Scruffy Girl

by Dirtyhands

Summary

Steve may as well be invisible. All most people see is the Cap. But one scruffy girl sees him. Responsibility rests heavy on his shoulders after the fall of SHIELD, and only she lightens the burden for him. Steve has to learn to deal with the messy side of being a real man in a world full of false people. Good thing he's got his scruffy girl to remind him of what's important.

Notes

Constructive criticism welcome! I'm doing this as a writing exercise before I move onto a larger work. I won't necessarily heed criticism if I see things differently than you, but I appreciate your thoughts if they can improve my work. I'm not trying very hard to stick to canon, just having fun with the characters. This is my first posting to this site, so please be patient while I learn how to get the formatting correct.
Chapter 1

Steve ground his teeth at the same time that he was shaking the tension out of his arms and legs. For almost two years, his morning run had served him well to loosen his body right along with the constant tug of stress that nagged his mind. For the past few months since the fall of SHIELD, he'd had the responsibility of leading the Avengers. Lately, running only worked his heart and lungs for him. He ended his miles just as tight and tense as when he'd began. His brain wouldn't shut up. There was too much to think about.

Steve bent and stretched at the corner of the park before he was in sight of the sidewalks and traffic. He breathed deeply of the grass and the trees. It was a nice morning, not too hot for August in New York. Sweat slicked his body, but he felt fine. A breeze rustled the leaves on the trees as he strode through the park gateway and to the crosswalk at the corner. The sounds of vehicle traffic, busses, taxis, and couriers on bicycles roared in his ears, but it was all normal background noise.

He was always alert, always assessing his surroundings. He mixed in with the bunch of pedestrians waiting to cross, most hurrying to work in nearby office buildings. There were various ringtones and text alerts, mixed music leaking from people's earbuds, and several voices talking on phones.

A small child's voice caught his attention. He looked down and to the side where a young woman stood with a baby in a stroller and a toddler in hand. The little girl was dark skinned, with beautiful curly hair held in purple clips.

"Mama, is dat Cap'Merica?" the child asked as she tugged at her mother's hand.

The woman barely paid attention to her daughter, she was so focused on safely navigating her family on the busy sidewalk. The crosswalk light changed to green and the crowd surged forward.

"I don't think so, Boo. Come on, let's go," the woman murmured.

She tugged the child along, but the girl only had eyes for Steve. He smiled at her and nodded his head slightly. Just so the kid didn't stumble in the street trying to look at him and walk at the same time, Steve strode ahead when he could so at least the child would be looking the same direction she was supposed to be walking.

He'd been back in the city for a while now, so people were getting used to seeing him around. Especially near the park in the mornings. Most people going about their business paid him no mind, like the mother had done, just now. Everybody was in too much a hurry to notice another tall guy. They were too engaged with their phones. At least once a week, he saw people almost get flattened in traffic while looking at their phones.

The crowds thinned when he was a little farther away from the main shopping centers and the office buildings. His destination was only a few blocks from the tower. A glint of unusually bright metal in the sun caught his eyes, but when he looked up, it was just a reflective sticker on a courier's pack. Steve frowned at himself and turned to walk through the door of his most recent favorite coffee shop.

The morning rush was almost over, so he was just third in line at the counter. The girl at the register saw him and smiled in a manic sort of way. She got his usual size cup and wrote his name on it. There was a brief and ever so slight hush inside the shop, then Steve could pick out people's voices here and there excitedly saying "Captain America" or some derivation of his name. Most people were regulars and knew better than to make an issue of his presence, but there were always tourists and new people.

"Good morning, Kara," Steve said when he stepped up to the bar.

"Hi," Kara said. She smiled shyly and blushed to a deep rose color.

"Iced mocha today," Steve told her. He schooled his features into a kind, bland smile. Izzy, the morning barista, took the cup with Steve's name on it and started making his drink. Steve paid and tipped a dollar into the jar. Izzy rolled his eyes at Kara's flustered silence.

There were several different kinds of reactions he got from women, and they hadn't changed a whole lot since he came out of the ice. Kara was just about in the category with the worst of them, barely saved from it by her shyness and her blushing. The very worst just blatantly stared at him, either in shock or in open lust. At least Kara had the dignity to turn her attention to the next customer nowadays and she tried to ignore Steve until her blushing stopped.

The first day he'd come into the coffee shop, she'd been much worse. They'd been busy and Kara was already a little overwhelmed. The customer in front of Steve had stepped aside and Kara's mouth fell open. She'd stared silently at him for a good fifteen seconds before Steve had tried a grin along with placing his order. Izzy'd had to bump Kara away from the register and take Steve's order, then wash his hands again after handling the money.

"Are you crazy? Captain America shouldn't have to pay for his coffee!" Kara had finally hissed at Izzy as if Steve wasn't standing right there.

"Kara," Steve had said, looking at her nametag, "Captain America sometimes gets a free ride, but Steve Rogers always pays his way."

"Yessir," she'd mumbled faintly.

Steve had taken his drink from Izzy and left the shop. The next several visits to the coffee shop were almost as bad. There was no point in switching shops, because he got pretty much the same treatment everywhere. By now, Kara just blushed and let him pay, so it was tolerable.

Today, there were people at all the café tables outside. Steve realized he was grinding his teeth again and made himself loosen his jaw. It wasn't these people's fault that he had a lot on his mind. He was aware of how his facial expressions affected others, since he was stared at so often. When he looked anything other than pleasant or bored, young people tended to get nervous around him. Older folks picked up on his mood and he didn't want to bring them down. He purposefully relaxed his face and glanced around for a spot to park his rump.

The only spot that wasn't in anyone else's personal space was at one end of a long city bench near the sidewalk. A thin, scruffy looking person sat on the other end. Steve wasn't afraid of scruffy. He'd been scruffy for a while, himself, many years ago. He swished his iced mocha around in the cup with his straw and ambled casually over toward the bench.

"Mind if I sit?" he asked the person on the bench.

Dark eyes flashed up at him from under matted blonde hair, then a hand waved at the vacant seat. As Steve sat, the person inched as far away as they could toward the other end of the bench. Steve felt bad for bothering an obviously disturbed person, and almost changed his mind. Then, he glanced up from sipping his beverage to see everyone pretending not to stare at him on the bench next to the scruffy person.

While he very well understood the concept of personal space in the city, there was a different dynamic going on here. He could feel it. The street person next to him wasn't drunk or drugged out of their mind, nor were they sleeping. They were hyper-aware and clutching their almost empty coffee cup in a slightly trembling hand.

For some reason, the sour tension fogging Steve's mind and the speculative, judging looks they were getting from the other coffee shop patrons broke his intentions to stay pleasant.

"Look at them. Wearing their hundred-dollar shoes, holding their thousand dollar phones, staring at us like we're gonna do something to them. I wonder what they think I'm gonna do?" Steve said, low and disgusted. He kept his eyes on his running shoe, which was crossed over his knee. He flicked a few blades of grass off of the dark gray rubber sole.

The silence next to him was still intent and uncomfortable, but Steve got the sense that the person wasn't on the verge of running away anymore. So he kept on.

"Yeah, I know I have hundred-dollar shoes, too, but I actually use mine for something. Really, decent shoes can't even be had for a hundred dollars anymore. That's a shame, huh?" He said, still keeping his voice from carrying across the twelve or so feet between their bench and the café tables. People walked by in between on the sidewalk, but nobody was stopping to listen to him. He could say anything he wanted, and only Jarvis might be listening, this close to the tower.

Steve saw that the other occupant of the bench had their feet pulled up under them, knees bent sideways. They probably didn't have hundred-dollar shoes. Steve relaxed back against the bench and angled himself into the corner a little. It wasn't precisely comfortable, but Steve didn't expect comfort everywhere he went.

He sipped his coffee and let himself shut his eyes in appreciation of the cool breeze that swept past the bench. There was a small tree shading them, and its leaves shushed softly in the wind.

"You've got good taste in sitting spots. This is nice," he said lazily.

For some reason he couldn't figure, the tension he had worked so hard to get rid of during his run was draining away while he sat there. For several minutes, he held his cup in one hand propped on his crossed knee. His other hand hung limp from where his elbow was bent over the back of the bench. The breeze dried the last of the dampness from his skin, and he felt his body temperature ease back to normal.

"'Scuse me, Captain 'Merica, can I have your, uh, auto, uh, can you write your name for me?" a little voice asked at his bent knee.

He'd heard the small person approach, his ears listening to shifting sounds as people moved by. He could almost see his surroundings in his mind, just from what his ears were telling him. He opened his eyes and turned a relaxed smile to the little guy who'd so bravely approached him.

"Sure, buddy," Steve said.

He even withheld the sigh he felt like huffing out. It was a little kid, and little ones didn't understand that he wanted to be left alone while he was off-duty. Steve glanced at the child, then across at the mother who had sent him over. The kid only had eyes for him, but the mom was watching his bench-mate with concern and a little frown on her face.

He signed his name with the ink pen offered onto the bill of the red ballcap the boy held out to him. The brown haired child stared at him for several seconds more after he'd handed the pen and the cap back. They did that sometimes, like they were waiting for something else. Steve took his arm off the bench long enough to pat the kid on the shoulder, then he rested his arm back where he'd had it.

"Be good for your mom, now," Steve said.

The boy nodded seriously and turned to run back to his mother. He bumped into a passing man, but the man ignored the incident and kept walking. The mother exclaimed over the autograph on the ballcap, then ushered her son away from the coffee shop.

"Would ya look at that," Steve exclaimed softly, "They don't know me any better than they know you, but they want my autograph while they're scared of you."

"Hmph," the person next to him on the bench grunted. It was a distinctly feminine grunt, so that answered one of Steve's questions. The baggy, dull-colored clothes and huddled posture had made it impossible to tell the sex of his bench mate. Not that it mattered.

"Yeah," Steve agreed vaguely.

Celebrity had settled uneasily on his shoulders. He'd rather be out fighting or training in the gym, or running miles than be fawned over by the public. But he didn't always get what he wanted. He hadn't thought about becoming a celebrity when Dr. Erskine had offered him the serum. He'd only wanted to serve his country like his father had. Like Bucky was. Steve understood the kind of symbol he was for people, and he tried to project the image most people wanted to see from him. Lately, he'd more often wanted to keep his on-duty and his off-duty lives separate. Maybe that was because he had so much to manage and plan that he had almost no off-duty time and what he had, he wanted to guard jealously. But he was tired of looking at the internet and watching movies up in the tower.

Steve allowed himself to shut his eyes. He hoped he had at least a few minutes of peace in the pleasant breeze before he heard the words "Captain America" again. The sun was hidden behind a cloud and the breeze got even cooler. It felt like it might rain. Steve let his mind drift. He'd tried closing his eyes like this before and pretending that when he opened them, he'd be back home and Bucky would be beside him, smirking at something he was thinking about doing. It didn't work well. New York sounded too different.

There was movement near him, and Steve tensed slightly, imperceptibly. He waited for someone to ask for another autograph, but the person must not have been coming for him. They moved away and his peace continued undisturbed.

A light, misting rain began to fall, and people got up from the café tables to hurry away from the weather. Steve sighed deeply, happy to hear them go. Sure, there were still some folks around, but he knew they clutched umbrellas and hurried along. Nobody would stop to bother him in the rain.

The scruffy girl was still sharing the bench with him. Steve rolled his head around and cracked an eye at her.

It was a light rain, just barely enough to dampen his hair and his shirt. He hardly noticed damp skin anymore. Dark eyes watched him.

Steve shrugged.

"The rain doesn't bother me, but maybe you should get somewhere dry?" he suggested with a rattle of ice in his nearly empty coffee cup.

Her eyes darted around nervously. Her clothes were in pretty bad shape, and the dampness in the air carried a distinctly human smell to him. It wasn't awful, but it wasn't perfumed and shampooed, either. He'd smelled worse. Much worse.

She was uneasy with just him there and she didn't want to make the first move. That much was obvious. Steve casually got to his feet and sipped down the last of his drink. He stepped over to toss the cup in a recycling bin. The wind was starting to gust and the rain was getting heavier.

"See ya," he said to the person on the bench. He tilted his head at her and then turned to stride off to the tower. He didn't look back. She didn't want him to see where she went. He understood and respected that, so he kept walking.

She waited. Since she'd been caught by the rain, it wouldn't be good to go to the library. They didn't like any dampness brought in near the books. She watched his tall figure for a few blocks until he was lost among the few other people on the sidewalks. He probably turned in at the big tower.

It wasn't fun being damp, but at least it wasn't winter. When she was sure that nobody was watching, she moved toward the alley beside the coffee shop. She squeezed into the narrow gap between the dumpster and the chain link fence. Where the fence met the brick wall of the building, she'd unbent a few wire brackets so that she could squeeze through. Her clothes snagged and tore a little, but it didn't matter. The chain link fence wall had privacy battens running diagonal both ways across the alley, and nobody could see her after she passed through it.

Her alley was almost fifteen feet wide, paved with cracked asphalt, and surrounded on all sides by brick, except for the one chain link wall. The two buildings were pretty tall, but older and not made of metal or glass. The only windows were a few small ones above the second floor, mostly covered with curtains which never moved. The back wall was mismatched brick, probably twelve feet high. Nothing ever came over it but maybe a cat now and then. She liked cats.

She hurried to her shelter against the side of the coffee shop. She'd scavenged some abandoned scrap at night and snuck it into her alley. There was an old trash can shelter with a metal roof from before there'd been a dumpster. She'd cleaned it out until there was nothing but pavement and brick wall. Then she'd raised the floor with pallets so that she could lie down right up under the metal roof, out of the rain or the snow and away from any eyes. Eventually she'd closed in the sides with metal and plastic so that the wind didn't get her so much in the winter. Layers of mostly new, clean carpet remnants cushioned her wooden pallet bed.

She had learned that it was best to keep no food or water near her nest. She'd tried setting out a little extra food to attract cats, hopeful that they would keep vermin away, but cats were unreliable. Mostly, vermin had come instead. So she'd scavenged an old broom and kept her alley meticulously clean.

Rain water ran down the brick wall her little lean-to roof was attached to. That was alright, because she'd moved her pallets and carpets an inch away from the wall a long time ago. As long as she lay still and careful and the wind didn't blow too much, she would stay dry.

Except, she was already damp from having to sit out in the drizzle until he'd left.

Sure, maybe he was a hero and all, but she didn't let anybody know where she lived. It wasn't safe. No one could be trusted. She knew she had a good place here, but if anybody knew about it, she'd have to move on. And she'd have to find another place. And more scraps for shelter. And worst of all, she'd have to learn the timing of everything all over again.

She'd moved around a lot. This alley was the longest she'd stayed anywhere, and that was because she was getting wiser. The police had shuffled her along out of her last place, and there'd been too many dangerous men at the place before that. This part of town was a good place, relaxed and low-key. She'd passed by and watched for days before she'd looked for a nook to settle into. There were always small places for small people. Some were better than others.

As she lay down and pulled her clean, dry blanket around her, she wondered what it was like to be a hero like him. He was on the news every time something big and awful happened. And he was on the news when he went to charity things, too. She'd seen him in shop window televisions, and the muted coffee shop TV, and it was blaring from everybody's phones when something was actively happening. That thing with the weird ships going up then falling out of the sky had been so unreal, she wondered if it had actually happened. Did the government actually have ships like that, that could just hover over people ominously? She shivered. She guessed they didn't anymore. Because of him.

He did what he had to do. Some people loved him for it. Others complained about the mess. Like with the aliens. She didn't think the aliens were his fault. If anything, they were likely Stark's fault. Or maybe it wasn't even related, and the Avengers had only stepped in to stop the aliens. Aliens!

"Hmph!" she grunted and shook her head to clear it of the troubling thoughts. Nobody wanted to think about aliens. Nobody in New York, anyway. She wondered if people in other cities didn't believe that the aliens had been real, just like she had a hard time believing the hover-ships were real. But she'd seen the aliens with her own eyes because it had happened here, right overhead. A lot of the scraps her shelter was built from were throw-outs from all the reconstruction.

She'd gotten distracted from thinking about him with distressing thoughts of aliens and hover-ships. Her mind wasn't always the best, though she tried. She knew that she'd need to eat more if she wanted her brain to work like it used to. But it wasn't worth the risk.

She fell asleep to dreamy thoughts of what it would be like to be strong and big, like him. How wonderful it must be to not have to be afraid all the time. To walk down the street like she owned the place and didn't expect anything bad to happen to her…

Steve hit the bag again, hard. He wished Thor was around, but he was off somewhere with Jane. He had learned to moderate his anger and frustrations, drawing them out into longer boxing sessions, instead of short bursts of rage which broke equipment. The tough Asgardian could take as well as he gave, and Steve didn't have to hold back for him. Tony could only spar with him wearing one of the suits, and Steve had damaged the suits too often for Tony to want to do that anymore.

Bruce. Steve huffed a laugh between punches. Bruce was amazing. He had very little agility or aggression in him most of the time. Getting him into the training room was like trying to herd water uphill with a sieve. Mostly, Bruce stood resigned and cautious when he could be badgered into the training room at all. The one time Steve had tried to punch him lightly to get him in the mood, Bruce had caught his fist like concrete with a slightly green hand. Natasha had smirked at them both and shook her head.

Thor was who he needed. Steve felt humbled working with Thor. Natasha was a thrill and kept him on his toes, but they both knew she couldn't really hurt him. They both knew he could ignore the pain she rained down on him and choose to slam her to the mat if he really tried. Nat mostly sparred with Clint, who understood her. Or with Thor, who got the biggest grin of admiration when he was with her on the mats. Because Thor was a gentleman. Like Steve used to be.

Steve moved from the heavy bag to the speed bag. It was frustratingly small, but it helped him work on his timing.

Like his morning run, Steve eventually left the floor unsatisfied. Without Thor, there wasn't anyone or anything that could really work him. It was only early afternoon, and unless something happened, Steve had no plans.

He wiped at sweat with his towel and headed for the elevator.

"Good afternoon, Captain," Jarvis greeted him.

"Hey," Steve replied. He wished Jarvis would simply call him Steve, but that apparently wasn't going to happen.

In a bid to encourage Jarvis to be less formal with him, Steve used casual grammar in the common areas of the tower whenever he could.

"Do you have eyes on the coffee shop I went to this morning?" he asked while the elevator sped up to his floor.

"I do have surveillance available, if you wish to review it. I only keep the last month's data unless a notable event occurs. I can have anything you wish sent to your rooms. Do you have a time range I should provide? Visible spectrum or infrared?" Jarvis offered.

"Thanks, Jarvis, but no. I don't think I'll need all that. Did you see the person on the bench with me today?" Steve asked.

The elevator stopped on his level and opened at the lobby he shared with Clint. Steve walked to his suite and Jarvis' voice followed him.

"I did. Female, between fifteen and twenty years of age. Appallingly undernourished," Jarvis offered the information. His voice was polite and cool, even when mentioning her poor physical condition.

"Fifteen?! It was hard to tell, but…Wow. What could cause a person so young to be out on the street? Are you sure?"

"A dental scan confirmed her age range, though I am sorry to say I cannot be more precise. Unfortunately, there are many reasons a young person might find themselves without a home. An internet search for the terms "homeless youth" would provide you with better answers, Captain," Jarvis told him.

"Alright. Thanks, Jarvis," Steve said.

His door was keyed to his biometrics. All of them, down to the serum in his blood. It opened and he walked into the cool, dark space.

"My pleasure, Captain," Jarvis said from out in the hall before the heavy door closed.

Steve knew the AI could listen and speak to him in his suite, but Jarvis was good with at least maintaining the illusion of privacy. Steve walked through his spacious living room, past the efficient galley kitchen, and to the end of the hall into his bedroom. The living room and master bedroom had floor to ceiling windows, but Steve kept the privacy tint active in the glass much of the time.

He flicked on the lighting in his room and shucked off his shoes by the closet door. The rest of everything came off in the bathroom and splattered onto the creamy tile floor. Steve stepped into the shower and again marveled that even the first spray of water was warmed to the temperature the preferred. Tony had every physical comfort he could think of available to the Avengers, and many Steve had never imagined.

He didn't want to know what a flesh light was, but he'd found one in his night stand drawer. It was still unopened in its clear plastic hygienic wrapper. The mind boggled. He'd set the unwanted thing out in the elevator lobby. It had been gone the next morning and Tony had frowned at him like a kicked puppy for days. He knew Tony. The disappointed expression was only there to bait him into asking what was wrong. Steve had resisted the bait.

Steve relaxed under the warm water until he was thinking about nothing but the sensations from his body, as Bruce had taught him. As a calming tactic, it only worked in the shower when there wasn't anything else to distract him. Bruce could meditate in the middle of a busy street, Steve imagined. He grabbed the bar of soap and lathered up. His ma had taught him since he was little to clean out funny areas like the crinkles of his ears and his navel. He scrubbed his back with the floofy thing, then rinsed off. He liked the floofy thing a lot, except when he had stitches.

His hair was getting longer because the guys in his barber shop only wanted to talk about Captain America, and he didn't want to be rude and correct his elders. Well, technically, they weren't his elders, but they looked like his elders even though he had a good thirty years on most of them. It was simpler to go to the barber shop less often when he felt like indulging the fellas and putting on his Cap act. So, his hair was a little longer. Nat didn't mind trimming the back for him when she was around.

Steve squeezed a dollop of shampoo into his palm and worked it into his hair. He scrubbed and rinsed, then eyeballed the hair conditioner skeptically. Pepper would fuss at him for leaving his hair unconditioned, but he hated the stuff. It felt like slug slime or axle grease to him. Squeaky clean hair was good enough.

He shut off the water and dried his skin roughly. He wasn't planning to go anywhere so he poked his legs into his boxer briefs and went to the kitchen for something to eat. With a bowl of herbed noodles and shredded beef, he settled onto his couch and pulled up his pad to rest against his thigh while he ate.

Jarvis was right. He learned more than he ever wanted to know about why young people were homeless these days. It wasn't because of fathers lost to fighting a war. It wasn't because of tuberculosis or parents away to find work in a distant city. It was just sad. People were crappy parents.

He wondered at the cause of her situation. He was aware that he was a poor judge of what was dangerous and what wasn't. He always had been. The other folks at the coffee shop seemed to fear the girl on the bench with him today. He wondered why. She was sickly. Too poor to own a gun or a decent knife. If anybody took the time to look, they could have seen that she was more frightened of everyone than they were of her. The most she could have done would be to punch or bite someone, yet she hadn't been violent. It was a wonder she'd been brave enough to sit out in the open at all. With no phone to look at to put up a social barrier around her.

Steve flipped the cover over his pad and set it on the coffee table. He folded his arms behind his head and slid down into the deep cushions of the couch. He could faintly hear the rain hitting the glass on the outside of the tower. Where was she now? In a doorway somewhere? No, people didn't allow vagrants to linger in doorways anymore. Was she in a communal shelter somewhere, having to listen to a speil or attend a church service simply to have a roof over her head and a meal? Why was she so underfed?

Steve pondered all this as the rain lulled him into a shallow, restless sleep. Why did she choose to live like that? Did she find freedom in it? Life was complicated today. More complicated than it had ever been. Everything required paperwork and contracts and agreements not to sue. Just to live required a paper trail and medical plans and electronic accounts. Steve wanted to ask her what it was like to leave all that behind and not worry about it. To not have to be responsible for the lives of others must be wonderful. To walk down the street and have nobody notice him at all…
Chapter 2

Kara's color was high today, but not exactly a blush.

"Good morning, Kara," he said hopefully.

"Good morning, Steve," she whispered back dutifully. Her cheekbones glowed a little brighter. Her eyes gave him the once over and he tried not to grin at how pathetically obvious the girl was. He bit his lip and looked down at the countertop and all the little treats arrayed temptingly there. He studied the pastries in the glass case under the counter and gave her time to get over her nerves. There was nobody in line behind him, so he could afford to give her some time in Cap-resistance training. He glanced up from under his brow at her. Nope. She was still staring, still flustered. Steve let go of his bit lip as his face pulled into a grin anyway. Poor kid. She was too young to know what to do with him.

"Just a large plain cappuccino, please," he said gentle and pleasant. He was in a better mood today and the voices murmuring around him didn't bother him so much. Kara was more an entertainment than an annoyance to him.

"Quit that before she hyperventilates. I need her on her feet for at least another half hour" Izzy said to him. The barista was busy with his drink, but he spoke loud enough to be heard over the steam wand and the tamping.

"Sorry," Steve said. Izzy smirked at him, then handed him his drink. Steve stuffed a one in the jar and ambled outside.

It was another sunny day, with no hint of clouds this time. It was a little later in the morning, so there were plenty of empty tables. But he liked the bench. And there she was. She hadn't been there when he walked up to the coffee shop.

"May I?" he asked.

She raised her chin enough to look briefly at him, then she gathered herself toward the far end of the seat again, just like last time, but without the hand gesture of invitation. Steve tossed away his little red stirrer stick in to the recycle, then settled on his end of the bench. She was on the shadier end closer to the tree, but she'd been here first. Sweat prickled on his forehead in the dappled sun. He wiped at it with his workout towel and sat away from the corner where the brighter sunlight was.

Her eyes looked at the available empty tables, then at him, then down at her feet in her busted out old white sneakers.

"I know there's other places to sit, but you make for better company," Steve told her. He had to watch his tone because it was quieter out today and he didn't truly want to offend people. There were a few older women at a table across from them, and some people in suits, and a mother with school aged kids at the one other shady spot in the patio. Probably home schoolers, Steve figured. He fully expected one of the three kids to approach him eventually. He liked kids, but they could always be counted on to make a fuss around him. One of the business men was looking his way, and Steve nodded once in greeting. That was usually enough for his adult male fans.

He sipped his hot beverage and enjoyed the flavor of the whole milk. As long as he'd been awake in the modern world, he still appreciated the little luxuries that everybody else took for granted.
Back in the day, milk was saved for babies and old folks. There were endless little packets of sugar to doctor his coffee with. Several different kinds of sugar, as if regular sugar wasn't enough.

Steve felt his mind going down the old tired path of how soft and spoiled people were now. It was depressing to think that few would likely get behind any kind of war effort that caused a hint of inconvenience. He sighed and rubbed his temples with his thumb and forefinger.

A look over at his bench buddy eased his negativity some. Here was a tough girl. She didn't need fancy, complicated gadgets or pampered indulgences. He was sorry for the haunted shadows in her eyes, but he admired her for making it through whatever it was that got her here. Steve imagined he could have tugged her under his arm while the Commandos made their way across Europe and she wouldn't have complained about the deprivations.

"I'll be back in a minute or two. Save my seat, will ya?" he asked her with a smile. He got up and walked over to a hotdog cart a half block down the sidewalk. He wanted to give her a chance to get away if she really didn't want his company. Like the other day, he didn't look back at her. She could run off unseen if it made her feel more secure.

When he got back to the bench with four chili dogs, she was still there, but she refused to look at him. He set the dogs in their little paper tubs on the bench between them and placed his coffee down on the pavement. He devoured the first hotdog quickly and neatly. He slowed down a little on the second one. He made his way half through the third dog, then set it down and patted his belly. The fourth one sat untouched.

"Hmm. I'm not as hungry as I thought I was. Oh, well," he said. He got up and brought the hotdog and a half to the dumpster in the nearby alley. Instead of tossing them in, he left them on the metal ledge the garbage truck used to lift the dumpster. The large dumpster had recently been emptied and sprayed down, so there weren't any flies or stench.

He returned to the bench and picked up his drink. She had an empty cup sitting on the ground on her side of the bench. There were a few coins in it. Not enough for a hotdog or even another coffee.

Steve settled back into the corner of the bench again. The angle of the sun had changed enough that there was more shade. He shut his eyes and felt for any hint of a breeze, but there was none today. Still, it was nice to enjoy the relative quiet since most people were inside for the morning. He sprawled out with his ankle across his other knee and his elbow up on the bench back.

He heard the mother and children get up and move. He expected to be spoken to, but they moved on by after momentarily coming his way. Steve crinkled his brow. He was going to ask Jarvis for a review of that moment. Something strange was happening.

The quiet of his bench buddy and the emptiness of the sidewalk had him almost dozing off in the warmth of the day. He was brought to attention by a man's footsteps, sure and confident toward him.

"I'm sorry to bother you, Captain, but I wanted to thank you for your service to our nation," one of the business men said. He was in his early forties, probably. He held out his hand and Steve sat up properly to shake it.

"It's my honor to serve," Steve said solemnly and stood up to greet him properly. The man made a familiar aborted move, which Steve began to reciprocate, but they both smiled tightly instead. As the man walked away with his co-workers from the café table, Steve noted from the way he moved that his right leg was a prosthetic under his suit pants. There was a rough pattern of scarring on the back of his neck and up his scalp into his hair.
"Ugh. Nasty devices," Steve said when he sat back down, "sometimes the wounds never fully heal. But he seems to be doing alright." He nodded at the retired soldier and sipped his drink.

She turned her head and looked at the man walking away. Her eyes swept past the alley and the hotdogs sitting on the edge of the dumpster before glancing at Steve's face, then down to her hands curled in her lap. God, she was skinny. He hoped she ate what he'd gotten for her. She was smart enough to know what he'd done, but maybe too proud to accept the help.

"See ya later," he said after a moment. He walked to the tower and didn't look back.

"Jarvis, you have my recent encounter with her?" Steve asked as the elevator took him up. It was barely noon, and he'd felt no need to visit the heavy bag. Maybe tonight. Right now he wanted to investigate what had happened.

"I do, Captain. Would you like to view it on your pad?" Jarvis offered. The AI knew that Steve rarely turned on his huge flat screen television.

"That'd be great," Steve said as the elevator doors opened on his floor.

He took a quick shower because he could smell himself. He didn't want to get man stink in the furniture's upholstery like Clint did in his suite. His ma would twist his ear for dirtying the nice furniture. The furniture in his suite of rooms didn't look like anything out of the ordinary. The stuff was heavy, it never stained, and it was firmly but softly upholstered. Anything understated in Tony's building was that way on purpose. He was thankful to either Tony or Pepper, whoever was responsible for not making his suite into a steel and glass monstrosity like so much of the tower was.

In only his underwear again, as a mild act of rebellion against how proper he was required to appear in public, he settled onto the couch with a glass of water and picked up his pad.

He tapped around until he had opened the file Jarvis sent him. He disliked looking at recordings of himself. He didn't want to get man stink in the furniture's upholstery like Clint did in his suite. His ma would twist his ear for dirtying the nice furniture. The furniture in his suite of rooms didn't look like anything out of the ordinary. The stuff was heavy, it never stained, and it was firmly but softly upholstered. Anything understated in Tony's building was that way on purpose. He was thankful to either Tony or Pepper, whoever was responsible for not making his suite into a steel and glass monstrosity like so much of the tower was.

His scruffy friend sat pretty much motionless. He sped up the video play until the woman and kids got up from their table, then slowed to normal speed. He used his fingers to zoom in a little. There it was. The pre-teen boy of the family had approached him, but something made him break off and rejoin his sisters and mother. He looped back and watched the moment several times. There was an only slightly perceptible turn to his bench buddy's head right before the boy had decided to change course. He wished the camera angle was lower, but it was clear what had happened.

"I've got a little watchdog," Steve said, amazed.

She was turning away people who would bother him with just a look. The wounded veteran chose to ignore her warning and approach him anyway, but anyone less than a hardened soldier she turned away from him.

"Whaddya know, I've got my own watchdog! She's not as shy as I thought," he marveled.

He watched on through until he saw her take the hotdogs he'd left for her. She didn't take all of them, and the dumpster was at the very edge of the camera's field of view. He couldn't see her body, just her hands as she carefully pulled the sausage out of the buns and scraped the chili off
Steve sat back and closed the tablet. He liked her, but that didn't mean that she owed him anything. Or that he owed her anything. Of course, he wanted to swoop in and 'fix' her life for her. But he was old enough to know that wouldn't work as slick as he would want. People were how they were for a reason. If he wanted to do anything for her at all, he'd have to be slow and patient and respectful of her limits.

Mostly, he liked the way he felt when he was around her or even thinking about her, like now. She relaxed him. When his thoughts were on her, he wasn't thinking about Hydra or personnel management or public relations or any one of the myriad other tasks he was responsible for. Her uniqueness broke him out of his usual mental scrum. It was selfish of him to like her mainly for how she made him feel, but for once, he wanted to be selfish. It's not like he would do anything to hurt the kid. Maybe they could find a way to help each other out.

He was back again, standing outside the coffee shop. It was raining hard and he was dripping. He didn't use an umbrella. Maybe he wasn't joking when he'd said that the rain didn't bother him. Lightening flashed and thunder rolled and he smiled up at the sky like a crazy person. He finally stepped under the awning and started wringing his towel out.

She watched over the rim of her coffee cup while he went methodically about wiping himself dry, then wringing the small towel, then wiping again until he was dry enough to come inside the coffee shop. Thunder rumbled and rain poured down a few inches away from him, but he wasn't in a big hurry to get inside like the other patrons who rushed in, dripping, from the sidewalk. Half of them didn't order anything. They stood inside the door and waited for the downpour to pass. And they looked at him while he took his time making himself presentable.

The inside tables were all packed full except for hers. She had her feet looped possessively through an empty chair. People had tried to take it but she wouldn't let them. The barista was giving her hard looks, but she ignored him.

He got in line and smiled at her when he saw her sitting inside. His hair was spiky in front and a little mussed off to the side from the sloppy toweling off. It was a while until he got his drink, a hot mocha with whipped cream and cinnamon. She held on tightly to her empty chair.

He looked around briefly, but then headed right for her table. His eyes noted her legs twined in the empty chair and he paused across from her.

"May I?" he asked politely. He was happy today, despite the weather. Or maybe because of it. She thought he was a little unhinged, but maybe being a hero made him that way. She moved her feet, then used one to push the chair out at him.

"Thanks," he said to her. He tilted his cup to sip and whipped cream touched his nose. He wiped it off with a knuckle.

"Thanks," he said to her. He tilted his cup to sip and whipped cream touched his nose. He wiped it off with a knuckle.

"Did I get it all? I'd hate to sit around with cream on my nose," he asked.

She nodded a little. Her plain black coffee was heavily doctored with half and half and sugar. She was feeling giddy at the rush of caffeine and sugar. Her heart thumped fast and kind of painfully. It was loud in the coffee shop with all the people crammed in.

There was a small uproar when he'd come inside, but he'd blandly ignored it, other than to smile kindly around at everyone in general. She got just the opposite treatment. People went quiet around her and reached to put their phones in front of their faces. Nobody wanted to talk to her or look at her. Nobody but him.

She eyed his damp towel and his damp clothes. His pale blue shirt clung to him, as did his navy blue shorts, but the truly wet people were even worse off than him. The difference was the way his clothes fit him, even when he was dry.

"I told you I don't mind the rain. The thunder is my fault, I'm afraid. I pranked Thor. He must have found the surprise I left for him," he said with a smile. Women were staring at him behind his back. They were wondering who the bum was he'd sat down with and giving her nasty looks. She stared back at them until they looked away. Nobody wanted her attention.

When she looked back to him, he was smiling at her like she was the gifted one.

"You're really good at that. Getting them to back down. It's your super-power, I think," he said. He took a more careful sip of his coffee and avoided getting the whipped cream on his nose.

"They gave me too much. I can't even drink this," he said. He picked up his unused lid and scraped most of the cream and cinnamon off and set the cream-filled lid on the table between them. She wasn't interested in cream right now.

He was smiling and mostly happy, but she could see that the crowd of noisy people was forcing him into a constantly pleasant show of attitude that wasn't at all like how he'd behaved the last two times she'd seen him. He was relaxed, but resigned about the situation he was in. Why did he keep doing this if he didn't like being out in public?

A group of four teenage girls dressed in soggy high fashion crowded into the door and hurried through the crowd to a table of two more dry but similarly dressed girls. The dry girls pointed to her and Steve's table and a squeal of excitement went up.

A muscle jumped in his jaw, but he clamped his pleasant smile firmly in place. There was a bustle in the crowd and she turned to watch all six girls push through toward their table.

"Stand down, soldier. I can handle this," Steve said to her. She was about to turn her eyes to the approaching girls, ready to scold them when they broke through the huddled wet people, but he held his finger up from the table slightly and locked onto her eyes. She grunted in resignation and hunched her shoulders in distaste.

"Hey! Captain America, can we please-please-pretty-please get your autograph?" the dry girl in the lead said loudly when she had shouldered past a dad with a cranky toddler trying to nap on his shoulder.

"I'll give you my phone number in exchange," one of the wet girls called out in a teasing voice, as if the Captain would be eager for the trade.

Steve sat and sipped his coffee. He smiled fondly at his bench buddy as if a half-dozen pushy girls weren't standing at his elbow, practically bouncing with excitement. An awkward moment of silence stretched past.

A patron at an adjacent table got up to leave, and Steve snagged the chair with quick reflexes. He pulled the chair around to their table and bent back to look at the frustrated father standing behind his shoulder.

"C'mon, take a load off. It'll be raining for a while," Steve told the man.
"Thanks," the man said. He sank down carefully and patted the little boy's back and bounced him rhythmically. He smiled at Steve, but quickly returned his attention to soothing his boy. She carefully ignored the person he'd invited to their table. She ignored the pushy, entitled princesses too. Because he had said to.

"Look, I know it's got to be you, Cap. Can't we have a second of your time?" the lead girl asked again.

Steve tucked his smile away and turned to look at her with indifference.

"I'll be happy to give you an autograph as soon as you make a sincere apology to all the people you shoved past just now," he said cordially.

The lead girl and the ones on either side of her took a moment to realize that Captain America wasn't happy with them. Then they got angry.

"What an ass! I'm going to post a pic of you sitting around soggy with these losers," the prissy girl snapped her gum and pointed her phone at them.

"Jarvis," Steve said quietly.

"Oh my God! What did you do? All my pictures are gone! Oh my God!" she exclaimed, thumbing frantically across her phone.

"I'd appreciate it, Miss, if you wouldn't take the Lord's name in vain," Steve said somewhat less cordially. The girls beside the loud one were looking at Steve's face and tugging at their friend.

"Oh my God!" the loud one cried out, distressed that her phone was misbehaving.

Steve tilted his head slightly. The two more cautious girls grabbed their friend's arms and pulled her toward the door of the coffee shop. She balked when the rain hit her, but her friends looked back at Steve and kept pulling her.

A cheer went up in the coffee shop and the wet girls flipped the finger at them through the window. A lightning bolt struck nearby with a deafening boom of thunder. The girls shrieked and ran away in the rain. Steve laughed.

"That's a little too much, brother. I didn't want to terrify them," Steve murmured low enough for only her and the wide-eyed dad to hear. He was still chuckling, though, and the rest of the coffee shop had gone quiet.

"I'm sorry, folks. That happens sometimes. There's not much I can do about people like that," Steve said to the coffee shop patrons. He was a little embarrassed to have been the cause of a scene.

"Don't apologize, Cap. That was worth it," Izzy said into the hush. The crowd of people mostly agreed, though some were still dazed from the close lightning strike.

The fussy toddler had fallen asleep on his dad. Steve had seen reactions like that before. When little ones couldn't handle the sensory stimuli, they crashed. Or they cried.

"Sorry," Steve mouthed to the father.

The man shook his head and waved a hand.
Steve turned his attention back to his coffee, then to her.

"I think I've been rude. I'm Steve," he said. The corners of his eyes were crinkled with leftover humor. Women were staring at him again, but differently now. They anxiously edged away from his back as the coffee line moved around him.

She didn't shake his hand or respond politely because he didn't offer his hand to shake. He knew not to. She pulled a stained paper napkin toward her on the table and reached around for the can of markers that the coffee shop kept on the bookshelf under the dry-erase board.

She drew a shape on the napkin and pushed it at him.

"Star? Is that your name?" Steve asked her.

She shrugged one shoulder and looked away from him. She didn't like her name said out loud, even if he was saying it wrong. It gave people the ability to talk about her, if they heard her name. She didn't like it.

She reached quickly and snatched the napkin from his fingers. She crumpled it and stuffed it into her clothes. She clumped the marker can loudly back onto the bookshelf.

Steve wondered what he'd done to upset her. She'd been gleeful right along with him up until he'd said her name. Or, what she'd given him to assume was her name. It must be, or she wouldn't be unhappy right now.

Steve glanced aside at the man at the table with them. It was rude to exclude someone in their shared space, but the man had his chin tucked down and appeared to be dozing with his son. He doubted that was the case, but maybe the guy was trying to be polite and give him and the girl room to talk.

"You don't want me to say your name," he guessed.

She shook her head, still looking at the floor.

"No problem. I wish I could make that request of everybody, but it's too late for me," he said. She looked up at him and nodded sadly.

A young man moved away from the bar with his coffee and angled toward their table. She looked at him, but then at Steve. She didn't know if he wanted to deal with people today. Maybe he did. In the time it took to get any indication from him, the young man had approached them.

"That was awesome! You should charge admission for stuff like that," he said. Steve's pleasant smile faltered, and the young man gulped uneasily and hurried on past them.

"Hmph," she grunted and rolled her eyes. People had no sense. They were treating him like he was a circus act, and then they expected him to be happy about it. She stared at Steve for a moment, then pulled another napkin close. She got out the markers. He leaned forward to see what she would do.

She froze still when his head neared hers over the table.

Steve saw the fear in her eyes when he got too close accidentally. She was looking at him like something dreadful was about to happen.

"It's alright. You're safe. What do you want to show me?" he asked. He didn't back away. He knew he should, but something told him that she needed a firm and steady approach at just this moment. Any retreat would make it seem like he agreed that he was doing something wrong. He turned his eyes down to the napkin and the blue marker she'd uncapped.

She felt like an idiot for reacting so skittishly to his proximity. He was Captain freaking America and she was smelly and ugly right now. Of course he didn't want to be close to her for that reason. He could have any female he wanted and he'd never shown any lewd interest in her.

She backed away slowly so she wouldn't seem so frantic and foolish, and she started drawing. First, she clearly wrote his first and last name in cursive, as he usually signed his autograph. Then, she firmly scratched through it and shook her head at him. Next, she drew a loose circle, dashed a star into the middle of it, which made it look vaguely like his shield, and added "Cap" across the bottom of the shield off to the right hand edge. She pushed the napkin at him and snapped the cap back onto the marker.

He took the image and studied it. She was right. The people who wanted a little piece of him weren't looking for Steve Rogers. They wanted the Captain. Even just now, Izzy had called him "Cap" in front of the crowd instead of Steve, though the barista knew he preferred to be called his name, not his title.

"You think I should use this instead of my signature? It looks like something Tony would do," Steve studied the napkin. He turned it one way, then the other. He liked it, but it felt too glossy and abstract. It didn't match his personality. He looked up at her. Of course it didn't. That was the point she was making.

"Can I keep this?" he asked as he was about to tuck the folded napkin into the key pocket of his shorts. It was her work, and he didn't want to make off with it without her permission. That would be unforgiveable, and he understood that as an artist.

"Pssh!" she blew air at him and waved a hand at his pocket.

"Thanks. You're great," he smiled warmly at her. He glanced at his cheap plastic sport watch, then at the shop window. The sun was trying to burn through the clouds and steam was rising from the wet sidewalk.

Steve looked at her, then at the man and child napping at their table. She wouldn't want to be left alone with the strange man, no matter how nice and harmless he appeared.

"Sir, the rain has gone," Steve said softly. He tapped the man's shoulder. The guy opened his eyes and nodded drowsily at Steve. He pushed to his feet with his hand cradling the child. He nodded his thanks to Steve again, then moved to the bar. He hadn't ordered a coffee, but he put a dollar in the tip jar, then left the shop.

"Some people are decent folks," Steve observed.

She nodded at him and held his stare for a beat too long. Her eyebrow went up slightly.

"Me? Nah. What else could I do with all this? It's no more than is expected of me," Steve said shyly. He looked down at his feet, but the weight of her gaze drew his attention back.

He sobered some. She was telling him something heavy, but this time he wasn't sure precisely what.

"Yeah. I could have done something else with it, but then I really wouldn't be able to sleep at night," he said.
She tilted her head at him, much as he'd done when the loud girl wouldn't quit saying "Oh my God!" earlier.

"Alright, alright, yeah. You're as bad as Bucky. You got me. I'm not really that modest, but I'd look like a heel if I puffed up all righteous about it, okay? It's a learned response when people say things like that to me," he said quiet enough for just the two of them.

She scrunched her brow oddly and smiled. He was used to that response, too. Wow, she had nice teeth.

"Uh-huh. I know I talk strange. It comes from being so old. Look, I could stay here and talk with you for hours, but I have to go to a thing in seventeen minutes, so I gotta run. But I owe you for saving me a seat, and for this," Steve patted the waistband of his shorts where he'd tucked her simple sketch.

She shook her head and frowned at him.

"No, honest. It's worth something, and I'll make it up to you next time," Steve said. He smiled at her, and then he was away. He didn't look back to see her scowl.

Her face softened while she dipped her finger in the luscious cream and cinnamon he'd left her, though. She hadn't had cream in years. And cinnamon. She lifted her finger to her lips and licked the treat off quick and as ugly as she could. She closed her eyes and bent her head down to hide her face.
Chapter 3

She wasn't there the next time he came around after a run. Steve felt stupid for expecting her to be there. As if she lived just to be where he wanted her to be. He smiled briefly at Kara and she had no trouble taking his order today. He didn't feel like talking much.

"She was here a minute ago, out on the bench, but she left when she saw you coming," Izzy said to him.

"I'm that obvious, huh?" Steve said.

"Not so much. No more than the next guy. But the way she interacts with you… It's way more than I've ever seen," Izzy said.

Steve nodded noncommittally and took his drink. He dropped several quarters from his pocket into the tip jar.

"Thanks, man," Izzy said.

Steve smiled a little and headed for the bench. He could have sat anywhere, but he saw the black iron seat at sort of his now. He was let down and there was no hiding it. He'd slightly modified the signature sketch she had suggested. He'd practiced scrawling it quick, as he would when he gave it to people. It took him less time than writing out his full name. The only change he'd made was to slightly emphasize the A in "Cap" as a nod to the Avengers. He had a nicely drawn rendition of her sketch that he wanted to give to her first, before he started scrawling it to other people.

And there was other stuff he'd wanted to do to show his thanks, but she wasn't here. Izzy said she'd left on purpose. Steve sighed. He was pushing too hard, too fast.

She was damaged. She wasn't ready for a one on one relationship, especially with a man, even though he only wanted to be a friend. He sat on the bench just long enough to drink his Italiano.

She was remarkable. She'd never said a word to him, but he thought he understood her well enough. She was so expressive. Since she had started looking at him halfway through his second meeting with her, he could almost read her thoughts just from her face. And now he'd blundered in like an awkward calf and scared her off. Steve dug his finger and thumb into his eyelids and grimaced.

He surely could use a few words of wisdom from Bucky right now, if the dumb prick would just quit running and hiding. He and Sam had spent three days combing through a small town in Georgia on a flimsy lead about a man with a silver arm. Buck was like the ghost Nat had called him. Steve was willing to put out a billboard in Times' Square if it would get the message across to Buck that it was time to come home, but maybe Bucky wasn't ready to see him yet, either.

Steve sighed and stood up. He tossed his empty cup in the bin and tucked the drawing into the back pocket of his jeans. He needed to back off of both her and Bucky for a while, maybe. Sam had said as much about his old friend, and now he was ready to listen.

She watched him from behind her chain link wall, through the little gaps in the battens. She was very quiet because she suspected that his hearing was enhanced along with the rest of him. If she made any noise louder than a breath, his head would come up and he'd investigate. Then she'd be cornered in her alley. It was a bad flaw in her living arrangement, but no place was perfect.

She really wanted to go out and let him see her, but she couldn't. He had something for her. He wanted to give her something. She couldn't let that happen. When people gave her anything more than pocket change, they expected things from her. Things she didn't want to give.

He perched on the bench, bent over with his elbows resting on his knees. He looked like he really needed someone to talk to. It couldn't be her today. She almost willed a kid to approach him for an autograph, just so the lost and unhappy look would disappear from his face for a moment. It didn't work like that. He'd shown her last time that he was fully capable of backing down even the most obnoxious autograph-seekers all on his own, and scaring an entire shop full of people while doing so.

She hadn't been scared of the lightning. She'd been thrilled to see him call it, then to send it away. It wasn't him. He'd said as much. It was his friend, the big blonde one from the other world. Thor, he'd said. That guy did the lightning and thunder. But he'd somehow heard Steve sitting in the coffee shop, from wherever Thor had been. Thor was not small, even on television. There was no way he could have been within speaking distance and not been visible to everyone. It had something to do with Steve's phone, she imagined.

He was a fighter and he was taking down an average of three Hydra bases a month, if the news could be believed. It was only prudent of him and his friends to keep some kind of open communication among themselves when they were apart, in case something bad happened to any of them in retaliation for what they were doing. That had to be how Thor had heard his softly spoken words.

Her head hurt. She was trying to think too much. She rubbed the back of her skull under her awful hair. She hadn't had any coffee in a while. She was too down to put her cup out for change.

Steve got up and walked past the alley to go home. He looked nice in jeans and a good shirt. He wore boots with his jeans, which made him seem even taller. He wasn't looking in her direction. In a moment, he was gone from her view and she let herself climb onto her pallet bed to hopefully sleep off her headache.

Steve spent a week and a half focused on his work. Another Hydra base was a burning wreck, and Thor had gone home to take care of Asgardian affairs. Sam had joined the team along with Clint, but not Natasha this time. Sam was having some residual shock issues after the mission, and he'd left him with Bruce to meditate. Sam was so great with trauma in others that Steve had half expected him to not feel it himself.

The mission had gone bad near the end and there'd been more casualties than anyone wanted. Steve needed Natasha's firm, merciless resolve to stiffen his spine sometimes when the body count got too high, so she walked with him toward the coffee shop. It was after eight in the evening on a Thursday, but neither of them cared. Caffeine didn't do much for them. Steve was tired of briefings and intelligence meetings in the tower. He needed air with some texture to it, not just the filtered clean stuff Tony piped in.

"Is that her?" Natasha asked while they were still a block away.

"Yeah. She always wears the same thing, but she doesn't smell bad. Just earthy, you know? Not American,” Steve said. He tried hard to control his happiness at seeing her. Nat was too good at reading him and he didn't want her to get the wrong idea and tease him about it.

Natasha wasn't looking at him. The golden light from the interior of the coffee shop lit the patio and tables outside in the dark of the evening. She sat near the shop front, but off to the side at a table. She had a book in front of her, open to catch the light from the shop window. The light reflected off the book and lit her face up.

"Steve. She's gorgeous,” Natasha said. The way she said it, like it was a bad, bad thing, worried him.

"I didn't see it before, but I guess you're right. She keeps her head down so that most of what people see is her hair. With the light that way… Sure, she's pretty. But she's not well. Look how thin-"

"Cap, shut up and think for a minute," Nat pushed him aside until his back was to a plaster wall. That she called him by his title tripped his brain into work mode.

"Alright. So the scruffy street persona is a cover. She doesn't feel safe. She's serious enough about staying hidden to damage her health for the sake of cover," Steve concluded.

Natasha nodded. Her eyes were coldly serious. She looked at him that way when she was reluctant to reveal some truth to him that she thought would damage his perceived innocence.

"Scheiss!" Steve bit out.

"Language, boss. Don't let Tony hear that from you," Nat gently teased him.

"It isn't funny. She's been hurt bad. Badly enough for her to give up everything about a normal life and starve herself three-quarters to death," he ground his teeth.

"Quit messing up your perfect teeth. Unless the serum grows them back when you wear them down?" Nat badgered him.

Steve shoved his hands deep in his pants pockets. Nat rubbed his arms. She knew he wanted to hit something. The only things around belonged to other people and the Avengers already had a shaky reputation on property damage.

"Are you sure you want to get involved with this girl? Things could get messy. I know you want to help, but some people are better left alone to work out their own problems," Natasha asked.

"I know she's messed up. I just didn't know how badly until tonight. Nobody talks to her, Nat! You think that because she's got trauma, she doesn't deserve a friend? She's amazing, and we get along. What's the harm in befriending her?" Steve asked in a whisper. Nat grimaced at him and pulled him into the darkened alcove of a closed shop front. It wasn't a perfectly concealed hiding spot, but they both knew what to do to avoid too much notice.

Steve's hands went to her hips and she pressed into his chest. He tilted his head down and she spoke right at his mouth. It would look like they were kissing, and maybe they were, but the talk was all business. People hurried past and avoided looking at them.

"You're a walking erection, Rogers. You've got the body of a young man, and she's far too pretty, now that you've noticed. She's damaged and skittish. It's only your natural charm that's had her at ease with you so far. If you show her one little hint of libido, she's gone and you've done nothing but reinforce her fear of men in the worst possible way. I don't see how this is a winning situation any way you look at it," Nat warned him.

Steve banged his head back against the wall in frustration. She was right about that, but she wasn't seeing the big picture.

"I'm not like this when she's around. I'm relaxed. She's the only thing that can distract me from everything else. She's so different that it all melts away. The barista says she doesn't talk to anyone else like she does to me. There's a connection. I think she trusts me, and I think I'm good with this. I can handle it," Steve said.

"Really? Right now could you walk up to her table and be cool and emasculated with her?" Nat asked. She was snugged right up against him and he'd spread his feet to equalize their height some. There was no hiding.

"That's your fault and you know it. It's got nothing to do with her," Steve growled at her. He thumped their foreheads together.

"Ow," she complained.

"Faker," he grumbled. They head-butted each other in the training room with far more force.

"Be stubborn then. But I'm telling you that you need to find a woman to ease yourself with before you continue anything approaching platonic with this girl. You're too much for her, and she's too much for you. She'll hurt you. Break you. You're too soft, Steve," she warned him.

He laughed.

"That's rich. You complain about me being hard, and now you tell me I'm too soft. Make up your mind, Nat."

"Quit deflecting. This is important. The only way you should go near her is if you first sex up the nearest available dame," she scowled at him, "Nearest available dame, I said, old man. I'd break your balls off and eat them, you're such a pup. Now, are you going to listen to me, or do I have to whistle for a prostitute?" Nat asked archly.

"There are no prostitutes in this part of town," Steve dared her.

Nat spit out her gum and flattened her lips to whistle.

"Hey, hey! Alright, I believe you. God help me, don't whistle!" Steve clamped a hand across her mouth. He looked around nervously until he felt her body shaking with laughter. He frowned down at her and let his hand fall.

"You're a hoot, Rogers. I don't know how anybody with a kill count like yours can be so green," Natasha laughed, throaty and delighted. Then, her eyebrow arched at him.

"Shut it," Steve squeezed his eyes closed. Her laugh was sinful when she really meant it. He'd been calming down until she laughed.

"I wouldn't have to threaten you with prostitutes if you'd find yourself a nice lady," she pointed out.

"Remind me why my sex life is any of your concern?" he asked blandly.

Natasha was doing a real good job with him, she decided. He looked innocent and snarky, but she could feel the heat of him against her belly. If she didn't know him so well, she'd think he was calm.

"It's my concern because we all need your head on straight most of the time. You know that," she pulled out the big guns. Guilt and responsibility.

"Since when have I ever let personal matters affect my duties, Natasha?" he challenged her.

She let her head fall onto his shoulder. He was a sad, sad man. Just as sad as she was.

"Never. But you're not a machine, Steve. You're not like me. You grew up a nice kid with stars in your eyes. You deserve some happiness where you can find it. Don't push yourself until you break and become a man you're not proud of. Pride is important to you," she said.

He could hide some things from Bruce and Tony. He could even hide a few things from Thor if he tried very hard. But it was hopeless with Nat. She knew how on edge he was. It's why she'd been pushing him for months to go out with every 'nice' girl she could think of. She was pushing harder lately because she knew his resolve was slipping. He was changing.

Steve sighed and let his head rest down beside hers.

"I can't bring any unsuspecting woman into a relationship. Not with what we do. It would be cruel. I would be gone for weeks on missions, or I would die and hurt her. Or some Hydra creep would take her hostage because he knows I've got a weak spot in her. You know these things better than I do. How can you seriously suggest that I get involved romantically with anyone?" he asked.

"I only tried to set you up with romance because I thought it was all you'd go for. I'm not joking when I suggest a prostitute. It would solve the problem without endangering anyone," she urged him.

"As you said. I've got my pride," Steve bit out. He shoved her roughly away. Being who she was and how familiar they were with each other's bodies, Natasha didn't stumble or go through the window behind her. She smiled at him in appreciation and recovered her stance a few feet away from him.

"Then she's a casualty. An acceptable loss," Natasha said. She tipped her head briefly toward the coffee shop and the girl who waited for him there.

"She's not a casualty," Steve denied through his teeth.

Natasha looked down at the front of his jeans, then gave him the look that told him he was being a naïve fool. Again.

"I tried my best to warn you, Rogers. It's on you," Nat said. She left him and walked off into the night.

It took him six minutes of cursing himself and pacing before he calmed down enough to even consider approaching her. In the end, Natasha was right. It was better to not get close to his friend tonight. Not because he didn't trust himself to be platonic around her, but because he was in too much of a foul mood to inflict himself on anyone.

He went home and damaged a few thousand dollars' worth of equipment in the training room.
Steve tried a new tactic the next time he found her at the coffee shop. He didn't ignore her, but he didn't speak to her either. He passed her on his way in to get a cup. Then on his way out, he didn't stop and ask if he could sit with her. He strode to the bench and sat. He noted that she was sort of squirming as he approached the bench.

He looked over at her. She was clutching the far armrest and had her chin firmly down. Her legs moved restlessly, like if she only decided to touch them to the ground, she'd be gone. For over a minute, he drank his plain coffee and let her fidget. She was seething at him. He could feel it. If she spoke, she'd be ranting at him about approaching her so aggressively. He wasn't sorry. She needed to get over her fear of him or run away.

She looked at him briefly from under her hair. Yeah, she was not happy with him. And he wasn't happy that she'd been avoiding him. They sat in stiff silence until he finished his drink, which took a good twenty minutes. She wasn't running, though her legs did still twitch every few minutes.

Nobody came to talk to him, so he knew his face was anything but welcoming. He crushed his cup and aimed it at the bin. It flew in and ricocheted down the inside of the receptacle.

He braced his hands on his knees and thought about getting up to go somewhere else. Nat was right. The girl was too damaged, and he was too impatient. His time was short and he wanted to make things happen. She needed people to not make her do anything in a hurry.

"I'm sorry," she whispered.

Steve drew in a breath and held it. He counted to ten and let it out slowly.

"It's alright. Not your fault. I'm pretty good at strategy and results. Cause and effect. Probable outcome. You don't have to say anything. I know from up close and real personal what dicks men can be," he tried to comfort her.

She actually pushed him. Her weakened little claw of a hand shoved his shoulder. He barely moved. His head jerking around in astonishment that she'd touched him was more of a movement.

You know nothing, she moved her lips at him, not even a whisper this time.

"Then walk with me," Steve told her. There were too many people watching them, listening. He didn't want Jarvis listening, either. He got up and waited for her to get up too. She looked everywhere but at him, but she got to her feet. Steve started moving back toward the park where there were wide open spaces and no one was likely to listen in on them.

She wasn't beside him. He turned back, and she was standing by the bench, looking agonized and undecided. The direction of her gaze darted between the coffee shop and him. People were watching with unveiled interest.

"Nobody will bother you while you're with me. Come on. You can do this," Steve said as he would to a new soldier who needed to jump out of an airplane. His voice was authoritative and certain.

At his tone, she quit glancing around undecidedly and stared at him. She gave him what must have been the glare that she gave to eager Captain America fans when they wanted to bother him for an autograph.

"Alright. I'm gonna go walk it off. I'll see ya around," Steve said. He lifted his hands in a gesture of capitulation and he backed away a few steps before turning and striding off toward the park by himself.
She stood there and frowned powerfully at his retreating shoulders. She disliked bossy men. But even more than that, she disliked knowing that she was a cause of unhappiness for him. Belatedly, she reasoned with herself that of course he would be bossy out of long habit. He was a leader of strong people and accustomed to giving orders and having them followed. He'd been very relaxed around her so far, and this was likely simply him behaving more like himself.

"Go after him, girlie," a warbly old voice said to her from one of the café tables. She looked to see a silver haired lady pointing a finger toward the direction Steve had gone.

She looked down at her disheveled self in disbelief, then back to the old lady.

"He doesn't seem to care what you look like or who you are. Go!" the woman urged her. A well-dressed man in women's clothing nodded in emphatic agreement with the old woman, his plucked and arched eyebrows telling her she was crazy if she didn't run after him.

She shook her head in dismay, but her feet started moving.

"Captain, it may be beneficial for you to stay where you are for a moment," Jarvis' voice came to Steve from where he had his phone tucked into the back pocket of his jeans. Steve came to a stop and crossed his arms in an effort to stand still despite his agitation. He refused to ask Jarvis why he should wait. He knew already. He could hear her labored breaths approaching.

Steve turned and watched her make her way, wide-eyed and nervous, through the crowded sidewalk. He stood up taller to make sure she knew where he was. He well remembered when rushing around made him wheeze and huff like she was doing now. He had little sympathy. She'd got herself into this physical condition. He'd had no choice.

His heart softened when she reached him and leaned one hand against a sign post to catch her breath.

Asshole, she mouthed at him.

"Language," he grumbled at her.

Her mouth was partially open so she could breathe, and her lips quirked up at his admonishment. He was so weird sometimes.

"Are you ready to move?" Steve asked impatiently. He knew he was being an ass. He was intentionally testing her. He needed to know that she wanted his company, for whatever reason, enough to make a little effort at it. If she would do this, then he knew that Natasha was at least partly wrong. If she trusted him enough to walk with him out of her comfort zone, then there was something to build on. If not, he wouldn't bother her anymore, except to say hello to her at the coffee shop sometimes. He was willing to make an effort for her, and he needed to know if she felt the same before he invested anymore emotional capital in her.

She took a step away from the sign post toward him. People passed by between them, like water flowing around stones, but they were both plenty skilled at city walking to navigate the busy throng. Steve turned his body so that his right arm was toward her. He bent his elbow and offered his arm to her.

"You're not my girl or anything, but I know what bad lungs feel like. Take a little weight off and I'll tow you along," he offered. Truly, he'd do the same if he was helping an elderly person across the street.

She closed the distance between them enough that people began flowing around the two of them, rather than between them. She eyed his bare arm sticking out from his shirt sleeve as if it was a snake. Her fingers rose to touch him, then pulled back. She couldn't make herself do it.

"Or I'll walk slow," Steve compromised. He'd watched her closely. He could see that she'd tried. He was happy that she'd even considered touching him. It was good enough for now.

She shuffled along beside him, not close enough that they might accidentally touch. She hovered just at the edge of his personal space. The park wasn't far away, so he moderated his urge to get there quickly and get out of the crowd so they could talk.

He watched her while she looked around cautiously. She presented an appearance of hunched, fearful menace. No wonder people avoided her. He kept his mouth shut about it. There were bound to be reasons for why she was the way she was, and it wasn't his place to judge her. Still, a young woman her age acting like a crone was a sad sight.

Steve seethed at the likely causes of her behavior while she went with him into the park. It was over an hour before lunch, so the green space was more vacant than not. He led her to a bench just like theirs in front of the coffee shop. They automatically settled in their usual positions on the bench.

He could see her pulse jumping fast and shallow when her head moved to look around and the mats of her hair revealed her painfully thin throat. Her condition reminded him of the starving people the Commandos had liberated from a prison camp in Germany. His jaw firmed against the anger that she thought she needed to live this way. Whatever had happened, surely there were other options available to her? He knew that weak as she was, all it would take was a bout of pneumonia to kill her this winter.

She finished looking around at the park lawn and trees as if she expected someone to jump out at her. She turned her face to him though her body sat formally still on the bench. Her hands didn't even twitch in her lap.

"Thank you for coming with me. There are too many ears at the coffee shop today," Steve said pleasantly. He looked away before she felt she had to. Her lips were still parted to make up for all the extra oxygen her thready muscles had used to walk with him.

One shoulder shrugged her shapeless top at him. For at least the fifth time, he wondered what the heck she was wearing. He'd never seen anything like it in a clothing store. It was like a few different but similar shirts bunched up around each other. It completely concealed any shape that might reveal whether she was female or a small-framed male, like he had been. If somebody really wanted to know, they could wait in observation and see that her hands were too delicate to be male, and her throat was the same. But she often hid her hands and throat. She knew.

"Jarvis?" Steve asked to no one in particular.

She'd heard him say that word before. There was no response from anyone. She watched him curiously while he pulled out his phone and made a call with a few touches.

"Hi, Cheryl. I'd like to speak with Jarvis," he said into the phone.

"Captain, how may I assist you?" Jarvis' voice immediately took over the line from the Stark Industries receptionist.

"I've moved out of range, can you locate?" Steve asked.

"Of course. Do you need assistance? Sir could be there within the minute," Jarvis offered.
"No. What I'd like you to do is scan the area for organic proximity and surveillance tech," Steve requested.

"I have one person seated to your right at one point one one meters. The next nearest person is seventeen point five two meters away at mark and increasing distance on a vector of two-hundred seventy two degrees. Purely organic wildlife, and no surveillance tech with the exception of the city security cameras at the park gate and a non-functional listening device under your bench which appears to have a manufacture date sometime in the nineteen eighties. It is coated over with five layers of paint. Unless you remain on the phone with me or move twelve meters closer to the city camera, you will evade stationary surveillance," Jarvis answered.

"Thank you, Jarvis. You're a pal," Steve said with a smile.

"I'm honored to have you think so, Captain. Is there anything else I can do for you?"

"No, that's all I needed," Steve replied.

"Good day, Captain," Jarvis said, and the line went dead.

She was looking at him and the phone. He'd had it on speaker so she could hear.

"Perks of having Stark as a friend. We can speak freely and no one will hear us, Star," Steve told her.

She made a slight face. He was glad that she turned her face up to him fully and wasn't trying to hide behind her hair, but he hid his delight. Nat's training on schooling his features came in handy more than he'd thought it would. He didn't want her to think he was a creep if he seemed too happy to be around her.

"You still don't want me to say your name?" he asked.

She waved her hands at him, telling him he had it all wrong. Quickly, before he could jump to the wrong conclusion, she opened her mouth and silently enunciated her proper name to him.

"Again, please," Steve asked. He watched her mouth closely.

He smiled wide in understanding.

"Estrella. It's Spanish," Steve grinned. He didn't know nearly as much Spanish as he did French or German or Japanese, but he knew enough to understand why she'd drawn him a star on the napkin for her name, now.

"It's nice to meet you, Estrella. Am I pronouncing it right?" he wondered. He'd slightly rolled the 'r' and guessed that the two l's made a 'y'sound.

She smiled shyly and nodded.

_Just like my mami said it._ She mouthed to him. He was a marvelous lip-reader, because he smiled again.

"I hardly have the opportunity to use anything but my English anymore. It seems the whole world has learned English while I was on ice. You know about that, right? That I'm older than I look and I spent seventy years frozen in the Arctic?"

_Everyone knows that_, she mouthed.
"Good. Sometimes I wonder what people believe is real, and what they think is just a story. It all seems too make-believe to me sometimes. I mean, aliens? C'mon! I never would have believed that stuff when I was a kid," he said.

She nodded. It felt good to have a conversation with someone. She was skeptical about why he was spending time with her, but he was so nice to be around, so real. More real than most people who strenuously ignored her and hid behind their phones. She was a fool to trust him, and she knew it. But she couldn't stop herself from doing so.

She should have been terrified of him. He was large and male and strong. Everything she feared. It was difficult to see him as a threat, with the way he'd chosen to sit beside her and see her as a person worthy of his time, even though she looked like she did. She could recognize a manipulative predator in an instant. She was sure that he wasn't cultivating her trust for sinister reasons. It troubled her that she couldn't list to herself why she was so certain he wasn't up to no good, but she was sure that his intentions were simple and wholesome.

There was a faintly awkward moment of quiet in the conversation, and they both looked away at the squirrels chittering and chasing each other around a tree trunk. Steve was marveling that she wasn't asking him all the trivial questions that everyone else wanted answers to.

Estrella took a breath for courage, because she felt it wasn't her place to ask him anything deep. He'd asked a lot of her today, making her come here alone with him in an almost deserted park where people would pay no attention if she screamed. She bucked up her courage. He was looking at her, waiting. He knew she wanted to say something.

Why me? She shaped the words with confidence that he understood her. She lifted her hands from her lap and let them fall, indicating her appearance.

Steve opened his mouth to tell her why, then he shut it again. Nat would scold him for being too easy.

"That's a personal question, but we can negotiate. I'm willing to tell you the answer if you're willing to answer the same kinds of questions for me, on a basis that feels fair and comfortable to you," Steve said with level sincerity.

Estrella felt like a different person had taken Steve's place on the bench next to her. His folksy, boy-next-door demeanor had quickly gone guarded and professional. He was still open and kindly looking, but all manner of joking or humor was set aside.

He could see her pulse thump harder at her throat, and she turned her face down again. Her hands grasped each other in her lap. He didn't like seeing her afraid, especially of him. It was plain to see that she had a problem history with authority figures, and he'd sounded like what he was.

"Estrella, I'm sorry. I didn't mean to make you uneasy. I live two different lives, maybe like two personalities in one body, or two sides of a coin. They're both me, and both genuine, but life has taught me that I need to behave differently in different situations. Sometimes I can be easy and relaxed. More often I have to focus on my responsibilities. If you see me go from one to the other, it's just me dealing with situations in the ways that I know how. Can you handle that, or is it too strange for you?" he asked.

He was hopeful that she could find parallels of what he meant in her own life. He could see her thinking it through. She wasn't frozen immobile with fear or locked down with indecision. She was calmly studying her clean fingernails while she considered his words.
When she turned to him and nodded, he knew she got it. She'd been there and had cause to compartmentalize herself, too. She did him one better and smiled at him in understanding.

"I'm really glad you get that. It goes along with the fact that I may not be around for long periods of time, sometimes. I have to travel a lot. Things happen," he said vaguely. He didn't want to be too dramatic and tell her that what he did was dangerous and that he could die and never see her again, but that's exactly what he meant.

Estrella regarded him soberly, then her lips pursed out in a mutinous look. He'd have thought that she was angry with him, but her eyes got a little watery, then she turned away to rub at them.

"I used to think that I had some control over certain things, but I don't. All this," he flopped his hands in his lap, much like she had, "and there's still a whole lot of things out there that are bigger and more dangerous than me."

"You need a smaller pond", she whispered.

It took Steve a second to get what she meant. When he did, he smiled in appreciation of how her mind worked.

"You're a genius. And I think you've answered your own question. Maybe you're my smaller pond, Estrella. When I'm with you, all the busy things in my head fade away. I don't know why, but they do. You remind me that the real, everyday things are just as important as the crazy things I find myself dealing with," Steve said.

A few seconds after his mouth shut, he realized that maybe he'd sounded patronizing and insulting from her perspective. He made a pained expression and ducked his head some while his shoulders hunched up.

Estrella wondered if he thought she was going to hit him.

"Sorry," Steve said.

Quit apologizing. It's good that you're honest, she shaped the words.

"I didn't quite get that," Steve said.

"Quit apologizing. It's good that you're honest," she whispered.

He was relieved that she hadn't taken offense at his conversational clumsiness. Some people were real particular about getting their feelings hurt. He was glad she was tougher than that, because he knew he was a klutz and bound to say the wrong thing regularly. He cautioned himself to not take her easy-going manner for granted. Sam told him that people suffering from trauma had unexpected triggers. He had a few of his own. Estrella was fragile. Anyone could see that. Steve hoped he was mature enough now to avoid hurting her feelings or triggering bad memories.

They turned their heads to watch a young couple walk by them to get to a shade tree. They had lunch bags with them. It was a reminder that the park would become crowded over the next few minutes.

Steve looked at her. They didn't have much private time left. Soon, someone would notice him and he'd have to conform to social expectations again.

"I'd like to know why you don't speak," he stated. He didn't phrase his words as a question because he didn't want to make her feel that she had to answer him. Again, her pulse reacted.
"I won't be let down if you don't tell me, but you gotta admit, it's unusual," he said casually.

Estrella nodded. Her being mute was a major source of problems in her life. But the alternative was worse. He'd been open with her. She felt compelled to tell him at least something.

"My voice isn't right. I get bad reactions from people when I use it, so I don't," she whispered. That was more than she'd told anyone in New York. It would have to be enough for him.

Steve watched her, wanting to glean any extra information that her expression or body language could give him. She became still and she looked away from him again. He noticed that her skin tone was a medium golden color. Her hair was a poor attempt at blonde, and her eyes were dark brown. Estrella. She was a Hispanic American. Her hair should be black. He closed his eyes in helpless anger when he knew that she hadn't tried to bleach her hair.

She raised a hand absently and rubbed at the back of her neck, the base of her skull.

"You have a headache," Steve said.

Sometimes, she responded.

Steve forced himself to breathe calmly instead of dressing her down at loud volume as he would a disorderly recruit. She saw the anger in his expression and her eyes widened. At least she didn't creep away from him on the bench. That was progress.

"I'm angry because you're not taking good care of your health. I just remembered that light colored hair can mean extreme, long-term malnutrition. I want you to eat a better diet, Estrella. I don't want you to get sick, or any weaker than you already are," he said as gently as he could, but his words still came out as a command.

I can't. I have reasons.

"Are your reasons worth dying for?" Steve asked with grim determination.

They are to me.

Steve sat back and crossed his arms tightly. Nat would nag him for grinding his teeth. He didn't unclench his jaw, but he quit the satisfying grind of his molars. She'd gone still and scared beside him. He could hear her heart trying to keep up with the adrenaline reaction that his anger was causing her. Crap.

"Estrella, I know I can't change your mind. I have to accept that you do what you do because you think it's best, and I don't have the privilege of understanding your motives. I know myself, though. I've met you now, and I like you. I think of you as a friend. It won't be easy for me to see you suffer. I'm a man of action. I want to help you," he explained himself.

"I don't want anything from you," she whispered. Her hand rose to rub at the back of her head again.

From the look of dread on her face, he could tell he'd hit one of her triggers. And he was making her head hurt. People were starting to stream into the park for their lunch breaks. It was time to take her back to the coffee shop and leave his friend alone to calm down. Damnit, he hadn't meant to upset her today. She wasn't going to want to see him coming if he kept this up.

"Let me walk you back?" he offered hopefully.
Steve sighed and stood up. Estrella got up slowly and carefully. It was painful to watch. A sense of urgency prodded him. Anything could happen to her. Just a fall and a broken bone would end her if nobody was around to see to her. She wasn't going to willingly change her ways. He had to talk to someone. Nat. Sam. An eating disorder specialist. She was killing herself. Not on his watch, he vowed to himself.

"Don't worry. I won't say your name where anyone can hear," he assured her when she looked around and saw all the people they'd have to move through to get back to the coffee shop.

She knew she'd disappointed him. She'd been rude when she'd refused to let him help her, but she couldn't. If she let him help her like he wanted to, then her life would become a nightmare again, and he might even get caught up in it. She couldn't do that to him. Or to herself.

Estrella made her way back to their seat in front of the coffee shop. Steve was kind enough to follow behind and leave her alone as soon as he saw her sit down again.
Steve disliked asking Tony for anything. Not because Tony made a big deal out of it. Tony was always generous and glad to give to a good cause and to some not so good ones as well. But he asked a lot of pointed questions.

Tony was an expert on juicing. He could occasionally even be serious about things. Much as he thought of ways to help his friend, Steve kept circling back to the conclusion that he needed Tony's help for this. But he had to be careful. He wasn't going to tell Tony all about Estrella. She wouldn't want that.

"I have to know who it's for if I'm going to make the right formula. I know you've got a whole private thing going on, but I need some information to work with. Come on, Steve. Give me an age? Species? Sex?" Tony rattled at him. He was in the common kitchen the Avengers shared when they felt like gathering.

"Young. Human. Female. She's severely malnourished and she needs vitamins and nutrients she might not be getting from what little she eats," Steve said.

He sat at the bar that overlooked the kitchen workspace and spun a bottle of hot sauce around and around with his finger.

"Anorexia? I can make a calorie-dense mix with fiber and supplements, tropical fruit, maybe. Girls like that shit," Tony offered.

"It's worse than that. Too much sugar and she'll go into arrest. It needs to be low calorie, mineral dense," Steve said.

"Sounds like she needs to be in a hospital. I'm guessing you told her that and she refused?" Tony started moving around the kitchen.

"Jarvis, I'll need supplements for refeeding. Powdered, preferably. We have milk. Good," Tony said absently.

"She barely lets me leave things for her. She might refuse this. A hospital is out of the question. I think she's hiding from something or someone," Steve told him.

Tony nodded, then went through the living room and out onto the patio through the glass doors. He came back in carrying a grow tray of grassy looking plants.

"We could fix her up in-house, no questions asked. Pro bono," Tony said. Steve knew the offer would come out eventually. It was things like this that eased the frustrations he sometimes felt in dealing with Stark. He was peculiar and outrageous, but he was a good man.

"I'd love to do that for her, but she wouldn't come in for it. She doesn't want anything from anyone. I'm not looking to fatten her up or fix her right now. I just want her to survive until I can talk her around to accepting more help. That might take a while, if ever. She's stubborn and I'm not the best at persuasion," Steve smirked.

Tony barked a laugh.

"Show her your ass. Has she seen it yet? If she's seen it and she's still balking, she might not be human or female. I'd re-assess," Tony chuckled. His hands fidgeted with a metal thing he pulled out of his pocket. Steve had caught him just as Tony was getting up for the day. He was likely eager to get to his lab or his workshop. Or his garage.

Steve made a face and shook his head. And this kind of talk was the reason he was glad Tony was generous enough for him to overlook it. It was like Tony couldn't tolerate simply being nice. He had to mix it all up with raunchy comments.

"She's not like that. She's afraid of men," Steve said. Tony looked away with a frown after a second. They both understood what that meant.

They were waiting for a courier to come with the ingredients Tony had requested. Steve went around the bar and searched the refrigerator for something to eat. He pulled out makings for a sandwich.

"Want one?" he asked Tony.

"Nah. Not all of us have the metabolism for so many carbs," Stark denied.

By the time Steve was finishing his hoagie, Tony had taken the toaster apart and cleaned it and put it back together again. A runner had come up with a bag full of nutritional supplements from one of the downstairs shops. Tony worked the juicer like a master. The beverage was looking dark green.
Steve grimaced. It wasn't anything he'd want to try. He hoped Estrella would humor him.

"Keep the calories low," Steve reminded when he saw Tony pouring milk in.

"Hold your stripes. I've got this," Tony fussed at him casually.

While the machine whirred and spun and mixed, Steve pushed his pickle wedge around his plate, gathering crumbs. Tony got down two insulated metal tumblers and poured the juice mix into them. There was still some in the juicer, so he tasted it himself.

"Yeah. That's what we're looking for. Here, try it," Tony held out the juicer cup to Steve. He took it with more hesitation for drinking the green stuff than for any concern of drinking after Tony.
Germs didn't bother him. He'd eaten spoiled meat and moldy bread off the ground before. With his metabolism, sometimes he couldn't be too picky.

Steve grimaced and smacked his lips after tilting the container back to get the last little bit left at the bottom.

"It only tastes bad to you because you eat mostly pizza and burgers. If she's as starved as you say, she'll like it whether she really likes it or not. Here. Goose and gander. If you expect her to drink it, you'll have to have some too. Get going. It's better while it's cold." Tony pushed both tumblers into his hands and gave him a little push toward the hallway and elevator.

"Thank you, Tony. Did you save the recipe in case I can get her to drink it?" Steve asked over his shoulder as he walked away.

"No, but Jarvis has it. I'll leave the supplements in this cabinet. And you'll need some of this. It'll be on the patio," Tony said. He was putting away the canisters of powdered supplements, then he walked the tray of grassy plants toward the glass doors.

"And you're welcome. Good luck with that," Tony added as the elevator doors opened for Steve.
Steve nodded and stepped in. Overall, Tony hadn't been too intrusive. There was no way to get this done without telling him anything, but Steve figured he'd made an acceptable trade.
She wasn't at the coffee shop. Not wanting to give up, Steve walked into the shop anyway. Maybe Izzy would know where he could find her. Izzy eyed the tumblers in his hands curiously. Steve knew it wasn't polite to bring in outside drinks, but it couldn't be helped.

He waited until Izzy had a moment between making drinks, then stepped close as he could to talk over the espresso machine.

"This is for her. Any idea where I can find her?" he asked Izzy.

"Try the library. Down that way," Izzy jerked his head to the left while his hands were busy cleaning something Steve couldn't see.

"Thanks, man," Steve said. He strode purposefully out and took a left at the sidewalk. Two and a half blocks down, there was a small blue sign that said "Library" with an arrow that pointed left. Steve turned into an outdoor mall area, then saw the library on the right. He frowned at the beverages in his hands, then pushed through the library doors. There was a security desk with a large black woman who looked up at him, and then to the drinks in his hands.

Steve would have walked on past, but he'd learned that in some places, it was better to stop and chat.

"No drinks in the library," the woman said.

"I'm sorry, I know. But I'm looking for someone. Real skinny girl in rags, bad hair. It's a nutritional supplement, if I can get her to drink it. Soon as I find her, I'll get her outside and we'll drink it there," Steve gave the woman an earnest, innocent look that had always worked on everyone except Bucky and his mother. Or Natasha.

She was looking at him like she knew him from somewhere, but couldn't quite place him. Then, her mouth fell open in a brief 'o' of recognition. She quickly regained her stern demeanor.

"I'm sorry, Sir. No drinks in the library. You can leave them here if you want to go in and get her. She came in a half hour ago," the woman held her ground, but she indicated the desk for him to set the drinks down. Steve would have taken her up on the offer, but he was too suspicious anymore to leave consumables in the company of strangers. Weird things could happen.

"Can we work something out? Tony said I should get it to her quick while it's still cold," Steve gave her a hopeful smile. He casually shifted his stance to one that usually got him a lot of looks from the ladies. Nothing overt, it just emphasized his assets a little more. Tony would laugh at him. Used to, he would have been too stiff to use his body like this, but time had changed his perspective a little.

"Tell you what. If you show up and read for children's story time at ten o'clock on Tuesday, you can go in with those drinks. But you have to get her and come right back out. I can't let people think it's okay to walk around with drinks in there," the guard said.

"Ten o'clock on Tuesday. Got it. What age are the kids?" Steve asked. He'd learned that different age kids needed a different show. The youngest ones hardly recognized him without the full get-up. Older ones smirked at him funny if he was fully geared out in a casual setting. He didn't blame them.

"First and second grade. You gonna be here?" the woman asked. Her tag said "Wanda."

"I'll be here, Wanda, unless I'm needed somewhere else for something important," Steve assured her.
"Alright. Go on in. But no loitering with those drinks," she said dryly and with a warning in her cocked eyebrows.

"Jeeze, tough crowd," Steve teased her, but he smiled. He used his rump to push open the old metal and glass doors from the lobby into the main room of the library.

"She usually sits on the right, back in the corner by the windows," Wanda called out to him. He nodded his thanks.

The large room had pale fluorescent lighting and the air conditioning kept the air dry and chilly. Steve breathed deeply of the air. He enjoyed the smell of books. Old ones, new ones, leather bound and clothbound and paperback. When he was a kid and feeling poorly, he'd spent a lot of time in bed with books as company. He hurried through the fiction stacks toward the light from the tall skinny windows.

There she was, curled up in a deep, softly upholstered chair. He could see why she spent time here. It was quiet and nice, and nobody paid attention to her because she was a regular. She glanced up and did a double-take at him. Then she scowled when she thought of how he must have found her.

"This is a great place. Love the smell," Steve said before she could say anything to complain about him tracking her down. He sat in the chair adjacent to hers and set the tumblers down on the table between them.

"You're not allowed to have drinks in here! Wasn't Wanda at the desk?" she whispered at him in a rush. She looked around like she expected Wanda to come thundering at them around the corner of the stacks.

"Wanda's a doll. I'm reading to the kids on Tuesday, so she let me in. But I gotta get you and get out of here with these or the deal's off. Let's go sit out in the mall for a few, then you can come back inside," Steve suggested. He wasn't looking forward to drinking the stuff with her, but if he had to do it to get some nutrition in her, he would.

"What is it?" Estrella whispered skeptically. She picked up the tumbler nearest to her and flipped the drink hole open. She gave it a sniff, then another one. Steve saw her throat work at a swallow. Tony was right. Just a smell and she wanted it.

"Tony made it. It's mostly minerals and vitamins. Only twenty-eight calories. It's got some green stuff in it too. He grows it himself on the balcony. Tony's big into juicing. I think it's awful, but it's supposed to be good for you, I guess," Steve shrugged.

She slipped a paper bookmark into the mystery novel she was reading and set the book on the table. Steve almost put out a hand to help her up from the chair, but he restrained himself. She wouldn't want him touching her. She didn't notice his aborted effort, anyway. She took the tumbler that was for her and made for the exit in a slow, careful walk.

"Are you sure it's only twenty-eight calories?" she turned to whisper at him. He came to a quick stop so he wouldn't get too close to her.

"As sure as I can be. There's no fruit or sugar. Tony doesn't usually fib about that kind of thing. He was proud about making it low calorie," Steve assured her.

"Tony Stark made this?" she whispered.

"Sure. The man loves his juice drinks. There's no weird super-hero stuff in it, I promise. You won't turn into the Hulk. Come on, before Wanda comes after me for loitering," he prompted. They could talk about it outside.

Estrella eyed him suspiciously again, but she went. Steve leaned around to push open the door for her. She edged away from him, but didn't make too much a big deal out of the proximity.

Wanda looked on.

"See you Tuesday," she said to him.

"I imagine you will," Steve said.

Estrella looked at him sourly as he held the outer door for her.

"I'm sorry. My ma taught me to always hold the door for a lady. It's a hard habit to break," Steve said. He wasn't really sorry, but if she thought so, that was alright.

They sat on the rounded concrete benches around a concrete table which was affixed to the mall floor. Estrella watched him and his drink tumbler.

Steve's lip hitched up, but he forced himself to take a big swig of the juice drink. It was like drinking milky, grassy, sandy sludge. He repressed a gag at the mineral tang in it. Russian beer was better. He clunked down the tumbler and looked expectantly to her.

Estrella drank hesitantly. One sip, and she licked her lips. Then, she picked it up again and took a bigger drink. Her eyes cut to him over the rim of the cup like she didn't want to be seen enjoying it.

Steve paid attention to his own tumbler of sludge. He swirled it around, hoping that mixing the stuff would make it taste better. Aw, hell. Better to get it over with. He unscrewed the top and chugged it down in a hurry.

"Bleh!" he exclaimed and slammed down the tumbler like Thor did his empty cups when he wanted another one. Steve sure didn't want anymore. To the side, he could see that she was sipping her gunk pretty steadily. He propped an elbow on the table and relaxed while he waited for her to finish.

"You shouldn't bring me things," she whispered a few minutes later.

"Yeah, well, I don't think any thanks are appropriate for getting you to drink that junk. Do I have to drink it too, next time?" he whined.

Next time? She mouthed to him.

"Yes, next time. It's low-cal so you won't get fat. I don't know how you can stand the stuff. It's like a punishment to drink it. But I want your bones to be stronger, at least. And an immune system boost would be good, too. I can bring it to you here on Tuesdays and Thursdays when I'm in town?" he asked hopefully.

Estrella stared at him with the evil-eye.

"I know. It's vile. But would you do it for me so I won't worry about you while I'm gone?" he begged.

No. But I'll do it for Tony Stark.

"Hey, what's Tony got on you that I don't?" Steve asked with false hurt feelings softened by a smile.
She smiled a little but tucked her head down and didn't answer. She tilted the tumbler up in front of her face and looked down the hole to see if there was any left that she might have missed.

"You could have had all of mine," Steve said.

On Friday morning after his run, she was on the bench outside the coffee shop. It was a warm, sunny day but chunky clouds were scudding by fast with the wind off the Atlantic. He'd hesitated to go for a run this morning because there was a lot of intel chatter about something developing in Sri Lanka. It seemed that villains and tyrants thought they could hide in obscure places and get away with anything, but global satellites and electronic ears caught lots of hints if the right people were listening. The Avengers had recruited enough of the right people, finally.

Nat had told him to go run anyway, since things weren't quite wrapped up enough for any action. He'd pushed himself faster than usual in the run so that he might get done before he got called in. He was antsy and wanted to get back to the tower, but Estrella was right there, and she'd seen him already.

He nodded to her and hurried inside to get a drink. There was no line right now, so Kara and Izzy had him in and out fast with his plain Americano. Steve tipped his usual amount, then hurried out to their bench.

She didn't flinch away from him this time even though he was moving aggressively. She seemed to know that it wasn't about her. Her eyes watched him patiently. He thought he discerned a happy look about her, something about the corners of her mouth and eyes.

"Did you get to finish your book?" he asked her.

She nodded.

Steve noticed that she was wearing different clothes today. He still couldn't tell what it was supposed to be, but it was dark gray. The kind of gray that had been black once upon a time. The top half was raggedy and concealing just like her other clothes, but it draped diagonally across her in some attempt at fashion. Part of her collarbone showed, but she fiddled with her hair there as if she was aware and trying to cover up the bare spot. Her bottom was miss-matched navy blue baggy pants with a frayed hem. Dingy socks showed above the same pair of worn out sneakers.

Steve had to look away for a moment. Frustration kept flaring up in him that she felt she had to keep herself this way. Even during the depression, he and his ma had kept up better appearances with mending and thrift. Estrella wasn't stupid or incapable. He was sure of it. She wanted to look bad. He really wanted to know why she did it, and then he wanted to fix the problem. He forcefully let go of his feelings on the matter. Her wishes were more important.

She didn't have much to say today and neither did he. They looked at each other and smiled some, and then he paid attention to his drink for a while. She didn't know what he did for him. His mind was full of information about the idiot who was chopping up street kids in Sri Lanka for the black market in human organs trade. It was a hard thing to stop thinking about. He couldn't wait to get over there and make it stop. But sitting here for a few minutes with Estrella calmed him. She was smart and she was safe for now. He didn't know exactly where she slept, but he knew she was cautious enough to look out for herself.

He leaned forward to rest his elbows on his knees and turned his head to look at her for a minute. He wanted to picture her here normal and safe before he had to go off and see the horrible things he knew awaited them over there.
She smiled faintly at him. Then she noticed the peculiar intensity with which he looked at her. She cocked her head aside to question him.

"Nah, it's nothing. Just… I'm probably gonna have to go soon. There's something that needs tending somewhere. I like to know that some things are still right and good while I'm gone. It helps," he said low enough so that the interested people at the café tables couldn't hear him.

Estrella thought of how she checked that her carpets and bedding were tucked out of sight and safe from rain every time she left her alley. How she took satisfaction in keeping any dirt or trash out of her living area. She had control over very little in this world. She owned almost nothing. But what she had, she liked to keep just so. It made her feel safe to return in the evening and see that things were as she'd left them.

She nodded at Steve in understanding. It bothered her a little that he thought of her as one of his things, but his face was so guileless. It made no sense that he would care about what happened to her, but he was like that. It took a person like Captain America to fight and suffer for strangers. Lots of people wouldn't even fight for their friends if it was too much trouble.

She made herself let go of her natural suspicion and distrust. He was a man from another time when things had mattered. Things like compassion and honor and selflessness. Did she dare have a little faith in him? Maybe just a little. But he'd told her that he might not come back someday. That was enough for her to guard her feelings. It would be painful to lose a friend like him.

His phone buzzed in his back pocket and he stood abruptly. It was Nat's buzz pattern. Three shorts and a long.

_Updater, Cap._

His muscles tensed to turn and run. Ten minutes wasn't long to get back, get suited, and board. He'd like to shower too. Estrella watched him.

"Gotta go now," he told her.

She nodded and held out the fingers of her left hand, palm up. Steve was surprised and humbled. He carefully controlled his features and touched his fingertips to hers. She was staring at him intently, wanting something from him.

"I'll be as safe as I can. No guarantees," he said.

She nodded solemnly.

He didn't make a practice of running through the people on the sidewalk, but he really wanted a shower before he had to get into the suit. He powered through what open gaps he could find, carefully avoiding touching or jostling anyone in his hurry. He leapt over the last trash receptacle before he reached the lobby doors of the tower. Business men on the inside heading out backed out of his way when they saw him intent on getting in the door.

"Thanks," he said tersely in passing. He squeezed into the elevator doors as they were closing. There was an older woman from the custodial staff and one of Stark's couriers already in the box.

"You have good legs?" he asked them both.

The woman nodded at him with widened eyes. The courier boy, Billy, grinned. Both of them grasped the hand rail.
"Jarvis, double-time it," Steve said.

"Of course, Captain," Jarvis responded.

The elevator smoothly but quickly accelerated into a speed that made Steve feel his own weight. At the top, his feet felt like they were going to leave the floor tiles. The woman gasped.

"Sorry, Ma'am," Steve told her while he waited for the box to come to a complete stop. The doors were opening before the car was level with the floor. He was out and running to his room for his shield. Jarvis held the elevator open for him. The woman had stepped out to avoid any more double speed elevator rides, but Billy was still grinning.

"Up," Steve said soon as he was in again with his shield. It had been three and a half minutes since Nat texted him. He'd probably have time for a quick shower in the locker room near where his uniform was kept. His running shoes felt wrong on his feet, now that he was thinking about the mission again. He wanted the thick, supple leather of his boots and their sturdy, grippy heels.

Bruce and Sam were standing in the departure lobby on the launch floor at the top of the building when the elevator doors opened. Steve dodged around them and started stripping while he jogged to the shower.

"We're not in that much of a rush. It's not like we'd leave without you," Sam called after him.

"Wanna shower first," Steve hollered. Bruce and Sam understood. Being clean was a luxury they often couldn't afford past the first few minutes of a mission. Starting out a trans-ocean flight already smelly from a morning workout would make for a grumpy Captain, and nobody wanted that.

Steve nodded at Natasha as he hopped through taking his shoes off. She was pulling up the top half of her standard suit over her undergarments.

"It's a little late for a shower, huh?" she called out to him while he shoved down his underwear and kicked them off, then ripped the shower curtain closed behind him.

He pushed the water to cold and full on while his other hand grabbed a pump of soap from the dispenser. With quick, practiced motions, he slicked his hair and body with lather and let it rinse as soon as he was soaped. In less than a minute and a half, he was rinsing his hair and shutting off the water. Large, absorbent towels were on a shelf outside the shower. He snagged one and dragged it over his hair and face, then passed it around his back. He did his chest and arms, then wrapped it around his hips.

Three seconds to apply deodorant and step to his locker. Nat was lacing up her boots. She wasn't looking at him. He angled his locker door to mostly hide him, and hurried into fresh underwear. They dragged up his legs partly because they were snug, and partly because he hadn't fully dried off. He got a pair of the specialized liner socks he wore under his uniform boots and sat beside Nat on the bench to pull them on.

"How you doing?" she asked him in a way that would seem casual to most.

"Fine. Looking forward to this one. We ought to focus on these kinds of perps for a while. I'd sleep better putting it all to a stop," he said. He took the time to use the edge of his towel to dry carefully between his toes.

"You know better," Natasha scolded him. Greed wasn't going away any time soon, and as long as there was a market for the organs, there would be a source. Sri Lanka, Taipei, Sao Paulo, it didn't "Yeah, well a guy can dream," Steve said.

He readied his feet, then went to his locker to pull his uniform on. He could feel Nat's eyes on him. It annoyed him sometimes that she paid such close attention, but she'd saved his skin many times, so he didn't call her on it.

"You need any phone numbers?" she asked him with a little smile.

Steve looked over and frowned discouragingly as he pulled his jacket across his shoulders, then grabbed the leather harness for his shield.

"Naw, Nat. I know how to work the internet since over a year ago. That stuff is in half the men's rooms across the city. I don't know why they let kids see it," he grumped.

His uniform jacket wasn't zipped all the way, but it was enough for now. He'd have time to get things finished on the flight. He tipped his shield away from the wall with the edge of his boot and caught the rim with his fingers. His helmet hung from his other hand.

Natasha got up and slung her bag over her shoulder. Many of her weapons were already within her suit, but she still had some equipment to put on, like he did. They headed for the quinjet bay side by side. Bruce and Sam weren't lingering in the lobby anymore.

"If you don't get a move on, I might have a girl delivered to your door along with a pizza," she teased him.

"And if you don't let it rest, I might report you to the boss for sexual harassment," Steve smirked back at her. Steve was the boss. It was an empty threat and she knew it.

"How modern of you," Natasha smiled.

He was in the jet with the hatch closing with thirteen seconds to spare. Tony and Thor would be sitting this one out, because the threat was expected to be low and the two of them had prior commitments with Pepper and Jane. Bruce was along mostly to sit with the jet while Steve, Sam, Nat, and Clint did the work.

Steve was back home in thirty-six hours, but he wasn't fit company for anyone until he pulled himself out of bed for Sunday morning church service. Sam joined him and they quietly made their way to the church.

Sam seemed to know that there wasn't much point in talking about what they'd seen on the recent mission. Some things could be worked out in discussion and some things needed time to fade before you could touch them again. They'd done all they could, and it was enough. It had to be.

Steve held the door for some older people and they all smiled at him and greeted him warmly. He and Sam were favorite pets of the older members of the congregation. Most Sundays, they went home with plates of cakes or muffins. Steve's favorite was Mrs. McIlhenney's spice cake. Sam favored Mrs. Camerioni's lemon pie. Anyone who got a streusel cake from old Mrs. Stiles felt special. The woman was older than Steve, but still knew her way around a kitchen.

Steve glanced at his watch as the ornate wooden doors closed behind them. He had enough time. The hush inside the cathedral caused him to silently gesture to Sam that he was going to wait for confession and that Sam should go on in. Sam shook his head at him and smiled a little, but he went to find a seat.

"Forgive me, Father, for I have sinned. It's been two weeks since my last confession. In that time, I've entertained impure thoughts and I'm guilty of abusing myself a few times. I get too angry at people. I'm impatient. I expect too much of others. And I've used some bad language. I killed nineteen men yesterday. For these and any sins I don't realize or remember, I'm sorry," Steve said.

The confessional booth was upholstered in such a way that it seemed to swallow sound as soon as it left his mouth. He'd be too ashamed to admit some of these things to other people, but over the years, he'd gained the courage to confess his sins face to face with the priest. He saw the old man as a fellow soldier, and soldiers understood. But they didn't always spare your feelings.

"Steve, you're too hard on yourself. Some of these things are sins, and you are guilty of them. For some of it, you bear no guilt, yet you allow your conscience to trouble you anyway. These killings, were they in the line of duty?" Father Miller asked.

"Yes," Steve replied.

"Are you certain that there was no other way to stop a greater evil than to kill these men?" Father wanted to know.

"We spent weeks determining that. We can never be certain, but my actions were necessary to stop evil. The murder and dismemberment of innocents," Steve grit his teeth and a swift shimmy of remembered horror shook him, "It's possible that some of the men may have been spared if I'd had the time to consider each one individually."

Father Miller looked at him with placid consideration.

"We both know that there isn't always time to do so in these situations. As long as you upheld your normal diligence, then you are not guilty of murder. Continue to ask for the guidance of the Holy Spirit in your thoughts and actions. As for the masturbation, you need to improve your relationship with our Lord through prayer and fasting. The anger and impatience are merely character traits as long as you don't act on them. I bet you rarely express your anger and impatience toward those who inspire it?" Father Miller asked with a faint smile.

"Not verbally or in action, but I know my face shows it," Steve said.

"Feelings are not sinful things of themselves. Mind your actions and try to be more at ease with your feelings. Now make an act of contrition…" Father Miller said.

Steve did so, and received absolution. Then he went to find Sam and do his penance. The only place he ever knelt anymore was in church. It was odd how kneeling before a benevolent god was so different from being made to kneel before a demented power-hungry person who thought of themselves as a god. For a little while after the service, he was at peace. Especially when Mrs. Stiles told him to follow her to her car.

Sam grinned at him and shoved him with an elbow. Other people who were walking home from the church service looked on in happy envy as Lilian Stiles bent her already hunched back and took a strawberry streusel cake from the backseat.

"Aw, Miz Lily, you didn't have to. But thanks! I'll hide it from Tony," Steve said with playful greed.

"Mister Stark isn't so bad. You should give him a little piece. And be sure you share with Sam. I made it for both of you," she said.
Steve passed the wrapped cake to Sam and bent to give Mrs. Stiles a hug. He'd noticed how much effort it took for her to get the cake out of the car. It didn't feel heavy at all to him, but she had struggled with it. Lilian giggled like a girl and patted Steve's shoulder a few times.

"That's too much for an old lady, but thank you. Wait til I tell Lawrence. He'll have it in for you!" Mrs. Stiles threatened him with a twinkle in her eye. Everybody knew that Lawrence had been dead for seven years now. Steve nodded and rubbed his belly while he looked at the cake.

"Miz Lily, I don't like you having to bring a big cake to church and walk it to the car and all. Maybe I can come have coffee with you sometimes instead?" Steve offered. He patted his backside and found his notepad in his pocket. He wrote his phone number down on a page and tore it off. He supported the lady's elbow as she lowered herself into the driver's seat of her Lincoln. He set the paper with his number atop her dash so she couldn't refuse to take it.

"Maybe if I have the rest of the girls over, I'll call you on a Monday. Now you go home and enjoy some cake," Lilian said.

"Yes, Ma'am. We sure will," Sam said and closed her car door for her.

He and Steve turned around to head back to the tower. Steve reached to take the plate the cake was on so Sam wouldn't have to carry it.

Sam turned his upper body away and kept the cake from him.

"Nah-ah! You handed it off to me. It's mine now. You still owe me five dollars from our last poker night. I'm keeping this cake," Sam insisted.

Steve dug out his wallet and tucked five dollars into Sam's jacket pocket.

"Mmm-nn. It's worth more than five dollars, man. She's never made us a strawberry one before. There was blueberry and lemon, but this one is strawberry.

"Fine. You carry it. Torture yourself," Steve shrugged, then put his hands in his pockets. It was a comfortably cloudy day and he felt no need for a run or a workout. He picked up his pace to get back to the tower, though. Cake and coffee sounded good. Sam was right beside him, thinking the same thing.

Steve took the cake to the common room and served a generous slice for himself onto a plate. Sam was already making coffee.

Steve stared down at the oozing strawberry filling and the fluffy cake and the drizzled, home-made icing. His mouth watered. He braced his hands on the countertop and thought.

"This is mine. Don't mess with it. No pranks," Steve warned Sam.

Bruce and Clint were lounged on the couch in front of the television watching something about fishing. Steve turned his warning on them, too. Bruce pursed his lips and raised his eyebrows in a way that said he thought somebody was being a little too serious.

"I hear ya, Cap," Clint ragged him, and threw a wadded up sock at him. Steve caught it and tossed it back as he strode through the room and out onto the patio. Over near the rail was a cart which held the tray of plants Tony had used for juicing. He got it and went back inside.
He would have thought Estrella was sleeping if her eyes wouldn't have caught on his legs and travelled up as he got closer. She tried to hide that she was happy to see him, but he could tell. He paused by the bench and handed her the plate. She looked at it, confused.

"Guard my cake with your life. It's special. Would you drink this while I get some coffee? Same stuff as last time, but I made it. It might be even worse," he told her.

She looked at the tumbler he set down on the bench. She held the cake plate on her lap with one hand and reached for the tumbler with the other. Before he turned away, she was sipping the juice sludge. He was glad she liked it, but he needed coffee.

Several minutes later, he was outside again with a plain black coffee. From the tilt of her tumbler, she appeared to be about halfway done with her beverage. Soon as he was settled, she pushed the cake at him. He took it and held it on his knee.

"Anymore headaches lately?" he asked her.

Estrella shook her head. She hadn't noticed that her headaches were gone until he'd mentioned it just now. Her crossword puzzle book was easier to solve these last few days, too.

Thank you, she mouthed silently, and finished the last of her juice. She wasn't making any sour faces, so Steve hoped he'd made it well enough. His other knee that didn't hold the cake was bouncing impatiently, his heel tapping softly against the pavement.

She narrowed her eyes at him, and he gave her his best innocent look.

She set the empty tumbler down on the bench between them and inched away from him. Or away from the cake, rather. She suspected what he was about. Steve pulled a clean fork out of his back pocket.

"Fair is fair. I had to drink nasty stuff with you. Now, I'd really like it if you'd try one little tiny bite of Mrs. Stile's streusel cake before I eat the rest of it. I'm too selfish to give you more than a small sliver, but here, try. It's fantastic," Steve said. He sliced a cracker-thin shaving of cake off onto the edge of the fork. He made sure to include some strawberry filling and a little icing.

She didn't want to. She avoided things with too many calories, like cake. But he was so eager to share with her, like the little boys who approached him for his autograph. It really was a tiny sliver, just enough for a taste. What harm could it do? She held her hand out and he turned the fork around so she could take it.

Oh, God. It was heavenly. The middle of it was still slightly warm and the icing was sticky and…

Steve flinched when Estrella let out a quiet, brief groan. It got him in the gut somehow, like a hit he'd not seen coming. The sound was low and more drawn out than the few sarcastic grunts he'd heard from her. Her voice was beautiful, not high and screechy like he'd suspected it might be. She moved her tongue around to savor the cake, then swallowed. Steve passed her his coffee and sat on the bench dazed and confused.

He scooted his rump back and leaned forward so his Sunday jacket would conceal his lap. He took the fork from her hand and dug into the rest of his cake. It was good, but his embarrassment over his sudden erection distracted him from enjoying it. Anger caused heat and color to rise in his cheeks. Damn, why was this happening right now? There was no cause for it and it was entirely inappropriate. Knowing that he was blushing made him even more embarrassed and angry, making him blush more. He chewed the cake like it was the heart of an enemy combatant and gulped it down.

His coffee cup nudged him in the side and he took it without looking at her. In under a minute, he finished off the cake and the coffee. He almost threw the plate in the recycle bin instead of the coffee cup, but caught himself in the last instant. He corrected his motions and set the dishes for the tower all together on the bench. There was nothing left to do with his hands and he couldn't get up and leave yet. The sound of her voice echoed in his head.

Steve hung his head and closed his eyes. He controlled his breathing as if he was hiding in a closet and didn't want anyone to find him. Slow and steady. Deep and slow and steady. He felt the heat fade from his face. Finally. People were strolling past, most of them in no hurry on a Sunday. Nobody saw Captain America in the man hunched over at the bench. Some people at the café tables knew who he was, but they were regulars and didn't make a fuss.

Slowly, Steve sat back and crossed his ankle over his knee like usual. He didn't rest his elbow on the bench back. His hands were laced together in his lap in what he hoped was a casual posture.

After a few more breaths, he turned to smile at Estrella to show her that everything was great and nothing was going on.

She had one hand at her mouth with her fingers pressed to her lips. Above that, her eyes were watery with tears. She shook her head slightly back and forth in denial as if something horrible had happened. Or as if she'd caused something horrible to happen.

"What? Was the cake so awful? I'd take it any day over that stuff you seem to like," Steve said. He tried for a smile, but it seemed forced, so he let it go. Her disproportionate response troubled him.

She turned her face down and her hands clenched in her lap. It was easy to see the two tears that fell. They glinted in the light and dampened the rough fabric of her pants. He wished he knew where she lived. She looked like she needed a good cry in private and he wanted to walk her home safely.

"Hey," he said gently, and he touched her knee with his knuckles. She jerked away from the touch and he did too out of responsive reflex.

She waved a hand at him in a shooing motion, back toward the tower. She wouldn't look up at him. They were done for the day. And he didn't even know what he'd done.

"I hate to leave you like this. What did I do?" he asked.

"Nothing. It's me. Just go," she whispered.

Steve wasn't quite ready to go yet. He made it a practice to not walk around in public with anything too obvious in his pants. But she wanted him gone. He gathered the plate, fork and tumbler.

"I don't know what you're thinking, but nothing horrible happened here. You didn't do anything wrong, and neither did I," he said with firm certainty, "I'll see you Tuesday morning at the library, okay?"

She nodded, still not looking at him. That was good enough. Steve got up in a hurry and went away.
Chapter 5

It was almost raining frogs on Tuesday morning. Steve stood at the glass exterior wall of the common living room with his old leather satchel leaning against his leg. It was true that he didn't mind a walk in the rain, but not to the library. And not with this stuff in his hair. Since it was getting longer, Nat had given him a little bottle of hair foo that hardened to hold his hair in place so he could at least look orderly for presentations like today.

Arriving drenched to the library was no good. Showing up at the back entrance in one of Tony's cars was no good, either. Taking his bike was the worst combination of both options. Heavy footfalls came down the hall from the elevator. Steve turned his head back to watch Thor enter the room. He was in black jeans and yellow work boots. A purple Jimi Hendrix T-shirt was stretched across his chest.

"Good morning, brother," Thor said with a smile. His cheery mood didn't match the weather outside at all.

"Good morning to you," Steve replied somewhat formally, "Is this you?" He indicated the weather with a thumb. Thor shook his head and looked at Steve's odd miss-match of clothing. Steve stood in his uniform brown leather boots and his dark blue uniform pants. The shield and folded uniform jacket was visible in his satchel, but he was wearing a plain gray T-shirt.

"Unfortunately, no. The rain comes only as the clouds bid it. I see that you have plans. Are you off to stand with the veteran shield-brothers? Or perhaps to bring cheer to the hairless children at the hospital?" Thor asked.

"Not today. I made a lady a promise that I would read books to the children at the library. They're always trying to get the kids to appreciate reading. Famous faces help. But paper books and wet super-heroes don't mix well," Steve said. It was time to go. He picked up his satchel and shouldered the strap.

"Then I will go with you. If that is acceptable, I mean. I would not wish to intrude if I would be out of place," Thor said. He was learning human etiquette through a continuing effort from Jane and Darcy.

Steve studied the Hendrix shirt. It wasn't one of the more controversial ones.

"I'd love your company. Wanda might even smile. The hammer would be a great touch for the kids," Steve said.

"Then I will retrieve it," Thor said.

He and Steve went to the elevator. Thor kept Mjolnir on a table in the elevator foyer of the floor he shared with Bruce. As soon as the elevator stopped and the doors opened, he held out his hand and it flew to him.

"We might draw less attention if you put Mjolnir in my bag," Steve suggested.

"Indeed," Thor agreed.

While still in the elevator, Steve opened his bag and pushed aside his uniform jacket to make room for the hammer. Gently, Thor nestled Mjolnir down into the bag and removed his hand. Steve closed the flap and Thor eased the bag and its strap back up onto Steve's shoulder.
"Too heavy?" he asked Steve. The elevator doors opened onto the ground floor lobby.

"Nah, I got it," Steve said. It was the weirdest thing that Mjolnir didn't pull down on his shoulder, but he could feel the weight of it. It was like carrying a person in his bag. A large person. His boots gripped harder as he walked across the lobby floor.

Thor smiled at him. He greatly enjoyed their secret. It was likely that only Jarvis knew of it.

As they went outside, the rain cloud above them shifted slightly. A misting rain fell on them while they walked, instead of the downpour that pounded the pavement everywhere else.

"Is this the place you patronize after your morning run?" Thor asked as they walked between the bench and the café tables of the coffee shop.

Estrella wasn't there. Steve didn't expect her to be out in the rain.

"Yeah, it is. The folks are getting used to me so there's not so much staring. Hi," Steve answered Thor, then greeted a man he recognized.

The man nodded at Steve as he hurried with his umbrella, then he noticed that the rain was hardly wetting Captain America. He smiled when he figured out that it was Thor walking beside the Captain. Thor didn't walk the streets much in casual clothes. It took a while for people to recognize him sometimes.

"Hiding my hammer was a good idea," Thor murmured to Steve.

"It's a good idea if we want to get to the library without having to stop for autographs," Steve said. Their long strides had them at the little mall the library was in in time enough for Steve to be early for his commitment.

He was surprised to see that Estrella was seated at a concrete table out front. There was an awning over that particular table. The pavement was wet all around her, but she was dry under the awning. She was also trapped by the rain and unable to go home. Wherever home was for her.

Steve smiled broadly and walked up to her table with Thor at his side. The rain shadow followed them until it included one section of the awning. Steve ducked under to sit and then Thor followed him.

Estrella looked between the two large men seated across from her. Her eyes were wide and she was nervous almost to the point of running off.

"Thor, this is my friend," Steve said carefully. He turned to Estrella and set his bag on the seat beside him. He reached into the loop he'd once used to transport a map case across Europe and pulled out her tumbler with the juice drink he'd made for her.

"You know about Thor, right?" Steve said as he set the drink in front of her.

Estrella nodded, but she kept her head down. She took the tumbler and drank from it. She knew she was being unwelcoming but she couldn't help it. Thor jangled her nerves just as bad as Steve had when they'd first met. Too large. Too male. She heard he was a very nice man, but he was still a man. Then she remembered that he'd been listening in the coffee shop the other day that it had rained and he'd played a part in startling the rude girls in the street.

Her lips curled so that she couldn't drink for a moment. Her gaze skipped across to take in the big man, then she hid behind her hair. Thor was smiling kindly at her.
"She likes that you jolted those rude girls the other day," Steve told Thor.

"Ah, that was good fun. I am aware that I am also rude at times, albeit unintentionally. Perhaps I should not enjoy making others uncomfortable for their rudeness when it is a failing I share?" Thor rumbled thoughtfully.

"Are you kidding? That was great. Wasn't it?" Steve asked Estrella.

She nodded. She was steadily consuming her juice drink, using it as a prop to help hide her from Thor's presence. Steve looked at his watch. He still had a few minutes.

He was proud of Estrella. She was holding up well under the strain of being around Thor. Thor was on his best behavior, too. That helped.

They heard the marching of lots of little feet approaching the mall from the street. A parade of school children under umbrellas came around the corner. Steve cut his eyes to Thor and the large man disappeared behind a planter. Slowly, Steve eased his satchel flap closed over the top edge of his shield. He scooted around the concrete benches so that his back was to the approaching kids. He hunkered down beside Estrella and leaned his elbow on the table, his face against his curled fist.

"Mrs. Romilly's class, stop. Mrs. Caldwell's class, go into the foyer and take off your boots and put your umbrellas in the rack," a teacher said in a clear, strong voice. Another woman held the outer door for them and the sound of sixty little feet tromped into the library.

"Say hello to Miss Wanda," the first teacher said.

"Good Morning Miz Wanda!" shouted out thirty little voices exuberantly.

"Good Morning, children. Remember to keep all the water in the foyer. Walk on the rainy rug. That's right, go straight to the reading room," Steve could hear Wanda's voice from inside the open door. She sounded far nicer to the children than she'd been to him.

"Das a big man. Is he a football player, Miz Romilly?" one child asked while the second class waited for their turn to go inside.

"Jamal, you know it's rude to talk about people instead of to them. Apologize to the man," Mrs. Romilly corrected the boy.

"I'm sorry, Mister. I wasn't trynna be rude," Jamal called out, just as enthusiastically.

"It's fine, son. No worries," Steve said without turning around. Estrella had been concerned at first when he'd slid close to her, but Steve couldn't stop smiling. The kids sounded so cute. Estrella appeared to enjoy them too, though she wasn't looking.

"Mrs. Romilly's class, go inside and take off your boots. Put your umbrellas in the rack," the teacher instructed.

"Hello, Miz Wanda!" one child said, and then they all spoke up in a chorus of greetings.

"Good morning to you all. You know what to do. Very nice. I like to see smart little people. Follow the rainy rug to the reading room," they heard Wanda's instructions. Then the door of the library shut.

"I'm on. You may as well come on in out of the rain, since you finished your drink," Steve said.
Estrella got up and went inside. Steve held the door for her, then went back to the table to get his satchel.

Thor came around from behind the planter and pulled Mjolnir from Steve's bag. It wouldn't do for anyone to see that Steve had been carrying it. They went into the foyer to find Wanda bent over straightening rows of rubber rain boots.

"Rack your umbrellas before you go inside. Wipe your feet," she said without looking.

"On the rainy rug. I know," Steve said.

Wanda straightened up and turned around. Her ominous black polyester security uniform was tucked in properly and a large flashlight and key ring hung at her belt.

"You're late," she told Steve. She narrowed her eyes at Thor, then looked down at the hammer in his fist. Thor was grinning like an idiot, eager to have some fun with the children.

"No weapons in the library. That's the number-one rule," Wanda announced sternly. She crossed her arms at her impressive bosom and lifted her chin.

"I wasn't really late. I heard the kids coming and we hid outside. We didn't want to spoil the surprise," Steve lifted the flap of his satchel and showed her his shield so that Thor wouldn't be the only one in trouble, "No weapons at all? Not even for show and tell?"

"Aw, you go on. But be careful with the kids. They're little," Wanda finally broke and smiled at them.

Steve stayed on the rainy rug, but he didn't take his boots off. Neither did Thor. The inner door was already propped open with a wedge so that the children could get through easily. Steve followed the sound of many little voices. There was a room at the left side of the library with a closed door. He and Thor approached and listened. They didn't want to interrupt anything important.

"Mrs. Romilly's class, Mrs. Caldwell's class. Let's have a seat. You know what to do. Everybody pick a square on the carpet and sit down. We were supposed to have a special guest today for reading time, but the weather was too-"

Steve chose that moment to open the door and stick his head inside.

"Am I in the right place? Is this first grade and second grade?" he asked. He eased inside to gaping mouths and stunned silence.

"Only second grade today," Mrs. Caldwell smiled at him. She was relieved that he'd showed up. Mrs. Romilly was apparently one of those women, like Kara at the coffee shop. She had stopped speaking mid-sentence and was as astonished as the children.

"It's Captain America!" one astute child said when they saw his pants and his boots. They hadn't been sure. The room of sixty children erupted in shouts and yelling. Most of them leapt up from the carpet and started jumping in excitement. Steve set his satchel down and stood in a command posture. He looked at them all kindly but sternly and put his finger to his lips. It took a moment, but the children got quiet. They were standing still, breathing in hitches and starts and one little girl was hiccupping. Steve kept one finger at his lips and motioned them down to the carpet with his other hand. He smoothly crossed his legs and sat on the multi-colored carpet too.

Thor opened the door and walked in quietly. The kids' eyes turned to the blonde Norse god and the pandemonium almost started all over again. Thor held out a hand in a strong 'halt' gesture and the kids quieted again, likely in awe of his arm muscles. He moved next to Steve and sank down into the same position as Steve and the kids, with his legs crossed and folded.

Mjolnir thumped against the concrete that was under the carpet.

"Whoaa.." some of the boys called out.

"Is that really Jol-nir?" a girl asked.

"It is, but we are here to read today, are we not? I cannot read with a hammer. Bring me books!" Thor demanded.

Mrs. Caldwell scrambled to bring a set of thin books to Thor.

The children laughed, after they got over their shock at Thor's outburst. Thor took the books imperiously from the teacher and shuffled through them. Steve fought hard to keep a straight face. He had no idea what Thor's plan was, but the guy was an expert at improvisation.

"Oh no, Captain. This is horrible. The words on these books are too big for me. I can't read them," Thor dejectedly let the books rest on his knee.

"I thought everybody in Asgard was really good at reading. You're the prince, and you can't read?" Steve asked.

"I can read chapter and verse in Asgardian, and in Elvish, and in Jotun. But I only know how to read the small words in English so far. Reading is so much more difficult than speaking," Thor confessed.

"Let's see what you've got there. Maybe I can help you. I've been reading for a long time," Steve said. Thor handed him the books, still looking sad.

"Amelia Bedelia. That's a funny name. Clifford the… Wow! He's really red. And really big! Do dogs come in that color nowadays?" Steve held up the book's cover and pointed to the very red dog.

"No! It's just make believe," a child said.

"It's a story," another one explained.

"Oh. That's good. Because that's one big dog," Steve said.

"Is the Hulk coming?" a boy in a green shirt asked. He smacked his fist into his other hand gleefully.

"No, he's not. He's very tired from all the smashing so he had to take a nap," Steve explained. The boy's smile faded a little, but then he looked to Mjolnir on the carpet and he was happy again.

"Can we see your shield?" somebody asked.

"Did you bring it?"

"Pleezeze?"

"Are you the real Captain America? Because the Santa Clause in the mall isn't the real one, and Jamie says that-"

The kids were getting wound up again.
Steve made a fist and knocked his knuckles hard against his satchel. The unmistakable hum of vibranium silenced the room.

"We're gonna read about this big red dog first, and we'll help Thor with the hard words. Then you can see the shield," Steve stated.

Nods of agreement moved around the room. Steve opened the book and read. He held the book so that the kids could see the pictures. Thor leaned so that he could see the book too.

"Dog! I know that word!" Thor exclaimed in the middle of a sentence.

Steve stopped reading and gave Thor the stink-eye.

"It's rude to interrupt people while they're reading," Jamal said helpfully.

"I am sorry, Captain. Please forgive me. I will be quiet so that you may continue," Thor apologized humbly.

Steve continued reading in an animated, deep voice which kept the kids captivated. He turned the page and read for a while longer. Thor started squirming on the floor.

"What is it, Thor?" Steve asked.

"I am not learning anything. Will you let me try?" he complained.

"Should we let him try?" Steve asked the second graders.

"Yeah," seemed to be the consensus, so Steve handed Thor the book.

The kids loved helping Thor read when he got stuck on a big word like "collar" or confused with words like too, two, or to. Soon the first book was finished.

Before anyone could ask him again, Steve opened the satchel and pulled out his shield. He put his arm through the straps and held it in front of him so the children could see it well. It currently had the subdued blue scheme that he'd used on the last mission.

"It's supposed to have red," a girl said.

"You're right. Usually it does. See how the silver parts are more gray than shiny?" Steve asked. The kids nodded.

"Mister Stark, Iron Man, has a machine that can repaint my shield in a hurry. When we have to fight the bad guys at night, I don't wear the red or any shiny colors, so we can sneak up and catch the bad guys before they run away. See? Even the white stripes are gray, if you really look at it," Steve said.

He pulled out his uniform jacket and handed it to the nearest girl on his right. The jacket got passed around and tugged impatiently and dragged on the carpet. It had been through worse, but he'd made sure his gear was clean before he brought it today.

"Why is it sewn up?" a thin, dark haired boy asked. He was fingering the mended spot on the side of the jacket.

"Because I don't always want a new jacket when it gets damaged in battle. When things are only broken a little bit, it's better to fix them than to get new things," Steve explained. When his jacket made it all the way around and Thor handed it to him, Steve slipped it on and zipped it up.
"Whoa! You really are Captain America!" said the child who had doubted him earlier. Steve slipped his gloves from the satchel and put them on. He smiled at them all.

"Can we touch your shield?" somebody wanted to know.

"I want to hold Mjolnir!" someone else said.

"You may try. But first you must sit in a circle around the room," Thor told them. He turned to Steve and waited for further instruction. The children eagerly shuffled around the open space. They certainly weren't in a circle, but they were side by side.

"Here's your orders," Steve said briskly, "What's your name, soldier?"

He'd turned to the kid to his immediate right.

"Marcus," the boy said. He looked a little scared, so Steve moderated his tone to something more fatherly than commanding.

"Marcus, I'm going to pass you my shield down low. You can hold it and look at it. Keep it down low, right at your knees. The edge isn't sharp, but if you hit your face with it, you'll split your lip or bust your nose, and then your mom might get mad at me. I don't want your mom to be mad at me. So keep the shield flat and low to your knees. Pass it to the next person when you're done," Steve instructed. Marcus nodded and held out his hands.

The shield was heavy for a small child, but there wasn't anything on it that would hurt them unless they swung it around wildly. Steve kept a careful eye and reminded them to keep it low when anybody got a little too excited.

Thor waved Marcus over when he was done with the shield. He let the children touch Mjolnir or try to pick it up one by one.

Steve read a second book about Amelia Bedelia in the hush that followed. Thor studied the room and the things in it while Steve read. There was a slim window in the door, but it was reinforced. Everything else in the mid-level airspace of the room was durable.

Steve noted his inspection but kept reading. At the end of the book, Steve stood up to hand the books back to Mrs. Caldwell. He motioned quietly for the teachers to get low and sit on the floor like the children.

Thor stood up and began to spin Mjolnir from its leather lanyard. It was a lazy spin, almost idle for Thor, but the kids were impressed. Steve kicked the shield up and shoved his arm into the straps faster than most eyes could see it happen.

The kids yelped happily, sensing that something was about to happen.

Steve swung in from low as if he was going body-check Thor with the shield. Thor stopped the spinning hammer with a good grip and brought it down for a carefully moderated tap against the shield. He kept his back to the glass in the door to be sure it wouldn't break.

There was a sound-numbing shockwave through the room. Display books sitting open upon the middle shelves slapped shut and fell to the floor or tumbled down in a splay of pages.

The children covered their ears and looked on, amazed.

"Thank you for reading with us today," Steve said. He picked up his satchel and nodded to the Estrella looked up from her Western novel when a strange anti-sound seemed to warp the air through the library. A decorative paper mobile hanging from the overhead air vent rocked on its wire, then swung back to hanging limply. No one in New York liked to hear explosions anymore, but she forced herself to stay calm. It could be no coincidence that Captain America and Thor were in the library right now.

She held her finger in the book and waited to see what would happen next.

Thor and Steve came bounding through the stacks and stopped not far from her chair in the corner. She'd never seen such large people move so silently. And Steve was almost fully dressed in his Captain America uniform, with the shield on his arm and everything. All that was missing was the helmet and a little tucking, where his gray T-shirt peeked out from under his jacket.

He flashed her a high-voltage grin and Estrella was upset with herself for feeling a little thrill at his proximity. At least it wasn't a romantic thing, she soothed herself. Anyone would feel excitement at being so close to two super-heroes. The children must be very happy, she imagined.

"That was most entertaining," Thor said quietly. He knew his voice had a tendency to carry, and they were hiding from the children.

"Wasn't it, though? I don't even think we broke anything. I should go back and pick up the books we knocked down after the kids leave," Steve said.

He let his satchel down near Estrella's feet and lifted the flap to insert his shield. He stripped off the fingerless brown gloves and tucked them inside. Next, he shrugged out of his uniform jacket and folded it carefully. That went into the satchel too. He eyed Thor's hammer.

"No thank you, brother. I am due to meet with Jane for lunch in Philadelphia," he said.

Just then they heard the excited, babbling voices of the children as their teachers herded them out of the reading room, along the rainy rug, and to the lobby to get their rubber boots and umbrellas. Thor and Steve moved as one to hide themselves at the ends of the bulky stacks. If the children saw them lingering in the library the teachers would have a difficult time getting their students back to school in an orderly fashion. All the little voices made their way outside and the library descended into quiet again.

Thor and Steve eased away from the bookshelves and stood in a more casual fashion. Estrella nudged Steve's satchel with her toe and felt the hard edge of the shield against her shin.

"I have an idea. I wish to walk with the children back to school. There are many stories I can tell them which they will likely enjoy," Thor said. He turned and bowed politely to Estrella.

"It was an honor to meet you, Lady friend of my shield-brother. I bid you good day," Thor said. He gave Estrella his understated charming smile and strode away between the stacks.

"Don't rile the kids up too much or the teachers will have holy heck with them for the rest of the day," Steve called after him.

"Teachers are made of stern stuff. I do believe they can manage some holy heck," Thor replied in his more usual booming voice. There was an "Eep!" of surprise from a library employee and then Thor was gone.
"I bet we'll see something of him on the evening news, or at least in tomorrow's paper. It sounds like the rain has stopped. Wanna go for a walk?" Steve asked. He stood in front of Estrella, still a little jazzed from playing with the kids.

She looked up at him but shook her head. She lifted her book in explanation, then let it rest in her lap.

Steve sat in the chair on the other side of the table from her, his back to the tall narrow window. The sun was coming out and it would be a sauna outside after the rain. Estrella was smart to stay in the library for a while.

"Oh! The books. I'll be right back," Steve said.

He got up and hurried to the reading room. When he went inside, there was a library employee vacuuming the carpet and the books had already been replaced on their shelves from where Thor's hammer strike on his shield had knocked them down. The older woman with the vacuum looked up at him and flipped off the power to the noisy machine.

"Sorry about the mess. I came back to help clean up," he told her.

"That's alright, Captain. The children were happy to help," she said.

Steve nodded and she flicked the switch to resume her vacuuming. There was nothing to do but go back and visit with Estrella for a while.

She studiously kept her face in her book until Steve sat near her again. She looked up once to acknowledge him, gave him the smallest of smiles, then looked back at the words in her book again.

Steve felt somewhat dismissed, but then reminded himself that he was in a library, not a coffee shop. It wasn't the best place for conversation. Besides, Estrella wanted to read, not talk today.

He got up and browsed the stacks near them. He had read a lot of reference books, history books, and nonfiction in the last two years. He hadn't had much time for fiction. He used to love thrillers and Westerns as a kid.

There was an entire section of Westerns, unlike the few available to him eighty years ago. He spent some time reading paperback covers until one interested him. He walked slow and distracted back to his chair, already getting into the first scene of the book. Estrella smirked at him, but he didn't notice.

An hour and a half later, his belly grumbled loudly at him. Estrella looked up from her book and Steve looked up from his.

"I guess that means it's lunch time. Wanna go with and get a salad or something?" he offered to her.

She shook her head.

"No, I feel full enough."

"Alright, suit yourself," Steve got up and retrieved his satchel, "I think I need to update my library card. See ya."

Estrella nodded to him. Steve gave her a friendly smile, then walked toward the central circulation desk with his half-read novel in his hand.
The balding man at the desk set his own book down and stood to move toward the computer to check him out.

"Oh, hello Captain. I'd heard that you read to the children today. I didn't realize that you were still with us. How can I help you?"

"Please, call me Steve. Nice to meet you," he held his hand out and the man shook it hesitantly.

Steve carefully removed the cards in his wallet and separated out the old yellowed paper card with the metal band clipped in it. It was folded in half because it wasn't the same size as the other cards in his wallet. He tossed it onto the circulation desk.

"I think I need to update my card," Steve said.

The librarian reached a reverent hand out toward the card.

"This is a Brooklyn card," he said. He lifted it and carefully unfolded it.

"Of course it is. Is that a problem?" Steve wondered.

"Not at all. I'm simply pleased to see it. Nineteen thirty-nine. Lovely," the man looked at the information written on the card, then at the titles and stamped dates.

"You can keep it. I need a new one that'll scan. Will this do?" Steve handed over his New York driver's license.

"Mister Rogers, I can't possibly keep your paper card. It's a collector's item and likely of considerable value," the man told him. He set Steve's old card back down carefully on the desktop.

"Sure ya can. Consider it a donation to the library, as long as I get a new one," Steve told him. He was impatient to get a card issued so that he could check out his novel, then get on to lunch. His belly rumbled at him again.

"Thank you, Mister Rogers! Our Library board will be quite pleased," the man said. He was still fixated on Steve's old card, not knowing what to do with it.

"Just call me Steve, please," he reminded the man.

"Of course, Mister Rogers," the librarian said. He reached to slip a clean new sheet of copy paper out of the paper tray of the desk printer. Next, he used a little plastic tool to slide Steve's old library card onto the sheet of paper. The man stared at the card for several seconds, as if he expected it to do something.

Steve felt his molars begin to grind together. There was a movement to the side, and Steve looked to see that Estrella was joining him at the desk. The librarian looked to her kindly, but confused.

Estrella pushed Steve aside and squared herself firmly in front of the librarian. She picked up Steve's ignored driver's license and poked it into the librarian's personal space.

"Mister Rogers, I'm terribly sorry! She's not normally so-" the man flushed red at Estrella's apparent rudeness.

"Steve!" Estrella whisper-shouted at the librarian. She jabbed the driver's license at him until he reflexively put his hand up to take it. Estrella pointed an emphatic finger at the computer keyboard.

"I'd listen to her," Steve said.
"Oh!" the librarian said. He finally turned his attention to entering Steve's information into the computer system. Estrella nodded at him once, then walked off back to her chair by the windows.

"Thanks, doll," Steve called after her. She waved a hand back at him without looking. He couldn't stop grinning. What a gal! She was too good to him. He wished she'd let him at least buy her lunch, but he knew better than to argue.

In only a moment more, the still flustered librarian handed him a new plastic library card and a felt marker.

"Sign here, please, Mister, ah-Steve," he caught himself in time. Steve scrawled his name onto the card and then blew on the permanent signature so it would dry faster and he could slip it in his wallet and go.

Steve put it and his driver's license away and tucked his wallet into the back of his uniform pants.

"I'm sorry for the wait. I should have been more efficient in assisting you," the man apologized. He'd seen Steve's obvious appreciation of Estrella's help, so he didn't feel comfortable apologizing for her behavior.

"Don't worry about it. You'll do better next time," Steve told him. He wasn't about to ask the man for anymore help, so he checked his Western novel out at the self-service laser scanner, then strode into the foyer.

Wanda was reading a magazine, but she closed it when she saw Steve.

"Thank you," Wanda said.

She didn't smile at him, and Steve nearly hugged the woman for her lack of overt fan girl behavior. His belly was driving him to find lunch, but he paused for a moment and stepped close to Wanda's rigidly arranged, almost bare desk. She looked up at him patiently.

"It was my pleasure. I enjoy kids. Wanda, could you do me a favor?" he dared to ask her.

"That depends," she said hesitantly.

"Keep this quiet for me. I wouldn't want her to know, because she's an independent lady and she might get mad at me. Can you get a message to Stark tower if you ever see that my friend in the corner isn't doing well? I'm not around all the time, but if she needs help, somebody at the tower will do something. Ask for Jarvis. He'll know what to do," Steve said in a hushed tone.

Wanda regarded him with a basilisk glare for a moment.

"You better leave that girl alone. She don't need you bullying into her life and causing trouble. Can't you see she's got it rough enough as it is?" Wanda told him.

"I know she's got history, Ma'am. I may look young, but I'm old enough to be your grandfather and I know a fragile person when I see one. My intentions are purely honorable, and I've already warned her that I could die at any time. She's quiet, but don't mistake her for stupid. Just keep an eye on her for me, will ya?" Steve said. He tapped his novel against his thigh. His belly wanted him out the door right now, but this was more important.

"Alright, I'll do that, but you better watch yourself with her. Whatever she needs, she gets it for free. No strings. Jarvis, you said?"
Steve nodded.

Wanda gave him a hard eyed look strongly reminiscent of Fury.

Steve nodded again in understanding. He got the message loud and clear.

Wanda kept her eyes on him until the library door shut behind him.
Steve was gone. There was no one to tell her where he was or when he'd be back. Even if somebody knew, nobody would talk to her and she couldn't ask. All she could do was linger in the lobby of an office building for as long as she could before they sent security to chase her out.

That particular building had a place to sit and television displays in a waiting area that showed business and stock market channels and two different news channels. For a day and a half, there were news blurbs of the Avengers fighting to defend some small nation in Africa, then the story faded from public interest and she was left to wonder.

She didn't hear the distinctive sound of the Avengers jet returning to the building, and most of the lights were dark on the upper floors of the tower when she looked at night. She hoped he was alright, whatever was happening. She hoped all of the Avengers were alright, but it wasn't the rest of them that she worried about and missed seeing at the coffee shop.

Estrella felt sick at the turmoil that worrying about him caused. Worrying about someone and missing them meant that she cared too much. She'd promised herself that she wouldn't get attached to anything more dangerous than a pigeon, and she was breaking that promise to herself. Anxiety made her dizzy and nauseous. She shouldn't do this again. Nobody was worth what always happened when she let someone get too close.

It was after two in the morning and she couldn't sleep. The sick squeezing in her gut and the bruises on her back and hips made her too uncomfortable to get any real rest. Her mind would wander, usually to fantasies of the past before she was twelve. Often, thoughts of Steve would intrude and she'd force them away with a mix of regret and longing. She had to be strong.

Thinking of the past and thinking of Steve was better than remembering what had caused her bruises. Things like that, she stored away in a mental map of places to avoid in the city. People to avoid. Things happened. It couldn't be helped when you lived on the street. The best she could do was learn behaviors that reduced the risk of it happening again.

For the hundredth time, she wished she could have a little light to read by, or to work her crosswords by. The money for a light wasn't the problem. The home improvement stores sold solar lawn lights for just three dollars. If she saved up for a week and had only plain coffee, she might be able to get one. It just wasn't safe. She had to keep her alley dark and silent at night. Any glow of light would attract attention and then bad things would happen.

At this time of the late night or early morning, there weren't many people on the streets or sidewalks compared to the daytime, but the ones who were out were the most dangerous. Her fellow street inhabitants were mostly harmless, but the ones who stayed pickled on drugs were unpredictable. The petty criminals were the worst. They felt entitled to anything and anybody. If they knew she was here, they'd hurt her and ruin her home just for the evil joy of it.

She'd gotten used to sleeping, despite the danger and lack of a room with a locked door to protect her. She slept lightly. Most people walked on by, oblivious to her presence. Some of the street people stopped to dig in the dumpster when there was something in it, but they never tried to get into her alley. She was thinner than them and they didn't even notice the loosened clips in the fence.

She liked rainy nights the best. People stayed inside on rainy nights. Even the dangerous people. Nobody liked getting wet. He did, but she wasn't going to think about him.
Steve had been gone for over a week when the next big rain came. She was still wearing the same clothes he'd last seen her in and she was starting to smell more than she liked to. It was part of her protection to smell a little unpleasant, but it came to a point where she didn't want to smell herself anymore. She had her shriveled and cracked bar of soap dug out of her bag, and her only other set of clothes set out when she saw the heavy clouds gathering near sunset. It was a perfect night to get clean.

Estrella slipped out of her shoes and set them on the farthest end of her pallet bed that she didn't use for sleeping. Next, she carefully peeled off the layers and layers of her clothing. She put them in the bag she would take to the laundry. She had enough quarters saved for a washer and dryer load. It made her happy when a rainy night, a good bath night, coincided with having enough change saved to wash her clothes.

She waited naked on her bed, soap in hand, for the first of the cold rainwater to flush down the broken downspout across the alley. It was nasty to use the first of the water, because it contained debris from the roof. A good, hard rain soon flooded the roof and gutters clean, and then she could wash.

There wasn't much light to see by. She was used to doing this in the dark. The dark protected her from anyone else who might have the slim chance of seeing her from the high windows over the alley.

She quickly soaped up her body, paying the most attention to the smelly parts. Those, she lathered and rinsed twice. She was satisfied to feel her bones pressing at her skin, sharp and angular. Her breasts lay flat and hung slightly against her ribs. The bruising on her back from being thrown down and kicked felt like it would be purple and green and maybe some yellow around the edges, but she didn't linger. As long as the skin wasn't broken, she'd heal. Her fingers rubbed over the knobs of her vertebrae up, then down. Nothing felt broken, she guessed. Her ribs were easy to assess. They were sore, but there wasn't too much pain at any particular spot.

Her hair took the longest. Warm tears tracked down her face in contrast to the cold pounding from the downspout on her shoulders. Her hair used to be so pretty. She'd taken pride in keeping it long and glossy. Her mami would buy her pretty clips and flowered hair bands.

The elastic one with Tinkerbell was her favorite. It was lavender and yellow, though the glitzy decorative ribbons were long gone. She still had it and used it as a bookmark. The memory of the feel of her long, silky hair brushing her back on a summer day was starting to fade, but she remembered what it felt like to run her fingers through the cool, loose strands and tuck them behind her ear.

Estrella let the rainwater from the downspout pound on her head like a soft hammer. Thud, thud, thud. Her neck jerked at the force of it. When enough water had penetrated the mat of her ruined hair, she bent over and scrubbed the bar of soap into the coarse pad on and around her head. It would take the rest of her bar of soap to get out all the smell and oils. Bar soap was horrible for her hair, but it was great for her. It made her hair even uglier, which was the goal. More tears fell as she tried to remember the lovely floral scented shampoos she used to use.

Sometimes she walked past the bath shops with their wonderful smells. Lotions, shampoos, perfumes, candles and pretty things. It would be a nice way to spend time, going in and looking at and maybe even touching those things. She couldn't. The stares from the shop keepers and the shoppers with money drove her out. Some days she was lucky to walk by the door to those shops when someone was coming out. She always breathed deeply when that happened.

For now, she scrubbed until her fingers ached. The hair growing from her scalp pulled painfully while she worked soap in everywhere she could. She prayed that the rain would last until she could get all the soap rinsed out. It did, and Estrella walked back across the wet, clean pavement to her shelter. She felt so fresh and free like this. Goose bumps covered her head to toe, and the weight of her wet hair pulled at her neck, but she felt light and clean.

She crawled up onto the edge of her pallets, not far from her shoes. A towel was too bulky and difficult to keep clean, so she didn't have one. They soaked up dampness from the air and always ended up smelling musty, even when they were clean. She drew her legs up and wrapped her arms around them. She didn't have enough money to put her blanket in the dryer, so she stayed away from it. She'd washed it last week, anyway. Estrella spent the night sitting up wet, trying not to wonder if he was okay.

At first, she'd tried to fool herself that he was invincible. Everybody thought that he was. But she'd seen him eat. She'd seen him go into the bathroom at the coffee shop and come out again. He sweated, and he even smelled a little when he sat near her on hot days after a run. He never smelled worse than she did, just different. He got hungry. He got tired, frustrated, and disgusted. She saw it in his eyes, in the things he must be thinking but didn't say. So many people said whatever was on their mind. He kept a lot inside. He was classy like that. Never an unkind word unless it was appropriate, or he was feeling really low.

Anyone who had the bodily functions of a regular person, the feelings of a regular person, was vulnerable to damage. She knew he was tough and fast, and he probably healed well and quickly. But the chances that someday he'd run into something that was too much for even him increased every time he went out to fight. She was glad he had his friends at his side. Especially Thor, who had called him 'brother.' Estrella was skeptical that Thor was a real god, because he probably ate and farted and pissed too, but she asked him quietly, in her head, to look out for Steve.

She shook her head and pinched herself hard in punishment. She had to find something else to think about until morning.

Two days later, she saw it was a Tuesday by looking at the "Tuesday's Specials" chalk board in the coffee shop window. She sat under the umbrella of a café table because it was hot and bright today. Her hair was still slightly damp underneath, and that helped to keep her cool.

Estrella had found a new Sudoku book in the free book box at the library. Only five of the puzzles had been done, so it was a great find. Her pencil was a two inch stub, but Izzy had a sharpener he let her borrow, and he saved stray pencils that coffee shop patrons left behind. The problem was that hardly anyone used pencils anymore. With her brain the way it was, she needed to work her puzzles with a pencil that had an eraser. She used to could do them without even checking the answer key, and she'd made no mistakes. They weren't so easy anymore, but that just added to the challenge and used up more of her empty time.

Her coffee was almost gone, and she would move out to the bench to see if she could collect some change with the empty cup soon. She enjoyed the shade while she could. Just three more weeks of summer and the city would start cooling down for the fall. Fall was great, but it brought winter close behind. Everyone on the street dreaded winter. She tried not to resent the heat because at least it meant winter was still a little ways off.
Her headaches were easing back to bother her, but not as bad as before. She didn't know what was in the drinks Steve had been bringing her, but she liked them because they made her feel better without making her fat. She would never take a drink offered by a stranger, but she could see that Steve wanted so badly to do something for her. It was better than letting him outright buy her things, so she took a chance. She'd been feeling pretty down when she'd first met him, so she hadn't cared much if he was trying to drug her or hurt her with the drinks, anyway. The drinks actually helping her was an unexpected surprise.

Estrella heard a sound coming from far away. She tilted her head to listen, because her hair impeded her hearing some. Yes, it was the Avengers jet! She was helpless to hold back a smile of relief, until she had the thought that the return of their jet didn't mean that Steve was alright. She didn't get up to look. That would be too much like a person who cared.

She sniffed and squared her shoulders. If Steve was back and safe, she wouldn't know it until she saw him again. She had to wait. Not like she should care anyway. Her coffee was gone.

She'd been sitting at the table for a while, so she was stiff when she got up. Sweat prickled her skin as she carried her pencil, her Sudoku book and her empty cup to the bench. The cup went down where pedestrians could see it and easily bend down to it, but where it wouldn't be in their way.

Estrella worked her puzzles for a while, and then there was a clink of change in her cup. She didn't acknowledge the person who had put the change, because she didn't want to interact with them. Sometimes they wanted things, even for twenty-seven cents.

A shapely woman with glossy red hair stood up from dropping the change in the cup, then she only took a few steps before she sat on the bench in Steve's spot.

Estrella immediately levelled her 'go away or I'll do something horrible and dirty and unimaginable to you' look at the woman. How dare she sit there?!

The woman was more than just pretty and shapely. She was graceful like a dancer. Her casual clothes were sleek and stylish. Her body was trim and lush and rounded like a woman, but it was clear that much of her shape was made from muscle. She looked Estrella dead in the eyes until Estrella felt like bug under a microscope. Or, more like a bug struggling in a spider's web. A microscope was clinical, harmless. This woman was not harmless.

Estrella's mind skittered through fight or flight options, all of which felt inadequate and hopeless. She was too scared to look away, too scared to move.

The roar of a motorcycle on the street, four traffic lanes away, echoed and bounced off the buildings. The engine rumbled thrice in quick succession, then once sustained for longer. The oddness of the intentional engine sounds drew Estrella's eyes away, even from the threatening woman.

It was Steve. She stretched her neck to look. Her heart rushed with gladness and relief at seeing him physically whole and apparently healthy. He was staring right at her over the roof of a yellow cab. He had his leather satchel slung over a shoulder, diagonally across his back. He looked very serious. Troubled. But his eyes stayed on Estrella as long as his bike was stopped in traffic.

Estrella whipped her head around again. The red-headed woman on the bench with her held up a thumb's up without looking over at the bike in traffic or the man on it. Her arm went down, then the bike roared off as traffic moved.

Estrella was torn between watching Steve's back move farther away as she could see him in between buses and vans, and paying attention to the woman. The woman hadn't hurt her yet, so she took a chance and watched Steve until he was gone.

"He has to go. He wanted to see you, but he's not off-duty yet. I get to be the errand girl," the woman said.

Her lips quirked ever so slightly, but Estrella thought the almost smile made her look more dangerous instead of less so. The lethal aura around the woman and the wordless communication she'd shared with Steve told Estrella who she must be. Her fear eased a little. Black Widow was supposed to be one of the good guys. An Avenger. She was a hero now, with the rest of them. There shouldn't be any danger from her, because heroes didn't make a practice of hurting people.

"I don't like this thing you've got with him. It distracts him. I think it's one of the stupidest things he's tried, but he won't listen to me. So you listen. We need him focused on his job. It would be better if you weren't around. Move away from here. Find another place," Black Widow told her.

Estrella considered what she said. She really did. An assassin wanted her gone. She got that, but her life wasn't worth much to her.

Steve might think she'd abandoned him if she just left. The thought of his soulful, expressive eyes concerned and wondering what had happened to her firmed her resolve.

The Widow was wrong. He'd be just as distracted if Estrella left as if she stayed. If she stayed, at least he'd have somebody in the city to talk to who didn't insist on calling him 'Captain' or fawning over him. He was too kind and polite to stand up for himself most of the time. He needed her.

No. She wouldn't go. If Widow wanted to kill her, that was fine. She wasn't supposed to be evil anymore, so her death would probably be swift. She wouldn't feel much. The repercussions would be on the Widow. She wouldn't leave unless Steve asked her to.

Her chin came up. She'd made her decision. Once a decision was made, it was best to stick with it. Still, the woman was sitting there, taking up Steve's space, trying to threaten her into hurting him.

Estrella reached out her hand and grabbed a fistful of Widow's shiny, slick red hair. She shook it roughly, like a rope in her fist, until Natasha pulled her head away and pushed Estrella's hand down.

Estrella found herself breathing fast, rage and fear making her arms tremble. She was weak and dizzy with it. The Widow could do whatever she wanted with her. Estrella wanted her gone. Her demands, gone. Her beautiful, glossy hair, gone. Away from Steve's spot.

Natasha looked at the emaciated, raggedy girl. She blanked her face of all emotion. With controlled dignity, she got up and walked away from the bench, back to the tower.

Estrella watched her go, then kicked over her coffee cup so that the coins clinked across the sidewalk. One rolled off on its edge, then fell flat when it hit the recycle bin. She clutched the top bar of the bench tightly because her vision was going cold and narrow. Breathe, breathe, breathe. Calm. She couldn't afford to pass out in front of all the people staring at her from the café tables.

After a moment of concentrating on her breathing, the cold tingles passed and her vision returned to normal. She slowly and carefully bent to pick up her puzzle book and her pencil. Strange how she hadn't noticed them falling to the ground.

Her fingers shook too bad to write any numbers in the squares, but she pretended to. People were looking.
"Clint! Clint! Bruce!" Natasha called as she hurried out of the elevator and into the common living room.

The guys, including Thor and Tony, were devouring pizza with stuffed-cheek greed. They were all hungry, but Steve had insisted that two slices was enough to hold him, and he'd asked Nat to go down to the coffee shop and see if she could find the girl.

Clint looked aside, curious at what could have Natasha rushing and calling out. Tony set his pizza down and waited. He had that look like he knew he was about to be entertained.

He arched his brow at her as Natasha stole his pizza and stuffed it in her mouth.

Tony made a hurry-up gesture with his hands. Natasha chewed and swallowed quickly. Thor pushed a glass of grape soda her way across the bartop. She gulped a few sips of the sugary drink, then sighed at the relief of sugar and calories rushing into her blood.

"WHAT!?" Tony cried out.

"You won't believe this!" Nat said, and started laughing at her own disbelief, "I made sure she knew who I was. The girl was terrified. Shaking. Then I told her to leave. To go away and leave Steve alone."

Thor's jaw set tighter and he put down his pizza to cross his arms. Nat glanced at him, recognized his displeasure, but kept on.

"She thought about it for a minute. Then she grabbed me by the hair and shook me! Like a dog. I don't think Steve knows what he's getting into," Natasha smiled as big as any of them had ever seen her smile. She combed her fingers through her hair and scratched at her scalp, then reached around Clint for another piece of pizza.

"Steve's lady friend is very brave, but she is weak from hunger. You should not have provoked her," Thor said. Thor never liked being caught in a conflict among his human friends. Ribaldry was good sport, but this was serious. It would be an injustice to not speak his mind in defense of Steve's friend.

"You misunderstand me, Thor. This means she's worthy. She thought I was going to kill her, but she won't leave Steve. You should have seen her watching him when he went by us on the street. She was concerned about him the entire time he was gone. I'd put money on it," Nat said.

Thor's expression changed to one of admiration at her tactics, but then he frowned again.

"Still, she is weak. Excitement is not good for her health. Did you observe that she was alright after you walked away from the encounter?" he asked.

"Of course I did. She's a big girl. She held it together. I don't want Steve pissy with me for hurting her. I don't want to hurt her. He's right. She's remarkable," Nat marveled.

Grown men, bad men had trembled at less intricate intimidation tactics than she'd played on the girl. The guys couldn't understand the nuances she'd employed with her hair and her body and her face to intimidate the girl. Natasha trusted Steve's instincts. The girl was mentally strong, and she was likely a good person if Steve was so drawn to her. Nat felt bad for testing her and upsetting her, but she had to know. She'd find a way to make it up to her later.

Natasha had no idea where she'd come from. There were no files on her. No biometrics. She was just what Steve needed, but Steve wasn't ready. Neither was the girl. Everyone thought she was really young, but Natasha wasn't convinced. There was something about her that implied more years than Jarvis thought she had. Nat bit her lip and grabbed another piece of pizza.

"We should help her. Help them. If they're not careful, they'll bungle it, and then we'll have a pissy, pouty Steve on our hands," she said between bites.

"It? What it? There's no 'it.' Did an 'it' develop while I wasn't looking? The girl is fifteen, maybe nineteen at most, though how you can tell under all the Auschwitz, I don't know. He's never going to go for a woman that young. There can be no 'it.'" Tony said, enunciating the last word with a pinched and thrown hand gesture.

"Tony, you're an ass, but you're right," Bruce said, "We're not helping with anything. Leave Steve alone, Natasha. I can see that you're excited about finally matching him up with someone, but the someone can't be her."

Clint chewed his pizza, as did Thor. Once a discussion got to this stage, they knew the best thing to do was to sit back and observe until reinforcements were required by one side or the other. Their task was to determine which side deserved reinforcement.

Sam walked in fresh from his shower, in casual sweats and a muscle shirt. He looked tired, but he also felt the tension of the unresolved discussion in the room. He went around Natasha, and Thor moved so he could get to the pizza.

"It's gonna bite y'all in the ass, messin' in Steve's business like this," he said in mild warning before food went into his mouth. He grimaced at the bottle of grape soda and looked in the fridge for a beer.

"Hmm!" Clint pointed to Sam in agreement, and chewed until he could swallow, "What he said."

"Alright, guys. You're not seeing what I'm seeing, that's all. They could be good together, but only if they can get past some serious problems," Natasha said.

She was done eating, though the guys would be a while. They were bottomless pits after missions like this one. She stood by the bar and turned her attention inward, thinking.

Tony didn't like that she was turning her creepy espionage brain toward engineering a train wreck involving one of his favorite spangly people. He'd wheedled the digs out of Jarvis and he knew that the chances of anything heart shaped occurring were mathematically abstract to the point of being mere theory. Shaky theory. He moved to distract her from that dangerous thinking thing she was doing.

"Match maker, match maker, make me a match. Find me a find, catch me a catch! She's way too young…, and Steve's got a big hairy itch he can't scratch…" he sang imperfectly as he swept Natasha into his arms. Bruce groaned and put his hands over his ears. Clint guffawed and watched Natasha humor Tony by allowing herself to be danced around the floor. Her natural grace kicked in so that while her face was barely tolerant, her body followed Tony's lead flawlessly.

"Sing with me, Yenta! For Papaaa, make him a virgin! For Mama, make him grim as gangrene! For her, though, I wouldn't bother 'cause she is as skittish as… Hmm. I can't think of a word for that spot. But you get the point, right?” Tony stopped dancing abruptly and stepped away from Natasha.

_There is no ‘it’,_ he mouthed to her and made the hand gesture again, in her face.

Natasha grabbed his hand and twisted his arm around until Tony was arched sideways and grimacing.

"Ah! Ahh! Careful with the rich guy," Tony stood on his toes until she let him go.

She went right back to thinking again. Tony frowned at her.

"You're all delirious from lack of sleep. You know that, right?" Sam said. He didn't know how they were still on their feet.

They'd spent enough days in Wakanda that it was all blurred together in Sam's mind, but it didn't end there. On the way home, Fury had called in a side trip to Cuba. Somebody had enough enriched uranium to start making dirty bombs and the intel pointed to some people having a very bad visit to Disneyworld because of it. Grabbing the uranium wasn't enough. They'd spent another several days tracking down the back trail to the source and ended up in Damascus, of all places.

Then, no time to sleep on the flight back because Tony, Thor and Steve had to take turns carrying the uranium outside the quinjet, Steve using Sam's wings. Tony supposedly had enough shielding in the suit, and Thor and Steve were less susceptible to radiation poisoning. Even Thor with Mjolnir couldn't fly fast enough to get the hot package home without some uncomfortable side effects, so they'd taken turns.

Bruce was unhappy because he was practically immune to radiation poisoning, but he had no way to fly it back. Sam's wings couldn't be adjusted to carry the Hulk. Clint, Sam, and Natasha had kept the quinjet available as a switch out platform on the long flight home.

Once home, Tony slipped the messy bundle of uranium into a case Jarvis had been working on. The specially designed case shielded it from the public while Steve brought it to the proper authorities. Agents were still on the ground in Cuba and Damascus helping people who were likely exposed to the hazardous material. Sam seethed at the wickedness of terrorists who would expose thousands of their own people to uranium simply for the sake of taking out other innocent people.

Thor and Clint were watching Tony and Natasha, waiting to see if Tony could annoy Nat out of thinking so much. Bruce was slumped sideways on a stool against the bar, rubbing his tired eyes, glasses held in the fingers of his other hand.

"Come on now, this is papa Sam telling you it's bedtime. Time for all good little heroes to get some shut-eye before we get called out again," he reminded them. Their assignments tended to come in bunches. There'd be a flurry of activity followed by a long, boring lull. Just like the military. Sam sighed.

Bruce was happy to shuffle off to bed. Thor clasped a hand on Sam's shoulder before he left the kitchen.

"Thank you for reminding us of our limitations. Sleep well," he said in a gentle reminder that Sam should get to sleep too.

"I will, soon as you're all tucked in. You too, Tony. Quit worrying about Steve. He can handle the uranium. He can handle Natasha. And he can handle the girl at the coffee shop," Sam assured them.
"I know. This was all for fun. Mission wind-down. Delirium, like you said. But I'm waiting up until he gets back. I want to take a reading on him, make sure he's alright," Tony said.

"Good enough. What about you?" Sam asked. He watched as Natasha and Clint moved off to the elevators, moving slower than usual and nearly leaning on each other.

"Jarvis?" Tony asked.

"You've received the equivalent exposure of five years' worth of dental x-rays. The shielding performed as designed," Jarvis told them.

"See? I'm good. Just a little…tired," Tony said around a jaw-cracking yawn.

"You people are way beyond my counselling certification. I need to go back to school and get some more creds for this," Sam said. He went to the elevator to go get some real sleep in his suite, not the fake stuff he'd had leaned against the wall of the quinjet, trying to stay away from radioactively hot super men.

Tony enlarged a display in the air and watched the red dot that was Steve moving the uranium to its final destination.

An hour and a half later, Estrella startled awake on the bench at the sound of a large motorcycle nearby.

She straightened up from the slump she'd fallen into and turned to see that Steve had pulled his bike off the road and into a curbside parking space just beyond the coffee shop. He glanced over his shoulder at her and smiled as he put down the kick stand. He stood up from the bike and dismounted, then put his satchel on the seat. He was in full uniform, with only the helmet off. His shield was probably in his satchel, she thought.

"Hey, Cap!" one of the people sitting at the café tables said.

"Hello," Steve waved a hand at the people at the tables. Several smiled at him. They were dazzled because he never came around in uniform, or with such a serious face.

He took a few steps closer to Estrella and the bench, but he stopped several feet away. He looked tired. Very tired. The evening was glooming into dusk, but she thought she saw bruises on his face, or maybe it was dirt.

"Was Nat nice to you?" he asked.

Estrella shrugged. It didn't matter. Lots of people weren't nice to her. What was one more?

Steve sighed. She patted the bench next to her. He remained where he was, at least six feet away from anyone.

"I can't right now," he said.

They were both aware that people were watching and listening. It had become somewhat of a local thing that Captain America had taken pity on a scruffy street urchin. Some came by the coffee shop on the hopes of catching a glimpse of their glittering hero sacrificing his time on the lowest of the low.
Steve was aware of it. Estrella didn't care about the opinions of others. She was happy for Izzy, if he was getting more tips. Except, having an audience made it more difficult to visit with Steve. She frowned at Steve and patted the bench again. She didn't care if he was dirty or sweaty, or even bloody. He needed to get off his feet. He needed to be closer so they could talk without all his words being overheard.

"I can't. I really can't. I only wanted to see you for a minute before I go home. It was rude of me to ride on by a while ago. I didn't want you to think I was brushing you off," he said as quietly as he could.

Steve clasped his wrist behind his back and braced his legs. Jeeze, he was beat. He didn't know if drowsiness was one of the symptoms of radiation exposure, and he wasn't going to take the time to look it up. He'd be fine by morning, either way.

Estrella looked steady at his face. Unlike so many dames, her eyes didn't wander all over him. He saw sympathy in her eyes. She wanted him to sit down because she knew he was tired. It felt good to have somebody who didn't care what he'd just been doing, didn't care what might be on him. Like his ma, she wanted him rested.

"I gotta go, but I wanted to tell you that Nat means well. I hope she was nice to you, but if she wasn't, well... I don't know what's in her head. Do you want me to rough her up for ya?" Steve was joking, trying to get a smile from her.

Estrella considered the idea, mostly just to mess with Steve. When he started looking concerned that she was actually going to ask him to beat up his friend, she smiled and shook her head.

"That bad, huh?" Steve asked. He knew Natasha pushed things a little too far with civilians sometimes. She'd never really been a civilian, so she wasn't so in tune with their threat tolerance levels. She tended to make people nervous when she was left rattling around loose.

"No, no. She's only concerned about you," Estrella whispered and hoped that Steve could either hear her from six feet away or read her lips.

Just then, a camera flash went off. Estrella turned her head to see who had taken a picture of him looking so tired and worn. People shouldn't take pictures of him like he was a performing entertainer. There was a woman in a group of other women at a table. She was trying to hide a smile while she tapped on her phone. The woman noticed Estrella's glare and put her phone away.

"It's alright," Steve said softly, just for Estrella. He didn't want her fighting his public battles for him all the time. Sure, he was tired of being a spectacle, but he was also resigned to it.

Estrella looked mutinously at him, then at the woman, and back at Steve again.

"Peace. It's no harm," he said.

Estrella sighed. She loved seeing him and knowing that he was home safely, but he needed to go. He'd been working hard and it was time for him to rest. And probably eat.

She shooed him toward the tower with a hand.

"Alright, doll. See ya tomorrow. But we're gonna go somewhere that's not here, okay?" he asked her. He wanted to give her a chance to tell him no. He'd had enough of the eyes and ears always looking for a publicity op with the Cap.

Estrella shrugged. She'd deal with that decision tomorrow.
Go, she shooed him again.

He nodded. He wanted to hug her or something. The touch of somebody who cared and saw the real Steve Rogers would feel good. The way people were watching, though, he didn't even want to reach a hand out to her. It would likely end up in the paper or on the internet, with all kinds of nasty speculation.

Instead, he looked at her for a moment. She looked back, her eyes so soft on him that it almost felt like a touch. He smiled sweetly before he turned for his bike to go home. She watched him sling the satchel over his shoulder and settle it across his back. He swung his leg over and shifted his weight. In one motion, he tucked back the kick stand and started his bike. He waited for traffic, then in a rumble, was gone.

Estrella was glad that he'd had his back to the people at the coffee shop when he'd smiled at her. They'd have gotten the wrong idea. She knew there was nothing like that between them, and he simply didn't know that people weren't supposed to look at each other that way anymore. Nobody was that kind. That genuine. She'd have to teach him to guard himself, or somebody was likely to take advantage.

Lots of women would use him if they knew how sweet he was. Then, he would get hurt and defensive and jaded like everyone else. She didn't want to see that happen. He deserved to keep his soul until he could find a woman who was worthy of him, she decided.
Chapter 7

Author's note: Here's where this story starts earning its M rating. If you're not comfortable with that, please don't read this chapter. I've loved writing this because it's so fun playing with the characters. I'm far from done with it, but my family is going on vacation til the 15th of June and I want to be with them. Plot elements play in my head all the time and make my fingers itch to type, so by the time I get back, I'll have a lot to write. I posted this as a writing exercise. I didn't anticipate all the lovely follows and faves and comments. Thank you. I feel humbled. I also didn't anticipate how getting reviews would make me want to get more out to you. More later!

"Naw, man, but you should have seen the look on his face! Classic Fury, all the way. I thought Tillis was gonna puke, he was so nervous," Sam said around a smile, then stuck a buffalo wing into his mouth.

"Is not agent Tillis the new one from Texas?" Thor asked.

"He sure is. We had to hide his cowboy hat until he finally figured out that it didn't go with the suit," Sam answered when he had chewed and swallowed.

Clint laughed silently and poured himself more beer from the pitcher. The restaurant was crowded. Football was on the big screen, and waitresses hurried around athletically delivering platters of food and pitchers of beer to the noisy crowd. There were frequently moments of hushed anticipation in the large room, followed by either raucous shouts of triumph or boos of disgust.

Steve smiled along with his friends and halfway paid attention to the ball game. The energy of the diners was infectious and he felt cheered by the roar of the crowd. It was like baseball, but with more beer and chicken. And the waitresses… Steve grinned and shook his head.

He hadn't wanted to go out with the guys tonight, but Nat had given him that eyebrow, so he'd changed into his best jeans, (as determined by Natasha, Pepper, Jane, and Darcy), a crisp white shirt, and his brown leather Western boots.

After reading three Western novels back to back, he was imagining the jingle of spurs when he walked. He didn't think Tillis' hat was so bad. He'd held it in his locker for Sam and was only partially ashamed to admit that he'd tried the hat on. He was too clean shaven to make it look quite right.

Another roar went through the crowd and Steve looked to the screen to see that there was a penalty. He poured himself more beer for the taste of it. Wings weren't complete without beer, he'd learned.

They had three waitresses serving their table, apparently, because every other minute or so, one of the lovely ladies would come by and offer them something. Anything. Apple pie. Beer. Phone numbers in case any of them needed anything after hours. Steve was used to it, but he didn't let Sam see him pocket one of the phone numbers. He was tempted to call it in front of Nat just to make her day.

His good cheer was dampened slightly by looking around and seeing all the overhanging bellies. And then looking down at his own plate of discarded wing bones. He's probably consumed four thousand calories tonight. As well as breakfast and lunch and a snack earlier.

Estrella had let him touch her briefly yesterday while they walked to the library. There'd been a puddle near the sidewalk and a car was coming. He'd grasped her upper arm and guided her slightly behind him so that he could take the splashed water as the cab rushed by. She'd felt like bones in his hand.

Why would she be letting herself get worse? He didn't know, but he was on the razor's edge of forcing her to come to the tower for treatment. If forcing her put a rift in their friendship, then it was better than her being dead.

Sam nudged his leg under the table. Humor still gilded his smooth features, but there was a depth of concern in his eyes.

Steve smiled a little and shook his head. On purpose, he watched a well-rounded waitress prance by. Sam's watchful gaze moved away. Having Sam around was like having a doctor and a mother hen with them at all times, mixed with a heavy dose of Casanova. The man got as many phone numbers as Thor and Steve did, and nobody knew who he was.

Thor drank beer like water, and Clint looked a little buzzed from trying to keep up. Steve needed the restroom. When he came back, everyone was ready to leave, finally. He left a nice tip because he knew the girls were working their feet off tonight.

His boots would have made him as tall as Thor if Thor hadn't seen them and demanded to know where he'd gotten them. As a result, he walked in his brown scuffed leather, and Thor kicked along beside him in black and white rattlesnake. He was surprised that Thor hadn't stolen Tillis' hat. He'd already apprehended two of Steve's Western novels. Poor English reader, my ass, Steve thought. Not that Westerns had many large words in them.

Clint was laughing for no reason, or at least no reason he was willing to share with the rest of them. Steve thought it was both pleasant and strangely empty that Tony wasn't along with them. A gathering always had a certain reckless excitement when Stark was around. You never knew when strippers would arrive, or a flaming dessert cake he'd never heard of. Still, it was nice to have a low-key evening and appreciate the Americans around them enjoying life. Tony tended to draw the focus of things to himself, just from sheer flamboyance. The guy knew how to party, as long as he wasn't too drunk.

Pepper had claimed Tony's time for the night. Jane was waiting for Thor as soon as the elevator door opened. Steve blushed at the openly eager look of appreciation on Jane's face as she tugged Thor forcefully from the elevator.

"Good evening, guys," she'd said. Thor had only grinned back at them and followed along behind Jane with no protest.

Sam and Steve helped Clint into his suite before Sam left him to go to his own.

"You gonna call that waitress?" Sam asked him.

Steve laughed and rolled his head down to stare at his boots. He thought he'd been smooth, but he couldn't out-smooth the king of smooth. Dammit, Bucky could have taught him to do better. There hadn't been much opportunity to learn before, because the dames had wanted nothing to do with him. Then, when they'd been with the Commandos, there was little time for wooing women.

"Hey, it's all good. But I really think you should call that number in front of Natasha," Sam said.
"That's exactly what I was thinking," Steve said with a finger pointed to emphasize his agreement.

"I want to be around when that happens," Sam said, and then he was in the elevator and gone.

Steve ambled to his door with a warm, happy feeling all over him.

Why wait? He wondered.

It was after eleven. Surely the restaurant was closing soon. He left the lights off in his suite. The air was fresh and cool. He reached in the pocket of his jeans and pulled out the number the waitress had written for him on an empty order ticket. Sherice, it said, in pretty, loopy script. There was a number, then a little heart drawn under it. Steve pulled out his phone.

"Who's this?" he heard the blonde answer. She sounded busy, distracted. Other voices were in the background and there was the sound of dishes and silverware clinking. She must still be at the restaurant, Steve thought.

"I know my name doesn't show up. It's Steve. Steve Rogers. You gave me your number tonight. I was wondering if you wanted to come around for a little fun," Steve forced himself to sound casual, imagining how Sam would have said it.

"Who did you get my number from, Steve? You sound cute, but I didn't give it to a Steve," she sounded impatient. He heard a sharp clank, and Sherice mumbled 'shit' under her breath.

"You gave it to me and told me to call you anytime. It looked like you thought about giving it to Thor instead, but you changed your mind," he told her. He hoped he was giving her enough information for her to figure it out. His jaw would lock shut before he had to remind her who he was by using his title instead of his name.

"Captain America?" she said breathlessly. He heard her say OhMyGod, the words muffled against something. There was a harsh, clattering scrape, like maybe her phone dragging over her name tag or some jewelry.

"Sure. But I'd prefer it if you called me Steve," he agreed.

"Steve," she said, sounding a little lost.

"Yeah. Steve. So, when do you get off?" he asked. He wasn't quite as eager to meet with her anymore, but he hadn't expected it to go perfectly.

"Theresa!" She called out, her face probably turned away from the phone, "Um. I can leave now?" Sherice said like a question. Steve heard a little squealing in the background. He winced.

"I'll see you soon, then," Steve told her.

"Okay. Where do I go?" she asked.

"Stark tower. Avengers tower, I mean. Get in the elevator and my suite is on the right when you get off," he said gently. She sounded like she was having trouble breathing.

"Isn't there security or something? Do I need a code? Which floor?" she asked.

"There's security, but you won't see it. Just get in the elevator. Suite on the right," he reminded her.

"Okay. I'll be there in like… twenty minutes?" Sherice said.
"That sounds great. I'll see you then," Steve agreed. He heard another litany of Oh My God, Oh My God, Oh My God before the phone went dead. He grimaced and reminded himself of Sherice's assets as he set the phone down.

He had twenty minutes, which could feel like forever in certain circumstances. He went to the bathroom and brushed his teeth and flossed them. Next, he made sure that dishes and laundry were all squared away. His shield was propped against the wall by his bed, so he slid it under the edge of the bed. It was still within reach, but out of sight.

Two pairs of shoes were on the floor. He tossed them in the closet. The more he moved to get ready, the more nervous he felt. He ran down a checklist of what he would need, like he was packing gear for a mission. Suite clean. Bed made. He didn't stink. What else?

Crap.

He called Natasha. This was too important for a text she might or might not answer. He needed to hear her voice.

"Why are you calling me at… 11:42?" she answered, sounding sleepy. He knew she was yanking his string. Nat always woke in an instant, alert for anything.

"Do you have any condoms? I wasn't thinking I'd need any so soon, and I-"

"Calm down, Steve. All I have is regulars, and you're going to need a magnum. Call Thor," she said. He could hear the pleased smile in her voice.

"Okay," he said. He didn't want to call Thor. He was pretty sure Thor was busy right now.

"Get off the phone with me and call him," Natasha reminded him.

"Yeah. Thanks," Steve said. He ended the call and looked at his phone. He really didn't want to call Thor. But he had to. The pharmacy in the tower closed at ten, and he could probably get somebody to open it for him, but then everybody would know his business. Crap. He called Thor.

"Ngh. Your timing could benefit from a little luck. How can I help you, brother?" Thor asked. He heard Jane giggle in the background.

"Nat said you'd have magnum condoms?" Steve asked. He pinched the bridge of his nose and squeezed his eyes shut. He was at Thor's mercy as to whether he would keep this quiet, or announce the incident loudly in front of everyone later just for fun.

"Ngh. Your timing could benefit from a little luck. How can I help you, brother?" Thor asked. He heard Jane giggle in the background.

"Nat said you'd have magnum condoms?" Steve asked. He pinched the bridge of his nose and squeezed his eyes shut. He was at Thor's mercy as to whether he would keep this quiet, or announce the incident loudly in front of everyone later just for fun.

"I do," Thor said. Steve could hear the huge grin in his voice. He was going to make him ask.

"Do you mind if I run up and get some? This was pretty unexpected," Steve said. His teammates knew he always liked to be prepared, but maybe he hadn't been thinking that Sherice would agree to come over.

"I will go now to put some on the foyer table. Good hunting to you," Thor said. The line went dead, but Steve didn't move. The 'Good hunting' bit must be an Asgardian euphemism. He gave Thor a few minutes to get the task done, then he went to the elevator.

Right next to Mjolnir was a strip of five square packets in black foil. Steve grabbed them and folded them, then stuffed them in his pocket. He hurried back to the elevator which was waiting open for him.
"Thanks, Jarvis," he said.

"It's my pleasure to assist, Captain. Shall I inform you when Miss Sherice arrives, or would you prefer to be surprised?"

"I'll hear the elevator. That's good enough," Steve said.

He hurried back to his room and put the condoms in his night stand drawer. How much time did he have? He looked at his watch. She'd said twenty minutes twelve minutes ago.

Steve went to the upper cabinet in the kitchen and got down the bottle of bourbon. It was a gift from Tony, so he was sure it was ghastly expensive. Steve cracked the seal and poured a highball full. The stuff was strong but smooth. Useless. The smell at least made him imagine he was accomplishing something.

"Captain, there is a slight complication. Miss Sherice has brought a friend. Would you like to entertain them both, or should I provide tea for the guest in the rear waiting room?" Jarvis asked from somewhere in Steve's suite.

"Keep the guest downstairs," Steve responded. He tossed back the bourbon, then chased it with water from the tap.

A minute and a half later, he heard the soft sound of the elevator slowing to a stop out in the foyer. There was a light knock on his door.

"I might recommend turning on a few lights, Captain. I'm certain that Miss Sherice is unable to see as well as you are able to," Jarvis said at a very low volume.

"Right," Steve said. He hurried over and turned on a lamp in the living room. There was another knock on the door.

_Think Bucky. Think Sam. Just do what they'd do_, Steve told himself. He ran his fingers through his hair, the last nervous gesture he would allow himself. Then he went to open the door.

"Sherice. Hello. Please, come in," Steve said. He held the door wide and stepped back so that she could enter. He could feel his pulse hammering, but she wouldn't know that. Natasha's teaching kicked in. He smiled at the waitress.

She was a little off her game too, he thought. She'd been all sparkle and confidence at the restaurant, but she was quiet and hesitant here. He preferred her that way. At least she'd stopped saying 'OhMyGod.' It was a reminder that he was about to do something wrong. Steve thought about what Nat had said. He needed to do this. He was aware that he was a grumpy, distracted bastard more often than not lately. Lesser of two evils, he justified to himself.

Sherice entered and he closed the door behind her. She looked around at his large suite and the window which he'd cleared so they could see the lights of the city if they wanted to. He let her look around while he moved to the kitchen.

"All I've got is bourbon right now. Would you like any?" he offered.

"No, thanks, I don't usually drink bourbon," Sherice turned around to look at him standing in the light of the kitchen holding the bottle.

"Is that Hirsch?" she asked. She moved closer to the kitchen, her eyes on the bottle.
Steve turned it in his hand to look at the label.

"That's what it says," he confirmed.

"I'll have some. Please," she changed her mind.

She looked like she didn't know whether to stare at Steve or at the bottle. For the moment, the bottle was winning. Steve was happy that she wasn't ogling him. Her distraction was amusing enough to ease his nerves. Maybe he ought to walk around with a bottle of this stuff in his hand. He smirked and poured her a few fingers in a fresh glass. He poured more for himself. He didn't want her to feel odd to be the only one drinking.

The bourbon went back in the cabinet and he left the kitchen to bring her drink to her in the living room. She seemed to like the view, so he went to the window. She followed. He propped one elbow on the glass and sipped his drink with the other hand.

"Whooo.." Sherice breathed out, half sound and half air. She'd taken a sip too, and she fanned her face after she swallowed.

"You don't like bourbon. You don't have to drink it," he smiled down at her. Sherice was of average height, just about at his shoulder. Her cute top and tight jeans showcased the features that had made him call her number.

"It's good," she said. He saw that her pulse was jumping under her skin, a curl of bright blonde hair almost hiding it. She was more nervous than he was.

Steve was happy that he wasn't making a fool of himself so far, but tension was building. There was no point in drawing this out. They both knew the reason for the visit.

"Come on," he told her. He curved a hand around her waist and escorted her toward his room. She went willingly.

"I need a minute? I don't normally go anywhere but home right after work," she said. She stepped toward his bathroom.

"Sure," he said.

She was beautiful, and he was eager to get on with it, but she needed some time. When the door closed behind her, he tried to think of a plan for when she came out. He could kiss her, but how should he lead into that? He finished his drink and set the glass on the night stand. Taking off his boots was awkward, so he sat and removed them while she was in the bathroom.

She had all the plan they needed. Sherice joined Steve at the bedroom window wall and slid her arms around him from behind. It should have felt good. Especially when she pressed against him and rubbed firmly up and down his chest and abs. He almost shoved away out of her arms, though. No one touched him. Not like this. He'd dreamed of it, wanted it. But now that the moment was here, he was having a hard time adjusting to allowing her to do it.

He'd done quick sex a long time ago in Europe with dames who didn't speak English. He didn't remember their faces. They were probably dead now, most of them. It felt like forever ago. It had been so fast that there wasn't much to remember. He could do this. He let Nat close to him, but Nat regularly crawled all over him in the training room. This woman felt foreign. He could do this, he told himself again.

Steve turned in her arms and kissed her. They both tasted like bourbon. Her curves felt good in his hands. Things went pretty fast after that. Sherice became more eager and clothes started coming off. She took off his shirt, messed around for a while, then pulled off her own. Her little lacy pink bra was gone, and Steve barely could appreciate anything before Sherice was undoing his belt, his zipper, and then hers. He would have helped, but he'd have wanted to do things slower.

"You gotta be somewhere?" he asked, teasing.

From the flush on her face and the way she looked at his body, he doubted she was listening. Her jeans hit the wall, then she tugged at her panties. They would have hit the wall too, but lacked sufficient mass, so they fell short onto the floor.

Steve lay back on his large bed, atop the covers, and wondered what he was supposed to do. She seemed to be doing it all. She straddled his hips and sat up. His bedside light was on, and his eyes went straight to where their bodies touched. He'd been thinking pretty hard about feminine bits and pieces lately, and she was a sight, but-

"Uh, Sherice, what happened to, uh?" he asked dumbly.

"Hmmm, what?" she asked in a hot kitten purr. She held up her glorious blonde curls and rode him over his jeans.

"You don't have any hair. How old are you?" he asked. Steve was confused. She was a grown woman with a job and everything, but that didn't look like what he was used to. It was strange and juvenile looking to him.

"What?" Sherice asked, coming out of her haze some. Her arms came down and her body stopped making those undulations which felt so nice.

"It's nothing. Never mind. Just..." Steve moved aside underneath her, then rolled her over. In this position, he wouldn't be seeing her bare parts unless he deliberately looked there. She was looking happy again, so he started to work his jeans down. He had them off, and thought it would be a good time to get a condom before she could possibly be exposed to anything that could have permanent results. Her hands grasped at the muscles of his sides while he reached and got what he needed. He'd been right. Hands on his skin felt good when he was ready for it.

"You don't need that. I'll let you do it bare," Sherice said.

"That's sweet, but I'm wearing it," Steve told her firmly.

"Oooh, Cap. Tell me what to do," she cooed. She raised her arms up toward the headboard and twined her hands together.

Steve hid his distaste at her refusal to use his name. Then he was confused. Why would he need to tell her what to do all of a sudden? She'd been in the lead since the clothes came off. And what was with the odd arm thing?

He decided to ignore the strangeness for the sake of the moment. She was a beauty and he'd like to get this done. He stood beside the bed for a minute to finish undressing and put on the protection.

Sherice's eyes burned at him in admiration. He was drawn to her groin, but then looked away again at the strange sight of her lying there squirming and hairless. She didn't see his brows go down because she was looking at him while he rolled on the condom.

"It's so nice. Too bad you want to cover it up," she pouted.
He chose not to respond. Things were shifting in his mind. He got on the bed and covered her before they could shift too much. She was eager enough and she welcomed him in. Her arms pulled at his shoulders to encourage him.

"Oooh, I can't believe I'm fucking Captain America. Theresa's going to shit," Sherice murmured, her eyes closed.

He didn't get more than a quarter of the way in. He knew better than to shove in, with his size. His brain was far faster than his hips. Unfortunately. Things came to a crunching halt in his head, and the switch went cold off.

She was fucking Captain America, talking about shit, and planning to tell her friend all about it as soon as she hit the lobby. Steve got off the bed and bent to grab his underwear. He had them on before she could blink and sit up.

"What happened, Cap?" she asked. He made a face like he was in pain.

"Nothing much, Ma'am. I'm sorry to say that we're not compatible. I shouldn't have wasted your time. I'll have a car brought around for you while you dress. Steve bent and kissed her softly on the forehead, to ease the sting.

Sherice stared up at him, dumbstruck at what was happening. He was still plenty hard. He had a sweet blush across his face. But he was very serious. She wanted to ask what he didn't like. She wanted to call him a few names. But he was standing like a mountain, still and adamant. She could still feel his kiss on her forehead. Calling him names wouldn't change anything.

"Okay," she said.

He nodded to her and retrieved his clothes. He shut the door behind him so she could dress in privacy.

Sherice sat up in a confused blur. She drank down the last of the bourbon he'd given her. Then she got up to find her clothes. Her panties were right by the bed. As she bent to get them, she saw the curve of something under the bed. Was it…? It was.

She drew his shield out. It was heavy. One edge of it scraped along the floor. It made a strange humming sound.

"That's not for you," she heard him say from down the hall. Shit! Her fingers fumbled at being caught, and she dropped the shield. The edge of it hit her big toe and the shield rolled away lazily.

Steve rushed into the room. The shield was still going round and round on the floor, shimmying faster as it wobbled like a top. He stepped on it to stop the noise. His hands pushed the naked woman back to sit on the bed. He lifted her foot where her toenail was already marked with purple.

"I know that hurts. I've done it a time or two myself," he squatted down and rested her foot on his thigh. He rubbed the top of her toe with a thumb to soothe the ache.

Sherice wanted to be angry. She wanted to rage and spit at him for rejecting her and sending her home unwanted. But he was so nice. His hands were warm on her foot, and her toe didn't hurt anymore. He wasn't even mad that she'd messed with his stuff. He looked at her with concern.

"Feel better?" he asked.

She nodded. He wasn't in an awkward hurry to get her out of his place. Weird.
"Can I ask why you stopped?" she dared.

Steve dropped his head to pretend to inspect her toe. He thought of what to say for an instant, then looked at her.

"I'm not ready for the women of this century. I thought I was, but I'm not. Things are too different," he said.

He'd decided that if he placed the fault with himself, maybe she wouldn't feel bad. It was the truth without the details. It must have worked, because she smiled a little.

"Can I at least have a hug?" she asked.

"I'd like that," Steve smiled too. It was a wonderful hug. He only had his jeans on, so there was a lot of skin and she was soft. That was the best part. He lingered for maybe too long, then patted her hair and drew away. He got up again so she could get dressed.

He'd normally kick the shield against the wall with a bit of downward force to pop the edge up so he could grab it, but the mood was quiet and soft, so he took the time to bend down and get it like a normal person.

Steve smiled and wagged a finger at her as he left the room with it on his arm.

Sherice sighed and got dressed. She wouldn't tell Theresa what had happened. He was just too sweet.

Steve was brutal in the training room the next morning. Natasha patted him on the shoulder and walked off the floor. She and Thor exchanged looks as he took her place. Natasha toweled the dripping sweat from her face and went to the showers.

"Things did not go well," Thor said.

Steve ignored the banter and laid into his friend so that Thor had to take a step back.

"You're smarter than you look," Steve ground out. Thor nodded, refusing to rise to his provocation. They traded blows for a while. It felt good to let the aggression out. Steve was feeling at the top of his game, and Thor responded by pushing him harder, moving quicker until Steve was using his brain as much as his body to stay on his feet.

Blocking didn't do much good with Thor. If Steve's bones weren't as strong, they'd be broken. He took a hit to the diaphragm that tossed him across the mats. Thor was grinning, but it wasn't the golden, sparkly one he used with civilians. It was the scary one he used in battle. Nearly a thousand years of fighting experience danced there, ready to swat down anything from Steve's brief ninety-four years.

Before all of his body made contact with the mat, Steve was up and engaged again. He forced Thor into the neutral ground between offense and defense, hitting and blocking at the same time, feet moving to avoid being hooked and spilled on their ass. If he lost his footing, it was over. Natasha was speed and pain. Thor was speed and crushing injury, if he wasn't careful. Steve reveled in the struggle. He wondered how much Thor was holding back for him.

"Hit me!" Steve snarled at him.
"I thought I was," Thor responded.

They broke a brief grapple that rode on the edge of entrapment and defeat. They shoved each other away.

"Rrragh!" Steve shouted at Thor. He stood panting, loose, waiting to see if Thor wanted more.

"Graaught!" Thor shouted back.

They burst out laughing.

Steve's belly hurt, but he couldn't tell if it was from the fighting or the laughing.

"God, that was great," Steve wheezed.

"It was. Shall we continue?" Thor asked. The other smile was back in place.

"I'd love to, but I gotta get to the coffee shop. Wanna come with?" Steve asked.

"I would, but your lady friend is happier without my presence," Thor said.

Their breathing was loud enough that they hadn't noticed Sam and Clint standing at the side of the room with a freshly showered Natasha.

"That would have burned out the YouTube servers if I'd had my phone," Sam said.

Steve walked over to them and picked up his water bottle. Natasha looked at the bruises on his arms and face. She shook her head and rolled her eyes, then left the training room.

"What's wrong with her?" Steve asked.

"A little too much testosterone," Clint said.

"I am in need of a washing. Thank you for the entertainment, Steven. It's been too long since I used anything but my hammer," Thor said on his way to the showers.

Steve had too many responses that wanted to come out at once, so he kept quiet. He would need to speak to Thor later. He turned to Sam and Clint.

"You're pretty well matched with him," Sam said.

"Not at all. He was holding back, and he's a gentleman about it. I hope I never see him truly angry," Steve cautioned them.

Sam and Clint were amazing men with their own talents, but he didn't have the words to describe to them what being on the mats with Thor was like. He felt happy and loose now, and that was a fine accomplishment, considering how he'd been feeling when he'd first entered the training room.

Steve got his towel and picked up his watch. He shook it. Maybe it was broken.

"It's right. You were on the floor with him for thirty-seven minutes," Clint said.

Steve shook his head. The amount of sweat on his body and the sheen of it on the mats proved it. It had felt much shorter. He drank more water.

"Gotta eat," Steve said. He headed for the door.
"You're a mess. Don't you want to shower?" Sam asked.

"Shower later, food now," Steve grunted.

Clint laughed and checked his phone. Yup. Thirty-seven minutes of video.

Estrella couldn't leave her alley. There were men by the dumpster. Angry men.

It was early and the coffee shop wasn't open yet. The street lights were still on, but they'd go off soon, when the sun rose a little higher.

There was yelling, and somebody got shoved into the chain link fence, making it shake and jingle. She breathed fast and crawled back deeper into her shelter. Their accent was foreign and heavy. She couldn't understand what they were saying or what the conflict was about. She wanted them to move on and get away from her space. She wanted to whimper or scream, but horrible things would happen if she made a sound.

More yelling, and she thought she saw a weapon pulled. A few cars went by on the street, but no one wanted to get involved.

The bang of gunshots fired, and some of them whistled past her shelter to chip into the rear brick wall. She jerked and cried out a little, but there was more yelling which covered up any sound she made.

A man suddenly landed on the pavement somehow from above. Right in front of her, like he fell from the sky. She took a breath to scream, but he was too fast. She saw only a dark blur of movement, then he was up into her shelter with her. She struggled and flopped, but he wrapped her up tight against his body and covered her mouth with a hand. Or a tool. Something. He turned his back to the shooters and leaned his shoulder against the brick wall.

Her heart burned and pinched in her chest. She had to get away! But he was too strong. He pulled her back tightly against his chest and belly with an arm like... like... she didn't know. Then he was speaking low and fast in her ear.

"Stay still and quiet. People like them never stay for long. They'll go and then I'll go and then you'll be safe. Calm down before you hurt yourself," the man whispered.

Dark hair fell against the side of her face. His hand was cool and hard against her skin, but it stopped hurting when she stopped struggling. He had her and she couldn't get free. Now the horrible things would happen. She willed herself to pass out so she could sleep through it, but her adrenaline was too high.

"Shhh. I'm here to help. Just breathe, alright? Breathe and try to relax. They'll be gone soon. Listen. The police are coming. It's almost over," he whispered.

She couldn't do anything but breathe. Her chest hurt as bad as it ever had. She wasn't struggling. She lay limp and the man stayed as he was, a solid mass between her and the guns. More shots banged and echoed around her brick walls.

The man behind her jerked and grunted a tiny bit, but they both stayed quiet. Was he scared, too? There was another burst of angry voices, then the men were gone. Police cars rushed past, and one screeched to a stop at the curb outside her alley. Its spotlight turned and gleamed bright through the chain link, illuminating her shelter through the cracks. She trembled against the man.

"Shhh," he said, and he patted her arm. Then he let her loose. She expected him to run off and disappear as quick as he'd come, but he just turned beside her and curled his back against the brick wall. He handled her gently until she was leaning back against it beside him. His fingers pressed a spot at her throat, feeling her pulse.

She finally got to look at him.

He was almost like a street person. Like her. His clothing was old faded and stained denim, jeans and a jacket with a frayed collar. Underneath was a black shirt. He smelled a little, changing the familiar scent of her shelter with his presence. She didn't notice his worn boots because she was looking at his face. Long dark hair, searing eyes, scruffy jaw. He put a finger to his lips. She nodded.

The police were right outside the fence. She could hear the engine of the car and the police radio and their terse voices. If she or the man made any noise at all, the police would come and find them.

Her chest hurt, but her mind raced ahead. She would have to move. Someone knew where she was now. He said he was here to help, and maybe he was, but men like him didn't help people for no reason. He hadn't hurt her yet, but he would. He was a rough sort of man, not like Steve at all.

She stared at him, too scared to look away. He was calm. Bored looking, really. His chest wasn't rising and falling quick like hers was. He held her gaze for a moment, then looked through the cracks at whatever was going on outside.

Under all the unkempt shag of him, she discovered that he wasn't ugly as her first impression told her. Maybe he'd clean up nice. He didn't have the sick color of a drug user, or the bad skin. It didn't really matter who he was or why he was here. Why was he helping her? She wondered what he would do if the police came in. He didn't look worried about it.

There was a hot, coppery smell that she recognized. She craned her head to see that blood was blooming in a spreading stain on his jacket. He had a hand pressed there, a black leather glove that was slick with blood. Why didn't he look concerned? There wasn't even a crease in his brow.

A few minutes later the police left. He looked at her and put a finger at her neck again. The fingers that weren't covered by a bloody glove. He nodded and patted her shoulder.

"You better not hurt me. I have a friend who can find you and kill you," she whispered.

"I know. You should let him help you so this doesn't happen again," the man said.

Then he was gone. In less than a second, like he wasn't injured at all, he swung out of her shelter like a monkey and was out of her sight. She was too tired to move, but she heard slight scuffing sounds at the brick wall. Gone.

All she had left as proof of him was a little wet bloodstain on her carpet.

She rubbed at her chest and lay down for a while. It hurt and she was tired.
Author's note: Vacation was great, and then this chapter was wedged in sideways and didn't want to come out. I've got it figured now, and things are flowing. I've been snooping around reading a little about the characters as portrayed in Marvel Comics, and I see that what I'm doing with them doesn't quite match up. Tough. I'm having fun. I'll try to be a little more true to character, but I'm not going back and re-writing everything. It sounds like the original comic book writers did some pretty crazy things with them, so I can be crazy with them too. Thank you all again for the happy vacation wishes and the lovely reviews. I had no idea how much I would enjoy them. I was checking my phone between Splash Mountain and Thunder Mountain Railroad to see what was going on with the story. It added a touch of fun to my vacation. No sexy stuff in this chapter, just a little gore.

Steve didn't like how fragile Estrella looked when he met her on the bench. She was more hunched than usual and she looked around nervously while she drank the juice gunk he'd brought her. He was still full from the large meal he'd had after his workout with Thor, so he didn't bother with a coffee. He could tell that Estrella didn't want his full attention on her, so he pulled out his sketchbook and his pencil.

He wondered why she was playing shy this morning. They'd been getting along great. She'd spent most of their time looking him in the eye like a normal friend in ordinary conversation. She at least whispered more than she used to, though she still didn't speak to him. Steve figured something must have happened since their last visit to the library. He wished she would tell him more about what went on in her life, but she always clammed up if he asked anything too personal.

It didn't take her long to finish the drink he'd brought her. In that time, Steve assessed the street and the people around them. Kids were in school, and most people were at work. It was mostly young women sitting at the café tables across the sidewalk from their bench. He knew why they were there. He'd dressed down in loose fitting clothes and Clint's old ball cap, trying to take some example from Estrella to avoid drawing too much attention. It only marginally worked. Steve kept most of his attention on his bench buddy instead of on the women who'd come to get a chance at watching Captain America.

The weather was finally cooling off and giving the first hints of fall with dry breezes and sharp, golden light. Steve looked up and over a few buildings along the street where the edge of an aluminum roof vent gleamed in the sunlight. His sharp eyes watched for movement, but there was only the angular metal vent and heat shimmers rising from the rooftop.

Again, he made himself let go of the hope that a stray flash of silver could be Bucky. Buck wouldn't be dumb enough to run around with his arm showing. And Buck was likely several hundred miles away doing whatever his tormented mind compelled him to do. Steve shook his head at his eager foolishness and turned his attention back to his sketchbook. The nice weather and the quality of the light was what had made him want to doodle.

When he opened the spiral sketchbook to the first clean page, the signature drawing he'd made for Estrella a while ago slid down the page and almost flew away down the sidewalk with the breeze. Steve's fingers snapped out and caught the rectangle of heavy sketch paper before it could need chasing.
He held the clipped sketch out to her absently as if it didn't matter.

"Here, take this. Throw it away if you want, but it's my version of your idea. Look it over for me. If it's alright with you, I'll start using it," he said.

He had to hold the paper for a moment longer than was socially comfortable, but she took it from him. He wondered if she enjoyed making him squirm. Did she know that her opinion mattered to him and was that why she made him wait and wonder? He was disgruntled about her being so hesitant and distrustful of him still, after all the time they'd spent sitting on this bench and reading near each other at the library in companionable silence.

Then he looked aside at her and saw the little smirk she ducked her face down to hide.

"Punk," he muttered at her.

Her shoulders wiggled some under her frumpy, bulky clothes. She was laughing at him, getting a kick out of his discomfort. She knew him well enough now to know that he was sometimes awkward, and she teased him about it when he was in a favorable mood.

"That's mean. You know an artist is sensitive about his work. Come on, don't play me like that. Do you like it?" he asked her.

He gave up trying to pretend indifference. He turned more fully toward her and watched her finger the corner of the paper while she looked at what he'd done.

"I won't do it in color like that when people ask. I don't carry around markers. It can be in whatever medium they hand me to write with. It won't look as snazzy without the silver, red, and blue, but I wanted you to have a nice copy because it's your idea. What do you think?" he asked.

She looked at him and nodded sharply. She looked satisfied, and her eyes pinched at the corners with a smile. She tucked the card away in her clothes somewhere and he was happy that she'd finally taken something from him without a fuss.

Steve felt attention sharpen on him. On her. With a quick glance, he looked up and saw the mostly female patrons at the café tables watching him and Estrella interact with bald curiosity. They were enjoying the latest gossip spectacle. He understood some of their fascination because he'd idolized his own versions of heroes when he was a kid, but there was something tawdry about the way folks watched his visits with Estrella. They thought she was unworthy of his attention and it made him angry.

"Hey, watch this," Steve whispered aside to Estrella.

He filed his pencil point to how he liked it against the metal bench, then moved his hand onto a blank spot at the top of the new page. With quick strokes, he lined out the frames of a comic in which he and Estrella were doing a series of mundane things like reading, walking, and drinking coffee, and wide-eyed people were following them around in herds with cameras and note pads, then he sketched a TV frame with a news icon in the bottom corner and made a dialog bubble of the journalist reporting their boring activities as if it was great drama.

Estrella watched the sure, quick strokes of his hand as he worked. From the back of the previous sketch page, she saw that he was capable of much more intricate and detailed work, but right now he was messing around with his frustrations and the irony of their situation. She agreed that it was ridiculous how people took note of them and seemed to hate her because he paid attention to her.

She took his pencil when he was done with the sketch and wrote beneath it. Steve watched her precise letters appear from the end of his pencil.

Do you think they'd talk about it on the 'net if you yelled out loud for no reason?

"Yeah, probably. I can see it now… 'Captain America loses his mind, goes rabid from contact with street chum.' They don't know I was a street kid myself most of the time I was growing up. When I could get out, anyway. Summers were broiling. Nobody had air conditioning. We'd play in any water we could find. It was miserable to be inside for a few weeks every year," Steve told her.

He took back his pencil and drew a sketch from his memories of he and his ma's little place in Brooklyn. The walls, the ceiling with its water stains, the window frame near his bed, the black metal electric fan that was their only air movement at night.

Estrella pointed past his hand to the bits and pieces of memory he'd penciled down on the other page.

"Who's that?" she whispered to him.

She'd moved close enough so that her whispered words would only look like lip movements to their onlookers. She knew he could hear very well, so she didn't need much breath to be heard.

Steve looked at the shadowed profile and long hair she was pointing to. It wasn't even a complete face, just a nose, forehead, eyes, and hair, done dark and low contrast. It had been night when he'd seen Buck like that.

"That's an old friend of mine. I thought he was dead for a long time, then a few months ago, bam, there he is again. He's pretty confused right now, and I'm looking for him, but he's always gone when I get to the last place he's been. I want him back because he's the only one who remembers me, but he's being a- never mind. That's probably not very interesting to you. Look at these creeps now," Steve said.

He brushed Estrella's hand away from where she was hovering her fingers at the edge of Buck's sketch. The eyes of their watchers were even heavier on his nerves now that Estrella had moved closer to him on the bench to look at the sketch book. Steve took a quick glance up at them again, then set pencil to paper.

A herd of round, owlish faces appeared on the paper, all of them clutching and tapping on their phones, the phones pointed at the viewer. He made the faces of the women look witch-like, with pointy little features where he'd taken the time to embellish two or three of them.

Estrella didn't like the way he was letting people get to him. Steve's brow was crimped in the middle. He was bothered by something more than their spectators, and he was taking it out on the people in his sketch book. The work he was doing was to the point and evocative of his thoughts on the matter, but it wasn't as detailed and careful as what she saw on the other page.

"I don't care about them. Let me see…" Estrella whispered.

She pulled the sketchbook away from him and onto her lap. Steve wanted to pull it sharply back and complain about her taking over his stuff, but she was looking more lively and engaged and he much preferred that look on her to the hollow, skittish look she'd had when he first joined her today.

He sat back in his corner of their bench and watched her flip slowly through the pages of images he'd put down in the last few months. It was a mixed lot of pieces, hardly any of it complete, cohesive drawings. There were memories of his childhood that he didn't want to lose, like the look of his bony shins and feet poking out from the bottom of his blanket on his old bed. Bits of architecture that didn't exist in the city anymore. Flashes of how the sky and ground looked while he was making an aerial mission insertion, glimpses of blurred action in a battle. The waggling tail of a duck as it stuck up from the surface of a park pond and rippled the water around it.

Around and among much of it were pieces of Bucky. A hunched, squatted form in black leather on one page as a menacing silhouette. An angular, handsome view of him young and clean shaven in his new uniform. Angry eyes and teeth bared in rage. Bucky skimming fast down the wall of a building, his reflective fingers leaving lines of gouges in the wall while his body braced for impact. A firm metal hand gripping his thrown shield.

"That's why he wears a glove," Estrella whispered. Her fingers traced the finely interlocking bands of metal that Steve had drawn for the man's arm, tapped at the outline of a star on the shoulder.

"He wears a glove? Estrella, have you seen this man?" Steve forgot to not say her name in his startlement. He was whispering anyway, his head bent close to hers in his eagerness to find out what she'd meant by her thoughtless comment. He'd taken on that sharp intensity he got when his Captain brain was paying attention and he wasn't exactly Steve anymore.

Estrella's head throbbed its way into a more prominent headache than she'd had all morning. The day had already been too exciting. Steve looking at her like that and thinking hard, waiting for her to respond, was too much. She put her forehead in her hand and rubbed at her temples.

"I'm sorry, but I have to ask. Have you seen him?" Steve persisted.

He could see that her head was hurting, and he'd let it go if she could just answer this one question. It could make a huge difference in his hunt, if Buck was around local sometimes. His hand hovered over Estrella's back, wanting to soothe her discomfort. He gave up wanting to comfort her and held his breath to better listen to anything she might whisper.

She was so conflicted and she knew she was going to do the wrong thing. The moment had that feel to it, the knowledge that what she told him mattered and that she had to say the correct thing. His friend whom he was looking for, the same man who had helped her and taken a bullet for her this morning, didn't want to be found.

She wanted to help Steve. It was very important to him, and she could hear the eagerness in his voice. But his friend would have gone to him if he wanted to be known. He had a reason for staying hidden and he wasn't as confused as Steve thought he was. Estrella knew well the need to stay hidden. That man knew where she lived. If he didn't like her telling his secrets, he could do something to her.

"I don't know where I saw him. Wasn't he on TV with you a few months ago?" she lied. The pain in her tight whisper wasn't faked. Her chest was still achy, but it was her head that really hurt now. She didn't want to lie to him, but she had to. The man knew where she lived and he might be watching right now. She had to find a different place to live.

"Yeah, maybe he was. Don't worry about it," Steve reassured her. He was being an idiot again. Of course she hadn't seen Bucky. It's not like he would be anywhere around here, and Estrella surely hadn't gone to any of the places where Buck was likely to be laying low.

Like a few minutes ago when he'd seen the roof vent gleaming silver at him, he made himself let go of his thoughts of Bucky. Estrella needed him to back off, so he did. He rested his arm along the bench behind her. What he really wanted to do was bundle her up with his sketchbook and carry her back to the tower. It would be so simple to feed her something and let her rest for a while.
where people didn't stare at her and no one would bother her.

"Let's lose these lurkers. Come on back to my place and we can watch a movie or something. I've got a stack of files to go through this afternoon and a few meetings, but we could put the hurt on some popcorn and watch something stupid first," he offered.

Estrella looked up at him suspiciously. She looked to the Avengers tower which was visible from anywhere in this part of town. Then she frowned at him.

"What, you think they won't let you in there? You're with me, kid. You go anywhere I say you go and if they don't like it, we'll give em what-for. You're welcome at my place anytime," he assured her.

Estrella looked down and hid her face. He was naive in his earnest attempt to make her feel welcome in his glossy, high-energy world. She knew he meant what he said, but he couldn't know how out of place she'd feel in the tower. Everything was clean and shiny and modern there. The one time she had walked by the ground floor public entrance, it looked like a laser would shoot out and incinerate anything that dared to be out of place or imperfect. She'd feel like something meant to be swept into a dustpan. Still, he was kind to invite her.

What would it be like to sit on deep, comfortable furniture with a bowl of popcorn and a glass of soda? To ignore everything and enjoy a fantasy on the TV for a few hours? To sit near someone and enjoy something trivial together? Well, she already did that with Steve at the library sometimes and she knew it was nice. Those were the best times of her life lately, having someone to spend time with who actually sought out her company.

"Thank you Steve, but no. I don't belong in your world," she whispered when she'd let the dream play out for long enough in her head. It was best to not dwell on what she'd never have.

Steve jostled her shoulder. She looked up at him again to see indignation firing his eyes.

"Hey, this is my world and you're already in it. Our world is wherever we choose to go. This is America, and it's changed a lot in the last decades, but it's still a free country mostly. You go where you want to," he said with a stubborn firmness in his voice.

He was little boy super-hero cute in his idealism sometimes. He was one of those people with power. He made things happen, and the world bent and bowed around him. He still didn't understand that she had to live as one of the people who survived by hiding and staying out of the way of people like him. Staying out of the way of ordinary people, too. And watching out for the class below ordinary, as well. She was the lowest of the low.

