Sighing, Apollo rolled his eyes. "It's my dad, moron."

"O-oh," Clay mumbled, looking a little shocked. "I knew that."

It was a full day later and still the image of Trucy's face as she held back tears lingered in Luke's mind. He'd been sitting at his old desk, staring at his latest draft of "The Adventure of the Curious Village" and attempting to edit it, but his eyes were only travelling across the page without actually taking any of it in. A part of him wished he'd thought to grab his violin when he dropped by his apartment after their visit to the detention centre the previous day, but he knew he wasn't much in the mood for music, and would likely just get the same result from trying to practise it now. Phoenix's words echoed in his head, disrupting any attempt by Luke to distract himself.

Trucy had been keeping a brave face despite her worry... right up until Phoenix opened the locket hanging around his neck to show her the picture inside. She stared at it in shock for a moment before seeming to break, hands pressed to her face as she crumpled in her chair. Luke wasted no time in shuffling his seat to her side to hug his sister, offering comfort as he gave their father a confused look.

Phoenix sighed, closing the locket and draping it back over his neck to hang neatly just above the zipper of his hoodie. "I can't say very much here," he sadly told them. "Full explanations will have to wait until later, I'm afraid."

Trucy sniffed loudly to herself, looking up from behind her hands long enough to ask, "What happened," she paused to hiccup, although Luke could have sworn she'd said 'to' in the gap, "Daddy?"

Phoenix closed his eyes, frowning. "Both of you have to remember, nothing we say here is to be passed on to Apollo until after the trial." He opened his eyes, looking at the both of them sternly. "Do you promise?"

Trucy nodded, but Luke was unsure. "Why?" he asked. "Isn't this all stuff you'll have told him anyway? To help him and Mister Gavin with the case?"

Another sigh, and Phoenix shook his head. "It wasn't part of my initial plan, but this trial has inadvertently turned into one of my 'secret missions'. Apollo will play his part in this better if he doesn't know the full story just yet."

Luke's reminiscings were interrupted by the sound of footsteps up the stairs outside their front door. He quickly rubbed at his eyes to brush away threatening tears and jumped to his feet, registering the thudding steps were familiar, but not enough to recognise the owners. He was halfway to the door before he saw the door handle rattle, quickly followed by a knocking on the opaque glass window.

"Trucy?" came a call from a voice Luke knew very well. "Are you in there?"

"Maya!" Blinking in surprise, Luke rushed to unlock the door, throwing it open with a relieved grin to see Maya and Pearl stood on their doorstep, travel bags in hand. "Pearl! What are you doing here?"

Maya scoffed, throwing her arms around the young man in a tight hug. "Whaddaya think?" she asked, before prompting Luke step back to allow the pair in. "We heard Nick had been arrested, so I cancelled all my appointments and took some time off to drop in on you." As she and Pearl placed their bags down, Luke closing and re-locking the door behind them, Maya turned to Luke with a curious frown, hands on her hips. "Actually, what are you doing here? Didn't you move out in February?"

Luke nodded. "Papa asked me to look after Trucy while he's in the detention centre," he explained, then rubbed at an arm nervously. "He's... not going to be happy about you two being here."

Maya again scoffed, Pearl nodding in agreement with a knowledgeable smile. "We can look after ourselves," the elder Fey simply said, then grabbed her bag and continued through to the office.

Taking Maya's lead, Pearl also picked up her bag, waiting for Luke to join her before they followed Maya. "Where's Trucy?" she asked, a worried frown on her face.

"In her room," Luke sighed, taking Pearl's bag to no complaint from the young spirit medium. "She's been locked up in there ever since I told her what happened. She's only come out to visit Papa and use the bathroom." A part of him wished he'd thought to time how long Trucy's shower had been the previous night, although he knew that particular fact would probably only make him worry for her more.

The trio made their way into the kitchen, and Maya placed her bag on the small dining table, looking around critically. "Man, I remember this place being a lot cleaner before you left, Luke."

Luke frowned, though he tried not to look as worried as he felt. "Well, Trucy's actually been keeping everything mostly in order," he mumbled, then looked between Pearl's bag in his hands and Maya's on the table. "Um, may I ask why you both appear to have travel bags with you?"

Pearl grinned. "It was Mystic Maya's idea!" she chirped.

Maya winked, giving the teen girl a proud smile. "Though Pearly helped me pull it off!" she boasted. To Luke, she explained, "We couldn't just leave you kids to fend for yourselves with Nick in the detention centre and all!" She stepped forward to pull the young man into another hug, patting his back and apparently firmly ignoring that her head only came up to Luke's eyeline at best. "Mommy will be here to look after you while Daddy's away, okay?"

Luke smiled, hugging Maya back appreciatively. He knew, if Apollo were here, his brother would be quick to point out that the two brothers were, quite literally, looking after themselves now, but Luke was raised better than to spit in the face of kindness... even though Apollo's complaints were only ever met with teasing smiles anyway. "Thank you, Maya," he whispered in reply.

As the pair parted from their hug, Pearl took her bag back from Luke with a smile. "I was thinking I might stay in Trucy's room," she announced. "Where are you staying, Luke?"

"In my old room," Luke replied. "I bought myself a new bed when I moved out, so my old one's still there."

"And I'll be staying in Nick's!" Maya added with a cheeky grin and a wink. "He's not using it right now after all!" Before either of the younger pair could reply, she had swept her own bag back into her arms and was marching off upstairs. "Let's go tell Trucy we're here, huh?"
At the top of the stairs, Maya dropped her bag on the floor, and Pearl was quick to copy her as she and Luke caught up. The elder spirit medium was already heading for Trucy's door, where she solemnly stood, gently rapping the wood with the knuckles of one hand. "Trucy?" she softly called. "You wanna come out, honey?"

Luke and Pearl hung back for a few moments, then the bedroom door opened and the pajama'd teenager within latched on to Maya in a tight hug, burying her face in the elder's shoulder. Trucy said nothing, silently shaking as she clung to her unofficial mother. Maya returned the favour, staying quiet and just hugging the teen back.

Hating to see his sister in distress (and cursing himself for not pushing harder to be there for her), Luke dashed forward, hugging Trucy from behind and resting his face on the top of her head. Pearl was quick to join in, running to hug her 'first cousin once removed' (she and Trucy had once spent an afternoon figuring out the exact term of their familial relationship, as unofficial as it technically was). The quartet stood for a long while, unmoving, before finally Trucy shifted in the centre and everyone else stepped back to give her space, watching the teen rub at her face and give her assembled family a small smile. "Thank you," she whispered.

Maya smiled warmly. "Pearly and I are going to be staying here a few days," she explained. "Why don't we all take a few minutes to settle in, get changed into something less conspicuous," she gestured to her and Pearl's robes, then to Trucy's pajamas with a wink, "and we can all go visit your dad together. Sound good?"

Trucy thought a moment, then nodded, still rubbing at one eye with a hand.

"It's okay if I stay in your room, right?" Pearl quietly added, biting a thumb nervously.

Giggling, Trucy nodded. "Of course you can, Pearly!" she replied, starting to look more like her usual chipper self. "We can have a sleepover!" As Pearl was grinning at the permission to stay, Trucy paused, frowning in worry as she then turned to Luke. "You're... gonna stay too, aren't you?"

Luke blinked in surprise. "Why wouldn't I?" he asked. "Papa asked me to look after you until he got back, and he's not back yet." He gave her a grin as she slowly began to smile again. "I'm not going to break a promise that important for so silly a reason!"

Trucy simply giggled in response.

"Alright then," Maya said, looking between Trucy and Pearl, "why don't you two get settled and changed, huh?"

"Yes, Mystic Maya!" Pearl cried, dashing to grab her bag and slip into Trucy's room.

Trucy hung back, stepping out of Pearl's way and giving Maya another hug. "Thank you for coming, Mommy," she said, then turned and followed Pearl, closing the door behind them.

The girls taken care of, Maya and Luke gave each other understanding looks before heading to their own rooms.
Hey Steel! I told everybody on the forum. How are things today?

Been better. It would help if Dad actually co-operated with us 😞. He's even asked Luke and Trucy not to talk to me, to 'let me focus on the case'. I swear I could punch him right now.

Aw, I'm sorry pal :( If it helps, I think I can get some time off to come see the trial in person. It's on Monday, right?

Yep, Monday. Luke and Trucy will probably be there too if you wanna find them.

Excellent! I'll keep an eye out, and see you on Monday then!

See ya Blackbird.

Detention Center
Visitor's Room

Phoenix's poker smile was firmly glued to his face as he sat down in his chair that afternoon, looking his lone visitor dead in the eyes. "Kristoph, glad you could make it!" he cheerfully announced.

Kristoph closed his eyes in a quiet sigh, looking more tired than anything. "I hopefully needn't remind you your trial is tomorrow," he said. "At this late stage, are you finally agreeing to co-operate with your own defence team?" His tone indicated he already had a suspicion of what the answer was going to be, despite his hopeful look.

Phoenix hummed to himself thoughtfully, somewhat enjoying what he thought might be his last chance to mess with the attorney. "Actually, I had more of a request," he admitted.

"Request," Kristoph bitterly repeated, a flash of darkness in his expression as he pressed at his glasses. "And what 'request' would this be, then?"

"It won't take long," Phoenix promised, keeping up his innocent grin as he lounged in the uncomfortable detention centre chair.

Kristoph still wasn't impressed. "And you couldn't ask your son to do this because...?"

Phoenix grinned. "Because he's not currently leading the case, is he?" he pointed out, as though his request was plainly obvious.

Kristoph paused, raising an eyebrow.

Resisting the urge to laugh, Phoenix shook his head, his smile never fading despite his serious tone. "Kristoph, I want Apollo to lead the defence in this trial."

At first, Phoenix thought maybe Kristoph hadn't heard as the attorney failed to react at all to the statement, but, after a few seconds, the man's eyes slowly widened. "You must be joking," he
On the contrary," Phoenix replied, sticking his hands in his pockets as he continued to grin at Kristoph, "I would never joke about something as solemn as a trial. This is my own life at stake."

"Exactly," Kristoph snapped, arms tightly crossed as his face tightened into a frown. "You know as well as I do that Apollo has no experience! With what little information we have, he has no hope of acquitting you!"

Phoenix's smile finally began to fade. "I'm afraid I'll have to disagree with you there: Apollo has sat in on a number of your trials since you took him as a junior partner, which is certainly more experience than I had in my first trial. He'll need to take that next step of an actual case eventually, so why not now?"

Kristoph only continued to scowl. "You would gamble your life like this merely to give him court experience?" he asked, then scoffed. "I'm sure you remember how he let his emotions get the better of him in his brother's trial last December. We can't rely on another miracle to save you."

Phoenix almost laughed, closing his eyes in thought. 'Meaning you haven't prepared any kind of forgery to pin it on someone else. All the better for Apollo's prospects, I'd say."

"Besides," Kristoph continued, a knowledgeable look on his face as he waved a hand dismissively, "the pre-trial meeting has been and gone. I am already registered as your attorney."

"And it's perfectly possible to switch that to Apollo," Phoenix pointed out, giving Kristoph a grin and a wink. "I haven't forgotten how trials work, Kristoph. Isn't it your job as my attorney to follow my request?"

Kristoph took a moment to respond. "Maybe," he admitted, "but as both your attorney and friend, it is my job to talk you out of a bad idea. I implore you to reconsider, Wright. I'm not considered the best attorney in California for nothing, and, considering your past and the difficulty of this trial in particular, Apollo would do better with a later case." He shrugged. "I could even grant him the next one that comes along if you are so desperate for him to begin taking charge on his own; I must agree, it would be a benefit to the firm to have us both working on separate cases at once."

Phoenix thought a moment, a small smile on his face. "Frankly, I think you're underestimating Apollo's ability," he said.

The other man scoffed, waving away Phoenix's concerns. "You may have been an attorney yourself once upon a time, but tell me again which of us has been working alongside that young man the past year?" He shook his head. "I've taught Apollo everything he knows, and he does not yet know enough to handle leading a case."

Phoenix shot Kristoph a glare. "And remind me which of us raised him as a son? If anyone knows what Apollo is capable of, it's his father."

"Then let's ask him, shall we?" Kristoph shot back with a dark look. At Phoenix's surprised confusion, he elaborated, "You may have adopted Apollo, but even then he was already almost grown. You by no means 'raised' him, Wright."

Phoenix stared, wide-eyed, at Kristoph for a long moment, torn between incandescent rage and the simple shock that Kristoph had the nerve to hang something as inconsequential as that over Phoenix's head. Slowly, his gaze turned into a glare. "He's still my son. Whether he lived under my roof for four or fourteen years doesn't matter." As Kristoph didn't seem to have a reply, still returning Phoenix's gaze with a stern stare of his own, Phoenix closed his eyes, looking away as he forced himself to calm down. 'One more day. One more day, and this will all be over.' "As your client, I'm asking you to put Apollo in charge of this case," he quietly insisted. "I know he can do this, especially if his teacher is there with him in court to guide him."

There was a very long pause, long enough that Phoenix began to worry Kristoph had simply given up and left, but, eventually, the other man sighed. "I suppose, as your attorney, I have little choice," he admitted. Phoenix looked up to see the man adjusting his glasses with a resigned expression. "I shall put through the paperwork tonight, and Apollo will be acting as your attorney in court tomorrow morning."

Phoenix nodded, finally allowing himself to smile again, this time genuinely. "Thank you, Kristoph."

Kristoph just sighed again, getting to his feet. "Of course, I shall also have to call him in to the office to hand over all the paperwork and give him warning. It seems to be a worrying trend that he is learning so much troubling news from me rather than you."

"It's not deliberate, I promise!" Phoenix laughed. "I'd call him myself, but they've taken my phone as evidence."

"Understandable," Kristoph replied, managing a small smile of his own before he turned and left the room. "Until tomorrow, Wright."

"Until then," Phoenix agreed, watching the other man disappear through the other door. The moment he was out of sight, the ex-lawyer's friendly smile faded into a stern frown. 'Tomorrow... tomorrow, you finally face punishment for one of your crimes, Gavin. And this revenge is going to taste so sweet.'

BLACKBIRD HELP IM DEFENDING MY DAD TOMORROW.

Um, yeah? Are you having last minute nerves, steel?

NO I MEAN MR GAVIN STEPPED DOWN AND IM DOING THE ACTUAL DEFENDING IN COURT HELP.

!?!?!? Are you serious!? Why'd your boss step down!?

Apparently Dad called him to the detention center today and asked to switch! I said I wasn't ready and Mr Gavin just said anything I had to say he'd already presented to dad and dad wasn't having any of it!!

Why does Dad want me to defend him!? I'm not ready for this!!!

Apollo, calm down. Where are you rn?

On the bus, heading home from the office.

Hm. It's not ideal, but... Hang tight and I'll give you a call

Ok.
When the phone in Apollo's hand rang, he instantly hit the button to pick up, pressing the small device to his ear as he huddled in a back corner of the half-empty public bus. "I really don't want to bother you, Blackbird..."

"Nonsense!" came Maggey's immediate reply from the tiny speaker. "You're my pal, and you clearly need to talk to someone!" She huffed. "Your dad won't talk to you, your brother and sister can't talk to you... Looks like it's left to me to talk to you!"

Apollo briefly smiled through his pained expression, mentally noting all the other members of his unofficial extended family that Maggey had overlooked in her brief list: Maya and Pearl he had left alone, reasoning Phoenix had probably also forbidden them from helping him, and Clay he had been expecting to see when he got home, though he wasn't sure whether or not his friend would actually try to help. His various aunts and uncles had very important jobs of their own he didn't want to interrupt, especially the few he had the number of, and he would feel uncomfortable demanding they spend time comforting him for something as silly as panicking about his first ever trial... on the contrary, they'd probably want to congratulate him. At the very end of the list was his employer and senior partner, and Kristoph was a totally different matter; There was no way Apollo was going to insist to his boss that he wasn't ready to lead a case... even if it was painfully true right now.

"So," Maggey continued, "Mister Wright's been arrested, and the night before the trial, he suddenly switches attorneys to use a newbie who he happens to be related to. Any ideas why?"

Apollo sighed. "Not really," he admitted. "I... think he was already planning the switch, though. Told me when we went to see him to have my own case file prepared... 'for practise'."

"Huh." Maggey thought for a moment. "Why'd he wait, then? Who makes their attorney's job harder by switching at the last possible minute!?"

That question suddenly seemed a very familiar one to Apollo... hadn't Phoenix himself once said that in relation to a case...?

"You'd think he'd know better as a former attorney himself!" Maggey pointed out, unimpressed. "At least he warned you a little, I guess. How's your boss taking it?"

"Okay, I s'pose," Apollo muttered, shrugging. "He said he'll be behind the bench with me in court. I think he's pretty mad at my dad, though."

"Can't blame him," she replied. "But hey, you'll have help in the actual trial! It's not like you'll be alone in there!"

Apollo shook his head. "N-no, but... Mister Gavin's the best attorney in the district! I've been trying to learn from him for over a year now, and..." He paused, his breathing quickening as he felt his throat tighten. "I-I've never been able to keep up with him in court, a-and when we were defending Luke, I-!"

"Whoa whoa, Steel, Apollo, stay calm!" Maggey interrupted as she heard her friend's distress.

"I'm not ready for this!" Apollo insisted, curling up against his quiet corner and pressing his free hand to his eyes. "I'm going to screw this up like I did Luke's trial, and Dad's going to end up in jail, because of me!"
"No, you are not!" Maggey shot back in a stern snap. "I might not know your father as well as you do, but I know for a fact that he wouldn't push you into something you weren't ready for! You can do this, Apollo!"

Apollo said nothing for a long moment, slowly bringing his breathing back under control. 'You're fine,' he repeated to himself. 'You're fine, you can do this. Even Blackbird thinks you can do this, so you can do this.'

"If I said I was planning to be in the gallery tomorrow," Maggey quietly spoke up when her friend didn't reply, "would that help, or just make you freak out more?"

A snort of laughter was Apollo's immediate reply, finally making the young man smile. "It wouldn't hurt," he admitted, grateful for another friendly voice of support in the terrifying crowds of the courtroom.

Maggey giggled in reply. "Well then, looks like my trip into the city tomorrow is a go!" she chirped. "Are you feeling better?"

Apollo was nodding before he remembered she couldn't see him. "Yeah, I think so. Thanks, um, Ms Byrde."

"Please, 'Maggey' is fine!" Maggey laughed in reply. "Besides, I've been 'Ms Gumshoe' for four months now... unless you meant 'Ms Bird' as in my username?"

As his friend continued to laugh, Apollo frowned in confusion, then smiled. "Oh yeah, I forgot about your 'ceremony-free wedding',' he giggled. "If you ever actually decide to hold a ceremony, I expect to be there, don't forget!"

"Of course!" Maggey replied. "I'd better let you go now, though. See ya tomorrow, pal!"

It wasn't often the Wright family had the opportunity to see their extended family on Edgeworth's side, so the sudden invitation to his apartment to close out 2024 with a 'Christmas get-together' was quickly accepted. Phoenix had hesitated when he learned this event was mostly because Edgeworth and his sister Franziska had not been in the same country at that time of year for a long while, but Trucy, Luke, and Apollo's excitement for the 'party' convinced him to agree to go regardless.

As it turned out, Edgeworth's invitations had not only been extended to the Wrights, but to Maya and Pearl too... as well as Maggey and Gumshoe, though they only learned of the latter pair when Phoenix and his two younger kids arrived at Edgeworth's home, being escorted through to the open living area by their host once the family appeared at his door.

Upon spotting their friends, Trucy raced ahead to give them hugs. "Hi Maggey! Hi Detective Gumshoe!" she cried, then noticed a pair of women standing nearby. Grinning as she recognised one of them, the teen bounced over to also pass on a greeting hug. "Hi Auntie Franziska!"

Phoenix resisted a nervous wince as he hurried after his daughter. "Um, Truce, maybe you shouldn't-!"

Franziska von Karma only smiled at the teenage girl, one hand idly resting near the looped whip on her belt. "It is a pleasure to see you again, young Trucy Wright. You've certainly grown since last we met."

Not noticing her father quietly sighing in relief behind her, Trucy nodded to her honorary aunt. "We've updated our act a lot, too! You should come and see it again!"

"I shall have to make time for it," Franziska agreed, then turned her attention to Luke, who was quietly greeting Maggey and Gumshoe through a much more sedate handshake. "I only count one of your brothers. Where is the other one?"

"That would be Apollo," Phoenix filled in, standing behind Trucy and placing a firm hand on her shoulder to keep her from trying to hug her 'aunt' again. "He had to drop by his apartment first. Shouldn't be too long." He then turned to the blonde woman beside Franziska with a friendly smile, nodding in greeting. "Hello again, Ms Andrews."

Adrian nodded to Phoenix in return. "It's been a long time, Mister Wright," she said, giving him a grin. "A lot has changed in five years."

"I don't believe you've been introduced to Adrian, Trucy," Franziska interrupted, changing the subject and giving Phoenix a smirk. "Perhaps it would be wise to do so for your children, Phoenix Wright."

Phoenix gulped, then hurriedly called Luke over.
The 'party', as quiet as it was, continued mostly uneventfully. The next to arrive had been, to Phoenix's surprise, not Apollo but Kay Faraday, who had raced in with a grin and leapt on Gumshoe with a loud cry of "Gummy!" After asking her father who the strange girl was and getting only a smile and "Why don't you ask her?" in reply, Trucy had rushed to introduce herself to Kay, and the two quickly became embroiled in a friendly argument over whether ninjas were magical or not, dragging everyone around them into one side or the other. Only Luke missed out on the hullabaloo of the young woman's entrance, having been occupied spending time with Pess in the next room.

After Kay, it was Maya and Pearl who arrived next, though only Phoenix seemed to notice Edgeworth showing them in, approaching them with a smile. "You took your time," he joked.

Maya scoffed, though she smiled back. "We've got a longer journey than you!" The pair quickly clasped hands, unwilling to be too affectionate in a more 'public' setting.

Pearl ran forward with a grin towards Trucy, distracting the girl from her discussion as she greeted her 'cousin' with a squeal of "Pearly!"

"Hello, Trucy!" Pearl replied as the two hugged, the conversation called to a halt as everyone quietened to acknowledge the new arrivals.

"Oh, Pearly, this is Kay!" Trucy quickly told her cousin, gesturing to the young woman nearby, then adding in a tone of mock outrage, "She doesn't think ninjas are magical!"

Kay playfully scoffed, rolling her eyes. "Yeah, 'cause ninjas are cooler than that! They don't need magic!"

Once Pearl had said her hellos to everyone ("Hello Mister Scruffy Detective and Ms Byrde! Hello Ms von Karma and Ms Andrews!"), Trucy ran to engulf Maya in a tight hug, loudly squealing, "Hi Mommy!"

Maya laughed as she hugged the girl back, pointing out, "It hasn't been that long since we last saw each other!"

Gumshoe waved to the older spirit medium. "Hey, Ms Fey!"

Kay crossed her arms, frowning in confusion. "'Mommy'? Isn't Trucy too old to be hers?"

"I must admit, that is a new development to me," Franziska replied, lightly brushing at a sleeve with a gloved hand, "although I can't say I'm surprised." She looked to Adrian with a smirk, and the other woman bit her lip to hide a laugh.

"Come now, Kay," Edgeworth cut in, surprising the girl as she twirled around to see him standing behind her with a smile, Luke standing at his side and Pess between them. "You've met Ms Fey before," Edgeworth continued. "It shouldn't be too much of a stretch to assume Trucy had adopted her as Wright adopted Trucy, Luke and Apollo."

Kay had to think a moment or two before she recalled her indirect introduction to Maya, the day after Phoenix lost his badge. "Oh yeah!" she cried. Brushing the subject aside, she then turned to Luke with a grin. "By the way, who's this, Mister Edgeworth? Did he sneak in the back?"

Luke only looked away uncomfortably as Kay winked at him. "I'm Luke," he said, then held out a hand as he forced a friendly smile. "Luke Triton, or, um, Wright. I-I must have missed you arriving; I was in the other room with Pess."

Kay giggled. "Wow, such a gentleman!" She shook his hand, grinning at his resulting proud smile.
"So that's where you went!" Maggey said, looking between Luke and the happy retriever at his feet with a smile. "I'd've thought you'd see so many animals at college, you wouldn't be sequestering yourself away with one on your time off!"

"Ah yes, you are taking veterinary medicine at an English university, are you not?" Franziska asked, gesturing with a hand. "How go your studies, Luke Triton?"

Luke nodded. "Just another six months to go," he replied. "I'm... hoping the animal shelter I volunteer at might be able to hire me once I graduate."

"That sounds great!" Adrian said, giving the young man a smile as she took the chance to be friendly. "Enjoying being back home for the holidays?"

Luke didn't immediately reply, frowning for a long moment in thought before finally returning his gaze to Adrian with an apologetic look. "Um... I-I'm originally English, so... Y-you'll have to be more specific on what you mean by 'home', Ms Andrews."

Blushing in embarrassment, Adrian decided to leave talking with Luke to everyone else.

When Apollo finally arrived, Phoenix offered to let him in to save Edgeworth the trip, and greeted his son at the door with a raised eyebrow. "What took you so long?"

Apollo sighed as he entered the house, removing his coat as his father closed the door. "Clay waylaid me with guilt-trips about how I was 'abandoning him' and 'oh it's so cold and lonely here all by myself!'" He scoffed, brushing off his cape as it was freed from under his winter coat, which Phoenix took to hang in the nearby closet. "He even managed to drag me into helping him look for something before I realised he was making it up just to waste my time!"

As they entered the main room, Trucy was distracted from showing off to Kay and Pearl to enthusiastically greet her brother with a loud cry of "Polly! What took you so long!?"

"Blame Clay!" Apollo shot back.

Not far away, Adrian and Maggey were sat together, chatting about how they met their respective partners. As Apollo approached to greet them, at Trucy's behest, Maggey waved to the twenty-year-old, calling, "Hey there, Steel!" with a wide grin.

Apollo smiled in reply, also giving his friend a wave. "Hey, Blackbird!"

Adrian blinked in surprise, looking between the two with wide eyes. "B... Blackbird...?" she breathed.

"Oh, um, our online handles," Maggey hurriedly explained, blushing in embarrassment. "We're friends online, so that's what we call each other."

"Yeah," Apollo agreed with a laugh, "I'm Steel and she's Blackbird!" He paused, rubbing at the back of his head. "More seriously though, I'm Apollo Wright. I think you've already met my dad and siblings...?"

Quickly pulling herself together, Adrian nodded, still casting a surprised glance or two at Maggey. "I-I'm Ce... Adrian," she said, forcing a cheerful smile for the young man. "Adrian Andrews. Your sister was telling me all about you earlier!"

Apollo gave her a grin, despite being a little embarrassed at the thought of what Trucy might have been telling people behind his back. "Heh... I should warn you though, Trucy likes to exaggerate..."
"Ooh, that reminds me!" Maggey cried, perking up as she gave Apollo a cheeky grin. "Ms Andrews here met your father on one of his cases!"

While Adrian hid a blush at the reminder of the story she had just finished telling her new friend, Apollo crossed his arms, thinking deeply for several moments. "Andrews... Oh, Adrian Andrews!" He looked back to Adrian with a grin. "You were in that case where Maya got kidnapped and the assassin saw your name and thought you were a guy and Dad called him out on it even though it might hurt Maya but then he and Uncle Edgeworth managed to save her and get the bad guy convicted!"

Adrian and Maggey both stared at Apollo in surprise, though Adrian also seemed a little horrified, repeating, "K-kidnapped!?"

"Geeze, I can't believe I didn't recognise the details of that one!" Maggey muttered to herself with a sigh. "Dick was telling me all about that kidnapping for weeks!"

It didn't take long for the conversation to turn to Apollo, touching on his in-progress law degree before the young man began to boast of his skill as a magician, which, he insisted, was at least equal to his sister's. Adrian, perhaps wanting to tease him, told Apollo to prove it, which he was more than happy to do: "A professional can perform anywhere, any time!" Before long, Adrian had pulled Franziska away from her friendly bickering with Edgeworth and the pair were being treated to a special 'show' by Apollo Gramarye... complete with Trucy standing nearby catcalling him.

"You're a hack!"

"Could I have some quiet in the audience, please?"

"I'm not in your audience!"

"Then you're a terrible stage-hand and you're fired."

It wasn't until Phoenix decided to add to the pranking by surprising Apollo with a photo that the impromptu show ended, with Phoenix, Trucy, Maya and Kay playing keep-away with Phoenix's Court Record as Apollo did his best to erase the photo. By the time the tablet computer ended up in Luke's hands (Kay had tossed it to him only for the young man to hand it over to Apollo with a smile and a "Here you go!"; The rest of the Wrights and Feys groaned at Kay for misjudging Luke and ending their game pre-maturely), the screen had locked, and Apollo, without the password to get into it, was forced to admit defeat and return the item to his father.

At the end of the evening, the assembled group slowly all packed up to leave, bidding their goodbyes to each other. Adrian, to Maggey's surprise, pulled the other woman aside with a nervous smile. "It was great to get to meet you tonight, Ms Byrde," the blonde woman said. "It... already feels like we're old friends!"

"Aw, that's so nice of you to say, Ms Andrews!" Maggey replied, though she wasn't sure what had happened to make the other woman think so. "We all had a wonderful time tonight; You'd have to thank Mister Edgeworth for that!"

Adrian gave a short laugh, nodding in agreement. "I... just wanted to thank you before we said goodbye."
"But surely we'll meet again, right?" Maggey pointed out with a friendly smile. "Dick and I are friends of Mister Edgeworth, and you're with Ms von Karma... It shouldn't be that hard to get in touch!"

"Y-yes," Adrian mumbled in reply. She paused a moment, then opened her mouth to speak, only to reconsider and close it again. After another long moment's pause, Maggey watching her curiously, Adrian simply sighed, giving her new friend a smile. "Until we meet again, BlackbirdLuck." Before Maggey could reply, Adrian had left.
Apollo resisted the urge to hug his bag for comfort as he walked through the massive double doors that led into the city courthouse. I'll be fine, I'll be fine, I'll be fine... I better be fine, or Dad gets... Well, best not to think about that. He had awoken early with Clay, and they had done some Chords of Steel training together, but Apollo had experienced enough stage fright in his life to recognise when he was doing more harm than good, and called their practise to a halt before long; He doubted he could drum up much respect in court with a voice hoarse from shouting.

Speaking of Clay...

"So where's it at?" Apollo's dark-haired roommate asked, looking around at the various staircases and corridors leading all over the maze of a building, newly in the midst of renovations. "Which number are we looking for?"

"You can go straight to Courtroom Number Two," Apollo told his friend with a raised eyebrow. "I'm meeting Mister Gavin and Dad in a Defendant's Lobby before the trial."

Clay nodded. "Right, right." He turned to Apollo with a grin. "Hey, d'ya think you'd be making all kinds of 'justice' puns right now if you hadn't changed your name back when you got adopted?"

Apollo blinked in surprise, then smiled. "Ha, probably!" he admitted. "It's too perfect not to... Besides, hasn't Justice always been on the side of Wright?"

Clay's grin widened. Shooting his friend a wink, he held up his hands, pointing 'finger-guns' at his friend.

"I'd say," Apollo continued with a chuckle, "by becoming a lawyer, I'm using Justice to do the Wright thing for my clients!"

Laughing, Clay stepped off towards one of the staircases, waving at his friend. "Yo, good luck, huh 'Pollo? I'll say 'hi' to Luke and Truce for you when I find 'em!"

"Later!" Apollo replied.

It took a few minutes for Apollo to find Defendant Lobby Three, and, cheered by his discussion with Clay, he was able to smile as he found his boss and father there already.

Kristoph looked up as Apollo came in, giving him a friendly smile. "Ah, good morning."

"Good morning, sir!" the young lawyer called, then turned to the relaxed figure slumped lazily on the lobby's couch. Raising an eyebrow, he incredulously asked, "Dad, are you asleep?"

Despite looking for all the world like he was napping, Phoenix smiled enigmatically and turned his face upwards to meet his son's gaze. "Now now, I know from experience how bad an idea it is to sleep just before a trial. What do you take me for, a common criminal?"
Apollo frowned. "Dad, you about to be tried for murder!" he pointed out, then huffed and moved over to sit at his father's side, noticing in the corner of his vision Kristoph moving away with the case-file to give the pair some privacy. "Are you... are you sure about this?" He gestured between himself and his father, explaining, "Having me defend you instead of Mister Gavin?"

Phoenix's jovial expression tightened a little. "As sure as I was when I adopted you," he quietly replied.

"But Mister Gavin's-!"

"You can do this, Apollo," Phoenix insisted, sitting up to give his son a more authoritative look. "I wouldn't ask you to do something so important if I couldn't trust you to pull it off."

Apollo looked away, thinking to himself, but didn't reply.

With a fatherly smile, Phoenix pulled a hand out of his hoodie pocket to rest on his son's shoulder. "I think you'll find once you're up there that it's just like standing up on stage with your sister, arguing over every minute detail."

Apollo failed to bite back a laugh at that.

"You'll see," Phoenix promised, buoyed by the sight of his son's half-hidden grin. "Just be confident."

"Y-yeah," Apollo quietly replied, looking up to meet Phoenix's face with a smile. "I won't let you down, Dad."

April 20, 10:00AM
District Court
Courtroom No. 2

"This court is now in session," the judge announced as he banged his gavel from up on his podium.

The old man in the yellow suit behind the bench opposite smugly smiled, flipping at his long hair flowing to his shoulders from around his prominent bald spot. "The prosecution is ready, Your Honour."

Apollo, fists pressed into the bench he stood by, jumped at his cue. "The defence is f-, uh, ready, Your Honour!" he called. "Dammit, almost said the defence was 'fine!' Don't lose your nerve now, Wright!"

The judge paused, frowning at a piece of paper and casting glances down at the defence bench. "Your name was... Mister Wright?" he asked, giving the young man a critical look. "And this is your first trial?"

"Yes, Your Honour!" Apollo replied, nodding and trying to not look as frantic as he felt. "I'm fine!"

The judge seemed impressed. "You seem remarkably confident for a first-timer! If a little tense, of course!" While Apollo tried not to blush in embarrassment of his inability to relax (and his better-than-expected ability to fake confidence), the old man turned to Kristoph, who was standing at Apollo's side. "Mister Gavin, I was under the impression that you would be heading up this case. No offence meant to the current attorney, naturally." He cast a small smile to Apollo, who forced one in return, not wanting to admit aloud he agreed with the judge's unsaid misgivings on the arrangement.

Kristoph sighed. "That was my intention, yes," he admitted. "However, a defence attorney must always cede to his client's wishes... and my client specifically requested Mister Wright."

"Odd," the judge murmured to himself, looking over his papers one more time before suddenly noticing something, looking surprised. "Ah! 'Wright'!" He turned to Apollo with a curious look. "You wouldn't happen to be related to the defendant, Mister Wright?" He frowned to himself. "Things could get very confusing with two Mister Wright's in this courtroom. One was quite enough."

Apollo thought for a moment, unsure how he could fix the judge's plight. "U-um, I used to be called 'Justice' a long time ago," he offered. He didn't think it would be a good idea to bring up the name 'Gramarye' in court, even if it was a more 'current' alternate name.

The prosecutor (Apollo's case documents called him 'Winston Payne') scoffed. "Well, a defence attorney would want to be called that, wouldn't he?" He patted at the small patch of hair in the centre of his forehead, giving the young attorney a condescending smile. "Gives off all the right impressions, doesn't it?"

'You bet it gives off all the 'Wright' impressions!' Apollo dearly wanted to shoot back.

"Ah, I know!" the judge again spoke up with a cheerful grin, apparently having not noticed Payne's interjection. "I'll call you 'Defence Wright' and 'Defendant Wright! That will keep it clear who I'm talking to!" Seeming very proud of himself and not waiting for a response, he then turned to look around at the court in general. "Let's begin!" he announced. "The defendant may enter the courtroom!"

Apollo bit his lip to keep from pointing out how much a mouthful 'Defence and Defendant Wright' were, standing still and watching as the bailiffs escorted in Phoenix from the side-room on the defence's side of the court. Just as in the lobby, Apollo's father was oddly relaxed, agreeably following the bailiffs to the witness stand, hands shoved deep into the pocket in the front of his hoodie. His head was pointed down, almost hiding his eyes above the calm smile on his face.

The judge sighed as he looked down at his defendant. "This is truly an unfortunate turn of events," he said, giving Phoenix, to Apollo's surprise, a genuinely sorrowful look. "I'm sorry we had to meet again under these circumstances. Long time no see, Defendant Wright."

Phoenix looked up, giving the old judge a shrug and a grin. "Let's put the past behind us, shall we? These days, I'm merely Phoenix Wright, piano player."

Apollo tried not to roll his eyes. 'Of all the times to play the fool, Dad... The 'poker' thing is kind of vital right now.'

"I won't speak of it further then," the judge agreed with a nod, then turned to the prosecutor. "If the prosecution would be so kind as to explain the charges. Mister Payne?"

Payne seemed to be giving Phoenix an almost gleeful smile. "To think, I saw you enter this room a fresh attorney, and now I'll see you leave in chains."

This time, Apollo did roll his eyes. 'Okay, we get it, you all know my Dad!'

Apart from a small frown, Payne seemed to brush Phoenix's jibe off, finally getting to business. He turned to his notes, clearing his throat. "The crime occurred at the Borscht Bowl Club, a Russian restaurant. The defendant, Phoenix Wright, took the victim, a customer..." He paused, seeming almost gleeful as he animatedly continued, "And he hit him! Wham! On the head! Smack!" He whacked a fist into his other hand a few times to demonstrate, then brushed off his suit and stood still, smugly brushing back his hair. "Killed him cold."

Apollo resisted the urge to demand the prosecutor shut his mouth immediately.

"Hmm," the judge hummed to himself in thought. "A customer at the restaurant, you say? And the defendant, you say he was...?"

"The pianist for the club, it seems," Payne replied, looking slightly confused at the notion.

The judge's eyes widened in shock. "Phoenix Wright... a pianist?"

For a moment, Apollo wondered why the both of them seemed so surprised, then remembered how, once it had sunk in what his new father's job was, he hadn't understood it at first either. 'Should I speak up and explain it, or...?'

Unfortunately, Payne interrupted Apollo's chance, reaching under his desk and pulling out a green glass bottle. "This is the weapon that took the victim's life: A bottle of grape juice, complete with the defendant's fingerprints," he announced, brandishing the item for all to see before leaving it to rest on his bench. "Grape juice is apparently our defendant's drink of choice."

Apollo sighed, burying his face in one hand. 'You and your damn grape juice, Dad.'

The judge nodded solemnly. "The court accepts the deadly bottle as evidence." He briefly paused, looking over the documents on his podium. "So, the victim was a customer at this restaurant... but just who was this, erm, 'Shadi Smith' fellow?"

Payne hid an uncomfortable wince, and Apollo couldn't help but wryly smile as he realised the prosecution knew as little about the victim as the defence did. "We believe he was a traveller, Your Honour."

"A... traveller?" the judge repeated, confused.

"According to his passport," Payne continued, referring to his notes, "he had been out of the country for a number of years. He had only returned recently, though his place of residence is unclear."

As they discussed the victim, Apollo turned his attention to the autopsy report sitting on the bench before him. It had been handed to Kristoph in the pre-trial meeting the previous day, then passed on to Apollo after Phoenix requested the change of attorney, and it had been bugging the young man ever since. The name of the victim he didn't recognise (which wasn't a surprise, given Apollo's awful track record with recalling names), but the small photo taken from the dead man's passport was naggingly familiar. 'I'm certain I know this guy... but from where? And if I know him... Dad must know him too.' He cast a glance to the witness stand, but Phoenix had his head down-turned, still smiling and looking for all the world like he was totally in control of his awful situation.

"And he had some sort of connection with the defendant?" the judge asked.

Payne paused. "That, too, is unclear at present, Your Honour," he admitted. "We believe they first met at the Borscht Bowl Club on the night of the crime."

The judge frowned, looking as confused as Apollo felt. "If they had only just met, then why murder?" he asked. "Perhaps the victim slighted the defendant's piano playing?"

Apollo again resisted the urge to roll his eyes. 'Given the way Dad mocks himself, making fun of his questionable piano skills would only result in him agreeing with you.'

"That doesn't appear to have been the case," Payne replied, beginning to look smug again. "No, the motive had nothing to do with the defendant's lack of playing skill... at least, not piano playing." He smirked, tapping at his tablet computer, and Apollo felt his hands tightening into fists as he began to guess what the man was implying. "I'll let this photo explain what I mean," Payne added, and, a moment later, the holographic screens around the room flickered into life.

The audience in the gallery murmured amongst themselves, as Apollo had now learned they often did on first sight of the victim, and, indeed, the black and white picture on the monitors showed a man lying limp in one of the chairs of the Hydeout, his hat draped over his eyes as though he were only sleeping. Around him, Apollo quickly noted the remains of the poker game on the table, along with what looked like the murder weapon. Cards littered the carpet below, barely visible in the picture, and light flickered in through the small window on the wall in the background, illuminating the cupboard that hid the secret tunnel.

Still Apollo couldn't keep his eyes off the murder victim. Just who was he?

"As we can see," Payne continued, still smugly smirking, "a game of poker was in progress at the scene of the crime."

The judge almost jumped in surprise. "Wait a second!" he cried. "Isn't poker gambling? That's a crime in and of itself!"

Apollo blinked in surprise, momentarily frozen. "Wait, what!? N-no it isn't!"

"Indeed," Payne chuckled, shutting down the holograms with a prideful swipe of his fingers. "It appears our defendant has fallen to become the basest sort of criminal!"

Apollo barely registered the growing hubbub of the gallery around them before blurting out "OBJECTION!" his face turning red from barely concealed rage. "N-no he hasn't! Poker isn't a crime!" He saw Payne only smirking knowingly at him, and was about to shout some more at the man before he heard a gentle cough at his side, and turned to see his mentor calmly smiling nearby.

"Let me handle this one, Wright," Kristoph quietly instructed, then turned to address the court. "It is true that the defendant was engaged in a game of poker with the victim," he announced, "yet it was only that: a game, in the purest sense. A competition, Your Honour."

That seemed to surprise Payne. "A... competition?"

"Yes," Kristoph replied, "a test of wits, a silent clash of passions." He closed his eyes, flicking at his hair. "Only the cards, their backs wreathed in blue flame, know its final outcome."

Apollo, having managed to calm himself down, frowned in thought. "Wait, when did we learn they were using the blue deck...?"

The judge was confused for a different reason: "Er, come again?"

Payne crossed his arms, unimpressed. "The cards on the table had blue backs, Your Honour," he explained. "I believe the defence was waxing poetic in an attempt to mystify those present..." He paused, scowling. "And impress women."
Although still confused, Apollo reasoned he must have missed the detail of the card backs being mentioned in the pre-trial meeting. I wonder how it even came up?

The judge shrugged in acceptance of Payne’s answer, then moved on. "That will be our first order of business here then: To find out more about this fatal game of cards." He looked to Phoenix, who finally seemed to react to the goings-on of the court by returning the old man’s silent gaze. "Defendant, you will testify to the court about the poker competition held the night of the crime," the judge instructed, and Apollo was certain he saw a soft, pitying look in the man’s eyes.

Phoenix simply smiled. "My pleasure."

View the Court Record
"I am a pianist by trade," Phoenix explained, almost leaning on the witness stand as he gave the court a relaxed smile, "yet I can hardly play at all. My real job is to take on interested customers over at the poker table. The room where we play and the competition in there are," he shrugged, seeming almost bashfully proud, "the club's main attractions. The rules are simple: we play a game of poker using two decks of cards." He gave a pointed look to Payne, who looked away with a scowl. "That's all it is: a game. And our customers are happy."

The judge seemed thoughtful. "A pianist who can't play piano?"

Payne smirked, taking the opportunity for another biting remark: "Better than a defence attorney who can't defend!"

Apollo bit his lip, hands tightening into fists. 'What I wouldn't give to get that guy a knuckle sandwich right now...' Phoenix, unsurprisingly, was unfazed.

The judge frowned at the prosecution's comment, but didn't speak up. "Very well. The defence may begin the cross-examination."

After a moment, Apollo jumped. 'Oh right, that's me!' "Yes, Your Honour!"

Kristoph's eyes subtly narrowed as he watched his student. "Will you be alright?" he quietly asked.

"Of course, sir!" Apollo insisted, nodding. "No need for help here! I think I've got this one covered!"

Kristoph raised an eyebrow. "I think you'd better do more than 'think'," he replied, but said no more, deciding to leave the young attorney be.

Apollo turned his attention to the updating transcript, belatedly wondering just what his goal was supposed to be when cross-examining the defendant. Finding lies and inconsistencies was what you did with witnesses, not your own client! A part of him wanted to add that his father knew better than to lie on the stand, but, upon giving the overly-calm Phoenix another glance, he had to admit he knew his 'witness' better than that. Feeling the expectant gaze of the entire court on him, Apollo randomly picked a question from thin air, one he already knew the answer to, looking up at the witness stand. "U-uh... Y-you say you're a pianist... but you can only play one song...?"

The judge was surprised. "Only one?" he repeated. "Is that true?"

Phoenix grinned. "'One' is usually all anyone wants, on the rare occasion they demand it," he boasted, and Apollo resisted the urge to groan. "The title of 'pianist' is just a mask; A respectable face I wear for the world at large."

Payne scoffed. "Then they pay you just to play poker?" he asked, condescension dripping from his tone.

"That would seem to be the case," Phoenix replied with a smile, apparently ignoring Payne's patronising for what Apollo could only assume was personal enjoyment. "I am a professional, after all."

"Bah!" Payne cried, frowning almost bitterly. "Do I detect pride in that statement?" He smirked, tapping at his head. "It's just hard for an honest, hard-working member of society like me to imagine-!"

Phoenix looked away, but failed to hide his own amused smirk. "Yes, your imagination was always a bit limited, Winston."

That made the prosecutor pause, looking shocked. "Wh-What...?"

"I've played poker for seven years in that little room," Phoenix continued, turning a stern face to the court at large. "And I've never. Lost. Once."

Apollo couldn't help but be impressed by his father's boast, despite being well aware of it already. The silence in the court, and the look on Payne's face, helped, though he made himself bite back a proud grin.

"You see why the customers come now?" Phoenix asked, beginning to smile again, a fierce determination in his eyes. "Defeat the undefeated poker champion! It's quite a draw. That is, I'm quite a draw."

'Okay, that's enough boasting, Dad.' Hiding a smirk, Apollo crossed his arms. "The Hydeout too," he reminded his father. "Don't forget that."

"Ah, yes!" Phoenix cried, shooting his son a grateful smile. "The Borscht Bowl Club has quite a history! It used to be a gathering spot for black market types back in the day." He shrugged. "All in the past now, of course, but suffice it to say there were a lot of deals being made under the table, right there in that room."

The judge tugged at his beard thoughtfully, tapping at his own screens to reactivate the holograms with the photo of the Hydeout. "A smoky room, gambling hoods... You know, just looking at this picture makes me feel 'bad!'"

Although Apollo raised an eyebrow, Phoenix seemed to be expecting such a response from the old man on the podium. "The bosses gather around the table, cutting deals, safe from the eyes of the law," he continued, playing along with the judge's mental image. "Meanwhile, a goon keeps watch through the small window." He nodded again to the photo on the hologram. "I can practically picture it now!" He laughed a moment, then switched gears to continue, "The room has a few other tricks to it; Common knowledge to our regulars." He cast a glance at the defence bench. "At any rate, they come to play poker in a room steeped in history. Despite the dark past, it's all just good, clean fun."

Apollo nodded. "That's also why there are two decks of cards," he added. "To prevent cheating."

"Exactly," Phoenix agreed, shooting his son a smile. "No one can slip in cards if you alternate decks."

"There's something else I noticed," the judge said, still staring at the photo and gesturing to it. "In addition to the cards on the table, there are some lying scattered on the floor.""

"Precisely," Kristoph cut in, eyes closed as he continued to wax lyrical. "Cards on the table, cards upon the floor... Each one forming a complete deck. A crime scene painted blue by a sad sweep of cards." He smiled, brushing at his fringe. "It's poetic, really."
'Could we do without the poetry?' Apollo asked himself.

"Incidentally," Phoenix picked up with a smile, "the two types of cards we use? One deck is red, and the other blue."

The judge hummed in thought. "As I recall," he said, "in poker you make five-card 'hands'. I can see how it would be easy to cheat."

Apollo noticed a flash of a smirk on Phoenix's face. "Yes," the man quietly agreed, "a game of 'hands'..."

The young attorney stared at his father with a frown. 'Just what are you playing at, Dad?'

Apparently satisfied, the judge nodded. "I believe the court understands the nature of this competition of yours sufficiently," he announced.

"Well, of course!" Apollo cried, arms crossed as he hid a sigh of relief. "It was just a simple game, like we said!"

The judge gave the young attorney a stern stare. "Are you sure?"

Apollo was too startled by the question to respond beyond a confused "Huh?"

"People are not murdered over 'simple games', Defence Wright," the judge pointed out, with a wisdom Apollo hadn't been expecting from the dotty old man. He turned to Phoenix. "Defendant, you were in the room the very moment that the crime occurred... yet you claim no connection to the crime?"

Apollo saw Phoenix look at him, and recognised with a jerk he was being prompted to react on his father's behalf. "O-objection!" he cried, but once the word had left his mouth, he discovered to his horror that he hadn't the slightest idea what to follow it up with. "U-uh... he, uh... Um..." Turning red, he stepped back from the bench, turning wide eyes to his father in a silent plea for help.

Although Phoenix seemed sympathetic (though amused) at Apollo's tied tongue, it was Kristoph who came to his rescue: "The defendant has not yet testified anything about the crime, Your Honour," he explained with his constant calm smile. "As of now, he has only spoken of the game of poker played in his place of work."

Apollo sighed in relief, but still kicked himself mentally at the blunder. 'More proof I'm just not cut out for this yet...'

The judge seemed surprised. "Ah, of course!" he agreed with the elder attorney.

"In which case," Kristoph continued, turning to Phoenix, "there is one thing I'd like made clear, Wright; Namely, your connection to the case at hand..." He gave a pointed look to Payne who was watching somewhat nervously from the opposing bench, warning the prosecutor to stay quiet. To Phoenix, he added, "And I'd like to hear it from you."

Phoenix seemed to think a moment, then smiled. "Sure, why not?" he agreed.

The judge nodded. "Very well. The defendant will amend his testimony."

With the entire court's eyes on him, Phoenix scratched his chin in thought for several moments, then looked up with a lazy smile. "I plead silence regarding the murder. But I will say I never touched the murder weapon."
Apollo blinked in surprise, then frowned and cried out, "W-wait, hold it!" He stared at his father, fists pressed into the bench in front of him. "Silence!? Are you freaking kidding me!?!"

"The defendant has the right to refuse to testify," Phoenix explained, giving Apollo an infuriatingly calm smile before looking away with a smirk. "I haven't forgotten everything about the law."

'Clearly!' Apollo wanted to shout, but held himself back, restraining himself to simply glaring at his father. "And just what am I supposed to do with 'silence'!?!"

"Your job," Phoenix replied with a raised eyebrow, almost laughing. "Turn it around in our favour."

Apollo could almost feel steam coming out of his ears. 'I COULD KILL YOU RIGHT NOW, DAD. THE DEATH SENTENCE WOULD BE SO WORTH IT.'

The young attorney's glaring was interrupted movement at his side, and Kristoph muttered in Apollo's ear, "Wright, didn't you detect anything odd about that testimony?"

Apollo gave his mentor a curious look for a moment before blinking in surprise. "Oh, yeah!" He turned back to the witness stand. "And another thing! What do you mean 'never touched the murder weapon'!? Have you not been paying attention!?!"

Phoenix just smiled knowingly, scratching at his face. "I guess not," he said. "Does the evidence contradict my testimony?"

Apollo rolled his eyes. "Yes!" he cried in exasperation. 'You know full well what I'm getting at! Stop pretending and take your own friggin' trial seriously!'

The judge looked between defence and defendant with a confused look. "Something the matter, Defence Wright?"

Payne giggled to himself, looking smug again. "Too bad our new defence attorney never learned how to play dumb!"

Apollo blinked in surprise, snapping out of his anger instantly. 'O-oh, right... pointing out that lie helps the prosecution's case...'. He frowned. Thanks for leading me into THAT trap, DAD.'

"What's this, Mister Payne?" the judge asked.

"The bottle in question," Payne explained, tapping at the piece of evidence still prominently displayed on his bench beside him. "As I mentioned earlier... it was covered in the defendant's fingerprints!"

It took barely an instant for Apollo to react, slamming his fists on the bench before him and shouting "OBJECTION!" as loud as he dared, considering what his experience on stage had taught him about reigning in the 'Chords of Steel'. "What's so strange about fingerprints on a bottle in a restaurant!? That alone doesn't prove anything! There'd have to be something special about them to be-"

A giggle crossed the room from the prosecution, and Payne grinned triumphantly. "Oh, you are right on track, aren't you? It's true, I must admit: These aren't normal fingerprints!" He gestured to the bottle. "These are upside-down!"

Apollo restrained a sigh as the judge and gallery all gasped in surprise. 'Good job, Dad... just make yourself look more guilty, why don't you...'

"He was holding the bottle inverted!" Payne further gleefully explained, even demonstrating by picking up the bottle himself by the neck. "And the one reason to hold a bottle like this is to brain someone with it!"

'Somehow, I'm not convinced.' Apollo's attention was taken by the bottle in Payne's hand. In his head, he was remembering a night long ago in Kurain, huddled with his family as they spoke of a surprise date in a London court, with a girl accused of similarly braining someone with a pipe that bore her fingerprints. He didn't doubt the memory that came to mind was no co-incidence.

"Defendant!" the judge called to Phoenix accusingly. "Can you explain your fingerprints on this bottle to the court?"

Phoenix glanced once at Apollo, then smiled as he closed his eyes. "I stand by my plea of silence regarding the murder," he announced. "For now."

The judge stared at him a moment, humming in thought. "This could hurt your case, Defendant Wright," he pointed out.

Payne scoffed, brushing at his hair. "I'm sure he's uncooperative because he's hiding something," he spat with a bitter tone.

"Objection," came a calm call from Apollo's right, and everyone turned their attention to Kristoph, hands clasped behind his back. "Your Honour," he said, though his eyes were on Payne, "you seem to have forgotten something."

"And what might that be, Mister Gavin?" the judge asked, confused.

Kristoph smiled. "On the night of the crime, who was it who reported the murder to the police?"

Payne jumped a little in surprise. "W-well, that was the defendant, Mister Wright," he admitted, rapidly adding, "but still, that-!"

"Really!?!" the judge interrupted, as shocked as the gallery gasping around him.

"Erm, yes," Payne meekly replied, his fire seemingly gone for now as he turned his full attention to his papers. "According to the case file, the murder was reported from near the scene, by a call from the defendant's cell phone." He reached under his bench, pulling out a familiar, battered mobile phone, its battery held in by a small, glue-streaked mat of tape.

Apollo thought a moment, pressing a finger to his forehead. "Where exactly was the call from?" he asked, running through a list of possibilities in his head. "The restaurant? The street outside?"

Payne bit his lip, then turned to tap away at his tablet computer. "Let's... take a look at a diagram of the murder scene, shall we?" he instead replied, and the holograms flickered back to life with a diagram of the familiar basement, Smith's body outlined in its chair by the poker table. "The victim was murdered in a small room in a basement two floors down from ground level. Of course, cell phones can't get reception so far down." He tapped on the stairs, which briefly flashed white. "The defendant used the stairs in this hallway to go above ground. The call came from the first floor of the restaurant."

The judge regarded the old phone on the prosecutor's bench thoughtfully as Payne again shut down the holograms. "I see... and this is the phone that made the call?"

"The defendant could have just fled the scene of the crime if he so chose," Kristoph pointed out. "Yet, he fulfilled his duty as a citizen and reported it to the authorities." He looked at Payne, the smallest smirk on his face. "And you claim he is being 'uncooperative'...?"
Payne gulped nervously, and Apollo tried to hide a smile at his mentor's clear victory, as minor as it was.

"I think the prosecution has toyed with our client enough for the time being," Kristoph continued, turning his gaze to the judge.

"T-toyed!?!" Payne cried, trying and failing to look confident through his nervous sweating. "I assure you, no-one is more serious about-!"

"What was it you said?" Kristoph interrupted, looking back to Payne. "The defendant was 'in the room the very moment that the crime occurred'? How can you possibly know this?"

The judge seemed surprised. "That's a good question! How indeed!"

"Simple!" Apollo spoke up, noticing Kristoph frowning in the corner of his eyes as the young attorney took over for his mentor with a wide smile. "He has a witness, of course!"

Payne looked between the two with a confused look, then sighed, crossing his arms. "You're more perceptive than you look," he muttered, then looked to Kristoph, "and you're certainly as good as they say you are."

Kristoph didn't respond. Apollo was too gleeful over the tiny victory against the smug prosecutor to explain they'd been expecting said witness from the start.

The judge nodded. "Very well. The prosecution may call its first witness to the stand."

View the Court Record
Once Phoenix was escorted from the witness stand, it took only a minute for the bailiffs to bring in a short young woman, about Apollo's age, all bundled up under layers of heavy furs, an apron almost comically added on top. Wavy blonde hair spilled out from under her woollen cap, and she seemed to be carrying a tray in one mittened hand. As Apollo watched, she looked around the court frantically, then seemed to glance in his direction and immediately dive behind the witness stand, shivering.

Payne sighed, apparently deciding to pretend he hadn't seen what his witness was doing. "The witness will state her name and profession."

"H-hold on just a moment!" the judge interrupted, looking around the courtroom as he seemed to have missed the woman's arrival. "Where's the witness?"

Payne gave Apollo a wry stare. "I surmise that she has been frightened by the defence's demonic-looking horns."

Apollo rolled his eyes. 'Yeah, make fun of the hair... real original...'

"Have no fear!" the judge told the witness, a fatherly look in his eyes. "If any horns point in your direction, this court will cut them off!"

The young woman seemed to believe the old man's assurances, peeking above the witness stand to peer up at him. "You... are sure?" Apollo was a little surprised to hear what seemed to be a thick Russian accent in her voice, though he supposed it made sense for her to be working in a Russian restaurant.

"I swear it on my gavel!" the judge replied, waving the small hammer with a friendly smile. "Please, come out."

The woman thought about it a moment more, casting a glance to Apollo that only made the attorney roll his eyes again. "Well, if you are sure it is okay," she said, and slowly began to extract herself from behind the stand.

The judge cleared his throat. "Now, the prosecution-" He promptly cut himself off as he saw the witness arranging her covered plate of food as she stood at the stand. "W-wait a minute!" The old man shot a glare down at Payne. "Would the prosecution care to explain the witness's, erm, paraphernalia!?"

"Er, yes," Payne muttered to himself, fiddling nervously with his glasses. "She is a professional, Your Honour. Those are... merely the tools of her trade."

The judge blinked at him for a moment. "And that would be...?"

The woman smiled sweetly. "My name... is Olga Orly," she spoke up. "I am employed as waitress in Borscht Bowl Club restaurant."
"Then... why the camera?" the judge asked, casting glances at the yellow object hanging around her neck. Apollo was surprised to notice it himself; Cameras weren't usual gear for the restaurant's waitresses.

"Of course," Olga replied, patting her camera, "it is my pride to serve borscht that is naming restaurant! But I also perform," she paused, mitten to mouth in thought, "how it is said? Other service."

The judge tugged at his beard for a moment. "I take it one of these other services is taking the customers' pictures?"

Olga nodded eagerly. "Da, da! Like, for example," she looked to Payne, a hand on her camera, "this one." Payne seemed to silently sigh to himself, tapping at his computer and displaying on the hologram screens a colour photo of the upper room of the restaurant, covered in its usual piles of fake snow. On one side, sitting with his back to his piano, was Phoenix, in his usual hoodie and with Trucy's beanie on his head. Opposite him, at the table, was a dark man in a white suit: unmistakably the victim.

The courtroom gasped, along with the judge. "Th-that's... the defendant?"

"Indeed," Payne sighed, a certain amount of disinterest in his tone. "On the night of the murder."

Olga gestured to the victim, a small smile on her face as she sweetly explained, "Man in white hat, is one who has gone kaput."

The judge nodded. "Indeed, that is the victim." The gallery's mutterings began to rise in volume, forcing the judge to bang his gavel. "Order! Order!" Once quiet had returned to the air, he huffed to himself. "This is quite a piece of evidence to casually drop into our laps!"

"It is same way as I drop cold bowls of borscht on laps of customers," Olga replied. "Casually."

The judge considered her words, humming in thought. "Then the court will casually accept this new evidence."

As the holograms powered down, Apollo brought up the photo again on his Court Record, frowning at the image of his father with the victim. 'It's still bugging me who this guy is... Where have I seen him before?'

"Now, witness," Payne spoke up, attracting Apollo's attention back to the proceedings. "Where were you at the time of the murder?"

"I was in room," Olga readily explained. "The Hydeout, we call it."

The judge thought a moment. "I believe we've heard that term before."

"Is room where famous gangster 'Badgai' was arrested," Olga explained cheerfully, only to turn more morose as she added, "Is room where murder took place." As the court gasped in surprise, she instantly switched her frown to a grin and grabbed her camera, pointing it at the defence bench before pausing and looking disappointed at the two attorneys' lack of a reaction. By then, the moment had passed for surprising people with photos, so she simply dropped it to again hang from her neck.

Instinctively, Apollo didn't trust this woman. Along with being the only other person present at the time of the murder, something rang as false to him about her entire demeanour. She didn't seem to exactly be lying, but something about her was a falsehood... he just hadn't figured out what yet.
"Very well, witness!" the judge announced. "You will testify to the court about that night's events!"

Olga nodded, thinking to herself a moment before she seemed ready to begin. "That night, customer asked me to deal cards for game," she explained. "It was cold... Both players played with hats on, da. The victim, he plays whole time with hand on locket at his neck." She patted her camera, as though imitating the victim's actions. "Then, last hand is done! But something terrible has happened, da!" She paused to shiver, looking scared. "That man flew at victim, and is strangling him to death!"

Apollo restrained a growl, fists tightening at his sides.

The gallery murmured to itself, but the judge was deep in thought. "Incidentally," he asked, "who won the game?"

"Isn't it obvious?" Payne scoffed, regaining some of his lost self-confidence as he smirked. "The winner was the victim, Mister Smith!"

"Objection!" Apollo instantly shot back, fists slamming his bench as he glared at the prosecutor. "That's ridiculous! My dad would never lose!"

Kristoph gently cleared his throat, and Apollo looked up to see his mentor watching the young attorney disapprovingly. "Wright, maybe you can come up with a more legitimate objection?"

"But that is legitimate!" Apollo argued. "He hasn't lost in seven years!"

Payne chuckled darkly. "I know it's hard to admit such a thing about your dear Daddy, but take it from me, it happens." He paused to flip his hair. "I didn't lose a case my first seven years as prosecutor, either."

Meanwhile, the judge was watching Apollo, confused. "I'm sorry, but what does your father have to do with this, Defence Wright?"

Apollo shuffled uncomfortably, having forgotten he'd already dodged the bullet of explaining that at the beginning of the trial.

"You spotted it yourself only this morning, Your Honour," Payne spoke up, giving Apollo an odd look between a smirk and a frown, like he couldn't decide if he liked this or not. "Why else would the great ex-attorney appoint a nobody to defend him? He's our young defence attorney's dear old daddy."

Despite the distraction of his embarrassment at being 'outed' and his anger at Payne for the prosecutor's choice of words, Apollo noticed Olga gasping in surprise, shooting the young attorney a wide-eyed glance.

"Ah, yes!" the judge cried with a proud smile. "I did notice that!" He paused, then frowned again, turning to Apollo. "But... You're Phoenix Wright's son? I wasn't aware he had children."

Apollo thought about answering, but decided there was too much to say. 'If he's a friend of Dad's, he can ask Dad. Later.' "Does it really matter, Your Honour?" he asked with a sigh.

Oddly enough, Payne seemed to agree. "Incidentally," he announced, tapping at his computer with a smug smile, "I have some evidence here that the defendant did indeed lose." Before anyone could interrupt him, the holograms flickered back to life, this time displaying another police photo: a colour image of the poker table, before it was cleared. The victim's white suit was even visible in the far chair. "These are the poker chips as they lay the very moment of the crime," Payne explained. "The hand and chips on this side," the near side of the table was highlighted, "belong to the defendant, Phoenix Wright. Those on the far side," the highlighting moved to the stated side, "belonged to the victim, Mister Smith."

Apollo could feel himself going pale. Just as Payne had said, it appeared the final hand was won by the victim; Although both men miraculously had a full house with two aces each, Smith had three kings, and Phoenix three sevens. The chips, however, confused him: At a glance, he could see Phoenix had been winning up 'til then, as he had four of the more valuable red chips while Smith had only two. Was it possible the inevitable had finally happened? Had Phoenix... finally misread an opponent? 'Oh, if only I'd been there with you that night, Dad... I could've stopped all this!'

Apollo's attention was suddenly dragged back to the trial by the judge's announcement of "The defence may cross-examine the witness!" Jumping in surprise, he quickly turned his attention down to his Court Record, seeing the hologram displays shutting down in the corners of his eyes as he brought up the updating transcript. Quickly re-reading Olga's testimony, he thought a moment. 'She was the dealer... The owner had the AC on full again... The victim had a... Wait a second. I don't remember seeing that.' Apollo frowned, then looked up to the waitress. "The victim had a locket?"

Olga nodded. "I believe it was good luck charm, da? He gripped it many times as he played that night."

"Yes, he must have felt as though it might carry him to the moon and the stars!" the judge cried, musing to himself with a smile. "Though if it were small enough to fit around his neck, it wouldn't have much lift..."

Apollo was distracted from his own thoughts by the judge's odd comment. "Um... This is a locket we talking about, isn't it?" he asked. "I mean, a pendant with a picture in it? Not a 'rocket'?"

The judge seemed surprised, then frowned, avoiding Apollo's gaze. "Of course! I knew that!" he insisted, and Apollo didn't need his bracelet to know the old man was lying. "It was probably a pendant shaped like a rocket. That's why she called it that."

Apollo simply stared back at the judge in disbelief. "No, a locket's a locket!" he pointed out, the ridiculous argument strongly reminding him of his sister. "It doesn't matter what shape it-!"

"It's considered bad form to poke fun at the hard-of-hearing," Kristoph quietly interrupted, calling Apollo's rant to a quick halt.

The younger attorney gave his mentor an incredulous look, but decided to let it go, returning his attention to the transcript on his computer. Although looking at the waitress's final statement still enraged him, "The absolute last thing Dad would do if he lost would be 'strangle someone!'", it was only now he was calmer that he noticed the contradiction in the testimony. "Ms Orly... You say the victim was 'strangled'? That's odd."

Olga nodded in surprising agreement. "Da, normal customers only choke on borscht."

The statement threw Apollo for only a moment before he decided to ignore it, activating the holograms to throw up the autopsy report, highlighting the cause of death. "N-no, I mean that isn't how the victim died! He was killed by a blow to the head!"

"Aack!" the waitress cried, eyes wide in shock, and she almost dropped her tray before scrambling to right it.

It was beyond obvious the exact circumstances of the murder were news to the shady waitress. "Ms Orly!" Apollo demanded. "Tell the truth: Did you witness the crime?"
Olga only shrieked, hiding behind the witness stand as the gallery loudly murmured.

The judge hummed to himself in thought, replacing the autopsy report on the holograms with the crime scene photo. "Looking at this picture, it doesn't seem like he was hit," he mused. "He's still wearing his hat and everything."

"Yet, it is a fact that he was hit, Your Honour," Payne sighed, tapping at his tablet computer and again replacing the image on the holograms, this time with a picture brand new to the trial. "Here's a photo we took of the victim with his hat off during our investigation." It was a close-up of Smith, and, although Apollo's attention was still primarily drawn to the man's vaguely familiar, pained face, he couldn't help but notice the prominent dark spot in the middle of Smith's forehead. From the wound, a line of blood traced its way back along his hairless crown, disappearing out of sight.

While the gallery burst into a small hubbub of discussion, the judge stared at the photo with wide eyes. "Well, that's quite shocking, isn't it? This head certainly was hit."

"B-but...!" Olga protested, looking somewhat panicked. "I have seen it happen! The defendant, he lunge at victim, his neck...!"

The woman's insistence gave Apollo pause. 'She's... not lying. But...' Frowning, he turned back to the photo looming over the court from the holographic screens, though this time his eyes were drawn to the victim's neck. It lay exposed in the lower third of the frame, the wide collar of his shirt fanning out around his head like a grey flower, colours stolen away by the black-and-white camera. As he was expecting, there were no signs of bruising. 'W-wait... he's supposed to have a locket, isn't he? Where is it?'

On his own Court Record, he quickly flicked back through all the previous photos supplied by Olga and Payne. Payne's was, of course, of the dead body, also with no sign of a locket, but Olga's snap of Phoenix and Smith before the murder surprised him: There, shining from the gap of the man's red collar, was a golden pendant... the missing locket.

Apollo felt his breathing quicken. What did this mean? It wasn't very clear from the long shot, but as far as he could tell Smith's locket was extremely similar to Trucy's, the locket Phoenix was currently wearing... or, at least, that was what he'd told Apollo about the golden pendant on his neck. A closer look at the photo confirmed Phoenix's entire chest was hidden from view, his body turned at an angle that hid where a locket would rest, but Apollo wasn't expecting to see anything there anyway; Trucy was supposed to have handed her's over later that day, in the detention centre... Apollo knew for a fact Phoenix certainly hadn't had it that night as he went off to work after their usual show.

Meanwhile, the victim's had disappeared between the poker game and the police investigation, a locket that looked remarkably similar to Trucy's, which was itself a gift from her father in years long gone. On top of it all, Apollo hadn't spoken to his sister since their show the evening before the murder (Aderyn had called him the next day to confirm Trucy putting their usual act on hold until after the trial, and Apollo had only spoken to Luke briefly over text, just the once; He had had no contact with Trucy herself). Olga was sure she'd seen Phoenix at Smith's neck. And just who was Shadi Smith, anyway?!

It all added up to something... but Apollo was starting to think he didn't want to know the answer.
A small nudge to his arm brought Apollo back to reality, and he looked up to see Kristoph watching him with concern. "Are you quite alright, Apollo?" he quietly asked. "You've been staring into space for a while now."

The young attorney hesitated only a moment before pulling himself together with every scrap of acting ability he could salvage from his brief panicked breakdown. "Of course I am, sir," he insisted, a calm smile to rival Kristoph’s best plastered on his face. "I'm always fine."

Although Kristoph seemed unconvinced, he didn't wait long before accepting the answer, turning towards the judge. "The defence will continue its cross-examination," he announced.

"Ah, good," the judge replied, and Apollo noticed him shooting the younger attorney worried glances. Had he been so focussed on his thoughts that he had missed them trying to talk to him? It did seem a lot quieter now than he remembered it being, and the holograms had been deactivated since he last looked. "What was your next question for the witness, Defence Wright?"

'Well... how do I put this?' Apollo turned to his tablet computer, again reviewing Olga's testimony. "If you recall, Your Honour... the witness said the victim played with 'his hand on locket at his neck'."

Payne scoffed. "I hope you aren't about to raise an objection to the witness's grammar!"

"No," Apollo shot back, wishing the man would just shut up about his obvious grudge already, "but look at this photograph!" With a swipe of his hand, he reactivated the holograms to display Payne's second photo again, of the hatless Smith as he lay back in his chair, stone dead. "Do you see a locket on the victim's neck?"

Sure enough, at Apollo's prompting, the court seemed to notice the inconsistency as one with a gasp. Kristoph smiled as he turned to the younger attorney, quietly saying, "Well done, Wright. I'm impressed. I admit, I should have known you had the ability to handle this... despite the odd hiccup now and then."

Apollo shrugged and grinned in response.

"If we are to believe this witness's testimony as is," the judge pointed out, "then the locket 'disappeared' following the victim's death!"

A part of Apollo wanted to joke it had been magicked away in a disappearing trick, but, for some reason, he found himself terrified to voice that thought.

"It's quite simple when you think about it," Kristoph said, a hand pushing at his glasses. "If the locket is gone, someone must have taken it off, no? Ms Orly didn't see the defendant strangling the victim; He was taking off his locket!" He looked around the stunned courtroom with a smile. "Wouldn't that explain it?"
While the rest of the court was erupting into a hubbub of shocked noise, Apollo looked away, trying to keep himself calm. 'N-no, I'm just jumping to conclusions. Of course I don't know Smith. Dad doesn't, either. Even the prosecution knows he's never met any of my family before.' It was then he spotted grey to his left, and looked over to see Phoenix stood not far away, watching the commotion with a neutral stare. 'Whoa. How long's he been standing there...?' A bailiff carefully lingered at a respectable distance, and a part of Apollo laughed at the thought they were intimidated by the 'hero attorney' despite the infamous disbarment.

Phoenix, perhaps sensing his son's eyes on him, turned his gaze to meet Apollo's. His eyebrows subtly raised, a silent question of 'How are you going?'.

Apollo gave a small shrug and a tight smile in return: 'I'm not perfect, but I can handle it'.

In reply, Phoenix flashed a grateful smile of his own: 'I'm proud of you'.

"D-defendant!" the judge cried, interrupting their 'conversation' (Apollo wondered if the old man had also just noticed Phoenix standing there). "What do you have to say to this?" He gestured with a stern frown to the displayed photo of the victim and his bare neck.

Phoenix just smiled enigmatically, looking away as he mused on what to say.

The judge frowned, leaning forward in his chair as he stared at the ex-attorney. "Say..."

"Yes?" Phoenix replied, meeting the judge's suspicious gaze with an innocent look.

"I just noticed this, but... you have something hanging around your neck, don't you."

At the judge's question, it seemed suddenly the entire courtroom had noticed the golden pendant sitting above Phoenix's hoodie zipper, muttering to themselves as every eye turned to the middle-aged ex-attorney. Unfazed by the attention, Phoenix himself only grinned, tapping at the locket with one finger. "Oh, you mean this?" he asked. "Yes, it's a locket... with a photograph inside." He barely glanced at Apollo before looking down at the locket itself (though it was too high on his collar to see without taking it off), the grin fading into a smile. "A photo of my daughter."

Apollo felt himself going numb. Even if he wanted to speak, he didn't think he'd be able to make his voice work.

"D-defendant Wright!" the judge cried in shock. "You have a daughter, too!?" He then turned to Apollo, looking more embarrassed. "Erm, your... sister, I suppose?"

Apollo just nodded.

"We confirmed it at the time of the arrest," Payne spoke up with a sigh. "The picture in the locket is indeed Mister Wright's daughter." He briefly paused. "And... the other Mister Wright's sister."

Although he felt he should be shocked, Apollo wasn't surprised to hear something so contradictory to what he'd been previously told. Turning back to Phoenix, he noticed his father watching him with a carefully controlled expression, and, as their eyes met, he saw Phoenix's eyes subtly frowning; A warning look. He could only guess it was a request to keep quiet, and Apollo was only too happy to follow it.

The judge huffed to himself. "Well now, if the results of this poker game led to the murder... perhaps we should hear a bit more about the outcome of the game?" he suggested.

Payne smirked, tapping at his head. "Further testimony won't really be necessary. It's clear the defendant lost. Badly." As if to prove his point, he flicked at his computer, changing the image on the holograms to the photo of the poker table, chips and all.

Apollo frowned, confused. 'Lost 'badly'?'

The judge, perhaps noticing her hesitation, faced the witness stand with a solemn frown. "Ms Orly!" he ordered. "You will testify to the court about the game played between the victim and the defendant!"

"D-da," Olga stuttered, taking a moment to compose herself before standing steadfast behind the witness stand, staring at a spot on the floor somewhere in front of the judge's podium. "The game began with three five hundred point in chips for each man. House chips come in two size: small and large. The one who was winning... da, it was victim!"

Apollo's eyes widened, but a glance at the photo still displayed on the holograms confirmed his initial impression. Th-that...! How dare she...!"

"For last hand," Olga continued, "defendant play with all chips on table and lose. The moment loss was decided, defendant grabs bottle from table and..." She winced at the memory, looking away and ending her speech with a squeak, hand clenched at her neck.

Apollo was still too angry to allow himself to react.

"Indeed," the judge agreed. "Looking at this picture, it does seem to be a one-sided game."

"As the court knows," Payne added, giving Apollo a particularly condescending smirk, "poker was the defendant's life! Failure must have been a bitter pill to swallow!"

Finally, Apollo could bite his lip no longer. Shouting "Objection!" as loudly as he dared, he slammed his fists into the bench, then dramatically pointed at Olga. "That testimony was a load of bull!"

While Olga nervously avoided his furious glare, the rest of the court seemed mostly confused. "Whatever do you mean, Defence Wright?" the judge asked.

Apollo sputtered for a moment as he forced himself to calm down enough to process how to explain. "The chips!" he cried. "It's blatantly obvious that it was the victim who was losing before the last hand!"

The court stared back at Apollo in silence. After a long moment, Payne chuckled, smugly smiling at the young man. "It seems our new attorney is in denial over his dear old daddy's dreadful deeds!" He gestured to the photo. "A glance at the picture is enough to tell you who won!" He brushed at his hair, snidely adding, "If you're not in kindergarten."

Apollo bit his lip to keep from hurling abuse at the old man. "Then maybe you should go back there," he spat. "Add them up! Most of the points are on my dad's side!"

The gallery murmured to itself. The judge just looked confused, looking between the two opposing attorneys as they stared daggers at each other. "Um... just for safety's sake," he turned to Kristoph, his expression begging for help, "could the defence explain the problem to the court?"

Apollo couldn't believe it. 'What's everyone's problem!? Why is everyone suddenly incapable of counting four and two!?'
Luckily for both Apollo and the judge, Kristoph again came to the rescue, with his everpresent calm smile. "I think I can identify the communication issues here," he assured everyone. "It is a simple matter of the assumptions we make when we look at this photo."

"Assumptions?" Apollo repeated, confused.

"Indeed," Kristoph replied, seeming slightly amused as he turned to Apollo. "You have been to the Hydeout many times over the years, Wright, watching your father play. You are as aware of the games played there as the defendant and witness... a familiarity the rest of us here cannot boast." He turned back to the photo above them, though still addressing his junior partner. "But that familiarity has blinded you to what a stranger to the game might see upon looking at those piles of chips. You simply assume we see what you see - that your conclusion is the same anyone else here would make."

Apollo remained silent, musing on his mentor's advice.

"So then," the judge spoke up, a curious look on his face, "what is it that Defence Wright knows that we do not?"

Payne frowned, unconvinced. "Calculation?"

"As Wright so eloquently told us, 'add them up'," Kristoph continued, then turned to Olga, still nervously fidgeting behind the witness stand. "Were the usual rules in effect for the game that night?"

"Then we must ask what the usual rules say about the worth of the chips," Kristoph concluded, returning his attention to the photo. "We have small, red chips and large, black chips, altogether worth... seven thousand points, I believe."

Apollo nodded. "Exactly. Six worth a thousand each, and ten worth a hundred." He pointed to the photo. "At a glance, you can ignore the hundred-point chips and just look at the thousand-point ones to see who's in the lead."

Payne was starting to look nervous. "May I ask... which ones are worth a thousand points?"

"The smaller red ones," Apollo replied. "Look at the photo; The victim has two thousand, nine hundred points, but the defendant has four thousand, one hundred!"

As the courtroom erupted into commotion, Payne jumped back with a terrified expression, arms held up around his head. "That's... impossible!" he cried.

Apollo couldn't resist a smug smile, crossing his arms as he watched the prosecutor. "Well, well! That gives our defendant even less reason to kill the victim! After all, he was winning!"

Payne shrieked as he continued to hide behind his arms.

His jibe against the prosecutor delivered, Apollo then turned to the waitress at the stand. "Now, Ms Orly... You must have known the true value of the chips... You were at the scene of the crime, weren't you?"

Olga just stared wide-eyed at Apollo before crying out in fear and hiding behind the witness stand.
The crowds in the gallery were only getting noisier, so the judge was finally forced to start banging his gavel. "Order! Order!" As the courtroom finally began to quieten, he sighed, turning to Payne. "It appears our defendant has lost his motive," he pointed out. "And Defendant Wright's supposed defeat... never happened."

Payne just stood, tensed, behind his prosecutor's bench, sweating nervously. "We must now ask ourselves," the judge continued to the court at large, "whether we can trust the witness's testimony at-"

"Hold it!"
The entire courtroom turned to look at the witness stand. "E-excuse me?" the judge asked. "What is it, Ms Orly?"

Olga herself seemed to have overcome her fright, determinedly standing behind the stand with her free hand clenched tightly in a fist at her neck. "I... I did not want to be saying this but," she began, only to seemingly lose her nerve, fidgeting as she looked down. "Actually, you see... erm..."

"See what, Ms Orly!?" Payne pressed, apparently seeing an opportunity to regain the upper hand. "What do we see!?"

Olga closed her eyes a moment, then looked up at the judge with a confident gaze. "In the last hand, there was cheat!"

A gasp rang round the courtroom.

"A c-ch-chaet!?!" Payne cried, somewhere between shocked and delighted. "You... you don't mean... a trick!?!"

"Wait," the judge added, surprised, "or do you mean... a scam!?"

Apollo resisted a glare at the prosecutor. 'Jerk. Tricks' are a totally different thing to 'cheats' and 'scams'!'

"Yes, there was cheat in last hand!" Olga determinedly repeated. "That is why game ends with chips as they are!"

Apollo sighed, burying his face in a hand. 'And she's not lying. Great.'

Kristoph seemed amused. "Well, this case certainly has taken a turn... for the interesting!"

The young attorney shot his mentor a glare. 'You're not helping!'

"Witness!" the judge commanded. "You will please testify to the court! Tell us about this 'cheating' in the final hand!"

Olga nodded. "The last hand, both men had 'full house'!" she explained, gesturing to the photo on the hologram above her. "There is four of each card in deck, from ace to king... If you look at both men's hands, cheat is more obvious!"

Apollo wondered who wouldn't know about the layout of a deck of cards, then reasoned that the earlier confusion over the chips had convinced her to explain everything, just in case. 'I guess, as a magician, I do have more reason than most to know that kind of thing.'

"The next moment," the waitress continued, "game becomes argument, da! The defendant's trick was exposed!"
Apollo's eyes widened. 'Wait, what?'

"He took bottle in hand..." Olga shook her head as she trailed off, looking sad. " Poor Mister Smith!"

Shooting the waitress a glare, Apollo banged his fists on the defence bench. "Ms Orly!" he ordered. "Why did you not tell the court about this from the very beginning!?"

Olga looked away, fiddling with her camera.

'Just as I thought!' Apollo told himself. 'A cover-up! And all to frame Dad for this murder, I bet!'

The judge hummed in thought. "A full house is a very high-scoring hand," he pointed out. "Not easy to make in my experience."

Payne scoffed. "That alone is enough to suspect less-than-scrupulous tactics," he replied, the smug smirk returning to his face. "There's a very easy way to make a full house and go undefeated for seven years: You cheat!"

Apollo dearly wanted to shout at Payne to take the comment back, but restrained himself to merely quietly fuming and clenching his fists tight enough to leave bruises from his fingernails.

The judge cleared his throat, looking to Apollo. "The defence may cross-examine the witness."

Forcing himself to calm down, Apollo again studied the photo of the poker table, giving the cards themselves another look. 'Both full houses, all four aces on display... The victim won the hand, though; Three kings beats three sevens.' He frowned. 'Where's the cheat? And Dad lost the hand, so he'd be a lousy cheater anyway.' "Ms Orly..." He looked to the waitress, still confused. "Where is this 'cheat'?"

Olga seemed as confused as Apollo. "It is obvious!" she insisted, gesturing to the screen. "The defendant... well, he played a fifth ace!" When everyone gasped in surprise, she nodded, looking all over the room. "Da, da! I still remember both hands very well! Mister Smith's hand has three aces, and Mister Wright's two!"

Apollo frowned, looking up at the photo above them. From the muttering in the gallery, he was sure some of the audience had noticed the problem, too.

"Obviously, cheating was afoot!" Payne boasted. "Or perhaps I should say... a-hand!" He chuckled at his own joke, ignoring Apollo rolling his eyes. "Adding cards to a deck is no less serious a taboo than... than forging evidence in a court of law!"

At that, Apollo very nearly stormed out from behind his bench, only being stopped from the potential rampage by Kristoph's firm hand on his upper arm.

"That was when argument started, da," Olga continued. "The victim, he shouts, 'you are cheater!', and then the defendant shouts something like, 'I have objection!'... To the gallery's amusement, she even mimed pointing her finger in an imitation of Phoenix as she 'recreated' the fight.

"Shouting objection, eh?" Payne laughed. "Old habits are hard to break! First he bluffed his way through the courtroom, now he bluffs his way through life!"

Apollo didn't think it was possible to hate someone more than he hated Payne already, so much so that he didn't question his father's odd return to a habit the young man had never had the opportunity to witness. "Objection!" he cried. "The defendant lost the hand! Doesn't that cast the shadow of doubt on Mister Smith!?!"
Unfortunately, Olga had a prepared explanation ready: "Humiliation from losing even when cheating... That is what set fire to defendant's heart!"

The judge nodded sagely to himself. "Ah, yes... I've always suspected the defendant was fire-proof!"

While Apollo was quietly fuming to himself, Kristoph gently called his attention with a quiet clearing of his throat. "Wright... Have you noticed her testimony keeps changing?"

"Y-yes, of course," Apollo hurriedly replied. "The strangling changed to the bottle, the serious competition changed to cheating..."

Kristoph nodded. "Perhaps it's time for you to say something, then?" he pointed out. "You have evidence that contradicts her, do you not?"

Apollo thought a moment, looking up at the photo still displayed above them. 'Why didn't I object with this earlier...? Oh, yeah, Payne.' After a pause, he gave Kristoph a determined look. "Leave it to me!" he said. Although the court was rather noisy with the hubbub of conversation, it took no more than slamming his bench to again quieten the room, and he stared at Olga. "It appears, once again," he announced, "that the witness is mistaken."

Olga cocked her head to one side. "Miss... Taken?" she innocently asked. "But my name-"

"The photo on the holograms, Ms Orly," Apollo prompted, gesturing to it with one hand. "We spent so much time staring at it counting those chips, and you never once even glanced at the cards?"

The judge frowned, confused. "What is the issue, Defence Wright?"

Apollo thought a moment, debating how to respond before keeping his attention on the stand. "Ms Orly," he said, "you said the victim had three aces and the defendant two, correct?"

Olga nodded. "Da," she replied, "that is cheat in final hand."

"Then I must ask you to explain yet another inconsistency," Apollo continued, reaching for his Court Record and setting up a highlight on the victim's hand. "Why, in this photo, does the victim have three kings and two aces?"

"Eek!" Olga squeaked as she saw what Apollo was pointing out.

"Objection!" came an immediate cry from the prosecution, though Payne seemed very unsure of himself. "Well... well, maybe the witness was simply confused!" he insisted. "Perhaps it was the defendant's hand that held the third ace in question!"

"Objection!" Apollo shouted in response, and switched the highlighting to Phoenix's hand. "Take another look!" he ordered. "The defendant also has two aces! Where's this fifth ace?" He narrowed his eyes at the prosecutor. "I see cheating alright, and it's going on right here in this courtroom!"

The hubbub of the gallery and Payne's offended look were all the response Apollo needed.

The judge tugged on his beard. "Two aces in each player's hand does make four aces total," he mused. "Hardly proof of cheating."

"Wait, please!" Olga cried, looking almost frantic as she clung to the stand, turning wide eyes up at the judge's podium. "It is true, I have seen it! The fifth ace! There was cheating, I swear to you!"

Apollo watched her. 'Again, she's not lying...' He closed his eyes for a moment. 'But was the cheater
"Dad? Nah, I doubt it. As shady as he can make himself seem, he'd never stoop to that kind of trickery. The worst he got was bringing me along to give him 'hints'. Trucy too, sometimes."

"You're right to trust your instincts."

Apollo's eyes snapped open in surprise, turning to look up at Kristoph. "Mister Gavin?"

"Who knows what lies in store for us in the trial ahead?" Kristoph enigmatically said, turning his gaze to the judge before Apollo could reply. "Your Honour, if I may, I have a suggestion."

The judge was already intrigued. "What might that be, Mister Gavin?"

"If you don't mind," Kristoph continued, "perhaps we might examine the actual cards?"

"The... cards?" the judge repeated, confused.

Kristoph had already turned his attention now to the prosecution. "Mister Payne."

Payne almost jumped at the sound of his name. "Yes?"

"The players' hands that night were set aside as evidence, were they not?" Kristoph asked. "The defence would like to request that the cards be shown to the court."

"Very well," the judge agreed, nodding. "The prosecution will submit this evidence!"

Payne sighed, then shuffled off to the nearest bailiff, quietly giving the officer orders before the young bailiff then scurried away out of the room.

Apollo thought to himself. 'I can't see what looking at the actual cards will teach us... but I suppose Mister Gavin knows what he's doing.'

Kristoph seemed proud of himself. "When the evidence arrives," he quietly asked his junior partner, "which will you examine first: The defendant's or the victim's hand?"

'Geeze, does it matter?' Apollo was tempted to reply. "I dunno," he admitted with a shrug. "I guess... since Ms Orly was convinced it was the victim's hand that was so different... that one first?"

"Always a good idea to quickly identify the most suspicious piece of evidence," Kristoph replied, seeming happy with Apollo's answer. "If these cards don't prove there was cheating, nothing probably will."
Eventually, the bailiffs returned with two clear evidence bags, each containing five cards in a small pile. Reluctantly, Payne took the bags, examined them, and handed one back to the bailiff, who ferried the small bag across the room to the defence team. Apollo gave the harried officer a grateful nod as he took the wrapped cards, laying them on the bench. In their pile, all he could see of them now was the king of hearts on top. 'Gonna have to take them out of the bag to look at them properly. Good thing I always bring my gloves.'

With one hand, he reached into a small pocket in his pants to retrieve his white gloves, while the other flipped the evidence bag over, where a label confirmed this was, indeed, Shadi Smith's last hand of poker. Something else gave Apollo pause as he unfolded his gloves, still staring at the cards in their clear bag. "Mister Gavin?" he asked. "Didn't we establish earlier they were using the blue cards in that final hand?"

Kristoph seemed more surprised than Apollo, dropping his carefully controlled demeanour as his eyes widened upon sight of the undoubtedly red cards before them. "Huh?" He quickly brought himself back under control, looking away as he hummed in thought, though it was clear he was still a little shaken. "Hmm, which was it now?"

Apollo raised an eyebrow, but decided to let his mentor be. After all, maybe they had gotten it wrong earlier. He quickly threw on his left glove, then popped open the bag and gently shook out the five cards, being careful to only use his left hand to flip them face-up and spread them out. Just as in the photo: Three kings, two aces. 'Gotta admit, that doesn't really help.' Frowning, he pulled the cards together into a fan-shape and, still only using his gloved hand, pulled them to the edge of the bench and picked them up, flipping them around to give the backs a cursory glance. Immediately, he froze. 'W-what...?'

One of the five cards was blue.

"Your Honour!" Apollo almost yelped, quickly holding up the cards to display their mismatched backs to the judge's podium. "One of the victim's cards... the back is a different colour!"

The courtroom burst into instant commotion, Payne shrieking as he jumped back in shock. Olga was frozen in shock for a moment, but then shook her head frantically. "Th-that's impossible!" she cried, her thick accent mysteriously vanishing. "But I put that card in Wright's hand!" The words were out of her mouth before she suddenly realised what she'd voiced, and she gasped loudly, clapping her free hand over her mouth while the other struggled not to drop her covered plate of food.

The hubbub was calming down already, but it hadn't stopped the three attorneys and judge from hearing the witness's slip. Kristoph gave Olga an almost smug smile. "What was that, Ms Orly?" he innocently asked.

"No!" Olga cried, then winced at herself. "N-nyet! I merely said, eh..." She shook her head, staring at the stand in front of her with wide-eyed panic. "Da, I have...!"

Kristoph turned to the judge. "Your Honour, tell me, what is the easiest way to cheat at poker?"
The judge seemed confused. "To... cheat?"

"I'll tell you," Kristoph continued, turning his triumphant smile back to the witness stand. "One simply needs a friend, a 'comrade', shall we say: The dealer!"

The judge cried out in surprise as he made the connection, and Apollo, though equally surprised, found himself watching the frightened woman with respect, gently placing the cards in his hand on top of their evidence bag. "Wow... I can say from experience, Ms Orly, it is not easy to play with the order of a deck of cards without being noticed! I'm impressed! Are you a professional?"

Olga wasn't expecting that response, looking up at Apollo curiously.

"As impressive at her 'trick' might seem," Kristoph continued, his attention back on the judge, "Ms Orly is undoubtedly the cheater. A professional, as Wright put it."

"Nyeeaarh!" Olga cried, recoiling from the accusation.

The courtroom again exploded into loud chaos, forcing the judge to bang his gavel, calling for order.

While the crowds calmed down, Apollo dragged himself back to business. He could professionally admire another card-artist's skill later; Right now, he had an act to do. "Your Honour! Ms Orly just gave us a very important piece of testimony! She 'put that card in Wright's hand'! He couldn't resist a grin, pointing dramatically at the witness stand. "Ergo! Ms Olga Orly conspired to cheat, not with the defendant, but with the victim, Mister Shadi Smith!" He paused to let the crowd react with shock, Olga herself starting to shiver in fear as he lowered his hands to his side, where one rested on the bench. "And not only did she cheat, she cheated poorly!" He crossed his arms. "It's not hard to imagine an altercation between her and the victim."

"What!?" Payne cried, recoiling as though his every worst fear were being relived at once. Apollo supposed, given the man's grudge against Phoenix, it very possibly was.

The judge blinked in surprise. "Wait, you don't mean..." He frowned. "The defence isn't accusing the witness, Ms Olga Orly... are you?"

Apollo nodded. "I am!" he replied, again throwing out his arm to dramatically point at the witness stand with a triumphant smile. "The defence accuses the witness, Ms Olga Orly, of murder!"

Olga shrieked at the top of her lungs, then fainted dead away, her bowl of covered food clattering to the floor beside her.

'Don't feel bad. It's the only logical conclusion, after all. She was the only other person in the room besides Dad and... the victim. It had to be her.' Apollo's triumphant joy at landing the accusation had quickly given way to guilt as the young woman lost consciousness. The bailiffs had taken her away to the first aid office to recover, accompanied by Payne, but it had been several minutes since then.

Finally, Payne returned to the courtroom, scurrying back behind his bench.

"Mister Payne," the judge said in greeting, giving the prosecutor a nod as the gallery quickly quietened. "Where is your witness, Ms Olga Orly?"
"Erm," the man muttered, brushing nervously at his hair. "Still unconscious in the first aid office, Your Honour. I'm told she will fully recover in time."

The judge nodded thoughtfully, then turned to Apollo. "Defence Wright?"

Apollo quickly stood to attention at his bench. "Your Honour!"

"It seems you've presented a new possibility to the court," the judge announced. "One suggesting a connection between the witness and the victim, Mister Smith."

Smiling hopefully, Apollo asked, "And that means...?"

The judge shook his head. "The court cannot pronounce a verdict for the defendant at this time!"

Payne snorted as he jumped in surprise. "What!?"

Apollo just grinned. 'I did it! I held out!' He sighed in relief. 'Maybe now Dad will finally tell us what happened!'

"I see no point in prolonging the trial this day," the judge continued. "The prosecution will need to make further inquiries."

"OBJECTION!"

Everyone spun to face the open space on Apollo's left, where, between the two sections of the gallery, a middle-aged man in a cyan beanie was striding out of the side-room with a stern look on his face, a nervous bailiff trailing behind him.

Apollo stared in surprise. "Dad, what are you doing!?" he hissed.

"You can't end the trial here, Your Honour," Phoenix announced, walking to the witness stand and proudly standing tall behind it. "Not yet."

Payne shot the eldest Wright a glare. "What nonsense is the defendant spewing now!?

"Think," Phoenix continued, ignoring the prosecutor. "One of the cards had a different coloured back. Don't you wonder what it means?"

"Objection!" came Payne's shriek in response, and the prosecutor sputtered in Phoenix's direction. "W-what are you doing, Mister Wright!? Raising objections when you're about to get off the hook!?"

He scoffed, crossing his arms with a frown. "Ridiculous!"

The judge simply chuckled to himself. "Mister Payne, you of all people should know, Defendant Wright has a talent for the ridiculous!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow in his father's direction, though Phoenix himself, predictably, just seemed proud of the judge's proclamation.

"Perhaps we should get to the bottom of things," the judge agreed, apparently swayed purely by his familiarity with the defendant. "Let's clear up the facts about the game that fateful night."

View the Court Record
"As was said before, we alternated between two decks of cards that night," Phoenix explained from the witness stand.

"That was said before!" Payne bitterly hissed to himself.

"The two decks at the club have different coloured backs," Phoenix continued, unfazed. "Blue and red. One colour per deck."

Apollo nodded. "And the reason for two different decks is to keep them from getting mixed up... though that apparently happened anyway."

"We used the red deck for the last game," Phoenix added.

The judge hummed in thought. "I see. But... that's odd." He gave Phoenix a confused look. "For some reason... I have this impression that you were using the blue cards!"

'Yeah, me too,' Apollo silently agreed, keeping his eyes firmly on the bench in front of him. 'It... it was just a simple assumption of Mister Gavin's.'

"Whatever," Payne scoffed, looking beyond done with the entire trial. "In the end, one card of the wrong colour got into the mix, which means there was cheating."

"Yes, a card slipped into the deck would seem to indicate cheating," Phoenix agreed, though his expression said otherwise. "Yet..." He shook his head. "This card raises two serious questions. Apollo?"

The young attorney almost jumped as he noticed his father's attention on him. "Huh?"

"Let's consider the first question, shall we?" Phoenix smiled as he always did when presenting Apollo with one of his 'trial games': a law-related problem, or 'puzzle' as Luke always called them, that Phoenix would always talk Apollo through while playing the role of prosecution, judge and witnesses. "Think," Phoenix instructed his son. "In the last game, when was the card swapped?"

Apollo blinked in surprise. "When?"

"There are three broad possibilities here," Phoenix explained, turning behind the stand to be properly facing Apollo alone, and counting off on his fingers. "It could have been swapped before the murder, during the murder, or after the murder."

Payne once again scoffed, arms tightly crossed. "Well, yeah! Thanks for the news bulletin, Mister Wright! Of course it was swapp-"

"Oh?" Phoenix interrupted with a knowing smile. "It might be as simple as you think, Mister Payne. Or... it might not be."

Payne snorted in displeasure, firmly looking away.
With that, Phoenix turned back to his son. "What do you think, Apollo? When were the cards swapped?"

The courtroom was quiet with anticipation as Apollo pressed a finger to his forehead in thought. 'Well, we can immediately discount 'during', because what does that even mean? The same moment as the victim was whacked on the head with that bottle? Our assumption was 'before', but... Exactly as designed, that would be noticed as she was dealing the cards, and she was definitely telling the truth about the cheat not being called out until later. That just leaves...' Slowly, he lowered his hand and looked up at his father. "Perhaps it happened... after the murder?"

"Objection!" came an immediate cry from the prosecution. "Ridiculous! What's the point of cheating after the hands have been shown?" Payne shouted furiously. "That's silly!"

"Objection!" Apollo shouted back. "Yes, it is! But tell me, how do you swap cards during the game!?" He crossed his arms. "I'll take 'silly' over 'impossible'!" That's all I ever get from my family, after all.'

"Objection!" Payne repeated. "Take it from me, sonny boy, there's a lot of silly in this world, but very little impossible!"

Apollo scoffed. "Even when the backs of the cards are a different colour?" he pointed out. "If you pulled that during a game, you'd be caught in no time!"

"Quite true," Phoenix agreed with a proud smile. "That would mean the blue card in question was swapped after the hands were shown, after the murder!"

Payne wasn't done yet though, crying another "Objection!" with a tight glare. "Okay, this is going past silly and straight on to crazy!" He sighed. "I ask again: What's the point of cheating after the game's over!? Who would do that!?"

"Who indeed," Phoenix agreed, looking away with his enigmatic smile. "That's one of the mysteries before us."

The judge, who had been watching the argument with intrigue, was surprised. "There's another?"

Phoenix nodded. "Yes. A simple, yet decisive, question must be asked: Who swapped the red card... for a blue card?"

Apollo frowned in thought. "Who...?"

Kristoph closed his eyes. "The game, and murder, is done," he outlined. "The victim is dead. Only two remain in the room, alive, that is: The defendant, Phoenix Wright, and our witness, Olga Orly." He then turned to Apollo, his eyes opening with a curious look.

Apollo paused, thinking. 'Maybe... no, but... Huh?' After a moment, he looked up to meet his father's eyes. "Obviously, it can't have been you, Dad, since you have no reason to have touched it," he pointed out, eyebrows furrowed in concern. "But... well, it doesn't seem like it could have been Olga Orly, either..."

"W-what are you suggesting?" the judge asked.

Kristoph frowned. "That's hardly a logical conclusion, I'll admit," he quietly told the younger attorney. "As the defence, I think it only makes sense for you to name Ms Orly at this point."

"Yes, I know," Apollo almost sputtered as he assured his mentor, "but...!" He sighed. "But she was the one who dealt the cards, right? I... I just can't believe she would make the mistake of swapping the wrong colour card!"

"And if the card was swapped during the game, it'd be obvious," the judge repeated, tugging at his beard.

Apollo noticed Phoenix grinning, and wondered if his little 'trial game' was even more fun than usual when played in an actual courtroom.

Payne gave a world-weary sigh. "If the one who swapped the card wasn't the defendant, and it wasn't Ms Orly... then who was it!?" he asked.

"Well, that's the question, isn't it?" Apollo shot back. "Someone else swapped those cards!"

"Precisely," Phoenix picked up, and he smiled proudly as he stood tall behind the stand. "I believe we're about to see this case take a new direction. We'll find that, indeed, after the murder, someone swapped one of the cards in the victim's hand... and that someone made two critical mistakes."

"I'm sure you're going to tell us that the first was swapping the wrong colour card," Kristoph replied, seeming oddly tense.

"Because the one who did the swap," Phoenix explained, "didn't know two colours of cards were being used. The other mistake..." He paused, grinning to himself. "Was the number on the card."

Apollo nodded. "Right, they replaced the fifth ace with a king."

"I'm sure whoever swapped it wasn't expecting there to be a fifth ace, after all," Phoenix continued. "All they knew was that the game had been won with a full house, so they picked up a king from the table, and swapped it in."

"Objection!" Payne cried, leaning heavily on his desk as he glared at Phoenix. "But! There's one problem!" He pushed off his desk, tapping firmly on his papers sat next to his tablet computer. "According to our case record, this person doesn't exist!"

"True," Phoenix readily agreed, "not until now. But you have to admit the possibility of a fourth person." He looked away again, smiling enigmatically. "Though, it's more than a possibility. There was someone else there that night at the scene of the crime."

"W-what!?" Payne shouted in shock.

Apollo watched his father cautiously. 'If you knew this... why didn't you say anything earlier, Dad? What is all this really about?'

"I believe the judge spoke truthfully earlier," Kristoph sighed. "You do make trials... ridiculous, Mister Wright."

Phoenix just gave Kristoph a proud grin.

"This trial has proceeded on one central assumption," the judge announced, "namely, that at the time of the incident, there were only three people in that room."

"I believe this new evidence, shall we say... overturns that assumption?" Phoenix added, still grinning.

The judge just gave Phoenix a stern look. "The problem is that you chose to conceal this information
Phoenix's grin faded. "I... suppose that is a problem, yes," he solemnly agreed.

Shaking his head, the judge banged his gavel. "Court is adjourned for a brief recess!" he announced, then turned to the defence bench. "Mister Gavin, I'll see you in my chambers during this recess."

Kristoph seemed a little surprised, but readily nodded his head in agreement. "Certainly, Your Honour."

"Very well!" The judge returned his attention to the entire room. "The trial will resume in twenty minutes!" With that, he banged his gavel once more before getting up and rapidly leaving the room.

View the Court Record
"That was quite... unexpected, Wright," Kristoph admitted as he led the two Wrights into the lobby. "To suddenly claim there was another person at the scene of the crime like that... I must ask." He spun on his heel to face the other man, his face carefully schooled into its usual neutral expression. "Is it the truth?"

Phoenix just smiled. "Well, now... I'd think you would know the answer to that?"

"Ah, being mysterious, are we?" Kristoph sighed, pushing at his glasses. "Sadly, I've no time for mysteries. I'd only ask that you leave the defending to your defence in future." He gave a pointed look at Apollo before returning his gaze to their client. "After all, was this trial not meant to be your son's first experience in court? You're being remarkably... underestimating of his ability."

Apollo frowned in confusion, wishing the 'adults' would acknowledge he was right there.

Phoenix snorted in laughter. "Throwing my words back in my face, are we? I see you haven't mellowed out one bit, Kristoph."

Kristoph didn't respond, pausing a moment before turning to his junior partner. "Apollo."

"Yes, sir?" Apollo replied, almost wanting to stand at attention.

"The judge has summoned me to his chambers, so carry on without me." With that, Kristoph left the room.

Phoenix chuckled in the ensuing silence, moving over towards the sofa. "You're doing well, Apollo," he called over his shoulder. "If you insist," Apollo replied, though he smiled at the praise. He followed his father to the sofa, sitting at his side. "I... did have a few questions, though."

"Hm?" Phoenix leaned back in his seat, giving Apollo a curious look. "Be warned, I'm still keeping quiet on some things."

Apollo sighed. 'Of course you are.' "First... the locket." He eyed the golden pendant hanging off his father's neck. "That's... not Trucy's, is it?"

Phoenix closed his eyes, looking away with a saddened expression. "No," he admitted. "It's not."

Apollo found himself letting out a breath of relief, turning his body away from his father. "Then we do know the victim." He felt his chest tightening again, as it had during his brief panic in the courtroom when the victim's disappearing locket had first come up, and he screwed his eyes shut. "That's why the photo is just of Trucy, not all three of us... and why you had it when you were arrested." His hands were pressed into the seat cushion, either side of his legs, and he leaned forward as he tried to keep his breathing under control, a part of him already knowing the conclusions he would reach if he kept talking. "W... why did you...?"
A hand rested on Apollo's back, and the young man felt Phoenix sitting close at his side, offering comfort. "I knew it would be easier for you to go ahead believing it to be Trucy's as you'd assumed when you first saw it," the ex-lawyer quietly assured his son. "I was... hoping you wouldn't figure it out until after the trial."

"Why'd you lie?" Apollo asked, looking up with glistening eyes to accusingly meet his father's gaze. "You could have just said... I-I dunno, that it wasn't important! O-or even, that it was the victim's and...!"

Phoenix sighed, looking pained. "Technically, I didn't lie, except by omission: I strung some unrelated sentences together to leave the impression your assumption was right." He closed his eyes. "It hurt to do, believe me, but I couldn't say any more without ruining the plan."

Apollo blinked in surprise. "The plan!?" he repeated. "You have a plan!?"

Phoenix smirked in amusement, giving Apollo a look. "What, I told Luke and Trucy not to talk to you, refused to talk about the crime, appointed you my lawyer... and you didn't think I had a plan?"

Apollo stared at his father in a long silence before sighing resignedly. 'Right. Of course.'

"We'll have a lot of talking to do once this is over anyway; I'll answer all your questions then," Phoenix promised with a smile. "The real trial begins now, Apollo. I need you to be ready. I need your 'power'."

His hand jumping to his bracelet, Apollo gave his father a look somewhere between confused and concerned. "B-but..."

Phoenix just smiled. "I know you've been picking up on Ms Orly's tells. Now you just need to apply it. Figure out what they mean, then confront her to see if you're right."

Apollo nervously rubbed around his left wrist. "B-but... we tried already, in Luke's trial, and I-!"

"It didn't work that time because you lacked the evidence to put the witness on the spot," Phoenix replied with a stern gaze, his hand gripping Apollo's shoulder. "You forget; Although I'm not talking about it, I was there, just like her. I know you can use the evidence you have to prove she's lying."

Apollo wasn't convinced, meeting his father's eye for only a moment before staring at the floor.

"Do your best," Phoenix said. "I know you'll pull through in the end."

April 20, 12:14PM
District Court
Courtroom No. 2

"Court will now reconvene," the judge announced, banging his gavel as he sat down atop his podium. "Has our witness, Ms Olga Orly, recovered?"

"Y-yes, Your Honour," Payne replied, nodding nervously before clarifying, "Er, well, she's regained consciousness."

Kristoph, who had been waiting at the bench already upon Apollo's arrival, finally seemed to relax from his tense death-glare into space, clasping his hands behind his back as he directed his ever-present calm smile to the courtroom. "Perhaps we can hear her version of the events again?" he asked.

Payne ran a hand across his forehead, wiping away anxious sweat. "That's the thing... You see, she's quite fatigued..."

"You're looking a bit fatigued yourself, Mister Payne," the judge replied, seeming concerned for his colleague.

"Sadly, fatigue is insufficient grounds for refusing to testify," Kristoph pointed out with a smile, "or prosecute. The defence would like to request that Ms Orly take the stand."

The judge nodded in agreement. "Very well. The witness will take the stand!"

It didn't take long for a bailiff to escort Olga back into the courtroom, now free of the plate of food she'd spent so long balancing in the first half of the trial. Her pink mittens fiddled with each other nervously as she approached the witness stand, casting fearful looks around the room as she shivered in place.

"Perhaps you could repeat your name and profession?" Kristoph asked.

Olga didn't reply.

"Or perhaps you'd rather admit that you're a poor liar, and a poorer loser," Kristoph added.

That seemed to spark a reaction, Olga blinking in surprise as she looked to the defence. "Ny-ny-nye-l!" Suddenly, her fearful shivering stopped, and she stood tall, glaring at Kristoph. "Not." Before anyone had time to register that her thick Russian accent had disappeared, the diminutive waitress was throwing off her thick layers of furs, standing taller than before on a pair of high heels that had somehow come out from within her snow boots (Apollo suspected she'd been crouching in the coat to deliberately seem smaller). Underneath her woollen cap was a bright red bandanna, the image of a six-sided die printed across it in white, and her coat had been covering a suit, black vest over a white shirt and topped with a red bow-tie. Aside from her face and hair, the only thing about her that hadn't changed was the yellow camera dangling from her neck. "Name's Olga Orly," she barked, a finger twirling in her hair. "That's the truth! I'm a pro dealer. People call me Olga 'Quick-Fingers' Orly!"

"Oh..." the judge muttered, staring at the young woman with wide eyes. "Oh really?"

"Want to know something else?" Olga continued, the hand in her hair clenching into a fist. "I'm not really Russian! And my last name sounds like 'oh really!'" She slammed her hand on the witness stand with a growl. "There, that's the truth! I hope you're satisfied!"

Despite his best intentions, Apollo was only admiring Olga more: A pro card-trickster, who was a pretty good actress too? It was a pity she used her skills for petty crime; She'd be a decent magician if she put her mind to it. "Ms Orly," he called, giving her a respectful nod, "please tell the court what you were actually doing the night of the crime."

Olga sighed, seeming to return a grudging respect for the young attorney. "Fine, I'll talk." Her finger continued to twirl in her hair. "We had a plan, see."

"Let me remind you," the judge spoke up with a stern look, "that you are currently under oath. Any further fabrications will have serious consequences."
Although she winced guiltily, Olga seemed to accept the suspicion. "Fine," she repeated. "Like I said, I'm a pro. That guy, Smith, hired me to do what I do best." She pulled her finger out of her hair, brushing at her golden locks proudly. "I was planted at the Borscht Bowl Club several days prior to the night of the game, as a waitress."

"So you were working with the victim," Apollo pointed out, glad to hear his earlier theory confirmed.

"Not that he needed my help," Olga scoffed. "Smith is a well-known poker player in some circles. But winning wasn't the main purpose of this game." She smirked. "It was about destroying a legend: the unbeatable Phoenix Wright!"

Apollo scowled at the pride in her statement. No wonder she'd been insisting so heavily Phoenix had cheated.

"The plan was simple," Olga continued. "Elegant, really. You see, we set up a trap of sorts: I was to plant a card in Wright's pocket beforehand, and then deal five aces during one of their games." Still smirking, she brushed an errant lock of hair from her face. "When their hands were revealed, Smith would call him out and search Wright. He would then pull out the planted card, and the trap would snap shut!" She snapped her fingers to illustrate the metaphor. "Exposed as a cheater and losing on top of it! It would have made a great double play! Just like that, the legend would be dashed to pieces!"

"Indeed," the judge mused, tugging on his beard. "Getting caught red-handed at cheating would cast doubt on all his prior wins..."

"Sounds oddly familiar," Apollo bitterly chimed in, arms crossed. "This isn't the first time someone's pulled that trick on him."

Olga scoffed, rolling her eyes. "I'm not surprised; If you play poker, especially if you never lose, you're a part of a seedy underbelly whether you like it or not." She grinned. "Last guy must've been a real amateur to fail so badly that I'd never even heard of 'im, though."

Apollo just gave the woman a glare. "'Poker' wasn't quite what I was referring to."

Kristoph smiled to himself, pushing at his glasses. "Nevertheless, it appears you made quite the mistake yourself, Ms Orly." As Olga gave him a confused glare, he continued, "I agree, the trap was elegant. Yet, what happened to that planted card?"

Apollo gave the witness a triumphant smirk. "Like I said, this isn't the first time someone's pulled that trick on my dad."

Olga scowled, avoiding looking anywhere near the defence. "He's lucky, I'll give him that," she admitted. "You'd have to be to slip free from a trap laid by Olga 'Quick-Fingers' Orly!"

"Oh really?" the judge asked, frowning at the stand. "The witness would be much cuter if she dispensed with the 'evil mastermind' shtick."

"Cute!?" Olga cried, offended. "Who wants to be cute!? I'm not cute! I'm bad!" Giving the judge a furious glare, she pounded the witness stand with her fists. "You hear me?! Bad!"

The judge wasn't impressed. "When you're through being bad, perhaps you could testify to the court?" He gestured to the small podium she stood behind. "Tell us about this 'trap', and how it was sprung."

"That night, I planted the card like I was supposed to, and Wright lost the last hand, just like he was supposed to," Olga explained, standing tall behind the witness stand, her left hand playing with her hair. "Then Smith searched him... but the planted card was gone! The trap failed!" She sighed, her hand moving to her neck. "The next moment, Wright picked up a bottle and swung it! It wasn't me who hit Smith!" She shot a pointed glare at Apollo, who was staring at her intently. "It was that no-good, cheating defendant!"

The judge hummed in thought. "A surprisingly frank testimony," he admitted, "that still leaves us mostly in the dark."

"The trap was perfect I tell you, perfect!" Olga insisted, her hands curling into fists. "If that rotten cheater hadn't messed it up...!"

Apollo was almost too distracted by his own mental processing of Olga's testimony to scoff at her words. "Look who's talking."

The judge sighed. "Well, the testimony, for what it's worth, is all yours, Defence Wright."

Apollo closed his eyes a moment, running through everything he'd seen in his mind as he pressed a finger to his forehead. 'She wasn't lying about the plan, or that she isn't the murderer, which is surprising enough on its own,' he mused. 'Actually, Dad picking up the bottle is the only thing she's consciously falsifying. She does seem to think he committed the murder, though... and that he's a cheat.' At that thought, Apollo couldn't resist a small smile. 'Well, sometimes, but never in poker.'

"Are you planning to ask her a question," Kristoph quietly asked, "or just stand there and think all day?"

At his mentor's prompt, Apollo quickly dropped his hands to his sides. 'He's right: Enough thinking! Time to act!' "Ms Orly, I'm curious... Could you tell us about this planted card?" he asked. "What was it? When did you plant it?"

Olga fumed to herself. "My trump card, the Five of Hearts," she explained. "I slid it into Wright's pocket, while he was eating."

The judge wasn't impressed. "Let me guess: Defendant Wright was to have switched the Five with the Ace to make a full house," he said. "At least, that's what you were going to accuse him of doing, thereby ruining his legend."

Olga just smirked. "At the Borscht Bowl Club, we serve borscht... and suckers."

"Remind me never to go there," the judge replied with a stern look. If he wasn't so closely connected with the restaurant already, Apollo admitted he'd easily agree.

"Of course, the card was to make its grand debut during the game," Olga continued. "Like a good borscht, a good plot must be cooked up early and allowed to thicken."
Apollo crossed his arms, thinking. "But what happened to it?"

"Hell if I know," Olga spat. "It disappeared without a trace! Poof! Zippo!" She twirled her finger in her hair. "We searched every nook and cranny... even inside his cute little hat!"

'I wouldn't call that neon monstrosity of Trucy's 'cute',:' Apollo mused, then shook his head to rid himself of the distracting thought. "You never found it?"

Olga didn't seem to have heard him, muttering darkly to herself. "Never in my long, storied career... never has 'Quick-Fingers' Orly been so readily duped!"

"Oh really," the judge said, again looking unimpressed. "So what did happen to that Five of Hearts?"

"Don't look at me," Olga snapped. "Why don't you ask that cheating, lying, two-faced defendant?"

Apollo rolled his eyes. 'Man, and I thought Payne had a grudge against Dad... Him foiling her plans really ticked her off.' Deciding to put the matter of the missing card aside, he decided to move on.
"So the card disappeared. Your trap failed. Without a doubt, he didn't cheat, and all three of you knew it." He narrowed his eyes at the witness, arms crossed. "Why, then, would the defendant feel the need to pick up that bottle and strike the victim?"

At that, Olga almost flinched, rubbing at the back of her neck. "W-well..."

Apollo's bracelet subtly tightened on his wrist, and he couldn't resist a small smirk. 'Gotcha.' "Ms Orly, once again, you're hiding something."

"Wh-what are you talking about!?" Olga snapped, her hand gripping the back of her neck nervously as she glared at the young attorney. "Y-y-you! M-m-m-me? 'Quick-Fingers' Orly, h-h-hide something?"

"Objection!" Payne yelped from the prosecutor's bench, startling Apollo as he remembered the man was there. "The defence will refrain from baseless accusations!"

Apollo tensed up slightly - that was the issue that had so screwed them over in Luke's trial, after all - but pushed on anyway. "I have one question for the witness then," he announced, turning back to face her. "You say you saw the moment the defendant hit the victim. Is this true?"

By now, Olga was visibly sweating, avoiding Apollo's gaze... not as good an actress as he'd previously thought. "O-of course it's true!" she insisted, her hand again rubbing at the back of her neck. "I d-did see it, honest! I saw it when Wright hit him. With my own eyes, I saw it!"

'Yep, definitely her neck.' He smiled, putting up a confident air though he still doubted his ability to use his 'power' to any kind of court advantage. "Ms Orly... I doubt you are aware of this..."

Olga froze. "A-aware of what?"

"Every single time you bring up that one certain event," Apollo explained, "you touch the back of your neck with your left hand."

"My... my neck?" Olga repeated, more confused than anything else. "So... so what!?"

Kristoph closed his eyes, the smallest of frowns in the corners of his lips. "Be careful, Wright," he muttered. "Remember what happened last time."

Apollo gave his mentor a quick nod to acknowledge the warning. "You're reacting to a memory,
"subconsciously," he continued to the witness. "A memory that unfailingly comes to mind every time you talk about the moment of the murder."

"A memory?" Payne scoffed, looking around the courtroom. "Would someone care to explain what he'd babbling about?"

The judge thought a moment. "This is highly unusual," he eventually admitted, then turned to Apollo. "Defence Wright, you claim the witness is remembering something. Maybe you have evidence of this 'memory' to show us?"

'Just like Dad said: Use the evidence I have to prove she's lying.' He closed his eyes a moment in thought, then opened them again, his eyes locking on to a green bottle still perched upon the prosecutor's bench. He smiled, turning to his witness. "Ms Orly, whenever you recall the crime that night, you scratch your neck... specifically, when you think about the exact moment of the crime. There must be some reason behind this 'habit' of yours, and I believe the weapon that left an inerasable 'impression' on your neck..." Grinning, Apollo pointed dramatically across the room at the deadly bottle. "... is that!" As planned, the gallery muttered amongst itself at his small display. "What reminds us more of the moment of the crime than the murder weapon itself?" he asked, a rhetorical question to cap off his presentation.

Olga had frozen, looking nervous.

"But something doesn't fit about that," Apollo continued, turning to face the con artist again. "If you were only the witness to the crime, why would that make you touch your neck like you're in pain?"

"What's he talking about now!?” Payne hissed.

"After all, it was the victim Mister Smith that was hit," Apollo was still saying, determined to push on as long as he could, "not you.”

Olga was fidgeting with her hair, her hand now deliberately moved away from her neck. "Uh... um..."

Payne had apparently had enough. "Objection! This is a cross-examination, not a cross-wild-conjecture!” he cried, steaming with anger. "Th-the witness's habits!? They're completely irrelevant!"

Apollo could almost feel Kristoph's disapproving stare on the back of his head, but he wasn't going to stop now. "Ms Orly! Please testify, in detail, about the moment of the crime! The very moment!"

Olga stood frozen for a moment, then ducked under the stand and emerged a few moments later in her fur coat and hat. "Ny-nyet, I am knowing nothing!” she cried, her voice dripping with the forced Russian accent.

The moment of absurdity instantly silenced the chaotic courtroom as everyone stared at Olga in disbelief, all tension gone without a trace. Apollo frowned. "We already know you're not Russian, Ms Orly,” he pointed out.

The judge nodded, giving her a stern stare. "The witness will testify, please," he agreed, almost surprising Apollo by appearing to agree with his conclusion. "Now."

Olga sighed, rolling her eyes. "Bah. Fine!” She threw off her coat and hat with a pointed glare at Apollo, making sure to very firmly grip a lock of hair with her left hand to keep from rubbing at her neck. "Like I said, it was Wright who did it! I didn't let him out of my sight until the cops got there!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow, watching her hand twitch. "You seem very uncertain about that."
"You try sitting up here!" Olga snapped in response.

Apollo could see her nervousness in her eyes, darting all over the courtroom as though looking for an escape. 'Didn't let him out of your sight, huh?' "Tell me, after the crime, what was the defendant like?"

Olga's eyes subtly widened - she hadn't been expecting that question. "Uh. Well. He must have been stunned by the weight of his crime!" she cried, stiff as a board. "He sat in a daze at that table until the cops came!"

"Intriguing," Kristoph muttered with a smile. "I believe this is all the testimony we'll be getting out of this witness." He turned to Apollo. "What did you think, Wright?"

"I'll tell you what I think," Apollo replied, arms crossed and with enough volume to announce his opinion to the court at large. "Her testimony is basically bogus. It contradicts the evidence!"

Payne jumped. "W-what's that!?"

"Well, show us this contradictory evidence, Defence Wright!" the judge cried.

Once again, Apollo turned his attention to the prosecutor's bench, pointing to where the ancient mobile phone belonging to his father lay. "Why, it's right over there, Your Honour! Sitting next to the murder weapon!" As everyone turned to look, he smirked triumphantly, crossing his arms. "The court record states the police were only alerted to the murder by a report from the defendant from that very phone."

Olga twitched. "Eh..."

"And we know that the defendant left the room, climbed the stairs and made that phone call from the first floor of the Borscht Bowl Club!" Apollo explained with the flourish of a professional performer.

"Ack!" Olga cried, jumping a little as she realised the young attorney's point.

"Please, explain, Ms Orly," Apollo continued, watching her carefully with a confident smile. "I've performed many magic tricks in my time, but never have I been able to see through two storeys of stone walls!"

Olga shrieked in shock, hiding under the witness stand as the gallery burst into commotion. Apollo worried for a moment that she'd fainted again, but, a few moments later, she carefully stood up, supporting herself on the witness stand with a pained look on her face. Without the judge even having to warn them, the gallery quietened to listen to what she had to say. "The man who picked up a bottle and swung it that night," she slowly admitted, her gaze locked on her feet, "wasn't the defendant."

Apollo was surprised. 'Are we... finally getting the truth?'

"Our plan went off without a hitch, until we couldn't find my trump card," Olga continued, still staring at the floor. "'You lose', he said. Just then, Smith grabbed the bottle from next to Wright..." Her breath hitched in her throat. "And he hit me!" She pressed a hand to her face, though Apollo could see it twitching towards her neck; He wondered if that was where she had been struck. "When I came to..."

The judge seemed sympathetic when Olga's final testimony trailed off. "The victim was already dead. Is that it?"
Olga nodded, managing to turn her gaze slightly upwards in the direction of the tall podium. "That's why I couldn't reveal who I really was. If it came out that I was in league with Smith..." Her hands on the stand tightened into fists, and she seemed to be slowly regaining control of herself. "I'd be a suspect for sure!"

There was a very long silence in the courtroom as Olga's words sank in. Finally, the judge leaned back in his chair and sighed. "Well. Where does this leave us?"

Payne was shaking his head, stepping back from his bench with a hand pressed tightly to his cheek. "M-madness. Th-this is madness! I'm dreaming! It must have been me who was hit with a bottle and I'm imagining all of this!"

The judge raised his eyebrows. "It appears our prosecution is at his wit's end, and frankly, I can't blame him." He turned to the defence. "Mister Gavin, what do you think about this turn of events?"

Kristoph was silent for a long moment, thinking to himself.

"Mister Gavin?" Apollo whispered, wondering if his mentor knew he'd been called upon. "Sir?"

Finally, Kristoph looked up at the judge. "I believe that, as the defence in this case... we are compelled to call Ms Orly a 'big fat liar'."

"W-what!?" Olga cried in disbelief, and Apollo couldn't blame her, adding his own, "B-but, sir-!"

"Three were in that room the night of the murder: the defendant, the victim and her," Kristoph was continuing. "And she has a motive."

Suddenly Apollo was having terrible flashbacks to Luke's trial.

"Her plot foiled, the witness got into an argument with her client, Mister Smith," Kristoph calmly explained. "The denouement of that argument... was murder."

"I didn't!" Olga desperately cried. "I'm no killer! It's a trap! Someone's trying to frame me...!"

Apollo heard chuckling on his left, and turned to once again see Phoenix had wandered out of the side-room to stand in the court. "Dad!" he cried in relief, alerting the entire room to the man's presence.

Phoenix didn't respond, apparently ignoring his son. "What tangled webs we weave when we practise to deceive," he said. "So tangled, we catch ourselves in the process."

The judge frowned, confused. "Defendant Wright?"

"Such a hasty conclusion," Phoenix continued, looking up at Kristoph with a lopsided grin. "It's not like you, Kristoph Gavin."

Kristoph stared back with a neutral expression. "What are you saying?"

"Why not consider the other possibility?" Phoenix asked, shrugging. "That there was another person in the room at the time of the murder?"

As quiet discussion rippled through the gallery, Apollo crossed his arms in thought. 'Right, Dad's theory... but is it even possible to prove?'

"A single card was swapped into the victim's hand after the murder," Phoenix explained. "And the one who swapped the card didn't know two colours of cards were being used... a fourth person."

"Objection!" came a surprising cry from the prosecution, and Payne scoffed at the ex-attorney. "Ha, this theory again!" He smugly brushed at his hair, and Apollo wondered if it was merely the sight of his 'rival' Phoenix that had stopped his earlier mutterings of madness. "Your 'fourth person' doesn't exist!"

Phoenix only smiled. "Indeed. That's why I decided to bring this case to court."

Apollo raised an eyebrow. 'You 'decided'? Really, Dad?'

"Here, where there's no escape, and no chance for deception," Phoenix was continuing, the enigmatic smile on his face as he looked away. "The perfect place to catch the real criminal."

"The r-real criminal?" the judge repeated.

"And we're in luck!" Phoenix brightly continued. "A clue to the real criminal's identity was kindly provided for us, and right at the beginning of the trial, no less!"

"W-what!?" Payne stuttered, jumping back in shock.

It was then Phoenix finally met his son's eyes, giving him that same playful smile he always wore when 'playing court'. "Apollo... Perhaps you know what I'm talking about?"

Apollo opened his mouth to say he didn't, but then changed his mind and closed it again. Although he longed to say otherwise, he had a funny feeling he did know what his father was referring to.

Phoenix didn't seem to mind Apollo's silence. "Remember what I said," he prompted. "The fourth person who swapped the cards made one critical error."

"Y-yeah," Apollo agreed. "They grabbed a card from the wrong deck."

Phoenix nodded, giving him a proud smile. "Right." He looked around the court, addressing his words to all to hear. "But how could such an obvious mistake occur? The cards used for the last game were red! Yet..." He returned his gaze to Apollo. "There is one person, here, in our court... who thought those cards were blue."

Apollo felt his face go pale. 'N... no...'

"Well, Apollo?" Phoenix asked, watching the young attorney with a kind smile. "You know who it was?"

Payne seemed to be shivering in fear. "I-it's not me, I swear!"

"Who is this fourth person!?" the judge demanded, looking between the two Wrights impatiently.

Seeing Apollo's slightly panicked look, Phoenix chuckled. "Let's hear what the defence has to say," he told the judge, before turning back to Apollo. "Who was it?" he prompted. "Who thought the cards used in the final game were blue?"

Apollo stared back at his father, the courtroom around them cloaked in a thick veil of silence. He didn't want to admit it, but that little fact had been niggling at the back of his mind for a while, the mistake that hadn't made any sense, that he'd brushed off as a mere assumption... something incredibly out-of-character for the man who had done it. Slowly, eyes wide in shock, Apollo turned his gaze to the floor... then turned around to stare at the tall man standing on his right.

Behind him, Phoenix smiled. "Kristoph Gavin," he announced. "You were the fourth person that night."

Kristoph, having been giving Apollo a mildly confused look, stiffened, eyes wide as he stared back at Phoenix.

"B-but," Apollo cried, spinning back around to his father, "of course Mister Gavin knows the colour of the cards!" he argued, unwilling to admit just yet his mentor had gone as far as committing murder - Forging evidence, yes, even possibly causing Phoenix's disbarment... but murder?

"Oh?" Phoenix replied, walking over to the witness stand. He gave Olga a respectful nod as he arrived, gesturing to the stand. "If I may, Ms Orly." Still nervous, she stepped back, and Phoenix dug around on the old, wooden structure until he had pulled out a cord. A few moments later, he pulled from his pockets an aging tablet computer, which he powered on and plugged in to the cord. Behind him, a bailiff approached Olga, quietly escorting her out of the courtroom to the side-room behind the prosecution, unnoticed by Phoenix, who was busy watching his computer boot up. He tapped away at its screen as he quickly prepared it for court, accessing the public Court Record through the cable on its side. "How would Kristoph know the colour of the cards?" he asked, finally flicking at his screen and activating the holograms, which displayed the initial crime scene photo of the Hydeout. "As you can see, this photo is black and white. You can't tell which of the cards are blue: the ones on the floor, or the table."

Apollo shook his head, flicking at his own computer to switch the display to the photo of the table itself, displaying the chips and the final hands. Off on one side, clearly visible, was the abandoned blue deck. "B-but look!" he cried. "You can see the colours in this photo!"

"Yes," Phoenix admitted, still smiling, "but when he said the cards were blue, it was well before this evidence came to light."

After a moment of staring, not wanting to admit his mentor was a murderer, Apollo frantically turned to his computer, switching to the transcript and rapidly scrolling back to the beginning of the trial, the words flying past on his screen at a breakneck pace. Above him, the holograms shut themselves off.

Meanwhile, Phoenix turned to the elder attorney. "Well, Kristoph?"

Kristoph didn't respond, still staring into space, stiff as a board. Next to him, Apollo was finally coming across the moment Kristoph had first claimed the cards were blue, finding that the only piece of photographic evidence at that point was indeed the black-and-white photo Phoenix had brought up. To his surprise, Apollo felt no shock and no further disbelief... only quiet acceptance, staring at the words on the screen almost numbly.

"Mister Gavin!" the judge cried, concerned at the elder attorney's continued silence. "I-is something the matter?"

Kristoph finally reacted, looking up at the judge. "Hmm? N-no, nothing." He shook his head, relaxing only a little. "Excuse me, it was just so... sudden." A carefully crafted neutral expression on his face, he turned to Phoenix. "Wright. You aren't seriously accusing me... are you?"

"Oh, Kristoph?" Phoenix asked, one eyebrow raised under his beanie. "You know even I'd never take a joke this far."

The gallery began to mutter, though it was quickly silenced by a cry of "Objection!" from the sweating prosecutor. "This has gone beyond ridiculous, beyond dumb... This is insanity!" Payne shouted. "The defendant accusing his own defence attorney of murder!?"

Apollo frowned. 'Hey, I'm his defence attorney, not Mister Gavin! Even though it doesn't seem like I'm doing much to help...'

"I assure you," Phoenix replied with an amused smile, "I'm quite sane."

"But what possible connection could Mister Gavin have to the victim!?" Payne sputtered.

Phoenix raised his eyebrows, giving Payne a surprised look despite the small smile on his lips. "I wasn't aware I had a connection to Mister Smith, either."

Payne paused a fraction of a second. "Yes," he admitted, "but Mister Gavin and the victim have never even met!"

"Well," Phoenix replied with an innocent shrug, "what if they have?"

Payne stared at him, confused. "Huh...?"

"There is a possibility, after all," Phoenix continued. "They may have met that night, before the game started."

The judge frowned. "What are you suggesting?"

Apollo perked up. 'Wait, of course!" Your Honour!" he announced. "The defence would like to request the defendant testify to the court!"
"Objection," came an immediate call from Apollo's right, surprising the young man into jumping back from the bench. "The defence would like to request no such thing!" To Apollo's shock, Kristoph was outright glaring now, a hand resting on the bench as he shot quick glances at Phoenix. "Testimonies must relate to the case. How could anything happening before that game of poker be related?"

The judge thought a moment. "I'm not sure I follow, Mister Gavin."

Kristoph minutely relaxed, straightening his pose and brushing at his fringe. "As I explained before, the defence believes that Ms Orly-"

"Am I to assume you speak for young Mister Wright in this?" the judge interrupted, giving the elder attorney a stern look. "He is the defence, not you."

Kristoph froze, eyes wide. It seemed he'd forgotten that.

The judge looked to Apollo. "Well, then... Defence Attorney Apollo Wright. The matter of the defendant's testimony is up to you."

Apollo felt most of the court's attention on him... and he wasn't sure what to say in response. "Oh."

"Does the court, in your opinion," the judge continued, "need to hear the defendant's testimony?"

Despite the fact that it had been his own suggestion, Apollo suddenly found himself unsure. On his right, Kristoph was firmly avoiding his gaze, glaring off into the distance, his posture tense from a barely contained rage. On his left, Phoenix stood calmly at the stand, watching his son with a neutral expression; It was clear he wasn't going to interfere with Apollo's decision, as much as the young attorney might have wanted to pass off the responsibility. He turned his gaze to the bench before him, deep in thought as he stepped forward to rest a hand on the smooth surface of the polished wood. 'Dad's been waiting for this for seven years; It seems Mister Gavin finally slipped up, even if this won't clear Dad's name... I...’ He sighed, steeling himself. 'This is my decision to make... and I'm going to see it through.' Apollo looked back up to the judge with a determined stare. "The defence would like to request that the defendant testify to the court!"

Kristoph didn't outwardly react except to close his eyes. "Et tu, Apollo? You would betray your teacher for your father?"

"I'm sorry, Mister Gavin," Apollo replied, hoping the elder attorney could see that it was genuine. "This isn't about loyalty. This is about the truth."

Saying nothing, Kristoph turned away.

The judge nodded. "Very well. The defendant..." He paused, perhaps noticing Phoenix was already at the witness stand. "Er... Will take the stand." Pretending he hadn't just made a fool of himself, he gestured for Phoenix to continue.

Phoenix rubbed at his chin in thought for a few moments. "That evening, Kristoph and I had dinner," he explained, then flicked at his computer to bring up Olga’s photo of himself and the victim. "We sat at the table in this photograph. Shadi Smith walked in five minutes after Kristoph left." Another swipe at his touchscreen, and the holograms shut down again. "When the 'trap' failed, Smith hit the waitress. The girl was knocked out cold, and Smith was uncontrollable. I left to call the police. When I returned, he was dead, blood streaming from a cut on his forehead." He closed his eyes at the unpleasant memory, grimacing slightly. "That's when I made another phone call... to Defence Attorney Gavin."
Apollo was almost surprised to realise his father was finally testifying about the murder... nothing held back any more.

The judge was turning to Kristoph in surprise. "Mister Gavin! You were at the Borscht Bowl Club the night of the murder!"

Kristoph didn't respond.

Phoenix smiled. "I dine with him rather frequently," he explained.

"A-and he talked to the defendant on the phone directly after the murder!" Payne added to the judge's outburst.

"Quite against my will, I had become involved in a murder," Phoenix pointed out with an amused look. "I thought I might be in need of a lawyer, so I called him."

Finally Kristoph reacted, pushing at his glasses as he kept his gaze firmly on nothing and nobody in particular. "You were planning this all along, weren't you, Wright? Just because you wanted to drag me into your little murder trial."

Phoenix's humour instantly gave way to stern determination. "The only thing I want is the truth," he insisted. "As I did back then, and now."

Kristoph snapped his head around to glare at the other man. "I thought I was doing you a favour when I took on your defence," he snapped. "When I passed it on, against my better judgement, to your son. It appears I was wrong." With that, he returned to staring straight ahead, his growing rage evident in his expression.

The judge seemed a little startled by the elder attorney's fury, but carried on with only a wary look at the man. "Very well. The defence may cross-examine the witness."

Apollo was already nodding and mentally preparing himself when he was startled by an icy whisper from Kristoph: "Apollo, he's lying and you're going to expose him."

"H-huh?" the young attorney muttered in surprise. "B-but-!

"As you said, this is about the truth," Kristoph continued, still staring dead ahead and pushing at his glasses to hide his whispered orders. "He's just a witness and you're going to take him down."

Apollo stared back at his teacher for a long moment. This can't end well.
Apollo ran a hand through his hair, steeling himself up for what was sure to be the most difficult cross-examination of his young career: The icy rage of the Coolest Defence in the West at his right, and his own father, the legendary Ace Attorney himself, the witness he was to question. With the transcript of Phoenix's testimony in front of him, he took a deep breath and began. "So, um... You had dinner with Mister Gavin that night?"

Phoenix smiled, knowing it was a question Apollo knew the answer to. "Yes, he dines with me at the Borscht Bowl Club rather frequently," he replied, for the court's benefit rather than Apollo's. "We were enjoying a usual dinner at our usual spot... as usual." When Apollo only nervously nodded in response, Phoenix hid a smirk. "'Usual' meaning the table closest to the piano, of course."

"I see," the judge muttered to himself, tugging on his beard. "Where Mister Smith was sitting in the photo!"

Payne frowned, looking confused, and he brought said photo up on the holograms. "So, the plates and such on the table were from your dinner?" he asked.

Phoenix nodded. "Indeed. The remnants of my meal with Kristoph." As Payne took the photo back down, Phoenix continued, "We dined for two hours, then Kristoph left."

"And Mister Smith walked in five minutes later," Apollo picked up, tapped his forehead in thought. "So, the two of them could have passed in the restaurant during that time?"

"That would have been a fateful encounter to be sure," Phoenix said, shooting a smile at Kristoph, but the elder attorney simply continued to ignore him.

"Objection!" Payne cried, then giggled with a gleeful smile, tapping his head. "Oh, Mister Wright... What was it you said? Kristoph Gavin and Shadi Smith may have met...?"

Phoenix nodded. "I believe I did say that," he conceded.

Payne scoffed. "Here I was all nervous about this 'meeting'... and now we hear they just passed in the hall!"

The judge hummed in thought. "That does seem a little weak as a pretence for murder," he agreed.

"Oh, it would be," Phoenix readily admitted with a smile, "if that was all that really happened."

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "Don't tell me you are still hiding something at this late stage, Dad!"

Deciding to leave it until Phoenix was ready to talk about it, he moved on to the next part of the testimony. "The failed 'trap' you mentioned... That's the same 'trap' Ms Orly was telling us about, right?"

"Yes," Phoenix replied, nodding. "A harmless prank, in essence. It was by a quirk of fate that I happened to discover it."
Payne frowned. "A 'quirk'?

"I happened to put my hand in my pocket," Phoenix explained, grinning, "and found a card."

Apollo blinked in surprise. "The planted card!"

"I snuck a peek at it," Phoenix continued. "It was the Five of Hearts. I had a feeling something might happen, so I disposed of the thing... before the game."

"Disposed?" the judge repeated, leaning forward eagerly. "Where!?!"

"There was an empty bottle of grape juice I had been drinking beside me," Phoenix explained. "I rolled the card up and shoved it in there. The coloured glass makes it hard to see."

Apollo frowned. "An empty..." His eyes widened in surprise. "You don't mean the murder weapon, do you?"

Phoenix nodded, grinning.

The judge tugged on his beard with a smile. "A battle of wits between the deceiver and the would-be-deceived! That sounds like terrific drama!" He nodded. "Defendant Wright, the 'Poker Head of Courtroom Number Three' approves of this battle of wits!"

Apollo, meanwhile, was staring at the bottle on the prosecutor's bench. 'Did the police really miss that in their investigation? Surely the murder weapon would be something they'd look at from every angle!'

Payne seemed confused. "Why in an empty bottle!?!"

Phoenix smirked. "I perceived my opponent's intent immediately. I'm used to entrapment, you see." He looked away, smiling enigmatically. "I knew what was coming."

"Ho ho, so you struck first!" the judge laughed. "I like that!"

"I know every trick in the book," Phoenix idly boasted. "They don't work on me."

Apollo rolled his eyes. 'You got lucky, Dad. Or unlucky. Any way you look at it, it was the Wright luck.' "So, um... When you discovered the dead body..."

Phoenix bitterly laughed. "I'll admit, I was a little startled when I walked in on that. He was bleeding from his forehead, after all."

'Can't blame you for that,' Apollo agreed, but, with his mind so focussed on the memories of his own initial impressions (it had proven to be useful a number of times in this trial, after all), he was already flipping through the photographic evidence. "You could see the blood on his forehead?" he asked.

Phoenix nodded. "Yep."

Apollo paused a moment as he found his photo, then swiped his finger to put it up on the holograms: the initial black-and-white crime scene photo. "You shouldn't have been able to see that, though," he pointed out. "The victim was wearing his hat."

After a few seconds of thought, Phoenix smiled, again nodding at his son, almost proudly. "Good point."
Kristoph huffed at Apollo's side, almost startling the young attorney as he remembered the man was there. "Next time you point out an inconsistency, put a little more oomph into it," he muttered.

"Defendant Wright!" the judge was calling. "Can you explain this to the court?"

"Ah, I forgot to mention something," Phoenix admitted, almost guiltily were it not for the gleeful grin. "I was the one who put that hat on his head."

The courtroom gasped at the revelation. While Apollo simply blinked in surprise, Payne actually jumped in shock. The judge slammed his gavel once, giving Phoenix a disapproving look as he asked, "You put the hat on the dead man's head?"

Phoenix didn't seem fazed by the reaction. "He wore it through our entire poker game," he explained. "After calling the police, when I returned to the scene, his head was in full view, shining bright..." He tapped at his computer, bringing up the photo of the victim without his hat. "Just like... in this photograph."

"And?" the judge asked.

"I picked his hat up off the floor and put it on his head," Phoenix said, still smiling.

Payne still seemed in shock. "W-w-why'd you do a thing like that!?"

Phoenix grinned. "All I can say is... I'm sorry." He capped his 'apology' off with a tiny bow of the head to the prosecutor. "But that's the only thing I touched at the crime scene."

Now that Apollo found intriguing. "So... Ms Orly didn't see it?" he asked, arms crossed as he frowned in thought. "His head, I mean?"

"I'd think not," Phoenix agreed, smiling enigmatically again. "She was out cold. I believe I was the only one who witnessed his head."

Kristoph sighed. "Ah, here we go again..."

Apollo blinked in surprise as he turned to his right, confused. "Mister Gavin?"

Clearing his throat, Kristoph put on a smile, speaking loud enough for the whole court to hear. "Pardon. It just seems our client is determined to lie his way through this case."

Apollo was too intimidated to say anything after that.

The judge hummed in thought, frowning at the attorney for a moment before turning to Apollo. "In any case, please continue the cross-examination. I'm afraid decisive contradictions call for decisive evidence."

Apollo barely had time to nod before Kristoph was looking at him with a stern frown, whispering, "Push him harder, Wright. Break him! It's just you and the witness in the ring. Go for the K.O.!"

"R-right," the young man nodded. 'Even discounting that we should never treat a client like that... does he not comprehend this is my father he's telling me to do this to?" Gingerly, he stepped away from his boss, out behind the bench. "M-Mister Payne," he called, ducking under the red ropes stretching past the defence bench, "I was wondering if I might take a closer look at the murder weapon?"

Payne seemed confused, but apparently had stopped caring, waving at the green bottle on his bench.
with a sigh. "Very well."

"Thank you," Apollo replied, giving the man a grateful nod as he quickly dashed across the room, getting out his gloves and pulling them on as he moved. It took him no more than a moment to sweep up the glass evidence into his hands, immediately pointing it to look down the neck through the top. 'Hmm... It might be more visible from the other end.' Spinning the bottle around on his silk glove (and eliciting a spattering of amazed cooing from the gallery), he turned his eye to the thick bottom, peering through the green glass from another angle. 'Huh. Dad seemed pretty sure it was this bottle... I hope that wasn't another of his 'plays'...' He turned to his father with a curious expression. "You're sure it was this bottle that trump card ended up in?"

Phoenix seemed surprised, which didn't do much for Apollo's confidence. "It's... not in there?"

Apollo shook his head, indicating the bottle still in his hands. "It's empty."

Phoenix frowned, looking away as he hummed in thought.

The judge sighed. "Surely that isn't all you have to say for yourself, Defendant Wright!" he cried. "I can't say I know what happened to that card," Phoenix explained. "I did put it in that bottle, however."

Apollo watched his father closely, his hands automatically placing the bottle back down on Payne's bench. 'You better not be lying, Dad. You've always known we could never tell with you.'

"Perhaps a fifth person came and took it out?" Kristoph bitterly asked, glaring in a random direction. "Oh, and a sixth person could've helped!"

The judge watched Kristoph in shock. "Mister Gavin...! Mister Wright is your client!"

Kristoph paused a moment, calming down before smiling up at the judge's podium. "My apologies, Your Honour."

Apollo suddenly found himself very unwilling to return to the defence's bench... however, as the leading defence attorney on the case, it would just be silly to remain lingering on the prosecution's side, so he forced himself to wander back across to his post.

Payne shot a glare at the two attorneys opposite. "I won't have you disparaging our investigation, either!" he snapped. "We looked inside that bottle, too! There was nothing!"

Apollo couldn't meet anyone's eyes as he ducked back under the red rope, pulling off his gloves to put away in a pocket.

Kristoph shook his head. "$I believe that's enough of that," he announced. "$This witness's 'testimony' is more like a 'travesty'. It's riddled with lies." He glared across at Phoenix. "$I'm beginning to see how you came to lose your attorney's badge seven years ago."

Apollo barely restrained a shocked gasp, although he was certain he heard a somewhat similar reaction from a small section of the gallery.

Phoenix only glared right back, putting on all appearances of being unfazed by such a low blow. "$Well. You certainly have a unique way of treating your clients, Kristoph. I never knew."

"I believe it was you who threw the first stone?" Kristoph darkly replied.
Apollo felt torn between his mentor and his father. "D-dad," he called, "if you are still hiding something..."

Phoenix's glare softened to a smile as he turned to his son. "Don't be misled," he said. "I haven't told a single lie here."

To his relief, Apollo felt he could believe that.

"When I noticed the 'trap'," Phoenix continued, gesturing to the bottle, "I put the card in that bottle to dispose of it." He paused, hiding a small smile that Apollo only just caught a glimpse of. "And, when I put the hat on the victim's head... Let's just say I had a reason for doing that as well."

"A... reason?" the judge asked, confused.

Phoenix paused a moment, then stepped out from behind the witness stand with a smile, heading towards a somewhat nervous Payne. "That reason," he announced, "is right here." With that, he grabbed his ancient blue phone from the bench, lazily taking it back with him. Everyone in the court exchanged confused looks, so Phoenix began his explanation as he arrived at the stand again, holding it up high. "That night, recall that I spoke with Defence Attorney Gavin after calling the police." He paused, grinning. "Just in case, I recorded our conversation."

Kristoph's eyes widened. "What's this...?"

"Now that we're all here," Phoenix continued, already with his eyes on his tiny phone screen as he navigated menus with the clunky keypad, "I see no reason why I shouldn't play it back for the court."

A few moments later, the phone began to play back the recording at full volume...
"Kristoph. I seem to be in a bit of trouble."

"What's this? Game not going well?"

"Something like that."

"That gentleman who challenged you... He turn out to be good?"

"He turned out to be dead. Someone hit him. Hard."

"You mean someone cracked that flawless bone china pate?"

"..."

"It... wasn't you, was it?"

"Me? Please. ... The cops should be here any minute. I'm in your hands... Should it come to that."

District Court
Courtroom No. 2

There was a short beep as the phone's recording ended, and Phoenix placed it down on the stand.

Apollo frowned. "Bone china plate...?" he repeated.

"A kind of porcelain, very smooth and shiny," Phoenix explained with a joking grin, taking delight in Apollo's resulting frown that that hadn't been what he was confused about. "And not 'plate', but 'pate'. I believe," he paused to again bring up the photo of the victim without his hat on the holograms, "he was referring to a certain gentleman's balding forehead."

The judge nodded approvingly. "The court appreciates the defendant's discretion in not indicating my forehead," he said.

Apollo was busy staring at the photo again. "But... hadn't Mister Gavin left the Borscht Bowl Club after dinner?" he asked.

Phoenix smiled proudly. "Most certainly."

"Then... how'd he know?" Apollo continued, looking over at his father (partly out of a strong desire to not see Gavin's own reaction to the question). "When did he see this 'bone china pate'?"

The judge jumped a little in surprise. "Oh! That's right!"

Phoenix sadly nodded. "Yes... That was when I began to see my good friend in a different light."

Apollo chanced a look at the man on his other side, but Kristoph had his eyes closed, standing perfectly still and calm as though he was not even aware of the court around him. '... 'Good friend'.

"Troubled, I returned to the crime scene," Phoenix continued, "and when I spotted Mister Smith's head again, I realised exactly what was wrong." He turned his gaze, ever so solemnly, to Kristoph. "Well, Mister Gavin. The stage has been set. Perhaps you would like to explain this to the court?" Phoenix's eyes ever-so-subtly narrowed. "Exactly how did you come by your privileged knowledge of the victim's head?"

There was a very long pause, in which Kristoph remained totally still. Finally, his eyes opened, and he looked up at Phoenix. "So, this is your 'reason'," he said. "Why you put the victim's hat back on. Why you insisted I step down in favour of your son."

Phoenix's gaze did not waver. "Your point, Mister Gavin?"

Kristoph stared back for another long moment, then closed his eyes again, turning away. "It's come down to this, has it, Phoenix Wright?"

Suddenly, the gallery erupted into chatter, and the judge was forced to slam his gavel a few times as he called for order.

Apollo was almost too stunned to process what was going on. 'Get a hold of yourself, Wright. The whole reason you took up a job with Mister Gavin was to help Dad once this day came... Argh, I just wish I'd been given some warning at least!'

As the courtroom calmed down, the judge turned to the prosecution. "Mister Payne!"

Payne jumped. "Y-yes, Your Honour!"

"I believe this court has been left with no other choice," the judge continued. "Are you prepared to hear Defence Attorney Gavin's testimony?"

"Eh?" Payne muttered in shocked reply, stuttering to himself for several moments before clearing his throat. "Well, as the prosecutor, I-"

"Very well!" the judge interrupted. "We'll break for ten minutes, after which Mister Gavin will take the stand for a cross-examination!" He looked around the room sternly. "Are we all clear on that?"

Kristoph, despite his closed eyes, was glaring again. "Crystal clear, Your Honour."

The judge nodded. "Very well! This will be the final recess for the day." With one final bang of his gavel, he was up and out of the courtroom.

April 20, 2:32PM
District Court
Defendant Lobby No. 3

The bailiffs had very quickly whisked both Phoenix and Kristoph away to speak with the judge, so it was Apollo alone who arrived in the lobby. He was still a little stunned from the dramatic last few hours in court, pacing back and forth across the room. 'I work way better with a performance if I know the bloody script! Sigh... Who'd've thought today would turn out like this...'
The door creaked open, and Apollo looked up in surprise to see the familiar face of a teenage girl peeking in at him with a grin, her hands hidden under her cape behind her back. "Hi, Polly!"

"Truce!" Apollo cried, rushing to meet his sister as she came in to the room. "What are you doing here!? You're supposed to be with Luke in the gallery!"

Trucy just grinned. "I have something for you!" she announced, then swept her hands into view to reveal a small bundle of red cloth, neatly folded on top of a much thicker red-and-white heart-shaped bag, its strap dangling out of the teen's grip.

Apollo blinked in surprise. "Wait... is that...?"

"Yep!" Trucy chirped. "Well, technically it's your spare. I was gonna ask Clay to bring your actual outfit, but he can't pick the lock on your closet."

Apollo just stared, dumbstruck, at the magician's cape and bag in his sister's arms, too shocked to even react to the fact Trucy had asked Clay to break in to his closet. "Why is it even here?" he asked. "I'm in court, not on stage!"

Trucy scoffed. "Daddy helped me design it so you could wear it in court, too!" she boasted. "You cut it down for Mister Gavin, but he's not telling you what to do anymore!" She forcefully pushed the bundle into Apollo's arms, forcing him to take it. "Now you can be wearing it when you take down your first criminal and save Daddy!"

Sighing, Apollo reluctantly held the red bundle of fabric. "Is it really so important I have to wear it?"

"Yes!" Trucy insisted, pushing further at the bundle. "Put it on!"

Rolling his eyes, the young attorney moved the remnants of his costume away from Trucy's reach. "Alright, alright, fine!"

Cheering, Trucy bounced up and down a moment before stopping with a gasp. "Oh yeah! Since Clay couldn't get into your closet, you don't have the fancy pin Luke made for you!" With one hand, she gripped the overlapping corners of her cape on her chest, while the other pulled out her own golden badge, which she held out to her eldest brother with a smile. "You can borrow mine!" She glanced down at his black court shoes with a frown. "Though I can't do much about your boots. We'll have to hope nobody notices that."

Apollo was staring at the bow-shaped pin in his sister's hand. "Are you sure?" he asked, gingerly taking it. "What about...?"

"Don't worry about me!" Trucy cried, reaching into the bag at her hip to pull out a safety pin, which she quickly stuck through the blue fabric at her chest to hold up her cape in the missing badge's place. "I came prepared!"

"You sure did," Apollo couldn't resist saying with a fond laugh.

Trucy shot him a grin, then turned and bounced out of the room. "Good luck, Polly!" she called.

Apollo was only briefly able to wave at his sister until she disappeared out of the room, the door closing shut with a decisive thud. 'How is it Trucy still fails to be predictable after all this time?'

Shaking his head, he slipped the pin into a pocket for a moment, then firmly held the bag and cape with one hand each, pulling them away from each other to prepare to put on. As the cape unfolded in his grip, billowing out in a crimson wave, Apollo heard the tiny flutter of falling paper. 'Huh...? What was that?' Lying by his feet was a playing card, face-down on the carpet, the red design on its back displayed for all the world to see. "What the...?" the young man muttered to himself, draping his cape over his other arm and kneeling down to get a better look at the errant card. 'It... it does look like one from the Hydeout! Or, um, one of the incomplete deck we 'inherited', anyway.' With his free hand, he reached out and grabbed the card, flipping it in his fingers as he held it up for a closer look.

The pristine white around the large, black symbol of the Ace of Spades was broken only by an ominous red splotch on its right: a single drop of blood.

Hiding a gasp, Apollo's gaze snapped up to the door of the lobby, as though he might find Trucy there to question her... but she was long gone, and he knew it. 'Where did she get this!? Why'd she have to hide it in my cape and not just give it to me directly!? Why is it...!?' He shook his head, slowly standing up. 'No, I'm sure she had her reasons. I... I just hope this isn't what I think it is.'
'Gloves, bag, cape... only things missing are my boots and hat, not that I'd want to cover up my hair in court.' Apollo smiled to himself as he adjusted his cape around his shoulders, finding himself feeling grateful that Trucy snuck the outfit to him... even if it felt a little weird wearing it in court after so long without most of it. The bow-shaped pin Luke had made for Trucy was securely fastened under his chin, the blue tie that matched his sister's costume peeking out from the shadows of the crimson cape's high collar. 'It hides my attorney's badge a little, but I knew that when I first got it. I hope Trucy isn't wanting me to try and advertise our show during the trial.'

As he approached the defence bench, Apollo's walk halted with a start. Waiting for him, in the spot Kristoph had been standing in up 'til now, was Phoenix, watching his son with an amused look. "You brought your stage outfit?" he asked. "What are you doing here?" he asked. "Defendants are supposed to be off in the side room."

Phoenix grinned. "Hey, defendants are allowed to stand at the bench with their attorneys if they want to," he said. "Besides, don't you want my help now Mister Gavin is 'away'?"

At that, Apollo couldn't resist a smirk. "Oh, you're planning to actually help me now, are you?" he asked.

"Very funny," Phoenix chuckled in response, moving to try and ruffle his son's hair before Apollo ducked out of the way with a laugh.

The bang of the gavel instantly quietened the room, attracting everyone's attention to the judge's podium. "Court will now reconvene," the judge announced as he sat down. He looked out across the room, and Apollo turned to see a bailiff standing with Kristoph, not far from the entrance doors. "Defence Attorney Kristoph Gavin," the judge called, "will you please take the stand?" Sighing, Kristoph obeyed, leaving the timid bailiff behind as he stepped up to the small podium, now free of all the paraphernalia Phoenix had left there before the recess. The judge nodded. "Now then, if you would, Mister Payne."

Payne was shivering with fear behind his bench opposite the two Wrights. "Y-y-yes, Your Honour!" he yelped, then looked to the stand. "Erm, will Mister... er, the witness state his name and occupation?"

Kristoph's arms were tightly crossed, and he gave a long-suffering sigh. "Is this farce necessary, Your Honour?" he asked.

The judge seemed to chuckle to himself. "Believe me, far stranger things have gone on in this courtroom."

'No kidding,' Apollo thought. 'Any one of Dad's trials had weirder things going on than this.' Kristoph didn't seem to like that answer, but accepted it anyway. "Fine. I'll play along."
The judge nodded. "First, there's one thing we need to have made clear: How did you know about the 'secret' beneath the victim's hat?"

There was a short pause before Kristoph responded with a tight frown. "Forgive my curiosity, but what is it about this fellow's head? Your Honour seems to have an inordinate interest in it."

Apollo almost jumped as he heard an open-palmed slam on the defence bench, and turned to see Phoenix throwing out a pointer finger with a loud shout of "Objection!" The older Wright smiled. "I wouldn't call it inordinate, Mister Gavin."

Suddenly Apollo was reminded of the first time he got to see one of the famous Phoenix Wright's trials in person, huddled up in a back corner of the gallery and staring down with glee at the distant figure in blue as he won his case with ease (or, at least, that's how he remembered it going). Never could he have imagined he'd one day be witnessing that famous shout from Phoenix's side.

Kristoph glared. "What do you think you're doing, Wright?"

Phoenix grinned confidently, and Apollo didn't doubt he was enjoying the fleeting chance to 'play lawyer' again in an actual courtroom. "Consider something for a second," he explained. "The victim wore that hat all night, never once taking it off... except for one time."

"That one time," Apollo picked up with a grin, "being the instant he was hit!"

The judge jumped in surprise. "Oh...!"

"When Dad, I mean, the defendant returned from reporting the crime," Apollo explained to the court, "the hat was lying on the floor. The defendant picked it up, and placed it on the victim's head. In other words, in order to have seen Mister Smith's bald head, you have had to be at the scene of the crime," he banged a fist on the bench, taking his father's lead, "at the time of the crime!"

Kristoph idly pressed at his glasses. "In other words, you'd have to be the real killer, is what you're trying to say."

Apollo felt a brief tap on his back, and turned to see his father giving him a proud smile. He grinned in return.

At the witness stand, Kristoph began to chuckle, brushing at his hair. "I'm afraid that I haven't been entirely honest with the court," he announced.

"W-what!" Payne yelped.

"Oh, I assure you, I had the noblest of intentions," Kristoph continued, giving the room the same serene smile he'd been wearing when the trial began. "I did it all... to protect my client, Mister Phoenix Wright." As murmurs rippled through the gallery, the attorney sighed to himself with a smile. "Yet, I'm afraid in the current situation I see little reason to hide anything." He paused a moment. "Very well. Allow me to tell you the truth of what happened that night."

"Finally!" the judge cried, and Apollo thought he glimpsed the old man rolling his eyes. "You may begin your testimony. Tell us, how were you involved in the events of that fateful night?"

Kristoph nodded. "The rage I sensed in that man that night troubled me, so I returned to the club. I went down to the basement and peeked in through the little window to the Hydeout." He paused, brushing at his hair. "It must have been right after the murder took place. The victim was dead, as he appears in the photo. A bald head, an unconscious girl... and Wright, holding a bottle in his hand." He smiled as his words seemed to cause more ripples amongst the gallery. "I sensed that was not the best place for me to be at the time and so I left. That's when the call came from Wright."

Apollo was almost disappointed in his boss. 'Geeze, a pack of lies from start to finish... well, except the various minor details that we already knew were true, of course.'

Payne stared at Kristoph in disbelief. "So... you witnessed the murder!?"

Kristoph shrugged. "For better or worse, I missed the actual moment of the deed."

The bracelet on Apollo's wrist twinged.

"Mister Gavin," the judge said, sounding concerned, "may I remind you that you are on Defendant Wright's defence team? Your testimony is clearly disadvantageous to your client!"

"What else could I say?" Kristoph replied, as calm as he usually was. "I'm standing on the witness stand, after all."

'You could start with the truth,' Apollo thought, knowing he didn't have the courage to voice it.

Phoenix just smiled. "So you are, Mister Gavin." When Kristoph gave him a confused frown, he continued, "And you had to testify as you just did. You had to tell them you saw the scene of the crime through that little window." He turned his face downwards, eyes closed as he continued to smile to himself. "You had to say that... because that was the only probable window of opportunity."

Apollo was almost surprised. 'Actually, that makes sense. He is trying to save his own skin here, after all, as most murderers would.'

The judge gave Phoenix a disapproving look. "Defendant Wright, the defence should do the cross-examination, not the defendant!" Sighing, he turned to Apollo. "Defence Wright, are you prepared?"

Apollo nodded. "Yes, Your Honour." He looked down at his computer, returning his attention to the transcript. 'Can't pull my punches here. That's what you've always taught me to do after all, Mister Gavin.' "When you returned to the Hydeout," he began, looking up at the stand, "why did you go through the trouble of peeking in through the window? Wouldn't it have been easier to just open the door and go into the room?"

Kristoph thought a moment. "I didn't want to upset Wright, you see."

"Upset...?" Apollo repeated, confused.

"Yes. What if my fears had been unfounded?" Kristoph replied. "I'd be walking in on their match! Bad form, to say the least."

Apollo returned his attention to the transcript, embarrassed. 'Well, that was a dud.'

Phoenix chuckled to himself. "Ah, there's that 'Coolest Defence in the West' we know and love!" he said. "Even when you're standing up there on the witness stand, some things never change."

Kristoph raised an eyebrow. "I was afraid you'd changed, too, Wright, but you haven't." He closed his eyes, looking away. "You and that overbearing personality of yours."

Leaning confidently on the defence bench with one hand, Phoenix was unfazed at the veiled insult, simply shrugging it off.

Apollo rolled his eyes, focusing on his next question. "So, at the scene of the crime, you saw only the victim, the defendant and Ms Orly?"
Kristoph nodded. "Yes... As far as I saw, at least."

Payne smirked, tapping at his head. "Then we're back where we started. The killer was the defendant, Phoenix Wright! Who else could it have been!" His confidence quickly drained again as he gave Kristoph a curious look. "But... why didn't you talk to the police?"

"Two reasons:" Kristoph replied, "First, I didn't actually witness the very moment of the crime. Second, my office was asked to defend Wright. Even after seeing what I had seen," he paused to shrug, his smile almost seeming cocky, "I couldn't abandon my friend."

The judge was humming in thought, tugging at his beard.

'Uh-oh, the judge is turning to Mister Gavin's side!' Thinking quickly, Apollo grabbed at the first idea that came to mind and shouted "Objection!", slamming the bench with his fists. "There must have been someone else there at the moment of the crime!"

Kristoph gave Apollo a stern stare. "Apollo, I just said I saw no one. Not a soul."

'And that's only the truth because the fourth person was you,' Apollo lamented. "B-but," he insisted, "that goes against the evidence! It doesn't make sense without a fourth person on the scene!"

"Ah yes," Kristoph almost laughed, "it would be very convenient for your father were there a mysterious 'fourth person' to be the 'real killer', wouldn't it?" He raised a single, disapproving eyebrow. "I thought I taught you to value the truth above personal relationships, Apollo."

Phoenix snorted to himself. "Glad to see there's one thing we agree on, Mister Gavin."

"Let me pose a question, then," Kristoph continued, ignoring Phoenix. "Tell me, what possible reason did this 'real killer' have to swap cards in the victim's hand?"

Apollo froze. He didn't know the answer to that.

"Hmm?" Kristoph pushed. "Perhaps you can show us a reason why such a thing would be necessary?"

'How can I show something I don't know myself?!' Apollo thought, trying not to visibly panic as he stepped back from the bench.

"Keep calm, Apollo," came a comforting whisper from Apollo's right, and he looked over to see Phoenix watching him with a solemn expression. "You know this, even if you don't realise it yet. It was the fifth ace, remember?"

"Y-yeah, the fifth ace," Apollo repeated with a rapid nod.

The judge seemed impatient. "Well, Defence Wright?" he asked. "The question of why the killer would swap out a card has been raised. Can you point to a reason?"

Kristoph just smiled, looking somewhat smug. "I'm willing to wait for as long at it takes, Wright."

Apollo wondered which 'Wright' he was referring to.

"Take a few moments to think it over," Phoenix prompted, remaining calm and quiet at Apollo's side. "Turn the question around: Why did the killer have no choice but to swap that card out of Smith's hand?"

Squeezing his eyes shut, Apollo pressed a finger to his forehead and tried to shut the sounds of the courtroom around him out. 'Right, turn it around, like Mia always used to say. No choice but to swap the card. Why would you HAVE to swap that card? I guess... because it could be used as evidence against you? Maybe if... Wait, the fifth ace! Of course!'

That was it. The solution. Apollo jumped to the bench, looking up at the judge with a confident smile. "The defence would like to present evidence to the court, showing the reason why a card was swapped out!"

Kristoph watched in neutral silence. Phoenix was frowning slightly.

The judge nodded. "Then go ahead and point out your reason, Defence Wright," he ordered. "Why did the killer take the fifth ace?"

With a flourish, Apollo raised his left hand into the air, twirling his fingers and seemingly materialising a single playing card from thin air, which he held high for all the court to see. "My reason," he announced, "is this!"

View the Court Record
The entire courtroom stared in shock at the tiny playing card between Apollo's index and middle fingers, Kristoph more than anyone. The young magician was too focussed on staying perfectly still, his confident smile directed out at the court, to turn and see his father's reaction, but he expected Phoenix must have been waiting for this; After all, how else could Trucy have this card to pass on to her brother?

"Is that... an ace?" Payne asked.

The judge was leaning in for a closer look when he suddenly gasped, jumping back. "Why, it's got blood on it! Right next to the spade!"

"W-what!?" Kristoph cried, somewhere between shocked and furious.

"This is insane!" Payne was shouting. "Why wasn't I told about this!? Why!?"

"Could... this be the missing fifth ace!?" the judge was asking.

Kristoph was forcing a half-smile on the stand, though his face kept visibly twitching. "I-inconceivable! How could you... What are you doing with that card!?"

Apollo just smirked. 'What, put out that your plan was foiled? You shouldn't have left it behind, then!'

"Oh, that card?" Phoenix picked up from Apollo's side, and Apollo finally lowered the card, turning to see Phoenix shrugging with a lazy smile. "It's mine. That is, I picked it up at the Borscht Bowl Club that night after the murder had occurred," he explained. "I gave it to my daughter. Cards are her, and Apollo's, stock and trade, after all."

'Yeah, that would be why Trucy had it!' Apollo agreed, still smiling ecstaticly. 'Dad knew it was important and gave it to her for safe-keeping!'

"Objection!" Kristoph quickly cut in, starting to look slightly panicked. "N-no! Impossible! Unacceptable! The court can't accept this evidence! It's a fraud!"

"A fraud?" Phoenix repeated, smirking. "How can you be so sure?"

Kristoph paused. "W-what...?"

"I would think the only person who could claim it was a fraud," Phoenix explained, "would be the one who took the 'real' card from the crime scene... the real killer!"

Kristoph was too surprised to respond to that.

"Allow me to elaborate," Phoenix said, reaching over and plucking the card from Apollo's hand. "What if this trace of blood was the reason?"
Payne frowned. "The reason for...?"

"For the killer to take the card from the scene of the crime," Phoenix replied, as though it were obvious.

The judge seemed confused. "Where are you going with this?"

Phoenix turned to Apollo, gesturing to his computer. Understanding the unspoken question, Apollo nodded and handed the small device to his father, who smiled gratefully and tapped at the screen for a few moments. "Take another look at the photo," Phoenix said, bringing up on the holograms the close-up of the hatless victim, "and at the victim's head. At the moment of the crime, his hat fell to the floor, and a trickle of blood ran from his forehead down the back of his head." He gestured with the card still in his hand. "Couldn't a drop of that blood have fallen on one of the cards?"

Apollo crossed his arms, thinking to himself.

"The killer then took the card," Phoenix continued, "to hide the blood."

"Objection!" came another cry from Kristoph. "R-regardless! That evidence is non-permissible!"

Phoenix looked to the stand with a raised eyebrow, a smile on the corners of his mouth. "Oh?"

Kristoph took a deep breath to steady himself, then stared sternly at Phoenix. "Wright! Regardless of how you've wasted the last seven years, you used to be a lawyer! You know what a serious crime it is to conceal evidence!"

To Apollo's surprise, Phoenix only smiled, as though they were discussing the weather. "Oh, we can discuss the finer points of our legal system later. What's important now is that I've answered your question."

"W-what are you talking about?" Kristoph asked, confused.

"You wanted to know why the killer would have taken a card from the crime scene," Phoenix replied, "and, now, I've told you." Placing Apollo's computer out of the way on the bench, he held up the bloodstained ace, examining it. "That one drop of blood would have been decisive evidence, you see."

Kristoph slammed the witness stand. "Objection! Th-this is... baseless conjecture! Baseless!"

Immediately, Phoenix was slamming the defence bench, pointing at Kristoph. "Objection!" he shot back, silencing the court in a moment. Slowly, Phoenix smiled, then bitterly laughed, lowering his hand as he shook his head. "Oh, I assure you, it's quite based."

"W-what?" Kristoph muttered in response, frowning in confusion and fury.

Phoenix was again admiring the single card, musing aloud. "It's amazing, really... how a single drop of blood on a single card can lead us to the truth. It's quite simple." He turned to his son. "Apollo?"

Apollo was almost surprised to be brought back into the proceedings, with Kristoph and Phoenix dominating it for so long. "Hmm?"

"You're familiar enough with the Hydeout," Phoenix continued, clutching the single card in his hand. "Picture the scene of the crime in your head: The body of the luckless victim was found at the poker table, and, before the killer swapped a card out, there was a single card," he gestured with the ace, "with a drop of blood on it in the victim's hand. Given this, there is one decisive problem with Again, the judge was impatient. "Well, what is it!?" he asked.

"Let's keep it simple, shall we?" Phoenix replied, turning his attention to Apollo's computer again. "Given that there was a drop of blood on a card..." With a swipe of a finger, he brought to the holograms a diagram of the scene that Payne had used much earlier that morning. The simple floor-map of the Hydeout had the usual markers of the victim in his chair, a 'W' in the dealer chair, a '2' outside the marked window, and the killer standing by Phoenix's usual chair, opposite the victim. "Whose position in this diagram doesn't fit?" Phoenix asked. "The victim's? The killer's? The witness's? The second witness's?" He turned to Apollo, focussing on him as though this were only a simple 'trial game'. "Whose position doesn't fit with the bloody card?"

Apollo turned to the displayed diagram with a thoughtful frown, the photos of the crime scene and his own memories of the Hydeout lingering in his mind. 'Well, Ms Orly was unconscious and out of the way, so really her location is totally inconsequential,' he reasoned. 'Not sure if I can discount Mister Gavin's claims yet, but...' His thoughts turned to the killer and victim, and the photo of the trail of blood behind the victim's head flashed before his eyes. Hesitantly, he pointed to the diagram. "Well... isn't it the victim's position that's the problem?" he asked.

The judge frowned. "I don't follow your logic here, Defence Wright."

Apollo struggled a moment on how to explain. "Well, look," he said, briefly replacing the displayed image with the photo of Smith, "the victim was struck on the head, sending him back in his chair. You'd think any blood would fall behind the body, not onto the table in front of him."

"Ah...!" the judge cried as he understood the young man's point.

"So, if he bled in this position," Apollo continued, switching back to the diagram, "the blood would fall on the floor, not on the cards."

"Why, that's right!" the judge agreed. "So... what does this mean?"

"Incidentally," Phoenix interjected with a smile, "those are swivel chairs we use down in the Hydeout."

Apollo grinned. "So, at the time of the murder, we have to assume the victim's chair was facing the other way!" With a few taps on his computer, the image of the chair under the victim counter flipped, facing the wall. "Away from the table!"

Mutterings spread through the gallery.

"When Defendant Wright returned from informing the police," the judge asked, looking to Phoenix, "which way was the chair facing?"

Phoenix briefly took over Apollo's computer, pulling up the first crime scene photo. "When I came back to the room, the body was facing as seen in this photo."

"Which would mean the killer turned the chair back around," Apollo concluded as Phoenix returned the diagram to the screens.

Kristoph remained silent and unresponsive.

"Let's take the next step," Phoenix said. "Look at the diagram once more. We know now the victim was facing away from the table at the time of the murder. But... this creates another significant contradiction."

Payne groaned to himself. "A-again!?"

Phoenix turned to Apollo with a smile. "Apollo, whose location on this diagram contradicts our new understanding of the crime?"

Apollo grinned. This one was easy. "The victim was struck from the front, correct?"

"Indeed," Phoenix replied, smiling as he saw his son knew the answer.

"Well, wouldn't it be hard for the killer to hit him from the front, sitting where his indicator currently is?" Apollo asked, gesturing to the 'K' now placed closest to the victim's back, on the other side of the table.

Like Apollo, Phoenix was holding back a laugh. "I would think it'd be quite hard, yes."

"Objection!" Payne cried, frustrated. "Yes, but what you're saying makes no sense! Why would the victim suddenly turn to face the wall in the middle of a game!?"

Phoenix just smiled. "I believe a sufficient reason will soon come to light."

Payne was too confused to respond coherently.

"There's something on this diagram that makes far less sense, actually," Phoenix continued, turning to his son. "Apollo, could you update the killer's location for me?"

Nodding, Apollo looked down to his computer, editing the diagram to move the 'K' icon... only to pause, looking back up at his father. "I can't," he said. "The cupboard is in the way."

"Ha!" Payne laughed, suddenly looking cocky again as he crossed his arms. "You get points for flair, but that's about all you get! I hardly need to point out that standing there would be impossible. The victim is facing a solid cupboard!" He chuckled, patting his head. "Or are you claiming the killer climbed the cupboard and hit him from above?"

The Wrights both stared at Payne, though Phoenix smiled in amusement. "$t^r$'s simple logic, really," he told the prosecutor. "$f this is the only place the killer could have been standing, then that means, at the very moment of the crime..."

Apollo also grinned. "... the cupboard wasn't there!" he picked up. "Even if you don't know, that's an easy enough conclusion to reach!"

The judge blinked in confusion. "What's this now? Don't know what?"

"I mean, that's the only explanation," Phoenix continued, ignoring the judge as he turned his attention to the witness stand. "Right, Mister Gavin?"

Kristoph pushed at his glasses, staring evenly back at Phoenix.

Unfazed, Phoenix turned his gaze to the judge. "Your Honour! I have a suggestion for the defence: We should arrange to examine the cupboard in the Hydeout immediately!"

The judge nodded, already calling for a bailiff.

Apollo poked at Phoenix's arm to attract his attention, giving his father a confused look. "We can't just tell them?"
Phoenix smiled. "Let them find out on their own," he said, winking. "It's more... exciting that way." Grabbing a random loose sheet of paper from the bench, he ripped off a blank corner, turning towards the judge. "Ah, Your Honour!" he called, stopping the orders currently being delivered to the bailiff.

The judge looked over in surprise. "What?"

"There's one more thing your men should look for," he called, pulling a pen from his pocket. He quickly scrawled something on the scrap of paper, which he then folded and handed to the bailiff, who scurried off around the back of the judge's podium.

Within a few moments, the scrap had reached the judge, who read Phoenix's message with a thoughtful hum. "Yes, I see." He folded the paper back up, giving Phoenix a warm smile. "You do belong in the courtroom after all, Phoenix Wright."

Phoenix gave the judge a small bow of gratitude. "I do my best."

The judge turned to the bailiff with a quiet order, and the court official hurried off out of sight, quickly disappearing.

"But, let's forge ahead here while we wait," Phoenix suggested, already back to business. "Look at the diagram once again: It's been changed. If the killer was standing here at the time of the crime, then this cupboard wasn't here." He gave his son a nod. "Apollo." The young attorney nodded back, tapping at the screen of his computer as he moved the killer's location and then, after a moment of thought, slid the troublesome cupboard aside, where it now pressed against the wall. "Thank you," Phoenix said, then turned back to the court. "As you can see, the cupboard was the problem. At the time of the murder, it has to have been as shown here. Now everything is in place to reconstruct the moment of the crime." To Apollo's horror, Phoenix then gave an exaggerated gasp. "Oh my! What's this?"

"D-Dad... no," Apollo mumbled, wincing in embarrassment. 'Leave the acting to me and Truce...'

"W-what is it now!?" the judge cried.

Phoenix pointed to the diagram. "Look; It appears we've found yet another contradiction... what I believe to be the final contradiction, in fact." He turned to his son. "Notice something, Apollo? Our line of deduction is rapidly approaching its logical conclusion."

Apollo ripped himself out of the second-hand embarrassment of his father's overacting to look at the diagram. '... Huh. So there is.'

"Which is it, defence?" the judge asked. "What's this final contradiction?"

Smiling, Apollo pointed to the cupboard, where it pressed against the tiny window. "With the cupboard where it is now... It covers up the little window to the stairs."

The judge cried out in shock.

"There's no way someone could see into the room from outside," Apollo continued. "Not even Mister Gavin."

Kristoph's eyes were wide with barely contained fury. "What... what did you say?"

Phoenix smirked. "Oh? Is the 'Coolest Defence in the West' losing his cool?"
Kristoph snorted, apparently just barely keeping himself under control. "Don't expect me to play along with your little game, Wright."

"It's only a game until someone gets killed, Mister Gavin," Phoenix replied, the humour gone from his expression. "And someone was... while the window to that room was blocked by a cupboard."

The attorney at the witness stand stared wordlessly.

"So, Mister Gavin," Phoenix continued. "Perhaps you'd like to explain to the court." He threw out an arm, pointing dramatically right at the twitching witness. "Exactly where did you witness the crime scene from?"

View the Court Record
Kristoph sputtered wordlessly at the stand, apparently unable to answer Phoenix's question. The sounds of the gallery muttering gradually increased as his silence lengthened, and Apollo wondered if the judge was going to have to force another recess to calm the growing commotion.

Suddenly, the wide entrance doors of the court slammed open and a bailiff charged in, waving a piece of paper over her head. "Excuse me, Your Honour!" she shouted over the noise.

The judge blinked in surprise at the new arrival, then shot a glare around the room as he repeatedly banged his gavel. "Order! This is a court of law and I will have order!" Finally, the gallery calmed down, and the judge turned his attention to the bailiff.

Making her way towards the podium, the court official nervously called, "We... We just now received word from our investigative team at the Borscht Bowl Club! They've examined the cupboard in the Hydeout, Your Honour!"

Apollo wondered if that meant Ernest... Although it was possible some other poor policeman was guarding the scene today.

"And what did they find?" the judge asked.

The bailiff shuffled in place awkwardly. "Well, Your Honour... It turns out there is a secret passage behind it!"

The judge jumped as the gallery loudly muttered to itself again. "What!?"

Phoenix shot Apollo a grin. "See? It's much more rewarding for them to find it on their own." As Apollo was rolling his eyes, Phoenix turned to the tall podium with a grin. "Ah yes, I believe I mentioned something of the sort before," he casually announced. "This is one of the 'tricks' to the room many of our regulars know about. A secret passage is a handy thing to have when you're engaged in illegal goings-on; Never know when you might need to duck away from the eyes of the law!"

Apollo noticed the bailiff scurrying away, back the way she'd come. 'Yeah, better get out of here before you get dragged into Dad's drama.' To the rest of the court, he added, "And it connects to the restaurant above. The underworld bosses used it to get away from the cops."

"And enjoy a cold bowl of borscht, no doubt," Phoenix picked up with a smile. "Just like our killer."

Payne scoffed. "And I suppose you already knew about this, Wright..."

"Well, naturally I did!" Phoenix replied, giving the man a grin. "I work there, after all!"

"N-no, not you, the other-!" Payne cried, then sighed and turned away. "Never mind!"

Apollo couldn't resist a pitying smile for the prosecutor, whose entire case had been taken over by the Wrights. 'Well, it's almost all over now.' He turned to Kristoph, standing stock still at the stand, eyes closed and head pointed downward. "At the time of the murder, the window was blocked, and the victim's hat was only off his head for the few minutes between Mister Smith's murder and the defendant's return from calling the cops," he announced to the court, who quietened to listen to his speech. "In other words, the only place anyone could've seen the victim's bald head was from inside the Hydeout!"

Kristoph didn't respond.

"Well, Mister Gavin?" Apollo prompted.

Kristoph moved his head away, but still didn't open his eyes nor speak.

The judge frowned. "Hmm... Dare I ask what really happened that night?"

With a minute sigh, Apollo crossed his arms, deciding his employer was never going to answer. "Actually, we can probably figure it out ourselves at this point," he admitted. "That night, for whatever reason, our killer had a date with Mister Smith... a date with destiny." He put on his best acting face, well-trained after six years of practise with his sister. "There he crouched, hidden in the secret passageway behind the cupboard, holding his breath, waiting for just the right moment... Then the chance came, and he took it! Ms Olga Orly was out cold, struck by Mister Smith, and the defendant had gone upstairs to call the cops, leaving Mister Smith alone in the Hydeout with the unconscious dealer. Then, and only then, our killer stepped out from the secret passage and into the Hydeout. No doubt, Mister Smith heard the cupboard sliding open on that carpet, and spun around to look... then, whack!" He slammed a fist into his other palm, and was pleased to see a number of his audience jump, engrossed in his story. "The moment had passed; Mister Smith lay dead in his chair, his hat fallen to the floor."

"The criminal must have seen the blood on the card," Phoenix picked up in Apollo's resulting dramatic pause, breaking the spell of the magician's tale. "He would have, of course, realised the need to destroy the evidence. That single spot of blood told the whole story of the crime."

Apollo smirked. "It's just too bad for him he didn't linger long enough to see the cards on the floor... and the fact that they were all red!"

Kristoph winced slightly, turning away and fruitlessly brushing his hair away from his furious glare.

The crowds were beginning to murmur, and the judge whacked his gavel a few times to silence them. "Well, it seems this trial has taken yet another turn." He turned to Kristoph with a sorrowful look. "I'm truly, truly sorry I had to see this day come, Mister Gavin."

Once again, Kristoph seemed frozen in place at the stand. Apollo wanted to call out to him, tell him it was nothing personal... but it was. As much as he'd always known there was a dark side to his boss, he'd never wanted to be the one to finally confront it.

"Mister Payne!" the judge cried with a stern stare.

The prosecutor jumped with a loud yelp, then, realising who was calling him, cleared his throat as though nothing had happened, despite being covered in sweat from the long trial. "Yes, Your Honour?"

"The prosecution will continue its investigation!" the judge ordered, then turned to address the court at large. "As for Mister Phoenix Wright, the defendant, he is hereby cleared of all suspicion."

Payne yelped again in surprise and disbelief.
"Believe me when I say that I don't believe this is happening, Mister Gavin," the judge continued to Kristoph, looking more disappointed now than sad, "but, I'm afraid circumstances call for me to issue a warrant for your arrest. Immediately."

Kristoph stood frozen for only a moment before his furious glare suddenly faded, back into his ever-present calm smile. "Oh, no need to apologise. I rather enjoyed myself," he said, determinedly looking away from the defence bench. "It's not every day you get to witness a legendary attorney's dirty tactics first hand..."

Phoenix just stared at the man behind the witness stand. "Your point, Mister Gavin?"

"Frankly, Your Honour, I'm shocked," Kristoph continued, ignoring Phoenix as he looked up at the judge. "That a person of your calibre would be taken in by such a low-grade parlour trick..."

Apollo couldn't help but be offended; It wasn't just Phoenix's reputation being attacked, but the magic acts two of his children practised as well. He was about to shout something, anything, in response, until he felt a hand on his shoulder and looked over to see his father giving him a stern look, subtly shaking his head.

"The defendant is 'cleared of all suspicion'?' Kristoph was saying, a clear rage lingering behind his half-grin. "This is hardly the time for jokes, Your Honour: Mister Phoenix Wright hasn't proven anyone's guilt or innocence here. What he has done is use his own children (which, might I add, are not his) to help him present illegal evidence and put the blame on someone else! And not just anyone else, but me, his own defence attorney!"

It was only thanks to Phoenix's hand on his shoulder that Apollo did nothing more than twitch in outrage... though he could feel his father's grip tightening a little.

The judge suddenly seemed nervous. "I-illegal evidence?" he repeated.

"Objection!" Phoenix shouted, his hand slipping off his son's shoulder as he glared at Kristoph. "Let me ask you, Mister Gavin: Is there still any reason, at present, to suspect me of wrongdoing?"

Kristoph paused only a moment before gesturing to the prosecutor's bench with a smile. "Of course. That bottle, for instance: How do you intend to explain away the fingerprints on the murder weapon? And not just any fingerprints," he turned to face the man behind the bench he had been gesturing to, "am I right, Mister Payne?"

Payne jumped a little at being addressed, clearly just wanting the nightmare trial to end already. "Er, a-actually, yes," he meekly replied, rifling through his notes. "The fingerprints on the bottle were, erm, upside-down."

Apollo thought a moment before recalling the mentioned fact. 'Oh yeah, that came up earlier, didn't it? Never really got the chance to address it.'

"The court, and this case, demand an explanation," Kristoph continued, starting to look as smug as Payne had at the beginning of the trial. "I can think of only one reason why one would hold a bottle upside-down, and that is hit someone with the bottom of the bottle." He turned to the judge's podium. "Well, Your Honour?"

As the judge hummed in thought, considering the notion, Phoenix chuckled in amusement. "Ah, see how the caught fish squirms to the last," he said, then turned to his son with a smile. "Well, Apollo, your boss seems awfully concerned about that bottle still."

Apollo nodded, beginning to smile himself.
"I'm sure you have a reasonable explanation in mind for him, of course," Phoenix added, winking. "His explanation isn't the only one."

The judge sighed from up on his podium. "It... would be hasty to deliver a verdict with unanswered questions, indeed," he agreed, then turned to the defence bench. "Perhaps the defence would care to enlighten the court?"

Nodding, Apollo replied, "Naturally, Your Honour!" He opened his mouth to explain, then paused, closing it again. "It's much more rewarding for them to find it on their own, huh?" "Actually, it would be easier to show you rather than explain." He held out a hand to point to the prosecutor's bench. "Mister Payne, would it be alright if that bottle was given to the judge for a few moments?"

Payne glanced between Apollo and the judge a few times, then shrugged. "I-I suppose so," he agreed. A bailiff immediately dashed out of nowhere to collect the piece of evidence, delivering it to the top of the tall podium.

Once Apollo saw the bottle being gingerly handed over to the judge, he smiled and nodded. "Place that bottle on the floor, Your Honour," he instructed, "next to your chair."

"Excuse me?" the judge asked, leaning forward to hear the defence more clearly. "On the floor?"

"Yes," Apollo replied, nodding. He watched as the old man ducked out of sight a few moments. "Now," he continued, "reach down and pick it up, without getting out of your chair."

As everyone intently watched, the judge leaned sideways, almost out of sight. A second or two later, he emerged again, looking surprised. Holding up his hand, he displayed the green glass bottle... upside-down in his grip.

Payne jumped again with a yelp.

Grinning triumphantly, Apollo continued, "See? You naturally go to pick up the bottle by its neck, with your fingers upside-down!" He briefly turned his attention to the Court Record, bringing up on the holograms the photo of Phoenix and Smith that Olga had taken. "Look at this photograph taken on the night of the murder. The defendant sat here, playing piano, bottles of grape juice on the floor to the side of his piano bench. He would have naturally picked up the bottles upside-down several times."

The judge seemed impressed, staring at the bottle as he placed it on his small desk with a chuckle. "Wow! I can't believe it was that simple!"

Phoenix was busy watching Kristoph, still standing silent at the stand. "Recall our dinner that evening, Kristoph. I was drinking my usual juice then, too."

"Basically, you used the bottle on the table to do the deed," Apollo picked up, "but then you must have remembered! So you went and picked up one of the bottles from under the piano, and switched them!" He crossed his arms, though was unable to smile, considering who he was addressing. "You took one of the defendant's bottles and made it look like the murder weapon."

Kristoph evenly stared back at Apollo as the court erupted into chaos around them.

View the Court Record
"Order!" the judge shouted as he banged his gavel, glaring at the gallery. "Order! Order!" Finally, the courtroom began to calm, and the judge turned his glare on Kristoph. "What do you have to say to these charges, Mister Gavin?"

Kristoph idly brushed at his hair with a calm smile, shaking his head. "Fascinating... So this is the legendary attorney's famed tactic of misdirection..."

Apollo blinked in surprise. "What...!?"

"You claim that I switched the bottle?" Kristoph asked. "Where is your proof?"

Unable to answer, Apollo looked to Phoenix for help, but his father was busy giving Kristoph his own carefully blank stare.

Taking the young man's silence as an answer, Kristoph scoffed. "As I thought. More baseless conjecture." He pushed at his glasses with an unmistakably superior air. "I'm afraid your 'bottle' of proof is quite empty."

Apollo saw the flash of a smirk on Phoenix's face before his father threw out an arm to point at the stand, shouting, "Objection! I wouldn't be so sure about that."

Kristoph seemed too surprised to answer, frozen mid-movement as he stared at Phoenix with wide eyes.

"Your Honour," Phoenix called, turning to the judge. "When you initiated the investigation of the Hydeout earlier, do you recall I requested an additional investigation?"

"Ah, yes," the judge replied with a nod. "I have your memo about that here." He held up the small scrap of paper, which he opened and read aloud, "Retrieve the bottles from under the piano at the Borscht Bowl Club." He looked up to the court entrance with a smile. "Ah, and here's one of the bottles in question."

Apollo turned in surprise to see the nervous bailiff from earlier scurrying back into the courtroom, holding a single bottle in her hands. Apparently unsure what to do next, she stood awkwardly at the back of the room, behind the witness stand.

Kristoph scoffed, raising an eyebrow at the judge. "What, are you going to dust that for fingerprints, too? I would be surprised if any were on that but his."

'He has a point,' Apollo had to admit, arms crossed as he thought. 'He'll have known better than to leave his own fingerprints on anything.'

Phoenix grinned, gently elbowing his son to get his attention. "You wanna examine our new evidence, Apollo?"
Apollo stared back at his father in confusion. "Why?" he bluntly asked.

"Just humour me," Phoenix replied, seeming amused. "I think you'll find that bottle will finally solve this case once and for all."

Relieved to have something to do, the nervous bailiff hurried over to the defence bench, where she handed the bottle of grape juice to Apollo before rushing away again. As he had done for the other bottle held in evidence, Apollo took a cursory look at its label, 'Yep, that's Dad's grape juice alright,' before pointing it to peer into the neck. 'Geeze, I hope we don't end up having to ask for ALL the bottles under that piano to be brought in here and examined. Why'd they only bring in just the one, anyhow?' Seeing nothing in the narrow opening of the neck, Apollo again spun the bottle around on the smooth fabric of his glove to look through the bottom. 'I hope they didn't leave all the others back at the... Hang on.' Surprised, he spun the bottle back around, crying, "There's something in there!"

As the court sat up and took notice, Apollo began to gently tap the upside-down bottle on the defence bench until, finally, a piece of white card stuck out of the narrow neck. Carefully, Apollo gripped the slightly damp corner, and pulled out a single, very crumpled playing card: A red-backed Five of Hearts.

Kristoph's eyes widened. "Th-that card...! It can't be...!"

Phoenix smiled. "Recall that unpleasant woman's testimony for a moment," he instructed the court.

"You mean Ms Olga Orly?" Apollo cut in with a frown.

"Yes, our little swindling devotchka," Phoenix replied, ignoring his son's disapproval. "She spoke of a 'trap' she prepared, that ultimately failed when Smith was unable to find her planted 'trump card'."

Apollo looked at the card in his hand. "Huh. You mean this is the card? The one you found in your pocket and 'disposed of'?"

"The Five of Hearts?" Phoenix said, looking over to the crumpled playing card. "Yep, that's it!"

A gasp rumbled through the gallery.

"The bottles were swapped," Phoenix announced, erasing his smile for a stern glare, "and the only one who could have done that was the fourth person in the club that night." He turned to the witness stand with a pointed finger. "You, Mister Kristoph Gavin."

Kristoph winced slightly, then, shaking in silent anger, he raised a single fist and slammed it down on the witness stand, meeting no-one's eyes.

There was a very long silence as everyone stared at the two, the attorney at the stand and the ex-attorney at the bench.

Finally, Phoenix closed his eyes. "That is all."

Kristoph was still frozen, shaking as he pressed his fist into the stand. "Is... this your idea of revenge, Phoenix Wright? For the events that took away your attorney's badge seven years ago!?"

Phoenix opened his eyes only to give Kristoph a long, solemn stare. "My past is like my logic: straight and true," he insisted. "Nothing's changed. All I did was point the finger of justice in the proper direction."

It was a very long moment before Kristoph reacted, seeming to relax as he straightened his pose and almost leisurely crossed his arms as he always did at rest. He even managed to plaster back on his everpresent calm smile. "Fine. I'm glad we could have this little tête-à-tête, Wright."

Phoenix only continued to stare.

Next, Kristoph turned to Apollo. "I suppose there were some things I was never going to get through your head, Apollo; You're just far too stubborn. Like him. The two of you were made for each other after all, it seems."

Apollo couldn't help but be a little hurt at being so easily brushed aside. "The same thing would have happened today anyway," he replied. "You've always said the truth was more important than personal relationships... a-and..." He looked down, unable to meet Kristoph's eyes. "I was following that to the letter today."

Kristoph watched Apollo a moment more before also turning away, physically leaving the witness stand. A bailiff ran to meet him, escorting the man to a pair of waiting police officers at the courtroom doors.

"This... this is insane!" Payne cried, the gallery around him slowly gaining volume in their discussion. "What about me!? Don't I get to prosecute anyone!?"

A few minutes passed before the hubbub of Kristoph's arrest had died down, mostly at the sight of a bailiff dashing into court to talk to Payne. Phoenix himself, without a word to Apollo, had returned to the witness stand, awaiting his final verdict.

The judge sighed. "I believe this time we've finally come to the end of our trial," he sadly announced. "Mister Payne, do you have a report for us on Kristoph Gavin?"

Payne briefly fiddled with his thick glasses. "He's admitted everything," he replied. "We're processing his arrest now."

"I see," the judge sighed, disappointed. "Still, one had to wonder why he would do such a thing... He didn't even have a connection to the victim, did he?"

"Er... None that we know of," Payne agreed.

The judge looked to Phoenix. "Defendant Wright, have you anything to add?"

Phoenix didn't immediately reply, staring off into the distance with an unreadable expression. "I'm afraid I can't shed any more light on the matter," he quietly said.

Accepting that, the judge tugged at his beard thoughtfully, looking over his notes. "About this victim, Mister Shadi Smith... His occupation was listed as 'traveller'," he pointed out. "An odd profession to be sure, and that's all we know about him!"

Payne hurriedly nodded. "I'll arrange a follow-up investigation, Your Honour."

"Good," the judge replied, then returned his gaze to Phoenix. "Defendant Wright?"

Phoenix looked up. "Yes?"

The judge slowly smiled, then chuckled. "Seven years... and you still haven't lost your touch."
Phoenix flashed a smile, only to then look away. "Kristoph Gavin... was a man with much significance for me. Both as a friend... and a lawyer."

"He was extremely talented, to be sure," the judge agreed.

"I needed two things before I could confront him," Phoenix continued. "The first was a place where no injustice would be tolerated: This courtroom. The second was a person who would tolerate no injustice... in other words, a defence attorney." He looked up to Apollo with a warm smile. "And, by some stroke of luck, I found I'd had the perfect candidate all along."

After a moment of surprised confusion, Apollo blushed, giving his father a sheepish smile in return.

The judge nodded approvingly. "Well, this seems like a good time to announce a verdict," he called, holding his gavel high. "This court finds the defendant, Mister Phoenix Wright, not guilty." As he banged his gavel, the courtroom erupted into cheers, and confetti rained down from hidden cannons that exploded as the verdict echoed through the court.

Grinning madly, Apollo dashed out from behind the defence bench and jumped on his father with a tight hug. He felt more than heard Phoenix laughing as he returned it.

Over the din, the judge was barely audible announcing, "Court is adjourned!"

FLASHBACK: Third Time's the Charm

- Three Days Earlier -

April 17, 2:01AM
Borscht Bowl Club
The Hydeout

Just like seven years ago, it all came down to an all-in final hand. And, just like seven years ago, Phoenix was winning.

"Showdown time."

However, unlike seven years ago, Phoenix was taking this game seriously. Although he still thought of his previous win as total luck, he was much more evenly matched as a pianist against a traveller than he was as an attorney versus a magician.

With well-practised poker smiles, the two opposing hands were thrown down on the table. The small dealer had barely had a chance to look at them properly before she gasped. "Two full houses!" she cried: One had two aces... and the other, three.

Phoenix could only stare, frowning in disappointment. Somehow, he wasn't surprised.

Zak jumped to his feet with an oddly triumphant snarl. "You dirty cheat!" he shouted, storming around the table towards Phoenix. "Check his pockets, now!" he ordered, waving at the dealer.

Unwilling to cause a scene, Phoenix simply got to his feet, allowing Zak to roughly grab his wrist and hold the pianist's hands high from behind as the dealer jumped in to begin the search. She stuck her hand in the almost hidden side pockets of Phoenix's black track-pants, then paused, looking confused. A moment later, she checked the other side, then began to frantically search his hoodie, too.

Phoenix smiled.

Zak watched the woman. "What are you doing?"

"I-it's gone!" she admitted, jumping away from Phoenix with wide eyes. "The card's gone!"

"What...!?" Zak shouted in disbelief, then turned to the search himself, sticking his hands in every pocket and, eventually, pulling off the ex-attorney's beanie to check underneath. Noticing Phoenix's smile, he gave the other man a glare, tugging at his wrist to drag Phoenix's face to his. "What did you do!?"

Phoenix didn't immediately reply, staring Zak right in the face. "You lose."

Zak was frozen for only a few moments before his face curled into a furious scowl, and, finally dropping his grip on Phoenix's wrist, he spun with a roar to face the young dealer, stood by her chair at the table. "Y-you-!" he barked. "Some master of cheating you turned out to be!" With that he grabbed the closest thing at hand, the glass of grape juice sitting by Phoenix's cards on the table; His sudden motion even knocked the red deck of cards, sending them flying throughout the room.

As the ex-magician began to wave the bottle through the air, attempting to hit her, the dealer shrieked, backing up instinctively until she hit her chair, falling backwards to sit in it. She didn't have the time to scramble out of Zak's way before the glass bottle in his hand connected with her, knocking the young woman out.

Phoenix was almost too shocked to react. "What... Why did you do that!?" he demanded, watching Zak heavily leaning on the table as he caught his breath from the outburst. Worried, he looked over to the dealer. 'She's not bleeding, but she's unconscious, so she definitely needs medical attention.' He cast a glance at Zak; The other man still worried him, and it wasn't just the sudden attack on the dealer. The ex-magician had also been punching that reporter earlier, after all. "Wait here," Phoenix instructed, kneeling down just long enough to grab his beanie. "I'll get help."

Zak nodded, moving in the vague direction of his chair, but Phoenix didn't stay long enough to confirm his destination, already out of the room and rushing up the stairs towards the restaurant, tugging on his beanie as he went. 'Suddenly I'm glad he doesn't want to see Trucy.'

Phoenix knew he could not call for an ambulance; It wouldn't be fair to the paramedics to send them in while Zak and the bottle he wielded (the one with that card he and his accomplice had undoubtedly expected to find in his pocket) were still in there. So, the police it was, and Phoenix urged them to hurry, though he did not tell them what was happening; A poor decision in hindsight, but, in the rush of the moment, he didn't think he had the time to spare for details.

As the pianist dashed back down the stairs, stuffing his phone back in his pocket, he hoped he could calm Zak down and keep him that way until the cops arrived. 'Shouldn't be hard. Maybe I could regale him with stories of Trucy and Apollo's magic act tonight.' Once at the bottom, he pushed open the door, registering the dealer was still slumped sideways in her chair, and, strangely enough, so was Zak, his bald head shining from the other side of the room and the abandoned bottle lying on the table beside him. "Okay," he called, entering the room, "the police are-"

It was then Phoenix noticed the blood. For a moment, he couldn't move, a part of him idly counting the years since he had last walked in on a dead body. A glance at the dealer assured him she was still alive, though unconscious, but he could see no movement from Zak, and dashed forward to the man's side, hand flying to his neck. 'Nope. No pulse.' He kept his hand there for a few more seconds, mind whirring. The police are coming. They're gonna see Zak, or 'Shadi Smith', dead, our little scheming waitress unconscious, and me... well, they're gonna blame me.' His eyes landed on the locket, shining from Zak's collar. 'And if they find out who 'Shadi Smith' really is...' Phoenix didn't wait much longer, hurriedly moving to unlatch the locket and pull it from Zak's neck. He was moving to shove it in a pocket before he had a better idea: Pausing only to glance at the picture within, the ex-attorney attached the locket around his own neck. 'They can't prove this isn't mine. It's got Trucy's picture in it, after all.'

After that, next on Phoenix's agenda was to arrange for his own defence. It only made sense to call Kristoph, knowing how nervous Apollo was about taking charge of a case after the trouble with Luke's trial the previous year, and besides, Kristoph's skill and experience would ensure the best job possible got done... provided there was no more forgery going on under the Wrights' noses, of course. He contemplated calling his kids to warn them of what was going on, but, given it was the early hours of the morning, he decided to give them a few more hours of much-needed sleep... He'd pick one of them to call when the police got him to the detention centre.

"You mean someone cracked that flawless bone china pate?"
He hadn't worked out what bugged him about the question until, phone once again resting in his pocket, Phoenix wandered back down to the Hydeout... and the first thing he saw was Zak, his hat on the floor and his bleeding, bald head visible for the world to see. Thinking fast, the ex-attorney scooped up the white hat on the floor and placed it carefully right on top of Zak's forehead, as though the man was only sleeping. 'Okay... better look around for clues before the police come and arrest me. If nothing else, I can bring it up in court... though I'll have to sort out how I can get my own defence attorney on the witness stand later.'

Shaking his head to clear his mind, Phoenix turned his attention to the poker table. Apart from the red deck of cards now splattered across the floor and the abandoned bottle lying nearby, it didn't seem unchanged at first glance. The chips are all in place, there's my full house, and there's... W-wait a sec! He leaned in slightly to study Zak's final hand of cards: Somehow, while Phoenix had been out of the room, the second Ace of Spades in his opponent's hand - the source of Zak's obvious ploy to once again ruin Phoenix's reputation with allegations of cheating - had been replaced with a third King.

It puzzled Phoenix why someone would have swapped out those cards. It would have suited Zak and the young dealer very well to leave all five aces on the table and try to imply to the world Phoenix was the cheat they already thought he was; The only logical conclusion that came to mind was that this anonymous card-switcher was a fourth person... probably the same person who had killed Zak while Phoenix was out of the room and the dealer unconscious. But why would someone uninvolved with our game swap those cards? Or, maybe... Why did they have no choice?

The answers came to Phoenix in a rush: The card was crime scene evidence. Zak had probably bled on it when he was killed. That meant Zak had his back to the table when he died. Which meant the killer was in the secret passage. From the secret passage, the dealer would have been audible announcing the two full houses, thus the unmentioned fifth ace being changed for a king.

The only people to have seen Zak's bald head tonight were Phoenix himself... and the ex-magician's killer.

A quick glance at the new card gave Phoenix a further surprise: This third king was from the blue deck, which was still neatly stacked by the dealer's chair. Now why did the killer search the blue deck for a card rather than the floor? Did... He looked around the small room. Did he not see the floor...? Sure enough, looking at the table alone gave the impression the blue deck had been in use; Had that been what happened?

The dealer began to stir in her chair, and Phoenix rushed around to sit in his own chair, closer to the young woman. "Are you okay?" he asked.

She didn't reply, apparently forcing herself to sit up as she pressed one of her bright pink mittens to her jaw line, near her neck. "W... why..." she muttered, then turned to look at Zak, staring at him almost uncomprehendingly.

Phoenix noted she seemed scared, and he supposed he couldn't blame her after a surprise attack like that... Now he was looking at her properly, she only seemed around Luke's or Apollo's age. "I've called the police," he told her. "They don't know Mister Smith is dead yet, but they'll find out when they get here."

The young woman's eyes subtly widened as she registered the white-suited man was dead. "H-he...!" She curled up in a half-ball in her seat, spinning suddenly to stare at Phoenix as she shrunk away from him. "W-what happened...?"

Phoenix closed his eyes, already tired of those words. "Now that is the question, isn't it?"
'Thrice now I've been accused of murder. I just hope third time's the charm.'

Apollo and Phoenix walked side-by-side back to the lobby, arms slung over each other's shoulders proudly. "I almost can't believe it!" Apollo laughed as the doors closed behind them. "We won! My first trial ever and I managed to win!"

Phoenix's smile tightened a little, and he patted Apollo's shoulder before pulling away, turning his back on his son. One hand rubbed at the locket hanging from his neck. "That... was certainly a miracle, alright." He looked back at Apollo. "A magic trick worthy of a Gramarye... though not necessarily in all the right ways."

Suddenly it felt like all the joy was draining from the room, and Apollo's exuberant grin faded as he stared at his father in confusion. "Wh... What do you mean?"

"Apollo." Phoenix turned to face the young man with a stern look. "Where did you get that Ace of Spades?"

Apollo blinked. "Uhh..."

"No, I already guessed," Phoenix continued, looking away with a glare. "There's only one way you could have obtained that card with no idea of what it really was."

Suddenly it felt to Apollo like the floor was dropping out from underneath him. "Y-you mean...?"

Before Apollo could finish his question, the lobby doors flew open, and in ran a teenage girl in a blue cape, making a beeline for Phoenix. "Daddy!" she shouted, latching on to him in a tight hug. Phoenix barely had the time to look up in surprise before a second figure barrelled into the room, crying, "Papa!" as he also ran to their father and joined in the hug.

Phoenix couldn't resist a smile at his first opportunity at physical contact with his younger children in three days... a very harrowing three days. "Hey Luke, Trucy," he almost casually replied, hugging them back. "You two been looking after each other like I asked?"

Luke nodded. "Of course we have!" He half-giggled, though his breath seemed to catch in his throat. "Why wouldn't we?"

"I'm glad that's all over with!" Luke sighed in relief, adjusting his cap. "I couldn't bear to make a contingency plan in case Papa got convicted!"

Apollo frowned, offended. "You didn't think I'd manage it!?"

"W-well..." Luke shuffled his feet a little, embarrassed. "To be fair Apollo, you didn't think you could do it, either."
Apollo was almost nodding in agreement before he realised he had never said so to Luke, and gave his brother a confused frown. "Wait, I never-"

"You didn't have to say," Luke explained with a fond smile. "You're our brother. We knew."

The young lawyer couldn't find the words to reply to that.

"I always knew Polly would get Daddy free!" Trucy boasted. "And get Mister Gavin convicted!"

Apollo blinked in surprise as he turned to his sister. "Wait, did you two know?"

"We can discuss that later," Phoenix cut in, bringing the trio's discussion to a halt. He looked between the three with a stern glare. "What's more important is, where did that card come from?"

Luke noticed their father's gaze specifically focus on Trucy, who was looking tremendously guilty as she stared at the floor. "S-so... that bloodied card Apollo presented..." he said. "It wasn't genuine evidence, after all."

Although feeling guilty himself, Apollo gave his brother a curious look. "You knew?"

"I suspected," Luke admitted with a shrug. "After everything else Mister Gavin did to hide his trail, why would he have left something like that at the scene? The fact that it was swapped with a blue card to fill out the hand was a primary piece of evidence against him in the first place. Not to mention, why would Papa have ever taken such an important clue and just casually given it away, even if it was to one of us?"

Once again, Apollo couldn't reply to that.

Phoenix was still staring at Trucy. "In other words, you didn't involve either of your brothers in your little plan," he said. "Let me guess: You slipped it to Apollo when you gave him his cape in that final recess."

Trucy didn't immediately reply, then, eventually, nodded a quick 'yes'.

"What were you thinking!?" Phoenix hissed, just barely containing a furious shout. "I didn't tell you what happened for you to forge evidence like that! You could cost your brother his badge, Trucy, and in exactly the same way I lost mine! Did you ever stop to consider what would happen if he got caught!?"

Trucy did not remove her gaze from the floor, hiding her tense expression under the brim of her top hat.

"B-but he wasn't, right?" Luke nervously pointed out, hands clutched together. "Everyone seemed to just believe it was real..."

"And Gavin can turn that all around whenever he wants," Phoenix pointed out. "He took the real card, after all; Most likely he burned it, but, having confessed he was the murderer, he has nothing to lose in telling the police that card was forged." He sighed, frowning to himself. "I was half-expecting Payne to start shouting about forgery when he said Gavin confessed; He's not the type to leave something like that for later."

There was a very long pause as the family contemplated Phoenix's musings. "No-one's gonna know," Trucy quietly said. "I made sure."

Everyone turned to Trucy curiously. "And how exactly did you 'make sure'?" Phoenix asked.
"I'm pretty sure Daddy was the same blood-type as me," Trucy replied, still quiet and hiding a sniff. "And it's been too long to test for DNA. I looked it up."

To his shock, it took Apollo a moment to realise which 'Daddy' his sister was talking about... and that his siblings had known 'Shadi Smith's' true identity all along. "Truce..." He stepped towards the girl, pulling her into a hug.

Trucy was quick to react, clinging to the back of Apollo's suit under his cape and visibly shaking as she held back sobs. "Everyone is always leaving me!" she cried, slightly muffled by Apollo's shoulder. "Mommy left me, then Grandpa, and Uncle Valant, and Daddy... Then you moved out, Polly! And L-Luke moved out, too!"

"But we still see you all the time, Trucy!" Luke cried, looking heartbroken at his sister's distress. "We're never far away!"

Trucy sniffed. "You visit for a while, but you always leave in the end," she bitterly replied.

As much as he might have wanted to, Luke couldn't reply to that.

"I always hoped I'd get to see Daddy Zak again," Trucy continued. "He'd come back, and do magic with us... he could live in Luke's room, and the police wouldn't ever have to know about him." She sighed, shaking her head as she pressed it harder into Apollo's shoulder. He patted her back comfortingy, and Trucy gave him a grateful squeeze in response before reluctantly pulling away to face Phoenix, looking up at him with a tear-stained face. "I didn't want to lose both my Daddies in one fell swoop," she announced. "I didn't want to be all alone."

Phoenix sadly stared back at Trucy for only a moment before stepping forward to hug her. "You were never going to be alone," he said, and, without any kind of signalling between the three of them, Apollo and Luke stepped forward to join the hug too. "As far away as we might feel sometimes... there will always be at least one of us here to run to your side when you most need it."

"I'm really sorry, Truce," Luke said. "I thought... I thought you'd be okay if I gave you a little space to be alone. I-I was wrong to do that... I'm really sorry." He squeezed his eyes shut to keep from crying himself.

Trucy, who had been standing almost limply as she was surrounded by her father and brothers, raised an arm around Luke's back in a half-hug. "It's okay," she assured him, giving the younger of her brothers a small smile.

The four Wrights stood in their arrangement for a very long time, both seeking and giving comfort to one another as they recovered from the previous week.

"Oh yeah, I almost forgot," Apollo said with a frown. "I'm... kind of out of a job now."

Phoenix, Luke and Trucy looked at Apollo for only a second before bursting into laughter, all stepping back out of the family hug. Trucy grinned as she tugged on Apollo's cape, telling him, "Aw, don't worry, Polly! We're the best undiscovered talents in all of California!"

Apollo gave his sister an unimpressed frown. "I didn't mean magic. I haven't been working so hard for so long to just stop practising law after my first trial."

Phoenix shook his head with a grin. "I'm sure we'll sort something out. We can discuss it at home, after we meet up with Maya and Pearls."

