Ultima ratio - the last resort. At last the day of the Final Battle against Lord Voldemort has come. Harry, Ron and Hermione fight bravely against their nemesis - but then something goes wrong. And Hermione finds herself alone in a precarious situation.
"Hermione, come on. You know we are ready." Harry tried to soothe his friend. "This is it! We have to do it now."

"He's right, you know, Hermione." Ron told her while his arm was wrapped comfortingly around her shoulder.

The three friends were currently sitting in what appeared to be a small apartment when in fact it was a magically enhanced tent. Said tent stood in a secluded area in the north of England far from any dwelling, magic or muggle.

"But…but…" Hermione stuttered. "It's tomorrow. He's attacking tomorrow. We can't do this."

She started to panic slightly. She had felt this way ever since they had learned about his plans to attack the ministry. It had been pure coincidence combined with Harry's invisibility cloak that they now held an advantage over the Dark Lord. He was going to attack the heart of the magical community: the Ministry of Magic itself. And if the Ministry fell so would England. And all would lie at the feet of Lord Voldemort. The three friends knew this. And they had to act to prevent that from ever happening. They had worked so hard. Ever since Albus Dumbeldore died at the end of their sixth year at Hogwarts the three friends had lived and fought only for one purpose, to rid the world of Voldemort. And now there was the long awaited opportunity. They knew his plans, they knew he was finally vulnerable. It was time to hit.

"Hermione, " Harry said in a calm voice. "this is our chance. We have to take it."

"I know!" Hermione choked. "I do! But, what if we fail Harry? We know of his plans only since five days. We couldn't take all possible scenarios into account. We are far from ready. I can't do this."

Harry sat down on the couch beside Hermione. Ron was on her other side and still held her in his arm. Harry took one of her hands and held it reassuringly.

"You are right Hermione. It was just five days ago. That's not enough time to set up a plan to take down Voldemort." He paused as if to decide how to best phrase his next words. "But it was not just those five days. It was a lucky stroke that we learned of his attack plan tomorrow. But this whole thing? We planned this for how long now?" Harry asked, then answering himself. "Two years, Hermione! Two years."

He leaned forward and whispered in her ear, "We are ready. Don't worry!" Then Harry let go of her hand and stood up.

Hermione knew he was right. So far their way had been hard and difficult. They had struggled to find and to destroy Voldemort's Horcruxes. They had sacrificed so much but in the end they had succeeded. All of the Horcruxes were gone. The diary, the ring, Slytherin's locket, Ravenclaw's diadem, Huffelpuff's cup and Gryffindor's dagger were now no more than broken trinkets. Just one piece of the Dark Lord's soul remained and that was residing in his body. But that last piece had proven to be very difficult to get. Since his rebirth four years ago Voldemort had grown in power. His army of followers was now strong enough to take over the country. He was just one step away of achieving his goals. Voldemort may not be immortal any more but he still was powerful and dangerous. If he succeeded tomorrow and took down the Ministry he would become the ruler of their country. And then, Horcruxes or not, he would be untouchable.

So ever since Harry had heard of Voldemort's plan to attack he had decided it was time to fulfil the prophecy.
A flash of green light and Scrimgeour, Minister of Magic, was dead. Voldemort stood, wand still raised, in the Minister's office and laughed insanely over the dead body that had fallen half way across the desk.

Hermione could feel Harry stiffen beside her. They couldn't see inside the office but they could still see the green shimmer of the deadly curse through the milky windows.

"It's time. We should hit" Hermione stated with more calm than she actually felt.

"How many?" Harry asked, no emotion betraying his voice.

"We have to take down the two outside the door first," said Ron who then cast a spell to sense sources of Dark Magic and closed his eyes "Four inside the secretary's room. And then there is Lestrange and Voldemort inside the Minister's office."

Ron didn't struggle over the Dark Lord's name.

"OK! Ron and I take down the two guards at the door. Silently!" Harry nodded to Ron "Then we barge in. While Ron wards the place we take down the four, Hermione. And then…" he trailed off but they all knew what would come next.

"That's it then." Harry paused as if he wanted to say something but then decided against it "Ron, on three. One….two….three!"

Harry and Ron both cast a silent curse. The two death eaters at the door were both simultaneously hit by a purple curse and fell down without making any noise. They walked stealthily to the door that led to the antechamber. The door would open to the inside so Harry and Hermione positioned themselves on either side of the door. Ron crouched down behind Hermione and closed his eyes again.

"Two in the far end of the room I think they are guarding the door to the Minister's office, one seems to be sitting somewhere in the left side of the room. The last one is pacing the room," Ron stated.

"Ok, we know what to do. Ron, after you ward the room help Hermione," Harry whispered.

Hermione felt fear bubbling inside her as her breathing became laboured. She couldn't focus her thoughts any more.

_Oh god, I can't remember one single curse_, she thought, panicking. In that moment Harry caught her eyes and smiled slightly. Then he whispered so softly that she could barely understand.

"Whatever happens now, Hermione. We did our best, we have nothing to regret. There is a chance to win."

Then his eyes hardened and the smile disappeared as he gave the signal to go. Harry blasted the door open with a spell and then took down the Death Eater sitting on a sofa that once was supposed to make the time visitors had to wait for the Minister more comfortable. Now it was turned over and the Death Eater that had occupied it moments before was sprawled behind it. His mask had come off his face and Hermione could see the surprise still present on his now lifeless face.

Hermione knew he was dead. They couldn't afford to spare him. It was too risky to leave behind stunned enemies as they could always be enervated. The trio had learned that the hard way long ago. Hermione shuddered as she remembered that day. Neville Longbottom wouldn't have lost his life if she had just killed that Death Eater.

But now was not the time to dwell in guilt.

The three remaining Death Eaters had in the meantime overcome their surprise and started attacking. Harry was forced to cast a shield charm as Hermione and Ron entered the room. Hermione had to stay near Ron to protect him while he was warding the room to prevent other enemies from entering. She raised her wand and brought it down in one fluid movement. A sickle of yellow light left her wand and headed towards one of the Death Eaters. The Death Eater had seen the attack and raised a shield of his own. As the yellow light collided with the shield it stopped and Hermione could see the Death Eater smirk behind his mask. Hermione wasn't concerned though as she knew his defences were useless. And sure enough the yellow light intensified its glow and absorbed the bluish shield. After that it continued its way like it never had been stopped. The smirk of the Death Eater hadn't left his face as the light collided with his chest. He fell backwards as blood flowed down his front. Hermione felt the now familiar pang of guilt wash over her as she knew she had ended another life.

In the corner of her eyes Hermione could see Ron casting the finishing spells to erect the wards while Harry was fighting one of the remaining Death Eaters. The other one was attacking her now. She cast a shield charm in order to protect Ron. The curses now hitting the shield were strong and Hermione had to concentrate to maintain her shield.

In that moment the door to the Minister's office was flung open and in strode, calmly as if he had no concern in the world, Lord Voldemort. He was clad completely in black, his skin sickly white and his eyes glowed in crimson as he surveyed the room. He was followed by Bellatrix Lestrange whose face was contorted into a cruel mask of glee.

"Ah, I knew you would do something stupid," Lord Voldemort said in his cruel high pitched voice. Both duels had stopped upon his entry.

"Your efforts are futile," he added his voice now icy cold and devoid of any emotion. "You can never beat me, Potter."

He strode towards Harry and the Death Eater who had been duelling Harry before backed away to make room for his master. Harry and Voldemort were now standing three metres from each other. Each staring at the other, crimson met green. Harry's face was determined while Voldemort still wore an eerie smirk that made him look even more dangerous. Hermione could see Harry twitch and she knew that his scar must hurt him. But aside from the small twitch he didn't let it show. Voldemort's eyes narrowed and his smirk disappeared.

"I see you have learned how to occlude your mind even when you stand before me." His voice was still emotionless, but Hermione could now sense an underlying anger.

"An impressive feat. But it will be of no use to you."

"You will not win this one, Riddle," Harry stated with a strong voice.

"You dare!" Voldemort snapped at him. His face now a mask of hate and anger as he whipped out his wand and pointed it at Harry.

"Yes, I dare. Tom Riddle." Harry now pointed his wand at Voldemort.

"Bella, take down his followers," Voldemort ordered his lieutenant without breaking eye contact with Harry. "Do not interfere in my duel!!"

Hermione could not follow their conversation any more as Lestrange and the remaining two Death Eaters started to attack Ron and herself. She could feel an impact on her shield as Lestrange's curse hit it. Bellatrix laughed insanely as she fired another curse at her. This time the force of the curse was too much. Hermione's shield shattered and she stumbled back a few steps.

"Ah, little Mudblood. Did you really think you could win against me?" Bellatrix mocked her.

Ron having finished warding the room was now fighting the remaining two Death Eaters at once. Hermione knew she was on her own just like Harry and Ron now had to fight alone.

"Avada Kedavra!" shouted Bellatrix.

And a burst of green light shot towards Hermione. She jumped to the side and the Killing curse missed her by inches.

"Very innovative, Lestrange." Now it was Hermione's turn to mock though she didn't feel half as sure as her voice sounded.

She was still crouched down on one knee as she moved her wand in three slashing movements at Bellatrix. Bellatrix formed a shield that took most of the force of Hermione's curse. The rest of her curse scratched Bellatrix' shoulder and blood started to flow down her arm.

"You filthy scum!" Bellatrix screamed furiously.

She flung her wand and Hermione could feel the force behind this dark curse. She had no time to move out of the way so she recast her shield. Bellatrix' curse collided with the shield but neither did disappear. Instead black veins snaked over the surface of the shield like a spider web. The black of those veins contrasted harshly with the clear blue of Hermione's shield. Hermione could feel the web of the dark curse pushing against her shield threatening to break it. And she knew if her shield broke the net would engulf her instead and she would die. Bellatrix, wand still raised to maintain her curse, cackled insanely. Hermione could feel the force of the curse double. Her shield lost its power by the second. Hermione closed her eyes. Now is not the time to despair, she told herself. Harry and Ron need you. If you don't stop her now she will attack them instead. Eyes still closed she got up from her kneeling position.

"Ah, what now? To proud to die snivelling on the ground?" Bellatrix asked, still smirking.

Hermione ignored her. She held her wand now with both hands in front of her the tip pointing at the ceiling. She summoned all her magic and opened her eyes. She then extended her arms to the sides and pushed with all her might at her shield and the dark curse. Slowly the shield gained in volume. Bellatrix' eyes widened in shock and she tried to maintain her curse. But Hermione did not stop pushing and finally the shield burst with a blinding light and took the dark curse down. Bellatrix gasped as her curse was broken. Hermione did not pause and flung a curse of her own at Bellatrix. It collided with her and this time Bellatrix fell to her knees.

"You little shit!" Bellatrix clenched through her teeth.

At that time Ron fired a powerful curse at his adversaries and both Death Eaters fell to the ground. Hermione saw that Ron had his back towards Bellatrix and her and she somehow knew what would happen seconds before it did. She looked back at Bellatrix who had her wand pointed at Ron with a malicious grin on her face.

"Avada Kedavra!"
The green light spurted towards Ron.

"Ron, no!" Hermione screamed to warn him.

Ron spun around and his eyes widened in shock as he saw the green curse coming towards him. It was too late he had no time to dodge it. The light hit him square in the chest. Hermione could only watch in horror as he fell backwards and hit the floor where he remained lying. Ron was dead.

Hermione was shocked and it was pure instinct that she raised her shield to avoid the curse Bellatrix flung at her.

"No, not Ron!" this time it was not Hermione's voice but Harry's.

"Do you see now, Potter?" Voldemort said amused, "First you let your parents die for you. And then your friends step in front of you, and die one after the other. You sacrificed them. You are worse than me. I never let others fight for me."

His wand was still raised menacingly at Harry, smirk in place but his eyes' cold gaze never leaving his opponent. Whereas Harry's eyes were darting between Voldemort and Hermione.

Hermione saw that Harry was losing his cool. She could not let that happen. Harry needed to concentrate but he would not as long as she was in danger. She looked away from Harry and towards Ron. He was still lying were he fell. She could not belief how empty his face looked. As if he was long gone already. And there was no way back for him. Hermione felt a desperate sadness grasp at her chest.

_Not now! _she told herself. _Get a grip!_

Then she took a deep breath and her eyes darted to Bellatrix. As her eyes moved away from Ron and towards Bellatrix her sadness changed into a fury she had never felt before.

"You are going to pay!" Hermione said softly and every syllable was seeped with cold hate.

This time Bellatrix did not mock her. She raised her wand and cast a curse at Hermione. This one the most powerful in the duel so far. Hermione didn't raise her shield nor did she utter a counter curse. She just let the dark curse rush towards her. At the last moment shortly before the curse would hit her she slammed her wand in the path of the dark curse and changed its course so it hit the floor a metre away from her position. She used the same motion she deflected the curse with to mutter one of her own.

"Inflammo!"

Bellatrix who was completely unprepared for this sudden counterattack had no time to defend herself. The curse hit her and the dark witch was engulfed with violet flames. Bellatrix Lestrange did not have time to scream as she burst into ashes. Hermione fell to her knees her magic drastically depleted. She looked into Harry's eyes and nodded.

Hermione felt so faint. She could barely focus her eyes. There were black dots dancing in her vision and she felt sick. Unconsciousness was very tempting now. She just had to give in to it and all this pain and despair would be gone. But no! That would only be temporary. And Harry was fighting against Voldemort right now. Hermione took a deep breath and fought the sickness. After opening her eyes again she tried to concentrate on the two other wizards in the room.

"-and of course Gryffindor's dagger." Hermione could hear Harry saying "Did you really think no one would find them, Riddle? I mean those hiding places weren't exactly original."
Hermione was proud of him. He was facing the darkest wizard alive and Harry was being so brave.

"You will pay, Potter!" Voldemort snarled furiously. "I will kill you and every one that followed your delusional ideas."

"The only one delusional is you, Riddle." Harry's voice was still strong.

Hermione whose vision was now back to normal could see the two wizards were still standing were they had stood before and had still raised their wands at each other. But so far neither had cast a curse. Though Hermione could feel Voldemort radiate a vast quantity of dark magic the force of which made the hair on the back of her neck stand on end.

"You may have destroyed my Horcruxes. But what good does that do you?"

Hermione noticed that the Dark Lords voice was now back to being calm and held again the controlled hate. That was much more unsettling than the screaming.

"I can create new ones. But first, Potter, you are going to die." Each word from the Dark Lord's mouth felt like knife stabs. "And I promise you your death will not be as easy as your friends." Voldemort gestured towards the fallen body of Ron.

"You will never win, Riddle. Because I know something you don't," said Harry with confidence.

Hermione was impressed how Harry could still stand that raw, dark power which seeped from Voldemort. It seemed to engulf the whole room and made breathing difficult.

"What are you talking about? Do you really think you have an advantage over me?" Voldemort sneered. But he still did not attack. Harry had him mesmerized.

"That wand of yours. Is it new?" Harry asked coldly.

Hermione knew the answer and so did Harry. That wand was once Dumbledore's and it was one of the three Deathly Hallows.

Voldemort stiffened as Harry concluded, "The Elder Wand."

"So you know? And you are still foolish enough to challenge me?" the Dark Lord's eyes narrowed. "Yes, you are right. I own the Unbeatable Wand. I took it from Dumbledore's dead hands."

"Maybe. But you are not the one who beat Dumbledore, are you?" Harry said. "So, that wand does not belong to you."

"Idiot boy!" Voldemort sneered "Snape beat him, of course. I ordered him to kill the old fool. And after that I killed Snape. And now the Elder Wand's allegiance lies with me."

"Oh, but you see. Snape might have taken Dumbledore's life but the one who beat him before that was Draco Malfoy," said Harry "The wand's allegiance never was with Snape."

"But what does it matter?" Voldemort was now angry. "We are duelling on skill alone then. You cannot win, Potter. And after I kill you I will get to Malfoy."

"Too late, Riddle. I got there first. I beat Draco months ago."

Hermione could see the Dark Lords eyes widen in shock at Harry's words.

"So, what do you think? Doesn't that make me the master of the Elder Wand?"
Hermione hadn't seen it coming but just as Harry had finished the sentence. Voldemort attacked.

"Avada Kedavra!"

Harry obviously had seen it coming as he cast his own spell.

"Expelliarmus!"

Hermione could see the Elder Wand leave Voldemort's hand. It spun and then attacked the one who threatened its owner. Lord Voldemort was hit by his own Killing curse. He fell backwards and hit the floor. His eyes staring lifeless at the ceiling.

Hermione could feel an enormous relief. They had made it! Finally! It was all over! She struggled to stand and then stumbled slowly toward Harry. She needed to hug him now. It was over! The biggest menace to the wizarding world, no to the world in general, was dead. Tears of joy were running down her cheeks.

But then Hermione saw it. Something was not right with Harry. He was in pain. And...he was clutching his scar.

"Eight! Eight, Hermione." Harry struggled to get the words out.

His hands left his face as he locked eyes with Hermione. She could see pain and fear. Then he threw his wand away. It hit the floor a few metres behind Hermione with a clacking sound and then rolled a short distance until it lay still. Hermione stared at Harry bewildered and concerned.

"I'm sorry. He is too strong. Finish him!" It seemed each word cost him tremendous effort to get out.