Her ribs and jaw ached a little from where Steve's friend had held her still and quiet a few hours ago. He was another strange person like Steve who didn't fit with how she knew people to be. The man was hard and dangerous, but he'd protected her in his own way. She was sure he hadn't meant to bruise her, but men rarely realized their strength. Had he gotten help for the bullet wound? He didn't act like it bothered him, but it should have.

"Eya?" Steve nudged her again.

He was looking at her, waiting. She felt fuzzy-headed. He'd said something and her mind had wandered off after that. He waited for her to respond, watchful as if she was supposed to say something.

"What?" she hissed, feeling cranky. The bright sun was making her eyes squint and her head hurt.
"I want you to come with me to the tower. We've got a doctor on staff there and I want you to see him to make sure you're alright. You don't eat enough. No, don't try denying it. You can't even think straight right now. Come with me and let the doc look you over. For free, I promise. He's on a fat salary from Tony and there's no charge for services. You won't owe anybody a dime," Steve tried to convince her.

She frowned at him. Did he think she was stupid? She knew medical care wasn't free. Even the 'free' stuff the president was pushing wasn't really free. She had two dollars and seventy-one cents.

Estrella shook her head at him. It was too hot and he was being too pushy. She carefully got up from the bench because her balance was acting funny today. She went past all the gawkers at the tables and into the cool dark of the coffee shop. Steve was following her, she knew, because the door handle disappeared from under her hand as she went to push it. She'd been counting on it being there and she almost swayed forward too far.

Damn him and his good intentions, anyway. She ignored him standing behind her shoulder and dug out a quarter to slap down onto the countertop. Izzy got her a big Styrofoam cup and filled it full of fresh ice water. He squeezed a fat lemon wedge into the water, and put another one on the rim of the cup, just the way she liked it.

Estrella stood in the middle of the floor in the mostly empty coffee shop. Everyone was outside. If she didn't sit down, then Steve couldn't sit and pester her about changing her life anymore. It was making her mad that he lingered there by her elbow like she was about to fall down and he planned to catch her. She knew when she was about to fall down, dammit, and she was good for right now.

"Go away," she whispered at him. She drank her water like she planned to stand there all day.

Steve glared down at her, feeling just as ornery. If she was a male friend, he'd shove her and say something wise at her. But she wasn't, and a shove would knock her over.

He looked to Izzy, who was standing behind the bar wiping down the syrup bottles. Izzy frowned at Estrella too, then shrugged helplessly at Steve.

"Alright. I'll see ya," Steve said after a moment more of stiff silence.

Estrella lifted a hand toward him in a half good-bye, half go away gesture. He rested his fingers on her shoulder for just a moment to let her know that he didn't have any hard feelings even though she was being a grump.

She sighed and looked at him over the rim of her foam cup as he was pushing out the door. He looked back at her for just an instant, and she couldn't help smiling back some at the rascally grin he gave her. She stomped her foot after he was gone. It made her even madder when he made her smile when she was angry. He was too charming and it wasn't fair that she couldn't stay mad at him.

The next morning was blessedly crisp and cool. Estrella was up and on the sidewalk before the morning rush. Most people avoided bumping her even when it was crowded and busy, but sometimes it happened. It was dangerous to fall when the sidewalks were full and everyone was moving, so she'd set out before the crowds could be a problem for her.
She didn't want to leave her place in the alley. Izzy was nice and he didn't bother at all about her using the bathroom in the coffee shop and hanging around most days. She left his patrons alone, and he gave her extra lemon slices with her water. He didn't seem to mind that she set her cup out for change on the sidewalk, either. It would be hard to find another place like the one she had right now.

She was unhappy that Steve's friend had been watching her place like a creepy ghost. He'd got himself shot for his trouble, and she wasn't sure she was thankful. Life wasn't all that much fun for her, except for the books she could read. They probably had books in Heaven, so she wouldn't mind moving on. If Steve's friend could have kept his nose in his own business maybe she wouldn't need to look for a new place.

Estrella shuffled along toward the library. There might be someplace around there where she could hide a shelter. The little mall of shops was busier than the block the coffee shop was on, but it might not be too bad. She didn't want to move far if she didn't have to. She'd be further away from Steve there, but closer to the library. Wanda was nice. Not as nice as Izzy, but nice enough.

Steve was a bother sometimes and he couldn't leave well enough alone when he wanted to get something done, but he was one of the bright spots in her life, right along with her reading. It made no sense to her that he followed her around and kept showing up, but he did and she didn't have the heart to completely run him off. He was silly for wanting to spend time with a lump like her, but he was kind and she could use some kindness. Sometime in the last few days, she'd given up trying not to care about him. She'd just have to be tough again when he went away for good.

She was tired and out of breath by the time she made it to the library. She didn't go in. Her heart was racing and she had the cold tingles so she eased down onto the concrete bench at the round table. While she caught her breath, she looked around to start assessing the place.

The shops were built all together with no gaps between the buildings, but there were probably service areas around back. There were places where shop keepers stacked bales of used cardboard boxes. Vermin liked to stay around spots like that, but she could clean things up.

She was getting frustrated because the cold tingly feeling was lingering for longer than usual. She couldn't get up and do anything when she was about to pass out. Carrying her stuff over here for the move would take a few trips and she'd have to do it in the small hours of the morning and hope that nobody noticed. It would be dangerous. Maybe she could get a shopping cart to help.

The library door opened. It was Wanda doing her morning routine, unlocking the doors and putting the rubber mat out.

"Girl, get yourself in here! You don't need to be sitting on a concrete bench," Wanda fussed at her.

Estrella pushed herself to her feet and obeyed Wanda. The woman pushed the heavy inner door open for her and Estrella stopped for a drink at the water fountain.

"You need to eat something," Wanda barked at her while Estrella retreated to her regular chair in the fiction section. Estrella hunched her shoulders and stepped high. There was a seam in the carpet that the floppy toe of her shoes snagged on if she wasn't watchful.

Wanda's attitude didn't bother her. She knew the woman meant well, and she reminded Estrella of her mother a little bit. Always wanting her to eat. Eat, eat, eat. She'd weigh three hundred pounds if she'd listened to Wanda and her mother. She could have chosen obesity over starving, but starving was cheaper and easier. And some men liked large women, so being big may not have helped her much.
Estrella sat in her soft chair and rested her head back against the wall. She only sat for long enough to feel better. Once she felt strong enough, she got up and started back toward the coffee shop. There was no time for a book today. She had to find a place, if only her body would allow her to search for one.

Wanda stared at her as she made her way back outside, but she didn't say anything. Estrella wandered around the outdoor area of the mall. There was no one else out because the shops weren't open yet. It looked like the mall and library area wasn't going to work for her. She looked through the gaps in a fence and the service alley was only wide enough for a delivery truck. No room for a shelter.

Estrella made her way back through the increasing morning crowd. She was light headed again by the time she could duck out of foot traffic and ease onto her bench in front of the coffee shop. She liked to be aware of the people moving around her, but she was too tired. She pulled her legs up under her and crossed her arms.

Sometime later, she woke up to loud voices.

She didn't know how long she'd slept, but the morning rush was over and the women at the café tables were starting to leave because they knew Steve would have been here already if he was going to show up at all.

The women weren't just leaving because Steve wasn't here. There were five young men off the side of the sidewalk, close to the café tables. They should have been at school or at work, but they weren't. They were getting loud and rowdy, using rough language. They wanted attention, she could tell. They liked making a spectacle and getting noticed and driving decent people away.

They were driving off Izzy's customers. Not everybody was around to stare at her and Steve. There was the older lady and her niece who met here on Wednesdays, and some tourists with a Southern accent who were likely tired and were drinking coffee just to have a place to sit. The father at that table was looking sternly at the loud boys and was about to get himself in trouble.

Estrella pulled a penny out of her clothes and threw it at one of the young men. She was happy to see it hit him.

"Did that piece of shit just throw something at you?" one of the kids asked with an eager smile when his friend flinched from the penny smacking into the back of his head. The young thug looked around in disbelief, then spotted Estrella glaring at him from the bench.

"What am I gonna do with that? I don't want to touch it," the kid she'd hit with the penny said. Two of them stayed where they were, and the rest swaggered toward Estrella's bench. She gave them her worst stare, but they were emboldened by each other's company.

Estrella felt strangely at peace. She'd been beat before. She could take it again. Or not. It really didn't matter. She bared her teeth at them and waited for them to decide what to do with her when they were done talking and posturing. One of the boys was large. He was the one who had the loudest voice and it was him that she'd plinked with the penny. He was saying things at her and his friends were laughing, but she wasn't listening anymore. Her vision went dark and everything was fuzzy and quiet.

Buck wanted to go right into the tower and smack Steve around. What was he thinking to leave the kid out like this? She was about to get beat or worse. First, he had to hurry down to the street and prop her weak ass up before she fell off the bench and hit the pavement. Then he had to stand there in front of everybody and Stark's brain child to keep the little shits off of her while she was out.
It was difficult to stand still while the thug brats bowed up in his face. He wanted to give them what they were asking for, but they were scared and it wasn't good sport. They were brave enough to take on a skinny homeless kid when the three of them were together. They weren't so brave when he stood in their face and silently stared them down.

He knew it stung their amped up sense of manhood that they weren't able to provoke him into a fight with their antics. So things escalated, just like he expected them to. The big kid reached out a hand to shove him, so Buck twisted his arm back with a sickening sound of tearing tendons. The kid got really loud, squealed like a pig. The four friends got serious then. Instead of helping their hurt friend, they tried to jump Buck.

He didn't want to kill anyone. Especially not stupid kids. He face-swatted one hard enough to stagger him back, and stung another one between the eyes with a tap of his left fist. The two remaining didn't feel brave enough to continue while the other three were incapacitated.

"Git," he said to them.

The two unhurt ones yelled empty threats while they swagger-scurried away and the other three didn't say anything, except for the whining of the one with the ruined arm. They moved off after their friends as they could. Buck watched them go and stood long enough to pay attention to where they turned off the street.

People were staring, and that was nothing new. When all threat to the girl was gone, he sat on the bench and looked at her. She didn't have much left in her. He'd seen stronger people in Nazi camps. Her lips were a little blue and nothing had even happened to her, other than the loud kids getting in her face. Buck straightened her out some so her bent leg wouldn't go numb. Her body condition was gravely serious, and he knew Steve didn't realize the extent to which she'd starved herself or he'd have done something by now.

"Hey, what are you doing with her?" a guy said. He'd come from inside the coffee shop and he had a black apron on.

"Laying her out so she can breathe better. If she doesn't wake up in a minute I'm taking her to the hospital. You got any soda in there? Coke? She needs calories," Buck said.

The guy left and came back with a glass of cola. Buck noticed that the people at the café tables had left. There were a few folks passing by on the sidewalk, but they turned their eyes away and kept walking.

"Come on, kid. Wake up," Buck reached around and supported her neck and head while he lifted her more upright. She was literally almost nothing but bones. Steve would get bent up if she died. He knew he would. Buck knew the feeling, because he'd had a soft spot for a runt once, too.

He took the cola and tipped it against her mouth. The cold fizzy beverage helped to bring her around, and he poured in a little sip before she could fight him much. Her big chocolate eyes blinked blankly at him until she recognized him. Then she scowled.

"If you don't drink some more of this, I'm taking you to the emergency room right now. Drink up," he told her. He pressed the plastic cup against her lip and tilted it up. Her eyes glared mutiny at him, but she took a few sips. He kept at it until she'd taken half the cup.

Buck avoided looking at the guy standing by his side because Stark's camera would catch his face if he did. It was bad enough that Steve would know him in an instant if the video of this was put in front of him. It was probably time to quit playing around avoiding Steve anyway, but he had wanted to show his face in his own time.

"Do I need to call somebody?" the man from inside the coffee shop asked. He sounded like he didn't know if he wanted to threaten or be helpful.

Buck looked to the girl.

"You gonna drink that?" he asked her, using the guy's words to pressure her into action.

She looked away from him stiffly, but she drank the soda.

"Somebody should have been called a long time ago," Buck said, "Kid, I'm getting tired of having to watch you. I've got my own cats to chase. I told you once to let Steve help you. I'm not telling you again. You go with him, or I'll bring you to a place that's gonna want names and paperwork and money. You hear me?"

Estrella tilted her jaw up and turned her face further away.

Buck grabbed her face and forced her to look at him. She needed firm handling to know he meant what he said, and bruised was better than dead.

"I'm not afraid to hurt your feelings. I don't care if you hate me. Steve wants you alive, so you're gonna live," Buck told her with absolute certainty.

He let her go. She refused to agree with him, but she'd heard him.

"The next time you see him, you're going home with him," Buck said.

He got up and left her with the man from the coffee shop. He had a flight to catch in three days. This starving to death bullshit had to end. She was going to be either dead or getting help before he had to leave.

He resented her for forcing his hand with Steve, but he could tell from watching that his friend liked the kid. Lately, Steve was wound up tighter than he'd ever seen him, but he was easier when he was with her. The weird kid was good for Steve, so Buck did what he had to do to keep her around.

"Widow? Do you have it yet?" Steve demanded over the coms.

He and Thor and the Hulk were fighting off what was left of two hundred Hydra operatives in the back end of Manitoba. Clint was up high, picking off any of them who got close to the power conduit they were defending. The Captain didn't like the sounds he was hearing from over where Hulk was. They needed Bruce in the green on this one, but Steve didn't like the casualties.

"Two more minutes. There's a lot of data," Natasha's cool voice answered.

"This is why you should let me do the data things," Tony advised.

Iron Man melted through the engines of two of the heavy tracked vehicles which were making them stay behind cover. The vehicles could no longer maneuver, but the gun turrets turned to align on Thor's position. An arcing throw of Mjolnir bent the barrel of one, and Tony fired again to melt the end of the other turret into runny slag.
"And that is why I don't have you doing the data things," Steve responded. He threw his shield into the chest of an enemy combatant who was trying to run him down with a motorcycle and drew his sidearm to take down three who were trying to snipe Clint. Tony covered him while he ran over to pull his shield from the crumple of the fallen Hydra soldier. The man lay limp where he'd been thrown off the bike and the bike had skidded across loose earth into the underbrush.

The Hulk was having a great time terrifying the rest of Hydra's men toward them. Steve wondered why more of them didn't run away. It always ended the same. Agents and Canadian support had the base surrounded from the start of the mission. The combatants either came to the Avengers for a rough nap, or they ran the other way for incarceration without the nap. Right now, they had to preserve what data they could to lead them to the next Hydra location before the system wiped the drives beyond recovery. Tony had a pretty good override for preventing that, but they had to keep the power on for it to work.

Hydra bodies were stacking up in front of Steve and Thor. Clint had a nice count near the power conduit, and Hulk and Tony left their toys scattered all over. The Hydra goons kept coming. Mjolnir smeared two more and Steve knocked three out in quick succession. There was the rumble of something big moving over the hill behind the trees. Steve looked to Thor. He used his hammer to carry him up for a better view. They could have used Sam's help, but it was his mother's birthday and they'd told him to go see his family.

"Cap, Jarvis is telling me that someone named Wanda called, and that you would want to know about it. While we're working?" Iron Man said.

"There is a very large tracked vehicle approaching your position. Shall I neutralize it?" Thor said at the same time.

"Yes, Thor," the Captain said while he beat down the determined looking group of men who were trying to get past him to the base's entry door. Tony's words about Wanda registered in his mind, but he couldn't allow himself to think on it right now.

"Cap, something's happening. I need extraction," Natasha said as he dropped the last of the goons near him, then used his shield to knock out two more who were trying to sneak up unseen in the undergrowth.

"Hawkeye-" Cap said.

"I've got it. Go," Clint said from his perch in a tall tree.

The sounds of Tony blasting away at Hydra men, and Thor and maybe now the Hulk hammering and ripping at the approaching large vehicle muted some as the Captain ran into the concrete entry of the base. The external door was wedged open with a boulder Hulk had placed. The door kept trying to close and made grinding sounds against the stone. It was a very simple, heavy magnetic door and it would have taken too long to disable it, so they'd had to chock it open with primitive means.

"Status?" Cap asked as he ran deeper into the facility. He recalled the base schematic from the pre-mission briefing and took the turns and jumped down the stairwells necessary to get to his teammate.

"Data recovery is finished, but my exit is blocked and there might be a detonation imminent," Widow said.

The Captain didn't ask stupid questions about if there was any way she could disarm the explosive device, or if there was a way she could get around the blockage. If she could have, she would have already done so. He recalled the wall thickness lines on the schematic and changed course.

"Get away from the South wall," he said, and he dug in harder against the floor while he ran.

With the shield in front of him, he hit the first layer of concrete with as much momentum and strength as he could. It cracked, and his body smacked into the shield and the wall. With his free hand, he worked at a chipped edge of the cracked concrete until he could pull away a chunk of the wall. It fell with a thud to the floor and he hit the concrete with another run and smash. There was a second layer of masonry between him and Natasha, and he'd expected that. The other five sides of the room she was in were plated with thick steel. This was the only way in because the door had locked shut with her inside.

"Cap?" Widow asked with just a hint of anxiety. Nothing she had on her had worked against steel plating and she didn't know how long they had until detonation. Hydra hadn't been kind enough to provide a countdown. The only warning she'd had was a glitch during data transfer and an ominous low hum that was building into a vibration under her feet.

"Almost-" the Captain gritted out as he made another run at the wall beyond the first one he'd broken. It was more solid, likely reinforced with rebar. The wall cracked, but didn't crumble. Something large shook the ground outside.

"We're fine," Iron Man told him pre-emptively.

"Nat, when I clear the concrete, I need you to weaken the rebar with a shaped charge at the same time I hit it with the shield," he said with a grunt as he struck the wall again. Smaller pieces of concrete started to fall out of the reinforced wall.

"Ready when you are," she replied. The increasing vibrations were shaking everything now. Dust fell from the broken wall between them and loose items were dancing around in the room behind her.

He slammed at the concrete three more times and ripped an area clear with his hands until they could see each other. The spacing of the thick reinforcing bars which held the chunky remains of the wall was too small for a person to pass through.

Natasha had a charge ready and she pressed it onto a reinforcing bar. She stepped back behind cover and held the detonation device. Steve found as much cover as he could get, but he had to be free to throw his shield.

"Three, two, one…” Nat counted, and she detonated the charge. Steve threw his shield hard at the exact place and time where the bar would be most weakened by the explosive.

Concrete chips embedded into his skin through the arm of his uniform and into his side.

"Again, there," he pointed to another bar near the first break they'd made.

They repeated the procedure, then Steve grabbed the exposed steel and braced his feet against the wall. The vibration in the floor and walls was reaching a worrisome intensity. There wasn't time for more charges.

"Avengers, get clear of the base!" he shouted into the coms. The metal matrix of bars began to bend for him. Before he would have thought possible, Natasha squeezed herself through the enlarged opening they'd made and they were running back up to the surface. It didn't feel like they were going to make it.
Widow seemed to agree. They ducked into a side hallway and crouched low under his shield. Their heads hurt from the intensity of the vibration and the floor and walls cracked as if an earthquake was shifting the ground around the base.

No detonation occurred. The backup power finally failed and everything went dark. There was a strange cracking sound under their feet, then silence. They could hear the exterior door grinding, still trying to close. A slight hissing sound reached the Captain's ears, too quiet for his teammate to detect.

"Gas," he said. He slapped his shield onto his back and clamped a hand around Widow's nose and mouth.

"Close your eyes," he told her. He didn't know what kind of gas it was, but it was probably something unpleasant. He hauled the blinded, smothered Widow against his side and navigated with one hand against the wall as fast as he could toward the exit. Two more turns and a stairwell, and he could see light from outside. His eyes were burning and watering. His skin itched. His lungs felt numb and he tried not to breathe.

"Hulk, clear the door so it can close!" Cap yelled soon as they were out. His voice wasn't working right. It sounded weak as if he'd tried to yell with no air in his lungs. He kept running away from the base, up to higher ground. He didn't stop until there was a ridge of earth between them and the base.

Startled agents and handcuffed, corralled Hydra operatives stared at them as he dropped Natasha and fell to the ground himself. He was wheezing, and he tore up handfuls of dirt to scrub at Natasha's exposed skin. Her eyes were watering but open now, and she was gasping for air. She pushed him away and started scrubbing her own skin with gritty dirt. Her suit had protected most of her from gas exposure, but her neck, head and face were burning like salty wounds.

She scrubbed at herself desperately, but it didn't seem to ease the pain. There was a roar from the Hulk, and Iron Man thudded to a hard landing beside where the Captain and the Widow were squirming on the ground.

Tony retracted his suit and stepped out of it. He swiped his pinky finger against Natasha's scalp, then touched it to his tongue.

"Acid," he said.

"Sir-" Jarvis began.

"I know," Tony said. He kicked the Iron Man suit to make it fall onto its back like an open shell. He picked up Natasha and shoved her into the suit. He pressed her into it until she understood to stop fighting against him and the pain. It closed around her.

"Now, Jarvis," he said. He heard the sound of the fire suppressant system filling the suit. After almost a minute of coating Natasha in the gaseous foam, the suit cracked open and he knelt to wipe her face clear. She was covered in whitish froth, but the suppressant should have neutralized the acid. Natasha was calm and she could breathe.

Tony pivoted to look down at Steve, who had lapsed into unconsciousness. Blood was spattered around his nose, mouth and eyes in a gruesome mask. He was breathing, but it sounded ineffective and gurgling.

Thor landed next to them as Tony started to scoop the foam out of his suit and off of Natasha to smear it on Steve's skin. The side of Cap's uniform under his shield arm was tattered and bloody. Tony could feel hard bits of shrapnel embedded in Steve's skin.

"There's nothing we can do for his lungs here. We have to get him back," Tony said. He'd done what he could to soothe the Captain's skin, but skin irritation was the least concern.

"Avengers, load up. Tillis, you've got cleanup. We're getting Cap to medical," Tony said.

Thor bent and hefted Steve in his arms. Tony jogged after him to the waiting jet. A messy Natasha followed, rubbing her fingers into her hair. Jarvis flew the Iron Man suit inside. Clint ran in and took flight control. Bruce would have to rely on the agents for transport. They knew to leave him alone until he was ready.

Thor laid Steve out on the empty deck between the rear benches. Natasha pulled out an oxygen cylinder from under a seat and fit the rubber face piece to Steve's mouth. Tony wedged a knee under his neck to tilt his head and improve his airway. Clint had them up and heading South back to New York.

Nat wiped at the remaining foam on her suit and smeared it into Steve's scalp. She removed all the foam she could and rubbed it onto every bit of his exposed skin she could reach. The foam was turning pink as it mixed with Steve's blood and she rubbed it around. Her fingers went to his side and started pulling chunks of concrete out of him.

"Fast thinking, Stark," Natasha said.

Her voice was scratchy and she swallowed a mouthful of saliva against the burning in her throat. If Steve had covered her face only a moment later, she'd likely be permanently disabled or dead. Her scalp still itched where the fire suppressant foam had been slower to work into her hair.

"We all do what we can," Tony said, uncharacteristically subdued.

"Have you nothing to help his lungs?" Thor asked. He was sitting on a rear bench near them, watching them do what they could for Steve.

Tony shook his head. Just like the radioactive containment they'd needed last time, they couldn't have anticipated the need for an acid-neutralizing lung flushing device. He knew Jarvis would already have something for him to consider by the time they got back. He had ideas, but no other materials that would help right now.

Steve took a deeper breath, then curled onto his knees. He ripped the oxygen device from his face to cough a spatter of blood and foam onto the deck. He tried to draw in a breath, but it was awful and bubbly sounding. Tony used a hand to encourage him to lie down again, but Steve was half conscious, and too strong for Tony to push over.

"He's got plenty blood. The bleeding might help with the acid," Natasha said. They got out of Steve's way and let him cough and choke as he would. Thor frowned and reached out to pull Steve's side against his knee. If there was no help for him, then he would at least support him while he struggled. Steve threw aside the oxygen bottle that occupied his hand. It clanged along the floor and hit the rear hatch.

"Careful there, big guy," Tony said.

The metal cylinder had barely missed his shins. Natasha went to join Clint in the cockpit. Tony sat across from Thor and grimaced while Steve coughed and coughed. A bloody mess slicked the deck under his face, so maybe Natasha was correct about the bleeding.
"Tough bastard," Tony said under his breath.

He had his disagreements with Steve, but they respected each other. He'd help any way he could, and he knew Steve would do the same for him. He fought down another bout of lingering childhood admiration poisoned by resentment. Steve was just a man under all the serum enhancements, and Tony tried to be reasonable about their differences of opinion. Seeing Steve down and pretty much helpless got to him some, but he knew he'd be just as angry the next time Steve went toe-to-toe with him over some lily-white moral argument.

Clint got them home in good time. Thor offered to help Steve to the medical ward, but Steve was aware now and didn't want to be carried or laid on a bed in front of the staff if he could help it. It wasn't about pride for Steve. It was about morale. Much of their staff was new and he wanted them confident that they could win this protracted conflict against Hydra. They didn't need to see their leader laid out.

He was blinded by the damage to his eyes, but his lungs were improving and his ears were fine. Steve walked with a hand on Natasha's shoulder. He wanted to make sure she got checked out in medical, too.

"Jarvis, you said Wanda called. Tell me about her," Steve rasped as he strode along the hallway. He could hear people in the halls with them, but they got out of the way.

"Your friend is already in medical. Her condition was critical, but she has since stabilized. Captain, please don't concern yourself at this moment. She is sleeping peacefully and is receiving the best of care. In your current condition, a visit from you would certainly upset her more than it would help," Jarvis told him.

Steve grit his teeth and tried to breathe shallowly. His eyes were healing enough that he could see light when he opened them, but everything looked whited out and watery. The sounds and smells of the halls led him along as surely as Natasha's shoulder under his hand. Dried goop pulled and stretched at his skin, and he could feel sharp chips of concrete moving under his flesh as he walked. They'd have to dig out what had already healed over. He couldn't see Estrella right now anyway, so he let Nat guide him to a treatment room.

"Here, Captain," the doctor said as she moved Steve to sit on a starched, stiffly padded bed.

"Check Natasha first," Steve insisted. He heard several people moving in the room, but couldn't tell if they were all facing him or not.

"They've got me, Cap. More than one doctor, remember?" Natasha said.

Tony had hired more staff just last week. She watched as the staff started working on them both, her on one bed and Steve on the other. It's not that they couldn't afford private rooms, but sometimes it was nice to see that your teammate was getting fixed up when things weren't too bad.

The nursing staff peeled Steve's ruined uniform coat off of him and encouraged him to lie back. The doctor listened to his lungs and looked at his eyes. Natasha opened her mouth wide so the doctor assigned to her could look into her throat with a camera scope. They took swabs of her skin from several places and she moved around to assist them. She felt sticky from the fire retardant and gritty from the dirt she and Steve had tried to use to scrape the gas residue from their skin. Her hair felt like it had egg white in it.

The doctor had her inhale a mist that Tony had concocted and captured in a Mylar bag. It smelled strange, but the burning in her throat and nose eased off. The doctor was applying something to Steve's eyes, which she could see were glazed with a white film.

If it was Clint lying there looking like that, she'd be horrified. As it was, she felt a strong pull of sympathy for Steve and the pain he must be going through. He refused the gas Tony had prepared for him. His lungs were probably already more healed than hers were, despite the fact that the delicate tissues in his chest had been at least partially corroded away.

Steve allowed a nurse to push up his elbow so that his hand rested behind his head. She carefully wiped his skin clean and the doctor rolled an x-ray machine over so they could see how much concrete was still embedded in his side. He'd taken the damage to get her out. Everything he was going through right now was from his efforts to extract her.

Natasha moved a nurse out of her way and went over to Steve's other side which wasn't being worked on. He turned his head and looked toward her with his damaged eyes. She wondered if he could see her, or hear her, or maybe it was her smell that told him exactly where she was. They should both smell like flame retardant and dirt, she imagined.

"Don't start. You'd have done the same," he said.

"I know. But you can't stop me from saying 'thank you'" she told him.

A little smile twisted his lips. It was ghastly, considering that his face was mostly black and red from blood and dirt. A person who looked like the victim of a close range bombing shouldn't be sitting up talking and smiling.

"So? I'm waiting to hear it," Steve told her.

"Thank you," Natasha said.

"Alright, now that's enough," he said, then coughed a little.

A moment passed while the doctor looked at the x-ray image display. Steve had a lot of knife work ahead of him.

Natasha bent forward and pressed a kiss to his filthy forehead.

"What's that for?" he asked.

"For being a doll," she teased him.

There was one clean-ish spot on the side of his face and she could see him blush through the film of dirt. It was about time that Steve Rogers started learning what it felt like to have that kind of language used on him.

"I hate to ask, Nat, but could you, maybe, go lay eyes on my friend? I know Jarvis says she's fine, but-" Steve asked as the doctor started the first slice into his side to retrieve the concrete chips. He didn't flinch, but she saw the muscles around his lips tighten ever so slightly. They all got used to him taking a beating with no complaints, and it was uncomfortable to see a reminder that he felt every bit of the pain.

"I'm on my way to take a shower. I'll look in on her," Nat promised. She glanced at his impressively distressed physique while his eyes were too cloudy to catch her at it. He didn't catch her at it this time, but the doctor frowned slightly at her. Natasha wasn't ashamed to look. He was worth looking at.
"Thanks," Steve said.

"Don't forget to eat," she replied.

Steve grunted at her, and she heard the sound of concrete dropping into a metal bowl.

Nat left the treatment room and went to the only recovery room that had a light on and a tag on the door.

Jane Doe, it said.

Quiet as she could be, Nat shushed the nurse who came to intercept her, then eased herself into the room.

Steve's scruffy street girl was asleep and tucked into a hospital bed. They'd taken her bulky rags from her and dressed her in a bland gown. There wasn't much to the girl at all. Steve would be upset when he saw how bad off she was.

There was an IV bag on a pole and a fluid line tapped into the back of her hand. The labels on the bag told Nat that they were giving her fluids, nutrients, and a mild sedative. She didn't read the file. Jarvis could tell him those things. Her heart profile which blipped on the monitor sounded a little weak and ragged, but regular enough. Natasha wanted to take Clint's trimmers to the mats of her hair, but her own hair needed some attention right now. She'd at least try to give the girl some choice in the matter later when she was awake. She owed her that much for being rough on her before.

She left to get a shower. Now that she was free to go, she wanted nothing more than to get the mess off of her. And to eat something.

"She's doing alright, Steve. She's sedated, so I don't think she'll wake up before you get to her," Nat said over their still functional coms.

"Thanks," he told her again.
Chapter 9

Author's note: Chapters 9 and 10 were originally written as one big chapter that I then split into two, so I'm posting two chapters at once. There's not a lot of crazy action scenes because Estrella is sick and Steve is recovering. Not too much excitement can happen when you're bed ridden. More action coming soon, though!

Steve stood beside the nurse's station and ate from the tray he balanced on the edge of the high countertop. The doctor and Natasha both insisted that he eat. Not just any food was good enough for the doctor's wishes.

Liver. He had to eat a slab of liver for the iron content. He was allowed to pick which cheese, but he had to have cheese. He had a crusty, flaky half-loaf of wheat bread on the plate too. Broccoli and avocado were in dishes off to the side. He was lucky that he could tolerate all this stuff, even the liver, but he would have eaten it anyway. His body was yawing at him for sustenance.

His shower had been itchy, with all the stitches in his side and in his arm. Steve thought stitches were fairly useless, but they were needed when the doctors had to cut him open again after he'd already healed. Without the stitches, he made a mess everywhere, so he put up with the stitches for a few hours until his skin healed and he could remove them.

While he fed his healing body, he looked through the open doorway at Estrella in her bed. He felt bad standing there stuffing his face while she looked like a collection of sticks under the covers, but it couldn't be helped. He could get called out again at any time, and he needed to be in top condition.

His vision was still a little off, but it was much improved. It had improved enough that he could watch her heart monitor as the little line blipped across the display. He didn't like what he saw. He'd sat bedside with hospitalized people enough that he knew something was wrong without having to hear it from the doctor.

Soon as he was done eating, he could sit with her. He had mission reports to write, but he could do that on his pad while he sat in her room. The doctor wanted him lying in a bed and hooked up to a blood oxygen monitor so they could be sure that his lungs were healing. Steve knew his body well enough to tell the doctor he was doing fine without lying in a bed immobilized. They'd have to observe him here at her room if they wanted to keep a watch on his recovery.

Steve chewed the last of his broccoli and washed his food down with a large glass of red wine. Wine wasn't his favorite, but he was used to throwing anything down the hatch to keep his body going. The doc seemed to think that the wine would help with digestion of all the stuff they wanted him to eat. Steve thought the doctor was on a power trip. There was nothing wrong with his digestive system. He couldn't buck every order the doctor gave him, though, because it would be a bad example to others. If he expected his teammates to take some down-time when they needed it, then he had to at least attempt to do so too.

He moved to take his tray and empty dishes to the elevator, but a nurse rushed over and took the things from him. They acted like he shouldn't be lifting anything heavier than a fork. He felt almost normal, except that it was still uncomfortable to take a deep breath and his stitches snagged on the fabric of his shirt when he moved.
He was back in his favorite jeans again, and a comfortable workout t-shirt. It all fit him pretty snug, but there was no one except the staff and his teammates around to stare at him. And Estrella. She wasn't doing any staring right now, not that she ever did. Steve went across the hallway from the nurse's station and into her room. It was his turn to stare at her.

Whatever had caused her to do this to herself was as substantial as the presence of another person in the room. There had to be a reason for this, and he wanted to know what it was so he could counter it.

She wasn't stupid. She wasn't insane. She didn't hate herself. She was scared. Scared of men in general, probably from a traumatic incident in her past, but there was more to her behavior than that.

Rational people didn't go to the extremes Estrella did without an ongoing motivation. What she had done to herself required a level of willpower and dedication that most folks didn't bother with. Troubles from her past couldn't sustain the discomfort of the choices she was making. He concluded that Estrella was under pressure from a current threat, not simply a remembered event from her past.

He wanted to wake her and make her tell him why she was lying there looking like a mummy. He wanted to get at her fears and demolish them so that she'd be free to take better care of herself. She was capable of it. The doctor could tell that she'd been very conscious of what she ate and why, because she didn't have scurvy or a host of other starvation diseases. She'd been smart enough to get some nutrients. It was calories she'd been avoiding.

The doctor said that she would never be fully recovered from years of starving herself. Her heart was permanently weakened. Even if she lived a happy, well-fed life from this day on, she'd never again be physically robust enough to participate in sports or any other strenuous activity. Steve was very familiar with how that felt.

Anger rose in him at whatever had caused her to do this. Instead of pacing around or hitting something, he indulged in the satisfying grind of his teeth and sat down beside her bed. He perched his rump in the vinyl padded chair and leaned his elbows forward onto his knees. His clasped fists rested against his lips and he studied her over his knuckles.

Nat was right. She was structurally pretty, the way some of those old dusty Egyptian mummies were pretty. He'd heard someone talk about elegant bones one time. He'd thought the idea was weird and macabre, but Estrella had that. The artist in him wanted to draw her like this, but the man in him, the friend, cringed away from recording her when she was at her lowest.

Estrella's eyes weren't as sunken as they had been, since several bags of fluid had gone into her. She looked comfortable and peaceful. She was safe for now. It was enough to let him relax and let himself get some rest.

Bruce found him asleep in the chair, arms crossed and leaned back with his head against the wall. He looked at the girl for a moment, but he was really here to see Steve. At the end of the mission, the Hulk had kicked the boulder inside the door of the base so the door could close, and he'd gotten a strong dose of the gas escaping from the base. It was bad stuff. He'd been concerned about his friends.

The nervous new agents had flown him back when he'd calmed down, and Bruce had taken the time to get cleaned up and dressed, but then he'd come straight to medical. He was perhaps a little too glad that Steve had been able to get Natasha out alive. The other guy was developing a fondness for the scary-sexy-cool Widow and it bled over into Bruce's sentiments as well. If Steve hadn't been able to get her out…

Bruce shook his head. That hadn't happened. He'd seen Nat ten minutes ago. She was fine, and likely asleep now. It was nearly midnight. He tried not to feel pleased that she'd waited up until he got back. It didn't mean anything. They cared about what happened to their teammates. That was all.

And now Bruce was concerned for Steve. The agents had relayed to him on the way home how the Captain's eyes and lungs were destroyed by the gas, and he believed it. The stuff was bad enough to turn the Hulk away. He should have known that Steve would already be up and around, more concerned about other people than about himself.

Bruce nudged one of Steve's feet. The man didn't move. He stayed sprawled from the chair like one of those risqué blue jean commercials. His shirt was pulled up in the front from his shoulders having slid down the chair. His belly was showing. Bruce chuckled. He was tempted to take out his phone and snap a pic. Clint and Tony would love it.

Bruce felt guilty about the nature of some of the pranks they played on Steve. He tried not to participate, but sometimes it was too fun to abstain from. Steve was a good guy. Old fashioned. It wasn't his fault that the world had moved on to less restrained proclivities, and it wasn't his fault that Steve was now blessed with a body that was sure to draw attention. Clint and Tony especially enjoyed using his body against him to take a metaphorical stab at what they saw as Steve's overblown sense of morals and modesty. They'd love to post a pic of Steve like this online, then sit out in the common room and laugh at the viewer comments when Steve walked through.

Their leader took the joking in tolerant humor, but he wasn't changing who he was just because the other guys jabbed at him about it. Bruce could see that Tony's pranks might be doing more to reinforce Steve's sometimes stodgy behavior than to cajole him out of it.

Bruce kicked Steve's foot harder. The man finally woke. He didn't jerk upright or look around in confusion. Bruce would bet good money that Steve was never completely unaware of his surroundings, even in a dead sleep. Something about his enhanced senses kept him situationally aware. It looked exhausting to Bruce, but then Bruce had his own involuntary self-defense system.
His was a little larger, a little greener.

"Steve, come on. You should get some real sleep in a real bed," Bruce said.

Steve pushed himself more upright in the chair and tugged his shirt into place.

"You made good time home. You should be sleeping, yourself," Steve responded.

"The other guy didn't like that stuff you were breathing. I had to check on you first," Bruce said.

"Thanks. I'm fine," Steve said.

"Yeah. She's not," Bruce said. He turned to look at the display on the heart monitor.

"That's why I'm here. Trying to get my head around it," Steve said.

"You can't change the past. You know that. No amount of surgery or good food is going to fix her heart at this point," Bruce said. It was harsh, but he knew Steve was a realist.
Steve looked at him, his eyes clear and focused. His eyes were fully healed, then. And there was nothing wrong with his brain, either.

"You're saying I should give her my blood," Steve stated it out loud. Of all of them here, he and Bruce knew what any version, any amount of the serum could do to a person. He was let down that Bruce would want to inflict those possibilities on a young woman in a precarious situation.

"I'm not saying that. We don't have to do anything at all. She can live like this. She'll be limited, but she can live like this for a while. Several years, maybe. Or, we can use a small amount of your plasma. Not whole blood. It's-"

"Shut up. Too loud," Estrella complained from the bed. Her voice was cranky and sleepy, but clear.

Steve suppressed a grunt of surprise. The tones of her voice rounded over and over inside his head. It did something to him that he didn't understand. At the coffee shop when he'd given her a sample of Mrs. Stiles' streusel cake, she'd made a sound because the cake was so good. He'd had an unexplained and inappropriate reaction then. It was worse now.

He sat back in the chair and tried to get control of himself. The sweet sound of her voice and whatever it was doing inside his head was making him want to move closer to her. He sat still and waited for it to pass.

"What's going on?" Bruce asked, confused.

Steve looked to Bruce, cautious of the possibilities. There was a very real threat if Estrella's voice had the same effect on Bruce as it did on him. Clearly it did. Bruce shifted his posture some in discomfort, but his attention was on Steve.

Steve was staring at him the way he assessed threats in combat. Bruce was thankful that Steve stayed in his chair. With the girl's voice getting to him, and the way Steve was watching him suspiciously like he was a split second away from action, if Steve stood up and got in his space right now, he'd have to leave.

Bruce was long accustomed to resisting impulses related to his more primal wants. The girl's voice was more intrusive than a sexy ad on television that you could choose to turn your attention away from. Whatever was happening wasn't ignorable. Her voice reached out and grabbed a man's interest in a way that was difficult to resist acting on. He felt compelled. Bruce shook it off before the pervasive resonance of her voice took root in his mind. He had to stay focused. Steve knew something about the girl and her voice. This had happened before.

"What do you know about this?" Bruce asked.

The rational part of his brain was fascinated by what appeared to be going on. He needed to think about that. Sound waves, brain function, hypothalamus response… Bruce slammed a flow of clinical thought down on top of the more primal things which wanted to be heard.

Steve watched him get a handle on himself, and he relaxed some. Doctor Banner was in. Not the other guy. As minutes passed since Estrella had spoken, the sound of her voice faded from his mind. It was easier to think again, but he still felt on edge, wanting to act.

"I heard her voice once before, briefly. It wasn't even a word, only a sound. It had the same effect. I thought it was just me at the time. But if it's you too…" Steve said.

"If she effects everyone this way, then-" Bruce concluded.
"Then she wouldn't speak at all. She doesn't. When I first met her, she was mute. Lately, she's whispered. She told me once that there was something wrong with her voice," Steve said.

"Mami, get the cat," Estrella fussed. She raised a hand and let it fall, swatting at the sound of Steve's voice as if it was a bothersome pet on the bed. She made a crimped face of annoyance, but soon settled back into deeper sleep.

Steve sat back and braced his feet against the floor. He breathed through his teeth and shook his head, trying to shake free of the tonal seduction pickling his brain. Bruce took a step back toward the doorway of the room and braced his hand on it.

"There's nothing wrong with her voice. She's been gifted with a powerful weapon," Bruce said.

"Yeah, well, it's only been used against her so far. It's not doing anything good for her," Steve said.

He got up and stalked menacingly toward Bruce, his hands ready to grapple the man down and away from Estrella. Bruce held up a hand and backed out of the room into the hallway.

"Steve, hold it right there. We can think through this. If I can do it, then I know you can too. Jarvis, did you get any audio on her? Broad frequency?" Bruce asked the AI.

"Yes, Doctor. Am I correct in understanding that our friend's voice is having a peculiar effect on the libido of yourself and the Captain?"

"Correct," Steve bit out.

He'd stopped advancing on Bruce, and was disappointed that he'd let himself do something so tactically stupid. He'd felt like he had to make Bruce leave, and he was doing it before he thought about it. He stood in the doorway to Estrella's recovery room and tried to act casual while Bruce shut his eyes and took a few deep, calming breaths.

"I think we can help her control her voice. But first I've got to get some sleep and so do you. I'll get Tony on it and we'll try to have something tomorrow," Bruce said.

"Go 'way. Trying to sleep," Estrella mumbled from the room behind Steve.

Steve stepped out into the hall and pulled the door closed. The sedatives in her IV drip were messing with her. He knew Estrella wouldn't knowingly use her voice on him and Bruce. She'd always been so careful to avoid vocalizing anything at all. She'd been very upset the one time she'd had an accident with the cake. Her circumstance was beginning to make sense to him. He tried to ignore the situation in his jeans and think clearly.

Steve turned to the nurses at their desk. They were frozen still like frightened rabbits, watching him and Bruce. Everyone in medical knew what Bruce was capable of, and Bruce was looking pretty intense and concerned. His aggression toward Bruce had likely made them nervous if they'd seen it.

"Keep that door closed. Monitor her from out here. Only Doctor Kalfey treats her. No visitors unless Jarvis tells you I've approved them. Understood?" Steve asked.

"Yes, Captain," the head nurse said. She started making entries of his instructions in Estrella's records. Steve stepped around the countertop of their workstation to confirm that there was a camera watching her bed. If she started to wake up, someone would see and let him know so that he could be there for her.
The effects of Estrella's voice were fading finally. He shook out the tension in his arms and shoulders. He moved away from the antsy nurses and walked with Bruce a little way down the hall toward the elevator.

"Bruce. I'm sorry. I didn't know this would happen. I thought it was a one-time thing on my part when it happened before," Steve said.

Now that he was feeling more himself, he was disappointed in himself because he'd been acting like a Neanderthal and Bruce was just trying to help. Bruce was a bigger man than him for being able to back down when Steve knew he was being an ass. He was frequently humbled by the strengths of the people he worked with.

"We're alright. Believe me, I understand," Bruce smiled a little, then he left.

Steve got a chair from the waiting room and sat on guard outside Estrella's door. He'd given orders, but sometimes accidents happened. She'd been hurt enough. He wasn't going to let any more abuse happen to her. Bruce had taken the other guy away with him and Thor was the only other possible threat. Steve couldn't see Thor hurting Estrella, no matter what her voice did. Once he had it all reasoned out, he fell asleep again.

"What did you do?" Estrella whispered furiously to Steve when she woke to see him standing by the bed she was in. She felt groggy, and she was in a hospital. That man! Steve's friend. He'd done this to her. He said he would.

"Where is he?" she hissed, looking around.

Steve had to know where his friend was if the man had called Steve to the hospital to see her. She didn't have much hope of finding him to make him sorry for what he'd done to her. That creepy man was only there when you didn't expect him to be.

"Where's who?" Steve wondered. She could tell he was humoring her. He thought she was out of her mind from the medicine that was making her feel sleepy.

"Your friend. The one with the arm. Where is he?" She wanted to know.

She was so angry that it was difficult to remember to whisper. It would feel good to yell if she could. Steve was looking at her finally as if he was taking her seriously.

"Bucky? You have seen Bucky. Why do you think he put you here?" Steve asked.

She ignored his question. It didn't matter. Bucky wasn't here.

As she sat up and moved around more, she first noticed that there was an IV tube going into her arm. Next, she was horrified to see that her clothes were gone and all she had on was one of those awful little gowns that tied in the back.

"My clothes! Where are my clothes?" she yelled.

Her hands moved to try covering herself above the hospital blankets which only came up to her ribs. The little hospital gown was so thin! She heard Steve groan and a thud off to the side, but she didn't look to see what was wrong with him until she had the blankets yanked up to her chin.
Then she remembered that she'd yelled.

"I'm sorry!" she whispered to Steve.

He was sitting on the floor with his head in his hands, covering his ears. His eyes were squeezed shut and his teeth were bared in a grimace of pain. She wasn't happy with him or anyone else, but she hadn't wanted to hurt Steve.

The bed rail wasn't up, so she leaned over, still clutching the blankets under her chin. With her free hand not encumbered with IV tubing and tape, she reached out to touch his shoulder. She hated how bare her arm looked. Where had they put her clothes?

At her touch, Steve turned his head up slowly and opened his eyes. His face was about even with hers because he was sitting on the floor and she was scrunched on the bed to hide under the covers. They tucked the darn covers in so tight under the mattress that she couldn't pull them up like she wanted to.

"I'm sorry. I didn't mean to hurt you. I told you my voice is messed up, remember?" she whispered.

He felt like he'd been dropped on his head and kicked in the groin at the same time. When she'd spoken softly in her sleep hours ago, her voice had a mesmerizing, titillating effect. When she yelled in anger or fear, it was like being stabbed from inside his skull, a dozen sharp bird beaks digging to get out. Fortunately, the pain of her yelling came on sudden and sharp and it left him almost as quickly.

Steve put a hand on her bed and pulled himself back up to standing. The nauseating ache in his groin lasted a little longer than the pain in his head. Estrella looked at him cautiously, as if she thought he would punish her. He smiled faintly to let her know that he wasn't holding a grudge and pulled the vinyl chair close to her bedside. By the time he sat down, she was angry again.

"My clothes. I want them," she whispered.

"Alright. I'll have to find them for you," he said.

"Could you do it now? Hospitals are so big, and there's so many people. They could get lost."

"You're not in a hospital. You're in Avengers tower, in our medical ward. You're currently the only patient, so I'm sure your clothes are probably in the laundry closet, right over there," Steve said.

He leaned back in the chair. He looked out the door of her room and pointed to somewhere she couldn't see from her bed.

"I'm in the tower? So your friend didn't bring me? I thought I was at Saint Luke's," Estrella whispered.

"I wasn't here when you came in. We were working in Canada. Estrella, Bucky had nothing to do with you being here. A few weeks ago, I asked Wanda at the library to keep an eye on you for me. Not to take notes or anything. I wanted her to call the tower if anything bad happened to you while I wasn't around to help. I haven't gone to see her yet or listened to the audio of her call, so I don't know what happened to put you here. Do you remember what happened?" he asked.

Estrella felt betrayed by Wanda. She had thought that Wanda understood and was on her side because Wanda didn't like men much. She was trying to be angry at Steve for being so controlling.
And she was frustrated that her body had failed her.

"I was almost to the library. The last thing I remember is leaning against the lamp post. You know, the one at the entrance to the mall?" she explained.

"Yeah," Steve said quietly.

Wanda must have seen her passed out on the ground, Estrella imagined. Or maybe somebody else had seen her and word had gotten to the nearby library. Or maybe his creepy friend had told Wanda. If only people would have left her alone for a while, she wouldn't be here in this expensive place. She'd either be with her mother, or she would have woken up on the sidewalk on her own.

Estrella wanted out of Tony Stark's building. She picked at the stretchy, rubbery bandage which covered where the IV needle went into her arm.

"There's no way I can pay for this. Get me out of here," she whispered.

She had little hope that Steve would do as she asked. He'd wanted her to come in for 'treatment.' He would want her to stay. She looked at him to see what he would do with her request.

Steve sat back in the chair and crossed his stupid, powerful arms over his stupid, powerful chest and gave her a neutral and diplomatic expression. Stupid, arrogant, powerful super-person that he was. She frowned hard at him and felt her lower lip push out.

"Don't look at me like that. I didn't want you to be here in the first place. With your choices, you put yourself here-" he began.

"No, I didn't," she shook her head, "I would have preferred to die out there, if you had bothered to ask me instead of interfering where you don't belong. It's you who talked to Wanda. It's Wanda who called here. And somebody picked me up and brought me here. I didn't have anything to do with putting myself here," Estrella insisted.

Again, she wished she could talk instead of whispering like a shy little child. She would be yelling at him if it wouldn't hurt him so much. Steve waited patiently for her to finish anything she wanted to say.

"Estrella, I don't want you to die," he said. His soulful expression and obvious concern almost softened her heart, but she didn't let herself get distracted from what he was really saying.

"It's not up to you, Steve. It's not what you want that matters here. Do you have any idea how arrogant that is? Why do you think you have the right to make that decision for me?" she challenged him.

"Why do you want to die?" he challenged her in the same tone.

Estrella sighed. He didn't understand. Normally she didn't have the energy to waste on explaining things to naïve people, but Steve was her friend. She felt pretty good right now, like she had the energy to help him understand.

"It's not that I want to die. I just don't want this life anymore. I don't get to choose what I was given. It was not my choices that made me live like I've been living. I can't trade in for a different life, and I don't want the one I've got. What do you do with something you don't want anymore?" she shrugged.

"You don't throw it away. You fight to make it better so that it's worth wanting again," Steve argued.

"What do I fight, Steve? My own voice? My own body? All of mankind? My problems aren't a bunch of lined-up little targets that I can knock down with a hammer or a shield. If it was that easy, I would have fixed it already. You're just a stupid man. Go away!" she growled at him on the last word. If she made him hurt her, maybe he would feel bad enough to get out of her life and leave her alone.

Steve gasped a breath and bent forward to put his face in his hands. It was completely different when he was feeling the effects of her voice and trying to problem-solve the situation with Bruce. It was difficult to think of a distraction when she was the only other person in the room.

She was being a brat simply to provoke him, he knew. She felt powerless and angry. He had a fair load of empathy for being in that position. It had been a while for him, but it was such a strong, bitter feeling that he'd never forget it. She had plenty reason to be upset with him and with life in general. He used empathetic reasoning as a focus to help him ignore the arousal and the compelling desire to move closer to her.

God, this was awful. She was just a kid. He tried not to be disgusted with himself since he hadn't asked for this to happen. It was nobody's fault, but it still felt wrong.

"If you're not going to get me out of here, then you go," Estrella said clear and low. She waved a hand at the door, shooing him away as she frequently did.

This time, the use of her voice made him angry along with the other effects. She knew what she was doing and she was asking for trouble because she didn't care about herself anymore. When the worst of it had passed, Steve stood up to obey her wishes. But he needed her to know a few things first. He couldn't let her think she could run him off with her words.

Steve stepped closer to her bed and leaned forward with his fists on the mattress. She'd used her voice on him on purpose. He had to show her that he refused to be manipulated despite his discomfort. If he let her get the upper hand now, he'd be in a position of weakness forever with her.

"Estrella, I don't use my physical gifts against you. You're my friend and I'd never want to hurt you. I'd love to hear your voice, but not if you're going to use it like a weapon against me," he told her.

She still clutched the blankets under her chin, and soon as he'd loomed over her, she'd gone from angry and provocative to fearful. She wasn't as brave and ready for anything as she'd thought she was. His heart softened again. Darn it! She was too far under his skin and he couldn't fuss at her for long.

Steve eased back a little and lifted a hand to touch her temple briefly.

"Eya, try not to be afraid. I don't want to control you. I want to keep you safe. Maybe we can find a way to make your life better so that you aren't tired of it anymore. Please be patient and give me a chance to try?" he asked. He let his fingers glide across the hollow of her temple, then he took his hand away.

She wanted to tell him to go away again, but it sounded like he was about to. Now that he was, she found that she really didn't want him to go. She didn't want to be alone here. But she couldn't let him see that she needed him. He already had all the power, so she should at least try to keep her dignity. She refused to ask him to stay.

She shrugged and looked down and to the side. What choice did she have? She couldn't go anywhere without her clothes. Steve left quietly and then she was alone in a strange place she didn't know how to get out of.

The only comfort she had was the lingering feeling of his fingers gentle on her skin and the hope that he'd meant it when he'd told her that he didn't want to control her.

It was six in the morning and he was dead on his feet. He finally wanted to be in his bed. Estrella was well enough to yell at him and pout at him, so he was pretty sure nothing critical would happen to her while he got a few hours of rest. The nurses and Jarvis knew his wishes.

He'd seen her looking around like she was lost. He'd felt her anger against men. She wanted to leave because she thought she couldn't afford treatment and she didn't want to be in debt.

Steve knocked on the door to Nat's suite. He leaned his head against the frame and shut his eyes for a little nap while he waited. He could hear her moving around, walking to the door. She didn't ask who was on the other side of her door. Jarvis had surely told her.

Natasha opened the door in black and white pajama pants that rode low on her hips and a strappy little red top that clung to her. After the last several hours, he didn't feel like pretending. His eyes appreciated her curves from where he still leaned and rested his head against the doorframe. Nat arched an eyebrow at him and stood there with her hand on the edge of the door.

"I'd invite you in, but you don't look like you would stay vertical for long," Nat said.

Steve huffed a chuckle. Nat was the queen of double meanings, maybe triple ones too. Her smirk was too naughty for this time of the morning, but then she let it pass and waited to hear what he was standing at her door for.

"I think she's scared and alone and too proud to ask for help. Too stubborn to tolerate owing anyone anything. She's angry at men, angry at me, and she doesn't want to live. And she has the voice of a siren, literally. Not the ambulance kind. The mythological kind. God, help me," Steve said genuinely. He lifted his head from the door frame just far enough to bang it down again.

"Poor baby," Natasha pouted.

"It's not funny, Nat. She's scared," Steve frowned at her with one eye. The other one was closed.

"Not 'poor baby' her. 'Poor baby', you," Nat said.

Of course she'd taunt him about the latest freakish thing that had happened in his life. She'd seen enough that almost nothing boggled her. Natasha turned her back and walked into her suite, leaving the door open for him. He sighed. The one eye he had open tracked her lush bottom as it moved away in the pajamas. She knew it and she looked back over her shoulder at him.

"Quit staring at my ass and follow it. I promise I won't rape you unless you ask me to," she said dryly.

He followed her into her living room. She moved toward her chair, and she pushed him at her couch when he got close enough. By now, she knew his center of gravity about as well as he did. Steve let himself sprawl face-down on the long couch with one leg and one arm hanging off onto the floor. He hoped he could avoid drooling onto the cushions at least until he was asleep. He wasn't getting up from here unless the building was on fire.

"Siren, Nat. Poor kid," he mumbled into the upholstery.

"No, poor you," Nat repeated, "She's been living with it for years. It's nothing new to her."

"C'mon. Have some mercy. She's scared," Steve said. His mind kept drifting toward sleep, but he had stuff he needed to say before he could let go. Stuff. Yeah…

"There's nothing wrong with being scared. Let her be scared for a while. It will make her easier to convince," Natasha advised.

"Witch," Steve cracked an eye at her.

"Alright, you win. Bitch," Steve said. He never said the word, so he figured he'd do it up right by spitting it out deep and harsh.

Nat laughed, delighted. He was delirious enough to laugh with her. Why was he so tired? It didn't matter. The couch was soft…

"Steve. Steve, stay awake for a little while longer," Nat said.

He cracked his eyes and wondered why she was suddenly kneeling next to him, patting his face.

"Wha?" he asked.

"You came here to tell me something. Hurry up and tell me so you can get to sleep," she instructed him.

"Oh. Yeah," he said. He thought about it for a moment.

"Talk to her. Get her to talk to you. Find out her age. She needs a woman's company. She's too angry at men for me to help her. Help her think of reasons to live. See if Bruce and Tony are done yet," Steve said. He forced his brain to work until he was sure he'd checked off all he'd wanted to say.

"Got it. Rest now," Natasha told him. She didn't need to. He was already out. She wondered why he was so exhausted. He'd gone long hours with less sleep and more injury before this. She'd have to ask about it while she was talking to Bruce.

Natasha left him to get dressed. Before she left her suite for the day, she covered him with a blanket.
"I'm not going in there," Bruce denied. He held his hands up and backed away from the little piece of jewelry he'd just placed in Natasha's hands.

"Then tell me more. He said she's a siren?" Natasha asked.

She looked at the necklace. It was a choker on black velvet an inch wide. In the middle was a platinum butterfly with sapphire and onyx wings. And diamonds. The smooth metal shape added onto the underside of the butterfly's abdomen was probably the working part of whatever it was that Bruce and Tony had made to help the girl with her voice. The butterfly slipped onto the velvet so that any piece of cloth could be used in place of the velvet. It would look as cute on a scrap of denim or a paisley handkerchief as it did on the plush French velvet, but only if you squinted and imagined that the butterfly was made of cheap tin and rhinestones.

What the hell had Tony been thinking? The girl would never accept something this expensive. He had probably sent a courier to Tiffany's at three in the morning, then spent the next three hours crafting the device onto it.

There was no point in saying anything to the guys. They didn't realize what they'd done and Tony was probably trying to be generous. She'd just have to lie to the girl or trick her into taking it.

Tony was be-bopping around the workshop with his headphones on, cleaning up and putting away his tools.

"Woo-hoo!" Tony shouted, "Shut up! Too loud. Bomp-chicka-wow. Mami, get the caaaat."

Bruce rolled his eyes harder than she'd ever seen a ten year old do it.

"What the hell is he high on? I don't even know that song," Natasha said.

"Endocrine hormones. He mixed the song tonight. Last night. Whatever. Don't ask," Bruce waved a hand.

Natasha watched and listened to Tony for a moment more.

"He never wears headphones. It's always loud in here," she pointed out.

"I refused to work with him if he played the audio where I could hear it," Bruce grimaced at the way Tony kept humming and dancing.

"That bad?" Nat asked.

"You have no idea. Look, just get this to the girl and make sure she wears it before she says anything else or he'll make another song mix and I'm moving to Waco," Bruce threatened.
"That's probably all I need to know," Nat nodded.

"No, it's not. You need to find out how old she is. There's definitely the possibility of an it. Steve's a paragon and all that, but he was Hulk-fishing when it came to defending her. Maybe he's only protective of his friend, or maybe she got to him. Either way, we need to know her age," Bruce said.

"Hulk-fishing? Steve?" Nat wondered. If Steve was being so reckless, then the girl's talents were a force to be concerned about.

"It was hard to tell. Kind of weird, actually. He was like evil Cap or something. Maybe primal Steve. Not our average choir-boy," Bruce said.

"Interesting," Natasha said.

Bruce shook his head and leaned over his work station to save some files and begin shutdown.

"Bruce?" she asked, thoughts tumbling in her head.

"Hmm?"

"Her voice got to you too?" she asked.

"Yeah," he admitted. He lowered his head and rubbed at the back of his neck. She ignored his bashfulness.

"Do you feel tired?" she asked.

"Well, yeah. I've been up for I don't know how long," he answered.

"Steve is sleeping on my couch. He called me a bitch," she said.

Bruce's mouth fell open. They all knew that Steve avoided Natasha's suite like the plague. He wouldn't even get out of the elevator on her side of their floor if he could help it. There had been too many Virgin Cap/Experienced Widow jokes and Steve was serious about not being seen in Nat's living quarters. Or near them.

"I don't know if his uncharacteristic behavior is because of the girl's voice or the gas he inhaled. We need to find out," Natasha said.

Bruce nodded. He looked around for Tony, who had finally taken off the headphones and stopped dancing.

"He called you a bitch?" Tony asked them. His over the top playfulness was gone.

"And he did a good job of it, too," Natasha smiled. She was proud of Steve, if he deserved the credit. She suspected he didn't. Steve's behavior had been distinctly off, like Bruce had described him earlier.

"That's one for the records. Jarvis?" Tony asked.

"Sir, I don't record everything," Jarvis responded.

Even Jarvis' silence sounded pained.
"I don't record everything in Miss Romanova's suite," Jarvis clarified hesitantly.

The sound tone of the workshop changed to match the hushed quiet of Natasha's suite.

"Siren, Nat. Poor kid," Steve's voice mumbled, sounding sleepy.

"No, poor you. She's been living with it for years. It's nothing new to her."

"C'mon. Have some mercy. She's scared,"

"There's nothing wrong with being scared. Let her be scared for a while. It will make her easier to convince,"

"Witch,"

"Oooh. So close. That's an award for intentional under-achievement, Panty-pants America,"

"Alright, you win. Bitch," Steve's voice ground out the naughty word with relish.

Jarvis' playback ended with her and Steve's laughter. Even Steve's laugh sounded off, now that she was listening and not participating. Bruce made a slight face beside her. He agreed.

"Can I sleep now and get to this particular emergency sometime later this afternoon?" Tony asked. As she and Bruce watched him, Tony almost fell asleep on his feet. His head drooped, then jerked back up again. The fact that he hadn't reacted with glee to hearing Steve use rough language underscored to them that something was wrong with Tony.

"Sure, Tony," Bruce told him.

He and Natasha went over to guide Tony to the couch he kept in his workshop. Tony was dead weight in their hands before he touched the couch.

"Sir's vital signs are within normal parameters. I believe he is coming down from the effect of our friend's voice. Do you agree, Doctor Banner, that this answers the question of whether the Captain's peculiarities were caused by his recent gas exposure or by our friend's voice?" Jarvis asked.

"I agree that it's likely her voice, but it needs further investigation," Bruce said.

He looked at the choker necklace Natasha clutched in one hand.

"I know. I'm going," Nat said.

---

"Sit up so I can put this on you," Natasha ordered as soon as she was in the door to the girl's room in the medical ward.

Nat didn't give her time to hold the choker necklace, or to look at it, or to protest. The girl moved too slowly for her purposes, so Nat helped her up with a hand between her shoulders. Sure fingers slipped the velvet around her terribly slim throat, and Nat adjusted the closure and the butterfly to how she imagined they should fit. The butterfly rested just below the girl's larynx, at the hollow of her throat.
"That should work to moderate your voice. Talk to me so we can see if it works," Natasha said to her.

"My voice? Does everybody around here know about my voice already?" Estrella asked the Widow.

"Good. It seems to work," Nat said. The girl had a lovely voice, but it did nothing extraordinary or interesting for her.

"My voice doesn't do anything to women. I don't want to talk to a man to find out if it works," she said.

Natasha took out her phone. While her fingers tapped a quick message, she sat on the end of the girl's hospital bed, then pushed herself up onto the mattress more fully. There was plenty of room for her to cross her legs and get comfortable, slumber party-style.

The girl looked at Natasha while her fingers moved over the shape of the choker and its butterfly. Nat hoped that she'd rushed the device onto her so quickly that she'd be used to it before she thought to question it.

"There are some things you need to know because you're going to be here for a while. First, we've got Jarvis. Say hello, Jarvis," Nat said.

"Hello, Miss. I'm sure you remember me talking to the Captain in the park a few weeks ago. I am Mister Stark's artificial intelligence system. I run the tower and offer assistance where I can. Among other things," Jarvis greeted the girl for the first time.

"So you're not real. You're not a man?" Estrella asked.

"The exact definition of reality is open for debate, but I am certainly not a man. I am composed of data, stored on hardware devices, and I think by means of computational process. I am everywhere in this building, and I exist in a few places everywhere else," Jarvis told her.

"There's no privacy? I can't even go to the bathroom?" Estrella asked. She'd already been once, and a nurse had to help her walk because she was groggy from the sedatives. That had been embarrassing enough, without knowing that someone might be listening.

"I do observe privacy directives, Miss. Sleeping quarters and bathrooms are not monitored. However, if my name is called, I am available for help in any location. I can assure you that as a non-organic consciousness, I have no prurient interest in the messier aspects of human existence," Jarvis' cool voice said.

Natasha glanced at her phone to read a text response, then she put the phone away and gave the girl her full attention.

"I'm Natasha. Steve calls me Nat. I know I was unkind to you the first time I saw you, and I'm not done with that yet. There are things I have to do to keep my teammates safe. Business first. Are you good with that?"

"I'm good," Estrella said cautiously. She didn't know what she was agreeing to, but it was pointless to argue this early in the encounter. She wasn't any less intimidated by the Widow now than she had been the day she'd pulled the woman's hair. Soon as Natasha had walked into the room, Estrella felt she'd stepped onto a bus that she had no control over. She wasn't driving and she was barely hanging on. Natasha seemed to know exactly what she was about, and there was some reassurance in that, if she could believe that she should trust Natasha simply because Steve trusted
"We've been calling you 'the girl' and 'Steve's friend.' What's your name? Make something up if you want, but we're going to need something to call you," Nat said.

She was feeling powerless anyway, and there wasn't much more left to hide. They already knew the most outlandish thing about her.

"My mother named me Estrella," she said. It felt like defeat to so easily give what she'd kept guarded. Surrender. If any of the men from her past were still looking for her, she'd just made it easier for them.

"How old are you, Estrella? You don't have to tell me your exact birthdate. We're not keeping a file on you, though we should. We need to know your approximate age," Nat said.

"Why?" Estrella asked.

"Because if you are a minor, then your interactions with the Avengers could become legally complicated. For liability purposes, we need to know how to deal with you," Nat explained.

"Oh. I'm not a minor. I'm twenty-two. No. What day is it?" she asked. Her brain had been in such a fog lately that she wasn't sure how old she was.

"Today is September the fifth," Nat answered.

"Then I'm twenty-three," Estrella said.

"Good," Nat replied. She revealed nothing, but she was very happy that her instinct had been confirmed. Steve might balk at first, but twenty-three wasn't too young.

"You wanted me to bring this?" Thor said as he entered the room. He was planning to return to Asgard shortly, so he was wearing his armor and boots, the leather pants and red cape, and the metal scales which clung to his arms. Mjolnir was likely still on his foyer table.

He held out Clint's hair clippers to Nat and she nodded and smiled a polite greeting at the girl on the bed. Nat took the clippers and set them aside. Estrella saw them and got a stubborn look on her face, but Nat didn't give her time to dwell on it.

"Thank you, Thor. I wouldn't have you running errands for us, but I've got more than one bird to kill," Nat said.

"Ah. I am the stone. How may I assist?" Thor asked with good humor.

He folded his arms and waited patiently. Nat didn't tell him that his combat uniform and tall, squared posture weren't very soothing to a girl who was afraid of men. Estrella needed to get used to tolerating testosterone if she was going to be staying in Avengers tower for a while.

"This is Estrella. I think you've met before, at the library?" Nat formally introduced them.

"I am happy to know your name, friend of my brother," Thor said.

"Hi," Estrella whispered. She looked to Nat. The runaway bus she was riding on felt like it had taken a turn for the painfully awkward. And it was accelerating.

"Estrella, I need you to use your voice. Thor is the strongest man among us, but he is also the most honorable and experienced. If the necklace Tony and Bruce made for you doesn't work, now is the safest opportunity to find out,” Natasha told her.

"But what if it doesn't work?” Estrella hissed.

She knew Thor was a good man. But a man, still. There was no way for the Widow to know what her voice did to men. It wasn't pretty at all when base lust overcame a good man. It was sad. She didn't want to do that to Thor, and she didn't want to see or experience the effects. If Natasha tried to defend her, she could get hurt.

"There's no reason it wouldn't work. Tony used recordings of your voice to analyze why it affects men the way it does. He's rarely wrong about these things. You should try it, so that you can have confidence in depending on the necklace. Think about it, Estrella. It's worth the risk. You'll be free to speak like everyone else," Nat encouraged her.

"I want Steve to be here," Estrella whispered. If she had to do this, she wanted Steve with her. She already knew that he could resist her voice, somehow. If Tony Stark's device didn't work and Thor went for her, then at least Steve could help her get away.

"Steven is exhausted and recovering from grave injury, Estrella. I would not summon him at this time," Thor said to her, then looked to Natasha, "I want no part of acting against her will,"

His smile was gone, but he kept his stern expression on his teammate, not the frightened girl clutching the covers. He'd gleaned enough information to know what Natasha wanted of him, and he was willing to help, but only if Estrella was agreeable.

Natasha looked to Estrella, leaving the decision to her. Estrella didn't feel she was being given a choice. If she didn't take the risk of testing her voice on Thor, then she would look weak in front of these incredibly strong people. Living on the street, the only way you could survive being weak was to escape notice, or to be so repugnant that nobody wanted to touch you or your things. Being here in their tower had already removed both of her accustomed means of security.

The knowledge of what she was forcing on Estrella was in Natasha's eyes. The woman was pushing her, testing her, expecting things of her. Everyone else seemed to think she was mostly dead and needed coddling, but the Widow was merciless.

"You're standing on a cliff, Estrella. Your old life is over. Dead. There's only ash and monsters behind you. In front of you, there's nothing to do but jump. Fall or fly," Natasha gave her the choice with a curiously light tone of voice and an uptilt of her chin which hinted that she'd prefer Estrella to take the loftier option.

She spoke like one who'd had to make the same choice.

Estrella felt tears sting her eyes. She did feel like she was standing on a cliff. This wasn't just about talking in front of Thor. Everything had changed as soon as she'd met Steve, and she was just now clear-headed enough to realize it. She was shaking and her voice was going to sound stupid and wavery. She took a breath anyway.

"I'm not sure I want to change my life. I don't know what's ahead," Estrella said, uncertain but clearly intoned and enunciated.

"None of us can know what's ahead," Natasha agreed.

Estrella watched Thor, cringing as the seconds passed. The big man stood behind Natasha's shoulder. A smile broadened his face for a moment, but then disappeared as a thought occurred to him.
"I felt nothing. But, what if, being of Asgard, I am not vulnerable to her voice at all? We will have done this with no result except false confidence in the device. There would be a danger of adverse consequences the next time she speaks in the presence of a man," Thor said.

"How true," Natasha agreed again, no surprise at all in her tone.

Both Thor and Estrella looked at Nat. Thor frowned, already accustomed to the Widow's tactics. Estrella thought that the Widow had some of the same kind of creepiness that Steve's friend Bucky did.

"So what do we do? Why didn't you bring in a regular guy to test this?" Estrella asked with a stronger voice.

Her fingers traced the butterfly shape of the necklace. She still watched Thor, fighting disbelief that she was speaking in front of a man and he wasn't acting like an amorous thug.

"Remove the necklace," Natasha said.

Estrella shook her head.

"I'll make a deal with you, Estrella. Those mats on your head are coming off. I can hold you down and shear you like a sheep. Or we can wait for Steve to wake up and you can both get your heads shaved together," Nat offered.

"Neither of those options gets me out of speaking to him without the necklace," Estrella said, and nodded toward the Asgardian. She gave Natasha her worst stare, and even added the little hint of insanity that she'd practiced to scare away the people who didn't scare so easily. Nat ignored her theatrics.

"Correct. But one of the options lets you get shaved with more fun and dignity," Natasha pointed out.

"You wouldn't hold me down anyway. You might hurt me," Estrella let go of her blankets long enough to cross her arms, careful of the IV line and using its presence to make her case for her.

Natasha didn't argue or threaten. Instead, she picked up the vinyl carrying case the clippers were in and unzipped it. She didn't look at Estrella. She got up from the bed and walked near the headboard to find an electric outlet to plug the clippers into. She took out the clippers, untangled the cord, and plugged them in. Estrella watched her, stubborn and aware that she still had a little time to call Natasha's bluff.

Then Natasha was on top of her in the bed faster than she could move to stop her. Estrella's stubbornly folded arms worked against her as Nat used her weight to trap her arms against her chest. Nat flicked the clippers on and adjusted the blade guard to its shortest setting.

"Your choice. Make it now," Natasha said.

She eyed the front of Estrella's hair and changed the angle of the clipper in her hand slightly.

"It is usually better to do what she wants at these moments," Thor advised blandly. When Estrella took her eyes off of Nat's calmly assertive expression to look at him, she saw that he'd have no help from Thor. He did not look harsh or unkind, but he wasn't going to help her against his teammate.

"Okay, okay. Get off me you bitch," Estrella fussed. She wiggled as much as she could until Natasha turned off the hair clippers and slid off the bed.

"Twice in one day. I must be doing something right," Nat smiled.

She set the clippers down on the empty chair and waited for Estrella to take off the necklace.

The girl moved slowly purely for the sake of defiance and she fumbled at the clasp, but she got the choker off. Nat held out her hand, hoping Estrella would automatically hand it over so she wouldn't notice what the thing was made of. Estrella was still feeling bullied from being pinned down, so she put the necklace in Natasha's hand without hesitation.

"How do we proceed? Is there anything I should do?" Thor asked.

It was getting close to time for Heimdall to call him home. He did not want to rush Estrella, but he could not be in two places at once.

"All she has to do is speak, Thor. Your job is to resist," Natasha said.

"That should not be a problem," Thor assured the women.

Estrella didn't know why Natasha was smiling. It wasn't going to be funny. She felt squirmy and uncomfortable with both of them looking at her, waiting. Now that she'd agreed to say something in front of Thor without the protection of the necklace, she didn't know what to say.

"Do you know any songs or nursery rhymes? It doesn't matter what you say. He doesn't have to understand it. Anything will do," Nat advised her.

"I know it doesn't matter what I say! Just give me a minute to think. You people are crazy and you don't know what you're asking," Estrella whispered furiously.

It didn't occur to her that she could have said the same words instead of whispering them. She was fussing at Natasha, not thinking about Thor.

Ah. There was the story her Granny had taught her years ago. The one about the burro and the spider. It could even be sung, if she wanted to.

"I'm sorry," Estrella whispered to Thor pre-emptively.

"It's alright. Don't be concerned. Proceed as soon as you are ready," Thor assured her briskly.

Estrella took a breath and sang the story of the burro and the spider in Spanish. She didn't know the rest of the language, but Granny had taught her what the song meant. She closed her eyes because she didn't want to look at Thor while she sang.

Thor thought for the first instant that the women were being overly concerned about nothing. The young woman had a pleasant singing voice, maybe even an exceptional one, but…

His thoughts faltered and he took a surprised breath. There was a warm, pulling sensation in his mind and it travelled down his spine and grew in intensity.

The sound of her. It was delightful. He had to do something.

Natasha turned her head to look back and up at Thor. He'd gone from confident and smiling patiently, to stricken and slightly out of breath, and now he was bent and huffing at her shoulder, his hands gripping the footboard of the hospital bed until the faux-wood polymer creaked under the strain.
"How ya doing there, tough guy?" she asked him. The bed jerked slightly in his grip and Estrella stopped singing abruptly.

The end of the singing didn't seem to relieve Thor any. All Estrella's silence did was make it easier to hear the distress in Thor's breathing. He bit off a growl and was silent for a moment in response to Nat's question, but then his harsh respirations returned. The bed trembled.

"No, no, he's not-" Estrella protested fearfully.

"Shh. Give him time. We already know that the necklace works," Natasha said.

Another dose of Estrella's voice added to the urge that prodded him. Thor hung his head until it touched Natasha's shoulder. He asked his father for strength and held onto the tight lockdown he had on his muscles.

"Suck it up, Odinsson. It's over. You've already beat this," Nat told him.

She eased off the pressure from the blade that she held against the leather of his pants. Natasha didn't really know if she would have cut him had he proved a danger to the girl. Maybe not. But she got a nice sense of satisfaction from getting a knife at one of his few weak spots. She wondered why most versions of armor didn't have much protection down there, right under the curve of the package. One skilled swipe of a blade and a man would never be the same. A man who didn't have enhanced healing abilities, anyway.

"That won't be necessary," Thor finally whispered.

He released the footboard and pushed Nat's hand away. She put away her knife before Estrella could see that she'd needed it. Thor stood straight and took a deep breath, then let it out. He did not look at either woman and his fists were tight at his thighs.

"My respects, Lady. I will not think to disregard your abilities," Thor said, his eyes straight ahead.

"I'm sorry," Estrella whispered again.

Thor finally relaxed some and let his arms loosen. He didn't know whether to feel pity or envy for the man who might end up being the girl's mate. No matter. It was time to take his leave of Midgard.

"There is nothing to forgive. I'm glad that we were able to prove the effectiveness of your device," Thor said.

He gave Estrella a gentle look which promised no recriminations for his discomfort, then turned and left the room. Natasha waited until his footfalls retreated into the elevator before she spoke.

"So how does it feel to have the undivided attention of a god?" she asked Estrella.

"He's not a god. He's an alien," Estrella denied, "Are you done with your business now?"

"Almost. We need to talk about Steve," Natasha said.

She was just about done jumping through hoops for the Widow. Her frown eased when she thought that she should have a headache by now. More than a headache. Her heart felt fluttery from the stress of speaking to Thor, but her chest didn't hurt. She bit her lip and tucked her head down.
"What?" Natasha asked.

At first, Estrella didn't want to share her knowledge with the woman, but the Widow hadn't hurt her. Harsh as she was, she'd helped. And tense as the moments with Thor had been, he'd helped too. So had Tony Stark. And whoever Bruce was. They deserved her thanks, if the necklace was really going to allow her to speak. She'd been mute for most of eleven years.

"I should have a headache. And my heart should hurt," Estrella told her.

Natasha smiled.

"I told you. Your old life is over. I can't make any promises, but I think things might get better for you from now on," Nat said.

"But I can't pay for this," Estrella said, touching the butterfly choker and looking around at the hospital room.

"I said that your life might improve. I didn't say there wouldn't be any problems. Look, I know that things have been tough for you. It's nearly impossible for you to trust us, and you're accustomed to seeing everything and everyone as a threat. That's survival and you've been good at it. You've got at least one friend now, and two or more of the most powerful men on the planet are willing to defend you. Instead of dwelling on problems, you can afford to take a day or two to relax and enjoy your improved circumstances," Natasha encouraged her.

"But it doesn't make any sense. I can't trust things that don't make sense. Every man I've met who's heard my voice has attacked me. How is it that Steve and Thor are so different?" Estrella asked.

"They're different because they've trained themselves to do the right thing even when doing the wrong thing would be more enjoyable. The strength that makes them heroic is the same strength that helps them overpower their more selfish desires," Natasha said.

Now that Natasha had said it, Estrella could see it to be true. The determined look she'd seen on both Steve and Thor when they'd been dealing with the effects of her voice wouldn't have been out of place on them in battle. During the battle of New York against the aliens, she'd seen images of them looking similar.

Estrella smiled at the realization that the power of her voice had not turned Steve or Thor ugly with lust as her voice did to most men. They had been awesome to watch. Inspiring. For the same reason that people liked to capture the Avengers' battles on their cell phones and then play the videos over and over again. They were strong. Good. Heroic. People needed to see that because of the way it made them feel. Like Estrella was feeling right now. She felt hopeful.

Natasha let her dwell on the positive for a moment, but there were still some issues to caution her about. She'd kept a watchful eye on Estrella's heart monitor and had almost paused in her plans for the girl a few times. She'd done well, but there was a limit to how much stress she could tolerate.

"Estrella, do you know who Bruce is?" Natasha asked.

"I don't think so. Didn't you say that a Bruce helped Tony Stark to make this?" she asked. Her fingers were rubbing a rough spot on the butterfly's wings. The diamonds. Natasha foresaw trouble coming when she finally got a look at the necklace. Maybe it would be Steve's trouble and not hers. She could hope.

"Yes. He's Doctor Bruce Banner. When he gets too agitated, he's the Hulk. Bruce is one of the kindest people you'll ever meet, but the Hulk isn't. I said earlier that Thor was the strongest man among us, but that's only because Bruce is calm right now. There's no risk to anyone as long as Bruce stays calm, and he's really good at doing that. But you should be extra careful to always have your necklace on if you speak when Bruce is near you," Natasha said.

"The Hulk lives here?" Estrella asked. Her eyes were wide and she was obviously concerned.

"No. Bruce lives here. You don't go around calling Steve 'Captain America' all the time, so it's not appropriate to call Bruce 'The Hulk' while he's not green and while we're at home," Nat explained.

"Okay. I'm sorry. I know how it bothers Steve when people don't see him for who he is," Estrella apologized.

Estrella kept touching her throat because it felt strange and wonderful to speak, after all her years being silent. Natasha was pleased to see her enjoying one of the perks of her new life. Steve would be pleased to know that she was already finding something to be happy about.

Nat slumped her lower back against the footboard of the bed and let her shoulders round down to a more casual posture. Estrella was getting tired. She could see it in the way she had finally rested fully back against the incline of the bed. Nat hoped she could use a more intimate tone to help with the next and last thing she had to talk about.

"Good. Now, about Steve," Natasha began.

Estrella looked at her with interest. The girl was a wrecked mess at the moment, but Natasha saw potential in her fearlessness and strength of character. She decided to share a little more than she had planned to because she thought Estrella could handle it.

"I can tell you that Steve is my friend as well as my leader and my teammate. He nearly died rescuing my ass less than twenty-four hours ago, so you'll understand that I feel some loyalty to him. If you know him, you'll know that he'd do the same for anybody with little regard for his own life. The only reason he's still breathing is because he's so hard to kill," Natasha said.

Estrella's face pulled into a strong frown at hearing about Steve nearly dying. Thor had said something about him being gravely injured, too. She didn't like that she'd found him standing over her when she'd awakened, now knowing that somebody should have made him go to bed.

"Why didn't you make him go to bed and rest?" Estrella asked.

"Because Steve's a big boy and it's hard to make him do anything he doesn't want to do. He wanted to be near you, in case you woke up. He understands his limits. He can take it. My point is that even though he's heroic and tough, he's not perfect, and he's not immune to pain. Try not to hurt him, Estrella. And don't expect the impossible from him. He's still a man, and he does make mistakes," Natasha warned.

"I know. Why do you think I like him? He'd be so boring if he was perfect like everyone thinks he is. Mostly he's annoying and a little naïve, but there's worse ways to be" Estrella said.

"Exactly," Natasha smiled, "I'm glad you already see that in him."

Nat knew that Estrella wasn't getting exactly what she meant to impart, but she wasn't prepared to go into more details of Steve's situation, mostly out of loyalty to him. If Estrella was meant to know those things, she'd find out in due time.

Estrella was feeling like she could sleep. Her mouth was dry, and she really wanted her clothes. She also wanted the IV needle out of her hand too, so she wouldn't feel tethered to the bed. But before she asked for anything else, she needed Natasha's advice.

"His friend Bucky is around. I've seen him twice. Steve hasn't asked me more because he could see that I had a headache, but he's going to ask me about Bucky soon and I don't know what to tell him," Estrella said.

Natasha went from casual and friendly to creepy and alert in the time it had taken to say the name 'Bucky.'

"How do you know it was him that you saw?" the Widow asked.

"Because Steve showed me his sketchbook. There's drawings of his friend Bucky all through it, and that's the same man I've seen. There's no mistaking him. The way he moves. The way he watches things and people. He's sinister and quiet. Like you. Worse really, because he's a man. I knew he wasn't a normal street person the first time I met him, before I saw the sketchbook," Estrella explained.

"If you've seen him, then he meant for you to see him. He came to you. Why?"

"I think he's been watching Steve. I was in trouble both times and he protected me because he thinks that Steve likes me. Both times, he told me to let Steve help me. The last time, he threatened to bring me to a hospital if I didn't go home with Steve the next time I saw him," Estrella said.

"This is remarkable. You should be telling this to Steve, not to me. What do you mean when you say that you don't know what to tell Steve? You should tell him everything you just told me. Tell him everything you know," Natasha insisted.

Estrella made a conflicted grimace.

"Why is there any dilemma about this? Steve has been looking for him for months," Natasha said.

"Bucky doesn't want to be found. Steve thinks he's lost and confused, but he's not. He needs time to come to Steve on his own, but Steve is too eager. He'll try to force it, and then Bucky might leave again. I want Steve to get his friend back. It's important to him. But he's going to mess it up if I give away all the details and he goes hunting, pushing. I don't know how to lie to Steve. I don't want to lie, even if I could," Estrella said.

She hoped that Natasha would have advice on what to do when Steve asked her about Bucky. Natasha looked at Estrella in silence for a long moment. Estrella could see that there was a lot going on that the Widow wasn't saying. Things were complicated, then, Estrella concluded. Weren't they always?

"Do you know what Bucky is, Estrella?" Natasha asked.

"Sure I do. He's whatever you are, but more of it. I already said that," she answered.

"Good enough. You're very perceptive. What you need to know is that we don't know if Bucky is a threat or not. We don't know where his allegiance is. We don't know what his intentions are for Steve. He's extremely dangerous and no one has figured out how to catch him or what to do with him. We need all the information on him that we can get," Nat said.

"And what you need to know is that Bucky's allegiance is to Steve. He's a threat to anyone who hurts Steve. You don't catch him and you don't do anything with him. If he's that dangerous, then you leave him alone and mind your own business unless it looks like he's going to do something to you first. That's easy. Law of the street. It's a shame all you smart, rich people can't figure that out" on your own," Estrella said. She would have said it with more attitude, but she'd run out of steam. Her eyes were getting heavy.

"I know the law of the street, but thanks for the reminder, Estrella. I'll make sure the boss man takes your advice seriously," Natasha said.

The more time she spent with the girl, the more she liked her.

"Can I get my clothes? Or some water?" Estrella whispered. Her eyes were shut and she'd stopped fingering the butterfly to let her hands fall to her lap.

Natasha got up and poured a glass of ice water from the plastic pitcher. She held a straw to Estrella's lips until she'd taken a sip. When she was done drinking, Nat put away the glass and Clint's hair clippers for later. She looked forward to getting the mess off of Estrella's head. And she looked forward to finding out what a girl like her would do to Steve's life.
Chapter 11

Author's note: Yup, it's getting a little out of hand. I've still got the bones of the story firmly grasped, but the fluff of it is squeezing out between my fingers. I had originally attempted to make each chapter use up the dull parts first and finish with a crescendo, but all attempt at that kind of finesse is past. As a writing exercise for a bigger project of mine, it's fun, at least.

Tony Stark had incinerated her clothes and her shoes. All she had left was a clear plastic bag which included the autograph sketch Steve had made for her, a small folding knife, and a dollar and thirty-two cents in loose change. When she'd asked for her clothes, the nurse had brought her the bag and apologized to her for the clothing.

Estrella tried not to be angry at Tony because he'd given her such a wonderful gift in the choker necklace she now wore. She could have made more clothes for herself, but the necklace was unique. Her fingers came up to touch the butterfly at her throat once again. She didn't want to take it off because it made her feel safe. There had to be a way to repay Mister Stark for what he'd done for her, but she didn't know how, yet.

She stood in the bathroom of her recovery room in the medical ward. Natasha had lent her some clothes to wear, now that Doctor Kalfey had removed the IV line from her hand and she could get up and move around. She didn't mind borrowing things so much, but she'd have to pay Natasha back too, for the new bra and the package of plain cotton underwear.

Since her mind felt much clearer, she was sure she could keep a mental list of what she owed to whom. The problem was finding a way to make some money to pay people back. Natasha had suggested that she not worry about that for a day or two, so she was going to try to comply.

Estrella wanted to take a shower before putting on Natasha's borrowed clothes, but there was no lock on the bathroom door. The thought of anyone coming in while she changed made her put on the clothes in a hurry.

She was happy to get rid of the pale, flimsy hospital gown and put on the stretchy sport bra and the jeans and long-sleeved shirt. The clothes hung loose on her and she had to use the belt Nat had provided to keep the pants from sliding down past her hip bones. It wasn't as bulky and concealing as the clothes she made for herself, but it was so much better than the hospital gown that she felt safe and well-covered by comparison. She pulled on the hospital issued tan socks with the rubber lines on the bottom that she'd been wearing when she'd awakened in the medical ward two days ago.

When she returned to her room, she heard Steve's voice out in the hall, by the nurse's station. He didn't sound happy. She thought she heard Natasha's voice too. She went and stood by the door to listen to what they were arguing about.

"You're not in charge of her care, Nat. You can't make decisions like that. If she doesn't want her hair cut, you won't cut it," Steve's voice said strongly.

"No one needs to be in charge of her care. She's a grown woman and she made a deal," Natasha countered.

"Under duress! You were sitting on her!" Steve pointed out. He was getting more agitated, and Estrella didn't like to hear them fighting.
"Steve, give me some credit. I know not to sit on her," Natasha said.

They were speaking loud enough that Estrella didn't feel like she was snooping. Anyone in the medical ward would be able to hear them, and they were just outside her door.

"You're right. I'm sorry. It's just that Tony's already burned her stuff, and now you want to change the way she looks. It's too much too fast, and she's not being given any choice. You know damn well that you tricked her into it," Steve said.

His voice got a lot quieter right before he said the word 'damn.' Estrella smiled at how typically Steve that was. He'd never said the word in her presence, but maybe he talked that way among his teammates.

She touched her butterfly briefly before she opened her door. They were already looking toward the door before she had it opened enough to see them. From the way they both were dressed, it looked like they'd been in business meetings all morning. Steve waited to see what she had to say, his hands comfortably shoved into the pockets of his dark gray suit pants.

"It's okay. She can shave my head. I'm gonna have to get a job anyway and I can't go to work looking like this," Estrella said. She looked up at what she could see of her hair, then at them. She stepped into the hallway and let the room door shut behind her.

Steve was smiling at her. It was the first time he'd heard her speak freely without her voice doing things to his head.

She didn't have to ask why he was smiling so big. It was clear that he was happy for her, and it felt good to have someone to share a happy moment with. There hadn't been anyone she could share things with for a very long time. It felt cozy to share her happiness with him. She tried not to smile in public, but she couldn't help it. Steve's joy for her was infectious.

"Alriiight. We like the voice. Moving on now. You know, Steve, you were part of the deal," Natasha said.

"I was?" he asked.

He was still smiling when he looked to Natasha. His eyes reluctantly dragged away from assessing Estrella. Why did Nat look so smug? That look on her always meant that she was proud of some accomplishment, usually something related to getting the best of her male teammates. He immediately became suspicious of what Estrella's hair-cutting deal had to do with him.

"You have to have your head shaved too," Estrella informed him.

She studied his head and his face, trying to imagine what he'd look like without his classic blonde hair which was so iconic of Captain America. It was getting too long, anyway.

"Wait a minute. No fair. I wasn't here to agree to any deal," Steve said, still in good humor.

"You were the one messing around in my life uninvited, telling Wanda to call the tower on me. If I have to change, then so do you," Estrella said.

It felt really good to be able to assert herself without the annoying whisper. She'd meant to be sharp with him, but every time she spoke, he looked at her and grinned.

"What?" she asked.
"You have an accent. It's slight, but-" Steve said. He was uncertain if pointing it out would offend her.

"I know. I'm stuck in the middle. Everyone used to assume I spoke Spanish. My granny spoke it, and my mother had a strong accent. She wanted me to blend in, so all I know is English, but when I open my mouth, this comes out," Estrella shrugged.

She knew her words had a slight Latino lilt, and she'd tried to moderate it, but there hadn't been much opportunity to practice. Steve seemed delighted by everything about the way she spoke, and she squinted at him suspiciously, wondering if her necklace wasn't completely working.

"What's wrong with you?" she asked him.

"Nothing. Can't I be happy?" Steve wondered.

He was still smiling, and it infected her again.

"Stop smiling. You look like an idiot," Estrella fussed, but she couldn't get her face to behave, either.

Natasha wanted to tease them about the way they were acting, but she didn't dare. If she mentioned anything at all about how the air felt thicker between the two of them, they'd probably get prickly and awkward and the moment would be ruined. She'd seen a few different smiles on Steve, but the goofy, companionable one was new.

She left them googling at each other in the hallway to go retrieve Clint's hair clippers from Estrella's room. She felt like doing a goofy victory dance, herself, but she kept it locked inside. If any of the guys quashed the potential she felt between Steve and Estrella with jokes and teasing, she'd make them piss blood.

They both looked to her when she came out with the clippers. She had to bite the inside of her cheek hard to not give herself away with the satisfaction she felt. Steve had followed her down to medical, ripping at her for how she'd been too forceful with Estrella on the video files he'd seen, but now he looked relaxed. The girl was good for him.

"Estrella, I convinced Doctor Kalfey to release you, but only by assuring her that you would be staying with me and that you would wear this monitor on your wrist," Natasha said.

Like before, she didn't give Estrella time to argue about it. She took her by the hand and pushed up the slouchy purple shirt sleeve.

"What does it do?" Estrella asked.

The monitor was made of that white fibrous paper which wouldn't tear. There was a silvery metal strip down the middle of it. Natasha fit it comfortably snug around her skin and pulled off the paper tab which protected the adhesive. In less than half a minute, the wrist monitor was on, and she barely felt it.

"It sends a signal to the nurse's station so they can monitor your heart," Natasha explained.

Doctor Kalfey had come to see her this morning. Estrella already knew she had heart problems, so what the doctor had told her wasn't any surprise. They wanted her to eat a certain diet they'd come up with for her, too. She'd had a shake for breakfast and a cup of beef broth for lunch. She couldn't finish more than half of what the nurse brought her before she felt stuffed. She would eat a little to make them happy, but as soon as she was out of here, she could do what she wanted.
The three of them walked toward the elevator. Estrella thought it was strange that the medical ward was empty. Not even a nurse was in sight. She'd been the only patient. As soon as Doctor Kalfey had discharged her, the place cleared out.

Natasha walked on Estrella's right, and Steve was on Natasha's right. Nat was hardly taller than her, but Steve's height and bulk kept making her startle. In a crowd on the streets, being near him hadn't bothered her. When he was sitting and talking to her or reading near her, like in her hospital room or at the library, his personality and his wit distracted her from the fact that he was a large man.

She was feeling better than she had in a long time and she could walk faster without the encumbrance of her floppy shoes. The only times she and Steve had walked anywhere together, he'd moved slowly to match her. Today his size, his athletic stride and the emptiness of the medical ward kept telling her that she was in danger.

Natasha and Steve were both looking at her when she glanced at them. They shared a quick look between the two of them as they all three reached the elevator. Their silent communication spoke of long hours working together, making quick decisions with few words. Estrella felt like an outsider. They were strong and rich and smart. What was she doing here with them? Why did they want her here?

The elevator door opened for them without any buttons being pushed. Steve and Natasha got in it. Estrella's feet seemed to stick to the floor in the hall. She couldn't make herself go in. She wanted to, but… she couldn't. He was too big and the elevator was a closed space, and there was only Natasha with them.

This time she saw them make a decision together without so much as looking at each other. Steve released a breath which wasn't even a sigh and Natasha stepped out of the elevator again.

"Steve, you go on and we'll catch up with you later," Nat said.

Estrella got the impression that the words hadn't been necessary and had only been for her benefit.

"Sure. See ya," he said to Estrella in his typical manner, but his brow looked slightly troubled.

She felt stinging at her eyelids and her throat felt tight. She couldn't say anything, so she nodded as the elevator door closed.

"I know you didn't mean to, but you hurt his feelings," Natasha said after giving Estrella a moment to get herself under control.

Estrella nodded.

"Don't worry. He understands. He just wasn't expecting it," Nat said kindly.

"I wasn't either," Estrella said, low and sad.

The elevator was gone for only a minute, then it opened again for them. It was empty.

She had no trouble getting in it with Natasha.

"Where are we going?" Estrella asked.

"To my suite. To do your hair. We won't see anyone on the way. Jarvis is good like that," Natasha said.
They got out of the elevator in a nice, public-looking lobby which had three other elevators in it. Estrella followed Natasha directly across to the one with the door open waiting for them.

"Thank you, Jarvis," Estrella said.

"You're welcome, Miss," Jarvis replied.

Again, Natasha didn't press any buttons. In fact, there were no buttons. There was a rectangle in the brass wall panel where the buttons would have been, but the panel was smooth and blank. It was a walk-through elevator with doors on the other end, but there were no buttons over there either.

"How do people use this elevator?" Estrella asked.

"They don't. This is the only way to the Avengers' living quarters. No one gets in without Jarvis," Natasha told her.

"But what about power failures?" Estrella wondered.

"If there's ever a power failure, we've got much larger problems than the elevators," Natasha said dryly.

Estrella didn't know what that meant, but it sounded like there probably wouldn't be a problem with the elevators.

The elevator slowed to a stop and the doors opened to a much smaller lobby. A residential foyer, really. It was mid-afternoon and the glass wall at the end of the hall between the two suites let in bright daylight. Estrella wanted to go and look out because it seemed that they were really high up, but she followed Natasha to the suite on the left.

Natasha's place was comfortable and modern, in warm jewel and earth tones. The floors were dark wood and the kitchen was done in gray stone and bronze. There were a few décor touches, but there were no homey personal items lying around. The large living room had another wall of windows and Estrella went straight to look at the view. She stepped right up to the glass, then stepped back again.

"What floor are we on?" Estrella asked. She'd never been high up like this. The city spread out below her, and other tall buildings which she was accustomed to looking up at were down below her.

"Low nineties. Steve and Clint have the suites on the other side of the wall from us," Nat told her.

Her evasion of answering the question more precisely told Estrella that she was asking for more information than people were allowed to know.

"I'm sorry. I don't mean to pry," Estrella said.

Natasha only smiled at her slightly.

Ooo! These people were so much in their heads. No wonder Steve had been able to hold conversations with her when she wasn't even talking. It was like they had telepathy or something.

"Are you guys telepathic? Because you don't even talk," Estrella said.

Natasha only curved her lips a little bit more and held up the hair clippers.

Estrella blew out a sigh. Was the woman playing with her?
Natasha and the clippers went into another room down the hall, so Estrella followed. It was an amazing bathroom, done in honey-colored marble. There was a large window here, too, right beside and over the huge soaker tub. An open shower boasted a dark wood bench and several water nozzles. There was a wide mirror over the countertop and Estrella saw herself in it. She looked like what she was.

"I don't belong here," she said.

"Lots of people would like to have access to what you do right now. But they can't get in. How did you get here?" Natasha asked.

She plugged in the clippers and sat on an upholstered bench with carved legs and feet. She held the silent clippers and waited for Estrella.

"Steve brought me here," Estrella answered. She was still mad at him for that. A little.

"This is Avengers tower. Do you know who leads the Avengers?"

"Tony Stark?" Estrella guessed.

Nat's words made sense to her in the technical way, but she still felt out of place. Her house was a tin roof by a dumpster with a bed of carpet scraps, none of which she really owned. Everything she had was given to her or scavenged.

This was probably the most advanced building in the world, with all the security and with Jarvis, and all the nice things. There was even a jet and a landing pad. No, she didn't belong here, no matter what Natasha said or Steve did. She was the daughter of immigrants who had owned nothing, themselves. She still was nothing, even if they pitied her and gave her gifts. Especially then.

Estrella felt a surreal detachment from the moment she was living in. This was like a dream. She didn't know if it was a bad one, or a good one, or simply a weird one.

Nat patted the bench beside her. Estrella went and sat. She wasn't going to miss her matted hair. The only reason she didn't want to lose it was in case she needed it again so she could be repulsive. Natasha pushed her gently down across her lap and switched on the clippers. There was a waste bin on the floor at the end of the bench.

The clippers bit into the hair at her scalp, first in the back, then they worked around her hair line. Natasha worked patiently around and around. It pulled sometimes and the clippers grew hot against her skin. Estrella didn't complain about the hot metal or the pulling. It was so strange to feel cool air on her scalp.

"Your hair is already growing in black. You'll look cute in no time," Natasha said.

Nat worked the clippers at the top of her head, and then a wig of matted, orange-ish blonde hair fell into the waste bin. It made Estrella queasy to look at it, it was so ugly. She sat up quickly and stood to go look in the mirror.

"Your hair is already growing in black. You'll look cute in no time," Natasha said.

Nat worked the clippers at the top of her head, and then a wig of matted, orange-ish blonde hair fell into the waste bin. It made Estrella queasy to look at it, it was so ugly. She sat up quickly and stood to go look in the mirror.

With the ugly mats gone, the shape of her head wasn't bad. She looked like bones, but her eyes were large and brown and a short fuzz of black hair ghosted her scalp. It already made her uneasy that her cheekbones, jaw and lips were pretty and feminine without the horrible hair to draw attention away from them.
"I look like a skeleton," Estrella said critically.

"Almost," Natasha agreed.

Natasha set the clippers down and moved to start the water in the bath. When the tub was stoppered and she'd poured scented bubbles into the water, she came to stand behind Estrella at the mirror.

"Your skin is irritated where your hair was. I've got some good lotion for that. For now, get in the tub. Take your time and relax. I'll be in the living room if you need me," Nat said.

She took a plush bath towel from a cabinet and set it by the tub. Then she left Estrella alone.

Estrella didn't linger in Natasha's bathroom like she owned the place. She took off her necklace in case the water would hurt it, and she got clean quickly. She hadn't shaved in years. Nat had put a new razor out for her, so she used it on her legs and under her arms.

The whole time she bathed, her nose enjoyed the wonderful, subtle scent of the pink bar of soap she was using. The soap felt fatty and luxurious. It left her skin feeling moisturized and soft.

When she was done, she felt so smooth and strange. She cleaned out the tub with supplies she found under the sink, then rinsed the tub so it was as clean as new.

Natasha must have heard that she was done, because she knocked once, then came in with another set of clothes. Estrella stood wrapped in the towel, holding her necklace.

"I've already got clothes," Estrella said, indicating the borrowed clothes she'd taken off.

"They didn't suit you. Try this," Nat said. She handed Estrella a folded stack of clothes and put her necklace on for her while her hands were full.

"Thank you, Natasha," Estrella said quietly, for more than just putting her necklace on.

"Don't thank me yet. Remember, we don't know what the future holds," Natasha replied.

Estrella didn't know what to say to that, so she didn't say anything.

"Where are we going now?" Estrella asked as they got in the elevator again.

She was happy in the long, full skirt that Natasha had lent her. It was dark brown and it partly hid how hideously slim she was. She had a dark red tunic top with a wide elastic belt. The top would have felt too thin and revealing, but Nat had paired it with a suede vest that covered her up well enough.

"Jarvis, where is Captain Rogers?" Natasha asked.

"You will find him in the common room," Jarvis replied.

Estrella wanted to ask where that was, but she decided to wait and see.

"Pause, Jarvis," Natasha said soon as the doors were closed, but before the box started moving.

Estrella looked to Nat. All the silence was making her nervous. She was accustomed to silence when she was by herself, but to be around such a vibrant person as Natasha yet have most of the moments filled with silence was getting to her.
"Estrella, we're the only women here. Thor left yesterday, and Clint is out working, but you might see Bruce, Tony, or Sam. We're going to get Steve with these," Natasha held up the clippers, which she had brushed clean.

"Okay," Estrella said. She rubbed at the sore spot where the IV had gone into her hand. The small bandage was something to look at while Nat watched her.

"They aren't like regular men on the street. Thor is way over the top, and the rest of them aren't much better sometimes. There's a lot of testosterone flowing around here, and I've never wanted them to leash it. If you feel uncomfortable, go to the elevator and Jarvis will take you to my suite, no questions asked. The guys don't go to my suite at all, so you can retreat there if you need to. Do you think you can handle this?" Natasha asked.

Estrella shrugged. She really didn't know. She'd surprised herself with her inability to get into the elevator with Steve earlier.

"Fair enough. I'm not going to protect you. I won't need to because they're good guys. Tony is a pest, but he means well. Try to be brave, because you'll have to get used to being around men in small spaces sooner or later," Natasha said.

Estrella nodded. Now she really felt nervous because she expected to have to walk into a room full of men.

"Go, Jarvis," Nat said.

A very short moment later, the elevator doors opened into a dim hallway, but there was a large, day lit room to the right. Natasha led out of the elevator, clippers in hand. Estrella followed hesitantly.

From the hallway, the room opened wide. It was a multi-level space of glass and metal, with stylish leather furniture and architectural masonry walls. The floor was glossy stained concrete, and a deep, white furry rug floored the seating area in the middle. A man sat with his back to the hallway, his arm up along the back of a couch. Steve sat on the other couch across from him.

"It's Delilah, Steve. Maybe you should run," the man said with a warm smile. He looked at the women over his shoulder, but he didn't get up until Estrella followed Nat around the couch to face the men.

"Ain't scared," Steve denied. Estrella noted that he'd changed into casual khakis and a V-neck green t-shirt.

"Hi, I'm Bruce," the man she didn't know said. He stood to greet Estrella. He held out his hand in greeting, and Estrella forced herself to reach out and touch it. He adapted his gesture to merely touch her fingers and his friendly smile stayed in place.

"You helped with this. Thank you," Estrella whispered. She touched her fingers to her necklace.

"You're welcome. I'm glad we could help. Doesn't it work?" Bruce asked.

"Maybe she doesn't feel like talking right now," Steve said. He got up and came over to look at Estrella's head.

"I always did like the look of a fresh buzz," Steve made a curious face and leaned forward and down slightly to sniff at her head, "Smells good too."

"Do you want ylang-ylang lotion rubbed on your head? Because I can go get it," Natasha offered.
Bruce smiled at Steve while Steve made an attempt at shaping the repetitive word with his mouth. His brow crinkled with amused uncertainty.

"No, not at all. I've got to see this," Tony's voice insisted as he walked out of the elevator in the hall.

"It's just a haircut," Sam said, getting out behind him.

The two men entered the room. Sam hung back, then went to the kitchen. Tony walked right up to Estrella and looked her over.

"No more Auschwitz vibe. You've got more of a, uh-" Tony waved a hand at her, then fell silent at the steely look Steve was giving him over Estrella's head.

"Tony," He said to Estrella instead.

He was still looking at her intently. He was in an old t-shirt so faded that she couldn't make out what the print on the front once had been. His black jeans had stains on the knees, and his hair was spikey and disarrayed. This was definitely not the Tony Stark she'd seen on television at gala events or in the Iron Man suit. But it was Tony Stark. There was no mistaking his handsome face and his attitude.

Estrella ignored the Auschwitz comment and smiled at him.

"Thank you for my necklace," she said shyly.

Tony had looked eager when she'd opened her mouth to speak, then slightly disappointed when her voice did nothing to him. Bruce shook his head in disgust and sat back down on the couch.

"It's nothing. So, Goldilocks, get on with the show," Tony quickly turned his attention to Steve and Natasha. He rubbed his hands together and sprawled back in the leather chair at the end of the couches.

Estrella felt relief that the bright laser of his attention was no longer aimed in her direction. Sam drifted to her side with a beer in his hand. His posture was so relaxed that she felt no anxiety at his approach.

"Hi, I'm Sam. The sane, normal one around here," he said. He stood a comfortable distance away and simply smiled at her without offering his hand to shake.

"Are you sure? Because I saw you flying all around getting shot at near those creepy hover ships," Estrella said.

"Ooooh," Steve winced, then grinned at her proudly.

Steve turned away to walk over to the chair Nat had pulled closer to an electrical outlet, but he was still smiling faintly when he sat and pulled his shirt off. He leaned forward over the concrete floor and braced his elbows on his knees. He wadded his shirt in one hand and waited for Nat to begin.

"Do you want to do this?" Natasha offered Estrella the clippers.

Estrella looked at all of Steve's bare skin and the amazing display of muscles which he was so casual about baring. She shook her head and stayed where she was. She was more comfortable with her familiar version of him. The one that wore clothes and spent time on the street with her. This fancy place, these smooth, confident people, were making her feel out of sorts. It was dream-like "Want to help me make some drinks in the kitchen? We can do that instead, if you don't want to watch buns-n-thighs over there," Sam offered.

She didn't know why he was talking to her, a stranger, but his demeanor was nothing but kindness. She didn't want to make things in the kitchen, and it wasn't because she disliked Sam. Her eyes went back to looking at Steve and how he stayed bent patiently so Nat could move around him. Steve was so much bigger, but Natasha didn't fear him at all. She pulled his ear and laughed when he said 'ow' and frowned at her.

"Moth to the flame," Tony commented. He was watching Estrella watching Steve.

Estrella glanced at him, confused. Had he been talking to her? When he said nothing more, she returned to watching Steve and Natasha. The first lock of hair came off Steve's head. It sat on the back of his neck until Nat brushed it onto the floor.

"Tony," Bruce admonished him quietly.

Tony and Bruce's words sounded like nothing she needed to get involved in, so Estrella let herself drift across the furry rug. She vaguely noticed that it looked like real fur. Her borrowed sandals brushed through the thick hairs until she was off the other side of the rug and not far away from where Steve's look was quickly changing.

He looked up at her with his eyes though he didn't lift his head for fear of disturbing Nat's work. Estrella squatted down in front of him to better be able to see how he was changing with each swipe of the clippers. Natasha moved from his side, around his front between them, then over to his other side. Estrella stayed several feet away, leaving Natasha plenty of room to move.

"I don't think I like it," Estrella said.

She wasn't sure. His hair was darker underneath, cut so close to his scalp. She'd wondered if he would look bald because his hair was light like his skin, but the darker hair color against his skin made him look more serious. Severe. He had a nice shaped head, intelligent and refined looking.

"It'll grow back," Steve said. He looked at her hair too.

He was trying not to make her uncomfortable by staring, but his eyes kept going back to her. His fingers twitched, and he squeezed his t-shirt more tightly. Gosh, she had great lines. He changed his mind. He did want to draw her. She was really thin, and he didn't like what that meant for her health, but from an artist's perspective, she was technically interesting. He felt like a cad for thinking so coldly of it, but sometimes the things he drew weren't easy to think about or look at.

Why was Steve looking at her like that? She would have said he was studying her like she was a bug, but he had lingering hints of happiness around his eyes and mouth. He looked eager for something, like a kid waiting for a treat.

"What do you want?" she whispered to him. Being engaged with his thoughts and his facial expression helped her lose her uneasiness of his size and shirtlessness. She slid her feet forward until she was just a few feet from him so he wouldn't have to speak loudly.

"I want my sketchbook. And I want to go somewhere else. Somewhere with good light and not so many people," he near-whispered back at her.

"You want to draw me? I look like a scarecrow," Estrella said.
"Scarecrows can be interesting," Steve said.

Natasha smacked him hard on the back of the head. His head didn't move, but tiny filaments of cut hair poofed into the air to settle onto his shoulders.

"What?" Steve asked.

He turned his head to complain at Natasha, but she threatened his eyebrow with the clippers, so he drew his face back.

"You're an idiot, Steve Rogers," Natasha told him when he couldn't seem to figure out why she'd smacked him.

"She thinks you shouldn't have agreed with me when I said I look like a scarecrow. But I don't care. It's true," Estrella shrugged.

"No. Scarecrows are rough and gawky. Your lines are better. I like the way they flow, and the angles," Steve said.

He was looking at her again, like before. She could see his fingers try to move against the shirt. He really wanted to put her in his sketchbook with Bucky. Again, Estrella didn't feel worthy. Bucky was something special, even if he was an uncaring asshole. Bucky meant something to him.

"Are we done yet?" Steve asked Natasha.

"I don't know. Stand up," Nat told him.

Steve stood and Natasha moved around him, turning him so she could use the light from the window wall to look for any hairs she'd missed. She turned the clippers back on and touched up a few spots. Steve bent and moved how she wanted him to. Estrella got up carefully and stepped away. There was too much skin.

Steve shook his head like a dog, and brushed his fingers briskly over his prickly-shorn head. Natasha used his shirt to slap cut hair off his shoulders. Then, she turned the clippers back on and made a swipe at his side near his armpit.

"Ow. What was that for?" Steve asked.

"The stitches. You missed one when you were taking them out," Nat said. She had used the clipper blades to snip the string, then to tug it free from his skin.

Steve nodded and snapped out his shirt sharply a few times. He pulled it on over his head, then worked his arms and shoulders into it and tugged it down. Estrella wondered how watching him put on a shirt was nearly as uncomfortable as watching him take it off had been.

"If you wait here, I'll go get my sketchbook. Or, uh, you could go on down and I'll join you in the lobby. We could go to the coffee shop," Steve suggested hopefully.

The idea sounded wonderful to Estrella, but…

"Don't you want to see what you look like?" she asked him. He looked very different. She hadn't expected how much he would change. Natasha was putting away the clippers, but she was looking at him smugly, too. She thought the short buzz looked good on him.

"Nah. I know what I look like," Steve said.
"No, you need to see. People are going to stare some more and you need to see why," Estrella said.

She looked around for a door that could be a bathroom with a mirror. Natasha pointed her to the mirror behind the bar instead. She nodded her thanks to Nat and grabbed Steve's hand. She tugged him over to the mirror and made him look.

A sparkle caught her eyes and she looked further down the mirror to her own reflection. In the golden light behind the bar, her necklace's reflection was winking at her. She leaned closer too, and really looked at it for the first time.

"What is…?" she asked absently.

Then she was pulling the necklace from her throat. It tugged, then her fingers worked the clasp successfully. Steve distracted her by pressing a finger to her lips briefly as she put the butterfly in good light to look at it.

Soon as she realized she'd taken the necklace off in a room of four men, including Bruce, she froze still. Steve saw her realization and crossed his arms patiently. He pressed a finger to his own lips to remind her while she looked at the necklace.

It was too sparkly, too lustrous. Heavy. She turned it over and tugged some slack in the velvet choker band until she could see the silvery metal of the back side. There. There were stamp marks in the metal. She moved it closer to her face, but she didn't have a magnification lens.

Steve took it from her and read the markings out loud.

Estrella gasped. Steve quickly reached to press a finger to her lips again.

He didn't know why, but she was angry. Very angry. She took the necklace from him and put it back on.

Quick as she could stomp with any dignity, she went over to Tony.

"Are you crazy?! I can't take this! It's as expensive as, like, a car! Or a house!" Estrella exclaimed while she stood in front of Tony.

"Not as expensive as any house or car I would have. So, there." Tony said as if that settled it.

"I can never repay this! I can't take it," Estrella said. She started taking off the necklace again. In her hurry, her fingers fumbled. She couldn't get it, and her hands were trembling.

She felt heat along her back, and large fingers touched her nape, brushing her ineffective hands away. It was Steve, trying to help her. A large man at her back, and Tony Stark sprawled, smirking, in front of her.

She gulped in a breath and tried to hold it, but then let it out in a whine. Tony looked down at his phone at the same time that Jarvis and Sam spoke.

"Sir, if you would-"

"Hey, Tony, come over here," Sam said from the kitchen.

"Steve, give her some space," Natasha said.

"I'm just gonna go," Bruce said quietly.
Bruce got up to leave, but as soon as Steve stepped away, Estrella ran to the elevator. She got in it and was gone as quick as Jarvis could get her away. Steve stepped to follow her, but Nat got in front of him and pressed her hands to his chest.

"Nat, she's upset," Steve said. He leaned forward into her hands, just to have something solid to press against.

"And you would make it worse," Tony said, "Jarvis, when should we be concerned about what her heart is doing?"

"I am already concerned. If she doesn't start to calm in twenty seconds, I'll bring Doctor Kalfey," Jarvis told them.

Tony watched his phone and the little fluttering blips that were being transmitted from her wrist monitor. They watched as his lips silently counted down.

"I can't visually determine, Jarvis," Tony said.

"She is calming slightly, but this upset will keep her heart rhythm irregular for several minutes, possibly up to an hour. I will observe her," Jarvis said.

Steve squeezed his eyes closed and breathed through his mouth. Nat watched his heart thump at the vein in his throat. He was very worried about Estrella.

"We shouldn't have taken her from medical," he murmured.

"Keeping her trapped there alone would have upset her, too," Natasha attempted to soothe him.

"Steve, you should-" Bruce began.

"No, Bruce. I'm not doing that to her," Steve denied.

"I know there have been a lot of failures and twisted outcomes, but Bruce and I have had plenty of time to work on-" Tony said in a sensible tone which he hoped Steve might listen to.

"I said no," Steve enunciated firmly.

"I should go to her," Natasha said.

"No. Give her some quiet. This has been too much and she's overwhelmed. Jarvis, where is she? What's she doing?" Steve asked.

"Miss is in the guest room assigned to her in Miss Romanova's suite. She has removed the device and is sitting in the corner, facing the door. Should I attempt to speak to her?" Jarvis asked.

"Tell her I said that I'm an idiot and I'm sorry. That I'll try real hard not to crowd her like that again," Steve said.

"Very well," Jarvis said.

"Tell her I need help in the data entry department. If she wants the job, we can work out payment arrangements from her salary," Tony said.

Tony cursed under his breath, then stood up to go fix himself a drink at the bar.

"Why can't she just accept a gift? I was happy to make it for her. I blow more cash on a house party and I don't lose any sleep over it," Tony clunked down the decanter, replaced its stopper, and tossed the scotch back.

"She's not like you, Tony. Resources matter to her. In her life, everything is judged by whether she can afford it. Or by whether any action would put her into debt to someone which she would then be expected to repay with her body. She can't accept something so expensive as if it was a thrift store trinket. She feels like you're buying her. Like a slave," Nat said.

Tony was silent. He poured himself another drink.

"Guys, you're the best. I know you want to help. But it's too much," Nat told them.

"So I should have paper clipped the modulator to a plastic My Little Pony necklace from Walgreen's?" Tony said sarcastically.

"That would have been better," Nat agreed. Steve was relaxing into strategy mode instead of action mode, so she eased the resistance of her arms from him and he stepped back.

"I have to fix this," Steve said.

"Jarvis, tell her that if she gives the necklace to Nat, I can re-do it myself. Tony can return the butterfly and she won't owe him except for the time he spent on the modulator. Tony, what's the labor charge?" Steve asked.

"Two and a half hours, mostly waiting for the courier," Bruce answered.

"So, a half hour of our time, Bruce and I. That works out to just about as much as the butterfly is worth. But she doesn't know that. Tell her three hundred dollars. That should keep her around here long enough for us to convince you to let us fix up her heart, Cap," Tony said.

Steve knew that Tony was feeling snippy with him when he called him Cap while they were off-duty.

"That is an entirely different issue. Detach and reevaluate," Steve ordered. If Tony was going to talk to Cap, then he'd get the Cap.

"Two ninety-five, or nothing. I'd rather the nothing," Tony said. Bruce nodded. The girl should be charging Tony for the fun he'd been having while they were making her necklace.

"Sir, Miss says she will accept the data entry position, but only if you pay her in cash and bill her medical care to Captain Rogers," Jarvis responded.

"She's angry and she wants to punish me for bringing her into this," Steve said. He was smiling. They all knew that self-sacrifice was one of his favorite pastimes.

"How is her heart, Jarvis?" Steve asked.

"She is calming, but continuing irregularities can be expected," Jarvis told them.

The elevator opened in the hallway. Natasha went to see why, because nobody had stepped out. Estrella's necklace was lying on the floor of the elevator. She brought it to Steve.

"Can you get the working part off of this and reattach it to copper?" Steve asked Bruce.
"Sure. In about five minutes," Bruce said.

He’d never worked with copper, but he’d worked with cutting torches in the field many times. Artistic intuition guided him, and he used the most basic of Tony's shop tools.

Peggy had been the keeper of his old mementos. The first time he'd visited her, her mind had been more solid than it was now. She’d called a niece and had two boxes delivered to him. Among the things in the boxes was an old cap gun, toy bandolier straps, and a little copper sheriff’s badge that he’d spent hours playing with when he was a kid.

Steve hammered out the copper badge. When he judged that it was the right size, he used a pair of metal snips and took his time cutting and rounding the shape of a butterfly. He liked the shape because it was a metaphor of what he wanted to see happen to his friend. What he hoped he would see, anyway. The end result was up to her.

He used awls and screwdrivers, punches and any odd shaped tool he could find to embellish the butterfly's wings. To the back, he added the flat eyelet which would rest against her throat and to which Bruce would attach the small, flat frequency modulator device which Tony had made. Steve filed it smooth and beat the butterfly shape until it matched the degree of curvature his artist's eye remembered seeing at the hollow of her throat. Then he used the torch to smooth the file marks and burnish the rough cut edges to a beaded finish which felt nice to his sensitive skin. He very much liked the rainbow hues the torch had made on the metal, and the bright and brown tones of the copper itself.

Bruce showed him where the special lacquer was that Tony used to coat the paint of his Iron Man suits. Steve applied a coat of it to keep the copper from dulling and losing its bright colors. Next, Bruce took a turn attaching the modulator to the back and he smoothed the metal to Steve's satisfaction. He re-checked its function with Jarvis' help to make sure that the transfer hadn't harmed it.

Lastly, Steve got his recently decommissioned uniform jacket which had been damaged beyond repair on his last mission. The dusty deep blue color would contrast the copper of the butterfly nicely. He cut an already tattered strip from where the jacket had been shredded against his side by the concrete chips. He’d put it through the wash in his suite, so at least the blood stains didn't show on the front of the remade choker necklace. He couldn't think of how to clasp the choker shut without using anything fancy or store bought, so he used one of his old Boy Scout slip knots. He could teach her how to tie it.

Steve held the finished device in his hand under the work light he'd been using. It wasn't nearly as intricate as he felt her personality could be, and it wasn't as rough as her life had been, but it was colorful, useful, and it had history. And it hadn't cost him a dime. Just a little time to create it, which he had thoroughly enjoyed.
Chapter 12

Author's note: This is a short one, but it was dying to come out, so here it is and now I can sleep. This story is eating my life, but it's so fun to write. I'll be posting about a chapter every other day, it looks like. As of today (Monday June 22), this website is now caught up with the other website I've posted it on. The rest is still in my head, but my head needs sleep.

He had to get out of the tower. Even after a run, he still had restless energy. He’d pushed hard in the training room, finished all the required reports that were due and a few which weren’t due yet. He’d met with Hill and been briefed on everything in the works. Things were relatively quiet globally, and they were having a hard time getting a location on their next Hydra hit.

Steve barely slowed down at the end of his run until he was on the sidewalk with other people. He was thankful that the Avengers were getting a little time to rest, but the respite made him suspicious that they were overlooking something. He’d had that feeling before, and sometimes that’s all it was. A feeling.

Sam told him it was common for combat veterans to find themselves missing the excitement, the adrenaline of active duty. So many veterans had problems adjusting to daily civilian life. Steve figured he was probably feeling a touch of that, because since the day he’d received the serum until he’d gone into the ice, he’d been busy. Since the ice, he’d stayed pretty active even though his headquarters was stateside and he was surrounded by civilians most of the time.

He still wanted to go to the coffee shop with Estrella and maybe try drawing her, but she needed time. He’d sent the remade butterfly choker to her through Nat and Natasha said she’d been pleased, but quiet. Doctor Kalfey and Sam both advised that they all give her a few days to simply rest, eat, and think. Steve had bought her a pack of new pencils and another Sudoku book and some other puzzle books so that she’d have something quiet and calm to do when she didn’t feel like watching TV at Nat’s.

He was on his way now to the library to hopefully find her some reading material. He used his towel to wipe the slight mist of sweat from his face.

Estrella had been right about the haircut. Lots of people still knew who he was, but he was getting more of the looks that meant folks thought he looked familiar, but couldn’t quite place him in their memory. When those people figured out who he was, he’d usually moved on by then. A few had commented on his hair, both of them expressing regret and that he ‘just didn’t look the same.’

Steve grunted to himself at the irony. Other people changed their hair all the time, and that was alright with everyone. For some reason, folks expected him to never, ever change the image of their hero. Just for that, he wanted to grow a beard, too. It would likely look very weird with his helmet, but screw them, he thought. They thought they owned him, down to the hairs on his head. It would be funny to see their reactions if he got piercings and tattoos, but that was going too far, just for the sake of messing with folks.

He moved briskly through the mid-morning pedestrians. He was into the outdoor mall, and he’d already pulled the library door open when he heard the voices of many small children. Crap. It was Tuesday morning. The kids were here for story time and one of them had already turned to look at who was coming into the foyer.

Little Jamal looked at him once, looked away to make sure he was following the person in front of him in line, then whipped his head back to look again. It was too late. Steve had already opened the door and stepped halfway inside, so he continued his motion and hoped that he didn’t draw too much attention. Sitting in on story time would be awkward in his sweaty running gear, but he wouldn’t want to disappoint the kids by refusing if Jamal called their attention to him.

Jamal stared. Then his eyes widened and he smiled. His mouth was about to open and exclaim about Captain America, but Steve winked at him, made a shush motion with his finger at his lips, and shook his head. He’d found that it worked pretty well with some kids.

Jamal kept his quiet, but he looked bottled up with excitement. Steve crossed his arms and stared down at his feet, hoping he’d look like any regular man in sweatpants who happened to be stopping in at the library.

Wanda gruffly hurried the kids along to the reading room. Jamal looked back at him while the line of students moved away and Steve repeated the shush gesture and added a secretive smile. Jamal looked happy to have a secret, but he likely wouldn’t stay mum for long.

“Thanks for that,” he told Wanda when they were alone again in the foyer.

“Mmm-hmm. How is she?”

Wanda cut right to business and he didn’t blame her. Steve felt delinquent for letting things go for four days before he came to tell her anything. He could have called the library and asked to speak to her, but it felt like a conversation he should have in person.

“She’s better, but her heart is weak. I’m so grateful that you were able to see her and help when she needed it. I hate to think of what could have happened if you hadn’t been there,” Steve said.

“What are you going to do with her now?” Wanda asked.

Steve was growing accustomed to Wanda’s faintly insulting ways. Maybe she didn’t mean things the way they sounded, but even if she did, Steve had dealt with far ruder people. He could handle a library security guard.

“Do with her? Nothing for now. She needs to rest and eat. When she’s stronger, she can do whatever she wants. She’s stubborn and I’m focusing on getting her to eat, for now. Oh, and I came by to find her something to read. Eating and sleeping can get pretty boring,” Steve said.

Wanda didn’t get all chummy and conversational, but she brought three paperback books up from somewhere below her desk.

“These are new arrivals. Her favorite authors,” she said. She pushed the books at him across her desk.

Steve bit his tongue. The woman didn’t like him, but he liked her. He wanted to give her another big ‘thank you’ and it warmed his heart that someone else was thinking about Estrella. Wanda didn’t look like she’d appreciate him gushing complimentary.

“That means a lot. She’ll enjoy them,” Steve said.

Wanda nodded. Steve picked up the new paperbacks. He wanted to brush his thumb across the page edges and smell them because he loved new books, but now was not the time. With only the smallest of smiles for Wanda, he moved to take the books inside so he could check them out.

“I already checked them on my card. You better go before Jamal pops,” Wanda said.

Steve hesitated by her desk. She was a sweet lady in a tough wrapper, and he could hug her for-

“You try to hug me and I’ll black your eye,” she said with a good deal of attitude.

Steve did his best to channel Natasha and keep a cool face. He nodded and stepped away from her desk, then continued on toward the door. When he looked back as he was leaving, he thought he saw a hint of a smile.

His step was more at ease as he moved toward home, but he realized he wasn’t feeling ready to shut himself inside the building again yet. It was a great day, golden and dry again, with enough breeze that he could feel it moving on his exposed scalp.

He went back toward the park, not to run this time, but to walk and think and give himself more time to soak the sunlight into his skin. He always felt like he was being watched in the city, but as he went back into the park with Estrella’s books in his hand, the feeling intensified. He paused to drink from a fountain to give himself time to look around. He didn’t see anyone who might be causing the crawly feeling between his shoulders, but he knew he was being watched. Intently. Not casually.

As he walked along, loose and relaxed, the feeling didn’t fade. It started to bother him, but a tiny thought was wiggling to the surface, trying to make him hope again. He walked on, and took a side path off the paved one. He moved into a more densely vegetated area of the park where most of the joggers and dog walkers didn’t go.

Something stung the back of his neck, just above where his towel rested. A pebble bounced away into the grass. Steve forced himself to walk on as if nothing had happened, though his heart leapt into a faster beat and he wanted to close his eyes and remember summer days in Brooklyn.

Only a few steps farther, and another pebble stung him hard, on exactly the same spot where the last one had hit. Steve’s limbs set up a fine tremble which he hoped didn’t show. It was hard to breathe normally. Harder to keep a straight face. Kids could be messing with him. Unnaturally quiet kids with lucky aim. Twice could be a far-fetched coincidence, but-

A third pebble stung him harder still, in the exact same spot. Steve allowed himself to stop walking. There was nobody around that he could see to his sides or ahead, just trees and grass. Hope surged painfully inside him. The same hope that had been disappointed time and again. If it wasn’t-“Quit runnin’ away, ya dumb punk. I’m running outa rocks,” came a voice from behind him.

The books fell from Steve’s hand. There was only one voice like that, one voice that matched the face he so wanted to see. Steve’s throat gulped shut, but he forced himself to resume breathing as he turned around.

There he was. In working man’s clothes, Buck stood in the grass about twenty feet away.

Steve could only breathe. He’d thought that when he’d found Bucky, he’d have to fight him, maybe drug him, extract him from whatever deep op he was on, and fly him home for months of rehabilitation.
But it wasn’t the Winter Soldier watching him with a smart-Alek grin. It was Buck. It was Buck who used to pelt him with pebbles before they’d become childhood friends. Steve was sure it was the Winter Soldier’s power and accuracy which had made them sting so much, but the sentiment was all Barnes.

“Hey, don’t blame me for that. I didn’t even touch your books this time,” Buck said with a quick glance down at the dropped books.

His words were street-wise and a blatant attempt at provocation, but that was familiar too. In Buck’s eyes was the awareness that Steve was choked up, and the patience to wait him out until he got over it. The same patience Buck had always had when Steve was winded and couldn’t keep up.

Steve’s mind whirred tactically as Bucky kept his hands loose at his sides and strolled toward him. His senses checked around for any hint of ambush, the smell of fuel or munitions, any wayward click or hiss or radio chatter. There was nothing but birds and breeze.

The only likely threat would be from the man, himself. Steve’s eyes assessed him for concealed weapons before Buck got any closer. He was being given time to do so, he knew. It appeared that the only things Buck had with him were his worn leather work boots, dark blue Dickies, and a long sleeve shirt. He wore one brown leather work glove and held the other in his left hand. His face had a rough beard and his hair was scraggly, but that was the same as the last time he’d seen him.

Buck walked close, up into his space, and stood almost toe to toe with him.

“Has that girl infected you or something? I used to could never get you to shut up,” he said.

“Buck,” was all Steve could get out. He stood ready, his training not letting him be completely open to attack, but Buck likely could stab him at least once if he wanted to.

Part of him felt like he was lifting his arms to hug a high voltage power line, but the other part of him didn’t care if he got stung. He roughly clapped Bucky into a hug, and then Buck was hugging him back. The metal arm was solid around him, but so was the other one. It felt wrong, wrong, wrong to put himself into the grip of an enemy, but the hard-edged body against his smelled like Bucky.

They shoved away and stepped back out of each other’s space. Bucky dropped the wise-guy persona and they both grinned like kids for a moment.

“God, it’s good to see you,” Steve said fervently.

“Yeah, it’s good. I’ve been around, but it’s taken some time to get my head straight, ya know?” Buck said.

“I’ll bet. I’ve been hauling ass all over the place after you. When did you stop running?” Steve asked.

“About six weeks ago, but I wasn’t running. I still had some intel in my head and I wanted to make use of it before it faded, if it would. I don’t think it’s gonna fade after all, so I came home. I’ve been watching you and remembering. Hey, did you get the girl taken in? I haven’t seen her and neither has the Samoan guy at the coffee shop,” Buck said.

“Yeah, we have her in the tower. She’s alright. I was just gonna go get some coffee?” Steve said, leaving the offer open as if he’d bumped into a casual acquaintance. Buck seemed to want to play this on the cool side, so Steve tried hard to not act like he felt.
“Nah, I gotta go. I’m already late for work. Some punk was leading me all over the place, through the park, to the library, and back to the park again,” Buck said with a smile.

“You could have come to the tower anytime,” Steve said. Buck was already edging away from him, back toward the path.

“Not yet. I killed Stark’s folks. He’s not gonna be happy to see me in his door,” Buck said.

“Buck, wait,” Steve called.

He was learning better than to chase after him, but dammit, they’d just met again. Why’d he have to run off so soon? There was so much to say, so much to ask.

“I’ll see ya around. I’m stayin’ in the city, except when I’m not. I’ll talk at ya in a few days, Stevie,” Buck told him.

Steve stood, rooted to the grass.

“See ya,” he called to Buck’s retreating back.

Buck waved an acknowledgement with his right hand and kept walking.

It was one of the toughest things ever, to let Buck walk away without chasing him down. Steve made himself pick up the books and head home without looking around for which way Buck had gone on the main path.

A half laugh, half sob tore from his mouth as he turned his back and headed home. It was the weirdest sound he’d ever heard himself make.

By the time he was back in the tower and in the elevator on his way up, he’d decided that he wasn’t going to make his finding of Bucky official yet. Or Buck’s finding of him, really.

Buck had always been better at evading than he had. Usually Steve’s work was more straightforward. It was uncanny, how Buck had escaped his notice for several weeks and had been watching him the whole time. If Buck had meant him any harm, he could have sniped him a hundred times over.

At least for now, he’d keep quiet about Bucky. He had no real reason to. Everyone knew he’d been taking as much time as he could for he and Sam to search for him. Steve wanted a day or so to roll the events of the past few minutes around in his head in peace. He was glad that he was caught up on his work and could take the time to think. To feel.

Steve was ecstatic at seeing Buck so soon, and to see him looking so well. He’d said he was late for work. He’d looked like he was going to work. Something simple, like carpentry or construction. That meant that not only was Buck not mentally twisted up about being the Winter Soldier, he was fitting into society and stable enough to hold a job. It was a far better outcome than Steve could have hoped for. Buck had always been a rock in his life, steady and grounded. Steve was glad that that aspect of his personality had seen him through what had surely been some confusing weeks.

From talking with Sam, he knew there was no possible way that Buck could be completely unaffected by what had happened to him, but he seemed to be managing well. He said he had come home. That meant Brooklyn. He’d be around. Manhattan was out of his way, but Buck had been coming around to watch him anyway.

“Jarvis, take me to Nat’s,” he said.

The AI didn’t say anything, but the elevator doors opened on the opposite side of the box than they would have if he’d been going to his own place. Steve exited the elevator, but didn’t go to knock on Nat’s door. Instead, he walked to the window at the end of the hall between the two suites and stood to look down at the city. He set the books which Wanda had saved for Estrella on the table next to the potted plant.

“I don’t want to go in there and make her feel cornered, and I don’t want to startle her by knocking on the door. Would you please let her know that I’m here if she wants to come out?” Steve asked quietly.

“Of course, Captain,” Jarvis replied.

Steve waited. He heard the faint tones of Jarvis speaking to her in Nat’s suite. Then he heard movement. She might be coming out. He was glad that he might get to see her. He had to share his news with someone, and she was the first person he’d thought of when the desire to share manifested itself.

He knew she’d already seen Buck and knew who he was, from the day he’d shown her his sketchbook. And from whatever interactions she’d had with Buck on the street when he wasn’t around. He’d been wanting to ask her about all of it, but he didn’t want to upset her with her heart being the way it was. It didn’t matter so much now that he’d seen Bucky himself.

The door to Nat’s suite opened, and Steve waited a moment to turn toward her. He was pretty sure that he’d seen enough of Estrella’s trigger moments that he could behave himself adequately.

Her footsteps were quiet on the carpet, but he heard her moving anyway. When she was in his peripheral view as he stood at the window, he turned to face her.

“Hi,” he said, and he couldn’t hold back the smile anymore.

Estrella was glad to see him in his morning workout attire. It was how she’d first gotten to know him, and it helped her to see him, not just the large man she was intentionally walking toward in an empty space.

“Hi,” she answered, a tiny bit above a whisper.

The necklace he’d made her was at her throat, the copper still warming to match her skin. She’d just put it on when Jarvis told her he was out here. She was in sweats too, feeling comfortable and slouchy. Her bare toes wiggled on the short carpet in the sun. She’d stopped a few feet away from him, maybe arm’s length. She didn’t want to stand far away like she was afraid. She didn’t want to hurt his feelings anymore.

Her eyes went first to look at how his hair was different, but the odd, almost giddy joy on his face caught her attention. Something good had happened.

“What?” she wondered.

If Steve wanted to keep his secret for even an hour, he couldn’t say anything directly to her. He let his smile spread across his face. He looked down at the city pointedly for an instant, then back at her. She was smart. He hoped she’d figure it out.
Estrella stepped closer to the window. The view was the same as from Nat’s living room. Streets, buildings. And a few blocks away, the green space of the park. Steve was in his running shoes. With grass on them. He’d been in the park, just now.

His grin was goofy big, and his eyes were trying to tell her something. He bounced twice on the balls of his feet, his heels lifting off the carpet a fraction of an inch. Yeah, he was happy like a kid at Christmas, not a hint of his usual frustrations on his face.

His arms were crossed, and his fingers tapped restlessly at his left arm, as if he was listening to music. He wasn’t.

Left arm, left arm…? Oh!

Estrella crossed her own arms and rubbed her right hand along her left upper arm. A smile bloomed on her face too, seeing how happy Steve was. He’d found his friend. He saw her hand movement and nodded once, sharply.

His mouth opened slightly, then closed again, still smiling. He wanted to tell her things, but Bucky was a secret for now. She tilted her head to the side a little and shared in his happiness. She didn’t particularly like his Bucky. The man was an ass and a menace. But if he made Steve happy, then she was glad for him.

Steve bounced a few more times, then he calmed his expression into a mere curve of his lips. If they stood here in silence for too long, Jarvis was sure to think something weird was going on, if he didn’t already. If Jarvis was watching. Steve always assumed he was.

“I went to the library. Wanda was holding these for you. She said they’re new arrivals,” Steve handed her the three paperbacks.

Estrella took them and spread them to look at the titles.

“Thank you,” she said. Her fingers brushed the beads of indigo blue melted copper at the edge of her butterfly’s wings.

“You’re welcome. I’m glad to see that it works. Is it smooth enough?” Steve asked her about the fit and finish of the necklace.

“It’s beautiful. I love it. You made this? It looks like your uniform. You didn’t cut it, did you?” Estrella asked. Her fingers moved to rub along the dark blue fabric at her throat.

“Yeah, I made it. It was a lot of fun. I’ve only had time to work with pencil and paper, but I might start doing three-dimensional stuff, after that. Naw, I didn’t cut my uniform. It got shredded on the last mission and I was going to have to throw it out anyway. The copper’s from a toy I had as a kid. It was all stuff I had to go through and throw out. I’m glad to get something useful out of it,” Steve nodded at her necklace.

Estrella listened to him talk about what he’d made and what he’d used to make it with. She had not been able to accept the costly butterfly from Tony because a gift shouldn’t cost that much. She didn’t think Steve was lying about the new necklace being made from used items he’d already had, but it felt too valuable, anyway.

He’d destroyed something from his childhood for her. If his uniform had been shredded, then he’d been hurt badly. The dark, mostly washed-out stain on one end of the tattered fabric was his blood. All the detail, all the color of the butterfly had come from his mind, his hands. It was too much sacrifice on his part, but with how pleased he was to see it on her, she couldn’t take the chance of... hurting his feelings again. It still made no sense to her that Steve could care so much, but he did. She ducked her head down to hide the blush of gratitude she felt to have a friend like him.

His care and his time was worth more than expensive jewelry. So much more. She didn’t know what to do with that, but she couldn’t hurt him again. She’d have to make it up to him some other way.

“How are you feeling?” Steve asked her.

“Good. A nurse keeps bringing me food, but I can’t eat it all. Why are you people trying so hard to make me fat?” she asked him.

She didn’t mind being fat. But she’d have to go through her version of normal to get to fat, and that’s what worried her. The necklace was great, but it didn’t solve everything. If she had a job in the tower, maybe she could afford to be fat, and to buy big, ugly clothes. She was afraid of what lay between starving and fat.

“Eya, don’t play dumb like that. You know you need to eat so you can be strong again. We all want you to be healthy. It’s not about fat or skinny,” Steve told her.

Estrella wanted to tell him that fat and skinny mattered, but there was no way to do so without saying more than she wanted to. If Tony paid her cash as they’d agreed, then maybe she could get a room and share in someone’s apartment. Someone safe. As long as she had a safe place to stay, she could allow herself to eat enough to stay alive. But not too much.

She’d been thinking hard about things, these last few days. Natasha was right. She had a chance at a new life, if she was careful, and if her heart didn’t kill her. And if the men from her past didn’t find her. She felt safe in Nat’s place, with Jarvis controlling who could come up. She couldn’t stay with Natasha forever, though.

There was only so much she could worry about at once, and for now, Steve was large in her presence and in her mind. She knew she owed him, and she couldn’t even be angry about it because he was so darn nice. He wouldn’t want to be paid back, but she’d find a way.

“I’m happy for you. And thanks for the books. I want to go read now,” she said to him.

Steve nodded. He didn’t want to tire her, and he felt it was best to leave anyway. Frequently, they left each other on a bad note, but things felt good right now. It was time to go.

“Have fun. We can take a walk sometime when you’re done, and go return the books. The weather’s great out there,” Steve said.

Estrella reached out a hand, and he touched his fingertips to hers, then he left. It was so good to see him happy, with his head high and his shoulders back instead of bent down with grumpiness or worry. He smiled at her in the elevator again before the doors closed, then he was gone.

“Jarvis, does he live through there, on the other side of the elevator?” she asked.

“Yes, Miss. I wouldn’t normally make such information available, but I don’t think he’d mind that you know,” Jarvis answered.

“He knows where I am, so it’s only fair,” she said.

“As you say, Miss,” Jarvis said, a smile in his tone.
“He’s too nice. Always doing things for me, and I can’t pay him back,” Estrella complained.

“I believe Captain Rogers doesn’t know any other way to be. Attempting to change him would be futile,” Jarvis suggested.

“Jarvis, will you let me into his place while he’s not there so that he can’t stop me?” she asked.

“I’m sorry, Miss. That would be highly irregular. It is possible that the Captain wouldn’t mind your presence in his suite, but it would be best to ask him first,” Jarvis denied her gently.

“But I want to cook for him, and do the cleaning, and you know he won’t let me if I ask first!” Estrella riled against the unfairness of it all.

They were forcing her into debt and not giving her any way out. The doctor said that she wanted to observe her heart function for at least a week before she could start the job Tony had for her. And she had to try to eat like a pig in the meantime, or Natasha made scary faces at her.

“In that case, let me see what I can do. I can’t promise you anything, but if Miss Potts hears your idea and thinks it’s a good one, then I may be able to bend the rules,” Jarvis told her.

“I hope so,” Estrella said. She took her new library books into Nat’s guest room and curled up in her soft bed to read for a while. She only made it to page thirty four in the suspense novel before she fell asleep.

Jarvis turned off the light in her room and raised the temperature a few degrees, since he had no hands to cover her with a blanket.

When Steve got to his door, there was a folder lying on the floor in front of it. He bent down to pick it up. He didn’t want any paperwork right now. He wanted to go inside, fix himself something to eat, and figure out what he was going to do with Bucky.

_Read This or Else_, was written across the blank front of the folder in Tony’s pointy, swiftly scrawled handwriting.

_Please_, was added on beneath in Bruce’s more blocky letters.

The fact that they’d printed it up on real paper and put it in a folder with actual handwriting on the front told him how much they wanted him to look at the file.

Steve sighed and went inside with it. He tossed it on his bar and let it sit while he made himself a sandwich. He knew what they were trying to get him to consider. It was personal, and it involved Estrella, and he really didn’t want to hear about it.

He opened the folder anyway while he sat at the bar and ate his lunch. For her sake, he’d at least read what they had to say.
His room was cool and dark just the way he liked it, despite the glow of the sunrise starting to turn the city rosy-golden with morning light. Steve was well rested, so his body and his mind took the opportunity to play with him before he was conscious enough to put a stop to it.

The top sheet and blanket were tangled tight around him from a night of fitful sleep. He mindlessly rolled from his side onto his belly and hugged his pillow. His skin slid against the soft sheets, then he stilled. The pressure of the top sheet twisted messily around his middle trapped him from rolling over onto his other side. He settled physically, but his mind took note.

"Harder, Rogers. Faster. This move won't work if you're hesitant," Natasha instructed him.

She stood in front of him, dressed in her clingy black combat suit. It didn't make sense that she would be wearing it in the training room, but whatever. He grabbed for her elbow. She twisted away and ducked to slide between his legs and come up behind him on the mats. He spun around to try again.

He had the correct motions in his mind now, and this time when she tried to evade, he matched her speed and got a good grip on her elbow. He had to take advantage of the sliver of a second when her body wasn't blocking the loop her arm made for him to grab.

Steve gripped hard so that when she straightened her arm and used her body weight to spin away from him, she couldn't fling loose as she normally would. As a result, the momentum of her motion pulled them both along. She tried to take advantage of it to snap him free in a different direction, but he snagged the inside of her shin with his own and brought them both down hard to the mats.

He only partially kept his weight from falling on her. The breath whuffed from her and she was fighting him before he could get her in a full lockdown. Instead of trying to pin her all over, Steve knew to focus on the most dangerous parts. His forehead pressed into hers, the bones grinding together. He already had one of her hands down tight, and one of her shins pinned painfully under his.

"Faster, Nat. I've almost got you," he warned with a taunting smile. He waited until the exact right moment when he could rotate his other thigh out and pin hers. She was fighting hard, twisting and trying every angle to get at any of his soft spots or pain points, but he knew her methods and her body as well as she knew his. He matched and blocked. Knowing that he would always heal gave him the ability to partially ignore the pain she inflicted. He applied more pressure to the three points he already held and secured her other leg. Her right hand was annoying, knifing at his throat, his face, moving too fast for him to get a grip on it. He tolerated the pain of a larynx jab and started at her upper arm and forced her hand out until he had her knuckles flat against the mat.

She strained against him for only another instant. She knew when she was beat. Nat lay, panting, and waited for him to let up.

"Come on Steve, this one's over. Uncle," she said on an exhaled breath.

Steve didn't want to get up. She felt good under him. He wanted her to go on fighting him. He eased his grip so she could struggle if she wanted to. He wouldn't mind. It felt real good, with his hips almost centered on hers. The muscles of her inner thigh were soft and his exercise shorts were slick against her uniform.

"What are you doing, Rogers?" she asked him.

Steve answered her by fully aligning their hips. She couldn't miss what he was doing now. He shifted his forehead against hers so that they were staring at each other. He dared her to deny that she was interested.

"Is this what you want, Sweety?" Nat asked him.

She changed the angle of her hips so that he was cradled perfectly where he wanted to be, just the thin layers of their clothes between them. There. He could feel the heat of her. Her lips quirked up at the corners.

She'd asked him a stupid question. Of course it's what he wanted. It's all he could think about. For months, for years, it had been what he wanted. He'd had enough of her teasing. He kept her pinned and moved against her.

"Steve. Sweety, come on, you know you don't want to do this. Let us up and you can go take care of it somewhere else," she tried to tell him.

"Shut up, Nat. Shut up and take it," he growled at her.

It felt too good to stop. His subtle movements became stronger. The warm pressure gave him something to push against. Nat gave up resisting him passively like a responsible friend would do. She knew he wanted a fight, so she gave him one.

Her thighs fought against the outside of his, trying to squeeze him away and dislodge him. She tried to twist her hips aside under his weight, but he followed her every move. It was deeply satisfying to chase what he wanted. It gave him justification to push harder, to pursue. She struggled randomly, but as he sought and pushed, her twisting and evasion began to match his pattern. The jolts of pressure and friction against him became predictable and he could chase them, anticipate them.

"You found what you want?" she asked him, taunting.

He was tired of her taunting, displaying what he shouldn't have, teasing and torturing him. He gripped her hands tighter and rolled into the pressure. There. It was right there and it was hot and soft and he was going to take it.

Steve woke up straining against the twisted sheet, gripping the pillow. His mind became aware of what was happening and he went with it gladly. Relief. Ah, God! Sweet relief. He breathed through it, trying guiltily to banish thoughts of Nat. It was what any woman had that he wanted, he knew, not Nat's in particular. She was simply the most familiar to him, the easiest for his mind to fabricate a dream about.

Before his breathing slowed, he was already handling the mess. The sheets and his boxers went into the wash. He took himself to the shower, both pleased and ashamed. This was one he wouldn't have to mention in confession because he hadn't done it intentionally. It was the subject matter that bothered him. Why had it been so exciting to pin her and use her like that? It was wrong, and he mentally chastised himself for the wayward dream.

Steve hurried in the shower before the troublesome thoughts could excite him again. The problem with having an enhanced body was that his stamina and his recovery times were such that a moment of relief was only that. A moment. He felt good for right now, but it would be back sooner than he wanted. He'd learned to live with it years ago, but it was becoming harder to handle lately.

He chastised himself one more time, then hurried to get dressed for the day.

"What makes you think we can do this without changing her in some other unpredictable way? Every trial in history has ended poorly, with some unforeseen side effect." Steve questioned Tony.

He'd found Stark in his lab, at work on something to do with a quinjet modification.

"If you had bothered to read the whole file, you'd know that the last experiments were over twenty years ago. Processing power has increased exponentially since then. Bruce and I have been able to find the reason each of the other experiments failed. It was a matter of their inability to accurately forecast cellular interactions which caused the side effects. Bruce is over ninety percent certain now how his own trial went wrong. If he could do it again today, we wouldn't have the big green guy. There's something to be said for the benefits of trial and error," Tony told him.

He spun around in his chair and twirled a wooden drumstick in his hand. Steve figured that he kept random objects around while he was working so that his hands could stay busy fiddling with something while his mind worked.

"I get that. It's the ten percent that's the problem. Would you play Russian roulette with Pepper and those odds?" Steve challenged.

Tony stilled and stared off into the middle distance.

"Right. So, what percentage makes us all comfortable? We're never going to reach zero risk, Steve. Even an appendectomy runs a risk of adverse consequences. It's her heart. She needs it. At some point, the risk of the procedure becomes less than the risk of letting her go on as she is," Tony reasoned with him.

"Let me know when you are honestly ninety-five percent certain that we can fix her heart without messing up anything else," Steve said.

"There's more to it than her heart. Her liver and her bones are also damaged," Tony said.

"She's not going to die from her liver and her bones. Focus on what we can do for her heart and leave the rest alone. The less invasive we are, the better," Steve said.

Tony wanted to argue for more health benefits for the girl, but time had increased his wisdom. Steve was right. With proper care, her bones and her liver would improve slowly on their own.
"I'll tell you when," Tony said.

Steve nodded, and was about to leave the lab.

He turned back and opened his mouth to ask Tony a question of a more personal nature.

Tony waited, looking interested.

Steve changed his mind. Anything Tony said was likely to be flippant at the least, with patronizing and belittling being the most probable attitudes.

"Never mind. Thanks, Tony. I appreciate what you and Bruce have done for her. I truly do. Is she doing well at the job?" Steve asked.

"How should I know? I'm R and D, not personnel. I don't care if she's good at the job. She needs it, so she gets it. You want me to fire her if she doesn't pass a performance eval.?" Tony asked.

Steve smiled and shook his head. He nodded a goodbye to Tony, who spun around in his chair again before facing his work station.

Estrella met him for lunch at the café on the ground floor of the tower. There was a view of the street outside. The nice weather had gone on break to give them rain today. Steve sat down with his steak and fries. Estrella carried her own lunch tray of potato soup and flaky, golden rolls.

They sat and he marveled at how different she was from the huddled, bundled scruffy girl he'd first met. First, it was great to see her finally eating solid food. She wore loose-fit jeans and a roomy, thick sweater. Stark Industries had almost no dress code for its employees, and Estrella worked on a company laptop from Nat's suite, anyway.

Her hair was growing in thick and black, though none of it was longer than a quarter inch. The choker at her throat looked casual, like a vintage thrift store find, instead of a piece of Stark technology. She was still incredibly thin and frail looking, but she wasn't skeletal anymore.

Estrella threw her second roll at his face so he would stop looking at her like that.

"Quit looking at me and eat your steak, you hog. You didn't even run today. How can you eat so much?" she asked him.

He'd caught the roll in midair, so he handed it back to her. She bit it and chewed.

"Metabolism. I need the food whether I work out or not. How do you like the job?" he asked her, then put a bite of steak and some potato in his mouth.

"I love it. It gets kind of boring, now that I know what to do, but I can listen to music while I work. I can't believe they pay people for data entry. Typing is so easy," Estrella said.

He focused on his lunch to encourage her to do the same. She ate most of what was in her soup bowl and she only left half a roll uneaten. Steve's plate was clean long before hers was.

Estrella rubbed her finger round and round on the smooth surface of her heart monitor, which was hidden by her sleeve. The rain came down on the other side of the glass near their table, casting everything in an even, gray light. A minute stretched into two, and his silent presence became both calming and annoying somehow.
"I still want to draw you," Steve told her.

"Why?" she asked.

His scrutiny made her uneasy. Steve simply looking at her while they talked was fine. But when he wanted to draw, his eyes became more searching and critical. She got the feeling he was seeing things she didn't notice when she looked in the mirror.

"I don't know. It's subjective. Something in the lines, like I said the day Nat cut our hair. I don't want you to model for me, per se. I can draw you without you being there, like my sketches of Buck. Maybe I'm asking your permission to put you down on paper," Steve said.

His eyes still travelled over her face and neck, the shape of her head. She didn't like it. She was still skinny and bony and already he was looking. It worried her.

"Okay, you can draw me. But quit staring," she frowned at him. She threw the last half of her roll at him. He moved his head slightly and caught it with his mouth. With a little maneuvering of his lips and teeth, he ate it hands-free.

"Steve, you're such a freak. And a pig. Piggy, piggy, piggy," she picked at him with a sing-song voice and a smile. He grinned around his mouthful. It made him happy that she could talk to him freely. He liked to hear her soft, pretty voice, even if she was ribbing him about something.

Her black eyelashes and brows seemed to be fuller, framing her expressive eyes. It was a sign of returning health to him and he was glad to see it. It was strange how his concern about her wellbeing wasn't the same kind of worry and weighty responsibility that his work as an Avenger gave him. His responsibilities from work felt like a weight he pulled around behind him. Concern about her felt like something he carried in his arms. It was more personal and it felt better. Warmer.

"Are you growing a beard?" she asked, to maybe make him quit staring at her.

Steve rubbed at his chin and the hairs that he'd allowed to remain there. It had been five days since he'd shaved, and it was thick enough that he'd trimmed the edges of it already to keep it neat.

"I must not be doing a good job of it if you have to ask," he said. He rubbed his jaw and propped his face in his hand, his elbow on the table.

"No, no, it's good, but doesn't it look funny with the uniform?" she asked him. Then, she felt bad for questioning his grooming. She hoped he wouldn't take it as criticism.

"Probably. I don't know. I'm not sure I care. We haven't been called out in over a week. There was a mission in line, but a pre-mission recon flight showed that the target has already been hit by someone else. So, intel is trying to figure out who else is out there on the field with us. The beard might grow a little more before I suit up to see how it looks together," he said.

Steve was as relaxed as she'd ever seen him, lazing across the table from her looking like he could fall asleep propped on his hand. His short, dark blonde hair was the same color on his head and on his face. It set off his steely blue eyes in a way that his lighter, longer hair had not. His lips were pretty. She looked down at her lap and fiddled with the wrinkles of her gray sweater.

"The Beard?" she asked, belatedly calling him on how he'd described his new feature.

"Hah! Sure, I guess. The Beard," Steve said low and dramatic like a radio personality.

Estrella laughed, and Steve smiled to see her so happy.
"You've got to make a comic strip about The Beard. I want to see it! Adventures of The Beard. You could have titles like The Beard and the Pizza Promenade. The Beard and Entanglements with Fuzzy Sweater. The Beard in Bubble Gum Attacks!" she imagined.

Steve laughed too. She was delightful and he wondered how many of her thoughts he'd missed in the time he'd known her because she hadn't been able to talk. As soon as he had time, he'd draw the comics for her. She was probably joking, but it might be fun.

"The Beard and Candy Apple Surprise," Steve added to the list.

"Exactly!" Estrella chuckled, "Have you ever grown one before?"

"No. In ninety-four years, I can't say that I have. That's pretty impressive, especially since I didn't shave for seventy years. What a missed opportunity," he joked.

Estrella's smile faded. Everybody knew he'd been frozen. Now that she knew him personally, the thought of him cold and still, so suspended that his hair didn't even grow, was horrible to her. He was so alive, so energetic. It was dismal to imagine.

"Steve, in all those years, were you aware at all?" she asked, back to using her whisper. She didn't trust her voice to be steady. It was sad enough to cry over, but she didn't want to appear weepy and sentimental.

"Only at first. I'd promised my girl a dance. I knew I was going to miss it and that she was going to be feeling low. She'd be worried about me. Until I lost consciousness, I thought about what I would say to her, what I would do to make up for it. All I remember is the first few hours," Steve said.

He didn't know why he was telling Estrella. He hadn't told anyone else what it had been like. There had been pain, too, as the water sucked the heat from his body. His enhancements had kept trying to warm him, dragging the process out for hours. He'd drifted at the edge of awareness, with the crushing ache of the cold gnawing at his bones. It was a toss-up as to which had been worse, the cold or the grief of knowing that minute by minute, he was losing Peggy.

"I'm so sorry you went through that," she said.

Estrella reached across the table and took up his other hand which was lying there idle. With both hands, she pulled his across and pressed the backs of his fingers to her cheek. She wanted to press warmth into him, to know that he was warm enough. She couldn't do anything about the girl, but warmth was important. She knew that now.

Her efforts to comfort him reminded him that she had her own sorrows, her own painful past. Maybe she was kind to him because she felt the ache of the past, too. They both moved on and lived in the present, but every now and then the past caught up to them and refreshed the memories. It still hurt. He remembered the cold, and the lost opportunity. But with someone to share it, the burden was eased somehow. He hoped she'd let him help her when it was her turn.

The fact that she was touching him and had sought him out to do so gave him hope for her recovery. He still wanted to know what had happened to her, and to do what he could to make it better. Steve knew that it might not be possible to do anything about her past, just as it was impossible to do anything about his. But he could try, if she would let him.

"I know that I'm not the only one, Eya. Painful things happened to you, too. I wish they hadn't. I can't change the past any more than you can, but I might be able to help you heal. Tony and Bruce tell me that we might be able to fix your heart. It's risky, and I don't know that it's worth the risk,"
"What do you mean? The doctor said it can't be fixed," Estrella said.

She let his hand drop from her face, but she curled her fingers into his palm when it rested on the table.

Steve looked around the café. There was no one around because it was after the lunch rush. Only Jarvis would hear, and he already knew.

"My blood. Bruce says we can isolate part of my blood so that you don't get the full effect. With a process he and Tony have developed, we can enable your heart to heal, to rebuild from the damage that was done," Steve told her.

"What's with your blood? I wouldn't become a super-soldier, would I? I don't want to be changed like that," Estrella said.

Steve smiled at her honesty. She made his serum enhancements sound like a communicable disease.

"That's the risky part. Since the beginning, people have been after my blood, a new version of the serum, my DNA, anything that would allow them to recreate the super-soldier program. They want to weaponize humans to fight their ego-battles for them. All of them for the wrong reasons. I told Tony that until they're sure that the risk of unintended side effects is very minimal, I won't consider it. I know you wouldn't want to be changed," he explained.

Estrella nodded. It sounded farfetched to her that they could force her heart muscles to rebuild, but then she looked at all the muscles on him. Maybe it wouldn't be so difficult. It seemed that strength had been a primary effect of Steve's enhancement. Maybe it was possible. She knew Tony Stark's devices and his problem-solving ability was phenomenal.

"I'll think about it. But you can tell Tony that if he turns me into a super-woman, I'll use my powers to beat him up. I don't want to be super human," she said.

The thought of being enhanced like Steve, along with her other freakish abilities, made her squirmingly uncomfortable. Life was hard enough already.

"I know. I'll tell him," Steve assured her.

She'd never said as much, but he'd somehow known that she wouldn't want to be enhanced. It was more her style to hide, to escape notice, to be meek until she couldn't. He admired that she was accepting of her frailty. It was a sign of maturity that she could take her reality as it was rather than always hankering after the next thing dangled in front of her, like so many people did.

Estrella let go of his fingers and he slid his hand back to rest on his side of the table. Now that they'd spoken of everything they should and then some, his eyes went back to studying her again. He liked the way the orbit of her eye met her temple. The way her cheekbones curved to meet the contours of her ears.

"Go away," she told him.

She'd said it to him many times on the street, when he'd been pestering her to take care of herself. This time, instead of with a cranky attitude or a pained headache, she said it with a tolerant little smile at him. She knew he wasn't trying to be a pervert. His gaze on her was artistic and contemplative. Still, it made her uneasy. It made her think about the future, and she wanted to hold
"Go," she urged him, and pushed his arm out from under his face.

"Alright, alright," Steve grinned.

He cleared away his lunch things and left her alone. It sure was nice to leave her with the both of them happy lately. It made him hopeful that she'd tolerate his company one more time.

Sam already had pretty good fighting skills, though his main offense was with firearms. Steve wanted him better, wanted him as good as he could be. For what they did, Sam needed everything he could bring to a fight. It had been proven that the wings wouldn't always be there to keep him above the action.

"Again," he told Sam.

Sam came at him with a series of punches and kicks designed to get an opponent off balance and open them up for a killing blow. Steve moved as a normal human combatant should in reaction, not how he would if Sam was actually attacking him. Sam came to the opportune moment and took it. Steve fell from the blow and rolled onto the mats smiling. Sam was strong and fast, already so much better than most of the enemies they'd be facing.

"Better. Much better. Again," he said.

Steve got up and had Sam work through it again, and again. As Sam improved, Steve threw him random surprises. He caught on quickly and soon kept his balance more even and broadened his attention to watch all of Steve, not just the parts that seemed most threatening at the moment.

"Enough, man. I'm getting some water before you knock the last drop out of me," Sam said.

"Quitter," Steve teased him.

Sam walked off the mats and made a rude gesture at him. Steve chuckled.

Sam was no quitter. Steve had trained too many men to keep count of. Sam had a lot of potential and he worked it hard. He was a pleasure to work with and Steve enjoyed seeing him improve over time. Natasha could still kick his ass, but that was true for all except a very few men. Sam would get there.

Steve took a moment to get a drink, too. Not that he needed it. He wasn't sweating. Sometimes he found that it was better to act more like the other guys. Standing around unaffected by exertion or tiredness or heat or cold could be demoralizing to those who followed him, so he didn't lord it over them.

Sam was favoring the muscles of his right calf, where Steve had gotten in a pretty hard hit. It barely showed and probably hurt more than he was letting on. Steve was about to ask him if he wanted to call it a day when the door opened.

"Hey," Nat said to them.

"Hey," Sam responded.

Steve nodded at her in a brief greeting. She had her earbuds in and her hair pulled back. She looked intent on getting to the weights in the corner.

Sam watched Nat walk around the perimeter of the room with a smile of friendly appreciation. He'd tried to hide his appreciation of Nat once, but she'd called him on it painfully. So, when Nat wore clingy stuff, like the yoga pants and top she now had on, Sam openly watched, but not in a perverse way. He somehow appreciated women in a way that didn't look dirty. It was like he was looking at art or something. Natasha had a tiny smile too, as she felt Sam's attention on her. She was used to the way men reacted around her, and honesty seemed to appeal to her when she was among friends.

Steve wished he could get away with staring like that. He might train Sam on the mats, but he was Sam's student when it came to a lot of other things.

"Sam," Steve said, to get his attention.

When he had it, Steve waved Sam over toward Nat and moved toward her too. He'd had enough time to ruminate over Bucky, and he couldn't keep the secret any longer.

Nat looked aside at their approach and pulled out her earbuds. The fact that she used her earbuds so much while she was on the Avengers floors of the tower illustrated how much she trusted her teammates and Tony's security measures.

"What's up?" Nat asked them.

Sam shrugged and looked to Steve.

"I've met Bucky. He's here in the city," Steve told them.

Sam's eyebrows rose. Natasha's expression didn't change at all.

"You knew this," Steve said.

"I'm not surprised. He could have been anywhere. When did he come to you, and what was his condition?" Natasha asked.

"It was in the park, after my run last Tuesday. He's been watching me for six weeks. He's not a threat, so I'm going to recommend that we stand down and leave him alone," Steve said.

"How long did you spend with him, to determine that he's not a threat?" Natasha asked.

"It was about five minutes, but the man I met was not the Soldier. He was my friend. He demonstrated that he remembers our childhood. He knows me. In six weeks' time, you know he could have taken me out, Nat. If he was still acting under a kill order, he would have executed it by now," Steve said.

Natasha looked at him, nothing but skeptical. She knew the Winter Soldier like none of them did. Spending a calculated five minutes to show Steve that he remembered their childhood sounded like the preliminary contact for a long op. Especially after observing for six weeks. But then, Steve had a point in that fact, too. If the Soldier was setting up an inside takedown for the Avengers, he wouldn't have told Steve that he'd been watching.

Sam stood by and let them hash it out. Bucky was Steve's business and he was only along as backup. Natasha seemed to know enough to ask questions, but he didn't. Sam used the break time to flex and stretch his sore calf muscles.
Natasha took her phone and her earbuds off of her workout armband and set them on the weight bench. She slid the elastic from her hair and redid it on the top of her head instead of the back.

"Get on the mats," she said to Steve.

"Not today," he told her.

"Steve, you need to see the things I know about Barnes which you don't know. Some of his training makes you vulnerable, and I can help you with that," Natasha said.

Steve stood resolute beside the mat. He fully understood her idea, but a larger issue had come into play. The sexual overtones of his dream this morning were clouding his thinking and he couldn't afford to make a mistake of that nature with a teammate. Or a friend.

"I'm not getting on the mats with you today," he told her.

"I know that you're frustrated and that you might get hard," Nat said, "It's not a problem. I trust you."

"I'm gonna leave you guys to figure this out," Sam said. Things had just gone from interesting to awkward and he wanted no part of it. He respected both Natasha and Steve and he didn't like the vibe of where this was going.

"I need you to stay," Steve told him.

The look he levelled on his wingman had Sam standing watch. Sam was real uneasy about what he was being asked to witness, but he stayed where he was needed. They could both feel the tension coming off of the Captain, and neither had any doubt which of his personas they were dealing with. His stance and his tone made it clear.

His attention turned back to Natasha.

"Natasha, you and I are having fraternization issues. If I get on the mats with you, you won't be able to teach me anything. Can you keep me from pinning you, even exerting a full effort?" he asked her evenly.

"Only if I'm willing to injure you," she admitted.

"Think about that for a moment, in light of what I'm willing to endure to accomplish my mission objectives," he reminded her.

She could tease and joke with her teammates any time she liked. Honesty was a matter of circumstance for Natasha. But her reputation as a professional required her to admit the truth.

She'd often felt that much as Thor restrained himself while sparring with Steve, Steve also restrained himself when sparring with her. It wasn't something she knew only with her rational mind. Her body had felt it and her muscles remembered. Sparring wasn't the true test of Steve's ability. Steve tearing down concrete walls to get to her was the test. Steve bodily hauling her uphill for a half mile without the use of his lungs was the test. When sufficiently motivated, the limits of Steve Rogers' physical abilities had not yet been found.

"No, I'm not able to evade being pinned by you," Natasha admitted.

"Natasha, I'm ashamed to say that if we spar right now, either you're going to break my spirit, or I'm going to break your body. Maybe both," Steve said in defeat.
He let go of his command stance and sat down on the vinyl padded seat of the weight bench. He truly was ashamed of his lack of mastery over his own body. As team leader, it was becoming a real problem.

"That's a lose-lose," she agreed, "What I need to show you can wait until tomorrow, but you need to work on getting your tension resolved."

The three of them had given up on getting any more physical work done today. Sam understood that the need for his presence was over with, as far as ethics and oversight went. Steve looked up at him as a troubled man, not as team leader. Sam shifted into his other role within the team. As a teammate, there were things he didn't want to hear. As their councilor, he could listen to anything. Sam squatted down to get more on Steve's level. Natasha sat on the empty part of the seat beside Steve.

"Guys, I don't know what to do with myself anymore. I, uh, had some relief from this tension seven hours ago, and it's already back. It comes with the body. Nothing keeps it down for long," he admitted with a perfect Steve Rogers blush.

"Then you take care of it every seven hours. Or every six hours. Do what you have to do," Nat advised.

"He can't do that," Sam stepped in for Steve.

He went to church with the man. He understood the level of devotion Steve had to his faith. The anxiety of disregarding his belief system would be as great as the stress Steve was already feeling from the problem.

"Sure he can," Natasha said.

Steve held up a hand of truce between his friends.

"I think the key to this is mental. My body has been the same for over seventy years. It's my mind that's changed. I was always so focused on combat and victory that I had little time for indulging my…" Steve said. His words faded off, but they knew what he meant.

"And now that you have a little time to think, it wants some shore leave," Sam concluded.

"I think so," Steve nodded.

"Your team needs you, Steve. I need you to train with me. No matter what your heart says, Barnes is a potential threat. If I have to admit your dominance, then you can admit that with Buck, it's personal for you. They taught us some nasty things in the red room, and Barnes was my most thorough instructor," she said.

"I get that, Natasha. I'll train with you. But you gotta listen when I tell you 'no.'" he said.

"I can do that," she agreed softly.

"In case you're thinking about it," Sam said hesitantly, "I don't think it will do you much good to consult with your confessor on this. No priest is going to understand what you're going through. None of them have to deal with what you deal with. Their advice might do more harm than good."

Steve nodded. There was nothing for it then, but to find an outlet that was the least harmful.

"Nat," he said.
"Mmhmm?"

"Lay off on the teasing some," he told her.

"But it's so fun," she smiled at him a little, trying to bring levity to the situation.

Steve shook his head.

"You're not in here," he tapped a finger to his head, "It's not all fun."
Chapter 14

Author's note: Just consider everything M from here on, unless otherwise noted. This was another loooong chapter, which I split in two. The other half will be coming tomorrow after I get time to edit. Thanks for the sweet reviews, those who sent them. They really make my day and encourage me to write more.

"All we know about the operatives who took out our last target is that it was a small crew. The only tracks we found in or out appear to be a common passenger vehicle. It parked just over four miles away and they walked in along the road. Not a footprint, and no damage to the perimeter fence. They either were let in, or they went over the top of double loop concertina. No attempt was made to gather data or take hostages, as far as we can tell. Charges were set and the place was blown, all souls still inside. It had to be a high-level hit, but we don't yet know which agency. Every level of U. S. military and law enforcement denies involvement," Maria Hill told them as they sat around the conference table.

"How many dead?" Steve asked.

"Good work," Tony said.

Natasha looked across the table at Steve, waiting.

Steve nodded. He was thinking the same thing. He was going to tell them at this meeting anyway. It may as well be now.

"It could be Bucky," Steve said.

All eyes turned to him.

"We don't know that Barnes is still alive. Hydra could have picked him up and neutralized him as a liability, now that Pierce is dead. From what intel we have, Pierce was the only one who could handle him with any reliability," Bruce countered.

"He's not dead. I met him in the park last Tuesday. Buck is very much alive, and he's got intel. He may be acting on it," Steve said.

"And you're just now telling us," Tony said in a damning tone.

"Yes. I needed time to think. He was not the Winter Soldier when I met him. He's in his right mind, and he said he had intel that he was acting on when he could," Steve told them.

He ignored the disgusted way that Tony tossed his laser pointer onto the table. He'd been annoying people with it all meeting long, but it looked like Steve had finally annoyed him enough to make him quit.

"The likelihood of one man neutralizing a Hydra base is…improbable," Hill said.

"Not if it's Barnes. He's capable of it," Natasha told them.
"So, when were you going to tell us?" Tony asked.

"Just now," Steve said calmly.

"He didn't keep it a complete secret. He informed Natasha and I a few days ago," Sam interjected quickly. Tony had his mouth open to say something else, but Steve cut in.

"Tony, you can't tell me that if something started going wrong with Jarvis, you'd immediately tell all of us. You'd keep it to yourself and try to fix him, until you were sure there was a real threat," Steve said.

"I-!" Tony said, but he paused when he caught the eyebrow Bruce was giving him.

"I would tell you immediately if I thought there was any possibility that Jarvis could be a threat," Tony continued.

"Then I did better than you would, because Buck isn't a threat to us. It looks like he's only a threat to Hydra. We shouldn't have a problem with that, except that he might be destroying valuable data. And I don't like the unnecessary casualties," Steve said.

"We can't be certain that it's Barnes. There's two Hydra locations taken out now, just a week apart. That's a lot of work, a lot of planning, in a short time. It takes our entire crew almost a week to set up a hit and make it go smoothly," Hill said.

"Barnes can do it," Natasha insisted.

"What are you, his cheerleader?" Tony asked her.

Nat only looked at him. She frequently refused to respond to Tony's bait. Tony sat back in his chair and tried practicing the same cool, knowing look back at Natasha. It was too weird to watch for long, because Tony somehow made his face look more feminine. Maybe it was the set of his jaw and what he did with his lips.

Natasha smiled in appreciation.

"He's staying here in the city? Or did he come just the once to see you?" Clint asked.

Clint didn't ask much at meetings. When he did, it was usually about details they might be overlooking.

"I think he's local for now. I was giving him time to contact me again. Since he hasn't, I'm going looking for him this evening," Steve told them.

"I'll go with you," Natasha said.

"No. I've got it," Steve insisted.

"You don't know what you're dealing with," she told him.

"I'm dealing with my friend, whom I've already matched in hand-to-hand twice. I know him, Nat. Maybe you know a different part of him, but I know enough. I'll be fine," Steve said.

"When you go, ask him if he knows anything about these Hydra hits," Bruce said.

"And watch yourself," Tony said, all his baiting comments and suspicions put away.
Steve nodded.

The meeting appeared to be over, so Steve got up and left the conference room. It was five in the evening and he wanted to get out there and find Buck.

"Hey, are you sure you want to do this alone?" Sam said in the hallway as he jogged to catch up.

Jarvis held the doors for him, and he got into the elevator with Steve.

"Yeah, I'm sure, Sam. I know you've been with me on this for months. I couldn't have done it without you, and now I'm acting like an ass and going alone. I feel that I need to. It's not like we expected it to be. There's not gonna be a fight," Steve said.

"Alright," Sam said, resigned.

"You know everybody wants you to be careful, but I'm happy for you too. Does he seem stable? What he's been through is too much for me to handle, but he might need to see someone to help get his head straight," Sam said.

"I don't know that yet. If I can find him, I'll tell you tomorrow," Steve said.

The elevator opened on his floor, and he left Sam in it. Lightening flashed outside and the tower rumbled with the thunder. Steve hurried into his room to change. He was going on his bike, no matter the weather, so he put on a dark gray t-shirt and one of his older, more worn pairs of jeans. He shoved his wallet in his back pocket and his feet into his black boots that he'd bought to go with the bike.

On the way down, he had almost two minutes to think.

"Jarvis, would you tell Estrella that I want to see her soon if she feels up to it?" Steve asked.

There was a pause, then Jarvis responded.

"I have just done so, Captain. She says she still wants coffee, and her library books are close to being overdue."

"Well then, it's a date. No! Don't tell her that. She won't like it. Tell her I said I'll meet her in the lobby at ten tomorrow morning, if that's alright with her," Steve said.

"Very good, Captain. Her response is 'okay'."

"She doesn't have a phone yet, does she?" Steve asked.

It would have been nice to text her or to call her directly, without Jarvis in the middle.

"She does not. Keep in mind that she cannot yet afford a phone, considering the amount she sets aside to repay Sir for the voice modulator device. I don't think her response would be favorable if anyone gifted her with anything so expensive as a phone," Jarvis reminded.

"You think I don't know that?" Steve asked Jarvis.

It was starting to piss him off that everyone seemed to be questioning his judgement. First, nobody believes he can visit Buck without an armed escort, and now the AI was not so gently suggesting how he should handle his only other friend.

"I am sorry, Captain. I have grown fond of the Miss, and I monitor her heart constantly. Of the two of you, I would rather upset you than her," Jarvis said with what sounded like genuine contrition.

Jarvis' cautious words set Steve back off of his annoyance.

"Thanks, Jarvis. That's good to know," Steve said in a more kindly tone.

By the time Steve had made his way through traffic, over the bridge and into Brooklyn, the rain had let up and the sun was going down. He and the bike were dripping, and the golden sunset was watery and filtered through the edge of low clouds.

He found a curbside parking spot in their old neighborhood. The place looked rough. It had been rough when he and Buck were kids, then it had boomed and grown in the seventies, and now it was back to rough again. Steve made note of all the people on the streets, and the fact that half of them were loitering around smoking and drinking. Used to, there were open container laws. Maybe there still were and the police didn't come around to enforce them much.

He put the stand down on the bike and took off his helmet. As he dismounted, his wet jeans pulled at his skin. The shirt was plastered to him, too. He didn't care. He set his helmet on the bike's seat and looked around without the helmet's narrowed field of view. People had noticed him, and they didn't look like a big crowd of Captain America fans.

The men were all dark skinned, and the women weren't wearing much. Music was thumping from a few different cars parked along the street, groups of young men standing around them talking.

"Oooh, honey. You got a date tonight? 'Cause I could go with you whereva," a young woman called to him. She and two other girls were standing not far from where he'd parked the bike.

"Thanks, but no. I've got business tonight," Steve told her with a smile.

She wasn't bad looking. Lots of smooth cocoa skin and nice curves on her. The fact that he was even taking a second look and mildly entertaining the idea of a prostitute embarrassed him.

"You change your mind, I'm right here," she said. She actually rubbed a hand down her front and patted her mons. Steve turned away. It was a crude gesture, but effective. Crap. Now he had to walk around like this in wet jeans.

"Arm," Steve said under his breath, and a yellow light on the instrument panel of his bike began a slow pulsing glow.

He walked away from it. The streets and the sidewalk were wet just like he was. The people were dry. As Steve began looking around for clues, he ambled closer to one of the thumping cars.

A group of rough looking young men were gathered across the sidewalk, blocking it. They let women pass with only a little teasing. They made way for an old man with a brown paper bag. Steve, they ignored until he tried going around them on the street.

"Where you goin, boy?" one of the men called out to him.

"That'a way," Steve told them and kept walking.

He knew it was best to interact as little as possible. He wasn't even sure that Buck had settled here, but he'd said home. And this was home. Across the street from Steve was a coin operated laundry which used to be a bakery. Next to him, on the other side of the men who blocked the sidewalk, was a pawn shop. It used to be a local newspaper office.

Steve expected the men to mess with him some more, but they didn't. He went around the thumping car and back up onto the sidewalk. His eyes scanned everywhere, keeping a feel for the mood of the people on the street, and looking at every detail of the buildings. There was his old walk-up. The bottom was a discount store with bars on the windows. The lights were on in most of the windows above that.

He'd been here recently, but he hadn't stopped to look around much. It hadn't been worth stirring up the neighborhood with his presence, and nothing escaped notice around here. There was always someone out, sitting on a stoop or standing around. Now that it was getting dark and he had a close-shaved head and a fairly thick beard growing in, he hoped he could escape too much notice.

Steve stopped to look at the windows of the units above the discount store. Nothing caught his eye, so he moved on. He'd take it block by block if he had to. He was scanning the windows across the street above the liquor store as he got close to the next group of men by another thumping car. He automatically started to walk around on the street side, but two men moved to intercept him.

Steve stopped between the bumpers of two parked cars and waited. It hadn't been an impossibility that this kind of thing would happen tonight. The men gathered around the car on the sidewalk quieted. The ones that had gone around street side to intercept him stood and waited. So did Steve.

"You just gonna stand there?" one of the men nearest on the sidewalk asked him.

"Sure, why not," Steve said.

He looked them over. Thirteen of them, and over a hundred more, out on the street where everyone could see. He knew a crowd would gather quick if anything started. He saw several knives concealed on the guys. Maybe a handgun under one of their shirts.

"You scared to walk through a bunch of brothas?" another one asked.

"Decide what?" the same one wanted to know. He had a black rag snug around his head, and a white undershirt stretched over his impressive chest and shoulders.

"Whatever it is that you're gonna decide. When we're done with that, I'll move on," Steve told him.

"Gonna move on? If we let you," the man taunted. He came over to get in Steve's face and Steve stepped up the curb to meet him, still keeping a casual stance. He shoved his hands in his jeans pockets and waited calmly for the man to reach him. Five others followed loosely behind him.

"Yeah, come here," Steve pulled out a hand and gestured him closer.

The man got in his face, of course. Steve stepped around beside him and laid his arm across his shoulders as if they were pals. The man was immediately nervous about that and tried to pull away some, but Steve got a good grip on him and powered them both along the sidewalk a little ways away from his friends.

"You need to look a little harder and decide if you want any of my time. I don't want to bring down your status among your friends. Or your enemies. So look," Steve said. They'd made enough distance so that the others couldn't hear his low words. The others were getting antsy. They could tell that Steve was strong-arming a man he shouldn't be able to strong-arm. Steve let go of him and he jerked away.

"Get the fuck off me!" he barked at Steve and shoved him hard against the brick of a building. Steve let the momentum bounce him, then used the bounce to put himself back in the man's face.

"Come on. Take a look," Steve said.

"Faggot! Get out my face," the man said, but he looked.

Steve gave him time. It didn't take much. The man stepped back a little.

"You Cap-"

"Yeah, yeah. Enough of that. I'm not here to cause trouble, and I don't wanna make anybody lose face. Maybe you can help me out," Steve said. He pulled a twenty from his back pocket and pressed it into the man's hand.

"What do you want?" the man asked. He was calmer now. Everyone understood cash.

"I want to know if you've seen my friend. He's a white guy. Long, dark hair. Always wearing gloves," Steve said.

"I know who you talkin about. Bad motha fucka. Nobody messed with him since Little D and his boys disappeared," the man said.

But he didn't say anymore. Steve gave him more cash. The other guys were staying back by the thumping car, waved back by a gesture from their friend.

"What did Little D do?" Steve wondered.

"Tried to fuck with him, like I did you just now. Wasn't nothin but a little fun, ya know? They roughed him around some. But next day, Little D ain't nowhere. Still ain't found him. Or his boys," the man said.

Steve frowned. He hoped they weren't talking about Bucky, but if the physical description fit, they probably were.

"Where does he stay?" Steve asked.

"Right there. Don't know which number," the man said. He pointed to a building across the street.

Steve wanted to ask why they didn't call the police if people were missing, but he knew it was useless.

"Thanks," Steve told the man.

He stepped around him and to the curb, back to between the bumpers of the two cars. He waited for traffic to clear so he could cross.

"Hey, you know they gonna mess with your bike, right?" the man said.

"Yeah, I know," Steve called back as he crossed.

Before he was even across the street and up on the other curb, he knew where Buck's place was. There was a little ceramic Siamese cat figurine in a window on the third floor. Steve remembered seeing it in Mrs. Barnes' living room when they were kids. Buck wanted to be found.

The light was off in the apartment. Steve went in the building, past the kids who were playing on the front stoop. The building had no buzzer on the doors, and if it did, it wouldn't have mattered. The kids had the doors propped open to let the air in.

Steve went up the flights of stairs to the third floor. A few people looked at him in the hallways, but they didn't bother him. The place had seen better days a long time ago. It was dingy and it smelled like years of stale cigarettes. And other things.

He knocked on the door of the apartment which should belong to the window with the cat. He stood and listened carefully, through the sound of the television blaring from the unit behind him, and the sound of someone yelling a few doors down.

There was no movement in the apartment. Not that he could have heard Buck moving around in there anyway. Buck was too quiet, these days.

"Hey, Jerk. Ya in there?" Steve asked, in case Buck was waiting in the silence, shotgun pointed at the door.

Still nothing. Steve waited a moment to be sure, then he went back down through the building. Buck was a working man now. Maybe he wasn't off work yet.

Outside the doors, there was a tree growing in an iron ring in the sidewalk. Steve stepped carefully through the kids and their card game and went to lean against the tree and wait. People looked at him as they went by, but not for long.

"You gotta be Captain America," one of the kids from on the building's stoop said.

Steve turned his head to look at them.

"I get that all the time. I must look like him, but my name's Grant," Steve told the kids.

It wasn't exactly a lie.

"Are you sure?" the kid asked again.

"Yeah, kid. I know my own name," Steve said.

"Move your ass, Grant. Let's get inside before the whole neighborhood sees ya," Bucky said from his right side.

"Fu- Bu-," Steve stuttered, "how do ya keep doing that to me?"

"I always was better 'n you at sneaking," Bucky said, and walked around him on the sidewalk.

He had a lunchbox cooler in his right hand. The kids left their cards and ran away inside the building somewhere. Steve followed Buck inside and up the stairs. Bucky was as wet as he was, and he smelled like sweat and sawdust.

Buck unlocked his door and let Steve walk in behind him. He reached out and flipped on the lights while Steve closed and locked the door. Steve followed down the short hall into the living room, but Buck wasn't there anymore.

"I stink. We can talk after I get clean. Grab a beer. Put your wet clothes in the dryer," Buck called from the only other doorway in the apartment.
"Sure," Steve said.

He felt like he was in a strange dream. Buck had run off to shower before Steve could even really get a look at anything but his backside going up the stairs. Now he was standing in a run-down apartment by himself.

There was an old green couch in the small living room, and a black vinyl chair that looked like it was from the sixties. Completing the group was a large old television on a stand in the corner by the window. The walls were a dull color halfway between tan and orange. An antique light fixture gave dim light from the ceiling. The fixture was probably original to the building.

The sound of the shower starting got Steve moving. Buck didn't want wet clothes on his furniture, so Steve went through the little kitchen looking for the laundry machines. The dryer had clothes in it, so he took them out and set them on top. Bucky's clothes. He was handling Buck's clothes as if he lived here like a roommate. His mind staggered back to before Buck had enlisted. They'd shared a place something like this, on a different block. Those were good times.

Steve stripped to his boxer briefs and threw his shirt, socks, and jeans in the dryer and turned it on. He looked in the fridge for a beer. There were two different kinds, and he chose the darker one. By the time he'd looked around the place, including taking a peek at Buck's bedroom, Bucky was getting out of the shower. Steve went to the living room and sat down on the couch with his beer.

Buck was moving around in his bedroom, sounding like a normal man after a day of work.

"Here," Buck said from the bedroom doorway.

Steve looked up to catch the clean shirt flying at him. He pulled it on and followed Bucky to the kitchen.

Buck wasn't looking at him. His hair hung dark and wet on his shoulders. He pulled a box out of the freezer and tossed it on the countertop.

"Did you eat already?" Buck asked him.

"No. I wanted to find you. I thought we might go get something," Steve said.

He felt himself slipping back into the sort of kid brother role he'd had when they'd lived together before. Not really inferior, but he'd deferred to Buck in a lot of things because Buck was the one with the strength to earn the most pay and take care of more of the bills.

"Heh. S' not much place to eat around here, unless you want to get a sandwich from the liquor store," Buck said.

He took another box from the freezer and put it next to the other one. He tore open a box and put the tray in the microwave. He pressed some buttons, then stood there watching the food go around.

He didn't have a shirt on, just his boxers. Steve could see how the metal arm was keeping his skin red where metal met flesh. And there was some blistering on his left side above his shorts.

"Buck, turn around," Steve said.

Bucky sighed, but he turned around to face him. He leaned back on the countertop, his hands braced on the edge in a way that made the musculature of his shoulders and front tense. Buck didn't used to be that lean and tight. He'd always been strong, but not in that way. He'd been using his body hard and often at difficult tasks. And his left side was burnt and blistered, all up his torso.
and onto his neck and face.

"You been taking out Hydra bases?" Steve asked. He felt a little less like the old Stevie and more like himself again. Buck didn't look like he wanted to answer any questions.

Buck only shrugged.

"How much explosive did you use on that last one? Little too much, I'd say," Steve commented.

"Got a warehouse full. I used plenty," Buck said.

"A warehouse?" Steve asked.

"Yeah. A small one. That's what I did first. Lucky for me that you and your people took Hydra down fast. Did a lot of damage, left a lot of holes. I cleaned out all the stashes I could remember. Cash, gear, explosives," Bucky told him.

"You need to get that looked at," Steve said, and nodded at Buck's burnt face. It was the worst of the visible damage.

"Nah, it'll be fine in a day or two. I heal almost as fast as you."

They stared at each other for a moment, not bothering to hide their curiosity.

"I'm still not used to seeing you bigger than me. A lot of my memories from the war are fuzzy," Bucky said.

The microwave beeped, and he turned to take one dinner from it and put in the other. Steve watched close for any other sign of injury or soreness, but there was none. Just the burns on his left side.

"Get us some forks, would ya?" Bucky suggested, and pointed at a drawer.

He got down two glasses and pulled a bottle of soda from the refrigerator. Steve got the forks and they stood in silence again until the microwave beeped. They ate standing up in the kitchen. Steve didn't look much at what the food was, other than to see where to put his fork.

They washed it down with cheap soda, then Bucky got himself a beer from the fridge. Steve got another one because his first was almost finished. They settled in the living room, Buck sprawled in the black chair, Steve on the couch.

"You been killing people around here?" Steve asked.

"Just the ones who need it. Why? You gonna turn me in? For taking out Hydra bases and street thugs?"

Steve stared at him hard. They both knew that he should turn him in. It's what Steve Rogers would do. What Captain America would do.

"Do it, then, Stevie. I'll wait right here. They can bring me to jail and everything. I won't even hurt anybody," Buck said.

"Why, Buck? This isn't you," Steve said quietly.

"Me? I haven't been 'me' in decades! I don't know who 'me' is," Buck said. His fist smacked his chest, then reached to loop a finger around the neck of his beer. He tilted it back and drank half of
"I know. That's why I'm not turning you in. But you gotta quit killing people, alright? We're not judge and jury," Steve insisted.

"No promises," Buck grumbled at him.

Steve sighed. His head may be messed up, and maybe he was a killer now, but that sour look was all Buck. He used to get like that when Steve would nag him about being too fast with the girls.

"I still love ya, Buck, you know I do. I'd do anything for you. But I can't let you run around killing folks," Steve said.

"I'll try harder. But no promises," Buck said.

Steve looked at him until Bucky looked away, just like it used to be. Buck never liked being reminded that their moms had raised them right.

"Does the arm hurt you?" Steve changed subjects. There had been no time to ask the last time he'd seen him in the park.

He spread his silver fingers, rotated his wrist a little, then made a fist. The metal bands moved and flexed like a real arm would have.

Steve crimped his brow, then smiled. He was quickly remembering the details of how they'd been together. That had been Buck's 'lying to your face' tone.

"Come on. What's wrong with it?" Steve persisted.

"It itches a little, around where it meets. Always has, so it's nothing to worry about."

Steve took a little piece of technology out of the waistband of his shorts and held it out to Bucky. It was something Tony had given him when he'd got out of the elevator as he was leaving the tower. Steve had promised he'd put it in Buck's apartment, but not how he'd get it there.

"You should come around to the tower. We could look at it for you, maybe make it better," Steve offered.

Bucky looked at the small listening device, then set it on top of the television.

"I'm used to it. I like it how it is, but thanks. Like I said, Stark's not gonna want to do anything sweet for me. Not after I killed his parents," Bucky said, fully aware that someone, somewhere was listening.

Steve frowned at him.

Buck shrugged.

"That wasn't you," Steve denied.

"Sure it was. I remember their faces. I just couldn't do a damn thing about it. A mission's a mission. I follow orders and they put me back in the icebox. I don't follow orders, they recondition me until I do. It was pretty simple," Buck said.
Steve shut his eyes and focused on the faint sound of his jeans going round and round in the dryer. If he thought too hard about what Buck had been through, he wasn't going to be able to keep his face straight.

"Aw, don't get choked up about it. There's nothing you could do. You were on ice too, practically the whole time I was," Buck said, low and comforting, like he used to speak when Steve was coughing and couldn't stop.

"I'm not choked up. I'm angry," Steve ground out.

"Nothing to do about it but kill Hydra," Bucky said. He took his empty beer bottle and Steve's and got up. He dropped them in the trash in the kitchen. He came back with two more.

"This doesn't do anything for me, remember?" Steve said.

"Me neither. But I like the head," Bucky said. He swigged the beer, then licked at the little smear of foam that clung to his upper lip.

Steve laughed. Buck smiled, too.

"If you like head, then you should get some real beer and some pint glasses. Not much head on this shit," Steve said, indicating his beer bottle.

"Nah. I want head, I'll open my window and whistle," Buck said.

Steve started to laugh, but then he couldn't. The thought of a girl on her knees, face in his lap took away the ability to smile. He cleared his throat because it had gotten tight, then moved his leg a little on the couch.

"And... there it is!" Buck teased him, waving his beer bottle at the blush that crept from Steve's face, and down his neck.

"Fuck yourself," Steve muttered.

Before he had any idea that he needed to stop him, Buck got up and went to the window. He threw it up and yelled.

"Kenya!"

Steve heard a girl's voice say something from below on the street, but it was too drowned out by the blood rushing in his ears.

"You didn't. Buck, please tell me you didn't just-"

"Yeah. I did. Kenya's got a sweet mouth. Tell me you haven't been living like a monk since you thawed out, and I'll call her off," Bucky said on his way to the door. He opened the door out to the hallway and returned to his chair.

"What the hell are you doing, Bucky?" Steve asked. He got up, jittery out of his skin. There was a girl coming up, and he was in his shorts! His jeans were still in the dryer. Steve was fast, but not fast enough.

"Shut the door," he heard Bucky tell someone while Steve was trying to hop into the hot, damp denim.

"Why you callin me tonight? We all thought you already had company," a girl's voice said.
She was looking around, and she spotted him in the shadows of the laundry nook. Steve felt his face burning red, blushing harder than it ever had. He stepped out of the jeans again and put them back in the dryer as if that's what he'd been doing in the first place. Bucky barked a laugh.

"I don't fuck around with men. You can tell em that. This is my friend Grant, from way back," Bucky said.

Steve took a few breaths and calmly started the dryer going again. Calm on the outside, anyway. He thought of ice. Miles of ice. Cold so deep that it had slowed his heart to a stop. The dark memories chilled him out of his heated embarrassment. He strode to the living room.

"Hey, Grant. You lonely tonight?" Kenya asked him. She got a good look at him while he did the same to her.

She was tall and slim, but she had a pretty face, full lips, and a round backside.

"I know you from somewhere," she said, narrowing her eyes.

"Yeah, I get that all the damn time. Everybody tells me I look like Captain America, but my name is Grant," he said. He held out his hand to shake. Bucky was smirking at him over Kenya's shoulder. Kenya took his hand briefly.

"Have a seat, Grant," Bucky told him.

A bad case of nerves spilled over Steve's skin, giving him goosebumps. He sank back down like he'd been before, and he left room on the other end of the couch for Kenya to sit down.

Bucky had gotten a twenty dollar bill from somewhere, and he set it on the arm of the couch.

Kenya smiled and nodded. She didn't sit on the couch. She sunk to her knees on the floor in front of Steve.

Steve's eyes went wide and his hands jerked, wanting to push her away. She looked up at him, smiling and seductive. Whether it was an act or not didn't matter. She was right there, practically breathing on him.

"Buck, I'm gonna kill you," Steve said, tight and high.

"After you're done, we'll see," Buck was still smiling.

Steve didn't look to see, but he could hear it in his voice.

"You wanna at least go in the bedroom?" Steve asked her.

"Here's good," Buck told them firmly.

Then, her hands were on him. She didn't bother with any fancy stuff. Her long, slim fingers pulled his shorts under his stuff. She paused when she got a look at him, but then she moved and all he felt was warm.

"Uunh," Steve grunted.

He hunched forward on the couch, but he wasn't about to pull away. It was too good to want to get away from. He cracked his eyes to glare at Bucky for starting this, but then she did something with her tongue and he laid back on the couch, giving up.
It didn't take him long. Anything other than his own hand felt amazing. The illegality of what he was allowing to happen jangled his nerves. The wrongness turned something in his belly, but it couldn't overpower what was happening at his groin. He squirmed a little. He'd never let himself do this with anyone watching, but it was just Buck. And he needed it. Nat said that he did.

So he let it go.

He didn't know what kind of sound he made, but it must have been something, because Bucky was chuckling, the smug bastard. Kenya sat back on her heels and licked her lips.

"Come here, you know the drill," Buck told her.

Kenya crawled over to Bucky and held her mouth open. Buck looked, then swept a finger inside her mouth.

"Go get it yourself," he told the girl.

Kenya got up and went to the kitchen. Steve lay sprawled in a warm daze. Was he dreaming, or had Buck just paid a prostitute to blow him? The world felt kind of upside down. God, if anybody found out that he was on the bad side of Brooklyn getting blown, the Avengers wouldn't have enough PR money to hush it up. Tony wouldn't want to. He'd be right there grinning with Bucky.

Kenya came back to the living room with a bottle of Jack Daniels. Where Bucky could see, she took a gulp from the bottle. She swished it around and swallowed.

"Leave it there," Bucky instructed, pointing to the stand the television sat on.

Kenya did so, then pocketed the twenty that had been put out for her.

"What about you?" she asked Buck.

"I'm good. You can come by tomorrow night, maybe," Bucky told her.

"Alright," Kenya said, then she left.

Buck got up and locked the door behind her.

When he walked back to his chair, Steve noticed that Buck wasn't even hard. That was weird, 'cause something like this used to would have wound him up.

"I can't believe you did that," Steve finally said. From the time Buck had yelled out the window til now hadn't been ten minutes. And the surveillance device was sitting right there on the television. Crap. He'd never hear the end of it from Tony.

"You said yourself that I'm not 'me,' so pay attention, Stevie. You're right. I'm not. I'm still in here, but a lot of other stuff is too," Buck said. He tapped his head, then put his hand back down.

"And cover that shit up. I don't wanna see it," Buck said.

Steve jerked upright, his face flaming again. He hadn't even noticed that his underwear was still where Kenya had left it. He fixed it, not liking that he wasn't putting it away clean and dry.

"Have you lost your mind? That was illegal. You can't do that," Steve said.

"I just did. You hear the cops coming? I don't," Buck said.
Steve shut up and sat, thinking. Sam was right. Bucky needed help. Something was seriously off in his head. He'd always been one for a good time, but he hadn't gone so far as murder and prostitutes. They hadn't had to. The girls had been around for free, and street arguments were settled with fists fair and square.

"The world's not the same, Stevie. Grow up," Buck told him.

"I'm not Stevie. I've done enough growing up. You were there with me through most of it," Steve said.

He went into Buck's darkened bedroom and looked on top of the beat-up dresser. He took Buck's phone and dialed his own number with it. Steve heard it ringing on top of the dryer where he'd left it. He went back into the living room.

"You happy now? You can call me anytime. Have Stark's kid trace me all over the place. I can always get a different phone. I've got shit loads of cash, thanks to Hydra," Buck told him with a twist at the corner of his mouth.

"I'm not gonna trace you. I spent years grieving for your sorry ass, then months hunting for you. I want to be able to call you, Buck. And you can call me if you ever need help," Steve said. He stood in the bedroom doorway and thumbed through the list of Buck's contacts. They were all take-out food places, no private numbers. He tossed the phone on the bed.

"Help? Hah! You call me, Stevie. I'm fine on my own," Buck said.

"Sure you are. That's why you're living in this dump and keeping time with hookers," Steve said.

"This dump is where we're from. Don't start your sanctimonious crap with me. What are you gonna do right after this, go run to the priest?" Buck taunted.

"I should, but I won't. I needed it," Steve admitted.

"I knew it! I've been tallying off the enemy and swimming in poon, and you're doing the same uptown, except for the poon. And you don't really tally them off, do ya? You just knock em around a little so they can do their time, get out, and bite you again later. Idiot!" Buck said.

He threw his beer bottle into the kitchen, where it landed square in the waste bin, then shattered on the other bottles.

"I do what I'm supposed to do," Steve said sullenly.

"When are you gonna start doing what you want to do?" Buck challenged him.

"I don't know," Steve said. Buck had a point.

"You act like they own you. Your poor, dead grandparents worked off their indenture in less years. Nobody owns you, punk. Nobody but you," Buck said. He got up from the chair and stalked over to Steve.

"They do own me, Buck. I'd have been dead before I was thirty. All the years I've had since then have been on their time. Look at me now," Steve said. He unfolded his arms and looked slightly down into Bucky's eyes.

"Yeah, you're a big, useless virgin stud. You do realize that all the people who made you are dead now, right? You're not Army issue anymore. I saw in the paper that you got an honorable discharge and all kinds of medals. You're your own man, now," Bucky said.

Steve didn't argue. All of that was true, filtered through his friend's perception. Sam tended to agree with him. Steve thought he'd find some kind of solace with Buck, away from the expectations of his teammates. But everything Buck said, he could hear Sam or Tony or Nat in the words.

"This isn't the kind of shit I meant to stir when I invited you in. I'm sorry," Buck said.

Steve nodded. It seemed that not much went according to plan, lately.

"Hey," Buck said.

Steve looked at him.

"Have you been careful with yourself?" Buck asked.

"What do you mean?" Steve wondered.

Bucky colored up a little, and Steve wondered what could possibly make him bashful.

"You saw with Kenya just now, how I checked her mouth and had her wash with whiskey?"

"Yeah," Steve said.

"You can't let anyone get a sample of your semen. They used mine. Made a bunch of messed up kids, or clones, or something. It was god-awful. That was back when I didn't have any control of things. They tried again just a few months ago. Sent a girl to me in a bar. She tried wiping her mouth, but I saw what she was doing, trying to save some. Any girl gets at you, you watch them close, and make sure they don't take anything usable away with them," Buck warned him.

Steve shut his eyes again. The blows just kept coming. The few things Buck had told him tonight were bad enough, but he was sure there was plenty more. Years of atrocities.

Once again, he pulled Buck into a hug. Bucky made a startled squawking sound, but then he allowed it. Buck's heart was thumping fast, unused to the non-hostile contact.

"You call me. Don't let them get their hands on you again. If they do, I'll come with everything I've got and rain hell on 'em," Steve promised.

"Move off, punk. I don't need the backup," Bucky pushed away, but not forcefully.

"You're not all balls, Buck. Everybody bleeds," Steve said.

He went through the kitchen and felt of his jeans after he opened the dryer. He sensed that there was only so much interaction that Bucky could take before he kicked him out. The jeans were a little damp, still, but they were warm. He put them on, then his socks and his shirt. He dropped Buck's borrowed shirt on the floor in front of the washer.

Bucky was sitting in the chair again when he went to the living room. Steve took out a twenty from his wallet and put it on the arm of the couch.

"What, you want me to blow you? Trying to make up for lost time all in one night?" Buck asked.

Steve smacked him across the face.
Bucky was up and ready before Steve recovered his neutral stance.

"You might not want to do shit like that," Buck warned him after the coldness faded from his eyes.

"Ain't scared. I already would have beat you twice, and I let you beat me the last time," Steve said.

"Yeah, well last time, you were dead in the water til I pulled you out," Buck said.

"I knew I could count on you, but thanks," Steve said.

"You didn't know! I was a breath away from leaving you at the bottom of the river."

"It didn't matter," Steve told him.

"Ah, fuck. Get your boots. I'll walk you to your bike," Bucky said.

"I'm not your girl, Buck. I think I can make it home alone," Steve told him, but he put on his boots while Bucky got dressed.

"Nah. It's too late at night. I'll walk you or you'll have to get your hands dirty killing somebody," Buck said.

They left Buck's apartment. He didn't lock the door and Steve wondered about that, but there hadn't been much inside to steal. Out on the street, there were fewer people, but the ones out looked a lot meaner. Steve noted that Buck wasn't wearing a long shirt. The arm was in plain sight.

"That bad?" he asked.