Trucy bit her lip to hide a smile, while Luke looked away uncomfortably. Apollo just frowned in confusion. "Maya and Pearly came down to visit?" he asked. "Why didn't anyone mention it?"

Phoenix had been already heading to the door when Luke spoke, and turned to face him with a raised eyebrow. "What about them?"

Trucy giggled, bouncing and throwing up her arms as she proudly announced, "They came to see the trial!"

"What!?" Phoenix cried in horror, then, without waiting for an explanation, he spun around and hurried out of the room, his three children at his heels.

The Long Awaited Meet-Up

April 20, 4:41PM
2nd Floor Lobby

It didn't take long for Phoenix to spot Maya, stood next to Pearl at the edge of a group of people. Even out of her traditional spirit medium's robes, he instantly recognised her in her Pink Princess backwards baseball cap and an over-large hoodie taken from his own closet. "Maya!" he hissed across the room, not wanting to call her name too loudly in the lingering crowds from the recently-ended trial in the next room.

Somehow, Maya managed to hear Phoenix over the low-level hubbub, and turned, spotting him striding towards her. "Nick!" she replied with a smile, waving as she rushed over to meet him halfway. "Congratulations, old man!" She gave him a cheeky wink. "I knew you'd get out scot-free and indict the real killer while you were at it!"

Phoenix sighed, frowning in disappointment. "Maya, I told you not to come!" he forcefully whispered. "You and Pearls were both supposed to be waiting at home!"

Maya raised an eyebrow, still smiling. "Just like we were supposed to sit up in Kurain, ignoring that you'd been arrested and Luke and Trucy were all alone, and not come visit you in the detention centre?" She shook her head. "Nope, not happening! We just care about you too much to stay away!"

"I'm flattered, really," Phoenix insisted through gritted teeth, "but I'm not telling you to stay in Kurain for no reason! This is your own safety at stake!"

"Nonsense," Maya scoffed, arms crossed. "You're just being overprotective." Before Phoenix could protest, she jumped up on her tip-toes and planted a brief kiss on his lips, giving him a grin. "Don't worry; That's one of the things I like about you."

Finally, Phoenix relaxed, unable to resist Maya's unwavering skill in making him smile. "Really?" he asked. "Usually I just hear complaining about that."

Maya was about to respond when she spotted Apollo, Luke and Trucy quietly catching up to their father, and gave the trio a wide grin. "Ah, there you are!" She winked at Apollo. "Congrats on your win, Apollo! You really do take after Nick!"

Apollo rolled his eyes, having long given up objecting when Maya made those kinds of comments. "Eh, I barely did anything," he said, crossing his arms. "Dad pretty much ran the whole trial."

Phoenix laughed. "Aw, we wouldn't have gotten anywhere if you weren't at the bench to help, though!" he said.

Apollo opened his mouth to respond, but was cut off by the loud arrival of his dark-haired roommate, who leapt on his friend with a loud "Whoop!" of joy, pulling Apollo and the nearby Trucy in to a sideways-hug, his arms hanging lazily over their shoulders. "Dude, that was AWESOME!" Clay shouted, and Apollo didn't doubt the whole room, if not the entire courthouse, could hear him. "You got your OWN BOSS put away for murder!? Talk about Chords of Steel; You must have BALLS of Steel!"
Sighing, Apollo pushed Clay's arm off his shoulder, stepping back for some personal space. "Well, I didn't exactly have a choice. If Mister Gavin hadn't committed murder-"

Clay laughed, "Now now, 'Pollo, you're selling yourself short!", leaving the giggling Trucy to instead throw his arm around Luke, pulling the young vet over towards his brother. "C'mon Luke, tell 'Pollo he's selling himself short!"

Luke shrugged, giving his irritated brother a smile. "I certainly think you did more out there than you think you did," he agreed.

"It was almost like the old days again!" Pearl said, surprising almost everyone as they noticed her standing next to Maya, having followed the much louder Clay to join the group. Like Maya, she was similarly 'in disguise' with a pale pink t-shirt and jeans, with her twin loops of hair pointed downwards from underneath a sun hat. "Just when all hope seemed lost, Mister Nick would come in with a wild scheme to turn everything around in a flash!"

Phoenix looked offended. "Hey, my schemes were never 'wild'!"

As everyone else giggled, Apollo gave his father a smirk. "See, even Pearly knows that was your trial more than mine, Dad," he pointed out.

Phoenix just scoffed.

Luke then turned to the Fey pair. "That reminds me," he said, a twinkle in his eye, "we have another surprise for Papa and Apollo, don't we?"

"Oh yeah!" Trucy cried with a wide grin, and jumped on Apollo, gripping his arm under his cape. "We found your people, Polly!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow, noticing Clay hiding snorts of laughter while Maya and Pearl grinned almost as widely as Trucy. Phoenix, at least, seemed just as confused as him. "'My people'?

the young attorney repeated.

"They've all been looking forward to meeting you, Apollo!" Maya said with a wink, turning to Phoenix with a cheeky grin to add, "Although they aren't going to turn down meeting you either, old man!" Phoenix opened his mouth to respond, but was cut off as Maya hooked his arm in hers with a giggle. "C'mon, then!" She promptly spun on her heel and began to drag Phoenix back the way she'd come, towards the small group of people gathered near the courtroom doors.

Apollo sighed, looking around at his siblings and friends all watching him expectantly, grins on their faces. "Fine," he muttered, moving to follow his 'parents' as Trucy bounced happily at his side.

It wasn't a long distance to the awaiting small crowd, and Phoenix was the first to get a good look at them, frowning in recognition as he spotted a familiar face or two smiling in greeting. "Maggey? Ms Andrews!?" He looked around in fright for a moment. "Von Karma isn't here, is she!?"

Adrian, standing mostly in the middle of the group, hid a smile. "No, sadly. Franziska's out of the country at the moment, though I'm sure she'd want to be here if she could."

Phoenix instantly relaxed, though hid it behind a neutral nod, brushing off his question. "Uh, yeah, of course... good to hear." He firmly ignored Maya's giggling at his side.

Maggey, who had been sitting at the edge of the group on a bench, pushed herself to her feet, a hand on her visibly swollen belly. "Sorry to surprise you like this, Mister Wright," she said with an apologetic grin. "This all kinda happened last minute."
"I see," Phoenix replied, raising an eyebrow as he noticed Maggey's hand on her middle. "I also see why you and Gumshoe were in such a hurry to get married all of a sudden."

The woman just shrugged, looking proud of herself as she patted her baby bump. "Should've done it years ago, anyway."

"Blackbird!" Apollo called, catching up to the group with Trucy, Luke, Pearl and Clay lagging behind him. He gave his friend a grin. "I was so busy with everything, I almost forgot you'd promised to be here!"

Maggey laughed. "I also promised you'd do okay in court! And you did better than okay if I do say so myself!"

Apollo scoffed at the praise, hiding a smile behind a roll of his eyes. It was then he seemed to notice the seven other people in the small group, looking around with surprise. "Wait... Adrian? And..." He pointed at one woman with two-tone brown and blonde hair, who gave him a small wave. "Weren't you a client at the Agency?"

"Apollo!" Luke cried, offended, crossing his arms as he gave his brother a stern glare. "That's Miss Holliday; She was the first person to ever hire me, remember?"

"Well... that was years ago," Apollo muttered. "At least I remembered she was a client!"

Aria smiled. "I was a regular customer until Luke left for college," she pointed out, "but I guess Luke does have more reason to remember me than you do, Apollo!"

Meanwhile, Phoenix had noticed a woman about Maya's age, wearing round glasses and with neutral brown hair done up in a ponytail, her entire demeanour seeming to direct attention away from herself. "You're familiar," he told her, scratching his chin. "Weren't you involved with one of my cases back in the day?"

The young woman seemed relieved to hear his question, giving Phoenix a relaxed grin. "The Jack Hammer murder case, Global Studios," she replied. "I was just the on-set assistant back then."

"C'mon Nick," Maya cut in, elbowing Phoenix with a wink, "Penny and I stayed in touch to trade Steel Samurai cards, remember?"

Apollo was looking around at the small group, examining the remaining four. "All of you seem familiar," he said, then frowned. "Aren't... Aren't you all regulars at the Wonder Bar?"

"I wouldn't say 'regular'," a short, androgynous youth with an impressively muscular build scoffed, looking at their pink-painted nails. "I only go when I can afford to."

One of the only two males of the group, pale with platinum blond hair, giggled at Apollo, apparently ignoring his friend. "Well, how could we not?" he said. "We heard so many good things about the Gramarye show!"

"They're all fans!" Trucy squealed in delight, pulling on her brother's arm as she bounced excitedly at his side. "Of us!"

Apollo gave her a frown. "I gathered that," he pointed out.

"I should probably explain," Maggey said, giving Apollo and Phoenix, though Apollo in particular, an apologetic smile. "Like I said, all of us meeting up was kind of last minute, and mostly unplanned..." She then specifically turned to Apollo. "I wanted to warn you earlier, Steel... but I figured you'd probably panic and you had enough stress with the trial and all."

Phoenix raised an eyebrow, wondering what Maggey was talking about, while Apollo gave her a suspicious frown, warily asking, "Warn me of what?"

Maggey took a deep breath, then gestured to the assembled group. "We're... Well, essentially, this is the first meeting of the entire semi-official Phoenix Wright Fan Club."

Apollo went pale, feeling everyone's eyes on him. "Oh."

View the Court Record
Phoenix immediately broke into uproarious laughter. "So that's what Trucy meant by 'Apollo's people'!" he cried.

Apollo spun around to glare at his father, turning red with embarrassment. "Dad!"

Ignoring his son, Phoenix was already turning to Maya with an amused look. "So this is your 'official fan club', is it?"

"Semi-official," Maya corrected with a wink. "And I'd be careful about letting that pride go to your head if I were you, old man."

"It used to be a lot bigger before you lost your badge, Mister Nick," Pearl pointed out somewhat nervously.

Meanwhile, Clay was running around Trucy to throw an arm over Apollo's shoulders, giving his friend a smirk. "And what's this I hear about your username being 'Steel Justice Lover'?" he laughed. "Is it even possible to think up a name lamer than that?"

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "What are you talking about, Starbuck Fan Three-thousand?" he shot back. "You helped me come up with it, moron."

Clay paused, surprised. "I did?"

The androgynous youth huffed to themself. "Why didn't you ever tell us who you really were?" they demanded of Apollo, still managing to seem intimidating despite their height. "What kind of jerk lies like that for... well, however long you were planning to wait to tell us!"

Apollo resisted the urge to give his father a pointed look.

Pearl looked unimpressed. "We already explained that, Drewby," she said, slightly pointing her nose into the air.

"I thought it was pretty obvious why," Aria pointed out. "We're a fanclub all about Mister Wright, so what reason does his kid have to admit who he is?"

The young adult backed down at that, and Apollo found he wasn't surprised to learn the confrontational youth was the argumentative Drewby.

"Well, thank you all for being fans!" Phoenix said with a proud grin, ignoring Maya rolling her eyes at him. "I'm astonished you still exist as a group this long after the mess seven years ago!"

"That was all thanks to Blackbird, really!" a motherly-looking woman insisted, giving Maggey a warm smile. "She warned some of us the first forum was going to shut down, so we had time to exchange contact information and keep in touch!"

"Some of us," Apollo quietly repeated, crossing his arms.
"Now now, don't gripe," Maya gently scolded him with a smile. "We got you in touch with Maggey, didn't we?"

"After roundly mocking me for being a part of the fanclub you started," Apollo replied, raising an eyebrow.

Luke shook his head. "No, that was Papa doing the mocking," he corrected, "not Maya."

After a short pause, Apollo rolled his eyes and sighed. "Y'know, I'm not surprised."

Phoenix scoffed, giving his sons an innocent grin. "Now come on, you two act like I don't respect you or something!"

"Oh, you do?" Apollo asked with a smile. "Could've fooled us."

Adrian adjusted her glasses nervously. "We don't want to keep you if you're busy, Mister Wright," she told Phoenix. "I imagine you'll be looking forward to home after spending so long in the detention centre."

Phoenix waved her concern off. "Don't worry about me, Ms Andrews; It was only a few days. Besides," he shot a smirk at Apollo, "how could I keep little Apollo from his friends?"

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "Ah, yes, more of that fatherly respect we're all so used to hearing from you," he deadpanned, though a small smile tugged at the corners of his mouth.

"Speaking of," Maggey spoke up with an apologetic wince, "I hope you're not mad about this, Steel. I mean, I promised to keep your secret, and that's all blown out of the water now..."

"It's fine," Apollo sighed, looking a little tired. "Besides, after Pearly's slip up..."

"I said I was sorry!" Pearl cried, hands clutched together as she gave Apollo a sad look. "I tried to take out real names before anyone else saw them!" Maya smiled sympathetically as she reached out to rub the teen's arm comfortingly.

Apollo shook his head. "No, no, I already forgave you for that. It was an honest mistake." He returned his attention to the rest of the club members. "I mean, it was kind of an open secret by now anyway, right? You all knew who I was."

Aria grinned. "Since Trucy invited me to your debut performance!" she boasted.

"You forgotten you posted a picture of yourself a grand total of once?" the blond man laughed, crossing his arms. "Man, Blackbird told me off when she realised I'd figured it out!"

Apollo blushed, looking away as he remembered the photo he and Pearl had taken, as part of his attempt to re-introduce her to the fan-club. It had been up barely a day before he took it down, scared of the awkward questions it had attracted.

"Yeah, that was when I realised, too," Penny said with an embarrassed shrug. "I even got all 'angry mod' on you before Blackbird told me what was going on."

"Me three," Adrian added, holding up her hand. "I was going to tell you who I was at Mister Edgeworth's party a couple years back, but..." She brushed at her fringe, glancing at Maggey. "Well, I guess I lost my nerve."

Maggey leaned towards Apollo with a wink. "Miss 'CelestialImpacts' here figured out who I was thanks to you!” she giggled. Adrian blushed as Apollo hid a smile himself.

The motherly-looking woman gave Luke a fond smile. "I must admit, I was concerned when you were posting about your brother being on trial," she explained. "When I saw those real names Precious accidentally posted, I... looked them up."

"Me too," Drewby muttered, looking away as they rubbed an arm guiltily. "The only surname that fit what you'd told us was 'Wright'. It wasn't hard to figure out." Biting their lip, the young adult glanced between Apollo and Pearl. "You guys know I was kidding about the 'blackmail' thing, right?"

The last of the group, a tall stick of a man who had been quiet up until now, ran a hand through his hair with a wince. "Uh... I guess I'm just thick, 'cause I honestly had no idea before today."

The group chuckled at that, the motherly woman giving him a hug and saying. "Aw, don't beat yourself up, Thunder! Everyone misses little things like that!"

Maya giggled, poking Phoenix in the side. "Y'know Nick, this calls for a celebration! Whaddaya say we do the traditional thing?"

Phoenix raised an eyebrow. "This isn't exactly a small group, Maya. I doubt he'd appreciate that."

Trucy watched them with a surprised look. "You had a tradition, Mommy?"

"You bet we did!" Maya replied with a wink. "Didn't we, Pearly?"

Pearl nodded enthusiastically. "After every trial, Mister Nick took Mystic Maya and I to get noodles and burgers!" she explained, then paused and added, "Almost every trial, I mean."

"Oh yeah!" Apollo cried with a smile, looking to Clay and Luke as he said, "That's why Mister Eldoon knows Maya!"

"As long as I'm not paying for it," Phoenix sighed, crossing his arms. "And I don't think anyone else but you could eat full servings of both noodles and burgers."

"We don't want to impose," Penny insisted. "If it's a problem, we can just go to a park or something."

Maya scoffed. "Of course it's not a problem!" she cried. "There's only! Hang on." She paused, visibly counting the number of people in their group. "Fourteen of us! Mister Eldoon won't mind!" Before Phoenix could object, she was turning to her online friends with a grin. "Oh, everyone here likes noodles, right?"

During the walk to Guy Eldoon's noodle cart, the Wrights, Feys and Fan Club all split into smaller groups to talk. Maggey finally explained to Apollo that, once she'd mentioned Phoenix's arrest online, all the other forum-goers had sprung into action, looking up his trial dates and making arrangements to be there in person... and the excitement had only doubled once Precious announced she would be there with My-Fairy and the Wright children. With everyone except the absent Steel confirming they would go, Maggey felt she had no choice but to admit he was defending, especially after his brief panic to her the previous day over taking the reins of the case from his boss. Maya had moaned to Phoenix about how none of the Wrights had contacted her or Pearl directly over the arrest, with Pearl only discovering by chance through the forum, though Phoenix had just rolled his eyes and ignored her, muttering that she knew his reasons for keeping quiet better than anyone and they had already discussed this only two days ago Maya.

Clay was very enthusiastic about meeting Apollo's online friends, saying it was a bit of a shock to find Luke and Trucy in the middle of a group when he caught up to them, not to mention the surprise of learning who exactly they were. Luke and Aria, the latter of whom Apollo was still confused over calling 'Ms Holliday' or 'Pocky', were very eager to catch up, as she had been a relatively regular client for him in the years before he left for university (apparently there had been too much fuss over the trial for them to chat earlier). Trucy seemed content to cling to Apollo's arm, although he noticed her frequently sending pleased grins at Phoenix and Maya, arm-in-arm ahead of them. Pearl, behind them, was engrossed in conversation with the motherly-looking woman, who had introduced herself to Apollo as "Liztropical, but just 'Liz' is fine - It's my name, after all!".

Of the other members of the fanclub, they individually re-introduced themselves to their friend once the group had arrived at Eldoon's, the small cart's owner happily preparing bowls for everyone in his tiny 'kitchen'. The tall, quiet man was Thunderdome, though he insisted it was awkward to call him that offline and preferred to go by 'Max' instead. The blond, somewhat forward man was ForgetMeKnot, though he had laughed that 'Knot' wasn't all that different from his given name 'Knox', so he didn't mind what people called him. The young woman who Maya had called 'Penny' introduced herself as Dime_Quarters, who had been outed only the previous year as an accomplished director at Global Studios - That she had met Phoenix and Maya there on their first investigation together was both surprising and not surprising. Adrian had only given Apollo a wink before confirming she was CelestialImpacts online, though she objected to being nicknamed 'Celeste' by the others and Apollo thought it would be awkward to call her anything other than her name anyway.

To Apollo's relief, after the initial meeting in the courthouse, most of his online friends were happy to leave alone the subject of his long-held 'secret identity'; Only Drewby, who seemed frustrated about it, and Max, who was just confused, brought it up before the night was over, and, once Apollo had given them apologies and explained how he'd been a teenager terrified of being abandoned, they eventually accepted that the past was past and moved on. Drewby themself, who Apollo learned preferred being gender-neutral even in their daily life, seemed especially surprised to hear his reasoning, giving Apollo an odd look before hurriedly exiting the conversation. Apollo had been too distracted to chase his friend up by Clay loudly proclaiming he was prepared to spill all of Apollo's most embarrassing moments to whoever would listen, forcing the young lawyer to tackle him. Their brief brawl had to be called to a halt by Luke, who dragged the two of them to their feet by their ears and glared at them until they both apologised.

It was Penny who first asked Trucy and Apollo about their magic act, concerned they might miss a performance. "Oh, don't worry!" Trucy assured her. "We arranged to take a break from performing until after the trial!"

"Specifically, tomorrow," Apollo elaborated. "That gave us time to extend it if something went badly today." He then paused, reaching for the pin holding his cape around his shoulders. "Actually, that reminds me," he said, gripping the fabric firmly with one hand as he unclipped the pin, holding it out to his sister. "You can have that back."

Trucy just nodded, taking the pin and swapping it with the safety pin holding her own cape together. "You want my safety pin?"

"I'll just take it off," Apollo replied, pulling off his cape carefully to avoid accidentally whacking it against somebody.
A moment later, Luke was at Apollo's side, holding out his satchel. "I'll look after it," he offered.

Apollo nodded, giving his brother a grateful smile as he quickly folded up the crimson fabric and deposited it in Luke's bag.

Liz sighed as she watched the siblings, standing with Maya and Phoenix as she caught up with her old friend My-Fairy. "Seeing that makes me wish I had such a good relationship with my sister," she said, giving the pair a smile. "You must be such proud parents!"

Phoenix blushed, rubbing at the back of his head. "Well, who wouldn't be?" he muttered.

Maya just looked away uncomfortably. "Trucy calls me 'Mommy', but I'm not their mom," she quietly explained. "Don't get me wrong, I'm proud of 'em, but..." As Phoenix pulled her close to his side, watching her with concern, she forced a smile and shook her head. "It's complicated."

"Doesn't look like it to me," Liz said, giving Maya a warm smile, followed by a joking wink. "But I guess you've tended to downplay your relationship with Mister Wright, too."

Phoenix snorted as he failed to hide a laugh, while Maya just blushed.

One by one, the assembled group around Eldoon's Noodles had separated, leaving for their own homes. The Wrights and Feys, sticking closer together as their friends new and old gradually left, waved their goodbyes and finally moved on, headed back to the tiny office and the equally small apartment attached to it, parting ways with Clay as Apollo elected to stay with his family a little longer. They filed in to the office in a line, Luke at the head as he unlocked everything that had been carefully closed up that morning. While Phoenix had headed to his computer, pulling off his beanie with a relieved sigh, Maya had made herself busy instructing Apollo, Luke, Trucy and Pearl to move the various pieces of furniture and piles of magic props littering the room, clearing a space in the middle of the floor that she quickly filled with every spare blanket and pillow from the linen cupboard.

When Phoenix next looked up, he was almost surprised to see everyone sat in a pile on the cushioned floor, all centred around Trucy. Luke's satchel and Apollo and Trucy's hip-bags were tossed onto the sofa nearby with Trucy's hat and cape, while Maya and Pearl had cast off their oversized sunglasses and hats. While Maya's bun was already back in place, Pearl was taking a little longer to move her hair-loops to once again point upwards.

Apollo sighed as he cast a glance over to the silver-framed portrait of Zak Gramarye, looking down on them from the top of the piano. "Y'know, of all the things I thought might happen today... he was at the very bottom of the list."

Trucy sadly nodded, mutely staring at the floor in front of her.

"Did you work it out during the trial?" Luke asked his brother.

Apollo thought a moment, then nodded. "I didn't want to know at first," he admitted. "The moment part of me worked it out... I just refused to think about it until I got out of the courtroom."

"It was an awful shock," Pearl agreed, finishing her fiddling with her hair. "He finally came back, only for Mister Gavin to kill him like that?"

Maya, sitting slightly behind Trucy, wrapped her arms around the teen in a comforting hug, pulling her head to rest on Maya's shoulder. "My mom did the same thing: Disappeared for seventeen years, only to get murdered when she finally tried to come back... and I didn't even find out until after."

"I just wonder why it took him so long," Luke bitterly added, crossing his arms. "How could he abandon Trucy the way he did and not even try to track her down for so long?"

Pearl noticed Apollo give Luke an odd look, and explained, "Mister Nick told us where his file for that case was; Luke was reading it all of yesterday."

"Who deliberately leaves their child alone like that!?" Luke demanded, turning to Apollo. "He even got Trucy to help him abandon her, and just left her without any kind of friend or guardian! If it wasn't for Papa, she'd still be alone out there!"
"I know; I've read that file, too," Apollo pointed out, raising an eyebrow. He then paused, tapping at his bracelet in thought. "Wait... it's been seven years, hasn't it? Like, exactly seven years?"

"Yesterday was the anniversary of his disappearance," Luke replied, still pouting to himself. "Today's exactly seven years and one day since his trial."

Pearl gave Apollo a curious look. "Why? Is there something significant about that?"

Apollo nodded. "It's a legal thing," he explained. "Missing persons are declared legally dead once seven years has passed."

Maya frowned. "So he was still legally alive for two days after his murder." She clutched Trucy tighter, the teen still unresponsive to the conversation. "I'd ask why that didn't apply to my mother, but I suppose she was just in hiding, not missing."

Luke's pout faded, his arms moving into a self-hug. "If mine weren't already both legally dead..." he quietly mused.

"Do you think he knew about that law?" Apollo wondered aloud, not hearing his brother. "Was he trying to establish he was still around to extend the deadline?"

"'Dead'-line?" Luke repeated with a grimace. "Bad choice of words there."

The five sat on the floor suddenly heard a clearing throat, and looked up towards the desk, where Phoenix was getting up from his chair. "And that sounds like a cue for me to come in," he said, rounding the desk to approach the group. "I did make a lot of promises that I'd explain everything once the trial was over."

The moment Phoenix had lowered himself to the nest of blankets and pillows, Trucy tore herself away from Maya, jumping to Phoenix's side and clinging to his hoodie. "Was he going to come back?! He was going to see me, right?! Did he come to one of our shows?! He wasn't going to take me away, was he?!"

After a moment of surprise at Trucy's demands for knowledge, Phoenix held up his hands, giving his daughter a stern stare as he interrupted her avalanche of questions. "Truce, calm down. I have a lot of explanations to give as it is, so let me lay them out in an ordered fashion and everyone's happy."

Trucy stared for a moment before her grip on Phoenix's jumper loosened, eyes shining with tears. Maya crawled along the cushioned floor, picking a spot that would sandwich Trucy between her and Phoenix, and guided the teen to once again lean on her shoulder. Trucy didn't protest, sniffling to herself as her tears spilled on Maya's borrowed hoodie.

Phoenix sighed, wondering if he'd been a bit harsh trying to calm his daughter down. "Truce, I didn't mean to sound so angry there. I'll explain everything now, okay? I promise."

Although she didn't look up, Trucy bit her lip to hide a small smile, and reached out behind her with a free hand, which Phoenix took to hold with a grateful look, his thumb running back and forth along her fingers.

Apollo couldn't help but find the picture in front of him odd, with Maya still in one of Phoenix's hoodies, identical to the one Phoenix himself was wearing.

"I guess there's no better place to start than the beginning," Phoenix began, looking around at the small group; Pearl, Luke and Apollo glanced at each other before edging closer, forming a tighter circle. "Thursday night, just as usual, I left the Wonder Bar and headed off to work. It was pretty quiet, poker-wise... wasn't expecting anything major to happen. Kristoph showed up around midnight, and we were sat together about an hour eating dinner."

Apollo nodded, eager to hear something new; So far, Phoenix was just repeating what they'd heard in court.

"It would have been around one in the morning that Kristoph left," Phoenix continued, staring off into the distance with a frown. "Five minutes later, a pair of strange men appeared at my table... wanting to talk."

Phoenix nodded. "Though I didn't recognise him at first, one was a Mister Shadi Enigmar, as you might have guessed," he explained. "The other was some kind of reporter; A friend of his who was a public notary. Long gone by the time of the murder, of course."

"That's odd," Apollo pointed out, pressing a finger to his forehead in thought. "If he wanted to publicly reveal himself with a news report, why hasn't that story broken yet? And why'd he bring the guy to see you?"

"I'll get to that," Phoenix said, a half-smile on his lips. "Mister Enigmar, or Smith as he insisted on being called, told me he was there for two reasons. One... was to 'settle a score', if I correctly recall his exact wording."

"The poker game?" Pearl asked.

Apollo frowned. "You mean he was still upset you beat him seven years ago!?" he cried in disbelief. "That's why he went to so much trouble trying to ruin your reputation!? Again!?"

Phoenix just bitterly chuckled. "Apparently, I share that honour with only one other person." He looked between Apollo and Trucy. "You two's grandfather."

After a pause, Trucy twisted her head around to give Phoenix a curious look. "Grandpa Magnifi...?"

"I suppose it bugged him that I had managed to win despite lacking the 'Gramarye power'," Phoenix continued. "He'd decided he was going to win this time, at any cost."

Maya frowned disapprovingly, but said nothing, firmly stroking Trucy's hair.

Apollo opened his mouth to question the phrase 'Gramarye power', but reasoned it wasn't that big a logical leap that his and Trucy's unusual skill ran in their family, so he shut up.

"But, before all that," Phoenix said, "Mister Smith had one other thing he wanted me to do... and, in return, he was willing to talk for a while, and answer a few questions."

"One of them was about Trucy, right?" Luke asked, glancing worriedly at his sister. "He was planning to visit her, wasn't he?"

Phoenix didn't reply immediately, glaring at nothing in particular. "No," he admitted. "He wasn't."

Trucy almost jumped, snapping her head around to face Phoenix with enough force to pull her off Maya's shoulder, her eyes wide in shock.

"He what!?" Apollo cried in outrage, fists clenched as he longed to punch the man who had put his family through so much. "How can he finally show himself in public and not visit Trucy!??"
"Exactly my thoughts on the subject," Phoenix calmly replied, his words calming his son down all on their own. "He only said it was too risky, even for her." He closed his eyes. "Considering what happened, he may have had a point."

Trucy said nothing, turning back to rest her head on Maya's shoulder.

Apollo and Luke exchanged glances. "You seemed unsure in your notes," Luke spoke up, "whether or not Mister Gavin really had been Zak Gramarye's first attorney."

"Because there aren't any records," Apollo pointed out. "But, like, nothing pointed to anyone else, either."

"It was Kristoph," Phoenix insisted, his gaze flicking between his sons. "We still can't prove it, but... Zak recognised him after they crossed paths. Knew his name."

Pearl gasped, a hand flying to her mouth.

"So your comment in court about them 'passing in the hall' was more than just speculation," Apollo realised.

Phoenix nodded. "I should have questioned him at the time, but we'd just finished a long discussion and were heading down the Hydeout by then," he explained. "I'd run out of time, and didn't even know it."

[View the Court Record]
"What did you spend so long talking about?" Luke asked.

Phoenix smiled. "Trucy, mostly," he chuckled. "Although we touched on Apollo a little, too."

Apollo blinked in surprise. "You told him about me?"

"Only a little," Phoenix assured him. "Just enough to get him to tell me what he knew."

Pearl and Trucy shared a confused glance. "About what?" Pearl asked.

Phoenix grinned a moment in amusement, then stared off into the distance as his smile faded. Instead of answering the question, he turned to Apollo. "Zak didn't know him very well," he said, "but your father was performing with the Gramaryes, as a guest in their show. That's how he met your mother."

Apollo froze, staring back at Phoenix with wide eyes. 'M-my... father?'

"As we already knew, they got married and Thalassa left the Troupe for a while," Phoenix continued. "Zak never knew about you before he died, but he did say that Thalassa was missing one of those bracelets of hers when she returned."

Apollo felt everyone's eyes on him, but couldn't tear his own from Phoenix, one hand reaching to his bracelet.

Phoenix paused, looking between Apollo and Trucy. "He also explained a little more to me about this 'power' of you two's... The Gramarye ability to see through lies."

"Mommy had it too?" Trucy asked, perking up a little from Maya's side.

"Yep," Phoenix replied with a nod. "Zak said he was just repeating to me how Thalassa had once explained it to him: It's... reacting to 'tension', basically."

Luke frowned. "Tension?" he repeated. "You mean, body tension?"

"Exactly," Phoenix replied. "Most everyone tenses up somewhere at least a little when they lie. Without even knowing it, someone of the Gramarye line will mirror that tension when they see it."

Apollo thought a moment, clutching his bracelet tightly. "That makes sense," he said. "We just... felt it when something was wrong."

Trucy nodded in agreement, sitting up properly next to Maya as she eagerly waited for more news with a grin. "What else did Daddy say, Daddy!?"

Phoenix laughed at the sight of his daughter's excited face. "Ah, just a little something I suspect our dear Polly already knew all about," he said, looking to Apollo with a grin. "Something to do with a certain bracelet."
Blushing madly, Apollo clung to the golden 'ring' on his wrist. "Eh heh... I probably know a lot less about it than you think..."

"What does the bracelet have to do with anything?" Pearl asked, hands neatly folded in her lap.

Luke looked thoughtful, tapping his chin.

"Apparently, those bracelets are made of a special alloy," Phoenix explained. "They expand and shrink, just a little, in reaction to body warmth."

Apollo stared down at the object on his arm, frowning in thought. "That's why it's so difficult to get off and on," he realised.

"They make an exact fit to your wrist," Phoenix continued, looking to Apollo. "Then, when you tense up in reaction to someone else... the bracelet feels tighter."

Luke smiled. "I suspected there was something to do with the bracelet," he said. "You always grab it when you say someone's lying, Apollo!"

"I do...?" Apollo muttered in reply.

Trucy pouted at her older brother, crossing her arms. "That's why you were always better at spotting lies than me!" she cried. "Cause Mommy gave you one of her bracelets and not me!?"

Maya's eyebrows furrowed, her hands clinging together firmly. "I'm sure she had a reason for not leaving you the other one, Trucy," she calmly pointed out.

"And that's not all there is to it," Phoenix picked up, giving Trucy a warning look to calm down and listen. "The bracelet only tells Apollo when to focus; Actually spotting the lie is something you both do."

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "You mean there's more to it than that?"

"Actually, I'm surprised I didn't put the pieces together sooner," Phoenix continued with a smile. "I don't suppose any of you have heard of 'kinetic vision', have you?"

"I have!" Luke piped up with a grin. "Athletes have that, right? If they focus, they can see a moving ball like it was stopped!"

Apollo rolled his eyes. "We're not athletes," he pointed out.

"Not all athletes have it," Phoenix corrected, trying to hide an amused laugh. "And it's certainly not just athletes, either. It's primarily the ability to focus... to see even the faintest twitch in the face, Zak said, as well as the meaning behind it."

Trucy opened her mouth to say something, then paused, frowning in thought.

"But it's difficult to hold that kind of focus," Phoenix continued. "Thus, the bracelets, to tell you when to do it."

There was a short pause as everyone mused on the new information. Apollo had a finger pressed to his forehead in thought. "So... that's the real reason Trucy thought I was better at it?" he asked. "Because I had the bracelet to tell me when to 'focus', and she had to work it out on her own?"

Phoenix nodded, then looked to the quiet teen at his side. "That's probably why I didn't know about your 'power' until the first night I took you to the Borscht Bowl Club," he explained. "Working out
Still frowning into the distance, Trucy absently nodded.

There was another short pause. Maya ran her hands through her hair. "So... was that all he told you?"

Phoenix sighed. "There was more," he admitted. "We spoke for a long time before finally heading to the Hydeout." He closed his eyes. "I'm... going to have to admit I'm not prepared to tell you all of it right now."

"We did have a very busy day today," Pearl pointed out.

Phoenix thought a moment. "I did ask him about Magnifi's murder," he admitted.

Trucy seemed a little startled to hear that. "Daddy didn't do it, did he!?"

"Of course not," Phoenix assured her, shaking his head with a small smile. "He... belatedly answered all the questions he should have answered seven years ago."

Apollo and Luke shared another look, both mentally pinning the true culprit. 'It couldn't have been anyone else but Valant,' Apollo mused.

Trucy shifted closer to Phoenix, giving him a hug. Her expression was looking sad again, thinking of her birth father without the distraction of another subject to talk about.

"Maybe, when the pain isn't so fresh," Maya offered, rubbing Trucy's back with a comforting smile, "you can come visit me and Pearly, and I'll channel him for you. How's that sound?"

Trucy didn't immediately react, thinking for a moment before looking back at Maya with a grateful look. "I'd like that, Mommy." Although she kept one arm clinging to Phoenix, she reached out with the other to grab Maya, pulling her adoptive parents together in a small group hug.

Maya giggled, then gestured to Pearl, Apollo and Luke, beckoning them closer. Pearl and Luke grinned as they leapt forward to join the hug, though Apollo was a little more hesitant, rolling his eyes and hiding a smile before crawling over to join the laughing pile in the middle of the blankets and pillows.

"So, uh, what do we do now?"

The rest of the family, lying about on the blankets, variously twisted to look in Apollo's direction. "What do you mean?" Luke asked.

Apollo shrugged. "Well, um, I guess I mean 'what do I do now'," he mumbled, staring at the ceiling. "I still want to be a defence attorney, and I just lost my job. Who would even hire me once they find out I put my own boss away for murder?"

"Someone who knew you were doing the right thing," Phoenix replied, watching Apollo with concern. "There are still people out there who care about that over 'winning' in court."
"Maybe," Apollo sighed, unconvinced.

Trucy frowned, sharing a look with Pearl.

Maya grinned. "Well, why not work here?" she asked, gesturing to the office around them.

Apollo finally tore his eyes away from the ceiling, glaring at his adoptive mother. "I already work here," he pointed out. "As a magician."

"Well, why can't you work here as a lawyer too?" Maya asked with a cheeky wink. "My sis and Nick here never had a problem with that!"

"To be fair, this was a law office at the time," Phoenix laughed in reply. "We closed it down when we ran out of lawyers!"

Luke nodded, frowning worriedly. "And it's not called the Wright Talent Agency for nothing," he agreed. "I can't work here as a vet either, only as a violinist."

Trucy began to smile excitedly as she picked up on Maya's train of thought. "Then we'll change the name!" she declared. "That way, we can all work here, with everything we can do!"

"We can't change the name!" Apollo cried, scandalised. "We'd lose our existing customer base, and no matter what we chose as a new name, who in their right mind would look for a lawyer or vet in a talent agency, or a musician or magician in an office?"

Trucy scoffed at her brother's concerns, shaking her head.

"Apollo has a point," Luke agreed. "Besides, I couldn't work here as a vet anyway; I would need a practise room and a full stock of equipment for that."

"Then we just add Apollo's law career," Phoenix suggested with a shrug. "Any ideas for a good middle-ground between Wright Talent Agency and Wright Law Offices?"

There was a very long pause as everyone thought hard.

"You... could run them both?" Pearl suggested. "In the same office?"

Maya shook her head. "I think that would just be more confusing than anything. Better to stick with one."

"I don't think we can mix office and agency," Trucy decided, then grinned cheekily. "Let's stick with Agency! It's just Polly being difficult about it, after all!"

"I am not!" Apollo protested, pouting at his sister.

"And we should definitely keep Wright at the beginning," Luke picked up. He smiled to himself, looking almost sheepish. "We... could go with Wright Family Agency. That covers all of us for everything, doesn't it?"

Phoenix smiled for a moment before something seemed to occur to him and he frowned. "Yes, but only the four of us," he pointed out. "Should we ever want to hire anyone else, we'd just run into the same problem."

Pearl seemed surprised. "Hire someone?" she repeated. "Who?"

Phoenix chuckled. "Well, one particular young psychologist-lawyer-in-training comes to mind..."
Luke immediately perked up. "Oh! Athena!" he cried, and giggled. "Yeah, it would be great to bring her here!"

"Huh," Apollo mumbled, smiling despite himself. "I can't believe I forgot... I promised Athena I'd work with her someday! Here would be perfect!"

"Glad to see you're warming up to the idea!" Maya pointed out with a cheeky grin.

Apollo immediately plastered a forced frown on his face and looked away.

"Ooh! Ooh!" Trucy cried, bouncing into a sitting position to look down on her assembled family with glee. "I just got the best idea!"

"What?" Pearl asked, already smiling with anticipation. "What is it?"

"The Wright Anything Agency!" she announced. "We could expand our business to do any odd jobs people have for us, not just music or magic or law! And the name's similar enough to the old one that we won't lose regular customers!" She looked to her father and brothers expectantly. "Well?"

Luke thought a moment, then nodded his approval. "That's a great idea, Trucy!"

Phoenix grinned. "Sounds good to me," he agreed.

Everyone turned to Apollo, waiting for his thoughts, and he sighed loudly as though it were a great effort to do so. "I suppose it's okay," he admitted.

Trucy and Pearl cheered with glee, while Maya gave everyone a grin. "Well then, I guess we've got a grand re-opening to celebrate!"

Phoenix jokingly held up a hand as though it were holding a wine glass. "To the Wright Anything Agency!" he called. Everyone else, even the reluctantly smiling Apollo, cheered in reply.

Thread: After that trial yesterday...

BlackbirdLuck [ADMIN], 04/21/2026 10:27:38AM
It was all very exciting to finally get to meet each other IRL, but that does cause a significant problem: NAMES. All of us exchanged at least our first names with each other yesterday, so it seems wrong to just switch back to usernames. SO. Why not just use our real names? We all know each other here, and this is a private forum anyway, so who's gonna bug us about it? So, yes, feel free to just call me Maggey here (and don't spell it wrong, please!)
While I'm at it, it seems a few of us had met the Wrights before today, and it's not something we've spoken about here, or had time to explain yesterday... so, why not talk about it here? :) I'll start: As some of you probably remember, I used to be a police officer. I went through training (met my husband there, but that's another story!), earned my police badge, and started a regular shift. At the time, I also had a boyfriend, Dustin, another new police officer I met in training. To make a long story short... Dustin got murdered, and I was blamed. I'd been a fan of Mr Wright for a while (and this was BEFORE the fanclub!), so I put through my request to him. To my surprise, he accepted! He was so nice about it, listening to my story, asking questions... then he gave me a confident smile and said he'd get me out of there in no time! I still have a business card he gave me with his cell number, to call if I remembered anything else! The trial was a bit of a fiasco thanks to the actual murderer hitting poor Mr Wright over the head with a fire extinguisher, but he managed to keep his promise in the end!
(Needless to say, I also met Maya/My-Fairy at the same time, when she was Mr Wright's assistant!) I didn't become friends with Mr Wright or Maya for another full year after that, though. I'd been fired from the force despite being proven innocent, so I took up a job as a waitress and, just my luck, got myself caught up in another murder... I didn't even realise the guy defending me wasn't even the real Mr Wright! Well, after a month or two in jail, the REAL Mr Wright found out what happened and got me out again. Since then, we've been casual friends, although I don't meet up with him or Maya all that often.
So, how about you guys? Join the Real Name Club, and lay down your story if you have one!

ForgetMeKnot, 04/21/2026 10:48:03AM
Gee, I was gonna tell people not to worry about it and just call me Knot, but if you're so eger to switch 'Maggey'... sure, you guys can call me Knox if you wanna!
I hadn't really met the Wrights before yesterday. I mean, I went to Apollo and Artemis' show out of curiosity, liked it enough to come back when I could, approached them a couple times after to tell em they were great... never met Mr Wright, though I saw the brother in passing. He was Luke, wans't he? Lemme know if I'm wrong, Steel.

Dime_Quarters [MOD], 04/21/2026 11:52:14AM
My story's not all that exciting. I mean, a certain few of you were determined enough to work out my job that it wouldn't have been hard to figure out my real name from that. I mean, sure, we're friends... so Penny it is.
I've never been friends with Mr Wright, though I did help him and Maya on a case. It was their first working together, I think. Maya was a fan of Steel Samurai (I think she talked Mr Wright into defending WP when he asked them), and so was I, so we stayed in touch after to trade cards. I was only an assistant then, so all I did was tell them what I knew, but apparently it was enough to help. In fact, as I'm sure I've mentioned before, I'm only a mod here because Maya needed help setting this place up and promised me my own sub-forum in return. It may not exist anymore, but I like this community enough that I don't mind. :)

So are we getting banned if we don't joint he Real Name Club? Is it a new clique or something? j/k, you guys can call me Aria!
You guys already all know how I met the Wrights: I hired Luke to play the violin when a friend bailed on us, then Trucy invited me to her and Apollo's first performance together! :D

Thunderdome, 04/21/2026 01:14:30PM
I'm happy to join the Real Names Club. Call me Max.
I've been to the Wonder Bar a couple times, but I've never met the Wrights. I didn't want to bother them by chasing them after their show, either.
Also, I just want you guys to know... I don't post often, but I really appreciate your friendship. It was just amazing to get to meet you all in person, and to feel so accepted! :') I think that's a happy memory that won't ever fade.

Drewby, 04/21/2026 02:02:41PM
NOPE, NO WAY AM I JOINING YOUR 'CLIQUE'. CALL ME DREWBY OR DIE!
(please be obvious that i'm joking)
Same story with me. Haven't met 'em before yesterday. Been to the show a couple times. Actually, I think I got called up on stage once. Tried to steal Apollo's hat.

CelestialImpacts, 04/21/2026 03:30:01PM
Adrian here. My story is a bit of a complicated one... I was involved in a case or two of Mr Wright's back in the day. The first one was, I believe, the first case he 'lost', and it was explained to me years later that he was only defending that man in the first place because he was essentially being blackmailed. Relatedly, I didn't meet Maya until a year later, when she and Pearl entrusted something to me that got stolen by Mask DeMasque.

Liztropical, 04/21/2026 04:06:10PM
Ah, I think I remember seeing a volunteer who tried to steal Apollo's hat. That was you, Drew?
You guys already call me Liz, so I guess I'm the first to join this 'Real Names Club'? Haha!
I didn't know that about you, Adrian! That's actually very interesting!
Aw, Max, if only we were speaking in person so I could hug you!
I find it interesting Maggey, that yours is actually the -longest- story so far!

Precious-Fairy, 04/21/2026 5:26:48PM
I don't mind if you all want to call me Pearly. :) It will be nice to consider all of you real life friends instead of just online ones!
I'm not sure how to talk about meeting Mr Nick. My-Fairy is my cousin, Mystic Maya, but she used to have a sister, who was Mr Nick's mentor. I met him the first day Mystic Maya took him to our home to visit. We helped him on all of his cases, until we had to leave the fan club because Mystic Maya was too busy. Then he lost his badge. We didn't see him for a long time after that, until he came to see us with Apollo, Luke and Trucy at Christmas. Trucy's my best friend, like a sister, even though we're first-cousins-once-removed! Luke's the smartest, and he's always very polite! Apollo always looks out for all four of us, and he likes to pretend we annoy him, but we know he's just playing. :) And ever since Mr Nick and Mystic Maya finally admitted they were special someones, we've seen a lot more of each other!

Geeze, you sure know how to compliment someone, don't you Pearly? ;)
Apollo here. It's kinda weird finally admitting that openly, but I guess it was just a matter of time. As for how I met Phoenix Wright... well, I was 15 at the time. Stuck in boarding school, all alone except for my friend Clay and the fanclub, until it imploded after the disbarment incident. That was a very lonely summer for me. Then, the second week of the school year, we got a surprise new student, named Luke. The three of us, me Clay and Luke, become best friends, spending all our time together... and then we found out that Luke was friends with the famous Phoenix Wright, who had sought him out after Luke's parents died. Luke took me along to meet him, and, to my surprise, a week later I had an offer of adoption in the mail. Once I found out who it was... well, I HAD to accept! Who wouldn't? For the first time in my life, I had a family... and one of them even turned out to be a blood relation, too!
We went to meet Maya and Pearly that first Christmas, and Maya told me the fanclub still existed, even if as a fraction of its former self. She gave me Maggey's number, but so much had changed in my life that I didn't think I'd be believed if I outright explained it all when I got my account back... then, I worried I'd be a target for constant questions about Dad, and what was going on with me, Luke and Trucy. So I kept quiet, and made up a story about being a friend of myself. But, you know, lies are hard to keep, and I slipped up a few times, talking about Trucy, or our show, or Pearly, Luke... or even Dad. I'm sorry for lying, there's no real excuse, but nobody lynched me yesterday, so I guess I'm forgiven?

Y'know, that does answer my question of what you planned to do now your old boss is in jail. That's quite a novel idea, actually. Who came up with it?

steeljusticelover "Apollo", 04/21/2026 07:26:16PM
Trucy, actually. I would have liked somewhere a bit more 'law office'y for my law career, but everyone else talked over me.

Precious-Fairy "Pearly", 04/21/2026 07:35:32PM
We did not! >[ You agreed to it!

Pocky-Hockey "Aria", 04/21/2026 07:54:43PM
I have been meaning to hire Luke for my choir's next performance. Looks like I have to find an excuse to hire you guys for something different some day! ;)

The Anything Agency's First Steps

Can you meet me at the office tomorrow morning?

Um I guess. Why?

I have a mission I've been neglecting, and I need an attorney's badge to investigate.

Mission? What mission?

I'm not lending you my badge, if that's what you're asking.

Don't worry, I'll explain tomorrow. See you at nine.

Wright Anything Agency
Phoenix's Office

It had been nearly three weeks since Phoenix's trial, and Apollo was almost amazed at how quickly everything had returned to normal... or, at least, the new 'normal': Instead of spending his weekdays at Gavin Law Offices, then in the afternoon dropping by his apartment to change before meeting Trucy for their nightly show, he was now spending almost his entire day at his 'childhood home', leaving only to head off to the Wonder Bar with Trucy in the evening. The long-closed drawers of Phoenix's and Mia's casefiles were now opened, and Apollo's (so far) lone casefile added to the line... a small drop in an impressive history the young lawyer was determined to match one day. On his birthday the previous Thursday, the family had made the rare decision to close the office and spent the day 'on the town' - Trucy had ensured the day off was viable for their business by bringing along a stack of their brand new fliers to hand out to any and all passing strangers, practising their new pitch on her unsuspecting audiences. It had been hard at first to get used to the Agency's new title, and there had been a rash of calls and random people off the street coming in purely to ask what an 'Anything Agency' was, but it was easier to handle than the occasional visitor who'd wandered in over the past seven years looking for 'Wright & Co Law Offices'. 'Naturally,' Apollo thought, 'those confused people suddenly stop appearing now we ARE doing law again.'

Pushing open the door with its new sign (Trucy had taped the word 'anything' over 'talent', as a temporary measure until they got a new one), Apollo didn't pause as he strolled right through reception and into the office, finding his brother sat on the red couches, staring at a document on his laptop screen. "Hey, Luke."

Luke jumped, looking up at Apollo in surprise before recognising his brother and smiling widely. "You came!" he called, shutting his laptop and leaving it on the table. "I was getting worried you'd forgotten!"

"Course not," Apollo replied with a half-smile, watching Luke jump to his feet. "I am curious why you've called me to 'work' on a Sunday, though."

Shrugging in embarrassment, Luke grinned sheepishly. "Well, I needed to be off work at the shelter, and I didn't want to take you away from Papa and Trucy while the office was open..." He scratched at a cheek. "I guess this investigation would be easier during the week, but we can always try again if today turns out to be a failure."

Apollo frowned, crossing his arms as he walked around the twin couches, closer to his brother. "That reminds me, what exactly are we doing today?"

Luke stared at him blankly for a moment. "You haven't guessed?"

"Obviously not," Apollo pointed out with a half-lidded glare. "What the hell is this 'mission' of yours that you're dragging me on?"

To Apollo's surprise, Luke seemed a little hurt by the question, and looked away as his expression turned carefully guarded. "You've forgotten," he said.

"F-forgotten what?" Apollo asked, eyes wide as he wondered what he'd done wrong. 'Has Luke mentioned it before? Why is he so upset I don't know!?!'

"I can't blame you, I suppose," Luke continued, not seeming to hear his brother as he wandered off towards Phoenix's desk. "It was seven years ago, after all."

Apollo was only feeling more and more lost, following his brother worriedly. "What? What is it? Luke?"

Luke sighed, leaning on the desk with his back to Apollo. "It's my mother, Apollo: Brenda Triton."

With a gasp, Apollo remembered: Although Luke's birth father had been confirmed dead for years (and they'd met him quite a few times now through Maya or Pearl channelling Clark for special occasions), Luke's mother was only legally deceased, as they knew her to be still alive but missing. Luke himself had searched for her for over a year before being forced to admit he'd hit a dead end, and his investigation was called to an abrupt halt. Apollo realised that, with the recent death of Zak Gramarye, Luke must have realised he finally had the tools to continue his long-dormant search (namely, Apollo's badge), and was hurrying into action before his own longed-for reunion met a similar fate to Trucy's. "Luke, I'm... I'm so sorry," Apollo whispered, approaching his brother and gently reaching out a hand to rest on Luke's shoulder. "I can't believe I forgot about that..."

"It's not your fault," Luke insisted, though he kept his gaze firmly on the desk he was leaning on. "We all forgot about her."

Before Apollo could say anything, Luke was spinning around, facing Apollo with a business-like stare. "We can pick up where I left off," he announced, the previous conversation seemingly forgotten. "I have a list of companies that made face-masks like the ones my dad saw, ordered by how suspicious I thought they were. "He pushed past his mutely stunned brother, to where his satchel rested on the couches. "I've been looking through it and crossing off any that have shut down since then, but there's still quite a lot left to investigate in person."

Meanwhile, Apollo had finally found his voice. "A-and what exactly will we be doing?" he asked. "What are we looking for?"

"I have some questions to ask them," Luke replied, hanging his satchel off his shoulder and turning back to Apollo with a determined look. "If they say no, we can tell them you're a lawyer and we're investigating a murder. It's technically true, after all."

Apollo wondered if Luke had picked up that particular trick of 'bending the truth' from Phoenix... or maybe it was something anyone in regular contact with Trucy and Apollo naturally picked up eventually.

Luke pulled out a map from his satchel. "I've planned out three companies to visit today; With any luck, they'll all be open and readily answer our questions."

"Just out of curiosity," Apollo interrupted, a hand to his chin, "are you following this list from most to least suspicious, or...?"

At that, Luke finally smiled. "Least to most," he replied. "I think they'll be most open to answering questions, and we can more readily cross them off the list."

Apollo frowned. "You aren't going most to least?" he confirmed. "I'd've thought that would pin down the place you're looking for quicker."

Luke looked away for a few moments, apparently thinking. "I was going to," he admitted, "but I've had five long years to think about this, and I reconsidered." He looked up again, meeting Apollo's eyes with that same determined stare. "A company with something to hide will just turn us away outright; If we go most to least, we'll take longer to start ticking suspects off the list. I don't want to start this final stage of the investigation on such a low note."

After a few seconds of thought, Apollo nodded in agreement. "That sounds fair."

Before the two could even begin to head out, the door through to the kitchen slammed open, and a teenager in a blue cape jumped into the room, waving at her brothers. "Polly! Luke! Wait a minute!"

Apollo rolled his eyes. "Don't worry, we'll hand out fliers if you're that desperate for us to," he assured her with a sigh.

Trucy stared at him for a moment before giggling. "Okay! I wasn't going to ask that, though!"

Apollo blinked in surprise. "Uh-!?"

"If you guys are going out," she brightly continued, "can we go somewhere else first?"

"You want to come with us?" Apollo asked, confused.

Luke frowned, staring at his map. "Well, I suppose that's okay," he decided. "Where did you want to go?"

Trucy scoffed. "To visit Mommy, of course!"

Apollo was about to ask why before the reason hit him, and he gasped, "Oh!"

Luke was just confused, looking between his siblings. "Why?" he asked. "Has something happened with her recently?"

Apollo felt his face fall, sharing a glance with his puzzled sister. 'Oh dear lord, he doesn't know.' Blushing, he rubbed at the back of his neck. 'How on earth do I break THIS to him?!' "Uh, Luke... did... did you not realise what day you were starting this search for your mother on...?"

Trucy's eyebrows shot up. Apparently she hadn't known why her brothers were meeting at the office that morning.
"No...?" Luke replied, only looking even more lost than before. "I thought today was just a normal Sunday."

"Luke..." Trucy spoke up, giving him a worried look. "It's Mothers Day today. I thought that was what you and Polly were meeting about."

At first, there was no reaction from their brother, but then Luke frowned, looking away with a hard stare. "Oh."

Apollo looked to Trucy. "But didn't Maya say she was busy this weekend?" he quietly asked. "I thought you'd be waiting 'til next weekend to do anything."

Trucy only looked more worried, shaking her head. "I don't think she is," she said. "Remember after Daddy's trial, when we all had the sleepover in the office and talked about Daddy Zak and Mommy Thalassa?"

Apollo nodded. "Of course I do," he said, thinking back on that nearly-disastrous Monday three weeks ago. "Then Dad insisted Maya and Pearly had to go back to Kurain the next morning."

"But we haven't seen Mommy since then!" Trucy pointed out. "And she always says she's too busy to talk to us!"

"It's not exactly unusual for her to drop off the face of the earth for a few weeks," Apollo replied with a raised eyebrow. "She has a village and a channelling school to run, as well as all those highbrow social events she has to attend every so often... not to mention those ridiculous training sessions she's always doing to keep her skills up."

Trucy sighed, her hands clung together. "This is different," she insisted. "Mommy's avoiding us, I know she is! She must be upset because we were all talking about how much we miss our other mommies after Daddy's trial!"

Apollo didn't know how to respond for a moment. "Why would she be?" he asked. "We could all see how much you missed your other dad, and Dad isn't upset."

"With Daddy, it's official!" Trucy replied. "He adopted us and everything! Mommy can't, because Daddy won't let her ruin her reputation!"

"Kurain's reputation," Apollo corrected; Although it had never been outright explained to them, the Wright children had one-by-one worked out the truth behind the secrecy around the Feys on their own over the years... whether from research into Phoenix's past cases, a casual mention by Pearl, or just overhearing Phoenix and Maya arguing about it. "Besides, Luke and I are adults now, she can't legally adopt us! I'm not sure she could even adopt you without marrying Dad first!"

"And for them to do that, we'd have to clear Papa's name." Apollo and Trucy looked up in surprise to see Luke watching them, the map in his hands now folded up and in the middle of being returned to Luke's satchel. He looked up at them with a smile. "But in the meantime, a simple visit will suffice, won't it?"

View the Court Record
The mansion was quiet as the three Wright children let themselves in through the front door, looking around warily for any sign of activity; Although they had dropped in on Maya without warning before, it was never at a time she claimed to be busy... and, although they had glimpsed other inhabitants of the village at a distance, they had never met any, and none of the trio fancied meeting a Kurain elder for the first time in the halls of Fey Manor in the midst of something important.

"Coast seems clear," Apollo hissed, waving at his siblings as he peeked down the nearby hallway. Luke and Trucy nodded once before all three rushed to pull off their shoes.

Both Apollo and Trucy still found it a little awkward that they had dragged Luke away from the search for his birth mother to visit Maya, who Luke had been very clear over the years could never be his adoptive mother as she was to Trucy. Apollo had especially felt guilty that said search had already been delayed by five years, but Luke would have none of it when they tried to insist he stay behind, especially since he had never joined them to visit Maya on Mother's Day before: "Mum's survived this long, so she'll be able to wait a few more days," he had said. "Maya needs us right now, and I don't think my mum would complain if we saw to her first." Thus, he had tugged his siblings out the door and in the direction of the tiny village in the mountains.

Trucy pulled together her and Apollo's boots with Luke's work shoes, looking for a spot to hide them in the open room. "Do you think we can get away with just putting them in a corner?" she asked.

"If it's somewhere out of the way," Luke replied. "As long as they doesn't draw attention, I think we can safely assume they'll be overlooked."

As Trucy was nodding, already moving to shove the shoes in a hidden corner, the sound of sliding wood interrupted their conversation, and they all turned to see the previously-ignored door to the Winding Way opening, revealing behind it a short woman in purple robes, who watched the shocked trio with a mischievous grin. After a few seconds of staring, Maya gave them a wink. "Busted."

It became blatantly clear as Maya took the trio through into the dining room that her claim she was too busy to see them that day had been anything but true, as the house was silent as the grave save for Maya herself, who seemed almost gleeful that the three Wright children had shown up in her front room; Pearl, she explained, was out with school friends in the city that day, thus her absence from the manor. Apollo, Luke and Trucy had been too surprised, confused and guilty for being there to complain as Maya sat them down with the usual drinks she always prepared for them on their rare visits.

With the young trio supplied with glasses of juice and water in their line on one side of the table (Apollo in the middle with Luke on his right and Trucy his left), Maya plopped down opposite them. with a grin. "So," she asked, hands held together, "what are you three doing here on a day you aren't supposed to be?"

There was a brief pause as the trio exchanged glances. "It was a mutual decision," Luke eventually said with a guarded tone. Apollo was almost surprised he hadn't immediately pinned the blame on Trucy, as it had been her idea originally. "We couldn't not come, no matter the risk."

"Today's important," Trucy added with a determined look. "Especially after Daddy's trial!"

Maya's smile faded a little as she nodded thoughtfully, avoiding their gazes suddenly.

"You've never been busy on Mother's Day before," Apollo continued, watching Maya carefully. "And it seems pretty clear you weren't busy this year either; You've always made time for us, no matter what else you had on."

Maya didn't immediately reply, her hands gripping her own glass of water. "Well, luckily for you, all my appointments today cancelled. I'm all yours."

Apollo felt Luke and Trucy immediately turn their gazes to him, and he couldn't blame them; They all knew from evidence more than any special skill that Maya was lying, even if Apollo was the only one to see her eyes flicker down to the magatama around her neck, whether at the thought of 'family' or possibly the memory of the locket that Phoenix had given to Trucy after the trial three weeks ago... That didn't mean any of them wanted to accept it, though. Unwilling to point the lie out himself, Apollo tapped a finger on his bracelet to signal Luke (under the table, the movement wouldn't be very clear to Maya) and gave Trucy a quick frown of disappointment, subtly shaking his head.

Luke sighed, looking away as he understood Apollo's unspoken message, but Trucy turned to Maya with sad eyes. "Mommy... you know you're our mommy, right? No matter what happens?"

Maya seemed a little surprised to hear that question, staring at Trucy for a moment before giving the trio a smile. "Of course!" she said, though Apollo knew from the way her fingers suddenly interlocked around her glass that she didn't believe it. "What's brought all this on suddenly?"

"Stop pretending, Maya," Luke said, somewhere between frustrated and worried for his friend. "Apollo's even already mentioned it's Mother's Day today."

Maya just playfully scoffed. "Aw, it can't be Mother's Day! Apollo just had a birthday on Thursday!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "Mother's Day has always been the Sunday after my birthday," he pointed out. "Not that it ever meant anything to me before we started celebrating it with you."

Maya didn't reply, seemingly frozen with a confused smile as she stared at Apollo.

"Mommy, we know you've been avoiding us, ever since Daddy's trial!" Trucy picked up, leaning forward on the table with a pleading look that slowly gave way to tears. "Do... you not want to be our mommy anymore?"

Immediately, Maya had gotten to her feet, rushing around the table to sit at Trucy's side, pulling the teen into a hug. "Of course I want to be your mom!" she insisted, and Apollo was relieved to find no trace of a lie this time. "Three wonderful kids like you? Anyone would be lucky to call themselves your mother!"

While Trucy hugged Maya back, drying her tears, Apollo and Luke gave each other a worried look, shifting on their seat cushions to better face Maya's changed position. "And you don't count yourself in that?" Luke asked.

Maya didn't reply, focused on hugging Trucy. Trucy, her head resting on Maya's shoulder, turned just enough to give her brothers a glance, concerned.

Apollo sighed. 'As the oldest, I guess I'd better start.' "I know I complain a lot," he said. "Whenever you, or anyone, goes on as though we're a biological family, I always point out we're not... I mean, Dad would've been eleven when I was born, and you five. It's physically impossible when it comes to me and Luke."

Maya looked away, though Trucy gave Apollo a glare.

"But, well..." Apollo continued, shrugging. "I mean, it would just be weird to call you 'Mom'... but it's not like I don't think of you as our mother."

At that, Maya looked up in surprise.

"I've never had a mother before," Apollo explained, continuing without pause, "not since I was less than a year old. I..." He paused, wondering how best to put his thoughts into words. "I guess, I've got Dad and you as parents, a brother and a sister... even Pearly as a cousin. That's kinda the closest to a normal family any of us are ever gonna get." He gave Maya a smile. "I've never really said 'thanks' for that. You seem like a pretty great mom to me."

"Who needs a normal mom, anyway?" Trucy agreed with a grin, hugging Maya tighter.

Apollo laughed. "Thalassa Gramarye has a lot to live up to when she finally appears!"

Maya herself didn't reply, giving Apollo a slightly teary warm smile. "Thank you, Apollo," she said. "I... can't say how much it means to hear you say that." She held out a hand to the young man, and he moved over to sit on the floor at her side, being pulled into the hug. Maya even planted a kiss on his forehead, quite a feat considering how much shorter she was.

Luke fidgeted nervously from his seat, seeming slightly awkward. "I... should probably admit upfront, I still could never think of you as my mum, Maya," he said.

"I understand," Maya told him with a smile. "You were very close to your mom. I don't want to get in the way of that."

"I don't think you could, though," Luke replied. "Get in the way, I mean. Before you first channelled my dad, I was convinced he'd be upset about Papa, but he wasn't, and I'm starting to think my mum will tell me the same about you when we finally find her." He looked away, thinking for a moment. "You're... my big sister," he said. "We have fun together, and have ever since we met in Labyrinthia."

At that, Maya giggled, seeing in her mind memories of the nineteen-year-old and the thirteen-year-old who connected so fast they spent their first night after meeting each other wandering the town in search of a missing cat, against the wishes of their respective elders. "You weren't nearly as freakishly tall back then," she joked.

Luke couldn't resist a laugh, partly at Maya's quip and partly at the raised eyebrow Apollo gave her as he heard it (whether he was resisting the urge to point out Phoenix was still taller than both of them or just irritated at the reminder his 'little' brother had outgrown him, Luke couldn't say). "Even so," he continued, "you've been the mother figure in our life ever since the adoption. It's not official, not like Papa... but it's real. It always will be. And that's all that really matters in my opinion."
Maya smiled appreciatively, then waved at Luke with the arm that was slung over Apollo's shoulder. "C'mere," she ordered, and Luke obediently crawled over to the group to allow Maya to pull her arms out from around his siblings to give the young man a tight hug. "I'm more than happy to be your big sis, Luke," she assured him. "I learned from the best how to be one of those!"

Trucy giggled as she joined the hug, and Apollo just smiled as he did the same.
"Oh, I almost forgot!" Trucy cried as the small group pulled out of their hug. "I have a present for you, Mommy!" She shoved a hand into the bag at her hip, then pulled out a golden necklace with a matching pendant, holding it out proudly for Maya to take. "Here!"

The other three all gasped, recognising the distinctive locket in Trucy's hand, the locket that Phoenix had taken from Zak's dead body and passed on to Trucy the night after Kristoph was arrested. "T-Trucy," Maya stuttered, shaking her head, "I can't-!"

"Course you can!" Trucy insisted, grabbing one of Maya's hands and depositing the locket firmly into the palm. "It's mine to give away, and I'm giving it to you. We even already got a photo for it!"

Apollo and Luke shared confused glances. 'We did?'

Although she was still apprehensive of accepting the gift, Maya couldn't help but be intrigued. Holding the locket for all to see, she clicked open the tiny door in the pendant, revealing a small picture inside: Phoenix, Luke, Apollo and Trucy, laughing and being silly in the celebration of the Agency's rebranding. Maya remembered this photo well: She had taken it herself, the night after the trial, on Phoenix's suggestion that they try to get a few family photos of the four Wrights to potentially use in the Anything Agency's advertising. This one in particular was one she snapped without warning, when everyone was hit by the giggles in the middle of their attempts to be serious for the photos. She couldn't remember what had set them all off, but the mere sight of her loved ones being so happy together was enough to make her smile.

Luke looked at the photo in surprise before leaning close to Trucy and whispering, "Pearl isn't in that picture!"

Trucy's eyes widened, a hand clapped to her mouth. "Oh no!" she cried, looking to Maya. "Do we have to take a new one?" she asked. "Pearly isn't in it!"

Maya laughed, unthinkingly holding the locket close to her chest. "Aw, Trucy, I see Pearly all the time!" she assured her. "Besides, I don't think this locket can fit more than four people in that tiny photo!"

Trucy blushed, sharing a relieved glance with Luke (Apollo just rolled his eyes). "I guess it was just made for one person," she admitted, then frowned in thought. "We should have just put Daddy in it, then."

"And who says I don't want you three in it too?" Maya replied, reaching up to pinch Trucy's cheek with a grin, making the teen giggle. "This is a perfect gift!" She paused, looking at the locket in her hands as her smile gradually faded. "But... I really shouldn't have it. This belonged to your father, Trucy." She held it out for the girl to take. "He used it as a memento of you. You should really keep it for yourself, as a memento of him."

Trucy just smiled, shaking her head. "Nope. This one wasn't the one Daddy had," she explained. "This is the one he gave me when I was really little; The one that had Mommy Thalassa's picture in Everyone else froze, staring at Trucy with wide eyes. "It's what!?" Apollo cried.

"We have a bigger photo of Mommy Thalassa," Trucy continued, "and Polly's bracelet, so we don't need the locket! I wasn't wearing it, anyway!"

Apollo tapped at his bracelet for a moment in thought. "That's true, actually," he admitted.

"But still," Maya insisted with a worried frown, "I shouldn't have this. Nick at least deserves it more than me!"

Trucy grinned. "You gotta keep this a secret," she said in a stage-whisper, "but I'm giving Daddy the other locket! We gotta remember to all take a picture together before we go!"

Maya stared for a long moment before giving Trucy a warm smile, her hands closing around the pendant in her palm. "Thank you, Trucy," she said, looking around at the boys to add, "all three of you. This is the absolute best gift anyone's ever given me." Gripping the locket in one hand, she threw her arms around Apollo and Trucy at her sides, leaning forward to try and include Luke despite the shortness of her arms.

Luke, although he was still shooting smiles at his sister, giggled as he pressed his forehead to Maya's, throwing his arms similarly around his siblings. "It's kinda funny," he said. "Apollo and Trucy gave up the locket with their mother's picture in it today... and I gave up a day's search for mine."

Maya was surprised, sitting up to look Luke in the face. "Oh, Luke, you didn't have to come today!"

"No, I did," Luke insisted with a smile. "Finding Mum's going to take a long time anyway; A day off to make sure you're alright won't change anything."

"We tried to talk him out of it too," Apollo cut in to Maya with a grin. "Luke's just too stubborn."

Maya laughed.

Maya wasn't sure if she could wear her new locket around her neck without it getting in the way of her existing magatama and beads, but she had promised her three children she would find a way to wear the pendant somehow. Once the four had pressed their faces together and made big grins for Trucy's phone to take a photo for Phoenix's corresponding locket, Apollo suggested it was time they returned home, telling Luke, "Maybe we could get at least one of the names on that list confirmed today?"

Trucy clung to Maya's arm as they walked back to the meditation room at the front door. "Mommy?" she asked. "Are you and Daddy ever going to have kids together?"

Had Apollo been drinking anything, he was sure he would have spat it out at that.

Maya frowned. "What do you mean? We have you three, don't we?"

"I mean, like, babies!" Trucy explained with a grin. "I wanna be a big sister too someday!"

After a moment of thought, Maya laughed. "Aw, I think that decision's up to your dad, sweetie! I'm all for it, but he's just dragging his legs... and other things!"

Luke and Apollo shared a worried glance as they sensed where this conversation might be going. "Um, can we excuse ourselves from this discussion...?" Luke meekly asked.

"He's got that big thing about 'ruining Kurain's reputation' and all," Maya continued, ignoring the boys' discomfort. "I'm kinda required to give birth to an heir eventually as Master of Kurain, but Nick won't let me have one with him until his reputation gets cleared." She paused to giggle. "You can probably tell I've had this conversation with him quite a few times!"

"Objection! The last thing I wanted to think about today was you and Dad in bed!" Apollo cried, face red.

Trucy giggled, also ignoring her brothers. "Luke was saying earlier we'd have to clear Daddy's name to get him to marry you!"

Maya cooed at the thought, intrigued. "I'm looking forward to that!" she said. "Although, to be honest, we'll probably end up doing what Maggey and Gumshoe did, and having a shotgun wedding once I'm pregnant!" She giggled, giving the amused Trucy a wink. "That'll really annoy the elders, but they can't do anything about it once they've got an heir on the way!"

Apollo sighed, pressing a palm to his face, but Luke was frowning in thought, a finger tapping his chin. "If you two did get married, how would it work?" he asked. "Would Papa have to move up here, or would you be free to stay in the city?"

Maya's smile faded as she thought on the question. "I'm not sure," she was forced to admit. "We'll just have to cross that bridge when we come to it." After a pause, she smiled to herself. "And make sure it hasn't been set on fire by then. I'm not losing Nick in another freezing river!"

My dear Luke,

You are correct that the broad strokes of your father's trial got through to us via Athena. She was particularly worried about you (as was Flora, in fact), almost as much as when you yourself were wrongly imprisoned. I was glad to hear when everything turned out alright thanks to Apollo, although many of those details you gave us sound particularly troubling, especially the ones you would not divulge. I would suspect they relate to this former employer of Apollo's, and how he knew the poor traveller he murdered... but I will not pry. I merely hope you are keeping those secrets for the right reasons, Luke.

As for this re-branding of your agency, I suppose that gives us even more reason to visit you in America some day soon! I was hoping to make it this year, but one of my fellow teachers in the archaeology department had unexpectedly left us; This wouldn't be too much of a problem, except that she was handling the summer courses, and the rest of us are scrambling to organise how we can fill in before finding a more permanent replacement. In any case, I may or may not be available during the summer months to see you in person, although Flora may decide to take Alfendi herself to drop in on you. We shall have to wait and see.

I'm pleased to hear you've started work on your next piece of writing! Are you planning to publish the first? That was your plan from the start, I thought, given all the name changes you were making to distance it from the actual events. As for this next one, I'm sure I can track down some of our friends from the Folsense adventure to get their thoughts on the subject; I heard enough of your conversations with Flora that I think I can guess what kind of details you would want from them, proposed name changes, memories of the events, and the like. I won't do so unless you give the go-ahead, of course.

Flora enjoyed the gift you sent, though I'm sure she has thanked you for it herself in her letter. This letter will surely arrive after Apollo's birthday; Although we do not know him well enough to send a gift, give him our best wishes. I hope it was an enjoyable day for all of you!

I wish you luck if you do indeed restart your search for your mother. I know you only halted it in the first place because you ran out of leads.

Dear Professor Layton,

I'm glad Athena passed on what I told her! She told me she had, anyway. I was more concerned for her when it was me in the detention centre, because I didn't have my phone and it was Apollo who ended up telling her what was happening. With Papa, I kept telling her Apollo would work it out, but I guess she could tell I didn't fully believe it myself, which is almost shameful to admit considering he's my brother.

The details I left out were for a very good reason. The long and short of it is that I'm just paranoid a third party will read these, and I don't want certain things getting out so easily. When we see each other in person, I can explain in full if you remind me.

I'm sorry to hear about the hassle going on at Gressenheller. I was looking forward to your visit, but if you can't make it this year, I understand. We can see each other next year, can't we?

I'm still a little torn on what to do with Curious Village now it's finished. Self-publishing would be easy enough digitally, but printing physical books would be a hassle, and I'd have to advertise it myself, which I'm not sure how to do. Going to a publisher would mean at least three more drafts before they accept it, and they might make me change all sorts of things I don't want to lose. I suppose, now I have the next one to work on (I've decided to title it The Adventure of the Pandora's Box), I can do research into publishers or something and shop around to find out what would work best.

As for talking to our old friends from Dropstone, it doesn't look likely that I'd be able to visit them myself, no. I'm a bit busy at the moment, but the next time I'm working on Box, I'll compile a list of questions and send them in the next letter, so you have something prepared to ask them. Thank you so much for offering to help, Professor!

I'm glad Flora liked it! Twenty-five is a big number to hit, after all! She did thank me in her own letter, but it's always nice to get confirmation on these things! And Apollo said to thank you for thinking of him. He did enjoy his birthday; We all closed the office for the afternoon and went out to explore the city! It was a lot of fun!

It was also Mother's Day this Sunday, so Apollo, Trucy and I went up to Kurain to visit Maya. Coincidentally, it was also the day I thought I'd take Apollo out to start narrowing the search for Mum. We've made some progress, thanks to Apollo's badge and a little persuasion talking about investigating a murder, but I know not everyone is going to be so open with us as the search progresses. Right now, I'm just happy it's going well.

Puzzles are enclosed.

A lone figure wandered out of People Park's front entrance, hands deep in the pockets of his baggy hoodie. The night was especially dark on this dim street, quiet save the distant swooshes of vehicles down the major streets of the sprawling city, so the figure didn't hesitate walking straight out into the middle of the road as he headed to his right. The avenue was rarely used by larger traffic, and had a very low speed limit, as it was shared by pedestrians and vehicles; It wasn't particularly dangerous for the average walker to drop their guard this way. Opposite the park, a large mansion stood, hidden behind tall stone walls, a brilliant jade dragon weaving in and out of fading patterns of yellow, red and black across its imposing surface. In front of its high wooden gates were several cans of bright paint, though they were well out of the way of any passing pedestrians, so the lone passer-by paid them no mind as he continued towards his destination.

An engine roared somewhere ahead, and the man paused, looking up curiously. That can't be something on this street, he told himself... but why did it sound so close?

Suddenly, a pair of lights appeared around the corner ahead. The man raised a hand to his face in an instinctive reaction to the brightness, but didn't have the time to do much more before there was a squeal of tires, the lights weaved away for a moment, and his vision went dark, pain exploding all down his right side as he was thrown against something, a momentary spike of pain in his gut, then tumbling to the ground, loud clangs echoing in his ears. The concrete path splashed as he hit it, feeling cold and sticky on his cheek, and the rattling of metal faded around him as the all-consuming roar of the engine squealed behind... then was gone. Left, stunned, in the silence, the man lacked the energy to move, or to even ponder on what it was, struggling to process what he had just narrowly lived through.

'Phoenix Wright, what have you gotten yourself into this time?' he asked himself.

Somewhere in the distance, loud voices approached, attracted by the explosion of noise outside the park. "Look at this mess!" a husky voice bellowed. "It's gone all over the street!"

'So have I, apparently,' a part of Phoenix, free of the numbness of shock, couldn't resist joking.

Footsteps splashed through the sticky substance on the concrete, and Phoenix felt more than saw the shadow of a large mass crouching at his side. The shadow asked, "Are you alright?" and oversized hands gripped his shoulders; Phoenix feebly tried to push himself up, helped by the firm grip of the deep-voiced man at his side.

"My goodness!" cried the husky voice, and Phoenix managed to turn his gaze up to see a round figure, kimono swishing around her ankles, hurriedly approaching. "Did that car hit you!? Into that pole!??"

Guided by the much bigger man at his side, Phoenix finally stood, heavily favouring his left as his right foot twinged in pain, resisting any weight being placed on it. 'And these two came out of Kitaki Mansion...? Oddly friendly for a pair of gangsters.' He took a quick look around, evaluating where he'd ended up after the chaos of the crash. With a weak smile, he laughed, "Man, the guy must've tossed me thirty feet!'"
Glancing behind her, the woman's eyebrows shot up, either surprised or impressed (Phoenix couldn't tell). "You should come inside," she insisted regardless, indicating the mansion's gate behind her. "A car accident isn't something you should brush off so easily."

Phoenix shook his head, limping out from the taller man's shadow and struggling not to stumble back to the ground, though he tried his hardest not to be too obvious he was cradling his aching right side. "No, I don't want to be a bother," he said. "I'll be alright. I have a job to get to. That Indochine place, on the other side of the river." He gestured down the road, in the direction he had been heading. "I kinda need the paycheck."

A second pair of figures, taller than the woman but nowhere near the height or wide build of the man, had emerged from the gate, and, spotting them, the taller man waved them away. "Back inside!" he ordered. With the duo scurrying away, he turned his shadowed gaze back to the shorter man in the hoodie. "With all due respect, I don't think you're going anywhere in your condition," he said. "There's a hospital not far from here: Hickfield Clinic."

"I've... heard of it," Phoenix replied with a frown. "The former 'Hotti' Clinic, right?" 'Huh, I thought the Kitakis used that Meraktis place around the corner from us. Isn't it closer?'

The taller man nodded. "If you won't come inside, I suggest you go there," he continued. "If nothing else, they can help clean that paint off you."

With a surprised blink, Phoenix reached up to pat the side of his face that had hit the ground, feeling the cold, sticky substance transferring to his fingers. A glance in the light from the streetlamp at his back (not that Phoenix remembered hitting it - the mild pain at the back of his head said otherwise) revealed what was clearly crimson paint on his fingers. 'Geeze, I hope I haven't cut myself and gotten something toxic in my bloodstream... Guess I'm not going to Alden Tae's, after all.'

"I can give them a call," the taller man offered, "so they are expecting you."

After a moment of thought, the injured man nodded. "Thank you. That's very kind of you." Taking great care not to aggravate his throbbing ankle, he slowly turned, pausing only momentarily to lean against the streetlight before limping down the road. At the back of his mind, he noted it was the opposite direction he had been walking before the crash... the same direction he had heard the car disappear. 'Hope this guy doesn't come back to finish the job, then.'

"Ah, but I will need a name to give them," the taller man called, almost an afterthought.

The man in the hoodie halted his irregular stride, then looked back with a small smile. "It's Wright," he replied. "Phoenix Wright." Hoping they didn't recognise the once-famous name, he quickly turned and stumbled away around the corner.

Apollo and Clay's Apartment
Apollo's Bedroom

It had been about an hour since Apollo arrived home after his and Trucy's nightly show, and he had yet to settle down for the night. That wasn't unusual, as he had always been more of a night-owl than early-bird Luke, and it was a trait he shared with Trucy and Phoenix. It was a usual busy Sunday night in the Wonder Bar, the end of the first week of summer holidays for school kids, so there were a lot of younger fans that the next generation of Gramaryes were entertaining by pretending to cut each other into pieces (their split box for the Zig-Zag illusion was just small enough for Apollo, though Trucy hoped one day to be inside it herself) or by playing around with the stuffed animals that stood in for the real ones neither of them could afford to keep to Luke's satisfaction (Trucy's current favourite was a stuffed cat called Bullets, which they shot from a specially-made gun). Once the show was over, the pair left together through the back door, meeting the small crowd that usually gathered there on weekends this busy, and going through the motions of greeting their fans. They had even said hello to Apollo's online friend Knox, who had been in the audience that evening and waited patiently to see his friends before heading home himself. Finally, as they always did, Apollo walked Trucy part of the way home before letting her return to the Agency alone and taking himself back to his apartment, where he promptly locked himself in his room to put away his smaller equipment and his costume as he prepared for bed... not that he had done more than taking off his hat and boots just yet, lounging as he was at his desk with his computer in front of him.

No, what was unusual about that night... was that Apollo's phone was ringing.

The young magician stared at the mobile phone on his desk for several long moments in confusion before hesitantly reaching for it with the nearest hand. 'Who's calling me at THIS hour...?' To his surprise, it was Phoenix's name on the screen, and he was half-tempted to simply hang up ('Isn't Dad supposed to be at a job right now? This HAS to be a pocket-dial.'), but the possibility his father was calling for a very important reason changed his mind. Tapping the button to answer, he held the phone to his ear. "Dad? What are you calling me for?"

"Hello?" an unfamiliar voice replied. "Is this Apollo Wright?"

Apollo momentarily froze. "Y-yes, it is," he forced himself to say, wondering why someone other than his father could be using Phoenix's phone to call him and already finding himself jumping to horrible conclusions. "Has... something happened to my dad?"

"I don't know if you're aware that you're listed as an emergency contact for Phoenix Wright," the voice continued, apparently ignoring his question with a distracted sigh. "He's been admitted into Hickfield Clinic."

'... Oh no.'

"He was hit by a car."

'OH NO."

"His injuries aren't too severe, by some miracle, but he is actively attempting to resist aid and walk out; I highly suggest you talk some sense into him. We're prepared to make an exception to regular visiting hours if you wish to come in tonight-"

"I do!" Apollo loudly interrupted, jumping to his feet and almost tipping over his chair. "I'm coming in tonight!" He paused a second, then hesitantly added, "Um, where's Hickfield Clinic?"

A minute later, Apollo was pulling on his boots as he stumbled out of his bedroom, his phone carefully held between his teeth as he tripped his way towards the front door. "Lay! Uh'm ghoin' ou!" he shouted, hoping his meaning was decipherable (there was a reason he didn't have a Mister Hat of his own, after all).

Behind him, Clay poked his head out of his room with a confused look. "What?"

His boots on, Apollo paused, removing the phone from his mouth and shoving it in his bag. "I'm going out!" he repeated. "My dad's in the hospital!"

Clay's eyes widened in surprise. "What!?" he shouted, dashing out after his friend. "What happened!?"

Apollo turned to face his friend. "Apparently he's fine," he explained. "Call it another example of the Wright Luck, but he got hit by a car and is actively trying to walk it off."

"Geeze!" Clay muttered, wincing sympathetically in spite of his relief that Phoenix was apparently okay. "Well, you'd better check on 'im, then. Lemme know how he is."

"Sure," Apollo agreed with a distracted nod, and quickly left the apartment.

Casual Near-Death Experience

June 14, 9:46PM
Hickfield Clinic
Phoenix's Room

After a few wrong turns and a brief stop to ask directions, Apollo finally located the hospital that held his father. He tried to stay calm as he searched for a rack to lock up his bicycle on outside, then headed in to the reception. It took a bit of arguing before the receptionist on duty would even listen to what he was saying (she kept repeating "Visiting hours are over, come back tomorrow," the moment she heard Apollo say "I'm here to see-!"), but eventually a passing nurse recognised Apollo’s name and specifically allowed the young lawyer to check on Phoenix, if only briefly, giving him a room number that Apollo didn't hesitate to race off and find.

Phoenix looked up from his bed as the door opened, smiling as he recognised the caped young man rushing towards him. "Apollo!" he laughed. "So they did call you!"

"Of course they did!" Apollo cried with no small amount of frustration, running to Phoenix's bedside in the plain-looking room and looking over his father for any visible signs of injury. "They said you were hit by a car!"

Phoenix continued to laugh. "They weren't lying!" he admitted.

Apollo took the chance to take in his father's condition: His well-worn clothes were scruffier than usual down his left side, with his hoodie even sporting brand new patches of black and yellow, Phoenix's hands well hidden in the jumper's front pockets. His shoes had been removed, Phoenix's right foot and lower leg in some kind of hard plastic boot-like contraption that appeared to be keeping it still (Apollo half-wondered if it had been put on to keep Phoenix from walking out). On his head, the cyan beanie seemed to be faring well, but underneath the entire left side of Phoenix's face was stained red, right around a rather large band-aid across his cheek, and Apollo couldn't help but immediately imagine the worst. "Are you okay, Dad?" he quietly asked.

"I'm perfectly fine," Phoenix insisted with a smile. "Honestly, if it weren't for the paint," he gestured to the red stain on his face, then to the black and yellow patches on his hoodie, "I probably would've kept heading to Alden Tae's."

"Paint?" Apollo repeated, blinking in surprise.

"Whoever owns that mansion out the front of People Park," Phoenix explained, "they had some paint tins sitting out along their wall. I think they were repainting the design. When the guy hit me, he threw me into the mess he made knockin' 'em all over." He shook his head with a sad frown. "What a waste of paint."

Apollo stared a moment more before sighing in relief, lowering himself into a chair nearby. "I thought that was a bloodstain on your face," he said. "It's just paint?"

Laughing, Phoenix nodded again. "Sorry to worry you," he said with a sincere smile. "They're pretty insistent about not letting me leave though, so I'm going to be stuck here another couple of days at least." He then raised an eyebrow. "Did you know they don't allow grape juice in here? They allow all the other juices, but not grape! It's ridiculous!"
Apollo just rolled his eyes. 'Don't drink it, then. It's not that hard. If we weren't so careful about checking on it all the time, it'd go alcoholic and you'd be a freakin’ drunkard, anyway.' He refrained from voicing his internal monologue however, his eyes again drawn to the plastic boot, which was far more important than idly mocking his father's drink of choice. "Did you break your ankle?" he asked.

"I don't think so," Phoenix assured him. "It hurts to walk on, so they've x-rayed that, and a few other places, to double-check. Haven't heard back yet, though. Doubt it's more than just a sprain; I managed to get all the way here on it, after all."

Picking up on the brushed-over detail (and deciding to ignore that Phoenix had walked to the hospital on a sprained ankle), Apollo narrowed his eyes at his father. "What 'other places'? What else did they x-ray?"

"What, you're going to ask for the entire grisly list?" Phoenix asked with a grin, ignoring Apollo's frustrated glare in return. Rolling his eyes, he held up his hands (Apollo noticed a few band-aids spread out across those too) and began to count off: "Minor abrasions to face and hands, varied bruising, minor neck pain, injured ankle..." He sighed. "They're testing for blood poisoning or any trace of broken bones, and I wasn't sure if I lost consciousness or not so they're keeping me to make sure I didn't hit my head against that pole too hard, but I honestly feel fine now they've given me painkillers."

Apollo stared, wondering which of his father's ailments on the list was more worrying. "Why might you have blood poisoning!?" he eventually sputtered.

Phoenix grinned, pointing at the band-aid on his cheek, surrounded by the faint crimson stain. "Paint, remember? They're checking nothing got into the cuts."

Apollo warily nodded. "And what's this about hitting your head on a pole?"

"Streetlight," Phoenix explained, rubbing at the back of his head with a small wince. "Think I got knocked into it as I hit the ground."

With a sigh, Apollo lowered his head into his hands. "Do you have to be so casual about nearly getting killed?"

Phoenix just shrugged, watching Apollo. "If it makes you feel better, I could talk about some other time I should have died," he offered, grinning mischievously. "Maybe the time I fell into freezing river rapids from a burning bridge? Or swallowed a tiny bottle of poison? It wasn't even my fault this time!"

Apollo shot his father a glare. "I swear, there's some higher power up there in a love-hate relationship with you," he said. "And for a very good reason."

Phoenix laughed in reply, then calmed down with a thoughtful look. "Listen, Luke and Trucy don't need to know every little thing about why I'm in here tonight," he said, staring off into the distance. "Just tell them... Tell them I just sprained my ankle. He gestured to his cheek. "This stain should be gone by visiting hours tomorrow, and the smaller cuts will be healing up. They don't need to know about anything else."

After a long moment of silence, Apollo nodded in agreement. It struck him that, maybe, Phoenix's casualness and downplaying of his true injuries was just as much a coping mechanism for himself as for his loved ones.
Phoenix smiled, seeing the movement in the corners of his eyes. "Thanks, Apollo."

Apollo hid a smile. "Speaking of telling Luke and Trucy," he said, "I guess you want me to do that?"

"If you could," Phoenix replied, looking up. "They haven't given me back my phone yet. I think I'm being punished for misbehaving." He grinned, giving Apollo a wink.

Rolling his eyes, Apollo decided to ignore the comment. "Luke will be asleep by now," he mused aloud. "If I wake him, he'll probably panic and want to see you immediately, so I'll just text him to call me when he can. As for Trucy," he crossed his arms with a frown, "she should be in bed by now, but probably won't be. I'd better head to the Agency and look after her until they let you out of here."

"Yes, I think it is your turn to do that," Phoenix said with a grin. "Luke babysat her when I was in the detention centre two months back!"

Apollo shot Phoenix a glare, deciding to ignore that too. "And I promised Clay I'd update him once I saw you, so I'll let him know I won't be back tonight while I'm at it," he continued. "As for Maya... she'll probably be asleep, so I guess I should text her to call me, too. Pearly will be with her, so she'll hear from Maya once they've called me." He paused, pressing a finger to his forehead in thought. "Anyone else you want me to call?"

Phoenix rubbed at his chin. "No, I think that's enough family-wise," he decided. "But, once you get back to the office, call Alden Tae's for me. Let them know why I didn't arrive tonight."

"Sure," Apollo agreed, then pushed himself off the chair to his feet. "Actually, I should get going now. The nurse didn't want me in here for long, since visiting hours are over and all."

Phoenix nodded, watching as Apollo gave him a small wave and slowly strolled towards the door. "Oh, Apollo?" he called.

Apollo paused, looking back with a confused look. "Hm?"

"If you see a man introducing himself as either 'Doctor' or 'Director Hickfield'," Phoenix said, a serious stare in his eyes, "with a patch of pink hair and missing teeth... keep him away from Trucy."

Although confused, Apollo nodded, committing the description to memory. "Okay," he said. "See you tomorrow, Dad."

Maya, I need you or Pearly to call me as soon as you get this. Dad's gotten himself hurt again.

Barely a minute after sending off the small message, Apollo was giving up on walking his bike to the Agency and preparing to ride it when he felt a buzzing from the bag on his hip, and quickly halted to retrieve it. "Luke?" he wondered aloud, only to blink in surprise and smile when a glance at his phone screen told him he was wrong. Accepting the call, he held the phone to his ear, continuing his walk with his bike. "Hey, Mommy Maya," he joked.

Maya scoffed from the other end of the line. "What's Nick getting up to now!?" she demanded, skipping any greetings. "Piano and poker aren't dangerous! Has he been arrested for murder again!"

Apollo bit back a laugh. "Nah, nothing quite as special as that," he said. "He only got hit by a car."

"What!?" Maya cried.

"He's fine though," Apollo assured her. "I was just with him; The worst he's got is a sprained ankle."

There was a short pause as Maya mulled over this information. "I guess that's only to be expected with him," she sighed. "Where is he?"

"Hickfield Clinic," Apollo explained. "Visiting hours are nine to six. Will you be able to make it down?"

Maya sighed again. "I'm not sure," she admitted. "We're right in the middle of a very important training session for the acolytes..." She paused again, and Apollo could swear he could hear her biting her lip. "I'll see if I can drop in early tomorrow morning," she eventually suggested. "I'll send Pearly down to help you guys out while he's away."

Apollo didn't think they needed help with anything, but knew Pearl would want to be there if she could, so he didn't object. "Okay. I'm sure Dad will appreciate seeing you anyway."

Maya laughed a little, sounding relieved. "I'm glad he's okay," she said, then hummed thoughtfully. "Y'know, if he's stuck in the hospital, he's gonna need stuff to keep himself busy, isn't he?"

"Um, I guess so," Apollo agreed. "He had a TV in his room, but nothing else that I saw."

"Oooh!" Maya cooed. "Did you see if it had a DVD player attached?"

Apollo had to think - he hadn't exactly been paying that much attention to the old television. "I... think so?"

"Perfect!" Maya chirped. "Okay then, if you're there at the same time as me, I'll see you tomorrow! If not... well, I'll see you when I'm next free!"

Rolling his eyes, Apollo decided to leave whatever Maya had planned alone. "Alright," he replied. "Seeya then."

"Buh-bye!" Maya called, then the phone beeped in Apollo's ear as she hung up.

Kitchen

As Apollo locked the front door behind him, he noted he could see lights on further inside the house and realised Trucy was, as he'd feared, still awake. 'Well. Now I have to try and explain what happened without making her panic and demand to go see Dad right now.' Running through various words and phrases in his head, he made his way through to the office, wondering if the sound of the front door opening and closing had attracted his sister's attention...

And he found out a moment later, when the door ahead of Apollo burst open, and Trucy charged in wearing little more than her strapless dress, wielding one of their prop guns (the comically-large barrel gave it away) and shouting, "You came back, huh!? Well I'd better get a-!" Suddenly, she stopped, staring at her surprised brother in shock. "Polly!!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "What was that about?" he asked, but didn't wait for an answer, continuing through to the kitchen and gesturing for his sister to follow. "You ought to be in bed right now, anyway."

Trucy pouted, crossing her arms as she trailed behind Apollo. "It's summer vacation! I can sleep in all I want!" she argued. "Besides, what are you doing here!? Our show's over, and Daddy's at a job!"

Apollo almost stopped dead at that, causing Trucy to bump into his back before he regained his composure and stepped forward, turning to face her. "Actually, Dad is exactly why I'm here. He's not coming home tonight."

At that, Trucy cocked her head to one side, frowning. "Huh? Why not?"

"It's..." Apollo sighed, mentally kicking himself to just get it out. "First of all, he's fine, I was just with him in the hospital-"

"The hospital!?" Trucy repeated, eyes wide as her hands flew to her mouth in surprise.

"Y-yeah," Apollo admitted, holding up his hands to implore his sister to keep calm. "He kinda got hit by a car, so-"

"Hit by a car!?"

"He's fine!" Apollo repeated, starting to sweat at the thought of how badly he was handling this. "I guess the car just grazed him or something, 'cuz he was actively trying to walk out before they put his foot in... whatever that boot thing was!"

Hearing that seemed to bring Trucy back from the brink of panic, her hands lowering as she frowned in confusion. "Daddy went to the hospital... then tried to leave?"
Apollo nodded. "And after all the trouble of walking there himself, too," he added. "On a sprained ankle!"

Trucy stared for a moment, then rolled her eyes. "That's just like Daddy," she said. "So, we can go see him, right?"

"Not tonight," Apollo replied, relieved that the panic had passed. "We can all go tomorrow, during visiting hours."

"Okay," Trucy said, then paused, thinking to herself. "Have you told Mommy and Luke?"

"I was on the phone with Maya just a few minutes ago," Apollo assured her, beginning to smile. "I've sent Luke a text asking him to call me. He'll be asleep right now. There's no point waking him up just to worry him, and I'm not telling him Dad got hit by a car over text."

Trucy grinned. "Yeah, he's such a worrywart. Like you!"

"Hey, objection!" Apollo cried, giving his giggling sister a glare before letting the jibe go with a sigh. "You should get to bed. I have to call the place Dad was supposed to be working at tonight, explain what happened."

Trucy nodded, and was already heading off towards the stairs by the laundry room before she stopped with a gasp. "Oh yeah! I almost forgot!" She spun around to face the confused Apollo behind her. "I was staying up late because I was doing laundry!"

Apollo glanced at the room behind her, noting the light inside appeared to be on. "Have you not finished?"

"Everything's hanging up to dry," Trucy assured him, jerking a thumb towards the room. "I had to move it all inside." She crossed her arms with a frown. "I don't think we should use the lines out in the alleyway anymore. There's a thief about."

"What!?" Apollo cried in surprise, then sighed, pressing a hand to his face in defeat. "What'd we lose?"

Trucy shuffled awkwardly for a moment or two. "Just the one thing," she replied. "It's..." The rest of her sentence came out as a barely-audible garbled mess, the teen heavily avoiding her brother's gaze.

Apollo raised an eyebrow, taking a step towards his sister. "Truce... what did the thief take?"

"My..." Trucy mumbled, then was silent a moment more before quietly admitting, "My magic panties."

Apollo was too shocked to reply for a moment. "But we only just replaced those!" he cried, remembering her older pair that had finally fallen apart just a month previously. "We need them for the show tomorrow!"

"I know!" Trucy shot back indignantly. "I didn't know they were going to be stolen! They were getting a bit dirty and needed a wash, and they've never been stolen before!"

Sighing, Apollo pressed a finger to his forehead. "Alright, alright," he muttered. "I guess we'll just have to rework the show around them until we can get another pair." He frowned in thought, then looked up at his sister curiously. "Did you know when the theft happened?"

Trucy nodded. "I was still hanging stuff up," she explained, gesturing to the wall on her right, "so I was going up and down the stairs out the back with the basket. Then I heard some of the clips snapping like something was pulled off the line!" She pointed dramatically. "Then I saw him, making off with my panties! So I chased him!"

"You chased him!?!" Apollo repeated in disbelief. "Truce, what if he was some kind of murderer!?!"

"He took my panties!" Trucy cried in protest. "I had to stop him! I was shouting, 'Give those back! Wait!', but he just sped up!" She gestured behind Apollo, to the currently-out-of-sight road perpendicular to the street their office was on, which led directly to the eastern entrance of People Park; Fittingly named Park Street, it was also the road that the alleyway out the back of their home led to. "He ran that way, and crossed the road," Trucy explained, "then ducked into a half-open garage!" She sighed in defeat. "I waited a while, but he'd disappeared... I lost him!"

Apollo sighed, pressing his whole hand to his face. A part of him wondered if the thief knew the blue-and-pink pair of underwear was a prop, but it was probably more likely the guy was an average, though bold, pervert. It made him sick to the stomach to even consider what the criminal might be doing now with their ill-won prize, so he tried to not think about it. "At least you tried, I guess," he admitted, crossing his arms. "We can tell Dad what happened tomorrow, decide if it's worth doing a search or reporting it or something."

Trucy nodded, sticking out her bottom lip. "I'm sorry, Polly..."

"It's fine," Apollo insisted. "There's nothing you could have done, anyway. We'll just have to deal." He rested a hand on her shoulder with a small smile. "For now though, you should get to bed. We wanna be up bright and early tomorrow to go visit Dad in the hospital, don't we?"

Trucy gave her brother a grin. "Yeah," she agreed, then laughed. "Y'know, if Daddy was more badly hurt, I'd be thinking about giving him his Fathers Day gift early."

Apollo laughed, remembering how much trouble they'd gone to preparing Zak's old locket behind Phoenix's back; It was pure luck their father apparently never noticed its twin entwined in Maya's robes, glittering at her hip where she could admire the picture inside any time she pleased. "That's coming up, isn't it? Fathers Day?"

Trucy nodded. "Next Sunday," she said. "We gotta organise sometime this week how we're giving it to him." When Apollo only nodded in return, she stepped back out of his reach and headed for the stairs. "Night, Polly. I'll see you tomorrow."

"See you tomorrow," Apollo replied, giving her a wave. Once she was out of sight, he sighed, his face falling as he turned to the office. 'And now... to call Alden Tae.'

---

Hey, Clay. Turns out my dads fine. They're just keeping him for observation.

Awesome! :D Man he's lucky to be so unhurt by a car crash!

Tell me about it >.>.

I'm at the office now to look after Trucy, so I won't be back tonight. Just a heads up.

Sure dude. Lemme know if you need anything :D
Will do :) .

Good news! They gave me back my phone!

Cool :) I've already called Maya, but Luke's still asleep. I told Trucy when I got home, and I've called Alden Taes about what happened. Maya said she's busy atm but she'll try and visit you tmrw.

You've been busy then ;) Thanks a bunch Shouldn't you be trying to sleep Mr Walking Wounded? ;).

Speak for yourself! I had another favor to ask you actually. I forgot while you were here to ask if you could put together some kind of overnight bag with a change of clothes.

You realise that if Trucy sees me actively leaving she's going to demand she come with to see you.

Then don't let her know ;)

Thanks, that's helpful >.>

You could also mention you won't actually be seeing me. The nurses will likely deliver it to my room.

Alright, I'll find a bag and grab you a change of clothes.

And maybe put in a bottle of grape juice while you're at it?

I'm not sneaking in grape juice for you.

Aw and I thought you loved your dear old dad ;)

Not enough to disobey doctors orders.

Fine, fine. I'll see you and your siblings tomorrow then, Maya too. That reminds me, does Pearls know?

She'll be in Kurain with Maya, so she's probably heard by now. Maya said she'd bring Pearly down with her.

Good, as long as everyone in the family knows. Maybe tomorrow I'll tell the extended family too! Tell your sister good night for me btw.

Condemning myself to a terrible night without my father's love, sure ;).

Sneak me in a bottle of grape juice and maybe I'd feel like wishing YOU a good night as well ;)

Love you too, Dad :).
"Phoenix! You gotta help me!"

"... Guy?"

"My castle's been stormed! My keep's been kept! My noodle stand's been stolen!"

"H-huh!? What!?"

"You had that whole rebrandin' about doin' anything needs doin', right? You gotta find my noodle stand! I'm finished without it!"

"W-wait, calm down... Who'd steal a noodle stand!?"

"Who cares!? It's gone! My livelihood! My keep! My castle! Oh, and it was my pops' pride and joy...!"

"Alright, alright! sigh Don't worry Guy, I'll put the kids on the case. Can you come by our office sometime after nine?"

"Eh? Why can't you get on the case right now!? This is my livelihood we're talking about!"

"Because the sun is barely over the horizon, from what I can see. You not only woke me up with your call, but I can guarantee Apollo, Luke and Trucy are still asleep too. They'll be better able to search with a good night's rest... and once they've seen me and aren't worrying about my health."

"Why? What happened? ... Somethin' wrong, Phoenix?"

"I'm... in the hospital at the moment. It's nothing too serious."

"Ah... Well then, I'll wait 'til around nine, nine thirty, then get to your office. Get well soon."

"I will, thank you."

Phoenix's Room

After being rudely awoken by Guy Eldoon's panicked call sometime around sunrise three hours ago (it was a miracle there was no-one currently in the other bed of his room to annoy), Phoenix had found it hard to get back to sleep. He'd tried turning on the TV at his bedside, but it turned out it wasn't connected to anything, so, unless he was reduced to staring at the static, off it went. The overnight bag Apollo had packed for him had nothing more than a change of clothes and a bottle of water with a sticky note on one side, on which Apollo had scrawled 'Special Grape Juice for big baby Phoenix Wright' and drawn a rough representation of a bunch of grapes; As amusing as Apollo's reluctance to sneak in anything against the doctor's orders had been, it wasn't doing much to alleviate Phoenix's boredom. 'At least if I had a pencil I could use the note to draw on...' In the end, Phoenix found himself passing the time by peeling off the band-aids on his cheek and hands (the cuts on his hands had nicely healed, though there was still a small mark on his cheek where he'd grazed against the pavement), stealing some hand-soap from the bathroom to scrub the last remnants of the red paint from his face, sending occasional texts to Maya begging she sneak in some grape juice when she dropped by, idly flipping through every old file and photo in his Court Record until he was sick of the small computer, and changing into the spare clothes Apollo had grabbed for him... once a nurse had come in and taken his foot out of the boot-like restraint, instead tightly wrapping the ankle with bandages and ordering Phoenix to stay in his room and alert them immediately if he felt any further pain. He had to admit, it had been a relief when he'd heard back from the doctors on the multiple tests they'd done, confirming he was pretty much as uninjured as he'd assured Apollo he was... though they were still reluctant to release him until they'd confirmed no symptoms of whiplash in his neck, and "to give that sprain a chance to heal before you go right back to walking everywhere and anywhere, Mister Wright".

Just as Phoenix was starting to consider counting the seconds on the clock, the door opened, admitting two short women in formal robes, their arms piled high with bulging bags. "Morning, Nick!" the taller of the pair chirped with a grin as she strode to his bedside.

Phoenix grinned, pushing himself into a sitting position. "Maya! Pearls! Thank goodness!" he cried, deliberately being a touch over-dramatic. "A distraction from the crushing boredom of this hospital room!"

Pearl giggled as she placed her burdens on the floor at the foot of the bed. "We brought some things to help you with that too, Mister Nick!"

"I figured you'd mope without someone around to keep you company," Maya picked up with a knowing smile, giving Phoenix a quick peck on the cheek before dumping most of her bags and shoving a hand into one, "so I grabbed you a few things to keep you occupied!" With that, she pulled out her hand to reveal a DVD case tightly clutched in her palm: The Pink Princess, Season 2, Part 4.

Phoenix raised an eyebrow, looking over the 'supplies' the Feys had brought him with concern. "Are all of those bags full of nothing but Steel Samurai DVDs...?"

Maya shrugged. "Almost all of them," she admitted with a grin, laying the case in her hands on Phoenix's lap.

"Oh joy," Phoenix muttered, resisting a sigh. "You sure know how to spoil me, Maya."

"Here it is, Mystic Maya!" Pearl cried, pulling a bag up onto the bed, on a small table surface above Phoenix's legs.

Quietly squealing to herself in glee, Maya leapt on the bag, pulling it open and peering inside. "Here we are! The special stuff! First off..." Reaching both hands into the bag, she soon pulled out a toddler-sized grand piano, painted bright pink and with little more than a couple octaves' worth of keys. She proudly deposited the toy on Phoenix's lap, next to the DVD already there.

Phoenix stared at the tiny piano in disbelief. "You got me... a baby piano."

"To keep your skills up!" Maya insisted with a grin. "Don't want those old man fingers getting stiff, do we?"

After a moment of shocked staring, Phoenix couldn't resist a laugh. "Yeah, guess I gotta keep up my illustrious career pretending to play the piano somehow!"

Pearl smiled, biting at her thumbnail. "I chose the colour. I'm glad you like it, Mister Nick!"
"It's beautiful, Pearls," Phoenix assured the teen with a grateful smile.

Maya wasn't done however, again shoving both her hands into the bag. "And last up...!" She shot Phoenix a wink, then pulled out two green glass bottles, one in each hand, which she held out towards her partner.

Phoenix was amazed for all of a second before he registered the strange white labels on the bottles and frowned. "'Deep Sea Mineral Water'...?" he asked.

Giggling, Maya shoved the bottles into Phoenix's arms, leaning in close and whispering, "Switched the labels. Don't tell anyone, okay?"

Slowly, Phoenix smiled as he realised the true contents of the gift, and he looked up at Maya with a sincere smile. "I love you."

"I know," Maya replied with a cocky grin.

Pearl snuck delighted glances at the pair through her fingers, hiding a smile.

Phoenix chuckled, sharing multiple chaste kisses with his girlfriend as she giggled. "Humble as ever, I see."

"You know it!" Maya boasted, then jokingly pushed Phoenix away, tapping his chest. "Now, I have a little assignment for you, to keep you busy while I'm teaching the acolytes!"

"Assignment?" Phoenix repeated, raising an amused eyebrow. "And exactly what is it you're ordering me to do this time?"

Maya had returned her attention to the bag, this time pulling out an A4 spiral notebook and a pen, which she gleefully held out for Phoenix to take. "I'm getting you to write about the episodes as you watch them!" she explained. "Y'know, thoughts on the acting, the costumes, the plot...! It'll be fun!"

Phoenix hesitantly took the offered stationary. "You... want me to write reports?"

"You bet!" Maya chirped, planting a kiss on Phoenix's cheek. "Better get started, mister! I expect to see that notebook full when I get back!"

Phoenix sighed, though he had trouble hiding a small smile. "This is an elaborate form of punishment for getting myself hit by a car, isn't it?"

Maya just ignored him, signalling to Pearl before the pair began to pull piles of DVDs out of their bags. "We'll get these all organised for you before I go," she told him, "so you can watch them in order!" She briefly paused, looking up to examine the television on the table beside the bed before smiling. "Ah, good, Apollo was right about that thing playing DVDs!" She laughed as she returned to her work. "I'd hate to have to put my classes on hold even longer to go get you something that would work with these!"

Phoenix shook his head, deciding to leave the excited pair to it as he leaned back against his pillow. It didn't seem to take long at all before Maya and Pearl were constructing elaborate piles of the DVDs at Phoenix's bedside.

"Mystic Maya?" Pearl spoke up as she was arranging cases of The Nickel Samurai in the proper order. "When you go back to Kurain, should I wait here with Mister Nick, or head to the agency?"

"You're staying in the city, Pearls?" Phoenix asked in surprise.
Pearl nodded, while Maya explained, "Yeah, I thought she could help the other kids out while you're stuck in here." She shot Phoenix a grin as Pearl giggled, the pair quickly returning to their tasks. "You may as well wait here, Pearly. The others should be here soon, after all."

Luke was happily humming to himself as he emerged into the small kitchen of the apartment he shared with his co-worker, making a bee-line for the fridge. "Morning, Fox!" he cried, giving the bleary-eyed redhead sat at the nearby table a wave.

Fox didn't seem to notice, quite a contrast to her friend in her pyjamas next to his more formal shirt and vest, all ready for work while she was fresh out of bed. "Hey, 'Paw," she mumbled distractedly as a greeting, tightly clutching a mug of coffee in her hands. Not far from her was an abandoned mobile phone, which she was staring at with a frown. "I think your brother's texting you," she said. "He seems... kinda mad."

Luke, his head already in the fridge, looked up with surprise, his prepared lunch already in hand. "He is?" he asked, shoving the cling-wrapped sandwich in his satchel and closing the fridge door. "What about?"

"No idea," Fox admitted with a shrug, turning her worried gaze to Luke as he approached. "I think he's been trying to contact you for a while. Did you mean to leave your cell out here?"

"I never do," Luke regretfully pointed out, sliding into the other seat at their small table and reaching for his forgotten phone. As he unlocked it and navigated to his messages, he mused aloud, "I should probably change up my evening routine so it actually follows me into my room more often."

Fox smirked. "That would be a good idea," she agreed.

Luke gave her a quick smile before turning his attention to Apollo's texts, noting that the first was from the previous night. "'Call me when you get this',' he read aloud. "'It's urgent but not an emergency'." He frowned, his reading turning to mumbles as he looked over the trio of messages, then paused, looking at his screen with an offended scowl. "Well, that's just uncalled for."

Fox was watching Luke with a worried look. "You gonna call him?"

Sighing, Luke looked over to the clock on their microwave. "I guess I should," he reluctantly admitted. "If I'm quick, I can still get to the shelter on time." Fox nodded in agreement, and Luke tapped at his phone screen only a moment more before raising it to his ear, staring off into the distance as he wondered what exactly Apollo was so upset about.

The phone on the other end rang barely once before cutting off, being replaced by the somewhat frantic yell of Apollo's Chords of Steel: "LUKE, YOU BASTARD, YOU BETTER NOT BE HEADING TO WORK ALREADY!"
Luke instinctively pulled the phone away from his ear with a frown. "There's no need to shout," he firmly informed his brother. "And I'm leaving shortly, so make this quick, please."

Apollo sighed heavily. "Fine. You want the short version of the story?" he snapped. "Dad got hit by a car last night."

At first, Luke thought his brother was joking, but it quickly sunk in that Apollo's brief 'explanation' perfectly fit the increasingly frantic text messages, as well as Apollo's reaction when Luke finally called him as requested. "W-what!?" the younger brother breathed in shock, eyes wide. "What happened!?"

"Oh, I'm sorry," Apollo snippily replied, "I thought you were in a hurry."

"You can't just leave it at that!" Luke pointed out, getting out his chair as he felt the sudden urge to pace. "He got hit by a car!?" Already, he was fighting off terrifying images in his head, of Phoenix lying in pieces in a hospital bed... or worse, a coffin. He pressed a hand to his forehead as his breathing sped up; It was becoming a struggle to keep his eyes dry. "Is he okay!?"

Fox looked up in shock, having been listening to the ongoing half-conversation before her with interest. "Someone got run over!?"

Apollo sighed again. "He's fine," he assured his brother, finally sounding more calm and reasonable... and possibly a little guilty too. "If it was serious, I would've called you last night, once I'd been to see him. I wasn't expecting you to take so long to call me back..."

Luke was busy trying to calm his rapid breathing. "You can't just say Papa got hit by a car and follow it up with 'but he's okay'!?" he weakly argued. "Who's okay after getting hit by a car!?"

"Apparently, Phoenix Wright," Apollo replied. "I wanted to get on to you before you left for work in case you wanted to come with me and Trucy to see him this morning. Visiting hours start at nine."

Concerned for her friend, Fox carefully pushed back her chair and stood up, half-extending a hand towards Luke, but she didn't dare to move any further.

At the option presented before him, Luke finally managed to begin to calm down, stood stock still as he considered. "I... don't know if I can right now," he replied, "not during work hours! I-I've already taken time off from the shelter when Papa got arrested, and Duck's relying on me today to be the lone-"

Luke's litany of excuses was cut short when Fox snatched the phone from his hand, putting it to her ear while her friend was still processing what had happened. "Southpaw?" she asked in a business-like tone, but didn't wait for an answer from the equally surprised Apollo on the other end of the line. "He'll be there in twenty minutes." With that, she hung up, pressing the phone back into Luke's hands and holding his fingers tightly with a smile. "I'll take over today, and don't worry about Duck; You know that guy couldn't be mad at you to save his life!"

Fox grinned, releasing her grip on his hands. "I'll tell him what happened. You go ahead and visit your dad."

Once the three Wright kids met up, they didn't waste any time heading to the hospital... though they did waste several minutes pointlessly arguing whether it would be faster to take Luke's car (Luke's suggestion) or just walk (Apollo's idea), before Trucy pointed out they'd be there by now if it weren't for the prolonged fight and dragged her brothers into walking. Once at the clinic, Apollo led them through to Phoenix's room, where they were surprised to find, not Phoenix, but Pearl, sitting on the end of the abandoned hospital bed while the TV behind her blared an episode from one of the numerous spin-offs of the Steel Samurai. Pearl's attention, however, was taken by the other person in the room with her, a short man who looked even shorter thanks to the way he was almost crouching, with a single tuft of bright pink hair on his forehead. He was squinting in Pearl's direction, giving her a grin that showed off all the gaps in his teeth.

"Very important to have regular... examinations, y'know," the strange man was saying, constantly fidgeting as though completely unaware of how odd he was coming across.

Pearl was biting her thumb, humming in thought, when she spotted the trio in the corner of her eye and looked over with a relieved smile. "Apollo, Luke, Trucy!" She slipped off the bed, sidling past the strange man to run and meet them. "I was hoping you'd arrive soon!"

"Sorry we took so long," Luke told her, blushing as he rubbed at his neck in embarrassment. "That was my fault..."

Trucy looked around the otherwise empty room with a frown. "Where's Daddy?"

"He had to go for a morning check-up," Pearl explained. "He should be back any minute!"

As Trucy was nodding in understanding, suddenly the strange man had appeared behind Pearl, surprising the teen and making her jump into her cousin's arms. "Hiya there, kiddo!" he said, one hand wiping at his bottom lip as he fixed his gaze firmly on the two girls, barely sparing the boys a glance. "Cute as a button, you are! Eh he he."

Apollo frowned as he looked the man over, Phoenix's warning from the previous night playing in his head. "Are you the... doctor?" he warily asked.

"Ayup," the man replied. "Doctor Hickfield's the name. Eh he he."

Trucy gave him a wide grin. "Good morning, Doctor!" she cried.

Listening to the alarm bells in his head, Apollo firmly stepped in front of Trucy and Pearl before 'Hickfield' could open his mouth again, making the strange man jump back in surprise as Apollo made full use of the rare height advantage. "Thank you, but we'd rather wait alone for your 'patient' to get back," he firmly told the labcoated man. "Maybe another time, 'Doctor'."

'Hickfield' stared up at Apollo for a very long moment, apparently unused to being so firmly brushed off. "Hrm. Hrmh." Finally, he grinned widely, the single golden tooth in his mouth glinting in the light. "Guess I'll be off then. Eh he?" He shuffled around Apollo awkwardly, Luke stepping out of his way as the strange man made for the door behind them.

Just as 'Hickfield' was taking a step into the corridor beyond, he collided with Phoenix, who was on his way in. Phoenix seemed as surprised as the fake doctor, looking up and taking in Apollo standing in front of Trucy and Pearl before returning his gaze firmly to the man in the labcoat in front of him. "Ah, you. I believe the nurse was looking for you," Phoenix coldly informed 'Hickfield', then limped to one side.

The short man looked around with an almost frightened grin. "Later, Pearl," he said to the young medium, then scurried away.

Phoenix sighed in relief, only to be immediately set upon by Luke and Trucy, who hugged him tightly as they cried "Papa!" and "Daddy!" respectively. He laughed as he hugged them back. "Good to see you, too!"

Apollo smiled at his siblings, taking the chance himself to visually check up on his father's injuries: The worrying red stain on his face was gone, as were the band-aids he had sported the previous night, with only faint marks of where his injuries had been underneath them. The boot was gone from his right foot, replaced by a bandage tightly wound around his ankle. He also noticed that Phoenix had changed into the clothes from the overnight bag Apollo had prepared for him, as there was no longer paint on his hoodie. All in all, he was already looking much better than he had the night before.

"How are you three holding up without me?" Phoenix asked with a laugh, limping over to his bed as Trucy and Luke stayed at his sides. Luke attempted to help him move, but Phoenix only politely held him back. "I can walk, Luke."

"Sorry," Luke mumbled in embarrassment, stepping back to allow Phoenix to reach his bed, which their father immediately moved to sit on, swinging his legs up off the floor. "Are you sure you're okay, Papa?"

"Course I'm sure," Phoenix replied, giving all three of his kids a grin as they gathered around his bed. "Absolutely nothing wrong with me, except for that," he pointed at his bandaged foot, "and that's just a sprain. It'll be back to normal in a week or two."

"I'm glad you're alright, Daddy!" Trucy chirped, then seemed to noticed the swaying, spiralling stacks of DVD cases all along the side of the bed by the TV. "Did Mommy bring these?"

Pearl nodded with a grin. "Mystic Maya thought Mister Nick might get lonely, so we brought him a few things to keep him busy!"

Luke bit back a smile as he pointed to the small piano on the floor nearby. "Is that one of them?" he asked.

"Gotta keep my skills up," Phoenix replied with a wink. "A pro always keeps his weapon close at hand."

Apollo rolled his eyes.

Trucy's attention was already focussed on the TV, and she gasped as she recognised the images on screen. "That's the Sniffling Samurai, isn't it?" she asked, turning excitedly to Pearl. "I didn't know Mommy was collecting that series!"

"As long as she didn't cave in to your childish demands for grape juice," Apollo sighed, "I'm happy."

Phoenix kept his expression carefully neutral, glad he'd had the foresight to hide the two bottles...
Maya had given him. Pearl, to her credit, hid her guilty look behind a sudden interest in the TV.

Luke was frowning in thought, arms crossed. "Papa... what exactly happened?" he asked. "Apollo said you got hit by a car?"

Grinning, Phoenix leaned back against the headboard of his bed. "Ah yes, who could have imagined I'd be the victim of a hit and run...!"

"Oh, he tried to swerve, I'll give him that," Phoenix gleefully continued. "Picture me tossed thirty feet through the air... only stopping when my head hit that telephone pole."

Apollo's siblings only continued to look horrified. "You hit a pole with your head!?" Luke repeated. "Are you okay!?"

Phoenix laughed. "What'd I tell you? Just a sprained ankle." He gestured again to the bandaged foot with a grin. "Every other test they've run has come back negative. I'm fine."

As Luke and Trucy sighed in relief, Apollo fought the urge to slap his father for deliberately teasing them about something they were so genuinely worried about (and for good reason, too), although he was glad to hear about all the tests he remembered being mentioned the previous night. He turned to Phoenix with a thoughtful look. "So, you never got a look at the culprit?"

"Nope," Phoenix admitted, shaking his head. "It'll make insurance difficult, but I'm not sure how we could track him down, otherwise I'd put you three on the case."

"If you won't, we will!" Luke announced, proudly resting his hands on his hips and looking between his siblings. "We'll find that irresponsible driver and make him pay for his crimes!"

"Yeah!" Trucy cheered in agreement. "The Wright Anything Agency never leaves a case unsolved!"

Apollo sighed. "Well, I guess we don't have any clients today anyway," he admitted, then looked to Phoenix with a reluctant smile. "Is there anything you can tell us?"

Phoenix looked thoughtful for a moment, then smiled. "A little." He reached down to the brown bag sitting on the floor nearby, pulling out his old tablet computer. With a few taps of the screen, he had turned it on and brought up a map of the general area, which he showed off to the four. "As you can see, this is the People Park area," he explained, then pointed to a red circle at the south entrance of People Park, standing out against the green of the park, the blue of the river that ran through it, and the dull grey tones of everything else. Next to it was a hand-written note of 'Car'. "I was about here, heading to Alden Tae's, when he came roaring around the corner, sent me flying, nicked a telephone pole... and zoomed away, about that direction," he pointed at the corner to the right of the circle, where the road turned south, indicated by a red arrow. "That was around nine or so. Good luck finding him from that, I say."

Apollo pulled his own Court Record from the bag at his hip, immediately getting the image file copied across.

Luke was examining the remainder of the map, and gestured curiously to two other red circles Phoenix had placed, one labelled 'Home' while the other had a small drawing of some kind of cart. "So what about these?" he asked.

"The middle one, obviously, is the Agency," Phoenix explained. "I marked it so you'd know where
The four teens and young adults exchanged surprised glances. "We do?" Trucy asked.

Apollo couldn't resist a hopeful smile. "Is it a legal thing!?!"

Phoenix laughed. "Unfortunately, no," he replied, trying not to look too amused as Apollo's face fell. "If he wasn't at the office when you left, he'll probably be there by now. You can go and get the details from him."

"You can't tell us what it is?" Luke asked.

"Missing item hunt, basically," Phoenix replied, deciding to go easy on them. "The item itself is... rather unusual, though."

Trucy turned to Pearl with a grin. "Are you going to join us, Pearly?"

Pearl thought a moment, then shook her head with an apologetic smile. "I'll stay at the office," she explained. "I could keep it clean while Mister Nick is here and you're all out searching!"

"Holding down the fort: An excellent idea!" Luke decreed, to Pearl's pleasure.

Apollo, meanwhile, had finally finished copying Phoenix's map (complete with signature 'PW' and a small fire bird in the corner) onto his own Court Record, carefully looking over the three red circles. "That makes three tasks for today," he announced. "First, the car that hit Dad... Second, the client waiting for us at the office..." Finishing his task, he locked the small computer and shoved it in a pocket. "And third, Trucy's panties."

Trucy nodded sagely, but everyone else gave the pair confused looks. "What about her panties...!?" Phoenix asked.

Apollo gave Trucy a look, and she sighed morosely. "They got stolen last night," she admitted.

Phoenix stared a moment more before slapping a hand against his face. "Oh no, that's awful!" Pearl gasped, giving Trucy a sympathetic look.

Luke still looked confused. "W-why... How did someone steal a pair of your underwear!?"

Apollo shook his head. "No, the Magic Panties," he explained. "One of the props in our show?"

Luke thought for a moment. "Oh! That makes sense," he said, then looked to Trucy with a frown. "What happened?"

"I put them through the wash last night with all our other laundry," Trucy meekly explained, fidgeting with her fingers, "but somebody grabbed them off the line when I had my back turned."

"Didn't we just replace that!?" Phoenix asked, looking up with an exasperated frown. "Trucy, those panties cost a lot of money!"

Trucy just continued to fidget, biting her lip as she looked away.

"That's why we're hoping to find them today," Apollo pointed out. "If worst comes to worst, we'll just rearrange the show without it, but since Trucy was able to chase the guy-"

"You chased them?" Pearl repeated in awed surprise, watching her younger cousin. "That was so brave of you, Trucy!"

Trucy smiled at the praise, gaining the confidence to look up at her family again. "Yeah, I heard him pull my panties off the line as I was on my way up the stairs!" she boasted. "I turned around, saw him running off, and ran right after him!" She held out an arm in an imitation of her side of the chase. "'Wait!' I shouted! 'Give those back! I need them!' But he didn't listen, just kept on running!" Her hands curled into fists, held close to her chest as she gave her family a fierce look. "Eventually, he ducked into a garage... and disappeared! I'd lost him!"

"In other words," Apollo cut in, hoping to end his sister's overly dramatic retelling there, "the moment we have any spare time, we'll find this garage and, hopefully, a lead on the thief."

"And my panties!" Trucy firmly added.

"And the magic panties," Apollo agreed.

Phoenix took a deep breath, thinking for a moment. "Sounds like a plan," he agreed, then smiled. "For now though, the four of you had better get back to the office. Don't want to keep our client waiting."

"You can count on us, Papa!" Luke cried with a grin, spinning around and charging out of the room. Trucy squealed in glee as she followed.

Pearl gave Phoenix a small bow. "Let us know if you need us, Mister Nick!" she said, then rushed to follow.

Apollo was moving to join his siblings and cousin, but paused at the door, looking back as his father settled in to watching the TV. "Dad?"

Phoenix looked back in surprise. "Hm?"

"All those tests definitely came back negative?"

Phoenix paused, then smiled. "Definitely," he said. "No trace of blood-poisoning, no bones broken, I haven't shown any sign of brain-damage or whiplash... I'm fine. Just a sprained ankle."

Apollo stared at Phoenix for a few moments before allowing himself to sigh in relief, returning the smile. "Okay. See you later, Dad."

"Check in on me if you need help," Phoenix called in reply.
As the four approached the stairwell leading up to their home and work space (or home-away-from-home, in Pearl's case), they quickly caught sight of a tall man in white leaning against the nearby wall, a crimson bowl sitting upside-down on his head and noodle-like hair spilling out all around his long face. When he spotted the approaching group, he straightened up with a frown, shaking a fist at the youths. "Hey, hey, hey! How long you planning on making me wait, eh!?"

Apollo shared a surprised look with Luke before breaking into a run towards their family friend. "Mister Eldoon!" he cried, making sure to give the man a smile as his siblings and cousin hurried to follow. "Good morning!"

Eldoon's stern look faded as the kids caught up. "Hey there, Pollo, Trucy-doll... and you two, Luke and Pearly, right?" He gave Apollo a wry smile. "Sounds like your pops had a bit of a rough spot, eh?"

Trucy sighed. "All's well that ends well, I guess."

Luke thought a moment. "Are you our client, Mister Eldoon?" he asked. "The one Papa told us to meet?"

"That'd be me," Eldoon replied with a nod. "The boss told you what I need, right? Don't let me down now, Pollo!"

Apollo opened his mouth to respond, then paused in thought. "Let's talk about it inside, shall we?" he decided, then turned to Trucy. "Truce?"

"I'm on it!" Trucy cried, giving Apollo a salute before charging up the stairs.

Once the small group was inside, Pearl was the first to charge off, announcing "I'll prepare some tea!" as she disappeared in the direction of the kitchen. Luke did a circuit of the office, making a valiant effort to tidy up a little despite the seemingly-by-design messy nature of the room. It didn't help that his efforts were hampered by Apollo, Trucy and Eldoon coming in right behind him, watching him run around for a moment or two in vague confusion.

Trucy shrugged, then gestured to the red couches as she invited their visitor to sit down with a wide grin. "Could you tell us what the problem is, Mister Eldoon?" she asked.

Eldoon chuckled as he lowered himself onto the seat. "Anything for you, Trucy-doll!"

Apollo noticed Trucy bouncing into place on the couch opposite Eldoon, and moved to join her. Luke, apparently noticing that business was happening, abandoned any further efforts to neaten up and ran around to copy his siblings, sitting on the other side of Trucy from Apollo.

"I'm afraid to say..." Eldoon explained with a frown, crossing his arms. "My noodle stand was stolen last night."

"What!?" Trucy cried.

"Stolen...!?" Apollo repeated, shocked.

Eldoon nodded morosely. "My stand! Gone!"

Luke had been frozen in surprise, but now frowned determinedly and pulled his notebook out of his satchel, preparing a pen. "What exactly happened, Mister Eldoon?" he asked. "Tell us everything you know!"

The older man sighed, then began to recount his tragic lament. "It was last night. I was doing my rounds, blowin' my whistle." He tapped the harmonica hanging around his neck somewhat proudly. "I closed up my stand for the night and parked by the house... then, this morning, dark 'n' early..." He shook his head. "It was gone! My keep! My castle!" He wailed rather dramatically.

Apollo frowned, a finger pressed to his forehead. "Do you know who might have taken it?"

"I don't care!" Eldoon practically barked in reply. "Without that stand, I'm finished!" He groaned, all the anger fading away as he seemed to almost deflate. "All my noodle bowls were in there, too..."

Trucy's hands were still pressed to her mouth, wide eyes shining. "That's the saddest thing I've heard all day!" she declared.

"You know it," Eldoon muttered.

Luke finished scribbling the last of his notes in his book, tapping the end of the pen against his chin. "You just want us to find the stand?" he clarified. "Not who took it?"

Eldoon nodded, giving the trio a stern stare. "Yep! And the day you bring my baby back is the day you feast on as many noodles as you want!"

Apollo tried not to visibly wince; He had yet to warm up to Guy Eldoon's particular brand of especially salty noodles, and he was beginning to doubt he ever would. "You can count on us, Mister Eldoon," he said.

Luke was still frowning in thought. "If you do have a thought about who might have taken it, though," he explained, "that would be a good lead in finding the stand. Do you really have no idea?"

Eldoon shook his head. "Gonna have to leave that part to you three," he replied, then pushed himself to his feet. "I live right 'round the corner, on Park Street," he told them as they also stood up. "Can't miss my little shack; You drop by if you need any more info, 'kay?"

"We will, sir!" Luke promised.

"Get it back today if you can," Eldoon continued with a stern look. "I got noodles to make!"

Apollo nodded. "Yours isn't our only search with a deadline today..."

"Don't you worry about a thing, Mister Eldoon!" Trucy promised, giving the man a cheerful salute. "The Wright Anything Agency is on the case!"
Eldoon was smiling at her and about to say something when the door to the kitchen opened, and Pearl stepped in, a single cup in her free hand (the other was on the door handle). "Tea's ready!" she announced. "How many people want it?"

"Not me, Pearly-girl," Eldoon replied, hand held up as he moved away from the couch. "I'll be headin' home now." As he headed for the door, he pointed at the Wrights with a warning look. "Remember, find my stand or there's an empty bowl in yer future!"

"Er, right," Apollo mumbled.

Luke and Trucy shared confused glances as their client left the room. Not long after, they could hear the click of the front door as it closed behind him.

Pearl clutched the cup in her hands, looking worried. "So, um... does anyone want tea...?"

Luke stepped away from the couch, moving towards Pearl with a smile. "If you've gone to all the trouble of preparing it, I'll definitely have some," he assured her.

Apollo nodded with a sigh, following his brother. "Yeah, we may as well work out our battle plan of what to do first."

"Alright!" Pearl said with a relieved smile, turning back to the kitchen. Luke and Apollo followed her.

Trucy giggled, bouncing after her brothers. "Things have certainly picked up, haven't they?" she marvelled. "We had no work yesterday, and now we have three cases!"

"Yeah, and two of them are us," Apollo pointed out with a frown.

"I heard what happened to Mister Eldoon's noodle stand," Pearl said with a sad frown as she poured out her green tea into four cups, each wildly different in appearance and scrounged from the Wrights' pieced-together kitchen supplies. "It doesn't sound like you have very much to go on."

Luke sat at the kitchen table, his notebook held out in front of him as he studied his notes. "We have enough for a start, at least," he pointed out. "For Papa's accident, there's the scene of the crime: The southern entrance to People Park."

"I don't think we're going to find anything there, though," Apollo sighed, sitting near Luke at the table. "We're looking for the car that hit him, and it sped away."

"You never know, it might have left something at the scene of the crime!" Trucy pointed out, bouncing into her chair next to Apollo as Pearl came out from the kitchen with two of her cups, leaving them with Luke and Trucy. "Thanks, Pearly!"

Apollo sighed as Pearl went back into the kitchen for the last two cups. "So what about the stand theft?" he asked Luke. "What possible leads do we have on that?"

"Well, the crime scene," Luke admitted, looking a bit sheepish. "Again, we'll have to see if the thief left anything telling behind."

"If only you had eyewitnesses," Pearl sympathised, emerging from the kitchen with a cup she left in front of Apollo. "At least then you'd have some idea who the thief was," she continued as she slid into the last empty seat, next to Luke.

"The Magic Panties too," Luke added. "Our only lead there is this garage where Trucy lost the thief when she chased after him."

Trucy nodded. "I can show you where that is, too!" she said. "It's on Park Street, same as Mister Eldoon's house!"

Apollo sighed. "I suppose there at least we could kill two birds with one stone," he admitted. "Check out the garage and the scene of the stand theft at the same time."

Luke was frowning in thought, again staring at his notes. "It kinda bothers me though," he said. "All three of our cases happened in such a small area, and all on the same night. Might they be connected?"

As Apollo and Pearl mused over the thought, Trucy giggled. "This is so exciting! We're like real detectives! Ooh!" She bounced in her chair, giving her brothers an excited grin. "We should add, like, 'private investigators' to our fliers!"

Apollo frowned, arms crossed. "I'd prefer as little of these jobs as possible, thanks."

"It is a bit like all the cases I helped the Professor on when I was a kid," Luke admitted with a smile. "On a much smaller scale, of course."

"Then why don't you head the investigation, then?" Apollo replied as he looked away, barely hiding the bitter tone that crept into his voice. "Since you have experience in this kind of thing and all."

Everyone stared at Apollo for a few tense seconds. "I wasn't aware anyone was heading this investigation," Luke calmly told his brother. "Besides, all of us present except for Trucy have valuable experience in this kind of thing; I'm not special in that regard."

After another lengthy pause, Apollo sighed, forcing himself to calm down. "Yeah, sorry. I just... I guess everything's just getting to me today."

Luke gave him a smile, nodding in understanding. "That's alright. Why don't we take a break here with our tea before we head off?"

Apollo gave a half-smile back, uncrossing his arms to grab his cup. "Sure. We can start on Park Street, since it's closer and everything."

Trucy hid a sigh of relief, turning to Pearl sitting across from her. "Hey Pearly, are you sure you're not coming with us?"

Pearl shook her head, looking apologetic. "I'd better not," she said. "You all seem to have this in hand. Plus," she smiled, "someone needs to look after the office and Charley while everyone's out."

"Aww," Trucy mumbled in disappointment.

Apollo gave Pearl a smile. "We'll try not to take too long," he promised her.

Pearl smiled back.
Apollo was in the lead as he, Luke and Trucy crossed the road onto the far side of the street Eldoon lived on. This was something new to all of them, as they usually ventured onto Park Street only to head to People Park itself, the eastern entrance the road lead directly to being the closest to their home at the Agency. They stayed on the pavement to avoid the passing traffic, crossing a side-street to where a very sparkly building sat on the corner, its entrance hidden under a loud archway that shone gold in the mid-morning sun. Between them and the entrance of the building was a half-open garage door, almost hidden behind a police car parked in front of it.

Trucy gasped, pointing at the garage. "That's it!" she cried, tugging on the nearest sleeve (which was Luke's) and bouncing in excitement. "Polly, Luke, that's where the thief went!"

"Behind the police car?" Luke asked, confused.

"Well, obviously the police car wasn't there last night!" Trucy pointed out. "It must be here to find my panties!"

Luke raised an eyebrow. "But you haven't reported the theft to the police," he replied. "Why would they be looking for them?"

Apollo frowned, examining the building. Unnoticed by his bickering siblings, he crept forward, getting a better look at the sparkling entrance. Up a red carpet, below the golden archway above the tiny porch, a sign proudly boasted 'Meraktis Clinic'. 'Looks more like a casino parlour than a hospital...' Beneath, a wide set of glass double doors hung, some kind of metal stand set up to the side. Apollo stepped forward into the shadow of the archway to get a closer look, only for the doors to suddenly open, a pink-haired police officer poking her head out.

"Sorry sir, no going into the clinic today," the officer warned.

Apollo blinked in surprise, stepping back automatically. "Why?" he asked. "Did something happen?"

"Huh?" the officer replied, then hurriedly shook her head. "Oh, no. Nothing to see here. Move along." She waved at Apollo, chasing him away off the stairs. "You'll have to find someplace else to play doctor." With that, she closed the door and disappeared back inside.

Apollo stared dumbfounded at the place the officer had been. 'Do I look the right age to be 'playing doctor'!?' He was startled out of his thoughts by a tap on his arm, and looked over to see that his conversation with the officer had attracted Luke and Trucy, the latter grinning up at him as she turned her tapping of his arm into a cheerful wave.

"A clinic, huh?" Luke mused with a frown, reading the sign. "I'd understand an ambulance outside a clinic, but a police car?"

"Maybe they're tax evaders!" Trucy gleefully suggested.

Apollo sighed. "We need a little more info on this place," he said. "Trucy's thief might still be in there, after all."

"Yes!" Trucy agreed. "We need to check out that garage!"

Luke was frowning in thought, then seemed to notice something behind Apollo and smiled. "We could ask Mister Eldoon," he suggested. "He's their neighbour, after all."

'Neighbour?' Apollo turned around and, to his surprise, saw a shack of a house sandwiched between the flashy clinic and the building on the other side. Out the front, sat in a chair next to a sleepy-looking dog lying in its doghouse, was Guy Eldoon, apparently dozing off in what little sunlight reached his property past the bulk of his suspicious neighbour. "That's Mister Eldoon's house...?"

"You didn't know?" Luke laughed. "He lives around the corner from us and you two eat his noodles almost every single night!"

Apollo shot Luke a glare.

Trucy skipped past her brothers to the sleeping Eldoon, stopping in front of him with a wide grin. "Hi, Mister Eldoon!"

With a snort, Eldoon woke up, looking around in confusion before registering Trucy in front of him, Luke and Apollo approaching behind her. "Ah, there you three are!" he cried, pushing himself to his feet. "Well, you find anything yet?"

Apollo tried not to look guilty. "Well, um, no. Not yet."

Eldoon scoffed, unimpressed. "The longer you loaf around here the saltier your victory bowl gets, just remember that!"

Apollo resolved to quietly dump his 'reward' in a bush once Eldoon wasn't looking.

Luke almost seemed to squeal with glee as he noticed the dog sleepily watching them from its doghouse. "Mister Eldoon, I didn't know you had a dog!" he cried, rushing around to kneel at the animal's side.

Eldoon laughed. "Ah yes, you're the vet, aren't you? 'Er name's Spoon."

"Hello there, Spoon," Luke said to the dog with a grin, and she quietly grunted in reply as she smiled up at him. Luke giggled, and slowly began to pet her on the head.

Trucy frowned. "Spoon doesn't seem so lively," she pointed out.

"She didn't get her bowl of salty broth this mornin', that's why," Eldoon explained with a morose sigh. "Poor lil' thing."

Luke looked up in shock, but apparently elected not to wail on their client for not feeding his dog correctly. Instead he caught Apollo's eye, glancing repeatedly behind the lawyer.

Apollo frowned for a moment as he wondered what Luke was asking, turning to look behind him. His eye was caught by a large tarp, the bright blue contrasting with the brown of the house and its generally worn down surroundings, and he stepped over to pick it up, noticing it didn't appear to be covering anything.

"That's the place! Right there!" Eldoon crowed, following Apollo and gesturing to the area in front of an outside kitchen unit, where the tarp had been discarded. "That's where I kept my stand.
Covered all nice 'n' purty with that blue tarp there!

Apollo thought a moment, then carefully placed the sheet of plastic back on the ground. "I see."

"You see?" Trucy repeated, almost surprising Apollo as he noticed her behind him again. "What? Did you figure out why it was stolen!?"

"Well, no," Apollo admitted, "but it does suggest that the thief knew what they were looking for. They clearly knew what was under that sheet."

Eldoon scratched his chin thoughtfully. "So it wasn't one of those casual drive-by stand snatchers, you mean?" he asked, then gave Apollo a smile. "Not bad, sonny-boy. Not bad at all!"

Apollo couldn't resist a proud grin.

Trucy's attention was caught by something crimson lying on the ground, and she jumped over to grab it, spinning the item in her hands. "Mister Eldoon, this is one of your bowls, isn't it?" she asked.

Eldoon looked over to see what she was holding and gasped, jumping over the tarp to her side. "Hey! It is!" he cried, taking the bowl as Trucy offered it to him and sniffing the inside, following it up with a satisfied sigh. "Smells like noodles... Pretty soon it's gonna taste just like noodles!" He turned to Apollo, holding the bowl out. "All my other bowls got taken away with my stand! Get it back for me sonny-boy, I'm beggin' ya!"

Apollo nodded, taking the bowl. "We will, Mister Eldoon, don't you worry." He leaned down and placed it carefully on the tarp. "Actually, I was curious... You've told us when you discovered the cart was missing, but when did you last see it before that?"

Eldoon hummed as his face scrunched up in thought. "Ooh, I reckon it was right before ten PM," he said. "I came home, washed my bowls and gave the wheels a squirt of grease... then I went inside."

"So it disappeared this morning?" Trucy wondered, tapping her mouth.

"Early this morning," Eldoon replied. "Before the sun rose."

'Hence the "dark 'n' early" comment earlier,' Apollo thought.

"I'm washed up on the salty shores of ruination!" Eldoon lamented, turning his face to the sky. "That stand had my whole life in it... nay, my whole being!" He sighed, looking down to the single bowl on the tarp. "If you don't find that stand today... then I'll be forced to walk the streets peddling that bowl... my last bowl."

Apollo wasn't sure how he could reply to that, sharing a glance with Trucy. "Well, we'll do our very best to find it," he promised. "We did have one more question though." As Eldoon gave him a curious look, Apollo gestured to the neighbouring clinic. "Do you know what happened next door? There's a police car out front..."

Instantly, Eldoon's demeanour changed, his self-pitying sorrow turning to anger in the blink of an eye. "Feh! Probably gave someone food poisoning, I'll bet!" he scoffed, crossing his arms. "That police car got here this mornin', actually. I asked what they were up to, but they wouldn't even tell me, the neighbour! Feh!"

Trucy was humming in thought, but Apollo resisted the urge to roll his eyes. It was clear, whoever the 'Meraktis' of the neighbouring clinic was, he didn't get on with Eldoon.
"Not that I was surprised much," the noodle seller was continuing. "That doctor works for the wrong crowd. It was just a matter of time 'fore he got what was coming to him. Feh!"

Apollo frowned. Now there was an interesting tidbit. "The 'wrong crowd'...?" he repeated.

Eldoon paused, apparently surprised he'd let the phrase slip, then waved dismissively at Apollo, his anger fading. "Never you mind about that," he insisted.
It was a grand room. It reminded me the most of a library, every visible wall covered by a bookcase bulging with books. The roof above us was made of glass, the ominous dark clouds blocking any view of the sky, and the skeleton of some kind of pterosaur was hanging off it.

At the end of the room, we saw him: Leon Bronev. He was sitting behind a large desk, full of artefacts and papers, but he stood up as he saw us come in. "Well, well! At long last, here you are. How do you like this Nest of ours?"

The sight of Bronev was too much for Professor Sycamore, because he finally snapped, jumping forward with that fierce look in his eyes: "Bronev! You soulless monster! I'll make you pay for what you've done!"

Bronev just laughed. "Hahaha! Ah, brought some extra baggage with you, I see."

Professor Sycamore visibly bristled, but kept himself under control.

"But I have no interest in the brayings of fools. No, Professor Layton, you are the one I have been waiting for." He held out a hand, and we were all too shocked to reply as we realised what he was about to ask: "I would like to extend an invitation to you... to join Targent."

"I beg your pardon?"

Professor Sycamore scoffed. "This is an absolute joke! Don't listen to him!"

Bronev was still ignoring him, though. "Don't feign surprise, Layton," he said. "You're an archaeologist after all; One who has seen the Azran ruins, and knows their significance. Power and wisdom beyond anything that mankind possesses today! You cannot tell me you are not tempted!"

The Professor stood for a long moment. "The advancement of man's knowledge is a worthy goal," he admitted, "but not one that should come at the cost of the basic human right of freedom."

"Such a noble sentiment," Bronev replied, though he was scoffing at the idea. "However, you are also here today because you seek the Azran eggs. What difference is there, really, between you and me?"

Professor Sycamore snapped again: "We are nothing like you! We understand the importance of free will! Why would we ever want to be your slaves!?"

"Free will? Pah! Are you so attached to your independence you'd forgo the benefits of working together for a greater goal?" He shook his head. "No matter. Let us not dwell on our disagreements. How about... a little game?" He pulled a small box from a drawer in his desk. "This one is a favourite of mine, a simple coin game."

"Wait, a game!? Can we play? Huh? Can we? Pleeeeaaaase?"

Oh, um, I guess so... It's more of a puzzle actually, but it is fun! How many coins do we have?

"Ergh, do we have to? It's holding up the story! And we know the Professor would have won it, anyway!"

"But I wanna play! Luke will tell us the answer if we don't do it now!"

"Just say the Professor won and move on! It's not that hard!"

"But-!"

He... does have a point, Trucy.

"Awww..."

I won't say anything about the coin game itself, so you can figure it out on your own... But remind me later and we'll play it together, okay?

"Okay!"

"THANK you."

Now, where was I...? Oh, yeah, the Professor won the game, naturally, leaving Bronev staring in shock! "I believe I have won. Now, the Azran egg was the prize we agreed on, was it not?"

Bronev wasn't happy, but he calmly packed up his game. "I suppose I have no choice, do I? You can have the egg."

I couldn't resist a small cheer at that, but Aurora looked like she was too scared to really react, and Emmy was still glaring off to one side; I don't think she'd even noticed.

"But before you start to feel smug, I have something I'd like to show you." Bronev smiled confidently, left his box of coins on his desk, then picked up a small remote that he pointed at the window. A shade rolled down automatically, and a hidden projector somewhere in the room switched on to point at it: It was Mister and Missus Layton, the Professor's parents!

"Oh no!"

They were sitting at a table in a garden, enjoying a cup of tea and totally unaware they were being filmed. Their discussion echoed from speakers somewhere in the room: "Don't you know what day it is today? It's the day we brought little Hershel home! More than thirty years ago now!"

"So, his birthday?"

"Shhhh! You're ruining it, Polly!"

"... What's that look about, Luke?"

The Professor was frozen in shock and fear, unable to make himself speak.

"What a charming old couple they are," Bronev was saying. "You must be very fond of them, Layton."

It was beyond obvious this was one of Targent's threats. "What do you intend to do to them?" the Professor asked.

"Nothing, if you accept my invitation."
Professor Sycamore had been watching sternly. "Don't pay any attention, Professor," he called. "It's a trick."

Bronev laughed. "Hahaha! How tiresome you are! Listen to any more of his drivel, Layton, and I'll have no more mercy for you than I had for him. The choice is yours: What will you do?"

The Professor suddenly seemed a lot calmer, thinking for a moment. "No," he replied. "I will never join Targent."

Professor Sycamore was surprised, but Bronev just laughed again. "So you don't really care for your parents after all! And I thought you were such a soft-hearted man! So you won't accept my invitation. Suit yourself. I won't coerce you; It's much more fun to just unleash you on the world and see what you'll do." From his pocket, he took out a small blue object-

"The Azran Egg!"

"Oh goodie."

Yep, the egg! He tossed it at us, and I caught it, but I quickly handed it over to Aurora.

"Be warned," Bronev continued. "Everywhere you go, I'll be one step ahead of you. So long, boys!" With that, he turned and left through a back door.

The Professor was still shaken; I ran to his side. "Professor? What's going to happen now? Are you sure that was...?"

"I don't know, Luke," he admitted. "But that footage wasn't live... thank goodness."

"It wasn't?"

"That party took place last week. I was sorry to miss it. In fact, I spoke to my mother on the telephone just yesterday. Ma and Pa are perfectly fine... for the moment, at least."

"What a happy coincidence you called them so recently," Professor Sycamore said.

"I must hope that Bronev is too focussed on the Azran to follow through with his threats," the Professor continued. "The thought of him hurting my parents... He had me so shaken I was fooled at first, you know. If Professor Sycamore hadn't interjected, I fear I would have given in." He turned to Professor Sycamore and tipped his hat. "Thank you, Professor. I am extremely grateful."

"It was nothing. I am familiar with Targent's trickery. Speaking of which," he gave the egg in Aurora's hands a suspicious look, "I wonder if this egg is just another trick?"

Aurora shook her head, finally giving us a smile. "It's real," she said. "The last aura stone." She thought for a moment, then looked sad. "Professor, once I release the power of the aura stones... I may not by myself any more."

"You have got to be kidding me."

"Shhhh!"

We were all surprised. "Are you sure?" the Professor asked.

Aurora nodded. "Ever since we entered this tower, I have had a very strong... feeling."

"The feeling of bullcrap?"
"Polly!"

"Not happiness or sorrow or fear... but a compulsion. To follow my mission to its completion, to remember my duty as the Azran emissary. I feel... a great gulf between myself and all of you."

Professor Sycamore gave her a kindly look, resting a hand on her shoulder. "Do not worry, Aurora; You are more than just the Azran emissary, but also our trusted companion and friend. Whatever anxiety grips us, we face it together, as one."

"Do you really mean that, Professor Sycamore? Professor Layton?"

"Of course," the Professor insisted. "No matter what happens, we all believe in you, Aurora."

Aurora seemed relieved, all of us giving her encouraging smiles. "Thank you," she said. "Your words have given me strength. I'm ready to activate the aura stones now."

We had to go outside to do it, since Aurora said there wasn't room in Bronev's office, and we didn't want to wait until we could get out of the Nest. She walked out into the open space of the courtyard on the top of the tower, raised the five eggs into the air, and said, "O five stones of aura, hear the call of the emissary! Reveal unto the world your true form!" Her eyes, like the five eggs, all glowed a brilliant blue, her hair flowing like she was underwater. The eggs, they began to float, spinning in a circle as they-

"Okay, that's it!"

Luke and Apollo's Room

Luke looked up in surprise as his brother got to his feet. "Apollo?"

Trucy, sat at Luke's side on his bed, pouted at Apollo. "What are you doing, Polly?" she demanded.

Apollo rolled his eyes. "These dumb little ancient artefacts have the ability to float now?" he asked.

"They're not 'dumb'!" Luke protested, trying not to be offended. "And they weren't just floating; They were transforming themselves into a-!"

"Transforming?" Apollo scoffed. "Okay, now I really have heard it all."

Luke was too shocked to reply.

Apollo crossed his arms, raising a sceptical eyebrow at his sister. "I think it was pretty ruined already."

Luke stared with wide eyes, trying not to cry.

Trucy gritted her teeth, barely holding in the fury emanating from her tiny frame. "Why can't you just sit and listen to Luke's stories for once!?" she cried. "You always have to butt in and... and be a
"If Luke wasn't claiming this all actually happened, I'd be a lot more receptive, believe me," Apollo calmly replied, waving away Trucy's childish argument. "This one in particular is clearly nothing more than a wild exaggeration."

"No it's not," Luke quietly insisted, but was too hurt to meet Apollo's eyes, looking at the floor as he blinked back tears.

Apollo didn't seem to hear his brother. "Maybe another time," he continued, then turned and walked out, closing the door behind him.

Trucy glared at the door for a very long moment before letting out her anger in one long shriek. "APOLLO WRIGHT IS A BUTT!" With that, she stomped back to Luke's side, sitting on the bed and turning to look at her brother. At the sight of his distress, she instantly calmed, throwing herself on Luke with a tight embrace. "Ignore Polly," she said. "He's a big idiot, anyway."

Luke couldn't resist a small giggle at that. After a moment to push the sadness to one side, he turned to his sister, forcing a smile. "He can be," he agreed.

Trucy grinned.

"What do you say," Luke continued with a more genuine smile, "we continue the story anyway, just the two of us?"

Gasping in delight, Trucy nodded eagerly. "Yeah! Finish the story! Finish it!"

Luke giggled, pushing his sister off his shoulder to put some space between them. "Okay, then! Let's see, we were at the formation of the Azran Key..."

It would be a very long time before Apollo heard the end to the story.

View the Court Record/Luke's Notebook
With Eldoon back in his chair, idly petting his dog, the Wright kids huddled together out of his hearing range to catch each other up on what they'd learned: Apollo and Trucy told Luke about when the cart was last seen and the solitary remaining bowl, which Luke dutifully wrote down in his notebook, then Luke explained to his siblings what he'd learned from his short talk with Spoon.

"She sleeps inside, so she didn't see anything," Luke said, "but she did say she heard something strange going on outside last night."

Trucy bounced excitedly. "She heard the theft!?"

Apollo sighed. "So nothing useful from the dog," he pointed out. "I doubt she heard anything that could help us."

Trucy paused, thinking to herself. "But if she heard something, why didn't she tell Mister Eldoon? Or his wife?"

Luke shrugged. "She seems a very quiet dog... and I don't think she puts much of an effort into protecting that cart anyway; She doesn't like it too much."

"That makes sense!" Trucy giggled.

"But I do think what she heard could help us," Luke continued, turning to Apollo. "She said, after she heard the tarp being pulled off, she only heard the cart moving for a very short distance. After that, she heard a lot of, what she called, 'before-water washing up sounds'."

Apollo and Trucy gave each other confused looks. "What's that meant to mean?"

Luke smiled. "I think she was hearing the bowls clinking together!" he replied. "You said Mister Eldoon washes them every evening, doesn't he? She knows he calls that 'washing up', and she recognised the sound the dry bowls make when they tap each other, but didn't know what made it!"

"Ooh!" Trucy cooed. "I never would've guessed that!"

Apollo pressed a finger to his forehead. "But why would she hear that?" he asked. "It doesn't make sense. The bowls have to still be in the cart, because they're not here! And why would the thief stay so close just to mess around with the bowls!?"

Luke shrugged. "Search me," he admitted, "but I'm sure a little more investigation will give us some kind of explanation! Oh, and," he turned to Trucy with a smile, "she said she'd heard you chasing your thief earlier that evening!"

"Does she know where the thief went?" Trucy asked hopefully.

"Sorry, no," Luke admitted, shaking his head. "She heard him walking away, but couldn't remember if she could tell where at the time." Trucy sighed in disappointment. "Same with the cart, actually!"
Luke continued. "She heard it moving away, but couldn't tell where."

Apollo crossed his arms with a frustrated grunt, half-ready to dismiss the dog's testimony entirely. "So, what next?" he asked.

At that, Trucy perked up. "The garage!" she cried, pointing to the nearby door, still hanging half-open behind the police car. "Maybe my thief left a clue in there!"

Apollo gave Luke a harried look, but Luke just giggled. "Why not?" he said. "We'll be quick and quiet, and won't touch anything we don't have to!"

"But we're trespassing," Apollo pointed out, raising an eyebrow. "Why are you okay with that!?"

"We'll be quick, Polly!" Trucy laughed, skipping away to squeeze behind the police car. Luke followed her, and the pair quickly disappeared underneath the half-open rolling door.

Sighing, Apollo pressed a hand to his face. "We are so going to get caught," he mumbled.

Suddenly, a scream rang from inside.

"Trucy!" Apollo cried, throwing himself over the front of the car and ducking under the door into the garage, where he paused, looking around frantically as his eyes adjusted to the low light filtering in from behind. "Trucy!?"

Luke laughed, and Apollo's gaze latched on to the two figures directly in front of him, at the other end of the room. "It's okay!" Luke called, and, a moment later, a yellow-orange light on the wall to Apollo's left flickered on, better illuminating the room. "We found a skeleton!" the younger brother added, standing next to the light switch he had just flicked on.

Trucy was giggling as she played with the macabre model. "It's gold-plated!" she pointed out, then looked to a box sitting next to it. "Ooh, look, there's bits of a mannequin in there!" She knelt down, poking gleefully at a tan foot sticking straight up into the air. "This place just screams 'hospital storage', don't you think?"

Apollo sighed in relief that the momentary scare turned out to not be anything serious. "It screams something, that's for sure," he mumbled.

Luke gasped, a wide smile on his face as he suddenly rushed past Trucy, manoeuvring around a pair of tires on the floor to where a folded step-ladder rested. "Hello there!" he cried, his eyes locked on the top of a towering pile of boxes on Apollo's right. "My name's Luke! What's yours?"

Apollo looked up in surprise to see a black-tuxedo-patterned cat perched above them, peering down warily with bright yellow eyes. It mewed at them, tail waving back and forth.

"Hello, Gabriel!" Luke replied, a hat moving to tip his cap as Trucy ran to join her brothers. "We won't be here long; We're investigating a pair of thefts that happened near here last night. One of the thieves came in here before we lost track of them, actually. Would you happen to know anything about it?"

Gabriel seemed to relax a little at that, its tail slowing to a standstill and hanging limply over the edge of the cardboard tower. It meowed again, a little louder this time than before.

"Oh, that's a shame," Luke said, with a sad look. "Well, if you do ever find out anything, we'd greatly appreciate if you could pass it on!"
The cat meowed again, then firmly turned its head away.

Luke shrugged as he turned to Apollo. "Sorry, he says he was at his home last night. Doesn't know anything about our investigation."

Apollo just nodded; He wasn't sure how much he could believe an animal's testimony anyway. "While we're here, we may as well look for any clues the thief might have left," he pointed out, moving around Luke to head past the lime-green car parked at their side.

"Yeah!" Trucy cheered. "Clues... to a panty-snatching!" she dramatically whispered. "Clues... like a pair of panties!"

Apollo was midway through rolling his eyes when an anomaly on the side of the car caught his eye (and, luckily, before he brushed into it): The side mirror on the driver's door was missing, roughly broken off with presumably-live wires sticking out of the hole. He frowned, reaching for his Court Record to take a picture. "Now that's odd," he pointed out.

Luke and Trucy ran to Apollo's side, examining the damage to the car. "Do you think it's relevant?" Luke asked. "For all we know, the owner of this car has nothing to do with the thefts."

"They clearly don't know about the damage," Apollo pointed out, snapping a picture. "In any case, I feel better having a record of this. You never know." He slipped the thin tablet back into his hip bag, pausing to carefully rearrange the wires so they pointed back into the hole of the missing wing-mirror.

Apollo moved on, running a hand along the side of the car as he slowly moved towards its back, smiling. "Hey, you know what this car reminds me of?"

"What?" Trucy asked, trailing behind her brother.

"One of Dad's cases!" Apollo replied. "A murder happened in the back of a car, and Dad spotted a cloth in the tailpipe that turned out to be a vital clue to solving the case!"

"Wow," Trucy said, faking some enthusiasm for her brother. Luke just smiled in amusement, staying where he was.

Not seeming to notice his siblings humouring him, Apollo made his way to the back of the car, crouching down by the car's exhaust. "Wouldn't it be funny if-?" He paused, staring at the tailpipe in disbelief. "Hey! There's something in here!"

Apollo was already carefully shoving his hand into the exhaust, and, a moment later, pulled out a bundle of blue-and-pink fabric with a grin. "Truce! Is this...?"

Trucy gasped, grabbing the bundle from her brother and shaking it out a bit to reveal her, slightly dirty, blue Magic Panties, decorated with reddish-pink hearts. She squealed in delight, throwing her arms around Apollo as he got to his feet. "My panties!" she cried. "Thank you so much, Polly!"

Apollo laughed, hugging his sister back. "That was quick!" he pointed out. "I'm glad we didn't have to rearrange the show!"
"You bet!" Trucy replied, bouncing away from her brother to admire the reclaimed prop. "It would have been terrible to lose our best-loved act!"

"Excuse me?" Apollo asked, laughing as he crossed his arms. "I'd say my Zig-Zag illusion is our best-loved act, Artemis."

Trucy stuck her tongue out at Apollo, and was about to shoot back a reply when a clearing throat from their brother nearby drew their attention.

Luke was watching his siblings, a hand held close to his mouth from his efforts to alert them. "I don't think you've noticed," he said, gesturing down with his hand as he stared pointedly at Apollo, "but there's another potential clue here." As Apollo and Trucy watched blankly, Luke quickly knelt down, reaching under the back tire of the car. As he stood up, he brandished a small, hot pink mobile phone in his hand.

"A cell phone!" Apollo cried in surprise.

Trucy jumped forward, looking down where Luke had found it. "Right beneath the tire!" she pointed out, then looked up at Apollo. "If the car moved, it would have been crushed for sure!"

"Which means the car hasn't moved since it was dropped," Apollo mused aloud, pressing a finger to his forehead. "Think it belongs to the doctor here?"

"We should bring it to him later!" Trucy suggested.

Luke nodded in agreement. "We shouldn't leave it here, where anyone could take it," he said, apparently not noticing that they were doing exactly that. "We want to talk to him anyway, to rule him out as the thief."

Apollo thought a moment more. "Luke?" he asked, a hand reaching into the bag at his hip. "Think you could put it back where you found it for a moment? I want to take a picture."

After a drop by the Agency to check Pearl was doing alright alone, the Wright children headed onwards to the south entrance of their local park; Luke had noted their usual eastern entrance was closed off, and Apollo was loath to sit around Eldoon's looking for more clues, which he doubted existed, so on to their second crime scene it was.

They didn't usually venture around this end of the park, and Apollo couldn't help but notice the massive mansion as they approached, running his eyes along the elaborate dragon design painted along the stone wall that protected the distinctly Asian-styled house behind it. 'Feels like Chinatown,' he thought. 'Or Kurain.'

Luke had ended up at the lead as they turned the final corner, and paused in surprise, causing Trucy immediately behind him to bump into his back. "Apollo!" he cried. "Look!"

Apollo rushed to Luke's side, dodging Trucy as she also hurried to look. "What?" he asked, but got no answer, catching sight of the street outside the park entrance with a gasp.

Kitaki Avenue was more of a wide path than a road, but even so a significant section of it was blocked off by a series of orange traffic cones, police tape tied around them and across the fancy archway over the park entrance nearby. A white van was parked behind the line of tape, a stretcher at its back, although it currently held nothing more than an abandoned purse of groceries as a nearby officer fought to keep an old lady from climbing the fence. A second officer stood under the arch, next to the public bin, engaged in a curt discussion with a young brunette in a yellow dress anxiously looking past him into the park.

Trucy cooed, pointing the woman out to her brothers. "She's pretty!" she said. "I bet she has a story, you know?"

"Everyone has a story," Luke pointed out with a smile. "It's not exactly polite to accost someone on the street and demand they tell it, though."

As Apollo watched, the woman finished her talk with the officer, looking furtively around before rushing off past them, apparently in a bit of a hurry. Although he agreed she was acting suspiciously, there was little reason to run after her. "Personally, I'm more interested in the park," he said, gesturing to it as he strode forward, his siblings behind him. "Why's it suddenly all closed off?"

"There's a lot more activity at this entrance than the other one," Luke added. "Something must have happened."

"I bet they're filming a movie!" Trucy excitedly chirped. "Let's go look! We might see someone famous!" Before her brothers could stop her, she had raced past them to the archway.

The officer on duty held up a hand, moving to stand in front of Trucy as she approached. "Hey, Miss! Stay out of the park!" he ordered.

A little shocked by the stern dismissal, Trucy jumped back, then turned to her brothers with a sad look. "He got mad at me..."

While Luke moved to comfort Trucy with a pat on the shoulder, Apollo more casually approached the policeman on duty. "Did something happen here, officer?"

"Huh?" the officer mumbled in reply, then seemed to catch himself and firmly shook his head. "Uh, no, move along, nothing to see." He waved the young man away dismissively. "Why don't you kids go play someplace else with your older brother there?"

At that, Apollo gave the man a scowl. "We're not kids and we're not playing!" he cried, hearing the footsteps of his siblings approaching from behind. 'Why are so many people calling me a kid today!? And since when was Luke older than me!? I'm a magician! I-I mean, an attorney!"

"Something wrong?" a voice asked, and the three Wrights looked up in surprise to see a young woman, about Apollo's height, approaching from within the park, dark eyes taking in the situation with a stern glare.

The officer spun around, saluting the woman. "Detective Skye!" he cried. "We're fine ma'am, nothing to report!"

Apollo gave the woman a curious look. 'She's a detective...?' His eyes were drawn to a pair of white-rimmed glasses with pink lenses resting on top of her head. 'Wait... aren't those...?'

Trucy pulled on Luke's arm, whispering, "Why's she wearing a lab coat?"

Luke could only shrug.

"And these kids are?" the detective continued to the officer, waving at Apollo.

"Curiosity seekers, ma'am," the officer replied, then hid a smirk. "They claim to be... 'magic lawyers'."

Apollo turned red, both in rage at being dismissed and embarrassment that he'd let the wrong occupation slip out first.

The detective seemed to hide a smile at that, turning to Apollo. "Why don't you kids run along and play someplace else?"

"Look," Apollo cried, trying not to get frustrated and make himself seem childish, "we're not-!"

"Or I spill something on that pretty face of yours," the detective continued, looking stern again. "Want a dose of experimental Hydroxyacelunodosetrase?"

The Wrights were shocked into momentary silence. "Come again?" Trucy asked.

Luke frowned, stepping around from where he was partially hidden from the detective behind his brother. "I'm sorry, you're threatening to throw an enzyme at us?" he asked. "Firstly, what are you doing carrying that kind of thing around, and secondly, I'm pretty sure that counts as chemical warfare and will certainly get you fired, Detective."

The detective definitely hadn't been expecting a retaliatory threat in return, staring at Luke in shock for a moment before sheepishly looking away, forcing the stern frown back onto her face. "Well. You should be keeping a closer eye on your little brother and sister," she insisted. "Keep them away from us hard-working grown-ups."
Apollo was about to object before he saw the dangerous look in Luke's eyes, the taller brother crossing his arms. "We were simply asking what was happening in the park," Luke calmly pointed out. "I don't see how that question deserved such an impolite response, regardless of the age you thought my older brother here actually was."

Luke's snide jibes regarding Apollo's age seemed to hit home, both the detective and officer looking slightly uncomfortable. "Well," the detective replied, "we don't answer those questions." With that, she turned to the officer. "Try to keep out the riff-raff, if you would."

"Yes ma'am!" the officer said, saluting again as the detective stalked off back into the park.

"It's fine," Apollo assured him, patting Luke's shoulder with a smile and guiding his siblings away from the park entrance. "Besides, it has nothing to do with us. We came here to look into Dad's accident, remember?"

Trucy nodded, staring up at the younger of her brothers in awe. "That was so brave of you to stand up to that detective, Luke!" she cried. "Even though she was threatening to throw her experimental Hydroxy-whatever in Polly's face!" She briefly frowned in thought. "What was it you said it was again?"

Luke smiled. "An 'enzyme'," he explained. "I had to study several as part of my veterinary degree. And I don't think there was anything to worry about with her. I've never heard of an enzyme, experimental or not, that had such a long name! I'm pretty sure she just made it up to scare us."

"She clearly didn't bet on you, then," Apollo pointed out with a grin of pride in his brother.

Trucy giggled, then gasped, looking over at the mansion opposite. "Oh, and if we're looking into Daddy's accident," she said, pointing her brothers to the gate, "there's a nice-looking lady over there! Let's question her!"

Luke and Apollo looked over to see a short woman in a dark, embroidered kimono, a yellow fox with multiple tails prominently displayed on one side. In her hands was a straw broom, and she was brushing menacingly at the dried pools of paint littering the cobblestones under the heavy wooden gate of her mansion home, the massive bow on the back of her elaborately styled dark hair feeling to Apollo like a red flag of doom. "Uh... Let's not and say we did," the elder brother said.

Luke raised an amused eyebrow at Apollo. "What kind of answer is that?" he asked. "Papa mentioned that mansion! If anyone was a witness to his accident, it would be them!"

Before Apollo could reply or try to stop them, Luke and Trucy had left him behind, approaching the woman at the mansion gate. Sighing, Apollo reluctantly followed, more out of wanting to protect his siblings than any desire for information.

"Excuse me!" Trucy called, waving at the woman to catch her attention. "Um, can we have a few words with you?"

The woman looked up, apparently surprised at being addressed. "You want something?" she asked, her husky voice instantly making Apollo sweat.

"We don't want to bother you," Luke picked up with a polite smile. "My name's Luke Wright, and these are my siblings, Trucy and Apollo." He gestured to them as he spoke. "Our father was hit by a car here last night, and-"
Suddenly the woman laughed, all the sternness melting away from her expression in an instant. "That man was your father?" she asked. "The guy who flew thirty feet and just walked away?"

"That's him!" Trucy chirped, bouncing excitedly.

Apollo sighed. "I don't think it was quite that dramatic an incident," he mumbled to himself.

"I should've known!" the woman laughed. "One of our Capos thought he'd make a great point man!" Before Trucy could do more than look confused at the unfamiliar terms, the woman set her broom to one side, putting her chore on hold. "I'm Plum," she said. "Plum Kitaki. Wife of the fourth head of the Kitaki Family business. Friends call me Little Plum."

Luke tipped his cap. "It's lovely to meet you, Missus Kitaki!"

Trucy giggled to herself. "Little Plum! That's a really cute name for someone so-"

"Trucy!" Apollo cried, diving to his sister's side and slapping a hand over her mouth. Ignoring her confused glare, he whispered in her ear, "H-how about you go through me when talking to her, okay?"

Rolling her eyes, Trucy pulled her brother's hand from her face. "That seems like a bit of a needless procedure," she pointed out.

"I'm a lawyer," Apollo replied with a deadpan stare. "I live for needless procedures."

Luke and Plum only seemed to be amused by the pair's antics. "Oh little girl," Plum laughed, "you should know... We're gangsters."

"Originally Yakuza from Japan, right?" Luke asked.

Plum nodded, impressed. "You've done your research!"

"Oh!" Trucy cried. "Gangsters! That means you're the bad guys!"

"Trucy!" Apollo warned, feeling like he'd faint if she kept on the way she was. "Through me!"

Plum just laughed. "The bad guys... I like the sound of that!" she said, giving the girl a wink.

Apollo sighed, pressing a hand to his face. 'I'm gonna need some of Pearly's warm tea after this...' "It takes a lot of hard work to protect a family fortune," Plum continued, her good humour fading. "Things aren't as easy as they used to be for us 'bad guys'."

Luke gave her a concerned look. "I'm sorry to hear it," he said. "I hope things turn around for you soon."

Apollo resisted the sudden urge to strangle his brother. 'Can we not wish their dubious 'business' well, please!?'

"Ah, they will be," Plum assured Luke with a smile that failed to hide her sad eyes. "Even if we have to lose the house to get it."

Luke and Apollo shared a confused glance, wondering what she meant.

Trucy looked up at the mansion beyond the gate in awe. "Your house is really big!" she cried. "And the gate, too!" She pointed to a small, yellow symbol on the wooden doors, resembling a fox head not unlike the one on Plum's kimono. "I like the fox! It's so cute!"

"Ah, that," Plum said with a smile, looking back at the symbol. "That's our family crest, from the old country." She gave Trucy a well-practised sharp grin. "We're clever as the fox... and our teeth are sharp."

Trucy was delighted. "Ooh, like a motto!" she cried, then turned to her brothers. "We need a crest, too! For the Agency!"

"We already have a motto," Apollo pointed out with a frown. "'Where you've always come to the Wright place', remember? How do you propose we make that into a crest?"

"Maybe you should ask Papa later, Trucy," Luke suggested. "He might have an idea."

"Oooh, yeah!" Trucy cried with a grin. "Daddy will know!"

Apollo sighed. "Speaking of Dad..." He reluctantly returned his attention to Plum. "The, um, car accident last night?"

"Oh yes, that," Plum replied, looking as annoyed at the subject as Apollo. "It's been nothing but trouble. I've been cleaning up this mess since morning!" She gestured to the spilled paint across the ground. "Bah!"

Apollo was reminded of how Phoenix had been covered in paint following his accident. It made sense that paint would litter the crime scene too.

Luke craned his head around the gate to look at the decorated stone walls on either side. "Were you repainting?"

Plum nodded. "That's right. I called in an artist to do the job right." She paused, frowning. "He's the third so far."

"The... third?" Apollo repeated, surprised.

"The first spilled paint all over the entrance here," Plum explained, her hands tightening on her broom, "the second on my kimono, so I..." With a glare, she pulled her hands apart just enough to reveal the hidden blade in the handle of her 'broom'.

"N-no, don't mention it," Apollo insisted, forcing himself not to run away as he resumed sweating in fear. "It's better we don't know!"

View the Court Record
"This paint was spilled at the time of the accident, right?" Luke asked.

Plum nodded. "It was around nine last night," she said, pushing the handle of her broom back into place. "I heard a crashing noise... and found your father drowning in a sea of paint."

"So you came to his rescue?" Trucy asked.

"You've my husband, the Boss, to thank for that," Plum told them with a smile. "The car that hit your father knocked over this paint," she gestured to the ground, "then turned the corner," she pointed to the road behind them, "and sped away."

Trucy frowned in thought. "But why are you out here cleaning it up?"

"What do you mean?" Plum asked, as confused as Trucy's brothers.

"I mean, aren't you a gangster?" the teen continued. "Don't you have any 'goons' to do your dirty work for you?"

Apollo paled, fighting not to panic. "Truce!" he cried.

Plum just laughed. "Don't be such a stiff, kiddo! I suppose we gangsters do have a certain image."

Luke rubbed at the back of his head, recalling his own run-ins with gangsters back in Future London... even if they had turned out to be merely actors in the end.

"But we're community-oriented gangsters, you see," Plum continued. "The Boss likes to give back to the people."

"Huh," Luke muttered, stroking his goatee in thought. "That's why there are plaques on the park entrances that say 'Donated by Big Wins Kitaki', right?"

"Yep, that's my husband," Plum said with a proud smile.

'How noble of him,' Apollo thought, resisting the urge to roll his eyes.

"I availed myself of the public facilities to get rid of all the garbage," Plum continued, gesturing across the road. "Now there's just the paint on the street to deal with."

Apollo looked behind him, his gaze locking on to the public bin sitting at the entrance to the park, where it had apparently been dragged from further inside. 'Which reminds me...' "Can I ask you a question?"

"What?" Plum asked back.

Apollo jerked his head to the park, giving Plum a curious look. "What happened in the park across the street?"
"Oh, yes, quite the commotion," Plum explained, sadly shaking her head. "Chicago Lightning, as the Boss would say."

"Gunfire," Plum elaborated. "Someone was killed. Strange circumstances, too."

The trio were surprised. "You're kidding!" Apollo cried.

"And this was last night?" Luke asked.

Plum nodded. "What a morning! Trouble everywhere," she said. "The park, the gate, even our house..."

"Did something happen at your house, too?" Trucy asked, looking sympathetic.

"A crime without honour! Without remorse!" Plum proclaimed. "It's a private matter." She paused, then gave the trio a stern stare. "Wanna hear about it?"

Apollo noticed poor Luke freeze at the question, battling internally over how to respond. A glance at Trucy confirmed that the Gramarye siblings both suspected 'no' wasn't an acceptable answer, so he turned to the woman with a restrained sigh. "So... what happened at your house?"

"Bloomers," Plum simply said, still staring. "Last night." When she got only confused stares in response, she added, "Me, Little Plum Kitaki, the victim of a panty-snatcher!"

Trucy gasped. "What!? So it wasn't just my panties that were stolen!?"

"Got you too, did they? Poor thing," Plum replied, giving Trucy a sympathetic look before returning her stern gaze to the two boys. "Like I said, whoever did this is a hardened criminal." She pulled open the handle to her broom again, letting the blade within shine in the sunlight. "It wasn't one of you, was it?"

"N-no, of course not!" Apollo cried, jumping back in fear.

Even Luke finally seemed to be a little frightened by Plum, taking a step back. "Why would we steal our own sister's underwear!?" he pointed out.

Plum just sniffed in response, but did put away the hidden blade. "I've heard word that panties have been disappearing lately," she continued as though nothing had happened. "And the missing panties all have something in common."

Apollo had already started wondering what that was before he realised he was imagining Plum's underwear and shook his head to rid himself of the image.

"I know!" Trucy cried with a smile. "We'll find your bloomers, too!"

"Great!" Plum immediately replied, giving Trucy an encouraging grin. "Show me what you're made of!"

Luke seemed to have finally recovered, again tipping his cap to Plum. "We'll do our absolute best, Missus Kitaki!" he promised. "The Wright Anything Agency will get the job done!"

"Wait, what!?!" Apollo cried, wondering what exactly it was his siblings had just gotten him into.

The conversation was interrupted by the arrival of a fifth person, a young woman who gently bypassed the Wrights with a nod as she headed to the gate of the Kitaki Mansion. Plum jumped as she noticed her. "Oh! Welcome home, sweetie."

The woman nodded, somewhat nervously. "Ah, uh... hello, m-mother."

Apollo hid a gasp. This was the same young woman in the yellow dress they'd seen watching the park earlier; She was a Kitaki?

"Um, Miss!" Trucy suddenly cried, jumping forward with a hand digging around in her bag. "Miss!" The woman turned, giving Trucy a curious look, and was promptly handed a small sheet of decorated paper. "Here, our flyer!" Trucy announced with a grin.

Apollo rolled his eyes. 'Really, Trucy!?'

The woman frowned as she read it over. "The... Wright Anything Agency?"

"That's us!" Luke chimed in, stepping forward and tipping his cap to the woman as he picked up on Trucy's unspoken hints. "We'll do anything, anywhere! Though we do specialise in illusions, violin and piano performance, and legal defence!"

"Defence...?" the woman repeated, her eyes flicking between Luke and Apollo.

"Drop by our office!" Trucy offered, giving the woman a curtsy. "We'll be waiting!"

The woman stared for a moment, then gave Trucy a vaguely uncomfortable nod. "Ah... goodbye." A moment later, she turned and disappeared into the house, and Plum shortly followed her.

The moment they were alone, Apollo shot glares at his siblings, whacking Trucy on the back of the shoulder to make her face him. "What was that about!? Why'd you give her our flyer?"

Trucy thought a moment, then shrugged. "I dunno," she admitted. "She seemed like she could use some help."

"She's the heiress to a gangster dynasty!" Apollo hissed. "She doesn't need our help!"

Apollo sighed, pressing a hand to his face. "Fine, fine," he mumbled. "Let's just hope she doesn't." With that he turned and headed back towards the park, Luke sticking close by. "Anyway, at least that little diversion did give us some lead."

"What do you mean?" Trucy asked, skipping after her brothers.

"Missus Kitaki said she threw the trash from the accident in the 'public facilities', right?" Apollo replied, shooting his sister a smile as he headed straight for the bin at the park entrance. He gave the officer a nod before the pair promptly ignored each other, the young attorney turning his attention to the large wire basket on the paving stones. "There might be clues!"

"That's a good point!" Luke agreed with a grin, rushing to Apollo's side. "If that car dropped anything when it hit Papa, it would have ended up in here!"

Trucy giggled, bouncing to Apollo's other side as he dug down to the bottom of the mostly-empty public bin. "A detective's life sure is a hard one!"

"Not detectives, Trucy," Luke corrected, barely hiding his excitement, "investigators!"
Apollo smiled at his siblings' antics above him, his head almost at the bottom of the bin as he looked through its contents. Mostly it was the remains of paint tins, emptied from the crash and a few even heavily dented from a direct hit by the car that knocked them over. It was only as he pushed them aside to see what had slipped past them to the very bottom that he found something new... a pair of objects that were very interesting indeed. "Aha."

Grinning, Apollo grabbed the most interesting object first, and pulled himself back up out of the bin, brandishing a green wing-mirror, covered in black, yellow and red paint. At the end where it used to attach to a car, several long wires splayed out, their bare ends frayed as the result of a violent separation between mirror and vehicle.

Luke and Trucy both gasped in unison as they recognised the object. "It's even the same shade of green!" Trucy whispered in awe.

"This proves without a doubt that the clinic car was the one to hit Papa!" Luke gushed, almost jumping for joy. "We solved another case!"

"There's more," Apollo said, holding out the mirror for Luke to take before 'diving' back into the bin, emerging a moment later with a pair of green, similarly paint-covered, slippers in his hand. "Look at these," he said, pointing to a short line of text across the top. "'Meraktis Clinic'. These are probably lent out to patients or something."

Luke frowned as he examined the footwear. "What are they doing so far from the hospital?" he mused aloud. "Do you think they fell out of the car?"

"It seems unlikely," Apollo admitted, shrugging. "I mean, look at the paint stains on them. Only on the soles? It looks more like someone was walking in them than they flew out an open window or something."

"Plus, I doubt it's a high likelihood that both rather than only one would have fallen out, and landed on their soles rather than upside-down," Luke added, conceding to Apollo's reasoning.

Trucy took one of the slippers from Apollo's hand, turning it over as she examined it. "Oh, look, there's a weird shape here!" She showed it off to her brothers, and they quickly spotted the outline of a leaf on the slippers' sole. "The person walking in it must have stepped on a leaf before the paint!"

"Leaving the outline when the leaf came off!" Apollo realised, taking the slipper back to more closely examine the outline. "That's a great find, Trucy!"

Trucy grinned with pride.

"That's certainly suspicious," Luke agreed, frowning, "but do you really think the slippers are related to any of our cases?"

Apollo thought a moment. "The fact that they come from the same place as the car that hit Dad is enough of a co-incidence," he replied. "I think we'd better take both." Passing the slippers to Trucy, he reached into his bag to fetch his stash of plastic evidence baggies, which he always kept handy just in case. "Since we know for sure who ran Dad over, we'd better go check on him. Let him know what we've found out."

Trucy giggled, grabbing an offered baggie to stuff the slippers in. "Yeah, he'll just mope if we leave him alone for too long!"
With the slippers in Trucy's bag and the mirror in Apollo's, the Wright kids made their way back to Hickfield Clinic.
Check Up

We're going to check on Papa if you want to join us.

No, that's okay. I'll stay here and look after the office
But tell me how he is once you're done, okay?

Of course, Pearl! Apollo says we'll head back to the office anyway once we're done.

Thank you, Luke! See you then! :)

Hickfield Clinic

Phoenix was running his pen along the pages of the notebook Maya had left him, alternating between idle doodles and actual notes on the Nickel Samurai episode whose credits were blaring from the TV on his sidetable. He frowned to himself, distractedly kicking his uninjured leg over the edge of the bed where he was turned to face the television. 'Note to self: Check my 'random selection' before putting it in. Don't want more 'kidnapping' flashbacks from Engarde.' He had no idea how Maya could still love that particular sub-series, or even the series as a whole, after their debacle with Matt Engarde and Shelly De Killer. Maybe she was just that forgiving, or able to separate the show from its cast and crew the way Phoenix couldn't. Either way, he had to admit Maya wouldn't be the same without her Samurai 'addiction', and Phoenix loved her for it all the same.

A knock at his door distracted Phoenix from his musings, and he looked up from his doodle of his girlfriend to see his three kids standing in the doorway, grinning and waving. Turning in his seat to face them, Phoenix put his notebook aside, waving the trio in. "Yo!" he called with a teasing grin. "How goes it?"

Trucy raced to his bedside. "Daddy! How do you feel?" she demanded.

Phoenix laughed. "Not bad, Trucy, not bad. It's good to have you young'uns on the case!"

Apollo rolled his eyes.

Luke giggled as he took up a position on the other side of the bed from his sister. "We solved two cases and picked up a fourth, Papa!" he announced.

"Oh?" Phoenix replied, surprised. "Wow, you three have been busy."

"You'll be pleased to hear," Apollo explained, unable to resist a proud smile, "we found the car that tried to run you over last night."

While Phoenix was staring in shock, Luke nodded eagerly, adding, "Yep! It was in the garage of the Meraktis Clinic, next door to Mister Eldoon's place!"

"And we found my panties there, too!" Trucy picked up with a grin. "Do you think this Doctor Meraktis guy was the one who stole them?"
"I highly doubt that, Truce," Apollo sighed. "We discussed this already, didn't we?"

Phoenix was frowning in thought, a hand rubbing at his chin. "Meraktis... I've heard of him. Nothing good, mind you."

"There was a police car outside his clinic," Luke admitted, arms crossed. "We thought maybe something had happened."

"What do you know about him?" Apollo asked their father, leaning on the bars at the end of the bed. "What's this 'Meraktis' guy done?"

Phoenix sighed, shaking his head. "All I've heard are the rumours," he said. "That clinic's been making good money... in a bad way."

"'Bad' how?" Luke asked.

"Ties to organised crime," Phoenix explained. "In particular, the Kitaki family."

Apollo, Luke and Trucy gasped, sharing surprised glances. "The Kitaki's!?" Apollo repeated. "What's he been doing with them!?"

"Some injuries you can't take to a public hospital," Phoenix explained. "They use the Meraktis Clinic for their patch-up jobs. He'd get a lot of money for keeping their business with him quiet."

"Interesting," Apollo mumbled, running the information over in his head.

"Oh, that reminds me!" Trucy chimed in, "something happened in People Park! It's all closed off!"

Phoenix couldn't resist a short laugh. "Ah, yes, I've heard about that, too: Apparently someone found a body there, in unusual circumstances."

"Something more unusual than being dead?" Apollo quipped, an eyebrow raised.

Luke nodded. "They were shot, weren't they?" he asked. "Plum said something about gunfire."

"It's not our concern in any case," Phoenix pointed out. "I suggest you focus on the cases you have left. The noodle stand, right?"

"Yep!" Trucy agreed. "And finding my thief!"

"We'll get right back to it," Apollo promised, speaking up before either of his siblings could mention Plum's bloomers were also on their list. "It's kinda hard to know where to start, since there aren't any witnesses, nor clues about which way either thief went."

Phoenix thought a moment. "Well, you managed to find the car that tossed me thirty feet," he pointed out.

"Only because we found clues we weren't expecting," Luke pointed out. "For Mister Eldoon's cart, we were expecting clues, and didn't find anything useful."

Apollo nodded, and was about to add to his brother's explanation when he was interrupted by a buzzing in his bag.

"Is that your phone, Polly?" Trucy asked.

"Yeah, hang on," Apollo replied, turning away from his family as he pulled the device out of his
To his surprise, the screen proudly displayed 'Pearly', and he cast a worried glance back at his father and siblings before answering it. "What is it?" he asked. "You okay?"

"Oh, I'm fine!" Pearl's bright voice replied over the tiny speaker. "Although, you should return to the office as soon as you can; You have a client!"

Apollo blinked in surprise. "A client? At the office?" he repeated, casting another glance back at his equally confused family. "This... isn't another missing-item hunt, is it?"

At that, Pearl giggled. "She specifically wants you for a reason, Apollo! You're the only defence attorney here, aren't you?"

Apollo froze, almost dropping his phone in surprise. "Y-you mean..." His mouth, hanging open from the shock, moved into an ecstatic grin, and he had to restrain himself from jumping for joy. "SOMEONE WANTS ME TO DEFEND THEM!?"

"Mm-hm!" Pearl cheerfully replied. "She's willing to wait, but don't take too long, okay?"

"Y-you bet!" Apollo cried, finding it hard to keep still, jittering in excitement. "Tell her I'll be right there, ten minutes at the max!" With that, he ended the call, hurriedly shoving the phone back in his bag as he spun to face his family. "Dad! I have a client!"

"So I heard!" Phoenix laughed, clapping his hands together. "Congratulations!"

Turning his gaze to his siblings on either side of the bed, Apollo waved for them to follow him. "Guys, come on, we have to get back to the office!" Without waiting for a reply, he had already dashed out of the room at full speed, his crimson magician's cape fluttering behind him.

Luke and Trucy gave each other surprised looks, then Trucy ran to follow her brother, shouting, "Polly, wait for us!"

Sighing, Luke nodded to their father. "We'll check in on you later then, Papa," he promised.

"I'll look forward to it," Phoenix replied.

Clutching his satchel tightly, Luke gave Phoenix a smile and raced off to join his siblings.

June 15, 11:21AM
Wright Anything Agency
Phoenix's Office

Although Apollo's journey back to the Agency had started out as a race, it quickly slowed to a brisk pace, then a casual walk. His legs were burning from the exertion, but he refused to stop and rest, not even to let Trucy or Luke catch up to him; They'd fallen behind not long after leaving the hospital.

Finally, the stairs to the Agency's front door came into view, and the thought of being so close to his destination gave Apollo the energy to push past his aching legs and sprint up the steps, through the open door and past the empty reception. As he burst into the office, he grinned widely and called, "Hello!? I'm back!"
Sitting on the twin red couches in front of him were two young women: One was Pearl, smiling up at Apollo as she paused, midway through removing two empty mugs from the table; The other was the same young woman in the yellow dress that the Wrights had seen on Kitaki Avenue, her tawny brown hair pulled into a bun on the back of her head and a green scarf tied around her neck. She fiddled nervously with blue ribbons tied around her wrists in bows, which matched the fancy heeled sandals on her feet. Although surprised to see her again, Apollo forced the smile back on his face and walked around to Pearl's side.

Pearl placed the two mugs back down, getting up. "Hello, Apollo!" she replied, gesturing to the woman. "This is Ms Alita Tiala, your client!" She turned her friendly smile to said client. "Ms Tiala, this is Apollo Wright, the defence attorney!"

Apollo gave the nervous woman a friendly smile, bowing to her as he normally did on stage. "A pleasure to meet you, Ms Tiala!" he said.

Alita watched him, still seeming nervous as she slowly stood. "You... You're the defence attorney...?"

"Um, yeah," Apollo replied, trying not to lose confidence at the thought that she had mistaken Luke for the attorney of the family. He flipped one side of his cape over his shoulder, pointing out to her where on his vest he kept the proof of his profession. "My badge is right here, if you want me to prove it."

"Oh, no, I believe you," Alita shyly insisted, avoiding eye contact as she backed down into her chair again. "I... I need your help."

'So Trucy was right after all.' Apollo lowered himself into the seat opposite her, keeping the polite smile on his face. "Well, you've come to the Wright place!" he said. "Maybe you could tell me what happened?"

Alita thought as she played with the bow on her wrist, watching Pearl again pick up the two mugs and sidle over towards the kitchen. "Well, actually, I'm... I'm not the client," she admitted. "The client would be my... well, my fiancé, I suppose you'd call him."

Apollo nodded. "What happened to him, then?"

"He was arrested this morning," Alita explained. "The charge... was murder." When Apollo only nodded in understanding, she added, "Have you heard about what happened at the park?"

"A bit," Apollo replied, frowning. "That's the murder they've accused him of?" 'It explains how Missus Kitaki knew more about it than Dad, anyway...'

"I haven't been told all the details," Alita said, "but I do know a body was found in the park, near the Kitaki Mansion. Apparently, the victim was shot with a pistol... but I hear the circumstances of the shooting were... rather unusual."

Apollo nodded, pulling out his Court Record to take notes. "So they arrested your fiancé?"

Behind him, Pearl re-entered the room, now free of the mugs. "Ms Tiala was telling me about him earlier," she told Apollo. "Apparently he's the son of the Kitaki boss!"

Had Apollo been drinking anything, he was sure he would have spat it out at that. 'Does Pearly even know what she's saying!?'

"We're to be married next month," Alita explained, finally starting to look more comfortable. "But you needn't worry about the Kitakis'... 'reputation'. They're locally responsible gangsters." She smiled, looking off into the distance. "I thought it'd be nice for a change... Quit my boring job, live the good, gangster life."

'So her fiancé's the Kitaki, but she isn't yet?' Apollo realised. "Is he... their only son?"

Alita nodded, returning her gaze to Apollo. "His name's Wocky. Wocky Kitaki." She reached into a blue purse at her side and pulled out a small piece of paper she held out for Apollo to take. "I brought a photo."

Apollo stared at the picture as he took it: A male teen, his hair in some ridiculous style that vaguely resembled horns with a massive curl inbetween (and Apollo could call it ridiculous because he had personal experience with ridiculous hair). He was standing in what looked like People Park, near the river, and wore a Bad Badger t-shirt under a brightly coloured pink and yellow jacket, which had twin patches on the chest of snarling fox heads that were undoubtedly added as a variant of the 'Kitaki crest'. But, perhaps most unnerving of all, was the ridiculous smile the teen was directing at the camera, one hand in the curl of hair at his forehead. "Well. That's... quite the photo," Apollo said.

"I know!" Alita giggled, her hands at her mouth. "Oh, he can be powerful and menacing, but so cute!"

Suddenly Apollo wasn't so sure about this case. "But, if he's the boss's only son..."

"Yes, I'm sure he'll take his father's place some day," Alita said with a smile.

Apollo felt his bracelet twinge.

"Please help my Wocky!" Alita was already continuing, giving Apollo a pleading look. "Please!"

Although a great part of him wanted to turn Alita down and run as far away as he possibly could... Apollo could not make himself turn away the first actual defence case he'd gotten since the formation of the Anything Agency. Giving her a smile, he nodded firmly. "I'll do everything I can to prove him innocent, Ms Tiala! You can count on me!"

Alita smiled, then pulled an envelope from her purse. "I... prepared a letter of request," she explained as she handed it over. "I know you need those."

Apollo took the envelope gingerly, unable to ignore the giant 'Hit Request' painted across the front. "Ah... thank you."

"I hope that's okay?" Alita asked, looking concerned as she noticed Apollo's discomfort. "I've never written a letter of request before."

"Oh, it's fine," Apollo insisted, forcing the smile back on his face as he put the envelope, along with the photo of Wocky, in his bag. 'And I should hope you've never written a letter of request before...!' "Don't you worry about a thing, Ms Tiala! We'll take care of everything!"

View the Court Record
Once Alita had left, Apollo had promptly leaned back against the couch cushions and stared at the ceiling. "What have I gotten myself into, Pearly?"

"It sounded like a decent job to me," Pearl replied with a smile, sitting at Apollo's side and offering him a mug of tea. "I thought you were excited about getting to defend someone?"

Apollo sighed, sitting up to take the mug with a grateful nod. "I was," he agreed. "But, hearing my client is the son of a gangster boss..."

Pearl frowned, biting at a thumbnail in confusion. "I thought... gangsters were just a fairy tale...!" she said.

Biting back a frustrated groan, Apollo shook his head. "N-no, they're..." He decided not to bother, just be as astonished as he usually was whenever Pearl's ignorance of the wider world outside her home village came up. "Anyway... Something Ms Tiala said near the end there... I'm not sure she's all she appears to be."

Pearl's head cocked to one side, the teen staring at Apollo nonplussed. "What do you mean?"

"I mean..." Apollo began to explain, before having to pause as he wondered just what he did mean. "She said something... about Wocky taking over from his father." He paused again, shaking his head. "She... I felt my bracelet tightening! She was lying about something!"

Pearl thought a moment, seeming troubled. "But... why would she be lying about that?" she asked.

Apollo sighed, sipping at his tea. "No idea," he quietly admitted. "And she moved on too quickly for me to ask about it."

The pair heard the sound of the front door opening and closing, and looked up to see Trucy, followed by Luke, appearing in the office doorway, both slightly sweaty and panting from their failed attempts to keep up with Apollo. Trucy looked around in disappointment as she registered no-one was there save her brother and cousin, and wandered over to sit on the free sofa, pouting at Apollo. "Where's your client?"

"She's gone already," Apollo explained, hiding an amused smile. "If you'd kept up with me, you might have got to meet her."

Trucy just glared at him in reply.

Luke weakly laughed, sitting at Trucy's side. "To be fair, if you'd waited for us, we would have got to meet her then, too."

"Are you kidding!?" Apollo replied, giving his brother a smirk. "Since when do we leave our clients hanging!?"
Pearl gave the exhausted pair a smile. "Do you two want some tea? I still have some in the kitchen!"

"That would be lovely, Pearl; Thank you," Luke told her with a grateful smile. Trucy just nodded, too tired to speak up.

As Pearl scurried off with a grin, excited to be useful, Apollo placed his own half-empty mug on the low table in front of them. "You two might be surprised to hear... Remember that lady we saw on Kitaki Avenue? In the yellow dress?"

"The one Trucy gave our flier to?" Luke asked.

Apollo nodded. "She's my client! Or, well, technically, her fiancé is my client."

Trucy gasped, then gave her eldest brother a smug look. "I told you she looked like she needed help!"

"Yeah, yeah," Apollo mumbled, waving her off with a grin. "Her name's Alita Tiala. Her fiancé, Wocky... he's the only son of the Kitaki Family's boss."

"Plus," Apollo continued, "he's been accused of the murder in People Park, the one that grumpy detective is investigating."

Trucy grinned mischievously. "Oooh, we can really rub it in her face when we go to investigate the park!" she cackled. "No-one turns us away from a crime scene without explanation!"

Luke frowned at his sister. "That's a bit of an over-reaction, isn't it?"

Pearl returned, two mugs of tea in her hands, and made her way over to offer them to Luke and Trucy. "I don't know if you three want to start investigating immediately," she said, "or maybe have lunch first. It's almost midday."

The trio thought, Luke and Trucy taking their mugs with grateful smiles. "It's only just gone eleven-thirty," Apollo pointed out, turning to Luke. "Weren't you saying on our way to see Dad that we should match the mirror we found against that car?"

Luke nodded, sipping from his cup. "That shouldn't take more than five minutes," he pointed out. "It's only around the corner."

"We should go investigate the crime scene!" Trucy cried. "People Park's not far either, and they'll let us in now!"

Apollo shook his head, arms crossed. "No. The first thing we should do is head to the detention center, and talk to my client. That's the first thing a defence attorney should always do, if they can."

"How long will that take?" Pearl asked curiously.

"We can use my car," Luke offered. "It'll be quicker than waiting for buses."

"Sure," Apollo agreed with a thankful smile. "And, maybe, since it won't take us long, we can drop by the Meraktis Clinic before we go to get a photo of the mirror against the car. I see no reason why it won't fit perfectly."

Trucy giggled as she sipped from her mug. "Sounds like a plan!" she chirped.
"We can go as soon as we've finished our tea," Luke added, giving Pearl a smile.

"And let me know when you're coming back," Pearl requested, looking to Apollo. "If the timing's right, we could have lunch together before you start your investigation!"

Apollo nodded, softly laughing. "Of course," he agreed, and picked up his half-empty mug from the table.

June 15, 12:17PM
Detention Center
Visitor's Room

Once they had finished their tea, courtesy of Pearl, the Wrights bid her farewell for the time being and walked to the Merakits Clinic around the corner. Sure enough, the broken wing-mirror had been a perfect fit against the broken hole on the side of the green car. Apollo had worried sneaking into the open garage a second time would alert the officer on guard within the small hospital, but the trio had avoided detection easily. To Luke's disappointment, Gabriel the cat had moved on, and was no longer anywhere in the vicinity.

Their errand complete, Luke led his siblings to his small, second-hand car, parked outside the Agency. It was a soft, pastel blue, similar to the vest Trucy had made him, acquired only from what little savings Luke had put together over the years from pocket money and spare wages; Trucy had dubbed it the 'Lukemobile'.

As they pulled in outside the detention center, Trucy giggled at Apollo, who was sitting shotgun next to Luke. "You look as happy as a clam in its shell, Polly!"

Apollo just continued to grin, ignoring her teasing from the back seat. "For a lawyer, this is it," he explained, "the place where the battle begins!"

Luke laughed, switching off the car. "Better hope your prosecutor doesn't take that seriously!"

Apollo led the charge inside, heading straight to the reception desk. "Hi there!" he announced to the officer sat behind it, staring sceptically at the young man in the crimson cape. "We're attorneys; I was hoping we could see Mister Wocky Kitaki?"

The officer thought a moment, then shook her head. "Sorry, he's in questioning right now," she replied. "Could take a while."

While Apollo was staring at the officer in shock, Trucy sighed. "Drat. Oh well, guess we'll have to come back later then." With that, she turned and began to leave.

Luke patted Apollo's back sympathetically. "I guess your battle's been postponed?"

"Yeah," Apollo sighed in disappointment, turning to follow Trucy back to the car, Luke at his side. "But what now? You always talk to the client first!"

Luke pushed open the door as they headed outside. "Well, what else can we do right now? Investigate the crime scene!"

Apollo stopped dead in his tracks. "Oh. Yeah, that... that would be a good idea." He resumed movement, heading over to where Trucy was waiting by Luke's car with a smile. "But first," he announced, "why don't we head back home and have lunch with Pearly?"

Trucy grinned, bouncing in excitement. "Yeah! It'll be well and truly lunchtime by the time we get back!"

Unlocking the car, Luke laughed. "And, if we've learned anything from this outing, it's to call ahead before wasting a half-hour car trip!"

Apollo blushed. "Y-yeah, we'll call ahead next time."

Despite the setback of trying to visit their client, Apollo was feeling optimistic as they approached the cordoned-off entrance to People Park on Kitaki Avenue. He had Luke with him to fend off any further threats from the grumpy detective, and Trucy for emotional support and an extra pair of eyes, so he was confident they would be leaving with some solid information on this mysterious murder.

His chest puffed out in pride, Apollo strode up to the officer under the entrance archway.

The officer sighed as he saw the three Wrights approach, speaking loudly over the roar of a passing motorbike. "You kids again? Look, can't you find some other-"

"We aren't children," Luke interrupted, giving the man a stern look. "Maybe you could give us even a modicum of respect and hear us out before brushing us off?"

Trucy firmly nodded in agreement, crossing her arms.

While the officer was looking away sheepishly, Apollo pulled Alita's letter of request from his bag. "Sir, I have a letter of request here," he announced, staying calm.

"Letter of...?" The officer took the envelope, frowning at the large words elegantly painted across the front. "Huh? Why does it say 'Hit Request' on it?"

Apollo inwardly groaned, having been hoping no-one else would notice that. He suspected it was simply the first available envelope when Alita was writing it... or possibly a threat to not screw this case up.

"Excuse me, coming through," came a heavily accented voice from behind them, and the Wrights turned as one to see a tall blond man approaching them, a purple jacket over a flamboyant popped collar and a matching violet motorcycle helmet under his arm. What stuck out most to Apollo, however, was the stylised pointy 'G' the man was wearing on a chain around his neck, underneath a face and hairstyle that was almost identical to Kristoph Gavin, save for the friendly smile.

It couldn't be anyone other than Klavier Gavin himself... and Apollo instantly hated him.

"Ah, Mister Gavin!" the officer cried, suddenly nervous as he stepped aside, waving the man past.

Klavier took a couple of steps towards the archway before seeming to notice the stares of the nearby trio, and pausing to flash them a smile. To Apollo's annoyance, it was him the famous 'rockstar prosecutor' decided to focus on, leaning forward with his hands resting leisurely on his hips. "I must say, I'm used to being inspected by the ladies, but this is the first time I've felt this way with a man!"

Apollo was too angry to react to the jibe, used to such teases from his family. "Mister Gavin," he said through gritted teeth, not letting up his glare at the man opposite.

Klavier turned his attention to the very confused Luke and Trucy behind, specifically focussing on Trucy. "Ah, Fraulein, what is a sweet morsel like you doing in such a dismal place? Can I help?"
Trucy had smiled and opened her mouth to respond before Apollo cut in, stepping protectively in front of his sister. "We don't need any help from you," he insisted.

"Apollo!" Luke hissed, horrified at his brother's blatant rudeness.

Klavier's posture straightened a little, emphasising his height over the shorter Apollo, whose gaze he met evenly with only a faint fading of his friendly smile. "But I don't believe I was addressing you, Herr Wright," he pointed out. "I was speaking to the Fraulein."

Luke cast suspicious glances between the two. "Have... you two met?"

"And as her guardian right now," Apollo said, ignoring his brother, "I'm refusing contact with you. The answer is 'no'."

Biting her lip nervously, Trucy tugged on the back of Apollo's cape as her brother and the handsome stranger stared each other down. "But, Polly, the officer man won't let us in!"

"Of course he will," Luke insisted, and stepped around his surprised brother to approach the officer directly. "I think you'll find, despite the envelope its in, that's a perfectly serviceable letter of request."

He crossed his arms, giving the now-nervous man a stern glare. "Correct me if I'm wrong, but wouldn't it be against the law to refuse an attorney, and his assistants, entrance to the crime scenes connected to his client? You're already on thin ice after the threat of chemical assault earlier."

The officer gulped, sweating already as he handed the envelope back to Luke. "O-of course you can go through," he insisted, grabbing at the tape to hold it high enough for them all to duck under it. "Why would I s-stop you?"

"Thank you very much!" Luke replied with a large grin, looking back at Apollo triumphantly.

As Apollo stared in astonishment at his brother, Klavier laughed. "Ah, so we are going to the same place then!" he said, gesturing into the park. "I will take you to the scene of the crime myself!" With that, he ducked under the tape and headed down the path.

Trucy grinned, dashing after Klavier with a loud, "Whee!"

Apollo tried to grab his sister's cape as it passed, but narrowly missed. Instead, he gave Luke a frustrated glare. "You couldn't have waited for him to leave?"

Luke blinked in surprise. "Wh... I was just trying to help, Apollo!"

Rolling his eyes, Apollo ducked under the tape and ran after their sister with a groan. A baffled Luke was close at his heels.

June 15, 1:32PM

People Park

When Apollo caught up to Trucy, he found her skipping at Klavier's side, happily chatting away with him. "Really?" she was saying in response to her new friend, whose comment Apollo hadn't been close enough to hear. "That's weird! You seem really friendly to me!"

Apollo frowned, deciding to hang back a little. 'The hell are they talking about...?' He had to admit, he was a little curious about the mysterious younger Gavin.

Klavier chuckled. "You are very different from usual girls, Fraulein... but 'different' is a good thing, ja? It would be awful to be exactly the same as everyone else."

"That's what I've always thought," Trucy agreed. "We're both magicians, you know, me and Polly... Well, Polly's a lawyer too, but he doesn't get cases very often. We gotta stand out on stage, or who's gonna watch our show?"

Apollo almost stopped dead in shock. 'Wait, was she telling him about me!?'

Luke caught up to the group, walking alongside his brother and shooting him confused looks. For one reason or another, he decided to stay quiet.

Klavier stared at Trucy for a moment. "You truly do not know who I am, Fraulein?"

Trucy frowned back at him, confused. "Am I supposed to?"

"Ah, it does not matter," Klavier replied, softly laughing.

'Aaaaand I think that's enough of that.' Steeleing his nerve, Apollo quickened his pace behind his sister, hissing, "Trucy!" When she looked back at him with a surprised expression, he gave her a stern frown, gesturing with his head for her to drop back behind him.

Trucy only glared, pretending she hadn't seen the gesture. "What? I'm just talking!"

"With a complete stranger," Apollo pointed out. "I'm not going to be the one telling Dad when you get yourself hurt! Or killed!"

"Since when have we not talked to strangers!?” Trucy shot back. "All our clients are strangers!"

"G-guys, we can discuss this rationally," Luke meekly tried to interrupt, clutching his satchel strap as he looked between his siblings. "P-please stay calm!"

A clearing throat snapped the bickering pair from their argument, and the three Wrights looked up at Klavier in shock, having forgotten he was there. "I'm afraid we have reached your destination," he said, still smiling as he gestured down the path ahead of them, where it met the river and turned off to the right. At a glance, Apollo saw a field of blue plastic and what looked like a wooden construction of some sort. "I am heading on elsewhere," Klavier continued, "so I will leave you be. Enjoy your investigation!" With a wave, he turned and headed back the way they had come.

Trucy blinked in shock, then jumped after Klavier with a grin, waving at him. "Thank you!" she called. "Will we see you again?"

Klavier laughed, briefly turning to walk backwards. "Ask the wind, Fraulein. I'll be riding on it!"

With that, he was gone.

Apollo instantly returned to glaring at his siblings. "What is you two's problem!?” he cried. "Why didn't you listen to me when I said not to talk to him!?”

"But you didn't say not to talk to him!" Luke pointed out with a worried frown. "You told him not to talk to Trucy!"

"It's the same thing!" Apollo shot back.

Trucy crossed her arms, pouting at Apollo. "What's your problem?” she demanded. "He's nice! Why don't you like him when you don't even know him!"

Apollo groaned, rolling his eyes. "Truce... you seriously didn't recognise him?"

Although her anger seemed to fade at the question, Trucy shook her head.

Luke, however, only looked more worried. "I... thought he looked familiar," he admitted.

Sighing, Apollo finally calmed down. "That... That was Klavier Gavin," he explained. "Kristoph Gavin's younger brother."

"Doesn't he play in a band or something?" Trucy asked, confused. "What's he doing at a crime scene?"

"No idea," Apollo sighed, shaking his head. "Look, let's... discuss it later, okay? We should try and focus on the case for now."

"Y-yeah," Luke agreed, "we'll talk about it later."

Trucy only morosely nodded, moping in the direction of the river.

As he and Luke followed their sister, Apollo turned his attention to the wooden structure he had spotted earlier. He was sure he didn't remember seeing such a thing along the river before, and he seemed to be proven right as he got a closer look at it, seeing that it was actually some kind of wagon, and a very familiar one at that. Red bandannas with white letters printed on them hung over the edge of the aging black roof, which, despite the table, box and oil drum tied to it with rope, Apollo had seen too many times over the years to not instantly recognise. "Wait, that's-!"

Ahead of him, Trucy screamed, running back and jumping on Apollo, frantically grabbing at him. "Polly!" She pointed fearfully to the front of the cart. "A corpse!"

"What!?!" Apollo cried, grabbing back at his sister protectively.

Luke immediately dashed past his siblings, looking around to the front of the cart... but his determined glare quickly melted into a relieved laugh, and he looked back at Apollo and Trucy with a smile. "It's okay," he announced, gesturing with a wave of his hand. "It's just a mannequin!"

The caped duo stared at their brother for a moment, then Trucy pulled away from Apollo and dashed back to Luke's side, laughing as she came back into view of her 'corpse'. "Wow, it sure got me!"

Apollo followed her, staring in confusion at a strange lightweight statue of a policeman mid-salute, leaning forward against the pull-bar of the cart, which it was tied to with yellow police tape. "Huh. Weird."

A clearing throat behind them startled the trio, and they spun around to see the grumpy detective, a hand on her hips as she glared at the Wright children. "Might I ask exactly what it is you're doing here?" Before they could reply, she blinked in surprise, apparently recognising their faces as they spun around. "Oh, it's you." She frowned again. "How did you get in here?"

Luke's hands curled into fists, returning her glare; Apollo suspected he was taking the detective's (and the officer at the archway's) beef with them personally. "We have a letter of request from our client," he informed her, reaching into his satchel to retrieve the item. "My older brother here is the defence attorney on the case."

The detective glared at them for a moment in silence, then snatched the letter from Luke's hands, opening it without a second glance. From her purse, she pulled out a large magnifying glass, using it to study the paper, squinting through her large lens at the handwritten note.

Apollo, Luke and Trucy shared confused glances; Did a simple letter of request really deserve that intense a scrutiny...?

View the Court Record
Finally, what felt like an eternity later, the detective seemed to finish studying the paper, passing it back to Luke with a sniff. "I'd recognise that handwriting anywhere. Scientific analysis says this was written by Alita Tiala."

While his siblings mostly looked confused, Apollo defaulted to a glare. "Thanks," he grumbled. "Took you thirty minutes to read her signature!?"

Luke shrugged, putting the letter away. "So, why is there a mannequin pulling the noodle stand there?"

"It's taking the place of the body," the detective explained, a hand resting idly on her hip in what Apollo figured was her neutral posture... the same as the slight frown on her lips. "Preserving the scene of the crime as it was found."

Apollo looked back curiously. "So our victim... was Mister Eldoon's thief?"

"So," the detective continued, and Apollo turned around to see her looking at him, casting her eyes suspiciously up and down his magician's outfit. "You're a defence attorney, are you?"

Nodding, Apollo threw back the right side of his cape, tapping at his badge with a small smile. The detective thought a moment as she stared at it, then grunted to herself, meeting Apollo's eyes. "Detective Ema Skye," she said, and it took the young attorney a moment to realise she was introducing herself. "I'm in charge of this crime scene."

Trucy leaned towards Luke, whispering, "She doesn't seem that happy about it..."

Apollo didn't think she seemed that happy about a lot of things.

"I trust you know how to stay out of the way," Ema continued. "I always carry two pairs of handcuffs... just in case."

Trucy frowned, looking at her brothers. "Um, but there are three of us...?"

Ema's eyes narrowed. "I could make it work," she darkly replied. With that, she stepped backwards and sat on a fold-out chair sitting on the path at the back of the benches looking out over the river, glaring at the trio as she pulled out a small plastic baggie with some kind of foreign text on it. Before the trio could ask what it was, she'd popped open the bag and was tossing the chocolate sticks inside into her mouth a handful at a time, munching on the treats loudly enough to signal she wasn't open for further conversation.

The Wrights stood in confusion for several long moments, then looked at each other and mutually shrugged. Luke was the first to talk, pointing a thumb at the nearby wooden cart. "So, um... we all noticed that's Mister Eldoon's noodle stand, didn't we?"

Apollo nodded. "The circumstances could stand to be better," he said. "We can't exactly return it to
"That's a shame," Trucy sighed. "He's out of work until the police investigation's over!"