Their eyes remained locked for another few seconds. Then Harry closed his eyes his hands again holding his forehead and his whole body trembled. Hermione didn't know what was happening. What eight? She didn't understand. Harry was in pain but she didn't know how to help.

Suddenly the trembling stopped. Then Harry removed his hands slowly from his face. But as he opened his eyes again they weren't green anymore. They were glowing red.

Hermione stood frozen in place staring at Harry. That couldn't be possible.

He cannot possess Harry. Hermione couldn't believe her eyes. Desperation was bubbling up inside her. Harry told us so the day Sirius died. But that arrogant posture those pitiless eyes, it couldn't be her Harry.

"Who...Who are you?" a terrified whisper from Hermione.

"Oh, I think you know perfectly well who I am, Mudblood," he answered with Harry's voice but at the same time it was not Harry's voice. Hermione had never heard Harry speak so cold with so much venom. She was scared.

"Give him back!" Hermione sobbed.

"I don't think so. He is gone and you will follow him" answered Harry cruelly. "You failed, your saviour is dead." Harry took some steps back as he spoke.

Hermione still stared at her friend's face but she could barely recognize it. It was a smooth mask betraying absolutely no emotion. Despite his eyes, they glowed red with malice. Harry's face wasn't supposed to look like that. He always showed emotions, happiness, joy, laughter, sadness, anger and even hate. But not this absence of every feeling. Hermione couldn't move a muscle. Harry on the other hand still retreated. Wait…he retreats? Voldemort never retreats. And certainly not from a 'Mudblood'.

Hermione's eyes darted to the floor. There, just one step away from him lay a wand. The Elder Wand. Of course, he was unarmed now. Harry had, with a last effort, thrown away his own wand. He had known what was coming and had tried to help her.

'Finish him! Finish him! Finish him! Finish him!' His last words were replaying in her head. They ripped her out of her stupor and she raised her wand at Harry.

"What are you trying to do now? Do you really think you can stop me? A Mudblood?" Harry cackled insanely.

He now stood right beside the wand. He just had to pick it up and she and the world along with her would be doomed.

"Your precious saviour failed. I killed him. The prophecy is fulfilled. No one can stop me now!" Harry's voice was now hard as steel.

"No…you are wrong" said Hermione softly her voice shaking. "He did not fail. He won. I just have to finish it for him."

Her grip on her wand tightened. She was still shaking, still scared but at the same time determined.

They locked eyes again. Those red orbs were so full of hate. Hermione was scared to no end. How could she beat that bottomless hate? But she had to. Harry counted on her and so did Ron. Hermione could feel Harry emanate the same dark magic that Voldemort had before. It was crackling around both of them. The air seemed charged with electricity.

Then she saw it. A flicker in his eyes. And suddenly he launched for the wand.

No! You don't! Hermione screamed in her mind. His hand now closed around the Elder Wand.

"AVADA KEDAVRA!"

A too familiar green light. The aim was true and another soul was ripped from the body never to return.

Hermione could still feel it surging through her, the power of the curse. Why this one? She didn't know. She had never used one of the Unforgivables before. She looked down at Harry lying at the floor. His right hand was still clutching the Elder Wand uselessly. The colour of his eyes was back to green. But they were empty and dull now, lifeless. His skin was turning grey and waxy. He was dead.

Hermione walked to him like in trance. She was feeling painfully empty as she kneeled beside him. How long she sat there beside her dead best friend she didn't know. But she was not crying. This pain was beyond tears. Her body was still breathing but it felt like her soul had left it, gone along with her friend's. Then after a long time she reached her hand out to his face. Slowly she closed his eyes for the last time. Then she bent towards him and kissed him on the forehead.

"Harry, my friend….my brother," Hermione whispered lovingly. "We made it. We succeeded. It's finally over. Don't worry, Harry. I will look after you. I'll bring you back to your parents. You can lie beside them in Godric's Hollow."
She held his cheek cupped in one hand. And looked at his face. He had been so brave and good.

Hermione stood and walked to were Ron lay. She crouched down beside him too. He was looking so grotesquely peaceful as if he were sleeping.

"Ron, my love. I don't know what to say." Her voice was hoarse with emotion. "You were everything to me. I don't know how to go on now. This was not supposed to happen. You were not supposed to leave me behind. We should have gone together or not at all."

She bent over him and kissed his lips. They were unreacting and icy cold.

"I'll bring you back to your family, Ron. You can rest beside your sister, your brother and your father."

Hermione got up. This dreadful feeling of emptiness still there. Her hands were shaking and her head swirling. How could she go on now? The day they had all been waiting for finally arrived. They had won. But she was alone now. They had lost so many people in this war. It had started with Cedric Diggory and then Sirius and Dumbledore. From there on it just got worse and worse. Even her Muggle parents got killed. But however bad it got they had always been there for her, Ron and Harry. They had comforted each other. But now in their triumph she was alone.

Hermione had started to pace the room. And now she found herself staying before the source of her misery. She looked down at the remains of Lord Voldemort. His red eyes, now empty, held no trace of their former malice. It surprised Hermione but she felt no hate for her enemy any more. It was gone. Maybe died together with her friends. There remained just the sadness. It had all been so pointless, this war. No one had gained anything. She kneeled down beside Voldemort and closed his eyes just like she had done with Harry's.

"I don't know where you wanted to be put to rest. I guess you didn't even know yourself. Never thought that would happen, did you?" Hermione sighed.

She got up again. What was she supposed to do now? Waiting for someone of her side to find them? She looked around the room. She hadn't left the energy to do anything anymore. Then her gaze fell an Harry's wand. It still lay where he had thrown it before Voldemort took over.

_He would want it back._

She went to retrieve it and then brought it to Harry's still form.

"Here, Harry" she put it down on his chest. "Your wand is a million times more worth than this evil thing."

She took the Elder Wand from his hand. But as she touched the smooth wood of the wand she could feel a surge of energy run through her body. She shrieked and fell back, the wand still in her hand. That was pure magical power running through her body. And it all came from the wand in her hand.

She looked at it in wonder. How was that possible.

_The wand, it is now bound to me?_

It was a nice feeling to have this much power. With this wand in hand she could do anything. Right all the wrongs. Put the world back on the right track.

But then her gaze fell on Harry's body and the euphoric feeling left her as quickly as it had come. Of course the wands allegiance was now with her. She had killed its previous owner, her best friend. As she now looked back at the wand in her hand she could almost see it covered in blood. This small piece of wood had cost countless lives. It was an evil thing. Hermione suddenly felt unbound hate towards the wand.

"Nothing good ever came from you!"

She took the wand in two hands, each hand on either side of the wand. And then she applied pressure unto the wood. After a while the wood gave in and the wand snapped with a loud crack in two. The moment it snapped Hermione could feel the magic from the wand, that had moments before peacefully flown through her body, go wild. It thrashed at her own magic, whirled forcefully through her, ripping at her body. Wave after wave of magic came from the two pieces of the wand clashing and joining with the magic already inside her body adding to its force. It felt like her body was ripped open. It was so much worse than the Cruciatius curse. Every nerve in her body screamed in pain. Hermione lay at the floor thrashing and screaming. And still there was more magic flowing from the wand into her body. Hermione tried to let go of the wand pieces but she was unable to open her hands. They were cramped around the pieces. There was now so much magic it encased her form in a golden light. The pain still intensified by the second. It felt like her skin was peeled from her body. Hermione just wanted to die now. She couldn't take any more. Her vision became blurry and she could barely make out the room. And then the room began to swirl around her until it became a blur of different colours. Hermione couldn't distinguish up from down anymore. It felt like she was falling. But were to she didn't know nor did she care. The pain and the falling feeling remained for an eternity. Hermione had lost all feeling of time. It felt like dying und she just wished she would lose her life already.

And then it stopped. She hit solid ground, hard. But it didn't hurt so much. Nothing like the pain before. Hermione opened her eyes but she couldn't focus her vision. It was bright and she lay on something green but that was all she could see before she lost consciousness.

She did not know how long she lay there unconscious but after a while she regained her senses. Hermione's body was sore and she felt dizzy. What had happened? What had that stupid wand done to her? She opened her eyes still sitting were she had fallen and cringed at the brightness. When the world came back into focus she could see she was lying on a grassy field. There were even some cows a distance away, grazing. The fields stretched on and on, some with more cows some with yellow, ripe wheat. Hermione could hear birds singing and the sun was shining. She was in the middle of a postcard countryside idyll. However had she gotten here? One second she was standing in the destroyed office of the Minister of Magic surrounded by her fallen friends and foes then she experiences the most excruciating pain she ever had to endure and then she wakes up in this peaceful scene. Hermione was at a loss here.

Well, she couldn't lay here forever. And the ground was a little bit chilly. As she tried to get up a sharp pain shot through her left arm. Hermione gasped at the sudden pain. She crouched into a sitting position and examined the injured arm. Her lower arm stood in an odd angle. She could barely move the fingers of her left hand. She rolled up her sleeve which sent new waves of pain through the arm. The skin was bruised dark purple and the bone was obviously broken. It could have happened when she had landed here. She vaguely remembered that her impact had been far from gentle. Luckily her wand was still in the holster at her right arm. She flicked her wrist and the wand landed in her hand. She then muttered a spell and bit her teeth together as the broken bones re-positioned themselves into their anatomically correct position. She then summoned bandages and secured the arm. There was really nothing else she could do about it. To mend the bones she would need some potions. Still sitting on the grassy land she examined her body for other injuries. She couldn't find anything else that required her attention. Her body was covered in bruises, cuts and dried blood but nothing serious. She took another look at her surroundings. Nothing had changed. Still peaceful, still calm. No enemies were in sight. Hermione was so used to being always alert. She had lived on the road for the last two years. Harry, Ron and she had been on the run. It had been essential to be wary of their surroundings because they never knew when the enemy would strike next. As she thought about Harry and Ron the memories of their last fight were coming back in mind. Hermione saw the still form of her boyfriend before her. Then there was Harry being struck with the Killing curse which had come from her own wand. Hermione closed her eyes. Despair and sadness were ripping at her heart again. She took a deep breath to steady herself again.

_Compare! Get up!_ she told herself. _I need to get away from here. Wherever 'here' is._

She stood up and was immediately hit by a wave of nausea. Hermione needed a moment to steady herself again. She felt weak. So weak in fact that she didn't dare to apparate away from here. The risk to splinch herself was too high. But she could always use the Muggle way. So, she walked slowly away from her little grassy field. After half an hour of wandering through the countryside she reached a small road. She decided it was best to follow that road as it would eventually bring her to a village or town. There she could seek some transportation back to London. She didn't exactly want to return to the Ministry but she still had things to do. The Aurors were sure to have arrived by now. Hermione would have to sort out what had happened with them. And of course, a bang of cold grasped her chest, she had to retrieve the bodies of Harry and Ron.

After a while of wandering along the road she heard the distant sounds of a motor behind her. She looked back, and sure enough there was a car coming her way. It was still far away. Hermione felt relieved. She was really tired by now. It would be nice if that car could take her to the next town. Hopefully the driver was nice enough to take a hitch. She quickly rubbed at her face with the sleeve of her robe to get rid of the blood and grime. Then she clutched her black witch's robes tightly around her to cover her tattered clothes. She didn't need to scare the driver away with her appearance.

After a while the car had nearly reached her and she stood at the side of the road waving at the car. The car seemed to be an antique car, Hermione noted. But was obviously well cared for. As the car neared her she could see a man in the driver's seat. The car slowed down and Hermione felt relieved as it came to halt right beside her. The man driving the car had the windows pulled down and was now leaning a little bit out of the driver's window to look at her.

"Hello, Missy. Do you need help?" asked the man.

He stared at her strange attire but seemed friendly enough. He was in his late forties, a little plump and had short brown hair in an old fashioned hairstyle.

"Yes, I was wondering if you would be so kind as to take me to the next town, sir," Hermione answered politely.

She could see he was still staring at her robes dubiously. But she couldn't blame him. She was wearing witch's robes and he was obviously a Muggle. Of course he would think it strange. He considered her for a moment but then seemed to come to a decision.

"That would be Steepleton, Missy. That's just were I'm headed." The man motioned to the other seat beside him. "Please, take a seat."

"Thank you, sir."

Hermione walked around the car and got in the passenger seat. The car took off again. And Hermione leaned back in the seat.
"It's just another fifteen minutes to Steepleton," the man informed her. "So, what were you doing, wandering around alone? Did you get lost?" he asked.

"Yes, kind of," Hermione answered.

She didn't want to talk about how she ended up here. She didn't even know where she was exactly. The man seemed to sense her reluctance and didn't ask anymore for the next ten minutes. The road reached the top of a hill and Hermione could see a village in the valley.

"That's Steepleton," the man said. "Lovely town. Lived there my whole life."

Hermione nodded.

"You could go to Mrs Janeson," the man suggested in a friendly talkative way.

Hermione was bewildered. Who is Mrs Janeson?

The man answered her unspoken question. "She is the best tailor I know. I'm sure she has something for you."

He glanced at her clothes again. Hermione raised a brow. She looked down at herself. Sure her witch's cloak was a little bit out of the way but it covered her ripped and bloody t-shirt. And her jeans were perfectly normal. A little bit dirty, okay, but otherwise just fine.

"And she is not that expensive," the man added helpfully.

You are one to talk. Hermione thought looking at the man again. He was obviously a vintage freak. First the car then his hair and to top it of he was dressed completely in vintage clothes.

But she answered, "Yes. Maybe I'll try that. Thank you."

The man smiled friendly at her. The car had reached the village in the meantime. It was just as small as it had seemed to be. But Hermione could see a bakery just a little bit ahead of them.

Perfect! I just need something to eat and I'll be able to apparate back to London.

"Could you stop here, sir?" Hermione asked.

"Of course." The man pulled the car from the road.

"Thank you for driving me." Hermione got out of the car.

The man behind the wheel looked at her rather concerned.

"Are you going to find your way now?" he asked.

Hermione thought it was nice of him to be concerned but there really was no reason for him to be.

"Yes, I think so," she said. "Thanks again for driving me. Have a nice day."

"Yes, good bye," answered the man smiling and waved at her. He then took off again down the road.

Hermione felt dizzy again now that she was standing. She looked longingly at the bakery. Unfortunately she didn't have Muggle money on her right now. But she really needed some nutrients now if she ever wanted to reach London again. She looked around. There was an old man sitting on a bench a few houses ahead from where she was standing. But he was asleep. A small woman came down the alley towards Hermione but she entered the bakery. So Hermione stepped in the shadow of one of the houses. With the flick of her wrist her wand was in her hand again. She tapped her head with the wand and experienced the familiar feeling of eggs rippling down her body. She was now invisible to the eyes of muggles and most wizards. She then took off to the bakery. Through the window she could see the woman paying. And as the woman left the shop Hermione slipped in.

Hermione was sitting on a narrow wall surrounding a garden. A large grapevine was right beside her and covered her from any passersby. Her thieving trip to the bakery had been a success. No one had spotted her. Unfortunately the assortment hadn't been very big. She just got some old bread and a few pieces of apple pie. But as she had felt starved to the point of feeling faint everything had tasted delicious. Now she was leaning back on her wall catching some sunrays. She really felt better. Her strength had returned to her. Not all of it of course but she definitely felt up to the apparition now.

Now were to apparate to?

The easiest thing would be to apparate inside the Ministry of Magic as that was her destination. But she didn’t know for sure that the Aurors had the situation under control now. Voldemort might be out but his Death Eaters could still be running free. No, Hermione didn't want to end up on a battle field again.

Then maybe Diagon Alley?

Yes, that would work. There was an apparition point at Diagon Alley. Then she just had to reach some Ministry official and hopefully this nightmare would finally be over.

Now that this decision was made Hermione got up and concentrated on Diagon Alley. She spun on the spot and the familiar feeling of pressure surrounded her. It was not exactly a very nice feeling but Hermione welcomed it. She was glad to be able to leave this village. She couldn't put her finger on it but it had been a tad bit on the strange side.

She arrived at the apparition area in Diagon Alley and stepped immediately aside from it as she didn't want to disturb other travellers. Hermione took a few steps down the Alley when she noticed something was off. There was Flourish and Blott's the bookstore right where it should be but the sign above it read Flourish and Geare. And further down the Alley she could see on the left side a new store were Florean Fortescue's should be. It was now an Antiques shop Hermione could see as she passed it. That was rather odd. There were more shops missing or other new ones she'd never seen before. Now that she thought about it something else was strange. The shoppers that passed her were staring at her. Not a recognizing glance in her face, no, they were fixed on her clothes. Some even shook their heads and muttered something under their breath. What was so strange about her? She was still wearing her black cloak opened in the front underneath she wore her shirt and the tight jeans. Really, nothing out of the ordinary, at least not in the wizarding world. The other people wore normal wizard's or witch's robes. Hermione couldn't see anyone with Muggle's clothes but that was not surprising. They still didn't know that Voldemort was defeated and didn't want to look like Muggleborns. But whatever happened to those staring people Hermione honestly didn't care right now. There were other more pressing matters. She still needed to contact the Aurors.

How best to do that? Or I could use the tram to the Ministry.

Deep in thought, Hermione passed a newspaper stand. She glanced at the Daily Prophet absentmindedly and stopped dead in her tracks as something caught her eye. She walked the few steps back and took a look at the newspaper. The caption read:
Grindelwald strikes again – New attacks in France.