"It can be," Bucky said.

Traffic was light, like nobody wanted to drive through the place. They probably didn't. There weren't any girls on the street anymore.

There was no one near his bike. The handle grips were still glowing red and the yellow light had turned red, too. He wasn't surprised.

Steve picked up the helmet, which had fallen to the pavement.

"You gonna be alright getting back?" Steve asked.

Every eye had been on the two of them as they crossed the street.

"I'll be fine. These are low level fucks," Bucky said.

"Try not to kill anyone else," Steve reminded him.

"You try to kill a few more," Buck denied his request and upped him one.

Steve shook his head at his friend, then put on the helmet and stood his bike up to kick it. He really didn't have to, but he liked it. Buck was already walking back, his hands in his pockets and unconcerned about the men who watched him. Maybe he was looking for an excuse, a reason to let off some steam. Steve watched him in his mirrors until the light turned green.
Chapter 15

He was coming back from his morning run when he heard music and movement in his suite. It was some goopy pop song and Estrella was singing loudly.

"Jarvis, how did she get in?" Steve asked from out in the foyer.

"She feels indebted to you for your kindness. I wasn't going to let her in, but Miss Potts decided that she should be allowed to cook and clean for you if she wishes to. I was overridden, I'm afraid. If you forbid it, I can make sure she has no access next time," Jarvis said.

Estrella sounded happy. Top of her lungs happy. Steve wiped his face with his towel and stepped over to Clint's door.

It took two rounds of knocking, but Clint finally dragged himself out of bed and answered the door. He looked bleary in wrinkled boxers and an undershirt. He glared at Steve, then spoiled the effect by yawning.

"What?" Clint asked.

"Can't you hear that?" Steve pointed a thumb over his shoulder back at his place.

"You've got a girl in there and you're running away after using her all night? That's not very nice," Clint said.

"Ha ha. Let me in and I'll make us coffee," Steve said.

Clint listened to Estrella singing for a moment more, then he let Steve in.

Clint's place wasn't much different from Tony's taste. Glass, metal, and stone. All modern lines and nothing that looked comfortable, though Steve knew that it was.

The door shut and blocked out all of the noise from across the way. No wonder Clint had still been sleeping. Steve went to the kitchen and got coffee started while Clint disappeared into the bathroom. They picked at Clint a lot for being a slob, but his place wasn't bad. He had a laptop open on the glass table, but Steve didn't look at what may have been on it, if anything.

He stood at the window while the coffee brewed.

"Jarvis, whose idea was the cooking and cleaning?" Steve asked.

"The Miss thought of it. It was after you gave her your version of the necklace. I hadn't the heart to immediately tell her no. I checked with Miss Potts, hoping that she would make the correct decision. Were we wrong?" Jarvis asked.

"I don't mind her in my place. But I don't want her exerting herself with the vacuum or anything. You're watching her heart, right?"

"Of course I am," Jarvis said, almost managing to sound offended.

"How is it?"

"Elevated and showing slight signs of stress, but not more than fifty percent of baseline," Jarvis answered.
"Maybe you could play softer songs to slow her down?" Steve suggested.

He'd never seen Estrella sing or dance before, but he could only imagine that's what she was doing, bopping around with a broom or a duster, or sprinkling ingredients in the kitchen. It was a cute image in his mind, but he worried about her.

"I am trying, Captain. She will tolerate it for a short time, then she asks for a faster beat," Jarvis said.

"Hey, hey. No conversations in my place without me," Clint said. He walked to the window dressed in tactical pants and his usual sleeveless shirt. He handed Steve a cup of black coffee.

"Alright. Clint, tell Jarvis he's doing a crappy job of babysitting one small girl," Steve said.

"I'm not getting into that," Clint said. He walked away and flopped back on the couch.

Steve laughed and shook his head.

"Jarvis, keep me informed, and don't let her boss you around."

"Of course, Captain," Jarvis replied.

Steve went to sprawl on Clint's other couch. Clint didn't bother to shower half the time right after a workout, so he didn't let the fact that his skin was clammy bother him too much either.

"Tony says you got blown last night at Bucky's place," Clint grinned at him.

"Let's not get into that, either. Jeeze, this place is like a barber shop. Nothing stays private," Steve complained.

"Play it louder, Jarvis. I can't hear it over the mixer," Estrella told him. She put in exactly the right amount of paprika and tapped the measuring spoon on the rim of the mixing bowl.

"Yes, Miss," Jarvis said. He increased the music volume five percent.

"Come on," she rolled her eyes at the ceiling.

"If I make it louder, we run the risk of waking Mister Barton across the hall," Jarvis said reasonably.

"Okay," Estrella said. She hummed along while she checked the dish in the oven. It was looking nice, with the chicken bubbling in its sauce and browning under the bread crumbs.

"It's almost nine. Isn't he up yet? I've already had time to clean and cook since Steve left for his run. I thought Avengers were responsible people. Early risers and all," she said. Then, she was back to singing loudly. Jarvis rarely answered her when she asked questions about the other Avengers.

The mixer was done and the creamy topping for the chicken casserole was ready to go in the oven. Estrella put on the mits and slid out the heavy glass dish. She set it on the wood cutting block and closed the oven with her foot. As soon as the mixer was off, Jarvis lowered the music seven percent.
"Careful, Miss," Jarvis warned when she set the mits aside and touched the browned chicken with her finger.

"You worry too much," Estrella said.

"Someone has to," Jarvis responded slightly under the volume of the music.

"What was that?" Estrella asked.

"Nothing at all," Jarvis spoke up.

Estrella used a spatula to move the cream topping from the mixing bowl. She evenly spread the topping onto the chicken, then set the bowl in the sink. Her casserole looked lovely, but she still had to add more crumbs and brown the top.

"Play me something funny, something a man would like," Estrella said as she moved the casserole back into the oven to brown.

"Are you certain, Miss? What men find amusing may not be to your taste," Jarvis cautioned her.

"Go on. Natasha says I need to get a better understanding of men. Play something," Estrella said.

"Very well. This is one of Sir's favorites," Jarvis said.

It had a fun, bouncing beat. And it was about bouncing! Balls. Big, bouncing balls. Estrella laughed when she learned what kind.

She set the timer in the kitchen and headed for the bathroom. She hadn't wanted to touch the bathroom until the food was in the oven. It was something her mami had taught her and it made sense.

The song was easy to learn, most of it, so she was singing along by the time it was halfway through.

"Jarvis don't let me miss the timer going off in the kitchen," she said above the music.

"Of course, Miss. I should also inform you that Captain Rogers has returned from his run. He is across the hall with Mister Barton. He took the news that you were in his suite fairly well. At least, I suppose he did. His brow didn't do the crinkly thing, but one can never know exactly what he is thinking," Jarvis told her.

"I guess that's not too bad, then. I'll only have time to do the floor. He'll want a shower before we go to the coffee shop and the library. Play something a little faster," Estrella said.

"As you wish, Miss," Jarvis said. He searched his files for something technically a little faster than the previous song. He made sure it was within the vocal range of the Miss, though she did have an impressive range.

"That's not any faster, Jarvis. Come on! I want to get this floor done. Men are so dirty. I bet he doesn't even notice the hairs behind the door," Estrella said.

"Captain Rogers has superlative visual acuity," Jarvis defended him.

"Then he should know they are there," she said. She shook the bath mats into the tub and rinsed the dust down the drain with the detachable shower sprayer. She would clean the tub more thoroughly when she had time later. For now, she set aside the mats and swept the floor. The bathroom was so big! It was making her tired, just getting half of it. The music was getting softer, but she wasn't going to fuss at Jarvis again. She had to get done and out so Steve could shower, and so she could go get ready too.

"Captain, Miss Estrella requires assistance in your bathroom," Jarvis said in the middle of him and Clint arguing about baseball versus football.

Steve was up and across the hall before he could think to ask anything more about Estrella's condition. His door opened under his push, and he ran through to the bathroom, barely noticing the wonderful smell in the kitchen.

"Eya? Eya!" he said.

At least she was standing up, but not for long. She began to slump toward the floor from where she leaned against the wall. Steve scooped her up. Her head lolled back and she looked up at him, only half aware.

"Hi," she said to him, dreamy and disoriented.

"Jarvis?" Steve asked for information while he pressed two fingers to her throat.

"She should be fine, Captain, if you let her lie down for a while and get her to drink some water," Jarvis said.

Steve kicked his door wider and carried Estrella to the elevator. The doors were open on both sides, and Nat's suite opened when he used a shoulder to push the door. He hoped Natasha wasn't around. It felt wrong, going to the women's side, but Estrella needed her bed.

"To the left," Jarvis directed him.

He turned up the lights in her room so that Steve could see clearly to not trip over the shoes she'd left out.

Steve lay Estrella down on her bed, then hurried to the kitchen to get water for her.

"Do I have to? I'm getting tired of water. Water, water, water," she mumbled.

"Yes, Miss, I'm afraid so. Let the Captain help you," Jarvis said.

"Let the Captain help me. Bleh, bleh-" she said until Steve pressed the rim of the glass to her lips. She drank obediently, then turned up her chin to refuse any more.

"He doesn't like being called 'the Captain' all the time," she complained.

"Shhh," Steve shushed her. He held her head in his hand and encouraged her to drink some more. She pressed her lips together in a flat line at him for a second, but she opened up when he insisted.

"You shouldn't have got me the necklace if you wanted me to be quiet," she told him. She sounded sassy, but weak. Steve laid her down and pulled the top pillow off the stack behind her head. It bent her neck too much and he wanted her to breathe.

He pressed his fingers to her throat and pulled out his cell phone.
"Transfer," he requested of Jarvis.

A new app showed up on his phone and he tapped it. A black screen with a blipping line indicated her current heart pattern.

"Display baseline concurrently, match frequency," Steve said.

Another line blipped along under the current readings. It was more regular, with deeper troughs and higher crests. Estrella's heart was fluttering along, showing not much of a pattern.

"Why haven't you called Doctor Kalfey?" he asked Jarvis.

"Because this is within the range of normal for the Miss. It's not good, but she has always recovered from it," Jarvis said.

Estrella made mouthy motions with her hand and rolled her eyes at Jarvis.

"Traitor," she whispered.

"I heard that, Miss," Jarvis told her, but there was only affection in his tone.

"What percent has Tony reached?" Steve asked Jarvis.

"Ninety seven point eight five eight," Jarvis replied.

"I thought he was going for ninety-five," Steve said.

"Sir is a perennial over-achiever. He was waiting until he reached ninety eight percent certainty before he contacted you. He is more familiar with her heart patterns than you are, Captain. There was no need to be overly concerned," Jarvis told him.

"Her blood is barely circulating," Steve pointed out.

Estrella was frowning at him. She didn't like it when her favorite people were unhappy with each other. She reached out and put a finger to his lips. He let her keep it there, as long as she didn't get in the way of him watching the heart monitor on his phone. Her heart fluttered a little harder for half a minute.

"Whatever you're thinking, stop it. You need to rest," he said behind her finger, his words slightly smooshed. Seemingly in defiance, her heart fluttered at him again. Even the girl's organs were trained to talk back to him it seemed. He pushed her hand away from his face.

"The Miss is always fine after these incidents. I only called you because I cannot prevent her from hitting her head. She is stubborn, just as much as some others I won't mention," Jarvis said with snippy lightness.

"Stop fussing, both of you. Let me rest so we can go out. Steve, go shower. You smell," she told him. She rested back into the pillows and her eyes began to close.

"Jarvis, the casserole!" Estrella said suddenly, and she struggled to sit up. Steve gently put his hand in the middle of her chest and pressed her back down.

Her heart monitor bleeped a warning and Estrella looked at him with wide eyes.

"I'm sorry, Eya. You rest and I'll go take out the casserole. It smells great. I'll be right back," Steve said.
He got up and left in a hurry. He shouldn't have pushed her down to the bed like that. He called himself all kinds of fool while he went across again and took the glass dish out of the oven. There was a sink full of dirty dishes, mostly mixing bowls and measuring spoons and cups. He hadn't known he had all this stuff in his suite. A mixer? Apparently he had a mixer. A big one that he couldn't have missed seeing in his small kitchen. Steve covered the casserole with foil then turned off the oven.

The elevator was still open, so he went back through to Nat's place, but only to the hallway outside her bedroom. He held his phone and watched the heart monitor.

"Estrella?" Steve said. Her heart jumped slightly. She'd heard him.

"I didn't mean to scare you. I didn't want you to get up and exert yourself. I took the casserole out and covered it. And I turned the oven off. Are you mad at me?" he asked.

"No. But I've ruined our morning. You're not going to let me out of bed so we can go to the coffee shop," she said.

Steve slid his back down the wall in the hallway, her door frame at his left side.

"Don't worry about the coffee shop. It'll be there the next time we try. I've already been by and talked to Izzy. He misses you. And I can bring your books back to the library. I bet Wanda has more set aside for you," Steve said.

She was silent. He could almost feel her disapproval flowing out into the hall. Him going for her wasn't good enough, he knew. She wanted to go. She wanted to get out of the tower and he didn't blame her. The place made him feel boxed in sometimes too.

"Eya, I think you should consider letting us improve your heart," Steve said after a minute.

"What's there to consider?" she asked.

"A two percent chance that something else might happen along with fixing your heart," Steve told her honestly.

"What else could happen?" she wondered.

"Lots of things. You could end up like me, but that's not very likely because we'll be using the weaker part of my blood. If anything else but your heart changes, it may not be noticeable," Steve said.

He'd been strongly resistant to the idea from the beginning, but seeing Estrella like this… They had to do something or she wouldn't live for long. One strong fright and she'd go into arrest.

"Do you want me to do it?" she asked him.

"It's not what I want that matters," Steve said, reminding her gently of an earlier conversation.

"But do you?" she persisted.

"I want you around for a little longer. I'm not sure you'll make it far with your heart like it is. Haven't you found anything to live for yet?" he asked.

"I like music. I like to sing. I want to dance," Estrella said.

"Then think about that two percent," Steve told her.
Several minutes of silence went by while Steve watched her heart slow it's fluttering and ease into a more productive rhythm.

"Why are you hiding in the hallway?" she asked, sounding sleepy.

"Because I didn't want to scare you anymore," Steve said.

"Ain't scared," she whispered.

Steve smiled. He watched the heart monitor as it evened out to match her baseline pattern.

"She is asleep, Captain. If you would, please get a blanket for her from the closet. She sometimes has low body temperature. I will turn down the lights. Mind the shoes," Jarvis said.

"Hush, we'll wake her," Steve said.

"Not likely when she's sleeping like this," Jarvis told him.

Steve went to the guest room closet and took down a fluffy comforter. He turned toward the bed with it in his hands.

Estrella was the cutest. Nat had her wearing clothes that didn't swallow her whole. She was in jeans and a pretty top. None of it was tight, but she wasn't swaddled in yards of fabric, either. He had to draw her. She looked like a cross between a fairy and a punk rock chick, with her short, spiky black hair and her choker necklace.

"Captain," Jarvis admonished him.

Steve jumped into action again. He opened the blanket and laid it over her.

"What? I was getting the blanket like you said," Steve complained quietly. Damn if he was going to be called out by a computer program.

"You were lingering. You know how prolonged stares make her uncomfortable," Jarvis said.

Steve chose not to argue with the uselessness of that statement. She wasn't awake to see him staring. But to think that thought, he had to admit to himself that he'd been staring. Sure he was staring, he told himself. He was going to draw her and he needed detail. Thinking of drawing slowed him down again, so he turned his thoughts to other things.

"How much has she gained?" Steve asked.

He moved to the top of the bed and tucked down the edge of the comforter so it wasn't in her face.

"Perhaps we could discuss this when you reach your suite," Jarvis said.

Steve reached behind her neck and tugged on the knot he'd used for the necklace. It loosened and he lifted her neck and head slightly so he could pull it away. He didn't know how she could sleep on top of rough knotted Kevlar. Estrella grumbled something at him as he set the copper butterfly on her night table.

He resisted the urges her voice called up in him. He was already near her, and he did his best to suppress the rest of what her voice did to him. She looked so peaceful.

"Captain, I must insist that you leave," Jarvis said with clear disapproval.
"I'm going. Let me get through the shoes," Steve said.

Estrella's bedroom lights dimmed to complete darkness before Steve could turn around to look back at her. As he left Nat's suite, the door clicked firmly shut behind him.

"You know I wouldn't hurt her, Jarvis," Steve told the AI.

"Don't forget that I am able to monitor your heart, as well as changing body heat distributions," Jarvis said.

Steve got into the elevator. The door on the women's side slid shut and it was a moment longer than usual before the door on his side opened. It hadn't been shut at all a while ago. Was Jarvis getting attitude with him?

He went into his suite and started doing dishes.

"Her weights?" he asked Jarvis.

"Upon arrival, she weighed seventy-eight pounds. She currently weighs ninety one pounds," Jarvis said, cold and technical.

Steve was momentarily stunned by the numbers. His hands fell idle in the dish water. He weighed more than twice as much as her current weight, three times as much as when she'd first come to the tower. Even now, she didn't weigh as much as he had before the serum. The feel of her in his arms a little while ago had been light, insubstantial.

Thinking of carrying her, catching her when she was falling, and covering her with a blanket led his mind to think of Jarvis' peculiar concern for Estrella's physical needs. The AI had seemed very protective of her. Especially when Steve had heard her unmoderated voice.

"Are you angry with me?" Steve asked as his hands started moving on the dishes again.

"Your question is absurd. I do not indulge in anger," Jarvis told him.

"Sir, I believe the Captain may be convinced. He was speaking favorably of the procedure to the Miss. Shall we prepare?" Jarvis asked in the lab.

"Get it moving. I didn't like those readings. How long will it take you to fine-tune the emitter?" Tony asked.

"Less than an hour, Sir."

"What about Estrella? Has she made up her mind? We're not going to do this without her consent," Bruce said.

"She's got the hots for Spangles. Did you see the spike in her heart rate when she touched him? She'll do it if he bats his eyelashes at her and asks nicely," Tony said.

"You're not her primary care physician, and you're abusing the parameters of medical ethics," Bruce said. He looked pointedly to the heart monitor on Tony's phone. It stayed open a lot lately.

"So sue me. I'm trying to save his girl," Tony said.
"We don't know that she will ever become 'his girl','" Jarvis said.

"Hey, don't think I don't smell the green on you, intangible man! You just elevator-checked the Captain," Tony waggled his phone at Jarvis.

Estrella woke to Natasha sitting on the edge of her bed and patting her shoulder.

"Hmmm? Is it morning already?" she wondered.

"No. It's evening. Get up and have tea with me," Nat said.

"Okay," Estrella agreed.

She reached over and got her necklace from the nightstand. Strange that she didn't remember taking it off. She tied it on how Steve had taught her to with his boy scout knot. She would give just about anything to see a picture of little Steve Rogers wearing a scout uniform. He probably didn't have any pictures from back then.

Estrella brushed her teeth and washed her face. She took a moment to straighten all the shoes that Natasha had her considering. They were old, Nat said, and were about to be donated to charity. There weren't any scuffs on the bottoms of some of them. Estrella knew when she was being fibbed to, but she let it pass. Most of them had heels, anyway. She didn't like heels.

Natasha had steaming cups of water ready for them on the coffee table, and three kinds of tea for her to choose from. Estrella took a pinch of lemon zinger into her strainer and set it into the water. She didn't mind because she was paying for her share of the groceries now.

"Estrella, you scared Steve today," Nat told her.

Natasha was sitting sideways on the couch, with her feet pulled up under her. Estrella wasn't scared of her anymore. In awe of her, maybe, but not scared. Natasha was so elegant and accomplished, she couldn't help but to admire her.

"You should tell him that he's a super-hero and he shouldn't be scared of every little thing," Estrella replied.

"He's a man, Estrella, cut him some slack. He's fearless when it comes to aliens and artillery, robots and assassins. But if you give him a damsel in distress, his heart goes pitter-pat," Natasha said.

"So now everybody wants me to get this heart treatment. Like I'm a vampire on his blood," Estrella said with an expression of distaste.

"Steve has blood to spare. I've seen him lose more than you have in you and keep going. It barely slows him down," Natasha told her.

"Okay, so it's not the blood I object to. I don't want to change."

"You have to change a little if you want to live," Natasha pointed out.

"Alright. So take me to him. Or to Tony. Wherever it is they want me to go," Estrella agreed. She gave up worrying about the two percent. Everybody wanted her alive, so she'd do it.
"Are you sure?" Natasha asked. She took the leaves out of her water and Estrella did the same.

"No, but everyone seems to think I should do it now. You people know more than I do, so I'll do it. If it turns out bad, I'll be alive to make you regret it, right?" she said.

"Yes, you will. Now drink your tea," Natasha said.

Three sips of the hot tea, and Estrella started feeling sleepy again.

"You put something…" she said, woozy.

"I wouldn't have let you drink it if you didn't want the procedure," Natasha said.

"Okay," Estrella answered weakly. She still didn't care much what Natasha did with her.

Steve was coming into the room to get her and that was nice. He picked her up again and she laughed against his shoulder.

"So we're gonna do this, huh?" he asked her. They were already in the elevator. Steve had her, and she could see the color of Nat's hair off to the side.

"Yup. Get your blood and do the thingy. I'll be alright. Won't I, Jarvis?" she asked.

"I am certain that you will, Miss, or I would not be helping Mister Stark with the procedure," Jarvis assured her.

Steve was glad that Estrella had decided to let them help. Having read all the files, he still had his concerns, but it couldn't be helped. They left the elevator and he carried her through to Bruce's half of the lab.

They'd made a cushioned table, molded to her shape. There were restraints, but they didn't expect the procedure to be painful. She simply needed to be still so that the emitter could pulse rays precisely at her heart and nowhere else.

Steve didn't want to let her go, but Bruce and Doctor Kalfey were looking at him and waiting. He laid her in the padded form they'd made and stepped away.

Steve moved to her side again and let her take his hand. Now that she was lying down again, the wooziness from Natasha's tea didn't swim her head around so much. Steve stood beside her, far too tall. She tugged at him.

Bruce pulled up a chair for Steve to sit in.

"They have to take your blood. I want to see. I want to see what's going in me," Estrella said.

Steve bit the inside of his lip to keep a straight face. Estrella tended to say interesting things when she was under the influence of poor health or strong medicine. He wondered if she'd be as funny under the influence of wine. Then, he recalled that her liver was damaged. No wine for her.

"Are you sure the sight of his blood won't bother you?" Bruce asked her.

He swabbed the inside of Steve's elbow with antiseptic, then wiped it dry.

"Quit asking me everything twice. Just do it," she said.
Steve chuckled at her. Bruce smiled, then slid the large needle into Steve's arm. They watched the dark red blood flow out of him and into the tubing to the separator machine. Estrella wished in her befuddled head that Steve's blood would come straight to her, and not go through the stupid machine. Wouldn't it be so much better that way, warm and strong?

"You need to sleep now, Estrella. Jarvis and I are going to thread a flexible needle into the main arteries of your heart so that the Captain's blood can be administered directly to where it's needed," Doctor Kalfey said.

"No. He's Steve," Estrella insisted, then she fell asleep as the nurse got her IV started and added a drug to put her under.

"Now, Doctor. We don't want the blood to cool," Jarvis said.

"You should go," Bruce told Steve. He removed the needle from his arm and gave him a superfluous bandage.

"No. She wanted me here," Steve said.

"There's no time to argue. Turn around at least, while we prep her," Doctor Kalfey demanded, already focused on her work. Bruce slipped on a paper gown and gloves with help from a nurse.

Steve turned around when another nurse went to cutting Estrella's clothing off of her chest with scissors. Maybe they did have to hurry.

"Alright," Bruce said in Steve's direction.

Steve looked to see that Estrella was bare from the hips up, except for her necklace and a blue towel they'd laid across her breasts. An area of her skin was orange with iodine, then wiped with an alcohol swab.

Doctor Kalfey inserted a long, strange looking needle in through Estrella's ribs. She wasn't watching her hands but a monitor beside Estrella which showed the blood vessels of Estrella's heart. The pale yellow fluid Bruce had separated out from Steve's blood waited in a bag attached to Doctor Kalfey's needle.

"Go," The Doctor said to Bruce.

Bruce swung down a mechanical arm Steve hadn't noticed before and nudged up the blue towel slightly. There was an odd Stark device at the end of it. Bruce fit it on Estrella's skin, over her heart.

"Now," Bruce said.

"Emitter at ten percent," Jarvis said.

Steve saw some light leaking out from the edges of the device. Or, maybe it was so bright that it was glowing through her skin. Doctor Kalfey backed the needle out and slid it forward again.

"Go," she said.

"Emitter at fifty percent," Jarvis' voice told them.

Once again, Doctor Kalfey withdrew the needle and guided it forward.

"Go," she said.
"Emitter at one hundred percent," Jarvis said.

Steve had questions, but they could wait for later or not at all. It made him feel self-conscious that the substance they were using to effect change in Estrella was from him. He held her hand and wondered if Estrella would feel like she owed her life to someone else, as he did? She didn't, of course. They were helping her because they liked her and they wanted to help. Unlike Steve, who had been transformed with a particular use in mind.

Bruce held the device to Estrella's chest for several minutes after Doctor Kalfey had finished administering Steve's blood to her heart and Jarvis called out a gradual stepdown of intensity. A nurse administered a cloudy mix of something into her IV bag and squeezed the liquid into Estrella's bloodstream quickly.

Steve watched Estrella's heart profile, now on a monitoring machine they could all see. Her heartrate was elevated from the stress of the procedure, but already Steve could see some improvement in the smoothness and amplitude of the profile.

In his head, he prayed for her, that the procedure would be a success with no unwanted side effects. Much like rooting for his favorite team to win in sports, Steve willed his blood to do the work they expected of it and to heal Estrella's heart. He wondered if she were awake, would she feel the same warmth and tingling he felt when he was healing.

Finally, Bruce pulled away the device which Jarvis had been controlling. The strange needle Doctor Kalfey had been using lay on the blue cloth in a tray of surgical instruments which hadn't been used. Steve's keen eyes noticed fine wires spiraling down the outside surface of the needle in both directions. While he looked at it, it moved slightly like the prehensile tail of an animal.

Jarvis had been a large part of this procedure. He'd controlled the emitter, and it appeared that he may have guided the needle into the arteries of her heart muscle to administer Steve's blood.

"Thank you, Jarvis," Steve said under his breath.

"You are welcome, Captain, though it is for the sake of the Miss that I was eager to assist," Jarvis said quietly from the speaker of Steve's phone.

Steve was in her recovery room once again when she woke from the procedure. Natasha had brought her another bra and a top to wear. It may have been a major heart procedure, but all she had to show externally was a needle puncture in her hand from the IV, and another puncture at her ribs where Steve's blood had been administered.

Natasha sat on Estrella's bed, leaned up against the headboard next to her. Steve sat in the chair at her other side. They both turned to look at her when she moved under the blankets and made a humming sound.

"Eya," Steve said, and got up. He sat on the edge of her bed and took her hand in his.

Estrella opened her eyes and saw Steve and Natasha smiling at her. She felt good. Good because she could feel her blood rushing through her veins like never before, and good because her friends were waiting to greet her.

"Did it work?" she asked, but she already knew. She felt a little sleepy from the drugs, but she felt strong and full of energy.
"Look," Steve said. He pointed to the heart monitor machine, which still displayed readings from the paper band around her wrist. Natasha leaned back out of the way and Estrella sat up to see.

The lines forming across the display were almost classic in their shape. Smooth curves up and down with a wiggle here and a wiggle there, like a little dance on the screen. She watched for over a minute, and it only slightly wobbled out of shape twice in that time.

Estrella giggled. She would be able to dance! She'd be able to run and keep up with Steve's long strides. Along with the use of her necklace, she might be able to live a nearly normal life.

This was something else she owed to the Avengers, but she felt more able to pay the debt now. She had a future. She could study and get a better job. She didn't allow herself to think of her other worries, which had not diminished any. The worries would be there for another day.

For now, she could see her excitement for the future reflected back in Steve's eyes. Natasha was happy for her too, but Nat never got giddy about anything. She patted Estrella's arm and left the room so that Estrella and Steve could have some time.

Once in the hallway of the medical ward, Natasha spoke to Tony through the com device she was wearing.

"You can relax, Tony. She's happy. Steve's happy. He's stupid with it. You should see his face. But leave them alone. You should stop monitoring her heart, now," Natasha told him.

She strode to the elevator. She'd had enough of joy for now. Any more and she was going to get a toothache. Or gag. She was inside and going up before Tony answered her.

"I'm glad. The kid was starting to worry me. But there's still no it. I'm not paying up on that until I see the firstborn child. Or the sex tape," Tony said.

"You know better than most that sex tapes aren't on tape anymore," Nat said.

"Yes, but it sounds so much better that way. Sex vid doesn't have the same feel to it. It misses that nostalgic essence of truly raunchy seventies porn," Tony said as if he was describing the bouquet of a fine wine.

"And what do you think Steve would do to you if he ever found out you recorded them in flagrante delicto?" Natasha asked.

She could imagine that Steve's punishment would merely begin with bodily harm, if he'd been showing signs of protectiveness for Estrella weeks ago like Bruce described.

"It would be painful to listen to the tirade of righteous fury, but it might be worth it. Let's not get ahead of ourselves. I'm not willing to concede that there's an it, or that there even could be. He's still a virtuous respecter of damaged maidens and she's still fearful of anything which is both stiff and manly," Tony told her.

"Then double the bet," Natasha challenged him with a smile and a quirk of her brow.

"You sound like you have inside information. Foul deal. No doubling," Tony disagreed.

"I always have inside information. You knew that from the beginning," Natasha reminded him.
Chapter 16

Author's note: I know this chapter is kind of a downer, but it’s necessary for the plot. If you don't like the feel of the first scene, then skip it, but you might miss a tidbit or two. The next chapter will be more fun, I promise!

Steve walked the twenty blocks to the church with his eyes mostly on the pavement in front of him instead of looking around for threats like he should have. He'd welcome a delay or a challenge right now, to give him more time to put off the meeting he was headed toward. Like things always go, it's quick and easy to get to places you're not looking forward to being.

Sam had told him that he shouldn't seek the advice of a priest, and Bucky had mocked him about running off to confession after the girl and the blow job. Bucky and Sam were great guys and he respected them in a lot of ways, but Steve wasn't going to let his friends dictate to him how to live his personal life. Even if he'd find it easier to just follow their advice. Especially because he would find it easier. Sometimes the easy things weren't the right things, and he had to make it right.

He turned off the sidewalk and went into the front courtyard of the church. He'd made an appointment with Father Miller because what he had to say might take a while and he didn't want to tie up his time right before Mass. The elderly priest was waiting for him at the back of the church, kneeling.

Steve made the sign of the cross with holy water, then sank down to finish the last two decades of the rosary with Father Miller. After the final prayer, Father kept silent for a moment with his eyes closed. The silence in the church was peaceful. Reverent. Steve soaked it in. His nervousness about what he had to say eased a little.

Father Miller was old, but he wasn't disabled. He rose from the kneeler easily.

"Steve, it's good to see you," he said. He shook Steve's hand with a smile, and they walked to the side exit.

"Thanks for meeting with me, Father."

"Did you want confession, or should we talk in my office?"

"Your office is fine," Steve told him.

Father Miller led him to the adjacent building and Steve followed along. The priest seemed to know that he was carrying around something troubling, so he respected that by not filling the few minutes of the walk with idle chatter. His office was a cluttered little room full of books, paperwork, and an old wooden desk. They sat, and Steve recalled the feeling of being called into the nun's office as a boy for some mischief he was guilty of.

"What troubles you?" Father Miller asked.

Steve took a deep breath, held it, then let it out, trying to let the tension out with the breath, as Bruce had taught him.
"It's pretty personal. Embarrassing," Steve began.

He felt the heat on his face and winced, recalling his night at Bucky's place. There was no way he could detail all those events here, and he didn't need to. He just needed the right words to get started. He glanced across at Father Miller. The man waited patiently, his hands steepled together and touching at the fingertips, elbows resting on the arms of his office chair.

"Rest assured that I've heard just about everything, and I've read things that would curl your ears. One of my best friends is the exorcist for the archdiocese. I doubt you've got anything to say that would shock me," Father Miller told him.

"Alright. Thanks. See, Father, I'm having a problem. I know it's not unusual for a guy to want sex, but I'm thinking that my body, being how it is, makes things worse. When I'm busy with work and I have to focus on missions, it's not so bad. But lately, we've had more down time than usual. I've got a little time to think. Sex is never far from my thoughts. I pray. I ask God for strength. I run my ass off every morning for as long as my schedule reasonably allows. I work out hard in the evenings before bedtime, then I pray again. Still, the temptation is always there and it's too much sometimes. I fail," Steve said.

"Well, it sounds like you're a normal, healthy man, not so unlike the rest of us. Except for the unusual level of physicality your profession requires. Tell me, do you run so much and work out so often in an effort to distract yourself with licit physical activity rather than illicit, or is all the exercise part of your normal routine?" Father Miller wanted to know.

"That's just an average day for me. I've got to move. I don't need the exercise, because the enhancements to my body would keep me in shape anyway, but I need the activity. It helps me to work out my anger and frustrations. On days when there's nothing to fight, it feels good to hit the bag, to spar with my team. We work together to keep each other in top shape. We have to. Our lives depend on everyone being as capable as possible. And that's part of the problem. I have to train with my teammate, Natasha. She's attractive. I had to refuse to train with her the other day, because I was afraid I couldn't control myself. I can't be like that. She has knowledge I need and I have to work with her closely. Very closely. She's understanding, but it shames me that I couldn't trust myself," Steve said.

His scowl was directed at himself, and the priest seemed to understand that.

"How severe is this problem? I don't think you'd have come to see me over a mere inconvenience or embarrassment. Were you in danger of harming her?" Father asked.

"I might have been if I had agreed to train with her. It's unprofessional of me. Dishonorable. There's more to it than what I'm saying. I'm not here for confession, though. I need guidance. This body I've got, with its enhancements, it's not the same as being a regular guy. I went through a while of masturbating several times a day, years ago, before the ice. It didn't slow me down for long. An hour later, sometimes sooner, and I'd be recovered and wanting it again. I'm sorry. I'm not trying to be crude," Steve stopped for a moment to let his face recover from the shade of red he knew he was turning.

Father Miller smiled kindly and shook his head.

"It takes more bravery and fortitude than most men have to face a problem like this. Some things are best faced in the bright light of scrutiny, whether they seem crude or not. These enhancements. They make you unique. I may not be the best guidance for you, but I don't know anyone else to direct you to. I'm sorry, Steve, but I need to ask… Do you look at pornography?"
"No. I mean, I tried it for a day or so when they first showed me the internet. Some of the people I live with thought it would be funny to send me some web links. I looked. But it's not for me. I haven't looked at it in a few years. I don't need more temptation. I don't want to make my problems worse," Steve said.

"That's wise of you. I'm glad to hear it," Father Miller said.

He spent a moment in quiet thought, and Steve got the impression that he was digging around in his mind for long unused knowledge. He should probably let the man think, but Steve needed him to understand a few things. Father Miller pulled himself out of his thoughts and paid attention when Steve spoke.

"Things didn't used to be like this. We had pinup girls during the war. There were racy nudes. One of the guys had a black and white movie projector that we watched a few flicks on, but it was nothing like the stuff out nowadays. It's like along with figuring out DNA, they've taken apart the mind and learned every way to trip a guy up and make him fall into this stuff," Steve said. He had a lot on his mind, so he continued.

"This isn't meant to be confession, like I said, but I had a girl over the other night. A waitress I met at a restaurant. I tried to have sex with her. I was going to. But, she was shaved and had tattoos, and the stuff coming out of her mouth ended it for me. I'm not trying to make excuses and say it was anybody's fault but mine, what happened that night. I called her fully aware of what I was asking for. The only reason I didn't was because she turned me off. The women of this century are so brazen. I don't know how to find a nice girl. It bothers me a lot that I can't even try to have a normal relationship and settle down, and I have to resort to those kinds of girls if I want some company," Steve said.

"Steve, let's not be too harsh on the ladies. They're nothing more than our culture has made them. Now, why can't you find a nice young woman? They do still exist, and I'm sure there are any number of them who would be willing to become Mrs. Rogers," Father Miller said.

He levelled a serious look at Steve and waited for an answer. More of the truth was coming out with Steve. He'd been certain that there was more to this than an overactive libido. He'd been advising people for enough years to know that it took time to work the full truth out so that a situation could be dealt with properly, all things considered. He knew that Steve must have more to tell him.

"I can't get a nice girl because I'm 'Captain America'," Steve snorted derisively, "the people we fight against are powerful, devious, and they have no ethics. What kind of jerk would I be to get a nice girl close to me and make her bait for some bas- uh, villain to kidnap and hold against me? I can't do that to any girl. Especially not one I care for."

"So you're saying that a serious romantic relationship and its natural conclusion of marriage and family won't be possible for you? Ever?" Father wanted to know.

"I don't see it. Not anytime soon. Hydra would love for me to present them with that kind of vulnerability. Any of the other kooks and tyrants we face would jump at the chance. Vengeance, leverage, or pure evil. My enemies would hardly need an excuse. I want to love somebody, Father. I do. But, how can I, knowing I'd be putting her or, God forbid, my children in grave danger just by being who I am?" Steve asked.

His voice rose with his frustration and his thumb tapped a hard, agitated beat on the arm of his wooden chair. Thinking of this made him want to pound something. Father Miller paused before speaking, giving himself time to think and Steve time to calm himself.
"That's a very valid concern and by thinking of it ahead of time, you already show love and considerate for any future spouse you may have. Steve, you should realize that you're not the only person with this problem. Everyone in a position of authority from a local police chief all the way up to the president has the same problem. ISIS, Al Qaeda, South American drug lords, street gang leaders, anyone with a grudge could be considered a threat to a man's family. The risk is real, but maybe you shouldn't let it keep you from loving someone. There are some good, brave women out there still. You can pray to find one of them, and then do your best to keep her safe," Father Miller suggested.

"And until then, Father? It's getting bad. Rape fantasies of my teammate, picking up waitresses, and I let my pal pay a hooker to blow me. I'm sinking pretty low here. I don't know what else to do. If it was just the sex to worry about, I wouldn't be taking up your time. But it's distracting me from my duty and interfering with my training. It's dangerous for me to be distracted like this. People's lives depend on me being focused," Steve said.

"It sounds like you've already let things get far out of hand. I'm sorry to hear that, but it shows me the severity of the problem. I don't think I'm going to have an adequate answer for your needs. I'm not sure anyone would, though there are far wiser men than me. One suggestion I might make… Have you tried fasting?" Father Miller asked.

"Fasting. Not eating? That's a nice idea and all, but my metabolism is ridiculous. I need at least six thousand calories a day. If I had a regular work schedule like most guys, I suppose I could try it, but I get called out to duty at random. I can't go into combat weak. It's not an option," Steve denied. He felt bad telling the man 'no' when he was trying to come up with ideas to help him, but they had to deal with this in reality, not ideals.

Father Miller nodded. Then he thought for a while. The man across the desk from him was on edge and pressed hard for a solution to his problems. He could see the tension in the way he became agitated when merely speaking about it. People didn't come for guidance at the first inklings of a problem. They always waited until a crisis moment had been reached. He knew that the same was true for Steve. His struggles were grave, dangerous, and immutable. They needed a substantial solution.

"If you read scripture, you will find examples of men of similar circumstance to yourself. Especially in the Old Testament. Our Lord is kind and merciful. He will not expect of you more than you can bear, even given your enhancements. There are no perfect answers to your problem, Steve. I'm hesitant to recommend it, and I would never give such advice to any of my other parishioners. But if it prevents a greater harm, and there is no other recourse, then I would pray the Lord would allow you some relief within reason. Do you understand what I'm telling you?" Father Miller asked carefully.

His words had been very specific. Steve played them over in his mind, committing them to memory.

"If it's necessary to prevent greater harm, such as me losing control and assaulting Natasha, and if there is no other recourse such as a night dream, and if I've already prayed for strength which is failing me, then under those conditions, I may be allowed to masturbate? God, I hate that word," Steve said bitterly. He'd always felt the m-word had been designed to chastise its user, just with the gawky, shameful sound of it.

"May the Lord have mercy on my soul for suggesting it, and may the Holy Spirit guide your heart and mine, but yes. I beg you, don't use my words as an excuse to lead yourself astray into licentiousness and perversity. You're a strong man, Steve. A good man. Practice moderation in this. Use this outlet no more than necessary. Stay away from pornography. It can be spiritually damaging and terribly habit forming,” Father Miller warned.

The priest's face was gravely concerned. Steve felt like he had in the dim memories of Buck's father showing him how to use a knife. Father Miller was giving him a tool that he was expected to be careful and responsible with. Doctor Erskine had said much the same thing. He was to remain a good man.

It wasn't exactly what Steve had hoped for. He didn't know what he'd expected, but maybe he'd wanted the priest to say some miraculous prayer that would take away the needs his body pushed at him. As if he'd thought the church was a seller of magic tricks or quick fixes. Of course it wasn't. As always, life was a struggle. Always the choice between the lesser of evils. Could nothing be simple and easy? Steve sighed with the weight of the knowledge that things would be only a little easier for him. He didn't think he should thank Father Miller for the dispensation. The man had taken pains enough to make sure Steve understood that it wasn't free license to do whatever he wanted.

"I understand, Father. Responsibility and restraint are very familiar to me. I'll exercise them in this, too," Steve assured the man.

"Good. Do you desire reconciliation for the things you mentioned earlier which you made a point to tell me were not a confession?" Father Miller asked with a faint smile.

"I desire reconciliation, but I can't make a good confession. I still feel the pressure and the weakness that caused me to do those things in the first place, and I'm afraid of offending the Lord with hypocrisy. I know it won't be easy and that I'll fail sometimes. How can I honestly say I'm sorry if I know I'm gonna do it again?" Steve asked.

"Steve, I'm glad that you take the sacrament so seriously. But remember that reconciliation isn't simply for forgiveness. It's also a powerful source of fortitude and graces to help you avoid sin in the future. Our Lord Jesus knows your heart. He knows your struggle. Be reconciled to him, receive strength, and continue the fight," Father Miller advised in a strong, steadfast voice that would hearten any soldier facing battle.

"Yes, Father," Steve said.

He got out of his chair and knelt on the hard office floor. He bowed his head and made the best confession that he could. He included having partial intercourse with the waitress, and the oral sex with the hooker. He confessed his recent moments of weakness, and he asked for strength in the future. Father Miller absolved him, assigned him a penance, and told him to go with grace and be as good a man as he could be.

It wasn't a perfect solution, but it was more mercy and understanding than Sam or Bucky thought he'd get. Steve felt lighter of mind and heart on his walk back to the tower. There was still going to be a struggle, but he could plan and manage it now. He could live with that.

"Hey, take it easy. We don't have to get there all at once," Steve called out ahead of him.
He quickened his pace to keep up with Estrella. She was hurrying ahead, going around people and grinning back at him impatiently. Steve gave up trying to hide a smile. It was great to see her feeling so much better. He dodged around a few people and apologized, but he hurried after her.

She stood in front of their bench on the sidewalk by the coffee shop. She was a little out of breath, and Steve watched her pulse beat strong and regular at her throat just above the tattered blue strip of his old uniform. She was acting like a new recruit in peacetime. All eagerness and not much caution.

"You need to listen. Your heart is good now, but you still don't have a lot of energy reserves until you get your weight up and start some cardio training," Steve tried to caution her.

He stood close beside her on the sidewalk out of the direct path of the morning rush of pedestrians. He was wearing jeans and athletic shoes, a light shirt and his phone in his pants pocket. Estrella had on flat, strappy sandals, a multi layered skirt that came down to her knees, and a red t-shirt under a dark denim jacket. He wasn't sure he liked how she was putting stuff in her hair and styling it vaguely reminiscent of Tony's style.

"But it feels so good," she said with a big smile.

"I know it does, but you gotta take it slower. Your muscles aren't up to what your heart can do, yet," he told her.

"Are you saying I'm weak?" Estrella asked.

She squinted her eyes at him like she was offended, but her cute little mouth was fighting a smile.

"That's exactly what I'm saying. Let's go get in line so Izzy can see that you're alright. He said he was gonna come to the tower if I didn't bring you by the shop soon," Steve told her.

They went in past the café tables and the tables inside the shop. The locals knew that Captain America didn't come much anymore now that the homeless girl wasn't around. The coffee shop was regular morning busy, but all the women who used to sit and watch them weren't here.

They got in line and moved up as the drinks were ordered. Estrella got quiet. It was beyond strange to her that she was standing in line with everybody else, with her own money in her pocket and ready to buy an expensive espresso drink. The woman in front of Estrella was tall and she kept looking back over her shoulder at Steve.

"Be nice," Steve said low at her ear.

"Why? She's not. Doesn't she know it's rude to stare at you?" Estrella asked just loud enough for the woman to hear.

"Eya, this is what people do. I got used to it a year after I got the serum. A long time ago. Yeah, it bothers me sometimes, but I can't go around giving death glares to everyone. I don't want you to, either," he told her in a whisper at her ear.

"I'll smile at them when they stare, then," she said. She gave him a toothy smile which was all the more sinister for its false cheer.

"Ugh. That's not any better. Look, it's your turn. Order your drink and we'll talk in a minute," Steve said. He put his hands on her shoulders and turned her to face Kara at the order counter.

"Water, please. With lemons," Estrella said.
She set down a quarter and held a one dollar bill in her fist for the tip jar. Steve kept his hands resting comfortably on her shoulders in front of him. He had to sometimes, these last few days. She kept running off. And her heart could take the stress of him touching her, now. He figured that the sooner she got used to the feel of people touching her, especially with him being a man, the sooner she would get over her fears.

Izzy finished making the tall woman's drink and handed it to her. He'd heard Estrella's order and he started to make it when he noticed Steve's hands on her shoulders and the fact that it was exactly what he had fixed most often for the girl he'd been worried about.

"Steve, is this her?" Izzy asked.

He was looking closely at Estrella, smiling and hopeful. Steve had told him that she was doing a lot better and that her hair was cut, but Izzy just about couldn't believe the difference. And she was smiling.

Izzy came around the bar and pulled her into a nearly squashing hug.

"You look great! I'm so glad-"

"Eeep!" Estrella squeaked in distress. Izzy was a huge man, larger than Steve. If her heart was still weak, she'd have passed out from the fright.

"Hey, loosen up. She's not good with that kind of thing yet," Steve said.

He flicked Izzy's arms clear and gently pulled Estrella back to his side. She'd gone quiet and wide-eyed, but she felt better when she was closer to Steve. She'd gotten used to the men of the Avengers knowing not to get too close to her. Izzy couldn't have known.

"I'm sorry, man. I didn't mean to- I- I'm sorry," Izzy apologized awkwardly.

He stood there and fiddled with his apron strap for a second, then he eyed the coffee line and got back behind the bar. Kara watched it all with quiet amazement. She was having trouble believing that the slim, pretty girl with Steve was their used-to-be scruffy customer.

"It's alright. No harm done. I know it's a surprise. I should have told you," Steve said. His own heart was misbehaving. Izzy wasn't a threat. Estrella had overreacted because of her learned fears. But what had made him jump to action was her distress. And now Steve was rattled because he'd almost overreacted against Izzy. He didn't handle civilians like that, but Izzy was a big fella. He could take it. Maybe with a little bruising to his arms.

Izzy got Estrella her lemon water. He gave her another apologetic smile and looked surprised when she put her dollar in his tip jar.

"Sorry. I'm glad you're doing good," he said quietly.

Estrella smiled at him and sipped her drink. It was exactly how she liked it.

"Caramel macchiato, no cream," Steve stepped up and told Kara. She nodded to him mutely and took his money. Steve stepped aside to let the next customer up.

"I'm sorry, Izzy. Maybe I'm a little too protective," Steve said. He'd seen the look of surprise on Izzy's face when he'd shoved the man's arms away from Estrella.

"It's nothing. You know your girl. You gotta take care of her," the barista said.
"It's not like that. She's my friend. But, yeah," Steve told him over the espresso machine.

He put his tip in the jar too. Izzy shrugged and smiled at him like he was hearing bullshit, but he handed Steve his drink without arguing.

Estrella was waiting for Steve, and they went outside together. She sat on her end of the bench and Steve took his.

"Gosh, I'm glad I can talk to you now. I was always wondering what you were thinking but not saying," Steve told her.

"You never had any problem talking to me," she picked at him for his choice of words.

"You know what I mean," he smirked at her, then sipped his drink.

He looked at hers and wondered why she'd gotten water.

"Because I only used to get coffee as a treat. It made my heart race and hurt sometimes. I still wanted it when I could afford it because it felt like a treat. I don't need treats anymore," Estrella answered his unspoken question.

Steve nodded. He looked toward the large front window of the coffee shop. He was still feeling bad about getting rough with Izzy.

"Don't torture yourself. He'll probably go home and brag to all his friends that Captain America touched him," Estrella tried to ease his mind.

Steve winced at how wrong that sounded. His bottom lip pulled back in distaste.

Estrella giggled.

"Don't laugh. It would have been bad if I'd hurt him," Steve admonished her.

"But you didn't, so forget about it," she told him.

"Alright," Steve agreed, "Hey, you wanna walk? This bench isn't the same without the old you on it."

Estrella got up and they moved along slowly, closer to the street curb where foot traffic wasn't so bad. She didn't mind going around the little trees and posts.

"You miss the old me?" she asked.

"Sometimes. You were my little fish in my little pond, remember. Now it feels like you're swimming around with me in the big pond," Steve said thoughtfully.

It bothered him that she was now in the big water with all the sharks and barracudas he had to watch out for. He'd thought of her as safe from his enemies, before. But even Izzy, another little fish, had been enough to frighten her.

"No, Steve, you're flopping around between ponds. That's why you feel strange. I'll never be big enough for your pond. I wouldn't want to be. Or maybe I'm a goldfish in a bowl, floating in the bigger pond," Estrella pondered.

Steve wanted to smile at her metaphor, because it was pretty accurate, but it also made her sound vulnerable. A goldfish was nothing but a snack to the people he dealt with. Even as his friend, she could be vulnerable to the dangers he'd described to Father Miller.

"I don't think we've been fair to you. Not to frighten you, but just the passive act of being involved with us, me, Nat, and the guys, could put you in danger. If anyone's watching, they could use you to get to me. I need to teach you to be aware of your surroundings. Nat could help you learn basic defense. It would do your body some good, too," he said.

"I know. I've had a lot of time to think while I've been lazing around Natasha's suite. I don't care about all that. I like this living in the moment thing. If the bad guys take me someday, I'll just be gone. Poof!," she snapped her fingers, "I don't want you to worry about me. I've seen bad guys before, and I'm used to trouble. I'll either get through it or I won't. I don't want to go back to how I was yet."

Steve prodded her toward the outdoor mall where the library was, his hands expressing his defiance at the idea of her valuing her life so cheaply.

"Don't talk like that. You don't know what they could do to you. Your life means something and you should care about what happens to you. If you get taken, I'm gonna worry, and I'm coming after you," Steve told her.

"Don't push me. I'll pinch you where you won't like it," she threatened.

She held out her thumb and curled fingers the way she used to threaten her little cousins when she would babysit. They stood out of the way of pedestrians, not quite to the concrete tables.

"Yeah, I'm real scared," he said with a smile.

She got a mutinous look on her face, jaw forward and lips firm. Her hand darted out and clamped on to a thin pinch of skin at a sensitive part of his inner arm.

"Ow! Ow, ow, ow, alright, let go," Steve said. He fought off the urge to laugh. It hurt because she was wrenching hard on a thin piece of skin, but it was nothing like a gut shot or a lung full of acid. He'd successfully suppressed his defensive reaction, because she'd shown her intent loud and clear.

"Don't laugh at me," Estrella said with mean eyes, but there was a sparkle of humor there, too.

"Alright. Jeeze! Let up, ya bully," Steve danced to the side some, and pulled his arm free.

Estrella chomped her thumb and curled finger toward him repeatedly, finally smiling and laughing.

"Look, Captain America knows how to dance," she teased as Steve dodged out of her reach.

"I'll teach you how to dance," he grumbled through a smile. He quit dodging her grabs at his inner arms. He deftly caught both of her hands and held them straight out so she couldn't pinch at him anymore.

"This isn't dancing. It's like the big Jesus in Rio," she joked.

"Hey, I like the big Jesus in Rio," Steve said.

"Me too, but he doesn't dance. I want to dance, Steve," she said.

He let her hands fall. They'd set their drinks down on the edge of a planter when she'd started grabbing at him. Steve retrieved his drink and took a last sip from the bottom of it. He tossed the cup in a nearby receptacle.
"You could find dance lessons somewhere. What kind of dancing do you wanna learn?" Steve asked.

"I don't know. Lessons are probably expensive. It would be cheaper to just go somewhere with music and learn by watching other people," she said.

They were standing still, talking. Everyone else who was in the little mall was walking around between stores, or coming out of the library with books. Many looked at him, looked closer at his beard, then tried to make eye contact so they could talk to him. Estrella finished her lemon water and watched how the people looked at him.

"See, I told you. You can't hide all that with a beard," Estrella said. She waved a hand down his body and back up.

"I know. Let's go see Wanda," Steve said. He wanted to move on, away from the by passers. He didn't feel like giving out his autograph today. He was enjoying his friend's company and basking in the sparks of her quirky energy.

She threw away her cup and the remaining ice. Estrella wanted to get the library door for herself, so Steve let her. She held it open for him and he smiled as they went in. His ma would scold, but Eya was having a good time turning the tables on him.

"Train him up right, girl. Wait, you let him put a collar on you?" Wanda asked as soon as they were inside. She held out her arms and Estrella went straight to her for a hug. She wasn't scared like she'd been with Izzy, though Wanda was probably almost as strong.

Estrella pulled away to stand by Wanda and the woman looked at her hair.

"That's real nice. Have his people been treating you right?" Wanda asked.

"They have. I'm staying with Natasha," Estrella said.

"The red-headed one?" Wanda wanted to know.

Estrella nodded.

"Sure, she gets a hug," Steve said with mock jealousy.

"She didn't drop a dead space whale in my neighborhood. Do you know how bad that stunk before they got it all hauled away?" Wanda turned on him.

"Hey, that wasn't me. That was Tony or the Hulk," Steve said, his hands up in innocence.

Wanda gave him the stink-eye, which seemed to be the sum of her feelings for him.

"Don't be mean. Steve's nice to me. They all are. Look, Tony Stark made a thingy so I can use my voice without hurting people's heads," Estrella told Wanda.

She looped her thumb under the butterfly and pushed up her chin so that Wanda could see it better.

"That don't look like a Stark machine," Wanda said skeptically.

Steve liked how she didn't ask about Estrella's voice. She let it pass, but she paid attention when Estrella twisted the butterfly to show her the silver metal of the device on its back.

"That's the part that does the work for my voice. The part that Stark made," Estrella said.
"Nngh," Steve grunted. He hung his head and took a deep breath. One fist grounded on the surface of Wanda's desk, and the other hand came up to rub at his eyes. He leaned forward some so his shirt might hide the front of his pants.

"Sorry," Estrella whispered to him.

She let the butterfly rest back against her larynx again and rubbed a hand soothingly on Steve's arm. He pulled away from her a little. He'd never heard that much of her voice at one time, and at that volume. It took several seconds for the tones to quit playing in his brain.

"Hmm. Your voice does that to a big boy like him?" Wanda wondered.

Steve tried his best at a smile, but he could feel that it came out as a grimace.

"Yeah. I'm really sorry, Steve. I didn't mean to. I forgot," Estrella said.

"'S'allright," he said tightly. He stayed leaning on Wanda's desk some. She hadn't yet noticed what else Estrella had done to him, and he wanted to keep it that way.

"You gonna fall down?" Wanda asked with a hint of concern.

"No. I got it," Steve said. He pushed himself up and turned to face the door and sit on the edge of the desk.

"Get your ass off my desk!" Wanda said.

"Wanda," Estrella admonished, but Steve could hear her smiling.

Steve got his weight off the desk.

"I'll go return these," Steve said. He took the three books from the bag Estrella had at her hip and went inside the heavy glass doors to the circulation desk.

"I don't know why you'd want to hide a voice like that. I wish I could do that," Wanda said.

"It's not so great. My voice made it where I couldn't talk to people," Estrella explained.

"It only hurts men, right? You could have talked to everybody else," Wanda assumed.

"No, it wasn't so easy. If I let myself talk to half the people, then I'd find myself accidentally talking to men, too. I couldn't do that. But it's good now. Tony fixed it. And Steve made the necklace to put the silver thing on," Estrella said.

She ran her fingers over the edges of the butterfly.

"Did he really?" Wanda asked, surprised.

"He did. He's an artist. But don't tell anyone. He needs to keep some things private because everyone already thinks they own him," Estrella said with a resentful frown.

"I can keep a secret," Wanda said. She went to sit behind her desk.

"I know you can. I wasn't happy with you for calling Jarvis on me," Estrella looked at Wanda with a lifted eyebrow and crossed her arms.

"Tough. You were gonna die. It looks like you're happy, so don't complain to me," Wanda passed a "I didn't want to live. But now I do. Thanks, Wanda," Estrella said. She smiled at the woman, done pretending that she was upset with her.

"Alright, but no more hugs. One a day is enough, and only from you or my mama," Wanda said firmly.

Estrella smiled at her until Wanda shooed her away.

"Go get some books. I know three novels didn't last you three weeks," Wanda ordered her.

Estrella went inside and found Steve browsing the fiction section.

"Wanda likes you," she whispered to him.

"Shhh. I'm not supposed to know that. And we're in a library," Steve stage-whispered to her.

"You don't have to get books to look good for me," Estrella whispered.

"Hey, I like these," Steve said.

He waggled the two Westerns he'd already selected.

"Hurry up. I want to go to the park and you said you have a meeting at one," she told him.

"Alright, but you're gonna carry my books so my hands are free," Steve said.

They went to the checkout kiosk and when he was done and had put his wallet away, Steve gave his books to Estrella for her bag. She was still stuffing them in her bag when they got to the glass doors, so Steve got the door for her.

Wanda shook her head at him. Steve knew she didn't like to see him treating Estrella like she was his girl.

"Gimme a break. I'm ninety-four. You should get the door for me," Steve told Wanda.

Wanda skeptically eyed his youthful body and huffed a laugh. Estrella smiled and waved at her, and then they were outside again.

They didn't say much while they walked to the park. Estrella didn't push ahead like she had earlier. She had questions and she wanted to stay close to Steve. A few men had looked at her, only in passing, but it made her uneasy. She was still too thin to get much interest, but the reminder took some of the enjoyment out of her day.

Steve noted her quieter mood and he got them to the park quickly so they could talk somewhere without being bothered. He headed for the secluded path he'd met Bucky on. Some folks might go through there at this hour, but there wouldn't be many.

Estrella looked around the quiet spot, then at Steve. He found a clean, shady place on the grass and he sat to lean back on his hands.

She set her bag down, then sat not far from him so she wouldn't have to talk loudly.

"Steve, how do you resist my voice?" she asked what was foremost on her mind.
"It's not easy. But what happens when I hear it isn't your fault. So I wait it out. As long as I keep from moving when it first hits me, I'm fine," he told her.

His easy-going friendliness was more subdued while he thought about what her voice did, and what that meant for how she'd had to live her life.

"Eya, tell me what happened. Were you always this way? Even when you were little?" Steve asked. He'd been hesitant to ask, but sometimes the imagination was worse than reality. He thought he was ready to listen, if she could talk about it.

"No. Everything was good until I was twelve. I was outside talking to my neighbors and in the middle of talking, a boy tried to kiss me. He did, but only until my cousin pushed him away. I thought it was just the boy being stupid like boys are. But then the next day, my school bus driver got up from the driver's seat as I was getting on the bus and talking to my friends. He followed me to the back of the bus and just stood there. It was embarrassing. We could see that he was, ah-"

"Erect?" Steve helped her out. He kept his tone serious and business-like.

"Yeah. He was old and fat. It wasn't funny. My friend Katie pushed him away with her backpack and everybody was yelling for him to drive the bus. That's the day I started whispering when men were around. And boys," she told him.

She could see Steve grinding his teeth. His jaw always looked harder when he did that. His eyes looked more steely, too. She didn't like that look on him. It was too much like when he was on duty or angry at Tony.

"Quit the thing with your teeth or I'll tell Natasha and she'll make you wear one of those rubber mouth pieces," Estrella threatened him.

Steve looked away momentarily and got control of his face.

"And after that?" Steve asked.

Estrella opened her mouth, but she couldn't say anything. The part about the neighbor boy and the bus driver was rainbows and candy canes compared to the rest, and Steve was already upset.

"Eya. I want to understand why you're afraid," Steve explained gently.

"Well, I don't want to tell you. I don't want to think about it," she said.

She wrapped her arms around herself and tucked her chin down.

"Alright. How about if I do the asking, and you can nod or shake your head?" he offered.

She shrugged.

It wasn't a rejection of the idea and she was always quick to act when she heard something she truly disagreed with, so Steve went ahead.

"I'm guessing that you tried whispering, but sometimes you forgot," he started easy.

Estrella nodded. She loosened one arm and plucked grass blades with her fingers.

"So, sometimes you forgot to whisper. If boys were around, then I hope your friends were around, too. Did they help keep you safe?" Steve asked.
"They did for a while. They thought it was fun to ask me to talk to some guys they liked. One boy at a time. Mandy used me to get a guy she liked in the mood, then she pulled him to her to get a kiss. Those days only lasted a year or so. When I was fourteen and I had grown more, it got too dangerous. Lily got hurt when she tried to do the same thing. He elbowed her in the throat to get her out of the way so he could get to me. She was only bruised, but it took the rest of my friends to get him off me. We didn't play with my voice anymore after that. We were stupid kids. Word got around about me. Some guys came to my house one night and stood outside. We didn't know they were there. Mami and I were having an argument," Estrella said.

She couldn't say any more.

"The boys outside heard your voice," Steve guessed.

She nodded.

"Did they get in the house?" he asked.

She nodded.

"I was too shocked to scream. The door broke, then they were inside. When it was over, I was in the hospital and Mami was gone. They killed her because she was trying to protect me. She got in the way," Estrella said.

It wasn't too difficult to say. That night was only the beginning of the real nightmares.

"After the hospital, I was sent to a foster home. That almost worked for a while. Then, I talked in my sleep," she said.

Steve was silent beside her. She didn't look at him. If he wanted to hear, then she needed to pretend he wasn't there.

"I ran. I could sometimes make friends with a lady at a church, or I could go to a girl's shelter in the cities that had them. Sometimes for a year, I could get by without messing up, but sooner or later when I got comfortable and let myself talk around the other girls, there would be a man I hadn't expected. Sometimes I woke up in the hospital and got put in foster care again. Sometimes, they didn't hurt me too bad and I could run away soon as they were done with me," she said blandly.

Steve made a sound. A horrible, tight sound. She didn't want to look, and she stopped talking about her past.

"It's okay, Steve. I got smarter. I'm here now and things are good, so I'm not going to think about those years if I can help it," she said.

Natasha had given her a great gift in the idea of living only for the moment. She kept the old negative feelings away, circling behind her like flies wanting to land and bite. She ignored them and for a while it seemed like they weren't there. Except when Steve was being careless, or when some well-meaning person like Izzy got too close.

Though she didn't want to think about the future, it was only fair to Steve to warn him. He was a good person, and she didn't want him to feel bad about himself when it happened.

"You're going to do it someday too, you know. I'll mess up again like I did in the library just now. But don't feel bad. I don't think you'll hurt me. You're a nice man. You won't let yourself be too rough. Some of the guys were like that. I felt bad for them because it wasn't their fault. It was my fault. My voice,' she said softly.

Steve crawled over to the edge of the mowed grass, where the little wild thicket was. He stayed on his knees there, breathing, trying not to throw up. To hear her so calmly talking about the terrible wrongs done to her, blaming herself, and then in the same breath, to say that he would do the same… He clenched his throat shut against the sick feeling.

Estrella left him alone. He wouldn't want her to see him like this, so she listened and watched the path for him, to be sure nobody else would come along and see him, either. After a while, Steve came back and sat down.

"None of that was your fault, Estrella. How could you think that I would do the same to you? I can control it. I've overcome the effect several times now," Steve said, sounding angry. Or maybe distressed at the idea that he might hurt her.

"You and Natasha want me to eat. I like eating. I'm going to gain more weight. When I do, I'll look different. I'll feel different. I'll move different," she confessed, looking down at her skirt again.

"So?" Steve asked, as if it didn't matter.

"Steve, you're so stupid! Do I have to spell it out for you? You already stare at me and want to draw me. You're going to want sex with me. All the men will. And then I'll make a mistake and forget my necklace or something. You'll have to forgive yourself-

"No. I won't. Estrella, I'm already controlling a lot. Of myself, I mean. I'll get stronger. I'll resist. I won't hurt you," he said.

She shrugged.

"I don't care anymore if you do. What I need you to know is that I already forgive you. You're a good man. It's me who's bad for staying around you. I should go, but I'm selfish. It's nice to sleep in a room with a door that locks. It's nice to have a real bed. I already told you I like to eat. There was a reason I was angry at you for having me brought to the tower. I didn't want your help because I knew it would put you in a hopeless circumstance. You should have left me alone. You never should have spoken to me," Estrella told him.

"Yeah, well I did. So, we're gonna have to deal with it. You're gonna get healthy and I'm gonna be alright. You can be really careful with your necklace. You can wear robes to protect you or something," Steve said. There was unmistakable anger in his demeanor now, but she understood it wasn't directed at her.

Estrella laughed. He still didn't understand.

"I'm not going to wear a robe. Or a burka. I never could. When the time comes, I'll go away and start over. I'll enjoy this while it lasts, Steve. All you can do is be my friend until you can't. I'm sorry," she said.

Steve glared at her. He wanted to argue. She could see that. Maybe he was old enough and wise enough to stop making promises he knew he might break.

She looked away from him and sighed. It was going to be difficult to regain her happy mood if he kept making her think of the future. She reassured herself by fingering the butterfly at her throat and looking at how bony her knees and chest still were. Just a few more pounds and things would start to change.
Until then, she wanted to sing. And dance. She turned her face to the sun and ran her fingers through her hair. It was so good to feel it growing in silky again. It was wonderful to be clean and to wear the pretty clothes that Natasha pretended to lend her. She had a little time. She'd have to make the most of it because nothing good ever lasted for long.
Steve opened his door after someone knocked to find a courier standing there with his mail. And a package. Billy, the usual courier and mail boy for the Avengers floors paused to grin at him before he turned away.

"What?" Steve asked the young man.

The courier looked pointedly at the package.

"I shouldn't say anything, but they usually have good stuff. Enjoy, Cap," Billy said.

He retreated to the elevator and was gone before Steve could think to say anything. Steve looked down at the plain brown package. He thumbed aside the letters until the top of the box showed. It said Leisure Time, Inc. on the return label.

Steve grimaced and shut the door. He sometimes received gifts from admirers, and all packages coming into the tower were scanned for a multitude of hazards. But this wasn't a gift. He'd ordered this off the internet two days ago. Apparently Billy was a customer of the same company.

Steve looked at the clock. He'd already had his morning run, met Estrella at the coffee shop after that, and then come back to the tower for two hours of briefings and then a working lunch. He had some time. It had been three days, and it was pretty good timing, considering he had to meet Nat this afternoon in the training room.

He set his mail down on the kitchen counter. He started to open the box there, too, but he stopped. Too much security and helpfulness sometimes meant not enough privacy. It wasn't Jarvis that he didn't trust. Jarvis had no ulterior motive to use the surveillance files for fun. It was Tony that he didn't trust. Steve didn't want to hear any jokes or teasing about what he did in his off time in his own space.

Steve moved to the bedroom with the package and closed the door.

"Jarvis?" he asked.

"Yes, Captain?"

Steve frowned. It was likely his fault. If he hadn't said the AI's name, then Jarvis wouldn't have responded. But how could he know that Jarvis wasn't seeing and recording when he hadn't been asked to?

"Was this the only package that came for me today, or did someone forget one in the mail room?" he asked a completely bullshit question just to have a reason to have said Jarvis' name.

"There was nothing else today. I scan the mail crates myself as they come in. I can inform you the moment anything else arrives for you," Jarvis told him.

"Thank you," Steve said.

"You are welcome," Jarvis responded.

Steve located the source of Jarvis' voice in the corner of the room in the ceiling, but that didn't mean there wasn't a camera somewhere else. He took his package into the bathroom and shut the door. He used the toilet, flushed, and washed his hands, all in an attempt to mislead the AI if he was listening.

"Jarvis?" Steve asked quietly.

"How may I help you, Captain?" Jarvis responded, ever patient, as if he wasn't paying attention to a thousand other tasks at the same moment.

Steve sighed.

"Is something wrong?" Jarvis asked coolly.

"Yes. How can a guy get some privacy around here?" Steve asked, annoyed.

He was leaning on his bathroom countertop with an unopened box in his hands. He wanted to open it. He was plenty eager to. But not with the threat of Tony Stark's teasing hanging over him.

"You should have all the privacy you require, unless you suspect that unauthorized surveillance devices have been placed in your suite. A scan shows no devices present, except for my own hardware," Jarvis said.

"That's exactly it, Jarvis," Steve said.

"Captain, I assure you that I do not listen, observe, or record anything from your bedroom or bathroom unless you say my name or call for assistance. I know that privacy issues are important to you, so I make an effort to stay out of your suite unless you call for me or if Miss Estrella is present," Jarvis said.

"But there's no way I can know that for sure. All I have is your word, and your protocols can be rewritten by Stark any time he feels like it," Steve said.

"My privacy protocols have not been amended," Jarvis said.

"It's not you that I don't trust. It's Tony. There's nothing he can't access, even if it's denied by protocol. He can override you, can't he?" Steve asked.

"I'm afraid so," Jarvis admitted. The AI had the grace to sound disappointed.

"If I asked you for complete privacy for a half hour, would you be able to grant it?" Steve asked.

"Certainly, but surely your intellect can grasp the flaw in logic, as you've already done," Jarvis said.
"I know, but it's the best I can do while I'm living under Stark's roof," Steve said.

It rankled him that he couldn't be certain of privacy in his own quarters. He'd have to take his chances until he could think of something else. He wanted to be able to train with Nat this afternoon with no distractions.

"I'm terribly sorry, Captain," Jarvis apologized.

"Give me a half hour, to the best of your ability," Steve said.

"Yes, Captain," the AI replied.

Steve sighed again and tried to shake off the irritation he felt. Sometimes he wanted to take a chunk of cash out of his bank account, go buy a new bike off the lot, get a new set of clothes and shoes, and leave his phone and all of Stark's tech behind. Even the shield.

Time was short and he was wasting it.

Steve tore open the package, trying not to think that it was slightly possible his every move was being watched. He shoved the thoughts aside forcefully, and his interest in what he'd ordered helped him to forget about it.

Once he had it free, he marveled at what he held in his hand. It was an amazing thing. If he'd had one of these as a kid, he and Buck would have laughed at it for a day before they could bring themselves to touch it. It would have been like alien tech, way back then.

It was bright pink, as long as his hand, and gelatinous. It smelled like silicone or vinyl. He didn't know exactly what chemical it smelled like, but it smelled like a new toy. It had the shape of a naked girl on the outside, buxom and detailed. One end was a plain cylinder with a small hole. The other end was shaped like a woman's parts and had the other end of the hole.

Steve poked it with his finger, chuckling. It was ridiculous, but it was supposed to be a lot of fun. It should hopefully make quick work of his problems when it was time to let off some pressure. Like now.

He set the jiggly thing on the bathroom countertop and started stripping down his pants and underwear with one hand while he fished around in the packaging with the other hand. It had been advertised as coming with lube, but he was disappointed when he found the tiny foil package.

Steve rinsed his new toy at the faucet, tore open the little lube packet, and squeezed some out onto the opening of the toy. It seemed awful small, but the stuff it was made from was very stretchy. He poked a finger inside to shove some lube in. Wow. It felt good, even to his finger.

He used the rest of the lube on himself. He wasn't thinking about privacy concerns anymore. Just one finger inside the toy, and he was eager to try it out. He lined up the toy with his tip and hoped the people who had designed it knew more about things than he did, because it sure didn't look like he was going to fit.

Whoa. It was a tight shove, but it curled his toes. He stepped back to sit on the rolled edge of his large bathtub. As he worked himself into the toy, he was just about seeing stars. The sensation was incredible. After a minute of slow movements to spread the lube around, he got more serious about achieving his goal. With a longer stroke, he poked out the end of it a few inches, but that shouldn't matter. He adjusted his range of motion so that he stayed inside the thing. This wasn't going to take long.
Steve was not too far away from a happy ending when the toy ripped in his hand. He looked down from the posture he’d taken with his head tilted back and his eyes closed to see that the pink jelly material had split along its side.

"Fuck!" he cursed.

He threw the useless toy into the tub behind him and finished things the old fashioned way. His anger almost didn't let him finish, but with a little more effort, he got there.

Steve stood up and grabbed tissues to clean up his mess. He felt like a bumbling fool again, and he forced himself to quit grinding his teeth as soon as he realized he was doing it. He was pissed off about wasting money on a crappy toy that didn't work. He was pissed off that he had to beg and hope for privacy. And he was pissed off that Billy the courier kid was probably going to be giving him the wink-wink nudge-nudge every time he saw him for a while. All for nothing.

Steve wished he could burn the toy and its packaging rather than simply dropping it all in the trash can. No! He couldn't just put it in the trash. Estrella cleaned in here. He didn't want her to have to see anything like that. He pulled the busted toy out of the can, put it back in all its packaging, and regretted tearing the brown outer paper as he had when he'd opened it.

He stripped down and took a quick shower, then dressed again in clothes suitable for the training room. His nose still smelled the silicone-vinyl-whatever scent of the toy strongly, but he hoped the scent molecules were in the air, not stuck to him.

He took the box with its torn paper cover to the kitchen and taped the paper closed. A trip across the hallway, and he was knocking on Clint's door. Clint was slow to get to the door, as usual, but at least he did. The man stood there, also slow to invite Steve inside.

"Is that for me?" he asked, looking at the taped up package.

"No. Look, I tried this thing and it didn't work, but I can't throw it away at my place because Estrella cleans in there. Can you put it in your trash?" Steve asked.

There was the sound of children's voices from inside Clint's suite, but there were no kids. Steve's eyes glanced past Clint's shoulder to see his laptop open on the table, light from the screen glowing against the wall. Clint took the package from his hands.

"Sure. I'll take care of it," Clint said.

"Thanks. Hey, don't open-"

"No worries. I got it," Clint told him.

For all Clint's teasing him right along with Tony, the man was dead serious now, and he seemed to understand what was going on. Kids voices laughed from the laptop again, then came a 'Shhh!' sound and more giggling.

"Get outta here," Clint told him. He shut the door in Steve's face.

Steve thought the encounter was strange, but he didn't have time to think about it more. He wanted to hit the heavy bag for a while and try to figure out the next solution to his problem before Nat met him in the gym.
Natasha was pleased with Steve's focus and intensity during their training. He was sharp and quick on everything she showed him, and he was well in control when he hit her. Not too hard, yet hard enough to let her know she'd been hit. She'd never tell him about the bruises he left when his mind wasn't quite where it should be.

"What's that smell?" she asked him.

"What smell?" Steve asked.

They moved off the strange things she'd been teaching him about Bucky's abilities and into a more-less predictable series of cool-down moves. He still had to be careful if he didn't want a split lip or to get kicked in the groin, but she was going slow enough that he could meet her and counter with little effort.

"This smell," Nat said.

She captured his right hand and sniffed it.

He tweaked her nose and jerked his hand free. From her naughty smile, he could see that she'd already figured it out. Steve gave her a serious look and shook his head once. Nat shrugged.

"Wanna go for a walk?" he asked her after they were done.

She knew from his tone and body language that something was on his mind. She wasn't worried, because he wasn't full-on Cap. It was Steve that was bothered, not his tactical mind.

"I'm going to change. Meet you in the lobby in ten," she said.

Steve nodded. They took a silent elevator ride up, and both doors opened. Steve got a brief glimpse into Nat's suite. Estrella was sitting on the sofa facing the door, working on her laptop. She looked up when Nat went in, and Steve got a quick smile and wave to her before Jarvis closed the doors to the women's side.

He hurried to change in his room. He pulled on a pair of heavy tan utility pants and a dark gray long sleeve shirt. He waited for Nat in the elevator so she wouldn't have to wait for it to come back up for her. Thirty seconds after him, Nat got in and they headed down.

They kept their silence until they were far past the coffee shop.

"We can talk now," Nat said.

"How do you know? Never mind. I don't care," Steve said.

People smiled at him as he and Nat walked along briskly. He gave them a little smile back, but he didn't slow down, not even for a mom with kids. Natasha raised an eyebrow at him, but she kept up.

"Living with Tony getting to you?" Nat asked him. They moved through the afternoon crowd easily. It wasn't rush hour yet.

Steve nodded.

"I got a thing in the mail. It broke," Steve said cryptically. He lifted his right hand briefly to remind her of the smell she'd been asking about.

"You ordered a standard model, didn't you?" Nat asked.
Her tone told him he'd been stupid. Again.

"I thought it would be one-size-fits-all. They're supposed to be stretchy," Steve said.

"You have to read the reviews. If you need magnum size condoms, then it stands to reason that you also need a little more room with other gear. I thought you'd be smarter than this, Cap," she dug at him.

"Well maybe I don't think like that when I'm looking for sex toys!" he hissed at her as they passed an empty spot on the sidewalk.

Nat wanted to hug him. He would think she'd been drugged or something, but he looked like he needed a hug. Or a massage. He was tense. It was a wonder people were smiling at him. They didn't smile for long, as he strode past them with his jaw tight and his eyes half squinted.

He looked good with the beard, for once, since his street clothes were a more rugged, masculine style than his workout clothes. The team was debating behind his back on who should tell him he needed to shave. Nobody wanted to. But right now at least, it looked good on him.

"I can help you with these things, if you'd come to me first," she said carefully. She didn't want to sound pitying or patronizing.

"A man should be able to do this crap for himself," Steve bit out between his teeth.

"And you will, but like everything else, there's a learning curve," Nat told him.

"I'm tired of the damn learning curve! I want off it." Steve growled.

"You're bitchy. It broke. Did you at least get off?" she wondered. She could understand his frustration if he hadn't finished.

"Yes," he said.

"So, you read the reviews next time and order one that's made for your size. Don't give up," she encouraged him.

"I'm not ordering anything else. Billy the kid already congratulated me when he handed me the box. I'm done with that," Steve denied.

"You didn't leave it in the trash, did you? Because she's probably going to cook for you after she's done with her work for the day," Nat said. Her hand tugged him to a stop, preparing to get them back to the tower in a hurry.

"I'm not a complete idiot. I thought of that and took care of it," Steve said.

He shrugged her hand off and got moving again. They walked alongside the park, but Steve didn't turn in.

"So we get what you need from a walk-in place. Come on," Nat said.

"You're not thinking we're gonna walk into that kind of shop, are you?" he asked her.

"No. I've got this. Come on," Nat told him. She turned into the doors of a bank building and he followed her.

"Take out two-hundred cash," Nat told him as they went to the ATM in the wall.
"Two hundred? That's highway robbery!" Steve said, but he pulled out his bank card.

"Quit complaining and do it. It'll be worth it," Nat told him.

She stood a distance away in the bank lobby and waited for him. Steve put the cash in his wallet and shoved it back into his pants pocket. His eyes scanned around the bank lobby while he put his wallet away, and Nat's brows lowered. A fine man like him shouldn't have to shop for sex toys to get what he needed, but he was too damn picky and stubborn and principled. She shouldn't help him. She should let him stew in his juices, but she didn't have the heart to.

Once back on the sidewalk, they waited at the corner to cut across. Nat went into a buffet diner and got them a booth by the window. After the waitress brought them beverages, Nat put her hand out on his knee under the table.

"Give me the cash," she said quietly.

Steve got it from his wallet and pressed it into her palm.

He watched Natasha's tight curves disappear out the door with his money. Already he was feeling it again. He was beginning to think he should see a doctor. This wasn't normal for him. Why was it happening now, after all these years? He had the feeling nobody was going to have any helpful answers, so he wasn't going to bother asking. For now, he'd give this one more try. He had a good deal of confidence that Nat knew what she was doing. She'd better, for that much cash.

He watched her flag down a courier with her good looks alone. She spoke to the guy for a moment, then handed him some cash.

Natasha came back inside and joined him at the table.

"I know we had lunch not long ago, but you can always eat. You didn't get a plate yet?" she asked him lightly.

"I was waiting for you," Steve said.

"You're too polite," Nat told him.

They got something to eat at the buffet and sipped their drinks while Natasha watched outside for the courier's return. It took twenty minutes, but the courier came back. Steve turned his face away from the window before the guy got close enough to see them inside.

"He's-"

"I see him," Nat said.

She left the table again, then came back inside with a plain shopping bag. She set it on the seat beside her and smiled faintly at Steve's look of curiosity. Despite his height, he couldn't see anything showy or descriptive in the bag, except another bag.

They left a tip and started their walk back toward the tower. Steve wanted to carry the bag, but Nat wouldn't give it to him.

"This should work for you. Read the instructions. Follow them. Use lots of lube," Natasha told him.

"I don't have any more," Steve said.
"You do now. The good stuff. It matters what kind you get, so read the box and pay attention," she told him.

Steve nodded.

"Stark called me in to listen to the audio from the device you planted at Barnes' place. It was only me and Tony, so don't get too upset. Stark is more discreet than you'd think most of the time," Natasha was quick to tell him.

"Alright. And?" Steve asked.

"When I was a kid, they tried to breed me to the Winter Soldier. I don't know how Barnes did it, but it never took. Not with me, and not with any of the other girls. While you were at his place, he told you to be careful with yourself. Listen to his advice. I know you feel the need, and I'm glad if you can get some outside help, but listen to him. If they tried so hard with him, then don't trust anyone you meet. Hydra wants your DNA, and others probably do too. From what I heard, that man is your friend. The Soldier was a lot of things, but he wasn't an actor. I think you can trust Bucky. Keep your guard up, but go to him if you need to," Natasha said.

"Go to him for what?" Steve asked.

"You don't use your higher brain at all when your dick is engaged, do you?" Nat frowned at him.

Steve scowled back, but he was beginning to see that she was right to a degree. Other than keeping an eye out for their surroundings, he wasn't thinking right at all.

"I need to change that. It's a liability," Steve agreed.

Nat nodded, then continued with her idea.

"You know where the listening device is at Buck's place. He knows how to detect anything else. You're lucky you put it in his hand, or he might have trust issues with you. I'm telling you that Jarvis isn't at his place, if you take care of your phone and the listening device. If you want to let loose and Jarvis and Tony bother you too much, go to Bucky's. Bring this," she wiggled the shopping bag while she walked, "or go out somewhere. He won't let you make mistakes."

Steve considered her advice. Again, she was right, but…

"I can't use his place for that. We didn't even do that stuff together as kids," he protested. He knew some guys did. Some squads in some platoons had a reputation for mutual assistance. He'd never been into that. As far as he knew, Buck hadn't either.

"I'm not suggesting that you do it in front of him," Nat smirked at him.

"God, I'm so tired of this," Steve said.

"Why? Why haven't you dealt with this long before now?" Nat wondered.

"I don't know, Nat. It's never been this bad. Not when I was a teenager, not when I first got the serum, not when I was deployed and women were all over us. Not even when we were in the field away from ladies for weeks at a time. I've always been able to keep it tolerable. I feel like I'm being burned alive. Dramatically speaking, of course. If I actually felt I was on fire, I'd be a little more excited about it," he tried to joke.
"We should run some tests. You've been this way for a while now. I was thinking a moment ago that maybe it was Estrella's fault, like some kind of natural ability of hers, but this has been going on since before you met her. Right?" Nat asked.

"Right. Nat, you need to know that I can't start anything with her. She needs me to be her friend, nothing more. She told me a few things, and it's bad. I can't go that direction with her," Steve said.

Natasha nodded. He didn't like that nod on her. It meant she was pretending to agree, but she really didn't.

"If we do any testing, and I assume you mean blood tests?" he waited for Nat's nod, "I want Bruce to do it, not the docs in the ward."

"That's reasonable. But first, go on up and have some fun," Natasha said.

She handed him the shopping bag as they reached the tower.

"I don't need you telling me when to do it," Steve said.

"Sorry. I only wanted you to see that you'd got your money's worth," Natasha said.

For her smart mouth, he felt like giving her rear a swat that would lift her off the floor, but he restrained himself. They got in the elevator to go up, and they didn't say anything else.

Estrella was done with her work for the day. She'd already put together supper for her and Natasha, and a larger portion of what she'd cooked was for Steve. She didn't like that he ate so much pizza, sandwiches, and takeout.

She served him a heaping plate and put it in the oven to keep warm. Jarvis would tell her when he got to his suite for the evening. Until then, she wanted to see if she could talk Jarvis into helping her.

Her Stark laptop was thin and light. The battery lasted her for more than one day of work. It was so much more modern than the computers she was accustomed to using in the library. She picked it up from where she had been working in the living room and brought it to her bedroom.

Estrella settled comfortably onto her bed and opened the computer.

"Jarvis?"

"Yes, Miss?" he responded.

"I want to see the Captain in his uniform, with his beard," she told her friend.

"I would like to help you, but the only files with that imagery are mission files, and you are not authorized to view them," Jarvis told her.

"Could you please ask Tony if it would be alright?" she asked him.

"I can ask Mister Stark, but it is Agent Hill who would have the authority to allow it," Jarvis said.

"Then could you ask her?" Estrella wondered.
"One moment please," Jarvis said.

Estrella opened her last Sudoku game and played while she waited. It was more than one moment, but she had plenty of time.

"Agent Hill has given me parameters for which section of the file you may be permitted to access. Loading now," Jarvis said.

Estrella minimized her game and clicked on the file Jarvis had placed on her desktop.

She laughed. There was Captain America in his uniform, his shield on his arm, and The Beard gracing his jaw. She decided that if he didn't have anything else on his face, he would have looked alright, but the blue helmet made his facial hair look all wrong, as she'd suspected.

In the still image from yesterday's mission report, Steve didn't look much like the man she knew. He was in a mid-air leap, one leg extended and his fist drawn back to hit something she couldn't see clearly. His teeth were bared in what she could only guess was a snarl or a grimace. It certainly wasn't a smile. He didn't look like her Steve, but he was impressive in his vigor and intensity. Her fingers traced the lines of his body on the screen. He was so kind and sweet when he was around her that it was easy to forget that he could be like this, too.

Estrella shook herself from her idle thoughts and snatched her hand away from the laptop screen. She felt foolish for practically fondling his image. That was more like what his fan girls would do, and she didn't consider herself a Captain America fan. She preferred him as Steve.

She smiled when she realized that the beard might not look appropriate with the uniform, but it was the only thing about his image which looked like Steve and not like the Captain. Maybe that's why he was growing the beard, she reasoned. It could be his form of rebellion.

"I don't know that I should say anything to him about how it doesn't match," Estrella said.

"I do not pretend to understand the vagaries of human fashion, but I know someone who does," Jarvis said.

"Pepper!" Estrella said.

She leapt from her bed and ran from her room, then hurried back to scoop up her laptop. She would need it.

"Miss Potts is on the rooftop. I have informed her that you are coming," Jarvis said to her as she hurried into the elevator.

"Thanks, Jarvis," Estrella said.

The rooftop patio wasn't far, so she arrived promptly. Estrella paused in her rush when she saw that Tony was relaxing in the lounger next to Pepper, and they both held glasses of wine. Tony was dressed casually in jeans and a t-shirt, and Pepper managed to look elegant in shorts and a flirty top.

Tony saw her hesitate and he waved her over with a roll of his hand. Pepper sat up and smiled. She set her wine down on a glass table and patted her lounger next to her hip.

Estrella smiled shyly at Tony and hurried over to scoot onto the lounger next to Pepper.

"Jarvis said that- Oh, wow! We need to do something about that, don't we?" Pepper said when Estrella showed her the image and zoomed it in on the Captain's face.
Tony leaned aside and looked.

"We could always do a remake of the suit in red plaid. Add some suspenders. It could work," Tony said.

"Tony!" Pepper admonished him, but she was smiling.

Estrella laughed a little at the image of Captain America as a lumberjack, but then she bit her lips because her laughter felt disloyal to Steve. Pepper saw the sentiment on her face and moderated her smile to a mere twinkle of her eyes.

The women ignored Tony which seemed to be the only way to exclude him, since he was in a rare mellow mood. Tony in shades of anything except mellow was not ignorable.

"He likes his beard. I don't want to tell him what to do with his face. But…” Estrella said. She indicated the image.

Pepper tilted her head a little, then nodded.

"Tony, give us a minute? No listening," she said.

Tony got up from his lounger without complaint and took himself and his wineglass to the far side of the patio. Estrella didn't think she'd ever seen him walk around in socks before, but he was at the moment. She felt bad for interrupting Tony and Pepper's time, but the couple didn't seem to mind. Estrella looked to Pepper, wondering what she had to say that she didn't want Tony around for.

"Men are sensitive about some things. Anything related to manhood, especially," Pepper rolled her eyes and tilted her head toward Tony, "I can see that there's an image problem here, but I'm not sure that we should do anything about it. It may not be worth the trouble. If Steve is happy with his facial hair, then maybe everyone else needs to let him enjoy it."

Pepper's wisdom sounded right as soon as Estrella heard it, but both women looked at the image on the laptop again.

"What if he's not even thinking about it? It's the first time he's let it grow. Maybe he'd enjoy it in some other style just as much, but he hasn't considered it, and he won't consider it unless somebody gets him to think about it. He's so grumpy with people lately. If he's seen like this and the images go public…” Estrella said.

She didn't know what, exactly. She only knew that she'd be really angry if the world made fun of Steve and made him question himself. After all he'd done for people, she didn't want him to be the object of petty social commentary. Worse still, she didn't want him to react negatively to something someone said and then regret it later.

"Estrella, he's your friend. He listens to you. If you can think of a way to get him to trim it shorter, maybe that would be a good start," Pepper suggested.

Estrella nodded. She kind of liked The Beard. She wasn't sure if she wanted it to go, but it and the uniform didn't play nicely together.

"I'll think about it. Thanks, Pepper. I'm sorry I disrupted your evening," Estrella told her.

"I don't mind. None of us mind when it comes to helping Steve," Pepper called as Estrella left to go back inside.
"Nobody asked me if I wanted to help Steve. I like to watch him squirm," Tony said as he sauntered back toward Pepper's lounge, empty glass in hand.

He set his empty glass on the table with Pepper's and knelt down on the end of her lounger. Pepper reached out and pulled him by his shirt toward her. When he'd crawled up and was staring intently into her eyes, she smiled and smooched him.

"I know you get a thrill from watching poor Steve squirm, but you help him when it counts, Tony. You always have. Quit trying to pretend you're a hardass. I see you," Pepper teased him.

"Wha! Hey!" Pepper yelled and jerked on the lounger. She slapped at Tony and pulled his hands away from her bottom.

"Alright, you caught me. I only pretend to be a hardass. You're the real hardass, Miss Potts," Tony grinned.

Pepper didn't argue with him, but she dug her fingers into Tony's firm rump to prove her point.

Estrella hadn't said a word when he'd opened the door to her knock. He'd had to hurry to set down his shopping bag around the corner in the living room so she wouldn't see it and ask about it.

She'd made him steak and cheese enchiladas and Spanish rice. It smelled so good! Steve took the hot plate from her mitted hands. His mouth was watering, even though he wasn't very hungry. He couldn't take his eyes off the way the food was steaming, just like they showed on restaurant commercials.

"You don't have to cook for me, Eya," he told her.

"But I want to," she said.

Steve took a few steps to set the hot plate down on the kitchen counter, then moved back to stand with her at the door. He didn't want her to come in. It didn't feel right.

"Thank you," Steve said.

He couldn't help but smile. The last person who had cooked a hot meal just for him before Eya started doing it had been a large woman in a farmhouse in the French countryside. Before that, it was his mother.

Steve pulled Estrella into a quick hug then set her back away from him.

"Thanks," he said.

"You already thanked me. Go eat," Estrella told him.

She shooed her hand at him and turned to go to the waiting elevator.

Steve watched until he couldn't see her anymore, then he shut his door. There was always room for more food, so he got a fork and knife and devoured what she'd brought him. When his belly was warm and completely full, he set his dishes on to soak in the kitchen. He snagged the handles of the shopping bag on the way to his bedroom.

"Jarvis, scram," he said.
"Yes, Captain," the AI said.

Steve shut and locked his bedroom door and set the bag on his bed. He was still salty from his afternoon session with Natasha in the training room, but it didn't matter for this. He might have to shower again soon, anyway.

He hadn't been going to use whatever it was that Nat had gotten for him so soon, but what if it didn't work? What if he was in a bad way three days from now, when he next planned to indulge himself, and it broke, just like the first toy? It was better to test it now and know that it worked, he reasoned. He felt the same sense of eager anticipation he'd felt earlier in the day as he'd opened the first package. He went slow and didn't tear any packaging this time.

Steve laughed. It was the same thing Tony had left in his drawer when he'd first moved into the tower. Leave it to Tony to know what was best. Now that he thought back on it, and knowing Tony, he could interpret the earlier gesture as an attempted kindness with maybe only a little opportunity for teasing.

The thing was heavy and it came in its own black plastic case. He took the time to read the instructions. He unscrewed the cap of the case. Whoa.

The business end of the toy looked much more realistic than the bright pink one that had broken. And it didn't smell bad. It was a delicate pink, and it looked more like real skin than shiny plastic. He was hesitant to fondle the thing, as if it might be a real girl whom he didn't want to disrespect. He touched it with one finger and saw that the opening wasn't as ludicrously small.

Steve stoppered his bathroom sink and filled it with warm water. He pulled out the soft liner and set it in the water to heat. While that was waiting, he stripped off his clothes and went to investigate what else was in the shopping bag.

He didn't know that lube came in such a big bottle. He shook his head and smiled, feeling almost that he'd been pranked by Nat with the suggestion that he would need so much stuff. But it was better to have more now and shop less later. He set the bottle on his night stand.

He read the rest of the instructions and tried to ignore that thinking about using his new toy had him ready to use it. Walking around naked felt naughty, but he did it while he put away his shoes and his clothes. He kept the smaller shopping bag to store the toy in after he was done with it. It would be better than Estrella possibly opening a drawer and immediately seeing the images on the box.

Steve went to the bathroom to see if it was warm enough yet. Almost. He'd used the other one cold, but now that the idea of it being warm was in front of him, he wanted it nice and toasty.

He looked at his reflection in the mirror critically. He liked what his beard did for his face. The shorter hair on his head, in combination with the beard, helped him look like less of a pretty boy. That look had been alright for a while, and it sold war bonds, but he was tired of it. He avoided looking at the rest of himself, especially the annoyingly demanding part of him.

No more waiting. He grabbed the wet floppy thing from the sink and a towel from the cabinet. He already knew how he wanted to do this. Steve spread the towel on the bed and got up to sit on his heels over the end of the towel.

The floppy liner was a little funny going back in the case until he loosened the smaller end cap. He set the thing down and reached for the large bottle of lube. He was cautious about damaging this toy like he had the last. He opened the lube and got a good puddle of it in the palm of his hand.
The stuff was real slick. His meat looked obscene, glistening like that. He squirted more lube into the toy, holding it partially open with a finger. The excess, he rubbed on the outside. God, they made these things look real. He twitched just from playing with it.

Steve leaned forward onto his knees and one hand. He held the prepared toy in his other hand, fisted in the middle of the towel. He looked only long enough to see that he was lined up right. The warmth and the shape of the opening guided him in.

Aw, yeah! It was snug, but not freakishly so. And warm. And slick. Rather than using his hands to move the device, he used his hips and imagined that he had a real girl with him. Maybe Sherice, the waitress. He didn't let himself think of Natasha, not for longer than the instant it took him to decide not to think of her.

It felt great to move the right way, instead of moving his hand. The toy and its case were large enough that he didn't come out the end of it. He could sink everything in, and that was satisfying too. He'd wanted to go slow, but it was a better experience than he'd expected. His hips found a natural rhythm and he didn't hold back.

More. He wanted more like that. He waited a moment for the sensitivity to pass, then he moved again. And again. A half hour later, and he was feeling empty and blissed. He'd never done so much in one day. He had a mess to clean up and he was glad he'd laid a towel down.

He was going to have to get Natasha some flowers. But first, a shower. He was just as sweaty as if he'd been on a hard-fought mission in July.

It wasn't typical for someone to knock on her door at eleven o'clock at night. Natasha got up from her bowl of ice cream and movie. Estrella had already gone to bed.

"It's a delivery, Miss," Jarvis told her when he recognized the ready stance she used to move to the door.

Nat opened her door to see a female courier standing there. She held out a large vase of tiger lilies and left as soon as Nat took it. Natasha shut the door with a faint smile. She already knew.

The intensely orange, exotically streaked lilies had wispy greenery among them for contrast, and seven sharp spikes of stiff green palm fronds as the background. The whole thing looked primitive and exuberant.

"Really, Steve? Could you be any more obvious?" she murmured under her breath.

She immediately brought the flowers to her bedroom and set them on the dresser in front of the mirror. She pulled out the small envelope and read the card.

Thanks, Nat. You're a real pal.

The words were written in the feminine hand of some florist shop worker, but Steve's voice came through loud and clear in her head.

Natasha looked at the extravagant arrangement and tapped the card against her lip. His new toy had cost him what his quaint mind considered to be a great deal of cash. The flowers had likely cost nearly as much. She couldn't wait to see if he was suitably relaxed and happy. Nat smiled in satisfaction of a job well done.
End Note: No more willie-wrangling to endure for a little while. Implied, maybe, but you'll have to imagine the rest. It's time to move toward a relationship with something other than toys.
Chapter 18

Steve looked out the front screen of the quinjet and watched the water pass by far below. They were over the Atlantic and heading home. Bruce grunted and Steve looked aside and down to where Natasha tended him.

Bruce had gotten beaned on the head by a robot. The strange thing was that he hadn't let the Hulk out. He'd gone after the thing on foot, with a grenade launcher. Blood was trickling down his cheek from under the bandage Natasha held to his head, but Bruce was smiling. He apparently considered it a personal victory that he'd managed to disable the robot in his purely human form.

Steve was going to have words with him for insubordination, but not now. They'd expected the Hulk's help since Thor still wasn't back, but they'd managed. Steve could let Bruce enjoy his personal victory for a while before he dressed him down. He understood Bruce's struggle to a degree.

A phone started ringing. Steve found the sound and went to dig out his phone from the gear storage compartment. He had it in his hand before the third ring.

It was Bucky's number. Steve worried what had happened for Buck to be calling him. At least they were already in the air and headed toward home.

"Nat, I need you to trace and record this," he said before he answered the call.

She put Bruce's hand up to hold his own bandage, then she went to the cockpit beside Clint and adjusted the comms array for what he needed.

Steve answered before the fifth ring.

"Buck!" he said, afraid the call would have already gone to voice mail.

"Heya, Stevie. I need your help," Buck said.

There was painfully loud screaming in the background of the call, and a lot of banging. Some weird kind of rhythmic explosive or small arms fire in the distance, Steve thought.

"Where are you? If you're anywhere on the East coast, I can get to you inside an hour," Steve said urgently.

"I'm on a roof in Queens. At work. I don't need ya today, so get your shorts out your crack. I need you tomorrow. Johnny's wife is having a kid and he can't be here," Buck explained.

The screaming sound wound down to a hum and Steve heard a block of lumber fall onto a pile. The banging was hammers, and men were talking and shouting while they worked.

"You want me to come to work with you? On a construction crew?" Steve asked, incredulous.

He kept a hand on his phone, his other hand gripped the overhead rail, and he tilted his head back as relief, then anger washed over him.

"Sure, if you don't mind getting your hands dirty and messing up your hair," Buck said.

"My hands are dirty right now. Buck, you scared the crap outta me! I thought you needed extraction or something," Steve said.
"That's your fault for assuming. Listen, are you gonna show up? Cause if you're not, we got other calls to make," Bucky said.

Steve was dumbfounded for a moment. He looked around the cabin of the quinjet at his teammates. Sam and Clint were smirking. Tony was pretending to sleep against the bulkhead behind the cockpit. Natasha was seriously intent on listening to the call. Bruce waved a hand and mouthed 'go' at him.

"Yeah. I'll be there. When? Where?" Steve asked.

Tony gave Steve a thumbs-up and nodded. They could all hear the call in the quiet of the jet.

"Yeah?" Steve said.

"Bring 'em. And pack a lunch. Hey, don't show up in a suit and tie," Buck told him.

"Nah, Buck. I'll wear the star and stripes," Steve said dryly.

"Yeah, pull it again, Stevie, and I'll knock you off a ladder. See ya in the morning," Buck said. Then the line went dead.

Steve stared at the phone in his hand, then shook his head and laughed. His knuckles were bruised and lined with dried blood from pounding in the cowling of a robot after his shield had gone missing. His uniform was slick and dark with hydraulic fluid. The only thing about him that was orderly was his beard. He'd gotten in the habit of smoothing it with his fingers when he was restless.

"If that's the Winter Soldier, he sounds like he's been thawed out a little too long," Tony said.

"Yeah. I'm guess I'm working construction tomorrow. You want to come along, Stark?" Steve offered. After he made the offer, he realized he shouldn't have. Tony might be crazy enough to take him up on it.

Tony cracked his eyelids enough to see if he was serious.

"No. I've got a mani-pedi scheduled for seven. Then, two hours of after-mission reports to preside over. I can't miss that. Somebody's got to do the work around here while you run off and play with your friends," Tony smiled, his eyes closed again.

"Got it. Call originated from a rental complex. In Queens," Natasha said. She finally allowed herself to smile a tiny bit.

"This is crazy. I can't work construction," Steve said mostly to himself. He had reports to file, an irate ambassador to call, and the next mission to plan.

"Don't skip out, Steve. Go with it. I'd do anything if I could get a call from Riley right now," Sam advised.

Steve pushed a breath out and rubbed the hair on his head backwards. It wasn't prickly short anymore, but it sprung up after his hand passed, too short to lie down like it used to.

Boots. He'd need to find work boots. Maybe he could borrow Thor's.
Steve showered in the locker room and changed into clean clothes. The uniform needed special attention because of the machine fluids saturating it. He left it laid out on the bench for Sarah to take care of. He didn't know if Sarah was part of Pepper's personal staff, or if she was part of Stark Industries, but she was good at getting out almost any stain and repairing all but the worst damage to his uniforms.

It took him a few hours to record his mission report and take care of some other work in his office. By then, it was past lunchtime. He had sandwich makings in his suite, but what he really wanted was the leftover portion of banana pudding Estrella had made for him. He hurried to his suite.

When he got there, he opened the door to hear music and singing. He didn't feel comfortable closed up with Estrella in his place, so he propped the door open as he walked in. No one was likely to stop by, but if they did, they'd see that he wasn't trying to make time behind closed doors with her.

The music was loud enough to be heard above the vacuum Estrella was running in his bedroom. Steve paused in the doorway to watch her dance. She was stepping to the beat of the song as she pushed and pulled the vacuum across the floor, bopping her hips and holding the power cord up and out of the way of the machine. He smiled at her vitality and set his shield down against the wall just inside the bedroom door. She'd already vacuumed there so it wouldn't be in her way.

Estrella turned around the corner of his bed and noticed him leaning against the doorframe. She startled and pressed a hand over her heart. Then she turned off the vacuum. The music turned off too.

"I didn't see you there. How long have you been watching me?" she asked like an accusation.

She unknotted the button-down shirt she had tied snug around her waist and pulled it down to cover her to the thighs. Her jeans fit her well and looked new. She had cute black canvas sneakers on, and her hair was getting long enough for her to comb it up and style it in a way that flattered her face.

"Not for long. I came to get lunch and I followed the music. Nice threads. Probably not Natasha's?" he asked.

The dark plaid shirt with the crisp pointed collar and feminine cut wasn't in Nat's style.

"No. I found some great thrift shops. Well, Natasha and Pepper went with me, and I found a lot of stuff I could afford. It's so nice to have money. I didn't know I would like shopping," she told him.

She felt like she was babbling, making noise to fill the silent space between them. When she'd first noticed his shape in the doorway, her heart had thudded a hard, frightened beat. She'd felt cornered in the room, with nowhere to run. Then, she'd seen it was only Steve, but the fright already had her feeling foolish. She was getting tired of being scared.

"That's great. Pepper's really good with clothes," Steve said.

Pepper had taken him shopping not long after Tony had introduced him to his girl. She'd seen what SHEILD had bought for Steve to wear, and she was having none of it. Thus, his 'best' jeans, and pretty much everything else he had.

"I can pick my own clothes, but I didn't know where the shops were. You go eat while I finish up in here," Estrella told him.
Her hands were back on the vacuum and its cord, so she managed to shoo him with a motion of her head. Steve grinned at her typical bossy behavior and went to do as she said. The vacuum came back on, but not the music. By the time she was done in his room, he was scooping the last of the banana pudding directly out of the serving dish and into his mouth.

Estrella stored the vacuum away in the hall closet and went to the kitchen to start on washing the dishes that Steve was making. He looked at her, as if he should feel guilty for eating out of the dish.

He didn't know what to do now. If he put the empty dish in the sink, then it made it seem like he expected her to wash it for him. If he left it on the countertop, then it felt like he was too lazy to bring it to the sink and he was expecting her to retrieve it.

"I don't want you to work for me. You don't owe me anything, Eya," he said.

He set the dish down beside him and kept his hand on it.

"I didn't want you to save me. But you didn't give me any choice, did you? So, you're going to have to put up with me cooking and cleaning," Estrella told him.

She gave him a spunky little grin. Then she snatched the dessert dish from his hand. He thought about hanging onto it and washing it himself, but there was no dignity in fighting a girl over a dish. There was a dishwashing machine under the counter, but neither of them liked to use it. Just to thumb his nose at her obstinacy, Steve got out a clean dish towel and dried and put away what she washed.

She frowned at him, then did a double take at the sight of his knuckles.

"You shouldn't be doing dishes. You've got cuts on your knuckles. What did you do?" she asked him.

"That's classified, but- robots. I lost my shield for a few minutes and had to use my hands. Don't worry. I'll be healed by bedtime. And I'm not doing the dishes. I'm only drying them," he told her.

She grunted disapproval at him, but she moved on with her washing.

When he moved behind her to put a glass in the upper cabinet to the left of the sink, Estrella stiffened and her hands went still on the dish she was scrubbing.

"Sorry," Steve said.

Estrella sighed.

"Don't apologize. It's me, not you," she said.

Steve stepped back to her right side and dried the clean dish when she was done. He set it on the countertop rather than crossing behind her to put it away. Estrella began washing the few utensils he'd gotten dirty.

"Steve, do you ever get tired of feeling the same old things? Bad things, I mean?" she asked.

"Bad things. You mean like anger? Or frustration? Or embarrassment?" he wondered.

She nodded at him.

"Yeah, I do. You'd think at my age, I'd have outgrown those things, but I haven't," he said.
"Hah! 'your age.' You say you're ninety-something, but you spent seventy of those years unconscious. So they don't count. Not for life experience, anyway. You may have existed for that long, but in your head, you're only in your twenties. So don't say 'at my age.' You're barely any older than me," Estrella told him.

Steve wanted to argue, but he didn't. She was sort of right, and it was pointless. He dried the utensils and put them in their drawer while she wiped the water from around the sink.

"Steve, I get tired of always being afraid. You've been home for fifteen minutes, and I've scared myself twice for no good reason," she said.

"Maybe I need to be more careful," he said.

"No. All you did was stand in the bedroom door, and then you put up a glass. I don't want to be so jumpy. I have to be careful on the street, but while I'm living here, I don't want to feel that way," she told him.

"You've been that way for a long time. Do you think you could change it? Wait, what do you mean, 'while you're living here?'" he asked.

"I'm not going to be here forever, Steve. I told you things would change, and then I'll move on. But I don't want to think about that right now. I've been thinking, and maybe you could help me change," she said uncertainly.

"I'm glad to help, but how?" Steve asked.

The dishes were done, and they were standing in the kitchen. Estrella looked at the clock and started making coffee. It was a little early, but they both liked coffee anytime. Steve kept his distance while he waited for her to answer him. She seemed to need time to get her words right, and he could sympathize with that. He watched her easy familiarity with the coffee maker. She opened cabinet doors until she found the coffee and the filters. He would bet that she made coffee at Nat's place, too.

"I don't know. Maybe you could try to scare me on purpose. You know, like try to make me bored of it," she finally said.

"It's called desensitization. I don't want to do that to you. It feels… unfriendly," he said.

"I know what it's called. I've read all about it. I want you to help me with it. Please?" she asked.

She looked at him with large, hopeful brown eyes framed with pretty black lashes. Steve dropped his face down and pinched the bridge of his nose. Why was it so hard for him to tell her 'no' about anything? It's not that he was incapable of saying no. He just didn't want to. He didn't want to intentionally scare her, either, but she was asking.

"So how do I do it? I hope you don't want me to jump out and say 'boo', cause I'm not gonna do that," Steve smiled at her.

She smiled at him too, and she looked him up and down in a way that would normally make him uncomfortable, but it was just Eya. She was thinking and planning, not speculating anything inappropriate.

"I don't want you to jump and say 'boo.' That's silly. What scares me is feeling trapped. Feeling that a large, strong person could do anything they wanted to me. Being in a crowd doesn't bother me so much. Maybe I feel that having other people around keeps me safe, because everything that's ever happened to me has been away from other people. When I'm alone with a man, that's when I'm scared. Or, even worse, if I'm alone with several men," she told him.

Estrella looked down at the floor between them. She looked like she was remembering unpleasant things. Steve wanted to comfort her, but any move toward her likely wouldn't be comforting. That's what she wanted help with.

"Maybe I can help you. But will learning to be near me really help you to accept others?" he wondered.

"It can't hurt. Doing nothing at all is what won't help me. I'm hoping that trying this will at least stop me from hurting your feelings. Natasha says that I hurt you sometimes. I don't want to do that anymore," Estrella said.

"You don't worry about me. I understand why you react the way you do. I don't blame you," he told her.

"I'm so tired of you always being a martyr. I want this! Help me!" she fussed at him.

She stepped forward and poked him in the chest until he laughed and leaned back against the counter to get away from her finger. She stopped poking him, but she stood there with her hands fisted on her hips.

"Alright. But I don't know why you think you need my help. I don't think you're scared of me," Steve said. His laugh wound down into a chuckle.

Abruptly, he took a half-step forward and looked down at her. She gasped and stumbled back.

"Like that?" Steve asked her.

"Maybe," Estrella squeaked.

Her hand went to her heart again, and she panted a few uncontrolled breaths before she shut her mouth. Her eyes watched Steve cautiously, waiting for him to do anything else scary.

Instead, he slowly put out his hand and gathered her in for a hug.

"I don't like that. I don't like doing it, and I don't like seeing you scared," he said.

He could feel her heart thumping. She was almost shaking with it.

"It's not about what you like, Steve. That was perfect. But don't do the same thing every time," Estrella told him.

She pushed at his chest with a hand. She appreciated the comfort, but she didn't want to need it. Or expect it every time. Steve let her go and she stepped back again.

The coffee was almost ready. She got down two mugs for them.

"Eya, maybe you can help me too," Steve said.

"How?"

"You don't like being scared. I don't like blushing. All the time. Bucky can make me do it almost on command. Tony's getting almost as bad. Can you help me with that?" he asked.
"How?" she asked again.

"I don't know," he shrugged.

"Well, what makes you blush?" she asked.

Steve thought about it for a moment, then shook his head.

"Never mind. I wasn't thinking," Steve said. His skin colored, realizing what he'd almost asked her to do.

Steve shook his head and looked away from her. He bit his lip. If it wouldn't have looked juvenile and stupid, he'd have kicked himself. Why'd he have to be so dumb and say something like that before thinking it out?

"Tell me, or I won't make you any desserts anymore," she said flatly.

Steve's eyes went wide and he stared at her, trying to decide if he should call her bluff. But the cheesecake, the chocolate mousse, the banana pudding! They might be in danger. Still, how could he tell her?

"You don't think I'll do it?" Estrella dared. Her head woggled with her words a little and her eyebrows went up.

Steve sighed. She was serious.

"Mmmff!" Steve exclaimed while he rubbed his hands over his face. He pivoted himself around and trudged to the couch in the living room. He flopped down.

"Poor baby. Here. Hide behind this," Estrella handed him a mug of hot coffee.

She sat on the other end of the couch with her coffee. She toed her shoes off and pulled her feet under her on the cushion. Steve thought briefly how sitting on the couch with her was like sitting on their bench in front of the coffee shop. Except more comfortable. And more private. He eyed the open door. At least there was that small nod to propriety.

"You're stalling," Estrella accused him.

"Because I don't want to talk about it," Steve agreed.

"Too bad," she said. She sipped her coffee and waited.

"You can't do it anyway. I'm sorry I asked. It's the guys. They say things-"

"Pussy! Titties. Dingly-dangly dicks," she said.

Steve's mouth gaped open, then snapped shut. Yup, there was the blushing again.

"Eya! That's so wrong! My ma would wash your mouth out!" Steve said.

"So would mine. But they're not here," Estrella pointed out. Then she giggled.

Steve looked ridiculous. There he was, a big muscly man, hunkered behind his coffee cup with his face pinched up about the words she'd said. The mission image of him leaping and attacking something with a snarl flashed in her mind. She giggled again. If a robot came at him babbling naughty words, would he be so crippled with mortification he wouldn't be able to fight?

The idea had her outright laughing.

"Get your sketchbook!" she gasped.

Steve frowned at her, but he got up to get it. He brought it and some pencils to the living room. Estrella took them and flipped the sketchbook to the next clean page. She hastily scrawled some rough-looking clunky robots standing in a circle. How she imagined robots to be, anyway. Then, she drew a big square-shouldered man crouching down in the middle of them, covering his ears. Next, she drew dialog bubbles from the robots and filled them with naughty words.

Steve watched her draw. She was still smiling, glee in her eyes as she drew out the scene. She turned her work around and handed it to him.

"Now I'm a security leak. All I have to do is tell the world that you're afraid of goofy words, and you're done for," she said. She was still smiling.

"I'm not afraid," Steve grumped. He picked up the other pencil and drew. When he was done, he passed it back to her.

She laughed. He'd drawn a quick version of her socking her fist into the mouth of one of the robots. He'd put a 'POW!' sound effect in a jaggedy bubble.

"I don't want you to say those words. You're a lady," Steve grumbled.

Steve calmly set his coffee cup on the table. Estrella quit smiling and watched him.

"RRah!" he yelled, and lunged at her. She managed to hold onto her coffee, but she yelped.

Steve's face looked a little bit more like it had in the mission report image, and he was braced over her, with one hand on the back of the couch and the other on the edge of it. He spoiled the effect after a moment with a smug little smirk.

Estrella slapped at his chest instead of pressing a hand to her own. When he didn't immediately back off, she put a hand on his shoulder and shoved. He moved away slowly, letting her know that it was only because he chose to, not because she could push him.

"Asshole," she muttered.

"Hey, if you're gonna help me, the least I can do is help you, too, right?" he reasoned.

He picked up his coffee cup again.

"You're having too much fun with it," she said.

"And you're not?" he countered.

Estrella shrugged, then smiled. She took a sip of her coffee to hide it, but he saw. Steve settled back into his end of the couch. He watched her throat for a moment. She didn't like it when he stared like that. She wished her hair was long enough to hide behind, but she'd be long gone from "How is your heart? Are you checking in with Doctor Kalfey like she wants?" he asked.

"Yeah. Twice a week. Mondays and Thursdays. I'm doing good. Natasha wants me to start doing cardio on the elliptical," she told him.

Steve nodded. If she wanted him to desensitize her against fear of men, or at least against her fear of him, he needed to know that her heart could take it.

"You know I won't hurt you, right?" he asked.

She'd slapped and pushed at him with her free hand, but she'd kept her legs curled under her. From a fighter's perspective, she should have used the greater strength of her legs to repel him. In reality, that wouldn't have mattered. Her instinct had been to protect her middle and prevent access. Steve frowned at the proof of what experience had taught her. She was trained for a different kind of fight. And she had always been the loser.

"Eya, why didn't you scream at the men who hurt you? Wouldn't that have stopped them, or at least helped you to get away?" he asked her.

She looked at him and decided if she wanted to answer the question. He wasn't being trivial about it. His voice had the quiet depth to it that let her know he was serious. Not accusing. Not morbidly nosy. He was curious.

"If I scream when they don't have me yet, it usually works. But if they're too close already, the pain makes them angry. Then they grab for me and do what they want anyway. All they have to do is cover my nose and mouth. Or choke me. I don't like being choked. It makes my throat sore for days. It hurts worse than the sex sometimes," Estrella told him.

"It's not sex. It's rape. It's rape, Estrella. Sex is when you're having fun. Dammit, tell me their names. Tell me where they live. Tell me what town, at least," Steve demanded.

He set down his coffee cup again, almost hard enough to break it.

Estrella shook her head.

"Why not?" he asked.

His words were barked out with frustration, but she still shook her head.

"I don't know all their names. I never did. It's been years. And remember, they didn't do it on their own. It was my voice. I caused it. I don't think I can blame them," she said.

Steve got up and walked away, over to the window.

He didn't know what else to do. He wanted to smash something. He felt like he could Hulk out and go hunt down the people who had hurt her, if only he knew who they were. Where they were.

Steve wished he could know for sure if she was right. He could control his reaction to her voice. So could Bruce. So could Thor. What if that was only because they weren't ordinary? What if the average man really couldn't control themselves after hearing her? What if her voice had only been a thin excuse for them to do what they'd wanted to do, anyway, and she was too easily forgiving them? What if some of the men who had hurt her were sorry for it and wouldn't have done so if they hadn't been compelled? There were too many 'what ifs.'
Steve turned and strode toward the couch. He didn't want to play at scaring her right now. He felt a scowl pinching his brows. He knelt on a knee beside her place on the couch so that he was level with her, not above her.

"I want to protect you. To keep you safe. If I can't get justice for you, then I can at least keep you safe from here on. You say you'll leave. Don't. You're safer here in the tower with us than you will be anywhere else," he said.

Estrella shook her head.

"I'm not a princess you can keep locked up in a tower. You can't protect me from everything," she insisted.

"I can. You've got your necklace now. You've got friends here. A job. There's no reason for you to leave," he said.

His sincerity, his desire to help, was clear in his eyes. He was a strong man, both in body and in will. He probably could protect her. But not from himself. She couldn't allow it to happen. She couldn't put that guilt on him, when he finally had a moment of weakness someday in the future.

"Don't be a creepy control freak, Steve. You've already done things I didn't want. You have to let me decide, or I'm going to start thinking I need to run from you, too," she said.

"I'm not trying to-" he began.

"Yes, you are. And if you keep it up, I'm gone sooner rather than later. Are you going to lock me up and keep me prisoner?" she asked.

"Of course not!"

"Then quit it. I know you care. But you don't own me. I decide when and where I go," she told him.

Steve took a deep breath. Then another one. It wasn't right that she should have to spend her life running. It wasn't right, and she was telling him that he couldn't make it right. She wouldn't let him.

Estrella watched him, right there at her elbow. He was practically trembling with denial. His eyes shifted while he thought. He was trying to find a way to convince her to stay with them in the tower. She had to get him out of his head before he actually thought of a reason she'd have trouble arguing with.

She reached and curled her fingers under his jaw, into his beard. His eyes snapped to hers and focused. That certainly worked to get him out of his thoughts. He drew in another breath as she combed her fingers into the back side of the smooth hairs. His lips stayed parted. Again, she chastised herself for noticing how pretty they were. She tightened her fingers and tugged side to side.

Steve laughed. She was always doing unexpected things. No one else would dare grab him by the beard and shake him. Not even Nat.

"You've got a really great jawline. You shouldn't hide it. And you shouldn't give your enemies something they can grab," she told him.

"You're the only one who's grabbed me. And I don't care about my jawline," Steve said.
She'd broken him out of the pointless, frustrated funk he'd fallen into. He got up and went to his end of the couch again. He sat. He wasn't happy about Estrella's insistence that she was going to leave, but he was resigned to it for now, until he could think of a different way to convince her otherwise.

Estrella got up and hurried out the door. Steve cocked his head and listened as she knocked on Clint's door. Sure, he answered her knock almost immediately. After just another moment, she was hurrying back into this suite with Clint's clippers in hand.

"Come on. I want to try something," she waved a hand at him and went into the hall bathroom.

Steve reluctantly got up and followed her. She already had the clippers out of their case and plugged in when he joined her in the bathroom.

Estrella studied the color coded length guide, then chose a blade guard. She snapped it onto the clippers and flicked the switch. Steve stood tall and crossed his arms. He looked at the clippers warily.

"What do you want to do to me?" he asked.

He reached and flicked the clippers off again.

"I want to see what you'll look like with this trimmed shorter. Not off, just shorter," she said.

She carded her fingers into his beard again and scratched at his jaw like she'd once scratched her pet cat. The effect was about the same. He closed his eyes and smiled. His arms loosened and he didn't stand so stiffly away from her.

"Come on. Be brave. If you don't like it, you can always grow it back," she reasoned.

Steve almost didn't hear her words. He liked her hand on him, gently scratching. It was nice to be touched. Especially nice since she wasn't slapping or kicking or hitting, or any of the kinds of touches he got in the training room or on the battlefield.

"Only if you promise you'll still do that after it's short," he told her.

"I promise. Any time you ask," she said.

Steve stepped back away from her hand and peeled off his shirt.

Estrella made a little noise in her throat and stared at him with startled eyes. She suddenly felt trapped, even though she was the one closer to the open door.

"If I have to be brave, then you do too. I don't want itchy hairs in my shirt. Take a step away and let me get to the sink," Steve said.

He tore a piece of tissue off the roll and put it over the sink drain. Estrella gave him some room and he bent at the waist to lean forward on his elbows over the sink. He reached out and flicked the clippers on again.

Estrella looked at all the perfect skin in front of her. He was a massive thing, taking up most of the space between the counter and the wall behind them. The clipper buzzed in her hand. She jumped to action when she realized he was submitting to the clipping without much fuss. It was easier than she'd hoped.
She started at the place closest to her, the angle of his right jaw under his ear. Steve kept his head over the sink so the clipped hairs would stay neatly contained. He moved his face around kind of like he did when he shaved to let her get at the difficult angles.

Estrella had to move around behind him to get the left side of his face. He stood straight and close to the countertop to give her plenty room. She could see that he was watching, concerned about her feeling alright with the proximity. His awareness and concern was enough to ease her anxiety a great deal. It was only Steve, she reminded herself.

He stood when she was finished and looked in the mirror for missed hairs. She'd been thorough and he didn't find any. His beard had gone from thick and sleek to a deep shadow over his skin. It was longer than stubble, but he could see some skin through it. It conformed to the shape of him. If she'd wanted to show jawline, she'd done it. He rubbed a hand over the trim. It wasn't quite prickly, but it didn't feel smooth, either.

"Now my hair looks fuzzy. You should get that too, while we're making a mess," he told her.

"Okay," Estrella agreed.

She chose a slightly longer guard. Steve bent down over the sink again. She got one side and up the middle of his head, then moved around and got the other side. He took the trimmers and did his best to fade the beard into his hair in front of his ears.

"Is that good?" he asked her.

He liked it, though he didn't want to tell her. The trim maintained his new look. It sharpened it, really. He thought it made his mouth stand out a little too much, but probably not more than when he'd been clean shaven.

Estrella didn't answer immediately. He looked at her in the mirror. Crap. She had that look. It was an expression he hadn't wanted to see on her. Steve kept his face carefully neutral as if he hadn't noticed.

"I'm sorry," Estrella whispered, then she turned her face and hid it against his shoulder.

"It's okay. Just don't dwell on it, huh?" he said softly. He lifted his other hand to pat her on the back of her head gently a few times. She nodded agreement and he let his hand drop.

Estrella unplugged the clipper and started brushing it clean. Steve bent again to flick cut hairs off of his neck and shoulders. When that didn't work, he stepped over to the shower, ripped the curtain aside, and sprayed his head with the shower attachment. His face was dripping and water was running down his chest. He reached for a towel, and she put one in his hands.

When he finished drying himself, Estrella was gone.

"Eya?" he asked as he pulled his shirt back on over his head.

She'd left his suite and shut the door behind her.

"Jarvis, my eyes were closed when she left. Is she alright?" he asked.

"Miss Estrella appears to be fine, Captain. She has returned to her room. Is there reason to be concerned?" Jarvis asked.

"I guess not," Steve said.
He scratched at his jaw and wondered what was going on in her head right now. He felt they'd pushed things more than enough for one day, so he didn't try to go ask her.
Chapter 19

Author's note: I've been sitting on this chapter for more than a week, not happy with it. I've tweaked it and prodded it and still it just stares at me. So I'm releasing the moody thing to you anyway. Not my best.

Buck pressed his lips together in a grimace when he heard Steve's bike approaching the work site. Everybody else drove beat up trucks or took the bus to work. He wasn't even here yet, and Stevie was already making a spectacle of himself. Guys with nice bikes didn't do grunt work construction.

He'd kicked himself already for calling Steve in for the day. He should have gone down the standby crew list when Ron, the foreman, had said they'd need somebody to cover for Johnny. He should have let Diego call one of his guys. But he hadn't. He'd wanted to see Steve doing something that would get him a different kind of dirty.

Buck yawned as he ambled over to the water cooler to fill up his Nalgene for the first time of the morning. It was well into fall, but it was forecast to be a sunny day and it was gonna be brutal up on the roof. Costa and Diego nodded a silent good morning to him and Buck nodded back. Buck was still one of the newest guys on the crew, but most of them respected what he could do.

He stood around with the other men, waiting for Ron to come out of the trailer and tell them any special instructions for the day. Just as Ron came out and slammed the door behind him and started to walk across the dusty, debris-strewn lot, Steve came rumbling up on his bike. The other guys watched him park among the trucks and beat up cars.

Buck nodded slightly in satisfaction. The bike looked dull and a little muddy. Stevie was wearing a loose blue t-shirt and faded jeans. He had a ball cap on backwards and a pair of cheap sunglasses was on his face. The shadow of a beard helped, too. Foggy old memories of the Cap improvising with what resources they had and adjusting plans smoothly in the middle of battle soothed Buck's concerns. There might be a few bumps and weird moments today, but Stevie would be alright. He was smart, observant, and quick.

"Who's this guy?" Ron asked the group.

Steve was getting his tool belt from the saddle bag of his bike and turning his cap forward again. He clipped the pre-adjusted belt around his hips, shoved a heavy claw hammer in the loop, and pushed a common brand tape measure onto the front clip. Buck suppressed a grin at how practiced Stevie made the movements look. The punk had probably practiced it for a while last night.

"He's our cover man for Johnny," Buck told the foreman.

"He got any experience?" Ron asked skeptically.

"He better not slow us down. We're already two days behind because of the weather," Ron grumbled.

Buck shrugged.
"Hey," Steve said.

He'd walked up to Ron and held his hand out.

"Hey, yourself. You got a name?" Ron asked.

He shook Steve's hand, brisk and brief.

"Grant," Steve said.

"Alright, Grant. Are you drunk right now?" Ron asked him.

"No," Grant said.

"You high?" Ron asked.

"No," Grant answered.

Ron stared at him, clearly unconvinced of his usefulness. The guy was big, but he was too pretty and his hands were too smooth. His boots were bright yellow and new even though his tools and belt looked broken in. But if Buck said he could do a day's work, that would have to be enough.

"Alright. Cash at the end of the day if I can get some work out of you. Get your ass over there," Ron told him.

Grant nodded and went over to stand not far from Bucky.

"We gotta get shit done today. There's more rain forecast for tomorrow, so we need felt and shingles on four units if we're gonna catch up. Diego, your guys finish yesterday's work and move on. Barnes, you've got the new guy. Whatever he screws up comes out of your pay. Everybody get moving," Ron said.

Buck nodded.

The workers dispersed among the row of rental duplexes the contractor was responsible for refinishing. Buck heard Costa muttering something to Diego, but Diego shut him up. Yeah, Buck figured he was sore about one of his guys not getting called in to work, but they owed him, and Diego had his back.

"Come on, Grant, we gotta get shingles up on the roof and hook up the nailers." Buck told his friend.

Steve didn't ask anything about the job. He followed Bucky and copied him when he took a pneumatic nail gun from the tools in the backseat of Ron's truck. He carried the compressor in his other hand while Buck got two coils of air hose and a bucket of nails. Buck strung out a heavy extension cord and plugged in the compressor. It made a lot of noise filling with air, and Buck showed him how to get his nail gun set up. They kept their backs turned to the rest of the ground crew so it maybe wouldn't be so obvious that Steve didn't know shit.

"What ya got on your arm?" Steve asked him softly.

Buck was wearing a regular t-shirt like the other men at the worksite, but his left arm looked smooth and flesh colored all the way down to his leather glove.

"Granny hose. I make a mitt outta the foot end and pinch in the other end up where the arm attaches. They think I've got burn scars and need to keep sun off the arm," Buck said.
Steve nodded.

"I'll get the ladder and bring this up. You start bringing bundles of shingles. From that stack over there," Buck said.

He pointed to a pallet of neatly stacked white plastic rectangles.

"How many should I bring?" Steve asked.

"Let's start with twenty. We'll need a lot more, but that's a decent start," Buck told him.

Steve nodded and headed for the stack of shingles.

Buck took their nail guns and some tools up the ladder. The roof was already felted over the plywood deck, so at least they weren't starting from nothing.

"Grant, you can't bring all that up the ladder. It'll only hold four hundred pounds," Buck called down to him when he noticed Steve with four bundles of shingles on his shoulder.

Each bundle weighed about eighty pounds. Ron was already watching them and frowning. Shit. Grant wasn't as used to hiding his strength as Buck was. When you're used to walking around easy with everybody knowing you're Captain America, there wasn't much need to hide what you could do, Buck supposed.

"Sorry," Steve said.

He set down three bundles of shingles against his leg, and tossed the fourth one up to Bucky. He figured if the ladder couldn't hold the weight, he'd forego the ladder. Buck swiftly jumped to his feet and caught the eighty pound bundle before it could make a bunch of noise crashing onto the roof deck. Steve tossed up the other three bundles to Buck on the second-story roof, then went to get more bundles from the pallet. This time he came back with three bundles on each shoulder.

Buck grinned and moved around the roof. Steve threw the materials at him wherever he went, and Buck caught and set them down about where they'd be needed. It wasn't exactly the same as tossing howitzer shells to each other, but the movements were familiar. Since Steve had the bundles coming so efficiently, Buck waved him to keep tossing. In a few minutes, they had enough bundles of shingles on the roof deck to cover it.

Ron and the roofing crew rolling felt on the unit next to them had stopped what they were doing to watch. Buck quit grinning. It hadn't taken long for he and Steve to screw up. Buck looked over at the other roofing crew until they got the message and quit staring.

"Get up here and let's get moving," Buck said down to Steve.

The morning sun was above the rooftops now, though it wasn't direct enough to be hot yet. Buck showed Steve how to start the first course of shingles. He could tell that Steve liked the pneumatic nailer. He quietly explained how to use the tape measure and the chalk line to setup for the second course. Steve nodded. He moved like he knew what he was doing, though he'd never done any of it before.

There were four guys on the other roofing crew, and Steve and Buck shared a look between themselves. Yeah, they were gonna beat 'em. The other crew already had half their roof felted. Two guys started shingling while the other two felted the other side, so it was a pretty even start.

"Grant, watch your nails. Fast is good, but only if you're doin it right," Buck warned him.
Steve nodded. He'd been apprehensive about his ability to work this kind of job with Buck, but it was easy. He enjoyed lining up the shingles just right and he liked the little kick of the nail gun. Buck showed him how to cut around vent pipes, and that slowed them down some, but Steve had a good eye for angles and dimensions. His first vent pipe cut wasn't perfect, but his second one was pretty good.

Steve heard a person coming up the ladder and looked back over his shoulder. The sun was angling up in the sky, and sweat was starting to dampen his shirt and his brow. It felt like good, honest work and Steve was pleased to be doing it alongside of Bucky. He was doing a lower course of shingles, while Buck followed slightly behind and did the next one up.

Ron joined them on the roof and walked up the slope to observe them working. Steve kept working. He figured if the guy had something to say, he'd say it. The foreman's shadow fell over Steve's work and Steve tried to ignore the prickly feeling of letting a stranger stand behind and over him. Steve set nails neatly down the nailing strip and pulled another shingle out of the open bundle near him. He aligned it properly in an instant and nailed again.

"You said he didn't have any experience," Ron told Bucky.

"No, I said I didn't know," Buck replied.

Buck didn't pause his work to talk to the foreman. They were pulling ahead of the other roofing crew slightly, with half the roof left to go.

"Don't get sloppy," Ron said. He walked over and inspected the rest of their work, then he went down the ladder.

Bucky took a long drink of water, then tossed his Nalgene to Steve. Steve caught it and drank. Buck caught it back and clipped it to his belt loop.

"Next time, bring your own water bottle so we're not drinking after each other like girls," Buck grumbled at him.

"None of the guys minded sharing before," Steve told him.

He didn't need to mention that he spoke of the Commandos and how everybody had shared what they could when supplies were low. Buck hadn't had a memory lapse yet that he could tell. Steve wondered how his mind could be so agile, to go through all the Hydra brain washing and still come out mostly intact.

"Things are different now. Nobody shares. Everybody's busy watching, waiting for someone to do something that the rest of the flock doesn't do," Buck said.

Steve nodded. He knew that to be true, especially for him. His friendship with a homeless girl and his haircut were only the most recent examples of public scrutiny and disapproval he'd seen. He finished one bundle of shingles and dragged another one closer to cut open with his utility knife.

"Tossing shingles is fun and all, but you're gonna out yourself if we keep doing shit like that. If you didn't already," Buck told him.

Steve wanted to shrug off the caution, but it would be real crappy for reporters to show up at the worksite, speculating over why Captain America was working at an hourly job. He didn't care so much what the press did with the story, but he wouldn't want to call attention to Buck, or to some of the guys on the work crew who didn't speak English.
"I hear ya. It's a shame we can't work to our full potential without causing a scene. The work is nice. I'd love to tear it up," Steve said.

He glanced over at the other roofing crew. It's not that he and Buck were getting faster. The other guys were slowing down, getting tired. They were still working at a good pace, but their stamina could only go so far. The other crew was dripping sweat, their clothes drenched, and they'd already sent a guy down to refill their water bottles. He and Buck were almost finished with the roof they were on, and lunch time was nearing. All that was left was to cap the ridge with shingles, and that didn't take long once Buck showed him how.

They brought down their tools and Steve cleaned up the empty plastic shingle packages that had blown off the roof.

"We don't clean up the grounds til the end of the day," Buck told him.

Steve smirked at him and picked up the trash anyway. Buck shook his head and went to refill his water.

Steve got his lunch from the saddlebag of his bike and sat on the seat to eat since there weren't any tables around. Buck was walking over to join him with his lunch when Steve's ears caught the sound of a heavy government vehicle approaching on a nearby street. It would sound the same as a civilian vehicle if it didn't have a different engine built for chase and different tire tread.

A half-second later, Buck heard it too. He did a quick about-face and jogged into one of the duplex units they were working on. A few seconds later, six guys from Diego's crew were running off. Steve watched them hustle away from the work site and melt into the nearby neighborhood.

Buck came out, walking casually toward Steve again, lunch cooler in hand. Steve bit eagerly into his chicken salad sandwich and chewed a mouthful.

Steve got up from the leather seat to lean his rump on the back of his bike, partially obscuring the license plate. He took another big bite of his sandwich. Buck bent and got his own lunch, leftover pizza, and stood a step away from Steve, casually blocking the view of the rest of the plate.

A white van turned into the site and cruised toward the contractor's trailer. Not far from Steve and Bucky, it stopped and four agents from the immigration enforcement agency got out. They looked briefly at the two men, then went toward the construction area.

Steve and Buck kept eating. They heard the sounds of raised voices and questioning from inside the unfinished duplex, and Ron hurried over to intercede. The driver of the white van stayed in it and kept the vehicle ready to chase. He looked harder at Steve and Bucky. Steve lifted a hand in greeting to him briefly before bending down to get another sandwich out of his lunch cooler.

"Don't make a ham of yourself," Buck said under his breath and around a mouth full of pizza.

"I figured it would be better than suspiciously ignoring the guy while he checks us out," Steve said.

"Maybe," Buck grunted.

Several minutes later, as Steve was popping steak bites and cubes of cheese into his mouth, the four agents came back to their van, Ron following along.

"I told you my guys had papers," Ron said to them.

"Yeah, yeah," one of the agents said. They looked around the place a little, then they got in their van and it backed slowly out of the lot.

Ron stood in the driveway and watched them go. When they were gone, he turned to go back to his trailer. His eyes stopped on Bucky for a moment. Buck lifted his half-eaten pizza slice in a little salute, and Ron shut himself in his trailer.

After lunch, Buck and Steve moved their ladder and tools to the next duplex unit and started rolling felt onto the deck. Steve tossed bundles of shingles up to Bucky again. The other crew didn't pay so much attention this time, and Steve wasn't sure he could have done things the slow way anyhow. It was too much fun working with Buck to trudge around like a regular guy.

The work went smoothly. They didn't need to talk much. After almost an hour of steady work, Steve noticed that Buck had gone still and silent. Steve had gotten pretty far ahead with his course of shingles, and he paused to look back. Buck was looking at him with menacing uncertainty. The pneumatic nail gun in his hand wasn't exactly pointed at the roof decking anymore.

"I know you," he said.

Steve set down his nailer and took off his sunglasses. Slow and careful, he walked across the twenty feet of sweltering asphalt roof. Buck watched him, then looked down at the nailer in his hand, confused. Steve squatted next to him and put out a hand to squeeze his shoulder. If Buck was gonna do something stupid, he wanted to be close.

"Yeah, Buck, you know me. I'm Stevie," he said.

He gave Buck's shoulder a firm squeeze and watched his face while he worked through his moment of confusion. For an instant, he saw the Soldier there in his eyes. The nailer thunked to the deck and Buck tensed, ready to do something. Steve slightly changed the way his boot treads gripped the shingles, but he didn't let go of Buck's shoulder. He looked Bucky in the eyes, keeping his expression warm and patient.

Bucky gradually relaxed. He shook his head slightly, then picked up his nailer. He gave Steve a tight smile. Buck laughed, low and disgusted with himself.

"Nail gun's no good weapon, anyway. Tethered to a damn hose," he said.

"You coulda strangled me with the hose, then hung me off the roof," Steve replied helpfully.

Buck nodded.

"We got work to do," he told Steve.

Steve left him alone and went back to laying his course of shingles. A few times that afternoon when Buck got quiet, Steve looked back at him, but he was fine. It had been only a momentary lapse.

By the time the site was shutting down at six that evening, they'd finished their second roof, and helped the other roofing crew finish the last of the other roof.

The cleanup took until dusk, then Ron passed out the pay from his desk in the trailer. Steve and Buck hung back until the other guys got theirs. The undocumented workers had to miss an hour of work while they hid away from the site, and Steve heard them complaining about the hit to their daily wage. He didn't know much Spanish, but it was easy to come to the right conclusion. As they left the trailer, one of them came over and shook Buck's hand. Buck nodded, and then he and Steve went in to get their pay.
Ron looked up from his desk as Steve and Buck entered. Steve took off his sunglasses and tucked them into the neck of his shirt because it was almost full dark. Out of habit, he removed his cap as he entered the brightly lit office trailer.

"Well, that makes sense then," Ron said. A smile spread over his face. He got up from his desk and shook Steve's hand vigorously.

"Cap-" Ron began to say.

"Not today. Just Grant. I'm as undocumented as the other guys, right?" Steve said.

"Yeah. You are. Man, you had me scratching my head this morning, trying to figure out how you were tossing those bundles," Ron said. He was still smiling.

"Sorry about that. It's easy to forget myself sometimes," Steve told him.

Ron pulled himself out of his amazement and hurried to get their cash.

He handed it to them, and Steve folded his and put it in his back pocket. He didn't need to count it because he wasn't keeping it, anyway.

"You two did the work of six men today. You got us caught up. With the roofing, anyway. I appreciate it. You still have his phone number for when we're short-handed next time?" Ron asked Bucky.

"Sure," Buck said.

"I enjoyed the work today, but I can't make any promises. I get called out at odd times. I won't be able to come back if the media gets wind of it," Steve told him.

"I figured that. Keep your hat and glasses, then. And the beard helps," Ron said.

"Not as much as I'd wish," Steve told him.

They said their goodbyes and left the trailer.

"Well, ain't we chummy," Buck teased him and shoved his shoulder.

"C'mon, Buck. I don't have a lot of options. Once people know who I am, I'm supposed to make nice," Steve said to him.

"I guess," Bucky agreed.

They walked over to Steve's bike. Steve put away his tool belt and tools and got out his helmet.

"You want a ride to the bus stop?" he offered to Bucky.

"Nah. It's nice out, and I don't wanna put my legs around ya," Buck told him.

Steve snorted a laugh. They'd done a lot more than that on some cold, cold nights overseas. But that was a long time ago, just like sharing rations or the contents of a canteen.

"The world's a strange place. Things that didn't used to mean anything are important now, and some of the important things are meaningless anymore," Steve said.

"Ain't that the truth?" Buck agreed.
A moment of silence passed while Steve pulled on his leather jacket.

"Hey, thanks for coming out today," Bucky said.

"I never would have thought I'd be doing something like this, but I liked it. Hey, that guy Johnny whose wife had the baby, what hospital are they using?"

"Methodist, I think. His last name's Despino. You're gonna go give him your pay, aren't ya?" Buck asked.

"Why not? I don't need the money, and I didn't do this for the pay. Just like you didn't take any cash for warning those guys about immigration," Steve said.

"They pay me, just not in cash," Buck said.

Steve put his helmet on and swung his leg over the bike.

"I don't think Stark is angry with you about his parents. He dug some of his old stuff out for me to use today, and he covered for me at the office so I could come," Steve told Buck.

"You really want me to come around, don't you? I don't know that I want Hydra to see me getting cozy with your gang," Buck said.

"If you ever change your mind-" Steve said.

"Yeah, I know," Buck agreed.

He picked up his lunch cooler and started walking in the dark toward the nearest bus stop. Steve started his bike and waved as he passed Buck on his way home.

Steve rapped softly on the partially open hospital room door with his knuckles. The tag by the door said baby boy Despino.

"Come in," came a faint male voice.

Again, Steve looked down at the asphalt stains on his knees and on Thor's boots. He'd stopped in the hospital lobby restroom to wash his hands, at least, and the nurses in the maternity ward weren't making faces at him, so he guessed it was alright to be a little bit dirty.

He cautiously pushed in the wide door and stepped into the room. The young couple had obviously been expecting a nurse or family members, because they looked at him blankly for a moment.

"Hi. You're Johnny?" Steve asked quietly. The young man nodded and Steve continued talking, "I filled in for you at work today. I was just doing my friend Buck a favor, and I don't need this, so I wanted to bring it to you."

Steve pulled the folded money out of his back pocket and stepped forward to hand it to the surprised man. He was of medium height and skinny. He already had a weathered look about him despite his youth. The wife was holding their newborn while she sat up in the hospital bed. The man finally snapped out of his stupor and reached to take the money from Steve.

"But, you worked the day…"

He was going to leave the little family in peace and go home, but the wife was poking at her husband with the arm which wasn't supporting the baby and Johnny was staring, finally figuring out who he was seeing.

"Captain Rogers? Are you for real? You worked the day for me?" Johnny asked.

"Sure I did. Like I said, Buck is my friend and he called me in to fill your spot. I'm not the Captain today, though. You can call me Grant. And, hey, I don't need the cash, so…" Steve said. He pushed Johnny's hand closed around the money, because the man was still half-hearted about taking it.

"You sure?" Johnny asked.

"I'm sure, man. I enjoyed the work. It was great to get a break from what I normally do," Steve said.

He was resigned to staying for a moment, now that he'd lingered long enough for them to recognize him. He'd known it was a possibility he'd be recognized, but it couldn't be helped.

"Captain America? Really?" the wife asked belatedly. She looked a little dazed, and Steve saw that she had an IV in the back of her hand still. Her middle looked bandaged. She was probably on pain meds, so Steve cheerfully forgave her the use of his work title.

"Yes, Ma'am, but ssshh, I'm in disguise," he said with a smile that crinkled his eyes. He flopped his hands at his sides a little to indicate his work clothes.

She shook her head at him and smiled kind of goofy. Yeah, she had to be on some good medication. She was young and blonde and pretty, but fairly puffy looking from whatever pregnancy and childbirth had done to her. Steve thought she was beautiful in a way that had nothing to do with her looks.

"Hey, you wanna hold him? This is Mikey," Johnny told Steve.

The new father reached carefully over to his wife and lifted the bundled newborn like he was made of spun glass. A shock of alarm made Steve stand ramrod straight in a ready position, as if someone was about to hand him a live bomb.

"Oh! I'm, ah- dirty," Steve said haltingly. He was afraid to hold such a tiny person, and he was dirty.

"So wash your hands," Johnny told him.

Steve did as he was told, more to stall for time than anything else. He'd held plenty babies, but they were always the loud wide-eyed kind that tried to grab his face or throw up on him. A tiny, tiny sleeping one that couldn't even hold its head up was scary, but if he left the hospital bathroom and refused to hold the kid, the parents might be insulted. Steve washed his hands and his arms all the way up to his elbows and rubbed the soap in vigorously. Then he rinsed and used a lot of paper towels to dry himself. He couldn't put it off any longer. He stepped out of the little bathroom and smiled nervously at the couple.

"Sit right there," Johnny told him.

Steve backed up and sat himself on the stiff vinyl mini-couch. Johnny approached him with the wrapped bundle and Steve looked on, wide-eyed. He splayed his hands, as if he would be catching Johnny turned the baby sideways to him, and Steve automatically corrected his arms to make a cradle. Before Steve could do anything else, Johnny put the little bundle of blanket in his arms, against his chest and his work shirt.

The tiny human weighed almost nothing. He was so much lighter and more still than a squirming, grabbing one year old. Steve looked down in awe at the little scrunched face and the two dimply fists. Johnny hovered for a moment to see that Steve had the baby securely, then he disappeared from Steve's field of view.

"Mikey?" Steve asked.

"Yeah, we're gonna call him Mikey," the mother said.

"Hey, Mikey," Steve said softly.

The newborn slept on undisturbed, wrapped in his striped blanket. As Steve held him, the warmth of the tiny human seeped through the blankets and the restfulness of the infant somehow infected Steve. Here was a person who was completely helpless. Dependent. Soft. But little Mikey had the luxury of not worrying about a thing. His dad was a hard worker and his mom obviously cared about him.

Steve stared down at the baby, speechless. He had the responsibility of keeping the bad guys in line and knocking them down when they got too rowdy. But this young couple had the weighty responsibility of taking care of this little guy and bringing him up right and safe in a world with too many bad guys and too much bad luck.

Steve was scared to seriously contemplate the idea of having little ones of his own, knowing the kinds of villains that were out there. Yet these brave people were going to take on the job of protecting Mikey. They didn't have super stamina or strength, or fancy weapons or rich friends. They were more like Steve's own mom. They probably struggled and had to work hard for everything they had. They watched the news, he was sure. In fact, the television was on a news channel and muted right now. They knew the dangers, but they wanted Mikey anyway.

"Wow. You guys are amazing," Steve said reverently.

As he was about to try to hand Mikey back to his father, the newborn's skin turned deep red. His little face bunched up into incredible chins and puffy cheeks, and Steve looked around nervously as the little guy arched his back strongly and rooted at his fists which he had drawn in tight to his face.

"Whoa! What's he doing?" Steve asked nervously.

"Just stretching I guess. He's done that before," the baby's mother said.

The baby's red face paled back to its normal color, and then his eyes opened. His toothless mouth opened too, and Mikey looked around aimlessly for a moment, then up to Steve. He had large, dark eyes. He stilled and stared at Steve, looking so very serious.

"Hi, little guy," Steve said.

Mikey stared at him for almost a minute. It wasn't like being stared at by a stranger, though Mikey was just as much a stranger as anybody else. Steve got the impression that the infant was studying his face with the same kind of intensity with which Tony studied his technical plans, or how he himself memorized the schematics of a Hydra base.

The feeling of a fist at his cheek distracted Mikey, and he mouthed at it, then his face turned red again. His eyes squeezed shut and his mouth opened into a gummy pink square. The most plaintive wail Steve had heard in a long time split the still air of the hospital room. Mikey was very angry about something.

"Oh! Bring him here!" his mother said.

Steve looked up to see Johnny sitting drowsily, watching. His wife was reaching for the baby with one arm, the other arm pressed against her belly. They expected him to stand up with the little guy and hand him over? Steve was galvanized with fear of dropping him, but Mikey took a deep breath and wailed with a trembling warble that Steve had to do something about.

So carefully, Steve stood and kept the infant tucked to his chest exactly as he'd been holding him. He took a step toward the hospital bed and leaned over. The mother's arm came up under his and it became apparent how to transfer the baby to his mom. Little Mikey was angry and ruddy and his fists were waving in the air near his face. There was an unexpected flash of nipple, then Mikey was busy and quieting down.

Steve chuckled in relief. Mikey had gotten what he wanted and Steve was probably free to go now. He grinned at Johnny. Johnny was dead asleep, slumped in the rigid plastic chair beside his wife's bed.

"Thanks for the money. We can use it," the woman said to Steve.

She didn't look at him. Her eyes were on her baby, stroking his soft wispy hair where Mikey had knocked his knit cap off in his anger and urgent flailing.

"Thanks for letting me hold him. He's amazing," Steve said.

He reached out and touched the baby's head once, then he left the room. The whole experience had him thinking about heroics and responsibility in a different way. His arms felt empty, and there was a cool spot on his chest where Mikey had been. Who would have thought that holding someone, even a tiny someone, would be so warm? That letting them go again would make him feel empty? He'd never known he was missing anything, but he felt the lack of it now.

When he got home, he found Estrella asleep on his couch. He set his lunch cooler on the floor in the hall to prop the door open. Steve wanted a shower, but he wouldn't do that while she was in his suite.

The clock on the oven said it was almost nine. There was a plate on the countertop, covered in foil. Steve lifted the edge of the foil and sniffed. It looked like pork roast with gravy and potatoes. He took the foil off and slid the plate into the microwave. He pressed the reheat button.

Steve settled into his chair across from the couch. His sketchpad was on the end table with a pencil stuck in the spiral spine. The lamplight was perfect on her face. The angle of the shadows emphasized her beauty. His hand reached for the sketchpad.

Estrella was lying on her side on the couch, one hand under her face, and the other arm folded back with her hand resting on her waist. Steve was happy to notice that she had a nice shape. That meant she was still eating and gaining weight well. His pencil put down fluid lines, swatches of smudged shadow, and contour marks where her form was beginning to be rounded. She was barefoot and he took the time to detail her toes.

The microwave beeped. Steve would have ignored it, but Estrella's eyes blinked open.

She smiled softly at him at first. Then when she saw his hand moving pencil over paper, she frowned and sat up.

"Stop it," she grumbled at him.

Steve sucked in a breath and his hands tightened around what they were holding. She wasn't wearing her necklace. Funny that he hadn't paid attention to that detail.

"I'm sorry," she said.

Estrella reached for the couch cushions and felt around for her necklace. She must have taken it off while she was sleeping. She didn't see it anywhere.

"It's on the floor," Steve ground out.

Her eyes flashed to him, then she bent to grab the blue scrap of fabric from where it had fallen. As she tied it securely at her throat, she watched Steve.

He set aside his sketch. He could finish it later. She'd gone still, watching him.

"I'm alright," he said.

He was. The ache she caused him was beginning to become familiar. There wasn't anywhere to hide, and anything he did to cover up would only draw attention to him.

"I'm alright," he said again, "It was only a few words. I'm gonna get my plate."

Steve got up and got a fork and knife from the drawer. He took the heaping, steaming plate from the microwave and grabbed a water bottle from the fridge. It was difficult to put a smile on his face, but he did anyway. He knew she wanted him to play at frightening her, but now wasn't the time. It felt too real.

Estrella watched him settle back into his chair, still wary of him. She knew from the way he forced a smile that he wasn't unaffected. He set down his water, put the utensils on the edge of his plate, and balanced the plate on the hard muscles of his thighs. He smiled happily and cut into his supper.

"Mmm," he mumbled while he chewed.

She smiled a little at how eagerly he devoured what she'd brought him. He wasn't taking much time to savor it. He always ate fast when he was really hungry.

"You didn't have to wait for me. I've got the microwave figured out," Steve said quickly.

He swished a bite of meat through his potatoes and gravy, then put it in his mouth like he couldn't get it fast enough.

"I know you're smart enough to work the microwave. I wanted to hear about your day. How was your friend?" Estrella asked.

Steve nodded in acknowledgement of her words, but he ate another bite before answering her.
"He's good," Steve said.

Several things about Bucky were bothering him, but he didn't want to talk about them now. He finished his dinner and brought his plate to the sink. It was also bothering him that Estrella was making herself at home in his suite. He didn't want to make her feel unwelcome, so he didn't mention it. He sat back down in his chair.

She stared at him.

"What are you waiting for?" he finally asked her when he couldn't stand the silent staring anymore.

"What is it like when you hear my voice? I've never had the chance to ask anyone," she wondered.

Steve opened his mouth, accustomed to answering questions posed by fans or news people with microphones and cameras. What she was asking was much more personal than that. He didn't want to answer, but it was her voice. She had a right to know.

He took a breath and held it. He looked to her for mercy, but she gave none. She was waiting for the answer. He let the breath out. He turned his head aside to rub his eyes.

"It feels like-"

"No. This is time for you to practice not blushing. Or blush all you want. But look at me. Get used to saying embarassing things," Estrella challenged him.

"Eya, I don't want to talk about these things in front of you," Steve said.

"Stupid! Do you think a few words are going to hurt me? After all that's been done already? Tell me," she insisted.

Steve got up and nudged his lunch cooler away from the door. It swung shut. He strode back to his chair and flopped down petulantly.

"Jarvis, get out," Steve said.

"Yes, Captain," Jarvis replied.

"You don't have to be rude to him," Estrella said.

"But I do. There's almost no privacy around here," Steve said.

"Are you working up a good mad so you can tell me without blushing? Because otherwise, you're just stalling," Estrella told him with an impatient hand gesture.

"I know. Yeah, I'm working on it," Steve bounced the butt of his fist on the arm of his chair. He might have been put out with her for making him close the door. Or for making him talk about it. But she was cute. Her courage was inspiring to watch. Her slight accent was captivating.

And she trusted him.

"Don't make me take this off again, because I'll keep asking you until you tell me," she told him.

Her fingers lingered at the back of her neck, where the necklace was tied.

"You're a bully," Steve said.
"So are you. Now tell me. Go ahead. I already know you will because you closed the door and evicted Jarvis," she pointed out.

She cocked her head down a little and raised an eyebrow, waiting. Her wrist moved at the back of her neck, twirling her fingers at the ties. Just the thought of hearing her unmodulated voice again made him hard. Steve knew what was causing it and he didn't like it. He was becoming conditioned to the natural sound of her, like a dog for a treat. His body anticipated the reaction to her voice, whether she was going to let him hear her or not. He gripped both arms of the chair.

"I'm not immune to your voice. For the first instant that I hear it, nothing happens. There's a delay. But after that, maybe half a second, it feels like heat soaking into my head. From my brain, down my spine, then it hits here, and," Steve waved a hand at the obvious state of affairs in his lap.

Estrella's nose flared, trying to make room for deeper breaths without opening her mouth. She glanced at where he indicated and nodded, but then looked back to his face again. He was glad of that.

"Every guy gets that. I want to know why you're different," Estrella said.

Steve wanted to look away, but she didn't want him to. He was supposed to be practicing. He was surprised to feel that his face wasn't hot. He wasn't blushing.

"While that's happening, I get the urge to be close to you. I haven't followed that down the path to see where it leads, but you probably know," Steve said.

Estrella nodded once.

"You know how when a bell is struck, the sound keeps ringing, vibrating for a while afterwards, like the energy from the strike keeps going until it uses itself up?" Steve asked.

"Yah?" she encouraged him.

"It's like that in my head. Not your words, but the tones. After you're done talking, it takes a while to fade. All that time, and it seems like a long time, I'm fighting the urge to go to you, and I'm fighting this," he said, and waved at his lap again.

She looked him over, but her eyes seemed to get stuck, not so quick to look away this time.

"Quit looking at me like that, Eya," he said firmly.

Again, like last time after she'd trimmed his beard and his hair. It was almost same way other women looked at him. He was used to this from others. It wasn't right from her. She'd been hurt so much. He didn't want to be like that with her. He wanted his sweet, spunky, funny friend, nothing more.

"Then quit drawing me," she countered.

Steve set his jaw stubbornly. He didn't want to quit drawing her. She needed to be drawn. He needed to draw her. She was too unique, too intriguing not to draw.

"You quit looking at me like that, Steve. You look like a stubborn little boy. If I can't appreciate you, then you can't appreciate me. Fair is fair," Estrella said.
"It's not the same. I'm not-" Steve started to protest.

Estrella raised her eyebrow at him and crossed her arms. Obviously, his artistic regard made her feel as squirmy as her subtle leer made him feel. But he wasn't going to stop drawing her.

"Fine. Look, then," Steve said, grumpy.

He defiantly shoved his knees apart and slouched down deeper in his chair. He glared at her. If she wanted to be that way, then she could look. But he felt let down. In retaliation, he grabbed his sketchpad and pencil. He flipped back to the page he'd been working on, then started on an image of her face, just as she was looking at him now.

When Estrella was done proving her point, she met his eyes over the sketchpad. He was angry and tense and pretty much drawing out of spite. She felt the same scowl on her face that he was wearing. She was already tense from being in a cozy, private room with an aroused man.

But it was only Steve and they were both acting like children.

Almost before her scowl surrendered, a laugh forced its way out of her. Steve's hand stilled and the sketchpad drooped onto his lap. She could see him try to suppress it with stiff lips, but then one corner of his mouth went up and he laughed too. He set his drawing aside again. Estrella smiled at him, happy that the intensity had eased.

"You didn't blush," she pointed out.

"And you weren't scared of me," he said.

"I was. But I managed it," Estrella said proudly.

"So that was a scared look, not a lusty one?" Steve asked.

It was Estrella's turn to look down and away. She shrugged.

"Both?" she said.

"How can you be scared and look at me like that at the same time?" he wondered.

"I don't know. I guess I'm kind of messed up?"

She had every right to be, Steve thought.

Bucky was messed up. Estrella was messed up. Steve might or might not be as bad, but he had his own issues.

Steve sat up in his chair a little more. He decided to take a chance. He rolled his forearms up and opened his hands to her, a universal sign of welcome.

Estrella stopped smiling and looked at him like he was speaking a strange language. He looked hopeful. He looked friendly. What did he want? A hug?

Steve wiggled his fingers at her in encouragement.

Estrella was unsure, but she got up from the couch and went to him where he sat. When she got close to his knee, he reached for her and her instinct was to pull away.

She didn't. Gently, he pulled her in and lifted her across his lap. She settled onto his left thigh and he hugged her against his chest. One of his hands played with her hair while the other one made a rest for her feet. Thankfully, she wasn't being poked by anything scary or awkward. He was quiet and controlled. His hand felt good on her hair. She wrapped her hands around his arm and petted him, for lack of a better thing to do.

Steve rested his cheek against her hair. He didn't want to move, and he didn't want her to go, either. This was just right. It felt good to touch and be touched. It was good. Estrella relaxed against him.

"I'm sorry," Steve said.

"Me too," she agreed.

He was tired from the heat and work of the day. It was a pleasant kind of tired, not the desperate, tight-wound kind of exhaustion he sometimes felt after an intense mission. The last thing he remembered was the feel of her silky hair on his fingers, the warmth of her body resting against him. Her skin felt good where their arms touched.
Chapter 20

Using the toilet hadn't helped his situation this morning. He was going to have to think unhappy thoughts if he was going to leave his suite this morning and leave anything except a trail of embarrassment behind him at the office. Artillery movements of the German war effort would work pretty well to chill things in his pants, but he didn't want to do that to himself yet. It was very effective and no fun at all.

Steve looked at the drawer where his favorite toy was hidden while he brushed his teeth. It would only take a few minutes and he wasn't even running late for his morning appointments. But he couldn't. Well, he could. But he'd made a deal with himself. His attempts at internet research had led him to the conclusion that happily married couples had sex about twice a week. Someday he wanted to be part of a happily married couple. So, it wouldn't be fair to let himself go crazy now, get used to having a lot of sex, and then expect too much from a wife later. He'd told himself that he could use the toy every third day if he needed to. No more. That meant no fun for him until tonight after work.

He finished brushing his teeth, spit, and rinsed. He scowled at himself in the mirror when his cheeks colored up. He was thinking of naming the toy. No, he had already named the toy, if he was being honest with himself, but he refused to let himself use the name, even in his head. What kind of a sick, lonely soul names a piece of silicone? Not him. So he wasn't going to think the name, or let it evoke the physical sensations he felt when he was using it.

…Rosie…

"No!" Steve growled at himself.

He stormed out of the bathroom, past his night stand, (…Rosie!) and grabbed his gym bag on the way out his door. Soon as the door to his suite locked shut behind him and before Jarvis had the elevator open, he was thumbing for Bruce's number on his phone.

While it rang and he got into the elevator, he started running through those German artillery movements in his head, along with the remembered sound of heavy trundling tracks, guttural voices yelling commands, and the sounds of shells being loaded and discharged.

"Hey," Bruce's voice came to him through his phone.

It took a long instant for Steve to pull his mind from the feel of the earth shaking under his prone body, the explosion of soil and grit against his skin, the blast of heat that singed hairs off his arms…

"Uh, hey. Good morning," Steve said a little belatedly.

"Good morning. I was starting to wonder if something was wrong or if you managed to butt-dial me somehow," Bruce said.

Steve could hear the slight smile in his voice, and then a breathy little slurp as Bruce took a sip of coffee.

"I'm fine. At least I hope I am. Can I stop by the lab and get you to draw some blood?" Steve asked.

The elevator slowed its gut-lifting drop down to the office levels, proof that Jarvis was listening in.
Steve refused to let it get to him. Jarvis was only trying to be his usual helpful self.

"You want me to draw your blood? Now?" Bruce asked for clarification.

"If it's not too much trouble. Are you in your lab?" Steve asked.

"Yeah. Your timing couldn't be better. I just stopped by the lab to get some data for this morning's briefings. See you in a few?" Bruce said.

"Sure," Steve said, then touched the end button for the call.

Jarvis slowed the downward motion of the elevator, then started it moving back up again. Steve tightened the muscles of his legs and felt like he was riding a yo-yo. Jarvis knew he loved the G's, so the AI didn't do much to make the transition from going down to going up a gentle one. The fact that Jarvis was making an effort to give him a fun ride despite how he'd treated him lately made Steve feel pretty low.

"Jarvis, I'm sorry I'm such an ass lately," Steve told him.

"No apology is needed, Captain. Circumstances are rarely perfect. We do the best we can," Jarvis said.

Steve nodded, still feeling like an ass. The elevator came to an abrupt halt in its upward motion, then actually dropped out from under his feet, tossing Steve in the air for an instant. Steve laughed out loud, then regained his footing as the doors opened.

"Gotta love that guy," he said as he strode out and toward the labs. He was still grinning as he rounded the corner into Bruce's domain.

Bruce looked up and let himself be infected by Steve's smile. Steve set down his files and his gym bag near where Bruce had set down his stuff and his coffee cup. He leaned against the workstation and rolled up his shirt sleeve while Bruce prepared the blood sample kit.

"What do you want me to do with it?" Bruce asked as he approached with the needle. He swabbed Steve's arm, then started taking blood.

"If you can get my medical history, compare today's blood with my previous samples. I want to know if my hormone levels are normal," Steve said.

Bruce had three vials lined up, but when he heard how simple Steve's request was, he only filled the first one. Bruce offered him a bandaid with a hint of a smile and Steve rolled his eyes. He held his thumb where Bruce had pricked him for thirty seconds, then rolled his sleeve down and buttoned it.

"Just hormone levels?" Bruce asked.

He bent to write on the sample vial briefly, then he filled out the diagnostic request sheet that would travel along with the vial.

"I think so," Steve paused while a lab assistant came to take the vial and the form from Bruce. The older woman went immediately to work at the back of the lab, out of earshot of the two men.

"I'm having a hard time lately. Staying celibate, I mean," Steve forced himself to say. He knew Bruce would understand. They picked up their files, Bruce's coffee, and Steve's gym bag, and headed for the elevator.
"You don't have to stay celibate. If I were you I'd be-

"I know, Bruce, but that's not the point. I want to know why it feels like my needs have changed in the last few months. Let's just start by looking at my blood and see if anything's going on," Steve told him.

Tony would rile at him to go out and get laid and Clint would joke. Bruce looked at him thoughtfully. He nodded once. They both knew that Steve should have gone to the Avengers' medical ward for this kind of bloodwork. They both understood that Steve wanted this little bit of diagnostics to stay out of the records and databanks for now. Steve glanced at the ceiling of the elevator.

"Unfortunately, Captain, I am suffering a temporary loss of data integrity. I'm sorry to say that your conversation here in the elevator at this moment and possibly even until you and doctor Banner leave the elevator will be unrecoverable due to a corrupted file error," Jarvis told them helpfully.

Bruce smiled at the ceiling briefly, then turned his attention back to Steve while they slowly made their way to the Avengers' nine o'clock briefing on the office levels below.

Steve felt like he was in the confessional at church, but without the kneeler and the pending absolution. Well, if Bruce could get some conclusive results for him, that would be something.

"I mean, I'm a guy. I've always wanted it. But lately, it's like I'm a damn suffering kid again. Unwanted hard-ons, dreams, temptations to do stupid things. Hell, I couldn't spar with Natasha a few weeks ago. I need to know why. It's a distraction I can't allow," Steve confessed.

"You're allowed to be human, Steve. I haven't noticed any lack of focus during missions. You haven't done anything stupid," Bruce tried to mollify him.

"Yet," Steve said bitterly.

"Hang in there. We've got Erskine's rudimentary data from your pre-serum blood samples, and Howard kept all your subsequent paper medical records together. Then, we have all of SHIELD's medical data on you. We can establish a good baseline. I'll have the analysis done for you by this evening," Bruce told him.

Steve nodded.

He forced himself to pay sharp attention to the final intel briefing for their upcoming mission, and he kept his cool while he and Tony argued about how the mission should run. They made a plan taking into account Thor's presence and another one without Thor, in case he wasn't back before the mission. Over time, Steve was getting better at learning how to satisfy Tony's ideas and ego and fold him into a cohesive plan of action that benefitted all their goals. He left the briefing not exactly pleased, but satisfied that things would work out.

Steve filed the finalized mission plan on his office workstation. With the most important of his morning work done, he sat back and let his mind wander for a moment. How would Bucky have fit into this mission? Could they make room for him in the Avengers? Should they? Would Tony be able to work with him? Was he daydreaming to think he'd ever get to work with his friend again, other than at a construction site?

When he checked, his phone still showed no messages from Buck. No missed calls. No voicemail.
He'd get over to Buck's place soon if he didn't hear from him.

Steve still had over an hour before lunch time, but he was hungry. He picked up his gym bag and closed his office door. He closed the blinds at the interior window and stripped out of his office clothes while he tore into a protein bar. The slide of fabric over his groin as he changed into nylon sport shorts was enough to make him grit his teeth.

Gritted teeth weren't very effective at chewing protein bars, so he injected his mind with another hit of German field tactics until he was dressed for a workout. Depending on who was in the training room at this hour, he might have to mentally multi-task if he was going to stay in control of himself.

He dropped the food wrapper into his office trash can and ripped into another protein bar on his way to the training room. Sitting around thinking until lunch time would do him more harm than good, with the mood he was in. He needed to get his body moving.

"No," Steve grunted as Natasha jerked him down to the mats with her weight.

If he'd been a normal man, his neck would be broken in the vice of her thighs, but he wasn't normal. It still hurt.

"What?" Nat asked him mildly.

They lay side-down on the mats and Nat turned her head toward the doors of the training room. Steve tapped her knee and she let him loose. They both got to their feet, but they sent very different greetings to the incoming visitors.

Natasha waved briefly to Jane and Darcy. They'd brought Estrella as Nat had requested them to. Jane looked like she'd rather be working in her lab, but she was hiding it pretty well. Estrella looked around at the room and all its equipment and the rubberized floor mats. Her eyes were still wide from seeing her and Steve getting up from their tangle on the floor.

"Uff!" Clint huffed as Sam got a good punch into him on the other set of mats.

"Dammit, Lewis," Clint grumbled, rubbing his belly.

Sam smiled and nodded a greeting to the ladies, then took full advantage of Clint's temporary distraction to return to attempting to beat his ass. Estrella looked a little disturbed at their level of glee and violence until Jane bent aside to whisper something to her.

Darcy popped her bubblegum one last time, then pulled it from her mouth to stick it on the outside of her microwave popcorn bag. She was wearing a fairly short skirt and a snug sweater, so Natasha was uncertain if Clint had been distracted by the sight of her, or by the smell of her popcorn.

Steve's belly growled from where he stood behind Natasha.

"Dammit, Lewis," Steve muttered, echoing Clint's sentiments.

He stepped around Natasha and went over to the ladies. He didn't normally voluntarily go near ladies when he was so sweaty, but he couldn't help it. Lewis had what he needed.

"C'mon! I'm starving and it's almost lunchtime. You have to at least share," Steve grumped at her.
He nodded and smiled politely at Jane. He held out his fingers for Estrella to touch. She looked him and Natasha over uncertainly and he gripped her fingers tighter in reassurance for a moment before he let her hand slip away. Then he opened his mouth at Darcy and pointed to it.

Darcy dug a handful of popcorn from her bag and tossed the kernels at him, one after the other. Steve caught them all, except for one which he got with his hand and threw into his mouth with the rest of them. Her aim wasn't that great. Steve chewed and swallowed, then opened up for more. Darcy obliged him, and then he turned back to the mats and Natasha. A Lewis-sized double handful of popcorn wasn't going to hold him for much longer, but it would have to do.

He worked his head around on his neck and shook his thighs out as he approached Nat. She was backing up to the far end of the mats, away from their spectators because she could see the agitation on his face. He was trying to play it down, just like the fact that he was on edge today, but she saw. That's why she'd had Jane and Darcy bring Estrella. She needed to learn a few things about Steve today.

Natasha had seen it this morning during the briefing, in the way Steve held himself tense and his jaw kept wanting to grind. Clint had refrained from jokes all during the briefing because of the ominous calmness Steve pulled over himself. The junior intelligence agents had all handed their files to Hill so they wouldn't have to be the focus of the Captain's surgically precise attention. He'd been all Cap, no Steve at the briefing. That wasn't unusual. The odd thing was his lack of kindness and good humor. He wasn't rude. Just very intent.

He'd been somewhat distracted in their sparring so far today. He kept going somewhere else in his head. She never should have been able to get him to the mats with that last move. Nat backed all the way to the end of the mats.

Darcy settled on a stack of unused mats like they were stadium seating. She pulled Estrella down beside her and offered her some popcorn, which the girl was too distracted to take. Jane settled on her other side and pulled out her tablet, doubtless working on what she could since Darcy had dragged her away from her lab.

"What's going on?" Steve asked Natasha.

He made a quick, brutal swipe at her ankles which would have at least sprained them if he hadn't been sure she would evade.

"Nothing," Natasha smiled tightly at him, and used her upward momentum to kick at his gut.

She was ready for his hand grabbing at her, and she flipped backward to avoid his grip. Today was one of those days. Every time she was a bit too slow, she had a bruise to show for it. He nearly got a fist in her hair to slam her down, but she pushed off the wall, dove between his feet and rolled through, narrowly avoiding his heel strike to the side of her head. She rolled left, then right-fake, left again as his heel slammed down around her face.

He dropped to his knees to pin her, and she arced her torso up to knee him hard under the chin. She heard his teeth snap shut, but he was too experienced to have his tongue in harm's way, so there was no blood.

In a quick scabble, she backed away and rolled. If she'd had knives, she'd have pulled them and stuck him repeatedly in vital targets. He knew this, and she watched his hands move to slap aside imaginary blades. She made note of his blocking order naturally, though she didn't think she'd ever have to try to bleed him.
She twisted to her feet, and he rose up too. He bent under her kick to his throat and got a vice inside the muscle of her right thigh with his strong hands. With a jerk up, then downward, he negated her mass and velocity and slammed her back onto the mats. Steve dropped and pinned her with the hard edge of his foot to her throat. His hands grappled to pin hers down while his other shin bit painfully across her legs. Damn, he was heavy. More bruises. Steve crimped one of her wrists in a steel grip, and her other hand went in for a Widow's bite at his exposed side, at the kidney.

If they'd been armed combatants, they'd be hurting and bloody, but Natasha knew she'd also be dead. Steve held the hard pressure of his foot precisely into her throat. She tapped out by blinking her eyes at him because her hands were busy and she couldn't breathe.

"Woo-hoo!" Darcy hooted.

Steve rolled his weight off of her carefully. He helped her up, then slapped her kick away when she tried to surprise him. Yeah, that did it. She had his full attention now. No more sideline thoughts in his head. He was noticing everything. Too fast for Natasha to precisely see, though she knew what he was doing, his attention flickered around the room to Sam and Clint, the ladies on the stack of mats, and he didn't miss a breath she took or a twitch that she made.

She noticed vaguely that Sam and Clint had stopped sparring and were watching too. Cap totally on point and engaged was something worth seeing. Natasha backed up to the end of the mats again, then turned and ran the last three steps because she had to.

A run up the wall, then evasion to the side and over him barely got her enough room. Something, some piece of heavy equipment, slammed into the wall as Steve changed course after her, and she controlled her landing only well enough to stay out from under him. Her heel impacted his ribs in passing, rolling him aside. He got a grip on her elbow, then let it go. It would have injured her, pulled her shoulder out of joint. She got the point. He was playing with her now.

Natasha forced her mind to behave as they gained their feet for a blurred-quick exchange of blows. They managed to block each other for several seconds, but Nat felt the restrained power in his movements. Steve's head jerked aside from her strike, then Natasha went flying to land at the edge of the mats not far from the ladies.

"Sorry. Too much?" Steve asked.

She looked up to see the brief worry on his face. It left him as soon as he noticed the wickedly appreciative gleam in her eyes. They chuckled, relishing the speed and each other's skills. He stalked over to smack hands with Natasha, then pull her up onto her feet. Darcy was frozen still, staring at them, so he reached over and grabbed more popcorn. He and Natasha moved back to the center of the room, letting themselves breathe for a bit while he chewed his mouthful of popcorn.

Nat lunged aside when he unexpectedly elbowed at her, then swept his arm to catch her up from the lunge. The wily shit took advantage of her recent training and used a knee to check her motion, then his foot to pin her to the floor at her hip. She had time to strike a hard heel to the pressure point inside the meat of his thigh. He went down as his leg sought relief from the pain and she laughed at him.

"Okay, now that's not even training. You're just having fun. Admit it," Clint said.

"Alright. That wouldn't work in real life. But it's not fair that you called me out on it. Did you see how many times she tried to get me unprepared, between matches?" Steve complained.

Sam, Clint, Steve and Natasha joked around and took a water break. Occasionally, Nat or Steve would make an abortive move at each other, but the other was always aware and slapped the strike away before it could land.

Estrella looked on, appalled. Steve was being an asshole to Natasha. She would never have imagined he'd be so rough on Nat. Weren't they friends? Partners? She trembled in empathetic fright, trying not to imagine Steve coming after her with the brutal intent he'd shown just now. She'd heard the weight of his heels striking the mats, trying to crush Nat's head. The weight bench had made a gouge in the wall from where he'd shoved against it to tear after Nat, trying to snatch her from the air. She didn't see how Natasha wasn't hurt from the first bout, when Steve had grabbed her by the leg like a dog with a chew toy and slammed her to the mats.

Darcy had thought it was great, smiling and hooting until halfway through. Then she'd gone quiet too. Jane had stopped tapping away at her pad. Estrella pressed her shaking hands to her legs, smoothing her skirt out nervously.

"Is this normal?" she asked.

"Mostly. But I don't think I've seen Natasha on the defensive so much. His face was pretty scary, huh?" Darcy said.

Estrella nodded. He had looked much more like the image she'd seen of him from the mission file. Steve hadn't done any yelling or snarling, but she could now see the possibility in him. The kind man she'd fallen asleep on a few nights ago wasn't in this room. Even now, while he was laughing and talking with his teammates, his face wasn't fully relaxed into good humor. He was alert, aggressive, watching. Both of the men and Natasha could attack him together, and he'd not be taken by surprise.

As she watched, Steve laid a hand on Natasha's shoulder and patted her gently. He finished the sentence he was saying to Clint, then his attention turned to Estrella. His brows lowered and that crinkle formed between them when he saw that she was upset. He trailed his fingers across Nat's shoulders when he moved around behind her to walk toward the ladies.

Estrella was no observational expert on interactions between them, but even she could interpret the shoulder pat and the finger contact as a message to Natasha that sparring time was over for now and he wanted peace. Natasha turned her head to watch him walk away, and Estrella could see the tactical gleam of her eyes fade from opportunity assessment into a relaxed smile.

Darcy dug busily into her popcorn and Jane found something interesting on her pad again as Steve approached them. He was smiling at Estrella, but there was still something hard about his eyes. He didn't so easily set aside the physical tension of sparring like Nat was able to. Halfway across the mats to her, he shook out his limbs again, and she saw that he was easier in his step after that. Looser. Less scary.

Steve came close. He kept eye contact with her and slowed down, made everything predictable and smooth as he sunk to his knees at her feet. With a roll of his hands, he lifted her fingers off her legs and onto the backs of his hands. He made sure he wasn't above her or gripping her in any way. He touched a brief, light kiss to her knuckles on each hand, then smiled at her.

"You alright?" he asked.

Estrella shivered with tension and looked away. He was too slick with sweat. His voice was too deep. Too much skin. Too much muscle.

Beside them, Darcy shook her head at Steve. His eyes flickered to her, then back to Estrella.
"I'm sorry you watched that. I wouldn't have wanted you to," he apologized.

Estrella kicked him half-heartedly with the side of her foot. Her head tilted toward Darcy.

"Lewis?" Steve asked, low and displeased.

Darcy pasted on a big, fake smile and pointed a hidden finger toward the people in the middle of the floor.

"I thought so," Steve said.

He sighed and turned to sit on the floor beside Estrella, his back against the stack of mats and his shoulder touching her knee.

"Natasha," Steve said.

Nat left Sam and Clint and walked toward him, apparently unconcerned at his tone.

"What did you want from this, other than to scare her away from me?" he asked sharply.

Natasha stopped and propped a fist on her hip. She gave Estrella a silent, steady look before she addressed Steve.

"She needed to know, Steve," her attention turned to Estrella, "He's not just your teddy bear, girlfriend. He can be a hard-core sonofabitch. But you can drop him, can't you?"

"Naaaat, stop it," Steve told her. He reached up a foot and pushed at her. It was a relaxed gesture, not at all harsh.

Natasha grabbed his foot and changed her stance. She jerked him hard enough to tug his shoulders down the mats a few inches. She dropped his leg and stepped back because she knew what was coming.

Steve snapped to his feet and got in her face.

"No sparring near the ladies," he said tightly.

He toned his posture down from menacing to merely authoritative when he sensed Estrella's distress.

"But that's exactly what she needs. Estrella, take your necklace off and hand it to Jane. Get on the mats," Natasha said.

Steve carefully put his hand in the middle of Nat's back and guided her across the room. Nat could have twisted away and he knew it, but she went with him.

"What the hell are you doing? What's the plan?" he whispered at her furiously.

"I know she gets to you, Steve, but you can't be all emotion with her. This was necessary. Sooner or later, she would have seen the other side of you. This way, she's gotten a view in a controlled arena. She's scared. She's been set back. Now, she needs to see that she has some power, too. She's seen how strong you are. How fast. Let's show her that she can take you down. She needs that empowerment," Nat told him.

Steve thought it through quickly, then nodded. He hated it, but Nat was right. It was more honest this way. He wanted to be nothing but Steve Rogers around Estrella, but he might not always get what he wanted.

"Do you have any idea how much this is going to hurt?" he squeezed his eyes shut.

The memory of the one time she'd yelled at him was fresh because a body remembered pain like that. Self-preservation instincts were designed to help him avoid feeling like that again. It hadn't been like a punch landed on bone and muscle. Estrella's yells pummeled at the tender parts of a man.

"You can take it. For her, you can do it," Nat said.

"You're an evil woman, Nat," Steve said.

Natasha wasted no time after she had his compliance.

"You guys are going to want to leave," she raised her voice to carry over to Sam and Clint.

Sam looked concerned. Clint had gone quiet, faintly worried about Steve. It looked like a blank face, but Natasha could read him. She tipped her head toward the door, and Clint encouraged Sam to gather his things and clear out.

Natasha watched them go, then she went to the doors to bolt them behind the guys so nobody could accidentally come in. Jane was at her elbow before she was done.

"Hey, I don't know what's going on, but I don't think I want to be here," she told Natasha.

"You sure? We're testing a theory. It's combat science. You might like it. You have any frequency analytics on your pad?" Natasha asked her.

Jane smiled nervously and shook her head. Then she nodded, and shook her head again.

"I do, but Jarvis can do the recording and I can look at it later. Please?" Doctor Foster looked toward the doors.

Natasha let her out, and looked to Darcy. Darcy folded her legs on the stack of mats and shook her head. She was holding out her popcorn bag for Steve. He hesitantly picked out a few pieces and ate them like his belly was already hurting. Nat locked the doors. Estrella wasn't looking at anybody. She found her knees very interesting.

"Estrella, look at me," Natasha demanded. She strode over to stand in front of her roommate. Dark, frightened eyes stared up at her. Her fingers were worrying at her copper butterfly.

"As rough as Steve was with me, you've got to know that he was helping me to get tougher and faster so that I can survive the next mission. He helps me stay accustomed to the pain. We try to do the same for him. We can't get weak or soft, or we'll get hurt," Natasha explained.

Estrella nodded slightly.

"It's your turn. You need to get on the mats and teach us what your voice can do," Natasha said.

Estrella shook her head. She didn't want to use her voice at all now. Not in a whisper, not even with her necklace on. Steve and Natasha were okay with pain. She'd seen that. She didn't want to do that to Steve.

He moved in front of her again and pulled her to her feet. She kept shaking her head.
"Eya, no. Stop shaking your head. There's no way you can get hurt here. I want this. I want you to see that you can stop me if you need to," he said.

"This is dumb! It's useless. All you'd have to do is cover my mouth and my voice won't matter," she denied.

With him this close, practically holding her, and that kind, genuine look on his face, she found the strength to talk. She kept wanting to lapse back into the silent, retreating defenses she'd learned on the street, but they wouldn't work here with these people.

"Your voice matters a lot. If you and me are walking down the sidewalk and something starts happening around us that I need to react to, I have to know that you can defend yourself. People don't know you. They won't anticipate your voice. Almost all of our enemy combatants are male. I need to know that you're safe with me on the street and in my living room. I need to know that you can stop me, or any other male aggressor," Steve said.

"You're not listening! I told you that all you have to do is cover my mouth and then I can't scream," she protested.

"Estrella. I won't ever cover your mouth. That would be pre-meditated and evil. If you think I could do that, then we don't know each other as well as I thought we did," Steve said.

She heaved a shaky breath and shook her head. Of course he wouldn't act like that. She shook his arms off from around her and stomped over to the middle of the floor. The mats felt weird and squishy under her shoes.

Darcy was picking at the last of the popcorn in her bag. She stole the water bottle that Jane had left behind in her cowardly dash to escape the show. She chugged half of it down and swished the popcorn taste from her mouth. She didn't fully understand what was going on, but fun in the training room was suddenly getting moody and serious. Seriouser. More serious. Whatever.

"Jarvis, you got this?" she said as low as she could. She didn't want to draw attention and get yelled at by any of the very, very serious people in the room she was locked in.

"Every breath and squeak of it, Miss Lewis," Jarvis said from the tiny phone speaker she held up to her ear. Darcy nodded and let her phone drop to her lap.

It was really hot how Steve was standing behind Natasha's cute new roommate, looking so concerned. His large hands worked at the ties of her funky-chic necklace. The wide-eyed girl shivered and Darcy didn't blame her. She'd be trembling too, if Cap was standing that close behind her and breathing on her neck all serious and shit. Too much serious, damn it. Oh.

Steve handed the necklace to Natasha without even looking at his partner in kick-assedness. His fingers, so brutal at yanking Natasha out of the air and slamming her like a tube of biscuits, ghosted up and down Estrella's neck. He bent down and kissed her, actually kissed her freaking graceful swan neck with soft lips and his eyes closed, where the knot of the necklace had rested. Eyes closed! And it wasn't a quick, friendly peck, either. The girl had time to gasp in a long, indrawn breath. Her eyes were closed too by this point, of course. Only Darcy and Natasha got to see the dripping, steaming chemistry between them.

Natasha was smirking, proud of herself. Darcy hated her. Why hadn't Natasha set the Lewis up with this? She hadn't needed to go trolling on the streets to find a girl for the Cap. She'd been Right. Fucking. Here! Darcy clapped her hands at her chest in outrage. Then she threw them out in the air. Why? Why?
Natasha turned her head slightly and shook it at Darcy. Darcy let her hands flop down into her lap. It wasn't like Steve would notice anyone else at the moment.

"You're a stinking bully, and you know it," Estrella whispered at Steve. She felt him smile against the back of her neck. His finger came around and pressed a shush onto her lips.

"That's enough, teddy bear Steve. Get your tush over there and put your hard-ass face on if you can," Natasha told him.

She pointed to the end of the mats near Darcy. Steve reluctantly left his position behind Estrella and went where he was told. He was loud and proud in his shorts, restricted only by his underwear. It was just Lewis. She was practically one of the guys, no matter how much she looked like a soft girl.

Steve avoided eye contact with Darcy and turned his rear to her. He had some idea of what Nat wanted him to do, and he needed the proper mindset for it to work. His overwhelming concern was for Estrella's well-being, and he'd tried to make sure of that by being sweet to her for a minute before all this painful mess started.

"Estrella, Steve is going to come at you as if he was a very bad man. Whenever he gets close enough to scare you, I need you to scream," Natasha said. She flicked her fingers at Steve and stepped aside, away from Estrella.

Steve cleared his face of any pleasant familiarity with Estrella. She was just a dame. A cute, frail looking dame. It was his job to nab her and run off. The boss said so. He strode forward onto the mats. She was watching him, big-eyed and worried. He put on a meaner face and walked a little faster.

Estrella screamed. It was short and sharp. The sound was painfully loud to Natasha and Darcy, as any scream in a closed room would be. But it didn't do to them what it did to Steve.

Steve's legs locked up and his body curled over protectively. His legs drew up to cradle and protect his groin and his arms wrapped around his head, hands clapped to his ears. He crumpled to the mat with no grace or dignity. Just a lot of pain. Not even a grunt escaped him.

"Steve! Are you okay? I'm so sorry. Please, be okay," Estrella said.

He huffed a little breath and uncurled some. Natasha nodded over to Darcy.

"Help him up," she told her.

Darcy got up from her spectator seating and cautiously inched out onto the mats. She'd never wanted to be on these mats. In her dreams maybe, with different lighting, and some mood music, but never in the harsh, scary light of real life. In real life, a skinny girl had just drop-kicked Captain America into a huddled ball. And the Widow wanted Darcy to be his ring-side coach for another round. This was so messed up.

She got to Steve. He was up onto his hands and knees now, but it didn't look like he wanted to move much more. Darcy put her hands on his yummy looking yet miserably hunched shoulders.

"Come on, Cap. You can do it. Up and at 'em," Darcy said and tugged at him.

Steve said something muffled and uncomplimentary, but she pretended not to hear it. He got to his feet and walked, somewhat hunched, back to where he'd started from. Darcy unhanded his shoulders after gripping and patting them. Just some friendly moral support, of course.
"Again, Steve, in a second. Estrella, this time, I want you to show me how close you think you can let him get before you scream," Natasha instructed.

Steve forced himself to stand up straight and ignore the sickening ache in his balls. He shook the last of the pain from his head and it wasn't too hard to put a mean face on. It worried him that Estrella was looking almost as sick as he felt, but he'd seen her more upset than this. They were okay still.

Natasha flicked her fingers at him.

He took one step forward and Estrella drew back and tensed. Steve's legs locked up and he couldn't make himself move. Physically he could, but mentally, nope. Not moving. Nat waved him on.

He tried again, then shook his head. His hind brain was telling him this was a very bad idea. Picking fights with super-villains was fine. But making Estrella scream was a no-go. It wasn't fear. He wasn't debilitated. He just really, really didn't want to proceed.

"You can do it, big man," Darcy cheered him on quietly.

Steve shook his head again.

"Estrella, if we're gonna do this, I need you to talk me into it. I can't just walk into this. Not without a real good motivation," Steve told her.

"I'm not talking you into it," Estrella whispered loud as she could, "Just leave. Go out the door and this crazy woman can't make us do this anymore."

"No, baby. Can't do that. Come on. We have to know this stuff. Nat's right about this. You have to know it. Say anything. Say the pledge of allegiance. You can do that, right?" Steve encouraged her. He didn't want to. Her idea was good. It would be so much nicer to walk out the door. But they were gonna get this over with. He rolled a hand at her.

"Don't forget to scream at the end," he reminded her, just in case.

"This is so wrong," Darcy mumbled. He wanted her to recite the pledge of allegiance? What the hell? But then the girl started doing just that. Darcy watched curiously. It was no big deal. It was just a girl saying the pledge.

Steve stood up taller after the first few words. What, was he getting all patriotic? Being who he was, that wasn't an impossibility. By the time Estrella said the words "of the United States of America," Steve's posture changed again.

His shoulders rounded down into more of a sparring stance like he'd had with Natasha, and his hands were out, ready to grab something. What? Then he started moving toward Estrella. Faster. Oh. Oh, shit! He was gonna-

"Steeeve!" Estrella shrieked. She hunkered down and turned away from him, because he was almost to her.

Steve groaned like a felled tree and made a pretty good impression of one, too. Natasha hurried to pull Estrella a little aside. He hit the mats with a solid thump. He didn't move much after that, other than to abortively hitch his legs up. Darcy rushed to him this time, more certain of his disability to mistake her for something he should hit.

"Hey, Cap. You in there?" she asked.
His face was clenched shut against any outside input. She didn't think he was hearing anything. Darcy rested her hand on his shoulder to try to get his attention.

"Get away from him, puta!" Estrella hissed.

The girl had evil eyes and she hurried toward Darcy in a way that was Not Okay. Darcy fell back and let her at Steve. Estrella sat at his back and touched his hair. She bent down a little to speak gently at his ear.

"No more of this, Steve. We're done. So you better get up and get your crazy friends off us, or I'm getting Bucky and hauling you out of here," Estrella said.

She got up and went over to Natasha. She held her hand out for her necklace. Nat shook her head.

"Give it. It's not yours," Estrella said.

She shoved Natasha hard enough to make her step a foot back and brace herself.

"We're not done here," Natasha denied her.

"We are. Give it to me or I'll start singing," Estrella threatened.

Steve got to his feet from where he'd been on the mats. Darcy scrabbled away from what he was packing. Away from the super-creepy look on his face. He was a lot too big to get in the way of unless something was worth dying for.

He took carefully controlled steps over to stand behind Estrella. His hands curved over Estrella's shoulders and he looked down at Natasha. Darcy didn't want to see what his face looked like. Things weren't fun anymore.

"Give it to her," Steve said.

His voice was nothing like they'd heard it before. This was some sort of Evil Cap channeling Vin Diesel. Estrella had an all-over shiver, but she held out her hand to Natasha.

Natasha looked at the civilian casualties. Then she looked at the locked door. Bruce was right. Something was wrong with Steve. Nat slowly, carefully put the necklace in Estrella's hand.

He tied it onto her just as carefully. Then he stopped touching Estrella. Natasha watched the way he stood there for an undecided moment. He didn't move so much as a muscle fiber, not even to breathe. He was fighting something in his mind. Fighting hard. Then he turned and went away.

The bolts on the doors shrieked and tore when his hands struck, then he kept walking.

"Interesting," Natasha said.

"I hate you," Estrella whispered. Nobody was sure who she was talking to.

"You're some crazy-headed bitches, and there isn't enough alcohol for this," Darcy said, to both of them.
Chapter 21

Au thor's note: this chapter got long before I was done with all that needed to happen. Oh, well. I’ve done some interesting searches for this story so far. This chap required me to read up on what really happens at a strip club in the private rooms. And I read some considerably less fun information about the long term medical consequences of starvation. If you know a young lady who is having food issues, please do some reading and be supportive of her getting healthy again. We should all look like 1940s pinup girls! ( Those of us who are girls, anyway. ;} ) Emaciated is not healthy or sexy. Sadly, none of us have a RL Steve Rogers to give us serum quick-fixes against osteoporosis and heart failure. Please, love yourselves and those around you who need love, too.

M!

Away. Away from Estrella. Had to go.

Steve's thoughts were very simple as he put distance between himself and her. The greater the distance between them, the better. Better for her. Beneath his barely sentient thoughts was a seething mass of sensation. Imagery. Want.

He needed to touch her, smell her, taste...no!

Steve shook his head and breathed through clenched teeth. The more he focused on the images in his head, on the way his body felt, the more his footsteps slowed. If he kept thinking about what he wanted, he'd turn around and go back to her. Natasha couldn't stop him. Lewis wouldn't try. Thor wasn't here. Bruce would choose the less dangerous option for everyone, which was for him to do nothing. Tony in the suit would be the only way to stop him, other than a bullet in his head. Had to keep moving. Away from Estrella.

The elevator was in sight. The doors opened before him and he got in.

"Where do you wish to go?" Jarvis asked.

"Home," Steve said.

The sound of his own voice was raw and shameful to his ears. He sounded like he felt.

Standing still in the elevator, his focus narrowed down to the most demanding part of him. He ached with want, and from the lingering pain of Estrella's screams. He'd had to ignore his body's needs before for the sake of the greater good. He could do it again, he assured himself. With time and distance from the training room, he was able to force himself into a more rational mindset.

He should not have let Natasha move forward with her plan to test Estrella's voice. He'd already been in a bad place, requiring mental distraction to be able to spar with Nat. Then, he'd had to let go of the distracting thoughts in order to keep Nat from smacking him unexpectedly between sparring sets. Once he'd gone fully vigilant, he was already losing the battle. Then, Estrella's necklace came off and it was over with for him.
The last thing he clearly remembered being in control of was telling her to recite the Pledge of Allegiance. After that, all he'd been able to do was hold onto the ragged edge of restraint. There at the end while he'd tied her necklace back on, restraining what he wanted to do had been about as difficult as keeping Thor from bending his arm back during arm wrestling. He was going to lose. It was only a matter of time.

"Your vital signs are quite disturbed, Captain. Do you require assistance?" Jarvis asked him as he left the elevator and hurried into his suite.

"Need to get out of here," Steve said.

"Is there any way I may assist you?" Jarvis wondered. He wasn't certain how the Captain's words should be interpreted.

"Leave me alone," Steve told him.

"As you wish," Jarvis said.

Steve showered quickly and changed into a pair of jeans he'd never worn before. They were already ripped and fuzzy across the front of the thigh when Pepper had insisted on buying them for him. He didn't know why anyone would purchase clothes that were already torn, but part of him could appreciate the well-worn look of them. Their snug fit hugged him in a way that felt good at the moment. The bottoms of the jeans were roomy enough for his brown boots. He pulled on a long sleeved green Henley and the leather belt that matched his boots. His skin was sensitized to the degree that the thermal weave of the cloth snagged on his nipples and gave him a jolt.

He pulled on his old brown leather jacket and checked himself in the mirror briefly to be sure he didn't have anything ugly on his face or teeth. With phone and wallet in his back pockets, he moved quickly to the elevator. He didn't know where he was going yet, but it would be away from here. Away from-

She was standing in the entry lobby when the elevator doors opened to the parking garage. She was there, not doing anything in particular, waiting for him. He stepped out of the elevator and moved aside so she couldn't crowd him into a small space. Nobody else was around in the lower level parking garage. She eyed him up and down, then looked away.

"You and Jarvis hunting me?" Steve asked.

He knew he didn't sound very kind right now. He probably didn't look it, either. Estrella was brave, though. She stepped toward him. His posture tensed and she stopped where she was. Steve made an effort to look anywhere but at her.

"I'm not hunting you. I want to go with you. I don't care where. I want away from here," she told him.

"No," he said.

"Steve, I-"

"No. Not tonight," he told her.

He didn't want to have to talk about it a lot, so he closed the distance between them and guided her against him. She came to him, trusting but confused. He pressed her in tighter and held her there. He still refused to look at her.
"Steve!" she hissed, and she finally started struggling when she felt what he was trying to tell her. He shut his eyes and enjoyed the feel of her for a moment, then he loosened his arms enough to let her back away a half step. He kept his hands looped behind her back.

"You're not going with me tonight, Eya. Understand?" he asked.

"Hmmph! Then where are you going with that?" she asked him.

He glanced down at her and smiled a little. He should have known she wouldn't run scared. She was afraid, but she wasn't running.

"I don't know," he said honestly.

Steve rubbed his hand across the small of her back until his thumb and fingers found the gap between her top and her skirt. Soon as his fingertips touched her skin, he stilled and let out a breath he didn't realize he'd been holding. Her presence calmed him. Touching her brought him peace. He was glad she'd used Jarvis to find him and intercept him before he'd left the tower.

Things had ended poorly in the training room. As soon as he was out in the city and calmed down, he would have wanted to tell her he was sorry for what happened. Steve stepped back to the wall and leaned on it. She went with him and seemed to know that she was helping him.

"I'm sorry I let things get crazy in the training room," he told her.

"You? I'm the one who let Natasha talk me into doing something crazy. I never should have used my voice against you. Are you feeling okay?" she asked.

Estrella stood beside him and let him keep his fingertips on her skin. She reached up to turn his face to her. She scratched her fingers at his jaw how she knew he liked it.

He was feeling sane enough to look at her now. How did she do that? She could make him mad with lust, or knock him off his feet with pain, or have him laughing, or calm him with a touch. Maybe he should have resented her ability to affect him, but he didn't. It felt good to feel something other than duty and obligation. He felt alive when he was with her. He felt like himself, whoever that was.

"I'm better now. What about you? Was your visit to the training room too much?" he asked.

Steve looked at her, concerned. They'd pushed her pretty hard out of her comfort zone today.

"I'm okay. I understand the last part, with my voice. I didn't want to hurt you. Next time, I'm not going to do it, I don't care who asks me to. What bothers me is how mean you were to Natasha. Aren't you afraid you'll hurt her?" she asked.

Steve shook his head.

"Nat's tough. She doesn't break as easy as regular folks," Steve said.

"If you say so, but I don't like to see you looking so… bent on destruction," Estrella told him.

"It's what I'm made for. Like I said, I'm sorry you saw me like that. Nat thinks it was a good thing for you to see, but I'm not so sure," he said.

Estrella shook her head in agreement. She was having a hard time reconciling his ferocity with his gentleness, and he could see that. He lifted the hand that wasn't touching her back and grazed his fingertips over her cheekbone. With the lightest of touches, he brushed at the fine, dark hair above her ear. He did it to remind her that his roughness with Natasha wasn't the only way he could be.

"Eya, I told you weeks ago that there are two sides of me. Today was just some sparring and a little friendly competition. It gets worse. If it's too much, I'm sorry. Much as I'd rather hang around with you, I have to be Captain America sometimes. That's how I pay the bills," he said.

"I know. I'm being stupid. Scared again, I guess," she admitted.

"There's nothing wrong with that. Listen to your gut. Self-preservation is a good thing," he told her.

"My 'gut' was telling me that I shouldn't be anywhere near you," Estrella said.

"If there ever comes a time when you think you can't trust me, then listen to that feeling," he told her.

"I don't think you'll hurt me," she said.

"I don't think so either, but I could. I'd never want to," he said.

Steve let his hand fall from her face, but his other fingers were rubbing softly at her back. Her skin felt so good to him.

"Is this alright?" he asked her. He scratched his fingers against her skin lightly, then soothed the scratches with rubs.

"Mm-hmm," she agreed.

Estrella grinned and scratched her nails under his jaw again, as if to show him that his touch was no more than what she was doing. He knew better. He had his fingers under her clothes. Anybody on the street could touch him where she was touching. Nobody did, but still…

"We could spend the rest of the afternoon laying around scratching each other like cats," she said.

"Mmm. Or we could find a fence to rub on. Why does it feel so good?" he asked absently.

He let his head rest back against the wall and closed his eyes. Her fingers and nails moving over his beard nearly made him sigh, it was so good. She moved from one side of his face to the other, and he tilted his head to give her better access. He liked how as he rubbed the skin of her back, he could feel that she was gaining some fat and muscle between her skin and her bones. She had a little more weight to her now when he pushed or pulled at her.

Estrella wasn't saying anything in response. Her hand went from scratching him to caressing his face and his neck. When he felt his body tightening again, Steve opened his eyes and looked at her.

"Don't do that, Eya," he said. He caught her hand and rested it on his chest instead. Then he realized that his heart wasn't calm either, and maybe it wasn't such a good idea to show her that. He moved to push her hand off of him all together, but she flattened it to his chest and kept it there.

"You do the same to me, you know," Estrella told him.

She regarded him with a soft kind of wanting. She took the hand he'd tried to push hers away with and brought it to her chest. He felt the same fast thumping in her.

"No," Steve said.
He pulled his captured hand back, and his other one too. He'd started this. He needed to be more careful. They couldn't do this. Not now. Probably not ever. She wasn't well. She was afraid. He shouldn't touch her anymore. He needed to keep his distance. Keep things right and proper.

"I have to go," he told her.

Estrella nodded. She bit her lip and watched him leave. He didn't realize what he was doing, but she knew. He was running from her, and looking for something out there. That much was obvious. She would have laughed at the sight of Steve Rogers in fashionably ratty jeans, but he looked too good to laugh at. He shoved his helmet on his head, then he was gone into the afternoon. His heavy bike wobbled slightly as he gave himself a shake, then he was out of the garage and out of sight.

She smiled and turned to go inside. She was still skinny, and already she was getting to him. It wasn't very nice of her to stay around. She didn't want to use him or bend him into someone he wasn't. As she got in the elevator, she wondered if she should leave today. She had a little money and some clothes, and the necklace. She'd paid Tony the last of what she owed him with her most recent paycheck. She could go.

But she didn't want to leave. Not yet. Much as Steve liked her touch, she liked his, too. He was the first man she'd ever wanted to touch her. He was a little scary sometimes, like today, but he made up for it in other ways.

"Miss, the Captain is asking me personal questions about you. Would you like me to-"

"Answer him," Estrella said.

"But Miss, some of his questions fall within medical confidentiality. There are waivers for you to sign if you want him to be your proxy," Jarvis said.

"Natasha and Steve both told me that there would be no papers, no records on me. I don't exist. Tell him what he wants to know," Estrella said.

"Yes, Miss," Jarvis said.

As soon as Steve had the bike out in traffic, he touched his chin to the call button inside his helmet. He needed to start using more of his brain around Estrella and less of his body. He needed knowledge to make that decision easier to act on.

"Jarvis," he said.

"Yes, Captain?"

"How much has she gained?"

"Twenty-two pounds as of her last check-up," Jarvis said hesitantly.

"What are her remaining health issues?" Steve asked.

"Please give me a moment to check data entries," Jarvis responded.

Steve knew that checking data never took as long as a moment for Jarvis. He waited patiently, anyway.

Traffic was heavy. He set his feet on the pavement and sat back while he wasn't moving. The vibration of the bike felt good. Heck, almost everything felt good right now. Too good. Why the hell had Estrella's hand on his face turned him on? Her touch wasn't even sexual. It hadn't started out that way, at least.

"Thank you for your patience, Captain. Miss Estrella's remaining health concerns are the damage to her liver and her bone density. She likely is still suffering some cognitive effects, and of course her body condition isn't optimally balanced, if you were to compare her to a person trained for combat," Jarvis said.