"Well then," Luke said, smiling, "that makes it our job to get this all sorted out as soon as possible! Once the true murderer is convicted, Mister Eldoon can get his stand back!"

"True," Apollo agreed with a determined smirk. "Let's get started then, shall we?"

As the trio turned to approach the stand, a cry from behind halted them: "Hey!" They looked back in surprise to see Ema, half-out of her seat as she glared at the Wrights, one hand still in her bag of food. "No messing with the crime scene!"

Apollo stared at her in disbelief. "B-but we need to investigate!" he argued.

"Investigations are to be carried out by professionals," Ema snapped, "scientifically!"

Luke frowned. "But that's not exactly fair," he calmly pointed out. "You're already watching us like a hawk, and you weren't doing anything anyway when we arrived! Isn't that a clear enough signal that your investigation is over!?!"

Ema just ignored him. "Quiet, please. It's snack time." Firmly looking away, she resumed shoving sticks of chocolate in her mouth.

"We're not making much progress here," Trucy pointed out.

Apollo shook his head, a hand resting on Trucy's shoulder. "I don't think there's any arguing with her," he told his siblings under his breath.

Luke was forced to reluctantly agree. "Let's just go," he sighed.

Phoenix's Room

Phoenix had been dozing off to the sound of the Pink Princess when a gentle knocking on his door startled him back into wakefulness, looking up with surprise to see his children smiling cheekily at him from the ward door. "Ah, you're back!" he called, putting aside his half-forgotten notebook and sitting up against his pillow.

Luke and Trucy giggled as they came in, each taking up their usual posts either side of Phoenix's bed. "Were you sleeping, Papa?" Luke asked.

"Just resting my eyes," Phoenix replied, shoving his hands in the front pocket of his hoodie with a lazy smile.

"Yeah, old men need their rest," Apollo joked.

Phoenix waved off the trio's laughter, deciding to get to business. "Run into some problems already? You only just got that defence request."

"Oh! Yeah!" Trucy cried, gasping as she remembered why they were there and facing her father with an angry glare. "That funny detective lady won't let us on the scene! What kind of detective wears a lab coat, anyway!?"

Phoenix's surprised look went unnoticed.

"A detective who thinks she's a scientist, apparently," Luke added, himself frowning at the memory of the woman as he turned to explain to Phoenix. "She threatened to throw what she called 'experimental Hydroxyacelunodosetrase' at us, but I'm sure she was just making it up because the 'ase' at the end means it was an enzyme, and of all the enzymes I've studied over the years, I've never heard of one with such a long na-

"Okay, Luke," Apollo interrupted, "we don't need to know!" As Luke sheepishly quietened, the elder brother sighed and turned to Phoenix. "Her name was really familiar for some reason... 'Skye'?"

Smiling, Phoenix nodded. "She was involved in a case of mine, about ten years ago," he explained. "She was still a high school student at the time."

Trucy and Luke exchanged surprised looks. "Doesn't that make her about our age?" Luke asked, gesturing to himself and Apollo.

"A little older than Apollo, actually," Phoenix admitted.

"Of course you'd know who she was!" Trucy cried, grinning. "You'd know all the police types, wouldn't you, Daddy?" Before Phoenix could do more than laugh in response, Trucy's good mood faded, and she fiddled nervously with the pin on her cape. "Oh, yeah... you'd know who the guy who let us in to the crime scene was, too..."

Phoenix paused, watching the trio suddenly all look away uncomfortably. "I get the feeling you three have been up to a lot since you got that request," he said. "Mind catching me up?"

Apollo thought a moment, then nodded, determinedly meeting Phoenix's gaze. "First of all, it turns out my case is the murder at People Park," he said.

"Huh."

"Yeah!" Trucy added with a grin. "And we found Mister Eldoon's noodle stand at the scene of the crime!"

"Did you now," Phoenix replied, rubbing his chin thoughtfully and keeping his expression carefully blank. "That's unusual indeed. Never heard of a noodle stand being used as a murder weapon."

Trucy burst into giggles, while Apollo rolled his eyes. Luke just smiled, telling their father, "Papa, the murder weapon was something else!"

"Was it?" Phoenix replied, unable to hide his smile through his innocent expression. "What was it then?"

Apollo sighed. "We don't know," he admitted. "Detective Skye won't let us investigate."

Phoenix frowned in thought, nodding. "So she clearly didn't let you in." He looked up, meeting Apollo's eyes. "Who did?"

The eldest of the Wright children was reluctant to answer, looking away for a moment before regaining his determination to meet Phoenix's eyes. "Klavier Gavin."
Phoenix stared for a very long moment before finally reacting, closing his eyes as his frown subtly deepened. "Ah."

"What's he doing here?" Trucy asked, fiddling with her pin again. "He's a musician, isn't he? Mister Gavin's brother?"

"But he's a prosecutor," Luke picked up, confused. "Doesn't it make sense for him to be at a crime scene?"

Apollo sighed. "He quit prosecuting seven years ago, to focus on his music. Hasn't stepped foot in the prosecutor's office since."

Phoenix kept silent and still.

"Maybe he came back?" Luke hesitantly offered in the ensuing silence. "There's no other reason for him to have been at People Park today, after all."

"But why would he?" Apollo argued. "He only ever prosecuted one case, then ran off with his tail between his legs! Why would he-?" He paused, stopping mid-sentence as his eyes widened in sudden realisation. "His brother went to jail," he breathed.

"His brother went to jail!" Apollo repeated, louder as he started to panic. "I got him convicted! He's gone back to the prosecutor's office to bring me down like he brought down Dad!"

"Apollo." The young man stopped, snapping out of his panic as he looked over to his father, who was giving him a firm stare. "Klavier has been back at that office for a few weeks now. If he was actively planning something against you, he would have done something before ending up on the same case by pure luck."

While Apollo was forcing himself to stay calm, Luke gave Phoenix a suspicious look. "You already knew he was back at the prosecutor's office?"

Phoenix gave a quick nod. "Edgeworth told me. He's been keeping an eye on him." He looked back to Apollo. "You don't need to worry about Klavier. He might be difficult, but he follows the rules. Edgeworth says his heart's in the right place, at least."

Luke seemed unconvinced.

"Well... that's good, right?" Trucy said, forcing a smile for her brothers. "Uncle Edgeworth won't let anything happen to us!"

Apollo thought a moment, then sighed, nodding. "Sure, I'll try not to worry about him," he reluctantly agreed. "But that still leaves the problem of Detective Skye. We can't investigate with her around!"

At that, Phoenix smiled. "Trucy," he said, looking to the girl, "you remember that trophy you got in that talent show several years back?"

Trucy grinned proudly. "You bet!"

"The one in the office with the spare hats on top of it?" Luke asked, eyelids lowered.

"There's a little something I've hidden in there," Phoenix continued. "Take it to the detective. It should convince her to work with you a little."

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "And what is this mysterious 'item' of yours?" he asked.

Phoenix just grinned. "You'll see," he almost sang, winking mischievously. "Oh, and tell her I said 'hi', would you?"

View the Court Record
It was Trucy who led the charge into the office, making a beeline for the staircase drawers sat between Charley and the piano. The drawers themselves were full of old and spare props and extra costume pieces, but a handful of larger items were carefully arranged on top: On the bottommost 'step' was a large green file, too big for the drawers, and a small box of assorted items; The middle 'step' was currently empty except for the extra red scarf and blue tie draped across it, while the top step proudly displayed a golden trophy, almost level with the top of the neighbouring piano. The plaque on the trophy's base proclaimed Trucy Wright as the winner of an annual talent contest held at Prime Mall a few years back, and on top of it was carefully balanced two silk top hats, one blue, one red.

The two hats on the trophy had been a source of almost constant consternation for Apollo and Trucy for several months now. When the drawers were in place, and Trucy had proudly set up her new display the way she wanted it, she had placed Apollo’s spare hat and tie on the middle step, putting her trophy atop her scarf and under her hat on the top step. The moment Apollo saw how much more prominently Trucy’s part of the display was, he had quietly moved her scarf to the middle step and balanced his own hat on top of hers... and thus begun a silent war. Although Luke and Phoenix had started out trying to compromise with the pair, the Gramarye siblings’ own rearrangings of the ‘tower’ kept winning out, always moving their own hat to be on top, and their brother and father simply gave up.

As Trucy turned to the trophy today, she discovered with a pout that Apollo had been the last to ‘fix’ it, with his own crimson hat balanced rather precariously atop hers. Slapping the offending red object aside (and sending it tumbling to the floor), she grabbed at the trophy beneath, her own hat staying stable atop it.

Apollo entered the room just in time to see his hat falling to the pale green carpet, and sent a glare at his sister as he snatched it up. "Hey, I should be getting this thing of Dad's!" he objected, making a grab for the trophy.

"Nuh-uh!" Trucy replied, sticking her tongue out at her brother as she manoeuvred out of his reach. "It's my trophy! I'm opening it!"

"Give it here!" Apollo cried, managing to grab one of the handles and turning their fight into a tug-of-war that sent Trucy's spare hat to the floor. "Dad told me to get it, anyway!"

Attracted by the noise, Pearl ran in from the kitchen, staring with wide eyes at the scene before her. "Apollo? Trucy?"

"Apollo's being a butt!" Trucy only shouted, managing to drag Apollo around to the glass-topped table between the twin sofas, which they stood at the end of as they continued their tug-of-war.

"And you're being a pest!" Apollo snapped in return, stepping up his efforts to keep his sister from moving them from where they now stood.
Luke rolled his eyes as he came in behind his siblings. "Do you two have to bicker about this like a pair of five-year-olds?" Briefly leaning down to grab Trucy's spare hat from the floor, he stepped forward between them, pulling Apollo's hat from his hands (unwittingly allowing his brother to tighten his grip on the trophy). "You're an adult, Apollo, and Trucy, you are perfectly capable of acting like one!" he firmly reminded them. With a small smile, he held up the hats in his hands. "Now, why don't we put our serious business hats on," he plopped Apollo's hat on his head and went to do the same to Trucy before realising she was already wearing her usual stage hat. After a short pause, he simply placed the spare on top of the hat already on her head in a small tower that made everyone else stare in stunned confusion, finishing off with a grin and a, "And discuss this like grown-ups! How's that sound?"

Apollo and Trucy stared at each other for a moment, and it seemed like they might listen to their brother before they both scowled, resuming their tug-of-war with even more ferocity than before, shouting indistinctly at the top of their lungs. Pearl was running around to try and stop them when the pair suddenly tipped over, falling either side of the glass-topped table to the floor in front of the red sofas, the trophy itself landing on the glass with a terrifying crash, sending all four cowering; Apollo and Trucy, already on the carpet, hid their faces under their arms, while Luke jumped back to the drawers and piano behind him, arms flying to his face. Pearl, mid-step in her run to aid her cousins, changed direction to jump at Luke's side, pressing her face to the back of his shoulder and clinging to his forearm.

The silence stretched out for several long seconds. Slowly, Luke lowered his arms, Pearl peeking out from behind him. Despite their fears, the table had survived the force of the trophy being thrown at its fragile glass surface, and the pair sighed loudly in relief. "Thank goodness," Luke muttered. Though Pearl still clung to his arm, he didn't make any move to push her away.

Either side of the table, Apollo and Trucy came out of hiding, pushing themselves up to peek over the tabletop. They locked eyes for a moment, Trucy having lost both her hats in the fall while Apollo was pulling the brim of his down more firmly on his temple. Between them, spread across the table top, were the fallen trophy on its side, the lid to the golden cup nearby, what looked like a cotton ball on a stick, and a small brown jar with a white lid, which rolled gently a little way before coming to a stop.

Trucy gasped, jumping up and grabbing at the jar with an open smile. "I remember this!" she cried, holding the object high and looking between her brothers excitedly. "I found it in Daddy's dresser when I was little, before you guys got adopted! I thought it was sugar, so I licked it!" She paused, staring off into the distance with an expression more befitting a traumatised soldier looking upon the field of war. "It wasn't sugar."

Apollo raised an eyebrow, pushing himself up and reaching forward to take the jar from his sister's outstretched hand.

"I got in a lot of trouble with Daddy," Trucy added, as a coda to her dramatic story.

Frowning, Apollo studied the jar, turning it over in his hands as he immediately went for the white sticker along the side. "What even is this? I think the label's... in Spanish, maybe?"

Luke stepped around to Apollo's side, taking the jar as his brother handed it over. He frowned as he also studied the object. "French, I think," he decided.

"Can you read it?" Pearl asked, stepping around to Trucy's side and helping the younger teen up, the young magician's hands full with the pair of cyan top hats she had gathered into her arms.

"Sorry, no," Luke had to admit, shaking his head. "All I can pick up is that most of these words seem Sighing, Apollo grabbed the odd cotton ball on the table and got to his feet, spinning the fluffy 'brush' between his fingers. "So we've got a mysterious jar of white powder and a strange ball-shaped brush... and Dad isn't telling us what they're for?"

Pearl blinked in surprise. "Why are you getting them if you don't know what they're for?" she asked.

"Daddy told us to!" Trucy brightly explained, putting one of her hats back on her head with a grin. "We've got to show them to the detective! She'll know what they are!"

Pearl was still confused. "Why?" she hesitantly asked.

"Because apparently Dad knows her, and it should convince her to let us investigate," Apollo explained, sighing as he took back the jar from Luke. "Speaking of, we should really get moving again. We need as much information as we can get about this case if we want to have any hope of winning in court." He shoved the jar and brush in his bag, gesturing for Luke to attend to the fallen trophy.

Once Luke had righted the golden trophy, placing its lid back in place, he returned the object to its home on the top of the staircase drawers. Trucy, clutching her spare hat in her hands, kept close at his back, intently watching both the trophy and Apollo.

"Sorry to fly through like this, Pearly," the eldest of the Wright children was telling their cousin. "We're kind of all over the place with this investigation."

"It's alright," Pearl replied with a smile. "Mister Nick always had the same problem!"

Laughing, Apollo then waved a farewell and turned to the door, preparing to head out.

Trucy snickered behind a hand, badly hiding her giggles. "Oh, we're ready to go, Polly?" she innocently asked.

Apollo turned to face her with a confused frown. He opened his mouth to speak, only to see Luke, stood behind their sister, give Apollo a look, a hand playing with the brim of his cap. With a gasp, he suddenly remembered the crimson top hat on his head, and grabbed it, stepping over to Trucy with a frown. He made a grab for the hat in her hands, then, when she moved it behind her back, for the one on her head, the two engaging in another war of who was going to put theirs on the trophy first.

Pearl and Luke glanced at each other worriedly, then Luke sighed, stepping towards his siblings and pulling the spare hats from them with a glare. "That's enough fighting for one day!" he ordered, turning to put them away himself. To Trucy's loud disappointment, it was hers that ended up in the middle of the 'tower'. Before she could do much more than whine wordlessly and reach up to try and 'fix' it herself, Luke had spun around, placing his hands firmly on her shoulders, and was pushing her out of the office. "We're going back to People Park!" he forcefully told her as they left the room.

Apollo grinned at seeing the tower in the 'right' order. "Seeya later, Pearly," he called as one last goodbye to their cousin, getting a smile in return as he turned to follow his siblings.
When the Wrights returned to the crime scene, they found Ema standing on the path, arms crossed and one foot rapidly tapping as she sent a furious glare at the noodle stand in front of her. She perked up a little at the sound of their approaching footsteps, turning to face her scowl on her visitors as she recognised them. "You three again!" she cried, waving at them to go away. "Didn't I tell you to leave my crime scene alone!"

Apollo bit back a retort, instead just pulling the strange jar and its accompanying brush from his bag. "Look, does this ring any bells for you?" he asked, holding them up for her to see.

Ema blinked in surprise, taking a step back as she stared at the items, one hand pressed to her cheek. "I-is that-? It couldn't-!" She looked up at Apollo, eyes narrowed, and demanded, "Where'd you get that?"

The three Wrights glanced at each other, wondering how to explain. "Well, it... was our Papa's," Luke hesitantly explained. "He told us to get it from the office to show you."

Ema stared at them for a long moment, her suspicious frown softening into a more thoughtful look. "You... work at the Wright & Co Law Offices, yes?"

Apollo raised an eyebrow, wondering how long it had been since he'd heard that phrase. "Sort of."

Trucy stomped a foot, glaring at Ema. "Detective Skye! How do you know our daddy!?" she demanded.

Ema almost jumped backwards, staring wide-eyed at Trucy and Luke. "Wait, you weren't joking!?" she cried. "Don't tell me you two are actually-!"

"Phoenix Wright's children, yes," Apollo interrupted, giving her a stern stare. "All three of us." He gestured to his siblings, saying, "This is my sister Trucy, my brother Luke," he pointed to himself, "and I'm Apollo. I'm the lawyer."

For a very long moment, Ema continued to stare, then her gaze narrowed again on Apollo. "You're Apollo?" she said.

Apollo nodded, frowning. "Has Dad not told you about us? You're a friend of his, right? From one of his cases?"

Ema crossed her arms, biting her lip for a moment. "He mentioned you," she admitted. "Didn't say anything about kids though. But..." She straightened up, giving the trio a grin as one hand adjusted the familiar pair of white-rimmed glasses on her head. "If you three are Mister Wright's kids, then I'm available to help you in any way I can!"

The trio exchanged confused glances, then Luke gave her a bright smile. "Thank you very much!" he replied.

"This powder," Ema continued, tapping at the jar in Apollo's hand, "is used for detecting fingerprints. I guess you might call it a memento, from the time I spent with Mister Wright." She paused to smile nostalgically, then gasped. "Oh! Actually, I have the perfect piece of evidence to teach you how to dust for prints yourself! C'mon!" Waving for the trio to follow her, she spun around and excitedly ran to the corner of the path, near where the mannequin was slumped over the front of the cart.

Trucy skipped after Ema with a giggle, and Apollo was moving to follow her when he felt a tap on his arm, and turned to see Luke hanging back. "What is it?" he asked his younger brother.

"I'll be right back," Luke said, gesturing behind them to an open grassy area of the park. "There are some crows over there, so I thought I'd just check to see if they saw anything."

Apollo nodded, watching his brother promptly dash off towards the grass. Sighing, the elder sibling then turned and hurried to catch up to Ema and Trucy, who were crouched on the path. Nearby, sticking handle-up out of the muddy ground, was a thin knife. Ema watched the eldest Wright's approach with a raised eyebrow. "Oi! We can't start this without- Hey, where's your brother going?"

"He'll be back," Apollo said as explanation, crouching at Trucy's side and holding out the powder and brush for Ema to take. "Here."

Ema scoffed, pushing the items back towards Apollo. "Nuh-uh, how can I teach you unless you do it yourself?" She gestured to the knife. "This here is a 'shiv'."

"Ooh, lingo!" Trucy cooed excitedly.

"Given the defendant is the son of known gangsters, the police are assuming this belongs to him," Ema continued with a cocky grin. "Wanna see if they're right?"

_Talking as though you aren't one of them,_ Apollo thought, but kept it to himself, looking at the knife with a raised eyebrow. "So you want us to..." He trailed off, noticing black marks on the beige handle. "Wait, is that a hand print?"

"Well spotted!" Ema grinned, and Trucy giggled at her side. "And where there's a hand print, there might be a fingerprint! Let's investigate!"

It took several minutes to dust the 'shiv' for prints, and Apollo had to admit, he actually enjoyed it a little, reminded of the times Phoenix had supervised their use of the luminol. In fact, the memory of the blood-detecting substance had brought his answers on why Ema, and the glasses atop her head, were so familiar; It was her name scrawled along the side of Phoenix's spray-bottle, and the red-tinted glasses had gone with it... Not that this new knowledge had improved his opinion of her all that much.

Under Ema's supervision, Apollo had coated the knife's handle with the white powder (which they learned was aluminium-based) from the jar, and Trucy had helped him blow the excess away. Ema prompted Apollo to pick a finger of the resulting print, then picked the powder there up with tape and pressed it onto a clear plastic card. Her print prepared, she entered it into a device she got out of her bag.

"So," Ema asked, her machine buzzing in her hand, "whose prints do you want to check this against? The police office has samples we can compare to."
"That doesn't sound like as much fun as actually finding the print," Apollo mused, but kept the thought to himself. "Well... I guess Wocky Kitaki, if you think it's his."

Ema grinned, jabbing a few buttons on her machine. It buzzed for a few more moments before going quiet with a triumphant beep, a tiny speaker squawking "MATCH FOUND."

Apollo sighed. "So this knife is the defendant's," he mumbled. 'What a waste of time...'

"Yes! Isn't it amazing?" Ema replied, not noticing Apollo's disappointment as she practically shone in glee. "Ah, the power of science. It's my life!"

Trucy giggled, elbowing her brother and whispering, "Polly, she's sparkling!"

"And I'm dimming," Apollo muttered in reply.

"Look sharp, spirits up," Ema ordered with a smile, getting to her feet as she put her fingerprint machine back in her bag. "The real fight is yet to come!"

"Yeah!" Trucy agreed, bouncing into a standing position alongside her morose brother. "Chin up, Polly!"

Apollo just sighed. The trial hasn't even started and I'm already losing...' "The defendant's prints on the knife mean he was here the night of the crime," he pointed out to Trucy.

"That's what I call irrefutable scientific evidence!" Trucy replied. "Neat!"

"Not so neat when it happens to be evidence against our client," Apollo pointed out, arms crossed. He looked to Ema. "What else do you know about the case?"

Ema's smile faded as she got back to business. "The body was found much as you see it now..." She paused, gesturing to the mannequin at the front of the cart. "Except it was a real body."

Apollo frowned. "But... why?"

"Why was a body pulling a noodle stand?" Ema elaborated, frowning herself. "If I knew the answer to that, I wouldn't still be here."

Sheepishly running a hand through his hair, Apollo decided to move on. "Well, what was the cause of death?"

"A bullet wound, to the temple," Ema explained. "He was shot by a pistol. Not the easiest thing to come by in this day and age."

'Unless you're a cop,' Apollo mentally replied. 'Or a gangster.' He pulled out his Court Record, thinking it was probably a good idea to start getting photos of the scene.

"Incidentally, the victim's name was Pal Meraktis," Ema continued, digging around in her bag. "I just received the autopsy report, in fact."

"Meraktis!?" Trucy repeated in shock.

Apollo had to agree, almost dropping his tablet computer as he jumped up from his photo-taking of the knife at their feet. Ema held out a manilla envelope and the young lawyer wasted no time in taking it, opening the file to examine. Trucy pressed herself to his side, reading over his shoulder.
The photo of Meraktis' square face didn't look familiar, the man himself staring grumpily into the camera with thick eyebrows, greying hair streaked with black sweeping across the top of his head and hanging above his left eye. The file described him as being forty-six, the same age as his neighbour Eldoon, and having died from a bullet wound to the brain in the half-hour around ten-thirty the previous night. 'And he hit Dad around nine... and the magic panties were stolen sometime before ten... And somewhere in there, he stole Mister Eldoon's noodle stand, too. Man, he must've had a busy night.'

"I mean, really!" Ema scoffed to herself, throwing a hand in the air. "What's up with this case!? It's enough to make me want to run off, pulling a mysterious noodle stand behind me...!"

Trucy smiled. "Not so mysterious, actually!" she proudly announced, then elbowed her brother. "Tell her, Polly!"

Ema raised an eyebrow. "You know where that thing came from?" she realised, jerking a thumb in the direction of the stand. "A likely story! I didn't come here to play games, you know!"

Apollo resisted the urge to laugh. "Actually, we do know where the noodle stand came from. It's written all over the cart!" He busied himself putting the autopsy report back together, and tried to hand it back to Ema before she just shook her head, briefly indicating a second copy in her bag. Putting his report in the bag at his hip, Apollo gave Ema a grin. "That's the Eldoon's Noodles cart," he said. "The proprietor, Guy Eldoon himself, hired us this morning to find it after it was stolen!"

"He's famous in this part of town!" Trucy boasted.

Ema stared at the pair for a long moment, then leaned to the side with a smile, her hand on her hip. "Not bad. I guess Mister Wright picked the right kids for the job." She gestured to the stand. "That saved me a lot of work. Thanks."

Apollo and Trucy shared a grin, then Trucy looked to Ema, bouncing on her heels. "What sort of person was the victim, anyway?"

"You mean what did he do?" Ema replied. "He was a doctor."

Apollo frowned. 'Yep, definitely the same Meraktis of the clinic. Hence the police car there.'

"As for why he died like this, search me!" Ema continued with a frustrated huff. "Inconceivable! I just don't get it! Some people just can't die normally!"

"It is strange," Trucy agreed, tapping a finger against her chin in thought.

'He's dead, give him a break,' Apollo thought. "Is there anything else you can tell us about the victim?"

Ema sighed, looking off in a random direction as she thought. "Well, let's see... Apparently he's the physician at a clinic in the area. Quite well off too, from the sound of it."

"You mean the Meraktis Clinic?" Trucy cut in, standing solemnly at her brother's side. "That's why the cop car's parked there, right?"

"What?" Ema replied, raising an eyebrow. "You've been to the clinic?"

Apollo nodded. "Yeah. On a... related issue, actually. Like I said, Mister Eldoon hired us to find his stand after it went missing."
"He lives right next door to the Meraktis Clinic!" Trucy added with a grin, bouncing on her heels. "We were there looking for clues!"

Ema thought for a moment. "I see." She fiddled with a strip of hair hanging over her shoulder. "So that means, Doctor Meraktis stole the stand and pulled it all the way here?"

"That would seem to be the case," Apollo agreed. "As for why, we've got as much of an idea as you do." 'I get the feeling Mister Eldoon might know, though...'

"What about the defendant?" Trucy asked, looking to Ema. "Do you know anything about him?"

"The only son of the Kitaki family?" Apollo pointed out with a frown at his sister. "What else is there to know?"

Ema smirked at little. "Well, I don't know if he is the boss's son, but he's certainly throwing his weight around." She frowned. "Violently. In the detention center."

Trucy's idle bouncing halted as she stared at the detective in surprise. "I see."

"Why was he arrested in the first place?" Apollo asked. "Surely that knife isn't your only reason?"

Ema thought a moment. "You're Wocky Kitaki's defence attorney, am I right?"

Apollo nodded. "Y-yes, actually."

Sighing, Ema looked away. "Well... we have a witness to the moment of the crime."

Trucy squeaked in surprise, but Apollo could only stare in disbelief.

"The witness called the police," Ema continued. "They'll be testifying during the trial tomorrow."

Apollo and Trucy were still in shock over Ema's bombshell when a shout from behind attracted the trio's attention. "Apollo!" They turned to see Luke racing down the path towards them, a massive grin on his face as he waved for their attention. "There was someone in the stand!"

"What!?!" Apollo cried, stepping forward to meet his brother as he rejoined them, doubling over to pant in exhaustion from his sprint. "What do you mean 'someone was in the stand'!?!"

"It... matches... what Spoon heard!" Luke insisted, pushing himself off his knees to stand straight, though it seemed nothing could dim his triumphant grin. "You couldn't fit a person and all those bowls in there at the same time!"

Trucy squealed. "You mean she wasn't just imagining things? We're a step closer to solving the mystery!"

Apollo was about to open his mouth to demand more information when a voice from behind interrupted him: "And how do you know that?" Luke's face instantly paled, and the three Wrights turned to see Ema watching them suspiciously. "You weren't here looking for proof, so you must have a witness. Who was it?"

Luke nervously smiled. "Uh... m-me?"

"Uh huh." Ema wasn't convinced, still staring at Luke with narrowed eyes. "If you were here in the park last night, where exactly were you at the time of the murder? Why didn't you come forward to police?"

Apollo saw Luke look to him for help, but could only shake his head and step back. 'Sorry, I got nothing. You got yourself into this mess, animal-whisperer.'

"I, uh..." Luke mumbled, kicking a shoe into the pavement beneath them. "I was... in a tree?"

Ema just continued to stare.

"And, obviously," Trucy cut in, gripping Luke's arm tightly as she glared protectively at the detective, "he was really embarrassed about it and that's why he didn't come forward!" She looked up at Luke, winking at him with the eye furthest from Ema. "That's right, isn't it? You don't like admitting to your weird bird-watching hobby!"

"Y-yeah, that's it!" Luke jumped in, pulling nervously at his collar. "I, uh, was watching the ducks! In the river!" He briefly pointed to the nearby water, then to the tree behind the noodle stand. "You get a good view of the river from up in the trees!"

After another moment of silence, Ema pulled a notepad out of her bag, readying a pen. "So then, as a witness with his big 'secret bird-watching hobby' exposed, I don't suppose you'd mind testifying to what you saw then?"

"I-I guess not," Luke agreed, sending Apollo a nervous glance before stepping forward to meet Ema.
"Where did you want me to start?"

"Your full name first," Ema replied. "Then you can tell me everything you know about last night."

Ema rolled her eyes. "I'm just asking your name. Why is that such a difficult question?"

Apollo stepped forward, resting a hand on his brother's shoulder. "Luke didn't change his name when we were adopted," he explained, and didn't miss Ema's eyes suddenly widening in understanding, as though more than one question had just been answered for her.

Luke nodded. "I usually go by 'Luke Wright'," he added, "but, officially, my name is still 'Luke Triton'. I... guess, as a witness, you'd... want my official name, right?"

Ema thought a moment, then nodded, jotting down on her notepad and saying aloud, "Luke Triton." With that, she gave him a small smile before returning to her business-like frown. "Your testimony, please?"

Hesitantly, Luke began to explain what he knew... a testimony Apollo and Trucy knew he was only passing on from the local bird population, hence the claim he had seen everything from the trees. "I don't know what the time was," he said, "only that it was late. It was too dark to see very much, but... I heard the stand passing before I saw it." He gestured up and down the path, as though lining the trail the cart would have made to its current location. Ema was rapidly taking notes, glancing up and down between her notepad and Luke. "The person pulling it, he stopped, and there was someone else there. The second person had something shiny in their hand."

Apollo frowned. 'That must've been Wocky Kitaki and his knife.'

"Then a third person appeared," Luke continued. "There was a bang, and the person pulling the noodle stand fell, but the other two ran away. The one with the shiny thing, they dropped it."

Ema paused in her notes, looking confused. A moment later, she resumed writing. Apollo was more intrigued by the thought that Wocky had still been holding his knife at the time of the gunshot.

"Once they were gone, a fourth person climbed out of the stand," Luke said, smiling, "and also ran away."

Apollo shot his sister an annoyed glare. "He already told us that literally three minutes ago."

Ema was looking suspicious again, staring at her own notes. "And these three other people... what about them could you see?"

Luke smile faded as he returned to clutching at his satchel strap. "Uh, n-not much, really," he replied. "It was too dark."

'Because, naturally,' Apollo darkly thought to himself, 'a bunch of birds aren't going to be able to tell people apart. Why couldn't you keep your mouth shut for three more minutes, Luke!?'

Ema just frowned, pointing behind her to the brightly coloured lampposts lining the river, their red trunks highly visible. "Even with everyone under the streetlights?"
Again, Luke paled, shooting nervous glances to his siblings for help. "U-uh..."

"Well, obviously," Trucy again cut in, hanging off her brother's arm, "that's because he wears sunglasses while he's bird-watching! So he sees what the birds see!"

At that, Ema pressed her hands into her hips, narrowing her eyes at the pair. "I thought birds had better eyesight than humans."

Luke's nervousness immediately vanished as he smiled knowingly, pointing into the air. "Actually, that's only during the day!" he proudly explained. "Most birds have absolutely terrible night vision! They'll even run into street-lights sometimes!"

Apollo was surprised at the random fact (though not at all surprised it was the subject of animals that brought out Luke's confidence), but what surprised him more was the brief wide-eyed look Trucy gave her brother, followed by a smug grin at Ema; It appeared she had as little idea as Apollo that her pulled-from-thin-air excuse had any element of truth to it.

Ema didn't react, quietly humming to herself in thought as she continued to give the middle Wright a suspicious glare. "Alright," she eventually agreed, seeming to accept the story. "But surely there has to be something else you can tell me? So far, you haven't given me any reason to believe you."

Apollo frowned curiously. 'Is Luke contradicting her witness, I wonder...?'

Luke hummed in thought, stroking his goatee. His gaze wandered around the scene, then came to rest on the noodle stand itself, and he smiled. "Ah!" He pointed to the blue tarps laid out on the grass. "Those are to preserve the scene, right?"

Trucy cocked her head to one side, crossing her arms with a frown. "I thought maybe the victim was going to have a picnic here..."

"I think the perfect piece of evidence to support my story might be under them," Luke explained, still smiling brightly. "May I?"

Ema thought for a very long moment, glancing between Luke and the tarps as an indecisive frown flickered across her face. Finally, she sighed. "Fine, alright." She pushed ahead to the back of the noodle stand ahead of the Wrights, and peeled back the sheets of blue plastic, exposing the dried, formerly muddy ground underneath, the tracks left by the stand clearly visible between clumps of green and yellow grass. "But don't touch anything!"

Luke nodded, crouching at the edge of the path as he looked over the muddy ground, followed by Trucy, the pair closely watched over by Ema at their side. After a few moments of searching, Luke grinned, pointing to a clear indentation in the yellow turf, not far from the large metal wheels of the noodle stand. "Aha! A footprint!"

"Wow!" Trucy cried, looking up from the print to the wooden cart beside it. "They must have climbed out of the window!"

Ema just stared in disbelief, then almost pushed Luke aside as she dropped to her knees to get a closer look at the clue, right in the middle of a small trail of leaves from the tree above. "A print!" she whispered almost reverently. "So I was right about there being clues here!" She grinned widely, barely restraining a delighted squeal, only to then suddenly calm, frowning at the new piece of evidence. "But I don't have my new kit on me," she grumbled, and reached for the tarps, pulling them back over the dirt.
Luke and Trucy, sending confused glances to each other, jumped back to their feet and retreated to Apollo's side, where he had hung back from the search. The eldest of the Wright children crossed his arms, watching Ema suspiciously. "So what exactly are you doing with that clue Luke gave you?" he asked. "Not to mention his testimony."

Ema sighed, then slowly stood up and turned towards the Wrights, a sad frown on her face. "Look, I'm sorry for not believing you," she said. "As for this footprint... Argh, I have just the thing to analyse it, but it's at home! I didn't bring it with me today!" She groaned again, frustrated with herself, then gave the trio a determined look. "I promise though, I'm gonna go get it as soon as I possibly can. I'll analyse that print and see if there's any information we can possibly get out of it!"

Luke smiled, giving her a nod. "That's all we can ask of you," he said. "How soon might you have the chance to analyse the print?"

Ema sighed, looking more morose than ever. "Who knows?" she admitted. "What with the glimmerous fop coming in and out as he pleases and the guards letting in all sorts of riff-raff, I really have to babysit this place to keep it from being tampered with." She gave the trio a sidelong glance, looking away guiltily. "N-no offence or anything."

Apollo shrugged. "S'okay," he replied. Privately, he wondered who exactly she meant by 'glimmerous fop'.

Trucy looked around the crime scene curiously, then tugged on Apollo's cape to get his attention. "So, we've looked around the noodle stand, and we've asked the detective about the case..." she pointed out. "Does that mean we're done here?"

'Good question.' Apollo looked around the area himself, taking a few steps closer to the water and studying carefully everything he could see to ensure he left no corner ignored, his Court Record raised to take pictures from every angle as he went. Down the path, where it followed the river, he quickly spotted another public rubbish bin, the same bright red as the lampposts, resting in the grass opposite the water. Over its edge, he could see some kind of off-white fabric draped, slightly fluttering in the breeze.

Trucy giggled, exaggeratedly rolling her eyes when Apollo looked back at her in confusion. "You and your trash cans!" she said, waving a hand as Luke beside her bit back snickers of amusement. "Go ahead, knock yourself out, Polly."

Apollo glared at his sister. "Hey, I'm looking for clues! That other one had important stuff in it too, didn't it!?"

Although he was fighting laughter himself, Luke shook his head, patting Trucy's shoulder. "Ignore us," he said. "Go ahead and look, Apollo."

His siblings' barely restrained giggles didn't give Apollo much confidence, but he decided he'd put up with their mocking if it meant he found a new clue. Sighing, hiding his reddening face, he dashed quickly to the red mesh bin. It looked pretty empty, but the smell turned the young lawyer off examining its contents as closely as he had the previous bin. The fabric draped over the edge was what had caught his attention, so he carefully took hold of a corner and lifted the item into the air, quickly locating a waistband that he held between his index fingers and thumbs. As the true nature of the piece of clothing became clear, his face paled. "A-another pair of underwear!?"

"What!?" Luke called, he and Trucy running to catch up to their brother, staring at the linen garment in astonishment.
"Wow, Polly!" Trucy cried, grinning. "You're a genius at finding panties! I never knew!"

"That was one time!" Apollo argued, pouting.

Luke was studying the bloomers, stroking his goatee in thought. "Whose are they?" he asked. "Do you think they were stolen, like Trucy's and Missus Kitaki's?"

Apollo frowned, spotting a glimpse of red through the thin fabric and spinning the item around to find a massive red flower with five round petals; Embroidered on top in black, a single character of what looked like Japanese writing. "Speaking of Missus Kitaki..." He held out the bloomers to show his siblings. "What do you guys want to bet that says 'plum', and the flower's a plum blossom?"

Luke and Trucy leaned over to look at the pattern, and Trucy cooed in amazement. "Genius!" she cried. "That way, she doesn't have to write her name on them!"

"I would think writing your name would be easier than drawing a flower," Apollo pointed out with a frown. "Writing your name in English, I mean."

Luke chuckled. "Not to mention, asking whoever found them to either read Japanese and know what the flower meant!" He then paused, thinking. "Although, I doubt she ever expected anyone outside her immediate family to actually see them like this..."

Apollo grimaced, trying not to think about the fact that he was essentially manhandling the underwear of the very scary gangster queen not far away. "Let's pack this up and return it to her," he said, hurrying to grab one of his evidence baggies from his bag.

Trucy giggled, looking back to the red mesh bin. "I'll always remember this trash can," she announced, "as the place where Polly found those bloomers!"

While Luke fought laughter, Apollo glared at her, shoving the underwear into a plastic baggie. "Don't you have more important things to remember?" he asked.

"Nope!" Trucy replied, and skipped off back towards the noodle stand.

As the Wrights left the noodle stand, Apollo gave Ema a wave. "Thanks for your help, Detective Skye," he called.

"No problem!" she called in response, then jumped at the trio with a worried look. "Oh, um... Have you met the defendant yet?"

Ema frowned, looking thoughtfully at the pink watch on her wrist. "Visiting hours are almost over at the detention center," she said. "You might think about wrapping up here and heading over."

"That's a good idea," Luke agreed, turning to his brother. "They're sure to have finished questioning him by now, right?"

Apollo sighed again, nodding. Privately, he wasn't sure what good it would do, given the witness and the prints on the knife, but he didn't suppose his job could possibly get any harder than it currently was.

Ema smiled, chuckling a little at Apollo's expression. "Don't worry, it's like a Wright tradition," she assured him.

"Of all the things to pick up from Dad," Apollo replied with a glare, "I do not want his bad luck."

Ema laughed, then waved the trio away. "You kids just get going. I might see you in court tomorrow, if the Great Glimmerous Fop rules it."

"Bye, Detective Skye!" Trucy replied, waving to the detective as she and her brothers headed down the path towards Kitaki Avenue.

Much like during their previous passages through the street south of the park since being hired by Alita, there was no sign of Plum Kitaki outside the mansion as the Wrights left the park. There had clearly been progress made on the dried paint stains covering the asphalt, but the colourful patches still lingered all around the cobble-stoned entrance of the traditional house.

"I guess she's gone to get a paint scraper," Apollo mused aloud, heading to the gate and intending to wait for her return.

Luke nodded, looking around the thick wooden doors of the gate. "I don't see a doorbell. We'd have to knock to call her out."

"I'll do it!" Trucy offered, jumped forward to do so, but was called to a halt by Apollo grabbing hold of her forearm with a firm grip.
"No thanks," Apollo insisted with a stern look. "I'm sure she'll be right out."

"We can't exactly dally, Apollo," Luke pointed out. "We have to get going to the detention center, remember?"

At that moment, a shrill shriek echoed from beyond the high walls of Kitaki Mansion, from a voice that the trio instantly recognised: "Okay, who's the wise guy who spit gum out on the street!?"

Although he knew himself to be innocent, Apollo paled. He did not want to face an angry Kitaki, and Luke's concerned face seemed to indicate he felt the same way.

Trucy giggled. "She's a neat freak!" she said. "How cute!"

"You there!" Plum's voice continued. "It was you wasn't it!? 'Fess up! I hope you've said your prayers; You're gonna need them!"

"Agreed," Luke replied with a nod, turning without a second thought to speed-walk down the path. Apollo grabbed his sister's upper arm and dragged her after Luke, ignoring her protests.

"But we were going to return her panties!" Trucy insisted.

"And we will," Apollo promised as they hurried around the corner. "Later."

June 15, 3:57PM
Detention Center
Reception

Apollo's pleas for Luke to hurry didn't make their drive go any faster, the middle Wright refusing to break any laws no matter the emergency. The moment the little blue car parked outside the old detention center, Apollo leapt out and ran into the nearby building, almost falling on the reception desk as he failed to pull himself to a halt in time. "I need to see-!"

The guard behind the desk looked up with a jerk, his long black fringe hiding all but his surprised frown. "I'm sorry, meeting hours for-" He paused. "Apollo?"

"Ernest?" Apollo slowly smiled as he recognised his old school friend, and turned to wave over Luke and Trucy as they entered the double doors behind him. "Luke, it's Ernest!" Before his brother could do more than grin and wave, Apollo had returned his attention to the officer with a determined frown. "We need to see Wocky Kitaki. We only have three minutes!"

Ernest bit his lip, looking away. "I'll... put in your request, but don't expect anything," he reluctantly agreed, standing up. "The father's talking in the private room with him."

"The father?" Trucy repeated, looking confused. "You mean like a priest?"

"I mean the suspect's father," Ernest replied, walking around the desk and adjusting his uniform sleeves as he went. "Mister Winfred 'Big Wins' Kitaki himself."

Apollo watched Ernest heading to the visitor's room door, trying not to look as anxious as he suddenly felt. 'Just the one gangster on their own was bad enough... Did we have to meet the entire Kitaki Family before the trial!?' Nevertheless, he forced his feet to move, following his former schoolfriend. Behind him, he waved at his siblings to stay back, unwilling to make them face any more gangsters.

The moment Ernest pulled open the door, angry shouts bellowed from the new opening, talking over each other with a fury that Apollo had never heard before.

"Die you-!"

"You're the one on your way out old-!"

Apollo looked back to his siblings, and was relieved to find they appeared to have backed up from the fright, almost pressed against the wall. Trucy was clinging to Luke's arm, half-hiding behind him as they both stared at the open door with wide eyes.

"Ah, they're here," Ernest muttered, almost casually, and waved Apollo in.

The first thing Apollo saw when he returned his gaze to the doorway was the very large man inside, taller than Phoenix and twice as wide, sunken eyes hidden below a thick brow and a thin moustache on his upper lip. Dressed in tight black robes, he stood tall in the dim light of the detention center's visitor's room... proudly displaying a lemon yellow apron with a cutesy fox head on the chest, right underneath a strip of green that read 'SALE!'. He turned his hooded gaze on the young magician. "You Wocky's lawyer?"

Apollo rapidly nodded. "Y-yes, sir!"

The man grunted to himself, then stepped towards him, holding out a hand to shake. Not wanting to irritate him, Apollo rushed forward to take it. "Well, I'm Big Wins Kitaki," the man introduced himself, "fourth head of the Kitaki family... capice?"

The moment their 'friendly' handshake finished, Apollo's hand fell back to his side. "Er... Actually, I came to speak to your son," he admitted.

Wins stared at Apollo for another long moment (or Apollo assumed he did - the man's eyes were totally invisible in the darkness under his eyebrows). "Mister Wright."

"Yes?" 'He already knows my name?'

"My son's innocent," Wins calmly insisted. "He killed no one. If he were found guilty... it wouldn't be good." He pointed a finger casually at Apollo, unnervingly like a gun. "Capice?"

Apollo rapidly nodded again. "Y-yes! I'm all about capicing! Capice'd loud and clear!"

"You gotta do more than just understand to make it," Wins continued. "You'll learn, though. Even if the lesson comes at the end of your short life."

'Way to make me feel confident about this trial...' Apollo thought, feeling a nervous sweat developing on his brow.

"What's the big idea, old man!?!" came an indignant shout from behind, and Wins stepped aside as he turned to face it, giving Apollo a good view of the other side of the glass, where a familiar-looking teenager stood, bouncing back and forth in his pink-and-yellow jacket as though preparing for a boxing match. "You can't treat me like a kid no more, not now!" he cried, then stilled, his scowl twitching nervously at the corners. "You know I... I... I wanted to go to the clink!" he insisted. "I like Apollo resisted the urge to sigh. He could see the origins of Ema's comment about the young man throwing his weight around... but he could also see a scared teenager, terrified of going to jail despite his insistent denials. Apollo stepped towards the glass, closer to his client. "You must be Wockey."

"A G's not a G 'til he does hard time!" Wocky continued, bouncing back and forth again. "Bizzoooy!" He threw a false punch towards the glass, giving Wins a glare as he ignored the lawyer. "You'll see. When I get out of here, things'll change!"

Wins suddenly lurched forward, slamming a hand on the desk and making both Apollo and Wocky jump in fright. "Silence!" he ordered, then stood straight as thought nothing had happened, his hands hidden in pockets behind his apron as he calmly turned towards Apollo. "My apologies, Mister Wright. He's usually such a nice boy."

Somehow, Apollo found that hard to believe.

"Ha!" Wocky barked, regaining his confidence remarkably quick. "You can't take me under your wing this time, old man! You heard me!" He jabbed a finger firmly against the glass, pointing at his father. "I don't need no trial! I did it!"

'Please don't say that...'

Wins sniffed, then turned away, placing a firm hand on Apollo's shoulder. "I think that's enough for today, Mister Wright," he said, guiding the young lawyer back out the still-open door into the reception. Apollo, unwilling to see more of the gangster's anger, went along without a fight. As they passed Ernest, who closed the door behind them, Wins stopped and gave Apollo a long stare. "Don't let me down tomorrow." With that, he left the lawyer behind and walked out of the building.

A lengthy silence followed the exit of the intimidating gangster boss, and it took some time before Apollo felt comfortable enough to sigh, the noise seeming to signal relief in everyone else too. "So much for talking to our client," he grumbled.

"Sorry, them's the rules," Ernest replied, returning to his desk. "And don't ask me to bend them, not for the Kitakis."

"That's understandable, Ernest," Luke said, giving the young officer a smile before heading over to Apollo, patting his back sympathetically. "Don't worry, Apollo; We made a lot of progress today! We solved the missing noodle stand, and the hit-and-run..."

"And we found lots of panties, too!" Trucy cheerfully added, jumping over to grab Apollo's other arm with a grin. "Maybe we should advertise your new skill for the customers!"

Apollo turned red, scowling at his sister. At his side, Luke was already stifling giggles. "Are you never going to let me live that down!?" He could even see Ernest pause, watching the trio, and no doubt he had a raised eyebrow under his mane of hair.

Trucy giggled. "We had fun, at least!"

"You have a strange idea of 'fun'," Apollo muttered, then sighed, deciding to move on. "I don't think there's really anything else investigation-wise we can do now. I've got paperwork to do for the trial tomorrow, but other than that..."

"Let's go visit Papa," Luke suggested. "We can see if he has any ideas on the case before you two have to go off for your show."
Trucy gasped, a hand to her mouth. "Oh! Yeah! And I need to give the Magic Panties a quick wash from that tailpipe!"

Apollo nodded. "Right then. Back to the office, Trucy washes the panties, I'll grab my paperwork, then we can take Pearly and go visit Dad."

"Sounds like a plan!" Luke laughed, and the trio headed off outside. Apollo and Luke gave their friend at the reception desk one last wave as they went, Luke calling, "Thanks for your help, Ernest!"

The young officer gave them a small smile and a wave in return.

The moment the Wrights and Pearl were all together again, the first thing Apollo made sure to do was catch Phoenix and Pearl up on everything they’d been doing since the investigation in People Park had begun, telling the pair about their angry young client, the family he belonged to, the evidence that stood against him, and the science-loving detective who had helped them. Once he’d finished, Luke stepped up to talk about the testimonies he had heard from Spoon the dog, and his crow friends in the park, specifically one called Corbin, who had been a friend of Luke's for two years now.

"He's promised to ask around for information," Luke explained, sitting in one of the chairs the group had dragged around Phoenix's bed, "and get back to me if he learns anything. Unfortunately, it was just too dark for him to see much on the night itself; If Detective Skye hadn't been watching us so closely, I might have been able to find some squirrels or someone else with better night vision that was by the river last night."

"Won't the gunshot have scared them off?" Pearl asked, on the other side of the bed with Trucy.

"Maybe," Luke admitted, "but these are animals living in an urban environment; They're mostly used to loud, unexplained sounds. Corbin and his family certainly are."

Phoenix, leaning back against the pillows of his bed, rubbed his chin in thought. "So... we should probably start out by outlining the series of events." He turned to his eldest with a small smile. "Apollo?"

Apollo looked up from the paperwork in his lap, momentarily surprised at being called on. "Uh..." Shuffling his paperwork to try and locate his notes, he sat up straight, pausing to run the details over in his head. "Well, as far as I can tell, it all started with that car accident." Finally, he found the relevant page, leaving it on top of the pile as he neatened it up. "Yeah, around nine. Doctor Meraktis hit you, then raced right back to his clinic, leaving his car there. Sometime after, the Magic Panties were stolen, and the thief, whoever they were, left behind both the panties and their phone."

"It had to be that doctor!" Trucy proclaimed, scowling as she held up her fists. "He stole my panties and went and hid in his home!"

"Except I don't think it was, Trucy," Luke cut in, stroking his goatee. "Spoon heard your thief leave; If it were Meraktis, where was he going? And why didn't Spoon hear him coming back before the stand was stolen?"

"Whichever it is," Apollo cut in, frowning at his notes, "the theft of the noodle stand was next. For some reason, Meraktis specifically went after Mister Eldoon's stand, and we're assuming he took the time to remove all the bowls from it before going to the park."

"To make room for the fourth person at the crime scene, maybe?" Luke suggested. "They were inside it, after all."
"But why?" Pearl asked. "If they were going somewhere, why'd they have to steal the stand and empty it for the other person to hide in?"

Luke opened his mouth to reply, then paused, deep in thought.

Trucy sighed, flopping back in her chair. "Nothing about the stand theft or this other person makes sense!" she cried in frustration. "What on earth were they doing!?"

"I'd say the answer to that will solve the entire mystery," Phoenix mused aloud. After a pause, he turned back to Apollo. "And once they stole the stand, what happened then?"

"Meraktis pulled it to People Park," Apollo replied, returning to his notes. "His friend was hidden inside. They... then came across someone."

"The defendant," Phoenix filled in. "And his knife."

Apollo nodded. "At this point, all we really have is the crow's testimony: Someone, the witness we'll be seeing in court tomorrow, interrupted them, a gun went off, and everyone fled. Wocky also dropped his knife."

Pearl was biting her thumbnail in thought. "So... where was the gun?" she asked. "And... why did Mister Wocky bring a knife if he was going to shoot Doctor Meraktis?"

"A good point to bring up in court tomorrow," Phoenix pointed out. "With Wocky's prints all over it, they can't deny he clearly had it on the night."

"I bet it was the witness who shot him!" Trucy decided, grinning at Apollo with a furrowed brow. "They ran in, shot the doctor, then planted the gun and ran off!"

Apollo sighed, crossing his arms. "We'll just have to see," he said. "If Detective Skye had been able to analyse that footprint we found, we might have had enough information to at least find this fourth person who was in the stand. We could've asked them."

Phoenix then noticed Luke still staring into the distance with a thoughtful frown. "You've been quiet for a while now, Luke," he pointed out, startling the young man was he was dragged back into the conversation. "Did you figure something out?"

Luke grimaced. "Well... I did come up with a hypothesis," he admitted.

Pearl looked confused, biting her thumbnail again. "High-pot-amus?" she asked.

"He means a theory," Apollo explained, a growing hopeful smile on his face as he turned to his brother. "What is it?"

Luke didn't respond for several seconds, pulling at his goatee. "I'd... rather not say," he said. "We don't have enough information to either support or disprove it, and," he turned his worried gaze to Apollo, "I don't want to give you, as Wocky's lawyer, a false idea of what happened should I turn out to be wrong. It could hurt your arguments."

Apollo shot his brother a glare. "Just tell me, for crying out loud!" he insisted. "I'm not going to confuse a theory for what actually happened!"

"Oh, you're not, are you?" Luke asked, returning the glare with a stern frown. "That's your biggest weakness when it comes to puzzles; You always bring in your pre-conceived notions and rarely think outside the box."
"What do puzzles have to do with a court case!?” Apollo asked, more confused now than angry.

"Everything," Luke replied. "Finding out what happened is one big puzzle that the defence and prosecution have to solve together! You have to be prepared to go somewhere that seems illogical to find the answer!"

"And turn everything on its head," Phoenix added with a nostalgic smile, watching his younger son. "There's a reason Luke and the Professor were invaluable to me in Labyrinthia."

Luke looked over to Phoenix in surprise, then smiled back with a bashful blush.

Phoenix returned his gaze to Apollo, who was staring thoughtfully at the floor. "As annoying as it may be at the time, sometimes you really just have to work it out yourself. In fact, on that note..." He looked between his sons with a grin. "Why don't you assist him in court tomorrow, Luke? You have experience, after all."

"What!?" Trucy cried with a pout. "Why does Luke get to help Polly in court!? Why can't I do it?"

"W-well, he did help Mister Nick a few times," Pearl said.

"So have you!" Trucy pointed out.

Pearl shook her head. "Not really," she replied. "All I ever did to help was channel Mystic Mia."

Apollo was suddenly tempted to ask Pearl to do exactly that.

"I was just making a suggestion," Phoenix assured Trucy with a smile. "I think it would be most beneficial to Apollo's case if Luke assisted him, but the final decision is Apollo's."

Immediately, Apollo felt the entire room's attention turn on him, Trucy's restless glare standing out against everyone else's patient looks. "U-uh..." Resting his paperwork securely in his lap, he pressed a finger into his forehead, taking a moment to think.

Truthfully, Apollo had had an idea of who would ideally assist him in his second trial ever since the formation of the Anything Agency: Phoenix himself. Despite the circumstances, it had been the realisation of a childhood dream to stand behind the bench with his father and former idol at his side, leading the defence with the support and help of Phoenix's experience on call... but, unfortunately, Phoenix was not an option. Apollo didn't even dare to bring the secret hope up, knowing his father was desperate to 'escape' the hospital and not wanting to give Phoenix an excuse with which to defy his doctors and skip out on his much needed healing time.

After Phoenix, Mia was the next best thing, with just as much experience and wisdom as Phoenix... although it had been seven long years since she had last assisted Phoenix, and Apollo had picked up the impression that she had been carefully weaning her former subordinate off her help before then; It didn't seem likely she, or the other Feys, would be open to aiding Apollo the way they'd aided his father. In fact, Apollo was certain they'd agree to help if asked, and promptly resent him ever after for being unable to work with what he already had in the world of the living.

That left only Luke and Trucy, and, Apollo had to admit, Luke was the better option. Not only did Luke have prior experience acting as a court assistant (even if it was eight years ago in a radically different court system), he seemed to have a tight enough grasp on the wild mysteries of this case to actually have some idea of the truth behind it all... both of which Trucy, as dear as she was to her brothers, lacked.
Sighing, Apollo made his decision, looking up to meet his sister's eyes. "Truce... you and I perform together every night," he pointed out. "We will be performing together in a couple of hours. Don't you think it's Luke's turn?"

At that, Trucy's angry gaze instantly softened, shooting her other brother apologetic looks. "I... guess so," she admitted.

His sister taken care of, Apollo then turned to Luke, watching him worriedly. "Although... will you be okay standing in court?"

Luke frowned, confused. "Of course I will," he said, then paused as it seemed to register exactly what Apollo had been referring to. He gave his brother a reassuring smile. "Don't worry about me, Apollo; I'll be fine. You have a case to concentrate on."

Apollo smiled in return.
The Wrights and Pearl had sat and chatted for as long as they could, right up until a nurse came to chase the young group out at the end of visiting hours. As they reluctantly left, Phoenix grabbed Apollo's hand and gave his eldest a grin - "You'll do just fine in the trial tomorrow; I know you will." - and let them go with a wave. After so much talking in the hospital room, Apollo, Luke, Trucy and Pearl settled into a comfortable silence as they wandered down the now-familiar route back to the Wright Anything Agency, the path around them busy with passing people. Every so often, Apollo would glance at a watch he kept under his right glove, keeping an eye on how long he and Trucy had until they had to leave for their show.

Finally, the quartet reached the last intersection to their destination, which required them to cross the road. Apollo held his hand out to signal his siblings and cousin, and paused at the gutter, looking both ways along the road (still busy despite not being rush hour). They barely noticed the roar of a passing motorbike as they dashed across the asphalt through a gap in the traffic to the pavement on the opposite side, the final stretch to home.

"Today's actually been really busy if you think about it," Trucy pointed out, breaking the silence as they fell back into their comfortable walk. "Running all over the place, looking for things, checking on Daddy..."

Luke gave her a smile. "If you want, I could give you a lift to the Wonder Bar tonight," he offered. "After all the walking we've done today, you two might appreciate the chance to rest your feet."

Apollo chuckled; He had to agree. "As long as you take us by my apartment first, that'd be nice," he admitted. "Performing is enough of a work-out. You two gonna come and watch tonight while you're at it?"

"I'd love to!" Pearl cried. "It's been a while since I last saw you two on stage!"

Luke was similarly opening his mouth to respond when he was interrupted by the roar of another motorbike (or perhaps, he later realised, the same one). He paused to wait for it to pass, but the loud engine slowed and came to a stop, sputtering at the edge of the road right next to them and quickly attracting the small group's attention, calling them to a halt.

Apollo noticed the shiny metal surface of the bike first; It was alternately silver and a reddish-purple, obviously well-loved and likely costing its owner a bundle in maintenance. On the front, near the hooded headlight and under the chest of the rider as he straightened up from his grip on the handlebars, was the familiar sigil of the pointy G: The logo of the Gavinners. The glare was already on Apollo's face as he turned his gaze to the rider himself, a tall man in black with a matching reddish-purple jacket on top, the silver chains of his belt and necklace standing out below the anonymous hood of his helmet. Idly flipping an unreasonably perfect coil of blond hair over his shoulder, he nodded in greeting to the quartet. "What a co-incidence; I just came from your office, Herr Wright."

Apollo wasted no time in stepping forward, protectively keeping his siblings and cousin behind him. "What do you want?"
Klavier laughed, his voice slightly muffled by the helmet. "Believe it or not, I did not stop by to antagonise you." He flipped up his visor, grinning casually out from the tiny window his face was squeezed into. "I believe you have a Herr Triton working for you, ja?"

Before Apollo could do more than blink in surprise, Luke had stepped forward, watching the bike rider carefully. "You want to talk to me about my testimony?"

Klavier nodded, his smile fading into a more serious frown. "I am loathe to go into a trial without all available information," he said, then looked up to the slowly darkening sky, the shadows of the buildings extending across the street. "However, it is a bit late to be questioning someone, ja?"

Smiling again, he returned his gaze to Luke. "Since we will both be at the courthouse tomorrow morning, maybe we could meet before the trial, Herr Triton. Have a little talk."

"Then it is settled!" Klavier replied with a grin. He flipped his visor back down, hiding his face. "I will see you both in court!" With a friendly wave, he revved his motorbike and peeled back out into the traffic, disappearing into the stream of cars behind them.

Apollo immediately turned on Luke. "You should have said no."

"And kept from him something that could make your job easier?" Luke asked, one eyebrow raised. "I've been a witness before; I know how this works."

Instead of replying, Apollo simply turned around, hands curled into fists as he stalked back towards home. Reluctantly, Luke and Pearl moved to follow him; Trucy, however, skipped up to Apollo's side, fixing her eldest brother with a grin. "So," she asked, "if Luke's gonna be a witness tomorrow, does that mean I can help you in court?"

"Not now, Truce."

Apollo and Clay's Apartment
Living Room

With Luke and Trucy waiting in the car outside, Apollo and Trucy dashed through his apartment's front door, making for Apollo's bedroom at the back.

Clay, stretched out across the nearby lounge, jumped up in surprise, looking up at the pair as they ran past. "Wha- 'Pollo? Trucy?"

"No time to talk!" Apollo replied as he disappeared into his room, his sister at his heels. "We're just getting my magic stuff and some spare clothes!"

"We'll be out in a minute!" Trucy added.

Frowning, Clay muted the television and got to his feet, scratching his head through his messy bedhead of black hair. "Where've you guys been all day? All I've heard is that your dad was fine!"

"Long story!" Apollo shouted, amongst the thuds of thrown open drawers and closet doors. "We got a lot of cases - Not that one, Truce, that one's falling apart - so we were really busy!"

Clay stared for a moment before sighing, crossing his arms. "So... what's the hurry now, then?"

"We gotta be at the Wonder Bar in ten minutes!" Trucy cried. A moment later, she had dashed out of the room, arms full of random mid-sized props. She paused only to grin at Clay. "Luke's giving us a lift, and Pearly's coming to watch too!" With that, she had run off back outside.

"Huh, really?" Clay asked, turning to smile at his roommate as Apollo exited his room, hat on his head and struggling to pull closed a zipper on the old school backpack in his hands. "Maybe I should come, too!"

Apollo shot his friend a quick smile, adjusting his bag into a firmer grip in his arms. "If you're coming with us, you gotta come now; We don't have the time to wait for you."

Clay grinned, pointing a pair of finger-guns at his friend with a click of his tongue. "Gotcha, dude."
He grabbed a jacket from the floor, then jumped into a pair of beige sandals that clashed strangely with his mint green socks. "Liftoff!" he announced, throwing his arms into the air, then raced out the door into the fading evening light.

Apollo chuckled, rolling his eyes as he headed out after.

\[Man, have I got a story to tell you when you wake up in a few hours. I know I said this morning that nothing was happening, but that all got turned on its head only a few minutes after we talked.
Actually, strike 'when you wake up'. I'll put it all out there when we're both awake tomorrow morning.\]

\[Naw thats okay, I can hear it now :D\]

\[Athena, why are you awake!? Isn't it 5am over there? .\]

\[Almost 6! I get up early for my morning jog remember? ;) And aren't you normally in bed by this time Luke?\]

\[I was giving Apollo and Trucy a lift to and from their show... But that doesn't matter. Today's been a bit of a whirlwind.\]

\[Papa was grazed by a car (he's fine though), one of Apollo and Trucy's props was stolen, a family friend's mobile business disappeared... and someone got murdered. To top it all off, all four became our cases and they're linked together in the strangest ways.\]

\[Wow, that DOES sound like whirlwind :/ Sorry to hear about Mr Wright. Tell him to get better from me?\]

\[Sure. Also, the prosecutor Apollo's facing in court tomorrow... I don't know if you've heard of him.
Klavier Gavin? .\]

\[KLAVIER!? LOL ARE YOU SERIOUS!?\]

\[Have you heard of him? .\]

\[NOPE BUT HE HAS THE SILLIEST NAME I'VE EVER HEARD!\]
WHO CALLS THEMSELVES 'PIANO'!?

I’m afraid you’ve lost me...

GIMME A MINUTE TO STOP LAUGHING THIS IS GOLD
Okay I think I’ve calmed down now. OH WOW THO
Klavier is the German word for piano. Who does this guy think he is!? There’s that law against naming kids after objects in Germany!

Huh. Really? He’s supposed to be German...

Yeah, no way. :) Looking him up, is he the same Gavin in the Gavinners band?

That’s him. Apollo really hates him because he was involved in the whole forgery scandal back in 2019.

Just read that bit on him in Wikipedia. Says he left the prosecutors office to focus on his music.

And now he’s back prosecuting. We’re facing him in court tomorrow, and he’s talking to me about what I ‘witnessed’ of this murder (long story).

We HAVE to have an actual phone conversation ASAP! I gotta hear these details!

Haha, yeah, once this trial is over. :) Now I’m kinda torn on telling Apollo about this ‘piano’ thing: He’d find it hilarious, but I just know he’ll turn it into some childish insult in court and I don’t want him to be resorting to that when I’m struggling to get him to give Mr Gavin the time of day.

I hear you ;) Talk to ya later Luke!

Until then, Athena.

Hey everyone, it's late and I want to get to bed, but I figured you'd all want to hear this so I'll make it quick.

My dad's in the hospital right now. He got hit by a car, though he's okay... just laughing and joking about it like usual, trying to walk out of the hospital despite his ankle. I've had to drop in back home to look after my sister, which is kinda annoying on such short notice, but I'll live.
Anyway. I'm going to bed now. It was great to see you after the show today, Knox.

Dime_Quarters [MOD] "Penny", 06/14/2026 11:31:14PM
Oh no! Sorry to hear about your dad, Apollo! Is his ankle broken?

Pocky-Hockey "Aria", 06/15/2026 08:04:16AM
I broke my ankle once, when I was a kid. Quite a story too. I whacked it falling off a swing! xD Never been hit by a car though, so its kinda amazing Mr Wright is well enough to try and walk out. I may not know him as well as you do, but that does sound just like him actually.

ForgetMeKnot "Knox", 06/15/2026 09:48:03AM
Wait what!? Hit by a car!? I almost didn't read this thread because 'general update' is so vague, why don't you mention that in the title!?
And it was great seeing you last night man, we should catch up irl more often.

Precious-Fairy "Pearly", 06/15/2026 10:26:48AM
Hi everyone, Apollo's really busy with a few cases the agency got this morning, so I thought I'd answer your questions!
Mr Nick's ankle is just sprained, though the hospital doesn't want to let him out yet. Mystic Maya and I came down to see him this morning, though Mystic Maya had to leave again because she's very busy. I'm staying with Trucy until he's better, to keep the office clean! Nobody seems to be very good at that since Luke moved out. :/
I think Apollo just said 'general update' in the title because he didn't want to worry anyone. Luke told me he almost didn't get the messege of what happened and yelled at Apollo when he was trying to ring him because he was busy getting ready for work.

ForgetMeKnot "Knox", 06/15/2026 10:48:03AM
Eh I guess that makes sense. Tell Mr Wright to get better from us, okay?
Precious-Fairy "Pearly", 06/15/2026 10:52:20AM
I will! :)

Dime_Quarters [MOD] "Penny", 06/15/2026 11:52:41AM
Slow day, Pearly? ;) You're replying fast!

Precious-Fairy "Pearly", 06/15/2026 12:02:12PM
Yes, a bit. :) I don't have much to do today, in between cleaning.

Thread: Apollo has a new case!
Precious-Fairy "Pearly", 06/15/2026 01:29:38PM
He's given me the okay already to announce it here, too! :) Though I'm not allowed to talk about the details, so all I can say is that he's been hired to take on another defence case!
I'm probably not going to go to the trial, because I'm busy looking after the office, and Mr Nick is still in the hospital, so I have to keep him company too. Trucy says he'll mope if we leave him alone too long!

BlackbirdLuck [ADMIN] "Maggey", 06/15/2026 02:01:14PM
Congrats, Apollo! I won't be able to make this trial either, assuming it's tomorrow or the day after...
Good luck tho, huh? :) And Pearly, you'll give our well wishes to Mr Wright for me and Dick, won't you? I only just saw the other thread, so I thought I'd ask here.

Precious-Fairy "Pearly", 06/15/2026 02:16:48PM
I will, Maggey! :) And I'll tell Apollo when he next drops in that you wished him luck!

CelestialImpacts "Adrian", 06/15/2026 02:30:01PM
It's a pity trials are always on such short notice. If I hadn't just left, I'd definitely be trying to be there to cheer you on, Apollo. :) Good luck from me and Auntie Franziska! (she didn't say outright that she wished you luck, but I know she meant to :) )

Precious-Fairy "Pearly", 06/15/2026 02:47:35PM
Oh no! Apollo was just home and I forgot to tell him anything because they came in to get something for their investigation and he and Trucy were arguing about something and it totally slipped my mind! D:
Dime_Quarters [MOD] "Penny", 06/15/2026 03:05:44PM
Haha, you keep an eye on those two in Mr Wright's absence, ok Pearly? ;) And tell Apollo to get back on here so we can wish him luck 'in person' as it were. I mean, I know he's busy, but you could have this thread open on your computer and point him to look at it when he's next around or something.
Oh, and is that trial tomorrow or the day after? I might have the time off to see at least part of it, depending.

Precious-Fairy "Pearly", 06/15/2026 03:12:14PM
That's a good idea, Penny! I'll try that when he next comes back!
I'm not very good at keeping Apollo and Trucy from fighting... Luke seemed to be able to stop them, though. I think they were fighting about which way their hats sit on display in the office? And there was something in a trophy Mr Nick wanted them to get for something.
The trial's tomorrow. That's why Apollo is so busy investigating it, and Luke and Trucy are helping him.

Pocky-Hockey "Aria", 06/15/2026 04:12:16PM
Ooo, perfect timing! I'm already taking tomorrow off, so I'll come cheer you on, Apollo! Maybe we could meet up again like last time? Obviously there won't be nearly as many of us there, but...

Dime_Quarters [MOD] "Penny", 06/15/2026 04:27:24PM
I have a shoot that evening, but if the trial doesn't go too long, I can be there tomorrow. :) Shall we meet up outside the courtroom again, Aria?

Drewby "Drew", 06/15/2026 04:32:43PM
Aw man, all the cool stuff happens while I'm busy! How are you two free on a weekday!? (oh yeah, good luck Apollo, and I hope your dad gets better)

Pocky-Hockey "Aria", 06/15/2026 04:54:15PM
Keep your hair on, Drew. ;) I have a bunch of vacation days I have to use up, and I was taking them this week to spend some time with my girlfriend while she's off from her teaching job. She's not that interested in law, but I think she does have some lesson plans or something to do, so I'll just owe her a night out or something to make up for it. :D
And outside the courtroom sounds good! I'll see you there, Penny!

ForgetMeKnot "Knox", 06/15/2026 05:08:39PM
Sorry, I won't be able to be there myself. Good luck Apollo, and Penny and Aria, you two cheer him on for all of us, k?
(Woah, Pearly, where'd you go? You were replying to us almost instantly earlier!)
BlackbirdL.uck [ADMIN] "Maggey", 06/15/2026 05:19:18PM
So Aria and Penny, you two know how to recognise each other? It looks like it'll be just you two and whoever else will be with Apollo on the day (not counting Pearly, since she's said she can't make it). Keep in mind, we haven't heard from him yet if he'll have the time for a meet-up, and there's every possibility the trial will extend to a second or third day too, depending on what this exact case even is.

Dime_Quarters [MOD] "Penny", 06/15/2026 05:36:34PM
I won't be able to make a second or third day, if that happens. Even if this first one takes too long, I'll have to sneak out to prepare for my evening shoot. And Aria and I were just confirming each other's phone numbers, so we're okay on that front.

Pocky-Hockey "Aria", 06/15/2026 05:42:56PM
I'll cheer Apollo on alone all three days if I have to! >D Also, if it's okay with you Pearly, I could drop by the office in the afternoon to say hi? I don't know how busy you'll be, or if Apollo will manage to wrap this thing up in a single day.

Precious-Fairy "Pearly", 06/15/2026 08:46:37PM
Sorry, we were all out together discussing Apollo's case! I can't say how it will go tomorrow, but Mr Nick is very confident, so I think Apollo will definitely win! He can give you a better answer once he's done putting all his and Trucy's things from their show tonight away. :)
I don't mind you saying hello tomorrow, Aria! It will be nice to see a friend, and I'm sure Apollo and Luke and Trucy would like to see you too!

steeljusticelover "Apollo", 06/15/2026 08:53:25PM
Hey everyone, sorry it took so long for me to get back to you all! Pearly passed all your well-wishes on to Dad, and he said to thank you all for thinking of him. He's still fine, laughing and joking about it, and still trying to escape despite doctor's orders to stay put. I was actually hoping to ask him to assist me in court, but I'm not giving him a reason to sneak out before they've agreed to release him, so I'm not letting him know that. Going through my paperwork, it looks like we'll be in Courtroom 4 tomorrow. Aria and Penny, keep an eye out just in case for State vs Wocky Kitaki, the murder trial. I'm not going to be able to meet you beforehand, but my friend Clay has said he'll come, so if you remember him or he remembers you, you could meet up with him. Dad might think I can pull this off in a day, but I'm doubtful. The prosecutor worries me, and I honestly think he'll have some nasty tricks up his sleeve for us in court. I don't even know if Luke will be able to assist me, or if I'll have to let Trucy do it instead. Will you guys even WANT to say hi if I lose this? I might just run and hide, unless he manages to twist things around to get me arrested or something.
Oh, yeah, and thanks for wishing me luck in the trial, everyone. :) I'll try not to disappoint you.
You're not going to need it, but I thought I'd wish you luck in your trial today :)

Thanks Dad :) Pretty sure I will need it tho.

Nonsense. You have your unique 'power' after all, and Luke's puzzle solving skills if you get stuck. Tell yourself you're fine like you always do and you'll do great! ;)

Ha ha >.> We'll come see you after the trial, however it turns out.

See you after your win then. :) We all believe in you, Apollo

... Thanks Dad :) .

June 16, 9:30AM
District Court
Entrance Hall

"So, where exactly is this dude you gotta see?"

Luke frowned, arms crossed as he entered the courthouse with his siblings and friend. "I'm not entirely sure, Clay," he admitted. "I assumed he'd be in the lobby assigned to the prosecution for this trial." He looked to Apollo. "That'd be the one next to yours, right?"

Apollo thought a moment, then nodded. "Yeah, we're up on the fourth floor; Courtroom number four itself. I'm supposed to meet the Kitakis in Lobby Two, so I guess Gavin will be waiting for you in One."

"So we can all go with you to meet Wocky, right?" Trucy asked, a hopeful grin directed straight at her eldest brother. "And if Luke doesn't come back from talking to Mister Gavin, I can go with you into court, right?"

Apollo shot his sister a glare, but decided to resign himself to accepting her help; It would be awful to lose Luke to the witness stand, but even worse not to have a source of back-up, and Trucy was better than nothing. "Fine, fine, you can come," he sighed.

Trucy immediately whooped, jumping into the air with her hands held high.

"But the moment Luke comes back," Apollo added, pointing a threatening finger at his sister, "you're sitting in the gallery with Clay!"

"Aw!" Trucy whined in reply, her exuberant mood quickly dropping.

Clay snickered to himself, patting Trucy on the back as the group made their way to the stairs. "Don't worry, I'll keep you out of trouble, little missy!" He shot her a wink as Apollo smiled and Luke hid giggles.

Trucy rolled her eyes. "I can look after myself!" she insisted.
Although Luke had offered to practise their Chords of Steel with Apollo before the trial, it turned out that they didn't have time for it. While Clay had headed off to the courtroom gallery to wait (promising to keep an eye out for Apollo's online friends if he recognised them), the Wrights went down the nearby corridor to the defendant lobbies. They passed Lobby One first, and Apollo and Trucy gave Luke a small wave as he stopped to knock on the door. Although Apollo kept moving, gripping Trucy's hand tight to hold her close, he watched over his shoulder as they continued to their lobby, until Luke's door opened and he was waved in by a purple-sleeved arm. With Luke out of sight, the eldest Wright had hurried Trucy into Lobby Two, already mentally preparing to settle in for a long wait.

As he sat down on the distressingly dull brown sofa, Apollo wondered what exactly was going on on the other side of the wall at his back. Was Klavier grilling Luke on his 'hobby', why 'he' was in the tree, why he was 'wearing sunglasses' at night? Was Luke managing to keep his cool and, as much as he was terrible at it, lie convincingly with the story Trucy had come up with for him? Was Klavier showing as little mercy for Luke as he'd shown for Phoenix seven years ago, as cold-hearted as his brother behind that amicably jovial exterior? Apollo struggled not to let his hands curl into fists around the court papers he was pretending to review; Now more than ever, he wanted to be at his brother's side, protecting him from the Gavins and the cruel outside world that would throw Luke in the loony bin before even beginning to entertain the thought that the young vet could truly understand what his animal friends were saying to him as though it were true British English as perfect as Luke's own.

A hand on his arm startled Apollo from his thoughts, and he looked up in surprise to see Trucy sat as his side, giving him a worried look. "Don't worry," she told him. "Luke'll be okay. He's a Wright: Wrights always pull through in adversity."

Apollo gave his sister a smile. "Yeah," he agreed. "Yeah, we do."

It was ten minutes before a knock at the door startled the Gramarye siblings into action, both jumping to their feet as Apollo dropped his papers on the nearby table. "Luke!" they both cried as they ran towards the door, only for it to open before they'd taken more than a few steps.

"Look at me, I'm fine, I'm great!" shouted a familiar voice as a young man stumbled into the room, waving off a tall figure behind him. "You know what I'm saying!?"

Apollo and Trucy exchanged confused looks. "Uh, not really," Apollo admitted.

"Wocky!" came a warning bark from the doorway as Big Wins Kitaki followed his son into the room. "Don't be running your mouth like that in here!"

The teen turned on his father with a scoff. "See, that's the difference between me and you, old man," he said. "I ain't afraid of no cops. Real G's can't keep it real till they spend some hard time in the pen."

Wins seemed to be glaring at Wocky from under his dark brow. "You have absolutely no idea what you're talking about."

Seeing his client was still too busy arguing to talk, Apollo risked a glance at his watch. 'Nine fifty... Trial's about to start, I haven't had a real talk with my client... and Luke's still missing in action.'

Sighing, he glanced at the wall separating the lobby from its twin next door. 'I hope he's okay...'

Luke gripped the strap of his satchel tightly to keep from fidgeting. It wouldn't do to let his brother's case down now by letting suspicion be cast on him... and the thought that it might be if it came out he was lying was terrifying the young vet more than it should have been. "I guess Apollo was right to ask if I was okay about this after..." He shook his head, not wanting to dwell on the events of the previous November. 'I'll be fine. I am fine. There's nothing to worry about.'

Klavier turned around from the table his papers were spread across, giving Luke a patient smile as he casually leaned backwards on the wooden surface. "So... Herr Triton. The Fraulein detective tells me you witnessed the murder, ja?"

Luke warily nodded, his fingers tightening around his satchel strap. The pause stretched out for a minute or two before Klavier laughed. "Would you mind explaining it for me, Herr Triton?"

"O-oh, of course," Luke hurriedly replied, plastering a smile on his face and trying to stay calm.

It took only a few minutes to run through the list of events, and Luke was suddenly glad Trucy had prompted him to practise it in the car on their way over. Klavier had kept quiet, watching Luke as he patiently waited for the tale to end, dark eyes never leaving his. At first, Luke found it terribly embarrassing, having to pretend he had been in a random tree in the park, wearing sunglasses in the middle of the night (that particular detail he hoped was never going to be addressed - Trucy had instructed him to pretend he hadn't known if someone else did notice), but, as he stuttered out Corbin's story of the interrupted confrontation, the gunshot, and the flight of the three witnesses, he slowly managed to regain his confidence.

"And then a fourth person climbed out the window of the noodle cart," he said, finishing his tale, "and ran away. Once they were all gone, I left myself."

Klavier stood in silence for a moment, until it was clear Luke had finished talking, then smiled, pushing off the table. "I see," he said, hands resting idly in his pants pockets. "And, may I ask... would you be able to describe any of the people you saw?"

Luke shook his head, having expected that question. "S-sorry, it was too dark."

"Because of your sunglasses," Klavier added, his smile suddenly seeming more amused, to Luke's embarrassment. "Did it not occur to you to remove them?"

Pretending he wasn't turning as red as Apollo's cape, Luke shook his head again. "N-no, I... I wasn't expecting someone to get shot."

Klavier paused again, then reached behind him and grabbed a sheet of paper, which Luke saw as it was held out to him was a diagram of the crime scene, complete with river, path, noodle stand and even the nearby tree that Corbin had been in. "Could you mark everyone's positions on this map then, Herr Triton?"

Luke froze. He hadn't been expecting that; Corbin had said nothing to describe where the people he saw were, other than (who they assumed to be) Wocky being 'in front of' Meraktis and the witness being 'by the river'. "Uh..."

"It shouldn't be too hard," Klavier continued, grabbing some small paper labels from the table behind him with his other hand. "We know the victim was here," he placed a label with 'V' in front of the stand, "and you were around here, ja?" A label with 'W2' was placed over the tree. "Plus, your little stowaway in the cart." Grinning, he placed a third label of 'W3' over the stand, then held the map and his two final labels, 'K' and 'W1', out for Luke. "Even in the dark, you should have seen enough to know where everyone was."

There really wasn't any way for Luke to refute that logically, and he knew it. Slowly, he took the labels and map, thinking carefully on how best to bluff through this particular question - If seven years being a Wright hadn't taught him how to bluff, he didn't think anything could. The 'K' label he assumed was for Wocky, although he objected on principle to its clear meaning of 'killer'; At least with Wocky it was easy enough to guess where he would be - right in front of Meraktis - so he placed it down and gave Klavier a glare. "Although I do not believe Mister Kitaki was the killer, since you clearly want me to label him with this one, I have done so," he coldly informed the prosecutor.

Klavier laughed. "Ah, fine, fine," he agreed. "You have spark, Herr Triton!"

Luke just continued his firm stare for a moment, then returned his gaze to the map, his current 'puzzle'. 'Corbin said the witness was by the river... presumably, they were on the path, putting them to the north, but there's nothing to say they weren't on the grass to the south. We don't know anything about this witness, after all.' He frowned. 'And I'm not going to get any hints on this one, either.'

After a long pause, the prosecutor opposite flicked at his hair, his grin fading to a small smile as he took a step towards Luke. "You can just admit it if you don't know, Herr Triton."

Luke was very careful not to react: It would be awful to get himself accused of the crime (he trusted Apollo to protect him if that happened), but for a stranger, let alone one he didn't trust in the slightest, to touch on his special ability to talk to and understand animals? He knew from experience he would just be laughed at and ridiculed, and attracting that kind of attention to the defence in court was the last thing he ever wanted to do; Only Maya had ever believed him outright with no evidence to prove it, and Luke didn't see any animals in the small defendants lobby that could help him not look like a madman in Klavier's eyes.

Finally, Klavier took the map and unused label from Luke, giving the surprised young man a smile. "I think that's all I wanted to know, Herr Triton. You may leave now if you wish."

"R-really?" Luke asked, watching the prosecutor return his map to the table of paperwork. "You don't want me as a witness in the trial?"

Klavier chuckled, turning to face the young vet. "If I do, you will not be far away, ja?" Returning his attention back to his paperwork, he waved Luke away. "I shall see you in court with Herr Wright. The trial will begin soon, after all."
Luke stared for a moment, then nodded and hurried out of the room.
Turnabout Corner, Day 2: Trial, Part 2

June 16, 10:00AM
District Court
Courtroom No. 4

Luke had run into Apollo and Trucy almost the moment he left the prosecution's lobby, and Apollo had been beyond relieved to see him, already en route to the courtroom. Trucy had given them both a quick hug and wished them luck before dashing off to find Clay in the gallery, and the Wright brothers had continued ahead together, escorting their client (still fuming from a lengthy argument with his father) into the courtroom ahead.

It was only a few minutes later that Klavier arrived opposite them, and, not long after, the courtroom was called to silence for the arrival of the judge, who settled himself into the chair at the top of the podium and began court with a few firm taps of his gavel.

"Court is now in session for the trial of Wocky Kitaki," the judge announced.

Apollo nodded, standing tall behind his bench. "The defence is ready, Your Honour."

Klavier smirked, brushing at his fringe. "Ready to rock 'n roll, Herr Judge."

The judge turned to Klavier, examining the younger Gavin. "Long time no see, Prosecutor Gavin," he said. "Were you taking a leave of absence?"

The prosecutor almost seemed to scoff, preening at the attention. "You know that little band I started in my free time?" he replied to the elderly man above them. "Thing is, we got real popular. Hard to say 'nein' to your fans when three of your singles go platinum, ja?"

Resisting the urge to roll his eyes, Apollo only tightened his glare at his opposition. 'Destroyed my father's life and got rewarded with a successful music career... no wonder you thought you'd come back to finish the job with me.'

The judge only nodded, seeming deep in thought. "I see," he mumbled, then gave Klavier a worried look. "To be honest, I was a little concerned," he admitted. "I feared that you might still be distraught over that one trial..."

'Obviously he's using his brother's conviction as fuel for the fire of revenge,' Apollo bitterly mused to himself.

Klavier's face twitched for a moment, too fast for the average eye, and he brushed at his hair nonchalantly. "Not to worry, Herr Judge," he insisted. "I wouldn't miss this day in court for the world. It's worth even more than VIP passes to one of my concerts, ja? How could I pass up a chance to see the true strength," he turned to lock eyes with Apollo, his smile suddenly seeming very false, "of the little boy who bested my brother?"

Apollo refused to reply, returning Klavier's gaze with a stern glare. It was beyond clear to him now that neither of the Gavins were interested in finding the truth of a case, only winning against their opponent; Why else would the prosecutor be using such personal insults as calling Apollo a 'little boy'?
Seeing he was getting no reply, Klavier humphed, flicking at his hair as he looked away with a smile. "It was worth cancelling a show or two," he casually added.

The judge nodded. "Understood." He leaned back in his chair, getting to business with a wave of his hand. "You may give your opening statements to the court."

Klavier hid a laugh. "Before that," he said, looking up at the judge, "I was thinking... Is the air in this courtroom not a bit... serious?"

"It is a court of law," the judge pointed out, raising an eyebrow.

This time, Klavier did laugh. "That's no way to get the crowd jumping, Herr Judge!"

"They're not supposed to jump!" the old man replied, starting to look annoyed. "This is a courtroom!"

Ignoring the judge, Klavier threw out an arm to point dramatically, eliciting a cheer from the gallery. "Achtung, baby!" he cried. "Today, we play it my way!" With that, he immediately turned to miming what looked like a guitar solo.

Apollo glanced at Luke, only to see his brother was as confused as he was. He almost could have sworn, in the roar of the gallery, he could actually hear an electric guitar playing.

With a flourish, Klavier finished his air guitar solo, grinning for the crowd. "Sometimes you have to get on up in order to get down," he paused to point dramatically in the defence's direction, "to prosecuting!"

Behind his glare, Apollo was developing the desire to demand Klavier get on with it already. Luckily, it seemed the prosecutor opposite agreed with him.

"The victim: Pal Meraktis, director of the Meraktis Clinic," Klavier announced. "The scene: People Park." With a flick against the tablet resting on the bench in front of him, Klavier brought up a photo on the holograms, of the aged man slumped over the pull-bar of the noodle stand in the park, Wocky's knife sticking out of the ground in front of him. "He was found pulling a noodle stand."

The judge blinked in surprise. "What in the world was a doctor doing pulling a noodle stand?" he asked.

Klavier grinned cockily, brushing at his hair as the holograms shut off again. "Yes, I believe you will only find that out by asking the defendant, right here, right now... because it's an undeniable truth that he shot the victim!"

Instantly, Apollo slammed at his bench with his fists, his glare focussed tightly on the prosecutor opposite. "What do you mean, 'undeniable'!?" he demanded.

Klavier only scoffed, smiling at the attorney as he gestured to the witness stand, where Wocky was lounging idly, not paying attention to his surroundings. "If you are to glare at anyone, Herr Wright, glare at the punk in the defendant's chair. His crime was witnessed quite clearly, you see."

Apollo refused even to glance in his client's direction, still staring firmly at Klavier. "Try harder, Gavin. It takes more than an unreliable witness to shake a Wright's belief in his client."

The judge nodded. "Very well. Please admit this witness to the court."

Klavier snapped his fingers, shaking his head. "Nein, not yet! First, there is a little matter to be cleaned up." With that, he began rocking on his air guitar again.

Luke bit back a snort, leaning towards his brother. "A bit in love with his music, isn't he?"

The judge sighed. "What is it, Prosecutor Gavin?"

Finishing his silent solo with a flourish, Klavier pointed up at the judge's podium. "The motive, Herr Judge," he explained. "Why did the little punk do it? Why did he kill the director of the Meraktis Clinic?"

"Objection!" Apollo shouted, banging on his bench again and almost smiling as he caught his opponent out. "Not so fast! The defendant doesn't have to explain that!"

Klavier just continued to smile. "Oh?" he asked. "But what if the defendant specifically requests to do so, as he did this morning?" He brushed at his hair, grinning cockily. "I want to give a shout out to all my homeys', I believe he said."

"What!?” the judge cried.

"'What' is right!" It was only thanks to his training on stage, and the cold hard focus of his anger at Klavier, that Apollo barely reacted to that news. It was just as one of his and Trucy's books said: Always hit your crowd with speed and ferocity. A part of him wondered if Klavier had read that book, too.

Luke was gripping at his satchel strap. "This isn't good," he whispered. "I hope you got to talk with Wocky while I was busy?"

Apollo minutely shook his head, turning his more neutral gaze to the defendant studying his fingernails on the stand. "No," he quietly replied. "I guess he really means it when he says he wants to go to jail; It must be a bonus for him that he didn't actually commit a crime."

"Well, this is highly unusual, but..." the judge mused aloud, then sighed. "The court will now hear from the defendant concerning his motive in the crime!" He banged his gavel to warn the rising noise in the gallery, then turned to the teen at the stand, who jumped to his feet as he realised he was being addressed. "So... you, son, are the defendant," he paused, glancing at his papers, "Wocky, are you?"

Wocky screwed up his nose as though he'd been hit with a particularly nasty stench. "I ain't your son, old man!" he shouted, shaking a fist at the podium. "You step to a Kitaki, you best be prepared to step strong!"

The judge seemed unfazed, staring sternly back at the boy. "You 'step' to a public official, you best be prepared to step into jail," he replied.

"I think that's only going to encourage him," Luke muttered with a wince. Apollo nodded in agreement.

With another bang of his gavel, the judge continued, "Well then, the court will now hear testimony on the defendant's motive, from the defendant himself!" With a nod, he gave the teen at the stand another stern stare.

Wocky rubbed at his nose with a sniff, seeming to ignore the old man entirely as he looked away in the vague direction of the ceiling. "I'll tell you one thing, that doctor was a quacker!" he cried. "Someone had to show him what's what! I was in his clinic 'bout half a year ago. He messed up my op something bad." He waved a hand, scowling as he returned his gaze to the attorneys and judge. "And then he just lets me go, without a word! See ya later, bye!" He paused, growling. "So I gotta go in, get another doc to patch me up again! That was the day I done figured it out." He pointed a finger threateningly. "No O.G.'s gonna let that pass! That's why I went to his pad that night, know what I'm saying?"

Apollo closed his eyes as he held back a sigh. There was no sign of a lie in Wocky's words... but at least he wasn't yet claiming to be the one who shot the unfortunate victim.

"You're saying you were one of the victim's patients...!?" the judge cried.

Wocky nodded. "Lotta stuff does down when you're keeping it real on the street," he replied. "True dat. I'll tell you one thing, that doc was wack!"

"That's a lot of 'one things' he's telling us," Luke muttered.

"Shame he couldn't spill them to us earlier," Apollo quietly agreed with a frown.

The judge hummed in thought for a moment, then nodded. "Very well, the defence may begin the cross-examination."

[View the Court Record]
Apollo crossed his arms as he mentally prepared himself for the cross-examination. More than anything, he wished he'd had the time to question Wocky before the trial, but there was little point in idle wishes now he had his client actively fighting him in court. 'I know this happened to Dad once... but I doubt Wocky's trying to avoid a worse charge than his current one. He just wants the 'reputation' of being imprisoned for murder.' He looked up, watching Wocky. "So you were a patient at the Meraktis Clinic half a year ago?" he asked. "For what reason?"

Wocky smiled proudly, crossing his arms. "I had what you might call a 'mark of honour'," he boasted.

"Can you explain precisely what was wrong?" Klavier prompted, standing relaxed behind the prosecutor's bench.

"We had a little run-in with the Rivales Family," Wocky explained with a sniff, smirking. "That's when I pulled a jack move, and ran into an ambush. G busted a cap right in me."

Klavier smiled, amused, looking at his tablet computer. "According to my sources, you 'couldn't stand the stress of waiting and ran in fifteen minutes before the appointed time'..." He looked up at the teen, raising an eyebrow. "By yourself."

Wocky growled. "Hey, I was more than a match for those guys!" he cried.

"So you were carried to the Meraktis Clinic from there?" the judge asked, stroking his beard curiously.

"Apparently, he was shot in the heart," Klavier filled in, still smiling in amusement.

Luke's eyebrows shot up. "And he's still alive!?"

'And I thought catching bullets with my teeth was dangerous enough,' Apollo mused.

"The bullet stopped just short of my thumper, you know what I'm saying?" Wocky continued. "I woulda been golden if it weren't for that wack doc! Can't even take out a stupid bullet!"

"So, as you say, the surgery was failure," Klavier picked up, playing with his hair again. "And, saying nothing about it as he did, it sounds as though Herr Doktor wished to hide his mistake."

Scowling, Wocky nodded. "He's a liar, straight up! He's a badder G than me!"

"I'm not surprised," Luke muttered to his brother. "That sounds like a difficult procedure."

Apollo pressed a finger to his forehead in thought. "So, this bullet is still...?"

"You know it!" Wocky cried, jabbing at his chest. "I can still feel it, right there in my chest, pressin' up against my heart!"
"Likely only through the power of suggestion," Luke was muttering again with a frown. "If he could actually feel it, he wouldn't have needed a second check-up to know it was still there."

Klavier was standing, relaxed, behind his bench with his eyes closed, snapping his fingers rhythmically. "'Your words are like a bullet shot straight into my heart', or something to that effect?" Chuckling, he stopped, looking up into the gallery to wink. "Incidentally, that's from one of our hit singles."

Apollo rolled his eyes as he heard a squeal or two of delight from the crowd.

To his credit, the judge appeared to be ignoring the off-topic preening of the prosecutor. "Well, that sounds like a straightforward case of malpractice!" he told Wocky in astonishment. "Word, J-man," Wocky agreed with a nod. "Weren't no accident, that's fo' shizzle."

Apollo thought a moment, then went to his Court Record to consult with the transcript. "You... 'went to his pad'?" he asked Wocky, confused. "How did you end up in the park, then?"

"What, you blind!!" Wocky shot back. "Shortest way to the clinic from my place is through that park!" The teen leaned forward on the witness stand, apparently trying to be dramatic with his story. "There I was, cold walking to that clinic of his... when he comes popping up out of nowhere, right before my eyes!" He smirked, standing up with arms crossed. "I figured someone up on high was looking out for me, know what I'm saying?"

The judge just nodded sagely, humming in thought. "It seems that there were issues with this doctor," he decided.

"Man, putting him down was like doing the world a favour!" Wocky added in agreement.

Apollo sighed, pressing a hand to his face. 'Wocky, you're getting dangerously close to outright 'confessing', and that's the last thing we need!'

"But why did this mistake only come to light that day?" the judge asked.

"It was found during the Family health check-up," Klavier casually explained.

Luke frowned, confused. "The... what?"

"That was the wackest thing of all!!" Wocky cried, shaking a fist. "All us G's lining up, taking eye exams n' all that. Better to die young than fade away, bizzoy!" He bounced back and forth, holding out his arms as though ready to start a fight right then and there.

Klavier quietly chuckled, brushing aside a lock of hair. "A relief to hear."

Wocky paused, looking over at the prosecutor with wide eyes. "W-what's a relief!?" he demanded.

"Oh? Did your father not tell you?" Klavier continued, his amused smile slowly fading as he met Wocky's eyes. "That bullet you carry so close to your heart... If not attended to immediately..." he paused, shaking his head. "It could kill you."

The courtroom rang out with surprised gasps, Wocky himself frozen, staring at Klavier with wide eyes. Luke, however, only frowned, rubbing his chin in thought. "Right... That does make sense."

Apollo turned to his brother, a single eyebrow raised, but had no time to question him before the prosecutor was speaking again.
"Yes, Herr Doktor Meraktis had knowledge concerning this 'ticking time bomb' in you," Klavier told Wocky, playing with his fringe again and almost looking boastful. "Knowledge that could have saved your life."

"No way!" Wocky managed to shout, breaking out of his shocked stare. "Th-that's wacked!"

"There is proof," Klavier replied, reaching under his bench and pulling out a medical file, which he held up by his face. "Your check-up report." With that, he laid it down on the bench, tapping at his tablet computer next to it; A moment later, Apollo saw the report (dated the day of the murder) pop up in his Court Record, and tapped it to examine, although it was Luke who seemed to be giving it the most careful attention. "How ironic that you would kill the one man capable of helping you," Klavier continued, now outright giving the teen at the witness stand a grin. "You're almost as careless as he was!" With that, he laughed, shaking his head.

Poor Wocky could only stare, stood behind the stand, and looking far less confident now than he had been when the trial began. Apollo couldn't blame him, he and Luke also lost for words at the clear mocking of their (admittedly very juvenile) client.

Still grinning, Klavier clapped his hands. "Well, now that the place is hopping," he cheerfully announced, "let's get this gig started!"

"S-started?" the judge asked, as lost in the silence as the rest of the courtroom had been.

"We've had enough of a warm-up act, ja?" Klavier replied, as though his answer were obvious. "Time to hear from a witness!" He gestured to the bailiffs, who rushed to escort the sullen Wocky off the stand.

Luke turned to Apollo, a worried frown on his face as he leaned in to whisper, "Suddenly I don't think this trial is going very well..."

Apollo only nodded, glaring at the prosecutor opposite. "That'd be his strategy, I bet," he quietly replied. "Unnerve us right at the start so we don't give our best when the going really gets tough later on."

"O-oh," Luke muttered. He stepped back a little, looking Apollo up and down with his eyebrows pressed together in concern.

Noticing his brother's reaction, Apollo tried not to roll his eyes, turning to face him. "What is it?" he barely restrained from snapping.

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "What's that supposed to mean?"

Luke lost any chance to reply, as the bailiffs re-entered the courtroom, cutting off the vibrant conversations of the crowd flying back and forth above them. Between the two guards, a thin man with a drawn face, dressed in a graduation gown complete with hat. In his hands, he held a thick, leather-bound book, which he was flipping through as he walked, his eyes scanning back and forth across the pages.

For reasons that were completely escaping him, Apollo found this new witness very familiar.

Klavier snapped his fingers, drawing the court's, and the new witness's, attention. "So." He smiled at the man at the witness stand. "You will tell us your name and occupation."
The witness, lips permanently pursed, stared at Klavier for a moment, gently closing his book. "My name... is Wesley Stickler," he said, then let his book fall open in his hand as he returned to perusing it. "By 'occupation' I take it you refer to some labour that 'profits' society at large, and supports a livelihood under which definition I must confess to being 'unemployed' however we must acknowledge the meaning-"

While the witness continued to prattle on at a mile a minute, Luke and Apollo gave each other confused looks. Whoever this 'Stickler' was, he certainly liked the sound of his own pompous voice.

Finally, Klavier interrupted the witness, frowning a little in irritation. "By which he means to say that he is a student," he explained. "A junior at Ivy University if I'm not mistaken?"

"Yes, in the Department of Science and Engineering," Stickler replied, giving a small nod as he again looked up from his book, holding his arms wide with a smile. "Filled with curiosity for all things, I spend my days in pursuit of truth, honing my-!"

"Herr Stickler," Klavier again interrupted, "please direct said curiosity to the case at hand today."

The judge nodded. "Very well, Mister Stickler. Please testify to the court about what you saw on the night of the crime."

Stickler sniffed. "You ask, quite simplistically, 'what I saw'. However, we must understand that homo sapiens possess two eyes, each of these designed to receive and interpret data..."

As Klavier hurried to try and distract Stickler from his rambling, Luke elbowed Apollo with a smile, whispering, "Now I'm even more glad I decided not to go to Ivy myself!"

Apollo nodded distractedly. "Uh, yeah..."

Luke frowned, surprised not to get at least a smile for his joke. "What is it?"

"I-I just..." Apollo shook his head, staring at the witness with a worried frown. "Does that guy look familiar to you?"

"No?" Luke replied.

Apollo sighed. "I could swear I've seen him before..."

Finally, Stickler's ramblings were halted, and his cleared his throat in preparation for his testimony. "That night, I passed through the park on my way home from shopping... when I saw them!" He held up his hands dramatically, his book snapping shut in his hand. "One man, pulling a stand. Another man, facing him. I saw them quite clearly. The man facing the victim was the defendant. In his hand he held..." As if just noticing the book in his hand, he returned it to his chest, gently opening it to leaf through its pages. "Yes, a pistol!" His book again snapped shut. "It was pointed at the man pulling the stand. A shot!" Once again, he returned to his book; Apollo wondered why he bothered closing it at all. "The bullet hit the man pulling the stand from the front, square in the forehead!"

The judge pulled at his beard, humming in thought. "Was there anyone else in the park at that time?"

"I can say with a hundred percent accuracy that there was not," Stickler decisively insisted.

"Depending on your definition of 'anyone else'," Luke muttered.

Klavier was digging around under his bench again. "The pistol our witness refers to..." He stood up, brandishing a small plastic bag containing a silver gun. "Is this."
The judge nodded. "The court accepts this into evidence."

Nodding, Klavier placed the gun down and tapped at his tablet. A moment later, Apollo saw the information on the weapon popping up on his Court Record screen: Two rounds fired, fingerprints wiped - An unfortunate dead end in determining for sure who had held it to deliver the fatal blow.

"Very well," the judge was already continuing, turning to Apollo. "Mister Wright, you may cross-examine the witness."

Apollo gave the old man a firm nod, turning to the witness stand. "Yes, Your Honour."

View the Court Record
During Stickler's testimony, Apollo had quickly determined his very particular nervous habit, one so obvious he wondered how no-one else could see it... Then again, nervous habits on their own don't make or break a testimony; He would have to cross-reference them with his evidence to make any kind of headway. He was unsure about the pistol, and there was a brief hesitation about the result of the shooting... Neither's really helpful right now. He pressed a finger firmly to his forehead in thought, then looked up to meet Stickler's eyes, only to find them glued to the man's book; Deciding to ignore that, he pressed on regardless. "These two men you came across... were they talking, by any chance?"

"Ah, now that you mention it," Stickler replied, snapping his book shut, "they were, though I cannot claim I heard them clearly." He looked up at the ceiling, clearly thinking back to the night at hand. "Only fragments, such as 'You lied to me!' Oh, and 'I'm gonna give you a taste of your own medicine, pal'."

Apollo almost winced at the professed student's terrible acting ability in recreating the tone of voice behind what little he remembered of the conversation he'd walked into.

Klavier laughed. "It's just as our defendant claims!" he pointed out with no small amount of delight. "I believe he wished to 'teach' the victim what it felt like to take a bullet in the heart."

"But he was shot in the head...!" Luke muttered.

"If that's true, then this is a vital piece of testimony!" the judge realised with surprise.

Apollo simply sighed; He had to admit, everything seemed to be nicely fitting together so far.

"Ah, hold a moment!" Stickler suddenly cried, holding up a hand. "Might I be allowed to amend my testimony?" Without waiting for an answer, he cleared his throat and explained, "To be precise, he did not say 'pal' but 'man'. Yes, that was the way of it. I swear it on my diploma!"

Luke frowned. "If he's a student, surely he doesn't have one of those yet...?" he quietly wondered.

Apollo restrained another sigh. "Not that his amendment mattered to anyone, anyway," he replied. With a louder voice, he continued to Stickler, "How can you even be sure it was the defendant you saw? The crime took place at night! It would have been too dark!"

Across the courtroom, Klavier hid a smile; At Apollo's side, Luke nervously gripped his satchel strap, looking away. Stickler, however, sniffed with his usual pompous tone, snapping his book closed as he met Apollo's eyes. "Perhaps I was remiss in not mentioning this earlier."

The young lawyer blinked. "Huh?"

"You see, in class, I always sit in the very backmost seat," Stickler continued. "Do you know why?"

Apollo just barely bit back a reply of 'Who cares?"
"Because I do not wish anyone to copy my perfect notes!" Stickler cried, clutching his book with an almost-offended glare.

The judge looked as confused as Apollo felt. "And this relates to your testimony how?"

Stickler huffed at the podium. "I mention this to illustrate my predisposition to that which is 'perfect'." He turned to Apollo. "It was dark, you say? Yet there are lights in the park. If I say the defendant was in the park that night, then he was in the park that night. It is a hard, immutable fact."

Apollo was starting to feel sorry he asked; Not only was Stickler not lying, his confidence in his statement was overwhelmingly clear.

Klavier chuckled. "Herr Wright, if you wish to contradict him with another's testimony," he said, giving Apollo a grin, "then you must first summon this other person to take the stand themselves, ja?"

Noticing the prosecutor's eyes flick to Luke, Apollo shot him a glare, leaning forward on his bench as though to protectively step in front of his brother as he had for both his siblings the previous day. "I didn't ask you, Gavin," he spat venomously in reply.

The court suddenly erupted into conversation, forcing the judge to bang his gavel with a glare directed at the gallery. "Order!" he cried, managing to quickly regain control of the unruly audience.

Klavier was staring back at Apollo, his smile looking suddenly forced after the earlier jibe. However, he said nothing, turning away as he busied himself with studying the wood of his bench.

Luke nudged his brother's arm, attracting his attention to the young vet's worried look. "Apollo, please be careful not to lose your temper," he warned, "not in court!"

Apollo almost huffed, arguing, "I'm not-!"

"Mister Wright!" called the judge, distracting the pair from their conversation. "Are you done with your cross-examination?"

"Er, no, Your Honour," Apollo hurriedly replied, and turned his attention back to the witness stand, where Stickler was idly examining his book, ignoring the court at large. Time to ask about that other thing he was unsure about. 'Mister Stickler, as you sure the 'pistol' you saw is the same as the one just submitted as evidence?"

Stickler, to Apollo's surprise, bit back a smile, again snapping his book shut as he met the young lawyer's eyes. "Am I 'sure'? Surely, you jest!" he said, then turned away, looking smug. "Or so a common witness would be tempted to say."

Apollo and Luke gave each other confused looks.

"Yet I am no common witness," Stickler proudly continued. "I see not only events as they are, but the logical structure governing these events! First, we must consider the fact that it was night in the park, which indeed..."

Already Apollo found himself tuning out against his will; Stickler was starting to remind him of some of his former lecturers from college. This guy really gets a kick out of long, incomprehensible monologues, doesn't he? Argh, pay attention, Wright!

"... it becomes difficult to say with certainty that Object A was indeed Object A," Stickler finished with a flourish.
Luke crossed his arms, giving Stickler a disapproving stare. "You could've just said 'It was too dark to see clearly'. You're not helping anyone by being so deliberately obtuse."

Apollo shot his brother a grateful smile; At least one of them was paying attention.

Stickler huffed, ignoring Luke with a scowl. "Yet the fact that a pistol was fired before my eyes is indisputable," he insisted. "I heard that single shot, clear as day!"

"Single shot...?" Apollo repeated, pressing a finger to his forehead in thought. "You're absolutely certain it was only one?"

"Yes," Stickler snidely replied, waving his book dismissively. "Of course it was one shot. Why do you ask?"

Apollo held back a smile at finally finding a fault in the overly verbose student's testimony, meeting Stickler's eyes. "I ask because, according to the Court Record, that pistol was fired twice. A clear contradiction."

"Objection!" came a cry from the prosecution, and everyone looked to Klavier as he grinned at Apollo, giving the surprised attorney a wink. "Good eyes, Herr Wright. You're cool. Real cool."

Apollo was too surprised at the sudden compliment to react, only staring at the prosecutor blankly.

"Yet, there is no reason why this other shot had to have been fired that night," Klavier continued.

"Meaning...?" the judge asked.

Klavier chuckled, picking up the gun in its evidence baggie to show once again to the court. "This pistol came from the Kitaki Family mansion, ja?" he pointed out with a smug smile. "I think it's not unreasonable to assume the pistol had been fired once before that night. During, perhaps... another altercation?"

Apollo sighed as he pressed a hand to his face. Klavier had a point there, and, what's worse, he'd likely been waiting for Apollo to point out that problem specifically to shoot it down.

"Don't give up, Apollo," Luke reassured his brother with a smile. "There's one more contradiction in the testimony!"

"And, whatever it is, Gavin's likely already spotted it," Apollo darkly muttered in reply.

Luke shrugged, unable to refute that. "Even so, you should still point it out anyway," he insisted, flicking at the Court Record to bring up Stickler's testimony. "Papa says to believe in your client until the very end, right? It's not the end, yet!"

Apollo sighed, but he agreed with his brother; What kind of Wright would he be to give up now? As he turned his attention to the testimony to find this last contradiction of Luke's, he noticed said brother dig through Apollo's papers and pull out the autopsy report (which Apollo had copied digitally into his Court Record the previous night). 'Yeah, don't try to be subtle with your hints at all, Luke.' But, sure enough, a quick comparison of the two gave Apollo his answer and, despite his dreading of what reaction the prosecutor might give this time, he swiped at the digital copy of the autopsy report to display it on the screens. "What about this, then?" he asked the court, though he primarily focussed on Klavier. "The witness says the victim was shot 'square in the forehead'? Why then does the autopsy report say the entry wound was the 'right temple'?"

Stickler looked surprised. "T-temple...?"
The growing mutterings of the gallery around them were silenced by a cry of "Objection!" as Klavier seemingly rose to Apollo's challenge. He shook his head, hiding a laugh. "Herr Wright... Oh, Herr Wright..."

Apollo's eyes narrowed as he stared at the prosecutor. "Yes?"

Klavier shot Apollo a grin. "Your tactics are outdated. Trying to shake the witness by objecting to trifles?" Chuckling, he brushed at his hair. "Surely you haven't forgotten the fatal wound your father suffered seven years ago? Phoenix Wright, was it?"

Apollo felt himself turning red with rage, his hands curling into fists tight enough to leave fingernail marks in his palms through the fabric of his gloves. However, before he could pull together a reply, someone else spoke for him:

"Objection!"

View the Court Record
Blinking in surprise as he was shocked out of his anger, Apollo turned to his right, where Luke stood, eyes shooting daggers at the prosecution. "Luke...?" he asked.

"How dare you! What does the disbarment of Phoenix Wright have to do with anything!?!" Luke was shouting. "You're bringing it up purely to demean the defence, totally unrelated to the case at hand!"

Klavier, instead of sputtering out a reply like Apollo was expecting, only stared, apparently shocked that it was Luke ripping him a new one and not Apollo; Apollo himself had to admit it was shocking that it had been the ever calm and polite Luke who had been the first to lose his temper today.

"And how is 'objecting to trifles', as you put it, 'outdated'!?!" Luke added, pointing across the room at the bench opposite. "It's impossible to find the truth of what happened unless we put in every effort to make the entire story match up, which includes nitpicking at details, however minor!"

"N-nein," Klavier managed to stutter, shaking his head, "I was saying-!"

"And you claim our tactic was to 'shake the witness'!?!" Luke cut across the prosecutor's protests, by now well into the flow of his impromptu speech. "All we are trying to do is get him to tell us the full truth of everything he knows, so we can determine the full truth of what actually happened! And, if you were doing your job, that's what you'd want him to do, too!" He slammed a fist on the bench.

"When did finding the truth become simply an 'outdated tactic', Klavier Gavin!? When!?"

The silence echoed in the courtroom for what felt like forever. Apollo stood still behind the defence bench, Luke at his side panting slightly in the exertion of his outburst, and couldn't help but feel oh-so-very proud of his not-quite-little-anymore brother. Opposite them, Klavier seemed to be half cowering behind his own bench, half still shaken from the accusation Luke had just levelled at him; He stared back at the pair, eyes wide, and said nothing. Above, on his podium, the judge was equally frozen in shock, casting confused glances back and forth, and the gallery (and Stickler, who clutched his book for dear life) seemed to be mirroring him, too scared to speak up and break the deafening silence.

Apollo grinned, deciding to take on the task of returning life to the room himself. Softly laughing, he nudged his brother to attract his attention. "So, uh, what was it you were telling me earlier about not losing my temper?"

Luke blushed, embarrassed. "O-oh, uh..." He turned to the podium on their right. "M-my apologies, Your Honour. I guess I just needed to get that out."

"Er, n-no, that's quite alright," the judge insisted, managing to relax with a (still slightly tense) smile directed at the defence team. "It was a very passionate speech about the purpose of the court." He then frowned in confusion, looking over to Klavier. "Er, what were we talking about before that, again...?"

Klavier sprung back to life with a hurried clearing of his throat, avoiding meeting anyone's eyes as he nervously fiddled with his hair. He still didn't speak up.
"It was a contradiction in the testimony," Apollo filled in in the prosecutor's stead. "The autopsy report puts the entry wound of the bullet in the victim's right temple, and the witness had said the shot landed 'square in the forehead'."

"Ah, yes!" the judge cried with a smile, then turned a stern frown to the still-terrified Stickler. "And how do you explain this discrepancy, witness?"

Stickler made a gurgling noise in his throat.

Finally, Klavier seemed to regain his ability to function, forcing a broad grin and again clearing his throat. "Ah, that is rather simple," he replied, then looked towards the defence bench. "Herr Forehead."

Apollo raised an eyebrow in confusion. 'Is... he talking to me?'

"Let us imagine you are walking through the park," Klavier continued, though the façade of his usual airs was broken by the audible shakiness in his voice. "You see two men facing each other, one with a pistol trained on the other. What would you do, Herr Forehead?"

Apollo resisted the urge to roll his eyes as he realised, yes, the prosecutor was talking to him. "I... guess I'd try to stop them," he reluctantly replied. "Shout for them to stop or something."

Luke sadly frowned, looking away. "I'd be too scared to do anything," he admitted. "I'd just freeze." He then looked up to meet Klavier's gaze with a stern frown. "And what about you, Piano Gavin?"

Klavier was quick to avoid Luke's eyes, nervously stuttering for a moment before just looking to Stickler. "S-so, Herr Stickler, what did you shout, I wonder?"

Apollo slapped a hand to his face as he realised what the 'simple' explanation was - He'd have to ask Luke about the 'piano' comment later.

Stickler's lingering fear instantly vanished. "Ah yes. Thank you for jogging my memory," he said. The judge nodded. "It sounds like an addendum to the testimony is required," he ordered, waving his hand at the witness.

As all eyes turned to Stickler, Apollo noticed Klavier turning his back to the courtroom, a hand to his face as he leant against the prosecutor's bench. The young lawyer almost felt sorry for him - Luke's passionate speeches could be awfully hard-hitting like that - but quickly reminded himself this was the man who had gloated about 'catching out' the famous Phoenix Wright using forged evidence, and quashed any remaining sympathies. They couldn't afford to drop their guard when a Gavin was involved.

"As soon as the killer raised his pistol," Stickler was explaining at the witness stand, "I took action. 'Cease this at once, you two!' I cried," he held out a hand the same way he probably had on the night, then paused and sniffed, adding, "with composure." His hand returned to his book. "The victim turned in the direction of my voice, and a shot rang out, whereupon our cowardly killer, the defendant, appeared to have become frightened. Tossing the pistol aside, he fled the scene."

'Of course, he mentions Wocky running away at the sound of the shot,' Apollo mused, 'but not himself running away as well? I wouldn't be surprised if it was the shout that set off the gunman in the first place.'
"I see," the judge said with a nod. "So you attempted to stop the crime."

"Indeed," Stickler replied, pausing for a moment before quickly adding, "With composure."

Klavier spun back around, seemingly now back to his former self, minus a bit of his usual humour. "Let us consider this new testimony, shall we?" he asked, and swiped at his tablet computer to bring up on the holograms a grey and black map of the crime scene, complete with river, path, noodle stand and even the nearby tree. In front of the stand was a marker, 'V', with an arrow pointing in 'front' of them to a second marker, 'K', with an identical arrow pointing right back at V; It didn't take a genius to figure out what they represented. "Observe the diagram, if you would. The witness - Mister Stickler, was it? - stood here." As he spoke, Klavier tapped at his computer and a third marker appeared to the south, 'W1'. "He shouted, 'Oh stop! Please!', or something of this nature, and the victim responded by looking in the witness's direction!" Another tap at his computer, and the arrows of V and K both turned towards W1, eliciting murmurs from the gallery as they realised what Klavier was saying. "If the killer were to have fired at just that moment..." He paused, giving a small chuckle that seemed to be lightening his mood back to normal, and a dotted line appeared between K and V. "As we can see, the bullet would have struck the right temple, as in the report."

The judge stared at his small holographic screen, running a hand through his beard. "That does seem to be the case," he agreed.

Stickler raised his hands with a proud smile, announcing, "Witness the power of a Junior in Ivy University's Department of Science!"

Luke quietly sighed, muttering to Apollo, "The more he boasts about that, the less it becomes something anyone else would boast about..."

The judge gave the witness a nod, then turned to the defence. "Very well, Mister Wright, you may cross-examine the witness."

Apollo nodded, bring up the transcript on his Court Record before turning to face Stickler. "So you saw a raised pistol... Weren't you frightened?"

Stickler almost huffed with pride. "It can be said we students of Ivy University know no fear," he insisted. "The moment I saw that pistol, my inner sense of justice compelled me to take action!"

"That was certainly brave of you," the judge pointed out with a sympathetic look. "You might have gotten shot!"

At that, Stickler blinked in surprise. "Er...?"

"You certainly were lucky," Klavier agreed, smiling. "If I were in the killer's shoes, I certainly wouldn't have left a witness behind."

Stickler was now frozen, eyes wide, and didn't reply.

Apollo almost laughed; Apparently, he realised, Stickler had had no idea until now that he'd actually been in danger by interrupting the scene he'd wandered into. "Did you hear the gunshot at the same time as the victim turned?" he asked, hiding his smile.

Breaking out of his shock, Stickler hurriedly nodded. "Indeed," he replied. "I would say 'about' the same time, to be precise."

'As vague as always...' Apollo mused. 'No time for Meraktis to even ask for help, just instantly shot.' "And the killer's actions? Can you describe them more clearly?"
Stickler smiled, amused. "He seemed quite surprised, especially considering that it was he who did the deed!" He held up his hands. "As we can see, human psychology is a tangled web, indeed."

"He simply couldn't believe what he had done," Klavier explained with a knowing smile and a shrug. "He shot, he panicked. A common tale, but true."

"Except that it doesn't line up with Wocky's supposed 'confession' earlier," Luke whispered, frowning.

"I think that depends on personal interpretation," Apollo whispered back with a smile, then returned his attention to Stickler, clearing his throat as he wiped the amusement from his face. "So the criminal ran. You didn't try to apprehend him?"

"It all happened so fast, I'm afraid I hadn't the time," Stickler insisted, pressing a hand to his chest.
Apollo pressed a finger to his forehead as he wondered what to ask next. They appeared to have run out of fuel in the testimony, and Apollo hadn't spotted any contradictions... Was it time to ask Stickler about his own exit from the crime scene? Technically, as Klavier had pointed out earlier, they couldn't use Luke's testimony as evidence until it was presented in court, and Apollo was loathe to resort to putting Luke behind that witness stand again unless they had no other choice. Despite that though, with Stickler having not yet said anything about leaving the crime scene, it wouldn't hurt to sort of angle towards that direction... right?

A nudge at his arm interrupted Apollo's train of thought, attracting his attention to Luke at his side. The young vet was giving him a small smile, and asked, "Need help?"

Apollo sighed. "Yeah, guess so," he reluctantly admitted under his breath.

Luke nodded, his smile unchanging. "Now's the perfect time to ask Stickler about a certain piece of evidence Gavin gave us. You didn't notice anything odd about the actions of the killer?"

"No?" Apollo replied, shaking his head with a raised eyebrow. "According to Stickler, he fired, dropped the gun, and booked it."

"Exactly," Luke said, still smiling. "So, there's something missing that should be there if the witness is telling the truth."

Apollo had opened his mouth to ask what, when Luke pushed the Court Record towards him across the surface of the defence bench. On the screen, the evidence notes on the murder weapon, the Kitaki pistol: 'Weapon left at the crime scene. Two rounds were fired. Fingerprints were wiped.'

"See it now?" Luke asked with a grin.

It took Apollo a moment or two more to realise what his brother was referring to, and he grinned triumphantly as he slammed his fists on the bench, turning his gaze to the witness stand. "Wait a second, Mister Stickler!"

Stickler just waved a hand at the defence dismissively. "Tsk tsk, another misleading request. Yet you're so beholden to your own mode of 'discourse' you can't see how it affects you!"

Apollo blinked in surprise, unsure how to react to the unexpected response. "Come again...?"

"Wait a 'second', you say?" Stickler was already continuing. "A 'second'? Are we intended to wait just that, a single second, one sixtieth of a minute? That's hardly enough time to draw a breath, let alone make a statement in court! Now, had you-"

Apollo turned to see Luke already rolling his eyes at the witness again. "Now he's just being pedantic to the point of insult," the younger brother muttered.

Stickler's speech was interrupted by the judge, who looked down at Apollo disapprovingly. "Mister
"Yes, Your Honour?" Apollo asked, rubbing the back of his head.

"Am I to understand you are objecting to the length of a second?"

Apollo frowned in confusion for a moment, then hurriedly shook his head. "N-no, I...!" He paused, groaning in frustration, and pointed at the pistol sitting on the prosecutor's bench. "Look at the pistol! The court's own notes say it doesn't have a single fingerprint on it!"

"Ah, a common ploy, made all the more common, I fear, by the prevalence of television," Stickler moaned dramatically, not seeming to notice the fact's relation to his own words. "Criminals these days are loathe to leave fingerprints."

"You said yourself the killer tossed the gun and ran!" Apollo shot back. "He didn't have time to wipe the gun for prints!"

Stickler paused, surprised.

Before the witness could attempt to explain, Klavier was chuckling, attracting the court's attention to his easy-going grin. "And tell me, Herr Wright... what is it you wear on your hands?"

Apollo glanced at the white gloves Trucy had made for him before shooting a glare at the prosecutor. "The notes on the murder weapon are very clear about one thing: The fingerprints were wiped, which means some trace of prints remained!" He turned his attention to Stickler, pointing at him dramatically. "Which contradicts your testimony! If everything happened as you say it did, he wouldn't have had time to wipe the pistol!"

Stickler thought a moment, then sniffed self-importantly. "That may be, but it does not change what I saw," he insisted. "The killer, the defendant... He threw down the murderous weapon from his hand and fled."

The judge was humming in thought, tugging at his beard. Luke was similarly stroking his goatee, muttering, "Murderous weapon...?"

"And this pistol was found at the scene of the crime," Stickler continued, gesturing to the gun on Klavier's bench, "strongly suggesting that this was the weapon he disposed of!"

Apollo couldn't resist a grin. 'Meaning, just as I thought from the beginning, you had no idea if it was really that pistol in Wocky's hand!'

Klavier brushed at his hair with a smile. "That sounds solid to me," he said, looking across the room to the defence. "Well, Herr Forehead? Any of your precious objections?"

Instead of replying, Klavier just snorted in amusement.

Leaving the prosecutor to his brother, Apollo turned to Stickler, arms crossed and a knowing smile on his face. "Mister Stickler, what if I told you there was something else on that crime scene... Another 'murderous weapon', as you put it."

Stickler's eyes widened. "Oh?"

"Yep," Apollo replied. "And, given the circumstances... I'd say it's much more likely to be the thing you actually saw falling from the 'killer's' hands."

"Perhaps you can inform the court as to the nature of this 'other weapon'?” the judge cut in, looking concerned.

With a grin, Apollo tapped at his Court Record, bringing up on the holograms his own photo of Wocky's knife, sticking handle up out of the muddy ground of the crime scene. "Take that!” he announced.

The judge frowned, leaning forward as he examined the photo on his screen. "Is that... a sword?” he asked. "I saw one of those on the late night movie last night!"

Apollo was momentarily thrown by the judge’s apparent claim of being sleep-deprived, but pushed himself to ignore it and move on. "This knife was found at the scene of the crime,” he re-iterated, "with the defendant's prints on it."

The judge almost jumped out of his chair. "His prints!" he repeated.

"This single piece of evidence proves two important things:" Apollo was already explaining, holding a finger up to count with his other arm tucked behind his back. "One, that what the defendant threw down wasn't a pistol." He held up a second finger. "Two, that the defendant wasn't wearing gloves!"

The judge hummed in thought, then nodded with a smile. "Indeed!"

Klavier chuckled, apparently impressed. "Oh, Herr Forehead? You're forgetting two other things you've just proven."

Apollo raised an eyebrow. 'Really? 'Herr Forehead' is a thing now?'

In imitation of the young magician, Klavier raised a finger. "One, that the man the witness saw was the defendant, Mister Wocky Kitaki." He held up a second to join it. "Two, that the defendant was holding a knife, with the intent of harming the victim!"

Apollo almost surprised himself as he instinctively raised a hand to firmly grab Luke's upper arm before his younger brother made a remark he'd regret. As for Wocky being on the scene, he'd already resigned himself to admitting it wasn't something he could argue, as he'd seen the truth of Wocky's own story of revenge even if he doubted the teen had committed the crime at hand.

The judge again hummed in thought, then nodded. "Indeed!” He gave Stickler a disapproving look. "This court is of the opinion that our witness is fond of making assumptions. In that light, I believe it would behoove us to hear what really occurred,” He banged his gavel to punctuate his order, "with less assuming, please!"

Stickler huffed. "It is always the same with you people,” he muttered. "'Mark left the house on foot and five minutes later his brother left after him. How long would it take for Mark's brother to catch up to him, assuming that Mark never had to stop for a traffic light'! Assuming...” He scoffed. "Yes, that's what I said, assuming! As if that were a probable situation at all! Yet here you are 'assuming' that my 'assumption' is no better!"

The judge rapped his gavel again, giving Stickler a stern frown. "Ahem. What this court 'assumes' is that the witness will testify as to what happened after the shot was fired!"

Although Stickler clearly didn't like the order, he seemed to decide there was little point fighting it further. Though still ruffled, he explained, "I could not prevent the killer from leaving the scene, nor could I simply leave the scene in good conscience." With that, he flipped open his book again,
Immediately, Apollo was giving Stickler a suspicious frown. From Luke's testimony alone, he already knew Stickler had left the scene, so his nervous habit as he claimed to have stayed was just a confirmation of Corbin's tale... except that the words themselves raised an interesting point: If Stickler did have a phone, and did intend to call the police, why'd he leave to do so? Unless, maybe... "You didn't try to chase the killer?"

"He was, as you say, a killer," Stickler pointed out, as self-important as always. "Of course, I could have run him down, yet what would he have done when cornered? Sadly, it takes more than an aptitude for solving quadratic equations to know that."

The judge was humming in thought. Apollo was similarly staring the witness down; Stickler wasn't lying, but he hadn't answered Apollo's question as to why he had left the scene... In fact, why was he lying about it in the first place?

"Did the testimony earlier not prove the defendant's presence at the scene?" Klavier asked with a grin. "And do we not also now know that there was no one else there? It seems clear that we have our killer, does it not?"

"Does it not, Mister Wright?" the judge repeated with a questioning frown at the defence.

Apollo just glared at the prosecution. "It doesn't, and you know that full well," he darkly replied, then quickly turned his attention to Stickler. "So, which way did the killer run?"

"By that time, it was clear the killer had noticed me," Stickler replied, waving a hand as though giving a lecture. "Naturally, he ran in the opposite direction."

"Away from the Kitaki Mansion?" Luke whispered in surprise.

Before Apollo could reply to his brother, Klavier had shouted, "Achtung!" and thrown a pointed finger in their direction with a grin. "Don't even think about pointing out that he was going away from his home," he warned. "All he had to do was loop back once he was out of sight."

Luke winced. "Ugh... He has a point there. And good hearing, apparently."

Apollo just gave his brother a sympathetic smile before turning back to the witness stand with a stern look. "You say you stayed at the scene until the police arrived? You were certainly composed for someone who had just witnessed a killing."

"If one is to devote one's life to the pursuit of science," Stickler explained, nose in the air, "one must never flinch at the sight of a little blood. Nor be so moved by a chemical discovery that one drops one's flask upon the lab room floor."

Luke snorted before managing to hold in his amusement, hiding his grin behind a hand. "What do you wanna bet that happened to him once?" he asked through muffled giggles.

"Oooh, cool answer," Klavier was complimenting Stickler with a smile that seemed to suggest the opposite. "Very cool."

Apollo rolled his eyes. "Can you tell us in detail about the ten minutes before the arrival of the police?"

Stickler held up his hands dramatically. "I stood in a state of heightened awareness. Anything could..."
happen at any moment. Anyone could appear from any direction!"

To Apollo's surprise, Stickler appeared to have finished talking, hands still held up as the student stared at the ceiling. "Is... that all?" the young lawyer asked.

Stickler nodded, lowering his hands. "No one came," he said. "Nothing happened at all. I saw it all, which is to say, I saw nothing."

'You sly devil,' Apollo mentally growled. Stickler showed no signs of a lie, which proved he was telling the truth, but he was also conveniently bypassing that he had left the scene, despite his noble desire to report the crime and guard the victim.

"It was late at night," the judge pointed out. "It's not odd to think there would be few people around in the park."

Apollo barely noticed the comment, pressing a finger to his forehead and frowning in thought. 'That seems to suggest he returned to the scene after running away, missing the person in the noodle stand leaving. But if he left, why'd he go back? Did he leave to call the police? Why would he need to do that? Didn't he have his...?'

Suddenly, everything clicked.

View the Court Record
Apollo stared at Stickler with wide eyes somewhere between astonishment and pure rage. "That's why you're familiar!"

While everyone else gave the young attorney confused looks, Stickler's eyes suddenly widened, and he quickly turned his attention to his book, nervously fidgeting with the pages. "I don't know what you claim to be talking about," he insisted.

"You think I wouldn't recognise a face I see almost every day⁉️" Apollo cried, scowling as his hands tightened into fists. "That was you outside the Agency that night, wasn't it⁉️ What, did you slink off to People Park to sulk after losing your precious 'prize'⁉️"

"Objection!" cried Klavier, slamming a fist into the wall behind him. "Would you mind only asking the witness about the case at hand, Herr Forehead?"

"Yes," the judge agreed with a nod. "How is this relevant, Mister Wright?"

Despite the warnings, it was only Luke's gentle tug at his cape that gave Apollo cause to calm, turning around to see his brother's concerned face, eyes wide in surprise. "Apollo?" Luke asked. "Are you saying that...?"

Forcing himself back from the brink of rage, Apollo gave Luke a small nod, watching his younger brother gasp in shock, shooting looks at the witness stand. "You have the phone we found," Apollo whispered. "Could you get it ready? Keep it hidden for now, though." Luke nodded, turning away from the rest of the courtroom to search through his satchel, and Apollo returned his attention to Stickler with a stern frown. "Mister Stickler," he called, "you used your cell phone to call the police immediately after witnessing the murder?"

Although still nervous, Stickler put on a casual air, still perusing his book. "The police undoubtedly have a record of the call," he replied. "Why not check with them?"

"Oh really?" Apollo asked, arms crossed. "Do you mind if I ask... May we see this cell phone of yours?"

Stickler's head jerked up with wide eyes. "Wh-why?" he asked. "Whatever for?"

"Show me and you'll find out," Apollo replied with a clear warning tone, glare locked firmly on his target.

"W-well I can't!" Stickler snapped, beginning to panic as he nearly ripped the pages in his book with his shaking hands. "I don't have it, you see."

The judge blinked in surprise. "You don't have it...?"

Apollo glared at Stickler a moment more in silence, then held a hand out behind him towards Luke. "Mister Stickler." A moment later, a chunk of hard plastic came to rest in his hand, and he gripped it tightly, thrusting the object upwards for the entire court to see. "Is this your cell phone?"

Stickler yelped in shock, gripping his book tightly to his chest as the gallery gasped around them. "Wh-where did you get that!?" he cried, his eyes locked on the bright pink phone, complete with watch-strap, in Apollo's grip.

Apollo didn't reply to the question, slowly lowering the phone with his stern gaze never leaving the witness. "How strange, Mister Stickler. Can you explain why your cell phone is sitting here in my hand at this very moment?"

"Wait a minute!" the judge interrupted, shocked. "What is the meaning of this!"

"This cell phone was found yesterday," Apollo coldly explained, pausing for effect before adding, "in the Meraktis Clinic garage!"

The judge gasped. "The Meraktis... Why, that's where the victim lived!"

Stickler seemed most shocked of all, stepping back in surprise with a look of horror on his face. "Th-that's impossible!"

Apollo brandished the lost phone at the witness stand. "Mister Stickler, you lied to this court!" he shouted, just barely reigning in the full force of his Chords of Steel. "If your cell phone is here, how could you have called the police from the scene of the crime!?

Stickler gave a high-pitched shriek, clutching his book tightly as he cowered from Apollo's yelling. He whimpered, then gingerly forced himself to step forward, to the witness stand he had unwittingly also fled from. "It... it's true," he admitted. "I didn't have my cell phone that night. That is why it can be said that I called the police from a public pay phone."

"A pay phone!" the judge repeated in surprise, muttering to himself.

"Just where was this pay phone located, Mister Stickler!?!" Apollo demanded, almost scrambling with his Court Record as he found a map of the area, the same one Phoenix had prepared for them the previous morning, and threw it up on the holograms; He realised too late that Phoenix's proud handiwork of the red labels noting the Agency, Kitaki Avenue and Eldoon's house were now accompanied by his own notes in cobalt blue regarding the murder investigation, labelling the clinic and murder scene complete with rough time stamps, and even signed with 'AW' and a simple diamond. Similarly to the arrow denoting the direction of the car after it hit Phoenix, a second in blue outlined the flight of the panty thief to the clinic, and a third the rough path of the noodle stand to the murder scene, while a dotted fourth suggested the most probable path of the car from the accident site to the clinic. "Point it out for the court!" he shouted, pretending the map wasn't nearly as messy as it looked.

Stickler studied the giant screen above him for a moment, making no move to comment on the red-and-blue notes littering the map it displayed. "Well, to indicate it with a startlingly high degree of accuracy..." He reached up and pointed to the location of the Gatewater Hotel, where Apollo suddenly remembered there was indeed still a public pay phone out on the street opposite the Agency. "It was right around here."

Apollo found himself wondering just what he'd been doing at the time Stickler had ventured so close to their home; Had he narrowly missed this witness on his way to and from Hickfield Clinic with his father's overnight bag? How different the night might have progressed if they'd run into each other then, though Apollo hoped he would have recognised him had that happened.
"That's... quite a ways from the park," the judge pointed out. "But... but why did you lie?"

Scowling, Apollo shut down the holograms displaying the map covered in his and Phoenix's doodles. "Why else?" he asked, bitterly. "He didn't want the court to know he had lost his cell phone, because it was found in the victim's garage!"

Stickler gave a startled cry. "Wh-wh-what are you saying!?!"

"Mister Stickler!" Apollo continued, pointing his finger accusingly at the student, "you broke into the Meraktis Clinic garage on the night of the murder!" Lowering his finger, he again waved the phone at the witness stand. "This cell phone tells all!"

"B-but that's ridiculous!" Stickler protested, sweating nervously. "That makes it sound like... like I snuck into this fellow's garage to commit some crime! As though I were trying to kill him!"

"Well, Doctor Meraktis was killed that night," the judge pointed out, eyebrows raised.

Stickler sputtered for a moment. "W-well y-yes, but no! This line of reasoning has to be against the rules!" He shook his head emphatically. "Yes, it's true! I lost my cell phone! But you can't prove that I lost it that night!"

The judge thought a moment, then turned to Apollo. "Well, Mister Wright? If that cell phone was dropped the night of the murder, it does raise considerable suspicions as to a connection with the crime."

Luke again tugged on Apollo's cape, and, as his brother turned to face him, whispered, "Are you sure he's really Trucy's thief? It could still be a co-incidence."

"It's no co-incidence," Apollo insisted with a frown. "He's a regular at the Wonder Bar, so he's well aware of that particular prop, and it gives him the perfect motive; Besides, we know his phone couldn't have been lost until after Dad's accident, remember? The theft was between then and ten o'clock, the perfect window of time to put Stickler in the area."

After a moment of careful thought, Luke nodded, giving his brother a smile. "Alright. You'd better go prove it, then." He raised his fists with a confident, determined look. "Take him down!"

Apollo grinned, then turned to face the court at large, arms crossed over his puffed out chest. "Naturally, of course, I can prove that the phone could only have been lost on the night of the murder."

"Ooh, I like your swagger, Herr Forehead," Klavier replied with a chuckle, and snapped his fingers with a smile. "Hit it!"

The judge nodded. "The court will see this evidence. Mister Wright, 'hit it', as they say!"

With a deft movement of his hands, Apollo whisked the paint-stained mirror from the doctor's car out of his bag, holding it up high to the court. "Take that!"

There was a pause as the court studied the object in confusion. "That's... a side-view mirror?" the judge asked.

"As it so happens," Apollo explained with a grin, "Doctor Meraktis' car was in an accident on the night of the murder."

"An accident!?" Stickler repeated in surprise.
"An accident," Apollo echoed confidently, and brought up on the holograms his map from earlier, no longer embarrassed of the useful notes covering it as he highlighted Kitaki Avenue. "It happened a little after nine PM, just outside People Park, our murder scene. Doctor Meraktis’ car hit a pedestrian!"

Although still nervous, Stickler mostly looked confused. "Wh-what are you trying to say?"

Apollo switched out the map for the photo he had taken of the damaged car. "From the absence of a mirror," he explained, his voice beginning to gradually increase in volume, "it's clear that the car was parked after the accident, which means it was parked there after nine PM on the night of the murder. If your cell phone had been dropped before the car was parked in that garage, then it would have been crushed." Glaring once again at his witness, he swapped out the photo on the holograms for another, one he had taken of the phone sitting under the rear wheel. "After all, it was lying on the ground, right under the wheel!"

Stickler made a strangled-sounding gasp, stepping back from the stand in shock.

"Ergo, Mister Stickler!" Apollo was almost shouting, slamming his fists on the bench. "The only time you could have dropped this in that garage was after nine PM, the night of the murder in the park!"

This time, Stickler outright jumped with a squeal, clutching his book for dear life.

"Meaning," Apollo shouted, glaring right in his eyes, "you did break into the victim's garage that night, after the accident and before the murder!"

The judge seemed to laugh to himself in shock. "This is most unexpected!" He looked to Apollo. "Mister Wright, are you naming the witness as a suspect in the murder of Pal Meraktis!?"

Apollo's rage drained out of him in an instant, replaced with shock and confusion. 'W-wait, what...?'

Stickler madly shook his head, face white as a sheet. "N-no, stop!" he cried. "This is too much! This can't be happening!" He turned towards the prosecutor's bench, where Klavier stood watching the goings-on with a neutral look. "P-p-p-prosecutor!" the panicking student begged. "Say something!"

Klavier closed his eyes, expression still carefully blank. "I suppose it is worth saying this: No connection has been found between Wesley Stickler and Pal Meraktis." Opening his eyes again, he gestured to the hot pink phone resting on the defence bench, adding, "That is, other than this."

Apollo felt a tug at his cape and turned to face Luke, who was watching him in concern. "Do we think he's the murderer?" the younger brother asked.

The older brother opened his mouth, but found himself unable to respond beyond a stuttered, "I-I..."

"I believe our next testimony will be most... revelatory," the judge said, giving Stickler a stern look. "Is the witness prepared?"

Stickler hurriedly nodded, clinging so tightly to his book Apollo was starting to think it might rip apart, cover and all. "Y-y-yes, Your Honour!" And he began to speak.

"That night..." Stickler muttered to himself at the witness stand, as though struggling to remember... or struggling to think up a believable lie. "Yes! I went to the supermarket. I must have dropped my cell phone on my way back."

Apollo rolled his eyes, but, unfortunately, couldn't tell for sure if Stickler was lying or not, as his nervousness was simply off the charts. Given his suspicions though, he highly doubted it was anything more than a lie.

"And when I was walking through the park," Stickler continued, slowly regaining confidence, "I happened to witness the crime! I saw the killer, the victim, the stand... all as clear as day! It was him! I saw the defendant at the scene!"

The judge continued to give the witness a stern stare. "Yes, but your cell phone was lying in a garage."

"Ah, yes, well," Stickler hurried to explain, "as you can see my model of cell phone has a defect: It is given to rolling!" He forced a small smile. "It's quite a pain when I drop it alongside the road, you know."

Everyone's eyes, including Apollo's, turned to the hot pink phone resting on the defence bench. "Looks like a normal cell phone to me," the judge said, but decided to leave the subject be and turned his gaze to Apollo. "In any case, Mister Wright, the cross-examination, please."

Nodding, Apollo brought up the transcript on his Court Record. To be honest, he was still a little thrown at the thought that Stickler might be their killer as well as their panty thief, but he wasn't sure yet what to think about it; They simply had too little evidence either way. 'Well... the only way to work it out is if I ask him a few questions.' "You... went shopping," he repeated. "So... you were holding a grocery bag when you witnessed the murder taking place?"

Stickler's surprise gave Apollo his answer on how accurate the whole story was. "Er... W-well, yes, of course..."

Klavier was still relaxing behind his bench, for all appearances paying no attention to the ongoing case. "Incidentally, the prosecution has received no report of this domestic detail," he spoke up.

The judge turned to Stickler with a frown. "Mister Stickler? Can you explain yourself?"

"No!" Stickler cried. "I mean, yes! I did go shopping, really! I walked around the supermarket, trying out the free samples..." He sniffed, giving Apollo the impression, maybe, he actually was telling the truth here. "It's... a deeply spiritual time for me."

The judge raised an eyebrow. "I'm sure the store clerks would disagree."

"And I don't think 'spiritual' is the right word for it," Luke muttered, looking thoughtful.
Apollo was already deep in thought again: As far as he could tell, Stickler's route home from the supermarket took him down Park Street, past both Meraktis Clinic and the alleyway where the Magic Panties were stolen, and then through the park itself. Stickler could easily claim he'd dropped his phone and it 'rolled' to where Luke had found it the next day. "Alright then, let's go back to the scene in the park," he decided. 'I doubt there's anything more he can tell us about Wicky or Meraks, so let's go for the one new thread he's brought up.' "Do you happen to remember the noodle stand?"

"Quite well, yes!" Stickler boasted. "For a student of the sciences, keen observation and healthy curiosity are vital! I remember everything! I could even read the sign! I believe it said..." He trailed off. "Er..." He stood in thought for a very long moment.

Apollo rolled his eyes. 'Ugh... Don't shout it out, Wright. If he doesn't remember, he doesn't deserve to be told...'

Finally, Stickler smiled and announced, "Noodle. Yes, that was it."

That got Apollo's attention. 'W-wait... 'Noodle'?!'

The judge frowned. "For remembering something 'quite well', it sure took you a while to tell us. And thank you for telling us that a noodle stand sells noodles. Very enlightening."

"I didn't realise the judge was capable of sarcasm," Luke muttered to Apollo in astonishment, misinterpreting his confused look as agreement. "Stickler must be really irritating him!"

"Well, Mister Wright?" the judge sighed, turning his attention to Apollo.

Snapping out of his confused stare at the witness stand, Apollo smirked. "So the sign on the noodle stand said 'noodle'?" he asked. "That's a vital new detail. And you're sure the sign definitely said that? Absolutely sure?"

Stickler stuck his nose in the air, offended. "Let me be frank: Yes," he replied. "Why, just last week, my professor offered me this praise: 'At least you have good eyesight, Stickler. I'll give you that.'" He nodded firmly. "It read, without a doubt, 'noodle'."

"I see," Apollo said, crossing his arms as he continued to smile confidently.

"What?" Stickler protested, seeing Apollo's look. "Why are you looking at me like that? Is that... pity I see in your eyes!?"

'Of a sort,' Apollo mentally replied, still smiling.

"Wait, you figured something out?" Luke asked, giving his brother a confused look. "From what?"

Apollo chuckled. "Call it my experience as a magician," he said, then turned back to the court at large. "Let's take a look at our map, shall we?" He quickly searched through his Court Record for Klavier's diagram of the scene, complete with the three markers of V, K and W1. "So, you're claiming that when you saw the sign, you were standing... Here, was it?" He highlighted W1. "Although, it would've been a bit hard to read the sign from this spot."

"Y-you think so?" Stickler asked, his prior confidence again quickly giving way to nervousness.

Apollo was suddenly very proud of himself for all the photos of the scene he'd taken the previous day, finding one of the noodle stand that he'd taken from near where the witness claimed to have stood. "Mister Stickler, I'd like you to please take another look at the stand," he swiped it up onto the holograms, "and to carefully read what the sign says." Already he was hearing gasps from sharp-eyed members of the audience, and even one from Luke at his side. "See? That sign actually states the name of the stand's owner: 'Eldoon's'."

"E-el-eld...?" Stickler sputtered in disbelief. "Inconceivable! I'm certain it was definitely 'noodle' for sure! Positive!"

The judge held a hand to his mouth, and Apollo got the impression he was hiding a chuckle. "I'm afraid your professor was wrong about that eyesight."

"I wouldn't be so quick to jump to that conclusion," Apollo replied, pointing a finger into the air to keep the court's attention on him. "What would you say if I told you that there is one spot from which the sign would be read the way Mister Stickler claims?"

Stickler stared at Apollo, his eyes slowly widening. "What...?"

"Mister Wright!" the judge commanded. "Show us this spot!"

'With pleasure!' Grinning, Apollo tapped at the screen of his tablet computer. "The witness was standing..." In moments, he had moved the W1 marker from the south of the stand... to the north. "Here! On the opposite side!"

Stickler was now totally frozen, staring at Apollo in terror.

"H-how do you know that?" the judge asked.

"My question exactly," Luke added. "How'd you come to that conclusion?"

Apollo gave his brother a grin. "Well, one, I'm a lot more familiar with that stand than you are," he idly teased Luke, "and two, I took a lot of pictures yesterday." With that, he proceeded to swap out the map on the holographic screens for the photo of the stand. "When viewed from the south, the sign on the stand reads 'Eldoon's', as we know," he explained to the court. "However! Observe the other side of the stand!" With a dramatic slide of his hand across the Court Record screen, the picture was swapped for another, one Apollo had taken from next to the mesh bin he'd found the bloomers in; The stand, and its sign, were clearly visible from under the branches of the nearby tree, exactly as they'd been on the night of the murder. "Oh!" the judge cried, almost in unison with the gasps throughout the court. "This side says 'noodle'!" he pointed out.

"Exactly!" Apollo replied, snapping his fingers as though he'd just pulled off one of his and Trucy's magic tricks back in the Wonder Bar. "The name of the stand is split between the front and back signs!" He slammed his fists into the bench, his smirk fading into a glare. "Mister Stickler, you lied to the court! You witnessed the crime from the northern side of the park, not the south!"

The slam startled Stickler back into motion, yelping as he jumped back and almost tossed his book straight up into the air. "Y-you got me!"

Any further whimpers from the witness were cut off by a loud cry of "Objection!" from the prosecution, and Apollo surprised himself with the fact that he'd forgotten Klavier was still there after all his focus on pinning a panty thief. Klavier shrugged to himself, looking as casual as can be as he gave the defence a smile. "So what?"

Apollo blinked. "S-so what!?" he repeated, equal parts confused and shocked.

"What does it matter if he saw the killing from the north or the south side?" Klavier elaborated with a
"It makes no difference at all!"

"H-he's right!" Stickler insisted, jumping at the witness stand and leaning on it heavily. "Travel far enough to the south, and you will end up going north! Viewed on a global scale, directions are utterly without meaning!"

Apollo frowned. 'Argh, don't tell me I went to all that effort for nothing!'

"That's utter nonsense," Luke spoke up from Apollo's side, arms crossed as he gave Klavier and Stickler disapproving glares. "The witness's true location changes everything! Have you all forgotten the spat we had earlier over the location of Doctor Meraktis' bullet wound?" Before anyone could reply, he'd grabbed Apollo's Court Record and brought back up the diagram of the crime scene. "If the killer and the victim turned to look at Mister Stickler when he was standing to the north," he rotated the arrows of V and K to point to W1's changed location, "then which side of the victim's temple does that bullet end up now?"

"Th-th-the left!" the judge cried in answer.

"Precisely!" Luke replied. "It's impossible for someone to shoot the victim's right temple in this scenario when standing at point K!"

Apollo could only stare at his younger brother in awe.

Klavier chuckled, apparently unmoved by the revelation. "Indeed. You are absolutely correct, Herr Triton."

"There is more," Luke continued, starting to look worried and casting nervous glances at Apollo. "Considering the placement of the wound, the location of the true killer would have to be..." He paused, looking uncomfortable, then screwed up his courage and finally blurted out, "to the north! Where Mister Stickler was standing!"

As Stickler shrieked in terror, the gallery erupted into a furor, forcing the judge to begin banging his gavel as he shouted over the rabble, "Order! Order!"

Before Apollo could congratulate Luke on his eye for detail, the younger man had turned to his brother with a nervous look. "Is it okay I accused Stickler?" he asked, and Apollo could see he was almost on the verge of panicking. "I-I don't actually think he did it, but since he was away when the other person left, I-!"

"It's fine," Apollo assured him, grabbing his brother's shoulders to help ground him and calm him down. "You're fine, Luke. You've given us a lead and time to work on it, and that's more than I could have asked for at this point."

Luke sighed in relief, managing to relax and give his older brother a small smile. "That's good... I'm glad to help."

"Objection!" came a cry from across the courtroom, which instantly quietened as all eyes turned to Klavier, who was giving the Wright brothers a stern stare from behind the prosecutor's bench, more serious than they'd ever seen him before. "Clarify one point for me if you would, Herr Forehead," he asked.

Releasing Luke and turning to face Klavier, Apollo raised an eyebrow. "What?" he bluntly replied.

"Are you truly accusing this college student," the prosecutor sternly requested, "of murder?"
Stickler squeaked, clutching his book for dear life. "No, please!" he cried, begging the defence. "Looks aside, I'm really a nice guy! All my friends say so!"

The judge frowned. "Let's hear what the defence has to say," he suggested.

Apollo felt the eyes of the court focussing on him, waiting for an answer.

View the Court Record
Apollo was used to the focus of a crowd, so, deciding they could wait, he crossed his arms as he pondered his options. Truth be told, he agreed with Luke that it was doubtful Stickler was the murderer: Luke's accusation was based by necessity on the assumption no-one else was in the area, which they knew wasn't completely true - it also assumed Stickler had to have been lying when he claimed to have shouted upon happening on the confrontation, which Apollo knew from the initial testimonies had been true. All put together, Meraktis' right temple, when the doctor turned towards Stickler, should have been facing the stand behind him (the location of the missing witness) and the nearby tree (where Luke was pretending to have been to cover for Corbin). As much as he hated to give Klavier the fuel to point suspicion on his brother, Apollo knew he had no choice but to admit the truth... Besides, hadn't he been waiting for the perfect chance to bring up Stickler's real crime?

"I do accuse Mister Stickler of a crime," Apollo announced, "but not of murder." He glimpsed Klavier minutely relaxing before he turned his attention to Stickler, watching the man sweat as he hugged his beloved book close to his chest. "Mister Stickler," he called, giving him a stern frown, "you seem unusually quiet. Tell us why, now."

Stickler's eyes darted around the courtroom before returning to Apollo, and he opened his book to rapidly flip through the pages. "Th-the word 'confession' isn't in my dictionary!" he cried.

"Tsk tsk tsk, Herr Forehead," Klavier said, a smile on his lips. "I'm afraid it falls to you to elucidate Herr Stickler's silence."

The judge stroked his beard, looking thoughtful. "Mister Wright, you did say you were accusing the witness just now for a crime other than murder." He looked down at the young attorney. "Your reason? The court's all ears."

Internally sighing, Apollo closed his eyes. "It seems the area around People Park had quite a rash of crime on the night of the murder," he explained. "Doctor Meraktis' car hit a pedestrian. Guy Eldoon's noodle stand was stolen by his neighbour, said Doctor Meraktis. A mysterious assailant shot Doctor Meraktis in the head." He paused, then opened his eyes to give Stickler a stern glare. "And a teenage girl had a pair of her panties stolen right before her eyes." Resisting the urge to slam his hand on his computer and accidentally break it, he brought up on the holograms a photo he had taken back in the garage, of Trucy posing gleefully with her reclaimed panties next to the tailpipe they had been found in. "Specifically," Apollo added, his voice increasing in volume, "this pair!"

Stickler visibly winced as the court's attention turned to him, the gallery loudly muttering. "D-don't look at me like thataaaat!" he shrieked.

The judge banged his gavel, calling, "Order! Order!" Once the crowds finally died down, he sighed and turned to Stickler. "Mister Stickler, while I can't say this comes as a shock-"

"I-it's not what it seems!" Stickler insisted, wiping the sweat from his brow with a sleeve. "By Pythagorilla's Theorem, I swear it!"
"And that would mean something if 'Pythagorilla' was an actual person," Luke muttered, arms crossed as he gave Stickler an offended look.

Apollo shook his head. "On the night of the murder," he said, dramatically telling the story to the court, "sometime between nine and ten PM, a young girl catches a panty-snatcher red-handed! Bravely, she gives chase, but the snatcher flees, and hides himself in no other place than the Meraktis Clinic garage!" He paused to let the gallery mutter to themselves, then pointed to the photo on the holograms. "Incidentally, these panties were found in the exhaust pipe of the car there; Presumably, he was trying to hide the evidence of his crime." He gave Stickler a glare that sent the student whimpering behind the stand. "But there's more: You see, this particular pair of panties is more than just a pretty pair of underwear... It's a magic prop. A very popular magic prop, one that he," Apollo pointed at Stickler with a scowl, "is very familiar with indeed!" He slammed his fists on the bench in front of him. "Don't try to deny it, Mister Stickler! I see you in the Wonder Bar almost every night! You knew full well what you were taking, and from who! It's bad enough you had to take my little sister's underwear, but to try and steal a magician's secrets is a crime I can't forgive!"

Stickler was by now cowering behind the witness stand, hiding from the full force of Apollo's fury. "Please! Hear me out!" he begged. "It's not what it looks like!"

The pleas of the cornered witness were very quickly drowned out by the buzz of conversation in the gallery, forcing the judge to bang his gavel, calling for order.

Apollo felt a tug at his cape, and he turned to Luke with a confused look, seeing his younger brother sporting a worried frown. "What?" he barely kept from snapping.

"I know what he did is vile," Luke whispered, shooting a glare of his own at the witness stand, "but try and stay calm. He's not worth losing your temper."

After a pause, Apollo nodded. "Don't worry, I can control myself."

The judge had finally calmed the room down, and gave Stickler an angry look of his own. "Mister Stickler. You should be ashamed!"

Stickler poked his head out from behind the stand, gasping for breath as he cried, "It's... not... what... it... seeeeeeeeeeeee-!" His shriek continued until his lungs were out of air, sending him back behind the stand as he sputtered for air.

"So," the judge continued, unfazed, "are we to understand that you were silent not because you were guilty of murder, but because you lacked the courage to admit your theft of this girl's undergarments?"

Coughing, Stickler pulled himself back up into a standing position. As ruffled as his previously-immaculate gown now was, he put on a calm air as he carefully paged through his book once again. "Perhaps you are not aware that my school's name was originally written 'IV'! 'I' stands for 'intelligent', 'V' stands for 'valiant'! See!?"

The judge's frown deepened. "Your point?"

"I'm not done!" Stickler yelped before regaining control of his panic and returning to his book. "Now, I'm a major in the Science Department, and what does science teach if not curiosity!" He closed his book and held up his hands, gazing at the ceiling. "Yes, we of the Ivy U. Science Department are valiantly curious! No challenge is too daunting, and what greater challenge to science than a mystery!?"
Instantly, Apollo was at the brink of rage again, slamming his fists into the bench with a scowl.

"OBJECTION! It's magic! The whole point is that it's a mystery to the audience, and the audience doesn't follow the magician home and rob them to uncover it!"

"That's easy for you to say!" Stickler cried, hugging his book to his chest. "You know the mystery behind that lacy fabric! To a scientist like me, a mystery is the unknown, and the unknown is unacceptable!" Lowering his book, he pressed a hand to his chest, staring up at the ceiling with watering eyes. "And, my friends, when it comes to mysteries, those panties are the promised land! From the moment I first laid eyes on them, I was compelled to investigate, for science! A full-sized car tire was only the first mystery those panties revealed!"

Apollo was only held back from snapping at the student a second time by Luke's hand at his arm.

"A car tire!?" the judge repeated, impressed.

"Yes! I saw them both do it, her and him!" Stickler cried, a look of awe on his face that Apollo knew well from the glimpses he caught in the Wonder Bar's audience. "They pulled a tire out of those panties! But that's not all! First, there was the tire, then a stew pot, and a frozen chicken! One mystery after another! It was..." He paused, both hands pressing his book to his chest. "It was magic!"

"That's the point!" Apollo hissed, just barely resisting shaking a fist at the student. "It's a magic act!"

"I just don't understand," Stickler mused aloud. "A broom, from a pair of panties? It mocks the very laws of physics..."

Apollo very nearly ran at the witness stand to throttle the student, held back only by Luke's firm grip on his arm.

The judge was giving Stickler a very stern look. "Mister Stickler... Am I to understand you stole this girl's panties to understand a magic trick?"

Stickler scoffed. "You say 'panties' but they are so much more than that! For me, they are an object for serious study!"

"Stop talking about my sister's panties that way!" Apollo demanded.

Klavier was looking thoughtful, despite the amused smile on his face as he watched Apollo's fury. "I wonder... There has been a recent rash of panty-snatchings in the area." He raised an eyebrow at Stickler. "Were they all you?"

Stickler clung to his book, looking uncomfortable. "I... I am sorry," he admitted. "But I did it for science! Each time I spied a pair of panties flapping in the breeze, I thought maybe! Maybe this would be the pair that would elucidate the mystery..." He smiled, despite the glittering tears in his eyes. "Even that night as she chased me through the streets, I wept tears of joy! Perhaps this is the night that I will seize the truth that lies within those panties!"

Apollo stopped listening with a scowl. He felt he'd be sick if he heard another word about the Magic Panties from Stickler's lips.

"Still, that leaves one thing unexplained," the judge pointed out, tugging his beard thoughtfully.

Klavier grinned. "Ah, you refer to our witness's other lie, yes?" he asked. "The witness claimed he saw the crime from the south, but was, in fact, in the north."

The judge nodded. "Indeed. Would anyone care to explain why he lied about that?"
Stickler fell silent, sweating nervously as he paged through his book.

Klavier gestured to the man, giving Apollo a cheery wink. "Be my guest, Herr Forehead."

Apollo's surprise helped snap him out of his boiling rage. "Me!?"

"Did I not hear you correctly?" Klavier asked, grinning. "Did you not say you 'do not accuse the witness of murder'? Why, then, did the witness lie about his location at the time of the shooting?" He chuckled. "Or have you no idea?"

"Give us a moment, Mister Keyboard!" Luke snapped back, then turned to Apollo with a determined frown, pointing to the diagram of the crime scene he'd pulled up on the Court Record. "Apollo, look at where you placed him here! Remember what else was around there?"

The judge interrupted their 'moment' with a cough. "Well, Mister Wright? What say you?"

Apollo half-wanted to scream at everyone to be quiet and give him a second of peace to think, but forced himself instead to cross his arms and press a finger to his forehead, eyes screwed shut. After a moment to collect his thoughts after the rush and emotions of pinning the Magic Panties thief, he returned his attention to the question at hand. Luke's advice he quickly realised was referencing the location of the mesh bin, unmarked on the diagram, though he wasn't sure at first why the fact was so important. When it did hit him, his eyes snapped open, in both surprise... and fear. '... Oh no.'

Sighing, Apollo took another moment or two to prepare himself, then reached into his hip-bag for the one piece of evidence he'd totally forgotten he had, and that he'd hoped to never have to bring up in this kind of situation. "The evidence that shows why he lied," he reluctantly announced, "is this." With that, he pulled out the small evidence baggie, and, from that, unfurled the large pair of beige bloomers, still reeking of garbage.

"What!?" the judge cried. "More panties!?"

Klavier seemed to giggle to himself, but, luckily, said nothing.

"These were found in a trash can at the park," Apollo explained, and brought up the diagram on the holographic screens. "Looking at the diagram," he quickly added a red square to indicate the location of the bin in the grass at Stickler's side, "we can see that the trash can was right next to where the witness stood."

The judge gasped. "Mister Stickler... You didn't...!"

"Alas!" Stickler loudly cried, falling forward on the witness stand dramatically, "I'm a failure as a scientist! I can't unravel the mysteries of the universe! I can't even unravel a pair of panties!"

"So," the judge continued, giving Stickler a stern look, "these panties are your handiwork as well?"

Stickler sniffed to hold back tears, then slowly nodded. "Th-that night, I had been chased, hounded into the Meraktis Clinic garage," he explained. "Weeping in frustration, I was forced to abandon my prize! Don't you see how I felt!?"

Apollo's hands tightened into fists. "Believe me, I'd rather not," he darkly reminded the student with a warning glare.

Stickler winced a little at Apollo's tone, but he was quickly back at his tale: "I hid in the garage for a short while, then, abandoning the panties, I made for home. To avoid the office where the girl works,

Luke's grip snapped tight on Apollo's arm, keeping the young magician from launching himself at the witness the moment the implication he had followed them home was brought up.

"- I went towards the south entrance," Stickler continued, not noticing the minor altercation of the Wright brothers nearby, "when I saw them hanging there on a clothesline by a great mansion: A

Apollo rolled his eyes, wondering if knowing the mansion was the home of the mob would have stopped the self-proclaimed 'scientist' from his spontaneous theft.

Stickler was smiling at the memory of his triumph. "I had them, safe in my pocket, ready to take home," his smile faded, "when I stumbled upon a murder! I reported what I had seen, but as I waited for the police to arrive, I got scared!" He visibly shivered, again hugging his book to his chest. "What if they searched me?"

"So you disposed of the bloomers?" Apollo asked with a glare.

"Yes," Stickler sighed morosely. "It was a severe blow to the progress of science, but one that had to be born."

The judge thought to himself for a moment or two. "A fascinating, if disturbing, tale," he decided. "I believe this brings today's proceedings to a close? And I'm more than pleased to dismiss this witness for the remainder of the trial."

Stickler whimpered from behind the witness stand, and a pair of bailiffs approached to escort him from the court.

Klavier snapped his fingers as Stickler disappeared from the room. "One or two last things, if I might."

The judge raised an eyebrow. "Yes, Prosecutor Gavin?"

"Regardless of where this witness led us," Klavier explained, "some vital points were made: Namely, that the defendant, Wocky Kitaki, was at the scene of the crime; And, he was pointing a weapon at the victim." With a grin, he lifted a single finger. "One more thing. Wocky Kitaki has a clear motive."

"Indeed," the judge agreed with a nod, "the defendant Wocky Kitaki is still the prime suspect in this case. The only suspect, in fact, assuming there was no one else on the scene at the time."

Klavier chuckled, brushing at his fringe. "And, on that note..." He leaned forward, giving Apollo and Luke a wide grin. "I believe the defence, with their strong focus on determining the full truth, has a witness of their own to call, do they not?"

It took barely a moment for Apollo to realise what Klavier was implying, and his eyes widened as he bit back a gasp.

"Oh?" the judge asked. "I should hope this witness is a lot more... agreeable than the last!"

Apollo's eyes turned to his brother, seeing Luke staring into space with a determined frown. "N-no!" he shouted to the judge, trying not to look as panicked as he felt. "There's no witness!"

Klavier raised a curious eyebrow, while the judge and Luke gave Apollo shocked looks. "What are you talking about!?" Luke cried. "Of course we have a witness!"

"No, we don't!" Apollo loudly insisted, turning towards his brother. Quieter, he hissed, "I'm not letting you do this, Luke! Not now!"

"And why ever not!?" Luke equally quietly demanded with a glare. "I can help our case!"

"Because it's a trap!" Apollo explained. "Gavin gets you up there, he makes me cross-examine you and pick apart your testimony!"

Luke rolled his eyes. "Then don't!" he snapped. "He can't 'make' you do anything! If he has an objection to what I say, he can make it himself!"
"B-but I don't want to have to question you!" Apollo replied, not wanting to admit Luke had a point.

"Well, too bad, I want to get up there and help you any way I can!" Luke shot back.

Apollo repressed an annoyed sigh. "Luke, we don't need your testimony; We have that footprint at the scene, remember? Detective Skye will have analysed it by now! We can use that to prove the other person was there!"

The judge frowned at the defence bench. "Is the defence planning to give us an answer sometime today?"

Both Wrights winced at the accusation, avoiding the judge's gaze. After a moment of shared embarrassment, Luke stared his brother in the face, determination in his eyes. "Like it or not, Gavin knows I'm a witness. You have to call me to the stand."

Apollo shook his head. "Luke, I-!"

"Let me do this," Luke insisted, then gave his brother a smile. "I'll be fine, Apollo."

The judge cleared his throat, looking annoyed. "Well, Mister Wright?"

Apollo stared at his brother a moment more, then sighed, turning to face the judge's podium. "The defence wishes to call Luke Triton to the stand."

The judge thought a second or two, then nodded. "If the prosecution has no objections?"

Klavier grinned, shaking his head. "Nein, no objections."

"Then it's settled," the judge decided, banging his gavel. "Can your witness be here in twenty minutes, Mister Wright?"

Apollo almost wanted to laugh as he glanced at his brother, who was pressing a hand to his mouth to hide a smile. "He's in the building right now, actually," he admitted.

The judge grunted in surprise. "Even so, this trial has gone on all morning without a break," he said. "Twenty minute recess, then we shall question our final witness of the day. With that, he banged his gavel and dismissed the courtroom.

June 16, 12:09PM
District Court
Defendant Lobby No. 2

Despite being the defence's witness, Luke was pulled aside as they left the courtroom by a bailiff, who escorted him away to speak with Klavier. Apollo continued alone to his assigned lobby, where he proceeded to nervously pace. Of the Kitakis, there was no sign, and Apollo could only assume either Wacky refused to leave the side-room he'd been placed in after his testimony, or Big Wins had managed to procure a separate lobby specifically for them. Truthfully, the young attorney was glad to not have to deal with the stubborn teen right now, or his shouting matches with his father; It was nice, after the emotional roller-coaster of the trial so far, to have a little peace and quiet to pull himself together and prepare for the last push to the end of the day's proceedings. Then once that's done, we've got more investigation to do to find this missing witness and..." He sighed, shaking his head.
'Better not let myself dwell on that. Just thinking about it is making me want to curl up in a corner somewhere and cry. Maybe Luke's got a point in testifying now, to get the prosecution looking for this person, too.'

At that moment, there was a knock on the door, interrupting Apollo's pacing as he looked up in surprise to see the lobby's door opening, and a teenage girl in a cyan top hat and matching cape dash in, giving him a bright smile. "Hi, Polly!" she chirped.

"Truce!" Apollo replied, laughing in relief at seeing one of his siblings safe as she bounded at her brother to pull him into a hug. "What are you doing here?" he asked her.

Trucy looked up at him with a cheeky grin. "Well, Luke got called as a witness!" she pointed out. "So I get to go with you into court!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow, stepping back out of their hug. "What?"

"You agreed!" Trucy said, giving him an innocent smile as she bounced on her heels, hands clutched behind her back. "You said, if Luke got called as a witness, I could help you in court!"

At that, Apollo could only stare for a long moment, before sighing and pressing a hand to his face. "Truce, that was if he didn't come back before the trial started!" he groaned.

"Nuh-uh!" Trucy insisted, shaking her head. "You said, if Luke got called as a witness and couldn't help you in court!"

"No, I-!" Apollo began to argue, only to cut himself off with another sigh as he decided not to bother. He was almost certain Trucy was deliberately misremembering the agreement, but, at this point, he lacked the energy to order his siblings not to help him. Besides, he had to admit he wouldn't have gotten very far at all today without a second pair of eyes to spot what he missed, and a calm watch to keep the elder brother's temper in check; Neither Apollo nor Trucy could match up to Luke in smarts, but, hopefully, they might come close as a team. Reluctantly, Apollo gave his sister a nod. "Fine, you can come."

Trucy immediately gave a loud cheer, jumping into the air with triumphant fists held high. "Whoo! I get to go into court!" Bouncing excitedly, she grabbed her brother's hand to shake wildly. "Don't you worry, Polly, I'll be the best assistant you ever had!"

As he watched his sister continue to bound happily around the room, Apollo had to smile; He knew her ability to be helpful would be far outclassed by Luke, Phoenix, or even any one of the Feys, but her enthusiasm was infectious, and, maybe, it was her enthusiasm he would most need when court resumed. 'Besides, Luke's not going to stop helping just because he's on the witness stand. It might be nice for all three of us to work together in the courtroom, even if it's only this once. I almost wish Dad was here to see it!'

---

To Luke's surprise, he found Defendant Lobby One empty when he entered it. He looked around, confused, but it was beyond obvious as he searched that there was no Klavier, and neither was there any of the notes that had littered the nearby row of tables earlier. For a moment, he thought maybe the bailiffs had taken him to the wrong room, but a brief knock on the door later to ask them informed him that the prosecutor would be 'right with him', so Luke was forced to wait.
For the first minute or two, Luke sat patiently on the sofa, twiddling his thumbs as he awaited the arrival of his questioner.

In the third minute, Luke started to worry. What was taking him so long?

By the fifth minute, the worry had turned to pacing. This must be some kind of technique to shake me up so I'm easier to discredit in court. Well, it's not going to work on me, Gavin! I'm too determined to fail!

A full ten minutes after entering the room, Luke found himself back on the sofa, head in his hands. Who am I kidding!? This is like waiting for an execution! He struggled not to dwell on his previous experiences behind the witness stand in a courtroom... either the first time, when he was so full of the anger and sorrow of grief and loss, trying to take it all out on new friends he thought had betrayed him, or the second time, when he was forced to watch in hysterical tears as a beloved mentor admitted to murdering a shared loved one, refusing to look Luke in the eyes as he walked willingly to jail. Luke had told Apollo his past experiences didn't bother him, and he had been telling the truth, but it was different now he was actually staring that prospect in the face, waiting for it to happen like a shot in the arm. It was only his determination to help his brother that had kept his fears locked up so tightly in the back of his mind, and determination was a difficult thing to keep a firm hold of.

It was becoming increasingly hard not to panic.

Finally, the door opened, and in came a surprisingly morose Klavier, who jerked in surprise as he noticed Luke staring at him expectantly from the nearby sofa. "Ah, Herr Triton...! I forgot you would be here," he admitted with a nervous smile.

Luke stood up, forcing a friendly smile; It helped that his abnormally long wait was a genuine mistake and not, in the end, some twisted tactic to psych him out. "That's okay," he said. "Both you and Apollo are already fully aware of what my testimony will be, anyway."

Klavier looked thoughtful, rubbing idly at the underside of his chin with a thumb. "Yes, your testimony... Are you sure that is what you are going with?"

Crossing his arms, Luke raised an eyebrow at the prosecutor. "And why exactly would I be changing it?"

"Because you are an awful liar, Herr Triton," Klavier replied with a cheeky grin.

Luke stared with wide eyes for only a moment before frowning. "That doesn't change the truth of what I say I saw. We even have the evidence to back it up."

Klavier looked intrigued. "Hm." With a grin he wandered off to the nearby tables. "In that case then, we shall sort this matter out when the trial resumes, ja?"

Luke only nodded. 'Just gotta stay focussed on my goal... I'll be fine.'

"You weren't alive at the time of those bombings, were you?"

Luke paused, raising an amused eyebrow at his friend, walking at his side on the dark pavement. "Considering it was exactly twenty years ago today, and I'm nineteen..."

Athena blinked, then blushed in embarrassment, shaking her head. "O-oh, yeah, stupid question. Forget I asked."

Laughing, Luke just smiled. "It's okay," he told her. "I mean, technically, Mum would've been pregnant with me at the time, and she and Dad were living in London then."

Humming in thought, Athena idly nodded, then stopped her walk and wandered over to the low brick wall, overlooking the brown water of the river below. "It's kinda weird how quiet it is today. Comparatively, I mean."

Luke mentally agreed, looking around as he joined his friend. Although the city was still chock full of passing pedestrians from any and every walk of life, the crowds were noticeably thin, even as close to the major landmarks of the London Eye and the general Westminster Bridge area as they were. He suspected, with the major event of the twentieth anniversary of the bombings on the Underground and one of the city's famous double-decker buses, most of the people who would usually be walking the streets were at various memorial services or the like.

It wasn't as though he and Athena had planned to be wandering London's tourist traps on this day of all days; Entering their final week of exams for the academic year, the pair had decided to take a break, and happened to pick the Monday as neither had an exam that day. Luke, keenly aware that this was his final semester before returning to California, had suggested they look around London's landmarks, and Athena readily agreed, saying it had been a long time since she'd gotten to be a tourist in her current home city. He'd taken her to the London Museum first, his favourite haunt of his youth, then they'd decided to head to the Thames to hit all the famous buildings there... and been surprised to learn as they'd set out on their 'day off' just how significant the date had been to the city's recent past.

"Oh hey, Big Ben!" Athena chirped, looking up and pointing past the nearby bridge to the clock-tower beyond, the Palace of Westminster standing proud behind it. "For some reason I always forget it's so close to the London Eye."

Luke laughed. "We should have done this months ago!" he told her with a gentle elbow to the arm. "How do you know so little about the amazing city you live in, Athena?"

Athena rolled her eyes at the friendly dig, hiding a smile despite the green glow of Widget at her neck. Spinning around, she sat on the wall with her back to the water, looking up at her friend with a serious frown. "Actually, that reminds me... When are you heading back home?"
At that, Luke's smile died, and he lowered himself down to sit at her side on the low wall. "I'm... not sure yet," he admitted. "I'm sort of taking it as I go right now." He forced a smile. "For one thing, I have to make sure I passed all my exams first, don't I?"

"Guess so, yeah," Athena agreed with a forced smile of her own, which quickly faded. "It's just, before you go... I was wondering if you'd come with me to... y'know..." She shrugged, looking away nervously. "Check out the Old Bailey? Or the Law Courts? Y-you don't have to, but-"

"Of course I will," Luke assured her, interrupting her nervous question with a reassuring smile. "Although I am a little surprised you haven't gone already. Has no-one else had the time to help?"

Athena smiled sheepishly, running her hands through her ponytail. "O-oh, well... I haven't exactly asked anyone else," she admitted. "They... don't exactly know I'm... having trouble..."

Luke patted his friend's shoulder. Athena had made vague implications to him since they opened up to each other about their parents back in March, that the incident of her mother's murder made it difficult to face a courtroom. With his own bad memories of testifying in court, he could certainly sympathise, though neither had gone into details. "Once exams are over, we can pick a date and make a day of it," he suggested. "I know a good chippie or two around there; We can drop in for as long as you want, then head out and just take it easy for a while. No pressure."

"Thanks," Athena replied, sighing in relief as she gave him a smile. "I know this is silly, with me wanting to be an attorney and all... I guess I just need to suck it up and face my fears."

Luke frowned in concern, then suddenly grinned, holding his fists tight by his chest and loudly crying, "You're fine, Athena! C'mon, say it with me!"

Although a little shocked by Luke's outburst, Athena laughed as she recognised the almost trademark cry of her friend, which she only ever heard in open public spaces such as this (Luke said he didn't want to disturb people by being too loud around the university, their usual haunt). "Say 'you're fine, Athena'?!" she asked.

"If you want," Luke replied with a grin, following it up with another shout of, "I'm Luke Wright and I'm fine!"

Though madly giggling at her friend's boldness shouting in public, Athena managed to reply with a shout of her own: "I'm Athena Cykes and I'm fine!"

"That's it!" Luke encouraged her with a joyful laugh. "Feel better?"

Athena nodded, trying and failing to stifle her giggles.

Luke watched his friend for a moment, then his smile turned sympathetic. "I may not be terrified of court itself as such, but I know I'd be hesitant to go into one without a friend... and I'd certainly resist having to testify in one," he admitted. "I... had a bad experience when I was younger."

"Oh, I'm sorry!" Athena replied, her giggles gone at the thought of a friend in pain. She was vaguely aware of hearing something in Luke's voice when he had once approved of her mission to aid emotionally overwhelmed witnesses in court, and realised this was probably the reason behind it. "M-me too," she assured him with a sigh, her gaze turning to her lap. "I-I've told you before, right? After my mom was killed, and Simon was deliberately taking the blame... They called me as a witness in court, but they didn't listen to a word I said." She shook her head, trying to ignore the tightness inside at the terrible memory. "And, every time I think about going into a courtroom, I just remember how terrifying that was, and I chicken out."
Luke gave her a reassuring smile, resting a hand on her shoulder. "You've been brave enough to tell me about it, and here I am, having not said a word about my own experience!" he softly joked. "Mine's not nearly as bad as yours, of course."

"If they still affect you, they were bad enough," Athena insisted, looking up at her friend with a frown. "That's just stupid to compare your pain to others!"

"Alright, alright!" Luke cried, leaning back with a laugh, hands held up in surrender. "I'll admit you obviously know more about it than me!"

Athena nodded proudly. "You bet!" she cried, crossing her arms, then gave her friend a smile. "Do you wanna talk about it?"

Luke thought a moment, rubbing at the slowly growing patch of hair on his chin. "Normally I just brush over it in the middle of the big Labyrinthia story," he explained, "but that one only gets told with Papa and maybe Maya around to help... Obviously that's not going to be possible for a while."

After a pause, he came to a decision, smiling at Athena. "I guess I could give you an overview, if you don't mind some details being spoiled."

Athena scoffed. "I'm more concerned with my friend's welfare over being spoiled about a fictional adaptation of his life story!" she insisted.

Laughing, Luke decided she had a point. "Alright, then!" He paused again, pondering how best to talk about the particular situation surrounding the Witches' Court of Labyrinthia. "It's... a bit complicated," he settled for saying. "It's how the Professor and I met Papa and Maya, actually: The four of us were trapped together in a place that believed strongly in magic and witches, and had a system for putting witches on trial and, if found guilty, dropping them into a pit of fire right there in the courtroom."

"What!?!" Athena cried in surprise, staring at Luke in disbelief. "But... How old were you!? No wonder you don't like courts if you had to watch people be executed...! That's positively medieval!"

At that, Luke had to laugh. "I was thirteen, actually!" he replied. "And, like I said, the whole thing is kinda complicated to explain!" He cleared his throat to hide his amusement, noticing the lingering look of horror in Athena's eyes. "Honestly though, I didn't actually see anyone get dropped into the fire: They were in a cage, which closed up so you couldn't see them."

"Even so!" Athena said, looking offended on her friend's behalf and horrified at how blasé he was acting about the whole thing. "It might be out of sight, but it's still someone getting dropped to a burning death!"

Luke had opened his mouth to respond, but decided to concede Athena's point; He'd explain the whole 'illusion' thing another time. "It almost happened to Maya, too," he said, sidestepping the complicated explanations for an easy half-truth. "She got put on trial for turning someone to gold."

Athena was mid-scoff before she paused, giving Luke a worried look. "Turning... someone to gold?" she repeated, confused. "Was it someone you knew?"

Nodding, Luke forced a smile, trying to cover for the lingering regret of the situation that he was sure his friend had picked up. "The Professor, actually," he admitted. "We all thought he was dead for a day or two there."

Athena's hands flew to her mouth in shock, eyes wide as she stared at her friend. "Oh no!" she cried. "It gets worse," Luke added, sighing as he looked away. "I was so angry... even though Maya was a friend, I decided the Inquisitor must have been right, that she had killed him with magic, so I agreed to testify... against her, and against Papa. N-not that he was my Papa then, of course."

"That is worse!" Athena cried, her voice muffled through the hands over her mouth and her eyes shining with tears of empathy for Luke. "M-mister Wright knew you didn't mean it though, right?"

Luke smiled, nodding. "Yeah. He talked me around, made me realise accusing Maya on no basis was the exact opposite of what the Professor would want, and I ended up helping him win the case." Finally, he looked up at Athena with an encouraging smile. "As wary as I am of going into another courtroom, I know that entire situation could never happen again; That was Witches Court, worlds away from the courts of England or America."

Athena's hands slowly lowered from her mouth, though she still looked worried for her friend.

"Even if I did ever have to testify in a trial again," Luke continued, "I know I'd have my friends and family at my back, and I know better now than to give in to anger before accusing someone like that. It would be a piece of cake compared to Maya's trial."

His younger friend had to think a moment before she finally smiled and nodded. "Yeah. It could only go uphill from that, right?"

Luke giggled. "Yep!" With that, he pushed himself to his feet. "We should probably get moving now, or there's no way we'll be able to cover all of the Tower of London." He turned to Athena with a grin as she stood up at his side. "Next time we do this, I'll take you to Labyrinthia! Maybe the Professor could help me tell you the story of our adventure there!"

"Sounds fun!" Athena agreed, then grabbed at Luke's sleeve as she headed off towards the nearby Westminster Bridge. "C'mon, slowpoke! We've got tourist crap to do!"

Laughing, Luke hurried after her.

Little did either of them know that Luke's conviction would be tested to breaking point before the year was out.

The gavel banged from up on the judge's podium, calling the room to order. "Court is now back in session!" the judge announced. "Is the witness ready?"

Klavier only nodded, snapping his fingers in the direction of the bailiffs.

Apollo took a deep breath to steady himself, watching as his brother was escorted to the witness stand: Luke was standing tall, hands held in tight fists at his sides and a determined frown on his face, although he avoided meeting his siblings' eyes at the defence bench or in fact anyone's eyes in general, staring dead ahead at the bottom half of the judge's podium opposite the witness stand.

Klavier grinned, playing with his hair. "Could the witness give the court his name and occupation?"

Luke was silent for a moment, glancing at Klavier. "Luke Triton," he said. "I'm a veterinarian."

The judge frowned as he watched Luke. "That's odd... Standing there, you look familiar, but I don't recognise your name. Have you stood in court before?"

At that, Luke smiled, turning his face up to the old man. "Yes, actually," he admitted. "I'm amazed you recognise me, Your Honour! That was seven months ago!"

"Ho ho!" the judge laughed, looking proud of the praise. "Yes, I am known for my fantastic memory!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow, but elected to say nothing.

"That's also why my name might not be familiar," Luke continued. "In that trial, I went by my full title and work name: Doctor 'Northpaw' Wright."

"Ah, of course!" the judge crowed. "The doctor veterinarian from Europe!" He frowned. "That was a murder in an animal shelter, wasn't it? Nasty business."

Luke nodded, though Apollo saw his smile become noticeably forced.

Klavier was looking thoroughly confused, glancing between Luke and the judge. "Ah... I was not aware you had a second name, Herr Triton," he said, frowning in annoyance. "How did you come by it? And why did you not inform me?"

Luke raised an eyebrow at the prosecutor. "You didn't ask about my name," he pointed out. "And, quite frankly, why I have two surnames is irrelevant and none of your business."

Klavier gave Luke an intense stare. "You're a Wright at the Wright's office," he said, apparently only realising the implications of such as the words left his mouth.

"Mm-hmm," Luke replied, smiling. "You're surprised? I thought it was obvious, with Apollo going so strongly into big-brother-mode to protect us from you."
"Objection!" Apollo cried, giving his brother a glare. "I'm not that bad!"

Trucy giggled at Apollo's side. "Yeah you are!"

"Well, maybe if you two weren't constantly trying to get into trouble all the time...!"

Klavier looked between the trio blankly for a few moments, then sighed, rubbing his eyes in a way that suddenly reminded Apollo of Kristoph.

The judge tapped his gavel, giving the Wright kids a raised eyebrow. "Are we planning to question this witness, or simply discuss the defence's family life all afternoon?"

"Sorry, Your Honour," Apollo replied with a sheepish look, pressing on Trucy's shoulder to keep her from shouting out something he'd regret. "We'll stay on topic from here on."

Appeased, the judge nodded, turning to Luke. "So... you witnessed the murder, Doctor Wright?"

Although he looked uncomfortable about saying so, Luke nodded. "I do have information about the murder that Mister Stickler didn't," he explained. "Had I been called to testify earlier, I could have told you then he didn't stay at the scene as he claimed."

"Indeed?" the judge muttered, intrigued. "In that case, why weren't you mentioned earlier as having witnessed the scene?"

Luke shot a glance at Apollo, but was speaking before his brother could interrupt: "After the previous trial I was involved with, the defence was reluctant to use my testimony if it didn't have to."

He smiled. "As I'm sure has been demonstrated, my older brother is very protective of our family."

Apollo turned red, trying to hide his face behind a hand. "Stop saying that like it's a bad thing..."

The judge chuckled. "Oh, that brings me back to my childhood with my own little brother!" He then cleared his throat, putting on a businesslike frown. "Well then, Doctor Wright. Tell us everything you know."

"Of course," Luke replied. He took a moment to collect himself, then slowly began to talk: "That night, I was in People Park... up a tree. Naturally, no-one could see me up there."

He closed his eyes. "I saw Doctor Meraktis pulling his noodle stand, and someone else, the defendant I suppose, stop him with something shiny in his hand. After a few moments, Mister Stickler interrupted them; The gunshot followed after."

He opened his eyes again. "Doctor Meraktis collapsed, and the other two ran, the defendant dropping the object in his hand. Once they had gone..." He paused. "That's when the fourth person climbed out of the noodle stand and made a run for it."

The gallery gasped, muttering amongst themselves loudly. The judge, though similarly flabbergasted, pulled himself together quickly enough to bang his gavel. "Order! Order!"

Once the crowd had calmed, he turned to Luke with wide eyes. "Are you telling me that not only were you also on the scene on the night of the crime, but another person was, too!?"

Luke nodded. "As I said, I was in a tree, so no-one else saw me," he explained again. "The person in the noodle stand seemed to be waiting for everyone else to leave themselves."

Smirking to himself, Klavier brought up the diagram of the crime scene on the holograms. "So, with the testimony of Herr Doktor here," he said, "we have two more people to place on the scene."

With a tap of his finger, a label of 'W2' appeared on top of the noodle stand. "Here, our mysterious figure hidden away," then a second label, 'W3', in the nearby grey blob denoting the tree, "and here, Doktor Wright himself." He looked up at Luke with a grin. "I would say this is correct, is it not?"

The judge thought a moment, tugging his beard. "In that case, the defence may begin their cross-examination." He waved a hand in Apollo's direction, almost dismissively.

"Good luck, Luke!" Trucy called to the witness stand with a grin.

Klavier smirked at the bench opposite him. "I'm looking forward to this," he said. "Don't forget, Herr Forehead... Your job here is to 'determine the truth', regardless of who your witness is."

Apollo was on the verge of barking a reply when a retort came instead from Luke, who crossed his arms as he gave the prosecutor a disapproving frown: "The defence is well aware of its purpose, Mister Keyboard. You don't need to remind him."

Raising an eyebrow, Apollo gave his brother a look. "The defence can speak for itself, witness."

Luke sheepishly looked away, and Trucy stifled giggles at Apollo's side.

Sighing, Apollo decided to get on with it. Looking back over the transcript, it looked like Luke had been careful to, unlike his previous retellings of the story, be remarkably vague and not give every detail unprompted as he usually strived to do (or would nervously blurt out with when he was trying too hard to lie). He supposed his brother was attempting to leave leads for Apollo to ask about... Hopefully, doing so would distract from the real problem behind the testimony. "So, you couldn't see anything about this person in the noodle stand?"

Luke shook his head. "It was the middle of night. Although there are streetlights along the river, there aren't any near that corner, and the person I saw was hidden in the shadow of the stand."

Apollo simply nodded as though this were the first he had heard of the information, ignoring the faint smirk on Klavier's face opposite him. "And the object in the defendant's hand?"

"All I saw was it glinting in the light," Luke admitted, deciding to stick to the minimal testimony he had been given, "but, considering the evidence, I'm of the opinion it could only be the knife that was found at the scene."

The judge nodded. "This all makes sense so far," he agreed, then frowned in confusion. "But the defence believes neither the defendant nor Mister Stickler fired the gun, correct?"

Apollo and Luke shared a confused glance, wondering how the question was relevant to Luke's testimony. "Yes, Your Honour," Apollo replied.

Klavier chuckled, playing with his fringe again. "Ah, Herr Judge has spotted it too," he said. "Yes, Herr Doktor's testimony presents us, or at least the defence, with a very intriguing problem..."

Trucy was tapping her chin, pondering Klavier's words. "What problem?" she asked. "The person Luke saw in the noodle stand must have fired it, right?"

At that, Klavier only laughed. "Ah, Fraulein, your deductions are as childlike as your face!"

Immediately, Apollo slammed his bench, glaring at the prosecutor. "You take that back!" he demanded.

"Herr Forehead, I was merely offering your sister a compliment," Klavier replied with an amused smile.
"Oh! Thank you!" Trucy replied with a big grin, though Apollo at her side was still doubtful, not letting up his glare.

Klavier chuckled again. "No, Fraulein... If Herr Stickler did not fire the gun, and the defendant did not fire the gun, it had to be someone standing on his right as he turned his head, ja?"

Apollo's eyes suddenly widened as he realised what Klavier was angling at. "No..."

"Therefore," Klavier continued, snapping his fingers with a grin, "according to your own logic, Herr Doktor here becomes the most prominent suspect of the murder."

The gallery buzzed as Klavier's accusation hung in the air. Was this actually happening? Was the defence accusing someone on their own team of the murder? At the witness stand, Luke was frozen, hands clasped together as he stared at Klavier, his eyes wide in a blatant fear that the young man so rarely allowed anyone else to see. Behind the defence bench, Trucy was similarly shocked to a standstill, hands held to her mouth as she slowly looked more and more guilty for 'leading' the prosecution to its terrifying conclusion, the prospect of the legal system taking a member of her family away from her again hanging menacingly over their heads.

Apollo refused to stand for it. Whacking his fists on the bench in front of him, he threw out a hand to point directly at Klavier opposite with a furious glare. "Objection!" he cried, with the full force of his Chords of Steel bringing the room to a sudden quiet. "Luke would never be a murderer! Not in a million years!"

"What would your reasoning be?" Klavier continued, looking remarkably smug. "Maybe, for example... Herr Doktor here was not at the scene that night at all?"

Luke winced, looking away guiltily as his hands fiddled nervously with his collar. The gallery above them once again began to murmur.

Behind the defence bench, Apollo and Trucy kept their expressions carefully still, their resolve to protect the lie in Luke's testimony keeping them focussed despite the shock. Trucy slightly leaned towards her brother at her side, whispering, "I think he's on to us."

The judge banged his gavel to quieten the gallery, then directed a stern frown at the defence. "This is a very serious accusation against your witness, Mister Wright," he pointed out. "If it turns out to be true, you will have wasted quite a lot of this court's time... among other infractions." His frown deepened. "I shouldn't have to impress on you how much trouble you would be in."

Apollo quickly nodded; Calling a false witness was as bad as falsifying evidence, and he was intimately familiar with the kind of penalties he'd face should either be proven. "I understand, Your Honour," he assured the judge, determination in his gaze. "I can promise you the accusation is false."

Klavier chuckled again. "Oooh, very tough, very cool," he said with a wink, snapping his fingers. "I'm afraid the court requires more than just a promise, ja?"

"We can prove it!" Apollo insisted. "There's incontrovertible proof someone was hiding in the noodle stand, as Luke saw! And Luke has even less of a connection to the victim than Stickler did; What exactly does the prosecution propose his motive was!?"
As Klavier brushed off the retort with a chuckle, the judge pulled at his beard thoughtfully. "Evidence, you say?" the old man repeated. "I would very much like to see this 'evidence'."

Apollo nodded firmly, already scrolling through the photos in his Court Record. "The proof that someone was hiding in that noodle stand... was this!" With that, he swiped at the screen and brought up on the holograms the final photo of the crime scene he'd taken the previous day.

The gallery gasped, even Klavier seeming a little surprised. "And what is that?" the prosecutor asked.

"A footprint," Apollo replied with a smug smile, "or, more accurately, a shoeprint. This final witness left it in the mud right under the noodle stand's window as they left!"

"Ho ho!" the judge said with an impressed look. "That is indeed incontrovertible!"

Klavier looked extremely unhappy (cheering Apollo up immensely) for all of five seconds before he scowled and slammed a fist against the wall behind him. "Fine. This extra person in the noodle stand does indeed appear to exist," he agreed. "Where are they, then?"

"An excellent question," Luke cut in, a finger pointed into the air with no small amount of pride. "Unfortunately, as I could not see any details in the dark, all we have to go on is a connection with Doctor Meraktis and that shoeprint." He then smiled at Klavier, lowering his finger. "Surely, if anyone is going to locate them now, it would be the police and their superior analysing equipment, correct?"

"A connection with the victim?" the judge asked, confused. "What kind of connection?"

Luke shook his head. "Unfortunately, I cannot say for sure," he admitted. "I only have theories. Nevertheless, it seems likely this other person assisted the victim in stealing the noodle stand they were hiding in... As to why, I cannot claim to know that either."

The judge nodded. "In that case, it looks like this case cannot be decided until this final witness is found and questioned. Their testimony would appear to be vital."

Klavier was unimpressed. "I will have a search started immediately," he agreed. "However, the prosecution does not believe this extra witness's testimony will change the fact that our defendant was the one to fire the gun at the victim." He snapped his fingers, then brought up on the holograms the diagram of the crime scene. "The defendant had the motive and the murder weapon, and his presence at the crime scene was proven by the defence themselves."

"And yet he is physically incapable of having fired the shot!" Apollo shot back. "The gunshot wound was on the opposite side of the victim's head, and the defendant was holding a knife! Who'd bring a knife to a gunfight!?"

"Then who did fire that pistol, Herr Forehead?" Klavier asked, throwing out an arm to point across the room at the young attorney. "If your witness was at the scene, what's to say it wasn't him?"

Apollo froze. What could he say that wouldn't unintentionally direct the bulk of the suspicion back on Wocky and sabotage their case? 'I think I'm regretting not asking Dad or Mia to assist me now...'

Trucy was glaring across the room at Klavier, her fists on her hips. "Well, I can think of something!" she announced. "Why would Luke ever want to shoot this guy!? And how could he have that gun, anyway!? It belonged to the Kitakis!"

Luke sighed as he pressed a hand to his face.
"Truce!" Apollo hissed at his sister in wide-eyed panic.

Trucy looked up at him in innocent confusion. "What?"

Klavier's chuckling from the other side of the room attracted the Wrights' attention, and the prosecutor grinned at Trucy with a wink. "All excellent points, Fraulein," he said. "In fact... does not the defendant have the motive you are looking for? And this access to the pistol, is that not also something the defendant possesses?"

Trucy went pale, looking up to her brother only to see Apollo's disapproving glare, which sent her shrinking away in shame.

"And what about the missing witness?" Luke asked Klavier with a stern look. "They may also have a motive, and some kind of access to the murder weapon. How can you say they don't unless you find them and ask?"

"That is assuming they do," Klavier pointed out. "A connection to both the victim and the defendant? A very narrow criteria for this last witness to be a suspect, ja?"

Luke just smiled. "Every argument in a courtroom starts with an assumption, Mister Gavin," he replied. "You must always assume the defendant is guilty and the defence must always assume the defendant is not guilty, until all other possible scenarios have been ruled out. That's how a trial works, isn't it?"

Apollo raised an eyebrow at his brother. 'When did Luke become so intellectual on how trials work, anyway?'

After a moment of thought, Klavier smiled back at the young vet. "An excellent point, Herr Doktor." He snapped his fingers. "And what about my scenario that you were not on the scene, ja? Can you rule that out?"

"I believe they already did, Prosecutor Gavin," the judge replied, giving Klavier a stern frown. "This final witness Doctor Wright saw left a shoeprint in the mud."

Klavier grimaced, clearly unconvinced. "And... what proof is there that it was you in that tree, Herr Doktor?" he continued, his attention back to Luke. "I am finding myself unconvinced after you failed to describe anything about the other people you saw that night!"

"Objection!" Apollo shouted, throwing out an arm to point at Klavier. "You demand proof Luke was there!? What proof is there that Mister Stickler was truly there!? You cannot insist a witness is lying without some kind of concrete proof of your own, Gavin!"

As Klavier winced at the accusation, the gallery around them burst into activity, forcing the judge to start banging his gavel to calm them down.

"Ooh, that was cool!" Trucy whispered to her brother, impressed.

Apollo raised an eyebrow at her. "This would have been a lot easier if you hadn't helped him earlier."

Trucy shrunk away at that, ashamed. "I-I'm sorry, Polly..."

"That is true," Klavier admitted, annoyed, "but which of us was making such a big deal about 'determining the full truth' earlier? I may not be able to prove anything, but I can see you are hiding something!"

Apollo had opened his mouth to snap a reply at the prosecutor opposite, but was interrupted by the quiet sigh of his brother from the witness stand, who everyone promptly turned their attention to. The young man in blue had crossed his arms, a tired look on his face as he looked up at Klavier. "And what exactly is it you want to hear me say, Mister Gavin?" he asked.

Klavier stared at Luke with a blank look. "Er...?"

"You want me to say you're right, that I wasn't in the park that night?" Luke continued. "Where, then, has my testimony come from? Long before it came out in court, I was already telling your investigation that Mister Stickler did not stay at that crime scene, even if I couldn't say where he'd been standing. It was me who found that shoeprint that proves someone else was hiding in the noodle stand at the time. I don't see how you could argue someone didn't see these things from the tree that night."

"I-I was only asking-!" Klavier stuttered, looking away.

"Are you wanting me to say I'm simply repeating someone else's testimony?" Luke interrupted, unwilling to stop before he'd made his point. "Why would I be doing that? Is this 'someone else' perhaps incapable of testifying in court? Maybe they speak a language no-one else except me does. Is that why they couldn't come forward themselves?"

Apollo's eyes widened. Was Luke... admitting where his testimony originated?

"Maybe it was more than just a language barrier," Luke suggested, the poor prosecutor he was lecturing looking slowly more confused as the young vet's tired voice kept coming. "Maybe this witness would be laughed out of the building if they even tried. Is that it, maybe? Why else would I be telling another's testimony as my own, unless the truth of who this other person was was simply too unbelievable for the court to accept the truth... like, maybe... this other 'person' wasn't human. Might that be what you're accusing me of doing?" He then paused and smiled at Klavier. Once the prosecutor had met his eyes with a confused look, finally Luke asked, "Are you saying I can talk to animals, Mister Gavin?"

The gallery murmured to itself in a vague state of confusion somewhat equal to the puzzlement settling on Klavier's face. It seemed no-one watching was sure whether or not to laugh at Luke's 'outlandish' suggestion, including the judge.

"Oooh, clever!" Trucy whispered to Apollo. "Telling the truth as a hypothetical scenario! I didn't think of that!"

"And, by the way," Luke added to Klavier, a finger pointed into the air, "the person making 'a big deal' about determining the full truth? That was me." He gave the prosecutor a warm grin. "I'm glad to hear you're taking that to heart, Mister Gavin."

Klavier's eyebrows pressed together, but overall he still seemed puzzled. Apollo wondered what was going through his mind.
The judge cleared his throat. "So, ahem... Does the prosecution still have any objections to this witness's testimony?"

There was a pause before Klavier finally broke his intense staring at Luke, shaking his head and fiddling with his hair with a slight frown on his face. "Nein, Herr Judge. No objections."

"And the defence has finished their cross-examination?" the judge added, turning to Apollo.

Apollo nodded. "Yes, Your Honour," he replied.

The judge seemed a little relieved. "In that case, it seems high time we ended this trial for today." He banged his gavel. "Despite all the progress made here, several mysteries remain: First, this extra missing witness who was on the crime scene that night. Second, the location of the wound in the victim's right temple." He gave both Klavier and Apollo a stern look. "The court requests further investigation from both the defence and prosecution."

Klavier almost scoffed, avoiding the old man's gaze as he played with his fringe. "Ja, baby."

Apollo just nodded. "No problem!" he cried.

"Very well." With that, the judge banged his gavel again. "This brings the trial for the day to a close. Court adjourned!"

Apollo couldn't resist a sigh of relief as he pulled his siblings into a hug the moment they left the courtroom. "In the name of all that is good in this world, don't you two ever do that to me again!" he cried.

Trucy laughed as she patted her eldest brother's back. "Aw, don't cry, Polly! Everything's turning out great so far!"

"I'm not crying!" Apollo objected, although he rubbed at his eyes with a hand just in case.

Luke gave him a sympathetic smile. "Trucy's right though," he said. "Look at all the progress we made! We uncovered the panty thief, and the evidence is really beginning to stack up that Wocky couldn't have fired that shot! You'll have this case in the bag tomorrow for sure!"

Apollo rolled his eyes. "That's if we can find this last witness!" he pointed out. "Even if Detective Skye has their shoeprint analysed, that's not going to be enough information to lead us to them! And this gap is giving Gavin plenty of time to think up some excuse to explain away the discrepancy of the wound! And!" He jabbed Luke in the chest with a finger. "What if he goes and talks to Fox or something and proves you weren't actually in the park!? We're practically inviting him to disbar me at this point!"

Luke glanced around them nervously, gripping his satchel strap. "C-could you not say that quite so loud...?"

Trucy crossed her arms, sticking out her bottom lip at her eldest brother. "Don't tell me you're giving "Of course I'm not giving up!" Apollo replied with a frustrated sigh. "I'm being realistic! We've got a lot of work to do if we want any chance of still pulling this off!"

Luke smiled. "In that case, what are we doing standing around moping about it?" he asked. "Let's get back to investigating and prove the prosecution wrong!"

Apollo rolled his eyes and was about to respond when he was interrupted by a loud "WHOOP!" and a tall figure with an explosion of black hair launched himself at the young lawyer, knocking Apollo back several steps as he struggled to fend off the tight grip of the arm around his neck. "That was great, 'Pollo!" Clay shouted with an enthusiastic grin, rubbing a fist into the top of his magician friend's hair. "What a first day in court, huh?"

Finally, Apollo threw his room-mate off his neck with a wordless groan. "Can't you say 'hello' like a normal person, Clay!?" he demanded.

Clay just laughed. "What, and not have a bit of fun with my best friends?" He then moved over to the giggling Luke and Trucy, who he high-fived with a grin. "You two were great too, by the way!"

Apollo rolled his eyes and crossed his arms.

"That was very well-handled, actually," came a voice from nearby, and Apollo looked up in surprise to see his two online friends, Penny and Aria, joining the group with a wave and a smile. Penny, who had spoken, had her hands on her hips as she gave Apollo a proud grin. "Especially considering that was Klavier Gavin you were facing in there. I'm not surprised you were so worried about this yesterday night!"

Apollo blushed, rubbing at the back of his head. "Y-yeah, I... didn't want to worry you guys bringing that up..."

Luke smiled at the pair. "Hello again, Miss Holliday! And it's Miss Penny, right?"

"Just 'Penny' is fine," Penny replied.

Aria gave Luke an excited wave, then looked to Apollo. "Hey, even though you got all angry and upset at that guy who stole Trucy's Magic Panties, I thought you stayed pretty calm, Apollo!" she assured him.

"That guy didn't know what hit him!" Trucy added with a mischievous grin. "You never take something from one of us and get away with it, you know!" She then added a delighted cackle, waggling her fingers in the air.

Clay laughed, elbowing Luke with a grin. "Yeah, and you were giving that Gavin guy a hard time, weren't ya Luke?"

Luke blushed, nodding. "W-well, I did get a bit carried away, yeah..."

"He deserves anything he gets," Apollo growled. "Mocking us, mocking Dad, continually leading us into traps..."

Penny nodded in agreement. "Bringing up your dad was a bit of a dick move, true."

Trucy sighed, staring at the floor sadly. "And he was so nice yesterday..."
Luke also shuffled uncomfortably. "Actually, I think Papa and Uncle Edgeworth had a point when they said his heart's in the right place. 'He's difficult, but he follows the rules', I think Papa put it?"

"Yeah, follows the rules to screw us over," Apollo shot back. "He nearly got you accused of murder in there, Luke! Again!"

"He's doing what he thinks is the right thing to do," Luke replied, staying calm in the face of his brother's temper. "He truly believes Wacky is the culprit, and he insisted on calling me to the stand because he knew I was lying, and he wanted to know the truth."

Aria blinked in surprise. "Wait, you were lying?" she asked.

Luke almost jumped, having forgotten Apollo's friends were there, and blushed in embarrassment as he looked away. "U-uh... It's a long story."

Clay grinned, waving a hand dismissively. "Luke can talk to animals. No biggie." As the three Wrights stared at him in disbelief, moments from madly telling him off and making excuses for his claim to the very confused Penny and Aria, Clay rested an arm each around Apollo's and Luke's shoulders, looking between them. "So, you guys have a plan of action for taking this guy down tomorrow, right Wrights?"

Apollo sighed, deciding to let the comment go. "I guess. We have to go talk to the detective anyway, and we should probably give the crime scene another look."

"We should go home first, though!" Trucy insisted. "We have to tell Pearly how it went!"

"And Papa will want to know, too," Luke added. "He might have some ideas for us."

Penny gave Apollo a smile. "Good luck, then," she said. "I won't be able to make it to tomorrow's trial, unfortunately."

"I'll just cheer for the both of us!" Aria giggled, then turned to the Wrights. "I'm planning to visit Pearly myself later, but if I don't see you then, I'll see you right back here tomorrow! I know you'll do great, Apollo!"

Apollo gave her a half-smile, shoving Clay's arm off his shoulders. "Thanks," he told his online friends, "to both of you, for coming today at all."

"No problem," Penny insisted.

Clay grinned, and gave the two an exaggerated bow. "Then, until we see you lovely ladies again!"

Apollo rolled his eyes, whacking his friend with the back of the closest hand. "Stop it, Clay."

[View the Court Record]
"Sounds like quite a trial," Phoenix's crackling voice laughed from the phone sitting in the middle of the table. "I'm sorry I missed it!"

Apollo sighed. "It was a complete train wreck," he replied, slumping forward in his seat. "I'm not even sure we made it out alive..."

While Luke, Trucy and the speaker phone'd Phoenix laughed, Pearl gave Apollo a sympathetic smile. "Would you have felt better if I came to court with you?"

"Not unless you were planning to channel Mia or something," Apollo admitted, looking away in guilt.

Pearl blinked in surprise. "Oh... Did you want me to ask her?"

Apollo shook his head, still firmly looking away. "Nah, it's fine. I managed on my own. That's probably what she would have wanted, anyway."

After leaving the courthouse, and their friends, the Wright siblings had headed back to the office for lunch, putting Phoenix on speaker-phone to tell him and Pearl about the trial so far. Apollo had started the story, although Luke and Trucy frequently interrupted to talk over him, and it became almost a battle for the three of them to get everything out. It was pure luck that, despite the Wright children constantly verbally tripping over each other, the details managed to clearly cross over to Pearl and Phoenix, even with their limited interruptions.

"The important thing is, we had fun today!" Trucy insisted. "And Wocky made it through the day, too!"

'No thanks to you,' Apollo resisted saying out loud, settling for shooting a glare at his sister instead.

"And we made a lot of progress on the case!" Luke added with a smile. "We really surprised Mister Gavin with that extra person, and, with the police looking for them now, I'm sure they'll be in court tomorrow for us to question!"

"That's if we can get them to talk," Apollo pointed out. "What if they're genuinely no help? What are we supposed to do then?"

"Pray," came Phoenix's voice from the phone.

The four sat around the table looked at each other for half a second before bursting into assorted laughter, even Apollo managing to loosen up enough to enjoy the joke.

"On a more serious note, though," Phoenix continued, a smile in his voice, "you can't always predict what's going to happen with a case; All you can do is take it as it comes and aim for the best possible outcome, whether it results in a 'not guilty' verdict or not." He paused, chuckling to himself.

"Although, considering what you accomplished today, I think you're more than capable of clearing young Wocky's name here."

Although Apollo was still doubtful, Luke gave him a wide grin. "See?" the younger brother said. "Even Papa thinks you can do this, Apollo!"

Apollo just grunted, dismissively waving a hand as he looked away.

"We got good publicity for our act today, too!" Trucy cut in. "All that talk about my Magic Panties should attract a good crowd tonight!"

"Are you serious!?!" Apollo snapped, locking a stern gaze on his sister. "The way that no-good thief was going on about the 'mystery of your panties', and you're thinking about flaunting that as advertising?!"

Trucy shrugged, smiling. "Why not?" she asked. "It's our best-loved act, after all!"

Not in the mood for playful bickering, Apollo just looked away with a sigh.

"Wow, you really are feeling down," Trucy noted with surprise.

"I know how hopeless it can seem sometimes," Phoenix picked up. "Honestly, Apollo, if you feel you need a break, feel free to stop and recharge for a while. You've got all afternoon for work, and all of you have been running around almost non-stop since yesterday morning."

Luke nodded. "That's a good point. The rest of us can pick up the investigation if you need us to."

Slowly, Apollo looked up at his family with a smile, even sparing a glance for the phone even though he knew Phoenix couldn't see him. "Thanks for the pep talk," he said. "I probably do need a break; I've got a lot of paperwork still to do, and I'm going to collapse tonight mid-show if I keep going on like this." With a smirk, he pointed at Luke. "And don't you guys dare run off and investigate without me."

Luke laughed. "We wouldn't dream of it!" he promised.

Trucy nodded, giving her eldest brother a determined look. "Yeah, we need you happy and energised for the show! There's bound to be a big crowd tonight, after all!"

"Sure, sure," Apollo muttered with a smile.

It was decided to take an hour off for the Wright kids to rest up and prepare for the second half of their investigation. Apollo decided to spend it in reception at his desk, working on some of his paperwork for the case, though he wasn't sure exactly what his siblings, or Pearl, were up to elsewhere in the apartment; Occasionally, he would hear the creaking of the floor above, or a closing door, but as long as the three were keeping to themselves and not bothering him, he wasn't planning to bother them in return.

About half-an-hour after their quick lunch and chat with Phoenix, Apollo had tuned out the world around him, absorbed in one of his and Trucy's magic books during a break from his paperwork. Thus, it was incredibly startling when the front door suddenly creaked open, surprising Apollo enough that he jumped in his chair, tossing the book into the air as he slipped to the carpet below.
"Oh! I'm sorry!" came a voice from above, and Apollo saw as he clawed his way back to his feet that it was Alita Tiala, watching him worryingly as she carefully closed the door behind her. "Are you alright?" she asked.

"I'm fine!" Apollo insisted, quickly brushing off and straightening his costume from the brief tumble as he gave their visitor a wide grin. "Was there something you wanted, Ms Tiala?"

Alita seemed relieved at the young lawyer's reply, though continued to fiddle nervously with the bow on her wrist. "I just wanted to thank you for today," she said. "The trial went... well."

Apollo almost winced at the hesitation in her statement; it was clear for all to see that the morning's session in court was a disaster. He kept the grin plastered on his face regardless. "O-oh, right! It was no problem!"

"Do you think Wockey will be okay?" Alita continued, looking away with a worried frown.

'Well, he's not guilty... Apollo kept himself from replying, biting his lip.

Unfortunately, Apollo's silence betrayed his thoughts, and Alita met his eyes with a tearful, yet determined, gaze. "Please, you have to help him!" she begged, her hands pressed to her chest. "We're supposed to get married next month..."

Apollo blinked in surprise. "Oh, congratulations!" he said, though he was inwardly wilting at the thought of even more pressure to secure his 'not guilty' verdict.

Alita smiled, giving him a grateful nod. "Please let me know if there's anything I can do to help!"

At that, Apollo paused; Considering they had yet to properly question Wockey, and he seemed so determined to be found guilty anyway, maybe they could get some of their 'background context' (a very important thing to have for every client, he was taught, and that he'd never needed before now) from the teen's fiancée instead. "Actually, I did have a few questions," Apollo admitted, and he gestured to the office further in. "If you don't mind, maybe we could sit down and chat for a bit?"

"I don't mind," Alita insisted, though Apollo noticed her grip on the bow at her wrist suddenly tighten. Nevertheless, she walked ahead into the office, making her way back to the red sofas with Apollo at her heels. "What did you want to know?" she asked as she made herself comfortable.

The young lawyer was deep in thought as he sat opposite Alita, his back to his father's desk on the other side of the room. "Well, for one thing... are you sure about marrying into the Kitaki Family?"

Alita just smiled. "I'm fine with it," she said. "And I love Wockey with all my heart."

Apollo felt his bracelet twinge. 'Uh oh. What's she lying about?" So, uh... it doesn't bother you that you'll be, erm... married to the mob?"

To his surprise, Alita minutely frowned, looking away. "I don't think so," she said. "My parents are against it, of course."

'Can't blame them,' Apollo thought. 'She must have to lie all the time to hide her true fears about it. I guess I should ask a happier question to cheer her up.' "Actually, how did you and Wockey meet? You don't look the type to have gangster connections."

"Oh..." Alita paused, slightly nervous as she stubbornly kept her gaze on the nearby wall. "We met at my old job, actually."
Apollo was opening his mouth to answer when a bright young voice chirped from behind him: "Aw, office romance! How sweet!" He spun around in surprise to the door through to the kitchen behind him, and noticed it had been opened at some point during the conversation, his younger sister now using it as a barrier from which to discreetly watch the unfolding conversation. "Oh, you can keep going!" she insisted to her brother, waving at him to continue. "Don't mind me!"

Apollo shot her a glare, then looked back to the slightly confused Alita with an apologetic smile. "Ah, I'm sorry about this, Ms Tiala..."

"It's okay," Alita replied, staring at her lap with a faintly relieved expression.

'I guess that was all she wanted to say anyway,' Apollo realised with a frown, then stood up and turned his attention back to his sister with a glare. "Trucy, I'm very busy right now!"

"Yeah, I can tell!" Trucy chirped, bouncing into the room; Apollo couldn't tell if her comment was sarcastic or genuine. "What are you asking her about? Can I help?"

Apollo crossed his arms. "Truce, I don't-"

"Hi there!" Trucy cried to Alita, ignoring her brother as she ran around to shake the woman's hand. "My name's Trucy! You must be Ms Tiala!"