That was just not possible. Hermione grabbed the paper. Grindelwald was dead. Voldemort had killed him to get information on that blasted wand. But here it read he had obviously attacked a secluded wizarding village in the north of France just a few days ago. Many were killed and even more injured. Was that some sick joke?

"Hey, you read it, you buy it!" the wizard selling the papers scowled at her.

Hermione looked up at him then reached in her pocket and handed him some sickles. Still clutching the paper she walked over to a bench right across Gringotts' gates and sat down. She gulped and opened the paper again.

Still there. That obviously fake article. Her eyes scanned the paper for further information. Then she read something that made her stop breathing. There over the caption in a corner was the printing date. Hermione felt like someone had boxed her in the guts. The printing date read:

Oct. 12, 1943

Okay, don't panic! Hermione thought. Desperately trying but failing this resolution. There has to be a perfectly logical explanation.

She then started to examine the paper. It seemed new. If this paper was indeed from the forties it should be yellowed. But it was not, it even smelling of printing ink. Was this a prank or something? But she had walked by the newspaper stand on pure coincidence. No one could have known beforehand. And there had been more copies of the paper. Why would someone make this up anyway?

Hermione felt sick as she now remembered all those tiny details she had noticed since waking up on the field but had been until now to preoccupied to pay attention to. The driver of the antique car and his vintage style, the village of Steepleton and the odd bakery, the undeniable changes in Diagon Alley.

They were strange but could be explained if she really was in…. but no, that would be, Hermione made a quick calculation, 54 years!

That was just not possible. No one could travel that far back in time. She had researched time travel in her third year. That year Professor McGonagall had granted her the time turner and Hermione had been a little bit obsessed with the concept of time travel. She had in fact read several books on the topic. The time turner was the only means to travel back in time. And Hermione hadn't had one since the end of third year. Even if she had a time turner she only could have gone back a few hours. That was the time frame a time turner worked with: a few hours not several decades. The farthest anyone had gone back was the inventor of the time turners Arctus Blimble. He had gone back for 63 hours if Hermione remembered correctly. But 54 years? Entirely impossible.

She thought back trying to reconstruct her actions. Maybe there was something she overlooked right now. It always helped to recapitulate things if something was amiss. First she had fought Harry/Voldemort. She had won. Hermione couldn't help but feel the misplaced guilt again. By defeating Harry - no Voldemort - she had acquired the allegiance of the Elder Wand. She had felt it's power when she had picked up the wand. Then in a fit of anger she had snapped it. The magic of the wand had then seemed to attack her. Hermione shuddered as she remembered the pain this had inflicted on her. She had passed out from the pain and had woken up on the field. But there had been more, she now remembered. A slightly familiar feeling. Beside this being-skinned-alive-feeling there had been this falling and swirling motion. It had been intensified tenfold but that feeling was comparable to her time turner experiences. Hermione shivered and clutched the Daily Prophet in her hands so that it crumpled. She was very pale now.

But it was still an assumption, yet. She had to check. The wizarding world was too static there wasn't much development in customs or styles. But the muggle world had been subjected to huge changes in the last 50 years. If she was indeed in the forties she would recognize it in Muggle London. So Hermione stood, threw the paper in a waste basket and walked down Diagon Alley to the Leaky Cauldron. The people were still staring at her and Hermione hastened down the Alley suddenly very self-conscious. As she reached the Leaky Cauldron she passed the bar accompanied by the stares of the customers and left through the front door.

Hermione stood there in the middle of London and was on the verge of tears. Her face was drained off all colour. That was not her London. The cars on the street, and there were not many, were all ancient and the buildings were just wrong. Some of them were destroyed. The worst of all were the people or what they were wearing. The women all wore skirts and blouses some even tiny hats and the men were in slack cloth pants and shirts. All wore unmistakeably forties styles and all stared at the strange woman standing in front of a rundown shop.

So the paper had not been a stupid prank. She was indeed stranded in a totally different decade. Hermione didn't know what to do now. In the last few hours her life had been turned upside down. First the loss of her friends and only family she had left and now this. There was just so much she could take and all of this had been much too much.

After another minute of staring at this foreign city and refusing to believe she turned around and re-entered the Leaky Cauldron. She wasn't in the condition to make any big decisions. She was tired and hurt. She hadn't slept for ages. She really needed rest now. Maybe the best plan of action would be to get a room in the Leaky Cauldron and have some rest. And if she was lucky this nightmare would just prove to be that, a nightmare.

But before she got a room she went back to Diagon Alley and searched for an apothecary. She really needed some healing potions. The apothecary was quickly found and Hermione bought some bone mending potion, a blood replenishing potion, bruise and cut ointment and a bottle of dreamless sleep potion. After that she returned to the Leaky Cauldron. Inside she went straight to the barman.

"Excuse me," she asked politely "Do you have a free room I can rent?"

The barman was a tall and muscular man in his forties with short dark hair. He took a look at Hermione but seemed to not care about her attire. For that Hermione was grateful.

"Of course, Miss. Do you need a single or a double bed room?" her asked in a deep and pleasant voice.

"Single, please." Hermione answered.

"Very well. That is two galleons a night, Miss." Hermione nodded in agreement to the barman's answer. "You can have room number 4. I'll get someone to show you the way." The barman handed Hermione a key then turned and shouted in the kitchen. "Louisa, show this customer to her room!"

After a few moments a woman stepped from the kitchen. She seemed to be just a little bit older than Hermione herself. She was not very pretty but had a friendly smile on her face.

"So, you are staying with us?" she asked "Which room did he give you?"

"Number four." Hermione held the key up.
Ah, that's up the stairs. Follow me!" The woman began to climb a narrow staircase.

"So, were are you from? I've never seen you here before," the woman asked Hermione as they reached the second floor. "And your clothes are so exotic."

This woman seemed to be rather talkative, Hermione noticed. She didn't need nosy people right now. What was she supposed to answer? No, I'm from London actually. But I travelled back in time more than 50 years, that's the reason for my clothes. Yes, that would go down well. Hermione nearly rolled her eyes.

"Yes, I was on the road for some time now," Not exactly a lie. "I've always wanted to see London though. Is it nice here?"

Hermione hoped her question would divert the woman's attention.

"Oh, yes. And Diagon Alley is really interesting," she answered enthusiastically. "Sadly, Muggle London is not safe right now. What with their war going on."

Hermione was bewildered for a moment until she remembered where or rather when she was. Of course, the Second World War was raging right now. And it wouldn't end for another two years.

"So, that's your room." The woman had stopped in front of a wooden door. "Have a nice stay."

"Thank you!" Hermione answered and opened the lock with the room key.

The room was rather small. There was a bed on the left side. Its covers were old and worn but clean. On the other side of the room was an old wooden closet. It looked like it could fall apart any moment. Hermione guessed the only thing holding it together was magic. A small window on the wall opposite the door showed a view of Diagon Alley. There was another door by the closet. Hermione checked it. It lead to a bathroom which was windowless and rather small but clean enough. Hermione took off her cloak put down her bag with the healing potions and sat down on the bed. She took her wand out and cast several warding spells, a charm to alert her of possible intruders and a locking charm on door and window. She did the spells mechanically and without thinking about them.

Now that she sat in this relatively secure room and nothing needed her immediate attention the moment she had dreaded had finally come. Since that duel in the Ministry she hadn't had time to think about what had happened. She had actually tried to suppress all thoughts about it. She didn't want to think about what she had lost this day. She closed her eyes and all she could see were their dead faces. They were staring at her accusatory. She had killed them both.

Tears were running down her cheeks. She had allowed Bellatrix to kill Ron. It had been her duel and her responsibility to stop the witch. In the end her hesitation had cost Ron's life. And Harry? She had personally cast the Killing curse on him. Hermione curled up in a fetal position on the bed. Sobs were now shaking her body. She knew it wasn't really her fault. They had fought in a war. They all had been prepared to die. Hermione was sure neither of them would blame her. But that didn't change the fact that they were dead now. She was left behind.

Since her parents had died almost one and a half years ago Harry and Ron had become her family. She had loved them both. Harry like a brother and Ron as her boyfriend. Hermione lay on the bed and cried desperately for their lost lives. She just couldn't stop the tears from streaming down her face. This war had taken everything from her.

She stood before her parents' house that had been completely wrecked just like all the other houses in the street. There had been nothing left despite the smouldering remnants of her childhood. Harry had had a vision of the attack. And they had left to help. But they were too late. Hermione stepped on the area that once was her home. She took a few steps her head was swirling and she couldn't think straight anymore. Then she came upon something. It was a corpse. Barely recognizable as human and burnt to cinders. The skin was blackened. The material that once had been clothes was merged with the body. The face was completely burned off making the body unrecognizable. But Hermione knew… and she fell to her knees….

It was a triumphant feeling. They had finally reached another one of the despicable horcruxes. It was the cup of Huffelpuff, a beautiful trinket. That something so beautiful held something so foul made Hermione sick. They were deep underground, below even the oldest of Gringotts’ vaults. This hiding place had been warded with so many dark spells, Hermione was surprised they had made it. But here they were. Harry, Ron, Ginny, Luna, Neville and herself. Nothing He put in their way could stop them. Hermione was so proud. Without Luna they wouldn't have been able to get here. So she was the one to have the honour to take the cup. As Luna touched the cup she was suddenly surrounded by a bright white light. The light then seemed to be sucked into her body. Hermione saw with horror as her friends face contorted in pain. Then Luna screamed. Blood was running from her eyes, ears and mouth. Her skin split open everywhere on her body. More and more blood flowed from her and gathered in a pool under her fallen body. And still she screamed in agony. Hermione could do nothing to help her friend. She held her as the life seeped out of her…

Hermione started up in the bed. At first she didn't know where she was. But as she remembered the events from last day the bewilderment was replaced by a dull aching feeling. She must have fallen asleep. It was dark outside. She checked her wrist watch: 5:34 a.m. As she got up from the bed her whole body hurt. The worst was the throbbing pain that radiated from her left arm. She felt nauseous and sat back on the bed. On the floor she found the bag with the healing potions.

Time to use them.

She emptied the bag on the bed. First she took the vial with the bone mending potion. She downed it in one go to get it over with. It was a viscid goo and tasted of burnt plastic. The throbbing sharp pain in her arm subsided and left a dull ache behind. Hermione removed the bandage. The arm still hurt a little bit but it would do so for the next few days. At least the bone would be mended. Next Hermione took the blood replenishing potion. It tasted only slightly better than the mending potion. After taking it she felt instantly better. The nauseous feeling left her. Next she should use the bruise and cut ointment but before that she needed a shower.

She stepped in the bathroom and took her clothes off. She glanced in the mirror. Her face was pale and there were dark rings under her eyes. Her hair was filthy and dishevelled. Her right side was caked in blood as there was a large cut that reached from her belly over to her side. It was the remnant of a cutting hex. She couldn't remember when she had received it. Several minor cuts and bruises were all over her body. After examining her injuries in the mirror she stepped in the shower. The water stung on her open wounds but the warmth still made her feel better. She even found a small piece of soap.

After the shower she stepped out of the bathroom, the towel wrapped around her. She then closed the curtains of the window and began to apply the cut and bruise ointment to all the places that needed it. She cast a quick Scorgify and Reparo on her clothes before donning them on. They were still rather tattered but it would do until she could buy new, time appropriate ones.

She wasn't sure why this being stranded in the wrong time affected her now so little. After having read the paper she had been shocked. But now that she thought about it didn't worry her that much anymore. Probably because there was nothing waiting for her in her own time. The worst had already happened at the Ministry. Everything else seemed to drop in the background.

But she still had to go back. This was not her time and she didn't belong here. Hermione knew the rules of time travel. Well, the first she'd already broken: You must not be seen. But she couldn't help that. The next said that no one was allowed to change time. How had McGonagall phrased it?

'Aawful things happen to wizards who meddle with time.'

Hermione snorted. Awful things had already happened to her even without her meddling with time.
But McGonagall had been right. Hermione mustn't change anything while staying here. In her time the war was finally over. The people were save again. Hermione wasn't going to jeopardize this victory. She was tempted to do something to prevent her friends from dying but everything they had done had been necessary. She wasn't sure she could save them even if she tried to. Then there was Harry. There was no way to save him. Hermione had thought about his last words.

'Eighth', he had said.

Hermione hadn't understood back then but now she had time to think it through it was rather obvious. Harry being able to speak parseltongue, the strange connection between his mind and Voldemort's and of course his surviving the killing curse when he was a baby. It all made sense now.
That night Voldemort had attacked the Potters he had, unknowingly Hermione assumed, created another Horcrux, Harry.

'Stupid prophesy, Hermione thought. 'Neither can live while the other survives'? Obviously what it should say is; neither can live. Period.

Hermione sighed as the lump in her throat was back again. It hurt to think of her friends. Just to stop her thoughts swirling around her lost friends she decided to ponder her options now. She was stranded in a foreign time period. What she needed was a way back to her time. But how to do that?
To travel forward in time was, as far as she knew, impossible. So the first step of action would be to research and get information. She could go to the Ministry and tell them everything. Maybe a department was involved with time travel. But Hermione didn't trust the Ministry. They had done more damage than help in her time. The most likely scenario if she were to tell them was them sticking her in some cage like a lab rat. Or they would put her under Veritaserum and squeeze out as much information about the future as they could get. No, the Ministry was not an option. Then maybe, Hermione hesitated to finish that line of thought, Hogwarts?

The castle did hold one of the biggest libraries of Britain. If there was a book about time travel that was useful to Hermione she was bound to find it at Hogwarts' library. And there was also the Elder Wand. The wand had been the trigger of her time travel of that she was fairly sure. She had snapped the wand and then this magic had flowed inside of her. It must have been the Elder Wand's magic that had sent her back here. But where were the broken pieces of the Elder Wand now? Hermione hadn't had them when she had awoken on that field yesterday.

Currently the Elder Wand of this time period was with Grindelwald. Maybe she should get that wand? But Hermione had already fought one Dark Lord. That was enough for her. She didn't intend to start a war with Grindelwald. But she knew Dumbledore would beat Grindelwald in the end thus acquiring the allegiance of the Elder Wand. All she had to do was lie low at Hogwarts win the trust of Dumbledore and then after he was master of the Elder Wand…steal it? Borrow it?

Hermione sighted loudly. That wasn't going to be easy. And she really didn't want to reveal everything to him. He had been a great wizard, Hermione had liked him and it had been a great loss for her side as he died but he still was one manipulative old man.

_I bet he was in Slytherin when he went to Hogwarts_, she chuckled.

Now that she thought about manipulative Slytherins. There was another one of those currently attending Hogwarts. Hermione groaned. She hadn’t thought about that. Tom Riddle would be at Hogwarts now – maybe a good chance to just assassinate him?

_No, I already determined: no changing the time line._ Hermione stood from the bed and started pacing the room. _I would probably fail anyway. He already is a powerful wizard. So, no attending Hogwarts?

But Hogwarts was the best solution. She could kill two birds with one stone. Getting information on time travel and the Deathly Hollows and a chance to steal the Elder Wand. Where was the problem anyway? Hogwarts was a big school. She would just have to stay out of Riddle's way. He was in Slytherin and she would make sure to end up in Gryffindor. Dumbledore was after all Head of Gryffindor. Yes, Hogwarts seemed to be the best way to go.

Hermione left her room and went down to get something to eat. It was still early, half past six, but there already sat a few customers eating their breakfast. After that she went back to Diagon Alley. To implement her plan she had to sort out a few things. First of all open a vault in Gringotts. She was currently using the money Harry and herself had stored in the beaded bag she always carried along. The beaded bag held everything they had ever needed in their two years of hunting horcruxes. There were beside other stuff books on every topic imaginable, the tent they had lived in, some rather volatile potions, potion ingredients and of course the money. Hermione had cast the complicated Infinitio spell on the bag and ever since it had been a bottomless pit. Now, she didn't have to carry the bag around everywhere. In fact, that would be suspicious especially the books which were all printed well after 1943. Best to deposit everything in a nice, safe vault. She had already altered the galleons with a little transfiguration as they had a mintage that would lead to inconvenient questions.

Hermione entered Gringotts. It looked just like it ever had. The entry hall was giant and intimidating. In the far end were the counters where she needed to go. When it was her turn the goblin turned to her and said in an indifferent voice,

"Welcome to Gringotts. My name is Grinax, how may I be of service?"

"I would like to open a vault," Hermione answered.

"Name?" the goblin, Grinax, asked bored as he reached for a piece of parchment and a quill.

"Hermione DeCerto," Hermione said without hesitation.

She had decided to not use her own surname. That could lead to time related problems so she was going to use a pseudonym.

After nearly an hour during which Hermione had to sign various papers, give the goblins her magical signature and even provide them with a sample of her blood Hermione was the proud owner of a Gringotts vault and a tiny key to said vault. She left Gringotts with the key hanging around her neck on a fine golden chain.

Now to the next step in her plan. She needed to contact Hogwarts and ask for a place at the school. Hermione bought a few sheets of parchment and then entered a café which she didn't know from her time period. After she ordered a coffee she began to write her request:
To

Armando Dippet

Headmaster of Hogwarts

School of Witchcraft and Wizardry

Dear Professor Dippet,

I have recently arrived in the UK as I had to leave my home due to dire circumstances. I lived with my parents in La Calique a small village in the north of France. I am sure you know the perilous menace that at the time threatens France. My family fell victim to this war as did many others.