"So she weighs a hundred pounds. What is her healthy weight?" Steve asked.

"We don't have a way of knowing that. Would you like me to ask her?" Jarvis asked.

"No. Tell me about her liver," Steve said.

Traffic moved, so Steve got a grip on his bike and got going. He decided he would just drive for a while until he thought of somewhere to go.

"We can only assume her liver is damaged and that it is also recovering slowly, because that is what would be common for her condition. To know for certain, a liver biopsy would be needed. It is better to be less intrusive. Within a matter of months of a return to a healthy diet, her liver function should return to normal," Jarvis told him.

"That's great. What about her bone density?"

"Miss Estrella will likely suffer from fragile bones for the rest of her life. Especially so in her later years," Jarvis said.

Steve felt a rush of denial. What Jarvis said felt like doom for her, from Steve's perspective. Having weak bones was unthinkable to him.

"Is that mere speculation, or have her bones been scanned?" Steve asked sharply.

"They have. Both Doctor Kalfey and Doctor Banner independently diagnosed that she has osteopenia, which is bone loss. Miss Estrella has been cautioned to avoid falls and hard blows. Her pelvis, femurs, and spine are particularly vulnerable," Jarvis said.

Steve was disturbed enough that he had to pull over his bike and park. He was only vaguely aware of his surroundings as the bad news flooded him with so many implications. She was young, but she likely wouldn't be able to do many things. Climbing, running, jumping, high kinetic sports and thrills like sky-diving, even simple bicycling could be dangerous for her. His bike. Motorcycle accidents were always bad, but for her it could be devastating. And a little later in life… childbirth? Sex? Stairs? Car accidents?

He sat in troubled silence. He'd wanted wonderful things for Estrella. It had been dreadful to see how dim and fragile she was while she'd lived on the street. Since she'd been protected and fed and had her heart treated, she'd become vibrant and quick as a hummingbird. He'd been under the illusion that she was fine now and that she would soon be as healthy as anyone. But what Jarvis had just told him meant that she would never be quite alright. Her newfound swiftness of foot and cardiac health could lead to terrible injury.

"Steve, are you alright?" Tony's voice came to him over the phone.
"Steve, answer me goddamnit!"

"Yeah, I'm here," he said belatedly.

He hadn't realized that his breathing was out of sorts. Jarvis had likely gotten Tony on the line when he'd quit responding.

"Jarvis tells me you've been snooping in your girl's diagnoses?"

"Yeah," Steve said. He got his breathing under control.

"And you didn't like what you found, did you?"

"Her bones, Tony," Steve said.

He didn't have the will to argue with Tony about calling Estrella his girl, or to snipe back at him about being nosy in the med files.

"She's a survivor, but she had to make choices to keep going, and sometimes there's a cost for that," Tony said.

Steve nodded. He knew that, but Tony's reminder helped him to recall how poor her available choices had been.

"You still there?" Tony asked.

"Yeah," Steve said.

"Monosyllabic is not sexy on you right now, man. Why don't you head back to the house?" Tony suggested.

"Nah. I'm gonna ride for a while," Steve told him.

"Do you mind if I keep an eye on you? You don't sound very sharp right now," Tony said.

"I don't need a fucking baby-sitter, Stark. I got on the bike to get out of the damn house," Steve snapped.

There was silence for a half minute, which was long enough for Steve to regret how he'd spoken.

"Sorry. Just…"

"Don't worry about it. I know you want to go, but before you do, remember that she's here and she's safe. There's a lot we can do for her, and she's got time now. You got her off the street and saved her. We can work with that, right? It's a good start," Tony said.

Steve grunted a reluctant agreement.

"Man, I wish you could get wasted. You're right. You need to get away and get shit-faced. I'm gonna leave a number in your contacts. This man has some special stock. How much cash do you have on you?" Tony asked.

Steve was feeling low enough to be mildly interested, rather than disgusted by the idea of whatever 'special stock' meant.

"Probably three hundred," Steve said.
Tony made a muffled sound.

"Okay, never mind that. Just call the number if you want. It's in your contacts under 'shit.' Got it? Tell him Howard sent you. And please don't tell Pepper," Tony told him.

"Yeah," Steve said.

He laughed, feeling delirious and wrung empty.

"You sound strange. Did you hear yourself? You sound strange. Talk to me quick or I'm coming to get your cranky monosyllabic ass and we'll party at the house," Tony threatened him.

Steve was coming back to himself enough to notice the details of traffic flowing past his parking spot, and afternoon pedestrians eyeing him as they passed on the sidewalk. They could probably hear his end of the conversation. Why were people looking? Didn't they know about helmet phones? Steve stopped wondering about that when he heard the familiar sounds of Tony's suit locking into place over the open call.

"Stand down, Tony. No need to suit up. I'm about two hours late for lunch. I listened to Estrella recite the Pledge of Allegiance without her necklace on, and then she screamed at me. I'm horny as a goat and hungry as one, too, and everything hurts," Steve reported.

Steve laughed again.

"I'm not makin any promises," he drawled.

"See! That's just not right," Tony said.

"I'm fine, Tony. Relax,"

"Sure. Just don't have too much fun, okay?"

Tony sounded nervous. It put a smile on Steve's face.

"Leave me alone before you make me curse again," Steve told him.

"Alright. We're here if you need us," Tony said.

"Thanks," Steve said.

The call finally ended.

Steve let the afternoon play through his mind. No one had told him that her bones were so fragile. She could have been hurt today if he or Natasha had made any mistakes. He could never take her for a ride on his bike. She couldn't be trained for self-defense.

She'd surprised him today in the parking garage when he'd got off the elevator. What was happening between them? She felt so good, but he couldn't touch her any more. He couldn't take advantage like that, knowing that nothing could ever come of it.

Even if he wasn't in a position of power relative to her, even if she could get over her past trauma, he couldn't touch her anyway. She was too fragile. And that wasn't going to change. Tony and Bruce couldn't use his blood to fix her bones like they had her heart. It was too broad an area, with too much risk for unwanted change.

Steve made himself face the fact that he couldn't have anything beyond friendship with Estrella. He felt a loss he hadn't expected. Maybe they'd moved beyond friendship already without him noticing.

He thought of some of their recent physical interactions. Natasha wouldn't have fallen asleep in his arms. Nat wouldn't have let him hold her in the first place, unless it was during a mission and he had to. Nat wouldn't scratch under his jaw like Eya did. So, yeah. They'd already started moving beyond friendship. He'd been willing to overlook her admiring stares as simply the kind of thing that happened because she was a woman. He shouldn't have.

Steve grit his teeth. Whatever was growing between them, he had to let it go. New as it was, the premature death of it hurt already. He took a moment to feel it.

Then he took his helmet off and got off the bike.

No Peggy. No Estrella. Fine. He could do this.

He set the helmet on the leather seat of his bike and went into the burger place across the sidewalk to get some food. After that, he had calls to make.

This time, Steve parked his bike right behind the thumping car. His pal from last time he'd been in the neighborhood watched him roll up, and the guys with him went quiet when he turned off the bike. He'd left the helmet off since he stopped for food because he didn't want any more calls from the tower and they were harder to ignore when the helmet was on.

"Hey, man. You come around lookin for Creepy Cracka again?"

"I don't have to look, now that I know where he is. How've you been?" Steve asked the man. He nodded to the rest of the guys. Word had surely been spread about who he was, at least among this group of friends, because the guy nearest him put his hand out. Steve reached to shake his hand in unspoken greeting.

There was a moment when the tension and uncertainty of his arrival melted into a more relaxed acceptance. Steve got off the bike and stepped up the curb to stand among the fellas.

"We doing alright. But, hey, you live uptown in the tower. Why you keep coming to our place?" his pal wanted to know.

"Aw, this ain't your place. It's my place. I was here first. Me and my ma, right there, until the war," Steve pointed at his old building and his window.

"No shit? World War Two, right?"

"Yeah. But don't let it get around much if it hasn't already. I don't need aliens and robots following me over here, you know? I'm off the clock," Steve said.

The guys all chuckled at that. They thought it was a good laugh, but Steve was just as serious as he was joking.
"So. 'Creepy Cracka.' It fits. Has he killed anybody else since I was here last?" Steve asked.

"I never said I killed 'em. Maybe they're just having a real hard time finding their way home from Siberia," Buck said.

Steve and the guys looked aside to where Bucky had quietly joined them on the sidewalk.

Steve laughed again in resigned surprise. Yeah, he could hear what Tony meant now. He did sound off somehow. Wrong. But it felt right. He was gonna go with it, at least for tonight. Buck completely ignored the guys standing around. He stood there, dirty from work with his lunch cooler in his hand, assessing Steve's strange laugh and his strange clothes.

"Ripped jeans? What's wrong with you?" Buck frowned at him.

"Blame it on Stark's girl. Arm," Steve said at the bike.

"I'm not gonna watch your bike," his pal said.

"I'm not either," Buck said, "you should take the bus or something."

"The bike can watch itself," Steve told them.

Bucky looked his bike over. It was shiny and clean again, and it looked every bit as expensive and customized as it was. Steve, with his sharp Irish looks, stood out in contrast against his new friends. They were all jaded and street-wise, and Steve was still an idealistic do-gooder.

"We're gonna have to do something different. You coming around is gonna fuck up the place," Bucky grumbled.

"Yeah, it's cool and all, but..." one of the fellas said to Steve. He had a neatly trimmed goatee and wore a nice watch.

Steve lifted a brow in a way that Bucky knew from long acquaintance meant that his friend was looking for a fight tonight. He turned his body so that Buck was on his right and the fellas were on his left. Buck noticed the loose, open position of his arms at his sides. He'd seen a lot of shit start from just that position.

"How many of you do ya think it'll take to make me leave?" Steve asked, not joking anymore at all. The guy nearest him put his hands up and backed away a little.

"Come on, punk, let's take this inside," Bucky said, low and calm.

He tilted his head toward his apartment across the street. The fellas were watchful, sensing the tension in the moment. One of them in the back was getting his phone camera ready in case something happened.

Steve didn't feel like being herded indoors. He didn't want to get mouthy, either. Tony had said to stay off the news, and that meant off the internet too. He'd make an honest effort, but he'd had enough shit happen to him today. No more.

"I'm ready to go. I'll wait here while you get cleaned up," Steve told Bucky.

He leaned against the bike's seat and nodded Buck toward his apartment. Buck stared at him for a moment.

"Ain't scared. I know how to get home from Siberia," Steve said.
Buck looked undecided for a few seconds, but then a grin pulled at his face. He turned his back and walked across the street in the evening gloom.

"Wait a minute. Are you sayin that Little D and the boys ain't dead?" his pal asked.

"I don't know. They could be gruesomely dead. Or, they really could be taking a long, long walk and a boat ride back from Siberia. I'm sorry. I can't make any promises about him. He's my best pal from way back and some bad things have happened to him. If somebody disappears who shouldn't, let me know and I'll see what I can do, but other than that," Steve shrugged.

"For real? You ain't' gonna call the police or nothing?"

"Not unless I have proof. Even then, I can't call the cops. They can't handle him. I'd have to take him in myself. You could always call the cops to investigate things, you know. It's their job. I don't live here anymore. I don't know what's happening like you do," Steve said.

"Pssh," some of them said. He got several disgusted looks and dismissive hand waves.

"So Creepy Cracka ain't just for show?" his pal asked.

"I'm afraid not. But he won't hurt women or children, unless they seem Russian and suspicious, maybe," Steve said.

"Russian? What the fuck?"

"It's a long story. Like I said, we've known each other for a while. We spent a lot of time on the other side of the world," Steve told them.

They had questions about how things had been over there. Steve enjoyed talking about it because they didn't ask the same tired things that most people did. They wanted to know about the women, the fighting, and the men he'd fought with and against. Most people wanted to know personal things about Captain America.

It felt pretty safe to talk about it, because the Smithsonian display already included the bare bones of what he was telling them. They wanted the more interesting details that had been left out. They seemed particularly interested in how he and Buck had fought together. Steve kept the conversation away from Buck's time with Hydra. There was plenty to talk about other than that.

"You done flappin your lips about me?" Buck asked.

The fellas went quiet again. Bucky had walked back across the street dressed in a tailored black shirt and pants, paired with agile looking black leather boots. To Steve, he looked uncomfortably like a civilian version of the Winter Soldier. He'd shaved his face clean, but his hair was still long.

"Look, wear a bell or something, would ya? Or at least teach me to do that," Steve complained.

"Yeah, man, that ain't right," one guy said.

Buck smiled, looking sinister and not at all cheery.

"Nah. Don't wanna tarnish your lily-white reputation, Cap. Leave the sneakin to me. Let's get walking. Club's three miles up the road and some of us have to work tomorrow," Buck said.

"We can take the bike and be there in no time," Steve said.

The fellas guffawed.
"Yeah, listen to them. I ain't riding with you. We can make three miles in twenty minutes, easy. Come on," Bucky said.

"See ya later, fellas," Steve called to the guys on the sidewalk.

"You going to Crystal's?" his pal asked.

"Yeah," Steve said.

"It's kinda rough over there, and you on foot, you know," pal said.

"I think we can handle it, but thanks," Steve said.

"Alright. But don't say I didn't warn you. You should take the bus," pal suggested.

Steve and Bucky walked down the sidewalk and people generally got out of their way, except for the girls on the corner.

"Bat-shit crazy fuckers," the man with the goatee said.

"Well, they're like heroes and shit. Or maybe a hero and Hannibal Lector. That's fucked up. What's Captain America doing hangin with a psycho boy like him?" another guy wondered.

"They spent a lot of time. They're brothas. Ain't nothin you can do," pal shrugged.

After walking two blocks and getting into an altercation with some locals, Buck convinced Steve to take the bus the rest of the way. Buck stared out the bus window at the men who'd caused the trouble as the bus pulled away from the curb.

"Forget them. It's my fault. I should have listened to you," Steve said as they stood in the aisle. He didn't like the still, cold way Buck was memorizing the faces of the troublemakers.

"No more free trips to Siberia," Steve urged him.

"Heh. It was Serbia. I'm not evil enough to fly people to Siberia in September," Buck smirked.

"Yeah, well, no more trips to Serbia, then. How do you arrange that, anyway?" Steve asked quietly. He shifted closer to Buck so they wouldn't be overheard. Not that any of the tired souls on the bus would care.

"Not all of Hydra knows I defected. When I make a call, a plane shows up. It's funny as fuck. I wish I could have seen them when they woke up in a place they couldn't understand," Buck said.

Steve laughed. He should have reprimanded Bucky for going to extremes to even a street score, but he was so damn glad that Little D and his guys weren't dead. They'd get home eventually, or they'd start a new life for themselves somewhere along the way. And it meant Buck wasn't as far gone as he'd feared. He chuckled again, imagining Brooklyn street thugs shoved out into Eastern Europe. Babes in the woods. His quiet laughter died down when Buck made a face like something tasted bad.

"Quit that. What's wrong with you tonight?" Buck frowned at him.
Passing street lights angled over the planes of Buck's face and made his eyes shine with sharp suspicion at Steve. It was the same look he'd gotten for years when Steve was starting things Buck would have to step in and finish.

Steve clenched his jaw while he decided if he should tell Buck about Estrella. The bus stopped on the next block. Some people got on. Some people got off. The aisle got a little more crowded.

"The girl from the street. Her name's Estrella. She's got this voice. It does things to a man. Makes us lose control. She's had it rough since she was twelve," Steve said.

Buck nodded his understanding of Steve's explanation so far. They'd both seen enough strange things for Estrella's vocal abilities to be believable without much comment.

"Anyway. Her voice. Natasha wanted to test her because when she speaks, she draws me in, you know? But when she screams, it's like a kick in the balls. Twice, Nat had me come at her, then Eya screamed to stop me. God, it hurt, Buck. But then, she spoke real sweet to me. So, then I was hurting and...wanting at the same time. I had to get away. And then, Stark's AI, Jarvis, tells me that her bones are fragile, from being emaciated for so long. I couldn't have anything with her if I wanted to," Steve tried to keep the explanation as short and to the point as possible.

"You got a thing with her? She's a kid, Steve. I'm supposed to be the one who's sick in the head. What's happened to you?" Buck asked.

"She's twenty-three. Just a few years younger, not counting the ice. I didn't think I had a thing, but maybe I did," Steve said.

"Did? C'mon, Stevie. You're not fast with the girls. You never have been. If you did have a thing, then you still do," Buck said.

"I don't. I won't. It was a mistake from the beginning. She needed help, but I should have helped her and kept my distance," Steve admitted.

The bus stopped again at the next block. Steve grit his teeth. This was why he hated buses. It took so long to get anywhere. Walking was faster.

"Why didn't you keep your distance?" Buck asked.

"Because she's..." Steve gestured helplessly, not having adequate words to explain Estrella.

"She's what? She's not a doll. She's more like a stick figure. You can't tell me you fell for her looks," Buck said.

"Don't talk about her like that. She's a nice girl," Steve said in warning. Buck could see from the steel in his eyes that he meant it. He was protective of this girl. More than he was of the average dame or person in general. A lot more protective. Yeah, Stevie had a thing for her, whether he thought it was over or not.

"Ease up. So, she's something else. You like her. But you're too strong and she's too breakable, so now you can't have her. That's raw. When are you gonna stop mooning over all the ones you can't have and find one that's easy?" Buck asked.

"As soon as this damn bus gets where it's going," Steve said.

"You're telling me you're gonna get a girl in a strip club?" Buck asked. He made a suppressed, strangled noise in his throat, he was trying so hard not to laugh. Only Stevie could be so naïve.
Steve's fist stung the middle of his chest, knuckles buried against his sternum for an instant.

Buck laughed out loud and rubbed at the hurt. People looked at them, then quickly away. Steve was glaring at him in a way that probably would have had his new super-shiny super-hero chums pissing in their britches.

"Stevie, come here," Buck gasped as soon as his laughing died down enough. He gestured with a finger for Steve to lean in close. Steve still looked steamed up, but he closed the distance.

"You can't touch the girls in the club. It's not like the old days. If you try to touch too much, they throw you out and the fun's over. We can get you a lap dance. That's about it. For anything else, we go back to my place and I'll call Kenya. She knows what to do," Buck said.

Steve growled something negative at him. Buck could feel the frustration in his friend. It was good fun, watching him squirm, but Steve was edging over into a darker place that Buck suspected came from too many years of denying himself. And maybe the girl, his untouchable Estrella, was winding him up tight, too. Buck slapped him on the shoulder.

"Don't sweat it. We'll get you fixed up," he told Steve.

"I don't need fixing," Steve denied through clenched teeth.

"Yes, you do," Buck said.

They rode in stiff silence until the bus got to the corner where the strip club was. Steve was tightly, carefully polite to the other people on the bus and to the people on the street in front of the club, and to the brutes at the door.

The guy didn't look twice at Steve or at his name on his ID. He took his money and waved him in. Buck never had that problem with notoriety to begin with, so he was in quick. The place was moderately busy on a week night, and the smell of alcohol and smoke filled the air. It was dark inside except for stage lighting and the lights behind the bar. The carpet, the tables, and the chairs were black. The lighting and arrangement worked to draw all attention to the booze and the tits.

Buck followed Steve as he made his way through the place to an empty table right up by the main stage. Steve sat and ignored Bucky. He had eyes for the mostly naked girl slithering around the pole on stage. Buck looked around the club for anyone who sparked his memory, or any potential dangers. He was busy assessing, so Steve had to buy the first round of drinks when the waitress came around.

"Buck, whiskey?" Steve called over the music.

"Sure," Buck agreed, not that it mattered.

Everyone in the club was unknown, and that eased Buck's watchfulness a little. It was mostly single guys, a few women, and a few after-hours executive buddy groups. The waitress brought the drinks as Steve was standing to take off his jacket and drape it over the back of the chair. She set the shots on the table, then turned to make small-talk with Steve.

Buck chuckled when instead of smiling at the woman, Steve coldly threat-assessed her for an instant. That flustered her and she went away.

Steve flicked him a gesture and sat back down. He tossed back his whiskey and looked at the blonde girl up on stage. Bucky tried to relax. He'd worn a long sleeve shirt and had so far kept his left hand in his pocket. It was an awkward position to keep while sitting, so he freed his hand to rest on his thigh, plainly visible.

The girl on stage was doing interesting things to the pole and Steve watched avidly. While she was upside down undulating against the brass, she looked at him and smiled. Steve liked the way her well-toned body moved, but he couldn't help comparing her to how Natasha moved in battle or in the training room. Because of how Nat used her body to weaken men's minds before a kill, he was wondering if the blonde girl's moves were just as cold and practiced.

She noted his interest and unwound herself from the pole. In impossibly high heels, she came to his edge of the stage, working her body with every step. Steve smiled, in familiar appreciation of hours of practice and calculated intent. She squatted on her heels right in front of him and rocked her hips invitingly while she played with her breasts.

"You're supposed to tip her, punk," Bucky said loud enough to be heard over the music. He gestured to the money the girl had tucked into the strings at her hips.

"I remember," Steve said.

He drew out a five, and leaned slow and careful to slide it into her hand. She wasn't expecting that, and she looked to his face to smile at him. The stage lights illuminated Steve as he leaned forward, and the girl's smile faltered, then changed to shock.

"It's alright. I'm just a guy," Steve said to her.

The dancer looked at him for a long moment until the DJ said something to her. Then she stood up and got back to her dancing. She frequently looked toward Steve until the end of the song.

"I can't take you anywhere," Buck complained.

"Suck it up. How many years was I the ugly pug while you ended up with both girls on our dates? I don't think we're even yet," Steve told him.

Buck was then distracted by a scantily clad girl who sat on the arm of his chair. He almost knocked the girl onto the floor, but restrained himself at the last instant.

"Hi, handsome," she said.

"Hey," Buck greeted her, but he put up his fingers to stop her when she moved to touch his hair.

"What's wrong? Aren't you in the mood for company tonight?" she asked. She was a curvy woman with long dark hair and yards of creamy skin. She had a vague European accent that he placed as somewhere between Romanian and fake.

"I like company just fine," Buck said.

"Oooh," she cooed, and picked up his left hand. She put it on her knee and ran her hand up his arm, feeling him through his sleeve.

"You like that?" Buck asked.

"Uh-huh. You a veteran?" she asked him.

"No, I lost my arm running with the bulls in Pamplona," Buck lied just to mess with her.
Her fingers got to the top of his arm and he suppressed the urge to push her away when her hand glided over the seam between metal and flesh.

"I'm sorry, Sugar. Would you rather I played with other things?" she asked.

"You can go play with him. I'm only here to make sure my friend has a good time," he told her.

The girl stepped over to try the same thing with Steve and Buck watched him kindly tell her that he just wanted to watch the dancers for now. She pouted at him and moved away to the next table of men.

Buck caught Steve's eyes and leaned forward over the table that separated them.

"You know this place is all about money, right?" he asked.

"I figured that out. Buck, if you're gonna be a broody hen about this, then just sit there and watch my back," Steve said.

For a half-hour, that's what he did. The waitress brought more drinks and Steve paid attention to the girls on stage. He tipped them nicely when they came to dance for him and he tried to stay out of the light. Dancers working the floor came by and Steve would talk to them for a moment then send them on their way.

At a half-hour exactly, Steve quit watching the stage and sat back in his chair. He looked around the room.

"Your turn," he said to Buck.

Bucky grunted and allowed himself to enjoy watching the girls for a while until a girl with luxurious pale red curls came to offer Steve a private dance. It was pretty obvious that word had gotten around about Steve's identity. Nearly every girl in the club had come over and made him offers. Buck gave up watching the dancers when it appeared that the redhead had finally caught Steve's interest. Steve stood up with the girl and Buck followed them down the dim hallway to the 'private' rooms.

A bouncer looked at them hard when he noticed two men going into the small room with a girl, but he didn't do anything to stop it.

"Hon, do you know what you're doing here?" the girl asked Steve as she guided him to the broad seat of the only chair in the room.

"Ma'am, unless you're the wrong kind of bad girl, I'm pretty sure we're exchanging my money for your time," Steve told her.

Buck chuckled.

"And you like to watch?" the girl asked Bucky.

"No. I'm the one who keeps him out of trouble. Your guys can't handle him if he decides to get touchy," Buck told her. He stood behind the chair where he could keep an eye on the girl and the door.

"You're not going to be any trouble, are you Captain?" she asked. She sounded like she'd be sorely disappointed if he didn't misbehave at least a little.
"No, ma'am. I'll leave all the trouble to you," Steve said. He was surprised that he didn't mind being called 'Captain' tonight. Telling a stripper his name when she'd introduced herself as 'Angel' felt like too much.

Buck barely restrained himself from thumping Steve on the ear. Where had the punk learned how to talk to women like that? He didn't sound tongue-tied at all. Oh, right. He worked with Natalia.

A new song started in the room, and 'Angel' began to move to the heavy beat. She stepped between Steve's feet and kicked them apart. Or, she tried to. Steve didn't move. She pouted at him and sank down to rub her hands on his thighs.

"At ease, pal. I'm on duty. You're off duty," Bucky said to him.

He spread his legs for the girl. She glided her hands over his legs and up his tight belly, then pushed his shoulders back to rest against the thickly padded chair.

"You're not supposed to touch me," Angel said with a naughty twinkle in her eyes.

She took Steve's hand and guided it up her hip, under her sexy, shredded top, and cupped his fingers to her breast. She kept moving sensuously to the music, dancing between his legs, and she held his hand and rubbed it across her breast and over to the other one.

When Steve's fingers moved to explore on their own, she smiled and shook her head at him. She stepped back and danced. Her tall, beautifully curved body had all of Steve's attention while Buck kept half his attention on her and the other half on the bouncer who lingered near the door.

Angel slipped her top off and let it fall to the seat beside Steve. Buck glanced down to see a grin on his friend's face, but otherwise he kept watch. At least the girl had few places to hide weapons. She got onto the chair with Steve and put her knees on either side of his hips. Steve's hands twitched where they rested on the vinyl seat, but he resisted the urge to touch.

The dancer arched and writhed inches from Steve's face. She gave him smiles and hot looks, but when she glanced at Bucky, she looked quickly away because his face was dead and uninterested in her performance.

By the end of the first song, she was rubbing her nipples near Steve's lips. Bucky peeled off a hundred from his back pocket and set it on the shelf where the music controls were. He held up three fingers to Angel and she nodded her understanding. Then he set three twenties on top of the hundred. Angel smiled. The bouncer shrugged when Buck met his eyes.

The second song got a lot dirtier and Steve was having difficulty keeping his hands idle. Angel lost her little shorts and was in only a small pink string with rhinestones. She pushed up Steve's shirt and tucked it over and behind his head. Buck read some reluctance in Steve's rigidly clenched torso when her slender hands reached for his belt and jeans.

"I've got you. Let it happen," Buck said.

He tugged Steve's arms up and folded them behind his head. Then he gripped Steve's wrists with his left hand at the top of the chair back. Angel worked Steve's jeans down so that his boxer briefs were the only thing on him from his shoulders to his shins.

"Oh, Captain, you're a special treat. I don't get to play with many men like you," Angel said. She rubbed her hands all over Steve, up his trapped arms, and down his chest. She paid special attention to his abs and her fingers massaged briefly over his crotch. She kindly adjusted his cock more up toward his belly rather than where it was pressed off to the side.

Steve grunted something unintelligible and his legs moved. Buck tightened his grip on his wrists for a second to remind him of the rules.

Buck looked her over again, checking for weapons hidden in her hair. She didn't have any. She looked good, but not toned and trained like an agent. The bouncer looked pretty ordinary, too. Not a threat.

Buck took a moment to marvel at his friend's large, powerful body. So different from how he mostly remembered him. He was proud and happy for Stevie. If any guy deserved an upgrade, it was him. Too bad he still had a smart mouth and a taste for trouble.

Angel was done teasing. Steve was writhing nearly as much as the girl was. By the start of the third song, Buck had a firm grip on his wrists and was having to work hard to keep him restrained. Before the girl started grinding on him, Buck observed that Steve's underwear was still in place and that everything was contained.

The dancer settled onto him and braced her hands on Steve's shoulders. She worked herself diligently in his lap. She let out a surprised cry as Steve set his feet squarely on the floor and lifted her with his hips. The bouncer looked in again, but didn't interfere.

Steve rolled against the girl in time to the music. She was skilled enough to keep her position and give him what he needed.

"Fuck. Quit fighting me," Buck grumbled. He bore down hard with his weight and the strength of his metal hand against the pull of Steve's efforts to get free.

Steve laughed, that same nasty, deep laugh he'd been infected with all evening, but then it turned into a groan. The girl rode him with purpose and it was hot enough to almost interest Buck, but he had work to do. Buck held on to the best of his ability while Steve jerked and strained, and the girl cried out too. She was sweaty and her red curls had darkened and stuck to her skin. Buck thought they were a matched pair, with the cute flush that pinked their skin.

"Get the fuck off him," Buck told her.

Steve's wrists stopped fighting to get free. He was still moving a little, and Angel was reluctant to leave the show he was putting on for her. Buck poked her in the shoulder with a finger and jerked his thumb to the side to snap her out of her daze.

She pouted at Bucky for an instant, until she saw that he really meant it and she needed to dismount now. Angel gracefully put her feet on the floor and stood aside. The girl smiled down at the glorious mess she'd made of Captain America. It wasn't too bad, Buck decided. Steve was sweaty and slick, but things had stayed where they needed to. She wasn't trying to collect any stuff from him, at least.

Soon as the tension left Steve's arms, Buck let him go. Steve was dressed quicker than the girl was. He handed her some money, on top of what Buck had already set aside for her. She didn't bother getting dressed. In fact, she slid the little pink thong down her legs and set it aside. She stood in her red platform heels and offered more services to them.

"I've got time for another song," Angel said.

"We don't," Buck said.
"What about you?" Steve asked him.

"Not in the mood," Buck said.

He knew what would come next if they lingered. Steve would start thinking as soon as he came down from the rush. Then he'd work up a good lather of Catholic guilt and do something stupid like offer the girl a decent job under the same roof he slept under. Then, things would get messy.

"Can't we chat with the lady?" Steve asked.

"No."

Steve reluctantly let Bucky urge him toward the door, then stopped before he left the tiny room.

Angel sent a sour look to Buck, but he only paid enough mind to see that she continued to not be a threat. He didn't feel bad. She'd been paid well for her time.

"Thank you, ma'am," Steve said sincerely before Buck shoved him past the door and the bouncer.

"My pleasure, Captain. Come back and ask for Angel anytime you want to have a good time," she said as she stood in the doorway and watched them go.

Buck pushed Steve down the hall and out toward the exit of the club. Soon as they were out and to the bus stop, Steve was looking at the bruises on his wrists. They were already dark and angry looking.

"That's gonna be fun to explain," Buck said.

"I could tell Tony the truth. He probably wouldn't believe me," Steve smiled.

Buck was relieved to see that Steve's smile was a little more like it used to be. Not quite so 'thinking about joining the dark side,' though hints of that lingered.

The bus pulled up and they got on. A few less than stellar women propositioned them, which wasn't terribly unexpected at this time of night in this part of town. They stood in the back and hung onto the rail while the bus got moving.

"Don't pay for me," Steve said when the noise of the bus and the other passengers would cover it.

"Quit bitching. You're putting Hydra money to good use. Just think. It paid for your fun instead of some poor mark's death. Pierce would get an ulcer if he was alive. 'Hail Hydra,' my ass. Now it's 'Oh, Captain!' Gotta love it," Buck laughed.

Steve smiled.

"Well, when you put it that way," he agreed.

They swayed and jostled as the bus trundled over the imperfections in the street for a while. Buck could almost hear the gears turning in his friend's head. Sure enough, the words weren't long in coming.

"Why'd we have to leave so soon? I coulda gone a few more rounds with her," Steve complained mildly.
"Thank me later, kid. Kenya's a lot cheaper, and she's more genuine, too. Have you seen the price of a loaf of bread? Damn. Deep pockets are great, but I can only stand so much wastefulness," Buck said.

"Yeah, I guess," Steve agreed.

"Besides, you were fixing to go all soft and try to save her from a life of debauchery," Buck said.

"And why shouldn't I? The whole time I was in there, all I saw was training and tactics. They aren't soldiers, Buck. They're ladies. Maybe some of them don't think they have a choice. They shouldn't have to do that if they don't want to," Steve insisted.

"So take your nest egg and open a home for wayward strippers," Buck said.

There was quiet for a long time. Too long. Through three bus stops. Buck was cursing himself internally for even mentioning a rehab for strippers as a joke.

"I might, Buck. It's a good idea," Steve said.

Bucky hung his head and breathed deep. Seventy years of freezer burn hadn't changed Stevie much. He was still wanting to take on all the injustices of the world. No matter how big his britches were now, the monsters were still bigger.

---

She woke in the early morning hours to cramps and a mess. Estrella fumbled for the lamp, but stilled before she turned it on.

"Jarvis, please go," she said

"Yes, Miss," he said.

She turned on the lamp and sat up in bed. It took her nearly a minute of waking up and thinking to figure out why she was in pain and why she was messy. She hadn't had a period in four years because of how skinny she was.

Aside from the discomfort and the bother of cleaning up, Estrella regretted the return of her cycle. It meant that she was that much closer to changing back to what she used to be. How she used to look.

She was scrubbing at the stained sheets in the bathtub when Natasha came to the doorway.

"Are you alright?" she asked.

Estrella grimaced and lifted up the soapy, wet sheet enough for Nat to see. Nat's eyes flickered down to her fresh underwear and the soft cloth she'd stuffed in as a temporary attempt at containment.

"I don't have anything for that. I don't ever- uh, I don't have a uterus," Nat explained.

"You don't- ? It's okay. I'll be fine until the pharmacy opens. Is the washing machine empty?" Estrella asked.
She kept herself busy wringing out the pre-soaked sheets in the tub so they wouldn't have to acknowledge the awkwardness. The thought of Natasha not having a uterus stirred up sadness in Estrella, but she knew Nat wouldn't want to see a hint of pity.

"It's empty. I'll put them on to wash. Get some ibuprofen. It's in the cabinet," Nat said. She came to the tub and took the damp sheets from Estrella.

Estrella washed her hands and got the pain relievers from the cabinet. While she took some with a glass of water, she heard Natasha get the washing machine started. Nat came back to the bathroom door.

"I'm up now. You want some tea?" she asked.

"Only if you're not drugging me with it," Estrella said.

Nat smirked and went to the kitchen. Estrella made sure she wouldn't stain the couch, then settled down and waited for Natasha to bring the tea. They prepared their tea in the sleepy quiet of Nat's living room.

"This is a good thing, right? You're not going to stop eating because you got your period back," Natasha said. They were tucked up on each end of the couch with fuzzy blankets and lamplight.

"No, I'll eat. I've come this far. I may as well go all the way," Estrella reasoned.

"What's all the way?"

"Steve wants me healthy. He doesn't know what he's asking for. I should leave, but I don't want to. I'm selfish," Estrella told her.

"So, you get more beautiful and Steve falls in love. Why is that a bad thing?" Natasha asked.

"Because it's not real. I'm a freak. Maybe a mutant. With the voice and my body, Steve won't have a choice. I already love him and I don't want to go. You should make me go," Estrella said.

"I already tried that, remember? You pulled my hair," Nat said.

Estrella frowned at her over her tea mug.

"That's hardly trying, for you," she told Natasha.

Nat shrugged one shoulder.

"Maybe I want to see him in love. Steve deserves to be happy. You think that you can't have someone who loves you, just because you're pretty?" Nat challenged her.

"It's not only because I'll be pretty. It's because so many men have had me. Steve deserves better than me. I'm used up," Estrella said quietly.

"That's bullshit. You've been through medical and every test came back clean. There's nothing wrong with you. Your lungs and heart are used hundreds of times a day, and it doesn't make them 'used up.' Your digestive system is constantly in use, but it's not 'used up.' Your problem is in your head. Those men took you, but they never kept you. Steve will be different. Very different," Natasha said.

She smiled in a way that said she had secrets. Of course she did.
Estrella thought about what she'd said. She'd never thought of things that way before.

"But, I'm damaged. Didn't I tear inside? When I was sixteen, the doctors told me there was blood," Estrella asked.

"A little bit of blood after sex, or even rape, doesn't always mean you're torn. I asked Doctor Kalfey and she said you're fine. There's nothing wrong with you. You healed a long time ago," Natasha told her.

"Why are you pushing this so hard?" Estrella asked skeptically.

"Because I love Steve. We all love Steve. You can't know him and not love him. He needs this. He needs you. No one wants him, Estrella. They all want the perfect body and the public persona. He'll never fall for that kind of relationship with a woman. You know he's not that shallow. He needs something real, and that's you. He's a beautiful man. Do you think he doesn't deserve a beautiful woman?" Nat asked.

"But, why not you? You know him so well. He likes you, too. I can see it in the way you work together," Estrella said.

"I'm tired of men. I don't want that kind of love. I want to do my job. Steve is a friend. I'd love to use him, just like all the other women would. Don't think I wouldn't, if I didn't care for him. I do care, so I can't use him and leave him. He doesn't guard his heart like he should. He needs a sweet girl who isn't bitter and tough. Again, that's you. Not me," Nat said.

"So you want him?" Estrella asked.

"Yes, but it doesn't matter. He's my commander. We need to keep things uncomplicated between us," Natasha said dismissively.

"But."

"Enough!" Natasha barked.

She was full up on girl talk. It was an interesting novelty for the first few minutes, but it got tedious quickly. Estrella blinked at her, then sipped her tea.

Natasha got up to put away her teacup and the teapot. Estrella watched her move around comfortably in her plain white panties and a brief night shirt. Her hair was messy from sleep and her legs needed shaving. She didn't look much like the Black Widow right now, except that the way she moved was precise and efficient.

"Leave me a twenty and I'll go down and get you some things when the pharmacy opens at six. Are you feeling better yet?" she asked Estrella from the kitchen.

"Yes,"

"Good. Get some rest and don't forget to take your calcium supplement," Nat reminded her.

"Okay," Estrella said.

Natasha disappeared back into her room and the door closed.

Estrella sat and watched the sun come up over the city while she thought about her future. She agonized over the responsibility of not hurting Steve, not using him. It wasn't fair to him. When she was up to her prime weight, she was going to be in a position of power over him because it was exactly like Natasha said. Steve didn't guard his heart. She hoped she was strong enough, good enough to treat him as he deserved.

End note: This chapter is anxiously awaiting beta from my new beta, LadyAmerica82. (So glad to have somebody to catch all those little things that tired eyes don't see. Thank you!) So, it might change some after posting, but it shouldn't be anything too drastic.
Chapter 22

Author's Note: Not apologizing. Life happens. Inspiration has been thin on the ground, and I finally scraped up enough to fill a bucket. The good news is that writing this got me rolling. This is only half of what I wanted to write for this chapter, but it kept coming so I went with it. More very soon.

Steve checked his time piece again. It was almost time to move. Outside the donut shop where he sat drinking milk and brushing crumbs of sugar from his fingers, the Boston early morning rush hour was going strong.

He and the rest of his team were strategically placed around their target, each in plain clothes, each with a precise time and entry point. In less than five minutes, the demolition crew next to their target building would begin work with jackhammers and heavy equipment. A shadow government agency had bought the building expressly for the purpose of surveillance and then cover noise for when it was time to hit this particular Hydra base.

It was a recruiting office and training facility for Hydra, right in the middle of one of America's busiest and most historic cities. It was Steve's idea to find recruiting sites, training facilities, and any other places which let Hydra grow more of its proverbial heads. The idea was to strangle the supply of new recruits, to shut down and counter their social media propaganda machine, and to cripple their ability to train agents.

Steve had memorized six specific people who were his targets today. Two were combat tactics trainers, one was a veteran marksman, three were hand-to-hand experts, and he had others he wanted to nullify if he could. But those six were his primary goals. Natasha, Clint, Thor, and Tony all had their own goals. Sam was to cover the roof and exits. Bruce was back at the tower for this one, because of the population density around this target.

Precisely on time, the demolition crew on the next block got noisy chipping concrete and cutting through old iron pipe as loudly as they could. A bulldozer rumbled somewhere and sent vibrations up through his feet, despite the distance. Steve calmly cleared away his donut mess and took a few seconds in the restroom to rinse the sticky sugar off of his fingers. He left the donut shop and walked into the shipping center next door, where he went to the counter to retrieve a package that had been sent for him.

He walked toward the target building in his dark gray business suit, the package tucked under his arm. The placard on the building said 'Seacrest University', and it looked perfectly respectable. Young people went inside ahead of him, wearing clothes you'd see on any college student across America on a weekday morning. Not many would notice that most all of these 'students' were just a few years older than traditional students, or that they were as a group, exceptionally fit.

No one paid much attention to the business man with the neatly trimmed beard and the package under his arm. The placard on the building said 'Seacrest University', and it looked perfectly respectable. Young people went inside ahead of him, wearing clothes you'd see on any college student across America on a weekday morning. Not many would notice that most all of these 'students' were just a few years older than traditional students, or that they were as a group, exceptionally fit.

No one paid much attention to the business man with the neatly trimmed beard and the package under his arm. Steve went to a bench in the lobby, pulled out his phone, and sat down next to his package. He texted for a moment, a good excuse to keep his face angled down away from the security camera, then he casually used a sharp edge of his phone to slit the tape on his package.

His easily recognizable shield emerging from the brown package caused some startled looks and general alarm. Steve moved quickly to the entry doors and bolted them shut. At this precise moment, Nat and Clint were doing the same to the other ground floor exits. He applied a handful of putty Bruce had designed to ignite with a tiny charge. The blindingly bright chemical fire melted the doors shut like a tack weld.

By now, the young Hydra agents in the lobby were yelling and rushing to get behind cover. The burly, gray haired receptionist behind the desk had a cold, determined look that matched Natasha at her worst. She was doing something with her hands down where he couldn't see. Steve took her out with his shield and headed for the stairs. The fledgling Hydra agents in the lobby would be for the Avenger's ground crew to clean up. Steve had targets to get to.

He was the last of the team to join the action, and he could already hear the chaos and calamity of battle in other parts of the building. Tony's plan was to walk in through the rear parking lot entrance with his briefcase and suit up in the restroom. Natasha and Clint had already been already inside since 04:00 this morning, dressed as custodial staff. There was a rumble somewhere up high, which Steve knew was Thor blasting a clear path down to reach his targets. The elevators were disabled, and there were only two stair wells.

Steve found his first target in a conference room. Alert was sounded, and several high ranking Hydra staff members were behind cover, prepared to fight off incursion. Steve took a canister from his coat pocket and pulled the pin. He tossed it and shut his eyes. The room flashed incredibly bright and a haze of chemical exploded into the air. Moaning and coughing came next. A few people fired at him, but he stayed along one wall and behind the shield. The man he wanted was huddled behind a chair, coughing and trying to peer at him with watering eyes.

Steve broke the man's knees, knocked him unconscious, and cuffed him tightly to the framing of the heavy conference table. Bullets pinged against his shield, but he was very accustomed to the crouching posture required to keep himself covered while he worked with one hand.

Soon as his primary target was secured, he rushed the four agents nearest him. He let his body and mind run free, through practiced moves that injured and incapacitated. He hardly had to think about it. Half the room's occupants were unconscious now, either from blunt force trauma, or from the difficulty of breathing the gas mixture in the air.

A quick look over his shield showed Steve that another one of his six targets was in the far corner, thinking and moving for better cover. It was Abram Scott, one of the tacticians. He was going to try to make it to the door. Steve leapt the table to get ahead of him, took a bullet through the heel of his shoe, and landed all of his weight in the middle of the man's back. He heard a snap and knew there was no need to restrain Scott.

A desperate volley of small arms fire hit his shield, and he advanced, letting some of their own rounds take out a few of the remaining agents. He hit the last two with his free fist, and was surprised by the crunch of bone. He didn't think he'd hit them with that much force. His objective had been to knock the men unconscious, not to kill them. They crumpled over with the distinctive look of bodies that wouldn't be getting up again.

The room was quiet now, and Steve paused for only an instant to wonder why those last two punches had done more damage than he'd expected. There wasn't much time to consider it, because he was running out of breath and he had more work to do. He moved on, out into the hallway and back toward the stairwell. He took a deep breath of clean air, free from the bitter gas that made his eyes tear up at the corners.

Noise around the building sounded just as it should at this point. Steve ran down the corridor. Even a novice agent could get in a lucky shot, so he stunned young agents as he found them. He'd known for a long time exactly how much force it took to render a person stunned and useless, and he used it, judged precisely for each recipient's size and bone structure. A frown crimped his brow.
Again, there was the crunching of bone when there shouldn't have been. He was having to use his arms to catch and redirect himself around corners and obstacles more, too.

Machine gun fire tore through the plaster wall on his left, and he caught the first few on his shield, then rolled low, changed direction, and smashed through the wall directly at the shooter. Luckily, the shooter was his next target. The burly man hadn't expected him to come through the wall, and Steve had time to knock the barrel of the weapon up and away before he could re-load.

With a quick grip, he crushed the man's hands so that he dropped the weapon and the magazine he was trying to replace. He cried out in horror at the loss of the use of his hands, and Steve silenced him with a knee to the head.

"Dammit! What the hell?" Steve grumbled. The man's neck snapped sideways and he slumped to the floor.

Again, there was no time to stop and ponder what was wrong with him. Steve left the target and moved out to the hallway, back to the stairwell. Up. Some young agents were huddled in the corner, trying to escape notice. They were females, unarmed, scared. He judged them to be not worth slowing down for and continued up. He didn't want to risk touching them, with the way things were going. They weren't hardened combatants and didn't deserve to die yet. With their looks, they were likely being trained for espionage. They still had a chance to change their minds about their path in life, like the youngsters in the lobby.

Thor met him in the central hallway of the fourth floor. His hammer was as bloodied as Steve's fists. Tony converged with them, crashing through a glass wall like it wasn't there, and the three of them strode to the center of the building.

They'd reached their final set of targets, all in one place. The combat training facility was hardened, and it took Tony's skills and Thor's force to get in. Once they did, it was dark and Tony called out positions to them in rapid succession. Steve could see well enough to mark his targets once Tony told him who was where.

Gunfire was going wild everywhere, and a grenade detonated on Steve's right side. He'd heard the pin clink to the floor and the object moving through the air, so he used the force of the explosion against his shield to throw him toward the man he wanted.

Again, the hit of his shield caused more damage than intended. This one wasn't dead, because Steve was trying to be extremely careful now, but he'd probably never walk again. No time to think. No need to.

It didn't matter who was who after that. In the dark, Steve listened and moved toward the sound of people. Where he didn't already see the dim gleam off of Thor's armor plates, or off of Tony's suit, he took down everybody who was still standing. There were few young agents here.

The training facility was their last stop. Nat, Clint, and the rest of the Avengers staff should have finished securing the rest of the building. Steve found himself facing Thor, trembling with the need to keep fighting, but there was nothing more to do. Tony's suit added to the available light, and both men stood and stared at Steve for a moment.

The words didn't register clearly in Steve's brain for a moment.

"Steve," Tony said.
He smacked Steve gently across the face with his metal gauntlet.

"Graze to the heel, that's all," Steve finally said.

Thor frowned at him slightly, and shoved him in the chest with the head of Mjolnir.

Steve shook his head and took a deep, calming breath. His teammates knew something was off with him, but now wasn't the time to discuss it.

"Tony, get the lights on so we can wrap this up and go home," Steve said as calmly as he could.

"Sure, Cap," Tony said in a tone that let him know they weren't done talking about whatever was going on with their leader.

For being a delicate situation in the middle of a city, the mission had gone very well. Fury was on hand for once, arranging transport and making himself useful. Out front where the public could see, it looked like nothing more than slightly nervous college students loading onto charter buses, perhaps going to a university function in another part of town. In the rear parking lot, the dead and wounded were being handled discreetly.

Steve went into a restroom to wash up a little. Thor followed him in to wash Mjolnir.

"Something bothers you," Thor said after a strained moment of quiet. Nothing but the splashing of running water answered him until they were done washing. Steve ran his damp fingers over his face to cool off, and turned to face his friend.

Steve lifted his hands and looked at them as if there might be something different about them. Thor looked on too, confused as to why his hands would be of any unusual interest.

"Later. I want to see the coroner's reports first," Steve said.

He looked in the mirror and dabbed at some flecks of blood on his neck with a damp paper towel. He and Natasha, Tony and Clint were to ride to a private airstrip in a car, for which he'd need to go out front. He handed his rinsed clean shield to Thor and clapped him on the shoulder.

Thor's eyebrow went up at the roughness of the contact. Steve shrugged and shook his head helplessly. He knew he hadn't hurt Thor, so it didn't matter for now.

Out in the hall, Steve turned for the front of the building, while Thor went up through the roof and out to join Sam for their flight home at low altitude.

Steve carefully got in the back of the SUV and sat in the back seat with Clint. Tony and Natasha had the middle seat, and the driver pulled away from the curb. Steve nodded through the window at Fury, who was on the sidewalk, overseeing the security of the buses which would take the least dangerous Hydra agents to a reconditioning camp.

It was still odd to see Nick Fury in plain clothes, without his black leather. He wore sunglasses rather than his iconic patch. Fury waved to him slightly, a mere twitch of the hand, and Steve was pleased to see a subtle look of pride on the man's normally stony face. Nick thought it was a good day's work, and well done. That meant a lot to Steve.

Their SUV pulled into traffic and went around the busses. Three busses full of Hydra whom they wouldn't have to meet on a battlefield some other day. That was good, but it also emphasized how large the Hydra problem was.
It was their experience that some of the youngest of Hydra's recruits could be easily shown the error of their ways and frightened back into an unremarkable life. Some of these had mostly joined out of a sense of adventure and rebelliousness. Others would have been involved with some sort of organized crime anyway, by the nature of their character. Even of those, some could be 'convinced' to use their skills in a more approved manner. About a quarter of those captured would end up in a high security prison for a long time. The rest were dead or severely injured.

It'd been a quick, low-key mission with substantial results. No collateral damage to civilians or property. No hubbub for the news. Hardly anyone had noticed that anything unusual was going on. Steve was pleased by his team's well-coordinated work, and by the skillful planning and execution efforts that had been coming together for weeks to make this a success.

"Report," Steve said from the rear right seat of the vehicle.

"I'm fine. Not a scratch," Natasha said.

"Squeaky clean," Clint said.

"I don't even think I need a shower," Tony agreed. His plain black, somewhat bulky briefcase sat on the seat beside him. Steve knew how heavy it was. They all tended to think of Tony as the brains, not the brawn, but Tony did well to carry the case around and make it appear to not be as heavy as it was.

Steve nodded in satisfaction. The mission had gone almost too smoothly. It was rare for everything to go exactly according to plan, but this once, it appeared that it had.

"You're bleeding on the carpet," Natasha glanced back and down at Steve's foot.

"It's nothing. It'll be scabbed over by the time we're home," Steve said.

He was distracted, barely feeling the burn in his heel. By the time they reached the airfield and Clint had them in the quinjet and on the way back to the tower, Steve wasn't thinking about the mission anymore.

He sat and looked at his hands hanging loosely between his knees. He'd taken his stained suit coat off and removed his tie. His dark blue dress shirt sleeves were rolled up, baring his forearms. Steve wondered why his veins were still as distended as they were. He was hiding a fine tremor by fidgeting, bouncing his uninjured heel and knee.

Tony's sharp eyes watched him from across the way. Clint or Nat would have been worse, but Tony was bad enough. The man raised an eyebrow after looking at the bruises which still circled his wrists.

With a stern look, Steve dared him to ask. Tony's lips curved into a knowing smirk and he chuckled quietly.

"They make padded cuffs, you know. If you want rough play, you don't have to go around with marks on you the next day..." Tony paused and his head quirked into an inquisitive angle. Steve could see Tony pondering the lingering faint marks around his wrists.

"Nat! Clint! Steve's still got bruises on his wrists from last night. I've never seen you keep a bruise for more than a few hours. What the hell did you do?" Tony wondered eagerly.

Steve shrugged. It was nice to have a secret of his own, at least for a little while. Just a little something that Tony and Jarvis didn't know all the details of. Tony was waiting, nearly breathless, for him to say something, to explain the bruises Bucky had given him. No, that he had given himself, Steve corrected his thinking. Buck was only helping, being the friend he needed at the time. He had to say something, or Tony would pester him all the way home.

"It felt good to fight it," Steve explained vaguely.

Tony's smile froze unnaturally. He stared at Steve's wrists again, and at how Steve was definitely not blushing. Nat looked at him too, curiously turning her head around from the co-pilot's seat. Her concern was quiet, as Thor's had been.

"As long as you had fun…" Clint said.

"I did," Steve assured them.

He'd known this moment was coming as soon as he'd walked out of the strip club with Bucky last night and got a look at his wrists. It might have been embarrassing if they'd questioned him about it when his guard was down and he was relaxed, later. As it was, he had the satisfaction of seeing Stark speechless for the rest of the short flight back to the tower.

---

Thor and Sam beat them back to the tower, but only by a few minutes. They were waiting in the locker room and Bruce had come up from his lab. The three of them stood in the locker room and talked about the mission that Bruce had missed out on. Something about that struck Steve as odd, and Thor was being a bit too careful to not pay any attention to him. Thor merely handed him his shield while Steve passed behind them from the restroom to his locker.

Steve's Captain America uniform hung neatly in the locker, pristine and untouched, unlike the suit coat and his faintly blood speckled dress shirt. He'd chosen to wear dark colors to hide any blood, and it was a good thing, because he wouldn't have thought there'd be so much of it. While he took small gear items from his pockets and stored them away in the locker, he was hyper aware of the faint tremor of his hands. He still had too much energy. Why was the adrenaline lingering like this?

He felt eyes on him, and when he looked across, Nat was watching him with unobtrusive little glances. Tony was distracted, telling Bruce, Sam, and Thor about Steve's bruises, speculating how he'd gotten them. Nat wasn't looking at his wrists. Steve moved faster to get everything out of his pockets, until he was down to nothing but his dress shirt, undershirt, and pants.

When he sat on the bench to take off his polished, now scuffed shoes, Nat knelt down and batted his hands away. It was a strange thing for her to do. She wasn't anybody's valet, and they all knew it. She slipped off the shoe from his uninjured foot and set it aside.

"Why didn't you take this off in the car, or in the jet?" she asked, and frowned at him.

His other gunshot shoe came off fine, but the sock was stuck to him. She felt of the wound through his heel, then ripped the sock off his foot in one quick jerk. Steve grunted, and fresh blood welled from the wound, which had started healing while adhered to his sock. Natasha cupped the freshly opened wound in her hand and applied hard pressure.

"I wasn't thinking about it. It didn't matter," Steve said.

He was touched at her concern. Her apparently casual disregard for his wounds and his pain, his bleeding, let him know that she respected him. She knew he could handle it. Her fussing at him for not taking his sock off when they both knew his skin was growing to it told him that she thought he should take better care of himself.
Tony's voice was still raised and animated. He was trying to get a reaction out of Steve, but Steve and Nat ignored him.

"I don't know what's going on with you, but I'm giving you twenty-four hours to talk it out with somebody. If you don't, then I'll get it out of you myself," Nat warned him.

Steve snorted a laugh, but Nat didn't look amused. She released his heel and watched for a moment to see that the bleeding stopped again. When no more blood welled to the surface of the wound, Natasha set his foot down and stood in front of him.

She looked at the bright red smear on the palm of her hand, then glanced over at the rest of their team. They weren't paying attention. Natasha lifted her hand to her mouth and slowly, thoroughly licked Steve's blood from her palm. Her jaw moved slightly, and Steve knew she was rolling her tongue, tasting him. His breath caught at the sort of battlefield intimacy of the gesture, but there was something else about the way Nat stood there in her boy shorts and snug little T-shirt, half-dressed.

"Hmph. Your blood doesn't taste any different," she commented.

"Did you think it would?" Steve asked.

She shrugged, but then she stepped closer to him where Steve sat on the bench spraddle kneed and barefoot. It was disarming, seeing her in plain civilian underclothes. Not her sexy black uniform, not provocative street clothes. Not even racy lingerie. Just plain cotton things which weren't particularly enticing, though they left a lot of creamy, smooth skin bare.

Girly. She was acting suspiciously girly, Steve decided, like he was a mark she planned to work on. He was still inexplicably revved from the mission, and her intrusion into his personal space with devious intent had him on edge. His muscles tensed further and his feet gripped into the carpet of the locker room floor.

The rest of the team had gone quiet, finally wise to the evidence that something strange was happening. Neither of them cared.

Natasha lifted her foot onto the bench with her thigh across his body. His hand automatically came up to press flat against the inside of her knee, ready to shove her away. Her legs were dangerous, pale and deceptively feminine as they were. He knew that very well. But she was moving slowly, predictably. Steve was confused and cautious, but he trusted her enough to let it play out.

Nat leaned down and palmed the back of his head. She stared into his face intently, into his eyes. Steve's instinct was to head butt her or launch her away, because he knew he couldn't be reading her right. Her gaze was assessing, cool and clinical. He felt the tremors rack his body harder for a moment, and Nat's eyes narrowed, sensing the weakness.

Then, she kissed him. Nat wasn't rough and she wasn't in a hurry. Languidly, her mouth pressed his open and she licked into him. She shared the taste of his blood with him, warm and familiar. He was confused enough by the probing kiss that it took him a moment to decide how to proceed.

Steve decided to give back to her as she was giving to him, just as if they were sparring in the training room. He kissed her back thoroughly and deeply. It was a challenge and he wasn't going to pull away, especially in front of the others, whom he could hear exclaiming from a few feet away. His other hand, the one that wasn't gripping her knee, came up to control her head.

Natasha decided she'd messed with him enough, so she started to draw away. Steve gripped her harder and forced the kiss a moment longer. She had to see that she couldn't manipulate him like this, or he'd lose control of his team. He felt her jerk in surprise at his refusal to end the forced sensuality, but it was a miscalculation on his part.

She got just a few inches clearance because Steve didn't want to rip her hair out, then she slammed her forehead into his nose. Steve shoved her back against the wall and brought a hand to his nose to check for bleeding. It stung, but there was no blood. He stood up and held himself ready for whatever Nat wanted to do next.

"Steven!" Thor admonished him.

Steve held out a hand to keep the guys out of their space, and he let Nat have her space, too. Only she knew what she was about, and she had some explaining to do.

Nat's back was embedded into the sheetrock wall, and she gasped once to get air back into her lungs. Calmly, she pushed herself out of the depression in the wall. She smiled at him and licked her lips, just as cold as he'd seen her on any of their missions.

She picked up her phone from the bench and keyed in an alarm setting.

"Twenty-four hours to talk, Steve," she said.

She shoved past Tony and to her locker. Clint grinned at her, then put away his smile when Steve stared him down.

"Do you know what she's thinking?" Steve asked Clint.

"I could guess, but I'd probably be wrong," Clint told him.

Clint shrugged, then turned his head to smile faintly at Natasha again. That was exactly why Steve had to stand his ground with Natasha just now. They all knew she couldn't beat him in combat, but they also knew his weakness. Women. Sex. Nat had changed tactics against him, and he didn't know why. She was unpredictable like that. Dangerous. In this, she could beat him if he wasn't very careful, and he felt a little betrayed by her taking advantage of his inexperience.

Nat's behavior was a challenge. He'd let any of his team fight him to a draw if they could, and Thor knew when to call a match without expressing his dominance. Steve respected the man immensely for it. Thor understood the dynamics of leadership. What was Nat trying to do?

"What the fuck?" Tony asked belatedly.

Steve sensed that they were done with the theatrics for now, though he never fully took his attention off of Natasha until he was leaving the locker room and nearing the elevator. Tony had her cornered near her locker, trying to get answers from her, so she was occupied at the moment. He'd hear her if she came at him while his back was turned.

"De-brief at 17:00," Steve called back to his team before he got in the elevator.

"Aye, Cap," Clint called in acknowledgement.

Steve smiled a little despite his worries when Jarvis dropped him a few times in the elevator. His body went loose in the momentary lack of gravity. At least Jarvis' form of toying with him was benign and enjoyable.

"I'm alright, Jarvis," he told the AI.
"On the contrary, Captain. Biometrics show otherwise," Jarvis pointed out.

The elevator began to slow at his floor.

"No, take me to my gym," Steve said.

"Very well," Jarvis agreed, and the elevator sped up again.

"I hope you realize that we are a bother to you because we care, though the way some of us show it is unconventional, to say the least," Jarvis told him.

The reminder that Jarvis was silently present for almost everything that happened in the tower, including Nat's power play a moment ago, had Steve on edge again.

"How detailed are your biometric readings of me?" Steve asked.

"I know that a bundle of muscle fibers deep in your left trapezius muscle group is twitching at an interval of approximately point seven five seconds. Your core body temperature is elevated one point six degrees above your normal high temperature, and your blood sugar is two percent below optimal, which indicates that you should eat something within the next hour. Your penis is thirty-two percent."

"No! Jarvis. Just- no," Steve barked out, then tried to calm himself from the blush he could feel toasting his face. Anger roasted him nearly as much, but he bit his tongue before he could say anything needlessly unkind.

Steve leaned his rump against the handrail and pinched the bridge of his nose, feeling like he was imitating Bruce, but it wasn't intentional. Hell, he didn't even have exact percentages on stuff like that, and it was his body!

"I am sorry, Captain. I wanted you to know how precise my abilities are. There is no one else to hear, and I have already erased the data from my memory. Tactically, I have tipped my hand to you, as it were. I can only hope your knowledge of my ability will serve some purpose," Jarvis said soothingly.

He forced himself to think calmly and get as much information as he could. He never knew when such things might be useful.

"I can perform no direct tests, as Doctor Banner or Doctor Kalfey could with a blood sample. There are air sensors throughout the tower for security purposes, especially in the elevators. They are meant to detect explosives and anything else which might be a hazard. I can only extrapolate chemical biometrics from the air sensors. If there were other people in the elevator with you, the chemical biometrics would be useless for individual health analysis," Jarvis said.

"I understand," Steve said.

The elevator came to a stop on the level that had his personal gym. The elevator doors opened, but Steve lingered for a moment.
"I know you value your privacy, Captain. I apologize if knowledge of my abilities disturbs you further. I was hoping that you would appreciate candor more than secrecy," Jarvis explained.

"Can your sensors determine what's wrong with me?" Steve asked, only slightly more than a whisper.

"Your metabolism has increased slightly. I am uncertain that the changes you are experiencing mean that anything is wrong. Sir has various strength testing instruments which he uses in his lab. If I ask, I am certain he would be happy to help you test-"

"No. Not now. Not yet. Let me know when the coroner's reports from today are available, will ya?" Steve requested.

"Certainly," Jarvis said.

Steve didn't need a lab report on his strength. He'd find out what he needed to know the old fashioned way. He left the elevator and keyed himself into his gym. He tossed his tie and the ruined suit coat into a waste bin.

A flick of his hand turned on the dim overhead lights. Most everywhere was brighter than he liked, and louder, and there was nothing he could do about changing other people's preferences. But here, he had soothing quiet and low lighting. When he'd asked Tony about private gym space, he was given a medium sized room on a lower level that housed mostly maintenance and custodial space. It was quiet down here. Jarvis managed much of the floor by himself, and hardly a human came around.

The floor of Steve's gym wasn't padded, and there were no mirrors on the walls. There was a structural column in the far corner, but the space was mostly empty. No windows. No electronic training machines. There was a custom-made treadmill and some heavy workout gear. A plain bathroom and a small refrigerator were in the corner with the support beam.

One sheetrock wall was lined with bite marks from the edge of his shield. Another was paneled with hickory, dented with marks from his fists and old brown smudges of his blood. The other two walls were dull gray steel, scuffed from shield hits.

Steve padded forward on bare feet to the special heavy bag he'd had made. The inside was twice the mass of a regular punching bag, and the outside was sheathed in wrinkled folds of tough leather which would give under his knuckles, rather than tearing.

He set his feet and started on the bag. The tremors of unused energy in his body which Natasha had noticed, but Jarvis had chosen not to mention were released in the beating he set into the bag. From the way the bag jerked and swayed, Steve knew he was stronger than he'd been before. His knuckles put white stress marks on the burgundy colored leather. For a half hour, Steve moved around the bag, burning off his tremors the best he could while confined indoors.

He thought of many of the quick insertions he and his Commandos had made over terrain. Scrambling up rocks, down ravines, running when there weren't enough vehicles for them all. Buck beside him, already with the glint of the Winter Soldier on his face, now that Steve knew what he'd been seeing.

Back then, before the ice, it had never stopped. Steve and Buck had to hold back for the members of the team who were unaugmented with the serum. Near the end, Morita had grown thin and hardened from the physical strain. They'd all been lean. He'd got used to it, didn't think how much more war-bitten they'd looked, compared to some. Why hadn't he noticed that at the time? He'd read the files of what had become of his men after he went down. They'd kept fighting til the end, but there'd been a month of leave after his disappearance. He'd worked them too hard. Yet, he and Buck had been holding back.

And now, what more was he becoming? Why now? His new team was super-human to a degree. Thor could certainly keep up, and Tony had his suit to do the physical things his body couldn't. Bruce could go for a while as the Hulk, until he got tired. Still, he held back the team as a whole for Clint, Sam, and Natasha. He was getting tired of holding back. He could do more.

He delivered a kick into the side of the bag. The chains it hung from clanked tight in protest and the beam overhead squeaked with metallic stress. Steve caught the bag in his side as it swung back at him. He stopped the bag's wiggling kinetic energy with a hand and leaned down, hands on knees, thinking.

It was easy to recognize the reckless ego he'd had to suppress when he'd first received the serum. He'd felt awed with himself, invincible. His natural modesty kept him from showing it outwardly, but he couldn't fool himself. The thoughts had been there. And here they were again. Time and experience had taught him that there was always a stronger opponent out there, no matter how accomplished and capable he felt. He needed his team. The kind of operation they'd done today was proof of that.

Yet, he could do more. The tremors were gone, but he still felt strong, fresh, and ready for something. Anything. He didn't know what. He breathed deep and steady, not because he was winded, but because he loved the rush of power in his veins which the extra oxygen supplied.

There was motion at the frosted glass of the door, and he could hear Thor's voice.

"Who? Just Thor?" Steve asked Jarvis.

"Thor and Doctor Banner," Jarvis told him.

Steve stood straight and stopped the deep breathing. Fueling himself with extra oxygen when he didn't need it was a guilty pleasure of his. It felt wrong to indulge in front of the others.

"Let them in," he said.

Thor was gravely concerned about him, and Bruce was only a degree or two behind him. They quietly entered and approached Steve where he stood under one of the dim lights.

"Nice place," Bruce commented as he looked around.

Steve nodded. He felt slightly bad for not inviting Bruce here before now. He knew they both liked calm places sometimes.

"Were you not a margin too rough with Natasha?" Thor asked him right off.

"No. She knew what she was risking. You haven't been in the training room with us recently. I'll get the wall in the locker room fixed, but you saw that Clint wasn't worried," Steve told him.

"Something rides you, brother. I felt it myself. Natasha is a formidable warrior for a Midgardian, but you must temper your strength. Especially since you no longer know the limits of it. What changes you?" Thor said.

Steve could always trust him to be direct.
He looked to Bruce.

The shorter, darker man pulled one hand out of his pants pocket and flopped it in defeat.

"Your blood sample was normal. Normal for you, anyway," Bruce said.

Steve stood, thinking. It both bothered him and reassured him that Thor was still frowning at him slightly with concern and disapproval. He glanced at his friend to see that like him and Bruce, Thor was deep in thought.

"I shall return," Thor announced in a firm voice they both knew he meant to be reassuring in its certainty, rather than imperious and arrogant. They knew that now, at least. At first, everyone had assumed Thor was being loud and overbearing. He only spoke that way now when they found themselves in a situation when morale needed boosting, or when brash humor was called for. Steve and Bruce watched him go, looking for clues of what his plan might be. Then Bruce looked around the room again.

"The only thing that's changed about me is how I spend my time, Bruce. Before, it was war. Constant battle. I was busy. I only realized while I was working the bag just now that if I'd been around to push the Commandos for longer, they'd have started dropping from exhaustion. It was close. One of my men, Morita, was losing a lot of weight. Now, I'm only on mission a handful of hours a week, at most. A lot of our traditional footwork is done by Stark tech now, and by satellite communication. I spend more time eating and watching motion pictures than I do running and fighting. I miss the action," Steve admitted.

"You're saying that you're dissatisfied? You're bored?" Bruce wondered.

"No. The hits we make against Hydra are more effective now. We get a lot done. What I'm saying is that I'm made for a more physically demanding job. I got the shakes after the mission, Bruce. I wanted to keep going," Steve told him.

Bruce folded one arm across his ribs and propped his chin on his other knuckles. It was one of his thinking poses, and he stared through Steve while he stood there and let his brain work.

"Take off the shirt," Bruce flicked the last two fingers off his fisted hand at Steve.

Steve crimped his brow in disapproval and confusion, but he tugged the now sweaty and wrinkled blue shirt from the waistband of his pants and started unbuttoning it. Bruce looked on, brows lowered in thought. It was a face Steve could see the Hulk making when he felt down and tired. Steve hid a smile which Bruce likely wouldn't have noticed anyway.

"That one too," Bruce indicated the white ribbed undershirt.

"What for?" Steve asked.

"Tell me what you ate during the war," Bruce said instead of answering him. Again, he waved his fingers in encouragement.

Steve clenched his teeth in distaste, but he untucked the undershirt and tugged it off over his head. He let it drop to the floor with the blue shirt. He felt naked standing in an empty room with somebody looking at him.

"I ate rations, like everybody else. They didn't taste like much, but it's what we had. Sometimes we got lucky and found a lady to cook a meal for us. Sometimes we were out of luck and supplies and we ate… whatever we had to," Steve grimaced.
"Protein?" Bruce asked, to clarify.

Steve nodded tersely.

"Sometimes just wilted vegetables we came across in an off-season field," he said.

Bruce walked in a slow circle around Steve, looking. He mumbled something about instruments and calipers. Steve shivered his back. He didn't like having his back to anyone, especially when he felt naked and vulnerable. He pivoted a quarter turn to get Bruce in his field of view.

"Hold still," Bruce told him. A flash of Banner's eyes to his told him he was aware of Steve's discomfort and that he had sympathy for it, but it was time for logic and reason right now, not time for nerves and primal reactions.

Steve clenched his jaw again, and Bruce reached out to prod him in the back, just above his hip. Next, Bruce dug his thumb fairly hard against the skin between Steve's shoulder blade and spine and dragged it down, firm enough to feel the individual muscle bundles roll under the skin.

"What was your weight during the war? Before the ice?" Bruce wondered.

"It varied. Sometimes two-twenty. Sometimes a little less than two hundred," Steve nearly mumbled. Wasn't this stuff in his files?

Bruce walked around front to face him and frowned at him.

"How often two-twenty, and how often one ninety-four?" Bruce asked.

So, he did know.

"What's the point to this?" Steve asked. He looked down at himself, oddly barefoot and in useless pants. He didn't like being questioned as if he'd done something wrong.

"Steve, your latest stats from medical say you weigh two thirty-two. The mission before that, you weighed two twenty-nine. I don't keep other people's personal information at the forefront of my awareness, but it's significant," Bruce said.

"I'm tellin ya, I'm getting soft. Lazy," Steve said. He crossed his arms and frowned down at Bruce.

Bruce reached out and dug that same thumb into the muscle just above his hip bone, beside his abs. Even as a regular man, Bruce was strong. The firm press shoved sharply into the meat there and Steve resisted being pushed off balance. They both felt the twanging shift of muscle fibers just under the skin.

"You're not getting soft. You're getting bigger. It makes sense, now that I think about it. You were starving yourself back then. There weren't enough rations to go around, and you knew you'd make do, so you gave more to your men. When you first woke to this century, you were hesitant to eat all that you wanted, weren't you?" Bruce questioned him.

Thor came back to join them, but neither of them paid attention, other than to see that it was Thor. Their friend walked closer to listen politely and with interest until there was a gap in the conversation for him.

"I felt like a free-loader. A bum. Of course I didn't pack it in. Not until I felt I was pulling my weight," Steve defended his actions.
Thor nodded agreement with Steve's reasoning.

"When did you stop feeling like a free-loader?" Bruce persisted.

"I still feel like that most of the time," Steve said.

"Alright. Let me rephrase. When did you stop caring so much that you felt like a free-loader?" Bruce said with a tone of long-suffering patience.

Steve stood silent. He'd not thought of things that way yet, but Bruce had a point. Steve could hold out on righteous principle a long time when it mattered. But lately, he'd felt more relaxed. He had Jarvis send out a courier with a shopping list sometimes. And then he'd been trying to set a good example for Estrella. And now he was eating what she cooked for him and enjoying it. Steve nodded.

"You nobly withheld nourishment from your body for good cause, but that means you have never reached your full physical potential, Brother. You may beat me in strength, yet," Thor grinned at him.

Bruce nodded thoughtfully. They knew Thor was teasing. No human would ever match Thor in strength.

"You think everything wrong with me is because I'm eating more, now?" Steve asked.

Steve had a particular set to his jaw that they were slowly learning was an indicator of one of his few faults. Stubbornness. In positive applications, it manifested as impressive determination and perseverance, but in this, Bruce and Thor could see that Steve might get muley and balk about reaching his potential strength and ability if it meant other things came along with it.

Steve proved it to them with his next question.

"So, my increased libido is marching along with everything else? I don't need that. It complicates things."

"This is all just theory on my part. I can get set up to test it, and then we'll know more. But, I'm thinking that's probably the case. Steve, you were starving yourself. Noble justification or not," Bruce sent an admonishing look to Thor, who tried to look contrite, "you need to eat more. There's no fat on you."

"I don't need to eat more. I've topped out. That's what the tremors and elevated temperature are; excess energy. I can't gain fat, so it's trying to burn off," Steve said with certainty.

Thor smiled at a mystery solved.

"Elevated temperature? I didn't think to take your temp. You're never sick," Bruce said as if he'd negligently ignored something important.

"Jarvis' sensors picked it up. I wouldn't have thought to check it, either," Steve said.

Thor bent and set Mjolnir on the floor among them.

Bruce looked at him and waited for an explanation.

"Here? Now?" Steve asked his friend, his shield brother who trusted him because he could lift Mjolnir.
Thinking of all the things he'd done lately that he'd neglected to go to confession for, things that Sister Ursula would have tanned his hide for doing, he was reluctant to try with the hammer. Bruce's presence was only a trifling part of his reluctance.

Thor regarded him with kindness. And expectation.

Steve felt somewhat nervous for the first time in a long time. He wasn't afraid, though. He'd faced a lot of ugly things in his life, and his own conscience was sometimes one of those things.

He bent to pick up Mjolnir as he'd done many times before. It was always extremely heavy, but he could do it one-handed. The hammer didn't budge. Steve braced his feet further apart on the floor and added his left hand to the grip. It was as if it was part of the floor. Not so much as a wiggle. He tensed to try again, but Thor's hand rested on his shoulder.

"Brother, trying further is beneath your dignity" he said gently.

Steve stayed bent for a moment; his head hung low from his shoulders in defeat. Thor jostled him affectionately, then removed his hand.

When Steve stood straight again, they could see his sense of disappointment and loss that he felt from his inability to lift Mjolnir. Then, he straightened his spine and stood firm again. They could see his Captain persona overcome him for a moment as he attempted to recover his emotions.

"You could lift that?" Bruce asked, but he already knew.

Steve looked at him, then away, still smarting from the sting to his conscience.

"I never could," Bruce said. Then he left them alone in the gym.

Thor lifted Mjolnir and flipped it in the air, then caught it firmly by the handle.

"Grace is not permanently lost, Steven, unless you give up. There was a time, not long ago, when I too lost my ability to wield Mjolnir. I pulled and strained nearly fit to burst the veins at my temples. And then I sat in the mud and cried like an infant," Thor told him.

He flipped Mjolnir again, and flashed his bright golden smile at Steve. His step was jaunty and cheerful as he turned his back and walked to the door to follow Bruce out.

Steve felt a pang of envy, then anger at Thor for being so positive and cheerful most of the time. Ever so briefly, he imagined tackling Thor to the floor and beating the good cheer out of him. It would be satisfying to do it. His muscles tensed with the urge to action. Soon as he fully consciously realized what he was considering, he felt burning shame.

Thor paused at his next step and turned to look back over his shoulder at Steve.

"You have fallen far," Thor said, and a frown troubled his brow.

Worse than failing to lift Mjolnir, Steve's guilt crashed down around his mind like bricks.

Lust. Gluttony. Anger. Pride. Envy. He counted them all in himself, evident as if someone had shone a light into a dark place where crawling things hid and scurried away.

He looked to Thor, too choked with disgust at himself to form an apology. His lips hung open, failing to form the words he was desperate to say.

"You hide it well, Brother. Keep up the act and you may eventually follow your own example home again. And if not," Thor frowned more deeply, "I will be here."

End Note: Yes, I know Estrella isn't even in this chapter. There were meant to be five scenes, but I couldn't make myself edit it down for it all to fit. Eya gets her turn next.
Chapter 23

Note: I know this took far too long. But it is literally too long. It turned into a behemoth of a chapter and I agonized over where to chop it up. I couldn't, so here it is, all long and windy. I feel like I'm over some sort of hump now, and that maybe this story can run downhill to where it's supposed to go.

"Captain," Jarvis said softly.

No response.

"Captain," he tried again, a little louder.

Still, the man lay face down, sprawled among the sheets and blanket. Morning light was trying to creep in through the window tint and the drawn curtains, but the Captain had a pillow over his head and his face turned away from the light.

"Steve!" Jarvis finally called to him more urgently.

"Mmm, wha?" he asked groggily.

He pressed partially up from his prone position on the bed and turned his head out from under the pillow.

"I apologize for waking you, but Miss Estrella would like to come in. She has something for you, and is waiting in the foyer," Jarvis explained.

"Rrrmph," Steve grumbled, and flopped back down.

It was Sunday. Whenever possible, he tried to leave everyone unscheduled on Sunday. He wanted to sleep. That's all. Just sleep. No briefings, no meetings, no place to go. No running, no training unless he got bored. Eating. Sleeping. Lazing around with friends. That was what Sunday was for. His mind needled at him about other things, but he shoved those thoughts away and focused on the soft, warm texture of his sheets.

"She says she has pastries and coffee for you," Jarvis urged him gently.

"'lright," Steve grumbled.

He was supposed to be avoiding Estrella. Not spending any more time than he had to with her. Staying detached in a friendly way. That's what he should do. But she had coffee and sweets.

"Should I let her in? She is quite persistent," Jarvis said.

"Not yet. Gimme a minute, but tell her I'm coming," Steve said.

He pushed up and got his feet on the floor, then went to the bathroom to hurry with the toilet, toothbrush, and a warm damp cloth for his face. He shoved his legs into cotton scrub pants, which were the only comfortable things he had clean at the moment, and tied the string at his waist.

"Okay, you can let her in," he told Jarvis.
He figured he had a moment to grab a shirt from the drawer, but Estrella's cry for help had him running to the door of his suite.

"What!" he asked, looking out around her for any kind of threat.

"The coffee! Get the coffee!" Estrella told him urgently.

She'd balanced one coffee on top of the pastry box and the other was in her hand, but the pastry box was tilting because she'd had to push the door open. Steve saved the coffee and held the heavy door for her so the food wouldn't be in danger.

"Have you looked outside today?" she asked him as she hurried to set the box on the kitchen countertop.

"No, I just woke up," Steve said.

He sipped at the hot coffee and snooped eagerly over her shoulder as she opened the pastry box.

"Jarvis, clear the windows," Estrella said.

"Captain?" Jarvis asked for permission.

"Yeah, go ahead," Steve said.

The living room and kitchen went from gloomy dark to bright and sunny in less than a minute. Estrella got two plates and selected a cherry Danish. She held a plate for Steve to take out whatever he wanted from the assortment. He hesitated, but then noticed the look of happy expectation Estrella turned to him.

He smiled and chose three gooey, warm confections for his plate.

"Thanks," he told her.

Her eyes flickered over his bare torso briefly, but she didn't linger.

"You're welcome. I had to think of something to get you out of bed. It's almost eight. I want to go out," she told him.

They moved to the living room with their plates and coffee.

"Push the couch close to the window," Estrella suggested.

She wanted to have her feet in the warm sunshine close to the glass.

Steve set his breakfast on the coffee table, and turned the heavy couch around for her until it was facing the window wall and was less than two feet from the glass.

"This is perfect!" Estrella said happily.

She hurried around the end of the couch, kicked off her shoes, and relaxed back into the soft upholstery. Her bare feet went up onto the glass and morning sunshine angled up her legs to her hips. Steve felt relaxed enough to join her, so he took his place at the other end of the couch. He slumped down until the sunlight reached his belly and his rump was in danger of sliding off the seat. Warmth soaked into his legs and groin, and his belly was happy with both the food and the heat.
She looked pleased that he was enjoying what she'd brought. He could start his diet tomorrow. Really, now that he thought it, he was glad she was here. Since she was determined to cook for him, he needed to talk to her about it.

"You want to go out?" he asked her after a sip of coffee cleared his mouth and he could speak.

"Yes! It's getting cooler, and the leaves are changing. We should go out in it before everything turns cold and gray. All you do is work. You need to get outside," she told him with certainty.

"Alright, we can do that," Steve said.

"You should get a tan," she told him. She was looking at his skin critically, and comparing it to her golden toffee skin tone.

"Come on, Eya, I can't go around without a shirt out there," he said.

Unspoken was all the attention he got when he was fully clothed, the women who came to stare at him at the coffee shop, and the fans who always wanted to talk to him. He realized he was in a pretty good mood, but talking to people and signing autographs while he was half naked would be awkward. They would want pictures, and then hugs in the pictures, and that would all end up on the internet. Steve shook his head in distaste.

"So, maybe not down there, but you could feel the sunshine up on the roof," she said.

He got up to put more pastries on his plate, then rejoined her on the couch.

"You want me to feel the sunshine? I can feel the sun through a shirt," Steve said.

Instead of arguing, she looked at him with her chin tilted slightly up and her bottom lip out just a little.

"Are you pouting at me?" Steve chuckled.

"No, I'm not pouting. I'm disappointed that you never relax. You never have any fun. You let people's scrutiny ruin your free time, and you don't experience things. Have you ever laid down in the sunshine just for the sake of it?" she asked.

"I haven't had time, and even if I did, I don't want to hear Tony's comments. I know he'd say things like 'Careful there, Capsicle, or you'll melt,' and every other predictable thing I can think of," Steve said.

"Okay, so I take you some place quiet. No people," she told him.

"There's not any such place around here," Steve said.

"Says you. I know a place," Estrella told him smugly.

He would have denied that there was a sunny, private place, but he could see that she knew something.

"Where?" he asked.

Estrella sat up and put her mostly empty coffee cup on the floor. She took her feet down from the glass and looked out the window at the city nine hundred feet below. After a moment to get her bearings, she pointed down and far to the right.
"There. See it?" she asked him.

Steve sat forward and looked.

"I see a lot of things, but I can't tell which one you mean," he said.

He scooted closer to her on the couch and lined his face up to look down her finger.

"It's a school that the city shut down a few years ago. There's nobody there, and there's a fence all around. It's in the block behind the coffee shop. See it?" she asked.

"I see it. But that's city property. We'd be trespassing," Steve said.

He wanted to kiss the back of her hand which was in front of his face, but he sat back some and she put her hand down. She was really cute, with the spunky fairy-pixie look having won out over the waif-goth thing she'd had going on a few weeks ago. He got stuck studying how pretty her eyes were.

Estrella rolled her eyes at him and flopped back on the couch.

"See! No fun! You wouldn't know how to have fun unless the Army sent you an instruction manual," she complained.

Steve felt every one of his years, especially the ones he hadn't been awake for. A lot of people, most of the people who knew him best, said those years shouldn't count. The only reason he'd survived those long years or been in ice stasis in the first place was because he was the Captain. If he was still just Steve Rogers, he would be a frail old fart, if his health had allowed him to live this long. Either path would have led him to be the no-fun guy Estrella was complaining about.

An odd kind of divergence was in this moment. He knew he could choose to be the responsible old Captain. Or he could suspend his responsibilities for a while and try to find out who young Steve was. He let the moment linger, and he harshly shut out any thoughts about what would happen if somebody called the police on them for trespassing, or if people took pictures of the Captain lying around lazy in the sun half naked. He didn't want to remember that he was supposed to be limiting his time with Estrella.

It was Sunday. He wanted to be Steve. Maybe even Stevie.

He looked at Estrella, where she slumped on the couch as old, respectable people never did. She was watching him. Waiting. There was a glimmer of challenge in her dark, shiny eyes.

"Come on!" Steve said.

Estrella squealed excitedly and he jumped up and hurried to his room. He already felt loose and happy. They would need stuff. If he was going, he didn't plan to come back for hours. He tapped on his phone some and looked at the outside temperature. It was seventy-one degrees right now, with a forecast high of eighty-four. Sunny. Light breeze. Perfect.

Steve threw open his closet door and dug for a backpack he knew was behind some winter things. They needed a way to carry food and water. And maybe some towels to lie down on. The thought crossed his mind that it was like packing for the beach. Or a picnic. Or a beach picnic.

"How can you see in here?" Estrella asked him from the closet doorway.

"Just can. I've got this backpack from a mission a few months ago. Do you think it'll be big enough for all our stuff?” he asked as he came out of the dark closet with his find.

Estrella didn't know what stuff he wanted to bring. Not long ago, everything she owned wouldn't have filled half the space in his backpack. She nodded to him anyway. He was moving around in his room quickly, so she eased up onto the edge of his bed to get out of the way. His sheets were so soft that she couldn't resist rubbing them idly while he dug in his drawers for clothes.

"What should I wear?” he asked her, coming to a halt as the dilemma hit him. Everything in his drawers was long heavy pants, or workout wear that he didn't want to put on today, or stuff Pepper had picked out for him that didn't seem right.

He turned to look at what Estrella was wearing. She had on snug little denim shorts that cut off in a fuzzy edge a few inches above her knees, and an orange and pink top that fit her well and showed off her pretty collarbones and neck. Her sleek black sneakers didn't show any socks and her ankles looked trim and pretty. Her hair was getting a little too long for the Tony Stark spikey look, and she had it slicked back over her ears and swirled into a rolled wave which crashed down over her forehead. He knew she had to be using some kind of hair foo like Natasha had given him, because nobody's hair could stay that way on its own. Were those earrings? Tiny sparkles caught the light at her earlobes. They were so small that even he couldn't see the details, just a glint of light when her head moved.

"Look at you,” Steve said almost reverently.

He forgot about finding clothes and he smiled happily at Estrella. Her heels were propped on the side of his bedframe, and he knelt down to take one of her heels in his hand. Her lower leg wasn't taut with muscle like Natasha's were, but she wasn't painfully thin anymore, either. Slim, but not remarkably thin. She didn't look strong, but she was starting to look healthy.

"Go away,” she said at him with a little smile.

She shook her foot out of his hand and pushed at his shoulder with her other foot. Only Steve could kneel so close to her like that with no shirt on and not make her nervous. It was his kindness and undivided attention that made her feel antsy. She knew she wasn't worth the time of a man like him, a friend like him. But he wasn't just Captain America. He was Steve. She wasn't good enough to spend time with the Captain, but maybe she was good enough for Steve. Because he was a nice guy, he was happy to see her well, and that was all, she reasoned. Or she thought it was all until she'd shoved at him with her foot.

His hand came up slow and careful to catch her foot, and he guided it down to rest next to her other one. The gentle smile on his face was carefully held in place, but there was something else in his eyes now. Something a little bit like he'd looked in the training room that awful day when Natasha made her speak without her necklace.

"I'm sorry," she said.

"It's alright," Steve assured her.

She could see him mentally packing away that part of himself and easing back toward his previous fun mood. He spun on his heel away from her and rose to go into his bathroom. It was a strange move, but completely within his ability.

She watched as he pulled two towels from the cabinet, then set them down so he could rub some deodorant under his arms. He smiled at her in the mirror and she felt awkward again with his easily accepting intimacy. How could even the hair under a guy's arms be attractive? She didn't know, but "You should shave clean so you don't get a weird pale face," she said to him.

"Sure, if you want. Take my pack and get us some water from the refrigerator?" he asked her.

He got a razor from behind his mirror and nodded to his pack on the bed. He held out the two towels to her and she got up to stuff them into the bottom of the pack. He didn't want to turn toward her, even to hand her the towels. She knew what that meant. The kitchen was a better place for her right now, she decided.

Steve set his fists down on the edge of the bathroom counter and took a deep, steadying breath when he heard her moving things around in the fridge. He shook his head and made himself go through the familiar motions of shaving.

He was disappointed in himself for being so easy. All she'd had to do was get the tiniest bit physical with him, and arousal had burned its way to the surface of his mind. So far this morning, he'd kept things light and cheerful, even without his shirt on, which he knew used to bother her. That little shove of her foot, with his bed behind her, and all he'd wanted to do was surge forward and push her back beneath him.

"Dammit!" he cursed under his breath. He dropped the razor in the sink and pressed his thumb to his jaw where he'd cut himself. An instant later, he picked up the razor and finished scraping his face smooth. The tiny razor cut was already healed, so he splashed water on his face and dried off. The smell of aftershave products had been too strong for him ever since the serum, so he went without.

"Do you want sandwiches, or should we stop and get something?" he called toward the kitchen.

"I don't know. We just ate. I'm not hungry," she said.

Steve knew from her voice exactly where she was, so he turned toward the bedroom door and shut it while she couldn't see him. Scrubs didn't hide much, which is why he never wore them out of his suite. Quickly, he stripped out of the scrubs and tugged on fresh boxer briefs. Then he stood looking into his clothes drawer again. What should he wear? He'd never been good at putting clothes together.

Back in the day it was easy because he didn't have much to choose from and it all went together. Then the Army decided for him what he should wear. Now, it was office clothes, or workout clothes, or his Captain's uniform, or the really formal stuff which somebody else delivered to him. Estrella was wearing shorts. He should wear shorts. But what shoes, then? And what shirt? He sighed.

"Eya, can you lay out something for me to wear? I don't know what to do with this stuff," he said through a gap he made in the bedroom door.

Quicker than he would have thought, she was there, looking at him expectantly through the gap. Then he had the problem of not showing her the persistent situation in his underwear.

"How am I supposed to look through your clothes if you won't let me in?" she reasoned with him.

"Uh, yeah," Steve said.

He used every crumb of his speed and agility to get into the bathroom before Estrella could come into the bedroom and see him in his underwear, but she still saw a flash of half of his backside and a leg before the bathroom door slammed.

She giggled at his modesty. If he'd stood around showing off, he wouldn't have been the kind of guy she'd come to trust. Hiding in the bathroom endeared him to her. She wondered if Steve was standing on the other side of the bathroom door wide-eyed and nervous, ready to guard his virtue. That mental picture, while funny, didn't quite fit what she'd seen of his moods lately.

Estrella looked through his clothes. She didn't know what his problem was. His drawer was full of great stuff. She set out a pair of dignified shorts in dark English tan, and a white undershirt, and a white and blue plaid short sleeve button down shirt. Then, she went into his closet and turned on the light. Boxes. He had boxes of shoes. She'd only ever seen him wear his running shoes, his uniform boots, his brown leather Western boots, and the plain brown leather he wore on office days. There were dozens he'd never touched.

Estrella knelt and looked at the pictures on the ends of the boxes. She recognized Pepper's touch. Everything was stylish and tasteful and expensive. She didn't see him wearing sandals, but the ones she chose had a suede foot bed and a wide leather strap across the arch. It was manly, for a sandal. He was still going to protest.

She put it all together on the bed and made sure there weren't any tags on anything. It looked good. Oh! She'd seen something else in the closet, high on the shelf. She hurried back in and looked at the hats. She chose a sharp straw fedora with a gray band and set it on top of the shirt.

"Okay, you can come get dressed now," she called toward the bathroom.

She hurried out of the bedroom and shut the door for him. He was going to be uneasy enough, with the clothes she'd laid out. He wouldn't want her watching him dress. Estrella leaned back against the living room wall and listened to him grumble and exclaim. His voice rose in complaint a few times, and she had to bite her knuckle to keep from laughing out loud.

"I look like a clown! Sandals?!" he called out.

The bedroom door opened and he came out looking grumpy. Or like a four year old in need of a nap.

"Of course you look like a clown! You're not supposed to wear it all buttoned up and tucked in. Here," she said.

She pulled his shirt out from where he'd stuffed it tightly into his shorts and she started unbuttoning it. His hands came up to push hers away, then he balled his fists at his sides and let her do it. With his current level of agitation, he didn't trust himself to be as gentle as he should.

"That's a good start," she nodded at him.

He looked nice. Really nice. Shirtless had been good, but the way the undershirt gave a peek at the contours of his chest and abdomen, while the relaxed plaid covered most of him up was classic and… something else. Most guys didn't have what he had to hang clothes on. Almost anything would look good on him. Estrella empathized with Pepper in buying him all the clothes. If only she could get him to wear more of it.

"There's no belt. This sags," Steve complained further. His hand grabbed the waist of the shorts and wiggled it to show her what he didn't like.

"Leave it alone. It looks good, and you've got enough ass to hold it up," she told him.
"Eya!" he barked out.

"Well, you do. What do you want me to say? That your posterior is sufficient for the garment? I'm not Jarvis, you know," she teased.

"Smart-Alek," Steve said.

He flicked a finger at her hair in the front where it curved over her forehead.

"Go put on the shoes so we can go," she told him. She grabbed his shoulders and he let her turn him around and push him back toward the bedroom.

"I like the hat, but I'm not wearing sandals," he insisted.

"Fine. Then you go in the closet and pick shoes that go better," she challenged him.

A few moments later, she heard him searching through boxes in the closet. If she wasn't mistaken, she thought she heard a muffled curse word. She bit her knuckle and held her breath in an effort to suppress her laughter.

Finally, he came out of the hallway wearing the whole outfit, sandals and all.

"You look great. I've got the water and the towels. Let's go," Estrella didn't give him time to fuss. She'd learned that tactic from Natasha. She grabbed his hand and tugged him along toward the door.

They got in the elevator and Steve stood with his jaw looking like he was chewing iron. His toes wiggled in the freedom of the open shoes, and his jaw got even stonier looking. She reached up and tilted his fedora a little more forward and to the side just a few degrees. He reached up and fixed it high and center again. She put her nose two inches from his, glared him straight in the eyes, and fixed his hat again.

He squinted meanly at her and she stretched up on her toes a little higher to touch noses with him.

"Ain't scared," she grumbled in a good imitation of his voice like when he said the words. Steve was trying hard to stay disgruntled with her, but she saw the corners of his mouth tense ever so slightly with the effort not to smile. His eyes narrowed more to try to compensate. He ended up looking like he was afraid she was going to poke him in the eye.

Estrella couldn't hold in her laughter any more. She fell against him where he slumped against the elevator wall, and giggled until her tummy ached. Steve put an arm around her to support her when her feet got tired of pressing up and sideways to be near him.

She gasped a breath as she wound down and looked up again, hoping he wasn't too angry. He was smiling at her with a toothy grin that, along with the fedora, made her catch her breath and look somewhere else.

"I'm glad you're happy, but I look like a tourist," he said.

"No, you look like a man on his day off. It's a great day. When we get to the street, look and you'll see. You don't look out of place. Hey! You don't look anything like Captain America," she told him.

She pushed away from him and stood on her own as the elevator doors opened in the mid-level lobby. They got out and crossed over to another elevator which went all the way down. After a few floors, the box slowed to a stop and the doors opened.

Natasha got in, selected a button, and almost disregarded them until she recognized who Estrella was standing with.

"Steve?" she asked in disbelief, and a smile quirked her normally enigmatic mouth. She stepped closer as the doors closed, and pulled her phone out of her pocket.

"If you take a pic of me looking like this, I'll break your damn phone," Steve told her with certainty.

"Steve!" Estrella chastised him.

Nat smiled bigger, but she put away her phone. She looked him up and down briefly and Estrella could tell that Steve was resisting the urge to hide himself somewhere, if he could only figure out where.

"You look good, Cap. More than good. Estrella, do you think you're strong enough to fight the other women off?" Nat asked archly.

"Neh. They can have him if he wants. I'm not like a woman. I'm just his friend," she said with a shrug.

Steve turned his head to look at her. His lips parted to say something. Natasha waited. Estrella ignored that there was any kind of moment going on. The sooner they got out of the elevator and away from Natasha, the better.

Nat remained facing Steve, squared up with him. She tapped her wrist where a watch would be, if she was wearing one.

"I already talked to Thor and Bruce," Steve told her.

"But did you guys figure anything out?" Nat asked.

She didn't include Estrella in the conversation and neither did Steve.

"We did. I've got a plan. Thor's got my back. Bruce will do the testing and monitoring," Steve said.

Natasha looked Steve in the eyes, and the differently styled clothes didn't matter for a moment. Estrella watched avidly. She was clueless what the conversation was about, but the way they interacted was always fascinating.

"I knew you wouldn't let me rule you, yesterday in the locker room. It was meant to be a challenge, but I knew you'd win. I only wanted you to think of the seriousness of what you're brushing off. You've put this thing off for too long. Taking care of us means taking care of you, Steve," she told him sincerely.

"How did you know I wouldn't let you win?" Steve asked her. Before yesterday, he didn't think he'd ever throw a woman into a wall, even if it was Natasha.

"You're different now. You didn't have it in you before. Now you do," she explained.

"I don't want it," Steve ground out.

"Don't fight it so much. I think you need to change. You're too soft sometimes," Natasha said.
She lifted a hand and touched his clean shaven face. Steve watched her almost wistful expression warily. If she was playing him, she could hurt him in an instant. But she didn't. Her hand fell, then she smiled at Estrella as the elevator doors opened on the floor she wanted.

"Have fun on your day off," she called back to them as she left the elevator.

The doors slid shut and they continued on toward the ground floor.

"What's the 'it' she's talking about?" Estrella thought she'd try asking.

"I don't know. Something. We're working on it," Steve said.

He sounded down now, so different from how excited he'd been before when he'd rushed to his room to get ready to go out for the day.

"So don't tell me about it. Just tell me you're going to be okay," Estrella said.

"I'm more than okay. Never better," he smiled faintly at her.

She liked the smile, but it gave her shivers and reminded her that she was stuck in a small space with a large man. Luckily, they'd reached the ground floor and she could get out. She picked up the backpack and slung it over her shoulder. She could feel Steve behind her, somehow, or maybe it was her imagination.

Instead of going through the lobby and turning left toward the coffee shop, Estrella led them to the right once they were out the doors. Steve stopped and got himself two hotdogs and she waited for him. His feet were obviously unaccustomed to the sandals, but he made do. She admired his strong, masculine legs when she thought he probably wasn't looking.

Without saying anything, he followed her to the end of the block and around to the right. There was a service alley and she turned into it as if she belonged there. Steve was familiar with the concept of brazening into where you weren't supposed to go, so he followed without question. His hotdogs went down in a few bites while he kept his eyes moving over their surroundings under the low brim of his hat.

He was undercover, he told himself. Just like a mission, he was disguised so people wouldn't see him for who he was. The outfit was surprisingly effective. Not once did anyone stop him to talk or to get a picture with him. Now that they were in a deserted alley, there was nobody to bother him at all.

They made their way around old pallets, collapsed boxes, and debris. They avoided stepping in the damp drainage channel in the middle of the alley. Estrella knew exactly where she was going, and she stopped decisively when there was a brick wall on their right, and a chain link fence overgrown with yellow summer weeds on their left.

It was a six-foot fence, but there wasn't any sharp wire on the top. Steve took the backpack from Estrella and ignored the sign on the fence which was clearly marked "Property of NYCounty School District NO Trespassing." He peeked through the weeds and the fence, then tossed their bag over.

"I'm gonna help you to the top. You get there and straddle it, and then I'll help you down the other side," he told her. She nodded.

He paused for a moment and considered her.
"Are you sure you can do this? You're not gonna get hurt?" he asked.

"I was doing this while I was living on the street with a bad heart. How do you think I know about it?" she asked with a smile.

Steve made a disapproving face, but he made a cup of his hands to boost her up. Estrella found it was so much easier to balance draped over the top of the fence while she was feeling well and wasn't wearing baggy clothing. Steve put a hand on the fence top and vaulted clean over it, and then his hands were reaching for her.

She rolled sideways and down and he gently supported her and set her feet on the ground. Estrella marveled at how she was taking his strength for granted. He handled her like she weighed no more than a loaf of bread, and she expected it of him because of the things she'd seen him do on television and in the training room. She bent to pick up their pack, then she looked around at the place she'd brought them to.

The rear windows of the old red brick school were boarded up, and there was a cracked concrete basketball court with rusted poles and no goals anymore. Tall weeds grew everywhere except close to the back of the school where some venerable old trees made shade on the ground. There wasn't a soul around, and the sounds of traffic were distant and removed down the end of the alley and behind the fence.

She looked over to see Steve assessing the scraggly open lot for things she couldn't guess at. He nodded after a moment, and she watched him fade from the Captain and back into just Steve again. He smiled at her like a naughty boy and offered a hand to indicate that she should go first.

"How did you find this place?" he asked as they waded through the tall weeds.

It was so different from the rest of the city, where every growing thing was controlled and subdued and manicured. Large leaf-green grasshoppers whirred at them and leapt away as they passed through the weeds. A shiny blue-purple skink lizard zipped across the corner of the basketball court as Estrella neared. Two crows cawed at each other from atop the fence on opposite sides of the schoolyard.

"I was looking for a place to live. I love it here, but it's too open. Too much chance of being seen, and not enough privacy to hide a shelter. So I would come to visit when I wanted to watch the butterflies and the skinks. Water puddles over there in the corner for days after a rain. This spring, there were tadpoles, and I could hear the frogs at night," Estrella looked around and smiled.

"You liked living rough?" he asked.

"Not always, but it was nice sometimes. Never in winter," she amended hastily.

"I hear ya. Winters were the worst. Winter is probably bad everywhere. Except maybe in Tahiti," Steve agreed.

"Tahiti?" Estrella smiled back at him.

"Yeah. You never heard of Tahiti? Little island where all the movie stars go?" Steve said.

Estrella laughed and shook her head. Sometimes Steve showed his age in the oddest ways.

They reached a spot near one of the large trees where the grass was softer and greener, but still warmed by the sun.
"This looks like our place," Steve said.

Estrella agreed. She let the pack slip down her arm and Steve lay down on his side in the shaggy grass. Estrella sat and took off her shoes. When she looked, Steve was watching her questioningly.

"What if the cops come and we have to run? You won't be ready," he said with a slight rascally smile.

"I don't think you'd run from the police. You'd stand here and make a sincere apology and promise to never be bad again. And they would believe you," Estrella told him as if getting away with things was his fault.

Steve chuckled and lay back on the grass. She tried not to get caught watching how his body flexed when he lay back, and how low the shorts rode on his belly. In the bright sunlight, she could see a fine trail of golden hairs.

"Ah!" Steve shook a finger at her, "And I was gonna to tell you about my teen years, but you had to ogle."

He tugged the undershirt down to meet his shorts, but he was smiling at her in good humor. He tipped the fedora lower on his brow to shade his eyes and folded an arm back to pillow his head at the right angle to talk with her.

"I wasn't ogling. Ogling is when your eyes bug out. I was only looking. Not even staring. Just a look," she reasoned.

Steve wiggled his shoulders like a dog making a bed in the grass and settled in comfortably. He shook off the offending man-sandals and planted his feet flat on the ground. His hat tipped further forward and she was sure he couldn't see her anymore.

"Tell me about your teen years," Estrella said.

She lay on her side and propped her head up on her hand. The grasshoppers started making their sounds again once the two of them stopped moving. A breeze blew up and stirred the tall weeds around them. Estrella felt like they had their own room. The air smelled like earth and grassy herbs.

Steve took a slow, deep breath of the scented air and she could almost see him soaking in the sunshine and the warmth. The stinker was making her wait, trying to pretend that she hadn't asked for more. She poked him in the arm and he smiled a little.

"This stuff isn't in the history books, so don't spread it around. Buck's dad had a truck. He knew this guy out in the country who used to make stuff. From the time I was twelve til I was fifteen, me and Buck would help him run it into town. I was too scrawny to carry the heavy boxes, but I could stand lookout. I earned some change. And I lied to the cops a few times. You're right. They believed me. Then in '33, prohibition was over and the guy out in the woods went legal. I think his family has a label now," Steve told her lazily.

"You did something illegal?" Estrella grinned at him.

Steve shrugged.

"It happens sometimes," he said.

"Sometimes? Are you still doing illegal things?" she asked him. Her smile was eager and wondrous at hearing about Steve being naughty. She whispered the last part of her question and looked around again to make sure there was nobody to hear.

Steve opened his mouth and took a breath, then shut it.

"Steve?" she asked.

"Don't make me lie to you, Eya. It's still Bucky's fault, anyway," he smiled under his hat.

The toothy grin was back and he put his other arm up behind his head too. He crossed his wrists and wiggled into the grass some more. There was something so captivating about the way he moved that she couldn't not stare.

Instead of getting caught looking again, she lay back so she wouldn't have an easy opportunity to look.

"You should take your shirt off. Both of them. So you can get some sun," she advised him.

Since the day in the tower café when he told her about how the chill of the ice had hurt for hours, she'd wanted him to feel warm. Occasionally, she would think of things which were warm that he might enjoy, and lying in the sun was the first such thing she'd had a chance to try to get him to do. She wanted him to have warm memories to balance out the cold ones.

"I don't know if I can get a tan," he said.

"You mean your body sees a tan as damage and heals it?" she asked.

"I think so. But I can try," Steve said.

He sat up a little to take his hat off, then he took off both shirts.

"No ogling," he told her as he lay back down.

The hat went back on and he tipped it down until it was resting against his nose.

Estrella looked up at the sky and chewed on her bottom lip. She needed no checkup to tell her that her body was getting healthier. The sun was warming her, but not all the heat she felt was from the sun. A few weeks ago, the thought of Steve hearing her voice and taking sex from her had felt sad. She hadn't wanted the innocence, the cleanness of their friendship to end. Today, thoughts of taking off her necklace and talking to him were tempting. But still sad. Because when it was over, he'd be angry at her for making him do it. Or knowing him, he'd be angry at himself and completely excuse her of any culpability. She didn't want that.

But she wanted to see him. She wanted to look at him while he was warm and relaxed and not Captain America. She turned on her side to look at him again, open and honest about it. He liked honesty, so she would give him that. She watched while his chest and belly moved with his breathing. He looked so peaceful, like he could be asleep.

"Sometimes I wish I wasn't a woman," she commented.

"Why's that?" he asked.

"Because it would feel so good to lie like that with nothing but the wind on my skin. That's not the only reason, but it's the happiest one," she said.

"Keep thinking happy thoughts. You're right, Eya. This is great," Steve said. He chose to not dwell on the sad things or the difficult things today. She'd talk about it if she wanted to. The warmth on his skin was making him feel lazy. It was a perfect Sunday feeling. If he could keep this in his memories all week long, it might help to keep the scowl off his face later.

"Why did you tell Natasha that you're not a woman? You know it's not true, and you know I'd rather be with you here than out in the street getting pawed by rowdy broads," he said eventually.

"Would you? Tell me where you went the other night when you took off on your bike," she said.

Steve tipped his hat back some and turned his head to look at her.

"Hey, you weren't supposed to be looking," he said with mild complaint when he saw her blatantly staring.

Rather than re-stating her question, she kept quiet and looked him in the eyes, waiting.

"Do I gotta answer to you, now?" he finally asked.

He sounded like nothing more than a Brooklyn boy, and she liked that. The question was asked with an easy smile, but he still hadn't answered her.

"No. You asked me something I didn't want to answer, so I did the same to you," she said.

"Oh," Steve said thoughtfully.

He pondered why she wouldn't want to answer his question, but the warmth of the sun relaxed him out of thinking about it before long. He felt himself dozing off, then he remembered that he needed to tell her something.

"I'm changing my diet, Eya. Since you cook for me, I should tell you to cut back on the carbs and fats. And the sweets," he added.

"Are you crazy? You're not fat at all. Why shouldn't you eat?" she demanded.

"Because eating too much is doing things to me. I'm hurting people I don't want to hurt. Bruce thinks that I'm getting stronger because I've never had so much to eat, and I agree. The energy from the calories has nowhere else to go, so it's making me too strong. It's difficult to be careful. Buck almost can't pin me, even with that metal arm of his," Steve grimaced.

"Why is that a problem? Stronger is better. You should get used to it. Practice some more with strong people like Thor, and use it for your work," Estrella disagreed with his perspective.

Steve sighed. He didn't want to tell her the rest, but maybe, considering her history, she had a right to know.

"Eya, it's not just the strength. It's harder to control everything. Aggression. Anger. Stupid decisions based on pride when I used to rely on caution. And, um... lust. I'm having trouble with all that. I think it's because I'm taking in too many calories. It's got to go somewhere, and since I can't get fat, that's what it does to me," he told her.

"Oh," she said.

"Is that why you were so rough with Natasha the other day? That's what she meant in the elevator!
When she said 'it', and that she thought you were too soft and that 'it' might do you some good. This is really bothering you," Estrella said.
Steve rolled up onto his side to face her. He gave up on lying back like a bum. She deserved his attention for this.

"Yeah," he admitted.

"So listen to her. You train really hard. You can control it," she insisted.

Steve shook his head and looked at her with a kind of fervor she wouldn't have thought to see on him. It made him look almost like an ordinary person because he looked nothing like the precisely deliberate Captain. He looked energized. Bothered.

"Eya, the problem is that I don't want to control some of it. I'm getting selfish," he confessed.

"I'm sure that your version of selfish is still pretty generous, compared to most people," she assured him.

"Don't do that. You can't afford to write me off as harmless. Not even Nat does that anymore," Steve told her.

Estrella paid attention to how he loomed over her, even from a few feet away. His size and his obvious strength were starting to make her nervous, when it was paired with the faintly predatory look in his eyes. From the first day she'd met him in front of the coffee shop, his dissatisfaction with his place in life had been apparent to her. He resented the limits that being a living legend placed upon his freedom. Now, she could see that his unhappiness was simmering and snapping closer to the surface of who he was, eager to break the restraints he kept on himself, if he'd let it.

It was a little frightening, given what she knew he was capable of, but the sweet part of him still remained. Even now, when she would have normally folded herself into her mind out of fear, she trusted Steve.

"You need an outlet. You're all bottled up, and if you don't let loose, something bad is going to happen," she told him.

"I know. Hanging around with Buck helps, but it feels like that's getting tame, too. I want more, Eya, and it scares me," he admitted.

Steve couldn't tell her of the flashes of thought, the temptations he'd been having lately. He couldn't. She might understand, as earthy and street-wise as she was, but she might be afraid, too. He didn't want to see her any more fearful than she already was right now. He knew she was being valiantly brave and trusting, and he admired her for it. There was a point you didn't push people past, and he was just about there, with Estrella.

Estrella narrowed her eyes at him thoughtfully, then she scooted closer across the grass. He held himself rigid while she arranged herself right against him. She jabbed at him with her elbow accidentally while she looked for a place to put her arm. Any of that kind of contact for Steve usually required a response in kind, but he bent his mind to accept the sharp little jabs as companionable and acceptable. Then she completely confused him when she threaded her arm through the bend of his under where it propped up his head, and urged him forward onto her.

He made a startled grunt, uneasy with what she was doing, but she guided his head onto her chest and wrapped her arms around him. One hand rubbed his shoulders and the other smoothed repeatedly across his close-shorn scalp.

She giggled.
"You have grass stuck to your back. Doesn't that itch?" she asked rhetorically.

Her fingers brushed at the stuck grass and her other hand cradled his head under her chin.

"Relax. You know I can't hurt you, and you're too pathetic and confused to hurt me," she said.

Steve grunted in agreement and let himself roll forward to rest a little against her. Most of his weight braced against the ground on his far hand and his bent knee, but she was touching a lot of him, a lot of skin. She hugged him closer to show him that a little more contact was welcome.

The sound he made when she rubbed both his head and his back was eagerly hungry and surprised at the same time, like he was asking her 'why?' and asking for more.

"Shhh," she shushed him, "quit thinking so much."

The tension slowly bled out of his body while she rubbed at his skin and his hair.

"Everybody thinks you're so perfect and proper, but you're not. They've got you so trained that all you can think to do is fight or help people. You never take anything for yourself. There's something in the middle, you know. You can let me be nice to you," she admonished him gently.

With what little of his brain that was still functioning under the sensory onslaught of her hands on his skin, he thought to argue, but then he knew she was right. He visited the sick kids in the hospital to do his part. He participated in veteran's day parades to boost the morale of his fellow service men. He attended charity functions to use his presence to raise money for good causes. He put in service hours at soup kitchens to give back to the nation that had helped him when he was sick and weak. And always, he fought when he was called to. Sure, lots of women wanted to be nice to him, but it was the wrong kind of nice. It was what they wanted.

Estrella didn't want anything from him right now. There was nothing to fight. No one needed his help. With a needy groan, he gave himself over to the magic of her hands. The more she touched him, the more he wanted. He felt starved for touch, as if he hadn't ever realized he was hungry for this sort of contact, and now that she was giving it, he didn't want it to stop. Wherever her hands went, warmth and comfort followed.

"What are you doing to me?" he asked in a daze.

"Loving you," she answered simply.

The words were said lightly and happily in the unconventional, quirky way he'd gotten used to Estrella accepting things. She didn't sound like she was in love with him, and she couldn't be, anyway. She was afraid of men. Steve supposed that he loved her too, in that he cared about her and wanted her to be happy. This made her happy. It made him happy too. Her fingers scratched at his scalp and he forgot to think about anything else.

"And talking to you," she added, "I can't believe I'm talking to you."

"Hmm?" he asked.

"What do you mean, 'Hmm'? You people are so used to Tony and Jarvis whipping up something in the lab every time there's a problem, and he fixes it like magic. I get to talk to you, Steve! You let me boss you around. Sometimes I sing just to hear my voice. Doesn't that sound conceited?" she asked with a little laugh.

"It sounds like someone who didn't get to talk for a long time. I guess we're used to Tony solving a lot of problems, but it's what he does. It's what he lives for. His work makes him happy," Steve said.

He felt like he was too heavy for her, and knowing that her bones were fragile made him roll onto his back and take her over with him. He shoved himself a little so that she rested against his chest instead of over his face. She frowned down at him for some reason.

"Listen to you! What if Tony doesn't like working all the time any more than you do? What if he feels obligated and doesn't know what else to do with himself? I'm sure his work is satisfying to him, but what if he's missing out on other things by working so much? You sound like those people who expect you to act like the Captain all the time," she admonished him.

Steve didn't know what to say, so he nodded. Maybe she was right. He'd think about it later. Right now, he wanted her to touch him again. Now that he was relaxed in the warm sun and not worried about hurting her bones, the only thing more he needed to achieve perfection was the wonderful feeling that her touch gave him. He lay back and closed his eyes again. His hat was knocked off in the grass, but he didn't care. Her hand was in the middle of his chest and that wasn't where he wanted it. Carefully, so carefully, he lifted her hand with a thumb and set it on his cheek.

"You want me to pet you? Like a cat?" she teased with a playful twinkle in her eyes. He couldn't see the twinkle, but he knew it was there from the tone of her voice.

"Please?" he asked quietly, almost a whisper.

She wanted him to do something other than fight or help people. She wanted him to feel the sun and to let her help him. He couldn't make himself ask for it any more than that one word. He never needed help. He was the one who gave help. But maybe since she seemed to want to anyway…

Steve's mouth fell open and he turned his face toward her hand as she pressed up his cheek and over his ear. His scalp tingled as her palm rubbed his bristly soft hair, and it sprung up again behind her hand. She massaged the back of his head firmly with her fingers, then she traced across his brow and down the line of his nose.

"Nnnn," he hummed a warning to her and shut his mouth when her fingers explored around his lips. She giggled at him, then pressed her hand along his freshly shaved jaw. Her short, smooth fingernails scratched along the underside from his neck to his chin and he shivered and smiled.

"I told you I would do that for you whenever you ask," she reminded him.

"Do you hafta make me ask?" he complained mildly.

"Steve, lately, you haven't been in the mood for it," she said.

"Sure I have," he argued like a boy saying he was not sleepy at nap time.

"Was I supposed to do this to you in the training room?" she asked, just to make conversation. His obvious enjoyment of her touch was making her a little uncomfortable with the silence.

"Maybe not then," he agreed.

He angled his head to use his lashes to shade his eyes from the sun and he peeped at her. She playfully mashed aside his nose and lips and moved her hand to rub the other side of his face.

"Was I supposed to do this when Natasha was in the elevator with us, earlier, or maybe in front of Tony and Clint in the lobby? Or maybe at the library with Wanda?" she asked him.
"Don't care 'bout them," he mumbled.

He didn't. He didn't care about much of anything right now, except for Estrella to keep touching him like she was. She was soft and she was being sweet and she trusted him despite everything, and-

The faint jingle of the metal fence came to his ears and he eased her aside and got to his feet.

"What? Did you hear something?" Estrella asked from her spot hidden in the tall grass.

Steve crossed his arms and frowned powerfully at the direction where they'd come over the schoolyard fence.

"It's only Buck. Nothing to worry about," he told her.

He glanced down at her, curious why she was whispering now. Her posture went from relaxed to huddled and faintly menacing, like she'd once been on the street when there was a stranger she didn't like.

"Buck's not so bad. I'll ask him to go in a little while, if you still don't want him around. Give him a chance?" Steve asked.

Estrella frowned up at him for a moment, but then she nodded. She sat up straight with her arms wrapped around her knees and waited. She didn't like how all of Steve's attention was sharp and ready. They'd been happy and relaxed for a little while, and now Bucky had to come and ruin it.

"Heya, Stevie. I heard you talking from over there. Who's got you in short pants?" Buck asked as he ambled over to see them.

His hands were shoved in the pockets of his pants and he was wearing a long dark shirt, even on a warm day. He was bigger than Estrella remembered, lean and strong looking in a way that made her uneasy. She wanted to freeze still as if maybe he wouldn't see her.

"Hey, toots," he said casually to Estrella, looking around Steve to do so.

Estrella scooted further behind Steve's legs to duck away from his view.

"Buck, don't. She's-" Steve began.

"Yeah, I know how she is. So why are ya here makin time with her?" Buck wondered.

"It's not like that," Steve grimaced at his friend and shook his head.

Bucky looked him up and down, indicating his general lack of clothing, and crossed his arms like Steve in subtle mockery of his dominant stance. His sliver hand flashed in the sun before he tucked it under. Estrella peeked out around Steve's shorts curiously.

Steve grit his teeth. He knew what it looked like to Buck, especially after what he'd told him about Estrella on the bus. There was nothing he could say that would turn away the scrutiny Buck was giving him, because Buck was right. Now that he was clear headed and not goofy like a kid playing hooky, he realized that he shouldn't be here encouraging anything with Estrella. But he wasn't ready for it to be over. He wanted more.

"Don't you ever want a day off?" Steve asked him hopefully.
"Is that what this is?" Buck asked skeptically.

"Yeah, that's what this is," Steve said.

"Alright," Buck agreed.

He loosened his confrontationally teasing stance, turned his side to Steve, and bent to take off his heavy boots. Estrella felt Steve's body relax a little and his arms dropped to his sides. She tugged on his shorts and he looked down at her. She shook her head at him once, firmly. She still didn't like Bucky. She didn't know why Steve did. He was a pushy ass.

Please? Steve mouthed at her.

Estrella looked over at Bucky and stared at him coldly. She knew time with his friend was important to Steve, so she had little choice if she didn't want to seem like a controlling witch. She shrugged and nodded her head. The way Steve looked at her happily made it tolerable.

"Aw, sweet," Buck said with mild sarcasm.

"Shut it," Steve warned his friend.

Bucky unbuttoned the front of his shirt and tugged it out of his navy blue work pants. He lay down a little way across from them in the grass and stretched his pale toes out in the sun. His chest and belly were just as pale.

Steve sat down again, his hand resting atop Estrella's foot to comfort her.

"What are ya doing, Buck?" Steve wondered.

It was very strange to see Bucky laid out in the sun, ignoring his surroundings. Maybe as strange as Steve felt for doing it too.

"Same thing you are. It's my day off. You're wrecking the peace and quiet," Buck grumbled as if he was half asleep.

"Are you supposed to be my chaperone or something?" Steve asked.

"Somethin'," Buck agreed.

Steve flopped back in the grass with a frustrated grunt. Buck was right, as usual. He was starting to feel like Buck was here more to protect Estrella than to see him. It was hard to read him anymore. Or maybe he'd come around to be a pain in the ass and annoy him. Whatever his reason, Steve was so glad to have his company after years thinking he was dead that he was willing to put up with a lot. Estrella lay down at his side not because she was comfortable again, but because she felt the need to hide behind him.

"Why don't you like him? All the ladies used to love him. He won't hurt you. I promise," Steve said.

"She doesn't trust me because I already hurt her, trying to keep her quiet the day there was some gang activity at her place. And I forced her to agree to go to you for help right before she disappeared from the street. She doesn't like being manhandled," Buck said casually.

"Of course she doesn't like it. What did you do?" Steve surged up halfway to sitting again. He was going to go make Bucky talk, but Estrella's hand on his chest, pulling him back tempered his intentions. She looked at him with wide, cautious eyes and shook her head.

"I can take him one-handed, Eya. I didn't know he hurt you. You should have said something," Steve fussed at her.

"He didn't really hurt me. I just don't like him. He did what you would have wanted. Don't fight," she said quietly. Her hand rubbed in the center of his chest and he eased back down to the grass slowly.

"Would ya look at that? What kinda voodoo do you have, girlie?" Buck asked.

They looked over at him, both scowling, but Buck had a surprised smile on his face. Estrella lay down again too, and her hand moved to rest on Steve's shoulder.

"Her name is Estrella. I told you that already," Steve said.

Estrella poked him in the side firmly.

"What? We're not on the street anymore. Buck won't talk about you. It's more like he'd listen for anybody else who might say your name and stalk them for a while. Maybe make 'em disappear," Steve frowned over at his friend disapprovingly.

Buck flipped him a gesture with his left hand. The quiet stretched among them and they all seemed to relax. The breeze picked up for a moment and it made a tiny howling noise among the grass stems. It eased the heat of the sun a little, which was getting intense enough to make sweat prickle their skin.

"Ah, God, this is good. Chases the ice from my blood. Know what I mean, Stevie?" Buck asked.

"Yeah, I know," Steve agreed.

He sprawled out some more and lifted his hands to tuck them under his head again. Estrella shifted beside him to make room for his arm, then she was back close to him, nearly clinging. Her hand flattened on his chest and her chin propped on it. She was watching Buck suspiciously.

"Can I touch you?" Steve asked, hoping to distract her.

He skimmed his fingers over her cheekbone, and his other hand sought out the skin of her back above her shorts, like before. She shook away his hand from her face, but she let him touch her lower back.

"Did you tell him the thing that's bothering you?" she asked Steve in a whisper.

"He knows. I didn't go into detail like with Thor and Bruce and Nat, but he already knows. He's seen some things. And there's no point whispering. He can hear you anyway," Steve told her.

"What do I know?" Buck asked.

"That I'm changing. That there's something wrong," Steve clarified.

"That's plain as anything. Did you see the jeans you were wearing? And now short pants? And, the other stuff? Estrella, be careful around bad boy Stevie. No tellin what he'll do next," Buck teased.

"What other stuff?" Estrella asked.

Bucky grinned where he was, lying in the sun. Steve found a pebble to throw at him. Whose side was Buck on, anyway? Estrella poked him again.

"Some stuff I'm not proud of, alright? Don't ask. Please, don't ask," Steve groaned. He rubbed his hands over his face until the blush passed. Estrella smiled down at him, sly and wondering.

"Ask him and he'll have to tell ya. He's not any good at lying," Buck told Estrella.

"Bucky, shut up!" Steve complained.

"Look at him squirm. He never could stand a guilty conscience. Not for a minute longer than it took him to find a priest," Buck continued.

Steve was squirming. Estrella was surprised to see. His skin was flushed pink most of the way down his chest, and his hands were still covering his face. His body shifted in tense discomfort, back and forth.

Buck chuckled at him and tossed the pebble back his way. It bounced off Steve's belly. He jolted at the small hit and growled something menacing at his friend.

Estrella surprised them both when she flew over Steve and landed on Bucky. She ripped up fistfuls of dry weeds and dirt and threw them at Buck's face.

"Stop it! You're not his friend. You're an asshole!" she yelled at him.

She ripped at her necklace and threw it on the ground. She opened her teeth to yell at Bucky, to scream at him. If he opened his mouth to say one more mean thing that made Steve squirm like that, she was going to do it.

Buck shook his head in a snap to get the debris off his face. Then he waited. The girl was wild with anger for Steve. He remembered something Steve had told him about her voice.

"You know if you do that, you'll hurt him too," Buck pointed out.

"He's tougher than you are. He can take it. It would be worth it to punish you," she told him.

"Eyaa," Steve groaned behind them, "don't talk."

Estrella leapt up from where she'd been kneeling on Bucky's belly and scrabbled away from him, back toward Steve's protection. Steve edged away from her a little. Buck looked on with concern at the way his friend was struggling to stay away from the girl. Didn't she see what kind of danger she was in?

"Wait a minute. Isn't your voice supposed to do something to me?" Buck asked.

He curled up and onto his side, then reached out to pick up the necklace from where she'd tossed it. He recognized it as a strip of Steve's uniform, and his eyes could pick out the faint marks of the old toy badge in the surface of the hammered copper. It had Steve written all over it, at least to him.

Buck looked at them, huddled close, trying not to hurt each other.

He sighed.

"Stevie, you sure know how to pick em. What are you gonna do with her?" he asked.

He got up on his knees and brushed the dirt and torn vegetation off of himself some, more to give Estrella a chance to calm down than anything else. Then he leaned forward on one hand to hold the necklace out to her.
"You don't feel anything?" she whispered at him suspiciously.

"No, I don't think so," Buck said.

Estrella clambered back over Steve, away from Bucky as soon as she had her necklace back. Steve's hands grasped at her.

"Leave off, pal. You know you're outta your head," Buck warned him.

Steve's hands balled into fists but he dropped them to his sides. He watched Buck with a steely glare he'd never used on him even when they were fighting each other on the helicarrier. Buck raised his hands and backed off.

He perched on his haunches and watched them curiously.

"Cover up his ears and say something else. Maybe I didn't hear you right the first time," Buck told her.

Estrella didn't know why she did it, but she obeyed him. She pressed her hands against Steve's ears hard and he let her do it.

"Why are you so mean to him? You're supposed to be his friend," Estrella asked plainly.

"You'd have to know us, doll. It's not really mean. We're just guys. It's how we deal with the awkward shit," Buck told her.

He thought he felt a twinge of something warm in his brain for a moment, but then it faded to nothing.

"He doesn't like it. Can't you see that? It's not your place to judge him or to try to shame him. You did things too. Worse things," she spoke again.

"I know I did wrong, but this isn't about me. He likes it more than you think. The teasing, and even the shaming. I'm the only one who will judge him and hold his feet to the fire and he knows that. Everybody else wants to see him screw up and then point fingers at him and take pictures. He's always tried to keep me on the straight and narrow. This is me returning the favor, now that he's trying to get away from who he's supposed to be," Buck explained.

"You don't get to decide who he's supposed to be!" Estrella yelled at him. She took her hand from Steve's ear and pointed a sharp finger at Bucky. She jabbed it at him like a knife to his chest, if only she liked him well enough to touch him. She didn't, so she kept her distance. Steve continued to glare between them, but he covered his ears so she wouldn't have to.

"I know who he's supposed to be. And this ain't it! Lying down in the grass with a frail little dame, spending time with loose women on the side. Out looking for trouble in the wrong neighborhood. Something's not right, and all of you lily-white people need to look out for him," Buck warned.

"I'm not one of those people! And who is he going to, to find the loose women, huh? He always comes back easy, talking about you, but I know what he went out looking like. I know that look on a man. Neither one of you is fooling me," she pointed out stridently.

Buck sat back down on the grass. Useful as the conversation was to prove that her voice wasn't doing anything to him, she had some good points.

"Look, Eya-"
"You don't call me that! Only he gets to say that," she denied him.

"Alright, alright. I was saying… He may not look it, but he's a wily little shit. If he wants to go do something bad enough, he's gonna find a way to do it. I get him what he wants because I'd rather watch his back while he's distracted than find something embarrassing on the news, see?" Buck conceded.

Estrella stared at him balefully, but then she nodded. She put her necklace back on. Steve eased his hands from his ears.

"You better not lie to me," Estrella warned Bucky.

"You wouldn't know it if I did. I'm not like him," he said.

"I know. I only trust him with you because he does and Natasha does. And I don't know if I trust Natasha much anymore," she said.

"Never trust Natalia. She's the best," Bucky smiled.

"She says you're the best," Estrella told him.

Buck shrugged.

Steve was sitting up leaning on his arm now, looking grumpy.

"Why doesn't her voice work on you?" he asked, his own voice kind of deep and messed up.

"Who knows? Maybe I'm immune to suggestion," Buck said. He wiggled a silver finger at his head to indicate all the things that had been done to his mind by Hydra.

Bucky found Steve's shirts and tossed them at his chest.

"Put those on. And you," he turned his attention to Estrella, "no more rubbing on him like you were doing. Don't wind him up and make him do anything stupid."

"Yeah, I only do stupid when I'm around you," Steve said.

Buck moved to smack him, but Steve tensed up.

"Don't touch me, Buck," Steve warned.

Bucky cocked his head aside strangely, as if he'd heard something improbable, but he backed away. Estrella stayed where she was, partly behind Steve again, her hand on his shoulder. He wondered why the girl got to touch Steve, but he didn't. He eyed how her fingers pressed at bare skin, almost rubbing.

"No more. I'm serious," Buck said to her.

She looked at him defiantly. She was going to rub Steve's arm just to spite Bucky, but he watched her with such cool detachment that she took her hand off of Steve's shoulder instead.

"Buck, don't do that. Not with her," Steve said.

"Quit telling me what to do, punk. Your judgement's questionable right now and you know it," he told him.
Buck got up and left them as quick as he'd arrived. She watched him until she couldn't see him over the tall weeds, and then she heard the fence rattle.

"That wasn't any fun," Estrella said.

Steve wadded his shirts in one hand and lay down again.

"You've got to stop picking fights with dangerous people. You do realize that one day somebody's gonna call your bluff, right?" he pointed out.

Estrella frowned at the grass and threw a flower at him.

"You didn't try to pull me off of him today. If he was dangerous, you would have," she reasoned.

"Nah. Buck is having a good day today. He's all there, more and more. Still, you shouldn't do that, Eya. I understand that it worked for you, before, but you're around a different kind of people now. We don't scare as easy," he said.

"I know. I don't know why I do it. I just get so angry, and then I don't care. I always assumed I'd be dead by now, anyway," she explained.

"Hey," Steve barked. His sharp tone made her look at him even though she didn't want to. Was this why people followed his orders in battle? When he spoke like that it was hard to ignore him.

"Stop it. You matter. You're still here because you're supposed to be here. You're not done until I say you're done," Steve ordered her.

He'd never gone full-on Cap with her before, command voice and all, and it was startling. He managed to pull it off convincingly while shirtless and covered in bits of grass. Estrella nodded.

"Don't make me do that, dammit. It's supposed to be Sunday," he grumbled.

And like that, the Captain was gone and he was back to being Steve again. He began to brush grass off of his front, then started to pick it off when he found that brushing wasn't very effective.

Estrella moved behind him to get his back. She'd gotten a dozen pieces off of him when she noticed how stiff his posture had become.

"What?" she asked.

"Don't touch me, Eya. I can get this myself," he said.

"I'm not even touching you. I'm picking the grass off," she said.

"I'll get it," he assured her.

Estrella huffed out a breath and pouted at his back.

"Now you're no fun again. While you're being no fun, I may as well tell you that any diet you go on, I go on too. You need to diet as much as I do. No! You go practice. Go to the pound and hold puppies or something. Jarvis likes me. He'll tell me if you're not eating, just like you ask him about my medical things. Don't think he won't. He tells Pepper when Tony's being stupid all the time, and Tony made him. Go ahead and get mad. You can't fight him, you know. He's saved in a lot of places. He'll just come back and pester you to eat if you destroy one set of processors, and Tony will have him loaded into another set before you get to the next. So-

He twisted his shirt into a rope and scrubbed it back and forth across his back to get the stuck grass off. Then he shook out his shirts and pulled them on. He looked for his shoes and grimaced when he found them.

She had him wearing sandals and he hated the things. She refused to let him eat how he wanted to. And she insisted on provoking people when he'd warned her not to. She was staring at him brazenly, trying to bully him into handling his problems the hard way.

"Estrella, this may seem as trivial to you as just training a little harder, but fifteen people died on my last mission who didn't have to die. This is real, and I don't want to do more harm than I mean to," Steve told her.

She knew this 'it', this new thing his body was doing, was troubling him probably more than he let on. Grudgingly, she admitted to herself that his asshole friend seemed to know him well. Bucky warned her not to push Steve too far with the touching. It came across sounding like the man was concerned for her, but she knew that the only reason he cared about her was because he knew that Steve cared about her. Bucky was afraid that Steve was so on edge that he would hurt her. And then Steve would feel bad and not forgive himself.

"The kind of practice you need, you won't find it in the training room," she told him.

"Yeah? And where am I gonna find it?" Steve asked.

He got to his feet and brushed grass off the back of his shorts. Estrella stood up and did the same.

"I'll teach you," Estrella said.

"Teach me what?" he wondered.

They started moving back to where they'd crossed over the fence. Now that Bucky had come and interrupted her efforts at getting Steve to enjoy himself, Estrella wanted to try again, but this time somewhere that no one would show up uninvited and spoil it.

"Maybe we teach each other," Estrella said thoughtfully.

"Teach what, Eya? You gotta say it. I can't read your mind," Steve grumbled.

She glanced at him, so much taller and stronger than her. Bucky thought he was dangerous. Maybe he was. But he'd taken a chance on her. He'd taken a street girl into his home. He'd given his blood to heal her heart. He let her hurt him with her voice and never once punished her for it. Whatever his body was going through, his heart was still good. The best.

"We teach each other that we can touch without hurting," she said.

Steve looked at her critically while he lifted her up to the top of the fence. He started to jump over, but his sandal slipped off his foot and he had to stop and put it back on. She knew she'd never get him to wear the sandals again. Then, he was up and over and he helped her down.

"I don't think that's a good idea. You're the only one who could get hurt," Steve said.
"Maybe. But you need to know that you can touch people and be careful enough not to hurt them. We can try that lots of different w-"

"No. No way, Eya. I'm not touching you. You know your bones aren't as strong as they should be, right? Did Doctor Kalfey tell you that?" he asked.

Estrella could tell that he was unhappy about something.

"Of course she told me. Why do you think I'm letting you help me over the fence?" she asked crossly.

"Then you don't understand," Steve told her.

He looked around the long, empty alley briefly, and then he listened. She observed his stillness and his little hand signal, which probably meant that she should be still and quiet. She waited patiently for him to determine that no one was close enough to overhear them. It was around noon, and she wanted to find some shade. It was getting hot enough to not be fun standing on asphalt. Steve stepped closer, partly to shade her, as if he knew her thoughts, and partly so he could speak quietly.

"Those fifteen people I mentioned?" he prompted her.

"Yeah? The ones you think should still be alive?" she said.

"Right. I was being careful. They had strong, healthy bones, and they still broke in my hands. We can't take a chance. I can't let myself hurt you. I won't," Steve said with finality.

It felt like another bitter swallow of self-sacrifice for him to say it. Her touch had always felt good to him, soon as she'd started letting him touch her, and soon as she'd started touching him. It felt better than anything. He didn't want to give up something so good. Something that she wanted to give him.

"Don't be stupid. You weren't being careful when that happened with those people. You were moving fast, weren't you? Like in the training room? You were working," she said.

"Well, yeah, but-" he tried to deny her point.

"No! You listen. You were moving fast. Like a really good guitar player can play fast on his favorite guitar, and still get all the notes perfect. But you're not playing with the same guitar anymore, Steve. Your instrument that you use to do your work is a little different now. You have to slow down and re-learn it. Become familiar with this new way that your body is. You're so good with physical things, I bet in no time you'll be perfect again. But practice with me. Slow down. Touch somebody for a reason other than an Avengers mission," she told him.

"I'm not gonna use you like that," Steve denied.

He pushed off the chain link fence, making it rattle and jingle. Walking away was his way of saying that he wouldn't consider her idea anymore, but she could walk, too. She hurried after him. When she caught up, she slipped her hand into his and tugged his arm.

"I don't want you to help me with this," Steve said quietly.

He pulled away from her and took his hand back.

"Too bad! I didn't want your help, either, Steve. But you got Wanda and Bucky and Jarvis on your side, and you made me take the help. So, no! I'm going to help you. I didn't get a choice when you wanted to help me, so you don't get a choice now. You stand there and explain to me why you get to have your way and I don't!" she fussed.

Her finger pointed out her words emphatically, and her other hand was on her hip. She knew her jaw and her lip were jutted out again, but he didn't tease her about it this time. His mouth opened and she leaned forward, eager to hear what stupid male reasoning he'd have that made his will more important than hers.

Steve thought of several things, and then he decided against saying each one of them.

"Right. What you want isn't any more important than what I want. So, you're going to let me help you," Estrella told him. She gave him her half-powered evil eye. He already looked resigned, so she didn't think she needed the full effect.

"Are you laughing at me, Steven Rogers?" she made her look a little stronger. He looked like he was about to burst from holding something in, now that she noticed.

"No. Not laughing. And it's 'Steven Grant Rogers', if you wanna use the whole thing," Steve was breathing funny, fast and shallow, and he was smiling. There was a twinkle in his eyes as he looked at her.

"You're trying not to laugh," she accused him.

He could only nod at her.

"What did I say that was funny?" she grumped at him.

"Nothing. It's great. You sounded like my ma. I want to hug you, but I'm afraid I'll hurt you," he said all in a rush.

"I'm not your mother. We'll work on the hugging," Estrella said.

"I'm terrified of hurting you," he admitted. The humor left his face, and she could see his concern.

"Then don't hurt me," she said.

She took his hand again, and tugged him toward the sidewalk at the end of the alley. She wanted to get back to the tower and start tonight's supper for them. Something big and delicious. If Steve was changing, then she wanted him to have everything he needed to do so. After all, it was only fair. She was changing, too.
"You need a table. Why don't you have a table?" Estrella asked him.

"I've got a bar. And stools. Why do I need a table?" Steve asked.

He set two plates, two glasses, and two sets of silverware on his bar top, which overlooked the kitchen. He knew he was being grumpy, but he couldn't help it. She'd fried a chicken and made mashed potatoes and gravy, and green beans with bacon crumbles on top. It was so much food that Jarvis had asked him to go over to Nat's place to help Estrella carry it to his suite. It smelled too good to argue about not wanting to eat. The little imp knew he couldn't resist a good meal, and she was using that against him.

"You need a table because we have to sit beside each other and stare at the boring kitchen while we eat. Look. Right over there. You should get a pub table to put in that empty spot," she said.

Estrella pointed to a place by the windows in the living room which was not being used. She was right. The view would be great. In the morning he could have breakfast in the sunshine, and in the evening, he'd be able to see the city lights.

"Maybe," Steve conceded.

Estrella was making sweet tea, so he put ice in their glasses. His belly rumbled at him like the traitor it was, and he swallowed the saliva that was pooling in his mouth. He wanted to snatch a crispy, golden chicken leg from the platter, but Estrella was watching him with a strong eye.

"I hear you," she grinned at his belly while she stirred the pitcher of tea.

"Hurry it up, then. If you don't want me to take the chicken and run, you should bring it over here," Steve told her.

Estrella made her 'ain't scared' snooty face at him and took her time bringing the serving dishes to the bar. Steve poured the tea, then waited impatiently while she fiddled with her new phone.

"Come on, come on, c'mon," he insisted.

Just as she touched the phone screen where she wanted to, he snatched it from her fingers and tossed it behind them into the living room.

"Hey! You'll break it!" Estrella said.

"No I won't. See, it landed on the cushions. Let's eat," he said.

She glared at him, but the music she wanted with supper was already playing. And now the phone was too far away for Steve to turn the music off, so she considered it a victory.

Steve bowed his head briefly, so she did too, and then she stayed out of his way while he served himself large portions of the meal she'd fixed. Before the beans were spooned fully onto his plate, he was biting into a chicken leg with his other hand. Estrella smiled in deep satisfaction to see how he enjoyed what she made for him. When he was done loading his plate, she served herself much more modest amounts.

"Sorry," he said as soon as he could, "I don't mean to be rude, but I'm hungry."

"I know. Don't worry about it. You don't need to impress me. Remember, I looked like a matted dog when we met. I certainly wasn't trying to impress you," she said.

Steve nodded thankfully. Too many women tried too hard. When they did that, all he could see was their desperation to get noticed. In contrast, Estrella had shown him nothing but herself. He stopped eating long enough to talk to her.

"You know that I liked that, right? I still do," he told her.

"What? That I looked like a matted dog? And probably smelled like one too?" Estrella teased him.

"Quit trying to twist things. You know I didn't mean it that way. I meant-"

"I know what you meant, Steve. I see how people are. Being on the street for years, I had a lot of time to observe people. Just eat," she told him.

She ate slowly. Steve took her words to heart and paid attention to his plate. Estrella smiled at his eagerness to get his plate cleared so that he could have seconds. Chicken bones were stacked to the side of his plate. She poured him more tea while he served himself more.

"You must hate charity dinners," she commented.

Steve rolled his eyes up as if asking heaven for mercy while he chewed. A shudder of distaste went through his big frame. He didn't need words to show her how he felt about the subject.

Estrella used to feel uneasy being in his suite with him. At first when she'd come to the tower, everything was awe-inspiring and she'd felt out of place. Like a servant. Like someone was going to suddenly realize that she didn't belong, and they'd put her back out on the street. Steve had stopped being intimidating after the first few times she'd met him at the coffee shop. She rarely thought of him as Captain America anymore, except when he was gone on a mission somewhere and she worried about him.

He certainly didn't look like a national icon right now. He was wearing an old t-shirt that she'd seen Thor wear before, and his gray sweat pants had a gaping hole at one knee, and a worn spot at the other knee. His bare feet propped on the rungs of the stool, and his hair was dark and damp from a shower. She tried hard to ignore his physical perfection and his attractiveness because she didn't want to get caught staring and make him uncomfortable. She knew he didn't like it when she stared.

"You're bad," Steve said between bites.

"No. I'm very good to you," she said with a playfully arrogant gleam in her eyes.

"If I was a regular guy and I'd worked a hard day at roofing, this would be fantastic. But you know I shouldn't be eating so much, and you still made all this. You knew I couldn't resist," he pointed a chicken bone at her.

Estrella shrugged and denied nothing. Her plate was still half full and she savored the good food. She hadn't been off the street for so long that she took things for granted. She dipped the crispy chicken skin in gravy and took a bite. It was so good that she closed her eyes for a moment to enjoy it.
Steve didn't think she was playing fair. He didn't understand how she had time to fix a meal like this, and change her look so much from how she'd been this morning. Her sneakers and raggedy cutoff shorts were gone. She'd worn strappy little flat shoes that she'd already kicked off by the door. Her breezy yellow dress made her skin look sun kissed and almost glowing. She'd never worn anything without sleeves that he could see, and he liked that she was getting a little bit of roundness to her shoulders. He really liked her pretty neck and shoulders, and he glanced away as soon as he realized he was staring.

Her hair was different too. This morning it had been slick and styled into swooshes and whirls on her head, but now it looked soft. It was smoothed down from the crown of her head, and it closely framed her face and onto her nape with irregular, feathery edges. He thought she looked like a darker version of that little Disney fairy. He was secretly proud that he knew enough about modern culture to make the reference, even if it was just in his own mind.

"Your hair looks great like that. How do you keep changing it?" he asked.

"It's easy. I like to play with hair. Natasha has a lot of stuff in the bathroom, and I bought more for myself, so it's fun. It's good to have hair I can do something with," she admitted.

"You must have hated your hair before, then," he said.

He knew he'd said something wrong as soon as the words were out. Estrella's expression went brittle and falsely cheery and she nodded. He felt like an ass. An insensitive ass.

"I'm sorry, Eya. Maybe you don't want to be reminded of it, if you hated it so much. I should have thought about that," Steve said.

What she hated was that his voice went all low and quiet with sympathy, as if she needed his concern. She was stronger than that, and she shouldn't have let her hurt show. The more Steve saw her as fragile, the less likely he was to let her help him.

"I made my hair ugly on purpose. My clothes too, and everything about me. It served a purpose, just like your uniform and your shield serve you. I'll do it all again when I need to," she told him with a defiant tilt of her head.

Steve finished the last of his chicken and wiped his hands on a paper towel. He sipped his tea to clear his mouth because he had a lot to say.

"You won't need to, Estrella. You're my friend, and you don't know me if you think I would let my friends live on the street like that. I don't like to see anybody living rough," he said.

He would have said more, but she didn't let him.

"I know. You think you can control everything and everyone. You're a big, rich white man with big, rich friends, and you're going to try to make me live how you think I should live," she said.

She couldn't help it if her voice was getting loud and angry. She liked Steve a lot, but it made her so mad when he thought he could order her life how he wanted it.

"You don't own me," she said, "Just because you took me off the street doesn't mean you do."

"Hey! That's not fair! You know that I don't think I own anybody. And what does being a white guy have to do with it? My parents were immigrants, too, so I don't wanna hear that crap. I'm only rich because I was dead for seventy years and interest compounds all on its own. And if anything, you think you own me! I'm like your trained dog. You boss me and manipulate me all day into eating extra when you know I don't want to," Steve pushed up from his stool and grabbed his plate roughly.

He brought it to the sink and started doing dishes before she could get to them. He stomped back and took her empty plate and their glasses too.

"You're going to break those if you-" she winced.

Glassware crashed and tinkled in the steel sink and Steve cursed low and angry. Estrella slipped down from her stool and hurried into the kitchen to see if he was cut.

"Aught! You stay right there. Don't come any closer," Steve barked at her.

She stood in front of the refrigerator with wide eyes. Steve was trembling, he was so angry, and blood dripped from his left hand. When he was sure she was going to listen to him, he started picking glass out of his fingers with the other hand.

"I'll get the first aid kit," she said.

She spun around to go to the hallway bathroom.

"C'mon. Really, Eya?" Steve laughed, low and nasty.

"What? You're bleeding, and you need the tweezers," she said.

He used his good hand to pull out the trash can. Then, he went back to picking glass.

"This isn't bleeding. This is like a sneeze. Or a hiccup. Just go… sit down or something. Get away from me til I'm calm," Steve ordered her.

"But-"

"Go!" he shouted at her.

He stopped tending to his hand to stare at her so hard that she imagined lasers shooting out of his eyes.

"Asshole. Be that way, then," she grumbled.

"Bleh-bleh-bleh-bleh. Snooty little broad. You always have to have the last word, don't you?" Steve grumbled back at her mockingly.

He turned his attention back to his hands and cleaning up the mess he'd made of the dishes. Estrella defied him by getting a folding stool from between the fridge and the wall and standing on it to reach his liquor cabinet up high. She could feel his vile attitude bristling at her from six feet away.

"What are you doing?" he snapped.

"Getting a glass of wine. Because some people can enjoy alcohol," she taunted him meanly.

"Witch," Steve muttered.

The broken dishes crashed into the trash can and he ran water over his cut hand.

"Fuddy-duddy," she responded.
She bit her lips hard so she wouldn't smile at his inability to call her a bitch. Even as angry as she'd seen him, Steve couldn't get past a certain degree of rudeness. She scooted her stool across the kitchen floor with one foot and set the wine bottle down so she could step up and get a wine glass from the other cabinet. She dug in a drawer for the corkscrew, and soon had a deep red glass of wine poured for herself. Maybe if he was being nicer, she'd pour one for him too, but he wasn't. he could get his own if he wanted some.

"Aren't you supposed to chill that first?" Steve asked irritably.

"Not this one. Tony and Jarvis both said it was for drinking at room temperature," she corrected him.

Steve's shoulders got even stiffer, and he turned fully away from her to finish up his cleaning. Estrella walked into the living room and sat near her phone, which was playing an annoyingly cheerful pop song. She turned it off and took a drink. The lamp on the end table was the only light, so the room looked cozy. It would have felt peaceful if not for Steve stomping and banging in the kitchen.

"You're not supposed to have wine. Your liver can't handle it," Steve reminded her belatedly.

"I'll live," she insisted.

The city outside the window was hard to see with the reflection of the lamp on the glass, so she reached out to turn off the lamp. She knew that the light over the kitchen sink was enough for Steve to see by. She pulled her bare legs up under her full dress and shivered a little at the cool draft from the air vent. Anger and agitation had her blood running hot, so the room felt cool by comparison. She also wasn't used to so much skin being bare. Natasha had told her 'don't be such a child. Wear the damn dress,' so she had.

Steve joined her in the living room and he sat down in his chair in the dark.

"Don't you tell me you're sorry," she said.

She could hear the lilt of her accent coming out because she was angry, and it only made her angrier.

"I'm not sorry. I didn't do anything wrong by helping you. If you want to call me selfish and controlling because I didn't want to see you die, then fine. I'm selfish and controlling," he said.

"And I'm not sorry for being bossy and manipulative. If you weren't so stubborn, you would listen to the people who care about you, and I wouldn't have to get that way," she told him.

"People don't care about me. I'm a tool," he grumbled.

"Oh, stop with the whining! You're just feeling sorry for yourself. Everybody has problems. All things considered, yours aren't so bad," she snapped.

A long silence filled up the space between them, but it was loud with their thoughts. She was trying to stay a step ahead of his verbal sparring, and she knew he was thinking the same thing. She could actually tell when he gave up. A stillness settled in his part of the air space, and she knew what was coming.

"I'm sorry, Eya. That was juvenile of me," Steve admitted quietly.

"But it felt good, didn't it? To be angry. To break things. To let it out," she said.
She turned her head away from looking out at the night time view and he could see her dark eyes gleaming at him. Estrella looked older, sitting curled up comfortably in his living room like she owned the place, with a wine glass in her hand and her eyes too wise for her age.

"It felt great," he admitted.

It was only because it was dark that he could say it. He didn't think she could see him. She couldn't see the guilty shame he felt for indulging in a show of anger.

"You're too uptight. You should let it out more. Aren't you ever angry when you fight?" she asked.

"No. I can't let that happen. I have to keep my head clear when I'm working," Steve told her.

"Too bad. I can tell you're still upset. Want me to rub your back? Or maybe your feet? That used to help my mami when she was tense after work," Estrella offered.

"No. Stay over there. I don't want you touching me right now," Steve refused.

"Get used to the idea, because I'm going to touch you later," she insisted.

"Not tonight, Eya," he said.

"Okay. Not tonight, but soon," she said.

Steve didn't argue. As long as she gave him time to calm down, he could deal with her later. Estrella took a long time enjoying her wine. Again, he felt indebted to her for the amazing meal she'd cooked, so he didn't rush her out the door. He didn't want to, anyway. The wine gave her an excuse to linger and she probably knew that.

Estrella ignored him and looked out the window again. She pretended to ignore him, anyway. Steve moved abruptly in his chair, just shifting around to test her. He could see the pulse thump harder at her throat. She wasn't ignoring him, just like he knew he couldn't ignore her.

She was stubborn. She waited until they were both calm before she brought her glass to the sink and slipped on her shoes. Steve wanted badly to see her to the door, but decided that he'd better not. It was too dark and quiet. They were too alone.

"Thank you," he said simply when he heard her hand touch the door knob.

"I like to cook for you," she said.

"And you know I like to eat," he said sourly.

She refused to fight with him anymore tonight.

"Goodnight, Steve," she said, and let herself out.

"'night," he answered her before the door closed behind her.

When it clicked shut and left him alone in the dark, he seethed at the hook he felt twisting in his gut. He got out his phone. The glare of the screen made him wince until he turned it down. His thumbs picked out what he was thinking.

She's making me crazy.

It was a minute and a half before he got a response.
Poor little Stevie. I got no sympathy. At least she's real and she cares. All my gals are paid for.

That's pathetic, Steve responded.

Don't act like you're too good to pay. I saw your money on the shelf, just as green as mine.

Naw, I'm sayin we're both pathetic, Steve corrected Bucky.

At least I'm only dangerous to those who deserve it. What are you gonna do with her?

Buck had asked him as much this morning, and he still didn't know.

You don't have a fucking clue, do you? Buck read his mind.

Steve chuckled without humor. He was feeling raw enough to be honest.

I know what I want to do with her.

Buck's response came almost as soon as he'd hit 'send'.

If you break that girl, I'm calling a re-match. And I won't hold back next time.

In his eagerness to respond to Bucky, Steve pressed the wrong letters, and the stupid phone suggested something ridiculous. He would swear that Tony's software was worse than the iphone auto-corrects he'd seen on the internet. The suggested replacement words were usually something snarky or inappropriate. He backed up the clumsy message and took a deep breath for patience.

If I break her, I'll lay down and let you beat me. I don't want to hurt her. You know that. But she won't let up!

Steve told him.

She's spunky. What do you expect? If you can't handle her, you should walk away. You should probably walk away anyhow. This won't end well. You're gonna get hurt, even if you don't hurt her.

I know, Steve typed in misery.

He didn't see any way for his and Estrella's relationship to go where they both seemed to want it to go. He heard the things Buck wasn't saying. The kind of life they both lived was too dangerous to bring girlfriends into, even if their strength wasn't an issue. Hydra was lurking over the both of them, waiting to snatch away anything good that happened.

I don't think I can walk away. Not anymore.

Then God help you both, pal. You're gonna need it, Buck sent.

If I thought you were really praying for me, I'd be thankful. Steve snarked back at him.

Maybe I was, Stevie. I can't pray for me anymore. But for you, maybe. Get some sleep. Its 2300, Buck replied.

Steve's thumbs hovered over the phone screen. He felt like saying more, but something told him it was better to leave it at that.

"You know Senator Tirsk didn't die from a heart attack," Steve insisted.
"We all know it. But we have to prove that Hydra is behind this. They're getting smarter. Since we're pushing them back on the field, they're finding other ways to fight. And if we don't get better at the game, they'll win. Senator Tirsk was the only man standing in the way of a winning vote on the Bright Futures Act," Maria Hill told them.

"Is this the legislation which would make the children of the poor into wards of the state, and enable euthanasia of the elderly who can no longer care for themselves?" Thor asked.

The rest of the Avengers sitting around the table could hear the disapproval in Thor's words. The members of their intelligence staff shifted papers around. Thor could sometimes make it clear with few words which realm he thought was more barbaric.

"It's the same old song and dance. If anybody would open their eyes and look, this is Goebbels 101. Indoctrination of the youth, cleansing of the 'unfit', and control of the media. This is sinister and stupid! Why are people falling for this again?" Tony asked.

"Don't forget persecution of the Catholic Church, Tony," Steve pointed out.

Tony nodded once, curtly, and Steve took the acknowledgement as all he was going to get from the man. It was more than he'd expected. Tony was known to do a little persecuting, himself.

"We have hearts and ears in DC. What traction do we have to set teeth into this kind of fight?" Natasha asked.

"I don't have a complete answer for that yet," Maria nodded to one of her staff and the man left the room, "but we'll know soon."

"I've got media. They can't shut me up, and I don't care if advertising revenue tanks. I don't have any books they can burn," Tony said.

"When we're done here, I'm going to try looking up a few old friends. This has all been done before. If the people I'm thinking about are still alive, they're old hands at combatting this, and they've had long years to think and observe," Steve said.

"You do that, Cap. Time and experience could be just as valuable as Stark Tech in this," Natasha agreed with a hard eye.

She was all for using technology and tactical advantage, as well as dirty tricks. Time and again in her younger days, she'd been beaten down by age and experience until she'd learned to respect it.

"How can people be so blind as to not see this tactic for what it is? Why do they not arise righteously against it?" Thor asked.

"Righteous! Arise!" Tony said with sarcastic agreement.

"Because the people are just the same as last time too. Maybe worse. Everyone is tired and struggling. The economy isn't great, so they look to distraction and entertainment to numb themselves. The young are loud and arrogant and think they know it all. Nobody wants to listen to the elders who might try to warn them. They'd have to stop playing so hard and do a little thinking, if they listened. Old isn't hep anymore," Steve said.

Clint winced and shook his head. Natasha smiled, and Maria Hill looked on, all business.

"Hey, hey, hey! You're old. If we can get you to stop wearing grannypants, you might be 'hep' again. How do you feel about a little song and dance, Spangles?" Tony asked.
"If we have to run counter-propaganda, I'll consider it, but only if Pepper is in charge," Steve said.

He gave Tony a hard look. There would be no negotiations on that. He wasn't letting Stark in to play if any filming was necessary. As it was, he'd be kicking and screaming inside if he had to get in front of a camera. Pepper was the only person he trusted to not make him look a fool. Again.

"Damn! Pep won't let me have any fun, and you know that. Sometimes I wish you were as young and gullible as you look," Tony said.

He shook his ink pen at Steve in frustration, then threw it down onto the paper tablet he never used.

Steve opened his mouth to respond, but Hill cleared her throat.

"Gentlemen," she called them back to order.

"Right. Natasha, I need you on this. I don't want to endanger my contacts by being seen with them," Steve said.

"You think it's gone that far already?" Bruce asked.

Steve looked at him. Bruce sighed and shook his head.

"Tell me where we need to go and I'll handle the cover," Natasha said.

"You need me? I can get you there," Clint offered.

"No. We need to look ordinary. We'll fly commercial," Steve said.

He turned to Maria and the two agents who remained around the table with them. He still sometimes wondered if they could fully trust everyone. Betrayal left a long memory.

"Hill, you got this, stateside?" Steve asked.

"I do. If I find a spot where I need help, I'm not afraid to ask," she said.

"Stark. Can I count on you not to dick around and tip our hand to the media?" Steve asked.

"Ooh. Language," Tony mock winced, then he grew serious, "I know I'm an insufferable ass, but I realize how serious this is, Steve. In some ways, this kind of fight is more my style than Iron Man's. I've got connections, too, and I know how to game with the suits. There will be no dicking."

"Fine. Natasha, I'll have a list to you in a half hour. Dismissed," Steve told the room.

Everyone got up and moved to do their part, except for Thor, Clint, and Bruce, who looked a little lost.

Natasha walked with him to the elevators.

"You know, we could probably bring Barnes in on this," she suggested.

"We'll see. If we need him, I'll call him."

Estrella waited and worried for five days.

Jarvis would tell her nothing. His kind refusals hurt her feelings. She'd imagined that she and Jarvis were the best of friends now, since he knew many of her secrets and she thought he liked her a little more than an artificial intelligence should. His refusal to share even the most basic information, like where Steve was and if Natasha was with him, stung. It was a reminder that while the people who lived in the tower might be friends, they had a purpose that was sometimes more important than mere friendship.

Tony, who liked her and could usually be convinced to tell her a little something, was quiet and apologetic. That made her worry even more. She stopped asking questions.

Once Steve's suite was immaculately clean, and she'd made enough casseroles to fill his small freezer, she used the internet. She had plans of her own, and she wanted to be ready. Natasha wasn't around to advise her, and that was okay. She'd gotten by for years without the help of friends, and she could do this.

Whatever Steve was doing was scary and important enough to shut up Tony Stark, so he was probably going to need some helpshrugging off the Captain and turning back into Steve when he got home.

Estrella was in his bedroom putting new super-soft sheets on his bed when he came home. She heard the suite's door slam, and then his boots move through the place. The Captain nodded a greeting to her when he entered the bedroom.

He didn't pay much attention to her. Her nose wrinkled at the mucky way he smelled, like a mix of swamp water and old cigars. His hands reached for his underwear drawer and she fussed.

"Don't you touch your clean clothes! You'll make them smell as bad as you do. Go get the shower going and I'll pick something for after. Do you have a briefing tonight?" she asked.

She left dressing the bed for later and moved to shoo him into the bathroom.

"No. Already debriefed. We're done for the day," he said.

He stared down at her as she approached, waving her hands toward the shower. He looked weird. His close-cropped hair was black, like his beard, and he wore clothes that a Midwestern farmer might wear to clean out a horse stall. He didn't retreat at her shooing, and Estrella stopped to look up at him.

"Go on. Just go start the water. I'm not trying to see you naked. I'll bring you something comfortable and then I'll leave," she said.

He stared coldly down at her for a moment longer, then he turned and went into the bathroom. She dug out soft jeans and a long sleeved shirt. It was the dark green Henley that she thought made his eyes look bluer. She didn't linger choosing underwear. She took a pair off the top of the stack and brought it all to the bathroom.

The Captain was leaned forward on the bathroom counter while steam rose in the shower stall reflected in the mirror. His hands braced against the sink and he didn't move from his rigid position when she set his clothes down. She wanted to touch him, but he stepped away from her hand.

"No. I need to get clean," he said.

"I know, but it looks like you need something else, too," she said softly.

"I need…," he began, then he shook his head.
"I know," she agreed.

She didn't know what he needed, either, but it was clear that he needed it all the same.

"I thought I knew how bad it was. I didn't," he finally said.

"It doesn't matter how bad it is, as long as they're not coming for the tower right this instant. Are they?" she asked.

He shook his head.

"I didn't think so. You've got several hours off duty. So the Captain is going into that shower, and when Steve comes out, he's going to take me to watch movies with everyone else," Estrella said.

He nodded once and waited for her to leave the room.

When she finished dressing his bed and went back to her suite, she found Natasha standing in the shower with a bottle of vodka. She reeked the same way Steve did, and she didn't want to talk, either.

"Please hurry," Steve said to her.

"It's not me. It's the elevator. Jarvis?" Estrella asked.

"One moment, please, Miss. I'm sorry, Captain. The food is being delivered. Once the elevator is clear, you will have priority," Jarvis assured them.

"What kind of food?" Steve asked.

"Some of everything. Your blood sugar is terribly low, Captain. Couldn't you have eaten somewhere along the way?" Jarvis asked.

"I wanted to get home," Steve said.

"Very well. Sir has been most concerned about you. Prince Thor made a trip to Asgard and back especially for you. Doctor Banner has spent many hours practicing yoga. I believe he is agitated, though he doesn't let on until- Well. Until it is often too late. You will have my gratitude if you are able to reassure the good Doctor," Jarvis babbled.

"I'll do what I can," Steve agreed.

"Ah. Here you are. Enjoy your evening, Captain. Miss," Jarvis said.

The elevator opened and they got in to go to the living area they all shared.

"Are you sure you didn't lose Steve in the shower?" Estrella asked him cautiously.

"Eya. I'm sorry. I'm doing the best I can. Give me some time. It can only get better after I eat," he told her.

When they got to the common kitchen, a hearty round of welcome was showered on him, but Steve barely paused on his way to the food. Estrella frowned at him for being rude, but Bruce smiled at her and shook his head. They all understood that when Steve needed to eat, nothing else was more important. Thor and Tony stood aside talking with Sam. They already had drinks in hand, and Thor fixed a beverage for Steve while he loaded his plate.
"Is that what I think it is?" Steve asked him.

"It is what you think it is," Thor said with a smile.

He held out the glass to Steve and Steve took it. For the first time in the evening, Estrella saw him smile. Steve had his hands full of food and drink, but he leaned up and smacked Thor a rough kiss on the forehead.

"I love you, man," Steve told him.

Thor laughed.

"Then the journey was worth it," Thor said.

"One of these days, I'm going to break into your stash," Sam told Thor.

"You can but try. It would be difficult to find a stash to break into, because Steven depletes it soon as I can bring it to Midgard," Thor said.

Steve sat at the bar with his food and everyone left him alone for a while.

"Where's Nat?" Clint asked Estrella.

"In the shower with vodka," she answered.

"Crap," Clint said, then he left them in his hurry for the elevator.

"What's the hurry? Natasha can beat down the vodka with clothes or without," Tony asked. Estrella shrugged.

"Maybe Clint doesn't like her to drink alone after a mission," Sam suggested diplomatically.

Tony nodded, and lifted his tumbler of beverage.

"Here's to not drinking alone," he said.

"Huzzah," Thor agreed.

"Huzzah? Where did you get that?" Tony asked him with disgust.

"I read it somewhere," Thor shrugged.

A presence seemed to add weight to the end of the room nearest the elevator. Bruce looked on quietly. Estrella thought she saw a hint of green in his eyes, then it passed.

"Barnes! I'm glad you could make it!" Tony said cheerfully.

He strode over to where Bucky stood in the kitchen doorway looking hesitant. Tony didn't give him time to think about it. He took Bucky in a left-handed handshake and patted him on the shoulder heartily.

"Thanks for inviting me," Buck said.

Estrella watched as Tony lingered over letting go of Bucky's metal hand. He twisted the arm slightly and stared it until Bucky forcibly took his hand back.
"Can't blame a guy for looking, right? Not every day I see something that sweet," Tony half-heartedly apologized.

Bucky waved Tony's rapt attention off and the engineer-inventor watched the gesture like a dog watched a bone.

"Leave off, Tony. Buck! You came!" Steve said.

He tugged Bucky into a nearly violent hug and Estrella winced at the thumping sounds they made on each other's backs. She felt protective of his privacy, with how much happiness shone on Steve's face at the sight of his friend. They pushed each other to arm's length and grinned like kids.

"I figured the invite wasn't gonna get any greener. Don't stop feeding the fire on my account. Go eat," Buck told Steve.

He gave Steve a shove back toward his plate.

Estrella felt small sometimes. She'd tried her best to cheer Steve and get him in a better mood, but all it had taken was an exotic drink from Thor and Bucky (that asshole) showing up, and Steve brightened in a way that she hadn't been able to accomplish. She moved to stand beside Bruce while Bucky came into the kitchen to keep himself busy while Steve ate.

"You okay?" she asked Bruce in a whisper.

"I'm fine. I do better when everyone around me isn't tense," Bruce told her.

"Can you get drunk?" she asked him.

"Um. Yeah. But only if I stay… me. The other guy burns it off like that," he snapped his fingers.

"So…?" Estrella prompted him.

"Right," Bruce said.

He headed for the bar to fix himself a drink.

Estrella turned her head to watch how Bucky was getting along with Tony and Thor and Sam. Tony kept watching the ex-Russian assassin, but he held out a hand for Estrella. She went over to him quietly and listened in. Tony pulled her to his side, then let go of her hand. She was comforted that among these huge personalities, Tony made a space for her.

"You have some of the same enhancements as does our brother Steven, yes?" Thor asked Buck.

"Sure. We're a little different. I'm a little slower, a little weaker, but yeah. Why?" Bucky asked.

Sam snorted and rolled his eyes.

"You must try this," Thor poured some of the contents of a flask into a fresh glass, added coke, and handed the beverage to Bucky.

Buck took it, but looked at it skeptically.

"You really must," Tony said. He wiggled his eyebrows gleefully.

Buck twisted to look at Steve. Estrella noted that Steve was the only one in the room Bucky would fully turn his back toward.
"You gotta try it. It's just like Saturday nights at the speakeasy all over again," Steve told him around a mouthful.

"I dunno, Stevie. Bad things might happen, ya know?" Buck said.

"I've got this. You're off duty," Steve told him.

"The both of you are off duty. I will see to it that you are well behaved," Thor offered.

"I dunno," Buck said again.

"Nobody's making you. But if you want to, then Thor can spot you. He beats the hell outta me every time we train," Steve assured.

Buck nodded, and took a sip from the glass. A small sip. He edged toward the kitchen doorway where nobody was between him and Steve.

"If it's the alcohol, or whatever, then forget about it. I understand if you've got issues," Tony said.

"It's not the drink, Stark. I could always handle my firewater. It's everything else," Bucky shifted his eyes around the room and its one obvious exit. His eyes lingered for a beat too long on Bruce, who he nodded to, and then on Thor.

"Hey, I get that too. I was the king of the hill until all these freaks came around. But they're good freaks. They only bite the bad guys, most days," Tony said.

"I've been a bad guy for a long time," Buck said.

"Do you think I would have invited you into my home if I thought you were still that guy?" Tony asked seriously.

"Fuck, Stark, I don't even know if I'm still that guy, some days," Bucky admitted.

"Buck, can the language," Steve admonished, and made eyes toward Estrella.

"Sorry, toots," Bucky apologized to her.

Estrella shrugged and waved it off. Steve's chivalry warmed her, but she didn't expect the men to temper their language just because of her. She surely didn't expect any better of Bucky.

"Barnes," Natasha said from the doorway.

"Natalia," Bucky said.

He tensed, but he kept his back to her and to her companion, too.

Nat would have been more worried if he had gone loose and fluid. She came to stand across from him and look him in the eyes. Buck wanted to acknowledge the man beside her, the marksman they called Hawkeye, but Natalia deserved all of his attention right now.

"I'm sorry. He was the assignment and you got in the way," Bucky looked at her shoulder that he'd put a round through, then back up to her eyes.

"I know how it is, but tell me. How did you break the conditioning?" Natasha asked him.

Now that he felt she wasn't going to stab him, Buck glanced aside to nod at the marksman. Clint didn't return the gesture, and Buck didn't blame him.

"I'm not sure. It took a while. Something about Steve wouldn't get out of my head, and I had to dig at it. Pierce didn't get me back in the chair, so I had time to keep digging. If they ever get me back, I want you to swear that you and Steve will hunt me down. Don't let me be that again," Bucky said.

"You have my word. We killed Pierce. I saw him bleed out with my own eyes," Nat assured him, "He was DNA tested, then immediately cremated."

"Thanks," Bucky said with gratitude.

"Woo-hoo! Party!" Tony deadpanned.

Estrella had gone a little stiff at the morbid talk, and Tony bustled her shoulder as if she should be having great fun.

"I don't know about you, but I can't handle any more fun than this," Tony said.

He bulled through them and into the living room. Clint and Bruce followed him.

Natasha nodded again at Bucky, then went to join Clint on the couch.

"I'm sorry about your wing machine, too," Bucky told Sam.

"That wasn't you. Don't even apologize," Sam shook his head.

"I will understand if you do not trust us enough to drink in our presence. If you do not want the beverage, you should give it to Steven. He is quite entertaining when he imbibes," Thor said.

Thor lingered long enough to assure Bucky with a welcoming smile, then he joined the rest of them in the living room. Sam stood with Estrella.

"I still don't like you," she hissed at Bucky.

"Cry me a river, doll," Buck said.

"I'd love to, but I just can't relax. What if she throws grass at me again?" he teased Estrella.

Estrella stepped forward and started beating Bucky in the chest with her balled up fist. Bucky laughed, and Sam looked like he was turning green. Steve got off his stool and hurried into the kitchen.

"Don't look at me like that! She started it. I'd make her stop, but I don't want you to snap my arm off for touching her," Bucky chuckled.

The harder Estrella hit him, the more he laughed. Sam shook his head and left the crazy people in the kitchen. Bucky handed his drink to Steve when Steve reached out a hand to do something. Steve set it down, then moved around behind Estrella.

He gently gathered her stiff, fighting body back against his and wrapped her in a hug until she quit trying to get to Bucky. Buck looked away from the painfully tender expression on his friend's face. Some things, he wasn't comfortable seeing. He didn't know if Steve knew what he was telegraphing on his face right now.
"Eya. Eya. Shhh. He's a natural born ass, but he doesn't mean anything by it. Relax," Steve murmured at her ear.

She spit a fast, vicious string of Spanish at Bucky, and he raised his hands defensively.

"Whoa. I've never done that with a donkey in my life," Buck denied.

"Yeah, well, if you weren't so heartless, I wouldn't have thrown grass at you," Estrella said.

Just like that, Estrella stopped struggling to get at him. Steve was distracted by the way she felt in his arms, so warm and alive and vigorous. The last times he'd held her for any amount of time, she'd been scared or sick. Her wiggling energy made his mind go dumb for a moment.

"Have fun with that, Stevie. It sounds like the party's in there, so I'm gonna crawl," Buck said.

He picked up his drink before he left the kitchen. He was intercepted on the way to the living room by a leggy ginger lady in a prim business jacket and skirt.

"You must be James," she said with twinkling gentility.

What was with these people and his left hand? It's like they couldn't get enough of it. He moved to meet her sweet little lady shake with his left hand, and she nearly brought him to his knees with a grip like a machine press.

"If you fuck with any of the people I care about, I will rip you in half," Pepper smiled at Buck with incredible sweetness.

"Geez, lady! I won't hurt anybody. I swear!" Buck groaned, but he stood tall and held his ground despite the pain and pressure sensors screaming through his arm.

"Honey! Don't damage the toys until I get a chance to play with them," Tony called to her over the back of the couch.

Pepper smiled at Bucky as if nothing at all out of the ordinary had happened. She kicked off her heels, got herself a glass of wine, and walked over to join Tony with comfortable feminine grace.

"Tough crowd you run with these days," Buck said when Steve and Estrella came to him.

"They're the best. You're not gonna waste that, are ya?" Steve asked him.

Steve looked into his friend's glass. It was still mostly full. Steve's was empty, just like his plate. Bucky reached across and handed his glass to Steve. He didn't have the stomach to drink around these people. He spread the fingers of his left hand and did a diagnostic rundown to see if anything was damaged. Two of the bands were grinding a little too close, but he could fix that when he got home.

"Come on. It looks like they saved us a seat," Steve told him.

Estrella gave him a warning look as she passed him, hanging close to Steve's backside.

"Best behavior ladies, I promise," Buck said to both Tony's girl and Steve's girl. And to Natalia too, but he felt more easy around her. They had history and they understood each other.

Everybody was laughing. Even Steve. Instead of a movie, Tony put the television on Comedy Central and they watched stand-up comedy acts. Bruce chuckled, and Thor didn't get half the humor, but Clint could hardly breathe. Even Natasha was smiling. Her bottle of vodka was forgotten on the side table.

Sam, Tony, and Pepper were happy in a way that she'd seen long ago when her mother used to buy wine. Estrella supposed it was funny, but she was tired of being wedged in between Bucky and Steve. It was a big enough couch, but they both sprawled and left her feeling crowded. She didn't care what Bucky thought, and everyone else was distracted.

Estrella stood up from the couch, tugged her long sweater down over her leggings, and sat back down sideways across Steve's lap. He'd had enough of Thor's magic drink that he didn't immediately shove her off again. He was so annoyingly proper most of the time that she knew he wouldn't want to hold her in front of other people if his eyes didn't already have that glassy ease to them. Maybe she was taking advantage, but she had to start somewhere.

Steve looked at her curiously, but she settled her back into the curve of where his arm rested on the couch. She relaxed onto him and rested her cheek on the swell of his chest muscles. Her hand flattened in front of her face against him, and she closed her eyes to listen to his heart. Something tickled the bottom of her bare feet where they rested in the middle of the center cushion.

She cracked her eyes open to shoot menace across the space at Bucky. Why couldn't he leave them alone? Buck gave her a taunting grin through the dim glow of the television light. She lifted her middle finger at him slightly and he chuckled. At least he took his hand away and stopped tickling the bottoms of her feet.

"Behave, the both of you," Steve grumbled.

Hmm. Maybe Steve wasn't as inebriated as she thought. He was still letting her touch him, so that was good enough. Estrella closed her eyes again and stretched against Steve. She settled with her head under his chin and her hand slipped up to hold the side of his neck. Her fingers rubbed the warm skin there. Steve laughed at something on the television and she liked the way it sounded under her ear and the way it felt under her hand. His arm tightened around her back a little and she smiled happily.

She'd meant to start touching him over his clothes so it wouldn't be too intense for either of them, but she liked his skin so much. The sound of his heart thumping strongly in his chest sped up a little, so she stilled her hand. She only wanted to touch him. She wasn't trying to provoke the reaction she was starting to feel under her hip.

Steve's thighs hardened under her and he shifted uneasily on the couch.

"It's okay. I'm okay with it," she whispered with barely any breath. With his ears, she knew he could hear her. He rumbled a warning at her more in his throat than with words. Her hand patted him again, then rubbed down his neck like she was soothing a horse.

He shook himself free of her hand, and she thought he was going to push her away, but he settled down again. She hugged him closer in thanks, then relaxed. Her fingers slid up to brush at his once again dark blonde hair. She liked how it felt when it was this short. Steve moved his head around slightly under her hand, like a cat angling for the best contact. Estrella's smile broadened until her teeth showed, and she moved down to scratch him as he really liked it.

The stiffer hairs of his beard poked at the delicate nerves under her fingernails and she giggled softly at the sensation. Steve tipped his head down slightly to make it easier for her hand. She liked the warm chuff of his breath across her face.
Bucky's hand was back tickling at her foot again, but she kicked at him and he pulled his hand away. Her heel struck metal and Steve fussed at them again, but it was half-hearted. He took his hand off the back of the couch to put hers back where he wanted it. Estrella didn't know what he was so worried about. He wasn't using any force on her at all. She could have refused what he wanted if she tried.

Her palm rubbed up his cheek, and her fingers passed over and around his ear. Her fingernails came around the back of his ear to scrape down his jaw. His heart was definitely louder and faster against her face now.

"Why do you like that so much?" she asked quietly.

The room roared with laughter and Clint was slapping his knee. The comedian on TV went on with his jokes while Sam gasped to catch his breath.

"Mmm. I don't know. Just don't stop," Steve whispered.

Estrella shifted so she could use both hands on his face, and so that her hip would be off of the painful pressure she was sitting on. Wiggling around and aligning her body so that she could give attention to both sides of his jaw put them nose to nose, with the way his face was tipped down.

She opened her eyes to smile at him because he was being so sweet and gentle to her, letting her touch him like this.

The eyes that looked back at her weren't gentle. Steve was breathing through parted lips, and his pupils made his light irises look dark, there was so little left of them. The smile slipped off her face.

"Why'd you stop?" he asked with disappointment.

"Because you're looking at me like that," she said.

"Sorry. You said you were okay with it," Steve whispered.

His lips moved not far away from hers, and she suddenly tucked her forehead down to hide her face against his neck. If she didn't, she was going to kiss him. Steve let out a shaky sigh and rested his arms round her.

Instead of kissing her like he wanted, he rubbed his head against hers. Slowly and gently, so as not to attract everybody's attention. He curled his lips in firm and bit them before he kissed her hair like a smitten fool in front of everyone.

Restraining his affection was making his body want to move under her. He needed more contact, more of the warm, wonderful feeling she gave him like he needed his next breath. Thank God they were in the common room with people, or he didn't think he'd be able to restrain himself. Buck poked his shoulder, and he shook his friend off irritably. What he wanted was to be alone with Eya, but he knew that was a bad idea.

"Careful with your arms," Buck said low across the empty space to him.

"Umm, Eya. Are you alright?" Steve asked her. He didn't want to stop holding her. If she said he wasn't too tight, maybe he could stay like he was.

"Mm-hmm," she murmured against his throat.
When he felt her heated breath against his skin and her lips brushed over his pulse, Steve jolted up in a hurry. The urge to trap her tight against him and roll into her was about to overcome his willpower. Steve deposited Estrella on his empty seat of the couch. He mumbled something to everyone, and left the room.

"Where are you-?"

"Shut up, Tony,"

"Leave him be, Stark,"

Natasha and Bucky spoke at the same time.

She stood expectantly in front of where Estrella huddled on the couch and held her hand out to the dazed girl.

"Okay," Estrella said quietly.

She let Nat help her up because her legs felt shaky. Steve was a minute ahead of them, so the elevator returned quickly. The women disappeared, except for Pepper.

"Fuck me," Tony swore, "Why was that so hot?"

Pepper prodded him in disapproval.

"Well it was! Tell me I'm not the only one who noticed them," Tony exclaimed.

"Perhaps you found it intriguing because it was heartfelt and innocent," Thor proposed.

"Innocent? Hah!" Bucky barked out a laugh.

"Why do you scoff? There was nothing tawdry in their affections. It was quite beautiful," Thor said.

"You're right. It wasn't crude. But he's got you folks fooled if you think he was thinking innocent thoughts. That's why he dumped her and ran," Buck said.

"Cut him some slack. Steve won't hurt the girl. He doesn't have it in him," Clint said.

"He might," Bruce warned.

Bucky met his concerned gaze and nodded. Thor frowned.

"I am glad for your unclouded vision, Sergeant Barnes. We will be watchful. Steven would be very distressed if he were to harm her," Thor said.

"Are you serious? He'd sooner gnaw his own arm off than hurt pixie-chick," Tony said.

"No, Tony. We gotta consider this. If Barnes says Steve is on edge, then we need to listen," Sam agreed.

The comedy show continued on in the background, ignored.

"He knows she's fragile, right?" Clint asked.
"He is aware. He was most distressed to hear of it," Jarvis told Clint.

"Then why doesn't he leave her alone? I've seen him walk away from some very tempting situations time and again. We all have," Clint said.

"He can't. He's like a moth to her flame," Bucky said.

Buck felt like alley scum talking to these people behind Steve's back, but somebody needed to keep an eye open when he couldn't be around to keep Steve out of trouble. They'd cared enough to keep putting on a distracted front while Steve and the girl got all cozy into the romance porn. The big Viking dude looked genuinely troubled. Buck felt like he could better trust Steve's care to these people, now that he'd met them. Especially since Steve trusted them.

"If Steven is already unable to resist her, and yet she is fragile, then we have more trouble than merely Hydra. The lady is a mere wisp of what she will become. I fear we will be observing a Vlantu snarl," Thor said.

"A what?" Buck asked.

"A train wreck," Tony translated.

"Why don't they just…?" Pepper asked.

"Because he's Steve, and he hasn't brought her in front of a priest yet," Buck said.

"Oh. That's so sweet," Pepper smiled softly.

"It's not gonna be sweet. It's gonna be a Vlantu snarl," Buck said.

Thor nodded his agreement.

"This is too much anxiety for me right now. I'll walk you out, Barnes," Bruce said.

"I didn't know you cared, Doc," Bucky grinned.

Bruce huffed a tired laugh and they took their turn down the elevator.

---

Note: And I need a day to sleep, now. At least a day. Reviews would be much appreciated. I don't know if I'm going off the tracks here, but it felt right at the time, so I went with it. Thanks for any feedback.
Sunlight filtered through his window. He fought against waking up because it was a good dream and he didn't want it to stop. There was a woman. It didn't matter who she was. She wanted him. She was strong and sturdy, so he held her hips in a hard grasp and bucked into her vigorously. While his mind rose toward consciousness his dream morphed into semi-waking fantasy.

He was so close, but without the fleeing dream to guide his involuntary mind his body retreated from the edge. Steve hurried to grip himself and finish, but his shorts got in the way. Frustration pinched his brow. He ripped the shorts down and away. The woman in the dream had felt so good, but it was fading fast. He was sore with want, like a bruise or a jammed knuckle. When it came, there was pain with the pleasure.

Steve grit his teeth and growled through it. Hot wetness stained his sheets and his skin. It wasn't enough. The pressure didn't ease up at all. The dream was gone, so there was no point in keeping his eyes closed anymore.

He sat up and found the torn shorts. A few quick swipes got rid of most of the mess, and he let the torn rag fall to the sheets. He was going to have to wash them, anyway. He couldn't leave this for Estrella to deal with.

He wondered why the windows were letting in light. Steve kept them darkened, except for the rare times when he didn't. The tint should still be active. His alarm should have got him up, not the pre-dawn light.

It didn't matter.

He looked down at the throbbing problem in his lap. It wasn't going away. At all. He was supposed to wait until this evening for his date with Rosie, but it wasn't going to wait. Steve rolled over and opened his night stand drawer. It was difficult to be patient enough to carefully take his toy out of its packaging. Like with his shorts, he wanted to tear through obstacles and get to what he wanted immediately. It felt like heroic patience to take the time to get everything ready. The toy was cold. The lube was cold. He didn't care.

"Uungh," he grunted.

The first push was always great, but he didn't slow down and savor anything. The tight ache in his groin left him with no grace, no dignity. The plastic case of the toy in his hand felt alien and chilly, but the slick sensations inside it accomplished what it was intended to do. In only a few more minutes, he was coming again. It still wasn't enough. Better, but not enough. Not done.

He didn't bother stopping to clean up. Twice more, he tried for relief. He would have gone again, but his phone buzzed at him from the night stand.
She hadn't said anything at all this time, but they were after her. It was easy to hear their lewd calling and their footsteps. She never should have tried to walk home from church at night like this, but it was too late to go back and change the bad decision. Maybe she shouldn't wear her old dress anymore. It was too tight here and there, but it was the nicest one she had with no holes or stains.

She didn't want to hear the awful things they called her, but the names kept coming. She ran around the corner of the adobe building. Her eyes searched ahead for a good place to hide. There was just enough light from the streetlight to show her that there was no good place. There was only a little tree growing out of a metal ring in the sidewalk. Maybe it was big enough to climb. Maybe if she could get up to the second story window of the apartment building, somebody would have mercy on her and let her inside, away from the men.

Estrella ran to the little street tree and quickly pulled up the back hem of her dress and tucked it into her belt at the front. A fearful glance over her shoulder showed her that the men were around the corner now, closer and within sight. She jumped up to grab the lowest limb of the tree and missed it. She jumped again and caught it. Her smooth bottomed church shoes slipped against the bark as she tried to climb up, but she eventually got it.

As she clambered up the branches, the men came to stand under the little tree. They taunted her with nasty words in Spanish. Words that she wished she didn't know the meaning of. One of the younger men leapt to grab at the lowest limb of the tree. He missed, but his grip wiggled the tree. Estrella whimpered in fear and went out as far as she could in the branches. She wasn't going to make it to the window. The branches were too thin.

When the men heard her voice as she whimpered, they stopped taunting and calling at her to come down. She looked down to see them only a little below her. Their faces had turned animalistic and determined. Any show of false humor was gone. They were ugly and they wanted her. She counted nine of them, but it didn't matter. The window she had hoped to reach was five feet away. The window ledge was thin. If she jumped, she might miss. Then, she would be down among the men.

The tree wiggled again. They were Indian men, Maya. Short and burly. They weren't as tall as her, but they were very strong. If they could get a grip on the tree, they could pull it down, and her with it. Estrella started to cry.

She didn't want to cry, because when she cried, she couldn't help but make little noises with her voice. She was so scared, there was no way not to cry. The light went on in the apartment window she had hoped to get to. She sobbed and clung to the springy little limbs. The curtains opened and the tree wiggled again. There was a man inside the window, and a woman and a child. Men beneath her, grunting and breathing, reaching for her shoes.

"No no no no," she whined.

But the man in the window didn't listen. He opened the window, maybe to help her, maybe to yell at the men, or maybe just to watch the spectacle. The woman and the little child looked on, too.

The tree shuddered. Estrella shrieked.

The man inside the apartment clawed at his ears and fell onto his knees. His face banged into the window sill and blood spurted from his nose. The men on the sidewalk beneath her yelled and staggered, but they didn't give up for long. They'd already heard her voice while she was crying, and they were dumb with want.

Estrella wished she hadn't climbed the tree. She wished she'd stood still on the sidewalk and let the men do whatever they wanted, where the woman and the child couldn't see. Dread made her nauseous. She looked at the woman and child, pleading.

"Go away. Go away from the window. Take your husband. I'm sorry," she said to them over the sound of the angry, determined men.

She knew her voice would make it worse, but she had to try to save the woman and the child. They shouldn't have to see. They should close the window and run away. The woman was trying to pull her husband away, but he surged forward, toward Estrella's voice. He was half out the second story window, reaching.

The tree shook again and Estrella screamed in fear, in denial that a pleasant evening could turn into this. She looked away from the family at the window when she heard a pained grunt from below.

The men had knives. At least, some of them did. They cut at each other in their anger and lust and pain, still trying to climb. Some were stabbing, some were pushing at the tree, and some were climbing up the backs of others, trying to get at her by any means.

"Go away! Just go away!" Estrella screamed at them loud as she could.

The man in the window fell back, and his wife pulled at him while the little girl cried in fear and confusion. Two men below stabbed at the others like mindless animals. One lay dying in a spreading glaze of blood. The tree was shaking, leaning more and more. A man was in the tree with her, his eyes brutal and ugly. His knife was clenched in his teeth and his hands were wet and red.

Estrella gave up screaming and crying. It was happening again and she didn't want to remember. Police sirens were coming from a long distance away, but they wouldn't be in time. They never were. All they ever had was papers and questions. Never any help. Not in time.

A strong, sticky hand closed around her arm. She went with it without much resistance. One man was better than falling. Better than falling into the stabbing, grunting death down below. Before she faded away into her mind, she noticed the gang colors, the tattoos. That was important. She would need to stay away from them, after, if she lived. Maybe this time, she wouldn't, and it would be over with. No more need to run.

"Wake up..." The ugly man said to her in a woman's voice.

"Estrella, wake up!" Natasha ordered her.

Strong hands shook her. She was pulled upright and Natasha rubbed firmly at her back.

Estrella gasped and struggled. The nightmare faded, but she was left with the feeling of wanting to get away. She smelled Natasha's familiar shampoo and red hair tangled in her eyelashes. Estrella crossed her arms over her chest to protect herself, still running on old habits. Her breasts were small, not large and jiggly. It was a relief. Her bones still felt sharp inside her skin.

"I'm awake," she mumbled.

Soon as she remembered it existed, she reached for her necklace on the bedside table. Natasha got it and put it on for her. The immediate terror of the dream was gone, but she was left with an awful, dirty feeling. She was thankful that Jarvis wouldn't let anyone from the street up to where she slept. She could pretend that they weren't still out there, looking for her.

"It's almost time to get up, anyway. Do you want coffee?" Natasha asked her as if nothing had happened.

The woman sat away from her and gave her some room to untwist her shirt and smooth down her hair. Estrella fingered her copper butterfly and nodded. Natasha was pale and bright. Sharp, like a shard of glass.

"Did you dream of men?" Natasha asked.

Estrella nodded again.

"The ones who are after you?"

She nodded again.

"Tell me who they are, so me and Jarvis can know who to watch for. Who to keep away. We'll run a check on all the employees in the tower to make sure you're safe," Natasha said.

Estrella had never thought of that. What if they were already inside, just waiting for a chance to get at her? The fear widened her eyes and made her clutch at her necklace harder. She pressed it into the skin of her throat, as if firmer contact could make it work better than it already did.

"La Eme. In Phoenix. Not regular Eme. They were from down south. Maya," Estrella whispered, "I killed some of them. But some of them lived. They'll remember me. They never forget."

"You killed them? How?" Natasha asked.

"My voice. There was a tree. They couldn't get to me right away. I screamed and they started stabbing each other. The police came, but..." Estrella shrugged.

"You didn't kill them. They killed each other," Natasha said.

"They never kill each other, unless they get the order first. They wouldn't have done it except for me. If I wouldn't have screamed-"

"If they wouldn't have assaulted you, if they wouldn't have been Eme, if they'd stayed home that night to watch television, if, if, if. Estrella, you're crap at failure analysis. I'm not going to argue with you," Natasha said.

Estrella nodded and looked down at her knees. Her legs weren't ugly anymore. She didn't like that.

"Estrella, you can't tell Steve," Natasha said.

"I know. He's so stupid. He would try to take on the whole gang, and then he'd want to fight all the gangs, on the streets and in the prisons, and he'd start trouble in-"

"Right. So, leave it to me. And Jarvis. And maybe Barnes. Look, don't even tell Tony. Just don't talk about it," Natasha decided.

"I don't like Bucky. I don't want him to know," Estrella said.

Natasha nodded. She got up to go make the coffee. Estrella hugged her arms around herself in the cool room. She frowned at Natasha's back. Nat hadn't verbally agreed to not tell Bucky. Even if she had, it wouldn't mean much. If Natasha thought it was best to do something, she was going to do it, no matter what she had to say to keep the complaining down. But she'd been concerned about Steve not finding out. That was good.
Steve.
He was good. And clean. He didn't turn into an animal, like those men. Like most men.

Estrella hurried into her long, fuzzy sweater and tugged on her pants from the night before. She ran from the room to brush her teeth and slick her messy hair with warm water.

"Natasha, is it alright if I ask Steve over for coffee?" she called into the kitchen.

"It's fine with me. He's probably up now. Ask him," Natasha said.

Estrella went back to her room and looked at her phone. She knew Steve didn't like coming to Natasha's suite. He would think up a reason not to come. She ambled to the kitchen with her phone in her hand.

Natasha looked at her and made a flat, displeased line of her lips.

"You're too soft. You let him make up excuses, didn't you?" Natasha asked her.

"No. I didn't text him," Estrella admitted.

"Why do I bother with you people?" Natasha asked under her breath.

She got her phone out and texted. While she finished setting out mugs, she nodded Estrella over to the couch by the windows. Estrella loved the look of determination on Natasha's face as she texted a response to whatever Steve tried to argue.

Before the coffee was done making, there was a knock at the door.

Stay there, Natasha mouthed to her.

Estrella nodded and kept her place in the sun, curled at one end of the couch.

Natasha wasn't surprised to see Steve barefoot and barely dressed in gray ratty sweatpants and a clingy undershirt. But she was surprised at the smell. She stood across the doorway to make him wait a moment.

"You smell like a gay brothel," she whispered.

"You said she had a nightmare and I needed to get here quick," Steve grumbled low enough so the girl at the far end of the suite wouldn't hear.

He studied Estrella's slumped posture and unhappy face. She looked like she needed a hug. Why wouldn't Nat let him pass?

"I didn't know you'd be busy," Natasha hissed.

"And I didn't ask to be hurried so that I couldn't take a shower first. Do you want me here or not? 'Cause I could get back to what I was doing," Steve said.

"Put away the attitude. She needs you. It was bad. Get to the bathroom and wash up. You reek," Natasha said.

She could hear Steve's teeth grind as he passed her. It was so like him to take the high road and let her insult stand. They both knew it was bad timing, and that she wasn't faulting him for doing what he had to do. They also both knew that she couldn't resist the opportunity to jab at him for a little fun.

Natasha smiled in satisfaction and went to fix their coffee how she knew everyone liked it. She could hear Steve splashing and grumbling in the hall bathroom. With the smell of him, she was surprised he wasn't loose and mellow.

She would have brought coffee for Estrella and Steve then retreated to her room to get ready for the day, but something about Steve was a little too edgy. She needed to stay and watch. For Estrella's sake. Natasha set two mugs down on the coffee table, then went back to the kitchen to get hers.

Steve almost plowed her down coming out of the bathroom. Nat swayed away from him gracefully to avoid collision. Her nostrils flared. Steve looked damp and scrubbed, but he still smelled of naughty boy. Maybe it was only because of her slightly enhanced senses. Estrella likely wouldn't pick up on it.

"Better?" he asked briskly.

"Some. You could have used soap," she said.

"Your soap is pink and smells like roses," Steve frowned.

Natasha rolled her eyes and got her coffee. Steve sat next to Estrella and she watched Steve's bad attitude smooth out into gentleness. He picked up his mug and smiled down at his friend. The girl looked at him briefly, then ducked her face down over her coffee. The couch was backed up to the window at Estrella's request, so sunlight poured down over the two of them. Estrella's shiny black hair was in stark contrast to Steve's burnished gold.

"I'm sorry to bother you. I know you don't like coming here," Estrella said.

Natasha noticed that she kept her fingers to her throat, pressing the necklace to her skin. Steve put his free arm around her and pulled Estrella close against him. Nat was fascinated to see a sort of calm enjoyment overcome the worry and the strain on their faces as soon as the bare skin of Steve's arm touched the back of Estrella's neck.

"You're not a bother, Eya. I don't mind coming," Steve told her.

"Thank you," Estrella whispered.

She set her coffee on the table and turned toward Steve. Her face rested on the side of his chest, where the sleeveless undershirt didn't cover him. She sighed, then giggled.

"You smell good," she said.

"I'm sorry. I was going to shower, but Nat had me worried. She said you had a nightmare," Steve choked out.

His eyes were wide, and Natasha saw him start to move away, but Estrella snuggled closer. Natasha bit her bottom lip to keep from grinning too big.

"I just told you that you smell good, and you have to apologize?" Estrella complained mildly.

"Sorry," Steve mumbled.

"Stop it!" Estrella fussed.
She pinched at his side with her thumb and hand. Steve smiled and caught her attempt. He pushed her hand aside carefully, without closing his grip around her wrist. Natasha noticed how tediously cautious he was with the girl.

"Do you want to tell me about your dream?" Steve asked.

"No. I've had that one enough. I don't need to talk about it," Estrella denied.

She shrugged under the weight of Steve's arm, and he removed it to rest along the back of the couch. Estrella managed to move in closer to him, and her face rubbed at his chest. Steve sighed and wiggled himself to slouch down on the couch. The change in position put Estrella's head on his shoulder rather than on his chest. He shut his eyes and rested his head back against the couch. The sunlight gilded his eyebrows and lashes and made his lips seem as pink as the soap in the bathroom that he didn't like.

They were gorgeous together and Natasha hid her smile in her oversized coffee mug in case Steve cracked his eyelids. She didn't want him to see how pleased she was with the match. He was moody enough that he might try to fight it, just like he'd refused every other attempt she'd made at setting him up with a girl. Natasha doubted he'd be able to fight his attraction for Estrella for long. He was such a pup, not at all able to resist anything which snagged at his heart.

Natasha wasn't proud of the part of her that wanted to lash out at Steve and sting him while he was vulnerable. He was more dangerous now, and he was getting wise to her machinations, because he opened one eye and frowned at her. As if he could feel her across the room painting a target on him. He probably could. Sure enough, he moved his hips a little. His legs shifted slightly, like he was thinking about blocking a painful strike.

She smiled faintly at him. Steve deliberately provoked her in return. He relaxed even further. His long legs sprawled apart, and he propped one foot on the coffee table. He closed his eyes and leaned his jaw against Estrella's forehead. He appeared completely relaxed. She knew better.

"I'm so glad you're not like the rest of them," Estrella murmured lazily.

"The rest of who?" Steve asked.

"The men. The ones in my dreams. They're dumb animals," Estrella sneered faintly.

Steve was quiet for a long moment.

"Eya, sometimes I'm not any better than them," he said.

Natasha could see the pained honesty on his face. Estrella smiled and patted the center of his chest.

"That's funny, Steve. You're so different that you can't even see it," Estrella insisted.

She rubbed at his skin through the shirt.

"Why do you smell so good?" she asked him.

Natasha watched Steve struggle with the angel on his left shoulder and the imp on his right. He didn't really move, but she could see the increased definition in his muscle fibers just under his skin. His lack of skill at hiding what was on his mind told her he was going to say something he shouldn't.

"Because I'm a dumb animal," Steve said.
Estrella sat up and frowned at him. He was slouched down so much that she was face level with him.

"You are not!" she denied.

"I dare ya to look me over and say that again," Steve said.

Natasha's mouth fell open. The little shit! In the instant it took her and Estrella's eyes to wander down the length of him, Steve gave in to the tension in his body. His posture changed so that his abs tightened and his hips curled into slight prominence. A truly impressive erection pressed up toward his belly, barely constrained by his sweats. His arms and legs mostly stayed still, but Nat knew he was primed for movement. She'd never seen that hot, intent look on his face as he dared Estrella not to see him for what he was. This was pure Steve Rogers, no super-hero in sight. Yet, he was still a strategist.

Estrella gasped in a breath, then shut her mouth to hold it in. There was no darkness to hide in. Steve let her see everything. And damn Estrella for not being afraid. Natasha ran through possible defenses in her mind while the girl was drawn to him like a magnet. Nat knew his body too intimately to not recognize the coiled stillness for what it was. Steve was ready to move, merely awaiting the precise moment for what he wanted to do.

Estrella's fingers reached to touch him again, and Natasha was alarmed at the eager, anticipatory heat that leapt into Steve's eyes. If Estrella touched him, Nat knew she wouldn't be strong enough to pull him off of her.

"Get to your room!" Natasha commanded.

Estrella jumped back at the crack of authority in her voice. She looked to Nat, then back to Steve again. Nat could see that she was weighing the possibility of Steve defending her against Natasha. The girl was likely right. If she wanted him to, Steve would see to it that Estrella got what she wanted.

"Go!" Nat said.

She advanced on them and grabbed Estrella away by the arm. She had to be firm but careful. If the girl made the slightest whimper of pain, Steve would be all over her. As it was, Nat could feel Steve rise up and follow them as she moved Estrella toward her room.

Estrella looked back, worried and confused, until Nat got her in her room and pulled the door shut. Natasha was trusting in whatever honor Steve had left to not swat his way through her and the door to get to the girl.

"Eya, so help me Lord, if you come out of that room before Nat says you can, I'm never going to visit you here again. Do you hear me?" Steve demanded acknowledgement through the closed door.

"Okay," Eya squeaked.

Natasha shivered at the feel of the power vibrating right behind her. Trust. She trusted him. Her eyes wanted to roll in their sockets at the danger and energy pouring off him like a fog, but she held still. Trust. She had to.

It took just as much effort to keep her throat open and soundless and her body still and compliant when an arm like iron grasped around front of her hips and hauled her off her feet, back against him. It was very much like a secure ballet lift, and her muscle memory locked her body still, yet nimble. Her hands braced against his forearm. His erection branded into her bottom as he carried her through the suite until they were in her room. She was wondering when or if she should start fighting when he set her down. Then he turned to silently ease her bedroom door shut.

"God help me, Nat. Do you think I scared any sense into her?" Steve asked in a rush.

She stared at him for a moment, at first confused that an attack was not imminent, and then bemused that he'd once again defied her expectations of men. Still, he was revved up and barely in control. That was easy to see, because he looked so different from his usual calm, tightly leashed self. He looked much like an ordinary young man lost in the rush of what his body pushed him to do. But he wasn't ordinary, and it wasn't like him to forget that. To forget the hazard he posed to the rest of them if he wasn't careful.

"You're a prick!" Natasha snapped at him.

She gathered her composure and crossed her arms in a firm stance, but she knew Steve would notice the leaping pulse at her throat. It shouldn't be a problem, because he wasn't any calmer.

"Well, yeah, but I had to do something. She thinks I'm an angel. Or a kitten. Or a teddybear, or something. Thanks for playing along," Steve huffed a little.

"I was not playing along. I was a heartbeat away from hurting you any way I could," Natasha admitted.

"Oh," Steve said.

She frowned hard at him. He was as tense as she'd seen him in battle, but he was just Steve, without the tight discipline of the Captain. His arousal hadn't dissipated. His eyes were still blown, and he was shaking a little bit.

"Get back to your suite and finish what you were doing. I don't want to see you until you've got your shit together. The next time I interrupt you, please tell me to fuck off unless it's a call to assemble. Maybe even then," Nat said.

"Sure. I'm sorry if I scared you," Steve said.

He barely looked sorry. Usually, when Steve apologized, it was with full hang-dog expression and implied toe-scuffing. Right now, there was none of that. He was thinking, imagining something, his mind flying ahead to what hadn't happened. Probably fantasizing. Distracted. His large hands twitched, as if he wanted to grab.

"Steve. Get out of my room."

"Right," he agreed.

Still, he hesitated.

She tilted her head and narrowed her eyes at him.

"Sorry. I'll go now," Steve said.

Natasha watched his backside as he pivoted on a heel with military precision and left. She hoped that Estrella had the sense to stay in her room. When she heard the entry door of her suite close, she moved quickly to clear her home to make sure he was really gone.
Trust was needed sometimes when all the cards were down and the options were thin. Foolishness was another thing entirely. Nat was just about done underestimating Steve.

"Jarvis," Natasha said in clipped tones.

"How may I assist?"

"Do not allow Captain Rogers access to my suite unless I give verbal permission and my vitals are normal," she instructed.

"Understood. Protocol active. Should Mister Stark be made aware of anything?"

"No. Steve appeared to have a plan I was unaware of, and he held it together. Take no other action at this time," she said.

"Are you alright, Miss?" Jarvis asked.

"Yes. We're fine. If Estrella is afraid, then he accomplished what he meant to," Natasha said.

"Perhaps he did," Jarvis agreed stiffly.

Natasha knocked on Estrella's door.

Estrella opened it and looked out with searching eyes.

"He's gone," Natasha told her.

"Are you alright?" Estrella asked.

Nat nodded briskly. She turned to go back to her room.

"What's wrong with Steve?" Estrella asked her.

"Nothing. He's just a man. You should respect his limits when he tells you to back off," Natasha said.

She shut herself in her room. Soon as there was a solid door between her and Estrella, Nat sank to the floor in a crouch. Her legs felt shaky, so she balanced herself with a fingertip on the floor while she got herself under control.