Alita seemed a bit baffled by the teen's attentions, but nodded anyway. "Y-yes, that's me..."

"It's nice to meet you!" Trucy continued, then sat down next to Apollo, grabbing his arm to pull him back down next to her, her bright grin never turning away from their 'client' sat opposite. "You were telling us about Wocky, weren't you? Your fiancé?"

Apollo rolled his eyes and decided to just let Trucy sit in; It would be too much of a hassle to chase her off now she'd dug her claws into the conversation. "Actually, I was about to ask her about the Kitaki Family in general, but okay..."

Alita slowly smiled, then giggled, her hands steepled at her mouth. "Did you know that the boss is trying to get out of the 'business'?"

Apollo and Trucy both blinked in surprise. "R-really?" Apollo asked.

"He's trying to transfer his assets into a normal company," Alita explained. "He only announced it recently, out of the blue. I hear there's quite a lot of confusion in the ranks."

Trucy was tapping her chin in thought; Apollo was remembering the oddly cheerful apron Big Wins Kitaki had been wearing both times they briefly met him, and wondered if this was the reason behind it. "I can't imagine Wocky going along with that," he said.

Alita giggled. "He's highly motivated, isn't he?"

Trucy stifled giggles of her own, nodding in agreement.

"Um, that's not the word I would have used," Apollo admitted, rubbing at the back of his head.

Alita didn't seem to have heard him: "He said, 'I'll be the next Big Boss, and keep the Family alive!'" she proudly told them. "I think he's at that age when boys want to make a mark on the world."

Apollo raised an eyebrow. 'Not the way I would have put it...' "His father moves in a lot of circles," Alita continued. "He's really focussed on profits. The Kitaki..."
Family's been making a killing recently!"

'Again, not the way I would have put it...'

Alita paused, looking away as her smile turned distant. "But Wocky says it's not about the money; They have the gangster tradition to uphold."

"Oooh, a generation gap!" Trucy cooed in excitement, elbowing her brother as she shot him a grin. "They've even got the ever classic 'what about the family business' thing going!"

Apollo gave her an unamused look, deciding not to bait his sister by pointing out it was usually the father and not the son upholding the traditions of a family business. Instead, he turned to Alita. "Can I ask you a question about Wocky? I understand he was operated on by the victim, Doctor Meraktis."

"Apparently, yes," Alita sighed, nodding with a sad frown. "It sounded horrible. Wocky has always been fond of fighting, I'm afraid."

Apollo decided not to ask if 'fighting' was the appropriate term when guns got involved.

"Mister Gavin was saying his life might be in danger, wasn't he?" Trucy asked, her excited grin for once replaced by a sympathetic frown for the young woman opposite.

Alita shook her head. "N-no, that can't be right!" she insisted, only shooting the siblings a glance before returning her firm gaze to the wall. "I'm sure he was just trying to scare us."

Again, Apollo felt his bracelet twinge, and couldn't help but feel sorry for the woman. 'Considering she only just learned her fiancé may die any day now, I can understand if she's still in denial.'

"It's scary to think that a surgeon might make a mistake," Trucy admitted, a hand fiddling with the pin on her cape, "but it's even scarier when he tries to hide it!"

Apollo gave his sister a smile, patting her shoulder. "We'd never let that happen to you, Truce," he assured her. 'It's high time we got more information about this clinic, I think.'

Alita then stood up, her hand fiddling with the bow on her left wrist. "I should be getting home now," she told the pair. "Wocky's in your hands, Mister Wright."

Nodding, Apollo stood up and gave Alita a final handshake. "Don't you worry, Ms Tiala! Just leave it to me!"

"Polly will get it all sorted out in no time!" Trucy added with a grin, bouncing to her feet at his side.

"Thank you," Alita replied, despite her remaining nervous demeanour. With that, she turned and left the office.

As the door closed behind her, Apollo pressed a finger to his forehead, deep in thought. "If it's okay with you Truce, I'd like to cut our 'break' short and get going. Could you chase up Luke and Pearly?"

Trucy failed to bite back a grin. "Why?" she asked. "What's the plan?"

Apollo raised an eyebrow at her, wondering what his sister's game was, but decided to answer the question regardless. "We need to look into the Meraktis Clinic," he told her. "Since it's tied in to our case, the officer watching it should at least talk to us." He closed his eyes. "And we should catch up with Detective Skye too; She should have finished looking into that shoeprint, and she's obviously happy to work with us thanks to Dad. After that, as much as he seems happy to go to jail, we really need to talk to Wocky; Maybe out of court he'll be more honest about telling us what really happened that night."

"A very good idea," a feminine voice, clearly neither Trucy's nor Pearl's, replied, surprising Apollo and causing him to spin around to face the back of the room. To his shock, standing by the kitchen door and in front of Phoenix's desk, was an amused Luke and a woman in Pearl's pink robes, the young medium's distinctive hair loops on the back of her head. "You seem to have this case very much in hand from what I've seen."

"Mia!" Apollo cried, jumping around the sofa before remembering to restrain his excitement over a rare meeting with his 'aunt' and forcing himself to stop in embarrassment. "W-what are you doing here?"

Mia smiled, glancing between Apollo's grinning siblings. "Luke and Trucy wanted to ask me on your behalf for my assistance," she explained. "They've been explaining the case to me."

"We were just coming down to talk to you," Luke picked up, "but we heard you talking to Ms Tiala, so we decided to wait until you were done!"

"I didn't!" Trucy pointed out with a proud grin, puffing out her chest.

Apollo rolled his eyes, knocking Trucy's hat off her head to ruffle her hair. "That's 'cause you're a pest," he joked. As Trucy giggled, bending down to retrieve her hat, Apollo turned his attention back to Mia. "I, uh, thought you'd want me to do this on my own," he admitted. "I mean, everyone else seems to think I can finish this case without help, but..."

Mia frowned in concern. "Your career is, unfortunately, turning out very similar to Phoenix's... and to mine. The major difference being that you lost your mentor during your first case rather than after."

Apollo shrugged. "We were expecting that to happen eventually anyway," he insisted. "And Dad's a better mentor than Mister Gavin was... He just can't help much right now, what with being in the hospital from the car accident."
"Yes, your siblings were telling me," Mia replied, still looking concerned. "My point is, I still had someone to teach me until I felt confident enough to strike out on my own... and I was still able to mentor Phoenix when he needed help in something I'd lost the time to teach him." Her concerned frown turned into a smile. "Despite not having a 'mentor' to help you, you do seem to be progressing well on this case of yours. That's very commendable."

Apollo tried to brush off the compliment, but couldn't stop a wide grin spreading across his reddening face, a hand rubbing at the back of his head. He barely even noticed Luke and Trucy giggling in response, too focussed on the thought of being praised for his attorney skills by the Mia Fey.

"If you still feel you need help," Mia continued, "I'm happy to talk things over with you. On the subject of trials however, I don't think you'll need my help, even when Phoenix isn't tied up elsewhere."

"Y-yeah, I figured," Apollo admitted, rubbing at an arm as he stared at the floor, trying to tone down his blushing cheeks and delighted grin. "Th-that's why I didn't mention anything yesterday..."

Mia nodded in understanding. "There's no shame in asking for help if you need it," she said. "Although, in this case, it doesn't look like you did need it. Was there anything in particular you wanted to discuss before you head off?"

"You may as well use this, Apollo," Luke pointed out to his brother. "It was actually Pearl's idea; She wanted to help the only way she thought she could."

"Yeah, and how often do we get to talk to Auntie Mia!?!" Trucy added with a grin.

Mia laughed. "Apparently too often," she said with a wink. "I am dead, you know."

The three Wrights giggled, and Apollo paused to ponder what exactly he would need Mia's advice on... and what exactly she would be able to help them with, having been dead for almost an entire decade. "W-well," he asked, "if Luke and Trucy were telling you about the case... Is there anything you could immediately suggest?"

Mia shook her head. "Only that you investigate to find more information, and you appear to be already doing that." She thought a moment. "I'd focus on talking to your client first; Luke tells me you haven't been able to yet."

Apollo shook his head. "May as well do that first, then," he agreed, looking between his siblings to check they were ready to go; While Trucy returned his glance with a grin, Luke had his attention elsewhere, deep in thought. "Luke?"

The young vet jumped as he was startled from his train of thought, looking up at his brother with a surprised cry. "Huh? S-sorry, did you ask me something?"

"Are you ready to go?" Apollo asked, repressing a laugh.

"O-oh, yes, of course," Luke replied, blushing and tugging at his cap brim with an embarrassed smile. "What are we doing first?"

Trucy giggled. "Wow, you really zoned out there!" she pointed out.

"We're going to try questioning Wocky again," Apollo told his brother. "Mia suggested it."

"Unless that theory you were telling me about needs some other, more important information," Mia added, raising a curious eyebrow at the young man in blue.

Apollo's eyes widened as he turned to stare at his brother. "You'll tell Mia your theory but not me?"

Luke looked away guiltily. "I-I honestly haven't," he insisted. "Just... implied it."

"He's telling the truth," Mia added to Apollo. "We had a few moments alone while Trucy was with you and that Tiala woman; Nothing more than a passing comment."

Apollo paused; Did Luke suspect Alita of something too?

"A-anyway, we should get going," Luke insisted, pushing past his siblings to the front door. "We've got a lot to do today."

"To the Lukemobile!" Trucy cheered, rushing after her brother and pausing only to wave back at Mia. "See you later, Auntie Mia!"

Mia waved as the younger Wrights disappeared out the door, then looked to Apollo. "Remember if you're ever stuck: Turn your thinking around. You'll always find your solutions there."

Apollo nodded, rubbing sheepishly at the back of his head. "Y-yeah, and a lawyer doesn't cry until it's all over, right?"

"More or less," Mia replied with a smile. "You'd better get going."

"Yeah," Apollo said, backing up towards the door, avoiding the sofas only through muscle memory of where they sat in the room. "Um, hopefully I won't need you again on this case... sorry for bothering you."

Mia laughed. "It's no bother," she insisted. "Now get going. And good luck."

Apollo grinned, then dashed off after his siblings.

June 16, 2:58PM
Detention Center
Reception

As Apollo entered the building, Luke and Trucy at his back, the first thing he noticed was the sight of his friend Ernest back at the reception desk. "Hey, Ernest!" he called with a grin and a wave.

"Hey," Ernest replied with a friendly nod. "You wanting to speak to one of the suspects?"

Apollo paused, sharing a confused look with Luke. "Uh, Wocky, yes. We really need to talk to him."

Ernest shook his head. "Kitaki's in questioning."

While Apollo stared at Ernest in disbelief, Luke gave their old friend a thoughtful frown. "What about this 'other suspect'?"

Trucy gasped, hands to her mouth. "You mean the panty-snatcher!?" she asked.
Ernest only nodded.

"They arrested him?" Apollo realised with surprise, and couldn't stop a wave of pride washing over him that his sister would be safe from the strange man's advances. He smirked. "Alright. Let's have a little chat with Mister Stickler."

Luke shrugged, watching Ernest get up and head to the visitor's room. "May as well," he agreed. "We're here, after all."

"And he's a valuable witness!" Trucy added.

Apollo snickered. "He is a bit 'precious', I'll give him that."

A minute or so later, the three were stood by the chairs on their side of the glass, none of them willing to sit down before they had their witness in sight. Trucy, refusing to leave, remained behind her brothers at Apollo's insistence, where she would be mostly out of Stickler's view. Finally, the door on the other side opened, and a tall young man in black robes sauntered in, his guard behind him, and his nose buried in a book.

"Please, keep this brief, if you would," Stickler said, walking automatically towards the chair. "I'm quite busy. I need to finish this paper-" The student's eyes glanced up to see his visitors, looking down again at his book before quickly widening, his sentence cutting off as he jumped in surprise. "Nyurk!" He almost tossed his book into the air in shock before fumbling to grab it more tightly, hugging it to his chest as he stared at Apollo and Luke in fear. "I-it's you!"

The Wright brothers stood with crossed arms, giving the man a joint stern stare. "Mister Stickler," Apollo said. "We'd like to have a few words with you."

Stickler returned their stare for a very long moment before finally sighing in defeat. "Very well," he agreed, lowering himself into the lone chair on his side of the glass. "As long as they're few." He promptly popped open his book and returned his focus to its pages.

"Nothing would make me happier,' Apollo resisted the urge to reply. He and Luke shared a glance, and they slowly moved to sit down on the two chairs. Behind them, Trucy leaned on the back of Apollo's chair, lacking anywhere to sit herself.

"So then," Luke spoke up, hands folded neatly in his lap, "where do we start? The murder? Your serial thefts? Or maybe your obscene obsession with a minor's underwear?"

"Wait!" Stickler cried, snapping up to meet Luke's gaze in the same way a teacher might pause a disruptive class. "I can't help but feel that I'm being misunderstood."

Apollo's gaze narrowed, his crossed arms tensing as he resisted the desire to punch the man's lights out through the glass. "How, exactly?"

Stickler sighed as though asked to explain the intricacies of quantum physics. "Yes, that night, I obtained a pair of panties, it's true," he admitted. "However! It was my burning curiosity that drove me to do it! Nothing more!"

At that moment, Trucy giggled, attracting the prisoner's attention. "You wanted to know the trick to my panties, right?"

Stickler almost jumped out of his seat. "Y-you're here, too!?"

Luke raised an eyebrow. "That would explain stealing the Magic Panties alone, but what about Missus Kitaki's? What about all the other women's underwear you've stolen?"

The student didn't seem to have even registered Luke's words, jumping to his feet and leaving his book to fall to the small surface in front of him, his hands clasped together as he stared intently at Trucy. "Oh, Great Artemis! Teach me!"

Trucy was too shocked to reply, stepping back with wide eyes. "U-uh...!?"

Immediately, Apollo had slammed the tiny desk, shooting to his feet to stand protectively in front of his sister. "Don't you dare talk to her EVER again," he growled. "You lost that right when you followed us home!"

"But I must know the secret of those panties!" Stickler begged, pressing against the glass as he gave Apollo a pleading look. "My very existence hangs in the balance! Please, make me your apprentice, Gramaryes! Teach me the mystery!"

"We wouldn't take you on as an apprentice if you were the last possible option on the entire planet!" Apollo snapped. "We'd rather let the Gramarye name die than let a pervert like you anywhere near our tricks!"

Stickler shook his head. "But I'm not a-!"

"You can say that all you like," Luke cut in from his chair, eyes closed, "but those words alone won't convince anyone." His calm, authoritative tone silenced the room instantly, attracting everyone's attention to the young vet, arms crossed as he leaned back in his chair thoughtfully. "You said you stole all those panties, or bloomers, or whatever you want to call them, in search for the Magic Panties themselves. On the night of the murder, you'd found them, even if you had to leave them behind." He opened his eyes, staring up at Stickler. "Why, then, did you steal those bloomers right after? You'd found the Magic Panties, you couldn't have not realised there was no chance those bloomers were them."

Luke just sighed, looking away again. "Not that it matters. We only called you here to talk about the murder."

At that, Stickler huffed, sitting back down. "I already told you all I know!" he insisted, reaching for his book. "The defendant was there in the park, of this I'm quite certain."

Apollo also slowly sat back down, but Trucy behind him hung back, not wanting to draw Stickler's attention by moving closer.

"He was pointing a pistol, or something like that, at the victim!" Stickler continued to Luke. "That's when I shouted, 'Stop, you two! Let's resolve this like gentlemen!' And, the next moment, a shot was fired." He shrugged. "You see? It hardly differs from the testimony I gave in court."

"And this is all true?" Apollo asked, giving the man a stern stare and not trusting his or Trucy's abilities in his anger. "Really?"

"My panties are gone," Stickler sighed, clinging to his book morosely. "My innermost heart revealed. What further reason could I possibly have to lie?"

Apollo stared at Stickler for a long moment before deciding he couldn't disagree. With a nod, he stood up. "Thank you. That's all we wanted to know."

The moment they were out of the visitor's room, Trucy jumped at her eldest brother, clinging to his chest as she pushed her face into his shoulder. "Can we not talk to him again?" she quietly asked.

Apollo didn't hesitate to give his sister a sympathetic hug, and Luke rested a supportive hand on her shoulder. "Don't you worry," the lawyer told her. "When we press charges, Dad and I will handle everything."

"And it would be easy to have him banned from the Wonder Bar," Luke added. "You'll never have to see him again, Trucy."

Trucy sniffed once, then pulled back from Apollo, giving both her brothers a smile. "Thank you," she whispered. "I've got the best brothers in the world."

Luke giggled, tapping his sister's nose, while Apollo just smiled, then moved on to the reception desk. "Hey Ernest, is Wocky done now?"

Ernest shook his head. "Sorry, buddy. From what I've heard, he's not co-operating at all, so his sessions take a long time."

Apollo sighed, leaning on the desk. He moved to pull out his phone, hearing his siblings approaching behind him. "Is there any way you could, like, text me or something when he's done? I've been here three freaking times in the past two days, and I still haven't got to talk to my own freaking client! I've only got..." He paused to look at a nearby clock. "Fifty-five minutes left before the centre closes!"

The officer held back a laugh at that, to Apollo's irritation. "Aren't we on opposite sides here?" he pointed out. "Why should I help you?"

"But you've helped us before, Ernest," Luke replied, standing at his brother's side with a confused frown. "What's so different this time?"

"Last time, it was either you or your dad in here; I helped because I felt sorry for you guys, as your friend," Ernest told Luke with an air of 'isn't it obvious'. "This time, your client is a dangerous gangster."

"Who's still been falsely accused!" Apollo argued, though he could see Ernest's point. "I mean, it's not like I'm asking you to share evidence, or the prosecution's argument, or even to let us in to a locked off crime scene!" He paused. "Although, if you could help us get into the Meraktis Clinic, that would help a lot."

Ernest's mouth bent downwards into a frown. "I'm not helping you get anywhere," he insisted.

"Awww!" Trucy whined, giving him her best sad look. "But we need to investigate the victim!"

"No," Ernest repeated, then sighed. "But... I suppose... there's probably a by-law somewhere extending visiting hours for attorneys. I could look it up and... text you once Kitaki is done in questioning."

Trucy cheered in excitement, her brothers sharing a grin. "Thanks, Ernest," Apollo told him, unlocking his phone to share his number with his friend. "You're the best! Better than 'Debeste'!"

Ernest snorted at that. "Yeah, right!"

June 16, 3:39PM
Park Street

The first thing Apollo noticed as they approached the Meraktis Clinic was the garage door. Apparently, after how important it had been in that morning's trial, the police had decided to close it, preventing any further 'invasions', and the police car was more firmly blocking it, parked ever so slightly closer to the walls than it had been the previous day.

"Think they'll let us in?" Luke asked, examining the building sceptically.

"I hope so," Apollo replied, though he privately doubted they'd get anywhere without some inside help. "The guard wasn't very co-operative yesterday..."

Trucy scoffed at her brothers' negativity. "No harm in asking!" she chided them, and skipped up the steps to the glass door, tapping it with her knuckles. As Apollo and Luke warily followed to stand at her back, the door was carefully pulled open by a police officer on the other side, who Trucy cheerfully waved at. "Excuse me!" she called.

The officer's eyes widened as he took in the trio waiting on the clinic's doorstep. "Hey, it's you three from yesterday!" he cried.

Apollo suddenly recognised the face of the unhelpful officer who had been at the park the previous day. 'Oh great, how'd we get saddled with trying to get past him two days in a row!?'

"Your business is over in the park isn't it?" the officer continued with a frown. "The clinic's off limits. It's not involved."

Trucy was wearing her best puppy-dog face, eyes wide as she gave the man a pleading look. "B-but-!"

"What part of 'off limits' do you not understand?" the officer snapped, unaffected by Trucy's moping. "Show me proof that the clinic is connected to the incident in the park, or beat it." With that, he slammed the door closed and disappeared back inside.

Trucy spun around to face her brothers with a frown. "But Doctor Meraktis died! Of course the clinic is connected!"

"He means the events of the murder itself," Luke explained. "He wasn't killed here, so there's no connection between the clinic and the murder."

Huffing in defeat, Trucy stomped back down the steps. "S'not fair," she grumbled.

Apollo shrugged, patting his sister's back sympathetically as she passed him. "No harm in asking," he reminded her. 'No gain either.'
Trucy looked up, and her gaze locked onto the house beyond the clinic, behind Apollo. She broke into a grin. "Hey, it's Mister Eldoon!" she cried, hitting her brothers with a hand as she rushed off. "Oh Mister Eldooooon!"

"That was quick," Luke muttered in amusement to Apollo, moving past him to join her.

As Apollo turned to follow his siblings, he saw a sight very similar to what the trio had seen yesterday, when they'd come to Eldoon's ramshackle house looking for clues: Guy Eldoon himself was lounging in a chair next to Spoon's doghouse, idly scratching behind the lazy pooch's ears as he dozed in the afternoon sun. Nearby, the abandoned tarp still lay on the ground, the lone remaining Eldoon's Noodles bowl lying on its surface by the makeshift kitchen at the house's front wall. As Trucy called, the man slowly raised his head, abandoning his dog as he pushed the bowl and noodle-like wig underneath back on his head, revealing his eyes. He blinked once or twice as he looked between the approaching trio of Wrights, then crossed his arms and looked away with a "Hrmph."

Trucy stopped in front of the noodle vendor, watching him curiously. "What's wrong?"

Eldoon was silent for a long moment. "So, you found my stand," he said. "That's why I'm here. To thank you."

Apollo noticed Luke shoot him a confused look, and had to agree. 'You're waiting at your own house to thank us...?'

"Ah," Trucy said somewhat guiltily, shrinking back from their old friend a little.

"But now it's a crime scene and they won't let me have it back!" Eldoon snapped, waving an arm and sending the Wrights all back a step, Trucy jumping to Apollo's side to cling to his arm. To his credit, the man seemed to notice he was scaring the trio, and calmed down with a sigh. "That's also why I'm here. I got no other place to go."

Apollo was regretting his decision now of not trying harder to track their friend down the previous day; Although they'd come back to the clinic after their initial search, Eldoon was no longer lingering outside his house next door, and Apollo hadn't wanted to upset him by having to admit they were as-of-yet unable to return the noodle stand they'd been hired to find. "I'm sorry, Mister Eldoon."

"Not your fault," Eldoon replied with a shrug, returning his gaze to the trio. "How can a noodle stand be a crime scene, that's what I don't get, Pollo!" He gestured angrily at his bawdy neighbour. "Even in death he's after my neck I tell ya! Bah! Can't even cook an honest noodle..." Arms crossed, he returned to glaring in the opposite direction of the clinic, muttering under his breath.

The three Wrights all shot glances at each other. "You mean Doctor Meraktis?" Luke asked, voicing their thoughts.

Eldoon didn't seem to have heard them, shaking his head and muttering to himself. "I tell ya. It's enough to drive a man to make his soup even saltier."

Apollo raised an eyebrow. 'I really hope this is just all talk in the heat of the moment and you'll be back to normal once we get this whole murder trial squared away...'

"That stand," Eldoon mused aloud. "For generations, it's served up the very best noodles us Eldoons could make. A tradition of noodles and salty broth."

"Yes, I think you or your father have mentioned that," Luke sympathised. "Fourteen generations, right?"
"Fifteen," Eldoon idly corrected. "It's more than a stand; It's history, I tell you."

Apollo bit his lip. Watch what you say or it might become true...'

"I'm sorry," Luke told him with a sad frown. "But, I suppose you'd never planned to be running it anyway, right? Maybe you could go back to what you did before?"

"Too late for that, kiddo," Eldoon sighed, giving the clinic next door a wistful look. "Aye, I was a go-getter back in the days I rebelled against my pops... until my friend next door butted in." His gaze turned to a glare, and he stood from his chair, kicking at the abandoned tarp on the ground. "In the end, I was left with nothing but that dusty old stand to earn my fortune."

Trucy sighed to herself. "Poor Mister Eldoon..."

Apollo rubbed at the back of his neck. "Um, Mister Eldoon, I don't mean to pry," he nervously asked, "but what exactly did you do before you took on the noodle stand? You've never mentioned it."

"Bah!" Eldoon replied, waving the question off and turning away from the Wrights. "Let old noodles lie, that's what I say."

Luke gave Apollo a look, and Apollo could tell his brother had also guessed what it was their friend had been doing in the years he'd been feuding with his father.

"He stole my dreams and left me with nothin' but noodles," Eldoon grumbled. "And now I don't even have that!"

"If I might ask, Mister Eldoon," Luke picked up, "what exactly did Doctor Meraktis do to you?"

"Enmity?" Eldoon repeated, taking a step towards the trio. "I hate 'im!" He paused awkwardly. "Er. Hated." Shaking his head, he turned away again. "Him actin' like he smells like roses when he's rollin' in mud!"

"He's the only doctor at that clinic, you know," Eldoon continued, apparently not hearing them. "Pretty impressive, eh?" He turned to face the Wrights, leaning in close with a hand to his mouth. Despite his apparent care to be secretive, he spoke only in a mock whisper: "I'll tell you the secret to his success: The mob!"

The siblings shuffled awkwardly, not wanting to embarrass their friend by telling him they'd already known that particular factoid. "The Kitaki Family, right?" Luke replied.

Eldoon nodded, crossing his arms disapprovingly. "They're always having one of them 'turf wars' or whatnot. Always an injury or two that needs fixing. Meraktis saw a chance for some business, so he started giving the Kitaki Family a good deal."

Luke frowned, equal parts horrified and surprised. "A deal?"

"Every fifth operation for free!" Eldoon snapped, pausing to spit in the direction of the clinic. "He stole the idea from my pops!"
Apollo closed his eyes. He could remember well old Dude Eldoon's attempts to drum up more business with the proclamation that every customer got one free bowl of noodles a week, even if the Wrights had so often refused it out of fairness, being such frequent customers - it was part of why Apollo suspected the old man had been discounting their tab, retroactively giving them the free meals they denied.

"Can a doctor just decide to do that?" Trucy asked, confused. "What about the insurance companies?"

Eldoon gave a bitter laugh. "Oh, no doubt it's illegal," he replied. "But, it got him in good with the Family. Pretty soon he was getting all the business in town." His scowl deepened, the man grinding his teeth at the overshadowing hospital next door. "Leavin' me here, in the dark! Up t'my neck in soupy noodles!"

'Whatever happened to 'let old noodles lie'? Apollo wondered, raising an eyebrow.
Luke cleared his throat, stepping towards their friend. "Well, if we may, Doctor Eldoon, would it be correct to say Doctor Meraktis was a rival of yours?"

Eldoon paused, looking at Luke in silence for a moment before sighing, his anger evaporating instantly. "Figured it out, did ya?" He nodded, ambling back to his chair to sit down, returning to idly scratching Spoon behind the ears. "That's right, I was a doctor. A surgeon, actually... until Onion-boy butted in."

"Onion-boy?" Trucy repeated.

Eldoon thought for a moment, looking up at the trio. "You like those onions they put in the soup broth?"

Apollo blinked in confusion. "Um, yeah, kind of," he admitted with a shrug.

Luke shook his head. "Not really, no."

"You take a spoon, you drink some broth," Eldoon explained, miming the action as he turned in his chair, his hand leaving Spoon to her nap. "Those onions will find their way in there. For people who like 'em," he gestured to Apollo, "why, that's just fine. For people who hate 'em..." He gestured to Luke, then paused, crossing his arms as his scowl returned. "I hate onions. Hate 'em!" he proclaimed. "Always sneaking in from the side, gettin' in the way of a good tastin' spoonful. Well, that's what he was!" He waved angrily at the clinic next door. "An onion!"

"Oh!" Trucy cried with a grin. "Onion-boy! That's such a clever nickname!"

"Ever since pre-school we were getting in each other's face," Eldoon continued, glaring at his gaudy neighbour. "No matter what I did, sure enough, he'd come followin' along. Then he'd do it better than me. Just blow right past without so much as a 'howdy'."

Apollo frowned in thought, crossing his arms. "I see."

"Thanks to Pal Meraktis, I was forced to trade in my scalpel for a ladle!" Eldoon sighed, then shook his head, pushing himself back to his feet as he gave the trio an apologetic look. "Sorry, kiddo. Didn't mean to weigh you down with an old man's ramblings."

"No, it's fine," Apollo insisted, smiling at their friend.

Eldoon didn't seem to want to accept that as an answer, pointing at the young lawyer. "By way of apology... You ever get yourself in a spot of trouble, you drop by."

"You're investigating Meraktis, aren't ya?" Eldoon asked with a smile, crossing his arms. "Well, you want to know about a doctor, you ask a doctor. That's all I'm sayin'."
Luke thought a moment, then giggled. "Makes sense to me!"

Eldoon grinned, looking to Apollo. "You just think of me if you need something, Pollo."

After a second or two of confusion, Apollo smiled and gave their friend a nod. "Right. Thanks, Mister Eldoon."

June 16, 3:56PM
Kitaki Avenue
People Park Entrance

As the Wrights turned the corner onto Kitaki Avenue, they were immediately accosted by a shout from the entrance of the nearby mansion: "Hey, you three! Over here!"

Apollo jumped, recognising Plum Kitaki waving, broom in hand, underneath the elaborate gate. "U-uh, us?" he replied.

Trucy eagerly waved, running to meet the woman. "Yo, Little Plum! Wassup!?"

Luke was at his sister's heels, giving Plum a wave. "Hello, Missus Kitaki!"

Apollo sighed, forcing his feet to follow his siblings. 'Note to self: Keep Trucy away from gangsters better in future.'

"I heard you retrieved my bloomers!" Plum called as the trio approached.

Luke nodded. "Yes, we did!" He then gave her an apologetic smile. "We tried to return them to you yesterday, but-"

Plum interrupted him with a hearty laugh. "You caught the thief, didn't you? A man takes credit where it's due!"

"In that case," Luke giggled, turning to Apollo, "you should be talking to Apollo!"

Trucy nodded. "Uh-huh! It was Polly who found them, and Polly who nailed the panty-snatcher in court!"

Apollo blushed, rubbing the back of his head. "Er... y-yeah, I guess I did that..." After a half-second's pause, he then reached into his bag and pulled out the evidence baggy he'd stored Plum's bloomers in, holding it out for the woman to take. "And, um, while we're on the subject..."

"Hey, my bloomers!" Plum cried, smiling as she recognised the clump of beige fabric. "Thanks for that. I owe you one."

"N-no problem," Apollo muttered, feeling more awkward as he continued to hold the item out for its owner to take. "I thought you might like them back, so..."

Plum blinked, looking surprised. "Oh, no, no," she insisted, shaking her head as her surprised look melted into an amused smile (or was that a smirk?). "Why don't you keep 'em as a souvenir?"
Apollo felt himself paling, and didn't need to look at his siblings to know they were watching him with highly amused grins. "Oh no, I couldn't, really!" he argued, silently begging the woman to take the underwear from his hand. "Thanks for the offer, bu-"

"We could use those in our Magic Panties act!" Trucy interrupted with an excited gasp, bouncing in place. "They could be Polly's pair!"

"What!?" Apollo cried, turning on his sister in shock as Luke outright erupted into laughter. "Why would I have Magic Panties!?"

Trucy just pulled at her brother's arm with a wide grin, still bouncing in place. "You could pull shivs and godfathers out of them!" she continued, ignoring his protests. "Ooh, and you could use them in court to pull out evidence and surprise the prosecution!"

Apollo shook his head, scrambling to pull together an argument his sister might understand. "Truce, when you have Magic Panties, it's funny; When I have Magic Panties, it's creepy!"

Plum's laughter interrupted the conversation, drawing the siblings' attention back to her. "Ah, I'm sure you two can discuss the details later!" she said, before her gaze turned serious. "But enough about bloomers. What about my son, Wocky?"

Sighing, Apollo reluctantly put Plum's old bloomers back in the bag at his hip. 'Where do I even begin...?'

"He's really everything you'd expect in a Boss's son!" Trucy chirped, then bounced on her heels, adopting a pose that imitated Wocky's 'boxing stance'. "I'm going to be a gangster, dude!" she added, her voice deep in an attempt to copy the elder teen's voice as well.

Apollo raised an eyebrow.

"Huh?" Luke muttered, then shook his head. "N-no, Wocky's nineteen! I'm twenty!"

"Only a year off though," Apollo pointed out with a teasing grin. "Thinking of quitting the respectable life already?"

Luke blushed in embarrassment. "Stop it!" he whined. Ignoring his siblings' giggles, he then turned to Plum, who was watching in amusement. "Actually, I'm amazed getting shot didn't stop him. Wocky almost died, at such a young age, and he still wants to be a gangster?"

Plum nodded, a sad smile on her lips. "He didn't tell you the whole story, though," she explained. "You know, even if had a pistol then, he couldn't have shot anyone."

"What...?"

"He acts like he's 'hard', but he couldn't shoot someone to save his life," Plum continued. "I should know... I'm his mom."

Apollo simply nodded understandingly at her words. The emotional weight behind them was almost palpable, to the point that Luke was affected by it and had to look away, and Trucy quietly took Apollo's hand in hers, hiding her true feelings behind a small smile; Apollo suspected they had just been reminded of their own, far too short, times with their mothers, and tightened his grip on Trucy's hand to silently offer some comfort the only way he could.

"Hopefully, when this is all taken care of," Plum sighed, "he and the Boss can sort out their differences."

Apollo frowned in thought. They certainly aren't on the best terms, are they? he agreed.

"The Boss may act tough, but that boy means the world to him," Plum added.

"But Wocky seems, well," Apollo spoke up, shrugging as his first attempt trailed off. "It seems like he's against his father's position."

Plum smiled. "Ah, it's to be expected. We're in a bit of a transition now; Trying to cut our ties to the shadier side of the street and do more on the up-and-up. Wocky isn't too enthusiastic about the change, it's true."

"But why the change?" Trucy asked, confused. "Is the gangster thing just not paying the bills?"

Before Apollo could think to quieten his sister, Plum was laughing heartily. "It pays," she agreed, her laughter fading back into a stern look, "but we need a lot of money right now. Clean money, that is."

Luke hummed in thought, stroking his goatee, and Apollo wondered if the younger brother had guessed the reasoning behind Plum's words.

"He'll see things the way the Boss sees 'em," Plum continued with a sad smile. "Some day."

After a moment of thoughtful silence all around, Apollo prised his hand from Trucy's grip and dug around in his bag for his Court Record, turning it on and flipping to his evidence list. "Can you... tell me..." Arriving on the photo of the knife buried in the muddy turf, he flipped the tablet computer around to show Plum. "Does this knife belong to Wocky?"

Plum leaned forward, examining the photo for a moment before straightening up with a nod. "Oh, that's his knife alright," she replied. "Bought it for him for his birthday." She smiled. "I remember him falling asleep with it clutched in his arms."

"Ooh, I know the feeling!" Trucy cried, grinning.

"Isn't that dangerous!?" Luke asked, horrified.

Apollo was already flipping to a different piece of evidence to show Plum. "And this pistol belongs to the Kitaki Family, correct?"

Plum nodded again. "It's one of the pieces we keep around. That is, we used to keep around." She frowned. "They're all gone now."

"Oh?"

"Police came yesterday and took everything," the woman explained, then glared menacingly into the distance as she tightened her hands on her broom, partly exposing the hidden blade within. "Everything but my 'broom'."

Apollo tried not to look too nervous at the reminder he was less than a metre from a dangerous woman and her sword.

Trucy hummed thoughtfully, arms crossed. "Don't you think you should have given them that, too?"
she innocently asked.

Plum's glare vanished instantly, the blade disappearing behind its camouflaging sheath as she laughed heartily. "You kidding? Can't clean up very well without a broom!"

It was only then Apollo thought to look down at the cobblestones, noting that the paint stains were significantly smaller than yesterday; It seemed Plum was simply sweeping when she'd stopped them, taking a break from wiping the last traces of the car accident from the street.

"It's true," Plum continued, surprising Apollo with how quickly she'd returned to a business-like tone. "One of our pistols is missing."

Luke rested a hand against his chin, arms crossed. "As unfortunate as that is for our case, we couldn't think of an alternative for where it came from," he admitted.

Plum scoffed. "It gets worse: None of the rank and file have access. Only the Boss, myself, and..." she took a deep breath, steadying herself, "and Wocky could have taken it."

"I see," Apollo muttered, staring at the pistol on his Court Record screen with a frown.

"I'm sure the cops will continue tromping all over the mansion because of this case," Plum added, already looking more cheerful. "Maybe this is a sign it's time for a change!" With that, she laughed.

Luke smiled, giggling himself. "At least you're not worrying about that, Missus Kitaki!"

"True!" Plum agreed.

Apollo thought a moment more, then shoved his computer back into his bag. "I just have one more question:" he said. "Is there anything you can tell us about Alita Tiala?"

Plum's good humour instantly vanished, and she stared sternly into the distance. "Yeah," she mumbled, blowing a loose strand of hair from her face. "Wocky's fiancée."

"They're getting married next month, correct?" Apollo added.

"I suppose," Plum continued with a distracted shrug. "She's been staying over lately."

Plum looked up with wide eyes. "How'd you guess?"

Apollo resisted the urge to point out how obvious she'd been about it. "Could you tell us more about her?"

The woman stood in thought for several seconds. "Wocky brought her home one day," she said. "Says he wants to tie the knot."

"I can see why!" Trucy chirped. "She's so pretty!"

Plum frowned. "Oh, she's pretty enough," she darkly muttered, "but, you know..."

Trucy just looked confused. Apollo and Luke shared a knowing glance; It seemed there was more weight to their suspicions than they'd previously thought.

"Nah, it's probably just me being suspicious," Plum insisted with a shake of the head, but Apollo saw her fingers fidgeting on her broom handle, betraying her own denial. "Stay in this business too long and you start to only see darkness in people." She frowned sternly. "You get a nose for it. A nose for people. A nose for trouble."

Before anyone could reply, Apollo felt his phone buzz from his bag, and moved to pull the device out and examine it.

"What is it?" Luke asked.

Apollo smiled as he examined the phone screen, almost laughing in relief. "It's Ernest," he explained. "Looks like they're finally done questioning Wocky!"

"Finally!" Trucy cheered.

"Then we'd better get going before they pull him aside again," Luke pointed out with a smile, then turned to Plum and tipped his cap. "Thank you for all your help, Missus Kitaki!"

Plum laughed. "You can repay me by helping my son!" she replied, and watched as the trio dashed off back towards home.

When the trio arrived at the detention center, Ernest had proudly informed them he'd found a loophole enabling them access to Apollo's client until seven, prompting Trucy to insist she give him a massive hug in thanks. After only a moment of basking in the Wrights' gratitude, the young officer let them in to the visitor's room, then disappeared to fetch Wocky on the other side.

Apollo was quick to settle into one of the fold-up chairs by the glass, but Luke and Trucy hung back.

"Do you want to sit down this time?" Luke asked his sister.

Trucy shook her head. "You can sit down if you want," she insisted.

Apollo tried not to roll his eyes and sarcastically suggest they share the seat. Knowing them, the pair would probably go ahead and do just that.

The green door leading to the holding cells opened, and a guard escorted in the male teen in his brightly coloured jacket, said teen grinning widely with eyes closed as he sauntered cockily to the lone chair on the other side of the glass, waving at Trucy. "Yo, 'sup, my little impostor!"

Trucy jumped with a squeal, caught off guard by his sudden appearance. "Wh-what did you call me?"

Wocky blinked in surprise. "Dizzam! It's you!?" he said, then lowered himself into the chair with a huff. "Sorry, G, thought you were Alita."

"'My little impostor' sure is a strange nickname," Trucy pointed out, crossing her arms and looking unimpressed.

"It's a clink thang, you wouldn't understand," Wocky scoffed, before his eyes widened and he crossed his arms, trying to look casual. "D-did I say 'impostor'? I meant 'poster'," he claimed, "like 'poster girl', 'aight?"

Trucy just stared. "If you're going to drop part of that, why not drop 'poster' and just call her 'girl'?"

"'Cause she's so much more than that, G," Wocky explained, looking a little wistful as he spoke of his fiancée. "She's like... She's like an angel. A fallen angel."

Apollo noticed Luke frowning as he stared intensely at the floor, and wondered what his younger brother was thinking.

"So," Wocky continued, looking to his lawyer, "what can I do you for?"

Trucy studied Wocky's subdued demeanour for a few moments. "You don't look so chipper today, Wocky."

Apollo couldn't blame him. "Worried about your, um," How to put this delicately? "heart condition, maybe?"
Wocky tensed up, avoiding their gazes. "M-man... I ain't trying to hear that!" he cried, a faint warbling in his voice that he seemed to be doing his best to disguise. "A man fights to protect what's valuable to him, you know what I'm saying?" He paused, letting out a long sigh. After a short silence, he declared, "I miss my fallen angel!" and pointed at Apollo. "Hey, you go get Alita for me. You're my lawyer, aren't you?"

Apollo just glared at him in response. 'Lawyer, not gofer,' he mentally replied, but decided to otherwise ignore the request and get to business. "So, I hear you're to be married next month?"

"Straight up!" Wocky replied, instantly cheered by the thought of his fiancée. "We poured the nuptial forty out on the stoop!" He sighed wistfully, a silly grin much like the one in the photo Alita herself had shown them on his face. "Alita! Oh, snapplecakes! She sooooo foine!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow.

"If we might ask," Luke spoke up, stepping towards the glass but not sitting down, "how did you and Miss Tiala meet?"

"Ooh, yeah, we asked her that earlier!" Trucy added with a grin, then frowned. "She was... very vague."

Wocky seemed surprised to hear that. "Well, man, if she wouldn't tell you, I'd best hold my tongue, you feel me?"

Luke stared. "But-"

"Man, what's past is past, she knows that," Wocky continued, waving a hand dismissively. "When I'm with Alita, I feel like there's things worth protecting out there, you feel me? And my Alita, she's down with that all the way."

Apollo and Luke shared a frustrated look. The younger brother sighed, deciding to change track by asking, "What about Pal Meraktis? Could you go over your relationship with him?"

The teen scoffed at the word 'relationship', but agreed to answer regardless: "There's something you should know. We Kitakis are having what you might call a feud with the Rivales Family." He sniffed, rubbing at his nose. "So, 'bout six months back, I go into Rivales turf, packing a knife, right?"

"And you were shot?" Trucy filled in, slowly sitting down in the free chair.

"Coldest thing I ever seen," Wocky sighed, shaking his head. "One shot, to the heart, but my homies weren't too late. It's a miracle that I lived." He grinned proudly. "It's already considered one of the seven wonders of the Kitaki Family, you know that?"

Apollo decided not to comment. "So you were taken to the Meraktis Clinic then?"

Wocky snorted in laughter. "You shoulda seen their faces when they wheeled me in," he said. "You can't just let the Boss's son die, you know?"

"I can imagine," Luke sympathised. "Even so, he should have admitted if he couldn't remove that bullet."

"That doctor... He did it on purpose!" Wocky growled, arms crossed. "The Rivales paid him off, I'm sure of it!"
Luke frowned. "I highly doubt that," he replied. "Any surgery involving going into the ribcage would be difficult; It's more likely it was just beyond his skill range and he was too scared to admit it."

Wocky ignored him, staring off to the side. "Life in the Family is a G thang," he said, changing the subject. "It's about being a man. You know what I'm saying?"

Trucy shook her head. "Sorry, I'm not up on my G things," she replied. "I'm not even sure what a G thing is..."

"Please don't use that phrase ever again, Truce," Apollo muttered, pressing a hand to his face as he tried to unhear what he'd almost misheard in Trucy's words.

"But my old man, he's gone soft," Wocky continued with a glare. "He says the old rival gang days are over. He just wants to make money!"

"Isn't that a good thing?" Trucy asked.

Wocky shook his head. "Man, there ain't no soul in making money!" he proclaimed. "Better to live fast and die young. Fo'shizzle!"

Luke was giving the teen an intense stare. "You seem a lot more confident about that now than you were in court this morning."

The teenager didn't reply, awkwardly looking away and pretending he hadn't heard the young vet.

Apollo hid a smile, distracting himself by pulling out his Court Record and once again flipping to the photos of the pistol and knife. "About these weapons," he began, flipping the computer around to show Wocky the screen. "The pistol and the knife."

Wocky sniffed as he gave the tablet computer a nod. "They belong to the Family," he confirmed. "I snuck 'em out that night."

Luke quietly grunted to himself in thought, rubbing his chin distractedly.

"So the 'killer' Mister Stickler says he saw that night was you?" Apollo asked, reluctant to fully believe it despite their ordeal in court that morning.

Wocky shrugged, looking unsure. "Guess so," he admitted. "I was there, after all."

Apollo was surprised; After all his bluster that morning, it seemed that truthfully Wocky was as confused about who fired the fatal shot as the court was. It was looking less and less likely that it had been the teenager at all.

Trucy thought a moment, then waved her arms in an imitation of some of Wocky's mannerisms. "Yo, Wocky!" Her act was promptly ruined by the big grin she gave the elder teen. "Do you think you could tell us exactly what happened that night?"

Instead of being offended, Wocky seemed amused at the girl (A lot like his mother in that respect, Apollo mused). "Heh... You don't beat around the bush do you?" he asked with a small smile. "I like your style, shorty."

Trucy shot a proud grin at her brother, Apollo smiling in return.

"Thing is... I dunno if I was the one who shot 'im or not," Wocky explained, arms crossed. "The day of that check-up, when I found out about the bullet by my heart..." He paused, frowning uneasily. "I... borrowed a gun from the Family's stash. Figured I'd give that doctor a taste of his own bad medicine."

Apollo frowned. It was disheartening to hear Wocky had been the one to take the gun after all.

"But you were carrying a knife, weren't you?" Trucy asked, confused.

"Oh, that?" Wocky asked, smirking a little at the reminder. "Yeah, well, never can be too careful, I say." He paused, his smile dying as he returned his train of thought to the murder. "So I'm on my way to the clinic, right, when I run into him in the park... and he's dragging this noodle stand behind him!"

"Wait, you didn't put him up to that?" Trucy again interrupted. "Like, you know, in the movies?" She put on a deep voice, holding her hand to her face like a phone. "If you value your life, you'll bring the stand...!"

Wocky gave the girl a strange look. "Shorty, you're more wacked than I am," he said. "And that's saying something."

Trucy seemed disappointed. "But I was serious!" She didn't notice her two brothers hiding smiles at their sister's antics.

"The thing is," Wocky sighed, "I don't remember what happened next all too well."

"You don't?" Apollo repeated, surprised.

"I mean, I don't know what's going on with all the extra witnesses and everything," Wocky continued, "but it looks like it was probably me, you know what I'm saying?"

Apollo frowned. 'Man, even with all the evidence against it, the prosecution's argument has a firm grip on everyone it touches, doesn't it?'

Luke shook his head. "Wocky, if I might ask... do you remember for sure if you brought that gun with you or not when you went to find Meraktis?" He gave the teen a stern look. "Don't give me a guess or an assumption, just tell me what you know for sure."

Wocky thought hard for a few moments. "Man, I... I don't remember," he eventually replied. "But, the way I see it, I got that gun from the stash, and it shot the doc, so... Who else could it be, you know?"

Luke pondered the answer a second or two before giving Wocky a smile and a nod. "Thank you, Wocky," he told the teen. "You've been a lot of help."

The Wrights heard the screaming long before they found where it was coming from. Since their talk with Plum, the section of street around the Kitaki Mansion's gate and the park entrance opposite had been surrounded by a small crowd of mostly teenage girls, a pair of harried police officers doing their best to hold the hysterically screaming onlookers back from the park entrance as they jumped up at the nearby fence. Fortunately, it appeared the young women were relatively well-behaved, respecting the far-too-short line they were given and their obsession with the fence keeping them out of the way of any potential passing traffic... not that their apparent good-will for passers-by could repay for the incredible noise they were generating.

Luke pressed his hands to his ears with a frown. "That screaming was coming from here!?!"

"What are they even screaming about?!" Trucy added, clearly uncomfortable with the noise but trying to hide it, restraining herself from copying Luke.

Apollo could only shrug, noticing with a glance at the mansion that Plum appeared to have fled from the racket of the street... not that he could imagine her having much luck inside the house, either. "They're trying to get a glimpse of the crime scene, probably," he guessed.

"Why?!" Luke cried over the din, exasperated. "What is there possibly worth screaming about in there?!"

As Apollo's eyes wandered across the scene, he then noticed a brightly shining motorcycle, resting partially in front of the archway over the park entrance; Its red-purple colouring was broken only by the stylised G on its side. 'Gavin!' His expression hardened to a glare, and he grabbed Trucy's shoulder, keeping her close with a firm grip. "I think I know why." Before allowing either of his siblings to speak, he carefully led them around the shrieking crowd and towards the unguarded park entrance.

"Omigod, it's him!!" a high-pitched shout came from the onlookers, and their screams instantly doubled in volume, the throng shifting dangerously close to the archway, despite the valiant efforts of the two officers to hold them back. The source of their heightened activity wasn't far away, as, a moment later, a tall blond figure appeared from the park, grinning in delight as he ducked under the police tape.

Apollo heard Luke gasp as he recognised Klavier, his hands even finally managing to leave his ears. Trucy, however, was quiet, staring between Klavier and the clump of teenagers clamouring after him with a strange look on her face - It struck Apollo that the girls in the throng all appeared to be awfully close to his sister's age.

Klavier looked up, spotting the trio only a meter or two away. "Ah! If it isn't Herr Forehead," he called, waving the Wrights closer.

Apollo felt his siblings' gazes on him, looking for assurance on how to respond. After a quick squeeze of Trucy's shoulder to offer comfort, he slid his hand off, stepping in front of her protectively... as he approached the man between them and their destination inside the park. "Prosecutor Gavin," he replied, his siblings close behind.

Klavier chuckled, either ignoring or not noticing the continued guarded expressions the Wrights sported around him. He gestured to the screaming throng next to them, slowly being pushed further back by the harried officers. "Some fans found me on my way out," he explained. "Just my luck."

"Thus the screams," Apollo muttered disapprovingly, arms crossed.

"New album just came out, you know," Klavier added, still grinning in amusement. After a pause, he nodded his head towards the small crowd. "Try waving to them. They love it."

Apollo raised an eyebrow, but made no move to do anything - He'd had plenty of experience with excited fans before (though none to this extent of hysterics), and had no desire to interact with someone else's. At his side, he saw Luke hesitantly watching the babble of teens, then slowly lifting a hand and meekly waving. Immediately, the screams of the crowd shot up in pitch and volume, some of the girls looking almost ready to faint in sheer excitement.

Klavier laughed. "They're so excited, it doesn't matter who waves to them, see?" he pointed out.

Luke grimaced. "I don't know how you can stand that kind of constant attention, Mister Gavin."

"Ah, it's not for everyone, I'll give you that!" Klavier agreed.

Feeling someone clinging to his cape, Apollo spared his sister at his side a glance; Trucy was watching the squealing rabble of music-lovers with that same strange look she'd had earlier, her hand tightly gripping her brother's cape around where his arm would have been had he not crossed them. His brow wrinkled in concern, and he reached out a hand to take Trucy's grip, her eyes looking up to meet his in surprise. Seeing Apollo's worried look, she gave him a smile, taking his hand.

Apollo wanted to ask his sister what was on her mind, but there was the more pressing concern of Klavier Gavin to deal with first, so he quickly returned Trucy's smile, making a mental note to check up on her later. Turning a stern gaze on the prosecutor in front of him, he asked, "You're here investigating, I take it?"

Klavier nodded, still as friendly as could be. "And I was on my way home... when my hog gave up the ghost."

Luke frowned, confused. "Your 'hog'...?"

"My motorcycle won't start," Klavier explained with a sigh, gesturing to the nearby bike. "A clogged exhaust pipe."

"Oh, that's awful!" Luke gasped, looking far more sympathetic than Apollo was comfortable with. "How did that happen?"

"Ach, I think I was using the wrong oil," Klavier admitted, shaking his head. "My own fault, really. Cars, motorbikes, they're all the same: Clog the exhaust, and they won't run."

Klavier turned to the young lawyer with a smile. "Ah, tell me you share our angst, Herr Forehead," he said.

Apollo's frown deepened. "I ride a bicycle, actually."
The prosecutor shrugged off the comment with a chuckle. "In any event, I'm waiting to get her off to the shop to be fixed. The detective in charge of the scene isn't fond of me, anyway."

"Detective Skye, you mean?" Luke asked, apparently as surprised as Apollo.

"Ja," Klavier replied, nodding. "She's in a foul mood, too. Be gentle."

Before any more words could be exchanged, there was a fluttering of wings, and a large crow landed heavily on Luke's head, chattering over the din of the thronging fans nearby. Klavier, Apollo and Trucy jumped back in surprise, but Luke, looking up at his cawing visitor, grinned widely, holding up an arm that the bird was quick to jump to. "Corbin!" he quietly cried. "Sorry, what was that?"

As the crow made more chattering noises at Luke, Apollo turned his attention to Klavier: The prosecutor was still staring at the black bird on Luke's arm with wide eyes, but, as he watched Luke nod along to the crow's chattering, his expression turned more curious. A moment later, he seemed to notice Apollo's glare, his eyes flicking over to meet the unapologetic young magician's, and he shot his fellow lawyer a grin.

"Agreed," Luke said with a bashful smile as the crow's cries stopped, casting a glance at the crowd. "I'll see you in a moment."

The crow bobbed its head in a nod, then took flight in the direction of the park.

Trucy, pulling out of Apollo's grip on her hand, jumped to Luke's side with an excited smile. "Was that Corbin?" she asked. "What'd he say? Has he found out something!?"

Luke laughed. "I don't know yet!" he replied. "We have to talk somewhere... quieter." He gestured to the crowd, a wry smile on his face.

"Ohhhh!" Trucy said in realisation, then tapped the side of her nose knowingly. "Gotcha."

Giggling at his sister's antics, Luke looked up to meet Apollo's expectant gaze. "We should go investigate the crime scene, Apollo," he instructed. "Maybe question a witness." He grinned, giving his brother a wink.

Apollo smiled, rolling his eyes good-naturedly. "Maybe you could keep from advertising it this time?" he replied, earning chuckles from his siblings. "I'd like not to have a heart-attack before I'm thirty."

"Tell that to Daddy!" Trucy joked. "He's the one throwing himself under cars!"

Luke shook his head, deciding to ignore their sister's remark. "I'll... keep that in mind," he agreed, sheepishly shrugging.

"Shall I escort you in again, then?" Klavier asked.

Apollo almost jumped at the interruption, having forgotten the prosecutor was there. He gave Klavier a stern look. "We know where the crime scene is," he pointed out. "We don't need help finding it."

Klavier wasn't discouraged, still giving the Wrights a friendly smile. "In that case," he continued, "I would like to accompany Herr Triton in order to question him again... as a witness."

"Oh really?" Apollo growled, glaring at the man. "What a co-incidence."

"It's alright, Apollo," Luke insisted, giving his brother a smile. "We're all trying to find out what really happened, aren't we?"

Apollo sent his brother a raised eyebrow. "Are you serious?" he hissed. "We can't trust a Gavin to seriously care about the truth!"

After a very long stare, Apollo sighed, backing down. "Fine," he agreed.

"Thank you," Luke sincerely replied, smiling. Without another word, he took Trucy's hand and the pair headed off into the park.

Klavier looked to Apollo with a grin. "Shall we go?"

Apollo glared in return. "Just so you know, I don't trust you," he spat. "You try anything else on my family, I'll make sure to take you down like you took down our dad."

The prosecutor stared evenly for several long moments. "Your wariness is reasonable, Herr Wright," he replied in a neutral tone, nodding in acknowledgement as he stepped back, apparently backing down. "I won't argue you on that." His piece said, he turned and followed Luke and Trucy under the police tape, his fans squealing louder as he disappeared from their sight.

Apollo caught up to his siblings just around the first corner of the path, hidden from the entrance behind a row of hedges that also significantly dampened the din of Klavier's fans. Corbin had once more found Luke, sitting on his arm and chattering away while its wings twitched repeatedly in irritation; Luke's muttered apologies and bashful look said it all. Trucy was standing nearby, intently watching as though she shared Luke's ability, and Klavier moved to join her, looking curious about the whole thing. Apollo made sure to keep a watchful eye on the prosecutor as he stood at his brother's side.

"I've said how sorry I am, Corbin," Luke pointed out to the large bird. "I can't apologise enough for taking so long to get back to you, but we do have a time limit for solving this puzzle; Could I possibly ask you to tell me what more you know?"

The crow paused, studying the young vet for a few moments. It then much more calmly took up its chatter again, head bobbing animatedly.

"I see," Luke muttered thoughtfully, stroking his goatee. "That's a shame... Thank you for trying, though. You've been a lot of help."

The crow cawed once, then took off once again into the trees.

Luke looked around at the assembled group with a smile. "Corbin's been trying to find anyone else who witnessed the murder, but anyone he found couldn't tell us anything new."

Apollo sighed, rolling his eyes. "Seriously? This is why we don't use animal testimonies, Luke!"

"I'm not done," Luke calmly continued. "He was able to clarify a few things about what he'd already told me in his own testimony; Namely, our mystery person."

"What'd he say?" Trucy demanded, excited to be closer to solving the case. "Did he find who it is!?"
Luke laughed. "Unfortunately not," he admitted, "but not from a lack of trying. Like I said yesterday, birds have awful night vision, so he couldn't pick anything out about their appearance. He did say they ran in the same direction as Wocky did, though."

"Which doesn't tell us anything," Apollo grumbled.

"On the contrary, it tells us more than you might think. Herr Forehead," Klavier spoke up, shooting the attorney a smirk.

Apollo resisted the urge to tell the other man to shut up.

"He also elaborated on the version of events as he saw it," Luke continued. "He wasn't paying attention to Meraktis and Wocky's conversation, but he said Stickler stuck around slightly longer than Wocky did after the shot. He also said the person who came out of the noodle stand stayed nearby for a little while; They walked around to Meraktis' body before leaving the scene."

"Checking on the corpse?" Apollo asked.

"Or perhaps planting evidence, ja?" Klavier pointed out.

Luke shrugged, giving Klavier a small smile. "I'm sorry you can't make much use of this officially... Mister Keyboard."

Klavier chuckled, not offended by the nickname. "I will keep it in mind as the investigation goes forward," he promised. "We can consider it an anonymous tip." With that, he gave the Wrights a brief salute and began to amble back out of the park. "Auf Wiedersehen, baby! Until tomorrow!"

Apollo growled quietly to himself until the tall man was out-of-sight, then turned his stern gaze on his siblings. "Let's not include him in our investigation from now on, okay?"

Trucy nodded obediently, but Luke just looked slightly frustrated. "I can't make any promises, Apollo," he sighed.

The elder brother stared back for several moments in silence before nodding. "Fine. Let's go talk to the detective."

View the Court Record
The first thing the Wrights noticed about the crime scene as they approached was the blinding blue of the tarps now restricted to a small pile on the side, exposing the previously covered ground. Nothing else about the area seemed to have changed... except that their new detective friend and her labcoat were nowhere to be seen.

" Didn't Mister Gavin say she was still here?" Luke mused aloud.

Trucy looked around curiously, wandering down the path ahead until she had rounded the noodle stand, her face lighting up as she looked down towards the location of the mesh bin. "There she is!" she informed her brothers, pointing ahead as Luke and Apollo moved to catch up. "She seems to be apologising reverently," she continued, confused, "to the trash can."

Apollo's eyebrows shot up as he came into view of the odd sight, seeing Ema leaning forward towards the red bin as though sharing a secret with it. "She's... under a lot of stress," he told his sister. "The investigation's probably not going so well."

Ema suddenly shot up, spinning around to shoot the trio a glare. "Hey, you!" she called. "If you're going to talk about someone behind their back, do it more quietly, please!"

Apollo jumped in surprise, turning red in shame. "Oh, Detective Skye," he replied, as his sister proceeded to whistle innocently. "Hello."

"Is something the matter?" Luke added, hiding an amused smile at his siblings being caught out.

Ema threw her hands up in the air as she stalked towards the Wrights. "This is miserable!" she declared. "Miserable! My new kit doesn't work when it's supposed to, and everyone's all smiles for that glimmerous fop!"

"Glimmerous...?" Trucy repeated, then her confused frown morphed to a smile of realisation. "Oh, do you mean Prosecutor Gavin?"

"And 'glamorous'?" Apollo added with a raised eyebrow.

Ema scoffed. "When he walks, his shiny chains catch the sun and glimmer in my eyes!" she explained. "It's distracting." With that, she pulled her bag of food from her purse and loudly began to munch on it.

Apollo restrained himself from pointing out the hypocrisy of her irritating chewing.

"I guess I just have to accept the fact that I lack talent," Ema sighed to herself, her gaze on the darkening sky above.

Luke seemed to have zoned out of the conversation, looking around at the newly-exposed ground thoughtfully. "Detective Skye, did you say you'd been able to analyse that shoeprint we found?"

Ema nodded, putting away her food with a smile. "To a degree," she replied, waving for the trio to follow her as she made her way back towards the bin. "I've been testing out my footprint analysis kit! It was raining the night of the murder, so I've found footprints from everyone who was on the scene!" She paused, looking back at Luke. "Except for you, apparently. We'd need to get a shoeprint from you, anyway."

Luke blushed, rubbing the back of his head. "Uhh, if you insist, of course. It's no problem..."

The detective didn't seem to notice his sudden nervousness, crouching back down beside the bin to a small box full of equipment sitting on the stone path; Apollo could make out a measuring cup, several bags of powder and a rolling pin. "Here it is!" she proudly announced as Luke and Trucy crouched at her sides, Apollo deciding to just lean over them from behind. "Ever wanted to know exactly where someone was standing? Like your panty-snatching student witness, for instance?"

Trucy gasped in amazement. "You found his footprints!?"

"Yep!" Ema replied, grinning. She dug around in her box, then pulled out a small stack of papers, the top one Apollo quickly recognised as a rough representation of the crime scene, littered with sketchy footprints, each one individually labelled. Ema flipped through the stack, briefly showing off the numbered sheets beneath and the inky blackness of a life-size shoeprint each one sported. "I've been busy, in what little time I had this place to myself today! Every single dent in the mud, scientifically catalogued and numbered!"

Apollo couldn't help but be impressed; Ema had clearly been working hard since they'd spoken to her last.

"See this one here?" Ema continued, pointing to a barely-visible print in the grass nearby. "That's your Mister Stickler's right foot! He was standing exactly here at the time of the murder."

Luke giggled. "That's amazing, Detective Skye!" he congratulated her. "It's a pity you couldn't get these put together earlier, to confirm Stickler was lying about where he was!"

Ema scoffed, but still looked proud of her work. "Oh, pshaw! I'd still be putting all this together if you guys hadn't given me a heads-up!" Hugging her stack of paper to her chest, she stood up and headed back towards the noodle stand, the Wrights at her heels. "And over here is where we found Wocky Kitaki's footprints!" A moment later, she was pointing the trio to a second dent in the ground, opposite the location of the body on the other side of the paved path. "More proof he was in the park on the night of the crime!"

"Wow!" Trucy cried. "I can almost see the science at work!"

"Don't you love it!?" Ema excitedly replied, almost bouncing in delight. "Ah, nothing feels better!"

Apollo hid a smile; As fun as using forensics to investigate a scene was, he was never going to be as into it as their detective friend.

Luke frowned, turning back towards the noodle stand. "And the other person on the scene?" he asked. "Or is that what you meant by your kit 'not working'?"

Ema's enthusiasm faded. "Oh, yeah, that one..." She sighed, pulling the very back paper from her stack. "I got a print, but this is unlike any kind of shoe I've ever seen before. It's too smooth." She then held the sheet out for the Wrights to take.

Apollo and Luke shot each other a glance as they briefly and silently debated who would take the paper, and eventually it was the older brother who reached out to examine the offered shoeprint, his siblings watching over his shoulders. Just as Ema had promised, the print from their missing witness looked too smooth to be a regular shoe sole, though its shape proved it was definitely a form of footwear. The most distinctive thing about it was the large imprint of a leaf under the ball of the foot, likely fallen from the tree above.

"I don't even need to look to know I can't match this to anything on file," Ema added. "It's... certainly unique. Not from a regular shoe, at least."

Luke hummed in thought, stroking his chin. "Actually, it looks like we could help you with this one," he admitted, shooting his siblings a smile.

"Oh?" Ema replied, an eyebrow raised as she placed her stack of shoeprints gently in her purse.

Trucy frowned in confusion as she looked to Luke. "We can?"

Apollo slowly smiled as he realised what his brother was referring to. "Of course we can," he told Trucy. "You remember those shoes we found yesterday? Not far from here?"

The youngest Wright stared at Apollo for a moment before her face lit up in realisation. "Oh!" She immediately shoved her hands into the bag at her hip, digging around with an excited grin for several moments before emerging with one of Apollo's evidence bags, a pair of green slippers visible within. "Here's our culprit!" she announced, proudly holding out the item for Ema to take.

"Slippers...?" Ema muttered, almost snatching the bag from Trucy's hands and popping it open with a frown, staring at the footwear within. "What would slippers be doing out here?"

"Have a look at the soles, Detective," Luke instructed, hiding a grin. "Specifically, the one on the left."

Ema raised an eyebrow at the young man, then obediently pulled the left slipper from the bag, flipping it around to examine the sole. "It's covered in paint." A moment later, her eyes widened in surprise. "Hey, that spot is shaped like a leaf!"

Apollo grinned. "What if a leaf was stuck on the bottom, and came off when the slipper stepped in paint?" he pointed out. "Makes sense, doesn't it?"

The detective didn't reply, flipping the shoe in her hand around again to examine the other side. "Hang on, something's written on this," she mumbled, then gasped again. '"The Meraktis Clinic!'"

Trucy gasped along with her. "I forgot about that!" she cried, then looked up to her brothers. "Wait, that means... that someone from the clinic was involved?"

Luke nodded, a serious look on his face. "Like I said before, this missing witness has some kind of connection to the victim. They would have come here together from the clinic that night."

Ema was peering intently inside the slipper in her hand. "Hey, I think I see a toe mark," she commented.

Apollo was surprised, having not thought to look inside, and couldn't help but feel excited at the thought of lifting a print. "You think we can get a print off that?" he asked.

"Sure!" Ema replied, grinning widely. "Toes have prints just like fingers do, you know." Before Apollo had much of a chance to get his hopes up though, she was frowning again. "Oh, but there's one problem: The police station doesn't keep a record of toe prints, so we won't know whose it is."

"Oh," Apollo muttered in disappointment. He didn't miss his siblings hiding giggles. "So, even if we lifted a print, we'd just be wasting our time?"

Ema stared at the slipper in her hand for several moments before putting it in the bag with its twin and handing the item back to Trucy. "Not necessarily," she said. "If you find another toe print somewhere, I can compare them for you to see if they match. That's probably your only hope for finding this guy." That said, the detective had pulled out her bag of food, throwing the chocolate sticks into her mouth as she glared into the distance.

The trio stood in silence, each deep in thought. After a moment, Trucy replaced the slippers in her bag and stepped forward towards Ema. "Um, Detective Skye? We have a favour to ask!"

The detective jumped in surprise, looking down to the teen. "What?"

"Can you get us access to the Meraktis Clinic?" Apollo asked, still holding the shoeprint in his hands.

"The police won't let us in!" Trucy added. "They say the murder and the clinic aren't connected, and it's off limits until we prove they are!"

Ema continued munching on her treats for a few moments before slowly smiling, looking somewhat smug. "I should be able to do something for you, yes," she said the moment her mouth was clear.

"Thank you so much, Detective!" Luke replied, giving her a grin. "That would be so much help!"

"Well, you did my work for me here with the slippers and all," Ema reasoned, shrugging. "Seems like I should return the favour." She shoved her bag of food back in her purse, grabbing the shoeprint from Apollo to return to her stockpile, then pulled out a blank paper and a pen. A few minutes later, once she'd found a hard surface to write on, Ema folded up the handwritten letter with a grin, handing it proudly to Apollo. "Here," she instructed. "Show this to the police officer on duty."

"Thank you again, Detective," Apollo replied, taking the paper and giving it a brief glance (he noted she had drawn a small heart by her name, in much the same way he and Trucy had taken to drawing diamonds in theirs).

"Don't mention it," Ema insisted with a grin, waving the trio off. "Now go find that witness!"

View the Court Record
Apollo grumbled as he checked his watch. 'Just over an hour until showtime. We're really pushing it today.'

Trucy was in the lead as the trio arrived outside the clinic, and skipped to the door with Ema's letter clutched tightly in hand. Just as before, she jumped up the steps and knocked on the glass door, giving the officer within a wide grin as he reluctantly pulled it open.

"Ah, you three again," the officer sighed, shooting Trucy in particular a stern look. "When oh when will you learn. Look at me however you want, you're not getting in today."

"I wouldn't be so sure if I were you!" Trucy giggled, then held up the letter for him to take. "Look what we have!"

The officer raised an eyebrow, warily eyeing the rather smug Luke and Apollo standing nearby before taking the folded piece of paper. "What's this?" he asked, opening it up to read. A few moments later, he was sputtering in surprise. "Detective Skye!?!" He then gave the trio a suspicious glare. "Yesterday it was Prosecutor Gavin, today it's Detective Skye. Who are you three? Really?"

Luke scoffed, arms crossed. "Excuse me, but yesterday Prosecutor Gavin just happened to be nearby when you agreed to let us in. He's not related to this at all."

Apollo resisted the urge to giggle at the reminder of how Luke had essentially blackmailed the man before them into letting them into the park, and, to the officer's credit, he was beginning to look appropriately embarrassed.

"W-well, you got the orders," the officer mumbled, pulling the door wide open. "I gotta let you in. Have fun." With that, he stepped out, waving the trio into the room beyond.

"Thanks, Mister Officer!" Trucy chirped as she skipped inside, her brothers at her heels.

The first thing Apollo noticed as they entered the Meraktis Clinic's reception was just how homely the place looked. The walls around the entrance were wallpapered with a pattern almost Victorian in style, and there were a few paintings hung up to cover them. A fake pot of white hibiscus sat on one side by a reasonably sized aquarium complete with fish (Apollo half-wondered if the officer was feeding them), and underneath a low set of shelves held an array of identical green slippers, the two long rows broken only by the conspicuous gap at one end of the upper level. The slippers we found at the park, covered in the paint from the hit and run...' Below, sitting on the black tiles of the doorway area, were a pair of women's sandals, high-heeled with blue strapping.

Luke immediately made for the abandoned footwear, crouching down to examine them without yet touching them himself. "Hmm... That makes sense..."
Trucy jumped up onto the step leading inside, crouching opposite Luke with a grin. "Does Doctor Meraktis have a visitor?"

"Truce!" Apollo barked, waving at his sister to get down off the white tiles of the clinic interior. "Take your boots off!"

"Can't tell me not to!" Trucy sang in response, running off into reception and giggling madly.

While Apollo rolled his eyes, Luke chuckled in amusement. "With Meraktis dead, no-one's going to mind if we don't, just this once," the younger brother pointed out.

"Fine, fine," Apollo sighed, crouching at his brother's side and deciding to let his teenage sister run off some steam. "Obviously these shoes can't be from a current visitor, given this place is vacant," he continued, changing the subject. "Besides, a friendly visitor would have used his house entrance instead of the clinic entrance, right?"

Luke nodded, a stern frown on his face. "Exactly. We need to get these to Detective Skye."

Apollo was able to connect enough dots in his head to realise why, but halted halfway to pulling an evidence bag from his stash. "Those are too big for one of the baggies," he pointed out.

"Just get out the biggest one, then," Luke replied, picking up the left sandal. "The toe of this shoe is the important part to protect."

A moment later, the left sandal had been shoved toe-first into the largest of Apollo's evidence bags, the massive heel causing it to stick out considerably. Luke was putting away both shoes in his satchel when finally Trucy reappeared, bouncing on her heels. "Hey, Polly, guess what I just figured out!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow, standing up. "Am I going to regret answering that?"

Trucy giggled. "Mister Eldoon must do take-out!" she replied, and pointed around the corner of the nearby reception desk behind her. "I guess he was still friends with Doctor Meraktis after all!"

"What do you-?" Apollo's question was halfway out of his mouth before he realised what his sister was really saying behind the gleefully ignorant jokes. Eyes widening in surprise, he dashed up onto the white tiles, circling Trucy and coming face-to-face with a small pile of distinctive red and white bowls, each one with the hand-painted logo of the Eldoon's Noodles mascot on the inside. "The bowls!" he cried, dropping to his knees to examine them more closely.

"They've been washed clean," Trucy added, following him with a smile. "I already looked."

Apollo almost laughed in relief, looking up to see Luke catching up behind their sister, unsurprised by the pile of crockery. He shot his younger brother a smirk. "You were probably expecting this, weren't you?"

Luke innocently smiled and gave his brother a shrug.

A loud thump echoed from down the corridor.

Instantly, the trio's eyes all locked on a door at the end of the dark passageway to Apollo's left, underneath a glowing green emergency exit sign. Although the door had a glass window, it was covered by flattened blinds on the other side, blocking any view either in or out. A placard nearby labelled the room beyond as "Doctor's Office".
"I th-think someone's in there!" Trucy whispered, jumping to Luke's side and clinging to his arm, both of them staring wide-eyed at the distant door as Luke hugged his sister protectively.

The sight of his siblings' fear prompted Apollo to gather his courage, slowly standing up with a determined frown. "Let's check it out, then," he announced, and strode forward, boots thudding methodically along the square tiles beneath. Without even pausing to consider what he might find, he grabbed the door handle (surprisingly, it wasn't locked), and threw the door open, jumping through into the room beyond.

The office was a mess. It was also empty. Apollo's gaze locked on instantly to a tall window by the important-looking desk at the other side of the room, open just enough to allow someone to slip out into the green garden beyond. "$They went that way!" he cried, and was moving to run after them before he felt a hand grab his arm, and turned to see his siblings had caught up, Trucy's gloved hands pulling her eldest brother to a stop.

"We're too late to catch them now," Trucy pointed out, shaking her head morosely. "$They must have heard us coming."

Apollo sighed, deciding to heed his sister's advice. "We should at least tell the police," he replied.

"Not yet," Luke insisted, pushing past his brother to look around the office. "$Look at this, Apollo." He turned, giving his siblings a smile. "$I think this is exactly the break we've been looking for."

"Huh?" At his brother's insistence, Apollo gave the room a more careful sweep: It was even more fancy than the reception had been, a darker wallpaper and wood panelling encircling a deep purple carpet covering the floor. Twin lounge chairs sat either side of the entrance, their matching cushions thrown asunder, and all the furniture - the heavy brick of a desk, a nearby table along the wall, room-height shelves along the back full of jars containing a variety of fish - was made of the same dark wood, built to match the elegant stylings of the existing room. What was most strange about it however was the pattern of mess the burglar had left behind: Upturned books on the floor, a spilled glass and accompanying bottle, a potted plant that had been tipped on its side, leaning heavily against the nearby table. On a hunch, Apollo stepped forward and knelt down to look at the dropped bottle (he almost laughed that he could instantly recognise it as grape juice, the same brand their father always bought), finding the dark stain its contents had left in the carpet was long dry. "$This was knocked over a while ago."

Luke nodded, glad to have convinced Apollo to stay, and headed around the desk to examine the plant in its pot. "$Very unusual for a burglar to be looking under a plant, too," he pointed out, righting the object.

"This mess is even worse than Daddy's room," Trucy huffed to herself, arms crossed. "$What was the burglar looking for? The key to the safe?"

Apollo looked up, belatedly noticing the large safe nestled amongst the jars of fish in the shelves behind the desk. "$I've heard of house keys under plants, but the key to a safe?" he asked as he got to his feet.

"Then maybe they were looking for the house keys!" Trucy replied with a grin.

"Unlikely," Luke told their sister, shaking his head. "$Remember, there's an officer standing guard outside, and a patrol car very visibly out the front. A run-of-the-mill burglar would be avoiding this place."

Trucy rested her hands on her hips, face scrunched up in thought. "$Then who was it breaking in?"
"Whoever it was, they obviously needed to do it today," Apollo realised, sharing a look with his brother that told him Luke had a very good idea of who it was already.

"Ooh, look at this!" Trucy suddenly cooed, rushing past Apollo and crouching by a small table lamp sat on the carpet, its cord stretching up over the desk to an out-of-sight power point elsewhere. "Kind of an expensive-looking lamp, isn’t it?" Before Apollo could tell her to leave the object alone, she was peering into the bright blue shade covering the bulb, frowning in disappointment. "Hey, the bulb's broken!"

"Broken?" Apollo repeated, suddenly intrigued as he moved to his sister's side. "Don't you mean burned out?"

Trucy shook her head, looking up at her brother. "No. Our cat burglar must have dropped it." She promptly stood up, waving for Luke to come and see himself.

Apollo frowned as he also peeked inside the shade, seeing the smashed bulb as Trucy had said. "But why is it standing up on the floor like that then?" he still pointed out.

"Hey, look at the cord!" Trucy instead cried, and Apollo looked up to see his siblings leaning over where the black cord stretched across the top of the desk.

"There's some kind of red mark on it," Luke added as their brother stood to join them, pointing out a soft red splotch on the black plastic covering the fragile wire. "See?"

It was easy for Apollo's mind to jump to the worst conclusion first. "You think that's blood?" he quietly asked.

Apollo sighed in relief, but Luke's intense staring at the mark gave him pause. 'Wait. That burglar didn't cause most of this mess. It must be connected to the murder! That's why we came here, after all!' He pulled out his Court Record, preparing to snap some pictures of the lamp. "Something's definitely odd about this, that's for sure," he said as explanation.

"Once you're done with that, we need to look at this safe," Luke replied, gesturing to the nearby object. "It looks like the burglar was halfway into it."

"Halfway?" Trucy asked, confused, and walked around Apollo to approach the safe herself.

Luke smiled, rounding the chair behind the desk and pointing his sister to a tiny keypad in the centre of the reinforced door. "It looks like this opens with a four-digit combination, and two of them have already been entered in!"

As Trucy cooed in amazement, Apollo quickly finished his photos of the lamp and ran to join his siblings behind the desk, shoving his computer back in his bag. Sure enough, next to the circular handle on the far left of the safe door was a tiny keypad and a screen large enough for four numbers, slowly blinking '79'. "I wonder what's inside this thing...?"

"How do we find out the last two numbers?" Trucy asked. "Do you think Doctor Meraktis would have written the combination down somewhere?"

Luke smiled. "Actually, I think there's a far quicker way to find out the combination," he replied, a finger pointed into the air. "Tell me Trucy, how would the doctor have opened this safe?"
Trucy crossed her arms, face scrunched up in thought. "He'd've entered the number?" she asked, confused, then her face lit up. "Oh! This is a puzzle!"

Apollo rolled his eyes, but decided to let his siblings have their fun.

"And how would he have done that?" Luke continued, always delighted to be engaging in his favourite pastime in the course of everyday life.

"Pressing the buttons," Trucy replied, gesturing to the tiny keypad and looking confused again. "Why? What am I solving?"

"How to find the next two numbers," Apollo pointed out, realising the answer himself and digging through his bag. "We have just the thing, actually."

Trucy blinked in surprise. "We do? What?"

Apollo smiled as his fingers closed around the tiny jar at the bottom of his bag. "You press those buttons with your finger, don't you?" he pointed out, then pulled out the jar and brush to show his sister. "Wouldn't that leave residue behind?"

"Oh!" Trucy gasped, grinning. "He'd leave prints!" She then paused, her face falling. "But, if the burglar was trying to get in, how do we know they knew the right numbers? What if seven and nine are wrong?"

Although Apollo hesitated, unable to refute Trucy's point, Luke frowned determinedly. "They knew the number," he insisted. "It doesn't make any sense otherwise."

Apollo and Trucy stole a glance at each other; It was clear their brother had a very specific person in mind. Deciding Luke would tell them when he was ready, Apollo opened the jar of fingerprint powder and got to work.

View the Court Record
Over the next minute or two, Apollo dabbed at the keypad with the brush, coating the plastic moulding in white powder that Trucy eagerly volunteered to blow away, spraying the powder back into her and Apollo's faces and sending Luke into a badly hidden fit of giggles. Despite that, Trucy's grin never faded as she and Apollo struggled to wipe the powder off, although it was eagerly sticking to the oils on their skin as it was designed to, Luke offering them no help in his delight at their misfortune. Once the whole ordeal was over, the three Wrights admired their handiwork, finding the powder had stuck to four different buttons: On the seven and nine, there was a notable absence of powder in the centre, revealing the numbers behind. "The burglar must have been wearing gloves," Apollo realised. "They were the one who entered the code..."

"Two and five," Luke said, paying attention more to the other two buttons coated in powder. "So the combination ends in either five-two or two-five."

"Let me try!" Trucy cried, and excitedly reached up to hit the buttons top to bottom, finishing the half-done combination on the screen. "Two five!" To the trio's surprise, first try appeared to be correct, as the safe beeped, made a 'clunk' sound, and the door subtly popped open.

Apollo had to hold back a grin. "It opened!" He grabbed at the handle, pulling the safe open as far as it would go, the door banging against a shelf wall on its left as it swung around.

The inside of the safe was deceptively small, given the compartment's thick walls. A large money box sat on the floor, almost the entire width of the safe, a stack of papers shoved at its side. On top, another, messier, stack of papers and a single manilla folder, as well as a small lucky cat figurine, golden with a stack of notes in its moulded paw.

Trucy gasped, grabbing at the manilla folder, which she was quick to open, pulling out a piece of paper and a thin sheet of black-and-white plastic. "This looks like... a medical chart," she said, handing the paper to Apollo as she turned her attention to the plastic. "There's an X-ray in here with it."

Apollo decided to ignore the chart for now, peeking over Trucy's shoulder at the X-ray as Luke attempted to do the same from across Apollo. It was, to him, a mess of grey, the only recognisable shape being a ribcage that took up most of the picture. "I can't make heads or tails of it," he admitted, looking back to the paper in his hands. "And I can't read the chart either; It's all in medical-speak."

Before the final word was even out of Apollo's mouth, Luke had grabbed the paper from him, studying the chart intently. "Hmm... That's interesting." He looked up. "Can I see the X-ray, Trucy?" Their sister nodded, handing over the remainder of the lone hidden file, and Luke turned to take a few steps toward the window, holding the sheet up to examine against the dimming light outside.

Apollo followed his brother, biting his lip. "I know you don't specialise in humans," he said, "but is there anything you can see that could help?"

Luke nodded, still frowning at the X-ray. "This is Wocky's chart," he explained. "From the failed operation to remove the bullet."

"What!?” Trucy cried, bouncing at her brothers' backs as she tried to see for herself. "Why is Wocky's chart the only one in there!?"

"Why else?" Apollo replied, placing a hand on Trucy's shoulder to stop her jumping. "If that got into the wrong hands, the Kitakis would have their vengeance on Meraktis for sure... Not that it helped, in the end."

Luke sighed, placing the X-ray back in the folder and turning towards his siblings. "That's not all,” he said, turning his attention back to the chart with a worried look. "You don't need any kind of medical knowledge to read a name. Take a look at the nurse who filed this." He held out the paper, a finger pointing to a box on the top right, underneath Meraktis' name as the physician on duty.

Trucy gasped, hands to her mouth. "Nurse Alita Tiala!?” she read aloud. "But she's Wocky's fiancée!"

"What's her name doing here!?" Apollo added, glaring at the chart as though it might be able to tell him. "Why didn't she ever mention she was on staff at this clinic!?"

"A very good question,” Luke replied with a stern frown, putting the chart back in the folder with the X-ray. "She's been actively denying any prior knowledge of this operation; I doubt her reasoning behind that is benevolent."

Apollo nodded in agreement, turning back to the safe to give it another look. Mentally, he was kicking himself for writing off Alita's lies earlier that day as denial; There was no way she was as concerned about Wocky as she claimed. "I'd be very interested if there's anything else that chart can tell us," he called over his shoulder.

"You'd need a human doctor for that, I'm afraid," Luke said with a smile. "All I can make out is stuff we already knew: The bullet near the heart, the aborted oper-"

"Hey!" Apollo suddenly cried, interrupting his brother as he pulled his tablet computer from his bag, staring into the safe with wide eyes. "This looks like a bullet hole!"

Trucy gasped, and Apollo felt her grabbing at his arm long before he was expecting her to appear at his side, bouncing to get a look around the Court Record as her brother took a photo. "Look, you can still see the bullet sticking out of it!” she pointed out.

As Luke wandered over to look, Apollo drummed his fingers against the back of his computer in thought. "The question in, why's it in the middle of a safe?" he asked.

Trucy was already reaching up to scrape at the hole, and dislodged the metal pellet inside. "It came out!” she announced, plucking the bullet from where it had fallen to examine more carefully in the palm of her hand. "The tip is all squished."

"Not surprising, given it was fired into a metal safe," Luke pointed out, watching from Apollo's other side as the elder brother resumed taking pictures of the flattened bullet. "If it was so easy to remove, it must be a recent addition in there; Doctor Meraktis would have surely taken it out himself otherwise."

"There's a story behind it, that's for sure," Apollo agreed, finishing with his photos and shoving his computer in his bag, swapping it out for a small evidence baggy. "For now, let's gather this all up and get out of here."
"Thank you again, Mister Officer!" Trucy chirped as she led her brothers back out onto Park Street, where the sullen policeman was waiting for them. "It was really useful to get to look around!"

"Yeah yeah," the man muttered, shooing the Wrights away from the door as he made his way back in. "Leave already."

Apollo gave the man a glare, changing his mind about informing him of the half-complete theft within.

"Before you go, sir," Luke spoke up, apparently more willing to stick to his guns despite the man's rudeness, "it looks like we interrupted a burglary in progress. The office window is open, and we heard someone moving in there."

The man was surprised. "O-oh," he muttered sheepishly. "Thanks, then." With that, he hurried back into the clinic, closing the door behind him.

Luke shrugged as he turned to Apollo. "That's that, then."

"What now?" Trucy asked, bouncing on her heels as her brothers joined her on the pavement. "We need to talk to Wocky about his operation, and tell Mister Eldoon we found his bowls too." She looked over to their friend's house next door, but there appeared to be no sign of him.

"And ask the detective to compare the toe prints on the sandals and slippers," Luke added, stroking his goatee in thought. "It might also be worth asking Doctor Eldoon to take a look at that chart, too."

Apollo sighed, checking the watch under his glove. "We've got just about fifteen minutes," he said. "We're not going to make a visit to Wocky."

Trucy gasped, then sadly looked to the ground, fiddling with the brooch on her cape. "Oh yeah... I forgot about the Wonder Bar."

Luke was still deep in thought. "If I give you a lift, that cuts your travel time a little," he pointed out, "although you two still need to fit in dinner before you go."

"Forget it," Apollo sighed again, crossing his arms. "Ernest can't get us in to see Wocky after seven, and five extra minutes won't help us much... The investigation's over for today." With that, he turned and began to walk back down the street towards home.

Trucy gave Luke a guilty look, then turned and rushed to catch up to their elder brother.

Luke rolled his eyes, then ran to Apollo, grabbing his shoulder to bring him to a halt and spin him around to face his younger brother. "Apollo, if I leave now, I can still make it to the detention centre in time to question Wocky." Luke gave his brother a look that he hoped was both pleading and sternly sincere. "I know I promised before that I wouldn't dream of investigating without you, but... If it's okay with you, I'd like to do that. I can finish the investigation today in your stead."

Apollo stared back at Luke with a blank expression, but Trucy's face split into a wide grin. "That's a great idea!" she cried. "We don't have to call off a show, and Polly's investigation is all complete for the trial tomorrow! It's perfect!"
"I-I guess it is," Apollo admitted, his stunned look slowly fading to a half-smile. "And this is an emergency we weren't expecting." 'Even though it was my idea to wait so long to get going after the trial...’ "You're really okay with doing all of that for me?"

Luke laughed. "Of course I am!" he replied. "I wouldn't offer otherwise!"

Apollo bit back a chuckle, finally allowing himself to relax. "Alright, then. Anything to get these final few questions answered, right?" After a short pause, he then pulled his brother into a hug, only partially because of the grateful tears pricking at his eyes. "Thank you. You helping out like this... It really means a lot to me, Luke."

Smiling, Luke returned his brother's hug. "We're brothers, aren't we? What are family for?"

Luke smiled triumphantly as he pushed through the entrance doors to the detention centre. Ten minutes to spare! Apollo and Trucy will be at the Wonder Bar right now, preparing for their show. I can't let them down! A part of him wondered if Pearl had decided to join them or stay behind at the Agency: The moment he and his siblings reached the Agency door, he'd jumped straight into his car, leaving Apollo and Trucy to go inside and explain the situation to their cousin; He hadn't the time to waste doing so himself, talking only very briefly to Apollo then making a mad dash for the detention centre before it closed for the night.

"Luke?" Ernest asked as he looked up from the desk, confused. "Where's Apollo?"

"He has a prior commitment," Luke explained, making his way to the desk with a smile. "I'm here to talk to Wocky."

Ernest frowned. "Buddy, only attorneys are permitted to meet clients this late in the day. I can't let you in."

Luke only continued to grin, pulling a small object from his pocket that his brother had solemnly handed him as they parted ways only half-an-hour previous. "And who's to say I'm not an attorney?" He held the tiny badge in his fingers, presenting it to his former classmate with pride. "This is all I need."

The young officer's surprised look turned into a frown. "I know that's not yours. You're a vet, not a lawyer."

"And how do you know that?" Luke brightly asked, refusing to be deterred. "For all you know, I also did a law degree while I was in London. How can you say for sure I didn't?"

Ernest stared at Luke for a long moment, then sighed, getting to his feet. "Alright, fine. I'll look the other way just this once!"

Luke resisted the urge to cheer, watching his former classmate call for Wocky to be brought to the visitor's room. "Thank you so much, Ernest!"

"Don't mention it," the officer insisted. "Really. Don't."

When Wocky sauntered into the room on the other side of the glass, it was once again with eyes closed and a wide grin on his face. "Don't cry angel, Daddy's back and Daddy's-" His eyes opened to see only Luke sat in a chair opposite, and the teen's face fell. "Oh. You again." With that, he slumped into the chair at his side, arms crossed.
"Me again," Luke confirmed with a sympathetic smile. "I just have a couple of questions for you this time, then I'll let you get back to your cell."

Wocky huffed. "Whatever, man."

Deciding not to irritate the teen, Luke peeked into his satchel: All he had with him evidence-wise was the medical chart and the sandals, both from the clinic, as he and Apollo had determined it would be all Luke needed to question Wocky; It was pure luck both had ended up with Luke somewhat naturally during their search. 'Well, first things first... and biggest things first, too.' He pulled out the sandals, the left one still toe-first in a clear plastic evidence bag to preserve the print within; Asking Wocky about the shoes had been his idea, anyway. "Do you happen to recognise these at all, Wocky?"

Wocky's expression brightened immediately. "Hey! Sure I do!" He smirked proudly. "I was the one who bought 'em for her."

Resisting the urge to smile at the confirmed hunch, Luke asked, "For Miss Tiala?"

Luke only smiled. "Thank you," he replied, putting the shoes back in his bag. Although Wocky gave him a suspicious look, Luke didn't give him time to question anything, pulling out the medical chart. "And this... this is a medical chart." He opened the folder, slipping out enough of the X-ray to show Wocky it was there. "To be specific, Doctor Meraktis' chart from your failed operation."

Wocky was surprised, even turning a little pale. "H-hey, I already know what that's gonna say-!"

"But not what I'm going to ask about," Luke firmly interrupted, pulling out the form. "This tells us there was a nurse assigned to you during your stay: One Miss Alita Tiala."

The teen almost sighed in relief, apparently more fearful of his impending death than how he met his fiancée. "You lawyers do your homework," he muttered, slumping in his chair. "Yeah, I met her at the clinic. So?"

"So," Luke replied, replacing the file in its folder, "could you tell me more about the exact circumstances of your meeting?"

"Fine, fine!" Wocky cried, waving dismissively. "I'll tell you how we met if you want to know that bad." He pushed himself upright again, taking a moment to ponder his answer. "Bout half a year ago, I was shot during a little turf war with another family. I was ready to die, sure, but they came in and got me, hauled me off to the doc's."

Wocky nodded, smiling nostalgically. "That's where I met her," he said. "My fallen angel..." He paused to giggle at the thought of his fiancée. "She was scared of me at first, turns out, but you know what they say: The bad guy always gets the ladies!"

Luke resisted the urge to outright laugh at the assertion. "Go on," he settled for saying, distracting himself by replacing the folder in his satchel.

"She was done with that clinic anyhow," Wocky continued, "so I was like, I'll take you on, woman! Straight gangster style." He grinned in pride. "Guess what she said?"

Wocky looked a little disappointed with that answer, but seemed to decide to let it go, smiling again at the memory. "Eh, yeah, kinda. She said it real quiet-like, on the down low, know what I'm saying?" He leaned in close to the glass, where the opening at the bottom was. "I'll leave, if you'll marry me."

Luke was both surprised and not surprised to hear that. "And that's how you became engaged?"

"You know it!" Wocky boasted. "An oath of love, right there in the hospital room. Just like that, the op was done, and we were outta there. See ya later, bye!"

At that, Luke felt a fresh wave of pity for the teen. 'And yet he hasn't realised the implications of everything he's just explained... Blinded by his affection for Tiala.'

The vet's silence deflated Wocky's ego, and he sniffed awkwardly. "Yeah, didn't go so well after all, did it? Bullet still in me an' all."

Luke decided to change the subject a little. "So, this health check-up that brought the error to your attention... Whose idea was it? Your father's?"

"Yeah," Wocky sighed. "Can you imagine? What's the point of living healthy when you're a G, you know what I'm saying?"

"You say this despite the fact that this check-up has potentially saved your life?" Luke pointed out, raising an eyebrow.

Wocky scoffed, looking away. "Well, I figured I could get that cap pulled after I got my revenge on that wack doc," he said, apparently ignoring Luke's point. "And hey, I'm still living large now, aren't I?" He shook his head. "Guess my old man must be getting old. Older, I mean."

At that moment, the door behind Luke opened, and Ernest poked his head in. "Time's up, buddy," he called. "You gotta wrap up and get out of here now."

"Alright," Luke replied, standing and giving the teen on the other side of the glass a smile. "That was all I wanted to know. Thank you for talking to me, Wocky."

Wocky feigned disinterest, but gave Luke a return nod. "Whatever floats your boat, man."

Neither moved for a long moment, Luke staring at the teen slumped in the chair on the other side of the glass, his polite smile fading to a concerned frown. "I feel I should apologise in advance for what's going to happen tomorrow," he said.

"Eh?" Wocky mumbled, meeting Luke's eyes with a confused look.

"It's not going to be pleasant for you," Luke continued. "I should know; I've been in your position, about to live through what you'll have to face in trial tomorrow. This is worse than a guilty verdict, this is going to break your heart, and..." He paused, struggling to keep himself from tearing up. "And there's nothing I can say to make this easier for you."

Wocky stared at Luke with wide eyes. "Wh... What's with the sudden weird vibe, man?" He weakly laughed, forcing a smile. "Like, no reason to get into a funk, right?"
Luke didn't respond. After several seconds of silence, he turned and left the room.

As Luke slipped into the driver's seat of the Lukemobile, slamming the car door behind him, he was unable to get Wocky's frightened face out of his mind. History was repeating itself, and there was nothing he could do to stop it.

"If they don't have evidence, that means they have testimony, and that means he's claiming someone at the shelter is lying to say I did it! None of us would ever do that, just like none of us would have killed Mister Pound!"

"Well, I hate to have to break it to you Luke, but someone did! Either Simba or Reindeer murdered him and is blaming it on you, and you have to face reality on this!"

"But neither of them has any reason to kill him!"

His hands tightly gripped the steering wheel as the voices of the past echoed in his head. He squeezed his eyes shut to block any errant tears. 'And I thought the prospect of being a witness again was awful... Now I have to watch one of the worst moments of my life happening to someone else?' He could still feel the tight grip of the bailiffs as they held him back, his feet slipping against the floor as he struggled to break free and run to his mentor... and the terrible look on Reindeer's face as he refused to meet Luke's eyes.

"You think I was happy about those two young things taking my job?"

"W-wait, Mister Wildgrube-!"

"So I killed the boss to get back at him! He cut my wages to chase me into retirement in favour of them, so it was never going to work out anyway!"

"Reindeer, no! The wage cut was your suggestion, don't lie for my sake!"

"And who told you it was my suggestion, huh?"

The scene was playing out in Luke's head, but suddenly all the faces and voices were changed; Debeste to Klavier, Kristoph to Apollo, Reindeer to Alita and Luke to Wocky.

"Face it, kid; You were an idiot if you ever looked up to me. Aren't you supposed to be the smart one with that fancy doctorate of yours? You should've guessed this was coming a long time ago."

'But where will you be when Wocky lives this?' a voice in Luke's head piped up. 'Will you hang back like Apollo did, hiding at Kristoph Gavin's side?'

"Where did that come from?" he wondered aloud, blinking in surprise. "Apollo did the best he could! What good would he have done running to help me?"
'You know full well what it would have meant to you,' the voice replied. 'You felt so alone in that moment, it was like the Professor being turned to gold all over again. To feel that again was so shameful, you never even showed anyone those bruises the bailiffs left on your arms.'

Luke couldn't reply to that.

'So, where will you be when Wocky lives this?' the voice repeated... then fell silent.

[View the Court Record]
On Friday, Luke had walked in on his friend and colleague's bloody corpse.

Saturday and Sunday were spent locked in a tiny cell, accused of a murder he didn't commit.

Monday's trial successfully cleared his name... by condemning someone else's.

On Tuesday, Luke dragged himself back to the detention centre, but was shown the door without even glimpsing his goal in going there.

Today was Wednesday, and the absolute last place Luke wanted to be was where he was standing right now.

Simba had gasped when the young vet meekly pushed his way in through the front door of the shelter's reception, her hand clutched tightly to the shawl still wrapped tightly around her neck. "N-Northpaw!" she cried. "I... forgot you were coming in today!"

"I can't exactly stay away, can I?" Luke quietly pointed out, not meeting her eyes as he stood by the door. "We have animals to look after and re-home."

"U-uh... yeah, guess so," Simba replied, fiddling nervously with her shawl.

Luke didn't respond, and the pair stood in awkward silence for several seconds.

Finally, Simba cleared her throat, standing behind her desk. "I'll, uh... I'll go find Duck for you."

With that, she scurried off, leaving her walkie-talkie behind on the desk.

When Duck arrived, he made an immediate beeline for the young man, giving him an encouraging smile. "Northpaw, you're back already?"

Luke nodded. "I said I'd be in today," he pointed out. "Why wouldn't I be here?"

Duck frowned in concern. "I told you if you needed more time to recover from the trial-"

"Why should I need more time?" Luke interrupted, his voice emotionless. "The shelter needs to keep running, especially after all we've lost. We can't afford anyone being absent right now."

The resulting sigh from his friend only made Luke feel guilty for lacking the energy to fake cheer. "We can handle one person's absence for another day or two," he insisted. "If you need it, Northpaw."

"I'm fine," Luke again interrupted. "I've lived through worse."

Duck stopped arguing with him after that.
In the recuperation room, Luke found Fox sitting on the floor, her back to him as she examined a small terrier. He decided not to greet her, busy ing himself with grabbing his labcoat and hanging up his satchel, the whole time avidly avoiding the third, empty hook between his and Fox's. When he turned around, he found the noises of his preparation for work had finally attracted his friend's attention.

"Northpaw?"

Luke only nodded, making final adjustments to his coat. Although he remembered his co-worker's tears on the day of the fateful trial, he couldn't summon the energy now as he did then to bring her out of her lingering melancholy; His own was hard enough to handle.

"I'm about halfway through the check-ups," Fox continued, gesturing to the nearby wall of cages. "We got a surprising amount of adoptions yesterday, so a lot of the healthier ones can go out into the bigger cages now."

Once again, Luke nodded, and got to work. Neither said a word to each other for several hours, focussed entirely on the animals they were examining and whether or not they were ready to fill empty cages in the main section of the shelter. They worked almost mechanically, Luke barely seeing his charges as he evaluated their health... which was only made harder as the cats pushed their purring heads into his hands and the dogs whined softly as they licked fervently at his cheeks, forcing him to pause as he waited for them to stop. Although all of them asked Luke what the problem was, wanting to help and with no idea of what had happened over the past week, Luke could not bring himself to answer them (especially not with Fox still in the room) and forced himself to tune their pleas out. In the end, every last one failed to receive an answer and backed down.

Eventually, Luke and Fox's paths brought them together, their jobs done. Fox gave her friend a forced smile. "That's everyone. Let's starting re-homing them, huh?"

Luke just nodded.

"Alright. I'll do the cats, you can do the dogs."

It was as he was locking away the last dog in its new cage that suddenly a blond teenage boy appeared at Luke's shoulder, giving him an intense stare. It was Bee. "Are you free now?"

Luke slowly nodded.

Bee smiled. "We were going to start bathing the dogs now, but Kitty has to start food rounds," he explained. "Did you want to help me?"

After a moment of silence, Luke returned a small smile of his own. "I'd love to."

Perhaps it was because Bee was the youngest volunteer of the shelter, or maybe because he'd been absent from the trial itself, but being alone with the teenage boy, their attention completely focussed on the dogs they were currently giving a thorough wash, seemed to calm him much easier than anything else had that day. Predictably, lazy Bee left most of the work to Luke, doing a bare minimum himself, but Luke didn't mind; He was content to keep his hands busy, struggling with the dogs who disliked baths and calming down the dogs who were overjoyed to play in the warm water. Luke even found himself laughing at their antics.

But it wasn't to last: Duck asked Luke to come to the office when he was finished. Luke had nodded and agreed to be there, then reluctantly bid Bee goodbye.

In the hallway at the back of the building, Luke stood outside the door that led to the Manager's Office. Only five days ago, it had been the sure-fire place to find Phelan Pound. Five days ago, Luke had found Pound, lying on the floor under the contents of the nearby bookcase, bleeding out into the carpet... and all that had changed. Now, every time he tried to reach for that door handle, the image of Pound bleeding on the carpet flashed in front of his eyes, and he flinched away, pressing his back to the opposite wall much like he had on the day of the murder. He could remember the shock and humiliation he felt when the detective's whole attitude switched from compassionate to cold, and Luke was dragged away in cuffs. His hands curled into fists, pressing tight to the wall at his back. What is wrong with me!? Everything turned out alright, and I've literally survived worse, why is this hurting so much!?’

"Northpaw?"

Luke paused in surprise, then slowly looked up. To his left, coming out of the storeroom, was Simba, giving him a worried look as she clutched a bag of animal feed in one hand. He stared at her, unable to make himself reply.

Simba glanced away, then shrugged, giving Luke a small smirk. "Having trouble with the door?"

There was a short pause, then Luke heard the clops of Simba's shoes against the concrete floor, and saw said sandals entering his field of view to stand at his side. "I get that," she quietly told him. "I've been having the same problem... I-it being where Mister Pound died, and all. It's... freaky, I guess you could say."

A spike of anger shot through Luke's mind, and he firmly looked away from his friend. "You didn't see him, Simba," he coldly replied, keeping his voice low. "The way the murderer just left him... Stunned, bleeding to death under his books? They didn't care." He squeezed his eyes shut, trying to slow his rapid breathing. "He didn't even get a quick death... Slow and painful, and they left him there to die, Simba! Lying in a pool of his own blood! He..." His vocal chords suddenly stopped working, and Luke pressed a hand to his face as he sank to the floor. With great effort, Luke managed to quell his threatening sobs long enough to choke out, "He didn't deserve that..."

Simba didn't reply for a very long moment, and Luke half-wondered if she had gone before he felt her hand patting his shoulder, and heard the bag of food she had been holding crumple as it was placed gently on the floor; Simba must have crouched down at his side. "I'm sorry," she simply said, a clear sincerity in her quiet voice that wasn't often heard from the sarcastic receptionist.

"Reindeer didn't do it," Luke added, slowly bringing himself back under control.

There was a slightly longer pause this time. "He didn't," she agreed.

They sat there, unmoving, for what felt like an eternity. Luke's strangled sobs calmed relatively quickly, leaving him with the quick task of wiping the tears off his face with a sleeve of his labcoat.

Eventually, Duck came out of the office, and was surprised to find the pair so close. "Northpaw! I was... just wondering where you were."

Luke nodded and pulled himself to his feet, lacking the energy to even feel sheepish about his brief breakdown. "Sorry. I was..." He trailed off, ending his sentence with a shrug.

"It's the office," Simba picked up, standing at his side and with her emotionless demeanour back on in full force. "Considering what Northpaw found last time he was in there, it's hard not to be wary."

Duck's eyes widened in surprise. "O-oh! Uh, geeze, I'm sorry about that, Northpaw!" He scratched a cheek, giving Luke an apologetic smile. Luke couldn't summon the energy to return it. "Uh, I just wanted to discuss you and Fox's schedule... y'know, since there's, um, just the two of you now. I thought, since the office is technically mine now, and it's private-"

In the end, Duck relocated his meeting with the two remaining vets to the surgery, as it was private and away from the animals, like the office. Luke couldn't bring himself to argue, still fighting his fears of the manager's office, no matter how many times he told himself he would only get over his sudden phobia by going back into the room and confronting it. He continued to barely say a word during the meeting, going along with Fox and Duck's suggestions with the insistence that whatever they worked out would be fine with him. Given Fox was being particularly quiet herself, this left Duck rather frustrated with the both of them.

As the meeting came to a close, Fox stood from their makeshift meeting table and gave Duck a thoughtful look. "Have... you visited Reindeer?"

Luke and Duck looked up at her. "After his arrest the other day?" Duck replied. "Sure, I tried."

Fox blinked in surprise. "Oh..." She then sighed. "He turned you away too, did he?"

Duck nodded, standing as he gathered his papers. "I think pretty much everyone's tried to visit him by now, but he's point blank refused to take any visitors. Stubborn as ever, the old bastard."

Luke's gaze turned to the examination table he was still sat by.

"Guess so," Fox mumbled, then sighed. "I just wanted to ask him... why? What really happened that night? Why'd he do it?"

"We all want answers," Duck assured her. "Unfortunately, the law doesn't really care about 'why', just 'who' and 'what'. If Reindeer won't tell us himself..." He trailed off, standing for a long moment in silence before shaking his head. He didn't need to say it for Fox and Luke to know what he meant.

"Reindeer didn't do it," Luke mumbled. "He's just saying he did to keep me from going to jail."

Fox and Duck both looked down at Luke in surprise. After a moment, Duck sighed. "And I'd love nothing more than to be able to believe that, Northpaw," the man softly replied. "But if you didn't do it, and Reindeer didn't do it... Who did?"

Luke couldn't reply to that, his eyes locked on the table.

"All we can do is trust in the system," Duck continued, "and that it found Mister Pound's murderer. I know it's hard, but would you rather live in fear that the killer is still out there? That they could come after you?"

When Luke still didn't reply, Duck took his papers and left without a word.

To his shame, Luke stayed in the surgery for the rest of the day, sitting on the floor in a dark corner. He kept telling himself to get up, go outside and help his friends and co-workers with the chores, but for some reason the order never quite reached his legs, and he remained on the floor, making no move to get up. It was so easy to just sit in the silence, to not have to think, escaping from the doubts and the fears of the previous Friday and the terrifying weekend in the detention centre and the simply awful trial that had followed.

Five o'clock arrived faster than expected. It was the end of the work day, and, usually, Luke would be looking forward to it, as the shelter emptied and he could spend some quality time with his animal friends without the fear of being discovered. Right now though, the young man wasn't sure if he even had the energy to do that.

The swinging door to the recuperation room opened, and Luke heard paws padding across the floor only moments before a wet black nose pushed itself into his face, a large Labrador-cross trying her best to climb into his lap as she licked at Luke's eyes and nose. "H-hey!" he cried, gently trying to push the dog off. "Stop that!"

As the dog reluctantly backed off, Luke wiped the saliva from his eyes, and looked up to see Fox standing nearby, giggling softly. "Sorry," she said, not looking at all apologetic. "I guess Patsey got away from me while I was feeding her."

Luke sighed, watching the black dog lie down at his side with her head in his lap. He settled for patting her neck.

"She's such a loving dog, huh?" Fox continued. "She'll get to make a family out there very happy one day."

Luke still didn't respond.

Fox held up a wrist to look at her watch, but had already begun speaking before her eyes had a chance to read it. "Oh, hey, it's home time! Are you coming, Northpaw?"

After a pause, Luke decided not to argue, and carefully moved the dog's head off his lap before getting to his feet. Still smiling, Fox led the errant canine back to her temporary home in the Recuperation Room, then grabbed Luke's satchel for him as he took off his labcoat. Not making any move to remove her own, she guided her silent friend out into the hallway and then to reception, where a figure stood silhouetted in the evening light.

"Hey, Luke."

Luke looked up in surprise to see Phoenix, giving his son a warm smile.

"Thought you could use some company on the way home today," Phoenix explained.

Although a part of Luke was bursting with questions - primarily WHY - the rest of him simply didn't care. He ran from Fox's side to latch on to his father with a tight hug.

Phoenix returned the gesture without comment. "Let's go home, huh?"

View the Court Record/Luke's Notebook
"I'll leave my Court Record inside, along with all the evidence Trucy and I have, if you don't need any of it for Wocky. Oh yeah, and a note on what the password is so you can get into the system. You spot anything else suspicious, don't forget to take a picture of it. And! Before I forget, you're going to need an attorney's badge to get in to see Wocky. Take care of it, okay? Don't do anything stupid. I'll text you once the show's over."

Luke was feeling a lot better after the drive back to the agency. From here, it was just a short walk to the crime scene to talk to Ema, then back to Park Street to see if he could find Eldoon. As he locked up his car and headed up the stairs into his childhood home, he ran through what he would need in his head. The fingerprint powder, slippers and sandals for the detective to analyse and compare the toe prints, and then the medical report and probably the Court Record too for Mister Eldoon, to tell him where his bowls ended up and ask his opinion on that report. Well, to see if there's anything else new we can learn from it, anyway.' He felt his stomach gurgle, but intently ignored it; He would have time to eat after finishing this investigation... hopefully before the sun fully set in another half hour.

As he entered the office, Luke's attention was caught by the array of items scattered across the glass-topped table between the two sofas. That must be everything for the case.' On top of a small pile of paperwork in the centre of it all was a small tablet computer, which Luke quickly recognised as being Apollo's beloved Court Record. He made a beeline for the object, sitting on the sofa with his back to the desk as he made to sort out what he could carry in his satchel.

"Is that you, Luke?" came a call from the kitchen, and Luke heard the door open behind him as Pearl entered.

"Yep, it's me," Luke replied with a smile, examining a small post-it Apollo had stuck to his computer, the password scribbled across it. "I'm just picking up some stuff, then heading off to talk to the detective." He paused a moment, removing the note and placing the Court Record in his lap as he reached for the slippers. "Apollo explained what we were doing, didn't he?"

"You don't want dinner?" Pearl hesitantly asked. "You have to eat, Luke!"

"I will," Luke promised, carefully arranging the slippers in his satchel alongside the sandals, "but I have to hurry to catch Detective Skye before she leaves the crime scene, and I might miss Mister Eldoon entirely if it's dark before I get around to him."

A third person then chuckled from somewhere in Pearl's direction, a person Luke had not been expecting to hear at all. "Now, that won't do. Need some help?"

Luke spun around, abandoning his bag for the moment as he looked up into the grinning face of Phoenix Wright, standing next to Pearl by the office's desk. "Papa!" he cried, jumping to his feet and just barely grabbing the Court Record before it fell to the floor. "What are you doing here?"
Phoenix scoffed. "I live here," he pointed out with a mischievous grin. "Why does everyone keep asking me that?"

As Luke shook his head at the joke, Pearl gave him a smile and explained, "Mister Nick decided to sign himself out this afternoon. He asked me to help him move Mystic Maya's DVDs back here!" She pointed to a literal pile of the Steel Samurai collection dumped by the TV, seemingly awaiting a willing hand to sort it again.

"I was going out of my mind with boredom," Phoenix added, and gave Luke a mock hurt look. "You three haven't been to see me all day! What kind of ungrateful children have I raised here?"

Luke laughed. "We were busy," he pointed out, then remembered his purpose in entering the office to begin with and quickly sat back down, placing the Court Record at his side and reaching for the fingerprint powder. "In fact, I'm still busy. I need to see Detective Skye right away."

"I'll come with you," Phoenix offered, walking around the sofa to Luke's side; Luke couldn't miss the slight limp in Phoenix's gait, or the tightly-bandaged ankle that was the cause. "I've been wanting to see Ema again anyway."

Luke gave his father a wary look, the jar of powder still in his hand. "Are you sure, Papa? That's quite a distance to walk on your ankle."

Phoenix scoffed. "Hey, I can walk just fine," he insisted with a smirk.

"He walked with me back here from the clinic," Pearl added.

"Exactly," Phoenix said, shooting the teen a grin. "I can handle a trip or two around the block."

Luke wasn't convinced, but didn't see the point in arguing. "You're not going to listen if I tell you not to, are you?"

"Nope!" Phoenix cheerfully agreed, taking the fingerprint powder from Luke. "C'mon, it'll be just like old times, investigating a case together!"

"We only investigated together once, Papa!" Luke pointed out with a laugh, handing Phoenix the Court Record to look after. With everything they needed now sorted out, he once again stood and turned to his cousin behind him. "Did you want to join us, Pearl? If Papa's home now, your 'job' cleaning up the office will be over."

Pearl blinked in surprise, a hand to her mouth. "You want me to come?"

"Sure, if you want to," Phoenix replied, giving her a smile as he secreted the fingerprint powder and Apollo's computer in his hoodie. "You'll probably get along with Ema."

Breaking into giggles, Pearl bounced around to join Phoenix and Luke, looking between the two of them. "Oh, I'd love to! It really will be like old times, Mister Nick!"

Phoenix laughed, then turned to Luke. "So, Apollo left you in charge, I believe. Where to first?"

People Park
Although Luke had offered to pass over Apollo's badge to Phoenix, the ex-lawyer had refused, insisting Apollo gave it to Luke to look after and he didn't want to interfere with that; Luke suspected the larger, unspoken reason was probably one of pride, that Phoenix didn't want to carry a badge that wasn't his, so he didn't argue. Once at the park, Luke put on the airs of a professional to persuade the officer at the entrance to let their trio through. It had been easier than he thought, as apparently the officer recognised Luke from his earlier visit with his siblings and was now under the assumption Luke had been the attorney on the case all along, which none of them were going to argue with.

As Luke approached the crime scene, his father and cousin at his back, he quickly spotted their detective friend in the midst of packing up her fold-up chair, her footprint kit packed away at her side. He gave her a wave. "Detective Skye! I'm glad we caught you!"

"In a minute!" Ema grunted in reply, struggling with her chair before it finally gave way to her efforts and folded up properly. "There! You took your time getting back here! I was about to-!" As she looked up to properly tell off her visitors, her words stopped dead, and she gazed in silence for a moment. "Mister Wright!" Dropping her folded chair, she turned to the man standing slightly behind Luke with a massive grin on her face. "I wasn't expecting to see you today! I was going to go visit you in the hospital tomorrow morning before the trial! What are you doing out already? Are you alright?"

Phoenix laughed, waving off her concerns. "I checked myself out earlier this afternoon. Honestly, I'm perfectly healthy."

"He sprained his ankle," Luke filled in, giving his father a wry look. "I told him he didn't have to walk here on it, but he wanted to come."

While Phoenix scoffed at the idea, Ema gave Luke a thoughtful look. "So, uh, what happened to your brother and sister? Isn't Apollo the lawyer in your family?"

Luke nodded. "He is."

"If you hadn't guessed from their outfits, Apollo and Trucy are magicians," Phoenix filled in with a proud grin. "They had a show to do, so Luke offered to finish up a few lingering questions in their investigation before the trial tomorrow."

"And we came along to help!" Pearl brightly added, giving Ema a small bow. "My name is Pearl Fey! It's a pleasure to meet you, Detective Skye!"

Ema gave Pearl a friendly wave, apparently only now noticing her hiding behind Phoenix and Luke. "Hey there. You a friend?"

Pearl nodded. "Mm-hmm!"

"You could call her a cousin," Phoenix added, poking Pearl's cheek and making the teen giggle.

The introductions over with, Luke flipped open his satchel. "By the way Detective, I had something to ask you about."

"Ah, a discovery!" Ema replied, grinning with pride as she adjusted the glasses on top of her head. "I thought I recognised that look on your face!"

Luke giggled, and pulled out the slippers in one hand and the sandals in the other. "We found these sandals-"

Before Luke could finish his explanation, Ema had grabbed the left sandal, still half sticking out of its Luke nodded. "Could you possibly analyse them for us?"

"Of course!" Ema cheerfully chirped, taking the slippers as Luke offered them to her. "Do have the fingerprint powder still on you? I don't think I showed you how to do this!"

"O-oh, no," Luke nervously agreed, forcing a polite smile. "I was... looking around at the time." He then paused, confused. "Why? Don’t you have your own forensics kit to use?"

Phoenix chuckled, pulling from his pocket the small jar of fingerprint powder and its accompanying brush. "If there's one thing Ema here loves to do, it's teach people the scientific method."

"Pshaw," Ema mumbled, blushing as she waved off Phoenix's comment.

Pearl was biting at her thumbnail, looking slightly worried. "Um... what's 'forensicks'?"

Ema gasped, giving the spirit medium a shocked look. "You don't know!?" Before Pearl could do more than slightly shake her head, Ema was excitedly grinning again, shoving the shoes into her purse, grabbing the powder then Pearl's arm and dragging her away from Phoenix and Luke. "Oh man, have I got a whole new amazing world of science to show you! I'll teach you how to dust for prints! We are gonna have so much fun!"

Luke watched in bemusement as the two young women settled down on the concrete path under a streetlight and began to dab at the toe prints on the two left shoes. "What just happened?" he asked.

Phoenix hid a soft laugh. "Ema happened."

It took a minute or two for Pearl to finish dusting the two toe prints, and Ema collected them both on slides to enter into her machine. Once the second print had gone in, she fiddled with it for a moment, it whirred, then beeped. "MATCH FOUND."

"Bingo! Gosh, I'm good." Ema grinned, looking up at Luke watching from nearby. "A perfect match!" she repeated, then put away her device and began to collect up the shoes. "The same person wore these sandals and slippers!"

Luke nodded, giving her a grateful smile. "Thank you, Detective! That was a lot of help!"

"That was fun!" Pearl giggled as she helped put the slippers back in their evidence bag. "I like forensicking!"

"I'm sure Apollo will let you do as much 'forensicking' as you want in his next case," Phoenix said with a grin. "If you're around again, of course."

Pearl squealed in delight as she got to her feet, handing the slippers to Luke. "Oh, I hope I am!" she declared.

Ema looked more thoughtful as she also stood, giving Luke the lone sandal she had taken and watching him put the shoes back in his satchel. "'All you have to do now is find out who these sandals belong to!' she pointed out, then paused, turning more serious. "Or... do you already know?"

Luke hesitated. Should he tell her? Would Apollo be happy to let that get out, even though the detective was a friend? He doubted it. "I'm sorry," he eventually muttered, avoiding Ema's eyes. "I don't think Apollo would want me to tell you before I've even managed to tell him."

Ema stared a moment more, then nodded, holding out the fingerprint powder. "No hard feelings. With any luck, it'll be the person the glimmerous fop is calling as a witness tomorrow. They vaguely match your requirement of 'motive to murder', at least."

Phoenix raised an eyebrow, stepping forward to take the powder himself. "You know who the witness will be tomorrow?"

Ema bit her lip in thought. "Well... Since it's you asking, Mister Wright..." She nodded, making a decision and giving them a confident look. "Her name's Alita Tiala. I believe she's the defendant's fiancée."

Luke said nothing, closing his eyes as he crossed his arms.

Pearl gasped in surprise, a hand to her mouth. "Ms Tiala!?! But why would she be testifying against her special someone!?"

Phoenix watched Luke's reaction, frowning. "You have to wonder what Gavin's up to... And I get the feeling there's a lot more to this 'Tiala' woman than there appears to be," he said. "Am I correct, Luke?"

Luke felt everyone's eyes turning on him, but didn't move. "Apollo's had suspicions," he admitted. "I'd rather not say anything more."

Ema nodded once. "Then I hope you two know what you're doing," she said. "Good luck tomorrow."

As they approached the ramshackle house hidden in its dark corner next to the Meraktis Clinic, Luke spotted with relief their family friend out the front, seemingly in the midst of persuading his pet dog to go inside. "Mister Eldoon!" Luke called, waving to the man.

Eldoon looked up in surprise, standing up straight and crossing his arms with a smile as he waited for the trio to reach him. "Now this is a surprise," he said, and gave them a brief nod in greeting. "Luke, Pearly-girl. You doin' better, Phoenix?"

"Sure, I'm fine," Phoenix replied. "Nothing serious, like I said."

"I told him he didn't have to walk here on his sprained ankle," Luke explained, a heavy tone of disapproval in his voice, "but he insisted."

Phoenix sputtered a little in shock, but Eldoon laughed. "Phoenix, you're a stubborn one! I don't envy your doctor!"

"So," Eldoon continued, turning to Luke, "what's the matter, then?"

Luke paused a moment, then began to dig through his satchel for the medical chart. "We found something during our investigation," he explained. "I've looked over it, but I'm not a human doctor, and I'd prefer to have an expert take a second look." He managed to extract the folder from the bag and looked up in surprise to see Eldoon pressing his upside-down bowl hat over his eyes, mouth wibbling as he held back a sniff.

"Mister Eldoon!" Pearl cried in shock. "Are you okay!?"

"I'm just," Eldoon replied, sniffing again, "so happy! I thought my doctor days were gone for good."

Phoenix smiled sympathetically. "Always happy to relive the glory days, huh?"

"Yep," Eldoon sniffed again, looking to the ex-lawyer with a small smile. "You understand the feelin', don't you Phoenix?"

Luke hid a smile of his own behind opening the folder and pulling out the chart and x-ray ready for view. Once Eldoon seemed ready, he held out the small stack for the ex-doctor to take. "Here it is," he said. "All I've been able to make out is the basi-"

"A medical chart!?" Eldoon interrupted, recognising the layout of the page as he grabbed it to take a closer look. "You shouldn't go around taking these from clini-!" He then cut off his own protests, frowning deeply at the paper in his hands, a moment later switching it with the x-ray to stare intensely at that too.
Pearl was biting a thumbnail worriedly. "Mister Eldoon...?"

"What... What's going on here?" Eldoon muttered, his glare deepening as he switched back to the chart.

Phoenix hid a wry smile. "That's what we're asking you..."

"That chart belongs to Apollo's client," Luke explained. "He's in the detention centre right now, on trial for murder."

"On trial!?!" Eldoon cried, finally breaking his stare at the files to give Luke a horrified look. "That's crazy! You can't put him on trial! He's A.B.D.!!"

"A.B.D.?" Pearl repeated, confused.

"All but dead," Eldoon explained with a stern frown. "He's knocking on the Pearly Gates, and someone's about to answer."

Luke could only stare in surprise.

"It's that serious?" Phoenix asked, equally as surprised as his son. "That's for this bullet that was never removed, isn't it?"

Eldoon stared at the chart for another long moment, then reached up with one hand and pulled off his hat and its attached noodle-like wig, revealing cropped black hair underneath. "Well, permit me to speak as a surgeon," he said, pressing the bowl-hat to his chest momentarily before placing it on the nearby chair and turning to Luke. "You listen up good now, son."

"According to this chart," Eldoon continued, tapping at the paper as he read over it, "this 'Wocky Kitaki' feller's not doing so well. He's got a bullet right up side his heart!"

"Yes," Luke agreed with another nod. "It's his entire motive for attempting to murder Doctor Meraktis."

"But," Eldoon added, waving the chart and x-ray, "this chart talks about the post-op. In other words, the operation is already finished! But you can still see the bullet stuck in there!"

Phoenix was rubbing his chin in thought. "But why would it still be there after an operation to remove it?"

Eldoon stared at the chart for another long moment, then reached up with one hand and pulled off his hat and its attached noodle-like wig, revealing cropped black hair underneath. "Well, permit me to speak as a surgeon," he said, pressing the bowl-hat to his chest momentarily before placing it on the nearby chair and turning to Luke. "You listen up good now, son."

"Does the chart say that x-ray is post-op?" Luke asked, trying to get a second look at the x-ray. "I assumed it was pre-op."

"No, it's post-op alright; Whole thing's about his post-op care," Eldoon assured Luke, then turned to Phoenix. "'Bout the only reason I can think for it still bein' there is it was too tricky to operate on."

Pearl was watching the ongoing conversation with a worried look, getting more and more confused. "Why was it so hard to get out?" she asked. "Couldn't you just pull it out of the hole?"

Eldoon chuckled, shaking his head. "If only, Pearly-girl. Unfortunately, reality's much more complicated than that." He waved the x-ray, gesturing to the white spot of the bullet just off-centre. "That bullet's snug as a bug there next to the aorta, which is connected to the heart. Heck, that scrap of metal's just surrounded by blood vessels. Kind of a miracle." He sighed, shoving the plastic sheet back into the folder. "Two millimetres to either side and there'd be some serious bleeding going on in there. Not something yer average doc'd be eager to fiddle with."

"You mean...?" Pearl mumbled, still looking both worried and confused.

"It took a miracle to get that bullet stuck where it is," Eldoon explained. "It'd take more than a miracle to take it out. It'd take a magician."

Phoenix frowned in thought, fingers rubbing his chin.

Luke almost winced at the word Eldoon had chosen. "Both our magicians are... otherwise occupied," he muttered.

"Course, with the heart pumping and lungs working," Eldoon continued, "that bullet's on the move. I'd give him another half a year, tops."

"But his operation was already a half-year ago!" Pearl pointed out, glancing between Phoenix and Luke for confirmation. "That was how long it was, wasn't it?"

Eldoon sighed. "That's why I'm saying you're outta time! This kid shouldn't be on trial! He should be on an operating table!"

In the ensuing silence, Luke tried to assure himself not to worry - Although they'd known about Wocky's potential death from the errant bullet, they hadn't known it was quite so serious a threat. 'Mister Eldoon sure can be scary when he wants to be...'"

"But how could the doctor do such an awful thing?" Pearl asked, distressed. "He didn't tell anyone he left it behind?"

Eldoon shook his head, putting the chart back in its folder with the x-ray and handing the whole thing back to Luke. "I got a pretty good idea of how he felt," he said. "An emergency operation. He's got the kid's chest open on the table... then he finds that bullet." With another sigh, he reached for his bowl-hat, flipping it back onto his head so the noodle-like wig fell evenly either side of his face. "That's despair right there, Pearly-girl. Cold despair."

Pearl didn't reply, staring at the ground with her hands tightly clasped together in front of her.

"'Bout the only thing he could do is sew the boy back up," Eldoon continued. "He wasn't exactly in the situation to go admitting he couldn't take it out."

Phoenix nodded understandingly. "You don't say 'no' to a Kitaki."

"You bet," Eldoon agreed. "This kid's their only son, I hear." He didn't leave any kind of pause for a confirmation, already speaking again with, "So, he skips the operation, and Wocky's back on the street living his life. Course, it's only a matter of time before his heart haemorrhages and he drops cold."

Luke frowned, staring at the folder in his hands. "And they take him to Meraktis for answers."

Eldoon nodded. "He's got enough ties to them, he could probably cover up the truth of what happened."

"That's just terrible!" Pearl meekly cried. "He was going to let Mister Wocky die?"

Phoenix patted Pearl's back, giving her a sympathetic look. "There are a lot of terrible people in this world, Pearls. That's why Apollo's a defence attorney, and why I used to be one; We gotta protect the innocent from the evil out there."

Eldoon pressed his hat to his head, hiding his eyes. "When you're up against real evil, Pearly-girl... Well, it don't matter if you're weak or strong. It'll take you all the same."

Luke closed his eyes, thinking a moment before putting the chart away in his satchel. "What about you, Mister Eldoon? Could you operate on Wocky?"

Eldoon scoffed. "I wish. I'm afraid there ain't nobody in the country that could. Maybe not even in the world..."

Pearl sniffed. "So... Wocky...?"

"He's real lucky to be alive even now," Eldoon replied.

Phoenix patted Pearl's back as she wiped at her eyes; It seemed Eldoon's efforts to impress how dire Wocky's situation was had hit her especially hard. "Thanks for your help, Guy," Phoenix said. "Apollo should have this entire case sorted by tomorrow, and the police will finally release your noodle stand."

Eldoon sighed, looking away. "With any luck."

Phoenix's Office

"He was very firm about that, actually. It would be so difficult to get that bullet out that he doesn't think any surgeon in the country would be brave enough to try."

Apollo pressed a finger against his forehead, deep in thought. At his side on the sofa, Luke was putting away the medical chart and x-ray, finished with his explanations of all he had found while Apollo and Trucy were performing (a busy night as Trucy had predicted; In hindsight, he was glad he decided not to skip it). The pair had returned home only a few minutes ago to find Luke waiting for them in the office, and while Trucy ran off to find Phoenix and Pearl, Apollo sat down with his brother to put his badge back on his costume and learn Luke's findings. "And the whole time, Alita Tiala knew all about it," he muttered.

Luke nodded, his expression as stern as his brother's. "Exactly," he agreed.

"Why didn't she ever tell him?" Apollo wondered aloud. "If she knew he was in serious danger, you'd think she'd want to get that second operation before getting engaged! What was she thinking!?"

"She knew full well what she was doing," Luke pointed out with a glare into the distance. "Look at it from her point of view: The only son of the Kitaki Boss, a timer on his life no-one but you or the doctor know about... and he starts flirting with you? What would you do?"

Apollo looked over to his brother with a confused look. "If she was going to insist he propose, why not tell him the moment they got out of the clinic? It doesn't make sense!"
Luke closed his eyes, suddenly rather melancholy. "How did she end up in the noodle stand, Apollo?" he asked instead, changing the subject slightly. "There's only one way I can think of that all of this makes sense, and not one bit of it is pretty."

Apollo stared at his brother for a moment before looking away again, frowning in thought. 'So... Tiala somehow got the gun, took it to Meraktis... Then, leaving her sandals behind, they stole the noodle stand, went to the park... and while Meraktis was distracted by Wocky and Stickler, she shot him? Why!? And, despite being engaged to Wocky, she refused to talk about her old job or the ticking time-bomb near Wocky's heart?' He sighed, shaking his head. "Nothing about this makes sense."

"Ah, I know that feeling."

Apollo and Luke looked up in surprise to see their father (without his beanie now he was home for the night) had entered the room, giving them both a warm smile. "Dad?"

Phoenix chuckled, walking around to sit on the couch opposite his sons. "The investigation isn't going as well as you hoped, I take it?"

Sighing, Apollo nodded. "You could say that."

Luke stared at Phoenix a moment. "Papa, were you wanting to take over assisting Apollo in court?"

Apollo blinked in surprise, looking between his father and brother, trying not to look too hopeful. "You do!?"

Phoenix laughed. "Now why would I want to do that?" he insisted. "You two seem to have this case well in hand. I can't break up a dream team like you, can I?"

"O-oh," Apollo replied, turning red and rubbing at the back of his neck sheepishly as he hid his disappointment behind a grin. "Yeah. Of course."

Luke gave Phoenix a small smile. "If you insist, Papa."

"You'll do just fine," Phoenix assured them. "Tomorrow's trial is the final stretch. You have everything you need... You just need to use it."

View the Court Record/Luke's Notebook
There had been no sign of Wocky or his father in the lobby; Apollo had assured Luke the pair likely had their own lobby to argue in, but Luke had only grown slowly more worried as the time of the trial's start approached. Whatever was concerning him, Apollo couldn't say, but Luke had managed to hide it quite well before they separated from their family and friends - Phoenix, Trucy, Pearl, Clay, and Aria - who had headed to the gallery to cheer them on. When Apollo outright asked Luke what the matter was, the younger brother had simply insisted he was fine, and changed the subject by asking to do a quick Chords of Steel session before they left for court.

After the agonising wait in the lobby, finally the pair now found themselves stood behind the defence bench back in the top floor courtroom. Opposite them was Klavier, settling in behind the prosecutor's bench and idly organising his files. Above them, the judge sat down in his chair behind the podium, and rapped his gavel loudly to call the noisy room to order.

"Court is now in session for the trial of Wocky Kitaki."

Apollo nodded. "The defence is ready, Your Honour."

Klavier shrugged, playing with his fringe and looking every inch the smug rock-star. "Prosecution is warmed up, and it's a sold-out house."

The judge softly humphed to himself. "Very well, to recap: While yesterday's witnesses seemed more guilty than any other party-"

Apollo noticed Luke flinching a little at that. He reasoned that, to be fair, Stickler had been a dirty panty-snatcher.

"- we did find out one thing for certain," the judge continued. "There were no less than five people in the park at the time of the murder: The victim, the defendant, yesterday's two witnesses... and a mystery person." He looked between the two benches below. "Has either the prosecution or defence had any luck in tracking this mystery witness down?"

Apollo and Luke glanced at each other, unsure how to answer.

"No luck from either side, I take it," Klavier replied on their behalf, grinning proudly. "In which case, I'd like to do something a little new age: I'd like to look at this horrible crime... from the outside."

"The 'outside'?" Apollo repeated, confused.

Luke's frown slowly turned into a smile. "Ah, I see!"

"The acquisition of the murder weapon, the preparation for the act," Klavier continued, apparently ignoring the pair at the opposite bench. "Our poor defendant told all, you see... to his betrothed."

The judge looked as confused as Apollo felt. "His... bee trove?"
Klavier was nonplussed for a moment or two, then brushed at his fringe, hiding a small sigh. "His fiancée, Herr Judge," he replied. "His partner for life, with no chance for parole."

Luke hid a snort of laughter, only seeming more amused by the raised eyebrow Apollo was giving him. "That's one way of putting it!" he whispered.

"Very well," the judge agreed, "you may show the, erm, 'lucky' lady to the stand."

In the pause as Alita was summoned, Apollo turned on his brother. "Okay, what exactly is so funny?"

"Don't you see?" Luke asked, a wide grin on his face. "I think Gavin's figured out who was in the noodle stand, too! He's pretending he hasn't to not tip her off!"

Apollo shook his head. "I highly doubt that. He'll be working with Tiala to 'explain away' all the inconsistencies with his story, to get Wocky declared guilty!"

"That's kind of his job to argue Wocky's guilt," Luke pointed out. "Remember what I outlined in yesterday's trial? I said the person in the stand had to have a connection to both the victim and defendant, and Tiala fits that to a tee!"

"We may know that, but Gavin sure doesn't!" Apollo argued, then sighed, crossing his arms. "He's planning something, I'm sure of it..."

Luke just smiled and shook his head. "Believe what you want, Apollo."

The crowds in the gallery quietened as the bailiffs escorted a young woman in yellow to the stand, where she stood solemnly, her gaze straight ahead.

"Your name and occupation, Fraulein," Klavier requested.

"Alita Tiala," the young woman replied, then smiled. "My occupation... is future wife."

The judge sighed nostalgically. "Ah, traditional values! I respect that." He huffed disapprovingly. "Too many brides these days can't even weave baskets blindfolded underwater!" Before anyone could react aloud to his comment, he was giving Alita a confused look. "Yet you're here today as a witness for the prosecution?"

"To be honest, I didn't want to testify at first," Alita explained with a sheepish shrug. "But... I couldn't hide the truth."

The judge hummed in thought, then nodded approvingly. "Honesty!" he declared. "Another admirable trait."

Apollo noticed Luke muttering darkly to himself, but decided not to ask; As far as he could tell, Alita had yet to actually lie in trial.

Klavier gave Alita a long, hard look. "Fraulein, is it true that, on the day of the crime, the defendant Wocky Kitaki confessed his plans? His plans... for murder?"

Alita returned Klavier's stare, then nodded. "Yes."

Apollo wasn't surprised this appeared to be true: They all knew Wocky's very real desire for revenge, even if the defence believed it had never worked out. It was arguing it hadn't that was the problem.

"The witness will please give her testimony to the court!" the judge demanded.
Alita gave a quick smile, but looked too worried to hold it long. "It was the day that the family health check-up results came back," she explained. "When Wocky found out that Doctor Meraktis had lied, he flew into a rage. 'I'll teach him!' he said. He took one of the Family's pistols, and... And, you already know what happened that night." She shook her head. "I... just don't see how anyone but Wocky could have done it."

Again, Apollo was almost surprised by how closely Alita was sticking to the truth. The only thing he'd picked up as a lie was her final sentence.

"So the pistol did belong to the Kitaki Family, then..." the judge mused aloud.

"Yes," Klavier replied, as serious as could be. "With regards to this, an investigation is underway at the Kitaki mansion, on charges of the possession of illegal firearms."

Apollo rolled his eyes. 'Maybe, this time, they could pick up Missus Kitaki's broom while they're at it?'

The judge nodded. "And the bullet that took the victim's life? Was it...?"

"Fired from the pistol the defendant procured?" Klavier picked up, finishing the judge's unspoken question. "Yes, this has been proven."

"Rifling marks, I assume?" Luke asked, scratching his goatee.

Klavier nodded. "What else?"

Apollo turned his attention to Alita. "And when did you first hear about Wocky's plan?"

"It was the day of the murder," Alita replied, fiddling with the bow on her wrist and looking every inch the nervous fiancée. "I... I should have stopped him! I just didn't think he would actually do it!"

The judge was clearly taken in by the act, and Apollo couldn't blame him. "Very well," the old man said, giving her a sympathetic look, then he waved to the defence bench. "The defence may begin the cross-examination."

Apollo gave the judge a nod, even if, technically, he'd already asked a question. His next was another clear one: "Ms Tiala... Is it easy to take a pistol out from the house?"

Alita paused in thought. "Not really, I think," she replied. "There's a system in place to limit access." She then smiled sweetly. "But Wocky's a special case, being the next-in-line."

Apollo raised an eyebrow, and could hear Luke's muffled giggles on his right. He was almost tempted to laugh himself. 'A wannabe gangster like him with a taste for... sweets?'

"The point here," the judge pointed out, "being that Wocky had access to a pistol." He waved at Apollo to continue.

Rolling his eyes, Apollo returned his full attention to Alita. "And how can you say that for certain?" he asked. "That only Wocky could have committed this murder?"
Alita's smile faded, and she was opening her mouth to speak before being interrupted by a shout of "Objection!" from the prosecution. "Herr Forehead, you will refrain from badgering the Fraulein," Klavier ordered with a stern look. "It was the defendant," he paused, "erm, Wocky, was it, who took the pistol from his home. We know this for a fact now."

The judge looked thoughtful. "I suppose we do."

Klavier's frown turned slightly upwards. "So, how could anyone else have used this pistol to shoot the victim? They could not." The small smile turned into a full-out grin. "Simple logic, ja?"

"That does seem to be the case," the judge agreed. "Does the defence have anything to say regarding this point?"

Apollo resisted the urge to sigh. "Yes, it does!" He turned to Alita with a frown. "Based on your testimony, there was clearly another; One other person had access to that pistol!"

Klavier's grin didn't change, snapping his fingers rhythmically. "What's this?"

The judge's eyebrows shot up as he grunted, impressed. "Interesting! Tell the court who this other person with access was, defence!"

Apollo couldn't resist a slightly smug smile, turning to the witness stand with arms crossed. "Well, of course, I mean you, Ms Tiala."

Alita's eyes widened as she stared at Apollo. It took her a moment to formulate a reply. "M-me...? But why-"

"You were quite clear when you told the court," Apollo interrupted, not in the mood for an excuse and too proud of the angle he had found to hesitate at opening up the field to the questions he really wanted to ask. "You heard about the pistol from the defendant on the day of the murder. In other words, you knew what he was planning."

"Objection!" came another cry from Klavier, who closed his eyes in thought, snapping his fingers. "Let me get this straight: You intend to tell us that this lady stole the pistol from her fiancé and killed a man in cold blood on his behalf?" He paused to laugh, the gallery even deciding to join in in his amusement. "I've heard of people doing strange things for love, but this?"

The judge raised an eyebrow in agreement. "It does seem a bit... unfathomable, to be sure. I'm all for romance, and for supporting your partner in life, but I think I would hesitate at murder!"

Apollo closed his eyes and held back a sigh. "I'd hope you'd do more than hesitate!" "But what if a different connection could be proven?" he argued. "A connection between the witness and the victim? We might find that she had a personal motive beyond wanting to help her fiancé."

Klavier smiled. "Hmm, that would put things in a slightly different light." He flipped his hair, looking genuinely curious. "What possible connection are you suggesting here?"

"Just as I thought," Luke muttered with a smile to his brother. "The police didn't even think to look in that safe."

Apollo shot his brother a smile, then turned to the court with arms crossed in pride. "I have evidence showing a connection between the witness Ms Tiala and the victim!" he announced, then threw out a hand, "Take that!" The crowd gasped as, out of seemingly nowhere, the medical chart appeared in the magician's grasp, and Apollo held it high as Luke quickly tapped at the Court Record to bring up the pictures they'd taken of the chart on the room's holograms.
The judge leaned forward as he examined the images. "That looks like... a medical chart?"

A triumphant grin on his face as he watched Alita's frozen expression, Apollo lowered the chart in his hand to the bench. "Found inside a safe at the Meraktis Clinic," he explained, then tapped at the screen to zoom in and highlight the 'doctor' and 'nurse' fields at the top. "I'd like to draw the court's attention to the names written on the chart."

A gasp rang through the room. "What!?" the judge cried, and turned his attention to the witness stand with a frown. "Ms Tiala! Whatever... Why is your name on this chart!?"

There was a pause as Alita failed to react, sweating nervously.

"Well? Care to explain the meaning of this, Ms Tiala?" Apollo asked.

Alita stood frozen at the stand, the court's attention on her as everyone awaited her words...

Alita pulled herself out of her shock, a sneer on her face as she crossed her arms. "I'm not sure what you mean by 'meaning', Mister Wright!"

Apollo's triumphant smile faded to a stern frown. 'Doesn't take much to freeze up the warm little fiancée act, does it?'

"I was on staff at that clinic until half a year ago," Alita snapped as explanation. "It was boring. So I quit. That's all. Is there a problem with that?"

The judge, to Apollo's surprise, looked furious. "Ms Tiala! You testified that you had no connection to the victim!"

"And I don't," Alita replied with a shrug, shooting the old man a glare. "Now."

Apollo raised an eyebrow, shutting down the holograms. "Now?" he repeated.

"I quit half a year ago, didn't I?" Alita explained, rolling her eyes. "So there's no connection!" She sighed, turning her glare back to the judge. "Let me guess, you're the kind of guy who can't rest until he knows every last detail of his girlfriend's past, am I right!?"

The judge's anger faded in a heartbeat, and he looked genuinely hurt by the accusation. "Th-that's not true at all! Why, I... I embrace the ones I love, past flaws and all, no matte-"

"Objection!" Apollo shouted, slamming his fists on the bench to bring the judge's ramblings to a halt and glaring at the woman on the stand. "'There's no connection now' doesn't fly in a court of law."

"Doesn't... fly?" Alita repeated, her frown intensifying at the young lawyer.

Apollo turned to his brother, who gave him a quick nod and wordlessly turned his attention to his satchel. They both knew what was coming. "You left your job at the Meraktis Clinic, true," Apollo told Alita, "but you remained connected somehow!"

"Very well, Mister Wright," the judge spoke up, looking intrigued. "Show us evidence that proves the witness is still connected to the Meraktis Clinic!"

Apollo looked to Luke just as his brother was pulling the shoes out of his satchel. After a quick pause to tug the protective plastic off the left one, the vet placed the high-heeled sandals on the bench, in full view of the curious court. Apollo simply smiled, gesturing to the footwear with one hand. "These sandals were found in the Meraktis Clinic lobby," he explained to Alita. "They're yours, aren't they?"

Alita's smugness had vanished. "W-well, who knows?" she insisted, playing with the ribbon on her wrist. "I'm sure there are lots of people with those sandals..."

A chuckle from the prosecutor's bench attracted everyone's attention to Klavier, who was shaking his head with an amused grin. "So sorry, Fraulein," he said, not looking at all apologetic, "but your act isn't working. Your moment of hesitation just now cost you."

Alita stared at him for a moment in shock, then glared. "Wh-what's with you? I thought you were on my side!"

Klavier raised an eyebrow, but didn't respond to her accusing remarks. "Perhaps you are unaware that toes leave 'toe prints'?" he asked, gesturing to the sandals. "A simple analysis of these sandals will reveal all."

There was a long silence, then Alita scoffed, crossing her arms again. "Well, now we see your true colours," she darkly muttered. "I was wrong to cooperate with you from the beginning! I just wanted..." Her anger faded back into the 'scared fiancée' act, her fingers resting on her cheeks. "I just wanted you to help get Wocky back on the straight and narrow."

The judge hummed in thought, giving her a stern look. "This court thinks you need to worry less about Wocky and more about yourself," he said. "It sounds as though we need to hear a bit more about your story."

"Your sandals were found in the entrance to the clinic," Apollo sternly reminded Alita, "which means you went there on the day of the murder!"

Alita sighed. "Well, there's little point in denying it."

"Very well," the judge said with a nod. "The witness will tell us about this visit. Why did you go to the Meraktis Clinic that day?"

The young woman looked away for a moment. "I did go to the clinic that day," she admitted, her hands held together close to her chest. "My first time in half a year, since I quit in January. I went to warn him. After all, I knew Wocky had the pistol."

Apollo felt his bracelet suddenly tighten on his wrist.

"The doctor always was a timid man," Alita continued, looking somewhat disdainful but also a little mournful for her former employer. "Too timid to admit to his own mistake."

The judge paused a moment. "By 'mistake', you mean the mistake we heard about from the defendant? The botched operation?"

Alita nodded, looking calmer. "He was a timid, small man," she repeated, "but I never wished him harm. I just thought I should let him know, you know?"

The judge hummed in thought, then nodded. "That does make sense."

Klavier had his eyes closed, silently musing to himself, then snapped his fingers to attract attention, giving Alita a neutral stare. "Yes, but there is still one thing which does not."

"You mean her sandals, Mister Gavin?" Luke asked, a smile on his face. "I imagine you have a reason of your own for why she didn't wear them home from the clinic."
Apollo shot his brother an annoyed look. 'Don't encourage him!'

Klavier smirked, irritatingly proud of himself. "Ah, I see you are getting to know me, Herr Doktor!"

The judge looked surprised. "That's a good point!" he said, apparently only just noticing the problem. "If it were me, I would have worn those sandals home!"

"As would anyone." Klavier agreed. "So, why were the sandals left behind?" He looked to Alita, who was again frozen behind the stand, carefully watching the discussion before her. "There's probably a good explanation for this, right, Ms Tiala?" he suggested when she remained silent. "Say, for instance... there happened to be a similar pair of sandals there which you wore home by mistake?"

Alita stared for a moment more, then smugly smiled again, resting a hand on her hip. "Actually, that's right," she replied. "I'm impressed, Mister Gavin."

Klavier chuckled, shaking his head. "Oh, it is nothing." He then shot a grin at Apollo. "There is, after all, no other possible explanation. Ja, Forehead?"

Apollo resisted the sudden urge to punch his pretty-boy opponent in the face.

"Stay calm, Apollo," came Luke's reassuring voice from Apollo's right. "He's just challenging us to present the real reason why."

"Can he not do it by blocking us from doing exactly that!?" Apollo hissed at his brother in return.

"The defence may begin the cross-examination," the judge announced.

Apollo sighed, deciding to just get to work; He had a few clarifying questions to ask before tackling the big one. "Around what time did you go to the clinic?"

"I don't remember exactly," Alita replied with a shrug, "but it was after nine thirty, I think."

'No sign of a lie yet...'. Apollo nodded. "And that was the first time you had contacted Doctor Meraktis in half a year?"

"Of course it was," Alita sighed, badly hiding a roll of her eyes. "He wasn't the kind of boss you made 'friends' with."

"Did you want him to run away?"

Alita paused a moment, shrugging again. "Well, after I failed to stop Wocky, I thought that was the only other way to avoid the problem," she admitted.

"Couldn't you have called?" Apollo pressed on. "Why go in person?"

"I called several times that evening, but no one was in," Alita explained, looking, to Apollo's surprise, genuinely sorrowful. He mused she must have felt more affection for her former employer than she'd realised.

"The victim was busy driving home until after nine PM that night, remember?" Klavier chimed in. "This was proven by the mirror yesterday, ja?"

Alita wasn't paying attention, staring into the distance. "I thought if I warned him, he would run away for sure."
Apollo closed his eyes. As mournful as she was about the doctor's death, he wasn't going to let himself forget she'd most likely been the cause. It was time to pin her on her 'dark secret'. He looked up with a glare. "Ms Tiala," he said, tapping at his Court Record to bring up the chart again on the holograms. "This chart was found inside a safe in the doctor's office."

Alita glared back at the young lawyer, a single eyebrow raised. "Yes?"

"Why would this one chart be in that safe?" Apollo pointed out. "Ms Tiala, you know why it was, don't you?"

The young woman didn't reply, beginning to sweat.

The judge frowned at his screen, confused. "Mind filling me in?"

Apollo nodded. "Doctor Meraktis didn't have the leisure of making 'mistakes','" he pointed out, withdrawing the chart again from the screens. "That's why he wrote up a false report, and kept the truth locked away."

Klavier smiled absently to himself. "Bad Herr Doktor."

"And this is where you come in, Ms Tiala," Apollo continued, turning to the woman on the stand. "The nurse who filed this chart was you, which means you knew about Wocky's failed operation!"

The judge's eyebrows shot up, impressed. "Interesting..."

"You were in the same position as Doctor Meraktis!" Apollo added, pointing accusingly at Alita. "Kind of makes it hard to claim 'no connection', doesn't it?"

Despite her earlier fear, Alita seemed confident, giving the young lawyer a smug smile as she crossed her arms. "You're bold for a novice, I'll give you that." Before Apollo could reply, she was scoffing at him. "Mister Wright, you must know I was only a nurse. The doctor is responsible for the chart's contents."

The judge hummed in thought. "This chart business seems to be quite important," he decided. "Please amend your testimony accordingly."

Alita gave Apollo a smirk. "Too bad, little attorney."

Apollo just glared at her in return, one hand on his bracelet. He wasn't going to waste time wondering why, but something told him he needed absolute focus for whatever the former nurse was about to say. He barely registered the courtroom around him disappearing into blackness as the young woman's every movement filled his vision.

"Honestly," Alita was continuing, innocently clasping her hands together at her chest with a sweet smile, "why would I go to the clinic now for a half-year-old chart?"

There it was. Apollo couldn't resist a smirk of his own as he turned his attention up to meet the woman's gaze. "Why go now, you ask? But you know why you would go 'now', don't you."

Alita stared evenly back at him. "I don't know what you're talking about."

"It was quite clear, Ms Tiala," Apollo continued. "You have a nervous habit: The moment you said the word 'now', you used your right thumb to fiddle with your ring."

"Wh-what?" Alita asked, both surprised and confused.
Apollo was too proud of himself for using his own ability to bypass the need to ask Luke for help to stop now. "The chart wasn't a part of your past, it was a clear and present threat!"

"That's ridiculous!" Alita scoffed. "Why, if that were the case, I would have had six months to do something about it!"

"Indeed," Apollo agreed, surprising the young woman into silence. "Which means something happened quite recently... Something to make that chart a problem for you now."

Alita didn't reply, sweating behind the stand.

"Ms Tiala, there's no use trying to hide it," Apollo continued, reaching for his Court Record resting on the defence bench. "The chart became a threat to you now... because of this."

View the Court Record
On the holograms, the doctor's report that Klavier had submitted back at the beginning of the trial came into view, and Apollo was careful to highlight its date, the same day as the murder. "A health check-up report, belonging to the defendant," Apollo explained with a confident smile. "The Kitakis are trying to get out of the business. The health check-up this month was their first ever." The smile turned into a smirk, his eyes having never left Alita's. "What did you think when you heard about this?"

Alita was still sweating, avoiding eye contact. "Oh, n-nothing," she insisted. "Why should I think anything?"

"Oh?" Apollo replied, his voice slowly getting louder as his argument gained traction. "I would think you were positively beside yourself. Because you were afraid. You knew what Wocky's chest x-ray would reveal!"

The young woman made a gurgling noise as she failed to construct a reply.

"A full half year had passed since the operation," Apollo still continued, staring her down as he refused to stop until he'd made his point. "You thought you were home free... when the chart," he grabbed the file, waving it at the witness stand, "came back to haunt you!"

Finally, Alita screamed, clutching her head as she leaned back, before her own cry was strangled as she twisted around, refusing to look in Apollo's direction.

Apollo felt a sudden swell of light-headedness as the courtroom came back into focus around him, and pressed a hand to the bench to keep from visibly swaying, the chart falling from his grasp. "That's all, Your Honour," he managed to add with the same strength as his previous speech. 'Note to self: No matter how excited you are, remember to stop focussing once you have what you need...'

A hand rested on Apollo's arm, and he turned his head to see Luke giving him a proud smile. "That was brilliant," the young vet whispered. "You really are better at this than you think, Apollo!"

Apollo could only sheepishly smile in return.

The judge seemed confused. "Wh-what just happened?" he asked. "Did... the witness just admit to lying?"

Klavier was watching the defence team with, to Apollo's surprise, an impressed smile. "I sensed it. There was a great 'aura' emanating from Herr Forehead." He gave them a nod. "Very cool." Before Apollo could even think to formulate a reply through the shock, Klavier had turned to Alita, who was leaning on the stand with a nervous grimace. "So, the lady was lying, it seems," he continued, seeming unsurprised.

Apollo quickly nodded, shoving his confusion over the enigmatic prosecutor to the side. "That's correct. She said she had no connection to the Meraktis Clinic, but her connection was deep indeed... a bit too deep." He forced himself to stand up straight to at least fake his earlier energy, which was thankfully slowly returning after his accidental over-exertion. Grabbing the chart, he again waved it at Alita. "If the Kitakis got a hold of this chart with her name, she'd be finished. Isn't that right, Ms Tiala?"

Alita paused, then sighed, standing up straight herself and brushing off her dress with a glare. "You guessed it," she darkly muttered in admittance.

The gallery broke into excited chatter, forcing the judge to bang his gavel to call for order. Apollo barely noticed, shooting Luke a happy grin as he placed the chart back on the bench. 'I-I did it! I broke her testimony!'

"Wait!"

Apollo almost jumped in surprise at the interruption.

"Ms Tiala?" the judge asked, peering down at the one who had spoken.

Alita was once again standing confidently behind the stand, her hand, which had been held out as she called for attention, coming to rest at her side. "It's true, that chart was bad news for me," she announced. "That's why I went to meet the doctor that day! But that's all! I told him about Wocky and went home! Nothing happened!"

Apollo felt his bracelet twinging again and resisted the urge to sigh.

Klavier grinned as he watched Alita. "It appears this cross-examination is far from over." He turned to Apollo and Luke. "She hid the truth from us, this is clear; Yet it is not clear that this truth has anything to do with the case at hand!"

'And I bet if she hadn't said something, you would have...' Apollo darkly mused, glaring at the prosecutor.

The judge nodded. "Very well. The witness will add this to her testimony... and we'll have a bit more cross-examination." He gestured to Apollo to continue.

Luke patted Apollo's arm. "Don't panic. This is what we've been waiting for, after all."

"Waiting for?" Apollo repeated, raising an eyebrow at his brother. "Waiting for what?"

"To ask her about the confrontation with Doctor Meraktis," Luke replied, smiling. "Remember the mess in that office? Something certainly happened while she was there."

Apollo paused a moment to think, finger pressed to his forehead. 'Told him about Wocky and went home, huh? True, I shouldn't have needed my bracelet to tell me that was a lie.' He looked up to where Alita was standing, arms crossed as she gave him a wary glare. "You say 'nothing happened' in the doctor's office," he said. "I disagree." With another magician's flourish, he produced from thin air the small baggy containing the squashed bullet from the safe, eliciting gasps from the gallery as he held it high. "Take a look at this."

Alita wrinkled up her nose as she leaned forward to examine the tiny lump of metal. "What's that? It looks like a squished-up ball of clay." She smirked, looking to Apollo. "Kind of like you, actually."

Apollo ignored her comment, still holding the tiny bag where all could see it. "This bullet was found in the Meraktis Clinic office," he explained. "Something did 'happen' in that office, Ms Tiala!"

"Objection!" came a cry from Klavier, who gave Apollo a stern look as he threw out a pointer finger.
"Enough of this joking around. The police investigated that clinic."

"Objection!" Apollo shot back, tossing the bullet to his right hand to point with his left in return. "Ah, but this was stuck inside the doctor's safe."

Klavier blinked in surprise. "Inside the safe...?" He then shook his head, banging a fist against the wall behind him. "Objection! But there is a problem. How can you say that bullet was fired on that day?"

"Objection!" Apollo again shouted, smiling to himself. "Were't you the one who brought up rifling marks earlier?" Before Klavier could do more than wince in shock, Apollo was continuing: "The pistol was taken from the Kitaki Mansion that day. If the marks on this bullet," he waved it at the court again, "match the murder weapon, then that proves a firearm was discharged in that office on the day of the murder!"

The judge banged his gavel. "Bailiff! Have this bullet analysed immediately!" A bailiff ran to the defence bench, where Apollo handed over the tiny lump of metal. As the official scurried away out of the room, the judge nodded decisively. "It will certainly take a while for us to hear any results, and I don't see anything worth questioning the witness about until then. Indeterminate recess!" Another bang of the gavel, and the trial was temporarily suspended.

June 17, 11:13AM
Defendant Lobby No. 2

The Wright brothers sat side by side on the dull brown sofa in the lobby. Again, there was no sign of Wocky or his father, but Apollo was no longer surprised by that. His lack of sleep from the previous night (he hadn't fallen asleep until one in the morning, and woke up around five from a nightmare) was combining with the over-exertion from using his unique ability for too long in court, so he slumped back in his seat and closed his eyes. If he did manage to doze off, he trusted Luke to wake him in time for the trial to resume.

Next to Apollo, Luke sat with his hands neatly folded in his lap, gaze locked on his knees. He sighed, frowning deeply in worry. "This is it," he muttered. "The final stretch."

Apollo pulled one eye open to check on his brother. "Yeah," he agreed, closing it again as he deemed the problem to be simple nerves. "Just need to prove she was at the clinic, then we can jump to putting her in the noodle stand."

Luke didn't respond for a long moment. "Wocky's gonna hate us."

"Yep," Apollo sighed, keeping his eyes closed this time. "He wants us to declare him guilty; Of course he's going to get mad."

There was another pause. "I didn't mean about that."

Apollo frowned, then reluctantly lifted his head from the back of the lounge, watching his brother carefully. "About what, then?"
Luke stared solemnly into the distance, slowly leaning forward in his seat. "You haven't noticed?"

Resisting the urge to strangle his brother for being so evasive, Apollo sat up straight, giving Luke a stern look. "Luke, tell me what the problem is," he ordered. "What's wrong?"

"All the similarities are piling up and there's nothing we can do to help him," Luke muttered, squeezing his eyes shut in an attempt to prevent tears. "We're about to ruin his life, Apollo..."

Apollo was about to ask his brother in frustration to just say what the problem was when it finally hit him, and he gasped. "L-Luke, no, of course not!" He jumped to comfort his brother, putting an arm around his shoulders. "We're about to save his life! He can't have that operation in jail, can he!? And we're protecting him from Tiala this way!" When Luke didn't immediately respond, he pulled his brother closer. "Luke... we didn't ruin your life. Why would this be ruining Wocky's?"

Luke was silent a moment more, but did lean into his brother's embrace. "It felt like it at the time," he admitted. "And the way Mister Eldoon was talking, it didn't sound like Wocky would even survive an operation... He could drop dead right now-!"

"But he won't!" Apollo insisted. "C'mon Luke, he'll be fine! He'll survive this, just like you did, and he'll be grateful in the long run!"

"But what if there's not-!"

"And what if there is?" Apollo interrupted. He sighed, wondering what best to say that would cheer up his brother. "This... This is what being an attorney's about. It's helping people, being on their side when no-one else is, when even they aren't. We're fighting for the truth here. We can't back down from that."

There was a very long pause. Luke didn't react.

Slowly, Apollo gave his brother a grin... then sucked as much air into his lungs as he could to shout, "You're Luke Wright and you're fine!"

Luke jumped a little, looking up at Apollo with wide eyes, then, a moment later, softly giggled at the gleeeful expression on his brother's face. "Haven't we already done Chords of Steel today?"

"Hey, since when is there a rule saying you can't do it more than once a day?" Apollo pointed out, crossing his arms. "Which one of us made this thing up again? Just gotta be careful not to blow your voice out, that's all."

After a short pause, Luke giggled again. "Alright. I suppose another session won't hurt." He got to his feet, giving Apollo a genuine smile. "We gotta be in top spirits to protect Wocky, after all!"

"That's the spirit!" Apollo laughed, and he jumped to his feet to join his brother.
The moment the report returned to the courthouse, summons were sent out for the trial to resume, and the crowds once more gathered in the gallery. As Apollo and Luke found their places back behind the bench, they both mused it felt like no time at all had passed since they left, with Klavier patiently waiting opposite them and Alita huffing nervously at the witness stand.

Above everyone, the judge lowered himself into his seat at the judge's podium, a small piece of paper in his hand. He banged his gavel to quieten the crowds, "Court is now back in session!" then turned his full attention back to the paper. "Now, I'm sure everyone remembers where we left off," he said. "The report has returned from the analysis of the bullet found in the safe." He cleared his throat, then read out, "The rifling marks on both bullets are identical." He nodded decisively, placing the paper down on his desk. "Well. It seems as though the bullet in the safe was fired from the murder weapon."

Klavier stood with his eyes closed, deep in thought.

"Perhaps the defence would like to state their position?" the judge offered.

Apollo nodded, taking a moment to formulate his thoughts. "The bullet in that safe proves one fact: A pistol was fired in that office on that day, and, at the time of the firing, the safe was open... the safe which contained the top secret chart."

"Do you think someone was threatening Doctor Meraktis?" the judge asked. "In order to open the safe?"

"Only one person was in a position to do such a thing," Apollo replied, then threw out a finger to point at the witness stand. "Our witness, Alita Tiala!"

The gallery erupted into loud discussion, forcing the judge to bang his gavel repeatedly. "Order! Order! Order!" When the crowds finally quietened, he turned to the defence bench. "Mister Wright! Where are you going with this? Are you accusing the witness!?"

Apollo took a deep breath. 'Here we go.' "Alita Tiala knew about Wocky Kitaki's botched operation! She got engaged to him without telling him about it!" He banged his fists on the bench to punctuate his point. "As long as that bullet remained in his chest, his days were numbered. What if she married him, and then the bullet finally reached its destination?"

The gallery gasped. "Wh-what!?" the judge agreed.

"That reminds me," Klavier cut in, snapping his fingers. "Apparently, the Kitakis have been asserting themselves in lawful business practises. They're making quite a great deal of money." He turned to Alita with a smile. "A fortune, if you will."

Alita looked away, frowning uncomfortably.

"Nefarious!" the judge commented. "So she planned to marry him just to get her hands on this fortune?"

There was a sudden slam from the defence side of the courtroom, and nineteen-year-old Wocky Kitaki charged in the direction of the defence bench, shouting "Objection!" just as a pair of bailiffs jumped in his way, grabbing the teen and just barely managing to hold him as he struggled in their grip, shaking an angry fist at Apollo and Luke. "You keep talking trash about my Alita and... and I'll sue you, lawyer-man!"

Apollo could only stare at the teen with a mix of shock and fear of what would happen should Wocky slip out of the bailiffs' grip. "Huh? Me?"

"Yeah!" Wocky shouted back, face red. "You said... You said you'd... you'd..." He shook his head, his anger impeding his ability to speak. "You'd abuse my Alita!"

"N-no, accuse!" Apollo corrected. "We're accusing her!"

Wocky didn't seem to be listening. "Same difference!"

Luke slipped past Apollo, moving towards Wocky with a sympathetic look. "Wocky, please, I know this is-"

"Is this what you were talking about yesterday!?" the teen demanded, turning his attention to Luke and starting to sound frantic. "Well I don't want it! You keep your hands off my Alita, or I'll-!" Abruptly, he stopped talking, and, in the silence, everyone could hear the muffled giggles that had given the teen pause. As Wocky slowly turned his head to the witness stand, so too did the attention of the court change its focus to the laughing young woman in the centre of the room, a hand pressed to her face as she doubled over, failing to hide her grin.

The judge frowned, confused. "Ms... Tiala?"

Alita stopped bothering to hide her amusement, waving a hand. "I-I'm sorry," she said, not looking at all apologetic as she dabbed tears from her eyes. "I just... It's been so long since I've laughed so hard."

Alita didn't seem to hear him, waving her hand dismissively as she turned to Wocky with a smirk, speaking to him as though to a particularly dim-witted child. "Wocky. Wake up and smell reality!"

Wocky seemed frozen, staring at his fiancée almost uncomprehendingly. "A... Alita-baby?" At his side, Luke was waving away the bailiffs, giving the teen some room.

"The signature on the chart, the engagement," Alita pointed out with a snort of laughter. "I mean, come on! It's so obvious!" She raised a mocking eyebrow, giving Wocky a sneer. "Even for a brainless, spoiled brat such as yourself."

Klavier was fiddling with his hair, giving Alita a stern look. "Your honesty is like a breath of foul air, Fraulein."

Alita waved a hand dismissively, turning away from Wocky to face the room at large. "Hey, I wasn't getting out of this clean, anyway."
"So," Apollo spoke up, refocussing on the case to let Luke take care of their client, "the Family fortune is what you're really after."

"That's right," Alita readily admitted. "I wanted the money."

"No way!" Wocky cried with a trembling voice, almost jumping towards Alita before Luke held him back, but, this time, the teen made no effort to struggle, staring at his fiancée with wide eyes. "That's wack! I ain't trying to hear that!"

Alita didn't even dignify the teen with her attention, pointedly facing away from him as she muttered, "Should have done the wedding earlier. Oh well."

Luke was guiding Wocky back to the side-room, muttering something to the teen that Apollo couldn't make out - He assumed some kind of comforting words. A part of him wanted to be upset his 'help' was 'abandoning' him at such a critical stage of the case, but he supposed no-one was better suited to help their client right now than Luke.

"By the way," Alita continued, turning to Apollo with arms crossed, "can I ask you a question?"

Apollo blinked in surprise. "Who, me?"

Alita smirked. "I believe you said you were going to abuse me?"

At that, Apollo gave her an unamused stare. "Accuse."

"Of what crime, might I ask?" Alita shot back, still smirking. At Apollo's sudden confused look, she continued, "Oh, I'm a bad girl, sure. I got close to that brat because I wanted his money. But he was the one with the pistol. He could've fired it into the safe after I'd already left the clinic."

Apollo was almost too surprised at the claim to respond, a hand on his bracelet as he felt it subtly tighten on his wrist. "What...?"

"I would never do a thing like that," Alita insisted. "It was definitely that silly brat."

More twinges from his bracelet, but Apollo wasn't sure where to even begin with a counter-argument. "Wait, but..."

"Your lies end here, Miss Tiala."

Everyone turned in surprise to see Luke emerging from the side-room again, a cold glare fixed on the woman at the witness stand. "L-Luke?" Apollo muttered.

"Wocky didn't know that chart existed," Luke was continuing, standing firm by the defence bench. "None of the Kitakis did. Only you and Doctor Meraktis knew where it was hidden, and no-one had more to lose than you if it was uncovered."

Alita stared at him a moment before huffing, faking a confident sneer. "But I didn't have a pistol now, did I?"

"You may not own a pistol," Luke conceded, his glare never failing, "but the Kitakis certainly did. Your fiancé had one that very night." He crossed his arms. "To live as one of them for so long was quite the con, Miss Tiala. I wouldn't think you'd be above some idle thievery."

Alita's false confidence was starting to fade. "Well, you'd think he'd have mentioned if he'd lost that pistol, no? All I've heard him do is boast about how guilty he is!"
Apollo half-wanted to object that that was only because Wocky put so much value into his 'gangster' reputation, but he decided not to.

"Actually, Wocky couldn't recall if he had the pistol on him when he was in the park," Luke coldly replied. "He can't recall the murder at all. It was too traumatising even for him."

Alita rolled her eyes. "Oh how convenient for him..."

"Sorry to intrude in this lovely conversation," Klavier interrupted, drawing everyone's attention with a concerned look at Luke, "but you are forgetting one critical point, Herr Doktor."

"And what point is that?" Apollo asked.

Klavier brushed his hair from his eyes. "Certainly, the Fraulein wanted that chart," he explained. "You assume she threatened the doctor into opening that safe. But then, wouldn't she have taken the chart?"

Luke just gave Klavier a smile. "Ah yes, thank you for bringing that up, Mister Gavin," he said, and began to stroke his goatee. "I was struggling over that particular logical paradox myself for a while: If someone wanted so badly to retrieve that chart that they had a gun with them, what happened that their objective was never completed?"

Apollo raised an eyebrow at his brother. "I hope you have an answer to that question," he muttered, not wanting to admit that the issue hadn't occurred to him at all.

Luke giggled as he turned to Apollo. "Oh, of course I do! Although it is just a theory."

The judge turned to Alita with a grunt. "Ms Tiala."

"Yes?" Alita sighed, a hand on her hip.

"It is clear to this court that you are not a very good fiancée," the judge announced, giving her a disapproving frown.

Alita just smiled. "Oh, I'm flattered."

"Perhaps it's time you told us the truth?" the judge suggested, in a tone that said 'no' was not an answer. "Tell us about yourself, including your actions and whereabouts on that day."

Seeing a chance, Apollo butted in with, "Don't forget! We've proven that you were at the Meraktis Clinic on the day of the crime!" At his side, Luke was moving to rejoin him behind the bench.

Alita gave Apollo a long stare, then began to speak.
"Yes, I went to the clinic that day to speak to the doctor," Alita reluctantly agreed, pointedly looking at Apollo before turning her attention to the court at large. "I wanted that chart, but I failed to get it, so I went back to the clinic later." She crossed her arms, shooting a glare at Apollo. "In any case, I didn't shoot him. You don't even have proof I stole that pistol, do you."

Apollo bit his lip to keep from shouting something about how he could see the nervous twitches of her hand as she claimed to not have shot Meraktis.

"And that brat was spotted in the park at the moment of the crime!" Alita continued, scoffing. "Frankly, I don't think it matters who else was there. Only one had the murder weapon, if you see what I mean."

The judge thought a moment. "You went back 'later'...?"

"That chart was dangerous, you understand," Alita explained with a sigh. "I needed to get rid of it, that's why I went that day."

"But you couldn't get the chart then, could you?" Klavier pointed out, giving Alita a neutral stare.

Alita looked away for a moment, not responding to his question. "And later that night, Doctor Meraktis was shot." She shook her head. "I heard about the shooting, waited a day, but then I had to go back..." She glared to one side. "No easy feat with the cops all over the place."

Apollo blinked in surprise. "Th-that was you!?" he cried. "That thump we heard in the office!? You were the burglar?"

Alita raised an eyebrow, looking between the pair behind the defence bench. "That was you two?" she asked in return, then scowled. "If only I had one more minute, then I could have opened that safe and gotten the chart!"

"At least we were there legally, Ms Tiala," Luke pointed out.

"Witness, that's trespassing!" the judge exclaimed in shock. "And brazen, at that!"

Alita rolled her eyes. "Oh, is this a trial for trespassing now? Besides, you can't blame a girl for wanting to protect herself." She smirked at the judge. "They are gangsters, you know."

The judge shook his head, deciding to leave it. "In any case, Mister Wright, your cross-examination!"

Apollo sighed to himself, studying Alita's confident smirk as she awaited his questions. 'Admitting the little crime to avoid the big one, eh? Well you must really be dreaming if you think it's that easy to escape the truth! Though there is one small thing that's been bugging me about that burglary...'

"Why did you wait to go back to the clinic?"
Alita shrugged. "When I heard what happened, well, I was too scared to do anything that day," she admitted. "So I waited until the day after... The sixteenth, was it?" She shot a glare at the defence team. "Of course, you and your meddling 'assistant' had to get in my way."

The judge tugged on his beard in thought. "But why did Doctor Meraktis keep that chart around?" he asked. "It was clearly dangerous for him. He could have burned it."

"Because he's a coward," Alita spat in disgust. "The chart was his insurance."

"Insurance?" the judge repeated, confused.

"My signature was on that chart, to be more specific," Alita explained with a scowl. "That made sure I couldn't betray him."

'That... makes more sense than I thought it would,' Apollo admitted to himself, pressing a finger to his temple. 'I guess now we move on to the big guns.' He stood up straight, a hand resting on the bench, and tried to look important. "Ms Tiala, you say it 'doesn't matter' who else was on the scene of the murder that night?"

"Obviously," Alita replied, rolling her eyes at the question. "Only the brat had the gun, after all."

"But it's impossible for Wocky to have killed him!" Apollo pointed out with a frustrated glare. "The wound was on the other side of his head!"

A snapping of fingers from the prosecutor's bench cut the argument short, Klavier thinking to himself as he waited for the room to fall silent. "Let's review the facts again, shall we?" he offered, then activated the holograms to bring up the diagram of the map, though only with markers of Wocky and Meraktis' locations. "If the killer shot from this location," he indicated the 'K' marker, "the bullet would've struck our victim square in the forehead." To illustrate his point, a small red arrow flashed to point at the 'front' of the victim's marker. "However! The entry wound was in the right temple."

The arrow moved to point at the 'right' of the victim.

The judge nodded. "Yes, we heard testimony on this yesterday." He pointed at his own screen, generating the 'W1' marker to the south of the existing ones. "At the time of the shooting, the witness standing here shouted. The victim turned his head to look, and was shot."

"Objection!" Apollo exclaimed, slamming the bench with his fists. "But that testimony was proven to be a lie! Our egregious panty-snatcher Mister Stickler did witness the crime, but he was standing to the north, next to the trash can where he tossed those panties!" He tapped at his Court Record to correct the location of the W1 marker. "If Mister Stickler shouted from this location, the bullet couldn't hit his right temple, not when fired from where Wocky was standing!"

Alita laughed to herself. "Silly, silly attorney..."

Apollo looked to the witness in surprise. "What?"

"Do you remember what you had for breakfast that morning?" Alita asked, almost mockingly. Confused by the strange request, Apollo shrugged. "Um, a glass of milk, usually..."

"What matters is one thing," Alita continued, arms crossed. "The doctor was shot in his right temple. If that's the case, there can only be one explanation: The panties guy was mistaken."

With a growl, Apollo slammed his fists into the bench again. "Objection! But his location was proven! You can't write that off as him being 'mistaken'? And what about the other two witnesses on "Objection!" came a cry from Klavier, who smiled knowingly at Apollo. "Ah, but need I remind you that, of those two, one is still missing and the other most certainly did not give a clear picture of events on his own." He gave the defence, especially the sheepish Luke, a grin. "Why don't you show us, Herr Forehead... Where was the shooter standing?"

Apollo blinked in surprise; He hadn't been expecting to be outright asked who actually shot Meraktis, not after his arguments were so continually brushed aside the previous day.

"Don't hesitate, Apollo," Luke said from his right, giving his brother an encouraging smile. "I know you know the answer to this."

Giving his younger brother a firm nod, Apollo moved a hand to his Court Record... then paused, and looked up at Alita with a confident smile. "I believe we all owe a debt of gratitude to Ms Alita Tiala."

Alita suddenly looked scared. "Wh-what do you mean?"

"Thanks to you, we had a chance to review the crime," Apollo replied. "We already knew it couldn't be the first witness, Wesley Stickler, nor the second... but the third? They've been a total mystery in this trial so far."

The judge gasped. "Oh no..."

"Oh yes!" Apollo cried. "Who's left that was on the victim's right as he turned to face Mister Stickler!?" He tapped on his computer to highlight the 'W3' marker in the noodle stand. "The mystery witness! Any other answer is simply impossible!"

The gallery broke into excited murmurs, forcing the judge to bang his gavel for order.

Alita hid her nervousness with a scoff. "This is the most ridiculous thing I've ever heard!" she declared. "I'd think you'd notice if you were pulling someone along!"

"Oh, we don't doubt he knew full well that person was there, Ms Tiala," Luke replied, giving her a stern glare. "Besides, their existence was proven yesterday, by both footprint and testimony."

"And you want to know the most interesting part, Ms Tiala?" Apollo added with a smug smile. "We found the shoe that left the print... and it had your toe prints inside." The gallery was already in uproar before Apollo had raised his hand, displaying the slippers he had again dramatically magicked into his grip. He considered shouting over the crowd to highlight that this proved she was said mystery witness, but, from the reaction of the audience, it looked like he didn't need to after all.

Alita made a gurgling noise, staring at the pair with wide eyes. Above, the judge was madly banging his gavel, shouting, "Order! Order!"

"Objection!" came a shout from Klavier, finally silencing the gallery as he pointed dramatically at Apollo. "Yet, upon second viewing of this evidence... Can this be called a footprint, in good faith?"

"Objection!" Apollo shouted back, dropping the slippers on the bench to return the point. "Observe the diagram! A park pathway runs right next to the slipper mark! A slipper wouldn't leave a trace on a cobblestone path!"

"Objection!" Klavier curled his outstretched hand into a fist and banged it against the wall behind him. "Yet you still cannot say this is a 'footprint', ja?"
"Why not!?" Apollo demanded, banging his own fists on the bench.

Klavier shook his head. "You have an impression left by a single slipper," he explained. "What if it was on the stand and simply fell to the ground?"

"I'm afraid that simply doesn't fit with the evidence, Mister Gavin," Luke interrupted with a smile, picking up the slippers to show off the paint-covered soles. "For one thing, they were clearly worn by someone that night, as they stepped in the paint from the hit-and-run on Kitaki Avenue, quite a distance from the scene of the murder." He placed them back on the bench. "For another, this is a working noodle stand. Normally, it would be full of the various tools of its trade; In Mister Eldoon's case, it is mostly filled with his bowls. And where did we eventually find those bowls?" He tapped at Apollo's Court Record, replacing the crime scene diagram on the holographic screens with the photo Apollo had taken in the clinic reception. "Neatly piled up just inside the front doors of the Meraktis Clinic. Space was being very specifically made in that noodle stand to fit a person inside."

"And," Apollo picked up, shooting a triumphant grin at the nervous Alita, hands pressed to her ears, "right around the time that you were there, Ms Alita Tiala!"

Alita shook her head as the murmurs began again from the gallery, then shrieked, "Stoooop!" Her cry silenced the gallery in an instant, and the young woman shot frantic glares at the defence bench. "I won't listen to any more of these wild fantasies! No, not fantasies..." She growled at the pair. "They're worse lies than that spoiled brat's pick-up lines!"

"I would like to remind the witness of her current status," the judge interrupted, giving her a stern look. "This court does not consider you entirely innocent."

Alita scoffed, lowering her hands from her ears to cross her arms. "Show me an innocent, I'll show you a fairy tale."

Apollo frowned. 'Man, were you a prosecutor in a past life, too?'

The judge sighed, shaking his head. "In any case. The defence has, somehow, made its point. The witness had both a motive and an opportunity to kill Doctor Meraktis."

"More fairy tales!" Alita barked. "This whole trial is a fairy tale!"

"Then please," the judge replied, raising a pointed eyebrow in her direction, "pull us back down to reality, Ms Tiala. I'm giving you one last chance to explain yourself."

Alita scoffed, but seemed agreeable to talk as requested.

Apollo rested a hand on his bracelet as he stared Alita down; He didn't want to miss a single thing when it came to this final testimony - They couldn't afford for him to miss even the smallest detail that might lead them to the full truth.

"That night, I went to ask Doctor Meraktis for the chart," Alita reluctantly admitted. "I had no intention of ever letting that chart fall into the Kitaki Family's hands." She paused to sigh. "But Doctor Meraktis didn't understand... For some reason, he thought the Kitakis had sent me!" She shook her head, looking away as a hand rested at her neck. "So I gave up and went home... All I did was talk to him!"

Apollo frowned as he evaluated the young woman's minute movements. Was it just him, or was there another similarity to Luke's trial that was about to rear its ugly head...? "All you did was talk?" he repeated.

Alita nodded, but didn't meet Apollo's gaze.

Shaking his head, Apollo crossed his arms, his mind working a mile a minute to fully decode Alita's intentions. This time, he would do it right. "No. All you did was lie."

"Wh-what?" Alita snapped in shock, glaring at Apollo with wide eyes. "Show me proof!"

"The proof," Apollo replied, "is you, Ms Tiala. 'All I did was talk to him', you claim." He threw out a hand to point dramatically at her. "Yet you can't hide your own nervous twitch when you say those words!"

Her hand was playing idly with her scarf, almost certainly unconsciously, as she stared Apollo down. "My 'twitch'? What are you talking about!?"

"You have a habit," Apollo proudly explained, "of scratching the area of your neck around the edge of your scarf."

"Wha-!" Alita stuttered, then consciously pulled her hand away from her neck, clutching it tightly with her other hand in the vicinity of the clover shape at the front of her dress. She pressed her teeth together, torn between shock and rage as she glared at Apollo with wide eyes. When he only smirked knowingly at her, she added, "D-don't look at me like that! I t-told you the tr-truth..."

Apollo shook his head as she nervously trailed off. "It seems that when you recall what really happened in that office, you can't keep your hands off your neck, can you?" Alita didn't respond, sweating heavily as she stared back at him, and Apollo's smirk turned into a stern look. "You can't hide behind your scarf, Ms Tiala! Something happened between you and the victim in the Meraktis Clinic office! And I've got proof that shows exactly what happened!" With a firm tap on his Court Record, he brought up on the holograms one of the photos he had taken the previous day, of the table lamp with the broken bulb Trucy had been admiring.

"Wh-what's that?" Alita hesitantly asked, her hand back at her neck as she obviously avoided looking at the picture.

Apollo smirked. "You're touching your scarf again."

With a tiny squeak, Alita again withdrew her hand, her nervous face turned away from Apollo as she continued to sweat.

Standing tall, Apollo turned his attention to the court. "There's something unusual about this lamp," he explained. "The bulb is broken," he paused to switch the photo out for one of the cord, "and there's a red splotch on the cord." He looked to Alita. "Seeing how you hide your neck... I think I can come up with a plausible explanation for the lamp's state."

Frustration seemed to overcome Alita's fear, as she shot the defence team a glare and demanded, "Well spit it out! This talking in circles nonsense is killing me!"

Apollo nodded. "Very well. The answer is very simple. Ms Alita Tiala..." He paused, again pointing dramatically at the witness stand. "Please remove your scarf!"

Alita once again shrieked, clasping her hands to her ears and madly shaking her head.

The gallery muttered to itself, and Apollo finally took his attention off the witness to briefly check in with his surroundings: Opposite them, behind the prosecutor's bench, Klavier was standing with eyes closed, deep in thought. Above, on his podium, the judge was frowning sternly at Alita, his hand readying his gavel in case the gallery got too enthusiastic. On Apollo's right, Luke stood with arms crossed, eyebrows pressed together in concern as he stared intensely at a spot on the defence bench directly in front of him. Worried for his brother (and with no idea how long Luke had been in that state), Apollo gently tapped his arm, whispering, "Hey, you okay?"

Luke didn't seem to react at first, then quietly insisted, "I'm fine. I was expecting something like this, after all."

Apollo wanted to press his brother harder, but it seemed Alita had recovered enough to resume her protests: "I... I won't do it! This is insane! I'm a... an unrelated third party!" She clutched her scarf tightly, sending death glares at the defence team. "You can't order me to remove my clothing!"

The judge shook his head, Alita's shrieks enough to quieten the gallery on their own. "Ms Tiala, I'm afraid you've forgotten what's already been proven."

Alita blinked in surprise, then shook her head at the judge. "Y-you haven't proven that was me in that ridiculous noodle st-"

"Objection!" came Klavier's voice, and he looked up at the witness with an even stare. "Maybe so, but you are hardly 'unrelated', Fraulein."

The judge nodded in agreement. "Please remove your scarf," he instructed.

Alita stared in disbelief for a moment, then slowly shook her head at the judge. "No," she muttered, then pressed her hands to her face, shouting, "Noooooo!"

There was a long silence, the court frozen as it expectantly watched and waited for Alita to follow the judge's orders. She remained unmoving for several seconds, until a bailiff nervously began to take a few steps in her direction, and she finally broke from her spell to wave them away. "I can do it!" she snapped, then, once the bailiff had scurried back to their post, she paused again. With a sigh, slowly she reached up to the long green scarf knotted firmly around her neck, and pulled it away.
Apollo couldn't resist a smirk as he stared. "I knew it. So I was right, wasn't I, Ms Alita Tiala!"

An angry red mark was snaked visibly around Alita's neck, standing out against her pale skin. As far as Apollo could see, there wasn't a single break in the line, looping perfectly all the way around. Alita herself had her head turned away, biting her lip in clear worry, her hands tightly clutching the scarf to her chest.

"Your neck," the judge muttered, a look of awe on his face. He shook his head in shocked disbelief. "That isn't what I think it is!"

"Something did happen that night at the Meraktis Clinic!" Apollo continued, pointing accusingly at Alita. "You needed to get that chart back, no matter what it took. Even if you had to steal your fiancé's pistol to do it!"

"B-but wait!" the judge interrupted, studying the photos of the lamp on his personal screen. "Looking at this lamp, and the witness's neck... It looks like the very opposite happened!"

Apollo nodded. "Exactly. The victim in the clinic that night was this witness! Specifically," he crossed his arms, sternly staring at Alita, "you tried to threaten Doctor Meraktis and he attacked you! That's what happened that night at the Meraktis Clinic!"

Alita stared back for a moment, then shrieked once more, burying her face in the scarf still clutched in her hands. It seemed to echo around the room for a full minute before she finally fell silent, slumped on the witness stand.

The gallery erupted into conversation again, forcing the judge to call for order, banging his gavel. "Order! Order! Order!" Once the crowds had began to quieten, he turned on the lawyers below him and demanded, "Will someone please tell me what really happened!?"

"I told you the truth already!" Alita cried with a sob, her hands moving to drape the scarf back around her neck and hide her injury. "I went to the clinic that night to warn Doctor Meraktis!" She sniffed, rubbing at her nose with the back of a hand, her gaze on the stand before her. "I told him the Kitakis knew, that they were coming for him, and I asked him to hand over the chart... He said..."

She shook her head, sniffing again. "He said I was just saving my own skin, wanting in with the Family... Then he said, if he was going down... he wanted some company."

The courtroom watched her in total silence for several seconds. Seeing her distress, Apollo felt a stab of guilt for being so harsh in dragging out the truth... but he couldn't let himself go easy on a murderer. "And what happened next!?" he sternly asked.

"He jumped at me, and knocked me to the floor!" Alita continued, still staring downwards with a hand on her neck. "Then, he took that cord..." She shook her head again, finally looking up at the court with a pained expression. "Pal Meraktis was serious. Deadly serious. He really tried to strangle me. I..." She looked down again, biting her lip. "I must have blacked out."

The judge watched her sympathetically, eyes wide in shock. "So... you were the victim!"

"And the red splotch on the cord," Klavier added, eyes closed in thought, "was your lipstick."

"I... I didn't want to remember that night," Alita whispered. "That's why I didn't bring it up." With a glare, she turned her tearful gaze up to Apollo. "There. Are you happy now?"

Apollo was too taken aback to respond.

"I was out cold, almost killed!" Alita added accusingly. "And you claim I then snuck into that noodle
Before Apollo could even begin to register his shock, Luke was calmly crossing his arms, meeting Alita's gaze evenly as he responded, "And when did we say you snuck in, Miss Tiala?"

It was now Alita's turn to be surprised. "What?"

"We only said it was you in the noodle stand," Luke pointed out, a small smile forming on his lips. "In fact, we proved it. Whether you were conscious of going in there or not is irrelevant."

Alita could only stare in surprise.

Apollo shot his brother a proud smile. As always, Luke was right: Alita was in that noodle stand, and they couldn't allow her to wring the sympathy of the court to let her get away with it.

The judge was deep in thought. "Well, one thing is clear," he announced. "We now know what really happened at the Meraktis Clinic. And it would seem that our victim was not entirely without blame himself!"

"With all due respect, Your Honour," Luke interrupted, a finger pointed into the air, "we don't yet know the full story. The witness was rendered unconscious, true, but what happened after that? There are too many questions still unanswered."

Klavier nodded in agreement, snapping his fingers. "This party's just getting started, Herr Judge!" he said with a grin. "Now, we rock!"

The judge looked over to the man in surprise. "Prosecutor Gavin...?"

Apollo decided to add his own voice to the fray, turning to Alita with a smirk. "Ms Alita Tiala, as you can see, we're not through with you just yet."

Alita shot the young lawyer a glare. "You really want to blame me for this murder, don't you?" she asked, then looking to Klavier with an equally accusing frown. "You too, 'Prosecutor' Gavin."

"Me?" Klavier replied with an amused smile. "Fraulein, I only wish to know the truth."

Luke nodded. "In fact, I believe we have enough gathered knowledge to piece together the events that led to the murder that night," he announced, looking to the judge.

After a moment of thought, the old man nodded. "Very well, defence. Why don't you tell us exactly what happened on the night in question?"
Luke stood for a moment in silence, eyes closed and fingers stroking his goatee in thought. Apollo got the feeling he was fighting the urge to pace, perhaps to circle the witness stand and truly put Alita on the spot as he'd so passionately described Professor Layton doing in all his stories. In any case, Luke stayed put, snapping his eyes open to survey the court. "This is what the defence believes truly occurred on the night of the fourteenth of June," he began. "After learning of the bullet still in his chest, the defendant was, understandably, furious. He wanted revenge on the victim, taking a gun from the Family stash for exactly that purpose, but, crucially, did not immediately act. His fiancée, the witness, knew all this full well, and had no choice but to act to keep her involvement in the failed surgery six months ago from being uncovered." He closed his eyes again. "I have no doubt she stole Wocky's pistol before she left. Her reasoning was likely twofold: Firstly, to keep Wocky himself from using it; Secondly... She described the victim as being a 'coward', using the chart as blackmail against her, and there's no faster way to make a coward act than by fear."

"You mean she intended to threaten him with the gun?" the judge clarified.

Luke nodded, looking up to the podium. "Exactly, although I doubt she ever wanted to have to use it."

Alita was looking away, fiddling with her nails and biting her lip. Apollo had no doubt his brother's words were hitting very close to home.

"When she reached the clinic," Luke was continuing, "Miss Tiala politely removed her sandals and put on the slippers, as was the routine there. It was only a small distance from there to the office, where she attempted to both warn Doctor Meraktis of what was going on and obtain the chart. Her plan was that the doctor would hand it over for her to destroy and he would then flee, saving both their lives... but, tragically, Doctor Meraktis believed otherwise." He shook his head sadly. "I believe he pretended to go along with her, opening the safe in his office where the chart was kept... but, likely while Miss Tiala was distracted retrieving the chart, attacked her from behind with the closest weapon at hand: the cord of the table lamp. In shock, Miss Tiala fired the pistol, hitting the back wall of the safe, but was unable to fight back."

Luke paused a moment, eyes closed, and Apollo wondered if talking about the details of the attack in such calm tones was harder than it looked. "Strangled by the cord, the witness passed out," Luke sighed, forcing himself to keep talking. "Doctor Meraktis was probably in a panic by this point; He believed he had killed her."

"What?" Alita interrupted, surprised. "But I was still alive!"

"Ah, but panic can blind us to the most obvious things, Fraulein," Klavier pointed out with a small smile. "Hence why it is called 'blind panic'."

Luke had opened his eyes again, looking around the court again with a serious look. "Doctor Meraktis' next move was clear: He had to dispose of the 'body'. Thus, with Miss Tiala still wearing the slippers, he dragged her to the clinic's doorway and grabbed the nearest available object to carry "The noodle stand!" Apollo cried out with a grin. "That's why he stole it!"

Luke nodded, giving his brother a smile. "Taking out the bowls to make room for Miss Tiala!"

"And then taking her to the park to dump her in the river!" Apollo replied again, feeling oddly energised by the pieces they'd collected finally all falling into place in front of him. "Except it was then he ran into Wocky and Stickler."

"And it was then Miss Tiala woke up," Luke added, his smile turning into a serious look as he turned to address the court at large. "For whatever reason, Doctor Meraktis put the gun in the noodle stand with her. His last words may have been attempts to tell Wocky the full story, or maybe Miss Tiala simply wanted revenge and took her chance when she had it, but, no matter the reason, as the doctor turned his head towards Mister Stickler, she fired that pistol into his right temple, killing him instantly." He closed his eyes as the gallery quietly murmured to itself. "Wocky fled, and Stickler left not long after. Thinking herself alone, the witness left the noodle stand, wiped her prints off the gun before planting it on the scene, then left for home. As far as she could tell, no-one ever knew she was even there."

Alita was staring at the pair behind the defence bench with wide eyes. It seemed she wanted to protest, but had so much to say she didn't know where to begin.

Klavier smiled, a hand brushing at his hair. "Impressive, Herr Doktor. Very impressive."

The judge frowned in thought, nodding to himself. "Hmm. Yes, the evidence certainly supports your theory." He looked up, fixing Alita with a stern gaze. "Well, Ms Tiala?"

Alita continued her staring for a very long moment before, finally, pulling herself together, shooting the brothers livid glares as she crossed her arms. "Hmph. Nice work."

Apollo blinked in surprise, sharing a grin with Luke. She was admitting to the truth already? 'That was easier than I thought!'

"You've done a fine job," Alita continued, "dreaming up a story to get that spoiled brat off the hook!"

Although surprised at her continued resistance, Luke was clearly crestfallen they still had more to prove, and Apollo's protective-older-brother mode kicked in instantly, slamming the bench with his fists as he returned the witness's glare. "You're the one who's dreaming!" he shot back. "We can back up everything Luke's said with facts! If you're so sure he's making it up, give us some other explanation for what happened after you were attacked!"

Alita simply scoffed, looking down her nose at Apollo. "Who knows?" she replied. "But there's one gaping hole in your logic. I think Mister Gavin knows whereof I speak!"

"Whereof what!?" Apollo demanded, glaring between Alita and Klavier, unsure who to focus on. Luke frowned, confused. "A... hole in my logic?" he repeated. "Where?"

"Is this true, Prosecutor Gavin?" the judge cut in, raising an eyebrow in Klavier's direction.

Klavier chuckled, closing his eyes as a hand ran through his blond locks. "Must I always be the one to point out the defence's errors?" he asked, amused, then opened his eyes to give the Wright brothers a grin. "I believe the Fraulein speaks of Herr Doktor's car."
Apollo had to think a moment to clarify which 'Herr Doktor' the prosecutor was referring to.

"That's right!" Alita smugly agreed, smirking at Apollo and Luke. "The Meraktis Clinic has that big garage!"

The judge tugged at his beard in thought. "In which sat... a green sports car, was it?"

"Why would he steal that stand in the first place?" Alita continued, apparently not even noticing the judge's comment. "If he wanted to carry a body, he would have used the car!"

Apollo paled, and it was only because of his years of stage experience he was able to keep from sputtering wildly in shock.

"And so we find our victim without probable cause to steal that stand," Klavier added, eyes closed again and grin fading to a small smile, "and our defence without a case."

"Not so fast, Mister Gavin!" Luke called out, pointing across the room with a confident smile. "The reason Doctor Meraktis had to use the stand is simple! His-!"

"Objection!" came a responding shout, stopping Luke in his tracks as Klavier pointed right back at him with a grin. "Ah ah ah, I believe we've heard quite enough from you today, Doktor Wright." As Luke watched in confused surprise, the prosecutor turned his amused gaze to Apollo. "I want to hear from Herr Forehead. Why does he think our victim stole that noodle stand?"

The young lawyer had opened his mouth to reply before realising he didn't have anything to say and closed it again. Instead, he turned to shoot a confused look at Luke, but his younger brother only shrugged off being ordered to stay quiet and gave Apollo an encouraging smile. 'Go on,' he seemed to be saying. 'You can do this easy.'

Apollo wished he shared his brother's confidence. Sighing, he pressed a finger to his forehead, throwing himself into the problem at hand. The obvious suggestion to make was that the car wasn't working, but they already knew that same car had hit Phoenix earlier the same night, and was clearly not damaged enough to affect its ability to run. But what other reason is there for him to take the stand!? I don't think there are any barriers in the park that would have blocked car access... Argh, this is as confusing a situation as the whole noodle stand theft was!'

His frustrated sighs must have slipped out of Apollo's internal monologue, as Klavier chuckled at the young man across from him. "Is that a groan of surrender I hear?" he asked, his smile only growing when Apollo responded with a silent glare. The prosecutor snapped his fingers at Apollo, calling his full attention. "Some advice: Now's a good time to review all you know... Everything you've learned over the last two days."

'Everything I've learned...?' Apollo stared at Klavier in surprise for only a moment before something unexpected came to mind: The conversation outside the park the previous afternoon, the shrieks of teenage girls threatening to drown them out as Klavier and Luke commiserated over engine failures. That had been new information to him after all.

"Mister Wright, this contradiction casts doubt on your entire case," the judge announced in the lengthy silence. "This is truly your last chance. The defence will explain to us what happened that night!"

Apollo closed his eyes for only a moment before looking back up to the judge with a determined nod. "That night, Doctor Meraktis couldn't use his car."

Alita let out a bark of laughter from the witness stand, smirking at the young lawyer. "Now you're "Not according to my information, Ms Tiala," Apollo replied, hoping his doubts that he was even on the right track weren't obvious. "Put one and one together, and the explanation is simple."

The judge raised a doubtful eyebrow. "If it's so simple, perhaps you can show us some evidence?" he asked. "Show us proof why the car wouldn't run that night!"

Apollo nodded and quickly turned his attention to his Court Record. It took him only a few moments to find the same photo he'd presented to the court the previous day, of Trucy proudly showing off her recovered panties in the yellow light of the Meraktis Clinic garage. "Take that!" he cried as he pulled it up on the screens.

It seemed to take a moment for the judge to register the picture, squinting as he leaned in to his personal holographic screen. "Let's see now..." He then jerked back, eyes wide. "Panties!? Again!?"

Apollo couldn't help a small smirk, his magician persona coming forth and puffing out his chest proudly. "All sorts of things come out of Artemis' Magic Panties," he boasted. "Even the truth!"

Before anyone could reply, he spun towards the slightly confused Alita on the stand. "Another crime was committed the night of the murder: The theft of these panties! The latest in a string of similar thefts, actually." He pointed at her dramatically. "But that night, the snatcher was caught in the act! A brave young girl chased the thief until they hid... in the Meraktis Clinic garage."

Alita blinked, her eyes widening in surprise. "Wh-what!?" Apparently she hadn't been paying attention to that part of yesterday's trial.

"The snatcher hid the panties there before running," Apollo continued without pause. "Perhaps someone in this court remembers where he hid them?"

The judge's eyebrows shot up. "Why... weren't they found in the car's exhaust pipe?"

Apollo nodded, crossing his arms with a smug smirk. "Exactly." He looked to the prosecutor's bench. "And by the way, I should thank you, Prosecutor Gavin. You gave me a very important piece of information yesterday."

Klavier just grinned, glancing at Luke.

"While Ms Tiala and the doctor were struggling," Apollo continued to the court, "the panty-snatcher snuck into the Meraktis garage. From then, until those panties were recovered the following morning, that car wouldn't start."

At that, Alita's disinterested look immediately faded, the young woman staring at Apollo in shock. "Wh... What!?"

"That's why Doctor Meraktis had to use the noodle stand!" Apollo proudly finished off, pointing dramatically at the stand once again. "It was the next closest thing he could think of!"
As the gallery murmured to itself, Apollo crossed his arms with a proud smile, watching Alita stare back at him with wide eyes. "Well, Ms Tiala? This wraps your doubts up quite nicely, I think!"

Alita continued to silently watch him for a very long moment, then sighed, looking away with a distant frown. "So it does." She closed her eyes, a hand to her neck as a pained look flashed across her face. "Funny. This isn't the way it was supposed to turn out." There was another pause, then she shook her head. "Oh well. Too bad."

The judge looked down on her sympathetically. It seemed he couldn't think of anything to say in response.

"Your biggest mistake," Apollo continued, letting his smile slip off his face in the sombre atmosphere, "was throwing out those slippers where you did, still covered in the paint from the hit and run. If we hadn't come across those, we would never have found the evidence to uncover the truth."

Alita scoffed, looking up to meet Apollo's eyes with a glare. "No. My 'biggest mistake' was coming to you for help, Mister Wright!" Apollo and Luke glanced at each other in confusion, but Alita didn't give them any chance to respond, snapping, "I believed in you! You and your 'Anything Agency'! If anyone would get Wocky declared guilty it was you!"

Luke was looking ready to snap an angry comment in response, so Apollo grabbed his arm and gave his brother a raised eyebrow. 'Seriously. It's not worth it.'

At an unspoken signal from Klavier, a pair of bailiffs escorted Alita away, out of the courtroom. Klavier followed them, but was quick to return only a minute later, waiting behind his bench with a calm smile as the judge calmed the gallery back into silence.

"I believe we've reached a conclusion of sorts," the judge finally announced, shuffling some paperwork from atop his podium. He looked to Klavier. "Prosecutor Gavin, how is Ms Alita Tiala doing?"

Klavier nodded. "She's confessed to everything," he said. "We're processing her arrest now."

Apollo was staring across the room, studying the man who had served as their opponent over the last few days. 'He's awfully calm for someone who just 'lost'... but, then again... He probably figured out she was the killer a while ago, same as us. Was Luke right after all? Can we really trust him, even after what he did to Dad?'

The prosecutor noticed the young attorney's stare with surprise. "Something the matter, Herr Forehead?"

Apollo quickly shook his head, then looked away.

"Looks like it's time to announce a verdict," the judge proclaimed, clutching his gavel solemnly.
"This court finds the defendant, Mister Wocky Kitaki, not guilty." With that, he struck the hammer down once, then nodded. "Court is adjourned!"

June 17, 2:12PM
District Court
Defendant Lobby No. 2

"Well, that turned out as well as it could, didn’t it?"

Apollo raised an eyebrow at his brother as they entered their lobby, studying his calm smile. It didn't take much searching to see the tension stretching across Luke's face, the carefully controlled serene expression that Luke always employed when he was trying his hardest to be gentlemanly... and hiding his true hurt. Apollo frowned in concern. "Luke..."

Immediately Luke turned away, a flash of a frown crossing his lips before the controlled smile returned. "Prosecutor Gavin helped us find the true culprit and uncover her crimes in court. Seeing justice be served makes all our effort worth it, doesn't it?"

Apollo watched as his brother stepped forward towards the depressingly brown sofa. As admirable as it was that Luke was holding together through his hurt, it was killing him to see. He made to follow, intending to question his brother further, but had barely taken a step before the doors behind him burst open with a bang.

"Hey! Attorney-man!"

Apollo spun around with wide eyes, finding himself suddenly face to face with a very angry nineteen-year-old.

"You're gonna pay for what you did to my Alita, homes!" Wocky shouted, spit flying on Apollo's face. "You give my Alita back!"

"What happened to being grateful!?" Apollo was shouting in return before it occurred to him that perhaps it would be a bad idea to bait the young man. Regardless, he was already jumping back to keep Wocky out of his personal space, hoping there were bailiffs nearby to keep an eye on the situation.

Wocky's face turned even redder and he moved to jump at Apollo again, but the moment the space had opened up between them, Luke had stepped into it, his back to his brother as he held up his hands in an effort to calm the aggressive teen. "Wocky, please, I know you're upset-!

"Enough, Wocky!" The deep boom of Big Wins Kitaki brought the argument to a halt, everyone looking up to the tall man entering the room, giving his son a stern look. "It's high time you opened your eyes."

Wocky's pleas were ignored, Wocky's attention switching gears with a growl. "You stupid attorneys have a death wish!?" he shouted. "I didn't ask for this! You think you-!"

"Enough, Wocky!" The deep boom of Big Wins Kitaki brought the argument to a halt, everyone looking up to the tall man entering the room, giving his son a stern look. "It's high time you opened your eyes."

Wocky's shocked look turned back into a scowl. "What do you know, old man!? I think it's 'bout time you opened yours!" He jabbed a finger at his father accusingly. "Givin' up the life, trying to become some kinda businessman!??"
Wins shook his head, eyebrows furrowed at his son as he ordered, "Don't talk about what you don't understand, Wocky!"

Apollo cast a concerned glance to the doorway as the pair resumed their endless arguing. Given Wocky's emotional state, he wouldn't be surprised if the bailiffs outright gave up and threw the pair in jail to calm them down... though he wasn't sure what else they could do to help.

Standing in front of his brother, Luke also watched the Kitakis in concern for a long moment... then, before Apollo had even realised what he was thinking, he had stepped forward again, putting himself once more between Wocky and his target. "Wocky, have you not realised why your father is working so hard to make money all of a sudden?"

Wocky paused, surprised at both being interrupted and the question he'd been posed without warning. "Uh... what is there to understand?" He then shot the vet a glare, hands curling into fists. "Haven't you done enough!? I don't need your pity!"

Luke's frown turned dark. "It's not pity; It's empathy," he said. "Would you rather have had no warning, and been dragged kicking and screaming from the courtroom? I can say from experience that's not exactly pleasant."

Wocky stared in silence for a moment, then looked away.

"But clearly you won't listen to me," Luke continued with a sigh, and looked to Apollo. "Could you tell him, Apollo? Why Mister Kitaki is leaving the life of a gangster?"

Both Kitakis looked as surprised at that as Apollo felt. 'Way to put me on the spot, Luke...'" "Whazzat?" Wocky muttered, raising a confused eyebrow.

Apollo put aside the strong urge to curse out his brother; It wasn't productive, not when he had the full attention of two notorious (though former) gangsters. Just as in court, the answer to Luke's question wasn't immediately coming to mind, though he was sure he probably did know it. Luke himself wasn't giving Apollo any hints, simply staring at him with an expectant smile. Wocky was similarly staring, his eyes flashing in warning should Apollo not say the right thing. All in all, neither were any help. Wins, though... His gaze was not on Apollo, but on Wocky, brow twisted slightly over his hooded eyes. The show of concern was enough on its own to jog Apollo's memory. He frowned, turning to the teenager before him. "Think about it, Wocky. Think about your condition."

Wocky blinked, surprised.

"We spoke to your mother, Little Plum, yesterday," Apollo continued. "She told us your family needs a lot of money right now. Clean money. Why do you think that is, Wocky?"

The teen stared for a very long moment, realisation spreading across his face. "She doesn't mean..." He turned around towards his father. "You aren't really... are you?"

Wins didn't immediately reply, looking back at his son. "I searched the globe. And I found one," he explained. "A doctor who can take that bullet out of you, Wocky. But it's an expensive procedure."

Wocky was starting to look distressed again. "M-man! B--but you got plenty of money already, don't you?"

"I won't use it," Wins insisted, shaking his head. "It was the gangster life that did this to you, Wocky. I want to help you, and I want to do it clean." He stared a moment, then his brows moved up on his face, revealing small eyes that blinked open to stare longingly at his son. "Please understand,
"D-Dad..." Wocky muttered, eyes shining with unshed tears; Apollo could almost admire his willpower in keeping his composure. A second later, Wocky shook his head, forcing a glare onto his face as he held a threatening fist up to his father. "M-man, I see how it is, old man! Always you looking out for... out for..." His voice faltered, and he shook his head again to put himself back on track. "Listen good, old man! One day... One day... I'm gonna take you out! Then we'll see who's the O.G.!!" He shoved at Wins' apron, but the older man did not respond. "You try to hide in your business suit, I'll find you!" Wocky cried. "Stupid ol' geezer!" With that, he pushed past Wins and out of the room.

Luke sighed, watching the teen go with a sad look. "He's had a lot to take in today. He just needs time."

Wins nodded in agreement. "It's as it should be," he said, then turned his puppy dog eyes on Apollo. "I'm glad... to have met you. I'm not so good with words... but I know a professional job when I see one." He looked between the brothers. "Thank you. Both of you."

Luke seemed to take the gratitude in stride, but Apollo blushed, rubbing at the back of his neck. "Us? I don't think-"

"Someday," Wins continued, "I'll bake you one of our latest: The Kitaki Lime Pie."

Apollo blinked in surprise. They're opening a pie shop?

Luke softly giggled. "It was no problem at all, Mister Kitaki. We're just happy to help."

Wins grunted, a small smile at the edges of his lips. "So long." With that, he was gone.

View the Court Record
They had lingered only a moment more in the defendant's lobby before Luke was following the Kitakis out into the hallway, and Apollo rushed to follow. However, instead of turning left towards the courtroom like Apollo had been expecting, his younger brother instead turned to the right, heading to a bench sat under a window overlooking a courtyard. With Luke intently staring out at the sky, Apollo glanced left, seeing the door to the fourth floor lobby closing behind Wins. 'Well, that's the last we're seeing of the Kitakis I guess,' he mused, then turned back towards his brother. "Luke?"

Luke didn't immediately react, standing still and quiet. Finally, after a long moment's pause, he turned, opening his mouth to respond...

... but he was interrupted before anything came out: The door at the end of the hallway was thrown open with a bang, attracting the brothers' attention as it startled them from their conversation. A caped blue blur was speeding across the vinyl floor, her arms waving gleefully as she cried, "Great job, Polly! You did it!"

"Tru-!?” Apollo had just enough time to gasp before his sister was upon him, slamming against his chest in a tight hug and emptying his lungs of air.

"Wocky's off the hook!” Trucy continued. "Free to become the gangster he's always wanted to be!” Releasing Apollo, she turned her grin on Luke, who was smiling back at her. "And he has you two to thank!"

Apollo rolled his eyes, tapping his chest with a fist to hide his gasps for air. "More like blame..."

Luke giggled. "Now that we've sorted out what happened, Wocky will be alright," he assured Trucy. Patting her shoulder, he then headed down the hall, to where Apollo now noticed the rest of their family and friends were slowly coming to meet them.

"Weren't they great, Daddy?” Trucy chirped as she skipped alongside Luke, grinning at Phoenix. "Wasn't expecting them not to be," Phoenix replied, coming to a stop near the door into Defendant Lobby 1.

Pearl nodded in agreement, bouncing up to meet Trucy and giving Luke and Apollo a wide grin. "You were amazing in there!"

Apollo couldn't resist a blush, rubbing at his neck. "Oh, uh... thanks, Pearly. Dad."

Behind Phoenix, Aria scoffed, waving a hand with a joking smile. "Honestly Apollo, were you expecting us to come in here and tell you you were awful or something?"

The Wright children all giggled at that, Trucy giving her eldest brother another tight hug.

Clay, the last of the group, did an exaggerated stretch as he walked around between the Wright brothers, draping his arms over their shoulders and looking between them almost conspiratorially.
"No, but, like, for serious... that was really boring."

Luke blinked in surprise, while Apollo rolled his eyes. "Clay! For goodness' sake, you were the one who insisted on coming to support us!"

"Yeah, but," Clay replied with a shrug, "apart from the dude running back in and shouting at everyone, it was actually really boring."

Groaning in disgust, Apollo shoved his friend's arm off his shoulders, everyone else in the group laughing at the exchange.

Phoenix's good mood suddenly vanished, the man casting quick glances to one side. "It's time for us to go, anyway. Don't want to clog up the courthouse more than we have to, huh?" He plastered on a fake smile and gently began to wave the small group back out of the hallway. The jovial atmosphere quickly faded as, one by one, everyone noticed what had attracted Phoenix's attention: A rather sheepish Klavier Gavin, standing in the open doorway to Defendant Lobby 1. Although Klavier seemed to be, rather uncomfortably, watching Phoenix in particular, Phoenix himself was avoiding his gaze, gesturing for the assembled group to leave.

Aria was the first to move, hastily and wordlessly turning to all but outright bolt to the door. Trucy was quick to take her lead, pulling on Apollo's arm as she forced a big grin, dragging her brother away with a cheerful, "C'mon Polly, we have to give Mister Eldoon the good news and collect our reward!"

"Has he even got his noodle stand back yet!?" Apollo asked in exasperation as he was pulled through the doors. Pearl and Clay weren't far behind him.

Last was Luke, calmly surveying the situation: Phoenix was standing with his right shoulder to Klavier, his gaze firmly on the floor in front of him; Klavier himself was staring somewhere in the vicinity of Phoenix's right ear, his eyebrows downturned almost longingly. It was clear to Luke that the prosecutor had something to say, and he wasn't sure Phoenix was willing to hear it. Making a decision, Luke smiled and stepped towards Klavier. "Thank you for all your help in there, Mister Gavin. We wouldn't have been able to find the truth of that night without you."

Klavier blinked in surprise, then, a moment later, suddenly regained his confidence, flipping his hair with the smug airs of his rockstar persona. "Ah, Herr Doktor, it is you I should be thanking." His grin turned a little sheepish. "I must admit, I nearly forgot of my own personal creed for the truth when I realised I was up against a Wright again. Would you pass my apologies on to your brother?"

"Of course I will," Luke agreed with a nod. "In fact... I wouldn't mind working with you again one day."

Klavier's eyebrows shot up only momentarily before the prosecutor made the appearance of taking the compliment in his stride. "And I would not mind working with you in return," he replied. "I look forward to such an opportunity that I might have need of your... unique skill."

Luke giggled, then turned and headed to the door. As he reached out for the handle, he paused, looking back towards Phoenix. "Shall I tell the others you'll be along in a moment, Papa?"

Phoenix didn't visibly react, apparently deep in thought. Just as Luke was considering asking again, finally the ex-lawyer replied, "Thank you, Luke. I won't be a minute."

With a small nod, Luke gave his father a smile and left the hallway.

The moment the pair were alone, Klavier's confidence was quick to once again melt away, revealing his nervous uncertainty. "M-mister Wright, about that case-"

"A very good friend of mine assures me you had nothing to do with it," Phoenix interrupted, his expression carefully guarded. After a short pause, he finally turned his gaze up to meet Klavier's eyes. "I'd like to think I can continue trusting him on that."