As I had to leave the country in a rush I had no time to prepare my stay here. I apologize if this may seem sudden to you but I would like to ask you for a place at your school.

I have been home tutored but I am sure my state of knowledge will qualify to follow the lessons at Hogwarts. I would be attending sixth family left me with enough money so I will need no funding to pay for the student fee and my books and equipment.

I would be very thankful if you would consider my request.

Yours sincerely,

Hermione DeCerto

Hermione reread the letter once more as she absentmindedly sipped at her coffee. It would do. She hoped her cover story wasn't easy to expose. She had really visited that village, La Calique. It was in the summer after her third year. She had spent two weeks there together with her parents. That had been a carefree time.

Hermione leaned back in her seat and closed her eyes as she wallowed in her memories. Everything had been so easy back then. And the wizarding world had still been a place of fantasy and fairy tale to her. But that happy, innocent and naïve Hermione was long gone now. She wondered if there was still something of that Hermione left in her. She doubted it.

With a sigh Hermione stood up, left a few Knuts on the table and left the café. Back out on Diagon Alley she noticed that there were more people now doing their shopping. And predictably the staring began again. She really needed to buy some clothes. But first she went to the owlery to sent the letter to Hogwarts.

A shopping spree later Hermione finally arrived back at her room in the Leaky Cauldron. She had several bags full of forties style clothes. After trying on various skirts and blouses and what not it was safe to say that she really didn't like the forties, at least not the fashion. And the hairstyles were hardly any better. Did they expect her to waste hours in front of a mirror to tease her hair into those locks? Really, she had better things to do. She wore her hair open in a mop of curly hair or as a ponytail which held her hair perfectly out of her face. Very useful in combat situations.

Welcome To Hogwarts

Dear Miss DeCerto

I have received your request. It is a very unusual one as Hogwarts never had a transfer student before. But of course one has to ponder the difficult times in which we are living right now. I am very sorry to hear from the awful things that happened to you.

As I don't want to worsen your situation I will offer you a place at Hogwarts. Enclosed to this letter you will find a list of the things you will need at Hogwarts.

Please use the floo to get to Hogwarts. It will be opened for you at the 18th of October at 4 o'clock.

Yours sincerely,
Armando Dippet

Headmaster of Hogwarts

Hermione had received that letter two days after she had sent her message to Hogwarts. She had been relieved. Now she was standing in a queue to use the floo fireside in the Leaky Cauldron. She had her trunk in one hand. It was filled with all the things she would need at Hogwarts. When it was her turn she took a little bit of the floo powder in her hand and stepped into the flames. She then threw the powder while saying clearly,

"Hogwarts, Headmaster's office!"

Just a few seconds later she stepped gracefully out of the fireplace in the headmaster's office. She took in her surroundings in a quick glance. It was the office she remembered but the interior decoration was completely different. Dumbledore's office had been rather sloppy, with delicate objects scattered here and there. And one side had been covered in shelves with books. Dumbledore's office had been warm but this room was something entirely else. The room was very tidy, nothing seemed out of place. In the middle of the room stood one big, intimidating desk made of dark wood. Behind that desk stood a shelf covered in medals, trophy cups and awards. The atmosphere of this room was a complete opposite to what she knew from her time period. The purpose of the room was clear though: to impress. Behind the desk sat a man. He had grey hair which was trimmed short. His face was wrinkled and his grey eyes looked rather stern.

"Ah, you must be Ms DeCerto. Welcome to Hogwarts." Dippet said, as he got up from his chair and walked over to Hermione.

He offered Hermione his hand and she shook it.

"It is nice being here. Thank you, Headmaster, for taking me in," said Hermione quietly and politely.

"Yes, it is rather unusual to accept a transfer student. But we have to help our fellow witches and wizards from the mainland," Dippet answered pompously. Hermione was reminded of Percy Weasley, but in a bad way.

"Now Ms DeCerto, you wrote that you would like to attend sixth year. How old are you?"

Hermione had the impression Dippet wanted to get it over with quickly.
"I am seventeen now, sir," she lied.

Hermione was in fact eighteen but she wanted to attend sixth year. That would give her nearly two years till her graduation. Time she could use for researching and getting her hands on the Elder Wand.

"That would indeed classify you as a sixth year. But you have to understand that we have to test you." Dippet sat down in his chair. He did not offer Hermione to sit down.

"Yes, of course, sir." Hermione wasn't concerned. She was very confident with her spell work.

"But before that, you will be sorted in one of the houses. I'm sure you know about our house system?"

Hermione nodded.

"Your head of house will then test you and place you in an appropriate year."

Hermione wasn't surprised he shuffled that task off on somebody else. Dippet waved his wand lazily and the Sorting Hat sailed from a shelf and onto the desk. Dippet then gestured to Hermione to put it on. She took the hat and placed it on her head. In her first year it had been so big it had slid down over her eyes. Now it was still too big but it didn't slide down so far.

"Ah, a new student? Aren't you a little late?" Hermione heard the head speak in her mind.

"I'm a transfer student," she answered.

"I see," the head said. And Hermione could feel the alien presence in her head probing her occlumency shields.

"Your mind is expertly shielded, dear. I wonder why you would need to occlude your thoughts so... But you have to lower your shields or I won't be able to sort you."

Hermione had seen that coming.

"I'm afraid I can't do that. Can't you just put me in Gryffindor?"

Hermione hoped the hat would cooperate.

"Now, dear. It is my job to sort. You can't just pick a house yourself," the hat answered amused.

"But I thought you would take the choices of the students into account. You did that for a friend of mine." Hermione tried to sound convincing. "You wanted to put him into Slytherin but he asked you to be put in Gryffindor. And so you did."

"Did I now? I can't remember," the hat said. "But okay. If you insist, dear. I put you into GRYFFINDOR." The hat shouted the last word.

"Thank you," Hermione thought before putting the hat back on the headmaster's desk.

"Excellent!" Dippet exclaimed. "I will fetch Professor Dumbledore. He's your new head of house."

Dipped walked over to the large fireplace and threw a little bit floo powder in the flames. Then he stuck his head into the now green flames and talked to someone on the other end.

A few seconds later a tall form stepped out of the fire place. Hermione was shocked to see her old headmaster alive. Of course she was prepared to see him alive. But now that he was standing unharmed before her, she was nearly moved to tears. This younger Dumbledore had auburn hair. His beard was as long as ever but equally auburn. And, Hermione noticed with a grin, he was still wearing those ridiculously colourful robes. He wore a bright red robe with little silver stars all over it. His eyes were twinkling. Just like she remembered them.

"Ah, you must be our new student." He beamed at her.

"Yes, professor. My name is Hermione DeCerto. I was just sorted into Gryffindor," Hermione answered

"And a fine house it is, Ms DeCerto." Dumbledore grinned at her. "Now, I think it best we go to my office. Unless you have to say something more, Armando?" Dumbledore turned to Dippet.

"No, not at all, Albus. Go ahead," Dippet said.

He had already started to read some parchments and wasn't really paying attention anymore. Dumbledore went to the entrance of the office and opened it for Hermione.

"Thank you for your time, Professor Dippet," she said to Dippet who didn't look up but waved a hand at her. She then exited the office together with Dumbledore.

They reached his office in no time as Hermione was busy staring at the corridors, the moving pictures and the suits of armour standing in a row in the corridor. She was thrilled to be back at Hogwarts. She hadn't known until now how much she had missed it. Dumbledore on the other hand would have been surprised if the new student hadn't been goggling at the castle. All new students were doing that, first years or not. Of course he didn't know Hermione had spent six years in the castle already and was just feeling a little bit nostalgic right now.

Hermione followed Dumbledore in his office. It was a nice and cosy room. And sure enough all the ominous silver objects and the ancient books she had been missing in Dippet's office were scattered all over the transfiguration teacher's office.

"Please, take a seat, Ms DeCerto." Dumbeldore made an inviting gesture towards one of the comfortable looking armchairs beside the fire place.

Hermione accepted the offer and sat down as did Dumbledore on the other arm chair.

"Can I offer you something? Maybe tea?" Dumbledore asked.

"Tea would be nice, thank you," Hermione answered.

And seconds later two cups of tea appeared on the side table.

"Now, Ms DeCerto, Professor Dippet asked me to determine your state of knowledge so we can put you in the right year." His eyes twinkled at her over his cup of tea. "Nothing to be afraid of though. I'm sure you will do well."

"Let's begin with my field of work. Can you transfigure this teaspoon into a humming bird?" Dumbledore held his teaspoon and passed it to Hermione.

Now, transfiguring an animal into an inanimate object was a relatively easy task. But to change an inanimate, soulless object into something alive was a lot more difficult. Hermione flicked her wrist and her wand landed in her hand. Dumbledore raised one brow but didn't say anything. Hermione thought that maybe her quick-access wand holster was not very common for students. At least if they were not fighting against random Dark Lords.

But back to the task.

Hermione concentrated her magic. She tried to imagine a humming bird in her mind, the long beak, the feathers glistening green. As she had created an image of the bird in her mind's eye she waved her wand in a complicate pattern and thought,

Mutatio res!

No visible spell left her wand but the teaspoon began to change into a tiny green humming bird. The bird began to swirl around Dumbledore's head.

"Wonderful!" Dumbledore exclaimed his eyes twinkling "And even nonverbal. Very good Ms DeCerto."

He waved his wand and the humming bird transformed back into the spoon and then fell into Dumbledore's outstretched hand.

"Now, let's see how you perform in the other subjects."

Dumbledore leaned back in his chair and beamed fondly at Hermione.

An hour later found Hermione before the entrance to the common room of Gryffindor. Dumbledore had tested her in many subjects and a few of his tasks had been quite tricky but Hermione had performed well. So well in fact that Dumbledore wanted to put her in seventh year. Hermione had declined. She really needed those two years to solve the mystery of her time travel. She had told Dumbledore that she would need some time to get used to the new school and she thought it better to have this extra year to accommodate. Dumbledore had accepted that and the rest of the hour they had had a nice game of wizard's chess. After the game Dumbledore had accompanied Hermione to the common room.

So Hermione was now standing before the painting of the fat lady. She had a little less than an hour till dinner in the Great Hall. Hermione felt nervous and was rather reluctant to enter Gryffindor common room. The last time she had been in there was at the end of sixth term in her time. Harry, Ron and herself had been planning their cause of action for the hunt of the horcruxes. That room held so many memories. Good ones and bad ones. Hermione didn't know if she was ready to face those memories.

"In or out? Decide now! I don't have all day!" the fat lady pronounced in her usual rough but amiable way.

"Aardvark," Hermione said giving the password to the common room.

The portrait swung forward permitting her in. Hermione stepped reluctantly inside the common room. Though she had tried to brace herself she was not prepared to see the Gryffindor common room again. She took in a sharp breath of air. It was just like she remembered it to be. The walls were a bright red with little golden G's all over them. On the side farthest from the door was the fire place in which a merry fire was crackling right now. Several brown leather armchairs were positioned before the fire. Hermione could see they were occupied by some third or fourth years finishing their homework or chatting. On her left side she noticed the two stairs leading to the dormitories.
As the lessons were over for today the Gryffindors had gathered in their common room. The students were sitting around talking and laughing. Some were having a game of exploding snaps or chess. Hermione had a warm feeling as she looked at the scene unfolding before her. But at the same time she felt a sorrowful longing tearing at her. She longed for her fellow Gryffindors sitting there having fun, for her friends waiting for her returning from one of her extensive library visits. The room might have been an old, dear acquaintance but the people were definitely not. Each face was foreign to her.

"Hey, who are you?" Hermione was jerked out of her musings by a male voice addressing her.

She looked up at a smiling face. The face belonged to a boy with blond hair. He was rather tall with a muscular build and a mischievous glint in his blue eyes.

"Umm…I'm Hermione. Hermione DeCerto," Hermione stammered still surprised by his sudden appearance.

"What a nice name. Hermione." He seemed to test her name on his tongue. He then extended a hand to her. "I am Marc Longbottom. Nice to meet you, Hermione."

Hermione was surprised to hear a familiar name but took his offered hand anyway.

"Oi, Longbottom! What are you doing?"

Another boy appeared beside the blonde one. He was equally tall with windswept red hair and brown eyes. He whacked Marc Longbottom playfully on his shoulder.

"Hitting on pretty girls again, are you?"

"What are you thinking of me, Weasley?" Longbottom answered in mock-surprise. "Why, I would never do such an undignified thing like that. I just welcomed this lady in our common room."

Hermione had stopped listening as she had heard the other boy's name.

"Weasley? A relative of Ron!" Hermione stared at the redhead. She could see the family likeness. He had the same sparkling brown eyes, the same long adorable nose and his face was freckled all over. A lump formed in Hermione's throat. Luckily the two boys hadn't noticed her losing her composure.

"Let me introduce Hermione DeCerto to you," Marc Longbottom said, then he turned towards Hermione. "And this rude bloke here-" He gestured to the Ron-look-a-like. "-is Richard Weasley."

At that Richard Weasley bowed to Hermione, took her hand and kissed it. "My lady," he said, grinning. "What stroke of luck brought you in our humble common room?"

Hermione couldn't help but blush. He looked so like Ron it was unnerving.

"I'm a transfer student," she surprised herself at how steady her voice sounded. "I was sorted into Gryffindor."

"Ah, now our luck doesn't end there," Longbottom exclaimed happily.

"Really? A transfer?" Weasley asked amazedly "Never had one of those, had we? Which year are you attending?"

"Sixth," Hermione answered.

"And it gets better and better." Longbottom smiled at her. "We are sixth years, too."
"Ah, but where's you uniform, Hermione?" Weasley asked and added with a grin. "Not that I don't like what you are wearing right now."

"Um! Yes, that's why I'm here. Prof Dumbledore told me the uniform is in my dorm. I need to change before dinner."

Hermione was still a little bit distracted by his resemblance to Ron.

"Of course! Wait, I'll get you a guide," Marc Longbottom turned towards a group of girls.

They were sitting on a couch right under one of the huge windows.

"Hey, Diana!" he called.

One girl of the group, she had jet black, long hair looked with raised eyebrows in their direction.

"What do you want? I'm busy," she returned.

And sure enough the group of girls were hanging over what seemed to be a fashion magazine.

"Could you show Hermione here to the sixth years dorms? She's new," Longbottom asked her.

The black haired girl, Diana, and a few others of the group glanced with prying eyes at Hermione than Diana got up and walked over.

"You're a new student?" Diana asked Hermione but before she could answer Diana continued.

"Okay, follow me! I'll show you our dormitory. I'm sixth year too."

She assessed Hermione with a glance then turned and walked towards the stairs to the dorms. Hermione, with no other option left, followed her.

"If there's no room for you, you can always stay in our dorm, you know," Weasley called after her grinning until Longbottom whacked him over the head.

Hermione followed Diana to the dorm. She actually didn't need Diana to lead the way after having lived there for a year. But Hermione mustn't expose her time travelling experience. So she had to play her role as the new girl who never had set foot in Hogwarts before.

Hermione entered the dormitory right after Diana. The dorm hadn't changed very much, just like the common room. The biggest difference was surprisingly that this room was tidy. Not that her dorm in the future had been a dump. But here in this dorm there seemed to be nothing out of place. No clothes on the floor, no books scattered over a bedside table, all the beds were made with no fold out of place. Hermione wasn't a sloppy person herself but this was a little bit frightening actually.

"Who's that, Diana?" A girl with dirty blonde, long hair asked.

She was sitting on her bed writing in what seemed to be a diary. At least Hermione guessed from the pink fluffy cover of the book. The bedcovers on which the girl sat were disturbingly pink too.

"She's a transfer," Diana answered brusquely.

"Oh, really. What's your name?" a cold voice asked.

Hermione turned in the direction and saw a girl who stepped out of the bathroom. She had a pale even skin and short brown hair styled in the forties fashion. She was beautiful Hermione had to admit.
"I'm Hermione DeCerto," Hermione answered.

"My name is Viola Brown," the girl answered in the same cold conceited voice. "That pink freak is Lucia Reeves and Diana Potter you've already met"

Hermione was surprised to hear that her guide wore Harry's family name. First Ron and then Harry. She didn't know how she was supposed to react to that. Harry and Ron had been the closest persons to her. Here she met their ancestors and was supposed to act like they were strangers.

"And that last bed belongs to Rose Smith, another sixth year but she's not really anyone worth knowing," Brown added in a smug voice.

"Viola!" Diana chided though Brown didn't seem to care.

Hermione wondered briefly if that Brown girl was somehow related to Lavender Brown. She seemed to be rather mean. Hermione hadn't exactly liked Lavender either especially after she had had that thing with Ron but Lavender had been an angle compared to this girl.

"Right," said Hermione "I really need to change into my uniform now."

She didn't want to small talk with those girls anymore.

"Of course. You can take this bed," Diana pointed to a bed at the end of the row. "I believe your trunk is already there."

"Thank you."

Hermione walked over to her bed and sat down. She was tired. It had been a long day and it was far from over. She still had to go down to dinner. And if she had Dippet's character down correctly he planned to introduce her to the rest of the school with one of is pompous speeches. Hermione sighed. Her gaze then fell on her uniform which lay neatly folded at the head of her bed. She picked it up. The uniform consisted of a white blouse, a forties style grey skirt, which made Hermione sigh, and the familiar black outer robes. Hermione found the red and golden Gryffindor seal on the black robes. The black robes looked almost exactly like the ones from her time period. Those robes were connected with so many happy memories. She had worn them during her years at Hogwarts. The world had seemed so much brighter back then and she had still been that carefree innocent Hermione. Now though, there wasn't much left from that time. Her family was gone, her friends were gone and even her innocence was lost. Hermione fought back the tears that built up inside of her. She took the uniform and walked to the bathroom. She didn't want to change in the dorm as her body was still bruised all over. The other girls weren't supposed to see that. They would surely inquire how she had come to get those injuries.