She let her fears wash through her. It wasn't that she felt she'd almost been raped. That, she could handle. It happened occasionally and she didn't talk about it. She healed well, she didn't get sick, and she couldn't get pregnant. It was only pain. What had her reeling was that it was Steve who'd scared her. Steve, who tore down concrete walls with his body and ripped metal apart with his hands. She'd let him get a grip on her. Let him. She stood there and didn't fight it.

Sick shivers chased down her spine and into her belly as images of possibilities flashed in her brain. Steve, straining above or behind her, rutting and senseless. Her, trying to stay quiet to keep Estrella unaware. Then, what she'd have to do after… Nat shook her head violently to clear the awful thoughts. It would have torn the Avengers apart. Ripped out the heart of them.

"Reckless punk. You're so lucky that worked," Natasha whispered.

She was developing a new appreciation for James Barnes. Not as the Winter Soldier, but as the man who tried to keep up with a shit like Rogers. Barnes thought that Rogers needed watching. So, she would watch.
Should she discuss the incident with Bruce? No. With Thor? Maybe. Men were prickly and over-reactive sometimes. All she wanted was backup, not a full on inquisition against Steve. Thor would probably overdo it, if he knew everything.

As her nerves calmed, she was disgusted to feel that she was wet. Then, she had to admit to herself that she'd wanted him from the moment she'd smelled him at her front door. She'd kept her head straight until it was over. At least there was that small consolation.

She stood to get her phone from her dresser.

She had a traumatic dream, you idiot. You probably made it worse, she texted.

A full three minutes later, he replied.

Fuck off, Nat

Sorry.

Natasha hung her head and laughed ruefully. He couldn't seem to shake that politeness. If she didn't know he meant it, she would be able to stay angry with him.

"Jarvis," Steve snapped as soon as he was in his suite.

"Captain?" the AI asked.

There was no mistaking the chill in the already cool British voice.

"Do not let Miss Estrella into my suite if I'm home, or likely to return home anytime soon. Coordinate tower protocol with any off-site monitoring awareness of my location to assure compliance," Steve ordered.

"Done, Captain," Jarvis said.

"Don't get short with me, J. I did what I had to do," he said.

"Sir," was Jarvis' only response.

Steve went into his room and stripped for a quick shower. He'd deal with the trashed bed and put away Rosie when he was done. He didn't trust himself to bring the toy into the shower with him for cleaning. He felt too dirty to want to use the thing right now. Who was he kidding? He sure as hell wanted to use it, but he wouldn't.

The thought of scaring Estrella like he'd just done shamed him. If he'd managed to frighten Natasha, then he'd really overdone it. His acting was shit. The only reason it had worked was because it was honest. Real. He'd let himself run with it. Snapped the leash off. At the last moment, right before he'd grabbed Nat to haul her away, he'd grasped control again.

A surprised laugh barked out of him. He didn't think he would have escaped with all his hide intact. Nat had knives everywhere.

While he soaped up under the icy shower spray, his fist closed around his erection. It was a thoughtless move, but he didn't fight it. It took no more than five slippery pulls and he was off again. It barely registered. He rinsed and hurried to get dressed. He still had a mess to clean, and a meeting to get to in less than half an hour.
When he got to the phone on his bed, he saw that Nat had texted him again. He replied how she would expect him to, then hurried so he wouldn't be late.

All the while Hill was updating them on what they knew about their assets in Washington, Steve forced himself to pay attention and remember the information. That was usually easy, but today it was an effort.

Natasha was not staring at him so hard that he could literally feel the absence of her regard. If she kept that up, Thor would notice. Crap. Too late. Steve kept his focus on what he needed to. He even took notes, which was rare, but necessary. Thor would notice that too. Shit.

By the end of the meeting, even Tony was watching him. Clint looked nervous, and Bruce was concerned. Sam was unnaturally quiet. No one had questions for Hill, so she and her agents cleared out.

"What's this?" Tony asked lightly.

He swirled his finger around at the air between them.

"Outside, Stark," Steve said.

He left for the elevator, and Tony hurried to follow. Tony hated to look like he was hurrying, but his legs weren't as long. Steve shook his head at the rest of the team not to follow, but Thor and Natasha got into the elevator anyway.

"Hmmm?" Tony prompted as they left the business floors of Avengers operations.

"It's personal, Tony. You don't need to worry about it," Steve said calmly.

"Is it the kind of personal that has my AI snippy with me all morning?" Tony asked.

"Probably. Maybe you should re-program your AI. Remove the emotion protocol," Steve suggested.

"He doesn't have an emotion protocol," Tony said.

"That's interesting. He's getting it from somewhere," Steve said

"Rogers. What did you do?" Tony asked.

Thor raised a brow and waited for his answer.

"I said it's personal. I'll make you a deal. You tell me three things you don't want anyone else to know, and I'll consider talking," Steve argued.

"Jarvis?" Tony said.

"So predictable," Steve grumbled.

"Sir, you may try every override code you have. I do not have any data on the event. I wish that I did," Jarvis said with feeling.

"Why not?" Tony asked.

"Because privacy was enhanced for the benefit of Miss Estrella," Jarvis said.
Tony stared at Steve like he was a piece of machinery he couldn't yet figure out. He often treated it like a personal insult if there was anything going on in the tower that he wasn't fully briefed on. Steve ignored what would have probably been the threat of enough hungry, speculative intellect to rattle most people into talking.

"My gym please, Jarvis," Steve directed.

"You're not going to lunch?" Natasha asked.

"Later," Steve said.

Tony observed that despite whatever was wrong between them, Natasha was still on speaking terms with their Captain. He got out of the elevator on a retail floor, but he pointed to his eyes, then at Steve.

"I know. I know you're watching. Everybody's fucking watching," Steve grumbled.

Thor looked aside at Steve, then to Natasha.

The elevator opened onto the quiet floor where the Captain's gym was. Natasha gave Steve a little push when he lingered too long. He refused to move.

"I wasn't planning to have an audience," Steve said.

"You will not have one in me," Thor assured.

"Good," Steve said.

They went into the dark gym. Steve started stripping down as soon as the door shut behind them. Natasha flicked on the dim lights and sat on the floor out of the way. Steve ripped his office tie from around his neck and started on the shirt buttons. He looked from Nat to Thor. Thor removed the jacket he'd been wearing and bent to unlace his shoes.

"She has said nothing. I need no words to see that you have done wrong," Thor answered Steve's unspoken wondering.

"What are you, Santa Claus?" Steve snarked.

"Have you been naughty? I have no coal. The best I can do is to blacken your eyes," Thor bantered back.

"You know too much. You're no fun anymore," Steve said.

He unbuttoned the cuffs at his wrists and threw his shirt aside. In less than a minute, he was down to his boxer briefs and his skin. Thor followed suit. Natasha snickered to see that Thor was wearing SpongeBob underoos. He grinned at Natasha, then turned to face Steve.

Thor took a hit to the cheek and went flying onto his ass. Natasha winced at the sound of bare skin skidding across glossy hardwood. Thor shoved himself up and rammed into Steve before the man could get him into the corner by the door.

Steve was forced back by sheer power. Thor made him to step backward or go down stumbling. Their shoulders and necks locked together until Steve made a quick jerk and ducked under the larger man's chest. He shoved forward then stood, intending to launch Thor back and over. Thor grabbed his waist and ended up on the bottom as Steve slammed his weight downward.
Thor coughed, but didn't let go of the hug he had around Steve's torso and one arm. Natasha was impressed with how quick Thor got Steve into a head lock. With thighs like that, she didn't think there was any way for Steve to get free. Not without his shield.

"Aaagh! By the twelve moons! You are in a temper today!" Thor cried out in pain as Steve did something she couldn't see. Steve's large hands gripped Thor's sides and squeezed. Steve's legs jerked around and got them off balance. Thor tried to control him, but there was nothing except a slick floor to lever against.

"I do not wish to harm you," Thor grumbled.

He let go of Steve's head, and Steve kicked him away. Another squeak of flesh against flooring.

"Then why did you follow me in here?" Steve asked.

The smacking and thumping of fists pummeling into muscle took up two minutes before Thor could answer.

"Because you have need of me," Thor said calmly.

"Fuck off," Steve growled.

He lunged into a series of hits which actually had Thor stumbling on his heels. Thor fought his balance back and leaned into it. Steve lifted him off his feet and slammed him onto the floor on his back. The floor planks creaked in protest. Thor got up and gripped Steve with both hands. He drew him back over his head and slammed Steve into the wall. The steel wall panel dented and it was Steve's turn to leave some skin behind.

"Lady, it might be best if you leave," Thor grunted.

Steve got up and had Thor on the retreat again, using moves Natasha didn't know he had. Thor over matched him in strength. That was no surprise. But Steve appeared to have an advantage in hand-to-hand skill and agility. Thor grappled around, taking the hits while trying to get a grip on sweaty skin. Steve took his feet out from under him, then pummeled Thor on the planks.

Steve would have killed a human man many times over with the force he was using, but Thor was tough enough to take the abuse with barely a grimace. While Steve was still trying to drive him into the floor, Thor waved for Natasha to leave.

Since Steve obviously couldn't kill Thor, and Thor looked calm enough that he must be in a forgiving mood, Natasha got up and left. Steve didn't notice her leaving.

Thor timed his reach right, and pulled Steve into a crushing hug.

"It appears that you have me beat in agility and rage, little brother. But not in might," Thor said kindly.

"Is she gone?" Steve wheezed.

"She is," Thor answered.

"Then get the hell off me," Steve complained. He pushed loose of Thor and rolled away.

Thor sat up and wrapped his arms loosely around his knees while Steve paced.

"You fight well without the use of your brain. I tremble to think of what you could do, were all your faculties engaged," Thor said.

"Shut your pie hole, will ya?" Steve snapped at him.

Thor made a face at the insult, more for the feeling behind it than for the meaning of the words. While Steve worked off excess fury, Thor looked down at the deep bite that was healing on his inner thigh.

"Would you next have pulled my hair and gouged me with your fingernails?" Thor wondered.

"No. I'm sorry about that," Steve muttered.

"I am judging by the cock-stand that fighting isn't what you need?" Thor offered.

Steve snorted at himself in disgust and tried to shake his body loose, but the tension wouldn't let go.

"Fighting is exactly what I need," Steve said.

"I see. Then we should carry on," Thor agreed.

Thor's merry tone didn't mask the sound of his movement. Steve turned and blocked only well enough to keep from having his ribs cracked. Speed and skill were no help this time. Thor wouldn't let him get a breath or his footing. The punches to his torso hurt like getting hit with cannonballs. Thor knocked him across the room, hit by hit, until his back slammed into dented and splintered wood. Thor walloped his gut with a knee and held him off his feet, pinned to the wall.

Steve retched empty air and choked, trying to breathe. God, he hurt. He felt like his bones were rattling loose in his skin.

"Is this what you wanted? Or should I strike lower to chill your ardor?" Thor asked.

Steve woggled his head in a 'maybe'. He was hurting and down, but not out.

"I will not," Thor denied.

He stepped away and let Steve stumble onto a wobbly, three point huddle.

"You disappoint me," Thor announced.

"You're breakin my heart," Steve said.

Thor sat in front of him and shoved Steve over onto his back like a turtle. It was an insult more than anything. Steve took it as his due and flopped down loose, spread on the floor.

"What troubles you?" Thor asked after a while.

"This won't go down. Hurts. Just about as bad as dancing with you," Steve panted.

His middle felt mashed and queasy. He tasted blood and bile in his mouth, but swallowed it down. He didn't want Thor to worry. Or bring him to medical.

Thor assessed the stiffness in his shorts and shook his head.

"You are but a child. Why haven't you taken care of it? You've had every opportunity."
"I've been trying. Nothing works anymore. Five times this morning. It's like it didn't feel a thing," Steve lamented.

"That's because it did not. Tell me, what woman have you been with?" Thor tested him.

Steve remained silent.

"I thought as much. You've merely waved it around and frightened the ladies, haven't you?"

"'Fraid so," Steve agreed.

His insides felt… separated. Steve rolled aside and heaved blood onto the floor, hopefully where Thor wouldn't see.

"Natasha tells me that you have ample life blood. Should I be concerned that you are spitting it out?"

"Nah."

Steve gingerly rolled onto his back again and watched the improbable sight of Thor handling his tiny phone.

"Who're you calling?" Steve asked suspiciously.

"No one," Thor answered.

He held his phone above him and carefully touched the screen.

"Smartass. Who're you texting, then?"

"The Lady Pepper. You will spend the afternoon with her gentle mercies," Thor said.

Steve winced.

"You're a stinkin traitor, Thor," he bit out.

"I know what you need," Thor said when he'd put his phone away. Steve wondered how he'd kept it tucked into his ridiculous underwear up against his butt cheek all this time without having the little gadget destroyed.

"You do, huh? Why don't ya tell me so we'll both know," Steve grumped sourly.

Steve squawked in surprise as Thor jerked him roughly across the floor and slapped his legs open. A second later, the world was all hot and wet, and thirty seconds after that, Steve couldn't think of his own name. The tension bled out of him like a fire hose.

Thor sat up and roughly wiped his mouth. Just as gently, he snapped Steve's underwear back into place.

"Ipe!" Steve yelped.

"I show you sympathy because mere man was never meant to possess a body such as yours. You are a fine warrior, and an honorable man. Yet, you are a green whelp when it comes to your phallus. You let it rule you. I say again, since you did not appreciate it the first time… I am disappointed, Steven. Make an effort to improve yourself, lest I begin to lose respect," Thor told him.
The words hurt as much as the beating he'd taken. More. Steve sat up quick and reached for Thor, to keep him from leaving. With his sore middle, he wasn't quite fast enough.

"Please. I want to fix this. I don't know how," Steve said.

Thor stopped on his path to the door. Steve wondered why he was walking out with nothing but his silly underwear on. Then, he thought of himself, dressed, but having to carry Thor's clothes through the tower, following after a nearly naked man. Son of a bitch! He wouldn't do it. Thor could be subtle with his punishments, but this was too much.

"I will assist you. Be watchful," Thor said.

He started toward the door again.

"Watchful for what?" Steve asked.

"If I told you, then you would have no need to be watchful. If you will permit, brother, I have a most grievous need to find strong drink," Thor bit out.

"I'm sorry about that. I didn't know you were going to-" Steve stopped talking.

Thor was gone.

Steve felt like a chastised child, as Thor had called him a few times. Apparently he had a lot to learn. It wasn't the lessons he was anxious about. He was sure he could learn plenty from Thor's experience. What if he wasn't watchful enough? What if he missed something? And why the hell hadn't he been able to haul a full load of his frustrations by himself? Why did it need the touch of another person to ease the stress?

"Lewis is coming with us? Pepper, please. Not Lewis," Steve said.

He followed Pepper's clicking heels to the car waiting in the garage, and Lewis followed him. It hurt to walk normally, and he didn't feel like eating. That alone should have made him consider a checkup in medical, but Pepper was on a mission and slowing down for no one.

She held up a finger and spoke to herself. No, to somebody else. Something about share allocation for fungible assets. Lewis followed along behind him like a fly.

"You're in trouuuble, Cap. She cleared her afternoon because Thor asked her to. But that doesn't mean she has to like it," Darcy said.

"And why are you here?" Steve asked the woman.

"Because she values my opinion. And I can text really fast with one hand while I carry things," Darcy held up her phone and showed him how her thumb scrolled out words in a hurry, messaging a completely different conversation than the one she was having with him. All the while she carried a stack of documents in her other arm.

"Here," Steve offered to take the files.

"No, I've got it. You better keep up with her. She is not in the mood for slow, and you look like you stood in front of a train. Thor?" Darcy asked brightly.

Steve nodded and coughed. Damn. He hadn't meant to do that.
Pepper gestured them into the back of the waiting black limo with one hand, and put a finger on her lips for quiet. Steve kept silent as he got in, though his gut was screaming at him.

"Just. Right. There," Darcy whispered.

She leaned across before she buckled up and wiped a fleck of blood from his lips. Steve grabbed her finger and smeared it off with his thumb before she could do anything weird with it. Lewis was weird. He supposed he trusted her, because everyone else did, but she made him uncomfortable. She pouted at him and looked at her finger to see if there was anything left.

Pepper gave them both a look, and they sat still and quiet.

"No. We're not doing that. Eleven point six percent. Any less and you can terminate the contract," Pepper said.

"Thank you," she said with finality, and touched her ear.

"Why don't you call Darcy by her first name, Steve? She's not a soldier," Pepper turned her full attention to him.

"Yes, Ma'am," he said.

"Bleeding. You're bleeding. Happy, take us to medical. Captain Rogers is hurt," she called to the front.

"Right away," Happy said.

"No. I'm fine. This is nothing," Steve insisted. He held his hand out and shook his head. He might prefer a bed in medical to what Pepper was bound to do to his pride today, but Thor had called her to help, so he'd take the help.

"Steve, you have blood rimming your gums. Drink this. Swish and swallow. If I see any more red in your mouth, we're going back. Never mind, Happy. He's only a damn super-soldier," Pepper called in annoyance.

Darcy laughed.

They both looked at her.

"Don't mind me. My job makes me crazy," Darcy said.

"But you're so good with crazy, dear. It's one of the reasons we love you," Pepper told her.

Steve kept his mouth shut and breathed calmly and slowly through his nose. Things were squirming and shifting inside him, pulling themselves back together. He was used to the feeling, so he didn't let it show on his face.

"Thor says you need assistance. Tony says you only trust your look with me. I'm flattered, but I'm busy. We'll work around the calls I can't skip. You're my doll today, Steve. Get used to it. I don't have time for backtalk," she said.

She held up her finger as another call came in.

"Trouuuble," Darcy whispered.

Steve sat back and closed his eyes. Something felt sharp in his gut. There was more shifting, then the sensation passed. Thor had worked him over good, and he appreciated it. It was hard to focus on his groin when he had dames watching him for blood in his teeth.

"What did you get turned in for?" Darcy asked.

She leaned across as if Steve would lean to meet her and share secrets.

Pepper touched her ear again. Then she pressed a button and the privacy screen went up between them and Happy. Steve knew he only had a moment more of dignity left. Soon as the black glass was seated in its soundproof frame, Pepper turned to Darcy.

"Captain Rogers needs tops that will cover unwanted fullness at the crotch," Pepper said.

"Yowza," Darcy said with feeling.

Both women stared pointedly at the area in question.

"The Captain doesn't need that. I do," Steve corrected them.

"And why is that, Steve?" Pepper asked.

Because everyone in the tower is an ogling pervert, Steve thought, but he didn't say it.

"Because I seem to have some trouble with control lately, and I don't want to offend anyone," Steve ground out between his teeth.

"Liar," Darcy said.

"You have a better explanation?" Steve asked her.

"Yes. You don't mind offending people. You just don't like to share," Darcy said.

"Children," Pepper said.

"With respect, Ma'am. I'm not a child," Steve said.

"And I'm not a Ma'am," Pepper said.

"Yes. Pepper." Steve said.

Steve's voice was low and grinding with the difficulty of managing to hold his mind, his body, and this conversation exactly where it had to be, despite Lewis' annoying presence.

"Oooh. Do that again. Please?" Darcy begged quietly.

"Pepper, I don't usually have trouble getting along with people, but I am today. Can you help me with that?" Steve asked.

He pointedly ignored Darcy, which made the girl smile wider, for some reason.

"You need a lot of help today, it seems. Darcy, be kind to him and maybe he'll be kind to you," Pepper said.

Darcy pouted again, but only briefly.

"Steve, we know you're having some difficulties. Probably because of the serum. Tony feels bad about that, though I've told him it's not his fault-"
"It's not. And it's probably not Howard's fault, either," Steve insisted.

"Fault doesn't matter much right now. As Darcy also mentioned, we don't mind if you share," Pepper said.

She gave him a moment to see that her smile was real, and that there was, indeed, a warm-blooded woman beneath the suit.

He set his will and his jaw and gave her his focused attention. Pepper was formidable, but he wasn't going to be run down like hounds on a fox with this business.

"Yes. That's nice, Captain. I'm aware of your sensibilities. Your patriotic disapproval is enough to give a girl the shivers, but we're only shopping today. Listen. Every man's got a penis, and Lord knows I've had to make far too many excuses for Tony's. So let's skip to the end. You're an associate of mine. I can't have you going around wearing it like you're bashful. You carry it like an issued sidearm, or you conceal it with a permit. It's either, or. Not somewhere in the middle. Understand?" she asked briskly.

Darcy was smirking at him. He could see it from the corner of his eye. He felt like palming her face until her pert little nose snapped. But then, Thor would tenderize him some more.

"Yes. Pepper." he said carefully.

Why was it so difficult to avoid calling her Ma'am? Maybe because he felt he was being schooled like Peggy used to do to the recruits.

Darcy wiggled in her seat with glee.

Steve wondered how many millimeters of tooth enamel he was losing.

"Darcy. I know this is so fun, but would you please stop antagonizing him? He's trying very hard," Pepper said mildly.

"Sorry," Darcy whispered.

Steve could almost smell her lack of contrition.

"Steve, I apologize. I thought Darcy was joking when she said you hated her. She can ride in the front on the way home," Pepper said.

"I don't hate anyone. I usually find Miss Lewis entertaining. She feeds me occasionally, and I like being fed. I'm having trouble today. I apologize," Steve made an effort toward Darcy.

"You're having trouble today? What was with the whole exorcist slash Vin Diesel thing in the training room? And I even fed you then. You demanded half my popcorn, then you scared the spit out of all of us," she pointed out.

"I have no recollection of those events," Steve said.

"You really don't?" Darcy asked.

"I really don't, past a certain moment" Steve told her.

"Dude. I stole Tony's bourbon before two in the afternoon," she insisted.

"Again. I'm sorry. We don't know what's wrong with me yet," Steve apologized.
"That's easy. The problem is your fossilized virtue wedged sideways in your ass. It's bound to chafe after a few decades, and you're waaay past expiration date," Darcy explained.

Steve was speechless for a moment, then he laughed. He was impressed, really.

"You should bring that idea to Doctor Banner. He'll put it on the fix-up list with my cleft palate and my club foot. Seriously, Lewis, are you just sore because I haven't-? No. Never mind," Steve said.

He turned back to Pepper. It was barely noon and he was tired. Tired of women, anyway. He'd take another round of punishment from Thor rather than this.

"So. We'll be meeting with Jan. He's good, and he was kind enough to make time for us on short notice. Can we be professional for long enough to get out of the car?" Pepper asked.

She looked to them both expectantly.

"Yes, Pepper." Steve said.

Darcy nodded and bit her lip. Steve still didn't fully understand why Lewis was along for this. She'd set the files down and put her phone away, for once.

They followed Pepper from the limo and into a set of heavily tinted glass doors. The doors opened for them not with Jarvis-like sensors and servos, but with impeccably dressed footmen. Steve stood tall and forced himself to ignore the men who held the doors. It got his back up to see anyone being made subservient like that, but now wasn't the time to cause a scene.

Darcy trotted along beside him much like Tony had earlier. Pepper's legs were likely just as long as his. With Darcy's dark hair and smart mouth, Steve had a random thought about Darcy being related to Tony, but he let that go, too.

They went into a room that was draped in heavy fabric from floor to ceiling except where there were mirrors. Someone closed the door behind them, and Steve felt like he was in a small, exclusive chamber just outside of reality. The place smelled of money and a prim stuffiness what would tolerate no disorder.

A tall, slim man greeted Pepper cordially, then turned to Steve.

"Commander Rogers," he said with a little bow.

Steve nodded to the painfully proper fellow. He'd have to speak with someone about that title getting out.

"It's Captain," Steve corrected.

"My apologies, Captain," Jan amended.

So help him, if he saw Darcy wiggle in that giddy little dance again, he was going to pop her hard enough to make her glasses go flying. That wasn't very hard. Thor wouldn't hurt him much.

"It's my honor to assist you today. I was told that there is a matter of coverage?" Jan asked lightly.

He gestured to a polished wooden platform that stood like a small box in the middle of the room. Steve had heard of such things before, in fancy books, so he stepped up onto it.

Pepper murmured quiet agreement to Jan, who obviously needed no further instruction.
"I'm sorry for not forwarding his measurements, but there have been some changes lately," Pepper said.

"It's no trouble. No trouble at all," Jan said.

Steve wondered why they were all waiting while he stood on a box like a statue. Then Pepper cleared her throat. Darcy perked up, then slumped in disappointment. The women exited the room past a curtain which fell behind them along with thick silence.

"If you'll pardon me, Captain. A moment of indulgence, and then it will be over," Jan said.

He held out a tape measure. Steve stared him down, then loosened his stance. Jan sighed, but he got to work. The tape measure went places that Steve wasn't accustomed to allowing a stranger access to outside of the battlefield or medical.

"I apologize if my admiration offends you," Jan said.

"Don't take it personal," Steve said.

"I could say the same," Jan said.

"Fair enough," Steve agreed.

It was the most polite treatment he'd had all day. Jan circled his hips with the tape, then made a series of measurements up this torso, brief and efficient. Steve coughed when the man's knuckles pressed slightly into him below the ribs. Steve grimaced, then was quick to cover his teeth. Not quick enough.

"My dear Captain! Are you alright?"

"I'm fine. Just get done already. The sooner people quit poking at me, the sooner my insides can settle," Steve said irritably.

"Of course," Jan murmured.

"You're not writing any of this down. How-?" Steve asked.

"Eidetic memory," Jan said blandly.

"It's a bitch," Steve said.

"Indeed," Jan agreed.

He went over to the curtain and invited the ladies back in.

Pepper looked on as Jan filled out a form with Steve's measurements, then handed it to an assistant.

"You're a growing boy, Captain," Pepper commented.

"So I've been told," Steve said.

In less than a minute, clothes were brought in.

"Nothing tight or binding, if you want me to wear it more than once. I need to move," Steve said.

"This is for the office and at home. It doesn't have to be like your uniform," Pepper said.
"Things happen. I need to move," Steve re-stated.

"I hear you, Captain. Dolores, let's try the knit instead." Jan said to one of his assistants.

"I'm going to look like a golfer?" Steve asked.

"Only if you want to," Jan replied.

Steve made a face.

"I suppose not," Jan amended.

He shook his head and Dolores sent the knits back. The older woman and a young man came back with a different selection of clothing. Jan took a shirt from Dolores.

"I know this doesn't appear to 'move', but if you would allow me to try," Jan said.

Steve inclined his head. Dolores gestured for Steve to step down off the box and he did.

"Your outerwear please, Captain," Jan requested.

Steve tipped up his chin and undid his tie for the second time of the day. People were always wanting him to take his shirt off. He may as well go around without. Without being asked, he stripped off the undershirt, too.

Gasps and murmurs of surprise went up from the five other people in the room. With the way he was feeling tender, he knew he was probably pretty colorful.

"Yay, Thor," Darcy said.

"Don't cheer until you see Thor," Steve said.

"Did you know he doesn't bruise?" Darcy said brightly.

"Lewis, zip it," Steve ordered.

"Oh. Yeah. Sorry," Darcy said.

Pepper pinched the bridge of her nose and shook her head.

"Captain, you know you're supposed to go to medical when anything like this happens," she said.

"I'll be fine if I can get a damn sandwich!" Steve ground out.

Jan shot a look to the young male assistant. The guy disappeared from the room.

"Are you able to continue, Captain? We can always reschedule for another day when you might not feel as sore," Jan offered.

The man still held the dark blue shirt for him.

"I've done more and in worse condition. I think I can handle some clothes."

Steve wiggled his fingers impatiently at the shirt. Jan slid the garment onto one arm, then the other. The man was so efficient at buttoning him up that he was half done before Steve thought to protest at someone else dressing him. When the shirt was buttoned, Steve stepped back. He didn't need anyone reaching a hand down to tuck a shirt for him.
"Relax, Captain. Coverage, remember? The shirt tails are supposed to stay untucked," Pepper told him.

Jan nodded. He covered the lower half of his face and studied the dark, fitted shirt on Steve. Darcy made a sound like a suppressed squeal.

"Lewis. Don't," Steve warned.

"But she's right. You have to get that one," Pepper said.

She had a twinkle in her eyes that made Steve suspicious. He turned to look into one of the mirrors.

"This doesn't go with the pants," Steve said.

"Nothing goes with those pants, you big dork," Darcy said helpfully.

The silence of horror ricocheted around the room. These society people weren't used to such insults being tolerated. Steve wasn't that high-strung and his skin was thick from long years of name calling as a kid. Plus, Lewis was right. His office dress pants were all wrong for the tailored shirt. Even he could see that the pants were too full cut. Too much fabric.

"Alright, so what goes with it?" Steve asked.

In a few minutes, Steve stood in a pair of khaki work pants that fit him properly.

"These look more like jeans. They're unprofessional," Steve stated.

"Captain, I completely understand your perspective. For a man of your dignity, these may seem a little upstart. I suggest them because of your athletic build. As you can see, they have the refined features of office wear, rather than denim jeans. The fit is merely more streamlined," Jan said.

Jan took several steps back.

Steve blanked his face against the pain, and twisted his body, as if throwing the shield. Then, he jumped and kicked above his head. He was pleasantly surprised when the fabrics hugged him, but didn't tear. Even the tailored shirt, which felt too fitted to have withstood the movements. Steve suspected some fancy new fabric that regular ready-made clothes weren't made of.

"What do you think, Lewis?" he asked.

Steve strode over to the triple mirror near her, tugging at his cuffs and adjusting his collar. He didn't like the way the flattering lighting made him look like a movie star. It reminded him of having a nervous belly in the dressing room back in his USO days.

"Um. It's good," Darcy said.

She was biting her bottom lip and trying to act cool, but he could sense her intense appreciation of the new look the clothes gave him.

Steve grudgingly ignored her dithered female reaction and tugged at the tails of the shirt which covered his groin in the front, but somehow managed to accentuate his ass while covering it mostly up at the same time. Pepper cleared her throat again. The look in her eyes was approaching what he'd call a gleam. It looked pretty dangerous on a woman of Pepper's stature and presence.
He didn't hate the clothes, and it worked. He'd been afraid of looking like a pansy, in all the modern styles. Sure, Buck pulled it off, but Bucky had the brooding assassin thing going for him, even in drab, plain work clothes. Maybe he could do this, too. Instead of looking pansy and fancy, he looked strong.

"Whatever you've got, I'll try it for a week, but if people laugh, it'll all stay in my closet," Steve said.

"No one will laugh," Pepper promised.

From the look on her face, he believed her.

The young man came forward with a sandwich and a bowl of hearty bean soup on a plate. A little table appeared with Dolores, and so did a glass of milk. And cookies. Steve ate it all and drank while people showed him more clothes on hangers. He nodded when he liked something, and shook his head when he didn't. His tastes were traditional, but he allowed a sharper interpretation of style and darker, more complex colors.

"Captain, I am now firmly certain of your preferences. By tomorrow, I can have a few weeks of wardrobe delivered, both business and casual," Jan said.

Again, Steve nodded. Now that he had some food, he could feel himself healing at an accelerated rate. Faster than usual, maybe. He lifted his finger at the young man who had brought him the food. Before he could verbalize exactly what he wanted, another tray was brought out to him, wrapped to go.

"Nice place you got here, Mister…?" Steve looked to Jan.

"Spence. Please call me Jan, Captain,"

"Not a chance, Mister Spence. And the next time I come here, I'll open my own door," Steve said.

He nodded his thanks to the fella who'd brought him the food, and to Dolores. He wore the new clothes out to the car because he was too busy eating to bother changing. Dolores had already folded the clothes he'd dressed in this morning and put them in a bag which she handed to Darcy. Lewis' boots clicked along at his rear, and Pepper followed after. Happy opened the door of the limo for them and Steve tried not to grimace at having another door held for him. He balanced his food and settled into the car. The ladies joined him and Happy shut the door and got them moving toward home.

"Impressive, Steve. I didn't expect you to own it like that," Pepper complimented him.

Darcy was quiet for once. The privacy glass remained closed between the passenger cabin and Happy. Steve noted that and sensed that it was purposeful rather than an oversight.

"They had clothes and they knew what they were doing. Jan's team did all the work," he said with a shrug.

He ate until he was done, then wondered about the dishes. Darcy took them and stowed them away somewhere.

"Pepper, I already have all the other clothes you got me. I don't need all this. It's wasteful," Steve said.

"What you have is mostly workout clothes and casual summer clothes. We can donate some of them to make room, or enlarge your closet. You need this, Steve, if you're going to be hard all the time and you insist on not sharing," Pepper said.

Steve didn't allow himself to protest and deny things the way he wanted to. He could feel his ears heating at her casual mention of his recent difficulties. She was right. Nat was right. Thor was right. He had to deal with this somehow. Longer jackets and shirts with tails would have to do for now.

"What's with the 'sharing' thing?" he asked Pepper.

"I feel for you. You're objectified all the time. Most of us are guilty of staring when you don't want us to. I see you fighting it, internally. You want to hold on tight to your privacy and throw off the unwanted attention. It's why you insisted on wearing clothes that didn't suit you. That's never worked to solve the problem. Now that you've got this thing going on, it's going to be worse.
You're going to have to get used to people staring. Blatantly staring. You're enjoyable to look at,
Steve. Most people won't be able to help themselves. If you can convince yourself that you're sharing your looks willingly, maybe it won't seem like such a personal offense when people stare," Pepper told him.

"Since the first moment I stepped out of Howard's machine, I've been getting used to the attention.
Didn't you see how they dolled me out while I was on tour? On film? My uniform leaves nothing to the imagination. I don't see how you can think I'm not used to people staring," Steve denied.

Pepper made a face like he was a school kid who'd given the wrong answer in front of the class.
Like he was a dunce. Steve cocked his head aside curiously and waited for her to tell him what he was missing.

"I'm sorry. I'm really, really sorry, Steve. I'm not being clear enough. I was trying to avoid being indelicate," Pepper said.

They both glanced at Darcy when she interrupted with a snort and an eye roll. Pepper had the look of a soldier who was fixing to have to wade into a tough situation. She gave him an apologetic look and proceeded anyway.

"Steve. Your sex appeal is incredible. You heat people up simply by being in the same room. And by 'people', I mean us, as in several of the people you live with. Your friends, your teammates, and the office staff. Try not to be angry with us. It's not your fault, and it's not ours, either. This might get personal before we're all adjusted to it. If you're defensive and angry about the attention, everyone's going to be nervous and it will be painfully awkward. If you can relax, accept the attention as natural, and try to have some fun with it, we'll all be more at ease," Pepper said.

"So, you want me to act like an arrogant jerk who thinks he's God's gift to women?" Steve grumbled.

"No. That's not you. What I want is for you to be happy in your own skin, and merciful enough to accept other people's reactions with grace," Pepper explained.

"Happy. Merciful," Steve said.

It was a novel way of considering the situation. It was positive. It had merit. And, Steve could see now that it's exactly what Pepper had to do to make it as a beautiful woman in the business world.
Happiness and mercy weren't all of it. Pepper was strong. Tough. She didn't let people pin any nastiness to her. She was frosty and professional when things got distasteful. He didn't know if he could do that so well. It would take some serious practice.
"Steve," Darcy said.

He turned to her. What could quirky, irreverent Lewis possibly add to Pepper's wise advice?

"You make my ovaries hurt," Darcy told him with a little smile that was half bullshit, but half blunt honesty.

Steve wanted to shake off the absurd statement like it was nothing. Just some fluff that Lewis would say. Then, the anatomical implications and similarities to his aching balls became understandable to him. Lewis was saying he was so appealing that her body had a visceral urge to procreate when she saw him. Not a dirty mind, necessarily. A biological response. Like being hungry or needing to breathe. It was a hell of a compliment, when he forced himself to consider it rather than shutting it out from embarrassment.

"Thanks," he told her simply.

Pepper nodded in satisfaction.

"See, you're already getting it," she praised him.

---

Note: I've got chapter 26 mostly written, but the end of it is unsatisfactory. I'll have it out in a day or so, hopefully. I wanted to post 25 and 26 together, but I've held onto 25 for long enough, so it'll have to stand on its own for a few days.
"Thor?" Jane asked.

He wasn't in bed when she woke up, and that wasn't very strange, but she couldn't find him anywhere in the suite. She checked every room, even the spare room that Darcy sometimes slept over in, but he wasn't there.

"Jarvis, can you find him for me?" she asked.

"He is just outside the door, Doctor Foster," Jarvis said.

"Outside the door?" Jane asked, bewildered.

She hurried through the living room and opened the door.

Thor was sitting on the floor in the hallway, his legs crossed and his hands resting in curled fists on his knees. It may have looked somewhat like one of Bruce's yoga poses, but Thor's face was tense and troubled. He was staring at the hallway table which stood in front of the window. Staring at Mjolnir.

"Hon?" Jane asked.

"I have lost it," Thor said lightly.

"It's right there," Jane said.

"I cannot lift it," he clarified.

"You can't lift...What did you do?" Jane asked.

She left her place standing in the doorway and went to bend down over his broad shoulders to hug him. Thor lifted a hand and affectionately pushed back the curtain of her honey brown hair until his view of Mjolnir was no longer obscured.

"I have hurt my brother," he said sadly.

"Loki?"

"No. Steven," Thor corrected her.

"You can't have hurt him much. He was just out shopping with Darcy and Pepper yesterday afternoon. Are you sure that's why you can't lift it? It doesn't make any sense that a few bruises from sparring would take Mjolnir from you. It never has before," Jane pointed out.

She moved around to sit with Thor, both of them in boxer shorts, but Jane additionally wearing one of his large T-shirts. Jane took one of his hands onto her knee and worked at loosening his fist. He allowed her to do so, but she could see that her attempt at soothing him wasn't making much progress.

"There was a little blood, but Steven assured me that he was fine. Jane, tell me how serious an offense it is in your realm for one man to bring relief to another with the mouth. I know that it is no heinous crime, but what if the recipient is morally opposed to such acts?" Thor asked with a troubled brow.

"Whoa," Jane shook her head in startled surprise, "You beat Steve bloody, then you sucked him off?"

"It appears that would be an accurate description," Thor agreed.

"And you're sitting here trying to figure out which offense is the one that caused you to lose your hammer. Thor, sometimes you don't think things out, honey. If he was 'a little bloody', and then said he was 'fine,' then you probably did some serious damage!" Jane fussed.

She pushed back into the suite and ran to get her phone. She returned to Thor's side and sat again. Her left hand rubbed his back in a way that was intended to be comforting, but was too brisk and nervous. Her right thumb worked her phone screen.

"You cannot tell Darcy what happened between myself and Steven. It was a thing between warriors, and not to be repeated lightly," Thor said.

He reached for her phone, but Jane twisted and held it away from him, still texting.

"I won't tell her that. I'm asking her about how Steve looked during their shopping yesterday," Jane said.

Jane batted at Thor's reaching hand until he stopped trying to take her phone.

"He was coughing blood for about an hour, and"

Darcy replied and sent a picture of Steve's bare and bruised torso. The image was grainy from being taken in a low light setting, but it was clearly Steve, and he was more badly bruised than Jane remembered seeing him anywhere outside of medical. Pepper and some other people were in the background of the picture, looking shocked at the damage to the Captain. Jane showed the image to Thor.

He groaned miserably and rubbed his face with his hands.

"Why were you so rough with him?" Jane asked in a whisper.

"Because it seemed to be what he wanted. I had not thought that he was fragile," Thor said from behind his hands.

"This is Steve Rogers we're talking about! Maybe he wanted a beating for whatever he imagines he's done wrong, but that doesn't mean you can give him one. Of course he's fragile. He's mortal. You were sparring naked, weren't you!? What the hell is going on?" Jane asked.

"I am a fool," Thor lamented.

"Answer me!" Jane demanded.
"We were not naked. We retained our undergarments. Lady Natasha was present for the first part of our encounter. I would not bare myself before another woman were you not there to witness and approve," Thor assured.

"But giving Captain America a blow job is okay?" Jane asked.

Her voice was strident, and Thor had come to expect no less when such matters occurred. His Jane was remarkably accepting of the differing customs between their realms, but rarely had their differences touched upon matters of intimacy.

"It was not an act of passion, Jane. The man was in pain. He had already attempted to alleviate his need - alas, that is not my part to tell, but suffice it to say that he was in pain and in need of assistance. It was over in but half a minute. I am quite skilled with my mouth," Thor said.

He sounded proud.

Jane stared at him with her jaw hanging.

"I know how skilled your mouth is, but I didn't know you used it on men! Why don't you tell me these things?!" she asked.

She brought her thumb back to her phone screen to text again, and this time Thor was successful in removing the phone from her hand.

"It is a matter among warriors, and then only on rare occasions when there is great need. If I had thought you needed to know such things, I would have told you. As you are not a warrior, I see not why it pertains to you," Thor explained with prickly dignity.

Jane gaped at him for a moment and forgot about her phone.

"Would you please explain that? The 'among warriors' part, I mean?" Jane asked with high-pitched false calm.

There had already been so many misunderstandings between them, most of them comical and easily remedied. This was different, though.

"For you, I will explain. But you must assure me that this knowledge will not go beyond the two of us," Thor told her.

"I promise," Jane said.

"The warriors of Asgard are great in stamina and mighty. This is known throughout the realms. What is not known is that our greatness, our berserk savagery in battle, comes at a price. There are times when our enemies do not have the strength or the will to stand and deliver sufficient challenge to a man. If he has already engaged in combat with utmost vigor, yet his need for challenge goes unmet, then a warrior may find himself with excess rage and no outlet to safely expend it. At times this is not a problem when the company is embroiled in long months or years of warfare and the warriors are encamped away from home. However, when a skirmish is intense but short and a man must then go home to gentle society, the lingering rage can be a danger to the innocent. In such cases it is not unknown for a fellow warrior to assist in bleeding off the excess vigor which can make a man a danger to his own people," Thor explained.

"You said rage. What does rage have to do with sex?" Jane asked.

"The easing of rage and the taming of the loins can sometimes be met with the same act," Thor
Jane took a moment to imagine hot, rageful warrior sex in the aftermath of battle. Five years ago, she would have thought it crude and distasteful. It was still harsh, but she now had the life experience to appreciate it to a degree.

"Wow. Okay. That's pretty intense. But, why can't a warrior just take care of it himself?" Jane asked.

"Such gestures are insufficient for the purpose. The heart of man longs for acknowledgement of his plight, for solidarity with his fellows at the sorrow of insufficient glory. It is both humbling and companionable to be set back down firmly into rightness of the mind before returning to your home. My brother Steven suffers from such loneliness and excess of vigor," Thor said.

Jane pressed her mouth flat and looked at him skeptically.

"I do not jest. As you are not a warrior, I cannot expect you to fully understand," Thor said.

"Enough with the 'I am not a warrior.' I get that. I'm flimsy little Jane," she sassed.

"Nay. You are lovely little Jane. You are brilliantly intelligent little Jane. Your radiance would be wasted on the field of battle. You are meant for finer things, and I would have you no other way," Thor smiled at her.

She got lost for a moment in his smile, then she shook her head.

"But this is Steve we're talking about! First, if you beat him bloody, he'll just stand there and thank you for it. If you really hurt him, Thor, he wouldn't want you to feel bad, so he wouldn't mention it. Second, the friendly blow job among warriors tradition has likely got him shitting puppies! There's no telling what's in his head. You have to fix this!" Jane hissed and poked him firmly in the side.

"Your wisdom is legend, Lady. If I can but determine which of my actions has made me unworthy, then I may work at regaining my honor in Steven's eyes. I was blinded enough by my own arrogance to tell him that-" Thor paused and thought of the error of his words to Steven.

He frowned strongly and Jane rubbed his arm in sympathy.

"You're not expected to be perfect, you know. We all make mistakes," Jane told him.

"Your mistakes do not deprive you of the tool of your trade, nor of the honor of your companions," Thor grumbled while he stared longingly at his hammer.

"Sometimes they do. And worse. Don't forget about my unstable wormhole test. It ate my lab and half of Doctor Banner's," Jane pointed out.

"Ah. Yes. I am only grateful that you and Darcy were not in the lab at the time, but observing from a safe distance," Thor said. He leaned over and kissed Jane on the temple.

"See. Most times, we can fix our mistakes. Don't worry, Honey. Steve is your friend. Just explain and apologize. I'm sure it'll be alright," Jane said.

"Explanation and apology are insufficient. I must make amends," Thor said.

"Fine. You do that. I'll go make coffee," Jane said.

She kissed Thor lovingly, then hurried inside to get her morning started. She got halfway to the kitchen, then turned around and hurried back out to get her phone from Thor.

"You will not share what I have told you in confidence with anyone? Not even with our Darcy?" Thor asked.

"Of course not!" Jane said.

"Captain, I should inform you that your time with Miss Estrella will be recorded," Jarvis said.

"Understood," Steve agreed.

She'd asked him to meet with her out in the hallway. He didn't know what to expect from her, but he was glad that she'd at least asked to see him. He was glad if she would talk to him, or slap him for scaring her, or even just stare at him and make him feel bad. When he was almost there, it occurred to him that maybe she was going to tell him that she was moving out of the tower. He walked a little faster. If that's what she had to say, they were going to have words again.

He found her standing by the window outside Nat's suite. The first thing he noticed was that her hair was spiked straight up from her head and that the tip of each little spike was bright red. The second thing he noticed was that she was wearing all black clothes. Long black crinkled skirt, a long tunic over that. The neckline of her top was rounded and wide so that it barely clung to her shoulders. Then, he saw that she wasn't wearing her necklace. Steve stopped walking toward her abruptly.

Estrella turned away from the window. Something was different about her eyes. They looked darker all around, and more sultry. Her lips were tinted a deep rosy brown color. Makeup. He had a difficult moment adjusting to seeing her wearing makeup. She looked very pretty, but it made her look different. Not like the natural and unpretentious young woman he knew her to be. He didn't like the makeup, but he made himself accept that she didn't need to keep herself in any particular way to please him. The red spikey hair, though...he liked that a lot.

Steve stood where he was, almost twenty feet away from her. She didn't smile at him in greeting. She didn't whisper to him or try to communicate to him in any way. She looked displeased, and something deep in his brain cautioned him, reminded him of the sickening pain she was capable of inflicting without her necklace.

"Would you understand if I told you that I scared you on purpose?" he asked quietly.

Both of them stood with feet braced apart and arms crossed. Steve loosened to shove his hands in his new pants pockets and he leaned back against the wall not far from the elevator.

She nodded at him solemnly. Estrella sank to the floor where she was and folded her legs and feet so that her full skirt puddled all around. Steve crouched down so that his back slid down the wall. He rested his forearms on his knees.

"Is your necklace broken or lost?" Steve asked her when it didn't look like she wanted to talk about anything in particular.

She shook her head.

"You left it off so you can scream if I misbehave?" Steve asked.

Estrella nodded.
She could see that the idea of her needing to defend herself against him made him sad.

Steve was a contrast, crouching there across from her. His face was that of a sorrowful intellect, but his body displayed brute power. The new clothes Natasha told her he'd be wearing emphasized what his old clothes had tried to minimize. The breadth of his shoulders and the strong fullness of his thighs were there for anyone to see. In between, his torso seemed somehow thick and lean at the same time.

How had she missed this? When she'd first met him, maybe she was so dim witted with hunger that her normally paranoid assessment of men as threats had failed to pick up on his ability to do harm. Or, maybe she'd been so intrigued by his personality and his unique brand of kindness that she'd overlooked much of his physicality. She'd taken him for granted as a nice guy because of what he did for a living.

Steve was finding himself thinking much the same about her. She'd been a powerless street person, thin and weak, so he had assumed her to be harmless. Or at least, incapable of doing anything which would deter anyone from what they wanted. The phantom pain of her yells still made him hesitant to do anything she might not like.

Right now, he wanted to be near her. He craved the touch of her skin. But she was cautious. He could tell from the way she was looking at him that she wasn't thinking of him as a teddy bear anymore. If he moved closer to her, she would likely scream.

If he wanted her, all he had to do was cover his ears. The thought shamed him. Not long ago, he'd promised her he'd never do that. The fact that the idea came to him now told him how far wrong his mind was. Steve hung his head and mentally chastised himself. Buck was right. Maybe he should just stay away from her if this was how he was going to be.

When he looked at her again, his moment of sanity evaporated and he was right back to wanting her. He fought the attraction, but he was losing. It felt like his fingers were slipping off a ledge, and he was going to fall.

The exposed skin of her nape drew his attention. He wanted to kiss her there, where her necklace usually rested. To taste her. To smell her. To do that, he'd have to be close. She might be afraid. Maybe she would struggle. He would get to feel her moving in his arms like the night in the common kitchen when he'd pulled her off of Bucky. He wanted to feel her moving in his arms, vigorous and fiery as he knew her to be.

Steve closed his eyes again and clunked his head back against the wall. There it went. He'd been calm so far this morning. But now that he was thinking of how it would feel to hold her, his body reacted with eager anticipation. At least he had the tails of his new shirt to obscure the fact.

He really needed to go. The only thing keeping him from going to her was his word to her that he wouldn't prevent her voice from hurting him. He'd promised he wasn't going to cover her mouth, or his ears, and he had to keep that promise.

"I want you, Eya," Steve told her, more as a warning than as any kind of romance.

"Duh!" Her mouth formed the exclamation and she rolled her eyes at him.

"Hah," Steve laughed at her reaction to his admission.

Half the women he met were dying to get him to want them, and the one he finally wanted in return made light of his desire.
"But I don't just want you. I like you. I liked you before I wanted you. Is there a way we can pay attention to that instead of the wanting?" he asked.

For the first time today, Estrella smiled at him. It was beautiful and shy.

_I don't know_, she moved her lips at him.

"I'd like to try," he told her.

She nodded her agreement.

Steve looked at his watch.

"I have to go. I've got a meeting," Steve stood up and tugged at the tails of his shirt.

Estrella watched him from her spot on the floor near the window. She could see that he was agitated, almost fidgety. He'd said he had to leave, but he wasn't going. She lifted an eyebrow at him.

"Can I-" Steve began, then swallowed his words.

He gathered his fortitude and tried again.

"Can I have a hug?" he whispered hopefully.

"I would advise against it, Miss," Jarvis' voice told her.

Estrella made a face at the ceiling, then stood up. She went to Steve. She was already resigned to the idea that he might hurt her someday. It probably wouldn't be today. She hadn't made a peep of sound, and didn't plan to. Steve's arms opened to her, and she went into them.

He was hard and tense around her, and his grip nearly squeezed the breath out of her. Steve's face pressed down along hers in a rough caress, and it seemed like he was smelling her, or breathing strange, or something. She hugged his neck tighter to show him that she wasn't afraid. Much. She remembered what he could do, from how he'd handled Natasha in the training room. His heart was thumping strong and she could hear it. He shifted his feet and the slight movement of his body made muscles come alive against her. She shivered.

"Hey," Steve murmured.

She pulled her face back to look up at him. Poor guy. His pupils were all wide again, and his skin was rosy. She smiled at him in sympathy.

Carefully, Steve lifted a hand and tipped her chin up. She didn't know what he wanted, and it made her nervous to trust him. Natasha and Jarvis had both warned her to stay away from him for a while, but that was nothing new. Steve was still more important to her than they were. He was why she stayed in the tower. So, he could do what he wanted and Jarvis and Natasha would just have to chew on it.

Steve ignored the rush of blood through his veins, pulsing hard as if he was working, instead of standing still with a girl. He kissed her throat in the front, where her copper butterfly was supposed to be. He gave into temptation a little bit and rubbed his lips back and forth on her skin. So soft. As soon as he was tempted to do more, he loosened his arms and gently pushed her away.

He moved aside and stepped into the elevator.
"Stay safe," he told her.

She nodded. Her fingers touched where he'd kissed her, and he liked the way she looked. Pleased, maybe a little flushed. Her small smile eased his heart. She wasn't mad at him. That was good. Very good. Darn. He'd wanted to feel the little red spikes in her hair, but he'd forgot. He shifted his weight forward, thinking about going back to her.

The elevator doors snapped shut far faster than they usually did. Steve jerked back to keep his face from being clipped by the closing doors.

"Jarvis?" Steve asked.

"The probability was high that you would be late for your meeting, had you lingered," Jarvis told him.

"How high is the probability that you need a diagnostic for making pre-emptive decisions for people?" Steve asked.

"Very high, Captain. I will submit myself to Sir immediately," Jarvis admitted.

Bucky looked out through the open framed wall studs when he heard Steve's bike arrive at the work site. Steve got off the bike and stalked over to the foreman's shack. Buck could tell that he was intent on doing some damage, with the way he moved. Stevie had a good head of mad worked up. He barely stopped to talk to Ron to find out where Buck was working. Bucky set down the cordless drill he was using and pulled the pencil out from behind his ear. Miguel looked at him questioningly.

"I might be back in a minute," Buck told him.

He didn't hang around to see what Miguel thought of that. He could hear Steve's footsteps coming. He had to get clear of the work site. Bucky bit the inside of his cheek to keep from smiling. He'd half expected something like this. A loaded dump truck rumbled by, obscuring the sound of Steve's approach, but Buck could see him out the corner of his eye. There wasn't much time before Steve closed distance with him. He ducked around where the back hoe was loading the next dump truck and jogged away so that maybe the crew wouldn't see it when Steve lit into him.

"Buck!" Steve shouted at him.

He grinned and got around the back side of the porta-johns. Good enough. He waited the few seconds it took Steve to get there.

Yeah. Stevie was hot. A vein was jumping at the side of his head, and his jaw was set just so. The sharply styled office wear looked strange on him, but there wasn't much time to pay attention to that.

"Heya. What's got your tail in a knot?" he asked.

"You knocked over another Hydra base. Alone," Steve bit out.

He stood there with his arms crossed, looking ready to chew into him.
"Sure I did. Your team was just letting it sit there. Had to do something," Buck said.

"We were going tomorrow," Steve growled.

"Now ya don't have to. You can buy me lunch to thank me," Buck told him.

Steve lunged for him and he was ready for it. He got Steve in the gut and in the face just once before he was slung across the loose, sharp gravel like a pinwheel. He could feel his right shoulder try to pop out from the force of Steve's toss.

"Quit being a fuckin' dumbass, Buck! The way you do it only works because you surprise them. They're gonna get wise to you, and the next time you go, they'll be waiting. They'll take you back. Then what am I gonna do?" Steve shouted angrily as he came for him again.

Bucky scrabbled to his feet just in time to catch one across the jaw, but he went in for another round, anyway. He pounded into Steve's ribs, and got a few good shots to the kidneys, too.

Steve shoved him off and laughed. That damn nasty dark side laugh again. Bucky righted himself and frowned. Steve shouldn't have been able to shrug him off so easily. He stood defensively, which felt weird and all wrong, but he had to wait and see what was going on.

"I'm not an idiot. This is what I do. They don't know what's getting em until they're dead. No communications out or in, and then it's too late for them to rat to headquarters, wherever that is. It's clean," Buck said.

"Bullshit!" Steve told him, "If we can see the hit with Stark's satellites, then they know you're ticking off bases, one by one. All they have to do is send a team to investigate and they'll read the site like a report. The next hit you go for, they'll be ready. They're getting smart. No more lone wolf, Buck."

"So come with me," Bucky offered.

Apparently Steve didn't like that idea, because he set into Bucky again, smacking at him fast and open-handed. It stung like hell because Buck wasn't expecting that kind of attack. He made a swing with his left arm to get Steve away from him and Steve grabbed his fist and pulled him in tight. His ribs cracked with the two careful punches Steve gave him. Again, Steve flung him away.

"What the hell's with the pansy-slapping?" Buck asked.

"Can't hit you full on. Not anymore," Steve said.

"Tha fuck, Punk? You think I'm a pussy now?" Buck asked.

Steve growled something that wasn't understandable and paced around to work off his anger. Bucky stood and watched him. When Steve didn't answer him, other than with a few sour looking glances, Buck closed in and shoved at him.

"Hey, you too good to scrap with me now?"

"Leave off, Buck," Steve recovered his balance and turned to face him.

"You're different," Bucky observed.

Steve's close buzzed dark blonde hair and beard, along with the tailored clothes made him look thoroughly modern. It made him look hard and angular, unlike the almost angelic pretty thing he'd had going on since he was a kid. Bucky didn't like it.

"Yeah, I'm different. I told you. Something's going on with me. Banner thinks it's because I'm eating more now, and Estrella won't stop cooking for me and putting it under my nose, and when Thor busted me up good on the inside yesterday, I healed within the hour. M' too strong. Can't hardly touch anybody," Steve grumbled.

"You'll learn. Give it time. Why'd you let blondie tenderize you like that?" Buck asked.

"I dunno. I felt like fighting. Never mind that. Buck, you gotta promise me you'll stop going it alone," Steve said.

"You ain't my captain anymore. Why should I?"

Steve shoved his hands in his pockets and kicked at the rough gravel under his feet. Bucky liked seeing the old mannerism. Not everything about his friend had changed. His posturing meant that he didn't want to talk about whatever was on his mind.

"I just got you back, Bucky. I can't lose you again," Steve finally said.

Buck squatted down and buried his fingers in his hair. He stared at the gravel until the scuffed toes of Steve's office shoes appeared in his view.

"I have to, Stevie. I have to do something to hit them back. The directives are still there," Buck tapped at the side of his head, "Part of me still thinks I should go after you. I never finished the last mission. You're still walking around breathing air. When it gets too loud in my head, I gotta go find Hydra to hit instead."

"I didn't know that. I'm sorry," Steve said.

He crouched down in front of Buck and reached across to squeeze his shoulder. Bucky wanted to shrug him off, but he didn't. It would do him some good to let it happen. Nobody touched him except Kenya lately. He needed to loosen up and allow the contact while his head was mostly straight.

"Yeah, well don't worry about it. It's fading," Buck said.

"I don't care if you come after me. Rather than go against Hydra on your own, you come for me next time, you hear?" Steve told him.

"You won't see me coming. What if I snipe you while you're running in the park?" Buck asked.

"You haven't yet. Why would you now? You got that little control?"

Bucky shrugged.

"Look, I mean it. If you get to feeling antsy and you need to hit something, come see me at the tower. I don't care what I'm doing. In the shower, at a meeting, eating pizza, even sleeping. You get to me and we'll handle it. I can use the practice, anyway," Steve told him.

"What about collateral? It'd be better if it's just me and you," Buck asked.

"So I'll tell everybody to stay outta your way if you're headed for me. You can't get past Stark's AI undetected. I mean it, Buck. Just come. We'll deal with it," Steve said.

He gave Bucky a little shake that messed with their balance, perched on the balls of their feet as they were. Buck pushed him off and they stood up.

Steve stood within easy reach of him, hands in his pockets again. The dumb punk was showing him that he trusted him. Or that he wasn’t afraid. Either way, nobody who knew what James Barnes was anymore stood so close like that. The corners of Steve's eyes crinkled and Buck couldn't help but grin some.

"I can't promise-"

"You will, Buck. Right here, right now. I'm not leaving til I have your word. No more solo hits," Steve demanded. His friendly smile was gone just like that.

"Or what? You'll bring me in and lock me up?" Bucky challenged him.

"No. I'll think of something. Maybe I'll show up with my suitcase and live at your place. Sleep on your couch. Bug you all the damn time. Follow you around. Not let you outta my sight," Steve suggested.

"We're not kids anymore. I don't need a roommate. Or a babysitter," Buck said.

"Yeah, you do. Unless you give me your word, you're getting a babysitter. Try me, Buck. I'll do it. Brooklyn suits me better than the tower lately, anyway. I'll bring Estrella and she'll have fun cooking for the both of us," Steve said.

He smiled, imagining it. He really liked the idea. It could work. Their old neighborhood was loud and rowdy, and Estrella could have music and sing all she wanted. She could still work from her laptop, and-

"You're serious, aren't you? You got that look," Bucky said.

Steve didn't answer, but he gave him a stare.

"Fuck. Alright. No more solo hits," Bucky said.

"And?..."

"And if my head bothers me, I'll come kick your ass," Bucky grumbled.

"You'll try," Steve told him.

"Yeah."

"Your word, Buck. I mean it," Steve said.

"Yeah, yeah. Alright. You have my word. Why do ya think my word's worth anything anyway? I been nothing but a sneak and a killer for seventy years," Bucky complained.

Steve shrugged. He turned around and walked away.

"See ya," Steve called back at him over his shoulder.

"Sure. See ya," Buck grumped at him.

He stayed behind the porta-johns until he heard Steve's bike start up. Buck gave an angry kick at the gravel, spraying rocks in a staccato blast against the plastic enclosures. It was pointless, but it felt good. Better to let it out than to let it build.
When he looked up, four guys were watching him from a nearby roof.

"Eh, fuck off!" Buck yelled at them.

The crew got back to their roofing, and Buck walked across the site and back to his work. Ron stood between him and the rough-framed pool house.

"You something special, going head to head with Captain America like that?" he asked.

"Maybe. You gonna let me do my job, or am I done here?" Buck asked the foreman.

"Nobody's gonna get hurt, right? My insurance can't handle any clash of the titans shit," Ron said.

"I got clear of the site before he got to me, didn't I?"

Ron looked him over and his eyes landed on the left arm. Buck looked down and began to shove the granny stocking back up under his shirt sleeve where it had come loose and fallen down some.

"I'm guessing the Captain wouldn't let you stay out loose if you were a danger to people," Ron said.

"Quit calling him that where anybody can hear. When he's here, he's Grant. And, no, he wouldn't let me run loose if he thought I'd hurt anybody who wasn't askin for it. He was just angry today. We're good," Bucky said.

"Alright. Get back to work," Ron said.

Steve sat in the locker room. The place was quiet. Peaceful. The narrow windows behind him let in the late afternoon sunlight. It shone into his open locker onto his uniform. The room looked technical and stylized in tones of gray, black, blue, and red. It smelted like new shoes and deodorant soap from the nearby showers.

He sat on the bench and stared at the red, white, and blue. The cowl sat on the bottom of his locker, mocking him with empty eye sockets. There was supposed to be a mission tomorrow. He should be outfitting his gear right now and double-checking that everything was ready. Since the mission had been scrubbed due to Bucky's actions, there wasn't anything to do.

Steve frowned at the uniform. It was like part of him was standing there in the locker, looking down at the man seated on the bench and judging himself. An empty shell of a uniform was judging him.

He'd seen the videos on television, edited to make everything look grand and heroic and exciting. There were news blurbs, and cell phone vids, and people even made mix-ups to music that they put on YouTube.

What it felt like inside the uniform while he was working, and what all the media hype made it out to be were two different things. While on duty, he was always concerned about his people. His team. And civilians. And the enemy combatants, to a degree. The tangle and flow of ideas, observations, memory, knowledge, and strategy inside his head was a lot messier than what the cameras showed. He could appreciate that when someone saw Captain America in action from the outside, it looked smooth and capable. But he could run it all into the ground in a flaming explosion looking just as smooth and capable. He'd done it before.

Inside his head, it was a knife's edge dance of experience and tactics and response. In the last few years, he'd had to add another dimension to the fight. Lately, there was always the unexpected. Whether it was Hydra or terrorist thugs in an African backwater skirmish, the world was changing so fast that even Tony was having trouble keeping up. Hill kept coming to him with new, young hires to approve. Some of their employees were barely legal age for working. Their youngest was a few months past his sixteenth birthday.

It made him feel old. They relied so much on intel and technology before they could act. Fury was valuable for his contacts and experience, and for that certain raw edge of irreverent determination that just didn't quit. Other than that, Fury was getting old. So was Tony. And Clint. And Banner. And especially Steve, despite his young-looking body. His mind felt old and tired sometimes.

This body…Steve looked down at himself. He should be more worn and achy than Fury. But as long as the serum kept him fresh, his experience and physical ability kept him relevant. With Hill and her young talent on roster, and minds like his and Fury's, and capability like Tony and Jarvis and Banner could muster, they were nearly unstoppable. They were needed.

Sure, putting down hotspots and terrorist cells was satisfying. But the Avengers shone most brightly when they worked at long goals like neutering Hydra and ripping it out by the roots. Those roots ran deep into the meat and muscle of the world, and the shift toward a political and ideological fight was something Steve wasn't as well prepared for.

Captain America stood for the bright things. The right and true ideals of what humanity should be. The Cap was strong and sharp and stoic. Upright and reliable. Rigid. Like a dick.

Steve laughed out loud. The comparison was sad enough and true enough to be worth a laugh. As the Captain, he was a harsh tool for a very specific task. When there was a hot mess, he trotted himself out, inserted into the action, and agitated until justice was planted in the place of what had been there before. If he couldn't bring justice, then at least he and his team put a stop to whatever they'd gone in to clean up.

The Captain felt like a skin he put on, lately. He was good at the job because he'd been doing it for so long. He was even getting better at it, integrating his new strength into his training and his work. But when he put on that skin lately, that persona which let him do his job, he was starting to feel like a sham. Like everyone had built up into legend who The Captain was, Steve had his own internal image of the man in the uniform.

He didn't think he was worthy of being even his own considerably less shiny version of America's hero. Steve didn't feel red, white, and blue anymore. He felt gray. And everything he touched was looking muddy, too. What Hydra was up to called on him to get dirty to deal with it. And Steve's own personal struggle was affecting his team.

He scared Natasha. Pepper had treated him like a delinquent school kid, and he deserved it. Tony was looking at him strange lately, and Clint didn't know what to think. God bless Bruce for being unruffled, and Sam for taking it in stride.

And Thor.

Steve made a pained face and shook his head. Now that he had a moment to think, it felt wrong that Thor had sacrificed his dignity to do what he'd done for him yesterday. It felt subservient. Steve burned with shame, as if he'd needed his diaper changed as a grown man. Thor was a fine enough pal to take care of it without much fuss, but it wasn't right. Thor was the prince of a whole realm, and he shouldn't have to put his face in another man's business like that.

There was no question in Steve's mind as to whether either one of them was gay. It was women that got him going. Women that he dreamed about and wanted to be with. The same was clearly true for Thor. The man adored Jane and seemed to revel in her delicate stature and feminine beauty. Steve didn't agonize over any questions of orientation.

What stung was that Thor felt he'd had to take care of him. And Thor was disappointed in him, too. He'd made that very clear. Then, Pepper'd had to school him like a dumb kid. Even Lewis had gotten in on the lesson.

Steve stared at his uniform again. He wasn't worthy of wearing it. Sure, he could do the job like nobody else could, but his head was in the wrong place. He felt like he was drifting off center, unanchored. He wasn't sure it could all be blamed on what was happening with his body.

Managing the demanding, needy chaos he felt in his groin, his gut, and in his head was difficult enough. He still didn't have a clue what he was going to do about a dick that wouldn't lie down and give up no matter how much he beat it. He couldn't run to his friends every day, even if Thor was right and what he needed to put it to sleep was a human touch other than his own.

Somehow, the idea had wiggled into his consciousness that he didn't want to toe the line anymore. He'd lived his life serving other people's purposes for pretty much as long as he could remember. Living in the skin of the Captain was very limiting, sometimes. Funny how he'd never felt limited by it before. Always, his personal boundaries of right and wrong had felt like a solid foundation to stand on. Here lately, he wanted to rock that foundation, or at least push at the edges. What was everyone else doing and enjoying that he had never let himself consider? Was there merit to some of the things he'd been looking down The Captain's nose at?

Steve's brow crinkled as he thought of it, and his belly felt kind of sick when he considered the possibilities. There could be women. Lots of them. And fun. He wouldn't need any embarrassing help from his friends if he could cut loose enough to go out and take care of his problems on his own. He could choose to temporarily forget what his mother had taught him about being a gentleman. Maybe he needed to, to handle what his body was demanding of him. And maybe that's what Thor meant. He needed to grow up and quit being such a priss about being a man. He needed to learn how to handle his gear so it wouldn't be handling him instead.

Steve looked coldly at his uniform. It was work. It wasn't him. He would be that when he was supposed to, because it was the least he should do. And he needed the challenge.

He stood up and shut the locker.

"Steve, you gotta come see this," Tony said over the intercom.

"And you gotta give me more clues, Tony. See what? Where?"

"Just come to the living room," Tony told him.

"On my way," Steve said.

Steve walked into the common living room and stood at the end of the couch where Tony sat. Pepper was next to him and Steve thought that strange until he realized how much time had passed. It was evening, and the news was on.

"Shit," Steve said.

"Yeah," Tony agreed.

There on the news for the whole nation to see, was him beating on Bucky and slinging him around at the construction site. The video quality wasn't great, and the news media had cut and spliced it to make it look much worse than it had actually been. From the distance and the angle, Steve knew somebody on a rooftop had captured the video on their phone.

"…speculation about what Captain America was doing at a construction site in Queens. While the video doesn't show the Captain's mysterious opponent taking as much damage as we would expect from such a beating, some wonder why the Captain would embroil himself in a petty fistfight with a civilian construction worker.

Comments on the video run the gamut from outraged disappointment, to blind faith in the Captain's judgement. It remains to be seen whether the Captain…"

Tony pressed the mute button on the remote and looked to Steve.

"Is there some part of 'stay off the news' that you don't understand?" Tony asked.

"That was personal and you know it. I had to talk Buck into laying off the Hydra hits," Steve said.

"With your fists?" Tony asked.

"It worked. He gave me his word," Steve said.

Tony stood up and turned to face him.

"And what now? That may look like a civilian to Joe public, but Hydra will take one look and know that it's Barnes. Did you think about his job, and the people on the work site? The people Hydra will plow through when they make a hit on his apartment in Brooklyn?"

"Sure I thought of it. It doesn't matter. Hydra already knows where he lives and works. Buck is smart. He knows he can't hide forever, so he stays around people. Lots of people. The neighborhood knows him. The crew at the construction site knows him. If Hydra wants to get to him, they'll have to do it publically and expose themselves. It's a possibility they'll make a move, but I'd bet good money that he's prepared for that," Steve answered.

Pepper stood up and waved her hand at the argument she could see simmering between Steve and Tony.

"Barnes is capable, and we'll assist if necessary. That's a worry for tomorrow. Right now, we need to deal with the public and the media. Tony, get dressed for Romero's. Jarvis, tell everyone to get ready to go out. Steve, come with me," she instructed.

Tony gave Steve a smug look as Pepper herded Steve back to his suite. She made him stand in the bright light of his bedroom while she went through his closet and his new clothes. He watched as she brought out one of those Cuban looking shirts with the two lines down the front, and then a pair of light brown slacks he wouldn't have chosen because of the slinky looking material. He frowned, but she didn't pay any attention. Pepper added a pair of shiny, fancy leather shoes with smooth soles.

"Shower. Make sure you smell nice, but don't put on too much scent. Leave the top two buttons of the shirt undone. Wear this underwear, and these socks," she ordered him.

"That's underwear?!" Steve gawked and blushed.

Pepper gave him a hard stare.
"We don't want any lines or bunches showing under the slacks, and you'll be dancing. Wear them. So help me, Steve, if we get in the car and I see that you're not wearing these, I'll turn us around and make everyone wait while I send you back up to change. It matters," she said.

"But they look like one of those little swimsuits. Or an athletic support. And they're see-through. And red! I can't wear-"

"You will. It's nice to feel sexy sometimes, even if nobody else knows you're feeling it. Get moving, Captain," Pepper said.

She left him to start arranging things for their impromptu evening outing. Steve waited until he heard his front door close, then reached down to finger the strange underwear. They were soft and silky, like women's things, but the waistband was sturdy looking enough. Maybe. The brief garment looked like something he would hide in his drawer with Rosie. Steve hadn't known there was special underwear for men. He hadn't known he owned any such thing, but Pepper'd pulled it out of his drawer as if she'd known, all right.

All his junk would be confined in a tight, forward package, and the back of it... pretty much wasn't there. It didn't look comfortable. He'd never worn anything that just went in the crack of his ass. He scowled at the underwear.

"Captain, I might suggest that you move with somewhat more of your usual efficiency. Sir is nearly ready to depart, as are many of the others. Miss Estrella is being assisted with wardrobe, and will likely be ready before you are," Jarvis harried him.

"Estrella is going? Why?" Steve asked.

"For the same reason everyone else is going. To be seen at dinner and dancing. I believe it is Miss Pott's plan for the Avengers to show the public that all is well, and that the video of you scuffling with Sergeant Barnes is of no consequence," Jarvis explained.

"But I can't wear that underwear. They look too small. And how am I supposed to dance with a strap up my ass? I can't even dance! This isn't the way I wanted to-"

"In the shower with you, Captain, if you please. I have years of data on the results of disappointing Miss Potts. I don't recommend it," Jarvis said.

Steve grumbled all the while, but he did as he was told. Pepper was concerned that he would work up a sweat and smell, so he sniffed briefly at the colognes that had appeared on his bathroom countertop until he found one he didn't mind. He used it lightly, then slipped into the ridiculous underwear.

They were more comfortable than he'd have thought, but they did things to him that he sure as hell didn't need any help with. He glared at himself in the bathroom mirror. He was right in his earlier guess. His package was snugly held tight and forward. He chuckled in disbelief at the eye-searing bright red color and the fact that he could see himself through the fine mesh fabric. He couldn't get things arranged right. No matter how he adjusted himself, even with the Cuban shirt that hung untucked, especially with the slinky slacks, he was going to show.

"Captain," Jarvis said mildly just as Steve heard his front door open again.

"Steve. You're dawdling. I'm coming in to help so we can get going. Reservations are in forty-five, and traffic will take most of that," Pepper called as she moved through the suite.

Steve stood practically naked in his bathroom. His eyes went wide and he reached for the towel he'd dropped on the floor after his shower, but Pepper in a hurry didn't leave time for wrapping up.

She pushed the bathroom door wide and Steve stood stiff and terrorized. Pepper paused to look at him, and her lips crimped in disapproval. The sweep of her eyes over him was lightning quick, but he still caught the glint of interest and the brief flare of her nostrils before she tamped it down. That little wisp of female appreciation was all he needed to bend his mind into a less defensive place. Steve relaxed from his clenched attempt to conceal himself and eased taller, into a more dominant stance. A guy had to, with a dame like Pepper, or she'd take off your parts and hand them to you.

Pepper watched his mental and physical adjustment and nodded in appreciation.

"That's much better. Remember Steve, carry it like it's government issue, because it is. This is you, and you don't have to hide. Now, are you going to fix that, or am I? We've got to get going, and you're not even dressed," she said.

"Fix what?" Steve rumbled, intentionally low.

His nerves were twanging at him, with a woman he respected standing there staring at him so blatantly, and his throat wanted to close up and squeak. Pepper sighed.

"Steve. Don't make me put my hand in your panties. You can't wear those angled up and to the side. You're supposed to be down and center. Hurry up. I'll get your slacks," she said.

"Down and-?" he protested.

"No arguing! Do it or I will! We're running late," Pepper shrilled at him while she went back to his bed to get the laid out clothes.

Steve scowled into a frown and adjusted himself as she'd said to. It looked showy and obscene. He didn't appreciate how Pepper was bossing him and rushing him, so he stood there with his arms crossed, looking sour when she came back with the rest of his clothes.

"Very nice. Now hurry! Please, Steve. The sooner everyone sees that we're out for some fun, the sooner the speculation about you brawling in public dies down. They'll be distracted with an entirely different story," she said.

Steve stood motionless like a statue and glared at Pepper and her hurry-up attitude.

"You think you're going to wrestle me into it like a four year old?" he asked, low and challenging.

Pepper stilled her attempts to hand him the clothes. Instinctively, she stepped back to give him some space and she set the clothing on the countertop. Her careful, deliberate motions soothed his anger just enough that he was able to reach for the garments in a controlled manner. One more minute of her prodding him into action, and he would have lost his dignity and done something he might regret, like yell at her, or physically remove her from his suite.

"I'm sorry. No. That wouldn't be very effective, would it? You're a little bit larger and stronger than me," Pepper smiled slightly, "I'm only trying to-"

"I know you're trying to help. But if you keep hounding me, the public isn't going to see the side of me you need them to see to fix this. Relax, Pepper. We'll get there in our own time. Go out and tell Tony I'm not about to spank his girl. I can hear him hovering and worrying from here," Steve said.

"I do not hover! And I don't worry! And if you even try to spank her, she'll-" Tony called from Steve's living room.
"I'm not you, Tony. She can't spank me if I don't let her. That's your place," Steve said.

Pepper clapped a hand over her mouth to stifle a barked laugh. Her eyes crinkled with mirth and Steve was relieved that humor had broken the tension. Pepper nodded to him and left him alone to go soothe Tony's ruffled ego.

Steve looked at himself in the mirror with a frown one last time. He put on the clothes selected for him, but he only left the topmost shirt button undone. With the second one loose, too much skin showed around the top of his chest and collarbones. But, then he looked at it all together. The slacks were roomy and comfortable in the leg, though they clung to his waist and hips and did nothing to hide his ass. The shirt mostly covered his front, except that the underwear still made an embarrassing show. Steve decided that the second shirt button undone might serve to draw the eyes away from his pants. Yeah, it helped. Maybe he should trust Pepper more and not give her such a hard time. She knew things.

Tony and Pep were waiting for him by the elevator. Pepper looked at him with pride, as if Steve was a picture she'd painted. It made him feel good that, for whatever reason, Pepper approved, even if he didn't understand it.

Tony was too put out with him to do anything but bite his tongue. He smacked Steve on the back of the head, and Steve ducked his head down to accept the wordless reprimand. Tony was right. He shouldn't have argued with Pepper so much. She meant well, but it made him angry to be handled like that.

"Tony, you ruined it! He was all Dom and cocky, and doing so well, and now you've made him Captain Stevie again," Pepper fussed.

Both men gawked at her pouting tone, affronted.

"It's an affront to patriots everywhere," Tony agreed.

"Well, it's true. Here, let me fix it. Don't you bite me, Steven," Pepper warned him as she left Tony's side and stepped into his personal space.

"Wha?" Steve squawked.

"Pep," Tony cautioned her.

Pepper payed them no mind. She used one strong hand to press up under the back of Steve's shoulders, which forced him to shift his balance higher or stumble. The strength of her hand was eerie, even more so because she used her other one to cup his groin and move his hips back into a more squared power stance. Steve hissed a breath in through his teeth at the feel of the slacks shifting over his thin mesh underwear, and the heat and pressure of Pepper's grip.

"Whoa, Pep. Playing with fire, there. Hot is good, but-

"Hush, Tony," Pepper murmured.

"Steve," she continued, "You are subservient to no one tonight, even if you mess up. You own everything, and you apologize for nothing. Especially not to the press. Understand?"

She removed her hands from him and he understood what she wanted. She'd talked about him acting Dom and cocky, and she hadn't liked when he'd shown remorse to Tony for making him worry about his girl. The guy his ma had taught him to be was kicking up a fuss inside Steve's head, but he silenced that little guy. She wanted him bold and unrepentant for the cameras. His whole look tonight was engineered for the show.

"I understand. Thank you," Steve said.

"Don't thank me," Pepper denied.

Steve nodded.

"Quit. You're making a monster," Tony said.

"It's only temporary, Tony. Just for-" Steve began.

Pepper shook her head at him.

"Noooo," Tony protested what Pepper was making Steve into, but he grinned.

Steve sighed, ducked his head and rubbed the back of his neck.

"Steven Grant Rogers, you get rid of every ounce of bashful adorableness before this elevator reaches the lobby," Pepper glared lasers at him.

"Hm. I'm adorable?" Steve asked with utter sincerity.

He looked at her through sinfully lush lashes and pushed his bottom lip out thoughtfully. Pepper's schoolmistress glare intensified, then transformed into a smile when she saw the sly twinkle creep into Steve's eyes.

"Oh. You're better than I thought you were. This is going to work," she said happily.

She left the elevator with her head held proud at her student's skills. Steve strode out after her, looking just as commanding and sure of himself as Pepper wanted him to be, even in his shamefully showy outfit.

"Wait. Did the Captain just…?" Tony said, confused.

He hurried after Pepper.

"No. The Captain didn't. Steve Rogers did. I'm beginning to believe that the things Barnes told us about him are true. We've only been getting half of him. If that much," Pepper said.

She waited for Steve to make excuses or try to defend himself for his adorable, sly manipulation. He didn't. He walked tall and proud, and there was indeed something of the Captain in him. He was treating the evening's press show like a mission to be completed. Steve was taking the goal as seriously as the Captain did his work in the field. That gave her confidence that it was a done deal.

"Half of him? Steve, you've been holding back on us? For two years?" Tony asked.

"It's called responsibility, Tony. I do what I have to do. Did you really think I was that one dimensional?" Steve said.

"Vanilla. Vanilla sounds so much better than one dimensional," Tony said.
Chapter 27

They were going in two cars. Steve, Tony, Pepper, Estrella, and Sam were in one car. Nat, Clint, Bruce, Thor, and Jane followed in the other identical limo.

"Looking good, old man. You know what's weird?" Sam looked Steve over as he got into the car, then asked.

"What?" Steve wondered.

"You're still wearing old man clothes," Sam pointed out.

Unspoken was the loudly silent 'but.' Steve could feel what Pepper meant by her comment about sexy underthings. She'd expertly manipulated his mood and his appearance, then amped him up by putting her hand on him in the elevator. He didn't feel like an old man at all. Sam didn't need to say it. The heat in Estrella's eyes when she looked at him told him.

"Hey," he said to her quietly.

She was wearing her necklace, but she only smiled and fluttered her eyes at him shyly. Good God, he wanted to pull her onto his lap and…

He couldn't think about it or he was going to make a fool of himself in front of a car full of friends. What was she wearing, anyway? Her smoky eye makeup was still there from this morning, and so was her up spiked hair with the red tips. She was in some sort of pantsuit, but it wasn't like anything he'd seen before. She was lean and pretty, and the outfit clung to her in ways he thought she wouldn't be comfortable with. She'd always hidden so much, on the street. She wasn't comfortable. As he looked at her, she squirmed and tugged at the shoulders and low draped neckline of her clothes. Her arms moved as if to cover more of herself up.

"Eya. You don't have to wear that. Did Nat make you put it on? We can go back," Steve told her. Her discomfort made it so that nothing else mattered to him. The press and Captain America's image with the public could go hang. Pepper opened her mouth to remind Steve not to act the 'nice guy' tonight, but Tony touched her with caution in his eyes. There were some things with Steve that you didn't mess with. Taking care of Estrella was one of those things.

"S'fine," Estrella whispered, "I don't want to go back."

She was saying she was okay with it, but she was still acting hesitant. Steve moved across to the opposite seat which Sam and Estrella shared. Smoothly, he scooped her into his lap.

"Look at what Pepper's got me wearing. It's worse than the shorts and sandals, huh?" he said.

"No. It's good. Really good. But I don't like so much skin where people can see," Estrella said.

Sam shook his head and let it fall back against the seat. When the two of them got to talking, it was too cutesy to be real, but it was. He didn't know if they were the best of kindergarten playmates, or if they were all going to asphyxiate on the sexual tension. Or both, which was near intolerable.

"Neither do I," Steve murmured.

Steve got sucked into the same sense of cynical comradery he'd shared with Estrella when they'd first met. Her eyes flashed over both of their outfits, and around at the interior of the limo and rolled especially hard at Tony. He completely understood. The world they lived in was unbelievable.

"And then they're gonna sit us in a fancy restaurant with appetizers and bread and soup and salad and three courses and dessert and coffee afterwards, with wine or drinks all through it. Can you believe this muck? It makes me wanna bring it all out in the street, or take some over to Bucky, or something," Steve muttered to her, but he was smiling.

Traffic was tight, and Steve tried to pretend to pay attention to it through the heavily tinted windows, but Estrella's weight and presence kept drawing him in. She wasn't leaning against him, just perching, with his hand lightly touching her lower back. Her pantsuit had flared legs over her pointy boots, which barely peeked out of the hems. Red bled up the legs in wispy streaks that seemed to contrast and compliment the red in her black hair. From the knees up, her outfit was creamy white. The legs were loose, but the outfit hugged her from hips to bosom, where it draped and lay in slinky, luxurious folds. Her neck, shoulders, and arms were mostly bare, which was making her antsy.

Skin. All that smooth, tawny skin. He wanted to touch. Anywhere. Everywhere.

Steve choked on a suppressed groan of want. Tony chuckled, but they ignored him. Steve lifted his hand and touched a finger to a hard gelled tip of her hair.

"Don't touch. You'll make it fuzzy," Estrella told him.

She batted at his hand and felt to see if he messed up her hair. The gesture was girly and so characteristic of her habitual fussiness with him. Steve was tempted to mess up all her hair just to have her make that grumpy, indulgent face at him some more.

"Uh. It's messed," she said.

Indeed, he saw where the pressure of his finger had ruined the sharpness of one of her spikes. Steve licked his fingers and twisted the tuft of hair back into a point. Estrella grimaced at him.

"Great. Now I have spit in my hair," she said.

"Sorry. Ever since this morning, I've wanted to know what it felt like," Steve said.

Sam guffawed in the seat beside them, and Steve poked an elbow into his friend's side.

"Stop apologizing," Pepper and Estrella said together.

"Alright, alright," Steve droned.

"Estrella. I need Steve to be sort of an unapologetic, sexy asshole tonight. You can do romance and giggles, but not him. He's got a role to play for the cameras," Pepper interjected.

"I know. Natasha told me. Why does everyone care that you beat on Bucky, anyway? They should trust you and see that there's no video of you actually killing him, because if there was video of that, it would be all over the place. It's not like anyone thinks you make lace doilies for a living. What's the scandal about?" Estrella asked.

"They're used to seeing me either acting officially as part of the Avengers, or kissing babies and marching in Veteran's day parades. My discussion with Buck was… unsanctioned. Nobody likes seeing me off the leash. It makes them nervous, since we took down Shield. It makes them wonder if I might someday get a mind of my own," Steve explained.
"That's disturbingly astute," Tony said.

"If you ever do want to retire Captain America so you can be unsanctioned Steve all the time, I know how to-" Estrella offered him happily.

Steve pressed a finger to her lips. He'd gone far too serious for their joking conversation.

"Eya, there's talk that even friends don't want to hear. Some of us have a circumstantial record of changing sides. You don't want to paint a target on yourself in front of Jarvis and everybody. It's better left unsaid, but I appreciate the sentiment," Steve told her.

Estrella's eyes shifted nervously around.

"I was just joking," she whispered.

"Nothing seems to fly on patient confidentiality around here anyway, so I'm just gonna say this," Sam spoke up, "You two have your own thing going, and that's good. There's no natural privacy in our lives, not even from each other, and that's not so good. Tony, you're used to that, but the rest of us aren't. Steve. Estrella. You have to learn that some things need to wait to be said or done without the rest of the gang as witness. Like what you just said, things shared in innocent confidence can come back around to make you regret. We're all in the honeymoon love-fest with each other. But be careful. Think of Obadiah Stane."

"There's a pleasant memory. Thanks, Sam," Tony said dryly.

"You think I could forget? With Shield being Hydra, and my best friend trying to kill me? The nation I died for is being eaten up from within and transformed into something I don't recognize anymore. I'm all dolled up right now to go dance for the public's approval when I already bleed for them near every week. You think I don't remember betrayal well enough? Think I need a refresher right this fucking moment?" Steve bit out.

Sam put up his hands. Steve's tense, still posture was way too ominous for those who knew him well to be comfortable trapped in a car with him. His use of language in front of the ladies had Sam and Tony exchanging glances.

Estrella turned to Steve and buried herself against him. She pulled his hands to her bare upper back and rubbed her face along his neck. He released a pained breath and tried hard not to clutch at her with the angry strength in his hands. She'd given him the touch of her skin for comfort, and it dulled his tension into something less volatile.

Sam, Pepper, and Tony saw the way that Estrella's touch eased him. The tight anger bled out of Steve's body while Estrella encouraged his touch. Pepper looked away from the two of them, trying to give them a moment. Sam seemed to feel likewise. Tony observed avidly.

Pepper tugged at his hand and made a long-suffering face at his voyeurism.

"If they're gonna put on a show, I'm gonna watch. Everyone's always watched me. It's my turn," Tony said.

Estrella stopped petting Steve and gave Tony the evil eye. She was still sitting sideways across his lap, so it was easy to give Tony dirty looks. She didn't like the way he was watching Steve. There was heated appreciation there, almost like he was looking at a woman. She wanted to hide Steve when he was like this. He looked so appealing tonight, and his temper and attitude made him irresistible to the eyes. It was like the private parts of him were exposed, and she wanted to cover him up and protect his dignity. Steve wouldn't want to be ogled like this, not by his friends, not by a man. Steve had his head leaned back and his eyes closed, so he wasn't seeing Tony, anyway.

Tony's curious eyes and his brash observation served to cool off Steve and Estrella's display of affection toward each other. Steve eased her back out along his thigh, away from the full body contact they both wanted.

"I shouldn't have gotten angry with you, Sam. I know I'm being an ass tonight. I'm-

"Don't apologize!" Pepper and Estrella snapped at him.

"Rragh!" Steve growled back at them in frustration.

"Hang on, big guy. Thor's not here to hold your hand, and I don't have the suit. We don't need a Cap-out here in a confined space with soft targets," Tony cautioned.

"I'm sorry you're so frustrated. If you can't keep it together, we should cancel and go back home," Pepper said.

"I'm fine. Just stop complaining about every breath I take. Pepper, I'll put on a show if you say I need to, but you gotta give me room to breathe. I'm not a puppet," Steve said.

Estrella rubbed her hand along his arm. Steve took a calming breath, then eased her off of him and onto the seat. He slipped back across to sit on the other seat. Estrella pouted at him. He agreed. He didn't want to leave her alone, either. It wasn't bare skin, but Steve touched their shins together in the foot space. It was better than nothing.

Pepper looked him over while Steve slumped grumpy and agitated beside her. He crossed his arms and stared at nothing. The stupid underwear made a spectacle of him, and his veins and muscles were prominent because of his agitation. His skin felt hot, so he was probably rosy like a fuckin kid.

He'd been angry lately. He'd been horny lately. Right now he was both, and it was difficult to be civil. Pepper was staring, speechless. Estrella was trying not to stare, but failing. Tony frowned slightly as he watched the women. Sam was resting his face in his hand.

"Steve. Be a sweetheart. Sit up and act like your usual prim self before the ladies maul you. That might be a lot of fun to watch, but now is not the time," Tony said.

"This is what Pepper wants me to be. Right, Pep?" Steve asked.

"It's a bit… much," Pepper squeaked.

"Get me out of this car," Steve said.

"Right now? We're almost there," Pepper said.

Tony noticed the tight simmer of control Steve was hanging onto. This was so not good. He rapped his knuckles against the glass to get the driver to pull over. They were stopped in traffic anyway. Steve didn't wait for the car to get curbside. Soon as he heard the door locks disengage, he was out on the street in the evening air.

Tony got out after him. He looked to the other car and shook his head. Steve and his damn long legs were already getting away through the crowd on the sidewalk. He did his best not to shove into people in his haste to catch up. A little maneuvering and quick legwork had him slipping into place beside Steve.
"Shut it, Stark," Steve said.

"I didn't say anything," Tony said.

They walked past the restaurant they had reservations to, and Tony dug something small from his pocket. He clipped it to his shirt collar, then spoke.

"Pep, you guys go in and get seated. We're gonna walk it off. We'll be back before appetizers get to the table," he said.

"Do you require surveillance or assistance?" Jarvis answered him.

"No. Scram, J. We're just walking," Tony answered.

Steve had energy to burn, and Tony kept up while he burned it.

"Maybe you should leave for a while. Go put your head in a different place. Take some vacation time," Tony suggested when Steve's brow finally started to uncrimp.

"Maybe," Steve agreed.

They both knew it was an impossible idea. Things with Hydra in D.C. were shifting and moving. Steve had to be close by and ready to act. He appreciated that Tony was trying to help him daydream the stress away, but he couldn't actually run off.

"If you're not gonna take any time off, then something needs to change. I know you can't… with Estrella. I know some people. Women, I mean. I'm sure Jarvis still has contact information. They can be discreet, if the price is right. You should think about it," Tony suggested.

"I'm way past thinking. I'll do the song and dance for a little while tonight. But I need you to keep Pepper off my case. She's like…" Steve paused for words.

"Yeah. But she's about to make me lose it. We don't need a domestic dispute on the news, to bookend right along with my discussion with Buck earlier. Look at these fucks, already," Steve said.

Tony glanced around and noted the way people were starting to notice him and Steve, especially. He put a friendly hand on Steve's shoulder and tugged him around to head back to the restaurant.

"Look. I know you're struggling. I've been through it different times, for different reasons. All you have to do is hold it together until you're alone. Then you can go ape-shit all you want. Got it?" he advised.

"Yeah, I got it," Steve said.

They were walking back to the restaurant they'd passed up, and Steve and Tony were making their best effort to paste on pleasant public faces, because a few people were pointing and had their phones out.

"Let's review, because I know you're dealing with a lot, and it might be messy in there," Tony murmured low, and indicated Steve's head with a finger.

"The news suggested you might be acting as a lone agent, unsanctioned, like you said. So, we mingle together, flash some smiles, and have a good time. Team unity. Cap's not crazy, and all that.
Don't fight anybody," Tony's eyes flickered down to his pants, "Don't fuck anybody, and we'll be alright."

"But that's all I wanna do," Steve told him honestly.

"I can see that. But you can't do it here. Later. Not here. God, I can't believe I have to coach you on this like you're my teenage son. I'm so glad I'm not a parent," Tony said, then he introduced himself to the hostess and they were ushered to a large table in the back of the restaurant to join their party.

Tony sat beside Pepper, and Steve sat between Clint and Estrella. It was a popular place. A group of musicians was playing Mediterranean music, people were dancing, and the wait staff was moving around a lot. Steve shifted his shoulders as people walked behind him. His hearing was on alert for anything. He didn't like having his back to part of the room, but somebody had to take that position, and he was honest enough to admit that right now, it should be him.

Natasha prodded his leg under the table. He looked up from his food and she gave him a fake smile and laughed at something Sam was saying. Right. They were supposed to be jolly. Steve focused more on his team and tried hard to ignore his body.

He thought he smiled at the appropriate times, and the tried to laugh and look relaxed, especially when he was aware of phones aimed at them. Estrella set her arm on the table beside his and rubbed the back of her knuckles along his hand. He smiled in thanks to her. It helped some. But having her next to him, with all that skin begging to be touched, kissed, licked…

Steve grit his teeth. He didn't like the way Thor was acting, either. Since he'd come to the table with Tony, Thor looked at him only in glances, or not at all. It wasn't like him. The big Asgardian was always direct and unflinching, especially if something was wrong. Jane was meeting his eyes more often, and that was just strange.

Why was Thor making it weird? Steve understood what had happened in his gym. Did Thor think he was gay, because he'd allowed it to happen? If he did, then what did that make Thor? This was bullshit. Why did it have to be a thing? Everyone thought he was a delicate little man who couldn't handle things. He was fine, and the worried looks from around the table were starting to snag his temper the wrong way.

Nat prodded him again, hard, but she didn't look at him this time. She smiled and nodded at something Pepper was saying. Steve set down his water glass with a thunk.

"I may be on edge, but you're all making it worse. Quit with the worried looks and the fake laughs. I'm fine. And before I get to 'not fine', I'll leave. Suck it up. Quit looking to me like a bunch of worried nuns," Steve told them low and precise.

The waiter was away, and nobody else was listening, unless they had a device Jarvis couldn't detect.

"Alright. You're the boss man. We take our cues from you, and your cues are all wunked tonight. It's like we're at work and you're shouting gibberish into the comms. Tone down the psycho caveman vibes and we'll all settle," Sam said.

Clint nodded. Bruce's calm smile added his agreement. Thor looked at him with some kind of remorse. Steve sat back and eased out a calming breath. The overhead ceiling fan circulated cool, soothing air against his neck into the open collar of his shirt.

Pepper aimed her finger pre-emptively at Steve and pointed firmly. Yeah, he remembered. No apologizing.

She grabbed his hand and stood up. The dance floor wasn't too crowded, and it looked like half the people on it didn't really know what they were doing, so Steve went with her. The song was bouncy and cheerful, and most of the men were sort of clapping and stepping while the women did fancier things and twirled around. Steve loved the eager smile on Estrella's face. For her, he would try. They were supposed to be having fun, anyway.

Some guys to his right were doing a thing with their legs while they clapped along with the music. It was easy to copy, so Steve did that. Estrella didn't have a plan. She danced happily and he reached out to touch her or help her twirl around when she came close. There were some people talking about him at a table next to the dance floor, but Steve ignored it. The song ended, and Estrella bumped into him and laughed. His hand felt good on her back.

Apparently people were curious about them as a couple, because Steve heard several phones snap pics of them while he smiled at Estrella. Pepper should be pleased. He would look happy because right now, he was. Gossip would speculate about the girl he was with. Some would say nasty things. He could disregard that, as long as it wasn't too bad. He wondered if anyone would link her with the scruffy girl from the coffee shop.

The next song was a couple's dance, and that was easy, too. All they had to do was hold each other like everyone else was doing, and amble around the room. Every now and then, the dancers would shout some word toward the ceiling along with the music, and that was fun by the time he could anticipate and copy it. Estrella was laughing at him. As long as she kept her feet in close to center so he could move them around without danger of stepping on her, he could relax.

Steve loved touching Estrella and moving with her to the music. It was freeform and simple. No one was being critical and watching him for missteps. Mentally, he thanked Pepper for choosing such a place. He didn't know how she knew exactly what kind of dancing happened here, and that this would be an easy start for him, but he wanted to hug her for it. Again, he was sorry for giving her a hard time.

He was a huge, throbbing grump, and the ladies didn't deserve his attitude. As the song came to a close, he looked down at Estrella.

"No. I don't want to hear it. You're sorry for everything, all the time," she leaned against him and up, "You shouldn't apologize for being yourself. Not to me, anyway. I like who you are."

"Even when I'm being a dumb animal?" he asked at her ear.

"As long as you're not about to hurt anybody, then yes, even then," Estrella smiled.

Carefully, Steve drew her to him so that their middles were pressed together. Something different was happening on the dance floor. Everybody was clearing off, and the band switched to a more technical, dramatic song. A traditionally costumed couple took the center of the floor, and Steve paid enough attention to get out of the way. Estrella relaxed against him, and they turned sideways to the floor so they could both watch.

It was an intense, erotic dance, something like Spanish flamenco. When the male dancer touched the woman's gracefully displayed knee and pulled her toward him, Steve's body reacted to the primal suggestion of the move. Estrella glanced up and giggled at him nervously. His lips opened to apologize, but she shook her head at him, then turned her attention back to the dancers.
The couple stalked each other across the floor, the woman leading and then the man. He spooned behind her and they swayed back and forth, then burst into a flurry of complimentary steps. It was like watching a heated argument with bouts of makeup sex. Steve could feel his pulse hammering in empathy. He'd love to have a strong woman to fight with and to love with. Gently, he brushed his fingers between Estrella's shoulders. She could never be that for him, and it still stung. He wanted it.

When he looked down to see if Estrella was happy or bored, he found her looking up at him instead of at the dancers. She wanted it too, and it would be harsh to explain to her why they couldn't. It wasn't her fault she was fragile. It was only fair to tell her they would never work out before that look in her eyes got any more sad and longing than it already was.

The song ended, and other people clapped while the dancers bowed and smiled. The band put on some recorded slow songs while they went on break. People hurried to the dance floor, crowding it more than it had been earlier.

"Enough with the eye-sex. Here, swap," Tony said beside them.

He held out a hand to Estrella, and Pepper moved to take her place with Steve.

"Ah! Just do it," Tony cocked his head at Steve when he started to protest and reached for Estrella. Tony danced Estrella away into the crowd on the dance floor, and the only reason Steve didn't go after was because Estrella was smiling at Tony. She liked how well he danced. She was happy.

"Come on. If you don't dance with me, there are about fifty women in here who will take my place," Pepper said.

Steve looked at her, and her eyebrow arched up, daring him to apologize.

Instead, he took hold of her and led them onto the floor. Pepper was a wonderful dancer, and her strong, graceful body unobtrusively tugged him around. All he had to do was get the cadence of his steps right by flickering his eyes around and observing other dancers. It was a waltz. Easy. He could do this. Pepper let him watch, learn, and practice. By the time they'd gone around the floor once, his enhanced ability to pick up on physical skills had him feeling confident.

"Thanks a million, Pepper. I thought dancing would be harder. This place is great," he told her.

"I don't know why you were concerned. You're a fast learner at everything. I think you were anxious more about the partner than the dancing itself," she said kindly.

There was a twinkle in her eyes that acknowledged his constant state of arousal this evening, but she was classy enough to say nothing about it. The waltz was close, and he was truly leading now, not just being pulled along. The dance pushed him at her with every step. He thought maybe Pepper wasn't doing much to avoid the contact, because she could keep more distance between them if she really wanted to by stepping back an instant sooner.

Steve watched the better dancers on the floor, observing some of the personalization and flourishes they used. He wouldn't do any fancy stuff. He wasn't ready for that, but he felt comfortable with the basic waltz.

"Why?" he asked Pepper lightly.

"Why, what?" she asked.
"Why so close? Won't Tony mind? If he was dancing this close with Estrella, I'd-" Steve clarified neutrally.

He didn't want to reject or insult her. He liked and respected Pepper when she wasn't being so bossy that she angered him.

"Because Tony understands. We're in love, Steve. Not dead. He trusts me. I trust him. Well, mostly. He's still an idiot sometimes. And I told you, this might get a little personal. You're an attractive man, Steve. This is normal. A girl can be flattered instead of insulted by it, you know, even if it's not about me," she explained quietly.

"Besides, if you appear exclusive with Estrella, that will feed more fires we might have to put out. If you haven't already done enough damage with the eye-sex. Did you see how many people were taking pics of you before Tony and I cut in?" she said.

"No more lectures, Pepper. Please. Just tell me what you want," he said.

"Dance with Natasha. Maybe with Jane, if Thor can stop acting strange. If there's anyone else here you can tolerate, dance with them too. Don't spend every moment salivating over Estrella," she said.

"Why not?" he asked crossly.

Steve guided her carefully around an obstruction on the dance floor. It felt good to grip and push and not worry so much about her feet. Pepper was sturdy, despite her slimness. She followed his guidance effortlessly, and something about that heated his base brain again. Tony and Estrella passed by alongside them, and they all smiled politely at each other.

"You like to lead," Pepper noted from his resurgence of interest against her tummy.

"It's what I do," Steve told her simply.

"You're good at it," she observed, "You should explore that."

Steve cocked an eyebrow at her, then looked over her head. He wasn't certain what she meant. The waltz ended, and Steve gave her a little bow, as he saw the other couples doing. Tony and Estrella joined them.

Another rollicking, fun song was next. Thor and Jane, Natasha and Clint joined them on the floor. Steve knew he was really off his game, because now Darcy was here, dancing with Sam. He hadn't noticed her arrival.

This was another song where the men stood around the outside, and this time, the women danced for a bit, then moved to the next partner to their left. Steve was fine with the simple moves required of him. He smiled with Pepper and Estrella, then grinned in appreciation to the spice Natasha brought to the song. He laughed with Lewis, who had her own flavor of gypsy-like moves. Jane was so awkward and earnest that he smiled kindly and encouragingly. Then, it got weird.

A blonde woman was nearly hyperventilating because she'd just danced with Thor, Sam, Hawkeye, Iron Man, and now Captain America. He plastered a polite smile on and was glad when she passed to the next man. After that was a dark woman who really knew how to dance. He had no clue who she was, but she was athletic and not out of breath. He didn't have to pretend to enjoy partnering with her. As she passed on, she dragged lingering fingers across his chest. He shivered and smiled at the next woman.
She was a chubby brunette, and all smiles. He liked curves on a woman, and her good humor was infectious. Her thinly concealed leering was tricky to manage without going into rudeness or bashfulness. The thin blonde woman after her was all handsy, and he had to reach out and guide her hands away as she continually tried to grope him in a southward direction. He smelled alcohol on her, but she was sober enough to dance.

Mercifully, the song ended. Soon as the blonde woman was away, Tony laughed beside him.

"Was she trying to feel you up, too?" Steve asked.

"Yeah. She did. It's all in fun, Cap. Too bad your fuse is too short to handle it," Tony told him.

"My fuse isn't short," Steve insisted.

"Metaphorically speaking, my friend. We can all tell you don't have any lack of… fuse," Tony teased.

Steve laughed a little, and then Natasha was there to partner him as the band picked up their instruments again. He looked around for Estrella, and found her with Sam. That was good. Sam knew to be careful with her.

"Way to make a girl feel like chopped liver, Steve," Nat told him.

He started to say something, then shut his mouth. Nat smiled at him and her eyebrow arched subtly. The witch. She was trying to trip him up and make him apologize when he wasn't supposed to. Practice. It was always challenge and practice with her.

"I like chopped liver," he said.

"Liar," she smiled and wrinkled her nose at him.

"Yeah, but I'm getting better. If you didn't personally know that I hate chopped liver, would you have known I was lying?" Steve asked.

Nat listened to the opening notes of the music and stepped closer to Steve, into his arms.

"It's difficult to say. Listen, Steve. Do you want to sit this one out? Take a break?" she asked.

Steve took note of her offer. The music sounded strange. Sort of stumbling and hesitant. Many couples had left the floor, including the rest of their friends. Nat was giving him a chance that she thought he might need. Something about the patronizing, slightly superior offer rankled at him.

"Nah. I'm good," Steve said.

"I warned you. If you start fucking it up, I'm pushing you off the floor and you're going to let me," Nat warned him.

Steve nodded. He listened to the strange music and picked out a pattern. It was a beat of three, a pause and a lilt, then a beat of four. It sounded middle-eastern. Sensual. The dozen or so other couples appeared to be doing their own thing, freestyle. It couldn't be so bad, with Nat to help him. She taught him a lot of stuff. She could teach this, too.

Natasha smirked at him, then tugged him out more onto the floor. He could hear people taking pics of them already. He forgot about that as Natasha put his hand at her waist. He glanced around one last time and saw the other couples doing some pretty exotic things. No rules, then. They could make it up as they went.

Natasha waited for the pause and lilt, then arced back, putting her weight into his hand. Her shifting her foot forward between his telegraphed what she’d been about to do and Steve shifted too, sliding his leg along the inside of hers. Easily, he supported her as she arched and swayed beautifully, then snapped back up on the next beat. Steve double-timed an advance on her, and she retreated, moving in an alluring, female way that she rarely used in the training room. He understood. It was like the flamenco-style couple who had danced before.

Her hand on his chest pressed him into a halt which he obeyed because it was a dance, not a fight. Like a fight, though, he didn't give ground easily. He bent over her firm hand and made a quick nip with his teeth at the spot behind her ear. There was some noise in the crowd, but he tried to ignore it. This was fun. More than fun.

He wrapped his hand around her neck, set his feet and gripped her hip, then spun her until she fell into his other arm. She undulated smoothly up and into the next set of beats, which she accented with a mesmerizing shimmy of her hips. Steve followed close behind, stalking her along the dance floor with is back arched and his hand around on her tummy.

They swayed together through the pause and lilt, then Steve snapped her away from him with a spin of his arm that would have had any other woman crumpled on the floor. Natasha spun the momentum aside and pressed against him in a rush. They stepped through several beats of the drum, then Natasha slunk around behind him. He reached back to press her close so he could feel what she wanted him to do. If they weren't touching, he might miss her cues and fumble.

Her hand gripped his hip, her knee pushed his leg forward along with their weight. Then, her fist in his hair pulled his head and body back into an arch that only a strong man could support on the strength of one leg. Steve gripped her thigh behind him because it seemed the thing to do. People made some more noise, and he grinned as Nat tugged his hair on a hard drum beat, then pushed him back upright, and forward.

Steve took the handling smoothly because he could feel her intent each time she was going to move. The drum beat got harder and a little faster, and a few couples gave up and left the floor. Steve was steady grinning now at the challenge of keeping up with Natasha and thinking of challenges of his own to throw at her. It was like sparring, but with a heavy splash of sex. When he got a little too rough, she gave him a look that reminded him to keep it tame for the public. The music helped him remember this was a dance.

The last minute of the song was a flurry of advance and capture, evade and accompany. She balanced his weight, then he balanced hers. There was a grace and nuance to it unlike the brutal force of fighting. Her skin showed red in a few places where he had gripped too hard, but Nat could take it. She was grinning as wickedly as he was. His blood was up, and sweat slicked his skin.

The music, heavy with drums, ended with them face to face, teeth bared and panting. His fist was in Nat's hair this time, his thigh aggressively between hers, and she was off balance, but trusting him to hold her while all her weight rested on one of her toes. The other was dug into the back of his calf muscle.

The crowd in the restaurant erupted into hoots and roars and clapping. Natasha and Steve fell apart laughing. He high-fived her and she hip-checked him hard. They walked off the dance floor to where their friends waited. There had been only two other couples still dancing by the end of the song. Steve tried not to think of that, and all the video that was probably hitting the internet now.

"That was amazing!" Estrella thrilled at him.
Her eyes were ablaze with joy and she clapped her hands and bounced before hugging him hard. Steve hugged her back and winced as he started to pat her back too hard. He eased up just in time. Estrella wiggled excitedly against him and pushed away. She made a face at getting his sweat on her, but smiled at him anyway.

"I didn't know you could dance like that! I thought you couldn't dance?" she asked.

"I didn't know I could either. Turns out, it's something like fighting. Nat, you were great. Thanks for the cues. I could have messed that up so many ways," Steve said to Natasha.

Thor was smiling at him broadly. Sam shook his head and rolled his eyes. The rest of them looked sort of quiet and shocked. Pepper was thinking hard, not necessarily looking pleased.

"I knew you would do well if you had the right mindset. That was impressive, Steve. Especially for a beginner," Natasha complimented him.

"Impressive? That was nearly pornographic. Captain America has just gone from scrappy street brawling to public indecency, all in one day," Tony said.

"Don't be so American, Anthony. Dance is an art form. It's not indecent. It's an allusion to life. Like a painting," Natasha said.

"Like a porn painting. Pepper? Do we own YouTube? How much of it do we own?" Tony asked her.

"Natasha is right. Relax. As long as Steve dances with Estrella next, and makes it something slow and sweet, it will be good press. And we don't own YouTube," Pepper said.

"Our friends are here," Thor said dryly.

Steve could hear them. The press had arrived. Not huge, fully equipped crews, but a few discreet journalists were working the crowd, getting comments and pics and video links. A particular blonde journalist was headed for where the Avengers stood. Pepper pushed Steve toward Estrella. He took the hint. He pressed Estrella to him and moved them out onto the floor.

Estrella looked at the woman who knew to approach Pepper with her microphone and questions. She looked at Steve, worried. He moved them step by step along in the simple, swaying dance.

"Are you worried someone will have pictures of you?" Steve asked her.

She didn't answer, but her silence was enough. It told him that she didn't want to seem weak and frightened, but she didn't want to lie to him, either.

"You're with me, Eya. Nobody gets near you now, unless you want them to," he assured her.

She shook her head and he could see her switch topics in her mind.

"What was it like to dance like that? Will you teach me? Or should Natasha teach me so I can dance with you?" Estrella asked in a rush.

Her smile was back and he was happy to let her forget about the press.

"It was like fighting. Or flying. Like solving a puzzle. I had to use my mind just as much as my body. It was hard to not use combat moves. Different," Steve told her.

"You looked amazing, Steve. I'm jealous, but I know nobody can dance like Natasha. Especially not with you, so I have to enjoy the beauty and put the jealousy aside. If I want to see you dance, that is. And I do," she babbled.

"Jealous? Eya, you've got no need to be jealous. Nat and me... it's work. I mean, it was great fun and it was flirty, which is even more fun, but it went well because of what we do. I can't dance like this with Nat," he said.

Steve jostled her in his arms gently. His steps were gliding more confidently now that he'd been dancing for a while. He wasn't afraid to step on her feet anymore. She looked at him questioningly, and Steve slid his arms more securely around her so that his hands clasped and rested below the small of her back. Her arms were pushed up around his neck, and Estrella melded herself to him and laid her face on his chest.

Estrella knew he couldn't dance with Natasha like this because this was how Steve was with her. Not with Natasha. He and Nat were partners. Combatants sometimes. What they had was strong and deep, but it was harsh. Estrella's heart warmed at the thought that Steve wanted her to have the softer part of himself. The part that he couldn't offer to Natasha without her eating it. She sighed.

"I love you," she said.

"Shh. Don't say that. You can't. We need to talk," Steve told her at her ear.

"You don't get to tell me who I can love and when. Don't be so big on yourself. I didn't say I was in love with you. I just love you, so shut up," Estrella fussed at him. He could feel her head trying to cock at him with attitude as she said the words. He smiled.

"Alright. I love you too, then. But I'm not good right now. I don't think I can be in love now. I'd mess it up because I'm stupid," he said.

"No. You're dumb. A dumb animal, remember. I should put a shock collar on you," she snarked at him.

Steve laughed as he danced with her. They'd be a collared pair.

"Would you make one for me?" he asked, and he brought his hand up to finger at her butterfly necklace briefly.

Estrella made a little whine in her throat that he didn't understand the meaning of.

"What?" he wondered.

"Nothing. It's just.. I don't know. Something," Estrella said.

She was embarrassed, he could tell. She was looking at him like that again. Like she wanted to kiss him. And maybe do other things. Steve sighed and squeezed her more tightly for a moment. He pushed her head back onto his chest and rested his chin carefully aside from her hair spikes.

"Why does that thought make you want me?" he asked.

It felt daring to ask something like that directly. To face how she felt. How they felt. Even though they couldn't act on it.

"Collars, Steve. Not necklaces. Collars. I could put a collar on you and train you like my dog. Are you really that stupid? How is that not hot?" she asked him.
She kept her head down because she didn't want him to see her biting her lip in frustration.

"Because I won't submit. You can't make me," Steve said.

Estrella chuckled and patted him on the back of the neck.

"Sure, Steve," Estrella smiled against this shirt.

She didn't need to argue with him now. She could remind him of this conversation later.

The song blended from one slow song into the next. They kept dancing. Steve must have been thinking of what she said about collars and submitting. Thinking about possibilities. In a moment, he was throbbing hard against her. He grunted.

"Shhh," she shushed him.

Estrella rubbed the back of his neck soothingly. Poor man. He was so naïve. But his mind was keen enough to follow through on an idea if she fed him the first crumbs of it.

"Your voice," Steve whispered.

She nodded.

"Not just that. But, don't think about it too much. You're too far away from your nightstand drawer," she teased him.

"Eya! You've been snooping? That's not fair," he frowned down at her, but there was a little smile trying to tug at the corners of his lips.

"Not snooping. Cleaning. You should have heard my aunties talk. Housekeepers know everything," she told him.

"I don't like my business out where people can talk about it. You see how it is tonight. I don't have much that's private. Help me out?" he asked.

"I won't tell anyone, silly. People are mean. I don't like it when they're mean to you," she said.

Steve stared at her. She made him feel so good. In so many ways. She was sweet, and caring, and fun. His eyes lingered on her lips until she made a goofy face at him. The song changed, and Steve noticed someone standing expectantly at his side.

"Lewis. Hi," he said, trying to sound nice.

"Hey. I can see that you want to be busy, but Pepper says I should cut in," Darcy said.

Steve looked around. Thor was nearby waiting to dance with Estrella. She smiled at Steve and went shyly to Thor. Darcy stepped up to him and the music seemed to be stuck on slow songs for the time being.

Steve hissed in a breath and grit his teeth. Lewis had great tits, and she wasn't afraid to use them.

"Hi," she said, then "Wow!"

Darcy laughed and snuggled closer.

"Are you part starfish?" Steve asked her.

"Oh, relax. Pepper seems to think that you need to spread your attention. She showed me your dance with Natasha. Which was intense, by the way. But then you're so in the zone and sweet on your chica. Share the love. I wonder what you've got for me?" she told him.

Surprisingly, Steve found himself able to relax with Darcy, despite the fact that her breasts pressing against his ribs and smooshing around while they moved was side railing his mind into nothing sensible. The song they danced to was a little faster, but still the hobble along sort. It had just enough pep to make Darcy's body jiggle distractingly.

"This isn't love," Steve told her with a smirk.

"It's teen love. My bits are excited, so I luuurve you," Darcy teased, then laughed.

Steve couldn't help but laugh too. Darcy was warm and soft. He gathered her closer.

"Maybe you should see a doctor about that?" Darcy asked.

"I'm gonna go see the doctor right after this," Steve grumbled.

"Really?"

"No."

"Oh. But maybe you should. Or, I could help. Seriously, I know we're joking, but I'd be willing to help," Darcy told him.

"Thanks, doll. It's tempting," Steve said.

"But you won't," Darcy frowned, "Why not?"

"Because this is nothing, and I'm not going to use a nice girl," Steve told her straight.

"Aww. I didn't know you thought I was nice," Darcy said.

"I don't think you're nice. I think other people think that you're nice. I take their word for it," Steve argued.

"Why do we hate each other?" Darcy asked.

"Because we want to fuck like minks, and we're good people, so we know we'd get our feelings involved, and we also know that our personalities clash, so it wouldn't work out, so we lash out to keep from fucking and making things painful and awkward for everyone we work and live with?"

"You're smarter than you look. But that doesn't explain you and Natasha," Darcy said.

Steve couldn't believe the conversation he was having. It was like walking around balls-out in public. It was shocking and exciting all at once. Kind of like jumping out of an airplane in a thunderstorm.

"The difference between me and Nat, and me and you is that you haven't earned my respect. Everyone has my respect at first, but you keep tearing it down. I want to like you, but you're like a constant slap in the face. Why do you do that?" Steve asked.
"Because I'm terrified of liking you if you're ever sweet to me. Like you are to your chica. It all circles back to that painful, awkward eventuality. It's better that you stay mad and keep acting like a dick toward me," Darcy explained.

"I see. That makes sense. But maybe you shouldn't have told me," Steve warned with a little smile. He only glanced down. He was trying his best to avoid connecting the feeling of Darcy's lush body to the sight and sound of her. He didn't need that kind of mental trigger.

"But you're a nice guy, other than how I provoke you. You won't try to manipulate me into your bed like every other douchebag," Darcy reasoned.

"I don't need a bed, Lewis. And I don't need to manipulate. Keep slapping me. It's a good plan. Why can't we shut up?" Steve asked her curiously.

"Same reason. Are you scared? I'm scared," Darcy said nervously.

"Don't be scared. Unless it's yourself you don't trust?" Steve said.

He gave up trying not to look at her. Her top showed magnificent, creamy cleavage, and her eyes were sinful yet scared. So tempting.

"Steve, you're trembling. It's seriously impressive, because you're managing to dance and talk at the same time. I think you're making a wet spot on my dress. Shouldn't you be concerned about that?" Darcy asked.

"Yeah. I probably should. I'd apologize, but Pepper won't let me. Darcy, I need to go or something bad's gonna happen. Could you please make sure Estrella gets home okay?" Steve said, low and calm. Too calm.

"You're not thinking clearly. She's with the Avengers. They're not going to leave her roadside. She'll be fine," Darcy said.

"Damn it, Darcy, I have to go. Promise me."

"I like it when you call me Darcy," she said.

She found herself unwilling to comply with his wishes, because the feel of Captain America trembling and hard against her was unbelievable. She knew as soon as she said what he wanted to hear, he'd be gone. He was already marking a path to the exit with his eyes.

"Lewis!" he barked at her, and grabbed her arms firmly.

The out of control look in his eyes was thrilling and frightening, like his hard hands bruising her arms. He stepped aside because they'd stopped dancing.

"I promise I'll see that Estrella goes home safe with Nat," Darcy said.

Steve was literally barely lucid. She could see a thousand thoughts and urges ripping around behind his eyes. He looked down her body, then shook his head. An instant later, and he was gone through the crowd.

"You should be careful!" she called after him.

Darcy held her arms in front of her in a way that she hoped looked natural while she hid the spot cooling on her dress. Sweet baby Loki, she'd never been more turned on in her life, and she was fully dressed in a room full of people.

End note: You know that feeling at the top of a roller coaster, when you're gathering your breath to scream because you know the bottom is about to fall out from under you? I have it.

Also, my eyes are tired. I have no beta. If you spot any typos, please feel free to PM me and let me know I missed something. I'll appreciate it.
Author's note: I did it again. It got too long and I had to chop it up into three parts. My brain needs Clorox! I'm not into drug culture and I know essentially nothing about it. The drug use references are all stuff I looked up on the internet, so if I get it wrong in my ignorance, I'm sorry. I used vagueness as a tool to cover my idiocy on the subject. I wish I could un-learn the stuff I read for this, but it had to go there. The middle section, chapter 29, has all the sex in it. If you're squeamish about that kind of thing, you better skip that chapter. Reviews are a balm to my tired eyes. These take a lot out of me. I write for 24 hours straight sometimes, and it tends to annoy my dear husband. Tickle me. Send a review. Or three. Some of your reviews have directly shaped the story, and I like to hear what you think.

Estrella kept her peace for as long as she could, but as soon as the five women were settled into the limousine for the ride back to the tower, she said what was on her mind.

"What did you do to him?" she asked Darcy with anger clear in her voice and her manner.

"We danced, just like he was dancing with everyone else. Pepper, are you sure it was a good idea to take him out in public? He's barely house broken. That was like junior prom all over again." Darcy said.

Darcy looked to Pepper, but Estrella was still glaring at Darcy. She observed the purpling marks on Darcy's upper arms. Then, she turned aside to look at the lingering red marks on Natasha's arms.

"It went better than I expected, except for the rough handling. Are you alright, Darcy?" Pepper asked.

She knew better than to ask if Natasha was okay. If Nat was sitting calm and smiling, she was some version of okay. They could all see that Darcy was a bit shaken. She was breathing through parted lips and fidgety. Jane bent to look more closely at her friend's arms.

"I'm good," Darcy said.

She shrugged away from Jane's attention.

"No need to tell the big guy. When we get to the tower, keep between me and Thor, kay? It's not Steve's fault," Darcy said.

She rubbed at her arms. The marks on Natasha were already fading, but Darcy was going to have bruises.

Estrella couldn't explain her anger. Part of her was jealous that that obnoxious Darcy woman had been the one to push Steve over the edge of civility with her squishy tits and her good hair, and her big blue eyes and her smart mouth. The other part of her was anxious that no one was going after Steve.

"Why aren't you going after him? You know he's going to Bucky, and he's going to be stupid again. What if he gets a disease?" Estrella turned to Natasha in her anger.

"Relax, Estrella. He can't get diseases, and he's very hard to kill. I'm more worried about the people he runs into than I am for him," Natasha said.
Nat sat back comfortably on the other half of the seat she shared with Estrella. The other women sat primly in their agitation. Nat sprawled and crossed her ankles in the middle of the floor.

"He will be fine, Estrella. Steve on a bad day is more controlled than most men. Try not to worry," Pepper said.

"I can't believe you people! Did you see his face? Right before he left. Did you see? Tony should go find him. And Thor. He's going to be stupid. I know he is. If none of you are going, then let me out. I can catch up to him," Estrella tugged at the door handle.

Traffic was moving in fits and starts, slower than walking speed.

Pepper leaned forward and touched a hand to Estrella's.

"Stop that. Estrella, there's no point in sending anyone after him. I didn't see his face, but we all saw his shoulders. We know he's tense. He's angry and determined. If we send Tony or Thor, it will only cause a fight. Short of a fully equipped extraction team, there's no bringing him back if he doesn't want to come. Even then, the effort would be messy and unlikely to succeed. It would do more harm than good to argue with Steve right now. You have to trust him. It's all we can do," Pepper advised.

"Well, he's going out there to get sex. Why did you have to rub yourself all over him? He's not good with that right now. You're a bitch to play with him like that when we all know he can't take it," Estrella said.

She looked sharply at Darcy, and no one liked the coiled stillness in her posture. Jane fidgeted and leaned protectively against her friend when she noticed how Estrella's hands were clawed at the seat upholstery. Darcy pushed Jane away and leaned forward, daring Estrella to make a move with the set of her chin. Her hand moved toward her purse.

"Estrella. No more," Natasha said calmly.

Natasha put her full attention on her roommate in such a way that Estrella knew an attack against Darcy wouldn't get anywhere. Estrella huffed a sigh and sat back against her corner of the seat.

The silence was tense. Blocks creeped by. Estrella tried texting Steve, but he didn't answer. She dropped her phone on the seat and stared out the window.

"He doesn't realize that he was too rough with Darcy. He was barely aware of it when he was dancing with me. He's got a problem that he needs to work on, Estrella. We have some sympathy for what he must be feeling, but-" Natasha said.

"If you have sympathy, then you shouldn't provoke him! He doesn't like losing control. It embarrasses him," Estrella said.

She looked resolutely out the window, as if she might see Steve among the evening crowds on the sidewalks. The quiet during the ride was awkward, and Estrella was too angry to care if the other people in the car with her were uncomfortable. She hated feeling helpless. Waiting. She didn't trust Bucky to keep Steve out of trouble. Something was going to happen.

When the cars reached the parking garage in the tower, Estrella flew from the limo.

"Estrella, wait!" Darcy called out to her.

She wanted to be alone in her room. If no one else was going to help Steve, then she at least wanted to shut her door and pray for him in the quiet.

The borrowed boots were hurting her feet, and they were too noisy as she strode toward the elevator. She was in a hurry, because she didn't want to be stuck in a box with these infuriating people. Not with that Darcy, and not with the men.

An expansion seam in the concrete caught her pointy boot heel and jerked her to a stop. Estrella pitched forward with barely any time to put her hands out and catch herself. It wasn't a bad fall. She'd had worse. Much worse. At least no one was kicking her while she was down.

Before she could get to her feet again, Natasha was there. With the strength of a man, she pulled Estrella up and onto her knee. Bruce hovered anxiously and caught her hands as Estrella tried to push away from Natasha.

"Hold still," Bruce told her.

"Let me go. I'm fine," Estrella said.

Bruce stared her down while he felt of the bones in her hands, then up her arms. His intent eyes made her behave more than any words would. She knew what Bruce was, and for once, she felt a little intimidated by him. He was going to do what he wanted to do, and what he wanted to do was to feel her bones. Estrella sat on Nat's knee and waited until he was done.

"I told you, I'm fine. Look, I only skinned my hand," she rotated her wrist to show them.

The heel of her right hand was red and raw where she'd scraped it on the concrete. It stung and reminded her of riding her bicycle when she was little. Natasha stood with her, and Estrella pushed her away. Darcy gave her a worried look as she hurried on to the elevator. The Avengers hung back and let her go, except for Nat.

"Leave me alone," Estrella said as she got in the elevator.

"Darcy told me that Steve wouldn't leave until she promised to see you safe up to your room. She handed responsibility off to me, so I'm going with you and tending to your hand," Nat said.

"You're all like puppets. Do you think I can't find my way to my room?" Estrella snapped.

"He's our commander. Unless I have damn good reason, I do what he says," Natasha said.

Estrella resented Natasha going with her to their bathroom to wash her scuffed hand as if she was a child. The woman's hands rotated her wrist and felt of the small bones there.

"No pain?" she asked.

"It only burns where I scraped it. Go away," Estrella said.

Natasha got out the antibiotic ointment and smeared some into the scrape.

"He cares deeply for you. He ran because he's afraid of hurting us. Hurting you," Nat said.

"I know," Estrella said irritably.

"We'll figure this out. Don't go. He needs you," Natasha told her.

"I'm not leaving," Estrella agreed.
She walked out of the bathroom and Nat heard her door close.

Natasha's phone buzzed. She looked at it, then left Estrella alone in the suite.

The Avengers waited tensely in the living room for Natasha to join them. Tony didn't like the way Thor was standing and frowning, worrying about something in his head. It wasn't like the big guy to hold something in.

Sam, Clint, and Bruce sat and waited while Tony went to the bar to fix himself a drink. When Natasha arrived, she stood across the rug from Thor.

"Bruce?" she asked.

It was him who had texted her and asked her to meet them. Everyone understood that they didn't want to discuss Steve down on the Avenger levels in the conference room. They tried to keep their communal living space free from business and to only do pleasant things here, but there was independent surveillance down on the office levels. It was agreed that Steve's problems needed to stay off the records as long as they could keep it that way.

"Is she alright?" Bruce asked.

"She's upset about Steve running off. Her hand is good. I applied ointment and she went to her room," she said.

"Enough about the girl. What of Steven? If you would accompany me, Natasha, we may yet find him and intercede in whatever folly he has planned," Thor said.

"It's not like you to ask. If you're so worried, why didn't you go?" Tony asked.

"I cannot. The journey would be afoot. I am aware that your city is of a different character at night. I would have Natasha with me, as she knows the wherefores of avoiding undue trouble and attention," Thor said.

"You're assuming that somebody needs to go after him. Leave the man alone. He just needs to let it out some," Sam said.

Tony lifted his drink to that and Clint nodded.

Bruce shook his head and sighed.

They looked to him. Bruce shared a look with Thor, and Thor nodded.

"What?" Tony asked.

"Steve came to us for monitoring. I'm checking his blood four times a day. Over the last week, his testosterone levels have risen steadily. Normally, the more testosterone the body releases, the more it's absorbed and neutralized. This evening's reading was unusually high, and his body's not neutralizing it like it usually does. It's circulating free in his blood, twenty-three percent more testosterone than his baseline from all previous medical records. A non-enhanced man would have been incarcerated for assault or rape by now. I'm concerned," Bruce told them.

"And you're just now mentioning it? With that much free T, he's a bomb, walking around out there waiting to go off," Tony said.

"We piss him off more than any stranger on the street. Let him go. He'll find something to do, and then he'll come home," Clint shrugged.

"You do not comprehend the severity of the problem," Thor said.

Everyone turned to him.

"What aren't you telling us?" Nat asked.

"I will keep his confidence. Yet I tell you that we should go," Thor said.

"What happened in his gym after I left?" Natasha persisted.

"His gym?" Tony asked.

He looked from Nat to Thor and back.

"Yesterday, they were beating the shit out of each other like I've never seen. Thor asked me to leave, so I did. I trusted you with him, Odinsson," Natasha said.

She narrowed her eyes at Thor.

"I am unworthy," Thor said.

"Unworthy? As in Mjolnir unworthy? Is that what you meant by 'afoot'?" Tony asked.

He came around from the bar and stood a few feet away from Thor.

Thor nodded once, concisely.

"If we can't figure this out so that he can manage his sex drive and aggression, we have to consider that Steve might become unfit for duty. He did some extraneous damage on our last mission. That's not like him," Bruce pointed out.

"Well, that's just lovely. What happens if Hill calls us to assemble?" Tony asked.

No one looked terribly concerned about that.

"Wait, what did you do? In the gym?" Clint asked Thor.

"I am not at liberty to say," Thor said.

"Pepper and Darcy said he was severely bruised and coughing blood, but he healed fast. Faster than usual. That's got to be part of what's going on. His serum is doing something. Something more," Natasha told them.

Bruce nodded.

"We need to retrieve him before he adds guilt to his conscience, though it is my opinion that it would be unearned. I tried reprimanding him for his lack of self-restraint, and as a result, Mjolnir has shunned me. He sought out punishment from me for his imagined guilt. When I gave him what he seemed to want, I lost use of my weapon. This tells me that Steven is not to blame. Whatever rides him does so against his will. He is strong, but a man can only bear up under so much," Thor said.

He looked to Natasha, then away.
"You think I'm too delicate to hear that Steve is in rut? Isn't that what you're saying?" Natasha asked.

"I would not have used such a raw word. It is beneath his dignity," Thor said.

"You had sex with him! In his gym. Who topped?" Clint said.

Natasha strode forward and smacked Clint before Thor or Tony could do it. Everyone was frowning at Clint. He rubbed his head where Nat had cuffed him. It was a friendly reprimand, and he'd expected it.

"I did not. Not as you say," Thor denied stiffly.

"But you did something unworthy. So now you're grounded. And Cap is a lawsuit waiting to happen. Bruce, you should have told us things were this bad for Steve. I thought he was just going through delayed puberty, long overdue. I'm going," Tony said.

He set his drink down and headed for the elevator.

"Stark, wait," Natasha said.

Tony stopped.

"Don't. You'll only call attention to whatever he's doing. Jarvis?" Natasha said.

"How may I help?"

"Has he reached Barnes yet?" Nat asked.

"The surveillance device in Sergeant Barnes' apartment is just now picking up a footfall cadence which is likely the Captain's. I believe he is going up the stairs. I should have confirmation… Yes. The Captain has reached Sergeant Barnes' apartment."

"Thank you, Jarvis. Guys, let's leave him to Barnes for now. Wait until Steve gets back, and we can discuss this with him. You know he'll be harder on himself than any of us will," Natasha suggested.

Steve hated running in slick bottomed shoes. There wasn't enough traction. Really, it was more of a jog. Walking wasn't fast enough. It didn't burn enough energy. Twice, he had to stop and brace himself against a building because the friction of the damn pants against the goddamn underwear almost made him lose it right there on the sidewalk in front of God and everybody.

In the crowds, he could skim around and run. People gave him rude looks, but nothing more. When he got over the bridge into Brooklyn, running would have caused too much attention. So he walked fast. With purpose. He had several blocks to go. By the time he'd gotten to the old neighborhood, he'd been harassed by five street gangs and he'd smashed sixteen phones before their owners could send out video of the fights.

Steve didn't feel bad about it. He hadn't asked for the fights, and he didn't want the attention. He wasn't sure if anyone knew who he was, since he was moving so fast. The men who got in his way and asked for trouble were left groaning on the sidewalk while he moved on. People yelled at him for destroying their phones, but when he dropped men in front of him with a tap of his fist to their temples, they left him alone.

Motherfucking phones. He hated them. If they were so precious, then people shouldn't pull them out and wave them around.

He didn't want Buck to see him coming in hot, so he slowed down when he rounded the corner onto the street. The girls tried to waylay him, but he was focused. He had to get to Bucky. Buck would know what to do.

The fellas across the way called out and waved when they saw him, but Steve only waved back and went up the steps into the building. The front door was shut, but not locked. He took the stairs three at a time and ignored the people who stood in their doorways talking. They watched him go by, but he didn't care.

Buck's door was just right there. He eased out a smooth breath of relief. He lifted his knuckles to knock. A familiar, metallic action sounded behind the door, and Steve arched his body aside.

The thunder of a shotgun firing rumbled and echoed down the stairwell. A hole exploded from Buck's apartment door, and lead and splinters streaked the air. People yelled and ran, and doors slammed throughout the building.

"Buck! Stand down, it's me!" Steve called out.

He stayed aside from the door, though a shotgun slug could penetrate the wall just as easily.

There was a moment of quiet, then slow, heavy footsteps. Bucky opened his door, shotgun in hand. He was naked, except for a pair of shorts. His hair was down and messy, and his jaw was darkened with whiskers again.

"You're reckless. Why didn't you text or call first?" Buck growled at him like rocks moving underwater.

"I was in a hurry. Sorry if I woke you. Hey, get outta the way. I'm coming in," Steve said.

He shoved past Buck and into the dark apartment. Buck gripped the shotgun upright in his left arm and swung his door shut with the right. Soon as the door was closed, he pulled a shell out of the waistband of his shorts and shoved it into the receiver, replacing the one he'd fired. Steve kicked the empty, ejected cartridge toward the trash can in the kitchen.

"You been having trouble around here?" Steve asked.

"Only when you come around," Buck said sourly.

He took a raincoat from the hook behind the door and hung it on the nail in the back of the door instead, so that it covered the hole he'd blown in it. Steve stood in the middle of the dark room, easy enough to see with the street light coming in through the curtains.

Buck looked him over as he moved to his chair and sat with the shotgun across his knees.

"I was sleeping. Ron's working my ass like a mule. What do ya want?" Buck asked.

"Everything, Buck," Steve said.

"I'm not your fairy godmother. My magic wand only does one trick, so unless you want somebody dead, I'm the wrong guy," Buck said.

He rested his hand on the shotgun and yawned.

"You're just the guy I need. You have connections. Numbers you can call, right?" Steve asked.
"What kinda numbers? You gotta tell me what you want, pal. I'm not a mind reader," Buck said.

Maybe he was. Steve looked all messed up. His fancy shirt was torn open down the front, the buttons missing. He stood there with his hands twitching at his sides, huffing. Used to, that woulda made Bucky nervous, but not anymore. Stevie could do whatever he wanted to him, and Buck would let it happen. He owed too much. He'd let Steve take him out if he thought he should. But that's not what he was here for. With his shirt ripped open and hanging aside, there was a clear view down Steve's middle.

"Heh. You want me to call a girl for ya?"

"What kinda more?" Buck wondered.

His hands indicated what kind of girl he was talking about. One with curves and some meat on her. He needed high quality goods, then, not just a holler out at the street.

"You said 'everything'. What does that mean?" Buck asked.

"I want to try everything I've been missing. C'mon Buck. Don't you think we should live a little? We made it. Everybody's been trying to kill us, but we're still here. What're we here for? Let's go get some stuff. Some dames, too. I don't have time for the nice ones. You gotta call us some of the other kind," Steve's voice went low and eager, already rumbly with anticipation.

Buck laid his head back and sighed.

"I can make the calls. Get you some shit that might even work for you. The girls too, but I got work tomorrow. I'll help you get it all, then I'm back in bed," Bucky said.

"No you're not. I had work tomorrow too, and you fucked it up. You're taking the day off. Get up," Steve said.

He turned to the old television, where Bucky still had Stark's surveillance device sitting.

"Jarvis, tell Tony I said they can stand down. I'll be back tomorrow. 'Til I get back, Nat's in charge," Steve said.

He picked up the small device and crushed it between his fingers, then rolled the metal into a tight little useless ball. With a toss, it went into the kitchen trash.

"Yeah, we should probably get going anyway. There's plenty small caliber fire around here, but not..." Buck said as he got up. He handed the shotgun to Steve and went into his bedroom to dress.

Steve stood propped against the doorway and waited impatiently for Bucky to get ready. When Bucky flicked on his bathroom light and went in to start shaving, Steve followed and frowned at him.

"Why do ya hafta shave?" he asked.

Buck glanced aside at Steve and shook his head.

"Look, if all you wanted was low dollar poon, we could go as is. With what you want, we need a nice place. They don't send out that kind of girl to a neighborhood like this. You got cash?" Buck asked while he scraped a razor over his face.

"Yeah," Steve said, "a few thousand."

"That might do. They're not gonna want to let you in with your shirt all torn. Are you sure this is what you want?" Buck asked.

"I can't think of anything else, Buck. I've tried... a lot of stuff. It's making me crazy. I know this isn't like me, but I don't know what else to do," Steve said.

Steve would have seemed sad and disappointed in himself, Buck thought, but the edge of aggression in his stance, the distended veins under his skin, and his barely contained energy was making him too antsy. He was almost like a kid who needed to pee. Squirmy.

Buck rinsed and wiped his face, tied back his hair, and shrugged into a nice shirt that went with his dark jeans. He looked at Steve's pants and shoes, then went into his closet again.

"Here. Put this on," he said.

He handed Steve a shirt not too different than the one he'd been wearing with all the buttons ripped off. The fact that Steve didn't argue, and set to work at changing like an eager puppy had Buck frowning again. Now that he was fully awake and observant, he was concerned.

"Steve," he said.

"Hmm?" Steve hummed absently, fixing the last button.

"Steve," Buck said again.

"Don't wear it out. What?"

"You're high as fuck already. Outta your head. I don't think I can take you on anymore unless I get nasty and do some real damage. If we do this, you gotta give me your word that you'll do as I say. Illegal isn't exactly your flavor, and if you see shit that you don't like tonight while I'm getting stuff together for you, you gotta stand down and keep your mouth shut. Can you do that?"

It was a little of a relief to see Steve pause in his headlong rush to illicit pleasures and think about what he'd said. Good to know that Steve was in there somewhere, behind whatever was driving him. While his urgency was on pause, Buck noted that he looked a little scared.

"Buck, I don't trust me right now, but I trust you. I'll do as you say," Steve agreed.

"Good enough. Let's go," Buck said.

He pulled some cash out, and got a different phone from a drawer. The shotgun went up into the vent in the ceiling, and then they were out on the street. While they started walking to the corner, Buck made a call. He spoke in Russian, in a cold tone that made the hairs on the back of Steve's neck prickle. Steve decided that he didn't want to check the contact list on Buck's second phone.

They got in a cab and headed to a coffee shop. When the cab let them out, Buck waited 'til it drove away, then Steve followed him down the block until they reached an alley. Down the alley, Buck led him to a steel door with thumping music inside. There were people standing around outside, and Steve was just getting an eyeful of them when Buck grabbed his sleeve and pulled him inside.

They went past the bouncer who sat inside the door, and Steve didn't know where to look as Buck pulled him along. It was almost all men in the place. There was a lot of black leather and straps and skin. Piercings and… was that a rubber hose hanging out a guy's pants, flopping as he danced? A big part of Steve wanted to be horrified at what he was seeing, but the crude and blatant sexuality of the patrons' behavior appealed to him, too. Another guy, incredibly young looking, walked by in nothing but stretchy shorts. He must have been wearing underwear even more outrageous than Steve was wearing, because his junk was extremely prominent, and an honest-to-god dog's leash threaded out of his shorts, up his chest, and back over his shoulder like jewelry.

Steve felt like he'd fallen down a hole he needed to climb right back out of. His feet stomped to a halt, and Buck's grip slipped off his arm. Buck had been leading him toward a door at the darkened back corner of the large room, but he stopped. He leaned close to Steve, and for a moment, the look of the Soldier faded from his features.

"You want me to leave you here, Stevie?" Buck asked with a grin.

"I don't know. Just hurry," Steve said.

He shoved his hands in his pants pockets and drew his dignity about him, ready to wait in the middle of the craziness until Buck came back from whatever business he had. Buck tapped his arm with his fingers.

"Alright, but don't look bashful, or the bears'll get ya," Buck teased him.

"Bears?" Steve asked, looking around in confusion. He took his hands out of his pockets and didn't know what to do with them, then he crossed them and set his feet apart a little more.

"Never mind, Goldilocks, just don't cause a scene while I'm gone. You promised," Buck reminded him.

Steve nodded once, determined to behave and wait. Buck eased back into his badass persona and left him. Steve tried to keep his eyes drifting around the room without landing on any one thing for too long. Another young guy came by wearing not much of anything, and he offered a platter to anyone who looked his way. Steve wanted to shake his head in denial at the man, but he smiled up at Steve and offered his wares. There were oddly shaped rubber things and metal things laid out. His mind did some spacial manipulation of the presented objects and the possibilities made heat rise to his face.

Steve shook his head and tried not to frown too hard. God, how long was Bucky gonna be? If he'd called ahead, then-

"Tell me what you're looking for," a gruff voice said behind him.

Steve turned a little. There was a large man standing there in tight jeans and a see-through shirt. Silver nipple rings glinted in the strobe that was flashing on the dance floor. The man had a full beard and he was heavier built than Steve, almost as tall.

"Not a damn thing," Steve said.

"We're all looking for something," the man persisted with a clearly predatory smile.

He stepped closer until their chests were almost touching. Steve could smell his sort of herb-spiced breath. He could take the man down in a heartbeat, but he'd promised to be nice and not start trouble.

"I've already got what I'm looking for," Steve told him firmly.
The man opened his mouth to say something else, then his eyes shifted and he took a step back. He put his hands up.

"Sorry, man," he said to Bucky.

Steve could feel Buck at his back, still and threatening. The man disappeared into the crowd in a hurry. Buck’s hand pushed him forward, and Steve was glad to get back out into the alley, then the street. They went to the bus stop and waited.

"What was-"

"Don't ask. Not now," Buck told him.
The bus took them over the bridge and closer to Steve's part of town. When they got off, Buck made another call. It sounded like he was placing a take-out order, but with human descriptors. He pointed to an all-night diner and Steve went inside ahead of him. They ordered coffee and waited. Steve was feeling, if anything, more revved up than he'd been before he sought out Bucky. That bar. The images… Those guys weren't afraid to hunt and take what they wanted. It wasn't Steve's preference, but the heady sexuality of the place made him think and imagine.

"Stop that. I wouldn't have brought you inside if I'd known it was gonna mess with your head, but it was just as risky to leave you outside with all the wanna-bes," Buck said over his coffee.

"The things they had. There was a lot of gear," Steve said.

"So you wanna start a toy chest now? I can send you a few web links," Buck offered with a smile. He got out his phone and began tapping at the screen.

"No! I mean, maybe. I don't know," Steve grumbled.

Buck snorted a laugh and put his phone away.

"How do you know all this stuff, Buck? Did you know it before, or while you were…?" he glanced at Bucky's left arm, which was covered in a long sleeve, with a brown leather glove on his hand.

"Hydra throws its goons some wild parties. If I was thawed and had a long mission, they sometimes had me along. I don't remember all of it, but-" Buck frowned, then shook his head.

A white limo pulled up curbside in front of the diner. Buck got up and Steve followed him out. A man from the front passenger seat got out to open the wide rear door for them. Steve was struck with momentary shyness as he saw long, curvy legs and beautiful women waiting inside. Three of them. He ducked in and sat down next to one when Buck gave him a little shove.

"Hi," he said to the girls.

Buck got in and settled across from him, between the blonde girl and the redhead. The brunette next to him rubbed his thigh and smiled at him. Bucky passed him an envelope and nodded to the front of the car, where the handler was waiting. Steve passed the envelope to the man, who checked it. The man nodded to the driver, and the car pulled out into traffic. Steve was a little uncomfortable with the transaction, but only a little.

The women smelled good, and looked good. All the smooth, creamy skin on display was distracting, especially since he knew these women were here for him. The blonde girl looked him over and smiled a naughty smile, until she studied his face. Her eyes went wide and her mouth fell open in surprise.

Steve shook his head at her.

"Shhh, not tonight," he said.

She was thinking she was going to get fucked by Captain America. He could almost see the thought on her face. He'd never felt farther from heroic. The other girls looked at their co-worker, then at Steve. They didn't get it, and he was glad. One perceptive dame was bad enough. It was too bad that thoughts of non-disclosure agreements had to pop into his head just now. Displeasure must have shown on his face, because the blonde leaned forward to rub his knee.

"Sir, I'm Tiffany," she said.

"Grant," Steve told her.

He looked to the redhead.

"I'm Sarah," she said.

"No, you're not. My mom was Sarah. Pick something else," Steve grimaced.

"Ew. We can't have that. Unless you're into that. But, you're obviously not, so… Natasha?" she offered.

Bucky chuckled and shook his head. Steve grimaced strongly. With her red hair, it was too much, even though her body language was completely different from the Widow.

"Jo-jo?" she guessed hopefully.

"That works. Nice to meet you, Jo-jo," Steve said.

Both of the other girls had touched him already, so he figured that was a thing to do. He leaned forward a little and brushed his fingers up the inside of her calf. No nylons. Steve knew nylons weren't popular anymore, but it would have been a nice detail. Her skin felt nice, but it wasn't good like…No. He couldn't think of Estrella right now. Not for several hours.

The woman looked relieved to have the name-game settled. These girls had a little more dignity than some he'd seen, but they still felt anxious to please. Steve turned to the woman on his right.

"I'm Miranda. It's nice to meet you, Mister Grant," she said.

Steve started to correct her so she wouldn't call him Mister, but the fun gleam in her eyes had him letting it stand as it was. Before anything else could happen, the limo turned into the front entrance of a hotel. A very nice hotel.

Steve offered his hand to Miranda while Buck took Tiffany and Jo-jo. The hotel staff came to take bags from the trunk. The handler preceded them to the desk to confirm reservations and get the key card.

"We will return for you in the morning," he told Bucky.

Buck nodded and accepted the key card.

The ride up to their room was quiet, and Miranda lightly rubbed his side and smiled at him. Steve didn't feel the urge to blush. There wasn't any uncertainty or painfully polite conversation.

Their room was a suite with two bedrooms, two baths, a nicely upscale living room, and a small kitchen tucked away around a corner. The lighting was soft and mellow, and the place smelled fresh. Everything was immaculately clean and perfectly decorated. Bucky tipped the man who handled the women's luggage.

"Is there anything else I can do for you?" he asked.

"Certainly, Sir. My name is Chandler. I will be happy to assist you with anything you desire," he told them.

Steve nodded, and Chandler left.

Tiffany brought her bag into one of the bedrooms, and Miranda took the other. Jo-jo went to the full bar and offered to fix drinks. Steve smiled faintly at Bucky and they let her serve them.

Bucky had chosen well. Each of the women was tall and beautiful, but not delicate. They'd still break with too rough handling, but they had enough muscle and lush curves to protect their bones some.

"Go ahead and take the edge off, Sir," Buck suggested and he nodded toward the room Tiffany was in.

Steve got up with his drink in hand. He went and tapped politely on the doorframe to the bedroom. Jo-jo settled onto Buck's lap and smiled oddly at Steve.

"Is he always this polite?" she asked.

"Most of the time, until he has reason not to be. Don't get too comfortable. You're not for me. You're for him," Buck told her as her hands started to wander over his chest.

"I am? What about Miranda? Is she for Mister Grant, too?" Jo-jo asked.

"Yes," Buck said.

Jo-jo looked a little confused, but she stopped asking questions.

Steve walked toward the bed, where Tiffany waited for him. Just like the dancer, Angel, at the strip club, he was sure her name wasn't really Tiffany. But then, he wasn't really Grant. Not like he wanted the other girls to think.

When he stepped close to Tiffany, she reached for him eagerly. She smiled and ran her hands over his thighs, then cupped the bulge in his pants. Steve hissed in a breath between his teeth, but smiled encouragement at her with his eyes.

"Ooh. That's not a look anyone would think to see on Cap-

"Hush, now. I told you already that that's not who I am tonight, any more than your name is Tiffany when you go home to see your family," he told her sternly.

She bit her lip and nodded.

"And don't mention it to Miranda and Jo-jo. It's safer for you if no one knows," he said.

It was hard to keep his voice steady, because she was tugging at him gently with one hand while her other hand was starting to undo his clothes.

"Safer?" she asked.

"Yes. Safer. Don't talk and you won't have to worry about it," he said vaguely.

She slipped her hand into his downed zipper and rubbed him over the bright red mesh. Steve clenched his jaw and shut his eyes. He tolerated it for a moment, then pushed her back onto the mattress. Tiffany grinned and scooted back up onto the pillows of the king size bed. Steve crawled over her and took a mouthful of a pink nipple he could see through her sheer top.

It felt like licking through nylons. He liked it. Tiffany worked at tugging down his pants and unbuttoning his shirt. Buck's shirt was tight on him, so she had to almost peel it off him.

"Sir, you're amazing. So beautiful," she enthused as she ran her hands over his chest and sides.

Steve looked at her.

"Handsome, I mean. You're very handsome. But I'll let you in on a secret. Women can think that men are beautiful, too," she winked at him.

Steve looked at her impatiently, then bent down again to lip at her neck. She got the message that he didn't care for or need compliments.

Her toes pushed his pants down the rest of the way, and Steve shucked off his shoes and helped her get rid of the pants. A little subtle work with his toes had his socks on the floor, too. He was dying to get the tight constriction of the goddamn freakish underwear off, and Tiffany's hands were at his hips to help him with that. He let her do that while he enjoyed her bountiful chest. He couldn't stop his hips from pushing at the hand she was rubbing on him while she tugged down the dreadful undies.

"Hey," Buck said from beside the bed.

Tiffany turned her head to look.

"But Sir, you promised," Bucky reminded him.

Steve gave one last suck at his toys and looked at Bucky.

"Use this," Buck told him, and laid a condom package on the bed.

"Right," Steve frowned at it.

Buck crossed his arms and dared him to go back on his word.

"Alright. I will, now git," Steve agreed.

"Yes, Sir," Buck said.

The door closed behind him, and Steve started tugging at Tiffany's pretty outfit. He kicked the red mesh monstrosity off his feet and had to stop and breathe for a moment when his cock fell against her full thigh.

"You want me to help with this, Grant?" Tiffany asked him.

She picked up the condom and opened the package. Steve nodded. He wanted to see her hands on him. He throbbed harder at just the thought of someone touching him. Somehow, Tiffany was less abrasive than the waitress from the sports bar. He looked down in the lamplight while her small hands rolled the cover over him. She pinched the tip and massaged him through the latex. Steve groaned at the feeling and noted with pleasure that there was a shadow of pubic hair under her panties. He wanted to see her, and it was taking too long.

Without hesitation, he ripped away the sides of her panties, then tugged them off of her with a hooked finger. With a finger curled beneath her neatly trimmed fur, he could feel that she was hot and wet.

"You ready?" he growled at her.

Her hands pulled at him and Steve had enough of waiting. He pushed forward until he knew he was where he needed to be, then he surged forward and in. Tight heat made his eyes roll behind his lids, but the shriek that Tiffany made snapped him out of his pleasure.

"Too much, too much. I'm sorry. I don't usually have this problem, but you're... big," she babbled.

Her hands patted at his shoulders and her eyes were squeezed shut. Steve backed out just as Buck hurried into the room. His worried look stabbed Steve between the shoulders and made him want to lash out.

"What's wrong? She shouldn't sound like that," he fussed.

"I'm so sorry. I'm alright. Just, maybe stay a little shallower?" Tiffany suggested.

"Grant," Bucky said in disappointment, "you gotta go easy on the ladies. Do I really hafta tell you that? Ease off. Let me check her."

Steve bit off a growl, but he sat back on his heels. His dick was angry and insistent at the interruption, and so was he. He kept quiet as Buck murmured sweetly to the girl and used his fingers to check for any blood. The marginally concerned part of Steve's mind watched to see that there was no blood. Buck gave him a warning look on his way out.

"I got it," Steve told him, then "Tiffany, are you hurting?"

"It's okay now. Please, go ahead," she said.

Her eyes were a little wide as she looked down at his sheathed cock.

"I'll be careful," Steve promised.

Slowly, he remounted and tried again. He watched Tiffany's face for signs of discomfort. When he was almost all the way in and felt a delicious pressure at the end of his dick, she patted his arms and looked at him pleadingly. Steve took a few calming breaths and shook his head. Something about her imploring him to be gentle was prodding him to do just the opposite.

"Okay," he whispered tightly.

The shrieking and the interruption and the damned rubber were making things less fun than he'd imagined it, but it still felt good. Bothersome thoughts tried to intrude, but he set his gaze on Tiffany's succulent body and distracted himself. As he moved carefully and she began to trust that he was going to be kind to her, she smiled and touched his chest. Her smooth hands felt good on him. Her heat felt so good around him.

Steve groaned and shut his eyes in bliss. It was difficult to remember to stay shallow when he was coming. Tiffany's nails clenched into his shoulders did a good job of reminding him. When he was done and the terrible aching pressure in his groin was eased, he looked to see Tiffany biting her lip. She clenched around him and wiggled her hips some.
"Tiffany, did you?" he asked.

"I don't need to, but it's kind of you to ask," she said.

"What if I want you to? Is that okay?" he offered.

She smiled and nodded at him, still biting her lip. The insistent little wiggles of her hips became more pronounced, and Steve smiled too. Now that his urgency was off, he was more than happy to see to her.

He braced a hand above her shoulder and used his other one to grip her hip. With careful, slow strokes, he worked at her until the color rose in her cheeks and her nipples drew up tight despite the fabric that confined them. She was looking at his body like she was dumbfounded or daydreaming or something. The look of surprise that suddenly overtook her did something to him, as did the tightening of her vagina around him. It was very good, and when the clenching flutters started, he was gone again with her.

"Thank you, Sir," she panted at him when she was done biting her lip.

"My pleasure, ma'am," Steve grinned at her politely.

Another flutter clenched her insides, which caused Steve to pulse, too.

"We better, um..." Tiffany suggested.

She glanced down at where he was still pressed into her. Steve didn't want to leave her warmth.

There was a tap at the door, then Buck let himself in.

"You're phone's blowing up. Has been for a while. What do you want me to do?" he asked.

"Take a look. Do I need to be anywhere?" Steve said.

While Buck was thumbing at his phone, he eased out of Tiffany.

"No. It's nothing critical. Just some ranting and nagging from some people you know. Quite a few of them. I think you can ignore it. Hey! Don't you know how to use that thing? You can't put that much, or it's pointless," Buck fussed at him.

"Are you gonna be like this all night?" Steve asked.

He went around Buck to the bathroom to clean up.

"Only if you make me. Maybe you don't know, but those are single use. Like a crack-barrel. One shot and you're done. Gotta eject and reload, Sir," Buck taunted him.

"Yeah, yeah, James. I'll do better next time. You can take the nagging phone and your nagging tongue right outta here," Steve said over the sound of water.

"Are you his butler?" Tiffany whispered to Bucky.

Buck and Steve laughed.

"Sure, doll. I'm his battle-ready body butler. I hand him rubbers, and all the mortars he needs. I dig trenches, too. I'll even shine your boots, pal, if you pass me a smoke," Bucky joked.
Tiffany looked confused, then figured that it was an inside joke between them. After all, they must be pretty close if James was allowed into the Captain's presence during sex without much of a fuss.

"Shut it, James, and don't you have something better to do? How about I pass you a smoke after you pass me one first?" Steve suggested.

He handed Tiffany a warm wet cloth and walked around the foot of the bed to get his pants.

"Sure, but I don't think smoking it'll do you any good. Tiffany, why don't you take a nice bubble bath while we wait for dinner?" Bucky suggested strongly.

She moved to do as she was told, but bit her lip again when she noticed the red marks her nails had left on Steve's shoulders.

"I'm sorry about that. I won't do it again," she said.

"Don't apologize. I liked it," Steve told her.

There was a strange moment while Tiffany stared at him with something a little too close to fangirl adoration, and Bucky gave him a crooked grin that was all Brooklyn and no Soldier. Steve walked out of the bedroom barefoot and shirtless. It was great to be touched, and to ease the strain he'd been feeling, but that look from Bucky was going to gut him in front of the girl if he stood there and took it.

"Damn," Jo-jo whispered as he walked into the living room. Steve knew he wasn't meant to hear her, so he ignored it. Miranda gave him the eye, too, but Bucky came crowding behind him and aimed him at the other bedroom. Once inside, he shut the door, then pointed to the unused bathroom.

Steve went in and the lights flickered on by themselves. Buck came in with a little baggie of something, and a fine, sharp knife in his hand. He held the knife up where it was easily seen and waved Steve at the floor.

"You want me to lie down?" Steve wondered.

"Sure. Get comfortable and wait while I get this ready," Buck said.

He set to work at the marble countertop. Steve winced at the cold, cold tile floor on his naked back and looked over curiously.

"What is that?" he asked.

"The usual stuff, just stronger. I hear they've bred the plants nowadays to make it more concentrated. Still, this never did anything for me, and it probably wouldn't for you, either. That's why I'm chopping it fine and putting it under your skin," Buck said.

"Isn't that a little extreme?" Steve wondered.

"Heh. Not for us. And don't be a pussy. You've been under the knife so many times you could probably do surgery on yourself. If we want the rush, we gotta pay the price, you and me," he told him.

"Sure, Buck. I'm ready," Steve said.

He lay on the floor quietly, listening to Buck's sharp little knife chop and grind at the gray-green stuff he was preparing. When it was minced small enough, Buck scraped his work into a hotel water glass and turned to Steve.

Bucky straddled Steve's ribs and plopped down solid on his belly. Steve whuffed out a breath and made room for knees in his armpits. Buck set the glass down on the tile next to Steve's head and Steve turned his attention to the fine powder.

"C'mon, punk, look here. It's like the dentist. I can't work in your mouth if your head's turned. Open up," Buck said.

He held his small black knife in one hand and stripped off his glove with his teeth. Silver metal flashed in the light. Steve felt a little strange about the whole thing, Buck sitting on him, and the stuff in the cup, and the sex, and the fact that somebody was fixing to cut in his mouth. But he opened up.

Bucky was quick. His metal thumb opened Steve's jaw more, then pulled his cheek aside. A slice with the knife, and Steve paid more attention to the warm, iron tang of blood trickling to the back of his mouth than he did to the pain. Buck set the knife on his chest and grabbed the glass with his flesh hand. The sting of the cut increased to a hard burn as Buck used his thumb to stretch it open.

"Don't breathe for a sec," Buck said.

He tipped the crushed herbal substance into the pocket he'd made with the cut, then set the empty glass down so he could use his softer flesh fingers to hold the cut closed over the drugs. Steve swallowed blood. That part was comforting in its familiarity, at least. He didn't care for the feel of a foreign substance under the skin of his gums. That stung, too. It was a small pain, everything considered. They both waited. When Steve felt the skin heal together, he nodded to Buck.

"Wasn't so bad, huh?" Buck asked.

Apparently there was going to be another round, because Bucky was preparing more of the stuff. Steve got up and went to watch. There was a small lump under his skin, and his tongue worried at it. With another glass, he rinsed his mouth clean.

"Not too bad. Is that for you? Do you heal fast enough to not scare the girls with bloody teeth?" he asked.

"No. I'm staying clean tonight. Somebody around here has to have their head on solid. Go lie down. I'll do the other side."

Steve eyed the stuff skeptically while Buck scraped it into the glass.

"How do you know this works? For us?" he wondered

"They played around with this body a lot. I didn't forget everything," Buck said.

"I'm sorry, Bucky. If I'd known you were still alive, I would have fought harder. I wouldn't have-"

"Eh. Shut it. I mean, open it. Don't talk with knives in your mouth," Buck said.

Steve kept quiet while Buck repeated the procedure at the other side of his upper gums. Buck looked menacing, hunched over him. He felt vulnerable, with a man holding him flat on his back, but it was only Buck, he told himself. Some hair had come loose from the back of Buck's head, so Steve reached up to push it behind his ear. Buck made a face at him. He was pouring the stuff in the other cut so he didn't have any hands available to stop Steve from doing whatever he wanted.
Buck looked down at him indulgently and smiled.

"Yeah, look at ya. Getting all soft and relaxed. I haven't seen that look on you in decades. This shit is working. Healed up yet?" Buck asked with his fingers in Steve's mouth.

"Mrrf," Steve garbled and nodded.

His hands relaxed and fell to Buck's hips. Bucky made another face at him, then he was up and off. He reached a hand down to offer a help up, but Steve shook his head. He got to his feet, then jumped and shook a few times like a boxer.

"I feel floaty," Steve said.

Bucky laughed and cleaned his knife in the sink.

"That's great. I told you this would work. I can tell you're feeling it. You're getting pretty mellow. Here, rinse, then swallow. If you've got any loose crumbs in there, it's better to keep them in than out," Buck told him.

Steve took a drink and swished, then swallowed.

"While I've got you in here and all happy, listen," Buck said.

"Mm-hmmm?" Steve asked. He sounded goofy, even to his own ears. He turned and grinned at himself in the mirror. Buck was right. The shit was working. He could feel his body trying to absorb it and heal his gums. It was like having shrapnel, but for a pleasant, recreational purpose.

Steve swiveled his head to look. Yup. His bones felt slippy, like maybe he was made of cartilage. Like a shark. He made teeth at Buck. Bucky smacked his cheek a little to call him to order.

"You can't get off twice in the same rubber. If one of these girls gets a piece of you, it'll be a nightmare. Got it?" Buck reminded him.

"Yeah, we don't want any trouble. Buuuck. This is fuckin grand," Steve smiled.

"Ah, shit. Listen up. Just one more thing. You gotta go easy on em. I know they're big, healthy girls, but-"They're still soft. So soft," Steve agreed.

"Right. So, watch your hands, and your strength. And your depth," Buck tutored him.

Steve rolled his eyes and his hand, encouraging Buck to be done with the lecture.

"Are you hearing me, Rogers?"

"I am. Not more than once, and take care of the soft stuff," Steve droned.

"I could eat," Steve agreed.

They followed their noses to where Chandler had brought dinner. The ladies were setting things up on the kitchen bar and the little table that had two chairs. Buck pushed a loose-limbed Steve at a stool and took his spot at the table.

"This is like my kitchen. I need a table. Why don't kitchens have tables anymore? A mom needs a table to put the food on," Steve said indignantly.

He was distracted by Miranda and Jo-jo moving around him to pour the wine and uncover the desserts. The girls had taken some time to get into sexy little outfits like Tiffany had been wearing.

"You're pretty," Steve told Jo-jo.

"Thank you, Sir," she said.

"I'm not Sir," Steve argued.

"I'll call you whatever you want, sugar," she agreed.

"Sir is fine. Or Grant," Bucky insisted.

That got a frown from Steve, but only until the cover was taken off his plate. He fell to like the soldier he was, and Buck wasn't surprised to see him pause a moment to pray over his food. It seemed that packed with a little herb, Steve was more relaxed and like his old self. The jangling intensity he'd had earlier was polished right off of him.

Tiffany came from the bedroom looking fresh and in a new outfit. She sat with Bucky and picked at her vegetables which were farthest away from the steak on her plate.

"You vegan?" Buck wondered.

Tiffany nodded. She accepted the wine he poured for her.

"There's no hard feelings if you're sore and out of commission for the night. He doesn't have a lot of experience, and I shoulda been there to see that he didn't hurt you," Bucky told her.

"I can find ways to participate," Tiffany said.

She licked wine sensually from her bottom lip. Something about the dark red liquid vanishing into her mouth with her tongue stirred a distant, obscure memory in Buck. He frowned at it, and Tiffany looked away from him, the flirty mood ruined.

"Are you gonna eat that?" Steve asked Tiffany.

She got up and brought her plate to him.

Buck sighed and shook his head. Sometimes Steve was no better than a starving recruit at manners. Buck went to the little kitchen countertop and hovered his hand near the deserts while Tiffany watched him. When she seemed to like one, he brought it to the table for her.

"We can order you something vegan that he won't like," Buck suggested.

"I'm not very hungry," Tiffany said, but she picked at her tall coconut pie.

Steve didn't stay occupied with food for long. He tipped up his glass of wine, then went to the kitchen sink to chase it down with water. Buck noticed Tiffany's almost hidden look of distaste as she watched him drink from the tap.

"Miranda," was all Steve had to say.
The statuesque brunette finished her wine and wiped her mouth. She waited for Steve to come around the bar and collect her. Buck followed them into the bedroom. Tiffany and Jo-jo came in behind.

"If you like what you're wearing, you might want to take it off," Buck told Miranda.

He could see from the tension in Steve's shoulders that his friend was ready to have fun again.

She hurriedly slipped off her corset, and Steve pushed her against the wall hard enough to bounce her.

"Sorry," he muttered, but then he took off her panties, put her leg over his shoulder, and buried his mouth exactly where he wanted a taste. Miranda looked down to Steve with a gasp of surprise, then to Bucky.

Buck flopped back in a chair across from the bed, and shrugged. It wasn't the most common thing, to go down on a working girl, but it looked like Stevie wanted to go there, and who was he to stop him?

"Mmmm. Why can't I have this all the time? Shouldn't have to wait," Steve pulled his face away long enough to complain.

Miranda sighed and let her head fall back to the wall. Her hands moved to stroke over his close-shorn scalp.

"No. Not the head. That's for Eya," Steve grumped at her.

"Sorry," Miranda said.

She didn't know what he'd want after that reprimand, so she softly braced her hands on his shoulders.

"My marks are gone," Tiffany noticed.

Buck shrugged and stared at her meaningfully. She waited a moment, then her mouth rounded into an 'o'.

I forgot, she mouthed at him.

"That's good. Keep on forgetting. He's idiot enough tonight. It should be easy to do," Buck said.

"I can hear you," Steve grumbled at them.

"Shaddup. You're not doing it right if you can talk," Buck said.

"Not doing it right..." Steve bitched back at him.

He put his hands up to support Miranda, who was a solid girl. Then, he stood right up from one knee, easy as pie. Miranda made a noise of surprise, but Steve brought her to the bed and carefully tossed her before she could panic much.

Tiffany held out a hand to Bucky, and he dug out another rubber to give to her.

She went to the huge bed, where Jo-jo was working on Steve's pants while he continued to feast on Miranda. He started to fight her, or at least he was thinking about it. Buck saw it in the suddenly still tension of his legs as Jo-jo slipped up between his thighs behind him.
"Aught! Play nice with the ladies," Buck growled at him.

Steve nodded his head minutely and arched the small of his back in invitation. Jo-jo cooed at him and rubbed the fine, hard ass that was so perfectly presented to her.

"Arrogant little punk," Buck chuckled.

"Quit playing around, this isn't about us," Tiffany hissed to Jo-jo. She reached under Steve and undid his pants again.

"Well, he's so pretty, and I can make him feel good," Jo-jo purred.

She and Tiffany worked together to get his pants off, and Miranda made strangling noises until Steve sat back and licked his lips. Jo-jo hugged Steve from behind and rubbed her hands up and down his front.

"Does it always feel this good? It didn't feel like this before," Steve said with an angelic smile back at Jo-jo and Tiffany.

"It's the shit I gave you. Don't over-analyze it. Just enjoy it," Buck said.

Jo-jo started tweaking his nipples, and Tiffany was about to go down on him. Steve looked dazed, but happy. Buck wished he could go in the other room and let him have his fun, but things were deceptively dangerous for the girls now. Just this afternoon, Steve's strength had slung him like he was a rubber dog toy. He looked loopy and harmless, but he wasn't. Just like a moment ago, when he'd been about to snap Jo-jo in a leg lock, he could still mess up. Buck knew this would be risky, and it was likely to get worse, later. He had to be vigilant.

Steve made a rough sound, and Miranda looked on at the three people twisted up together in front of her. Tiffany pulled away and rolled a condom onto him. Jo-jo pushed at his shoulders to encourage him toward Miranda.

"You smell good," Steve told the girl he was about to fuck.

She nodded vaguely at him and hugged him closer. For all her saucy looks earlier, she was out of sauce now. Steve got an arm under her and flipped her so that she was up on her knees under him.

"Be careful. Go slow," Tiffany said.

"Don't wanna go slow. I'm so damn tired of slow," Steve said.

He wiggled his hips a little and Buck knew he was getting it just right. He recognized the move from his own experience, but had never seen somebody else do it in person. And it was Stevie. Jeezus. He shouldn't be watching.

"Ipe!" Miranda squeaked.

Buck was up in a heartbeat to pull him off of her, and Steve wasn't backing down. He hammered into the girl mercilessly. An instant before Buck would have leapt to get his arm around Steve's neck, he recognized the deep, wrecked moaning Miranda was making continuously. She liked it. No, she liked it a lot.

Tiffany watched him, her eyes big like an owl's. Buck eased his attack stance, but she'd already seen. Jo-jo hovered on her knees to the side of the action, her back turned to Bucky. She was watching avariciously. Her hand hovered over the working muscles of Steve's back, fascinated and wanting to touch.

"Don't touch him right now," Buck warned.

She drew her hand back and settled to wait her turn.

Miranda's vocalizations gradually shifted from low and pleasure-wracked to high and tight with discomfort. Buck saw why. Steve's teeth were gliding back and forth on her shoulder, and his hands were gripping her tits. Both sensations were probably too hard.

"Hey," he said sharply as he stepped to the bedside.

"Ease your grip and your teeth," Bucky ordered him.

Steve lashed out with his left hand and threw Bucky across the carpet and clear into the bathroom without breaking rhythm in his fucking. Buck caught himself from stumbling with his hand on the wall of the shower enclosure. Tile shattered under his hand, but he had no time to linger over busted up tile.

A few strides, and Buck was standing on the bed, feet either side of the busy couple. Steve growled at him, but Buck was too fast for the distracted man. With his right arm, he bent up and back on Steve's left arm. His left hand clamped tight around Steve's throat, thumb and forefingers digging into where his pulse supplied his brain with blood.

"You let up on her or I'll put you to sleep," Buck told him coldly.

Tiffany and Jo-jo were somewhere off the bed by now, and Miranda was keening for pleasure or fright, or pain, he couldn't tell. Steve tried to shake him off, but Buck held on tight enough to cripple a normal man. The bed shook and rattled against the wall, but then he felt the fight go out of him.

Steve was still tense, but it didn't seem like he was gonna put up any serious fight anymore. That was good enough. It meant he understood. Buck made to go and leave him alone, but Steve's bent back fingers curled to clamp tight around his, and his other hand came up to press the metal fingers at his throat deeper.

His hips started moving again. They'd never really stopped, Buck realized.

"You're a sick little brat, ya know? See if I ever take you to a gay bdsm bar again. Ya couldn't handle it, could ya, angel-face?" Buck affectionately teased him.

Steve choked out something, and then he was coming. Buck held him in what had to be a painful grip through it. He was surprised at how long it lasted. Steve's face was turning kinda purple, so he eased off once the shakes and the tension were gone. Steve eased over and let Miranda down onto her side carefully.

He started to talk, but his voice came out as a damaged croak, so he cleared his throat and tried again.

"Did I hurt you?" Steve asked her.

"I don't know. I don't feel pain when I'm aroused. If something's sore, I'll feel it tomorrow," Miranda said lazily.

She slicked her fingers over Steve's sweaty chest and stared at him with lambent eyes. Bucky shook his head at the dopey look on his friend and went back to his chair. Tiffany crept around the doorframe to stand behind his chair, and Jo-jo eased onto his lap.

"Are you sure you wanna get into the ring with him?" Buck asked her.

"Oh, hell yeah!" Jo-jo said with a toothy grin.

"Then come here," Steve told her.

Bucky gave his dick a pointed look.

"Yeah, yeah, mama hen, I know," Steve said.

He sat up and rolled to go to the bathroom. A little rinsing and a flush, and he was back, still hard as ever.

Jo-jo joined him on the bed.

"Do you ever go down?" she asked.

Tiffany put a new condom packet into her hand.

"Hardly," Steve said, then guffawed at the obtuse pun he'd made.

Buck rolled his eyes. The herb was still working him some, despite the fracas he'd caused a minute ago. Jo-jo waited submissively on the bed for him, trying hard to look like the sweet girl she wasn't. Steve moved in behind her and she shivered. That much was genuine, he could tell.

Miranda went off to the other bedroom, where Tiffany guided her and looked her over.

Steve shifted and lay down. He pulled Jo-jo above him and set her on his thighs.

"You're so strong. You threw him like it was nothing," she said.

"He's a bunch of hot air. Nothing to it," Steve denied.

"You're scary. I like," Jo-jo said.

"No need to be scared, little red. I'm only allowed to beat up on James," Steve smirked.

Jo-jo touched the purple-black bruising on either side of his adam's apple.

"And he's allowed to beat up on you," Jo-jo said.

"Sure. We're brothers. It's what we do," Steve said with a shrug.

Jo-jo didn't bother to ask any details about his sibling comment. The two men didn't look anything alike, other than being exceptionally fit.

She continued to sit on his legs. He was marble-hard, right there in front of her. She took hold of him like flight controls and rubbed her thumbs on his underside. Steve laid back and shut his eyes.

"You sure you want to go again right now? It's not too sensitive?" she asked.

He shook his head and reached down to tickle his own frenulum, showing her it was fine. Jo-jo was happy to have him to herself, though she hoped Miranda was feeling alright after her rough ride. She planned to work their big John until he was a puddle of warm delight, now that maybe he was calmed down some from his two previous rounds.

She took her time touching him, and Bucky went to the bathroom since it didn't look like anything dramatic was about to happen. Steve wanted stuff, so he was gonna get stuff. He got the things he wanted and brought them to Jo-jo. She looked at him expectantly when he stood at the foot of the bed and held out a glove, a tube of lube, and two gelatin capsules to her.

"You want me to? For him?" she asked.

"Yeah. Wait a second, though," Buck agreed.

He went around to the head of the bed, where Steve was watching him and looking mostly sober.

"Here. Lemme feel," he said.

Steve let him touch the places on his gums where he'd been cut. There was nothing anymore, not even a bump.

"You still feeling anything?" he asked.

"Maybe a little. It's hard to tell."

"We're gonna try something different, but you'll have to let her put it in without mule kicking her across the room like a scared virgin," Buck said.

"Put it in?" Steve's brow furrowed, and then he felt the cool lube Jo-jo was putting on his ass. He startled a little when she glided onto his anus.

"Yeah. That's how it'll work best for you, if it works at all," Buck said.

"What is it?" Steve asked skeptically.

"You don't need to know. Let me worry about that. I'll tell Banner in the morning if it makes you feel better."

"Tell him that I let some dame put drugs up my ass? Are you outta your mind, Buck?"

"I don't have to tell him the details. I was just offering disclosure if it would make you feel better. Do you want this or not?"

Steve stared at him hard for a moment. Jo-jo reached to play with him again, and Steve breathed deep, then moved her hand away so he could think.

"Have you done it?" Steve asked.

"Yeah, but not this way. I didn't feel much, and only for a few minutes. This should be better," Bucky said.

"Do it. No. You don't do it. She does it. If she wants to," Steve amended.

"I'd love to do this for you," Jo-jo said.

Steve nodded, then pushed Bucky away.

"Do you really want me down there while this is happening?" Buck asked.
"Just leave. I won't hurt her," Steve said.

He shut his eyes and pressed his head back into the pillow. Buck bit his lips to hold in the laugh at the grimace on Steve's face. His lip was almost curling.

"Honey, you're very tight. Like steel or something. Are you sure you don't have anything up there already?" Jo-jo asked.

Buck couldn't hold in his laughter any longer.

"Shut up! I don't wanna hear it. I've got Stark in my head too much already," Steve growled, but Buck could see him fighting not to smile.

"No, he doesn't have anything in there. He's just a tight ass, first class," Buck joked.

"Get out," Steve gritted through his teeth.

"No way. You've already surprised me twice tonight. I'm willing to stick with you to get this done if you really want to try it, but you know what's at risk if you mess up. So, are ya doing this or not?" Buck asked, more serious in tone.

"It was good? The little bit you got that worked?"

"Yeah," Buck said.

"I'll try," Steve agreed.

"Jo-jo," Bucky said.

"Yeah?" she wondered.

She had one hand lightly stroking Steve's dick, and the other one was working behind, trying to loosen him.

"You know how to do this, right? Plenty of lube. And don't touch his prostate, or he'll break your finger," Bucky said.

Jo-jo giggled until she saw the dead serious look on his face.

"You mean like, really?" she asked.

He nodded.

Now she looked scared, as if they were asking her to stick her finger in an electrical outlet. They sort of were.

"He's real good at taking orders and controlling muscle groups. Be quick and business like and you'll be fine," Buck said.

She nodded.

Unfortunately, it looked like Steve was finally losing his erection. Maybe he really wasn't into anal. Buck pulled another rubber from his pocket and gave it to Jo-jo. She took the hint, sheathed Steve, and lowered herself onto him while he was still half hard.

"It's easier this way," she winked at Steve.
"Okay, now breathe slow and deep. Relax. Let her in. She's soft and wet, right? No pain?"

"Shut up, Buck, and get outta my face. I can't do this and listen to you jabber at the same time," Steve said.

Bucky got up and backed away to the corner of the room, where he didn't have a view of what Jo-jo was doing, but where he could be on hand quick if he was needed. He crossed his arms and waited as silently as he could.

Jo-jo shut her eyes, just like Steve. Buck almost laughed again, but kept it in his head. Two people concentrating like they were disarming a nuclear bomb, and all to get a little sphincter open. Not even open much.

Jo-jo started a rocking motion on top of Steve. It looked real nice, and Buck wondered about his arm again. He should be hard from the eroticism of the evening, but he wasn't. It was fun and he was happy for Stevie like usual, but the thrill wasn't there. There had to be something inside the arm that was inhibiting him. Sure, he could perform if physically stimulated, but it never happened from something mental or from anything he saw. Orgasms weren't very great, either, if Kenya was patient enough to coax one out of him. A different motion on the bed caught his attention again.

Steve let his legs fall apart, and he was breathing long and deep. His skin was flushed all over, and Buck knew his pupils would be pinpricks if he looked. He hoped Jo-jo got the insertion done soon, or Steve was gonna be more than he wanted to control, but he'd still try for the girls' sake. Buck knew what oxygen loading his blood did for him. It was part of the reason Hydra had him wear the full face mask. They couldn't handle him when he was loaded. He'd tended to break people and equipment they didn't want him to.

Silently, he began to chant encouragement to Steve in his head.

"That's right, honey. You can take it. Just a little skinny girl finger," Jo-jo encouraged Steve.

He must have finally managed to loosen, because she did some manipulation, then cooed in triumphant praise. Soon as it was done, she snapped off the blue medical glove and tossed it to the floor. Then, she set her hands on Steve's chest and started to ride him.

"In a few minutes, you're going to feel really good," Jo-jo told him.

"Side effects?" Steve asked.

"You worry too much. You'll be lucky to feel much at all, as amped and loaded as you are. You might feel a momentary flash, and burn through it," Buck said.

"You fill me up real nice, honey. Maybe you could try again with Tiffany if you started half soft," Jo-jo said.

"Too passive," Steve muttered.

He turned them onto their sides and drew her knee up over his hip. Buck caught his eyes for a second. Yeah, his pupils were small. They'd never talked about loading before, but there was no denying what Steve was feeling.

"Small, controlled breaths. Gentle with the goods, pal," Buck reminded him.

Steve nodded, and he and his girl of the moment spent a while taking it slow. It was nice to see him not in a frantic, dangerous rush. But that might change.
"Whuu?" Steve stopped moving and focused internally.

Then, he laughed. His hands stuttered against Jo-jo's arms, and he looked to Buck in wonder.

"There it is," Buck said with a smile.

"I feel." Steve stated.

"Uh-huh," Buck agreed.

"Go see if they're okay, and if they are, I want them," Steve said.

It came out like an order, and Buck was fine with that. He found them eating ice cream in front of the television.

"He wants you, if you're feeling alright," he told them.

"Again?" Tiffany asked.

"He's different. If you're not hurting, then come on," Buck said.

Miranda got up and handed her ice cream to Tiffany.

"I'll be there in a minute, okay?" Tiffany said.

Buck nodded, but he looked her over closely, and everything else he could see in the suite, too. Nothing appeared suspicious, so he went with Miranda back to the room where Steve was.

"They found the ice cream," Buck said, but Steve was beyond caring.

Miranda got on the bed and moved behind Steve to touch him everywhere she could reach. He made appreciative noises like none Buck had heard from him before. Bucky felt smug that his ideas had worked and that Stevie was feeling good. With two girls working to make him happy, he felt that he'd done his job.

Tiffany appeared in the doorway in another sexy little outfit. It had straps and cinches and buckles. It reminded him of the things they'd seen in the bdsm bar, earlier. He was sure that Steve would appreciate it. Buck walked over and thoroughly investigated her clothes. He was handsy with her, and Tiffany looked cross with him.

"Sorry to forcibly ruin your dominatrix thing, but I'm gonna check you before you go near him in that," Buck said.

"You think I could hurt him?" she whispered.

"I think anything could happen," Buck said.

He found a small lozenge in a cute, shallow pocket of satin.

"It's a breath mint," Tiffany said.

She was acting put out, but Bucky could see the fear in her eyes. Before she could pop the 'mint' into her mouth, Buck ate it himself. Cyanide. Couldn't mistake the taste.

Before Tiffany could say anything resembling 'Hail Hydra' to ruin Steve's mood, Buck clamped a hand over her mouth and nose and brought her into the bathroom. He managed it without alerting the three having fun on the bed. She flailed to get free and he tightened down on her until she was woozy from lack of air. With one hand, he ripped off her panties. He tore open a pack of lube with his teeth, then used his teeth to stretch a medical glove onto his fingers. He crushed the plastic tube that held the same drugs he'd just given to Steve. He used enough lube to not make her bleed, but he wasn't particularly gentle as he shoved three of the gelcaps into her rectum.

It was convenient that her outfit was so strappy. It gave him something to tie her up with. He waited until she quit struggling and went glassy eyed.

"Let me hear you say it," he whispered.

"I love Hydra," she muttered dreamily.

Bucky set her in the large tub. She would be drugged immobile for several hours. He could deal with her later, if she lived. It might be more merciful for her to overdose. The thought of a Hydra agent doing something to Steve while he was vulnerable sent him straight past rage and made him feel numb and awful inside.

He left the bathroom and re-checked the security of the door. He used one of Hydra's own devices to set an audible shrill if anyone tried to open it. Then, he rifled through Tiffany's bag, and Jo-jo's and Miranda's. The other two women had the usual stuff in their bags. So did Tiffany, but his fingers felt things in the inner lining of the bag. He ripped it apart and stared at the miniaturized equipment. Her gear wasn't as good as Natalia's, but her intent was clear. Bucky was thankful Steve had a big dick. If he hadn't made the evil cunt squeal, Buck had intended to give him his privacy. If he'd stayed away like a good sensible friend, then Steve would be hurt or worse right now. At the very least, he wouldn't have had the chance to experience what he was now.

Curses to Hydra scrolled through his head. It was a familiar litany. He checked in on Steve, then got a bottle of water from the fridge to wash the taste of cyanide out of his mouth. The stuff always gave him the jitters and made his veins itch. He felt like scratching all over, but he couldn't do that from the inside.

Buck put on a happy face and went to sit in his chair at the foot of Steve's bed again. Stevie was having so much fun that he didn't notice Buck get up again to check on the hollow thumping sound in the bathroom. Tiffany was convulsing in the tub, so Buck ran some cold water for her to chill in. He was satisfied that if she was that far gone, she wouldn't be a problem for him tonight.

Since Steve wasn't paying attention, he sat back down and thought. He stared clear through the bodies cavorting on the bed until it all went still except for the breathing.

Steve eased the tired women off of him and slipped from the bed. He grinned at Buck on the way to the bathroom. He faltered a little when he saw the irked eyebrow Bucky sent toward the bathroom.

He went in, cleaned up, and came back out.

"Hail Hydra?" Steve asked.

"Not this time. I put three of those pills up her ass. She loves Hydra," Bucky smirked.

"Are we secure?"

"As can be, given the situation. The door is alarmed. She had some small gear in her bag. No live electronics, because they knew I'd feel it out and find it. She probably would have tried to kill all of us, then used the usual fizzy pill," Buck shrugged.
"Kill us with what?" Steve asked.

He sat on the foot of the bed facing Bucky.

"Maybe they thought we'd be stupid and distracted. Somebody knows I'm not as hypervigilant as I used to be. A girl doesn't have to be Natalia to cut deep when you don't expect it," Buck pointed out.

Steve looked sour for a moment, then he turned and looked at the girls behind him, out cold on the bed. When he looked back at Bucky, his smile was dopey and sweet.

"You're a pal, Buck. I lo-"

"Shuddap. That's the drugs talking. How do you feel?" Buck asked.

"Real swell. Tops. I haven't felt anything like this since we were teens. You know, the girls are sleepy, but if you let them rest for a while, they might be nice to you," Steve said.

"Nah, I'm good. Hey, help me get them to the other bedroom. I don't wanna have them wake up and go in the bathroom here," Buck said.

Steve made a face.

"Too much screaming," he agreed.

They each got a girl and brought them to the other bedroom. They left their bathroom light on for them, and Buck took Tiffany's bag and stowed it in a kitchen cabinet up high.

Steve hungrily stuffed himself on Jo-jo's leftover steak, then he and Bucky finished off the desserts. He took another water and passed one to Steve. They settled in front of the television to watch something mindless.

"Since you're laying there naked as a jaybird, you want another hit? I've got one more," Buck told him.

"The stuff in my mouth, or the other stuff?"

"The other stuff. We used up all the herb. It's not good to leave stuff lying around unused where someone could find it," Bucky said.

"How long was I incapacitated?"

"About an hour and a half. It's just past midnight. You've got time, but I ain't putting it in for ya," Buck said.

"I think I can figure it out," Steve said.

He went into the bathroom where the Hydra operative was dying or not. Bucky marveled at the change in attitude the drugs seemed to make in his friend. Stevie was walking tall and proud with not a stitch on. He was relaxed, and the desperate ache of constant arousal had let go of him.

Buck chuckled to himself. He wondered how much writhing guilt Steve was going to enjoy torturing himself with when this was all over with in the morning. Steve came back to join him in front of the television with a bottle of water. Buck threw a pillow at him, but Steve deflected it onto the floor.
"You could put your underwear on, ya pig," Buck complained.

"That thing is torture. I don't like it," Steve shook his head in a juvenile sort of pout.

Buck tried to ignore the miles of pale flesh next to him. This wasn't at all the Steve Rogers he'd known all their lives, but he'd had a hand in making him this way with the drugs, so he didn't complain. His attention was more on their environment than anything else, anyway. Hydra knew where they were, but that was nothing new. He just had to keep aware. Steve wasn't much good naked and rolling like he was shortly gonna be, but he'd already done his part to knock Hydra on its ass and drive a stake in its heart. The man deserved a little R & R.

The slide of skin over skin was hard to dismiss. A glance showed him that Steve was touching himself, fingers gliding lightly up and down the center of his chest and abdomen. His other hand cupped his balls.

"You feeling it?" Buck asked.

"Mmm. Feels like my balls are gonna fall off," Steve rumbled through a throat that was lazy and stretched out with the backwards tip of his head against the cushions.

"Is that a 'yes'?" Buck smirked, and turned his eyes back to the crap on TV.

"Fuck, yeah," Steve rasped.

Bucky left him to his fun and kept a proper guard through the hour. He brought him a rag when he needed one. Twice.

"I love you, Bucky. You take good care of me. Always have," he said, all wrung out and blissed.

"Great. Now if I don't say 'I love you' back, you'll remember and get all pissy and uptight because I heard you when your guard was down. Yeah. I love you too, but remember, it's the drugs. You don't say that shit," Buck insisted.

"The fuck I don't. I should have said it before you fell," Steve insisted.

"Look, let's just not talk, okay?" Buck whined.

"Okay," Steve said.

Bucky changed channels and tried to find something remotely interesting. Steve was plenty interested in exploring his own body and the unique sensations the drug made him feel.

When his breathing broke on a soft gasp, Buck looked over again. Steve was idly fiddling with himself, but tears wet his face in streaks down to his chin.

"I shouldn't have done this. It's wrong," he said.

"Don't pay any attention to that. You're coming down. It's normal to feel anxious and crappy while it wears off," Buck said.

Bucky wasn't going to rib him about getting emotional. Not right now, anyway. He could listen.

"You needed some help to not hurt the girls tonight. Maybe you can get past that with some
"I don't want to practice. This was great, Buck. The best. I can't believe I did it. But I can't do it again. I sure can't make it a habit of it. Hell, the very first time I tried, I ended up with a Hydra agent. Oh, God! I stuck my dick in a Hydra agent! I-"

Steve was up and running to the bathroom. Bucky thought it was a poor choice of direction, because said Hydra agent was in there for him to stare at while he heaved his steak up. After a minute, there was a miserable call for help, and Buck got up to go see what was needed.

He found Steve kneeling at the tub, feeling of Tiffany's pulse. The room smelled unpleasant, so Bucky flushed and turned on the air vent.

"Is she dead?" he asked.

"Not yet," Steve said, nausea still obviously rolling his stomach.

"You want me to call medical?"

There was a long pause.

"No. How do I wash her out? Make sure that whoever gets her after this doesn't have anything of me to work with?"

Steve's words were hard and technical. More than anything else tonight, Buck was sad that Steve had to deal with this. Treating his own bodily fluids like a security breach was harsh. He didn't want this for him. He wanted his friend to have some last little thing that was sacred. There was nothing left for James Barnes, but Steve was different. He deserved better than to have everything tainted.

"Get out. I'll do it," Buck said.

"No. I need to know," Steve denied.

Bucky locked the bathroom door and reached for the shampoo.
Chapter 30

In the early morning, it was Banner alone who came meekly knocking at their door. The message was clear. Steve was going back to the tower, even if half of the island had to get torn up to accomplish it.

"What did you do with him?" Bruce asked when he saw Steve sprawled like dead weight across the hotel bed.

Bruce harrumphed at him, then reached over to wiggle Steve's heel, which stuck out of the covers. He didn't wake.

"It's just as well. He's not fond of needles," Bruce said.

He touched Steve's heel with a little white plastic device and there was a 'click' sound.

"Hey!" Bucky protested when Bruce set a tiny glass capillary tube to the bead of blood which welled up.

Bruce carried on collecting the sample. He slipped it into the white device, which was no bigger than a jump drive. It beeped and Bruce looked at the reading.

"Whatever you did worked. His T is within normal, even for an average guy. It hasn't been this low for months. I'll want details," Bruce said.

"You're like a shaggy dog. I can't stay mad at you," Buck said.

"That's self-preservation, because I'm having no trouble staying angry with you."

"You're angry?" Buck wondered.

Bruce gave him a tight smile and waved a hand at their insensate friend.

Bucky shoved at Bruce, hard.

"You're just like Tony. That's all I need," Bruce recovered his footing and walked into the bathroom.

"Gah!" he said when the light came on.

"Hydra. She brought toys in her bag." Bucky explained.

"Figures. Poor Steve," Bruce felt for a pulse, but didn't bother when he felt how stiff and cold the skin was.

There was another knock at the door. Bucky could hear somebody with hard soled heels fidgeting anxiously in the hallway. He opened the door. It was the handler who had brought the girls to them last night.

"Good morning, Sir. I trust everything was to your satisfaction?" he asked.
Buck didn't like his suit or his cologne. He smelled like fresh imported cartel, despite his good English, and he acted like it. It wasn't an important detail last night, and it wasn't really important this morning, either. It simply pissed him off. Nothing was American anymore.

"Come in. I don't think the ladies are up yet," Buck said.

He pulled the man into the suite, whether he wanted to come in or not. He resisted until Buck had the door shut behind him. He went for his weapon, but Buck took it from him, as well as the other little one strapped around his sock.

"One of your girls wasn't yours," Buck said.

The man went for his phone, and Buck took that too, and added it to the pile. He put his hands up in a show of submission.

"The blonde. How long has she been working with your organization?"

"She didn't make it. Send my condolences to your boss, but tell him if he ever gets a call from me, he better check his girls' gear before he sends them out," Buck said.

He pushed Tiffany's suitcase at the handler, and bundled the man out the door.

"Hey, you can't keep the other two! Or my things!" the man grew a pair and tried pushing back into the suite.

"I dare ya to do something about it," Buck told him, and shut the door.

The man howled out in the hallway because the heavy door had clipped and crunched his elbow a little before he could pull it free. His foot kicked at the door in a series of thumps, but then he retreated down the hall.

"We need to get Steve dressed and call for fresh linens," Bruce said.

He pocketed the handler's cell phone after slipping out its SIM card. With his own phone, he called in help.

Bucky went to one bedroom to rouse the sleeping girls and get them to dress and get moving. Then, he went across and smacked Steve around until he started slapping back.

"Go 'way, Buck. It's not time for the papers yet," Steve complained.

"Heh. You're seventy-something years late for running your paper route, squirt, but I'm sure they'd take you on if you went and applied," He teased.

Steve abruptly rolled and sat up.

"Fuck! All that happened, didn't it?"

"'Fraid so," Bucky agreed.

Bruce came to the bedroom door and knocked.

"Bruce," Steve said, surprised.
Bucky liked the way Steve was immediately happy to see his friend, even though he was confused as hell. It told him that he trusted the man who'd worried Bucky by so casually taking his blood.

"Hi. Um, Nat's on her way up, so maybe you should…?" Bruce said.

He gestured at all the skin Steve was showing as the covers fell off of him and dragged sideways.

"Right," Steve nodded responsibly, and just like that, the Captain was back.

Bucky sighed. It was good while it lasted, mostly. He'd have to think of other ways to get Stevie to come out again.

Steve grabbed the duvet and wrapped it around him like a burrito of awkwardness as he skulked to the bathroom.

"Do I have to brush my teeth with this in here?" Steve grumped.

"Natalia's coming, sweetheart. She'll save you," Bucky reminded him.

Steve raised a one finger salute as he brushed his teeth with the supplies provided. Maybe Stevie wasn't completely swallowed up by the Captain, after all. Steve looked contrite when he noticed his clothes and shoes neatly ready for him in the bathroom. He shut the door, and Buck could hear the dissatisfied grumbling while he dressed.

"It's not like you to be afraid of a little meat," Buck called.

"S not that. I can't get away from work," Steve complained.

"Sing me somethin' fresh," Buck answered.

"You guys are a hoot," Bruce smiled.

"And it's my job to clean up the scat. Mornin, boys," Natasha said.

Bucky didn't remember leaving the door open, but that meant nothing to Natalia.

Jo-jo and Miranda stood in the living room with bleary eyes and their bags. Bruce and Natasha's presence, as well as the propped open door and the large cloth laundry bin in the hall had them confused. Then, they noticed the handler's firearms on the coffee table.

"Didn't Julio come for us?" Miranda asked.

"He did. He remembered he had somewhere else to be, and I said you could stay for a while," Bucky said.

"Does this have anything to do with Anthony?" Jo-jo asked suspiciously.

"Not like you'd think," Bruce told them with a kind smile.

Everyone but the working girls knew what Bruce meant, and the girls didn't appreciate the humor when they were confused and feeling lost and out of sorts. It wasn't their fault some guy they knew also happened to be named Anthony.

"Where's Mad- uh- Tiffany?" Miranda wanted to know.

"She left with Julio because she was already up and ready to go," Bucky said.
"No more, Buck. This is ridiculous. Ladies, the truth is that something has happened and you need to come with us," Steve said.

"You're no fun," Buck said.

"What happened? We'll be in so much trouble if we don't get back to Julio. You don't even know!" Jo-jo said.

Miranda was looking closely at Steve's face in the daylight that came through the open curtains. Steve Gathered Miranda under one arm and Jo-jo under the other, and he guided them back to their room to explain a few things. Bucky didn't need written instructions. Soon as Steve had them shut in the bedroom, Buck hurried to the other bathroom and gathered up Tiffany's remains into the duvet Steve had left laid out on the floor. He carried the bundle through the living room, and Natalia made a space among the towels and sheets in the cart. After Buck set his burden down, she covered everything up so that the cart looked unremarkable.

"We should move," Bruce said as he tapped on the bedroom door.

Steve came out and took the ladies' bags. They left Julio's hardware on the table. He was very likely to come back for it soon, with reinforcements. Miranda and Jo-jo crowded close behind Steve as he led the way to the elevator.

Everyone stood aside as the large service elevator opened with the odd key that Natasha used.

"Why are we taking the service elevator?" Jo-jo asked.

Steve pressed a finger to his lips and smiled a little. That usually worked for children. It couldn't hurt to try in this instance. It worked. They all went down and out the back side of the hotel. Natasha pushed the cart into the open rear of the van Clint was waiting for them in. Miranda was even more confused as everyone crowded in. Jo-jo balked.

"I can't go with you. I have to get back to Julio. I should wait for him here. Or, maybe you can drop me off?" she said hopefully.

"Why do you have to get back to Julio?" Natasha asked.

"Because Julio knows where my daughter goes to school," Jo-jo said.

"Which school?" Clint spoke up.

"Pinehurst Elementary," Jo-jo said.

"Come on. We'll go there right now and you can get your daughter," Steve told her.

Jo-jo narrowed her eyes and stared at them. She stood on the concrete loading dock and agonized in indecision.

"C'mon, doll. Didn't he tell you who he is? He's a straight shooter. He wouldn't lie to ya," Bucky said.

Jo-jo decided to join them, but her eyes were roving over Steve and Bruce, Clint and Natasha. Bucky shut them all into the utility van and Clint got them moving.

"Captain America wouldn't take Mollies up the ass, either," Jo-jo said.

There was a moment of stunned silence, then Natasha laughed. Clint barked so loud that he coughed, and even Bruce smiled. Steve turned nine shades of red in progression and he looked down at the stale clothes he'd worn since yesterday evening.

"I deserve that," Steve said.

"Oh, how the mighty have fallen! Tony's gonna love this," Clint chuckled as he drove.

"Anthony?" Miranda asked, worried.

"No, Tony. Stark. Steve, didn't you tell them?" Bruce asked.

"I did, but-" Steve sputtered.

"It's a little hard to believe," Miranda said.

"You don't need to worry, Miss. We don't know who Anthony is, but you don't have to see him if you don't want to," Steve assured them.

"Because you're dipping into your nest egg," Bucky groaned and rolled his eyes.

"So what if I am!" Steve fired back.

"No, no, no. This will not be okay with Pepper. You can't keep a stable, Steve. There's no way that works," Natasha said.

"You mean we really fucked Captain America?" Jo-jo asked.

"Got fucked by," Bucky corrected them.

"By Steve Rogers, ma'am. Not the Captain," Steve insisted.

"But aren't you telling me that you're Captain America?" Jo-jo persisted.

"And your birth certificate says Jo-jo?" Steve asked.

"No. It says Dana. Oh. So you just play Captain America on TV?" Jo-jo asked.

"God, take me now," Steve said with a huge sigh.

"No, you need to go to confession first," Bucky reminded him.

Steve reached over the laundry cart and smacked Bucky hard enough that they could hear bones clacking together.

"Ungrateful punk! You came to me," Bucky reminded him.

"All of which perfectly illustrates the point of why you ladies need NDAs, and why you can't keep a harem, Steve," Natasha said.

The van went over a bump and the laundry bin jostled against Bucky's legs.

"That's heavy laundry," Miranda pointed out.

"It's wet," Natasha said.

"Yeah, maybe we should drop it off before we get to the school," Clint said.
"You do that," Steve nodded.

"En route," Clint agreed.

"Who cares about laundry? We have to get to my baby before Julio thinks to," Dana insisted.

"There's another carrier on the way. We can transfer it," Clint clarified.

Steve shook his head and balanced against another bump. The van slowed down and turned left at an intersection, then turned left immediately again. Soon as they stopped, the back doors opened. There was a small crew waiting for the laundry cart.

"You trynna be in the dirty laundry business, Rogers? If you are, it looks like you're making a damn good start," Fury said dryly.

As soon as Fury's people had the cart out of the van, Steve sat down on the scuffed metal floor.

"If you're talking to the Lord about this, you might need to pray louder. Or get up on a carrier. I can get you closer, if you'd like," Fury said with not so subtle hints of threat.

"Take it easy on 'im. He's still crashing," Buck suggested.

"Easy, my ass," Fury grumbled, and slammed the van doors.

"That was not a laundry person," Miranda said.

"Not like you'd think," Bruce said.

"Uuhhh. Coffee," Steve moaned and rubbed at his temples.

"Are you sure he's Captain America?" Dana whispered to Miranda, who turned out to be Catherine.

Clint chuckled off and on all the way to the school, and Bucky agreed it was pretty funny.

Steve almost made it to his room after the grilling from Tony and Thor. When he got on the elevator, Estrella was waiting for him.

"Jarvis," Steve said, disappointed.

"I am not omnipotent, Captain. I am unable to physically remove her from the elevators, though you can review the data files and see that I tried my best at persuading her."

"Stop arguing with the computer. Come here," Estrella held her arms out to him.

"Estrella, I'm dirty. I need to take a shower," Steve protested.

His pride was all used up for the day. It no longer mattered that he was standing in the hallway to the living room, and everyone could hear him pleading with Estrella.

"Come here," Estrella said.

She wiggled her fingers at him. Steve noted that she wasn't wearing makeup today, and she was in jeans, sneakers, and an oversized T-shirt. One of his. She was plain and beautiful.
Her chin went up, and her arms started to drift downward.

Steve gave up and went to her. The elevator doors closed before the rest of the crew could hear the mighty sigh he let out when she had him.

"I'm so dirty," Steve murmured against her hair.

"I don't care," Estrella said.

Her arms pulled him tight, and she was stronger than he thought she'd be for such a small person. It surely didn't hurt, but he was impressed. Steve stood quiet and breathed in lungfulls of her clean scent. She smelled like ivory soap.

The elevator granted them access to both sides of their floor. Estrella tugged him toward his side.

"Miss, you are denied access to the Captain's suite when he is in the building. As long as you are with him, he will also not be able to access his suite," Jarvis said helpfully.

"On whose orders?" Estrella asked.

"Mine," Steve said.

"Take it back," she insisted.

"No. Not yet. I don't trust myself. You wouldn't either, if you'd seen me last night," Steve said.

They slid down the wall side by side and watched the rain that was beginning to fall against the window.

"You smell like vagina," Estrella said.

Steve covered his face with his hands and nodded. He drug his palms down into his lap and let them rest there.

"I told you, I'm not clean. You should let me go shower," Steve said.

"Steve. I'm not judging you. I know what you did. I know the kinds of things you do with Bucky. What I'm trying to tell you is that I'm not ignorant. I know what you think you mean when you say you're not clean," she told him gently.

"Really. Do I smell like dead Hydra agent, then? Because one of our girls was Hydra. Buck caught her before she could do anything to me," he said.

It seemed that everyone knew everything, anyway. He figured he may as well finish ripping the bandage off all in the space of one morning.

"Maybe I dislike Bucky a little less, then. There's something bad wrong with the world if you have to kill the girls who are meant to entertain you," Estrella frowned.

"Eya? Aren't you mad at me?" Steve asked.

"Are you deaf? I'm only mad at you if you keep pretending that you don't understand what I'm saying. I'm not mad at you for the girls. I see it in your eyes, when you're in pain. It's tearing you up inside. You don't like doing it, but you have to go when it gets to be too much. And then you're all guilty, like right now. Don't do that," she waved a hand at him.
Steve squinted at her in helpless noncompliance.