Klavier winced guiltily. "I... I don't know," he mumbled. "Zak may have done the deed, Valant may have done it... And then that page..." He shook his head, looking away. "All I know is that justice wasn't served that day, in more ways than one, and it's a black mark I will forever carry with me. I... cannot imagine how I might even begin to apologise for what happened."

In the long pause that followed, Phoenix studied Klavier thoughtfully. "I see," he eventually said, then turned and took a few slow steps to the door, feeling the prosecutor's gaze on his back. "In that case, I'll have a word or two with my friend. When we're finally ready to uncover the truth once and for all... we'll let you know."

Klavier's eyes widened. "Mister Wright...?"

"Until then," Phoenix said, then left.

---

Phoenix seemed back to his cheerful self when he caught up to the group on the steps outside the courthouse, even if he turned down any requests to discuss his 'confrontation' with Klavier. Instead, he wrapped his arms around Trucy and Pearl and escorted the two away with a smile, Aria at their heels. Apollo made to follow them with Clay, but was distracted by Luke, who was again standing stock still, staring at the sky with a frown.

After a quick glance assured him no-one else had noticed Luke's behaviour, Apollo headed back up the stairs to his brother, giving him a worried look. "Luke?" he softly called. "You okay?"

Luke didn't immediately reply, his eyes still focussed on the clouds above. "I'm fine," he insisted. "Wocky will be alright, too. He just needs time to heal."

Apollo looked away guiltily. 'It's been long enough. He needs to know.' Fearfully glancing back to see how far away Phoenix was, Apollo forced himself to do his best to meet his brother's gaze. "L-look, Luke, there's something I never told you about that trial..."

"I don't want to hear it," Luke interrupted, shooting his brother a quick glare before making his way down the stairs after their family and friends.

"B-but-!"

"Not now, Apollo."

Apollo could only watch, dumbfounded, as his brother stalked off. After a moment's confusion, he sighed. 'Dad didn't want him to know anyway...' Pushing the overhanging guilt from his mind, he hurried to follow.

pulls party popper Happy first anniversary, you strange little AU-fic that wouldn't stop growing and expanding! Who'd've thought it'd take a full year to get into canon territory, huh? And that I'd be using you as my project in a Masters course of Creative Writing? It's just all too weird for words... especially that last bit, pffft. Anyway, back to your regularly scheduled Wright family nonsense. :)

"We could pull them out of my panties! It could be part of the joke!"

"That won't change the fact that it's creepy, Truce!"

"Of course it will! The audience will accept anything ridiculous if it makes them laugh!"

"Those things being 'ridiculous' isn't the problem here!"

Luke rolled his eyes as he turned the page of his book, trying his best to block out his siblings' argument. He had arrived in the midst of it five minutes ago, and his attempts to shut them up for long enough to even greet him had all failed, so he had simply given up and sat down with a book to wait for the disagreement to run its course. Unfortunately, it wasn't looking like either Apollo or Trucy would be running out of steam any time soon.

"What are you so scared of, Polly?"

"Wha-!? I'm not scared of anything!"

"You think they'll call you a girl, don't you?"

"Um, no, I think they'll call me a pervert."

"No they won't! 'Cuz you're not!"

"Oh yes, what perfect evidence to the contrary, why didn't I think of that."

From what he'd been able to glean from their conversation, the old pair of used bloomers gifted to them by Plum Kitaki had somehow come up when Apollo arrived not long before Luke, with Trucy eager to put them to good use as she'd promised and Apollo equally eager to not have anything further to do with them after the embarrassment of presenting them in court. 'Funny how presenting the Magic Panties twice hasn't stopped him from being a part of that trick...' Although he had to admit that the Magic Panties being an obvious prop, and Plum's bloomers clearly not, were probably a large part of the problem. He shook his head. 'This wasn't how I planned spending our Father's Day get-together...'"
Finally, the front door in the next room swung open, and Luke put his book down with a sigh of relief. "Maya and Pearl are here!" he loudly announced as he stood.

Apollo and Trucy's argument finally came to a halt as they turned in surprise, just in time for the door to reception to open, revealing a grinning Maya and Pearl. "Mommy! Pearly!" Trucy cried in delight, her frustration with Apollo forgotten as she ran to greet the pair.

"Hi there Trucy!" Maya replied, pulling Trucy into a hug before letting her go to greet her cousin. The elder Fey then dashed into the room to Luke, who was closer to the door. "And how are my boys?"

Luke giggled as he also gave their mother figure a quick hug. "We're fine, Maya!"

Apollo just gave an exaggerated sigh as Maya moved on from Luke towards the eldest of the trio. "We had a week from hell, but it turned out okay, I guess."

Maya laughed, pulling the young man into a hug and patting his back sympathetically. "Aw, Nick's all recovered from his injury, your client got acquitted... What's there to complain about, huh?"

Instead of replying, Apollo sighed again, though he hid a smile as his morose act made Maya laugh again.

"Where is Nick, anyway?" Maya asked, looking around the office as though she might spot him hiding behind an abandoned magic prop. "You three haven't given him his present already, have you?"

Luke shook his head. "I haven't seen him yet."

Apollo rubbed the back of his head guiltily. "He was here when I arrived, but I think he wandered off..."

Trucy giggled, bouncing to Maya's side. "You want me to go find him, Mommy? I can fetch his present while I'm at it!"

"Oh, good idea, Trucy!" Maya replied, giving the girl a bright smile. "We'll wait here."

"It's not much of a party without the guest of honour," Pearl sagely pointed out.

With another twinkling laugh, Trucy skipped off out of the room.

It took a few minutes for Phoenix to finally arrive, being pushed into the office by an overly eager Trucy. He didn't seem to mind, a lazy smile on his face as he surveyed his sons and the Fey women sat on the twin couches around the glass coffee table, watching with no small amount of amusement. "Ah, I see we have some visitors!" he announced as he made his way over. As he ruffled Luke's hair through his hat in greeting, he jokingly added, "What's the occasion?"

Nobody replied, either laughing or rolling their eyes at the question. Trucy bounced around to sit between her brothers on the nearest couch, a hand resting on the bag at her hip. "Sit down, Daddy!" she demanded.

Chuckling, Phoenix decided to obey the request, and sat himself on the only remaining free space at the end of the other couch, next to Maya and opposite Apollo. "In a hurry, are we?" Once he was comfortable, he turned to Maya, the pair sharing a few quick kisses.
Apollo rolled his eyes. "Dad, you can kiss Mom later."

Phoenix raised an eyebrow wordlessly. He'd never heard Apollo call Maya that before... and so casually, too.

"Sure, he can kiss me later," Maya replied with a cheeky grin, "but we can't let 'now' go to waste either!"

When the three Wright children promptly responded to that with impatient complaints, Phoenix laughed, raising up his hands in surrender as he backed off from Maya. "Alright, alright! You obviously called me down here for a reason; What is it?"

"We have your gift!" Trucy cheerfully announced, pulling out a small, colourfully wrapped, object from her bag. "I would have given this to you in the hospital if you'd been hurt badly."

"Yeah, that was the worst possible time to run under a car, Dad," Apollo added with a smirk.

Phoenix scoffed playfully as he leaned forward, reaching for the gift. "I'll keep that in mind next time someone tries to kill me," he joked, then, once Trucy had handed over the present, sat back in his seat, turning the box over a few times as he examined it. "What is it?"

Luke snorted, pressing a hand to his mouth to repress laughter.

"That's why you open it, dummy," Maya pointed out, elbowing her boyfriend and childishly demanding, "Hurry up!"

Phoenix complied, picking at the tape to carefully unravel the bright paper. "I take it you and Pearls already know what I'm getting, then?"

"We've been waiting for this for ages!" Pearl squealed, hands covering her face so she was catching glances of Phoenix through her fingers. "It's so perfect!"

Trucy hurriedly shushed her cousin. "Don't ruin the surprise!"

Barely a moment later, Phoenix pulled away the last of the wrapping paper, revealing a small black box, about the size of his palm. "Ah, excellent, a cardboard box," he remarked. He didn't wait to wriggle the uncooperative top open, then stared down in surprise at what he found within: A golden locket, the egg-shaped top-heavy pendant resting neatly on top of the looped chain. He didn't believe it.

He didn't wait to wriggle the uncooperative top open, then stared down in surprise at what he found within: A golden locket, the egg-shaped top-heavy pendant resting neatly on top of the looped chain. He didn't believe it. Couldn't believe it. Eyes locked on the necklace, he hesitantly asked, "T-Trucy... Isn't this...?"

His shock seemed to have turned the ambient excitement into subdued and bittersweet acceptance. Trucy nodded, giving off a sad air despite her smile. "Yep. It was Daddy Zak's. But it's yours now."

"Why don't you open it, Papa?" Luke quietly asked, a hand moving to rest on his sister's back.

Phoenix wanted to object - just as he'd always loved to do in court - but the atmosphere felt it was too fragile to withstand that kind of blow... and what kind of ungrateful person would he be to argue about a gift of this magnitude before even giving it a second glance? Although, to be fair, he had worn it nonstop for a number of days after recovering it post-Zak's death. But that's irrelevant right now. Just open the damn thing, Phoenix.' Holding his breath in anticipation, he carefully pulled the necklace from the box, then pried open the pendant. Inside, replacing the picture of seven-year-old Trucy in her brand new magician's costume, was a small photo of Maya, Apollo, Luke and Trucy, clearly taken relatively recently: In the middle was Maya, winking and sticking out her tongue as she threw her arms around Apollo and Luke's necks, dragging them down to her height. On the left was Apollo, also sticking out his tongue as he pulled down an eyelid with one finger.
Luke, on the right, was laughing at their antics, not bothering with a silly face himself... although that hadn't stopped him from giving Maya bunny ears beside her bun. Trucy was at the bottom of the picture, the top of her head tickling Maya's chin as she bit back laughter, concentrating her attention on the camera; Her arms appeared to be, from what little of them could be seen, holding said camera, apparently taking the photo.

"Took that last month," Apollo explained, the corner of his mouth twitching upwards into a half-smile. "Pearly wasn't available, but we got most of us in there."

"There wasn't room for me anyway," Pearl pointed out with a smile; Phoenix was surprised to note the lack of any Psyche-Locks, meaning she genuinely wasn't bothered about being excluded from the picture. "And it matches Mystic Maya's!" She giggled, her hands clasped together excitedly.

Phoenix raised an eyebrow, turning to the sheepish Maya at his side. "Matches what?"

Maya's embarrassment quickly turned to amusement. "You can be so unobservant, Nick," she gently chided him, then reached for the side of her obi opposite the bow. After a moment's fiddling, she extracted a locket of her own, the pendant identical to the one in Phoenix's hands although the chain had been swapped out for one more appropriate to its new home in her sash. With a flick of her thumb, she opened the locket, showing Phoenix the photo inside, one he recognised from the night of the Agency's rebranding: Himself and his three children laughing together as they failed to take a serious photo. "Seriously, I've been wearing this since Mother's Day, and you never noticed it!"

"Mother's Day, huh?" Phoenix repeated, a smile creeping across his face. He turned to the trio on the opposite couch. "Hence why you three were so secretive about telling me anything you were up to that day."

Luke scoffed playfully. "Nonsense, Papa. We told you we'd gone to Kurain, and about my search for my mum, didn't we?"

Phoenix could only laugh at that.

"Honestly, this whole thing was Trucy's idea," Apollo explained, patting his sister's shoulder as he gave her an affectionate look. "They were her lockets to give, and we couldn't exactly say no to her."

Trucy nodded. "I don't need them. We have other things to remember Mommy Thalassa by, and what would I need a locket with a picture of myself in it for?" She bit back giggles as she looked to their father. "And besides, I thought it really suited you, Daddy."

Phoenix raised an eyebrow as his children and their cousin giggled to themselves, then shrugged. Snapping the locket closed, he grabbed the clasps at either end of the chain and reached up to attach it around his neck, the pendant resting neatly above the zipper of his hoodie, just below the neckline of his shirt. After staring at it for a moment, he smiled. "Y'know, I have to agree with you there."

Maya smacked his arm playfully as the kids laughed.

"By the way Maya," Phoenix continued, getting to his feet and collecting the packaging of his gift, "I hope you're planning on taking those DVDs back with you today."

"Hmm?" Maya looked around the office, confused, before her gaze landed beyond Pearl, where the small mountain of Steel Samurai episodes had been left. A smirk formed on her face as she turned back to Phoenix. "You got all those reports I asked for?"

Phoenix paused, giving her an incredulous look. "You can't be serious."
"Nuh-uh," Maya replied, shaking her head and holding out her hand in a beckoning gesture. "No buts. I told you to have reports done when I got back, and now I'm back. Where's that notebook I gave you?"

Trucy's giggles were first to break the silence, quickly followed by Pearl and Luke. Phoenix shot them unamused glares, but it only made the problem worse... even Apollo was hiding his mouth behind a hand. "You heard her, Dad," the young lawyer said, muffled a little by restrained laughter.

Sighing, Phoenix threw up his hands in defeat. "I guess I should know by now not to even try fighting you," he muttered in Maya's direction, trying to sound angry around the fond smile threatening the corners of his mouth.

"You bet you should," Maya said with a knowing wink.

Apollo and Luke were pretty sure it was by design that they'd never interacted with Clay's father before today, beyond the occasional distant glimpse back in their school years. Clay had never been shy about the ups and downs (mostly downs) of his paternal relationship, and even when he'd finally talked Apollo into moving into an apartment together he'd organised his own moving day to be at a time his father was away. All in all, Clay liked to keep his friends separate from his family... which made it all the more surprising when the Wright brothers found themselves sitting in an uncomfortable silence with Mason Terran for three hours.

Although there had been no introductions, there was no mistaking that the man rapidly approaching them in the audience for the graduation ceremony was Clay's father. He and Clay were remarkably similar in appearance, although Mason's hair lacked the same wildness as Clay's; The two were similar heights and builds, and shared the same piercing stare, though Mason's face was more lined and less exuberant than his son's. The moustache helped differentiate them even further.

Apollo and Luke's surprised gazes didn't go unnoticed by the stranger as he moved past them, sitting down quickly at Luke's side. He shot the duo a quick glare, then pointedly turned his attention to the distant stage somewhere ahead of them. Apollo, embarrassed, had looked away, but Luke was never one to back down from fixing an awkward situation and gave the man a polite smile, attempting to engage him in conversation: "Hello there, sir! If I might ask, you wouldn't happen to be Clay's father, would you?"

The man didn't immediately react, pausing a few moments before turning his attention back to Luke, his expression unchanging.

"Clay Terran, I mean," Luke continued, unfazed. "My name's Luke, and this is my brother Apollo; We're friends of Clay's!"

There was another long pause before the man nodded, returning his uninterested gaze to the stage. "That's me."

Apollo tried not to let his displeasure show in his expression as he watched the awkward atmosphere get worse by the minute. Their new 'friend' obviously wasn't much of a talker.

"It's a pleasure to finally meet you!" Luke happily replied. "We've heard a lot about you, Mister Terran!"

'And very little of it good,' Apollo kept himself from saying aloud.

"Mason," the man muttered in reply.

Luke nodded, still smiling. "Mason, then. It's a ple-!"

"I didn't say you could call me that," Mason interrupted, shooting another quick glare at Luke as the young man was shocked into silence. "I just want you to be clear on my full name. I doubt my son has mentioned it." With that, he firmly stared out at the stage, no longer paying attention to his immediate neighbours.
Chastened, Luke winced and looked away, hands tightly gripping his knees. He didn't dare speak up again after that.

And thus the hours passed. As much as they would have wanted otherwise, not even the various speeches on the stage were an adequate distraction from the awkward vibes between the Wrights and Mason. When Clay was briefly on-stage to receive his diploma, Mason sat stock still and silent as Apollo and Luke madly waved their arms and shouted Chords of Steel cheers for their friend. As they calmed afterward, the elder man shot them dark looks for so blatantly defying the request to keep their cheers for the entirety of Clay's class.

Once the ceremony was finally over, the Wrights wasted no time in fleeing the audience seating, making their way for where the graduating students in their dark robes were all congregated near the stage. In the end, it was Clay who found them first, charging at them with a wordless shout of joy and throwing his arms around their necks in a strangling hug.

"Uh, yeah," Apollo agreed, a smile on his face although he was struggling to escape his friend's grip.

"Aw, dudes, I should be thanking you for coming!" Clay replied, throwing his arm off Apollo to enthusiastically noogie Luke through his hat. "Those cheers were epic!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow curiously, crossing his arms. "What would an 'epic cheer' actually sound like, I wonder...? Exaggeration aside."

Clay's laughter suddenly stopped, his hands falling from around Luke as his dark eyes locked on to something behind the Wrights on their path to meet him. Apollo and Luke, noticing their friend's odd behaviour, turned to look. Standing a few short metres away from them was Mason Terran, arms hanging at his sides like a soldier at attention as he gave the trio a stern stare.

Clearing his throat, Clay straightened, giving his father a nod. "Thanks for coming, Dad. It means a lot."

Mason didn't immediately react, and the trio thought for a moment or two that he hadn't heard Clay. Finally, he returned his son's nod. "Congratulations."

Clay gave him a strained smile. "T-thanks."

With that, Mason spun on his heel and walked away.

Clay sighed, tearing his gaze from the direction Mason had disappeared in. "I'm fine. He's always like that. Don't worry about it." Forcing a smile, he clapped his hands on his friends' shoulders. "But hey, you guys probably deserve a medal for putting up with him today!" He laughed, almost sheepishly. "The only way to make him come was to buy him a ticket myself, and I guess they misunderstood when I said I wanted you two together!"

Although Luke still looked worried for their friend, Apollo gave him a reassuring smile, slapping his back in return. "Hey, anything for our best friend, huh?"

It took about an hour to finally extricate Clay from his classmates, get him out of his graduation robes, and head back to their cars. After Mason's abrupt exit, it had taken a while for Clay to stop looking like he was faking his usual enthusiasm, but eventually he'd regained his characteristic energy, thoughts of his father long gone from his mind.

"Oh hey, I almost forgot!" Clay cried, grabbing his friends' wrists and dragging them towards his car with a grin. "I have something I want to show you!"

Apollo sighed as he fought to keep up with Clay's longer strides. "And what exactly are you showing us?"

"No idea!" Clay gleefully replied.

Luke and Apollo shot each other confused looks, but had no time to question their friend before he came to a sudden stop, releasing his friends and almost sending them running straight into his little black hatchback.

"Watch it!" Apollo barked, catching himself against a window.

"Sorry," Clay muttered with a giggle, then ran to unlock and fling open the passenger side door.

While Apollo sighed, leaning against the car with a roll of his eyes, Luke watched their friend curiously. "You have something to show us, but don't know what it is?" As Clay continued to giggle, his entire top half buried in his car, Luke suddenly gasped in realisation, a grin spreading across his face. "It's a gift!"

"A what?" Apollo asked.

Clay jumped back out of his car, proudly waving a wrapped present in his hands, soft in his hands and no larger than his head. "Got it in one!" Laughing, he slammed shut the door. "Mister Starbuck gave me this the other day and told me to open it once I graduated!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "So you brought it to the ceremony? You couldn't wait until you were back home?"

"Nope!" Clay cheerfully replied. With that, he was ripping off the paper, letting it fall to the grass below them.

"Whoa, careful!" Luke shouted as he lunged for the paper, eyes wide.

Clay wasn't paying much attention, losing the last of the wrapping and holding up the blue garment within with no small amount of glee. "Oh. My. God."

Apollo found himself unsurprised, chuckling as he crossed his arms. "I take it this is a 'welcome to the Cosmos Space Center' thing? Now you've graduated, you're an official staff member?"

Clutched in Clay's hands was a blue jacket, a high collar folded back above the shoulders, white stripes across the chest and at the ends of the sleeves. Luke gasped as he paused from his clean-up to look up at the gift. "A HAT-1 jacket?!"

Clay's mouth, hanging open in shock, slowly turned into a wide grin, and he wordlessly shouted in delight as he bounced around his friends, waving the jacket over his head. "I'm an official astronaut!" he gleefully announced, pausing to point at Apollo with a smirk. "Take that for our little bet!"

Apollo bit back laughter. "Our little bet? You mean the one I won last week, when I successfully defended a case in court?"

Clay's smirk died. "Yeah, well... Do it without any help, then it'll count!"

"I highly doubt you'll get into space before then," Apollo teased.

"You're just jealous," Clay said, slipping the jacket on over his casual t-shirt. "You two decided to become a boring lawyer and a vet, instead of something cool like me."

Luke giggled as he stood, the scraps of the wrapping paper cradled securely in his arms. "Magicians don't count as something cool anymore?" he asked, giving Apollo a pointed glance.

"He's only half a magician," Clay immediately claimed with a grin. "Those aren't cool."

Apollo just gave his friend a glare. "Let's just head home, shall we?"

The pudgy red plane was instantly recognisable long before it slammed onto the tarmac of the runway, its boat-like belly almost brushing against the asphalt as the landing gear bounced on its suspension. The propeller at its tail slowed, and the plane turned off the runway to an open space to the side, near a small arrangement of hangers, where it came to rest. A pair of officials with a stairway rushed to meet it, locking the moving stairs on a door in the fuselage, by the wings. As the two climbed up, the door opened for them, revealing a suited man waiting inside, who waved them in. After several anxious minutes' wait, the two men again left, escorted by the suited man to the bottom of the stairwell before heading off past a group of four youths to the airport terminal building.

Luke turned to his siblings as the men passed with an excited grin. "It looks like they're done!"

Clay sighed as he tugged at his blue jacket, taking note of the distance from where the quartet waited to the round plane ahead. "Did they have to use such a tiny airport? It's way too hot to stand around in the sun like this..."

Apollo scoffed, elbowing his friend. "Well, maybe if you didn't wear that ridiculous jacket twenty-four-seven..."

"It's not ridiculous!" Clay protested.

"Fine then," Apollo replied with a grin, "but we won't mourn you when you die of heat exhaustion."

Luke and Trucy gave each other a look and giggled, then rushed off ahead. "C'mon slowpokes, let's go say hello!" Trucy cried, waving at them to follow.

Although the pair didn't acknowledge Apollo's siblings, they moved to walk after them, still focussed on their conversation: "Oh, you wound me, 'Pollo!" Clay cried dramatically, his hands to his heart. "Right through the heart! I'm bleeding out, here! I didn't deserve such a fatal cutting remark!"

Apollo shook his head, but didn't bother to hide his smile. "Nimrod."

Below the plane, the suited man looked up with a smile at the small group as they approached. "Ah, there you are. I was wondering if you'd managed to make it... or noticed we'd landed already."

"Of course we wouldn't miss coming to meet you, Mister Sycamore," Luke replied, stepping forward to shake Sycamore's hand. "And the Bostonius is instantly recognisable; We couldn't not notice it touching down!"

"It's certainly unique," Clay said in agreement, getting an elbow to the chest from Apollo in reply.

"Will you be staying here while you're visiting?" Trucy asked, peering up the stairs through the open door in the side of the plane above them.

Sycamore chuckled. "That is our plan. We're paying to keep the Bostonius here, and it is our home." He looked knowingly between the girl and the open door. "I assume you're wanting a tour?"
Trucy gasped, her smile forming into a massive grin as she held her hands to her cheeks. "You'll let us look around!? That would be so cool, Mister Sycamore!"

Apollo nodded in agreement, unable to resist a smile himself. "Luke's told us quite a bit about the Bostonius over the years. It would be interesting to see how much of it is true." He shot his brother a mischievous grin, a signal of truce after their disagreement the last time they had met the man before them.

Luke was surprised, but smiled as he saw his brother's smirk. "I might embellish," he replied knowingly, "but I never lie. Excepting the times I do, of course."

Sycamore watched the pair in amusement before turning to the black-haired boy between them, who was staring up at the Bostonius with a critical look. "And your friend?"

"Oh, this is Clay," Luke announced with a smile, waving between the two as he belatedly performed introductions. "Clay, this is Mister Sycamore."

Clay gave the man a nod, but his attention was still drawn to the plane. "So, um... how high does that thing go?"

Sycamore raised an eyebrow.

Apollo rolled his eyes. "It's beyond obvious it doesn't get into space," he pointed out.

"N-no, I know that," Clay hurriedly replied, blushing a little as he fiddled with his visor, looking away. "I was... just curious."

Sycamore laughed, but before he could reply, Trucy gasped, pointing up the stairs in amazement. Two figures in flowing, brightly coloured dresses had appeared in the doorway above, one in peach pink and the other lemon yellow, drawing the group's astonished attention. They both draped scarves around their necks, fanciful hats pressed to their crowns above matching sunglasses on their faces. The taller of the pair, in yellow, grinned down at the watchers below, giving them a wave with her fingers. "Hey there, boys."

"Wow!" Trucy breathed, admiring the pair. "Emmy! Flora! You look so pretty!"

Clay snickered, tapping Luke's arm and leaning in to whisper, "You're gonna introduce me to her too, right?"

Luke only sighed.

Apollo hid laughter as he watched the two women sweep their way majestically down the stairs. "Why the fancy outfits?"

"Because this is Los Angeles," Emmy replied as though it were obvious, waving a hand to gesture around the barren tarmac. "The land where talent and beauty combine!"

Flora nodded excitedly. "Uh-huh! You gotta dress up in Los Angeles!"

"And, what, you think a talent scout is gonna pick you up in the streets and make you a movie star overnight?" Apollo asked with a teasing grin. "You're only going to pick up con artists that way."

Emmy smirked right back at him. "Says the kid who wears a magician's outfit every waking moment of the day."
Apollo turned red as Trucy giggled at his side. "Objection! Th-that's different!"

"And no matter what you wear, you still look positively radiant, my lady," Clay insisted, giving Flora a charming grin as he took her hand and kissed her gloved fingers, prompting Flora to giggle, her cheeks flushing.

Apollo rolled his eyes, nudging Clay back from the young woman. "Okay, that's enough."

"You're just jealous I have charm," Clay shot back with a scoff and a teasing grin.

"I have plenty of charm," Apollo replied, a small smile forming on his face. "I just save it for the stage."

Luke giggled, then quickly waved between Emmy and Clay. "Emmy, this is my friend Clay Terran. Clay, this is Emmy Altava."

"Ah, a pleasure to meet you!" Emmy replied, giving the grinning Clay a wink over the top of her sunnies. "Luke and Flora have told us about you!"

"The latter more than the former," Sycamore added with a sly smile at Flora.

The young woman blushed as she looked away shyly. "Uncle, please..."

Clay just gave Flora another wide grin, one hand behind his back in a short bow while the other was at his ever-present visor.

"Flo-ra has a cru-ush!" came a sing-song voice from the stairs, and the group barely had time to register the arrival of six-year-old Alfendi Layton before Flora had again turned red, this time for a very different reason.

"You take that back right now, 'Fendi!" Flora ordered, storming up the stairs towards the boy, who only ducked under her grasp to race back down the stairs.

Alfendi laughed loudly as he jumped off the last step and made a run for it between Emmy and Sycamore, only for the latter to grab the boy's collar as he passed, pulling him to a halt. "Let me go!"

"Apologise to your sister," Sycamore ordered, his free hand on his hip.

"Uncle!" Alfendi pleaded, pulling at the man's grip and failing to wriggle out of it.

"Now."

With a long-suffering sigh, Alfendi stopped his wriggling to mutter a reluctant, "Sorry," glaring all the while at the tarmac below his feet.

Flora stuck her nose in the air, adjusting the scarf at her neck. "Apology accepted," she airily replied, lightly stepping back down the stairs.

As Sycamore released Alfendi from his grip, Luke knelt down to give the boy a smile. "Hello, Alfendi! Adjusting to our time zone well?"

Alfendi shrugged, cheering up a little now he wasn't being punished for teasing his sister. "Guess so," he replied.

"Ooh, yeah, it's late at night for you guys!" Trucy remembered, then gave Alfendi a big grin. "You get to stay up late without getting in trouble! Better make the most of it, huh?" She gave him a knowing wink for good measure.

Alfendi giggled in reply. "And I got time off school, too!"

"Whoa whoa, wait a sec, you're the baby who was here with the Professor and Flora way back when!?!" Clay cried, hunching down to examine the six-year-old with a gleeful grin. "How'd you get so big all of a sudden, huh?"

Alfendi raised an eyebrow, giving Clay a look that clearly indicated he thought the young man was missing more than a few brain cells. "I... grew up?"

While everyone else laughed at the boy's clueless response, Sycamore snapped his fingers in thought, turning to Luke. "That reminds me. Speaking of my brother, he wished for me to pass on his apologies he couldn't make it himself. Exam period and all."

"It's understandable," Luke replied with a smile. "He already explained in his last letter, so we weren't expecting him. And Athena couldn't come for the same reasons."

"Oh, right, Athena!" Emmy cried, eyes wide as she looked between the Wright brothers with a grin. "She had something she wanted us to give you!"

Apollo and Luke shot each other confused looks. "She did?" Apollo asked.

Emmy beckoned for the group to follow as she turned and climbed up the stairs. "C'mon, I'll show you around while I dig it out!"

"Yay, a tour!" Trucy squealed in delight and hurried to follow.

Sycamore stepped to one side as the procession headed up the stairs in single file, Alfendi sticking to his side with a frown.

"Do we have to go back in, Uncle?" the boy asked. "We only just got here!"

"No, you don't have to," Sycamore assured him with a smile. "You can wait out here with me if you like."

Apollo, at the back of the line to head into the Bostonius, paused as he overheard the pair, and hung back a while on the bottom step. "Oh, um, Mister Sycamore, I should warn you, Trucy will be wanting to pull you aside at some point to question you."

Sycamore frowned, confused. "Question me?" he repeated.

"Did you forget?" Apollo replied with a smile. "Trucy begged you last time to come visit us once I'd heard the end of Luke's story, so she could ask you questions without spoiling anything for me."

"O-oh," the elder man muttered, pressing his glasses against his nose self-consciously. "Yes, I do recall her saying that now."

Apollo gave a short laugh. "I'd be interested in hearing more about the "miracles of Monte d'Or" myself. I'm sure most of her questions will be about those."

Eyes closed in an internal sigh, Sycamore nodded. "Understood."

Alfendi cocked his head to one side, squinting up at the young man on the stair. "Why about Monte d'Or?"
"Because we're both magicians," Apollo explained to the boy with a proud grin. "Miracles are our trade."

[View the Court Record]
The interior of the Bostonius hadn't changed much in the nine years since Luke had briefly lived in it as a child; The same wallpaper decorated the walls, the purple sofas spread across the area below the flight deck... even the same old map was framed on one wall, if a bit more faded than it used to be. What had changed, Luke could almost count on one hand, as long as he made sure to group the multiple minor differences together according to cause: Keats' various toys and living necessities were dotted about (all well-loved and more numerous than they had been before), sending Luke idly wondering whatever had happened to the cat's original owner that he never returned to them; The Descole outfit was openly on display now, though only in parts, with the cape hanging on a coat-rack and the hat, boa and mask on a mannequin head set up on a nearby table; An old camera of Emmy's appeared to be in pieces on the coffee table, and Luke strongly suspected the various decorative souvenirs from various places all over the world were her doing too.

Luke's contemplation of the main room was broken by the squeal of his sister as she dashed to the purple couches, where he noticed Keats the cat was perched, leaning against an armrest. "A kitty!" she cried, dropping to the floor in front of the feline and gazing at him longingly, her hands cupping her face. "What's its name?"

"That is Master Keats, young lady," came a familiar Scottish brogue, and Luke noticed Raymond watching them from the flight deck, making his way slowly down the stairs. "He is resting right now."

"Oh, I won't disturb him then," Trucy replied, backing up only a little but continuing to admire Keats as he gave a wide yawn.

Luke smiled as he stepped forward to meet the old man at the bottom of the stairs. "Hello again, Raymond."

"Master Luke, you have certainly grown since last we met," Raymond replied with a chuckle, though he seemed totally unsurprised (as he always did, Luke recalled). As the pair shook hands, he added, "Are you and your family staying long?"

"Not too long," Emmy answered, walking past where Apollo appeared to be holding Clay back from charging at the flight deck, no matter what stood in his way. "I'm just planning to fetch something, and we thought we'd show the kids around!"

Luke frowned. "We're not kids anymore, Emmy."

"Yeah!" Trucy agreed from the floor, her hands on her hips as she turned rather awkwardly to face the woman in yellow. "I'm a teenager!"

"Well, Trucy's a kid," Apollo replied with a smirk, earning a glare from his sister.

It didn't hit Luke how much smaller the Bostonius seemed when compared to his memories until Emmy and Flora led the Wrights and Clay into the downstairs hall, where the sleeping quarters were.
Raymond's room, at the back, was still as off-limits as it had been when Luke was young, and so technically was Sycamore's, but Emmy was happy to throw open his door to give them a brief glimpse of the study inside, all neat and tidy except for the mess on the floor that was Alfendi's temporary bed. Next to that was Emmy's room, the former guest room where Luke remembered sleeping with Emmy and Aurora in his youth. There was even still a sleeping bag on the floor, though it was now Flora's rather than his or Emmy's.

"I remember this room being a lot bigger," he muttered as he peered inside over his sister's head. "Not much, but... bigger."

Emmy laughed as she dug through her closet, at the head of her bed. "Yeah, you were small enough to just sleep on the floor back then," she pointed out, gesturing to the carpet behind her where Flora stood. "And sharing that space with me, as well!"

"Oh wow, remembering you being so young," Flora added with a nostalgic smile at Luke. "That was such a long time ago!"

Apollo snickered, elbowing his brother. "Yup, that would be back when you were actually smaller than me!"

Clay leaned down a little to rest his chin on Apollo's shoulder, flattening the collar of his cape to give the magician a teasing grin. "Aw, is 'Pollo upset he's short?"

Instead of dignifying the jibe with an answer, Apollo shot his friend a glare and shoved him away.

Luke giggled, and decided not to point out he was only taller than his brother by a couple of centimetres.

"Aha!" Emmy cried, and finally emerged from her wardrobe with a bulging plastic bag. "Found it!"

"Found what?" Trucy asked, her hat in her hands.

Emmy manoeuvred around her bed (Luke fought not to mentally refer to it as Aurora's anymore) and approached the Wrights in the doorway with a grin, holding out the plastic bag. "Here it is! Your thing from Athena!"

Apollo frowned, gingerly taking the offered bag. "What even is it?" he asked, and immediately peered into the opening of the opaque white plastic. With a start, he looked back up at Emmy with wide eyes. "She's sent us CDs!?"

Trucy gasped, jumping to try and look in the bag herself. "CDs!?" she excitedly repeated.

"Sent you CDs," Emmy corrected, giving Apollo a smirk. "She specifically told me 'Give these to Apollo the moment you meet him; They're very important'."

Apollo's nose wrinkled in disgust as he looked back into the bag. "But they're... Gavinners CDs..."

Trucy's eager jumping paused in shock.

Luke suddenly burst into laughter. "Oh, I remember now!" he cried, leaning against the wall. "Athena and I were doing research together on Klavier Gavin after your case against him! She even told me she'd send her half of the research to you!"

Apollo glared at his brother. "Her 'research' consists of the entire physical catalogue of his band!?"
"I guess so!" Luke replied, trying and failing to stifle his giggles. "I can text her to make sure, but as Gavin writes all their lyrics, I think she was looking into his work to get a better idea of who he is."

"That's such a good idea!" Trucy decided, once more bouncing to try and look into the bag. "I mean, I've been listening to some of their songs on YouTube, but I didn't think we could call that 'research'!"

Apollo's suspicious gaze snapped to his sister. "You've been what!?"

"I haven't paid for anything," Trucy assured him, rolling her eyes exaggeratedly. "That would just be weird, asking Daddy for money to buy Mister Gavin's music."

Emmy was looking thoughtful, arms crossed as she tapped a finger against her cheek. "I could have sworn Athena had some papers she was planning to put in there as well... Did she forget to include them?"

"She must have," Luke agreed, giving his brother a reassuring smile. "Actually, I could ask her right now if you like. It's almost ten PM over there, so I think she'll still be awake."

"That would be great, thanks," Apollo sighed, trying not to sound ungrateful as he held the unwanted bag of CDs gingerly in his grip, away from Trucy's clawing hands.

There was a chuckle from behind him, and Clay suddenly reached around to also try and sneak into the bag, grinning cheekily. "Well, if you don't want it...!"

Apollo pulled the bag away from his roommate with a glare. "Drop it, Terran."

Back up in the main cabin, Luke stretched his arms, enjoying the open space when compared to the tiny living quarters in the back. He could hear Raymond pottering about in the kitchen, likely making note of the Bostonius' supplies for a restocking run later. Keats lay expectantly in the half-open doorway, his tail flicking slowly back and forth as he stared into the room with great interest. Luke couldn't resist a smile as he moved to sit down on the large purple sofa, pulling his phone from his satchel.

'I hope Athena hasn't already gone to bed. I'd hate to wake her."

Nevertheless, Luke didn't dare pause as he set his phone to dial her number. He knew deliberating over it would only make the time even later, and Athena usually set her phone to silent once she'd gone to bed; If she didn't pick up, he'd know it was too late and could leave her a text for when she awoke in another seven or eight hours. To his surprise, he didn't end up having to wait long.

"Hey Luke! What's with the late call?"

Luke almost laughed at the surprise of hearing Athena's voice interrupting the dull ring-tone. "Ah, I'm glad you're awake! I wanted to let you know that the Bostonius has arrived, and Apollo got your package."

Athena gasped. "Oh, good! Has he had a chance to look at it? I know there was a lot in there..."

"Well..." Luke shrugged, forgetting for a moment she couldn't see him. "He did have a quick look. I don’t think he’s very fussed about Gavinners music though, so I’ll probably end up looking them over with Trucy."

Athena snorted. "Oh, yeah, I figured he wouldn't be impressed with the music! What about the rest of it?"

At that, Luke paused. "Rest of it?"

"Yeah, there should be a wad of paper in there," Athena continued. "I printed out my psychologically-lyrical analyses for him to look at, and some other stuff I wanted to ask him that was, y’know, more law-related. Has he looked at that?"

Luke wasn’t quite sure how to break the news to her, so he decided to be blunt. "Athena... there was just the CDs in there. No paper."

There was a long pause, then Luke heard the distant wooden thuds of drawers being rapidly opened and closed.

"Athena?"

The distant scraping of wood-on-wood continued, until finally Luke heard the noises abruptly stop, and Athena sighed defeatedly. "I left them all in my desk," she admitted. "They must've got caught up in my study notes..."

Luke tried not to laugh; Athena was feeling bad enough about it. "That’s okay. Just email me the files and I'll pass them on to Apollo myself. You said they were print-outs, didn't you?"

"Y-yeah, okay, I'll do that," Athena agreed, then sighed in relief. "You'll tell Apollo I'm sorry for forgetting, right?"

"Sure I will." Luke paused, hearing the voices of his siblings and friends echo from the hallway below, and smiled. "I'll let you go now though. Oh, and I should thank you for sharing your research with us."

Athena giggled. "No problem! I was just studying anyway. Talk to you later, Luke!" With that, she had hung up.

Luke stared at his silent phone in bemusement for a moment before shaking his head with a fond smile and putting the phone back in his pocket. He'd make sure to call her again when he next had time.

The group took their time heading to the Agency, Clay and the Bostonius crew getting to know each other and everyone generally just clowning around in the airship before piling into Luke's and Clay's cars to head off. Once at the family home, Apollo was quick to chase Clay off alone, as the young astronaut had a busy week ahead of him at the Space Center and had homework to do anyway.

"Your home doesn't seem so different since I was last here," Flora pointed out as they passed through reception.

"To be fair, you're the only one of us who has been here before," Sycamore replied.

Alfendi nodded, arms crossed knowingly. "Yeah, and I don't count cuz I was just a baby."

"You never know, maybe you'll see something you recognise, Alfendi," Luke said with a smile, and led the visitors through to the office, his siblings trailing at the back.

The moment Luke opened the door, they heard Phoenix's harried voice trailing through from within:
"-wouldn't be asking you if I didn't have something genuinely important going on. Just answer the question."

Confused, Luke took only two steps into the room, staring across to the desk on the other side of the room, where he could see his father bent over in his chair, a hand on his face and his phone pressed to his ear. Luke cast a glance behind him, and glimpsed Emmy and Flora at his back, Alfendi trying to run in before a grown-up's hand (probably Sycamore's) held him back.

Phoenix gave a great sigh. "Fine, fine. If we don't have any choice, of course I'll be there. You know this whole thing would just crumble to pieces without me, anyway." He smirked, then lowered his hand from his face and looked up, jolting in surprise as he saw the small crowd gathering in the doorway. "Hang on," he said to the phone, then stood, his free hand covering the microphone as he gave everyone an apologetic smile. "Um, sorry, it's a very important call. I can't exactly put this off. Maybe if you guys go to the kitchen, I can catch up to you once it's done."

Luke nodded, leading his friends around the red sofas. "I didn't know you were expecting an important call," he said.

Phoenix's smile turned into an annoyed frown as he lowered himself back into his chair. "Neither did I," he replied. "This got sprung on me."

Apollo slipped past the visitors, dashing to his father's desk and leaning over the computer monitor with an eager look. "What's it about?" he asked. "Can I help?"

"Not with this," Phoenix chuckled in reply. "And I'll tell you later. Promise."

Although disappointed, Apollo accepted that and waved everyone through into the kitchen.

"Oh, Apollo!" Phoenix cried, holding his phone awkwardly with the hand over the mic as his other grabbed an envelope on the desktop in front of him. "I almost forgot this thing came earlier. It seems to be addressed to you three."

Apollo raised an eyebrow as he took the offered item. "Alright. Talk to you later, Dad."

Phoenix gave him a grateful smile and returned to his phone. "Sorry about that, the kids got back. What were we talking about?"

Apollo was still examining the envelope as Trucy closed the office door behind her, the last of the group to enter the kitchen. "What is it, what is it!?" she demanded, jumping at her eldest brother excitedly. "Who's writing a letter to all three of us!?"

"I certainly don't know!" Apollo pointed out to her.

Emmy was looking around the room curiously, even stealing a peek into the laundry. "This is a cosy little place you've got here," she said.

Alfendi gave her a confused look. "Isn't that just another way of calling it 'small'?"

Flora was quick to shush him.

"Well, until your father has finished his call, we certainly can't get a full tour," Sycamore told the Wrights, and gestured to the letter in Apollo's hand. "You may as well open it now and see if it's important."

Luke shrugged, approaching his brother. "He's right. May as well find out who's writing to all three of us."

Apollo rolled his eyes and sighed, then made his way to the dining table, ripping open the envelope flap with his finger. With his siblings still sticking close to his sides, he took a quick peek into the letter and frowned, then carefully held it out as he pulled at the contents, spilling three identical yellow slips of paper onto the table below.

Trucy was quick to snap the slips of paper up, examining them carefully. "What are these?" she asked.

Apollo and Luke didn't seem to have heard, Apollo pulling out the paper between his fingers and almost dropping a second, which Luke grabbed. The empty envelope left forgotten on the table, the brothers each studied their papers with confused frowns.

Sycamore, Emmy and the Layton children joined the Wrights, all gathered around the table as they watched and waited for explanations. "So?" Emmy asked, smiling eagerly for news. "What is it?"

Apollo glanced up at her, still looking confused, then shook his head and began to read aloud: "Herr Apollo, Doktor Luke and Fraulein Trucy Wright: You are hereby invited to the July seventh evening performance of the 'Guilty As Charged' tour, featuring world-famous rock band The Gavinners and special guest Lamiroir."

Everyone gasped, Trucy almost dropping the papers in her hands. Alfendi, the only one not to be shocked, looked around the table in confusion.

"Please find enclosed," Apollo continued, "three VIP tickets in your names - These will allow you access backstage during the show."
Everyone looked to the slips of paper in Trucy's hands, and her grin magnified as she regarded the precious items in a new, awed, light.

"Also enclosed is..." Apollo paused to sigh, looking at the letter in his hands with a mixture of disbelief and resigned acceptance. "An invoice for them... Don't fear, I have given you, as my friends, twenty percent off what the regular price would have been. I'm sure you understand I can't just give these away for free, not even for you."

Luke gave his brother a half-smile as he held up the paper in his own hands, signalling somewhat sheepishly what it was.

Apollo sighed again, resisting the urge to mutter darkly at the letter and instead continue reading. "I can't wait to see the three of you there. This is a unique opportunity after all, and I am eager to get to know you all better." Apollo paused to glare at the paper, again resisting the urge to mutter some choice words. "We've played together on one stage, now I show you how I play on mine. With kindest regards, Klavier Gavin." With that, his hands lowered, the letter done.

There was silence for a long moment as everyone contemplated the contents of the unusual letter... a silence broken by a very loud squeal from Trucy, who jumped at her eldest brother's arm as she waved the three tickets in his face. "Polly, we got invited to a Gavinners concert! Mister Gavin called us his friends!"

Apollo scoffed, dropping the paper on the table with disgust. "Right, 'friends'. That's why he's making us pay for the wretched things."

Luke was unsure, studying the invoice in his hands. "Not quite. Those tickets have already been paid for."

"What do you mean?" Flora asked, confused.

"They obviously must have been," Sycamore pointed out, gesturing to the slips of paper in Trucy's tight grip. "Tickets are printed at the time they are bought and paid for, not before. This Klavier Gavin must clearly trust you to pay him back for the expense."

Luke nodded, showing the invoice to his unconvinced brother. "Mister Gavin's paid for these himself. He's expecting us to pay him back. See? Those are his details there for where to send the money." When Apollo still wrinkled his nose in disgust, Luke added, "And at a discount too, don't forget that."

"He's still expecting us to pay for this 'gift' of his, discount or not," Apollo pointed out, arms crossed. "And did you even look at how much he's expecting us to fork over? There's no way we can justify throwing away money like that."

"You mean we can't go!?" Trucy cried, face falling. "B-but... that's not fair! I've never got to go to a concert before!" She pulled on Apollo's arm, almost toppling him over with her sudden weight. "And we already have the tickets, Polly! Why can't we go!?"

Apollo almost growled, grabbing the invoice from Luke's hand to show to Trucy. "Then you're happy to take out a loan on the next thirty-years-worth of your pocket money to pay for it!?"

Luke grimaced, gesturing to their friends. "To be fair Apollo, we make our friends pay to go to your show."

"But it's different for us!" Apollo shot back, slamming the invoice on the table as he turned back to his brother. "We barely get by! Gavin is a rich and famous celebrity!"
"But that's why I wanna go!" Trucy whined, clinging tighter to Apollo's arm.

Sycamore sighed, holding up his hands in a peace-making gesture. "Perhaps it would behove all of us to calm down and discuss this rationally? If you've forgotten, your father is in the next room on an important phone call." He raised an eyebrow pointedly, arms crossed. "You don't want to disturb him, do you?"

The Wright kids shuffled guiltily, Trucy releasing Apollo's arm as the trio carefully separated from each other.

"Honestly?" Emmy spoke up in the silence, holding a finger in the air. "I think you should go. That letter's right, this is a unique opportunity. You can't just turn it down."

Apollo sighed, leaning forward on the table. "That's another reason why we can't go. You guys aren't leaving until Friday. We all had plans to spend that time together."

"Oh, it's just one evening. We don't mind if you cancel," Flora chipped in with a cheerful smile. "You get to go behind-the-scenes of a concert! That sounds so exciting!"

"Right!?" Trucy cried, gesturing to Flora and looking at Apollo pointedly. He just glared at her in return.

"We have plenty of time to do things together as a group," Emmy added with a smirk. "We can handle ourselves alone for a single evening."

Sycamore chuckled in agreement, a hand resting on his chin. "Indeed. Getting up to mischief on our own is almost a hobby of ours."

Luke thought a moment, then nodded and gave his friends a smile. "Well, if you're okay with it then I'm happy to go." He looked to Apollo, almost apologetically. "Um, as for paying for it... I'm sure you're just exaggerating the kind of dent it would cause, Apollo. We can handle it."

Apollo rolled his eyes. "I can't believe you're all happy to go along with this." He tapped at the letter on the table in front of him, shifting his stern gaze back and forth between his brother and sister. "Have you two completely forgotten? After what he did to Dad, after what I had to do to his brother, and he's acting all buddy-buddy? Don't you think he's up to something?"

Trucy looked away, crest-fallen, but Luke shook his head, staring his brother right back. "What I think is that Mister Gavin is better than that," he said. "He's proven already he's not out for revenge. He was seeking Papa's forgiveness. There's no ulterior motive here, Apollo."

"Um, excuse me?" Flora butted in, raising a hand and looking confused. "But... what are you talking about? Mister Gavin did something to Mister Wright?"

Apollo sighed, glaring into the distance. "Klavier Gavin is the reason Dad's not a lawyer anymore."

Flora gasped, her hands flying to her mouth. Emmy and Sycamore cast surprised glances at each other.

"Again, that's a bit of an exaggeration," Luke firmly cut in, arms crossed. "All he did was call out forged evidence when he saw it. How was he to know what the defendant was going to do after that? Or what was going to happen to Papa?"

"He still kicked all that off," Apollo shot back. "Dad would never have lost his badge if it weren't for him."
Emmy tapped her cheek in thought. "So, any reason why you've never told us this before, Luke? That sounds awfully important."

Luke shrugged. "I didn't know the details myself until this past April."

Flora was now looking conflicted. "Well, if you're so adamant about not going, Apollo..." She gave him a hopeful smile. "I'll take your ticket instead!"

Apollo sputtered a moment in shock. "No!" he cried, hands pressed to the table. "No-one's going! We're sending these right back to him with a 'no thank you!'"

"What!?" Trucy cried, then whacked her brother's arm with a hurt look. "No! We can't do that! I want to go!"

Emmy scoffed, giving Flora a smile. "Well, even if you three don't, I don't see why we can't join in on the fun. What do you say we buy our own tickets, Flora? Regular ones, of course."

Flora grinned. "Oh, that sounds wonderful!"

"Great," Apollo muttered, rolling his eyes.

Sycamore sighed, pressing his glasses to his face. "Well, you two go have fun wasting your money on resold tickets from scalpers. I'll be staying behind at the Bostonius with Alfendi."

"See?" Trucy hissed at Apollo. "Now they're going too! Why can't we!? We ne-!"

"Wait, stop everything!" Flora cried, her suddenly panicked look calling Trucy's tirade to a halt as everyone turned to the young woman. Flora was looking around the room frantically, her hands pressed to her chest and eyes wide. "Where's Alfendi gone!?"

No matter how focussed he was on his very important call, there was no way Phoenix could have missed the kitchen door slowly and silently opening. Keeping an ear on the voice of his friend on the other end of the line, he watched as a red-headed boy slipped into the room, closing the door behind him as carefully as he'd opened it. Noticing Phoenix's eyes on him, he flashed a small smile and pressed a finger to his lips, indicating he would stay quiet. Phoenix nodded in return, then returned his attention to his phone, keeping half an eye on the boy just in case.

Alfendi proved to be remarkably well behaved. He stayed in Phoenix's sight at all times, busying himself by silently looking around the room at the various magic props, bookshelves and other random items dotted about. Phoenix had no idea why the boy had come back into the room, and alone, but he supposed the scenario of an important call was probably something familiar to Alfendi from his home; Hershel Layton was certainly an important enough man that he might get very important calls at home occasionally, and he would have been sure to impress on his son the correct manners when someone was on the phone. It was a relief they seemed to have taken.

"Then I'll see you tomorrow, Wright," said the voice on Phoenix's phone.

"Yeah yeah, bright and early," Phoenix replied with a grin. "Until then." With that, he (finally) hung up, placing his phone down on the desk with a sigh.

Alfendi looked over from where he was examining the piano. "Who were you talking to?"

"A friend," Phoenix explained with a smile, then got up from his chair and rounded the desk. "So, why are you in here, may I ask?"

"They were all arguing in there," Alfendi replied, shrugging.

"A concert?" Phoenix repeated to himself, casting a confused glance at the kitchen door. "Is that what the letter was about?"

"Mm hmm," Alfendi mumbled, then pointed to the piano, abruptly changing the subject. "I remember this. From last time."

Phoenix couldn't resist a smile, walking forward to crouch at the boy's side. "Ah yes, I'm not surprised. You quite enjoyed playing it, if I remember rightly."

Alfendi grinned. "It made a lot of noise. I don't get to do that much without being told off."

"You've never tried to learn an instrument?" Phoenix laughed in surprise. "I thought your father could play the piano, or the organ, or something like that."
"Yeah," Alfendi muttered, his smile fading. "I'm not very good at playing music. Just making noise." He frowned. "And I don't like practising."

'Well, that would put an effective damper on any prospective musical skills,' Phoenix mused. "Me too," he agreed, patting the boy on the back.

At that moment, the door to the kitchen swung open, admitting a wide-eyed Flora. "Mister Wright, have you-!?" She paused, noticing the desk she had been aiming for was empty, and turned around to see Phoenix and Alfendi standing by the piano behind her. "Alfendi!" she shouted, and jumped on her younger brother to give him a tight hug. "Don't ever run off like that again! I was worried sick!"

Sycamore poked his head in the door, then looked back into the kitchen to call "We found him!" before coming into the office himself.

"I don't know why it took you so long," Alfendi replied with a shrug, wriggling out of his sister's grip with a frown. "I've been in here for ages."

Flora stepped back from her brother, hands on her hips. "You know full well you're supposed to tell me before you go running off! The Professor made it a rule!"

"I know," Alfendi groaned, visibly struggling not to roll his eyes. "Papa gave me, like, a million rules though! Do I have to follow all of them!?"

Eventually, the Layton siblings were calmed down from their bickering and the Wright children were recalled from their search (Apollo and Trucy had been scouring upstairs, while Luke checked the laundry and the alleyway behind their building), and everyone settled down in the office around the red couches with some of the green tea the Feys always kept stocked for their visits (plus some juice for the visiting six-year-old). Trucy and Alfendi, being the youngest, sat directly on the carpet, while the six adults took up all the available sofa space.

Phoenix leaned back in his seat, leaning on the armrest at his side. "So, what was that letter all about?" he asked, directing a grin at Luke opposite him and Apollo at his side. "Something to do with a concert, I hear?"

Apollo sighed, crossing his arms, and Luke looked away, his hands fiddling nervously in his lap.

Trucy huffed from the floor next to her father. "Mister Gavin's invited us backstage to his concert on Tuesday! And Polly doesn't want to go!"

"What!?!" Phoenix cried in surprise, jerking up in his seat. He noticed Sycamore, Emmy and Flora carefully avoiding eye contact, busying themselves with sipping their tea. Alfendi just rolled his eyes, playing with his glass of juice.

Recognising another argument threatening on the near horizon, Luke leaned forward in his seat, resting a hand on his sister's shoulder and cutting any fight off at the pass. "Could you fetch the letter for us, Trucy?"

The teen sighed. "Alright," she mumbled, then got to her feet and dashed off into the kitchen.

The middle Wright child returned his attention to his father. "The letter was from Klavier Gavin. He's sent us three backstage tickets, for his concert at Sunshine Coliseum."

"But he still expects us to pay for them," Apollo added bitterly, raising an eyebrow.
"Oh?" Phoenix asked, surprised.

Luke winced, nodding. "Y-yes, it would cost quite a lot. B-but he has given us a discount, and technically they're already paid for anyway; He's just expecting us to pay him back."

Phoenix didn't reply, frowning slightly as he stared off into the distance.

"Here it is!" Trucy called as she re-entered the room, waving the opened envelope over her head. As she got to the table, she quickly emptied its contents back out, snatching up the three tickets to show Phoenix. "See, Daddy? We already have the tickets, so we should go, right?"

"No we are not!" Apollo snapped, grabbing at the invoice to also show Phoenix. "Dad, look at what he's expecting us to pay for these!"

Sighing, Phoenix held up his hands, silencing the pair. "I am perfectly capable of looking at things myself," he pointed out, giving Apollo and Trucy stern stares until they sheepishly placed their items back on the table, Trucy lowering herself back down to sit on the carpet. Free of his children's hounding, Phoenix finally turned his attention to the letter.

It took a few minutes for him to peruse the contents of the envelope, his gaze carefully expressionless in his best poker face. He could feel the stares of his children on him, and the occasional curious gaze of their silent guests, but he didn't acknowledge them, quietly reading Klavier's letter before turning to the invoice.

Finally, Apollo couldn't take the quiet anymore. "You agree we can't go, don't you?" he asked. "I mean, Gavin's clearly up to something. And I doubt we could afford to go, anyway."

"No, we could just about manage that," Phoenix muttered distractedly, returning his attention to the letter. "If you boys chip in for your own tickets, that'd help too."

Trucy's face erupted into a grin, while Apollo's paled. "You can't be serious...!" he said.

"We get to go!?" Trucy cried. "Really really truly!?"

"But Gavin's clearly planning something!" Apollo argued, giving his father a pleading look. "You know we can't trust him, Dad!"

Phoenix finally looked up to meet Apollo's gaze with an innocent grin. "Oh, I'm sure he's planning something," he replied. "He's planning to give you three a solid night of entertainment."

As Apollo stared in disbelief, Luke giggled. "I'm glad we got all that sorted out," the younger Wright brother said.

"And I was looking up tickets too," Emmy spoke up, a finger in the air as she grinned proudly. "Flora and I were thinking of going ourselves. We've been hearing a lot about these 'Gavinners' recently!"

Flora looked to her little brother. "What about you, Alfendi? Are you interested?"

Alfendi shifted, uncertain. "Um, what exactly is going to happen there?"

"Very loud music," Sycamore filled in with a dry look. "And equally dense crowds."

"And that's half the fun of it!" Emmy replied with a grin.
Alfendi wrinkled his nose. "No thank you," he muttered.

Apollo sighed, lying back in his seat with his head resting on top of the cushion behind him. "Great. Somehow this has turned into a group excursion."

Phoenix chuckled, but his smile was quick to fade. "That reminds me, I have some bad news to break."

Everyone looked up to watch him with surprise. "What is it?" Luke asked.

"Nothing serious," Phoenix assured him, looking to their visitors. "It's just that I'll be very busy over the next few days; I don't think I'll have the time to show you guys around myself like we planned."

"Was that what your call was about?" Alfendi asked.

Sycamore shook his head. "Unfortunate, but understandable," he said. "I imagine this is too important to put off?"

Phoenix nodded. "I tried to, believe me, but this is something that has to be done now. I don't exactly have a choice."

"What will you be doing?" Trucy asked, watching her father with confusion.

"Yeah," Apollo agreed, suspicious. "This has never happened before, Dad. What's going on?"

Phoenix just grinned. "Secret mission."

Trucy groaned, rolling her eyes, while Apollo looked thoughtful. "Wait, really? You'll tell me later, right?"

"Of course," Phoenix promised, still grinning as he relaxed in his seat. "Later later."

Apollo's eyes narrowed. "What does that mean?"

"I'll tell you later," Phoenix simply said.

Honoured (Paying) Guests

July 6, 1:25PM
Kurain Village

The bus was quick to empty when it pulled up to Kurain Village that afternoon. Its handful of passengers hid under the small shelter, waiting until the bus they had just exited had turned and disappeared back down the road to the train station. As it passed, the door of the mansion opposite them flew open, and a teenage girl in pink robes dashed out, grinning excitedly as she paused at the top of the stairs, pressing her hands together and bowing deeply in greeting. "Welcome to Kurain Village, honoured guests," she called. "We're glad to see you have made it safely."

Trucy giggled, breaking off from the group huddled under the shelter to race across the road and greet her cousin with a hug, standing on her tiptoes on the second step from the top. "Hi Pearly!" Given Trucy's slightly taller frame, this wasn't difficult for either of them to accomplish. "Where's Mommy?"

Still grinning, Pearl pulled away from Trucy as her brothers crossed the road to join them, Luke waving along their visitors behind him. Pearl gave the visitors another quick bow. "Mystic Maya will be coming to greet you shortly," she announced, in a 'proper' manner that the Wrights weren't used to hearing from her. "Please, come inside." With that, she turned and went inside.

Luke, Apollo and Trucy gave each other confused looks, before the latter pair followed her in. Luke shrugged before waving in his friends.

In the Meditation Room, Pearl was automatically directing everyone to remove their shoes, though she halted awkwardly as she noticed that the sight of the Wrights doing so was enough of a prompt for the Bostonius crew to follow suit. Apollo was the first to finish, and he approached the girl with crossed arms. "You can drop the act now, Pearly. You've met these guys before."

"Oh, thank goodness!" Emmy suddenly cried with a laugh, waving apologetically at Pearl. "I was beginning to think you were a sister or some other very similar-looking relative!"

Pearl bit a thumbnail. "I'm sorry," she mumbled, glancing back at Emmy before looking away. "I thought you'd want a traditional welcome. You're honoured guests, after all."

Luke snorted, biting back a giggle as he shoved his shoes in one of the provided cubby holes. "Aren't we honoured guests? You've never greeted us that way."

"Oh, well," Pearl muttered, hiding a small smile, "I've always thought of you as 'family', not 'guests'."

Luke froze, surprised, and Trucy giggled as she pulled at his arm. "Well, duh, how'd you forget that, Luke?"

Chuckling, Luke adjusted his hat, looking down at his sister. "Yes, that was a silly question, wasn't it?"

Apollo just shook his head, amused. "Nice to know family doesn't deserve a special welcome," he joked, giving Pearl a grin. She giggled in return.
Sycamore straightened his tie as he stood from stowing away his shoes, then approached Pearl with a hand outstretched. "It's a pleasure to be here, Miss Fey. Flora was telling us of her last visit here during our trip."

"Oh, really?" Pearl replied, politely shaking the man's hand, then looked to Flora with a smile. "I was at school then, wasn't I?"

Flora nodded, looking up from where she was hovering over Alfendi, the last of the group to be putting his shoes away. "Oh yes, you and Trucy were both indisposed that day. And then I was visiting alone the next summer, and I didn't have the time to come all the way up-"

At that moment, the hallway door flew open, interrupting Flora as everyone turned their attention to the incoming woman in purple robes, floating in almost serenely were it not for the massive grin on her face. "Yo!" she called, giving their guests a wave. "How's it going?"

"Mommy!" Trucy cried, running to give Maya a hug.

Maya laughed as she hugged the teen back. "And how's my little girl, huh?" She beckoned to Trucy's brothers, adding, "And my boys, how are you two?"

Luke giggled and waved, while Apollo crossed his arms, hiding a smile. "We're fine, Mom," he assured her.

"Pffft, fine, don't get a hug then," Maya scoffed, releasing Trucy as the girl snickered in amusement.

"Hello Maya!" Flora called, stepping forward towards the woman. "It's a pleasure to see you again!"

"Flora!" Maya replied, pulling the young woman into a quick hug. "Welcome back to Fey Manor!" Releasing her, she then looked around for Alfendi, spotting him sitting on the low shelves and looking bored. "And you too, Alfendi! You probably don't remember your last visit, do you?"

Alfendi shook his head.

"Of course he doesn't; He was asleep," Apollo pointed out with a smile.

Everyone promptly hid a smile or laugh, and Alfendi was offended. "No I wasn't!"

"Actually, Alfendi's right," Luke reflected, rubbing his goatee in thought. "I took him out to the Winding Way to play with Pearl's ball, remember?" He paused, giving the boy a smile. "Then he fell asleep."

A fresh wave of giggles spread across the group, and Alfendi huffed to himself in embarrassment, arms tightly crossed.

"Don't worry, we're just teasing," Flora assured her brother, stepping towards him. "You were just a baby, after all; The jetlag got to you."

While Alfendi dodged comforting pats from his sister, Emmy moved towards Maya, her hand held out to shake. "I don't believe we spoke much last time we met, Miss Fey. Did you get my letter?"

Maya nodded, looking suddenly very business-like as she shook the offered hand. "Of course, Ms Altava. I was very honoured to read your intriguing offer."

Sycamore blinked in surprise, then groaned, pinching his nose with a frown. "Emmy, don't tell me..."

Emmy shot a smirk at the man, then turned back to Maya. "Is there anything you wish to discuss before we go ahead?"

Maya pretended to think, hiding a smile. "No, it was quite agreeable." Her smile turned into a grin as she dropped her prim demeanour. "Besides, no-one here's going to turn down some free, and positive, publicity in the World Times!"

Sycamore sighed. "Of course you did."

Pearl gasped. "Oh! We're going to be in a newspaper?"

Luke looked to Flora, confused. "Did you know about this?"

Flora shook her head, her expression somewhere between scandalised and puzzled, and turned to Emmy. "I thought we were just here for a visit, not for work!"

"Oh, we are here for a visit," Emmy insisted, flipping her hair with a proud smile. "But I can't very well afford to waste time in Los Angeles and not have an article ready for publishing at the end of it, can I?"

"And it's not like we're going to complain," Maya added, patting the grinning Pearl's shoulder. "We could always do with more customers!" She then turned back to Emmy, her mood more serious. "I don't know if you have a passed loved one you want us to channel, but I did take the liberty of consulting with a spirit who could help explain how our customs work, if you're at all interested."

Trucy grinned. "You mean Auntie Mia, right?" she asked. Maya gave her a quick smile and a nod.

Emmy frowned, a finger on her cheek. "No, I didn't have anyone in mind," she admitted. "Honestly, even if I did, I don't think I'd have a photo of them anyway. Ironic, I know." She patted the camera pouch on her belt.

Not seeming to have heard the woman's wry words, Trucy gave Emmy a bright grin, bouncing at her side. "Emmy, Emmy! When you come to see my and Apollo's show tonight, would you be able to write about that too?!"

"Hmm, maybe," Emmy conceded with a sly smile. "If you two give me a particularly spectacular show, of course."

Apollo scoffed, arms crossed as he puffed out his chest with no small amount of pride. "What are you talking about, Ms Altava? Our shows are always spectacular."

Sycamore sighed, then stepped forward to also shake Maya's hand. "In any case, thank you for taking the time out of your busy schedule to meet us, Miss Fey... despite my friend here's," he shot a glare at Emmy, "unreasonable requests."

Emmy scoffed, waving off his disapproval.

"They're not unreasonable at all," Maya insisted with a smile. After a short pause, she turned and waved the pair to the door behind her. "In fact, why don't I give you two a tour of the Manor? You could get started on your article, Emmy."

"A wonderful idea, Maya," Emmy replied with a grin, pulling her camera out of its pouch. "Shall we go?"

With that, the two women linked arms and strolled out into the hallway. Sycamore sighed heavily before following them.
Trucy turned to Pearl with a grin. "So, any plans for us? Or are we just killing time for Mommy to finish with them?"

Pearl thought a moment, then turned to Alfendi still sat on the low shelves. "Actually, I should check... Did you want a tour too, Alfendi? You didn't get one last time, after all."

Alfendi screwed his nose up in thought. "Is there anything interesting in it?"

Apollo bit back a snort of laughter at the boy's audacity, while Pearl simply looked shocked.

Flora was watching her brother disapprovingly. "Alfendi, that was rather rude, wasn't it?"

"But I don't want to go if it's going to be boring!" Alfendi protested.

Luke gave him a sympathetic look. "I don't think a tour would interest you, no," he admitted, then turned to Pearl. "Why don't we get out a board game? Something not too complicated, just to fill the time until the others are done."

"That's a good idea!" Trucy announced, turning to Flora and Alfendi with a grin. "Have you guys ever played Castle Panic?"

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "Castle Panic isn't complicated?"

"It should be easy enough," Pearl decided, turning to the Laytons with a smile. "It's co-operative. We can show you how it works as we play."

Flora nodded. "That sounds fun," she said, looking to her brother. "What do you think, Alfendi?"

Alfendi shoved his hands in his pockets, face screwed up in thought. After a moment, he jumped to his feet and gave Pearl a smile. "Okay."
It didn't take too long for Pearl to set up the game, and she and the Wrights gave the Laytons a quick overview of the game mechanics before starting a round. It took a little longer for Flora and Alfendi to get a handle on it (especially Alfendi, who, in addition to being under the game's age suggestions, kept trying to hide his cards), but, being a co-operative game, they were thoroughly guided and helped by their friends. Eventually, even they were happily joining in strategy discussions, trading cards and helping to destroy the hordes of monsters slowly descending on the group's tiny castle in the centre of the board.

During a lull where Pearl was generating new monsters from the diminishing pile, Flora turned to Luke. "Speaking of castles, how is your story about the Folsense adventure going? The Professor's notes from our visit to Dropstone arrived, right?"

Luke was surprised at the question, looking up at Flora before frowning in thought, his gaze on the cardboard walls of the game's stone fortress. "Yes, those arrived this past week." He shot her a smile. "I should thank you for that, too. You asked them things I'd forgotten to include in my list! They're proving to be very helpful!"

Flora blushed. "Oh, it was no problem, Luke. I'm just glad my additions are useful."

With the new monsters set up on the board, Trucy began to draw cards, eyeing a goblin only a space away from one of their castle walls. She examined her new draw, then huffed. "No one has a green swordsman? Or a barbarian? Or a hero?"

Apollo shook his head. "Draw a new card. Maybe you'll get one," he pointed out.

While Trucy was busy choosing which of her cards to discard and replace, Luke continued to Flora, "I've got the version I tell people all written down. Right now, I'm just planning out new names, and basic ideas for the necessary medium changes." He smiled. "What do you think about 'Stonefall' for Dropstone?"

Apollo snorted, hiding a smirk. "Bit on the nose, isn't it?"

Flora giggled. "I like it! What about Folsense?"

"That one was a lot harder," Luke admitted, stroking his goatee. "I was thinking about 'Goldknell'. Or... 'Goldenknell', maybe?"

Alfendi screwed up his nose. "Those both sound awful."

Luke shrugged. "Katia suggested I could always keep 'Folsense', since it is a ghost town. And the air is meant to be all clear in the area by now anyway."

"Well, I hope we won't need a red archer!" Trucy suddenly cried, slapping one of her four cards on the discard pile and grabbing another from the draw pile; She hadn't even noticed she was interrupting anything, her focus being so strongly on her own issue at hand. After a moment, her glare at the new card turned into a defeated sigh, and she held it out to Pearl. "I've got a fortify. We can kill it that way at least."

Pearl gave her a sympathetic nod, taking the card to discard it and then turning to the game box at her side. A moment later, she had pulled out a tiny piece of cardboard resembling a wooden wall, which was hung on the wall in front of the offending monster. "Are you done playing cards?"

Trucy sadly nodded, picking up the goblin token and the 'fortification' on the wall in front of it. "What a waste of a fortify." Tossing them back in the box at Pearl's side, she made a grab for the bag of monster tokens, looking at Luke curiously. "Were you talking about something?"

"It's unrelated to the game," Flora informed her with a smile. "I was just asking Luke how his latest novel is going."

Luke blushed, rubbing the back of his head. "I wouldn't call it a 'novel'..."

"Cool!" Trucy chirped, pulling out a pair of monster tokens from the bag, which she was turning her attention to already. "That's the one with the train, right?"

"Yep," Luke replied, nodding. "I'm still thinking about what to rename the Molentary Express to, though."

There was silence for several moments as Trucy placed one of the monster tokens, an orc, on the board where the die assigned it, then tossed the other one back into the game box. "We've got an archer plague," she informed everyone.

Alfendi frowned. "What does that mean?"

"If you have an archer card in your hand," Pearl told him, "you have to discard it."

Nodding, the boy turned his attention to the three cards sitting in front of him on the table. After a moment, he added, "Do they have to be actually in my hand to count?"

Apollo grinned, biting back a laugh. "In your hand of cards, yes," he said. "Not necessarily in your actual hand."

Without a word, Alfendi handed over one of his cards to be discarded.

As she moved the monsters that were already on the board closer to the castle, Trucy grinned at Luke. "That reminds me, didn't Emmy and Mister Sycamore want to hear some of your stories last time we saw them? Maybe we could do that when they get back!"

Apollo chuckled, drawing some cards to fill out his hand as the turn of play moved to him. "I think Ms Altava will be too busy talking to Mom about that article. It'll have to wait."

Trucy frowned in disappointment, but a moment later her face once again lit up. "Then we can talk to Mister Sycamore! Do you think he'll mind if we ask him about your stories, Luke?"

Luke had to think for a long moment, then finally shook his head and shrugged. "I'm afraid I have no idea. We haven't talked about it much ourselves."

"It probably depends on what exactly you want to ask him," Flora replied in his stead. "He talks to us about those days from time to time." She gestured between herself and Alfendi, the young boy grinning proudly at the mention of his beloved uncle.
"Oh, I just wanted to ask about Monte d'Or," Trucy airily explained, waving a hand. "Not, like, about Descole or anything." She paused, then gave Luke a hopeful grin. "Unless he doesn't mind me asking about that, of course."

Luke shrugged again. "Don't look at me."

Flora just looked confused. "Monte d'Or? I'm pretty sure Uncle only ever went there the once..."

"They want to ask about illusions or something," Alfendi explained, watching Apollo use one of his cards to attack a troll nearing the castle.

Trucy nodded eagerly. "He helped plan the Masked Gentleman's illusions, right? I wanted to talk to him about his techniques!"

"He's not exactly a magician, after all," Apollo added, smiling. "He won't have sworn himself to secrecy on it."

"But you guys are against using audience plants," Luke pointed out, a little confused. "Not to mention, all the Masked Gentleman's miracles were on such a grand scale... I don't mean to be rude, but you two could never pull those off in the Wonder Bar."

Apollo and Trucy shot each other identical grins. "Yeah, we knew that," Trucy replied.

"Just because we work in different styles of illusions," Apollo continued, "doesn't mean he won't have anything interesting to tell us." Their eyes locked on Luke, the pair promptly slapped their hands together in a proud high five.

Although still bemused, Luke decided to drop the question, shaking his head with a fond smile.

Not that the group in the living room seemed to notice, their attention fully focussed on defending their tiny cardboard castle from marauding monsters, but Maya's tour ended up taking a surprisingly long time. Sycamore's long-suffering sighs, initially unnoticed by the two women, had slowly increased in volume as the group of three stopped every five steps for Emmy to ask a question and Maya to give a long-winded explanation as an answer, Emmy taking copious notes in her little book with an intense frown of concentration. Once Emmy had noticed her friend's frustration, she began to shoot him amused smirks, goading him into taking action if he was so upset, but Sycamore refused to rise to her bait, pushing his glasses up his nose with a glare and waiting patiently for Maya's latest thorough explanation to finish and the trio to once again move on.

Finally, Maya's tour came to an end, and she led her visitors back down the corridors with a smile. "Well, I hope I answered all your questions adequately, Ms Altava."

"Oh, of course," Emmy replied, grinning as she put away her notepad and pen. "Your little village here is so fascinating, Miss Fey. Who wouldn't want to hear as much as they can about it?"

Behind her, Sycamore rolled his eyes.

Coming to the living room door, Maya giggled as she heard the raucous laughter of the group within. "You almost don't want to spoil their fun, huh?" she whispered to Emmy, then knocked and promptly opened the door. "Hey kids, I hope you weren't too bored by us abandoning you like that!"

The group within, circled around the low table on the floor, looked up in surprise, their previous conversation abruptly halted as Maya swept her way towards them. Trucy grinned, giving the woman a wave. "Hi, Mommy!"

Pearl smiled, gesturing to the board game on the table. "It's alright, Mystic Maya; We were just playing a game to pass the time."

Luke turned his attention to Emmy and Sycamore, trailing into the room behind Maya. "Was your tour fun?"

"Of course it was," Emmy insisted with a sly grin at Sycamore. "Why wouldn't it be?"

Sycamore withheld another sigh, pushing at his glasses. "I suppose you could call it that," he admitted.

"I think our game is almost done," Flora said, indicating the nearly empty bag of monster tokens sitting in front of Alfendi. "It's quite fun, actually!"

"I like the castle," Alfendi added, grinning as he pointed to the cardboard castle, currently missing three of its walls and one of its towers to the game's wrath. "It's got my age of walls!"

Apollo smirked. "Well, when it's complete it does."

"Oh!" Trucy cried, jumping to her feet. "I almost forgot!" She ran around the table to where Emmy and Sycamore stood, her hands clasped together as she gave Sycamore a wide grin. "Mister Sycamore, Polly and I wanted to ask you about something!"

Sycamore glanced at Apollo, withholding another sigh. "Monte d'Or, I take it?"

Trucy nodded eagerly. "You helped plan all the Masked Gentleman's illusions, right?"

Emmy was surprised, looking between the two magicians. "But surely Luke's told you how those were done, hasn't he? The Professor worked it all out pretty quickly."

"And it wasn't me who pulled them off, either," Sycamore added. "Ascot did that all on his own."

Apollo scoffed, getting up to join his sister. "Yeah, but he was just following instructions. You were the one who planned it." He stood at Trucy's back with his hands on his hips, the pair giving the man before them identical grins. "Quite impressive for an amateur."

Sycamore's eyes widened as he sputtered, giving the siblings an offended look. "Excuse me?"

Emmy snorted, but quickly hid her laughter behind a hand, steadfastly avoiding anyone's gaze as she suddenly pretended to be very interested in the ceiling. Everyone else was exchanging shocked looks, not quite sure how to respond.

Trucy just nodded knowingly. "For instance," Apollo picked up, "you must have had plans for 'miracles' that you never sent, right? We'd be very interested in hearing about them!"

For a very long moment, Sycamore simply stared at the pair, but, eventually, his anger faded away with a sigh of quiet acceptance. "Alright, alright," he agreed. "Let's sit down and I'll answer all your questions."

"This is infinitely more exciting than a dumb little magic show, am I right?" Clay boasted, gesturing widely to indicate the massively tall room around them. "Or a roomful of sick animals that would just make everyone sad?"

Luke rolled his eyes. "You don't need to bring the shelter into this, Clay." Nearby, Apollo and Trucy crossed their arms in unison, sending identical unamused glares at their astronaut friend.

"It's certainly impressive," Sycamore agreed, looking up at the rocket towering above them with a smile. "A great feat of engineering." He then turned his attention to the models of aliens hung nearby, firing on a helpless satellite and its gun-toting astronaut from their UFOs. "Although it would help its integrity to be a little less sensationalist in the decor..."

Emmy snapped a few photos of the rocket, then turned her attention back to Clay. "This is an exact replica you said?"

Clay nodded, gesturing proudly to towering spacecraft. "Yep! Identical in every way to the rocket that brought Mister Starbuck into space six years ago! They could fill it up with fuel and fly it into space today if they wanted to!"

"Seems a bit of a waste of resources to me," Emmy muttered, hiding her comment behind her camera as she took another photo, this time of an information board by the railing around the rocket.

Alfendi tugged on Clay's sleeve to attract his attention, then pointed at the display nearby. "What's that one about?"

"Ah, that one?" Clay replied with a grin, walking across the glass floor to the closed case. "This happens to be the most exciting exhibit in the whole museum!"

Noticing her brother looking warily through the transparent floor at the distant ground, Flora took Alfendi's hand, guiding him along beside her as they followed Clay. "This is the one on the HAT-1 Miracle, right?"

"Indeed it is, my lady!" Clay crowed with no small amount of pride. He bent down closer to Alfendi's height, giving him a grin. "You've heard of the HAT-1 Miracle, right kiddo?"

Alfendi thought a moment, sticking close to his sister and still shooting the occasional wary glance at the floor. "No..."

Clay's grin somehow got even bigger. "Ah, fantastic! I get to introduce you, then!"

As Clay launched into a blow-by-blow retelling of the satellite's failure and its lone passenger's safe return to Earth, the rest of the group slowly dispersed around the room. Trucy and Luke gravitated to a holographic model of the solar system, playing with the buttons to see what it would do. Sycamore lingered by the HAT-1 display, examining the items in the case and listening in on Clay's story with interest. By the rocket stood Apollo and Emmy, their hands on the white railing separating them from the sheer drop to the rocket's base far below.

"It's actually very pretty, what they've done in here," Emmy told Apollo, gesturing to the walls, which were painted a blue so dark it appeared black, with spots of white-yellow that seemed to glow in the dim light indicating stars. Far above them, the ceiling was similarly painted, but a slightly paler blue, wisps of clouds circling around the dome where a dedicated spotlight lit the area. Near one of the supports for the rocket, a model of Jupiter hung, opposite from the space-battle more befitting a children's cartoon than a scientific diorama. Emmy shrugged as she similarly turned a bemused look to the latter. "I mean, I agree the aliens are a bit much, but..."

Apollo chuckled. "Yeah, I'd bet anything that was Director Cosmos' idea. He's... a bit obsessed with the idea of alien attack."

Emmy raised an eyebrow. "And he runs a serious space research centre?"

"Yep," Apollo replied, smiling. "You gotta be a little kooky to work here, I've found."

After a moment of thought, Emmy accepted the comment with a shrug. "I guess it's always a good idea to be wary when it comes to space research. There's a lot of people out there who'd love to shut these people down and claim all their work for themselves."

Apollo frowned. "Huh? What do you mean?"

"You don't know?" Emmy asked, surprised. "Your friend is such a talker, I thought..." She shook her head. "Never mind. You didn't know about all the underground interest in space research?"

"No?" Apollo replied, still confused. "Why would people be taking something like that 'underground'?"

Emmy shrugged. "All I know is, there are a lot of strange people out there. Some of it is just other countries wanting to keep all the research to themselves, some of it is lone companies wanting all the 'market' power..." She frowned. "Some of it... well. There are a lot of strange people out there."

Apollo stared up at the rocket before them, shining in the spotlights trained on its pristine white skin. As much as he liked to think the best of humanity as a whole, he had to admit he could understand where Emmy's worries were coming from; As a world-travelling reporter, she'd certainly be more informed on the subject than he was. "What about the people that aren't countries or companies?" he asked, looking back to the woman in yellow. "You're saying there are lone wolves that just want to hoard the knowledge themselves?" When she didn't immediately reply, he added, "But that doesn't exactly make sense... what can one person do on their own to get into space?"

Emmy didn't say anything for a long time, staring a hole in the GYAXA logo on the rocket's side. "Like I said: There are a lot of strange people out there."

Apollo watched her go in confusion, headed to the HAT-1 display. "Strange..."

Nearby, he noticed his siblings still playing with the solar system hologram, zooming in and out of various planets and playing with the scale to compare their sizes to each other and to the truly massive sun. Smiling at their antics, he walked over to join them, arms crossed. "I hope you two aren't getting into trouble."

"Of course not!" Trucy protested, jabbing at a button to reset the picture. "We never get into trouble!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow at her claim.

Luke giggled, but evidently decided not to comment. "Did you want to have a go?"
The elder brother shook his head, his worried frown etching itself back on his face. "Actually, I... I was just talking to Ms Altava..."

At that, Luke's expression mirrored his brother's. "What happened?"

"Nothing too serious," Apollo insisted, forcing a quick smile. "She was... just telling me about how there are people out there who'd prefer to hoard all the space research for themselves..."

Trucy blinked, shocked. "Why would they want to do that!?!"

"That's what I said," Apollo replied, and sighed. "Y'know, other countries might do illegal things in an effort to be better than us. And then unscrupulous companies might want to dominate the 'market' and put competitors out of business. All sorts of reasons."

Luke frowned, studying his brother intently. "But that's not what has you so worried, is it?"

Apollo thought a moment, then reluctantly nodded. "She didn't say it outright, but she seems to think there are people unconnected to governments or research companies just as willing to take action against a place like this. But that doesn't make any sense, right?"

"Of course it doesn't!" Trucy agreed, crossing her arms. "It costs a lot of money to go into space, doesn't it? You'd never hide something as big as that rocket without someone else seeing it!"

Luke wasn't so sure, a hand at his chin in thought. "I don't know, Emmy has a point. The places I've seen... it's not unheard of to hide something bigger than this from the outside world."

"But why would you even want to take space travel underground?" Apollo asked. "There's no point. One person can't get far on their own, and getting too many people involved is just asking to be uncovered and shut down."

Much like Emmy, Luke didn't reply for a long moment. "What would be the point in taking archaeology underground?" he instead asked, meeting Apollo's eyes with a stern frown. "They'd claim to be acting purely for the benefit of mankind, I'm sure... but it's all about greed in the end."

Apollo and Trucy shot each other surprised glances. "You mean there's another Targent out there?" Trucy asked. "One for going into space instead of finding the Azran?"

"Or even another Descole?" Apollo added, shooting a glance to the suited man standing by the HAT-1 display.

Luke stared across the room at where Emmy and Sycamore stood, smiling and laughing along with Flora as Clay and Alfendi continued their animated discussion. Finally, he sighed, looking away. "If Emmy didn't say anything for sure, she probably has as much of an idea as us," he decided, then gave his siblings a reassuring smile. "I wouldn't worry about it. If there was something going on, you know Clay would be telling us all about it the first chance he got."

As worried as Apollo was, he had to admit Luke had a point. "Yeah, true," he sighed, relaxing with a smile. "Clay couldn't keep a secret to save his life."

Trucy giggled in agreement.
Eleven-year-old Luke Triton was becoming increasingly bored with travelling the globe.

Oh sure, it had all started as incredibly exciting, with a glamorous airship to admire, a short trip across Europe, a high-speed plane battle and a mid-air rescue... but, with Aurora safe and the group started on their quest to recover all the Azran Eggs before Targent did... Luke had very quickly run out of things to do. He'd explored every inch of the small plane they now lived in (barring the engine room and Sycamore and Raymond's private quarters), read every one of his Sherlock Holmes books he'd brought with him to pass the time (even the new ones he'd picked up when they dropped by London again after Torrido), and had told all three of his stories about his and the Professor's adventures to everyone else... multiple times. Out of desperation, he'd also tried introducing his beloved books to Aurora, but discussing even fictional murders proved to be distressing for her and Luke wisely decided not to bring them up in her hearing ever again.

Thus, the pre-teen found himself stretched out on one of the purple sofas, lying on his back and staring out one of the high portholes at the blue sky beyond, an intense feeling of boredom permeating his skull.

"Don't tell me you're out of things to do already?"

Luke jumped with a cry, falling off the sofa to the floor. Above him, he heard the chuckling of Professor Sycamore, and felt a blush spreading across his cheeks as he scrambled to his feet. "P-Professor, I didn't see you there!"

Sycamore's laughter faded as he crossed his arms across his chest, watching Luke with no small amount of amusement from behind the sofa. "I was expecting you to be up on the outer deck with the others. Professor Layton is giving Aurora a lecture on ancient mythology, believe it or not."

Luke looked up to the door in the corner of the room, accessed by a nearby stairwell. "Why mythology?" he asked.

"I believe she was curious about the legend of the phoenix we heard in Mosinnia," Sycamore explained, still watching Luke. "We only left this morning. Are you so bored you won't even seek out something to do?"

Luke shuffled guiltily, then turned around and sat back down on the sofa without a word, his eyes locked on his knees.

"Ah, so this is a serious case indeed," Sycamore said knowingly. A moment later, Luke noticed out of the corner of his eye that the man was rounding the purple lounge, and he sat down at the boy's side. "We're not scheduled to reach our next destination for another day or so. We'll fetch the final egg and after that... well." The man paused, suddenly seeming uncomfortable. "I suppose we'll see what the Azran have in store for us next."

Luke wasn't sure what to say to that. The uncertainty of what a race of people were thinking oh so long ago when they set up this strangest of Easter egg hunts was... well, scary. He tore his gaze from his lap to look up at the man at his side. "As long as we get it before Targent does, right?"

Sycamore didn't reply, and Luke wasn't sure if he'd even heard the question, frowning off into the distance with a hand on his chin.

"Professor?"

Suddenly Sycamore sprang back to life, pushing at his glasses as he shot glances all over the room. "Y-yes, as long as we secure this 'legacy' before Targent does," he hastily muttered, refusing to meet Luke's eyes. "You have nothing to worry about, Luke."

Luke watched the man carefully. It seemed reasonable, and even a little reassuring, that the adults of the group were as concerned about the uncertainty facing them as Luke was. With this thought in mind, he looked away, deciding it was time to change the subject.

... But what to?

Luke's mind drifted back to the previous day, spent running all over the ancient town of Mosinnia. They'd found good friends in Umid and all the other children that lived there, and outsmarted the two Targent agents skulking around and irritating poor Adler the eagle. However, although they'd been too busy at the time to question it, one small exchange he'd overheard stuck in his mind.

"You know, my dad died when I was young, so I never got to know him, but I heard he was a quick thinker, like you."

"Sounds like he would have been a wonderful father. Hmm... If my daughter were still alive, she'd be about your age, too."

"Oh, I..."

"You... had a daughter, Professor?"

"Ah, forgive me. This isn't the time."

"I'm so sorry..."

"All that is in the past. What matters now is waking up the people of Mosinnia."

Of course, now the adults of Mosinnia were all awake, the danger past and the Azran Egg in Aurora's care where it belonged. They had all the time in the world to talk... but would Sycamore want to talk about it? Luke shot him a wary glance. He didn't think so. After all, they'd not heard even an inkling about a family from the man, not in the two weeks they'd been travelling with him and certainly not in the article Emmy had found about his achievements, before they'd left for Froenborg. Given the way the subject had been brushed off as 'not the time', Luke doubted there would ever be a 'good time' to talk about it for Desmond Sycamore.

That didn't stop Luke being curious, though.

As bad as he was at guessing ages, Luke was fairly confident Umid was older than him; A teenager at the least. And Sycamore, if he remembered Emmy's article correctly, was in his late thirties, not much older than Luke's father; He'd probably been around the same age at his daughter's birth as Clark had been at Luke's. So how long had it been then since said daughter had died? And what of? Was she a lot like her father, or more like her mother? In fact, what had happened to her mother? Sycamore had made no mention of a wife, so had they separated, or was she dead too? Were they ever even married?

"Were you wanting to ask me something?"

Luke jumped, looking up at the man beside him with wide eyes. "P-pardon?"

Sycamore gave the boy a fond smile. "You keep glancing at me. Something on your mind?"

Blushing at having been caught out, Luke looked away. "U-um..."

Sycamore's smile slowly faded, turning into a more concerned look, the man's eyes wide. "Luke, what is it?"

"I-I..." Luke mumbled, his hands wringing the corner of his cardigan. "Are you sure you won't mind me asking, Professor?"

"Of course not," Sycamore insisted, laughing nervously and forcing a smile. "Tell me what the matter is."

Luke shifted uncomfortably for a moment; Sycamore's sudden 'demand' to know was rather unnerving. "W-well... it's just, you were telling Umid back in Mosinnia that you... used to have a daughter?"

Sycamore stared for a long moment, then laughed, relaxing back into his seat. "That was what you wanted to ask me about? My daughter?"

At that, Sycamore calmed, pressing his glasses against his face with a smile. "Ah, it doesn't matter," he insisted, looking off into the distance. Now his laughter had faded, his expression had turned... nostalgic. "No, it's only natural you'd be curious about her. I may not talk about my family, but... I do think of them. All the time." His eyes glanced to the stairs leading to the upper deck.

Luke frowned. Sycamore's mysterious relief at the question, and his near-panic beforehand, almost had him insisting to know what the man had thought he was going to be asked... especially when the subject of Luke's true question was brought into it. He decided not to push his luck, though. "I'm sorry."

"No need to apologise," Sycamore replied, giving the boy a reassuring smile. "My wife and daughter died a long time ago now... My parents even further back. I'm sure you would have gotten along well with them."

Despite his earlier concerns, Luke couldn't help a small smile in return. "What were their names?"

"My wife and daughter? Jean and Chloe," Sycamore replied, his gaze turning distant. "Jean was such a fighter, right to the end..." His smile died. "Chloe was only five years old. So much like her mother, but... there was only so much any of us could do." He looked up to the window, almost frowning. "My parents died when I was eight. I barely remember them now. And my little brother Teddy..."
Luke wasn't sure what else he could do but apologise again, so he neatly folded his hands in his lap and kept quiet as Sycamore's sad tale trailed off. It sounded like he'd lost everyone he ever called 'family'... and what could Luke possibly say to that?

After a pause, Sycamore seemed to return to the present, looking at Luke with amusement. "You aren't going to ask what happened? Everyone else always does."

"I-I don't want to bother you," Luke insisted, trying not to fiddle with a loose thread on the end of his shorts. "I mean, it's none of my business, right?"

Sycamore chuckled. "Funnily enough, the mere fact that you're here helping me means it is your business," he replied. "Sort of, anyway."

Luke met the man's gaze, frowning. "It does? How?"

"Targent," Sycamore replied, his expression darkening.

"Targent?" Luke repeated, shocked. He would have been scared by the dark look in the man's eyes, but he'd long ago noticed the almost involuntary deepening of Sycamore's voice and dead-eyed glare that came to the surface whenever the topic of the underground organisation came up; He was used to the deep-rooted anger the archaeologist harboured, and, given what they'd all seen Targent attempt to do to Aurora, he couldn't blame him.

Sycamore nodded, glaring back out the window. "My father was an archaeologist too. They wanted him to join them. When he refused, they gave him no choice." His eyes closed. "Two decades later, they set their sights on me. Naturally, I gave them the same answer my father did, and..." He trailed off, and didn't say anything for a long time. Finally, he quietly added, "Every family I've made, they've torn apart."

Luke looked around the room. He could just about see Professor Layton's waving arms on the upper deck as he continued his personalised lecture for Aurora and Emmy. The flight deck was empty, the plane currently on autopilot and under Sycamore's care while Raymond was busy arranging their evening meal. Keats' usual spot on the couch cushions was empty, the cat almost certainly sitting in the kitchen hoping to see a dropped treat or two. The boy thought a moment, then turned back to Sycamore. "We're not going to let them do that to this family though, right?"

Sycamore frowned, then his eyes opened, looking curiously to the boy at his side. "I'm sorry? What do you mean?"

Luke shrugged, smiling. "Well, we're a family, aren't we? We're Aurora's family. None of us are related, but... we all came together to look after her. So... that makes us family. In my book, anyway."

The man's frown faded as he mulled over Luke's words. After a long pause for thought, he gave the boy a sad smile. "Yes... yes, I suppose that does make us a family, of sorts." He looked away, but somehow seemed even more distressed than he had earlier. "We'll take down Targent together. Of course we will."

"Mm-hmm," Luke agreed, forcing a smile though he was watching Sycamore carefully.

After another short pause, Sycamore stood, giving Luke a fond look. "That was a good talk, Luke. Now why don't you run along and check on Professor Layton?"

Luke glanced to the upper deck, then back to Sycamore. "Um, okay, Professor." Shooting the man a concerned glance, he jumped off his seat and ran to find his mentor.
Sycamore didn't move an inch until the boy was out of sight.
The fading glow of twilight was bathing the park surrounding the Sunshine Coliseum all shades of orange and pink, glittering as it hit the windows of the large concert hall above them. The sweeping roof cast a long shadow down into the courtyard below, where a fountain-like installation held an array of blooming flowers, their colours all tinged red in the fading light. Above, balloons of multiple colours floated, dangling banners advertising the night's concert; Below them, a massive billboard did the same, featuring what looked like Klavier in a birdcage, surrounded by wings of fire. At his feet was emblazoned the words "Guilty as Charged".

Apollo had to wonder if there was any symbolic significance to that image.

Trucy looked up from where she had been admiring the flowers with Flora, and pointed to where the sweeping roofs met above the entrance. "Hey look, they labelled the coliseum with a sun! So you know it's the 'Sun'-shine Coliseum!"

Flora giggled. "Almost ironic it's being used for this concert as the sun is setting, isn't it?"

Emmy was eyeing the crowds gathered around the massive columns surrounding the stadium's entrance. "I don't know about you three, but I think Flora and I had better get in line if we want to be able to see this thing."

Luke crossed his arms, frowning in thought. "How exactly are we getting in? Through some kind of back door, or just through the front with everyone else?" He looked to Trucy. "Does it say on the tickets?"

Trucy reached into the bag at her hip, pulling out the three slips of yellow paper. Squinting, she held them up in the dim light in an attempt to examine them for small print. "Um..."

Apollo rolled his eyes, then pulled out his phone and moved to stand behind his sister. With a press of a button, he lit up his phone screen and held the device up to shine its light on the tickets.

"Oh!" Trucy cried, shooting a grateful grin at her brother. "Thanks, Polly!" When her brother only shrugged in response, hiding a smile, she returned her attention to the tickets. "I think it says we have to show them to a staff member, and they'll direct us to a side door."

Flora studied the crowd for a moment, then pointed eagerly to a section on the right, where there appeared to be some marquees set up by the giant billboard. "I think there's some people in there. Would they count?"

"Aren't they selling merch?" Apollo asked, putting his phone away.

"Even if they can't show us where to go," Luke reasoned, "they would still be able to help us find someone who can. There's no harm in asking them."

Apollo sighed, seeing Trucy giving him an expectant grin. "I guess we'd better go talk to them then."

"Yay!" Trucy cheered, jumping once before running off up the stairs.
"Wait, Truce!" Apollo shouted, running after his sister. "We have to stick together!"

Luke chuckled, and tipped his hat to Emmy and Flora, who were watching in amusement. "Have fun! We'll see you after the concert!"

"You too!" Flora replied, waving.

"We'll see you later!" Emmy added, already walking off towards the crowds at the coliseum entrance.

After some running around, eventually a security guard (in a suspiciously police uniform-like outfit) was able to pull herself away from crowd control to check the three Wrights' tickets and escort them around the side of the massive Coliseum, blocked off by temporary wire fencing. Below a set of five multi-coloured flags was a massive purple truck emblazoned with the Gavinners logo (Apollo presumed it probably carried their equipment), a similarly decorated bus (for the band themselves) and multiple smaller cars and vans. The guard didn't comment on anything in the makeshift parking lot, leading the three through a door into the Coliseum's backstage area. Once inside, Luke and Trucy found themselves shrinking away from the enclosed walls and open ceilings of the maze-like corridors, each clinging to one of Apollo's hands; Apollo hid a smirk at their wary avoiding of the walls, simply leading his younger siblings after the guard ahead of them.

Finally, the guard stopped to knock on an open side-door, leaning into the hidden room beyond. "Ma'am? The three backstagers have arrived." The woman promptly disappeared into the room, muffled conversation erupting from within.

The Wrights all glanced at each other nervously, unsure what to do. Luke seemed to finally notice his grip on his brother's hand, blushing madly as he retracted it. "Do we wait for the security guard to come back out?" he whispered.

"Probably," Apollo replied, frowning. "Is it just me, or do they seem a bit unprepared for us...?"

Finally, the guard returned, sighing to herself. "Alright, looks like you three are my responsibility for right now." In her hands were three lanyards, each with what looked like some kind of ID card attached; She held them out in a bunch for the trio to take. "These are yours for the night. Don't take 'em off until you leave, and make sure you return them when you do, alright?"

"We will," Apollo promised, taking the lanyards as his siblings nodded in agreement. Separating the items gave him a closer look at the cards attached, and he realised they were temporary backstage passes, each with one of the Wrights' names on it. He made sure to pass the correct ones to his siblings, and they all slipped the lanyards over their necks obediently.

The guard led the trio back the way they had come, past the door outside and through an open doorway to a single corridor leading to the back of the building. "Down here are the dressing rooms," she explained, waving to the red doors, "but they are off-limits until the show has started. Mister Gavin has asked you have free reign, so he obviously trusts you not to get in the way." Before they could express surprise at that, she was pointing down to the far end, where the corridor went through another doorway and into an open room, where a set of stairs protruded up and out of sight. "Down there's the way to backstage. It's off-limits for you three."

"Understood," Apollo told her, shooting Trucy a warning look. She just gave him a frown in return.

The guard was quick to herd them back the other way, to a steel door they quickly realised was a lift.
Mashing a button on the wall nearby to open it, she waved them in. "Here's where you guys go to watch the show," she explained, setting the small box in motion the moment all four of them were inside. "Regular fans can get pretty rowdy, so you don't get the best seats in the house, but it's relatively private and you won't get mobbed by people wanting your backstage passes."

"Yeah," Trucy chipped in with arms crossed, "do you know how hard it is to get VIP tickets to a Gavinners show!? Of course they'd be mad!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow; He suspected this was information his sister had known for a while.

The guard laughed. "Well, as long as you enjoy the show, I guess!"

At the top of the elevator shaft was another corridor, this one slightly more open than the one below. The guard, after a moment of looking around in vague confusion, finally spotted a door she found familiar, and pulled it open. "Here we are!"

Luke and Trucy's first reaction to the view inside the small room was an awed gasp, and Apollo couldn't blame them; The view was indeed incredible. The top half of the wall opposite the door was missing, open to the growing audience of Gavinners fans in the concert hall below. To their left was the stage, decorated with red metal beams (apparently supporting a raised section of stage for the drum kit) and three large purple flags with the band's logo emblazoned across them. Another, smaller, metal railing separated it from the first row of the audience, already clumped up against it like a mob, aimlessly milling about as they awaited the objects of their affections. The crowd thinned as it got further from the stage, to a raised diamond-shaped platform at the back of the room. Below it, twin doors were allowing the steady stream of fans to fill the massive expanse of the hall.

"Try not to stray into any of the other rooms up here," the guard continued, attracting the trio's attention back to her. "We've got some security lookouts and, of course, the lighting guys, so don't disturb them if you can help it."

"Of course," Apollo agreed, giving her a reassuring smile. "We're actually performers ourselves, so we'll keep out of the way."

"You don't need to worry about us, ma'am!" Luke added, tipping his hat.

The guard nodded, smiling back at them. "Alright then. Enjoy the show, huh?"

 waren you two in the concert hall yet? .

Yep, we just came in. Where are you three?

We have a room near the light box. Apparently we're in danger of being mobbed for our passes if we go down into the crowds.

Ha! Yeah, don't make me write a sad article about three kids getting stampeded at a concert. The Professor would kill me.

Anyway, you better stop talking to me and enjoy your posh VIP seats. ;) Talk to you later, Luke
Of course! You enjoy the show too, Emmy!
"Thank you for coming to the Gavinners: 'Guilty as Charged' Tour! This ends the first part of tonight's show. There will now be a twenty-minute intermission."

It hadn't taken Apollo long to decide he wasn't much of a fan of the Gavinners' music. Sure, he could see why they were popular, being loud and having a variety of catchy beats and riffs that Trucy, and the crowd below, eagerly sang along to at the top of their lungs. Even Luke seemed to like it, standing at the window next to Trucy with a smile on his face, alternately watching the stage and his gleefully dancing little sister. Looking at the audience, crammed into the concert hall like sardines in a can, Apollo found a range of emotions sweeping through his head - appreciation, guilt, jealousy, shame - and not one of them he was happy about. No, he decided. His mind was firm: This band could not be something he liked.

They hadn't looked around their little room much when they'd first entered it, but, sick of the rock music emanating from the stage, Apollo turned to looking around to occupy himself. As per his suspicions, the abandoned chairs and tables, paired with frequently placed power-points and the railing on the ceiling by the window, told him that the room was usually used as a light box, but had been cleared out on this occasion specifically for the Wrights to use. On one table, he found a few fliers for the concert, and they proved an adequate distraction from the bass and percussion beating through his feet. A short blurb on the band heading the tour told him that they had only risen in success after their founding in 2019 (a part of Apollo wanted to find the exact date to compare to Klavier's first, and Phoenix's last, trial), and their first single had gone platinum overnight. Two of the three acts of the concert were dedicated to the band alone, with the first act a mix of their earlier hits and the third their newest favourites; The second was purely the realm of their guest performers, the major reason Apollo had finally resigned himself to accompanying his siblings tonight.

Of Lamiroir, Apollo was already aware: Her songs were always somewhere on the charts when they came stateside, and he and Trucy were happy to call themselves fans. In fact, Apollo had found himself quite a few times having to convince Trucy not to use Lamiroir's music in their act for fear of getting them both sued, instead talking Luke into doing some tasteful violin covers for them to use instead (although a piano would have been closer to the originals, he refused to bring the offer to Phoenix for obvious reasons). He'd always thought it was a miracle the enigmatic singer managed to gain fame despite not singing in English, though he'd never found a reliable source before to tell him anything more about her: To his surprise, the flier told him she was Borginian. Her everpresent piano accompaniment was also the work of a teenage boy, blind from birth, who she had all-but-adopted as her own, and the two reportedly went everywhere together.

Apollo couldn't help but smile at that; His wasn't the only tale of an orphan adopted by their hero.

Finally, blessedly, the music stopped, and the Gavinners left the stage. Once Klavier had (rather smugly in Apollo's opinion) announced the upcoming performance of their "special guest", an announcer came on over the speakers to formally close out the first act. It would be another twenty minutes before anyone returned to the stage.
Trucy squealed as she bounced back from the window to where Apollo sat in one of the abandoned chairs. "Isn't this so cool, Polly!? Our first live concert, and it's for the Gaviners!"

Apollo screwed up his nose in disgust, making a show of sticking a pinky finger in one ear as though cleaning it out. "I'm sorry, did you say something? My ears are still ringing."

Luke's smile faded a little. "You didn't enjoy it, Apollo?"

The elder brother sighed. "Let's just say the Gaviners put the 'sick' back in 'music',' he said, then held up the flyer in his hand. "I was reading this instead. Quite interesting stuff, actually."

"Oh?" Luke asked. "What about?"

Trucy scoffed, arms crossed. "Who cares? It can't have stuff we don't already know in there!" She then fixed her brothers with an excited grin. "Let's go to Mister Gavin's dressing room! You know, like we're VIPs! I've always dreamed of being a VIP at a Gaviners show!"

Apollo's eyes narrowed. "Truce, you didn't even know who Gavin was two weeks ago."

Trucy shrugged, suddenly looking uncomfortable as she ambled around her brothers and towards the door to the hallway. "Yeah, but I'm a girl. I'm supposed to swoon over gods of rock." "God-awful, maybe," Apollo darkly muttered, rolling his eyes.

Luke meanwhile was giving their sister a concerned look. "Who told you that, Trucy? That you're 'supposed' to do that just because you're a girl?"

Trucy lingered at the door, shifting slightly on her heels and avoiding eye contact. "No-one had to tell me," she insisted, then, before Luke could push the issue, she threw open the door with a bright grin. "Now come on, let's go find Mister Gavin before the intermission's over!"

The Gaviners' dressing room was surprisingly easy to locate, what with the small printed sign on the wall next to the door with their name on it. Apollo had sent a longing glance to the neighbouring room, labelled "Lamiroir", but as Trucy was already charging her way into the Gaviners' space, he wisely decided to follow her, Luke at his heels.

"Hi, Mister Gavin!" Trucy cried, waving as she jumped into the room.

"Ah, you made it," came Klavier's voice in response. As Apollo entered behind his sister, he saw the man putting down a guitar, giving his visitors a grin as he approached to welcome them, ducking under the chains hanging across the ceiling. Behind him, the other four members of his band stayed where they were, engrossed in their conversation and paying the trio no mind.

"Thank you for the tickets," Luke added to Trucy's greeting, closing the door behind him. "That was very kind of you to send them."

Apollo couldn't resist crossing his arms and darkly muttering, "And the invoice that was with them."

"You were incredible up on stage, Mister Gavin!" Trucy continued, apparently deciding to ignore her eldest brother's comments.
Klavier chuckled, brushing at his fringe. "Nothing like music to brighten the mood after a trial, ja? And we're almost ready for our next act. I'm looking forward to it myself."

"Lamiroir's singing, right!?" Trucy excitedly asked. "The 'Siren of the Ballad'?"

At the mention of their shared idol, Apollo's frown faded. "Oh yeah, the flier said she flew all the way over for this show."

Klavier nodded. "That's right. I happened to catch her show while overseas. Her voice..." He paused, visibly searching for the right words to fit his meaning. "Is divine. I knew I had to invite her to perform with us."

A soft laugh echoed from their right, and the trio turned to see a woman in a white frilled dress sitting in a stool, her back to the mirror of the dressing table. A veil covered most of her face, and a blue, star-patterned cloak covered the rest of her. A diamond brooch was pinned on her chest, the exact centre of her collar. At her side was a teenage boy, also in white, wearing sunglasses and apparently staring at his lap. The woman, her arms neatly crossed, spoke, but none of the Wrights could understand her words. Apollo couldn't help feeling that both woman and boy were incredibly familiar... and he could guess why.

"Lamiroir says, 'You praise me too highly'," a deep voice said, and it was only then the Wrights noticed the tall, sturdy-looking man standing nearby, a nondescript suit on his body and a thick brown beard on his face.

Klavier chuckled at the Wrights' stunned reactions to the trio of strangers. "Ah, allow me to introduce Mister Romein LeTouse, Lamiroir's manager," he said, waving to the man. "And her interpreter, incidentally."

LeTouse nodded. "It is a great honour for us to be here. And a great honour for Lamiroir to be heard in this country."

The woman, Lamiroir, pressed a hand to her chest, giving the Wrights a small bow of her head as she again spoke in the language they couldn't understand.

Trucy squealed again, jumping at Apollo and clinging to his arm. "It's Lamiroir!" she stage-whispered to her brother. "We're actually meeting Lamiroir!"

Apollo couldn't resist a smile, though he kept his excitement better in check. "I noticed."

"Lamiroir says," LeTouse continued, "'We have long looked forward to this joint performance'."

"It's a pleasure to meet you all," Luke said, giving all three a polite smile and nod.

Klavier waved his hand in the air as though smelling something particularly sweet, his eyes closed. "Ah, Lamiroir, your voice... It is art."

Lamiroir seemed amused by his continued praise, speaking once more as she rested a hand on the shoulder of the boy at her side, who looked up at the visitors. A moment later, his eyebrows shot up; Apollo assumed he had been so wrapped up in his own world, he hadn't noticed the Wrights were there.

"Yet without his piano to guide me'," LeTouse translated, "'it is but a voice'."

The boy did not speak, staring open-mouthed in their direction for a moment before suddenly looking away again. Was it just Apollo, or were the boy's cheeks turning red?
Trucy again squealed, much quieter this time, still hanging on her brother's arm. "It's Lamiroir's pianist!" she pointed out. "He's so much cuter in person!"

Apollo couldn't resist a smirk, whispering to his sister, "I hear good pianists such as him are a dying breed."

"Allow me to introduce Machi Tobaye," LeTouse informed the Wrights, gesturing to the boy. "He is blind. This is why he never strays far from Lamiroir. They are always together."

It was only then Apollo noticed Luke's reaction to this whole affair; After shooting LeTouse a surprised look, he stared intently at young Machi, a hand stroking his goatee in thought. Apollo wondered what was on his mind.

"Lamiroir's so, um, what's that word?" Trucy continued to babble in excitement, still tightly clinging to Apollo's arm. "Like, exotic, but, not in the bad way. And mysterious!"

"Why are you telling me this?" Apollo asked her, grinning in amusement. "You know I agree with you."

"Her eyes are certainly intriguing." Luke quietly added, and Apollo looked up in surprise to see his brother's odd suspicion from earlier had vanished, and he was giving his siblings a smile.

Klavier chuckled. "Hers is a kind of 'sight-seeing musique'," he informed Luke. "She travels the globe, putting the sights she sees into song. Even though her appearance and voice are 'exotic', as the Fraulein put it, her songs remind us of something close, and warm."

"Sights into song," Trucy repeated with a dreamy sigh, leaning heavily on Apollo. "That's so poetic!"

Luke was looking suspicious again, glancing between Lamiroir and Machi... but, a moment later, he smiled. "I see."

"She was gracious enough to put music to my lyrics tonight," Klavier continued. "'The Guitar's Serenade'..." He shot the Wrights a grin, hands on his hips. "I hope you enjoy it."

"I can't wait!" Trucy chirped.

Klavier laughed, then looked up to a clock on the nearby wall. "And now it is time," he said. "For the next part, we're giving the Gaviners' hard rock a little rest." Grinning, he gestured to the woman seated nearby, bowing to her. "Lamiroir, the stage is yours."

Lamiroir's attention turned to Machi, saying something in their native language. A moment later, they reached out to grasp hands and got to their feet as one.

"The band members will not play during Lamiroir's ballad," LeTouse explained to Klavier and the Wrights. "Only Machi's tender tones, and Lamiroir's dulcet voice."

"And my guitar, of course," Klavier added with a laugh, reaching for a guitar case under the nearby table.

Finally, Trucy released Apollo's arm, but only to jump up and down on the spot, cheering excitedly. "Nights like this make it all worthwhile, you know!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "Make what worthwhile?"
Luke giggled, grabbing his sister's arm to call her bouncing to a halt. "C'mon Truce, let's get out of their way."

"Oh, right!" Trucy cried, then grinned at Klavier. "Good luck, Mister Gavin!"

Klavier gave her a quick bow, still grinning widely. "Take care your hearts aren't stolen away, ja?"
He turned to Lamiroir and Machi, gesturing to the door. "Shall we hit the stage, then?"

Keenly aware they were in the way, Apollo hurried after his siblings as Luke herded Trucy back out into the hallway. From there, Trucy wasted no time in racing back to the lift, waving for her brothers to follow. "C'mon, let's get back to the concert hall!"

View the Court Record
To tell the truth, Apollo was as excited to hear Lamiroir's song as Trucy, despite all his moaning about going to a Gavinners concert. Comforted by the knowledge that only Klavier was accompanying her, he eagerly stood at their window in their converted light box, looking down on the stage and the audience below.

The lights came up slowly, hushing the crowds. Walking out onto the stage, as he'd seen so many times before, came Lamiroir, hand-in-hand with Machi. She led the blind boy to the grand piano at the side of the stage, then Klavier followed her out, a simple acoustic guitar hanging on his front from its strap over his shoulder. Grinning under his sunglasses, he gave Lamiroir a bow, and she curtsied, then he took her hand and held it high, escorting her to the centre of the stage, to the middle of a diamond-shaped marking on the floor. Mild applause rang from the crowd as they prepared to begin.

Machi's piano was the sound to cut the crowd back into silence, softly playing a few chords in a simple melody that nonetheless attracted attention. Then Lamiroir began to sing.

"Sugar, sugar,
"O that night, in your embrace.
"When you stole away the keys,
"My heart held on to so tight."

Lamiroir held out her arms, and the section of stage she and Klavier stood on suddenly rose up, a tall platform that completely hid the drum kit behind them from view. As they moved, Klavier finally brought his hands to the guitar strings, beginning to play along.

"Pleasure,
"But a fleeting melody."

The platform reached its full height, a good five metres in total, and Lamiroir gestured along with her song, running a hand down her face and then pointing to the sky.

"It wraps itself around me,
"And now through the air I fly."

She held her arms out again, and Klavier abandoned his guitar playing, stepping around in front of Lamiroir with his back to the audience.

"Woh, woh...

As Lamiroir pressed her hands together in a praying motion, Klavier raised his hand up to the top of her head and, in one swift motion, grabbed her cloak and pulled it down over her face, throwing it out over the audience. Behind him, Lamiroir had disappeared.

"What!?" Luke cried in shock, and was promptly elbowed by his siblings on either side of him.
Spotlights followed the cloak as it floated through the air above the gasping crowds. On stage, Klavier had resumed his guitar playing, and Lamiroir's voice continued to echo through the speakers unabated.

"Burning on in my heart. Fire.
"Burn my love away. All away."

Suddenly there was a flash of light from the top of the platform, and Klavier jumped as his guitar suddenly burst into flames. Flailing in shock, he fell backwards, scrambling to untangle himself from its strap.

"Like a bullet of love. Fire.
"Take my life away. All away."

Meanwhile, the cloak had reached the other side of the room, where the other diamond-shaped platform had been all night. Now, however, Lamiroir stood atop it, raising her arms as her cloak neatly landed perfectly on top of her, exactly as it had been on stage. The crowd burst into cheers as they recognised her.

"Guitar, guitar,
"Up together to the sky."

On stage, Klavier was crouched on the opposing platform, engrossed in putting out the flames of his guitar. The lingering final notes of Machi's piano disappeared into the roar of the cheering audience.

Up in their little box, Trucy didn't hesitate to cheer along, bouncing up and down and leaning out the window. Luke, worried she would fall out, grabbed at her waist to keep her inside. "Be careful!" he cried.

Apollo couldn't resist the massive grin on his face after the spectacle he and his siblings had just witnessed. Leaving their sister's care in Luke's hands for now, he looked back out over the concert hall as the lights began to fade out for the second intermission. Lamiroir was being guided down off the high platform at the back by an employee as the spotlight on her shut off, disappearing into the dark. On stage, the tower was lowering back down, Klavier pulling himself to his feet as a stage-hand ran to meet him with a portable fire extinguisher, finally putting out the orange flames for good. A separate stage-hand was escorting Machi offstage.

Trucy took her celebrating away from the window, bouncing around the room in glee. "Wasn't Lamiroir amazing!?" she cried, then paused, her fists pressed to her cheeks as she sniffed. "I even cried a little."

Luke finally relaxed now their sister wasn't attempting to hurl herself out into the crowd below. "I was surprised Mister Gavin actually burned his guitar," he said. "I mean, I know it's a thing to destroy guitars in a rock concert, but-"

"Yeah!" Trucy interrupted, bouncing again. "That even surprised me, and I'm a magician! What a production!"

"What a destruction," Apollo remarked with a smirk, crossing his arms. He turned to Luke, his smile fading. "I dunno; As a magician myself, I think Gavin was expecting that to happen about as much as we were. At least whoever set it off timed it well."

Luke seemed surprised for a moment, then frowned and nodded. "I should have guessed. The perfect timing to the lyrics threw me off."
Trucy didn't seem to have been paying attention to her brothers' conversation, tapping at her chin in thought. "Is that what they call 'risking life and limb for art'? That was so brave of him!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "I'm not sure I'd call that 'art'."

But his sister wasn't listening, already running to the door back to the hallway, waving for her brothers to follow. "Well, what are we doing here? Let's get going to Mister Gavin's dressing room! There's twenty minutes 'til the last part of the show!"

As Trucy disappeared outside, Luke shrugged, shooting Apollo a smile. "Might as well," he pointed out, and hurried to follow her.

Apollo sighed. "How many breaks does this band need?" he muttered to himself, and reluctantly ran after them.

Downstairs, Trucy led the way back to the dressing rooms, but abruptly stopped as she turned the corner into the hallway, causing her brothers to run into her back as they were unceremoniously alerted to her change of momentum. Ahead of them, Klavier Gavin was clutching his sunglasses tightly in one hand, standing tall over a cowering staff member as they gathered together dropped pieces of burned wood from the floor.

"What the heck was that!??" Klavier shouted, waving his hand. "I was never consulted about it!"

"S-sorry, Mister Gavin, sir!" the staff member apologised, hugging the pieces of ruined guitar to his chest. "I've asked the man in charge-"

"I play new rock, not Great Balls of Fire!" Klavier interrupted, apparently too into his rant to even hear the man's words. "Speaking of fire, I have a good mind to fire whoever's responsible!"

Trucy turned to her brothers. "He seems upset."

Her comment seemed to have been heard, as Klavier promptly wheeled around, and, noticing the trio, pointed at them with a scowl. "Apollo Wright! Were you the one who tried to torch me!?"

Behind him, the harried staff member took the opportunity to flee, disappearing into the backstage area.

Apollo held up his hands, wondering why it was him the prosecutor had decided to hone in on. "Hey, I didn't do it!"

Klavier huffed, looking away, but he seemed to accept Apollo's innocence, pressing a hand to his face.

"'The Guitar's Serenade' is ruined!" Klavier cried. "Ruined!" With that, he turned and stormed into his dressing room, the door slamming closed behind him.

The Wrights stared at the empty hallway for several long seconds.

"Well," Trucy finally spoke up, "let's try to talk to him at least." She began to step forward, only to be grabbed by Luke.
"I don't think that's a good idea right now, Truce," Luke said, looking worried. "We should give him his space, until he calms down."

Apollo nodded in agreement. "He seemed pretty mad."

Trucy scoffed. "C'mon, don't you two have any taste for adventure?" Before they could protest further, she had pulled herself from Luke's grip and skipped after Klavier into the Gavinners' dressing room. Her brothers could only exchange worried glances before hurrying after her.

Klavier was alone in his dressing room, his bandmates likely avoiding him after catching wind of his rage. He was slumped in a chair in front of a mirror, his head in his hands, and didn't react at all to the three Wrights slowly filing into the room.

Trucy carefully tiptoed across to the man, her hands linked behind her back. "So... the guitar... That wasn't part of the act?"

"Part of the act!?!" Klavier repeated, coming to life and lifting his head to give Trucy an incredulous look. "Who'd burn up a guitar on purpose!??"

Luke shrugged. "Well, it fit perfectly with the lyrics."

Trucy nodded in agreement. "Yeah, you know." She promptly attempted to half-sing the lyrics of the song: "'Burning on in my heart, fire, burn my love away, all away'?"

Klavier stared, wide-eyed, for a very long moment. "Wait, you think the audience thought it was...?"

Frowning in thought, Klavier looked off to the side, apparently contemplating his luck in timing. After another long pause, he shook his head, getting to his feet. "A-anything, that guitar was the Ferrari of guitars!" he cried, launching into a speech. "All the speed, all the sound... and all the price. If I burned one of those at every show I'd go broke!"

"Achtung!" Klavier shouted, throwing his hands in the air and moving past Trucy to the back of the room. "Today's been one disaster after another... My hog won't run, my guitar case's broken..."

Looking worried, Trucy went to follow Klavier, but paused as she passed the table in the middle of the room, examining a pile of purple cards spread out between the other random items that had accumulated there. Cooing to herself, she was quickly absorbed in poring over them, Klavier forgotten.

Shaking his head, Luke picked up where Trucy had left off, walking around to Klavier's side. "That song was incredible, though. You wrote the lyrics, didn't you?"

Klavier nodded, turning to Luke and putting on a polite smile. "Ah, yes, thanks. It was a collaboration: I wrote the lyrics and she wrote the melody."

Luke smiled. "I'm surprised she could sing in English."

"I'm sure she practised a long time for this day," Klavier chuckled, then snapped his fingers as something came to mind. He reached into an inner pocket of his jacket, pulling out a small sheet of paper. "Ah, here."

"Thank you," Luke automatically said, looking over the paper curiously.

Apollo frowned, taking a few steps forward. "What is it?" he asked.

"A lyrics sheet," Klavier explained, giving the suspicious elder brother a grin. "It's yours. Signed by myself and Lamiroir."

Apollo's eyebrows shot up in surprise.

"That's very kind of you, Mister Gavin," Luke said, looking over the paper with a wide smile. "Thank you so much!"

Trying his hardest not to be jealous of Klavier's success as a performer, Apollo crossed his arms and decided to change the subject, gesturing to the table. "What are those postcards there, by the way?"

Immediately, Trucy jumped away from the table, where she'd been ignoring the greater conversation for some time now. Her fake smile screamed 'guilt'.

"Lamiroir's, you mean?" Klavier replied, looking a little confused. "It's part of her PR campaign. I received a stack. You can have one if you'd like."

"Ah, that's good to hear," Apollo replied, and gave his sister a stern stare. "Trucy already swiped one, is why."

Trucy was visibly trying not to sweat, her hands clasped tightly behind her back. "B-but that... But I..." Giving up on feigning innocence, she crossed her arms and gave her eldest brother a glare. "What's the big idea, making me look like a criminal!? It was... a collaboration! I've always wanted to do a collaboration!"

Klavier chuckled. "Usually, a collaboration is for creating, not stealing."

"You don't even know what that word means, do you?" Luke pitched in with a fond smile.

"Of course I do!" Trucy insisted. "It, um... It means... I don't have to tell you what it means! It's obvious!" When her brothers only rolled their eyes, she pointed angrily at them and cried, "I'm telling Daddy you two were picking on me!"

As the two elder Wrights laughed at their sister, Klavier's attention was again distracted by the clock above the door. "Almost time for the third act of the night," he announced.

Trucy immediately calmed at the thought of more concert to watch. "Oh! There's more?"

"Yes!" Klavier laughed. "Lamiroir's part is done. Now it's time for us to drop our groove again, ja?" He winked, looking between Trucy and Luke. "Hope you're ready to catch it."

Cheering, Trucy ran to Apollo's side, grabbing his arm. "Ready, Polly?"

Apollo tried not to visibly wince. "I think I'll pass."

Luke gave him a sympathetic smile. "You're not enjoying yourself?"

"I liked the bit with Lamiroir," Apollo replied, shrugging. "The rest could use a volume knob. Turned way down."
Trucy giggled. "You're just getting old, Polly!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow at her. "I'm twenty-two."

"Well, I'm going," Trucy told him, releasing his arm, then looked to her other brother. "What about you, Luke?"

Luke shrugged. "I'll go. There's no reason not to."

Apollo rolled his eyes.

Klavier chuckled. "Let the old folks rest backstage, ja?" he said, waving for the younger Wrights to follow as he left the room. "Time to rock!"

'You're older than me!' Apollo resisted from spitting at the man's head as he passed.

Luke paused at the door, giving his brother a sympathetic smile. "I'll keep an eye on Trucy. We'll be right back once the show's over."

Apollo nodded, forcing a smile back. "Sure."

Thinking it would be rude to linger in the Gavinners' dressing room, and already having decided not to follow his siblings back up to their box, Apollo quickly found he had nowhere else to really go. He stood out in the hallway for a little while, quietly examining the vending machine, a battered-looking Blue Badger doll, and a nearby bench stacked with random items such as a trunk, a guitar case and a small pile of hoops... But even the apparently-forgotten earpiece on the floor failed to keep his attention for long, and he found himself wandering off back towards the elevator. If nothing else, it was further from the stage and thus echoed less of the Gavinners' music into his long-suffering ears. 'At least I don't have to worry about Luke and Trucy,' he assured himself. They can look after each other. I hope Ms Altava and Flora are enjoying themselves too.

It was as he turned the final corner of the bend in the corridor that led to the elevator that Apollo heard footsteps ahead, and looked up with mild curiosity to see who it was... only for the approaching figure to stop dead in her tracks, apparently as surprised as Apollo to see who she was meeting. "Hey, it's you!" she called, resuming a speedy walk in his direction. "One of the Wright kids!"

Apollo forced a polite smile as he waved in greeting, hoping this meeting would go better than their last. "Detective Skye!"

Ema reached Apollo's section of the hallway and gave him a grin. "Call me Ema," she insisted. "There's no need for titles once you've shared a bottle of fingerprinting powder." She winked.

"That's a new one," Apollo chuckled. "So, um, Ema, what are you doing here?"

Sighing to herself, Ema slowly continued her plodding walk down the hallway, and Apollo fell into step at her side. "Isn't it obvious?" she asked, holding up the plastic bag in her hand. "I'm snacking. You think I want to be here!? Me, in charge of security in this pit!?"

Apollo blinked in surprise, wondering if she was the person who'd passed the Wrights off on that random security guard earlier... and suddenly realising why said guard was dressed, and acted, more like a police officer than mere security personnel. "Security...? Did something happen?"

"There's no knowing with that glimmerous fop," Ema muttered, scowling into a handful of Snackoos as she shoved them into her mouth. "Apparently, he's all upset because something was stolen. He wanted security back here during the concert." She huffed. "Where does he get off acting like he's some big rock star?"

Apollo bit his lip to keep from pointing out the obvious.

"Hey!" Ema cried, tossing a piece of chocolate that pinged off Apollo's forehead. "You listening to me?"

Rubbing at his forehead, Apollo nodded. "Yes, yes! Geeze!"

The pair rounded a corner and found themselves back in the section of corridor where the dressing rooms were. Apollo cast his eyes over the near door, where he had just come out of the Gavinner's dressing room, and then the far door, the one labelled as Lamiroir's. He could only presume she was in there right now with her pianist and manager, probably idly waiting for the concert to end.

Ema paused, noticing the blue vending machine opposite the Gavinner's door. "Oh hey, look at that.
You thirsty, Apollo?"

"Come to think of it," Apollo admitted, turning his attention back to the machine, "I am a little."

The detective nodded, a hand on her hip. "I'll have some tea."

Apollo stared for a long moment as Ema failed to move, belatedly realising she seemed to be expecting him to buy her drink. Rolling his eyes, he turned to the machine, putting his back to Ema.
"I think I'll get a water," he decided.

"I'll have tea!" she ordered.

Apollo looked around only long enough to shoot her a glare. Where was Luke when you needed him? "If you want tea so bad, go buy it yourself!" The moment he'd turned back to look at the machine, he felt something small pinging off the back of his head, and looked around again to see Ema staring at him with narrowed eyes, her free hand in her snack-bag.

"I'll take a tea."

The two stared each other down for a long moment, neither budging to give the other ground.

\textbf{BANG}

Apollo jumped, looking down the hall. In front of him, Ema was also looking around, both trying to locate the source of the sound. "What was that?" Apollo asked.

\textbf{BANG}

"Was that..." Apollo whispered, hoping to goodness he was wrong, "a gunshot?"

A crash echoed down the hall. It was unmistakably coming from Lamiroir's dressing room.

"You, out of my way!" Ema ordered, shoving Apollo against the vending machine as she charged the short distance to the far door. "Lamiroir! Lamiroir!" she called, and her hand instinctively moved to the doorknob, which unlatched in her grip and gave her pause, looking down in surprise. She and Apollo locked eyes for only a moment, then she announced "I'm going in!" and threw open the door.

The first thing to hit Apollo was the sudden loud shrieking of guitars in his ears, which he took a moment to recognise as the sounds of the concert coming from a speaker directly above them. Ema stopped just inside the door, and he was forced to stay behind her, frantically looking around the surprisingly messy room for the source of the bangs. It didn't take long to see the large man sprawled on the floor at the back, blood pooling on the carpet underneath him and a noticeable dark stain covering his left shoulder. "Th-that's-!"

"LeTouse!" Ema interrupted, spotting the man at the same moment Apollo did. She practically leapt over the couch in front of them, making for the other side of the room, and Apollo wasn't far behind her. "Oh no," she groaned to herself, stepping over a massive revolver and standing briefly at LeTouse's side to examine him, then she rounded on Apollo with a fierce look. "Hey, you!"
"M-me?"

"Watch this room for me," she ordered, and pushed past Apollo again to run back to the door. "I have to call for backup!"

Apollo nodded, still in shock. "R-right, understood. You want me to make sure no one comes in, right?"

Pausing in the doorway, Ema nodded. "And don't touch anything! I'll be right back!" With that, she was gone.

Despite the ear-splitting rock music still ringing in his ears, the room felt unbearably silent all of a sudden. Apollo stared at the door, left slightly ajar in Ema's hurry to leave. What now? Just... stand there until something happened? The adrenaline was pumping in his veins; He had to do something...

A groan interrupted Apollo's rising panic, and he noticed with a start that the man lying at his feet was still alive. "Mister LeTouse!" Springing into action, he leapt to the man's side and dropped to his knees. "Can you hear me?" If he's alive, and he's hurt... I should get him into the recovery position!

Automatically, he started moving to push the man's shoulder off the carpet, but paused. 'No, wait, he's got a bullet wound in that shoulder... bad idea.'

"Sh... shot," LeTouse mumbled with great effort. "I was... shot."

Apollo shook his head, refocusing himself on helping LeTouse. Primary goal: Keep him talking and awake. Secondary goal: Stop the blood-flow. He pressed a palm to a barely-noticeable rip in the middle of the bloodstain. "Who? Who shot you?"

LeTouse's face twitched, but whether in pain or deep thought Apollo wasn't sure. "I don't know," he admitted. "Ask..."

"Ask?" Apollo repeated, terrified of what would happen should LeTouse trail off permanently. "Ask what?"

"Ask... wi... witness..."

Apollo gasped. "Witness... There was a witness!?" He gripped LeTouse's shoulder tightly with his other hand, desperate to get as much information from him as he could. "Who!?"

LeTouse paused, coughing. "Cold... so cold... Witness..."

"You're cold?" Apollo's hand flew to the brooch on his cape, unclipping it and tossing the crimson fabric over the man's back. "D-don't worry, you're going to be fine! Help is on the way!"

"Can't s... see..."

Apollo noticed with a start that LeTouse's eyes were drifting closed. "Hang in there, Mister LeTouse!" he cried, clinging to the man's shoulder through the red cloth of the cape, barely feeling the points of his brooch digging into his left palm through his glove. He was leaning so far down, the ID card on the lanyard at his neck was brushing against the floor. "Tell me, who was the witness?"

LeTouse didn't immediately reply, struggling to breathe. "The wi... witness... is... si... si... ren..."

'Siren? As in the mythological...?" Apollo shook his head, dismissing his confusion for later; LeTouse's eyes had closed, and the tension was leaving his face. "Mister LeTouse!" he cried, shaking the man's shoulder to try and keep him awake.
A closing door, far too close for comfort, snapped Apollo out of his focus on the dying man, and he looked up. "Ema!?" He jumped out of his crouch over LeTouse, the brooch in his hand falling to the floor, and peered around the half-closed separator wall to the hallway door, which appeared to be closed tight. "Wh-who's there!?!"

The door swung open, making Apollo jump before he recognised Ema finally returning, and he pressed a hand to his chest, sighing in relief as he dropped back down by LeTouse's side.

Ema was almost at the young lawyer's side before she noticed his unease and gave him a worried look. "What's wrong?"

Apollo shook his head, gesturing to the hallway. "Ema, did you see anyone just now?"

"Huh?" After a moment of thought, she shook her head. "No..."

The young lawyer continued to stare at the door, frowning intensely as his breathing refused to slow. 'Didn't Ema leave that ajar?'

"The concert's been cancelled," Ema continued, and Apollo suddenly noticed the music echoing through the room had stopped. "Backup's on its way. Is Mister LeTouse...?" She frowned, looking down at the man on the floor, Apollo's cape draped over his back. After a moment, her stare turned sad. "He's dead, isn't he? That's terrible."

Apollo had followed her gaze to also stare at the man he'd been comforting only moments before, but it still took a moment for Ema's words to register. Face paling, he jumped to his feet, scrambling away from the body on the floor.

LeTouse was dead.

And only Apollo had heard his last words.

View the Court Record
After LeTouse's death, Ema sat Apollo down on the nearby red couches and instructed him to recount everything that had happened while she was away. Once he was done, she retrieved his cape and dropped brooch from the corpse; The cape had acquired a large bloodstain in the back of the left shoulder, no thanks to Apollo gripping that area so tightly as he attempted to hear LeTouse's last words, and the blood had transferred through to his formerly-pristine white gloves, mixing with Apollo's own blood where he had punctured the skin on the sharp points of his brooch - Ema sternly told him to go find the first aid kit later as she pulled the gloves off his hands. Only the brooch itself was undamaged, any blood easily wiped off the metal surface, and Ema pressed it gently back into Apollo's undamaged palm the moment she had wiped away any residue of blood with a box of tissues in the room. "Sorry about your cape and gloves," she said, piling the items together and tossing the soiled tissues. "I... could get them cleaned for you. If that's okay?"

Apollo just nodded, unable to meet her eyes. "Thank you."

It was then Klavier arrived in the room, accompanied by one of his bandmates. Noticing the pair shooting him glances as they called over Ema to get to work, Apollo decided it was time to leave. Out in the hallway, Apollo cleared some space on the bench on the opposite wall, then sat and waited. LeTouse was the first and only death he had ever witnessed, let alone the one and only dead body he had ever seen, and the thought of that, the responsibility of having been the one at LeTouse's side to hear his last words, to comfort him as he passed, to literally have LeTouse's blood on his hands... He could only sit, clinging to the golden brooch in his palm as it glinted in the artificial light. At least he could be grateful the shock was slowly wearing off.

Footsteps echoed from down the hall, and Apollo looked up to see his siblings rounding the corner, looking around worriedly. They were quick to catch sight of him, and Apollo gave them a re-assuring smile as they raced to his side.

"Polly!" Trucy cried, clutching her hands together with concern as she noticed the missing parts of his costume. "What happened!? The announcer guy said the concert was cancelled, and everyone had to give the security staff their names and addresses!"

"I told Emmy and Flora to give them the agency as their temporary address," Luke added. "They said they'd wait outside for us to catch up."

Apollo nodded, clutching the brooch tighter. He stared at his lap, unsure of what to say.

There was a moment of silence, and Apollo assumed his siblings had nodded. "What about him?" Luke asked.
"He's dead," Apollo quietly replied. "Someone's shot him."

His siblings remained silent and unmoving for several seconds. Slowly, Luke moved to sit at Apollo's side, where the bench had been cleared of clutter. He rested a hand on his brother's shoulder, but Apollo didn't look up, keeping his eyes on his lap. "You did the best you could," Luke assured him.

At that, Apollo looked up to meet his brother's gaze, surprised. "How'd you...?"

Luke just smiled. "I'm a vet. I've had plenty of patients pass away under my care. Let's just say I know that look."

Sighing, Apollo leaned back against the wall behind them. "What about you two? Have they talked to you yet?"

Trucy nodded. "One of the security guys met us in our box."

"He told us not to leave just yet," Luke added, "so we decided to come find you."

Apollo thought a moment, staring off into the distance.

Seeing her brothers had nothing more to add to the conversation, Trucy moved between them. "Shove over," she ordered, pushing the two to either side and squeezing herself onto the bench between them. Apollo and Luke moved over to indulge her, even though Apollo was now pushed up against the large trunk at his side and Luke was at the very edge of the bench, in danger of falling off if he wasn't careful.

Just as the three Wrights were getting comfortable, the door to Lamiroir's dressing room opened, and Klavier Gavin came out into the hallway, his bandmate behind him. "- venue's locked down," the other man was saying. "We took names and addresses before letting the crowd go."

Klavier nodded, pausing in the hallway as his friend followed him out, Ema standing expectantly in the doorway behind them. "Good work, Daryan."

"I'll let you know if I find out anything about the victim," the other man, Daryan, continued, giving Klavier a cocky grin and running his hands along his extravagant pompadour. "Later." With that, he turned and wandered off down the hall, out of sight.

Klavier turned to Ema with a smile. "It's investigation time then, ja, Fraulein Detective?"

Ema glared. "I don't need some rock 'n' rolling prosecutor to tell me that."

Said prosecutor was unphased by her proclamation, chuckling as he turned his attention to the Wrights on the nearby bench. "One request I must make," he added, apparently addressing all four of them as his smile died. "Tell no one, on staff or otherwise, anything of this."

"Ooh, a gag order!" Trucy cooed, looking between her brothers with a grin.

"No word gets out, other than that Mister LeTouse is dead," Klavier continued. "No word of the cause of death, or of the murder."

Apollo realised he must have guessed the eldest Wright had already told his siblings the full story, and nodded sheepishly. "Tell no one... Not even Lamiroir?"

"Not even her," Klavier replied, shaking his head. "We must keep everything under wraps. Oh, one other thing." He held his hand out to Ema, who sighed dramatically and pulled a piece of paper from her purse, handing it over to him. He gave her a grateful nod, then passed the paper on to Apollo. "I'll need your signature on this, Herr Forehead. Yours too, Fraulein, Doktor."

Clutching his brooch in one hand, Apollo pulled himself out from between Trucy and the trunk, getting to his feet. "On that?" He took the paper, examining its contents thoughtfully. "An 'investigation request'?"

"Why just us?" Trucy asked.

"You three are civilians," Klavier pointed out, his smile slowly returning. "It's standard procedure."

Apollo looked to Luke, who gave him a smile and a nod. 'It should be okay to sign, I think...' Luke retrieved his pen from his satchel, and the three Wrights took turns signing the paper, using the nearby trunk on the bench as a flat surface. To Apollo, the hallway felt very crowded with his siblings, Klavier and Ema all there; Once he had passed the pen back to Luke, he moved down the hallway a little to calm down, pressing the brooch in his hand to his chest. Despite his best efforts, he still couldn't make himself put it in a pocket. He just felt naked, vulnerable, without his cape and gloves... and the glint of the bow-and-arrows distracted him from the glimpses of red he kept seeing on his palms.

With the contract signed and handed back to Klavier, the prosecutor turned to Ema with a grin, handing the paper back to her. "Right, well, get started with the investigation!"

"I'm on it already!" Ema cried indignantly, spinning around dramatically and disappearing back into the dressing room, the door slamming shut behind her.

Klavier chuckled, unphased by her theatrics, and turned to Apollo, one finger in the air. "Ah, and one tip for you."

Apollo briefly looked behind him to check no-one was there. "Me?"

"Try not to get in the Fraulein detective's way," Klavier continued, pushing his fingers into his pants pockets. "She's in a foul mood today." Apollo rolled his eyes, but Klavier just turned and walked off out of sight.

Luke sighed, pulling his phone out of his satchel. "Well, if the Coliseum's on lockdown, I guess we're not leaving any time soon."

Apollo shook his head. "I'm technically a witness, so I probably can't go anyway until they've arrested someone." He then frowned, noticing Luke's intense fiddling with his phone. "What are you doing?"

"Telling Emmy and Flora to go ahead back to the Bostonius and that we'll see them tomorrow."

Luke replied, shooting his brother a smile. "Don't worry, I'll keep to the contract and not tell them what's happened."

Trucy meanwhile was gazing intently at the door to Lamiroir's dressing room. "Y'know, Detective Skye is a friend of Daddy's... do you think she'd let us look around the crime scene?"

"I don't know, Truce," Luke replied, finishing up his text message to his friends. "She might not want us getting in her way."

Apollo sighed, crossing his arms. "I still can't believe I was there when it happened," he quietly admitted.

Luke gave his brother a sympathetic look as he put away his phone. "What exactly did happen?" he asked. "You heard Mister LeTouse getting shot?"

Trucy scoffed. "This is no time for navel-gazing!" she proclaimed, and was stepping forward to open the dressing room door, "Let's crack this-!", when she paused, looking down and lifting her boot. "Huh? What's that?" Distracted from her train of thought, she crouched down by the abandoned earpiece on the floor that Apollo had noticed earlier, pressing the lanyard around her neck to her chest to keep it from getting in the way. "It looks like some kind of future-phone!"

'What would Dad do in this situation?' Apollo found himself wondering, hearing but no longer listening to his siblings' conversation. He held out his brooch, staring at it in his palm between the angry red cuts it had caused not ten minutes before.

Luke crouched at Trucy's side, similarly pressing the loosely hanging ID card to his chest. "Oh, that's not a phone. It looks like a transceiver... I think they call those specifically 'headsets'."

'Obviously, Dad would insist on investigating himself, regardless of whether he had a client... He did that when he first met Mom, didn't he? And again for Uncle Edgeworth... but he sorta knew Mom from Mia, and Uncle Edgeworth was his friend since they were kids. I didn't know Mister LeTouse at all, so I don't exactly have a personal stake in this. Maybe Dad would be leaving it to the police after all...'

"What's it doing on the floor?" Trucy was asking Luke, frowning in confusion, then she gasped. "Wait! Do you think Mister LeTouse might have been wearing it? Like one of those bodyguards?"

'Except I witnessed the murder... I literally had Mister LeTouse's blood on my hands! Doesn't that make it personal? Argh, why am I even trying to emulate Dad in this situation!?! I should just do what I want! But... what do I want?"

"I don't think he was wearing one of these, actually," Luke was telling Trucy. "And it looks like it's on. See that LED?" He pointed to a tiny green light near the small speaker.

"So... can we take it?"

Apollo's grip tightened on his brooch. 'I want... I want to know who killed Mister LeTouse. I want to know what his last words meant. He wanted me to know. I'm involved in this. It's my duty to see it through.'

"Better not. Whoever owns it will come looking for it eventually."

Trucy sighed in disappointment, pushing herself back to her feet. She looked around a moment, confused. "What were we doing? Oh yeah!" She grinned, turning to Apollo. "We have to go ask Detective Skye if we can investigate! Right, Polly?"

Apollo nodded a determined frown on his face. "The witness is siren," he said, then securely fastened the brooch in his hand to his tie, roughly where it would sit had he been wearing his cape along with it. "Let's investigate."
Ema looked up as the door opened, but seemed unsurprised as she saw the three Wrights crowded in the doorway. "Oh, it's you," she said, a hand on her hip as she stood from beside the body. "I figured you'd come."

Apollo took a deep breath, stepping forward into the room. "You have to let us investigate the scene, please!"

Looking the three over, Ema raised an eyebrow. "You're attorneys, no? Shouldn't you wait until you have a client?"

The young lawyer's determined look just deepened into a glare.

Behind Apollo, Luke adjusted his cap, adding to his brother's firm stare. "If nothing else, at least let us assist in your investigation," he said. "We all want to find who shot Mister LeTouse, don't we?"

"Please!" Trucy picked up, her hands clasped together as she pleaded with the detective. "Think of poor Lamiroir!"

Ema looked uncomfortable under the gazes of all three Wrights, shifting a little where she stood before sighing. "Oh well, I suppose," she reluctantly agreed. "You did find the body with me."

Apollo sighed in relief, giving Ema a smile. "Great!" He glanced back at his siblings to spot Luke narrowing his eyes at Ema while Trucy was giving Apollo an excited grin. "Let's get to it!"

"Right!" Trucy replied, a hand at her hat. Luke seemed to dismiss whatever was on his mind with a shake of his head.

"Just try not to touch anything!" Ema ordered, sitting back down on a stool by LeTouse's body.

Apollo noticed with a sense of elation that Ema had not pulled out her bag of Snackoos, evidently making herself available to talk. This bodes well! Better get started then. He stepped forward into the room, and, although it was his second time inside, he suddenly realised he hadn't really looked around the last time he was there: Hanging from the roof in much the same way as the chains in the neighbouring room were a series of brightly-coloured streamers, but only in the half of the room at the entrance door, the ceiling being clear around the dressing table itself at the back. Along with the red sofa and lounge chair was a figure-eight-shaped table and a large TV, as well as hearty piles of fruit, flowers and presents for the visiting singer.

"Ooh, what a pretty brooch!" Trucy suddenly cooed, and Apollo turned to see her dropping to the floor by a small fridge, next to the entrance. "Um, Detective Skye...?" She peered over the top of the sofa with a hopeful look.

Ema rolled her eyes. "First, you can call me Ema, second, you're not going to say 'can I have it please', are you?"
As Trucy's expression fell, Apollo walked over to see what she was looking at; Luke, who had moved over to the other side of the lounge area, joined him. It didn't take long for them to notice the green diamond-shaped brooch, outlined in gold, lying on the grey tiles.

"Look, you may be a cute little girl of fourteen," Ema continued, "but that doesn't get you any special treatment with me!"

Trucy shrank away even further.

Apollo couldn't resist a smirk at the detective, sitting grumpily on her stool at the dressing table. "It's not healthy to envy the young, Ema."

"It's not about envy!" Ema shot back. "It's about tampering with evidence!" When Apollo rolled his eyes, she added, "You need to learn to respect your elders a little!"

Luke was stroking his goatee as he examined the brooch. "That seems familiar..." He then looked up at Trucy. "Actually, did you used to have one like that, Trucy? Before you replaced it to match Apollo?"

Trucy blinked in surprise, a hand flying to the bow-and-arrows pinned to her cape. "Oh, yeah, I did!" she realised, then frowned. "But mine had a white outline. And it stuck out on the corners. And the diamond was all pointy, not round." She turned her frown back to the abandoned brooch. "Though... I don't think that's why it's familiar."

Apollo internally sighed, knowing the allure of the pretty pin wasn't going to leave his sister's mind for a while. To appease her, he pulled out his Court Record from his hip-bag (truthfully, he'd almost forgotten he had it), and unlocked the screen. "Want to take a picture of it?" he asked her.

"Yes please!" Trucy eagerly replied, taking the offered computer tablet to snap a photo of the floor at her feet.

Luke's attention had meanwhile turned to the wall at his left, above the fridge they were stood near. "Those are bullet holes, right?"

Apollo looked up and nodded. "Looks like it. Two shots. Matches the bangs we heard."

"From the look of it," Ema picked up, looking through her own notes on a notepad, "the victim was shot once in the shoulder. The first shot must have missed."

Trucy finished her photo-taking, turning her attention to the conversation at hand. "But there are two holes," she pointed out. "Wouldn't that mean two misses?"

Ema stood, gesturing to something on the floor out of their view. "The murder weapon is a forty-five-calibre revolver. It's very powerful." She stepped over the body and towards the trio, pointing to the bullet holes. "I believe what we're seeing here is the mark left by the second bullet after it passed through his shoulder."

Trucy winced. "Ouch... Sounds painful."

Apollo could only frown as he stared at the damaged wall, seeing LeTouse's pained face in his mind's eye.

Luke had turned to Ema. "If I may ask... I gather you and Apollo witnessed the crime?"

Ema sighed, a hand on her hip. "In a way. We certainly know more about it than anyone else."
"Y-you do?" Trucy cried, surprised.

Apollo nodded, still staring at the bullet holes. "It was us who found the body," he repeated.

"What!?!" Her shock apparently spent, Trucy huffed, crossing her arms. "I guess that's what we miss for watching the concert, huh, Luke?"

"Hey, I wish I was watching the concert," Apollo replied, shooting her a glare before again looking away. "Anything would be better than this..."

Luke nodded, giving Trucy a sympathetic look. "He's right, Trucy. It's not as pleasant as you think to walk in on a murder."

Trucy opened her mouth to protest before remembering both her brothers were speaking from experience, and wisely shut up.

"Well, we know the crime took place during the concert," Ema continued, deciding to ignore Trucy's interruptions.

"And when we heard the shots and entered the room," Apollo picked up, "the killer was already gone."

Trucy frowned. "What? But that doesn't make sense! You came in when you heard the shot and no one was here?" She looked around almost indignantly. "How did they leave the room?"

Luke was stroking his goatee again, giving an intense frown of his own to the ceiling behind Apollo. "It's not as nonsensical as you might think, Trucy."

"What does that mean?" Trucy asked, crossing her arms.

Meanwhile, Apollo turned to find the object of Luke's attention. Indeed, there on the ceiling behind him, right above where a pink streamer was attached to the wall, was an air vent. Below, leaning against the wall, was a stepladder tall enough to reach it.

"You've noticed," Ema pointed out, arms crossed as she glared at the vent herself. "The killer must have had a way out other than the door... and that air vent is one possibility."

Trucy peered around Apollo, finally spotting what everyone was talking about. "But... that's much too small!" she argued.

The teenager turned to the younger of her brothers with a raised eyebrow. "You're not saying it was me, are you?"

Luke gave her an offended look. "Of course not!" he cried. "You were with me up in our box! Why would I accuse you!?"

Trucy shrugged, turning away with an innocent air. "As long as we understand each other."

Luke just rolled his eyes.

"What about the other possibilities?" Trucy asked, turning to Ema. "Like... that little window over there!" She bounced around Luke, pointing to a small window in the wall behind Ema. "Maybe they escaped through that!"
Apollo leaned over, peering suspiciously at the mentioned window around the half-closed separator wall. "It's barely big enough for me to get my head through," he pointed out, stepping across the room to examine it closer.

"Not to mention it only opens a crack," Ema added.

Trucy paused, then leaned against the side of the sofa, disappointed. "I was just saying it's possible..."

Luke patted her back sympathetically. "We understand."

Ema shrugged, looking back at the window. "You could peek into the room through it, though."

Finding himself on the other side of the separator wall, Apollo stopped in his tracks; He'd caught sight of LeTouse, still lying on the floor where Apollo had last seen him. 'I... forgot he would still be here...’ Nearby, bundled on the floor, was the magician's soiled cape and gloves... the proof of Apollo's failure to help.

At his side, Ema gave Apollo a concerned look. "Did you want to examine the body?"

Apollo didn't immediately answer, still staring at LeTouse, but finally he tore his eyes away to focus on something, anything, else, and happened to land on the large gun lying on the floor nearby. He remembered seeing it when he and Ema first entered the room, but hadn't paid it much attention before now. Taking a deep breath, he gestured to it. "This is the murder weapon, isn't it? This revolver...?"

Ema paused for a fraction of a second before nodding. "That's right. A big forty-five-calibre revolver."

Trucy hesitantly stepped forward, apparently as put off by the body as her brother. "Wow. I wonder who brought this in here? I thought only police were allowed to have one of those." She raised the computer tablet still in her hands, taking photos of the scene.

Apollo looked up at Ema, silently waiting for her explanation, but Ema, noticing his gaze, just glared in return. "Why are you giving me that look!? I didn't do it!"

The lawyer blinked in surprise, then shook his head. "I didn't-!

"Listen," Ema forcefully continued, "I was out in the hall eating Snackoos when it happened!"

"I know, I know!" Apollo insisted, holding his hands up in surrender and backing off from the detective. "No one here thinks you did it, Ema!"

Ema's eyes narrowed. "It's hard to tell with you sometimes, Apollo."

Apollo resisted the urge to roll his eyes. 'What did I do!?'

Luke wandered around behind Trucy, stroking his goatee. "But why would someone bring a gun to a concert? Does that mean this was pre-meditated?"

Ema just frowned, glaring at the gun. "Something's certainly odd about it, that's for sure. Even the police don't carry guns this big."

"Really?" Apollo asked.

The detective nodded, crossing her arms. "You don't need so much power to kill at such close range.
It's overkill."

Trucy looked up from her photo-taking, confused. "I'm not sure I see the problem."

"Of course you don't," Apollo replied with a teasing smile. "You always order curry 'extra spicy', can't eat more than a couple bites, and mooch off Luke's food."

Luke stifled giggles, while Trucy pouted, spinning around to take photos of the other side of the room.

"There's another thing about a gun this big and heavy," Ema continued. "It puts a lot of strain on the shooter."

"Strain?" Apollo repeated.

"Yeah," Ema replied, nodding, and gestured to the young magician. "Say, if you were to fire this revolver, the recoil would probably dislocate your shoulder."

Apollo instinctively grabbed his left shoulder with a wince. "Er, I'll stick to our prop guns, thanks..."

Luke was frowning in thought. "So you're saying the shooter is a victim too?" he asked. "They'll be either big and strong, or small with a dislocated shoulder."

"I'm not that small," Apollo muttered, crossing his arms.

Ema sighed, shrugging. "Yet, they used this revolver," she pointed out, "and quite well. I'm guessing whoever did it was used to shooting."

Trucy seemed to finish with whatever she was doing on the other side of the room and dashed up behind Luke, tapping his back to attract his attention.

Luke turned, giving his sister a confused look. "What is it, Trucy?"

"I was wondering," she asked, frowning, "with all this talk about the revolver... what's a calibre? And what does the 'forty-five' mean?"

Ema snorted, interrupting whatever Luke might have said in response. "You want me to tell you?" she said, smirking. "It's the size of the barrel. Simply put, the larger the calibre, the bigger the round. The bullet, in other words." She crossed her arms. "Bigger bullets do more damage."

Apollo half-smiled, impressed. "Wow, chalk one point up for forensic science."

"You know it!" Ema chirped proudly.

Trucy still looked confused. "But it's not forty-five inches, right? That'd be too big."

"Actually, in a way, you're right there," Luke replied, smiling at his sister. "It isn't forty-five inches, it's point forty-five inches. About the diameter of one of your fingers, probably. " He held out one of his own for comparison, and Trucy imitated the movement with a giggle. "Off the top of my head, it'd be somewhere around a centimetre in metric units."

Apollo noticed Ema quietly frown to herself, then pull out her notebook to scribble something down on one of the pages. When she noticed him looking, she shot the young magician a glare, turning away. Apollo hid a giggle behind a hand. 'Yep, that was news to Ema too.'
"Mister Romein LeTouse... Lamiroir's manager, and interpreter apparently," Ema explained, stepping towards the body and sitting back down on the stool between it and the dressing table. "This was his first time in the country."

Luke and Trucy looked up from their conversation in surprise; Apollo couldn't blame them, as it had been a rather sudden change of topic. He could only assume Ema had decided it was high time they get to talking about the elephant in the room of their investigation.

"It doesn't seem likely he knew many people here," Ema continued. "Nor can I think of anyone with a motive to murder him... except for one person, of course."

"One person?" Trucy asked. "Who?"

Luke frowned. "Who else?" He crossed his arms with a sigh. "The only adult in this building who's known him for more than a day: Lamiroir."

Trucy instantly bristled, offended on her idol's behalf. "What are you talking about!?" she demanded, slapping her brother's arm. "Lamiroir didn't do it!"

"And I believe that too," Luke assured her, though he winced a little at the assault on his upper arm. "Unfortunately, she and her pianist are the only people who might conceivably have a motive with the information we currently possess."

"Well, it wasn't him either!" Trucy argued, crossed her arms and pouting as she calmed down. "Mister LeTouse is a big man. Or... was. I don't think even Polly would win in a fight with him."

Apollo wanted to be offended, but he had to agree with that assessment. "Which is why whoever it was used a revolver, I'm guessing."

"We've sent a request to the Borginian Embassy for more info on him," Ema explained, then gestured to the body on the floor in front of her. "Were you three planning to take a closer look at the victim?"

"Me!?" Apollo cried, backing away himself. "Why me!?"

Luke sighed, then stepped forward, away from his sister's terrified grip. "You two don't have to if you don't want to. I'll look at him."

Apollo felt a flood of relief at not having to confront the corpse of the man he had tried so hard to save... but also guilty for having to leave the job to his younger brother. As Luke knelt down at LeTouse's side, in the same spot Apollo had sat earlier, the elder brother turned his attention to Trucy, who was hanging back by the lounge chair, hands fiddling with the lanyard around her neck.
as she debated joining Luke or running away; Apollo would bet money she was having the same internal argument as him. After another glance at Luke (he was leaning over the body now, stroking his chin and frowning intently as he studied the area closely), Apollo walked over to his little sister and rested a hand on her shoulder. "Stay here," he told her, making the request an order partly out of worry for letting her near a dead body and partly to keep her from forcing herself to approach it out of a misguided need to prove herself. "Luke and I will look at Mister LeTouse." He waited only to see Trucy give him a nod, staring up at her brother with wide eyes, then he turned to join his brother.

Apollo noticed Luke hiding a smile as the elder Wright crouched at his side. Ignoring it, he asked, "Noticed anything yet?"

"Sort of," Luke replied, his smile fading as he got to work, pointing at LeTouse's right hand. "Did you see that bloodstain there?"

"Yeah, I saw that," Apollo said, running his eyes along the blood smeared across the carpet and leaving out how he'd dismissed it at the time to concentrate on LeTouse. "It's a strange stain, isn't it?"

Luke nodded. "It looks like something was written there, then wiped away. If we had Papa's luminol, we'd probably be able to find out what it was."

Ema gasped, interrupting their conversation. "Did you just say 'luminol'!?"

The Wright brothers looked up, confused, at her growing grin. "Yes?" Luke hesitantly replied. The detective squealed. "Oh he did keep it!" After a short moment wriggling in her chair, she turned her attention back to the two Wrights. "I don't have any on me right now, but I'll be sure to get some in here and test that stain to see what it said!" She promptly pulled out her notebook, turning to a fresh page and jotting something down with a massive grin.

Luke and Apollo shared a look, then shrugged, and returned their attention to the body. "There was one other thing," Luke continued, and pointed to LeTouse's left hand, curled into a loose fist in front of Apollo. "Did either of you look closely at this?"

Apollo leaned in a little closer, then jumped back a little in surprise. "He's holding something!" He instinctively reached out a hand to investigate.

"Hey!" Ema snapped, calling Apollo's attempted search to a halt. "No touching!" Leaving her notes, she shoved a hand into her purse and promptly tossed a small handful of Snackoos at him, three of them pinging off his forehead.

Apollo glared at her, shooting a wry look at the chocolate sticks now dotted around and on top of the body. "You can throw all the snacks at me you'd like, Ema," he argued, "but sooner or later, you're going to run out of them."

Ema frowned, pausing halfway back into her purse for more ammunition. "Hmm. You raise a good point." She withdrew her attack, putting her notebook and pen away. "I'm a bit intrigued by this scene," she admitted. "Let's take a look."

Apollo and Luke got up and backed away as Ema stood from the stool, walking around to kneel where Apollo had been sitting. Gently, she worked the fingers of both her hands into the curl of LeTouse's fist, then worked his grip open, pulling out whatever he was clinging to with a jangling of metal. "Huh." As she stood, she held up the small object for the Wrights to see, and they quickly recognised a small keychain, a purple strap attached to a golden heart that was the ring itself. Attached were three keys, hanging together at the point.
"A key ring?" Apollo muttered, frowning in confusion.

Trucy squealed from the lounge chair, bouncing in place. "You think it might belong to the killer!?!"

"Definitely a possibility," Ema replied, turning the keys over in her hand to examine them from every angle. "It's certainly unusual... both the key ring and the keys themselves."

"What do you mean?" Luke asked, stepping forward to get a better look.

Ema looked between Luke and the key ring, then sighed and handed them over to him. "I'm sure you can figure it out." Ignoring Luke's surprised look as he clung to his new possession, she turned away, pulling her notebook back out of her bag. "Well, that's about it. I think we've looked at just about everything there is."

Apollo looked around the room and sighed. "I guess you're right."

The detective almost laughed, turning back to Apollo with a smirk. "I know how you're feeling; It is hard to know when to stop. But," she turned away again, waving a hand, "anything more involved has to wait until the squad gets here."

Trucy crossed her arms and pouted, but reluctantly accepted the prognosis. "I suppose..."

"I'll go report the evidence," Ema continued, reviewing her notes. "Sorry, but could you wait here till I get back?"

The three Wrights glanced at each other in surprise. Luke was the first to gather his wits, calling, "Well, actually, we-"

"Great!" Ema interrupted, shooting the three a grin as she strode to the door. "Thanks!" She threw it open, then paused, looking back at Apollo with a frown. "Oh, yeah, your clothes: Don't worry about that, I am going to get 'em cleaned, promise." With that, she closed the door behind her.

Apollo glanced back at the stained cape and gloves lying on the floor with a grimace.

Trucy turned to her brothers with an uncertain look. "So... what do we do now?"

Luke was examining the key ring in his hand, frowning. "We can't exactly investigate while keeping watch on the crime scene."

"True," Apollo sighed, crossing his arms. "I guess we'll have to wait for Ema to get back... again."

At that, Luke looked up, giving his brother a curious look.

Trucy scoffed, waving a hand dismissively. "Screw that!" she decided, skipping to the door. "Time's a-wasting! We've got a lot of ground to cover!"

"Wait, Truce, where are you going?!" Apollo demanded, running after his sister.

"Where do you think?" Trucy replied, pausing to shoot her brothers a grin over her shoulder. "We have to finish the investigation, don't we?"

Apollo paused. He couldn't deny that he did want to keep looking for LeTouse's killer, and he certainly didn't like the idea of once again being trapped in the small dressing room waiting for Ema to return - Just once that night had been more than enough.

"Why don't you two go?" Luke suggested, approaching his siblings with a smile. "I'll stay and watch the scene for Detective Skye, while you follow up on some of our leads."

"We have leads?" Apollo asked, confused.

Trucy gasped, her grin getting even wider as she pressed her hands to her face. "Ooh, yes, that's a great idea!" she cried. "What are we doing first?"

Luke held out the key ring in his hands, fanning out the three individual keys for his siblings to see.
"First of all, you can probably guess who these belong to, can't you?"

Apollo's eyes widened as he focussed on the item in his brother's hand, hearing Trucy gasp at his side: Although the two keys on either side were common and innocuous, the middle key on the heart-shaped loop was highly unusual, a golden hue in the metal and the key itself in the unmistakable shape of an acoustic guitar. "Is that...?"

"It must be the key to a guitar case!" Trucy decided, bouncing in glee at having solved the mystery.

Luke giggled, handing their sister the small item. "And once you've questioned its owner, there's one other person you need to talk to," he continued, a serious look on his face as he turned to Apollo.
"You know who I mean, right?"

Apollo frowned, looking away.

"Who?" Trucy asked, glancing between the two. "Who do we talk to next?"

"I know you're reluctant to talk about it," Luke told Apollo, "but if I'm piecing together what happened correctly, you were alone in this room as Mister LeTouse was dying, correct? He gave you his last words; 'The witness is the siren', if I remember correctly?"

Apollo didn't immediately reply, then reluctantly nodded. "The Siren of the Ballad," he filled in, arms crossed. "It's unnerving how much is pointing at her right now."

"Wait, Lamiroir!?" Trucy squeaked in horror, clutching the keys in her hand tightly. "Lamiroir didn't do it!"

"We're not saying she did, Truce," Luke assured her. "Mister LeTouse himself named her as only a witness, after all."

Trucy still looked unhappy, but seemed to accept his argument.

"That's the other problem," Luke continued, turning back to Apollo. "I'm sorry to have to insist, but... What else did he tell you? Was he trying to say anything else? About the witness, or even the shooter?"

Apollo's first instinct was to refuse to answer, shut his brother down and make a run for the hallway... but Luke's final question had triggered something in his memory he'd almost completely forgotten, and he felt a rush of guilt for very nearly taking his pain out on his younger siblings.
"Actually, the first thing I did was ask about the shooter," he admitted, staring at the floor. "He just said he 'didn't know', and told me to ask the witness."

Luke nodded, a hand cupped around his chin in thought. "What else did he say? Even if it seemed unimportant, it could turn out to be a vital clue."

Apollo sighed, arms tightening in their grip across his torso. "It was hard to hear him over the blaring rock music, but... He said he was cold," he quietly said. "That he couldn't see."
At that, Luke's eyebrows shot up. "Do you remember his exact words?"

Sighing again, Apollo pressed a finger to his forehead, just as much to avoid meeting his brother's gaze as to think; Although it had been a while now since the event itself, he could still hear LeTouse's pained gasping echoing in his ears. "Cold, so cold," he repeated in a monotone, trying not to dwell too much on the words coming out of his mouth. "Witness, can't see... The witness is siren."

Luke's frown slowly morphed into a smile. "I see," he said, then dropped his arms to his sides, giving his siblings a bright smile. "In that case, you two go ahead and question our leads. I'll stay here and wait for Detective Skye."

Apollo stared at his brother in confusion, baffled by the change of topic. Luke didn't have anything to say about LeTouse's last words after pushing so hard to hear them? Nothing at all?

"Yay!" Trucy cheered, then pulled out of the bag at her hip a familiar-looking computer tablet - Apollo's Court Record. "And if you find any more evidence, you can take pictures of it!" she instructed him.

"Should we get one of those keys?" Luke asked with a smile.

"Oh yeah!" Trucy chirped, pushing the keys into Luke's hands again only long enough to snap a picture, before taking them back and replacing them in Luke's grip with the small computer. "Seeya later, Luke!" She spun around and ran for the door. "Let's go, Polly!"

Apollo gave his brother a worried look. "You'll be okay? With the body and all?"

"I'll be fine," Luke promised. "What's going to happen, Apollo?"

[View the Court Record]
Trucy bounced on her heels as she waited for her eldest brother to join her in the hall. "Where to first?" she asked.

Apollo thought as he closed the door behind him. Where are we going to find our errant prosecutor? He looked down the corridor to his left. "Let's check the stage first; He was headed that way when we last saw him."

"Okay!" Trucy chirped, and skipped off towards the stage, her brother at her heels.

As the pair rounded the corner of the doorway at the end of the hall, they were confronted by a flash of yellow, causing Trucy to scream as she jumped back to cling to her brother. In the brief confusion, Apollo focussing on his sister's safety and Trucy with her back to whatever had startled her, the swish of bright fabric disappeared in an upwards direction, vanishing in the darkness.

"W-who was that!?" Apollo cried, clinging to Trucy as hard as she was clinging to him.

"We... didn't just imagine that, did we?" Trucy asked, looking around the short stretch of hallway fearfully.

Apollo thought hard, looking up into the darkness above them and trying to recall exactly what it was they had glimpsed. "He was wearing a silk hat," he realised. "And... he had a cape, didn't he?"

Trucy scoffed, pulling herself away from her brother and brushing off her costume. "Well, he won't get anywhere copying our outfits! These are Gramarye-tried-and-tested!"

As his sister promptly continued towards the stage as though nothing had happened, Apollo lingered a moment longer, staring up at the spot where the strange man had disappeared. Was that...? N-no, of course not. Trucy's right, it's just some suspicious-looking faker imitating our family's success. As he reluctantly rushed to catch up, he tried to shake the feeling that their exit was being closely watched.

It was easy to find the stage, as it was surrounded with clear signage warning passers-by to keep absolutely silent during showtime. As they climbed the stairs to enter the wings, loud voices began to drift towards them, both familiar, though one more than the other.

"What is it with today!? Problem after problem! Achtung!"

"You ain't kidding."

Trucy gasped, looking back at Apollo with a grin. "Polly, look! It's the two leading members of the Gaviners!" She pressed her fists to her mouth, muffling a squeal.

Apollo rolled his eyes, watching at his sister's side. Indeed, he did recognise the two from what little he saw of the first act of the concert... one of them being Klavier himself, the lead guitarist and primary vocalist. The other was one of the other guitarists (Apollo couldn't tell if he'd had a bass guitar or not on stage), and the same elaborately-haired man who'd been accompanying Klavier on his visit to the crime scene earlier. 'His name's... Darren? I wasn't exactly paying attention.' Either way, the pair were stood at the edge of the stage, glaring in turn at each other and some machine behind them, rocking on their heels as they kept from pacing in an overflow of nervous energy.

"What are they arguing about?" Trucy whispered.

Apollo shrugged. "Probably the case, I'd bet," he quietly replied, arms crossed.

"My hog won't start," Klavier listed off on one hand, "my guitar case is busted, my guitar's been burnt to a crisp, and to top it all off, someone's dead!" He dramatically pointed out at the stage. "And then there was that performance just now! What was that all about!?"

"Hey, man, don't blame me!" his bandmate cried, looking defensive. "You were the one who missed the cue."

"Me? Miss a cue!?" The remark had clearly offended Klavier deeply, judging by the tightening of his fists and the glare he directed at the other man. "How could I conceivably get the most important part of that song wrong? How!?!" He waved a hand, pausing as he worked to articulate his feelings further. "And what was all that tinny playing of yours?"

The other man snorted, snarling right back. "Who you calling 'tinny'?"

Apollo rolled his eyes. 'Or not.'

"Sounds like one of those 'differences in musical direction' bands are always splitting over," Trucy whispered, looking worried.

"This is hardly the time," Apollo quietly pointed out, resisting the urge to scoff.

Klavier's head suddenly snapped towards the pair, his eyes wide. "What are you two doing here?" he called. His bandmate spun around, his purple boots squeaking on the floor as he also gazed at the pair in surprise.

Apollo and Trucy both grinned widely, embarrassed as being 'caught'. "Ah, um, hiya," Apollo replied, waving.

The two bandmates glanced at each other, then simultaneously cleared their throats, looking casual. "We were just discussing the investigation, if you don't mind."

"Sorry," Apollo was replying instinctively, before Klavier's words actually registered. "Wait... you were what?"

Klavier ignored him, turning to his bandmate with a serious look. "Listen, you need to confirm that with the Republic of Borginia, Detective Crescend."

The other man nodded, as suddenly business-like as his friend. "Right. Anything else?"

Apollo blinked in surprise, leaning towards his sister to whisper, "Did he just call him 'Detective'?"

Trucy giggled, but any reply she might have given was interrupted by a bark of laughter from said man, running his hands cockily along his enormous pompadour as he directed a grin at Apollo. "Ah, greetings. Daryan Crescend. Criminal Affairs, Division Three."

Apollo jumped, blushing at having been overheard. "Uh... H-hello."

Trucy rolled her eyes, giving her brother a good-natured sigh of disbelief. "Wow Polly, how can you go to a concert and not know anything about the band playing?"

"Easy," Apollo hissed as she skipped across the room to join Klavier and Daryan. He reluctantly followed her. "I didn't want to be here in the first place!"

Klavier chuckled. "Oh, Herr Forehead, you wound me!"

Apollo just glared at him, arms crossed.

"The Gavinners aren't just an average rock band, Polly," Trucy explained, her fists on her hips. "Each member is connected to the police somehow!"

"Okay, so they have a gimmick," Apollo replied, rolling his eyes. "Very unique."

Daryan scoffed. "Bit more than a mere 'gimmick'."

Apollo narrowed his eyes, muttering, "Well, something kept you together for seven years..."

Klavier either didn't hear or ignored the young attorney's comment, and gestured to his friend. "Daryan here is my right-hand man," he explained. "I make the melodies, and he attacks them with his guitar." He gave his friend a grin. "He's a bit of a rogue, really."

"Heh," Daryan laughed, grinning back. "And this guy's a bit of a perfectionist," he shot back. "When a performance goes the least bit wrong, he goes into this funk... Just like today."

Apollo raised an eyebrow. 'I'd hope murder would be a bit more off-putting than a 'ruined' concert...'

Meanwhile, Klavier's face had screwed up in disgust at Daryan's reminder of their earlier argument. "The concert today? A disaster!" he proclaimed. "I'll get to the bottom of this, and then we'll see who missed a cue!" He turned on the two Wrights. "You heard it, didn't you? From the audience?"

"Not if it was in Act Three, no," Apollo muttered with a glare.

Trucy shook her head. "I didn't notice anything, but Luke might have."

Daryan scoffed, giving Klavier a look. "See? No amateur is going to pick up on that!"

Klavier turned from glaring at Daryan to give Apollo a surprised look. "Herr Doktor plays an instrument?"

Trucy nodded, she and Apollo slipping into identical boastful grins. "Yep, the violin! He's been playing since he was eight, so he's very good."

"A classical guy, is he?" Daryan commented, chuckling.

Klavier just seemed impressed. "Well, that just proves we most certainly didn't have an entire audience of amateurs," he pointed out. "But, in the absence of Doktor Wright, you shall have to do instead." He beckoned to the surprised Apollo and Trucy, turning to the machine behind him. "Take a listen to this."
Intrigued, Trucy immediately bounced to Klavier's side. "What's that?"

"A mixing board," Klavier explained, waving a hand over the large device. "We used it to record our concert tonight."

Apollo noticed Daryan rolling his eyes in disgust, arms crossed. He had to admit, he agreed with the sentiment. 'Is this 'missed cue' thing seriously taking priority over a murder investigation?'

Trucy glanced back at her brother. "Well, we've come this far," she decided, "might as well go all the way! I've always wanted to learn about the recording industry!"

Klavier chuckled. "This is but one of the devices used in recordings," he told her. "We're a five-part band; This lets us record each member's performance separately." He pointed to the array of sliders, specifically to five at Trucy's end of the board. "You use these to adjust the volume for each part. Check it out!" He fiddled with the laptop attached to the device, then hit a button, and a loud rock song began to play on the computer's speakers. Klavier then placed a hand across the five sliders in front of Trucy, moving them all down and reducing the volume of the playback.

"Wow, neat!" Trucy cried, bouncing in glee. "So, could you, say, hear only the drum part?"

"Of course," Klavier laughed, pushing up only the far right slider, making the steady beat and elaborate flourishes of the drum kit stand out against the faint echoes of the other four instruments. "That's how we'll find the criminal guilty of missing his cue tonight!"

Apollo sighed. "I'm more concerned with the other criminal," he pointed out. "The one who kills people."

Klavier met Apollo's eyes with a glare. "You want help on the case?" he asked. "Then help me with mine."

At that kind of ultimatum, Apollo didn't feel he had a choice. Restraining a groan, he joined his sister at the mixing board.

"Let's begin!" Klavier announced, back to his cheerful self as he brought up all the sliders again to a volume just loud enough to still talk over. "First, we bring up the part of the performance in question," he said, his attention back on the laptop as he began to slowly skip ahead through the song. "Like so!" With a flourish of key presses, he left the track running, turning back to Apollo and Trucy with a grin. "There it is. Now, listen!"

Apollo screwed up his nose and reluctantly turned his ears to the music, while Trucy frowned determinedly. The song sounded to Apollo to be in its closing chords, every instrument in the band going all out in one final blast before going quiet, the speakers falling into silence. Trucy looked confused, looking up at Klavier. "Was something wrong?" she asked.

"You couldn't hear it?" Klavier replied, resetting the track back to the beginning of the final section. "Listen again, closely."

The music blared again in the speakers, and Apollo gave up, crossing his arms and looking away. Trucy however only concentrated even harder, and, as the final chords fell into silence, grinned widely. "The timing's a little off, isn't it?"

"You see!?" Klavier cried, as excited as Trucy that the problem had been found. "There! Right at the most important part!" He turned to Daryan pointedly. "And even an amateur can hear it!"

Daryan rolled his eyes. "An amateur with a mixing board, maybe."
"You're missing the point!" Klavier argued, waving a hand. "We'll never stamp out crime until we're perfect. Perfect!"

"Here he goes again," Daryan sighed, looking away.

Klavier returned his attention to the mixing board. "Right. Fraulein Amateur, you will prove my point."

"Me!?” Trucy asked, bouncing in glee. "What do you want me to do?"

"You will find the missed cue!" Klavier instructed, setting the song playing again. "You will tell us which instrument, which part, is the guilty party!" After a moment's more fiddling at the laptop, he pointed to the sliders. "Adjust the volume for each instrument track, so we may find which one hopelessly bungles the cue, with your untrained amateur ears!"

Trucy squealed in glee, turning to the sliders. After a moment of thought, she turned them all down, starting to experiment with them and listening carefully to each of the five instruments. It soon became apparent that Klavier had set the final bars of the song to loop, making it easier for her to narrow down the flaw.

Apollo sighed as he turned away, waiting for his sister to finish. He had to admit, he was a little jealous (it looked fun to mess around with equipment as sophisticated as that), but he wasn't interested in hearing the same riff of already-objectionable music over and over again. Even so, he had no choice but to wait it out.

"Here it is!" Trucy cried excitedly, turning down all but one of the sliders to isolate a single guitar as it looped through the final bars of the song. "This is the part that's off!"

Apollo and Klavier both looked over to see which one she was pointing at, a slider labelled 'Track 2'. "Which is that?" Klaver muttered in thought. "Second Guitar." A frown slowly settling on his face, he turned to stare behind him, Apollo and Trucy following his gaze as it settled on one very embarrassed Daryan Crescend, trying visibly not to sweat. "It was you, Daryan!"

Daryan shrugged, avoiding his friend's eyes. "Ah well," he said, waving off the accusation as casually as could be. "Looks like the cat's out of the bag."

"'Ah well'!?" Klavier repeated, stepping towards Daryan with a glare. "That's all you have to say!? That kind of attitude lets killers walk free, Daryan!"

Trucy leaned towards her brother and whispered, "Here they go again."

Apollo nodded. "We should have brought up the case sooner. It's starting to feel like we're just wasting time."

"It's all experience under our belts!" Trucy assured him with a smile. "That can't be bad! And I got to play around with 'Guilty Love'!"

At that, Apollo raised an eyebrow. "'Guilty Love'? That's the name of that song?"

Meanwhile, Klavier and Daryan's argument once again had fizzled out, both men now sulking in the outcome. Klavier turned back to the Wrights, brushing at his fringe as he visibly tried to calm down. "Now, I believe you had something you wished to talk to me about, Herr Wright?"

Straightening from his conversation with his sister, Apollo nodded. "I wanted to talk about the crime, actually."

Klavier paused, frowning in thought. "Which crime do you mean?"

Apollo's face screwed up in indignation. "The murder, what else!?"

"Oh, that," Klavier sighed, running his hand through his hair again. "For me, today has been a hit parade of crimes, you see."

Trucy frowned, tapping her chin in thought. "Oh yeah, wasn't he talking about that earlier?" she whispered to her brother. "Something about his hog, and his guitar case?"

Apollo shrugged. He hadn't been paying much attention to Klavier's diva-like outbursts.

"Anyway," Klavier continued, resting his hands in his pants pockets. "I'm afraid you know more about the killing of Mister LeTouse than I do. For now, at least."
"Huh?" For a moment, Apollo felt panic at the thought that Klavier knew they'd pushed their way into the crime scene; Was he mad?

Klavier only smiled. "You were the one who found the body, ja?" he pointed out. "While we were in the middle of a performance, no less."

"Oh," Apollo muttered, relaxing. That made more sense.

"Aren't you going to examine the crime scene, Prosecutor Gavin?" Trucy asked.

Klavier chuckled. "I'll leave that to Fraulein Detective," he said. " Wouldn't want to step on her toes."

Apollo nodded; Given Ema's earlier rage at the man, and her general dislike for him on top of that, he could understand Klavier wanting to keep his distance. It did feel strange to be the one more informed on something for once, though.

"Oh!" Trucy suddenly cried, reaching into her bag. "Guitar case, of course!" With a jingling of metal, she pulled out the heart-shaped keyring, holding it up to Klavier with a grin. "Do you know anything about this, Prosecutor Gavin?"

Klavier gasped. "Th-that...!"

Apollo smirked; He felt he didn't need to ask, but did anyway: "Does it look familiar?"

"Familiar!?!" Klavier repeated. "It's mine!" He took the key ring from Trucy's hand, checking it over with an excited grin. "That's my key ring! I've been looking all over for it!"

"It is yours?" Trucy realised, sharing a wary look with Apollo.

Klavier sighed, attaching the clasp on the strap to something inside his jacket. "Thanks, anyway," he told them, still smiling. "So, where did you find it?"

Apollo winced. "Actually... the victim was holding it," he admitted, watching Klavier's gaze snap up to meet his, the prosecutor's face rapidly paling. "Like he was trying to keep it from the killer. Even if it meant his life."

Klavier could only stare, frozen, for a very long moment. Apollo could even see Daryan's large pompadour out of the corner of his eye, looking between the two of them as though waiting to see who would break the silence first. Finally, Klavier seemed to break out of his shock, frowning in confusion and shaking his head. "Wh-what!?!" he managed to stutter. "The victim... You mean, Mister LeTouse had my keys?"

Apollo nodded. "Indeed."

Sighing, Klavier turned and wandered away, deep in thought. "When will my trials be over?" he muttered to himself. Daryan similarly took a few steps backwards, frowning as he mused to himself.

Trucy leaned towards her brother, watching Klavier. "Speaking of trials," she whispered, "I've never heard Mister Gavin whine in court like he has been today."

Apollo nodded. "Ema was right about the fop, I'll give her that," he quietly replied.

"Polly!" Trucy hissed, lightly slapping her brother with the back of a hand. As he rolled his eyes and ignored her chastisement, she took a few steps towards Klavier. "Mister Gavin, maybe we can help.
Tell us about your troubles today."

Klavier turned, raising an eyebrow at the teen. "I really don't think that's-"

"Tell us," Trucy interrupted, grinning, "and we'll keep mum about the key ring for now."

Daryan barked in laughter, turning away as he hid his amusement. Klavier only stared at Trucy in amazement for a long moment, then slowly smiled. "Are... you blackmailing me, Fraulein?"

Apollo couldn't resist a proud smile, walking over to stand at his sister's side; Given the location they'd found Klavier's keys, anything the man could tell them about the item would certainly be relevant to the case. "You were saying something about your motorcycle not starting?" he prompted.

"And something about your guitar case being busted?" Trucy added.

Klavier's eyes narrowed, looking between the pair. "You're well informed."

Trucy scoffed, crossing her arms. "You mentioned it a few times," she pointed out.

The prosecutor winced, brushing at his hair. "Ach!" He shook his head, then reluctantly explained. "It all happened this morning. It's all this key ring's fault. He patted at his jacket, where the item had been returned earlier. "It's got all my keys on it, ja? My bike key, my car key... and the key to my guitar case."

Trucy frowned. "Wait, so the key ring..."

Klavier shrugged. "It disappeared," he admitted. "I thought I'd put it in my jacket pocket..." He shook his head, sighing. "I had to come to the concert by taxi. How embarrassing! And in order to get my guitar out, I had to break the lock."

Apollo looked out at the stage, another recent incident with a guitar coming to mind. "Wait, this guitar wasn't the one that...?"

"The very one," Klavier replied with a nod. "Up in flames, and right on stage, too." He sighed, clearly still mourning the loss of the wooden instrument. "Crazy. And to top it off, Mister LeTouse's life was taken. Nobody told me 'bout days like these."

"Strange days, indeed," Apollo agreed, frowning in thought. He decided not to mention that, unlike Klavier, strange days such as this were a frequent topic of discussion in the Wright household.

"You think?" Klavier replied, distracted.

Trucy was frowning in thought, tapping her chin. She said nothing, and it was her silence that attracted Apollo's attention more than anything else.

Watching his sister with worry, Apollo asked, "Something wrong, Truce?"

Everyone's attention turned to the teen, still deep in thought. "I'm just trying to make sense of everything," she explained. "First that heart-shaped key ring gets stolen. Then a very expensive guitar flares up on stage. Then Mister LeTouse dies."

Klavier frowned, likely already fearing whatever conclusion she was about to reach. "Yes, and...?"

"Could it all really be just a co-incidence?" Trucy asked, finally looking up to meet Klavier's eyes. The prosecutor looked confused. "Co-incidence? Meaning...?" He sighed, turning to his friend.
"Daryan, can you make any sense of all this?"

Daryan shrugged, even backing up a little. "Hey, don't look at me."

"You know what I mean, don't you Polly?" Trucy asked, turning to her brother. "Either Mister Gavin's having a really bad day... or all this was planned."

Apollo frowned, his mind working overtime to run over what she was implying. You're saying... someone deliberately set out to steal the keys and set the guitar on fire...? Well, naturally, if they wanted to set the guitar on fire, they'd need the keys to its case, though that doesn't change it being a mean prank to play. You can't seriously mean that's all connected to the murder though, right? LeTouse didn't seem the type to do that kind of thing...

Meanwhile, Klavier was staring intently at Trucy, one hand pulling out his keys again to examine them. "You... aren't thinking what I think you're thinking... are you, Fraulein?"

Trucy gave him a firm nod. "I am!"

"What? What!?!" Daryan cried, looking between the two with wide eyes. "Hey, don't leave me in the dark with Spike, here!"

Apollo shot the man a glare. "It's Apollo."

"You noticed it too, right Polly?" Trucy asked, shooting her brother a glance as she dug around in her bag.

"Between the key ring and the guitar, yes," Apollo admitted, shrugging, "but not with the murder, if that's what you're implying."

Trucy stared at him a moment before groaning, then pulled out a sheet of paper from her bag. "It's this! she cried, shoving the paper into her brother's hands. "The Guitar's Serenade! They're all connected!"

Apollo looked over the paper in his hands, recognising the signed lyrics sheet Klavier had given Luke earlier. Obviously Trucy had taken the chance to study it while they were separated earlier, but Apollo himself hadn't exactly had the time. Well, no wonder I didn't notice a connection. What is the connection, anyway?

Daryan took a few steps towards Apollo, leaning to check the paper over his shoulder. "A lyrics sheet?" he asked, then turned to Klavier with a frown. "What's that got to do with anything?"

"It has everything to do with everything," Klavier replied, studying the key ring in his hand. "Though I wouldn't have believed it if the Fraulein hadn't pointed it out."

"What are you talking about, man?" Daryan sighed, crossing his arms in frustration. "Enough with the riddles!"

Klavier shook his head, meeting Trucy's eyes. "Maybe it is a coincidence, or perhaps it means something. Don't you think, Fraulein?"

Trucy nodded. "I do." She looked up to Apollo and Daryan. "Everything that's happened to Mister Gavin today is predicted in the lyrics to this song."

Daryan jumped back, eyes wide. "Wh-what!? No way!"
Apollo looked to his sister in surprise, then turned his attention back to the lyrics sheet. "Wait, you're right!" he cried. "There in the first verse: 'When you stole away the keys my heart held on to so tight'..."

"The key ring was stolen!" Trucy filled in. "And not just any key ring, a heart-shaped key ring!"

"And after that," Apollo continued, "'Burning on in my heart, fire, burn my love away'..."

"The guitar bursting into flame!"

"'Like a bullet of love, fire, take my life away'..."

"Mister LeTouse was killed!"

Apollo shook his head, still staring at the lyrics in disbelief. "And it's all in order, too! That's crazy..."

Trucy nodded, crossing her arms. "Yeah, no kidding."

Daryan was looking thoughtful, staring intently at the floor. "So everything that happened today, here... This song predicted it all?"

"Or perhaps it was the other way around," Klavier pointed out with a stern frown, replacing his keys inside his jacket. "The criminal could have based his crime on the lyrics."

Apollo looked up from the lyrics sheet. "But who would go through all that trouble?"

Klavier sighed. "Someone who moves in mysterious ways, no doubt." He turned to Trucy. "I believe you've stumbled upon something quite vital... and quite annoying, Fraulein."

Trucy grinned, blushing a little as she giggled with pride.
"The lyrics predicting the crime," Daryan muttered to himself in thought, then turned to his friend. "Klavier?"

"Seems a bit more than just a co-incidence to me," Klavier decided, glaring at nothing in particular. Daryan nodded. "I have to agree. The key ring, the guitar, and the murder..."

Apollo folded up the paper in his hands, still sceptical. "The key ring might have been dropped by accident," he pointed out.

"Yet the victim was holding it," Klavier replied. "Hard to think that it was unconnected."

"That's true," Apollo sighed, and handed the lyrics sheet back to his sister.

Trucy took the paper, quickly putting it away in her bag. "So the criminal matched their actions to the lyrics?"

"That sounds likely," Daryan replied, nodding.

Apollo crossed his arms, frowning. "Why would anyone do that?" he asked. 'It doesn't make sense! Then again, neither did a lot of Dad's cases until the full story came out...'

Daryan scoffed, stepping back from the conversation. "While we think about that, I'm going to get cracking on the biggest crime here and talk to the Borginian Embassy about this Mister LeTouse."

Klavier nodded. "Ah, right. Thanks, Daryan."

"I'll leave the pondering of mysteries to you," Daryan continued, shooting his friend a grin as he turned and ambled away, waving goodbye. "I'm outta here." With that, he jogged down the stairs and disappeared into backstage.

Meanwhile, Klavier was still deep in thought, hands in his pockets. "A foreign national, Mister LeTouse, was killed... It seems like that would have to be the 'point' of all this," he reasoned aloud. "But they did more than that. They left us with not only a murder, but a mystery!"

Apollo and Trucy shared a wary look; It occurred to both of them that Klavier was awfully irritable tonight, much more so than he'd been throughout the entirety of their previous encounter with him. 'This must be the real Klavier Gavin,' Apollo mused. 'The one we don't get to see in the courtroom.'

Klavier threw up his hands. "I've had enough, frankly," he announced, and turned to the Wrights. "If you find any more mysteries, do me a favour and keep them to yourselves, ja?"

"Ja," Apollo repeated, nodding. 'That pretty much concludes our questioning of him, I'd say. And next up is...' "Mister Gavin, do you know where Lamiroir is now?"

"Ah, I had her go to my dressing room," Klavier replied, running a hand through his hair and looking thoroughly flustered in the aftermath of all that had gone on that night. "With that pianist, Machi Tobaye, of course. She seemed rather shocked by Mister LeTouse's sudden passing."

"Right, thanks," Apollo said, and took Trucy's hand. "C'mon, Truce."

As she was led away by her eldest brother, Trucy eagerly waved back at Klavier. "Seeya later, Mister Gavin!"

Lamiroir's Dressing Room

Luke would have never admitted it to Apollo, but a part of him was still repulsed by the idea of being alone in a room with a dead body. Quite frankly, he didn't want to be a hundred-percent okay with it, either; He had simply decided, as the one with the most direct experience with death (mostly animals, but a fair amount of human death too: Phelan Pound, Rosa Rains... even Doctor Schrader sort of counted, as they'd all thought he was dead when Luke first met him, and the same went for the convicted 'witches' of Labyrinthia and Professor Layton himself if you wanted to be technical), it made more sense for him to stay behind while Apollo and Trucy got on with the investigation. Plus, after seeing the look on Apollo's face when they caught up to him after the murder... there was no way in hell Luke was allowing Apollo to be the one to wait for Ema's return.

As he paced the room, idly looking around with Apollo's Court Record in hand, Luke mused that this was by far a cleaner crime scene than Phelan Pound's had been. That's probably to be expected, though... Mister Pound was beaten to death with a bat, while Mister LeTouse was just shot. And at least he didn't die alone. Even if he didn't know his killer, he was able to give Apollo enough information to help us track them down.' Trucy's photos only heightened the comparison, all being, with no exception, of everything around the room but the crime scene itself... well, if you didn't include dark corners like underneath the larger furniture, or the small gaps between said larger furniture and the walls. In the aftermath of discovering Pound's death, that dark night in the shelter alone, Luke could remember kicking himself for lacking the courage to face his dead friend, open up the blood-covered office and contribute more to finding the man's killer through cataloguing the scene as he'd found it. I'm not letting Mister LeTouse down like I did Mister Pound. He trusted Apollo with his last words, and Apollo's dead-set on solving this murder; Anything Apollo does, there's no question I'm going to help him in every way I can. There is no corner I will overlook!' With that in mind, he opened up the camera app of the computer tablet in his hands, aiming to exhaustively catalogue the corpse's half of the room as Trucy had done for the 'living area' on the other half.

It hadn't taken nearly as long as Luke had hoped.

Sitting on the floor near LeTouse's body, the young vet placed the Court Record down with a sigh. 'Well, that's that. Now what? It feels like Detective Skye's taking forever...' His gaze soon turned to the blood-stained cape and gloves lying nearby. 'Oh, Apollo...' He knew it was likely LeTouse's blood, but it still hurt to look at, so he turned away again, and found his gaze landing on the sofa and lounge chair on the other side of the room.
"Huh... Now, what was it I was thinking earlier, about Trucy's photos being exhaustive except for the dark corners underneath and behind the furniture...?"

And that was how Luke found himself lying on his front and taking photos of the floor underneath the sofa.

When the door slammed open without warning, Luke jumped, his thumb tapping the screen involuntarily to snap an extra photo of the darkness under the red lounge. The click of the camera seemed to go unnoticed by the visitor, who had slammed the door again behind him and was striding purposefully towards the other side of the room. From his position on the floor, Luke had a very good view of the strange man's heeled blue-purple boots, the long tongue pointed and sticking straight up as large 'wings' flared out on either side. Above them were black leather pants, leading up to a purple-and-white hooded jacket, the pattern and sharp teeth of its zipper heavily reminiscent of a shark, especially when paired with the white-tipped pompadour on top. This strange newcomer was unmistakably the second guitarist of the Gavinners, a man Luke had been watching on stage for most of that evening. What was he doing here?

"Can I help-?"

The man shrieked, jumping backwards and flailing around until he spotted Luke on the floor, the tablet computer in his arms. "Wh-!? Y-!? Don't scare me like that, man!"

"I'm sorry about that," Luke said, pushing himself up onto his knees, then to a stand. He watched the man carefully, frowning. "Were you not expecting someone to be here?"

The man didn't reply for several moments, still looking a little scared. "Um..." He then shook his head, pulling himself together with a glare at the young vet. "The hell are you to be asking me that?
You're not a member of security!"

he calmly informed the man. "Detective Skye left me in charge of the crime scene until she gets back. And who are you, may I ask?"

The man's eyes narrowed. "Detective Daryan Crescend," he replied in a low tone.

"A pleasure to meet you, Detective Crescend," Luke said, giving the man a polite smile despite his clear displeasure with Luke's presence; Luke didn't have the same encyclopaedic knowledge of the band Trucy seemed to have picked up, but he had remembered the trivia that all five Gavinners were connected somehow to law enforcement. It still didn't explain exactly why a detective not in charge of the scene had stormed in the way he had, though. "If you're looking for Detective Skye, I believe she said she was reporting the evidence. She shouldn't be far away."

"Yeah yeah," Daryan muttered, crossing his arms. Was he... sulking? "I... spoke to her already.
Crime scene's mine now."

At that, Luke frowned. "And she didn't tell you she'd left someone watching it?"

"Obviously not," Daryan snapped impatiently. "Must've slipped her mind. She was real busy, not paying attention. You getting out of here or what?"

Luke thought a moment. "May I ask where she is? I had something I wished to talk to Detective Skye about myself."

Daryan scoffed, shrugging. "What do I care?" He pointed angrily at the door. "Civilians shouldn't be in here anyway! Can't you take a hint?"
Putting the tablet computer in his satchel, Luke decided not to push his luck any further. "Then I'll leave Mister LeTouse in your care, Detective. Farewell."

"Yeah, sayonara," Daryan muttered, glaring at the young vet slowly making his way across the room to the exit.

As Luke closed the door behind him, he was very glad he decided not to mention what he'd found under the sofa to Detective Crescend.

[View the Court Record]
Trucy skipped merrily at Apollo's side as they left the stage, headed to the dressing rooms. "And now we get to talk to Lamiroir!" she gleefully pointed out. "This is so cool!" She giggled, poking her brother playfully in the chest. "And you didn't want to come to this concert! We'd've missed out on meeting one of our idols!"

Apollo chuckled; As much as he hated the idea of a handout from Klavier, and that he'd walked head first into a murder only an hour ago... he did have to agree that meeting Lamiroir was worth the trouble.

Suddenly, Trucy stopped, pulling them both to a halt. "Wait... but... She can't speak English," she pointed out, frowning. "How are we going to talk to her?"

Apollo smiled. "Didn't you notice earlier?"

Trucy blinked, confused. "Notice what?"

Laughing, Apollo poked his sister's nose. "When we spoke to her before. You don't remember hearing Mister LeTouse speaking in Borginian?"

Although irritated by her brother's teasing, rubbing her nose with a glare, Trucy stopped to think. "Um... wait..." Now she only looked more confused. "I... don't remember hearing him talk in Borginian."

"Exactly," Apollo replied with a grin. "She may not be able to speak English, but Lamiroir can obviously understand it well enough." He laughed as Trucy pouted at him, then resumed their walk, dragging his sister along at his side. "Somehow we'll muddle through some questions with her. If she can understand what we're asking, she'll find a way to make sure we understand her answers."

The pair rounded the corner to the stretch of hall with the dressing rooms, only to again stop in their tracks, Trucy shrieking as she threw herself at Apollo, her arms wrapping tightly around his chest. The man in yellow was there one moment, then disappeared with a flash of his cape up on top of the vending machine and into the darkness above the lights.

Apollo and Trucy stood in a long silence, clinging to each other and staring at the black ceiling above the vending machine. Finally, slowly, they extricated themselves from each other, and Apollo dashed forward to the spot where the man had disappeared, his eyes on the ceiling. Despite the glare of the overhead lights, he could just make out the metal grate of a sizeable air vent, snuggled into the corner the nearby pillar made against the wall. 'So that's how he's getting around.' Even though they had just come from the stage, a part of Apollo wanted to run straight back and ask Klavier about the suspicious man in yellow.

As he turned to check on his sister, Apollo saw Trucy frozen in place, staring at the floor with an expression somewhere between sad and confused. "Truce?" He walked back to join her, resting a hand on her shoulder.
Trucy jumped at her brother's touch, but quickly recovered, taking his hand in her grip. "He... looked familiar," she admitted.

Apollo frowned. He was afraid of that. "More than just a faker?"

His sister didn't immediately reply, staring at the vending machine where the man had disappeared. Finally, she shook her head. "I don't know," she admitted. "I'm sorry."

"It's alright," Apollo assured her, giving her hand a squeeze. "C'mon, let's go talk to Lamiroir, huh?"

The Gavinners' dressing room was much the same as it had been since they were last there, although this time it was Lamiroir and Machi sat in the nearby stools by the mirrors rather than Klavier. Both looked clearly distressed, Machi's face tight with worry while Lamiroir's hands were clutched together, looking up with wide eyes as the door opened to admit the two Wrights.

Apollo gave the pair a respectful nod, but Trucy plastered a large grin on her face, greeting them with a wave. "Lamiroir!" she called.

The singer wasn't in the mood for small talk. "What... what has happened?" she asked, almost haltingly despite her clear desire for information. "I heard that Mister LeTouse has died!"

The Wrights glanced at each other in disbelief, shocked to a halt. "L-Lamiroir!" Apollo cried. "You speak!? I mean," he shook his head forcing himself to calm down, "you speak English?"

Although still upset, Lamiroir sighed, nodding. "Ah, yes. I was invited here from the Republic of Borginia... but I am not Borginian by birth."

It was then Apollo noticed her accent. It sounded distinctly different to LeTouse's, which he supposed made sense given this new information, but he still couldn't place where exactly it was likely to have originated.

"But wasn't Mister LeTouse your interpreter?" Trucy asked, confused.

"Ah, that..." Lamiroir seemed uncomfortable, her gaze on her lap. "Yes, well... It was Mister LeTouse's idea. He thought it would add to the mystery, you see."

Apollo's gaze flitted to the teenage boy sitting at her side, tense in his seat as he stared at the floor. "Then, your pianist is also...?"

Lamiroir shook her head. "No, Machi Tobaye is Borginian. He does not speak English." She looked back up at Apollo, her gaze stern. "Now, please tell me! What has happened to Mister LeTouse? Why did he...?"

"Actually," Trucy carefully explained, "Mister LeTouse was."

"Truce!" Apollo cried, slapping a hand over his sister's mouth with a glare. "We're not allowed to talk about it, remember? We signed the agreement!"

Trucy frowned, pulling her brother's hand from her face. "B-but Mister LeTouse is Lamiroir's manager! That's not fair to her! I mean, isn't she a related party?"

Apollo looked away. He didn't want to say in Lamiroir's hearing that Trucy's point was exactly the reason why they weren't allowed to tell her anything... Although, he had to admit, there was no chance that she could seriously be a suspect. He wouldn't mind sticking it to Klavier if it meant soothing the woman's worries.

"All we have been told is to wait here in this room," Lamiroir explained. "It is very unsettling."

Apollo shook his head, dismissing his train of thought as the opportunity passed. "I'm sorry," he told her, "we're trying to figure it out ourselves." He paused, then stepped closer to the woman. "Do... you think I could ask you some questions?"

Lamiroir nodded, as graceful as ever despite her concern. "Of course. I am always willing to help."

Apollo moved to pull over a stool, Trucy running up behind him, but Lamiroir's attention was grabbed by Machi, who had reached up to grip her sleeve, speaking in Borginian. The Wrights paused, watching Lamiroir frown in concern as she replied, then look shocked as Machi spoke again.
She said some urging words to him, but he shook his head as he spoke in return, apparently unmoved.

As the two paused, Apollo reluctantly asked, "Um, what seems to be the problem?"

"Machi," Lamiroir sighed, then turned to the Wrights. "He is not good around strangers. He wishes to go out for a breath of fresh air. Would that be alright?"

Apollo thought a moment, then nodded. "Uh, sure, of course." 'He's blind, so he won't have seen anything anyway. There's no reason to keep him cooped up with us if he's uncomfortable.'

Machi didn't speak, getting to his feet and holding a hand straight out in front of him, walking straight to the door. He paused as his outstretched hand touched the wall, then felt for the handle, pulling the door open and heading out to the hallway. The door closed behind him with a sharp click of the latch.

Hesitantly, Apollo sat down on the stool he'd pulled over, while Trucy, grinning widely, skipped over to the one Machi had abandoned, pulling it a little way from Lamiroir out of politeness before perching on it herself, giving the singer an excited grin.

"What is it you wished to ask me about?" Lamiroir asked, her gaze on Apollo's lap.

Apollo looked the woman up and down. She seemed so... fragile. He couldn't make himself ask about the murder just yet. He quickly scrambled for another topic of conversation. "The Rupublic of Borginia... that's in Northern Europe, right?"

Lamiroir smiled, turning her head upwards to Apollo's face. "I started out singing in a restaurant," she explained. "Then a producer called me. Before I knew it... here I am."

"You don't say!" Trucy chirped. "You know, our daddy plays piano in a restaurant!"

Apollo snorted in restrained laughter. "Producers tend to look for talent, Trucy." As his sister giggled, he turned back to the singer. "Lamiroir, you're not from Borginia originally? Were you born here?"

Lamiroir frowned. "Well..."

"Oh, is that supposed to be a secret?" Apollo interrupted, suddenly panicking he'd crossed a line.
"Part of the image and everything? I'm sorry, you don't have to answer..."

"We know quite a bit about 'image' ourselves," Trucy filled in with a knowing nod.
Lamiroir smiled. "Ah, yes, it is something like this," she replied. "A contract, you might say. I'm also not to speak anything but Borginian in public."

Apollo nodded. That made sense. He of all people knew how important image was when you were a performer.

"We love your music though," Trucy cut in. "All that poetic 'landscape painter in sound' stuff... Travelling the world, putting everything you see to music...!" She sighed longingly. "I wanted to use your songs in our act, but Polly wouldn't let me."

"You want to pay the royalties out of your pocket money?" Apollo asked her with a smirk.

Lamiroir softly laughed. "You're very perceptive," she told Trucy. "But this 'landscape painter in sound', too, is an image." She looked away, her smile fading. "Yet without it, my songs would not be so widely heard."

Apollo paused, frowning in thought. "The 'Siren of the Ballad', right?"

"Yes," Lamiroir said, nodding. "In Borginia, 'Lamiroir' means 'the siren'." She stared sadly at her lap. "I fear that, perhaps, already I am not the siren I once was."

Trucy seemed as upset as Lamiroir to see the woman's self-doubt. "Um, your pianist," she spoke up. "Machi, was it? He's cute!" She grinned. "Like a porcelain doll."

Apollo raised an eyebrow at her. "He's probably around your age," he pointed out. "Is this a 'crush' situation?"

Blushing, Trucy shot her brother a glare. "N-no, of course not! Can't I just call someone 'cute'!?"

Lamiroir seemed amused by their antics, smiling behind her veil. "I met him while singing in restaurants in Borginia," she explained. "He is an orphan... His playing is exquisite. Soon he came to live with me."

Apollo smiled. "That's very similar to us, actually. How we ended up with our dad, I mean." He shot his sister a grin, and she smiled back. "Minus the exquisite piano playing of course." He turned back to the singer. "I've, um, noticed Machi hardly leaves your side."

"Yes, well," Lamiroir quickly replied, her hands fidgeting in her lap, "he is blind. At first, I hesitated at dragging him across the world."

Apollo found himself frowning, watching her hands. Did... did Lamiroir just lie?

"He doesn't speak English either, does he?" Trucy asked, not noticing her brother's sudden distraction.

"He had never left Borginia before we met," Lamiroir explained, nodding. Her hands were still. "I made his presence part of my contract. Machi and I together are 'Lamiroir'." She stared at her knees, thoughtful. "Together, always."

Apollo dragged his gaze back to Lamiroir's face, a part of him surprised she didn't seem to have noticed his actions; Trucy certainly had by now, shooting her brother a curious look, but he decided to ride his good luck and move on; He'd find what she'd been lying about later. "So... Mister LeTouse was translating more for Machi than you?"

Lamiroir thought a moment in silence, then turned her face up to Apollo's. "Mister LeTouse was my new manager."

"New?"

"Yes, from three months ago," she explained. "Around when I received Mister Gavin's invitation to come. I met Mister LeTouse at my office. He was to be my manager and bodyguard." She paused, a hand reaching for her hair under her cloak. "And, as it turned out, my interpreter."

Apollo nodded. "Even though you speak English."

"Yes, but we were to visit more places than just here," she continued. "We had a concert in Japan. scheduled after this one." She paused, frowning. "Though I fear that may have to be cancelled now..."

Trucy had her arms crossed, frowning in thought. "Mister LeTouse was from the Republic of Borginia too, right?"

Lamiroir looked uncertain, her hands clasping together. "He was only with me for three months," she repeated. "He was such a talented man... That phrase, 'Siren of the Ballad', that was his idea, you know." She shook her head. "But I'm afraid there is much I do not know about him... and now, I shall never know." She stared down into her lap, blinking back tears. "No one will even tell me why he has died."

Apollo stared at her, then looked down himself, eyes closed in a fierce frown. Suddenly, this woman he had never met before was reminding him rather heavily of Trucy... the night Phoenix was acquitted of Shadi 'Smith's' murder... the reunion with Luke after his disaster of a trial... that time she and Phoenix had a blow-up over getting her ears pierced, twice... all the times she tripped and scraped a knee or an elbow, or fell off the play equipment in the park... when she got sick and was especially miserable about having to cancel her shows... This wasn't right. Apollo turned his fierce gaze up to Lamiroir's face. "Mister LeTouse was murdered."

Lamiroir looked up to meet Apollo's gaze in surprise.

"P-Polly!" Trucy gasped, watching her brother with a mixture of shock and worry. "We promised Mister Gavin we wouldn't-!"

"Well, I never liked Gavin anyway," Apollo replied. "Besides, you were right earlier: This isn't fair. She deserves to know."

Lamiroir frowned, looking down at her lap again. She said nothing, apparently deep in thought.

"The thing is, Lamiroir," Apollo continued to the singer, "I was the one who found him... and he was still alive."

"What...?" she muttered, looking confused, though she didn't meet Apollo's eyes.

Apollo nodded gravely. "I was the only one around to hear his last words. He didn't know who, well," he paused, deciding to be careful with his words, "delivered the killing blow, but he did tell me there was a witness. He wanted me to find them, to ask them what had happened."

Lamiroir's frown seemed to deepen. Apollo didn't doubt she knew by now what he was getting at.

"I... couldn't help him," Apollo admitted, his injured left hand reaching for the brooch pinned to his tie. "I tried to stop the bleeding, but... he died right in front of me. I... failed, really."

Trucy was watching her brother with sad eyes. "Polly..."

"So I have to find who killed him," Apollo continued, keeping his eyes on Lamiroir and trying not to tear up. "Please, Lamiroir. You're the 'siren'. You must have seen something."

Lamiroir didn't reply, her hands tightly clasped and her gaze intense as she stared at the floor. Finally, her mouth opened behind her veil. "I..."

The door flew open with a creak of its hinges, making all three jump as they turned their attention to it. "Apollo? Trucy?" called a familiar voice, and a young man in blue peeked into the room, eyes quickly locking on the trio. "There you are!" he cried, a grin growing on his face.
"Luke!" Trucy shouted, jumping off her stool and racing across the room to greet her brother with a hug. A moment later, she jumped back, giving him a glare. "Hey, you're supposed to be watching the crime scene!"

Luke chuckled, closing the door behind him. "Don't worry, I was relieved of my post. Mister Gavin thought I might find you here." He looked over to Apollo, his grin turning quickly to a frown. "Apollo, are you alright?"

Apollo got to his feet, nodding his head firmly. "I-I'm fine," he insisted, rubbing at his eyes with the back of a hand. Snot was building up mutinously in his nostrils, forcing him to clear them with a loud sniff.

Although he clearly didn't believe his brother, Luke decided to move on, smiling at Lamiroir as she stood behind Apollo. "My apologies, Lamiroir, for barging in so suddenly. I hope I wasn't disturbing something important."

"It's no trouble," Lamiroir insisted.

Luke looked a little surprised by her reply, but quickly covered it with another smile.

"We were asking her about the murder," Trucy explained. "If she saw anything."

At that, Luke's face fell, and he turned back to his brother. "I hope you weren't using that exact wording, Apollo," he said.

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "What do you mean?"

"Because," Luke reluctantly explained, "Lamiroir didn't 'see' anything."

Behind him, Apollo heard Lamiroir gasp, but his attention was fully on his brother. "What are you talking about?" he asked, frowning as he stepped forward. "You agreed Mister LeTouse named her as a witness. She even told us just now that 'Lamiroir' means 'the siren' in Borginian!"

"And that's all still true," Luke agreed, his expression sad, as though he didn't want to be discussing the topic. "You two are supposed to be more perceptive of people than I am; I'm a little surprised you didn't notice yourselves. Mister LeTouse was even trying to warn you."

Apollo bristled at the mention of his and Trucy's perception, glaring at his brother as he took another step forward. "Just say what you mean, Luke," he growled. "Stop dancing around the subject."

Luke sighed, shooting the woman behind Apollo a glance. "I apologise for this, Lamiroir." He then met his brother's eyes with a stern look. "Apollo... she's blind."

Trucy gasped, her hands to her mouth as she rapidly turned back and forth between Luke and Lamiroir.

Apollo shot a glance behind him, seeing the singer downcast, her hands tightly clasped at her chest. Scoffing, he turned back to his brother. "Don't be stupid, Luke. Her pianist is the one who's blind. 'Landscape painter in sound', remember?"

"Oh, no," Trucy sighed, eyes watering as she started making connections in her head, her fingers idly playing with the lanyard around her neck. "That's the 'image', Polly..."

"Machi Tobaye isn't blind," Luke explained, resting a hand on Trucy's shoulder for comfort. "I caught him staring at me earlier, but he looked away the moment we locked eyes. He can see..."
perfectly well."

Apollo stared for a long moment. "What on earth-?"

A thump behind him stopped Apollo in his tracks, and he spun around to see Lamiroir slumped on her stool, looking suddenly very unsteady, one hand to her face. Without even stopping to think about it, he dashed back to her side to hold the woman firm (left arm across her back, right hand on her upper arm), ensuring she wouldn't fall off with her backside only barely on the green seat. "Lamiroir, are you alright?"

Lamiroir gently nodded, regaining enough control of herself to sit down properly on the stool, allowing Apollo to release his grip. "I'm... I'm alright."

It was then Apollo noticed Luke appearing at her left, opposite from his brother, hands held out in case the woman collapsed again and eyes wide in concern. "I-I'm so sorry, Lamiroir, I didn't mean to upset you! Did you want me to keep it to myself?!"

"No, it... it was going to be explained anyway," Lamiroir sighed, her hand lowering from her face. Apollo noticed her hand moving vaguely towards him and instinctively went to take it in his grip... but, as he clasped her right hand in his, he caught a glimpse of something gold under her cloak... something gold that came into full view as her cloak fell away, her arm twisting to accommodate her tight grasp on the young man, seeking his support.

A bracelet.

A bracelet Apollo was all too familiar with.

Trucy gasped somewhere to Apollo's right, but he wasn't paying attention, his wide eyes locked on the object on the woman's wrist. "L-Lamiroir... your bracelet..." He looked up to her face, finally making himself acknowledge the unfocused, unseeing gaze of those icy grey eyes. "May I... ask where you came by it?" 'Oh no those are Trucy's eyes that's why she was reminding me of Trucy earlier...'

Lamiroir subtly frowned. "I... I'm afraid to say I do not know," she admitted. "I do not know the English word for it, but... 'Lamiroir' is not my true name. I remember nothing of the time before I was given it... before I started singing on stage." Her eyes closed. "This bracelet comes from that time, before everything. I hold on to it because it gives me comfort... even if I do not remember why."

As Apollo stared at Lamiroir's face, he was vaguely aware of Luke watching his siblings carefully. "I think that's called 'amnesia'," the younger brother told Lamiroir. "Your condition, I mean. Have you been unsuccessful regaining your memory?"

Lamiroir shook her head. "I... That is difficult to talk about."