'Those cuts? I got them while fighting the Dark Lord's followers. Don't worry though, I killed them all.' Hermione almost snorted. Now, that would make a fine topic for small talk.

It was a quarter to six as Hermione walked down to the Great Hall accompanied by her new dorm mates. Her dorm mates were occupied with a pointless chatter about who had a crush on whom and what colour best to use for eyeliner. Hermione thought it was rather irritating. She had finally met the last resident of her dorm, Rose Smith, a plump small girl. And though Hermione didn't like Brown she had been right; Rose Smith was annoying. She was endlessly talking about one of the Ravenclaw boys who apparently was beauty divine. The only other beside herself who didn't contribute to the pointless conversation was Diana Potter. She was the only person in her dorm that seemed to be half-decent though a little bit rude. Hermione liked her but that might have been caused by her relation to Harry.

Dumbledore greeted her in front of the entrance of the Great Hall.

"Ms DeCerto, I hope you've made yourself comfortable in your new home?" he smiled serenely at her.

"Yes, professor, thank you," Hermione was glad to see the old man.

"If you could accompany me. I think Professor Dippet wants to introduce you to the school," Dumbledore explained.

Before she could stop herself Hermione sighed loudly. She could hear the girls giggling behind her.

Dumbledore chuckled. "I thought you would like it."

He then led her to a side entrance to the Great Hall. It was situated right beside the teachers table in the Great Hall. Hermione could see that in the mean time all students had settled at their house tables. In the far corner was the Gryffindor table. It seemed to be the loudest of all. Then there were Huffelpuffs, some of them laughing good naturedly, beside them were the Ravenclaws. Hermione wasn't surprised to see some of them reading books. She, not for the first time, wondered why she hadn't been sorted into Ravenclaw. The last table belonged to Slytherin house. Hermione tried to get a better view of that particular table. She was scared but at the same time wanted to see the young Lord Voldemort. But from her point of view she couldn't detect him.

"Now, before we begin our dinner. I have to make an announcement."

Hermione heard Dippet's booming voice and started to get nervous. She really didn't like to be the centre of attention.

"From today on we will have a new student. She will be attending sixth year."

He beckoned Hermione towards him. As she walked to Dippet she heard the whispers which had started upon his proclamation. All the eyes in the hall were now staring at her and she felt uneasy. As Hermione arrived beside Dippet he took one arm around her shoulder and said,

"Welcome Hermione DeCerto. Ms DeCerto is from France. But unfortunate circumstances caused her to leave her home. That is the reason for her to finish her final years of education here with us at Hogwarts. She already was sorted into Gryffindor house. I hope you all give her a warm welcome and treat her well."

Dippet again shook her hand and with the same motion shoved her towards the Gryffindor table.

Obviously Dippet was finished with his introduction for which Hermione was thankful. She walked over to the Gryffindor table which had started to clap for her. Hermione felt happy at that gesture though the self-consciousness remained. The hall was still full of whispers and stares. She just wished she had Harry's invisibility cloak. She saw Longbottom and Weasley waving at her enthusiastically. She smiled and walked over to them where she slid onto the bench, relieved. That was the moment as the food appeared on the tables. She hoped that would distract all those people from gaping at her. Honestly, she couldn't be that interesting now, could she?

"Hey, Hermione. Nice to see you again," Longbottom beamed at her. He was sitting on her right side.

"How do you like Hogwarts so far?" asked Weasley.
His hair was still windswept and rather looked like Harry's untameable hair. Hermione had to chuckle at that thought. Richard Weasley looked like a cross between Ron and Harry. Rather disturbing that.

"Well, I haven't seen much. But I think I like it."

Hermione smiled at him and started to load her plate. She was quite hungry now as she hadn't had the time to grab something for lunch back at Diagon Alley.

"If you need a guide I would be more than pleased to show you around," Longbottom grinned at her.

"Hey, Longbottom," Weasley complained to his friend. "You can't go and have Hermione all for yourself. And I'm sure she prefers nice guys." He tapped his chest with one hand.

"Maybe," Longbottom retorted still grinning. "I'm sure to tell her if I see one then."

"You now, next Quidditch match I might hurl a Bludger at your head," Weasley said swinging a chicken wing threateningly at Longbottom.

"Aren't you in the same team?" Hermione asked bemusedly.

Both boys stared at her in mock-surprise.

"No, really? Did you know that?" Longbottom turned to his red haired friend, still maintaining a shocked voice though the corner of his lips were twitching upwards.

"I had honestly no idea. Maybe that's the reason we nearly lost last time?" Weasley was looking equally shocked at Longbottom.

"Don't pay too much attention to them. They are insufferable jerks."

Hermione looked at the boy who spoke. He sat across from them. He seemed somehow familiar to Hermione but she couldn't put her finger on it.

"Lupin, don't tell lies about us. She's new she doesn't know that you are the insufferable jerk," Longbottom took a chicken wing and threw it at the other boy who caught it and ate it nonchalantly.

"And they are thick, too," the other boy stage-whispered to Hermione.

"Wow, you really should consider to play Quidditch yourself, Lupin. You would be the perfect Seeker. With your reflexes. I've always told you," Weasley tried to convince the other boy.

"No, definitely not," Lupin laughed. "I'm rubbish on a broom."

"That's Amarys Lupin by the way," Longbottom informed Hermione. "He's in sixth too. And a nice bloke if you ignore his anti-Quidditch attitude."

"Well, it is damn dangerous. You broke your arm last game if I remember correctly," Lupin threw into the conversation. "Anyway, nice to meet you Hermione."

Hermione smiled at him. He had dark blonde hair and a friendly face. There definitely was a resemblance to Remus Lupin. Though hopefully not in his werewolf nature.

They introduced her then to the other sixth year students and a few of the other years. But there were so many she couldn't get all their names. Though now she felt uncomfortable again, being the centre of attention. They all were very inquisitive about how she had ended up at Hogwarts and bombarded her with questions like,

"Were in France did you live, Hermione?"

"Did you have to flee from there because of the war?"

"What about your family?"

or even,

"Are you muggleborn or pureblood?"

"Do you have a boyfriend?"

That last question came from a grinning Marc Longbottom. Hermione tried to answer their questions without giving away too much. She had decided on her cover story before she had come to Hogwarts. She was a girl from a pureblood family. Hermione had grudgingly decided to conceal her Muggleborn heritage. She knew that during Grindelwald's time Muggleborns were looked down upon by many purebloods. She didn't need that additional attention. She had furthermore lived with her family in a small village in the north of France. That was exactly where Grindelwald was most active at the moment. And after his latest attacks she had had to leave the country. That was how she ended up at Hogwarts.

This story seemed to satisfy the curiosity of her fellow Gryffindors. And Hermione could spend the rest of dinner talking and laughing with Longbottom, Weasley and Lupin fairly undisturbed. They were really nice. A little bit crazy but otherwise nice. After a while Diana Potter switched into their conversation. And they started to discuss whether it was safer to ride a broom or try to tame a dragon and ride it instead.

Later, Hermione lay in her bed and reminisced the day. It had been a strange feeling being back at the castle. But it wasn't the same, she decided, without Harry and Ron. The castle looked the same but something had changed. The people, the atmosphere everything was different.

Or maybe, Hermione thought bitterly. it's me who has changed.

She rolled over to her side. It was one in the morning. But she couldn't get to sleep.

The other students had been nice enough. She liked Weasley and Longbottom already. And Lupin seemed to be a little bit quieter than his two friends but he was likeable too. The girls were another story though, Hermione thought. The only things they seemed to worry about were their next day's outfit. Well, save Diana maybe. But Hermione wasn't worried about that. She had always seemed to get better along with boys. She had shared a dorm back at her Hogwarts for six years with the girls but they had never gotten really close. Well, she wasn't here to get friends anyway. They were all so carefree, so innocent. Their worst problems were the NEWTs next year. Hermione felt detached from them. She was nothing like them. The problem was, that at one point in time she had been just like them. And she knew there was no way back to that. But she longed to get that innocence back.

Don't be stupid. She scolded herself. What's lost is lost. No use crying over spilt milk.

She had a purpose here. The only reason she had gotten back here was the information the castle held and the Elder Wand that Dumbledore had or would have after taking it from Grindelwald. She needed to maintain a low profile, fly under the radar so to speak.

No changing the past. That would be fatal.
She thought about dinner. How she hadn't dared to look in the direction of Slytherin table. She knew he had been there, Lord Voldemort. She was scared to meet him or even look at him. Everything was so damn complicated. She rolled over on her other side. She wanted Ron now. A tear trickled down her cheek.

Not now, Hermione. That's not going to bring him back.

She was standing on a battlefield. There were curses flying everywhere. She had to duck sometimes to avoid a spell. The Death Eaters had attacked the Order of the Phoenix itself. Voldemort was becoming bolder and bolder. He knew without Dumbledore they were weakened. Hermione could see a red robe, an auror. He was duelling a Death Eater right now. They were throwing spells at each other so fast Hermione couldn't follow with her eyes. But she wasn't here to watch the fighting, she needed to find Harry. He was somewhere here. She could only hope he was alright. She crawled away from the duel. As she moved forwards she came upon a body. Her blood ran cold. It was Remus Lupin. She closed her eyes at the view. But the picture of his mutilated body was burned in her mind now. Half his head had been blown away. There was blood everywhere. His legs were ripped off. Hermione choked as she crawled away. Leaving behind the mangled body of her former teacher and a piece of herself…

Tom Riddle got up early, like every day and left the Slytherin dungeon perfectly dressed, like every day. Not one strand of his thick dark hair was out of place. He really liked that air of perfection that was swirling around him. Because that was what he was: perfect.

He strode to the Great Hall with graceful steps. When he arrived he went over to his place at the Slytherin table. Yes, it was his place. No one ever dared to sit down on this particular spot because they all knew whom it belonged to. There were a few Slytherins sitting at the table and greeting him with reverence. Riddle ignored them and sat down. He poured himself a cup of coffee and reached for a Daily Prophet not caring whom it belonged to. He was scanning the newspaper bored and sipped at his coffee when he saw her scuffle into the hall, the new girl. An early riser in Gryffindor that was something unheard of, he thought, the corners of his mouth forming a smirk. He watched as she sat down at Gryffindor table.

Whatever happened to her hair? He wondered in disgust. Are birds nesting in it or what?

And now she was loading her plate like there was no tomorrow. Maybe she planned to stuff her face again like she did yesterday. Really, had that girl no dignity? And sure enough she started to shovel the food in her mouth. Why did she even bother using the fork? Riddle put down his cup of coffee and continued to stare at her. She was not very tall and had a slender figure, almost scrawny actually. A miracle with her eating habits. Her face was nothing remarkable. Though she could have been rather pretty if she'd put any effort in her appearance.

Then she suddenly stopped eating and looked around the hall. What was she searching for now? Her gaze fell on his table and then she locked eyes with him. He was mildly surprised, had she somehow sensed him looking at her? He leaned back in his chair elegantly not breaking their eye contact. She was still looking at him with this oddly blank face. Well, of course she couldn't take her eyes off him, he thought smugly, he was the best looking guy in Hogwarts. No girl could resist him.

He put on his most attractive smile. Seducing someone like her was almost too easy. And really he should know. He had done that to so many of them there was no challenge in it anymore. And this stupid girl was no exception, he thought while he continued to smile at her. Now she looked surprised, her eyebrows high and her eyes wide open. He almost snorted, so predictable. Next she would blush or start giggling stupidly.

But she did no such thing. She scowled at him. Actually scowled. At him. Who did that bitch think she was? Now she got up from her table and left the hall hurriedly, still that disgusted look on her face.

What was wrong with that girl? How dare she look at him like that? He felt anger creeping up in him. After a while of pondering the new girl he felt more than saw someone taking a seat beside him.

"Riddle," he heard a smooth voice greeting him.

"Lestrange," he acknowledged the boy in a cold voice.

"We were wondering when the next meeting would be taking place," Lestrange asked warily.

Riddle really wasn't in the mood to deal with this idiot right now.

"Next Saturday," he said brusquely.

"Ah, but that's a Hogsmead weekend," Lestrange whined.
Riddle turned around to him looking at him for the first time.

"If you have better things to do, Lestrange, I won't force you to come," his voice now deathly cold.

Lestrange flinched away from him with a fearful expression, Riddle noticed pleased.

"No, no, of course not. I...I'll come," he stuttered not looking Riddle in the eyes.

Riddle got up, pleased at how Lestrange cowered before him. But he had to attend a class now and he didn't want to be late because of this idiot. He left the Great Hall and stalked confidently to the charms classroom.

Hermione was lost. She had been walking, still disturbed by Riddle's twisted behaviour in the Great Hall, to her charms classroom. Only to find that in this time period the room was obviously not the charms classroom. It housed now the second years' History of Magic class. She had been searching endlessly in the vicinity for the right room but hadn't found anything. Well, beside that broom cupboard which was so crammed with old brooms, buckets and other stuff that everything had fallen on her head as she had opened the door. She was now late for her first class even though she had been one of the first to rise. So much to the advantage of her knowing the place. Swearing loudly she marched down a corridor.

"That is no way for a young lady to talk!" a strict voice reprimanded her.

Hermione turned around and saw a teacher she didn't know walking towards her.

"Five points from-" The teacher eyed Hermione's robes. "-Gryffindor."

Hermione was annoyed now. She was already late without this stupid woman criticizing her. But she answered politely,

"I'm sorry, professor. I seem to be lost. I'm new you see."

"Well, that is no reason to revert to language like this," the woman answered.

Hermione estimated her age at about forty. She was tall, thin, with black hair and a pointed nose. Her face looked kind of sharp and unappealing.

It turned out that the woman, Austeria Legifer, was the teacher of Household Charms and Spells. Hermione'd never heard about that particular class but she obviously would be attending as the teacher informed her.

"Whatever!" she thought exasperatedly.

After nagging at Hermione for another five minutes. 'What happened to your hair?', 'Your uniform is crinkly!' and 'Is that your schoolbag or a filthy, old sack?" She finally revealed the way to Hermione's charms classroom.

Thank you very much, Hermione thought sarcastically. Now I'm really late.

Hermione had hastened to her Charms class and was now standing before the door. She knocked hesitantly at the door then opened it and entered her very first forty style lesson.

"Yes, dear? How can I help you?" the teacher, an elderly lady, asked her friendly.
"Um…Sorry to disturb your class, professor. I'm Hermione DeCerto. I got a little bit lost on my way here."

"Ah, of course. Ms DeCerto. I've been wondering where you were," the old lady beamed at her kindly. "I am Professor Merrythought. Please sit down, Ms DeCerto. And don't worry about being late it happens to the best of us"

"Thank you, professor."

Hermione looked around the room. It was a Gryffindor and Slytherin class she noticed. In the back row she could see Weasley and Longbottom waving at her. She smiled at them. Unfortunately there was no room there for her. She searched again for a free space and realized with horror that the only free spot in the entire classroom was next to Tom Riddle. He was sitting on a place at the window smiling arrogantly at her. Seeing no other option she walked over to him. She chucked her bag at the floor beside the table and slumped into the chair beside Riddle. That day was getting better and better. She took her charms book and some parchment and quill out of her bag and tried to ignore the fearsome Dark Lord sitting beside her.

Professor Merrythought had in the mean time resumed her lesson and was now talking about the Procella charm. Hermione knew everything about that charm already. By using it one could create everything from a light breeze to a full blown tornado. Not really useful in duels though. It needed a lot of time to create something half way harmful and much magic to maintain the charm until it could strike your adversary. But the professor wasn't talking about combat situations, Hermione noticed. She recommended the charm for hot summer days.

\textit{Well, of course that could work, too}, Hermione thought and shrugged.

She risked a glance at Riddle. He was gracefully sitting in his chair and took notes with his elegant neat handwriting. He seemed to be most attentive to the professor.

\textit{Yeah, as if,} Hermione rolled her eyes. \textit{Probably plans how to take down the world. Or whatever it is dark, evil people like him usually think about.}

His dark hair was now falling lightly in his eyes. Hermione was surprised to see his eyes were a beautiful shade of grey. She had half expected them to be the familiar ruby red. His nose was straight and rounded at the end, his jaw strong. The colour of his skin was very pale but not sickly so, it even seemed to enhance his beauty. And Hermione had to admit it, he was positively dashing. If she didn't know that he was a homicidal psychopath she might have called him handsome.

\textit{Maybe the most handsome guy I have ever seen?} Hermione was disgusted at her own train of thought. \textit{Yeah, so he is handsome. What does that matter?}

Hermione saw the corners of his lips were beginning to form a smirk. He put down his quill and looked up at her one eyebrow ached gracefully. Oh Merlin, he had noticed her studying his face judging from the smug smile he now wore. He had locked eyes with her and was staring at her expectantly. His eyes were really the most unusual colour Hermione had ever seen. They were an impossible light shade of grey. They even sparkled in the light coming from the window. His smile had now become inviting, no trace of a smirk left. Just an honest smile.