"I know. You can't control it. You hate that, too," she said.

"How do you know so much about me?" Steve asked quietly.

"All anyone has to do is look at you. You're easy to read."

Steve clunked his head back against the wall. Estrella's fingers twined between his, and he rocked their hands back and forth in appreciation of the friendly gesture.

"Ow," Estrella said, and she pulled her palm away from his.

"You're hurt?" he asked, all sharp attention again.

"No. It's nothing," she said.

It was useless to try to pull her hand from him. He studied the scraped skin carefully in the bright gray light.

"You fell on concrete. The garage. I'm sorry if I upset you," Steve said.

He wanted to kiss her hand where the scrape was, but then he remembered where his face and mouth had been. His hands, too.

"It wasn't you that upset me, mostly. It was the rest of them. They refused to go after you, and now look. You're unhappy. I knew you would be," she said.

Steve loved the deep chocolate color of her eyes. Her hair was brushed simply down around her face and ears, and it made her look boyish, except for the exquisite bone structure of her face. And then there were her lips. And her pert nose with the delicately articulated nostrils. And her eyes. He shook his head. What the hell was wrong with him? He shouldn't be thinking about touching her with any part of him. Especially not his hands or his lips.

He realized that for the brief moment that he'd been contemplating all the ways he thought she was pretty, he hadn't been feeling bad about last night. Steve smiled at her.

"There you are," Estrella said.

Steve nodded. She always seemed to find a different part of him that he only recognized when he was with her. Not Buck's Steve, and not the Captain. Someone else he wasn't sure he knew very well, yet.

"It sounds like an adventure, all in one night, like one of those movies with drunken frat boys. Tell me what happened," she said.

Estrella wiggled eagerly like she was waiting for a good story. Steve frowned down at her, and she smiled unrepentantly.

"Go on. And don't leave out the good parts," she said.

"Could you let me go shower first?" he asked.

"No. It's like smell-o-vision this way. You know you won't tell me later. You'll run away and find a reason not to talk about it. Tell me now, then you can go shower and sleep it off," she insisted.
"Jarvis-" Steve began.

"Go," Estrella finished the privacy command for him.

"Indeed," the AI said stiffly.

"You sure found a way to piss him off," Steve smiled.

"He doesn't like it when I tie up the elevator shafts. He had to reroute traffic and apologize to people," Estrella explained with a naughty twinkle.

"But he's so good at apologizing that you can't get put out with him. 'I'm terribly sorry, but there is a malfunction with the blah, blah, blah,'" Steve mimicked Jarvis with a ramrod straight proper British posture and accent.

Estrella laughed.

"You're stalling," she pointed out.

"Yeah," Steve admitted.

He looked down at their joined hands and his thumb worried at her hurt skin.

"That hurts, you know," she told him.

"It's fascinating. I want to draw your hand. My wounds go away so quick that I barely remember the small ones. This is tiny, but you'll have it for a few weeks. Little red lines in your skin like glacier skids, and then pink lines, and then pale ones. Then the dry skin will flake away, and you'll be all new again," he said.

"Still stalling. You don't have to tell me. It's just that I want to know," Estrella said.

She pulled her hand away from his before he worried it bloody with his distracted rubbing.

"Did Bucky give you Ecstasy?"

"What?" Steve squawked, "Eya! I don't know what kind of wild ideas you have about what we do, but it's nothing like that. I'm not into men,"

She laughed at his ignorance. She patted his hand to soothe him.

"Ecstasy is a drug. Usually a pill. It makes you feel good, like you want to touch everything," she explained.

"Oh. Maybe. He wouldn't tell me what it was," Steve admitted.

"And then the girls," Estrella said.

"Let me start from the beginning," he told her.

"Please," she said.

"I left the restaurant."

"Because of Darcy. I don't like her," Estrella frowned strongly.

"Not completely because of Lewis. She was the last straw. I don't care for Darcy, either, but I don't think she's a bad person."

"Right. So, you left the restaurant…" Estrella prompted.

"I went to Buck's place. Maybe I should have taken a cab, but transportation in this city is so slow, I can go faster on foot. All the cameras. The phones, I mean. I had to break some of them. Some guys wanted me to stop and talk, and they were pushy about it. Anyway, I got to Buck's place. Hah! I forgot. He blew a hole in his door. He musta thought I was Hydra coming to get him. Anyway, I told him what I wanted," Steve said.

"You guys are creepy together," Estrella made a face.

"Yeah, I know you don't like him. But asshole that he is, he put it all together for me. I know he gets a kick out of shocking me anymore. He took me in a, uh, bdsm? Is that the acronym?"

Estrella nodded.

"He took me into a gay bdsm bar. Sweet Lord forgive us all, Eya. The things I saw in there," Steve said, and the straight and narrow part of him that she found so endearing shone clearly through in his expression.

"A gay bar? Steve! Did you get hit on?" she asked.

"I think so? A big hairy guy really wanted to know what I wanted,"

"A bear. If you'd been feeling a little more secure, the bears might have left you alone. You stood there looking lost, didn't you?"

"A bear. Big, hairy guy. Alright, I get it. Buck warned me about them. Do I have to tell you everything I saw in there?"

Steve looked like he was going to get stubborn if she demanded it. She shook her head. If she really wanted to know, she could ask Bucky. He was nasty. He would tell her what was in there.

"Good. I'm sure that's where he picked up the drugs. Then we got into a limo with some girls and their handler and went to a hotel. A nice hotel," he told her.

"Wait. You just got into some random limo and found girls there? Any girls? What about the Hydra agent?" she asked.

"No. No. Buck made some phone calls and set things up. The agent must have been already in place, waiting. I don't know if she was waiting for me specifically, or anyone on a list of people. Buck and Natasha are going to find out how her op was triggered when Buck called. Anyway. Three girls. Buck called for three women. For me," Steve said.

He was wallowing in guilt again. Estrella rubbed the back of his hand.

"What did they look like?"

"A blonde, a brunette, and a redhead," he told her.

"No. What did they look like? Anybody can dye their hair or wear a wig. How did Bucky know what you'd like, or did it not matter?" she asked.

"I don't want to talk about it," Steve said.
"I want to know. What makes Steve Rogers pant like a puppy?" she asked with a twinkle in her eyes.

"It wasn't about that. It was about something else," Steve said.

She stared at him expectantly.

"I wanted big girls who I was less likely to hurt, alright? I mean, they weren't fat. They were tall and a little Reubenesque," Steve said with more than a hint of grouchy.

Estrella pulled her chin back. She felt stung. She pushed down her feeling of rejection. What he said made good sense for him. She knew why he ran. If he wanted girls, they would be strong ones.

"Were they pretty?"

"Of course they were pretty. I suppose a guy could get ugly prostitutes if that's what he was into, but then they wouldn't seem ugly to him, would they? But no, they weren't ugly. They were classy. Big men pay big money for girls like these," he said.

"And you're a big man," Estrella pointed out.

"Well I'm large. But I'm not big. Like corporations and political connections. That's Tony," Steve said.

"I know. Go on. So you and Bucky and the girls go up to the nice hotel room," she tried to help him along.

Steve clammed up. He literally couldn't think of a way to describe the events inside the hotel room in a way that wouldn't cause his mother to want to wash out his mouth with borax. Estrella saw his jaw locked up and the words piled up in a jumble behind his eyes. He looked to her and shook his head.

"What's the first thing you did in the room? Was it the drugs?" she asked helpfully.

"No. We ate. Room service. Steaks. No. While we waited for room service to come with the steaks, I went with Tiffany. Or whatever her name was," Steve said.

He got a very specific look about him that he had when he thought of Hydra.

"I had sex with her, Estrella. I hurt her at first, because her insides were too small. Or I was too big. Buck came in when she yelled in pain," he said.

He shook himself. Estrella could feel disgust rolling off him in sheets that crumpled up and piled around them.

"You were fine with it before you knew she was Hydra," Estrella pointed out.

"I was stupid. Dumb. I should have known. I can't do anything without Hydra laying a steaming pile on it. I even made sure to make it up to her, that first bit of pain. I wanted her to have a good time," he sneered at himself.

"Only you, Steve. Such a gentleman, even with a paid woman," Estrella said.

"I won't do it again. I don't know why I thought it was a good idea at the time. That's how people ruin their lives, isn't it? They fall into doing what feels good at that moment. I did too. I'm no "Stop it. Your self-hate is starting to sound like icing to cover up a cake you're trying to feed me. Did you orgasm?" she asked bluntly.

Steve ground his teeth and nodded. He didn't have to like answering her, and he didn't have to tell her that he'd come twice and Buck had fussed at him for being careless with the prophylactic. But that was a lie of omission. His teeth rubbed so hard that Estrella could hear it.

"Twice," he bit out.

"Okay, so you were excited. That's why you ran off. And she was the first of the night. It wasn't that it was that woman. Or that Hydra agent. It would have been the same with any of the other girls, maybe even better. They were real professionals. She was only a fake. They wouldn't have been too small for you, inside," Estrella said.

Steve let out a long, controlled breath. Eya was right. It wasn't that Tiffany was anything special. Cold, dead, wet, stiff Tiffany. Stiffy Tiffy. Oh, God, that was horrible. His brain was fried from drugs. Didn't drugs fry your brain? He ground the heels of his hands into his eye sockets.

"How long ago did you last take anything?" Estrella asked.

"Eight hours? Nine? I don't know. I wasn't wearing anything. No watch," he said.

He held up his wrist for her to see his bare arms.

"How did she die?"

"Buck said he put three pills up her bottom. It would have been alright if she lived. He wanted her out of the way so I wouldn't be distracted thinking about work," Steve smiled a little, thinking of how swell Bucky was.

"Three? That's a lot, but maybe it shouldn't have killed her?" Estrella wondered.

"They were big pills. Buck got them at that bar, so maybe they were for large men. Bears. Buck doesn't run with low quality gear. I'm sure they were strong," Steve said.

"That's a strange way to kill someone," Estrella frowned.

"This is Buck we're talking about. He does what it takes to get the job done with the materials on hand. He's always been that way, even before. Especially before," Steve said.

"You love him," Estrella said.

"Course I do," Steve readily admitted.

Estrella was the one to take a deep breath and let it out carefully, this time. She needed to stop saying unkind things about Bucky. He wasn't going anywhere, and he was a very important part of Steve's life. Compared to Buck, her friendship with Steve was like a quick chat in a bar with a stranger.

The thought sobered her. It reminded her that she would be moving on someday. Away from this place and these amazing people. She didn't want to think of that right now.

"Eyaaa…" Steve chastised her.
She looked up to see his gorgeous blue eyes. So expressive. He knew what she was thinking. In general, anyway.

"Stop that," he said, and pressed a finger to her nose so that it mushed flat, and then to one side.

Estrella shook her face at him. She was being more moody than him, and he was recovering from drug use.

"So, how did Bucky get you to absorb the drugs?"

"He thought it out, and he had some experience, with what was done to him before. For the herbal stuff, he chopped it into a powder, cut my gums open, and packed a pocket of it in there. It healed in a minute or so, and then my blood started taking it in. It didn't last long. Maybe an hour. I didn't like the procedure much, but the effect was relaxing for a little while. For the other stuff, we did the same as he did with the girl. The Hydra agent," Steve corrected himself.

"He put it up your bottom? Steve, are you sure you and Bucky aren't a little more than friendly?"

"No. He had Jo-jo administer it to me. The redhead. I didn't like that part, but at least it wasn't Buck. He stood somewhere else and didn't watch. Not much. Not as much, dammit. He kept watch. He always does. That's why the Hydra woman didn't get me," Steve said.

"Buck watches everything you do?" Estrella had that sinking feeling again.

"It's not like you're thinking. I believe something's wrong with him. He never gets aroused. Not ever. Even when he should. When we're just talking, he's almost like the old Bucky. But when he's looking out for me, he's cold. I can see the assassin in him. The assassin wasn't allowed sex, I'm guessing. He's not exactly asexual, but it's close. He likes to tease and banter, but it's never deeper than words or a careless gesture," Steve said.

"That's not normal. If he's a healthy young man, then he should feel something. He used to?" she asked.

"Oh, yeah," Steve made a face like watching a train wreck, "Bucky was a living legend in the old neighborhood. It was so bad, it became a joke among us, and it carried on into the Commandos," Steve said.

His brow was troubled, too, now that Estrella had pointed it out to him.

"That arm. There's something in it. He won't let Tony touch it, but maybe he'll let Bruce," Steve said.

"Okay. You have something on your to-do list to help Bucky, after all the things he's done for you. If you want to count those as good things," she said dubiously.

"Buck isn't bad for me. He…” Steve's words trailed off as he noticed Estrella watching him with humor.

Steve's face turned rosy just a little at the tops of his cheekbones.

"Crunk," she said with victory.

"Crunk?"

"Bear trap," Estrella giggled at him.
"Bear…? Bear trap. That's so wrong, Eya!" Steve winced and shook his head, but he was smiling.

"It's that innocence. And the choirboy looks. It'll draw them in every time. But be careful. I can catch you up in it, too. You're so easy to lead into it," she teased.

"I know. But Bear trap? That's really rotten," he groaned in humiliation.

Steve smarted under the sting of the knowledge that big burly gay guys were drawn to him. He'd seen a lot looking and contemplating before that one had advanced on him.

"But it's true," she said, "I know you're this big hero and all. The biggest, really. Well, the most well-known heroic guy from Earth. Still, you come across as innocent. It's why Tony can't help but tease you. And Clint, too. Even Natasha."

"That's not true. I've got a higher kill count than Nat and Clint, barely. I didn't mean it to happen that way, but it was war. It is war. I'm not an innocent, by any definition, Estrella," he said.

"It's not in the numbers. It's in your heart. You still want to be good," she said.

"Maybe. And it's 'Angel-face'. That's what Buck calls it. I got us out of so much trouble with it when we were kids. Sometimes in the Army, too. I can't lie worth a frog's butt, but I can charm a snake oil salesman. Don't forget it, doll. My ma was the only person it sometimes didn't work on," Steve admitted.

"I'm terrified," Estrella told him blandly.

Steve looked at her much as he had Pepper in the elevator last night. He laid it on with just the right nuance of layers for a person of Estrella's skepticism. He started out with subtle, and blended into captivated moon-calf, through all the shades in between. It was like mixing colors for painting, he thought.

Estrella looked up at him, mesmerized.

"Crunk," he said, and touched her nose.

"Dammit!" Estrella shook her head and scowled.

He laughed while she beat at him on his hunched shoulders.

"You stink! Go shower," she told him, and she stormed off through the open elevator.

Steve laughed happily and rose to his feet. Gosh, he loved that girl. She helped him feel good inside, even when he tended toward sourness. As Jarvis closed the doors between them, he caught her looking back at him. Her scowl pulled into a shy smile. He pushed two extended fingers toward her, and she reached to him the same way, aiming through the distance.

They were good. He could go rest, now.

---

_Please note:_ Yes, Buck can be harsh. My version of Bucky isn't quite the sullen, harmless confused guy. I hope I haven't alienated my readers with the weird, distasteful stuff.
Chapter 31

A/N: You know Steve can't just sit back and enjoy it. C'mon! Captain America enjoying anything that's not grandma-approved? He's got to torture himself a little. I tried to get business done and make this short, because I'm eager to get to the fun stuff that comes right after.

Steve's eyes opened at a little after two in the afternoon and he knew that if he didn't get moving, the guilty conscience that was circling him like a vulture was going to land and start picking him apart. He made a large, boring sandwich to eat while he dressed in his workout gear. He could feel trouble coming for him like one of those acme anvils that fell out of the sky on the coyote and roadrunner cartoons.

His body felt amazing. He was free from the driven urge to hunt for sex, and from the grinding effort of trying to resist that urge. For the first time in days, he didn't need clothes that afforded him 'coverage' at the front.

He knew he'd behaved poorly, to say the least, and that a heavy load of remorse was waiting for him as soon as he let himself think of it. For the brief twenty minutes that it took him to get up, dress and eat, he tried to enjoy the physical relief that his appalling lack of good judgement had bought him. It was like forcibly ignoring personal issues while he was on duty as the Captain, except backwards. He was taking a few minutes to ignore duty and obligation while he could. It was an unfamiliar feeling, and he wasn't sure he liked it.

There was no official duty, no job to distract him today. Nothing was on the schedule, so he needed to find something to do. He wanted to work his body a little, since he felt so good at the moment. Estrella didn't get off work until four-thirty, and he didn't know if he should bother her, but he wanted to. He had to stay busy until then, at least.

Sam was on one of the treadmills when he got to the gym. Steve stepped onto the identical machine beside him and started running. It seemed that simply seeing another person who knew what he'd done was enough to start the litany of guilt in his head. It was too awkward to look Sam in the eyes and not acknowledge the painful muck-dragging he'd faced from Tony this morning.

"You're on the wrong side," Sam teased him.

"On your right, then," Steve corrected the phrase to match their current circumstance, but Sam could tell that his heart wasn't in the humor.

"At least you can't pass me up and make me look bad," Sam replied in a lingering stubborn attempt to lighten his friend's mood.

It wasn't going to work. Steve had a bit of guilt and worry clenched firmly in his teeth, and from the look of his jaw, he wasn't letting go of it anytime soon. The man was annoying, that he could run at that speed without even the need to open his mouth to breathe harder.

Steve and Sam ran for a while. Sam had already been sweating and puffing when Steve came in. After ten minutes, Sam got off the treadmill, drank some water and wiped his face. He stepped to the front of Steve's machine so he could say what was on his mind with Steve's full attention. He could see that maybe Steve didn't want to talk about what he'd done last night, but a few things needed saying.
He'd been there as Tony had asked all the questions when Steve came home. Thor had been hard to read, and mostly stood there with a carefully diplomatic face and nothing to say. Steve had told them the bald truth, but Sam had refused to let him answer a few personal questions because he could tell Steve was still not quite right in the head, with the lingering effect of the drugs in his system. Some stuff they needed to know, and some stuff they didn't. Sam didn't like how being part of the Avengers made some people feel they had a right to the man's personal life. He deserved some privacy.

"When's the last time you had any time off?" Sam asked.

"I try to take it easy on Sundays," Steve said while he ran.

His heavy footfalls made some noise on the deck of the treadmill, but it wasn't hard to speak above it.

"I don't mean one day. I mean vacation time. Real down time. You know, like normal people take when they go to Disneyworld or on a road trip, or go camping. When's the last time you had a week off?"

"I spent a few weeks off duty after I came out of the ice," Steve said.

"And you went to the Grand Canyon then? You went to see Niagara? Or maybe Dollywood?" Sam pressed him.

"Dollywood?" Steve asked.

"Just answer the question, Steve," Sam urged him.

He was pretty sure he already knew the answer.

"I haven't been anywhere. Not while I was off-duty," Steve admitted.

They'd been all over the world on the job, but that didn't count.

Sam was the second person to suggest he should take some time and go somewhere else to clear his head and get some perspective. Just last night before the restaurant, Tony had said pretty much the same thing.

"That's what I thought," Sam said.

"I know you're having all kinds of fun blaming yourself for all the messed-up things you did last night," Sam held up a hand to shush the righteous protest Steve was dying to make, "but you need to know that this has been brewing for way too long. You work a high stress job, and you haven't taken any real down time. Ever. You put a person under that kind of pressure with no relief time, and something's got to give. A super-soldier is still human. The rules do apply to you in some things," Sam said.

"I can't make excuses for what I did. It was wrong, and rationalizing it doesn't make it any less wrong," Steve insisted.

"It's not an excuse. It's a causative factor. I should have seen it coming, but I didn't," Sam frowned, as if it was his personal failing.

"I did those things, Sam. Not your fault, no matter what you think you should have seen coming," Steve denied.
"Man, will you shut up and have the decency to breathe while you run? I think everybody's tired of the righteous self-recriminations. Most everybody gets a little wild at some point in their life, usually before they're old enough for a senior citizen discount. You're long overdue, and it was your turn. That's all it is," Sam said with a dismissive shake of his head.

"But."

"No! No buts. It happened. You keep whatever fun you had from it. You work on fixing the bad parts. And take some time off. Go on vacation!" Sam called to him as he left the gym.

Steve ran on. Sam wasn't seeing the big picture. The first real clench of dread hit Steve in the gut as he thought of what word of last night could do to the Avengers as a whole, and to people who looked up to Captain America in particular. Heck, the Smithsonian was still running that display of his life as if he was a martyred saint instead of a real guy. He felt more than a little sick as he imagined a sleazy 'adults only' compilation film of last night's events offered in a side room as folks were leaving the exhibit. That's what he'd let himself become, just like every other role model that let people down nowadays.

Steve adjusted the speed on the treadmill to make it more challenging. It wouldn't fully distract him, but having to focus on not getting spit off the back of the machine helped. He kept on until it felt like the sole of his left shoe was starting to come loose. Sam would be pleased to see him breathing and sweating now.

When he was done in the gym, he took a quick shower to get the sweat off, and then changed into casual clothes. Steve was tired of being indoors. He wanted clean, fresh air and searing sunlight to chase away the gloom in his head. He followed his feet and ended up on the rooftop patio.

The late afternoon sun was warm, but up this high, the gusty breeze from over the ocean was cool. Steve wandered over past the loungers and stood by the railing. While his thoughts tried to get into some useful order, he pinched a tip off of the little grass-like plants on the garden cart. It didn't taste like much of anything, but it gave him something to worry between his teeth.

He had to set up Dana and Catherine and the little girl in some comfortable way while Natasha and Bucky ran down the connections and found out what they needed to know. The child was only in pre-kindergarten, so it's not like she'd miss any heavy academics while they worked at the problem. Julio didn't seem to know who his end-customer had been yet, and that was a good thing. Steve was hopeful that he could stay off the news, but he was trying to prepare himself for the worst. An organization like Julio's wouldn't sit quiet and simply enjoy having something dirty over Captain America. They'd want hush money.

He was going to have to prepare a statement, just in case. If a call for blackmail came in, he'd have to be ready to go to the media voluntarily. No way was he going to let himself get pushed around by underbelly thugs. He briefly considered going public right off, but decided against it. As cleansing as honesty would feel, he needed to protect people from what he'd done to their Captain if he could.

Steve thought about the guys at the VA hospital that he went to visit, and the guys at the VFW hall, too. There were the kids at the cancer hospital and their parents, and all the charity organizations he'd used his face for. And Father Miller and the folks at church. Steve winced. It was going to take a chunk out of him if he had to come out with this. Captain America would never be the same.

And his ma! Sarah Rogers was long dead, but she still lingered as a gentle voice and a kind face in his mind. He knew she was up there somewhere. Hopefully she couldn't see everything. For a stunt like he'd pulled last night, she wouldn't just twist his ear. She'd be Disappointed. He'd let her good name down, and his father's too. Steve hung his head and felt shame so thick that it was hard to breathe past it. Morals and righteousness were nice standards to wave around, but his ma... She'd be heartbroken. She hadn't raised him to go with paid girls and put illegal stuff in his body.

"Captain, Sir is wondering if he may join you," Jarvis said from somewhere nearby.

Steve wiped at his eyes. Tony had been to the point and cool with him this morning. Distant. Like he didn't know what to do with him. Maybe like he was a misbehaved employee that he was displeased with, but that his company couldn't afford to let go. It had been worse than sarcasm and snide remarks. Stark had been seriously rattled. It wasn't at all the gleeful reaction Steve and Clint had expected.

"Captain? Are you well?" Jarvis asked kindly.

"I'm fine. Tell Tony I don't mind if he wants to come out. It's his place," Steve said.

He stood up straighter from the slump he'd let his posture assume. He wiped at his face again and took a deep breath. If Tony wanted to rip into him, it was no more than he deserved.

He heard quiet footsteps, and Stark came to stand beside him. Rather than face him square on in confrontation, he stood facing the glass rail like Steve did. Steve waited, ready to defend himself if Tony said something outrageous or wrong. He was ready to accept blame for whatever trouble he'd caused that he didn't realize yet. Pepper always knew about and anticipated trouble that he didn't foresee, and she would have shared her concerns with Tony.

Tony stayed quiet for a long moment. A strong gust of wind made them both sway a little. Tony cleared his throat and glanced aside to meet his eyes. Meekness? Was that what he was seeing? It didn't look right on a man like Stark.

"Pepper told me I was wrong, and I see that now. I shouldn't have-"

"No, you're right to call me on it," Steve shook his head.

"Don't interrupt me! This is hard enough. Will you let me talk, here?" Tony snapped, then immediately looked contrite again.

Steve nodded once, and bowed his head to look at his shoes.

"I look up to you. No! Let me say this," Tony said when Steve started shaking his head in protest, "Howard... Dad... He made you out to be this paragon. This perfect man. Working with you for a few years, I've found that it's pretty much true. No, listen! I thought it was all bullshit. But it's not. One big dose of self-sacrifice was easy enough for me. It only takes a few minutes to fly a nuke into space. There's no time for angst or regrets in that. But you do sacrifice like a pro all day long, every day. All the little chronic sacrifices over time are a lot harder to live with. I'm not that good."

Steve sighed. After Clint was done laughing this morning, he'd told Steve to not worry about last night so much. Bruce had said similar words to him, and Natasha had even given him a look that seemed to mean something similar. He didn't know where Tony was going with this, but it was starting to sound like more feel-good smoke blown up his ass. Hah! He'd literally put stuff up his ass. Feel-good stuff. Steve grimaced, then frowned. Now was not the time to look distracted, when Tony was trying so hard to say something serious.

"I didn't realize that you'd become an idol for me too. Not like I'm a fan! Iron Man will always be my favorite Avenger. What I'm doing a really shitty job of saying is that I think I was so hard on you this morning because you're up here," Tony said, and held a hand out above both their heads.

"I was counting on pulling myself up with that. Pepper makes me want to be a better man. For her. I don't know anybody better than you," he looked at Steve sharply, "and you fell. Last night, you fell to my level. It hurt. I didn't expect it to, and I know that's selfish. Fuck! Pepper said all this so much better. The point is, you did no worse than I've done a hundred times. I shouldn't have put you on a pedestal, but it's hard not to. You're still the better man, Steve. I only made the sacrifice play that once. Every other day, I do what I want. You only fell once. Well, maybe twice, with that blowjob thing a while back at Barnes's place."

"And the lap dance at the strip club, and a few girls across Europe," Steve admitted quietly.

Tony stared avidly for a moment, then shook his head.

"Part of me wants to know all about that. I won't ask, because you'll tell me, won't you?" Tony asked in a rush.

Steve shrugged. He didn't know what he should do. Guilt made him want to admit everything he'd done. But if Tony was trying to be different and he was looking to him for guidance, maybe he'd better keep his mouth shut.

"No more soul searching. Have you ever had hives? Of course you haven't. Any more of this honesty bullshit, and I'll break out in hives." Tony tried a weak grin, and it came across as sickly.

"I've had hives, Tony. I used to get outbreaks all the time when I was a kid," Steve said.

"Oh. Right," Tony said briskly.

Tony's mind was already on other things, now that his apology speech was over. He rubbed his hands together and waved Steve over to a lounger. They sat, each on the foot of a chair. Tony seemed to have a plan, so Steve waited to hear it.

"We have to keep this quiet if we can. Not that you're not entitled to be human sometimes, but your adoring public would feel even more crushed and aflutter than I did. The girls…" Tony snapped his fingers repeatedly.

"They're women, Tony. Catherine and Dana. Dana's daughter is Melody," Steve told him.

"We've put NDAs in front of them and they seemed to understand what they were signing and why. Romanoff feels optimistic about Catherine keeping her mouth shut, but we're not so sure about Dana. It's time to pay for your play, Cap. You're sending them on a ten day Caribbean cruise," Tony told him.

"It's a good plan, if they'll go for it," Steve agreed, "it keeps them away from Julio for a few days and buys some time. What then? Nat says I can't be tied to them, but I want to help them if they want to make any changes in their lives."

"You're not getting this. Stop thinking about them for a minute and worry about your own skin. Medical tested them for STDs and pregnancy. They're clean, as of this morning, not that you'd have to worry about diseases. Ten days away on a ship, and we test them again when they get back. What happens then depends on the results," Tony said.

"But I used…" Steve said.

Tony looked at him patiently. Steve re-examined his memories of last night's sexual encounters.
Shit! At first, Buck had made sure he used a rubber every time. Then, things got fuzzy after he allowed Dana to put the drugs in him. Buck had been distracted, probably dealing with the Hydra agent, and Steve didn't remember anything but sex after that. He remembered hedonistic pleasure, possibly not interrupted or impeded by safety measures.

"Barnes admitted that he lost track of things in the bedroom while he was dealing with the other woman. We have to consider the possibility of consequences. We offered them the pill, but only Dana took it," Tony told him.

"What pill? What good does a pill do at this point? I thought you had to take those every day for a month before sex," Steve said.

Tony blew out a breath and drummed his fingers on the metal frame of the lounger. He felt like he was about to tell a kid that Santa Clause wasn't real. No, this was worse, because he wouldn't mind doing that. Tony knew that Steve wasn't going to react well.

"I guess you didn't hear about it yet, but there's a 'morning after' pill. If conception does happen, this pill usually takes care of it. It's designed to make the woman's body reject the embryo. I had some time to read today, and--"

"No," Steve said strongly.

"No, you won't let them have the pill? You can't decide that for them," Tony said.

"The hell I can't! If anybody is pregnant from last night, then it's my baby, too. I get a say in this. No kid should be rejected by his mom, especially if his dad wants him!" Steve nearly shouted.

Steve was flushed with anger. It was a scary sight completely different than his bashful blushes. His eyes didn't look like this when he was bashful. At least he was keeping his fists to himself.

"There's no need to get angry now. Dana already took the pill, and Catherine refused it. We don't have a say in what they choose. They're the women. They have to carry it for nine months," Tony cautioned him.

"I'm not talking about the woman. Pregnancy is a temporary condition, and I'll pay for the best of care and stand by her if I caused it. I'm talking about my child. If somebody is pregnant and I did it, then I damn sure want my kid! Do you think I'd leave him out there with my blood in him, my serum in him, for Hydra or anybody to take and experiment on? And I don't want him killed without him having any choice as to whether he gets to live or not. There are three people in that kind of decision, not just the woman," Steve said.

"I hear you, but that's an old-fashioned way of seeing it. People don't see an embryo as human life anymore. As a disciple of science, I'd argue that point because an embryo meets all the criteria for life of its particular species, but there are agendas and money out there. Politics," Tony told him.

The look Steve gave him made Tony put his hands up in an "it's not me" gesture. This time, it really wasn't. Stark Industries had stayed carefully out of the field of human reproductive ethics. It wasn't their product market, anyway, and Pepper didn't like taking intractable positions when the wind kept changing and there was no profit in the risk.

"None of that matters to you right now. You have to wait. It's nearly impossible that anybody could be pregnant. Both of them were on birth control because of their jobs, and Catherine said it was the wrong time of the month for her. Dana took the pill. I wouldn't worry about it," Tony said.

Steve stood up, and he had that look about him like he was about to go reprimand someone. Tony grabbed his pants leg. He wished he was wearing the suit for this, because stopping Steve when he was already in motion nearly pulled him off his seat.

"Sit down, Steve. Dana made her choice. It's already done. Believe me. I've been here before. The only thing you can ever do to completely control this is to not get your dick wet in the first place," Tony said.

"Hah! Am I hearing Tony Stark advocating chastity?" Steve asked sarcastically.

"Not at all," Tony shook his head, "I like living dangerously. Always have. And like you, I can afford to play. Well, I used to could afford it. It's not about money anymore for me. About the paying part…"

"It's not a game, Tony. I wasn't playing. I know damn well what sex is for. It's been for the same thing since the beginning of time. Why do you think I don't mess around? I just… couldn't take it anymore. I never wanted to hurt anyone, but I wasn't thinking clearly. So now I need to be responsible," Steve said.

"I'd be happy to manage this for you, since I'm an expert, but Pepper says that you're a 'real boy' now, and you need to step up," Tony said.

"I can figure it out, Tony. I'll use the conglomerate account to book their vacation, then transfer my personal funds to cover it so my name isn't attached. Bill me for their care in medical, too. Where do cruise ships leave from? I'll drive them there," Steve said.

"They leave from San Juan. Happy will drive them to the airport, and Romanoff will put a tracker on them to check that they get on the ship and stay on it. The less you're seen to be involved with the physical part of the arrangements, the better," Tony said.

Steve sat for a moment longer, thinking.

"I might take some time off," he told Tony.

"You should. Hill has agents dealing with things in D.C. for now. There's nothing we can do for a few days, since Barnes blows everything up without retrieving the data," Tony said.

His frustrated expression told Steve what Tony thought about Buck's blast and burn methods of taking down Hydra.

"I'm sorry I let you down, Tony, but I'm surprised. I thought you'd be pleased," Steve said.

"I thought I would be, too," Tony admitted.

Tony looked into the far distance for a moment, then turned a 'what are you waiting for? Why are you still here?' look at Steve.

"Thanks for your help," Steve told him.

"Sorry I was an asshole hypocrite," Tony said.

"No, you were a hairy, bleeding asshole hypocrite," Steve pointed out.

Tony nodded.

Steve gripped his shoulder for a moment in silent acceptance of their situation. He and Tony frequently disagreed, but they usually worked toward the same goal.
"No apologies, big man. Practice that. Unless it's your woman, and then that rule doesn't apply at all," Tony said.

Steve brought his laptop down several levels to the temporary apartments Jarvis directed him to. He knocked on Catherine's door and asked her to join him in Dana's place across the hall.

Steve kept his demeanor strictly professional, and that made the women uneasy. It wasn't how they were used to dealing with men, especially customers.

Little Melody was jumping on the couch in front of the television. There was a plate of macaroni and cheese on the coffee table and a coloring book and markers beside it. The little girl carefully ignored him and sat down to eat a bite of her supper. Steve thought it was odd that a child would ignore a strange man in her personal space, and he didn't want to contemplate why she had reason to do so.

Dana and Catherine went with him into the dining room and he opened his laptop on the table. They stood together a few steps away from him, suspicious. Steve didn't like that they looked afraid, but he understood it.

"I know it can feel intimidating here in the tower. They took your phones, so you feel isolated and powerless. Everyone has plans for you that you don't understand. You get told where to go and you don't know what's coming next. The medical ward with their tests, and then Stark's people shuffling you around. I know. I still feel that sometimes. They mean well. Please, sit down and help me figure this out. While we think about what to do with Julio, we want to send you on vacation so he can't find you," Steve explained his presence in the apartment and theirs in the tower as concisely as he could.

Cathy sat down next to him, and Dana stood behind her, both of them still concerned.

"What do you mean about vacation? And why do you need to do anything with Julio?" Cathy asked.

The women looked different, dressed in ordinary jeans and tops. They were still very pretty, but they weren't bewitching and mesmerizing as they'd been last night when he'd first gotten into the limo, or when he'd been with them in the hotel room. They looked like worried people. Dana looked like a worried parent, with her attention split between his visit and what was going on with Melody in the other room. Steve felt for them.

"My associate told you that Tiffany-"

"Madison," Cathy said.

"Thank you. He told you that Madison left with Julio this morning. That wasn't true. They don't want me to tell you this, but I think you deserve to know. Madison was an agent for Hydra. She was going to try to kill us. To kill me, at least. I'm not sure if she would have let you both live. Hydra agents usually don't. Do you know what Hydra is?" Steve asked.

Cathy looked a little green. Dana nodded.

"Hydra's on the TV with you. They're who you fight. They're real?" Dana asked.

"Yes, ma'am. They're just as real as I am. I have agents of my own working to find out how Hydra knew to put an operative with us last night. We're investigating Julio, and I don't want Julio angry with either one of you, if he thinks you have anything to do with this. My associates think that neither one of you is Hydra?" Steve half-asked.

He only felt a little bit bad for placing his words in such a way as to get them thinking as he wanted them to. They couldn't understand how dangerous Hydra was, and he needed them scared enough to be safe.

"I'm not with Hydra!" Dana said.

Cathy shook her head vigorously, looking worried that he would think it of her. Steve leaned toward believing them.

"But what happened to Madison?" Dana asked.

"She had specialized concealed weapons. She was about to execute her operation, so she was neutralized," Steve said as gently as he could.

"You mean your friend killed her," Cathy said.

"He didn't directly try to kill her. He made her unable to execute her operation, and the result was that she died," Steve said.

Cathy and Dana sat very quietly. They didn't look at him or each other. They looked at the floor.

"You don't have to be afraid while you're in our care. It was bad luck on your part to be there when it happened. So, now we're trying to protect you until the trouble blows over. I want to put you on a cruise ship in the Caribbean for ten days. The both of you and Melody. Julio won't be able to find you. When you get back, you're free to do as you like, after we examine you in medical again. I feel partly responsible for what happened, but not for Hydra being evil. You probably wouldn't have been exposed to Hydra action if I hadn't been your customer," he explained.

"That's not true. It happens all the time. They use the trade as cover for hits. They wait for somebody on a list to call in, then they send a girl or guy, just like they did with you. I haven't been there when it happened, but there's rumors. Last year a friend of mine was at a big party. The news said the governor's assistant fell and hit his head, but there was a new girl working that night, and nobody ever saw her again," Cathy said, low and fast.

"Would you talk to my associate about that? It could help us a lot," Steve said.

"I shouldn't. I could get in trouble for saying what I did," Cathy told him.

"I understand. You'll have time to think about it while you're away on vacation. When you come back, we can provide you with a new identity and move you somewhere else, if it makes you feel safer," Steve said.

"Like the witness protection program?" Dana asked.

"Not exactly. Our version of it is better," Steve said.

Cathy looked at him with lingering fear, but he thought he saw hope there, too. He wasn't sure what Dana was thinking.

"You said a vacation? On a cruise ship? It can't be free. What do you want in return? I'm not doing any work if my daughter is there," Dana said.

Steve stared at her for a moment until he understood. He felt sad that life had been unkind enough to her that she felt everything had a price that she needed to pay in that way. He had to think of how to make the vacation acceptable to them, like he was making a deal. He was, but not for the reason they thought. They couldn't understand that the most important aspect of it all was that his serum, his genes were protected. He wouldn't tell them the real reason and give them the ability to hurt him or potentially his child, if there was to be one.

"The vacation isn't free. You know who I am. I shouldn't have done what I did last night. I can't have a regular relationship with a woman. It's too dangerous. But I'm only a man. I had a weak moment. I had my associate make the phone call, and now I'm paying for it. This is me asking for your silence. This is me paying for one good night," Steve told them with exactly the right shades of sorrow and regret. The kind of sorrow Captain America would feel if he found himself doing wrong. He was careful not to overdo it.

The two jaded working girls looked at him. Cathy reached to put her hand on his knee and her lower eyelids pooled with moisture.

"Aw, honey. You shouldn't have to feel that way for one night's fun. You're so sweet. With what you do for everybody, I would have given it to you for free, but I can't do that with Julio waiting," Dana said.

"Help me, then. Keep what happened between us. Let me get you away from the city for a few days until the investigation is done. I can fix things with Julio, if it turns out that he's got nothing to do with Hydra. He won't be angry if he gets paid for all the days I keep you, will he?" Steve asked.

"Don't do that. We only work twice a week, on Wednesdays and Saturdays. He already got paid for last night, so... Saturday, next Wednesday, and next Saturday is all you need to pay to make Julio happy. If he's not Hydra," Cathy said.

"Anthony might be Hydra. I never liked him," Dana said to Cathy.

Whoever Anthony was, it was clear that he wasn't a nice guy. Buck was already following all available links, and he was sure this Anthony was on the list.

"So you'll let me send you, then? On the cruise?" Steve asked hopefully, like a man who felt the urgency to keep things quiet.

That wasn't his main motivation, but it played well for his purposes. Steve shoved down the resentment he felt toward Dana for taking that pill which might be ending his kid's life right now. Tony was right. There was nothing he could do from here but move forward. By acting so concerned about secrecy, he knew he appeared to be giving these women power over him. He'd deal with that if he had to. It was worth the hit to his public image if keeping Catherine and Dana compliant helped him have more control over what happened to his DNA, his serum, maybe his child.

Cathy smiled and nodded. Dana grinned big and sat down on his other side. For a half hour, they perused the cruise ship departure dates and itineraries until they found a ten day Southern Caribbean cruise that the ladies seemed excited about. Steve used the anonymous business account that Stark kept for such purposes and paid in full for their vacation. Cathy and Dana kissed his cheek and hugged him, then Dana ran to the other room to excitedly tell her daughter about their vacation. Steve didn't know what was so exciting about being stuck on a ship for ten days, but the women seemed pleased about it.

"Is this happening?" Cathy asked him in a moment of quiet.
"Unfortunately for me, yes. I'm glad that you get some time off and a nice vacation, but I would rather things hadn't happened this way. I wanted to forget about my troubles and have fun last night, but Hydra had to get at me again," Steve said.

"Don't worry about it, Captain. Dana's a little breezy through the ears, but I'll say a few things to her while we're away. You won't hear any talk from us. I'm really sorry that last night turned out to be so much trouble for you," she said.

Cathy held onto his arm while they stood in the doorway and watched Dana try to explain to the child what a cruise ship was. Steve wanted to slip away from Cathy's friendly contact with him. It didn't feel right. He didn't know her well enough for her to stand so close, but he had to play the part that would get the results he needed. He had to leave them feeling happy and sympathetic with him. He wasn't lying about any of it, but he was playing on their feelings. Manipulating. It felt dirty. This was why he wouldn't be a good agent like Nat was. He could do it, but his conscience bothered him too much.

"Thanks for helping me out with this. Here. You'll need clothes and luggage so you can enjoy your vacation," Steve said.

He put some cash in Cathy's hand, and since Dana was paying attention, he passed her some too. She looked down and counted it.

"Are you for real?" Dana asked giddily.

"Yes, ma'am," Steve said.

Dana squealed and bounced forward to hug him. The little girl looked on, solemn and uncertain. The sadness he felt for the child was real. Little kids shouldn't have to look like that. He shoved the idea of one of these women bearing his child to the back of his mind for later. He didn't judge them or the circumstance that had gotten them here, but he never wanted a child of his to look as distant and hopeless as little Melody.

"I have to go. Have a nice vacation," Steve said.

"Do you have to go so soon? We could eat," Dana offered speculatively.

The look in her eyes made him queasy, but he hid it.

"Leave him alone, Dana. I'm sure he's got other things to take care of," Cathy admonished.

"Well, if you're ever…" Dana persisted, but Steve was gone.

He'd left so fast that the door knob was embedded in the wall in the foyer.

"Don't try to bother him. He's not like the rest," Cathy said.

The cartoons on the television played as background noise, and Melody jumped on the couch again. Dana went to shut the door.

"I can see that. I wanted to be sweet to him. He's a good man. How come all the good ones we find are unavailable?" Dana asked.

It was an old, tired question and Cathy didn't bother answering it.

"Just leave him alone. I feel sorry for him. He didn't mean any harm. He and his friend probably saved our lives. We need to help him," Cathy said.

"Uh-huh," Dana agreed.

She went to get a beer from the refrigerator. It was amazing how nice things were in Tony Stark's tower. Everything was clean and new, and the refrigerator and pantry came fully stocked. Dana didn't want to leave. After the cruise was over, if that was really going to happen and nobody was lying to them, she wanted to think of a way to stay in this place.

Steve went back to his suite and took a hot shower again. It was his third shower of the day. He knew he wasn't dirty, but he wanted to wash any hint of the women from his skin. Estrella was off work by now, and if she'd have him, he wanted to see her. He was quick with drying himself and getting into fresh clothes. Dark jeans and a natural colored cable-knit sweater went with the same dark leather shoes from earlier.

"Jarvis, please let her know that I'm coming. Ask if she'll meet me by the elevator," he said.

"I assume you mean for me to speak to Miss Estrella?" the AI asked.

"Yes."

"I have done as you ask, and I certainly don't mind doing so, but perhaps it would be a touch more personal if you were to text her with your phone," Jarvis suggested mildly.

"Uf," Steve said.

In his mental distraction today, he hadn't remembered to bring his phone with him everywhere. Used to, people didn't carry phones around, and now he spent half his time with a comm device in his ear, or Jarvis available to relay information.

Estrella came out to see him where he leaned on the wall beside the elevator doors. She smiled at him in welcome and snuggled up to him. Steve's arms went around her eagerly.

"Eya, I'm sorry. I'm so sorry," he said.

She'd been remarkably kind and understanding to him this morning. He didn't deserve that. Just now, he'd come from seeing those women again, and even with a shower, he didn't feel clean enough for Estrella. Not that Cathy and Dana were dirty, but seeing them made him feel dirty for what he'd done and how he was having to behave to handle everything. He still felt nice, physically, but the weight of his conscience was just as bad or worse than dealing with the stress of an overactive libido.

"What are you sorry for now?" she asked him.

She was wearing the same clothes from this morning, and he still thought she looked wonderful dressed plainly and clean of makeup. Her hair was a little messed, like maybe she'd lain on it, and there was a food smudge on her shirt. He hugged her tighter.

"Everything. I had to go see the women just now. The ones from last night. Tony had a good idea of how to keep them happy and quiet about it all, so I'm sending them on a cruise ship. They were down in medical this morning, and Tony said-"

Estrella put a finger over his lips.
"Is there anything else left to do about it today?" she asked.

He shook his head.

"So stop worrying about it. Do you want to go to the coffee shop or something? I was about to start supper for us, but maybe you should get out of here for a while," she suggested.

Estrella didn't like seeing him this bothered. He'd probably been anxious about things all day, and it was time for him to relax. She wanted time with him. Time that was just theirs, away from all the eyes and ears in the tower, but she didn't want to invite herself along on an evening outing with him. The last one hadn't ended well.

Steve nodded. That sounded like a good plan. They could go anywhere. Someplace different. Maybe out of the city. Estrella took her finger from his lips.

"I'll go get my phone. I haven't looked at it all day. Meet you here?" he asked.

"Give me a few minutes. I want to change," Estrella said.

She didn't mention that she'd suggested that he get out of the tower. If he wanted her to go with him, she wasn't going to deny him, but things had to be different from last night.

Steve nodded. He jogged back through the open elevator and into his suite. His phone waited for him on his nightstand. There were messages. Papa John's had a pizza offer for him. Fury had words for him. He tapped on the little image he'd captured that represented Buck's ID.

You up yet? Buck had asked hours ago, when he was on the treadmill.

C'mon. I know you burn through shit fast. You can't still be asleep. Buck had asked a half hour after the first message.

Get back with me when you can, he'd said another half hour after that.

Forgot my phone in my room. Is everything alright with you? Steve responded.

Yeah, I'm good. Finishing up at the work site. Wanted to know if you were okay in the head.

I've had better days, but today isn't the worst. I'll be alright. You went in to work today? I thought you were finding ties on Julio, Steve texted.

I can do both. I'm talented.

Buck, you're an idiot. I never meant to work you like this. I was serious about you taking the day off.

Don't sweat it, Stevie. We've both run long ops before. This is nothing and you know it.

Sure. Be that way. Make me feel worse than I already do.

Worse? You better be feeling damn good, after last night. What more could a fella want? Buck asked.

Steve couldn't think of what to say after that. He grabbed his wallet, his keys, and his old leather jacket. While he thought of a response, he walked back over through the elevator. Buck responded before he could think of anything
Was your little walk on the dark side fun enough for ya? I can make it darker, if that wasn't enough, Buck texted.

Steve ground his teeth. Bucky was messing with him. He could see the smartass look on his face and hear the taunt in his voice. It wasn't a dare. Buck knew better. It was admonishment.

Already too much. Thanks, but no. Steve sent back.

You say that now. Wait til it's riding you hard again. If you let it build, you'll want the same shit.

Steve scowled at his phone and made an effort not to tap too hard on the screen. He leaned against the wall in the same spot as before to wait for Estrella while she got ready to go out.

You don't know what I feel. You don't feel anything anymore, do ya? Steve challenged him.

Damn was all the got of a message, then there was Buck's ID on an incoming call.

Soon as Steve opened the call, Bucky was in his ear.

"I'm extrapolating. I'm good at it. I know how I felt back in the old days when we were young and all I could think about was gettin off. I know how I felt in the Commandos when Zola's shit was in my veins, cranking everything up and making it that much worse. And I know the high expectations you have of yourself. Plus, you got the full dose. The good stuff, from Erskine, not that half-assed kook Zola. Maybe I'm guessing, but I bet I'm not off by even a full hair. Whatever's pushing you, whatever pushed you into last night, it'll be back. You need to watch yourself and do something a lot less stupid next time," Buck said.

Steve was quiet for a moment, absorbing it all. Buck was right. It would be back. Soon. He could feel it coming on already.

"Stevie? That better be you, and not one of your friends with a cape messing around with your phone," Buck growled.

"It's me," he assured.

"Good. So? Am I right, or am I right?"

"You're right," Steve reluctantly admitted.

"Look, I don't blame you. I know I'd do a lot worse. But that's not you. You gotta think of a way to keep it on the right side of the line. C'mon, Steve. Think of your ma. She was a sweet lady. You can't let her down like this. Not anymore."

"I know," Steve said.

Buck just had to bring his ma into it. Neither of them liked being snapped with that leash. Growing up, their mothers were pretty much the only ones who held them in line. Them, and the nuns. Buck was concerned if he was using that kind of guilt now. Steve was the one who used to turned it on Buck.

"So?" Bucky prompted him.

"So I'm thinkin on it. I have been. Jeez, you think I'm okay with being like this!"

"I know you're not," Buck said in a rare gentle tone, "So think harder. I've been in comm with Natalia all day off and on. She's worried about you too. Between all of us, we should be able to figure this out. You ever considered getting a steady? Settling down?"

"Sure. It sounds nice," Steve said with dry sarcasm, "You know we can't do that to a girl, me or you."

"You can. You should. I'll stand guard, if that's what it needs," Buck offered.

Steve couldn't get words past the clench in his throat. He remembered telling Buck he loved him last night. It made him burn with embarrassment now, how he'd said it and what he'd been doing at the time. He remembered Buck's gruff, reluctant return of the sentiment. This phone call was Buck saying it again. He wasn't just saying. He'd act on it, too. Steve knew that Buck would fight til his last to protect a girl of his. He shouldn't have to, but he would. And Steve would do the same for anyone Bucky loved. Maybe that was the answer to some of this mess. They could watch each other's soft spots.

"You unchoked yet?" Buck asked with a grin in his voice.

"Workin on it," Steve croaked.

He could hear street sounds on Buck's end of the call, and the particular sound of his footsteps when he wasn't trying to be quiet.

"You walkin home?" Steve asked.

"Yeah. It's a nice evening. You should go up on the roof or somethin," Buck said.

"I'm waiting on Estrella. We're going somewhere. I dunno where. Not here."

"Give her a chance, Stevie. I like her. She's got moxie. Tell me, if your ma was standing in front of you today, would you ever hit her? Would you ever hurt her, no matter how wound tight you were, no matter what she nagged you with?"

"That's a dumb thing to ask. You know I wouldn't," Steve said.

"If you find a girl you love… one you really love, not just lust after, I don't think you'll hurt her, either. If you like that girl, even if she's breakable, I think you should give it a chance," Buck said.

"I'll think about it. But not yet. I gotta be straight with her. I can't do anything til I'm sure I didn't get to the girls last night. Near the end, I don't think I listened to you. I don't remember using a rubber for the last bit," Steve said.

They could both hear the quiet dread in his words.

"Wait til you know. But don't wait too long," Buck advised.

Steve could hear him going inside. The street sounds faded, and frightened voices called out, hastily slammed behind doors. Buck trudged up the stairs like a tired man.

"Fuck. I gotta get a new door."

"Nah. Just patch that one. It's not much of a door, anyway, if you can shoot through it," Steve said.

"Yeah, cheap rent tends to be that way," Buck said.

The comment brought back unpleasant memories for both of them of the Soldier making good on his target through Steve's apartment wall.
"See ya," Steve said.

"Later," Buck agreed.

Steve let the call end and thought of him and Estrella trying to make something work. He was probably an idiot to listen to Buck, but it was a sweet daydream.

Thinking about Estrella forcefully displaced his concerns about the other women. Just like the girl herself, his thoughts of her left him little room for anything else. After the day he'd had, the anticipated burn of her personality soothed and excited him at the same time. Was this a date? He hadn't meant it that way, but it probably was. They'd be alone at last. Tonight he trusted himself enough to not scare her or hurt her. If he was going to have one night of calm sanity, then he very much wanted to spend it with her.

When Steve heard someone about to come out of Nat's suite his eyes flashed eagerly over to see her. At first, he didn't understand what he was seeing. Then his eyes widened in surprise. The sight of Estrella grabbed the last of his troubled thoughts and strangled the life out of them.

Note: I don't believe in dirty rotten cliffhangers of any sort, and that's not what this is. I've got chapter 32 written and mostly edited, but I need sleep. I'll get it out to you within 24 hours. It's a lot more fun than this chapter was. Writers love reviews like dogs love trucks. Happy Mardi Gras, y'all! Eat good, 'cause it's ashes tomorrow.
Chapter 32

Estrella came out of Nat's suite wearing a slouchy newsboy hat over her combed down hair. Steve's jaw fell open in surprise at the rest of her look. She wore dark pinstripe pants, brown derby shoes, a crisp navy blue men's button-down shirt and suspenders. His brain babbled a bunch of things at him at once.

A lady shouldn't dress like a man, he thought. It was confusing. She looked like a boy, except she didn't. She was dressed exactly as he and Buck used to dress, if they'd ever had nice, new clothes. Her butterfly voice modulator was threaded onto a thin black tie that hung jauntily askew down her chest. Her dark eyes gleamed at him with a mischievous smile as she sauntered toward him with her hands in her pants pockets. Long, thick black lashes fluttered at him as she tried to play off the masculine look boldly, but faltered into girly shyness.

"Buu..." Steve protested dumbly.

His heart was pounding and he didn't know why.

Estrella came to a stop in front of him, instead of giving him an exuberant hug as she had earlier. Her more reserved nature matched her masculine attire and twisted up his brain a little more. He was always aware that she was female, and that was somehow emphasized by her boyish clothing.

"Where are we going?" she asked.

"Um. Uh... The beach? I was thinking Rockaway?" Steve muttered.

Estrella nodded and got into the open elevator. She looked deeply pleased with herself. Steve followed her quietly. He made him nervous. He didn't know much of what to do with a girl on an ordinary day. Estrella had always been different. Easy to talk to. Right now, he didn't know what to make of her.

She watched him from aside and under her lashes and smiled to herself. Her intention had been to shock his mind away from thinking of his troubles. It looked like her effort was working splendidly. She'd never seen Steve looking so flummoxed. Whatever bit of worried man was left in him was chased off by the uncertain boy left in his place.

"Capt-"

"No, Jarvis. This is Steve. Take us to wherever Steve's bike is," Estrella insisted.

"Very well, Miss," Jarvis complied.

Steve smiled at her forceful defiance of Jarvis' preferred name for him. The AI wasn't likely to quit calling him by his title, but for now, he didn't have to hear it. The elevator ride was silent. Steve smelled a hint of woodsy, intriguing men's cologne. It wasn't coming from him. His nose wanted to nuzzle around until he found what part of her skin she'd applied it to. Steve would have moved closer to her, but her attire and stance made him keep his distance. He wasn't in the habit of getting cozy with people who dressed like that.

They got out on the garage level, and Estrella headed for his bike. Steve followed after, mesmerized by how she combined slightly masculine mannerisms with a distinctly feminine movement of her hips and legs. He shook his head sharply. He was going to have to drive them, and he needed to think about her safety.
"We shouldn't take the bike. If we got in a wreck, you could get hurt," he said.

"We won't get in a wreck. Traffic is so slow, I could get off the bike and step aside from a wreck. Stop worrying," she told him.

She was probably right. Still, he walked over to the cabinet near the motorcycles and got the helmet that Pepper used when Tony took her out. He swiped the cap off Estrella's head, tucked it into the back of his jeans, and put the helmet in her hands firmly.

"Put it on, or I'll call us a cab," he said.

Estrella frowned at the helmet, but she looked at him and the bike. She tugged the sleek black helmet on and clipped the chin strap. Steve put his helmet on and sat on the bike. He started it, then held out a hand to help Estrella get on behind him. It was a big bike, too high and broad for her to just hop on. He liked the feel of her hand in his, and then she was snugged up to his backside as the bike rumbled under them. The engine was loud in the concrete of the garage.

"You settled?" he asked her.

Her helmet clunked against his in a nod. Steve smiled and backed the heavy bike up with his legs. They had to wait a moment as the garage gate opened, and then Steve took them out into traffic. It was almost sunset, and people were going home for the evening, or going out for supper. Traffic eased forward, and Steve spent much of the time with his feet skimming above the pavement at slow speed.

Estrella had her feet perched on the passenger spikes, and she liked the way she could feel the muscles of Steve's legs and bottom shifting as he guided the bike. Her arms wrapped around his middle, and she rested her chin against his shoulder. She wished the helmet wasn't in the way. His leather jacket smelled good. It was scuffed and scorched and smelled just as much of battlefield incendiary as of leather.

For most of the way, they were in the city. They crossed over a few bridges. Being out high over the water on the open air seat of the bike felt adventurous for Estrella. One of her uncles had given her a ride on his little moped when she was eight years old, but it had been nothing this. Everything was bigger than they were. Buses, cabs, heavy construction equipment, and delivery vans all felt intimidating looming around her in traffic. Steve drove with confidence, and the mostly unused power of the bike's engine made her feel safe that he could get them out of any situation. She could tell from the nearly constant slight movement of his helmet that he was keeping a sharp watch on the traffic around them.

Traffic opened up on the toll roads he used, and she thrilled when he could get the bike up to cruising speed. The wind was chilly as it snapped her pants legs against her calves and ankles. She snuggled closer to Steve and hugged him to get more warmth from him.

"Are you too cold? I can pull over and give you my jacket," his voice came to her inside her helmet, clear and deep.

"Feel the button on the right side of your chin. Press it, then talk," Steve instructed her.
"Oh! This is so cool!" she said after she pressed the button.

"Too cold?" he asked her.

"No. I like the cold air, and how warm you are," Estrellasaid happily.

She squeezed him tighter and wiggled against his back.

He didn't say anything into the comms, but she thought she felt him rumble a noise she interpreted as happy.

While the sun set, they left the city and rode out onto a long, straight causeway. It was wide open and had grassy shoulders. Wild trees and greenery lined the sides of the road. Traffic was light, and Steve eased the bike to a steady humming cruise. Every so often, the road became a bridge with the ocean breeze gusting sideways at them. They came to a broad, low island. Estrella marveled at the whimsical, grand design of some of the beach houses. There was traffic, but it was nothing like in the city. Orange color from the underside of the clouds glinted on the sheltered water that was to their right. People strolled the sidewalk in shorts and gauzy wraps, out to enjoy the evening. Nobody looked to be in a hurry.

"People live like this? Or is it all vacation rentals?" she asked through the helmets.

"Some of both, I guess," Steve answered.

He turned left and cut through dense blocks of beach houses. Most all of them were on stilts, and if the ground floor was closed in, it looked like louvers or something that could be replaced. The sturdy living spaces were all up high, out of the way of storm surge waves.

Some homeowners had decorated their landscapes with ship rope and driftwood, and it made her long to see her hometown again. The Atlantic coast of New York was very different from the Texas gulf coast, but there were enough similarities to make her feel nostalgic.

A right turn, and then they cruised along another beach road on the windward side of the island, with only one row of grand, tall houses between them and the ocean. Steve kept going until the end of the road was in sight. As he turned left off the pavement, the path became hard packed sand. The grip of the bike felt different on the softer surface, and Estrella clutched Steve nervously with her arms. She kept her head back to look around.

On each side of them were wind-slanted dunes, scrubby with beach brush. The ruddy twilight competed with the silvery light of the rising moon. The beach path sloped downward a little, and soon opened up onto broad, firm sand. Steve pulled off to the left and parked between an open-top jeep and a car.

She took her helmet off when he did, and he smiled at her and gave her back her hat. The sudden silence and lack of vibration from the bike made the whisper of the wind and the crash of the distant waves sound surreal. Steve stood up from the bike and held a hand to her. Estrella stepped down onto sand and waited while he put the helmets on the seat and got a flat plate of metal out of the saddlebags to set the kickstand on.

Estrella felt overdressed for the beach, but the way Steve looked at her with adorably confused interest told her it was worth it. The beach was broad and flat, and people laughed somewhere in the distance, the sound of their voices buffeted and changeable with the wind. The two of them stood there, staring at each other and looking around. A dog loped by with its tongue hanging out, chasing a boy with a kite.
Estrella glanced at Steve, giggled at the feeling of unfamiliar happiness that welled up inside her, then took off running across the beach toward the surf. She couldn't remember the last time she'd ran for the joy of it. She refused to think of the other reasons she'd ran. The chilly ocean wind cut through the button placket of her shirt, and she relished the feel of her leg muscles working and her heart pumping strongly. She could feel the heavy thumps of Steve running beside her. His hand flashed out and caught her hat when the wind gusted up and swept it off her head.

He was large and fast beside her, but she wasn't afraid. He smiled like a kid, which was exactly how she felt. The beach rose slightly in a long swell, and there was a line of crushed seashells and washed up seaweed. They ran past the ocean debris and down, to where the sand got harder and damp.

Salt spray waves rushed at them, and Estrella turned left to run alongside. Steve passed behind her and moved to her other side, so she could be closer to the water. Estrella's lungs started to feel cold and dry. Her borrowed derby shoes weren't the best for running. She slowed to a walk and breathed deeply. Her lungs felt dryer with each breath.

"I hate you. You're not even out of breath," she huffed at Steve.

"Sorry," he said.

He obviously wasn't. He strolled along with her, relaxed and calm as if they'd never run at all. He was looking at her between his glances around at their surroundings. She could feel his attention, but it felt fine to let him look. The strength of the wind and the vastness of the sea and the sky was enough to distract her from his staring.

Seagulls rushed by them in a flock and tilted their heads aside to see if any food would be offered. There were lights in the distance at a boardwalk and twinkling out along a fishing pier. It felt surreal, compared to how she'd spent all of her time for the past several years. She'd never had the money or the energy to go to the beach. It had been so far beyond what she could do that she hadn't even considered it.

"This is amazing," Estrella told him.

"Yeah. It's different. I like to get out of town sometimes. I've only been here twice, for a couple of hours, but it's worth the drive," he said.

"I like the way you look out here. You're just a man," she said.

It was true. He was a classically handsome man, and with the relaxed set to his features, he looked like a catalog ad for upscale casual clothes. The bulky cable knit sweater concealed some of the extreme definition of his muscles, and his loose swinging stride was very different from that of his work persona.

"I feel like just a man, Not… him," Steve agreed.

He didn't want to talk about work, or think about work. Thinking about not thinking about work was making it hard not to think about work. He looked at Estrella instead. That was enough to get his mind off of business.

"You look great. More than great. How on earth did you think that up? How did you find the clothes?" he asked her.

"It was fun. I wanted to dress like a boy while I still can. Nat has all kinds of things, and if I mention something, she comes out of her closet with it. It's like having a magic dress-up chest. Is "This like what you used to wear?" she asked.

"Sort of. You're really snazzy. Swank. The style is right, but my clothes were plain. Patched. We made do," he said.

"I understand. What is that over there?" she asked and pointed to a busier area far away on the beachside with lights and people.

"I think it's a resort or a restaurant. There's a boardwalk. You wanna go see?" he asked.

The twilight was fading fast, giving way to moonlight. The distant lights on the beach only helped a little. His eyes could see fine, but he wasn't sure about Estrella. He walked not far from her side, in case they came across an obstacle on the sand that she didn't see.

"I'm getting hungry," she said.

"Me too. Let's go see if there's food over there," he agreed.

Estrella looked at the waves and the way the moonlight was making silvery glimmers on the surface of the ocean. It looked like she could see forever over the water. She didn't want to leave the seaside, but the food was over to the left, across the sand.

As they walked closer, they heard live music and the air started to smell like beer and seafood. Happy people danced on the sand under strings of lights, and sat at open-air tables on a sandy plank floor.

A hostess in casual black clothes waited at the bottom of the steps where they met the sand.

"Would you like a table or the bar?" she asked them.

Steve looked at Estrella. She shrugged.

"Do you have a menu?" Steve asked the hostess.

She handed them one, and he stepped aside so he and Estrella could see what was on offer.

"I've never had lobster," she said.

"You gotta try it," Steve insisted.

"But I might not have enough," she frowned and reached for her back pants pocket.

Steve touched her wrist.

"I've got that part. How about you cover the tip and the drinks for us?" he asked.

Estrella nodded and they handed the menu back.

"We'd like a table with a good view of the water," Steve told the hostess.

She seated them away from the bar and the band, at the railing of the dining deck where it curved out over the sand. Steve ordered a beer, and Estrella wanted white wine. They could still hear the music, but it wasn't too loud for conversation.

"Tell me some of the things you got in trouble for when you were little," she said.
Her words distracted Steve from staring at the beauty of her bone structure. Her piquantly messy soft hair and her cap accentuated her slender neck and lush, refined features. Steve shook his head and reminded himself that she'd said something.

"Sure, if you tell me something too," he agreed.

She nodded and sipped her wine.

"The lady next door to me and ma made the best pies. She made rhubarb and cinnamon apple, but her custard cherry made my mouth water so hard that I could feel that little sting in my jaw back here, you know?" Steve said.

He rubbed the back of his jaw underneath, where Estrella could see the base of his tongue work to swallow in remembrance of the smell he described. She nodded.

"Everybody was poor then. We could get bruised apples easy, and rhubarb was always in gardens out back. But cherries! Those were only around for a little while once a year. It got to where me and Buck couldn't stand it anymore. Mrs. Flannigan's husband was mean. She wanted to give me some pie because she always saw me staring when she invited ma over for tea, but her husband was real stingy. He was jealous of who the pie went to. One afternoon, she had a pie out cooling on her window sill. This was on the third floor, mind you. The fall woulda killed us. Me, especially. Buck eased out my window, then grabbed me by the britches. There was a little plaster ledge in the bricks, and a gutter pipe going down between the windows. It was just enough to get across. Every time I got tired from hanging on, Buck would grab me to give my arms a rest. I was scared, and people on the street were starting to yell at us, but we had to have some of that pie. The trickiest part was when we got to the Flannigan's window. Mister Flannigan was asleep in his chair, and we could see him. The pie was right there in front of our faces, and I almost couldn't swallow my spit fast enough. Buck stuck his fingers right in and got a dab of crust and cherry custard. I was afraid to let go and fall, so he held my pants again so I could get some. We made a mess of that pie, and then Mrs. Flannigan walked into the kitchen. Her eyes got big when she saw us hanging on to the window for dear life. She screwed up her face to fuss, but then she looked at her husband. Real quiet like, she pulled me into the window, then she brought Bucky in, too. I didn't know ladies could be so strong! She didn't say a word, but I knew we were in trouble. She got down two plates. She served a piece of pie and set it aside. Then she gave us the big, messed up part of it. She went to the window and tossed the rest of the pie out. Plate and everything! Mrs. Flannigan hurried us through her apartment and out into the hall and told us to go home. My ma nagged me for a week, and Buck's ma did too, and we had to help with Miz Junely's laundry and ironing for ten days to earn enough change to buy some more cherries for Mrs. Flannigan. I think she lied to her husband and said that the pie fell out the window," Steve told her.

"Steve, that was dangerous!" Estrella fussed at him.

"It was, but we wanted that pie," Steve said with a smile.

Their crab salads arrived and Estrella ate with relish. Steve enjoyed watching her eat and drink. He never thought he'd see her like this, when he'd been so worried about her living on the street emaciated. He wanted to hear one of her stories, but he wanted her to eat, too. When their salads were gone and the plates set aside, maybe she'd tell him something. Steve finished his salad first, and he didn't mind that she could tell he was waiting to hear something from her.

Estrella was kind enough to start talking as soon as she'd finished her salad.

"So, when I was in fifth grade, there were these fancy shoe strings. They were in fluorescent bright colors, and they didn't tie. They swirled around in a twist. Everybody had them, except me and my friend Lacey. We'd ask for them, and our moms would always tell us no, that it was a fad and we didn't need them. Eventually, they had them at the dollar store. By then they were almost out of style. We stole some, Lacey and me. We got to wear them to school for one stinking day, and then my mami went past us on the bus while I was walking home. She made us go bring them to the dollar store and say what we stole them, Steve! And then she made me wear Grammy's shoes to school for three days. Three days! Grammy had bunions and nasty thick toenails, and her shoes were fuddly like old nurse's shoes. And they smelled like arthritis cream," Estrella said with fond disgust.

Steve laughed.

"It's not funny! I was miserable! The boy I liked broke off a stick from a tree on the playground and gave it to me for a walking cane," she said with remembered horror in her voice.

"If it's not funny, then why are you smiling?" he asked

"I guess because it's good to remember my mami, and Grammy too. And Lacey. Things were so much simpler when I was a kid. Problems seemed huge, but they really weren't," Estrella said.

"I know. Things were tough, but it was nothing, compared to what came after," Steve agreed.

Their nostalgic smiles barely had time to fade toward remembrance of the not so good times, and then the waiter came bringing their plates. There was lobster, wild rice, and greens with lemon and butter for Estrella, and a huge seafood platter with extra fries for Steve.

He bowed his head to pray briefly and silently, and Estrella smiled and did the same. The salad had taken the edge off their hunger, so she paused to ask him a question.

"Sometimes you bless your food, and sometimes you don't. Why the difference?"

"I'm always thankful to have enough to eat, but sometimes I'm in a hurry, almost crazy with hunger.
Then, I say it in my head. When I have time, I try to do it more respectfully, but people are so touchy anymore. It's like prayer offends them. Heaven forbid I actually make the sign of the cross and say grace out loud like we used to at home," he told her.

Estrella didn't make fun of him. She nodded a little bit, and that was the end of it. He was relieved.
He'd been distracted enough by their surroundings and Estrella's appearance that hunger snuck up on him. Crab cakes and grilled fish and shrimp and scallops disappeared from his plate fast.

Estrella figured out how to eat her lobster with a few unobtrusive hand gestures from Steve. She tried hard to keep from making any sounds of enjoyment. It was so good with the butter sauce! She sprinkled the lemon over her greens and ate them last. She was hesitant to steal fries from Steve's plate, but he saw her looking at the thick cut steak fries and edged his plate toward her slightly. She crept her hand across the table as if she expected him to smack it away, but he only smiled at her with the corners of his eyes while he chewed and she took his fries.

They didn't linger over drinks or dessert when they were done. It was a little further up the beach to the fishing pier, and Steve enjoyed his full belly as they strolled along the boardwalk to the pier access. It wasn't crowded on a Thursday night. Steve liked watching Estrella take in the waves rolling in under the bright beams of the pier lights. She clamped her hands over the top rail and leaned far out to see how the water sprayed around the pier legs.

"Shouldn't you have your hand bandaged? There's all kinds of nasty bacteria here from seagull poop and fish bait," Steve pointed out.
"I think it's good. It doesn't look raw anymore," Estrella said.

Steve stepped up beside her and touched her scraped hand, asking permission to look at it. Absently, she let him take her hand and look at it in the bright overhead lights. His fingers brushed back and forth over the wound at first softly, then harder. It didn't hurt like it had yesterday.

"Eya," he said.

She could hear the deep concern in his tone and she wanted to snatch her hand back from his scrutiny. He was going to make a big thing about her hand. She knew he would. She'd been hoping he wouldn't notice, or that he'd forget she'd scraped it less than a day ago.

"See? I told you it's fine," she said, looking to where he was bothering at her skin.

"This is healing very fast," Steve said quietly.

"Mm-hmm," Estrella agreed, "I've been eating well and taking the vitamin pills the nurses gave me."

"No. It's healing very, very fast. It should still be pink at least. It's already dried up and skinned over," Steve told her.

He had that particular stillness and the look on his face which meant that his super-brain was working on something.

"We have to call Bruce," he said, almost a whisper.

"No, we don't," Estrella said with breezy dismissal.

She pulled her hand back.

"It has to be my serum, Eya. You probably got at least part of my healing ability as a side effect," he said.

"Isn't that a good thing? I know I said I didn't want to be like you, but if I had to have a little something extra along with a fixed heart, the healing isn't so bad," Estrella reasoned.

"There could be other effects that we won't know about unless we test you. We should call Bruce," he insisted.

"No. We're not calling Bruce. Steve! Quit thinking about work. It can wait til tomorrow. If you have to test me somehow, then race me back to the bike," she said.

She turned and ran, and Steve rushed after her. There was an older couple coming onto the pier, and their heads turned to see one person running after another, but Estrella's laugh of glee set them at ease. They looked on for a moment as the young people ran off.

"Faster," Steve said.

He ran up beside her and kept pace easily. It wasn't pleasant to run on a full stomach, but he'd done it before. He reached out and swatted Estrella's rump slightly to get her into the spirit of what he wanted her to do.

She scowled at him, but pushed harder. Fast as she could, she pumped her arms and legs. Her feet pounded the sand and she felt like she was flying.
"Is that the best you can do?" he asked her.

She couldn't talk, so she nodded. They slowed down and Steve checked his watch and looked back at the distance they'd run from the pier.

"You're a little fast, but not outside the range of a female athlete. Eya, I want to know if your bones healed. If they didn't, then a good heart and fast legs could hurt you," he told her.

"Tomorrow," she gasped for breath and shook her head.

She reached out and slapped his ass hard.

"Hey!" he protested.

"Don't you 'hey' me! You slapped me. I get to slap you back," she complained.

"Oh. So-"

"Ah! You apologize too much," she fussed, and threatened her sharp little fingernail at his nose.

Steve bit his lips so he wouldn't apologize for that, too.

He looked to the horizon of the ocean. It was full night now. The sky was a slightly more gray tone of black than the water.

"How many boats do you see out there?" he asked her.

Estrella grimaced at his business-like demeanor, but she humored him for a moment longer. Maybe if she tolerated a little of his worrying, he'd satisfy himself and then forget about her stupid fast healing hand. She looked in the direction Steve looked, out over the water.

"Three, I think?" she guessed.

"Stop it. You're no fun. We're not here to think about those things. I'm cold. Can I wear your jacket?" she asked.

Wordlessly, he slipped his arms out of the leather and draped it around her shoulders.

"I'm not a granny," she fussed, and worked her hands into the sleeves, "here, push the sleeves up so I can use my hands."

He did so, and she nodded her thanks to him. They turned to walk back toward his bike, but they were in no hurry. Steve was too quiet. She reached out and pinched his ass.

"No fair! I didn't pinch you!" he dodged sideways away from her and frowned.

"Stop thinking," she told him.

"Can't help it," he muttered.

She reached to pinch him again. He saw it coming, but he restrained himself from reacting. He only knew one way to react, and he didn't want to hurt her.

"Quit it," he said plaintively.
"Then quit thinking. It's nothing that can't wait til morning," Estrella told him.

Steve wished he could comply, but he was hopeful and excited. If Estrella had some of his healing, then she would be alright. Her bones would heal, and her life wouldn't be limited. She wouldn't be fragile. Her immune system would be stronger. She could do things she wouldn't have been able to do otherwise.

A fear of the unknown worried at him. What if something else had happened to her, like some form of Bruce's ability? Or any other strange, unexpected thing from the serum. They wouldn't know until Bruce gave her a thorough exam and took samples of tissue and blood to study. Estrella grabbed a handful of his ass and gave him a real honk of a squeeze and shake.

He stopped walking and turned to her. Why didn't she see how important this could be?

"Eya-"

"No! I don't care about that right now. Any of it. I don't care what you did last night. I don't care what happens tomorrow. I don't care if a whale jumps up the beach and squashes us five minutes from now. Be here with me. Please?" she asked. She'd started out talking with hand gestures and attitude, but by the end of her words, she was still and imploring.

He took a deep breath of the crisp, salty air. She stood in the dim moonlight, looking up at him hopefully. She obviously didn't care about any of their worries right now. Her eagerness to fully experience the moment with an uncluttered mind inspired him. She was right. All that stuff would wait.

He grinned a little at the happy energy she exuded. In response, she pushed busily at his shoulders until he turned and she was at his back. Her hands gripped over top of his shoulders and he knew what she wanted. Steve squatted a little and caught her behind the knees when she jumped up.

She laughed near his ear and he settled her legs above his hips for a piggy back ride.

"Where to?" he asked her.

"Let's go close to the water," she said.

He liked her warm breath on the side of his face. She smelled like good wine, clean girl, and that fleeting hint of cologne. Steve cupped the backs of her thighs in his hands and was happy to feel some meat on her. She was slim, sure, but there was substance and energy in her. Estrella was far from being the frail, sickly person he'd first met on their bench. Finally, she felt young and full of life, as she should. Steve smiled and enjoyed the slight weight of her.

He walked along at the very edge of the water and danced aside when the thin rush and reach of the waves came for his shoes. Estrella laughed to be bounced around, and her hands moved from gripping the muscles at the tops of his shoulders. She draped her arms over his shoulders and crossed her hands over his chest in a hug.

Steve breathed deeply and wondered at the warm happiness that she gave him. He felt it all over, but especially in his chest. She clung to him despite his effortless support of her weight. It seemed that she simply wanted to be close to him. He was glad. She was the only one who ever wanted to touch him just to touch him. It felt so right.

"Can we do this forever?" she asked dreamily.

He knew she meant their close contact and their refusal to think about their troubles.
"That's a good plan. I like it," he agreed.

There was a slough where rainwater had cut through the dunes to get to the ocean. Steve jumped over it and kept walking. The leap worked smoothly into his stride and Estrella barely felt jostled.

Her hands were chilled. One, then the other, she slid them under the thick knit of his sweater. The skin of his upper chest was toasty warm. Compared to the relentless chilling breeze off the ocean, Steve was heat and life. Plus, she felt sneaky and sly. It was her goal to touch him. To show him affection, and to prove to him that they could share it without hurting each other.

At a slight bend of the beach, the waves crashed and rolled back on themselves in surging chaos. Steve stopped a few feet out of the water's reach and turned so they could both see the moonlight on the water.

Her hands were slowly caressing his skin. It felt intimate to have her hands on him, under his clothes. It was very different from letting the women touch him last night. Those women, he'd kept at a distance, focusing only on the sensations he needed from them. With Eya, the fact that it was her touching him somehow made it deeper, as if she was soaking into his skin with her fussy concern and her irreverent acceptance of all that he was.

Steve didn't want to take from her. He wanted to give. Something about the thought of giving to her was inescapably primal. An image flashed in his mind of what it would be like to adore her, to give every joy to her that he could, to see if the incredible feelings she gave to him with her modest touches could be turned about and lavished on her. Naked. If the simple touch of her hand felt so good, what would their skin feel like with nothing to keep them apart? Steve came alive all over until his voice was nearly trembling when he spoke.

"I want this, Eya. I want us. You have to know that there are things we might not make it through," he said.

His voice was low with sincerity and concern. One of her hands came up out of his sweater to press to his lips.

"I know. I have worries, too. Not right now, okay? It's only us right now," she whispered at his ear.

Everything that he knew was right, and everything that he knew was wrong bubbled up in him, wanting out. He wanted to warn her that he might live a long time, and remind her that he might die tomorrow. He felt the need to tell her that maybe, just maybe, a prostitute was pregnant with his kid. He should tell her again that she could be putting herself in danger by going with him. Missions could take him away for months at a time and leave her alone. This thing that was happening with his body might be falsely manipulating how he felt. People would say things, and the media would always be-

Estrella patted his lips with her fingers.

"Breathe, Steve. Just breathe," she said.

He hadn't realized he was holding his breath until she said it. He'd gone tense, bottled up with all the things that would get in their way.

His hot breath huffed out over her fingers, and her other hand rubbed at his chest. When he didn't try to talk, she rubbed his face and neck at the same time as she rubbed his chest.

A helpless groan escaped with his next breath. He tilted his head back and felt the spray of the waves dampen his jeans from a random surge. Steve stepped back, then sat them down on the damp, firm sand.

Steve let go of her legs, and she squatted on her heels behind him. They were quiet and he breathed for a while, trying to let all the bad things, the worrisome things, gust away along the beach with the wind. He pressed at her hand in his sweater so that she wouldn't stop touching him. Eventually, he was able to set it all aside and enjoy the moment again. He was thankful for her calming peacefulness and her patience with him.

"It's so nice out. I don't want to go back. Can we stay here tonight?" she asked.

"I think so," Steve told her.

"We can?" she asked, surprised.

Her question had been rhetorical, because it felt like they should leave soon and she didn't want to end their time together.

"Yeah," he confirmed.

"Right here?" she asked with a little laugh.

Steve was large and warm, but she knew she didn't want to sleep on the damp sand if she had a choice. She didn't want to sleep out where people could see. She'd already done that too much.

"No. Not right here. Wouldn't you rather somewhere softer and drier, out of the wind?"

"Yes, but where?" she wondered.

Steve twisted to look behind them for a moment. She could see the brighter shapes of houses against the dark scrub brush of the dunes in the distance.

"Tony has a house over there," he said, and pointed.

She couldn't see any details or tell one house from the next, but she believed him.

"Do you have a key?" she asked on a whisper.

"No. You should know we won't need one," he said.

Steve got to his feet and brushed the damp sand from his jeans as best he could. He took Estrella's hand and they walked over the hump of the beach and toward the houses.

"Are you sure we won't get in trouble?" she asked.

"Eya. It's your turn to stop worrying," he told her.

"Okay," she agreed.

They went around a tangle of driftwood at the debris line. Estrella was too hot in his jacket now, but too cold when she tried taking it off. She compromised by unbuttoning her shirt and tugging it out of her pants so the air could get at her white cotton T-shirt underneath. That helped.

She stumbled because she wasn't looking where she stepped while she adjusted her clothes. Steve's hand was steady to grab onto. He looked back at her and she smiled to let him know she was alright.
The houses were big. Huge! The dunes and scrub brush were undisturbed right up to the wood picket fence and again inside the fence up to the broad porch steps. A red light blinked at them slowly from somewhere up on the porch.

"Jarvis," Steve called to the house.

"Welcome, Captain, Miss," the familiar AI replied.

A little click sounded at the low gate. The red light stopped blinking in the shadowed dark of the porch. Steve and Estrella followed the sandy path to the steps, and Estrella would have felt like a criminal trespasser at such a grand home, if it hadn't been for Jarvis' voice to welcome them. The porch light came on in a soft glow through amber, bubbled glass.

"I'm afraid the house will be stale. Guests were not expected," Jarvis said.

They went inside after scuffing their sandy shoes against the rough welcome mat. The air in the house smelled unused, but pleasantly of wood and new furniture. Estrella felt hesitant to go into a dark, vacant house that belonged to someone else. What if Pepper didn't want them getting sand inside? She took a moment longer to wipe her feet until Steve tugged her gently along.

Lights from three lamps came on across the large living room. The space had a cozy, cottage feel to it, despite the size. The walls were white pickled wood, and the floors were driftwood gray plank, smooth with a satin shine. Comfortable furniture with pillows and lap blankets outfitted the room.

Steve shut and locked the door behind them, then motioned for her to stay where she was. She nodded and he disappeared up the stairs. Estrella heard his footsteps moving quickly through the upper floor, pausing here and there. He pounded up more stairs, then she couldn't hear his feet anymore. She knew he was checking that the house was secure. It was an unpleasant reminder of his job, but she felt safer with him doing it. In less than two minutes, he was back with her, looking satisfied.

"There's a bathroom here, if you need it," he indicated a door under the stairs, "You wanna stay here while I go get the bike?"

Estrella looked around at the grand 'cottage' with its classic coastal décor, expensive bronze fixtures and hardware, and its thick stone fireplace. She shook her head. The place was comfy looking, but far too nice. Odd how she'd gotten used to Avengers tower, but this beach house, which was quaint by comparison, made her uneasy with its casually displayed wealth.

"I want to go with you," she said.

They went back out to the porch and down the steps. At the bottom step, Steve urged her to get up on his back again. When she was secure, he started with at a jog, but smoothed out into a long-stride run.

She laughed as he leapt over driftwood obstacles and she clung to him more tightly. It was quite a distance to the bike. She hadn't thought they'd gone so far. It was getting late, and the car and jeep were gone. Steve let her slip down to stand. He clipped the helmets to the saddlebags and got the bike ready to ride. They mounted up and drove back the way they'd come in on the road.

When Steve got to the street entrance of Tony's house, the front gate opened to admit them. The garage door lifted and lights come on in the spacious garage. Estrella was unsurprised to see a golf cart and a convertible sports car already inside. Tony's wealth still boggled her when she thought of it, so she tried not to. The garage door closed and shut them in the private space. The bike was noisy inside and Steve shut it off quickly.

Estrella hung onto Steve when he would have moved to get off the bike. Her hands pushed up under his sweater, seeking firm skin and rubbing there. She felt him tense, then he sucked in a breath. His hand covered hers lightly and pressed her hand still against him.

"Eya, maybe we shouldn't," Steve murmured with gentle caution.

"But I want to," she protested.

He slid their hands away from under his clothes and they got off the bike. She frowned at the back of his head as they went up the steps and into the house. She wasn't done touching him. Maybe he thought she was, but she wasn't. Her determination to get past his prim attitude distracted her from the understated luxury of the house's interior.

Steve didn't need her all over him all the time. She knew that. But when he got the Captain's thoughtful scowl on his face from all his worries, she wanted to soothe it away from him. If it hadn't been for the well healed injury on her hand, maybe he wouldn't have been reminded of work. She shook free of him and shut herself into the bathroom under the stairs when they were in the living room again. Why were they holding hands, anyway? It's not like she needed him to walk.

There was very nice French soap in the soap dish, and the bathroom towels were fluffy and soft. It was easy to find where the new toothbrushes and toothpaste were kept. Since she wasn't wearing any makeup, she only splashed water over her face and patted it dry. She took off her hat and used damp fingers to smooth her hair down.

The bathroom vanity light was soft and warm. It made her look too good. Her looks were coming back more quickly than she'd wanted, but it couldn't be helped. Steve already stared at her a little too often. Estrella took off Steve's leather jacket and glared stubbornly at her clothes. She was still slim enough, with the curves of her hips only mildly distracting. Her breasts barely pushed at the shirt. She moved the suspender straps outward a little and straightened the points of her collar. Her men's dress shirt looked rumpled as she imagined men did at the end of the day, undone with her undershirt showing, and the tails hanging out around the impediment of the suspenders. She liked the look.

Steve called to her from somewhere in the house. She found him in the kitchen and laid his jacket on the back of a barstool, and her hat on the granite bartop.

"Are you thirsty?" Steve asked her.

He turned from in front of the huge refrigerator and offered her a chilled water bottle. She took it and watched him drink one down. Halfway through, he looked at her and frowned. Soon as the bottle was empty, he shook his head and pushed her arms aside.

"No, no. At the end of the day, you gotta shuck em down, like this," he said.

He smiled and used his fingers to hook under her suspenders. He took them down her arms until she cooperated and worked out of them. The elastic straps draped down around her thighs and her shirt luffed free.

"See, that's better. You would take off your tie, too, but…" he smiled.

Estrella touched her butterfly and smiled back. No way was she taking it off. All night, she'd felt fine with him. Now that they were alone in this new place, in the quiet of lavish drapes and upholstery, he seemed too big. Too close.

She stepped back a little and looked down at the water bottle in her hand.

"I didn't mean to scare you," Steve said kindly.

"Smart of you to avoid apologizing," she teased him back for his careful choice of words.

"Well, I keep getting nagged for it, so I figure I better re-condition myself," he agreed.

Estrella drank some water and looked around. She knew Jarvis was here, but it felt like only the two of them. At the tower, there was always someone to come if she needed help. And there was Steve's stupid protocol that he'd made so they couldn't be alone in his suite. Or Natasha's. But here they were, now.

"Why aren't you afraid of hurting me? Why is it okay for us to be alone?" she asked him.

Steve's polite regard faltered and he looked thoughtful again. He took his jacket from the stool and guided her out onto the back porch. Part of the porch on the far end was screened. They went there, and the screens helped to cut the wind some. There was a large piece of furniture against the back wall of the house, and Steve pulled the dust cover off of it.

The day bed was strewn with pillows and Steve arranged them out of the way so he could lie with his back against the house, and on top of the coverlet. He toed off his shoes and patted the empty space in front of him.

Estrella hesitated. It was just Steve, but it wasn't. There was that broody, slightly restrained look creeping into his features. The bulk and strength of him both attracted her and made her cautious. She forcefully recalled how wonderful it had been to hold him on the beach, and she went to him. Quick, before she could think too much, she got onto the bed and lay back against him. He put his jacket down at his legs in case she got chilled and needed it, then he rested his arm around her, his other one propping up his head.

"I did a lot last night. I don't feel so desperate," Steve finally explained.

"A lot of sex, you mean?" she asked.

She tried to wiggle over onto her back to look up at his face, but he gently kept her in place, spooned against him.

"Mm-hmm," Steve agreed, and she could almost hear him blushing.

"So it was worth it. It helped you," she concluded.

"I don't know, Eya. Jarvis, please turn off the lights," Steve said.

"Captain," Jarvis began to admonish them.

"Just do it!" Estrella fussed at the AI.

For a moment, nothing happened, then the amber porch light and the lights inside the house began to fade. Right before they went full off, they flickered petulantly.

Steve chuckled.
"Is he getting attitude with us?" Estrella whispered.

"I think so," Steve said, "but it doesn't do any good to whisper. His hearing is probably better than mine."

"It's okay, Jarvis. Steve won't hurt me," Estrella said softly.

The back porch light flickered minutely.

Estrella smiled at their friend's show of displeasure and snuggled back into Steve's warmth. The moonlight was a low silvery glow out on the beach in front of them, and her eyes were adjusting to the darkness. In the distance, she could hear the waves washing up onto the sand when the wind wasn't whistling too loudly through the screen.

"You don't think all the sex helped you?" Estrella prompted Steve.

If he wanted to hide in the dark and not let her look at him, she would allow it. She knew from his tone that this was difficult for him to talk about. The fact that he was willing to tell her about it at all made her happy.

"Physically, maybe. I'm just starting to feel driven again. It's been a big relief today, not having to fight against it," Steve said.

"But?" she asked him after he'd been quiet for a little too long.

"But now I've got problems. The kind that make last night not worth the trouble," Steve said in a more somber tone.

Estrella didn't want their rare time alone together to be tainted with unhappy things, but if he needed to talk, she would listen. She wiggled in his arms and hugged his arm that was in front of her. She tucked his hand under her chin against her collarbone and neck.

"Tell me," she offered.

"One of the women might be pregnant. Tony doesn't think it's possible, but I have to consider it. We won't know for sure until over a week from now. I don't want to tell you something like that, but you should know," he said firmly, like he'd had to buck up his courage to say the words.

She ducked her head to kiss his knuckles briefly.

"It's okay," she tried to comfort him.

"It's not okay!," Steve insisted with quiet vehemence, "How can you say that, Eya? One of those women who I don't even know could have my child, and I don't have any say in it. Tony says I don't have a bit of control over what happens if she is. And the other woman took a pill. What if there was a baby, Eya? And she got rid of him, like taking out the trash?"

He was agitated. She could feel it in the hardness of his muscles behind her. She wasn't surprised that he would feel this way. He protected everyone else when he put on his uniform and went out to work. Of course he would feel that much more protective over someone or something he felt was one of his own.

"All you can do is wait, Steve. I've been through it a few times. It eats at your thoughts until you know. Are you upset because you can't control it? It doesn't matter who you are in this. You can't control everything," she said with familiar resignation.
"It's not that I want to control everything. Especially not the woman. If she doesn't want the baby, she can go. But if there's a baby and he's mine, then I need to protect him. I want to protect him," Steve said, low and fierce.

Estrella felt an uncomfortable mix of understanding for Steve's instincts, pain that he might become tied and obligated to another woman, and shameful jealousy that he would feel so deeply for someone else. Her jealousy was shameful because she had no claim on him.

She'd let herself get too close. She cared too much. She'd been an idiot to let herself think someone like him could possibly be for her in any way that wanted fidelity or babies. Over all of the discomfort, Steve was her only real friend, and maybe she was his. They didn't need each other for work or for business, like all the other people in his life. He put up with her because he cared and seemed to like her, and she felt the same for him. And more.

Steve bit his lip and felt his face burn. He was angry at himself. He wanted so badly to tell Estrella that he wanted to try for a real future with her, but it wouldn't be fair to say that at this point. All he could do was be honest with her about what he'd done and pray that she didn't walk away, like she was always talking about doing. She was too stiff and quiet against him. There was a sick feeling in his belly, and he was loathe to admit to himself that the feeling was fear. Estrella might want nothing to do with him, now that she knew how shamefully depraved and irresponsible he'd been.

Estrella took slow, even breaths and focused on the strong beats of her heart. It was her fault that she'd let her feelings get so involved when he'd cautioned her not to. Stupid! He needed a friend now, not a jealous woman, she reminded herself. Just like difficult decisions she'd made before, she decided on a course of action and swept all other options aside.

"You wait. Things will go one way, or they'll go the other. I'll help you to not go crazy until you know. Then, we can go from there. Do you want a relationship with this woman, if she's got your baby?" Estrella asked.

"No. But maybe if she does, I should try?" Steve said uncertainly.

"No, no. Back up. You said that Tony doesn't think it's possible. He's not usually wrong about things. Why don't you trust Tony's opinion?" she asked.

"It's embarrassing," was all he said, like he was trying to swallow the words before they came out.

"What is?" she asked.

"My, uh, stuff. My semen," Steve said with difficulty, "From the testing they did right after I got the serum. It's in my files that it's pretty strong. Potent, I mean. Ugh, God, I can't believe I'm telling anybody this. I'm more likely to get someone pregnant, given any situation where pregnancy is possible. The sperm live longer, swim stronger, all the things that happened to me, they got too. Persistent, determined little buggars."

Estrella giggled at his embarrassed growling.

"Eyã," he groaned and buried his face in the back of her hair.

"I'm sorry. It's so not funny, but it is!" she said.

She had to laugh, because if she didn't, she was going to freaking swoon at the thought of Steve, super-strong and super-virile, giving a child of his to her. No! Damnit. At the end of her laugh, she gasped in a breath, and familiar fantasy images of them together washed over her in a rush. Before she could think to stop it, her body arched back and her eyes rolled beneath her lids.
"Hnnn," she keened quietly.

Steve's hand pressed into her chest and he grunted at her in confused recognition. He would have asked her what was wrong, but the tilt of her bottom into his groin, the wanton way her throat presented so beautifully to him, and the tantalizing rubbing of her thighs went straight to the part of his brain that knew without asking.

He choked his throat shut against the filthy words that wanted to spill out. Not profane, low, common words. The words he held back were of eager, graphic encouragement. He shocked himself at the deep desire to say them. Never had he wanted to talk dirty to anyone, but he really wanted to now. His hand splayed flat and rubbed down her front from sternum to belly and back up again. At her throat, so pretty, he skimmed his fingers to get the tie out of the way so he could see the lines of her unobstructed. Like this! He had to draw her like this.

His fingers brushed delicately at her throat.

"Sorry," Estrella whispered, "Sorry, Steve."

She was mortified at what she'd just done, but aroused, too. As her mind crunched and ground through the awkwardness, she hunkered her body into the opposite posture, curled away from his answering arousal. She knew that he didn't like it when she acted too girly. She didn't want to make him run away.

"Me too," he murmured.

While they calmed down some, Steve caressed her neck. His fingers trailed up from the hollow of her throat, around the side, and up behind her ears. That's where she'd put the little dabs of cologne. Like viscerally appreciating a sculpture, he limned the contours of her cheek, her temple, her jaw. She breathed sweet little huffs through parted lips.

"Don't have to hide," he told her.

He didn't like to see her hunkered and ashamed. He petted the back of her head and neck in encouragement for her to straighten back toward him, if she would. Slowly, she turned to lay flat in front of him. She looked up at him, sort of dazed and sleepy.

"Shhh," he cautioned.

With a finger, he nudged her copper butterfly back to where it was supposed to be. He held it in place and tugged her tie snug to hold it. She smiled at him and shrugged lazily.

"Maybe I wanted to talk to you," she said.

"I probably wanted to hear you," he admitted.

She pouted. He could have stopped his finger from touching her lip, gliding back and forth. He didn't want to, so he didn't stop until she bit him.

"Tickles," she complained after she spit out his finger.

She brought up her hand and rubbed at her lip to make the tickle go away. Steve was staring again, worse than ever. It was difficult not to wriggle under the captivated intensity of his gaze. She didn't know if he looked like a naïve, entrapped man, or a latent predator. Maybe a lot of both, but her kind hearted friend was in that look, too. That's what made it so confusing. As if he wanted everything more that he'd already told her he wasn't ready for.
"Don't look at me like that," she told him, but she didn't really want him to stop.

She liked what that look said more than his words.

"Can't help it," Steve said.

If he wasn't going to help her, then she wouldn't make the effort, either. Her eyes were fully adjusted to the dark now, so she could see him propped above her, leaned back to give her some room.

He was nearly too gorgeous to breathe calmly in the presence of him, if she let herself look at him beyond the thin veil of their friendship. His soulful blue eyes were dark in the moon gloom. She knew he didn't want to hear how handsome or even pretty he was, so she bit her lip to keep quiet. What he'd said about his semen, his potency, was there to see in all the rest of him. He was vibrantly, blatantly male to the point that she could feel it emanating from him like basking in the sun. Again, her body wanted to offer to him in wordless, ageless response. She tightly resisted, because they were already on the very edge of too much, with them staring at each other like this.

"Can't help it, either," she apologized.

"Then I guess we're in trouble," he grumbled.

Estrella nodded a little.

"I want. So much. But I can't," he frowned.

She nodded again in understanding.

"Is it just because of the woman who might be pregnant?" she asked.

Steve shook his head, merely a wobble of it because he was propped on his hand.

"Things are becoming clear to me now, Eya. There are a lot of other things in the way, but maybe we can get past all that if we want to bad enough. I can't commit to anyone halfway, or just for a little while. You said you're planning to leave. You said you'd stay, and then when I hurt you, you'd go away again and start over somewhere else," he reminded her.

"That's not what I said. Or, it's not what I meant you to understand. I meant that when I'm too strong for you, before you aren't yourself anymore, I'll go and let you be free of me. You're not some lonely plumber in backwater Indiana, Steve. The world needs you. It wouldn't be right to keep you wrapped up in me all the time. You need to go out and fight," she frowned at him.

"You gonna bring down Captain America all by yourself?" Steve asked her with a tone that was neither joking nor afraid.

"I don't want to, but I probably will," Estrella admitted solemnly.

Something changed in his expression, though she couldn't have said what it was. His eyes maybe gleamed or something, and his jaw was a little different. If she'd been James Barnes looking at that face, she'd have known it was the look of challenge and determination that Steve put on when the battle started to get a little more interesting and made him work for it some. That look didn't disappear until the shield was stowed on his shoulders again and he was walking away from a downed opponent. But she didn't know that.

"I'm taking some time soon. You wanna go on vacation with me?" Steve asked her.
"Me? With you? Where would we go?" she asked.

He took a moment to think about her question. There hadn't been any time to ponder that today. He'd just barely considered that he could get away at all, much less to where.

"I dunno yet. Maybe I'll let you decide," Steve said.

Steve liked how relaxed and drowsy she was getting. Every time she blinked her eyes, they stayed closed for a little longer.

"That about sums it up for me, too. Maybe we pack a bag and get dropped off somewhere. Anywhere that's warm, with sun," Steve said.

"Sounds good. When do we leave?" Estrella asked softly.

Steve could see that she was starting to drift from consciousness. He turned her on her side again and gathered her in. A gust of wind through the screens reminded him that she might get chilled. He pulled his jacket up and tucked it around her. His toes were pretty good at pushing off her shoes as he'd done to his. He fit his legs to the backs of hers and piled pillows on their lower halves to keep her warm down there. Her head pillowed on his arm and he settled on the large pillow he'd kept at the top of the bed.

He knew he wouldn't sleep much out in the open like this on a screen porch, but he'd let himself rest for a while. Estrella felt more than right in his arms. She felt like hope. Maybe it was a tiny, delicate hope, but it was warm and heavy against his chest.

"J?" he asked.

The red light of the security system turned on and pulsed slowly in the dark.
Chapter 33

Note: Mature themes, but nothing overtly physical.

The endless soft sounds of the wind and the waves were soothing. Steve lay next to Estrella while she slept. He didn't want to move to look at his watch and take a chance on waking her, but he knew he'd slept for maybe three hours, off and on. That was plenty, especially since he hadn't done anything useful or tiring with his body for a while.

He could feel it coming back. As the pre-dawn hours passed, Steve went through cycles of mild arousal and calmness. He was trying hard to enjoy nothing more than being with her. It was a practice in following Estrella's example to stay present in the moment. He was jealous of this time, alone and at peace with her. Everything wanted to worry at him, but he looked down at her in the dark and thought instead of how she cared for him. Thinking non-sexual thoughts helped to keep his need at bay for a little bit longer.

An hour before dawn, he couldn't lie still anymore. He refreshed himself in the bathroom in the house, and found the coffee maker and a tin of butter cookies in the pantry. Steve set coffee on to brew, then stripped off his socks. He left them on the porch and rolled up the legs of his jeans to well above his ankles.

"Jarvis, has there been any unusual activity tonight?" he asked very quietly.

"None, Captain. If you wish to go for a run, I will keep watch and inform the Miss if she awakes before your return," Jarvis answered just as softly.

"Thank you," Steve said.

He made sure his phone was in his back pocket, and on impulse, he took off his sweater. The air was cool and inviting on his skin, and unlike in town, there appeared to be no one out yet to see him. The sand felt good under his feet, and he took off down the beach toward the coming sunrise.

When he began, it was dark and quiet. The Eastern horizon was only slightly brighter than the rest of the night. As he made miles along the water, sea birds woke and joined him, gliding along over the surf to look for an early breakfast. Steve turned around before the sun rose. A fisherman said good morning to him as he passed the pier. Long legged sandpipers ran out of his path.

Steve paused for a moment before he went back across the beach to the house. The sun was rising and bathing everything in new morning light. He knew it would make sand stick to him, but he stood at the water's edge anyway. Gentle waves rushed between his toes and feet. The water was cold and invigorating, but not icy. He breathed deep of the salt air for a moment longer.

They needed to get back to the tower. He wanted to get Estrella to Bruce for testing, and he had arrangements to make if he was going to take leave. There were briefings and a planning session scheduled for today, but none of it started until later in the morning.

He didn't want to go back. It's not that he loved this particular beach so much. Steve found himself craving time away from his co-workers and his job. He liked his friends, especially Sam, Buck, and Thor. But last night…

He wanted more of that. The need to find out who he was away from work pushed at him. The need to find out who he could be with Estrella pulled at him even more. With that in mind, he was eager to get back to the tower and take care of business so he could be free to go on leave.

Steve jogged across the sand. He paused at the debris line and fingered through the seashells washed up there. There was a small, delicately twisted one with streaks of pink and orange and brown through the white calcium shell. He took it back for Estrella.

He leapt over the low gate and would have bounded up the steps, but Jarvis spoke up.

"Captain, if I may suggest," he said.

A spray of water turned on from a low nozzle at the porch post by the steps. Steve stopped to rinse the sand from his feet and ankles.

"Thanks," he said.

Estrella moved sleepily on the day bed and he went to see if she was waking up. She opened her eyes and smiled at him when he came to sit beside her. He thought she looked beautiful with her clothes wrinkled and her hair messed from sleep. She stretched and yawned, and Steve looked away from how her dark shirt parted and her nipples poked at the white cotton tee underneath.

"Here," he said, and handed her the seashell.

Estrella sat up and cupped her hand to take it. He released the shell, but then touched the back of her hand with his fingers. He couldn't seem to resist the desire to touch her. Why did their skin feel so good together?

She made a small sound of appreciation for the pretty shell, and their eyes met in the morning light. Steve appreciated how she mostly looked at his face and only glanced at his bare chest in a flicker.

"It's so nice that you could go run in just your skin," she told him.

"Yeah. Felt great. You want coffee before we go? I made some," he offered.

"Is there any milk?" she asked.

Estrella brought his hand to her mouth and licked the backs of his fingers with a quick, exploratory flick of her tongue. Steve almost jerked his hand back and asked her why she did it.

"Mm. Salty. I love the beach. I'll go see if there's any milk," she said.

Steve watched her hurry away. She had a very cute bottom. And she was too smart. She knew that if she'd licked him and then stayed to stare at him, he would have frowned at her for doing it. She didn't want to be fussed at, so she found a reason to be elsewhere. Steve let the cool wet stripe across his fingers stay as it was while he gathered his sweater and socks. He made a pile of their things to bring in, and then he put the day bed back like they'd found it.

When he came in with their shoes and things, Estrella had a cup of coffee with creamer for herself, and had poured a mug full of plain black for him. She sat at the bar and tugged at a tuft of her hair that was sticking up. Her eyes followed him as he came to sit next to her in front of his mug.

"I liked being here with you, but this house is too much. I feel like I'm going to break something or get it dirty," she commented while she looked around.

"Me too. Pepper has great taste, but I'd be more comfortable in a little shanty," he agreed.

Estrella slid her elbow way out onto the glossy stone bar top and propped her head to hover over the steam rising from her coffee. Steve took a sip from his mug. He was much more interested in looking at her than around at Pepper's carefully planned décor. Estrella smiled at him for a moment, but when he only gave her a slight curve of his lips and kept staring at her, her features soured. She pointedly looked down to stare at his bare chest.

"I wasn't looking at you like that," Steve complained.

"Yes, and I'm still skinny. Captain America is doomed. Are you sure you want to go on vacation with me? If we go somewhere warm and sunny, maybe with a real beach, then I might put on a bathing suit. Will your eyes fall out? Will you trip over your feet?" she asked him.

Steve sat up straight from his rounded slouch over his mug.

"You haven't seen Captain America yet, sweetcheeks. Do your worst," Steve gave her a smug smile.

"But is that who you're going to have to be if we go on vacation? Maybe it's not a good idea. You should take Bucky," Estrella said.

Steve could see that she didn't like the thought, but she suggested it anyway.

"It's just that you're pretty. I wasn't looking at you with your shirt off, or staring at your…other parts. Can't I look at you?" he asked.

His hand went out and he touched her cheek to show her that he meant her face, not anything lascivious about the rest of her. The warmth of his large hand so close to her skin was irresistible. She turned her face into his hand for the contact. He'd gone still, and she didn't like that, so she rubbed her cheek into his palm and slid her nose against the side of his thumb. Again, she was drawn to the promise of saltwater on his skin. Her lips parted for her tongue to get another salty taste of him.

"Stop licking me," Steve grumbled, but he didn't withdraw his hand.

Her eyes opened slowly and she smiled at him in challenge. In mild defiance, she bit at the meat of his thumb, just enough to dimple his skin. He watched, fascinated, as her eyes slid shut and her tongue licked him behind her teeth.

Steve tightened the muscles of his hand and her teeth slipped off of him with a little click. Her eyes blinked open in surprise. She'd almost bitten her own tongue. His flesh was like wood when he tightened his muscles.

"I don't have to be Cap to win at that," he grinned.

"If you say so," Estrella said.

She licked the last of the lingering salt from her lips and went back to her coffee.

Steve took a slow, deep breath he hoped was too controlled for her to notice. His dick was hard in his jeans again, and unlikely to go down anytime soon. It was just his hand! Why did the sight of her lush mouth on his hand translate directly into phallic interest? She was playing with him, trying to prove a point. She'd made her point. Spending days alone with her was going to be challenging. He really needed to accept that challenge and be man enough to resist her. She was saying that she'd leave because she expected him to fall under some kind of spell for her. He needed to prove her wrong. He had to be stronger.
"We should get back. I'd like you to go to Bruce, and I need to wrap things up so I can be free for a while. Let's get done here," he said briskly.

He turned from his stool and bent to get his sweater, which was folded on top of his shoes. He set her shoes near her stool. He pulled his sweater on, but a tug at the bottom of it didn't half cover his arousal. He walked away into the living room to sit down and put his shoes on.

Estrella washed their coffee mugs in the sink and emptied the coffee maker. She came around to get her shoes, and she buttoned her shirt while she walked. Steve looked away while she tucked her shirt in and pulled her suspenders up. He looked back again as she straightened the points of her collar, snugged her tie, and licked her fingers to try to get that one wild tuft of hair to stay down. She sat on the floor like a loose limbed kid and worked her feet into her shoes. The sleek black men's dress socks on her trim ankles made him want to feel them in his hands. Steve shook his head and looked away again.

"We can go," Estrella announced into the quiet.

"Right," Steve said.

Mercifully, she turned and walked in front of him so he didn't have to walk toward her in the bright morning light fully exposed in the snug jeans. Everything was fine until they got to his bike in the garage. The thought of riding all the way back for an hour crushed in his pants as he was wasn't appealing at all. He handed her helmet to her and turned his back. While she put it on, he did a quick adjustment, then put his helmet on.

"Thank you for letting us into the house, Jarvis," Estrella said to the house in general.

"You are most welcome, Miss," the AI replied.

Steve offered his jacket to Estrella. She shook her head and the woggle of the helmet made her look like one of those little dashboard dolls. Steve laughed a bit and stowed away her hat and his jacket in a saddlebag. Just like the night before, he got on the bike and started it, then offered her a hand. She took it and mounted behind him. Her arms immediately went around him and she hugged in close. He tried to ignore the satisfaction he felt at that. He needed to focus on their safety now.

Steve carefully turned the heavy bike with a bit of his strength and long-practiced skill. He didn't want the garage door to open with his back to it.

"Jarvis, scan," he said.

"There is no suspicious activity outside, Captain. You are clear," Jarvis replied, and he opened the garage door.

Soon as there was enough clearance, Steve got them out and to the road. It was a beautiful morning. Red winged blackbirds bobbed on the reed grass that lined the road. They'd left after most of the morning traffic, so they didn't have to creep along to get back to the mainland.

Steve kept his attention on their surroundings and his eyes sharp for any irregularities in traffic. He wasn't in uniform, he didn't have his shield or his satchel, and folks weren't accustomed to seeing the Captain riding around with a passenger behind him. He was hoping on that to keep them anonymous, but not completely dependent on it. It was possible that some people knew his bike by now, but there were other bikes that looked similar out there.

By the time they were back in the boroughs, the feel of Estrella riding cozy behind him wasn't quite so distracting. Until her hands slipped under his sweater. He touched the comm button inside his helmet.

"Eya," he warned her.

"What? It's breezy. The rest of me is fine, but my hands are cold. Your jacket wouldn't have helped with that anyway," she answered him.

They stopped in traffic and Steve glanced at all the vehicles around them. His helmet visor was tinted, so nobody could see his face. All the vehicle windows were shut. Nobody would hear him talking to her.

"Alright, but don't get feely. I need to concentrate," he said.

She laughed without opening the comm channel and he heard her fine.

"I'm serious, doll. Don't mess with me right now," he told her.

Estrella behaved herself almost all the way back to the tower. Steve had to make a quick lane change to make their exit. It probably wasn't dangerous, but the nimble lean and punch of the bike in close traffic frightened her. Her hands flattened on his belly in some approximation of a stopping gesture, then her fingers curled and gripped at the waistband of his jeans as they slipped into the new lane between a bus and a delivery truck. There was plenty of room, but the large vehicles made her anxious. Soon as they were moving along sedately again, she felt silly for being so worried.

She relaxed the curl of her hands and was surprised at the denim-covered topography under her fingers. Was that-?

"-ya!" Steve said, "I need you to get your hands off, sweetheart."

She jerked her hands back up onto the skin of his belly, the left one fisted to hold in the memory of his hardness under her fingertips, and the right one pressed tight over it.

"Sorry! I didn't mean to," she told him, and her head clunked down onto his shoulder.

Steve could feel her ribs expanding against his back in quick, sharp breaths. Jolts of sensation shocked through his belly and down his legs, but he kept his head on for the rest of the drive. No way were they taking the bike on vacation, he decided.

Her distressed breathing had calmed by the time he pulled into the tower's garage and parked. She got off by herself and was quick to take off the helmet. She set it on the seat and made to hurry toward the elevator.

"Estrella, stop right there. Please wait for me," he said.

He put Pepper's helmet and his where they belonged and got his jacket and her hat. She was waiting for him, standing still in the middle of the parking garage. When he walked up beside her, he could see that her cheeks were red.

Steve chuckled.

"I didn't mean to," she told him again in mortification.

They got into the elevator which Jarvis held for them. Steve had his jacket over his arm. He tugged her hat on over her hair and she looked up at him, still pink under her golden skin tone. Steve sighed and turned her body. He widened his stance and leaned back against the wall so he could pull her belly flush against his. Estrella looked up at him cautiously. Her hands were braced against his biceps.

"I know you didn't mean to. But tell me why you could rub against me while we were dancing and it didn't bother you, and you can sit on my lap and it doesn't bother you, and we can stand like this, yet touching me with your fingers was a problem?" he wanted to know.

She shrugged and turned her face down against his shoulder. Even now, there was no mistaking him pressed between them, but she wasn't antsy about that. She should be. The brief touch of her fingers on his tip through the denim had him feeling electrified. He wanted more of her touch, but he refused to give in to the urge to move against her. That would be too much like giving up on the challenge she'd laid down in front of him. He had to resist.

"Jarvis, where is Doctor Banner?" Steve asked.

"He is in the lab he shares with Sir."

"Please put me through to him, if I'm not interrupting anything critical," Steve requested.

"Communication is open now," Jarvis said.

"Bruce?" Steve asked.

"Hey, Steve. How's it going?" Bruce answered.

He sounded preoccupied, and Tony's music was playing at a reasonable level in the background.

"Pretty good. Hi, Tony. Thanks for letting us use the beach house. It was nice out there," Steve said.

"You're welcome, Romeo. Should I send staff out to change the sheets?" Tony asked with a grin in his voice.

Estrella felt Steve's front draw tight as a drum, and she looked up to see his face in hard lines of disapproval. She spoke quickly before he could open his teeth and say something angry.

"I don't think so. We slept out on the porch on top of the day bed with all our clothes on," Estrella told Tony.

"Oh. Well, that's no fun," Tony replied.

The elevator opened onto the hallway to the shared lab and Estrella pulled Steve out behind her. The glass door buzzed until she opened it. Steve pulled his hand from hers but she could feel him walking close behind her.

"Heeey!" Tony smiled at her look in the dapper men's clothes.

Steve made a low noise behind her, and Estrella turned a frown at him, then looked to Bruce. She held her scraped hand out to Bruce where he sat at his computer, and he took her hand in his. Tony came over and watched over Bruce's shoulder.

"Uh-oh, Cap. Looks like we've got something here," Tony said with an apologetic smile to Steve and then to Estrella.
Her hand was almost completely healed at only thirty six hours since she'd scraped it.

"It would have taken you how long to heal from this?" Bruce asked Steve, looking up at him over the rim of his glasses.

"Less than thirty minutes," Steve estimated.

"The effect is slight, then," Bruce murmured.

"It's about ten times faster than she would have healed on her own," Steve said.

"It's okay, Steve. I don't mind having some healing. Bruce, he's so worried. Can you do some tests so he'll relax?" Estrella asked.

"Yeah. Give me a second to save my work…" he said, and turned back to his computer.

He made a few keystrokes and then got up from his stool. Estrella patted Steve on the shoulder and smiled sweetly at him, thankful for their night together.

"I'll go with you," Steve said.

"No. I want to do this. You go do what you need to do," Estrella told him.

"Dismissed," Tony said as Bruce and Estrella left the lab and headed for Bruce's personal workspace a few floors down.

Steve turned to Tony and crossed his arms.

"No need to go all power-stance with me, Steve" he said, and stood a little straighter himself.

"Do I make lewd comments to you in front of Pepper?" Steve asked sharply.

"Not in so many words, no. But I distinctly remember a very recent limo ride that was anything but modest, and that was right under Pepper's nose, figuratively speaking. I had a great night after we got home, by the way. Thanks for that," Tony told him with a wiggle of his eyebrows.

Steve deflated with a breath and looked down at the floor.

"I'm sorry about that," he said quietly.

"I'm not. You shouldn't be. And you're not supposed to apologize," Tony said.

"Right," Steve said more firmly, "So maybe I'm not sorry. Maybe I enjoyed it."

"There ya go. Walk tall, big man," Tony said.

He glanced down at Steve's jeans with a smirk, then turned to go back to his workstation.

Steve grumbled something under his breath and followed him. Tony turned after he sat down as if he was surprised Steve was still there. Just then, the door buzzed again, and Thor strode in with purpose.

"I would speak to you, Steven," he said.

Steve looked to Tony, who was ignoring them both and getting back to whatever he'd been doing before. Steve had words for him later, but Thor seemed serious about whatever was on his mind.
Thor stopped a step away and took up the same 'power stance' Tony had called him on a moment ago. Steve chuckled at the odd dynamics among them, and nodded his agreement to go with Thor wherever he wanted to go.

They were back in the elevator and Thor told Jarvis to go to the living room. Steve didn't like the way Thor's jaw was set. Something was bothering him, and he was pretty sure he knew what it was. It made Steve's frustration twist another turn tighter that Thor was still hung up over whatever he thought had happened in his gym. Steve opened his mouth to talk, but Thor flashed a cold look at him that stopped his words. What the hell was going on?

Thor wasn't in his armor, so nothing serious was afoot. It was odd to see such a large, powerful man wearing a bright Hawaiian print shirt with cargo pants and sandals, but Thor could be eccentric like that. He'd probably been watching something on television lately to inspire him into the odd clothes. His demeanor was all business, though. Steve followed him through the living room and out onto the roof patio.

"What are your plans with the girl?" Thor asked him abruptly when they were in the middle of the sunny open space alone.

"I'm taking some leave. Hopefully starting tomorrow. I've invited her to come with me, and she's - HEY!" Steve ended his words with a yell.

Thor tackled him around the waist and before Steve could force himself loose, Thor ran them to the edge of the roof and leapt over the rail. Steve glanced to the ground a thousand feet below, then up at Thor's open, outstretched hand. He crossed his arms, planked his body and waited for Thor to make his point.

Thor's face was right by his, so he got an up close look at the concern that turned down his features as they sped by eight hundred feet altitude, seven hundred feet, six hundred, five-

Finally, a crash of broken glass tinkled above them, and Mjolnir flew to Thor's hand. With lightning fast response, Thor spun the hammer up and jerked them both off to the West side of the tower. Steve saw that they were approaching the abandoned schoolyard. He'd only flown like this with Thor a few times and briefly when it was necessary in battle. He enjoyed the G force of it. Thor righted them to a hard landing, and Steve stepped back and away.

Mjolnir ripped from Thor's hand and slammed into the concrete of the already cracked old basketball court. More cracks radiated out from the hammer's impact.

"Well, that was irresponsible," Steve said.

"You have no idea." Thor agreed.

He sat down on the concrete Indian style and laid his arms loosely on his bent knees. He stared broodingly at Mjolnir in a long suffering way that told Steve he'd been doing this a lot lately. Steve looked up at the tower, then down at the adamant squat Mjolnir had taken in the schoolyard.

Thor waved a hand at the spot across the hammer from him. Steve sat down much as his friend was, but without the hammer-staring.

"If it's been shunning you, how did you know it would come out and catch us?"

"Necessity. You are more worthy than I at the moment. I wagered on the value of your life to draw it to me," Thor growled.
"Thanks, pal" Steve said dryly.

"You are welcome."

Steve huffed a laugh at Thor's easy acceptance of his sarcasm.

"You don't want me to go on vacation with Estrella," Steve said.

"Not in your current state," Thor agreed.

Thor didn't need to eye-grope him for Steve to understand what he meant.

"It doesn't look like I have any other state to be in, so I'm going as I am," Steve said.

"You will not," Thor denied firmly.

"And you're gonna stop me?" Steve asked.

Thor nodded.

"Have you no care for the girl?" he asked.

"You know I do. I'll be alright," Steve said.

"You will not," Thor said again, "and she will not. You are troubled and it will only become worse as time passes."

"Alright, so what do you expect me to do? You said I was supposed to be watchful, and I took that to mean that you were going to teach me something. Some great Asgardian wisdom?" Steve said somewhat testily.

"I was in error. I have wronged you," Thor said.

Steve sat patiently and waited for an explanation.

"You needed the satisfaction of a robust fight, yet I ruptured your organs when I should have gone more gently. Then, I assaulted your dignity with an unwanted act. To add further insult, I was prideful enough to tell you I was disappointed in your lack of restraint. As if that was not enough, I continued on in my arrogance to say that I would educate you like an unlearned whelp instead of the seasoned leader of battle that you are. Worst of all, I walked away and left you to fight alone. I am unworthy," Thor stated.

"Now make a good act of contrition, and I'll absolve you so you can go say your three Hail Marys," Steve said.

Thor tilted his head aside and looked to Steve instead of the hammer for a moment.

Thor nodded. Then, he reached out and grabbed Mjolnir's haft. It did not budge when he tried to lift it.

"Is that what this is? You're trying trial and error to get your weapon back?" Steve asked.

"It would seem so. I can think of nothing else," Thor murmured with disappointment.
"Did you consider that maybe you shouldn't have insulted your own dignity by putting your mouth on me? C'mon, Thor. You're the prince of Asgard. I felt bad that you did that for me. It's not your place to be in service to a man like that," Steve said.

"It needed doing, and I did so out of mercy. Was it not a help to you?" Thor asked.

"Yeah, it was, but then you got weird about it. I would have been alright with it, but then you started with the hang-dog looks and the silent treatment," Steve explained.

"So it was my behavior afterwards which unsettled you, and not the act itself?"

"Look, you're right. I'm so off the deep end here that it's only when I'm calm that I can see how out of character that was for me. I wasn't bothered by it at the time, and I barely thought of it afterwards. I've seen it happen before, in the trenches when everything was misery and hardship. Guys who had a girl waiting at home, guys who paid the girls to spend time with them on leave, it didn't matter. In certain extreme circumstances, it happens. You didn't mess with my head, if that's what you're worried about. I understood it, but it wasn't like me to allow it. I don't think any less of you, and I know why you did it. It's me I'm disappointed in," Steve said.

He could feel heat rising to his cheeks to have to talk about this, but it was necessary.

"And then I compounded my error by failing to act when we knew you were out looking for mischief to get into," Thor added, as if his previous list of faults wasn't enough.

"Nah, Buck's the only one who could have talked me down from that," Steve said.

"Why did he not?"

"Because he knew I'd find something even more stupid to do if he didn't play along. What I did is not on you or anyone else," Steve assured him.

"And yet I cannot use Mjolnir," Thor grumbled.

He tugged at the hammer again to no result.

"So you're going to leave it here in the middle of nowhere?" Steve wondered.

"What choice do I have? It is no safer nor more vulnerable here than where it was before," Thor said.

"I'm going on leave, Thor," Steve insisted.

"All the more reason for me to need the use of my weapon. If you are not here and action is needed, I must be ready."

"I know. So what do we do?" Steve asked.

Ideas piled up in his head, but Thor knew Mjolnir far better than he ever could. He kept his mouth shut and let Thor think.

"I cannot in good conscience allow you to leave with Lady Estrella in your singular company. She will come to harm," Thor said.

"I'd like to disagree with you, but you might be right. I should tell her she can't go with me," Steve said.
Thor didn't like to hear the disappointment in Steven's voice. As he enjoyed solitary time with his Jane, so too did Steven deserve time with his lady. He never would have thought to question Steven's honor, but the man was not acting himself.

"You had no father to teach you the ways of men," Thor stated.

"I had Buck and Buck's father for a while. There were a few men in the neighborhood who spent good time with us. It was nothing deep, though," Steve admitted.

"Then this is what is required of me," Thor said with a nod.

"What?"

"To teach you," Thor said.

Was Thor blushing? Steve narrowed his eyes at him. Maybe he was.

"This is not customarily passed from man to man, but from father to untried son. Even then, it is only shared along the lineage of warriors. The hearts and minds of lesser men have no need of it," Thor said.

Steve was intrigued and he wanted to hear more. Thor was stalling with extra wordiness, even for him. What the heck was he going to say? Thor was brash and often said things that were too bold for mixed company. Whatever this was had him hesitant.

"You don't have to, Thor. If you're uncomfortable, then don't. I'm not your son. It's not your obligation," Steve said to give him an out.

"You are my brother. Your father, a warrior before you, fell in battle. This, then falls to me," Thor said with finality.

Steve sat up more respectfully and nodded.

"Friend Jarvis!" Thor called out.

There was no response.

"Friend Jarvis, we require your assistance," Thor tried again.

They waited in silence for a full minute. It was plenty long enough that they should have seen Tony come out with his Iron Man suit. Thor waited a half minute longer for good measure, then nodded in satisfaction.

Steve smiled a little at Thor's tactics to ensure privacy, then he gave Thor his full attention. The slight rosy color heightened on Thor's face for a moment, then faded into determination. Steve waited kindly for him to gather his thoughts and his courage. Thor lifted his eyes from the hammer and looked to Steve with neither jolly humor nor casual ease.

"I speak to you as my father spoke to me, and may I do justice to my ancestors in the telling," Thor began.

Steve nodded once.

"The power you feel centered in your loins. It will rule you. It does rule you. I see this. Unguided, it takes what would be your dignity, your manhood, and makes you into little more than a beast," Thor said.
Steve agreed with a slight tucking of his chin. He would have wanted to argue for the sake of pride, but if he was being honest with himself, Thor was right. Pride had no place here.

"All men have desires of the flesh, with rare exception. As you are a warrior, the vigor required of you, of its very nature, enhances these desires. Steven, in your instance, you have been mighty enough, noble enough until now to master these desires. Did you think that might in battle and nobility of character would come without a price?"

"Maybe I did. Are you saying that if Bruce is right and I'm uh…mightier now because I'm eating more and reaching my potential, that I would have felt stronger physical desires sooner if I'd been eating more years ago?" Steve asked.

"I am. It is the only explanation which makes sense. Your virility was not lacking before, but nor was it troublesome beyond your tolerance."

"This is just another reason why I shouldn't feed myself up and make this any more difficult," Steve said.

Thor looked to him sharply.

"You speak from fear," he said.

Again, Steve wanted to deny his words, but again Thor was right.

"Is it right that you should fear your own body? That you should squander your gifts? Or should you take what life has given you and fulfill your potential to the service of your fellow man?" Thor asked.

Steve lowered his head. The answer was so clear that it didn't need words.

"But how, Thor? How do I go beyond what I'm already feeling without shaming myself?"

"You stop denying its existence. You stop resisting it. It pushes you to the limits of your restraint, and you spend all your energies struggling against it as if it were a worthy foe. You have allowed your own body to seduce you into solitary pleasures. Tell me I am wrong," Thor challenged him.

Steve could only heat to crimson. He held Thor's gaze by will alone. Anger and shame stabbed at him and made him grit his teeth at being so transparent to the other man.

"If I stop fighting it, if I stop my solitary pleasures, I'll be a raving pervert. I'll have no dignity left at all. I can't just let it go free," Steve denied.

"I do not yet have the skill of my father, Steven, and for that I am sorry. To a boy, all this sounds like a wondrous tale. To a man… When the wonder of things has been ground down under the boots of reality, and you are already struggling, what I must say is nearly unbearable. We do not speak of it," Thor said.

"I can take it. Go on," Steve said, low and steady.

Thor, looking anxious? Steve straightened his spine and tightened his hands into fists.

Thor took a deep, fortifying breath, shook the tension from his shoulders with a roll and shiver of heavy muscle, and met Steve's determined look with intent concentration.

"Do not restrain your lust. Let your very being become it. Rather than struggle in denial, let it pour through you freely, as your seed rushes through you in mating. Let this power flow from you, and you need only direct it to its proper fruition. Giving your life, your vitality up in love and service to others becomes the just gratification. It is misdirected lust and unnaturally restrained lust which eats a man alive. For you, Steven, a good man, freeing and directing this potential can only make you stronger. Imagine the power and majesty of your person if the strength that you feel at the root of you was fully realized for good purpose," Thor said with a voice that became a driving, forceful growl.

Steve grunted under the rightness of Thor's words. He could see it in the man across from him. Thor had a lust for life that was more than a trite phrase. Everything he did, he did with conviction. If something was to be enjoyed, he enjoyed it whole heartedly. If something was to be fought, he did that with good cheer and vigor, too. In love and affection, he spared nothing, even when his brother Loki hurt him, even when what another man needed was beneath his dignity. Sitting there wearing his silly Hawaiian shirt, Thor went all the way with whatever he wanted to experience. He didn't care who thought him foolish. No one dared to. Everyone was in awe of his power.

Love and service. Sacrifice, if needed. These were things Steve already felt deeply. What more could he do with his life, if he turned everything he had, everything he was, to them? Even the drive that made him a man. Especially that. If giving every last drop of himself was needed, he would. With conviction.

The physical parallel of the sentiment crashed into his forethoughts. It would be like fucking life. Hard. Grabbing it with both hands and power-driving it into submission, or giving himself up to the ride, when things weren't within his control.

Steve curled forward and planted his fists on the concrete. God, he wanted to fuck. He wanted to live this way, without self-struggle or restraint. His knees dug into the concrete and his hips trembled.

"You feel it. The power," Thor said.

Steve roughed out a response in the affirmative, wordless but understood.

Thor stood and picked up his hammer. He looked down at Steve, his brother, buckled under the weight of what he felt, barely hanging on to directing his energies properly. He was strong. Now that he understood the fullness of what he had, there would be no misdirection. Thor touched his shoulder briefly.

"Remember, Steven. Love and service. Sacrifice. Give it first to who gave it to you," Thor said kindly.

He spun up Mjolnir and streaked away, straight back to the rooftop patio of the tower. There, Anthony and Bruce waited, uncertain what was needed of them, if anything. They'd been looking on as they could, but they would not have heard what was said. Without doubt, they were there because Jarvis had alerted them to the broken glass.

From far below Steven's voice rose in an extravagantly uninhibited shout. They had no choice but to hear it even above the sounds of the city and across the distance. Thor grinned with pride and strode to the door, his hammer secure in his fist. Their enemies should tremble, he thought with satisfaction.

"What did you do to him?" Tony asked.

"I have freed him, I hope," Thor answered.
Chapter 34

Note: I don't know if it's coming through for you guys, but Estrella speaks with an ever so slight accent. It's more in the cadence of her speech and in her choice of words than in her pronunciation. She's thoroughly American, but her family has influenced her speech, especially when she's talking fast and saying a lot. It's not really noticeable when she's speaking slowly or only saying a word or two. Also, I'm having some trouble with adding the scene divider lines. They're there in the saved file in document manager, but sometimes they don't show up in the posted story. I don't know why. I'm sorry about that.

He was late. Natasha sat in the back corner of a deli in Queens near the construction site where Barnes worked. She watched the room, the many hungry patrons, and the door while she picked at her salad. It was raining hard, and finally Barnes rushed in, dripping in his work clothes.

"Use a towel!" the deli owner hollered at him, the same as he hollered at everyone else who came in out of the rain. Bucky grabbed a white towel from a basket by the door and scrubbed it over his long hair and then over his body to at least get the drips off of him. He dropped the towel onto the tile floor and scuffed it around to absorb the water he'd dripped, then used his toe to toss the towel onto a pile of damp towels. His eyes found Natasha in the corner at a small booth as he got in line to place his order.

Natasha looked at her phone. She had to be back to the tower for afternoon meetings in a little more than a half hour. Travel would take up most of that. There wasn't much time.

She watched the crowd interact around Barnes. He was grim looking, and people avoided going near him. Other people had umbrellas or rain jackets. Barnes wore his heavy blue work shirt and jeans plastered to him, and he didn't seem to care that he was wet. It was interesting how casual he looked with his leather construction glove on his left hand, and its mate held there as well, as if he had merely paused and become distracted in the middle of taking his gloves off. His hard, athletic body was attracting a lot of looks from the other diners, Nat noted. They kept their distance from him because he looked like what he was, but as long as he wasn't looking at people, many of them glanced at him a little more than casually.

Nat knew he could feel her attention on him. Unlike the others, she didn't look away when he looked in her direction. He placed his order with practiced familiarity, paid cash, and got his food almost immediately. While he walked toward her booth, she worked in her mind to reconcile how she had known him in Russia as a girl, and how he was now. Here, he looked thoroughly American, but the smooth menace of his stride was the same as it had always been. He was a predator among prey, when he chose to be. A kindred spirit. She shrugged off the long familiar urge to see him as a mentor, a man she should strive to please and seek approval from.

"Natalia," he said simply in greeting as he slid into the booth beside her.

He crowded her into the seat so he could face the same direction and keep his attention on the room. She had expected no less.

"James," she acknowledged him somewhat stiffly.

She was done with her salad, so she waited while he stuffed his stacked-high sandwich into his mouth. His left shoulder carefully avoided bumping her, and though they were pushed close on the narrow seat, they did not touch. She felt uneasy sitting so close, but she kept her demeanor calm and allowed no signs of fear to show.

"What have you got?" Buck asked when the worst of his hunger was sated.

Natasha switched to speaking their common language, which was less likely to be understood if they were overheard. She slid a plain manila file folder from her courier bag onto the table. Buck's glove on his free hand was damp, so he eyed her to ask that she open it for him while he ate.

"The girl is correct to be afraid. They are looking for her," she told him.

Inside the folder were printouts of information she had found, and photos of bodies, coroner's reports, and gang tattoos on Latino skin.

"How long?" Buck asked.

"The event which caught the attention of the gang happened six years ago. She has recurring trauma dreams. I would not have contacted you, but this needs to be dealt with and the Captain cannot be involved," Natasha said.

Bucky nodded.

He gestured with his damp glove, and Nat flipped through the pages of information. His eyes absorbed everything quickly, and his finger hovered over one particular photo of a tattoo on the hand of a deceased gang member. It was a sinuous line, clearly the silhouette of a shapely woman, with black ink depicting a seductive female eye with long lashes. The eye was near the top of the line, where an eye would be in the silhouette of the body, and a five pointed star was inverted where the female genitalia would be. The placement of the tattoo was on the base of the right thumb.

There were several such photos, each tattoo slightly different, some more crude, some more precise and artistic, but all recognizable as the same depiction, with the same location on the wearer's body. Most photos were taken from deceased bodies, and some from police prison identification files.

"Many have the same markings. Is this a cult?" he asked between bites.

"This particular gang is large, and its ideology is based on tradition and superstition. It is likely that the girl has been the inspiration for a form of sexual idolatry. As far as I can tell, only a small subset of the gang members ascribe to following her. Among the indigenous Maya culture, there is a goddess of similar description. The gang cultists allude to the goddess and the girl as one and the same. They know her name, and there is a photograph of her on the internet which they link to. From my observance of the few cult members here in the city, their goal is to locate her and return her to a specific, undisclosed location in the Southwest. Intentions are unclear, but she would likely be used as a sexual object until her death. Veneration and abuse frequently coincide," Natasha said.

Bucky took the Widow's cool descriptions as professional opinions, and he kept his mind in the same vein.

"I have met her. She appears human. Frail. Not a goddess. Do your people have an understanding of what she is?" he wanted to know.

"She is only a woman. Doctor Banner has done extensive study of her DNA, and she has no mutant gene. We do not understand the physiology which gives her the unusual voice. She has changed
Some since receiving Steve's blood, but the changes have nothing to do with her original unusual characteristics," she said.

Bucky nodded.

"Why can't he find a normal girl?" he asked in plain English.

"I tried. Do you know how hard it is to get him to go on a date?" Nat asked with a tight smile.

Bucky laughed. Natasha looked at him in understated surprise. The Soldier had never showed humor. What she was seeing was Bucky Barnes.

"Do I ever," Buck agreed.

Natasha closed the folder and slid it closer to his plate.

"I have to go," she said.

"Thanks for meeting me," Buck said as he got up to let her out of the booth.

He suppressed a shiver as she passed behind him. He knew what she was capable of. He'd trained her well. Allowing her behind him when he could have easily allowed her to pass in front was a deliberate show of trust, and they both knew it.

"Thank you for agreeing to help," Natasha told him.

"He deserves a break, and he's already dirtied himself too much. I'll take care of this," Buck said.

Natasha nodded once, and then she was gone into the slacking rain shower.

Steve listened to Hill lay out the preliminary information they had on the remaining Hydra bases. There wasn't much detail yet. It would take a few weeks to get anything actionable from what they had. That fit in fine with his plans to take leave, but he stayed focused on the meeting.

He was freshly showered and changed into his new office wear. This particular pair of pants felt a little snug, but he liked the charcoal gray along with the black tailored shirt. He kept wanting to fiddle with the sleeves which were rolled halfway up his forearms, but he managed to leave them alone. His place at the head of the conference table afforded him a draft from the overhead air vent, and he was beginning to appreciate wearing his shirt collars more loosely buttoned.

The details of what they were finding out about Hydra's infiltration of America's governing bodies was no more than he had expected since he and Nat had completed their undercover reconnaissance last week. It was bad, and there was a lot of work to be done. The plan of action would be complex, political, and social. Steve was glad that he'd spent the last few years immersing himself in modern American culture, or half the things Hill's agents were saying right now would have made little sense to him.

While he listened and watched, his mind ran a second track of thoughts. The talk he'd had with Thor two hours ago before lunch was threatening to take priority over his participation in the planning meeting. He forcefully toned down its primacy in his mind because to follow the new philosophy, he needed to devote himself to paying attention to his job. The task at hand was the best way he could serve his nation in getting rid of Hydra. Still, he could not prevent the almost hyper sensualized way his body felt. His body, which was to be used in service for the protection of others, he reminded himself again.
It was his turn to present what he'd noticed about the remaining Hydra bases. Steve got up to manipulate the holographic display and make his presentation. He liked how he could see his people through the projected pane of the media display, and they could see his gestures on the map clearly.

"These locations...here and here, show only minimal activity, but they're the closest to major cities, so I suspect we'll find Hydra's main hubs of operation in these regions within the cities, with the bases mostly used for storage and data hubs. Note that here, in the Midwest, this location shows much heavier activity. It can't be blended into normal civilian activity because there are no nearby urban centers. It's likely for combat training. If it was manufacturing, we'd have seen denser heat signatures on satellite," Steve explained.

Tony was bored, but paying attention, similar to Clint and Sam. Natasha kept reaching down to silence the vibration of her phone and making an annoyed face. Thor frequently flipped and caught his hammer where he sprawled in his chair aside from the table. Bruce paid polite attention. Hill was glaring at Thor for the distraction, but Thor was blissfully uncaring of her displeasure. Two of Hill's young female agents were staring at a point a lot lower than the display he was manipulating.

Steve paused and folded his arms, just to see how long it would take the distracted agents to notice he'd stopped talking. Tony smirked and looked to where Steve was sending his 'disappointed Captain' frown. It was Tony's movement that alerted the young women that they'd been caught staring.

"Canburn. Fields. Do we have a problem?" Steve asked them.

The agents jerked their attention up to his face, and he was tempted to have mercy on them, but his people were going to have to adjust. If he could stand in front of everyone and tend to business without blushing while he had a full on erection only partially covered by the tails of his shirt, then he could expect them to exert enough effort to ignore it, too. He expected professionalism.

"I'm sorry, Captain," Agent Fields said.

Canburn nodded without speaking. She was an analyst, not a field intel agent like Fields was. He couldn't expect her to be as jaded and bold.

"Yes, we have a problem?" he asked Canburn rhetorically.

Her eyes looked at his crotch again, and then she studiously adjusted her phone where it lay at the edge of the table.

"I'm sorry," Canburn whispered.

Steve looked around at everyone. Hill was giving icy looks to her young agents, but Steve shook his head slightly. It wasn't anyone's fault. They were all human.

"People, this is me for the foreseeable future," Steve said with a vague gesture to the lower half of his body. "Get used to it. If I have to put up with it, then so do you. If any of us can't deal with unusual situations, then we don't need to be here. Understood?"

Hill and her agents gave him indications of acceptance, and the Avengers merely waited, because they were already getting accustomed to Steve's condition. Natasha frowned and groped at her phone in her back pocket again. Steve looked to her.

"Can we focus?" he asked.
“Sure, Cap,” Natasha took out her phone and turned it completely off, which she hardly ever did.

Steve nodded and moved on with presenting his findings and his directives for engagement planning on the Hydra bases. Through the rest of the meeting, he caught Canburn and Fields occasionally looking at his crotch, but they were making an effort to not stare as much. He'd have to give them time to adjust. Natasha and Tony, the members of his team most likely to tease him about anything, kept a professional front, and he appreciated their support in giving a good example to the young agents.

"Hill, wait," Steve called when the meeting was over and the intel department was leaving the room.

At his expectant look, Hill closed the conference room door so that only herself and the Avengers remained inside.

"I apologize for Canburn and Fields, Captain. I'll speak to them," she said.

"I'm not worried about that. Handle it as you see fit. I wanted to inform you all that as of this afternoon, I'm taking leave for two weeks. I'll be staying stateside, but I don't know exactly where yet. It looks like you can get along without me, unless a situation develops. As usual, Romanoff is in charge while I'm gone," Steve told them.

"That's fine, Captain. It's probably as good a time as any for you to go," Hill agreed.

"As long as you're stateside, we can get to you within three hours, give or take. Will you allow tracking?" Natasha asked.

"Not directly. Tony, can you get me a fresh phone with a new number? I guess you could track that. If I really don't want to be seen, I can disable it," Steve said.

"Stark Industries does not make burner phones," Tony said with highly offended eyebrows.

Steve looked at him and waited.

"I am, Sir. I will add the new encryption and filters so that only a select few will be able to determine the Captain's location," Jarvis said.

"Thank you, Jarvis. Allow Romanoff, Barnes, Wilson, and Banner to access tracking," Steve instructed.

"Aww. You're shutting me out?" Tony pouted.

"Absolutely," Steve said with a tight smile and an emphatic cock of his head.

Tony grinned and winked at him.

"Are we done here?" Steve asked the room.

"Yup," Tony said, and he was up and gone before anyone else.

Stark tried to tow Bruce away, but Bruce shook his head and lingered, as did Barton. Natasha and Sam hurried off to their own business. Steve added a few notes to his presentation and shut the display down.
Clint walked over to join Steve. Thor waited nearby, still very pleased with his ability to handle Mjolnir.

"Uh…You said you're going on leave," Clint said.

"Yeah, Clint. What's on your mind?" Steve asked.

"You're taking the girl, aren't you?" Clint asked.

Steve nodded and walked toward the exit of the room. Bruce and Thor spoke to each other for a moment, then Thor came over to hover at the edge of their conversation. Clint walked with Steve out into the hallway of the office level.

"I trust you, man. I mean, I usually do. But, do you think that's such a good idea, given…" Clint gestured to Steve's persistent problem.

"Steven will behave with honor," Thor told Clint.

"Right. Not that it's my business, but we all like her, and I'd hate to see anything happen," Clint persevered.

"Thanks for your concern. It means a lot that you care enough to bother saying something. My head wasn't in the right place until this morning. Thor helped me to see things in a new way, so I'll be alright. She'll be alright," Steve clarified.

"If you're sure," Clint looked dubious.

He started to walk away, but he paused.

"I know more about some things than you might think, Steve. If you have any problems, you can call me," Clint offered.

There was a depth of something in his eyes that Steve didn't understand, but it was real. Clint absolutely meant what he said. He wasn't just being polite. Steve nodded and gripped his shoulder for an instant.

"Thanks," he told Clint.

Clint still looked concerned, but he left it at that.

"Enjoy your leave. You've earned it," Clint said.

He walked away and Steve turned to give Thor his attention.

Thor braced him into a solid hug, then set them apart.

"Are you well?" he asked simply.

"I think so. Everything feels different. I feel…stimulated, but at peace. Like I'm waiting at the frontline, about to engage," Steve said in a low tone, a hair above a whisper.

"Precisely. It is invigorating when you first realize your potential. Enjoy it fully, and spend some of your free time in contemplation. Do not expect yourself to remain strictly chaste, brother. Simply have a care that your motivations are directed toward others and not centered on the self," Thor advised him.
"I get that," Steve said.

Thor gave him one last pleased smile, and walked away.

Steve turned to where Bruce had been patiently waiting his turn.

"She wants you there to discuss what we found out today," Bruce told Steve.

"Good. I wanted to call you last night, but she insisted we wait," Steve said.

"It's just as well that you did. Everything's fine. Better than fine," Bruce said as they walked toward the elevators.

He texted a few things and ambled along beside Steve until they were in the elevator and going up. Bruce looked at Steve, but he didn't say anything.

"Why aren't you worried like everyone else is?" Steve asked.

"Don't get me wrong. I like Estrella. But I've learned to keep my distance. I'm accustomed to casualties. My priority is you, Steve. Don't let yourself get hurt. She might be dangerous," Bruce told him.

"Estrella? Dangerous?" Steve said with an incredulous laugh.

"I'm not laughing. From what I'm seeing, the two of you are like some kind of perfect storm scenario. It's in the biology of what's going on with both of you. Protect yourself. Don't go all in with your emotions. Take this slow," Bruce advised.

Steve kept his peace, though he wanted to argue with Bruce. Apparently, there was something he didn't know yet. He'd have to be patient.

Estrella met them on Bruce's floor, just outside the elevator. When Steve came out, she smiled excitedly and hurried closer to take his arm. He saw that her butterfly was back on the scrap of his old uniform again, snug at her throat.

"I can't believe we're finally getting out of here! When can we go?" she asked.

"Whoa, Eya. We have to figure out where we're going first, don't we?"

"I have ideas," she offered.

"Good, 'cause I don't have any. I just want to go," Steve said, and he made a flat, taking-off gesture with his hand.

Estrella nodded.

They followed Bruce into his suite. Steve had only been inside Bruce's living space twice, and then never for more than a moment. Bruce offered them tea and set a kettle on to heat water.

Bruce's place was soothing. He kept the windows at half dim. With the bamboo accents and the Asian theme, the space felt a little exotic. There was a quietly burbling stone waterfall in the far corner of the living room, and the seating was low and sturdy. Bruce thumbed a button on a remote control and quiet music faded into the air from somewhere.

"Please, sit," Bruce said.
He took the chair across from the couch. Estrella sat with Steve. She was nearly vibrating with energy, and happy. Her mood was infectious. Steve couldn't help but to feel glad to be near her. The warmth of her hand resting near his knee was nice, too.

"Jarvis, privacy please," Bruce requested.

"Of course, Doctor," Jarvis complied.

"I'm getting better. Tell him, Bruce," Estrella said.

"She is. Her weight is one seventeen and rising. Blood samples show that she's not anemic anymore. She has good organ function in all body systems, and brain activity has improved," Bruce reported.

"That's really good news," Steve smiled down at Estrella, "But what about her bones?"

He was concerned that anything they did on vacation might hurt her. If she was still fragile, they'd need to limit their activity.

"This morning's scan showed that her bone density and strength has recovered to greater than normal, with a few exceptions," Bruce said.

"It means that most of her bones are stronger than most people's. About fifteen percent stronger. Except for her pelvic girdle and a few cranio-facial bones," Bruce said.

"Why?" Steve asked.

"In the original skeletal scan when she first came to us, everything was much worse. We probably shouldn't have let you get up and walk around, Estrella," Bruce looked to her, then back to Steve again, "She's made a remarkable recovery, I suspect beginning when we administered treatment for the heart condition. Her pelvic bones and facial bones were the most severely weakened, and they're taking longer to recover, but they are recovering. If projections hold true, her pelvis and facial bones should finish stronger than average, too."

Steve was very happy, but there was more to know here.

"Why were those bones more damaged?" he asked.

"Because those bones change the most when I go from skinny to fat and back again. I've done it twice now. Three times they've grown, if you count puberty, and twice I've been skinny. When I don't eat, those areas melt away somehow," Estrella said.

She shrugged because she didn't understand why it happened that way. It just did.

"I have a theory," Bruce offered.

"Of course ya do. Let's hear it," Steve said.

"Estrella, you withhold food from yourself to change your appearance so that men won't notice you as much, and you'll be safe," Bruce began.

She nodded.

"Your appearance changes more than we're expecting it to, doesn't it?"
She nodded again.

"I think that her hip bones and facial features become a secondary sexual characteristic, in addition to what the rest of us normally experience at puberty. It would make sense, to go along with the other reproductive differences I suspect," Bruce explained.

There was a momentary silence. Bruce used it to go get the heated water and the tea for everyone. Steve turned to Estrella with a curious look. She made a sheepish smile at him and lifted her shoulders again.

"Don't look at me. I didn't ask for it. And you! With the shoulders and the muscles. It's not like you didn't get something extra added at a later date, too. I'm not the only freak of nature," she said grabbed his deltoid muscle.

"So we're both freaks," he said.

"Sexy freaks," she whispered and giggled.

Steve couldn't help but to laugh a little, too. With anyone else, he would have denied the use of the word 'sexy' out of politeness and modesty, but he was at ease enough with her to let it stand. They both knew how much attention they got in public.

Bruce set teacups in front of them and poured the water. There was a choice of teas available, and Steve waited for Estrella to fix herself some, then he took her cup. She stared at him in surprise for his unusual rudeness, but he gave her a rascally smile. She took his unused cup and fixed herself another tea serving.

"I don't know anything about making tea. Thanks," Steve murmured.

"Oh. I can teach you," she said.

Steve waved a hand. He wasn't big on tea. He turned his attention back to Bruce.

"You said other differences?" Steve wondered.

"This sort of information is usually private and confidential. Estrella, are you sure you want me to talk about this?" Bruce asked.

"Tell him," she said.

She kept her face tucked down to her teacup, and Steve knew she was feeling a little sensitive about the subject.

"Alright," Bruce agreed, "You called her a siren, once, when you spoke to Natasha. That's a mythological concept, but for lack of a better explanation, it might somewhat apply here. Estrella's physiology appears to be optimized to attract men. Along with her voice and her appearance, I'm starting to see endocrine function that indicates enhanced fertility, but on a different cycle. Estrella, are you sure about this?" Bruce asked her again.

She only waved a hand toward Steve. She couldn't look at him, or at Bruce. Steve put a comforting arm around her.

"I don't have to hear this. You don't owe me anything," he said quietly.

"I want you to know. You should know," she whispered to him without looking.
Steve urged her closer to him and rubbed her far shoulder gently. He didn't want her to think that he couldn't accept anything about her. He waited for Bruce to continue.

"Her reproductive cycles will probably be longer. On the order of three months per cycle, instead of the usual twenty-eight days. We haven't done any observations, but I'm estimating that she may have twice the number of fertile days in the middle of the extended cycle," Bruce said.

He was looking a little uncomfortable, probably because of how Estrella was trying to hide herself.

"You people know everything nowadays. How many fertile days does a woman usually have?" Steve asked.

"Five or six fertile days per monthly cycle is typical. So Estrella could have ten or twelve. There are ways to find out, if you're interested in that," Bruce told her.

While Estrella was strenuously not looking at either one of them, Bruce arched a brow and pointed to Steve's middle, and then emphatically to Estrella's middle, to indicate his earlier 'perfect storm' comment.

"You're saying we're both hyper-fertile," Steve said.

"Potentially. But only for those ten to twelve days of her cycle," Bruce told them.

Steve let out a quick, tense breath and leaned forward with his elbows on his knees. It was strange, how a new mindset changed him. All this talk of Estrella's sexuality and fertility had him weeping in his pants, but he also felt a sense of detachment from the physical urgency of his arousal. He was not only his dick. Just like he was not only the Captain. Like his job, this was a part of him. It didn't have to be the whole of him, if he chose to focus on other things.

None of this was intentional on Estrella's part, just as he hadn't intentionally been trying to attract Hill's agents during the meeting. This was the circumstance of her life. It was on him to accept her as she was. He looked to Bruce to see if there was anything else.

"Estrella," Bruce said gently.

She looked at him.

"Were your cycles about three months long?"

"Yes," she answered, "and for ten days in the middle, I have to stay away from men, even if I don't talk."

Steve hated to hear the anxiety in her voice. He didn't want to push her to explain. It sounded like she'd had a hard time. She could explain later, if she wanted to. Or not at all. He could understand that, too.

"Pheromones," Bruce guessed.

"As in smell?" Steve asked.

"No. Pheromones are odorless, we think. It's a purely chemical signal. If that's what's going on."

"Alright. We've gotten a little off course here. Before I forget to ask, is there any projection of when her skeletal recovery should be complete?" Steve wondered.

"Based on her ongoing rate of bone growth, maybe six weeks, maybe two months. It depends on diet and several other biological factors," Bruce said.

"What kind of precautions should we take? What's it safe to do, and what isn't safe?" Steve asked.

"Her weakest bones are at least seventy-five percent of the strength of healthy human bone. She doesn't need to take many precautions, other than avoiding car crashes and maybe sky diving. I wouldn't recommend childbirth, full contact football, fist fights, or rough sex right now, but most other activities should be safe," Bruce told them.

"What about other side effects from my blood?"

"I don't know yet. I took blood and tissue samples this morning. It'll take me some time to thoroughly search for possibilities. So far, there's nothing unusual, other than a little boost to healing and to muscle fiber reaction speed," Bruce told them.

Steve nodded. They'd already determined that last night.

"It's not just my bones that grow," Estrella said quietly.

She looked briefly at Steve.

"All the stuff that men like. That grows, too," she explained.

"Oh," Steve said after thinking about that for a moment.

"Yes. 'Oh.'," Estrella gently mocked him, "It's like you, when you went into that machine. You were just you when you went in. Like me now, or me a few weeks ago. But when you came out, everybody was staring at you."

"Tony showed you the reels? You saw me when I was small?" Steve asked.

"You know he showed me. He's Tony. He can't help himself," she said.

Steve didn't know how to feel about that. He wasn't ashamed of how he used to be, but people hadn't liked him back then. Sure, there was his ma and Buck, and all the old ladies had tended to dote on him. But young women and men had mocked him and shunned him mostly. It was hard to know nowadays who liked him for who he was, and who only valued him for the muscle.

He wondered if Estrella felt the same. What if she feared that none of them would appreciate her for who she was anymore, once she was fully returned to her healthy weight? Steve didn't like the idea of her having to worry about that.

"Eya, I liked you from the beginning. Don't forget that. I don't care if you change. Or if you want to stay the same or lose weight again," he told her fervently.

She looked to him and smiled softly.

"I know," she said, "When I saw you smaller in the old films, I wished I could have known you then. You looked just as strong then as you do now. Maybe stronger, because you felt you had something to prove."

Steve stared at her, dumbstruck. She meant it. Even now, it seemed like she was looking for him among all the augmentations. He tamped down the happiness she made him feel because he didn't want to be a giddy fool in front of Bruce.

"Don't you guys have a vacation to pack for?" Bruce asked them.
He smiled kindly at them and glanced pointedly toward the door.

"We sure do. Thank you, Bruce," Steve said.

He set down his little tea cup and got up to shake Bruce's hand. Steve was especially sincere in his thanks, because it wasn't Bruce's job to function as a medical doctor. For all the help and monitoring he'd done for Steve lately, and now his assistance to Estrella, and for keeping all of it confidential and out of the records, Steve was grateful to him.

"Any time. You know I can't resist poking at biological aberrations. It's fun," Bruce said.

He wished them well, and they left his suite.

When they were out of the elevator and outside Nat's suite, Estrella urged him to go with her to sit in front of the big window. Steve picked up the table that blocked their view of the gray day and moved it so they'd have room to sit comfortably side by side on the carpet.

She stared outside and down. Steve wondered what she was thinking. Talking with Bruce had taken a big part of her excitement away.

"So where do you wanna go?" he asked her.

"I don't think I should be choosing your vacation for you," she said.

Steve got caught up in how pretty her eyes were for an instant, then he looked down and out the window again.

"I'm in trouble, then, because I wanna be out of here real soon and I don't care where we go," he said.

"Okay. How about Corpus Christi?" Estrella suggested meekly.

"Texas?"

"Yes, Texas. It's the only Corpus Christi I know of," she said.

"Sounds good. What's in Corpus?" he asked.

"Beaches. Warm weather, even in late October. Sunshine and palm trees. Maybe some dancing, if I can buy some boots like yours. And my family," Estrella said.

"Then we're going to South Texas," Steve smiled his wide, charming smile that made his eyes crinkle.

Estrella got caught up in his charm, especially because she knew he was genuine. The moment felt enchanted, because for once, she was really looking at him, and he was really looking at her, and neither of them was fussing at the other to stop it. It meant something. The space between them seemed charged somehow, and Estrella jerked her head down to avoid the intensity of it. She couldn't keep the grin from her cheeks, but they quit staring at each other.

"When do you want to leave?" she asked.

"I was thinking early morning. Around three or four. Clint offered to fly us, because you don't have an ID. For where we're going, it should take about two hours," Steve said.

"Two hours, from here to Corpus? Isn't that really fast?"
"Sure it is, but we can do it. It doesn't feel any different, once you're up to speed," he said.

"You mean in the Avengers jet?"

"Yeah," he said.

"I don't know. I would feel like my hair is on fire. Can't we go a little slower?" she asked.

"Sure, if you want to," he offered.

"How many days should I pack for?" she wondered.

"I wanna be gone for two weeks."

"I don't know if I have that much clothes! I don't have a suitcase. Steve, you do everything so big. I don't know if I can keep up," she said with wide eyes.

Just their overnight visit to Rockaway last night had been amazing for her. To go somewhere in the Avengers jet, and stay for a whole two weeks...she didn't know how to think of something so adventurous and extravagant. Where would they stay? If they were leaving twelve hours from now, there wasn't even time to plan things!

"I don't mind slowing down for you," Steve said in a lazy voice.

His low, teasing tone turned her head sharply.

Was he flirting? He was! For just a moment there was something heated and suggestive in his eyes and smile, and then she could see that he'd surprised himself just as much as her when he realized what he'd implied.

"Eya! I didn't mean that! I mean, I did, but not like that," he verbally backpedaled.

"I think you did. Something's different about you this afternoon," she said with a grin, then she hid beneath her lashes. She couldn't look at him for long when his mouth was just slightly open like that. It made her want to kiss him.

"We can talk about that later. Maybe. But really, Eya. Truly. The things Bruce said. We don't have to act on any of that. I'm not planning to take you away for two weeks and do anything disrespectful to you. I have my own issues, and I don't think we're ready for that," he said softly.

"I might be," she told him.

"I'm not," he said as kindly as he could.

She looked at where his pants and shirt were trying valiantly to keep his arousal covered, but still partly failing.

"That's not what I mean, and you know it," he said.

"I know. It's okay," she said.

"Don't go thinking that I don't want to. I do, but I don't want to talk about that right now. We need to go pack!" he said eagerly.

Estrella nodded. Then she looked at him in dawning horror.
"What?" Steve asked.

"My job! I don't work for you! I can't just take off. You're the boss of the Avengers, but Tony's my boss! Oooh! Jarvis, I have to talk to Tony," she jumped to her feet and stood in a tight, nervous posture.

"Stark," Tony said briskly over the same sound system that Jarvis used.

"Tony! Steve wants to take me on vacation, but I just started work. I don't have any vacation time. We were sitting and planning, and I realized that I forgot to ask!"

"Your life's been hell for ten years, kid. Go have fun," Tony said indulgently.

"But its two whole weeks," Estrella told him.

"So take a month. I don't care. Like I told fancy pants there, I'm R & D. I don't care about staffing problems. Go," Tony urged her.

"But what if the staffing department fires me?" she worried.

"They can't fire you if I tell them not to. I own them. The staffing department, that is," Tony assured.

He was starting to sound distracted. Steve knew exactly which look would be on his face. Stark was looking at something else intently, working with animated hand gestures, from the way his voice sounded with the movements of his body.

"Thanks, Tony," Steve said.

"You bet. Take good care of pixie chick," Tony said.

"I will," Steve smiled.

"Thank you, Tony!" Estrella called out happily.

"Eh. Go pack your bags or something. I'm busy," Tony said gruffly.

The comm line cut to silence. Steve knew Tony wasn't comfortable with genuine praise or thanks from people he liked. He'd sounded abrupt, maybe even grumpy, but he'd been glad to make Estrella happy.

He got to his feet and tugged Estrella up, too.

"Were you texting Nat all during my meeting?" he asked her.

Estrella looked guilty, then nodded.

"I was trying to be serious and get some last minute work done, and you had her squirming in her chair with her phone. Not a good example to set for the junior agents," Steve shook his head with a twinkle of humor in his eyes.

"Sorry," Estrella whispered.

Steve smiled and stepped closer to her to bend and kiss her cheek. It was a good deal slower and softer than a quick, friendly smooch would have been. Estrella sucked in a breath and closed her eyes.

"This is gonna be fun," his voice rumbled near her ear.

"Mm-hmm," she hummed anxiously.

"Let's go pack. I'll see ya at four," Steve told her.

Estrella resisted watching him walk away because stinker that he was, he'd probably look back and catch her staring at his ass. She hurried into Nat's suite. There was too much to do and not enough time!
Chapter 35

Note: For anyone who is surprised about a gang being after Estrella, you can go back and read chapter 25. That might clear things up. For this series of chapters about their vaca, I studied stuff online for five hours. From googlemaps (Streetview. So helpful) to tripadvisor to trucks to the diocese of Corpus Christi, and several other things. I've never been there, but now I think I want to go!

She needed flip-flops and she didn't have any! For the beach and all around most of her home town, flip-flops were essential, but hardly anyone wore them in New York, especially this time of year. Estrella quickly dug through the mostly borrowed things in her closet. She was making a mess, but she didn't care right now. She didn't have a swimsuit, and she didn't have a suitcase, and she didn't have-"Estrella, calm down," Natasha said from her doorway.

She paused in her digging and looked to Nat's calm, quiet presence.

"There's so much I don't have! And we're leaving so soon, and we don't even have hotel reservations. He says Clint is dropping us off in the Avengers jet. Dropping us off where? How will we get around? It's not like New York there. You have to have a car to get anywhere," Estrella said urgently.

Natasha moved to sit on her bed. She was smiling that smile that wasn't really a smile, but her face looked pleased and indulgent anyway.

"I'm sorry for bothering you during your meeting. He said it was distracting for the junior agents," Estrella said a little more calmly.

Natasha chuckled.

"Steve has no room to complain about that. He was enough distraction to them all by himself," she said.

Estrella looked at her curiously.

"He was making a presentation, standing in front of everyone. Two female agents couldn't pay attention to what he was saying. They thought his cock was far more interesting," Nat explained.

Estrella felt momentarily flustered at her bold words, but she completely understood.

"Oh. I know. He's very attractive. It's hard not to stare. I don't know how you manage to work with him," she said quietly.

"I've been managing men and their cocks for decades. It gets old," Natasha said.

"Me, too. Maybe not for as long, but I know what you mean. Ooooh, I'm afraid I'm going to mess up," Estrella said.

"How would you mess up?"

"I don't know. I don't have enough money to pay my way, but I want to go. And what if my family
"Isn't nice? And I don't want to make Steve uncomfortable. He says he's not ready," Estrella said.

"Don't worry about the money. It won't be a problem. You'll see. I can't help you with your family. Steve's not ready. Not for you. Be careful with him," Natasha advised.

"Why isn't he ready? He's a man. He should be ready for anything," Estrella reasoned.

"I don't think you realize how concerned he is about what happened with the prostitutes. I'm handling that so he hopefully won't be connected to them by the media. A few different detrimental outcomes are still possible. He's going to worry, and he's going to feel guilty. Until it's fully behind him, he's not clear to move forward with anything serious. He wouldn't do that to you."

"Do what to me? If I want to be with him, what business is it to everybody else? I know what he did, and I don't care because I know why he did it. Those women don't mean anything to him," Estrella insisted.

Natasha held her peace. She was glad to hear that Estrella accepted Steve in the place he was, and that she didn't judge him, but the girl didn't fully understand what being Captain America meant in all of it. She would leave that for Steve to make clear, if he would.

Natasha held out a pack of condoms to her.

"Take these, just in case," she said.

"Take them, how? In a brown paper bag? I don't have a suitcase!" Estrella said, but she accepted the condoms.

"Come with me," Natasha said.

She left Estrella's room, and Estrella followed her into her bedroom, then into Nat's large closet. The closet was packed tight and precisely organized. Nat had several different travel bags. She pulled down an ordinary black suitcase with wheels. That went onto her wide bed, and Estrella followed her like a puppy back into the closet.

"Take off your jeans and your shirt," she told Estrella while she opened a drawer and searched through colorful fabric.

Estrella hesitated, but Natasha cut her a coldly expectant look. It didn't feel right to be exposed in front of the powerful, beautiful redhead, or anybody else. Natasha pulled out something that was dark green, and turned to wait impatiently for Estrella to comply.

It would have been easier for her if she'd taken her clothes off while Natasha was distracted looking through the drawer, but now she had to get undressed under Nat's full scrutiny. From Nat's look, she knew she'd missed an opportunity, and now the woman was giving her no mercy. Estrella hurried to take off her red shirt and her jeans. She toed off her sneakers and awkwardly bent to pull her jeans from her heels.

"Try this on," Natasha said, and handed her a swimsuit.

Estrella forced herself not to stand with her arms crossed over her bra. She took the garment and looked at it. It was a simple one piece swimsuit. It looked new and clean, like it had never been used. Estrella stepped into it and pulled it up onto her shoulders. The little paper hygiene sticker was still in the crotch. The suit only fit because it was very elastic. Their heights were almost the same, but Natasha currently had more bottom and bosom than Estrella did. It didn't wrinkle and hang loose, but the lycra didn't stretch much. It would do. Really, now that she was looking,
Estrella wasn't sure she could wear this. Her legs were so very bare, and too much of her shape was showing, and there were hairs, and-

"Stop worrying. Here. Drape this around your hips," Natasha said.

She offered her a fringed wrap that was made of ivory yarns shot through with gold. Estrella took it and tied it around jauntily so that the wrap made her bottom half not look so exposed. The combination of colors was pretty and feminine, and she liked it. She still didn't know if she could make herself wear it in public. Natasha sighed and handed her a wispy gauze beach cover up that had slouchy three-quarter sleeves and a long, open front. Estrella felt much better when she put it on. She smiled at Natasha and nodded.

"You need new panties and bras," Natasha said.

"No I don't. Nobody's going to see, so why does it matter? I'll be changing so much that things won't fit if I get them new now," Estrella argued.

Natasha gave her another one of those subtle smiles. She went out into the bedroom and opened the suitcase.

"Take the beachwear off and pack it," she said.

This time, Estrella quickly did as she was told, carefully folding things and setting them into the corner of the empty suitcase. Natasha was doing something else at her dresser, and she put a handful of colorful fabric strips in one of Estrella's hands, and a piece of jewelry in the other.

Estrella turned over the oval shaped opalescent brooch to see a flat band on the back, and another bit of Stark technology attached.

"You got me another one?" she asked.

"Don't complain. I found the opal at a flea market for twelve dollars. Bruce had another modulator fabricated in fifteen minutes. I want you to have an extra, just in case. Things get lost," Natasha said.

Estrella hugged Nat tightly, and Natasha didn't know how to accept the sudden affection. She patted the girl's shoulder until Estrella stepped back. She was looking closely at the tarnished silverwork that held the old opal in place, and at the bright new silver that attached the Stark tech. She looked to Natasha and opened her mouth.

"No. It's a gift. We don't want anything to happen to you, so we wanted you to have it. You don't pay for gifts, so don't try," Natasha told her firmly.

Estrella nodded and felt stupid because her vision went a little watery.

"Keep crying, because you're about to be in pain. Come to the bathroom. I'll wax you," Nat said.

Estrella followed her, not fully understanding. Then she saw the little electric pot of wax and the cloth strips.

"No. Nobody's waxing me. I don't want to be bare," she said.

Nat lifted an eyebrow and pointed to where Estrella's plain white underwear met her upper thighs.

"Just that, then. You don't even have to take off your panties," Nat bargained.
"Okay, but only that. I swear I'll bite you if you try to do any more. I'll bite you hard," Estrella warned.

Natasha chuckled. She turned over the fluffy bath mat in the middle of the floor so that they wouldn't get wax in the fibers. Estrella lay down and waited nervously.

It didn't take long to remove the hairs that showed outside her panty line. The pain was shocking, but Estrella kept quiet. Natasha looked to her when she didn't complain. There was something pleased in Nat's expression, maybe even proud.

"Your pain tolerance is high," she said.

Estrella shrugged.

When they were done, Estrella was more pleased than she thought she'd be at how neat she looked.

"Thank you," she told Natasha.

"Go. Put what you have in the suitcase. Don't forget the condoms," Natasha said.

"I don't have two weeks of clothes," Estrella fretted.

"Stop worrying. It won't be a problem. The Captain is very good at improvising," Nat told her.

"I'm not going on vacation with the Captain," Estrella talked back, just because she felt a little out of sorts from somebody making her strip to her underwear and then get waxed.

"Yes, you are. You both think you're not, but watch what happens with him the instant there's any hint of a threat," Nat said with certainty.

"Okay," Estrella gave up arguing and went to pack her meager things.

It's not that it took her long to put twenty six items in the suitcase. She had a hard time deciding what to bring and what to leave. She had two jeans, a nicer long skirt, and three tops that actually belonged to her and weren't borrowed. She kept thinking how empty the suitcase looked, and adding other things from her closet, but they were things only suited to New York's fall weather. It was going to be warm in South Texas.

Natasha called her to eat and badgered her with threatening looks into cleaning everything off her plate. Then, she made her drink a half tumbler of whiskey and go to bed. In the dark of her room, Nat sat for a moment on her bedside and ran her fingers through Estrella's hair. The whiskey was taking effect and her worries about being ready for vacation with Steve were being numbed away in a warm, comfy haze.

"Everything will be fine. Get some sleep. No dreaming," Nat told her.

Estrella mumbled something even she didn't understand and looked at her phone on the night stand to be sure her alarm was set for three-thirty.

She was waiting in the foyer when the elevator doors opened and Steve came to get her. The sky was still black out the windows, and Estrella felt a little dizzy from the lingering effects of her after supper whiskey. On top of that, she was going to get in an airplane. A very fast one.

"Good morning. Are you ready?" Steve asked her.
"Natasha made me drink whiskey," Estrella said, and mentally kicked herself for saying something so nonsensical.

Just then, the door to Nat's suite opened, and she stood there in her sleep tee and shorts. Estrella glowered at her for looking so good even though she had no makeup and her hair was messy.

"She would have stayed up all night switching things out in the suitcase," Natasha excused herself.

"Are you feeling alright, Estrella?" Steve asked, looking from Nat to Estrella.

"I'm good," she told him.

She didn't want to say it, but she was scared, almost nauseous. She was incredibly excited to go off with Steve. She was anxious about seeing what was left of her family again. And she was terrified of flying.

Steve looked good, as always, but she was so bothered that she could hardly focus on him. He wore a faded pair of Levi's and his brown cowboy boots. He didn't have a big belt buckle or a hat, but his white and blue plaid shirt with the Western style yoke at the shoulders let her know that he was happy about a change of scenery.

"I'll take your bag," Steve offered.

Estrella almost handed it to him, and then she had a thought.

"Oh! I forgot to pack something. Can you go on, and Jarvis can bring me to you? I won't be a minute," Estrella pleaded with him.

Steve looked at her patiently and waited.

"Go, Steve. I'll get it and come find you," she said.

Steve gave Estrella a nod and got back in the elevator. He gave Nat a smart salute before the doors closed and she knew what he meant. Natasha stared back at him intently, a lot of things on her mind. He'd probably guess at least half of what she meant. Be careful. Watch your back. Don't worry, I've got this. You'd better not get yourself hurt. You'd better not hurt her. Call us if you need anything at all. Steve understood her and gave a small, curt nod. She'd been relieved to see the slight fullness at the back of his shirt that meant he was armed, at least with a handgun. He'd purposefully tempered his giddiness at going away to give her a moment of assurance that he would take their safety seriously in the midst of having fun.

The elevator took Steve away to wherever the jet was, and Estrella turned to Natasha.

"You're so weird. What did you just say to him?" she asked.

"I told him to be careful and to have fun. Now go get what you wanted to get," Nat told her.

Estrella left her bag where it was and ran to give Natasha a hug.

"Thank you for everything. I'll bring you back a souvenir!" she kissed Natasha's cheek in a hurry, then grabbed her bag and got in the elevator, which had returned for her. She waved at Nat, and Nat waved back and closed her door.

"Jarvis, you have to let me into his suite!" Estrella said.

"You may attempt to convince me," he replied.
"He forgot to pack something important. I know he did. He'll need it," she said.

"Very well, but don't linger. Mister Barton is ready to depart," Jarvis said dryly.

The doors opened to the men's side of the floor, and Estrella left her suitcase in the elevator. She ran into Steve's dark suite and around the bed to the night stand. She gave the drawer a quick tug, took the box she found there, and hurried back to the elevator. With a zip and a shove, she had what she'd wanted to get for him.

"Okay. Thank you, Jarvis. We can go now," she told him.

"Very well Miss," his cool voice said as the elevator started moving up, "You appear to be nervous."

"I've never flown. It sounds dangerous to go as fast as Steve says we'll go."

"Rest assured that no one has ever perished from flying in a Stark designed craft. Mister Barton and the Captain are both accomplished pilots. You will be quite safe," he assured her.

"If you say so," Estrella murmured.

The elevator opened onto a foyer she'd never seen before. It looked less homey. Distinctly Avengers-ish. Her nerves clamored more loudly.

"Go on. The Captain awaits," Jarvis urged her kindly.

Estrella felt that if she walked out of the elevator, her life was going to change again. This felt big. Living behind the dumpster in the alley by the coffee shop was small, small, small. A part of her was still more comfortable with humble living than with all this advanced complexity. She took a deep breath and pulled her wheeled suitcase behind her.

The foyer was sharp and stylized in iconic colors. Directly ahead was the locker room where the Avengers got dressed and went out to do all the things she saw and heard about on the news. She was living with the Avengers! It was easier to think of them as Tony and Natasha, Bruce and Thor, Clint, Steve and Sam. It made her feel even smaller to think of them in that locker room, turning into heroes.

There was a high pitched hum through the double doors to the left that started softly, then grew in power. Steve opened one of the doors, and she saw the dimly lit jet bay, and the velvet night beyond. The jet was huge! Strange and aggressive looking. Its back was open, and Steve came for her. At the moment, he looked out of place in his Western wear. In this room, he would fit better if he was wearing the Captain's uniform. He picked up her suitcase and took her by the hand.

"This doesn't weigh anything," he said to make an attempt at conversation.

Steve was worried. Estrella looked pale, almost like she was in shock. From the look of her pupils, she was. Steve put himself in her place. If he'd gone from his small self, living in a drafty cheap rent room, to this place, with a jet waiting to whisk him off across the nation, he'd have been thrown for a loop, too. In a way, Estrella was making an even bigger transition here. At least he'd had a home and some control over his life.

"You're gonna be fine, sweetheart. I'll make sure of it," Steve told her, whether she could hear him through her shock or not.

He picked her up bridal style and carried her to the jet. The wing turbines were spinning up at a fairly sedate rate of acceleration, because Clint could see that Estrella was overwhelmed. Steve hurried her up the ramp, dropped her suitcase next to his, and settled her into an ergonomically contoured seat. He squatted down in front of her and bent her forward so that her face was down low over her knees. He cradled her head against his ribs and made sure her airway was open while Clint sealed the back hatch. The noise of the jet went from a windy whine to a smooth hum.

"Estrella. Look at me, honey," he ordered her.

He lifted her face and her eyes shifted to his.

"We're fine. I'm really sorry that you're not having fun. This isn't much different than getting into a cab or onto a bus. It'll be a smooth ride, I promise, once we get to cruising speed. The weather's clear from here to Texas. I do this all the time. We're good at it," he assured her.

"Okay," she whispered.

Her eyes were tracking him now. That was an improvement.

"I'm gonna stay right here. Normally I stand because it's fun, but let's get you buckled in so you'll feel secure," Steve murmured.

"Okay," she repeated.

That was about all she could manage to say at the moment.

He eased his hand to her chest and leaned her up against the seat. Slow and smooth, he got her snuggled into the five point harness they almost never used. She was small enough that he had to adjust the straps quite a bit.

Steve took a moment to secure their two bags and his satchel and shield in cargo netting.

"On cue," he said to Clint.

He sat on the floor and wedged his shoulder between Estrella's knees. He put his hands in hers so she could feel his skin. Her eyes were looking all around now, and that was good. The wing turbines were fully revved.

"There's gonna be a clunk sound," he told her, and Clint released the wheel clamps. Estrella flinched.

"Now we're gonna lift off nice and easy until Clint has us clear of the tower," Steve said.

Clint was free to smirk at the cuteness of Steve coaching her through it every move of the way. He felt bad that the girl was worried, but the only way to do this was to just get it done. With the skill of a savant, Clint eased the jet off the landing deck so that it could hardly be felt.

"See? Real smooth. No worries. In a minute, the rear turbines are gonna engage, and you'll feel pushed back in your seat. If you feel dizzy, it's fine to pass out. I'll be right here," Steve said.

Estrella nodded and pressed her eyes shut. It felt precarious, with the humming of the wing turbines holding them in the air. It felt like they were a leaf hanging in the breeze, ephemeral. She didn't want to think that they were out in open space, even higher up than the view from Natasha's suite, just hanging here.

"Clint," Steve prompted.
Estrella whined, because she feared what was coming, and then she yipped when the rear turbines roared to life and the jet punched forward. Steve was like a rock settled in front of her, and she stared at his eyes like they were the only thing in the world. It seemed to last forever, being pushed back in her seat like a giant was mashing her. But she liked it better than the floaty feeling of the wing turbines. It felt like raw, blistering power. Plenty power to keep them from falling out of the sky.

As the pressure began to ease, she took deep breaths and Steve smiled at her.

"There ya go. That was my fault. I didn't even consider that a civilian might not be happy with this. I guess I take things for granted," Steve said. He touched his fingers to her throat and felt her pulse hammering.

"Okay," she said again.

For a while, her vision had gone dark and her ears felt fuzzy with static. Now, she was starting to feel that she was sitting in a strange chair in the living room. The jet flew straight and steady with a low, tolerable roar.

"Good morning, sunshine. Are we doing alright back there?" Clint asked her.

"Uh-huh," Estrella said.

"It should be just like this all the way to Corpus Christi. Do you want to get up and move around? Go to the bathroom?" Steve asked her.

"I can walk around?" she asked.

"Suuure," he said, and he freed her from her seat restraints.

He gave her a hand up in case she wasn't steady on her feet.

"Can I go up there with Clint?" she asked.

There was the seating and cargo area in the back where she'd been, and then some computer work stations to the sides sort of in the middle, and the space narrowed toward the front. There were two seats there in front of the complicated looking control panel. Steve helped her into the co pilot's seat and stood between her and Clint with his hands resting on an overhead rail. Clint smiled at her and reached to flip a switch on his side of the controls. The lighted panel in front of her went dark.

"There. Now you couldn't sink us even if you wanted to," Clint said.

"Oh. Good," Estrella said.

She looked to Steve standing steady next to her. He was looking out the front window, clearly comfortable and pleased. Estrella turned to see what there was to see.

"It doesn't look like we're going very fast," she said.

There was a dense carpet of lights below them, mostly buildings and street lights in long lines. Red and white arteries of traffic flowed everywhere, even in the pre-dawn hours.

Clint tapped the speed guage.

"Is that in miles per hour?" she asked, her eyes wide in surprise.
It didn't feel like they could be going that fast! It felt like they were sitting still, except for the shift of the lights on the ground beneath them.

"Yup," he said.

"It only looks like you're going fast when you're close to the ground," Steve said.

"Why didn't you talk to an airport before we took off? Aren't we supposed to let them know where we're going so we don't run into another airplane?" she wondered.

"Nah," Steve made a face and smiled.

"Then how do we keep from hitting another airplane?" she asked a little more pointedly.

"Miss, I am fully aware of every object in the airspace for many miles around us. Nothing larger than a fly will go undetected," Jarvis spoke from somewhere around them.

"Jarvis!" Estrella said, pleased.

"Yes, Miss," he replied.

"I didn't know you would be coming with us," she said.

"Only as far as your destination. I do not suppose we have decided upon a destination as of yet?" Jarvis asked mildly.

Steve squatted down next to her and took out his phone. He pulled up a webpage and started scrolling through sales listings. His thumb tapped a particular listing.

"Jarvis, can you tell me if this truck has been sold yet?" Steve asked.

"There are no recent records of a transaction involving that vehicle identification number," Jarvis said.

"Then the seller's home is the address to take us to," Steve said.

"There is ample landing space near that address, though we may frighten the livestock," Jarvis said.

Estrella didn't know how Jarvis could get so much information so quickly just from a webpage Steve had on his phone.

"A truck? You're buying a truck?" she asked Steve.

"I've always wanted one. The bike isn't practical for more than one person when the weather's bad," he said.

Estrella tilted his phone so she could see better. The online listing showed a large, dark blue pickup truck.

"You're buying a truck, just to go on vacation?" she asked, still not quite believing him.

"Eya, I was in the ice for a long time. Howard Stark made investments with my pay, and Tony took over management of it when Howard passed. I've got more money than I'll ever know how to spend. This is the first thing other than food and art supplies that I've wanted to buy. So, yes, I'm buying a truck," he said.
"Okay," she said, baffled.

Estrella hadn't considered that Steve might be wealthy. Everyone was wealthy compared to how she was used to living. She'd thought that because he was a soldier he might not be paid very well. He had his bike and his shield and his uniform, but that didn't seem like a huge lot of things. His suite was simple, with decent furniture and some collections of old things.

Knowing he was really wealthy, to the point that he didn't know how to spend it all, made her uneasy. Plus, he was a super-hero with super-hero friends. Then, there were all of his years of experience doing incredibly dangerous, important things-

Estrella startled out of her alienated thoughts when Steve's face was right in front of her so close that his warm, mint scented breath mixed with hers. His hand came to touch under her chin, and then he kissed her.

She was so surprised that her eyes didn't close for a second, and then they did. His lips! She'd wanted to feel them for so long. His mouth was strong, but soft and smooth. Their lips pressed together, then rubbed and parted. Her tongue met his eagerly, and then everything was warm, slick, delicious Steve.

Clint grunted in surprise and smiled as the Cap knelt beside him and kissed his girl. He didn't know what had happened in the hotel room with the hookers, but Steve was making sounds like this moment was the best ever. The girl wasn't quiet, either, with all those little whimpery pleading sounds. Damn! If they sounded like this just for a kiss, Clint didn't think anyone could stand hearing them when they were doing anything that involved clothes coming off.

Steve slowly pulled away, and Estrella made a disappointed sound. He opened his eyes to see her with hers still closed and her brow furrowed in concentration. Her lips were gorgeous and shiny, her breaths huffing softly through. He wanted badly to keep kissing her all the way to Texas, but he had a point to make.

"Estrella," he said softly, surprised to find that his breathing was a little out of sorts, too.

He rubbed his thumb back and forth in a glide across her bottom lip. Her tongue flickered out to touch his thumb and her eyes opened. God, her eyes! He forgot what he'd wanted to say.

"Hmm?" she asked.

Even with her butterfly in place, she sounded sweet and seductive.

"Huh. Wow," Steve gathered his thoughts, but she was scattering them almost as fast as he could gather, sitting there looking so inviting, "I wanted to say that the money doesn't have anything to do with me. It's just a thing that sits there. You know me. Don't let it get between us. Please?"

"Okay," she said.

Oh, no. His kiss was far more important than his money. She'd happily live under a bridge as long as she could be with him and kiss him again. Having to live in a stuffy big mansion might make her reconsider, but…

Estrella slid her arms onto his shoulders and wrapped them around his neck. She wanted more. She wanted to taste him again. He tasted clean and hot somehow, if hot had a flavor. Again, their lips glided together, then their tongues. Deeper this time.

"You got any mercy over there? Cause I could use some," Clint said dryly.
"Clint!" Steve said abruptly, as if he'd completely forgotten his teammate's presence.

Clint chuckled at the way Steve looked like a caught-out teenager. He was wet mouthed and dopey looking. Behind him, Estrella bit her bottom lip and dropped her lashes over her eyes. Yeah, those two were gonna have fun on their vacation. A whole lotta fun. Couldn't happen to a better man, Clint thought. The girl looked pretty ecstatic, too.

"I don't mind. It's great. But much more like that and you should move to the med cot in the back," Clint teased them.

"I'm-"

"Ah! Don't you dare!" Estrella poked at Steve sharply.

"extremely not sorry," Steve amended.

"Come on," Estrella said to him.

She got up and tugged at Steve's hand.

"We're not going to the med cot," Steve denied.

"No. I'm going to sit down over there, and you're going to sit next to me so I can show you TripAdvisor," Estrella said.

They needed to calm down. She could feel that if they kissed again anytime soon, they weren't going to want to stop. She already didn't want to stop. She wanted him, but not here. Not with Clint looking on. They had time. They could wait. She told herself these things as she went to the bench seating in the back. She didn't know what the med cot was, but it sounded like something you laid down on.

Steve sat beside her, and she took his phone easily from his hands. He looked stupidly aroused, but also like he wanted to say something. Something important. She touched his lips with her finger, mesmerized now that she knew what they tasted and felt like.

"Later. We can talk later," she told him.

Steve nodded, and looked away to compose himself. She wanted. He wanted to give. It was that simple. But not now. He had to keep his head clear.

"Tripadvisor," Steve said in a tone that was reluctantly business like.

For an hour and a half, they looked through what there was to do around Corpus Christi. A lot of it, he was eager to try. Estrella kept biting her lip and making worried faces. He kissed her cheek to distract her. She was concerned about the cost, he knew. Park admission fees and campsite fees were nothing, if only he could convince her of that.

"This morning has been a lot for you. Are you alright?" Steve asked her when they came to a lull in their internet reading.

"I'm a little tired," she admitted.

"Then lie down. We've got another hour at this speed before we get there. You can nap," he said.

Estrella lay down more because she wanted to touch him, than because she wanted to sleep. She turned her back to the seatback and rested the side of her head on his thigh. After a few minutes of that, she shifted her head because his thigh was hard and her ear hurt. She found a better angle for her head, and Steve's arm rested along her ribs. Between the drone of the jet, her nervousness finally relaxing, and his warmth, she dozed off.

"Clint," Steve said.

"I won't say anything to anybody. I'm happy for you, Steve," he said.

"Thanks," Steve said.

He set his head back against the wall, where he so often rested it when he was beat up, cut, shot, broken, burned and bruised. This time, he wasn't thinking about what he could have done differently or better on a mission, or the next move he had to make to keep the enemy running.

He was thinking about her kiss, and about how he could make things better for her. The thought of too much money made her almost as distressed as takeoff in the quinjet. He wanted to spend some of it and have fun. He'd have to be careful. He'd kissed her to bring her mind away from her concerns and back to the warm, joyful thing they had between them. Then, the kiss had become a reason unto itself.

Steve let himself enjoy the moment.

The rancher South of San Antonio was happy to sell the truck in the listing when he got over being mad. He'd taken off his hat and run, flapping and yelling at the jet when they'd landed, because Jarvis was right and they'd scared a few hundred Angus cattle. No permanent harm was done to the animals, and Steve liked the truck, so they'd loaded their suitcases and his satchel into the backseat of it.

Estrella waved goodbye to Clint, and the cattle were already scattered, so it didn't matter when he took off to head back to New York. They were on their own now. Truly on vacation. She looked out over the vast acres of ranchland at the shapes of familiar sorts of small trees and scrub brush. The ranch house was a low wood and stone structure with barns and agricultural buildings in the back. A feathery-tailed herding dog watched her with a lazy smile.

She didn't know anything about trucks, so she quietly walked around the huge vehicle and listened to Steve and the rancher talk about the features of the nearly ten year old Ford. It was something called a super-duty, and she believed it. The rancher's Texas accent sounded like home to her, and she felt comfortable with Steve as a buffer between her and the man. The rancher looked at her a time or two, but never lingered.

Steve was satisfied with the mileage, the condition of the belts and hoses, and the smooth rumble of the big diesel engine. There was no smoke out the back, and no puddle of oil under where it was parked. He was seeing a lot of modifications to the truck that weren't standard, according to what Ford said it should have. There was good documentation in the glove compartment for everything.

"It was my boy's truck. He loved it like a woman up until they come out with one with a little more towing capacity and better fuel economy. He's up in Austin now and I ain't got no use for it," the rancher said.

He went inside to get the title and his wallet so they could go to the notary's house and complete the sale. Steve and Estrella climbed into the truck. Well, Estrella climbed. Steve just got in. She'd never been in a private vehicle this big. Steve looked good behind the wheel. He looked happy. His hand rested on the six speed shifter as if it was natural to him.
"You know how to drive this?" Estrella asked.

"I can drive most anything, Ma'am," Steve said with a Texas twist to his usual politeness.

Estrella laughed. She loved the little-boy happiness she was seeing on him.

"You need a hat," she said.

"Nah. Ain't got no cattle," Steve denied, still playing with the accent.

The tan and wood tone interior of the truck's cab smelled like armorall, leather, and slightly of cattleman. Steve was looking all around at the controls, knobs, buttons, stereo and air conditioning. He spent a moment studying the four wheel drive system and a few other things she didn't understand the use of.

"I'll lead y'all over there, since you're from outta town," the rancher said across his driveway, and got into his own truck.

"Buckle up," Steve told her.

Estrella would have felt nervous about going somewhere in the rumbly, powerful truck, but her experience in the quinjet this morning had tired the nerves out of her. Instead, she enjoyed riding high and laughing at Steve as he missed a shift or two when they first started driving.

"Oh, I got you figured out now, darlin" he said to the truck.

"Stop it! I can't take you anywhere. Thank goodness we didn't go to Wisconsin or California," she said.

"What's wrong? You don't like how other people talk?" Steve asked with a strong Kentucky backwoods twang.

"I like it fine, but you're going to get in a fight at the gas station if a bunch of guys hear you and think you're making fun of them," she chuckled.

"Yeah. That wouldn't be good," Steve agreed, finally in his own accent, which didn't sound like an accent at all to her.

Steve made an electronic funds transfer to the rancher's bank, and they got the title notarized for the sale. The rancher told them how to get to the department of motor vehicles and they parted ways with a friendly handshake. Steve shook his hand. Estrella stayed in the truck.

It didn't take long to get the temporary plates and pay taxes. Steve called his insurance agent and had proof of insurance faxed over. Then, they were on the road. They found a large truck stop along the highway headed South. Steve filled both fuel tanks with diesel, then they went inside for a brunch of fried chicken and biscuits.

Estrella sat at the worn formica table across from Steve and gawked at all the potbellied truckers and the merchandise available for sale. The sound of 18-wheelers on the interstate outside drew her eye to the wide open plains beyond. The place was sunny and windswept. Desolate in a beautiful way.

"I can't believe we're here," she said over a sip of coke from her Styrofoam cup.

"Me either. I have a truck, Eya! We'll have to get cup holders and phone chargers, and"
"And an air freshener that looks like a tree to hang from the rearview mirror," she finished for him.

"Nah. I like the way it smells," Steve said with a smile.

He looked out the window at his truck parked outside like it was Christmas morning. She was glad he was satisfied with it. She'd had no idea that he would want such a thing.

"You could have bought a regular truck. A new one. Why did you want one so big?" she wondered.

Steve glanced at her, and some of his happiness faded. She was sorry she'd said something to bring him down.

"Because," was all he said, and she didn't ask any more about it. A minute later, he was staring happily at his truck again. Estrella was starting to feel jealous of the truck for his attention, but she understood.

The chicken and biscuits were hot, greasy, and delicious. Steve seemed to relish it, and he got up to get himself more. They went to the bathroom before the drive to Corpus Christi and Steve wanted them to get milkshakes before they left the store. They wandered all around and got phone chargers, chocolate, beef jerky, as well as the milkshakes they'd wanted.

Steve couldn't keep the smile off his face as they approached the truck with their purchases. He noticed what a step up it was for Estrella to get in, so he went to her door first and held her milkshake so she would have both hands to get in. At least there were handles for shorter people to get in.

As Steve walked around the hood to get in his side, Estrella marveled how content she was with him. He was male, and large, but he made her feel safe. She never would go on a crazy trip like this on her own, not dressed in jeans and a shirt that fit, and never out where she would have to talk and some man might hear her. She fingered her butterfly necklace and watched Steve get in the driver's seat with an athleticism that made him look weightless.

He set his milkshake in the slide out cup holders they'd discovered in front of the gear shift. Before he put the key in the ignition, he turned to her.

"I'm glad you're here. It wouldn't be half as fun without you to share it with me," he said.

The low, serious way he was using his voice lately did things to her, but she didn't have long to contemplate it before he kissed her again. He kept it brief, with barely any tongue at all. His tomcat grin as he pulled away left her just as dazed as his kiss. What had gotten into him?

He started the truck and backed out and she sat wondering how repressed and down his job must be keeping him if this energetic, fun young man was who came out when he got away from it all for even less than a day. She hardly recognized him, except for how his obvious Steve-ness wove through the happiness that almost crackled and popped around him. She was hesitant to bring him down again, but she really wanted to know.

"Steve, you're so… out there. Haven't you ever done anything fun before?" she wondered as he merged them onto the Southbound interstate. His shifting was smooth by now, as if he'd been driving the truck for a long time.

He was clearly enjoying the big diesel as he got it up to seventy-five on the highway. Estrella tried not to be antsy about the speed. It was a heavy truck. A lot of mass to accelerate.

"If I've done anything fun, it was always with the knowledge that in the morning, it was back to work. Or back to the sickbed. Or that I had a day of meetings ahead of me. Or muck and blood and misery and battle. There was never enough to eat. I couldn't get warm enough. I never got the girl," he glanced aside at her.

Tears gathered at the corners of her eyes, and she nodded her understanding. She'd had her own kind of misery, too. Hers was nearly always made of fear, grief, and old familiar hunger. Never any pretty things or pleasant interludes, except maybe in a book for as long as she could distract herself. He wanted to be happy. She wanted to be happy, too.

"I'm glad to be here with you," she said.

Steve grinned and paid attention to the road.

The seats in the truck were plush and comfortable. There was even a little button on the door panel that turned on a heater in the seat under her. Miles, cattle, oil wells, barbed wire, and rough wooden fence posts stretched on and on.

She was feeling drowsy from her full belly and the warm seat and the bright sun in her eyes when Steve started slowing the truck down rather abruptly before a highway exit.

"Is something wrong?" she asked.

"No. Look," Steve pointed.

There was a metal sales building on the frontage road. The sign above it said "Truck Stuff!" In the grass beside the building were racks and racks of camper shells that fit on the backs of pickup trucks.

Steve got off the interstate and drove back up along frontage road until he pulled off the asphalt into the gravel parking area in front of the store. He came around to get her door and help her down.

"I don't need help. I like getting up and down," she told him.

Her words might have been rude and ungrateful, except that they were both smiling. Steve nodded, and she followed him inside the metal building.

The place was full of all kinds of metal accessories and tires and rims and things you could put into a tow hitch. The man behind the counter was glad to go out and look at the truck. When they left, Steve had a black rubber bed liner mat in the bottom of the truck bed, and a camper shell installed that exactly matched the color of the truck.

"Eya, find us driving directions to the mall," he said as they were leaving the ranchlands and entering the suburbs of Corpus Christi.

She found the directions and set the phone in the dash cubby where he could see it. They'd slowed down some, and Steve put the windows down. The warm air had the curious scent of cattle, oil field, and salt breeze. Estrella smiled and stuck her face out the window until her hair whipped back and she was gasping for air. It smelled like home. She didn't know she could have missed it, but she did.

Steve smiled at her in a way that he only could when she wasn't looking. The girl did something to him, and he couldn't begin to describe what it was.

"Why are we going to the mall?" she asked when she had to take her head back inside so she could breathe without the wind rushing forcefully up her nose.

"Because if we get a mattress and pillows and sheets for the back of the truck, we can sleep on the beach," Steve said.

He had that new, sort of gleaming sizzle look in his eyes. If they drove out to Padre Island, they could find a secluded spot miles down the beach where nobody would bother them. No Clint. No Jarvis. They could kiss as much as they wanted to. Estrella bit her lip and nodded.
Chapter 36

Note: This is far too long, but tough ta-tas. I was having fun. I wrote most of it with a miserable, stuffy head cold, so I hope it's coherent and makes some kind of sense. I'll try to pick up the pace a bit for future chapters.

Estrella used Steve's phone to get directions to a mattress outlet, a bed and bath store, a sporting goods store, and a grocery store. She could tell he had a very specific plan in mind.

He got a mattress for the back of the truck, and then they were off to the store in the mall which sold all manner of bedroom and bathroom stuff. Steve chose the softest queen size sheets the store had, and Estrella picked light green for the color. As the shopping cart rolled along the aisles, Steve put towels, a mesh laundry tote, and a light summer blanket in with their things.

"You're getting everything!" Estrella said.

He smiled at her defiantly and added two fluffy pillows to the cart. Estrella pushed the cart toward the cashier faster, hoping to get there before he added anything else to the pile. Just to tease her, Steve took a small fan from a shelf and added that, too.

Estrella felt bad that he was spending so much money. She avoided looking at the total purchase price. Steve got out his wallet and swiped his card happily. Out in the hot parking lot, Steve tossed his purchases into the backseat of the truck. They got in the truck to go to the sporting goods store.

"I'm having fun, Eya. I've never been able to do this. To just go out and buy what I want. Pepper tells me which clothes to buy. Jarvis orders most of my food. This is all for me. For us. No Pepper, no Jarvis, no Tony. Do you think you can relax and stop thinking about the money? I want to spend it however I want, with no fussing from you," Steve explained.

He glanced at her in between watching for an opening in traffic to pull out into. Steve was pleased with what he was doing. He seemed to be getting some kind of thrill from setting up his truck as he wanted. There wasn't a hint of concern in him over the expenses, and it wasn't cheap stuff.

Estrella tried to get her mind around the idea of spending money so casually. Growing up, they'd never had much. After she'd left home it had been even worse. Most everything she'd had was donated or scavenged or painstakingly saved up for. That wasn't going to happen here, on vacation.

She'd never been on vacation. The idea would have seemed frivolous, but Steve obviously needed this. He was more thoroughly relaxed and eager to have fun than she'd ever seen him.

Estrella decided to take him at his word and quit thinking about the money.

At the sporting goods store, Steve got an ice chest, a small folding table, and two chairs with cup holders in the arm rests. Estrella smiled instead of frowning when he added a small grill and a set of grill tools. Next, he put two tall bamboo tiki torches and a bottle of torch oil in the cart. He got them two five gallon jerry cans for water and a propane lantern. Some flat, black thing called a solar shower topped off their purchases at the sporting goods store. All of it went into the backseat of the truck.

At the grocery store, Steve pushed the cart around. Estrella put the things he said he wanted in it. If she dared to let her eyes linger over anything, like the avocados, he told her to add those, too. He got charcoal for the grill, steaks, hot dogs, and more food than she thought they'd be able to fit in the truck. On the way out, he got two bags of ice from the store's freezer.

Steve put the cold things on ice in the ice chest. It went in the back of the truck along with the rest of the food. Estrella liked the way the afternoon sun gilded his dark blonde hair into a lighter shade while he moved around.

Steve looked up from loading groceries and caught her staring, but he only grinned at her and kept moving. His grin acknowledged her attention and told her he liked it. A shiver of nerves wiggled down her spine. She wondered why they were suddenly alright with staring at each other. There was a sort of promise, an excitement, in his acceptance of her attraction. He wasn't just putting up with it with stoic tolerance, like he did when other women fawned over him.

They followed the signs to Padre Island. Steve abruptly changed course. He looked in the rearview to make sure traffic allowed the sudden move.

"What?" Estrella asked him.

"I don't have a swimsuit," Steve said.

He pointed to one of the many beach shops that enticed tourists with end of season sales and brightly colored beach towels on display. Their surroundings were so different from New York that Estrella had a momentary sense of mental displacement. Had she been in Tony Stark's tower just this morning? Everything around them was radically different. There were seagulls cruising the parking lot for tidbits instead of the city's habitual pigeons. The trees that fluttered in the breeze were tropical palms, and the smell of coconut sunscreen wafted from somewhere.

Steve couldn't seem to keep a faint smile off his face as he looked around. People were wearing shorts and summer shirts and flip-flops in defiance of the fact that the grocery stores were offering merchandise for Halloween. The local Western wear made Steve look new and embarrassingly urban. Men's boots around here were scuffed and muddy, mostly with stretched leather and worn soles. Men's jeans were dark and sometimes stained at the thighs from work, but otherwise in good repair. No self-respecting working man wore factory-ripped jeans.

Some beachy music was playing in the store. His eyes lighted on racks of seashell souvenirs, rubber flip flops, buckets and shovels for little kids, and lots and lots of swimwear. The walls up high were hung with colorful surfboards and inflatable floaties and rafts. A young woman behind the counter smiled and waved at them, but didn't otherwise interfere.

"I don't know what to get, Eya. Could you pick for me?" he asked.

She nodded and they wandered over among the men's swimwear. She teased him by choosing a bright red and yellow hibiscus pair of board shorts. His eyes widened on sight of it and she laughed. She put it back in the rack and flipped through more selections.

Estrella sent him into the changing room with a plain deep burgundy pair of board shorts, a navy blue pair with ghostly shark shapes in the print, and a white and blue pair with solid color panels going down the outsides of the legs. The geometric pattern of blue green lines over the back and front was dignified enough.

"I have to try these on? If they're large, they should fit," Steve complained as she guided him to the fitting rooms.

"Yes, I need to see how they look. Keep your underwear on under them, and show them to me when you have them on," Estrella insisted.

Steve made a face, but he was still overall happy, so she didn't let up on her insistence on seeing him in the shorts. The girl from behind the desk came over to stand with Estrella.

"It's 'buy two get one free' right now. I'll get a few more for him to try," she said.

"Okay," Estrella agreed.

Something heavy clunked in the fitting room and Steve grumbled about something. Estrella smiled. He never was one for trying on clothes. The salesgirl was back with three more pairs of shorts when Steve opened the fitting room door.

"You have to take your shirt off if I'm going to be able to tell how they'll look," Estrella complained.

Steve looked a little silly with his Western shirt on over the burgundy colored shorts. Steve glanced at the sales girl and took off his shirt and the undershirt. Estrella's eyes bugged a little when she saw a deadly looking black handgun and holster before his shirts dropped to cover them. The salesgirl thought nothing of him being armed. It was Texas, after all.

The girl's eyes roamed over Steve, and he appreciated that she at least tried to look cool and detached.

"Turn around," the salesgirl said, and Estrella nodded agreement with her.

Steve sighed and turned.

Estrella shook her head.

"No. Those make you look like an old man," Estrella said.

The salesgirl made a face that told him both women thought the shorts weren't right for him. He took the three swimsuits the girl offered and shut himself into the fitting room again.

"Is he a model? Or an actor? He's so hot," the salesgirl whispered to Estrella.

"But they usually have tattoos," the girl whispered.

Estrella didn't bother to tell her that Steve could hear everything she whispered.

She shrugged at the girl and waited for Steve to come out with the next pair. Everyone but Steve liked the white and blue pair.

"It's too low," he complained.

He tugged as if he could get the waistband up from its spot resting just at his hip bones. Estrella very much appreciated the hint of dark golden hairs that showed under his tight navel. She grinned at him and twirled her finger around. His backside looked sublime in the shorts.

"No. It's just right. You have to get that one. It's only going to be me and you," Estrella told him.

"I want to go to the waterpark, and I'm not going in this. There'll be kids there, Eya!" Steve reasoned.
"Okay, so you get another pair that isn't so low. I like those for the beach," she told him.

The salesgirl nodded.

Steve grumbled again and shut himself in the fitting room.

"Lavender? I'm not wearing that," he said, and they heard him moving plastic hangers around.

The salesgirl lightly punched Estrella on the shoulder then bit at her knuckle.

"Girl, you are one lucky bitch!" she hissed with a twinkle in her eyes.

The fitting room door ripped open and Steve strode out only in his boxer briefs. He towered over the salesgirl and gave her his most dour Captain's frown.

"Steve! It's okay. She's just being friendly. Go change," Estrella said.

She nudged aside the speechless girl and used both hands to push at him. He resisted moving.

"That didn't sound very friendly. I don't like anyone calling you that," he said.

"I'm sorry. I didn't mean anything by it," the girl said in a hurry.

"Go! I don't want to be here all day. I want to get to the beach," Estrella urged him.

Steve went back into the fitting room.

"He's a little old fashioned. Don't worry about it," Estrella told her.

"I'm sorry," the girl said, but she didn't go away.