"Then we won't press you," Apollo assured her, moving his left hand to grip hers tighter; He didn't miss that it brought their matching bracelets so close together. "We're sorry for bringing it up."

A rapid padding of boots echoed through the room, and Apollo looked up just in time to catch a flash of Trucy's cape as she fled into the hallway. "Truce?" he called.

"Is your sister alright?" Lamiroir asked.

Apollo met Luke's eyes, seeing his brother's worried look. The vet glanced to the door, and Apollo nodded. "I'm sorry, Lamiroir," he told the woman. "I need to check on her."
Lamiroir nodded as the young man placed her hand back in her lap. "I understand."

Apollo stepped back, keeping his gaze on Lamiroir just long enough to see Luke pull over a stool to sit at her side, picking up his brother's watch... then the elder Wright ran for the door.

As he pulled the door to the dressing room closed behind him, Apollo instantly located his sister, standing a few metres away in the direction of the stage, her back to her brother and her head drooped. "Trucy?" he softly called, running up behind her and standing warily just within arm's reach of her back, not wanting to scare her even further away by touching her if it wasn't welcome. "Truce?"

Trucy was shaking, ever so subtly, and sniffed loudly. "She doesn't recognise us..."

Apollo felt his heart breaking, seeing his sister in distress. After a moment, he rested a hand on her shoulder. "No," he quietly agreed. "She doesn't. And we can't make her."

With another loud sniff, Trucy turned to look up at Apollo, tears streaming down her face. "Why!? Why can't we tell her!?"

"You know why," Apollo sighed, keeping his voice low. "She's blind. She has amnesia. How do you think she'd react if we told her who we are? Who she is?"

Trucy's anger faded as her gaze fell to the floor. With a single step forward, she pressed herself against her brother's chest, where she was immediately enveloped in a hug (though Apollo moved just as much to get her top hat out of his face as to rest a hand on the back of her head). "It's not fair," she mumbled into his vest.

"No," Apollo whispered in reply. "No, it's not."

The siblings stood like that for a while, neither paying any attention to the time passing. Apollo was minutely aware of every movement his sister made as her sobs slowly died down, listening to her irregular breathing slow and again become uniform. As for himself, as much as he might have liked to just pour his heart out as Trucy did, Apollo found he was too numb to really react to the shocking revelation. They had been hoping for six years to find their mother, to work out what had truly happened to her, why she left Trucy the way she did... and now they'd indeed found her, happened upon her thinking they were merely meeting an idol on the invitation of a certain frenemy of the family. And they weren't going to get any of the answers they wanted.

No. It was not fair.

Apollo's musings were broken by a clatter from behind him, and he half-spun on the spot, clinging tighter to Trucy, twisting to see what was going on. In his arms, he felt Trucy pushing to also look around, rubbing at her face with one hand.

"We meet again!"

The caped man in yellow, the one who'd been hiding in the vents, stood proudly by the vending machine, spinning a pink cane in one gloved hand. Apollo's eyes narrowed as he wondered if the already-suspicious figure had been spying on their conversation; His smirk was far too... egotistical for Apollo's liking.
Trucy gasped, pushing herself out of her brother's grasp as she madly wiped the last of the tears from around her eyes, a massive grin on her face. "Uncle Valant! It's you!"

"Yes, it is!" the man replied, bowing ostentatiously to the pair. "The Great Valant Gramarye! As seen on television."

Apollo felt his free hand (the one not still holding Trucy's hat) curl into a fist. 'I knew it.' The smirk on the man's face was still getting on his nerves, too.

"It's been a while, Miss Trucy," Valant continued, walking closer to the pair and focussing on the younger of them. "Seven years to be exact! My, how you've grown!"

"Good to see you again, Uncle Valant!" Trucy replied, curtsying then bouncing forward a few steps to meet him. "You... look exactly the same!"

Apollo thought he looked visibly older, but he wasn't going to say anything; Aside from the new moustache and faint wrinkles, he swore he could see some grey in Valant's hair. He forcefully relaxed his fist, adjusting the brooch pinned to his tie. There was no use in being rude, as Luke would say. "It's a pleasure to meet you, sir." He smiled as he stepped forward, almost surprising himself at how genuine he felt.

"He is an actual professional magician, I suppose. No shortage of things to admire about that."

Valant laughed, brushing off Apollo's greeting. "Ah, and who is your friend here, young Trucy?"

Trucy giggled. "That's Polly!"

"Apollo," her brother quickly corrected, holding out a hand to shake. "I'm Trucy's brother."

Valant froze, his confident smirk vanishing in an instant. After a moment, he looked Apollo up and down, then shook his head, the smile coming back to his expression. "Yes you are," he quietly said, and shook the young man's hand.

Apollo felt his suspicions rising again.

"What are you doing here, Uncle Valant?" Trucy asked, bouncing on her heels.

Valant laughed, already back to his old self. "Ah, my presence was petitioned by the purple prosecutor," he admitted. "But when I saw you here Miss Trucy, the first time in seven years..." He rested a hand on his forehead, palm outwards, an overly sad expression on his face. "I could fain contain my emotions! I wept oceans!"

"Aww!" Trucy sighed, her hands pressed to her cheeks as her eyes shone. It was clear she was happy to go along with the man's over-dramatic version of events.

Apollo raised an eyebrow, but decided to leave it. "So that teleportation illusion during the Guitar's Serenade... That was your work?"

"Yes!" Valant cried, snapping back to normal and again twirling his cane. "I am here to watch my trick take to the air."

At that, Apollo couldn't help a slow smile; That was indeed impressive.

"A simple sleight-of-hand, a petit prestidigitation," Valant continued, chest puffed out in pride. "A modicum of magic from me," he paused only long enough to bow to the pair, tipping his hat to them, "to you."
"It was wonderful, Uncle Valant!" Trucy cried.

Apollo nodded in agreement, and cast a glance up to the air vent above the vending machine. "I was thinking about how you did it... The air vents, right?"

Valant looked suddenly uncomfortable.

"Oh, it's okay Uncle Valant," Trucy hurried to assure him. "Polly is a magician too."

"Ah, I see!" Valant cried, relaxing. "Of course you are."

Apollo gave him an apologetic smile, holding up his hands. "Sorry, yeah, I'm not asking you outright to explain it. It's just habit to dissect any tricks I see... see if Trucy and I can make use of them in our show." He pointed to the ceiling. "The air vents are how you kept disappearing earlier, aren't they?"

Valant smiled knowingly, holding his cane to the brim of his hat. "I am like a deity, with the stage as my domain!" he proclaimed. "I suffer no mystery upon those floodlit boards not grasped tightly 'twixt my fingers. It is a potent, primeval power I possess."

"So that's a yes then?" Apollo replied, grinning.

"My illusions are mine alone," Valant only said, though he gave Apollo a smile. He turned to Trucy and performed another elaborate bow. "And now, I, Valant Gramarye, must make my leave, Miss Trucy, Sir Apollo."

Trucy blinked in surprise. "Oh, there's no need to rush, Uncle Valant!"

"I am afraid I must not linger," Valant replied, his smile as he gazed at Trucy now seeming more soft. "Perhaps I will see the two of you tomorrow at your home. I was planning to visit."

"Really?" Apollo asked, surprised. Surely Valant knew Phoenix lived there too, and had suspected the magician of murder since they first met in court?

Although she was sad to see him go, Trucy reluctantly nodded. "Okay. We'll see you there?"

Valant grinned, slowly walking backwards and away from the siblings. "Correct! In a while, alligator!" With a twirl of his cape and a wink of his eye, he spun around... and walked away, disappearing around the corner.

Apollo rolled his eyes. As much as he resented Valant for the murder of Magnifi... he had to admit he was really warming up to the over-dramatic magician.

Trucy suddenly yawned, the glee at reuniting with her magician uncle fading rapidly from her face. "That was nice," she whispered, drooping in place as her eyes remained closed. "Getting to catch up with Uncle Valant again..."

Apollo watched his sister warily, seeing how drained she was, and he couldn't blame her. 'Ideally, I'd get her home, but that's out of the question still... and she can't continue the investigation like this.' Looking around, he quickly took note of the nearby bench, where the three Wrights had waited together after the murder. 'That'll do.' He moved over to where Trucy stood, placing his hands on her shoulders. "Why don't we sit down for a bit, huh?"

Trucy didn't protest as she was guided over to the bench, watching blearily as Apollo put her hat down on the trunk, then unpinned her cape. "Polly...?"
Apollo gestured to the bench, waiting for his sister to reluctantly sit down. He promptly sat at her side, slipping her brooch into a pocket before throwing the cape over Trucy like a blanket. As she registered what he was doing, she leaned into her brother's side, resting her head on his shoulder, and Apollo wrapped his arms around her in a tight hug. "Comfy?" he whispered.

Trucy nodded.

"Good." Apollo rested his head on top of Trucy's, and they fell into a relaxed silence.

No matter what life may throw at them... the Gramarye-Wright siblings would always have each other.

"Again, I'm very sorry about all that, Lamiroir," Luke said, fidgeting in his stool at the singer's side. "I-if I'd known about your amnesia, I would've..."

"Please, I am alright now," Lamiroir insisted, smiling from her seat. "As you said, you did not know. I can trust it's not a mistake you would make twice."

Luke hurriedly nodded, before remembering she couldn't see him. "Y-yes, of course." He still couldn't quite believe it; Lamiroir was...? Even now, her hands were idly replacing her cloak back over the telltale bracelet, hiding it once again from sight. The worry for his siblings was rising in the back of Luke's throat, and he hoped beyond hope Apollo and Trucy were okay in the aftermath of their unexpected discovery.

"I should apologise on Machi's behalf," Lamiroir said, "and explain."

Luke blinked in shock at being dragged from his train of thought, his gaze snapping back to the woman's face. "Explain?"

"Why he was staring at you earlier," the singer continued, a small smile visible under her veil. "He said he recognised you, from some old articles he used to read to me."

"Arti?- Oh!" One of Luke's hands clapped over his mouth as he suddenly recalled why his face might have been in a newspaper. "You mean, you've been reading about Professor Layton?"

Lamiroir nodded. "Yes. He is supposed to be able to solve any problem."

Luke grinned eagerly. "Oh yes, he can! Any puzzle, big or small, Professor Layton can solve them all!" He giggled at the rhyme, something Emmy had come up with when he was young - The pair of them would cheer it occasionally between cases, mostly for the odd looks said Professor would give them in return. It was something he'd never realised he'd missed once Emmy left.

"I'm glad to hear it," Lamiroir replied, looking thoughtful. "I once thought... I considered asking him to solve the 'puzzle' of my past. It was Machi's idea, truthfully." Her eyes closed. "He still tries to convince me, now and then."

Luke frowned, head cocked to one side in confusion. "Why didn't you? He'd be glad to help. The Professor helps anyone who comes to him with a worthy cause... and you're not the first singer to do so, either."

Lamiroir sighed. "I... am afraid," she admitted. "I do not fear the darkness I live in, but I do fear the darkness in my heart." She pressed a hand to her chest. "I tried, for many years, to clear the fog of my memories, but they would not come... only the feeling of great pain. Whatever is in my past... I think I am better off not knowing."

Again, Luke's gaze drifted to the door, and he wondered how his siblings were doing. He couldn't pass by this chance to reunite them with their mother. "Lamiroir, I understand you don't want to know... but..." He sighed. "Actually, the Professor's son and daughter are in town visiting me right now, with their uncle and a friend of theirs, the Professor's former assistant. Let me introduce you to them, once this investigation is over. If you ever change your mind, at least then getting in touch with Professor Layton will be easy."

Lamiroir thought a long moment, her head turned in Luke's direction. "That's very generous of you."

"It's the least I can do," Luke insisted. "It's a gentleman's job to help a lady in need; I wasn't the Professor's apprentice for nothing."

Under her veil, Lamiroir smiled, her eyes twinkling. "I suppose not. You saw through my and Machi's act, after all."

Luke blushed, giggling in embarrassment as he scratched the back of his head. After a moment of silence however, his smile faded. "That reminds me..." He shook his head, his hands resting in his lap. "Lamiroir, I should state this outright: With the evidence they have now, the police are going to arrest Machi for the murder."

Lamiroir gasped. "Wh-what!? But Machi didn't shoot him!"

Luke nodded, briefly forgetting the woman couldn't see him... though he did pick up her word choice, filing it away for later. "Apollo and a detective heard the shots from the hall outside. When they came in, only Mister LeTouse was in the room. The only other exit is the air vent, up a ladder by the door." He sighed. "There are only two people backstage small enough to fit through that vent, and one of them has a rock-solid alibi... The other is Machi. No matter the evidence against it, they're going to arrest him."

"But he did not-!" Lamiroir began to argue, only to stop, apparently recognising that Luke was only stating facts. She clasped her hands together, frowning in distress.

"I know it couldn't have been Machi," Luke continued, "but I also know there is no way anyone larger than him was in the room when Apollo and the detective heard those shots. Somehow, you witnessed what happened in that room, and Mister LeTouse knew you did. Anything you know, however small, could be what we need to prove Machi's innocence."

Lamiroir closed her eyes, deep in thought. "This... is difficult," she sighed. "I still do not understand how what you are saying can be possible... but there is not much I can say to explain myself." She screwed her eyes shut. "I am sorry, my English is not perfect."

"No, I understand," Luke assured her, then crossed his arms, a hand resting on his chin. "Let me think..." He hummed in thought, running over all the information in his head. Knowing Lamiroir was a witness, and how Apollo and Ema had come across the body... he had to admit, he found it confusing too. There was only one other place the singer could be to have heard what was going on in the dressing room, but placing her there completely blocked all possible exits for the shooter.

There was much more to LeTouse's death than he'd initially suspected.

Luke shook his head, then returned his attention to Lamiroir, who was waiting patiently. "If I'm correct... May I ask when exactly you heard the shots?"

"When?" Lamiroir repeated, a little surprised. "Well... It was during my performance, of course," she said. "I was in a hurry, just passing by, so I didn't have the time to report it."

Luke's eyes widened. "During your performance?"
"Yes," Lamiroir continued. "There is something like a little window... I heard everything through it as I passed."

"Of course!" Luke quietly exclaimed to himself, a grin growing on his face. "The teleportation illusion!" He laughed. "I suspect you've been sworn to silence on the details, if the magician that planned it is worth their salt!"

Sighing in relief, Lamiroir nodded. "Yes, I am. I'm afraid I cannot speak in detail about why I was... well, where I was."

"No, don't worry, I understand," Luke assured her. "My brother and sister are magicians, so I know what's it like." He leaned back on the stool, thinking. "This explains those fragments... It was all a set-up for when Apollo and Detective Skye were in the hall..."

"I heard more than just the two shots," Lamiroir offered. "Mister LeTouse was talking to someone... a grown man."

Luke perked up at that. "Did you recognise their voice?"

"Unfortunately, no," the singer admitted. "But, should I ever hear them again, I am sure I would. When I hear a voice, I do not forget it."

"They were undoubtedly the shooter," Luke muttered to himself, rubbing his chin. "And Mister LeTouse must have seen his face if they were talking, so it means something that he didn't know who this shooter was..." He nodded firmly, giving Lamiroir a determined look. "Lamiroir, I must ask, as unpleasant as it is, please reflect on everything you remember of what you heard. Any small detail you can recall could help us find this man."

Lamiroir nodded, her face mirroring Luke's even though she couldn't see him - She must have heard his steely resolve in his voice. "I will," she promised.

Luke smiled. "Thank you, ma'am. You've been a great deal of help."

The woman's expression softened, almost amused. After a short pause, she asked, "Is this what it's like when the famous Professor Layton takes on a case?"

At first, Luke was confused, but then it registered she was comparing him to his former mentor, and he blushed. "Oh, uh..." He giggled, rubbing the back of his head. "I-I don't know how I'd compare to the Professor, but I do my best to live up to him!" His laughter faded as his hands clasped together in his lap, a frown settling on his face. "But... even when the Professor was in charge... it did always seem to get worse before it got better." His frown deepened, staring off into space. "I don't have the same reputation amongst the local police that he does with Scotland Yard, either."

Lamiroir, looked away, saddened. "Will you be able to protect Machi?"

It broke Luke's heart to admit it, but he couldn't lie to the mother of his siblings... especially not about her adoptive child. "I'm... sorry. I can only promise I'll do my absolute best."

The singer simply nodded, accepting his response. "That is all I can ask."

"But be sure to tell the police everything you've told me," Luke continued. "Even on its own, it may convince them Machi is innocent."

Lamiroir frowned, concerned. "There are some things we have discussed I am under contract to not mention," she said, again looking determined, "but I will tell them everything I can if it will save Machi.

Luke smiled triumphantly, straightening in his seat. "That is all I can ask, ma'am."
He couldn't see her face, but Apollo suspected Trucy's stillness, except for her slow, regular breathing, was because she had fallen asleep. He wished he could join her, after their roller-coaster of a night, but sleeping for him was out of the question; He had to watch out for her, keep her company and keep her safe until she was back home in her bed, and he would gladly stay up all night (or morning, considering it was past midnight now) in that empty hallway (if Klavier's ridiculous lockdown lasted that long) for his little sister's sake. The boredom of the wait was only kept from being mind-numbing by the fact that Apollo's mind was already numb. After the murder, and then happening upon Lamiroir's true self purely by chance... He didn't want to even think about it anymore. He kept his focus on Trucy. All he cared about at that moment was her.

Occasionally a member of the concert staff would walk past, though they paid the Wright siblings little more than a glance; Apollo didn't know any of them anyway, so he was happy to ignore them back. He had no idea how many were ordinary backstage crew or members of the police, given they were all dressed very similarly... although he did spot the other three Gavinners running past in a rush, and idly found himself wondering what kind of jobs they boasted as being connected to law enforcement.

Finally, the door to Lamiroir's dressing room opened, and Klavier emerged, Ema at his back. He noticed the two Wrights nearby with surprise, but gave Apollo a small nod and smile before turning his attention back to Ema. "The important thing now is to find that boy, I suppose. And get those items we discussed analysed by the experts."

Ema huffed at his choice of words, but reluctantly nodded. "Sure."

As if on cue, the door to the Gavinners' dressing room then also opened, Luke quickly slipping out and closing it again behind him. He noticed the four other people gathered around in surprise before turning to Klavier. "Mister Gavin, you can't arrest Machi!"

Klavier's eyebrows shot up momentarily before deepening into a frown. "And why can I not, Herr Doktor?"

"Because he's being framed!" Luke cried emphatically, hands curled into fists. "The real murderer has falsified the time of the shooting and is pointing the blame at an innocent child! They can't be allowed to get away with this!"

Klavier sighed, eyes closed. "I will arrest whomever the evidence tells me to arrest," he replied, then gave Luke a stern glare. "Tell me Herr Doktor, is your little claim backed by any evidence?"

"I have testimony," Luke proudly proclaimed, then looked to Ema. "And, Detective Skye, did you take a look at those fragments I told you about?"

Ema nodded, her face flashing a sad look. "They'll have to be analysed before we can say if they're related to the murder."

Luke shrugged. "As long as the analysis comes back before an arrest is carried out, I'm fine with Klavier sighed and shook his head. "And you would be happy staying here all night, Doktor Wright?" He gestured behind him, to where Trucy was slumped unresponsive against Apollo's shoulder. "I am not sure your sister would agree with you."

Luke only gave the teen a pained look, sharing a quick glance with Apollo to check both his siblings were alright. He then turned back to Klavier, his resolve stronger than before. "Trucy is the same age as Machi," he pointed out. "They're children. A night in this concert hall they can survive, but it would be reprehensible to allow one of them to be jailed for something they didn't do."

Klavier frowned, eyes screwed shut. He stood in deep thought for a long moment, then stepped past and around Luke, heading to the dressing room the vet had just exited. "I apologise, Herr Doktor, but sometimes it is the person we least suspect who is the true culprit."

"In which case," Luke shot back, spinning around to still face the prosecutor, "the person you do suspect is being wrongfully accused!"

Klavier did not reply, disappearing into the dressing room.

Luke sighed, looking frustrated at his own failure to talk Klavier around, then turned back to Ema. "Detective Skye, surely you agree that Machi...?"

Ema's face was downcast. "It's Ema. And I'm sorry, but I can't pick sides. Not even between you and the fop."

"I-I understand," Luke haltingly agreed, though he was clearly upset to lose an ally. "But there's still more evidence for my theory than his."

"I suppose we'll have to see," Ema said. After a pause, she added, "I'll let you know if the analyses agree with you," then disappeared back into the crime scene.

As Ema left, Luke's gaze turned to the floor, a range of emotions mixing across his face. Apollo was about to call out, check his brother was okay, when suddenly Trucy shifted against his shoulder, lifting her head up towards the middle Wright. "Luke?"

Luke blinked in surprise, then turned to the pair with a smile, heading over to where they sat on the bench. "I'm sorry, Trucy. I didn't mean to wake you." He glanced to Apollo. "Are you both okay?"

Apollo nodded, giving his brother a reassuring smile. "We're fine. It's just been a long night."

"Alright," Luke replied, though it was clear his mind was already wandering, his gaze turned towards the crime scene. After a pause, he frowned. "That earpiece... How long has it been there?"

The other two looked over to the abandoned headset on the floor. "I remember seeing it there in the break after Act Two," Apollo said.

Luke gasped. "Of course!" He then turned to his brother with a grin. "If you see anyone picking it up and claiming it, take note of them, okay?"

"Um, okay," Apollo agreed, confused. "Why?"

"It's a part of the frame-up against Machi!" Luke continued. "They must have been specifically waiting until there were people in the hall as witnesses to set off the fake gunshots!"
At that, Trucy shot up out of Apollo's grip, her cape slipping from her shoulders. "What!? You mean Polly and Ema...!?"

Apollo frowned, thinking back to the loud bangs he'd heard as his gaze turned to the vending machine. "We were arguing at the time..."

Luke had apparently stopped listening, pulling Apollo's Court Record out of his satchel to take a photo of the abandoned earpiece. "Surely the sheer amount of supposedly 'circumstantial' evidence helping my case will convince Mister Gavin," he muttered to himself, and sighed as he put the computer away again, still glaring at the device on the floor. "If Lamiroir can't convince him, then..."

Suddenly Apollo remembered why they'd been talking to Lamiroir before their rather rude discovery. "She told you what she witnessed?"

"After some convincing," Luke replied, turning to his siblings with a smile. "I'll give you the full story later."

"Sounds good," Trucy sighed, leaning back against Apollo. As her brother smiled and began to drape her 'blanket' back up over her shoulders, she added, "Will they be letting us go home soon?"

Luke shrugged, and was about to reply when footsteps echoed from towards the stage, and he looked over to see the source. A moment later, Daryan Crescend rounded the corner, striding purposefully towards the Wrights. Luke stepped to the side, giving the man a friendly nod and a "Detective," in acknowledgement, but the man only grunted in reply, passing the trio and disappearing into the Gavinners' dressing room.

Trucy hummed to herself as she watched the door close. "He must have a lot on his mind."

Apollo nodded in agreement. "It probably bugs all of them that a murder happened right under their noses," he pointed out. "And during a performance, too."

Luke was frowning in thought, staring after the man. "The band members..."

"What about them?" Apollo asked.

"Oh, that reminds me!" Trucy cried, her head lifting from Apollo's shoulder as she fixed her other brother with a grin. "Luke, I haven't told you what I found out about the lyrics!"

Apollo rolled his eyes. "Here we go..."

Luke seemed intrigued. "Lyrics?"

"To the Guitar's Serenade!" Trucy explained. "Mister Gavin was telling us earlier how those keys of his we found, they were stolen this morning! Then I realised they matched a line in the song about taking keys that 'my heart held on to so tight'!"

"And after that," Apollo picked up, "there's the 'burning' line, about his guitar, then lines about a bullet and taking 'my life away', about the murder."

"It's all in order, too!" Trucy finished, her chest puffing out with pride. "And I spotted it!"

Luke didn't immediately reply, arms crossed against his chest as he stroked his goatee. "Interesting..."

"Unless they've been spreading it around, only Gavin and that detective friend of his know about it," Apollo added, smiling. "They were arguing because Detective Crescend missed a cue on stage."
"Did you notice that, Luke?" Trucy asked. "Mister Gavin was really upset about it."

It took a moment for Luke to respond. "N-no, I didn't notice a missed cue," he insisted, then uncrossed his arms, giving his siblings an intense stare. "But on the subject of the Guitar's Serenade, I trust you two have an idea of how that teleportation illusion was carried out?"

Apollo and Trucy would have shared a confused look had their current position allowed them to. "Why?" Apollo asked, wary.

"As long as you do," Luke replied, smiling. "It's related to the murder, I promise."

Before Apollo could ask what Luke meant, the door to the Gavinners' dressing room opened again, admitting into the hallway two full-grown men in the midst of another argument.

"I know I left it in there, man! This is a serious offence!"

"Not as serious as our missing pianist. Your guitar isn't going to go anywhere; Someone will hand it in before long."

"Aw, come on, Geeter's more like a missing person, not lost 'n' found..."

Luke again stepped to the side, out of the pair's way. "Mister Gavin, did you-?"

"If any of you three see a guitar," Klavier interrupted, waving to the trio and ignoring Daryan's protests behind him, "return it to our dressing room, ja? And," he stepped towards them, specifically focussing on Apollo and Trucy, "should you see young Machi Tobaye, let me know. He's run off somewhere."

Luke's eyes narrowed. "Only because you want to question him, right?"

"All entrances and exits are sealed," Klavier continued, ignoring the vet, "so he'll be somewhere in the building." He then turned back to Daryan, giving them (Luke especially) no opening to reply. "If you're so worried about your guitar Daryan, go check the stage. Maybe you left it there." With that, he turned and disappeared into the crime scene.

Daryan huffed, crossing his arms. "Check the stage... Ha! As if I'd forget where I left it..."

Apollo found his grip on Trucy tightening.

Luke sighed. "Why don't I check the stage?" he suggested. "If you have somewhere you think is more likely to look, Detective."

Daryan, paused, looking Luke up and down, then grinned. "If you insist." His grin died. "Geeter's a Gibson SG, red. Vintage too, so be careful if you find it."

Although none of Daryan's description meant anything to Luke, he nodded and turned to face the stage. "I'll be careful," he promised.

"Oh, actually," Daryan continued, rushing to catch up to him, "I'd better go with you, Paperboy. Can't let you be alone if the killer walks by, huh?" He laughed loudly.

Luke gave the man an odd look, pausing his walk. "'Paperboy'?" A hand hesitantly drifted to his cap.

"C'mon, let's find my Geeter!" Daryan cried, waving for Luke to follow as he continued to stride towards the stage.

Trucy gave Luke a small wave as he left, then settled back down against Apollo's shoulder. "Wake me when they're letting us go home..."

"Sure," Apollo promised, hugging her tighter. He was grateful her position meant she couldn't see the worried look Apollo was giving Luke as he disappeared around the corner with Daryan.

The walk to the stage was mostly quiet, to Luke's relief. Right now, Daryan and his three bandmates were the obvious candidates for the 'grown man' with the alibi for Act Three and not Act Two; Why else would they have set up the situation Apollo and Ema walked in on if not to give themselves an alibi? What's worse, with all of them being Klavier's friends and connected to law enforcement, Klavier himself wasn't going to suspect them the way anyone else would. It made Luke sick to think that, given the chance, Klavier would choose to send an innocent teenage boy to his death to let a friend walk free.

Strange how he was suddenly agreeing with Apollo when it came to the subject of Klavier Gavin.

The stage was awash in red floodlights as it came into view at the top of the stairs. To one side was a stand with two guitars resting inside, but, with one a bright sparkly pink and the other a dull wood beige, it was clear neither was Daryan's beloved Geeter.

Daryan sighed as he checked inside a nearby contrabass case. "I told him I didn't leave it on stage, but does the diva ever listen to reason?" he darkly muttered, throwing up his hands.

Luke stepped forward to the edge of the stage, looking out over the audience. It was strange, seeing all those empty red chairs that had been filled with people for most of the night... plus, although he'd been on stages before, it had been a very long time since he'd been on one with a potential audience of that size.

"You're the violin player, right?"

Luke turned in surprise, giving Daryan a nod. "Yes, I play the violin."

Daryan smirked, walking past Luke to the grand piano, and tapped out a few notes on the keys.
"Classical guy, huh? Hope our show today taught you a little about modern music."

At that, Luke raised an eyebrow. "Just because I play the violin, it doesn't mean-" He then stopped, his gaze caught on the high platform raised above the stage. "Wait, why is the tower up? That was lowered when the concert finished, wasn't it?" He jogged towards it, examining around the base to find some way of climbing it. "How do we retract it?"

There was a loud sigh from behind him, and a clatter; A moment later, Daryan appeared at his side with an extendible ladder, securing it against the side of the tower. "No idea," he replied. "Quicker to see if there's anything up there before running for help." He promptly began to climb.

Luke cast a wary glance back at the wings. "Why can't we just...?" He cut himself off with a groan, deciding to leave it; Clearly Daryan just wanted to climb the tower. He folded his arms and leaned against the red grate covering the lift mechanisms within.

The regular thudding of Daryan's footsteps up the ladder came to a halt. "Whoa!" Luke looked up just in time to see the man disappearing on top of the tower. "Looks like Geeter found our missing person!"

"What!?" Luke cried, then grabbed at the ladder himself, dashing up it as fast as humanly possible.
Sure enough, when he crested the top of the five-metre tower, there was Machi, lying curled up Daryan was towered over the boy, pulling his guitar from Machi's grip with a stern look. He noticed Luke pulling himself up on the platform with surprise, waving the vet away. "Hey hey hey! It's dangerous up here, you get back down and run for help!"

"Why don't you?" Luke shot back, running to Machi's side. "It's just as dangerous for you as for me." He turned his attention to the teenager, quickly noting the boy appeared to be unconscious. "Machi?" he called, turning him on his back and carefully removing his sunglasses. "Machi, can you hear me?"

"And it's even more dangerous to be messing around with the kid!" Daryan hissed, stepping back with his guitar firmly in hand. "What if he wakes up and tries to push you off, huh?"

At that, Luke gave the man a glare. "That's utter nonsense," he calmly replied. "Tell me, why else would he be up here and unconscious unless he was attacked and put here deliberately?"

Daryan almost seemed to pale under Luke's accusing gaze, but blew it off with a snort. "I dunno, maybe he's narcoleptic!" he cried, crossing his arms and rolling his eyes. "Or maybe he's scared of heights! Why'd he steal my Geeter, that's what I want to know!"

Luke frowned, but decided to let it go, returning his attention to his 'patient'; He wasn't a human doctor, but he at least knew basic first aid. Pressing a finger to Machi's neck, he quickly established the boy had a pulse, and a hand held above his mouth and nose indicated the boy was breathing.

Daryan sighed, then threw his guitar's strap over his shoulder, slinging it over his back. "Whatever. Don't come crying to me if the kid breaks your neck." With that, he began to climb back down the ladder.

Luke just ignored him, busy rolling Machi onto his side again and moving the teen's head to face up and away from his body: The classic recovery position. While the boy was still, arms and legs locked together to keep him from rolling, Luke ran a hand gently through Machi's hair, looking for any signs of bleeding. "How'd they hurt you, huh?" he quietly asked. "Why'd they drag you up here with...?"

He paused, then looked back in the direction Daryan had disappeared. Over the edge of the tower, he could see the white tip of the man's pompadour as he ran through the wings, likely heading for Klavier.

Suddenly Luke's shortlist was even shorter.

Machi shivered, eyes still screwed shut. He muttered something quietly in Borginian.

"Machi?" Luke whispered, and stopped to check Daryan was gone before sitting back from the boy, giving him space. "It's okay, Detective Crescend is gone."

Slowly, Machi's eyes blinked open, revealing bright blue eyes that locked on to Luke's with a fearful gaze.

"Are you alright?" Luke asked, grabbing the teen's sunglasses to offer them back to him. 'What am I doing? I know he doesn't speak English...'

Machi didn't reply, carefully retrieving his sunnies to put them back on. He pushed himself up into a sitting position, hugging his knees. This time, he spoke a bit more confidently, a string of words Luke couldn't pick out followed by two he knew very well: "- Hershel Layton?"

Luke blinked in surprise, then smiled. "Ah, apprentice," he said, only to then mentally kick himself for using a word Machi definitely wouldn't know. He pointed at himself. "Luke Triton."

Machi nodded, and Luke could only hope that indicated he understood what Luke meant, if not his words. That would have to be enough.

"I promise I'm going to help you," Luke said, slowly in case Machi could pick out occasional words, and with as much feeling as he could muster. "I know you're not the killer. Lamiroir knows it too. We've just got to prove it to Prosecutor Gavin." He cast a dark glare in the direction of the wings. "Admittedly, that's going to be hard if Crescend is the culprit... but I'm not going to let that stop me." He looked back to Machi, who was still quietly watching him, expressionless. "Would you be able to trust me?"

There was a short pause, then Machi nodded, giving Luke a small smile.

Despite his relief, Luke hoped the boy wasn't just being polite in answering a question he hadn't understood a word of.

[View the Court Record]
Suddenly the tower shuddered under Luke and Machi, the pair stabilising themselves on the floor with their hands as the platform began to lower. Luke looked around for the ladder Daryan had set up, but saw no sign of it; He could only assume the guitarist had put it away again as he left. In the wings, it wasn't hard to spot Klavier, Daryan at his back, walking towards the lowering tower with a frown. Instinctively, Luke scuttled closer to Machi, holding an arm around the boy's back protectively. "It's okay," he muttered, as much for himself as for Machi. "It's going to be alright." He spotted a flash of blue in the darkness, and was surprised to see his siblings, Apollo holding Trucy's hat with her cape slung over his arm and Trucy clinging to her brother's elbow, dragging him forward to the stage.

Machi seemed to shrink into himself, pressing his face into his knees and hugging his legs tight. Luke pressed tighter against his back, shooting a glare at Klavier as the platform reached two metres high, then one, then folded back into the stage with a thud.

Klavier and Luke stared each other down for a very long moment, Luke daring Klavier to make a move and Klavier silently ordering Luke to move. When it became clear the young vet wasn't going to budge, Klavier gestured to Machi. "Go ahead, Daryan."

"No!" Luke cried, jumping to his feet, though he knew better than to try and physically stop Daryan as he grabbed Machi's upper arm and roughly dragged the teen to his feet. "You're making a mistake! Machi is innocent!"

"I have yet to see any evidence saying so," Klavier coldly replied as Daryan dragged Machi away, the teen's head held low as he meekly followed the taller man.

Luke's hands curled into fists. "Have you even looked?" he shot back. "Did you listen to Lamiroir at all!?"

"I'm tempted to ask you that," Klavier said. "You cannot call yourself an investigator and blindly trust people, Doktor Wright." He turned and began to walk away.

"How dare you!" Luke shouted, seething with rage as he stomped after the taller man. "Do you even realise how hypocritical that statement is!? You've just decided the murderer was an innocent fourteen-year-old, and you're not even entertaining the possibility that you're wrong!"

Klavier sighed as he neared the wings, where Apollo and Trucy were watching nervously. "Herr Doktor."

"Don't 'Herr Doktor' me, you fake German!" Luke spat back. "Or are you just that upset that your name is literally 'Piano', that you're willing to send a pianist to his death for no reason!?"

The prosecutor spun back to face Luke, bristling.

"Luke!" Apollo cried, interrupting anything Klavier might have said as he ran around to his brother's side, grabbing a shoulder with his free hand. "L-Luke, c'mon, there's nothing we can do now they've carried out an arrest, okay? Let's stop before you say something you'll regret."

Luke didn't even glance at his brother, still visibly panting with rage as he glared at the prosecutor across from him.

Klavier sighed, calming down. "You three are free to go. I'd head home if I were you."

Apollo and Trucy gazed at Klavier in surprise, but Luke was still unphased. Finally, without a word, Luke shook off his brother's grip and stomped away, roughly pulling off his ID card and tossing it on the floor. As he passed her, Trucy watched Luke with a worried look, then turned back to Klavier, approaching him nervously. "Mister Gavin?"

Klavier avoided meeting the girl's eyes, a stern frown still on his face. "What is it, Fraulein?"

"Um..." She looked down, too scared to answer, but screw up her courage to again look up at Klavier's face. "You'll... make sure there's someone to look after Lamiroir now, won't you?"

The man blinked, surprised, and turned his head to look down at the worried teen.

"It's just," Trucy continued, "her manager's dead, and now Machi's been taken away, and she's so far from home... she needs someone to help her. Please?"

"Uh, ja," Klavier replied, still watching the girl with vague confusion, "yes, of course."

Trucy nodded, relieved, and Apollo chose that moment to approach her, a hand on his sister's back as he gently guided her away from the stage. "C'mon Truce, let's go home."

Wright Anything Agency
Phoenix's Office

Luke had said very little as he drove them back to the Agency, still fuming over his argument with Klavier. To his credit, he didn't take any of it out on his siblings, apologising to them and checking they were okay. Trucy was quick to fall asleep in the back, her head resting against the window, and Apollo had insisted, instead of dropping by his and Clay's apartment (which was closer), that Luke take them straight to the Agency, and he would get Trucy settled in before walking home himself. Luke was reluctant, but eventually agreed, admitting he was too tired to disagree anymore.

The movement of the car parking was enough to cause Trucy to stir, though she looked confused when she saw where they were. "Polly...?"

"Apollo's going to walk you in," Luke told her with a smile.

Apollo nodded as he opened her door. "Let's get you to bed, shall we? It's past one in the morning!"

Luke's car didn't move until both of them were safely inside.

Trucy said nothing as Apollo guided her through the apartment and up to her room, allowing him to partially strip her of her costume before he left her to change into her nightie herself. Once she was done, she mutely followed his instructions to brush her teeth, then crawled into bed. Apollo insisted on tucking her in, giving her one last hug and a kiss on the forehead.
"Thank you, Polly," she whispered with a smile.

Apollo pulled the bow-and-arrows brooch from his tie as he made his way down the stairs, leaving only the hall light on as he went (in case Trucy needed the security of the light under her door). He contemplated digging out his spare cape, the one he had last worn for Phoenix's trial back in April, but wasn't sure it would be worth it; After all, he didn't have a spare pair of gloves, and it felt a little wrong to be missing them while wearing his cape... He had regularly gone without both back when he was working for Kristoph, after all. As he pushed open the door from the kitchen into the office, he noticed the sound of books being shuffled on a shelf, and the occasional fluttering of paper, and paused. "Dad?" He ventured into the room, looking around the door.

Phoenix was stood at one of the bookshelves, his backpack sitting open on the sofa and his hands on the books of the bookcase by the door, opposite where Charley sat. He was looking back at Apollo in surprise, abandoning his search to turn and face his son. "Apollo? What are you doing here?"

Apollo shrugged, stepping a little closer through the piles of magic props. "We got... held up... at the concert. I was just getting Trucy home." He gave his father a curious look. "Aren't you usually back from work later than this?"

Now it was Phoenix's turn to shrug, the man looking a little sheepish as he ran a hand over the beanie on his head. " Eh, I left a little early. Got that secret mission to attend to, so I gotta be up early tomorrow."

"Right," Apollo muttered, nodding absent-mindedly. He forced a small smile. "You ever gonna tell me what it's all about? You said you would."

Phoenix grinned. "I said 'later'," he pointed out, but the teasing expression faded as he watched his son. "What happened? You okay?"

"Yeah, sure," Apollo replied, quickly enough that Phoenix's concerned frown only deepened. "I'm fine, Dad."

After a short pause, Phoenix sighed. "If you say so." He gestured upwards with one hand, pointing to the ceiling. "In case you've forgotten, your old room is always open if you need to stay the night."

At that, Apollo's forced smile became genuine. "Yeah. I might have to take you up on that." He tried to laugh, but it came out as more of a tired sigh. "Thanks, Dad."

Phoenix smiled, shoving his hands in his pockets. "I'd say 'see you tomorrow', but I'll probably be gone by the time you and Trucy emerge in the morning, so I'll just say 'good night'."

Apollo nodded, turning to head back upstairs, but then paused. "Um, Dad?" he asked as he turned back. "Can I ask you something... about your secret mission? Promise not to lie?"

After a surprised moment of silence, Phoenix's frown deepened. "That... will depend on what you're asking, but..." He sighed, shaking his head. "I can promise I'll give an honest answer, even if it's not the one you want."

"Good enough," Apollo decided, fingering the brooch in his hand. "I just wanted to know, if... in your investigation... you'd ever looked into Lamiroir?"

Phoenix blinked, clearly thrown by the question. "L... Lamiroir? The singer?" He shook his head, confused. "Uh, no, I can't say I have... Should I?"

At that, Apollo found himself laughing in relief, though he wasn't entirely sure why in his current state of exhaustion. "N-no, it doesn’t matter... Forget it." He turned and headed for the door. "Night, Dad."

"Goodnight Apollo," Phoenix replied. He watched his son go with a concerned look... and made a mental note to investigate this 'Lamiroir' immediately.

"I told you Mommy was still alive!" eight-year-old Trucy Wright crowed as she sat on the edge of the walkway through the garden, kicking her feet back and forth where they dangled.

Sixteen-year-old Apollo rolled his eyes, sat in the middle between his siblings, their backs to the spare room's paper door. "For the last time, I never said she wasn't!"

On Apollo's left, fourteen-year-old Luke shot the pair a glance, then returned his attention to the photo album lying open in his lap, silently studying the pictures within.

It had been no more than ten minutes since Maya had, one after the other, failed to channel either Brenda Triton or Thalassa Gramarye; The double failures, paired with the successful channelling of Clark Triton, had been a shock to everyone residing in Fey Manor that hot summer day. While Maya and Pearl busied themselves cleaning up in the aftermath of a successful channelling, the three Wright children had wandered off into the Winding Way, the events of that morning heavy on their minds. Of Phoenix's location, they had no idea, as he had ventured off further into the mansion shortly before they left the Meditation Room.

"Miss Maya sure showed you!" Trucy continued, proudly grinning and steadfastly ignoring Apollo's protest.

Sighing, Apollo turned his face to the sky. "Fine, think what you want."

"Now we just gotta find where she went," Trucy said, arms crossed. After a pause, she shot Apollo a glare. "And she didn't run away!"

"I told you, that was just a scena-!" Apollo began to object, only to cut himself off and throw his hands in the air. "Okay, you wanna find her? Where was the Troupe living when she disappeared? You were with them, right?"

Trucy paused, suddenly looking nervous. "Um..."

Apollo stared at her a moment in surprise. "You weren't with them!?"

"I was!" Trucy shot back indignantly. "I just..." She shrugged, staring out at the garden. "I don't remember."

"You don't remember," Apollo repeated, giving his sister a disbelieving glare.

"It was a long time ago, okay!?" Trucy pointed out, arms tightly crossed.

Apollo scoffed. "It was four years ago," he replied.

"And that's a really long time!" Trucy cried, promptly sticking out her tongue as a follow-up.
Rolling his eyes, Apollo decided to turn his attention to his other sibling, who was still paging idly through his currently-lone surviving family photo album. "Speaking of investigations, didn't you say you had a few leads for yours now?"

Luke didn't respond, his eyes on a page of photos dedicated to city views, and people in front of buildings.

Trucy leaned forward, watching the younger of her brothers worriedly. "Luke?"

Luke jolted in his seat, meeting Trucy's gaze with wide eyes. "Huh? S-sorry, where you talking to me?"

Apollo and Trucy shared a look before returning their worried eyes to their brother. "Are you okay?" Apollo asked.

"I'm fine," Luke automatically insisted, looking back down at his photos. "I guess I'm just... still processing..."

Suddenly Apollo noticed the photo Luke was specifically looking at: Clark standing proudly with a large, complicated-looking machine at his back, gesturing to it with a grin. "Your dad's dead."

Luke nodded. "Maya said she'd channel him again any time I wanted to talk to him, but... he's still dead. Nothing can change that."

Apollo rested a hand on his brother's shoulder, offering his silent support.

"To make it even worse," Luke continued, closing the album so it stood on its spine in his lap, "Mum's been kidnapped and taken away somewhere, and I have no idea where she is or how she's doing... only that she's still alive." He took a deep breath, and Apollo thought for a moment he was about to cry, but instead Luke simply released all his pent-up tension with a sigh, resting his forehead on top of the photo album; Perhaps he'd done enough crying that day already. "Papa's promised to help, at least. I'd have no idea where to even start otherwise."

Apollo blinked in surprise. "'Papa'?"

Trucy gasped, a massive grin spreading across her face. "Luke! You're calling Daddy...?"

Luke looked up, giving his siblings a small smile. "Yeah, I decided to stop calling him 'Nick'. It was stupid of me to do that in the first place." He turned away again, the smile fading as he lay the photo album down on his legs. "I kept saying I already had a dad, but... I just didn't want to admit I needed another parent. I shouldn't have waited for Dad's permission to let Papa be that for me."

Trucy leaned across Apollo's legs, reaching for Luke's hand in his lap and coming just short without slipping off the deck herself. "It's okay, Luke. Maybe, while Daddy's helping look for your mom, he could help look for our mom too!"

"With what information?" Apollo pointed out, crossing his arms.

Luke giggled, and reached out a hand to grasp Trucy's, resting on their brother's knee between them. "Thank you, Trucy. I'm sure if all four of us join forces, we can find both our mums in no time."

"Yeah!" the girl cried, and fixed Apollo with a grin. "Isn't that right, Polly? You'll help, won't you?"

Apollo sighed, staring up at the sky as his siblings watched with hopeful looks. "They won't be together," he pointed out. "Luke's mom was kidnapped, and ours is just missing."
"You never know," Luke replied, shrugging. "We'll never know, not unless we try. And there's no harm in that, right?" He giggled. "We'll get farther trying than not."

There was a short pause. "Thalassa Gramarye and Brenda Triton... two needles in an Earth-sized haystack." Apollo looked between his siblings with a joking grin. "They shouldn't be that hard to find, right?" As Luke and Trucy laughed, Apollo rested his left hand on theirs, his bracelet glittering in the sunlight. "Let's give it a go."

Finally, Maya and Pearl finished putting out the candles in the Channelling Chamber, then removing the ones that had dripped wax and cleaning the spilt remains from underneath them (dry wax was especially annoying to remove if it was allowed to build up, a lesson Morgan had been very intent on ensuring Maya remembered by allowing one of the shelves in the small room to be filled with dripping candles until they were all caked together, short strings of wicks drowning in the white mass; It had taken the young Maya two entire days to finally clean the shelf, and the floor below it, to her aunt's satisfaction). Maya sent Pearl to go replace the candles they'd removed, an easy job for the girl, then headed off herself to find Phoenix.

The spirit medium found her friend in the guest room that was always his when he came by, sitting on his bed and holding his beanie in his hands, staring at the pink 'PaPa' boldly sprawled across the side. Smiling, Maya cleared her throat, catching Phoenix's attention. "Tired already, old man?"

Phoenix smirked, placing his beanie down on the bed as he stood. "Finished raising the dead?" he replied, his hands shoved in his pants pockets in the absence of his usual hoodie.

Maya laughed and headed into the room, dropping down on the bed at Phoenix's side. "Well, I'd say our mission was a success, huh?"

"'Our' mission?" Phoenix repeated with a chuckle as he rejoined her. "This was entirely your idea."

"And it was a complete success!" Maya boasted. "Maya the Magnificent does it again!"

Phoenix snorted, crossing his arms. "You never fail to be humble, do you?"

The pair laughed, then fell into a comfortable silence. Maya was the first to break it, her smile falling: "You'll keep an eye on Luke, won't you? He claimed to believe they were both dead, but I still think it was a shock for him when I got through to his father. He'll be in mourning now."

"Of course I'll keep an eye on him," Phoenix insisted, then smiled. "He's my son, isn't he?" When Maya glared at him, he just laughed, holding up his hands in surrender. "Hey, c'mon, I'm not going to let my kids be miserable. You know that."

At that, Maya relented with a sigh. "Yeah. You're a pretty amazing dad, Nick."

Phoenix blinked in surprise, resting his hands in his lap. "Uh. Thank you."

Maya blushed, looking away. "Y-y'know, when you want to be," she hurriedly added, blushing harder as she realised her words weren't as insulting as she'd intended.

"Sure," Phoenix replied, hiding a smile. He decided to just take the rare compliment instead of teasing his friend for being unable to turn it into a back-handed one. "Not sure if all of this would have cured Luke's homesickness for England, but knowing what's happened to his parents probably helped a lot. In unexpected ways, too."

The redness in Maya's face slowly faded, and she nodded in agreement. "Oh yeah, it was 'cause he was homesick we kicked all this off, huh? Don't suppose there's really anything more we can do to help, anyway..." She frowned, then looked up at Phoenix curiously. "Did he mention to you what he and his dad talked about? Surely it wasn't all questions for his investigation."

Phoenix couldn't resist a smirk. "Apparently if I don't look after Luke, Mister Triton is going to haunt my nightmares."

Maya snorted in amusement.

"And Luke's going to call me 'Papa' now instead of 'Nick'," Phoenix continued, "so yeah, I gather they talked about quite a lot. You were in there a long time."

"Yeah, it was like an hour or something in the end, wasn't it?" Maya mused, then, after a moment of thought, looked up at Phoenix with a grin. "And Luke's named you after your beanie. Congratulations, old man."

Phoenix shot her a glare, but couldn't hide his smile. "Shut up, Maya."

True to Phoenix's word, he was already gone by the time Apollo and Trucy woke up the next day, having admittedly slept in after their late night the previous evening. Trucy was a little surprised to see her brother making breakfast as she came down the stairs, but otherwise seemed back to her cheerful, although quieter than normal, self, bugging Apollo to make some of the 'special occasion' bacon for her too (ignoring Apollo saying he had already been doing so) and generally annoying him as though he had never moved out.

The Bostonius crew arrived just as the pair had finished breakfast and were cleaning up in the kitchen. Apollo invited them in to sit around the table while he finished up, and wait for Luke's eventual arrival. In the meantime, he chased his sister upstairs to get dressed for their visitors.

"So, what happened last night?" Flora asked, watching Apollo from her chair at the table. "We gave them the address Luke sent us, like you told us to."

"Ooh, yeah!" Emmy cried, a massive grin on her face as she leaned forward on her elbows eagerly. "You three didn't get wrapped up in that murder, did you?"

Apollo dropped his scrubbing brush, and had to scramble to recover it from the soapy water of the sink. "U-uh...!?"

"It was in the news this morning," Sycamore explained, raising an eyebrow. "Rather a big story, I understand. Hadn't you noticed?"

Sighing, Apollo shook his head, returning to cleaning the fry pan. "No, we... we just got up. Didn't get home until one in the morning."

"Goodness!" Flora cried in shock, a hand to her mouth. "It's a good thing we didn't wait for you after all, then."

Alfendi was sitting backwards on his chair next to his sister, arms dangling over the back of the seat as he watched Apollo. "Did you see the dead guy?" he asked, smiling hopefully.

Apollo paused only momentarily in his scrubbing, his focus firmly on the sink in front of him. He could feel his throat tightening, and forced himself to reply despite the strained higher pitch that came out. "Does it matter if I did?"

"What's that supposed to mean?" Alfendi scoffed, arms crossed in disapproval.

Sycamore cleared his throat to attract the boy's attention. "Let's leave that question for another time, shall we?" he said.

"But I want to know!"

Ignoring her brother, Flora gave Apollo a smile. "Did you enjoy the concert, Apollo?"
Apollo was sure to shoot her a thankful look, pulling the frying pan out of the sink to dry it with a dishcloth. "I'm glad I went," he admitted, "for Lamiroir, if nothing else. Could have done without the Gavinners, though."

Loud thudding echoed from the stairs, and Trucy came bouncing down them two steps at a time, her cape flapping behind her. "Polly!" she called, with an audible whine. "You can't say that about the best band in the world!"

"According to who?" Apollo shot back, moving to put the dried frying pan back in its drawer.

As Trucy passed the table, Alfendi held his hand out to grab her cape, stopping the teen in her tracks. "Did you see the dead guy?"

"Alfendi!" Flora hissed, grabbing the boy's shoulder and surprising him into dropping the blue fabric in his hand. "Don't be rude!"

"I'm not!"

At Alfendi's question, Trucy had stopped to stare at him with wide eyes, but she quickly recovered, fixing him with a wide grin. "Of course we saw him! We met everyone backstage!" She leaned forward, her hands folded behind her back. "His name was Mister LeTouse! He was super tall, and he had a cool-looking beard, and his voice was all gravelly and low like a lion!"

Alfendi frowned, disappointed. "Wait, you only saw him before he died?"

Sycamore gave the boy a warning glare. "Alfendi, that's enough about the victim for now."

"Lamiroir's song was really good, though," Trucy continued, bouncing into the kitchen to help Apollo dry the plates. "She's the best, isn't she?"

"Way better than the Gavinners," Apollo agreed with a smile, the two magicians sharing a look.

"I didn't know she could sing in English," Emmy said. "She must have practised a long time for that concert."

Flora tapped her cheek thoughtfully. "If you three were backstage, you got to meet her, right?" She grinned, her hands clasped together. "Is she as nice in person as she seems?"

Apollo chuckled, emptying the sink. "What did we just say? She's the best."

"Uh huh!" Trucy agreed, carrying the plates to a cupboard to put away. "We got to sit down and talk to her in the dressing rooms."

Flora sighed wistfully, leaning on the back of her chair. "Aw, you guys are so lucky!"

As Apollo was drying his hands, he heard a distant door closing, and smiled. "Hold up, Luke's here." He turned and headed to the door, Trucy bouncing at his side, opening it to direct a grin at his brother through the office. "Yo."

Luke laughed, giving his siblings a wave. "Hey." They stepped aside to let him through, but he took his time entering the kitchen, giving them both a worried look. "Are you two okay?"

"Sure we are," Trucy assured him.

"We should be asking you that," Apollo replied. He noticed both he and Trucy were still smiling, and reasoned they weren't both actors for nothing. "You were really upset."
Luke sighed, nodding. "I've had time to calm down. It just hurts that we couldn't stop the inevitable..."

A chair squealed against the floor as Flora stood, watching the Wrights with worry. "Um, I don't want to be rude, but... what exactly happened last night? Why were you three held up at the concert hall for so long?"

Apollo, Luke and Trucy shared a look. "I gather you heard about the murder," Luke said, passing his siblings to approach his friends at the table. Apollo stepped towards Trucy, the pair hanging back at the door, and Trucy took her brother's hand without a word.

"It was all over the news," Emmy admitted with a sheepish smile, standing from her chair. "I had to throw together something at the last minute to send my editor, since I'm the closest she has to the incident; She was calling me all excited the minute the news broke."

"Wow, that fast?" Trucy asked.

Emmy smirked. "I don't think she sleeps."

"Emmy's dubious career aside," Sycamore interrupted, waving off Emmy as she crossed her arms and sent him a dark look, "it does worry me that the three of you were kept around all night. I hope none of you came under suspicion."

Luke shook his head. "We counted more as witnesses than anything," he explained. "With the concert hall locked down, we were even trying to help investigate."

"Not that it helped," Apollo sighed, his free hand on his hip. "Gavin made his arrest and we got kicked out, so that's that."

Emmy frowned, tapping her cheek. After a moment, she smiled knowingly and circled the table towards Luke. "You sure you won't tell us what happened? Just between friends?"

Luke shot her a glare, crossing his arms. "We're not going to be your sources, Emmy."

"Aw, who said anything about sources?" Emmy asked, leaning on Luke's shoulder with a big grin. "I'm just curious, is all!"

"We can't talk about it anyway," Apollo sighed. "We signed a gag order."

Emmy looked over to Apollo in surprise, then pushed away from Luke with a disappointed look. "Well that's no fun."

"Um, Luke?" Trucy spoke up, breaking away from Apollo to bounce towards her other brother, who turned to face her. "Did you notice, last night? Where they found Machi?"

Luke nodded, a stern look on his face. "The lyrics, right?"

"Yeah!" Trucy cried, pulling the lyrics sheet from her bag and holding it up for Luke to see. "'Guitar, guitar, up together to the sky', just like in the song!"

"What's a song got to do with anything?" Alfendi asked, leaning back so far in his seat he was almost lying down, his chin resting on his chest.

Flora glared as she stood behind her brother's chair, and grabbed his shoulders to pull him up into a proper sitting position.
"It's my theory!" Trucy boasted. "All the events of the murder followed the lyrics of the Guitar's Serenade!"

Emmy gasped. "Lamiroir's ballad?"

"But I thought last night was its debut," Flora added, confused. "How'd they know the lyrics?"

"And why follow them in the first place?" Luke pointed out, arms crossed. "There's no reason to do that."

Sycamore shook his head, standing from his chair, and rested a hand on Luke's shoulder with a sympathetic look. "There's little use worrying about it now. As your brother mentioned, you aren't exactly on the investigative team."

"But Lamiroir's song was amazing, wasn't it?" Trucy gushed, hugging the lyrics sheet to her chest. She then giggled, showing it to Emmy nearby. "Mister Gavin and Lamiroir even gave us a copy of the lyrics with their signatures on it!"

"Wow, that's lucky!" Emmy laughed, admiring the paper.

"Really!?" Flora cried, running around excitedly to also get a look at the sheet in Trucy's grip. She sighed wistfully as she gazed at it, hands clasped together. "Oh, I'm so jealous you got to meet her!"

At that, Luke smiled. "Oh, that reminds me," he paused to giggle, "I got talking to Lamiroir last night-"

Emmy scoffed, waving a hand with a smirk. "Don't boast, Luke."

"I'm not!" Luke protested. "Anyway, it turns out she has," he paused, frowning, "um, this personal problem, and she's also been following Professor Layton in Borginia's papers."

Apollo and Trucy shot each other surprised looks, then turned their astonished gazes on Luke.

Sycamore smiled. "So you've put her in touch with him, I take it?"

"Not... quite," Luke admitted, shrugging. "She's only been considering asking for his help, and actually wasn't going to. She didn't want to bother him or something, I suppose." He smiled sheepishly. "I... well, I convinced her to at least meet you four, while you and her are all in the same place. In case she changes her mind."

Flora and Emmy turned to each other, slow grins growing on their faces. Sycamore looked merely surprised. Alfendi cocked his head to one side, confused, and asked, "Wait, who are we meeting?"

"You're going to introduce us to Lamiroir!?" Flora squealed. "Oh, Luke, you're the best!" She pounced on her friend as he broke into laughter, giving him a tight hug.

"She wouldn't be up for an interview, would she?" Emmy asked, smirking.

Apollo and Trucy shot identical glares at her. "No interviews!" Apollo ordered.

"She has enough going on!" Trucy added indignantly.

Emmy jumped, taken aback by the pair's complaints. "Uh, s-sorry, of course not, I was only joking!"
A voice then echoed through the open doorway of the office, accompanied by the gentle closing of the front door: "Hello? Are you there, Herr Wright?"
Everyone shot confused glances at each other as the softly-accented voice drifted through the air, the Wrights’ eyes all wide in shock. Flora was the first to react, running past her friends with a grin as she dashed through into the office; Alfendi was hot on her heels. "Hello!" she replied, and everyone heard her gasp as she came face-to-face with the visitor. "Oh! Mister Gavin! This is an unexpected surprise!"

Apollo felt his heart drop as he watched Luke's gaze snap to the open door, a hardened glare forming on his face.

"Ah, good morning, Fraulein," Klavier cheerily replied, and there was a short pause as they heard him kiss her hand. "I do not believe we've had the pleasure of meeting before."

"Luke-" Apollo started to say in warning, but his brother wasn't listening, pushing past Apollo and out into the office. After shooting each other worried glances, Apollo and Trucy hurried to follow.

"Flora, get away from him!" Luke demanded, and Apollo rounded the door just in time to see Flora jumping back from the prosecutor in surprise, her space by his side swiftly being claimed by Luke, standing protectively in front of her with a furious glare. "How dare you show your face here after what you did last night! You know as well as I do that Machi is innocent!"

Klavier's surprised look hardened. "I believe you made your thoughts on the subject quite clear already, Doktor Wright. Arresting him was tough for me, too."

"Well you didn't exactly show it!" Luke shot back. "How heartless can you be to arrest a child because you can't be bothered to investigate properly!?"

"Luke!" Apollo shouted, finally catching up to his brother and grabbing his arm to pull him back. Behind them, he noticed Flora guiding Alfendi away from the confrontation, back to the relative safety of the area around Phoenix's desk, where Trucy, Emmy and Sycamore had gathered. "Luke, calm down!"

Luke was still seething, his eyes locked on Klavier, but he listened enough to his brother to quieten down. "I can't believe I stood up for you," he spat in the prosecutor's direction, then shook his arm from Apollo's grip and stalked out of the room.

Sycamore sighed. "I'll check on him," he offered, and quickly followed the young vet, closing the door behind him.

Klavier shook his head, the stern look on his face turning to a tired smile. "Your brother would have made a fearsome attorney, Herr Wright," he said, "had he chosen a different path."

Apollo was a little surprised to hear that, but found he had to agree. "Yeah, probably." He doubted it had ever occurred to Luke, though; A career in law had always been Apollo's dream, and he knew his younger brother would never have wanted to step on the elder Wright's toes by doing the same thing. "Why are you here, Prosecutor Gavin?"
Klavier played with his hair, giving Apollo his usual easy-going grin. "I was going to apologise for being so upset last night, but I don't believe Herr Doktor wants to hear it." He shook his head. "No matter. The powers that be have determined their culprit; It is vital that this case be wrapped up swiftly, especially since Lamiroir was invited to this country as an ambassador of goodwill."

Apollo sighed, crossing his arms as he looked away. "I'll pass your apologies on to Luke."

"I am here for more than just that, Herr Forehead," Klavier gently chided him, and held up his other hand to show off a plastic shopping bag Apollo hadn't noticed the man was holding. "The Fraulein Detective wanted to return this to you; She was too busy to make the trip herself."

Warily, Apollo reached out, Klavier moving the bag closer for him to examine, and the young lawyer pulled it open to look inside. "My cape!" he gasped, quickly pulling the mass of red and white fabric from the restrictive plastic. "And my gloves!"

Trucy squealed, racing to Apollo's side to pull at the recovered pieces of his costume, examining them as carefully as her brother was. "You got all the blood out!" she cried in delight, pulling at the red cape in her brother's grip. "And there isn't even any bleaching! How'd you do that!?"

Klavier chuckled, wrapping up the now-empty bag in his hands to shove in a pocket. "You'd have to ask Fraulein Detective, I'm afraid. I had nothing to do with it."

"Thank you so much!" Apollo almost laughed, ecstatic to finally have his costume once again complete. "I don't know how we could have cleaned them ourselves!"

Trucy giggled as she pulled her brother's gloves from his grip, watching him throw his beloved cape around his shoulders and dig around in his pockets for the brooch to pin it on. A cursory glance at the items in her hand turned to a frown, and she promptly brandished the left glove, the one missing the large cuff to accommodate Apollo's bracelet, at Klavier. "Hey, you've damaged this one!"

Klavier looked confused, peering at the glove's displayed palm dotted with tiny rips, then shook his head. "Nein, Fraulein, those cuts were already there."

"What?" Trucy cried. "But how-?" She then noticed Apollo's sudden stillness at her side, his bare hands on the brooch holding his cape on his shoulders. Without a word, she forcefully grabbed his left hand (ignoring Apollo's weak protest of "Hey..."), giving his palm a thorough examination. Five small red marks, in exactly the same pattern and position as the glove... matching the five sharp points of the brooch at his neck. "Polly..."

After a pause, Apollo pulled his hand away, avoiding her eyes. "They're only small cuts," he said, though even he wasn't sure if he meant the glove or his hand. "I'll repair the glove by show-time tonight, don't worry."

"No," Trucy replied, matter-of-factly. "I'll do it." Shooting her brother a quick smile, she headed off to their staircase-drawers by the door, where they kept their smaller stage supplies.

Apollo watched her go with a fond look, then turned to Klavier. "Thanks again. But..." He grimaced. "You're sure Luke's arguments don't have merit? You two haven't exactly gone into detail with each other."

Klavier chuckled, giving Apollo a teasing grin. "Herr Forehead, you of all people should know: The prosecution isn't at liberty to discuss their case... especially with the defence."

Apollo froze. "What... did you just say?"
"This is the final reason I am here today," Klavier continued, reaching into a pocket of his jacket. "You Wrights must have impressed our Borginian pianist last night." He pulled out a form Apollo recognised as a request for defence, which the magician took with shaking hands. "He wants to request your services."

No matter how long Apollo stared at the paper in his hands, immaculately filled out in a hand he suspected wasn't Machi's (the usage of English was a dead giveaway), he still could barely believe the stroke of luck. "Machi wants us...?"

"That's so cool!" Trucy was shrieking, and Apollo suddenly noticed his sister had reappeared by his side, the damaged glove forgotten. "Polly, this is just what we've been waiting for! To find who really did it!"

Before Apollo could reply, Klavier was laughing. "I will wish you luck then," he said, flashing them a grin. "You're going to need it."

Apollo shot the man an unamused glare. "Thanks," he growled, "that means a lot coming from you."

Klavier just laughed off the sarcastic jibe, taking a few steps backwards towards the door. "I hope you got all you wanted out of Lamiroir last night, because I'll be questioning her today," he continued. "I shall see you in court tomorrow, Herr Wright." He paused at the door to shoot a quick wave at Emmy, Alfendi, and Flora, the last of whom was still gazing at him longingly. "Maybe next time, Frauleins. Knabe." With that, he was gone.

Flora sighed wistfully. "Klavier Gavin spoke to me! And he kissed my hand!"

Alfendi mimed throwing up.

"He does that to everyone," Trucy explained with a shrug, and skipped off to resume her mending of Apollo's glove, sitting on the open drawers where she'd been retrieving her sewing kit.

Emmy seemed mildly concerned, approaching Apollo as he folded up Machi's request form to put away in his bag. "Well, congratulations on getting a case," she said, though she sounded unsure.

"Thanks," Apollo replied, watching her curiously. "Is... something the matter, Ms Altava?"

It took Emmy a few moments to reply. "I'm sorry to be blunt, but... How did you get blood on your clothes?" she asked. "There must have been a lot if you couldn't clean it yourself."

Apollo shuffled uncomfortably. Around the room, he noticed Flora snap out of her fawning over Klavier, both her and Alfendi suddenly looking very interested in the conversation (though Alfendi's was more out of excitement than worry). Trucy, although she appeared to be hard at work laying out her supplies to repair the torn glove, had notably slowed in her work, clearly keeping an ear on the conversation herself; After everything that had happened last night, he couldn't blame her for worrying about him. "I..." Apollo hesitantly tried to explain, only to stop and close his eyes in shame. "I found the body." He heard Emmy and Flora gasping, and could only guess at how big the smile on Alfendi's face was. "Only, he wasn't dead yet, he was still alive." He turned his head away so he couldn't see anyone's faces, staring at the floor. "He was bleeding to death. I was just trying to help him."

There was a long pause, the only sounds in the room being Alfendi's quickly muffled attempts to speak up, always cut off by a 'hush' from Flora. "I'm sorry," Emmy eventually said.

"I'm fine," Apollo insisted, then, still avoiding their gazes, headed towards his father's desk. "I'd better get started on the paperwork for the case."

When Sycamore caught up to Luke, he found him in the second bedroom, sitting on the lone, unmade, bed within with his head in his hands and his elbows on his knees. He entered slowly, closing the door behind him and carefully approaching the young man. "Luke?"

There was no response.

Sycamore sighed, then lowered himself onto the bed at Luke's side. "You don't take betrayal of trust very well, do you?"

Luke moved his head, pointing more firmly away from the older man.

"Yes, I know," Sycamore continued, "you're thinking 'who are you to be telling me this, Jean Descole?' You're right, too." He chuckled. "Just look how long it took you to forgive me for that. Eight years, was it?"

Luke didn't reply.

Sycamore was unphased. "Of course, what you don't know is that Jean Descole himself only existed because of a betrayal of trust." He hummed to himself in thought. "As hard as it might be to believe, I too made the mistake of thinking someone I trusted was incorruptible... but that mistake was a lot more tragic for me than for you."

Finally, Luke reacted, raising his head just enough to look Sycamore in the eyes. "What are you talking about?"

"I've told you before about Jean and Chloe, haven't I?" Sycamore replied with a sad smile. "I remember you asking about them after we left Mosinnia."

Luke nodded, slowly sitting up as his hands rested in his lap. "Your wife and daughter."

"Yes, that's them," Sycamore sighed, pushing at his glasses. "I never told you exactly what happened. It was my own fault, really."

"I'm sure it wasn't," Luke said.

Sycamore smiled. "I haven't even told you the story yet." As Luke sheepishly looked away, the man chuckled and crossed his arms. "For the longest time, in addition to my long-term goals of researching the Azran and taking down Targent... I had a rescue mission in mind."

Luke looked up, surprised. "A rescue mission?"

"Targent kidnapped my mother and father right in front of me," Sycamore pointed out. "In addition to avenging the forces that had taken them from me and my brother, I wanted to get them back, if I could. I knew it would take a long time, but I was prepared to wait." He sighed, pushing at his glasses. "Little did I know he wasn't..."
Luke said nothing, waiting for Sycamore to continue.

"I was never planning on romance," Sycamore eventually said. "Inbetween classes, I was meeting with contacts and carrying out small raids on whatever Targent outposts I could locate... always in disguise of course. Even back then I was rather good at those." He paused, the nostalgic smile returning to his face. "Then I met Jean. She rather... forced herself into my life. Helped me in all my goals. Taught me to be bolder with what I wanted." He chuckled. "Always such a fighter. Once my studies finished, the two of us set off together, travelling the country to prevent Targent from keeping track of us. Chloe coming along was a surprise, but not an unwelcome one; We simply found an old farmhouse in the middle of nowhere, a place we hoped could not easily be found." The smile died. "We were so careful... Every time we thought we saw anything out of place, we threw a few belongings and Chloe into the car and set off for a few weeks, until we felt brave enough to scout out the area again, make sure the coast was clear."

Luke frowned in thought. "So... did all those false alarms...?"

"Oh, we were very wary to not let ourselves become complacent," Sycamore assured him. "We even had an agreement: Should one of us return home and find signs of a break-in, we would leave immediately, and wait at an assigned meeting point we'd set up." He sighed, closing his eyes. "I should have followed it. I shouldn't have let..." He shook his head, looking sadly off into the distance. "I'd been out on a grocery run. It was getting dark when I returned, but... I couldn't see any lights on inside. And the front door had been left open."

Luke gasped. "Targent...!?"

"I broke my promise," Sycamore continued. "I couldn't bear the thought of leaving without Jean and Chloe. Even though I knew full well what I might find, I disregarded the danger and went in anyway." When he looked up, it was only to glare at the opposite wall, as though he could still see the scene from his memories in reality. "It was the first time I'd seen him in twenty years... lounging by the fire as though he owned the place."

"Leon Bronev," Luke breathed, eyes wide. "That was how you found out he'd...?"

Sycamore didn't respond for a long moment. "Jean was dead on the floor. She wouldn't stop fighting back, they said, so they shot her until she did. And Chloe..." His glare softened into a sorrowful look. "She was terrified... sitting in front of the fire, tears streaming down her face." He closed his eyes, head bowed. "I didn't know what to think at first... but then he explained what had happened to my mother, made it clear that he had chosen his side... and gave me my choice."

Luke didn't need to guess at what the man's answer had been.

"They weren't very happy to hear my response," Sycamore joked, the smallest smile flickering at the corners of his mouth. "I grabbed Chloe and made a run for it, bullets ricocheting all around us. There was a forest near our cottage, so I ran in there, and kept running until I couldn't run anymore. Thankfully, they didn't follow me." He paused, then sighed again, slipping a hand under his glasses to press against his eyes. "I didn't realise until I'd collapsed that several of those bullets had met their mark: I'd been hit in the shoulder and the leg... and Chloe..." He took a deep breath. "They got Chloe in the head."

Luke gasped. "I'm so sorry..."

"It was a long time ago," Sycamore said, almost emotionless, and took his hand away from his eyes; Even so, Luke could recognise the mask the man had put on in that moment as he stared into space. "I didn't come up with the name or the costume until later, but that was the night Jean Descole was born... a culmination of Jean, Desmond and Chloe, the three lives that had been taken so suddenly, and before their time." He sighed, a slight frown settling in his mouth as he looked to the floor. "To lose Jean and Chloe, and to the one man I still naively trusted as inherently 'good'... it was too large a betrayal to bear."

The room fell into silence, both men deep in thought. Luke fiddled nervously with the end of his shirt sleeve, wondering what, if anything, he could say in response to the sad tale.

Finally, Sycamore turned to Luke with a serious look. "You might think the lesson to learn here is 'never trust anyone and you won't get hurt again', and that's certainly what I took from it at the time. With the exception of Raymond, I never again trusted anyone to do what I wanted them to, what I expected them to do. I let my anger consume me, and you know better than most the destruction that decision caused." He turned away, a thoughtful expression on his face. "But that's a terrible way to live, and it took me so long to learn to trust people again... to leave myself open to that kind of hurt." He smiled. "But, on the rare occasions it does happen... I know how to move past it now. I know it's only because I have friends, and family, that I care for, and that care for me in return. And I know there will always be an apology and a return to normal at the end of it; If there wasn't, they wouldn't be worth caring for in the first place."

Luke looked away, deep in thought. He didn't say anything.

"I'm not saying this 'Klavier Gavin' does or does not deserve forgiveness," Sycamore continued, watching the younger man. "I'm just asking that you be mindful of your emotions. Don't fall into the same traps I did."

Luke didn't reply.

After a short pause, Sycamore stood from the bed. "We'll be waiting for you downstairs when you're ready." With that, he walked to the door, pulling it open again to leave the room.

"Wait!"

Sycamore paused, then turned, noticing Luke had jumped to his feet, staring after the older man with an unreadable expression on his face. "Yes?"

Luke bit his lip a moment, considering his actions, then gathered his confidence and met Sycamore's eyes. "Can I ask... when we were on the Bostonius together... were you planning the whole time to abandon us like that? Once we got the Azran Key?"

It took a few seconds for Sycamore to respond, looking away sadly. "I kept my plan malleable, but I was always intending to go the final stretch alone," he admitted. "My reasons changed, is all."

"Reasons?" Luke repeated, watching curiously.

Sycamore chuckled, smirking at the young vet. "You love asking questions, don't you?" As Luke looked away sheepishly, the man adjusted his glasses with a smile. "I didn't know if I would need Aurora or not, so I never set in stone if I was going to take her, but I didn't want you three trying to stop me while I was busy taking down both Targent and the Azran once and for all. As the days wore on, I got more and more attached to you all... I 'became the mask', you could say, after all the faking of friendship and kindness." He smirked again as Luke raised an eyebrow at that, but quickly reverted to a more neutral expression. "Once we'd reached Targent Headquarters, and Aurora translated those dire warnings on the spire, I knew whatever was coming was going to be very dangerous; I couldn't allow you all to put yourselves in harm's way trying to help me, and I certainly couldn't allow Aurora anywhere near Froenborg... so I took the Key and ran. I hoped revealing myself would convince you not to follow."

Luke nodded, frowning in thought. After a moment, he grinned cheekily, hiding a giggle. "You shouldn't have left us the Bostonius then."

"That was for you all to return to London," Sycamore replied with a smirk. "Besides, given the way you landed it, I was right to think you couldn't fly it very well in the first place."

At that, Luke had to laugh. "I guess so!" he agreed.
When Luke and Sycamore returned to the office, they found the twin sofas had become a hive of activity in their absence, everyone busy with something and a lively conversation going on between the three women, with only occasional interjections by Apollo or Alfendi.

Emmy was the first to notice the new arrivals, in the middle of giving each other confused glances, and she waved to them with a bright smile, pausing all other movement around her as everyone else's attention turned to the pair. "Luke, Desmond! You'll never guess what you two missed!"

Sycamore scoffed, smirking at his friend. "You finally learned the meaning of 'subtlety'?"

Emmy just glared in response. "Ha ha."

"In a moment, Trucy," Luke replied, approaching the group with his eyes on his brother. "Apollo, did you stay in our old room overnight?"

Apollo blinked in surprise, then nodded. "Yeah, it was easier than making the trip back to my place. Why?"

Luke frowned, standing at the end of the sofa with his arms crossed. "You haven't made the bed yet."

Sighing, Apollo rolled his eyes, and turned back to his paperwork spread out on the glass coffee table, pretending he couldn't hear the snickering coming from Flora and Emmy. "I'm sorry, I didn't realise you'd turned into Dad," he snidely replied. "I'll do it later."

It was then Luke's turn to blink in surprise, as he suddenly noticed the cape pinned around Apollo's shoulders, and the two gloves sitting in Trucy's lap with a spool of white thread. "Wait, did you get your cape and gloves back?"

"Yep!" Trucy chirped, giggling. "Mister Gavin was returning them, because Detective Skye was busy!"

"And that's not all he was doing," Apollo picked up, shooting a triumphant smile at his astonished brother, Sycamore watching curiously from behind him. "Guess who Machi's requested to defend him?"

Luke's jaw dropped. "He's hired us!?" He practically leapt into the empty space on the lounge next to his brother, a grin spreading across his face. "We can finish our investigation and find the real murderer!?"

"Yep!" Apollo laughed, gesturing to the paper on the table. "I was just getting a head start on my paperwork before we get going!" He then smirked, turning his arm more towards the young boy curled up in a ball against the armrest of the opposite sofa. "Alfendi's admiring all those photos of the..."
body you got, by the way."

Luke blushed, looking to the boy. "Ah, yes, I forgot about that..."

Alfendi peeked over the top of the tablet in his hands to shoot Luke an excited grin, then returned to idly scrolling through the digital gallery.

Sycamore chuckled as he moved to sit in the space left between his nephew and niece, easy enough to do given the pair's smaller sizes. "Maybe now you'll tell us everything that happened last night? We might be able to help."

"Yeah, I figured we may as well," Apollo admitted with a shrug, then turned back to Luke. "We never got a chance to share what we found when we were separated, anyway."

"Oh, of course!" Luke cried. "I forgot about that!"

Flora leaned forward on her knees, watching the pair expectantly. "So? What happened? Did you guys know about the murder when they cancelled the concert?"

"Polly did!" Trucy chirped, returning to her work of patching up the small rips in Apollo's left glove. "Luke and I were watching the concert. Oh!" She grinned excitedly. "Did we tell you they put us up in a lighting box to watch the concert from way high up!?!"

What started as Trucy happily boasting about their adventures backstage during the concert (and gushing with Flora about the performances themselves) eventually turned into a re-telling of the events of the night, the three Wrights passing the story between themselves to answer questions from their friends or just interrupting each other with forgotten details. Apollo, after enduring some teasing by Trucy for not wanting to endure the third act, paused only momentarily before moving on to how he and Ema had heard the gunshots, and finding the dying LeTouse in the dressing room. He brushed over most of his harrowing few minutes alone with the man before his death, then skipped to meeting Luke and Trucy out in the hallway, and the trio deciding to investigate. Trucy eagerly talked about their examination of the crime scene with Ema, though trailed off when it came to the corpse, leaving Luke to pick it up and describe the smeared writing on the carpet and the key ring found in LeTouse's hand. At the point where the trio separated, the story suddenly became a lot calmer, Apollo and Trucy first talking about their conversation with Klavier and Daryan (Trucy happily boasting about the connection she found between the Guitar's Serenade and the murder), then turning over to Luke for his description of passing the crime scene on to the suspicious detective, and then tracking down Ema to pass on a few additional details he'd come across while alone (although he refused to go into detail until he knew for sure if they were related to the crime or not). When it came to Lamiroir, Apollo and Trucy left the story to Luke, who carefully bypassed everything from his conversation with her but her surprising proficiency with English and the testimony she had given him.

"She told me she'd heard the gunshots," Luke explained, more to Apollo than to everyone else. "She was passing by and heard Mister LeTouse talking to someone she didn't recognise, a young man; She did promise she would recognise the shooter if she heard him again, though."

Apollo was silent, a finger pressed to his forehead in thought.

"But, if she heard those shots," Emmy asked, confused, "why didn't she report it?"

"She was in a bit of a hurry," Luke explained with a smile. "I believe she was also distracted enough that she had been hoping she imagined it."
Trucy frowned. "In a hurry?"

Luke chuckled, and turned back to his brother. "Have you noticed the contradiction yet?"

Apollo didn't answer immediately, deep in thought. "Where was she?" he eventually asked, almost quietly enough that no-one could hear him.

"An excellent question!" Luke laughed. "But the more important one here is... when did she hear them?"

"When?" Sycamore repeated. "Surely that was at the same time as Apollo and this detective, wasn't it?"

Luke shook his head, seeming to take delight in all the confused expressions pointed his way. "That didn't make sense to me," he explained. "She wasn't in the hall with them, and that small window to outside looked very thick; I don't think the sound of voices would have got through it easily, especially not with the speaker in there blaring the music from the concert. The only other place she could have been-"

"The air vent!" Trucy interrupted with a scandalised gasp, then shot her brother a glare. "But you said she's too big to fit through the grate!"

Apollo scoffed, looking up at Trucy with a smirk. "Have you already forgotten all those times we saw a grown man jumping in and out of the air vents in the hallway?"

At that, Trucy dropped into silent thought, returning to her work on Apollo's gloves.

Apollo turned back to Luke, confused. "But if she was in the air vent, that just raises more questions," he pointed out. "Like, how'd a grown man get out of a room with no exits?"

"Exactly," Luke agreed, smiling. "Hence why I decided to ask her when she heard the shots." He paused, grinning excitedly. "Apollo, the murder was during the second act!"

Everyone gasped, looking at Luke with wide eyes. Apollo was the first to recover, muttering "What?" under his breath before jamming a finger against his forehead in thought. "During the Guitar's Serenade... You mean, during her 'teleportation'?"

"Oh!" Trucy cried, dropping the damaged glove as her hands flew to her mouth. "That's why she was...!"

"You can't be serious!" Emmy said, arms crossed. "She was on-stage, singing! How could she have been backstage?"

Flora grinned excitedly. "But she wasn't on-stage for all of her song!" she pointed out gleefully. "She disappeared, and then she was behind us! That's why she was 'in a hurry'!"

"Precisely!" Luke proudly agreed, and turned to his siblings. "She was under contract with the magician behind the illusion not to discuss it, so I told her you two were magicians and might already know anything else we might need relating to it."

Now it was Apollo and Trucy's turn to grin with pride, shooting each other a look. "Naturally," Apollo replied. "We even met said magician while you were talking to her."
"Really?" Flora asked in surprise.

Sycamore smirked. "The 'grown man' you saw dropping in and out of air vents, I assume."

"That's him!" Trucy boasted, puffing out her chest. "My Uncle Valant, from before Daddy adopted us!"

Flora and Sycamore looked confused, but Emmy grinned knowingly. "Ah, Valant Gramarye. I was reading about him while doing research for this review I'm writing about you two."

"Oh, how's it going?" Apollo asked, a hopeful look on his face.

"Wait 'til I've finished it," Emmy reminded him with a smirk, which quickly turned into a thoughtful frown. "Regardless, it's interesting to hear that 'teleportation' trick was his; He seems like such a boastful character to me, and I've not heard a peep of any kind of announcement regarding that trick."

"Huh, that's a good point," Apollo agreed, arms crossed. "Why wouldn't he be boasting about that illusion?"

Trucy shrugged. "We can ask him when he comes to visit today."

"If he comes by today," Apollo corrected her. "He's probably avoiding the public eye after the murder... and they might want him at the Coliseum, or for questioning."

"He was planning to visit?" Luke repeated, still a little shocked and confused. "That guy you made me dress up as one Halloween?"

"Ooh, yeah, I forgot about that!" Trucy chirped, grinning. "You'll definitely like him, Luke! Uncle Valant uses a lot of animals in his acts!"

Luke very carefully stayed silent, looking away uncomfortably.

"Actually, that raises another question," Apollo interrupted, looking confused. "If Lamiroir gave Gavin the same testimony she gave you, Luke..."

"Exactly," Luke replied, crossing his arms with a glare. "Machi was on that stage during the murder, playing piano in front of hundreds of people... not to mention, Mister LeTouse said himself he 'didn't know' who had shot him. It's impossible for Machi to be the murderer, yet Gavin still arrested him."

Apollo grimaced. "Well, at least now I know why you went off on him so badly last night... and just now."

Luke turned his glare off to the side, still clearly fuming internally over the injustice.

"Now that's a betrayal indeed," Sycamore muttered sympathetically, watching the young vet.

Finally, Trucy finished her repair work of Apollo's glove, and Apollo himself finished his paperwork. With their stories of the previous night all told, there was only one thing left to do:

"Investigate!" Trucy proudly announced.

Flora gasped in excitement. "Oh, can we help? It's been so long since I last got to investigate a case!"

"I don't see why not," Apollo agreed, pulling on his gloves and giving Emmy and Sycamore a smile. "Did you two want to join us too?"

"Of course!" Emmy immediately replied, sharing an eager grin with Flora. "It'd actually be really cool to see how you guys carry out an investigation!"

Sycamore smiled. "It certainly sounds interesting," he agreed, then turned to the young boy at his side, squeezed into the space between the armrest and his uncle. "What about you, Alfendi?"

The boy looked up from the tablet computer in his hands, already deep in thought - It appeared he'd been listening to the ongoing conversation as much as everyone else. "I dunno," he said. "What are we doing?"

Apollo shrugged. "Well, we pretty much exhausted any actual looking around last night, and I don't think there's anyone left to question... except Machi, of course."

"But Machi doesn't speak English," Luke pointed out. "Unless someone here speaks Borginian, we can't exactly communicate with him."

"Ooh, we might be able to help there!" Emmy replied, elbowing Sycamore as she turned to him with a smile. "We went to Borginia once, remember?"

Sycamore sighed. "How could I forget? They wouldn't let us leave until they'd searched the Bostonius up and down to ensure we weren't carrying undeclared goods..."

"I don't think I remember enough of it myself, but we still have the phrasebook we got somewhere!" Emmy continued, brushing off her friend’s complaints. "It could help you talk to Machi!"

"That sounds great!" Apollo cried with a laugh of relief. "Thanks, Ms Altava!"

"No problem!" Emmy replied, getting to her feet. "Let's go, huh?"

Flora and the Wrights took her movement as a cue to also stand; Sycamore and Alfendi, however, stayed seated, Alfendi watching everyone intently. Apollo was quick to scoop up his papers to put away in his bag, and approached the boy with an apologetic smile. "Sorry, but I'm going to need my computer back to investigate."
Although Alfendi groaned in resistance, he reluctantly gave up the device, watching it disappear into Apollo's bag. He then frowned to himself, and looked up at the young lawyer with a grin. "Are you going to look at the body again?"

Apollo chuckled. "Sorry, no. Even if we were, the police wouldn't let you guys on the scene, I'm sure."

"Wait, that reminds me!" Luke spoke up from behind his brother, attracting everyone's attention in the rush of their preparations to leave. "When we were looking around the crime scene last night, Detective Skye - Ema - had a few things she needed time to look into. We should try and find her to follow up on those."

"That's a good point," Apollo agreed.

"So we're going back to the Coliseum?" Trucy asked.

Apollo shrugged. "Guess so, if she's there."

"I wanna go to the crime scene!" Alfendi demanded, jumping to his feet with a determined look.

"But we need to go back to the Bostonius first, Alfendi," Sycamore pointed out.

Emmy thought a moment. "Well, there's no reason for all of us to go. We'd be better off splitting up."

"I'll go with Apollo and Luke!" Flora immediately called, giving the two young men a hopeful grin. Luke promptly broke into laughter.

Apollo crossed his arms, frowning in thought. "So that's me, Luke, Flora and Alfendi heading to the Coliseum?"

"I'll go with Emmy, if you don't mind, Flora," Sycamore decided, getting to his feet. "I'm almost certain that phrasebook we're after is in my study. I'd rather search for it myself."

"Excellent!" Emmy cried, grinning. "I knew you'd agree to help, Desmond." She gave him a teasing wink, which he scoffed at, hiding his smile.

Trucy looked thoughtful for a few moments, but eventually turned to her brothers with a smile. "So, how are we getting to Sunshine Coliseum, then?"

July 8, 11:15AM
Sunshine Coliseum

It was a bit of a squeeze, but the three Wrights and two Laytons all managed to fit neatly into Luke's car, and drove the half hour to the concert hall that had served as the previous night's crime scene, waving goodbye to Emmy and Sycamore as the pair headed off to the train station to return to the Bostonius. Before they'd left, Trucy had insisted on writing a small note, just in case Valant came by while they were away, asking he return later, and she taped it to the door with a grin before running after her brothers to jump in the car.

"It looks so different in the daylight," Flora remarked as they came into sight of the massive building. She paused and sniffed, looking confused. "Is that the sea I can smell?"
"Sunshine Harbor's not far from here," Apollo told her, and pointed behind them, across the nearby road. "And Rising Sun Park is over there; They're all named after each other."

Luke giggled. "When this is all over, maybe I could take you guys up Grand Tower, to see it all from above!"

"That sounds nice!" Flora agreed.

Despite the cancellation of any events, and even of the tour itself, all the billboards and posters were still hanging around the area, proudly boasting of the Gavinners' presence and of the concert hall itself. A small blimp, the same brilliant purple as Klavier's jacket, circled above, the giant silver 'G' of the band's logo reflecting the sun's light onto the grass below. A series of balloons, attached to ads for the nearby Prime Mall, floated above the entrance doors where they were tethered, leaving brightly-coloured shadows on the crowds gathered below.

"Crowds...?" Apollo muttered to himself in surprise. "Why are there crowds here!?"

"Maybe they're lining up early for the next performance!" Trucy suggested.

"The next performance has been cancelled," Luke pointed out. "I think it's more likely they're angry customers wanting refunds, or just wanting to know what's going on."

Flora gestured to the nearby merch tables, still set up under their purple marquees. "They look a bit overwhelmed there, too."

Alfendi's attention, meanwhile, was taken by a figure in a blue costume, strolling around the flower display nearby with a bunch of balloons in their grip. "Why is PC Badger here?"

"PC what?" Apollo asked, shooting the boy a confused look.

"That's the Blue Badger, Alfendi," Trucy explained with a knowing grin. "He's the police mascot!"

"No, that's PC Badger!" Alfendi protested with a glare. "Why's he in a different costume?"

Flora held up a hand to keep the two elder Wrights from again trying to correct the boy. "No, Alfendi's right; Back in London, that's PC Badger, the mascot of the Metropolitan Police. He normally has a truncheon and a police helmet, though."

Luke nodded. "I was sure I'd mentioned PC Badger in the past. Didn't Papa say he originated here?"

Trucy thought a moment. "Oh yeah, you did say that."

Apollo just sighed, shaking his head. "Who cares about the badger anyway? We need to find a way around those crowds to see if Ema's here."

"But why is he here!?" Alfendi whined, tugging on Flora's arm where she had his hand in a determined grip.

"He's selling balloons!" Trucy explained, pointing to the mascot as Apollo groaned in exasperation. "Probably raising money for the police. Your PC Badger - he'll be the Blue Badger's cousin, I'll bet - does that over in London, doesn't he?"

Alfendi frowned in thought. "He came to my school once. I have a toy of him at home."

"Well there you go!" Trucy chirped as though Alfendi's remark had answered her question.
Flora gave her brother a smile. "Were you wanting a balloon?"

Apollo bit back another sigh. "If you're getting one, be quick," he told the young woman. "If you guys don't mind, I'm going to try and find someone in this crowd who can help us today." With that, he sped up towards the Coliseum.

Alfendi shifted back and forth a moment, then looked up at his sister with a sheepish smile. "Can I have a balloon, please?"

"Can I have one too?" Trucy immediately asked Luke with a wide grin. "It's been a long time since I last got a balloon!"

Luke laughed. "You can buy one yourself, can't you?" he pointed out, glancing after Apollo to keep an eye on his location.

"Oh yeah," Trucy realised, then beckoned for the Laytons to follow her. "C'mon, let's get some balloons!"

"Catch up to Apollo and me when you're done, okay?" Luke called after her, jogging to follow his brother. "Text us if you can't see us!"

"We will!" Trucy promised, waving at her brother before turning back to their visitors. "Now where were we?"

Alfendi giggled, pulling out of Flora's grip and grabbing Trucy's hand instead, dragging her towards the Blue Badger. "Balloons!"

Apollo and Luke took long enough finding an officer on guard who would listen to them that Flora, Trucy and Alfendi had long caught up to them, the latter two proudly carrying their helium-filled balloons in hand (although Flora had tied Alfendi's around his wrist, just to be sure he couldn't lose it). Just as they had the night before, the officer guided them through the nearby fencing and around to the back door, where they were instructed to wait while their guide ran to fetch Ema.

"Will the detective let us see the body?" Alfendi asked hopefully, shaking his arm up and down to make his balloon dance in the air above him.

"I don't think so," Luke told him. "They've probably moved Mister LeTouse out by now to do the autopsy."

Flora turned to Trucy. "What's your detective friend like?" she asked. "All the inspectors I've met back home tend to be either grumpy or... not exactly the smartest, to put it nicely."

"Don't worry, Ema's very smart," Trucy assured her. "She was gonna be a forensic investigator, so she's always using science to find leads and stuff. And she's friends with Daddy, too!"

"Oh, that sounds nice," Flora replied, smiling. "It must be wonderful to be able to work with friends!"

Trucy snorted. "And Polly likes her because she doesn't like Mister Gavin!" she whispered conspiratorially.

As the pair descended into giggles, Apollo raised an eyebrow at them. "Did I just hear my name back there?"

Any kind of reply the two might have given was interrupted by the door the group was waiting by finally opening, a young woman in a labcoat emerging with a blink as she stumbled in the bright sunlight. "Argh, who turned on the lights out here!?" she complained, holding up a hand to shade her eyes.

"That's the sun," Alfendi pointed out, arms crossed. "I thought you were s'posed to be smart!"

"She was joking, Alfendi," Luke assured him.

Ema huffed, deciding to ignore the boy as she turned her attention to Apollo and Luke. "So, whaddaya need?"

"I take it you heard Machi hired me, right?" Apollo asked.

"The fop mentioned it," Ema admitted, then pointed to the magician's cape with a smile. "He gave you your clothes like I asked him to?"

"Yes, thank you!" Apollo gushed, brushing at the left side of the cape, where the worst of the staining had been. "We never would have been able to get them looking this great again; I can't thank you enough!"

Ema waved off his thanks, though couldn't hide her proud grin. "Aw, it was nothing. Those cleaners owed me one anyway."

"How'd you manage to get the blood out?" Trucy asked. "I always end up bleaching stuff removing stains."

"It's a very fascinating process actually!" Ema began to explain. "As I understand it-

"I'm very sorry to interrupt," Luke cut in with an apologetic look, "but we really do need to hear about those leads we couldn't chase up last night. You remember, the writing on the floor and the fragments under the sofa?"

Ema and Trucy were clearly annoyed to break off their conversation (even Flora looked upset at the detective being cut off), but Ema dragged her attention back to Luke anyway. "Oh, yeah, those." She rested a hand on her hip, back into her idle frown. "That writing turned out to be some kind of ID number once we got it under the luminol. One of the other detectives is following it up."

"An ID number?" Apollo repeated. "Like, belonging to the murderer?"

Ema paused, avoiding eye contact. "We can't say anything for sure until we've identified it," she said.

Apollo decided to take that as a 'yes'... a 'yes' that the prosecution was never going to admit. He made a mental note to follow it up again in court.

The detective then waved a hand at Luke. "Those fragments of yours, though? There's not a scrap of evidence they were connected to the murder, I'm sorry to say."

Luke glared at her in response. "They are," he said. "They must be, or nothing else about the true events of this murder makes sense! Just tell me if you've identified them."

Ema sighed. "They had traces of explosives, so they were probably firecrackers of some kind," she admitted. "That device we found with them is still being identified, but it's all on the backburner unless we get proof it was connected to the murder."

Apollo saw his brother biting his lip, hands curled into fists; Luke was visibly restraining himself from giving Ema a similar talking-to to the one he'd given Klavier earlier that day.

"Excuse me?" came a quiet voice from around Apollo's waist level, and everyone looked down to see Alfendi approaching Ema with a hopeful smile, his purple balloon held tight in his hands. "Do you still have the body in there?"

To everyone's surprise, Ema seemed to take the question in her stride, shaking her head as she gave the six-year-old an apologetic look. "Sorry, kiddo. The victim's body was removed early this morning."

Flora nodded, hoping her brother would pick up on her unspoken request to leave his questioning there. "That's right Alfendi, just like Luke said. Now why don't you co-"

"But why'd you do that?" Alfendi continued, tilting his head curiously as he watched Ema.

"For a lot of reasons," Ema seemed happy to explain. "We have to do an autopsy, and it's kinda disrespectful to let a dead body just lie around for longer than it needs to. We also need to finish up with it as soon as we can so we can release it back to his family, and in this case they're all the way over in Europe, so it's more important than usual we be quick."

Alfendi thought a moment, then nodded. "Okay."

Grinning, Ema leaned forward a little, closer to Alfendi's level. "You planning on being a coroner when you grow up?"

"A korr-nor?" the boy asked, frowning in confusion.

"A coroner," Ema repeated. "They work with dead bodies, prepare autopsies, that sort of thing."

Alfendi didn't reply, deep in thought. A moment later, his balloon slipped out of his grip, bumping against the boy's head and sending him jumping back in surprise as the purple ball of air floated back up to the full length of its string, anchored securely to Alfendi's wrist.

Everyone hid laughter at the sight, though only Ema spoke: "Ah, I'm sure you'll figure it out," she assured the boy, straightening back up. "You've got a long time to think about it, after all."

Alfendi blushed in embarrassment, rubbing at his nose where the balloon had brushed against it and rushing to his sister's side, gripping her hand tightly.

Luke looked away. He didn't respond.

"Thank you anyway," Apollo spoke up, "even if it's just for letting us on the crime scene last night. You've been a lot of help."

Ema made a show of blowing off his praise, but was clearly touched. "P'shaw. Anything for a friend."

Apollo gave her a smile and was moving to leave when Trucy jumped forward, giving Ema a hopeful look and she chirped, "Oh, before we go, what was it you were saying earlier about removing bloodstains?"

Flora also broke into a grin, stepping forward to join Trucy. "Oh yes, that sounded very interesting!"

Sighing, Apollo crossed his arms. "Seriously? How often are any of us going to be in a position where knowing how to remove bloodstains would be useful?"

The three women rounded on Apollo with unamused glares. None of them said a word.

Apollo looked between the three in growing confusion. "What?"

Luke wordlessly dropped his face into a hand. "Oh, Apollo..." He moved to his brother's side, gently guiding him away from the door. "Why don't we just let them talk alone."

"What!?" Apollo objected, though not as strongly in his growing confusion. "Why!??"

"Alfendi, why don't you come with us for a while?" Luke continued, gesturing to the boy.

After some prompting from Flora, Alfendi finally released his sister's hand and ran to Luke, gripping his instead.
"Call us when you're done, Trucy," Luke added over his shoulder as the three men got slowly further away, Apollo still demanding answers behind him.

"We will!" Trucy promised, waving her brothers off with a grin.

"Honestly Apollo, I'm ashamed of you," Luke gently teased as he led his brother and Alfendi back across the arena out of the front of the Coliseum. "One day you're more than likely going to end up sharing a home with a woman, and you're going to scare her away with your complete ignorance."

Apollo ignored his brother, his face almost as bright a red as his cape; It hadn't taken long as they strode away from the girls for the sheer embarrassment to hit him as he slowly realised what everyone else had been talking about. He kept his gaze straight ahead, a stern glare indicating he didn't want to talk right now.

"Remember that girl who used to hang around the arcade when we were kids? The blonde in glasses you had a crush on?" Luke continued, pretending to think harder than he actually was. "You spoke to her once and then she avoided us for months. Is that what happened with her?"

"I didn't have a crush on her," Apollo quietly insisted, crossing his arms. "You and Clay decided I did. And she wouldn't have started avoiding us if you hadn't pushed me into talking to her."

Luke just smiled. "You never would have spoken to her at all if we hadn't intervened," he pointed out.

"That would have been a preferable outcome," Apollo snapped.

"And if you'd spoken to her again instead of just moping and hiding," Luke continued, ignoring his brother's embarrassed anger, "you might have gotten to know her."

Apollo looked away. Tell me, does it ever get tiring being so damn right all the time? he snidely wondered.

Alfendi watched the conversation curiously from Luke's side, his purple balloon bouncing along above his head. "Um, Luke? I have a question."

To Apollo's relief, Luke finally turned his attention away from his brother, to the boy still clinging to his hand. "What is it, Alfendi?"

Alfendi screwed up his face for a moment or two. "What... were they talking about?" he asked. "It was just getting out bloodstains, right? Why'd we have to leave? Why's it such a big deal?"

Apollo sighed, pressing a hand to his face. "Just make this even more awkward, why don't you."

"It's only awkward for you," Luke said in a matter-of-fact tone, then turned back to Alfendi with a friendly smile. "I'm afraid it's an extremely complicated explanation in full, so are you alright with a simplified version, Alfendi?"

Alfendi thought a moment, then nodded.

"Okay then," Luke replied, and paused to think for a few moments. "It's something that happens to girls when they grow up," he eventually explained. "Girls have an organ boys don't, that sits in their belly and has an opening between their legs. When they get older, it stops about once a month and bleeds for a few days."
"Wow, cool!" Alfendi cried, looking excited. "Does that really happen!?!"

"Is this seriously happening?" Apollo muttered darkly into his hand.

Luke chuckled, giving Alfendi a nod. "Yep. Naturally, it's very easy to get bloodstains in things, so Flora and Trucy wanted to hear how Ema's friends cleaned them up so well."

Alfendi thought over Luke's words for a few moments. "So, only girls get to do the cool bleeding thing?" he asked. "That's not fair..."

At that, Luke hid a snort of laughter. "Depending on the girl, they might disagree with you there..."

"If I was a girl, I'd take off my trousers and pants and run all over the place!" the boy continued boastfully. "I'd leave blood everywhere, like... like a serial killer! O-or a caveman dragging a dead animal behind him!"

Apollo rolled his eyes, shooting his brother a look. "Now look what you've done. He's not going to shut up about this for days."

Luke just laughed. "Let him have his fun, Apollo. This is a fact of life he'd have to learn sooner or later."

"Speaking of," Apollo replied, eyes narrowed, "how come you know so much about this?"

"Have you forgotten I happen to share an apartment with the owner of a uterus?" Luke pointed out, a mischievous grin on his face. When Apollo only sighed in response, he laughed and added, "Not to mention, you'd moved out before Trucy's first period. I was the only other person home at the time when it hit, so I had to go and get her some pads and help clean up."

Apollo shook his head, crossing his arms as he tried not to feel grateful for that. "Forget I asked."

"I very quickly realised that day that there's no point in being awkward about it," Luke continued insistently, giving his brother a serious look. "It's a fact of life that fifty percent of the population has to live with. Just accept it, Apollo."

As Apollo quietly stewed to himself, Alfendi happily skipped at Luke's side, still happily fantasising aloud about trails of blood.

Turnabout Serenade, Day 1: Part 4

We finally found the phrasebook! Turned out it WASN'T in Desmonds study, he just forgot it had ended up with me, so we had to pull a few things apart to find where I put it after we left. And of course Desmond complained the whole time about why we still had it because our trip to Borginia was such a nightmare in the end so we were never planning on going back, but it's obviously proven useful so I told him to shut it.

I'm glad you found it! Tho to be honest I'm not sure if it WILL turn out to be useful - it is a 'tourist' phrasebook, yes? .

Yeah? Why?

So it won't exactly have any way for us to ask him "what happened during the murder", or to translate whatever he says in return.

... Crap.

Why didn't you say anything before, Luke!?

Everyone seemed to think it could help, and you looked eager to dig it out. It might still be useful, just not for questioning Machi.

I still can't believe you didn't say anything! What happened to being a gentleman huh?

I WAS being a gentlemen. Like I said, the phrasebook could still be useful. Anyway, we'll probably be heading back from the Coliseum soon. We'll see you at the office, Emmy.

Yeah yeah, whatever :P

Apollo paced nervously around the room as he flipped through the phrasebook Emmy had handed him the moment he stepped out of Luke's car downstairs. "Greetings, shops, restaurants..." He shook his head. "No, there's not much it looks like we could use..."

Emmy sighed, sinking into the sofa and resting her head in her hands.

"At least we can say 'hello' to him now!" Trucy pointed out, giving everyone a bright smile. "That would cheer Machi up, wouldn't it?"

"That's true," Flora agreed. "He's separated from anyone else who speaks Borginian... even a 'hello' would probably mean the world to him."

Sycamore pressed a hand to his chin in thought. "Are... we sure he doesn't understand English?"

"Of course he doesn't," Apollo replied, still flipping through the book. "Lamiroir said so."
The man opened his mouth to reply, but evidently decided it wasn't worth it, closing his mouth again with a shake of the head.

Emmy looked up to shoot Sycamore a glare. "Go ahead Desmond, tell me how I wasted everyone's time getting that book and how we should have thrown it out anyway. I know you're dying to."

"No I'm not, as a matter of fact," Sycamore sternly replied. "I was actually thinking that there remained the possibility this boy had learned to read English on the internet or something, until a moment ago when I remembered he is blind, so it's entirely impossible. Regardless, although Flora and Trucy have a point that he may appreciate someone taking the trouble to at least greet him in his native tongue, that might be overshadowed if we are unable to communicate anything else at the same time."

At Sycamore's mention of Machi's 'blindness', Apollo and Luke shot each other a look, while Trucy casually turned to face the ceiling. Without ever discussing it, they had mutually decided to keep Lamiroir's blindness to themselves, which necessitated Machi's ability to see also being kept secret; None of them were willing to break Lamiroir's or Machi's trust by spreading the truth of the pair's arrangement around needlessly.

Emmy just sighed, returning to a slump in her seat. "I hope you guys got something useful from your detective friend at least..."

Apollo turned to Luke. "I'm not sure we did, actually..."

Luke reluctantly nodded, arms crossed. "I don't think she's been told all the details of this case... but at least she's agreeing to continue the investigation."

"She wouldn't let us look at the body!" Alfendi complained, throwing himself dramatically across the back of a sofa from behind it. "She said it had been moved!"

"We told you before we left we wouldn't be seeing it," Apollo pointed out with an amused smile.

Alfendi just huffed and ignored him.

There was a very long pause as everyone mused over the conversation so far. Finally, Trucy broke the silence, sitting on the arm of the sofa nearest Emmy and looking up at Apollo with a frown. "So, what do we do now?"

Apollo sighed. "I don't think there's anything we can do," he admitted. "We'll just have to wait until the trial tomorrow."

"That sucks," Alfendi muttered.

"You don't have to go if you don't want to," Sycamore pointed out to the boy with a smirk. "If sitting through all the talking isn't worth the possibility of seeing more photos of the murder-"

Alfendi interrupted his uncle with a gasp, his head snapping to attention. "They might show the body!?"

"It is a murder trial," Flora reasoned. "They'll be talking about how he died."

"I wanna go!" Alfendi decided, grinning widely.

Sycamore chuckled. "If you insist."
Emmy finally sat up from her moping, looking between the three Wrights. "So I guess our plans for tomorrow are set in stone then; We'll come and cheer you on."

Apollo started as he suddenly remembered something, shooting a glance to the computer on his father's desk. "That reminds me, I have friends who'll be interested in hearing I have a case..."

"Did you tell them about the concert?" Trucy asked. "Or we had friends visiting?"

"None of your business," Apollo joked, and, with his sister giggling in reply, he then turned to his brother. "By the way, I know this kinda goes without saying, but... With Dad busy again, you'll assist me in court, won't you, Luke?"

Luke gave his brother a smile and a nod. "Of course I will. You can always count on me to help, Apollo."

"Thanks," Apollo replied with a grateful smile, trying not to sound as relieved as he felt; He didn't want Luke to concern himself over Apollo's brief, paranoid worry that he'd get a 'no' as an answer.

"So, are we not going to visit Machi?" Flora asked, a worried frown on her face. "I thought we'd agreed..."

Apollo sighed, shaking his head. "There's not much of a point," he explained. "'Hello' isn't a conversation, and it's all we can say to him. I think we're better off leaving him be."

No-one could think of a good reply to his argument.

steeljusticelover "Apollo", 07/08/2026 01:12:32PM

So remember how I said I had friends visiting? And most of us were going to that Gavinners concert? And now there’s been a murder there? Yeah. I'm defending that case.

(PS Oh yeah, there isn't anyone here who's available and speaks Borginian, is there? I know it's a long shot, but...)

Precious-Fairy "Pearly", 07/08/2026 02:32:48PM

APOLLO WHY DID YOU NOT TELL ME OR MYSTIC MAYA WE WERE VERY WORRIED ABOUT YOU!!!!!!

steeljusticelover "Apollo", 07/08/2026 02:47:64PM

I'M SORRY OKAY I'LL TEXT HER NOW
I didn't know you guys had heard about the murder, okay? And why didn't you call me if you were so worried!??
BlackbirdLuck "Maggey", 07/08/2026 03:10:41PM
Congrats on another case... and you've got a high-profile one this time, too. How'd you nab that? :) (sorry, never even heard of Borginia before today)

Thunderdome "Max", 07/08/2026 03:21:34PM
Wow, I was just reading about that case... and I have tomorrow off, so I might drop by and watch it after all. Good luck, Apollo. I hadn't heard of Borginia before today either. Sorry.

Precious-Fairy "Pearly", 07/08/2026 03:43:64PM
YOU KNOW FULL WELL WE HEARD ABOUT THAT MURDER!!! AND OF COURSE WE DIDN'T CALL YOU, YOU WERE ASLEEP!!!

steeljusticelover "Apollo", 07/08/2026 03:54:28PM
ACTUALLY Pearly, I had no idea you knew about it because Luke texted you last night. He only just told me he did that while I was trying to appease your demands for irl contact. SIGH ...
Thanks for worrying about us though. We're all fine. Thanks Maggey and Max. I guess it's time I admit, what I failed to mention about those tickets Gavin sent us... they were backstage passes. We met the defendant (and the victim...) before the murder, and did some investigation while we were stuck there. It's a good thing Machi did decide to go for me as his attorney, considering. And it's fine, I know it was a long shot anyone would know Borginian...

CelestialImpacts "Adrian", 07/08/2026 04:40:11PM
Congratulations on the case and good luck, Apollo. I have to say, this one looks difficult. You're gonna have the eyes of an international community on you for this. That shouldn't be a problem for a performer like you though, right? :) No Borginian here, but I think Franziska is rather decent with it... and if she wasn't currently back in Germany, that would be helpful. Sorry. :(

BlackbirdLuck "Maggey", 07/08/2026 04:59:82PM
Wow, backstage passes? I guess Gavin's taken a liking to you for some reason. You're a very lucky kid, Apollo. :)

steeljusticelover "Apollo", 07/08/2026 05:27:56PM
Maggey: Ha ha. I'm so flattered this enemy of my family is wanting to make friends and got me involved in a murder. :/
Adrian: Thanks... I think. I could do without the added pressure. And don't worry about the Borginian thing, I'm sure we'll get by.
Aw, I know you'll do just fine. :) Take it from your Auntie Adrian.

You know full well only Trucy calls you that. Thanks, though.
"Did you see Dad last night?"

Trucy nodded, following her brothers into the empty lobby. "I told him about your case. He said he was sorry he couldn't stick around to talk to you about it."

Apollo sighed, tightly crossing his arms and resisting the urge to pace. "Yeah, I am too, honestly..." He'd felt like a bundle of nerves since they'd been forced to put their investigation on hold the previous day, and, although they had enjoyed themselves taking the planned quiet day for Luke to tell some of his stories, the shadow of the stalled case had hung over all of them. In the evening, their visitors had returned to the Bostonius, having agreed to be in court to watch Apollo's trial. Apollo and Luke had stuck around longer to keep Trucy company, but eventually bid her goodnight and returned to their own homes; With Phoenix busy on his own investigation, Apollo had decided not to bother him with a message over the phone, leaving it to Trucy to pass on the news if their father happened to drop by before heading off to the Borscht Bowl Club for work. Now it was the next morning, and Luke had given Trucy a lift in his car to the courthouse, where they met up with Apollo at the front doors, the three of them walking in together without a word.

"Will you be okay, Apollo?" Luke asked, watching his brother in concern. "Did you want to do some Chords of Steel?"

Apollo shook his head. "Better not. I already did a session with Clay this morning, before he left for the Space Center."

Luke smiled at the mention of their friend. "How'd he take your news?"

"The usual," Apollo replied with a shrug. "Congratulated me, wished me luck... was unreasonably glad he couldn't get off work to support me in person."

Trucy was looking thoughtful, taking a small step towards her elder brother. "Polly? Did you tell Daddy about... about Mommy?"

Apollo frowned in confusion, noticing out of the corner of his eye that Luke was rapidly looking between his siblings with a surprised look. "No... But..." He sighed, shrugging apologetically. "I did ask him if he'd ever looked into Lamiroir on one of his secret investigations. He seemed genuinely thrown, so I think we can trust that he had as much of an idea of who she was as we did."

Trucy looked down, mutely reaching for her eldest brother's hand.

Apollo gave his sister a comforting squeeze. "Why do you ask?"

After a moment, Trucy explained, "He asked me last night... about the concert, and the murder, and then... about Lamiroir." She pressed a gloved hand to her nose, hiding a sniff. "I didn't tell him anything. I just said I was tired and went to bed."
Luke nodded knowingly. "He probably suspects something's going on after Apollo mentioned her," he pointed out, then stepped forward to rest a hand on his sister's shoulder. "Don't worry, Trucy. We'll wrap this case up in no time, then you and Apollo can decide if you want to tell him... And, if Papa works it out on his own, you can trust him not to push you about it; He's just worried because he can tell you two are upset, and he doesn't know why."

Apollo winced; He hadn't realised before now that Phoenix would surely have seen those 'Psyche-Locks' of his indicating both Apollo and Trucy were hiding something from him. "Should I have told him?" he quietly wondered aloud.

"The night of the concert?" Luke replied. "Apollo, I saw how much that shocked you both. You needed some time to process it." He then turned to Trucy. "And it's understandable you didn't want to tell him without Apollo with you, Trucy. This is a matter that means everything to you both, so, if you tell Papa, you should be doing it together. I'll even help if you want me to."

Trucy nodded, but didn't reply.

Apollo thought for a long moment, clutching his sister's hand tightly in his. "Gavin should have brought her here to testify," he said. "I wonder where he's put her?" He left unsaid his worry that Klavier still did not know about Lamiroir's blindness.

At that, Trucy finally seemed to perk back up, a determined look on her face. "She'll be in the lobby next to us, won't she?"

Luke nodded. "Should be," he agreed. "He may move her to the smaller one neighbouring the courtroom itself for the trial, if he's intending to call her."

Trucy thought over Luke's words for several seconds in silence. "Right then." Dropping her grip on Apollo's hand, she dashed away from her brothers and back out into the hallway.

"Truce?" Apollo called. He and Luke shot confused glances at each other before running after their sister, out of the lobby.

They found Trucy standing in front of the doors to Lobby One, hands bunched into fists at her chest and sending a determined glare at the doorknobs. She didn't react to her brothers approaching her, standing guard with perfect stillness as she watched for movement.

"Truce?" Apollo asked again. "What are you doing?"

Trucy didn't reply. After a few moments, just as Apollo was considering asking again, the door she was staring at suddenly moved, sending the brothers scuttling back while Trucy only moved her gaze upwards, where she could meet the eyes of the man currently leaving the room.

Klavier jolted as he registered the girl in his path, stopping in the doorway and staring down at Trucy in surprise. "Fraulein...?"

"Have you been looking after her?" Trucy demanded.

The man only frowned in confusion for several moments, before he finally remembered. "Lamiroir, you mean?"

Trucy nodded, her stern glare refusing to fade.

Klavier relaxed, chuckling as he ran a hand through his hair. "Fraulein, you insult me. Naturally I made sure she was taken care of."
"Okay Truce, you've asked your question," Apollo interrupted, waving for his sister to move out of Klavier's way. "Shouldn't you be heading to the gallery now?"

Trucy just ignored her brother. "And she's in the courthouse, right?" she asked.

Klavier laughed again, then stepped to one side. "Maybe you'd like to ask her yourself, Fraulein?" Behind him, stepping forward somewhat gingerly, was Lamiroir, still dressed in her white dress and blue cloak from the night of the concert.

Trucy's face erupted into a bright grin, and she jumped forward to grab the woman's hand. "Hi, Lamiroir! Are you doing okay on your own?"

Lamiroir smiled behind her veil, looking in the direction of Trucy's voice. "I am surviving," she replied. "Were you worried about me?"

Apollo tried not to visibly wince. 'Oh, if only you knew...'

"Of course we were worried," Trucy quickly replied, her grin frozen on her face. "Do you have someone to show you around the courthouse? It's real easy to get lost around here if you don't know the way."

As he realised what his sister was truly angling at, Apollo sent a fearful glance to Klavier. He found the prosecutor watching Trucy with a vaguely suspicious look.

Lamiroir thought for a moment, then nodded, her smile warm. "That would be lovely." She looked up towards the door. "If Mister Gavin does not mind, of course."

Klavier's suspicious look vanished in an instant, waving to the woman with a confident grin. "Ah, I do not mind. Just be sure to not wander off with your witness, ja Fraulein?"

Trucy scoffed, giving the prosecutor an offended glare. "Obviously not." She turned back to Lamiroir with a wide grin, gently beginning to lead her out into the hallway. "The courtroom's this way, Lamiroir; Just follow me!"

Lamiroir only nodded with a grateful smile, walking where Trucy's hand pulled her with the kind of confidence only a blind woman who was used to faking sight could show. As they left the hallway, Trucy could be heard already happily chatting away with the older woman about the weather.

Klavier chuckled as the door clicked shut behind the pair. "People will begin to wonder if Lamiroir is incapable of walking without a teenager at her side..."

Apollo rolled his eyes but kept silent; He still didn't know after all if Klavier was aware of the woman's blindness or not.

"Don't think we didn't notice your choice of words just now," Luke instead picked up, having stood so silently behind his brother before now that Apollo almost jumped at the reminder he was there, spinning around to see the younger Wright glaring daggers at Klavier. "'Our' witness? You're so dead-set on keeping the truth quiet that you're going to discredit the only person who could identify the murderer."

Klavier's easy-going smile vanished. "Don't be so quick to assume my version of events isn't the truth, Doktor Wright."

"Considering who the most likely candidates are," Luke shot back, "I have every reason to assume you're covering for them."
Apollo recognised the flash of hot anger in Klavier's eyes, and stepped between the two, one hand on Luke's shoulder and the other held up towards the prosecutor in a silent signal to stop. "Okay, that's enough about the case," he ordered. "Let's save it for court, huh?" Klavier huffed and looked away, but didn't argue, so Apollo then turned his attention fully to Luke, who was still glaring intensely at the other man. "Luke, if you won't be able to control yourself during the trial, maybe you'd be better off in the gallery with the others," he quietly pointed out. "I can handle a trial alone."

Luke gaze snapped to his brother, and he didn't bother being quiet as he replied, pushing Apollo's hand off his shoulder. "I am perfectly capable of keeping calm. There is no way you can talk me out of supporting you; Isn't it you who's always talking about what happened the last time Gavin faced one of us alone?"

Klavier grunted from behind Apollo. "Low blow, Doktor..."

"You were right all along," Luke continued, apparently ignoring that the other man was even there. "That's what you wanted to hear, isn't it? You were right not to trust him and I was a fool to give him a chance." His voice slightly wavered, enough to make the vet stop talking for a moment, looking down. "Let's just get to the courtroom." With that, he pushed past his brother and left the hallway.

Apollo turned to watch Luke leave, unable to keep a worried frown off his face.

"Yes, I did want to be right about Gavin... but not like this. Not because he stabbed you in the back."

After a long pause, Klavier cleared his throat, surprising Apollo as he was reminded the man was there; The prosecutor looked around awkwardly, shuffling towards the door out of the hallway. "Your brother isn't wrong about one thing, Herr Wright... We should be getting to the courtroom."

Apollo sighed and nodded. "Sure."

July 9, 9:57AM
District Court
Courtroom No. 3

Apollo found Luke standing stock-still behind the defence bench, arms crossed and eyes glaring at a barely-visible knot in the wood. Not wanting to upset his brother further, Apollo busied himself pulling out his Court Record, connecting the computer to the wireless network of the courtroom... but, as he watched the spinning circle of the loading screen, his worry won out, and he looked over to Luke. "Will you be okay?"

Luke blinked, his angry look fading as he met Apollo's eyes. After a moment, he smiled. "I'll be alright," he assured him. "I have to be. After all, we're doing this for Machi... and, if you think about it a certain way, he's a member of your family, right?"

Apollo paused, frowning in thought: Machi was Lamiroir's adopted son, wasn't he? "Huh. I guess so." He shot Luke a smirk. "I wonder if he'll be as much of a pain as my other younger brother?"

Luke snorted, pressing a hand to his face to stifle his laughter, though he couldn't hide his grin.

Opposite them, Klavier was also settling into his post behind the prosecutor's bench, patiently waiting for the trial to start. A bailiff wandered in with Machi at his side, leading the supposedly-blind boy through into the small waiting room on the defence's side; Apollo was reminded that Trucy had probably done the same thing for Lamiroir earlier, and hoped they were doing okay together in the prosecution's mirroring room.

The usual bustle of the gallery calmed, and Apollo looked up to see the judge taking his seat on top of the podium at the head of the room. Gripping his gavel in hand, he slammed it on his desk until silence fell. "Court is now in session for..." He paused, squinting at some papers in front of him. "How do I say that?"

The judge nodded, getting back to business. "Right, his trial. Court is in session!"

Apollo stood firm behind his bench. "The defence is ready, Your Honour."

"The prosecution is A-okay, Herr Judge," Klavier added, hands in his pockets.

The trial had begun.

View the Court Record
The judge hummed in thought, then turned to Klavier. "Prosecutor Gavin."

Klavier looked up. "Ah, my opening statement, ja?"

"No, no, actually," the judge replied, drawing surprised looks from everyone in the room. "There was something else I wanted to ask you about."

The prosecutor looked a little lost at that, and Apollo couldn't blame him. "Yes?"

"Say you're going to visit someone in the hospital with an incurable disease," the judge continued, fingers drumming on his desk nervously. "What do you say to them?"

"Eh?" Klavier muttered, eyes wide in confusion.

The judge apparently hadn't noticed how uncomfortable the prosecutor was with the subject. "I mean, you wouldn't say 'get well soon', right? You'd only be kicking them when they're down..."

Apollo decided to try and 'rescue' the increasingly-lost Klavier, turning to the judge with a sheepish smile. "Um, what are you talking about?"

Snapping out of his train of thought, the judge cleared his throat. "Actually, I'm going to visit someone who is terminally ill," he explained, "right after this trial. The Chief Justice's son."

Luke considered for a moment, then gave the judge a serious look. "Your Honour, in my experience, people always appreciate honesty," he said. "Especially those who are dying... and very especially children. I would suggest, rather than something 'moving' and ultimately distant, to just be frank and say what's on your mind." He paused, then quickly added, "Without making it about yourself, of course."

The judge thought Luke's words over. "Just be frank... Hm. Solid advice, young man." He shot Luke a quick smile, then turned to Klavier. "In any case, I'm a bit busy today, so let's wrap this up quickly. Prosecutor Gavin, your opening statement, briefly!"

Klavier grinned. "You're in luck, Herr Judge. I believe you'll be going on your hospital visit sooner than you think." He directed his last comment more at the Wrights than the judge, almost teasing them.

Apollo instinctively grabbed Luke's arm to keep his brother from shouting something he'd regret.

"First, to review the victim in this case," Klavier continued, turning to his own Court Record to activate the holograms around the courtroom, which soon displayed a passport photo of a familiar looking man with a brown beard and receding hair. "Romein LeTouse, age thirty-five. The global manager for diva songstress Lamiroir." With a swipe of his hand, the passport photo was swapped out for what looked like an autopsy report. "The cause of death: blood loss due to being shot by a large calibre revolver." He waved a manilla folder that had been resting on his bench. "This report has all the details."

The judge nodded. "The court accepts this into evidence."

Luke immediately went to Apollo's Court Record, bringing up the autopsy report as it downloaded. Apollo gave it a quick enough glance to assure himself it didn't have anything drastically different to what they expected it to say.

Up on his podium, the judge was similarly poring over the document. "Forty-five calibre... That's quite large, isn't it?" he mused aloud. "A direct hit from that could knock a man off his feet."

"However, the bullet struck him in his shoulder," Klavier explained, bringing up on the holograms a photo of LeTouse, lying dead on the carpet. "The damage to his body was slight... death was not immediate. Sadly, his blood loss was such that he could not be saved."

Apollo felt a wave of guilt wash over him, LeTouse's final moments flashing in front of his eyes as he stared at the photo on the holograms.

The judge hummed in thought. "I suppose the victim's condition could have been much worse, considering."

Klavier nodded. "Two shots were fired," he continued. "One shot missed, the other penetrated and passed through the victim's shoulder. Both bullets were found in the wall at the scene." He flicked his hand against his tablet computer, and the photo was replaced with a diagram, which Apollo quickly recognised as a birds-eye view of the dressing room, complete with a white outline marking LeTouse's body where it had fallen. "Observe the diagram: This is where the bullets hit." Two red crosses flashed on the screen, on the wall next to the door where the bullet holes had been.

"I see," the judge said. "The court accepts this evidence."

Apollo noticed the photo and diagram downloading on his Court Record, but didn't bother looking at them; He'd seen enough of LeTouse's corpse.

"If we're talking about a forty-five calibre revolver," the judge mused, "we must assume that the killer was adept at the weapon's use."

"That makes sense," Luke quietly muttered at Apollo's side, his hand on his chin. "Ema said it would have broken the arm of someone who wasn't."

Klavier snapped his fingers to attract attention, and carried on with his explanation: "The victim was shot backstage, in a dressing room. This dressing room has only one entrance: this door." The triangle shape of the door on the diagram flashed red briefly.

"That does seem to be the case, yes," the judge agreed.

"However," Klavier continued, "there were witnesses who heard the gunshots." Apollo noticed him briefly gesture across the room, towards the defence bench. "Yet when the witnesses entered the room, it was empty, save for the victim's body of course."

The judge's eyes widened in surprise. "B-but that's... That's impossible!"
"Exactly," Klavier replied, nodding, and shut down the holograms. "This murder was impossible... for all but one person."

Apollo could hear Luke starting to growl under his breath, and grabbed his brother's shoulder, shooting him a warning look. The shock of the touch was enough to silence Luke, but his glare at Klavier didn't let up.

"That is, of course, the defendant," Klavier continued. "Machi Tobaye."

The judge pulled at his beard thoughtfully. "Only this defendant could have committed the crime?" he asked. "But how?"

"It's quite simple," Klavier assured him with a confident smirk. "The circumstances of the crime scene make it clear."

"Very well," the judge replied with a nod. "I assume you have testimony to back up this claim. Let the witness please take the stand!"

Klavier snapped his fingers at the bailiffs, one of whom quickly darted out of the room.

Apollo took his chance as the gallery muttered to themselves to turn to his brother, releasing his grip on Luke's arm. "I know, I know, he's already swaying the judge to his side with his lies, but getting upset now isn't going to help," he hissed. "We have to wait for the cross-examination before we can prove his arguments are wrong."

Luke sighed, giving his brother a hurried nod. "I know that... It just makes my blood boil, looking at him so confidently brushing off Lamiroir's testimony to declare Machi guilty."

He shot another glare at the prosecutor opposite, then returned his attention to Apollo with an earnest look. "But don't worry about me; I'm fine."

Apollo stared back for a few moments, before giving his brother a small smile.

The gallery quietened, and the Wright brothers looked up to see Ema arriving at the witness stand, her usual stern frown on her face.

Klavier shot her one of his usual charming smiles. "Your name and profession, please."

Ema didn't even glance at him. "Ema Skye, I'm a detective for the police department. I was on security detail at the concert forum that night."

'She seems... tired, somehow,' Apollo noticed, frowning in concern for his friend.

"Security at the concert, you day?" the judge repeated, surprised.

"Some security I was," Ema sighed, her eyes on the floor. "Couldn't even stop a murder..."

Apollo winced in empathy; It hadn't ever occurred to him until now that she was likely harbouring the same guilt as he was over LeTouse's death.

"Now, don't blame yourself!" the judge insisted in concern, waving a hand as if to pat her shoulder. "Things like this happen! I've made even bigger mistakes in my career, you know!"

Klavier shook his head. "In any case, because you were on security detail, the crime was quickly discovered, and we were able to identify the killer."
Ema didn't respond, deep in thought.

"You may give the court your testimony, if you would," Klavier continued, waving a hand. "Describe the circumstances of that day, and your discovery of the crime, please."

After a short pause, Ema sighed, looking up. "Alright." She took a moment to pull herself together, then stood confidently behind the stand, back to business. "The night of the murder, I was on security backstage, at Prosecutor Gavin's request," she explained. "Only people involved with the concert in some way were allowed backstage. At the beginning of the third set... I heard shots. I went into the room, filled with blaring rock music, and found the body. I examined the scene and determined that only the defendant could have done it."

Apollo heard Luke darkly muttering to himself, arms crossed.

The judge hummed in thought. "It was lucky that a detective was the first on the scene," he muttered. After another moment's consideration, he then nodded to Apollo. "Very well, the defence may begin the cross-examination."

Apollo nodded back, then turned to Ema. 'May as well get the one burning question I never really got to ask out now...' "The night of the murder was the night of the concert, yes?"

"That's right," Ema replied.

"What was a detective doing on security detail, might I ask?" he added. "If it was only a concert?"

Ema huffed, rolling her eyes. "My thoughts exactly. But, orders are orders. Even when they come from rock gods." She shot a glare at the prosecutor's bench.

Apollo also turned to the man opposite, raising an eyebrow inquisitively. "Prosecutor Gavin?"

Klavier grinned. "Yes, allow me to explain." He leaned on his bench, looking far more serious than the situation really called for. "I smelled something that day, you might say. The stench... of conspiracy. That day, at the concert hall."

Apollo resisted the urge to sigh. "Conspiracy," he muttered in a deadpan, crossing his arms.

"Isn't it obvious!?!" Klavier cried. "My keys! That whole morning, no, the whole day was ruined! And it's all because someone stole my keys!" He began to count off on his fingers. "I couldn't ride my hog to the show, I couldn't open my guitar case-!

'There he goes again.' "I still think it's possible you simply misplaced them," Apollo interrupted.

"Misplaced them!?!" Klavier repeated, sounding horrified. "Misplaced items don't just wander into a murder victim's hand on their own!"

"What's this?!" the judge cried in shock, staring at Klavier. "Prosecutor Gavin, if your keys were in the victim's hand... that makes you a prime suspect!"

Klavier only chuckled, calming from his earlier theatrics in the blink of an eye as he closed his eyes, snapping his fingers rhythmically. "Love, slow-acting and new. Atroquinine... is waiting for you," he softly sang.

Apollo resisted the urge to sigh, muttering to his brother, "Does everything with this guy have to be so over-the-top?"
"The killing happened in the middle of my concert," Klavier explained to the judge. "I was... like a sailor, adrift on a sea of sound. Anyway," he shook his head, "I didn't want anything else stolen, so I put the detective with the most time on their hands on the task."

The judge thought a moment, the nodded. "I see. I can accept that."

"Well, I can't!" Ema cried, glaring at the prosecutor. "What do you mean 'time on their hands'!?!"

"Please," the judge interrupted, waving a hand at the detective. "The cross-examination."

View the Court Record
Apollo ran his eyes over Ema's testimony on the screen of his Court Record. What to ask her about next? He could think of two things, and the first had only come to mind because of Luke's comments on the night, a detail he wouldn't have thought important otherwise. "At the time we heard the shots," he said, "I believe we were chatting, weren't we?"

Ema scoffed. "You were chatting," she insisted. "I was eating Snackoos." She pulled out a bag of said food from her purse, popping it open to toss a handful in her mouth.

"Hey!" the judge cried, offended. "No snacking in court!"

Ema ignored him, looking away as she continued to munch on the chocolate sticks.

Klavier looked across at Apollo with a lazy grin. "And you're sure the shots came from Lamiroir's room?"

Apollo narrowed his eyes. "Obviously." It would be ludicrous to claim otherwise, after all.

"Hey, I'm the one being cross-examined here!" Ema protested, then reached into her purse and pulled out a second bag, which she tossed at the defence bench. "Here, this'll keep you quiet!"

Luke caught the bag with surprise, fumbling not to accidentally drop it over the front of the wooden desk. He shot his brother a confused look, but Apollo just grinned, taking the bag. "Thanks!" the elder brother called to Ema, popping the bag open to grab one for himself; He had to admit, he'd been curious as to their appeal for a while now. At first bite, they just seemed like normal chocolate over a biscuit stick, but chewing them proved to be tastier and more enjoyable than he expected... not that he'd go to the same extremes as Ema for something as seemingly generic as this. Shrugging, he tossed another Snackoo in his mouth and offered the bag to Luke, turning back to the witness stand. "So," he asked around his food, "how about it, Ema?"

Ema had resumed her own snacking, nodding in agreement. "We were right there," she said, slightly muffled with the Snackoos in her mouth. "Hard to be mistaken about that."

The judge shot them both a glare, gripping his gavel. "Please, either talk, or eat. Not both at the same time!"

Luke, having been meekly trying one of the chocolate treats himself, sheepishly took the bag from his brother, carefully closing the plastic zipper and hiding the rolled-up package away in his satchel.

Ema scoffed, but finished her chewing and put her own bag away again, looking oddly triumphant. "Right, so," she continued the moment her mouth was clear, "after that, me and Mister Lawyer there opened the dressing room door to the blaring rock music."

"Er, when you say 'rock'," the judge interrupted, looking confused, "are you referring perhaps to this 'rock 'n' roll' music that's so popular these days?"
Apollo raised an eyebrow. 'Where've you been for the past fifty years?'

Ema apparently decided to ignore the question, rolling her eyes. "They pipe sound from the stage into the backstage through speakers," she explained. "That way, people in the back can hear when they're supposed to be on stage."

'Huh, that's clever,' Apollo mused. 'We don't have anything that fancy in the Wonder Bar. But...' He shot a glare at Klavier. "Did it have to be so loud?"

Klavier brushed at his fringe, grinning. "You don't listen to the Gavinners with your ears," he said. "You feel it with your entire body and soul! I always have the backstage monitors at full volume."

'And my damaged hearing sure is grateful for that,' Apollo resisted the urge to snap in response. 'It's a miracle I heard Mister LeTouse's last words at all with that racket overhead...'

"When we walked in the room," Ema picked up, "the band was playing 'Guilty Love' I believe, making it easy to determine the time of the crime."

The judge hummed in thought. "If you could hear that music playing..."

"Then everyone on stage for that song has an alibi," Klavier pointed out. "Including myself."

Apollo heard Luke darkly muttering to himself again.

"Anyway," Ema continued, "I closed off the scene and started my investigation. It's beyond obvious there's only one person who could have done it."

"Objection!" came a sudden shout from Apollo's right, where Luke was angrily pounding a fist against the desk. "How! How could Machi have possibly committed this murder, Detective!? Why don't you outline your clearly flawed logic to the court!?"

"Objection!" Klavier shot back, throwing out a hand to point at the young vet. "Before you call someone else's logic flawed, maybe you should take a look at your own, Doktor Wright!"

"Hey!" Ema cried, pulling out her bag of Snackos again to furiously toss some of the sticks at the prosecutor. "Stay out of this! I can fight my own battles!"

Klavier softly scoffed, playing with his fringe as he stepped back from the conversation without a word. With his free hand, he activated the holograms again, displaying the diagram of the crime scene.

Her protests said, Ema shoved the bag of food back into her purse, rounding on Luke. "Listen," she said, pointing at the holograms, "we know there was only one exit from the room: that door. The small window only opened a tiny crack. And I was standing right in front of that door! So, how could the killer have fled the scene?" She crossed her arms. "There's only one possibility: the air vent."

The judge blinked in surprise. "Ah..."

"Objection!" Luke shouted again. "So just because Machi was the only person backstage small enough to fit through that vent, that automatically makes him capable of firing that revolver without breaking his arm!?" He slammed his fist on the desk again. "You yourself said whoever fired it must have been experienced with guns! How can you not see the flaws in your own argument!?"

"And who says the defendant isn't experienced with guns?" Ema replied, leaning forward on the stand. "Besides, the fact that he missed at such close range is enough of a signature that the shooter was blind!"

"Blind!?" Luke repeated, indignant. "You think he's blind!? A better argument would have been that he missed because he was too small to fight the kickback of the gun; at least then you would be making sense!"

Ema stared nonplussed at Luke for a moment or two. "Are you implying he's not blind?" she realised. "What are you saying? Of course he's blind!"

Luke stood stiffly for a moment before throwing his hands in the air with a wordless cry of rage, turning away from the courtroom. "You talk to her!" he snapped at Apollo.

Apollo bit his lip to keep calm in the face of his brother's righteous anger; Luke could be scary when he got mad. A second later, he turned to Ema. "So you say he missed because he was blind. Is that all the evidence you have?"

Ema shrugged, looking a lot calmer now she wasn't dealing with Luke anymore. "There is one other vital piece of evidence," she explained. "Marks were found on the air vent grill. Traces that it had been recently opened."

Apollo blinked in surprise. 'Wait, really?'

"And on top of that, the defendant's fingerprints," Ema continued. "They were very clear."

The gallery began to murmur amongst themselves.

Apollo sighed. On its own, that certainly sounded like decisive evidence... and it didn't help that apparently Machi had been using that air vent as the prosecution claimed. Taking a deep breath, he banged his fists on the bench to silence the crowd, then gave the woman at the witness stand an even stare. "Is that it?"

Ema raised an eyebrow. "Excuse me?"

"Is that all your evidence incriminating Machi?"

The detective crossed her arms, giving Apollo a withering look. "If you're going to ask how he knew about the vents, everyone backstage that day knew they were scheduled for maintenance; You remember that stepladder below the air vent on the scene, don't you?"

Apollo shook his head. "I wasn't going to ask about that, but thanks for clarifying." He turned to his Court Record, flipping through his photos of the scene. "If your main point is that the shooter was blind, you appear to have looked over some very vital evidence that proves you wrong without a doubt."

Ema blinked, surprised. "What?"

With a flick of his wrist, Apollo decided to bring up the same photo Klavier had submitted earlier, just to rub the detail in further. "I distinctly remember us talking about it on the night actually. Do you not remember?"

The judge leaned forward, studying the holograms. "The photograph of the crime scene...?"

"Yes, Your Honour, the crime scene," Apollo agreed. With a swipe of his finger, he highlighted the smeared carpet at LeTouse's right hand. "Specifically, this."
Ema frowned, confused. "The smeared blood stains? We got a match for that ID number, if you-"

"As interested as I am to hear you have a match," Apollo interrupted, "that's not specifically what I was referring to." He pointed up at the holograms above them. "These stains were smeared, Ema. What does that tell you?"

Ema paused, deep in thought.

The judge suddenly broke the silence with a gasp. "Ah, I thought it was just my blurry vision! But it really is blurry!"

Apollo sighed, then decided to spell out the problem. "When Mister LeTouse was shot, he wrote an ID number with his own blood. We agree on this, right?" It struck him only as he said it how strange it was that the man had supposedly had the time to do so between the bangs he'd heard and his and Ema's arrival at the scene, but he stowed that thought away for later.

Ema nodded, watching Apollo curiously. "It's certainly a logical conclusion."

"Then how did it get smeared?" Apollo pointed out. "Mister LeTouse had no reason to, and it certainly wasn't you or me. Who does that leave? Who was trying to rub out what he was writing?"

"Oh!" the judge cried, looking proud of himself. "It was the killer! Ha, naturally, if I were a killer, I certainly wouldn't want to leave something so incriminating behind!"

Klavier nodded, smiling lazily as he continued to watch the proceedings. "Neither would I."

Ema shrugged. "I guess that makes sense. With it being an ID number, the killer wouldn't have recognised its true purpose when he saw it. Of course he'd try to-" She cut herself off, her eyes slowly widening. "Wait..."

The judge's eyes also widened. "When he 'saw' it?" he repeated.

Apollo nodded. "Exactly. You claim it could only have been Machi because of his blindness," he pointed dramatically at the holograms, "but the crime scene itself contradicts you! If there is one claim you cannot make about this case, it is that the killer was blind!"

"Ack!" Ema cried, jumping back in shock as the gallery erupted into chaos. "I-impossible!"

"Order! Order!" the judge shouted, banging his gavel. "Order!" As the audience quietened, he turned to Klavier with a surprised look. "P-Prosecutor Gavin! Please explain to me what all this means!"

Klavier didn't respond, standing still behind his bench with his eyes closed.

"I mean," the judge continued, gesturing to the holograms, "looking at this photo, it seems quite clear that the shooter could see! Yet, up until now..."

Finally Klavier reacted, grinning and opening his eyes. "It seems I owe the court an apology." He brushed at his fringe. "The Gavinners are a band with law enforcement ties, yet a murder occurred during our concert! Apparently, this caused some confusion over jurisdiction. As a result, some reports were not filed in an entirely timely manner."

Apollo noticed Ema's shocked look slowly fade into a glare as she stared at the man. He couldn't blame her. At his side, he noticed Luke finally rejoining him, not saying a word as he also shot daggers across the room.

Klavier chuckled. "I've got an idea." He dramatically pointed to the sky. "Let's rock!" After a short pause, he then held up a file on his bench with a teasing grin. "With these documents. But before that." He dropped the file back down (making Apollo wonder what the whole point of his little display was), and turned to Ema, hands in his pockets. "I have a question for the Fraulein Detective. If I may?"

"Wh-what?" Ema asked, understandably nervous.

"Tell me," Klavier continued, still grinning almost cheekily. "Why do you think that Machi Tobaye is blind?"

Ema blinked in surprise, casting glances over at Luke; Apollo suspected she was finally putting two and two together. "H-he's... the blind pianist, right?" she asked, actually beginning to look scared. "So... So he's... Doesn't Lamiroir lead him around by the hand all the time?"

Klavier held up the file he'd been teasing them with before. "I have a report here on the defendant, Machi Tobaye," he explained. "According to this, Machi Tobaye... can see perfectly well. His blindness was merely a publicity ploy by those clever Borginians."

Ema stared at him for a long moment, then nervously flicked her gaze over to the Wrights opposite. "Y-you two... You knew he wasn't blind!" she pointed out. "Why didn't you say anything!?"

Apollo looked away, not wanting to admit in front of their audience he'd been trying for a while now; He knew for sure saying so would just embarrass their friend further.

Luke shrugged, giving her an apologetic look. "We should apologise," he said. "We thought you already knew."
"Regardless," Apollo spoke up, directing a glare at Klavier, "the prosecution’s entire argument hinged on Machi being blind, did it not? I’d say this new fact—"

Klavier’s chuckling interrupted Apollo’s pronouncement. "Herr Forehead, not once in the course of this trial have I claimed the defendant was blind," he said. "The only one who did was Fraulein Detective."

Luke shot the prosecutor a scowl. "And you threw her under the bus for what, entertainment?" He gestured towards the witness stand. "A gentleman would apologise."

Klavier laughed, giving Ema a small wave. "Oh, sorry," he called, ignoring Ema's glares as he turned back to the court at large. "Consider however: Machi Tobaye sees. And he was the only one who could have fled through the air vent. I see no problems with this."

"But what about the bullet holes in the wall?" Ema asked, gesturing angrily to the holograms, apparently forgetting they no longer displayed the diagram she was thinking of.

"Yes, the bullet holes," Klavier repeated with a nod. "I believe Herr Doktor neatly explained those for us: He didn't miss because he couldn't see; it was the kickback from the forty-five calibre revolver. A simple accident, in other words."

"You... you jerk!" Ema sputtered, slapping her hands on the witness stand. "Luke's right, did you just have me in here for comic relief!?"

The judge cleared his throat, giving Ema a stern look. "If we can please end the bickering. Now."

Ema gritted her teeth, looking ready to shout right back at him, but the judge was already tapping his gavel on its stand. "The prosecution has a rather convincing case: The only way in and out of the crime scene was watched, making the defendant the only one who could possibly leave the scene, regardless of whether or not he was truly blind. Simple and decisive."

Apollo groaned. At his side, he could see Luke making great efforts to bite his lip and not shout something out-of-turn.

"I believe we've heard enough to determine our verdict," the judge continued. "Even if I wasn't in a hurry to make a hospital visit."

"Wait!" Ema cried, gripping the top of the witness stand tightly enough that her knuckles had turned white. "I'm not leaving! I can't leave like this! I'll come up with some clue to solving this case if it kills me!"

The judge looked down at her in surprise, almost dropping his gavel. "But your testimony has already given us enough to convict the defendant," he pointed out.

Ema thought a moment. "Ah! Ah ha!" With a grin, she pointed up at the photo on the holograms. "This blood stain... I never got around to telling you what it said!"

"Oh, right!" Apollo cried with a smile. "It was an ID number, wasn't it?"

"You bet!" Ema proudly replied, a hand at the glasses on top of her head. "And we got it matched up yesterday! Turns out... it belonged to an agent of Interpol."

"Interpol!?" the judge repeated, shocked. "Are you saying the murderer was an agent of the international police!?"

Ema shook her head, her grin fading. "Well, we thought it might be... We sent the ID number over, and they told us the name of the agent it belonged to." Her gaze turned up to the holograms, still displaying the photo of the body at the scene. "It was Romein LeTouse."

As the judge sputtered in shock, Klavier nodded. "Turns out he was undercover, in the middle of a secret operation," he explained. "He was trying to tell us his own identity, and a cautious killer tried to stop him."

"And that revolver he was shot with," Ema continued, "the murder weapon; that was also Mister LeTouse's. He had a permit to carry firearms, and the registration number on the gun matched."

Luke hummed in thought, stroking his goatee. "It wasn't what I was expecting to hear, but that does all make sense. Now we know where the murder weapon came from."

'Surely this is relevant to the case,' Apollo mused. 'But how?'

The judge shook his head. "As interesting as all this is, I fail to see how exactly it's relevant."

"As far as we can tell, it isn't," Klavier replied. "We have yet to hear back from Interpol on what our victim's mission was that brought him undercover as Lamiroir's manager." He then grinned, playing with his hair again. "Hence why I did not feel the need to bring it up... although we can certainly dig the defence's grave deeper with more evidence incriminating the defendant."

Luke slammed his fist on the desk. "If you are referring to that nonsense theory regarding the lyrics!"

"A theory your own sister came up with, if I remember correctly?" Klavier interrupted with a teasing grin. "She won't be pleased to hear you say that."

Crossing his arms, Luke sighed. "Trucy is perfectly capable of letting go of theories once they've been proven wrong, and this one has."

Klavier smirked as he stared at Luke. "Well, I would be most interested in hearing how you've worked that out."

Apollo rolled his eyes. A part of him hoped Klavier genuinely didn't know, and didn't have some kind of plan prepared for what they hoped to prove.

"Theory?" the judge asked, looking between the two. "What theory?"

"I'm sure you noticed," Klavier said, looking up to the podium, "the unusual circumstances of the defendant's arrest?"

The judge thought a moment, then nodded. "That did catch my eye in the report, yes."

Klavier grinned, looking proud of himself, and turned to Ema. "Perhaps you can tie it all together for us with another testimony, Fraulein Detective. How all the strange events of that day lead us to the killer."

Ema rolled her eyes, but didn't protest, sighing as she straightened behind the witness stand. "No one in this country had a motive to kill the victim," she explained. "We believe Machi co-ordinated the thefts, the arson, and the murder to match Lamiroir's song."

"Lamiroir's... song?" the judge repeated, confused.

"Yes, the Guitar's Serenade," Klavier replied, grinning. "It contained a certain 'code' our murderer decided to follow." He snapped his fingers, then reached into his pocket to pull out his key ring. "First, the keys my 'heart' held on to so tightly were stolen."

"Then his guitar burst into flames on stage," Apollo picked up. "Mister LeTouse's life was taken by a bullet."

Klavier put his keys away, a smug smile on his face. "The rest hardly needs explanation. 'Guitar, guitar, up together to the sky'. He probably would have stolen the body itself if it weren't under constant surveillance, so instead he made do with his own."

"Leading to his unusual arrest," the judge finished, tugging his beard in thought. "But that's... mad! It's like a story out of some fairy tale! I've heard of jumping rope to songs, and counting to songs... but killing?"

Luke shivered, talking so quietly only Apollo could hear him: "Please don't compare this to a 'fairy tale', Your Honour..."

Klavier just shrugged, still looking smug. "It's a wild world out there, Herr Judge."

The judge seemed to accept that with a nod. "Very well. We've heard one song and dance; Let's get on to the next: the cross-examination!"

Apollo sighed, and turned towards Ema. 'If I have to... Court's not much of an appropriate stage for singing and dancing, though.' "We've just learned Mister LeTouse was an agent of Interpol, right?" he pointed out. "How can you just rule out no-one in this country having a motive? He spoke English! Surely he's been to an English-speaking country before!"

"We did look into that," Ema replied. "He'd never been to America at least before coming here as Lamiroir's manager; He may have learned English on his own."

"As for his status as an agent," Klavier picked up, "we still do not know what he was investigating. It certainly doesn't seem relevant, in any case."

Apollo rolled his eyes. 'Great...'

"You see?" Klavier continued with a grin at the Wrights. "No one here had a motive to kill him, and certainly not in such an elaborate fashion."

The judge hummed in thought. "It does seem difficult to imagine."

Ema smirked, looking away from the prosecutor's bench. "Unless our famous prosecutor did it as a publicity stunt."

Klavier's eyes widened in indignant shock. "Wh-what did you say!?"

"Prosecutor Gavin!" the judge cried, surprised. "You did this to promote your song!?"

Luke pressed a hand to his face, hiding giggles. Apollo did the same.

Klavier shot the Wrights and Ema a glare. "Of course not," he told the judge, "and I am quite dismayed by the ludicrous nature of her claim." He waved a hand in the air, grinning proudly. "Why would I need promotion? Everyone already listens to my music."

Ema snorted, still smiling. "I was just kidding! Don't get all worked up, glimmer-boy."

Apollo suspected that was only the first step in Ema's payback for Klavier's earlier misstep.

The judge thought a moment, frowning. "Perhaps we should go more in-depth on these lyrics. I do not believe it's entirely clear how the crimes of that day are tied to them."

Klavier nodded. "Let us begin with the first verse." He brought up on the holograms a text file, the lyrics to the Guitar's Serenade, then shot Ema a grin. "If you would, Fraulein Detective."

"What?" Ema asked, shocked. "You want me to sing it!?"

"You are the witness, ja?" Klavier replied, teasingly. "Or did you want me to sing? I warn you, my fee as vocalist is not trivial."

Ema bit her lip, shooting him a glare; It was a clear retaliation for her joking accusation. She cleared her throat, turning her attention to the lyrics on the hologram. "Let's look at the first part of the lyrics, shall we?" She paused a moment, then haltingly sang in an approximation of the tune: "When you stole away the keys my heart held on to so tight..."

Klavier nodded. "Indeed, my favourite heart-shaped key ring was stolen that morning."

"A few verses later," Ema continued, "we find 'Burning on in my heart, fire, burn my love away, all away'." She slightly winced at her own nervous attempts to sing the words. "As we know, Prosecutor Gavin's guitar burst into flame. And, right after that, 'Like a bullet of love, fire, take my life away, all away'. Mister LeTouse's life was taken by a bullet."

Klavier clapped his hands, giving Ema a grin that still didn't look at all sincere. "Bravo, Fraulein Detective. Your singing... it's not bad." As Ema glared at him, he snapped his fingers. "Now, for the finale!" Eyes closed, he promptly sang, "Guitar, guitar, up together to the sky..." He grinned, looking up at the gallery as multiple women giggled and swooned; Apollo wondered if the man had simply wanted to show Ema up or was jealous that she had a better singing voice than he'd expected... and was craving to show off again as a result. "As it says in the lyrics," the prosecutor continued, turning to the judge, "our defendant was found with a guitar, high in the 'sky' over the stage. No series of coincidences could be so well-conceived!"

Ema was avoiding the Wrights' gazes. "He's right," she admitted. "Scientifically speaking."

'We would Wocky have said? Apollo wondered to himself. Probably 'that concert was wack'...'

Luke was frowning intensely, looking between Ema and Klavier. "And does the prosecution have any idea why he'd do all this?"

"You want my scientific opinion?" Ema asked. "No clue. But he clearly had a reason to go through all that trouble."

"Not only did he steal my keys," Klavier picked up with a glare, holding a fist in the air, "he torched my guitar! Unforgivable acts even if he had a reason... and worse if he had none!"
"The diva's complaints aside, I can't imagine someone doing this on 'just a whim',' Ema pointed out.

Klavier blinked in surprise, turning to Ema before frowning. "Fraulein Detective! I take offence at that description!"

"I figured," Ema shot back with a smile.

Before Klavier could object, the judge was speaking again: "Indeed, it does seem too... well rehearsed, shall we say."

Ema nodded. "Yes. This crime was planned for sure."

Luke shook his head, arms folded across his chest and a hand on his chin. "I'm afraid I have to disagree with you," he said. "Yes, clearly these crimes are connected... but the lyrics are not the reason why."

"How can you say that?" Ema asked, seeming genuinely curious despite her disbelief. "It matches up too well to be a coincidence."

"Yes, it does," Luke agreed. "Because it was advantageous for the killer to let you believe they were. That was their motive. In fact, I believe it is only because they were privy to the 'lyrics' theory that Machi was found on the platform with the guitar, for no other reason than to 'prove' the connection in the minds of the investigators." He lowered his hand from his chin, giving Klavier a stern look. "Everything else I think truly was a coincidence... which only raises the question of why the murderer would need to go to so much extra trouble to entrench the 'lyrics' theory once they heard it. I don't know about you, but there's only one reason that comes to my mind."

Klavier raised an eyebrow. "An interesting counter-theory. I hope you have more than just words to support it, Herr Doktor."

Apollo nodded, finally spotting their chance. "Of course we do," he announced, then threw out a hand to point dramatically across the room. "We have a direct witness to the murder!"

The gallery immediately burst into murmurs, forcing the judge to quickly pull himself back from his shock to bang his gavel, glaring at the audience. "Order! Order!" With his courtroom quiet once more, he then rounded on Klavier. "Prosecutor Gavin, I thought you said the detective was the only witness!"

'I was a witness, too!' Apollo kept himself from shouting out. 'T-technically...'

Klavier shrugged, unConcerned. "Because she is... Unless another defence attorney wants to take Herr Forehead's place so he can testify." He shot the Wrights a teasing grin.

Apollo shook his head. "Ema and I found the victim, yes," he agreed, "but we were not witnesses to the murder, and certainly not direct witnesses."

"What are you talking about!?" Ema asked, wrinkling her nose in disgust. "We heard the gunshots! How can you say we weren't-!"

"We heard bangs, Ema," Apollo interrupted. "Because the victim was shot, it's easy to assume those bangs were gunshots... but we can't prove they were. We can't say with complete confidence we were witnesses to the murder." While Ema looked away uncomfortably, Apollo returned his attention to Klavier with a stern glare, the prosecutor meeting his gaze with an even look that betrayed no fear of the younger attorney's words. "The victim himself, however, named a direct witness with his dying words. The prosecution knows this, because I told them all about it."
"What!?” the judge cried, shocked. "The victim... named a witness!?”

Klavier shook his head. "Perhaps he did, and perhaps he did not. I'm afraid the detective was not present at that time; All we know is what Herr Forehead says he said." He picked at his fringe. "It's no testimony, especially since it comes from the defence attorney himself."

"Objection!" Apollo shouted, banging his fists on the bench before him. "But it's the truth! 'The witness is siren', he said it with his last breath! It had literally just happened at the time I gave you my witness statement! Why would I have lied about it!?"

Klavier scoffed. "It's my policy to fully investigate everything I deem relevant. Clearly this rookie lawyer thinks he can tell me how to do my job."

Apollo was about to growl a reply when he felt a hand on his arm, and turned to see Luke giving him a concerned look. It was enough of a reminder for the young attorney to pull himself back under control.

The judge shook his head. "Mister Wright, this witness of yours, unknown to the prosecution... I hope you're right." He leaned forward, giving Apollo a stern look. "May the court have their name so they may be summoned?"

Apollo nodded, keeping his eyes fixed on the judge's. "The defence wishes to call Lamiroir to testify."

The judge jolted in shock. "Lamiroir!?"

"The 'Siren of the Ballad',” Apollo explained. "Mister LeTouse said 'the witness is siren'; He could only have meant her."

"Ah, I see," the judge said, though he still looked shocked. He turned to Klavier. "Well, Prosecutor Gavin?"

Klavier was unphased, as Apollo had expected. "My claim still stands," he calmly replied. "There were no direct witnesses to this crime."

The judge thought a few moments. "Very well," he announced. "Let's hear it from the horse's mouth then, shall we? Please show Lamiroir to the witness stand."

Klavier scoffed, but waved to Ema, looking away with the smallest of smiles. Ema shot him another glare before heading off to the side-room on the prosecution's side.

Apollo watched carefully, waiting for his first glimpse of Lamiroir around the raised stands of the gallery. He was finding himself nervous about making her testify in court. At first he thought it was to do with who she was - There was, after all, the smallest of possibilities that her time with Trucy may have triggered some resurfacing memories - but then he realised it was more to do with her being in court. He couldn't forget how, on the night of the murder, Luke revealing she was blind and the resulting argument had caused enough stress to the woman that she had very nearly collapsed; If that happened again on the witness stand, Apollo wasn't sure he'd be able to forgive himself... and, to make it worse, Klavier was sure to push for a verdict while Lamiroir was recovering, destroying their last remaining chance to save Machi (essentially a member of their family, even though he didn't know it yet). Apollo couldn't bear to let either his young client-turned-brother or amnesiac mother down by failing to see justice done in this trial... not to mention how much a loss would hurt him, Trucy, Luke... and even Phoenix. How could a son of the Phoenix Wright, the famous ace attorney whose only loss in court had been with a truly-guilty client, fail to sway the court's opinion on an innocent teenager?

A hand on his arm startled Apollo out of his thoughts, and he turned to his right to see Luke giving him a smile. "We're in this together," the younger brother reminded him.

After a moment of surprise, Apollo smiled back and gave Luke a nod. No matter what lay ahead, the Wrights were a team; There was no giving up until the day was won.

View the Court Record
"It is my distinct honour," Klavier announced with a bow, quieting the crowds instantly, "to welcome the Siren of the Ballad to our courtroom."

Apollo and Luke looked up in surprise to see two figures heading towards the witness stand, already nearly at their destination. The taller one was who they expected to see: Lamiroir, stepping gingerly forward with a hand on the collar of her white dress. At her side, holding Lamiroir's hand tightly, was a grinning teenage girl in a blue magician's outfit... a girl they knew all too well.

"What's Trucy doing!?!" Luke hissed under his breath. "Is she allowed to so obviously escort Lamiroir to the stand?"

Apollo shrugged. "Guess so."

As the two women reached the witness stand, Trucy stopped and laid Lamiroir's hand down on the wooden podium, whispering something to the singer with a smile. Lamiroir nodded, whispering something back, then Trucy skipped over to the defence bench, taking her place at Apollo's side with a grin. "Hi!" she quietly chirped.

Luke didn't have the time to question their sister, as Lamiroir had turned her attention towards Klavier, giving him a respectful nod. "You are too kind," she said.

The judge jumped in surprise. "Y-you can speak English?"

"Yes," Lamiroir replied. "Yes, I can... though I am not very good. There is much I do not know."

"You speak so well!" the judge gushed. "Have you spent time here before?"

Lamiroir shook her head. "Actually, I do not know how I came by my knowledge of your language... nor where I studied it."

Apollo felt a twinge of sadness. So her time alone with Trucy hadn't triggered any resurfacing memories...

"I too thought to call her as a witness," Klavier announced, giving the Wrights a stern look, "but I did not. I had a reason, of course: Lamiroir suffers from amnesia."

The judge was surprised. "Amnesia?"

"Lamiroir is not my true name," the woman on the witness stand explained. "Yet I remember nothing of the time before I was given it... nothing of the time before I started singing on stage."

"As lauded singer Lamiroir," Klavier picked up, "she lives a good life. There are little difficulties for her, thanks to her success... Yet, I did not wish to subject her to unnecessary stress."

Apollo noticed Klavier's stern gaze flicker back to the Wrights, and shot the prosecutor a glare in return. 'I think I'm more aware of her condition than you, Gavin. You think I would be doing this if I had any other choice?"

The judge hummed in thought. "I see." He gave Lamiroir a warm smile. "I care surprisingly little about people's pasts. You have nothing to fear in this court, Lamiroir."

Lamiroir nodded. "Thank you, but please do not be concerned on my behalf. I do not believe Machi is Mister LeTouse's killer; If there is anything I know that may help his case, I will tell it gladly."

Her resolve seemed to be unexpected to the judge, but he went ahead with his courtroom procedure. "Well, now that you're here, please give us your testimony... If nothing else, the sound of your voice is welcome. Tell us what you saw the night of the crime!"

Apollo winced. 'Saw? Really? We already know the answer to that...'

Lamiroir gave a tight smile that was barely visible through her veil. "What I saw?" she repeated, thoughtfully. "Unfortunately, I 'saw' nothing. That night, I was invited to sing on stage, and this I did. At the time of the murder, I was on my way from the stage to the backstage exit. There was something like a little window there. I heard two shots... I couldn't do anything to stop it." Her eyes closed, pained, then she looked up towards the judge with a determined look. "But it wasn't Machi! It was a grown person! I know it was!"

Klavier had his eyes closed, fiddling with his hair as he stood relaxed behind his bench. "There you have it. She saw nothing that night. Not as 'direct' a witness as the defence claimed."

"But she heard a lot," Luke calmly replied, suddenly seeming subdued as he stared across the courtroom. "And... you haven't even realised how her testimony is important, have you?"

The prosecutor's eyes snapped open, giving Luke a curious look.

The judge didn't appear to have heard anything of their conversation, smiling at Lamiroir. "I must say, you sound wonderful just testifying," he gushed, then turned to Apollo. "The cross-examination, Mister Wright."

Apollo nodded. 'It would have been nice if you'd been listening to her words, Your Honour...'

Turning back to Lamiroir, he ran over in his head how Luke had explained this same testimony the previous day, and realised she was doing her best to be informative without breaking her contract with Valant (had he recognised her too?) or giving away her own blindness... though Machi's deception being uncovered and Trucy's personal escort to the witness stand certainly hadn't helped that last part. He wasn't sure if it was possible to use her words effectively without giving away either of those, but he was going to do his best to allow her to keep her secrets. "Lamiroir, you say you heard the murder through a 'little window'?"

"Yes, well," Lamiroir sheepishly replied, "'window' is the best word I know in English. I think this is how it is said, yes."

Klavier chuckled, playing with his hair. "You need not worry, Lamiroir. Your choice of words is impeccable. There is a small window in the dressing room in question." He eyed the Wrights teasingly, bringing up the crime scene diagram to highlight the window on the back wall. "Perhaps the defence remembers this detail?"

Trucy minutely gasped, elbowing Apollo excitedly. "That's the one the killer could have escaped through!" she whispered.

Apollo shot her a frown. "No, they couldn't. And it's not relevant to Lamiroir's testimony anyway, remember?"
"Oh, yeah," Trucy muttered, arms crossed in thought.

Luke sighed, shaking his head. "Prosecutor Gavin... Lamiroir... It seems I owe you both an apology."

The entire court seemed to focus on Luke with surprise. "What do you mean?" Lamiroir asked.

"When you told me 'small window'," Luke continued to the woman, "I knew instantly what it was you were referring to... and, naively, I thought the police and prosecution would know too. I didn't think it would be necessary to give you a more specific word for what you meant."

Klavier raised an eyebrow. "What else could she have meant?" He pointed to the diagram on the holograms. "There are no other windows, small or otherwise, on the scene."

Luke shook his head. "The word 'window' has other meanings than just a pane of glass, Mister Gavin. There was another 'window' in that dressing room... one that's come up several times in this trial already."

Klavier frowned. "Now you are just being ridiculous, Herr Doktor. What 'other window'?"

Luke gave Apollo a smile, a silent passing over of the honours, and Apollo grinned at the opportunity to put their prosecutor rival in his place. "Simple," he said, tapping at his Court Record to display on the holograms a photo from the crime scene, one Trucy had taken on the night of the concert. "She was talking about the air vent."

"The air vent!?" the judge cried in shock. "B-but that's no 'small window'!"

"May I remind you, Your Honour, that Lamiroir is Borginian?" Apollo replied. "She is unfamiliar with English; It's not a stretch to imagine the best word she could think of to describe the air vent opening was as a 'small window'!"

"Objection!" came a shout from across the room, and Klavier whacked a fist against the wall at his back, shooting the Wrights an unhappy pout. "Now you've done it. You've gone beyond ridiculous and into ludicrous." He gestured to the diagram. "So Lamiroir was up in the ventilation system listening to this murder going down?"

Apollo nodded, remembering his discussion with Luke the previous day. "The glass window on the scene looked rather thick, and it was closed too; It didn't look possible to overhear anything through that."

"Indeed it was not," Klavier agreed, still looking annoyed. "We ran a simulation and determined the scenario impossible."

"Hence why you threw away Lamiroir's testimony so readily," Luke added with a proud grin. "You didn't think to question her further and determine your interpretation of her words was correct."

Klavier glared. "And who's to say yours is?" he asked. "Why would Lamiroir be in the ventilation system, hiding like a rat!?" He glanced to the woman at the stand. "No offence intended to her, of course."

The three Wrights all shot each other grins, and Apollo crossed his arms over his puffed-out chest as he faced Klavier. "The explanation for that is simple, Prosecutor Gavin." He turned towards the witness stand. "Lamiroir, just to clarify: The 'small window' you heard the murder from... Was it up high, on the ceiling of the room? Not low on a wall?"
Lamiroir thought a moment, then nodded. "Yes, it was up on the ceiling."

"What!?!" Klavier cried, jumping back in shock as the gallery erupted into noise.

The judge began to bang his gavel. "Order! Order! I will have order!"

Trucy giggled as she elbowed her eldest brother. "That was amazing, Polly!"

"Thanks," Apollo whispered back, unable to turn down his grin.

"And now," Luke added, "we just have to overturn the assumption of when the shooting happened!"

Apollo's grin faded at that. "Easier said than done."

Finally, the gallery calmed, and the judge put his gavel back down with a sigh. Annoyed, he turned to face Lamiroir. "Witness! You will clarify this statement to the court! Are you, in fact, saying that you were up above the ceiling of the room? And that's where you heard the moment of the crime?"

Lamiroir nodded again. "Yes, in fact, I was." She bowed her head apologetically. "I am sorry. I did not imagine it would become such an important point..."

"Don't blame yourself, Lamiroir," Apollo insisted. "After all, you are under contract not to discuss why you were in the air vents; It's understandable you'd be hesitant to explain all the errors of assumption the prosecution has made with your testimony."

"Excuse me!?" Klavier cried, tightening a fist as he shot the Wrights a glare. "What exactly are you talking about now, Herr Forehead?"

Apollo grinned, deciding to tease Klavier as Klavier had teased them. "Needless to say, with myself and Ema at the dressing room door, and Lamiroir here in the air vents, there should have been nowhere for the killer to run, correct?"

The judge thought a moment, then nodded. "That's true. There's no other exits."

Klavier scoffed. "That is easy enough to explain," he pointed out. "It is clear Lamiroir is lying to cover for Machi."

"It was not Machi!" Lamiroir insisted, more firmly than Apollo had been expecting to ever see. "I do not forget a voice when I hear it, and I heard the killer speak! It was a grown man!"

"And this voice you heard," Klavier retorted, "could it not have been the victim, Mister LeTouse?"

"Absolutely not," Lamiroir sternly replied. "Did I not just say that I do not forget a voice? If it was Mister LeTouse who spoke, I would have known."

The judge frowned in thought. "But, Lamiroir... you were in the air vents, and you heard this murder happen? Why, then, did you not look to see who the killer was?"

Lamiroir's eyes closed. "I am a singer. I rely more on my ears than my eyes."

"Th-the dressing room was very cluttered," Apollo added off the top of his head, eager not to have to explain her blindness. "It's understandable she couldn't have seen anything through the vent."

"And yet," Klavier said, frown deepening, "I have still not heard a reason our 'Siren of the Ballad' was in those air vents at all, let alone any proof to corroborate her story. How do we know she is not simply covering for the defendant?"
Apollo paused.

"That is a good point, Prosecutor Gavin," the judge agreed. "Testimony alone is not enough as an argument, not in this case." He gave Apollo a stern look. "Does the defence have any evidence to support their claims?"

In the silence, Apollo heard Luke hissing "Bollocks," at his side.
'But I haven't gotten to the best part yet!' Apollo mentally objected, regretting his decision to not bring up the timing of the murder sooner; He highly doubted the judge would accept it as evidence.

Still swearing under his breath, Luke grabbed the Court Record, madly scrolling through their collected notes. Trucy slipped around behind Apollo to join him, peering over Luke's arm at the photos as they flew past on the small screen. Noticing her there, Luke was quick to halt his muttering, simply glaring intensely at the tablet computer in his hands.

Klavier smiled, eyeing Luke's mad search. "Of course the defence doesn't have evidence," he said. "Their theory is complete nonsense."

"Wait!" Trucy suddenly cried, holding out a hand. "Give us a minute!" Without waiting for a reply, she turned to her eldest brother. "Polly, remember that brooch on the floor of the dressing room? I think I've remembered why it was familiar!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow, leaning in closer to his sister to hear her better. "Why is that?"

"Lamiroir was wearing it that night!" she explained with a hopeful grin. "Then she wasn't when we spoke to her after! Maybe she dropped it when she heard the gunshots!"

At that, Apollo winced. "Truce, we can't prove when she dropped it," he pointed out. "It could easily have been lying there all night."

Trucy's face fell. "But..."

"Apollo's right," Luke added behind her, still paging rapidly through the Court Record. "Even then, how could we ask Lamiroir if it was hers without the actual brooch on hand for her to touch? She can't exactly look at a photo, remember."

Apollo growled to himself. "Why couldn't Gavin have let us finish explaining before demanding evidence!?"

Klavier chuckled, playing with his hair. "We heard your claim," he said. "We even entertained the possibility... and it brought us to this. Herr Judge!"

The judge nodded, watching the Wrights sternly. "The defence has failed to provide any evidence supporting their theory," he announced, then banged his gavel. "This cross-examination is over."

"Objection!" Apollo cried, banging on his bench with his fists. "Wait! Let me finish explaining-!"

"The cross-examination is over, Mister Wright," the judge repeated with a glare. "Until such a time as a need arises, this witness may leave the stand."

Lamiroir bowed her head, looking as sorrowful as the trio at the defence bench. "I'm sorry I could not be of more assistance." She turned, beginning to walk away from the stand, and Trucy jumped at her brothers' side, racing to catch up to the woman. She quickly slid her hand into Lamiroir's, then began to escort her back to the waiting room.

Apollo sighed, leaning heavily on the bench as his head rolled forward. That's it... I've failed...'

"Your Honour!"

The room seemed to stop as everyone looked up at a young man in uniform racing into the courtroom, ducking past Trucy and Lamiroir as he headed for the judge.

"What is it, bailiff?" the judge asked, annoyed. "Can't you see we're in session here!?"

"We have some results back from the investigation!" the bailiff announced.

Jogging in behind the young officer came Daryan, grinning smugly and giving Klavier a quick wave. He barely paid Trucy and Lamiroir a glance as he skirted around them.

"Ah, the information from Interpol!" Klavier realised with a smile, watching his bandmate expectantly. "Quick work as always, Daryan."

The judge gave Klavier a surprised look, then also turned his attention to the detective. "Well, let's hear your report, Detective Crescend."

Daryan nodded, the bailiff at his side scuttling away back out of the room. "I asked Interpol about LeTouse," the detective explained. "I'm sure you'll find their answer intriguing: Apparently, he was on a search for something."

"'Something'?" Klavier repeated, confused.

"They wouldn't tell us what," Daryan admitted with a scowl. "But, they did say he was given a 'replica' for identification purposes, so we took a look through his belongings and found this." With a proud smile, he reached into a pocket and pulled out a tiny white lump, oval-shaped and only about four centimetres long. "It's just plastic, but I figure enough asking around will get us an answer of what it's meant to be." He handed the lump off to Klavier, who carefully turned it over in his grip as he examined it.

The judge nodded. "Thank you for informing us of the investigation's findings, Detective Crescend. This certainly seems likely to tie in to the case somehow."

Daryan smirked smugly. "Oh, no problem at all, Your Honour," he insisted, then spun on his heel and began to casually amble back out of the room. "I'll be heading out."

"Hold it!" came a sudden cry, stopping everyone in their tracks. Still halfway between the witness stand and the waiting room, one hand in Trucy's and the other held out towards the judge, stood Lamiroir, eyes wide. "Wait!"

"La-Lamiroir?" the judge asked, surprised. "Is something the matter?"

She frowned, deep in thought. "That voice just now..."

Klavier glanced over to the detective, stood near the door with an equally confused look. "Daryan?"

"Mister Daryan, is it?" Lamiroir quietly replied. She thought to herself for a very long moment, then nodded, a determined frown on her face. "It was him. I'm sure of it."

"It was 'him'?" the judge repeated, still looking lost.
Klavier meanwhile was watching the woman with wide eyes. "Y-you aren't saying-!?"

"That voice I heard," Lamiroir continued, "talking to Mister LeTouse, when I heard the gunshots fired. It was him! It was Mister Daryan!"

"Is this some kind of a joke!?" Klavier shouted, slamming a fist against the wall at his back as the gallery erupted into chaos.

Apollo was too surprised to say anything more than a strangled "What!??", looking between the steely resolve of his blind mother and the wide-eyed stare of the detective at the courtroom doors. He couldn't read Daryan's expression, only that it was somewhere between shock and fear... and possibly rage, too.

"No way," the detective muttered, almost unheard over the growing volume of the gallery.

The judge banged fruitlessly with his gavel, calling for order, but none came. Eventually, he seemed to give up, shouting over the chaos "This trial is suspended until tomorrow!" and promptly fleeing his podium. His exit served as enough of a signal that everyone else followed his lead, Trucy leading Lamiroir back to the waiting room while Klavier ran to Daryan, the pair rushing out together through the main doors.

Apollo turned to his brother, and was surprised to find him totally calm, a stern look on his face. "Luke?"

Luke looked over, giving his brother a smile. "It looks like the worst part is over," he simply said. "We can't give up now, Apollo."

Although he didn't understand Luke's confidence, Apollo nodded, returning the smile. "No, we can't," we agreed.

The Wright brothers emerged into the third floor lobby, still mostly quiet as the chaotic crowds in the courtroom took their time to leave. It didn't take long to spot Trucy, standing with Lamiroir in an out-of-the-way corner and idly chatting. As they approached, their sister spotted them and waved. "Polly! Luke! We found who shot Mister LeTouse!"

Apollo scoffed, rolling his eyes as he reached his sister's side. "Now we just gotta prove it."

"I'll be honest," Luke added, smiling, "I already suspected Detective Crescend of the murder."

"You did?" Trucy asked, surprised.

"Of course you did," Apollo sighed.

Lamiroir turned towards Luke with a hopeful look. "So there is more than just my word to save Machi?"

Luke paused, uncomfortable. "Unfortunately, 'he was acting strangely all night' isn't going to be strong enough evidence in court."

"Strangely?" Apollo repeated, giving his brother a curious look. "How can you tell? That night was the first time any of us met him."

"I told you this yesterday," Luke reminded them, "that it was Detective Crescend who relieved me. from guarding the crime scene? He wasn't expecting to see me, and claimed Ema sent him... but Ema hadn't spoken to him since just after the murder, so he was clearly lying. I suspect he came straight to me after you two spoke to him about the 'lyrics' theory."

"Actually, that reminds me," Apollo muttered, a finger pressed to his forehead, "he and Gavin were arguing about that missed cue of Crescend's. Might he have missed it because he injured himself using Mister LeTouse's gun?"

"It's certainly a possibility," Luke agreed. "He was manipulating the hunt for Machi too, complaining about his missing guitar and then 'leading' me to the stage and up on the platform."

"And Gavin mentioned today the killer might have stolen the body itself had it not been watched," Apollo added. "I bet Crescend was planning to do just that until he realised you were guarding it, Luke."

Trucy squealed. "Ooh, this is so exciting! Everything's coming together!"

Apollo sighed. "And the only problem is, we can't prove any of it. We didn't even get a chance to bring up most of our argument, since Gavin cut us off."

Lamiroir clasped her hands together, frowning sadly. "I'm sorry I couldn't help more."

"Please, it's not your fault, Lamiroir," Apollo insisted. "We should have searched harder for evidence yesterday, when we had the chance."

"Oh, but, we can do that now, can't we?" Trucy pointed out. "The judge said the trial was resuming tomorrow, right?"

Luke nodded. "He did. We were very lucky. We can focus this afternoon on finding as much information as we can on our case... and Mister LeTouse's secret mission."

Lamiroir sighed. "I am still finding that hard to believe," she admitted. "What was he seeking? And what connection did it have to me?"

"Luke!"

The Wrights turned to see Flora running towards them, an eager smile on her face. Trailing behind her were Emmy, Sycamore, and Alfendi, the young boy having to be dragged along by his uncle as they tried to keep up with his older sister.

"You and Apollo were both amazing in there!" Flora gushed, reaching their corner of the lobby. Her face then fell. "Mister Gavin was being such a jerk... and you really stood up to him! That alone deserves congratulations!"

"Uh, thanks, Flora," Apollo muttered, running a hand through his hair in embarrassment.

Luke cast a concerned glance between his friend and Lamiroir, the latter listening quietly to their conversation. "This is probably a bad time to be doing introductions, given what we're all in the middle of."

"There's no need for them on our end," Emmy offered, joining the group with a smile. "Flora and I were in the audience of the concert the other day; We loved your song, Lamiroir."
Lamiroir smiled, bowing her head. "Thank you."

Apollo looked behind them, noticing Sycamore now dragging a protesting Alfendi off towards the stairs. "Where's Mister Sycamore taking Alfendi?"

"The kiddo's throwing a tantrum," Emmy explained with a wry look. "Apparently the trial wasn't exciting enough."

"Uncle's taking him somewhere quiet to calm down," Flora assured them. "He'll be alright in a little while."

"Aw, poor Alfendi," Trucy sighed in sympathy.

In the resulting lull of the conversation, Luke turned his attention back to the singer. "Lamiroir, Flora here is Professor Layton's daughter, and this is Emmy Altava; She was the Professor's assistant."

"A very long time ago," Emmy interrupted with a grimace, but turned to the older woman with a curious look. "Luke mentioned you had some kind of problem you were considering bringing to Professor Layton for help? I assume it's to do with the amnesia Prosecutor Gavin mentioned."

Lamiroir nodded, though her face was downturned, hands tightly clutched together. "I may or may not," she said. "I have... other concerns to attend to at the moment."

"That's understandable, ma'am," Flora commiserated, then gave Luke and Apollo a bright smile. "Though I'm sure you two will clear little Machi's name in no time!"

"Especially if you let us help out," Emmy added, gently punching Apollo's arm with a grin. "Getting to go on an investigation is much more exciting than just a boring old regular trip to LA!"

Trucy huffed. "It's not boring!" she insisted. "You came to see our show!"

"And your show was wonderful," Flora insisted, shooting Emmy a disappointed look. "I always love seeing you two evolving your magic tricks!"

Lamiroir smiled, almost laughing under her breath. "Thank you all for your help assisting Machi," she said. "I will be needed elsewhere this afternoon, so I must leave, but I wish you all the best of luck."

"Do you need help?" Apollo asked, giving Lamiroir a concerned frown identical to his sister's. "We don't mind."

"You are already helping by finding Mister LeTouse's killer," Lamiroir assured them. "I will be fine alone. If you need me, I will be at the Coliseum."

Although he still worried for her, Apollo nodded, deciding not to push his luck. "We'll come find you if we need anything more," he promised.

Trucy sidled closer to her eldest brother, grabbing his hand. Her eyes never left Lamiroir. "We'll definitely see you later!" she added in a cheerful tone, betrayed only by the tightness of her expression.

Lamiroir gave them all a grateful smile. "Until then." With that, she turned and slowly made her way out of the lobby.

"I must say, this case is much more intriguing than I thought," Sycamore said as he lowered himself onto one of the red sofas, pinning down the sulking Alfendi at his side. "Your victim is a secret agent, your suspect a police detective, and your blind client isn't actually blind." He smiled, pushing at his glasses. "Not to mention the secrecy surrounding your chosen witness..."

Luke blushed, shrinking down in his seat opposite the man. "It never got said, but... you must have figured it out pretty quickly once the truth about Machi came out."

Sycamore chuckled, nodding. "It isn't that hard if you give it more than a moment's thought."

"We're sorry for not telling you," Trucy meekly said, sitting at Luke's side, her hands in her lap. "It was really important to keep it quiet, so..."

"It took me a while, I'll admit," Emmy added, standing by the window and looking out over the road below. "I didn't stop to wonder why the deception existed in the first place until the trial was almost over."

Flora frowned in confusion, sitting next to Sycamore. "What are you all talking about?"

Apollo sighed from where he stood, moving over to sit with his siblings. For Flora, he explained, "Lamiroir is known as the 'Landscape Painter in Sound'; For her image, it was important that she be known as sighted... but, in reality, she's blind."

Flora gasped, her hands to her mouth. "Oh! I... didn't even realise!"

"Machi pretended to be blind to cover for her," Apollo continued. "I'm sure you've heard they hold hands at all times... but it's not for Lamiroir to lead Machi; it's for Machi to lead Lamiroir."

As Flora mused over this new knowledge, Luke turned towards the window, watching his friend standing there with a concerned frown. "Emmy?"

Emmy looked around. "Hmm?"

"I know what your answer's going to be, but I really have to double-check," Luke said, carefully considering his words with an embarrassed frown. "You... aren't going to spread around the details of our investigation in your articles, are you?"

For barely a moment, Apollo caught a glimpse of hurt on Emmy's face, but she had covered it so quickly with a smile that he doubted anyone else had seen it. "Of course I won't," Emmy assured Luke, her sincerity clear. "All my information is coming from the trial at this point; Before that, I just passed on what all the other news reports were saying. You don't have to worry about anything private getting out from me."

Luke was visibly relieved. "Thank you, Emmy. I just needed to hear it."
Emmy's smile widened. "No problem."

Apollo decided to keep to himself the sight of her right hand twitching into a fist as she said those last words.

Trucy sighed, leaning back against the couch cushions and staring up at the ceiling. "If only Daddy were here... He'd probably know what to do."

"He would," Apollo agreed, "and, honestly, we wouldn't have needed his help figuring it out anyway."

"We wouldn't?" Trucy repeated, giving her brother a confused look.

Apollo laughed. "We're going back to the Coliseum. We need hard evidence for our case, right?"

"I'll go with you," Emmy insisted, grinning. "I missed out on seeing you three in action yesterday, after all!"

Alfendi loudly groaned, finally inserting himself into a conversation he'd been largely ignoring until now. "Do we have to go?" he asked in a whine. "I don't wanna!"

"Of course you don't have to, 'Fendi," Flora assured her young brother, leaning forward to see him on Sycamore's other side. "Did you want to go back to the Bostonius? Take the rest of the day off?"

The boy paused, thinking the offer over.

"It's entirely up to you, Alfendi," Sycamore added, then paused and turned to Flora. "And what about you, Flora? Were you also wanting to join the investigation?"

Flora looked away, her hands fiddling with the edges of her dress. "I... I don't know," she admitted. "You've spent so much of this holiday watching over 'Fendi, Uncle..."

Sycamore chuckled, shaking his head. "You needn't worry about me, Flora. If you want to join the investigation, go ahead. I'm happy to take care of the boy."

His assurances only seemed to make poor Flora even more uncertain.

Over the ensuing silence, a loud, pompous laugh echoed through the room, stopping everyone in their tracks as they exchanged confused glances.

"Desmond...?" Emmy hesitantly asked, stepping away from the window.

"That most certainly wasn't me," Sycamore replied, eyes wide as he got to his feet.

Trucy's face slowly erupted into a grin, her eyes on the almost-closed reception door behind Sycamore. "Oh! It's...!"

"Wherever the mundane gives way to miracles," the mysterious voice continued, "a word is whispered... Gramarye!"

Apollo wasn't sure whether to roll his eyes or join Trucy in her excitement. "We left the front door open, didn't we?" he asked, but it was more of a statement than a question; He didn't want to consider that the front door had indeed been locked and their visitor simply picked it open.

With a flourish, the door to reception was shoved open, and a man in yellow wielding a long cane stood in the entrance, giving everyone within a wide grin. "We meet once again!"
"Uncle Valant!" Trucy gleefully cried, dashing to her uncle's side.

"Ah, my dear Trucy!" Valant replied, holding his arms out wide to welcome the teen. "You are looking much more cheerful on this fine day than on our last rendezvous!"

Apollo couldn't resist a grin as he saw everyone else watching Valant with a mixture of shock and confusion. "Hello again, sir!" he called, walking around to meet the man.

"And the attorney Apollo!" Valant cried, tapping the brim of his top hat with his cane in greeting to the young man. "I must say, learning it was you on that horrid courtroom stage defending that poor pianist..." He shivered, his confident smirk fading. "Twas a hot topic of talk amongst the staff, you know."

Apollo blushed, running a hand through his hair. "Oh, uh... Thank you. I'm doing my best for him."

"I hate to intrude," Sycamore interrupted, giving Valant a suspicious look, "but I don't believe we've met, Mister...?" At his sides, Flora and Alfendi were curiously watching the new arrival from where they sat on the sofa, Alfendi peering over the back with narrowed eyes.

Trucy gasped, scandalised. "Mister Sycamore!" she cried accusingly. "Don't you remember? This is the Great Gramarye, Valant Gramarye!" She gestured to her uncle, the pair grinning proudly. "The Grand Magician!"

"Yes, it is I," Valant pompously agreed, twirling his cane, "the Great Valant Gramarye. As seen on television."

Sycamore wasn't impressed, pushing at his glasses. "I don't watch much television, I'm afraid."

"Desmond!" Emmy hissed from across the room in warning. At the man's side, Flora stifled a giggle.

"It's a pleasure to finally meet you, Mister Gramarye," Luke spoke up, rushing to join his siblings with a polite smile. "Trucy's told us a lot about you over the years."

"Ah, indeed?" Valant replied, fixing said girl with his usual smirk.

Trucy nodded, then gestured to the younger of her brothers. "Uncle Valant, this is Luke, my other brother! Our second-ever Halloween together, I made him-!"

"L-let's not bother him with that story, Trucy," Luke hurriedly interrupted, cheeks red as he laughed nervously.

Valant seemed a little surprised to hear his honorary niece's explanation, but accepted it with a shrug, giving them a boastful smirk. "You have made quite the family since last we met, Trucy; I should apologise that I lack the time to greet your new guardian."

"Papa's very busy this week," Luke insisted; Apollo was starting to see the cracks in the vet's expression as his smile became more and more forced. "I'm afraid he's also short on time to meet people."

"Ah, well, in that case, fate has decided 'twas not meant to be," Valant declared. Regardless, Apollo could see how relieved he'd been to hear Luke's words. The man twirled his cane, dramatically gesturing to call attention to himself. "Now, I believe you wished to see me? So, be quick with your questions, and do not quail, quake or quiver; I am quite tame. Though my stardom may sear the sight, you'll find me down to earth when need calls." He gave a deep bow.
Trucy squealed, taken with her uncle's alliterative display.

In less than a moment, Emmy had pushed past Apollo, notebook open in her hand, and was giving Valant an eager smile. "Don't you worry, Mister Gramarye; I am very practised with firing off quick questions!" she said, pulling a pen from her sleeve and holding it to the top page of her notebook. "I'm curious, the illusion during Lamiroir's performance at the Gavinners' concert was your work, wasn't it? Why haven't you made any kind of announcement about it? You've been working alone for seven years now; Is it very different to when you worked with a partner? I understand you've not been keeping in touch with Trucy, but have you managed to catch her and Apollo's show while you've been back in town?"

"E-Emmy!" Luke cried, face paling as he tried to signal for her to stop. "Is this really the right time for an interview!?"

Emmy just grinned. "He asked for questions," she pointed out.

Valant laughed. "Indeed I did!" he agreed, turning to the woman. "You must be a reporter."

"Emmy Altava, World Times," she replied, pen still held at the ready above her notebook. "I'm working on an article about the next generation of Gramaryes here," she pointed her pen alternately between Apollo and Trucy, "and my boss has got me on the murder at the concert while I'm in the area. Any comments, Mister Gramarye?"

The magician held his cane to his face, eyes closed in thought. After a moment, he looked up again with his usual smirk. "My master-work at the concert... I've been remiss in remembering the reasons for my visit."

"Reasons?" Apollo repeated.

"The first being, of course," Valant continued, turning to Trucy, "to see you, Miss Trucy."

Trucy bounced up and down in glee. "You don't know how happy I am to see you again, Uncle Valant!"

"I'm sure you are," Valant replied, smirking smugly.

Apollo rolled his eyes.

Valant then turned to Apollo holding out a hand. "My other reason for coming here today," he twirled his fingers, and a silver CD appeared from nowhere in his grip, "was this."

The young lawyer took the item, turning it over in his hands. He quickly noticed, scribbled on the top with a black marker, was the handwritten label 'Guitars Serenade'. "Is this...?"

"A recording of the concert," Valant proudly explained. "I've brought it for you, Apollo and Trucy, on behalf of Troupe Gramarye." He gave a quick bow, giving the moment far more importance than it perhaps deserved. "Will you watch it?"

"Of course we will!" Trucy cried, dashing across to snatch the CD from her brother's hands and running to the television, where she didn't hesitate to start fiddling with the aging DVD player.

Luke rushed to follow his sister, "Um, Truce, let me...", and reached for the tray of remotes, gently guiding the teen away from jabbing at the buttons on the front of the machine.

It hadn't taken long for everyone in the room to assemble around the television, which, moments after the CD was inserted into the tray, flickered to life. It showed the unmistakable image of Lamiroir, standing in a spotlight. The speakers, once Luke had hurriedly turned them up, emitted the gentle piano melody of the song's opening, and were followed half-a-second later by Lamiroir's soaring voice.

The Guitar's Serenade played out much as Apollo remembered it, though now through an edited sequence of close-ups and long shots that highlighted the illusion of the teleportation trick: Klavier's incident with his guitar was entirely in the background (Apollo stifled laughter at the sight of the prosecutor's flailing as he fell offscreen, the camera quickly whipping away), and Machi appeared only in extreme long shots and a single close-up at the very beginning of the piece; The focus of the video was entirely on Lamiroir and, when she wasn't onstage, her cloak. The song itself was as beautiful as he remembered... though a part of him had to blink back tears as the realisation hit him all over again that the woman onscreen, who the camera was paying the utmost attention to, was his lost mother.

The song came to an end, Lamiroir standing on the platform at the back of the audience while Klavier beat out the flames of his guitar in the distant background. The faint cheers of the audience faded out, quickly followed by the image turning to black, and the video was over.

Trucy sighed, her eyes shining as she gazed at the screen with a faraway smile. "Wow... It's almost as good as it was live." Luke, standing at her side, rested a hand on her shoulder, watching his sister with concern.

In the shuffle of everyone arranging themselves around the television, Alfendi had ended up at the front, closest to the screen, and turned to face Valant with a frown. "How did the lady do that?"

Valant laughed. "Are you asking me how my trick took to the air, little boy?"

Apollo shook his head, giving Alfendi a look that was half-stern and half-amused. "Now now Alfendi, it's against the rules to ask a magician how his illusions work."

Alfendi shot Apollo a glare. "Why?"

"Because it's the rules," Trucy added, imitating her brother right down to the crossed arms.

"Don't even ask," Valant picked up, shaking his head with a small smile. "I won't answer."

Alfendi pouted, crossing his arms and glaring at the three magicians.

Valant laughed again, then gestured to the television with his cane, looking at Apollo. "Put that CD in a computer and you should find the individual audio files from the mixing board. As mystical as I am, I could not figure out how to combine them."

Luke snorted, but quickly hid his giggles. "Don't worry Mister Gramarye, I can handle that."
Trucy clapped her hands together, bouncing on the spot. "Oh, thank you so much Uncle Valant! This was the best gift ever!"

"I don't doubt it!" Valant said, then bowed to the girl. "But now, I must make my leave, Miss Trucy."

"What!?" Trucy gasped, running to her honorary uncle. "Th-there's no need to rush... You should stay a while!"

Valant shook his head. "I am afraid I cannot. I may not. I shall not." He held his cane high with a serious frown. "I have been asked to assist with an analysis and so I shall slink back to the scene."

Emmy tapped her cheek in thought. "So you'll be at the concert venue today?"

"Correct," Valant replied, then returned his attention to Apollo and Trucy. "If you would call on me, come to the Coliseum," he told them, then spun around with a twirl of his cape, waving over his shoulder. "See you later, crocodile."

Apollo watched as the man left the room. 'I wonder if... Should I?'

"Wow, we really picked the right time to visit, didn't we?" Flora giggled somewhere behind him. "We got to go to a concert, almost witnessed a murder... We've met Klavier Gavin, and Lamiroir, and Valant Gramarye..."

"Yeah, you guys got some connections, didn't you?" Emmy added in a teasing tone.

Luke sighed, likely the focus of Emmy's attentions. "Please don't, Emmy."

"But how did the trick work!?" Alfendi interrupted, sounding annoyed.

"Alfendi-" Sycamore tried to scold the boy.

Trucy giggled. "Nuh-uh, a magician never reveals their secrets! It's the rules!"

"The rules are stupid!" Alfendi proclaimed.

With everyone else distracted, Apollo decided to make a run out the door.

Apollo caught up to Valant on the stairs leading from their front doorstep to the street below, flying out the reception door and taking care not to trap his cape as he closed it behind him. "Wait, Mister Valant!"

At the sound of his name, the man turned, looking back up the stairway in surprise. "Hmm? Young Apollo?"

"I had something else I wanted to ask you," Apollo explained, jumping down the steps, his hands on either wall of the narrow passage. "In private."

Valant considered the request for a second or two, then nodded, turning to face him. His cane was, for once, lowered to rest upon the step next up from the man's feet. "What did you want to know?"

Apollo thought a moment. "How come... Why..." He stopped, shaking his head. How best to put this? Eventually, he fixed his gaze on Valant's. "When I introduced myself to you as 'Trucy's brother', you knew exactly what I meant," he explained. "How come you knew Thalassa Gramarye had a son... had me," he paused only to take a deep breath, his chest feeling tight, "and Zak didn't?"

Confirming Apollo's suspicions, Valant returned the serious stare, remaining completely unsurprised... until Apollo mentioned the man's former performing partner. "You've... spoken to Zak?"

"I haven't," Apollo explained, shaking his head. "He... We've had distant contact with him," he settled for saying, not wanting to explain to a man he still suspected of murder what was truly going on with his sister's biological father.

Valant nodded, deciding to accept this explanation, though he was still frowning in worry as he stared off at a point in space somewhere beyond Apollo's shoulder. "I... can't say for sure, but wilful ignorance may have been a factor on Zak's part," he said. "Thalassa never spoke of the year she was away... but even a member of Troupe Gramarye as disregarded as myself could put together the story with a little thought."

Apollo didn't reply, watching Valant carefully. 'Disregarded?'

"There were all the rumours when she left," Valant continued, meeting Apollo's eyes. "Onlookers insisted she must have been pregnant against the wishes of Magnifi to just up and marry and leave the Troupe the way she did. Neither allowed their private lives to be known even to us, his apprentices, so it was always a mystery." He looked away again. "It's a small world, the performing arts. We heard what happened to Hyperion. And then she reappeared in her father's caravan like nothing had happened... except she was missing one of her bracelets."

At that, Apollo instinctively moved to grip the bracelet on his left wrist. Naturally, as he'd been missing his gloves and cape after the murder, the golden ring would have been even more visible upon his meeting with Valant.

"I didn't see the resemblance until you mentioned your relation to Trucy," Valant explained, meeting Apollo's eyes again. "I recognise even a partial magician's costume such as yours that night, and you looked about the right age... When I noticed your bracelet, then I knew for sure. Thalassa had had a child while she was away... and, by some Gramarye miracle, you and Trucy found each other."

Apollo smiled. "That was a miracle," he quietly agreed. "We didn't have anything to do with it, though."

With nothing he could say in reply, Valant simply nodded. "If you are going to ask me about your father, I'm not sure I will be very useful," he admitted. "Understand, it was a very long time ago that I performed with him, and we did not socialise with each other outside of work."

Apollo shook his head. "I've tried looking him up already. Hyperion... Reylu, right?"

Valant thought a moment. "Yes, I believe that was his stage name."

At that, Apollo blinked in surprise. "Stage name?"

"With the exception of his own daughter, everyone who worked under Magnifi had one, even myself," Valant explained. "I don't recall Hyperion's true name - we did not use them, after all - but I believe it was... something Justice."

Apollo felt his stomach drop. "Justice?"

Valant nodded. "Yes, I think so. 'Reylu' is the Borginian word for 'justice', if memory serves. He thought it was clever."
Suddenly Apollo was glad they'd never found a photo of his deceased father; He could only imagine what kind of false hopes might have been conjured had he asked Maya to channel 'Hyperion Reylu' and she had failed with the incorrect name. Who'd've thought that all along it had been 'Reylu' that was the stage name, not 'Justice'? Was 'Hyperion' his name at all, or another fake? And, for that matter... was he actually from California as he'd claimed before his death, not Borginian as the one article they'd found said?

"As for what happened to Thalassa, that is a memory that weighs heavy on my heart even today," Valant was continuing. "It was, truly, an accident... but we still do not know which of us was to blame, and the thought we were murderers was not a happy one. Magnifi was true to his word: Not a whiff of it escaped to the public. Not even a funeral."

Apollo stared at Valant in surprise. "What... happened to her?"

Valant gave a humourless smirk. "Zak and Valant's Quick-Draw Shoot'em, we called it. The worst of all possible tricks to go wrong in rehearsal."

"O-oh," Apollo muttered, his face paling. He decided immediately this would not be information he passed on to Trucy. "I've... heard of that one..."

With a sad sigh, Valant nodded. "You would have; It was our most famous for a reason. Now I perform alone, I wield only prop guns... and even then, I rarely use them."

Apollo looked away, deep in thought. His mind was abuzz with all the new information he'd been given; He hadn't been expecting so much...

"Two last things, young Apollo."

The shorter magician looked up to meet Valant's stern eyes. "Huh?"

"While we are being frank," the elder magician explained, "because of who you are, I will turn a blind eye to 'Apollo and Artemis Gramarye'; It is your name after all. But." He paused, shaking his head. "The rights to 'Troupe Gramarye' the group... have passed to me. If you two attempt to form a troupe of your own with those names, I warn you I will have no choice but to act."

Apollo nodded. "I understand," he said. "I'm not a lawyer for nothing."

A small smile twitched at the corner of Valant's mouth, but he kept going. "Secondly, because I know you will be aware of the rumours..." He paused again, sorrow leaking through his serious expression, and firmly met Apollo's eyes. "Magnifi's death was not of my causing."

At that, Apollo could only stare in surprise. "It... what?"

"I did not kill him," Valant repeated.

Apollo stared a few moments more, unsure how to take the assertion; He couldn't see any sign of a lie. "Zak said that too."

Valant nodded, a smile on his lips. "I'm sure he did," he agreed. Before Apollo could ask for clarification, Valant turned and took a step or two down the stairs before again pausing, turning back to the younger magician. "Oh, and... good luck."

Somehow Apollo got the feeling from Valant's secretive smirk that he wasn't talking about the trial. "For what?"
"For returning to lovely Lamiroir her precious memories, of course." Valant chuckled, watching the young man with a soft gaze. "If anyone could do it, it would be you two." With that, he spun on his heel and stepped out onto the street, leaving Apollo stunned and alone on the stairs.

"There you are!"

Apollo gave his brother a smile as he re-entered the office, pulling the door to reception closed behind him. After his conversation with Valant, he'd needed some time alone to recover, but was wary of taking too long to return; He didn't want his siblings worrying about him on top of everything else that was going on. "Hey."

"We were about to send out a search party," Sycamore joked. He and Luke seemed to be standing apart from the rest of the group, who were still gathered around the television, replaying the Guitar's Serenade and talking between themselves as they occasionally pointed at the screen. "If we're to investigate this murder, we need our defence attorney."

Apollo shrugged. "Sorry. I... needed to ask Valant something."

Luke watched his brother with a concerned frown.

"No harm done," Sycamore replied with a smile. "Actually, Alfendi's so taken with that stage illusion, he's probably eager to go question Lamiroir herself on how it was done... and I get the feeling Flora will want to go wherever he does."

"Oh?" Apollo asked, surprised. "I thought they were leaning towards staying out of the investigation?"

Luke nodded, seemingly deciding to put his worry for Apollo to the side for now. "That was before Valant Gramarye came in and turned everything on its head... which I'm sure he'd be very proud of."

At that, Apollo snorted, holding back a laugh. "Yeah, he would be."

"The only problem," Sycamore continued, pushing at his glasses, "is that I doubt our entire assembled group would be permitted to run around the crime scene; I understand that dressing room is small enough as it is."

"The corridors in there are very cramped too," Apollo muttered, crossing his arms. "Seven would be very crowded for an investigation team..."

Luke pressed a finger to his chin. "We could split up? Surely we can think of something we need to look into away from the Coliseum."

Sycamore shook his head. "Unless you can think of something, I doubt that's an option. I'll be happy to sit out, but I'm not sure six is all that much smaller."

Apollo thought a moment, then shrugged. "Eh, let's discuss it on the way. Whoever volunteers to sit this bit out can wait outside."
The Lukemobile was a bit crowded as they made their way to the concert venue near the harbour, making Luke very nervous as he fruitlessly tried to convince everyone else it really was safer to just take the train than to sit Alfendi on Flora's lap and Trucy on Apollo's. Emmy eventually talked him down with some gentle teasing once she heard Trucy's nickname for the small blue car, and they were on their way.

Apollo's badge had opened the way for the group of seven to bypass the crowds and enter the car park at the back of the building, heading to the backstage door the Wrights were by now very familiar with. "So, who's volunteering to wait out here?" Apollo asked. "Aside from Mister Sycamore, of course."

Emmy sighed. "I'll sit out," she announced, then gave the surprised Flora a smile. "I'm always on investigations of my own, anyway. Why not let you young people have some fun?"

"Oh, Emmy..." Flora sighed, somewhere between concern and appreciation.

"Don't you worry about me," Emmy insisted, patting Flora's shoulder. "Desmond and I will be out here when you guys get back."

Thus the Wrights and the Laytons headed into the small backstage corridors of the Coliseum.

Alfendi was the most eager to explore, being only barely reined in by the tight grip of his sister on his hand; Even so, Flora found herself dragged to the front of the group alongside Apollo, with Luke and Trucy trailing behind. The young boy refused to remain silent, firing off question after question about everything he could see.

"Where does that way go? Why is the man on that poster in a cage? Isn't he that guy who came to visit the other day that Luke yelled at? Why's his cage on fire? Are these boxes all for the concert? Why is that PC Badger doll there? Did someone forget him?"

At first, Flora attempted to answer him, but eventually Alfendi's ceaseless queries silenced even her, and the group was forced to endure the constant source of noise. Apollo was only just starting to manage to tune the boy out when they turned the final corner to the dressing rooms, and Alfendi asked something that attracted everyone's attention.

"Isn't that the lady who disappeared in the video?"

Sure enough, Lamiroir was lingering in the hallway, her face turned towards the sound of Alfendi's voice. As Apollo spotted her, he rushed forward to greet her, Trucy at his heels. "Lamiroir!"

The woman smiled. "Ah, the attorney. Apollo, was it?"

Apollo realised with a start that, in all the confusion, they'd somehow managed to never actually introduce themselves to the singer. "Uh, yeah, sorry. It's Apollo."

"And Trucy!" Trucy added, grabbing the woman's hand to shake. "Are you okay here on your own?"

Lamiroir smiled. "Humans are blessed with five senses. Even robbed of one, we get by... though it does make being a witness rather difficult."
Even though he knew she was making light of her situation, Apollo still felt a twinge of guilt.

"I thought I could hear your footsteps," Lamiroir continued, turning towards where Luke, Flora and Alfendi were joining them. "That is... Luke, is it not? And Flora Layton?"

Luke blushed as he came to a halt, laughing nervously. "Y-yes, I'm here too, ma'am."

Flora similarly stopped in her tracks, looking a little surprised. "Oh, you remember me?" She didn't seem to mind the wrong surname, and Apollo wondered if it was a common occurrence for her.

"Naturally," Lamiroir replied with a smile. "I heard your footsteps only earlier today."

"You must have great ears!" Trucy remarked.

Lamiroir softly laughed in response.

"Oh, I should introduce my little brother," Flora said, placing her hands on said boy's shoulders as he sent a suspicious stare up at the woman before them. "Lamiroir, this is Alfendi Layton; 'Fendi, Lamiroir here is the woman from that video Mister Gramarye gave us."

"The one who disappeared?" Alfendi clarified.

Flora nodded. "Mm-hmm. Why don't you say hello?"

Lamiroir leaned down a little, looking in the direction of the boy's voice, smiling behind her veil. "Hello there, Alfendi."

Alfendi narrowed his eyes at her, his head turning to one side. "Will you tell me how you did it?"

Trucy huffed, her fists on her hips. "Alfendi! How many times do we have to tell you!?"

"But I want to know!" Alfendi retorted.

Lamiroir only laughed as she straightened up. "I'm afraid I cannot say, young one," she replied. "Mister Gramarye made me swear to never tell a soul."

Alfendi whined in disappointment, crossing his arms. "S'not fair..."

"Hard to be a magician if you can't keep a secret," Apollo pointed out, shooting the boy a smirk. "You'll just have to figure it out yourself."

"Mister Gramarye actually gave us a visit earlier," Luke picked up, talking to Lamiroir. "He gifted us a recording of your performance."

"Oh, yes!" Trucy cried, grinning in glee. "It was even better the second time! And the third!"

Apollo hid a smile. 'Calm down there, Truce...'

Lamiroir pressed a hand to her chest, bowing her head slightly. "Thank you."

"And that reminds me," Trucy continued, "you were wearing a brooch that night, weren't you? A diamond-shaped one?"

The woman frowned in thought, a hand going to the collar of her dress. "I was, yes," she replied. "I noticed after the murder that I had dropped it. I'm not sure where it went."
"Then it might be the one we found on the crime scene," Luke said, a hand to his chin.

"The crime scene?" Lamiroir repeated in surprise, then again frowned in thought. "I... did almost go back in to my dressing room after my performance. I must have dropped it then."

Apollo's eyes went wide. "Y-you did? That was you?"

Luke, Trucy and Flora gave Apollo confused stares, but Lamiroir clutched her hands together, looking pained. "I apologise. By the sound of your voice, I must have given you quite a fright."

"Y-yeah, you did a bit..."

Luke glanced between the two suspiciously. "What are you talking about...?"

Apollo sighed, shaking his head. "When Mister LeTouse was dying... or dead... just before Ema got back... I heard the door suddenly close. Nearly jumped out of my skin... but there wasn't anyone there when I got up to look."

"I was about to go in," Lamiroir picked up. "The door was ajar, so I pushed it open. Then I heard a voice, and I realised I should not be there... so I fled. I am sorry for frightening you."

"N-no, it's fine," Apollo insisted, forcing a smile. "I'm just... glad to have that mystery solved."

Trucy frowned in thought, arms crossed. For once, she kept quiet.

Apollo noticed Luke giving him a concerned look, and tried to subtly wave him off without attracting anyone else's attention, but it seemed he didn't have to worry as Flora abruptly spoke up to change the subject with a bright smile: "So, have you known Machi long, Lamiroir?"

Lamiroir nodded. "Since before I was Lamiroir," she replied, "when I was singing in a restaurant in Borginia." She paused, looking sad. "He was very kind to me when he learned I could not see."

"Is that when you started playing 'opposites'?" Apollo asked.

"Ah, no, it wasn't then," the singer answered, shaking her head. "That began after our major debut... After I became known as the 'landscape painter in sound'..."

"How did that lie even start?" Flora asked, looking confused. "Wouldn't it have been easier to choose a different title for yourself and admit you were blind?"

A smile flickered in the corners of Lamiroir's mouth. "My producer came up with that line after hearing my music," she explained. "He thought I had a global quality, that made the listener picture the country closest to their heart. It's how my music has reached so many."

Trucy sighed dreamily. "Aw, what a lovely story!"

"It was only later he learned I was blind," Lamiroir continued. "I do not mind so much myself; I simply remember that the real 'landscape painters' are the listeners, and my songs a blank canvas."

"That must have been hard for you and Machi," Luke sympathised. "You had to pretend to see and 'guide' him, and he had to pretend to be blind while guiding you."

Lamiroir nodded. "We held hands always. He would write with his finger on my palm to signal to me things I should know." She sighed sadly. "He is a smart, gentle boy."

"Don't you worry, ma'am," Flora said with an encouraging smile, "Apollo and Luke will prove him innocent for sure!"

At that, Lamiroir gave a gentle laugh. "Thank you all. Machi and I are depending on you."

Trucy watched her with a concerned frown. "Are you still worried about Mister LeTouse?"

Lamiroir's face fell. She didn't need to reply for them to know her answer.

"So no-one knew he was a secret agent?" Flora asked.

"A secret agent?" Alfendi repeated. "Like the movies?"

"He was undercover," Luke explained for the boy. "So, not much like the movies."

Alfendi huffed. "That's boring."

"Someone knew who he was, though," Apollo pointed out. "They went after him that night."

"Or he was after them," Luke replied. "Remember, he was looking for whatever it was he was carrying a replica of."

"Some kind of smuggler, then?" Flora asked, looking around the corridor. "Why would anyone working here need to be dealing in the black market?"

Lamiroir was still frowning deeply. "Why did he pose as my manager?" she quietly added. "I can only assume that he was investigating me... but why?"

Apollo and Trucy shared a concerned glance at their mother's words. "What makes you think that?" Apollo gently asked.

"Perhaps it is not so," Lamiroir admitted, shaking her head, "but I cannot deny the possibility. As my present is veiled in darkness, so, too, is my past clouded from my memory."

At that, Apollo felt Trucy's hand slipping into his and gave her a reassuring squeeze.

"I do not know my past," Lamiroir continued. "Perhaps I committed some terrible crime. Everything before becoming Lamiroir is lost to me."

Trucy shook her head madly. "B-but I don't think you-!"

"I can think of no other explanation," Lamiroir interrupted, frustrated. "Why else would an agent of Interpol approach me?"

Apollo quickly recognised the woman's anger was more directed at herself than any of them, and it only made him more worried for her. "Lamiroir, I honestly don't think your past is related to this case. You're not the kind of person who could commit the level of crime that would attract Interpol's attention... or any crime for that matter."

"Yeah!" Trucy jumped to agree. "I mean, you're such an amazing person! You're so sweet, and kind..."

Lamiroir sighed, but she gave the pair a smile. "I thank you. Machi, too, tells me this often when I fear who I might have been."

Flora watched the woman with a frown. "And... that's why you're not sure if you'll ask the Professor for help?"
"Whoa!" Alfendi cried, looking up at Lamiroir with a grin. "You're one of Papa's clients!? What are you doing in America!?!"

"She isn't yet, 'Fendi." Flora corrected him.

Lamiroir chuckled. "I am considering it," she told the boy, but her smile died as she turned her face up towards Flora. "And, to tell the truth... yes, that is why I have not yet contacted Professor Layton. After this..." She smiled again, but it was quick to fade. "Maybe running into his apprentice and his children is a sign... if I can overcome my fears... once Machi is safe."

"Ah, but I am reminded I wished to speak to you about something," Lamiroir continued, changing the subject before anyone had a chance to reply. She reached under her cloak, to a small pocket hidden in the folds of her dress. "When I was walking this hallway before, I stumbled upon this lying on the floor." She held out her hand, revealing an earpiece with attached microphone.

The three Wrights gasped. "That's been lying around since the day before yesterday!" Trucy pointed out.

"What is it?" Alfendi asked, standing on his tiptoes to see the device in the singer's hand.

"This is one of our headsets," Lamiroir explained, lowering her hand; Somehow, she must have realised Alfendi was struggling to see it. "Everyone on staff wears one during a concert."

Flora tapped a finger to her lips, frowning in thought. "I wonder whose it is..."

Apollo and Luke shared a look; They could make an educated guess. In fact, it was then Apollo noticed the once-shining green LED by the earbud had gone dark, likely having finally ran its battery down since the night of the concert.

"Why do you need them?" Alfendi asked, poking at the device.

"We use them for communication," Lamiroir replied. "You need something like this to communicate across such a large stage. Everyone on staff had one, of course... and all of the band members too, I should think. It would be quite inconvenient should it go missing."

Luke was stroking at his goatee. "Would you... happen to know their range, Lamiroir?"

"About thirty feet or so, I understand," the singer said. "A stronger signal would interfere with the sound system."

Apollo saw Luke give him a subtle nod, and the elder brother replied in kind. "We'll hold on to it for you then," he offered, taking the headset. "Prosecutor Gavin might know whose it was."

"Yes, that's best," Lamiroir agreed. "Thank you."

Trucy bounced excitedly. "Ooh, ooh, can I put it on?" she cried, and before Apollo could answer, she had grabbed at his hands and pulled the earpiece from his grasp, putting it to her ear. "Ten-four that, little buddy, this is Trucy reporting in, over!"

"I wanna play with it!" Alfendi added, reaching for the device himself. "Let me have a go!"