But that was fake, wasn't it? In reality he was nowhere near the nice persona he was acting. Hermione had seen how he truly was. Cold, merciless, calculating, in short: evil.

She looked away from him. Never returning his smile. She didn't want anything to do with him.
What had she thought back at Diagon Alley? That she could simply avoid him? And now at her very first day she was sitting right beside him. It was frightening actually.

For the rest of the lesson she didn't look his way again. And as the lesson was over she stuffed her things hurriedly in her bag and was about to leave when a smooth melodious voice called her,

"Wait."

She turned around and saw Riddle following her. He was rather tall, Hermione noticed. Maybe a head or more taller than herself. What did he want now?

"Yes?"

"I believe we haven't met before. My name is Tom Riddle."

He extended a hand smartly at her, his charming smile back in place. Hermione hesitated again but she couldn't see a way around it so she took his hand. It was warm and pleasant.

"I'm Hermione DeCerto," she answered shortly.

"Yes, I know. The headmaster announced it yesterday. So how do you like it at Hogwarts?"

_I would like it far more if you weren't here._

"Oh, it's quite nice."

Tom Riddle was sitting in his charms classroom. He had taken his usual seat right beneath the window. Merrythought was droning about one spell or other when there was a knock on the door. Riddle looked up from his notes and saw the new girl entering the classroom. Nearly ten minutes too late, he checked his watch. She had left the Great Hall way before him. How did she manage to be this late? And her hair was still in this fearsome mess. Even more so if that was physically even possible.

She was now looking for an empty seat. Well, the only one left was right beside him. When she noticed that, she had again this look on her face. The look she had shown in the Great Hall too. Like she was disgusted by him. He really didn't like that look. It actually made him quite angry. But he mustn't let that show. So he tried to ignore her as she walked over to him and sat down beside him ungracefully.

Merrythought resumed her lesson. She was now talking about the Procella charm. He groaned inwardly. Could this lesson get any more boring? The Procella charm was just one thing: useless. He took notes anyway, writing down everything the professor said. He had to hold up his reputation after all. And Merrythought was very fond of him. Well, all the teachers were. Who could resist his charm?

After a while of scribbling down the professor's superfluous explanations he noticed the new girl wasn't taking any notes. So he risked a look from the corner of his eyes. And of course, she was staring at him, taking in his features. It was about time she noticed how absolutely gorgeous he looked. Well, that girl seemed to be rather dull, didn't she? Now she sat so closely beside him even she was bound to notice. He knew she would fall for him like all the other stupid little girls. They just couldn't help it, poor things.

He looked up at her. His face carefully arranged in a charming smile. He really didn't know why he was doing this. The girl was obviously way beneath him. But that incident in the Great Hall this morning had really annoyed him and had somehow awakened his spirit of the challenge. So he was going to make her fall for him and then ignore her for the rest of the time.

She looked flustered now as he had caught her staring at him. He had to really work to prevent his 'genuine' smile from transforming into a smirk.

But then she did it again. She sat there with a blank face, no blush no giggling. He could even see the contempt in her eyes. And then she just looked away from him. He was taken aback. That girl was really beginning to get on his nerves. He resumed taking his notes but couldn't concentrate on the lesson anymore. He glanced at her again but she seemed to ignore him. How dare she ignore him?

For the rest of the lesson he tried to get his temper back in control. At the end of the lesson he really wanted to just crucio her. As if she had heard his last thought she now tried to get away from him as fast as possible.

"Wait," he tried to stop her.

"Yes?" she asked impatiently as if he was bothering her.

"I believe we haven't met before. My name is Tom Riddle." His perfect mask was back in place. Time to play the gentleman.

She shook his hand hesitatingly, Riddle noticed annoyed.

"I'm Hermione DeCerto," she answered shortly.

"Yes, I know. The headmaster announced it yesterday. So how do you like it at Hogwarts?"

As if I'm really interested, you insolent bitch.

"Oh, it's quite nice," she answered distractedly while looking at something over his shoulder.

Then she waved at someone, at that Weasley and Longbottom arrived by her side.

"Hey, Hermione," the Weasley idiot said. "Oh hey, Riddle."

How he despised the whole lot of them. But he fought a smile on his face, after all he was a respectable prefect and good friends with everyone.

"Hello, Weasley, Longbottom."

"Hello," Longbottom forced out. Riddle knew that the git didn't like him.

"Well, if you excuse us, Riddle," DeCerto said. "There's a History lesson we have to catch. And I don't want to be late again."

With that the three took off and left him behind. After they had left the classroom he was the only one left. His smile transformed into an angry scowl. That girl was really starting to infuriate him. She had left him standing here like an idiot. She needed to be put in her place. He wasn't going to tolerate her insulting behaviour.

Had Hermione known his dark thoughts she would have been frightened. She was currently sitting at the Gryffindor table having a nice lunch. The History of Magic class had been incredible boring. The only interesting thing that happened had been as the professor entered the class. It was Professor Binns, but not the ghostly form of him that she knew from her time period. No, he was very alive and human. Hermione had been surprised to see him like that as she was so used to him being semi-transparent. Sadly, that remained to be the only difference between this Binns and the ghost Binns. His class had been insufferable. And even doubly so as Hermione had heard it one time before. So she had been glad when it was over and she could go to the Great Hall to have lunch. She sat again with Longbottom, Weasley and Lupin. They really started to grow on her. Well, they had saved her from Riddle after the Charms lesson.

"Really, DeCerto. How can you load your plate so much?" Viola Brown was sitting at her other side and stared disgustedly at Hermione's plate.

"Well, I'm hungry," Hermione shrugged.

"You'll get fat," Lucia Reeves piped up with a look on her face like that was a fate worse than death.

Hermione had been living on the run for the last two years. And that included not having a steady supply of food. Sometimes they had to go on for days without food. So now this three meals a day felt like luxury to her.

"Hey, let the girl eat if she wants," Weasley threw in.

At that moment Hermione saw Riddle entering the Great Hall. He was accompanied by a group of Slytherins. He strut confidently towards the Slytherin table, the other boys following him reverently.

"Oh, look, it's Riddle!" Rose Smith said with a glassy look in her eyes.

"Yeah, doesn't he look just hot?" Lucia had now the same glassy look.

"Oh, please!" Longbottom said indignantly, "That evil git!"

"Evil?" Hermione asked innocently.

"Yes, he's an arrogant bastard!" Longbottom narrowed his eyes at Riddle.

"Aw, come on, Marc. He's not that bad, you know." Weasley looked at his friend exasperated.

"You only say that because he helped you with that herbology essay," Longbottom countered.

"Is he really that bad?" Hermione now wanted to know what they thought about the evil Dark Lord-in-training.

"Yes! He is one conceited little creep!" Longbottom said with conviction.

"Don't listen to him, DeCerto," Rose said. "He's just jealous."

Longbottom huffed at that.

"Yeah, Riddle's really nice," Lucia threw in. "He's a prefect and top of every class. And of course he looks gorgeous. He's really popular too. There's even a Riddle fan club. Want to join, DeCerto?"

"Um… no! I think I pass."

"Finally, a girl with some sense!" Longbottom exclaimed.
Hermione looked back at Riddle. He sat now at the Slytherin table and was talking with the boy beside him.

No, not talking. Hermione thought, ordering him, sounds more like it. Longbottom's right, he is an evil bastard.

Author's note: What do you think about the story so far? Like it? Hate it? Please review, so I know!

And finally Tom had his appearance. What do you think of him? I'm trying to stay close to his character in the books. But honestly we don't know very much about his school days. Thankfully that's leaving me a lot of room to describe him.

Hermione didn't seem to be very enthusiastic with meeting him, did she? Well, it's not going to be a 'Love at first sight' story. I thought that would not be very plausible. After all Hermione has just lost her boyfriend and somehow it was Tom's fault, too.
It was Friday and Hermione walked down a corridor to her next class. The week had flown by as she had arrived Monday evening and had therefore missed the Monday classes. It was easy getting used to the old routine at school. Hermione had missed it very much after having left after her sixth year. But there still was this odd detachment she felt. Like she didn't belong here. And not as in 'here in the forties'. She didn't belong to this school anymore. She wasn't one of them. She had seen too much. There had been a time where lessons, tests and homework were very important things to her. She had had to excel in every class. Oh, the hours she had spent studying in the library, Hermione remembered with a smile. But now, that was just a distant memory to her. She had learned that there were more important things than getting an O in every subject.

She reached her classroom. The professor hadn't arrived yet, she noticed. The students were still crowding the hallway. It was going to be her very first Household Charms and Spells class. She wasn't exactly looking forward to it as she didn't like the teacher, Professor Legifer. That woman had really annoyed her with her nagging. And she was the reason Hermione had been late for charms at her first day and consecutively had to sit beside Riddle.

"Hello, Hermione, over here," someone yelled at her.

Hermione turned and saw Lucia waving at her. Next to her stood Diana, Rose and Viola. All her dorm mates being assembled, oh joy!

"Hey," Hermione walked to them, and noticed that this class consisted of students of all the four houses.

That was unusual. And there were only girls. Hermione had a sinking feeling as to why there were only girls but she had to ask anyway.

"Where are all the boys?"

They looked at her like she had grown an extra head.

"Why would there be boys here? It's Households, Hermione, Lucia looked at her bewildered.

"Don't tell me you don't learn Household charms in France," Viola said in her self-important voice. Sure, the forties, Hermione thought, and there fly women's rights out of the window.

"Um... not really. No," Hermione said just to spite them.

"And that is where your problem lies, Ms DeCerto," a sharp voice behind Hermione declared.

Hermione closed her eyes and tried to get her temper back under control. It didn't work. So she turned around anyway and there stood Professor Legifer. She was still tall with black hair teased in an indestructible-looking hairstyle. There was not one hair out of place. How the woman did that Hermione could only guess. Her clothes were equally impeccable. Her outer robes black and squeaky-clean. Underneath she wore a white blouse and a long grey skirt. Everything was perfect nothing out of place.

"Now, in, ladies." Professor Legifer had opened the door.

The girls streamed in and took their seats without saying a word. Hermione followed her dorm mates and took a seat at their table. Unfortunately it stood in the front row.

"Who can tell me what we learned last lesson?" Professor Legifer asked instantly. "Ms Thomson, please."

A nervous looking Ravenclaw girl stood up and said in a rather squeaky voice, "We... We learned about the different cleaning methods."

"Correct. And what are the cleaning spells called, exactly?" Professor Legifer continued her inquisition, "Ms Yaxley?"

A Slytherin stood up, "Tersus cella and Extrico, for tidying up a room."

"That is correct. Now we continue with laundry spells," Professor Legifer started to pace up and down the classroom. "Ms DeCerto, what do you know about cleaning the laundry?"

"Ehm! I know the Scorgify spell, professor," Hermione had been surprised by being addressed.

"In my class you stand up when you are spoken to, Ms DeCerto. Five points from Gryffindor."

Hermione stood up, she was beginning to feel angry again. "I know the Scorgify spell, professor,"

"And that is all you know about laundering?" Professor Legifer was standing now right before Hermione.

She looked at Hermione's hair and clothes and seemed to be personally offended at what she saw. Hermione nearly rolled her eyes.

"And how do you fold the laundry after cleaning it? How do you remove stains that can't be removed by a simple Scorgify?"

"I don't know?" Hermione answered cheekily, though she did know. The muggle way, aka washing machine. Did they have washing machines in the forties? She didn't know.

"Another five points from Gryffindor, Ms DeCerto. And given the state of your clothes you would do well to pay attention to this lesson."

Professor Legifer walked away from Hermione's table and began to lecture about her oh so important laundry spells. Hermione slumped down in her chair. That lesson was a farce, she decided.

"... want you all to practice this spell. Take one of those robes here." Professor Legifer hold up a box filled with different robes. "And try your very best."

Hermione had drowned her out for the last fifteen minutes so she didn't know what spell they were practicing right now.

"Ah, Ms DeCerto, there will be no need for you to take one of those." The professor gestured at the robes with an evil grin. "You can train with your own robes. They seem to be dirty enough."

Hermione narrowed her eyes at her but said nothing. When the box arrived at her she took one of the robes it was rather muddy.

"So what are we supposed to do?" she whispered to Rose who sat next to her.

"You have to wave your wand like this." She made a few swishes with her wand. "And Okay, seemed easy enough, Hermione thought. She flicked her wrist and her wand landed in her hand.

"What in Merlin's name is that, Ms DeCerto?" Professor Legifer was standing behind Hermione.

Hermione was bewildered. What had she done now? She looked at the professor blankly. While the whole class looked at Hermione.

"Show me your arm!"

For a short moment Hermione thought she was talking about her left arm which was still rather bruised after her time travel crash. But the professor took her right arm and rolled up the sleeve of her robe, exposing her wand holster.

"Aha!" the professor said as if she had just found the Dark Mark on Hermione's forearm and not a harmless wand holster.

Hermione frowned at her, "So what?"

"A girl does not use such a thing, Ms DeCerto. That's indecent," she screeched.

"Well, it's dead useful. How am I supposed to duel without it?" Hermione shook her head at that woman's naivety.

"D…d…Duel?" the professor looked scandalized. "Ms DeCerto, you are incorrigible. A hopeless case. I really do not envy your future husband."

With that she let go of Hermione's arm and stalked away. Hermione stared after her unbelieving. My future husband? her left eye began to twitch.

"Wow, Hermione. That was so brave of you. Standing up to the old dragon like that," Rose said.

They were walking to their next class, Transfiguration. Hermione was still irritated by her previous lesson. When she had arrived back at the forties she hadn't thought about the old-fashioned role of women she would be confronted with.

"Pffh! That woman, who does she think she is? Talking about 'my future husband'? My ass!" Well, Hermione was still annoyed.

"You should be cautious, Hermione," Diana said evenly. "I mean you will need those spells later. Who would marry a girl that can't even do the simplest of household spells?"

Hermione was taken aback because this comment was coming from Diana. She had seemed, so far, to be the only one sane of the whole lot.

"Well, I don't have to know those wretched spells," Viola said conceitedly.

"And why's that?" Lucia asked.

"Because my husband will be a pureblood. He will be rich and the house elfs are going to do the all the work. That's why."
At this point of the conversation Hermione decided to drop out. She couldn't bear to hear more of that nonsense. She could just hope that at her next lesson in Household Charms and Spells she wouldn't lose her temper and kill the woman. How would Ron or Harry act if they could see her now? Ron would probably laugh at her and say: 'Better you than me, Mione!' And Harry? With his saving people thing, he would burst into her next lesson and drag her out. Hermione smiled sadly as she thought about her lost friends.

They arrived at the Transfiguration classroom. As she entered the classroom she at once saw Longbottom, Weasley and Lupin sitting in the front row. There was one free seat so she joined them. Everything to get away from those talkative girls.

"Hey, Hermione," Longbottom greeted her, smiling. "How's it going?"

"Oh, just fantastic!" she grumbled sarcastically.

"What happened?" Lupin asked.

"Professor Legifer," was the only answer he got.

She heard someone chuckle at that and turned around in her seat and groaned. Right behind her sat Tom Riddle. That just made her day! Transfiguration was a Gryffindor-Slytherin class? She hadn't noticed while entering. It was the first one since Charms. And of course, he had to sit right behind her. How reassuring, having the Dark Lord sitting behind your back.

He sat in his seat nonchalantly and flashed her one of his charming grins. He looked just as attractive as ever, Hermione noted.

"And what are you laughing about?" Hermione said rather unfriendly.

She did think dimly that it may not be the best idea to talk to Tom Riddle like that but at the moment she just didn't care. His friendly and even flirtatious manner had gotten to her nerves since their Charms class. No, since he had tried to woo her in the Great Hall. He had smiled at her and tried to befriend her. He. The man who was going to kill all the people that meant the world to her.

At her response Riddle's smile faltered a bit. He still maintained it, though his eyes seemed to change completely. Before, they were inviting and even friendly now they grew cold and hard. There was a murderous glare behind this smile of his. Hermione shuttered.

How dare she talk to him like this? Riddle was enraged. He felt that familiar cold anger taking hold of his mind. That girl, DeCerto, was going to pay.

"Oh, I'm sorry. I didn't mean to offend you," he said in his kindest voice and shot her a humble smile.

She seemed to buy it and turned around restarting her conversation with those three dorks. The classroom door opened and Dumbledore entered the room. Oh, how he despised the crazy old man. Even the magic Dumbledore radiated disturbed Riddle a great deal. It made him feel uncomfortable.

"Hello, class," Dumbledore beamed at them.

Well, he beamed at everyone but Riddle. The old fool reserved a glare just for him. Riddle looked back at him with a blank face.

"Today we are going to have a practical lesson."
At that announcement the class seemed to be so much more enthusiastic.

Idiots!

"But before you start with the wand work lets go over the theory first," Dumbledore said. "I want you to transform these Honduran Blacklizards into a chalice." As he said that he held up a box full of shining black rather big lizards.

"Now who can tell me where the problem by doing this might occur?"

The problem will be that those inapt jerks don't even know how to transfigure a match into a needle. I wonder whose fault that is though, Riddle successfully suppressed an evil grin while looking at Dumbledore. Of course, Riddle knew why it was difficult to transfigure the lizards. But he wasn't going to raise his hand. Transfiguration was the only lesson in which he made no effort. Really, what for? Dumbledore would ignore him. And Riddle didn't want to waste his time with trying to charm the man. It wouldn't work anyway. Dumbledore hated him and suspected him of doing all sorts of felonious things. Not that he was wrong, of course, but Riddle hated how the man could look right through him. The only thing that stopped him from throwing Riddle out of school and into Azkaban was that he had no real evidence of Riddle's crimes.