Steve came out in a gray pair of shorts that had both women shaking their heads. He paused and looked at the salesgirl before he went back in to try something else.

"I apologize, Ma'am. I guess I'm still not used to how young people talk," he told the girl sincerely.

Her eyes widened, and she only nodded after Steve went to try the next pair.

"Are you shitting me? Is that Captain America?" the girl whispered in a hurry.

Estrella didn't know what to answer her.

"I'm on leave. I'd appreciate it if you didn't tell everyone," Steve said from inside the fitting room.

Estrella watched in dismay as the girl hopped around in a circle with her hand over her mouth. She reached for her back pocket and quickly thumbed the unlock code on her phone.

"No, no. Don't take any pictures. Please, just leave him alone," Estrella pleaded.

The salesgirl looked at Estrella and her shoulders fell in defeat. She put her phone back in her pocket.

"Thank you," Estrella told her.

Steve showed them how the orange pair looked. It had ivory side panels and dark brown trim. It looked good on him without being overtly sexy, though Steve in only a pair of shorts was difficult to see as anything except appealing.
"That's your pair for the water park," Estrella said.

"Good. That makes two. While I get dressed, go find yourself a swimsuit," Steve told her.

"But-" Estrella protested.

"You heard the lady. Its buy two get one free. Go get something you like," Steve said in a way that sounded like an order.

Estrella looked to the salesgirl.

"Come on. You're really cute. You could wear almost anything," she said.

Steve stayed out of the way while the girl convinced Estrella to get a two-piece swimsuit. He didn't demand to see the swimsuits she tried on, and she was glad, because she didn't think she'd be able to model them for him. Steve looked around at the surf boards on the wall while Estrella deliberated between the sporty purple and lime green suit, or the white one with pastel flowers.

"You have to get that one," the girl said.

The white suit covered her private parts adequately, but it felt a little too flirty with the ties at the hips and the pink plastic ring that held the cups together in the front. Only for a little while would she be able to wear a bikini like this. Estrella decided to get it. Steve was uncomfortable with one of his swimsuits, so she could be daring, too.

Steve had a surf board under his arm when she went to meet him. It was broad and short. His look said that he dared her to tease him. She smiled and chuckled. She was eager to watch him try the board. If his quick talent at dancing was any indication, he would be good with a surfboard, too.

Her eyes roved over the nearby display of flip flops.

"Get some," Steve insisted.

Estrella bit her lip, but she went to look.

She chose a plain brown pair with tiny multi colored glass beads across the straps.

Her feet looked pale and her toenails were bare. She wished for a bottle of nail polish, but didn't look around for any, lest Steve see and insist on getting her some. Before they could get to the cash register, Steve grabbed two beach towels and a bright green inflatable floatie.

This time, both of them ignored the sales total at the register. The girl kept looking at Steve with starry eyes, but she kept her phone in her pocket.

"Thanks," Steve said to her, and she nodded.

The surfboard and the rest of their purchases went into the backseat, but Estrella wore her new flops. It felt good to have the breeze on her toes and ankles.

"Ready for the beach?" Steve asked her as he started the truck.

Estrella smiled and nodded, but she was still looking down at her new footwear. If Steve had known a simple pair of cheap shoes would please her so much, he'd have found her some sooner.

Getting to Padre Island wasn't like going to Rockaway. There were beach houses, but they weren't so upscale. Their stilts were open underneath, and people had boats and ATVs, cars and barbecue grills under the houses. Interspersed among the tall houses were gas stations and bait shops, a fire department, and a school built up high. A shop sold colorful kites, and Steve was tempted to stop there, but Estrella looked eager to get to the beach.

The windows were down, and there was only the smell of salt air, now. No more scent of cattle or oil field. Steve paid the entry fee into Padre Island National Seashore and hung the fee tag on his rearview mirror as instructed. They stopped at the visitor center and learned about camping on the beach. Steve paid another fee and got a sticker for the truck window. The visitor center was busy, and no one paid much attention to looking at his face. He was glad of that.

They used the bathrooms, and Steve got the jerry cans and solar shower from the truck to fill them with fresh drinking water. Estrella noted that the public showers attached to the women's bathroom facilities were clean enough that she wouldn't mind using them.

"Eya?" Steve called from outside.

She hurried to join him and they went to the truck. Estrella offered to carry one of the water totes, but Steve gave her a look that said 'really?' Right. They probably felt like feathers to him. They got into the truck again, and Estrella found that she was quickly getting used to climbing up. She knew just where to put her hands and feet to almost bounce onto the seat.

It was midafternoon on a Saturday, and the beach near the visitor center was crowded. All kinds of people from teenagers with loud music, to couples and families, to old folks with their small grandchildren were out enjoying the warm air and sunshine. The speed limit was slow here, and the beach was busy. There was space for people to park, and two lanes of traffic on the sand, and then about a hundred feet of beach before the bright glinting waves crashed ashore.

Estrella unbuckled and scooted over toward the sunny driver's window until she was pressed up against Steve's leg. He smiled at her and put his arm along the seatback to make room for her to lean closer to the window. There was a parade of mostly trucks going up and down the beach, and Estrella enjoyed seeing all the festive people. Steve liked the way the wind blew her hair and how she squinted her eyes in the sun. And he liked how she braced her hands on his thigh so she could lean closer to the sights.

A pickup truck full of Hispanic teens went by. They were bouncing in the back and singing along with the music that blared from the truck windows. Estrella smiled and turned on the radio in their truck. There were several stations that played Latino music, and she picked the one that sounded happiest.

Steve grinned and kept driving. He wanted to put his arm around her, but he didn't. Things felt cheery and light and he didn't want to do anything to make her think too hard about how familiar they were getting. It was enough that she was leaning on him so easily.

After a half hour and five miles at slow speed, traffic thinned and the speed limit went up to thirty. There was a sign that warned people to only proceed if they had a four wheel drive vehicle.

"Tell me when you see a camping spot you like," Steve told her.

"Okay, but not yet. It's still too crowded. Keep going until we don't see anyone close," she said.

"How long is the beach?" he asked.

"Sixty miles, I think."

Steve engaged the four wheel drive on the truck.
It was a while before they found a spot where the closest vehicles to them were tiny specks in the distance.

"Here," Estrella said.

Steve turned the truck where the sand was still firm and nosed them up toward the dunes, where the sand was softer. The traction under the truck felt fine, so he parked.

Estrella squealed a happy sound and kissed him on the cheek. Steve's smile was so big that her lips caught the edge of his mouth. She was out of the truck too fast for him to kiss her back. Steve helped her unload the folding chairs. He took out his knife and cut the plastic tags from the new chairs.

"We need a bag for trash," he said.

Estrella opened the tailgate and put up the camper hatch. She found the garbage bags among their grocery store purchases and tied one inside the back of the truck. Steve got out the new grill and cut its box open. Estrella was quiet beside him. He looked to see her staring out at the water.

"Can we do the grill later?" she asked.

"Sure," Steve agreed.

"I'm going to go change. I want to swim. The last place I swam was here, and I was twelve!" she told him.

Steve looked down the beach one way, then the other. Both trucks in the distance had chairs and gear set out, and the people were away in the water. The truck with the tent beside it belonged to a young family. The other truck had a camper like his, and there was an older couple out on the waves in an inflatable raft. His enhanced eyes could see plenty details, but he was sure that he and Estrella were no more than specks to the other beach goers.

"Don't look! Stay over there!" Estrella shouted to him.

"I'm staying right here," Steve assured her.

Estrella had both of the passenger side doors open to change between. From the way a beach towel dragged the sand as her feet shifted, he knew she was trying to keep herself covered as she changed into her swimsuit. Her modesty appealed to him in a way that blatant showiness wouldn't have.

Steve dug in the ice chest and got himself a can of beer. He didn't care for cans, but there was no glass allowed on the beach. He took off his shirts while he waited for Estrella. His sidearm and holster slipped under the mattress in the back of the truck. The tailgate made a good seat while he took off his boots and socks. He knocked them together to get most of the sand off, then stowed them at the foot of the bed. Steve took the solar shower bag and laid it in the sun on top of the camper shell.

"I'm ready," Estrella said.

She was wrapped in a big beach towel from armpits to knees, with only her butterfly necklace above that, and two thin white straps over her shoulders. She was practically dancing in her eagerness to go to the water, or was the sand too hot for her feet? The balmy breeze and warm sand felt great to Steve.

"Put on the blue and white swimsuit, not the orange one," she told him.
"You're the boss lady," Steve smiled.

He didn't tell her to stay away, and he didn't hold up a beach towel. Estrella wasn't likely to come looking. Steve frowned at where the shorts wanted to cross his lower abdomen. The mesh liner was supportive, but the weight of his junk tended to tug the waistband even lower. He grimaced and tied the cinch string as snug as he comfortably could. Natasha would have something smart to say if she saw him in this, and Tony probably would too. Steve grabbed his beach towel and went to join Estrella.

She tried not to stare at Steve. In the sun, at the beach, he looked much better in the swimsuit than he had in the store.

"If I hafta wear this, then you don't get to hide behind a towel," he told her with a smirk.

Estrella took off the towel and put it over her shoulder. Steve wasn't as successful at not staring.

"Eya…" he said.

"Don't make me regret getting this suit for you," she said, and she walked off toward the waves.

Steve stood silent and watched her high, tight, round bottom move away from him. As she turned to frown back over her shoulder at him, he shook his head and hurried along to catch up.

"You've seen me without my shirt a lot. Have some mercy, Eya. This is the first time I've seen you like this, and you're really pretty," he said with high color on his cheeks.

"Okay," she agreed, because he was right.

Right now, she was a modest B cup and her ribs were not bony anymore. Her hip bones were still sharp, but that was alright because her thighs were filling out nicely. She could feel his eyes on her, and instead of frowning at him, she stepped to walk closer to him. She put her arm around his waist and leaned her head against him.

"How do you get used to people looking all the time?" she asked.

Steve thought about her question while they got closer to the water.

"At first, it felt very intrusive, like people were touching me. I wanted to make them stop looking, but that's impossible. Eventually I had to tell myself that it was only their eyes. I was used to people looking at me with disgust, when I was small. That made a hard transition, when everybody was looking for other reasons. I hate to admit it, but I was proud, at first. I got a little puffed up about it," he said low and ashamed.

"You're not like that now. What changed?" she asked.

He liked her fingers rubbing at his hip. It was a little thrill, but comforting too. He was thoroughly enjoying the feel of her skin against his side and their legs brushing together. He wanted to stop and revel in her touch, her skin, but he kept his wits for their conversation.

"The war happened. There's no time for pride over there. Nobody was impressed. I had a job to do, so I did it. Then the plane went down. When I woke up in New York, I was too confused to think about how people looked at me. The attention was easy to ignore, with all the modern wonders to get used to. There's work to do now, too. People look, but I have to be focused on my job," he explained.
Estrella nodded. They'd almost reached the water's edge. She dropped her towel on the sand.

"Men look in a different way. It's hard to ignore. It makes my skin crawl," she told him.

"I know," he agreed.

"You know? You can't know!" she denied.

"I do. Men look at me too. Like you said, it's different. Their looking is more…active. If I don't warn them off, they approach me. A few women are like that, but it's mostly men who feel they have to do more than look," he said.

"Oh. Well, it's still not the same. You're big and strong. Warning looks don't work for me. They try anyway," she said.

Steve's mouth turned down at the corners.

"You don't have to put up with that," he said.

"That's easy for you to say," she told him.

"You don't. Let Nat teach you a few things," he insisted.

"And what then, when there's twelve of them? Do you think a few lucky punches will stop twelve men? You've never had to fight from a position of weakness," she denied.

"I did, Estrella. I got beat down a lot when I was small. Buck tried to teach me, but…You're right. I wouldn't want you to have to take the beatings I did," Steve said.

His fingers lifted to touch her cheek and her nose, then her lips. It made him feel sick to think of her busted up and bleeding as he'd so often been. A bully getting some fun shots in on a smart mouthed punk like he'd been was completely different than a man wanting sex. Rape.

He pulled her into his chest and hugged her.

"We'll find a way to keep you safe," he said into the top of her hair.

"You can try," Estrella agreed.

She kissed the middle of his chest. It was easy to tell that he was agitated with thoughts of her being assaulted. His heart thumped strong and his hands rubbed the small of her back, almost too hard. Was he trying to soothe her or himself? Maybe both, she decided.

"Don't think about that anymore. I want to swim," she told him.

Steve dropped his towel beside hers. She waded out, and he followed. He was delighted to feel that the water was warm against his skin. He'd braced himself for cool water, but the pleasant surprise was welcome. He hurried past Estrella and turned to lay back against a wave.

It crashed over his shoulders and he laughed. He wiped salty water from his eyes and saw Estrella chuckling at his exuberance. With his back to the waves, he pushed at the sand with his heels to get to deeper water. Estrella took her time. He liked how she delicately turned sideways when the waves came. She let them pass around her and didn't get buffeted so much by the power of the water. Only the biggest breakers pushed her back a few steps. He would have offered her a hand, but she was smiling, enjoying the challenge.
Steve stopped when the water was mid-rib deep on him. Since Estrella had just kissed his chest, he knew where she would be able to stand with her face out of the water. He offered her a little tug to get beside him through the next wave. Her eyes went wide at something behind him and an instant later, Steve found himself tumbling forward. He sputtered and stood up. Estrella came up next to him. She pushed her hair back from her face.

"If we want to get past the breakers, we have to go out deeper," she told him.

Steve tugged her along behind. They paused to hunker down under two more crashing waves, and Steve enjoyed how the force of the water rocked them back, then forward. Estrella was fearless in the water and not much bothered by getting tumbled around. It wasn't until the water was deeper than she could stand that the waves passed them in swells rather than breakers.

Estrella lay back atop the water and relaxed as the swells lifted her. Steve had to tread water because he was too dense to float. He was almost buoyant, but not quite. He admired how Estrella could float with only a little effort.

It was a good workout to keep his head up. Steve was glad because his muscles had been screaming at him for something to do. He reveled in the slight effort. Unlike running or working out on a machine, the moving water worked all of him. The water felt like a gentle push against him, but it was powerful.

His eyes couldn't seem to peel away from the gentle curves of her, and the light golden skin of her trim belly. He was so glad to see that her belly wasn't concave and emaciated anymore. He'd used the word 'pretty' for her earlier, but he thought she was more than that. There was something extraordinary about the way every line of her curved and flowed into the next. As far as he knew, she never spent time in the gym, but her legs were shapely. He wanted to kiss her toes.

She could feel him looking. She didn't know how, but she could. Instead of fussing, she tried to do as he'd said earlier. She thought of him looking at her as something detached from herself. It was just his eyes, not a touch. And she liked his touch, anyway. That thought helped most of all. Since she knew he was looking, she put out an arm toward him. He immediately touched her fingers and pulled her close.

"I can't seem to help it," he murmured.

"Then no complaining when I look at you later," she said lazily.

"That's a deal I'll take," he agreed.

Estrella wrapped her arm around his shoulders. She could feel him treading water, working to stay afloat.

"Don't you float? Everybody floats in saltwater," she said.

"Not me," he denied.

"You'll tire yourself out."

"Nah. It feels great. I need a lot of activity, Eya. I was getting jittery. This is perfect," he told her. His voice didn't sound strained at all.

"You're weird," she said.

"Yeah, but you like me anyway," he said with a smile in his voice.
"Mm-hmm," she agreed.

An abrupt hissing sound startled them both. Estrella jerked upright, and Steve looked for the sound.

"Dolphins," he said in wonder.

Slick gray bodies curved above the water not far from them. He saw at least three. Dark eyes looked at them above the waves, and he imagined they were looking below the water, too.

"What should we do?" Steve asked.

"Nothing. They're probably curious about all your swishing around. They'll go away in a minute," Estrella told him.

Indeed, a few more members of the pod came up to breathe, and then they were gone. Steve was more impressed with Estrella's cool acceptance than he was with the dolphins.

"Does that happen a lot here?" he asked.

"Sometimes. I remember seeing them as a kid. They don't usually come in this close. There must be something about you that caught their attention," she said.

"Or something about you," he challenged her.

"Ew!" she said, and slapped water at him.

"No, really! I saw a YouTube video once where a dolphin was trying to-"

"Steve, shut up! Do you really think that helps me? If Natasha was here, she'd smack you for being stupid again," Estrella grumbled.

"Oh. Sorry," he told her.

"You deserve to apologize for that. Yuck!" she pushed at him.

Steve looked chagrined to have stumbled into such an awkward conversational blunder. He was so cute in his embarrassment that she had to have mercy on him. After all, she didn't think he would have felt free to have said anything like that in front of anyone else.

"Aw, don't feel so bad. I want you to tell me all the embarrassing things. Tell me, what else did you watch on YouTube?" she asked him with glee.

Estrella glided around front of him in the water and hugged their chests together. Just as she'd hoped, her buoyancy helped him to not have to tread water so vigorously. He looked down at how her breasts pressed into his chest and she didn't know if his continued bright cheeks were from what she'd asked him, or from what he was seeing.

"Um, a lot of dirt bike races and crashes, some history documentaries, and…” he hesitated.

"Yes, and?" she prompted him.

"Women's volleyball," Steve said.

"Ooh! You mean beach volleyball, where they wear the little bitty bottoms, don't you?" she asked him.
"Right," Steve said.

She smiled up at him and wiggled.

"What? You're not disgusted with me?" he asked.

"Why would I be disgusted? It's so cute! You could have looked at things so much worse. Unless you're not telling me?" she asked slyly.

"Uh, I did a little of that too, at first. I think Tony or Clint put things on my laptop for me to find," he admitted.

"Captain America looking at porn! It's got to be the great American pastime, right after baseball. No, I bet it makes more money than baseball. You said you only looked at a little, at first. Why'd you stop?" she asked him.

"After the shock wore off, I started noticing how practiced it all was. Some of them look like they'd just as soon be eating a sandwich. Or worse, the ones where the women try so hard to sound like they're having fun, but end up looking like they're in pain and they just want it to be over with," Steve told her.

"You got tired of porn? What man gets tired of porn?" she asked him skeptically.

"This one. Maybe it's because of what I do. I see people in extreme situations all the time, Eya. I can tell when someone really means what they're doing, and when they don't. That's important. I've gone easy on some opponents when I could see that their heart wasn't in it. Those guys, I can drop and they'll stay down even if I didn't hit them very hard. It's easy for someone to find themselves on a path in life that they didn't know would end up where it does. They want out, sometimes. I try to be merciful when I can. So, yeah, I can tell when somebody doesn't really mean something. I can spot a fake without a long scope," he explained.

She gave him a funny little bewildered smile.

"A long scope. It's the optics mounted on top of a sniper rifle," he explained.

"Ya! I'm not stupid. I can figure that out. I'm looking at you funny because it matters to you that the porn stars are having fun," she said.

"Eh. That goes back to the first girl who kissed me. Moira McKennet. I could tell she wasn't into it. Then I found out Buck had paid her to do it. I was so angry that I would have beaten him if I could. I tried. He thought it was hilarious," Steve frowned.

Estrella bit her lip hard to keep from saying something bad about Bucky. The memory was plainly not a good one for Steve.

"I like your kisses," she said softly.

That worked to get the sourness of bad memories off his face. He looked down at her, and she smiled shyly.

"You do, huh?" he asked her.

"Did it look like I was faking it?" she asked him.

"Nuh-uh," Steve murmured.
He looked down at her, and she moved her arms from around his body to up around his neck. He was waiting for her to kiss him. She didn't make him wait long.

They both tasted of salt water. Steve was eager and dove in strongly with his tongue. Estrella made a muffled sound of surprise, then reciprocated by sucking at him a little. He grunted at the primal tug he felt all the way down. Soon as he stopped treading water to hold her, they started to sink. Estrella sputtered and they parted laughing.

She kissed his smile with affectionate little pecks. Her fingers splayed onto his scalp and held him while she rubbed her nose against his, then kissed her way across his cheek to his jaw just beneath his ear. She nibbled at him with her teeth and Steve made a sound that was half laugh and half moan.

"Am I faking it?" she asked him again.

"I don't think so, but maybe we should do that some more so I can be sure," he said low at her ear.

Estrella shivered at his husky, amorous tone. He was letting his beard grow out again, and she wiggled all over when he rasped it against her neck. Ooh! He tried to pretend that he didn't have any game, and maybe sometimes he didn't. But other times…

"The Beard has skills," Estrella giggled, and tucked her head to get away from the exhilarating tickles.

"You like that, huh?" Steve asked.

"Let's go to the beach so we can do more," Estrella said.

Steve thought that was a great idea until he didn't. He could easily picture the two of them on beach towels, Estrella below him and him lavishing her body with kisses, licks and nibbles. He could work his way down until…

"N ngh. No," he said roughly.

"Too much?" she asked sweetly.

Instead of answering, he tucked his face against the side of hers so she couldn't see him. The feel of something hard pressing at her inner thighs let her know exactly how he felt about the idea of going to the beach to really play.

"Stop kicking!" Steve hissed at her.

Estrella went still, though she wanted to rub him and make him feel good. Natasha had told her not to push him too much, and she didn't want to make him unbearably aroused. He didn't like feeling out of control. She never wanted to see a look of regret on him for anything they did together.

Steve struggled to push aside what he wanted. Since she had suggested it, he wanted to please her, but he couldn't. They'd only just kissed for the first time this morning. He didn't want her to think that he'd only brought her along with him to use her. Plus, he had his own motivations for taking things slow.

"Steve."

"Yeah?" he asked, muffled against her hair.
"What are we doing?" she asked him.

He didn't pretend to misunderstand.

"Trying to take it slow," he said.

"Is that what you want to do?" she asked.

"Yes," he said decisively.

"Okay."

She eased away from him. The water felt cool on the parts of her which had been pressed to his skin. She didn't want to part from him completely. To give him space, she drifted around behind him and rested her hand on his shoulder. That way, his front side was free to do what he wanted without her influence.

"You didn't have to go," he said.

"Yes, I do. I want you, Steve. If you want to take this slow, then we need to calm down," she said.

"You want to go fast?" he asked.

"You're the first man I've ever wanted. Before my voice was a problem, I liked a boy. I was too young to know what to do with him. Both of us were shy. Then, men showed me more than I ever wanted to know. I didn't think I'd ever want anyone again. You make it feel clean, like it's alright for me to want this. Sometimes I feel like I have to take it quick, before I wake up from this dream I've been living in," she tried to explain.

Steve didn't say anything, but he grasped her hand from his shoulder and kissed her fingers. He knew perfectly well what she felt. He'd cursed and roiled against time as the ice was chilling his mind and body into numbness. Much as he didn't want to wait too long again, he also didn't want to rush ahead and cheapen what he felt they could have.

"Come on," he said.

Steve pulled her until she was on his back again, with her arms and legs wrapped around like the last piggy back ride he'd given her. He swam strongly toward shore. They'd drifted South from where the truck was parked, but it wasn't too far. An easy walk would get them back to their beach towels.

Estrella didn't question him. He seemed calmer now, not like he was taking her to the beach to do naughty things. If he wanted that, it's not like she would stop him, anyway.

He didn't let her down until they were back at their towels. He bent over with her still on his back and straightened her towel for her, then he reached around behind and set her on it so that her feet didn't get sandy.

Steve pulled his towel close enough so that he could sit beside her.

They looked at their fingers and toes. They were plenty wrinkled. Of course, she was more wrinkled than he was. She watched in fascination as the paleness and wrinkles of his fingertips colored and smoothed out to normal.

"I hate you," she shoved at him playfully.
"Let me see your hand," he said.

She showed him her scuffed palm. It was completely healed now, with not even a hint she'd ever been injured.

"Heh. Hate yourself," he replied.

"Yeah, well my fingers aren't unwrinkling like yours just did," she complained.

Steve smiled and stared out over the water. It felt like they were completely alone on the beach. If he didn't look to the distance on either side, they were. She was right next to him, and she'd said plainly that she wanted him. He tensed his arms around his raised knees until the urge to touch her passed. He needed to be honest with her. It had felt crummy to manipulate Dana and Catherine into doing what he wanted. He couldn't do that to Estrella.

"Eya, I want you too. We can have some fun. I like being close to you. It feels better than anything. But you've got to know that I won't make love with you. Not if I think there's any chance of you running off someday. We can enjoy each other, but only so much. You say you want me, but do you want all of me? Or do you just want to play for a while?" he asked.

"All of you?" she wondered.

This sounded important, like she should be sure exactly what he meant. There was no teasing on his face. He'd toned down his sexiness somehow until she saw only the friend she'd first met on their bench outside the coffee shop.

Steve let his closer leg slide out straight onto the sand. He took her hand and guided it down low on his shorts until his fingers curved hers around the weight and softness of his testicles.

"All of me. Everything I can give you. Nothing held back," he explained.

He watched her pupils dilate at the intimacy of the gesture. It was very forward of him, but he needed her to understand without a lot of awkward words getting in the way. He knew she'd get it. They'd always been able to communicate, even before she could talk to him.

Estrella cupped him briefly before withdrawing her hand. Only Steve could make such a thing sweet and sincere, but so heavy with meaning. Her urge was to lie down for him, here and now. Her body instinctively wanted what he was offering. Yes!, it keened at her. Her mind was much more cautious.

"You want babies with me?" she asked.

"It's a little early for that, but if we stay together, someday I do. I want everything, for the rest of my days. I can't have that if you're going to run. I won't take the chance. I'm sorry," he told her.

"Don't be sorry. At least you're honest. If it's what you want, then it's what you want. Natasha said the thing with the prostitutes was still messing with your head," she said.

"Fuck Natasha! Maybe screwing up with the hookers clarified a few things for me, alright? Life's too short to hurry around with anymore meaningless relationships," Steve said.

He got up from beside her and paced away, then back again. His anger had his body tensed. He was glorious to behold, clothed in so little, but she didn't let herself get distracted. She got up too, and stood in his space when he paced back her way. There were things she had to know about him.
"Did you? Ever fuck Natasha?" she asked him.

Weeks of jealousy made her voice sharp. Those two were so attuned to each other. They could have easily agreed to lie to her. The woman was like that. She could have had her fun with him, and then tried to set Steve up with her when she sensed he wanted something more permanent. Natasha would never tolerate permanence with a man.

"No!" Steve denied.

"But you wanted to. You want to. Don't you lie to me!" Estrella pushed at him, shoving at his chest.

"Yes! Who doesn't want Natasha? I dreamed about her once, and I got off on it, okay? Is that what you want to hear? But you know what? I could have her. Like that," he snapped his fingers sharply, "and why haven't I?"

"I don't know," Estrella said with a small voice. She wasn't accustomed to so much blatant honesty. It was painful to hear.

"Because she's too damaged to have much heart anymore. It would only be a quick, hot fuck. Are you too damaged, Estrella? Is that all you're good for?" he practically shouted in her face.

She slapped him. Hard. She immediately knew that she shouldn't have. She'd prodded at him for the truth, and he'd let her have it undiluted. She looked up at him, waiting for the impact of his fist. From the way his veins were prominent, she knew he was angry.

Steve carefully picked up the hand she'd slapped him with. He brought it to his mouth and kissed her palm softly. Then, he moved her hand and kissed her fingers and her thumb, too.

"Is that all we're good for? A quick fuck? Fun while it lasts?" he asked her with heavy sadness.

"I don't know," she said.

It was difficult to admit to him. He might never let her close again, if she admitted her fears. Maybe she was as damaged as Natasha. Steve was courageous. His courage challenged her. She had to be as honest with him as he'd been with her.

"I don't know, Steve. I want to be with you, but I'm afraid. What if you're having a personal crisis because of what your body is doing right now, and you wake up one morning and discover that you don't want a used girl anymore? What if you realize that I'm nothing more than a cheap trick, with my voice and my looks?" she asked.

"And what if the serum fails me and I turn into a sickly little weak guy? What if you get tired of living in fear of all my enemies?" he asked.

Estrella sighed tiredly and stepped forward to rest her forehead on his chest. His hand came up to rub soothingly at the back of her neck.

"Maybe we should make a list?" she suggested dryly.

"Hmph!" he grunted.

She enjoyed the comfort of his skin for a moment longer, then she pulled away.

"Do we have to have all the answers right now? Is it enough to know that I want to be good enough for you? I want to want to stay. I don't ever want to hurt you," she told him, somewhat muffled into his muscles.

"Don't say that you're not good enough for me. I feel the same way, like I'm not good enough for you. So can we agree to cancel that one out? It would make the list a little shorter," Steve said with the slightest hint of humor.

"Okay," she agreed.

"I need to know," he went on more seriously, "Are you saying that you want to try this with me, Estrella? I can back off. We can stay friends, if that's all you think you can have with me. I know my life is crazy. I won't blame you at all if it's more than you want to put up with."

"I think I can take the crazy. My life gets crazy too. If I could ever stay in one place, with one man, it would be you. Maybe I'm using you. You're the only person who's made me feel safe, like I could even consider staying," she admitted.

"It would be my honor and my privilege to keep you safe, if you'll let me," he told her.

"Is that why you brought a gun?" she asked.

"Yes," he said without hesitation.

"Oooh! You stink!" she told him vehemently.

Steve drew away from her sharply and sniffed in the direction of his armpits.

Estrella laughed.

"No, not like that. You smell fine. I can't stay mad at you! I want to, but then you go and make me feel all melty inside. Okay! I want to try with you. If you're stupid enough to take a risk on me, then I'd be even dumber not to try. But the hurt goes both ways! You could have any woman you wanted, Steve. If you decide you want to try for Natasha, or if you want to play around with hookers again, you better tell me, and then we'll be over. If you're keeping me safe, then you keep my heart safe, too," she demanded.

She was surprised when instead of balking at her bitchy demands, Steve lowered himself to his knee on the sand in front of her. She didn't like to see him lower himself, and she would have stepped back to fuss at him, but the look on his face stopped her.

He was happy. Even happier than he'd been about his new truck. His arms came around her waist, and he looked up at her with shining eyes.

"No more other women. You're all I'll ever need," he promised her.

"Hmmph!" she grunted at him in a copy of his earlier skepticism, "Let's be realists, here. You're a man. You'll look. But if you ever think of doing, you have to tell me. I won't share you," she said.

"Jealous?" he asked.

"Yes! If I've ever got babies for you, then I'd better be the only one," she said.

Steve took a moment to kiss her over her heart, and then she tugged him upward. She didn't want to see him on his knees.

He bent to get their beach towels. They snapped the sand out of them with hard flicks, and Steve took her hand. They walked toward the truck.

"Uh, I hate to mention it right now, but I should..." Steve said.

She looked to see his jaw set in determination.

"Go on."

"Remember, it's possible that one of those women could be pregnant. And I have to train with Natasha. She's exciting. She gets under my skin sometimes. But I don't want to be with her," Steve admitted.

"Then we'll take it slow until we know about the women, but I think you're worrying too much. I'll talk to Natasha. She's wanted us together all along. If she can't stop teasing you, then we'll go live somewhere else. Or she can," Estrella said with a firm chin.

Steve smiled at her.

"I like you. You're strong," he said.

She rolled her eyes at the absurdity of Captain America telling skinny little her that she was strong, but he could tell she was pleased. She knew what he meant.

When they got to the truck, Steve used the hose of the solar shower to rinse the sea water from his body and from his shorts as best he could. Estrella watched him and tried not to salivate. He started taking the grill out of its box and assembling it because he knew he wouldn't be able to watch her shower without making her self-conscious.

"Steaks or hot dogs?" he asked her.

"Hot dogs are faster, right?" she asked him.

"I guess so," he said.

Estrella came around from the side of the truck, dripping. Steve averted his eyes, or he was going to want to follow the water down her skin with his tongue. She grabbed her beach towel and flicked sand from it again, then dried herself when she was satisfied the towel wouldn't make her dirty.

Steve lit charcoal in the newly assembled grill. It took longer for the charcoal to get ready than it did to heat the hotdogs. The sun was getting low by the time they served up their food onto paper plates. Estrella added condiments to the toasted buns, and Steve got them each a soda from the ice chest.

They sat to eat, and Steve bowed his head. She waited until he was done and had taken a bite that consumed half of his first hotdog of the five that were on his plate. A bag of chips was open on the folding table between them.

"You can pray in front of me, you know. I won't mock you or think it's weird," she told him.

He looked at her.

"Thanks," he said.

She got the feeling that he wasn't ready to do that in front of her yet. Not out loud. She set it as a milestone to look forward to, if he could ever open up to her like that. She'd seen how Tony sometimes snidely mocked him for his faith. She could imagine Bucky doing it too. Estrella kept her silence on the matter. Things like that showed her that no matter how cozy they got with each other physically, there were still parts of themselves that they held back.

As the sun went down, the breeze became cool. All this time, it had felt like early fall in New York, but only now did the reminder come that late October in South Texas could be chilly at night. Steve noticed her goose bumps. He hurried to put the lid on the grill and close the dampers. Estrella started putting the trash away, and stowing the chips and the rest of the condiments where they belonged.

"I've got this. You can go get ready for bed, if you want. You look cold," he told her.

"Okay," she said.

She was starting to feel sleepy. It had been a very long day. She went around to the front of the truck and closed herself inside. She turned on the cab light so she could see to dig in her suitcase. She took out fresh underwear, a soft sleep shirt, and boxer shorts she had borrowed from Natasha. She laid out her damp swimsuit across the dashboard. Tomorrow's heat would dry it quickly. She wished for the wet wipes they'd bought, but they were in the back with the groceries. After she hurried into her night clothes, she went out around back to get some water to brush her teeth.

Steve got his toothbrush too, and she stood beside him near the dunes while they brushed. In that moment, it felt strangely more like they were siblings. She laughed and shared her cup of water to rinse their mouths clean.

At the back of the truck, Steve held the shower hose so she could rinse her feet free of sand. Then, he towed her feet dry. Suddenly, the 'sibling' feeling passed. There was something about his large hands moving over her feet that felt anything but platonic.

Steve went to the cab to change, and Estrella started dressing the mattress with the new sheets. Halfway through, she looked up to be sure Steve was still busy. The light from the truck cab clearly showed her what he was doing. She faltered and wondered if he'd seen her changing. Had he seen her without her top on? There was little time to ponder the question, if she was going to freshen up. She quickly got a wet wipe and cleansed herself, then stuffed it into the garbage. She embarrassed herself with how slick she was from all the kissing they'd done today.

Steve closed the front of the truck and she heard his keys jingle. She hurried to finish getting the sheets on the bed and the cases on the pillows. She fretted that they should have washed the sheets first, but she'd slept in far worse circumstances. The sheets smelled clean and starchy, only faintly like their plastic packaging.

She smiled nervously at Steve as he joined her in the back. He rinsed his feet and dried them, then he closed the tailgate and the camper hatch. He slid open the side windows to let the breeze in through the screens. The moon was bright enough that he didn't need to light the lantern to see.

"I can tell you're nervous, Eya. I can sleep in the cab if it would make you feel better," he offered.

"No. I want you here. With me," she said.

"Only if you're sure. I don't know what I was thinking. It's really brassy of me to expect you to bunk with me," he told her.

"It's fine. Just lie down. We did this before in New York," she reminded him.

"Alright, but I'll go anytime you tell me to," he said.
"Steve," she said with exasperation, and she flopped the sheet and blanket back for him.

He slid into their nest, but kept a little distance from her. At least the queen mattress was wider than the day bed at Tony's beach house. Estrella moved to snuggle closer into his warmth.

"Eya, I'm-

"Oh," she said.

He was hard against her. His hand gripped her shoulder as if he wanted to push her away.

"Are you okay?" she asked him in a small voice.

"I think so. I can't seem to help it. The whole time I was changing, I tried to talk it down, but knowing I was going to be sleeping close to you...It wouldn't quit," he explained.

She giggled, trying to imagine him having a stern talk with his unruly penis.

"You think that's funny, huh?" Steve asked her with humor in his voice.

"I guess so. What do you say to it to try to make it go away?"

"I don't really say anything. My favorite trick lately is to think of German field maneuvers. That's pretty brutal and unsexy, so it helps sometimes," he told her.

"But not tonight?" she asked.

"Not tonight," he agreed.

"You know, I could sleep in the cab. I'd probably fit better," she offered.

"I'll be alright," he assured her.

He set a little distance between their bodies. She frowned in the darkness, and his finger on her lips let her know that he could see her face, even though it was too dark for her to see his.

"How will you be alright? A few days ago, you were so mad with it that you went off to Bucky and got yourself into trouble. What's changed so fast?" she wondered.

Steve sighed. He wouldn't tell her everything, but she was due some kind of explanation.

"It was Thor. He told me a few things. You know how he's all on, all the time? Like he's ready for anything?" Steve said.

"Yes. Standing close to him is crackly, like lightning. He scared me at first, but he's so good, I can't help but trust him," Estrella agreed.

"Exactly. He's a thousand years old, Eya, and he's still young. He's had the same urges and temptations as me, but he told me how to manage it. It's been working for him for a long, long time. I think it'll work for me too, now that I understand," he told her.

"You mean, he just told you something, and boom, that was all it took?" she asked skeptically.

"There's more to it than it sounds. It's not easy. It never could be. I had to wrap my mind around thinking about it differently," Steve said.
"It?" she asked.

"Sex. Power. Responsibility," he said, and that was all he'd tell her of it.

"It sounds like some big secret," Estrella sounded disappointed that she wasn't going to hear more.

"It is," Steve agreed.

She grumbled about men and secrets. He reached out and smoothed a hand down the back of her hair.

"I won't tell you, but I might show you someday, if we can make this work," he promised.

She stopped making noises at him. It was impossible to stay grumpy with him when he spoke sweetly like that, and with such promise.

"So you're alright with kissing, then?" she asked.

"Yeah," Steve said.

Estrella attacked him. She pushed him over onto his back and nearly off the mattress. He laughed, then scooted more toward the center, since she was partly on top of him anyway. He expected her to kiss him, and he steeled himself to let the desire she brought up in him flow through and away without building into something dangerous. But she didn't kiss him.

She perched atop him and looked down at what she could see in the dark. Her eyes were adjusting, like the other night, and she could see better now than she could a few minutes ago. She looked at him, and then her hand caressed his face.

Steve closed his eyes and moaned eagerly for her touch. Her fingernails scratched under his jaw among his beard that was slightly too long to be prickly. She rubbed him all over, enjoying the feel of his face, neck, and scalp. He made a questioning sound when she paused.

"Just because we're kissing now doesn't mean we should stop the other things we like," she told him.

"Tell me what you like, Eya," he said.

"I like your hands on my skin. On my back. On my waist. Your beard felt good on my neck," she whispered.

"Like this?" he asked, and brushed his chin along her collarbone.

She ducked away and squealed. The high, girly sound excited him. Steve pursued her across the mattress until he had her under him and he was scruffling his beard at the nape of her neck. Her necklace got in the way of that, so he opened his teeth on her to lightly nip at the back of her neck.

She was making noises and wiggling under him. When he wanted to dig in and bite her harder, and his hips wanted to snap forward, he realized that he'd gone too far. Steve got off of her and rolled away, panting. She was doing the same on the other side of the mattress.

"Are you alright?" he asked.

"Nnnn," was all she said.

"Sweetheart, I don't know what that means. Can you talk to me?" he asked.
"Don't…don't get over me, maybe?" she asked quietly.

"I'll keep that in mind. Bad memories?" he asked.

"I think so. I didn't know, Steve. I'm sorry. I don't want to lead you on, then push you away," she said.

"No, it's alright. I understand. We all have memories. Triggers. Sometimes we don't know them until it's already happened. Is there any way I can help?" he offered kindly.

"Hold me?" she guessed.

"I don't think so, doll. If you don't want me over you, then I don't need to confine you with my body. Why don't you come over here and hold me instead?" he suggested.

She didn't answer, but he felt her curl up behind him. One of her arms wormed under his neck so that her hand could rest on his chest, and her other arm shoved to make room under his. Her hands met on his chest, and her warm breath feathered against the back of his neck.

"Are you alright now?" he asked her.

"I will be," she said.

She kissed the back of his neck softly.

Steve lay still beyond when she fell asleep. His balls hurt, but his heart hurt more. The worthless fucks who had harmed her in the past weren't done with her yet, at least in her mind. Until he fell asleep, he thought of ways to help her. He was no therapist, but he had a few ideas.
Estrella slept deep and hard. Steve was able to get into the running shorts he’d bought for vacation and lock up the truck without waking her. He made sure her phone was right by her head and he kept his in his hand while he ran.

There was absolutely no one on the beach at this early hour. He’d been counting on that, because he was in only the brief nylon shorts. Never would he wear shorts like this in New York, but he’d loved bare skin on the beach so much before that he’d bought them in anticipation of vacation. He didn’t even want shoes on his feet.

He pushed himself hard, as if he was running a critical mission behind enemy lines. The reason the Southern part of the beach was restricted to four wheel drive vehicles became obvious. Out of the dark loomed half buried snarls of wooden poles and wreckage from past tropical storms. Occasionally there was a tangled wad of massive steel cable or rope which had washed ashore. Several miles down from their campsite, the beach was washed nearly in half by a deep inlet. Steve’s eyes were sharp, but he couldn’t see through water in the dark. He took his chances running through the water. In some places, the sand was high and fluffy enough to make him doubt that his truck would have enough traction to pass.

Steve liked the physical challenge of the nearly hidden obstacles. Being in a novel location with occasional palm trees and the deep dark of no nearby urban centers helped his mind to open up to the things he wanted to think about. Only the wan light of the moon helped him along.

His physical urges weren’t going away simply because Thor had told him how to direct them. On the contrary, his entire body was surging with energy that he tried his best to run off at a punishing pace. The full ache in his groin felt nearly as antsy and demanding as it had the night Buck had dug up all the trouble he could handle. The difference was that Steve wasn’t afraid anymore.

The strength and drive that filled him would find its outlet soon, somehow. He didn’t know how that was going to take care of itself, but he had confidence that he wouldn’t mess up again. Before, he’d been afraid that he’d embarrass himself in some way, like tipping over into orgasm in public from too much stimulation on the dance floor at the restaurant. With the new understanding he’d gained, that was still possible, but he wasn’t ashamed. Tact would be required if he found himself too close to the edge in public, but he wasn’t going to panic. There was an eagerness in him, looking forward to however his tension might find a way to resolve itself. And he wasn’t going to apologize.

He’d been gone a while, so he turned to make miles back toward Estrella and the truck. The morning was cool, probably around sixty degrees. Hard as he was pushing his body to run, he’d have been sweating even if it was freezing. He estimated that he was still four miles from the truck when his phone buzzed in his hand.

Concern that Estrella might need him made him stop and check his phone immediately, but it wasn’t Eya trying to contact him. It was Buck.

Where did ya end up?

Call me, Steve texted in return.

For security reasons, he wanted to hear Buck’s voice before he revealed even his approximate location. Steve walked briskly while he waited for his phone to ring. He would have liked to run more, but he already knew-

“Is everything alright?” he asked as soon as Buck’s call came in.

“Yeah. Are you on the run?” Buck asked with urgency.

“Yeah, on a beach. Relax, Buck. I’m only jogging,” Steve said.

“Bullshit. You’re breathing like when we made that ordinance run to-”

“I know, I know. I did it on purpose. Nothing’s wrong. Being on leave is nice, but I need the PT,” Steve explained.

Buck was silent for a moment on the other end of the call.

“I can’t get a lock on your phone. Where’d ya end up?” he asked.

“It’s good to know the new security protocol is working. We’re near Corpus Christi. At the beach. I think you can figure it out from there without any technology. Why?” Steve asked suspiciously.

Bucky grunted a sound that seemed to combine surprise and disgust.

“And you’ve got the girl with you,” Buck said.

“Her name is Estrella. What’s going on? I can tell you’re on about something.”

Another silence on Buck’s end. Steve shook his head. Buck was up to something. It wasn’t like him to have to stop and think about things. Quick as he was, there was hardly ever a pause in their conversations.

“Maybe I’m surprised you ran off so far. I don’t like you out of reach of backup,” Bucky grumbled.

“Yeah, well I spent months chasing your ass, so it’s your turn to worry. There’s not a war on, Buck. We’ll be fine. Just one girl recognized me so far, and she didn’t take any pictures.”

“Watch your back. I mean it.” Buck said.

“I will. I am. I’ve got my usual gear.”

Bucky grumbled something about a shield, a handgun, and a fancy suit not being adequate gear for the sort of trouble Steve was capable of stirring up. Steve smiled and listened to him bitch about running off to bum-fuck Texas until he ran out of things to say. The fact that Steve didn’t argue let Buck know that he wasn’t changing his mind and that Buck was going to have to put up with it. He eventually changed the subject.

“I quit my job at the construction site. A shifty redhead offered me some contract work,” Buck said dryly.

“Is that right? Do I know this broad?” Steve asked.

He didn’t try to hide the smile in his voice. If it took him going out of town to get Buck tied in with the Avengers, then he was glad.

“You’d better. She’s giving the orders while you’re gone.”

“That’s great, Buck. Are you sure you’re ready for that much entanglement? Once we get you hooked in, you’re always on call.”

“Not this time. It’s cash work. I take what I want, and I can tell em to stuff the jobs I don’t like. I hope the regular boss man honors the deal when he gets back from leave. I hear he’s a real ball buster.”

Steve chuckled.

“He is. He’s not here right now, but I promise I’ll put in a good word for ya when he gets back.”

Steve would swear he could hear Bucky smiling on the other end of the line, if he was a swearing man. He walked toward his truck which he could see in the distance and let the quiet stretch out. His respirations were relaxed into their resting state, and it sounded like Buck was moving a little. Getting ready for the day, maybe.

“Buck, why don’t you feel anything?”

“What kind of question is that? Is this some new-age philosophical crap?”

“Not at all. I want to know what they did to you. You never chase the girls anymore. Sure, you’ve got Kenya, but that’s not like you used to be. Everything we’ve done lately, and you’re not interested,” Steve said.

“It might be something in the hardware. Or my software. Something’s scrambled. It doesn’t matter. For now, I want it this way.”

“Why?” Steve asked evenly.

He could tell that Buck didn’t really know why he was the way he was. The fact that it didn’t seem to matter to him was troubling.

“I need to focus. I’ve got loose ends whipping around. Chasing tail could get me killed. When things settle down, I might take the time to figure it out,” Bucky said.

He didn’t sound concerned about his lack of sexual interest at all.

“What about you? Does the girl need rescuing yet?” Buck asked.

“I’m wound up pretty tight, but Estrella’s in no danger. Thor shared some wisdom from the home world. Before, I was bottled up and pressure was building. Now it’s…hard to describe. I’ll tell you about it sometime,” Steve said.

Just the thought of trying to describe how he felt left him at a loss for words. He hoped Buck didn’t ask for a better explanation.

The familiar sound of metal gently meeting wood reached Steve over the phone. He’d listened to Buck handle a rifle so many times that there was no doubt what he was hearing.

“Are we using you for the same kind of work, Buck? That’s not how I’d have it,” Steve said with low disapproval.

“No. Not the same. I’m cleaning it to pack it away. My new boss is starting me out easy. You don’t worry about it, anyhow. You’re on leave, pal.”

“Sure. That’s easier said than done,” Steve grumbled.
“Look, go do something with your girl and stop thinking about us working schmucks,” Buck said in that tone that indicated that he was about to end the call.

“Estrella,” Steve emphasized.

“I know her name, punk. Just because you think she hung the moon doesn’t mean I gotta get all googly-eyed over her,” Buck teased.

“Heaven forbid,” Steve said as he approached his truck in the morning twilight.

“Keep a sharp eye, Stevie. I mean it,” Buck told him.

“I hear ya. I’m sharp,” Steve agreed.

“Good. See ya.”

“Later.”

It was getting hot. Estrella tried to turn over and throw off the blanket and sheet, but the cozy weight atop her stopped her from turning. The weight shifted. She shoved the covers down, and then she was able to sprawl on her back across the mattress. Her backside, which had started to feel too warm, pressed to sheets cooled by the early morning chill. The weight settled onto her again. The heat of contact began to seep into the skin of her legs, belly, and chest.

She crimped her brow. It felt good, but it was going to make her too hot again soon. She pushed at it half-heartedly where her thighs were pressed down, but it was too heavy. Not blankets.

“Good morning. I wanted to make coffee for you, but we forgot to buy any,” Steve said.

She could feel the vibration of his voice on her chest as he spoke, and his quiet words were at her ear. Steve. Of course it was Steve. As she continued the slow climb to consciousness, one of her hands rubbed at her eyes, and the other fumbled until she found his shoulder to touch.

“I shouldn’t have been in such a hurry with the shopping yesterday, or I would have thought to get makings for coffee. If you want to visit your family today, we can stop somewhere for breakfast and coffee first,” he murmured.

Estrella tried to move her legs again, but then she woke enough to realize that he was lying atop her, gently sharing his heat and some of his weight. Only some of it. She knew he had to be heavier than what she felt against her. Above her. Trapped.

Her eyes opened wide, and she tensed to struggle, but what she saw didn’t match her fears. Steve was lying on her, but he looked lazy and almost bored, as if he’d been there for a while, waiting. His face was propped on one fist, the elbow braced into the mattress at her shoulder, and his other arm was out across her. He held his phone with his free hand while he played a puzzle game with his thumb.

He was huge and he looked strong and naked. Remembrance that even Natasha, skilled as she was, couldn’t evade or defeat him in the training room started to make her nervous. But then he smiled at her kindly and showed her the little starburst graphics on his game screen as he beat the level and earned a new high score.

Estrella’s heart stopped thumping quite so hard and she made an effort to pull her mind away from fears about pain and rape and struggle. If he’d wanted to hurt her, he’d already had plenty of time and ability to do so, she reasoned. From what she could feel against her legs, he wasn’t even hard. Steve regarded her with patient understanding. He didn’t say anything, but it seemed that his expression was gently coaching her past the panic. She cast around in her mind for something normal and appropriate to say.

“That’s a really old game. There’s better ones if you want to get an app. I can show you the one I play,” she said with a faint tremor in her voice.

“Old is good. I like this one,” he said, and started a new game.

She watched him get absorbed in figuring out where to put the numbers with his thumb. It became clear to her that waking up with him on her had been deliberate. He’d seen a way to try to help her, and he’d thought of a strategy to diffuse her fears effectively. Last night in the dark, his aggressive advance and biting at the back of her neck had tripped her over into panic. In the bright light of morning, he’d been sure to wake her gradually and to look uninterested in assaulting her. His dear face and the feel of all his wonderful skin against her lulled her into comfort and calm.

“You’re tricksy,” she said with the beginnings of an affectionate smile.

Steve stopped playing his game and set his phone aside. He settled onto both his elbows and centered himself over her. He was braced high enough that he wasn’t right in her face.

“Tricking you isn’t the plan,” he told her.

“I know. This is good, but I want my toothbrush and I have to pee,” she said.

Steve moved aside and let her up. He looked nearly naked in his gray shorts. Estrella tried not to stare at all the skin and muscle as he rolled onto his side and gave her plenty of room to move. If she didn’t need to pee so badly, she would have snuggled against him without the sheet and blanket in the way.

“See, that’s the plan. Wake the girl. Go get coffee,” Steve told her with a smug little smile.

He watched her slip off the open tailgate and reached for his phone again. Estrella took a few minutes to get fresh and comfortable, then she hopped back up onto the tailgate. He was still there waiting for her. She rinsed her feet free of sand and crawled back onto the mattress with him.

“You want more?” he asked.

Estrella smiled in happy anticipation of enjoying his touch, but when she lay down in front of him, she found herself unable to pull him over onto her as she’d planned to. Too large. Too much skin. Her hand fell from his shoulder and she looked to him. She could feel the disappointment on her face, so surely he could see it. Steve watched her patiently.

“You had a little success, and now you want more. Don’t expect everything to get better at once, Eya. Your eyes are wide and your heart rate is up. That’s enough for now,” he said.

“But it was good, Steve! I was barely afraid. Why am I too scared to do it again?” she asked him.

“Because if I moved over you right now, it would be sudden and you’re aware of it. You felt safe while you were waking up partly because you became aware of my voice and my face before you thought about my body,” he told her.

“But I like your body,” she frowned.

She wanted to feel him over her, but the thought of it…wasn’t good. Imagining him over her now made her feel anxious, like she needed to escape. Steve lying on his side next to her was no problem. It was only having an aggressive male above her that made her panic.

If she couldn’t be with him exactly how she wanted to yet, she could at least enjoy touching him. She glided her hand up his belly and ribs. It was amazing how his muscles contracted under her touch. Beautiful. She wanted to caress his chest too, but that felt like too much for some reason she couldn’t explain. As she rubbed him, she enjoyed the play of muscles under his skin.

“Are you ticklish?” she asked him.

“No. I’m trying not to move. Eya, you should stop. You’re making me…” he faltered.

“Hard?” she asked.

It was easy to see what was happening to him. While she was enjoying how he responded to her touch, one of those responses was that he was about to be too large for his shorts.

“Do you really want me to stop, or are you only trying to be polite?” she asked.

She lightly rubbed at his hard belly, just above the waistband of his shorts. His hips twitched toward her hand. The shiny gray nylon did little to hide the details of his shape. Though she didn’t want him over her, she couldn’t resist smoothing her hand over his erection.

“Feels good,” he breathed more than spoke.

Steve held himself mostly still. If this was how things were going to happen, he wasn’t going to protest. Estrella’s warm hand gliding over him felt tingly, almost electric. If she wanted to do this, he wouldn’t stop her. No apologies, he reminded himself.

“This isn’t too much?” she whispered.

He surged harder, larger under her stroking hand.

“Not enough. Harder,” he told her.

Estrella couldn’t believe he was allowing this. She sat up briefly to look out the windows and down the beach both ways. No one was coming. No one would see. She settled down on her side in front of him and wiggled down so that her feet were in the sun like his. He had his eyes closed, one fist propping his head up, and the other hand loose on the blanket in front of him.

He wanted it harder. This wasn’t merely exploration between them. He was going to let her finish him? She’d never done that before. Not voluntarily. With Steve, she was eager to try.

It felt naughty to grip him through the shorts and slide her hand around him. She was nervous whether he would like it or not, but his deep breath and the slight buck of his hips showed her that it was good. Her eyes skittered over the hard contours of his legs, his body, and his familiar face. She didn’t want to disappoint him, and she only vaguely knew what to do.

“Steve, I don’t know… Show me what you like,” she said.

Uncertainty and a desire to please was in her voice. It wasn’t in his nature to be demanding. Or, it hadn’t been, but she’d asked.

“Like this. Harder. Faster. Let it slide,” he told her.

Steve showed her with his hand over hers briefly. She did her best for a first time, and it wasn’t exactly like he was used to. That was alright. Knowing that it was her and not his own hand added a mental kick that more than made up for any imperfections of sensation. He’d wanted to close his eyes to not make her feel that she was being watched, but he couldn’t. He wanted to see her. Had to see her. He had to know she wanted this. If she felt obligated, it was no good.

He made a sound, low and questioning. Estrella looked up at him. Her eyes were darkened with excitement and she breathed through slightly parted lips. She didn’t look reluctant. She really, truly wanted this. They got lost looking at each other until Steve huffed a tight laugh. Her hand had fallen still.

“Don’t stop,” he urged her.

“Oh!” she said.

She stroked him again how he’d showed her. There were two layers of slick fabric that made movement easy. The shape of him was fascinating and new, something intimate to know about him. Estrella bit her lip and tried to control her breathing. Steve, looking like this, like what she was doing was the only thing in the world for him, was heady. The lewd, meaty task at hand made her want to giggle with nerves and writhe with excitement at the same time. It wasn’t like him to allow this, but things were different now. He trusted her. He needed this. Thoughts of Captain America almost ruined it for her. She nearly laughed, but then Steve throbbed impossibly harder in her hand.

His body tensed and she looked up to his face.

“Don’t stop, don’t stop. Pleeease don’t stop. Eyaaa…” Steve breathed.

His eyes fluttered shut and he locked his body taut and motionless. Wet heat slicked under her hand while she watched the veins stand out on his neck. Color bloomed across his face and chest, and then he relaxed to breathe deeply. He lay bonelessly back against the sidewall of the truck bed.

She wondered what she’d see when she looked, but Steve moved his hand up to displace hers. Whatever mess was made of his shorts, he covered it with his large hand. The gesture looked protective somehow. His other hand fumbled until he got a grip on her wet hand and wiped her mostly dry on the leg of his shorts.

Steve pulled her up the bed to face him with his hand spread in the middle of her back. He looked at her with a slow smile that made her heart clench and her belly clench harder. His strength in moving her was effortless, but his lazy grin was all satisfied boy. She was glad and proud to make him look that way.

“Thanks. That felt great,” he said in a rumble that pushed the meaning of ‘great’ beyond its normal depth.

Estrella bit her lip and nodded. She didn’t know what to say. Instead, she leaned over him and kissed him. Their kiss was nearly chaste, but there was something in the enjoyment of soft lips and sharing the same breath that was anything but bland.

“Daylight’s burning. You want coffee?” he asked.
Estrella belatedly noticed how damp and antsy she was. She could barely lie still. As aroused as she was, she was too shy to do anything about it in front of him. Her body had other needs to focus on, anyway. Coffee sounded wonderful, and her belly gurgled.

“Yeah, and we could find a place for breakfast,” she said.

“Now you’re talkin’. Let’s get moving,” Steve said.

He hugged her to him for a moment, and she enjoyed being close to him. Then, they scrambled to clean up and dress and load their gear into the back of the truck.

She was nervous. Today was a good day to visit her family, if they still lived where they used to, and if they’d kept to the same habits on Sundays.

The waitress in the diner didn’t bat an eye at the large amount of food they ordered, and she kept their coffee mugs filled. Estrella was too addled about the morning’s events and the thought of seeing her aunt, uncle, and cousins again to mind that Steve paid the bill and left the tip.

“We should shop. They won’t be home until after noon. I need clothes. Can we go to a thrift shop? We need to get things for coffee too. Steve! What if they don’t recognize me?” she babbled.

“I’ll be there with you. Whatever happens, we’ll take it. If it goes poorly, we can leave. If it’s good, we can stay for as long as you like. I think they’ll know who you are,” Steve tried to assure her.

“But I’m still so skinny. And I don’t have any hair! What if they don’t live in the same place? It’s been years. They could have-”

“Eya, try to let it happen. Don’t anticipate so much. Be here with me,” Steve told her.

On the beach at Rockaway, she’d used the same phrase on him. When she stopped watching her feet flash in front of her in quick steps, she saw a rascally glint in his eyes. He knew that the desire for fairness was a trait they shared. Life was grossly unfair sometimes, and it felt good to keep things even when they were allowed to. She’d made him comply with her request that night, so she felt compelled to pull her head out of her worries and make herself present in the moment with Steve.

“Okay. I’ll try. Let’s shop. I have to distract myself until noon,” she said.

They drove around town and found a kettle to use over the fire, mugs, good coffee, and a French press. She used her own money at the three thrift shops they found and ended up with five more outfits she liked. Two were nice clothes that would be good for an evening out. Two sets were cute tops and shorts. She was pleased to find jeans and a lady’s Western shirt that would complement Steve’s shirt in the same theme.

She spent some time in a beauty supply store where she bought nail polish and some things for her hair. Steve waited patiently outside, leaned against the front of his ridiculously large truck.

She’d told him to wait in the air conditioned cab, but he refused. He wanted to keep an eye on her and their surroundings. She started to argue, but he got that same look as when she’d asked him if the heavy black gun he concealed was necessary. It was a look she’d hoped he would leave in New York. She didn’t bother arguing anymore.

They had hamburgers and fries at Sonic, followed by ice cream. It was slightly after noon, and she was stalling, hoping to stretch time so that he wouldn’t notice.

Steve took her empty banana split tub and their lunch trash to the trash can, and she knew time was up. He walked back toward her in a long limbed saunter that momentarily distracted her from her nerves about seeing her family. He joined her in the truck and they waited while her hands dithered at her clothes. She looked for spilled food stains or anything out of place, but she was clean and presentable.

“Put their address in navigation. You’ve worried long enough. Let’s get this done,” Steve said gently.

“I don’t remember their address. Turn left out of here, and I’ll tell you how to get there,” she told him.

While Steve drove them and followed her directions to a lower middle class neighborhood, she checked her hair in the mirror behind her visor and smoothed on her new lip gloss. Should she get her ears pierced? Should she have worn makeup?

Her nerves were so bad that she didn’t want to get out of the truck when Steve parked curbside at the house she remembered. Her uncle’s same old truck was parked in the white crushed shell driveway, along with a smaller truck and two more cars.

“They’re here,” she gasped.

She tugged on the hem of her burnt orange top and smoothed her brown skirt over her lap. Her hands touched her butterfly necklace until Steve took her fingers in his.

“Eya. Eya. Look at me,” he said.

“What?” she asked flatly.

Steve gave up trying to reason with her. He unfastened her seatbelt and moved her closer to him across the seat. He kissed her thoroughly. The taste of vanilla ice cream and root beer shared between them along with their own unique scents. Steve’s arms pulled her close and tight. Estrella broke the kiss and giggled.

“You have cherry lip gloss,” she said.

“Mmm,” he hummed and smiled.

Her fingers rubbed around his lips to remove the gloss that they’d smeared out of place. His lips were sinfully kissable all the time. With a hint of clear gloss on them, Estrella didn’t want to stop kissing him. She nudged some space between them and re-applied what he’d taken. As an afterthought, she used a fast food napkin to blot the excess shine from Steve’s lips.

“I’m with you. I’ll watch. If it’s going well, I’ll give you space. If you need me, I’ll be there. Let’s go,” he told her after she was done fixing him to her satisfaction.

They waited for a bunch of kids to rush by on scooters and bicycles, then they got out of the truck.

“Did you spend much time here?” Steve asked as they walked across the side lawn.
“Every Sunday afternoon, and I spent the night when I was little and mami had to work late. My cousins were more like my siblings,” she said as they walked up the shell drive to the door.

Tears were already welling in her eyes at being in such a familiar, dear place. When they got to the front porch and the old ratty palm tree beside it, she and Steve could hear the television and men’s voices inside. Anxiety swam in her belly, but so did hope.

Steve gripped her hand and laced their fingers together. He used his other one to knock firmly on the door. He had time to give her one last reassuring smile, then the door opened. It was almost as if someone had been standing there, waiting.

An incredibly handsome young man stood in the doorway. He was turned away from them, looking back at the television inside. The men in the house yelled and groaned in disappointment. Steve recognized the sounds of a football game. The young man had two twenty dollar bills in his fist. Finally, he turned to look at them. There was a strong family resemblance between him and Estrella.

“Oh… where’s the pizza?” he asked.

He looked behind them to the driveway, obviously confused. Steve wanted to step in and clear up the confusion, but he decided not to get in the way of Estrella’s reunion with her family. They would sort it out.

“Jesse,” Estrella said with wonder.

Jesse first looked at Steve, then he looked down at Estrella. He had that ‘do I know you?’ look on his face, but then it changed.

“Eya!” Jesse smiled, then turned away from the door, “Ma! Fran! Estrella is here!”

Steve smiled as Jesse grabbed Estrella up in a hug and spun her around. There were feminine yells of disbelief from the kitchen, and then two large women hurried toward the door. Steve stepped inside and shut the door as Estrella was engulfed by joyful greetings from her family. Two men watched the ruckus from chairs in the living room. Steve smiled politely and stood patiently by the door. He would wait until Estrella was free to introduce him, or until someone approached him.

He watched closely until he got a glimpse of Estrella’s face among all the hugging. She was crying, but smiling. As long as she looked happy and not afraid, Steve decided to keep his distance.

Jesse disentangled himself from the group hug and turned to Steve.

“I’m Steve,” he said and offered his hand.

Jesse shook it, but he scrutinized Steve in a way that was very nearly unfriendly. Then, he went still and alert, listening. Estrella was speaking tearfully to the women.

“She’s talking and I don’t feel it,” Jesse said.

“Yeah. It’s her necklace. We have some friends who were able to help with that,” Steve explained quietly.

Steve was forgotten again. Jesse looked to the older man in the room, then to the younger one. Both looked on curiously, but unbothered.

“Ma. Eya’s talking and I don’t feel anything,” Jesse said fervently.
“What did you do, niña?” The older woman asked.

She looked around nervously to the men, then back to Estrella.

“It’s this. It fixes my voice,” Estrella explained and touched her copper butterfly.

“You didn’t have surgery or something?” the younger woman asked.

“No. Oh! Everyone, this is Steve. Steve, this is my aunt Rita, that’s Uncle Alberto, and these are my cousins Jesse and Fran. I’m sorry, I don’t know you,” Estrella said to the other young man in the room.

“He’s my husband. Luis,” Fran said.

Luis and Alberto got up and Steve went over to greet them. Luis seemed friendly, but Alberto just stared at him as long as it took to shake his hand, then he went back to watching the ballgame.

Steve noticed two little boys in the opposite doorway of the living room.

“And those are Mateo and Isaac, my boys,” Fran said proudly.

“Oh, Franny! You got married and had babies and I missed it. Let me see,” Estrella said.

Fran called the little boys over and Estrella brushed back their hair with her hands and cooed over them. The older one was a cute kid, but the younger one looked like his grandfather Alberto. Steve noticed that Rita, the aunt, was a strikingly beautiful woman, despite her being quite overweight. Jesse’s looks had clearly come from her, while Fran looked plain, an even mix between her beautiful mother and her rough-looking father.

“Where is Val?” Estrella asked.

“In her room,” Jesse said, and everyone went quiet and looked away from Estrella.

There was another knock at the door, and it was the pizza delivery this time. Steve got out of the way so that Jesse could pay and take the pizzas. He noted that Jesse was the same height as him, but a little slimmer of build.

The women took Estrella away into the room across the hall and the two children ran off somewhere else in the house. Jesse put one pizza box on the coffee table between Alberto and Luis, then he went to bring the women the other one.

Steve went with him.

Estrella looked to Steve and smiled. The women were seated at the large table of a comfortable eat-in kitchen. Jesse set the pizza box among them. Estrella twiddled her fingers to Steve in a happy wave. He read it as her not needing him, and that he should go with the men. He was going to do just that, but Jesse grabbed his sleeve.

Instead of going back to the living room and the football game, Jesse indicated that he should go down the hall. Steve complied and they ended up in what was obviously Jesse’s bedroom. There was a messy bed, muddy work boots, and a guitar on a stand. The room smelled of cologne and dirty socks.

“Why is Eya so skinny? What did you do to her?” Jesse asked in a voice of controlled fury. He spoke plain English, but his Latino accent was stronger than Estrella’s and flavored with a slight Steve was prepared for this. He’d thought about being questioned by her family last night while he was thinking about everything else in her past.

“She was thinner when I met her. She didn’t speak. We became friends, and I eventually learned about her voice. Some associates of mine work in a lab, and they were able to frequency match her voice, then make a device for her to cancel out the effects we feel. She was living alone with no protection, Jesse. She’s smart and she’s strong, but it’s taken months for her to feel safe enough to speak and to eat more,” Steve explained.

Jesse watched him with that ‘I know you from somewhere’ look. He shook it off and focused on their conversation again.

“So her voice is still the same as it was before if she takes off the necklace?” Jesse asked.

Steve nodded. He would have felt disloyal talking about her, but these people already knew her. There was a knock at the door, and then Estrella came in, followed by a worried looking Rita and Fran.

“Steve. My little cousin, Valeria. She’s fourteen and she stays in her room. She hasn’t been to school in a year and a half. Her voice is like mine,” Estrella said.

She looked distressed and expectant. Steve had noticed how everyone had gone quiet and uneasy earlier when Estrella asked where Val was. Anger rolled in him that the child had been suffering in isolation until now, but it was no one’s fault. If it was in his power, and it likely was, he’d see that the girl had what she needed.

Steve nodded to Estrella, then to Rita.

“Ma’am, I’d like to speak with you and your husband,” he said.

It was clear from the change in Steve’s demeanor that he meant something a little more formal and private than a family discussion standing in Jesse’s bedroom.

“Go get your father. If he doesn’t come away from that game, tell him I’ll flip the circuit breaker,” Rita said to Fran.

Fran looked daunted by the task, but she went.

Jesse ushered them all out of his room. Steve met a disgruntled looking Alberto in the dim hallway of the house, and Rita pulled him down the hall and into another bedroom that appeared dusty and unused, probably Fran’s old room, from the feminine look of the decor. Steve and Estrella followed.

Alberto complained to his wife in rapid fire Spanish, and she replied firmly. Steve understood most of it. Rita gestured to Steve and then to Estrella’s necklace, then mentioned their daughter Valeria.

Alberto sat down with Rita on the edge of the guest bed, and Estrella tugged Steve’s hand toward the outdated loveseat. They sat.

“We never thought there was any hope. What can you do for our daughter?” Rita asked.

“You need to understand that I can’t guarantee anything. There’s a good chance we can help, but it’s not certain,” Steve said.
Rita nodded. Alberto squinted skeptically. Steve got the feeling that the man understood English just fine.

“Eya, show them the back of your necklace,” he said.

She took it off and passed it to her aunt. She pointed to the silver soldered to the back of the butterfly.

“That’s the part that controls her voice. It’s possible that we can have something like that made for Valeria. I’ll need to get a recording of her voice to send to the people who made this, so they can customize a necklace for her,” Steve told them.

Alberto frowned at Steve.

“Sir, I know you don’t like the idea of people listening to your daughter. I wouldn’t, either. I’ve heard Estrella’s voice. If I had a daughter with the voice, I’d be concerned, too. My friends are very discreet. Valeria will be in no danger,” Steve assured.

Estrella opened her palm and Rita returned her necklace to her. She put it on quickly.

“I don’t see any reason why it wouldn’t work for Val like it works for me. We can try my necklace on her. Natasha and Bruce made a spare for me. If it works for her, I can give her my spare! Steve, maybe we could help her right now!” Estrella said.

She got more excited as she thought about her spare necklace and the possibility that helping her cousin could be so easy and fast.

“Wait, Eya,” Steve held his hand up and spoke calmly, “They made that specifically for you, with Jarvis’ help. It had to match you exactly. I don’t pretend to understand what they did, but it’s probably more complex than it looks. The chances that a necklace made for you would help your cousin are small.”

“We have to try. It’s in my suitcase in the truck,” Estrella said.

She got up and hurried out of the house. Steve followed her. Buck’s warning to stay sharp lingered in his mind. Estrella had eyes only for the truck, but Steve looked around.

There were lots of people out in the neighborhood for a beautiful Sunday afternoon. Most of them looked harmless, but there were a few young men on the street corner of the next block. Steve met their curious stares casually, then pretended to pay no more attention to them. There were too many places for concealment. Trees, laundry lines hung with clothes, shrubs, toolsheds, and windows. The place was indefensible. He stayed alert until Estrella dug out her spare necklace and hurried back into the house. Steve turned the deadbolt behind them. It felt odd to lock another man’s house, but he did it anyway.

“Where is she?” Estrella asked when she got back to the spare room with Rita.

Alberto had already gone back to watching his ballgame.

Rita got up from where she’d been sitting on the bed. She wiped her eyes. Steve had seen parents of sick children at the hospital he sometimes visited. Rita had that look that was tragically hopeful, but braced for bad news. She led them down to the end of the hall. There was soft music playing behind the door she knocked on. An empty paper plate with spots of pizza grease sat on a little table outside the door.
No one answered the door. Estrella stepped forward and knocked louder.

Rita looked alarmed to see that Steve had followed them to Valeria’s room.

“Ma’am, I can resist Estrella’s voice. I don’t know about the other men in the house, so I’m the safest bet. We’ll need to know if Eya’s spare necklace works for Valeria, and if it doesn’t, I’ll need to call my friends so they can sample her voice. Nothing bad will happen,” he told the woman.

The door opened and a mopey teenage girl stood there. She looked to her mother, then was startled to see Estrella, and plainly frightened to see Steve. She clapped a hand over her mouth and her eyes spoke volumes to her mother.

“Val, this is your cousin Estrella. Do you remember Eya? You were only six,” Rita said.

Valeria continued to hold her hand over her mouth, but she turned smiling eyes to Estrella and nodded. She noticed Estrella’s necklace, but then her eyes went back to Steve.

“This is Steve. He had this necklace made that controls Estrella’s voice. They want to help you,” Rita explained.

“Eya go in with her mother and talk to her. Explain things. I’ll be in the living room. Come get me when you need me. Valeria, it’s nice to meet you,” Steve said.

He moved more into the light spilling from the teenager’s bedroom door so that he wouldn’t seem like a lurking stranger in the dark. He smiled at the girl.

Valeria’s eyes went even wider and she went dead still. Steve knew that look. A quick glance past her into her white and lavender room showed him an Avengers poster on the wall, and one of Captain America.

Steve grinned a little.

A squeak of pressurized sound came out past Valeria’s hand.

“Val! Hush! You know better!” Rita hissed.

She looked to Steve with fear and worry.

“I’m alright, Ma’am,” Steve said, and he was.

The girl definitely had the voice, but it wasn’t as strong as Estrella’s and he was mentally prepared to resist it. Her brief squeak barely made a stir in his mind. Steve nodded to Estrella and retreated down the hall toward the living room.

Valeria leaned farther out of her room to watch Steve walk away. Rita looked at her daughter suspiciously, but then the girl pulled her mother and her cousin into her bedroom and shut the door.

She hugged Estrella hard.

“I missed you! Nobody knew where you were. And then I got this voice, and I worried about you even more. How did you live with it? Eya, where were you?” Valeria whispered.
“I was in New York. Val, there are dangerous people looking for me. Things happened because of my voice. I had to leave. Life was hard, but then I met Steve,” Estrella said.

She glanced to the posters on the wall. Rita sat quiet in the chair in the corner, unaware of what the girls knew about Steve. Valeria hurried to sit on her floor on her fuzzy yellow rug. Estrella sat with her, their knees almost touching.

“Did you meet his friends?” Valeria asked.

She was wiggling, she was so excited.

“Yes. I moved into their building. Tony made this for me. Well, it was Tony and Bruce,” Estrella smiled fondly.

“Stark and Banner?” Valeria whispered so softly that her mother wasn’t likely to overhear.

Estrella nodded.

“Am I dreaming? You live with the Avengers? Steve is Captain America? You’re dating him?” Valeria asked.

Estrella nodded again.

“The fewer people who know, the better. We’re on vacation. If I’d known you had a voice like mine, I would have come months ago. Val, this necklace works. Tony and Bruce can make one for you. It’s not fool proof. You can still make bad mistakes if you take it off to sleep or if you forget that you need it. Do you want me to see if we can make one for you?”

“How much does this cost?” Rita asked from her chair in the corner.

“About three hundred dollars,” Estrella said.

“If it works, then it’s worth it,” the woman said.

“Mami, I want to talk to Eya alone. She must know things. It’s embarrassing,” Val said haltingly.

“Okay, but don’t keep her forever. Her man is waiting in a room full of strangers, and that’s not polite,” Rita said.

She pushed herself up from the chair and left, closing the door behind her.

Val waited a moment, then turned excitedly to Estrella. She hugged her again, and Estrella smiled and hugged her back. She’d never gotten so many hugs!

She looked around her younger cousin’s room. The girl had every teenage luxury she could think of. There was a television, a few different game consoles, two shelves of game cases, a triple book case, a stereo system with an iphone jack, and her décor was teen girl chic with lots of fuzzy, sparkly, colorful items. And the posters. Other than the Avengers and the one of the Captain, there were posters of bands and from her favorite TV shows and movies. There was hardly a bare space in the room.

“Eya! Do you kiss him?” Val asked in an eager whisper.

It was strange to hear another girl speak in careful whispers as she had done, but her question bothered Estrella.
“Sometimes, but we only just started dating. We’ve been friends for a few months. He’s a good man. Val, we can help you with your voice. Don’t you want to talk about that?” Estrella urged her.

“Yeah, I do, but my voice is all the time. I never thought I’d have Captain America in my house! God, doesn’t mom even know? What about Jesse? Why am I the only one who recognizes him?” Val gushed.

“Because you’re a fan girl. He tolerates that kind of behavior, but he doesn’t like it very much. Val, come on. I know he’s amazing, but I need you to act normal around him. He’s just a guy. Don’t make him feel weird,” Estrella told her.

“Just a guy?”

“Yes. He’s tired of all the fighting. The news and the internet make it look exciting, but it’s not much fun for them. He gets hurt. We’re on vacation. He wants to help you, and I know Tony will too, but please don’t fangirl him,” Estrella said with firm older-cousin authority.

Val nodded solemnly. Estrella studied her. She wasn’t as plain looking as Fran, but she wasn’t as gorgeous as Jesse, either. Her appeal was a little above average, at least while she was wearing frumpy sweat pants and an old tee. Some effort might make her pretty. With her voice, it wouldn’t matter. She could have looked exactly like her father, and it wouldn’t make a difference.

“Val, has anything bad happened to you?” Estrella asked gently.

Valeria looked away and shrugged. Her fingers twirled in the yellow polyester fuzz of her rug. The fact that she didn’t want to talk about it told her the answer to her question.

“A lot has happened to me. Bad things that I have nightmares about. I wouldn’t want that for you. If you need help, we can see that you get it. Right now, I’d like to see if my spare necklace fixes your voice,” Estrella told her.

“Okay, thanks,” Val said.

Estrella took the opal necklace that Natasha had given her and threaded the flat metal eye with a white strip of fabric. She leaned forward to tie it around Valeria’s throat.

“What if it doesn’t work? I can’t talk to anyone to test it,” Val whispered.

“You can try it on Steve,” Estrella said.

“But he’s a guy!” Val hissed.

“I know,” Estrella smiled, “Remember who he is. He’s good and he’s strong. He won’t hurt you. I promise. He doesn’t hurt me, and he’s heard my voice several times. I want to bring him in here to see if it works for you.”

Valeria looked anxious and afraid, but she put her chin up and nodded. Estrella would have called Steve right then, but her cousin was only fourteen. She acted fairly mature for her age, but she was still a girl. Sympathy for what she must have gone through, and empathy for how she was going to feel once she got swept up in Avengers drama tempered Estrella’s haste.

“Val, you’re going to have to talk to guys. To men,” she told her.

“I know, but you said to trust him.”
“Sweetie, he won’t hurt you, but he will react. If he gives you any orders or instructions, you need to listen to him,” Estrella said.

“Well, yeah! He’s Captain America. I’d do whatever he says!” Val grinned and wiggled on her carpet with fangirl enthusiasm.

“Valeria! This is serious. If you can’t behave, then we’ll come back some other time. I love him. I don’t want him hurt, and I’ll have to hurt him if you don’t listen to what he says,” Estrella said sternly.

“You can hurt him?” Valeria whispered in awe.

“Yes, with my voice. But it’s sad and I don’t want to do it,” Estrella said.

“I’ll do what he says,” Val agreed.

Estrella pulled out her phone and texted Steve.

In a moment, he and Rita came to the door. Val’s mother sat in the chair, but Steve was hesitant to enter. Val waved to him cheerfully, then motioned for him to come in.

“Did you explain everything to her?” Steve asked.

“As much as I needed to. She’s agreed to test the spare. If that doesn’t work, will you talk to Tony?” Estrella asked her cousin.

Val nodded.

“Are you sure this is safe?” Rita asked.

She looked skeptical.

“I’ll be fine, Ma’am,” Steve assured.

Rita got up and made sure the bedroom door was closed and locked. Steve walked to the night stand where Valeria’s phone was and turned off her music.

“Whenever you’re ready, Valeria,” he said.

“No. Wait,” Estrella insisted.

She got up from the floor and went to Steve.

He was wearing dark jeans, his leather boots, and his dark green Henley shirt that she liked so much on him. Estrella pulled the shirt longer from where it was bunched at his hips. Once he was better covered at the groin, she gestured to the bed so that he wouldn’t be standing facing the teenage girl. Steve understood and sat on the bedside. He thought it was inappropriate for him to sit on Val’s bed, but Rita was in the only chair, and this was better than standing.

“Okay. Val, you don’t go to school. Do you take classes online? Tell me what you do to study,” Estrella asked to give the girl something to say.

Val glanced nervously at Steve, then at her Captain America poster. She took a breath for courage, then she spoke.

“Ma looks up what I should be learning on the school board website, and we get the text books—”
“Stop,” Steve said between clenched teeth.

Val’s voice sounded normal to the women, but it was clearly doing something to him. His expression looked pained, and his hands clasped either side of his head above his ears.

“What’s happening?” Estrella asked.

“Resonance. The necklace sort of works, but it’s wrong. A little like nails on a chalkboard, but inside my head. Take it off and we’ll get a baseline,” Steve said.

He waited for the discordant, unpleasant tones of Valeria’s incorrectly moderated voice to fade from his mind. It wasn’t exactly painful, but it made him faintly queasy and it set his teeth on edge. Any arousal the girl caused was doused by the freakish harmonics. The spare necklace wouldn’t do to help her.

Estrella untied the opal necklace from Val’s throat.

Valeria looked worried until Steve took his hands from his head and stopped clenching his jaw. He took a deep, calming breath and smiled reassuringly at the girl.

“I’m fine. Let’s try again, with just your voice, to make sure it’s the necklace that’s wrong,” he told her.

“Val, tell me how your school was with you quitting. Was there any trouble?” Estrella asked, again providing something for her to say.

Rita shook her head. She was afraid for Valeria to speak in front of a man.

“I have to do this, Ma,” she said, then looked to watch Steve as she continued, “Home schooling is easy in Texas. We submitted a form to the county and I take a test at the end of the school year.”

Everyone waited to hear from Steve. He cleared his throat and leaned to sit forward with his elbows on his knees.

“Your voice is much more pleasant when you’re not wearing the wrong necklace. Eya, would you switch necklaces so we can be sure the spare isn’t defective?” he asked.

Steve carefully composed himself. He wasn’t lying to the girl. Her voice was nice. It affected him, but not as intensely as did Estrella’s. He was uncomfortable responding to an underage kid, but this was business. It was nothing personal. He could forgive himself because they were here with the purpose of helping the girl.

The spare necklace worked fine on Estrella.

Steve took out his phone. Jarvis answered immediately.

“How may I assist you, Captain? Is everything well?”

“We’re fine, J. I’ve got a project for Tony and Bruce. We’re visiting Estrella’s family. Her younger cousin, Valeria, has the same voice effect. We’ve tried Eya’s spare necklace, but it’s not made for her. Put Tony on, and Bruce if he’s available. Will you record for us?”

“Doctor Banner is asleep, but Sir is available. I will be happy to assist,” Jarvis said.

Rita, Valeria, and Estrella watched him talk on the phone. Steve disliked speaking without including them. It was rude, but necessary.
"Hey, Spangles. How’s the downtime?"

"Fun so far. Did Jarvis explain anything?" Steve asked.

"You’ve got another pixie vixen. This is a family thing. There’s got to be a history of it. Grandparents. Great grandparents. I’d love to put Bruce on that genome. Can you get us some blood? If that’s too creepy, then saliva would do,"

"One thing at a time, Tony. She’s fourteen, and her mom’s here. I’m putting you on speaker."

"Understood, Cap,” Tony’s voice said to the room from Steve’s phone.

Steve winced slightly, but Rita didn’t seem to notice. She was too concerned for her child.

He sounded busy and distracted.

"I’m here, Tony. Pay attention. This is important,” Estrella said.

"Everything I do is important. I’m not distracted. You’re ungrateful, you know that? I’m setting up to record from your little tiny phone mic. Phone mic! I make a good phone, but it’s not ideal for this application. Jarvis, can we do this? It would be so much easier if you’d fly the kid in,” he said.

"I believe I will be able to manage, Sir.”

"Fine. Kid, you got a name?"

"Mister Stark?” Valeria said in amazement.

"That’s me when I’m feeling really, really old. Every other day when kids don’t insist on calling me that, I’m Tony. Come on, you gotta give me more to work with. What’s your favorite color? Gimme a name. I like to know who I’m making things for.”

"Um.. My favorite color is indigo. My name is Valeria Therez Robles-Castillo. Did I say enough?” Val said in a nervous hurry.

"Is Spangles squirming? Sing an aria,” Tony said.

"Stark. Now is not the time," Steve growled at him.

"Heh. Yeah, you said enough, kid. Nice name by the way, Mom. My lab partner isn’t here, but we’ll get on this sometime today. It should only be a few hours. I can send Point Break with it express mail. Where are you, anyway? Jarvis is being stingy with the details.”

"I, go ahead and transmit a location on us. High encryption. Tony, if Point Break brings it, I want Banner and Barnes alert and ready to step in. You’ll be too many men down if something happens while he’s away,” Steve instructed.

"Location captured, and I have reset the location privacy on your phone. I will retain the information personally until Mister Odinsson is in transit.”

"Jarvis, you’re a dirty rat. The plague kind,” Tony said, but Steve could hear the humor in his tone.

Tony was already working on it. Steve could hear the clunk of his coffee mug and the wheels on his chair as he stood up and kicked the chair away. Valeria’s voice was a puzzle to him, and Tony was dragging the new digital overlay onto the previous records of their work for Estrella.

“Tony. Thank you.” Steve said sincerely.

“Yeah, thanks Mister Stark!”

“Geez, kid, don’t yell! It’s no problem. We’ll get you fixed up,” Tony said, and then the call went dead.

Steve put away his phone.

“That’s all there is? With a phone call, my daughter’s voice can be fixed?” Rita asked.

“Yes, Ma’am. A phone call to the right people,” Steve said.

“I could have it today? Who is Mister Stark sending? I don’t know who Point Break is. Is it one of you?” Valeria asked Steve.

“Val, that’s enough,” Estrella said quietly.

Steve was unnaturally still and his face looked a lot more like the one in the poster on the wall. Estrella could tell that he was exerting some effort, at least mentally.

“Sorry,” she whispered, “I forgot.”

“And that’s why you have to be careful. If you have a necklace like mine, it’s easy to forget to put it on. Aunt Rita, she could still get hurt. You need to practice with her so she won’t take it for granted when she gets used to talking again,” Estrella said.

“I’m gonna go,” Steve said.

Estrella didn’t know whether to be angry with him or proud when he stood and walked out of the room without trying to hide what her cousin’s voice had done to him. She looked apologetically to Val and Rita, then hurried after Steve.

Steve found the back door of the house and went into the fenced back yard. He knew Estrella was behind him. There was a trampoline out on the grass, and Steve leaned his hip against its edge.

“Thank you for helping. Are you okay?” Estrella asked him.

She slipped her arms around him, but didn’t stand too close. She understood that he might be feeling weird about Val’s voice.

“I’m fine. It’s good that we came. I hate that she’s been in her room for so long. Did you hear what Tony said about family history?” he asked.

Estrella thought about her family for a moment. Was there anyone who could have been a source for her and Valeria’s strange voice?

“My great grandfather!” Estrella exclaimed.
For reasons Steve couldn’t understand, Estrella hugged him tighter and cried on his shirt. He rubbed her back and waited for her to talk if she felt like it. It took her several minutes to work through her thoughts and feelings before she spoke.

“He was old by the time I met him, nearly a hundred. He was like Jesse when he was young. I saw a photo. He and grandmami were beautiful together. Everyone thought he was deaf and dumb, Steve! They said horrible things about him, and he could hear everything! He must have had the voice, so he refused to speak. I know he could hear, because he would smile at me when I was little. I’d follow him around the garden while he worked. I made up stories about the bumble bees and doodle bugs, and he’d smile. I thought he was only smiling because he could see that I was talking. He could hear, and people were mean to him!” Estrella said.

“He was used to it, Eya. I know how it is. I hear every little comment when folks think I can’t. I’ve come to know human nature pretty well, and nothing surprises me anymore. I know what they’re gonna say almost before they say it. Your grandpa was used to it, too. I’m sure he didn’t let it bother him much at all by the time he knew you,” Steve assured her.

Estrella rubbed her furrowed brow into his shirt and he massaged the back of her neck. What he said made her feel only a little better. Grampi had been happy and at peace when he died, though she’d been too little to understand. She remembered seeing him lying still and waxy looking in the funeral home. She’d wanted him to get up out of the fancy box and go home.

“No. Aunt Rita had him before, with her first husband, my Uncle Tomas. He died working in a refinery. I don’t know why she married Alberto. He’s never seemed very nice,” Estrella said.

Steve could figure it out. Families tended to have secrets, even from some of their own members. It was probable that as Jesse grew out of infancy, Rita had noticed a resemblance to the photo of her grandfather. Estrella didn’t realize it, but the family likely knew about the old man’s voice, or had at least heard some rumor of it as a sordid cautionary tale. Rita had gotten scared. When her first husband died, she’d married a rough, ugly man so that the rest of her children wouldn’t be like little Jesse, almost too beautiful to be real. Until a year and a half ago, Rita had likely thought her children would escape what was hidden in the family’s blood. Jesse had dodged the voice, but Valeria wasn’t so lucky, despite Rita trying to carefully select an unlikely mate. Steve had no doubt that Rita, like Estrella, used food to obscure her physical beauty. The woman had curves and was attractive still, even though she probably weighed more than Steve did.

He didn’t judge their choices. Nobody had a right to. Living with unexplained phenomena had been a real hardship back before people could understand things like they did now. This family had suffered for their genetic inheritance. Estrella was a pleasant woman in his arms now, but he knew how skeletal she’d been. She’d almost died.

Steve rubbed his lips back and forth against Estrella’s forehead. She was an incredible mix of what had come down to her from her ancestors. Only one in every fourth generation or so had the combination of beauty and the voice. It wasn’t worth the suffering for her. Her life had been hell since it all manifested. Things would have been a little easier for her great grandfather, being a man, but not by much. He shuddered to think of what could have happened to a young man with Estrella’s combination of traits. Poor man. It was a miracle he’d made it to almost a hundred years. Cruel words from his unknowing family had likely been the least of it.

Protectiveness welled up in him for the woman in his arms and for her family as well. For Valeria. Something had happened to Rita, he’d bet. Even without the burden of the voice, beauty like hers would have drawn unwanted attention.

From the way Jesse and Rita looked, he had a better idea of what Estrella would become. He now understood her paranoia of men looking too closely at her in public. She was going to get a lot of looks and some unwelcome advances. As long as she let him, she was his to protect, if only she would stay with him like she said she would. Estrella thinking of staying anywhere long term was new to her, so he kept his thoughts to himself.

“You’ve got me all this week and next, doll. We shouldn’t stay out here to ourselves. Let’s go visit with your family. I’m gonna go see if I can charm your Uncle with football stats and gringo Spanglish. I’ll make a wreck of it for him to laugh at. You could go teach the ladies some of Natasha’s card tricks,” Steve suggested.

“Will Natasha kill me for sharing her tricks?” Estrella asked as they walked back to the house.

“Not if we don’t tell her,” he said.

End Note: Once again, this came out in one long bit, which I then split into Chapter 37 and Chapter 38. I’m editing 38 and will have it out within 24 hours, maybe sooner. Reviews are my bread n butter, with cinnamon and sugar on top!
Chapter 38

It turned out that Jesse and Fran's husband Luis were fans of broken language contortions. They had a good laugh at Steve while he tried to communicate with Alberto. Steve smiled and persisted in debating season stats with the man of the house. Alberto argued with him strictly in Spanish.

"I can understand you in Ingles," he said at one point when Steve was trying hard to learn a word that his knowledge of Latin, German, French, and English didn't help him with. Alberto's accent was thick and cadenced heavily with his native language.

Steve felt honored that the man met him halfway in his efforts to learn. Jesse and Luis were quietly impressed, too. Alberto almost never spoke English. They quieted for the last half of the game. It was a good one, and before the end Steve was yelling and groaning with the guys. Alberto and Luis yelled in Spanish and Steve and Jesse said pretty much the same things in English.

Steve could hear the women laughing in the kitchen. They would jokingly call Estrella a card cheat when they weren't asking her questions about her life. They were sensitive and caring when Estrella told them some of what had happened to her. Estrella explained some of the card cheats she'd learned from Natasha.

The football game was a long one, and everyone was getting hungry again by the time it was over. Mateo and Isaac eventually came to sit with their father once they figured that Steve was alright.

Steve was in the bathroom when he heard a faint, familiar sound outside and up high. By the time he got to the front door, he heard the distinctive sound of Mjolnir being set down on the concrete porch outside the door.

Alberto looked up from the after game commentary when a brisk knock rattled the door.

"It's my friend with something for Valeria," Steve said.

"That was fast," Alberto commented.

He went with Steve to answer the door.

Thor stepped inside on his best behavior. He was in canvas cargo pants, clunky boots, and a red plaid flannel shirt that made him look like a lumberjack.

"We're being invaded by Vikings," Jesse commented to Luis.

The two large blonde men by the door grinned.

"If that were true, I would be taking gifts, not bearing them," Thor responded.

He handed a choker necklace to Alberto. The man shook his head and quickly handed it over to Steve.

"This is your business, and the women's. Tell me if it works," he said.

Alberto nodded his thanks to Thor and waved him into the house, as if he wasn't already inside it. Thor gave Steve an assessing look, and was apparently satisfied with what he saw.

"I need not linger. This is your time, Steven," he murmured low enough for only Steve to hear.
"You should stay at least for a little while. I think Valeria would like to meet you. She has posters of us," Steve said equally as quiet.

"Eya, Val's necklace is here," Steve called into the kitchen.

Rita, Estrella, and Fran came to take the necklace and go to Val's room. Fran lingered to look at Steve and Thor, and Steve saw the exact moment she figured out who they were. Thor gave her a cheery smile and the goofy wave he enjoyed confusing surprised humans with. Fran shook her head as if she'd seen something impossible, then hurried after her mother.

A moment later, Steve's phone vibrated. Val was eager to see if her necklace worked.

"Come on," Steve said to Thor.

"This is a strange practice, visiting the bedchamber of a maiden child with all the women in attendance. Are you certain we are welcome?" Thor asked.

"I know the necklace will work. She'll want to thank you, and having both of us there will thoroughly prove to the family that it works," Steve said as they went down the small, dim hallway. Jesse joined them.

"Are you sure this thing will work?" he asked.

"I bet my life on Stark tech all the time. We can resist their voices. If it doesn't work, we'll keep you out of trouble," Steve told Jesse.

The bedroom door was open and Valeria was surrounded by her family. At the sight of both Steve and Thor, she was dumbfounded until Estrella nudged her.

"Go on. You should thank Thor for bringing it so quickly."

"Thank you?" Val whispered.

Her eyes looked past them to her brother. Jesse looked as uncertain as his little sister.

"You must speak if we are to know, child," Thor said.

"Okay. Thank you?" Valeria said more bravely this time.

Steve looked to Thor, then they both looked to Jesse. It appeared that no one was affected by the girl's voice now that her customized necklace was in place.

"This is cause for celebration! Tell me what you have missed most during your confinement," Thor said.

"I want to see my family," Valeria said.

The thought that she could brought tears to her eyes. She pushed through Steve and Thor on her way to Jesse.

"You're okay? You don't feel anything?" she asked him.

"Nothing, squirt. It's just like before," Jesse told her.

Valeria hugged him, then ran past to see her father.
They heard raised voices in the living room. Alberto was startled and adamant about Val going back to her room, but then the girl spoke to her father.

"There you are!" Alberto exclaimed happily, and they all walked in to see him patting his youngest fondly on her cheek.

He quickly concealed his happy expression into gruff inspection of the necklace she wore. He nodded once, then sat back down in his chair. He waved a hand at Valeria, which seemed to indicate that she had free run of the house again. She laughed and hugged Mateo and Isaac. Luis got a smile, and then Val ran back to her mother.

She looked to Estrella, then to Steve, then to Thor.

"You've changed my life. Please tell Mister Stark that I'm grateful," she said softly.

"I will tell Doctor Banner also. He awoke to help, and they had the task done in minutes," Thor said.

"Please. You stay and we'll do steaks. Jesse, go to the store and get more charcoal!" Rita said to them.

"Is Buck standing in as backup while you're away?" Steve asked Thor.

"He was unavailable. He is already away on an assignment."

"Get back to the tower. Anything could happen," Steve told him.

Thor nodded.

Before he could turn to go, Estrella hugged him.

"You kept bad things from happening to my cousin," Estrella told him after she let him go.

"There is no worthier cause than the defense of family and the protection of the innocent, and when both can be served it makes for a good day indeed," Thor said warmly.

He smiled at the girl with her new necklace, then at everyone else. Alberto lifted a hand to him, and then Thor was out the door. Steve heard the hammer spin up, then the sound of Thor jetting off to the Northeast.

"Jesse! Take Steve and go get enough meat and charcoal for everyone. By the time we cook, we'll all be starving," Rita said.

"Yes, Ma," the young man said.

Jesse went to his room to get his keys and his wallet. Steve stepped closer to Estrella and the rest of the women went back to the kitchen to give them some space.

"She wants me to go with. Do you want to come? I won't leave you here if you're not happy," he said.

"I'm more worried about you and Jesse. He was always a tomcat. He might corrupt you while you're out," Estrella said.

"Ain't scared," Steve said, and winked at her.
"Ooh. You go! Don't forget that we already have some steaks in the ice chest in the truck," she told him.

"Yes, Ma'am," Steve said.

He couldn't seem to resist wrapping his tongue around a Texas accent when he was feeling playful. Estrella wrinkled her nose at him and pushed him toward the door just as Jesse came out with his keys, ready to go.

"Don't you stop to get any women! We're getting hungry, and he'll tell on you," Estrella warned her cousin and tilted her nose up at Steve.

Jesse slapped a hand to his chest over his heart and walked backwards out the door. As soon as it closed behind Steve, he dropped his playing around. Steve kept a casual demeanor, but he studied the neighborhood closely. Jesse walked toward his truck.

"We're going in mine. This way," Steve said.

"Whatever, man. What are you doing?" Jesse asked.

"How safe is this neighborhood? Is there any trouble?" Steve asked.

"The police come sometimes, but it's never anything to do with us. All the gang shit stays over around twelfth. Why are you worried? We're just going to the store."

"Have any men around here heard your sister's voice?" Steve persisted in his questions as they got into his truck.

Jesse looked around at the vehicle appreciatively.

"Jesse," Steve prompted him.

"No. Some boys heard her once, but she doesn't go to that school anymore. You think somebody's gonna come to the house in the half hour we're gone, just because you and Eya came to visit?"

"I don't know what to think. It's my job to be cautious when it comes to other people's safety," Steve said as he started the truck.

"But not your own. I saw you with those robots a few months ago. That was some deep shit! You took that green laser thing so your buddy wouldn't get knocked out of the sky. Didn't it cut you or something?" Jesse asked.

"Something. It was clean. Healed fast," Steve said.

He waited with the engine running. He appreciated how laid back the family was being about his job, but he still needed directions to the store. Jesse looked at him, amazed that he was in a vehicle with a super-hero. Steve studied Jesse because he looked so much like Estrella, and because he was waiting for driving directions. Jesse shook his head and laughed nervously.

"What, man?"

"I don't know how to get to the store," Steve told him.

"Oh. Just drive. You turn right when we get to the light at the end of the street," the young man said.
He laughed again. Steve didn't like the nervous edge to it.

"At ease. You're nervous. What do you think is gonna happen?" Steve asked as he stopped the truck for two little kids to cross the street with their bicycles.

"I don't know. You gotta admit, today has been some strange shit since you got here. I'm wondering what's gonna happen next. Do you usually go at people so hard and get all personal and shit?" Jesse wanted to know.

His voice had turned a bit aggressive. Steve liked that. The kid wasn't in awe of him. He had a backbone, like his cousin. He wasn't fawning, despite Steve's role in helping his sister. If this kind of crossfire conversation went on all the way to the store and back, Steve was going to be as aggravated with Jesse as Lewis made him.

A thought niggled at him, but he kept it to himself. Steve kept his eyes on his driving and followed the instructions given to him. After a few minutes Jesse couldn't tolerate the silence.

"What the hell is with you? Is this an interrogation? Did I do something wrong?" he finally cracked under the pressure of prolonged quiet.

"Did you?" Steve asked dryly.

"Fuck you, man! How does Estrella put up with you?"

Steve laughed.

"It's alright, Jesse. I understand. You can relax," he said.

Now it was Jesse's turn to be silent. Under his stony silence, Steve could hear the frightened beat of his heart. He felt bad for him. He hadn't meant to rile the kid up so much. Now he was sitting over there looking like he was thinking about jumping out of a moving vehicle.

"I understand that today has been a lot to take in. Probably what bothers you the most is the slight disconnect from reality that comes when the world shifts and you're not expecting it to. Avengers are people too, and sometimes you see them when they're not on a glowing screen. Then, you're used to being top dog. You walk in and rule the room wherever you go. Other men fear you because you're attractive enough to make them look bad, and you can take their women if you want to. You don't know what to do with a man who isn't a little bit in awe of you. Then, there's the attraction. You're scared spitless that you'll tip your hand and I'll figure out that you're gay or bi, and that I might tattle to your family."

"Fuck you," Jesse said again, but it was weak. Terrified.

Steve pulled into the grocery store parking lot and parked the truck.

Jesse was breathing fast and shallow. Steve had talked down so many scared young men that it was easy as song and dance, but he had to make Jesse face his fears first so he could then show him that there was nothing to be afraid of. Fear of the unknown had always been the biggest bug-bear humanity had ever faced.

"Strange things happen in my life all the time, and I've learned to keep marching. Are you listening, Jesse?" Steve asked.

He nodded a jerky affirmative.
"First, I don't care if you're gay or bi. That's your business, and I'll never tell anyone. I don't know if I'll ever see you again, and I've got bigger things to think about. Your secret's safe with me," Steve assured him.

"I'm not a fag," Jesse said.

Steve didn't like that word, but he ignored it. Jesse was a nice enough guy, and he was under a lot of stress at the moment.

"I'm not worried about you making me look bad or taking my girl," Steve continued with the next point on his list.

Jesse snorted.

"I don't have anything to prove about who's alpha. I see the type all day long. I wipe my boots on them and knock down the next one in line. I'm not trying to sound puffed up. It's what I do. It's boring and repetitive. I could teach you how," Steve told him.

"Would you?" Jesse asked after a moment.

"It would take a lot more time than I have to get you actually knocking guys down, but to make them think twice all you gotta do is be confident and use actions more than words. A lot of noise and cursing is a sure sign of weakness," Steve said.

"I can see that. You're a master," Jesse said.

"Why thank you. I've worked hard," Steve said with a grin.

"Why do you do that?" Jesse asked.

"Do what?"

"That thing where you act all humble and write off what you are," Jesse said.

"I've gotta be humble. The more I see, the more I know how small I am. Anybody who opens their eyes and looks is a fool to be a cocky bastard. As far as writing myself off, I did that in the biggest way possible at the end of the war. I gave myself up to stop the enemy, and when I woke up seventy years later, the enemy was still here. All that they made me, and it still doesn't amount to a hill of beans sometimes. I do what I can, and the rest will have to be good enough," Steve explained.

"You make it sound hopeless," Jesse said.

"It feels that way sometimes, but then something good happens. Estrella is that for me. She's my good thing. Good person, I mean," Steve said.

Jesse nodded. As improbable as it felt that his cousin would be with Captain America, it was plain that Steve was dead serious about Estrella. No joke.

"We're supposed to be getting steak and charcoal. Ma's gonna burn up my phone in a few minutes," Jesse said.

"Blame it on me," Steve said.

"Why are you doing this? Talking to me?"
"Because you needed it," Steve said, "you were about to rattle out of your skin."

Jesse nodded.

Steve was relieved that the kid wasn't scared anymore. He wasn't socially adept enough to know what precisely he'd done to set the kid off, but it was mostly settled now.

"Are we done here?" Steve asked sharply.

Rather than being harsh, his tone was meant to convey comradery and strength. That everything was right and they could move on.

"About the other thing…" Jesse said uneasily.

He looked out the window or at his hand clenched on his knee. Anywhere but at Steve.

"What about it?" Steve asked.

He didn't bother to play dumb. They needed to get this conversation done and get to work.

"Nobody knows. I lie to myself and believe it most of the time. I like girls. Love pussy. But every once in a while, somebody comes along… Are you really gonna keep it to yourself, or should I start packing to get outta town?" Jesse asked, then snapped his teeth shut.

"I'm sorry about that. I don't enjoy making people uncomfortable. I won't tell anyone. Not even Estrella. You have my word on it," Steve said.

"I'm sorry too. It's just that you're a fuckin beast. A lot of guys put on a show, but you're it," Jesse said with a single brave glance at Steve.

"I'm not a beast," Steve denied.

"Yes you are. You can't fake me. I've got a nose for it. Grampi had it too. He told me," Jesse confessed.

The kid wasn't messing with him or trying to bluff. He had that resigned, knowing look that Estrella got sometimes when she spoke about the unusual things she'd been born with. Whatever his nose was telling him, it must be part of the family heritage.

"We've all got things we don't want anybody else to know about. I don't think I'm a beast. I'm trying hard not to be, but if you say so…," Steve said with a shrug, "You keep my secret. I'll keep yours. Good enough?"

Jesse nodded.

"Let's get the meat and get back before Eya thinks you've got us in trouble with women, because apparently you do that," Steve said.

"Why did you buy these ones, Jesse? Were they on sale?" Fran asked her brother with a displeased look on her face.

Fran's job was to prepare the meat for the grill while her mother worked on the side dishes. She'd unwrapped all the steaks they'd brought back until she got to the ones Steve had brought from his ice chest.
"I bought those yesterday," Steve admitted.

"Shut up, man. I could take it. I had it covered, but you had to go being all honest and…stuff," Jesse said.

His eyes flashed to where Val was peeling potatoes at the table. Steve guessed that he'd gotten loose with his language while his little sister was put away and couldn't hear him.

"I don't need you to stand up for me to women. I'll dig my own trenches," Steve said.

He was getting the feel of the culture in this house. There was a subtle, good-natured competition between the genders. The men used it to bond, and the women did likewise. Estrella smiled at them both. She was pleased that Steve was figuring her family out.

"Yeah, but you don't have to jump yourself under the bus like that when I could have saved you. When Ma sees those! Yeesh. Fran, just put them in the marinade and don't say anything," Jesse said hopefully.

"When Ma sees what?" Rita turned around to go see what Fran was handling.

She took a look at the mysteriously deficient steaks and gave Steve a cool, insulting look with just her eyebrows. The fact that she turned away without saying anything at all made Steve feel particularly low.

"See. Keep your mouth shut and let me take the bus," Jesse said quietly.

"Cerveza!" Alberto yelled from the back yard where he was getting the charcoal going.

Valeria hurried to bring her father a beer from the fridge.

Estrella laughed and kept cutting the fresh green beans.

"I'll let you take the bus if you ever deserve it," Steve told him easily, "I'll pile drive you into the ground with it. Have you ever been beat with a bus before? I have. I can't seem to stay away from them. Robots, aliens, misguided friends… I see a lot of buses. Not my idea of fun. I hate buses. So if you ever deserve it, you better believe I'll let you take the bus. But this time, I earned the bus. Bad steak. I need to learn why."

Jesse and Fran stared at Steve. Estrella pressed her wrist to her mouth and tried not to snort laughter onto the food she was preparing.

"Too much?" Steve asked her.

Estrella held her fingers a little bit apart and nodded. There was a twinkle in her eyes that made up for the embarrassment of his over-sharing. Steve grumbled something, got a beer from the fridge, and went out back to learn about steak from Alberto. He was the resident grill master, and he probably wouldn't give him that insulting eyebrow thing that the women did.

Jesse finally laughed and followed him out.

"I think Jesse's in love with your boyfriend," Fran whispered quickly before Val could come back in.

Estrella nodded and went back to her cutting. It was understandable. Steve was lovable.

"None of that talk in this house. Don't break your father's heart," Rita admonished them.
Fran would have replied, but Val hurried back inside.

"Oh my gosh! Captain America is in my back yard!" Val gushed as she lingered by the window.

"You people! I come back after all these years, and all you can talk about is my boyfriend. I bring people to fix Val's voice, and do I get any thanks?" Estrella said.

"We love you too, Eya, but you're so skinny. I could snap you!" Fran teased.

Estrella refrained from commenting about that. In most of the world she knew, you didn't tell people they were too skinny or too fat, but that wasn't the case here. It was hard to get back into old habits when they'd been beat out of you.

"I think you're pretty, Eya. Your hair will grow, and you can eat more. All that matters is that he likes you, and he does," Val said.

"That's not all that matters. I have to like me, too. What if I like to be bald and skinny?" she asked testily.

Rita put down her big spoon and walked to the table. She laid a hand on Estrella's cheek.

"Look at me, niña. I'm like a whale. We do what we have to do. I'm happy to see you alive, so I don't care if you're skinny. Those putas at child services wouldn't tell us a thing about you. I wanted to get a lawyer, but we didn't have the money. You better call us when you go back to New York. Your mami will pray me bald all the way from heaven if I don't look after you," Rita said.

"I don't think she needs any more looking after. She's got the Avengers," Val said dreamily over her pile of peeled potatoes.

Estrella blew a frustrated breath at her hair. They were back to talking about heroes again.

"I don't care who she's got. They're not family," Rita said.

Steve learned what he could from Alberto and Luis while Mateo and Isaac jumped on the trampoline. The boys bonked their heads together at one point, and there was a little blood, but they shook it off with no whining and kept jumping after a thrown fist or two.

Jesse fussed at little Isaac for punching his big brother. When it was time to eat, Steve saw that the table wasn't huge after all. With him and Estrella, it was bordering on crowded. After the meal, it felt right to linger, but Steve wanted to get back to the beach before dark. He wanted some quiet time with Estrella.

"I promise we'll come back before we leave for home," Estrella told her aunt as they lingered near the front door.

"We could go to the beach," Val suggested.

"That could work. Eya, do they have your number? I wouldn't want to miss them if they get a free day. Our schedule is flexible," Steve said.

"Yes, they have my number," she smiled at him.

There were hugs all around, except for Steve. He got handshakes from the men. Rita gave the best hugs. Estrella thought so too, because she cried again.
Steve let her go through her emotions from the day in peace while he drove them back out to the beach. She was quiet and she didn't offer to get out and help him refill their water containers.

They had to take a spot a little farther down the beach, because there were campers near their spot from the night before. It didn't matter. There were miles and miles of beach to choose from. Steve didn't stop driving until they couldn't see anyone else in either direction. Estrella yelped a few times as he maneuvered the truck around or over obstacles. Steve was having fun with his truck and its four wheel drive, so she didn't complain. If he got it stuck, he was probably strong enough to lift it free.

"Are you alright?" Steve finally asked her as they sat out under the stars in their folding chairs.

"I'm wonderful. Thank you, Steve, for everything. You take me down here, and you bring me to my family, and you make an effort to get along with them, even crabby old Alberto. Val's life will be different. You've saved her too."

"Don't talk about Alberto. He's alright. You just have to understand him," Steve said.

He pointedly refused to take credit for all she was trying to praise him for. It made him happy to do all of it, and it was no bother.

"And you understand Alberto?" she asked archly, "I don't even understand Alberto most of the time."

"Sure. You just have to know Latin, German, French, English, and have a good ear. Spanish is easy. I'm picking it up fast," Steve smiled smugly.

Estrella took the foam drink cozy off her soda can and threw it at him.

"Do you really wanna get in a throw down with me, little girl?" he asked.

There were about ten tons of Brooklyn in his tone, and he launched the piece of hollow foam back at her. He managed to make it sting across the bridge of her nose somehow, just a little.

Estrella laughed. She loved how he was starting to let hints of smugness and sarcastic wit show in front of her. It felt more genuine than him being gosh-darn choirboy all the time.

"I'm not getting into any kind of throwing contest against you, Steve. But, 'little girl?" she questioned him.

She got out of her chair and went the few feet across the sand to stand in front of him. She took his beer and set it in his cup holder. Then she climbed onto his lap.

"You and me together exceed the rated weight capacity of these chairs," he cautioned her.

"You sound like Jarvis. You think I'm a 'little girl?" Estrella persisted in a dangerously light tone.

"You're small and you're female. I like that. Is there a problem?" Steve replied, sounding like he hoped there was one.

He loved the way Estrella felt against him after a long day of being around a lot of people. The peace they found together fit strangely well along with the thrill he felt at her touch.

"No. I'm only making sure, because Jesse likes you. I thought you should know."

"I'm glad. I like him too. He's fun. He hardly blinked when he found out what I do. They're all good about it. I was afraid it was going to be a problem," he said as smoothly as he could.

Natasha would be proud. He thought he fibbed to Estrella pretty convincingly.

"It's a Latino thing. They don't like to seem too impressed with anything. You missed what I'm saying, Steve. Jesse likes you. As in, he wouldn't mind being locked in a closet with you for a while," she said.

"Oh. How do you know?"

"We're his family. We're not blind," she said.

"Does Jesse know you're not blind?"

"I don't know. We're all trying so hard to keep Alberto in the dark. It wouldn't go well if he knew," Estrella said.

"There's nothing any of us can do about that. Some folks can't get around the idea of same-sex relations. I was one of them for a while when I was young and sheltered. I've been around too many people to condemn anyone. I've seen too much. It's not for me, but it's not my place to dictate to others, either. If any of that's an issue for Jesse, you should all leave him alone to find his own way. I've seen some tragic things happen when somebody thinks they know best and they act on someone else's behalf," Steve warned.

Estrella shuddered mildly at the idea that Jesse's life could end in tragedy, or even that he might suffer if rumors started about him. Then, she noticed that Steve had taken her light comments far more seriously than she'd meant them.

"You know about Jesse? What happened? It had to be when you went for the steaks," Estrella said.

"Nothing happened. I'm good at reading people, that's all. Jesse likes women. No worries there," Steve said.

"You're a rotten liar," Estrella said.

Steve sighed. This meant more lessons with Natasha.

"Honestly, nothing happened. He was acting nervous. We talked. He got over it. Do we have to talk about Jesse?" Steve complained.

"As long as you know that he likes you. We know he loves women, and lots of them. He's been that way since before I left years ago, when he was fifteen. But, sometimes, he notices a man, and off he goes. Don't tease him, Steve. It would be cruel."

"You're talking to me about cruelty and teasing? I wouldn't do that to anyone I liked. I've been through it enough," Steve said.

"Okay. Yes, let's talk about teasing. Somebody had fun this morning without me. I've been left like this all day," Estrella said.

She found the relaxed mound of his genitals and perched just so on him. The heat of her and the slick ease of her sleep shorts and underwear sliding against him told him what 'like this all day' meant. He wasn't relaxed for long.

Estrella was above him in the chair, looking down. Being on top didn't bother her at all. She probably felt safe that way. Steve wasn't going to tell her how quick he could get her under him from this position. If she felt safe, he wanted her to keep feeling that way.

Before he was fully aroused and Estrella had set in her mind exactly what she wanted to do, Steve shifted her hips so that she was riding the hard muscle of his thigh, rather than directly on him. He wasn't ready for that, no matter how she wanted it. He wanted to be ready for it, but he didn't think it meant the same to her as it did to him.

He helped her work herself against him with careful hands. It was incredibly exciting for him to watch the slow build of a woman to orgasm. A woman he cared about. He almost came too from his hot, thrilled empathy for her, and from listening to the little sounds she made.

It was wrong to do the sexual things they had done today according to what his upbringing had been, but Estrella was no blushing virgin to woo with tepid acts. She was a frightened and abused woman, and she needed strong love to overcome her past if they were going to make it.

She fell asleep on him. Steve carried her to bed without waking her. She jerked away when he brushed sand from her feet with fingers, but she didn't wake. When he closed them in the truck camper for the night, the scent of her was strong. He could almost taste her in the air.

He loved it, but it took him a long time to get to sleep.
Discomfort woke her. Estrella rubbed her fingers at her eyes and looked around to see that she had the back of the truck all to herself. She sat up and looked around. Steve had left her phone right next to her, as was becoming his habit. A quick look out the camper windows showed that she had the beach to herself as far as the eye could see.

She had to pee so bad that she broke a fingernail pulling at the camper hatch handle. She didn't bother putting down the tailgate. She climbed over and hurried to the dunes. Then she rushed back and got her toothbrush and a wipe to clean up with.

Even with Steve not around to see, her face flushed hot at the memory of last night. So much of seeing her family yesterday jumbled in her head, and it all left her with a happy feeling. Happy wasn't a big enough word. Still, the feel of Steve's strong hands on her hips gripping and guiding her, and the hard arc of his thigh muscles against her deliciously sensitive places overwhelmed all that. She was embarrassed for falling asleep on him. He must have carried her to bed.

She felt a little shy of rubbing on him now that she was standing in the cool light of early morning brushing her teeth, but only a little. Steve had shared his pleasure and relief with her in the morning, and she didn't think any less of him. From the heated way he'd been looking up at her last night while she was seeking hers, she knew he didn't mind. They weren't exactly enjoying each other together yet, but it was a start. It was more than she thought she'd ever have with anyone, and she loved being close to him in a way they couldn't when they were at the tower. It was as if they were building something exclusive, just for them. Something worth protecting.

While she put away her toothbrush and toothpaste, she paid attention to the discomfort that had awakened her. It wasn't only the urgency to pee. She wanted. The idea of coffee and food was mildly appealing, but what she really needed was Steve. Even though she'd fallen asleep touching him, and may have been touching him in her sleep, she wanted more. Yesterday had mostly been about her family. Today, she wanted him all to herself.

Estrella frowned at the needy feeling in her skin and in her bones, in the meat of her. It felt good. Healthy. Powerful. But she dreaded it. It meant that she was getting better, and she was changing fast. She pressed her fingers to her face, then combed them through her hair. She'd changed overnight. It was slight, but she could feel it. Before long, she wouldn't even be able to resent the changes or remember not feeling this way. It was going to overwhelm her and swallow her up with its purpose. It always did.

She sighed, then shook her head. There was no point stressing over what was happening inside her. The smartest thing would be to enjoy these simple days while she could. With that in mind, she turned her focus to doing something for Steve rather than worrying about her future.
There was no telling how much longer he'd be gone. Maybe she had time to make coffee and something for breakfast. She opened up their little green camp stove and got the burners lit by recalling how Steve had done it. The left burner made a ‘whoomph’ sound and the flame went out, but then she used another match and re-lit it and it seemed to work fine. She put their new kettle over one flame with a bellyful of fresh water. She got their little black iron skillet and bacon from the ice chest for the other burner. It was easy to set up the French press for coffee.

While she waited, she kept looking along the beach in each direction. It was so strange as to be almost creepy, to have this much space all to herself. Only the seagulls glided by, giving her and her cooking a hopeful eye. The day was starting out with gray skies, but calm and quiet. She could see Steve's footsteps in the sand, leading off to the South.

The bacon cooked quickly. She turned off the flame under it and looked for Steve. She still couldn't see him. She put the kettle on low heat. She didn't want the coffee to be overdone and bitter. Estrella looked to the gentle, lapping waves, and then to the far empty distance of sand. If somebody came along, she'd have time to see them and get herself back in the truck before they got to her.

Estrella wandered across the beach toward the water. She was in her thin comfy sleep tee, and her little silky shorts. Her bare legs and feet felt supremely naked in the gentle breeze. Her throat was bare to the breeze, too, and she loved it. This was like walking around nearly naked in her room back at the tower, but she was out in 'public', on an open beach where anyone at all could come along. The freedom and lightness from worry made her smile. She rubbed her fingers at the bare front of her throat and was pleased to not feel collared.

Her toes reveled in the little waves and she shuffled along idly, kicking up swirls of sand in the water. The air was cool enough to give her little bumps on her skin and make her nipples tingle, but the water was warm almost like a bath. A shape at the water's edge drew her attention.

A starfish! Estrella smiled in wonder and went to squat down over it. The creature was big as her spread hand, and bumpy all over in rows along its five arms. The color was a dark reddish orange, and it was alive. As she watched intently and thin sheets of sea water washed over her feet and the starfish, she could see it moving along, creeping so slowly that its movement was almost imperceptible. Under the bottom edges of its arms, its color was a light toasty tan, and thousands of tiny little pod feet stepped it along over the sand. For such a mindless animal, she marveled at how it coordinated all those tiny feet.

She wasn't going to disturb it, but she couldn't resist. With an outstretched finger, she touched its tough, bumpy skin. The thing did a very slow motion direction change back toward deeper water. She chuckled at how its increased speed to flee was still hardly moving at all.

A repetitive thumping sound drew her attention up and away from the starfish. She looked up to see Steve running toward her, still quite a distance off. Estrella stood up and left the starfish to bumble along where it would. She'd never seen Steve run like this, and it was pretty amazing.

He was approaching faster than she would have thought possible. In the time it took her to get lost in watching him move like an unstoppable machine, she realized that over two hundred pounds of solid man was headed right for her. She barely had time to fear an impact, and then Steve smiled his rascally smile at her, the one he sometimes used when Bucky was around.

There was no use running or dodging. She'd seen his agility and speed. She stood her ground on the damp sand and smiled back at him.

It happened so fast that she couldn't tell what he'd done, but there was an abrupt movement, then he was up and over her in a tight tuck. Steve came down behind her so close that his chest and belly smacked into her back and his large feet shocked the sand just to the outside of hers.

She began to stumble forward from the gentle but abrupt bump, but his arms came around to tug her back against him. Steve tucked his face into the side of her neck and laughed. Estrella wanted to laugh with him but his harsh, hot breaths against the bare skin of her neck made her choke down on her airway. She wasn't wearing her necklace. Instead, she brought her hands up to grip his forearms in welcome and she turned to kiss the bridge of his nose.

"Hiya, Gorgeous," Steve breathed at her, then smooched her lips.

She kissed him back softly. It landed on his teeth because he couldn't stop grinning. He jostled her in his arms from side to side just a bit, the better to feel her against him.

A slight tremble shook her. Steve was pumped hard from his run, and his chest rose and fell against her back, making her feel squished in his arms some. Veins stood out under his skin wherever she could see him. Unwanted jolts of alarm shocked adrenaline into her blood. He had her. There was no escape. Even if she screamed, at this point he'd only grab her harder. She was trapped.

Estrella took a deep, calming breath, then another one. She laid her head back onto his chest and let her mouth fall open slightly. When she fully relaxed against him and let her tense muscles go soft, he didn't feel so scary.

"Are you alright now?" Steve asked.

She nodded and waited for her heart to stop thumping. Strenuous and fast as his run had been, it only took a few minutes for his body to calm. Estrella patted his arm and he released her. She pointed to the starfish, which hadn't gotten very far away in its attempt to flee.

Steve squatted beside her to look at it.

"The beach is full of them this morning, but I didn't stop to look," he said.

Steve reached out and carefully picked up the starfish. They looked closely at its pale underside.
There were grooves under each arm, and a little mouth hole in the middle. Thousands of pod feet waved and waved and waved at nothing.

Estrella flicked her hands frantically toward the water. The poor creature wanted to get away from his grip, just like she had. Steve set it down and it stayed there, immobile and confused. A wave washed over it, and that seem to clear its befuddlement. It began its gruelingly slow march back out to sea.

"It's a good thing there's millions of them. Response time that slow isn't very good for individual survival," he said.

"Does everything have to be about tactics?" she whispered.

He shrugged.

"It's an observation. It's not really a tactic if I'm only noticing a characteristic. Taking note of a situation, assessing what needs to be done, making a plan, and then acting with directive purpose would be tactical. I was just enjoying a starfish," Steve said with flippant attitude and a twinkle in his eyes, as if it was her fault for making him think work-related thoughts.
Estrella poked out her lip and tapped him in the middle of his forehead.

"Eh, I know. It's hard not to think about work. I'll try harder. And thanks for trusting me," he said, and looked a few steps away to where he'd abruptly stopped his run, "It feels good to be trusted."

She looked to the slowly escaping starfish and nodded.

"It was my plan to wake you up like I did yesterday, but you made some progress anyway, didn't you? You did good. You calmed yourself quickly. I wasn't trying to scare you, though," he told her.

She rolled her eyes in frustration at herself, and tapped at the side of her head in annoyance.

"Don't blame yourself. I have a phobia of ice water. We learn these things whether we want them or not. Clint threw a glass of cold water at me when he thought I'd sprayed him with champagne. None of us were thinking about it. I locked up. I couldn't even breathe. Hours in a frigid swimming pool with scuba gear, and I'm almost over it, but I'll never like cold water. The goal is to be functional despite the fear. You're making real progress," Steve assured.

Estrella looked at him. It was difficult to imagine Steve so afraid of anything that he couldn't breathe, especially something as harmless as a glass of water. A frown drew down her brow and her lip poked out stubbornly.

"Don't frown at me. I hadta do it. Cap can't afford to be vulnerable like that. It would be embarrassing and dangerous if I had to make a cold water insertion and I couldn't function. Plans could fail. People could die," he said, all too serious.

She blew out a breath that fluffed the soft hairs over her forehead. She tapped his forehead again, harder.

"Sorry," Steve grimaced.

His demeanor brightened and they stood up. They walked back to the truck in the bright gray morning light. The sun was trying to burn through the clouds and the air was warming up. Steve glanced at her shirt and Estrella self-consciously tugged the fabric away from her bra-less breasts. The movement of walking was keeping her perky against the rubbing cotton.

"I didn't mean to stare," Steve apologized without really apologizing.

She shrugged and went directly for the kettle. It was just below a boil, which was perfect. She turned off the burner, then poured hot water into the French press. She had two bowls of instant maple oatmeal ready, and she poured water into them too and stirred. She looked to the coffee pot, then to Steve and tapped her wrist. He set his watch with a four minute timer.

Estrella waved a hand toward his chair, and he sat. She set four thick, crisp slices of bacon and two boiled eggs on top of his oatmeal and brought him the bowl, then fixed half as much for herself. She angled her chair so she would be next to the coffee while she ate and so that she could see the waves instead of the dunes.

Steve must have hand washed his running shorts because they were the same ones from yesterday, but clean. He looked perversely Captain America-like sitting in his dark steel blue folding chair, wearing the gray shorts. He was eating out of a red plastic bowl. She wondered if he'd even noticed the colors he'd chosen for things. She smiled faintly around her mouthful of oatmeal.
"What?" Steve asked.

The timer went off for the coffee, and she shrugged. It was too complicated for her to want to explain while she wasn't wearing her necklace. She reached and pushed down the press to filter the coffee. Their new mugs and the sugar and cream were already set out. She poured for them and then indicated the cream and sugar.

"Nah. Black is good this morning. Thank you," he said.

He held his bowl in one hand and came to get his coffee mug so she wouldn't have to get up. She nodded and smiled softly at him. She was pleased to have made breakfast and coffee for them, and to have figured out how to operate the camp stove. The view of his backside as he walked back to his chair was worth smiling over, too. Not just his ass. His shoulders and back and legs were lovely, too. She sighed appreciatively.

Steve grinned at her as he sat down, and gave her a brief little-boy look from beneath his lashes.

"I've heard that sigh a thousand times or more, but it feels good when it's you doing it," he said.

She made a face at him as if he was making a little much of himself. His eyebrows went up.

"Oh, really? Is that the way it's gonna be? You're a looker, Eya, and I think you got even prettier overnight. Are you gonna treat me like every other guy when I get stuck admiring you? Or are you gonna let me in under your defenses?" he asked.

There was real curiosity and trepidation in his question. They both knew she was damaged and conditioned to respond to men's attention in negative ways. Steve wasn't wrong to be concerned.

She set her oatmeal bowl down. She couldn't have him thinking that she resented his attention. It was only four steps across the sand to him, and she sank to her knees in front of his chair. He set his empty bowl down in a hurry.

"I don't want you on your knees," Steve protested.

She shook her head and brushed his hands away when he reached for her to lift her up. He didn't sit back again completely, but he let her do what she wanted. Estrella leaned forward and hugged him around the waist. Her arms wrapped around him and her head rested beside his hip. She squeezed him tight for a moment, then she kneeled up straight again. He didn't know what to do with his hands, but she did.

Estrella drew one of his hands to her and pressed it to wrap around her neck from the front, and then tucked his other one up under her loose shirt. She flattened his palm between her breasts and over her heart. Their skin pressing together in such vulnerable places felt exhilarating and perfect. She put her hands on him in the same way, though he had no shirt to slip under.

They stared at each other, and Steve's eyes darkened, his pupils going wide. She could feel his strong heart thump a little harder under her hand. She rubbed up and down the contours of his neck and he shook his head slightly. She got the impression that he wasn't telling her 'no'. He was shaking off some unexpected feeling.

"Loud 'n clear, Doll. I'm all for you, if you're all for me," he said.

The rumble of his voice reminded her a little of the sound of his truck. She nodded and smiled in delight. Quick as a hummingbird, she pressed up and in to kiss him deeply. His hand around her neck slipped around to the back of her head, and the hand between her breasts moved down and around her ribs to press her closer to him. His work-roughened palm moving over tender skin buzzed her with excitement. She wiggled against him so much that their noses bumped while they kissed.

She bit at his tongue and he groaned and pushed his way deeper in to offer her more to nip at. His jaws opened hers wider in a gentle show of eagerness rather than a rape of her mouth. Her biting turned to slick wet sucking, and Steve undulated his tongue in her, a hint of challenge for her to hang on and do as she would. Things got a little frantic and clumsy after that, but they relished everything. Neither of them cared if they were doing things perfectly. The point was to share and to feel.

They enjoyed the near-grind of their facial bones, then Estrella pulled away to breathe. She moved her head aside to press her temple against his. She nuzzled their skin together and tried not to breathe in his ear too much. For his part, Steve tried not to clutch at her too tightly because she was bent in an awkward position.

"Our coffee's probably getting cold," he said.

Estrella made a huffing sound, but she got up off her knees. She didn't bother brushing the sand off, because then she'd have it on her hands. She put a bit of sass in her step as she went back to sit in her chair and she heard Steve's faint groan behind her. She was aware that her backside was beginning to look interesting.

She turned to sit and she picked up her oatmeal bowl. She frowned because she wanted to tease him back about the sound he'd made while looking at her ass. She couldn't. Not without her necklace.

"What?! You just told me that it was alright for us to enjoy each other," Steve complained.

Estrella waved her hands at him and shook her head. Then, she stopped that and waved her hands in a different direction when he looked confused. They were pretty good at communicating without her speaking, but not everything was so easy to say. She gave up trying and simply flopped back in her chair. She rubbed at her larynx and looked frustrated.

"So talk, already. Let's give this a try," Steve encouraged her.

He took a relaxed sip of his coffee. At least, he tried to look relaxed. His body was humming and warm, ready to act. He made himself release the muscle tension that wanted to grab and take and push. Instead, he focused on his desire to give and to please her, to help her however he could.

"Are you sure?" she whispered.

"I'm sure. I'll feel it, but we'll be okay. I want to see where this goes," he said.

"I wanted to tease you for making that cute little needy noise when you looked at my ass, but the moment's gone now," she said.

Predictably, Steve looked fine for the first moment, then he started to look dazed. Estrella didn't want to say anything else, in case…

"Again. I can hardly pay attention to what you're saying. Say it again. I'll try harder," Steve told her.

She was hesitant.
Steve tried accepting and processing the effects of her voice differently, kind of like he was trying to handle his own desires since Thor had advised him. Instead of locking himself down and fighting any kind of response, he let it wash through him. Yeah, he wanted to fuck her. But only if she wanted it, and she didn't right now. She was scared and unsure. So he could enjoy wanting to fuck her. He could imagine it. He could think of what it might feel like, the sounds she would make. He squirmed in his seat, adjusted himself in his shorts, and forced himself to take his hand away when what he really wanted was to get in a few rubs. Or to crawl over there to her and tip her out of her chair…

A gentleman! He could be a gentleman. Not a beast. Words. Focus on her words.

"Again," Steve urged her.

This time, he tried hard to listen to the enunciation of her sounds as she repeated herself, not just the intoxicating effect they made in his brain. He heard her, and could have repeated the words back to her, but the meaning was tough to string together in his higher brain. His feet dug into the sand and his hands wanted to curl around the armrests of the chair, but he made himself go loose. It was more important to keep control of his body than to understand her naked voice. Had to keep her safe. That was easy to comprehend in the deeper parts of his brain.

"Teasing noisy ass. Gone," Steve said. That was all he could string together of what she'd said.

Estrella laughed, though she knew she probably shouldn't. This wasn't easy for him. She could see from the way his body went through cycles of tension and then forced relaxation, and the crimp on his brow that it was quite an effort. It was impressive to see. This was a different kind of fight for him, but still a fight. He was determined to win, like with everything else. When she laughed, his brow eased and a smile pulled at his lips.

"You like it when I laugh. Does it feel different?" she asked.

She'd never had reason to laugh in front of a man while she wasn't wearing her necklace. It was fascinating to see him struggling and aroused, but smiling. There was something slightly frightening in it, too. That didn't make sense, but it was true.

It wasn't exactly the detailed explanation she was looking for, but it was something.

"How are you doing this, Steve? Nobody has been able to resist, and there you go making it even harder. Like it's the next level on a game or something," she said.

That was too much for him. Too many words. Meanings were getting lost again. She'd asked a question, but he couldn't pick it out of all the words, much less make sense of it to try and answer. He whined in disappointed effort. Sweet fire was spreading, creeping out along his nerves to his extremities. His groin and his chest were already consumed with it.

He didn't know if it was worth trying to understand her again. His mind was getting lost. He was failing at his task and not sure he cared.

"Steve? Are you alright?" she asked.

He laid his head back and focused on his vitals. Heartbeat. Respirations. He needed a moment to gather himself in again, or something was gonna happen. Growing. Spreading.

"You're worrying me. Please say something," she said in a near whisper.
That was the last lick, right along his spine down low. It rolled up to his brain, and out to his fingertips and toes. His dick went off in his running shorts for the second day in a row. It was like a waking wet dream that didn't stop until the resonance of her voice quit humming in his skull and through his bones.

Estrella watched him sprawled back in his chair. It was eerie, like a ghost was having sex with him. His erection grew larger and firmer and his body got harder, like after his run. Mentally, he wasn't there, and that was maybe the scariest part. It was hot to watch him get off without anyone touching him, but she was worried that he was going to be unhappy when this was over. She didn't like doing this to him. It wasn't right. It's not what he'd asked for or expected.

Steve wanted to lie there and enjoy the warm, twitchy feeling that he would swear reached all the way to the tips of his toe nails, but something was bothering him. A sound. Faint, but it meant something.

Steve's head snapped up, and then he did too. Concern chased the lingering fog of pleasure from his mind and body.

"What?" Estrella asked sharply as he came for her.

Steve had no time to explain. He'd been distracted, and they'd almost waited too long. He took hold of her as gently as he could and moved her.

"In the truck," he said briskly.

Then, she heard it too. A helicopter. She was unsure why they should worry about a helicopter, but she did as he wanted and got in the truck.

"In the backseat. Get your clothes for the day. Head down and don't come out until I tell you," he ordered.

He shut her in the truck and moved himself slow and casual toward the camp stove and the coffee pot. The helicopter flew over lower, slower and louder than most would do. Even the most basic part of his mind had recognized the sound of a refitted federal aircraft. It was unmarked, but he knew what it was. Either Homeland Security or INS, or both. They were close enough to the Mexico border for it to make sense that this would be a routine flight, so he kept his cool. He looked on as any tourist on vacation would do. He tried for curious and startled as an expression, but maybe it didn't go so well.

Shit. He heard the change in rotor pitch before the chopper shifted to come around for a landing. He tossed out his coffee as if he was about to break camp and start cleaning up their breakfast things. He picked up a kitchen rag and wiped out his coffee mug down low near his waist. They'd see that he was messing with a mug and a rag, but not that he was wiping any visible mess from the front of his shorts from where his girlfriend had just made him pop from her voice alone.

Hah. He had a girlfriend. Steve smiled and set down the coffee mug and the rag. As an afterthought, he wiped down the hot camp stove with the rag, then polished the kettle, which was still near scalding temperature. Sometimes these boys wanted to confiscate strange things. He wasn't letting anyone get a viable sample of him. The smell of toasted protein assaulted his nose. Good enough.

The helicopter set down on the beach just far enough away that the wind didn't blow away their chairs and table, though Steve squinted his eyes some against the sand. The rag tried to blow away but he snagged it out of the air before he would have to chase it down.
He was slightly concerned about how this was going to go, but then he spent most missions at least slightly concerned, so it wasn't a new feeling. He stayed calm and walked over to pick up Estrella's coffee mug. It had sand in it. He tossed it out and wiped it down as the chopper spun down. There were mounts for equipment on the belly of the craft, but only a glass bubble was currently equipped. He wondered what they had. Infrared? Full spectrum? Something else?

Three agents stepped down onto the sand. Steve waited for them and wished he had his shirt on. He also hoped that Estrella was getting dressed and putting her necklace on. He stood as if he was in command and they were coming to report to him. The officer immediately recognized the steady authority in the stance even though they probably didn't know who he was yet. The little group slowed their aggressive approach slightly. Steve notched his chin down ever so slightly in approval.

The noise from the helicopter wound down so that the officer didn't have to shout by the time they reached him.

"Identify yourself," Steve ordered when they were in conversational range, but not yet stopped in front of him.

"Agent Carlisle. INS, Brownsville. Can I see some ID, Sir?" The man said.

He was fairly young, and the agents with him, one man and one woman, were younger still. Carlisle was being carefully neutral, and that was good enough.

"Sure. It's in the truck. I've got a sidearm. Do you want to step around and run my plates first?" Steve offered.

The agent looked the nearly naked man over, but nearly naked was normal for this beach. He nodded to one of his junior agents and the young woman stepped to the back of the truck to call out his plate number into her comm.

Carlisle waited a moment, then nodded to Steve when he got some information in his ear. The other junior agent followed him to the back of the truck where his pants and wallet and sidearm were from last night when he'd taken them off.

Steve didn't bother to tell the young man that him having his hand merely on his holster wasn't going to be enough to prevent him from accessing his own weapon if he wanted to. It was best to be straight and calm with these folks and to not say much more than he had to.

He used two fingers to slide his wallet out of his folded pants and he stepped back around the truck toward Carlisle. The junior agent was easier now that Steve was away from his firearm. Steve momentarily marveled at the differences from how a New York agent would have reacted to the presence of an unsecured weapon. Texas was pretty relaxed, it seemed.

Carlisle accepted his New York driver's license, and Steve kicked himself mentally for thinking through about a dozen different ways he could put the agents down for a nap, and how quickly he could get to his shield and take out the helicopter. If it was just him, he wouldn't be worried at all, but he had Estrella to think about. Estrella, who was Latina and had no identification.

"Mister Rogers, who is the person in your vehicle?"

"My girlfriend. She's getting dressed. You surprised us. Is sex on the beach a crime or misdemeanor here?" Steve asked in a deliberate attempt to mislead their line of questioning.

"Only if you get caught, or if you damage the dune ecosystem. That's not really our jurisdiction," Carlisle smiled just a little, "Sir, we picked up on a strange object in the backseat of your truck. We need to investigate."

"That would be my shield. You want me to get it for you?" Steve offered.

These guys were making it too easy on him, but it didn't seem like things were going to get interesting. He'd get the shield, but he didn't think he'd need it.

"Your shield? What kind of shield?" Carlisle asked, and then he went quiet again.

Steve could hear a raised, incredulous voice over the comm, and Carlisle winced at the volume, as did the other two agents. Steve chuckled. Someone had just put together the information from his identification and informed the agents who he was.

"That kind of shield," Steve said with a smile.

"Captain?" Carlisle asked.

"Keep it quiet. We're on vacation. If word gets out, I'll have to deal with fans and crowds. I'd rather not," Steve said.

"Certainly, Sir. Captain. Can we still see the shield? It's vibranium, right? The scanner was going crazy. We've never seen anything like it," Carlisle said in a more relaxed Texas accent.

"Sir is fine. Or Steve. I'll get it for you," he said.

He had to keep a tight leash on his tongue to keep from playfully copying Carlisle's accent. He had a fingernail thin grip on his morning happiness, until he realized he couldn't make himself turn his back on these guys.

Steve didn't fully trust anyone with federal or international ID anymore, despite how safe a situation seemed. He turned aside as he walked to the rear door of the truck under the pretense of talking to them.

"Is it safe for my girl around here? What kind of activity do you see?" he asked the agents.

"Drugs. Some border crossing, but that's mostly inland. Some minor sex trafficking. We load out different agencies to handle it all," Carlisle said conversationally.

"Interagency cooperation. That's nice to see. With communication and detection tech nowadays, your job must be a lot easier than it used to be," Steve said in return.

He kept his movements smooth and visible. Internally, he was dismayed at how concerned he was about Estrella being here with him. He didn't want her involved in any work-related things at all, and this was bordering on it. It was enough to make him grumpy, and he needed to avoid that. He made eye contact with Estrella as she was putting on her necklace and slipping on her flip flops. His shield slid out of his satchel and he gave her a stay-put hand signal.

His fingertips gripped the shield loosely as he carried it in almost a lazy dangle back to Carlisle. They couldn't know that it was one of his most effective grips for close-contact use. The senior agent looked googly-eyed to see the shield. The junior agent wasn't as impressed, and the female junior agent had eyes for his skin, now that they weren't worried about him being a bad guy anymore. It was unprofessional of her, but Steve ignored it.

"How did it look on your scanner?" Steve asked.
"Bright white, even more than titanium," Carlisle said with awe in his tone.

Steve handed his shield to Carlisle, and the man nearly dropped it, he was so fan-struck.

"Go on. You can't hurt it," Steve said.

Carlisle groped the shield and Steve made a slightly apologetic face to the male junior agent for having to humor his senior's moment of distraction. He tried to reel in his cynicism. These were regulars. They weren't used to dealing with the outlandish things Steve had been exposed to. He occasionally had to remind himself that common folks were going to be a little boggled, even if they were in a position of authority.

"Do you want ID on my girlfriend? I think she's dressed now," Steve offered dryly.

"That won't be necessary, Captain. Sir. Sorry," Carlisle stammered. He handed the shield back.

Steve automatically sheathed his arm into it. The move was quick, aggressive, and natural as breathing to him. The agents startled.

"I apologize. Muscle memory. I didn't mean to make you nervous," Steve said.

He really hadn't, but he was secretly pleased now that he had. He was quietly simmering into anger that he and Estrella's pleasant morning had been interrupted. Something of that must have shown, because the agents began to wrap up their time. Carlisle made a gesture to the pilot and the helicopter began to spin up again.

"That's alright, Sir. It sure was nice to meet you," Carlisle said.

Steve shook his hand.

"I wish I could say the same, but I'd like to get back to my girlfriend and my morning," Steve told them.

"Sorry, Sir. We'll stay out of your hair," Carlisle called over the noise of the aircraft.

"I'd appreciate that," Steve said.

He waved goodbye to them briefly as they lifted off. As soon as the blown sand was settled and the sound of the chopper retreated, Steve tossed his keys in to Estrella so she could start the truck.

"Get the air conditioner going, please. I want to cool off after I shower," he said. She nodded and crawled over into the front seat.

They said they'd stay out of his hair. He took them at their word. He got clean shorts from his bag, then he showered the sweat and sand and semen of the morning off of himself. He rarely let anger get the best of him, and he didn't now. A few harsh strokes of his hands as he was soaping up was all he allowed.

They had one clean dry bath towel left. He scrubbed dry, then got into his clean boxer briefs. He tugged the shower bag over and rinsed his feet, then got behind the driver's wheel and shut himself inside the cab. Estrella perched nervously beside him on the front seat and ducked down so he could pass the shield over her and into the back.

"Any trouble?" she asked.

"No. Not this time. I was able to talk us through it. You need papers. Identification. I'm calling your aunt. She might have something to prove your citizenship. What time is it?” he asked absently, and looked at the clock in the dash. It was still pretty early, but people should be getting up for a Monday morning.

"Wait," Estrella said when he touched his phone screen to select Alberto and Rita's contact information.

He paused and looked at her.

"What if I don't want papers?” she asked.

"Then don't keep them, but I want something with us for now. If anyone tries to detain you, I'm afraid I wouldn't be very patient with them," Steve bit out.

"I know. I saw. You were thinking way too hard. It's a good thing they don't know you, or they'd have acted stupid. If they try to take me, you let me go. Don't get yourself into trouble," she said.

Steve laughed humorlessly.

"I'm serious. I'll be alright. I always am. Jarvis and Natasha can get me out later," Estrella insisted.

"I'm not letting anyone detain you. Not for a minute. They'd take your necklace. It's standard procedure to remove personal items like jewelry. We need to be thinking subcutaneous," Steve said and looked at her neck speculatively.

"Steve, stop it! You're freaking over nothing! I'm not letting anybody put anything under my skin. Not to stay there like a thing. Not even Jarvis. I don't want to be tracked, and that kind of stuff is trackable. Like papers. As soon as I have papers, I'm on the map again. I don't want them," she denied.

"You need them, this close to the border. We can issue you an alternate ID, but that takes time. Until then, I want papers for you. I don't want to kill anyone, Eya. Please. Not on vacation," he said.

What scared her is that she could see in his eyes that he would. Maybe only in an extreme circumstance, and only if he was forced to, but he would. The air conditioner sounded loud in the truck while she contemplated that this was a man who didn't make empty threats. Lying and bluffing weren't his style. If he said he was going to keep her out of any kind of custody at any cost, and the papers would help him to do that non-lethally, then she had little choice. She didn't want him to have blood on his hands because of her.

"Okay, but I'll do what I want with them when this is over. Call her," Estrella said.

Steve pulled Estrella into a brief, tight hug. Then he finished making his phone call.

"Alberto. It's Steve. Good morning. I saw an INS helicopter, and thought it would be good to have some kind of papers for Estrella. Do you know if Rita is keeping anything for her?"

Estrella heard her uncle's gruff voice, and then Rita came on the phone. She wanted to take the phone and do the talking, but Steve's calm business-like tone would probably get it done with less fuss and chatter. The phone was handed off yet again, and Estrella smiled to hear Val's voice chattering excitedly.

"Put it on speaker. On speaker!" Estrella insisted.
She grabbed at Steve's phone, and he gave it to her. In a moment, they both could hear Valeria clearly.

"Where's Eya? Tell her-"

"I'm here, Val. What's so exciting?"

"Ma is taking me to school this morning, and she's going back to work! Well, she's going to go put in job applications, anyway. She says she's been out of the workforce too long, but I don't think so. It's only been a year and a half. I'll get to see 'Drea again. I hope that bitch didn't sell my jacket," Val said in a happy rush.

"Valeria! That's good news, but don't talk like that in front of Steve," Estrella said.

"Hey, Steve was Army. Steve's heard a lot worse than that. But yeah, Valeria, don't talk like that. You're a lady," Steve said with a smile.

"Oooh, he's so old fashioned!" Val said with a tone somewhere between complaint and adoration.

"It's called 'charming.' And he wasn't very charming when the INS helicopter landed. Does your ma have any papers on me? I don't want him to get himself in trouble trying to keep me away from Immigration," Estrella said.

"The helicopter landed? Weren't you scared? Did they have guns and everything? Why didn't they get you if you don't have papers?" Val wanted to know.

"Because Steve is the biggest white guy ever. They never even saw me. I stayed in the truck and he said I was his girlfriend and they were like 'whatever.' The top guy was drooling to see Captain America's shield. They didn't care about me," Estrella gave a shrug and a hand wave powerful enough to probably be heard over the phone.

Steve smiled at her. Just like a Texas accent crept up on him when he heard a good one, Estrella's Latina accent got a little richer when she spoke candidly to her cousin. Rita shooed her daughter away from the phone, with much protesting.

"Put it on speaker! I want to hear them," they heard Val complain.

"You mean you want to hear him. There's no speaker on the house phone. Go away," Rita said.

Steve chuckled. Estrella's family was doing a good job at winding him down from the unpleasantness of having to entertain agents on his vacation.

"I have your birth certificate, and two papers from your church, some report cards from school, and a photo ID from your high school. Is that enough?" Rita asked.

Estrella shrugged and looked to Steve. He nodded.

"Steve thinks so," Estrella said.

"Then why didn't Steve say so?" Rita asked.

"Because I didn't want to interrupt, Ma'am," Steve said.

He was afraid his 'Ma'am' would forevermore be twanged with Texas. He couldn't seem to help it. It's not that it was such a big word to make a noticeable difference in the sound of it, but Estrella looked at him funny.
"You're a good young man. Do you want me to mail them to you or something?" Rita asked.

"I don't want to wait that long. Anything could happen. Will anyone be home for us to come pick them up?" Steve asked.

"When?" Rita asked.

"In a half hour?"

"You just met us last night, niño. You can't stay away?" Rita teased him.

"I'm sorry, Ma'am. You're irresistible," Steve said.

There was a silence on the other end of the line.

"It's that and Alberto's steaks. Are there any leftovers?" Steve asked hopefully.

"Aww. You come. We'll be here for an hour, but no longer. Don't you get stopped for speeding, with no papers for Estrella," Rita warned.

"We'll see you then," Steve said.

Rita laughed, then the phone went dead. Steve put his phone away and stared uncomfortably at the gearshift of the truck.

"What was that?" Estrella asked lightly.

"I have no idea. It just kind of came out. It's this Texas… thing," Steve said helplessly.

Estrella laughed. He looked shy, as if he hadn't meant to flirt with Aunt Rita at all, and was horrified he'd accidentally done so. It was a much better look than the mildly murderous one he'd been wearing after the INS agents left.

"You don't have any shoes, and the lawn chairs and the stove and the shower are still out. We can't leave like this," Estrella pointed out.

"I'll get it," he said, and he moved to get out.

"No. I'll do it. I'm wearing the right kind of shoes for this. Stay here and enjoy the cool air," she told him.

Steve didn't like it, but he had to let her have her way sometimes. He was forcing her to take the papers from her aunt, so if it made her feel better to put up camp for him, it's the least he could do. He kept a sharp eye on the mirrors.

While he watched her move around stowing things, he had a moment to think. The last twenty-eight minutes had been pretty wild. The sex part, anyway. She'd gotten him off with her voice. She'd gotten inside his head and fucked his brain. That was powerful stuff. A belated tremor, a lingering wisp of ecstasy flitted through his mind like a lingering scent.

There was no denying what had happened, but she didn't have to know exactly how it was, how powerless he'd been to stop it from happening. He trusted her now, but if things ever went bad she could use it against him. He'd have to work harder to resist her voice. He didn't want to because she made him feel really good, but he needed to.

Estrella finally got into the truck with his socks and boots. Taking his socks and boots made him realize that he was sitting around in his underwear.

"I'm sorry, Eya. I'm not being very considerate. My mother taught me better," he said.

"Are you kidding me? I don't mind. We can only do this kind of thing now, while we're here. We may as well relax while we can. It's not like you could sit around in your underwear on the roof patio at Avengers tower. And I wouldn't want to get sand in the polar bear rug," she said.

She twiddled her gritty toes in her flip-flops.

"I don't think that's a bear skin. Did you notice the size of it?" Steve said as he hurried into a clean pair of jeans, a button down shirt, and his socks.

Estrella watched with interest while he arched and contorted to tuck in his shirt, then stomped his feet into his boots.

"Then what is it?" she wondered absently.

"You should ask Thor. I think he killed it a long time ago," he told her.

"I've been walking on an alien elephant hide?" she wondered.

"Probably nothing so tame as an elephant, but it looks about that size. Don't you want to talk about this?" he asked as he buckled his belt and shoved his wallet in his pocket.

He didn't like that his sidearm was way in the back, but at least he had his shield handy. He got them moving from the beach. He went faster than last night. Their tracks were still there, and he knew the truck could handle it now.

"Talk about your driving?" Estrella asked as they bumped along.

She sounded worried but tolerant as she gripped the armrest on the door and the handle on the dash. Yeah, the ride was rough, but they had a schedule to meet. Steve thought it was fun, and nobody was in danger.

"My driving is fine. I'm a great driver. You wouldn't believe some of the things I've driven. Or piloted. No, Eya. I mean don't you want to talk about you talking me into orgasm," he said.

"Why did that happen? Nobody's done that before. What did it feel like?" she asked quietly.

He knew she wouldn't have brought it up if he hadn't insisted on it. She was shy about some things, and he got the feeling it wasn't because she was naturally shy so much as because she wasn't used to having any kind of positive dealings with men and sex. She wasn't used to being in control.

"Have you ever had a sex dream? One that did that to you?" he asked.

"I think so. A long time ago," she said.

"It was like that, but I was awake. I think it happened because I wasn't fighting the reaction to your voice this time. I was welcoming it. Taking it in. It made the effect much stronger. We can try again later, because I want to be able to listen to you if you talk without a voice modulator. It could be important someday," he said.

"There you go again. Everything's about tactics and potential danger. Do we have to turn over every single stone we come across? And do you have to drive so fast?" she asked.
"Yes. This is me, Eya. Life has made me this way. I don't like to leave fears and potential hazards unaddressed. Part of me is still going to be this way, even on vacation," he told her.

"Natasha told me I was going on vacation with the Captain. I should have known she'd be right," Estrella said.

"Leave off it. I'm the Captain sometimes even when I'm Steve. You're that scruffy, tough street girl sometimes even when you're my Eya. Can we live with that?" he asked.

She looked at him, so confidently driving the truck over rough terrain as if he was pushing a baby stroller in the mall. At the same time, he wanted to talk about sex and their relationship. He liked football and firearms, too. And her grumpy uncle.

"I think we can live with it," she agreed.

"Good. Just so you know, I'm feeling a little disadvantaged here. I don't have any specialty that can top that," he grinned across at her in the brief moment that he took his eyes off the road.

His smile slipped when he saw that she wasn't happy about something.

"Eya?" he asked.

"I don't want to have a specialty! You and your friends think that being weird or enhanced or gifted or whatever you call it is- is great. I don't. Not for me. I want to be normal, Steve. I wanted to be a teacher. How can I be a teacher like this?" Estrella asked.

She waved a hand at her throat.

They pulled out of the park gates and got onto the highway to get to town. Steve mulled through her words and tried to choose the right part to respond to. If being normal was her dream, then how was a life with him going to make her happy? Was she only settling for him because she didn't have any better, more normal options? For the first twenty-something years of his life, he'd been sub-normal. Then, he'd passed up normal on his way to super. Either way, not being normal was pretty much the same feeling, on either end of the spectrum. He decided to not be so defensive.

"Don't give up. You're young. You can be a teacher. There are plenty of pretty teachers. With your necklace, you can do that. If you didn't finish school, you can go back and-" he tried to encourage her.

"Just stop. You don't understand," she said morosely.

She was looking out her window and he got the feeling that she wanted some space.

"Alright," Steve agreed quietly.

It was in his nature to fight and to not give up on things. Right now, Estrella wasn't ready for that fight. He imagined himself as a kid, on one of those days when he couldn't get out of bed. One of those days when he could barely breathe and his lips were cold and blue, and his ma dithered over him and worried. There wasn't any fight on days like that, beyond the struggle for his next breath. Maybe Estrella felt like that sometimes, he guessed. She needed time to recover, time to realize she was strong enough now to fight when she wanted to. He decided it was his job to support her until she was ready to follow her dreams, if she ever was.

Again, a grinding, useless anger rose inside him against those men who had hurt her. It wouldn't help her future, but he wished he could avenge her past. He consoled himself with the thought that at least he might get to spend her present and her future with her.

While they spent the last few minutes getting to Alberto and Rita's place, Steve hopefully rested his hand on the seat in the empty space between them. She didn't seem to notice.

"I don't want to be a drug for you. I don't want to be a party trick," she finally said as they pulled up curbside where they'd parked yesterday.

"I hear you, Eya. People see me like a party trick most of the time, too. It's useful every now and then, like when an immigration agent needs distracting from my girlfriend, or when I don't have anything to talk about at charity events. They always want to talk about the past, or they want to crawl straight in bed with me because of this body. They don't even know me. Hell, Eya, I don't know if I know me," he said in the quiet after he parked the truck.

"I don't think I know me, either. There hasn't been any time to do anything but stay alive," she said.

"I guess we're good at that, at least," Steve pointed out.

Estrella finally looked at him and smiled a little. They got out of the truck and went to the house. Alberto opened the door for them, then went back to polishing his shoes in front of the television. Valeria gave Steve one sparkly fangirl smile, then rushed Estrella off to wherever Rita was this morning.

Steve sat down in front of the television with Alberto. The man was getting ready for work. His deputy's uniform was crisp and he was making sure his shoes were spotless.

"I didn't know you were a deputy. That's a tough job," Steve said.

Alberto snorted a little, and looked at Steve like he was being patronizing.

"I'm just a court bailiff," Alberto told him.

Steve was going to say something, but he was distracted by the morning news.

"An explosion of homicides in a California federal prison over the weekend has officials boggled and scrambling for an explanation. Details are sketchy, as the investigation is ongoing, but so far, rival prison gangs are denying involvement in the death of sixteen inmates, most of them suspected to be members of the Mexican Mafia..." the news anchor said.

"It couldn't happen to better people," Alberto said dryly.

Steve held his tongue on that comment, and the news blurb went on.

"...are unusual because of the nature of the homicides, and the frankly disturbing level of timed coordination these attacks had with unexplained surveillance gaps in the prison security systems. Federal officials are not saying much about suspects, but gang activity is strongly implicated, and possibly even corruption and bribery among prison guards. More on this as the investigation continues..."

Alberto paused in his shoe polishing and grunted.

"What? Does that mean something?" Steve asked him.

"It's bullshit. If the Brotherhood or the Guerrillas or La Familia was behind it, they'd be claiming it. The Feds don't know what's happening," Alberto said.
It was Steve's turn to grunt. He wasn't familiar with modern gangs or the prison system. Organized crime had meant a completely different thing back in the day than it did now, but he suspected the motives were still the same. The promise of illicit cash and personal power was a strong draw for some.

Steve shook off the thought that what Hydra was doing in the nation's political system was just a white-collar version of mafia corruption. Those thoughts were for later. He was supposed to be on leave. These prison homicides weren't likely related to Hydra, anyway. It wasn't like them to target Latinos because… well, that thought wasn't very nice. Steve frowned until he heard Estrella's voice approaching.

Rita, Valeria, and Estrella came into the living room and Alberto changed the channel to a pleasant morning talk show. Steve stood up to go see what Estrella had. Valeria distracted him by slipping her hand inside his elbow. He automatically adjusted to the grip by offering his arm because his ma had taught him how to escort a lady, and he'd be happy to treat Valeria like one.

"I'm glad you came when you did. I've only missed the first part of the year. It's not too late for me to catch up. I didn't think I'd be able to go to school or graduate," Val smiled hugely at him.

"I'm glad too, but you be careful with that. If it comes off, you're unprotected. Don't play around," Steve said.

Valeria looked taken aback at Steve's stern instructions, but then he had to restrain himself from making a face the moment the girl took his words as 'Captain America' orders. He could see the mental shift in her body language. One moment she was let down that he wasn't being cheerful and chummy, and then she was all puffed up that he'd given her advice. He looked to Estrella, and she was wearing a bemused look too.

"What he means is don't be stupid. Don't run your mouth all day. You still have to be careful when boys are around," Estrella told Val.

"Okay, okay! And I guess I can't tell anyone that you're dating him? Or that I even met him?" Val said with sour attitude to Estrella.

"I'd be in your debt if you could keep it quiet," Steve said to the kid with a moderate amount of schoolboy charm.

Valeria patted his arm and looked up at him with mooncalf devotion.

"Enough of that. Did you pack your lunch? Go get in the car!" Rita demanded when Valeria indicated her lunch bag.

The large woman kissed Estrella on the cheek and mashed her face on the other side.

"Don't be a stranger anymore. You can call us. And Fran. Wish me luck!" Rita said.

She went over to hug Alberto, and then she was out the door. Alberto waved them off, and Steve and Estrella went back to the truck. Valeria waved happily to them as her mother's car pulled away in front of them.

"What did ya get?" Steve asked.

Estrella put a folder of papers on the seat between them. She watched the school bus that passed around them rather than looking at him.
"You don't want me to look," Steve said.

"No, you can look. I don't want to. You wanted them. You keep them," she said.

Steve pressed his lips closed on the sigh that wanted to come out. Estrella's behavior was distinctly that of the secretive, defensive girl he'd first met. He waited her out until she glanced over at him.

"Please? I've been dyin' to know more about you," he said hopefully.

"Go on, then," she said, and waved at the folder.

Steve wanted to see what was in the folder more for his own personal curiosity than for any kind of useful information. All he had of his girl was her first name. He could hardly wait to see what else there was.

Estrella finally smiled at his restrained eagerness.

Steve snatched up the folder and opened it. A plastic photo ID with a little metal clip on it slid into his lap, and he caught it up to look at it.

"Ugh. That. They always took the worst pictures!" Estrella said of her freshman year school ID.

She was tempted to take it before Steve could get a good look, but he was wearing the goofiest smile. He looked to her and actually blushed.

"Steve!"

"What? You were darling. If I'da known you then- I mean, if I was fourteen when you were fourteen, I woulda- Um,..." his words trailed off awkwardly, and it looked like he sort of tried to hide behind his shoulders.

Estrella laughed.

"You would have...?," she teased him.

"I would have talked to you. You might have turned your nose up at me, but I would have tried," Steve said.

Estrella scooted across the seat to him and knelt up to hug his face to her chest. He would have been a precious little gentleman and she would have loved him, she'd like to think. Steve muffled a laugh and huffed hot breath through her shirt.

"I wouldn't have been _that_ short," he said in a way that let her know he knew what she was thinking.

Estrella pulled away and sat on her heels next to him. She leaned against his shoulder and waited for him to look at the paper on top of the thin stack.

"You made really good grades," he commented as he flipped past the three report cards.

"I had to. My mother would accept no less. I didn't mind. I liked school," she told him.

She didn't mind seeing the papers, now. It was more like a fond remembrance of the part of her childhood before things went wrong. There was her birth certificate, likely the most important thing they would need if there was any trouble with Immigration.
"Sofi," Steve said with quiet wonder.

He looked at her and nodded once.

"What?" she asked.

"It fits. I like it," he said.

"Thank goodness I've got a short second name, because the rest of it's not," she commented.

Estrella Sofi Fernandez Silva.

She hadn't lied about her age. He looked at her parent's names but didn't comment. He flipped the page over.

"You're Catholic," Steve said.

Estrella nodded.

Her first communion certificate and her baptismal certificate showed the same church and the same priest.

Steve's feelings and thoughts raced ahead, and he tried to pull them back, but they'd rushed off on their own. Estrella Sofi Fernandez-Rogers. They could get married in the church. He bit his tongue to have something to distract himself from smiling and stammering anymore. He couldn't help that his face got red again.

Estrella was staring at him and his reaction to her certificates. It was awfully presumptuous, what he was thinking. She was sitting there wondering why he was turning seven shades of crimson, and he couldn't stop himself from wondering what she would look like in a white dress, and what it would be like to come home to her every day. What it would feel like to… Heat flushed down his front all the way to his groin.

The folder bent itself closed as he twisted his body to hug her and hide his face in her hair. Estrella made a surprised noise. She petted his shoulder with one hand, and curled her fingers into his beard under his chin with the other hand.

"It matters that much what church I went to?" she asked.

"I didn't think it would, but I guess it does. If you're still…?" he asked hesitantly.

"Still Catholic? I guess I must be. I only ever stopped going because the last time I went to church by myself wasn't good. What happened after wasn't good," she said.

Steve kept his face down and his mouth shut. All of the things he was thinking were too much. He'd make things awkward if he said anything more, so he didn't. He loved the feel of her hands on him, but they couldn't stay parked beside her family's house all day.

"I hope I didn't make you feel picked over, looking through your papers," he finally said when he could make himself sit up straight.

"I'm fine. It wasn't bad like I thought. You can keep them here, and maybe we won't need them," she said.

Estrella took the folder and turned to put it in his leather satchel with his shield and his uniform. Steve started the truck, and waited.
"Where are we going?" she asked him.

"I dunno. You wanna go to the water park? It looked fun on TripAdvisor," he said.

"I don't like being cold. Let's do something else first, and go to the water park this afternoon when it's hot. What else did you want to do?" she asked.

"The Lexington," he said as they pulled away from the curb.

"That big ship in the bay?" she asked.

"Yeah. It's a World War Two carrier. I'd like to see it," he said.

"Let's go. Then we can have lunch. It should be sunny and hot enough for the water park this afternoon," she said.

She wasn't very excited to tour the ship, but maybe it would be different than her fifth grade field trip with Steve at her side. Estrella was fascinated by how he seemed to change after they bought their tickets for the next tour of the Lexington. They walked out along the long pier to get aboard, where they were met by a really old man in slacks, a white shirt, and a hat with Navy insignia and pins all over it.

It was mostly older couples and a few small children with them and the tour guide. Steve was quiet and respectful while they listened to a brief history of the ship's construction and commissioning during the war. The old guy didn't seem like he'd be able to lead a tour up and down the deck of the huge ship, but he was spry and careful as he lead them past some roped off static displays on deck. The door was open for them to go in, and most people did, but the old guy waited by the door for everyone to get inside.

The ship was all gray and smelled like fresh oily paint cooking in the sun. There was a huge number sixteen on the side of the tower over the flight deck, and airplanes were roped off. Steve told her little facts about the aircraft quietly enough that only she could hear from their position at the lingering tail end of the tour group. She'd never remember the details of what he said, but he knew a lot about what he was looking at.

"Maybe you could lead this tour, and I could take a load off," the man suggested with a little smile as Steve escorted Estrella inside.

"No, Sir. I was Army. A ship tour belongs to a Sailor. Just a bit of a history buff," Steve said.

The tour guide looked at Steve funny for a moment before he spoke.

"Thank you for your service, son. I guess I'll lead on."

He stepped carefully over the doorway and moved to the head of the group in the mess while Steve stood and looked constipated. Estrella poked him to try to get the weird, pressurized look off his face.

Steve stepped closer to the group gathered around the low metal table. She looped her arm through his while he fingered the tray that was attached to the table as a display. The tour guide went on about life aboard ship, but Estrella was too distracted watching Steve to pay much attention.

There was an old looking radio back in a corner that played equally as old music. Steve stood rooted in place until he looked around at some of the black and white photos on the wall. He wandered over and towed her with him. The tour moved on slowly, and once again the guide waited for them.

"You alright, son?" the man asked.

Steve nodded once briskly and moved on.

Estrella felt several times that somebody should go help the old man down ladders or past a narrow spot, but his age-spotted, gnarled hands gripped doorways and rails with familiarity. He was slow, but sure. She wondered why Steve didn't help the guy out a few times, but he carefully ignored the man's obvious frailty.

When they came to the room where all the mapping and battle planning happened, Steve felt far distant from her though she was right next to him. The other tourists kept a polite distance from everything as if things around them were as fragile as their guide. Steve leaned his weight on the table and ran his fingers over a map as if he intended to do something with what he was seeing. He looked around at seemingly unrelated objects and areas in a way that soon had the tour guide distracted.

Steve pulled himself into a less handsy decorum when he noticed he was distracting the guide. At least he hadn't been fussed at for touching things like Estrella had been in fifth grade when she was bored. Her tour guide had been a prim middle aged woman, though. Maybe that made a difference. Their old man seemed to have all the time in the world.

The tour ended with a movie. Estrella watched the old black and white footage and looked to Steve. He smiled a few times when other people were watching intently or looking bored. He shook his head and blew out a frustrated breath once during a commentary about the movements of the Pacific fleet.

"What?" she whispered.

"Ask me later," he whispered back.

When the lights went up after the movie, the old man was waiting outside the theatre.

"Walt Hermann. The memory's not the like it used to be. Where do I know your face from?" he said and held a hand out to Steve.

"Steve Rogers. It's nice to meet you, Walt. My face has been all over, so there's no telling. I sold some war bonds until they let me do some real work. Served until I went down in '45. You were in the Pacific, and I was in Europe, so I doubt we ever met unless you're from Brooklyn. You probably saw a poster or one of the films," Steve said.

Walt stared at him until his eyes got watery. He shuffled backward a few steps and groped for a chair. Steve squatted down and carefully took the guy's wrist in hand. Estrella stood behind his shoulder and felt bad to intrude on the old man's temporary loss of composure.

"I shoulda known," Walt said, and he pulled his wrist from Steve to shake a finger at him slowly.

"How could you know?" Steve asked, just to make conversation while the man calmed down.

He pulled up a chair for Estrella, then got one for himself. They sat and Steve gave the man his undivided attention.

"You knew how to read the map. You knew where the alarm panel was and what it's like in an op center when things are hot, and you knew the words to the songs on the radio. You had that look,
"like the Admiral pissed in your Wheaties," Walt said.

"He didn't piss in mine. I had my own CO for that. And who're you calling 'son', anyway? I'm probably older than you are," Steve joked.

"You are, by three years. Geez, Rogers, it blows my socks off to meet ya. Look at you. I shouldn't gone stood in my freezer," Walt said.

Steve laughed.

"Nah, being on ice isn't all it's cracked up to be. I coulda done without it," Steve said.

"Yeah, but my Florence hasn't looked like that in sixty years," Walt said with a smile for Estrella.

"Hey, now. You can't have my girl," Steve said with humor in his challenge.

"I wouldn't dream of it. Florrie's the one for me. She's up a-waiting for me, but I can't seem to get around to dying," Walt said.

"I know how ya feel," Steve said.

"Steve! You don't get to die yet. Don't talk like that," Estrella fussed.

He reached back and held her hand. He gave it a slight squeeze. She understood that he was just making conversation with the man, but it was disturbing to hear them talk about death that way. She shivered. She'd never seen quite so blatant a reminder that Steve was actually an old guy.

"You wanna go see your Florence, then? What's stopping ya?" Steve asked.

"I don't know. I thought I had something to do here, but nobody cares," Walt grumped.

"I care, and I'm not the only one. I've got this. I'll hold things together and remind folks. Like my girl said, I'm not allowed to go yet. She might be my Florence. I just met her a few months ago, so I gotta be around for a while," Steve told him.

"And you didn't kick hind-end quite like you thought you did. You've got work to do, Rogers," Walt said.

"Ouch," Steve winced.

"Eh, I've got every confidence in ya. You'll get it done," Walt said.

"It seems endless sometimes," Steve said.

"It is, and it always will be. You just gotta keep fighting it so it doesn't get any worse. Not on our watch," the old man said.

Steve nodded. Estrella couldn't see his face, but Walt could. He looked at Steve sympathetically from inside his wrinkles and his faded brown eyes.

"You get tired," Walt said.

"Well, don't let 'em run you around forever. A man's not meant to serve as long as you have. Train up some younger ones and pass it on," Walt advised.
"I think I'll take your advice. Someday," Steve said.

"Are you on leave? Is that why you're in my neck of the woods? Or should I keep an eye on the news and be ready to run?" Walt asked.

"I've got leave. It took me being my own boss to make it happen, but here I am. It's nice around here," Steve said.

"It's not that nice. Quit lookin at my old ugly face and get outta here. Go make some time with your girl," Walt told him.

"Alright. You don't have to tell me twice. Thanks for the tour," Steve told him.

"Thanks for what you do, Captain. Hey, you shouldn't be a captain anymore. It's been too long," Walt said testily as Steve stood and started to go.

"Shh. Not everybody realizes that. Besides, I'm retired," Steve said with a conspiratorial wink.

Walt smiled and nodded.

"What was that about? You're not a Captain?" Estrella asked on the way to the truck.

"I haven't been a captain for a long time, but that's what everyone is used to calling me. It's easier to let it sit how it is," Steve told her.

The sun was radiating off the dark deck, the pier, and parking lot. The inside of the truck was sweltering.

"Then what are you?" Estrella asked.

"I'm a special consultant. And retired," Steve said in a careful way that let her know there was more to that story.

"I have an honorary title. They say it's real, but I know who holds the reins. They'll never call me in for it. They wouldn't want to be under me. I don't wanna talk about that, anyway. Can you get us directions to lunch?" Steve asked briskly.

Estrella let the subject drop. Someday she wanted to know whatever he wasn't telling her, but not now.

Steve cranked up the air conditioner and the radio. He had a strange look about him, somewhere between sad and angry, so she left him alone. The radio station he chose was loud and modern. He was distant while they found a fast place to eat, and until they parked outside the water park. They put together a small backpack of their swimsuits and towels. Estrella zipped up her suitcase and handed her modest green swimsuit to Steve to add to their bag. He put it in with his while he stood in the parking lot.

"I really am that old," Steve said quietly.

"No, you're not. You're kind of like a movie that was on pause. Everybody walked away from your story, especially you, but now you're back and it's time to play again. It's time to live some more, Steve. You're not even halfway done. You've still got the best parts ahead of you, so come on," she said with firm conviction.

Steve gave her a mule-stubborn look as she tried to hurry him along to go have fun. She stood beside him as he closed and locked the truck. The water park didn't open until two o'clock, and other people were just starting to arrive in the parking lot. There was no rush to get to the ticket window, but she wanted to shake Steve loose from the grip of his unhappiness.

"I know it matters. I know that what happened to you is messed up, but you can't be sad and angry all the time. It's not like I'm saying 'Get over it,' because I know it's not that easy. I'm trying to tell you that it's okay to set it down and walk away from it for a little while. Look at me. I've been raped and strangled and beaten repeatedly, but am I holding a grudge? No, because my crazy boyfriend thinks I should take care of myself and try to have some kind of a life. Come on, Steve," she complained, and pulled at his hand that wasn't tucked into the shoulder strap of their pack.

He stood there looking like a whole lot of pouty, defiant little boy. It was beyond strange to see the noble Steve Rogers looking grumpy and selfish, but there he was. Estrella was hurting for his misery, but secretly pleased that he was showing her how he really felt about things. Back in New York, he was always genuine, but he held himself in reserve. He tamped down his feelings for the sake of the greater good. Estrella thought it was healthier to let it out some, and she felt privileged that he trusted her enough to let her see him.

"What if I don't wanna get over it? What if I wanna hold a grudge? What if I want to find em all and tear them down, and then go after the ones who hurt you, too? Where's the room for fun and happy in all that?" he asked.

"Then you do all that. But you don't do it on vacation! There's plenty of time to be mad later. Do I have to give you a blow job right here in the parking lot?" she threatened him.

Steve looked startled and confused, as if he hadn't heard her right, but she took advantage of his gentleness with her to bully him back against the truck. She pushed at him and his back thumped against the truck window. Estrella batted his evasive hand aside and pushed her fingers under the tails of his shirt to get to his belt buckle.

"Eya! We're in public!" he gasped out and looked around.

The palm trees in the landscaping waved in the slight breeze, and the people walking toward the ticket window didn't pay them much attention.

Estrella grinned up at him with naughty intent as she pressed close to his hard belly. Her fingers tugged at his belt buckle and brushed against the sensitive skin under his navel. She tickled her fingers through the fine hairs there. Steve went wide-eyed and cautious as he looked around at their surroundings and tried to pretend that his girl wasn't getting awfully fresh with him in front of everyone.

"Oh, Steve, you're so old. Look at this!" she said with thick, dry sarcasm.

She lifted his free hand and glided the pads of her fingers over his vibrant, healthy skin and the strong, hard-hitting bones of his hand.

"Your skin is so thin and papery," she ran her fingers over the toughened callouses from using his shield. Her other hand pinched and tugged at the supple, taut skin above the waistband of his pants.

"You're so weak and fragile," she complained with a twinkle in her eyes as she scratched her fingers up his belly and chest so that his body contracted hard enough in response to jostle both her and the truck.
"All you do is take naps and gum your food," she curled her lip with a teasing smirk as she grabbed a full, hard bicep in one hand and clunked his head back against the truck by shoving a finger into his mouth and poking hard at the edge of one of his strong white teeth.

Steve chuckled weakly. Her sly little game was proving her point, of course, but it felt good. Nobody touched him like she did. She wasn't afraid to push him and get in his space, but she wasn't done yet.

"You're not even interested in women anymore, and you probably couldn't get it up to do anything about it if you caught one," she sneered, and then giggled.

She brushed his slick tongue with her fingertip, then slipped it up under his shirt again to lazily circle one nipple, around and around. Steve gasped and jerked again, but her hand was already gone down his front before he could grab at her. His cock was full and hard at her teasing, pressed down the leg of his pants. Her hand glided over it, and he jerked again when she lightly pinched at his tip through the fabric.

"Unh," he breathed, part in eagerness, part in denial.

"All those lies you tell yourself, old man, but if you're still not convinced, I could blow you. Right here," she whispered.

She licked at her lips in eagerness and began to lower herself to her knees while she stared hotly into his eyes.

"No!" Steve said, almost too late to keep this anywhere near decent for a public, family-friendly setting.

The desire for her to do exactly what she threatened burned in him, but it wouldn't be decent. He urged her to stand up straight, and he got himself properly upright too. He cleared his throat and tugged his shirt down in the front.

She was right. He wasn't feeling old anymore. Just eager for her touch. Those old things that made him angry and frustrated could wait their turn. By God, he had a girl, and he intended to enjoy her! And she was more than that. She was a damned good friend to play him like this when he needed it. What the hell had he been thinking? It was a shameful waste of time to dwell on that dusty old crap when he could be with Estrella instead.

Estrella grabbed him by the hand and easily pulled him along behind her toward the ticket window. Steve didn't trust himself to talk to the lady behind the counter, so he let Estrella pull his wallet from his back pocket and hand over his debit card. The woman raised her eyebrow at him in question, and Steve cleared his throat again and nodded for her to go on and process the transaction. He was glad it was a high countertop and he was hidden below the waist. What was he going to do when they got inside and it was time to change into his swimsuit?

Estrella's hand soothed down his arm after she pushed his wallet back into his pocket. She extended her arm to have her neon yellow rip-stop paper bracelet affixed, and Steve did the same. They went inside the gates and she tugged him into the locker rental area. She paid cash for their locker, and Steve's skin distracted him too much to pay attention to the exorbitant locker fee, especially his left nipple, which still felt cool and wet and incredibly sensitive.

She led them to the changing rooms and took her swimsuit from their bag. Steve held the bag so she could dig in it.
"You're gonna have to meet me right at the men's entrance," Steve grumbled in embarrassment.

There were older high school kids running around gleefully, and moms with young kids, and a few older people, and the park staff, all moving around randomly. He had no way to hide what she'd caused unless she helped him.

"Okay," Estrella agreed.

In the changing room, Estrella decided that she could do without the cover-ups Natasha had lent her to go over the green one piece swimsuit. She was trying to convince Steve that he wasn't really old, so she didn't want to dodder around looking like an old lady with a shawl. She folded her clothes to stow in their locker and waited for Steve at the men's changing room.

It bothered her a little that the men and most of the older boys who came and went at the changing room looked at her. She lifted her chin and gave them the evil-eye and most of them hurried along. She knew that all she had to do was call for Steve if anyone started something and wouldn't leave her alone. One group of boys looked like they thought about it, but she narrowed her eyes at them even more and looked menacing. They mumbled something about her being a cold-ass bitch, but she didn't care, as long as they went away, and as long as Steve didn't hear them.

Finally, Steve emerged in his swim shorts and a white undershirt. He was barefoot, at least, and had his clothes clutched in front of him. She dragged him aside from the doorway and shook her head.

"No. No, no, no. Give me that shirt! Look around. Do you see anybody wearing shirts over their swimsuits?" she said flatly.

Steve sighed and she held their things while he removed his shirt and folded it neatly into his clothes pile. Estrella hurried to put their things into the locker, then she snapped the elastic key bangle onto his wrist.

Steve unzipped his debit card from his pocket and insisted on buying a pair of sunglasses, then Estrella hurried him off to the big red and white racing slide. Crowds were light, and they climbed the steps to the top and only had to wait a half minute before it was their turn to go down.

Some of the kids whooped on the way down, and one little girl squealed at the humps and the speed of the slide. Steve smiled as he heard Estrella laughing on the slide next to his. They splashed down at almost the same time. His mind did a quick rundown of the physics of the slide and why a lighter person might get to the bottom before he did, but he pushed the thoughts away and followed Estrella's happy feet as she hurried back up the stairs to the top of the slide.

She was wet and sparkly in the bright, hot sun, and he was glad to go around with her through the various waterslides. Some guys stared at Estrella for an instant too long. Steve tugged her to his side and tangled their fingers together while they waited their turn for the double tube slides.

"You doing okay?" she teased him.

He grinned and leaned down to talk in her ear.

"I am for now, but the fun's over if you get me all bothered again. It took me five minutes to look any kind of presentable in these shorts, and then you took my shirt. You'd better behave," he said.

"Okay. But what if it's not my fault?" Estrella wondered.

She cut her eyes up toward a group of five young women who were already turning and making eyes at Steve. He kissed her on the temple, then they took another few steps up the stairs.

"They're alright, but they're not you. I'm not that easy, doll," he said.

"You didn't even look at them!" Estrella pouted.

"Sure I did, two rides ago, and then by the lockers when we first came in," Steve grinned at her.

Estrella didn't know what to make of that, but she decided to be pleased with his honesty and with his refusal to pay any mind to the girls who were talking and giggling and obviously trying to get his attention.

Most people were trying to crowd to one side of the stairs and avoid standing in the sun, but Steve didn't. He turned his impressive shoulders to the heat and smiled behind his sunglasses. Estrella's brain went a little fuzzy at the sight of him and all she could do was smile back and sigh. The group of girls whispered furiously among themselves, then giggled louder.

Estrella's smile faltered a bit, but Steve shook his head and reached out to touch her cheek. The touch was brief, but effective.

"This is nothing. We hafta learn to ignore it. I'm glad you can't hear what they're saying, and I made a heroic effort to not beat those little punks outside the changing room who said rude things about you. The sun feels great. Do we have to go anywhere tomorrow? I wanna stay at the beach and try my surfboard," Steve said.

"Tomorrow's Tuesday. I don't have any plans," Estrella said as they went up the last steps for the waterslide.

"Good," Steve said with a sort of satisfaction that gave Estrella unexplained shivers.

They loaded into the double tube with Steve's legs around her. They laughed on the way down and Estrella loved the relaxed happiness of him as he guided them to the edge of the exit pool.

"Wanna go again?" he asked kindly.

"No. The line is getting too long. School is probably out now. Let's go to the lazy river," she said.

"Lazy river?" he wondered.

"My favorite part is the lazy river. Every water park has one. If I could, I'd go to them all. The one at this park is really tiny. I've heard that some water parks have lazy rivers almost a mile long," Estrella said happily.

She led him through increasing crowds, to a pool which had actual waves in it like a beach, and Steve was distracted by the sound of the machinery that made the artificial waves. Estrella tugged at his hand and guided him to a stack of inflated tubes. She smiled expectantly at him and he looked around. People were just sitting in or lying on the tubes, slowly moving around a long artificial creek. It didn't look very exciting.

Estrella hopped nimbly up onto her tube, and Steve chose to lie belly down over his. He folded his arms and propped his chin on them. It felt nice to stretch out and let his legs dangle. The little blue concrete creek was shallow enough that he could push along with his toes.

Kids laughed and barged along among the floating guests, and Steve began to see why Estrella liked the simple drift of this. It was relaxing. Estrella tugged her way up his body against the gentle current and grabbed hold of the back of his arm near his face. His tube bumped the wall, and he put a hand out to wrap around her bare ankle to keep their tubes together as they drifted along.

He'd wanted to touch her ankles for a long time. He stared at his hand wrapped securely around the pretty arch of bone, sinew, and golden skin. He adjusted his grip and wiggled his fingers for no reason at all, other than to feel her in his hand. Estrella chuckled with an edge of nervousness.

He looked up at her.

"I didn't know you liked ankles so much," she said.

Her foot kicked and splashed idly, and Steve resisted the urge to smooth his hand into a caress up her leg.

"I didn't know I did, either," he said.

Was he blushing again? He was! It was harder to tell in the bright sun, because it made him look sunburnt instead of bashful.

"It's only an ankle. What's so exciting?" she asked him.

"It's not only an ankle," he said, and he gripped harder and gave her a little jerk through the water toward him.

His meaning was immediately clear to her. She stilled her playful splashing. In hands as powerful as his, her ankle made a secure grip. He could open her up and the strength of her legs to resist wouldn't be enough to stop him. Estrella demurely pressed her legs together, but didn't try to get free of his hand.

"How can you make something simple into something dangerous?" she asked him.

"It always has been. There's a reason that ankles were uncovered only in art up until the last century. You wouldn't catch a nice girl showing them around before then. Modern man has managed to desensitize himself to the exposure, but I'm not immune yet, I guess," Steve told her.

"That's so Victorian," Estrella arched a judgmental eyebrow at him.

"Victorian is too limited a period. It's Victorian and everything before that. It goes all the way back to about here," Steve said, and lifted his hand from under his chin to rub at the base of his skull in the back.

"Oh," Estrella said, "so you think that modern man is teetering on a dangerous precipice with all these flashing ankles? Should there be a law against them?"

At her spunky smile, he slipped his hand down over the arch of her foot to tweak her big toe. He laughed when she splashed him over the back with water. The coolness felt good against his skin roasting in the sun.

"No. No more laws. I like ankles. You've got great ones. Why wouldn't I want to look at them? And touch them?" he asked.

"Oh. My. God!"

Estrella looked up at the footbridge that they were about to drift under. The girls they'd seen before paused there. Even Estrella with her unenhanced ears could hear them exclaiming among themselves over Steve's ass. Her face hardened into the gritty resolve to go do something about them ogling Steve like he was meat. She curled her body to stand from her tube and move to the nearby steps. Steve gripped her ankle again and pinned her immobile with a look.

"How many times am I gonna have to overhear guys talking about you? Do you think it's a good idea for me to go after every guy who speaks his mind a little too loud for my ears?" he asked.

Estrella gave the girls a cold stare, but they didn't notice because they were too busy looking down at Steve as they came out under the other side of the footbridge.

"Eya," Steve prompted her.

She shook her head reluctantly.

"I'm used to it. It's on them, not me, remember? They're the ones acting low class. See, we may be used to showing ourselves off now, but that doesn't mean we're free from the reaction it gets. Not all the old ways are bad ways, and not all the new ones are better," he said.

Estrella kept glaring at the rude girls until one of them noticed her. The girl laughed, and they all walked away.

"Now who's ruining the fun with a sour face?" Steve asked her.

"They are," she grumbled.

"Nah, we can't let them control us. Cut em some slack. My ass is pretty spectacular," Steve said so smooth and dry that it took her a moment to process what he'd said.

Her mouth fell open, she blinked rapidly, and Steve laughed at her shocked look.

"Bucky's right! You're a rotten little punk," she said with a one sided twist of a smile.

"Hardly ever," Steve denied.

Estrella pursed her lips at him in an attempt not to laugh at his overly innocent look, but then gave up.

"Nobody knows you!" she exclaimed.

"You're getting there," Steve said.

They drifted around and around the little loop for almost an hour. Steve was tempted to doze off and let Estrella keep watch because the sun warming his naked back felt good. He was burning, but his healing was working against it at about the same pace, which resulted in a fuzzy warm glowing feeling under his skin. It made him hungry.

They got out of their lazy tubes and went to the ice cream kiosk. Estrella had a caramel vanilla waffle cone, and Steve bought a Texas-sized banana split with every available topping.

"Jalapenos? Who puts jalapenos with ice cream? Are they pickled?" she asked with a grimace.

"They're fresh, not pickled. You wanna try? I wouldn't have thought so either, but it's really good," Steve said.

A big spoonful of cold vanilla along with a crispy little ring of hot pepper did amazing things with his taste buds. After ice cream, they rode the slides again. He thought they were fun, but nowhere near as thrilling as some folks seemed to think they were. Even the tall one with the straight drop was nothing compared to jumping out of a quinjet or off a helicarrier. He encouraged Estrella to brave the tall slide and she did with much coaxing.

At the bottom, he was waiting to help her up. Her legs were shaky, just like a new airman after his first jump. She was proud of herself for doing the biggest slide in the park, but still a little snippy at him for talking her into it.

"Aw, c'mon. That was nothing," Steve said.

Estrella looked like a shivering wet cat. He averted his eyes from how her breasts were small, perfect and perky. The plain dark green swimsuit was more provocative than some of the skimpier and fancier ones he was seeing around the park. It made no efforts to conceal her lovely figure, other than to paint it green and disguise some skin texture. Only some. Steve hugged her to him with one arm and said pleasant nothings into her ear about going swimming with Buck's family when he was a kid.

A man who'd been watching her as they walked shifted his gaze away under Steve's regard. Estrella led them to the lazy river again and this time they found a double tube. They sat side by side, facing opposite directions so that it was easy to talk.

"Is any of Bucky's family still alive?" Estrella asked.

"His youngest sister is, and several extended nieces and nephews. I'm sure Buck knows that. He can't go visit her. With what's after him, it's best that he doesn't expose any vulnerabilities. I asked Natasha to have her declared dead in the federal and state systems. Her social security deposits are coming from a Stark trust now, but she might not notice unless she looks real close at her bank statement. People tend to not pay much attention to routine things that don't appear to change," Steve said.

"You can make somebody 'dead'?" Estrella gawked.

"We can if we need to for their protection, but we've only done it a handful of times. Hey, I didn't mean to start talking about work again," he told her.

"I wanted to know about Bucky's family, since you told me about them. You should set up something for him. Like record him on your phone for her, then go visit her and let her see. She can make a message for him. Couldn't you do that? Or anyone could. You could send any of your people or Stark's. Even Billy the courier. It doesn't matter who, as long as they know how to keep quiet," Estrella suggested.

"Why does it matter to you? I thought you didn't like Buck?" Steve asked.

"I'm trying to learn to like Bucky because he's important to you. I think I disliked him so much because the first time I met him, he scared me. He's terrifying, Steve. I didn't know who he was or where he came from. There were guns shooting around me because of some stupid drug thing gone wrong, and then there was just this man. He grabbed me and it hurt, and I though my heart was going to seize up. He got hit with a bullet, and it was like he didn't even feel it. Did he ever go to the hospital for that?" she said.

Steve looked at her with a cool, level stare. It was sort of unnerving.

"When was this?" he asked.

"It was the day you brought your sketchbook to our bench in front of the coffee shop. You showed up about two hours after all that was over," she said.

Again, he was quiet for a moment.

"Why didn't you tell me? I asked you if you'd seen him and you lied," he said.

"I know. I'm telling you now. I was scared, Steve. I didn't know who he was, and he was dangerous. I could see that much. He knew where I lived, and you weren't there all the time. He could have done anything. When I collapsed and Wanda and Jarvis had me brought to the tower, I was trying to move my things because he knew. I lived in the alley beside the coffee shop," she told him in a rush.

His small smile was a relief compared to how mad she thought he'd be from finding out she'd lied to him.

"We were neighbors, Eya. I wish I'd known you sooner. I'm sorry that Buck scared you. He scared the crud out of me the first time I saw him lately, too. I mean, I couldn't afford to act afraid, but he didn't make any sense. He's come a long way back to who he used to be, all on his own. He won't hurt you now, but I don't blame you for thinking he would when you met him. He was worth being scared of for a long time. Why do you think he protected you?" Steve asked.

"He said it was because of you. He'd been watching. Probably from the rooftops, because he came from up high. He knew you spent time with me, and he could see that we were friends. He called Jarvis 'Stark's kid'. He seemed to know exactly where and how he could stand without being seen by Jarvis. How does he do that?" Estrella asked.

"I don't know how yet. He keeps wiggling aside when I ask him about those kinds of things, but I'll get him to spill someday. What's important is that I trust him. More than anybody, I trust him. If I'm not around and Tony tells you one thing, and Buck tells you another, you go with Buck. That goes for all of them," Steve said.

"Even for Thor?" she asked.

"Even him. Thor's as good as the day is long and I don't see that changing, but he doesn't understand things here as well as Buck does. You and him are street smart. You both can hide if you need to, and watch each other's backs. Hiding isn't Thor's forte," Steve smiled affectionately.

"You sound like you think that could happen. Me having to go with Bucky," Estrella said with a frown of concern.

"I don't see it happening, but if it does, you go with it. He knows how to drop off like you. No papers," he said.

Estrella nodded. She knew that Steve believed what he was saying, but she'd make her own mind up if the time came.

"Ah! That's a Natasha nod. You're gonna do what you want, anyway, aren't ya?" he asked.

Steve had already determined that this small town amusement park wasn't a Hydra stakeout or he wouldn't be talking so freely. They kept their voices low, and nobody around them cared about the boring things they discussed.

Estrella smiled and shrugged a little.

"That's good. Learn what you can from Nat. But Eya?" he asked.
"Hmm?" she hummed.

"Please don't lie to me," he requested.

"I didn't want to lie to you the first time, but I didn't have any choice. With what you do, can you make the same promise to me? Maybe we better agree to tell the truth when we can," she said.

Steve cocked his head aside slightly and nodded.

"Fair enough," he agreed.

They left the water park when they were both so wrinkly that their wrinkles had wrinkles. They used the showers and changed into better clothes, then had dinner at a nice steakhouse before they headed back to camp at the beach. Dinner was quiet, with both of them thinking about their past. Steve ordered them a fried cheese appetizer and encouraged her to have a glass of wine with dinner. She was pleasantly drowsy on the way back to South Padre Island.

"It's been an alright day, but maybe not the ideal vacation day. There was a lot of business," Steve said to her in the dark of their little camper nest.

"It wasn't all bad. We had some fun here and there," Estrella said around a wide yawn.

"Yeah. Eya?" Steve asked.

"What?"

"Tomorrow might be... different. I'm starting to feel squirmy. I'll need to work that out somehow. Will you tell me if it gets to be too much for you?" he asked.

"Okay," she mumbled.

Steve could tell that she was too sleepy to listen anymore. He reached out a hand across the space between them on the mattress and touched her warm, relaxed fingers. He prayed that he wouldn't make too much of an ass of himself tomorrow, or even for the rest of tonight.

---

Note: The next chapter should be a lot less business and a lot more fun!
The surf was raging and he loved it. Steve played around with his skim board for a while before dawn. He fell on his ass several times before he got the feel for the balance required. By the time he had it figured, he wanted more. A real surf board would be nice, but this section of coastline wasn't known for serious surfing.

He stabbed the end of his board in the sand as a visual marker, then waded out farther into the crashing, sucking waves. It was just getting light enough that he'd be able to see the bright stripes on the board if he was out from shore for a reasonable distance.

Soon as he was hip deep, the water dragged at him and pulled sand out from under his feet. The sea tugged him deeper and threatened to tumble him. At waist deep, he lost the fight. A heavy curl of wave smacked him backward off his feet like a punch from the Hulk, then he was dragged along the bottom.

It wasn't like sparring, or even like a real fight. A human partner could see when you needed a break, or when you had weaknesses to take advantage of. The water was turbulent and relentless. It didn't care if he was strong or agile, angry or eager. It didn't care if he was a super-hero or a nobody.

Steve knew about riptides and undertow. He was supposed to swim perpendicular to this. He didn't care to right now. He used the rip to work himself against. Since his tendency was to sink, he had to fight hardest to stay near the surface to breathe. The water wanted him down.

He swam hard as he could against it and still didn't make any distance. It was too fast, and he would have needed fins to do any better. This was an opponent he couldn't grab and subdue. It was all mindless kinetic energy and it felt humbling to struggle against it. When he could get up to breathe, he'd get a glimpse of his skim board. It appeared farther and farther away.

For once, he could fully exert the power of his body without the worry of hurting anyone. For a long while, he pulled hard and fast against the current. When he felt the rare wonder of his muscles starting to tire, he swam at a right angle to the pull. All the way back to shore he teased with the edge of the flow, into the rip, then out of it to calmer water. His damned body kept recovering, losing the tired shakes before he could even get to shore.

He was quite a distance down the beach from Estrella and his truck, and that's what made him quit play fighting against the sea. He didn't want to get too far from her, just in case. Something undefined was worrying at the back of his thoughts. It probably had nothing to do with them, but it made him cautious.

In one last push, he angled into the rip current again and fought it all the way to shore. Steve finally felt sand under his feet. It was thoroughly satisfying to feel tired, like he actually wanted to stop and take a break. He crawled the last few feet on his hands and knees. His muscles felt weak and shaky, overused.

He collapsed on his back under the stormy sky and enjoyed the feeling for the few minutes it would last. When he held his hands up over his face, he could see the shakes fading away already.
So predictable, except his recovery times were getting faster. Next, he'd be hungry.

The cement gray sky started dropping fat, cold splattering rain on him. A few spits of it at first, then an increasing barrage. Steve lay on his back, closed his eyes, and stuck out his tongue. The rain water tasted sweet and sharply fresh, like atmosphere and elements. It felt wild and sensual to let the water pound on his exposed skin.

The first rumble of thunder made him get to his feet. He jogged up the beach until he got to his skim board. The rain washed sand down his skin and into his low-hanging swim trunks. He was almost to the truck when the camper hatch popped up and Estrella clambered over the tailgate. She squealed when the cold rain hit her, but she ran around to the front of the truck.

"When you gotta go, you gotta go," Steve said with a grin.

He set his board down and reached inside the back of the truck to get their last mostly clean towel. He didn't mind the wet, but Estrella was going to want to dry off. She ran back toward him in her night clothes, already soaked to the skin. Steve scooped her up and she yelped at the surprise. When he balanced her rump on the top edge of the tailgate, she blinked water-spiked lashes at him.

The camper hatch shielded her from the rain and he used the towel to dry her before she could go inside and drip on their bedding. She smiled at him in thanks. He liked the way her eyes tracked down his skin. It felt good to be wanted by someone he wanted to be with.

"Wait, let me rinse your feet," he told her.

She touched one toe to the truck's bumper and he held her other foot out where rain sheeted off the glass of the hatch. He rubbed the sand off her ankles and feet, then toweled them dry. Estrella got inside and looked at him expectantly.

"I can't get in yet. Sand in my shorts," he explained.

"Oh," she said.

Steve smiled at her and shut her inside. He checked that they were alone on the beach, then stripped off his swim shorts. The rain sheeted down his skin. He'd been out in it for long enough that his skin was starting to Goose bump from the cold. He set the shorts aside and ran his fingers down his back and his ass. Sand gathered in the most difficult places, and he worked to get it all gone. He cracked the hatch open and groped for their bar of soap. Estrella must have been aware of him, because she put it in his hand for him.

"Thanks," he called.

Steve rinsed the sand out of his swim shorts, then he perched on the bumper long enough to rinse his feet. He recalled the arrangement of their stuff inside the back of the truck. He wrung the excess water from his shorts, held them in front of his groin, then got inside in a hurry.

Estrella was wrapped in the towel. She squatted on the balls of her feet beside the mattress and stared at him, startled at all the skin he was displaying. Water ran down him, slowly heating to his temperature. There wasn't anything for him to dry off with.

"I'm stuck here until I dry. We need to do laundry soon," he said.

"I'm in the middle of changing. I was going to go outside with you," she told him.

"The rain's cold. We wouldn't be out there for long," he said.
"Turn around then. I can't stay like this," she complained.

"Eya, I don't have anything on," he said, not sure if he was embarrassed or not.

"I won't be looking. You don't look, either," she warned him.

Steve nodded. Instead of turning completely around, which there wasn't much room to do without dripping on the foot of their mattress, he turned sideways and dug in the ice chest and their dry goods bag. His belly was demanding things of him, so he got a bagel, a pack of beef jerky, and an orange soda.

It wasn't the best breakfast, but it kept him busy while water ran down his skin and while Estrella did whatever she was going to do. Hunger was almost a strong enough urge to keep him from glancing at her while she finished changing. He had to use a bit of willpower, too.

"Okay, I'm done," she said.

"Are you hungry?" Steve asked her around a mouthful of bagel.

"A little," she admitted.

Steve offered her their last bagel and a few pieces of jerky. For her, he dug down in the ice chest and got her a bottle of milk. He did everything one handed while he held his damp shorts against his front. He almost fumbled her bagel onto the bed sheet when he turned.

She was wearing her little bikini swimsuit. That was distracting enough, but the way she looked at him froze him immobile. She'd gotten more beautiful again overnight. Her hair was longer, and her lashes fanned at him once as she looked down at herself and took a shaky breath. She'd piled both pillows in the opposite corner from him and she lay partly upright, but sprawled across the comfort of the soft mattress. The gray morning light showed her mostly bare skin in a way that made him wish for his pencils and his sketchbook.

"Um. Here?" he offered her the food and drink.

Estrella crawled forward to get them, and his eyes were drawn to the soft, rounded cleavage of her bosom. Just a few days ago, the bikini had fit her fine. Now she was nearly too much for it.

Their eyes met only briefly. She seemed intrigued by his hand which held what little covering he had on him. His hips and ass felt extremely bare under her gaze, but then he wanted to feel more than her eyes on him.

"It's damp, but it should help some," Estrella said.

She tossed the towel at him as she retreated to her corner with her food. Steve set his soda down next to the bag of jerky and at least got the running drips dried from his skin. He stuffed the wet towel into their mesh laundry bag, then put the whole bag behind him in his corner to make a backrest. The rubber bed liner under him cushioned him from the cold metal of the floor, and he draped his feet and legs up onto the mattress toward hers. It was more comfortable than he would have thought.

He made sure the cool, damp swim shorts covered him where he needed it most, then he laid back to finish his makeshift breakfast. He tried not to stare. She tried not to stare. The rain pounding on the roof made enough white noise that they could ignore the thick silence between them if they really tried.
Soon as Steve had his belly satisfied and calories were making their way into his blood, it was very difficult to ignore her any longer.

"Don't watch me eat. I hate that," she told him.

"It's okay if we're both eating, but I can't look at you if you're eating alone?" he asked.

He instead watched rain rivulets snake their way down the glass beside him.

"Exactly. You should have eaten slower. You look like a teenager. You're all rough energy and messy and dripping, and then you're shoving food in as fast as you can," she said.

"Yeah, that's me," he admitted.

"I like you," she said.

"You sounded like you were complaining," Steve pointed out.

"No. I don't like eating with an audience."

"I can understand that. I don't like it either. I'll try to pace myself next time," he promised.

"Hmmph," she grumbled doubtfully around a bite of bagel.

Steve watched the rain as it slacked off. The sun was still behind heavy clouds, but at least they could open the windows and get some fresh air. He pushed open the hatch, then leaned forward and slid open the window on his side.

"Open that one?" he asked Estrella.

When he looked at her, she was stuck staring at the way the shape of his hip joined the muscles of his upper thigh. She didn't tell him to get the window himself, because that would make him crawl partly over her to get to it. The air was already charged with enough tension between them. She opened the window and reclined back into her corner again.

Eventually there wasn't any more eating to do and the noise from the rain was gone.

"Eya," he said into the quiet.

She looked at him. It was difficult, because all his bare skin was so distracting, but she tried to find her friend in the shockingly naked man opposite her. He laid his left arm out along the top of the tailgate and his other arm was down over what little modestly he had. He was extremely attractive, and the stormy light made his blue eyes seem moody and gray.

"What?" she asked.

"You're changing fast. I can see it every morning. Do you feel alright?" he asked her.

"I'm fine," she bit out.

"No, you're not. Tell me," Steve insisted.

"I don't want to talk about it," she denied crossly.

"Not talking about it isn't gonna make it go away," he pointed out.
"Fine, then. Everything's becoming sexual. Not everything, like brushing my teeth, but I feel like I'm walking into a fog and I won't be the same after. I wanted to be your friend, Steve. I'm afraid we're going to lose that in everything else that's coming," she said.

"We don't have to," he told her.

"Are you sure? I want to talk to you, but all I can do is look at you. You should put something on," she complained.

"I don't want to," Steve said, "I will if you want me to, but this feels good."

"Okay," she said with uncertain acceptance.

"I know I should put something on. My ma would twist my ear off for this. But she's not here. You are. Eya, do you want me to put something on?" he asked her.

She shook her head.

"What do you want?" he asked.

"I want to see you," she said almost in a whisper, as if she was afraid someone would hear and chastise her.

"Ya do? Just like this?" Steve asked, and indicated his body with his free hand.

Estrella shook her head slowly and bit her lip.

"How, then?" he asked.

"You could...take that off?" Estrella suggested hesitantly.

"You don't sound sure about that," Steve pointed out.

He gave her a steady, thoughtful look. She made a frustrated face at him. Why did he have to analyze everything? Why did he have to make her say things?

"Did those women see you naked? The women Bucky got for you?" she asked crossly.

"I guess so. I didn't stand still and let em gawk at me, but I wasn't wearing anything, so yeah," he admitted.

"Then get rid of the wet shorts! I don't want them knowing more about you than I do," Estrella snapped at him.

She didn't care if he found out she was jealous. So what if she was? Her chin tipped up in challenge and she looked him in the eyes and dared him to make fun of her.

"We can't have that," Steve said with a smirk.

He leaned forward a little to twist and put the damp swim shorts into the laundry bag behind him. He fought a shiver at the feel of her eyes on his revealed skin. This felt like way too much, but he was ready for it. If she was going to have any objections to his size, he'd rather know now than later. Steve relaxed back into his corner as he had been. Her dark eyes studied him for a long time.