"No-one is playing with it!" Apollo scolded them, snatching the headset away from his sister with a frown. "This is sensitive equipment that we're returning to Gavin before one of you breaks it!"

Alfendi and Trucy both groaned in disappointment, but didn't protest as Apollo slipped the small object into his bag.
Lamiroir hid a smile behind a hand held over her veil. "If you have anything else to ask me, I will try to stay in this area," she promised. "Good luck with your search."

"Thank you," Apollo replied, a smile almost involuntarily coming to his lips as the now-familiar rush of emotions came to him at the thought of having to leave her again. "We'll see you again soon, Lamiroir. Don't worry about a thing."

"Yeah!" Trucy agreed, her pouting over the headset forgotten as she similarly gave Lamiroir a wide grin. "We'll have Machi out of there before you know it!"

Lamiroir softly laughed. "At this point, I begin to wonder if you are worrying more over me than your case," she pointed out. As the pair blushed in embarrassment, she continued, "I will be fine. And I trust you all to take care of Machi."

Apollo noticed Flora giving them an odd look and blushed harder. "Uh, yeah," he quietly agreed.

Alfendi rolled his eyes.

"Let's head to the stage next, shall we?" Luke suggested, gently guiding his siblings away from the woman. "Maybe there's someone else useful to talk to."

Flora jumped to follow, grabbing her brother's hand. As they left, she waved back at the blind woman. "See you later, Lamiroir!"

The sound of singing was the first thing the Wrights and Laytons noticed as they approached the stage, closely followed by the piano and guitar that were backing it.

Trucy briefly paused, confused. "Is that...?"

"... The Guitar's Serenade?" Apollo picked up, equally confused.

Flora gasped. "Oh! It must be Mister Gramarye!"

That was all it took for Alfendi to cry "It is!?!" and race off ahead of the group.

When the Wrights and Flora caught up to the boy, they found him standing at the edge of the stage, tugging on Valant's cape as the man silenced the music playing from the nearby mixing board. "But why can't you tell me?"

"It is against all that is sacred to inquire as to how a trick is performed," Valant replied. Apollo was pretty sure he could see a muscle twitching in his eye; Likely Alfendi was finally getting on his nerves.

Flora rushed to her brother's side, hurriedly pulling him away with an apologetic smile. "I'm so sorry, Mister Gramarye!" She then turned on Alfendi with a stern frown. "Will you stop running off!? You promised Papa you wouldn't!"

"But you knew where I was going!" Alfendi retorted. "It's only against the rules if you don't know!"

"That's beside the point!" Flora argued back.

Valant was quick to ignore the bickering siblings, waving to the approaching Wrights with a grin. "Ah ha! If it isn't Miss Trucy and Sir Apollo! And indeed it is!"
"Uncle Valant!" Trucy cried in greeting, skipping to the man's side eagerly.

Apollo gave the man a wave and a small smile, feeling a little awkward after their conversation outside the Agency. "Hello."

Luke was looking around the backstage space around them, seeming confused. "I thought you were doing some kind of run-through with the prosecution's investigation, Mister Gramarye."

"Indeed I was," Valant agreed. "But that task is done! Now, I am inspecting my equipment of illusion to make sure naught is amiss, Miss."

Trucy cooed with amazement, playing along with his wordplay.

"I take real responsibility in tasks undertaken," Valant continued, holding his cane high with pride. "Should anything go wrong, it would reflect poorly upon me and my troupe. As I went about my exacting examination, I happened to notice that suspicious piano," he pointed to said grand piano sitting on the stage with his cane, "and I remembered that fair lady's melancholy melody."

Apollo almost winced at that description of the song; It fit in more ways than one.

Trucy, meanwhile, had turned her attention to the piano, staring intensely at the instrument. "Hmmm..."

"I'm sure designing that illusion must have been a challenge," Luke said, looking up at the raised platform on the stage, likely a leftover from the run-through Valant had completed. "There was so little time between Lamiroir's disappearance and re-appearance... I can't imagine how she made it clear across the concert hall in time."

Valant laughed boastfully. "At the climax of the song, I was told to make her disappear, like a dream. But what can I work with on a stage meant for musical endeavours? There are none of the conveniences of a stage built for sorcerous acts." He frowned, shaking his head. "It was a challenging task..." He then smirked, twirling his cane in hand. "And so I accepted."

Luke giggled. "I can't argue with that, I suppose!"

Apollo found his attention wandering as he watched the conversation, barely hearing it as his mind mused on other topics, jumping from thought to thought until he landed somewhere he hadn't expected. As he ran the new realisation over in his head, his eyes turned to Luke, considering his younger brother carefully.

Valant just continued to smirk. "People come to me because I am a professional among professionals," he continued, tapping his forehead with the top of his cane. "My illusions are custom-made for a time and place. Not a bad thing, as far as the fortunes of Troupe Gramarye are concerned."

Trucy's attention was finally torn from the piano on stage. "What do you mean, Uncle Valant?"

"In Magnifi Gramarye's prime, not a day passed that he did not play upon the screens of every TV there was," Valant dramatically explained. "But, as you know, his troupe, my troupe, pulled a vanishing act. Cries for magic no longer heard, the TV screen a barren waste, stripped of illusion."

"Th-that's not true!" Trucy cried. "I still went to all your shows! Like that one in the parking lot down at the supermarket!"

Valant shook his head. "We hone our skill at these small venues, always awaiting our time..." He sighed, then pressed his cane to his chest, puffing it out with pride. "Yes, one day we will rise, up from obscurity, onto fame's shining stage once more! I do this not only for the magic that is Gramarye, but for my partner."

Luke cast a quick worried glance at Trucy, whose eyes had turned to the floor. "You mean Zak," the middle Wright said.

Valant nodded. "Yes, Zak Gramarye. Before he disappeared seven years ago, there was no name higher than Gramarye in show business circles. None." He held his cane up to the ceiling with a determined look. "I will see us returned to glory!" he proclaimed. "I, Valant Gramarye!"

"I'm rooting for you, Uncle Valant!" Trucy cried, giving him a determined look.

"Miss Trucy, you cannot grow up quick enough!" Valant replied, giving her a smile. "I need the skills of Apollo and Artemis by my side!"

"Two skills coming up!" Trucy proclaimed.

"Whoa whoa whoa!" Apollo laughed, holding up his hands to calm his sister and giving Valant a look somewhere between surprised, confused, and amazed. "Are you... offering us a job?"

Valant nodded, smirking proudly. "Once you are both old enough, of course," he clarified. "I could not break up a pair such as you."

Apollo was almost too busy grinning gratefully to notice Luke giving Valant a suspicious look.

It was at this point Flora and Alfendi rejoined the conversation, Alfendi pushing his way between Apollo and Luke while Flora stuck close behind him, still looking a little miffed from their arguing. "Lamiroir must have had a secret tunnel, right?" Alfendi asked, pointing to the raised platform. "So, when she disappeared, she could run all the way over to the other place?"

Valant laughed, brushing off the boy's question. "Maybe so, maybe no. I'm afraid I cannot say."

As Alfendi once more began to argue his point and persuade Valant to tell him how the teleportation illusion worked (his tactics seemed to have switched to guesses and working it out himself, which was at least an improvement), Apollo's attention was once more grabbed by Luke, who took a step back from the conversation and began to quietly walk around towards the stage. Valant, Flora, and Alfendi, engrossed in their discussion, didn't seem to have noticed, so Apollo carefully stepped backwards himself and quickly moved to follow his brother.

Luke had emerged onto the stage once Apollo caught up to him, standing at the piano and running a hand along the keys, too softly to sound any of them. He was staring intensely at the large instrument, as though at any moment it might shed its wooden exterior and reveal itself to be some kind of giant mecha from Luke's stories of England... or maybe that was just Apollo. Regardless, Apollo approached his brother with arms crossed, giving him a curious look. "What are you doing?"

"I know Trucy noticed, so how you didn't I can't imagine," Luke replied, moving on from the keyboard to check the music stand. "Mister Gramarye described this piano as 'suspicious' earlier. Something about it must have changed since the concert."

Apollo nodded; He remembered the comment, though his attention had been on Valant's other words at the time. "You think it's worth looking into? It might be unrelated."

"We don't exactly have a choice," Luke pointed out, finally meeting his brother's eyes with an apologetic gaze. "We don't have any evidence, remember? We need anything we can get."
"That's true," Apollo muttered, wincing at the reminder. He looked over the large instrument, unsure where to even start. Although they saw a piano every day in the office, it was a small upright model, and rarely ever was touched except for cleaning and adjusting the 'decorations' that dotted it; After growing up hearing how Phoenix played it (and its aging predecessor, before it had been destroyed in the fire), none of the Wright children were ever especially eager to go near one in the event they might encourage him, Luke even finding other methods for keeping his violin in tune. In contrast, this instrument in front of them was a massive grand piano, which had only seemed all the larger when it was Machi at its keys, all set up to play to an entire concert hall of people. It was the same black as theirs, but the paint somehow seemed glossier, more professional. If you wanted, you could peek in the top and look at its strings, which wasn't possible with the uprights Apollo was more familiar with... In fact, Apollo had half a mind to take a look while he had the chance to, just to see the inside of a piano in person.

"Are you considering it?"

Apollo met his brother's concerned eyes in confusion. "The piano?"

Luke glanced away for a moment. "Gramarye's offer," he clarified, looking uncomfortable. "Once Trucy leaves school... Do you really want to go travelling the world with him?"

At that, Apollo was stunned into silence for a moment or two. "Oh." That was a good point: Did Apollo want to put his law career on hold to pursue magic full-time? It was Trucy's ultimate goal for sure, and she would love nothing more than to do so with the very Troupe she had spent the first seven years of her life with - to tell the truth, Apollo quite liked the sound of that, too - but... under Valant Gramarye? As much as he'd suspected the man for years to be Magnifi's murderer, and had 'known' as much for three months now, Valant had seemed open as a book when he said he wasn't, and Apollo couldn't help but believe him; After all, Valant had shared so much with them, with Apollo especially, and was in the same boat as the Wrights with knowing who they (and Lamiroir, for that matter) were while not being in the position to really talk about it. Even the man's infuriating smirk had stopped being so irritating, even endearing, as Apollo got used to Valant's persona. The bottom line simply was that Valant was a magician with an incredible pedigree, having trained under Magnifi himself, and was a part of the Gramarye 'family'... It would be ludicrous to turn an opportunity like that down.

But...

Apollo sighed, shaking his head, then met his brother's eyes. "Trucy doesn't finish school for a few years yet. We'll think about it then."

Luke gave Apollo a long hard stare... then nodded and moved on.

As Luke continued to look around the keyboard end of the grand piano, Apollo decided to indulge his curiosity and take a peek at the strings. As he'd suspected, it wasn't all that exciting, though it was still interesting to see how something so large was put together, the long strings ranging ever-so-slightly in thickness from one side of the piano to the other, tied securely around what looked like bolts on either end, bits of wood holding them tight; They overlapped significantly, three quarters of the shorter end dipping underneath the last quarter of the long end and creating that distinct shape of the outside frame. He could even see the hammers near the keyboard, shifting slightly as Luke's hands glided across the keys on the other side. Above and nearby were another set of hammers with soft, felt-like edges, just resting against the strings, though Apollo had absolutely no idea what they were for.

'Wait... That's not meant to be there.'

Jammed between two strings at the shorter end of the range was a small black object; On its side, Apollo could just glimpse a splash of red, and something long and thin was sticking straight up. "Luke, look at this!" As Luke's head jerked up in surprise, the young vet rushing around the piano, Apollo pulled out his Court Record, snapping a picture of the strange object. "It's stuck between the strings."

Luke appeared at Apollo's side, then, once he was sure the photo had been taken, leaned inside the large instrument to grab at the object. With a sharp tug, it came free, the piano emitting a short jab of sounds as though someone had briefly slammed a hand down on its high notes. As Luke pulled himself back upright, he adjusted the mystery item in his hand, looking it over. "It's some kind of... remote activator or switch," he said, then held it out for Apollo to see. "Just an antenna and a button."

Sure enough, Luke was right: The splash of red Apollo had seen was a button, right next to a short antenna. Despite the single function it seemed to serve, the handle of the switch was rather bulky, maybe about the size of a smallish mobile phone... and far less useful. "Huh," Apollo muttered, looking between the object and the strings of the piano. "How'd it end up in the piano...?"

"And what does it do?" Luke added, sighing as he shot the object a glare, perhaps demanding it speak up and answer for itself on its own. "The earliest it could have gone in is after the Guitar's Serenade. I'd say someone was trying to dispose of it."

Apollo nodded, frowning in thought. "In which case it's likely connected to the murder. We just gotta find out how."

"What are you doing?"

Both Apollo and Luke jumped with a shriek, spinning around to see Trucy standing behind them, hands on her hips as she pouted at them, watching their every movement with narrowed eyes. Behind her, still stood near the mixing board at the edge of the stage, Valant, Flora, and Alfendi also watched the goings-on curiously; Apollo realised they must have been attracted by the sound of the piano strings as the switch was pulled out of them.

"Trucy!" Luke cried, giving her a relieved smile as he relaxed after the shock she had given them. "Don't surprise us like that..."

Trucy blinked, noticing the device in Luke's hands. "What's that?"

Noticing his brother looking blankly at the switch, still recovering from his shock, Apollo bit back a smile, pointing at the object. "Some kind of remote switch," he explained. "We found it in the piano."

"Oooh, really?" Trucy asked, grinning. "What does it do?"

As Trucy reached for the device, Apollo was quick to react, taking it from the surprised Luke's hands. "Don't touch it!" the elder brother warned his sister. "You might blow up the whole coliseum!"

Trucy scoffed, crossing her arms. "As if it would do something that old-fashioned! Not every strange button triggers a bomb!"

"It's still a bad idea to just press it when we don't know what it does," Luke pointed out.

Apollo crossed his arms right back at his sister. "Alright then, what do you think it does, Trucy P.I.?"

Trucy thought a moment, then grinned. "Maybe it turns on the electric razor in Mister Gavin's dressing room?"

Rolling his eyes, Apollo replied, "A switch as big as a razor to turn on a razor. Because that makes sense."

Luke sighed, shaking his head at his siblings. "We're just wasting time speculating." He reached over and gently retrieved the switch from Apollo's hand. "There's only one way to find out what this is." He strode away from his siblings, back to where Valant and the Laytons were still watching, and held the switch high in the air for them to see as he approached. "Mister Gramarye, would you happen to know what this is or who it belongs to?"

Valant shook his head, barely having to even think about it. "I have not set mine eyes upon such a thing before this day," he said. "I'm afraid I cannot help you further."

Although he couldn't see his brother's face, Apollo could tell Valant was now getting a suspicious stare, so he hurriedly stepped forward to Luke's side. "Then we'll just have to find someone else to ask. Thanks for your help, sir."

Luke shot Apollo an odd look, but Apollo ignored it.

Valant gave the brothers a deep bow. "It was my pleasure," he replied with his usual smirk.

Trucy appeared with a bounce at Luke's other side. "You'll come see the trial tomorrow, right Uncle Valant?"

Flora gasped, a hand to her mouth. "Oh, yes, will they call you to the stand to testify?"

At that, Valant gave a loud laugh. "A preposterous proposition," he proclaimed. "How could I stand to stand upon the stand? Why, my secrets would be free for the plucking!" He gave Alfendi a pointed look, and the boy pouted in reply, crossing his arms. Still chuckling, Valant shook his head.
"I might even have to sign autographs! No, I intend to remain hidden for the entire day."

Luke resumed his suspicious stare on Valant, but said nothing.

Trucy cooed in amazement. "With vanishing magic?"

"Indeed!" Valant replied, holding his cane out towards the stage as though pointing at a distant object. "I will jump upon an express train, and express myself to the next town over!"

Apollo realised the 'distant object' Valant was attempting to point to was probably the nearest train station, a short walk from the Coliseum's front doors. "You don't have to worry about being called as a witness," he assured the older man. "I'm pretty sure I've worked the illusion out... I'll tell the court what it needs to know, when it needs to know it."

"You are very kind," Valant replied, with another small bow, "but I would rather not risk it, Sir Apollo. My apologies. It pains me to part with you so."

Apollo nodded, giving him a smile. "I understand."

Alfendi was thinking to himself, frowning up at Valant and Apollo. "So... if we go to the trial tomorrow... we'll find out how Lamiroir disappeared?"

Valant laughed again, while Flora rolled her eyes. Trucy shook a finger at the boy, winking cheekily as she told him, "You can't always count on a murder during a magic trick, Alfendi. You'll have to work it out yourself next time!"

"So, that's a yes?" Alfendi asked, confused.

As everyone else laughed at the boy's question, Luke began to wave Trucy and Flora back towards the stairs. "We should be going," he pointed out, slipping the switch into his satchel. "We have a case to prove, after all."

Trucy sighed in disappointment, but gave her uncle a wave as she turned and trudged away. "Goodbye, Uncle Valant."

"Until next time, Miss Trucy!" Valant replied, waving back.

Flora also waved a goodbye, gently guiding Alfendi away, and Luke moved to follow them. Before the young vet got too far however, he was pulled to a halt by a hand on his arm, and turned around in surprise to see who it was. "Apollo?"

Apollo gestured to the girls, calling to them, "You guys go on ahead, we'll catch up." Although confused, they nodded and continued heading off down the stairs, Apollo returning his attention to Valant. "I was going to wait until after this case was over, but if you're leaving tomorrow I'll have to ask this now," the young lawyer explained.

Valant raised an eyebrow. "Another question for me?"

Luke cast another glance at the hand still gripping his arm. "Apollo, why...?"

"I'll try to be quick," Apollo promised the elder magician, casting a look towards the stairs to ensure the girls and Alfendi had disappeared down into the hallways below. "Listen, did you use a face mask when you were on stage with Gavin for the Guitar's Serenade?"

"What!?" Luke gasped, staring at his brother.
Valant thought a moment, then nodded. "Yes indeed. Why do you ask?"

"Did you happen to get it locally?" Apollo continued. "Or, really, know the local business very well?"

The elder magician raised an eyebrow. "May I ask why I am being interrogated on this strange subject, Sir Apollo?"

Apollo sighed, gently removing his hand from Luke's arm and trying not to meet his brother's wide eyes boring into the side of his head. "It's... an investigation," he explained. "One we've been on for several years now. It involves a large group of people wearing identical face masks, and we haven't been having any luck tracking them down. I was hoping you might be able to... give us some hints or something."

Valant stared at Apollo for a moment, then his gaze shifted slightly over to Luke. "Correct me if I'm wrong," he said, his eyes flicking back to Apollo, "but it is illegal to make large numbers of identical face masks here, is it not?"

"What?!" Luke cried, finally turning his attention to Valant in shock.

"It is!?!" Apollo added, equally surprised.

Luke then turned back to Apollo. "You don't know?! You're the lawyer!"

"I never looked it up!" Apollo shot back. "This is your investigation, why didn't you!??"

With a frustrated sigh, Luke dropped the subject, scrambling for his satchel to find his notebook and pen. "The moment we get some free time, we need to confirm it!" he announced, flipping his book open to a blank page and scribbling something down. "If it is indeed illegal, we've been going about this entirely the wrong way! No wonder all those companies were so polarised on whether or not they'd talk to us... Do you realise what this means, Apollo?!!"

Apollo thought a moment, then shrugged. "Maybe they ordered small batches from individual companies?"

Luke shook his head, grinning. "Unlikely. I looked into the process years ago, and it's by design prohibitively expensive to pay for a new mould; They need two for each mask: One for the outward face, and one for the inward. If they were covering their tracks that way, they'd need an additional small fortune for every new company they ordered from. No, I think it's certain they've ordered all their masks from the same place."

Apollo crossed his arms, frowning in thought. "But how does that change anything? It just means the company that sold to them is breaking the law too."

"Which means," Luke explained, a tight ball of excited determination, "that they are in on it! The kidnappers have their own mask-making technologies, and are most likely selling their skills to fund their activities! We're doing more than just finding someone to help us locate them, we're directly locating them! We're so much closer to finding her than we thought!" His voice squeaked a little, and he wiped at his eyes, still smiling. "Mum... we're almost there..."

At the sight of his brother's happy tears, Apollo wasn't quite sure what to do... so he reacted as he would to normal tears, and stepped towards Luke, putting an arm around him in a half-hug.

"I glean that my words have helped."
Apollo and Luke both jumped as they looked up at Valant, who was giving them a knowing look; they'd forgotten he was there. "Um, yes," Apollo replied, giving him a grateful nod. "Thank you. It really means a lot to us."

"Thank you so much," Luke added, an earnest, though tear-filled, smile on his face. "I honestly don't know how I didn't think to look into the laws and regulations before."

Valant gave them a small bow, the tiniest of smiles on his lips. "I would help more if I could, but unfortunately all my supplies have come from elsewhere. Good luck to the pair of you on your search."

Apollo nodded. "Thank you again, sir." With that, he placed his hands on his brother's shoulders, and gently guided the sniffing Luke towards the stairs. "C'mon, let's meet back up with the others."

View the Court Record
As they walked down the stairs, Luke wiped away the last of his tears with a sniff. "Thank you for asking him about that," he quietly said.

Apollo grinned, resting his hands on his belt. "Once I figured out he'd used a face mask in the illusion, there was no way I wasn't going to ask," he replied. "Besides, we never thought we'd find Trucy's and my mom, right? It's only fair we redouble our efforts on yours."

Luke giggled, clutching the strap of his satchel. "Yeah... Once we've proven Machi innocent, and our visitors have all left... We'll get right on finding my mum, won't we?"

"Definitely," Apollo agreed with a nod.

They found Trucy, Flora, Alfendi and Lamiroir in the hallway by the dressing rooms. Lamiroir had sat herself down on the bench cleared by the Wrights on the night of the concert, and appeared to be telling Alfendi a story, attracting the boy's rapt attention as he perched on the bench at her side. Flora and Trucy were not far away, watching the pair while occasionally whispering comments and giggling between themselves. Trucy was the first to notice her approaching brothers, dashing towards them with a grin and a shout of "You're back!", only to stop as she got close, frowning in concern. "Luke, are you okay?"

Luke gave her a big smile. "I'm fine," he insisted. "Really, I am. I hope you weren't waiting long."

"We just had one last question for Valant," Apollo explained. "All we've left to do now is talk to Ema."

Trucy was still giving Luke a worried look, but decided not to push it.

"The detective is in the dressing room," Flora added as she caught up, gesturing to the nearest door. "We saw her going in just now."

Apollo frowned in thought, watching Alfendi and Lamiroir. "Flora, is Alfendi distracted enough that the rest of us could duck in to the crime scene without him noticing?"

Flora shot the door she'd gestured to a surprised look, apparently having not realised it was the crime scene itself. "Actually, we probably could," she decided. "Lamiroir just started telling him some stories from Borginia to keep him from asking more about the magic trick, and he seems pretty taken by them."

Apollo nodded. "Good. Let's try and be quick then." Waving for his siblings and Flora to follow, he quietly ducked into Lamiroir's dressing room.

The first thing to greet the four within was the loud sound of crunching food from behind the separator wall. Apollo almost stopped in his tracks, shooting a wince to his siblings. "Uh oh. There's only one person I know who can munch with such... venom," he whispered.

The crunching sounds stopped, and a familiar face promptly appeared around the separator wall, glaring at the intruders. The moment her mouth was clear of food, she stepped around to give them a proper withering look. "What are you doing here?"

Apollo fixed a grin on his face, leading his siblings and Flora forward. "Hello, Ema. You're looking as grumpy as ever."

Ema wasn't impressed, a hand on her hip. "Oh, am I supposed to be happy? You give me the second degree in court, and Prosecutor Gavin makes me look like a fool!" She threw her hands in the air, revealing that one was tightly clutching her latest bag of Snackoos. "My department chief had a field day with that one. 'Even a blind person could see the shooter wasn't blind!'" She rolled her eyes, turning around to head back to her stool by the dressing table. "Funny guy, huh?"

Now they had reached the other side of the room, Apollo noticed it had changed a little since the night of the concert; For one thing, LeTouse was gone, the outline of his body marked with white tape and a few small numbered signs leftover from the investigation. The square of carpet where he had written his dying message had been cut out and removed, revealing the grey concrete beneath. The revolver, however, still lay where it had fallen, marked by one of the numbered signs.

"On the bright side," Luke pointed out, "we wouldn't have known what was written there if you hadn't analysed it for us."

"Yeah!" Trucy added with a nod. "We wouldn't know Mister LeTouse was with Interpol if it wasn't for you, Ema!"

Ema screwed up her face in thought, then sighed. "I suppose. Maybe that's why the chief gave me these," she held up her food bag, "after he was finished chewing me out. Said it was my reward."

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "Are chocolate Snackoos popular down at the precinct or something?"

Instead of replying, Ema just threw a handful of the sticks into her mouth.

The Wrights and Flora shared a look. Trucy gingerly stepped forward. "Um, we were hoping we could check out the crime scene again."

Ema shrugged as she swallowed her mouthful. "Be my guest. You're not going to find any clues in here." She sighed morosely. "I met my embarrassment quota for the year, that's for sure."

"I'm sure nobody blames you, Miss Skye," Flora finally spoke up. "The prosecutor was acting awfully towards you in court."

"You were watching it, were you?" Ema sighed again. "Seems like the whole world was, honestly."

Trucy was frowning in thought, arms crossed. "Um, Ema, isn't it a good thing you've met your quota?"

Ema raised an eyebrow at the teen. "How?"

"I mean, think about it," Trucy explained with a grin. "Not you don't have to be embarrassed about anything else all year!"

Apollo couldn't help a small smile of his own. "If only it worked that way."
Ema huffed, turning away. "It just bugs me to think that little kid outsmarted me. And it makes him even more suspicious now that we know he can see!" She gestured angrily to the other side of the room. "He could have seen the air duct, and he could have shot that revolver!"

"Not according to Lamiroir he didn't," Trucy insisted, giving Ema a stern look.

"You mean her saying she heard Detective Daryan's voice at the scene?" Ema replied. "And being in the air ducts at the time?" She hummed in thought, throwing another Snackoo in her mouth.

Trucy nodded, chest puffed out. "That's right."

Ema scoffed, looking away. "Why can't we have a normal, straightforward killing once in a while in this country!?

"Oh my," Flora muttered, a hand to her mouth.

Apollo rolled his eyes. "I'll pretend I didn't hear that," he told Ema.

Luke sighed, then stepped forward behind Trucy. "So, do you have any more information about what I found under the furniture?"

Ema didn't immediately respond, her hand in her Snackoo bag. After a moment she carefully folded it up and placed it in her purse. "I've been puzzling over that device we found under there," she explained, pulling out a small evidence bag with a tiny circuit board inside, bits and bobs soldered to one side with crimson wires connecting them all.

Trucy cocked her head to one side as she watched Ema remove the object from its bag. "What is it?"

"Part of something larger, I think," Ema replied, holding it out. "I still haven't a clue what. All I've found out is," she pointed to a short black wire sticking out of one end, "this is an antenna."

"An antenna?" Flora repeated. "To receive electronic signals, you mean?"

Ema nodded. "Not sure what it would do if activated, though. I'm kind of hesitant to try and force it."

Luke met Apollo's eyes, and the pair shared a look. Apollo didn't waste any time in reaching for his bag, pulling out the switch they'd found in the piano. "Ema, could you take a look at this?" He held the black object out towards her.

Ema hummed in thought. "Looks like a transmitter," she said. "Why?"

Apollo grinned. "This is just a hunch, but..."

Flora's eyes widened. "W-wait, Apollo-!"

Before he'd had time to process the call to halt, Apollo's finger had tightened on the red button of the switch, a faint click echoing as it registered the press. A millisecond later, the end of a silver cylinder on the device in Ema's hand suddenly lit up, a bright orange flame erupting from the end. Ema shrieked, dropping the device in surprise and causing Trucy and Luke to jump back, away from the flaming object. Even Apollo stepped back in shock, his finger lifting from the button, and Flora pressed against his back, eyes screwed shut as she sought protection from the miniature explosion. By the time the device hit the floor, the flame had fizzled out, leaving the open end of the tiny contraption a charred black.

Ema immediately rounded on Apollo. "What's the big idea!?"
"S-sorry!" Apollo cried, almost dropping the switch. "I-I didn't know it'd...!"

"I was trying to tell you!" Flora cried, nervously stepping back out from behind the young lawyer. "It looked like an igniter!"

Luke gave her a surprised look. "You know what it is, Flora?"

Flora sighed, brushing off her dress. "Sort of. We have little devices like that in the kitchen, for the old hot plates." She gave the object a critical look. "None as sloppy-looking as that one, though."

"It's likely homemade," Ema pointed out, carefully retrieving the object from the floor and dropping it back into its evidence bag. "At least we're getting somewhere with this case now." As she straightened up, she gave the switch in Apollo's hand a stern look, and he hurriedly shoved it away in his bag. "No no, let me see that for a second," she instructed, and Apollo reluctantly pulled the switch out again, handing it over to the detective. She studied it for a long moment, being careful to hold it only on the grip, her fingers never straying close to the bright red button.

Finally, Apollo got sick of the silence. "Well?"

"Well, this is definitely a little transmitter," she replied, handing it back to Apollo. "The signal's weak, probably only reaches thirty feet."

"Thirty feet?" Luke repeated, a hand stroking his chin. "That's about... ten metres?"

"Isn't that the same range as the headsets?" Flora pointed out.

Ema didn't answer, digging around in her purse again. A moment later, she pulled out a piece of paper with a cross-section diagram of the concert hall, showing the stage, the audience, and the dressing rooms in the backstage area down below it all. "Incidentally, looking at this..." She then pulled out a ruler, placing both flat on the dressing table as she spun the ruler around on the diagram. "Aha. Thirty feet from this room covers the backstage completely." She turned around, handing the diagram to Apollo. "It also looks like it would cover the stage."

Apollo nodded as he took the diagram, though he thought it unlikely someone on stage would have been the one to fire the switch. "Thank you."

"Keep that thing," Ema insisted. "I only printed it off just in case." Finally, she grinned, her first happy expression since their arrival. "I feel much better knowing what this device is. I'll have to look into igniters a bit more later."

"Good luck!" Trucy chirped.

Luke chuckled. "I'm glad. Paired with those fragments that were next to it, this being an igniter makes a lot of sense."

Ema's grin faded as she turned to Luke. "You said something on the night... that the timing of the murder was faked, correct?"

After a pause, Luke nodded. "You said those fragments were firecrackers?" he reminded her. "Put an igniter next to two firecrackers, then set them off from a remote location. They would sound like gunshots, wouldn't they?"

Ema didn't reply, staring at Luke for a long moment. Finally, she turned away. "I'd best be getting on with my investigation," she said.
Apollo nodded, securing the diagram he'd been given in his bag with the switch. "We'll be off to find more evidence then," he announced, and pulled out his Court Record. "Just let me get a picture of that igniter first."

"Sure," Ema agreed, holding up the small bag with its charred device.
It took a few minutes to tear Alfendi away from whatever riveting tale Lamiroir was treating him to, but eventually he was persuaded to leave with his sister. Apollo and Trucy made sure to give Lamiroir their goodbyes as they went.

"I will be here when you return," the singer promised them.

Outside, Apollo paused in surprise before closing the door. In front of them, not too far away, was Desmond Sycamore, casually chatting away with a man sporting an enormous pompadour... a very familiar man sporting an enormous pompadour.

"Uncle!" Alfendi cheerfully cried, running to Sycamore and quickly latching around his middle, where he peeked up at the stranger through the red hair falling over his eyes.

"Ah, Alfendi, there you are," Sycamore chuckled, resting a hand on top of the boy's head. "Had fun, did you?"

Alfendi mutely nodded, pressing tighter into his uncle's chest.

Flora, like the Wrights, was meanwhile staring in surprise at the other man standing nearby. "Aren't you... Detective Crescend?" she asked.

Daryan scoffed, shooting the two eldest Wrights in particular a glare. "What? Come to laugh at the murderer?"

"That old bag opens her pie hole," Daryan continued, waving a hand, "and wham-bam my life goes down the chute! Thanks. They won't let me work while I'm a suspect!"

Trucy leaned in close to Apollo and whispered, "He's not in the best of moods, is he?"

"Not many people are these days, it seems," Apollo quietly replied.

"Crime scenes aren't exactly the happiest place to hang out, though," Trucy pointed out.

Meanwhile, Sycamore was giving Daryan a sympathetic look, prying Alfendi off his abdomen. "It is a pity. A detective should be allowed to attempt to clear their name, should they not?"

"You bet," Daryan agreed, still fuming. "And Gavin had to go rub salt in the wound... My alibi's rock solid. Rock solid!"

Luke raised an eyebrow at Sycamore, but said nothing.

Flora thought a moment, still watching Daryan, then slowly smiled. "If I may say, Detective Crescend, I thought your performance during the concert was wonderful."

"You were in the audience, huh?" Daryan realised. Finally, he managed to crack a forced smirk.
"Heh. Thanks, little lady. Gotta apologise, but I'm not exactly in the mood for giving a fan the attention they deserve. Glad you enjoyed it, though."

Luke's confused and vaguely horrified look only intensified as he now turned to Flora, but he still kept quiet.

"My favourite of yours was 'Guilty Love'," Flora continued, still smiling. "It's a shame the concert was cancelled after that."

Daryan shrugged, softly chuckling. It seemed Flora's attentions were doing a lot to cheer him up. "Ah, one of our new ones. We recorded that one for the album just the other day, actually. One of Gavin's babies." His smirk faded. "Though not to the extent of Guitar's Serenade, I think. It's a classic tearjerker."

"Does he base them on real experience?" Flora asked.

"Probably not," Daryan replied. "He writes by 'feeling' more than memory." He shot a glare into the distance. "Of course, he changes the song and lyrics on a whim. Drives me up the wall."

Apollo rolled his eyes, muttering to Trucy, "Makes his court cases on a whim sometimes, too."

"He changed the lyrics to a song just before our last recording session, too!" Daryan continued, arms crossed. "Wants to put in this line about a university student obsessed with girls. Whatever!"

At that, Apollo blinked in surprise. 'Wait, what!?'

"Of course it always turns out good in the end," Daryan scoffed. "That's his talent, I suppose."

Flora tapped a finger against her mouth in thought. "He's a very good prosecutor, too. All of his cases turn out good in the end as well, don't they?"

"Guess so," Daryan muttered, clearly not happy the conversation had moved on from himself.

Sycamore nodded. "Although, as you said, your alibi is supported by hundreds of witnesses. It's a shame he can't see that."

"Exactly!" The detective huffed to himself. "This whole thing's a sham. I can't believe they aren't letting me work!"

Luke pulled at the brim of his hat. "There's no need to yell..."

Daryan didn't seem to hear, loudly continuing, "Man, I never even talked to that old windbag! How could she possibly identify me!?"

Apollo made sure to grab Trucy's arm where it wasn't obvious, just in case she decided to take offence.

"They won't let you work?" Flora asked, her head turned to one side.

"He won't let me work! Gavin!" Daryan specified, almost spitting his friend's name. "Says I gotta lie low till the suspicion is cleared. What suspicion!? He can be such a stick in the mud..."

"Mister Gavin?" Flora repeated, looking confused. "A stick in the mud?"

Daryan nodded. "He may look all flashy and showy, but he's straight as an arrow, man... 'cept when he's depressed, of course." He gestured to Apollo and Trucy. "You heard him whining the other Apollo nodded, remembering the incident with the mixing board and the missed cue.

"He's just a perfectionist, is all," Daryan sighed, his anger finally seeming to fade. "Not a bad guy, really."

Flora nodded, an eager smile on her face. "I think so too! I love the Gavinners' music!"

Daryan grinned. "The band's fine, too. Gavin can write a good tune, I'll give him that."

"Although, come to think of it," Flora continued, "I was expecting to see him near the crime scene... but he doesn't seem to be here."

"Nah, he'll be down at the prosecutor's office, most likely," Daryan replied. He then looked away, a tight expression on his face. "The data on the victim should have come in from Interpol... Normally, I'd be down there dealing with it." His glare deepened. "Normally."

Apollo cleared his throat. "Well, we need to see him, so we'll be going now." He patted Trucy's back, signalling for his siblings to head back towards the front of the building. "C'mon, Truce."

"Say 'hi' for me, okay?" Daryan called. "Oh, and 'screw you'. And tell him I want into that crime scene!"

"We will, Detective!" Flora cheerfully told him, giving him a wave. She took her brother's hand and moved to follow the Wrights. Sycamore was at her heels.

"Hey, wait!"

The group stopped and turned as one, seeing Daryan jogging up to meet them. "Y-yes?" Apollo asked.

"What do you really think happened?" the detective asked, fixing Apollo with an intense stare. "Really? You don't think I did it, right?"

Apollo felt his mouth turn dry.

"Naturally, we think you didn't," Sycamore replied on Apollo's behalf, a friendly smile on his face. "There's nothing stronger than your alibi, is there?"

"Exactly!" Flora agreed. "Even the defence has to agree you were on stage during the third act!"

Luke gave the pair of them horrified looks.

Daryan gave them a proud grin, then turned to Apollo. "Listen to your pals, eh? Don't get led astray by some siren song. Get this one wrong, and you'll be eating humble pie for a year." He scoffed, turning to walk away. "I'll bake it myself."

As the man left, Trucy pulled at her eldest brother's arm. "Let's not talk to him anymore," she said.

"Agreed," Apollo muttered, and quickly led the group away. 'I'll certainly admit, Detective Daryan Crescend is one stone I'd leave unturned if I had a choice...’

"What was that!?!" Luke cried the moment he was sure they were out of earshot, looking between Flora and Sycamore. "You two know he's the murderer, why were you agreeing with him!?!"

Sycamore laughed, pushing at his glasses. "I believe the correct term for what we were doing, Luke," he replied, "is 'sucking up'."

Flora nodded in agreement, frowning. "Mm, it's a pity. I was hoping talking about the Guitar's Serenade or Guilty Love might get him to slip up and say something incriminating."

Luke looked between them a moment more, then sighed, pressing a hand to his face.

"Wow, Flora!" Trucy gasped, and fixed the woman with a wide grin. "You're more devious than I thought!"

"Thank you!" Flora proudly chirped, brushing at her ponytail.

Apollo smiled, holding back a laugh at his brother's exasperation. "So you guys never believed him at all?"

"Goodness no," Sycamore chuckled. "I have no doubt the dear detective is a murderer... but I wasn't exactly going to say so in front of him." He shook his head. "As painful as it was, it was easier to just go along with him and keep him distracted, in case he tried to push his way inside." He frowned at the sky. "It's been a very long time since I had to put that much effort into an act."

Luke gave Flora a dark look. "You should be more careful, Flora. You're picking up Descole's tricks."

"How else am I supposed to keep up with the Professor on an investigation?" Flora asked with a knowing wink.

"And I was under the impression you'd forgiven me for all that, Luke," Sycamore added, shooting the young vet a smirk. "Are we reverting back to the glares and thinly-veiled barbs?"

Luke turned red, looking away with a chastened expression.

Although he was walking at his sister's side, Alfendi's attention was firmly behind them, frowning in thought. "So that's what a murderer looks like..."

Trucy put on her best airs of wisdom. "Yep. Get a good hard look, Alfendi, because murderers all look different on the outside; You gotta look at the inside to identify them."

Apollo rolled his eyes. "I'm a hundred percent sure that's not how it works."

Alfendi snorted, looking up at Apollo with a grin. "That's awfully sure for someone who's wrong!"

"Eyyy!" Trucy cried with a proud grin, holding up her hand. Alfendi giggled as he high-fived her.

Sighing, Apollo decided to ignore them.

By now, the group had reached the front of the building, and paused momentarily to slip out through the wire fence, the policeman on guard waving them through. With the din of the nearby crowd around the Coliseum's entrance, the group fell silent as they hurried past, heading down into the arena area immediately adjacent. As they passed the fountain of flowers, Flora turned to Sycamore with a puzzled look. "By the way, Uncle, what happened to Emmy? Wasn't she waiting with you?"
"Ah, Emmy... I forgot about her in the fuss with the detective," Sycamore muttered, pushing at his glasses. "Don't worry, she decided to return to the Bostonius shortly after you all went inside."

"Why'd she do that?" Luke asked. "I thought she wanted to help the investigation."

"She did," Sycamore agreed. "She's been dwelling on it, actually." His walk slowed as they approached the other side of the arena, and he sat down on the large steps, the group coming to a natural halt around him. "I'm sure you recall the pair of us once travelled to Borginia ourselves not too long ago?"

Apollo nodded. "You had that tourist phrasebook you lent us."

Flora looked worried as she sat at her uncle's side. "Is Emmy still upset it wasn't much help?"

Sycamore sighed. "Unfortunately." He patted the concrete seating at his side. "Feel free to sit down, everyone; This is a bit long."

At that invitation, Alfendi didn't hesitate to jump to Sycamore's side opposite his sister, grinning, and his actions seemed to convince Trucy, who shrugged and happily sat next to him. Apollo and Luke, seeing the line now in front of them, decided to gingerly lower themselves to the bricks under their feet rather than sit either behind the group or far enough to the sides that it would just be awkward trying to listen to Sycamore's story.

Once everyone was comfortable, Sycamore began to explain.

View the Court Record
"It was because of Emmy we decided to go to Borginia," Sycamore began. "It's a tiny country, with an even tinier emigration rate... Her editor thought it might be an unexplored venue for international gossip, and Emmy agreed." He shook his head. "Naturally, they don't speak English outside of the airport, so we took our time preparing before taking the plunge, as it were; Emmy would need to be able to communicate effectively with people if she wanted a story, and she was very insistent that she didn't want to rely on a translator if at all possible."

"Really?" Trucy asked.

Flora frowned in thought. "So... she was learning Borginian?"

Sycamore nodded. "She never became perfectly fluent, but it was enough." He smiled. "And what she couldn't say, I always could; That tourist phrasebook was mine."

"Hence why it was supposed to be in your study," Flora realised.

"Indeed," Sycamore chuckled. "In the end, Emmy just wrote an article about Borginia itself, nothing specific. We spent two weeks there in total." He frowned. "Although Borginia's customs are very strict. I feared they weren't going to let us leave at all... They refused to allow us to take off until they'd checked every inch of the Bostonius for illegal activity."

At that, Luke snorted. "Hope you hid the Descole outfit."

Sycamore gave him a wry look. "As far as I could tell, they'd never heard of him, fortunately."

Apollo pressed a finger to his forehead, thinking. "So, if Ms Altava could speak Borginian... How long ago was this that she couldn't talk to Machi for us?"

"A few years now," Sycamore replied. "After the hassle of trying to leave, we mutually decided we never wanted to return. Emmy threw out her Borginian books, I put my phrasebook on a hidden shelf, and the both of us willingly let go of anything we'd learned of the language; We didn't think we'd ever need it again."

Trucy huffed. "That's irony, right?" she asked. "When you think you won't need something, so you get rid of it, but then you do need it once you don't have it anymore?" She then smiled. "That's why I never throw anything out!"

"That's why your bedroom is a mess," Apollo pointed out, an eyebrow raised.

"And that's why Emmy has returned to the Bostonius," Sycamore continued. "Her books may be gone, but she still has her digital study materials in a back-up somewhere. She's determined she wants to refresh her memory and re-learn what Borginian she can, in order to aid you in communicating with your young client."

"Really?" Luke asked, surprised. "She's doing all that... for us?"
Sycamore nodded, giving the Wright brothers a smile. "Of course. We all want to help you succeed, if we can."

Luke blushed, embarrassed. Apollo gave the man a grateful smile, saying, "You've all been a lot of help. I don't know if we'd be as far along in this case without you guys."

There was a lull in the conversation, a moment of two of silence as the topic reached its natural conclusion... and was promptly broken by Alfendi, tugging at Sycamore's sleeves. "Uncle? What are we doing now?"

"That's a good question," Sycamore replied, again looking to the Wright brothers. "I believe you two are heading to the Prosecutor's Office, you said?"

Apollo nodded. "We need to talk to Gavin."

"I'll go with you!" Trucy cried, her hand shooting into the air.

"Me too!" Flora agreed, smiling eagerly. "I didn't get much of a chance to speak to Mister Gavin last time!"

Sycamore turned his attention to his nephew. "And what about you, Alfendi?"

The six-year-old thought for a long moment. "Um... If it's okay... I want to see that video of Lamiroir disappearing again," he finally replied. "I... think I might have figured out how he did it...? I'm not a hundred percent sure."

Luke giggled. "That's fine Alfendi, you can watch it again. We left it in the DVD player."

Trucy gave the boy a wink. "And you can tell us what you've worked out later when we meet back up! Polly and I will tell you what you've got right!"

Alfendi grinned in pride.

And thus the group split up to go their separate ways once more. Luke gave Sycamore detailed instructions on how to work their TV set-up, then Apollo refreshed them on the route back to the Agency, Trucy entrusting them with her keys so they could get inside. After promising to call them should he have any trouble, Sycamore took his young nephew and headed off for the train station a couple of blocks away, while Flora and the Wrights headed back to Luke's car. It was a much roomier journey with only the four of them, and it was easy enough for Apollo, having been to the Prosecutor's Office before, to direct his brother to its location.

"You've been there before?" Trucy asked in surprise.

"Uh, yeah," Apollo replied, waving a hand as if to brush her question off. "It was... for a case. I wanted to ask Uncle Edgeworth something."

Luke cast his brother a glance, his attention glued by necessity to the road. "Which case was that?"

Apollo thought a moment, steadfastly keeping his eyes out the window. "Don't remember," he insisted. "It's not important, anyway."

Finally, they arrived at the tall office building, just one in a group of identical office towers that filled the nearby streets, though it seemed to be the tallest in the immediate area. Luke circled for a while before he found a nearby parking lot with free spaces, and the quartet made their way inside. Klavier, it turned out, was on one of the higher floors, with enough distance off the ground to look down on the surrounding buildings... as Trucy was happy to point out once they exited the lift, passing a window by the stairwell.

"Look at all the people down there! They look like rice grains!"

Apollo found the door matching the number the receptionist gave them, sitting slightly ajar. "Hello?" he called, and pushed it open.

The first thing that struck Apollo as he entered Klavier's office was how different it managed to be from Edgeworth's, despite having the same basic structure of the rectangular room and the floor-to-ceiling window at the back; The wooden floor-boards were the only identical thing between the two Apollo could pick out. On the right wall, where Edgeworth had tall shelves full of files, Klavier had a glass display case full of guitars, while the left wall was coated with a strange array of wooden blocks that stuck out, preventing anything from hanging on it. There was no curtain or shelves separating the view out the window from the room inside, making Apollo feel dizzy at just the thought of getting too close to it. From the ceiling along the left wall hung three truly massive computer monitors, all on and displaying what looked like evidence... though only one of them had anything Apollo recognised from LeTouse's murder, specifically a photo of the bloodstained carpet once the man's body had been removed. Aside from the floor and a small side-table holding a jug and glass, the only flat surfaces in the room were a pair of enormous speakers, red tablecloths draped over them: One carried a display full of Gavinners CDs and what looked like a stereo system (as well as an adorable ukulele), while the other held a miscellany of small objects and a familiar-looking charred guitar, wrapped in a white cloth. A stool stood amongst piles of folders on the floor, holding a covered tray, and, at the back of the room, a large massage chair sat on a round carpet, its back to the door and the black and white keys of a keyboard visible on an attached stand.

"Look, don't give me excuses, why isn't this information getting through?"

Apollo grabbed Trucy's shoulder as she tried to push past him. "Sounds like he's on the phone," he whispered.

Trucy gasped, a grin on her face. "Let's eavesdrop on him!"

"Maybe we should come back later?" Flora suggested.

"We're just waiting for him to finish!" Trucy continued, undeterred by her brothers' disapproval. "So what if we hear something scandalous about the band while we're here, innocently wanting to talk to him?"

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "What, you're an agent for Ms Altava now?"

From behind the massive back of his chair, Klavier sighed. "Just get me that report, okay? Chop chop." There was a beep, and Klavier groaned, his chair slowly beginning to spin away from the window and into their sight, a phone in hand. "It's times like this when I start to miss Daryan..." A moment later, his face came into view, a deep frown that turned to widened eyes as he spotted the quartet standing in his doorway. "Huh?"

Apollo sheepishly grinned, giving the man a wave. "Erm, hiya!"

Trucy giggled. "Just thought we'd drop in!"
"W-we can come back later if you're busy, Mister Gavin," Flora nervously added, her hands clasped together. "I hope you're not mad..."

Luke said nothing, hanging at the back of the group and staring at the floor.

Klavier gave them an easy grin, pushing himself off his chair as he slipped his phone into a pocket. "How could I be?" he told Flora, waving them in. "Have a seat."

Apollo raised an eyebrow as he looked between the two lone chairs in the room, one taken by the covered tray and the other with a German prosecutor still half-sitting in it.

"That's so kind of you!" Flora gushed as she eagerly stepped into the room, Trucy equally gleeful at her side. "We won't take up too much of your time, we promise!"

Klavier chuckled. "So, who have you come to see?"

The girls paused, shooting each other confused looks. "Huh?" Trucy asked.

"Klavier, lead vocalist for the Gavinners," Klavier asked, brushing at his fringe with a leisurely smile, "or Prosecutor Gavin, scourge of the courtroom?"

Flora and Trucy still looked confused, and Apollo couldn't blame them. "Are those our only choices?" he asked, joining the girls to stand at his sister's side. "The concert or the case?"

"Aren't they all the same thing?"

Apollo spun around in surprise as he heard his brother speak, seeing Luke still standing near the door with a small smile on his face. "Luke?"

"Lead vocalist and prosecutor, the concert and the murder," Luke continued, holding up his hands as though weighing half of each pair in them. "They're the same things. You can't talk to, or about, one without having to include the other."

Klavier shrugged, amused. "A good point, Herr Doktor." He chuckled, running his eyes up and down the vet. "I see we are on speaking terms once more, then."

Luke nodded, stepping forward to join his siblings. "I should apologise again; It was my own error to assume you could see the same things in Lamiroir's testimony that I could."

At that, Klavier's lazy grin seemed less genuine and more confused.

"I believe the phrase is," Luke continued with an innocent smile, "'never ascribe to malice what you can instead ascribe to stupidity'?"

Klavier's expression darkened into a glare. "I got your point, Herr Doktor." He brushed at his fringe. "Needless to say, your jibes will all mean nothing if you cannot prove your case in court tomorrow, which I have every confidence you can't."

"And yet you've still taken Detective Crescend off the case," Apollo pointed out with a raised eyebrow. "Isn't that admitting to the possibility?"

Klavier shook his head. "It is not up to my personal thoughts on the matter. Given the delicate situation, with him and Lamiroir both, I felt it would be kinder to separate him from the investigation."

Apollo shrugged. He couldn't really argue with that.
"I like your stereo!" Trucy cried, pointing to the nearby CD player on one of the massive speakers.

Klavier didn't seem to mind the sudden change of topic, giving Trucy a wide smile. "To me, a life without music is inconceivable," he told her. "I never turn down the volume, even when I'm working on a case."

"But these speakers are enormous!" Flora pointed out, surprised. "Surely they're awfully loud?"

Chuckling, Klavier gestured to the walls. "This room is completely soundproof, of course."

Luke smiled, looking at the oddly-designed left wall. "I thought so. It's been a while since I've seen such efficient sound-proofing."

Apollo tried not to visibly huff at the prosecutor. 'Lucky bastard. We can always hear if the neighbour turns on their TV...'

The younger brother then pointed behind them, continuing, "Although, the open door does defeat the purpose a little."

Klavier chuckled. "It is never left open by me, I assure you."

Meanwhile, Flora's attention had turned to the tall chair. "Is that... the 'replica' Detective Crescend was showing off in court?"

Apollo looked back and noticed the covered tray did indeed seem to be holding the lump of white plastic they had seen from a distance only hours ago in the courtroom. It was sat under a bell jar, looking for all the world like a discarded stick of used gum.

"Oh yeah, the thing Mister LeTouse was looking for!" Trucy said, grinning. "Is that what your phone call was about?"

Klavier's eyes widened. "Wait a second! You were listening in!"

"Who? Us?" Trucy quickly replied, face paling. "I-I tried to stop them, really, but they forced me to!"

"We forced you?" Luke repeated with an unamused frown.

"Exactly!" Trucy only said.

Klavier just sighed, waving the girl's claims off. "We still haven't identified it, if that's what you're asking. You can take a closer look if you wish... although I really shouldn't be offering, should I."

Apollo decided not to look a gift-horse in the mouth and stepped away from the conversation to peer at the strange lump through the bell jar covering it. Just as Daryan had said in court, it appeared to be just a harmless blob of plastic, positively tiny at only four centimetres in length... Although Apollo's closer examination did give him an excellent view of the large 'SAMPLE' printed across one side, and the slightly ribbed texture of the cloudy-coloured exterior. 'It's amazing how something only an inch and a half big can be so important to a case...'

"What do you know about it?" Luke asked. "Other than it's a replica of whatever Mister LeTouse was searching for, of course."

Klavier shrugged. "Nothing, unfortunately. I've put in a request to Interpol via my contacts in Borginia, but apparently there is a block on information somewhere along the chain."

"Really?" Flora muttered in surprise. "That's odd."

"Indeed," Klavier agreed. "There's something about this little piece of plastic that Interpol doesn't want to tell Borginia. It's a real pain."

Flora frowned in thought, tapping a finger against a cheek.

Klavier sighed again. "I've sent someone to the Coliseum to fetch Lamiroir. Perhaps she knows something about it, being a Borginian." He shot the Wrights an unamused grin. "I think I can safely assume you all know why I couldn't have asked her in court, ja?"

Trucy nodded, giving Klavier a stern stare. "I told you to make sure someone was looking after her, didn't I?"

Chuckling, Klavier returned her nod. "Indeed you did, Fraulein."

"That reminds me," Apollo said, moving away from the odd object and shoving a hand into his bag. "We found this on the floor backstage. I think it's yours?" He pulled out the small headset, holding it out for the musician to see.

As her brother arrived at Trucy's side, the teen's face fell. "Do we have to give it back?"

Apollo shot her an unamused look. "Yes. It's not a toy."

"I know that!" Trucy cried, crossing her arms. "I was just thinking we could use it in our show!"

"By stealing it?"

"We could get our own!"

"By stealing them?"

"Guys," Luke said, snapping the two out of their bickering with a stern look. "Can we save this for later, please?"

Klavier laughed. "Please, you may keep it," he told them. "Consider it a gift."

"Really?" Trucy cried, and she didn't hesitate to snatch the earpiece from the surprised Apollo's hand, putting it back on her ear with a grin. "Look at me, I'm concert security!" she giggled.

Flora gave the teen a warm smile. "You certainly look like you belong on a stage, Trucy!"

"Thanks, Flora!" Trucy happily replied.

Apollo rolled his eyes, but decided to leave it.

Meanwhile, Luke was watching Klavier, disconnected from the levity. "Is there any way to identify who would have worn it on the night of the concert?" he asked. "Were they signed out of a stash, for instance?"

Klavier shook his head. "There is nothing special about the tour-issue headsets," he explained. "Anyone who needs one, takes one. We inevitably lose a few here and there."

Luke frowned and nodded. "I see."

"Speaking of the concert," Klavier continued, frowning himself, "did you see the paper today?"

"Yes!" Trucy proudly announced, a gloved hand shooting into the air. "I always read the TV section, and Polly reads the funnies, don't you Polly?"

Apollo shrugged, looking away as he pretended his face wasn't turning red.

"Good girl," Klavier told her with a smile. He turned to Flora. "And you, Fraulein?"

Flora thought a moment. "Uncle picked up a copy of the Times at the courthouse," she replied. "I saw some of that over his shoulder while we were waiting for the trial to start."

"And I read the paper before leaving home this morning," Luke added. "Why do you ask?"
Klavier briefly snorted in laughter, though he didn't look all that amused. "Then you will not have seen this." He reached behind him and pulled a newspaper from the arm of his gigantic massage chair, holding it out for the quartet to see. Emblazoned across the top, above a glamour shot of the Gavinners on stage, was the headline: "Concert of Tragedy: The Prosecutor's Deadly Song".

Immediately Luke was biting back a grin, his attempts not to laugh almost more obvious than a simple smile would have been.

"What...?" Flora asked, shaking her head in confusion. "I don't understand..."

Trucy gasped in recognition. "The Guitar's Serenade!"

Apollo frowned. "Really? That's what the press latched on to?"

Klavier sighed, tossing the paper at the chair behind him. "Since getting back from the trial, my phone has been ringing off the hook," he explained, shooting a dirty look at Luke's stifled giggles. "'How does it feel to take a man's life with a song?' 'Have you ever hummed a man all the way to death row?' 'Do you think you could sing for me over the phone?' It is endless. Endless!" He threw his hands in the air with a groan.

Luke managed to bring his amusement enough under control to innocently suggest, "Maybe it was a bad idea to bring that theory of yours up during the trial then, Prosecutor Gavin."

Klavier glared at him. "I'm greatly looking forward to hearing your evidence against it in court, Herr Doktor."

"Is that another newspaper you have there?" Flora interrupted, pointing to the arm of the chair where Klavier had retrieved the first paper. "It doesn't look like it's in English."

"Ah, yes," Klavier replied, turning to retrieve it. "The Borginian Daily Bugle." He handed it to the young woman. "Go ahead, take a look."

Flora politely took the item, looking over the front page. "That looks like Lamiroir," she said, showing the front page's centre image to Trucy at her side.

"That's her promotional picture," Trucy explained. "The same one from her postcards..."

"Thank you," Apollo told Klavier, "but none of us can exactly read Borginian."

Klavier winced. "Oh, that's right." He shook his head. "Suffice it to say, this is big news over there as well... though they didn't go so far as to mention the lyrics to my song."

Luke was biting his lip again, failing to hide his smile. "I'm sure they could see there was little evidence for the outrageous theory and decided not to mention it."

Although he sighed in exasperation, Klavier seemed to decide to let the comment go. "Lamiroir's testimony will probably be in the evening edition, I'd imagine," he continued. "That's why I've had Daryan step down from the investigation for now."

"The 'delicate situation' you mentioned?" Flora asked.

"We did run into him moping outside the Coliseum," Trucy added with a sage nod.

Klavier smiled a little at that. "Lamiroir was my invited guest, remember. You understand why I want to solve this case... quickly, if possible."
"We want this case solved quickly just as much as you do," Apollo replied with a stern look. "It's more than just the situation that's delicate here; Lamiroir and Machi, for their own well-being, need these false charges lifted."

Klavier met Apollo's determination with a smirk that seemed almost proud. "I look forward to seeing your evidence in court tomorrow."

Flora broke the silence, folding up the Borginian newspaper in her hands. "Speaking of the song, I was meaning to compliment you on the Guitar's Serenade, Mister Gavin," she said. "It's a beautiful song."

"It was the best!" Trucy added with a grin, fists pressed to her cheeks. "Such a great atmosphere!"

Klavier laughed. "Thank you, Frauleins!"

"You co-wrote it with Lamiroir, right?" Apollo asked.

"That's right," Klavier replied. "It was last year; I had gone to tour Borginia's legal system, as a matter of fact."

Luke's giggles seemed to have finally halted, as he was now stroking his goatee with a thoughtful look. "And you first heard of Lamiroir while you were there?"

"It was at a small jazz club," Klavier explained, then sighed wistfully. "I wept that night. I knew I had to meet her, to talk with her... so I used my influence, which is not inconsiderable, to arrange a meeting." He grinned proudly. "Thankfully, she liked the work I did, and we wrote a song right there, backstage." He stared at the ceiling, a nostalgic smile on his face. "Machi on piano, that dulcet voice, and myself on a guitar that I borrowed from Lamiroir. It is a memory I hold dear."

"And music history was made!" Trucy squealed. "You wrote the Guitar's Serenade that night, didn't you?"

"Indeed," Klavier chuckled. "And the very guitar is right over there." He gestured behind the group, to the burned remains of the acoustic guitar laid out on one of his massive speakers.

Apollo blinked in surprise. "You mean that charred lump?"

"Don't call it a 'lump'!" Trucy protested. "That's a piece of history! And it's only browned, not really 'charred'!"

"It doesn't exactly look capable of ever making music again," Flora gently pointed out.

Klavier shook his head. "No matter. I shall never sing that song again. I wouldn't have used that guitar again either, even if I could have."

Apollo resisted the urge to point out it hadn't been Klavier who sang the song in the first place.

"What exactly happened to that poor thing?" Flora asked.

Klavier nodded. "I thought it was one of the staff playing a gag on me," he told Flora. "I never guessed that wasn't the end of it... They say the best guitars burn the brightest for a reason." He then turned to the Wright brothers. "I had a specialist analyse it, incidentally."

Trucy cocked her head to one side in surprise. "Oh? Did you find anything out?"
"He didn't have a lot of time, so it's still unclear," Klavier explained, shaking his head. "But the results he came up with were... intriguing."

"Intriguing?" Apollo repeated.

Luke seemed to have picked up on something else, frowning intently at the destroyed instrument. "Wait, you said this was Lamiroir's guitar?" he asked. "How did it end up with you?"

Klavier chuckled. "She gave it to me," he said. "It was a beautiful instrument. It was played lovingly for many years. A guitar befitting a woman like Lamiroir." He sighed. "I mentioned how much I enjoyed playing it that night, and she made a present of it."

"So it came all the way from Borginia?" Trucy realised.

Klavier nodded. "That it did. We couldn't carry it on the plane - changes in air pressure and humidity ruin the wood - so we vacuum packed it in Lamiroir's studio. I used a special shipping service available to me for transporting evidence." He grinned proudly. "They brought it right up to my office for me, pristine and untouched."

Flora gave the guitar a sad look. "It's such a shame it got burned."

In contrast, Luke's suspicious gaze only seemed to have hardened.

"What was it you were saying earlier?" Apollo asked Klavier. "Something about intriguing results from an examination of the guitar?"

"That's right!" Trucy agreed. "What was that all about?"

Klavier thought a moment, then turned to Luke, dragging the young vet's attention from the instrument. "You will know this, Herr Doktor: The name of the hole in the front of a guitar?"

Luke nodded. "You mean the sound hole?"

"That's the one," Klavier replied. "They found something attached to the wood just inside, a broken device of some sort."

Flora's eyes widened. "A broken device?"

"Yes." Klavier walked past them to the speaker the guitar was lying on, and reached for one of the many small objects littered around it: A small evidence bag, the silver and green of a circuit board visible within. "This, in fact. The examiner is busy with evidence for the case now however, so he'll be checking this out once he's finished with everything else." As he turned back to face the quartet, he held up the evidence bag for them to see.

Apollo, Trucy and Flora gasped, gazes locked on the slightly-blackened device held in the clear plastic. Luke's eyes widened for a moment, then he frowned.

Klavier raised an eyebrow, looking between the four. "What is it? You recognise this?"

"Unfortunately," Flora muttered, looking to Apollo.

Apollo sighed, then reached into his bag to pull out his Court Record. "We saw another just like it only an hour ago," he explained, flicking through to find the photo he'd taken of Ema's igniter in its bag, her painted fingernails visible where she gripped it. "It was at the crime scene." He spun the tablet computer around to show off the picture, and Klavier gasped as he compared the two devices, one bright and new while the other was charred and worse for wear; It was beyond apparent that, apart from the coating of soot, they were identical in every way.

"What is it?" Klavier mumbled.

"Think about it, Mister Gavin," Luke replied. "You found one of these in your guitar, which burned to pieces in your hands on the same night as the murder. What do you think it is?"

Klavier frowned, not looking happy with the answer he had in mind. "Which raises the question of what an igniter was doing at the crime scene." He sighed, playing with his hair as he tossed the evidence bag back on the 'table' behind him. "Regardless... I believe that covers everything I'm at liberty to talk to you about."

"Oh, really?" Trucy asked, surprised.
"Thanks for dropping by," Klavier replied, giving the group a smug grin, "Herr Forehead."

Apollo felt his siblings' (and Flora's) confused stares on him, and felt he had to agree. "Thanks...?"

Klavier laughed. "Why, you gave me so much information! That igniter, for instance."

"Oh," Apollo mumbled, shooting the man a glare. "That."

"I've never met an attorney so forthcoming with the prosecution," Klavier continued, highly amused. "It's a big help. Or perhaps you're just a tad naive, hmm?"

Apollo heard Luke scoffing at his side. 'That's true, we could have refused to tell him anything... but he'd have found out when he next spoke to Ema anyway.' The young magician shook his head, then gave Klavier a grin of his own. "I could say the same to you, Prosecutor Gavin."

Klavier blinked, his smirk fading to a confused look.

"Thanks for the information," Apollo continued. "About your guitar, to name just one thing. It's far more important to this case than you realise. 'At least I hope it is. It can't be a co-incidence that both it and the murder happened at more or less the same time...'

Trucy snorted as she hid giggles.

Klavier softly laughed under his breath, shaking his head. "I've been thinking, Herr Forehead... We encounter many incidents in our lives, all of us... not all of them simple."

Luke looked away, contemplative. "You can say that again..."

"That is why I try to at least remain simple inside," Klavier continued. "And I keep a simple goal: to discover the truth." He gave Luke a pointed look, smirking. "And I prefer to keep relations civil, ja? That's all."

Aside from the widening of his eyes, Luke froze where he stood, face turning red.

Apollo felt a little embarrassed himself: He could remember how he'd reacted the first time they happened to run into Klavier at People Park, barely holding in his rage at seeing the man who'd accused their father of forgery... and, in a way, that hadn't stopped. He still blamed Klavier, at least partly, for Phoenix's disbarment, though his anger had faded as time passed, watching Trucy fall for him (though she kept her fangirling at a minimum), Luke deciding to trust him (even if that had so recently gone sour), Phoenix insisting Klavier wasn't to blame (while still treating him rather coldly when they ran into each other at the courthouse)... Klavier had apparently been trying to befriend them, being so affable at People Park, helping to convict Tiala, inviting them to the concert, arranging for Machi's defence request to go to the Wrights, and even now happily sharing information with the 'opposing side'. Despite the man's efforts, Apollo didn't think he could ever be friendly towards the rock star prosecutor, no... but civil? Civil he could do.

Apollo gave Klavier a smile. "I can live with that."

Klavier's returning grin was the most genuine Apollo had ever seen.

"M-me too," Luke quietly added, still red as he avoided Klavier's eyes. "I'm sorry again."

"Heh, maybe you should have given me a testimony yourself on the night, Herr Doktor," Klavier told Luke. "It would have saved us both a lot of headaches, ja?"
Luke nodded, hesitantly glancing up at the prosecutor's face. "I guess so. I'd say I'll be more careful next time, but that's just tempting fate."

Klavier laughed.

Trucy frowned thoughtfully for a moment or two, then, avoiding Klavier's eyes, asked, "Um, Mister Gavin?"

"Fraulein?" Klavier promptly replied with his usual friendly smile.

"Can I ask why you sing in a band?"

Klavier chuckled. "Because I want women to turn and look when I walk down the street."

Apollo rolled his eyes.

"That's very simple, too," Flora realised.

Still laughing under his breath, Klavier turned and began to saunter towards the door. "Now if you'll excuse me, I've got work to do," he announced, waving. "Another time perhaps."

"Until then, Mister Gavin," Luke replied, and led Flora and his siblings out of the room. Trucy lagged at the back of their group, giggling, but Apollo didn't get a chance to see what had caught her attention; She had already finished and was dashing past her eldest brother by the time he'd turned around.

Once Klavier had locked his office door behind them, he was quick to dash off, but the Wrights took their time, Apollo rounding on Trucy with a stern look. "What did you do."

Trucy grinned innocently. "Who says I did anything?"

"I heard you giggling back there," Apollo explained, gesturing with his head to the now-locked office they had exited only a minute ago. "What did you do?"

Luke joined in the stern look on their sister. "Trucy..."

"I didn't do anything!" Trucy insisted, still grinning brightly. "I was just thinking, while we're here, we could stop by Uncle Edgeworth's office and say hi!"

"Would he mind that?" Flora asked. "This is an office building..."

"He would mind that," Apollo agreed. "Besides, we don't have the time; We need to find this evidence for Machi, don't we?"

Trucy huffed, but she didn't complain.

"Let's hurry up," Luke reminded them. "We should get back to the Coliseum. Maybe Ema has something new for us."

On the way back to Luke's car, they passed Klavier standing out on the street with Daryan, the pair engaged in a quiet argument once more. Neither noticed the Wrights, and the quartet weren't eager to attract their attention, so they quickly slipped past in the crowds covering the pavement.

It was going to be a while until they got back to the Coliseum.
Hi Emmy this is Trucy, Luke wanted me to ask how you were doing.

Hi Trucy! I'm doing just fine. Found my old back-up harddrive and am going through it now. How's your investigation going? Desmond told me you went to the prosecutors office?

    Yep! We had to talk to Mr Gavin. Were going back to the colegseum now tho.
    Polly said to thank you for wanting to help btw.

Tell him it's no problem. ;) I'm going to get together everything I can and head to your office to join Desmond and Alfendi, so you guys be sure to call on me if you need me, ok?

    Ok! You can study in reception if Alfendis too loud. Daddy made us do homework in there a lot.
    Luke says he'll let you know when we want to try talking to Machi.

Great! I'll let you guys get back to your investigation then. Talk to you later!

    Seeya Emmy!

"Whatever Mister LeTouse was looking for," Flora mused aloud as the group wound their way through the fence and into the closed-off car park, "it must be a very closely guarded secret."

"Why do you say that?" Trucy asked, skipping at the woman's side.

Ahead of them, Apollo noticed Luke frowning intently, a hand on his chin.

"Think about it," Flora explained. "Mister LeTouse didn't know what it looked like, which is why he had that small replica. Interpol won't tell the police what it is. Not even Mister Gavin seemed to be having any luck working it out."

Luke nodded in agreement. "It looked so nondescript, too. I can't even imagine what that replica is meant to represent."

Apollo looked behind him as they walked, watching Flora. "You're a cook; You've worked with all kinds of wild and wacky European food. Any ideas?"

Flora could only shake her head. "I'm sorry... It didn't look like any plant life I've ever seen."

"I have to agree," Luke added. "It didn't look like a plant to me."

"Which makes it what?" Trucy asked. "A rock?"

Apollo had opened his mouth to reply when he noticed movement ahead of them, the door to backstage swinging open rapidly as a woman in a white coat dashed outside. "Hold it," he said. "Is that Ema?"

The woman was already running in their direction, and paused in surprise as she spotted the quartet only a few metres away. Rolling her eyes, she stopped, watching them approach her. "Oh, it's you. You came at a good time."

"Hi, Ema!" Trucy cried, waving.

"Is something up?" Apollo asked.

Ema huffed, her eyes darting around the car park. "Any of you know where Lamiroir is?"

Apollo and Trucy shared a worried look. "We... saw her in the backstage hallway a while ago," the elder of the pair admitted.

The news only seemed to concern Ema further, making her fidget nervously. "Yeah? That's strange..."

"What's strange?" Trucy asked. Apollo noticed Luke's eyes widen; Had he already figured it out?

"I can't find her anywhere," Ema told them. "I was supposed to bring her to the prosecutor's office..."
Apollo froze. ‘Oh no... Mom...!’ He felt Trucy clinging to his arm.

"She can't have gone far," Flora pointed out, forcing a smile for her friends. "She is blind."

Ema nodded before Apollo had the time to panic that she hadn't already known; Apparently Klavier did manage to fill her in on the details of her own investigation after the trial that morning. "That's what's worrying me..."

"We'll help look for her," Luke offered. "She's probably still inside."

"Great!" Ema sighed, looking relieved. "Thanks. I'll look out here anyway, just in case."

Apollo nodded, feeling a rush of determination. Looking to his siblings and Flora, he started heading to the backstage door behind Ema, Trucy still clinging to his arm. "C'mon, guys. We'd better hurry."

More than ever before, the backstage corridors of the Coliseum felt like a maze. Once in the door, Luke suggested they split up, taking Flora up to the lighting boxes where the Wrights had watched the concert, while Apollo and Trucy looked around the staff rooms on the ground floor. When neither found anything, Flora suggested they meet on the stage, which she had noticed had gone completely dark; For a blind person like Lamiroir, the lights being off certainly wouldn't be an obstacle.

Apollo and Trucy, being closer, were the first to arrive in the wings. Just as Flora had told them via Luke's phone, it was pitch-black out on the stage, and Apollo was wary of exploring it before all four of them were there.

Trucy leaned forward, peering into the darkness despite her brother's hand on her arm. "Why do you think the lights aren't on here?"

Apollo shrugged. "The power breaker must be off." He sighed, frowning at the faint outlines he could barely make out of the equipment littered in front of them. "When you think of it... darkness is all Mom has."

Trucy's face fell as she stared out at the dark stage. She stood in silence for a few moments before frowning. "Polly, does something about the stage seem... different? Like, something's changed?"

Looking over at his sister, Apollo raised an eyebrow. "Aside from the lights?"

"I can't quite put my finger on it," Trucy continued, her eyes flicking all around the impenetrable blackness, "but it's bugging me."

Apollo turned his attention to the stage. ‘I think she's right... Great, now it's bugging me too...’

Before either could think of investigating, they heard rattling up the stairs behind them, and turned to see Luke and Flora arriving in the stage area. "Have you two started searching yet?" Flora called.

Trucy shook her head. "Polly wouldn't let me."

"Well, now all four of us are here," Luke pointed out with a smile, "let's use our phones as torches and sweep across the stage in a line. We'll be sure not to miss anything then!"

Nobody had any objections to his plan, so they obediently got out their phones, opening the relevant apps to light up their camera flashes a blinding white, easily able to cut through the darkness of the Despite that, Trucy shivered a little as she kept close to Apollo's side; He wondered if it was purely fear of the dark, or worry for their mother that had her so on edge.

Stood in a row, Flora, Luke, Apollo, and Trucy headed out into the off-stage area, lights shining ahead of them. Flora was at the side that would be the edge of the stage ahead of them, while Trucy was more to the back, though all four had to navigate bits of equipment lying around the floor.

Trucy cast her gaze over a rack of guitars as they passed, then turned her torch on a red contrabass case right at the edge of the stage. "Hey, Polly?"

"What?" Apollo replied, the conversation bringing the entire line to a halt.

The teen pointed to the instrument case, tightly closed and with a length of white fabric sticking out. "Wasn't this open before?"

"Obviously it's been closed," Apollo sighed. "They even wrapped whatever's inside in that white cloth."

"N-no, wait!" Luke cried, dashing over to his siblings to get a better look. "I remember this contrabass case... this was empty before!"

Flora rushed over to join them, her worried face barely visible in the darkness. "Should we open it?"

Trucy gasped, pointing to the white fabric at the small end of the case. "P-Polly... that looks like...!"

Apollo's eyes widened, and he nearly dropped his phone as he realised what Trucy was trying to say. Shoving the still-brightly shining makeshift-torch in his bag, he dropped to the side of the massive instrument case, "Quick, get this open!", and shoved his fingers into whatever gap he could make beneath the lid. Luke was quick to join him, and even Flora tried to help, lifting the neck of the case while the boys worked at the body; With all three of them, it took only a moment to haul the lid up on its hinges, exposing its contents to Trucy's and Flora's torches.

Immediately, Trucy screamed, her phone clattering to the floor. As Apollo jumped to his feet in shock, she grabbed his arm and then clung to his torso, breaking into terrified sobs as her elder brother could only hold her, staring numbly at what they had found.

Lamiroir lay unconscious, curled up in the contrabass case. She was so still, Apollo couldn't tell if she was even alive.

"Flora, get Ema!" Luke barked, waving at his friend as he leapt to Lamiroir's side, immediately pressing two fingers to her neck. With his other hand, he reached for her veil, carefully pulling it off her face.

"R-right," Flora replied, already running for the stairs.

As the stairs rattled with Flora's fading footsteps, Luke kept his attention firmly on Lamiroir, pulling her veil free and shoving it absentely into a pocket. "She's alive," he announced, then shifted, trying to form a firm grip around her body in the darkness. "If we could just..."

A small voice at the back of Apollo's mind realised Luke was attempting to lift Lamiroir out of the contrabass case, and the thought was enough to finally shake the young lawyer from his frozen state. Registering again that Trucy was sobbing into his shoulder, he placed his hands on her to gently push her away, looking his sister in the face. "Truce, we need to get Mom out of that thing, okay?" he gently told her. "Why don't you shine a light so Luke and I can see what we're doing?"
Trucy's sobs quietened but didn't stop, and she nodded, heading for the bright light shining from the floor that indicated where her phone had landed; Miraculously, it appeared to be unharmed from its fall... at least as far as Apollo could tell. Apollo himself jumped to Luke's side; Together, in the light from Trucy's phone, they managed to pull Lamiroir out of the instrument case, laying her on the floor next to it. The moment the woman was safe, Trucy reappeared at Apollo's side, clinging to his arm as she softly cried... though she made sure to keep her phone's light trained on Lamiroir as Luke moved her into the recovery position.

It felt like hours before help finally arrived.

In the Wings

The moment Luke saw Lamiroir, Trucy's scream ringing in his ears as Apollo leaped away from the contrabass case, he didn't hesitate to take charge. He ran almost on autopilot, directing Flora to get help, entrusting Trucy to Apollo, ensuring Lamiroir was alive and safe... It surprised him a bit when Apollo and Trucy managed to put their shock to the side long enough to help pull their mother out of the instrument case, though, once that was done, he couldn't help noticing how Apollo just stood there, Trucy softly crying at his side, both looking utterly lost at the prospect of losing their mother before they'd even had a chance to properly reunite with her.

Luke had to admit, over the years since his adoption... he'd felt something like that more times than he could count.

When Ema arrived, Flora at her heels, she had her phone in one hand and a radio in the other, barking orders into the latter: "I don't care about the maintenance, this is an emergency! Turn them on now!" She shoved the radio in a pocket with a huff, stomping across the dark of the backstage area towards the tiny pocket of light that Trucy's phone was casting over Lamiroir's still form. Apollo seemed to come out of his shock long enough to step back a bit, taking Trucy with him, and the movement (or perhaps Trucy's quiet sobs) seemed enough of a signal that Ema immediately turned her focus to Luke, still crouched at Lamiroir's side. "She's alive?"

Luke nodded. "She's breathing, she has a pulse, and I haven't found any injuries. Of course, I only know basic first aid, so-"

"Aren't you a doctor?" Ema interrupted with a frown.

"Of veterinary medicine," Luke explained, unable to keep from feeling a little frustrated at the familiar refrain. "If Lamiroir was a border collie, then I'd have the expertise to help her further."

Sighing, Ema shook her head; It was too dark to see if she was embarrassed at the mistake or not. "You found her there?" She pointed to the contrabass case.

"Yes," Luke replied. "You've called an ambulance?"

Ema gestured with her phone, indicating it was them on the other end of the line.

Finally, the lights of the stage flickered back to life, allowing Flora and Trucy to put away their makeshift torches. Ema quickly passed on news of Lamiroir's condition to the emergency services on her mobile, taking pauses to direct Flora and the Wrights to clear the area for the paramedics when they arrived; Apollo and Trucy worked silently, mostly as a pair, and Trucy with tears still streaming down her face. Luke supposed his worry for his siblings as they worked had been clear to Flora, as she quickly volunteered to be the one to go meet the ambulance in the concert hall's carpark, and guide the paramedics through the maze of hallways to the wings of backstage.
Luke didn't keep an eye on the time, but he estimated it took around five minutes for Flora to return, a thundering of boots up the metal stairs announcing her arrival with two people in navy uniforms, one a man and the other a woman, each holding a bag of what Luke assumed to be equipment. The woman glanced around at them only once as she strode across the cleared path, then dropped at Lamiroir's side, asking, "What's her name?" Once Ema told her, she put a hand on Lamiroir's shoulder, gently shaking it as she called to her, "Hello, Lamiroir, can you open your eyes?"

The woman nodded, giving Luke the smallest glance before she returned her attention to her patient. "What happened?" the man asked, placing his bag down by his partner's and zipping them both open. "Was anyone present when she collapsed?"

Ema shook her head, pointing to the contrabass case. "She was found in there. Before that, we last saw her about an hour ago. It didn't seem like anything was wrong."

The woman reached into her equipment, pulling out a short plastic tube and a mask attached to a simple bag. Carefully lifting Lamiroir's head, she pulled off the star-patterned cloak, freeing the woman's tawny hair.

Trucy squeaked, rushing forward. "Did she stop breathing!?"

"No, she's breathing on her own," the paramedic assured her, sticking the tube into Lamiroir's mouth and twisting it, only the flat ring at the end visible sticking out. She gave the teen a friendly smile as she then slipped the mask over the singer's face. "The tube is to keep her airway clear until she wakes up, and this," she gestured to the bag as it began to subtly deflate, "is a non-rebreather mask, so she has plenty of oxygen."

Trucy thought a moment, then nodded. Apollo placed a hand on her shoulder and gently guided her back a few steps, out of the way. "It's looking like we'll have to take her to the hospital," the woman continued to the group at large, holding Lamiroir's head while the man pulled from his bag a curved strip of foam and plastic Luke quickly recognised as a cervical collar, not too dissimilar from the dog and cat ones in his surgery. "The doctors there will find out what happened."

The male paramedic slipped the collar around Lamiroir's neck, where it was firmly tied in place, and Trucy squeaked again as she realised what it was, clinging to Apollo. This time, she said nothing, a hand pressed to her mouth as she watched the busy emergency workers, now attaching wires, a blood-pressure cuff, even needles into various points all over Lamiroir's arms and upper body. Ema was recruited to hold up a bag of fluids connected to somewhere on Lamiroir's left arm, and had to answer a series of questions about the singer's medical history. "Does she take any regular medications? Have any allergies?"

"Sorry, I have no idea. Not to my knowledge, at least."

"Is there anyone here who would know?"

"Her manager, maybe? Except, y'know, we're in the middle of his murder investigation right now."

There wasn't really anything the paramedic could say to that. Nearby, Trucy whimpered as she pressed her face into Apollo's shoulder, getting a tight hug in return.
Luke watched his siblings with worry. In fact, he was so focussed on them that the light touch on his shoulder made him jump, spinning around to Flora at his side. "F-Flora! Uh, did you want something?"

Flora cast concerned glances between Luke and his siblings. "Are they okay? I know they're big fans of Lamiroir..."

"Y-yeah," Luke assured her, forcing a smile. "Don't worry, I'm sure both they and Lamiroir will be fine."

That didn't stop Luke from keeping a careful watch on Apollo and Trucy as two more paramedics arrived, fussing over Lamiroir and talking between themselves and their co-workers. By now, Lamiroir had been moved out of the recovery position Luke had put her in, and a large board had been placed at her side. The lead paramedic (the woman who had assured Trucy earlier) sat at Lamiroir's head, holding it still as she counted to three, then the team of four together rolled her onto her side, one of the paramedics shoving the board underneath before the lead once more counted to three, and Lamiroir was gently rolled back onto the board. As the other three continued to fuss over the unconscious singer, the lead paramedic stood to speak quietly with Ema, taking the bag of fluids. Once they were done, the four emergency workers together lifted Lamiroir on her board and began to carefully carry her towards the stairs.

Ema cast a look over the Wrights and Flora, a concerned frown on her lips. "They're taking her to Hickfield," she announced.

Luke was too surprised to immediately react. 'Why's she telling us...?'

"Hickfield?" Apollo repeated, Trucy looking up from his shoulder. "Hickfield Clinic, you mean?"

"It's the closest emergency ward, apparently," Ema replied with a shrug. Without another word, she spun on her heel and hurried off after the paramedics.

Apollo and Luke locked eyes, both wearing frowns, though Luke's was worried and Apollo's determined. They didn't need to say anything for Luke to instantly read his brother's intentions.

"We're going, right?" Trucy asked, quickly wiping her eyes dry as she put on a frown identical to Apollo's.

Apollo nodded. "To Hickfield," he said, and the pair quickly ran off together down the stairs.

Flora stepped forward to follow them, then noticed Luke hadn't moved, and stopped to look back at him in concern. "Luke?"

Luke sighed, walking to join his friend. "I'm sorry about this, Flora," he said. "First your holiday is put on hold for the concert, then this investigation, and now..."

The woman softly laughed, surprising Luke. "What are you apologising for? We're all enjoying getting to help you, and Lamiroir's accident certainly isn't your fault."

Luke gave her a weak smile in return. "Even so, we're not investigating while Lamiroir's..."

Flora cocked her head to one side, examining her friend. After a moment, she smiled. "Why don't you go check on her with Apollo and Trucy? I'll go see how Emmy's going; Maybe she's ready to question Machi for us."

At first, Luke was too surprised to react. "F-Flora..."
"Don't worry about us as well as them," Flora continued, her face an expression of fond sympathy. "You'll just explode that way. Take care of your family right now."

Luke stared at her for a long moment, then smiled and nodded. "Thank you, Flora."

July 9, 5:43PM
Hickfield Clinic
Parking Garage

Luke caught up to his siblings waiting for him at the car. They were so impatient to meet Lamiroir at the hospital, they didn't even waste time asking what had taken him so long to follow them, nor did they seem to notice Flora was no longer in their group. Everyone was totally silent as they set off, following the ambulance to Hickfield. To Luke's fascination, the vehicle never once exceeded the speed limit, nor turned on its siren or lights, though he didn't point the fact out; Apollo and Trucy had certainly already noticed, and he didn't doubt it was a source of additional worry for them.

Once at Hickfield Clinic, Luke took his time parking, though his siblings were out the doors the moment he shut off the engine. Unable to rush locking up his tiny car, Luke had quickly lost them, the caped duo dashing across the carpark in a blur of teal and crimson.

'I guess I can't blame them for racing ahead... This is their mother we're here to see.'

Luke took his time heading inside, pulling out his phone to send Flora a quick text.

We're at the hospital. We followed the ambulance the whole way, so there won't be any news on Lamiroir for a while. Are you finding your way back to the Agency okay? .

It was only a few moments before he got a response.

What did I just tell you about worrying about us? I know what I'm doing. :) Let me know when you get news on Lamiroir, though.

Luke had to laugh; Flora had always known what to say to cheer him up.

The waiting room wasn't hard to find, just inside the front entrance of the building on the ground floor. Three rows of black, boxy chairs filled the open area, facing a small TV sitting against one wall, next to a large floor-map of the hospital. Not far away, the reception desk was labelled by several small signs, just to ensure it couldn't be missed; Above the window into the smaller room beyond were large letters reading "Visitors" and "Patients". Eyeing the busy-looking receptionist inside, Luke reasoned Apollo would have already asked after Lamiroir and instead decided to just look for his siblings; They weren't hard to find, sitting near the end of one of the rows of boxy seats and attracting stares from various other people in the room. Trucy was cuddled up tight at Apollo's side, and both had their focus completely on the television, apparently unaware of the scrutiny the two magicians were under.

Apollo looked over as Luke slipped into the seat next to him. "The nurse at reception said the doctors are looking at her," he said.

Luke nodded. Over his brother's shoulder, he couldn't help but notice the receptionist's head perk up, shooting a hawk-like glare at the boys. "Um, speaking of the nurse..."

"I know," Apollo interrupted, looking back to the TV with a frown. "I think my voice carries in here. And she probably recognises me from when Dad was here in April."

Although he raised an eyebrow at that, Luke decided to leave it, listening to the news report playing on the television:

"... murder during a concert at Sunshine Coliseum. Famous musician Klavier Gavin, with his current hit song 'Guilty Love', is in the courtroom as prosecutor, singing the defendant all the way to death row. International star Lamiroir, who performed with him on the night, served as a key witness in this morning's trial, although a verdict is yet to be declared. Their song, The Guitar's Serenade, is on sale now."

Chapter End Notes

Endless thank yous to my little sister, who took time out of her very busy schedule to talk to me extensively about paramedic procedures for this chapter! Love you, Sisterling! - Sisterbig
Sixteen-year-old Apollo lay perfectly still in his bed, lying turned to the wall. On the other side of the room, he could hear the gentle breathing of his sleeping brother, muffled by the teddy bear pressed, as usual, to the teen's face. Not that Apollo could see him, as his eyes were closed, but he felt very alert, goosebumps prickling his side: His blankets had fallen from his chin to his chest and an arm was lying on top of the covers, exposing his skin to chilly night air of the early winter. A moment ago, he had been fast asleep. What had woken him?

It took him a few moments to work that out, his ears pricked to even the slightest noise in the silence of the dark building, the distant cars of the city buzzing outside the window. The floor was creaking, the padding of tiny footsteps on the carpet, so close he'd be able to touch the intruder if he turned around and reached out. Suddenly he remembered hearing the creak of the door opening, and realised that had been the catalyst that stirred him from his sleep.

Those footsteps... Was that Trucy?

The nine-year-old was stood, he guessed, in the centre of the room, the floor softly creaking as she shifted her weight side to side. Other than that, she wasn't moving or making a sound, simply standing on the carpet of her brothers' bedroom.

'What on earth is she doing...?'

Despite his burning curiosity, Apollo didn't dare move. It was the middle of the night after all, and she clearly thought he was still asleep... This had never happened before, not once in the now-thirteen months since he and Luke had been adopted and moved into the Wright household (they'd only just finished replacing all Apollo's paperwork at school with his new surname too). No, keeping his breathing slow and even, Apollo stayed perfectly still, listening intently to whatever his sister might do next.

'Is she trying to prank us? Play around with our things while we're asleep? Is that what she's doing?'

The wait felt like an eternity. A stand-off between the two, although Trucy was plainly unaware of the fact. Apollo wondered many times if he should just sit up and confront her, maybe even shift slightly to peek at what she might be doing just standing there, but the thought never quite reached his body, always vetoed at the last possible second.

'It doesn't feel like morning... She isn't hoping to just stand there all night and scare us when we wake up, is she?'

Finally, the tension broke: Trucy squeaked, sniffed, and turned around, her breathing loud despite the muffling effect of her hands on her face. She was leaving the room...

... crying.
Apollo shot up, the sudden movement seeming to startle Trucy and almost make her trip as she half-spun to face her brother, eyes wide from behind the fingers clasped tightly over her face. The two stared at each other for a moment, Apollo taking in his sister's ruffled pyjamas and tangled hair, before he pulled back his blankets, moving to sit on the edge of his bed. "Trucy? You okay?"

Trucy squeaked again, her hands curling into fists over her mouth as she blinked back tears. A second later, she had leapt back across the room, half-landed on Apollo's bed, and thrown her arms around his chest, her face buried in the fabric of his top. Apollo instinctively grabbed at the girl to keep her from falling, given the precarious position she had slammed into, and held her tight as she quietly sobbed.

'What on earth happened!?'

The door to the hallway was wide open, left as such by Trucy. Just as Apollo had suspected earlier, neither it nor the window opposite showed any hint of light outside (barring distant street lights, of course). From the angle his bed provided him, he could just make out the edge of another door, the main bedroom, also wide open. This in itself was surprising, as Phoenix always left it closed; The only conclusion Apollo could come to was that Trucy had opened it as she had their own door. 'Dad must not be back yet. What's the time?' Hugging Trucy tight with one arm, he reached for the phone on his bedside table, tapping the button once to bring up the clock on its lock screen: Midnight... or not long past it, anyway. Phoenix had told them that evening that he wouldn't be done at the Borscht Bowl Club until at least one.

"'M srry," came a mumble from Apollo's chest.

"It's fine," Apollo replied, leaving his phone to again hug his sister with both arms. Now why would she be up at this time, crying, and trying to seek comfort from Phoenix? Only one option came to mind: "Did you have a nightmare?"

Trucy froze with a squeak, then slowly nodded.

Apollo wasn't surprised. "Well, since Dad isn't home yet... did you want to stay with me for a bit?"

There was a short pause. Trucy nodded again.

Without a word, Apollo pulled back the covers and patted the mattress underneath, and Trucy obediently crawled around him to lie down. It didn't take long to rearrange the covers over the girl, and, as he lay down at her side, she pressed tight against her brother, clinging to his top as his arm wrapped around her back.

Just as the two had gotten comfortable, there was a shuffling of blankets from across the room, and their gazes snapped up to see Luke turning in his sheets with a sigh, his teddy clutched tight to his chin as his sleeping face came into view. Although he was facing them, he did not move again, unaware of the tension he had unintentionally woven into the air.

Trucy's eyes were wide as she stared across the room from behind Apollo. "Did we wake him?" she whispered.

Apollo smiled, turning back to his sister. "Nah. He's a heavy sleeper." Despite his words, he spoke no louder than a whisper himself. "Nothing wakes Luke up."

The girl nodded, relaxing a little despite her continued stare at the bed opposite. After a moment, she added, "Does he ever have nightmares?"

There was so much concern in her voice that Apollo couldn't help himself replying, shooting a worried look at their brother. "All the time." They were no longer as frequent, but Apollo had lost count of the number of times Luke's crying had woken him in the middle of the night. Every time, without fail, he'd get up to check on his younger brother and the sobs would instantly stop, Luke frozen in a death-grip hug of his teddy, eyes screwed tightly shut; No matter how long Apollo sat at his side, Luke refused to admit he was awake, and eventually Apollo would have to admit defeat and return to his bed. For now, he quickly told Trucy, "Just don't tell him I told you that, okay?"

"I won't," Trucy promised. Finally, she broke her stare across the room, the top of her head pressed into Apollo's armpit as her eyes drifted closed.

Silence.

"Did you want to talk about your nightmare?"

Trucy thought a moment. "I was with Mommy. Then she disappeared. I couldn't find her."

Apollo hugged his sister tighter and said nothing. It was true, they hadn't exactly had much luck with tracking Thalassa Gramarye down... just as Apollo had warned Trucy months back, when they discovered she was still alive. He suspected they were more than likely never going to find her. She probably didn't want to be found; Why else would she have left the way she did, with a ridiculous story about not coming back from a disappearing trick?

"I was too scared to wake you up," Trucy added after a long pause, interrupting Apollo's inner monologue.

"Don't be," Apollo told her, putting all thoughts of their mother out of his mind. "If Dad's not home - even if he is - and you need help? I'll be here for you. And I won't be mad at you, either. I promise."

Despite the darkness, Apollo could see his sister's teary smile. "Thanks, Polly."

The first thing Phoenix had noticed as he trudged up the apartment stairs in the early hours of the morning was his daughter's open doorway, and the empty bed beyond it. Panic squeezed at his heart as he jumped into the hallway and noticed the similarly open doors of his own room and the bedroom belonging to his sons; When he looked into the latter and found the three sleeping figures within, he had almost collapsed in relief where he stood.

Luke was in his own bed, bundled up in his covers with his teddy bear sticking out at his side. Opposite him, Apollo was sprawled across his mattress, his blanket lying half off to accommodate the small figure at his side, pressed against her brother as though he were a massive teddy of her own. They were breathing almost in unison, eyes closed and expressions peaceful. Never before had they looked more like siblings... and never before had Apollo been more a big brother, even taking into account all the endless hours he was allowing Trucy to lock him up in her room practising magic (Only time would tell if he kept to his agreement of actually performing).

Phoenix was almost tempted to take a picture of the sleeping pair, but he knew the loud click and bright flash of the camera would only serve to wake them... and it wouldn't turn out very well in this light even with the flash. Instead, he simply watched them with a fond smile, committing the image to memory. After a long pause, he reached out and gently pulled the bedroom door closed.

'I am so going to tease them about this when they're grown up...'

Hickfield Clinic
Waiting Room

It was Trucy suddenly jumping to her feet that finally broke Apollo's stare at the television, his mind's eye torn from the memories playing across it. He looked up, following his sister's mad dash, and quickly found what she was racing towards: A labcoated woman in high heels exiting from the direction of the wards. He cast a glance at Luke, who had similarly spotted the detective, and they jumped to their feet to meet her.

"Ema!" Trucy cried, arriving at the woman's side and looking only slightly panicked. "How's Lamiroir!? Is she okay!?

Ema smiled, looking over the trio. "Ah, you're here. We all owe you a big thanks, that's for sure."

Apollo blushed, looking away. He was pretty sure his presence hadn't made any kind of difference.

"So she's okay?" Trucy asked hopefully, her eyes lighting up.

Ema nodded, her smile wide. "Yep. She came to a short while ago. You found her before it was too late."

Trucy sighed in relief. "Th-that's good to hear..."

"So what happened?" Apollo picked up. "How'd she...?"

Ema frowned. "Someone attacked her," she explained. "She was struck on the forehead."

Apollo and Trucy were too shocked to immediately reply, hit by a fresh wave of concern for their only living blood relative.

"By whom?" Luke asked, his stern look seeming to say he had guessed the answer.

Ema could only sigh and shrug. "We don't know."

"Wh-what!?" Trucy cried. "But, they didn't speak!? She can recognise footsteps, couldn't she have-?"

"To recognise footsteps, you'd have to have heard them before," Ema pointed out, interrupting the girl. "She didn't say they were familiar." She shifted where she stood, gesturing behind her. "Anyway, would you like to see her now?"

"Would we!" Trucy repeated, a bright grin on her face; Her answer to the question was blindingly obvious.

"Is that alright!?" Apollo asked, equally hopeful.

Ema half-smiled, then waved for the Wrights to follow, heading back towards the wards. "She wants to thank you for saving her life."
Apollo had to bite back a giddy laugh as he and Trucy rushed to tail Ema down the corridor, Luke at their heels. Lamiroir was alive. She was alive and unharmed and very specifically wanted to see them. A part of him dared to hope that the physical trauma had knocked loose a few memories of her past, that maybe she had recognised the names 'Apollo' and 'Trucy' and why they were important. Hadn't Valant said it was the pair of them that had the best hope of uncovering her former self?

Finally, Ema stopped in front of one of the wards and waved the trio in without a word. Apollo and Trucy charged in without a second glance, quickly spotting the woman sitting on the lone bed within, pulling her cloak on over her head, her veil missing. "Lamiroir!" the pair called, running to her side with identical wide grins.

"Ah, Apollo and Trucy," the woman replied, smiling as she heard their voices and turned to face them. Apollo felt his heart skip a beat as he saw the full force of her happy expression without the veil to cover it, and was struck by how much she suddenly resembled the woman in the photo from twenty years ago; He wondered if Trucy was feeling something similar, thinking of her own fleeting memories as a five-year-old. "I'm told you were the ones who found me," Lamiroir was continuing. "Thank you, from the bottom of my heart."

Apollo almost had to force himself to breathe. "W-we're just glad you're okay," he insisted. "Tell us, what happened?" In the corner of his eye, he noticed Luke trailing in, closing the ward door behind him.

Lamiroir frowned, thoughtful, her hands clasped together. "It... was after I had spoken to young Alfendi in front of the dressing room," she hesitantly explained. "I sensed someone approaching. I thought it might be someone come to see me, but they said nothing. When I went to return to my dressing room..."

Apollo winced in sympathy. "You were hit?"

"I knew, that very moment I knew," Lamiroir replied, looking towards Apollo with a fierce look much like one of his, "the assailant was trying to kill me."

Trucy gasped, her hands to her mouth.

"It was lucky for me the first blow did not knock me out," the singer continued. "I turned and ran for the stage. Someone was chasing me, I could hear footsteps... yet, I reached the stage first."

Luke had a hand to his chin, thinking. "Why the stage, if I may ask?"

"I had overheard maintenance people talking," Lamiroir explained. "The power to the stage area was off, they said, for electrical work."

Apollo remembered Ema shouting something about maintenance and turning something on when she caught up to them after they found the unconscious singer; That must have been what she was talking about.

"Darkness is my ally," Lamiroir continued. "There was a contrabass case near the stage. That is where I hid."

"So the attacker couldn't see you!" Trucy realised.

Lamiroir nodded. "Once in the case... I'm afraid I passed out."

Apollo took a deep breath, relieved above all else that Lamiroir had escaped unscathed. "That was a really close call... Do you have any idea who it might have been?"
The woman shook her head. "Unfortunately, no. Whoever it was, they said not a word."

Luke nodded. "Like Ema told us."

"Yet, when I consider that I was struck high on the forehead," Lamiroir continued, a hand to her head as she frowned in thought, "I must conclude that whoever hit me was taller than I am."

"You're about the same height as Apollo and me," Luke pointed out, glancing between mother and son. "Detective Crescend is taller than us, wouldn't you say, Apollo?"

Apollo frowned, nodding in agreement. A part of him was impressed and proud of his mother's deduction, sure he would never have noticed that point on his own.

"But why would he attack Lamiroir!?" Trucy demanded, offended on the woman's behalf. "Why would anyone attack her!?"

"Because she's a witness," Apollo pointed out. "She heard Crescend talking to Mister LeTouse, and even recognised him in court this morning." His frown deepened. "He'll be wanting to silence her."

Trucy gasped, eyes wide in fear.

"And his attempt failed," Luke added. "Hopefully, with Ema now alerted to the threat, he'll know better than to try attacking her again before we can pin him in court tomorrow." He crossed his arms, glaring into the distance. "He confronted us as we left, remember? It must have been while we were talking to Mister Gavin he took his chance to act."

"Oh, that reminds me!" Trucy suddenly cried, digging around in her pouch. "I wanted to ask you, Lamiroir..." With a triumphant grin, she pulled out something tiny concealed in her fist, then grabbed Lamiroir's hand to deposit the object in her palm. "... if you knew what this is!"

Apollo's eyes widened as he recognised the lump of white plastic. "Truce! You stole the replica!?"

"I didn't steal it," Trucy replied, giving her brother an innocent grin. "We're just borrowing it! To ask Lamiroir what it is!"

"That was what Mister Gavin was planning to do with it," Luke pointed out.

"Why are you on her side!?" Apollo demanded.

Meanwhile, Lamiroir was running the small object over her palm, taking in its size, shape and texture with her fingers as she frowned deeply in concentration. "This... is the 'replica' of Mister LeTouse's?"

Trucy nodded. "Yep. The thing he was after!"

Lamiroir didn't immediately reply, brushing a thumb against the ribbed texture of the object. "So that's what he was doing..."

"Yes, I know, of course," Lamiroir replied, distracted, her attention still on the tiny lump of plastic in her palm. "This must be... a Borginian Cocoon. Or, rather, a convincing replica thereof."

'A... what?' Apollo thought.

"But, then... why was he carrying it?" Trucy asked, arms crossed in confusion. "Those don't sound like things you could find here..."
"I think that's exactly the point, Trucy," Luke pointed out, frowning. "Based on the name, I'd say they're unique to Borginia; Is that right, Lamiroir?"

The woman nodded. "As far as I am aware. All in Borginia know of them."

"And, like Flora said earlier, they must be a heavily guarded secret for Mister LeTouse to need something to identify it with," Luke continued, "and for Interpol to have him looking for them outside Borginia in the first place."

"I am sorry to say I do not know the details," Lamiroir replied, holding out the replica for them to see, "but there is another fact about the cocoon that all in Borginia know: They are not to be taken out of the country." Her gaze seemed stern. "If someone does, and is caught, they will be put to death."

Trucy gasped, her hands flying to her mouth. "T-t-to death!?"

"Why!?!" Apollo added, equally shocked.

"I do not know," Lamiroir admitted, running a thumb over the replica in her grip. "Yet, if Interpol was involved..."

Apollo bit his lip; Half of him wanted to snap and ask Lamiroir what she did know, while the other half of him was mentally kicking himself for daring to disrespect her, even if it was only in his own head.

"He must have been tracking smuggling of these cocoons," Luke pointed out, stroking his goatee with a frown. "I wonder if this same issue is what gave Mister Sycamore and Emmy so much trouble when they went to Borginia..."

Lamiroir sighed, her hands falling to her lap as she looked away. "It seems I was 'marked'..."

Trucy stepped forward with a worried look, placing her hands on Lamiroir's. "'Marked'?!"

The woman took a moment to respond. "Life changed for me with the popularity of my songs," she explained. "I began to travel around the world."

"Oh," Trucy muttered, shooting her brothers a look. "So they thought you could have brought those Borginian Cocoons with you...?"

Lamiroir nodded. "That was probably the suspicion."

"Hence why he posed as your manager," Luke mused, deep in thought.

"Borginia is a small, sheltered country," Lamiroir continued. "Not many of our people venture into the world outside."

Luke's frown deepened. "And these cocoons are so important even Interpol was working to keep them a secret... But what about them is so dangerous?"

"They're cocoons, right?" Trucy said. "So, they make silk from those, don't they?"

"I don't think it's silk that has Interpol scared of these things," Apollo pointed out. He reached out to gently take the replica cocoon from the woman's hand. "Thank you again for all your help, Lamiroir."

Lamiroir smiled, facing the direction of his voice. "It was the least I could do." Her smiled faded, a hand brushing against her cheek. "Although, perhaps you would know... What happened to...?" She paused, gesturing to her face and struggling to find an appropriate word.

"Oh, your veil!" Luke cried, and was immediately digging around his satchel. "I'm so sorry, I had to check you were breathing when we found you and..." He shoved a hand into his pants pocket, "ah, here it is - and it was covering your nose and mouth so I had to take it off..." He took her hand and placed the strip of semi-transparent blue fabric into her palm. "I've been carrying it in my pocket for safe-keeping."

"Ah, thank you," Lamiroir said, smiling again as she moved to replace the item on her head. "I am glad to have this back, for the conditions of my contract if nothing else."

Apollo almost rolled his eyes as he recalled this strange contract that had their mother jumping through ridiculous hoops to hide so much about herself all for the sake of a 'mystery'... What was wrong with admitting she was blind, that she could speak English? Why did even her face have to stay so carefully concealed from the outside world? Given how long it had taken them to find her, he couldn't help but feel a little bitter about the image that had been forced on Lamiroir.

Trucy's eyes widened, and she glanced around the room fearfully. "Oh no...! What happened to Flora!?

Apollo blinked in surprise as he also noticed the woman's disappearance. "Wasn't she just with us!?

To Apollo's annoyance, Luke laughed. "You two took long enough! She left us back at the Coliseum, to go check on how Emmy's doing with her Borginian."

"Oh, right," Apollo muttered. "I forgot we..." He shook his head. "How is she doing? Is it enough to talk to Machi?"

"What's this about Machi?" Lamiroir asked, looking up curiously, her veil now re-attached and hiding her lower face.

Luke was already pulling out his phone, tapping away at the screen. "We don't speak Borginian and he doesn't speak English; We've been trying to find a way to communicate with him since the murder."

Lamiroir nodded, already in thought. "I see..."

It was maybe half a minute before Luke's phone beeped with the arrival of a return text. "Emmy says she could probably hold a basic conversation with him now, though she warns she's not completely confident with her vocabulary; Are you wanting her to come with us to the detention centre?"

Apollo winced, pressing a finger to his head as he thought hard. After their conversation with Lamiroir, he had a feeling it was more important than ever they spoke to Machi. Finally, he sighed. "Machi is our most important witness... If we don't talk to him now, we'll never talk to him."

He turned to Luke. "Could you ask Emmy to meet us outside the agency? We can pick her up on our way there."

Luke nodded, already tapping away.

"If I may...?" Lamiroir asked, looking in Apollo's direction. "If you need an interpreter, I would be glad to assist you."

Trucy shook her head. "B-but, Lamiroir, you're not well!"
"I'm well enough to travel," the woman insisted. "If your friend is not confident in her Borginian, I am happy to help her, as a back-up if nothing else."

Apollo felt his siblings' questioning gazes on either side of his face. True, Lamiroir had narrowly survived an attempt on her life, but she did seem to be recovering... and there was certainly nowhere safer for her to be than in a group instead of alone in a hospital ward. Plus, with her there, anywhere Emmy faltered in her translations, Lamiroir could pick up, allowing them to properly question Machi. He gave Lamiroir a determined look and nodded. "Thank you for your offer, Lamiroir. We're very grateful for your help."

It was high time they got to the bottom of this case, once and for all.
The journey to the detention centre went by pretty fast; Although reluctant about Apollo's decision, Trucy was happy to lead Lamiroir to the car she proudly called 'the Lukemobile', then they drove only a minute or two to meet Emmy outside the agency. She had been surprised to see the singer, but once it was explained to her what had been decided, the two women happily chatted the entire trip, Emmy practising her Borginian and Lamiroir happy to coach her. By the look on Emmy's face, and the slow speeding-up of her voice, it was clear by the time they arrived that her confidence had increased tenfold.

Finally, they were at their destination, and Apollo lead everyone in to request a meeting with Machi. As they turned to file into the visitor's room, he spotted a clock hanging on the wall and winced. Six thirty-nine. He and Trucy needed to be at the Wonder Bar in ten minutes; How had he not noticed how late it was getting!? They would have to be quick. If only he'd noticed earlier, he could have left his badge with Luke again... not that he wanted that to become a habit.

Inside, it was unanimously and wordlessly agreed that one of the two available seats would go to Lamiroir. Apollo offered the other to Emmy, but she refused ("I always question people standing up," she'd insisted with a wink, flipping open her notebook), so Apollo took it himself. Luke and Trucy stood at the back of the room, out of the way, Trucy even sitting on one of the tables resting against the wall as they watched from a distance.

Apollo took the chance to shoot off a quick text to Aderyn - "Family emergency, we're gonna be a little late tonight" - and hit the 'send' button just as the door opened on the other side of the glass wall, admitting a single guard and a small teenager in white. As the boy noticed his visitors, his slow walk to the chair paused, eyebrows knitted together in worry above his sunglasses.

Lamiroir looked up as she heard the door opposite them close. "Machi...?"

The boy hesitated, then stepped forward, carefully lowering himself into the chair. He avoided any kind of eye contact; Was he aware they knew he could see? They were about to find out.

"Machi, we came to talk to you about the case," Apollo said.

Emmy frowned, her eyes flicking across the open pages of her notebook. After a moment, she hesitantly translated the comment into Borginian; She seemed worried until Lamiroir nodded once she was done.

"We know you're not blind," Apollo continued. "But... that's not the only secret you're hiding, is it?"

Emmy shot Apollo a surprised look before she translated. Machi bit his lip, but otherwise did not react, remaining silent.

Lamiroir turned to Apollo with a frown. "Wait, Apollo... What do you mean by 'secret'?"

Apollo didn't have the time to wonder if Lamiroir meant the word itself or the suspicions that had been building in Apollo's mind since Trucy pressed that tiny lump of plastic into her hand... a tiny lump of plastic he wordlessly pulled from his bag to show to the boy on the other side of the glass.

There was an instant reaction, Machi almost jumping in his seat as he flinched away from the object. Lamiroir must have heard the squeak of the chair moving, turning to the teen with a worried frown. "Machi...!" She then spun back to Apollo. "Please, tell me what this is all about!"

As much as he hated to, Apollo made himself ignore the woman's demand. "Machi, by your reaction just now, I know you know something about this." He gave the boy a determined glare as Machi slowly looked up to meet his eyes. "If you won't tell me... I might have to give this back to the prosecution, and have them look into it."

Emmy sounded uncertain as she translated; Apollo wondered if she was having trouble with the words, or was just vastly confused about what was going on - They hadn't exactly had the chance to explain it to her, after all. Machi only continued to stare back at Apollo from behind his sunglasses, and, as Emmy finished speaking, remained silent and unresponsive.

Apollo waited, but it soon became clear the boy was determined not to talk. With a sigh, he leaned back in his chair and moved to stand-

"Odota!"

-and stopped in his tracks, staring back at Machi in surprise. The boy was reaching out a hand to the glass, looking up at Apollo with a grimace of fear.

"A-ala… ole nin hatanen…"

Apollo turned to Emmy, and she hesitated for a moment before overcoming her own shock at hearing the teen finally speak. "W-wait, don't be so hasty," she translated.

Turning back to the boy, Apollo got comfortable in his seat, signalling he was prepared to listen.

"Tidatko... sina kaken?"

"Do you know everything?"

Apollo was tempted to reply 'sort of', but decided their father's famous tactic of bluffing would be a better idea; He simply nodded.

Machi sighed, his hands tightly gripping his arms in a self-comforting hug. "Hyva on."

"Very well."

The boy pointed to Apollo's hand where the replica was still visible in his grip. "Lekotelo, lasilki... Se on vomakas remede."

Emmy opened her mouth, then paused, staring at her notebook in confusion. "Um..."

"He's talking about the silk of the cocoon," Lamiroir filled in. "He says it's a potent cure."

"A cure...?" Apollo repeated.

"On remede Incuritis."

"A cure for Incuritis," Lamiroir translated, then gave Emmy a nod, signalling the handover of the translating back to her. Emmy sent her a grateful smile in return, momentarily forgetting the other Apollo frowned, pressing a finger to his forehead. "But if it's a cure, why is it such a closely guarded secret...?"

"I do not understand the reasons myself," Lamiroir admitted.

Instead of replying, Apollo continued to think. 'So now we know what Mister LeTouse was looking for, if not why... And Machi...?' He looked up at the boy, studying his face. "Machi." He held up the replica. "You were smuggling these, weren't you?"

Machi was leaning back in his chair with a wince before Emmy had even begun to translate; Obviously Apollo's accusing glare had been enough to communicate his meaning. The moment Emmy finished speaking, the boy was already replying, barking rapid words that Apollo couldn't make out. Emmy didn't even have a chance to attempt to translate, as Lamiroir was interrupting him, speaking as Apollo imagined a disappointed mother would sound like. The pair exchanged angry words for several moments before Machi abruptly quietened, stubbornly turning his head away in a universal signal that he was ignoring her.

Lamiroir sighed, annoyed. "He won't say."

'First he plays blind, now he plays dumb.' Apollo stared at the boy, wondering how to progress from here. He didn't doubt at all now that Machi had been the person LeTouse was following... Was he planning to sell that cocoon to someone in LA? And how did all of this tie in to the murder?

"Vo mena kotin..."

Apollo blinked, refocussing on the boy sitting in front of him. He looked ready to cry.

"I can't go home," Emmy translated.

"Vo mena kotin Bohinya... En... En hala mena kotin."

"I can't go home to Borginia. I don't want to go home."

Lamiroir sighed again, now more sad than angry. "The penalty for taking a cocoon from Borginia... is death."

Emmy looked shocked - doubtless the full story was starting to come together for her.

"N-non lemurhasta…"

"Enta lemurha?" Lamiroir replied.

"He wants to tell us something about the case," Emmy filled in with an excited smile.

Machi thought a moment. "Lesitaya vo kerto," he forcefully spoke, staring at Apollo. "Tela on lupas ei yota kerto-!"

The door behind the teen slammed open, instantly attracting everyone's attention as they looked up to face the source of the noise - Even the officer on guard jumped, staring at the door with wide eyes as he pressed against the wall at his back. Apollo felt a spike of fear in his chest as he recognised Daryan Crescend, the detective's dark, stern eyes taking in the assembled group on the other side of the glass. "This meeting's over," he announced.

Apollo jumped from his chair, standing protectively with an arm in front of Lamiroir. "You can't kick us out! Visiting hours aren't over yet!"

Daryan tsked. "There's a call for Machi from the Borginian Embassy," he said, no feeling in his voice except the vague sense of irritation. "This meeting is over." His eyes flicked to the side, a moment of thought. "Sorry." His words were anything but genuine.

"Just give us five more minutes!" Apollo demanded. "We can call them back after that!"

Daryan shook his head. "Sorry, no go." He strolled up to Machi's chair, gesturing to the boy frozen in the seat. "C'mon, piano-boy. We're leaving." When Machi didn't immediately respond, he forcefully grabbed the teen's shoulder, pulling him to his feet.

Apollo heard rapid thuds of footsteps, and a moment later Trucy had pushed herself in front of Emmy, standing protectively in front of Lamiroir much like her brother; Luke similarly appeared on Apollo's other side, both glaring at Daryan.

"Wait!" Trucy shouted.

"Detective Crescend, you can't do this!" Luke added.

Daryan paused, then slowly turned to face the Wrights, a calm anger in his eyes. He looked between the three for a moment in silence, then growled, "I never liked you. Any of you." With that, he turned around, dragging Machi out of the room. The nervous guard followed, clicking the door closed behind them.

Trucy growled, banging the table with a fist. "Darn it! We were so close! He was about to tell us!"

Emmy sighed, putting her notebook away. "Whatever he was about to say, it was something he didn't want the prosecution to know; He was asking we promise not to tell."

Apollo was still glaring at the door Daryan and Machi had disappeared through. "Crescend did that deliberately," he said. "He didn't want us to hear what Machi had to say."

"Exactly," Luke agreed. "This case is finally coming together, isn't it?"

Nodding, Apollo looked over to meet his brother's eyes, the pair sharing a determined frown.

Lamiroir sighed in her chair, downtrodden, her hand clinging to her right wrist where the cloak was covering her bracelet. "Oh Machi... please do not say..."

Trucy watched the woman sadly; She reached out a hand to offer comfort, but seemed to think better of it, withdrawing reluctantly. "Don't worry, Lamiroir. We'll get him out."

Apollo returned the tiny replica to his bag, then turned to head out the door. "If we can't talk to Machi, we'd better get out of here; Trucy and I have somewhere to be."

"You do?" Emmy asked, confused.

Trucy barely kept herself from shrieking, eyes wide as her hands flew to her mouth. "The Wonder Bar! Aderyn's gonna kill us!" She raced to follow her brother as they entered reception, well ahead of everyone else.

"Don't worry," Apollo chuckled. "I already warned her we'd be late: Family emergency."

"Ooh, naughty! You always lie to your boss like that?" Emmy asked, a sly smile on her face as she followed at the pair's heels.
Apollo blushed, having not noticed she was there. "Um..." He decided not to explain.

Luke led Lamiroir out to the car behind his siblings and Emmy, quickly unlocking it for everyone to get in. "We'll head back home for you two to pick up your things," he explained as they got settled inside, "then I'll give you a lift to work, save some travel time. Will you be alright performing without dinner?"

"We can get something in the restaurant," Apollo replied as the car's engine began to hum under their seats. "We'll manage until after, right Trucy?"

Trucy nodded from the back seat, right behind her eldest brother. "A professional magician can perform even on an empty stomach!"

Emmy laughed. "Well, good luck! Or do you prefer 'break a leg'?"

"Ah yes, I forgot you two were magicians," Lamiroir said, smiling behind her veil from Emmy's other side in the back seat.

"Oh, um, I'm sorry, Lamiroir," Luke replied, looking uncomfortable as he kept his gaze firmly on the road, guiding his car away from the detention centre. "Once I get Apollo and Trucy to their job, I can take you back to... well, wherever you need to be. I don't know if you want to go back to where you're staying, or to the hospital...?"

Lamiroir thought a moment, unaware all other eyes were turned to her. "I'm told magic is a very visual medium... but, truthfully, it has always intrigued me," she said. "I myself began performing in a small restaurant also. If you don't mind... I would quite like to hear your show."

"Really!?” Apollo replied, eyebrows raised.

Trucy squealed in glee. "That would be amazing!" she cried. "We'll be extra noise-y today, just for you! And-" She gasped. "Aderyn might let you sit backstage, where the best sound is! No-one will bother you there!"

Lamiroir laughed. "That sounds wonderful."

Luke hadn't hesitated to race back to the Agency from the Detention Center (Why hadn't Apollo warned them showtime was approaching? Wouldn't it have been easier to send Luke on alone again, while he and Trucy prepared to leave?), pushing the road rules he usually followed to the letter as far as he dared. By some miracle, the traffic appeared to be on their side, as they actually arrived outside the Wright Anything Agency ten minutes earlier than he'd predicted. Even so, he didn't dare to turn off the engine once they arrived, Apollo and Trucy dashing upstairs only long enough to grab their equipment before returning to the car.

Emmy bid Lamiroir a thank you and a goodbye as she wriggled out of her middle seat in the back. "Have fun with the Gramaryes tonight!" she added as she slipped out the door after Trucy. "I have to boast to Desmond about how much my Borginian came in handy!"

It was only a few minutes' drive on to the Wonder Bar, and Apollo waved his brother and Lamiroir around to the back of the small restaurant, where the back door he and Trucy always used was. "Come in this way; We can explain everything to Aderyn and find you a place to sit, Lamiroir."

They didn't see anyone as they entered into the dark, quiet hallways of the restaurant's backstage, but somehow a message must have gotten through regardless, as they were accosted by an angry dark-haired woman about halfway to the Gramarye dressing room, storming towards them from the direction of the stage. "There you are!"

"Aderyn!" Trucy cried with a cheerful grin. "We made it!"

"You call this 'a little late'!?” Aderyn was already continuing, gesturing stiffly to a clock hanging above a doorway behind her and clearly trying her hardest not to shout. "We're already into the second act! If you 'ad a bleedin' emergency, why didn't ye just call the whole thing off toni-!" She paused, suddenly noticing the magician pair were not alone as her eyes snapped to Lamiroir. "I-is that...?"

Apollo couldn't resist a grin. "Aderyn Vogel, this is Lamiroir. Lamiroir, our boss, Aderyn Vogel." He rocked on his heels as he refocussed his attention on the shocked Aderyn. "She's come to listen to our show today."

"We were thinking she could sit backstage?" Trucy added with a hopeful look.

"Backstage?" Aderyn repeated, coming out of her shock. "God, no. It's far too busy, especially tonight." She shot Lamiroir a wide grin. "You just come with me, and I'll find ye a private seat out in the audience, ma'lm." She turned to leave, but then paused, studying the woman. "Although, if you're here in hidin', ye should probably take off that hood an' veil. It's a very distinctive look."

Lamiroir nodded, reaching up to remove her cloak from her head. "Thank you. You're very kind."

Luke giggled as he took the singer's cloak and veil, watching Aderyn chase Apollo and Trucy to their dressing room with a clap of her hands and a harried "Git along, you two! We need our finale ready twenty minutes ago!"
True to her word, once Aderyn had ensured the Gramaryes were (finally) getting ready for their act in thirty minutes' time (exactly half that of their usual preparation allowance), and she herself had dashed briefly onstage to act as the bridge between acts two and three, she led Luke and Lamiroir out through the door from backstage into the bar area, then around the back to a small table near a speaker.

"I'll be expectin' a full story for all o' this later," the woman quietly warned Luke as he led Lamiroir to her chair. "Y'know, once I'm not run off my feet keepin' this show goin'."

Luke grinned sheepishly and nodded. "I'll let Apollo know." He had a feeling his brother hadn't prepared an explanation for how they got from 'family emergency' to 'showing up late with international celebrity'... and he certainly didn't envy him having to face Aderyn's wrath should it not be up to snuff. I'm sure it'll be okay. She's bound to give her best-sellers a little leeway... Right?

Aderyn dashed away with a curt not. Up on stage, the current act was a single woman dancing in a medley of styles to a pre-recorded track, switching rapidly between different genres and time periods in matching time with the music. Not exactly the best example of entertainment for a blind woman to walk in on... Glancing at the nearby tables to gauge their distance and ensure he wouldn't be disturbing their neighbours, Luke shifted his chair closer to Lamiroir and leaned over to tell her what was going on.

"Ah, I see," she replied. "Or... don't see, in this case." She smiled at her own joke, and Luke giggled. "Since there is nothing to hear, I did have a few questions, if you don't mind."

"Go ahead," Luke prompted her; He was pretty sure they weren't missing anything by ignoring the dancer on stage, as talented as she appeared to be.

Lamiroir frowned, thinking. "I understand your last name is... 'Gramarye'?"

At that, Luke laughed nervously. "Ah, no, our last name is 'Wright'," he explained. "Apollo and Trucy, they come from Troupe Gramarye originally, so they use the name onstage."

The woman thought a moment. "The same as Valant Gramarye?"

Lamiroir considered his answer, then smiled. "Mister Wright, you had me under the impression your name was 'Triton'."

Pressing a hand to his mouth to stifle an embarrassed stutter, Luke again nodded. "Um, yeah, sorry. That is still my name, actually; I didn't change it when we were adopted. Apollo and Trucy did, though."

The singer gave a soft laugh in reply. "I should have guessed. You are all so close, I could not imagine why your siblings would not have joined you on your adventures with Professor Layton."

Luke blushed, giggling.

After the dancer finished her performance, Aderyn once more walked out in front of the closing curtains, idly chatting for a few moments before introducing the fourth act of the night, a stand-up comedian. The man wasn't all that funny in Luke's opinion, but he managed to get some positive reactions from the audience, so he at least had the makings of a decent performer. After him, the fifth slot of the night was filled by a guy with a guitar, who sang a few croaky songs in his allotted ten minutes, to smatterings of polite applause.

"Apollo and Trucy are up next," Luke whispered to Lamiroir.

The curtains swung closed, and Aderyn strode onstage, doing an admirable job of talking up the guitarist... but she spent no longer on the man than she had to, changing the subject with a practised smoothness. "And, finally, meine Damen und Herren, that brings us to our final act of the night, the one I'm sure you've all been waiting for," she announced, to a couple of cheers from the crowd. "The most wunderbar of the Wonder Bar, it's our resident magicians: Apollo and Artemis Gramarye!"

Aderyn walked offstage to cheers as the curtains swung open, revealing Apollo and Trucy's usual set-up of props spread across the small stage. The pair themselves stood in the centre, stepping out as the curtains parted around them. Wearing identical grins and gripping identical yellow wands, they tipped their top hats to the audience, waiting for the applause to die down.

"Thank you, thank you!" Apollo called over the noise. "You are already such a wonderful audience, and we haven't even started yet!" As the cheers quickly gave way to a small laugh, he gestured to Trucy with his wand. "For those of you new to our show, this is my sister Artemis..."

"And this is my brother Apollo!" Trucy picked up, gesturing back at him with her own wand. She then turned to face Apollo with her hands on her hips and a thoughtful frown. "Y'know Apollo, we've been doing magic together for six years now. Don't you get bored?"

Luke bit back a smile as he recognised their current routine: He had last seen it only three days ago, when he accompanied Sycamore, Emmy, Flora and Alfendi on their trip to the Wonder Bar the day after their arrival in town. Although the Gramarye pair didn't have the resources to change their act every night, it was switched up often enough that, almost every time Luke saw it, it felt like something entirely new. Seeing the same routine twice was a true rarity.

"Bored?" Apollo replied to his sister's question, raising an eyebrow. "What madness are you spouting now, Artemis?" He gave her a sly grin. "You haven't been thinking again, have you? You know nothing good comes of that."

Trucy scoffed, giving the audience time to laugh. "Now now, Apollo. I just thought-" "So you were thinking," Apollo interrupted with a sly smile.

"Let me finish!" Trucy shot back, acting as though she couldn't hear the giggles in the audience. "I just thought we could try expanding our range a bit, and try other things. Like," she turned to the crowd with a cheeky grin, "I just flew in from Borginia yesterday, and boy are my arms tired!" She threw her arms out wide, as though expecting a standing ovation to her 'genius'; She got only groans and mild applause, sprinkled with genuine laughter at her audacity.

Luke snorted; Three days ago, it had been London Artemis 'flew in' from.

Apollo rolled his eyes. "Really? You're trotting out that tired joke?"

"Tired like my arms?" Trucy replied, still grinning widely.

The laughter was much louder this time, enough that Apollo and Trucy stood frozen on stage for a few moments, staring at each other as they waited for their audience to quieten. Finally, once the room had been silent for almost long enough to prompt another bout, Apollo said, "Let's just get on with the magic, huh?"
"Yeah, okay," Trucy quickly replied with a shrug, and the speed of their exchange elicited a fresh wave of amusement all its own.

Although Luke doubted they'd had any time to truly prepare, his siblings did seem to be keeping their promise of being a lot more... as Trucy had put it, 'noise-y'. That is, they put a lot of attention into describing what they were doing, played a little more roughly with their props closer to their microphones, and had more fun with puns and wordplay inbetween the visual tricks. Artemis even brought out Mister Hat at one point, comically drawing out the time Apollo was 'in pieces' in their zig-zag apparatus with the claim that he was now useless as a partner and she needed a replacement (Apollo, naturally, played up his distress for all it was worth). As always, the allotted ten minutes passed far faster than it seemed they should have, and the pair were soon bowing deeply to the enthusiastic applause of the small restaurant's audience, the curtains swinging closed in front of them.

"And that is it for our show tonight!" Aderyn announced over the speakers. "Danke schon for attending, ladies and gentlemen, and I hope the rest of your evenin' is just as wunderbar as the Wonder Bar! Guten Abend und auf Wiedersehen!"

The lights on the stage faded as the house lights came up, and the cheering of the crowd soon turned to the usual bustle of a restaurant in the middle of its dinner rush. Luke turned to Lamiroir with a grin. "Did you enjoy the show?"

Lamiroir nodded, smiling. "It was wonderful," she assured him. "I'm sure I would have enjoyed the tricks had I been able to see them... but their... what's the word?" She frowned. "In Borginian, we call it pilalu. Their talking."

Luke thought a moment. The wordplay in his siblings' banter would be much harder for someone unused to English to process. "Was it hard to understand their jokes?"

"Oh, no," Lamiroir insisted, shaking her head. "I was able to glean the meaning behind anything I didn't immediately understand." She smiled. "Never mind what the word I was looking for is. I did indeed enjoy the show."

"That's good," Luke replied, softly laughing. "They'll be delighted to hear it." After a pause, he added, "It's eight o'clock now. Did you want to catch up with Apollo and Trucy, or head home?"

Lamiroir thought for a long moment, her face falling. "I would love to tell them in person that I enjoyed their performance... but it has been a long day. If it is alright with you, I would very much like to return to my hotel for the night."

Luke nodded. "That's perfectly fine, ma'am." He stood from his chair. "I'll send them a message and get you home."

She loved your show. Said it was wonderful, and she even understood your foreign English wordplay. ;) However, it's been a long day for all of us and she seems exhausted, so I'm taking her back to her hotel.

That's awesome she enjoyed it! Guess it would be mean to make her stay and tell us herself, but she could probably do that tomorrow I spose. Trucy says to thank her for coming and we enjoyed performing for her Passed on your message. Are you two okay?

We're fine. We'll see you and her at the courthouse tomorrow k?

Alright. I might see you later this evening, since I need to drop by the agency, but if not... Tomorrow at the courthouse.

Apollo's mind was buzzing as he entered the lobby, the events of the last few days flying back and forth in his head. He was almost certain of what had happened the night of the concert, if not all the whys; It was just a matter of proving it to the court's satisfaction, and it was that more than anything that was killing him right now. He couldn't let his new younger brother (as ignorant of that fact as Machi was) be convicted for murder... but, at the same time, the boy was still guilty of smuggling, and would certainly be convicted of that back in his homeland. It seemed death faced the teenage pianist at every turn; Was there anything Apollo could do for Machi?

Sighing, Apollo dropped onto the dirt brown sofa of the lobby, his head in his hands. 'Great job, Wright. After all these years, you finally find your mother and a brother you never knew you had, and immediately let said brother be sent to his death. Wonderful. Perfect, even. How could they fail to bring you into their family after this?'

The door opened and Apollo recognised Luke's footsteps entering the room. "Apollo! You're already here!" The footsteps sped up, and the sofa bounced under the attorney as his younger brother dropped into the neighbouring seat.

"Hey," Apollo muttered reluctantly, lowering his hands from his face.

Luke was looking way too cheerful for Apollo's tastes, clutching in his hands a small black laptop and a local newspaper. "I happened upon something very interesting! Well, a few things, really," he said, placing the laptop on the table as he flipped open the newspaper. "First off, I think I've found out what Crescend's goal was!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "His goal?"

Luke paused, finally noticing his brother's less-than-eager mood. "Mister LeTouse was looking for cocoon smugglers, right?"

"Right," Apollo agreed, wincing. "He'd probably figured out Machi was one of 'em..."

After a moment of concerned staring, Luke added, "And then Crescend killed him."

Apollo nodded. "I guess they somehow got into an argu-" He paused, cutting himself off with a frown. "Wait... Does that mean Crescend...?"

Luke slowly smiled. "Is also a smuggler," he confirmed. "I'm sure he and Machi were working together on this operation; Mister LeTouse discovered their partnership, confronted Crescend, and lost his life as a result."

Apollo pressed a finger to his forehead, running over the case in his mind once more. "So Crescend faked the time of death entirely to pin to blame on his partner... and Machi's too scared to speak out because he'll be killed no matter what."

"Exactly," Luke solemnly agreed, then held up the newspaper. "I think I've found why Crescend was smuggling it, too: Those cocoons can be made into a cure for Incuritis, right?"

Apollo nodded, looking at the newspaper curiously. "And?"

"Remember the Chief Justice's son?" Luke continued, grinning. "How the judge was worried what to say to a dying child?"

Apollo rolled his eyes, although he had truthfully long forgotten about the minor interruption to the court proceedings the previous morning. "Get on with it, Luke."

It took Apollo a few moments to register the cry, and his eyes widened as he snatched the newspaper from his brother's hands. "He's what!?" Sure enough, there in the corner of the page was a small piece about the incurable disease, and how it was afflicting the young son of the district's Chief Justice. Apparently, this was a fate the family had been openly fighting for nearly a year, seeking the best doctors the world (and their money) could offer in the hopes a cure would magically materialise.
"This can't be a co-incidence..."

Luke nodded. "I'm almost certain Crescend was planning to sell the cocoon to the Chief Justice. He's so desperate, in return for a cure, he'd protect Crescend from any backlash breaking international law would cause. Doubtless he'd be charged a lot for it, too."

Apollo's frown deepened. "I wonder if Gavin's got any idea what his 'friend' has been up to all this time..."

Luke didn't immediately reply, looking away as he thought. "He genuinely didn't realise Lamiroir's testimony was important," he mused aloud. "Instead of ignoring Lamiroir's accusation, he actually took Crescend off the case... or at least attempted to." He sighed. "I honestly think he doesn't know.
He said he simply tries to discover the truth... but I guess only time will tell if that holds up when someone close to him is at stake."

As much as he wanted to say otherwise, Apollo had to agree; After their talk yesterday, he couldn't see Klavier willingly aid in a cover up of the truth, even to protect a friend.

"But that's not all I've found," Luke continued, changing the subject as he reached for his laptop, opening the lid and quickly tapping in his password. "While you two were finishing up at the Wonder Bar, I dropped by the agency to pick up that CD Valant left us..." He paused, wincing sheepishly. "And pick up Trucy's key from Mister Sycamore, too. I hope she found where I hid it."

Apollo couldn't help a wince of his own at that; They'd been so focussed on being late for their show, and looking after Lamiroir, that they had completely forgotten about the Bostonius crew. "She would have contacted one of us if she didn't. By the way, are those guys all set for today?"

Luke nodded, busy with his computer. "Emmy and Flora are here to watch the trial with Trucy and Lamiroir, but Mister Sycamore's taking Alfendi out for the morning. They're fine."

"Good," Apollo sighed in relief. He then caught a glance of the time on the clock in the corner of Luke's computer screen. "Oh geeze, it's nearly ten. Speaking of the trial, shouldn't we be heading out?" He got to his feet, not waiting for a reply.

"Is it?" Luke muttered, noticing the time himself with a frown. Reluctantly, he closed his laptop and moved to slip it, and his abandoned newspaper, into his satchel. "Well, I'll just explain this later... or bring it up in court if need be."
The brothers headed to the hallway door, only for it to surprise them by opening itself, sending the pair jumping back in surprise.

A bailiff meekly looked up at the pair from the doorway. "Ah, excuse me, sirs...

"Y-yes?" Apollo replied, brushing off his costume in pretence he hadn't been surprised by the entrance.

"The scheduled starting time for the trial has been changed," the bailiff informed them, bowing her head. "The trial will not be commencing until ten thirty AM. Sorry for the inconvenience." Apollo and Luke shared a confused look. "Did something happen?" Apollo asked. "This is a first...

The bailiff shook her head. "It was by the judge's request," she said. "Some urgent personal business. Apparently, he's visiting the hospital again."

"The hospital?" Luke repeated. "You mean, the Chief Justice's son?"

"I believe so," the bailiff replied. "Apparently his condition worsened considerably this morning."

Luke and Apollo shared another glance, then Apollo gave the bailiff a nod. "Thank you. For informing us."

The bailiff squeaked under her breath, then, blushing madly, fled from the room, closing the door behind her.

Apollo sighed, crossing his arms. "Well. Guess we've got another entire half hour to fill, then."

"It's not too bad," Luke assured him, heading back to the sofa with a smile. "I can show you what I found in files Valant gave us!" With that, he dug his laptop back out of his satchel, arranging it on the small table as he sat down.

Apollo thought a moment, then followed his brother, sitting at his side. "Alright. What's so interesting about the Guitar's Serenade?"

Luke giggled, navigating through his digital folders. "This first one I noticed while I was showing the video to Fox before getting to bed last night," he explained, clicking on a folder that opened to reveal seven files, five of them audio and the sixth of a type Apollo didn't recognise. The final file, a video, was what Luke pointed at, selecting it with the touchscreen before hitting enter to open it. "Just watch."

Apollo raised an eyebrow as the video started, its sound muted. Luke adjusted the player to full screen, then, careful not to touch the screen, pointed to Lamiroir as the cameras pulled back from her. "See here? She's wearing that brooch we found."

"Yeah, and?" Apollo replied. "We met her just before this, we already know she had it."

Giggling, Luke tapped on his keyboard a couple of times, making the video skip ahead. "Look here, when she 'reappears'..." The star-patterned cloak fluttered on the screen, falling down to land perfectly on Lamiroir's raised arms. Immediately, Luke slammed the space-bar to pause the clip, and looked over to his brother with a wide grin. "See it?"

Apollo was tempted to shove Luke aside and demand he just say, but he instead decided to just tolerate his brother's enthusiasm for his find, reminding himself that at least this one wasn't being kept a secret. He turned his attention to the figure of Lamiroir on the screen, running his eyes up and down until he noticed the problem. "She's not wearing the brooch anymore."

"Exactly!" Luke cried, dancing a little in his seat out of pure glee. "Not only does this prove she witnessed the murder, it proves the timing too! And that's not all!" He minimised the video to return to the folder of files, clicking on the one Apollo couldn't identify. It opened in a different program, and, once it had finished loading, Apollo recognised the horizontal bars across the program's window as the unmistakable patterns of sound-waves.

"Are those... the audio files?" Apollo asked.

Luke nodded. "Mm-hmm. I was putting them together last night, and, just for fun, tried listening to them all separately." He fiddled around the program a moment, greying out all but one of the bars. "Here, see if you can spot what's wrong with Lamiroir's track." He again slammed the space-bar, then rapidly tapped on another key, slowly raising the volume of the laptop.

Before long, Apollo could hear his mother's voice, unaccompanied by piano or guitar, coming from the speakers of the computer.

"When you stole away the keys,
"My heart held on to so tight."

His smile was almost involuntary. No wonder she had managed to find fame again on her own terms.

"Pleasure,
"But a fleeting melo-

Luke slammed the space-bar, bringing the song to a halt. "There! Right there! See?" He pointed at the waveform.

Apollo blinked, looking at the incomprehensible squiggle on the screen. "See what?"

After a second's pause, Luke fiddled in the program, selecting the portion of the song that had played and zooming in on it. "I almost didn't notice this, and it's practically impossible to hear with the sound so low..." He pointed at a specific bump in the waveform, smaller than the hills surrounding it. "That!"

Apollo stared at it for a very long time. Finally, he looked back at Luke. "What about it?"

Sighing, Luke tapped the space-bar again.

"-ight.
"Pleasu-

He gestured to the bump again. "Lamiroir isn't singing here," he pointed out. "So what is this sound her microphone picked up?"

Now that Apollo could understand. He frowned at the strange anomaly. "That's a good question. Is it possible to hear what it is?"

Luke grinned, quickly moving to again fiddle around in the program. Apollo had no idea what exactly he was doing, but before long the anomaly matched the surrounding hills of the overall waveform in height. Without a word, he again hit the space-bar.
Apollo almost jumped out of his seat, not even hearing the rest of the short clip. "What the hell!?"

Luke just stared at the laptop screen. "That was my initial reaction, too."

For several moments, Apollo could do nothing but sit, almost on his side from the shock of the noise on Lamiroir's mic. He took the time to forcibly slow his rapid breathing, calming down from the surprise and carefully sitting back up in his seat. Finally, he waved a hand at the computer. "That's... That's a gunshot, isn't it?"

Luke nodded. "Without a doubt. She must have only been close enough to pick up the one."

"And she probably dropped the brooch from the shock of it," Apollo realised, leaning back in his seat. "Geeze... Who'd've thought?"

"This won't prove it was specifically Crescend who killed Mister LeTouse," Luke reluctantly pointed out.

Apollo thought a moment, then gave his concerned brother a smile. "It proves Lamiroir is telling the truth," he said. "It proves Machi was onstage at the time of the murder. Even if we can't get Crescend, I'll be happy with that."

Luke still didn't look happy. "But then Machi will go home and be tried for smuggling. If Mister LeTouse was after him, Interpol will know what he did, and so will the authorities in Borginia before too long." He sighed, staring at his computer. "What do we do about that, Apollo?"

Apollo couldn't reply.

This was going to be a very tough case indeed.

When it finally came time for the trial to start, Apollo and Luke stood ready at the defence bench. They didn't need to exchange words, having discussed their case all they needed to back in the lobby.

The judge cleared his throat as he settled into his seat at the podium, banging his gavel to call the room to order. "My apologies for the delay," he announced. "Court is now in session for the trial of..." He paused, squinting at his papers. "Erm, how do you say this name again? 'Marquis'?"

"Maki Tobayu," Klavier idly filled in, eyes closed. "Our suspect fortissimo."

Luke raised an eyebrow. "Wouldn't 'pianissimo' be more accurate?"

Klavier thought a moment, then shot Luke a grin. "Perhaps so, Herr Doktor. He is not exactly 'loud', is he?"

The judge looked between the two with vague confusion. "Right." He brushed them off. "It's his trial, in any case." He tapped his gavel, marking the start of the trial.

"The defence is prepared, Your Honour," Apollo replied.

"The prosecution," Klavier added, throwing out an arm to point across the room with a cocky smile, "is ready to rock."

The judge had fallen silent, frowning into the middle distance.

Apollo and Luke shared a worried look. "I-is something wrong, Your Honour?" Apollo asked.

"No," the judge insisted, then sighed. "Well, yes. It's just, I've been friends with the Chief Justice since we were students. It pains me to see him going through such a difficult time."

Apollo wasn't quite sure how he could respond to that.

"Herr Judge," Klavier spoke up, "let me say, with all honesty, I feel your pain." To Apollo's surprise, he actually seemed genuine, but his rare sympathetic look hardened quickly. "But, now is not the time for tears. Now is the time... for law."

The judge thought a moment, then nodded, back to business in an instant. "Indeed. We left off at quite the juncture yesterday."

"Quite a sensational ending," Klavier agreed, grinning. "Who would have thought Daryan would guest star in the season cliff-hanger... as a suspect?"

"I asked the prosecution to look into this matter," the judge continued, and gestured to Klavier. "Please tell the court your findings."

Klavier's grin faded. "Daryan Crescend is a member of my band, the Gavinners," he explained. "He is also a detective, making the current charges serious indeed." He shook his head. "Yet, after investigation, I have found no cause to alter our case, or file new charges."

Luke sighed, eyes closed. He looked... disappointed.

"And your reason is?" Apollo asked on behalf of them both, arms crossed.

"Weren't you aware, Herr Forehead?" Klavier replied, smirking across the room. "He has an impeccable alibi."

Apollo rolled his eyes.

"An alibi?" the judge repeated.

Klavier chuckled. "Let us review the facts again, shall we?" He held up a hand, counting off on his fingers. "The concert held on the night of the shooting was in three sets. The Gavinners ripped up the stage during the first set."

Apollo resisted the urge to take that description literally.

"For the second set," Klavier continued, "our guest took centre stage. The only performers appearing were myself, Lamiroir, and Machi, along with a drummer and bassist, for a total of five."

'Huh, really? Could have sworn it was just the three of you,' Apollo mused. 'Guess the other two were offstage somewhere.'

"The shooting in the dressing room however, took place during the third set," Klavier said. "Lamiroir and the defendant, Machi Tobaye, had left the stage at that point, and the Gavinners were already rocking. This is when two shots rang out at the scene of the crime. Shots heard by Detective Ema Skye, mind you." He pointed to the ceiling, almost glaring at the defence bench. "Furthermore, Lamiroir herself witnessed the moment of the crime." He paused, a smirk forming on his lips. "Well, perhaps I should say, she 'heard' the moment of the crime; When she claims to have heard Mister LeTouse and Detective Crescend 'talking'."

Apollo's hands tightened into fists as he resisted the urge to loudly object.

"B-but that's impossible!" the judge gasped. "Detective Crescend was-!"

"Precisely," Klavier interrupted. "Detective Crescend was on stage, getting his groove on, no less." He waved his hands triumphantly. "Voila. A perfect alibi!"

It was becoming steadily more difficult for Apollo to keep his mouth shut. The judge hummed in thought. "Does the defence have anything to add to this?"

"Naturally," Apollo growled, and threw out his arm to point at Klavier. "Detective Crescend's alibi is not nearly as perfect as the prosecution would have us believe!"

The judge looked surprised. "Whatever do you mean, Mister Wright? I don't see any reason to doubt his whereabouts during the third act."

"Objection!" Apollo shouted. "It's not the third act that's at issue here! We were rudely interrupted during Lamiroir's cross-examination yesterday; She still had something very important to tell us!"

"Objection!" Klavier shot back with a stern look. "But it was determined that Lamiroir's testimony was insubstantial! There's nothing you can-!"
Apollo slammed his fists on the bench, then gave Klavier a hard stare, suddenly feeling very calm. "Lamiroir was taken to the hospital yesterday with injuries."

The courtroom fell silent. "What happened?" the judge asked.

"She was assaulted, Your Honour."

"Assaulted!?"

"Someone wanted Lamiroir dead," Apollo continued. "Thankfully, she was able to save herself."

Klavier scoffed in disbelief. "What!? I've heard no such report!"

Apollo only stared. "Prosecutor Gavin." Funnily enough, it seemed Apollo's solemn gaze was almost frightening the prosecutor, who stared back with wide eyes. "Why would anyone be out to kill Lamiroir? Can you think of a reason?"

Klavier shuffled behind his bench, uncomfortable. "W-well..."

"Think of how she is known here in America," Apollo continued, on a roll. "A singer from overseas who doesn't speak English, yes? Yet someone tried to keep her mouth shut." His glare at the prosecutor intensified. "Who could that have been?"

The judge's eyes widened as he realised what Apollo was getting at. "You don't think..."

Apollo nodded. "I do. It was the same person who shot Mister LeTouse." He pointed dramatically across the courtroom. "The killer was afraid of her, afraid of what she might say!" His calm began to slip as he pressed his fists to the bench, leaning on them heavily. "The true culprit of this murder knows there is a truth in her testimony that the prosecution has not yet seen, a truth that turns this entire case on its head! The defence demands that she return to the witness stand, and, this time, be permitted to give her entire testimony!"

There was a long pause in the aftermath of Apollo's outburst. Klavier avoided the Wrights' eyes, grimacing as he stared at his feet.

Finally, the judge hummed in thought. "If Lamiroir was attacked," he reasoned, "this has serious implications." He nodded. "Very well. There were some confusing points in her testimony during yesterday's trial. Perhaps we did not inquire as deeply as we might have. The court will hear Lamiroir's testimony once more!" He banged his gavel, and that was that.

Apollo let out a breath he didn't realise he'd been holding as he straightened up from where he'd been leaning on the bench. "That was close," he muttered.

"That was amazing," Luke whispered in reply, and Apollo looked around to see his brother giving him a wide grin. "I don't think I've ever seen you get so angry you loop back around into calm!"

At that, Apollo couldn't resist a small laugh. "No, guess not." He pointed to Luke's satchel. "We'd better get your laptop on standby; We're gonna need it to prove Lamiroir isn't lying."

"You got it," Luke promised, already moving to pull the computer from his bag.

Somehow Apollo was not surprised when, a minute later, Lamiroir showed up in the courtroom with Trucy at her side, the teen leading the singer to the witness stand before again skipping merrily to the defence bench, giving her brothers a grin.

"You don't give up, do you?" Apollo whispered with a smirk.

Trucy playfully stuck out her tongue in reply.

"Lamiroir, I must apologise," Klavier told the woman at the stand. "We must ask you to stand again and speak."

"You need not apologise," Lamiroir insisted, looking every bit as strong as her children. "I know that Machi is innocent, and I will do all that I can until the court realises this."

"Let's review your testimony from yesterday," Apollo suggested, looking through his notes. "You told us you were in the air vents when you heard two gunshots and the shooter's voice, and that the voice belonged to Daryan Crescend?"

Lamiroir nodded. "That is correct."

"Which would all be quite impossible," Klavier pointed out with a frustrated look. "First of all, what reason did Lamiroir have to be in the air vents, and second, how could the killer have escaped that room with witnesses at both exits?"

Apollo smirked. "Not as impossible as you might think," he assured the prosecutor, then returned his attention to the stand. "Why not answer both his questions at once? Lamiroir, perhaps you could tell us... when exactly all of this happened?"

Klavier scoffed. "What on earth are you up to now!? Of course it-!"

"I didn't think I was asking you, Prosecutor Gavin!" Apollo shot back, silencing the man instantly. After a pause, he gave Lamiroir a nod. "Witness, please continue."

Lamiroir waited a moment more, perhaps to ensure she would not be cut off again. "Naturally," she replied, "it was in the middle of my performance."

"What!?" Klavier cried, jumping back.

The gallery erupted into noise, forcing the judge to bang his gavel repeatedly. "Order! Order! Order!" He huffed as the room reluctantly quietened. "B-but... that goes against the evidence!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "What does, Your Honour?"

The judge gestured with his gavel. "Lamiroir here... she was onstage during the second act!"

"Indeed she was," Apollo replied with a smile. "But not for the entire performance."

The judge blinked at the young man, confused. "What do you mean by that, defence?"

"Ach!" Klavier muttered, wincing with a glare as he realised what Apollo meant. "You can't mean to say-!

Apollo nodded at the prosecutor, then looked up to the judge. "We have a video of the second act, if you want to see for yourself, Your Honour."

The judge considered a moment. "Alright Mister Wright, you've intrigued me. Let's see this fateful performance."
View the Court Record
It took them a minute or two to connect Luke's laptop to the wireless network of the courtroom, and before long the video of the Guitar's Serenade was playing over the holograms. Unable to figure out how to connect his computer to the courtroom's little-used sound system, Luke had made do with turning the laptop's volume up full-blast, carefully placing it as far as reasonably possible from himself and his siblings in fear of blowing out their own eardrums.

The court sat in rapt silence, watching the clip. Lamiroir closed her eyes and simply listened, while Klavier stared at the screens with an intent frown. The Wrights, having seen it themselves a number of times already, mostly just waited for the video to finish, and eventually it did, the music fading out before the screen went black.

The judge clapped enthusiastically. "Oh, that was simply fascinating!" he cried.

"As we can see," Apollo announced, "Lamiroir was clearly not on stage for her entire performance." He held out a hand, gesturing to the screens. "Though I hate to delve into the workings of a grand illusion, it is clear that she is incapable of actually vanishing, let alone teleportation; During that time, Lamiroir was hidden from sight, moving to the back of the forum."

"But how is it possible?"

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "Your Honour?"

"There is only twenty seconds between when she disappears and reappears!" the judge pointed out. "She couldn't have moved that fast!"

Klavier looked distinctly uncomfortable, avoiding anyone's eyes.

The judge didn't take long to notice. "Is something wrong, Prosecutor Gavin?"

"This was his concert, his show," Apollo explained, staring holes into the blond man's head. "He knows how the illusion was performed. He's just realising his own oversight." As the judge hummed in thought, studying the prosecutor, Apollo turned to his Court Record, throwing up on the holograms the diagram Ema had given him the previous day. "This is a cross-section diagram of the Coliseum: We can easily trace a route through these air vents," he highlighted the white area marking the air system below the concert hall itself, "from the stage, above the dressing rooms and out to the rear of the forum."

"Aha!" The judge seemed happy to understand what was going on.

Apollo brought up the previous day's transcript on his Court Record. "Lamiroir said yesterday, when she witnessed the murder, she was on her way 'from the stage to the backstage exit'."

"Why, that's a perfect description of this route above the ceiling!" the judge realised.

Klavier was sweating, glaring at his bench. "Why didn't he tell me...?"
Apollo couldn't resist a smirk. "Magicians only reveal the details of their acts on a need-to-know basis, Mister Gavin. You didn't need to know her exact route, so it was not shared with you."

"They're the bread and butter of a magician's life, you know!" Trucy added with a knowing nod.

The judge turned to the witness stand. "Is this true, Lamiroir?" he asked. "Did you use this route above the ceiling during the illusion?"

Lamiroir nodded. "I did."

"Well, that's that," the judge muttered, leaning back in his seat. "But I'm still a little confused... There was very little time between when she disappeared and when she reappeared. Twenty seconds, tops! How could she do it so fast?"

Apollo closed his eyes, thinking. After what Luke had shown him in the lobby, he knew the exact moment in the song when the murder occurred, and it was at a point when 'Lamiroir' was still onstage; It was going to be necessary to explain more details of Valant's illusion.

But Apollo had taken too long to reply. "Can the witness explain this to the court?" the judge demanded.

Lamiroir's face was turned downwards. "I cannot," she replied.

The judge stared at her for a long moment. "Very well." He turned to the defence. "Mister Wright?"

Apollo bit back a glare; Just because he'd known this was coming, didn't mean he had to like it. "It goes against every fibre of my being to share the secrets of a magic trick," he warned. "Against my very pride as a magician. I would rather die than ruin a fellow illusionist's career like that." He closed his eyes, sighing. "However... In this case, certain details of the teleportation illusion are necessary to understanding the events of this murder. As an attorney, I cannot allow anything to stand in the way of the truth... not even magic."

Klavier gave the young magician a strange look, a smile on his face. "Nicely put... Herr Gramarye."

At Apollo's side, Trucy seemed upset, but she didn't speak up. Apollo mused she didn't agree with his sentiments on talking about the illusion's finer details.

"So?" the judge replied, watching Apollo expectantly. "Can you explain how Lamiroir moved across the concert hall in twenty seconds?"

Apollo nodded. "I can. But first, I would like to confirm a few things." He turned to the witness stand. "Lamiroir, just to clarify... how much time were you given to move across the hall?"

The woman thought a moment. "Two minutes."

"Two minutes!" the judge repeated, astonished. "The mystery deepens! As does my curiosity!"

"I'm not sure the song itself is even that long," Luke muttered at Apollo's side.

Apollo frowned in thought. "And did hearing the murder slow you down in any way?"

Lamiroir reluctantly nodded, admitting, "Yes, I nearly didn't make it in time. You see... I stopped halfway."

"Above your dressing room?"
Again, Lamiroir nodded. "That is when I heard the gunshots, and Mister LeTouse and the detective talking."

"But you still made it to your mark in time," Apollo pointed out, giving her a smile. "That's very commendable, given the circumstances."

Lamiroir returned the gesture with a small, grateful bow of her head. "I have also been giving what I heard much reflection over the past few days," she continued. "I believe I can tell you what I heard the detective saying."

Klavier looked up in surprise. "You remember something that was said!??"

Of the Wrights, Luke was the first to react to this surprise, leaning forward over the bench. "Lamiroir, why didn't you tell us you heard his words!??"

"Though my memory is clear, I was afraid to speak," she admitted. "You see, I do not understand what was said."

Apollo and Luke shared a look. "You said it was the detective speaking?" Apollo asked. "What did he say?"

Lamiroir thought a moment. "It's over. Press the switch. Now."

"Switch?" the judge repeated, confused. "And the shooter said this to the victim, Mister LeTouse?"

"I thought it quite strange myself, afterward," Lamiroir admitted.

The judge hummed in thought. "It is a mystery..."

"Maybe not as much as it appears, Your Honour," Luke said with a grin, looking at Apollo. Apollo smiled back.

"Oh?" Klavier asked, raising an eyebrow at the pair. "There was nothing at the scene that could be called a 'switch', save the lights'."

Apollo shook his head. "True, there wasn't a switch at the scene. But, it just so happens," he held up a hand, twirling his fingers as the remote trigger seemingly materialised in his grip. "I have a 'switch' right here."

The judge leaned forward, examining the object. "That certainly does look like a switch, doesn't it," he agreed.

His hand lowering, Apollo's smile turned to a frown. "The problem is, this was found not at the scene of the crime, but on the stage. It was hidden there."

Klavier glared at his bench, thinking.

"Are you claiming that the voice Lamiroir heard," the judge asked, "was of someone commanding another to press this switch?"

Apollo nodded, resting the trigger on the bench. "It's a possibility."

"Objection!" shouted Klavier, turning his glare to Apollo. "Oh, Herr Forehead? I'd call that an impossibility."

"And why is that?" Luke demanded.
"It's hardly necessary for me to remind the court of the layout of the concert forum," Klavier explained. "The stage is quite far from Lamiroir's dressing room. Not to mention, even The Guitar's Serenade is not so quiet that a shout from backstage would be heard in the forum."

Lamiroir nodded. "The detective's voice was loud, but certainly not a shout," she agreed.

Klavier gestured to her as though her reply sealed the deal. "So, too, have Herr Forehead's cries of 'possibility' fallen far short of being heard."

Apollo just smirked at the prosecutor. "Sorry, but he wouldn't have needed to shout."

At that, Klavier's frustrated smugness faded. "Excuse me?"

"You heard what I said," Apollo replied. "Or do you need me to shout it for you?"

Klavier rolled his eyes, ignoring the barb.

"It would have been quite simple to be heard on the stage from that dressing room," Apollo continued. "You would only have to use..." He paused a moment, thinking, then turned to Trucy at his side. "Truce, that headset, if you could?"

Trucy blinked in surprise at being addressed, then gasped. "Oh!" She took a moment to dig around in her bag, then proudly held high the tiny earpiece they had found on the hallway floor. "You'd just need this!"

"Perhaps you're familiar with it, Prosecutor Gavin?" Apollo added, shooting the man another smirk. Klavier only glared back.

"What? What is it?" the judge asked, leaning forward to get a good look at the tiny device in the teenager's hand. "Is that some kind of new-fangled phone they invented while I wasn't looking?"

"This is a type of transmitter," Apollo explained to the old man. "A communications device."

The judge still looked baffled. "Communications? Device?"

"From what I've heard, that night everyone on stage was wearing one of these," Apollo continued, gently taking the item from his sister. "Isn't that right, Prosecutor Gavin?"

"Ah, yes, actually," Klavier admitted. "They're for talking between band members. We all had one on."

Apollo triumphantly brandished the earpiece at the man with a grin. "So you admit that, if you were wearing one of these, talking from the backstage to the stage would be simple!"

Klavier winced, then threw out an arm. "Objection! True, but wait! Those send out an electronic signal. To avoid interference with the audio systems, their range is quite limited."

"About ten metres, correct?" Luke asked. "Thirty feet?"

Apollo just continued to smirk, and placed the headset down on the bench to again summon on the holograms the cross-section diagram of the Coliseum. "Why don't you look at this again, Prosecutor Gavin?"

Klavier took one look and flinched; He'd already spotted the problem.

"Exactly." Apollo pointed at the screen. "The walk from the stage to the backstage seems far, but the direct distance is less than thirty feet!"

"So, when Lamiroir heard the shooter's voice," the judge reasoned, "he could have been talking to someone on stage!"

"Objection!" Klavier cried, recovering remarkably quickly to grin at the Wrights. "Hah! You're claiming this is the 'switch' in question? Why did it have to be on the stage at the time? It could be placed in a pocket and carried anywhere! Someone could have hid it on the stage after the fact!"

"Uh oh," Trucy muttered at Apollo's side. "He's got a point there, Polly..."

Apollo felt his earlier smugness wilting. "W-well..."

"Actually, it's very easy to prove where it was at the time of the murder," Luke spoke up, giving Klavier a confident smile. He then turned to Apollo. "Because we know what it does."

'Oh yeah, we do!' His grin returning in an instant, Apollo turned to his Court Record. "Prosecutor Gavin," he called, "I'm sure you remember this?" With a swipe of his finger, he summoned to the courtroom's holograms the photo of Ema's igniter.

Klavier jolted in shock. "Ach! That's that...!" He cut himself off, digging through something underneath his bench.

"That what!?!" the judge asked, looking almost frantically between the two attorneys. "Is it another one of those new-fangled phones!?"

Apollo froze, eyeing the decorated circuit board on the screen. "This... is an igniter," he hesitantly explained. 'What phone looks like this!?'

"I-igniter?" the judge repeated. "You mean it's like a lighter?"

"Yes, actually."

Meanwhile, Klavier had stood back up, a familiar-looking plastic bag in his hands. He was examining the remote trigger on the defence bench, giving it a critical look. "You aren't saying this switch is a remote...?"

Apollo nodded. "I am." He held up the black device. "This is a remote trigger for an igniter. Did you want me to prove it?"

"Let me see that!" the judge called, holding out a hand towards Klavier.

Klavier looked reluctant, but pulled the igniter from its evidence bag and handed it over to a bailiff, who delivered the item to the judge. Immediately, the judge was turning it around in his hands, examining the blackened device from every angle.

"Your Honour, if you'll hold it pointing away from you for a moment," Apollo called, eager not to repeat the incident with Ema as he held the trigger in his grip.

It took the judge a moment to register the request, and he almost huffed childishly as he obeyed it. Nevertheless, once Apollo had pressed the red switch, the igniter's tiny gas canister burst into flame, and the judge cried out in surprise as he promptly dropped it on his podium. "Mister Wright!" he shrieked, giving the young attorney a glare. "You will cease and desist from burning down this courtroom!"
Apollo flinched. "S-sorry," he replied, hurriedly placing the trigger back down on the bench. "That was a bit more fire than I'd expected."

"If my whiskers had caught on fire," the judge darkly muttered, handing the igniter back to the bailiff to return to Klavier.
As the igniter was returned to its evidence bag, Apollo fixed Klavier with a stern look. "Prosecutor Gavin," he called, attracting the man's attention. "Let me repeat myself: This switch is a remote trigger for an igniter." He pointed at the device on the bench in front of him. Klavier looked at it with an unreadable expression. "Given what you now know about the timing of the murder... doesn't that suggest something to you?"

Klavier stared back at Apollo, his eyes only briefly flicking over to Luke. "You're... talking about what happened to me, aren't you?"

Apollo nodded. "Exactly. That night at the concert, there was one unusual burst of flame." He pointed at the prosecutor. "Your guitar caught fire, right in the middle of the second act!"

The judge looked between the two, confused. "Wasn't that part of the stage show, though?"

"Prosecutor Gavin was entirely unaware such a thing had been planned," Apollo explained, resting his hand back on the bench. "And the guitar that burned was a valuable keepsake."

"Yeah!" Trucy chirped with pride. "He got it in Borgia from Lamiroir!"

"And it was later discovered to have an igniter sitting just inside the sound hole," Luke added, then gestured to the trigger. "An igniter that was set off by this very 'switch', as ordered by the shooter to an accomplice over their headsets. And all this was only moments after Mister LeTouse was shot."

Klavier said nothing, his eyes closed in thought.

"But, wait a minute," the judge spoke up with a frown, "this crime was carried out according to the lyrics of that song, yes?" He turned to Apollo. "The 'bullet' came after the 'fire'!"

Apollo shook his head. "You're thinking about it the wrong way," he said.

"We've been saying this from the start," Luke added. "It makes no sense for the shooter to be following the lyrics in the first place. They only did so because it was advantageous for them." He sighed, crossing his arms. "In this case, because placing the shooting in the third act instead of the second would give the shooter the perfect alibi."

"You're saying the order was reversed on purpose?" Klavier realised, standing still behind his bench.

"And then went to the trouble of kidnapping Machi and stealing a guitar as a final touch," Apollo continued. "A ruse to make everyone think he'd followed the lyrics the whole way."

The gallery began to murmur, so the judge banged his gavel, silencing them with a single, "Order!" As the crowds calmed, he sighed. "I believe you've made the defence's case quite clear... but I am reminded that we were in the middle of something else before this little distraction." He gestured to Apollo. "Were we not explaining how Lamiroir could have been witness to the shooting in the first place? How she could have travelled all the way across the forum in only twenty seconds?"
Lamiroir smiled. "It was two minutes, actually."

Apollo looked up at the increasingly annoyed judge, deciding it was a good idea to get back to the discussion of the illusion. "Your Honour, Lamiroir was indeed offstage for those two minutes before she appeared behind the audience."

"But how?" the judge asked. "In the video, we clearly see her singing!"

Apollo almost smiled. "You see, that is not Lamiroir on the platform with Prosecutor Gavin."

"You mean..." The judge's eyes widened. "A fake!?" The gallery began to murmur, and the judge paused to bang his gavel. "Order!" Once they had quietened again, he rounded on Klavier. "P-Prosecutor Gavin!"

Klavier smirked. "From your expression, I gather you had no idea this was the case, Herr Judge," he said. "I, of course, knew about it already. Don't get me wrong. I wasn't hiding it; It just never occurred to me that the switch and the shooting took place at the same time."

"And now there was a switch!?" the judge huffed in reply.

"Just before the stage's tower rose," Klavier explained, 'Lamiroir was replaced'."

"And the magician behind the trick was the replacement," Apollo picked up. "Which reminds me," he turned to Lamiroir, "were you singing the entire time you were offstage, Lamiroir?"

Klavier chuckled. "Naturally. When the Gavinners play a show live, we play live. We aren't some kind of air guitar band!"

Lamiroir smiled. "Yes, Mister Gavin expressed a dislike for recordings. I used a headset to keep my voice onstage even while I was off it."

"B-but, if you were singing while you were walking," the judge pointed out, "wouldn't the shooter and victim have heard you? You were right over their heads!"

"Not necessarily, Your Honour," Luke replied with a smile. "Her voice was being projected from the air vent to the stage, and from the stage to the backstage speakers." He pointed a finger into the air proudly. "And one of those same speakers is situated right next to the air vent, set to full volume at Prosecutor Gavin's own request."

The judge laughed, impressed. "Ingenious! Her voice was hidden... by her voice!"

Lamiroir suddenly gasped, a hand to her veil.

"Lamiroir?" Apollo prompted her.

"I... have just remembered something."

The judge seemed intrigued. "Do tell."

"When I heard the gunshots... It startled me, so I..." She looked away, embarrassed. "I stopped singing. I forgot the words."

"What...?" the judge mumbled, confused.

Apollo noticed Luke grinning widely, a hand already on his laptop.
"Thankfully, it was the very beginning of the second verse," Lamiroir continued, "so not many would notice."

"Herr Doktor!" Klavier cried, pointing at Luke. "Play that video again!"

He didn't need to say it twice; Without a word, Luke hit the space-bar on his laptop, and the holograms again played the video for the courtroom.

"Sugar, Sugar,
"Oh that night in your embrace,
"When you stole away the keys
"My heart held on to so tight.
"Pleasure,
"But a fleeting-

With another slam of the space-bar, the video paused. "Right there!" Luke proudly announced. "The song stops!"

The judge's eyes flicked rapidly between Luke and the screens. "It does? I must have missed it."

Apollo pulled out the lyric sheet from his bag, examining it. "According to the lyrics, the second verse begins with the line 'Pleasure, pleasure'."

"Exactly!" Luke pointed out, fiddling with his laptop again. A moment later, the video skipped backwards a little, and again began to play.

"-heart held on to so tight.
"Pleasure,
"But a flee-

The video was again paused. "See it now?" Luke excitedly asked. "She only said 'pleasure' once, instead of twice!"

The judge was shocked, musing to himself for a moment. "This is evidence indeed! I believe we are guilty of making a terrible mistake."

Apollo nodded, and sent a stern stare at Klavier across the room; The prosecutor was once more glaring at his desk. "The crime didn't happen during the third set," Apollo pointed out once more, now it finally seemed to be sinking in for the prosecution. "It happened during the second, during Lamiroir's ballad."

"If that is true," the judge continued, "then no one onstage during the second set could have been the shooter!"

"Which takes Machi off the list of possible suspects," Apollo picked up, "and places Daryan Crescend firmly on it." He pointed at Klavier. "Not so watertight an alibi now, is it, Gavin?"

Klavier did not immediately reply, eyes closed as he retreated into his own thoughts. Finally, he mumbled, "Fascinating..." He looked up, gazing across at the three Wrights with an unreadable expression. "I don't believe I've ever seen a trial turned around quite so thoroughly." He shook his head, the sternness returning to his eyes. "Yet one problem remains."

"What's that, Prosecutor Gavin?" the judge asked.

"Herr Forehead's theory does have a certain kind of logic to it," Klavier admitted. "Yet, it is entirely based upon Lamiroir's testimony."

The judge, much like the rest of the courtroom, gave him a confused look. "Yes? Is there a problem with that?"

"Well, it's quite simple, though it pains me to say it," Klavier replied. "What if she is lying to protect the defendant?"

"Objection!" Apollo immediately shouted. "But you have no proof-!"

"All I'm saying," Klavier calmly interrupted, "is that the truth is as yet unclear... until we hear directly from the man himself."

The judge tugged at his beard. "You don't mean...?"

Klavier nodded. "Yes," he sighed. "Though he is a friend, and bandmate, Daryan Crescend must take the stand. I see no other way."

"As... someone with a new perspective on the case?" the judge asked.

"As a suspect, to be frank," Klavier replied, clearly reluctant.

Apollo thought a moment. "How long would it take to call him?"

"No more than fifteen minutes," Klavier said. "He's not likely to be far away."

"Then is it alright if we call another witness until he's ready to take the stand?"

The judge looked at Apollo with surprise. "You wish to call another witness?"

Apollo nodded.

Klavier raised an eyebrow. "Exactly who else do you need to hear from?"

"A witness who, until now, had not been given a chance to speak in this court," Apollo explained. "Because he doesn't speak English."

Klavier blinked in surprise. "You don't mean...?"

'AFTER WHAT HAPPENED YESTERDAY... WE HAVE A VERY IMPORTANT DISCUSSION TO FINISH. AND I THINK I MIGHT KNOW WHAT IT WAS ABOUT.' "I do." He pointed dramatically at the courtroom in general. "The defence calls Machi Tobaye to the stand!"

"WH-WH-WHAT!?!" the judge cried. "But he doesn't speak English!"

Apollo resisted the urge to roll his eyes and point out he'd already said that. "We'll use an interpreter!"

Klavier gave a bark of laughter in disbelief. "Interpreter? I'm afraid you'll have to look elsewhere." He brushed at his fringe. "I only speak a few phrases, such as 'I love you', and 'Where is the toilet?'."

'I WASN'T GOING TO ASK YOU ANYWAY.' "The defence already has an interpreter in mind actually, and I believe she's in the gallery." Apollo ran his eyes over the crowds, but no distinctive yellow coats jumped out at him; He had no idea where their friends were sitting anyway. "MS EMMELINE ALTAVA?"

"I'M HERE!" came an excited cry from behind them, and the Wrights spun around to see Emmy's brown hair bobbing up above the crowd in the raised gallery, her hand waving in the air. "I can interpret Borginian, Your Honour!"

The judge's eyebrows shot up as he spotted the woman. "Oh! Well," he turned to Klavier, "if the prosecution does not object...?"

Klavier chuckled, shaking his head. "The prosecution agrees with the defence's request," he said, and gave Apollo a teasing look. "Although I could not interpret myself, I know enough of the language to tell if your friend there lies, Herr Forehead."

Apollo nodded. "Duly noted."

"Woohoo!" came a cry from behind him, and a moment later a figure in yellow vaulted over the barrier of the raised gallery, sticking a perfect landing next to the defence bench, her boots squeaking slightly on the wooden floor. "You can count on me, Your Honour!" she proudly announced.

The judge simply nodded. "Bailiff, please show the defendant to the witness stand." As one of the court officials ran off to the defence waiting room, the judge then turned to the stand. "Lamiroir, thank you for your time."

Lamiroir smiled. "It was my pleasure to help," she insisted.

"Good luck!" Trucy whispered to her brothers with a wink, then she dashed off to escort Lamiroir back to the prosecution waiting room.

"I'm glad Emmy was able to help," Luke sighed, smiling sheepishly.

"Why?" Apollo replied, raising an eyebrow.

"Otherwise we would've had to rely on Lamiroir," Luke pointed out. "I'm not sure Mister Gavin would have agreed to that..." He shrugged. "Plus, given she's a witness herself, it'd be like cross-examining two people at once."

Apollo snorted, smirking at his brother. "You and Dad've done that before. It can't be too hard."

Luke softly laughed. "There's a reason it's not usually done, Apollo."

Apollo was about to reply when he heard footsteps nearby, and looked up to see a bailiff walking across the courtroom, pushing Machi before him by the shoulder. The teen stared at the floor as he was escorted to the witness stand, arms tightly crossed in a self-hug. Waiting by the wooden podium was Emmy, giving him a cheerful wave and a quiet greeting as he approached, but he gave her no more than a glance as he stood at her side, behind the stand.

"I suppose there is a first time for everything," Klavier mused to himself with a smile, then gave the boy a nod. "Shall we proceed? Your name, to begin with." He then looked to Emmy. "If you would, Fraulein."

Emmy nodded, still grinning widely, and turned to Machi. "Nimi?"

"Machi Tobaye," Machi said. "Levastaha."

"Machi Tobaye, the defendant," Emmy translated.

The judge hummed in thought. "This is certainly a first for this courtroom," he agreed. "Not that we really needed an interpretation of that message in particular." He turned to Apollo. "Mister Wright, if you would."

Apollo stood in confusion for a moment until it registered that, as his witness, it was his job to request a testimony. "Um. 'Well, we've no idea what he was about to say last night... so...'

"Machi, we'd like to ask you about the night of the concert," Luke spoke up.

Apollo looked up at him in surprise, having not been expecting a rescue. "Uh, yeah," he hurriedly agreed, turning to the witness stand. "Tell us everything you were doing between the start of the second act and your arrest."

Emmy was quick to translate, and, as she finished speaking, Machi stood in silent thought for several seconds. Finally, he spoke, sounding almost frantic as he explained something directly to Emmy. She immediately looked nervous, holding up her hands and crying, "W-whoa, odata! Kero hitasti! En ymara teta!"
Machi paused only a second or two, then repeated his earlier speech, this time more calmly.

"What is he saying?" the judge asked as Machi finishing talking.

Emmy stared at the boy in confusion for a few moments, then turned to look up at the judge, an uncertain frown on her face. "Um... I didn't shoot him. I was on stage at the time. Besides, I didn't even know the lyrics of the song, so how could I have followed them?"

Klavier scoffed. "That is hardly proof. Lamiroir could have explained them to you."

"Not that the lyrics really matter at this point," Apollo pointed out.

"Machi, that isn't what we asked you," Luke told the boy. "I know this is hard, trapped in an unfamiliar country where you don't know the language, but you're only making it harder by avoiding the question."

Apollo felt his bracelet twinge as he watched the teen, who was already glaring guiltily at the witness stand as Emmy translated for him. 'Wait... Can he...?' Something Sycamore had said the day after the concert was coming unbidden back to his mind:

"I was actually thinking that there remained the possibility this boy had learned to read English on the internet or something, until a moment ago when I remembered he is blind, so it's entirely impossible."

Apollo hadn't given the idle comment much thought at the time, but... what if...?

Machi was staying stubbornly silent in response to Luke's question. The younger Wright sighed, giving his brother a shrug. 'I'm out of ideas,' he seemed to be saying.

Apollo stared at the boy, his mind racing. It was time to try a different tactic. "Machi... How did you know the lyrics had been tied to the murder?"

Emmy looked surprised by the change of subject, but she translated regardless. Machi mumbled a reply, and Emmy passed on, "I read it in the newspaper. They gave me the Borginian Daily Bugle in the detention centre."

Apollo's eyes widened. 'I was right!'

"What!?!" Luke asked at his brother's side, frowning in confusion. He promptly turned around, scanning the area of the gallery where Emmy had previously been sitting.

To his credit, even Klavier seemed suspicious of Machi's assertion, though he made no move to point it out, simply watching the goings-on.

"Machi," Apollo said, staring at the teen, "I've actually seen a copy of yesterday's Borginian Bugle... and, although I couldn't read it myself, I've been told by someone very reliable what the article on this case said." Already Machi was looking uncomfortable, even though Emmy had yet to translate a single word. "It didn't mention the lyrics, Machi."

Emmy paused before translating, then, as she spoke, began to idly dig around in the bag hanging off her belt. With a flourish, right as she finished speaking, she produced a very familiar newspaper, presenting it to the boy with a proud smile. To the Wrights, she explained, "Sorry, forgot I had it. I'm guessing you wanted him to see it."

Luke gave her a grin and a thumbs-up.
Machi was frowning as he took the newspaper, uncurling it and running his eyes over the front page article. After a few moments, he started nervously, pressing the paper to the top of the witness stand as he cried, "O-olin varasa! En tarkota lesanomalehti!"

"What does this mean!?” the judge asked, looking between Machi and the defence in confusion.

"L-lapolisi manitsi sen!" Machi continued. "Se oli miten tesin!"

Emmy was frowning again, looking a little uncomfortable with the teen's frantic cries at her side. "I was mistaken," she translated. "I didn't mean to say the newspaper; The police mentioned it."

Klavier shook his head. "Impossible. The subject of the lyrics was not brought up in police questioning. I read the full report myself."

"Meaning, the only place you could have heard about the lyrics was right here," Apollo pointed out to the teen, staring Machi down, "in this very courtroom, in English."

The judge added to the stern staring. "The witness will explain himself!" he demanded.

Emmy turned to Machi almost apologetically as she translated.

"Kulin... Kulin sen de Lamiroir," Machi said.

"I heard them from Lamiroir."

Apollo's fists were already moving to strike the top of his bench the moment he heard his mother's name on the teen's lips. "Bullcrap!" he cried, just barely keeping his anger in check enough to not shout something stronger. "Machi, I know you didn't do it, really, I trust you, but this is three lies in a row you have just fed us... and you're expecting Lamiroir to come back in here and lie on your behalf!?" Emmy opened her mouth to translate, but Apollo cut her off, pointing at her with a fierce gaze. "Don't translate that!" he ordered, then returned his attention to Machi, watching the teen with the kind of concerned older-brother gaze he usually reserved for Trucy and Luke. "If this is going to work, you have to trust me too, Machi. You can understand English. I know you can."

Machi was hugging himself tightly, staring terrified holes into the newspaper still sitting on the witness stand.

"W-witness, is this true?" the judge asked, looking between Machi and Apollo in amazement. "Do you understand English?"

There was a long pause as the entire courtroom watched the fourteen-year-old at the witness stand. Finally, he replied, "Y-yes. A little, only."

"What!?" the judge cried, jumping in his seat as the gallery murmured in shock.

"First he could see, now he can talk," Klavier muttered to himself across the room, playing with his fringe thoughtfully.

The judge huffed, banging his gavel to silence the audience. "How many secrets is this witness hiding!?"

"Last," Machi replied, fiddling with his sunglasses as he chanced a look at the tall podium. "This is... last."

Emmy looked around uncomfortably, then, rubbing at the back of her mass of dark hair, wandered over to stand near the defence bench, somewhere out of the way. Her job was over, after all.

Apollo sighed, relieved that at least the boy was finally talking. "Machi, will you tell us now what happened?"

"No shooting!" Machi insisted. "I did no shooting!"

"Of course not," Apollo agreed, shaking his head. "You were on stage. But what about after? Where were you during the third act, when Ema and I heard those bangs?"

Machi didn't reply, looking away as he bit his lip.

"Apparently, the answer to that question isn't simple either," Klavier pointed out.

"I was in... dressing room," Machi admitted. "Behind desk. Manager, he on floor... Then, there is voice."

Apollo was too surprised to immediately react.

"W-wait," Luke spoke up, "you mean you in that dressing room? After Mister LeTouse was shot, and just before Ema and Apollo came in?"

Machi nodded. "Panel high up," he continued, miming pulling something off a wall high above him. "I take off. Run away, run away!"

"And you escaped through the air vent," Luke realised, hand to his goatee in thought.

Klavier began to laugh. "As the prosecution has held all along, no less," he pointed out with a smug grin and no small amount of relief. "The defendant has admitted to being at the scene. Might we take this as a confession?"

"Objection!" Apollo shouted, banging on the bench with a glare. "Machi has clearly denied he did it!"

"I no shooting!" Machi added, cowering behind the witness stand. "Manager on floor, already on floor!"

"Besides, the murder was during the second act!" Apollo continued. "He has hundreds of witnesses placing him onstage-!"

"Objection!" Klavier shot back, pointing at the defence. "And yet all you ultimately have to support that is Lamiroir's testimony." He gestured to the Machi. "The defendant understood the song lyrics. He was at the scene of the crime. This can only mean one thing: He is the shooter!"

Machi whimpered as he shied away even further from the witness stand. Apollo just barely kept his mouth shut, a stream of curses sounding inside his mind.

"Does the defendant have anything to say to this?" the judge asked.

Machi did not reply, breathing heavily as he stood, hunched over and staring at the floor.

Apollo was shooting death glares at Klavier. 'Just as we finally get him to open up, Gavin has to clamp down even harder! Can't you give the kid a break!? He's only fourteen!'

With no response from the defendant, the judge turned to the defence. "Mister Wright, will you require any further testimony from the witness?"
Apollo's anger at Klavier faded as he returned his attention to Machi. 'My little brother... The whole world's against him right now... No wonder he's so scared.' "Machi, please, tell us the truth," he begged, trying to be gentle. "About the murder, about everything. Let us help you."

Machi stood in silence for a very long moment. "No," he replied, his voice high in distress. "No more speak. Not... to any of you."

Klavier scoffed. "So much for your precious 'trust', Herr Forehead."

Apollo returned to shooting him death glares.

"Regardless," Klavier continued, "this brings us to an impasse."

The judge nodded. "It does seem that the defence and defendant are at odds," he agreed. "I doubt we are likely to learn anything more of value should this continue. I see no other course but to declare a ten minute recess!" He turned to Apollo. "The defence will work things out with the defendant so that we might proceed," he turned to Klavier, "and the prosecution's witness, Detective Crescend, should be here by now. Prepare him for court, Prosecutor Gavin."

Klavier paused, a serious look on his face. "I'm the last man who needs to be reminded of what his duties are."

"Very well," the judge replied, then banged his gavel. "Court is adjourned!"

The moment the judge had stood from his podium to leave the courtroom, Apollo had raced to Machi's side, gripping the boy's shoulders in a half-hug as he guided the terrified teen out of the room, Luke at their heels. It took them no more than a minute to reach their assigned lobby. Apollo carefully sat Machi down on the sofa, placing himself at his side, and watched the teen breathe slowly, calming down from his fright in the courtroom.

Luke dropped into a crouch on the other side of the table, hugging his laptop close to his chest. "Are you feeling better now, Machi?"

Machi paused a moment or two, then nodded, briefly glancing up to meet Luke's concerned gaze. "I no shooting," he mumbled.

"We know you didn't shoot him," Apollo promised. "But we can't prove it without your help."

There was a short pause. "On the night of the concert," Luke said, "when we were alone on the stage, I asked if you could trust me, and you nodded. I thought you were just being polite, but... you knew what I was asking, didn't you?"

Machi's hands clutched tightly together, the fingers rubbing nervously against each other. "I sorry," he said. "I no trust you... I dream years of meet Professor Hershel Layton, ask for help Lamiroir... and I no trust you... I very sorry."

Luke smiled at him. "It's all forgiven. You'll trust us now, right?"

The teen thought a moment, then looked up at Luke. Forcing a small smile of his own, he nodded.

"Good," Apollo said, sighing in relief. "So, if you were in that room before Ema and I came in... Why? What happened?"

"The bangs," Apollo replied.

"Yes," Machi agreed. "But only sound."

Luke frowned in thought, then placed his laptop on the table, looking to his brother. "Apollo, did you grab your Court Record on our way out?"

Apollo nodded, pulling his tablet computer out of his bag. After a moment to unlock it, he handed it to Luke without a word.

"Thanks," Luke said, taking the tablet and scrolling through the case files. A few moments later, he held it out for Machi to see, on the screen the diagram of the dressing room. He pointed to a space between the hourglass-shaped table and the sofa. "You were here? Facing Mister LeTouse?"
Machi examined the diagram, then nodded.

"Would you say the bangs came from behind you?" Luke asked, gesturing to his back with one hand. "Around here?"

Again, Machi considered the question. Again, he nodded.

Luke gave Apollo a grin. "The firecrackers under the sofa."

Apollo shot his brother a smile, then turned back to the curious Machi. "Then you heard me and Ema outside, and fled through the air vent?"

Machi nodded. "I know, if I opening vent... I can leave stage and back... backstage."

The Wrights shared another glance. "Did Lamiroir tell you?" Apollo asked. "Or Valant? The magician?"

Machi paused, then nodded again. "Magician. Yes."

Apollo idly nodded back, biting his lip in thought. 'He must have been there while Valant was explaining to Mom what to do for the illusion...' He met the boy's eyes, hidden behind the sunglasses. "You're sure you won't testify?"

Machi didn't have to think about that, shaking his head with a fearful look. "No talking," he insisted, "no."

"Then we won't make you," Apollo sighed, looking away. 'Of course. To testify against Crescend, he'd have to admit to smuggling... It's death either way, and he knows that.'

The silence echoed in the room for maybe a minute, Machi sitting and watching the two Wrights while the brothers sat in thought. Luke kept glancing up at Apollo. "What now?" he asked.

Before Apollo could reply, there was a knock at the lobby door, which opened as the trio turned to look. To Apollo's shock, the figure that entered was wearing a grey hoodie and cyan beanie, fixing them with a cheerful grin as he closed the door behind him. "Hiya."

"Dad!" Apollo cried, he and Luke jumping to their feet with surprised smiles and running to meet him halfway. "What are you doing here!?"

"Secret mission is up, for now," Phoenix explained. "I thought I'd drop by. Wish you luck." He chuckled, giving Apollo a warm look. "I think you have it pretty much in hand, though. You'll get Machi over there," he gestured to the teen with a jerk of his head, "off the hook no doubt."

Despite the praise, Apollo couldn't smile. "Yeah, but..."

"But you're after that detective, aren't you?" Phoenix picked up, his own grin fading into a stern frown. "It won't be easy proving he did it. Especially not under the current court system."

"So what do we do?" Luke asked. "We know it will be difficult; All our evidence ties in to Lamiroir and Machi, and Mister Gavin keeps shooting them down!"

Phoenix didn't immediately reply, looking away. "Like I said. Good luck." He met Apollo's eyes. "And be aware that it will be impossible to prove his guilt by conventional methods."

Apollo winced. "Great..."
Chuckling softly, Phoenix took a step backwards. "I guess I'd better go find your sister and our English friends. Cheer you two on from the gallery."

"Please not literally," Apollo reminded him, though he couldn't resist a small smile.

"We'll see you after, then?" Luke asked.

Phoenix nodded, turning to the door. He reached out for the door handle, then stopped, turning back with a thoughtful look. "Every man has an igniter inside him."

Apollo raised an eyebrow, sharing a baffled look with Luke. "What...?"

"Find Daryan Crescend's igniter," Phoenix told Apollo, "and set it off." With that, he turned and left the room, the door swinging cleanly shut behind him.

Luke turned to Apollo. "So, what did he mean by that?"

Apollo sighed. "Aren't you the puzzle solver here, Mister 'I'm the Professor's Apprentice'?" he replied, turning back towards Machi. "What would the great Hershel Layton do in this situation?"

"He'd leave it to the lawyer," Luke admitted, following Apollo back to the sofa. "We dealt in mysteries, not court trials; The one time we did, we just assisted Papa." He paused in thought, looking off into the distance. "Although, the Professor did step in as an Inquisitor, just the once, as part of the ploy to help. I was busy with something else at the time, though."

Apollo stood by the short table, pressing a hand over his eyes. "So in this situation, the Great Hershel Layton would rely on the Great Phoenix Wright... and the Great Phoenix Wright would shrug and wander off to the gallery."

Luke snorted, but hid his giggles at Apollo's resulting glare. "To be fair, I'm sure Papa is only being flippant because he knows you can do it, Apollo."

"Yeah, well," Apollo darkly muttered, lowering himself back onto the sofa at Machi's side. "I just wish you didn't all have an annoying tendency to give pointlessly cryptic advice..."

Although he gave the boy no more than a glance, Apollo noticed Machi hiding a smile; No doubt he was enjoying their conversation... or at least the bits he could understand.

Luke stared at the ceiling, his smile fading as he stroked his goatee in thought. "Maybe... Papa just meant we need to find a way to make Crescend confess?"

Apollo cast a sidelong glance at Machi. "Guess so." Truthfully, he doubted Daryan would willingly go down alone... If he was truly working with Machi on the cocoon smuggling, he'd make sure everyone knew that before letting himself go to jail for murder.

Luke turned his gaze to his brother in concern. "Should we bring up the cocoon smuggling at all? I doubt Mister Gavin's going to."

Apollo didn't need to look to know that Machi was watching him carefully. Even so, he took his time musing on his answer: "I don't know yet. We'll have to see what he says once we're back in there."

There was a very long pause. "How much time do we have?" Luke asked.

Sighing, Apollo grabbed his Court Record off the table to check the time. "We should probably go," he admitted, moving to replace the computer in his bag.
Luke nodded, picking up his laptop. "Right."

Apollo stood, but didn't move to leave just yet. He thought a moment, then turned to Machi, watching the nervous teen as he twiddled his fingers in his lap. "We're almost at the finish line."

Machi looked up, meeting Apollo's eyes.

"You can trust us," Apollo continued, giving him the older-brother smile the young man had long perfected for his other siblings. "We'll sort this out, and I won't let anything bad happen to you. Okay?" He held out a gloved hand for the boy to take.

Machi's gaze flickered between Apollo's face and the outstretched hand for a few moments. Finally, he smiled, giving the lawyer a nod as he took the offered limb in his grip. "Yes. Thank you."

Apollo grinned, pulling the teen to his feet with a chuckle. "No problem. You just hang in there; This'll be over with before you know it."

[View the Court Record]
"Court is now back in session," the judge announced, banging his gavel. He turned to the defence bench. "Mister Wright, have you sorted things out with the defendant?"

Apollo nodded, stood tall behind the bench with Luke at his side. "Yes, Your Honour. We had a good talk."

"Very well," the judge replied. "So will he testify?"

"Your Honour, the defendant," Apollo paused to take a deep breath, still not quite believing what he was admitting, "will not testify."

The judge's eyes widened in surprise. "Wh-what!?"

Klavier scoffed, shaking his head with a smile. "Shame. And here I thought this was your big chance to turn the case around."

Apollo glared back. "Actually, it is," he replied. "Detective Crescend is ready to testify now, isn't he?"

The prosecutor looked away with a grunt. "He is in the witness lounge, ready to be called at any time."

The judge nodded. "Very well." He waved at Klavier, signalling to go ahead.

Klavier snapped his fingers in thought for a few moments. "Might I add," he told the court with a stern frown, "I don't believe any of this. He... Daryan was the first detective I ever worked with. We stopped working together when he moved to Criminal Affairs, Division Three... but his guitar playing?" He smiled, waving a hand. "It fires my imagination!"

"Criminals come from all walks of life and all skill sets," Luke pointed out, giving the man opposite an almost pitying look. "Detective or not, skilled guitarist or not... That bears no relevance in court."

"Oh, I know, Herr Doktor," Klavier replied, his smile fading.

The judge nodded. "Call the final witness to the stand!" he ordered. "Detective Daryan Crescend!"

It didn't take long for the bailiff to return, almost cowering next to the tall, swaggering figure walking at her side. Daryan didn't need an escort to the stand, sauntering up to the small podium and slamming his hands on the top with his nose wrinkled in disgust.

Klavier had his eyes closed, looking away. "Name and occupation, please." His voice sounded far away, the prosecutor barely paying attention to the courtroom around him.

"Daryan Crescend," the man at the witness stand barked. "Detective, Criminal Affairs, Division Three. That's the International Affairs Division, for those of you who didn't know." He straightened up, arms crossed. "And I'm a guitarist for the Gavinners. Maybe you've heard of us?" He shot a grin at the gallery, where a few women squealed in delight.

Apollo rolled his eyes.

"Do you fully understand the circumstances under which you stand before us today?" the judge asked.

Daryan's smile died. "Yeah, I understand, Your Honour. What I don't understand," he turned to glare at the prosecutor's bench, "is how you let this happen, 'partner'."

Klavier did not react, still standing with his eyes closed.

"You gave me your word I wouldn't be standing here," Daryan continued, uncrossing his arms to again lean on the stand.

"The situation's changed, Daryan," Klavier finally replied, then opened his eyes to meet his bandmate's accusing stare. "And don't call me 'partner'."

Daryan scoffed, looking away. "So much for old friends."

Klavier turned away, his expression unchanging.

'Press the prosecution all you like, Crescend, it won't save you from the Wrights.' Apollo looked up to the judge. "Your Honour, if we could begin the trial?"

"Yes, it's high time we did," the judge agreed, turning to Daryan. "Let's hear your testimony. You may begin with your response to Lamiroir's testimony... if, in fact, you have anything to say about it."

"Oh I got plenty to say," Daryan spat. "Lying must be a national pastime in Borginia," he rounded on the defence bench with a grin, "and wherever you two are from, Misters 'Wright'." He laughed at his own joke.

Apollo raised an eyebrow. At his side, Luke just sighed and shook his head.

"The diva's lying, plain and simple," Daryan explained, leaning on the witness stand with a cocky grin. "She's got nothing to back up her story. In the first place, she never heard my voice! She 'forgot the words because she heard gunshots'? He scoffed. "As if! Didn't Detective Skye hear those gunshots during the third set, anyway? The shooting took place when I was on stage, man!"

The judge hummed in thought. "So you claim Lamiroir's testimony was a lie?"

Daryan held up his hands. "Hey, don't get me wrong, I dig what she's doing, trying to protect that kid." He waved a hand, scoffing. "And she's got the court eating vague statements out of her hand just 'cause she's blind."

The judge jumped in his seat, at the same moment as the gallery broke into muttering. "She's what!?"

Klavier glared at his friend. "You go too far, Daryan."

"Lamiroir is blind!?" the judge cried. "Is this true!?"

Daryan waved off the judge's shock and Klavier's disapproval.
Apollo sighed. 'I guess we'd better explain that, now the cat's out of the bag...' He looked up to the judge. "Your Honour, you remember Lamiroir and the defendant's relationship, right? How they would always walk together, hand in hand, at all times?"

The judge nodded. "Yes; Because the defendant was 'blind', wasn't it?"

"Except we now know that to not be true," Apollo continued. "So, we must ask, why the charade?"

"Well," the judge mumbled, "wasn't it part of their, er, performance?"

Apollo shook his head. "There's actually a much simpler explanation. Machi did not need to be led by the hand at all. That can only mean one thing: It was the other way around. The one who needed to be led by the hand was Lamiroir."

The judge still seemed shocked, looking around his desk as though it might provide a clearer explanation. "But... that makes no sense!" He turned to Klavier. "Prosecutor Gavin, please, shed some light on this madness!"

Klavier stood still, eyes closed. "Herr Forehead is quite correct: Lamiroir is blind. As it was not a necessary fact of the case, neither of us saw reason to bring it up before now."

The judge humphed to himself, then suddenly noticed the muttering crowds, and banged his gavel to silence them. "Well. If it is really so unimportant, I suppose we had best move on. Your cross-examination, Mister Wright."

Apollo nodded, then turned his attention to Daryan, who was still standing smugly at the stand. 'You're just so proud of yourself, distracting the judge and casting even more doubt on Lamiroir... Well, you haven't figured on us Wrights.' "You can claim disbelief all you like, but it's been proven without a doubt Lamiroir forgot the words at the start of the second verse."

Daryan just scoffed, unphased. "Oh yeah, there was a mistake. But blaming it on gunshots is just a lame excuse."

"And what's that supposed to mean?"

"Exactly what I said," Daryan laughed. "That video of yours proves, what? There's a mistake in the song? A missed cue? So?" He shrugged, still grinning. "She just flubbed it up, big time. That's all. She spins this story about a gunshot to protect the kid, and cover for her own goof." He laughed again. "Man, I'd have to hand it to her... if she wasn't sticking it to me at the same time."

Klavier shot his friend a glare. "Daryan, watch what you say. Lamiroir is an artist." He waved a hand with an offended air. "She 'just flubbed it up'? That's no small accusation for a performer of her calibre."

Daryan scoffed. "She got to you, alright. I can see it your eyes." He waved the comment off. "I tell you, most of her stuff is so pretentious; It's way over my head."

Apollo's hands tightened into fists, and he resisted the urge to run across the courtroom and punch Daryan out then and there.

"Anyway, she's too close to the defendant," Daryan continued. "Her testimony can't be trusted. You ask me, I'd go with Detective Skye's story at the drop of a pick." He then laughed, turning to Apollo. "Actually, didn't you hear those gunshots too? The hell are you doing trusting Lamiroir over yourself?"
"We heard bangs," Apollo replied, returning the detective's laughter with an even gaze. "We didn't see the shooting."

Daryan's grin only widened. "Heh. I guess you and Lamiroir got the same excuse then."

"We know one thing for certain here," Klavier pointed out, looking between the two sternly. "There were gunshot-like sounds that emanated from that room during the third set. What we must determine is whether those sounds were actually gunshots."

"That is easy," Apollo replied, reaching for his Court Record. A moment later, he found the photo he was looking for, and a swipe of his hand on the screen sent it to the holograms for the court to see. "This is a photo from the scene of the crime, taken only hours after the murder; Specifically, it's underneath the dressing room's sofa."

Klavier minutely sighed, eyes closing. "You speak of what was found there, I presume."

The judge narrowed his eyes, leaning forward to study his screen. "That looks like... What is that?"

"The first is the remote-triggered igniter," Apollo explained. "The other is remains of some kind."

"The remnants carry traces of gunpowder," Klavier added. "We have a report that it was something like a firecracker."

Luke shook his head, looking sympathetic. "And did you understand their purpose when Detective Skye told you about them?"

Klavier didn't reply. "It was as I was looking over the reports again this morning I made my decision... to register Daryan as a witness in today's trial. Just in case."

Daryan's eyes narrowed as he stared at his friend.

"This raises another possibility," Apollo pointed out. "Those gunshot-like sounds during the third act could have been two firecrackers rigged to go off by remote control!"

At that, Daryan just laughed, pointing at Apollo mockingly. "You got an active imagination, don't you? But you shouldn't say every little thing you think." He ran his hands along his pompadour smugly. "Your explanation there seems a bit too convenient to me."

"How so?" Apollo asked, crossing his arms.

Daryan shrugged. "So, you're saying these firecrackers just happened to go off right when two witnesses came walking by?"

"You could say that about the shooting, too," Luke replied. "But, in this case, there's no 'just happened' about it."

Laughing, Daryan waved him off. "And you think I set them off, huh? I was on stage, man! How was I s'posed to know what was going on in the dressing rooms?"

"He may not look it, but Daryan is a gifted detective," Klavier warned the Wrights with a stern gaze. "Show any weakness, and he's sure to find it."

Daryan's grin faded. "'He may not look it', partner?" he repeated. "Gee, thanks, man."

"That reminds me," Klavier continued, "I happened to pass through that very hallway several times that day myself, and I saw something odd there just before the third set."
Apollo and Luke shared a look. "It wouldn't happen to have been one of your concert staff headsets, would it?" Luke asked.

Klavier nodded. "What if that headset wasn't dropped, but placed? And what if it was turned on?"

"It was turned on," Luke replied, turning his attention to Apollo's Court Record. "We have a picture of it on the night, with its LED lit and everything."

"You could use that headset to hear what was going on in that hallway," Apollo picked up. "Even if you were out on stage."

Daryan seemed unsure who exactly to glare at, but settled eventually on Klavier with a scoff. "Whose side are you on, Gavin?"

Klavier returned his gaze with an even stare. "Listen to me, Daryan: There are no sides in a court of law."

The detective did not reply.

"Which is why I now turn to you, Herr Forehead." Klavier ignored Daryan, looking to the Wrights. "I've a question for you: The igniter and the burnt fragments that were found at the scene of the crime... It's certainly a possibility that they were part of a ruse to fake the sound of gunshots. Throw the headset from the hallway into the mix, and you could fabricate an alibi. But." He snapped his fingers, his gaze stern. "We're still no closer to proving anything. Those gunshots might have been real, or fake. We can't say."

Apollo sighed. 'Of course not. Because why should this job ever be easy?'

"You've raised the possibility that the shots heard during the third set were faked," Klavier continued. "Now you need to prove the other half of the case."

Luke had his hand at his chin, stroking his goatee. "You mean, prove that the murder was during the second set."

Klavier nodded. "If you can't prove that, then to continue this cross-examination would be pointless."

The judge hummed in thought. "Well, Mister Wright?" he asked. "Can you prove the crime took place during the second set?"

Apollo couldn't resist a smirk. "Actually, I can prove it." He turned to his brother. "Luke?"

Luke grinned, and turned his attention to his laptop.

"The proof," Apollo announced, "is right here in the song."

He couldn't help but notice Daryan suddenly going pale.

View the Court Record
"Hmm? Are we watching the video again?" the judge asked, eyeing Luke's laptop with excitement in his eyes.

Apollo shook his head. "On the night of the concert, the Coliseum's equipment recorded every person's performance separately; We have here the five tracks from the Guitar's Serenade, as performed the night of the murder."

"Here, let me demonstrate," Luke said, hitting a button on his laptop. The sound of the song began to ring through the crowd, and, one by one, Luke began to mute and unmute the various parts.

The judge laughed, impressed, then paused in confusion. "But what does this prove?"

"According to Lamiroir's testimony," Apollo pointed out as his brother stopped the playback, "at the moment of the shooting, she forgot the words to the song."

Klavier smiled. "Ah. You intend to examine the recording at that moment, ja? We might even hear those gunshots."

Apollo grinned, barely holding back a proud laugh. "Exactly."

Daryan scoffed. "Ridiculous. How are you supposed to hear gunshots back in that dressing room out on stage?"

"Have you forgotten, Daryan?" Klavier replied. "We were all wearing those headsets."

The detective's amusement instantly vanished. "Oh."

"We were all deeply involved in our performance," Klavier continued, "but Lamiroir's headset would've picked up what she heard all the same." He nodded to Luke. "Take it away, Herr Doktor."

Luke nodded back with a smile, and returned his attention to his laptop. The song again began to play, but all the instruments were one by one muted, leaving only Lamiroir's voice, blasting at full volume. "This is rather quiet, so you have to listen closely," Luke warned, then fell silent.

"When you stole away the keys,"
"My heart held on to so tight."

From the laptop, the faintest sound of a bang.

"Pleasure-"

The playback stopped.
The judge gasped. "I did hear something faintly there, yes! Why, it sounded like a gunshot!"

"Wh-what!?" Daryan cried, sweating behind the witness stand. "This has to be some kind of mistake!"

Apollo saw the flicker of a smile on Klavier's lips. "I believe a case has been made," the prosecutor announced. "Gunshots were heard during the second act... which means Lamiroir's testimony was true."

Daryan grunted, looking around the room with wide eyes as the gallery began to mutter loudly.

"Order!" the judge cried, banging his gavel. With the courtroom quiet once more, he turned to Klavier with a curious gaze. "So, she was telling the truth about what she heard?"

"The shooter said 'Press the switch, now'," Apollo recounted. "Just after that, there was a gunshot, the second of two... and then the guitar caught fire."

Klavier was staring into space, his head pointedly turned away from his bandmate. "Detective Crescend... You weren't on stage during the second set. You could have done it."

The judge hummed in thought. "But why did we only hear one gunshot on the recording?" he asked. "Weren't two bullets fired from the weapon?"

"Lamiroir was moving through the air vent, Your Honour," Apollo explained. "She must not have been close enough for her mic to catch the first shot. But then, as she passed over the dressing room," he snapped his fingers, "the gun fired again, and Mister LeTouse's life was taken." He turned to the witness stand, giving the man stood there a stern stare. "Well, Detective Crescend?"

Daryan didn't say a word, stock still as he stared back.

"Ah, once again I am reminded of something."

Apollo looked over to Klavier, confused. At his side, Luke held his chin in thought. "Reminded of what?" the younger brother asked.

"Our performance that day," the prosecutor elaborated, running a hand through his hair. "Herr Doktor's makeshift mixing board jogged my memory. You were there too, Herr Forehead."

At that, Apollo's eyes widened in recognition. "You mean, the missed cue in 'Guilty Love'?"

Klavier nodded, giving his friend at the stand only a glance. "I thought it strange at the time. How could you miss such a simple cue?" He turned to watch Daryan, the other man looking away guiltily, almost hiding behind his pompadour. "I know you. I know how you play. You're better than that."

"Yeah, well, I..." Daryan mumbled, shrugging.

"You what?" the judge asked, looking between the two in confusion. "Prosecutor Gavin, what are you getting at?"

"I'm talking about the murder weapon," Klavier explained, turning his gaze to his desk. "Mister LeTouse's forty-five-calibre hand cannon. As we have learned, even the shooter doesn't go unscarred with a revolver that size. The kickback is enough to dislocate your shoulder, if you're an amateur."

Daryan scoffed. "You're forgetting something, there: I'm a trained police officer. I've had firearms training. Plenty of it." He waved his hand with a proud grin. "I'm no amateur."
"The standard sidearm issued to police officers is a thirty-eight-calibre weapon. A much tamer beast," Klavier replied, still avoiding anyone's eyes. "Also, the murder weapon belonged to the victim, Mister LeTouse... which suggests there was a struggle between killer and victim."

"So the killer might not have been holding the revolver correctly when he fired!" the judge realised with a smile. "Is that what you mean?"

Klavier stood in silence for a moment or two before nodding. "The thought had occurred to me, yes."

The judge thought for a few seconds, then turned to Daryan. "Well, does the witness have anything to say to this?"

Daryan didn't respond, crossing his arms as he looked over at the defence bench.

Apollo raised an eyebrow, looking right back at the man. 'What now?'

"Detective Crescend!" the judge called with a stern glare.

Daryan didn't react to the judge's anger, gesturing to the defence bench. "What I want to ask is what Mister Flappy-cape-and-ready-to-dazzle has to say." He turned to the Wrights, snapping his fingers. "Hey, you. Supposed 'attorney'."

Apollo glared. "I do have a badge."

"Whatever," Daryan mumbled, waving him off. "Exactly which piece of your evidence is decisive, again? You got a little noise on a tape that could be anything, and you have an alleged guitar cue miss due to a forty-five-calibre kickback." He looked over to Klavier with a small smile. "I weep for this case, Gavin, I really do."

Klavier didn't reply.

"You can line up your little weak pieces of evidence all you want," Daryan continued with a grin, not seeming to mind his bandmate's continued silence. "I didn't shoot that manager. And that's the obvious truth."

The judge hummed in thought. "The witness has a point. The defence's arguments, while persuasive, are not decisive."

Daryan held his arms out wide, as though waiting for applause. Apollo held back a groan, looking over to his brother: Luke was stroking at his goatee, staring hard at his laptop.

"I believe we should hear what the witness has to say in response to the case so far," the judge continued, then nodded to Daryan. "Your testimony please, Detective Crescend. Tell us your reasons why you couldn't have done it."

At that, Daryan scoffed, leaning casually on the witness stand. "C'mon! Why would I even want to kill that manager?" He paused to laugh. "You want a reason? Easy: I got no motive, man! This was that diva's first trip to this country, right? How could I possibly know her manager?" He waved a hand as though to announce 'voila', and slapped it on the stand. "If I didn't know him, why would I want to kill him?"

The judge humphed. "A simple reason indeed," he agreed, then turned to Klavier. "Prosecutor Gavin, is it the case that Mister LeTouse had not been to America before?"
Klavier sighed. "According to our records... yes. Not even once."

The judge's eyebrows shot up in surprise. "I see. Very well!" He turned to the defence bench, quickly moving on. "Mister Wright, you may begin the cross-examination."

Apollo nodded, paused in thought, then turned to Luke. "I guess we're bringing up the cocoon smuggling after all," he whispered.

Luke smiled sympathetically. "We can still save Machi," he assured his brother. " Couldn't Crescend have still met Mister LeTouse before the concert?"

"That's a good point," Apollo replied. 'Actually, isn't he...?' He looked to the witness stand. "Detective Crescend, aren't you with International Affairs?"

"Yeah?" Daryan answered, running his hands along his pompadour nonchalantly. "What of it?"

Apollo smiled. "Even if this was Mister LeTouse's first trip to this country, you could still have met him prior to the concert!" He felt his confidence grow when Daryan's only response was a look of confusion. "Or don't you take any international trips in International Affairs?"

"That's right!" the judge agreed. "Well, Detective Crescend?"

Daryan's surprise turned into a cocky grin, and he chuckled at the Wrights.

Suddenly Apollo's confidence drained.

"That's your game, is it?" Daryan asked. "Guess I'd better confess, then."

"Confess?" the judge repeated. He sounded as confused as Apollo felt.

"Yeah." Daryan shrugged, still grinning widely. "It's a bit of an embarrassment, but I've never been sent overseas."

Apollo stared in disbelief. "What!? But you're in International-!"

"See, me and planes got a difference of opinion," Daryan interrupted, hands in his pockets. "We don't like each other much."

Klavier nodded. "My condolences, Herr Forehead, but he's telling the truth. He's never set foot outside the country. I can guarantee it."

Apollo stared across at the prosecutor. It struck him how drained Klavier looked, how subdued he had been since they'd come back from recess. 'Does he know Crescend is the killer? Was... Was Luke right about him all along?'

"As it turns out," Daryan continued with a proud air, "my division has plenty of work to do locally as well."

Apollo chanced another worried look at Klavier, but the prosecutor was looking away, his eyes closed once more. 'Better to just get this over with.' Straightening his posture, the young magician held a hand up high. "Your Honour," he called, "take a look at this." With a twirl of his fingers, the tiny cocoon replica seemingly materialised in his grip, for all the court to see.

Daryan's grin froze.

The judge peered down at Apollo's hand. "That looks familiar... What is it?"
"Mister LeTouse's replica, from yesterday," Klavier realised, shooting Apollo a stern frown. "I was wondering when it would turn up."

"Oh, yes, his investigation," the judge recalled. "Did we ever learn what it was?"

Luke was grinning at Apollo's side. "Guess Mister Gavin managed to identify it on his own, then," he whispered.

Shooting his brother a quick smile, Apollo moved to add to the explanation: "Borginian cocoons such as this can make a powerful curative, a one-of-a-kind medicine for a disease thought incurable."

"Really?" the judge asked, amazed.

"However, it is illegal to take one of these healing cocoons out of Borginia," Klavier picked up. "We looked into the matter at some length: Apparently, it isn't difficult at all to manufacture the remedy from the cocoon... Yet, if you change the process only slightly, you can easily make a large quantity of something else entirely." He slammed a fist against the wall at his back with a hard glare. "A deadly poison, in fact."

Apollo gasped (as did most of the courtroom), sharing a look with Luke. 'So that's why...!'"There was an incident, several years ago," Klavier continued, "where some of these got out onto the black market. It caused quite the commotion in the global community, though the media was kept largely unaware."

The judge mused a moment, his shock fading. "Intriguing!"

Klavier didn't respond to the comment. "All this has led to a strict ban on the cocoons’ export, one rigidly enforced... by Interpol, among others."

Apollo almost gasped as he felt sudden connections forming in his mind, and he rounded on Daryan, brandishing the cocoon replica in one hand while he banged his desk with the other. "Detective Crescend! You insist on referring to Mister LeTouse as a 'manager', but that is misleading! Romein LeTouse wasn't killed as a manager; He was killed as an undercover agent, working for Interpol!"

Daryan stared Apollo down as the gallery muttered above them. "So I was trying to smuggle this gum-ball into the country?" he asked. "That's what you're trying to say?"

Apollo decided not to give a direct answer. "I'm saying that could well be a motive for murder."

The stare continued for a few more moments before Daryan smiled. "Oh, so I was going to sell it on the black market, make myself a pretty penny?" He scoffed, shaking his head. "Ridiculous. I mean, totally unthinkable."

"And why exactly is that so 'unthinkable'?" Luke asked.

"Perhaps it's time for another testimony, about this 'smuggling of cocoons' business," the judge suggested, tapping his gavel.
"International Affairs got a memo about these cocoons," Daryan explained, lounging casually at the witness stand. "Interpol's all hot and bothered about 'em. Can't sell 'em on the black market; Too dangerous." He chuckled. "Yeah, cocoon smuggling ain't exactly lucrative anymore." The chuckle turned into a laugh. "Man, I'm in International Affairs! I know the deal!"

The judge tapped his gavel in his hand, thinking. "Indeed. Interpol wanted these cocoons bad enough to send Mister LeTouse undercover."

Daryan shot a smirk at the Wrights. "You kids think up the craziest things... No way am I going to risk life and limb just to get my hands on some dirty cocoon money."

"Not the most noble of statements," the judge muttered, "but duly noted."

"According to reports," Klavier added, "these cocoons top Interpol's list. Selling them to an underground organisation would be risky."

The judge hummed in thought, then waved to the defence bench. "You may begin the cross-examination."

Apollo didn't say anything immediately, pressing a finger to his forehead as he ran over Daryan's testimony in his mind. "It's... 'too dangerous'?"

"Yeah," Daryan laughed. "Interpol finds you, they arrest you on the spot. Or another marketeer might think you're part of a sting and take you out himself." He shoved his hands in his pockets, smiling almost nostalgically. "Times have changed..."

"Why not choose a less dangerous buyer then?" Apollo asked, looking up. "I would."

Daryan snorted. "How clueless are you? Everyone in the market's dangerous! The second they found out I was a cop, I could kiss my keester goodbye."

Apollo felt a smile growing on his lips as he turned to Luke. Luke smiled back, already digging around in his satchel at the silent signal. "Why sell to a black market buyer?" Apollo asked, looking back to Daryan, arms crossed. "How about someone," he paused, giving Luke time to hold out the morning's paper, "like the Chief Justice?"

Daryan did not react, grin frozen on his face.

"A deadly poison can be extracted from the cocoon," Apollo continued, "but so can a cure... A cure for Incuritis!"

"I-incuritis!?" the judge repeated, shocked. "Th-that's what the Chief Justice's son has! You aren't saying...?"

"Our witness is a detective," Apollo pointed out, taking the newspaper from his brother to gesture with it at the witness stand. "He would have contact with the Chief Justice."