Not so smart after all, the old fool.

He was brought out of his musings when the girl sitting in front of him raised her hand.

"Yes, Ms DeCerto?" Dumbledore looked fondly at DeCerto.

Riddle began to dislike her even more. Anyone who Dumbledore was fond of was an obstacle.

"Sir, the difficulty with transfiguring Blacklizards is that they are magical beings," she answered speedily.

Pffh, so she knows what a Blacklizard is. Probably because there is a colony living in her filthy school bag.

"That is right, Ms DeCerto. And do you know why it is difficult to transfigure a magical being?" Dumbledore asked her.

"Sir, Wilson's first law of magical equilibrium states that it is not possible for a wizard to overcome any object, being or spell which is magically more powerful than the wizard himself.

Furthermore Jackson says in his publication: Transfiguration and the magical threshold value that before transforming a magical object or being it is necessary to subdue the magical energy of said object or being.

Taking into account Wilson's law, Jackson concludes that it is only possible to transfigure magical objects or beings that are of lesser magical energy than the caster himself."

After her statement the whole class stared at DeCerto. Riddle had to admit, that he was slightly impressed himself but he didn't stare by principle. Dumbledore though seemed not to be surprised by her knowledge and smiled at her contentedly.

"Very good, Ms DeCerto. Take ten points for Gryffindor."

Riddle felt his anger rising again. Ten points for knowing this basic stuff? If he had answered Dumbledore's question he would either not been awarded any points at all or he would have been thrown out of the classroom for speaking out of turn. His hate for Dumbledore overshadowed his dislike for DeCerto.

Maybe I should just curse the both of them.

"Ms DeCerto has been completely right." Hermione heard Dumbledore say. "That is why I have picked these Blacklizards. They are of magical origin thus form a higher resistance against transforming their shape."

Dumbledore began pacing in front of them.

Hermione was absorbed in his lecture. She had been looking very forward to having her old Headmaster teach her. He had been a great wizard. And his death two years ago had been a huge blow to her side. In fact his death had marked the true beginning of Voldemort's war against the Order and the Ministry. Without Dumbledore there had been no one to stop him anymore. The immediate time after Dumbeldore's death had been marred by disappearances and murders. No one had been safe anymore. Many people had joined Voldemort's side out of fear. And many more because they had been too afraid of Dumbledore before. To see him now alive and well was comforting to Hermione. She had never been close to him like Harry had but she had always known what a truly formidable wizard and man he had been.

"These lizards are in fact a highly powerful source of magic. Their shed skin is one of the most potent potion ingredient. It is known as Powder of Tegucigalpa. So, now everyone take a lizard and try your best." Dumbledore's eyes twinkled at them.

At that Dumbledore gave the box of lizards to Lucia who was sitting at a table in the front row. She reluctantly took the lizard box and eyed the black reptiles with disgust. She took one lizard out of the box and shrieked when it wriggled in her hand. Her table neighbours Rose and Viola were even more reluctant to touch the animals. Hermione rolled her eyes at their antics. After a short while the box reached her table. Weasley, Longbottom and Lupin seemed to have no problems with dealing with the reptiles. Hermione took one herself. They were rather beautiful lizards.

"You may begin now," Dumbledore said after he made sure everyone got one lizard.

Hermione observed the other students first. She wanted to know how good they performed. Obviously the task was difficult as no one had successfully transformed the lizard yet. Rose had only managed to enlarge her lizard so far which only added to the shrieks coming from their table. A Gryffindor boy, his name was Jorkins if Hermione remembered correctly, had managed to form a black cup. But he couldn't maintain its form longer than a few seconds.

"Watch it, Weasley!" she heard Lupin beside her grouch.

Weasley had somehow managed to enlarge his lizard's sharp teethed mouth and it was now trying to eat the other boy's lizard.

"How did you manage that?" Longbottom asked conversationally. His lizard still unaltered in his hand despite his many tries.

"I have no idea. Could have even invented a new spell here," Weasley added with a mischievous grin.

Hermione decided it was time to try herself before her lizard was eaten by its cannibalistic brother. She took her wand and concentrated her magic. Then flicked it and thought,
She could feel her magic reaching out to the lizard taking in his form. She then tried to influence its form. At first it felt like any other transformation but then she hit something like a barrier. It stopped her efforts. That had to be the inherent magic of the lizard. Hermione had to draw on her magic more to overcome the barrier. Just as she could feel the barrier give away there was something else. It was another alien magic and this time it wasn't coming from the lizard but rather from inside herself. At first it wasn't distinguishable from her own magic but now that she had to concentrate she could feel it. Interweaved with her own magic were strands of another kind of magic. Hermione tensed. That was not supposed to happen. She tried to free herself of that magic but it was useless it was too tightly wrapped together with her own magic. She tried to draw upon the alien magic but it was useless too. The more she concentrated on it the more it seemed to slip away from her. Hermione didn't know what was happening to her. Something was seriously wrong. She felt panicky now.

"Hermione? Are you all right? You look pale," Lupin asked her concerned.

"Pull yourself together. Now is not the time to lose your head. Hermione breathed in deeply and used her own magic to bowl over the lizard's defences. The lizard instantly changed its form and transformed into a silver chalice.

She looked up at Lupin and said, "I'm alright. Don't worry."

Lupin and Weasley and Longbottom along with him stared open mouthed at her chalice.

"Wow, wicked, Hermione. You made it," Longbottom reached for the chalice.

"Hey! Let me touch it too," Weasley snatched the cup away from him.

"How'd you do it?" Lupin eyed the vessel impressed.

Dumbledore had noticed the commotion and walked over to their table.

"Ms DeCerto! Excellent, excellent," he exclaimed as he took the cup from Weasley. "An expertly done transformation. 20 Points to Gryffindor."

Hermione blushed at Dumbledore's praise. It hadn't been that difficult. And if her magic hadn't been invaded she could have done it even sooner. Had really no one else managed the transformation? She then remembered Riddle sitting behind her. Surely he was capable of doing it? But Dumbledore was standing right before her he would see if Riddle had transformed his lizard. And then Slytherin would be awarded 20 points too.

She risked a glance back at Riddle. He was sitting at his table arms folded before his chest. His face was warped into a blank mask giving nothing away. But she could read his eyes. They were so intense. Hermione could swear there was a gleam of red in them as Riddle glared at Dumbledore. He looked ready to murder the other man.

Before him on his desk stood a beautiful, richly ornamented golden goblet.

Hermione looked back at Dumbledore in bewilderment. She didn't know him as one to be biased. But he obviously ignored Riddle's accomplishment. There was no way he couldn't see Riddle's golden goblet standing right in front of him. As long as Hermione had known the old man he never was prejudiced, even to a fault. But here he was ignoring the work of a Slytherin while praising a student of his own house. Or maybe that was a personal thing between Riddle and Dumbledore and had nothing to do with the houses? That may be the most likely explanation, Hermione mused. Harry had told her and Ron that Dumbledore never trusted Riddle. Even when they were student and teacher at Hogwarts. Dumbledore had always suspected Riddle to be behind the murder of Moaning Myrtle even though he couldn't prove it. When did that happen again? In Riddle's fifth year, Hermione remembered. So that was one years ago. Of course Dumbledore didn't want to award house points to a student he suspected to be a murderer. Hermione could hardly blame him.

While she had been thinking about his relationship with Riddle, Dumbledore had proceeded with his lesson. He was now lecturing about the problematic nature of magical entities and transfiguration. Hermione had to concentrate hard to follow his explanations as she was still pretty shocked about that foreign magic she had experienced. On top of that Dumbledore seemed to have the habit of talking about one thing and then springing abruptly to another and then back again. It was difficult to follow him. Hermione only managed because she already knew about the topic. But after the lesson it felt like she had learned more about the nature of transfiguration than she ever knew. Her parchment was scribbled full of notes. After the lesson she could see Riddle leaving the classroom as fast as possible. He still wore that look of barely controlled rage.

"Hermione, that was awesome!" Weasley said as they were walking back to the Gryffindor common room.

"Yeah, who would have thought! Not only are you a walking encyclopaedia, no, on top of that you know how to do the spells you're talking about," Longbottom added.

"Come on. It wasn't that great," Hermione felt uncomfortable with all the praise.

"Not great? You were the only one who managed to transform the lizard," Lupin said, then added. "Well aside from Riddle. But he doesn't count. He always manages every spell."

At that comment Longbottom rolled his eyes.

"I noticed," Hermione said innocently. "His goblet was even better than mine. But Dumbledore didn't give points to Slytherin. I wonder why…"

"I'm not sure why," Lupin said. "But Riddle and Dumbledore don't get along very well-"

"The understatement of the year," Longbottom grinned.

"He's normally on top of every class," Lupin continued as if he'd never been interrupted. "The only exception is Transfiguration. Riddle's not even trying there. Though I guess he is really good at Transfiguration. I'm surprised he tried today."

"Ah, why are you so interested in Tom Riddle, Hermione?" Lucia asked triumphantly. "Wanna join the Riddle Fan Club after all?"

Hermione didn't deem that worthy of an answer and just looked at Lucia disgustedly.

"You guys noticed it's a Hogsmeade weekend tomorrow?" Rose piped in.

"Yeah, you are right," Longbottom said enthusiastically. "I really wanna go to Zonko's. I need to get something to get back at Avery for nearly killing me last Quidditch match."

"Neat. What are you gonna buy?" Weasley grinned evilly. "I recommend the Colour Changers. One drop in his Pumpkin Juice and he'll have Gryffindor-red hair for the rest of the week."

"Are you coming too?" Lucia asked Hermione while the two boys continued to plan the demise of Avery.
"Um… No, I think I pass this one. I really have to work on this essay Professor Binns gave us."

"Aw, come on Hermione. You still have next week to get that done," Weasley threw in.

"Well, I still have to catch up in a few classes, you know," Hermione lied.

She didn't need to catch up on anything. But she wanted to finally start her research on time travel. Tomorrow most students would be in Hogsmeade. Thus giving her the opportunity to do that unobserved.

"But you'll totally miss everything," Rose said.

"I'll come next time," Hermione promised.

It was near midnight as Hermione finally entered her dorm. She had been sitting in the common room with her fellow Gryffindors. They had been laughing, talking and playing games. It was like being back in her time; like those jaunty days during her time at Hogwarts. Well, almost like back then. She missed her friends so much. Every time she entered the Gryffindor common room she expected them to be there sitting in a corner and having fun.

But they are gone!

Hermione stepped in the bathroom and locked the door. She stripped off her clothes and examined the wounds she still wore from the fight in the Ministry. Her left forearm was bruised but it didn't hurt anymore. The smaller cuts and bruises all over her body seemed to be healing quite well thanks to the bruise and cut ointment she applied every night. Even the deep cut on her side started to heal. The slash looked still raw and red but it would heal eventually and would only leave behind a scar. Hermione sighed. There were already more than enough scars on her body. She wondered briefly when someone would invent something against magical scars.

At least not in the next 54 years, she mused as she put on her pyjama. Harry would have been grateful for something to get rid of his scar. Magic could leave the worst of scars on the body. Magic…

She hadn't forgotten about the incident during Transfiguration. There was something wrong with her magic. Hermione closed her eyes and summoned her magic. She could feel it flowing through her body. It was a comforting steady pulse of energy. But there was nothing left of that foreign magic she had felt as she transfigured the lizard. She couldn't find those strings of foreign magic that had been entwined with her own. What could have caused this incidence? There had been nothing out of the ordinary…besides Riddle sitting directly behind her. Maybe he did something to her? But what for? He didn't know her. There was no reason for him to attack her. And that foreign magic hadn't felt like him at all. It hadn't been dark or threatening. No, it seemed to mingle quite nicely with her own magic. But if it wasn't Riddle who else? Hermione didn't appreciate it at all that there was now another problem added to her already large enough pile of problems But right now she couldn't do anything about it. Maybe that strange magic inside her was just a one-time occurrence anyway. Hopefully…

Hermione stepped back into the dorm. The other girls were still down in the common room. Aside from Diana. She lay sleeping in her bed. Hermione went to her own bed and lay down. She was really tired now and fell asleep the instant her head hit the pillow.

"We have to go, Hermione!" Harry screamed at her, shaking her as he tried to get her out of her...
They had been found. Death Eaters were apparating everywhere around them. Hermione was scared to death. They had been following a trail to the next Horcrux but somehow they'd triggered a ward. And now Death Eaters were after them. Harry dragged her along with him. Ron followed them shooting curses over his back.

"Hurry. We have to get away!" he screamed.

Curses were flying everywhere. Hermione tried to fire some of her own back. But there were so many Death Eaters it hardly mattered. Then she saw a Death Eater creeping up on Harry. And before she could utter a warning the masked man fired a curse at Harry's back. They couldn't lose Harry, Hermione thought desperately. He was the only one who had a chance against Voldemort. The purple light shot towards his back as Hermione made her decision. She twirled Harry around so that she stood in the line of the curse. She could see Harry's surprised face as the curse hit her in her back. The instant it hit she was thrown into a prison of pain. Knives slashed at her flesh. Slitting it open. The cuts were going deeper and deeper until Hermione thought they would rip her body in shreds. The last thing she felt before unconsciousness took her was her own blood flowing down her body...

"Hermione!"

"Hermione, wake up!"

Hermione groaned and tried to pull the blanket over her head. She was still so tired. She felt like she had hardly slept at all.

"Mmmm…whutyuwan?"

"Come on, Hermione. Wakey! Wakey!"

Hermione rolled over and opened her eyes. She saw Lucia standing before her bed trying to drag the blanket away from her.

"DeCerto, really. You should get up. The inspection is today!" Hermione heard Viola's blunt voice saying. The girl was rummaging inside her trunk.

Hermione sat up. Still sleepy.

"What inspection?" she said while stifling a yawn.

"Oh my, did no one tell you?" Rose screeched.

She seemed to be in a state of panic. Why though, Hermione didn't know. It was Saturday after all.

"Er…No."

Hermione got up and searched for some clothes she could wear. As today was weekend she didn't have to wear her uniform. But as she sorted through her forties style clothes reluctantly she really thought about not changing at all and wear the pyjama all day. What would the forties etiquette say about girls running around half naked? With a sigh she took a plain blue skirt and a black jumper.

"So, what inspection are we talking about?" Hermione was slowly getting annoyed by the other girls hectic.
They were running around the dorm like mad. She wondered how she had slept during all that commotion.

"It's Professor Legifer," Diana told her while she smoothed some non existant folds out of her perfectly made bed. "She's inspecting our dorm today."

"She's what?" Hermione hoped she misheard that.

"Every month or so she looks into the girls dormitories. And if your place is not perfectly tidy you're going to get punished," Lucia frantically tried to fold her clothes neatly.

Hermione stupidly noted that she wasn't using the spells Legifer had taught them last lesson. Well, had tried to teach. Hermione for one hadn't paid her any attention. Now this 'inspection' was outrageous. What did that woman think who she was? Hermione decided to just ignore this asinine spectacle and headed for the bathroom.

Ten minutes later she emerged again into the dorm. She now wore her skirt and the black jumper. The other girls still run around trying to establish some order in their things. Really, this was worse than the army, Hermione thought amused.

"Legifer!" yelled a terrified Rose.

And sure enough after a while Professor Legifer entered the dorm. She looked impeccable like always. Hermione wondered how she managed that... or even why. Legifer stalked through the room. Her joyless face taking in every detail. She stopped at each bed. First was Diana's. Professor Legifer looked at the neatly done bed with a raised eyebrow. She then even opened Diana's trunk. The content of the trunk was as tidy as the rest of Diana's things. Legifer left Diana's bed without saying anything. Obviously that was something good, Hermione assumed, as Diana let out a relieved breath of air. Next Legifer examined Viola's and Lucia's beds with the same sour face she so liked to sport. But they seemed to be just as fine as Diana's had been. Rose wasn't so lucky like her friends.

"What is that, Ms Smith?" the professor asked while holding up a crumpled piece of parchment she had found under, yes under, the bed. Why the woman looked under the bed was beyond Hermione. Well, actually the whole thing was beyond her.

"You are on thin ice, Ms Smith," Rose seemed to whimper under the professor's glare. "Next time I see something like that it is detention."

Hermione snorted at that.

"Ms DeCerto. Let's see what you can present me," Legifer hissed evilly while turning to Hermione's side of the room.

She walked the few steps to Hermione's bed and took in the clothes that where still laying here and there scattered over the unmade bed. She raised one eyebrow at the open trunk that revealed an organised chaos. At least to Hermione it was organised. Legifer's face transformed into an evil grin as she saw Hermione's little desk that was crowded with books, quills and parchments. She actually looked like Christmas had come early. That didn't bode well, Hermione thought.

"Well, well, well, Ms DeCerto. I can't say I'm surprised," Legifer said with a fat smirk on her face. Hermione raised an eyebrow at that. She really despised that foul woman. Legifer gave one of the books a nudge with her wand. She clearly didn't want to touch anything with her fingers.

"That is, I think, worth a detention, Ms DeCerto." She looked at Hermione with a smug smile playing around her lips. "Next Tuesday, 6 o'clock."