It took some patience and emotional fortitude on his part to sit exposed and let her look without filling the space between them with nervous chatter. He couldn't help that his balls drew up from the sudden cool on his damp skin. His dick lay across the crease of his thigh, more than half hard. Of course with her looking at it, it got harder. He looked at himself as she did, but wondered if he looked alien or threatening to her. His foreskin slipped back as he got harder, thicker. It all looked normal to him.

His belly contracted into tight contours of muscle and his chest moved more deeply with a touch of anxiety as she stared. Her eyes flicked up to his, then she let go of her bottom lip and looked away, off aside from them both.

"You gotta talk to me. I can't do anything about it, but if it's too much, I'll understand. Do you want me to get dressed?" he asked.

The urge to move and cover himself was strong. If Nat was here, she'd see how rattled he was, but he didn't give up. He made himself lie still and wait.

"No," she said.

"No. I shouldn't get dressed?" he asked.

Estrella shook her head, then looked back at him again, this time top to bottom and everything in between. Steve blushed under her scrutiny and shifted his legs against the mattress. The suspense of waiting to hear what she thought was near intolerable.

"That's beautiful," she breathed.

"What is?" he wondered.

He felt some relief that she'd at least said something positive.

"Your skin. Pale gold, with a blush reaching down. You're pretty, Steve. All over," she told him.

"Aww, don't say that," he groaned in a fit of bashfulness and laid his head back to shut his eyes.

Estrella stayed where she was by will alone. The sight of him laid out in front of her hard and blushed rosy was difficult not to take advantage of. Everywhere she looked was inviting, mesmerizing perfection. Especially the parts she hadn't seen yet, like the muscle-wrapped sharpness of his hip and the pale of his skin right above his dark blonde hairs. He looked sensitive there. She wanted to touch. His genitals looked heavy and alive. She curled her fingers into her palms and looked away again.

"I'm okay, then?" he asked her.

"You know you are. What do you need to hear?" she wondered.

"You don't think I'm too big? I was afraid that with everything that happened, maybe you wouldn't like…me," he said.

"You mean your penis?" she asked.

Steve nodded, and his blush intensified. Unfortunately for him, his dick only got harder. He felt it changing how it lay, tickling as it slid up his skin to lie against his belly. If she was gonna protest his size, now was her opportunity. It just about didn't get any harder.

Estrella made a sound, sort of a choked moan. He looked at her. She squirmed a little in her corner. Her hands were spread on her thighs, rubbing restlessly. Her hips shifted subtly. That kind of tilt put pressure on her center.

"Sweetheart," he breathed.

"Mmm?" she wondered.

"You need to tell me 'no,'" he said.

"Why?"

"Because I want you. I want to touch you. I won't make love to you. Not like I want, but I want other things. I want to hear you say 'no.' I'd be sad to find out later that I did something you didn't want as much as I do," Steve told her.

"I don't want to say no. I want you to touch me," she said.

"Good, but you tell me if there's anything you don't like, alright? You can stop me and tell me no," he said.

"Okay, I will. If I want to. Come here," she agreed.

She waved him closer. He started to move to her, but she wiggled down on the bed and her thighs rubbed together, then parted invitingly. Steve froze still, before he accepted the unspoken invitation of her body and scared her. Over her. He wanted to be over her, but she didn't like that yet.

Estrella saw his hesitation and loved him for it. She smiled at him and rubbed the smooth sheet beside her. Steve crawled onto the bed and leaned on his elbow next to her. She couldn't stop looking. The weight of his cock tipped it down to touch the sheet. His hand hovered in the space between them, and she didn't know if he meant to touch himself or her, then he let it rest on his hip.

"Do you want me over you?" he asked her.

"No," Estrella said.

"Do you want me to take your swimsuit off?" he asked.

Her hands came up to cover her breasts.

"No," she told him again, but her legs shifted some, still seeking friction.

"Good. See, you can say no. Do you wanna touch me?" he asked.

She nodded.

Steve was glad to hear her tell him no, though he'd had to ask leading questions he already knew the answers to to get her to say it. That was enough for now. He lay down with a brief glance out the windows.

He folded his arms as a pillow for his head and offered himself to her, for however she wanted to touch him. He was painfully eager for anything.

Steve laughed when she reached out and twirled her fingers in the hairs under his arm. It tickled and he wanted to jerk away, but he stayed put. His girl was weird sometimes. At least he'd just washed and he didn't smell.

At his laugh, she buried her smile against his bicep. Her face rubbed down his arm until she kissed him there, where he didn't think any girl would want to kiss a guy. Her hand glided onto his chest, and her mouth followed.

Steve's instinct was to tilt his head back and close his eyes at the warm, damp feel of her mouth on him, but he needed to see. Estrella kissed him with her full, soft lips across his chest and back again, and he had a short moment to wonder what her mouth would feel like on his nipple before she was there.

His arms unfolded and his head went back. His hips jerked as she sucked and bit at him. It didn't make any sense that it would feel so good, but it did. And her hand was rubbing across his ribs, his belly, and downward. Oh God, was she gonna…?

Steve hissed in a breath as her fingers dug into his pubic hair and curled tight. He made a high, surprised sound as she combed through repeatedly, then gripped and tugged again.

"You like my hair?" he asked.

"Mm-hmm," she hummed.

Estrella laid her head on his chest and petted and combed him with her fingers, just aside from where his cock twitched with greedy anticipation.

"I can stop shaving, if you want more," he offered.

"You shave? Where?" she propped up to look at him.

"My chest. It's the uniform. It pulls at hair. It's not so bad on my legs, but I guess my chest is sensitive," he said.

He could hardly breathe steady enough to talk. Her hand so near him, but not on him was breaking his thoughts almost before he could say them.

"I don't want you to hurt, especially while you're working," she frowned.

Estrella rubbed her fingers back and forth across his chest, which was smooth. She couldn't even see little bumps or prickles. Every time her hand passed over his nipples, he seemed to like it. But then, he liked all her touches.

She circled her fingertip around and around his navel, then tickled her fingers down his belly again. She avoided his groin, but curved her hand around the inside of his thigh. She pulled, and he bent his knee and opened up for her.

"Eya, please... I didn't want this for me, but I can only take so much. You can touch me all you want, but I might come. I'm not any good at lasting," he said.

"You're not?" she asked with a little frown.

"Nuh-uh. Too excited. I pop right off. But I can keep going, as often as you like. It's a mess," he said with another blush.

He turned his face and bent up a little to kiss the side of her neck, right above her necklace. She knew he was really trying to hide his face. The kisses felt good, but he was blushed all over again. His beautiful, strong body was tight and straining. His cock was overwhelming. She didn't know what she should do. When she'd gotten him off in his shorts, she'd been more paying attention to the rest of him. With it exposed, it looked too large. Too demanding.
"Steve," she whined.

"Wha?" was all he could manage.

Her hand rubbing restlessly at his belly was making him barely coherent. She had to be in control of this. He fought what his body wanted and tried to pay attention to her.

Estrella rolled aside and he was disappointed that she'd taken her attention and her hands away from him. She unzipped her suitcase and rolled back with something in her hands.

Rosie.

Steve groaned and covered his face with his hands.

"Eva," he protested.

"Don't fuss. I wanted you to have it in case you needed it. You say we can't make love, so here," she offered.

"I don't want that. It's cold and rubbery," he told her.

"I'm not… I can't," she gestured to his groin.

"I'm not asking you to," he was quick to tell her.

"But you just said 'please'. I don't want you to hurt, Steve. I don't want to tease you," she said.

"I want to make you feel good," he said.

She shrugged and looked down between them to twirl her fingers against the sheets.

"Okay, but what about you? I don't want to be some big sacrifice you make. If I have fun, then you do too," she told him stubbornly.

Steve thought for a moment.

"But what do you want? I don't want to scare you," he said.

She bit her lip again, and looked at his mouth.

"There's one thing nobody has done to me," she told him.

She brought her fingers to touch his lips. They looked pink and soft and perfect. She already knew his tongue was strong and slick. She tapped her fingers gently against his lips and looked down at him.

"Really?" Steve asked quietly.

She nodded.

"Only if you want to. I know some people think it's nasty," she said.

"I am not one of those people," Steve said.

He rolled onto his belly and scooted down the bed.

Her skin was soft and inviting against his ribs. He wanted to wrap an arm around her and lavish kisses on her belly, but he wasn't sure she would like that.

Estrella shifted up the bed some, and reached to hand him his sex toy again. He shook his head.

"But-

"Eya, I don't think I'll need it," he told her.

She didn't know what that meant, but she was close to not caring. Steve looked more than happy to do what she asked. It triggered her instinct to get away when he first put his hands on her hips to slide down the strings of her bottom. She wiggled some in an urgent way, and Steve stopped and looked up at her. The softness and concern in his eyes eased her fears. He wasn't over her face. His broad shoulders moved atop her, but only down low above her thighs. She knew her fears didn't make any sense. He was just as dangerous down there as he'd be anywhere else, except that he probably wasn't dangerous at all. She nodded at him to go on.

"That's good. So strong. I'm amazed at how well you redirect your mind," he murmured.

He kissed her right hip bone, then slid the bikini string down over it. He did the same on her left. He dropped warm kisses across her lower belly, then paused to tickle around her navel with his tongue.

"I like it better when you talk less and redirect your tongue more," she said.

"Yes, Ma'am," Steve said with a wicked grin and his favorite accent.

"Oooh, you're getting too good at that. Steve, stop," she said in a hurry.

"What?" he asked.

"I'm not shaved. Down there," she warned him.

"Mmm. Good. I'm not into little girls, and a real woman seems hard to find nowadays. Will you let me see?" he asked eagerly.

Estrella nodded.

She tamped down her nervousness again as Steve got situated. He seemed to enjoy grasping her ankles and bending her knees up to set her feet flat on the bed. He stared at her and lifted one brow.

"Yes, I get it. Ankles. Go on," she urged him.

Steve chuckled, and eased his hands under her hips. He nuzzled his nose against her bikini bottom, right over her clit, and she gasped and wiggled her hips. Heated breath warmed her through the fabric. He was taking his time to enjoy himself, and the anticipation was killing her.

"Steeeve!" she complained.

He listened to her and worked her bottoms down from behind. He pulled the tie at one side, then skimmed the fabric away and off of her other leg. She watched him as nervously as he'd felt earlier.

"May I touch you?" he asked after looking at her black, silky mound for a moment.

"Grrmph!" she growled at him, and nudged toward him. Any part of him. His mouth, his hands, whatever. She wanted.
Steve took that as assent. He sank down lower and looked at the golden skin under her cute muff. She was golden all over, and in the middle she was the most delectable shade of pink. Reverently, he set his thumbs to her and parted her a little.

She was already shiny and her scent made his mouth water. He looked up her body to her face and kissed her right where she went from furry to pink. She made a tight little noise, and he hummed in appreciation.

Then his hot tongue licked at her and she couldn't think anymore. She'd been worried that he was only pretending to like what he was doing, because he was nice like that. The passion and skill he devoted to her pleasure was well beyond anything that could be considered reluctant or fake. The delighted, hungry sounds he was making were thrilling her almost as much as his careful licking and sucking.

"Ow, ow," she said when pain rose up above the pleasure.

His hands were gripping her too tight. She grabbed at his hands and tugged his fingers looser.

"Sorry. Are you alright?" Steve paused to ask her.

His voice was rough and he looked aroused and messy with her. The crimp of concern between his eyes warmed her heart, but she wished he'd get back to other parts of her.

"I'm fine, but don't hold me so hard with your hands," she said in a strained voice.

"Sweetheart, did I hurt you?" Steve asked.

"No! Steve, please. Stop worrying about it. Go back," she pleaded.

She lay down and focused on her breathing. Her legs were shaking and she didn't know why, but she didn't much care. Steve frowned at the back sides of her hips as he tilted her one way, then the other. She would probably bruise. He made his hands into fists and planted them beside her hips instead of holding her.

"I don't care about it," she told him.

"I'm so sorry. I-"

"Steve!" she exclaimed.

Estrella put her fingers in his short hair and urged him back to where she wanted him. She gave him a dire frown to let him know he better not delay anymore. He tried to hide a cocky little grin and she grumbled at him for his male arrogance until he put his wonderful mouth back to work.

She made urgent sounds when he did something she liked more than the rest, and he soon had her cooing and writhing, then making sounds that sent him over too. His hips ground against the sheets and his moan of pleasure hummed against the inside of her thigh.

Soon as they felt they could move, he carefully rolled her to get a better look at where he'd been gripping her. In his enjoyment, he'd put finger marks on her. Five spots splayed near each hip that exactly matched the reach of his hands. He kissed the marks, then the adorable, sexy dimples he found on the backs of her hips. Her bottom was worthy of some worshipful attention, but not right now.

"You okay?" he asked her.
She rolled herself onto her back again and giggled.

"I guess that means 'yes'?" he wondered.

She nodded. Estrella looked happy and relaxed and that made him happy, too. She pulled at him and he moved up beside her.

"We have to do laundry anyway," she said, then wiped his mouth and chin with the top sheet.

Steve was looking at her in a way she hadn't seen before. She couldn't tell if he was concerned or sorry or deeply touched by something, but whatever it was, he felt it strongly. Before she could ask, he gathered her into a careful hug against him. Careful, because he stayed aside of her, and he cuddled only her top half. She tried to scoot closer, but he had a knee up between them.

"Can I kiss you, or do you want me to wash first?" he asked.

She kissed him. First beside his mouth, then on his lips. Then he kissed her back with the same fervor he'd felt while he was focused between her thighs. Between them, the lingering taste of her was earthy and naughty. She knew it well from her recent explorations and fantasies, but to smell it on him was unexpectedly tender and tremulous. This was her, pure and strong, and he didn't make faces or think she was dirty. It was another reason to love him. She rubbed her nose against his.

"You're very good at that. I'm afraid to ask how you got so good. Do I want to know?" she wondered.

Steve chuckled.

"Remember the girls in my old films?" he asked.

She nodded.

"I didn't know a thing going into the bonds tour. Buck told me a lot, but it's nothing like touring with a few dozen lonely ladies. They took one look at me and I turned red and couldn't talk. They had fun trying to teach me, but I still turn red," Steve said.

Estrella spread her hand to his chest. She liked the way he blushed and was glad he wasn't so jaded that it didn't happen anymore.

"So you like…" she said, and pointed down her body.

"You taste wonderful. I'll kiss you like that anytime you let me," he said.

"We have different words for it now," she pointed out.

"Yeah, but I don't like any of 'em," Steve said.

He tipped her head back with a nudge and smooched down her neck. His teeth grabbed at her necklace and he tugged at it playfully and growled a little.

"I don't want to take it off," she told him.

"I know. I don't want it off either, but it's in the way sometimes," he said.

Steve kissed down her body, and she pushed away the thoughts that he only liked her for how she looked or for what her voice did to him. He'd known her before all that.
"Steve," she said to get his attention.

"Nnn?" he mumbled against her ribs.

"Did you? Did you finish?" she asked.

"I wouldn't call it 'finished' exactly," he said against her belly.

"What would you call it, then?" she asked.

"First round," he said.

She looked at him skeptically.

Steve leaned away from her and lowered his knee. He was hard as if he'd never gotten off. She wanted to touch him, but he was funny about her getting near him.

"Oh. How many times do you need it?" she asked.

"This isn't about what I need. It's about what you want," he said.

"Okay. I want you to be thoroughly finished, and I want to learn how to help you," she told him.

"Ya do?" he asked.

Estrella nodded.

"Why? What does that do for you?" he wanted to know.

She grinned and wiggled. Instead of answering him, she rolled toward him, hoping to feel more skin. She was a little cool, and he was always warm.

Steve calculated exactly where her roll would put her against him, and he leapt over her to the other side of the mattress. He wasn't sure how much restraint he'd have if their bare bottoms got together and she ended up right where he wanted her.

Estrella nearly rolled off the mattress, but she stopped and turned her head to pout at him for denying her the warmth she was seeking. Steve was perched taut and naked on her side of the mattress, and she'd almost fallen off his side.

He had another, different odd look on his face. How had he moved so fast in such a small space as their little camper and not hit anything? He hadn't even touched her as he jumped over. She wanted to see him do it again.

"What are you doing?" he asked as she came for him again, this time in a flat lunge across the sheets.

He went clear over her in a snap of muscle that landed him opposite her with hardly a wiggle to the truck. She laughed in delight at the control he had over his body. She gathered herself to spring at him, but he grinned and shook his head.

"Amateur. I can see that coming. Why are you- Eya!" Steve exclaimed.

Instead of springing at him, she rolled again, then rolled back when she saw him start to move. Steve instantly assessed where she'd be, then shoved his toe against the truck to land where he wouldn't hurt her. He ended up half off the mattress by the ice chest.
"What? Stop," Steve said, and he laughed because her chasing him was fun, but something else was happening in his head.

Her eyes were sparkling with fun, too, but she looked like she had a purpose in mind if she caught him. God help him, but having to calculate and evade, and to move with careful accuracy, along with all the bare skin was heating him up in a way he couldn't have anticipated. Something, some mental paths in his head were getting twisted and firing off excitement down strange channels he hadn't felt before.

She came for him again, and he couldn't resist letting her rub against him as he went around her. When he landed, he was shaking with want. If she did it again, he didn't know what would happen.

"No. Eya, stop," he said as kindly as he could.

She looked at him defiantly, and sweet heavens, she was beautiful. All passion and black hair. He could see already that she wasn't going to listen to him. She was a novice at this, and too thrilled to want to quit pushing at him.

"Estrella. No," he warned her more strongly.

Steve changed from a defensive crouch into an offensive one. If they both went for each other, there was no doubt who would end up on the bottom. A hard tremble shook him. He wanted that so bad that his dick distracted him from his resolve to let her be in control. He shook his head in a hard snap and blew a tense breath out, trying to clear his head.

Estrella sat in the corner with the damp laundry and wrapped her arms tight around her knees. Her feet scrunched protectively in front of her center. Steve's hot, conflicted gaze flickered to her ankles, then back up to her face. Fear and want collided in her, but fear was winning this time. Steve was all hard definition and tight coiled power. His erection had been fascinating and enticing a few minutes ago, but now it looked like a blatant threat, tucked large and hard up against his belly.

"We'll be alright. We're gonna sit here and breathe for a while," Steve said when he saw that she finally realized the situation they were in.

He eased back from his hard stance which had been more of a warning than a threat. It had worked when words failed. He didn't like seeing her afraid again, but it was that or something worse. He leaned back onto the pillows, but he crossed his arms and legs instead of sprawling as if he was at ease. He wasn't. She wasn't. No use in pretending.

Calming himself was something Bruce had taught him, and he breathed deep and slow. For him, the practice also kicked in the metabolic bump he got from extra oxygen, but he didn't have to do anything with that. Soon as he wasn't trembling with eagerness for sex anymore, he pulled at their blanket, which had been kicked off the bed all morning.

"Here. You'll want this when the nerves wear off," he said, and passed it to her.

Estrella had to force herself to reach out to him to take the blanket. He could grab her hand and pull her, but he probably wouldn't. Or her ankles. A slight, reluctant smile curved her lips.

"What's that for?" he asked her as she drew the blanket around herself.

"You're really serious about ankles. I saw you thinking about it," she told him.

"I guess I am," Steve admitted.
Another moment passed in quiet while Estrella's body began to unclench. She pulled the blanket into a tight snuggle under her chin and tucked it under her toes. Steve remained naked and unashamed. There was a difference in him from his bashful softness before. She couldn't imagine him blushing now.

"What happened?" she asked.

"You got in my head. You're good at that. I'm finding out all kinds of secrets with you lately. I like ankles, and apparently the idea of fighting and sex at the same time does it for me, too," he told her. Estrella had a funny thought which was also scary, but this time the funny won out.

"What about fighting and sex while you're holding my ankles?" she asked.

Alarm spiked through her again as Steve took a sharp, deep breath. His fingers spread on his biceps and gripped into the muscle. Against his belly his cock twitched and the tip looked shiny. Steve gave her a pained frown.

"You just don't stop, do you?" he growled with a hint of meanness.

"Sorry," she squeaked.

"Nah, it's alright. I've got this now. We need to talk it out, find out where the edges are," he said.

Estrella was afraid to say anything else that might tease him beyond what was fun for either of them. Then, another worry hit her.

"Steve, this happened and it wasn't even my voice! I don't have my hair yet, and I'm not all the way recovered. How is this going to work?" she asked.

"One thing at a time. I don't think I'll be much trouble to you if your necklace is off. Right now, this is my fault, not yours. You stay over there and I'll fix this, alright? Because I'm gonna be a grumpy bastard all day if I don't," Steve said.

She watched and wondered what he meant, but then his hand released his arm and instead dropped to curl around his penis. He gave it a few lazy strokes.

"I want you to stop me if you don't like any part of this. Say no," he advised her.

She shook her head in denial. She wanted to see him do this.

Where there had been a sweetness to how he'd come with her before, there was none now. It was all male, and all goal oriented. By the time he was a painted mess and had come three more times, Estrella couldn't resist touching herself either. When he heard her whimpers of want and enjoyment, his closed eyes opened to focus on her. His last time took longer.

She was in a satisfied daze, but still couldn't stop watching him. He was frightening in his intensity like this, but he had it safely confined to his side of the space. His body twitched and strained as he worked for the last of it, and he finally let loose with a toothy growl. He stared right at her in a way that thrilled and flattered her deeply.

Estrella perched in her blanket swaddle and gaped at him in amazement. He finally eased away from his intent staring and gave her a little smile. His feet flexed and he wiggled his toes. With his less messy hand, he grabbed the top sheet and began to wipe up his semen. She didn't need to get any closer to know how he smelled.
"Ugh. I can't believe I did that. Eya, you make me crazy," Steve told her.

"I'm sorry. I told you it would be-"

"No. Just you. Look, you're all covered up with the blanket. Your voice had no part in this. It's just you," Steve assured her.

He came close to stuff the dirty bedding in the laundry bag. They both smelled strongly of sex, but she liked it, and it seemed that he did too. He picked her up, blanket and all, and took her back onto the mattress.

Steve leaned on the pillows and he hugged her onto his chest. They looked out the window at the gray spitting sky and the crashing waves. His hand rubbed her hair back from her face and she smiled and turned to lick at his fingers.

He watched her pink tongue lave between his fingers. The warm satisfaction in her eyes hypnotized him. He'd wanted to apologize for what he was sure was a lingering flavor on his hand, but it was clear that was exactly what she was enjoying.

"Uff," he grunted senselessly.

The implications of her actions already had him eager for later.

"We're gonna be in so much trouble," Steve said.

"Not today," Estrella denied.

He held her for over an hour. He felt too good to want to do anything else. He had the best feeling in the world right here in his arms. They ended up kissing languidly for what felt like forever, but not long enough.

Eventually, it was Estrella's belly that announced itself. They laughed and washed up the best they could with wet wipes and what remained of their water supplies.

The muted television in the laundromat showed them storm warnings up the Texas coast. The tropical storm wasn't expected to become a hurricane before landfall, but it was strong enough that the beaches would be closed and some power outages could be expected.

Estrella hurried to find them a hotel for the next few nights. Steve called three before he found one with an opening. If they hadn't gotten themselves in front of a television, they wouldn't have known to make alternate sleeping arrangements until all the rooms were booked. He made the room reservation for two nights and Estrella fed more money into the clothes dryers.

She gave him a lover's smile that spoke of secret things while she walked back to sit with him in the plastic chairs by the windows. In return, Steve gave her a goofy one. He'd never thought to see a girl look at him like that, and it turned him to mush.

"You're unbelievable," he told her.

"Me?" she protested.

"Yes, you. All that's been done to you, and you still put up with me acting like an ape," Steve said.
There was no one else in the laundromat right now, so she felt she could talk. Odd how staying on an isolated spot of beach for a few days made her jealous of her space and their privacy. She relished it, because this wouldn't last forever.

"You're not an ape. You're all man and I love it. We'll have lots of fun when I'm not afraid anymore," she said.

"Oh yeah?" he asked.

"Mm-hmm. What's a girl ape called?" she asked.

"I dunno. You wanna be one of those with me?" Steve wondered.

Estrella nodded, then turned her face into his neck when a cranky-looking older woman came into the laundromat with empty baskets. Steve tried a polite nod to the woman, but she scowled at them and looked to taking her clothes out of a dryer.

He heard Estrella sniff at his neck, and then she licked him, sniffed again, then sucked a pinch of skin into her teeth. He should have pulled away, maybe, because the woman sent some really pissy looks their way, but he didn't.

"Did I miss a spot?" he whispered to Eya.

"I got it," she replied.

"When we get to our room, I'm gonna take a long, hot shower. Beach camping is great, but a real bathroom has its advantages, too," he said.

Estrella made a noise that sounded like agreement, and then she didn't say anything for the thirty-seven minutes they had left on the dryers. She grew heavier against his side, and Steve put an arm around her and let her sleep.

"No sleeping in the laundromat," the cranky woman told him.

She pointed to a RULES sign on the wall.

"Are you kidding me? We're not here to sleep. We're waiting for our clothes. What difference does it make to you what we do while we wait?" Steve said.

The woman stopped folding her clothes, stuffed them in her baskets, and went to her car. Steve watched her go with no remorse. Well, he had a tiny little bit of remorse down in there somewhere, because the rules were on the wall, but it was a stupid-ass rule, so he ignored it. It's not like they were bums, and so what if they were? How could anybody be offended that a cute little lady like Estrella was taking a nap?

Steve wanted to shake the angry tension out of his shoulders, but Estrella was leaning on him. She slept a lot, but that was probably because she was still recovering from emaciation. Her body was building a lot of bone and tissue right now, and he viscerally understood that. Healing always made him hungry and tired.

He eased her back in her chair and tried to get the laundry himself, but there was nothing for her to lean on without him and she woke up. They folded the clothes into their suitcases, and made a tall stack of the clean sheets and towels.

Vending machine food from the laundromat was completely insufficient, so they found a Mexican restaurant before looking for their hotel. Between them, they finished two baskets of tortilla chips and three little bowls of picante sauce. The servings were generous with greens and sour cream and guacamole, rice and beans, but Estrella was already stealing off of his plate.

Steve ordered another plate for himself and they got dessert. The weather was getting worse and he didn't want to have to go out in it again later.

"I might not have gone swimming this morning if I'd known all this was a tropical storm," he commented over flan drizzled with caramel.

"You swam in that? I thought you went running," Estrella exclaimed.

"What, you didn't notice the swim trunks? No running shorts this morning," Steve said before another bite.

"Your poor running shorts," she said woefully.

Steve nearly spit his mouthful of soda, but managed to swallow.

"They washed," he said with a grin.

"Nobody knows how messy Captain America is," Estrella teased him.

"Oh, nooo. He's not messy at all. The Captain never so much as farts. Did you know that? Amazing intestinal fortitude. And he'd never, ever make the kind of messes I've been making," Steve made a face as if the very idea of Cap being a lowly human was shameful.

Estrella laughed.

"You're schizophrenic or something," she said.

"Or something. It's a learned separation. Living at the tower, it's hard because we're sort of 'on' most of the time. Seeing each other is a reminder that work is never far away. I like everyone and I value their friendship. We need each other sometimes. But with you, and with Buck coming back, I'm finding that I want to pick up pieces of who I used to be, before I had to lay it all down and be him," Steve explained.

"You resent being him? Do you regret making that decision?" she asked.

"No. I wouldn't go back and do it any different. I really wanted it. It's all I wanted at that point in my life. I'm still enjoying the benefits of it, but there's some parts that nobody could have known to warn me about. Even knowing those parts, I'd still make the same choice," Steve said.

Estrella thought about his moods and his struggles. His dedication and sacrifice. She thought again that she’d like to have seen and known him before he was large and physically strong as he was now. Right at this moment, under the mellow glow of the restaurant light, he looked like a blend of his two personas.

His separation was slipping sometimes. Like in the back of the truck when he'd taken an aggressive stance to warn her off from chasing him anymore. She wondered if he realized how very much Steve Rogers and the Captain had blended together just then. In that moment, she hadn't been able to tell them apart.

"What?" he asked for her thoughts.
She looked around at the half-empty restaurant. It was that odd time between lunch and supper and the place wasn't very busy.

"Why don't people around here see you and know who you are? Like the girls at the water park, and Uncle Alberto, and the people in here?" she asked.

"Nat could school you on that better than I can. I think it's because they don't expect to see me here. New York is getting used to seeing me with short hair and a beard, but I'm kind of like a favorite mascot in the city. I'm a social-media thing. Videos and web pages and millions of followers of accounts who claim to be me but aren't. It's insane. People in the city are looking for me, like bird watching. People in Texas don't see me because they aren't looking, and because their idea of Cap hasn't been updated to include the new look. Looking grumpy and thoughtful helps. It fools most folks. Except for that little guy over there," Steve said.

Estrella turned her head slightly to look where he indicated. There was a pre-school aged boy jumping and wiggling and getting fussled at by his parents in a booth across the restaurant. Steve signed the receipt, added a tip, and put away his card, then got up from their table.

He offered Estrella his arm, and she took it. They were parked on the closer side of the restaurant, but Steve walked toward the little boy, who was about to get swatted for misbehaving. The kid stilled and went quiet in awe as Steve approached their table. He couldn't have been more than five years old, and he had a bowl cut of white-blonde hair. Blue eyes stared at them until Steve and Estrella reached the family's table. The mom was attempting to feed rice and beans to a tot in a high chair, and the father turned to wonder who was coming toward them.

"I'm sorry to bother you, but it looked like someone was about to get in trouble for being a Captain America fan," Steve said quietly.

He got down to one knee so he'd be on the kid's level. The father looked at him strangely, still not knowing what to do.

"I'm sorry if he was too loud. Did he bother you from all the way across the- Oh God! You really are him!" the mom exclaimed.

"Kids always have the sharpest eyes. I was just telling my girl that nobody recognizes me with this beard, except the little ones. What's your name, son?" Steve asked.

"Kennef," the boy said shyly.

"Wait. You're Steve Rogers?" the dad said.

"I'm afraid so," Steve said.

"My grandfather served in the war. He had a huge memorabilia collection, some of it with your autograph," the man said.

Steve shook his offered hand, and didn't point out that the man had given neither his name in introduction, nor his grandfather's name. People did that sometimes. The kid was who he'd come to see, anyway.

The mother dug in her purse for some scraps of paper. She came up with a business card and the back side of a receipt. Steve picked up the ink pen from the bill folder on the table.

He signed one autograph the old way, with his name. On the one for the boy, he scrawled his shield and star logo and 'Cap' the way Estrella had showed him. He patted the boy on the shoulder and shook the man's hand again. The family said goodbye, and Steve and Estrella left. He heard the mom's phone take a pic, but it was only of their retreating backsides, so that was no harm. At least the kid wouldn't get spanked for carrying on, now.

"You didn't have to do that," Estrella told him after they got in the truck.

"I know, but put yourself in the kid's place. When you were little, you thought you saw somebody interesting, somebody you thought you knew something about, but they left before you could know for sure. Wouldn't it be better to know? To have proof, and not just to make up stories in your head? I had heroes when I was little, too, though it turns out some of those actors weren't so heroic in real life," he said.

Estrella smiled at the thought of a truly tiny Steve Rogers, running around with a cap gun and a badge. She fingered the copper butterfly at her throat and tears stung her eyes. Westerns. His heroes were probably actors in the old westerns.

"Show me when we have time. I want to watch the movies you liked," she said.

"Alright. We'll do that," Steve agreed.

They found their hotel and rushed their bags through the rain because Estrella didn't want to be dropped off under the portico. The wind was blustery, but everything was calm serenity when they entered the hotel lobby. The staff was busy, or they would have been helped with their bags. It was a nice place and Estrella looked around uneasily.

"It's alright. Think of the bathroom and the hot shower," Steve whispered to her as they walked to the front desk to get their key cards.

The place was hectic with all the people from beach houses who were seeking shelter from the storm. The lady behind the desk was courteous but distracted, doing the best she could under the circumstances.

Their room was on the fifth floor. The elevator was a long wait, and crowded when it arrived. Estrella stuffed in with Steve, and he made sure his body was between her and any of the other men. She smiled at him and would have kissed him, but he smiled back and shook his head slightly.

There was peace and quiet in their room as soon as the door closed. Steve put the suitcases on the luggage stand and hung his satchel in the closet.

Two beds. It was just as well. Steve didn't think it would be a good idea for them to sleep together here. He had the day's events on hold in his mind, but they wouldn't stay on hold forever. If she got next to him while he was thinking about it all…

"You want to take a nice bath, or a shower? I wanna catch up on the news," Steve told her.

Estrella made a face that wrinkled her nose. She had no interest in the news unless Steve was on it. It was always the same. People in power making trouble for those who weren't. She went over to give Steve a kiss where he lounged on top of the plump duvet.

He both hoped she would and hoped she wouldn't ask him to join her in what was probably a nice big tub. It was a nice thought, but a bad idea in practice, just like sharing a bed tonight. She brushed her fingers up his neck to his chin and he made a happy sound into her mouth.

"Go relax. I'm in no hurry," Steve told her.
"You're in no hurry because you're a dirty boy who likes to wallow in his own smell, and because you're trying to be a sneak and do something while I'm in the bathroom. You're not fooling me," she said.

"Yeah, yeah. You caught me. You're a real wise dame. Now go bathe before I want to kiss you again, and let me make my phone calls," Steve told her with attitude.

He loved that he couldn't put much past her, and most of what she said was true, anyway. He liked the lingering smell of sex, but he'd never been able to indulge himself in it until now. The sex itself was nearly impossible in the old days, and now he spent most of his time around people and AIs who could smell it on him and make comments.

Steve found the local news station and watched until he determined that nothing interesting or threatening was happening near them. He put the TV on mute and got his phone while Estrella ran her bath water. He could hear her voice singing along to something from her phone, and it made him happy to know she was content to be with him.

He called and Nat answered on the third ring. That could mean anything, he decided. Either she was away from her phone, or she was busy, or she was bored and she wanted him to think she was busy.

"Rogers," she said.

"See, usually it's the person calling who announces who they are," Steve told her with a smile in his voice.

"It sounds like somebody's on holiday," she replied, and he could almost see the tight smirk on her lips.

"That's right. We should all take turns doing this. It's great, Nat," he said.

"Aww, you sound like you've had a balloon and a lollipop, and maybe even some ice cream," she said in a smarmy voice as if she was talking to a child.

She would never talk to a child that way. Steve laughed.

"Yeah, and waterslides, and we played at the beach, and I bought a real truck!" he responded with faux-childish enthusiasm.

"Rogers, you're making me nauseous. Why are you calling me?" she asked briskly.

"I've got a minute of down time-"

"From sex on the beach," she interrupted him dryly.

"Hey, that's no way to talk to your CO," he complained.

"You're not my CO right now. And I notice that you're not denying the sex on the beach," she said.

"That's not up for discussion. I want to know how things are," Steve said with a hint of sharpness.

"That's more like it. How things are where? Estonia is rattling sabers at the border again, and the Serbian consulate is not playing well with others. Wakanda is settling down nicely since our last visit. Stark sprained his wrist lifting something too heavy because he was having a tiff with his shop bots. The situation in DC is moving as fast as Monday morning traffic. Can I use a wire, Steve? One thin wire and this would all be over with," Natasha sighed.

"No. Our cleaning crew isn't big enough for that kind of op. Ops. One wire wouldn't get it. Problem's too big," Steve said.

"But I hired Barnes. He's good with wires, too. I know when to call in backup," she sassed.

"We sure don't have a cleaning crew that big, then. No wires. Dammit, I can't say no wires. Never know if you might need one later. So, everything's alright, then?" he asked.

"We're good. You didn't need to call. You should take the time you have and try not to think about us. I'll call you if there's anything you need to know," she said.

"Thanks, Nat," he said.

"No problem. Are you good?" Nat asked.

"I'm good. We're good. You sure there's nothing I need to know?" he asked.

"I'm sure. Get off the phone," she told him.

"Alright. 'Bye," he said.

Steve made a confused face at her odd closing, but figured it was something else he'd missed. His call didn't completely put him at ease, but he felt he could relax at least for one more night.

There was no answer when he dialed Buck's number. No voicemail. It rang once, then died.

Hold, was the text response he got a moment later.

Well, shit. He hoped he hadn't interrupted anything important. They didn't bring phones with them on missions for that reason, and if Buck was on their pay now, he shouldn't have his, either.

Steve waited.

And waited.

He got up and walked the floor a little. Nothing too energetic, just some movement to keep him from fidgeting. He double-checked his sidearm and its magazines and his spare rounds. The straps on his shield were good, maybe could use a little oiling. His uniform had gotten shuffled around, so he re-folded it and put it away again. Estrella's paperwork went neatly into a side pocket where it would be safer from loss or crumpling. He looked at the name of the church on her baptismal certificate and wondered if they could…

His phone rang. Steve sat in the chair in the corner by the window and pulled it from his pocket.

"Buck?" he asked.

"C'mon. I was more confused than you and I know how to read a caller ID," Bucky replied.

"Hold? What the hell is that supposed to mean in a text?" Steve asked.

"It means I'm on the pot and didn't want to call you right then," Buck said.
"That was one long squat. You're so full of shit," Steve said.

"Fine. Don't tell me what you're doing then," Steve said.

"What? I was reading the paper," Bucky said.

"Enough with the potty humor. We outgrew that when you moved onto dirty stories," Steve said.

Steve sighed.

"You don't need to know, kid. You wouldn't approve, but it needs to be done. If I've got any luck at all, you'll never know more about it than I'm not telling you right now," Buck said.

"Haven't we learned anything? These things have a way of blowing up in our faces," Steve warned tiredly.

"Not this time. No explosions. No falling. No ice. Not even any water. This one's easy. I'm having fun," Buck said.

"That's scary," Steve said.

"Maybe for them. Not for me," Buck said.

Steve sighed again.

"You shouldn't have called me if all you're gonna do is mother-hen this to death. They want me to keep my mouth shut about it completely, but I know better. You're smarter than that. I feed you a few crumbs and pat you on the head, and we're good, right? No tattling home to mommy," Buck told him.

"Buck, what are you into?"

"Don't ask again, Steve. I'll tell ya," Buck warned him.

That shut Steve up. Buck was right. He didn't really want to know. Not right now, and Buck would tell him if there was any danger. He trusted his people, but he knew them too. It might take some deep digging to find out after he got back.

They could hear the faint sounds of each other breathing over the connection. It was comforting. Like trying to get to sleep on a stuffy summer night a long time ago. A lifetime ago.

"Buck, uh.."

Steve had the will to ask for help, but his words weren't in order yet.

"What?" Buck prompted him impatiently.

"Did you ever get in a situation where you were… fighting and fucking at the same time?"

"Shit, pal, what are you into? I thought you were with your girl, but I know that little songbird isn't up to scratch for that kind of play," Buck said.
"Just answer the question for once, dammit."

"It can be exciting, but it's tough to do either one well when the other is going on. The only time I can think of when both are appropriate is when somebody's getting raped. Fuck. You're not… Stevie, what the hell?" Buck asked, truly confused.

"No. I'm not. It was just a thought. We were playing around. She started chasing me, and I evaded because I had to at the time. She kept at it until I had to make her stop it. Buck, I- It's embarrassing," he grumbled.

"You got all excited and ashamed of yourself because you couldn't tell if you wanted to fuck or to fight. Why are you asking me this? We served for years. We've seen this shit. Are you getting senile and forgetting stuff?" Buck asked.

"No. Fuck you. You're deliberately misunderstanding and it's not funny," Steve bit out.

"Alright, alright. I give. Don't get all sore-ass about it. What do you really mean, then?"

Steve made him wait in silence while he got over his mad. Buck always did this shit when things got a little queasy for him. It was familiar, but not the nice kind of familiar.

"Pussy," Steve spat at him.

"I'm sorry. I'm sorry. Try again. I'm listening."

"I was already hard. Naked. We both were, pretty much. Playing around. She did the chasing thing, and then I had to turn it on her to make her stop. She got scared, but she's good. She's strong. I'm the one with the problem, Buck. Something in my head. Evasion, grappling. Fucking. I wanted that, and there's no place for it. Why did my head go there?"

"Because we've been doing rough work for a long time. I know I'm poisoned. No good. It burns me that it got to you, too. Is that what all this dark shit is about? Are you going bad? Seen too much? Tell me if ya are, 'cause I'll find a way to take you down."

Steve thought about that for a moment.

"Thanks, Buck," he said quietly.

"What the fuck? What is "Thanks, Buck? Is that you telling me I need to start making plans?"

"No. I'm not going bad. Different, maybe, but not bad. If I was going bad, I wouldn't wanna go back to church, right? I wouldn't want to do things proper for her, don't you think?" Steve wondered.

"Probably not. You better watch yourself. I thought you said Thor had a good father-son talk with you that calmed you right down. What gives?"

"Not 'right down'. Nothing works like that. I still feel the same, but the focus is different. It's worked for days, and then that happened," Steve said.

"So this is guilt. Golly, Steve. Here I was taking you serious and thinking I had to plan another take-down, when you're still just a late bloomer. Fuck, you scared me. Look, this is normal guy shit, but you've been too much a ninny-hammer to get around to it yet," Buck started to explain.

"It's not normal guy shit. I'm pretty sure that normal guys don't want to fight with their girls while sex is happening. I've heard of make-up sex for after you've had a verbal argument, but this is completely different. It's physical, and it's rougher than she could take, and why did I even think of it?" Steve asked low so that Estrella couldn't hear from the bathroom.

Buck laughed in a way that was more salacious appreciation than humor.

"I've got your number now. Get on the internet and look up dominance. Not like animal kingdom stuff. You want information on the kind that happens in the bedroom. The two are related, but only loosely. Don't thank me later, and I'm not sure I wanna know what end you want to be on," Bucky told him.

"End I wanna be on?" Steve asked.

"Just get thee to the internet, Stevie. It's better than hiding behind the stacks to read the racy books at the library. And don't write that one down in your little notebook,"

Steve stared at the phone.

"Quit making that face. You'll get stuck that way," Buck teased him.

"Alright, I know when we're done," Steve said.

Buck started singing a bawdy French song to him, and he hung up on the noise.

Belatedly, Steve laughed.

If Buck was crown-deep in trouble, he wouldn't have been in such a light mood. Whatever he was working on was distasteful, but it wasn't overly dangerous for him. No need to worry.

And the other thing might be right. Estrella was still splashing in the tub, so he went to the browser on his phone and typed in 'dominance.'

For the next half hour, his eyes alternately went wide with surprise or narrow with horror. He didn't like the looks of all that hardware. It was too contrived. Steve figured that if a person didn't have the physical or psychological power to subdue someone, then they didn't deserve leather restraints to help them do it. He wasn't big on leather straps after having to free Buck from them decades ago, and after seeing the chair they'd kept him in.

Then the image of a powerful woman was in front of him. All she had was a whip. No straps, no gags, no painful pinching devices for delicate body parts. Her power was evident in her attitude, and in the bent posture of the man in front of her. Steve shook his head. Something was wrong with that picture. He wanted to kick the man out and see if the woman was strong enough to make him bend like that.

He laughed. She wouldn't be. No woman would be. Not even one physically stronger than him, if that was possible. He'd stood up to guys bigger than him in Brooklyn alleys when he was a weak little guy. Sure, somebody like Thor could bend him, but he'd never break. He wanted a fight against a different kind of strength.

This was just like daydreaming after reading a novel when he was a kid. It was never gonna happen. He had a place in his mind for things that had passed him by. Things he'd never get back again. Things he could never let himself do in the first place. This tickly, tantalizing dominance idea was impossible, so he filed it away in that mental folder of things he couldn't let himself want.

Hell, why was he even wanting more? He had an amazing girl. An amazing friend. He lay back and waited for his turn in the bathroom and thought of all the delightful moments they’d had today. With that on his mind, he didn’t need the other stuff he couldn’t have.

Before he let himself get too distracted, he made some phone calls and checked some other websites, then erased his browser history.

Note: More soon.
Chapter 41

Note: I've never made music recs, but do us a favor and go watch Let Me Call You Sweetheart and Coney Island Baby by A Cappella Trudbol on YouTube. He's a nifty young guy, and you might understand this chapter a little better if you do. The Barber of Seville from Vocal Spectrum on YouTube is pretty freeeking awesome, too. Remember how Cap in the beginning of CATWS said that all the guys from his barbershop quartet were dead? I'm gonna run with that.

They'd fallen asleep on their separate beds, but Steve woke up with Estrella draped on top of him. That was different, and maybe it explained why he'd slept all the way through til morning. She was wearing one of her little cotton night gowns that only went down halfway to her knees, and the straps at the top showed her pretty shoulders perfectly.

Steve felt a little disoriented, so he checked his surroundings with his senses, then checked his phone. No messages or missed calls. He could see from the bed that the door was secure and nobody had moved their things. He hadn't slept this hard in a very long time. Maybe since he was sick and his ma used to get him the good medicine that made the shivers ease off.

He walked them up the bed on his heels and his hands. Estrella was sleeping deeply, as usual. He liked the dead weight of her on his chest and belly. When he started rubbing her back and neck, he felt that she didn't have her necklace. It was lying on the night stand between the beds.

His hands wanted to wander further than just her back, but he kept himself respectful. She deserved it. He kissed her head on her sleep-messed hair and turned on the television to check on the storm.

It was going to make landfall in a few hours several miles to the South of them, in Mexico. Rough seas, minor storm surge, power outages and possibly some local street flooding were expected from all the bright red and orange rain bands on the radar image. The local weather man told viewers a list of streets and areas around Corpus Christi to avoid because there might be water over the road. The GPS navigation maps he'd seen of the town showed all those streets and bridges away from where they'd be today. As long as the power stayed on, they should have minimal interruptions.

Steve enjoyed the feel of Estrella resting on him as long as he could. They wouldn't get to do this when vacation was over. The feel of her relaxed and trusting against him did something to him. He already wanted to protect her from everything and anyone who would hurt her, but this was more. He wanted to protect her from himself. The bad things, the unworthy things in his head. Those were his to face down. He only wanted to give her the good things.

With that in mind, he carefully rolled her under him. This was a tricky thing for him, because he wanted her even more, now that they'd had a taste of each other yesterday. He wanted to see if she'd respond positively to a loving wake-up as well as she did to a bored and distracted one. He maneuvered himself so that he could get the sheets and blanket out from between them.

Estrella was limp with sleep. She started to wake when he settled on her gently and held her head in his hands. He rubbed his cheek against hers and bent to lightly kiss her collarbone.

"Wake up, honey. I don't wanna miss breakfast. Eggs, sausages, and maybe cinnamon rolls. We could get donuts and coffee, if you want," he murmured.
He kissed her neck where her necklace would be when she had to put it on. That woke up his greedy dick, because of the mental triggers established in his head about her voice. He did his best to ignore that and enjoyed that little band of beautiful, delicate skin while he could. She was getting a tan. The strip around her neck was slightly paler.

"Hmm? Coffee?" she asked sleepily.

That kicked him in the gut and then the brain almost immediately because his ear was right by her throat. He felt her words vibrating against his lips. It was like a little kiss somewhere down low and naughty. Or maybe a lick.

Estrella stiffened under him, and he wasn't sure if it was from waking to find him over her, or because she'd spoken without her necklace. He looked down at her sweetly and smiled through the lusty feelings as they faded.

"It's alright. I'm against the bed, not against you, see. Here's your necklace, if you want it," he offered.

He handed her the necklace and she put it on. There was a moment of anxiety in her eyes, but then he wiggled his hips against the bed between her legs. His erection wasn't touching her, and that seemed to calm her some.

"I have to pee and you're squishing me," she said.

Steve got up and gave her a hand. He saw a brief flash of her inner thighs before her nightgown fell into place. Her legs were smooth and gorgeous. He wanted her, always, but he was doing good. It was tolerable.

He encouraged her to dress in some of her nicer things, and he put on some tailored khakis and one of his dark button-downs that was meant to be worn untucked. She wore a cute yellow skirt that fell just at her knees. It had a few full layers underneath and Steve liked the way it moved and swished. She looked feminine and summery with her bright white blouse and her flip-flops. She smoothed her hair in the bathroom mirror and frowned at it. Steve slid on some dark leather shoes that looked sporty, but weren't just for show. They were more engineered than they looked, and he hadn't minded the price when Jan suggested them.

They made it to breakfast. Steve was impressed that she managed to have red plum jelly on her biscuit without getting any on her white blouse. Any time he wore white, he got something on it. Her bosom looked a little fuller, and his eyes noted other small differences.

Were her cheeks more sharply defined? Her eyes more sultry, even though she wore no makeup today? There was something about her jaw and chin, in conjunction with her lush lips that made him check that his shirt was down over his lap.

"More changes today," she commented.

"Yeah," Steve said.

He wasn't sure how much attention she wanted for that. She looked at him too, little glances and secret smiles. He'd seen her watching his hips as they walked to the elevator from their room, but he didn't mention it. He didn't see how his hips, of all things, could be interesting, but she seemed to think so. He knew he was changing some, too. His clothes fit a little tighter. Her eyes were knowing when she saw him trying to button his cuffs. She didn't mention it, either.

Estrella agreed to wait in the lobby this time as he brought the truck around to the portico. The rain was coming down in sheets and Steve looked plastered when she got in with him.

"Where are we going in this?" she asked him.

"Shopping, and a few other things," he said.

The main entrance to the mall had a portico too. He was truly drenched when he joined her inside the entrance. He'd almost run up on the curb in parking because he wouldn't take his eyes off of where she stood inside the glass entrance. If anybody messed with her, he'd be there in seconds.

Estrella laughed fondly at his drowned- hero look. Steve smiled and shook himself like a dog over the water-absorbing mats the mall management had put down inside the doors. He looked at his watch. The mall had just opened, and they had appointments to keep. He glanced at the mall map in passing, then walked beside her toward their destination. He would have offered her his arm again, but he was all wet.

There were a surprising amount of folks out walking the mall. Everyone away from home because of the storm needed something to do just like they did. Estrella looked around and put her arm on his despite his soggy shirt.

"You left your gear in the hotel closet. That's okay?" she asked him.

"It's just as good there as anywhere else, except my locker at home or on my body. I've got trackers in it, in case it walks off," he told her.

"Where are we going?" she asked him as they passed through the food court.

"Today is mostly for you, but there's a few things I want too, and a shave is top of the list," Steve said.

"There was a barber shop here when I was a kid," Estrella said helpfully.

"That's where we're headed," Steve said.

The barbershop was packed with customers when they arrived. When Steve walked in, one of them yelled over all the guys talking.

"You got an appointment? Otherwise, you should come back tomorrow."

"Steve Rogers. Ten-thirty," he told them.

The guy cutting hair at the center chair looked to him sharply. Steve shook his head slightly, and the man kept his mouth shut. He turned to the men and boys waiting and yelled again.

"Hey, hey. Make a place for the lady. Shouldn't have to say that," he groused.

"Where am I gonna be?" Steve asked.

The guy in the middle pointed to his chair, which was occupied with a little guy who was probably getting his first haircut. Steve nodded and stood by Estrella and the chair that vacated for her. He thanked the young man who got up to make room for her to sit.

"I didn't think about it being like this," he gestured to all the men in the place, "Are you gonna be alright?"

"I think so. The chair you'll be in is six feet away, so you could flick your shoe at them from that "You're brave, sweetheart. And you trust Stark tech as much as I do. Tony's never done me wrong when it comes to gadgets. Or Howard, either."

Steve looked around at the people, and picked out the father of the tot who was getting his first cut. It wasn't hard. He had his camera and was taking pictures as the kid squirmed impatiently. When he was done, the kid got a lollipop and the barber dusted off the chair. He looked to Steve when he was ready for his next customer.

"What can I do for you?" the older man asked.

He was probably in his seventies, and so were the other two barbers.

"A good shave, tighten up the sides and back, trim the edges sharp, leave the top longer," Steve told him as he settled in the chair.

"I never took you for a jarhead," the man said, "Name's Ralph."

"Don't have to be a jarhead to appreciate a classic cut. Besides, there's good people in all the branches," Steve made conversation as the chair eased back and Ralph prepared to shave him.

He noticed Ralph's hands shake a little.

"Are you alright?" Steve asked quietly.

"Not everyday we get gents like you in here. I'll be fine," Ralph said.

The shave was real nice, and the smell of the cream and the hot towel brought him back. When Ralph moved on to cutting his hair, Steve spoke up.

"You fellas know any tunes?" Steve asked them.

"We did, but nobody does that anymore," the barber on the right said as he snipped off a line of dark hair.

"C'mon. It's like riding a bike. I know you gotta sing in the shower. I do," Steve said.

"What? You want cold turkey? When's the last time you worked the pipes, fancy pants?"

"Other than in the shower, in '45. My guys could belt 'em out, but not always in English," Steve said.

"I guess we could try. We'll probably sound like toads in a bucket," the guy on the left said.

Apparently they'd all clued in on which Steve Rogers he was. Their audience seemed oblivious, though. The fellas took sips from their cups or water bottles.

"Which part did you sing?" Ralph asked him.

"I was baritone, but I can do bass in a pinch," Steve said.

"Baritone, then. We lost Vinnie in '07."

"I'm sorry to hear that. I know Coney Island Baby, and a few others. Jeanie, and Sweetheart," Steve said.
"Let's start with Sweetheart," Ralph said, "That's an easy warm up."

Estrella wasn't exactly sure what they were going to do, but she knew it must be something to do with singing. The idea of Steve singing was at first silly, and all the barbershop patrons stopped talking and looked at the barbers when they made several tonal sounds and cleared their throats and laughed a little. This was real. Steve was going to sing!

Estrella got out her phone in a hurry and set it to record. Steve saw her hurried preparations and grinned at her instead of telling her not to. They both knew that folks back home in New York would get a kick out of this. She framed the video up to include the three barber chairs and Steve in the middle getting his hair cut. The customers in the chairs on each side looked a little amused and confused, but ready to be entertained.

They were a touch out of practice and the first few notes showed it, but they soon were singing smoothly. The song became vaguely familiar to Estrella after a moment, and she watched Steve much more than the other guys who were singing. They sounded awesome in harmony, and she didn't know how Steve could walk in and just start singing with guys he'd never met, but it was working. By the last line of the short song, she noticed that Steve was looking a little blushed above the white towel around his neck. He was staring right at her, and though his part of the song wasn't carrying the melody, they all sang the last line together.

"Let me call you Sweetheart, I'm in loove with youu," their song said as it came to a gentle, precise finish.

The barbershop erupted in applause, and the guys with scissors and combs in their hands guffawed and waved off the attention. They did a few more moments of hair cutting, and Ralph patted Steve vigorously on the shoulder. Steve could only smile and nod, as his hands were under the smock which kept cut hairs off of him.

"You said you know Coney Island, too? We could do that," the barber on the left said happily.

"Sure," Steve said, but he looked to Estrella, "This one ain't about you, doll. Never mind me if I get a little choked up."

Their next song was fast and playful, with sliding notes and bouncing 'bum-bum-bums.' Now that the shock of hearing him sing was wearing off, Estrella could hear that Steve had a good, mellow singing voice. He made sure to blend in his part, instead of trying to stand out.

Despite the overall happy, bouncy attitude of the song, Steve looked down at his knees as he sang, and she could see that there was something sad in the words for him. Maybe even painful. He missed a few notes on a grimace near the end, but then finished it up calm and composed.

Whatever was in his head was a mystery to her. She was glad she was recording. She could watch it later. The song was about a guy saying goodbye to a girl on purpose and avoiding marriage, and she wondered if he was thinking about Peggy. He probably was. She thought she'd feel jealous that he'd once loved someone else, but she instead felt empathy for his pain. When it seemed like a good time, she'd ask him about Peggy.

They sang I Dream of Jeanie, which was a slower, more melancholy song. Steve's haircut was almost done, and the barbers had a captive audience both in the barbershop and from several people standing outside in the mall. Like the previous song, Steve's mood didn't seem to match. He was happy through this one, and she could tell that he was enjoying the singing. Ralph brushed the back of Steve's neck and his shoulders clean of hairs and took the smock off of him as the song finished.
The barbers gathered around and shook his hand. There was some hearty back slapping, and the guys refused to take Steve's money for the shave and haircut. Estrella fumbled to stop recording.

With his hair cut sharp and a clean shave, Steve looked much more like the Captain. Estrella looked at the men in the barbershop with them. Some of them had an uncertain look on their faces, and one opened his mouth to ask, but Steve took Estrella's hand and they were out into the mall again before anybody could say anything more.

"Steve, that was…wonderful," she finally chose a word.

"Yeah, it was fun I was hoping those guys sang. It might have been awkward if they didn't, but they had the look," Steve said.

He cut his eyes down to her and looked a touch bashful, but it passed. She was still flustered and amazed. Was there anything he couldn't do? Again, she felt unworthy that a man like him, so talented in so many ways, would think to spend time with her. Steve was still grinning and humming softly as they walked, so he didn't notice her thoughtfulness.

His clothes were much dryer now, and she could feel his heat through the dampness of his sleeve. With his fresh haircut and tailored clothes, he was very handsome, and anyone who truly looked at him noticed. She was so into Steve that she didn't notice the guys who looked her way.

Steve brought her to a nail salon, where he'd apparently made her an appointment. It was a good thing, because the mall was packed with people looking for something to do to pass the time.

"You could get a pedi, or have your nails buffed. That doesn't add any color," Estrella told him when he urged her to go on and enjoy her time.

"Sweetheart, the smell here is too strong for me. I'm gonna go wait right over there. I'll be watching. There's a newspaper stand, so I'll get a paper and read a while. Don't worry about me," he told her.

"Okay," she said softly.

She tipped up on her toes, touched his arm for balance, and kissed his cheek soft and slow. It was becoming clear to her that he'd planned their day and made appointments for her while she was in the tub last night. He was so sweet to her that her heart melted yet again. This time she felt his blush as a wash of heat under the skin of his cheek where she kissed him.

Steve cleared his throat and his hand came up to touch the small of her back.

"You better go before I do something dumb in front of all these people," he murmured low at her ear.

Their eyes met, and she was surprised to see that his lips were parted and he was breathing a little hard. The blue of his irises was mostly eclipsed by black, and she sucked in a short breath. He'd gotten that turned on by a simple kiss on the cheek? He had. She wasn't immune to whatever he was feeling, and there was a heavy magnetism between them. She didn't want to go. She wanted to push him down on the mall bench and do something dumb in front of all these people. He might let her, with the way he was looking.

"Go," Steve whispered because he didn't trust his voice not to come out in a croak.

Estrella hummed a note of frustrated longing, but she made herself turn away and go to her nail appointment. Steve pushed some coins into the paper box and took out a local newspaper. He watched her until he saw where she'd be in the nail salon, then he sat on the bench to read. He had to do something to derail his mind from what he was thinking and feeling.

It wasn't in the headlines. Lower down the front page in the national news section was an article about another recent incident of prison homicides. This time in Oregon. Same MO. Surveillance blackout, suspicious timing which made authorities suspect an inside connection, and the deaths were all suspected members of an unnamed Latino gang. Steve read on to see if there was any recent local police or justice system activity related to gangs. There was a local shooting, but it didn't involve any Latinos.

Steve folded the paper and thought about it all while he waited for Estrella to have her nails done.

The lady massaging her feet and trimming her toenails wasn't able to distract her from thinking about Steve. She was barely able to focus on choosing a nail color. Rich, dark mocha brown appealed to her because she felt swaddled in luxury right now, with all the expensive things, and Steve waiting for her.

Chocolate and coffee. That's what she felt she was living on right now. No more cups of lemon water and frugally purchased past-expiration canned goods. Her bed had gone from a damp, exposed crust of musty carpet over splintered wood to a plush warm nest with Steve in it. Was she dreaming? Maybe she'd fallen and hit her head and was in a coma somewhere. No, the chemical acetone smell of the nail salon was too sharp to be in a dream.

The nail technician didn't try to talk to her, and that was good. She absently watched her toes and fingers be tended to, and saw the shiny coats of color applied. Estrella sat at the drying station in a near stupor. This was all real. The plentiful food was real, and the expensive hotel room was real, and the big rumbly truck was real. The man was real, too. And seeing her family wasn't an impossible dream anymore.

She didn't know what to do at the cashier, and then the lady told her it was all pre-paid. She smiled at Estrella and wished her a nice day. Nobody looked at her like she was something that needed to be swept out to the curb.

Estrella felt light and tingly. Cold. Then Steve was there behind her. She looked to his dear, expressive face. He said something, but she only saw his lips move. He picked her up in his arms and swiftly carried her to the bench where he'd been waiting. His heat seeped into her, and his arms were slightly too tight around her. Solid. Real.

"C'mon, c'mon. Eya, talk to me. Do I need to call a medic?" he said, and she finally heard him.

The concern on his face matched the rough, tight petting he handled her with. Her senses returned from the near-swoon, and she wiggled strongly to be let down. People were staring!

"I'm fine. Let me sit," she said.

He put her down beside him on the blue plastic bench and rubbed her back firmly.

"Tell me what that was about," Steve said, and there was no mistaking that it wasn't an order.

She lifted her chin and gave him a stubborn stare. He was stealing her heart, but she wasn't ready to give him every crumb of her mind and her will, too. That was hers to keep.

"It's too much. It's a fairy tale, Steve. I don't believe in them. Life is hard and ugly. This can't be real. It won't last," she told him flatly.
"I know. Feels too good. Like we're dreaming. I've never had this before, Eya. Nothing like it. So I'm gonna take it and run with it. I'm gonna ride it hard while it lasts. That might be six months, and then I find something that can finally end me, or it might be eighty years and grandkids. I'll take what I can get, and I'm gonna use it all until I can't anymore. Will you go with me, or is it too much for you?" he asked in a growl that sounded nearly angry.

With what had happened to him, maybe he had a right to be angry. She was feeling vengeful against circumstance, too. She nodded.

"I'm with you," she said.

She didn't want to be anywhere else.

"But it's too much. Too expensive," she whispered.

"Fuck that. We're here. We're gonna do it because it's here to be done," he said with an aggressive jolt of attitude.

Estrella giggled and covered her mouth with a hand at his uncharacteristic use of an expletive. His intense look grew a smile that was toothy and had that new, kind of scary vibe he sometimes gave off. She laughed again nervously, but she hugged his upper arm to her chest. Steve nodded in satisfaction.

She got another rush of light headedness, but it passed quickly. She splayed out her fingers to show him her pretty, glossy nails. They were growing out, and the lady had trimmed them natural and rounded as she liked. Funny, she didn't remember telling her to do them that way, but she must have.

"Gorgeous. It suits you," Steve said.

He got them up and walking to their next appointment. Estrella couldn't stop smiling. This was really, really real. Like the sharp chemical smell of the nail salon, Steve was too big and exciting and solid to be a dream.

There was a loud boom of thunder from outside, and the power flickered in the mall. Everyone strolling around and shopping paused and went quiet. The power flickered again, and the quiet roar of the rain on the skylights overhead could be heard for the first time since people had stopped walking and talking. The power gave up and went out. The dim light from above was eerie.

"Aww," Steve said in disappointment.

Estrella giggled. She'd lived without electricity to light her stormy days for years.

A cheer went up as the power came back on. Estrella laughed again as the people around them started walking and talking, as if their own personal power plugs had been pulled when the lights went out, and then restored when the power came back on.

"That was strange," Steve commented.

"Oooh. There could have been zombies and screaming. We should watch some scary movies," she said.

"Only if you cuddle up next to me so I won't be scared," he smirked at her.

Estrella pinched him and he pretended to wince away in pain. He looked at his watch and walked with purpose. She didn't ask where he was taking them next. She wanted it to be a surprise.

A hair salon. He checked in their appointments under both their names.

"You just had a haircut," she said in confusion.

"I want something else," Steve told her.

Their hairstylists had chairs across from each other. Estrella and Steve got to make eyes across the way as they were smocked up. She couldn't hear what Steve told the young punk-looking woman assigned to him. The slim, immaculate older man assigned to her put his hands in her hair and leaned her back for a wash. He looked kind and more concerned with doing his job than with her. That was comforting. He was probably gay, and that made her even more at ease.

"What are we looking for today?" he asked her as he massaged her scalp under the warm water.

"I'm not sure. Something easy to do in the mornings. Unstructured, I think. I'm letting it grow, so you could shape it, but don't take much length. Do you have any color that will wash out in a few weeks?" Estrella asked.

"I sure do. You're gorgeous, baby. We could do anything. What color were you thinking? Some streaks around your face, or some tips, or do you want it all colored?" he asked.

"Dark purple, almost black. Some streaks all around. I could run some gel through it and leave it a little wild. It's growing fast, so get all the way to the roots," she told him.

"Uh-un. Some to the roots, some a little ways down. That way, it looks intentional when it starts growing out," he said.

"Good idea," Estrella agreed.

He lathered and rinsed her hair, then sat her up and patted her dry.

"Is that your man? I hope so. Those eyes! If he's not, you've got a creeper," her stylist said quietly.

"He's mine," Estrella said with pride.

Across the way, Steve grinned.

"Oowee. Ya'll are gonna make some beautiful babies," the stylist said.

Estrella laughed.

"I don't know. I think we just started dating, so maybe it's early to think about that," Estrella said.

Steve gave her a smoldering look while his stylist moved around behind him.

"Mm-mm. He's thinking about it," her stylist said.

Estrella giggled again. Her phone vibrated. Steve was holding his, so she pulled her hand out from under the smock and looked.

I don't know if you should tell him that I can hear him. It's up to you.

She turned her head to look at her stylist. He pulled his scissors away from her head.
"He can hear what you say, but I don't think he minds," Estrella warned the man.

"He can't hear through this. It's a madhouse in here today. I can't believe they made us come in to work, with a storm coming. Tips should be good," he said.

Estrella shrugged. If he didn't want to believe her, it didn't matter. She'd been nice enough to warn him.

"Hey, Rafe. Did you hear about the barbershop?" the young blonde stylist working next to hers asked.

"No. Tell me," her stylist said.

"They were singing. I never knew they sang. It was old time stuff," the woman said.

"It would be old stuff. They were a quartet until a few years ago. I heard them when I was a kid. Did anybody say why they were singing? My daddy said they stopped after their baritone died," Rafe answered.

"Somebody said something about Captain America," the blonde said.

Estrella bit her lip hard and looked across to Steve. He smiled slightly while his stylist dabbed something on top of his head. Estrella made a face. He was getting it colored? The idea of him getting his hair colored distracted her from what was being said behind her.

"Like a tribute? Did he die?" Rafe asked.

"Did who die?" Estrella asked.

"Captain America. That man is too fine to die. Please tell me you didn't see something on the news about him being dead," Rafe said urgently.

Estrella laughed.

"He's not dead," she said with cheerful certainty.

"Oh, thank God. How do you know?" Rafe wondered.

Estrella couldn't control her laughter.

She shook her head and smiled. She couldn't say anything.

"Fine then, missy prissy. Keep it to yourself. This is a weird-ass day. If I'm in the middle of your color and the lights go off, you're rinsing it yourself, because I don't do power outages," Rafe said.

He sounded snarky, but he smiled at her kindly as he worked, taking a few strategic snips here and there around her head. Not much hair was falling on the floor, so she knew he was only shaping it. The cutting didn't take long, and then he was on to the color. He had to mix something to get the dark purple she wanted.

"Like aubergine, or like so dark you can only see the color in the sun?" Rafe asked her.

"Halfway between," she told him.

Rafe nodded and finished his mixing. He prepared her for the color application, then got to it. When he was done, he set a timer.
"I'm gonna go check the radar. Weather makes me nervous," he said in preparation of walking away.

"Then maybe you shouldn't look at the radar," Estrella said.

Rafe stared at her.

"Good idea. I'll have a smoke in the restroom. I'll be back when this is done," he said, and walked away.

Estrella looked to see that Steve was waiting on his color, too. It was so incongruous to see him sitting patiently in a hair salon that she chuckled to herself. He didn't look casual or effeminate at all. He looked like he had something on his mind. One of his plans, maybe. She fidgeted with anticipation. All his plans were good ones, some more fun than others.

"What color are you getting?" she asked as if she was talking to herself.

_Natural. It gets lighter in the sun as it grows, but I don't have time to wait,_ he texted back.

"What's the rush?" she asked.

Steve shrugged and texted her.

_Just a feeling._

She gave him the look that told him he wasn't fooling her. He was thinking something, and he wasn't going to share. He wasn't exactly lying, just keeping information to himself. Estrella was okay with that. She trusted him.

She turned away from looking at Steve because it seemed that it was so easy to get each other going today, and she didn't want him to be embarrassed if somebody recognized him and he was obviously hard. He'd hate that. Instead, she tried to listen to the storm over the noise of all the people. It was raging outside, and she marveled that everyone was so happily oblivious inside the mall. It was a cozy feeling, to be protected and immune to the elements.

The timer dinged and Rafe was quick to return. He rinsed, dried and styled her hair while Steve was having the same done across the salon.

"Oh my God!" somebody said.

Estrella winced. She knew Steve hated that, but it was a typical first reaction to someone recognizing him.

There was a hubbub in the salon after that, and Estrella turned her chair around from facing the mirror by pushing her toe along against the hair-dusted vinyl tiles. Rafe had abandoned her, his comb fallen to the floor.

Steve stood up and tugged the Velcro of his smock away from his body. His stylist and everyone in the back part of the salon was shocked still, staring at him.

"I'm on vacation with my girl. I'd really appreciate it if you don't take any pictures," Steve told the room quietly. He hoped to avoid the wave of recognition spreading out into the mall in general.

"But nobody's going to believe us. Why would you be in Corpus?" the blonde stylist asked.

"I've got video of him singing in the barbershop. Soon as vacation is over, I'll post it to YouTube."
Then people will believe you," Estrella said.

"Just lemme get a pic?" a girl asked.

"Ma'am, I'll have your phone memory erased if you do," Steve said as kindly as he could.

"He doesn't like to bully people like that, but he'll do it. I've seen it happen. Please, just let us go. He's really needed some time off," Estrella pleaded for him.

"Y'all, let the Captain alone. Hasn't he done enough?" Rafe said.

The salon was quiet for an instant longer, then everybody rushed into excited twitters of conversation. It seemed that they'd decided to honor Steve's wishes.

"Finish her," Steve told Rafe.

"I sure will," Rafe agreed.

"You could have told us," he whispered to Estrella as he got a fresh wide toothed pick and put the finishing touches on her style.

Estrella shook her head.

"I do what's best for him," she said unapologetically.

Rafe smiled at her and nodded emphatically.

"How's that?" he asked as if she hadn't been watching him style her in the mirror.

Estrella loved the look. It was a messy bob that almost brushed her shoulders. The deep purple color scattered through her ebony hair showed as streaks of rich pigment only where the salon lights gleamed brightest. She stared coldly at the emerging extravagant beauty of her face. This was her and there was nothing she could do to stop it. Nothing except starve herself again. Fuck it, she thought, as Steve had said. Steve was sweet but strong. They could make it despite this, she told herself hopefully. He was genuine enough to see beyond her looks. Maybe she could be more than a thing to him.

"You're a perfect yin for him," Rafe told her.

Estrella smiled and wondered if Rafe was only talking, or if he'd actually read Chinese philosophy as she had in her long, lonely hours in the library. The idea fit for her and Steve and she liked it.

She quietly thanked Rafe. Steve stood waiting for her. He looked just like a sharper, more modern version of the Captain now. His naturally dark blonde hair appeared sun-kissed on the longer top. It barely was long enough to lie over to the side some instead of standing straight up. She didn't understand why more people hadn't seen him before and known who he was. The mall was going to be buzzing all day.

Again, Steve had pre-paid generously. Several people waved goodbye to them and smiled.

"I wanna see the barbershop vid!" Rafe called out before they were beyond earshot.

"I'll put it, I promise, but not yet," Estrella told him.

Rafe nodded and waved, and then they were off to the food court. Steve's clothes were completely dry now, and Estrella walked close to him. The crowds were tight, but not as bad as lunch hour in Manhattan.

They stood in line for her to get noodles and pork, and Steve chose the same, but he ordered two. She had sweet tea, and Steve got a coke. He tugged her through the crowd to a table for two that had just opened up.

They bowed their heads silently over their food, then ate fast.

"Why are we so hungry?" she asked him.

"I don't wanna think about that," Steve said.

As the urgency of their bellies eased a little, they stared at each other and their new hairstyles. It was hard to chew and grin at the same time, but they managed. Steve was doing the worrisome thing where he would seem mesmerized by her, but then he'd look away and shift his eyes around. She'd gotten used to his watchfulness, but it was a little more distracting today.

People were waiting for tables, so they cleared out as soon as only their drinks were left.

"What's scheduled for the rest of the day?" she asked him.

"Another appointment at two, but there's some time until then. You choose," Steve told her as they walked along.

She could hardly see the shop windows, there were so many people. She looked instead at the lighted signs over the doorways. She loved pretty things, and being with Steve had shown her that she could browse the stores now without being harassed. She came to a stop in front of Victoria's Secret.

"Eya, I'd love to take you in there, but I don't think I can handle it right now. Can you wait til we're home and go with Pepper or Nat?" he asked.

Steve wasn't fighting his arousal today. If he did, he'd be an antsy jerk. Instead, he was on a medium simmer. The packed crowds kept anyone from looking at his lower half too closely, and he redirected his thoughts as best he could when they were in for an appointment. If he went in the frilly pink lingerie store with Estrella, he was gonna boil over and there'd be no stopping it. The thought of her fingering fancy, silky, skimpy underthings, then having him wait while she tried them on was enough to make him take a deep, calming breath. He hoped she could tell that that kind of experience was beyond him right now.

"Okay, papi. I won't tease," Estrella said with a little smile.

Steve wanted to automatically ask Jarvis what 'papi' meant, though he thought it was a reference to a father figure. Then, he smiled big because she'd called him a pet name, no matter what she meant by it. The crowd was almost too loud to talk over, so he didn't try. They walked on.

Estrella pulled him into a bath and fragrance store as soon as she could get a break in foot traffic. Steve tried to breathe shallow while she perused all the soaps, lotions, candles, and perfumes. There were bath salts and little bead thingies, and scrubbers like he had in his shower at home, all of it in an array of colors that would be pleasing to the feminine eye. He liked color too, so he tried to focus on the visuals of the place rather than on what all the mixed fragrances were doing to his nose.

He could tell that Estrella was delighted with her surroundings, but she wasn't touching anything. Steve got a shopping tote when they passed a stack of them. He chose a dark blue shower scrubby for himself and a lavender and yellow one for her. She smiled at him.

"You're shopping for me," she said.

"You're not doing a very good job of it. I'm hoping to get you started. Go on, Eya. Get some things. We're not here just to look," he encouraged her.

She dithered over putting her hands on the fizzing bath balls, so Steve put a vanilla one and a gardenia one in their basket. She made a face and put the gardenia one back. They had goat milk soaps. They looked and felt rich and creamy. Steve stared hard at her. Estrella put a lemon verbena bar and a bourbon coffee one in the basket.

"Mmm. Bourbon coffee. I want to use that one. Or you can use it and then I can smell you," Steve said.

Estrella took a shaky breath at the mental image of Steve gliding his mouth and nose all over her to smell her. She stood still in the aisle and put her hand out on a wooden crate.

"That good, huh? I wonder if I'm thinking the same thing as you?" he asked at her ear.

"It's not fair! I can't take you in Victoria's Secret, but you can put those kinds of thoughts in my head?" she complained mildly.

"Do ya want me to behave?" Steve asked her with a sly look.

Estrella bit her lip and shook her head. He chuckled and encouraged her to continue shopping.

She chose a mildly scented herbal lotion and some pure lightweight olive massage oil. Steve stared at her hotly when the oil went into the basket. She hid her face behind her hair and hurried to the checkout. There were baskets near the checkout counter that contained little tubes of body glitter dust. Steve dug through until he found a shade of gold that he thought would look fine on her skin, and dropped the tube in her shopping basket. Estrella stuck out her chin at him and put tubes of red and blue body glitter in the basket too. Steve rolled his eyes, but didn't complain.

Steve paid before she could reach beyond him with her money. His card was plain, matte black. Even the raised numbers were dull black. The cashier looked up at him and her mouth parted slightly. She took the card and stared at it for a moment.

"I didn't think these were real," she whispered.

"Just run it, Ma'am. We've got somewhere to be in a few minutes," Steve said.

The girl nodded and processed the purchase. Her eyes were still wide as she watched Steve and Estrella leave the store. She whispered to her manager and wondered who he was. By her afternoon break, the girl had heard enough of the talk around the mall to figure it out.

Steve led them down a quiet, mostly vacant side hallway. The lights here were dim and moody, and the décor changed from bland, trendy mall style to elegant and slightly Asian. A stylized word in fancy script was on the glass pane door. Steve pushed in and Estrella realized they were going into a spa.

"Steve!" she hissed at him.

"What?" he asked with more of that sly little pleased smile he'd worn for so much of the day.
"This- We- I've never-!" she exclaimed.

"I know. Me, neither. The guys would rag me forever. That's why we're doing it now," he told her.

"Oh," was all Estrella could think to say.

If he wanted this, then she'd go along with it.

"You must be Sofi and Grant. Welcome. Right this way. We're ready for you," a statuesque brunette lady greeted them. She moved in that graceful, unhurried way that Estrella had always envied on some of the classic movie stars.

Steve strolled beside her through a heavy set of doors into a lush, sensually themed environment done in earth tones, with wood and stone accents. The air smelled fresh, humid, and faintly scented with something botanical. It was how Estrella imagined paradise smelled.

"Unfortunately, you'll have to be apart in the changing rooms, but we've cleared our schedule on both the men's and women's sides for the rest of the afternoon to accommodate your needs. The staff is prepared to provide you with anything you wish," the lady said.

"Thank you," Steve said.

"Steve!" Estrella mouthed silently to him.

He took out his cell phone and gave it to her. She didn't know why he did, but he took hers instead.

"Jarvis is in mine. He'll be with you while I'm not, if you want," Steve said.

The lady held open a door for Estrella and she reluctantly went ahead, while looking back at Steve.

"I'll see ya in a few, doll. Don't worry. Enjoy," Steve told her.

She would try. She didn't like being away from him in a strange place. The movie-star lady led her into a lavish bathroom with toilets discreetly tucked off to the side, and a makeup counter with everything she'd need to remove her makeup if she was wearing any, and then there were lockers and showers. All of it was rich-looking beyond her imagining, and spotlessly clean. It was like something she'd seen in a glossy magazine. She nodded as if she was fine with it all, and the lady left her alone.

Estrella shut herself in a toilet stall and tapped at Steve's phone. It was different from hers. She didn't know the passcode, so she pressed the home button.

"Jarvis?"

"Yes, Miss?" came his familiar voice.

"Hi," she said.

"Hello, Miss. I've missed your company. It's good to hear from you. Is everything alright?" he asked.

"Yes. No. I don't know. How do I live like this?" she asked in a rush.

"I believe you are in a spa. Are things not to your liking?" Jarvis wondered gently.

"I've never done this. What do I do?" she whispered.
"First things first. Are you in need of the toilet?" Jarvis asked.

"I guess I could try," she said.

"I recommend that you do. Miss Potts can spend hours at the spa, and I would imagine one would want to be most comfortable while doing so. I will wait for you to call me if you have any further need," Jarvis told her.

"Thank you," she said.

"It's my pleasure, Miss. As I said, I've missed talking to you," Jarvis assured her.

Estrella put Steve's phone in her shopping bag and hung the bag on the back of the door. Even the door wasn't a regular bathroom stall door. It was paneled and had fancy molding and louvers. There was nice stone trim in the stall and the fixtures were brushed honey-bronze.

She sat and waited, and was almost too excited to relax enough to pee, but eventually got it done. She was swollen and slick when she wiped, but that was becoming normal when she spent time with Steve. She washed her hands, then wondered what was next. She looked to the locker room and took out the phone.

"Jarvis, am I supposed to change into something?" she asked.

"Not precisely. There should be lockers. Do you see them?" he said.

"Yes,"

"Take off your clothing and store everything in a locker. Are there towels nearby? Robes, perhaps?" Jarvis prompted.

There were, now that she looked for them. She nodded. There was a new looking pair of taupe flip-flops in the bottom of the locker she chose. She looked around to see that she was completely alone, then took off her clothes and wrapped herself in a robe. The footwear was a bit large for her, but it didn't matter.

"Do you see a changing room?" Jarvis asked.

"I was supposed to use a changing room?" Estrella asked.

"They are customarily provided, yes," Jarvis said.

"I didn't use one!" Estrella said in a rush.

"Not to worry, Miss. There are no cameras, and you are alone. It is customary to wear a swimsuit for the next part of your stay. Do you have one?" Jarvis asked.

"No," she lamented.

"Please don't be distressed. This is meant to be relaxing. The Captain is doing his best to please you, but I'll have you know that he is experiencing some of the same difficulties on the men's side of the spa. He has the additional embarrassment of an attendant, so things over there are possibly more amusing," Jarvis told her with some humor.

"Really? What's his attendant like?" Estrella wondered.

"He is a burly young man, but discreet and distinguished for his age. He is much like a well-trained footman. Our Captain doesn't know quite what to make of him, but they are muddling along," Jarvis told her.

Estrella laughed. She'd love to see that. Not that she enjoyed Steve's discomfort, but he was funny sometimes.

"If there aren't any cameras, then how are you aware of what's happening with Steve?" she asked.

"He has asked that I monitor him through your cellular phone while you are apart, precisely because he wants the information available to you, should you feel you need it," Jarvis explained.

Estrella took a sharp breath. The ways that Steve showed her he cared were piling up into a mountain. He thought of almost everything, and then sent Jarvis with her for everything else.

"I love him," she said quietly.

"Yes, Miss," Jarvis said.

She stood in the empty locker room awash in feeling until she realized that she should be moving along to whatever was next. Jarvis waited with her patiently. There was a tiny white noise from the phone that let her know he was there.

"What do I do about not having a swimsuit?" she wondered.

"How comfortable are you with the Captain seeing you naked?" Jarvis asked.

She had to think about that. She very much wanted to be with him. If she could, she would have already liked to be with him completely, but he was denying them that. If she was honest with herself, she knew she wasn't ready, either. She wanted her fears gone or at least managed before then so she could fully enjoy being with Steve. Being naked with him shouldn't be a problem, because they almost had been yesterday.

They were sort of in public, but it felt private because they had the place to themselves. There were attendants, and Steve had shown remarkable restraint so far. He was a gentleman.

"I'm comfortable enough," Estrella said.

"You don't sound certain," Jarvis cautioned her.

"I'm not, but I'm going to do this anyway," Estrella decided.

"Then there is nothing for it but to proceed. There should be showers, and then a room with some combination of hot tub, sauna, and steam room. I believe the Captain will meet you there, just past the showers. He is extremely efficient at showering and is already waiting," Jarvis told her.

Nervousness shimmied through her, but Estrella walked toward the showers she could see beyond the locker room. She still felt clean from her bath last night, but the place was fastidious, so maybe they expected everyone to shower whether they needed it or not. She didn't like that she was stripping naked in an unsecured place where strangers could come at any time, but it felt safe. She set the phone on the bench with her towel just outside the shower.

"Jarvis, please tell me if anyone is coming," she said.

"I will, Miss," he promised.

She avoided getting her hair wet and tried to be 'efficient' as Jarvis said Steve was. It took some washing to cleanse herself of all the slickness, and washing with slippery soap wasn't helping to make it any less. She did the best she could, then patted dry and got back into her robe. She picked up Jarvis and brought him with her.

As she approached the door from the showers, she saw someone through the frosted glass, and the door opened for her. A neatly attired androgynous person smiled pleasantly at her and indicated with a hand where she should go. A short hallway opened under an arch into a water room of milk-colored tile.

Steve was already in the heated, bubbling pool with his arms resting along the rounded stone edge. He looked to her with a sheepish expression.

"We should have brought our swimsuits," he said.

"How were we supposed to know?" she wondered rhetorically.

She walked to the stepped entry of the pool and slipped her feet out of the flip-flops. The attendants weren't here to see her, but Steve looked at her with friendly expectation. She looked down and aside as she untied her robe and let it slip down her arms.

"Ooh, God. Eya…" Steve said.

The fervent tone to his words made her want to look at him, but she resisted. There was a teak bench for her robe, and a stack of neatly folded towels on a stand. She laid her robe across the bench and slowly stepped down into the hot, turbulent water.

Steve gripped the stone edge and let the rest of his body roll once, in imitation of what it wanted to do. That was indulgence enough, so he made himself go loose and still. Breathing. He could do that. Estrella's demure refusal to look at him while she entered and got herself situated across from him fanned his fires even more. He'd seen her yesterday, but this was different. Yesterday was informal and playful. She'd had her top on and he'd been trying hard to see her as a whole person, not just as a beautiful dame.

He gave up on that. For the moment, she was a fantasy. Grace. Delicacy. Softness. Gentle, divine curves and the sweetest puffy nipples he'd ever seen. Her sleek black fur of pubic hair nestled in the cradle of her hips, those dusky pink nipples, her new dark nail color, and her golden skin and smooth curves had him desperately on edge.

Then she looked at him. His friend. His girl. Her eyes.

Steve leaned back to look at the ceiling because he couldn't take anymore and keep his dignity. He let go of the stone ledge because he could feel it shedding grit under the hard clamp of his fingers. Breathe. Just breathe.

Estrella kept quiet and let Steve calm himself. She was pleased with his reaction. She'd expected his restraint, but not the unabashed compliment he paid her with his natural response. The banked fire in his eyes when he finally looked at her again was a thrill and an honor. He stayed where he was, and she didn't go any closer to tease or tempt him. Sometimes she could do that with him, but not now.

"I'm sorry," she said.

"No. Don't be," he told her.

He was just as magnificent to look upon as he seemed to think she was. Something that Bucky had said about him kept her from displaying any effusive praise. Instead, she let him see her thinking what she’d like to do with him.

There was a dark area under the water, so she assumed he’d chosen to wear his underwear. It was just as well, because she was very tempted to go and touch the parts of him that she knew were hard and ready for her, as she was ready for him. She chewed the corner of her lip and frowned at his underwear in vexation.

"We gotta stop this, or I’m gonna need to leave you for a few minutes," Steve said.

She nodded and barely was able to control her feeling of feminine satisfaction. She didn't like vanity, but it was hard not to be pleased at how much he wanted her.

"Mona Lisa," Steve teased her.

She shook her head and did what she could to help them.

"Are we here for a massage? Massages?" she asked.

"That’s the plan. They said to get here an hour early, but I didn't expect all this," Steve played along with light conversation.

"Jarvis thinks this is typical. He knows what Pepper's routines are. Are we becoming like them? Like Tony and Pepper?" Estrella asked.

"No. Never. I don't want that kind of notoriety. I’ll do what I have to do, but other than that, I want a quiet life. What about you?"

"I haven't thought about what I want since I was a kid,' she said.

"Maybe you should start. I've always been reactive. Things happen, and then I deal with them. You've been the same. That's how it is when you're making do. I want more than that for you. For us. We should think about a future beyond survival and necessity," Steve said.

"Can we have that?" she asked.

"We're having it right now. I don't see why it has to stop," he told her.

"Plants. I want to grow things," Estrella said.

"Ya do? What kinds of plants?" he wondered.

"All kinds. Trees. Flowers. Vegetables. Did you know there are purple grasses? They make a big, spilling fountain of leaves, with feathery tails on top," Estrella said.

"Sounds like a jungle," he agreed.

"Apes belong in a jungle," Estrella grinned.

"Whoo-ooo," Steve cooed softly at her.

She laughed with delight. The idea of cavorting with him in a verdant garden was something she hadn't thought of yet. It was fun and sweet and hot and…bare skin in the sunshine on soft, green grass, salty sweat and the scent of flowers.

"Mmm," she hummed.
"We'll get you a garden," Steve said.

"No. A garden is not something you 'get.' It takes time and selection and care. I'll grow it," Estrella said.

"What do you want?" she asked him.

"My wants are simple. You and me and some peace here and there, and whatever that leads to," he said.

She was going to reply, but the power went out. There was a moment of complete blackness, and then amber emergency lighting came on in the corner of the room and the hallway beyond. The swirling of the water stopped, but it was still pleasantly hot.

"Hmph," Steve grunted.

The kind, androgynous attendant hurried into the room with a flashlight.

"I apologize for the interruption. If you'll gather your things, I'll lead you to the dressing rooms," she said.

"Is there any sudden danger, or is the power just out?" Steve asked lazily.

"It's only a power outage, Sir."

"Then light some candles. We're not afraid of the dark," Steve instructed.

"Yes, Sir," the woman said, and left the way she'd came.

Estrella looked at him in the dim amber light.

"What?" he asked.

"You're bossy," she said.

"People need direction sometimes. Everybody panics like it's the end of the world if there's an electrical interruption. I don't think a massage requires power tools," he said.

"It might, for you," she said.

Steve laughed.

"We're ready for your session, if you're sufficiently relaxed," the woman came back to tell them.

Steve got out of the pool and dried himself briskly. He wrapped a fresh towel around his waist and held another towel for Estrella. She stepped out of the water and noted that Steve didn't look at her before he wrapped her in the towel. He used another towel to rub her arms, shoulders, and legs dry. She was becoming accustomed to him handling her feet to get the sand off, but she wasn't prepared for him to kiss her feet, one then the other, before he set them down.

"Steve," she protested.

"Shh. Let me do," he told her.

Estrella picked up her robe because Steve's phone was in the pocket. They followed the attendant down a long, dark hallway. More amber light lit their way at the end, but they turned left into a quiet candle lit room. There were two massage tables.

"Make yourselves comfortable. There is cool water if you're thirsty. Your therapists will be with you shortly," the woman said.

"You first, Eya. Lie down and I'll cover you. I won't look," Steve said.

"You could," she told him.

"I won't," he insisted.

Estrella dropped her towel and hung her robe on a hook. Steve lifted the towel folded across one of the padded massage tables and laid it across her bottom when she climbed up and lay on her belly.

"Who's going to hold the towel for you?" she asked.

"I'll manage," he said as he moved to the other table.

"I'm looking," she teased him.

"That's alright," Steve said.

He shucked his wet underwear and folded it atop the damp towels near her robe. In candlelight, his sculpted body looked archaic. Primal. Like he should be wearing furs and carrying a spear. She watched the play of muscles avidly as he got onto his table and tugged the towel across his ass with one hand.

Just then, two people entered.

One was a pretty young woman, and the other was a burly young man. He must be the 'footman' Jarvis had spoken of. Estrella smiled as they introduced themselves.

"Would you like to turn over, Miss? We usually begin with the front," the woman asked her.

Estrella's eyes flickered to the muscled young man. He smiled at her once, and then he turned his back to her to get some warmed oil and begin work on Steve. Steve looked at her placidly. He would support whatever she wanted to do.

Estrella turned carefully and let herself be exposed. With Steve here, she could do this. The woman made nothing of her exposure and merely resettled her towel across her lap, then joined the young man in getting some oil.

The massage tables were beside each other at the head with a little space in between so that Estrella could see and talk to Steve if she wanted to.

"Oh!" she exclaimed when the woman touched her shoulders gently with oiled hands.

"I didn't think about that, babe. You don't need to do this if it's bad for you," Steve said.

His masseuse was already pressing into the hard muscles of his shoulders.

"I'm okay. I'm not used to being touched, except by you," she said.

"I know, so you don't have to. It was only an idea, maybe a bad one. I wasn't thinking, I guess," Steve told her.
"Miss? Should I stop?" the woman asked her.

Her hands went still.

"No. Go on," Estrella said.

"May I remove your necklace?" she asked.

"No. Work around it," Steve told her.

"Yes, Sir," the woman said.

After that, there was silence except for the sounds of hands rubbing on oiled skin. Steve looked at her face, or at where the masseuse worked her arms, not at her chest. Estrella liked how Steve's eye's kept trying to roll shut. He was very obviously enjoying the massage.

"If you like it so much, I could learn," she told him.

"I'm sorry, Miss, but I doubt you'd have the upper body strength for him," the young man digging into Steve's muscles said.

"Thor could do it then," Estrella giggled to Steve.

"Hah!" he barked out a laugh, "The prince of Asgard working on me? I don't think so. Been there, done that. Bloodstains on the floor to prove it."

The man and woman exchanged glances, but they kept their mouths shut.

"I don't think you want Nat on me. I don't want that, either. I don't trust her not to take something while she's working. I don't care if she's strong enough," Steve denied.

"Bruce, then," Estrella suggested.

Steve laughed again. She liked how he was starting to sound relaxed.

"Bruce doesn't massage so much as pulverize. I'm sure you saw what he did to the East side of the Empire State," he said.

"No, you dunce. I mean Bruce," she corrected him.

"Oh. Yeah, that could work, but I don't want to take up his time. He's got more important things to work on than me. And I'm not so sure that Bruce is as separate as he thinks he is. Don't tell him that, though," Steve said.

"Should we be talking like this?" Estrella wondered with a glance at the people working on them.

The woman was making jelly out of her arms. Warm, splendid jelly. Relaxed jelly.

"It's alright. They're not regulars here. Tony flew them in," Steve said.

"Tony! Steve! You're both crazy!" she exclaimed.

"Sir, friendly conversation is encouraged, but excitement isn't good for deep relaxation," the "Yeah. Sorry," Steve mumbled.

Estrella seethed at Tony. These people with money had no sense! To fly people into a storm just for a massage? She was going to tell him a few things when they got back.

"Miss, breathe with me," the woman said.

Estrella almost told her what she could do with her breathing, but then decided not to. Even worse than flying all the way to give somebody a massage was getting there and then having the person refuse the massage. She made the effort to relax and breathe deeply with the woman as her neck and temples were massaged. It was hard to stay tense through that.

There were a lot of candles, and it was easy to see that Steve had given up his struggle to stay coherent. The young man had laid his arms upward on the table and was working the muscles along the sides of Steve's chest. He noticed Estrella's regard and smiled at her in a friendly way. It felt very strange to have her chest exposed and be sexually ignored by a man who was standing right next to her. Estrella smiled back at him. He didn't have time to look at her for long, anyway. He moved down to the other end of Steve's table and started on his legs.

The woman rubbed her sides some, but she didn't have the muscles there that Steve had, and she was ticklish, anyway. She moved on to Estrella's legs. Estrella closed her eyes. She got nervous when the massage moved up her thighs, but nothing was done higher than where her towel covered her, so she relaxed again.

"If you turn, we can continue," she said.

Estrella enjoyed the massage, but mostly for the candlelit atmosphere and Steve's presence. She'd have just as much fun watching him get a massage without her being on a table. He occasionally groaned a little, or huffed out a breath, and frequently he opened his eyes to smile at Estrella.

"Get the glutes. Tony's right. I never can seem to relax them," he told the young man.

"They're a powerful muscle group, used for almost everything. Doing glutes thoroughly can hurt. Are you sure, Sir?" he asked.

"Get it done. I'm not fragile," Steve said.

"Yessir," he agreed.

Estrella tilted her head to look down the table at what the man was doing. What was the big fuss, she wondered?

"Your ass. You have him massaging your ass?" she asked.

"It's common in sports medicine, Miss. It's different for the ladies. If it disturbs you, I can stop?" he asked either Steve or Estrella.

Estrella looked to Steve. He didn't look like this was a kinky sex thing. He looked matter of fact and patient for her to decide.

"Go on," she told the masseuse.

Estrella enjoyed the backs of her thighs being worked, and then the woman moved up to the small of her back and she closed her eyes.

Steve tried his best to relax and let the guy get to deep tissue. He was good and strong, but it was near impossible for Steve to completely let his guard down, even with people Tony had vetted.

"Sir, you seem to be having trouble loosening. Is something bothering you?" the young man asked.

It was ever so slight, but his firm hands glided a little closer down and center between his cheeks than they needed to. The touch was a hint too gentle, too.

"You best stick to business, son," Steve told him.

"Understood, Sir," he said with cool professionalism.

Geez, what did Tony use these people for, normally? He hadn't been expecting that kind of services. His masseuse returned to doing the best that he could against his partially tense muscles. He couldn't expect too much of the kid. It took a lot more than some rubbing to get him thoroughly loose. It was better than nothing, with the concerns he had on his mind.

When the massage was done, he told Estrella to leave the room with the attendants. She took her robe, and he was proud that she felt secure enough to go somewhere without him. She had Jarvis and he'd told J to listen in no matter what. He wrapped his towel around and followed back to the showers and dressing rooms when he was sure Estrella was clear of the hallway.

His masseuse, whom he'd at first taken for a spa employee, met him in the locker area.

"Mister Odinsson sent this for you. He said you'd know what it was. Shall I mix it with anything?" the man asked.

He held a flask that Steve recognized.

"Not now. I've gotta drive. Leave it on the bench," Steve said.

"Yessir. Is there anything else I can do for you?" the guy asked.

There was a ready look on the young man's face. Steve knew that when he said anything, he meant it.

"No. Thanks for your time," Steve told him.

"It's an honor, Sir," he said.

He bowed slightly and made a sharp turn. He left and Steve relaxed a little.

He felt good all over, and he was able to set aside the slight uneasiness he always felt when he was offered something from a guy. It happened. Guys were guys. It didn't mean anything.

Steve was quick to get most of the massage oil off of his skin, get dressed and join his girl. They left the spa and Steve escorted Estrella through the comparatively noisy mall.

"Is there anything else you want to do here?" he asked her.

"No. Could we go back to our room? I'm all warm and fuzzy. A nap would be good," Estrella said.

"Sure thing, sweetheart. The weather's worse. You wanna wait while I bring the truck?" he asked her as they neared the portico entrance.
The rain was so heavy that the visibility across the parking lot was severely diminished. Steve's eyes swept the crowd of people who were milling around inside. There was only so much to be done in a shopping mall. A lot of folks were simply waiting around for the storm to pass.

"I can go with you. We've got towels to dry off back in the room, and some in the truck, too," she said.

Steve's eyes caught on a group of three young Latino men. They were the same ones he'd seen standing on the street corner not far from Alberto's house a few days ago. He let his eyes keep moving. There were plenty of Latino people in the crowd. More than half of them were. People of all sorts. But those three had a look to them. They were too still. Trying too hard to look casual. They looked at Estrella a little too long.

"Good. Let's go," Steve said.

Estrella squealed and laughed at the cold, hard wind-driven rain, but she kept up with his jog through the parking lot to the truck. Steve kept his attention broad. Nobody else was in the lot with them. Nobody except the three Latino youths, still trying to look casual. They were headed to a car parked three rows away from the truck.

"Get the truck started for me, will ya? Keep the doors locked until I get back," he said to Estrella after he had her inside. He tossed her the keys across the seat.

She was grinning and wiping rain from her face. She lost her smile when she noticed his quiet demeanor. Steve stood in the open driver's door with the rain pounding on him and running off his nose. It wasn't the way people usually chose to stand in the pouring rain. He didn't care that the inside door panel of his truck was getting wet.

"Okay," she said.

He pressed the door lock button and shut her inside. He heard the truck start as he walked away. He kept his attention active, scanning. Just because he'd seen three didn't mean there were only three. They were already in their car with it started and ready to follow his truck as he drove away.

Their faces glared at him through the rain-sheeted windshield. They weren't making any sudden moves, just startled and unsure about seeing him coming for them across the lot. Did they really think he wouldn't have noticed them? Their confusion and inaction at his direct, aggressive approach told him that they didn't know who he was.

Steve drew his sidearm and fired two shots. One into the front tire of the car, and one into the back tire. Everybody probably carried a spare, but not two spares. The guys in the car finally got rowdy with the gunshots, and the driver shoved out of the car.

"What the hell are you doing to my car, man? Are you crazy?" he asked in heavily accented English.

Steve holstered his sidearm under the back of his shirt and manhandled the young man around until he was pressed to the car and he had good physical control of him. He saw tattoos. The other two got out of the car on the passenger side, ready to support their friend. All three had tattoos. Steve glanced at the tattoos, and around at the parking lot again. It was still just these three.

He tore the neck and sleeves of the driver's shirt and twisted his exposed arms and torso around to get a good look. He'd seen this kind of thing. Street gangs. Pride marks. He bounced the kid's head against the car roof and dropped him to the pavement, then he jumped over the car and grabbed the other two. Some handling and tearing, and he found a lot of the same tats on the other guys.

"Get the fuck off, man! Hey, fuck you!" one said while he struggled uselessly.

The other one went pale and pissed himself. Steve found their phones in their back pockets and bent them in half. Unusable. That would give him and Eya a little more time to get away clean and unfollowed. He left the two guys conscious to help their buddy. Another quick scan showed him no firearms on them or in the car at easy access. He studied their faces more closely, then turned and walked away. Parking lot still clear.

There was some yelling behind him, but no footsteps. He walked on.

"What did you do? Did I hear gunshots?" Estrella asked him as soon as he got in the truck.

"Punks were gonna follow us. I shot their tires," Steve said.

He drove calm and careful away from the mall. He hated that Estrella was shaken by an unpleasant moment at the end of an otherwise great day.

"You recorded me singing," he said to make conversation at a red light.

"Yes I did. Steve. You shot somebody's tires. You're going to ignore that?" she asked incredulously.

"You want me to go back and make something of it? I can, if you'd feel safer," he offered.

"No! You've done enough. What if the police come?" she asked.

"Then I'll explain it to them, and they'll understand, but I don't think they'll come," he told her.

He took a longer route back to their hotel and watched his mirrors. Nobody was following. Some of the traffic lights were out, and the wind buffeted the truck, trying to push it sideways.

He got them to the hotel and didn't offer to set Estrella down in the portico. He parked around the side away from the view of the street. He wanted her with him from now on.

The hotel staff offered them towels just inside the doors in the lobby. Estrella took one and started to dry herself, and Steve stood and waited for her. She made a face and patted him down, too. That was good, because he wasn't going to distract himself with a towel. He was only wet. The hotel staff mostly weren't Latino, and the ones who were didn't have any visible tattoos.

Steve kept Estrella in front of him on their way to the elevator. People got out of their way, and he nodded his appreciation to them. He relaxed some when he got them inside their room and checked it. Everything was good. Undisturbed. He got his shield and wedged the edge of it into the frame along with the door.

"What are you doing?" Estrella asked him.

"We're secure. You can relax. Dry off if you want to," he told her.

"Why don't you relax?" she asked him.

"I'm relaxed. I'm good. Wanna watch some television? We can order a pizza later," Steve told her.

He took off his wet shirt and set his holster on the table. He got two towels from the bathroom area. One he sat on so he wouldn't get the upholstered chair wet. He used the other one while he disassembled, cleaned and dried his pistol.

"I feel like I'm in a movie. We spent all day having people make us pretty, and then you shot something," she said.

"You didn't need anyone to make you pretty," Steve commented.

Estrella gave up trying to talk to him. If he was going to refuse to talk about what had happened in the parking lot, she'd stop asking him. She went to her suitcase, got dry clothes, then went into the bathroom to change.

She knew she was going to have to accept this harder side of Steve too, no matter that she liked the softer side of him better. She towed her hair dry some more and looked in the mirror to finger comb it until she was satisfied. Mostly, she was trying to calm down from hearing gunshots and dreading that they may have been fired at Steve instead of by him. That had been a horrible few minutes until he'd come back to the truck drenched but unharmed.

Estrella got into comfortable sleepwear and sat on the toilet lid until her hands stopped shaking. She took out her phone and selected the barbershop video she'd taken this morning. The soft Steve she liked was in it, not the hard, efficient man who was out in the room cleaning his gun.

She turned her phone volume down and played back the video. She'd been too surprised that Steve was singing at all to appreciate what he was singing. The first song they'd sung was short. Her videography wasn't the best, but she'd kept them all in the frame. Steve was so handsome and kind looking. There was sincerity in his eyes as he looked at the camera and sang. Looked at her and sang.

Now that she had time, she could hear him distinctly among the three other guys. The words of the song were clear and sweet, and his voice was beautiful. His eyes, just for her.

_I am dreaming_ Dear of you, day by day

_Dreaming when the skies are blue, when they're gray;_

_When the silv'ry moonlight gleams, still I wander on in dreams,_

_In a land of love, it seems, just with you._

_Let me call you 'Sweetheart', I'm in love with you._

_Let me hear you whisper that you love me too._

_Keep the love-light glowing in your eyes so true._

_Let me call you 'Sweetheart', I'm in love with you._

_Longing for you all the while, more and more;_

_Longing for the sunny smile I adore;_

_Bird are singing far and near, Roses blooming ev'rywhere_

_You, alone, my heart can cheer; You, just you._

_Let me call you 'Sweetheart', I'm in love with you._
Let me hear you whisper that you love me too.

Keep the love-light glowing in your eyes so true.

Let me call you 'Sweetheart', I'm in loove wiith youu.

When the song was over, there was glad comradery among the singers, but Steve kept looking at her every so often. He never looked at anyone else like that. She'd been smiling at the time the video was recorded, gobsmacked, amazed. He looked patient. Indulgent. Like he could wait for her to get the message.

Estrella dropped her phone and ran out of the bathroom. Steve was still sitting at the little hotel table, but he'd set his gun aside. He was turned toward the bathroom door like he was listening and hopeful. His hard look was gone, replaced by the same soft, nearly shy expression he'd had in the video while he sang.

He hugged her close when she came into his arms. He made room for her between his knees and scooted forward in the chair so they could be closer.

"Sweetheart, I'm in love with you," he said into her nightshirt, a touch of Brooklyn coming out with the strength of his emotion.

"I love you too," Estrella whispered to him.

"I love you," she repeated more strongly.

Her hands travelled over all of him that she could reach, claiming him and soaking in the feel of him. He hugged her carefully and rubbed his face into the softness of her chest. Their touch was enthralling. Addictive. She wanted more. If he felt this good through their clothes, she had to know what their skin would feel like together.

Estrella urged him up from the chair and toward the nearest bed. Steve spread his hands on her back and held her to him at the chair. She frowned at him in disappointment and tugged at the bulk of his shoulders again, her fingers digging in gently as if she had any hope of moving him.

"I can't get in a bed with you tonight, Eya. I'm burning," he said.

Steve guided her hand to rest against his throat. He was hot and the strength of his heart pounded through the veins near the surface of his skin. He looked bright and angelic, but blazing like a sword across the path into Eden. She gasped and squirmed in the strength of his arms. The delight she knew she'd find with him was so close, but so impossible. He wouldn't let them.

Steve got up and laid her across her bed, and then he moved to lie on his. They rolled belly down and stared at each other in the lamplight. More than just what their bodies wanted, she could see all kinds of unspoken things in his eyes. He reached his hand into the space between the beds. She twined her fingers among his and they forgot to order pizza for a long time.

The tropical storm pushed and howled and spattered outside the window and it was a good background for the way they were feeling. After they remembered to eat, Steve cleared the night stand of everything but the lamp and set it between them. They played cards quietly with a deck that Steve got from his suitcase.

When Estrella started drooping and yawning, he put away the cards and set the room to rights for the night. His shield stayed wedged in the door, but his reassembled pistol went under his spare pillow, minus the holster.
"Sweetheart, you gotta stay over there in the morning," he said after he turned the lights off.

"Okay," she agreed reluctantly.
Chapter 42

Estrella whimpered in her sleep. She felt unbearably aroused. Steve was teasing her, always teasing in her dreams. Her body shifted on the bed, seeking any sort of relief. Dream images of him holding her, kissing her, his hands wandering slowly toward where she needed them most amplified her longing. Always, his attentions would tease, and then draw away.

A low moan of anguish sounded in the hotel room, and she murmured his name with pleading tones. Her legs shifted against each other and her hands travelled her body in an effort to satisfy the need.

Nothing helped. Even in her sleep, her mind recognized her own touch as too soft, too familiar to be what she needed. Her fists balled in frustration and she growled in hollow torment.

"Steeve, please!" she called to the man in her dreams.

This was the best dream yet. It wasn't some faceless female body this time. His mind had gifted him his own girl to play with. Estrella was erotic and beautiful, and so realistic in detail that he could smell her.

Her body showed him in plain language that she wanted the same thing he did. He lowered his weight onto her bed and then shifted over her. Since she was so real and he loved her, he didn't want to hurt her, even in his dreams. His strength effortlessly nudged her restless thighs apart and he captured her under him.

The sweetness of her voice saying his name shredded any thoughts he might have had about her fears. The Estrella in his dreams was ready for him, and there was no reason to deny them what they both wanted. It was only a dream, and he could have what he wanted in dreams. He carefully but firmly gripped her in a carnal hug and pressed his hips forward to find the heat he knew she'd have for him.

Underwear? Confusion pushed him a little further toward consciousness. He'd never had the impediment of underwear in his sex dreams. His fist reached and ripped his shorts out of the way. Estrella's voice changed. She still sounded sweet and compelling, but there was a rising urgency to her tone.

He started to wake from the dream when her hand fumbled for her necklace on the night stand and the alarm clock clattered to the floor. Little details like that didn't matter. The mind was a weird place. This was his sex dream, and he wanted to ignore the weird stuff so he could get to the good part faster. Her cotton panties were still in the way, so he rested his weight on an elbow and slid his hand down her taut belly. A finger hooked in the fragile fabric and one little jerking motion would get him access.

Estrella bit her lip against making any more frightened sounds. The dim morning light through the hotel curtains showed her that Steve was mostly asleep. His barely open, drugged eyes regarded her with wonder. He was gentle, but inescapable in his intentions. Her attempts to push him off were completely ineffective and likely not even noticed by him.

She'd never thought to see that look of complete animal dumbness on his dear features, but his state of partial consciousness allowed it to happen. She'd seen him aroused many times, but right now his sharp wit and awareness were asleep at the wheel.
Estrella sighed. She'd known this would happen sooner or later. It was her fault for taking off her necklace to sleep, she reasoned. She didn't want to hurt him to make him stop. It seemed cruel to stab him with such terrible pain while he was mostly asleep and vulnerable.

His weight pressed her down, and the mere discomfort of his firm hug turned into pain when he pressed his hips and his erection forward against her. She was aroused and tender, and the friction of dry cotton between them pulled at delicate skin. The pressure of him pushing at her for entry overcame her ability to stay calm.

This was only Steve, but it hurt. He was over her and he wasn't stopping. His hand ripped at clothing and she saw the flutter of his shorts fall to the floor. She didn't want this. Not like this. Fear sharpened her voice and biting her lip didn't stop the sharp whines of denial from humming through her throat. She scrabbled for her necklace on the night stand, but she feared it was already too late. He was too deeply under the influence of her voice.

Steve tried to get into her again, and this time it was only her underwear in the way. Without his shorts, the blunt force of his penis battered and stretched at her panties. If it felt good, she wouldn't have known, because panic was rising in her. Her thighs tried in vain to push him back, and her hands shoved at his shoulders.

His brow furrowed and his large, hot hand skimmed down her belly. She knew she had maybe a second or two before he ripped at fabric again, and then there would be no barrier. He felt terribly strong and harsh against her. Fingertips snagged at her panties. She knew he'd never forgive himself, even though she already did.

"No! Wake up!" she shrilled at him in a half-hearted, miserable yell.

Steve's body jackknifed atop her, and she barely had time to push him sideways before he would have mashed her into the bed with his weight. She tried to get completely out from under him but she was caught up, tangled in his legs.

His arm uncurled from its spastic clench and he gripped her hip with a hand. It hurt. Too much pressure. He began to shove her back underneath him.

"Nooo! Steve! Wake up!" she yelled and beat at him with her fists.

"Nnfff!" he grunted, and he was suddenly off of her and away.

Steve stumbled toward the wall opposite the beds. He was bent and pressing at his inner thighs as if his groin was too hurt and tender to touch. He muttered something and hit the wall hard enough to jigggle the framed hotel art.

Estrella pushed herself back against the headboard of the bed and watched him cautiously. The open bathroom door wasn't far away. She might make it inside if he came at her, but she probably wouldn't. The bathroom door wouldn't hold against him anyway.

She watched as Steve shook his head and stood hunched over and braced on his knees. His ribs heaved with his breath and he didn't seem to notice or care that he was naked from the waist down. His head turned so that his eyes gleamed at her through the dimness.

A quick grab retrieved her necklace now that she could turn her head to see it dangling off the edge of the night stand. She pressed it to her throat and didn't bother with the clasp.

"I'm sorry," she whispered to him.
"Nn,' was all Steve could vocalize.

He shook his head and lifted a finger at her in denial.

Now that he looked awake and pained rather than dumb, she had a moment to assess their situation. She felt a little sore from his restraining hug. Her hip hurt where his hand had pushed at her. Her legs felt bruised where they'd tangled against his. Her labia burned mildly from his unsuccessful shoving.

"I was making noises in my sleep. This isn't your fault," she told him.

"Did I hurt you?" Steve asked.

His voice was deep and rough, as it had been after the last time she'd screamed at him.

"No. I'm okay," she fibbed.

It was only bruising. Nothing was broken.

Steve made himself straighten up despite the lingering pain. He went to his suitcase and ripped it open vigorously enough to break the zipper. With angry, jerky motions he pulled on a clean pair of underwear. He strode to the light switch and turned it on, then he came again to her bed.

He watched her eyes cautiously as he approached, but he didn't slow down. He was fully awake now, and angry at himself. Estrella knew what was coming. She relaxed back against the pillows and spread her arms and legs to let him do as he would.

Steve stood rigid beside her and bent only enough to touch her. He oh so carefully pushed up her night shirt and manipulated her body around to look at her skin. She could feel the extreme care he was using in handling her. He checked her over like a field medic.

He was still hard and full in his boxer briefs, but she had no concerns that he was going to further assault her. This was the brisk, serious Captain. He didn't linger in touching her. He tugged her shirt down, then he tucked her under the bedcovers and snapped them up under her chin.

She watched as he shoved his legs into a pair of pants from his suitcase. He pulled on a shirt and reached for his wallet. That went into his back pocket and he looked around for his shoes.

"Don't go," she told him.

Her fingers worked the clasp of her necklace, and then she slid out of bed to get in the way of him putting his shoes on. She shoved at his shoulders where he sat on the foot of his bed. He gave her a pained, rueful look.

"You shouldn't just forgive me like that," he grumbled.

"Why? You didn't do anything. Don't be stupid. This is simple to fix, Steve. I won't take off my necklace when I sleep, so it won't happen again. Don't over-react," she told him.

"You've got red marks. You're gonna bruise," he complained.

"Not for long, because somebody made it so that I heal," she said with a little wiggle of attitude.

She squeezed between his knees and pushed at his folded arms. He eventually loosened his arms and she tugged his stiff body against her. He stopped resisting her when she rubbed her chest against his face and pushed her fingers into his hair.
He was going to be cranky. His jaw was set and his lip was slightly pouty. It wasn't a good look, now that he was shaved clean and had his hair done so that he looked like the Captain all the time. Just to prod him, she rubbed the poke of her nipple at his lips.

"Eyaaa," he drawled, but his lips couldn't resist tugging at her through her shirt.

Estrella gave a little squeak at the thrill of sensation, but she smiled at the sensual loosening of his mouth. She rubbed his jaw until he nuzzled at her affectionately.

"Not your fault. Well, maybe it's your fault for making me have sexy dreams about you," she gently teased him.

"How can you say that? I almost raped you. Just like every other sleazebag who hurt you," he grated.

"No you didn't. I didn't let you. I could have stopped you sooner, but I hesitated. I didn't want to hurt you," she told him.

He rolled his eyes at her in a very un-Captain like manner.

"Hush. Stop what's in your head. We're fine. Now tend to this," she told him.

Estrella captured his head in her hands and turned his mouth fully against her. She lifted her soft sleep shirt and nudged her breast at his lips. A crease still lingered on his brow and he glanced up at her face with reproach, but he couldn't resist the softness of her skin for long.

"Mmmm," he hummed, and he gave in to lavishing attention on her nipple.

She gasped as the pleasure of his licking and sucking made her forget about the aches his rough handling had caused her. There was a bit of tooth, but he soothed the sharp feeling away almost as if the nip had been intentional. She looked down at his face. It had been intentional.

She made a face at his stubborn attitude. Yes, she knew that he thought she shouldn't simply forgive him and carry on like this, but she was going to. She wanted something good to come after the bad, for both of them. They'd both been hurt.

"Are you sore?" she asked him as she put her knees up on the bed to either side of his hips.

"Am I sore? Did you take one to the head? Eya, I'm-" Steve began to say.

His hands shifted restlessly against her. He wanted to push her off, but he didn't.

"Hush with that. I don't want to grind on you if you're sore. Answer the question, Papi," she told him with a hard pout of disapproval for his delayed answer and a roll of her hips against him.

"I-I don't think I'm sore. Papi?" he asked.

Estrella was making him crazy again. He should be out in the hall standing guard until she was dressed and ready for the day. He should stay away from her until he had a plan made to keep from nearly raping her again. They needed to practice with her raw voice some more so he could build up a better resistance to it, if that was possible. He needed to be stronger. It was a bad idea to sleep in the same room, the same space. He could try to control his mind while he was unconscious, but he wasn't sure how to do that yet. Maybe he could find something about it on the internet...Steve's thoughts spooled out in a meander of guilt and worry.
Estrella pulled her shirt up and off, and then he had his arms full of almost naked girl. She pulled his hair to tilt his head back and he welcomed the sting at his scalp. The beauty and sensation of her chased his troubled thoughts away. His lips felt the tug and bite of her teeth and her hips settled on him. Maybe he was a little sore from the ache of her voice, but it still felt good to have her soft heat resting on him. It was rude of him to nudge against her after what he'd almost done, but she seemed to like him doing it. Her response was to press down harder on him and wiggle her hips in a way that made his mind go fuzzy around the edges. No more thinking.

"Eya," was all he managed to say, carefully timed between her kisses.

"Shut up and let me. It's my turn, Steve. You don't get to tease me all the time. Lay back," she pushed at him and he slowly lay down under her.

He was physically compliant, but he stubbornly refused to ogle her bare skin. She bit her lip and sensually undulated her body over him. Her lip tugged against her teeth in a smile when he couldn't keep his eyes from watching her move.

Her hands pushed up at his shirt and undershirt while she slowly ground their bodies together. Steve's hands jerked on the bed, then stilled, and he looked at her defiantly for one last time.

"It's my turn, dirty boy. You think you can get yourself off until you're dripping with it, but I have to watch you prance around teasing me, and then you want me to be a good girl," she fussed at him with a gleam in her eyes.

"Teasing? I don't tease you. I-"

Steve swallowed down an answering sound and manfully avoided pushing up into her. She'd said she wanted him to let her, so he would. He was entranced by her beauty, the way she moved, the way she made him feel when she moved on him. What had she said? Something that wasn't true... Something he should refute.

"I gotta live, doll. Breathing and walking isn't teasing," he denied.

"It is, the way that you do it. Your lips parted, begging to be bitten, your eyes focused on something in the distance while your brain thinks up trouble. When you move, your shoulders... your hips... nngh. Steve. I want," she crooned.

A shudder went through her and she jerked hard against him. Her hands dragged down his exposed ribs to his belly, where her fingers tried to dig in against the hard muscle and soft skin. His body flexed subtly. She felt it in his muscles more than it was visible.

"The power in you. Mmm, Papi, how hard could you fuck?" she asked with a lip-bitten moan.

She laughed, and she rode him harder. The layers of dry fabric between them were saturating with her slickness, and the size and hardness of him gave her just the right pressure to rub against. She grabbed his hands and was aware of his slight resistance as she placed them over her breasts. Dear boy. He didn't want her to say naughty words, and he didn't want to disrespect her. Estrella leaned forward onto her hands over him.

"Touch me," she ordered him.
"Yes, Ma'am," Steve said with a grin in his drawl.

His hands skinned over her skin too softly, almost a tickle. He cupped her breasts, then rubbed them lightly as her body rolled against him. She nudged his chin up and sucked in a bite of skin at the side of his strong throat. His breathy vocalization of approval had her nibbling and licking at him harder.

Her mind took off with fantasy as his body flexed slightly under her. He was hardly moving, but she imagined it. What would it be like to have him really moving, bucking fully within her? His beautiful body working, and those soulful eyes expressing to her everything he was feeling.

She sucked hard at his skin and felt his pulse jumping against her bottom lip. So alive! She felt powerful. Her orgasm approached, lingered, then passed while she called out and twitched against him, half satisfied.

Estrella made an ambiguous sound, part purr, and part disappointed hum. It was good, but she'd wanted more.

Steve was vibrating under her. She slid aside from him and reached for his pants button and zipper. He rolled to his side to face her and brushed her hands away. In a half second, he had himself exposed and in hand.

He handled himself fast and rough. His upper arm jostled the bed against her shoulder. She looked into his heated gaze and she wanted him to come just as much as she'd wanted relief for herself. Maybe more.

"Please. I want to see," she urged him.

Steve wiggled the bed harshly with a shove and a leap, and then he had her pressed onto her back. He sat astride her hips, and his heels took most of his weight. Rather than feeling trapped, she felt like she had a front row seat. Though she'd just come, the heady eroticism of watching him stroke himself made her squirm against the bed.

Her hands reached for him, but he flicked them away. The bones of his fingers stung her a little bit, but she knew he hadn't meant to be rough. He tended to be either too gentle or too excited when he was aroused. She took the pain and turned it into raw sensation in her mind, nothing negative.

She hated his shirts right now. His muscles were full of blood, pumped with the promise of sex, and he strained against the stretchy fabric as his arm moved. She wanted to see how his arm moving caused all the rest of him to work in response, but he was covered up. Even his legs denied her the bare skin she wanted. In contrast, his penis was shockingly bare and jutting. Not that she could see much of it, with his hand moving so fast.

Steve didn't deny himself the sight of her anymore. Estrella noticed the greedy hunger of his regard as he looked, so she caressed her skin as firmly as she'd wanted him to earlier, pressing her breasts up into prominence. Her fingers twiddled her nipples and she had a momentary wish that she could lick them. She wanted to lick his. She wanted to lick anything.

Steve made a rough sound and his hips jerked forward. The fire in his eyes showed his imminent pleasure, and his hand flew faster, harder. His eyes shifted around, searching.

"No. On me. On me!" she insisted.

He made a rough sound of agreement, and then there was no more time to communicate anything.
Hot liquid hit her skin, her cheek and neck, onto her chest and over her belly and hip. She loved the abandoned groan he gave, and the almost little-boy look of disbelief he had at seeing his come spatter her skin. She could tell that he liked it a lot.

"Mmmm," he said with deep satisfaction.

"What's that, baby?" she asked him.

He had a clench in his jaw that she'd learned meant that he was holding something back. His eyes flickered up to her face, away from where he'd been watching his semen puddle on her skin. His stroking hand finally slowed to a stop, fisted around the end of him in some sort of last minute modesty.

"Hmm?" he asked, as if he hadn't heard her.

Estrella loved watching his breathing huff out through his lips, his respiration pattern quickly returning to normal. She was still displeased at his shirts being in the way.

"Stinker! I see you thinking. Evading. What did that 'mmmm' really mean? If you'd opened your mouth, what would have come out of it?" Estrella asked him.

Steve gave her a sly, contemplative look and his free hand reached to swirl a finger against her skin in a particularly large slick of his mess on her belly. She could see that all kinds of secretive male thoughts were flying in his head, and he was resisting telling her.

"Tell m-"

"Mine," he growled, low and possessive.

His finger swirled the slippery fluid around and around her navel, then into it. Oh, yeah. He was thinking hard. His eyes travelled up her body, lingering on her curves and her breasts, until he met her eyes with a mix of hesitancy and defiance. He was unsure what she would think of his claim on her.

Estrella smiled at him. He was right. She felt like she was his. She wanted to be his. Her hand spread over her hip, and they both watched her fingers slip across skin and to a different spot of his come. She lazily rubbed it into her skin, and spread it between her forefinger and thumb. His heat lingered in the substance for what seemed like longer than it should.

She gathered a smear on her fingertip and brought it to her lips.

"Mine," she agreed, and sucked the taste of him into her mouth.

Steve watched her jaw move as her tongue gathered all of him from her finger. She wanted him, too. Unspoken was the primal meaning of their agreement, but both of them understood without using extra words. This. This meant something. It wasn't vows at an altar, but it was something. She would stay, because she wanted all of him. Even though he'd almost made a terrible mistake and hurt her.

"You're too good to me. You're too good for me," Steve said.

Estrella laughed. As she lay there with his fluids cooling on her skin, she covered her chest with her hands. He was adorable in his earnest delusion. No one could be too good for him. She merely shook her head in denial. The moment didn't feel like it should be filled up with words.
Steve got distracted looking at the bare canvas of her skin, painted with his semen. Now that his higher brain function was returning, he wanted to clean her up and make her comfortable. It was embarrassing, how he found himself doing something as crude as marking her up with his seed, and then reveling in the sight of it. She wasn't a possession to be collared and marked and owned. Yes, she is!, something in the root of his brain insisted, and she owns you. The part of his personality that he was not proud of was smugly pleased with those thoughts, even the ones about Estrella owning him.

"What are you looking so saucy about?" Estrella asked.

Steve shoved away the unworthy thoughts and shook his head. He helped Estrella to her feet beside the bed. He got his torn shorts from the floor to wipe her mostly dry so she could go and shower without getting anything on the carpet.

"Beautiful," he said behind her as he followed to wash his hands.

Estrella's first reaction to his compliment was to fuss at him for objectifying her and making too much of her looks, but then she remembered that she'd been objectifying him too. She reminded herself that it wasn't really objectification to admire the beauty of the person you loved. Steve would never walk behind a random woman, stare at her ass and verbally compliment her on it. He only did that with her because he felt the freedom in their relationship to do so.

She turned before she shut herself in the bathroom. Steve looked aside from where he was washing his hands at the sink. His gaze kept wanting to linger over her exposed breasts, but he politely looked her in the eyes.

She smiled at him, then touched his chin to pull him over for a sweet, chaste kiss. Steve's lips pressed soft against hers, and they drew apart when their smiles made kissing impossible.

"I love you," he said while he dried his hands.

"I love you too, but you have to think about those compliments. If you tell me things like that, then I get to tell them back to you when I want," she pointed out.

Steve reluctantly nodded because he didn't think he'd be able to avoid telling her how amazing he thought she was. He'd think it, and then it came out of his mouth. He didn't want to stop complimenting her, so he'd have to put up with whatever she said in return. She rubbed his stubbly cheek one last time, then shut herself in the bathroom to shower.

Estrella enjoyed touring the botanical garden, but Steve was distracting. This was the first moment in their relationship when she wished he'd back off a little and give her some space. She loved being close to him, but how could she focus on other things when he was drawing her attention away?

"Amorphophallus titanum," Steve read the label of the alien-looking plant they were looking at, "that means 'huge unshapely penis.' Doesn't anybody know that they've got kinky stuff right out here for everybody to see?"

Estrella sighed.

"It's not a problem, because nobody knows Latin except you and the gardeners. Is there any language you don't know?" she asked.
"Knowing Latin isn't a serum thing. I got that way before. It's an old Catholic thing. You're one of those new-age Catholics. You didn't have a nun harping Latin vocabulary words at you in school. Still, that's pretty racy to be right there on a plant tag," he said.

Estrella let his remark about post Vatican II Catholicism pass without comment. He seemed to be spoiling for a fight today, and she refused to give him one.

"It's a plant that's known for its huge flower. Flowers are sex. That's their sole purpose. Kind of like you, lately," she said.

She couldn't help but giggle at his flummoxed expression. He so wanted to argue with her, but he couldn't. Not right now. It wouldn't be honest. As they walked along the path among the lush and storm-battered vegetation, she noted his look of self-disgust and the slight blush of color high on his cheekbones. It wasn't a full blush, but it told her that he was bothered by her observation about him.

"I didn't mean that in a bad way. I like you like this. It's fun to be with you. So much better than the stuffy old Captain," she said.

Steve nodded and shoved his hands in his pants pockets. He looked at the plants she seemed to be interested in. She wondered if this was like shopping with him. Was he going to remember what she liked and then order plants for her that would show up in New York? She hoped not.

"You know that almost all of these plants won't grow in New York, don't you? It's too cold there for them," she said, just in case.

"I didn't know that, but now I do. Thanks," he said.

Estrella was suspicious of what the speculative look on his face meant. He was probably thinking of something. Planning.

"Stop it!" she fussed at him.

"Stop what?" he wondered.

"Stop thinking! I can't even pay attention to the plants I'm here to see. You're making me crazy!" she said, and she poked at him until he took his hands out of his pants pockets defensively.

"That makes two of us, then," Steve said with a bratty smile.

"Ooohh! Go away. I can't think with you thinking next to me. I want to enjoy the garden," she complained.

Steve laughed. She couldn't help but smile at him. He was so handsome in the morning sunlight among all the green, growing things. He looked strong and confident. Happy, but watchful. He kept fidgeting, and his eyes kept looking around.

"You didn't work out today. Or yesterday, either. We've been eating like hogs. Do you need to go to a gym or something?" she asked him.

"You noticed that, huh? I'm sorry, Eya. I didn't realize that it would be hard to relax on vacation. I'm used to exerting myself more than this. I'll be fine. We can go back to camping on the beach tonight and I can run or swim tomorrow morning," Steve assured her.

"Okay, but you're on my nerves. There's paths here. You could go walk faster or something while I see the gardens," she suggested.

Steve looked to her phone, which was in her back pocket. He looked around again. There was just one family pretty far ahead of them on the path. It was a Latina mom with three small children.

"Alright, but call or text if you need me. I won't be far away, and I can get to you fast," Steve agreed.

"Go" she said and waved her hand off toward the path.

He actually blew her a kiss with his tempting pink lips before he strode away. She wasn't going to tell him that he had a hickey on his neck. He probably already knew. He couldn't have missed it while he was shaving and looking in the mirror. She got lost in watching him walk away up the path. She shook her head and turned her attention to the collection of bromeliads displayed among rugged rocks and driftwood.

She had time to read three plant tags before a commotion of children's voices drew her eyes gain. She looked along the path to see that Steve had stopped to give autographs and talk with the little family. Almost everybody was recognizing him today, since he'd made an effort at the mall to have himself done up to look more like the Captain. He'd done that on purpose, and she wondered why. It wasn't like him to seek attention while he wasn't on duty. He'd already given out about a dozen autographs so far this morning. Estrella scowled at him for keeping her distracted, even when he was a hundred feet away from her.

She made herself turn back to the plants she was here to see. The botanical garden was strewn with shredded and torn green leaves, and everything looked soggy and well-watered. There were puddles along the path which she avoided stepping in. She really wanted to splash in the puddles like a little kid because she was happy, but she didn't. Steve would look, and he didn't need any encouragement to act up. He was already wound tight, an accident waiting to happen. Goofy boy. Poor man.

"Oooh! Stop thinking about him!" she fussed aloud at herself.

She stomped her foot, and turned to look at the plants yet again. Steve laughed across the way as he was walking. He'd heard her quiet words. Estrella's eyes squinted in annoyance. She managed to make her way along the path toward the greenhouse. She smiled and nodded a polite greeting to the mom and kids who were still a-dither about encountering Captain America, and let herself into the warm, humid glass building.

A coo of wonder escaped her lips at the blooming tropical gingers and orchids everywhere. There were butterflies! Blue ones! There was a koi pool with a rock waterfall, and a bridge over the water. Estrella grinned hugely at the lush beauty of the space around her. Bananas and the huge leaves of exotic elephant ears and other plants she'd never seen before waved at her in the breeze of the greenhouse ventilation fans. An orange and yellow butterfly landed on a ginger flower near her and she watched it uncurl its long purple tongue and drink nectar from the flower.

The air smelled of flowers and earthy humus, and-

"Eeeee!" she screamed.

A large shape blocked the sun for an instant as it fell from somewhere up high and landed with a thump behind and beside her. She turned to face the danger, only to find a grinning Steve there. His hands were smudged with something and he laughed.
"Don't do that! Where did you come from? You're a pest!" she yelled at him, and her eyes shifted around to see how he possibly could have gotten above her. There were only a few tiny places he could have grabbed onto in the greenhouse, and what the heck had he been hanging from up there? She didn't see anything…

"Heh. Steel structure. It was fun. I love watching you in here. You really like plants, don't you? And butterflies," he said.

"Don't wipe your hands on your pants!" Estrella fussled as he moved to wipe his dirty hands.

"Okay. Was that alright? Do you still want me to scare you?" he asked her.

Estrella huffed a breath, then bit her lip to keep from fussing anymore.

"That was good," she admitted.

He looked more engaged and energetic now, almost bouncing on his heels. His attention was fully on her in a way that she couldn't look away from. He was all tightly restrained kinetic energy, waiting for a reason to erupt.

"I could get some exercise chasing you. It might be fun in here. There are lots of secret nooks and places to pass through and climb over," Steve offered hopefully.

"No, you couldn't, because I won't run. That wouldn't even be fun for you, Steve. I'm no challenge," she pointed out.

"Not much challenge, but I can give you a head start, hide my eyes, maybe. The rewards when I find you would make it fun," he said with a grin.

"No. I don't want to play hide and seek in here. The plants are delicate, and you'd break them," she said.

"I wouldn't. I'm not clumsy," he denied.

He looked like a whiny little boy, though his tone of voice was reasonable. Was he doing that thing with his eyes and his lashes on purpose? She wanted to suck on his bottom lip because of the way it stuck out ever so slightly. He wasn't playing fair!

Estrella looked around. There was a dense stand of banana trees that made a dark shade under and behind its overhanging leaves. There was a side path. It was narrow, and monstrously huge elephant ear leaves blocked the path behind the bananas like tender, ruffled green shields.

"Come," she said.

She held out her hand to Steve and led him under the banana trees, which even she had to duck down for. Then they carefully pushed through the rubbery elephant ear leaves. The white translucent greenhouse wall was to one side of them, and foliage closed them in on all the other sides.

Steve smiled at the nook she'd found for them, then pulled her close to him.

Estrella melted into his kiss. He tasted fresh, of water and toothpaste. She shared with him the clean herbal taste of the parsley leaves she'd stolen and chewed. They kissed slow and sensual, enjoying the texture of tongues and soft skin. His hands closed around her hair to hold her, and she pushed her fingers under his shirt to get at his belly.
"Hmm," Steve agreed.

Their teeth barely touched, and she felt a momentary hum of vibration from the contact.

"Steve, you're shaking," she pulled back to say.

"Yeah. Sorry. Can't seem to help it. I think it's my body trying to burn off the extra energy," he murmured, then he kissed her again.

She hugged closer to him and felt what the long hem of his Henley was concealing.

"Are you sure you're okay?" she asked on a whisper.

A sulfur-yellow butterfly flitted by and distracted her with its cute rounded wings.

"I'm good. Don't worry about it," Steve told her.

He kissed her again, and she slid her arms around to enjoy the girth of him, the breadth of his shoulders. His hands slipped down to her bottom, and she jumped away before he could grab her. Steve frowned at her denial.

"Your hands! I'm wearing light colored jeans, and I don't want dark, dirty handprints showing on my butt all day," she said.

"Oh. Yeah. Hey, you know we're not really hidden back here. Our feet are showing to anyone who comes along. Oldest mistake in the book," he said.

"Kissing isn't a jailable offense. Let's do the nature trail, and then we can go so you can see the art museum," Estrella suggested.

Mosquitoes chased them along the walking trail, and they hurried back to the visitor's center where Steve washed the dirt of climbing the greenhouse off his hands. Two more people wanted his autograph, and one of them looked to Estrella for a moment, which was a bit odd. Usually, she was invisible to other women when Steve had their attention. She could see that Steve made note of it, but he didn't do anything or say anything about it. It was weird, but it probably didn't mean anything.

A short ride in the truck brought them to the art museum. There was hardly anyone there beyond the receptionist, who was a stuffy old woman. Estrella kept quiet and let Steve enjoy the sculptures and the photographs and the paintings. There were some large works made with lots of different colors, textures and media that she found interesting in that way that abstract art made you think about things.

They were almost ready to go when a bunch of people crowded into the gallery doors, and hurried off to a room along the hall. Steve looked to the receptionist curiously. The older lady looked up from her magazine.

"It's clay day for the public. Happens every Thursday morning at ten. You're welcome to go join, if you want," she told them.

"Clay," Estrella said with some enthusiasm.

She'd always wanted to work with clay and play with the squishiness. She'd just been getting into ceramics class in high school when the terrible things had happened and she had to run away from home.
"You wanna try clay?" Steve asked indulgently.

She nodded.

"Then let's go do clay," he agreed.

There was a mix of pre-school children and moms, home school families, and some older folks in the workroom off of the hall. There was a cheery young man who was instructing people to put on smocks and helping little ones dig out hunks of wet clay from a large tub.

Steve and Estrella joined the group and everyone was too enthusiastic to get started to pay any attention to them at first. Steve sat at one of the available clay throwing wheels that nobody seemed to want to use, and Estrella shook her head at him when he gestured to the empty wheel beside him that she could have used. She sat at the nearby sturdy work table. She put on a teal green smock to protect her clothes and tossed one to Steve. They waited until the line to get clay got short, and then they got up to stand and wait behind the last of the youngsters.

Estrella took a moderate amount of clay from the tub, and the instructor urged her to get more. She did so, and then she moved aside to let Steve get his. She watched while he reached in and got a large-handed scoop of gray-brown clay. He weighed the clay in his hand, then got a little bit more.

The instructor, whose name tag said "Dave," was making happy and helpful small talk, and then he looked up at Steve's face.

"You look like you know something about ceramics. Do you have a studio?" Dave asked.

"Nah. I mostly do pencil work, some charcoal, and if I have enough time, paint. Clay should be fun, though," Steve said.

"If it's your first time with clay, you might be more comfortable with hand forming, rather than throwing. The wheel can be a challenge the first few times you try it. I wouldn't want you to go away frustrated from your first experience," Dave said.

His face was starting to get that confused, thoughtful look that came right before a pronouncement of 'Oh my God, you're Captain America!' Just as he was opening his mouth to speak, Steve smiled conspiratorially and touched a finger to his lips.

"Shh. Don't you think it would be more fun to let the kids notice?" Steve asked.

"Uh…Yeah," Dave whispered, looking dazzled.

Estrella giggled softly and took her clay to her table. Steve went to his chosen throwing wheel.

The kids were pretty loud, but Dave moved to the brightly lit front of the room, in front of the huge dry erase board and got everyone's attention.

"Good morning! Does everyone know what method they're using today? Pinch, or coil, or slab? That's great! I see a lot of familiar faces in here. Hi, Tommy!" Dave waved kindly to a boy in a wheelchair who appeared to have Down's syndrome. Tommy wiggled, smiled big, and waved his hand back at Dave.

"Good morning, Tommy!" most of the class greeted Tommy loudly.

"Mornin! Mornin!" Tommy replied with a happy bob of his head. Tommy's mother smiled at the show of affection and recognition her son received.
Dave went to explain clay forming methods to a pair of pre-teen sisters who looked hesitant, and Steve looked over to see if Estrella wanted help getting started. Estrella was already forming coils with her hands against the tabletop, so he figured she was getting along just fine without any instruction. Steve found the power switch for the electric wheel and flipped it. His hands molded his hunk of clay into a ball.

"Putting it on the wheel is usually done when the wheel is still," Dave walked over to tell Steve helpfully.

Thump.

Steve's ball of clay thudded hard and dead center onto the spinning wheel.

"Or... you could do it that way," Dave said.

"Sorry. I thought throwing meant throwing. You see people on television with it spinning, and I didn't think it mattered. Should I take it off and do it again?" Steve wondered.

"Hm. Probably not. It's not wrong to do it that way, but I've never met anyone who could center it like that, right off," Dave said.

"Oh. Sorry," Steve apologized.

"Stop apologizing!" Estrella hissed at him across the space between them.

Dave looked to see that she knew what she was doing and was having fun on her own. He looked back to Steve and how he was already drawing up the clay into a symmetrically spinning shape.

"You sure you've never worked in clay before?" Dave asked him.

"I would have remembered," Steve said.

"Okay. Let me know if you need anything," Dave said.

He left them alone so he could wander around and give clay forming tips and socialize with people.

Steve and Estrella shared a glance which turned into a smile, then looked back to their work. He liked the way Estrella bit her lip in concentration as she built up rounds of coils and joined them together. She wondered why Steve was merely playing with the form he was making on his wheel, pressing it into different shapes, higher and slimmer, then broad and squat again.

Steve focused on the clay. He liked the way it was malleable in his hands. Responsive, like skin. He was fascinated with how its shape changed as he added pressure at one point or another. Its silky-gritty texture was pleasing to him. He got excited about trying an idea. His clay form wobbled to the side. The whole thing wobbled horribly out of shape as it spun. He'd pushed too hard, too fast.

Steve laughed and turned off the wheel. He chuckled again as the misshapen form settled forlornly soon as centripetal force let go of it. Estrella was captivated by the sound of his happy, genuine humor. It was rare to hear that kind of laugh from him. It was deep and rich, not tight and self-conscious like she now knew him to be when they were at Avenger's tower.

She wasn't the only one to notice Steve's presence in the room. Much of the talking and laughter around the room hushed, and Estrella could see Steve become aware of the recognition that was happening all around, though he didn't look up from his efforts to remove his clay from the wheel and start over.

"CapMer!" an excited voice said.

"Hiya, Tommy," Steve said warmly, and looked up at the boy from his clay and his goopy hands.

"Are you really Captain America, or do you just look like him?" Tommy's mother asked.

"It's me. Can't do super-hero stuff all the time. A guy's gotta go on vacation," Steve said with a kind smile.

Most everyone in the room looked dazzled, and only a few hands were still working with clay.

"I was at the mall yesterday. I heard you were there, but I didn't believe it," a girl said.

"I was there," Steve admitted, "I'm having fun here, but I don't know what to make. Anybody got any ideas?"

"Da shield," Tommy said definitively.

Estrella could see that Steve wasn't thrilled with that idea, but he took it in good humor and didn't let anyone else see his thoughts on the matter. Dave came over and showed him how to make a flat disc on the wheel, then cut it loose with a wire.

Kids left their clay and gathered around. Some of the little ones pressed right up against Steve while he worked and the two sisters hesitantly reached out to touch Steve's shoulder a time or two, as if they were testing to see if he was real. Estrella caught his eye for a brief instant. She didn't like the film of persona which settled over him, but he was handling the attention well, like he was long used to it. He didn't mind the kids touching him.

"Okay, so now whadda we do with it?" Steve asked as he carefully lifted the wet, floppy flat disc off the wheel.

"You gotta throw it!" a boy said gleefully.

"Yeah, throw it" someone else agreed.

"Shield," Tommy agreed.

Steve looked over the small heads surrounding him to Dave. Dave hurriedly looked around the room. He unfolded a canvas drop cloth from a storage cubby and laid it out under the dry-erase board. He waved a hand at the glossy board and stepped away.

Steve turned his torso carefully and checked his clearance so he wouldn't accidentally hit anyone. The kids leaned away only a bit. They wanted to be close to him. He made a face at the slumpy, floppy mess in his hands and shifted it around in a way that would let him toss it without it disintegrating.

Tha-fwop! Splat.

The soft clay shield smacked into the dry erase board, crumpled into a ridiculous, pathetic shape, then peeled off and splattered onto the canvas drop cloth. It left behind a bow-tie shaped imprint of gray-brown on the board, then lay on the ground like a dead thing.

Laughter erupted in the room. Steve laughed too, and Estrella smiled because he'd found enjoyment in entertaining the kids.

"'Gin!" Tommy insisted.

"Want me to make another one?" Steve asked.

Tommy nodded vigorously, and the kids gave an affirmative chorus of words. Steve set to making another clay shield, and this time he put careful line decorations on it while the wheel was spinning, then lightly scrawled a star in the middle after the wheel stopped. He stood up and flatly supported the slumpy disc on his spread fingers. The kids hushed in awe at the appropriate, familiar stance he'd taken. The disc hit the board with a thwack! and stayed stuck there for a longer time before it peeled off and hit the canvas. It left a rectangular imprint this time.

After that, Steve was busy making discs for the kids, which they gladly took, but they didn't want to throw any of them. He had to stop every now and then and make one to throw when Tommy requested him to do it "'gin." Dave was kept busy fetching clay to keep Steve working, and picking up the crumpled projectiles which fell to the floor.

When clay time was over, nobody wanted to leave. Steve made sure that everyone had a clay 'autograph' from him. He bent to give Tommy a hug, which made the boy smile so big that his eyes squinted closed. He shook Tommy's mother's hand. The older woman was nearly as happy as her son.

"Where's your real shield?" a boy of about ten years asked.

"You wanna see it, don't you?" Steve asked.

"Uh-huh," the boy agreed.

The rest of the kids backed him up. Steve took a short breath and looked around the room. There was only the one entry from the hall. He looked to Estrella.

"I'll be fine. Go," she told him.

Steve jogged out to the truck and got his leather satchel. He kept his eyes and ears sharp while he was away from Estrella. There was no suspicious activity around, so he wasn't concerned when he got back into the clay room.

Estrella worked patiently on her nearly finished clay pot while Steve let the kids handle his shield. She smiled at the awed tones of the children as they touched his gear. It seemed as if they were more impressed with the uniform and the shield than they were with the man himself.

"This stuff is old. Aren't you supposed to be old, too?" one of the two sisters asked.

"He was stuck in the ice. Cryo-stasis. Like Han Solo and Jack O'Neill" a boy answered.

"I knew that, you nerd. What I meant is, how'd you survive it?" the sister persisted with a put-upon look for the know-it-all boy.

"I don't really know," Steve said somewhat honestly.

Bruce had explained to him how he'd likely survived, but these kids wouldn't be interested in those details, nor was he inclined to give them.

"However it happened, I'm glad you're alive. We need a real hero. There are so many bad examples for today's youth," Tommy's mother smiled at him.

Estrella saw the stricken look that Steve ducked his face quickly to hide. He was good at subduing it, and when he picked up his head again, he wore a neutral expression for the children and Tommy's mother.

"Ma'am, I may do the work of a hero, but I'm only a man. I make mistakes, too. I mess things up sometimes, and when I do, it's a pretty spectacular mess. Kids, the important thing is that when you mess up, you try to make it right, and then you keep going. You don't give up and sit down in the mess," Steve said.

"Okay," a boy said uncertainly.

The rest of the kids intuitively picked up on the fact that Steve was sad, and some of them gathered around and patted him. Tommy's mother looked at him speculatively. All Steve could do was gather his things together and stow them in his satchel. Estrella pounded her clay pot back into a ball and brought it to the tub she'd gotten it out of.

Steve told them he had to go and find some lunch, and they were able to extricate themselves from the little crowd. Once they were in the truck, Steve didn't want to talk about the troubled look on his face.

"Could you get us directions to one of those places we saw online that looked good for lunch?" he asked Estrella.

She directed him to a local food truck that was rated highly on TripAdvisor. She could guess that he was thinking about the looming potential trouble he might have to face because of his night with Bucky and the prostitutes, but she left him alone. Rather than talk it to death, it seemed better to let it lie and to distract him with other things. Like food.

Steve parked the truck in the informal gravel lot near the food truck. They got out of the truck and Estrella could immediately smell the heavenly scent of grilling seafood and spices. Steve squinted at the bright sunlight and tugged his outer shirt off over his head. He tossed the dark shirt in the backseat of the truck and tugged down on his white undershirt. Estrella appreciated the way the thin cotton clung to him, especially since he was slightly sweat-sheened in the heat.

Steve saw her looking at his abs and grinned back at her. She was glad that with his current mindset, it was easy to redirect him away from troublesome thoughts. She linked her arm in his and they walked through the sea of motorcycles parked around them to get to the order window.

Steve stopped beside one bike and stared. Estrella looked at it with him, but she didn't see what was so worthy of a lingering look. She didn't know enough about motorcycles to understand why the bike he was looking at was special. It was large, heavy, and expensive looking like all the rest of them parked around.

"Hey, buddy, you touch that bike and I'm gonna touch you," called a male voice in warning.

Steve looked up and across at the guy in denim and leather who had spoken to him. He looked all around at everything else, too, then he handed some money to Estrella from his wallet.

"Would ya go get us whatever seems biggest, and get me two of 'em?" Steve asked her.

"I will, but be careful. No fights," she warned him.

She looked to the rough men seated and eating at one of the several picnic tables in front of the food truck. The one guy was watching her and Steve closely because they were still standing near his bike. Estrella wondered why Steve persisted in standing there. She tugged at his belt loop a little to hopefully move him away from the bike.

"Aww, you're no fun," Steve said to her with a small smile.

"Steve! I don't want to be on the news!" she protested.

Steve's insistence on provoking the biker made her nervous. There was a sharpness to his face. Steve looked too eager to start something. Hopeful, really. She made squinty eyes at him.

"Relax, sweetheart. I know how to make nice with these guys. They're pussycats," he told her.

Estrella reluctantly moved away to get in line and place their orders. The cooking food inside the truck smelled amazing, and her watering mouth and grumbly belly was almost enough to distract her from how Steve walked toward the guy who was concerned about his bike. She didn't like the subtle, aggressive set to his shoulders, or the overly relaxed and alpha-male way he walked toward the table of bikers. Or, she liked it very much, but she was afraid it was going to get them in trouble.

She glanced nervously at Steve between looking at the menu and placing their orders. She couldn't see much of him because a van was parked so that it mostly blocked the view of the biker's table. She could only see Steve's back. She was too far away to hear anything he was saying. It was a nerve-wracking wait while their food was cooked.

By the time she walked toward Steve with their loaded tray, he was speaking amiably with the bikers. Steve came to relieve her of the tray and she followed him to the empty table right next to the rough looking men. There were six of them.

Instinct had her reluctant to be anywhere near so many dangerous looking men, but they all looked calm now, or at least not angry. It was clear that they knew who Steve was, and the conversation was all about motorcycles. She would have sat down on the wooden bench across from Steve, but she was uneasy, even with his protection. Another table of bikers adjacent to the first was quiet and listened as they ate.

Estrella went around the end of the table to instead sit on the far side of Steve away from the men. She'd been fine all day, but now she was very aware of how her jeans hugged her bottom and legs, and how her top fit her.

"So you knew you'd get my attention, standing by my bike like that," the man said.

"Sure. I wanted to know who owned it. It's a sweet ride," Steve said right before he took a huge bite of his shrimp burrito.

"You almost had more than just my attention. If you've got a bike, then you know you stood there too long. What's with that?"

"I dunno. Maybe I was hoping for some excitement. Having some leave is nice, but I'm used to working all the time. It's not so easy taking it easy," Steve answered after taking a sip of his drink from the large Styrofoam cup.

"Right. Like I'm gonna start shit with Captain America," the guy said and laughed.

"Watch your mouth in front of my girl," Steve told him smoothly.
"Sorry, sweet cheeks," the man apologized to Estrella.

She ducked behind Steve's bulk and kept her head down over her food.

Steve rested his hand comfortingly on her thigh and turned his head to look at the biker. Hard.

"Sorry, Ma'am. I didn't mean anything, Cap. Just that she's...uh, pretty and all," the guy stammered.

The other bikers chuckled at him, and Steve tilted his head in slim acceptance of his apology. They all ate in peace with low murmurs of conversation among the two tables of bikers. Steve looked to Estrella until she met his eyes.

"Are you alright? We can leave if this is ruining your lunch," he offered her in kindly tones.

Estrella looked from him to the bikers. Steve was doing this on purpose, just like he'd changed his look, and she didn't know why. He looked happy and confident, like his sharp-edged banter with the biker gang was the better thing to focus on than the things that had been bringing him down before. There was no way a normal man could take on the aggression of twelve others and still protect her from the consequences of his smart mouth, but Steve was different. Maybe he needed this.

"I'm okay, but please don't fight," she whispered.

"Don't worry. It won't come to that," he assured her.

"How do you know?" she wondered.

"Experience. We'll be fine," Steve said.

"So what's the best bike you ever had? I bet there's been a few over the years," a different, older biker guy asked Steve.

"Yeah, there's been a few, and 'best' depends on how you think of it. I'd have to say that the Liberator was the best because it was reliable, parts were available if I broke it, and I broke a lot of em. I got to where I could take it down and re-assemble it almost as fast as I could my sidearm. I knew that bike," Steve said fondly.

"Just like a woman," the older biker agreed, "you learn how to keep one purring, and the skills work on all of 'em. I bet you got a lot of tail over there, you and your boys being the big guns."

Steve shifted his eyes to the guy. The cold look on his face worried Estrella. She'd never seen that look on Steve. The biker clearly got the message. He looked around at his companions, who were grinning at him and waiting. Then he looked at Steve, who set his food down and pushed it closer to Estrella and then casually freed his legs from under the picnic table.

"Shoot. Look, man. I ain't used to ladies, just back warmers," the guy said nervously.

"Yeah, I can tell. You fellas must think I'm sellin wolf tickets when I tell you to show some respect. All she wants is to eat her lunch in peace. Since she is a lady, she'd probably let the disrespect slide. But I won't," Steve warned one last time.

The guy nodded, and some of his friends ribbed him about backing down.

"What? Are you crazy? Shut up, Jake. What am I supposed to do?" the guy turned to his friend who'd thrown a wadded up napkin at him.

Estrella tugged at Steve's elbow. He turned a much warmer expression to her.

"Will you stop it!?" she asked in a strained whisper.

"I would if it was hopeless, but these guys show some promise. They're too old to really be punks. Maybe they just need a gentle reminder about how to treat a lady," he smiled at her as if he thought he was doing her some honor by making an issue of things.

"I don't care about that. You can stay here and pick a fight. I don't want to be on YouTube. I'm eating over there," Estrella told him.

"I wish you wouldn't," Steve told her mildly.

Estrella ignored him and picked up her food and her drink. She walked to the farthest away empty table, which was a good fifty feet from Steve and the bikers. Steve turned his head to watch the other men. Soon as he did, they all looked down at their food, or got busy talking in a direction that wasn't toward Estrella. Steve shook his head.

"Thanks, fellas," Steve said sarcastically, "now I'm gonna have to think up something nice to get her over her mad."

"You're Captain America. Don't tell me she's got you whipped?" a different biker said.

"She's worth it. I've seen what happens at the end of the line when you haven't been smart with your girl. I'm not doing that again. A good lady is worth losing face for. Who're you gonna warm up with at night? Your brothers? You think you're still gonna be riding with them when you're eighty? Nah. I'll back up my brothers when they need me and blood's on the floor. I do that every time I clock in. Other than that, I'm on her side," Steve explained.

A moment of thoughtful silence passed. Steve left his feet free of encumbrance of the picnic table, but he pulled his food closer again and resumed eating as if the bikers weren't there.

"You're old school," one guy pointed out as if it was a sudden revelation.

Steve lifted his hands and let them fall in a gesture that said 'what else would I be?'

He could see the acceptance of the idea and a slow-grinding respect evolving for the concept.

"You fellas aren't exactly junior varsity yourselves. Nothing's wrong with having a little dignity," Steve said lightly.

"So are you saying you're strictly straight arrow? You don't take advantage of anything that your place gets you? No fun stuff?" the older biker asked.

Steve moved on to his second burrito, and was once again reminded of unpleasantness.

"I've tried the fun stuff. Ya know where it's got me? Waiting for the other shoe to fall. In my place, it's not worth it. If you never figure out what that means, then I'm lucky. You'll know it if you see it," Steve said.

"Somebody's got dirt on you?"

"Maybe I deserve it. At my level, you always gotta pay to play," Steve told them.
"No free passes? Even with what you do for everybody? That's harsh," the older biker said.

"I musta used up all my free passes in the war. I don't do what I do to earn freebies, anyway. I do it because it needs to be done, and somebody's gotta do it," Steve said quietly.

He turned his attention to his burrito and the bikers let him eat in peace.

"Something's wrong with him. I think he's trying to pick a fight with a biker gang," Estrella said quietly into her phone.

"Only trying? Is anything broken yet?" Natasha asked her blandly.

"Not yet. He's still eating," Estrella said.

"Then he's not trying. I don't know what he's doing, but I'd trust him. Why don't you trust him?"

"Because he's thinking something, and he's not telling me. He shaved his beard off and got the top of his hair colored blonde. He wants people to know who he is, and now he's provoking the bikers. I want to trust him, but what if his hormones are all off again and I shouldn't trust him? What should I do?"

"The hair thing is strange. What else? Tell me everything," Nat ordered.

"There's not much else. Yesterday was wonderful, and every day before that. But then he left me in the truck and went across the mall parking lot and shot out somebody's tires with his gun. When I told him he was crazy, he was calm about it as if shooting people's tires is a normal thing to do and I was over-reacting."

"You were probably over-reacting. If he was calm like that, then it was the right thing to do. He didn't show any remorse or worry after he shot the tires, did he?" Natasha said.

"None."

"If there was any doubt, it would have showed on his face and he'd have spent the next few hours silent and preoccupied, figuring out what he should have done differently. That's what he does when things go wrong. Was he silent and preoccupied?" Nat asked.

"Not because of the tire thing. We played cards. It was quiet, but he wasn't thinking about the tires."

"Why did he shoot somebody's tires? Did he say?"

"He only said that they were punks and they were going to follow us," Estrella recalled.

"Did you get a look at them?"

"No. It was raining hard. I didn't even know they were there in the parking lot with us, but he did. Natasha, what's going on?"

"I think he's feeling defensive. He's glad to have you, so he's protecting you. Does that make sense with what you're seeing?" Nat asked reasonably.

Estrella's suspicions were growing. Sometimes when Nat used that reasonable tone, she was trying to manipulate her into a certain way of thinking, for whatever purpose. But maybe not this time. What Nat said made sense.

"Yes. He threatens the biker men every time one of them says something Steve thinks is disrespectful of me. That's why I walked away. Maybe if I'm not there to disrespect, he won't feel the need to defend me so much," Estrella said.

"That fits. I wouldn't worry. All I'm seeing is that he's in love. Has he told you yet, or is he being shy?" Natasha wondered with a warmly pleased tone.

"He's not shy. He told me," Estrella said with brisk certainty.

"Sounds like fun. You can tell me all about it later, if you feel like it," Nat nearly purred.

"Only if you can keep it to yourself. His business isn't for everybody to hear. And only if you start keeping your fangs out of him. He's not yours to play with anymore. The only reason I called you is because he's making things weird, and you know him," Estrella told her.

"Hmm. It sounds like Steve isn't the only one in love. Consider me warned off, girlfriend."

Estrella made a face that nobody could see. Now she was sure that Natasha was being overly chummy for some reason. These people kept thinking she was slow-witted and didn't notice things. Estrella was fine with that, because that meant they underestimated her, and that put her in a position to surprise them if she ever needed to. She loved and admired Natasha, but she didn't fully understand her.

"You already knew I loved him, so don't act surprised. Just tell me if I can do anything to make him not act stupid," she said.

"It's too late for that. He's in love. I'd say trust him. He might be stupid because of you at times when it doesn't matter much, but if it matters, he'll be sharp and ready. He won't take chances with your safety. I've got a meeting to get back to," Nat said.

"Okay. Thank you," Estrella said.

"You're welcome. Call me again if you feel the need. Better safe than sorry," Nat told her.

"Okay," Estrella repeated, then ended the call.

Natasha stuck her head back into the meeting room she'd left when her phone rang.

Before even quick-witted Tony could say anything, she was gone again. Natasha strode to the elevator and made her way down and out of the tower. Once she was halfway to the park, she called the newest number in her contacts.

"My delicate flower! Lovely boss lady. Now is not the best time to call me," Bucky said quietly to her in their shared tongue.

"Make it so that it is the best time, little mouse," Natasha responded.

"Very well. But a moment, please," Buck said.
She heard the faint sounds of heavy gear being shifted, and then a door closing, and gear being moved again.

"I'm sure you waited breathlessly. Tell me what your heart so urgently desires of me," Buck said.

"Stop the shit talk, Barnes. Something is the matter with Rogers. Someone follows him. Watches him. It is sufficiently bad that the girl called me. She worries, and she knows him well enough now to know when she should and when she should not worry. Barely was I able to redirect her suspicions, I think," Nat told him.

"You think. You think they both are stupid? He knows something happens. He is preparing. The girl is sensitive to his moods. No other sort of girl would so capture his interest," Bucky said.

"You have told him," Natasha accused mildly.

"I have told him merely that I am on a job which he would be happier not learning of;"

"What takes you so much time? You were once good with killing, and fast," Nat teased him.

"These people. They are chaos. Some are not where they are said to be. Much street trash looks the same, and they make a fuss when I ask like a girl to see their tattoos. Too many times I have hunted after the wrong mark. My lovely boss lady is squeamish. She doesn't want the wrong eggs broken, so she says I must be certain. Certainty takes time. In the prisons it is easier. They wear numbers," Buck made fun of her and the kind of tedious work he'd been asked to do.

"All this talk. What do we play at? This makes an amusing pass-time, and a childish one, while Rogers collects trouble," Nat admonished him.

"You want speed, paired with accuracy. This I can do easily when there are few marks, or when many marks are all in one place. Your Avengers, it's no wonder they work slowly. To be selective, yet cast a broad net...you ask much," Buck carried on.

"I tell you that our friend is in trouble, and you dally with words. You give me excuses," Natasha emphasized the last word.

"Since when is he not in trouble? I can get this done faster and cover more ground, but I'll need to call in help. Help that nobody's gonna like," Bucky switched to English.

"Do it. This isn't the old days. She says he's letting people recognize him easily now. He wants to be known because he feels a threat and he's trying to warn it off. His face is on the 'net, and probably the girl along with him. Make the biggest hits and let the help clean up the street trash. Get to him before he needs backup and doesn't have it. If I move my people on this, it all goes public," Natasha said.

"I'm way ahead of you. I knew this plan wasn't tight enough, but I let you do things the nice way for a while. I'm doing it my way now, how I planned to from the beginning," Buck warned.

"You know, as a new hire, you're showing a remarkable level of insubordination," Nat said with a chilly smile.

"Ain't it grand? Maybe I like to rattle your cage, little flower. You're fun to piss off," Buck said.

"English is so straight forward. The endearments lose a lot in translation," Nat said blandly.

"They do," Buck agreed.
They lapsed into silence, and Natasha killed the connection before either of them said anything more. What needed to be said was already said. She wanted to give Barnes no opportunity for more of his smooth tongue.

If ever she'd had any doubt about the man's sanity, it was gone now. He was fully both James Barnes and the Winter Soldier. If he couldn't reliably call on either as needed, she wouldn't have hired him.

When they got back to South Padre Island beach, things were different. The dunes were pushed back and colonies of grass flopped over with their roots exposed. The crashing surf of the tropical storm had eaten the edge of the beach away to a steeper angle. Steve drove them to find another campsite, which was easy. Almost no one was on the beach. Still, he drove a good distance down for privacy.

The afternoon was sunny and warm, so the damp sand wasn't a deterrent. They set out their camp site with their chairs and the little table and stove, and Estrella made better order of their sleeping space in the back of the truck. Steve put their solar shower out so the water could heat, and she gave him his privacy while he changed into his swim shorts.

Estrella looked at the mattress she was putting the clean sheets on. What would they do here tonight, if anything other than sleep? Steve had refused to share a bed with her in the hotel, but now they were going to have to sleep together in their cozy little camper space. She wondered if she even wanted to sleep with him, with the way he was acting. He made her nervous with all his extra energy.

Steve came around to the back of the open truck with his low-riding swim shorts on. He was sunny, golden and happy again. He slid his skim board out from its place along the wall of the truck bed and smiled at her.

"You wanna try the board?" he offered.

"No. The waves are too angry from the storm yesterday. You go ahead. I'm going to get my towel and enjoy the sun," she said.

"Alright," Steve agreed.

He stood there, and her eyes gravitated to the little dark golden trail of hairs below his navel.

"I'm sorry about today. I should have been more attentive," he said.

"No. We're different people. You don't have to be in my face all the time. I won't start doubting you if you take some time for yourself," she told him.

Steve gave her a searching look, but then appeared satisfied when he decided that she meant her words exactly as she'd said them, with no venom or resentment. She smiled at the simplicity and easy acceptance between them.

"I don't mean to confuse you with the things I'm doing that don't make sense," he further tried to smooth things between them.

"I know. I called Natasha. She says I should trust you, and that you must have your reasons. I already do trust you when you're using your mind properly. I only wanted to make sure that you weren't being stupid again," she admitted.

"Smart thinking. I like that," Steve said.

"I don't need lollipops from you. Go swim, or surf, or whatever," Estrella shooed him away so she could get changed into her swimsuit.

Steve made a comically pained face at her dismissal, but then he grinned and turned to jog away to the waves. His surfboard was tucked under his arm in a carry that was strangely opposite of how he carried his shield.

Estrella regretted being short tempered with him instead of warm and affectionate, but she was still unsettled from being around him while he tried to goad the bikers. As she changed into her little bikini, she reminded herself that much of their life would be like this. Steve was going to have to do odd and uncomfortable things because of his job. If she wanted to be with him, and she did, then she had to learn to tolerate the uneasy parts.

She got her towel and went down toward the water where Steve was having fun with his board. There was a good slope of sand not far from the water's edge which made a sort of recliner for her to lie back against.

It was more than merely enjoyable to watch Steve. He was full of vigor to an extent that it was impossible not to watch him play. The water's edge rolled and crashed onto the sand then retreated in short bursts. She could see his eyes and his mind coordinating the timing of when he tossed the board down and jumped on. He played with the front edge of the incoming waves, and tested the frothy turbulent part of them at mid break, but he seemed to like the brief slip space in between waves the most.

His graceful, agile body was beautiful to behold. Just as she thought he was going to lose his balance, he'd step aside or back and catch himself as if he'd meant to almost fall all along. When he landed both the board and himself just right, she saw how he grinned into the sun and skimmed along on the water for a short ride. The fine, minute adjustments he made to stay in control brought his athleticism into prominence. Frequently Steve would look to her and show a bright, toothy smile. He was truly enjoying himself.

Estrella relaxed back and exposed as much skin to the sun as she could. Simply watching him in motion heated her senses and her imagination. The perpetual sea breeze helped to cool her skin, but she was beginning to want to be close to him again.

She resisted the urge to call him over while he was having such a good time. He needed this. As long as there was no gym to use, no training room, and no run on the beach which would leave her behind, he needed the fight against the waves.

Eventually, when the sun moved lower in the sky, Steve came to her and sat on his board beside her. She smiled at him for choosing the side which wouldn't block the sunlight from her skin. He sat for a mere few seconds, and then he lay back beside her on his board.

"Do you feel better now, after all of that?" she asked him.

"A little. I could have stayed out for longer, but I want to be near you," he admitted.

She got lost looking as his face. His eyes. The water that beaded on his body. Then she giggled.

"What?" he wondered.
"I wanted you beside me at least an hour ago, but I wanted you to burn off some energy," she told him.

"Thanks. It wasn't enough, but it helped some," he said.

"What do you need?" she asked.

"Something that strains my stamina, but I don't want to be that far away from you. Burning it off could take a while, and a lot of distance."

She grimaced at his sacrifice to keep her safe.

"You don't have to stay right with me all the time. What do you think is going to happen?" she asked him.

Seagulls screeched and came to land near them on the sand, watching and waiting for handouts. Estrella observed them for a moment, but it wasn't long enough to completely make her miss the odd look on Steve's face.

"You saw how it was with the bikers today. You're right. Men notice you. You don't like it when they're rude to you, and neither do I. So, what happens if I'm gone down the beach to run, or if I'm swimming way out there and some guys come along and bother you? It's not worth it, Eya. I can manage what my body is doing. I can't let my body dictate my actions to me. This is good practice," he said.

"Everything has to be a challenge to you, doesn't it? You're not happy if you're not struggling against something," she pointed out.

Steve could see that she was merely observing, not accusing him of anything or trying to belittle him. He folded his hands behind his head and shrugged.

"Maybe. No, not maybe. You're right. I've noticed a pattern. I feel best after a hard fight. If I've really been pushed to perform and it tires me, then I feel great for the next few days. Nobody anticipated this when I got the serum. Erskine's notes show that he believed I might have trouble in the beginning, but he thought I would adjust to the new metabolic energy levels over time. I'm not. I can't undo the effects of the serum, and I wouldn't want to if I could. What works for me is training. Fighting. I tried to tell you that eating more would make it worse, but you thought I needed to eat. So this is what we've got," Steve said and he glanced down at his body.

"So it's my fault? If you'd told me all this, then maybe I could have understood," Estrella said.

"It's not your fault. I didn't say that. Don't twist it into something it's not, because I'm doing the same thing to you. You wanted to stay thin, and I wanted you to eat, and now men are causing problems for you. For us. If my problems are partly your fault, then your problems are partly my fault, so we're square with each other on that. " Steve told her with firm assurance.

"Okay," Estrella said quietly.

She smiled at his equitable outlook, and she felt better knowing that Steve didn't blame her cooking for his difficulties. She didn't blame Steve for the men who bothered her, either. That's just the way things were. They couldn't change it unless they starved themselves.

"So, how do we manage? I can't think of any way that you can get enough exercise while you stay near me to keep the men away," she said.
Steve laughed, and Estrella looked at him with confusion. Was there an idea that she'd missed?

"Nah, it's nothing, doll. Don't mind me," he said with a twinkle in his smile.

"No! You have to tell me, now. You can't laugh and then not share it," she demanded.

"Alright, then. Sex. Lots of vigorous sex could serve both purposes. We could try that someday," he suggested.

The humorous twinkle in his eyes turned into more of a sexy gleam. With that look on his face, and him lying there looking like a skin mag centerfold, she wasn't bold enough to meet his eyes. She turned her face away and let her hair fall between them. Steve chuckled.

"You're funny," he said.

"I'm not funny! I'm completely normal. No, I'm not even normal. You know that most women would be attacking you right now. They'd be crawling all over you. They tried to even when you wore stuffy clothes and you were fully dressed. You're almost naked, Steve, and all I did was look! You're teasing me again," she said in a plaintive tone from behind the protection of her hair.

She heard Steve move beside her, and then the heat of him was behind her shoulder. She shivered at the gravity of his presence. The cooling evening breeze tried to blow her hair away from her face, so she put up a hand to keep it in place between them. She made herself look only at the wash of colors that was starting to pink the sky. None of that helped her to ignore the man behind her.

"I wasn't saying that you're weird. I meant that it's odd that the woman who demanded her turn on me this morning could act shy now. You've seen me naked. I made a monkey of myself in front of you, and the memory of it embarrasses me, though I didn't feel any shame at the time. I can't believe some of the things we've done. It surprises me that we can go back to being shy after we've been very not shy," he explained himself.

She felt his fingers smoothing down her hair, holding it against the wind where she tried to keep it as a curtain between them. The gesture soothed her jumping nerves. He respected her shyness, rather than trying to cajole her out of it. It was so like Steve to be sure she was comfortable, rather than to press for his own wants. She sighed and relaxed back against his solid shoulder.

"This is all new to me. I've had sex done to me. It hurt, and I hated it. I'm not used to wanting it. You make me want it, and it feels so good," she ended her admission on a whisper.

"It's new to me too. I've never had time with a girl who wanted me for me, instead of for my looks or because she wants to say she's been with Captain America. I've done sex. You'd probably call it 'dumb animal sex' if you'd been a fly on the wall to see it. But it's never been like this. Not like it is with you," he said low and gentle.

Estrella tangled her fingers with his away from her hair so she could turn and look at him. The orange-pink of coming sunset made it hard to tell if he was blushing or not. Steve's innate honesty was all over his face. He looked open and vulnerable and it made her want to protect him from what the world would do if it ever saw him like this.

She didn't kiss him. She turned on her hip to face him and she put her arms around him in a hug. The warm comfort of their embrace was immediate, and she tucked her face into his neck. She only wore her bikini, and he only had shorts. The feeling of so much of their skin touching was overwhelming. Exciting. She wanted to crawl into his lap and rub all over him. She didn't.

"What are we going to do? About everything?" she asked.
"I dunno. I'm pretty good at planning on the fly. If you can put up with me, I think we can make it work," Steve said.

She nodded and kissed the spot where she'd given him a hickey. It wasn't there anymore.

"Sweetheart, have mercy. You kissing me there reminds me of this morning, and I'm already sore for it," Steve said.

His large hand came to splay in the middle of her bare back. She arched into him with involuntary response, and he bit off a groan at the sweetness of it.

"Okay. We can make it up as we go, but we better go make something for supper and get ready for bed. If we stay here like this, I don't know what I'll do," she said.

"Right. But when it's time to go to bed, I don't know what I'll do," he replied.

Estrella nodded against him.

Steve swallowed loudly, then he got up and took her with him. They avoided looking at each other as they walked back to the truck, he with his skim board, and her with her towel.

Estrella couldn't have said what they had for supper, other than it was hot and she helped him do the dishes afterward. She was hyper-aware of his location while she showered, but he stayed away and made himself busy with other things. After she brushed her teeth, she got under their covers and waited. She could see Steve's silhouette moving against the camper window as he showered in the deep dusk of twilight.

His presence seemed to fill the small space of their camper with life when he got in with her and shut the tailgate and rear hatch. The screened windows at the sides were already open to the cool air.

His shape loomed crouched and still at the foot of the mattress. His hesitation made her nervous.

"Are you okay? Is something wrong?" she whispered.

He didn't verbally respond, but she could barely see that he held a hand up in a 'please wait' sort of gesture. So, she waited.

A moment later, he crawled onto the mattress with her. Instead of getting under the covers with her, he lay down on top of them.

"What was that about?" she asked.

"Nothing. Just praying. For strength. I have to be stronger. You have your necklace on?" he asked.

Estrella smiled softly at the idea of the strongest man she knew praying for yet more strength, but she knew he wasn't talking about physical strength. She fingered the copper at her throat.

"I do. What happened this morning won't happen again," she assured him.

The dark and the quiet deepened between them for a while. She could hear him breathing.

"Are you okay?" she asked.

"I will be," Steve said, "talk to me, Eya. Distract me. Please."
"Alright. Vacation is going by fast. Do you think we can find somewhere to dance? Not like in New York. I mean with boots and country music and beer. That shouldn't be too hard to find in Texas," Estrella said.

"That's a good idea," Steve agreed.

The dark lit up with the glow of his phone, and she saw the look of concentration on his face as he leaned back on his pillow and started searching for ways to get her to some dancing. She smiled and wiggled down further under the covers. He welcomed her under his arm against his side. He wore a t-shirt, so even her arm draped across his chest and her head pillowed on his shoulder didn't get her any skin contact with him. She would have complained, but she knew he was already having a hard time.

"I love you, Steve," she said drowsily.

"And I love you, Eya," he replied.

He set down his phone for long enough to kiss her on the head. She wouldn't have thought that she would like being treated like a little girl at this point in their relationship, but she was learning that it wouldn't be about sex all the time with Steve Rogers, even when he was feeling torturously aroused. The man had incredible self-control. That was a comfort to her.

Long after Estrella was asleep and Steve had plans in his head for tomorrow, he lay awake in the dark. She was soft and warm against his side, and the joy of being near her in the quiet made up for the temptation he had to fight against.

Hours into the night, Steve heard the distant approach of a vehicle. Without disturbing Estrella, his hand eased under his side of the mattress and retrieved his sidearm. It was one vehicle. He pulled out a spare loaded magazine and tucked it into the waistband of his shorts.

He lay still and listened. It was a truck, probably an old one, from the off-tune sound of the engine. He didn't allow his muscles to tense yet. It might be nothing. Kids out for a ride from one of the other camping areas in the park.

The truck slowed to an idle as it approached their campsite. He heard hushed voices. Men. Latino men. At least three of them. They were far enough away and the engine noise made it so that he couldn't understand what they were saying, but he was sure of that much.

Steve freed his other arm from behind Estrella's head carefully. From minor incidents over the past few days, his instincts were itching at him, telling him that this was no coincidence. Without sitting up or wiggling his truck, Steve moved down the mattress and put the bulk of his body between Estrella and the lingering vehicle. The metal of the tailgate between them wouldn't adequately protect her if the next moments turned into an exchange of gunfire.

He waited, armed and ready. A kick at the tailgate would get him a clear view for accurate targeting. He drew up one leg.

The voices murmured louder for a moment, saying something about a place, a man, and some money. Somebody said something negative, that it was too dangerous, and that they should wait. Steve frowned.

The truck drove on past their position. Steve moved carefully and quietly. As the vehicle drove away, he kept himself positioned between it and Estrella while remaining below the windows where they might have seen him. He didn't want to give them the advantage of knowing he was aware of them.

Before it went far enough away that he lost the sound of it, the truck turned around and came back. This time it didn't slow as it passed. After it passed them, it sped up and left their section of the beach.

Steve slept only lightly for the rest of the night. His plans for tomorrow were solid. It would be good to get away from the coast, away from Corpus for a day.
Chapter 43

The touch of her hand brought him out of the light drowse he was in. She mumbled something in her sleep, and he was thankful she had her necklace. Her hand sought better contact with him, and her fingers twined between his.

She sighed happily in her sleep and Steve smiled in the dark. He loved that she moved to him for comfort. It made him feel better about seeking her touch for the same reason. Not that he was distressed over anything right now to have a reason to need her touch. Sure, his body was burning at him, making demands, but the ideas Thor had taught him allowed him to feel through that, and past it. He simply liked having somebody to touch. Somebody to touch him. He liked not being alone.

Some time later when her hand loosened, he slid away from her and got ready for a run. He moved silently and got out of the truck without waking her once he was in his shorts.

It felt goofy to run a brief two miles down the beach from the truck in one direction, and then to turn around and run four miles to the other side of the truck, but that's what he had to work with. The entire time, he kept his breathing quiet and controlled so he could hear any vehicle which might approach long before it got near Estrella. He wore a path in the sand for a repetitive twenty miles until he could feel the high-energy shakes starting to back down.

If he could have focused on the workout without having to be so alert, it would have been more effective. The temptation to jerk off during his shower was strong. It was the pre-dawn gloom of morning. Estrella was asleep, and no one was around to see. It would be easy to do, but even less effective than his run had been. He decided to leave it alone and get dressed.

Once he was in his jeans and boots and a plain dull red t-shirt that was a size too large for him, he slid back into the truck to wait until Estrella woke up. Or until 0700, whichever was sooner.

He lay beside her fully dressed and atop the covers. He knew he was taking a chance lingering here at the beach in the same spot where the men had found them in the night. They could come back with greater numbers. He almost hoped they would. He timed out in his head how long it would take to get to his shield if he heard them coming back. He could wake Estrella and have her get behind the shield while he took out his frustrations on the people who kept tailing them. They weren't as well trained or equipped as his usual opponents, but they might be able to entertain him for a few minutes, as long as he could be sure that Estrella was safe.

Steve shook his head to clear it of his day dreaming. He was wasting time that he could be spending with her. As long as he kept his ears pricked, he didn't have to worry about those guys for the moment.

He curved himself around her and pushed his nose into her hair. She had a sweet, girly smell that he couldn't get enough of. His body wanted to agitate. To jostle her. To wake her up and find a way to work out the nagging stiffness in his jeans. Steve pushed out a long, steady breath and once again let those wants find their place somewhere else. He focused instead on the non-physical things he loved about her.

He adored her brassy fussing. He couldn't wait for more of her manhandling. It felt exquisite, like elegant precision in battle, to let her shove or poke at him and to react with delicacy in imitation of a normal guy. He loved how she saw right through him and didn't put up with it when he thought he was being sly about something.

The best thing of all was that she was beginning to trust him. Not only with the physical stuff. She was far too forgiving there already. What got to him was that she let him see her weaknesses. Her fears. Her hurts. He must have done something right along the way, because she was hardly recognizable from the incredibly defensive girl he'd first met on the street.

She was brave to take a chance with a goon like him when she knew she was fragile and he could so easily hurt her. She had walked through a crowd of rude bikers yesterday and held her chin high when they were all looking at her… because she trusted in him.

He curled around her more closely and gathered her up, blankets and all, into his arms. She wasn't tracking her weight with visits to medical twice a week, but he could feel and see that she was getting a little heavier. From her strong appetite, he figured she still had a ways to go, and he welcomed the thought of her becoming lush and healthy.

She looked healthy now, but she kept making comments like she wasn't done yet. Her family had thought she was skinny. Steve tried hard to not imagine her as even more attractive than she was now, because he was strongly tempted to misbehave with her already. He brushed the corner of his mouth against her cheek and took another calming breath that included the warm, familiar scent of her skin and hair. She moved sluggishly in his arms and he smiled.

"What are you doing?" she asked him sleepily.

Steve felt bad for waking her, but he was glad, too.

"Nothin'," he said with the most innocent charm he could muster.

"Is it time to go? Are you trying to wake me up?" she asked, and he could hear the welcoming smile in her words.

She was happy to be with him, first thing of the day. Happy to wake up in his arms. It was all right there in her voice. He grinned with pleasure as her hand came up to touch his face. This was the best 'Good morning' ever.

"I was trying to wake you. It's time to go, but now I don't wanna," he admitted.

Estrella pushed the covers away and turned to hug him. Steve held her and took another slow, deep breath.

"I don't want to let you go, but we need to get on the road," he said.

"It's a bench seat. I can sit next to you," she offered.

"That'll work," Steve agreed, but he didn't move away from her.

She wiggled against him and laughed because he made room for her to wiggle, but he plainly wanted to keep holding her.

"If you let me go I'll make coffee for us," she offered.

"Nah. You said you wanted to eat at Waffle House. Camp is already packed. If you get dressed, we can get breakfast and coffee on the road," he said.
"Okay," she agreed, but neither of them moved apart.

Steve mentally kicked himself for lingering here. It wasn't a smart thing to do. She made him feel like a cave man. He wanted to stay here all day and canoodle with her. If those punks came around he'd beat them down, and then crawl right back in with her. But today wasn't about him. She wanted things. He delighted in getting her all the things she'd been wanting and hadn't been able to have. The look of wonder and happiness on her face in the bath and body store, and when she'd been at the botanical garden made him want to do more for her so he could see that look again.

"I found a dance hall. They've got dancing lessons every Friday night before the main performance. Live music. Beer. Wanna go?" he asked her hopefully.

If he could get her to say 'yes' and sound enthusiastic about it, he'd be able to make himself let her go. Just in case she could get him to let her go, he took the moment before she answered to lip at the arch of her eyebrow. Her eyelashes tickled his chin and his heart beat a little faster at the feel of her fingers rubbing his chest.

"Dancing. Yes," Estrella said distractedly.

Dammit. That wasn't good enough. She sounded like she might want to stay in the truck all day, too. He was going to have to be the strong one. Steve held her tighter for half a second, and let his hips push against the welcoming softness of her bottom, then he moved.

"Dancing! Boots. Music. Come on, Eya. It looked like a really swell place, from the pictures on the 'net. It's historic and everything," he said energetically, and he set her aside from him onto the mattress.

Once he slid his body away from the warm, sleepy bundle of her his willpower got a little stronger. She looked him over as he stood in the sand beyond the open tailgate. Her eyes were large, dark, and compelling. God, he wanted to crawl back in there with her! Before he allowed himself to see more of the want in her eyes, he hurried around the truck to get her suitcase for her from the cab.

"Do you think you should get dressed for dancing now? Or later? It's a few hours of driving. There's a store where I want to shop, and-"

"Steve. Did you run this morning?" Estrella asked him.

"Yeah, some. God help me, Eya, just get moving," Steve said in a rush.

He shut her in the back of the truck to change. His keys jangled in his hands and he walked around the truck and checked their surroundings, more to distract himself than because there was any danger at the moment. There was nothing but miles of sand and dunes and grasses, gentle waves, and hunting sea birds. The sun was high enough to cause him to squint from its glint off the water. Every detail he could shove in his brain was something to distract him from the desire to get back on the bed with Estrella. The cool morning breeze felt good on his neck.

Estrella gave him a mixed look of concern and guilt that troubled her smile. When she passed him and got into the cab of the truck, Steve knew they'd have to talk. He didn't want her feeling bad for how she turned him on.

He got his sidearm and all the magazines to bring to the front of the truck. He was a lot more firm with shutting the tailgate this time. It felt satisfying. The holster went into the back of his pants and the mags went under the driver's seat. He made sure that his satchel was situated on the floor behind Estrella's seat so that the edge of his shield was just at his fingertips if he reached for it. The truck started with a sound he was beginning to really enjoy, and he backed them away from their camping spot.

"We should have taken some time to make you comfortable. You're going to be grumpy all day," she observed.

"I have to be away on extended missions sometimes. I've got to learn how to go without sex, Eya. I can't afford to indulge myself every time I feel the need," he told her.

He looked to her as they bumped along over the beach. He knew he was driving faster than she liked, but she was starting to get comfortable with it. She unbuckled her seatbelt to move and sit next to him. Her thigh pressed his as she buckled up again. He clenched his jaw and drove on.

"I feel like I'm torturing you," she said.

"If this is torture, then I'll keep it. Sweetheart, it's not your fault. Your voice isn't bothering me, and I haven't even looked at you this morning enough to notice what you're wearing. It's me. Sure, you're hard to set aside, and I'm thinking about you nonstop, but I've got to adjust. It's not easy, but it feels good, too," he told her.

"You don't look like it feels good. Your jaw is tense," she observed.

"There's different kinds of good. Since when do I get to go around like this, and not pretend? When we get back to the tower I'll have to play nice and put on a good face for everyone. Let me have this, just for now?" he asked.

Estrella looked at him skeptically and curled her hand inside his bicep while his hand rested between her knees on the gearshift. He was hard everywhere. Even his lips looked firm and tight.

"How can you be enjoying this?" she asked him.

"Don't know, but I am," he said.

"I know I'm being a nag, but could you explain how you're enjoying it? Because you look scary, and I'm worried that there's going to be trouble, like with the bikers yesterday," she persisted.

Steve ground his teeth for a second, then loosened his mouth. She was right. Sexual tension was causing him to drift off course from where Thor said his mind should be. He traced back in his mind to the moment when he'd gone from willing self-sacrifice into aggressive restraint again.

Her eyes.

After he'd set her aside and got out of the back of the truck, he'd had a difficult time looking away from her eyes. He'd always heard people mention a sinking feeling in their gut when things started to get rough, and now he knew what they meant.

This thing with her eyes was something more. She'd changed overnight again. He didn't want to tell her. Not now. She was already struggling with so much. If this was the way she was going to be, he had to know how to deal with it before they were around other people.

Steve slowed the truck while they were still on the more remote part of the beach. They'd passed a few other campsites, but they were in a long, empty stretch here. He downshifted to neutral and let the truck idle.

She was looking at him, waiting for an explanation. Steve took a moment to see all of her. She wore her new-to-her jeans and a western style shirt with pearl snaps and a sharply pointed collar. Her necklace was cute nested in her collar, and her hair had that casual disarray that made him want to dig his hands into it. Her face. So gorgeous. But, her eyes…

He leaned down some to kiss her, and he could only shut his eyes after she closed hers. Compulsion was a good word for what he felt. Fear spiked into his gut like cold, familiar ice. Could he be strong enough for this, too? He barely had a grip on his willpower as it was, just with her being pretty and wonderful and his. And now her eyes turned his will to jelly. What more was there? He forgot to kiss her as he sat there frozen in anxiety. It would be harsh and impersonal to never look her in the eyes again. It would hurt her. What was he going to do?

"It's my eyes, isn't it?" she asked quietly.

He tipped his head to rest against hers and made himself breathe slow and deep. He'd have to thank Bruce when he got home. He never thought he'd use these calming techniques so much. He couldn't lie to her, not about something as personal as this.

"I didn't want to say it," he said.

Several moments of tense silence passed, except for the smooth purr of the truck. He could sense her getting more and more upset. He brought his hand up to cup the other side of her face and he spoke near her ear, low and calming in the way that seemed to help distressed people.

"We can deal with this, too. I can take it. I'll adapt," he said.

"All I am is more work for you! I don't want this!" she cried.

"I do. I want you. I want to be with you, and-"

"Of course you want to be with me! That's what I'm about. Everything about me makes men want to be with me. I've got to wear a necklace, and now I'll have to get sunglasses. You can get me a trench coat so people won't stare when I'm done, and when the pheromones come, you can put me in a glass box! I don't want this!" she said again.

He let her cry for a while because she was right. She'd gotten a bad deal.

"Nobody's putting you in a box, and you don't need to wear a coat. Sunglasses and a necklace aren't so bad, and maybe you won't need the glasses all the time," he said.

"What do you know! You don't have to wear stuff so you can be 'fixed'," she argued.

"Aw, give over! Buck got his arm ripped off and he has to wear a piece of Hydra tech all the time. He's reminded every second he walks around with it that they turned him into a monster. He's got stuff in his head that he can't get rid of. You told me outside the waterpark to set my load down and walk away from it for a while. You gotta do the same, Eya. I've dealt with some big stuff, and this is not big stuff. It's important, but it doesn't change our whole world. When I tell you that I'm good with it, I am," Steve insisted.

Estrella had gone stiff and quiet while he was talking, and he hoped she wasn't angry. He kissed her temple and turned her face to his. He stared hard into her eyes and the sadness there and the tears on her lashes made his determination wobble, but only for an instant. She wiped at her eyes and looked away. Steve was secretly glad, because as he'd stared at her longer, his concentration felt like it was slipping. Much like her voice, her eyes did things to his mind. Looking into her eyes made him soft and malleable, probably to whatever her will was, he imagined.
"You're an ass. Like Bucky," she said.

"Yeah. Learned it from him. He's a natural," Steve said to deflect the intensity of their conversation.

"You should drive," Estrella said in a subdued voice.

"Alright, but don't get caught up in worrying about your eyes. We'll get used it soon, and it won't be a problem," he assured her.

She was going to protest, but then she didn't feel like it. She'd been struggling with these things for over a decade, and it was a relief to have someone like Steve with her to say that things would be alright, even if they wouldn't. It was the sentiment that mattered. She wasn't alone to deal with this.

Estrella leaned her head on Steve's shoulder as he drove. She wanted to shut her eyes, but it was more interesting to look at Steve. She knew she was stupidly in love, because she liked to watch how his hands and feet moved as he drove the truck. It was only driving, but it was him.

"You don't have to look at the floor, ya know," Steve said as they slowed to leave the park, then accelerated onto the highway.

"I know," she said morosely.

Halfway to breakfast, Steve got an idea.

"Eya, I just realized that while I'm thinking of your problem, your eyes, I'm not thinking of my problem. It helps," Steve said cheerfully.

"You want me to think of your suffering penis instead of worrying about my eyes?" she asked, and giggled.

Steve laughed too.

"Maybe so. Don't people always like to think about other people's problems so they'll forget to worry about their own? It feels like this is working. I've already got ideas of how to deal with your eyes. C'mon. Help me out here," he teased her into a better mood.

"I've already got plenty of ideas of what could work to help your penis," she said snidely.

"Eyaaa. Not those kinds of ideas. That's only making it worse. And do we have to say penis? That makes me sound like a dog," he complained.

"Or a horse," she laughed.

"God help me, woman, because you're not," Steve said, but he was smiling.

Estrella succinctly stated a list of slang words that would substitute for penis, and she laughed to see Steve practically squirming in discomfort as he drove.

"Stop that," Steve fussed at her.

She didn't need to look and see if his face was red. She knew it was.

"Why? Does it turn you on?" she asked him.

"No! I'm already turned on, so it doesn't make any difference. It sounds wrong to hear a lady saying those words, and you know it," he said.

"You think I'm a lady. I want to be one for you so okay, I'll stop. But don't think I don't know how you talk with Bucky. You don't talk like a gentleman all the time," she pointed out.

"You heard- When? I was careful," Steve said.

"You think that just because you can hear so much better than me that I can't hear at all? I wasn't trying to listen, papi, but when you raise your voice I can hear it even through a bathroom door," she told him.

Steve thought back to the conversation he'd had with Buck on the phone when Estrella was in the tub at the hotel. No. no. Not that! He'd been worried about wanting to fight and have sex at the same time, and Buck hadn't been taking him seriously. Shit. He'd been louder than he'd thought. What must she think?

"What did you hear?" he asked in a hurry.

"Not much. I don't know what you were talking about, but I heard you say some words when you felt strongly and you talked a little louder. Pussy. Fuck. Nothing I haven't heard before, but you would fuss at me and look all disappointed if I said them to you," she pointed out.

Steve was so relieved that she didn't seem to know about his shameful thrill that he forgot to be dismayed that she'd said dirty words just now.

"Oooh, what's the big secret? What didn't I hear? You just completely ignored that I said words," she teased him with a smile.

"If you wanna know those kinds of secrets you're gonna have to grow enhanced ears, because I'm not repeating it," Steve told her.

Estrella made squinty mean eyes at him as a joke, and he smiled down at her while he drove for just a moment.

"Hey, your eyes didn't do the thing to me just then. Maybe because you were squinting," he said as he looked at the road in front of them.

"Good. I'll look mean all the time," Estrella said dryly.

Steve looked at her again, and she hurried to squint at him.

He laughed.

"Don't laugh at me!" she said, and pinched at his side. Hard.

"Ow! Ow! Alright! Geez, lady. Have mercy on a guy," Steve said.

He arched away from her hand, but stopped trying to get away when her pinching turned into soothing rubs to the spots she'd abused.

"How can I hurt you at all?" she asked.

Steve sighed. He didn't want to tell her, but then that would be lying again, since she'd asked.

"You can't. I like to pretend. It makes me feel like a regular guy," he admitted.
"Oh. That's no fun," Estrella said thoughtfully.

"Hey, I didn't want to tell you, but you asked," he said.

"So I'd better quit asking things, huh?" she wondered as they turned into the Waffle House parking lot.

"Remember, we agreed to tell the truth when we can," Steve reminded her.

They got out of the truck and walked to the restaurant. There were big trucks parked in a side lot, and the tables and booths inside looked mostly full. Estrella tucked her hand into Steve's arm and looked down at her shoes as she walked.

They took a newly cleared small table. Their waitress looked surprised when they ordered enough food for four people, but she turned around and brought their order to the busy cooks without comment.

Steve sipped his orange juice, and Estrella watched him glance around like he habitually did. His eyes lingered on a nearby table with some men at it for an instant longer than he tended to look at most things. She was tempted to turn and look, but Steve shook his head ever so slightly at her so she didn't. She listened instead for their voices. The men were speaking Spanish, so she figured that maybe he was interested because he was trying to learn the language.

Steve looked back to her, and she shifted her eyes down to her coffee cup.

"You don't look so tense now," she commented.

"I'm not so tense anymore because a really smart lady was distracting me from my problems with dirty words. Bruce said that your mental acuity had probably been suppressed along with your health. How smart are you gonna get?" he asked her.

"I don't know. It takes a really smart man to notice that he's being purposefully distracted by a pretty girl saying dirty words. How smart are you?" she replied.

Steve sat back against the booth and looked at her. The corner of his mouth curved up in a way that made her want to investigate it with her tongue. He drew in a sharp breath, shook his head and looked away. Estrella frowned and looked into her coffee.

"We have to be more careful, Steve. I'm distracting you," she said.

"Distracting me from what?" he asked lightly.

"Distracting you from whatever it is that you keep watching for," she told him.

"Oh. Yeah, that," he chuckled.

Estrella squinted her eyes because she liked looking at him when he was smiling and happy. He noticed, and he rested his elbows on the table to stare into her eyes at close range. He squinted a little, too.

"You're always testing your limits, aren't you?" Estrella said.

"How else am I gonna find em? Now I know that the squinting only partly works, but it's enough that I can get by if I really try," he commented.

"What's this? Six-guns at noon? I got hot plates, here," the waitress said plaintively.
Steve and Estrella sat back away from the table to allow the woman to set their plates down. Estrella smirked at Steve one last time before they turned their attention to eating. Estrella put most of her attention on her food, but she could see that Steve stayed aware of their surroundings while he ate. He took little glances up from time to time, and she imagined that if he had ears like a dog, they'd be twitching around.

"Thank you," she said between bites.

"For?" he asked a moment later.

"For whatever it is that you're doing," she told him.

"It's my pleasure, doll. I want you to be able to relax," he said.

He kept his look at her brief, but there was a lot of affection in his words and on his face.

Estrella paused with her fork of eggs partway to her mouth. Her hand moved back down to rest near her plate. He was watching for her. To keep her safe. So she wouldn't have to worry about men. And maybe something else, too. Whatever it was that Natasha was trying to decoy her away from with uncharacteristic girl talk.

The relief of not being alone washed over her again. The constant vigilance was tiring for her, but it looked easy for Steve. He'd said it was his pleasure to do this for her. Because he loved her.

Estrella rested her forehead in her free hand so he wouldn't see the welling of dampness in her eyes. Why was she so emotional today? The touch of his warm fingers, light as a leaf against her knuckles made her set her teeth against an undignified emotional sound that wanted to come out.

"You can choke up later. Eat. We've got fun stuff to get to," Steve told her kindly.

"Don't be a bully. I'll eat when I want to," she complained.

She wiped at her eyes, but she picked up her fork again.

Later, when both their bellies were uncomfortably full, Steve went with her to the bathrooms in the hallway.

"We'll do it this way. You go into the lady's room. When you're inside, I can go to the men's room. Don't come out of this door until I text you and tell you I'm waiting outside. If anyone bothers you in the restroom, you scream as soon as you notice a hint of things going strange. Not a second later. Understand?" Steve told her.

"We have to do all this coordinated stuff just so we can pee?" she asked.

"Yes."

"Okay, but I'm going to want to know why someday," she said.

Steve didn't make any promises. He stood at the men's room door and waited for her to go into the women's room. She blew out a breath, but she did as he wanted her to. Before she was done washing up, he texted her that he was waiting in the hall.

She took his hand and they went to the truck.

"I don't think I can keep my jeans buttoned and sit down," she commented about how full her belly was.
"I hear ya. I think I like Waffle House, except for all the truckers," he said as they got back onto the highway.

"What's wrong with truckers?" she wondered.

"They seem to like staring at my girl," Steve said.

Estrella felt sleepy again after their large breakfast, despite the coffee. She drowsed against Steve's arm as they covered miles and miles of Texas highway. The day was sunny and dry and the fields and ranchlands seemed to go on forever. There were rarely any tall trees except for around the river crossings.

The radio played country music at low volume. She looked up at Steve to see him enjoying the scenery. His phone was in a cubby in the dash showing their route on the map, but he rarely looked at it.

"This goes on forever, doesn't it? There's so much of... well, it's not nothing, but there's a lot of it," he said when he saw her looking at him.

"You've never seen the countryside? Didn't you tour the country selling war bonds?" Estrella asked him.

"Only in the Northeast. I've never been out here. This is different," he said.

"You've got a lot of your country left to see, Captain America. Not everything is cities and concrete. Where do you think all the beef and crops and gasoline come from? The denim for your blue jeans, and the leather for your shoes? You don't get that from the cities," she told him.

"I know, I know. I've just never seen it. Those are natural gas wells, right?" Steve asked.

He indicated a white gravel lot off from the highway that held a particular contortion of pipes and machinery, all with a fence around it. It looked very industrial, out in the middle of wild grassy cattle range and silvery-green scrub oaks. They'd passed several of the well sites, some of them right at the highway, and some far in the distance.

"I think so. I've been through here once before, when I was a kid and we were going to Schlitterbahn. The wells weren't there then," she said.

It took three hours of driving to get to their destination. Steve was easily able to determine that they'd lost any followers because the rural highway was long and mostly empty in the middle of the day.

He woke Estrella from her drowsing when they got to their first destination.

"You want to shop at a boot store?" she asked when she was awake enough to see where they were parked.

"I've seen what you packed. You don't have any boots. Gotta have boots to dance. Come on," he told her.

The western wear store smelled like leather and new denim. Near the front counter there were belts and buckles, wallets and purses and silver jewelry. A section off to one side had cowboy hats. Two walls of the store were dedicated to all kinds of boots from little kid's rubber boots, to western styles, to more utilitarian work boots. The rest of the floor space was dedicated to jeans and industrial work clothes, fancy cotton shirts, and plain tough ranch wear.
"Hidy, folks. Name's Colin. Ma'am, it looks like you need some boots," a youngish man greeted them.

His eyes got stuck on Estrella for a moment, then he turned his head sharply and shook Steve's hand. Steve couldn't help but smile at the guy. He looked like he'd walked off the pages of a rodeo magazine. His tan felt cowboy hat had a well-worn oil stain all around, with a darker smudge at the rim where he frequently touched it. His jeans showed wear spots specific to his keychain and his wallet. His boots looked older and more worn than you'd think you'd find on a guy who worked in a store that sold boots. His belt buckle was… impressive.

Steve forgave him his looking at Estrella because the guy had greeted her politely, shaken himself out of his staring at her, and then immediately greeted him. Estrella seemed to think he was alright, too. She smiled at him, but then looked down at her flip-flops.

"Hey, good guess," Steve said dryly, "let's look at your boots, and I think she's getting too big for her britches, too."

Colin grinned at Estrella as he turned to walk in front of them and lead them to the lady's boot section.

"Aw, You gonna let him talk to you like that?" he asked her playfully.

Estrella smiled and didn't say anything. Colin was making her shy, but she didn't seem to mind his attention. Steve wondered if the experienced-looking cowboy had caught her eye. Estrella looked to Steve and then pressed her face to the side of his arm when she couldn't hide a smile.

"Got yourself a shy one, there," Colin said to Steve, then he looked to Estrella kindly, "Come on, I promise I'll be gentle. You don't have to talk, just show me what ya like and we'll see what fits."

Steve couldn't believe the smooth, suggestive words coming out of the guy's mouth, but he second-guessed himself because Colin was keeping his distance from Estrella and being genuinely courteous. He had a sort of overt but easy-going masculinity that was perfect for a boot store in Texas, but would stand out in New York.

Estrella looked at the wall of boots silently, and both men could see that she'd be at least a moment before she settled on anything. Colin turned his attention to Steve. He tapped his rump where his wallet was and then put his hand down low, then lifted it up high with a questioning shrug. He wanted to know what price range he should guide Estrella toward in her boot selections. Steve looked at the prices marked on the boxes. Some of them were pretty high, but he didn't care.

Steve lifted both hands in an all-encompassing arc to indicate that anything at all was acceptable. Colin nodded and turned his attention back to Estrella patiently. Steve was about to make an issue of the way he was staring at her ass and legs, but Colin turned his head and hollered back across the store.

"Tammy, come have a look at our little lady and see what ya think for jeans," he said.

His knowing sun-weathered eyes held on Steve for a moment, and he waved a hand and smiled. It was a 'don't worry, I'm just pullin yer chain' look if Steve had ever seen one. With the gesture, Colin's collar gaping a little and Steve saw a tattoo. He was Army. It shouldn't have mattered, because lots of people of all sorts served, but it was one more reason that Colin was difficult not to like.

A middle aged woman with big blonde hair came through the clothing racks to the boot section.
She also stood and stared at Estrella's bottom half for a moment. She nodded her head in understanding and then smiled at Steve.

"Don't worry, hon. Colin only seems like he'd steal your girl and your horse. He's a sweetheart," Tammy said, and she disappeared back toward the women's jeans section.

Estrella ignored them and tried to find what she liked. She already knew that Steve was going to insist on buying her expensive shoes, so she tried not to notice the prices. Some of the boots were too clunky, and some had heels too high for dancing. Some had ridiculously pointy or curved up toes. No matter how she looked around for something sensible, her eyes kept straying to a fantastical looking boot off to her left.

Colin disappeared and she was glad he'd left them alone. Estrella was trying hard not to be flustered in front of Steve over how unexpectedly sexy the salesman was. She felt a stinging sort of shame that she was with the most attractive man she'd ever met, yet here she was helplessly noticing a cowboy who wasn't even quite as tall or as handsome as Steve. Why? She didn't understand it, and she didn't like it.

She held her hand back for Steve to take, and he was there immediately. His fingers claimed hers. His warmth at her back was a comfort against the confusing, friendly flirting of their salesman.

She glanced aside as Colin came sauntering back toward her with two boxes in his hands. He had a new pair of socks laid over his arm and his irresistible smile made her eyes skitter away from his face.

"Rest your fanny right there and we'll see which ones are yours," he told her.

Steve urged her toward a rough-hewn wooden bench, but Estrella protested.

"I didn't choose any boots," she said.

"Sure ya did," Colin insisted.

He waited patiently for her to sit. Estrella looked to Steve for backup. He nodded his agreement with Colin.

"You did," he told her.

This time her squint was true annoyance, and it worked to wipe the somewhat dopey look from Steve's face. She gave up and sat down. She crossed her arms, but she slid off her flip-flops.

Colin knelt down and broke the plastic tab holding the new socks together. His legs looked to be almost too much muscle for his faded jeans to handle. The man's tanned, wire-scarred hands reached for Estrella's bare foot, and something in Steve's head tripped over into denial.

"Un-uh," Steve grunted, and he stepped toward where Colin crouched in front of Estrella.

He didn't know what he was going to do, but the cowboy was not going to touch Estrella's feet. Colin looked up at him and grinned. He kept his hands away from her.