"You are saying!" the judge cried, then frowned at the young man. "The Chief Justice would never deal in contraband!"

Apollo looked up at the judge's podium. "Not even to save his own son's life?"

The judge couldn't respond to that, looking around uncomfortably before sighing in sad acceptance. "But, even if the deal went through," he pointed out, "why, it's be an international scandal!"

"That's Detective Crescend's insurance!" Apollo cried, louder than he intended in his excitement at the realisation. "If word ever got out, the one with his neck on the line would be the Chief Justice!"

Daryan was staring off to one side, arms crossed and a dark look on his face. He didn't speak.

"Detective Crescend, is this true?" the judge demanded.

"First I'm a murderer, now I'm a smuggler?" Daryan quietly replied, then looked back to the Wrights with a grin. "How many crimes are you trying to pin on me, anyway?"

The judge shook his head, frowning. "Distasteful as it is to think about, if the Chief Justice were the buyer..." He sighed. "Why, a seller couldn't hope for a better deal." He shot a glare at nothing in particular. "A very cowardly seller!"

"Don't let Flappy over there trick you," Daryan replied, jerking his head towards Apollo before turning to the young lawyer himself. "So I made a deal with the Chief Justice? Where's your proof?"

Apollo didn't have the time to complain about the nickname; Although he hated to admit it, he knew full well they had no evidence of any kind of deal. "W-well..."

"Oh yeah, and you're forgetting one other important thing," Daryan added.

'What now!?'
"Do tell."

"Interpol isn't the only one out there watching this," Daryan pointed out with a grin. "Borginian Customs is very thorough. Everything and everyone gets checked, in and out." He snorted. "They barely sleep, they're so worried about cocoons getting out!"

Luke hummed in thought, his arms crossed. "Like Mister Sycamore and Emmy said; The Bostonius was grounded for hours and searched thoroughly before customs let them go."

"Cocoon possession will get you arrested on the spot," Daryan continued, "and then sentenced to death." He laughed. "Hey, man, if there's a way to get cocoons out of there, I'd sure like to know."

Apollo pressed a finger to his forehead, running over the entire case in his mind. There had to be a way to get a cocoon out of Borginia, where customs couldn't find it... And, if Daryan had in fact never been to Borginia himself, it had to be a reliable method he could trust someone else to pull off. And hadn't they not yet figured out why Klavier's keys were stolen, or his guitar burnt to a...?

Klavier's guitar. That was it.

"Actually," Apollo said, looking up with a smile, "there is one way."

Daryan went pale. "Wha-?"

"One way to get something out of the country, no checks." He pointed across the room. "You become a prosecutor."

"A prosecutor!??" the judge repeated, sputtering in shock.

Klavier's eyes slowly widened as he registered the finger pointing in his direction. "I... I don't believe it..."

Apollo couldn't help but feel another twinge of sympathy for the man. "Believe it, Prosecutor Gavin. What was it you told me yesterday in your office? Your guitar couldn't travel by plane, or the wood would be ruined."

The prosecutor's gaze turned downwards. "Yes, exactly. I used a special shipping service normally used for transporting evidence."

"And it was delivered to your office 'pristine and untouched', correct?" Apollo asked.

Klavier nodded, sighing. "Quite. It was wrapped in several sheets and vacuum packed in Borginia. The pack was untouched until the day of the concert." He looked up, meeting Apollo's eyes with a tired gaze. "Are you saying the guitar was...?"

Apollo nodded, fighting off his growing pity for the prosecutor. He held up the cocoon replica, addressing the court just as much as Klavier. "With cocoons this small, it would've been very easy to use your guitar as a mule to smuggle a cocoon out of Borginia!"

"Wh-what!?" the judge cried, still shocked.

"Which reminds me, Prosecutor Gavin," Apollo continued, placing the replica down on his bench, "that guitar had some 'work' done on it recently, right?"

At that, Klavier managed to force a small smile. "Good memory, Herr Forehead. I had it investigated after the concert; That was where we found this." He held up a small evidence bag, containing the item that had nearly set fire to the judge earlier that day.

The judge tugged at his beard protectively. "Ah, the igniter. Let's leave it in its bag, shall we?"

"Consider this, if you will," Apollo called to Klavier. "What if that igniter wasn't the only thing that was attached inside your guitar?"

Klavier's smile died again. "You mean a cocoon."

The gallery began to mumble.

"There was a way to get a cocoon out of the country!" Apollo announced to the court at large. "They could use Prosecutor Gavin's privileged guitar as a mule!"

The mumbling grew louder. Daryan was frozen at the stand, sweat forming on his brow.

"And who better to do that than someone with access," Apollo continued, "like a member of the band!"

Daryan jerked back with a strangled cry. The gallery erupted into excited chatter.

"Order! Order!" the judge cried, banging his gavel. "Order!" With the courtroom finally calm again, he looked between the opposing benches. "So the igniter...?"

"Was placed in there for a clear reason, it seems," Klavier sighed.
Apollo nodded. "It was a safety precaution."

The judge raised an eyebrow. "A precaution?"

Klavier shook his head, smiling despite the air of fatigue still hanging off his every motion. "Ah, Herr Forehead... At last, it all comes together."

"Every strange thing that happened that day," Apollo agreed. "Care to review?" He looked to Luke with a grin. "Maestro, the gentle sounds of Lamiroir's ballad, if you please."

Luke hid a giggle, and fiddled with his laptop. A moment later, the Guitar's Serenade was echoing around them, the video playing through again on the holographic screens above them.

Klavier snapped his fingers, a business-like frown on his face. "First, my keys were stolen - A harmless misdemeanour - which forced me to break the lock on my guitar case."

"The key was stolen to retrieve the cocoon from the guitar," Apollo added. "But, things didn't go so well: The smuggler wasn't counting on the guitar being wrapped! Only a member of the band could get near that case; Unwrapping the guitar would raise too many suspicions." He shot the nervous man at the witness stand a look. "Then the concert began." He gestured to the screens, which had reached the beginning of the second verse; Lamiroir's missing word. "Right about this time, a very large problem presented itself to the smuggler."

"What's that?" the judge asked.

"Mister LeTouse."

The judge cried in shock.

"Mister LeTouse, an undercover agent, was on to something," Klavier picked up. "He would have known about the guitar; He'd only have to check the shipping records." He shook his head. "So, Mister LeTouse tried to examine the guitar himself."

"If the cocoon were confiscated then, the gig would be up," Apollo continued, the screens above them showing the gentle flight of Lamiroir's star-patterned cloak across the concert hall, Klavier's burning guitar in the background. "The only thing left for the smuggler was to get rid of the whole lot." He snapped his fingers, putting on a brief impression of Daryan: "It's over. Press the switch, now!" He pointed to the screens again. "The guitar burst into flames, and the cocoon was lost. And then, Mister LeTouse died."

On the holograms, Lamiroir had reappeared, her cloak landing perfectly on her head. "With Lamiroir there to witness it," Klavier added.

Apollo nodded. "There's your case."

As the song faded out above them, the courtroom fell into a long silence, punctuated only by the buzz of the holograms as they shut down, the signal of the video having ended. The quiet was almost long enough to start feeling awkward, Apollo wondering if he should speak up and ask for the judge's opinion or not.

Finally, there was a snort from the witness stand, and everyone looked over to see Daryan slowly fall into semi-hysterical laughter. Despite his grin, Apollo could still see the nervous twitching in the detective's eyes, betraying his fear. "Brilliant, man!"

"Detective Crescendo...?" the judge asked, giving the detective a curious look.
"I gotta know," Daryan continued, "you make all that up on the fly?"

Klavier watched his friend with a stern look. "For a made-up story, it makes a great deal of sense, Daryan."

Daryan scoffed, gaining confidence. "The Republic of Borginia? Sorry, man, but I haven't even been there."

"True, you haven't," Klavier admitted.

"Hah!" Daryan barked at Apollo, his cocky grin returning to his face. "Let's see you make up a story for that, kid! How'd I hide the cocoon in the first place, huh?"

Apollo almost smirked, but his concern for his youngest brother, whose terrified face had flicked across his mind, kept his gaze stern. "It's not so hard to imagine," he explained. "You had help. A Borginian accomplice." He closed his eyes. "That's all."

Daryan did not respond to that.

"That you had an accomplice was clear from the start," Apollo continued, looking up at Daryan's frozen grin with a fierce glare. "The voice Lamiroir heard, 'press the switch'? You made that transmission from backstage."

"While your co-conspirator was onstage," Klavier added, watching Apollo carefully.

The judge looked between the two attorneys with an excited air. "But... But who was it?"

Apollo closed his eyes, taking a deep breath. 'I can't believe I'm doing this, but... Don't you worry, Machi, I'll keep you safe.' Opening his eyes again, he turned his gaze up to the judge. "There is only one person who meets all the requirements of the accomplice... and that person... is the defendant. Machi Tobaye."

View the Court Record
The judge stared down at Apollo in disbelief. "But... Mister Wright... He's your client!"

Daryan scoffed, though his grin didn't seem as cocky anymore. "A defence attorney accusing his client? That's a new one!"

Apollo sighed, not bothering to hide his own displeasure. "I assure you, no-one is more unhappy about this than I. But," he pointed out at the court with a glare, "I am here to defend him in the murder of Mister LeTouse, and I stand by my statement earlier that he is innocent of that particular crime."

"Indeed," the judge muttered, thinking. "The defendant is Borginian; He does meet the basic requirements to be the accomplice... But, what if it was, in fact, Lamiroir?"

Apollo shook his head. "It couldn't've been."

The judge blinked in surprise. "Well, you seem sure of yourself."

"The reason," Apollo sighed, "is electronic signals, Your Honour." He picked up the trigger still sitting on the bench, holding it up for all to see. "This remote only works to a range of thirty feet. Beyond that, it's useless."

"Yes, I recall that being mentioned," the judge mused.

Apollo placed the trigger back on the bench, fiddling with his Court Record to bring up the side-view diagram again. "When the shooter made his transmission, Lamiroir was in the air vent," he explained, "right above the dressing room where the shooter stood." He highlighted a circle, the ten metre range of the remote according to the diagram's scale, and centred it above the dressing room. "This is the area that the remote could reach from the air vent."

The judge examined the diagram, no doubt noticing the circle still included the stage. "Well, looking at this, it seems that Lamiroir still could have done the deed."

Apollo shook his head. "No. When the shooter made that transmission, the stage was slightly different than shown here; It was in the middle of the Guitar's Serenade. Part of the stage was raised." As the judge gasped, Apollo tapped to add a five-metre platform to the stage, its top well out of range of the trigger. "Prosecutor Gavin and the Lamiroir stand-in were in the air, on a tower which happens to be fifteen feet tall! In other words, the remote couldn't have worked from Lamiroir's position in the air vent!"

Daryan was sweating again, his grin melting off his face.

"Well, Detective Crescend?" Apollo asked, turning to the man with a stern look. "What do you say to that?"

In the resulting silence, Daryan stood motionless, his nervousness fading. "Your Honour."
"Y-yes, Detective?"

"Could we see the video where Gavin's guitar burns?" Daryan asked, looking thoughtful. "Just one more time?"

The judge seemed confused at the request, but shrugged. "Well, I don't see why not." He gestured to the defence bench.

Luke obediently moved to his laptop, but paused with his hand on the touchpad, thinking. "You just want to hear Machi's playing, don't you."

Daryan gave the vet an even stare. "Is that a crime?"

At that, Luke smiled, and began to fiddle with the computer. "I'll just play his piano track then, save us all some time... Though I should warn you, you won't get what you're looking for from this."

Daryan just glared.

A moment later, as promised, the sound of a piano began to echo around the room, the gentle tune of Machi's part of the Guitar's Serenade. By now, Apollo had watched the video so many times he could see and hear the rest of the song in his mind's eye: The rising platform, Lamiroir's 'disappearance', Klavier's guitar catching fire, the floating cloak over the audience...

The song paused, Luke still smiling. "We've passed the point where the guitar began to burn," he explained. "That's all we need to hear."

Daryan began to laugh, pointing at Apollo. "Too bad, so sad, punk!"

"'Punk'...?" Apollo repeated, an eyebrow raised. 'I guess it's better than 'Flappy', though.'

The judge was looking equally confused, but for a different reason. "What exactly were we supposed to be listening for?" he asked. "If that is indeed what we were meant to be doing."

Klavier nodded, frowning at nothing in particular. "It was, Herr Judge."

"The punk says I ordered the wee pianist to set off that igniter, right?" Daryan explained with a grin. "In order to do that, he'd have to press a switch, wouldn't he?"

"What he's trying to say," Luke picked up, smiling calmly, "is that the piano didn't stop playing at any point in the song."

Apollo felt a spike of fear in his chest as he realised what Daryan's point meant for their case... but seeing his brother's confidence was enough of a boost that he found he didn't lose much to worry; In this case, he'd leave the 'music' argument to the musicians.

"Exactly!" Daryan crowed. "How's he s'posed to hit that switch if he's playing? You've got Ms Diva, the guitar, the bass, the piano, and the drums... the only one with her hands free was the diva!"

'Stop calling her that!' Apollo barely kept from growling.

"But, according to you," Daryan continued, grinning at Apollo, "she couldn't have been the accomplice, could she? Your accomplice would have had a hard time helping out if they couldn't even press a switch!"

Daryan scoffed, waving the comment off. "Your story is full of holes," he insisted. "I'd like to see you explain this one."

"No, Herr Doktor has a point," Klavier said, watching Luke curiously. "That piano track sounded... strange."

"Machi could very well have still pressed that switch and continued playing," Luke pointed out. "Or have you forgotten, Detective, that a piano is perfectly capable of being played with only a single hand on the keys?"

Daryan's grin suddenly became very forced.

Luke fiddled with his laptop a moment, then hit the spacebar, a section of the piano track echoing around them. "This is the second verse, the part when the guitar caught fire and the switch would have been pressed."

As the music was left to play, Apollo paid close attention, trying to find what about the track supported their case: It was much easier to listen to than Phoenix's attempts at music (though that wasn't hard), but he couldn't think of anything else remarkable to comment on. It was, simply, a piano. There was nothing more to it.

The music stopped, and Apollo noticed Klavier frowning intently in thought. "So you are saying, Herr Doktor, that Machi could have played that part one-handed?"

Apollo blinked. 'It was 'simply' a piano...? Yeah, it... it sounded kinda 'simple', didn't it?'

Daryan barked in laughter. "Aren't you a violinist?" he asked Luke with a smirk. "What do you know about pianos?"

Luke only smiled back. "Any musician worth their salt knows how a song is constructed, Detective," he replied, promptly ignoring how Daryan's eyes widened in rage at the jibe to add, "This song places the piano in the background, so it should play mostly the same throughout the piece," he turned to Klavier, "correct, Mister Gavin?"

Klavier nodded. "Indeed. I had Machi play specifically so that the piano would not draw attention to itself."

"So, outside of any modulation," Luke continued, "the verses of the song should all sound identical when listening only to the piano." He again moved to fiddle with his computer. "So, for comparison's sake, let's listen to the first verse, shall we?"

Once more, the lilting melodies of the piano echoed around the room. Although Apollo still had no idea what Luke was talking about, he still tried to pay attention to the notes, to how Machi had been playing on that fateful night. If anything, he had to say the two different sections of the track sounded the same... though something about them was definitely different. This one... seemed more complicated. Had there been those low notes in verse two?

Luke stopped the music, still smiling. "I'd say verse one was definitely two-handed; It used the entire range of the keyboard. But did it sound identical to verse two?" He left the resounding 'no' of his answer unsaid.

The gallery muttered to itself, quietened only by a bang of the gavel. "They... 'feel' the same," the judge admitted, "but they're clearly very different!"

Daryan was sputtering at the witness stand, searching for words. "B-but... I... Wh-what's that?
prove!?” he demanded, hands pressed on the small podium as he leaned over it, glaring at Luke. "So the two verses had different arrangements! Happens all the time!"

Klavier shook his head. "Not this time, Daryan. There's no point in changing an arrangement if you can't hear it clearly... and that wasn't the point."

"I think the fact we had to work so hard to prove there was a difference is enough evidence that this was not for the benefit of the listener," Luke picked up. "Machi played right-handed during verse two, for the lone reason of having a hand free to press the remote trigger... and set Prosecutor Gavin’s guitar alight."

Daryan choked an incomprehensible reply, jerking away from the witness stand as though it had burned him. Above, the gallery had burst into loud chatter, excited to see Luke's point landing. Apollo wondered how many of them were as lost as him in the middle of all the 'music' talk.

"Order! Order!" the judge cried, banging his gavel. "Order!" Finally, the gallery was silenced, and he turned to the prosecutor's bench. "I believe this ties all the facts together. Prosecutor Gavin?"

"Yes, quite," Klavier agreed, though he was frowning deeply. "Though, personally... this comes as a terrible disappointment."

"Very well," the judge replied. "Barring an objection from the prosecution, I will now state the court's opinion on this matter."

Apollo let out a relieved sigh. It seemed they'd finally reached the end...

... but then Daryan began to laugh.

Apollo stared in disbelief. 'You mean it's not over!? Wasn't what Luke said enough!?'

Daryan looked up from where he was leaning heavily on the witness stand, sarcastically clapping. "Good show, Flappy, Paperboy! No, great show!"

At Apollo’s side, Luke shot the detective a glare. "What's wrong now?" he demanded.

"You tell ’em, Gavin," Daryan panted, still grinning widely. "Tell ’em what's so disappointing!"

Klavier was stood tall behind the prosecutor's bench, eyes closed. "Personally, I'm terribly disappointed," he repeated, then opened his eyes to meet Apollo's confused gaze, "in you, Herr Forehead."

"M-me!?" Apollo cried.

Klavier nodded. "Don't get me wrong: Your case is solid, the facts all check out... but, even now, you have yet to show us a single piece of decisive evidence."

To his shame, Apollo had to admit that was true. "B-but the facts!" he sputtered, gesturing to Luke's laptop in front of them. "Anyone can see it was him!"

"Unfortunately, 'anyone' does not include the law," the judge pitched in, looking stern. "I'm afraid your case doesn't cut it."

"But that's not fair!" Luke cried, leaning forward on the defence bench with an expression bordering on panic. "We proved the gunshots were during the second act, didn't we!?"

"That is no proof it was the detective who pulled the trigger," the judge pointed out. "A thousand facts might point to the same conclusion, but without decisive evidence, it's not proof. That's the rule of our current legal system."

Luke whimpered as he withdrew. Apollo patted his shoulder to offer comfort. It was becoming resoundingly clear there was nothing more they could do.

View the Court Record
"It does not seem as though the defence has any more evidence to present," the judge announced.

Daryan smirked. "Oh, I think if they did, we already would have seen it a long ways back."

"It is unfortunate," the judge continued, giving the Wrights a sympathetic look, "but, at present, this court is unable to acknowledge your accusation."

Luke didn't respond, apparently fighting tears as they faced what could very well be their first loss. In a bizarre way, seeing Luke so cut up about it only made Apollo feel all the calmer, standing strong for the both of them as he ran over the case once more in his mind. There had to be something they could do... but what? For some reason, Phoenix's words came back to him in a rush:

"Every man has an igniter inside him. Find Daryan Crescend's igniter, and set it off."

Luke had reasoned earlier that the piece of cryptic advice just meant a way to make Crescend confess... but maybe what Phoenix had meant was to find Crescend's weak spot, something that a single spark could ignite into a wildfire of emotion. 'Impossible to prove by conventional methods, huh? Well then, guess I'd better find some unconventional methods, and quick...'

"So, can I get back to work now, or what?" Daryan asked, leaning on the witness stand with a cocky grin. "It may look like I got a lot of time on my hands, but I got no more time to play pretend with this dead-weight attorney and his friend."

The judge hummed in thought. "Well, Mister Wright? We've come this far without decisive evidence... This witness won't be coming back to the stand once we let him go."

Luke looked up to his brother, eyes shining. "Apollo...?"

Apollo stood only a moment more in thought. "Every man has an igniter." Feeling the confused gazes of the court boring into him from all sides, he met Klavier's eyes with a fierce stare. "Didn't you say the best guitars burn the brightest, Prosecutor Gavin?"

"Ah, yes," Klavier agreed, nodding, though he still looked baffled by the question. "Good guitars are kept dry, is why. That provides the best sound."

"It's the same with violins," Luke quietly added, discreetly wiping away his tears. "With most wooden instruments, I imagine."

"So even a small spark could cause irreparable damage," Apollo reasoned, then turned to Daryan, a small smile forming on his lips. "Your plan has an 'igniter' in it too, Detective. It was there from the very beginning."

Daryan raised an eyebrow, unimpressed. "What, and this igniter's supposed to come 'burn' me up?" He snorted, smirking. "That's almost poetic there, Mister Attorney."
"All the better," Klavier said, watching with a smile of his own. "I'm rather fond of poetry... and I intend to hear this one through to the very end."

At that, Daryan's smirk died, shooting his friend a wide-eyed glare.

"Herr Forehead," Klavier continued with a stern look at Apollo. "You are accusing this man, Daryan Crescend, of two crimes: The murder of Mister LeTouse, and the smuggling of a Borginian Cocoon." He snapped his fingers. "This is your last chance to prove your case."

The judge nodded in agreement. "This trial has already run on for far too long." He turned to the defence bench. "Mister Wright, this will be my last warning. The moment this 'igniter' of yours turns out to be a dud is the moment this cross-examination ends. Understood?"

Apollo gulped down his nervousness and nodded. "Yes, Your Honour."

The judge stared back a moment, then gestured to the court at large. "Then, let's have it."

'I can't believe I'm about to do this after what I promised Machi, but...' Apollo took a deep breath, then stood tall, turning his gaze to Daryan. "Your 'igniter' isn't a piece of evidence."

Daryan blinked in surprise. "Huh? So what is-?"

"It is true that I couldn't show decisive evidence," Apollo continued. "Perhaps what I needed to prove my case all along was something else."

Klavier's eyes narrowed. "You mean a witness."

Apollo smiled, looking back at the prosecutor. "Proving his guilt is a tall order... but I've got just the person to do it."

The judge nodded. "Very well, Mister Wright. Who is this person who can prove Daryan Crescend's guilt?"

Again, Apollo paused, pulling himself out of his own disbelief at his actions. 'This is the only way. It's the best outcome for everyone.' "The person who can prove Daryan Crescend's guilt... is the defendant. Machi Tobaye."

"Y-your client?" the judge cried. "Again!?"

Luke frowned, watching his brother curiously.

"Machi Tobaye was an accomplice to the cocoon smuggling plot," Apollo explained. "Without him, Daryan Crescend could not have gotten the cocoon. Furthermore," he pointed dramatically, "he can easily prove that the one who plotted to smuggle that cocoon is the real criminal in this case!"

"How so?" the judge asked, tugging at his beard in thought.

"It would require just one of the very cocoons Mister LeTouse was looking for," Apollo replied, hoping this didn't sound as made-up-on-the-spot as it was. 'We Wrights have always thought best on our feet, after all.' "With the co-operation of the Republic of Borginia, we could burn a cocoon. The burnt cocoon would leave a particular residue, a residue we would, no doubt, also find inside the burnt guitar!"

The judge smiled, impressed. "Aha! Very scientific of you."

"Thus, if Machi Tobaye acknowledges his agreement with Daryan Crescend concerning the attempted smuggling of a Borginian Cocoon," Apollo announced with a proud smile, "the case is solved!"

The resulting silence was broken by a quiet snort from the witness stand, followed by loud laughter. "Your unrelenting passion is... remarkable," Daryan said, leaning an arm on the small podium while his other hand wiped away false tears. "You really want to get me, don't you?" He bit back another laugh. "Too bad you'll never be able to."

Apollo's smile did not fade. "Why not?"

"The little key-tickler won't acknowledge anything!" Daryan replied. "Especially not anything to do with cocoon smuggling!"

"He has a point," Luke whispered at Apollo's side, looking worried.

The judge frowned. "What's this all about?"

"Taking a cocoon out of the country means death by Borginian law," Klavier explained.

"Yeah!" Daryan laughed. "See? If our pianist really was a smuggler, then testifying about it would be suicide!" He shook his head, still chuckling. "Believe me, he's not tal-"

"You're wrong, Detective Crescend."

Daryan paused, meeting Apollo's fierce gaze with a confused look. "What?"

Apollo stood unmoved, still smiling confidently. "It's the other way around: If Machi doesn't admit to smuggling here... he's in deep trouble." He spoke slowly, hoping Machi was listening in the waiting room; He wanted to be understood by even the teen's basic knowledge of English.

Daryan's grin had finally faded. "H-how?"

"If Machi admits to smuggling here," Apollo explained, "then he'll be tried in our courts, by our laws; You don't get the death penalty for smuggling in California."

"Ah," Daryan muttered, going pale.

"The victim in this case was an undercover Interpol agent," Apollo continued. "I'm sure that news has long reached Borginia."

"And they'll likely broadcast our dealings in court today," Klavier added. "Including the part about the Borginian Cocoon."

Daryan was starting to sweat. "Yeah, but... but..."

Apollo's smile only grew wider. "If Machi doesn't admit to smuggling now, he'll eventually be picked up by the Borginian police... and it's not like he's in any danger in our court; We're not going to find him guilty of murder here, not now."

"Yeah," Daryan reluctantly admitted, "but... you can't do this!" He glared at Apollo, his knuckles white where he was gripping the witness stand. "You can't accuse me!"

"Maybe the law doesn't allow it," Apollo said, his smile flickering only momentarily in his anger at that point, "but who's going to think you're really innocent after hearing this trial?" He crossed his arms. "The same goes for Machi."
Daryan's hands slipped off the stand with a strangled cry.

"The cocoon smuggling, your entire plan," Apollo continued, enjoying the opportunity to finally twist the knife. "Machi knows everything. There's only one way out of it for him, and that's to acknowledge his own crime, the crime of cocoon smuggling!"

The room fell silent. Apollo felt a poke on his right and broke from his fierce stare-down of Daryan to look over at his brother in confusion. Luke's eyes were wide, and he only jerked his head wordlessly, signalling for Apollo to look behind him. Although confused, Apollo did so, and his eyebrows shot up at what he saw.

Machi was standing not far away, having emerged from the defence waiting room while Apollo wasn't looking, a bailiff at his side. The teen was watching Daryan from behind his large sunglasses, eyebrows furrowed.

Daryan paled even further as he noticed Machi, eyes wide. Slowly, through the sweat pouring down his face, he forced a grin. "D-don't worry, there... I'll get... I'll get you out of the country." He laughed, but it sounded more desperate now than smug. "I'll set you up somewhere. A hidden mansion? Real nice."

Machi didn't react, silently staring back.

"You want a house made out of cookies?" Daryan asked, venturing out from behind the witness stand to take a few staggering steps towards the teen. "Or no, a house made out of pianos? C'mon..."

Machi stayed quiet.

"Please!" Daryan cried, jumping forward only to be body slammed by the bailiff at Machi's side, and quickly joined by two other bailiffs to pull him back from where he was still trying to lunge at the boy. "Don't taaaaaaalk!" he shrieked, shaking wildly to the point that his pompadour bounced around like a spring on his head, almost tossing the bailiffs off him all on its own. Nevertheless, with a final wordless shout, his tantrum seemed to have ended, and the detective allowed himself to be dragged away by the trio of bailiffs, who left him slumped over the witness stand.

Klavier was looking away, one hand at his fringe. "Daryan. I consider that my last session with you," he said. "We rocked."

Apollo shared only a single sympathetic glance for the prosecutor, then returned his attention to Daryan. "I'm guessing we can treat that outburst as a confession?"

At the witness stand, Daryan quietly laughed again... but he lacked even the slightest hint of his earlier confidence, instead sounding sick and desperate.

The judge shook his head, waving to the bailiffs. Together, they propped the limp man up and began to drag him away. "Well," the judge said, turning to Machi, "have you been listening to today's trial?"

Instead of replying, Machi looked over to Apollo and Luke; Apollo could only guess he was asking for permission, so he gave the boy a sad smile. "I'm... sorry, Machi. I didn't want it to turn out this way, but..." He sighed, shaking his head. "I'm not the kind of lawyer that can overlook a crime." 'Not even when it's my little brother committing it... but I saved you from two separate death penalties,
"Today's trial was all for your benefit, you know?" Klavier added, to the Wrights', and Machi's, surprise. He also gave the teen a friendly smile. "I see no reason why you should hesitate now."

Machi thought a moment, then slowly walked around the rope barrier to the front of the defence bench. He pulled off his sunglasses, folding the arms in with a practised air, and gave the Wrights a smile that seemed bright despite the boy's lingering nervousness. "I knew," he said. "From beginning, I knew."

Apollo could almost feel his heart breaking.

Machi's smile faded, and he placed the sunglasses on the bench. "Situation... I cannot explain. But money... I needed. Very much money."

The judge sighed. "Today's trial... raises a delicate issue with our legal system," he announced. "'The only thing definite in a court of law is evidence', the golden rule. However..."

"It has become apparent that not all things can be tried by this standard," Klavier agreed.

"Should another case of this sort surface," the judge continued, "we may have to consider an alternate system by which to administer justice. Anyway." He shook his head, dismissing his own musings, and turned towards the defence bench with a warm smile. "Mister Machi Tobaye?"

Machi blinked up at the tall podium. "Yes?"

"I promise you will receive a fair trial by the laws of our country," the judge said. "And, with regards to the current charges for the murder of Mister LeTouse, this court is prepared to announce a verdict."

Smiling, Machi looked back to the Wrights. "I thank you," he said, glancing away in guilt. "I... only lie... but you see truth!" He turned back to the judge, even giving Klavier a grin. "You find... truth."

The judge chuckled to himself, looking proud. "That's our job." He tapped his gavel on its base, then loudly called, "This court finds the defendant, Machi Tobaye, not guilty." He banged the gavel louder. "Court is adjourned!"

With the exit of the judge and the end of the trial, Apollo didn't hesitate to dash around the defence bench, wriggling past the rope barrier to Machi's side with a wide grin.

Machi was rubbing an arm nervously. "I sorry," he repeated, before either Apollo or Luke could speak. "I make so hard you find truth."

Apollo almost laughed, resting a hand on the boy's shoulder. "Don't you worry about it for another moment," he assured him.

"We knew from the beginning you didn't kill anyone," Luke added, grinning at the teen. "The hard part was proving it."

"And thank you for telling the truth," Apollo continued. "That was very brave of you to admit to the smuggling... and it really is the best option for you in the long run."

Machi nodded, giving Apollo a small smile. "I understand. Thank you."

Apollo suddenly found himself having to blink back tears. "Never any trouble for you, little bro."

Machi cocked his head to one side, confused. "Sorry?"

"Never mind," Apollo laughed, patting the teen's shoulder once more before reluctantly removing his hand.

Luke shook his head with a fond smile.

"Machi Tobaye."

Apollo spun around to see Klavier standing nearby, hands in his pockets and an unreadable gaze on Machi.

Machi stood ramrod straight as he turned to face the man. "Yes?"

"Paholani, little pianist," Klavier replied, giving the boy a short bow, "but I'm afraid you will have to come with me; We must make arrangements for your next trial, on the smuggling charge."

At that, Machi's face fell, and he nodded.

"Detective Crescend has been arrested, right?" Luke asked, casting a glance to the doors the bailiffs had dragged the man through earlier.

The prosecutor nodded. "He will be charged with the murder, and the smuggling... He's lucky we won't be handing him over to Borgia for that."

Apollo watched Klavier carefully; Despite the prosecutor's efforts, it was clear he was taking the betrayal of his bandmate hard. "I'm sorry about... what just happened. He was your friend."
Klavier shook his head. "Daryan will face justice," he insisted, "as we all must when we do wrong. The law does not distinguish between friend and foe." He sighed, eyes closed. "Even so, I think I will leave his trial for one of my colleagues; I have had quite enough of this entire case."

Luke frowned in confusion, glancing at the nervous teen. "What about Machi?"

At that, Klavier looked up with a smirk. "What about him?"

Apollo grinned at the boy. "You'll be going to Juvenile Court now, Machi," he explained. "It's specially designed for kids and teenagers; They're a lot nicer than here in adult court."

"And they have their own prosecutors," Klavier added, to Luke. "Your little friend here will be in safe hands."

Machi thought this over, then smiled up at Apollo and Luke. "Thank you," he said. "You work so much... a-all for I." He laughed, shaking his head. "I wish could speak English more..."

"Please, don't worry about it," Apollo chuckled.

"You certainly won't be lacking opportunity to practise," Klavier pointed out to the teen with a smile, then gestured to the doors, stepping away from the defence bench. "Come, we have work to do."

Machi nodded, then moved to follow Klavier. As he left, he turned to wave back at the Wrights with a grin. "Talus!"

Apollo didn't stop waving back until Machi was out of sight. It was only as he reluctantly turned around to gather his belongings he noticed the boy had left his sunglasses behind.

By the time Apollo and Luke had left the courtroom, Klavier and Machi were long gone, and the hallways filled with the crowds from the gallery. Sticking close together, the brothers wound their way towards the furthest corner from the stairs, where the entrance to the defendant lobbies was. As they reached the gap in the throng around the large double doors, the pair took a deep breath and promptly slumped against the wall.

"Now I see why we get out early," Luke muttered.

Apollo grinned. "It's worth it to have had that last conversation with Machi." In the bag at his hip, his hand tightened around the abandoned sunglasses.

Luke opened his mouth to reply, but cut himself off before a single word came out, looking off behind Apollo with wide eyes. "Mister Sycamore!"

Spinning around in surprise, Apollo quickly found what had caught his brother's attention: Sycamore, Emmy, Flora and Alfendi were approaching from the edge of the crowd, all cheerful smiles and waves. Apollo almost laughed at seeing them. "What are you two doing here?" he asked, looking between the man and the six-year-old. "I thought you weren't interested in the case!"

"Apparently, we got bored," Sycamore replied, giving Alfendi a wry smile.

The boy shrugged, shuffling side-to-side where he stood.
"They only just missed my big moment!" Emmy jokingly complained, slapping Sycamore's shoulder with a smile. "When am I ever going to stand in a courtroom and translate for someone like that again, huh?"

"Are all your trials this exciting?" Flora asked, hugging Alfendi close with a wary glance at the crowds. "It felt awfully close to Machi being convicted at several points..."

Apollo thought a moment, then shook his head. "Not really. We usually have actual evidence to help our case."

Alfendi looked up at Luke. "Where's... that guy? The one you were talking to before?"

"You mean Machi?" Luke asked. "Our client?"

Alfendi nodded.

"He's gone to sort out his next trial," Apollo explained. "He has to be charged for the smuggling."

"And the guy who killed the other guy?"

Luke giggled. "He's been arrested. He'll have his own trial later, too."

"Two of them," Apollo added with a grin.

Alfendi huffed, disappointed. "He didn't talk about killing that other guy at all!" he complained.

"Murderers generally don't," Sycamore told him. "They're trying to hide what they've done, so they don't get punished for it. It's up to the police and people of the court, like Apollo here," he gestured to the young lawyer, "to ensure they don't get away with it."

Listening to his uncle's explanation, Alfendi cupped his chin in one hand, frowning in thought.

'Speaking of lawyers...’ Apollo looked around the immediate area, scanning the crowds. "Where's Dad? And Trucy?" He presumed Lamiroir had probably caught up to Machi by now, and tried not to feel bitter that she would surely forget to say goodbye in her concern for the boy.

"They're in there," Emmy replied, grinning widely as she pointed to the nearby double doors.

"I think they said they'd wait for you in your lobby," Flora added with a smile.

Apollo and Luke shared a confused glance at that, wondering why Phoenix and Trucy would find it necessary... but Apollo saw the images of Lamiroir and Machi flash in front of his eyes and realised somewhere private to talk as a family probably wasn't a bad idea. "We'd better catch up to them, then," he said, giving their friends a grateful smile.

"We'll be right back!" Luke promised, and the pair hurried off into the defendant lobby hallway.

"Take your time!" Flora called in reply.

When Apollo pushed open the door to Defendant Lobby Number Two, the absolute last thing he was expecting was to come face to face with a familiar woman in a white dress. "L-Lamiroir!"

Phoenix grinned as the trio waiting in the room looked up towards the pair in the doorway. "Ah, there you two are! Stayed behind to talk to Machi, did you?"
Lamiroir smiled. "I owe you both my thanks."

Apollo could only stare at the woman, unsure if it was the longing or the guilt that was overwhelming him more. He was only broken out of his reverie by a shove at his back courtesy of Luke, and he stumbled forwards towards where Lamiroir stood, Phoenix on one side and Trucy on the other. "Lamiroir, I'm... sorry about Machi. I mean, he was your..."

Lamiroir's smile faded. "Yes, I thought of him as my own son. Even now, I do. Yet," she sighed, "something got a hold of him, something evil. I see that. And he must pay for what he has done." Although her tone was firm, her pale eyes still seemed so gentle as they pointed in Apollo's direction. "Is that not how it should be?"

Apollo was almost surprised at her sentiment; She was right, he just wasn't expecting her to truly believe it like that. Not that it helped his guilt. "I'm still sorry."

"Do not be sorry," Lamiroir insisted, shaking her head as the smile returned to her face. "You have given me courage."

Seeing Apollo's confused face, Trucy giggled, attracting her brother's attention. "You should've seen yourself in there, Polly!" she boasted, bouncing to his side. "You were so cool, fighting back against every argument, getting that detective to confess just by talking at him...!" She squealed, pulling at his arm.

Luke chuckled, walking up on Trucy's other side. "You were pretty amazing in there, Apollo," he agreed.

Apollo was certain his face was as red as his cape. "W-well..."

"Lamiroir, tell him!" Trucy cried, directing a grin at the woman. "Tell him what you decided!"

Lamiroir smiled, her eyes twinkling. "I am going to England," she announced, "and having an eye operation."

"It was my suggestion, actually," Phoenix chimed in with a grin and a wink.

Apollo and Luke shared a surprised look. "You mean, you'll be able to see again?" Apollo asked.

"You're going to ask the Professor to help recover your memory!?" Luke added, almost squealing in pure glee.

Lamiroir clasped her hands together, face downturned. "It's funny, I have always been afraid of the 'light'. Light seems so harsh, so unforgiving..."

"According to the doctor," Phoenix explained, watching Apollo carefully, "Lamiroir lost her sight due to some kind of 'accident'."

Apollo's eyebrows shot up. 'The accident Valant told me about...!'

"I feared that, if I could see," Lamiroir continued, "perhaps it would open my eyes to the truth I have been running from... the past I have been running from." She closed her eyes. "I was scared."

Phoenix stepped up to where his children had gathered, a smile growing on his face. "You know what changed her mind?" he asked, placing a hand on Apollo's shoulder. "Hearing your defence in there today. She could feel your gaze, unwavering, always looking straight at the truth."
Apollo blinked back tears. 'Laying it on a bit thick there, Dad...'

Lamiroir smiled, hiding a small laugh at Phoenix's rather dramatic proclamation. "If the light returns to my eyes," she said, "I think I will take up painting."

"Really!?!" Trucy cried, gripping Apollo's upper arm so tightly he feared she might cut off the entire limb. "Like, become an actual landscape painter, not just of sound?"

Chuckling, Lamiroir nodded. "I will paint the three of you," she replied. "I promise."

Trucy gasped, pressing a hand to her mouth as she pressed tight against Apollo. He couldn't blame her, feeling pretty speechless himself; Not only had Lamiroir just promised them she would make efforts to regain her memory, but that she would be coming back to see them regardless. They really couldn't have hoped for a better outcome.

"That's very generous of you, Lamiroir," Luke spoke up, shooting his siblings a fond smile. "It means a lot to us."

Lamiroir bowed her head, giving the trio a warm grin behind her veil. "Apollo, Luke, Trucy... I hope that we will meet again someday soon."

Trucy nodded rapidly. "Y-you bet! Me too!" she chirped.

"We'll be waiting," Apollo added.

Luke nodded, then held out a hand towards the door. "Lamiroir, if you're heading to London to speak to Professor Layton, maybe it's time you discussed it with Flora? So everything is ready to go once you arrive?"

"Yes, thank you, Luke," Lamiroir replied, and took a few steps towards him, a hand outstretched. "They said they would wait for us outside, I believe."

Luke took the singer's hand, guiding her to the door. "Ah, you were in the gallery with them?" he realised.

With that, the pair left the room and door closed behind them, cutting off their conversation and leaving Phoenix, Apollo, and Trucy alone in the lobby.

View the Court Record
As the door closed, Trucy's hands slipped from their strangling grip on Apollo's upper arm, and she pressed tight against his side, arms wrapping around his chest. Despite the residual ache in his arm, Apollo wrapped it around her shoulders, holding her close. He couldn't help but feel a little relieved now Lamiroir was gone; After the high emotions of saying goodbye to Machi and only barely scraping a bittersweet victory, having to come face-to-face with his amnesiac mother and apologise for not being able to do better was a bit overwhelming. All he really wanted to do right now was crawl into bed and sleep for a million years, the rest of the world be damned... though Trucy was welcome to join him. She could do with a break just as much as him.

"Are you two okay?"

Apollo came out of his thoughts with a surprised blink, looking up to meet his father's concerned gaze.

Trucy nodded, giving Phoenix a smile. "We'll be alright, Daddy."

"Yeah," Apollo mumbled in agreement. She was right; They might not be okay now, but, given some time, they would be. He frowned as a thought occurred to him. "You figured it out, didn't you?"

A smile teased the corners of Phoenix’s lips. "You could say that," he replied. "After you asked me about her, I kinda had to look into it."

Apollo probably would have laughed at that were he not feeling so drained; Instead, he merely let slip a single silent chuckle. "Sorry I couldn't tell you outright."

"I don't blame you," Phoenix said, shaking his head. "Finding her was unexpected enough, but to have a murder and a case on top of it?"

"And Machi," Trucy chimed in, grinning up at Apollo. "You heard Mommy; He's our new brother!"

Apollo nodded, smiling back. "Yep. He's even already joined the list of family members I've had to defend for murder."

Phoenix laughed. "Ah, and I should warn you: I've not told anyone who Lamiroir is, but your Uncle Edgeworth does already know; He was helping me look into her the other day."

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "Your 'secret mission'?"

"My secret mission," Phoenix confirmed, tapping the side of his nose with a wink. "Watching your trial today reminded me we need to hurry things along on that."

"Right," Apollo sighed. He decided not to bother asking for details right at that moment; He needed some breathing room after said trial, and really didn't want to have to think, not yet.
There was a long pause as the trio stood in a comfortable silence.

Phoenix looked at his watch. "Lamiroir should be done talking to the Laytons by now," he said, then headed to the door, looking back at his children. "Ready to go?"

Apollo and Trucy looked at each other, then smiled as one. "Let's go," Apollo agreed.

As Phoenix had predicted, Lamiroir had long gone by the time they emerged, finding a third floor lobby that was quiet and empty except for the animated conversation going on between Luke and his English friends.

"Lamiroir's going to call us once she's in London!" Flora excitedly proclaimed as the rest of the Wrights joined them.

"She promised to tell me the rest of her fairy tale from Borginia!" Alfendi gleefully added.

Phoenix raised an eyebrow under his beanie. "You're excited about a fairy tale, Alfendi?"

Sycamore nodded. "According to what he was telling me yesterday, said fairy tale involves a troll cutting off people's hands in return for favours," he explained. "Everywhere he went, he left bloody handprints."

"We had to go yesterday, so I didn't hear the end of it," Alfendi added, "but Lamiroir said she'd tell me the rest when she meets up with us back home!"

With that, the group left the courthouse, walking together down the stairs to the entrance. Apollo ended up at the back of the group with Emmy and Sycamore, and Emmy turned to him with a grin. "I'm going to double down on my study of Borginian," she told him. "If the Professor's going to be looking into her mysterious past, he's going to need an expert on hand, right?"

"But Lamiroir speaks Borginian," Apollo pointed out.

"Yeah, but is she really going to be up to doing all that reading herself, assuming she gets her sight back as planned?" Emmy asked. "I know the kind of research we're going to need to do for this job, and it involves a lot of reading."

Sycamore sighed, pushing at his glasses. "I hope your work while we were here has impressed your editor enough to support such a long holiday assisting my brother, Emmy..."

"I wonder if we'll have to go back to Borginia?" Emmy wondered aloud, ignoring her friend. "At least this time we know why their customs is so crazy... and I'll know better than to buy marshmallows to bring home again."

At that, Sycamore hid a snort of laughter. "Yes, you were quite distraught when they confiscated those, weren't you?"

Emmy shot him a glare as Apollo began to giggle.

"I've decided!" Flora announced as they emerged into the entrance lobby, pulling the group to a halt as she proudly turned her gaze between the four Wrights.

"Decided what?" Apollo asked, confused.

Phoenix was grinning from where he stood next to Flora, one hand resting on the head of the very excited Alfendi bouncing nearby. "It appears Flora wants to cook for us tonight," he explained. "Before your show."

"As celebration for your win!" Flora elaborated.

"Isn't that so cool!?!" Trucy cried, standing on Flora's other side and looking equally as happy about the offer as Alfendi did. "It'd be like going to a fancy restaurant, but at home!"

Flora laughed at that. "Oh, I may work in a restaurant, but that doesn't mean I have the capability of making some of the stuff we do... unless you happen to have specially made sushi knives hiding away in that tiny kitchen of yours?" She winked at Trucy, who giggled. "I'll definitely make what I can, though. Luke, are you okay taking me to a few shops on the way back to your office?"

Luke nodded. "Sure. We can go shopping while everyone else heads home."

"I'll come!" Trucy cried.

"Me too!" Alfendi added.

Emmy laughed, rolling her eyes. "And I'll come to actually help. Five is the maximum for the Lukemobile, right?"

Blushing at the reminder of his car's name, Luke nodded.

Phoenix chuckled. "The rest of us will meet you back at the agency, then."

Once back from her trip, Flora was quick to take over the Wrights' kitchen, her hands working a mile a minute while her mouth provided a semi-constant commentary.

"Now where are your frying pans, I know you have at least- Wait, you only have one? How do you live!?!"

"Geeze, this is the smallest cutlery drawer I've ever laid eyes on... Nothing but knifes, spoons, and forks, huh? And a lone fish slice!"

"You keep books in these cupboards...? That's new, a kitchen too big for its contents..."

"Wow, this is probably the cleanest oven I've ever seen! You... You never use it, do you?"

"Not one of these plates matches another... Actually, that's impressive."

Despite her many criticisms of their meagre supplies, and the Wrights' admissions that they very rarely did more than occasionally fry things, Flora refused to back down from her promise to make something, ploughing ahead with the harried cry, "Seriously, I'd go out and buy you this stuff myself if we weren't on a time crunch!" In the end, Flora sent out Emmy to buy the few kitchen supplies she absolutely could not do without, such as baking paper, a measuring cup, some tongs, a mixing bowl... Apollo hadn't bothered listening to her full list, tuning out as the words got ever more incomprehensible to him. Nevertheless, Emmy jotted everything down in her notebook and headed off to the supermarket a couple blocks away, Trucy accompanying her as a guide.

"I'm sorry, Flora," Luke muttered as he helped his friend gather her ingredients. "I guess it didn't occur to me that we never cook in this apartment..."

"No no, I should have guessed," Flora insisted with a sigh. "I mean this is, what, the tenth time I've been in this kitchen? And you've told me in the past that Apollo and Trucy have take-out noodles every night, so I really should have known." She paused, noticing Alfendi standing nearby, eagerly waiting to assist. With a grin, she ruffled his hair, causing the boy to wordlessly whine and wriggle on the spot in semi-faked displeasure until she withdrew. "And hey," she looked up at the watching Apollo, "everything I buy for you guys tonight you can consider a gift!"

Apollo blushed in embarrassment, rubbing at the back of his head. "Y-you really don't have to, Flora..."

"Nonsense, I insist," Flora replied with a decisive nod, hands on her hips. "Besides, I can't exactly take them home with me. Maybe I could find you some cheap and easy things to make, and you could start cooking for yourselves! It's bound to be healthier than constant noodles every night!"

As much as he considered Guy Eldoon a friend, Apollo couldn't really argue with that.

With their bellies full of Flora's glorious food, Apollo and Trucy had raced to the Wonder Bar that evening for their nightly performance. It hadn't occurred to them until they were putting on their stage makeup that there was another reason Flora had chosen this particular night to treat her friends:

"Aren't they going home tomorrow?"

Apollo paused, his eyes moving from the mirror's image of his own face to his sister's. "Hm?"

"Luke's friends," Trucy explained, staring at the brush in her hand. "It's Friday today. The Bostonius is leaving tomorrow."

"Huh, guess so." Apollo paused in thought, then gave his sister a grin in the mirror. "We'd better make tonight a worthy send-off for them, then."

Trucy blinked in surprise, looking up at her brother's reflection. After a moment, she grinned back. When they received the warning call, brother and sister stood hand-in-hand at the edge of offstage, watching the final chords of the plucky bass-player ring out from centre-stage; Apollo had to admit, that woman was quite talented. As she bowed to the applauding audience, the curtains swung closed, and the stagehands immediately set to work pulling out all of the Gramarye props, helping clear the music stand and stool of the musician from the magicians' way. Apollo shot the woman a thumbs-up as they passed each other, and she grinned back, her gigantic instrument in her arms as she hurried back to her dressing room.

"The time has come, meine Damen und Herren," boomed Aderyn's voice from the speakers on the other side of the curtains. "The finale of our show, the act you've all been waiting for! It's the most wunderbar of the Wonder Bar, it's Apollo and Artemis Gramarye!"

It was as easy as breathing to slip into routine as the curtains opened, the wide smile of his stage persona plastered across his face as the audience came into view beyond the blinding stage lights. He and Trucy stepped forward in unison, bowing to the crowd as they wielded their identical wands in hand. After quickly introducing each other and 'flying' through their current opener (Trucy changed her destination back to 'London' for their English friends, after having switched to 'Borginia' the previous day), they moved on to their first trick, a simple card-based series of illusions in which the gag was that the siblings were constantly trying to one-up each other; As always, it was being very well received by the audience.

Trucy rolled her eyes as Apollo flawlessly completed his last in the trio of tricks, by far the most complicated of their entire repertoire. "What a flashy piece of nonsense!" she cried, exaggeratedly shrugging in disinterest. "Anyone could pull that off!"

Apollo scoffed, clapping his hands together and discreetly palming the pack of cards into a hidden pocket of his gloves; When he pulled his hands apart, he gave the audience just enough time to notice the magically disappearing prop before turning to his sister with a sigh. "Artemis, we're not getting anywhere with this," he proclaimed with a sad air, exactly as scripted. "I think we need to call
"A third party?" Trucy repeated, cocking her head to one side, eyes wide. "I didn't know we'd had a first and second party!"

Apollo waited for the laughter of the audience to die down before waving off her reply; That particular pun was his idea, and it was harder to hide his pride at the reaction to it every night. "You know what I mean: We need to ask a random person off the street to come up here and decide for us." He slipped the microphone out of his bag, flipping it dramatically in his hand to give the sound engineer the signal it was time to turn it on, and stepped forward to the very front of the stage to peer down into the audience with a wide grin. "Okay, random people off the street! Any volunteers?" He raised a hand over his eyes to better see the raised hands that shot up all over the restaurant, accompanied by loud cheers and whistles as the hopeful strangers tried to draw as much attention to themselves as possible. "And who of you will be voting for me?" Apollo joked, getting the mixture of laughter, cheers and good-natured booing that he expected.

Behind him, he knew Trucy was already rolling her eyes, hands on her hips. "Apollo!"

"Just kidding, just kidding!" Apollo replied, still grinning. As scripted, his sister was pacified by the statement, and he began to scan the crowds more thoroughly for an appropriate contender to join them on stage. A sparkle of light from the front row caught his eye, and he instinctively turned his gaze to investigate the source: A silver chain, hanging around the neck of a tall figure in black, the glimpse of a familiar face before they turned their head to hide it.

Apollo froze as the recognition hit him, staring in disbelief at the figure below. The shock must have activated his perception abilities, because he felt time stop and the audience fall silent, his vision black except for the blond man in the front row of the audience. That hairstyle, and that particular shade of yellow... They belonged to only two men Apollo had ever met, one of whom was safely in solitary confinement. The loud-and-proud symbol hanging off the shiny chain around his neck clashed horribly with the clear intentions of the baseball cap and designer shades the man had pulled on his head, a hand visibly trying to cover his face as he avoided Apollo's gaze. There was only one possible person this could be...

... and this was a perfect opportunity for revenge.

Time restarted around him, the audience's mutterings again registering in Apollo's ears. He smirked, casually striding closer to his target and squatting down at the edge of the stage, microphone lazily dangling in his grip. "Hello there, sir," he called, eyes locked on the man with the silver chain. "You look like a reasonable fellow... if a bit of a diva. Up to mediating our little disagreement tonight?"

The man stayed perfectly still a moment longer, then his hand lowered, his gaze finally meeting Apollo's from behind his sunglasses.

Apollo's grin widened. "Yes, hello, I'm talking to you!" he continued. "Care to join me on stage, Herr Diva?" He shrugged nonchalantly. "I'm afraid we Gramaryes don't allow anyone to hog the spotlight though; You'll have to share it."

From behind him, Apollo heard Trucy gasp - She must have noticed her brother's odd behaviour (they made a point of never mocking paying customers, after all) and approached to see what was going on. To his surprise though, Trucy was quick to dash around to his side, leaning forward to fix an equally large grin on the man in the audience. "C'mon, Herr Diva! What fun is a magic show if you don't get to take part? Don't you want to boast to all your friends back in Deutschland about this?" She winked, shooting finger-guns at him. "Surprised I know you're German? The Great Artemis Gramarye is just psychic like that!"
Below, the insistent focus of the two Gramaryes, Klavier Gavin sighed and reluctantly pulled himself to his feet. "I don't know what you're talking about," he muttered, his usual accent gone without a trace. He pulled his cap further down over his face as he walked past the pair, on his way to the stairs at the end of the stage.

Apollo resisted the urge to snicker smugly as the man finally acquiesced, the young magician getting to his feet and holding out the microphone for the other to take. "Herr Diva, everyone!" he announced to the audience, hearing Trucy's muffled giggles as she skipped back to her post by their table of props.

The crowd applauded as Klavier stepped under the lights of the stage, one hand still self-consciously on his cap as the other took the microphone. "That's not my name," he quietly protested, a faint blush visible through the tan colour of his cheeks.

Apollo raised an eyebrow as he escorted the disguised musician to join Trucy at the props table. 'And how do you think I feel about 'Herr Forehead'?'

"Then what would you like us to call you?" Trucy asked, already shuffling her deck of cards in preparation for their upcoming trick.

Klavier paused, gripping the microphone tight. His free hand had moved to fiddle with the Gavinners symbol hanging on the chain around his neck. "K-Konrad."

A loud bark of laughter echoed from the audience. Apollo thought it sounded suspiciously like Luke. It was only because he knew Trucy so well Apollo could recognise the brief pause of surprise before she gave Klavier a bright smile. "Alright Konrad, you're going to help me and Apollo here with a couple of card tricks." She showed off the spread of cards in her hand to the audience. "But pay attention though; You'll have to judge which was more impressive when we're done!"

"You can do that, can't you, Herr Diva?" Apollo added, a smirk still on his face.

Klavier shot him a glare from behind his sunglasses.
The finale of the Gramaryes' act that evening was a variant of the zig-zag illusion they had thought up on the fly the previous night, for Lamiroir's benefit; With Apollo squeezed into the apparatus of the separated boxes, appearing for all the world to be in pieces, Artemis began to wail that he was useless as a partner now and she was going to need a replacement, hence, the bringing out of Mister Hat for a short comedy routine that Apollo would try his best to interrupt from his compromised position. Finally, he was able to pull himself back together, springing from the apparatus to the cheers of the audience. Artemis abruptly changed her tune at his grand escape, putting away Mister Hat as the two fell into their farewells, the curtain closing in front of them.

Apollo flicked off his microphone and immediately sighed in relief, moving to help the stagehands put away their Props as Aderyn gave her own farewells on the other side of the curtain. "I'll be glad to get to bed tonight," he whispered to Trucy.

Trucy nodded, her arms gripping either side of the table between them to carry it offstage, props and all. "Me too."

Alongside the stagehands, the pair proceeded with the ritual of the post-show clean-up silently, not needing to exchange any words in the monotony of the familiar movements. It took no more than five minutes to securely lock everything away in their dressing room, then the pair locked hands and exited their dressing room and the backstage.

It wasn't hard to find their family and friends, seated in the usual table Aderyn gave the Wrights when they had someone in the audience. Phoenix was happily chatting to Sycamore at one end of the table, while at the other Emmy and Flora were animatedly discussing some of the tricks they had seen on stage only minutes earlier. Alfendi, in the middle, perked up as he saw the approaching duo, slipping out of his seat and racing around to meet the caped pair. "That was great!" he shouted, shooting Apollo a grin before moving to bounce at his side. "How'd you stay in that box for so long? Did it hurt? Did you know Artemis was going to leave you alone for so long?"

Apollo grinned as they approached the table; After seeing their show on Monday, Alfendi had been full of questions about all their tricks, so it didn't surprise him he was this time focussing on the biggest obvious difference between the two performances. After all, he'd spent a whole day obsessing over Valant's illusion from the concert, too. He gave Alfendi a knowing wink. "Oh no, I had no idea Artemis was going to cruelly abandon me like that," he said. "But it was okay; The magic kept it from hurting at all."

Alfendi giggled.

Phoenix waved as the trio arrived at the table. "You two ready to go?"

Trucy was looking around with a confused frown. "Where's Luke?"
It was only when Trucy asked that Apollo realised their brother was indeed missing. "That's a good point."

Sycamore smirked, pushing at his glasses. "He ran off the moment Miss Vogel left the stage," he explained. "I imagine he had someone to talk to."

"Hey, speak of the devil," Emmy interrupted with a sly smile, pointing off into the crowds near the stage.

Apollo spun around just in time to catch sight of Luke as he emerged from behind a cluster of people at a neighbouring table, a massive grin above his goatee. Behind him, his blond head bouncing above Luke's despite his efforts to shrink out of view under that dark baseball cap, was Klavier, still wearing the competing dark shades and sparkling Gavinners logo.

"Hi, Konrad!" Trucy loudly called, waving to the pair as they joined the table. "You were a great volunteer!"

Luke was biting back giggles as he stepped back, leaving Klavier face-to-sunglasses with the table at large. Klavier himself cast a furtive glance at the crowds around them, then turned to Trucy with his usual easy-going grin. "Danke, Fraulein," he quietly replied, his usual affected accent back on in full force (a stark contrast to the personality he'd exuded on stage as 'Konrad'). "It was not what I was expecting when I came out here tonight, but it was a very enjoyable experience."

"And you kept yourself from hogging the spotlight for once," Apollo replied with a smirk. "Very admirable, Herr Diva."

Klavier shook his head with a chuckle. "Are you done, Herr Forehead?"

Apollo shrugged. 'Not until you stop calling me that, Gavin.' "Sorry we couldn't invite you backstage," he airily continued. "Didn't think you could afford the tickets, even at twenty percent off."

At that Klavier scoffed, waving off Apollo's smug tirade.

"If only you'd brought your Prosecutor's Badge, maybe we could have done a disappearing trick tonight."

Klavier frowned. "Low blow."

"Nonsense, that joke has like a million layers to it," Apollo shot back, his smirk growing. "Besides, it'd be more than fair for the five minutes it would be gone."

"Is it that top hat you're wearing?" Klavier replied, an eyebrow raised. "Is that why you are so much more confident here than in court?"

Apollo scoffed. "May I remind you which of us has ventured off neutral ground and into the other's territory tonight?" He gestured to the tables nearer the stage. "You were kinda asking for it, sitting in the front row."

"As much as I'm enjoying this," Phoenix interrupted, a small smile on his lips, "I think that's quite enough, Apollo. Leave the sauerkraut alone."

Klavier gave Phoenix a curious look, but said nothing.

"What are you doing here tonight, Mister Gavin?" Flora asked, giving the prosecutor a friendly
"Yeah!" Trucy agreed, arms crossed. "I was going to invite you after the concert, but..." She shrugged, glancing away.

Klavier chuckled. "I thought it was only fair," he explained. "You have seen my show, I should see yours." His smile faded. "I wanted to wait until after the trial was done... not that I could have imagined it would end the way it did."

"I imagine the rest of the band is in shock too," Emmy chimed in. "I'm looking forward to seeing what you decide to do next, though."

Klavier's smile was strained, but he nodded respectfully at the woman. "We'll certainly make an announcement when we do. By the way, you did an admirable job as a court translator today, Fraulein."

Emmy waved off his compliment, though she was grinning wide. "Aw, shucks, just doing my job!"

"But your job is as a reporter," Alfendi pointed out. Apollo suddenly noticed the boy had at some point wandered back around the table, now standing at his uncle's side.

"And today she was a court translator," Sycamore replied, shooting Emmy a smile. "It's just a shame we missed seeing it."

Emmy winked at the pair, still preening gleefully. "You bet it is."

Anything that might have been said after that was cut off by the arrival of Aderyn, squealing with joy as she appeared at Apollo's shoulder. "What on earth do you two get up to out there in the world!?" she laughed, looking between Apollo and Klavier. "First Lamiroir, now one of the Gewinners!?"

"That's 'Gavinners', Fraulein," Klavier gently corrected, then turned to Apollo. "You had Lamiroir here last night, Herr Forehead?"

As Aderyn gave Klavier a confused stare, Luke explained, "After she was attacked yesterday, she was interested in listening to their performance, so we took her along."

"We should tell you the full story sometime, Aderyn!" Trucy chirped to the woman, bring her out of her focus on the prosecutor. "We always have exciting adventures when Polly gets a case!"

"Not always," Apollo chimed in; He was hard-pressed to think of all the events of the past few days as 'adventurous'.

Aderyn laughed, and turned to Klavier. "Werden Sie ein Teil dieser Diskussion auch, Herr Gavin? Ich wäre sehr interessiert es zu hören!"

Klavier's casual grin froze. "Er... Pardon, Fraulein?"

"Nein, nein, du gehört mir," Aderyn scoffed, shaking her head with a smile. "Beantworte die Frage!"

There was no immediate reply from Klavier, still frozen in his stare at Aderyn... though Apollo could see sweat starting to form on his brow. "Ah... j-ja, um..." He took a few steps back, glancing all around. "I would love to stay and chat, but I have somewhere very important to be, so..." With that, he turned and fled.
Aderyn only laughed. Not far away, Luke was also suppressing an attack of the giggles.

"What did you say to him?" Flora asked, watching the man go.

"I just asked him if he was going to come back and help with this 'explanation' of yours!" she replied, still chuckling. "Honestly though, as excited as I am to have a celebrity here... he deserved being scared off after calling me 'Fraulein', the sexist bastard. It's been too long since I got to use any significant Deutsch." She turned and patted Apollo and Trucy on the shoulders. "See you two tomorrow. Have a nice night." With a wave over her shoulder, she then left, returning backstage.

ATHENA ATHENA KLAVIER GAVIN'S REAL NAME IS CONRAD .
I'M GUESSING ON THE SPELLING BUT I THINK THAT'S IT .

OMG ARE YOU KIDDING THAT'S AMAZING
CONRAD GAVIN, WORLD FAMOUS SEX OBJECT
(Actually I wonder if it's Konrad for the k thing)
How did you even work that out!?

He was at Apollo and Trucy's show last night! He was speaking without the accent, said his name was Conrad, and was trying to hide behind a hat and sunglasses while also still wearing his massive chain necklace with his band’s logo on it! It was amazing! .
(Maybe it is Konrad, I really have no idea. His brother's Kristoph, so it's possible.) .

(I'm gonna assume it's Konrad then :D)
AAAA I WISH I COULD HAVE BEEN THERE TO SEE IT

Apollo was calling him Herr Diva and kept mocking him. It was very cathartic after the day we'd had in court. .

Oh yeah congrats on that! We gotta call sometime so you can tell me the full story! Something about a song, and smuggling?

Yes, we need to organise that. Tomorrow around this time? I'm busy today. .

Sure, tomorrow sounds good. Talk to ya later Luke!

Until then! .

As always, any actual Germans feel free to let me know if Aderyn’s too off-base in her (admittedly rusty) use of the language. :)

July 11, 10:27AM
Moonlight Airport

"You were the light of my life this past week, my dear," Clay gushed, gently pecking his lips against Flora's hand in his. "It is my endless regret that we could not spend more time together."

Flora giggled, her cheeks red. "You're too kind, sir," she replied, playing along with a curtsy. "I shall count the days until we reunite."

Alfendi rolled his eyes and mimed throwing up.

The Wrights and Clay stood on the airport tarmac at the foot of the stairs leading inside the Bostonius, having gathered early to say farewell to Sycamore, Emmy, Flora, Alfendi... even Raymond and Keats, though the latter never ventured too far from the plane. Luke paused to watch, seeing everyone in their smaller groups spread out around him: There was Phoenix and Sycamore, exchanging regrets that circumstances forbade them from spending more time getting to know each other; There was Emmy and Apollo, the former boasting about her skills in Borginian while the latter simply hid smiles and thanked her again for her help; Finally, there was Trucy and Alfendi, half-watching Flora and Clay's over-the-top romantic scene and half-whispering conspiratorially between themselves, but of what Luke couldn't possibly imagine. After the week they had had, the things they had learned, the secrets they had kept... Luke was content simply to see his friends and family smiling.

The stairs creaked as Raymond made his steady way down, Keats balancing across his shoulders. "I've received a response from the tower," he announced, silencing the group and attracting their attention immediately. "We should be leaving within the hour."

"Thank you, Raymond," Sycamore replied. "We'll be up shortly."

Raymond gave a short bow, Keats meowing in protest as his perch shifted, then the old man carefully turned around and ventured back up the stairs.

"Then this is our final farewell for now," Sycamore pointed out to the group, focusing his smile specifically on the Wrights and Clay. "We had a lovely time; I look forward to whenever we can next call in here."

"It was a pleasure having you," Phoenix replied.

Apollo ran a hand through his hair sheepishly. "Even with Dad being called away and the concert and trial messing everything up?" he asked Sycamore.

Emmy scoffed. "If you ask me, the concert and court case only made this whole thing even more exciting!" She laughed, patting Apollo on the shoulder. "I've got so many great articles written while I've been here, even with having to re-learn Borginian... This holiday has been jam-packed!"

"Yeah, you got to see a murder!" Alfendi added, bouncing excitedly. "And then you got to find the murderer and locked him up!"

Trucy giggled. "That bit's the most exciting part!" She winked at the boy. "Maybe Polly will have another case going on when you next visit too!"

"That would be awesome!"

Clay laughed. "Man, of all the things to miss..."

"We really should make plans to do all this again!" Flora said, her grin mostly directed at Clay. "Once this whole business with Lamiroir is sorted out, we should look into making this a regular thing!"

Luke tugged briefly at the brim of his cap. "I'm sorry work pulled us away from you this entire week," he told his friends. "What with Papa's secret mission, the trial... even the Wonder Bar and the Space Center. It feels like we wasted the opportunity."

Emmy shook her head, giving her friend a stern look. "Nonsense. Did you not just hear me? All of that only made this visit better."

Sycamore nodded in agreement. "We already knew about all of your prior commitments to the Wonder Bar and the Space Center," he added. "We planned around those. The surprises that came along the way were nobody's fault and, while I agree it's a shame we couldn't spend more time together as a group, there's little use in regretting the time we did have."

Luke wasn't sure what he could say to that, so mutely stared at the tarmac below his feet instead. Barely a moment later, a pair of shoes followed by a peach dress entered his field-of-view, and Flora was throwing herself on Luke, wrapping her arms around him in a tight hug.

Luke smiled, holding back tears as he returned the hug. "I'll miss you too."

With that, the group exploded into rapid individual goodbyes between the departing four and the remaining five. Sycamore was quick to grab Alfendi, overseeing the boy's leaping hugs on the Wrights and Clay before herding the six-year-old up the stairs into the Bostonius.

"Bye!" Alfendi called, pausing halfway up to wave at the group below. Getting waves and similar calls in return, he turned and ran up into the Bostonius, giggling.

Flora ran to Clay, giving him another curtsy. "I'll make sure I come back soon."
"I'm already looking forward to it," Clay replied, kissing her hand once more. They stared at each other a moment more, their usual theatrics oddly missing, then he flashed her a grin and began to walk away, keeping himself facing Flora. "The hours shall seem like years until I see your face again, my lady!"

"I'll write!" Flora called, waving madly even though they were still only metres apart.

Clay pressed his hands to his heart. "And I shall treasure every letter your gracious hand pens!"

Phoenix took that as his cue to start herding his children back to the terminus building, placing his hands on Apollo and Trucy's shoulders. "Alright, let's get out of here, or this ship won't ever leave."

"Goodbye Flora!" Trucy cried for the third time, jumping on the woman with a hug before running off after Clay, waving over her shoulder. "Keep in touch!"

Apollo gave Sycamore and Emmy a smile and nod. "Until next time." He then turned and strolled in the same direction his sister had gone.

"Next time should be a much smoother visit," Phoenix said with a smirk, getting chuckles from the gathered group. "Don't take too long, Luke."

"I'll be right there, Papa," Luke promised.

Giving his son a nod, Phoenix wandered off after the others.

Luke stood alone. In front of him, Sycamore and Emmy were already on the lower steps, Flora making her way to join them, a hand already on the rail. Luke took a deep breath and called, "Guys?"

The young man chewed his lip, uncertain. "It's... when you're talking to the Professor about Lamiroir..." He turned his head, glancing back at his family, gathering in the distance by the airport terminus. Even from this far, he could see the brilliant crimson and teal of his siblings' capes. After everything they had been through this past week... was what he was about to do the right thing?

"Luke?"

At Emmy's call, Luke spun back around, coming face-to-face with his friends' concerned gazes. He gave them a warm smile. "Never mind." With that, he turned and headed off to join his family, waving over his shoulder. "Come back soon!"

"Goodbye!" Flora shouted back, and Emmy was quick to echo it, but their calls soon disappeared behind the general hubbub of the airport, and Luke could only watch from afar as they finally retreated back into the Bostonius.

No words were said as the Wrights and Clay watched the pudgy red plane speed down the airstrip and disappear into the bright blue sky.
Good news: she said yes.

I'll assume you're referring to what I think you're referring to and say good. If it weren't for the very specific circumstances surrounding this case, I'd be very seriously suggesting you have a problem, Wright.

Does Maya know?

I've told her bits and pieces... what she needs to know. It's not exactly my place to tell her all of it.

Thanks for everything btw.

No need for thanks, I agreed to this long ago. Not that we were expecting this specific scenario to ever occur, but that is beside the point.

Do keep me informed of everything, as I would like to know post-haste when she returns from England. And I would tell Maya soon if I were you.

Don't lecture me. The kids are already suspicious after I had to bail on them earlier.

You honestly think this kind of thing is suitable to tell over a text or a phone call? Really?

Obviously not. I'm aware how busy Maya is, and how big most of this news is, however you are both my friends and I would hate to see your relationship suffer by the needless keeping of secrets.

It's not needless, but I guess I can see your point. Don't worry, Maya's aware I haven't told her the full story. We're still arranging a trip to Kurain of some kind.

I'm glad to hear it. I'll get to work on my end concerning what we discussed. Keep me informed of events on your end.

I will. Talk to you later.

_I'm at the office with Trucy. Papa left the moment we got back; Said he had a 'secret mission' to attend to. Any ideas?_

_I thought Dad's secret mission was over with already... Don't worry, I was planning to ask him on Monday what all that was about. I'll just add that to the list_ _Alright then, I'll wait for you to talk to him. I warn you though, Trucy's a bit impatient..._

_Tell her not to worry; Dad will talk to me about it on Monday, trust me._

July 13, 9:10AM
Wright Anything Agency
Phoenix's Office

Apollo couldn't help a smile as he walked through the office's front door that Monday morning. 'A new week after the chaos of that trial...' From his bag, he pulled Machi's abandoned shades, picked up from the courtroom on Friday afternoon. _'Not that he needed them anymore, but... If we ever see him again, I can return them.'_ Chuckling to himself, he circled his desk, the one closest to the front door, and laid the sunglasses in front of his chair. With one last longing look at the dark object, he turned to leave reception, headed into the office.

Had Apollo ever arrived at Gavin Law Offices at this time, he surely would have been fired without a second thought; At the Wright Anything Agency, his 'boss' was a lot more lenient... This was still more of his childhood home than a workplace, and they treated it as such, not as a professional office that demanded respect. Sure, they did work, saw clients, but every inch of space in the allotted 'office' area still echoed seven years of memories to Apollo, whether they be happy, sad, angry, or just neutral; The office Kristoph owned, for the year-and-a-half Apollo worked there, had exuded coldness, order... the exact opposite of everything the Wrights stood for. As embarrassed as he still was about it on occasion, Apollo wouldn't give up the chaos of his family's agency for the world.

He left the door half-open as he strolled through, grinning as he spotted his father sitting at his desk. "Hey," he called.

Phoenix looked up and smiled as he saw the new arrival. "Morning, Apollo. Good weekend?"

Apollo nodded as he crossed the room towards the desk. "Mostly just recovering from the trial." He gave Phoenix a grin. "I should be asking you that. Luke and Truce said you disappeared on another 'secret mission' after we saw off the Bostonius."
Grinning back, Phoenix shrugged. He didn't reply.

Apollo waited fruitlessly. Sighing, he decided to put that particular question to the side for now; He had something else he was planning to talk about anyway. Leaning on the desk, he cast a furtive glance to the kitchen door on his right. "Where's Trucy?" he asked under his breath. He didn't need to ask about Luke; After a week off from the shelter, he would now be repaying Fox's favour by working there a solid week himself, and wouldn't be returning to the office until the following Tuesday.

"In her room," Phoenix replied, his grin disappearing. "Why?"

Apollo thought a moment, then walked over to close the kitchen and reception doors, closing himself and his father in. "I have something to tell you... related to your secret mission."

Phoenix's eyebrows shot up. "Oh?"

"Oh," Apollo repeated with a nod, dashing back to the desk. "I had a talk to Valant before he skipped town."

At that, Phoenix's eyebrows curled down into a frown, eyes narrowing. "I see. What about?"

Apollo opened his mouth to reply, then paused and closed it again. How best to put this? "A few things," he admitted, his gaze turning to the window. "Luke has another lead for his mom, but I'll let him explain that... And..." He paused again, avoiding his father's eyes guiltily. "I... asked him about my birth father."

Although Apollo half-expected Phoenix to be upset, his voice sounded warm when he spoke, and one of his hands rested on Apollo's where it pressed against the desk. "Do you want to talk about it?"

Apollo smiled, a wave of relief washing over him. "He didn't say much. They didn't know each other very well... but," he looked up, meeting his father's eyes with a grin, "apparently it was 'Reylu' that was the stage name, not 'Justice'. We had it the wrong way round this whole time."

Phoenix slowly smiled, then chuckled. "So you were right all along. I did always wonder."

Laughing, Apollo nodded in agreement. "He was telling me how Mom left Troupe Gramarye to marry him, wearing two bracelets, then showed back up a year later with only one. Just like we thought." His grin then faded, eyes drifting down to the desk. "He'd recognised who I was the night of the concert, when Trucy and I ran into him backstage. Mom, too. He wished us luck helping her regain her memory."

Phoenix's hand gave his a comforting squeeze. "He's smarter than he looks, that Valant."

Apollo smiled at that, but it was quick to die. "He told me about Magnifi, too."

He couldn't see his expression, but Apollo knew Phoenix's eyes had narrowed again at that. His grip on Apollo's hand was frozen, tightly clutching his son's fingers as he listened intently to whatever he would say next.

"He..." Apollo took a deep breath to steady himself, then looked up to meet his father's eyes. "Valant didn't kill him."

Phoenix didn't immediately react, still staring at his son. "He what."

"He didn't kill him," Apollo repeated, gaining confidence. "He didn't elaborate, but he didn't kill Magnifi. He wasn't lying."

"I see." Phoenix withdrew his hand from Apollo's, his chair spinning to face the window. His voice was clipped, dangerous. "Did you tell him his former partner said that too?"

Apollo bit his lip; He should have guessed his father would take this personally. "I did. Like I said, he didn't exactly elaborate."

Phoenix didn't reply, staring off into space. A hand curled around his chin.

"I know this is hard to take, Dad," Apollo said. "I promise you he wasn't lying."

"So you believe him," Phoenix replied, still glaring out the window. "You think Zak did it."

Apollo couldn't help but be thrown at the accusation; As much as he thought his sister's birth father was a jerk, he would hate to label someone Trucy loved and admired so much a murderer. "It's not like Zak is the only other option, Dad."

Phoenix glanced in Apollo's direction, an eyebrow raised. "What on earth are you talking about? Two pistols, two shots... he ordered them to shoot him. No-one else was ever there."

"Dad, you're forgetting someone," Apollo pointed out, a smile dancing at his lips. "Magnifi was there too. You proved in court that Valant altered the scene..." He paused, shrugging. "Well, sort of. Who's to say Magnifi didn't kill himself?"

Phoenix didn't reply.

Apollo sighed, pushing himself off the desk. 'Fine. Don't believe me.' "Whatever. I've told you what he said. Your turn."

At that, Phoenix finally reacted, turning to look up at his son. "My turn for what?"

"You were away most of last week on your 'secret mission'," Apollo reminded him. "You said you'd tell me about it."

Phoenix finally smiled, resting his interlocked hands on top of his beanie. "So I did," he agreed. "Later."

Now it was Apollo's turn to narrow his eyes. "You keep saying that. It's been a week, isn't it 'later' enough?"

The smile grew into a grin. "Not yet."

"Dad."

"You'll see," Phoenix insisted, giving his son a wink.

Apollo crossed his arms, glaring back. "Is this because you don't believe me about Valant?"

Phoenix's grin died, and he lowered his hands from the top of his head. "Of course not. Honestly, you brought up a good point; I never considered it might be suicide."

"Mmm." Apollo looked away, unconvinced.

Phoenix sighed. "Please, Apollo. I promise I have a reason for keeping this to myself for now. Trust me."
Apollo waited a few moments before meeting his father's eyes again, trying to stay calm. "You promised me, six years ago now, that I could help you. That you'd include me in your investigation.
You obviously didn't want to, you've never wanted to, but you let me in, you let me help." He paused to take a breath, taking a small amount of pleasure from the guilty wince on Phoenix's face.
"Why are you cutting me out of this, Dad?"

Phoenix stared back at Apollo with a sad frown, waiting a few seconds to quietly and calmly say,
"Apollo, in this case I have my reasons. Please, trust me; I'm not excluding you on a whim."

Apollo didn't reply. After a long while silently watching his father, he turned and left in the direction of the kitchen. He didn't bother looking back.

Although Trucy hadn't taken long to drag Apollo back into the office, he refused to interact with Phoenix again after their disagreement, following Trucy around on her various little time-filling projects: designing sewing patterns for clothes and cute plush toys, then actually sewing them; practising magic tricks both old and new; watching TV; even planning a locked-room murder mystery for some reason (Apollo could only suspect their recent case had intrigued her). Phoenix left them alone, and, although Trucy quickly noticed the friction between them, she ignored it, allowing Apollo to stew at their father without comment.

"I'm hungry," Trucy announced, not long after midday. "Wanna make lunch, Polly?"

Apollo sighed, pulling himself to his feet. "May as well."

Phoenix rose from his desk, tugging his beanie firmly on his head. "Well, it looks about time for me to head out. Have fun, you two."

Trucy and Apollo watched in confusion as their father moved to leave, Apollo surprised enough to forget he was supposed to be not-talking to Phoenix. "Where are you going?"

"Out," Phoenix replied, giving the pair a grin that infuriated Apollo all over again. "Can't tell you where; It's a secret."

"Again?" Trucy asked, nonplussed.

Apollo groaned. "Dad..."

"See you later!" Phoenix cheerfully told them, and dashed out of the apartment before either could stop him.

Suspicious Minds

Dad's not telling me anything. The way he was smiling at us, I get the feeling this particular secret mission specifically centers on us... and he's just left the office. I'd keep an eye out if I were you

July 13, 12:30PM
Warren St Animal Shelter
Recuporation Room

Luke bit his lip as he read the message on his phone, free hand in the pocket of his labcoat. Truthfully, he'd almost forgotten about Phoenix's odd behaviour on Saturday, once Luke had returned Trucy and Phoenix to the agency after seeing off the Bostonius.

"I'll be back in a few hours, don't worry; I'm just seeing to another facet of my 'secret mission'. You'll never even notice I was gone."

Out of obligation to his sister, Luke had stayed with her a little longer, texting Apollo for help. When Apollo told them to not worry, Luke was happy to listen and put the entire issue out of his mind, distracting Trucy for a few hours before returning to his own apartment. However, the tables had turned since then, with Apollo all-but-outright telling Luke to worry; What now?

He dashed out the door, only briefly checking his ID card was still in his chest pocket, and pushed through the double doors into reception. As always on weekdays, Simba was sat at the desk, her shawl loosely wrapped around her neck as it had been ever since the previous December. She looked up as Luke came in, raising an inquisitive eyebrow.

"Simba, if a man in a grey hoodie and cyan beanie comes in, could you let me know?" Luke asked.

The young woman wrinkled her nose. "Um, sure?"

"Thank you." Luke ducked back into the vets' rooms.

The day progressed slowly, and Luke's nervousness over what Phoenix might be planning grew. He found himself taking every chance to walk past reception, asking Simba, "Has a man in a hoodie and beanie come in at all?"

Every time, Simba would sigh and reply, "No-one's here, Northpaw." As the question was repeated over the next three hours, she began to obviously count off on her fingers, then finally just shot Luke a glare and shouted, "If you keep asking me that, I'll lock you in the surgery!"

Even though Luke knew she hadn't the slightest capability to do so, he decided to heed her warning.

Dad's back. He looks really pleased with himself too. Was he at the shelter?

No, he never came by here. I actually got Simba mad at me for asking so often. Where did he go, then?
Just as Luke was reading Apollo's reply, Duck came in to the vets rooms, frowning in confusion. "Northpaw... apparently you have something urgent on tomorrow and Wednesday?"

Luke blinked. "Um... not to my knowledge."

"It's just, Fox is insisting she's working those days because you have an urgent family thing," Duck explained, scratching his head. "Seemed very cheerful about it. I told her I'd make a note of it but... You don't know what she's talking about?"

Luke stared, then sighed.

I figured out where Papa went. He's been talking to Fox: Something about an 'urgent family thing' we're doing tomorrow and Wednesday.

What!? Hang on I'll ask him

Dad refuses to admit anything!! Just says we'll find out tomorrow! And something about Pearly's birthday but I'm 100% certain that's a red herring

Her birthday is on Wednesday, though.

Guess that's true
Sigh Dad must have planned us a trip to Kurain. I can't complain I guess, I just don't know why he's making such a big deal of it.

Yeah, it's strange he's going to so much trouble behind our backs. After last week, it'll be nice to see Maya and Pearl again.

True. I've warned Trucy, so we'll be prepared. Don't forget to act surprised, I'm sure Dad would love that Haha, yeah, he would! I'll see you tomorrow at the agency then, all ready to go.

Even as he sent off his final text, Luke couldn't stifle a niggling thought at the back of his mind: If Phoenix was planning a simple trip to Kurain for Pearl's birthday... why had Fox been so excited to help him?

That evening, as Luke walked in his front door, he immediately set about locating his roommate. Fox wasn't hard to find, holed up in her room dancing to JPop. When Luke knocked on her open door, she jumped in surprise, silencing her music with an embarrassed smile. "Hey, Northpaw. Didn't hear you come home."

Luke flashed her a smile back, then crossed his arms with a stern frown. "My father came to visit you today."

Fox stared in surprise for a moment, then shrugged, running a hand through her red hair with a wide grin. "How’d you know?"

"I figured it out," Luke simply said in reply. "What did he tell you?"

Laughing, Fox dropped into the chair at her desk, where she quickly busied herself plugging a set of earbuds into her computer. "That he had a surprise and I'm not going to ruin it for you."

Luke resisted the urge to roll his eyes. "We already worked out he's trying to surprise us with a trip into the mountains for our cousin's birthday."

"Oh, really?" Fox asked, shooting him a surprised look. She then shrugged again and turned to her computer, popping the buds into her ears. "Well, why are you asking me if you already know what he told me?"

As much as he would have liked to respond, Luke wasn't sure how he could answer that question, despite Fox's careful refusal to make eye contact. After a moment of thought, he turned and headed into his room. Maybe he was over-thinking it.

Luke! Daddy's taking us to see Mommy and Pearly to tell them about Mommy and Machi!

Yes, I thought that might be the reason. We only just saw Maya and Pearl a week ago, after all.

You already knew!? :(

I guessed, that's all. Have you asked Papa about it?

Polly spoke to Aderyn, and Daddy's excused us for tomorrow night, but I'm pretending I don't know yet. We gotta be surprised for Daddy's surprise remember!

I remember. :) I'm packing my overnight bag right now. I'll see you tomorrow, okay?

Yup see you tomorrow! Good night Luke!

Good night, Trucy.

The next morning, Luke grabbed his overnight bag, his satchel, and his hat, then ventured out of his room. Fox was in the kitchen as he passed, and she gave him a cheerful wave, sipping her coffee with one hand while the other ran a brush through her hair, all dressed up for a day at work.

"Heading out, Northpaw?"

Luke nodded, shooting her a smile. "I'll see you Wednesday night then. Don't blow anything up while I'm gone."

Fox laughed at the joke. Luke headed on and was already at the front door when she called a reply: "Have fun in Kurain! Take your time coming back tomorrow!"

He was halfway to the agency before Luke realised he'd never told Fox where in the mountains they were going.

At the office, the electricity in the air was almost palpable. Everyone knew what Phoenix had in store, yet he refused to formally share it, wandering around the apartment with a secretive grin on his face. Apollo stubbornly did not confront Phoenix on this, still fuming over whatever failed attempts he'd made the previous day to make their father talk, while Trucy, in stark contrast to her brother, kept silent quite gleefully, stifling giggles of excitement as she waited for the announcement they knew was coming. Luke simply sat back and watched everyone else in bemusement, wondering how they got into such a contrived state of constant tension, be it anxious or excited; He was certain Phoenix knew that the kids knew about the upcoming 'trip', so why was he deliberately leaving them to stew? How long would they have to wait?

By mid-afternoon, Apollo, Luke, and Trucy were lounging together on one of the sofas, idly watching the television and alternating between mocking commercials and mocking the programmes. Trucy was in charge of the remote, flicking through channels in an attempt to find something even vaguely interesting rather than just boring or annoying, while Luke and Apollo laughed at the snippets of voices her scrolling created.

"I just feel-"

"-kind and gentle-"

"-you mean, Martha?-"

"-tipping cows-"

"-Serenade is set to top the charts for weeks to come..."

It was then that Phoenix emerged from the kitchen, beanie on his head and a grin on his lips, and stood right in front of the trio, immediately demanding their attention. Trucy quickly turned the TV off.

"So I'm sure you're all wondering why I've called you here today," Phoenix said.

"No we're not," Apollo muttered.

"You bet we are!" Trucy cheerfully insisted.

"You didn't even call us here, you conned Luke out of two days of work and Trucy and I have nowhere else to be anyway."

"We've been pondering over your message all day! It was so intriguing, we just had to know what it meant!"

Phoenix chuckled, looking between Apollo's glare, Trucy's bright grin, and Luke's neutral gaze. "Ah, well, I guess I'd better come clean: I've arranged for you three to go up to Kurain to see your mother and cousin overnight."

Apollo rolled his eyes. "Friggin' finally."

Trucy gave a loud gasp. "Wow, really? That's so surprising!" She turned to the younger of her brothers. "Isn't that surprising, Luke?"

Feeling like he had no other choice, Luke reluctantly nodded. "Yes, it's very surprising."

"It's just so surprising!" Trucy continued. "I'll need to put together a bag of things for tonight! I won't take a second, Daddy!" With that, she sprang to her feet and dashed through the kitchen door.
"We've had them prepared since yesterday," Apollo said, and pointed across at the opposite sofa, where his own brown backpack was sat. "Mine's been sitting over there all day."

Luke nervously got to his feet. "I'll get mine from my car, then."

As he shuffled to the front door, Luke heard Apollo once more round on Phoenix: "Wait, did you just say 'you three'? You're not coming with us?"

"I have something else on, regretfully," Phoenix replied. "Maya understands; She and Pearls are only expecting you three."

Somehow, Luke knew that knowing smile that so infuriated Apollo had not once left Phoenix's face.

On the train, speeding up the mountain, Trucy hugged her duffelbag to her chest. "We need to be careful how we tell Mommy about Mommy, alright?"

Were they not already used to their sister's insistent method of referring to her four parents by the same two names, Apollo and Luke would have been confused by that statement. Even so, Apollo asked, "What do you mean? She'll be happy for us, won't she?"

Trucy stared out the window, the worried frown tightening. "Remember how sad she was after Daddy died and Daddy got arrested? And she got sad because she thought she wasn't our mommy anymore?"

Luke had to think a moment to parse the entire meaning of that question. "You mean when we gave her the locket."

Apollo pulled Trucy into a hug. "Then we'll just have to remind her she's still our mom, won't we? Finding Thalassa Gramarye hasn't changed a thing."

Trucy smiled, giving a small nod as she leaned into the embrace.

A Night in Kurain

July 14, 5:01PM
Kurain Village

The first thing Luke saw as they exited the bus outside Fey Manor was Pearl's grinning face, pulling her cousins into a hug the moment they got within reach. "I'm so glad you're here!" she cried, pulling them away from the bus as it slammed the door shut to move on. "We've been reading about your case in the papers; It looked so exciting!"

Apollo blushed, a hand running through his hair. "Er, yeah, it was... Kinda."

"We're glad to see you too, Pearly!" Trucy proclaimed, hugging her cousin tighter as the bus chugged back down the mountain behind them, venturing out of sight and out of hearing. "Where's Mommy?"

"Mystic Maya is still busy with her Master duties," Pearl told them, a hand fiddling with the bead in her long fringe. "She should be finishing soon."

Luke pressed a hand to his chin. "So that's why Papa waited so late to send us up? So she'd be free when we arrived?"

Pearl nodded, then grinned again, gesturing to the clear road between them and the Manor. "Come on in! We can wait for her inside!"

Maya took a few minutes to finally appear, hurrying into the living room while pulling fistfuls of bobby pins out of the elaborate hairstyle perched on her head. "There you are!" she cried, greeting the trio with a grin and racing to give them all a hug and a kiss from where they were seated on their cushions around the low table (the same one that would be set up as a kotatsu in winter; In summer, it was too hot to need it, so the blanket and heater were removed). "Sorry I took so long; Those Elders really like to prattle on sometimes."

"It's okay, Mom," Apollo assured her as she kissed his forehead. "We know you're really busy."

"Speaking of busy, you three got up to a lot this past week, didn't you?" Maya replied, squeezing Luke's cheeks and making the vet giggle. "Pearly and I were reading the papers!"

Trucy scoffed playfully. "Come on Mommy, you know the papers never have the full story!"

Maya laughed, sitting down on the side of the table opposite Luke; Apollo and Trucy were on her left and Pearl on her right. "Then I guess you'd better fill us in, huh?" she told Trucy, the pins emerging from her rapidly-deflating hair forming a pile on the wooden surface in front of her. "What's with this whole business about killing to a song?"

"Yes, that part confused me too," Pearl agreed, chewing a thumbnail.

Luke's gaze turned to his siblings: Similarly, Trucy was also staring up at Apollo, who was sitting, arms crossed, with his eyes boring a hole in the table. He sighed, and his eyes closed. "It's a long story."
"We've got plenty of time," Maya pointed out, gesturing to the empty room around them. "You guys aren't returning to the city until tomorrow."

The Wrights did not react, Luke and Trucy still waiting for their older brother to take the lead while Apollo sat silent and still on his cushion.

Maya and Pearl shared a worried look. "This was a rough one, huh?" Maya asked, pulling a final pin that left her hair billowing out in parallel waves down her back. "I can understand that, believe me." She reached out a hand towards Apollo, resting it on the table between them as she waited for him to take it. "Nick said you guys needed the break."

At that, the trio all looked up at her in surprise. "Papa said that?" Luke asked.

Maya nodded. "That's one of the reasons we rushed to get you up here today."

"That and my birthday tomorrow," Pearl added with a smile, which quickly died. "It's just a shame Mister Nick couldn't be here."

"He's just as busy with his own thing," Maya explained, a grin on her face that Luke couldn't help but think was a carbon copy of Phoenix's own grin as he'd sent them off from the agency earlier that afternoon.

Apollo sighed, leaning forward until his forehead rested on the table. "Don't tell me..."

"You know what Daddy's secret mission is!?!" Trucy asked, amazed.

Luke was frowning in thought, a hand at his chin. "Is he planning something else...?"

Maya winked. "Now now, don't waste time asking me things... What about this trial of yours? Pearly and me still want to hear all about it!"

"O-oh, uh," Trucy muttered, her hands fiddling with her brooch as she worriedly returned her gaze to Apollo, who was still face-down on the table. Luke half-wondered if he should lean over and give his brother a shove back into action; He didn't feel at all comfortable being left with having to explain everything to Maya. Maya herself had certainly picked up something was wrong, her smile looking increasingly forced; Pearly was similarly worried, chewing a thumbnail as her eyes flitted between her cousins nervously.

After a short pause, Apollo pushed himself off the table, taking a deep breath and letting it all out in a long sigh. "Mom... you know you're our mom, right? And nothing will change that?"

Maya's smile finally dropped from her face. "Of course, kiddo. What's this all about?"

Apollo thought a moment, then got up from his cushion, moving around the corner of the table to sit at Maya's left. "I... we just need to make sure you know that," he said. "It's very important."

Trucy's bottom lip began to quiver, and she jumped to her feet to imitate Apollo, running to Maya's right. "You won't leave us, will you, Mommy!?"

Maya looked slightly alarmed as she pulled Trucy into a hug, drying the teen's tears before they could get very far. "I'd never do that! Why do you think I would ever want to leave you?" When Trucy didn't respond, she turned to Apollo, giving him a quizzical frown.

Apollo took a deep breath. "We found Thalassa Gramarye."
Maya froze. Nearby, Pearl gasped, slapping a hand to her mouth in shock.

"Apparently there was... an accident, when she left Troupe Gramarye," Apollo continued. "She lost her memory, her sight... She woke up in Borginia, working in a restaurant as a singer, and kept doing it because she loved performing for a crowd."

"You mean Lamiroir!?" Pearl realised, watching Apollo with wide eyes. "She's...?"

Apollo gave Pearl a brief nod, but otherwise kept his attention on Maya, who was still staring back at him in shock, Trucy held tight in her arms. "We recognised her the night of the concert because she still wears her bracelet. She doesn't remember us, or anything about her old life."

Maya looked close to tears herself as she continued her stare up at Apollo. "Oh, you poor babies..." She finally broke her stare to turn to Trucy, hugging her tighter with one arm while the other reached up to Apollo, pulling him down to her level. "All that searching you did and she doesn't remember you?"

Apollo sniffed, hugging Maya back. "I just thought it was important to tell you that bit first, Mom."

Trucy was shaking, her hat having fallen to the floor. "We love you, Mommy..."

Maya laughed, though tears were also streaming down her face. "No wonder Nick thought you needed a break... This has been a rough week for you, hasn't it?"

As the three of them descended into sniffling laughter, Luke turned his attention to Pearl: The teen was perched on her cushion, teary eyes wide as she watched the scene before them, hands pressed to her face. Luke couldn't help a smile, recognising she needed comfort in this moment just as much as Maya did. He shifted around the corner of the table towards her, and Pearl started as she noticed the movement out of the corner of her eyes, watching him quizzically as the young man settled at her side. Luke simply held out an arm, and, without having to exchange a word, Pearl smiled gratefully, leaning into the offered hug.

The Wrights told the story of the past week over the hours following their arrival, taking their time in sharing every detail of their experiences. Apollo took the lead, though he gracefully allowed Trucy and Luke to interrupt with their own viewpoints whenever the need struck them. They told Maya and Pearl about the concert, leaving Emmy and Flora outside the Coliseum, their 'seats' up in the re-purposed lighting box, and the first act that Trucy adored and Apollo tolerated (Luke kept carefully neutral).

"And when they finally stopped playing," Apollo explained, "Trucy decided we should go down and meet them before the second act started."

Trucy stuck her tongue out at Apollo, making Pearl giggle.

Apollo ignored his sister with a roll of his eyes. "And, while we were down there... That's when we met Lamiroir and Machi."

Pearl blinked, confused. "'Maki'?"

Luke nodded, looking between the bemused Feys with a raised eyebrow. "Didn't you say you've been reading the papers? Machi Tobaye, Lamiroir's pianist."

Maya shrieked in shock, jumping in her seat. "Machi is Lamiroir's pianist!?"
"We thought his name was 'Matchy'," Pearl explained, chewing a thumbnail as she glanced away.

Trucy snorted, hiding giggles. "M... Matchy!?

Apollo was watching Maya suspiciously. "You've... heard Machi's name before?"

Maya turned red as all attention turned to her. "Oh, uh..." She forced a smile, waving a hand casually. "Nick said it in passing while we were planning to get you guys up here. I... assumed he was a friend of yours or something."

Apollo's eyes narrowed, but Maya appeared to be telling the truth. He decided to leave it.

"Well, Lamiroir adopted him, so he is our new brother," Trucy replied, arms crossed in thought. "Technically."

"Not that he knows that," Apollo sighed, shaking his head and turning his gaze to the table. "And who knows how long it will be until we see him again... At least we know Lamiroir's coming back to see us anyway, with or without her memories."

There was a long moment of silence. Maya's smile fell off her face awkwardly.

"But, after meeting them," Luke picked up, reaching for his satchel, "then we got to watch the Guitar's Serenade."

"Oh yeah!" Trucy cried, her enthusiasm returning. "That was amazing!"

Pearl pressed her hands to her cheeks with a smile. "Aw, I wish we could have seen it!"

Luke giggled, pulling his laptop out and resting it on the table. "Give me a moment and you will," he promised, giving the Feys a wink.

As the attention of the room turned to Luke's laptop, Apollo cast another suspicious glance at Maya. He said nothing.

The Real Surprise

July 15, 1:25PM
Kurain Village

It had been a very relaxing evening and morning in Fey Manor. The Wrights and Feys had stayed up late, chatting about the trial, Lamiroir, Machi, and the departure of the Bostonius, and ended up cuddling in a large pile in the living room as they fell asleep. As they awoke the next morning, all discussion of the past week was ended, the family instead relaxing and focusing their attentions on the happy celebration of Pearl's sixteenth birthday.

After lunch, the Wrights reluctantly packed up their few belongings and went out to the bus stop. Pearl announced when she spotted the white metal of the large vehicle approaching around the buildings at the edge of the village, and Maya immediately turned to hugging the trio tight. "You three be good, okay?"

"We promise, Mommy," Trucy replied, pressing her cheek to her mother's.

"We'll keep you updated, Mom," Apollo added, leaning down to hug the shorter woman.

Pearl ran around to give her own farewell hugs, while Maya moved on to Luke with a cheeky grin, telling him, "Say hi to the rest of your family for me, too? And stay out of trouble."

Luke snorted as he also leaned down to hug her. "Shouldn't we be saying that to you, Maya?"

Maya scoffed, pinching Luke's nose as the young man giggled.

The five didn't stop waving to each other until the bus, and Kurain, were long out of sight.

Trucy lead the way back into the agency that afternoon, dumping her bag on the nearest of the sofas as she strolled past. "Daddy, we're-!" She cut herself off, her gaze frozen on the piano: Normally, a red cloth rested on the keyboard lid, with several of Apollo and Trucy's older and currently unused props arranged across it. Right now, all of that was gone, moved across to Phoenix's desk, and the lid had been left open, exposing the little-used white and black keys of the piano for all to see.

Apollo and Luke filed in behind their sister, also noticing the odd sight with surprise. "Was Dad... practising?" Apollo mumbled, placing his bag by his sister's.

Trucy huffed, and stomped off towards the kitchen. "Daddy! You know we get complaints when you-!" The moment she stepped through the door, she again cut herself off, but this time with a quick shriek. Apollo and Luke shared a confused glance before running after her, only to freeze themselves.

Phoenix was sat at the kitchen table, an array of papers and his mobile phone before him. Across from his chair, perched on the edge of his seat with his hands clutched tightly in his lap around a phone of his own, was Machi Tobaye, staring back at the trio with wide, baby-blue eyes.

"Ah, you're back," Phoenix said with a lazy grin. "Sorry about the piano; We're going to have to rearrange your little display, I'm afraid."
Trucy had her hands pressed tight to her mouth, suppressing her earlier shout. She turned to look up at Apollo, speechless; Apollo could only stare at the boy, unable to form any words despite the movement of his mouth.

Finally, Luke let out a nervous laugh, stepping forward towards him. "Machi! This is a surprise... What are you doing here?"

Machi opened his mouth, but then sealed it shut again, staring at his lap.

"He went to Juvenile Court on Saturday," Phoenix explained, leaning back in his chair. "They sentenced him to a year's probation."

"Congratulations, Machi!" Luke told the boy with a proud smile. "That's great news!"

"Since Lamiroir is leaving the country for a few months," Phoenix continued, "he was going to have to go to a foster home to await her return; I figured, well," he shrugged, "we've got an empty bedroom now you boys have moved out, so I had a talk with some old friends and with Lamiroir and offered it to Machi." He fixed Apollo and Trucy with a wide grin. "I didn't think you'd mind."

Apollo narrowed his eyes at Phoenix. "So that's what you were doing on Saturday..."

Trucy emitted an ear-piercing squeal, running to Machi's side to pull the surprised teen into a hug. "Machi, this is wonderful! We'll get to spend so much time together-" she paused to gasp, "-Oh! I can show you around the city! It's your new home after all, and I bet you didn't get to see much of it before the concert, huh?" She squealed again, hugging Machi tighter. "You're gonna love it here!"

"Thank you," Machi muttered, a vaguely confused smile on his face at the rapid stream of speech above him, despite the strong grip of the girl's arms around his head and shoulders.

As Trucy continued to excitedly tell Machi all about his future in the Wright household, Apollo turned to Phoenix with a glare, arms crossed. "Mom knew about this, didn't she?" he asked. "Mom Maya, I mean."

Phoenix chuckled at Apollo's quick correction, both of them knowing full well he would have taken advantage of the potential misunderstanding otherwise. "I might have mentioned it to her, yes," he admitted, shoving his hands in the front pockets of his hoodie.

"And you told Fox, didn't you?" Luke added, laughing. "That's why she was so happy about taking more of my shifts so soon!"

Phoenix just grinned, shrugging his shoulders innocently.

"When were you planning to tell us this!?" Apollo asked, indignant.

Suppressing a snort of laughter, Phoenix gestured around the room. "Right now?"

Apollo rolled his eyes as Phoenix and Luke laughed. As upset as he was about Phoenix's unexpected addition to their family... he had to admit, he couldn't really be mad about it. 'So this is what Dad was planning for us... and I got so mad at him about it...’ He turned his gaze to Trucy and Machi, seeing Trucy had calmed down enough that she was trying to engage Machi in conversation, though the boy often could not reply without first consulting his phone, typing words into it (sometimes with Trucy's help); Apollo wondered if it had some kind of Borginian-English dictionary app they were using. Putting the pair aside for now, Apollo turned back to Phoenix. "Um... I guess I should apologise. For Monday."
Phoenix smiled. "You're already forgiven."

Apollo blushed, running a hand through his hair.

"Wow!" Trucy suddenly cried, turning to her brothers and father and waving to attract their attention. "Did you hear that?" she excitedly asked. "Machi turns fifteen in February!"

"Oh, really?" Luke replied with a polite smile. "Maya's birthday is in February too, isn't it?"

Trucy huffed, rolling her eyes. "That's not what I meant." The grin returned to her face. "I turn fifteen in August!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "And?"

"I'm older!" Trucy crowed, and pulled Machi to his feet, engaging him in another hug. To Apollo's surprise, it appeared the boy had lost several centimetres of height now he was out of the heels that were a part of his concert get-up, his eyes being level with Trucy's mouth when before the pair had been equal in height. Still grinning, Trucy began to stroke Machi's golden bob of hair. "Don't you worry, baby brother," she said. "Your big sister's here to look after you!"

While Phoenix and Luke laughed, Apollo scoffed, walking to his sister's side and tapping her shoulder. "I don't think a difference of less than a year gives you the right to call him a baby," he pointed out, not bothering to hide his smile. "Little brother, maybe, but not 'baby'."

Machi started typing into his phone again.

Still with one arm around Machi, Trucy looked up at her eldest brother with her free hand on her hip. "Well, there's seven years between you and me, and seven years between you and Machi, and you call me a baby."

Apollo had to stare for a moment to even register what his sister was saying, and crossed his arms. "Um, my age has nothing to do with this. And I only call you a baby when you're acting like one."

"Ah! Pikuveli!" Machi cried in understanding, looking up from his phone to give Trucy a blushing smile. "I... not mind be called that. 'Baby brother'."

Trucy's grin got even wider. "Well, there we go!" she announced, turning smugly to Apollo. "Baby brother it is!"

Apollo rolled his eyes, but didn't complain. "I'll stick to 'little brother'," he said, then patted Machi's head, giving the boy a grin. "Welcome to the family, Machi."

Machi grinned. "Th-thank you... isoveli."

"Um...?" Apollo raised an eyebrow at the unfamiliar word, but decided to just accept it with a smile.

"So, Machi was sentenced to 'probation'?" Luke asked, a hand on his chin as he looked between Phoenix and Apollo. "What exactly does that mean?"

Phoenix smiled. "Nothing much," he said. "The term is 'released home'; He just has to be in this apartment by seven PM every night, and I'll take him to visit his probation officer every month."

"What!?" Trucy cried, offended. "So he won't get to come see our show!?"

Laughing, Phoenix shook his head. "Sorry, Trucy. No can do."
"That's not fair," Trucy muttered, hugging Machi tighter in silent apology.

Apollo's eyes were on the papers littering the table. "And you're going to school here, Machi?"

Machi thought a moment, then nodded. "Yes. We are... in middle. Of plan."

Trucy leaned over, dragging Machi a little with her arm over his shoulders, and gasped as she looked over the papers. "Wait, that's my school!" She turned to Machi with a wide grin. "You're going to my school!?"

Phoenix laughed. "He is indeed. There wasn't any reason for him to be going elsewhere, after all."

Trucy squealed, hugging Machi. "This is going to be so amazing! When school starts back, I'll show you around and introduce you to my friends! They'll love you!"

Machi blushed. "Thank you. I hope be better in English then."

"We'll help you practise," Luke promised. "I'm sure you'll be perfectly fluent by September!"

"I'm signing him up for ESL classes anyway," Phoenix said. "Just in case." He shot Machi a smile.

"So you're in Luke's and my old room, huh?" Apollo asked Machi. "Settling in okay?"

Machi had to consult his phone before he answered. "Yes, Isa bought clothes for me."

"Isa?" Trucy asked.

"That's me," Phoenix replied, shrugging. "He just asked to call me that yesterday."

Machi blushed, clenching his phone tight.

Apollo hid a laugh; He'd suddenly remembered the day he'd moved in and been immediately dragged off clothes-shopping to get him out of his school uniform. "Well, I'll help you set everything up if you need to. This is going to be your home for the foreseeable future; Might as well make it comfortable."

"Ooh, yeah!" Trucy agreed, pulling Machi towards the stairs. "Let's get your room feeling like home!"

Phoenix and Luke watched as Trucy dragged Machi upstairs, giggling madly, and Apollo laughed as he followed. Phoenix turned to Luke with a smile. "I think they're going to be okay."

Luke nodded in agreement.
Machi still wasn't sure what to think of this enigmatic Phoenix Wright.

On the day of his trial in Juvenile Court, his new lawyer took him out to meet Lamiroir and found Phoenix there with her. "This is Mister Wright; He's offered to look after you while I'm away," Lamiroir told Machi in their native Borginian. "He's the father of Apollo and Luke, the men who were defending you in the other trial."

"I know; He came to see us," Machi quietly replied, casting nervous glances at the man in the hoodie watching them with a friendly smile. "But... why does he want to look after me?"

Lamiroir laughed. "He told me he has an empty room from when his sons moved out and wished to fill it," she explained. "I understand his daughter Trucy still lives there, however. She's about the same age as you, and I think you'd get along well."

Machi did not reply. He remembered seeing Trucy a few times: At Apollo's side on the night of the concert, and later in the detention centre when she and Luke stood up to Daryan. They'd never spoken, but Lamiroir had nothing but warm words to say about the girl, and the sister of the Apollo and Luke Machi knew couldn't be all that bad.

"You don't have to accept if you don't want to," Lamiroir assured him. "A home with people you know might be more agreeable than one with strangers, but if you don't feel comfortable with them you can choose somewhere else. It's entirely up to you."

Machi gave Phoenix one last wary glance. The man had a friendly smile. When he'd dropped by during the earlier trial, Apollo and Luke had been glad to see him and accept his help, even if Apollo was annoyed about said help's crypticness. The father of the Apollo and Luke he knew couldn't be all that bad, either. Besides, as Lamiroir had barely avoided saying, there was less risk to a home with people he knew... and he would very much like the chance to get to know Apollo in particular better than he already did.

Machi accepted the offer.

It took a few days for the paperwork to go through, with Machi staying in a foster home in the meantime. With his still-hesitant grasp of English, he had been relieved when the young couple caring for him didn't try too hard to connect. Lamiroir came to visit him every day with his new probation officer, Pru Bateson, talking to Machi about the progress of the application to move his approved address to the Wrights' home, and of Lamiroir's plans for her upcoming trip to England; Lamiroir also helped Machi practise his English, though he would have preferred not to. He didn't have very many belongings, but what little Machi did own (most of which he'd brought with him from Borginia) he kept packed away in his bag. When the day finally came that it was all to go down, Pru and Lamiroir came to pick Machi up in the middle of the day, they bid his foster parents goodbye, and drove to the airport, where Phoenix was waiting for them.

Phoenix greeted Lamiroir and Machi with a grin and a cheery "Good afternoon."
"Hello again, Mister Wright," Lamiroir replied in English. "You are here to give me goodbyes too?"

"You've seen right through me, ma'am," Phoenix laughed. "My kids would kill me if I didn't see you safely off." He then turned to Machi. "Everything's all ready for you back home, Machi. And thank you again for accepting my offer."

Machi didn't reply, clinging tighter to Lamiroir's hand.

Pru guided the blind woman to a designated carer for her flight, and she was quickly checked in. They walked together to the security gate, which Lamiroir as both blind and a celebrity was permitted to be fast-tracked through, but she asked to stop before heading on. "I must say goodbye to you here," she explained to Pru and Phoenix, her hand still holding Machi's. "Ms Bateson, my thanks for your kindness since Machi's trial. I trust you will keep him out of any further trouble."

Pru grinned, tipping a non-existent hat. "It was my pleasure, Lamiroir. And don't you worry about little Machi; It's my job to keep kids out of trouble, and I'm pretty good at it if I do say so myself."

Lamiroir smiled, then turned to Phoenix. "Mister Wright, the level of kindness we have received from your family was already astonishing even before your generous offer. I don't think I can ever repay you for everything you have done."

Phoenix chuckled, shaking his head. "Please, my sons did all the hard work. You can repay us by going ahead with this operation."

Although Lamiroir softly laughed in return, Machi felt her grip on his hand tighten. "And... you will look after Machi?"

"Like he was one of mine," Phoenix replied, a hand over his heart. He gave Machi a warm smile that seemed to be hiding so much more meaning behind that thin layer of stubble, even if Machi couldn't decipher it. "We'll all be waiting for your return."

"Thank you again," Lamiroir softly replied, looking relieved. Finally, she turned to Machi, kneeling down a little to match his shorter height and placing her hands on the boy's cheeks. In Borginian, she said, "Machi, you will be good for Mister Wright, won't you?"

Machi nodded, blinking back tears as he held her hands in his. "I will. I promise. And you'll come back with stories of England, won't you?"

"And hopefully my sight and my past, if all goes well," Lamiroir added with a smile that looked excited despite her sadness. "I will be back the moment my quest is over." She took in a deep breath. "I will miss you terribly... pokani."

Machi could not stop the water trickling from his eyes when he heard that word. "I-I will miss you too, Aska," he sniffed.

Lamiroir kissed her adoptive son on the forehead, then turned and reached out for her guide. Once the man handed her his arm, they walked off to the security gate and were soon out of both sight and reach.

Machi silently wiped the flowing tears from his eyes as he watched. When he felt a hand on his shoulder, he didn't need to look to know it was Phoenix.

Somehow, Machi and Phoenix ended up hand-in-hand as they left the airport; Machi had slipped back into his blind act a little, his mind consumed with thoughts of Lamiroir, and the familiar feeling of a guiding hand in his helped comfort him enough to at least stop the embarrassing crying. There would be no safety net of a Borginian translator anymore... Machi's existing grasp of English would have to be enough.

He missed Borginia more than ever.

Pru showed the pair to her car, having offered to drive them to Machi's new address. Although Machi expected to see Phoenix get in the front with Pru, like Lamiroir had, he instead asked to sit in the back, still watching Machi with that enigmatic smile. Machi kept his gaze out the window instead, watching the passing scenery as the airport, and Lamiroir, fell further and further behind them.

"Are you okay, Machi?"

Machi turned, seeing Phoenix's concerned gaze. "I okay," he insisted. "Th-thank you... for offer."

Phoenix grinned. "It's no trouble at all," he replied, then chuckled. "In fact, my kids are out of the apartment for the night, so you'll have some time to settle in on your own before they come back and throw everything into chaos. I haven't told them you're moving in."

Machi had to run the words over in his head a few times before he could put together the gist of it; Apollo and Luke didn't know he was seeing them again so soon?

"Ah, that reminds me," Phoenix said, reaching into a pocket. "I acquired a little something for you; Should help you get settled." To Machi's surprise, he promptly produced a small mobile phone, holding it out towards the boy with a grin. "Welcome to the family."

Machi's eyes flicked up and down between the phone and Phoenix several times before he felt confident enough to reach out and take it. "This... mine?"

"Yours," Phoenix confirmed with a nod. "And there's an app I got for you..." He leaned over, reaching out to tap on the phone screen. As Machi watched with wide eyes, he opened a program, a familiar Borginian keyboard on screen with two windows to type into and a gear-shaped button to one side. "A translator. Borginian to English, English to Borginian... probably a few other languages too." He straightened back up in his seat with a grin. "If you're stuck on a word, that should be able to help you."

Again, Machi had to run Phoenix's explanation through his head a few times, but he could already guess the purpose of the program just by looking at it. Regardless, he tested it out by typing 'talus' into the window; Promptly, the program filled the second window with the less familiar words 'hello' and 'goodbye'. Machi felt a grin spreading across his face, and he met Phoenix's expectant gaze, feeling like he was about to cry again. "Thank you, Mister Wright..."

Phoenix chuckled, pleased. "You can call me Nick if you want; It's much easier to say."

Machi nodded, turning back to his phone. A thought came to mind, a thought he suspected he would never have had were it not for the so-recent scar of Lamiroir's goodbye, and the still-burning question of Apollo's final words to him hanging over his head. "Nick?"

"What is it, Machi?"

"Is okay if... I call you 'Isa'?"

Machi hadn't had the courage to meet Phoenix's eyes, but he could hear the confusion in the man's voice regardless: "Esah? Is that a Borginian word?"

"Isa," Machi corrected, clutching his new phone tight. "Yes."

Phoenix mused on this for a moment. "May I ask what it means?"

Machi resisted the urge to fidget. If Phoenix insisted on knowing that particular embarrassing fact, he'd prefer to withdraw the question entirely.

In the end, the boy's silence said it all. "Alright, you don't have to explain," Phoenix agreed, and Machi warily looked up to meet the man's smiling eyes. "Yes, you can call me that if you want to."

"Th-thank you, Isa," Machi sighed, smiling in relief.

Pru saw them off outside, and Phoenix walked Machi up the stairs and through the door at the top, which was labelled 'Wright Anything Agency'; Machi was quick to type those words into his phone to learn their meaning. "This your... work?" he asked.

Phoenix nodded, waving Machi through into the door beyond with a grin. "Has been for ten years now," he explained. "The 'home' is upstairs and beyond this wall," he knocked on the wall to their right, "and these two rooms are the office."

Machi slowly nodded as he mentally translated, only to gasp as he got a good look at the inner half of the 'office': Aside from the piles of miscellaneous props, the single desk, the two small sofas, and the walls packed with bulging bookshelves... there was a piano. It was an upright, a little dusty, and with more strange props arranged across its closed lid, but the shine of the black paint indicated it was reasonably new, and likely to still be in tune despite the signs of disuse. Instantly Machi's fingers itched to play it. He hadn't touched a piano since the night of the concert, a week ago now, and doubted it had been anything less than years since he'd not touched a keyboard for that long. He couldn't even remember a time before America when he hadn't had a piano to play constantly within reach in his home.

Phoenix's chuckling brought Machi back to earth. "I see you noticed the piano."

Machi blushed.

"It's mine, technically," Phoenix explained with a grin, "though I don't really play it. We get complaints." Laughing to himself, he began to clear the strange collection of items from the piano lid; Machi took advantage of the pause to quickly type Phoenix's more complicated words into his phone. "You, on the other hand, are sure to charm them," Phoenix continued, moving the small display to the desk, next to a bulky computer monitor. The lid now clear, he flipped it open to reveal the array of white and black keys underneath, and gestured to them with a smile. "Did you want to have a go?"

Machi didn't need to type anything into his phone to understand the offer. In moments, he was already sat on the piano stool with a wide grin, his hands on the keys.

"Hey, maybe I could get lessons from you," Phoenix remarked, though Machi could barely hear him over the notes he was coaxing from the disused piano; He could only guess that the man was making some kind of private joke. "I wouldn't have to pretend to be able to play anymore. Although, that might clash with your contract as part of 'Lamiroir', huh? I know all our regular performances are past your curfew, so it's probably for the best."
Machi decided not to comment.

Once Machi had had his fill of music for now, Phoenix showed him through the nearby door into the ‘home’ section of the apartment, from the kitchen and dining area next to the office, to the laundry and backdoor beyond, to the bedrooms and bathroom upstairs. Machi’s new bedroom was next to the master bedroom that was Phoenix’s and opposite from the bathroom across the hallway; Trucy’s room was next door. As they moved around the apartment, Phoenix briefly explained the house rules, that there was no going into bedrooms without asking permission, that the bathroom was to be locked at both doors when it was in use (and so was the downstairs toilet for that matter), and that failure to do household chores would be punished (though he promised Machi there would be no punishments until he was actually put on the chore list); Machi thought they all sounded reasonable enough, though he spent most of his time inputting various words into his phone before he understood what he was being told.

View the Court Record
Eventually, Phoenix left Machi alone in his new bedroom to settle in, telling him to come downstairs when he was ready, so the boy took his time becoming familiar with the sparse room; A single, neatly made bed was pushed against one wall, a short table with a single drawer at its side. A closet stood at the opposite wall, next to a section of wall that was spotted with damage, patches of dark, ripped paint that indicated a lot of somethings had been stuck or taped there. High on the wall nearby was a squat window, the tops of nearby buildings visible beyond. Machi ran to jump up against the white plaster and catch glimpses through the glass, but saw only an alleyway out the back of the apartment, and quickly realised the window’s only purpose was to let in light, lacking any kind of significant view.

As he opened the empty closet to toss in his lone bag, Machi found it hard to imagine this room had once been Apollo and Luke’s. It was so small; How had two adult men ever fit? Staring at the pockmarked wall, he could maybe imagine a second bed in the gap, but surely neither had been happy with that arrangement. ‘Maybe that was why they both moved out,’ he told himself, plopping down on the bed and kicking off his uncomfortable concert heels.

(It didn’t occur to him until later that the two figures he was imagining would not have been adults when they first slept in that small, shared bedroom.)

Downstairs, Machi found Phoenix idly paging through a magazine at the table, a small stack of papers to one side. He looked up with a smile as he heard the boy’s feet on the steps. “Ready?”

Machi had already pulled out his phone before he decided he was confident enough to take a guess at the man’s meaning. “Yes…”?

Phoenix chuckled, flipping the magazine closed. His eyes ran up and down the boy, looking concerned. “Are those the only clothes you have?”

“Thought so,” Phoenix muttered, nodding to himself. “It’s too bad I long ago donated Apollo’s and Luke’s old stuff, but…” He pushed himself to his feet, giving Machi a smile. “Why don’t you go get your shoes? We have a little trip we have to get done before your curfew starts.”

It turned out that Phoenix’s little ‘trip’ was to the local shopping centre a few blocks away. It was such a contrast to what Machi was familiar with back in Borgia: This ‘mall’ was bright and shiny, white angular surfaces everywhere he looked, so much space, and what seemed to be hundreds of different kind of stores, small and large, all housed together in one massive building. Back home, Machi had seen a place like this only once, and it had been a cramped affair, full of pressing crowds, dark colours, and smooth curves; The individual shops inside had been similar varieties of ‘small’, and there were nowhere near as many… not that he had much of a chance to look around. Phoenix knew exactly where he was going, and led Machi quickly through the snaking hallways without room to pause.

It was in one of the larger shops they stopped to look at clothes. Machi tailed Phoenix as he picked out a few differing sizes of the same simple white shirt and black pants, then he sent Machi into a changing room. "Try these on," he told the boy. "Find which one fits you."

This was a new experience for Machi, and it took him a minute to translate what he had been asked to do; Back in Borginia, he'd started out wearing hand-me-downs from the older kids in the orphanage, then, once Lamiroir took him in and they began to gain fame, all his new clothes were tailor-made, designed specifically for performing in and becoming casual wear only after they wore out. It was strange to be taking off his clothes in a semi-public area and trying on things. How was he supposed to know which fit best?

Despite his issues, Machi eventually picked out the top and bottom that he decided hung on his torso or waist the most like his performing outfits, and took them back out to show Phoenix. The man examined them for a moment, muttering to himself, then gave Machi another smile and led him back out to the piles of clothes. "Now we know your size, let's find some stuff you like, shall we?"

It was a similar story in the shoe store they dropped by on their way out, minus having to change in a dressing room. Machi's favourite part of that trip was that he was allowed to wear what he picked out almost immediately. He wasn't going to miss those concert clothes, or those uncomfortable heels.

Halfway back to the agency, Phoenix spotted a cart being pulled down the street towards them, and pointed it out to Machi with a grin. "Do you like noodles, Machi?"

Machi paused, then typed 'noodles' into his phone, just to double-check the similar-sounding word did indeed mean what he thought it meant. "Yes, I like noodles."

Phoenix chuckled. "What about salt?"

That word Machi had to look up out of pure confusion. "Uh... Yes?"

Laughing, Phoenix checked his watch. "We've got just long enough... Hope you're more certain about that than you sound." He gave Machi a wink, then slapped a hand on his shoulder and guided him down the street.

The man pulling the cart looked up as they approached and broke into a smile. "Hey, Phoenix!"

Slipping out from behind the pull-bar, he jumped around to the back of his cart, suddenly full of life. "No kids today?"

"Afternoon, Guy," Phoenix replied. "Nope, I sent the kids away for the night. Just got this one for now." He patted Machi's shoulder and laughed, leading the boy around the side of the cart just as a window there opened, revealing the man with the noodle-hair he had been speaking to. "I should introduce you; Machi, this is Guy Eldoon of the famous Eldoon's Noodles cart."

Eldoon scoffed, already whipping something up in a red bowl much like the one sitting on his head. "Flattery ain't getting you anywhere, Phoenix."

Machi decided to give the man a polite smile anyway, his hands laden with the bags of their shopping trip. "Hello yourself, Mikey," Eldoon replied, pausing in his work to lean over his counter and give the boy a smile. "What are you doing with ol' Phoenix here, huh?"

Phoenix was laughing before Machi could even begin to process the question. "It's a long story," the man said. "Short version is, Machi's staying with us for a while... and he has to be home by seven."

Eldoon thought a moment, then dropped a red bowl of steaming noodles on the counter. "I won't keep you then," he said, getting to work on a second bowl. "I'll mix you up one of Pollo's special mixes, Mikey-boy. You don't look like a salty kid to me."

Machi had no idea what Eldoon was saying, but mumbled a nervous "Thank you," regardless.

Back at the agency, Machi took his time putting his new clothing in his closet, then ventured back downstairs to play some more of the piano. Phoenix sat and listened for a while, working at the desk, but eventually got up and left, shooting Machi a smile that assured him the reason was nothing to do with the music. Even so, after a while Machi grew bored of playing, and decided to take the chance to explore his new home a little, starting with the crowded office, right where he was sitting at the piano stool. He began by picking a random direction: Anti-clockwise.

Directly in front of him, the large portrait overlooking the piano immediately drew Machi's attention. He made a note of it to ask about later.

To his left as he slipped out of the stool were the bookshelves around the desk. Out of curiosity, he translated a few of the book titles using his phone. To his surprise, every one he tried seemed to be on a different random topic.

There was a movie poster hanging on the wall behind the desk, next to the window. It didn't have a title, but Machi could have sworn he'd seen a similar poster hanging somewhere before.

The windows themselves looked down on the street outside. Across the road was a posh-looking hotel, and Machi amused himself for a little while 'spying' on some of the lower-leveled rooms foolish enough to leave their curtains open.

Opposite the movie poster, on the other end of the room-width windows, was an old-looking television. It was sitting on top of an array of ancient devices, and a small pile of remotes sat next to it. Machi wisely decided not to fiddle.

Past a few more bookshelves was the door into reception, and a tall plant sitting in a white pot. Next to that was a set of staircase drawers, with a trophy-top-hat tower on the highest step, and a poster hung on the wall above: Apollo and a slightly younger Trucy, decked out in their crimson and teal top hats and capes, pointing identical wands at the camera. Machi paused, staring up at the poster. He hadn't looked too closely at Trucy before, but now he saw Apollo in that top hat and at Trucy's side... Why were they wearing outfits almost identical to that yellow magician from the concert? The capes lacked the card suits on the ends, and they wore a different style of brooch at their necks (not to mention their hip-pouches were entirely unlike Valant's belt and gun holster), but the similarities were impossible to ignore. He'd just written Trucy off before as some kind of fan, but... This would explain why Apollo had been so knowledgeable about the illusion at the concert. Hadn't there been a moment when the illusion first came up, when Apollo had made some kind of declaration that Machi hadn't been able to decipher before the court had moved on? The text on the poster was minimal, and Machi didn't need his translator to read it: "Apollo & Artemis Gramarye".

The door opened and Machi jumped back as he turned to look, seeing Phoenix stepping into the room. The man smiled as he spotted the boy, his eyes taking in Machi's position next to the staircase drawers. "Admiring Apollo and Trucy's stuff?"

Machi blushed, casting a glance back at the poster. "Um..."
"Oh, right, I haven't told you anything about the Agency itself yet, have I?" Phoenix laughed, walking over to the desk and picking up a slip of paper before circumventing the piles of props as he headed to the boy's side. "Did you know Apollo is more than just a lawyer?"

Machi wasn't sure how to answer that. He wasn't even sure what he was being asked.

Seeing the boy's non-response, Phoenix chuckled, then handed him the slip of paper - a flier boasting the same image as the poster, but with illustrated borders and a lot more text. "For now, I think you'd better understand just reading this. You can ask all the questions you want when they get home tomorrow."

As Machi examined the flier, Phoenix strolled away.

It was a couple hours after they got back that Phoenix seemed to suddenly remember 'going to bed' was something they needed to do. After being directed to have a shower, Machi headed into his bedroom, getting used to his new pyjamas as his bare feet walked small circles into the carpet. In his head, his mind walked similar circles over everything that had happened that day, everything he had learned. Tomorrow, Apollo and Luke and Trucy would be here too. Would they appreciate his invasion of their home? He couldn't help but worry, despite all their kindness to him, that he would not be wanted. That question was still burning at the back of his head, the question he had been asking himself again and again since the murder trial had ended, only harder after he had quietly asked that German prosecutor what it meant in a moment alone:

Why had Apollo called Machi 'little bro'?

Machi was lying on top of the covers of his bed, fiddling with his phone, when a gentle knock at the door heralded Phoenix's arrival. The man slowly pushed it open to poke his head in the doorway. "Ready for bed?" he asked.

Nodding, Machi quickly put his phone on the bedside table, and started wriggling himself under the blankets.

Phoenix chuckled, entering the room and sitting on the edge of the bed as Machi settled down on his pillow. "The first day in a new place is always chaotic, but I hope you'll grow to love it here. We'll certainly love having you."

Machi didn't reply.

After a pause, Phoenix shook his head, then reached over and patted Machi's shoulder with a smile. "Goodnight, Machi. Don't stay up too late." As he stood, he flicked on the lamp on Machi's bedside table, then headed to the door.

Without pausing to think, Machi called back, "G-goodnight, Is-... Thank you."

Phoenix stood at the door a moment, then turned his head to give the boy a warm smile. Without a word, he flicked off the light and left the room, closing the door behind him.

"She should be in touch with us shortly," Flora said, sipping her tea. "She didn't seem to want to delay at all."

Hershel nodded, a hand on his chin as he sat back in his chair at the cafe. He mused quietly on the rather long explanation he had just been given, a slight hum his only noise.

The Bostonius had arrived back in London earlier that day, greeted at the Aerodrome by Hershel and his parents, Roland and Lucille; Once the elderly couple had showered their affections on their grandchildren (and, to his discomfort, Sycamore), and Hershel had given his own 'welcome backs' to the group, they all moved on to a nearby cafe to discuss the outcome of the trip... although, despite her pleasure at seeing her son and grandchildren, Lucille's worries for them spiked enough at the tale of the murder at a concert that she and Roland left early, leaving the three younger Laytons and the two members of the Bostonius crew to chat alone.

Discussion of the week in Los Angeles passed quickly, Alfendi happily talking about the murder and the magic trick, Flora of the concert itself, and Emmy of how she "single-handedly saved Apollo's case in court"; Sycamore merely resigned himself to reigning all their wild exaggerations closer to reality. Flora finished the story off, passing on the details of Lamiroir's plight, the singer's upcoming surgery in England to restore her sight, and her desire to find and recover her past.

"Yeah, Luke said Machi is a son to her," Emmy added, idly tapping a finger against her empty cup. "He'll be stuck in LA now, serving a sentence for smuggling."

Hershel nodded. "It would be very hard for Lamiroir, yes," he agreed. "In which case, it would be prudent to start looking into leads as soon as possible."

Sycamore glared at the tabletop in front of him, but said nothing.

"Are we starting the investigation early, Papa?" Alfendi asked, swinging his legs back and forth under his chair.

"Indeed we are," Hershel replied, giving his son a smile. "Nothing too exciting just yet, but we can get started researching what we can while we wait for Lamiroir to contact us."

"That should be easy enough," Flora said. "She's famous; There should be loads about her, right?"

Emmy gave a bitter laugh. "You'd be surprised," she said. "She only recently entered the English-speaking world, and even in Borginia her main draw is that she's intensely private, withdrawn... and mysterious." She sighed. "I did some researching myself for work - Not much of a holiday in the end, really - and there's literally nothing before her debut in that tiny restaurant."

Sycamore looked up from his glare at the table. "Is this a figurative 'literally' or a literal 'literally'?"

"As far as I could tell, a literal one," Emmy replied with a smirk. "I read like five Borginian articles that outright said there was no Lamiroir before the Restaurant de Chanson."
Hershel hummed in thought, rubbing his chin with a stern frown. "If that's our only lead, I fear we won't be getting far..."

Alfendi gave a world-weary sigh, leaning back in his chair. "That's not fair."

"There is another."

Everyone looked up at surprise to Sycamore, who kept his gaze uncomfortably on the table. "What do you mean?" Hershel asked.

"There's another lead," Sycamore clarified, meeting his brother's eyes. "I don't know what it is, but someone we know does."

Emmy cocked her head to one side. "You mean Luke? That strange goodbye he gave us?"

Hershel's eyebrows shot up. "Luke?"

"Oh yeah, that was strange, wasn't it?" Flora agreed, then turned to her father to explain, "As we were leaving, Luke stopped us with a message to pass on to you about Lamiroir, but he changed his mind before telling us what it was."

Instead of replying, Hershel frowned, staring at his teacup as he mused on the information.

"Are we going to ask him about it, Papa?" Alfendi piped up, tugging on his father's sleeve. "Get him to tell us what it was?"

"I'm more curious as to why he changed his mind," Sycamore admitted. "He seemed especially excited for Lamiroir to regain her past. Why would he hold something back like this?"

Hershel pressed his hand tighter to his mouth, his frown deepening. "I think I might have an idea."

Hershel wrote a letter to Luke that very night, though he waited a few days to send it. He chickened out of mentioning what he'd been told of the aborted message half-given, assuring himself Luke would surely offer the information himself in his reply the following week. In the intermission, Lamiroir had arrived in the country and officially hired the famous Professor Layton to look into her past, although she freely admitted it would be a tough search and there was little they could do until after her surgery was done: All had agreed their one major lead was to go to the location of Lamiroir's earliest memories in person, with Lamiroir in tow, and simply ask questions until a clue surfaced. Unfortunately, this was going to be impossible for another month or two, depending on how the upcoming surgery went and how fast the middle-aged woman recovered. In the meantime, Emmy had firmly promised to continue her Borginian language studies and do her part to help, gathering and translating all the Borginian articles related to the famous singer to pass on to her former boss; Until then, she and Sycamore were once more off to travel the world, agreeing to return when the investigation itself started for real.

In all honesty, Hershel was wary about confronting his former apprentice as Sycamore had suggested. He knew Luke like a son from the years they had spent together as teacher and student, travelling England, travelling the world, and solving puzzles of all sizes left, right and centre. Only once before had Luke held something back from an investigation: He'd been a frightened ten-year-old, terrified his father was killing the very town he ruled, seeking out the help of a man he didn't know and couldn't make himself trust fully until they were already almost done with the investigation... after they'd cleared Clark's name. If there was one thing that would convince Luke to not tell his beloved Professor everything he knew, it would be his family. The only other option was... that Luke didn't think whatever he knew was important or relevant, but, somehow, Hershel didn't think that very likely.

It was a regular rainy afternoon in London that Wednesday. Alfendi had locked himself up in his room, the occasional shrieks of play escaping through the thin walls. Quite happy to leave his son to his own devices, Hershel retreated to his office, sitting at his desk with a sigh. He'd been trying to distract himself with his archaeological work, but the question of Luke kept returning to him every time he looked up and saw his wall of photos, his eyes invariably landing on the images of either Luke himself or his parents; Try as he might, Hershel still felt a twinge of guilt that he somehow hadn't been in California himself when the Triton family had their fateful accident. What kind of godfather was he, that he wasn't there for Luke in his greatest time of need? What kind of friend was he, that he hadn't been there to prevent Clark's death, to stop Brenda's kidnapping?

For the millionth time since the incident, Hershel dismissed his guilt with a shake of his head, firmly turning away from the wall of photos. It didn't do to dwell on the past. A gentleman looked to the future.

And yet.

Hershel grabbed his phone off the desk and dialled Luke's number.

There were a handful of rings before the other end picked up. "Professor?" came the voice of the young man who had once been Hershel's self-proclaimed apprentice. "It's not often you call me!"

"No, it isn't," Hershel agreed, smiling as he pictured the young vet sat in that sparse room of his apartment, from the photos he'd sent when he moved in earlier that year. "It's not too early for you, is it?"

"Just gone seven," Luke assured him. "It'll be... three in the afternoon over there?"

Hershel chuckled. "About that time, yes."

"Ah," Luke laughed, then fell into silence. When Hershel did not reply, he continued, "Papa tells me a friend of the family - she's been pregnant for a while now - finally gave birth last night. It's a girl, I think. Apollo's promised to show me their announcement when I get in to the agency before I head off to the shelter."

"Pass on my congratulations," Hershel replied. "Am I likely to recognise their names?"

Luke thought a moment. "I'm not sure. We don't see the Gumshoes often, since they live outside the city. Mostly they keep in touch with Papa and Apollo. The others might go visit them today, though."

Hershel nodded. He didn't recognise the name, but that didn't mean Luke hadn't written about them in his letters at some point. "My last letter to you hasn't arrived yet, has it?"

"No, no letter yet," Luke replied, and Hershel could almost hear him shake his head before he started to laugh. "I'm looking forward to writing my response already! I have to tell you all about our new addition to the family!"

"Oh?" Hershel asked. "This baby?"

Luke laughed louder. "No, Professor!" He stopped talking for a few moments, calming himself down. "If Lamiroir's contacted you yet, she knows all about it. If not, it'll be in my next letter."
"I see," Hershel muttered in surprise; He would have to ask Lamiroir what Luke meant later. "Speaking of Lamiroir, she arrived in London after I sent that letter. She's safe and unharmed, and preparing for her surgery soon."

"That's good!" Luke chirped. "I'll tell everyone that when I next talk to them."

Hershel nodded. He was running out of topics to stall the inevitable.

There was a long pause from the other end of the phone line. "Why did you call me, Professor?"

Hershel winced, and almost chickened out... but then his gaze fell on that happy graduation photo of himself, Claire, Clark, and Brenda. He steeled his nerve. "I'm told you very nearly had a message for me. Before the Bostonius left Los Angeles?"

"O-oh, that," Luke muttered. "They told you about that...?"

"They did," Hershel confirmed, a note of sternness in his voice. "Did you want to share it with me?"

Luke didn't immediately reply, and when he did, it was with a high-pitched, nervous laugh. "I-it was nothing, Professor, honest. I know you'll figure it out in no time."

Hershel almost sighed; So Luke was intentionally withholding information, not just dismissing something as irrelevant. "Luke..."

"D-don't worry about it," Luke insisted. "I, um, I have to get going. Trucy will be impatient to see me, and Apollo will be excited to introduce Maggey to Machi. I'll talk to you later, Professor!"

"Wait, Luke-!"

There was a beep in his ear as Luke hung up.

Sighing, Hershel put the phone back down on his desk. He thought a moment or two, running over Luke's words in his head, then frowned, a hand rubbing his chin. "Is that what you're hiding, my boy...?"

Hershel immediately made plans for another visit to Lamiroir.

Machi's second evening and morning at the Wrights' home was a lot noisier than his first. All that was thanks to Trucy, who, despite disappearing after dinner with Apollo, was apparently trying to spend every waking moment with her new 'baby brother'. The exertion of constant concentration to translate her endless stream of words and actually reply to them was tiring, but mostly Machi was just relieved that, despite their initial reactions to seeing him, all of the Wrights were happy to have him in their home. He had never had much of a family before... it was nice to finally have one he could call his own, even if it was only temporary.

He'd been woken that morning by a bang at his door, his new 'big sister' calling, "Machi! Come and get breakfast!" He didn't need his phone to translate, though it still took him a moment or two. Rubbing at his eyes, he slipped out of bed and went to follow Trucy's footsteps downstairs.

Over the simple cereal that was serving as their first meal of the day, Trucy happily prattled about her show the previous night, detailing her and Apollo's illusions as though they were actual magic and not just tricks. Machi briefly regretted not bringing his phone to make notes and translations, but soon found on listening carefully to Trucy's words that he could understand more than he initially thought he could (or at least could guess from the context of her rambling). On reflection, that was how he had gleaned what was going on during his murder trial too.

Trucy insisted on showing Machi how to wash up when they were done eating. He didn't have the words to tell her Phoenix had already shown him the previous day.

Machi found Trucy waiting outside his door when he had gotten dressed. She gave him a big grin, grabbed his wrist, and proudly announced, "Machi, you're about to see the private show of a lifetime!" before dragging him down the stairs and through into the office.

Phoenix looked up from his desk as the duo burst in, raising an eyebrow. "Where's the fire?"

"Not now, Daddy!" Trucy cried, leaving Machi by the piano (the former display from the keyboard now being rearranged around the portrait on top) as she dashed to the staircase drawers, digging around in them almost madly. "Is Polly here yet?"

"If he was, he'd be in this room," Phoenix pointed out, sharing a confused look with Machi. "Why?"

Trucy turned away from the drawers with a grin, pulling out a black top hat and a wand identical to the one in the poster. "If Machi can't come to the Wonder Bar, we'll bring the Wonder Bar to him!"

"Wonder Bar...?" Machi repeated.

"That's the restaurant where they perform every night," Phoenix explained.

"It's been a while since I performed alone," Trucy added, running back around to grab Machi's wrist and drag him towards the sofas. "If Polly doesn't get back soon, I'll have to make do and give you a solo show."
Machi fell down on the cushions of the red sofa, his back to Phoenix's desk. "You are... magician?"

Trucy nodded, sitting opposite Machi and placing her hat and wand on the table. "Yep! Polly and me come from a long line of magicians!" As she spoke, she reached into the top hat and pulled out a deck of cards and a handful of metal rings that looked far too big to actually fit in there. "We've been keeping up the family tradition, even though Polly insisted he wanted to be a lawyer like Daddy used to be."

"And you never stop bugging me about that, too."

Trucy spun around in surprise, both she and Machi turning their gazes to the reception door as it opened, a young man in a crimson cape standing on the other side with a smirk. "Polly!" Trucy cried.

"We've been eagerly awaiting your arrival," Phoenix called from his desk. "Apparently."

Apollo softly laughed, pulling the door closed behind him. "Morning, Machi."

"Good morning," Machi automatically replied.

Trucy patted the seat at her side. "Polly, come here!" she ordered.

Apollo didn't move, crossing his arms as he eyed the small pile of props on the table. "You're planning to give Machi a private performance, I take it?"

Huffing, Trucy turned away from him, nose in the air. "You don't have to help if you don't want to."

At that, Apollo laughed, heading to the staircase drawers. As Machi watched, he took the teal top hat off the top of the tower there, then the crimson one below it, and replaced the teal hat on the trophy. "You should have warned me; We could have taken home some of our props last night."

Trucy blinked, then looked up in surprise to where Apollo was rounding the couch, grinning down at the pair as he placed the red hat on his head. "Really?"

"Really," Apollo laughed, then pointed to the kitchen door. "And, if we want to give Machi a real show, we're gonna need more space than we have in here."

After a moment of confused thought, Trucy whooped, scooping up her small pile of props before skipping off towards the kitchen.

Machi nervously got to his feet, watching Apollo as the young man waited for the boy to join her. "Uh... thank you, isoveli."

Apollo snorted, reaching out a gloved hand to ruffle Machi's hair. "No thanks necessary; We love showing off. Now c'mon," he patted Machi's back, gesturing to the door, "you've got a magic act to see!"

Machi noticed Phoenix hiding a smile behind a hand as they raced past.

Just as they had promised, Apollo and Trucy's double act was quite the sight, despite their assurances they were using an act as old as the spare props they were wielding and the version they were currently using on stage was much better. They'd appropriated the dining table to store their props, moving one of the chairs across the room for Machi to sit in as he watched, although even then they were frequently reigning themselves in as though used to a larger space, occasionally whacking their wands or hats against the ceiling or backing into the kitchen counter or neighbouring wall. It took Machi a moment to register the name Apollo started calling Trucy was 'Artemis', the same name attributed to her on the poster and flyer, confirming his suspicion after seeing said poster that it was her stage name (he had come across the Greek mythology connection purely by chance not long after). The pair shot a lot of banter back and forth, but kept slipping into what Machi assumed was their routine, a rapid delivery that he had no real chance of deciphering with his still-minimal knowledge of the language; Usually, Machi's confused look as a reaction seemed to be enough of a reminder for them to slow down, even if they would only forget themselves and resume their speed a minute later.

The final 'trick' of their show involved the black top hat, giving it briefly to Machi to confirm it was indeed empty with no hidden pockets, only to then proceed to use it as a pair with Trucy's Magic Panties, disappearing items into one, pulling them out of another, and endless variations on that, even pulling what appeared to be the same thing out of both at the same time... and Trucy briefly pulling Apollo's gloved hand into view from the brim of her panties.

"Apollo, stay out of my panties!"
"Keep your panties out of the Magic Hat and I will!"
(This exchange was another victim of the language barrier that Machi didn't fully comprehend until much later.)

Trucy dramatically sighed, poofing her Panties away into the ether. "Well, I guess that's it for-"

"Nope, I think I see something else in here," Apollo interrupted, making a show of examining the inside of the Magic Hat. Ignoring Trucy's confused stare, he reached in, feeling around for a long moment, then triumphantly emerged with a dark object clutched in his hand. "Aha! I think this belongs to you, Machi." Grinning, he held the object out for the boy to take.

Machi blinked, glancing between Apollo's face and hand for a few seconds before hesitantly reaching out to take it. It wasn't until his fingers curled around the cool lens that he realised what it was with a gasp: His sunglasses. He lacked the words in English to gush about how he'd owned this particular pair since his 'blind' act began, that he'd lost track of them after the murder trial, that he'd forgotten until now that they'd even disappeared. He couldn't find the words to ask Apollo where he had found them, lacking any memory of where they'd been misplaced. Instead, all he could do was look up at Apollo with wide eyes and whisper in wonder, "Thank you."

Apollo just grinned in return.

The pair wrapped their show up with a bow, and Machi clapped enthusiastically, calling, "Bis! Bis!"

"Thank you, thank you!" Trucy replied, tipping her hat with a grin. "You're a lovely audience!"

Apollo bit back laughter, a hand on the brim of his hat. "Just wait 'til tomorrow; We'll take home some of our newer props to give you a proper show!"

"Ooh, yeah!" Trucy agreed, spinning her wand in her hand as she turned to her older brother. "Maybe we could try out some of our new ideas while we're at it!"

"Just the illusion-based ones, yes," Apollo replied, shooting a glance at Machi. "I think our 'jokes' will be hitting a language barrier more often than not."

Machi blushed, an arm pressed to his chest as he clung to his elbow. "Sorry..."
"It's not your fault, Machi," Apollo insisted with a smile. "Nobody expects you to be instantly fluent in English."

Trucy giggled, dropping her wand on the table and jumping to Machi's side, enveloping him in another of her tight hugs. "Don't you worry, baby brother. Luke's promised to teach you, remember? And we're all going to help!"

Machi started to nod, but then paused, frowning. "Luke..." He looked around the room, confirming it was still empty apart from the three of them. "Where Luke?"

"He's not coming in today," Apollo explained, cleaning up their props into a neat pile. "He'll be at work until... the Tuesday after next, I think he said."

"That long?" Trucy asked, surprised.

Machi stood, gently disentangling himself from Trucy's loosened grip. "But... this work," he said, gesturing to the office and hoping his meaning was clear. "Yes?"

Apollo paused a moment before smiling, a hand pulling at the brim of his hat. "Ah, I meant his other work. Luke is a vet."

"He looks after animals!" Trucy explained, seeing Machi immediately reaching for his phone. "You know what an 'animal shelter' is, right?"

Machi thought a moment, then pulled his phone from his pocket.

"You want me to spell out those words for you?" Apollo offered, heading to Machi's side.

Just as Machi was about to accept the offer, Trucy loudly squeaked, bouncing forward and grabbing her brothers' arms. "I've got a better idea!" she announced. "Let's go visit Luke! Then we can show Machi what an animal shelter is, and what a vet does!"

Machi blinked, staring at Trucy as he translated her words in his head.

Apollo opened his mouth with a frown, then closed it again. "Alright, I have to admit, Luke would probably love that," he said, "but would Dad mind being stuck here alone while we're all out?"

"Don't worry about me, I'll be perfectly happy," came a shout from the next room.

"Stop listening in to our private conversations!" Apollo shouted back.

"Daddy agrees!" Trucy crowed, clapping her hands. She then rounded on Machi with a grin. "What about you? Wanna go see Luke?"

Machi thought only a moment or two before nodding with a smile.

Even though their visit was ostensibly to show him what a 'vet' and an 'animal shelter' were in person, Machi still looked the words up on his phone during the bus trip, Trucy bouncing at his side and Apollo sat sideways on the seat in front of them. The teen had to admit, he found the thought of going to this shelter exciting, having never been to one before and never really getting to interact significantly with dogs or cats back in Borginia. Would Luke let them play with the animals? He hoped so. A part of him wondered if the Wrights were allowed to have pets, or if it would be crossing a line to ask.

Trucy took Machi's hand the moment they got off the bus, leading him and Apollo around the corner and down the road to where the shelter was. He could hear the loud revving of a machine floating in the air, and found as they walked down the path that it was a green lawnmower, being pushed up and down a short strip of grassy lawn by a tall man with black hair, a large pair of headphones on his head. Nearby was a large sign, a cartoony dog and cat pointing to the building from atop the words "Warren St Animal Shelter" written at their paws in a bold and colourful font.

Apollo laughed under his breath, fiddling with the mesh gate of the property with the mowing man. "This is new."

"Luke mentioned they added a fence, didn't he?" Trucy replied over the din of the nearby lawnmower, pulling Machi through onto the concrete path beyond.

The buzz of the mower abruptly ended, and Machi turned to see the man seemed to have spotted them, pulling his headphones around his neck. "Aren't you Northpaw's family?" he called.

"That's us!" Trucy replied, she and Apollo both waving to the man. "We thought we'd come and visit him!"

The man laughed, and gestured to the building beside them. "He'll be inside somewhere. If you can't find him, just ask Simba at the front desk."

"Thank you, Mister Duck," Apollo replied, nodding his head respectfully before waving his younger siblings inside. Behind them, the man replaced his headphones and started up the loud mower once more.

Inside, Machi let himself be briefly distracted looking around the reception. It wasn't all that big a room, but the double doors on either side seemed to imply the same thing could not be said for the rooms beyond. A desk stood between them, high enough at the front to be comfortable for a standing adult to lean against; Behind it, he could see the top of a computer monitor, indicating there was space for someone to sit on the other side. Aside from Apollo and Trucy, looking around curiously on his left and right, there didn't seem to be anyone else around.

"So where will Luke be?" Trucy asked, crossing her arms and looking up at Apollo. "Dogs or cats?"
"Like I have any idea," Apollo mumbled, his eyes flicking between the double doors. "He might even be in the vet area."

Abruptly, one of the doors on the left swung open, a blonde woman with a blue shawl wrapped loosely around her neck coming in with a sheath of papers in her hands. She paused as she spotted the trio, eyes widening behind her pointed glasses. "Y-you're-!

Trucy grinned, giving the woman a wave. "Hi!"

"Ms Simba, isn't it?" Apollo asked, arms crossed. Machi saw a spark in the lawyer's eyes that he remembered seeing during his murder trial, a stern glint that cast judgement upon whoever he turned his gaze on; Despite that, his expression was casual, matching the polite words coming from his mouth. "Nice to see you're doing well."

"Y-you too," Simba mumbled, avoiding Apollo's gaze as she slunk behind the desk, busying herself with the shuffling of her papers. "Southpaw, wasn't it? That cape's new."

"It's 'Apollo' actually, but Southpaw's fine," Apollo replied, ignoring her comment on his cape. "You haven't repaired that necklace, I notice. How did it break, again?"

Machi cast a glance at Trucy; She seemed as confused by the conversation as he was, blue eyes flicking between the two adults with a slight frown.

Simba paused. "My cat, Servalan," she eventually replied, laying her papers on the desk. "Sh-she got it pretty good; It's unrepairable, actually." Abandoning the papers, she turned back to the doors she had come out of. "I'll go get Northpaw for you." With that, she disappeared.

Apollo let out a quiet sigh as the woman disappeared, staring at the doors. The spark faded from his eyes. "Be careful with her."

Machi and Trucy shared another confused look before returning their gazes to Apollo. "Polly?"

"She is... bad?" Machi added.

Apollo's eyes turned down to the two teens, his expression suddenly uncertain. "Just... be careful."

Before either could reply, the double doors were again shoved open, this time admitting a red-haired woman in a labcoat, a stethoscope slung around her neck; Her eyes locked on to the trio and then to Machi with a massive grin. She let out a squeal and jumped forward towards the boy. "You must be Machi!"

Machi's eyes widened, and he stepped backwards. "Y-yes...?"

Trucy giggled. "Hi, Fox!"

"Our dad told you, I assume?" Apollo asked, smirking.

The woman laughed. "Him and Northpaw!" She turned back to Machi, hands resting lazily on her hips. "You enjoying it here so far? I was just telling Northpaw, Luke to you, that he had to take you up here or by our place so I could meet you myself, after all that trouble I went to covering for him the other day." She laughed again. "And then he was telling me he spent that morning wasting time anyway, so someone didn't think their plan through before sharing it with me, huh?"

Half of her rapid stream of words had flown over Machi's head. He could only stare up at her blankly, unable to comprehend if she expected a reply.

"You have to slow down!" Trucy informed the woman with an accusing glare, one arm slung over Machi's shoulders protectively. "He's not that good at English yet!"

Fox blinked in surprise, then gave Machi a sheepish grin. "Oh, um, right, sorry. I forgot you're Borginian."

Apollo sighed, then rested a hand on Machi's shoulder by Trucy's arm, giving the boy a smile as he gestured to Fox. "Machi, this is Fox. She shares an apartment with Luke."

"And work with him, too," Fox added, then held out a hand. "A pleasure to finally meet you, Machi."

Machi paused a moment to mentally translate, then smiled and shook the woman's hand. "Nice to meet you."

"Fox!"

Everyone turned to the double doors as they once more were pushed open, a harried Luke standing in the doorway, Simba meekly standing beside him with a box in her hands. Surprisingly to Machi, Luke was lacking his distinctive hat, wearing a labcoat and stethoscope identical to Fox's. He was slightly hunched over, a happy cat (white except for its ears and the tip of its tail) perched on his shoulders and rubbing lovingly against his brown hair. Raising a hand to hold the cat, Luke stepped forward carefully, giving his siblings a small smile, "Hi guys," then turned back to Fox with a frustrated look. "Could you not wait three minutes to finish up!?"

Fox snorted, though she did look sheepish. "Can you blame me for being excited?" she replied, walking back to Luke's side and reaching out to pull the cat from his shoulders. "C'mere, Dottie."

The cat meowed in protest, but its claws were quickly detached from Luke's labcoat and the feline was held tightly in Fox's arms, where it quickly seemed to settle down into a contented purr (Trucy quietly cooed at it from Machi's side). Behind them, Simba shifted from foot to foot in the doorway, eyes downcast.

Luke stretched his back as he returned to his full height, clearly relieved to not be so awkwardly hunched over anymore. His smile seemed much more genuine as he then turned his attention back to his siblings. "So, not that I'm complaining, but what are you three doing here?"

Machi felt Apollo and Trucy's eyes on him, and briefly panicked that they expected him to explain until suddenly Trucy was talking: "Machi didn't know you had another job, and instead of just telling him what a 'vet' and an 'animal shelter' were, we thought we'd show him!"

"We figured you wouldn't mind," Apollo added with a smirk.

Luke chuckled, shaking his head.

Machi took a deep breath, pulling out his phone to show Luke. "I look up words on way," he admitted. "B-but I never go to animal shelter before... It very interesting." He couldn't bring himself to meet Luke's eyes for more than one hopeful moment, fearful of rejection.

"Well, in that case, I'd better show you around then," Luke promised, chuckling. He turned to Fox. "You okay finishing up with Dottie alone?"

"Of course I am," Fox replied, her eyes on the dozing feline she was actively stroking in her arms. "Isn't that right, you cutie?" she cooed, her voice going up an octave or two as she blew kisses at the cat's black and orange ears. The cat ignored her, its tail dangling over Fox's elbow, the orange tip lazily swinging back and forth.

"We'll see you later," Apollo told Fox, holding up a hand in a small wave.

"Take your time, hey?" Fox replied with a grin, carrying the cat back through the doorway Simba was still standing in. Simba herself cast her eyes over the Wrights only once before mutely following.

Luke and Apollo shared an amused glance, Trucy giggling at Machi's side. Luke then gestured to the other door, giving Machi a friendly smile. "We'll start over here. Do you like dogs, Machi?"

Machi nodded, jumping to Luke's side as the pair headed through the doors together. "Owner of restaurant had one," he explained, "but I not see it much."

The doors closed behind them, and Machi gasped as he registered the new room they stood in, stretching out before him into the middle distance. Aside from a small nook with a door on his immediate right, the lengthy hallway was lined on either side with the transparent doors to small enclosures, each holding somewhere between one and three dogs that all ran to investigate the new arrival, their barks sounding muffled through the plastic.

"Welcome to Warren Street Animal Shelter, Machi," Luke said with a grin, slowing leading the shocked teen down the path. "Who would you like to meet first?"

Machi felt his heartbeat quicken as he numbly walked at Luke's side, the soft giggles and gentle footsteps of Apollo and Trucy behind them. He would... get to play with an animal? That had been a dream of his for years, as far back as he could remember; The glimpses he had seen of other kids cuddling cats, playing fetch with dogs... They'd filled him with such longing, but he had always told himself that was a pointless dream, that he had no means to support a pet, and later that he had no time, too busy acting as Lamiroir's 'seeing eye dog' himself (not that he could ever hold that against her; he'd done it gladly). The yellow dog belonging to the owner of the restaurant they'd met in, the Restaurant de Chanson, had never been allowed inside, and Machi himself was never allowed outside after dark without an adult escort, so he never saw more than a glance as he arrived and left either end of his performances, no matter how much he asked to stay and give the dog a hug as he'd seen so many other, more fortunate, children doing to their own pets without even a thought. And finally, years later, here Machi was, about to indulge in that dream for the very first time.

Machi's vision blurred. He pressed his hands to his face, his lungs fighting for air, and found his cheeks wet under his fingers.
Trucy was the first to notice Machi's suddenly-distressed state, cooing the same way she had over the cat back in reception. "Aw, don't cry, Baby Brother." She wrapped her arms around him in a hug.

"Are you okay, little bro?" Apollo asked, jumping around in front of Machi with a worried expression, the same way he'd been looking at Machi the entire last day of the murder trial.

Machi felt a fresh wave of tears coming on at their words, and rubbed his eyes to clear them. He didn't trust his voice not to waver, so he just nodded, giving Apollo a grin.

Luke minutely sighed, relieved. He jerked his head towards the end of the corridor, smiling at Machi. "There's a bench out the back; Why don't you come sit down for a bit?"

Despite Trucy's comforting arms around his shoulders, Machi felt guilty and embarrassed as they went through the door; Thanks to his ridiculous body deciding to cry against his wishes, he was missing out on the chance to meet those dogs, was ruining their trip, making his new family worry. He rubbed harder at his eyes, willing them to dry, but nothing changed. A moment later, they were through another door, emerging back into the sunlight; Machi could hear the distant hum of the lawnmower out the front, and the padding of small feet on grass.

Feet? Or... paws?

Machi looked up and gasped. In front of him was a tall fence encircling a sizable enclosure, a variety of small dogs racing around inside. One paused from its mad dash, its black eyes on the Wrights as it moved to the fence and stuck its nose inquisitively through the wire.

The teen felt the clenching hand on his heart loosen. Maybe Machi hadn't missed his chance to meet a dog after all.

Trucy guided Machi to a bench against the wall nearby, where they sat down together. Apollo sat at Machi's other side, but Luke remained standing. "Feeling better?" Luke asked.

Machi nodded. "Yes, thank you." He turned his gaze back to the enclosure, watching the single dog that had taken notice of their arrival. It was white, fur sticking out in every direction, and probably no taller than Luke's knee; On top of its head, pointed ears stuck straight up, and behind them a short tail did the same, shivering slightly in some kind of restrained wag.

"We give all the dogs time out here to run around," Luke said, and Machi realised his interest had not gone unnoticed. "Looks like Donnie there has taken a liking to you."

Machi smiled, watching the dog shove its nose against the fence as if it might move away at its touch, still watching them intently. Machi hid a sniff by rubbing his nose.

A door to their left, one Machi had not noticed until now, swung open, and Fox emerged in her white labcoat, the mostly-white cat stretched out over her chest and hanging sleepily from one shoulder, supported by the crook of Fox's elbow. The woman grinned as she spotted the quartet, approaching with a call of "Hi again!"

Luke sighed, giving his co-worker an exasperated look. He pointed at the cat. "Fox... why?"

Trucy leaned away from Machi, pressing a hand to her mouth to stifle giggles.

Fox shrugged innocently. "She didn't want to go back in her box. She's not hurting anyone."

At that moment, a peal of deep barking erupted from the nearby enclosure, and Machi looked around to see it was coming from the small white dog who'd been watching them. Its barking quickly attracted the attention of several of the other dogs, who joined it with barks and yaps of their own, all directed at the cat. In response, said cat simply turned its head the other way, tail curling from where it hung over Fox's arm.

Luke directed a glare at Fox, then turned and took a few steps towards the enclosure, holding out a hand. "Okay, that's enough. No barking at the cats; We discussed this."

At his call, the dogs settled down into various states of whining, a few obediently giving up to return to their play while several others sat or lay in the area, trying to hide their continued gaze on the group at the bench. Only the white dog Machi had seen earlier continued to stand at rapt attention, ears and tail on alert as it stared the cat down with an audible growl.

Luke gave it a warning look. "Donnie, no growling either."

The growls stopped, but the white dog continued to stare, its tail shivering in excitement.

Sighing, Luke turned back around, returning to the group. Machi was shaken out of his amazement at the ease with which Luke had calmed the dogs by movement at his sides, and he noticed Apollo and Trucy shooting each other excited grins, engaging in some kind of silent, secret conversation between themselves.

"Seriously, you gotta tell me your secret sometime," Fox told Luke, her free hand gesturing to the dogs. "What are you doing that they always listen to you like that?"

Luke's cheeks turned pink, and he shrugged. "Oh, I just talk to them, that's all," he insisted. Before Fox could argue, he was pointing to the cat in her arms. "Hey, if you've got Dottie out here anyway..." He looked to Machi with a smile. "Did you want to meet her? She's a very friendly cat, I promise."

Machi was already nodding excitedly before he'd even fully translated the question in his head, guessing the request from Luke's gesture alone. "Yes thank you!"

Fox laughed, adjusting the cat in her arms as she stepped towards the boy. "Here you go. Be careful of her claws." She detached the sleepy feline from her labcoat, laying Dottie down in Machi's lap; Dottie pressed up against Machi's front and immediately lay back down in a tight ball, purring against Machi's abdomen.

For a few moments, Machi was in too much shock at finally being friendly with a cat to move. Finally, he forced his hand into his lap to pet Dottie's head between her mismatched ears, the grin on his face immovable.

"Dottie's a girl?" Trucy asked, her own hand straying into Machi's lap to scratch behind the cat's ear.

Fox nodded. "All calicos are. Well, almost all."
Apollo frowned, his eyes flicking between the two vets. "Really?"

"It's genetics," Luke explained, hands slipping into the pockets of his labcoat. "The tortoiseshell pattern, orange and black; That's caused by two differing X-chromosomes."

"Naturally," Fox picked up, "a male cat with two X-chromosomes is extremely rare. Usually sterile, too."

Apollo hummed to himself, staring off into the middle distance. "Interesting."

Machi longed to pull out his phone and look up their complicated words, but Dottie was lying right on top of his pocket and he didn't want to move her.

"But Dottie's a calico, not tortoiseshell," Trucy pointed out, looking at Fox. "Didn't you say she was a calico?"

At that, Fox remained silent, shooting a smirk at Luke, who sighed. "We don't use 'calico' in England," he explained. "We'd say Dottie is tortoiseshell and white."

"If it's more white than not," Fox said, turning to Trucy, "it's a calico; 'Caliby' if it's got tabby patterns too, and then 'torby' if it's not got much white."

Luke repressed another sigh, pressing a hand to his face. Machi got the feeling this was something they'd probably argued about in the past; Given Luke's frustration, Fox had probably won.

Trucy cooed, her attention back on the cat in Machi's lap. "We're learning so much today!"

Apollo chuckled, getting to his feet. "So if it wasn't for that black ear, she'd just be a white cat with orange bits," he pointed out.

"We had one of those classic calicos come through here a few months back," Fox said. "You know, just like the pattern they paint on those waving lucky cat figurines?" She held one hand up in the air, gesturing like a cat trying to bat at some high object.

"Oh yeah, those," Apollo replied, arms crossed in thought. "Didn't think that pattern had a name."

Luke was looking at Fox. "By 'classic calico', are you talking about Lucky? She disappeared fast. We only had her a few days."

Trucy scoffed, still scratching Dottie's ear. "That's not surprising; It'd be cool to have a real-life cat exactly like one of those figurines!"

"It's more than just that," Luke explained. "They paint that pattern in the first place because it's traditionally lucky. Cats with Lucky's pattern are very rare, and worth a lot of money to the right people; I'd hate to guess how many zeroes a male with that pattern would go for."

"That'd be super rare," Trucy realised, and smiled. "And that'd make it more lucky, right?"

"Don't get your hopes up," Apollo warned. "None of us are allowed to keep pets in our apartments, remember?"

Trucy huffed, crossing her arms, and gave Dottie a longing look.

Machi continued to pet Dottie in silence, hiding a smile. He was pretty sure the Wrights were already lucky without the aid of a cat... At least, they'd been lucky when it came to Machi. "Is alright if I meet dogs now?" he asked.
"Sure thing," Fox replied, leaning down to pluck the sleeping cat from Machi's lap. She gave Luke a grin. "Northpaw?"

Luke laughed, and gestured to the dog enclosure. "Right this way, Machi."

I have just been informed via a very excitable detective's texts that Maggey Gumshoe has given birth to a daughter. Just so you all know when you wake up :) And Apollo: Maggey says to check the forum for her announcement.

Apollo: OMGOMGOMGOMG I'LL GET ON THE FORUM RIGHT NOW
Apollo: HER NAME'S FELICIA AND MAGGEY'S INVITED EVERYONE TO VISIT HER IF THEY HAVE TIME

Trucy: AAAAAAAAA DADDY CAN WE GO VISIT THE BABY?!
Trucy: Wait Machis not in this group CAN WE INTRODUCE MACHI TO THE BABY AND MAGGEY AND MR GUMSHOE?!

Luke: That's good news! I have work still, but you guys can go ahead if you want.

Apollo: Luke seriously can you drop by the office before going in to work? I want to at least show you the pictures Maggey posted!

Luke: I suppose I can do that. I'll have to be gone by 8:40 at the latest.

Trucy: Hurry up! Daddy's letting us go visit her today!

After waking us all up with excited screaming, yes.

Trucy: WE CAN'T SLEEP WE HAVE A CUTE BABY TO MEET

Apollo: I'm on my way ;)
Apollo grinned as he threw himself through the door into the agency's office, already pulling his laptop out of his bag. "Dad! Truce! Machi! Is Luke here yet?"

Phoenix looked up wearily from where he sat at his desk, one hand fruitlessly trying to eliminate that one curl of hair that hung down from his spikes more often than not nowadays. "Not yet."

Hiding a smile, Apollo walked to the table, laying his laptop down on the glass surface; Looking around, it appeared it was just the two of them in the room. "Not get much sleep, Dad?"

Phoenix scowled. "I'm regretting not waiting until morning to tell Trucy."

Apollo fought not to laugh. Instead of replying, he decided to leave his laptop where it was and headed towards the kitchen. "Could you let me know when Luke arrives?"

"Sure," Phoenix muttered, waving a hand.

In the next room, Apollo found Trucy and Machi sat at the dining table, hunched around Trucy's school laptop. At the sound of the door swinging closed behind him, they looked up as one, grinning excitedly as they recognised him. "Isoveli!" Machi called, waving in greeting.

"Polly, Polly!" Trucy cried, beckoning for their older brother to join them. "I'm introducing Machi to Maggey and Mister Gumshoe!"

Apollo laughed at her enthusiasm, waving in reply as he wandered over to join them. "Aren't we doing that later anyway?"

Trucy scoffed. "We can't waste time with introductions! We have a cute baby to see! A cute baby, Polly!"

As he shook his head at her insistences, Apollo got close enough to see what was on the screen of Trucy's laptop, and recognised a photo from their family gathering at Edgeworth's a few Christmases ago. This particular photo was Maggey and Adrian sitting together - a moment Apollo realised in retrospect must have been when Adrian realised who her online friend 'Blackbird' was - and smiling up at the camera in a break from their chat. Obviously Trucy's idea of an introduction was showing Machi pictures and talking at length about who they were as people.

"Trucy tell me Maggey is friend of you," Machi explained.

Apollo nodded, and gestured to the photo. "Adrian too. Did Trucy tell you about Adrian?"

Machi looked back at the picture on the screen. "Little, only."

"What do you take me for, Polly?" Trucy said, arms crossed. "Of course I told him a little about everyone else in these photos!"
Apollo laughed, reaching for the arrow keys to page through the image files. He felt the nostalgia of that night prickling at his mind as he saw the snapshots flip past his eyes; There was Edgeworth, Franziska, Gumshoe, Kay... even Pearl and Maya. He paused on a photo of Maya and Phoenix, taken from a distance and without their knowledge; Even if he didn't know them as well as he did, he suspected the way they were looking at each other was more than enough evidence the pair were romantically involved. "Even...?"

"W-well," Trucy muttered, looking away, "I didn't go into Mommy Maya and Pearly much. That's too much to explain."

Apollo nodded. He noticed Machi watching them curiously; At first, his instinct was to ignore it, but upon further thought, he decided to hold back information was to be cruel, and turned to their little brother with a smile. "Like Trucy says, it's very complicated, but... Maya here," he pointed to the photo, "is Dad's girlfriend. She's been our mother, because our other one disappeared when we were little."

Machi's eyebrows shot up. "Oh! Then, why she not here?"

"She lives up in the mountains," Apollo continued. "Her job keeps her very busy, so we don't get to see her much."

"We'll take you up to see her when we next visit!" Trucy promised, grinning. "You can meet Pearly too!"

"Pearly is Maya's cousin," Apollo added, unsure if his sister had mentioned that already. "And, by extension, ours too. She also lives in the mountains."

Machi giggled, turning to Trucy. "Thank you. I like that very much."

When the shout of "Luke's here!" came from the office, the trio in the kitchen wasted no time abandoning Trucy's laptop to charge back into the office, finding Phoenix and Luke standing around the former's desk; Luke seemed a little distracted, but still smiled and waved as he saw his siblings coming.

"Luke!" Apollo cried, almost amazing himself by how much more enthusiastic than Trucy he was to see their middle brother, a true reversal of their usual roles. Jumping forward, he grabbed Luke's shoulder and pulled him towards the sofas. "C'mon, I want to show you what Maggey posted on the forum this morning!

Luke allowed himself to be dragged back across the room, and sat on the nearer of the red seats. "Her announcement, right?" he asked. Trailing behind them, Trucy and Machi sat on either side, wearing identical grins of excitement.

Apollo nodded, sitting opposite and reaching for his laptop. "Yep!" He busied himself pulling open the lid and typing in his password, revealing the open webpage of Maggey's announcement that he'd left up when he left his apartment earlier that morning. "Here it is." He spun the laptop around, pushing it towards his siblings with a smile.

Luke pulled the computer closer, Trucy and Machi leaning forward to read it. "Ah, I thought I'd remembered right that it was a girl."

Trucy pressed her hands to her mouth, muffling the high-pitched squeal coming from it. "She's so cute!"
Machi frowned a little, then pointed to the screen. "This is... her name?" he asked. "Fel-iz-ah... Gumshoe?"

"It's usually pronounced 'Felicia', I believe," Luke corrected. "Although, if I'm wrong, I'm sure you'll know when you go to see her."

"We can let you know later if you are," Trucy giggled, elbowing Luke with a wink.

Luke chuckled, shaking his head.

The back cushion of the sofa the trio sat on creaked as it was pushed down by a weight, Phoenix leaning down over Luke's shoulder to look at Apollo's laptop screen. "I'm surprised Maggey's had the time to post an announcement, to be honest. I wonder if she asked for Gumshoe's help."

"You guys will have to pass on my congratulations when you see them," Luke said, pushing the laptop back towards Apollo. "Oh yes, and the Professor's, too."

Apollo almost dropped his computer as he reached to grab it. "The Professor?"

Machi's eyebrows shot up. "You mean... Professor Layton?"

Luke nodded. "I got a surprise call from him this morning, and mentioned the new arrival."

"Uncle Professor called you!?" Trucy repeated, surprised.

"Huh, that's unusual," Phoenix muttered, frowning as he pushed himself off the back of the sofa. He curled his fingers around his chin, slowly rounding the lounge and the trio sat there. "What did he want? You usually keep in touch purely through letter."

Apollo couldn't help but notice Luke's sudden avoidance of eye contact, the small pause before the vet replied, "He wanted to let me know Lamiroir had arrived in London. She's preparing for her surgery."

Machi's face lit up with his smile. "I-is... Lamiroir okay, yes?"

Luke giggled, nodding. "Don't worry, she's fine; The Professor is keeping an eye on her."

"Mm-hmm," Machi mumbled, his cheeks pink as he curled up in his chair. News of his adoptive mother's safety seemed to have made his day all on its own, and he must have been a little embarrassed at how obvious that fact was.

"So when are you planning on leaving?" Luke asked, his eyes on Phoenix.

Apollo's eyes narrowed. Luke was being as transparent as ever that he was hiding something.

"Ooh yeah, we can't keep them waiting, Daddy!" Trucy chirped, jumping to her feet with a wide grin.

Phoenix laughed; Apollo had no idea if he'd noticed Luke's avoidance and was letting it pass, or just found the sudden change of subject amusing. "If you're so impatient to get going immediately... Let me go find my hat." With that, he headed off for the kitchen. "Be warned, visiting hours might not start for a while yet."

"We'll survive a little wait, Daddy," Trucy replied with a knowing nod of her head.

With a chuckle, Phoenix disappeared through the kitchen door.
Luke got to his feet, reaching into his pocket. "Y'know, I almost forgot..." He pulled out his phone, looking between his three siblings with a smile. "I thought maybe we could get a picture of you guys... send it to Lamiroir once she gets her sight back."

Machi gasped, jumping out of his ball to land feet-first on the carpet. "Really!?!" he cried. "W-we send Lamiroir picture of us!?"

Trucy squealed in delight, running around the couch at lightning speed to grab Machi in an excited hug. "Yes yes yes! Quick, Luke, take a photo for her!"

Apollo couldn't help laughing as he shoved his laptop into his bag, rushing to join the pair. "Actually, yeah, that sounds like a great idea!" He made sure to arrange himself on Machi's left, his other hand on the teen's back as he leaned down to match his younger siblings' height. "C'mon Luke, hurry up! Dad'll photobomb us if he gets back!"

The others laughed, though Apollo doubted Machi really understood what he had said; Trucy jumped at Machi's right, pressing the three of them together in a half-hug, and Machi giggled as he raised his arms to hold across their backs.

Luke held up his phone, opening his camera app. "Say cheese!" he called.

Apollo raised his left hand in a wave, grinning widely. He didn't need to look to know Trucy and Machi were doing much the same thing, shouting in unison, "Cheese!"

The camera in Luke's phone went off with a flash and a loud click.

View the Court Record/Luke's Notebook
It was nearly a new month, the end of Machi's first in the Agency, and still he had had only minimal time with Luke. Sure, the vet had still spent plenty of time with his family, but so far they had all been hurried weekday visits in the morning before Apollo arrived... excepting the handful of longer weekend stays that tended to take up the whole day. It had been a surprise for Machi to learn that, in addition to being a vet, and the famous Professor Hershel Layton's former apprentice, Luke was also quite a talented violinist.

"I brought this!" Luke had announced as he met Machi and Trucy that first weekend, proudly holding up a small black violin case for Machi to see. "I thought we might be able to play for each other today!"

"This?" Machi repeated, watching as Luke lay the item down on the table, opening it to reveal the instrument inside. "One... viulu?"

Luke nodded. "A violin, yes," he replied, taking out both violin and bow. "I've been playing since I was eight or so."

"We didn't mention that?" Trucy asked, grinning. "That's Luke's role here at the agency; He plays the violin."

Trucy had gone on to explain to Machi how she had wanted to use Lamiroir's music in their magic act, but Apollo had talked her into instead recording something of Luke's, 'inspired' by the Lamiroir song she wanted. Machi had thought the entire charade was incredibly funny, but the notion of hearing a 'cover' of his music intrigued him greatly (once he'd looked up what it meant, of course). Luke playing his versions had led to Machi playing his original accompaniments had led to the pair playing together; Their separate arrangements meshed together surprisingly well, with Luke taking his cues more from Lamiroir's vocals than Machi's piano, creating a final product that was similar to the original while at the same time being something totally new. Machi had never played with a violin before, only with Lamiroir's voice and guitar, and he couldn't help but find the whole experience inspiring... He couldn't wait for Lamiroir to return, for the three of them to one day play together.

This particular Wednesday was the first weekday Luke had off from the shelter since before Machi moved in. He'd arrived at the agency shortly before Apollo, and now the two musicians were happily playing an arrangement of one of Lamiroir's songs, Machi on his piano while Luke's violin played over it. Apollo chuckled as he passed through, shooting them a proud smile before moving off into reception with a handful of papers; Phoenix similarly tugged on his beanie with a smile before disappearing in the direction of the kitchen.

Trucy leaned over the back of the nearer sofa, pouting as the music came to a halt. "I wish I played an instrument..."

Luke lowered his bow with a laugh. "Are you jealous, Trucy?"
The teen huffed, burying the lower half of her face in the sofa cushion. She grumbled something incomprehensible into the red leather.

Machi twisted on the piano stool, his phone in his hand as he ran 'jealous' through the translator; The result he got almost made him laugh, but he bit down his amusement to give Trucy a sympathetic smile. "You can sing?" he offered.

Trucy sighed dramatically, dragging herself off the cushion. "But I don't know the words! I can't speak Borginian!"

Machi opened his mouth to tell her how easy his native language was, but changed his mind when he realised he didn't know how to say so in English.

Luke lowered his violin, placing it down on the desk with a thoughtful frown. "So... if the lyrics were in English, you'd have no problem, right?"

"Yeah," Trucy agreed, dangling her arms over the back of the sofa as she slumped back down again. "'Cept I don't know 'em, I can't translate 'em, and you know online translators never work..."

Laughing, Luke turned back to his younger siblings. "Well then, you have a very important question to ask Machi, don't you?"

Machi's grip on his phone tightened in surprise.

Trucy took a little longer to register Luke's meaning, her confused stare slowly extending into a wide grin. "Oh!" She perked up immediately, spinning to face her younger brother. "Machi! You know the lyrics, don't you?"

"L-little, only," Machi admitted, his fingers interlocking around his phone. "I not sing, I play piano."

"We can look them up online, can't we?" Luke suggested.

Machi paused, thinking. "Yes, it is possible... but I not write well in English."

"Trucy and I can make the words match the rhythm and meter," Luke replied. "All you’d need to do is translate them."

Machi wondered for a moment why they couldn't just do 'Guitar's Serenade'... but it was only one song, had been involved in Mister LeTouse's murder, and had been playing almost non-stop on the radio ever since; Each on its own was an adequate reason to avoid it... not that that seemed to have stopped Apollo using it as his new ringtone. Regardless, Machi gave his siblings a smile and nod. "Yes, I will do that."

Immediately Trucy leapt from the sofa with a loud cheer, running a lap of the room. "I'M GONNA SING!"

Luke laughed loudly as he watched his sister stop on her heel and charge through the door into reception. "Don't go too far, Trucy!"

Machi pressed a hand to his mouth to muffle his own giggles as he heard the resulting conversation through the open door:

"POLLY, I'M GOING TO SING SOME OF LAMIROIR'S SONGS!"

"I heard. Congratulations."
"You wanna sing with me?"

"No thanks."

"Aw, c'mon, you don't wanna be like Lamiroir at all?"

"It's not that: I'm a magician and lawyer, not a singer, and certainly not anywhere near Lamiroir's range. Besides, I have work to do today."

"... Spoilsport."

Apollo groaned. "I'm not ruining your fun by not joining in. Honestly, you'll enjoy it more without me."

"... Still a spoilsport."

Although he sighed, Apollo didn't argue further, and Trucy soon returned to the office.

Before long, Luke, Trucy, and Machi were settled in the sofas, Luke's laptop on Machi's knees as the teen copied across Borginian lyric sheets from Lamiroir's official website; At his side was Luke, idly watching over Machi's shoulder, and Trucy sat across from them, hands fidgeting in her lap.

"How long is this going to take?"

Luke shot his sister a glare. "Don't be rude, Trucy. This is going to take time." His gaze softened as Trucy looked away guiltily. "You'll just have to think of something else to do while you wait. Any ideas?"

Trucy chewed her lip, frowning. After a minute or so, she turned her eyes up to Luke with a wide grin. "You know what you haven't done yet, Luke?"

"What do you mean?" Luke asked, equally as confused as Machi.

Trucy giggled. "You haven't told Machi your stories about Uncle Professor!"

Machi's eyebrows shot up, and he paused in his copying of the final song's lyrics. Wasn't 'Uncle Professor' what Trucy called...?

"True," Luke muttered, rubbing his chin thoughtfully. "I have been holding back on that; I wasn't sure your English was up to the task, Machi."

"It... is better than used to," Machi said.

Trucy nodded insistently. "Exactly! We can tell him..." She hummed, arms crossed, then the grin returned to her face. "Oh! We can tell him the story of how you met Flora! That one's the shortest, right?"

"Ah, I see," Luke said, a small smile growing on his lips. "A test to see if Machi thinks he can understand it all."

"Yes!" Machi cried, almost knocking the computer off his lap in his excitement. "Yes please, I would like to!"

Luke chuckled, watching the teen. "I'm sure you're eager. Although," his smile tensed with concern, "are you sure you can multitask translating those lyrics and listening to my story?"

Trucy huffed, arms crossed as she frowned at nothing in particular. She seemed to be weighing which of the translations or the story was more important to her... and coming up blank.

Machi turned his attention from her to look at the document on the laptop monitor. Luke had a point there. "Maybe... we try anyway?" he asked, giving Luke a hopeful look. "As test?"

"Ooh, yes, let's do that!" Trucy agreed.

"Two tests in one," Luke laughed. "We're being awfully adventurous today!" Machi blushed, and Luke's laughter intensified. "Alright, Curious Village it is!" He patted Machi's shoulder as his giggles subsided. "Let me know if I say something you don't understand, or you want me to slow down. I have this particular one all written out in book form if you want to look at it later."

Machi nodded. "Yes please," he said, twisting in his seat to face his older brother. "Thank you!"

"You're gonna love this story, Machi!" Trucy cried, curling up on the sofa cushion with a grin. "The twist at the end is amazing!"

Luke shushed her with a smile. "Who's telling this story, Trucy?"

Trucy giggled, pressing a hand to her mouth, but stayed quiet.

"Let's begin then, shall we?" Luke announced, and the story began to unfold.

View the Court Record/Luke's Notebook
It had now been four weeks, and Machi already felt like a proper member of the Wright family.

He had his isa, Phoenix, who always watched over them in their apartment home with that strong paternal air... who also didn't hesitate to tease his four charges, ruffling their hair with that gleeful grin. Every night, before he went off to work and after Trucy returned from hers, he would tuck Machi and Trucy into their beds with a hug and a kiss on the forehead; Every morning, they would both return the favour by making breakfast for him when he finally woke up.

He had his isoveli, Apollo, who always had a smile for his three younger siblings, no matter how much they (Trucy in particular) loved to gently mock his serious nature. He showed up at the office at nine every weekday, and, shortly before Machi's curfew began, the entire family would go out to eat noodles for dinner from Guy Eldoon's cart; Phoenix would take Machi back home, while Apollo and Trucy headed off for another night of magic, Apollo promising to repeat the highlights for Machi the next day.

He had his other isoveli, Luke, who, despite his initial absences, had nonetheless spent much of his free time with his family. Already, Machi and Luke had spent hours playing together on the piano and violin, and almost as much time poring over puzzles side by side; The puzzles reminded Machi of Borginia, and Luke almost seemed happier to give Machi a puzzle and watch him solve it than to solve one himself... Machi couldn't help but wonder if this was something he shared with his former mentor, Professor Layton.

Finally, he had his sisko, Trucy, who always had an eye out for her 'baby brother', but never treated him like a helpless toddler. Sleeping only a few short metres apart, they spent almost every waking hour together, Trucy's near-constant stream of words helping Machi practise his English almost as much as the books and computer programs specially designed to teach him; None of them were in Borginian, but Machi found he was becoming confident enough anyway that he could even contribute to some of the girl's one-sided conversations.

All considered, having his new perhe around helped a lot to distract him when he most missed his aska, Lamiroir...

... and that perhe was about to get a little bigger.
"You're gonna love Mommy and Pearly!" Trucy insisted as they left for the train station that morning. "They've been really looking forward to meeting you!"

"Just like everyone else we know, apparently," Luke added, giving Clay a wry look.

Clay scoffed; He'd shown up at the agency next to Apollo only minutes earlier, simply insisting he wanted to see the family off for their weekend away. Machi had previously met him barely a handful of times, but he knew enough about Clay from his initial visit to the Space Center that first week to know that he was obsessed with space; It didn't take much thought to realise what was in the cylindrical package tucked under the young man's arm. "Hey, maybe if you'd been decent enough to get the new little brother a few years earlier," Clay told Luke, tapping his friend's arm, "we wouldn't all need to catch up on getting to know him, huh?" He shot Machi a wink, and the teen giggled.

"You're just upset he didn't go gaga over the Space Museum," Apollo said, shooting his friend a smirk; Although Machi didn't understand the exact phrasing, he was reminded of how upset Clay had been when first they met, that Machi hadn't been able to fake enough excitement to please him... To be sure, space as a concept was fascinating, and he could see how much Clay loved the subject, but it simply didn't spark all that much interest in Machi, and it had killed him that simply being himself had disappointed his brothers' friend so much... even with the Wrights laughing at the young astronaut for taking it all so seriously at the time.

Clay waved the comment off. "I'm over that. We all have different interests, after all. I mean," he grinned at Apollo, "I hate your dumb obsession with law, right?"

Apollo's smirk turned to a glare. "Shut up, Clay."

"Now now, that's enough of that," Phoenix ordered from the back of the group, though he was clearly hiding a smile. "Less arguing, more walking."

Once on the platform, Clay pulled out the package under his arm, brandishing it proudly in Machi's direction. "Here we are! I brought this for you to borrow while you're up in Kurain!"

Machi blinked in surprise as he took the gift. "Um... Thank you."

Apollo sighed, pressing a hand to his face. "Please don't tell me that's a telescope."

"It's a telescope," Clay confirmed, grinning. He ignored Apollo's and Luke's resulting groans, turning back to Machi. "This is an old one of mine, actually. When you're that high up, and a little further from the city lights, you get a much better view of the stars. If you get the time tonight, you should go out and take a look."

Machi regarded the package for a moment, wondering if Clay had forgotten Machi's probation required he be back at the Agency by seven. Not wanting to disappoint him, he gave the astronaut a smile regardless. "Thank you very much, Clay."

"No prob, dude," Clay replied, visibly preening.

Trucy peered over Machi's shoulder, frowning. "Why didn't you ever lend this to us?"

Clay shrugged. "I guess you didn't seem interested... Plus, you only go up there to visit your mom, not to look at the sky."

The girl seemed to accept that answer. "Can I use it too? And Pearly?"
"Sure."

Apollo rolled his eyes, muttering something that sounded like 'probation' and 'home' under his breath.

"Just so you know," Luke spoke up, patting Clay's shoulder sympathetically, "none of us are going to come back as converts to how amazing space is. We already have the highest opinions of it we're ever going to get."

Clay chuckled. "Yeah, I know. I can dream though, right?"

After that, Phoenix alerted them to the approaching train, and they had to bid Clay goodbye.

The sun was high overhead as the Wrights got off the bus in Kurain Village. Machi found the entire thing fascinating, looking all around at every opportunity he got. The buildings reminded him of the book on Japan he had secretly read, in preparation for the Gavinners tour passing through there (before the whole business of the murder had thrown all that out). The giant boulder near the bus stop also caught his attention, as did the out-of-place phonebooth on the other side. As he looked down the road after the disappearing bus, he noticed the perfect placement of the mountain beyond, its blue-green peak seeming to rise up out of the road as it crested a hill and disappeared down towards the train station. Grinning, he turned to Trucy at his side and pointed to it. "Pretty."

Trucy giggled, nodding. "That's Mount Mitama. It's owned by the Fey family!"

Apollo snorted. "They own this mountain, too. Hazakura Temple is on the other side of the peak, higher up."

"And, if that mountain wasn't there," Luke added, pointing at Mitama, "you'd be able to see the sea. It's just beyond it."

Machi was so busy admiring the mountain, absorbing all the surprising information he was getting on it, that he failed to realise Phoenix wasn't with them anymore until he heard two shouts from very close by:

"Nick!"

"Maya!"

As he spun to see where their father figure had disappeared to, Machi noticed the large building just across from the bus stop, its front door wide open. On the porch by the stairs down to the road stood a woman with long, dark hair, dressed in purple robes, and currently locked in a rather passionate make-out session with Phoenix, who stood on the second step from the top... and even then, he had to lean down a little to match her height. Machi wanted to look away from the rather confronting sight, but found himself frozen in place, cheeks red.

"Get a room, you two!" Apollo called, making his siblings laugh.

The shout shocked the pair out of their kiss, looking around to where the four stood with very wide grins and only a small amount of embarrassment. "Is that a request?" the woman asked, a hand on her hip.

Phoenix chuckled, waving them off. "Give us a break, we've both been busy lately." Without giving anyone a chance to snidely reply, he looked to Machi, gesturing to the woman he still had one arm wrapped around. "Machi, this is Maya Fey. Maya, Machi Tobaye."
"Welcome to Kurain, Machi!" Maya said, bouncing down the steps towards the boy and holding out her hand. "I've heard a lot about you!"

"Th-thank you," Machi replied, forcing a nervous smile as he shook her hand. "It is nice to meet you."

"He was just admiring the view," Luke explained, gesturing down the road. "The sky's very clear today."

Trucy giggled, patting Machi's shoulder. "Do you get views like that in Borginia?"

Machi thought a moment, then shook his head. "Not where I live. My town in valley, far below."

"There's a pretty good view from over on Mitama too," Apollo chimed in, grinning cheekily. "Maybe we could show you someday."

"As long as you don't go any further than that this time, I'll be happy," Maya warned, though her smile indicated she wasn't as serious as she sounded; Machi couldn't help but wonder what she was referring to as he saw the mixture of embarrassed looks and gleeful grins across the faces of his new siblings. "Anyway," she continued, clapping her hands and fixing Machi with a maternal smile, "why don't you come in, Machi? Anyone who calls the Wright Anything Agency home is always more than welcome here."

It wasn't until they were all inside and shoving their shoes into the nearby cubbyholes that Trucy paused and looked around in confusion. "Mommy... Where's Pearly?"

"Oh yeah, she's out the back," Maya explained, casually waving a hand. "I forgot to tell you guys about that in all the excitement..."

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "Meeting us at the bus stop isn't that exciting."

"That's not what I meant," Maya replied, leaning against the doorway further into the house. Her smile was beginning to look a little forced. "These past few days have been busier than normal."

Machi noticed the Wrights exchanging surprised looks.

"But you're already super busy!" Trucy cried. "Did something happen?"

Maya sighed, crossing her arms. "The latest in a long line of somethings..."

Phoenix frowned, stepping towards her and resting a hand on Maya's shoulder. "Maya...?"

"It's nothing I can't handle," Maya insisted, waving off Phoenix's concern. "It's just that... You remember Bikini, right?"

Apollo's face twisted in disgust. "What about a bikini!?"

"Of course I remember her," Phoenix replied, ignoring Apollo's outburst. "Why?"

"Her back's gotten so bad, she's finally agreed to retire," Maya explained. "We couldn't leave Iris up there alone, and Hazakura is never all that busy, so..."

Machi leaned over to Trucy, who stood the closest to him, and whispered, "What is talking about?"

"I don't know for sure," Trucy whispered back, then waved at the two adults with a frown. "Mommy, Daddy, what are you talking about?"

"That's what I'd like to know," Phoenix muttered, watching Maya with concern. "Has Hazakura shut down? I thought business was improving since Iris got back."

Maya didn't immediately respond, opening and closing her mouth a few times. "It hasn't shut down," she eventually settled for saying. "Just, while it's sitting there unused, Iris is staying here in Kurain instead of all alone in that cold temple. She forced a grin. "All this kinda happened in a rush just the other day, so she's here in Fey Manor until we can get her her own place in the village."

Phoenix grunted to himself, staring thoughtfully at nothing in particular.

Luke was frowning, rubbing his goatee. "Iris'... Is this is the same Iris that came to visit us once a few years ago at the Agency? Pearl's half-sister, one of a pair of twins?"
"And Dad's ex-girlfriend," Apollo added with a smirk at Phoenix. Phoenix just shot him a glare in reply.

"Oh yeah, I remember that story!" Trucy cried, then turned to Machi. "We'll have to tell you later! Or, well," she paused, shrugging, "get Polly to tell you, cuz I don't remember it so well..."

Maya giggled, poking the unamused Phoenix in the arm although her eyes stayed on the kids. "Pearly and Iris are out the back. Maybe you'll run into them while you're showing Machi around?"

Trucy squealed, grabbing Machi's arm. "Yeah yeah, we need to show you Mommy's house!" she cried, then dragged him past Maya and into the hallway beyond, Machi tripping over his feet as he struggled to keep up. "C'mon, c'mon!"

"I'm coming!" Machi replied, getting his bearings as they tore down the hallway. Behind him, he could hear the laughter of his older brothers as they followed, and Machi couldn't resist joining in as the exhilaration of the chase washed over him.

Fey Manor was much larger than Machi had expected from what he saw of the building from outside; Instead of a small floor space, as he expected from a single floor, the mansion seemed to sprawl out in every direction, with almost as much garden as there was house inside the tall, white wall that circled it. The snaking hallways were just as much open to the outside as they were walled in, and Trucy didn't pause as she took Machi down them all, heading steadily towards the back, her head spinning every which way as she searched for any sign of their target.

Finally, they turned a corner to a porch overlooking the back garden, and Trucy's run suddenly came to a halt, sending Machi running headlong into her back as her grip on his arm loosened. He peeked over her shoulder at first opportunity, and saw two women sitting by a rock garden, looking up in surprise as they heard Trucy's loud shout of "There you are!"

"Trucy!" the shorter of the two replied, jumping up from where she was kneeling in the dirt. Pausing only to brush the dust off her pink kimono, she dashed to meet Trucy at the foot of the nearby stairs, where the pair hugged. "I completely forgot you were coming!"

Luke laughed, gently guiding Machi forward with a hand on his shoulder. "That's not like you, Pearl."

Pearl blushed as she and Trucy separated. "A lot's happened over the past few days." She gave the boys a wave. "Hello Luke, Apollo."

"Hello yourself," Apollo replied with a grin, leaning on the wooden railing of the walkway. "Dad's with Mom right now, but I'm sure you'll see him later."

"Oh, of course!" Pearl giggled. She moved up the steps, holding out a hand to Machi. "You must be Machi. We've heard a lot about you."

Machi nodded, shaking her hand. "It's nice to meet you. You are...?"

"Pearl Fey," the girl replied, pressing her hands together and giving Machi a short bow. "Welcome to Kurain."

"Th-thank you," Machi mumbled, rubbing his arm and trying not to look as awkward as he felt.

Meanwhile, Trucy had skipped away from the stairs to where the older woman still sat, kneeling in the dirt by the rock garden. Seeing the teen approaching, the woman's eyes widened and her hands clutched at the purple magatama on her chest; Machi couldn't help but sympathise with her fear.

"Hello!" Trucy called, rocking on her heels as she gave the woman a bright grin. "It's Iris, right? Pearly's big sister?"

Iris nodded, slowly pulling herself to her feet and brushing off her purple robes. "It's been a while since we last met," she said, a shy smile on her face. "I... wasn't expecting to see you so soon."

"We kinda weren't either," Apollo pointed out, chuckling. "Mom told us when we arrived that you're staying here until you get your own place?"

"Yes, that's right," Iris replied, brushing a stray lock of dark hair behind an ear. "It was very kind of Mystic Maya to offer... She and Pearl have been my only contact with the outside world for a long time."

At that, Pearl jumped back down the steps, running to her sister's side and taking her hand with a fierce look. "But all that's going to change now; You're here in Kurain, disgraced or not, so you're going to make lots of friends of your own."

Iris sighed, but gave the teen a smile. "Yes, I'm sure I will." She then turned her gaze to the Wrights. "I hope I might be able to count the four of you among them, with how much I've heard of your lives."

Luke laughed as he left Machi's side, moving to join the growing group by the rock garden. "I'm afraid we can't say as much for you in return, Ms Iris; You'll have to tell us about yourself while we're all here together."

Iris hid a giggle. "Just Iris is fine. There's nothing much to tell anyway."

Trucy scoffed. "I'm positive that's not as true as you think it is."

Machi took his time descending the steps after Luke. "Um, Pearl?"

"Yes?" Pearl replied, the entire group turning to face him with a curious look.

"It's nice to meet you, but," Machi rubbed at the back of his neck awkwardly, "I have return home tonight, so not much time... I hoping look around before I go."

"But we've got plenty of time before you have to leave," Trucy pointed out.

Luke nodded. "True, but it's only polite to show him around, at least a little."

"And Mom kinda asked us to," Apollo added with a grin. Despite everyone else having moved to stand in the dirt below, he remained on the walkway, leaning on the railing.

Pearl gave Machi a warm smile. "It would be a pleasure to give you a tour, Machi," she insisted. "After all, you are a member of the family now; Fey Manor will always be open to you."

Machi blushed, shoving his hands in the pockets of his pants. "Trucy said you are... cousin?"

"First cousin once removed," Pearl boasted, the closest she had come to what Machi would call 'pride'; It was the same exact phrase Trucy had used, and he still had just as much of an idea of what it meant... that is, none at all.

"What was it you said was the Borginian word for 'cousin'?" Trucy asked, looking upwards thoughtfully. "Seh-koo?"

"Yeah, that!" Trucy giggled, turning to Iris. "That makes you one of our serku too!"

Machi opened his mouth to tell her the plural form of the word, but decided not to bother with a laugh.

Iris blushed. "Thank you," she said, then looked to Machi. "You said earlier you have to return to the city tonight; When are you going?"

Unsure of the answer, Machi bit his lip. "I..."

"I'm taking him back home on the five o'clock bus," Apollo spoke up, attracting everyone's attention. "It'll get us back to the agency in plenty of time for his curfew."

Luke frowned. "You're taking him? I thought Papa was."

"I offered," Apollo explained, shrugging. "Dad's been stuck in the city the last two times we came up here, so I figured he deserved to stay the night more than me." He sighed, rolling his eyes. "Plus, if he and Mom are gonna make a big deal out of being apart for so long, I don't want to be here."

Luke shivered. "They seem to be restraining themselves around us, at least."

Trucy huffed, her hands on her hips. "But where are you going to sleep!? You can't go back to your apartment and leave him alone!"

"I'll be in Dad's room," Apollo laughed. "You think Clay would have forgotten Machi can't stay here overnight if I was going to be back at my place come evening?"

Machi blushed as he remembered the gift of the borrowed telescope, still in Trucy's bag where they had shoved it once on the train. "I leave telescope with you," he told his sister. "I can not use it back home."

Trucy's eyes widened for a moment before her expression turned to a disappointed pout. "Alright..."

"You have a telescope?" Pearl asked, intrigued.

"Clay lent it to Machi," Luke explained, and gestured to the garden, "but, weren't you going to give Machi a tour, Pearl?" He looked to Iris. "If your sister doesn't mind us stealing you away, of course."

Iris giggled. "I don't mind. In fact, I'd quite like to join you."

Trucy cheered, throwing one arm around Iris' waist and the other over Machi's shoulders. "We can do a tour together!" she cried, and began to drag them off into the garden. "C'mon, Pearly!"

"Coming!" Pearl replied, hurrying to catch up.

Luke chuckled, moving to follow, but paused as he noticed Apollo was still stood quietly on the walkway. "Not planning to join us?"

Apollo shrugged, pushing off the railing. "I'll catch up later. I have something to ask Dad."

"Alright." Luke gave his brother a quick wave before running off after their siblings. "See you later!"

Fey Manor
Master Bedroom

Once the kids had all run off looking for Pearl and Iris, Maya had sighed, given Phoenix a tired smile, then gestured down the hall before heading off in a different direction to the thundering footsteps of the younger Wrights. Phoenix had only picked up his bag and followed her.

Phoenix had spent his Kurain Village nights in Maya's bedroom ever since they had finally acknowledged their long-overdue romance. At first, he shared her bed purely at Maya's insistence, but by now it was an unspoken tradition. It was only Phoenix's sheer force of will (or, as Maya called it, 'being a prude') that had kept anything too physical from ever going on between those walls; Phoenix suspected they would have outed their secret relationship a million times over by now if he hadn't - Maya's childish dislike of condoms only strengthened his resolve.

On this particular day though, the physical elements of their partnership were the furthest thing on Phoenix's mind.

Phoenix sighed as he put his backpack down by the door, which he closed behind him. "Maya, what's the matter?"

Maya's head jerked around to face him, eyes wide for only a second before she forced a grin. "Now c'mon Nick, who says anything's the matter?"

He only narrowed his eyes, arms crossed. "Maya. You know better than anyone I can tell when people are hiding something."

Maya kept up her façade a moment longer before dropping it with a sigh, falling onto the nearby bed. "I can handle it."

"That seems to be your catchphrase as of late," Phoenix gently pointed out, moving to sit at her side. He rested one hand at Maya's back, rubbing up and down her spine. "Every single time I've asked you about work these past couple of months, it's 'I can handle it, don't worry about me, I can look after myself'... You do know telling me not to worry only makes me worry, right?"

Maya weakly laughed. "That's cuz you're a worrywart."

"Maybe so," Phoenix agreed, "but it's clear I'm worrying for a very good reason." He paused, but Maya didn't reply. "It's not just Hazakura, is it?"
After another pause, Maya shook her head. "The mess at Hazakura just added to everything... but I can hold out. I've made it this long."

Phoenix's eyes narrowed in concern, his hand still moving against Maya's back. "How long? What are you holding out against?"

At first, Maya didn't react, pretending she hadn't heard... but finally she sighed, leaning over to rest her head on Phoenix's shoulder. "Things aren't going as well up here as they should..."

"What?" Phoenix asked, his hand freezing at the base of Maya's ribcage. "But you've been so busy, training acolytes, visiting with the Elders... Hasn't Kurain's reputation only been climbing?"

"Sure, our reputation is great," Maya almost spat. "The acolytes and Elders, though? The acolytes are either quitting their training early or outright just moving to the bright flashy city, and the Elders are all dying off!"

Phoenix blinked, unsure how to react to that.

The moment of anger passed, and Maya again sighed, pressing her face into Phoenix's shoulder and wrapping an arm around his back. "Even though I've been working so hard at my own training, to live up to their expectations... they say I'll never be ready to pass the test to be Master of the Kurain Channelling Technique, not unless I go on intensive training in the country where it originated."

"That doesn't sound so bad."

"For two years, Nick."

Phoenix nearly leapt off the bed, staring incredulously at the top of Maya's head where it rested on his shoulder. "Two-!? They want you to go on a two-year training course!? Overseas!?"

Maya nodded.

"But... that's..." Phoenix bit back his objections, slumping in his seat. "Well, if it's split up into chunks, at least we'd-"

"Can't split it up," Maya interrupted. "It's ascetic training; It works best when there's minimal breaks... not nearly long enough to fly back here and visit."

"But two years?"

"Mm-hmm."

Phoenix sighed, moving his hand from Maya's back to her head, gently stroking her hair. He couldn't imagine being apart from her for two entire years... The longest they'd ever managed was eight months, the gap between his disbarment and that first family trip to Kurain with the kids... except, even then, he was prepared to stay away from her for much longer if it was for her own good. This was the same thing, wasn't it? It was for the good of Kurain Village, for Maya... They had their phones to keep in touch, he had his kids as a distraction... If it was for her, he might be able to manage such a long time apart... even though he felt it would kill him.

Taking a deep breath, hand still stroking Maya's dark hair, Phoenix managed to force out the quiet words, "Wh... When are you going?"

"I'm not."
Phoenix froze. "Huh?"

Maya pushed herself off Phoenix's shoulder, giving him a stern look. "I'm not going. I refuse to leave you, or our kids."

Phoenix stared back at her as her proclamation sunk in... then the gears began to turn, and his eyes narrowed. "Maya... how long have you been fighting this?"

"Since April."

"April!?"

She shrugged. "Thereabouts."

Phoenix sighed, unsure if he should be relieved it was 'only' since April, or upset that she had been fighting this battle for so long without a word to anyone. "Maya..."

Maya scowled. "Don't give me that look. I'm not going, so why would I need to tell you? It's not happening."

"Right." Phoenix closed his eyes, trying not to look like he was judging her. Honestly, that was a very good reason not to share... but. "Even if it's not happening, I'd like the chance to support you if you need it."

At that, Maya had the decency to look a little guilty. "I can handle it. I didn't want to bother you."

Phoenix nodded, lacking the energy to be annoyed at hearing that phrase again. "I hate to play devil's advocate, but if going away for two years is the only way to be recognised as Master... what's your back-up plan?"

Maya's eyes went wide as she paused. "Um."

Her reaction nearly made him sigh. "You don't have one."

"Of course I do!" Maya protested, but the way her face turned red and her cheeks puffed out said it all.

Phoenix shook his head. "Maya, we'd survive two years without you if we had to... We'd hate it, but we'd survive. I'd come visit you if I had to."

Maya turned away from him, arms crossed in a sulk. "I know."

"Then why?" he asked. "If you don't have a back-up plan, why are you so insistent you can't go?"

"I..." Maya whimpered, then sniffed, and Phoenix suddenly realised she was crying. "I can't..."

Without hesitation, Phoenix pulled Maya into a hug. "Maya, I love you. I'll support your decision. I just hate seeing you suffer, okay?"

Maya nodded, hugging Phoenix back and burying her face in his shoulder. "This has been on the table for a while now," she admitted. "I just refused to discuss it with them, they always dropped it... Then, this past April, they said I'd avoided it long enough. They'd even arranged it all for me, got tickets to send me to Khura'in at the end of May."

'Khura'in?' Phoenix thought, frowning. 'Why does that sound vaguely familiar...?'
"Then..." Maya paused, sniffing. "You remember what happened in April."

Phoenix had opened his mouth to ask before he suddenly remembered. "My trial."

Maya nodded. "You were arrested. Trucy's dad died. Apollo was all stressed out about his first ever trial, putting his mentor in jail. Luke was struggling to be there for them both with those ridiculous restrictions you put on him." She sniffed. "I... I told myself, after all that, it might be better for me to go after all. I mean, only Trucy called me 'Mommy', I was just a friend to Luke and Apollo..."

Phoenix decided not to comment on her last sentence; They both knew Apollo and Luke were far closer to Maya than she'd just implied. "You were actually planning to go?" he instead asked, surprised.

"I didn't say anything at the time because there was enough going on for all of you," Maya replied. "I was planning to tell you later, I promise I was, but..." She paused, pulling away from Phoenix only to wipe her eyes. "Then Mother's Day came around, and I guess a part of me was waiting to see what would happen if I wasn't there. What the kids would do."

Phoenix smiled. "They came up here to visit you, didn't they?"

Maya giggled, nodding, then pulled the locket from her obi, flipping it open to look at the photo within. "They gave me the best gift in the world... not just this thing, but all those reassurances that they loved me, that I would always be their mom... or big sister, in Luke's case."

Seeing her welling up again, Phoenix pulled Maya into another hug.

"Apollo started calling me Mom!" Maya cried, somewhere between hysterically laughing and crying. Her hand closed into a fist, snapping the locket shut, and it slipped from her shaky grip as she clung to Phoenix in response. "How could I leave after that!? They're my kids, I couldn't leave my kids!"

"Maya, Maya," Phoenix murmured, holding her tightly. "Yes, they're our kids... but they're all grown up. They'd understand if you had to leave, and be waiting here for you when you got back."

Maya's sobs quietened, but she remained clinging to Phoenix's hoodie. "And now Apollo and Trucy's mom has re-appeared," she quietly pointed out. "If those two have ever needed me to be around, it's now."

Phoenix had to admit she had a point there.

"I haven't even told Pearly about this," Maya continued. "I know she'd be okay on her own, and she'll do even better with Iris nearby to keep an eye on her... They can't exactly come with me to Khura'in."

Phoenix returned to gently rubbing Maya's back in an effort to offer comfort. "So... this 'Khura'in' place is where you'd have to go?"

Maya nodded. "It's a tiny country in the Himalayas," she explained. "The spiritual capital of the world, they say. It works a lot like Kurain Village, but at a larger scale: The leader, a queen in this case, keeps the peace with the neighbours by channelling people for the other country's leaders. Only the women of the royal family can channel spirits... They say Ami Fey herself was a former princess before she fled to Japan."

"And then to here, I presume," Phoenix added.

"Uh huh." Maya sighed, pressing closer to Phoenix. "They're not going to leave me alone until I agree to go. I don't want to go. Don't make me go, Nick."

Phoenix held her tighter. "I won't make you do anything," he promised. "And you're right, now is a bad time to leave anyway... but Thalassa will be coming back eventually."

Maya didn't reply, her face still buried in Phoenix's hoodie.

"As we speak, she's lying in an English hospital, getting her sight back," Phoenix continued. "Eventually, she'll have her memories too, and she'll be here in California again to reunite properly with Machi, Apollo, and Trucy."

"And they won't need me anymore," Maya morosely pointed out.

"And everything will calm down," Phoenix corrected. "Apollo's an adult, and he and Trucy won't need the same kind of reassurance they need now once Thalassa is a part of their lives... I can certainly promise you you won't stop being their mother just because you have to go away for two years, or because they've reunited with their birth mother, and I'm positive they'd tell you the same thing if they knew about this. You can't use them as an excuse anymore when that happens. You need to do what you need to do."

Maya just sniffed. She didn't reply.

"Like I said, I'll support your decision no matter what," Phoenix continued, "but we all want what's best for you... and if what's best for you is two years in this Khura'in place... Well, we'll miss you a lot, but we won't stop you going."

For a long moment, Maya remained silent, then she gave a muffled, tearful giggle into his hoodie. "Thanks, Nick."

Phoenix smiled, holding her tight. "Promise not to keep me out of the loop on this stuff anymore?"

Maya laughed, rubbing her face against his chest. "Promise."

Chapter End Notes

(Maya wasn't going to reveal any of this to Phoenix for another few months, but you people forced my hand! xD I have actually had this in the back of my mind since Maya's announcement for SOJ though; If you go back to look at Turnabout Trump and Mother's Day, Maya's been hiding this the whole time.)
Apollo was halfway down the hallway towards the Manor's Master Bedroom when he heard a loud cry from somewhere ahead, a sobbed laugh that was on the verge of hysterical:

"Apollo started calling me Mom!"

Was that... Maya?

"How could I leave after that!? They're my kids, I couldn't leave my kids!"

Her sobs quietened, and Apollo could hear the distant murmuring of his father's voice replacing it. A part of him said this was a bad time, to turn around and leave and come back later to talk to Phoenix... but the rest of him was oh so curious to know what they were talking about. Maya had said his name after all... Were they talking about him?

Phoenix's murmurings were again replaced by Maya's, but much quieter and indistinct than before; Her words were impossible to decipher from where Apollo was standing.

Against his better judgement, Apollo crept forward and pressed an ear to the tiny gap between the door and its frame, just in time to catch the end of Maya's short monologue.

"-come with me to Khura'in."

Apollo felt his heart stop.

"So... this 'Khura'in' place is where you'd have to go?" Phoenix asked.

"It's a tiny country in the Himalayas; The spiritual capital of the world, they say. It works a lot like Kurain Village, but at a larger scale: The leader, a queen in this case, keeps the peace with the neighbours by channeling people for the other country's leaders. Only the women of the royal family can channel spirits... They say Ami Fey herself was a former princess before she fled to Japan."

"And then to here, I presume."

"Uh huh." Apollo heard Maya sigh, and when she next spoke, her words were too muffled to make out.

"I won't make you do anything," Phoenix said. "And you're right, now is a bad time to leave" anyway... but Thalassa will be coming back eventually."

There was a pause. Apollo's heart had restarted, pounding a million times a minute, and he pressed a hand to his chest as if to muffle the sound in his ears. First Apollo, then Khura'in, now Thalassa? What were they talking about?!

"As we speak, she's lying in an English hospital, getting her sight back," Phoenix continued. "Eventually, she'll have her memories too, and she'll be here in California again to reunite properly with Machi, Apollo, and Trucy."

Maya mumbled something in response, again too muffled to make out.

"And everything will calm down. Apollo's an adult, and he and Trucy won't..."

Apollo fought the urge to suddenly stumble backwards, reigning in enough control of his limbs to step back as quietly as he'd stepped forwards. Phoenix's words faded back into incomprehensible murmurs, exchanging private words with Maya, then Maya laughed.

Once he'd finally gotten a good distance from the door to the bedroom, Apollo turned and fled.

He wasn't staying the night, but Apollo didn't think anyone would mind if he went to lie down for a while in the guest room that was usually assigned to him. He firmly closed the door and threw himself down on the bed before finally letting the panic of what he had just overheard flow through him. Maya was going to Khura'in? And, from what he could tell, was planning to take him and Trucy with her once their mother came back? Did... did they know? He could remember telling Phoenix and his siblings that his biological father had died in Khura'in; Had Phoenix passed that on to Maya? Had they looked up what happened? Had they found out what Apollo had been doing in the eight years after?

Apollo pressed his face into the pillow, forcing his breathing to slow down. No, of course not. How could they possibly know anything about Apollo's life that he hadn't told them himself? Even if they did, why would they be talking about sending him back there? Not to mention, what would Trucy and their mother have to do with it?

Apollo groaned, flipping over onto his back and staring at the ceiling. He forcefully reminded himself he had no idea what Maya and Phoenix had been talking about, so what use was there jumping to conclusions? Surely if they were actually planning something to do with him, they'd let him know... and Maya had sounded pretty upset, too.