"Are you kidding me?" Hermione couldn't help but being rude around that woman. It wasn't in her nature at all to be impolite to anyone but the woman seemed to have the ability to bring the best out of people.

"That is another detention, Ms DeCerto. And if you don't want to spent the rest of the year in detention I suggest you hold your tongue now."

Hermione really wanted to give her a piece of her mind but she didn't want to spend any more time with the hag than she already had to. After that Legifer floated out of the dorm leaving behind a very angry Hermione.

"Oh, Hermione! That's so unjust," Rose lamented. "I'm sorry we didn't tell you yesterday. But we just forgot you are new and don't know."

"It's only two detentions. Could have been worse," Lucia tried to soothe her.

"It's okay. Really! I think she just hates me. Nothing I can change." -or want to change. Hermione shrugged.

After a leisurely breakfast at Gryffindor table Hermione said good bye to the others who went off to Hogsmeade. Hermione was a little bit curious about Hogsmeade herself. She wanted to see how it had changed during those five decades which lay between her last visit and now. She had always liked the Hogsmeade weekends back in her time period. But she had other things to do now. Like getting herself back into the right time period without changing the past and thus probably sentencing her future to a terrible fate.

No pressure there. Hermione sighed tiredly as she walked the corridor to the library.

"And what are you doing here on a nice day like this?" Ms Peters the librarian smiled at her friendly.

"Just a little research, Ms Peters," Hermione answered. She really liked Ms Peters. She was so much better than Mrs Pince had been. Ms Peters was actually helpful where Mrs Pince had been downright disturbing.

"Ms DeCerto, you spent way too much time in here," Ms Peters chastised Hermione gently.

Hermione smiled at her. She then walked into the library and searched for a nice secluded table. She found one in a corner that couldn't be seen from the entrance. Hermione sat down on a chair with her back to the wall. No one would be able to sneak up on her. She didn't need anyone getting suspicious of her interest in time travel. Or the Deathly Hallows for that matter. She left her bag at the table and went to browse the shelves.

After several hours of searching, reading and a little bit of cursing Hermione still had to find something useful. She had so far only come across books dealing with the nature of time in general or books about time turners. There even was a detailed book about how to actually create one. Hermione had wondered briefly if it was a good idea to not restrict that information at all. But after she read the book she knew why. It was incredibly difficult to create a time turner. The spells involved where way beyond her and the material to form the time turner with where nearly impossible to come by.

But she didn't need a time turner anyway. What she needed was a device or spell that would enable her to go forward in time. A time turner was definitely not the way to go about it, Hermione reasoned after she looked through the tenth book about time turners. They were not constructed to go forward in time. It wasn't a matter of changing a few of the involved spells and one could travel forwards in time. It's sole purpose was going back. Travelling forward was utterly impossible. The books just confirmed what she'd already known.

The books on the nature of time in general on the other hand where were very informative. But again they didn't help her solve her problem. Hermione closed a rather large tome about time and its nature with spell work - rather useless - with a sigh. So far she hadn't learned anything helpful.

Maybe that's not the way to go about it after all, she pondered. The source of her problem had been most probably the Elder Wand. So if that wand had sent her back it should also be able to go forward in time. Maybe she should try to find something on the Deathly Hallows. She looked at her wrist watch. Nearly 5 o'clock. She had spend the whole day here for nothing. Hermione took her head in her hands. She was frustrated. It would be best to stop now and resume her search another day.

She left the library with the feeling of having failed. She yawned loudly as she walked down a corridor of the fourth floor. Most of the students still were in Hogsmeade having a nice day. Maybe she should go outside for a bit of fresh air. She mused about her plans of the afternoon as she rounded a corner and ran directly into someone. She stumbled back a few steps looking at whom she had run into.

The tall and muscular boy seemed to be a sixth or seventh year and was wearing the colours of Slytherin. Behind him she could see he was followed by more boys whom all belonged to Slytherin and all in their sixth or seventh year. They were staring at her and wore grim faces.

What are they up to? Hermione thought suspiciously. With a jolt of anxiety she noticed how secluded and dark this corridor was. And those Slytherins didn't exactly look delighted to meet her here. She unconsciously fell into her duelling stance.

"What are you doing here?" the boy Hermione had run into asked in an aggressive manner while he took a threatening step towards her.

"Oh, I'm sorry. I didn't know it was forbidden to walk around in this school," Hermione answered sarcastically, once again surprised by the lack of emotion in her own voice. She didn't know when she had developed that particular skill but Harry and Ron had been impressed by it in more than one occasion. For Hermione it was more unsettling than anything else.

"Watch your mouth, _Gryffindor!_" one of the others said venomously. He spat his last word so that it sounded like an insult.

Hermione noticed that his hand went to his wand as he spoke. Why were these people so aggressive? It was like she had walked into something they really didn't want her to see. This seemed to be more than the normal house rivalry.

"Avery, please, there is no reason for a tone like this." Hermione heard a smooth poised voice say.

She could see the boy who had spoken to her before tense. The others parted to make room for whoever spoke last. Hermione had a sinking feeling that she knew who it was. Someone, she hadn't noticed before because he stood behind the others, was walking towards her. The sound of his authoritative steps now the only sound heard in the corridor. As he strolled confidently towards her Hermione could see that it was indeed Tom Riddle. He wore a smug smile on his otherwise handsome face. He stopped in front of her and Hermione took an involuntary step backwards. He smirked at that.
"Ms DeCerto, a pleasure meeting you again," Riddle said politely while smiling at her.

But Hermione wasn't fooled. She could see the underlying coldness. For the first time she noticed how tall Riddle was. He was towering over her. Merlin, she wished she had just gone to Hogsmeade with the others.

Here she was again. The nuisance that had bugged him since her arrival at the school, DeCerto, the stupid girl. She constantly affronted him despite his efforts to flatten her. That was just not the way it goes, Riddle thought furiously. No one could resist him. And certainly not this filthy slut. He walked towards her satisfied by noticing how his servants hurriedly made place for him. He stood now right in front of her. And DeCerto seemed frightened by him. That was much better than her indifference.

You should be frightened by me, DeCerto.

She even took a step back from him. And was now standing with her back on the wall. No way to run any more.

"Ms DeCerto, a pleasure meeting you again," he said, barely able to keep the scorn out of his voice.

She looked up at him and he could see the fear in her hazel eyes. She darted a look at his followers standing now behind him before looking back at him.

No way for you to escape, my dear. And I really don't need those idiots to stop you.

"What do you want from me?" she said forcefully, and Riddle was a little bit taken aback at how strong her voice still sounded.

That little bitch really doesn't know her place, he fumed inwardly.

"Why, Ms DeCerto, I was merely trying to be nice to you. No reason for jumping into my face," he said softly but made no effort to sound nice or polite anymore.

If this girl wouldn't accept his superiority the easy way he was going to show her what it meant to cross his way. He didn't need her running around thinking she could do whatever she pleased after all.

Her voice was dripping with sarcasm as she answered, "I'm sorry. Never meant to offend you."

He had to breath in slowly to stop his temper from exploding and cursing her on the spot. He could feel his magic going berserk anyway. It was crackling around him. He knew that was making others uncomfortable but he didn't stop it. Obviously DeCerto had noticed his magic too for she was looking very frightened again. An evil smile broke out on his face.

Hermione was chastising herself inwardly. Whatever had come over her to speak to Riddle like that? But she had said those words before she could stop herself. Now he was really furious. She could feel him emanating dark magic. It assaulted her body and made breathing difficult. She could even see his followers taking a few steps back. There was panic building up inside her. Riddle was glaring at her, his grey eyes deathly cold. Why did she have to insult him so openly? She tried to take another step back from him when she felt her shoulders touching the cold stone wall. Riddle had trapped her against the wall.

Then Riddle suddenly leaned forward. Hermione tensed as he bent his head to speak in her ear, his lips almost touching her. His body barely touched hers but his onslaught of magic now really trapped her against the wall. He was way too near to her. Hermione could feel her legs giving way underneath her.

"An advice for you, DeCerto," he whispered maliciously in her ear. Hermione shuddered as she could feel his breath on her skin. "Do not cross me! You should not make me your enemy!"

He leaned back again. Hermione shivered as she looked up at him again. His face was completely blank now. But his eyes were boring into hers and Hermione could see the same coldness, disdain and the immeasurable hate she had seen in his older counterpart from her time.

He took a step back from her and said in a disturbingly normal, friendly voice, "It was nice meeting you, Ms DeCerto." With that, he smiled kindly at her.

But although his face was now a mask of affability Hermione could still see the ferocity and cold anger underneath it. Then he turned and walked arrogantly away from her. His servants tensed as he passed them and then they followed him in a respectful distance.

As they had left Hermione slid down the wall she was leaning on. Her whole body still shivered. She closed her eyes and tried to steady her breathing again. That was not good. Not only had Riddle noticed her, something she had tried to avoid ever since she arrived at Hogwarts, no, he now had a dislike for her. He had even threatened her. She still couldn't believe how she could have been so stupid as to mock him. He may be only sixteen but what she had seen right now confirmed that he was already very dangerous.

What to do now? Maybe it had been a silly idea to come to Hogwarts from the very beginning. The best thing to do now would be to leave instantly. It wasn't safe to stay here. She didn't want to fight against him again. If she really needed that information about the Deathly Hallows so urgently she sure could find it somewhere else. After all Hogwarts held not the only library in England. Yes, leaving seemed to be the best option.

Hermione pulled her legs to her body and rested her head on her knees. She still felt very shaken. Her first impulse was to get away from that monster as far as possible. But was that really the most logical step to take? The information she could get somewhere else but what about the Elder Wand? Dumbledore would gain it eventually so she needed to stay close to him. She didn't know the exact date he would fight and win against Grindlewald. There had been contradictory data in the books of her time. And she had never asked him herself. No, she should stay close to Dumbledore. Then eventually an opportunity to get her hands on the wand would surely arise.

But what about Riddle? Hermione leaned back at the wall resting her head on the stone. Riddle definitely was a problem now. He was suspicious of her to the extent that he had felt the need to threaten her.

She slowly got up from the place she was resting on.

No use sitting around and cry. I have to get my act together!

As she walked around the next corner she recognized her surroundings. This was the corridor with the Room of Requirement. Maybe that's were Riddle and his cronies had come from. What had they done in the Room of Requirement? Maybe a Death Eater meeting, Hermione reasoned. Those Slytherins had had those brutal looks about them that had marked the Death Eaters of her time. Hermione swallowed at the thought of having just met the forerunners of the Death Eaters.

With those dark thoughts she walked back to Gryffindor common room as fast as possible. She let out a relieved breath of air as she stepped inside the common room. She felt safer here. No evil Slytherin could get to her here. The common room was rather crowded. Obviously most of the students were already back from Hogsmeade. They were hanging around laughing and talking.

"Hey, Hermione! There you are!" Rose waved.

The group of them was sitting in a corner of the common room. Hermione walked over and sat down beside Lupin and Lucia on a sofa.

"What's happened, Hermione? You are as pale as a ghost," Weasley sat on an armchair across from her and eyed her worriedly.

"Yeah, you look kinda sick," Rose said.

Hermione knew only one reason for her looking so pale. Well, the Dark Lord threatened me right now. But it's nothing to worry about, I'm sure.

"I think I'm just tired," she answered instead.

"Have you been in the library the whole day?" Longbottom asked in incredulously.

"I've forgotten the time," Hermione offered as explanation. And then changed the topic of their conversation. "So, did you get what you wanted by at Zonko's?"

Longbottom's mouth broke into a grin. "Yep, the finest Shape Shifters they've got," he announced proudly.

"What do they do?" Hermione hadn't heard of them before.

At that Longbottom grabbed in his bag and produced a package of what seemed to be innocent looking candies. He offered her one. Hermione took a candy and eyed it suspiciously.

"Go on!" Weasley said and added as Hermione still hesitated. "It's nothing really bad. At least if you're not a Slytherin."

Hermione shrugged and tucked the candy in her mouth. It was rather sticky and tasted of caramel. Hermione swallowed it and waited for something to happen. At first nothing out of the ordinary happened but then she could feel her clothes changing. She still wore the black jumper and her skirt. But as she looked down on her she saw that her clothes were changing into her school uniform. After a while she sat there completely dressed in her uniform.

"Well, that's impressive. But how's that getting you revenge?" Hermione looked back at Longbottom.

"Because, my dear Hermione, these candies are changing the clothes of whoever's eating them into the school uniform. But not any school uniform. It will be the Gryffindor one," Longbottom grinned at her. "And of course, Avery being the Slytherin Quidditch team captain, will really appreciate the nice colours of his new uniform."

Weasley laughed at that.

"Yeah, and the best is even if you change your clothes the candy will still transform the new clothes. It will only stop after you eat one of the yellow wrapped candies."

At that he took a yellow candy out of another box and handed it to Hermione. Hermione ate the candy and after a few seconds the uniform changed back into her normal clothes.
"Not bad!" Hermione grinned at them.

"Now, we only have to find a way to get Avery eat them," Longbottom said.

Lupin rolled his eyes at that and looked at his two friends. "Really, can't you find something more productive to do with your time?"

"Ow, come on Lupin. You're such a spoil sport," Weasley exclaimed.

Dance With The Devil

It was Monday again and Hermione started her second week at Hogwarts in the forties. She had barely left the common room during the weekend, having tried to avoid Riddle as best as possible. She had to admit she was really scared by him. Well, she had been scared of him before too. But this was a whole new level. After his attack on her in the corridor Tom Riddle had become Voldemort again in her mind. There was no denying it. He may look different but he was Lord Voldemort. Those pitiless eyes had told her so. She didn't want to be near him ever again. And if her logical side hadn't insisted that she stayed because of the Elder Wand she would have had fled the castle by now. But as a very huge part of Hermione's mind was logical she had stayed and was now headed for her first lesson this week. Unfortunately it was a potion class. Unfortunately because it was a Gryffindor-Slytherin class.

She was a little late now. She didn't want to go to the class so she had lagged behind. But now there was no delaying it. She took a deep breath and entered the familiar potion's classroom. The other students seemed to have arrived already. She could see Lupin and Longbottom sitting at a table in the back. Weasley wasn't there as he took Divination instead of potions. Hermione sighed as she envied him. Who would have thought that she ever wanted to go to a Divination class?

She looked around in the classroom to find herself a free seat. There was only one left. Hermione tensed as she saw it was a seat at Riddle's table. She looked at him and saw him openly smirking at her. She had the feeling that this free seat wasn't as coincidental as it seemed to be. With no other option left she walked reluctantly over to him.

"Why, if it isn't Ms DeCerto," Riddle sniggered at her.

On his left side sat another Slytherin. Hermione recognized him. He was one of Riddle's followers, a Death Eater. Hermione shuddered. He had been part of the group that had threatened her in that corridor. He was a fair-haired boy with pale skin. He was quite handsome, Hermione noted. Nothing compared to Riddle's dark beauty but handsome nonetheless. If it weren't for that look he sported though. He looked conceitedly at her as she sat down beside Riddle. Like she was some kind of particularly disgusting trash.

"Oh, I think I haven't introduced you yet." Riddle laughed darkly. "Meet Abraxas Malfoy. Malfoy, this is Hermione DeCerto."

The fair-haired boy, Malfoy, barely inclined his head towards her, never abandoning his stuck up look. Hermione just stared at him. Of course he was a Malfoy. Did members of this family had to make her life miserable, she wondered.

"Now, DeCerto, were are your manners?" Hermione turned back at Riddle. "I thought you would have taken my little advise at heart?" His was tone conversational but there was an underlying malice in his words.

'Do not cross me!' Of course she remembered. That evil git!

He looked at her expectantly. His evil smirk still plastered all over his face. Hermione could see triumph glistening in his eyes. But what really enraged her was this amusement and scorn he showed off.

No more pretending to be prince charming then, eh?
Somehow Hermione preferred it that way. This friendly façade had been quite unsettling. She pressed her lips together in a thin line. Her right hand itched to curse him. Right then and there. But she mustn't do that, she told herself.

_Just ignore him._

Hermione was saved from this conversation as Professor Slughorn entered the classroom.

How inconvenient, Riddle thought as he saw Slughorn enter. He would have really liked to jibe the girl some more. He studied her features as the professor droned on about some potion or other. She avoided his gaze and seemed to be scared by him, he noticed satisfied. It had been a stroke of good luck when they had met in that corridor. He had decided to show her then that he was not one to be trifled with. But there still seemed to be a little bit of resistance in her. He needed to put away with that. He felt an evil smirk beginning to form on his face.

Hermione felt sick. He was staring at her. She could feel it. Like he was boring a hole in the side of her head. What did he want from her? Why was he suddenly so interested in her? Hermione couldn't concentrate on the lesson. Slughorn had greeted her as she was a new student but she had only been able to nod stupidly at him. Then he had started to lecture about a potion. Hermione didn't even know which one so distracted was she by Riddle.

"...is mainly used by the Aurors to determine the age of underage troublemakers. Takes a little time to brew. But I have confidence in you. We'll begin on the potion after the Christmas break. I would advise you to take the time to prepare as the grade you'll get for the potion will influence your final grade in potions greatly. I want you to join together in groups of three. Hmm, it's best you stay in the groups you are seated right now." At these words of Slughorn Hermione couldn't hold back a groan. Riddle raised an eyebrow at her. And Hermione chastised herself at her lack of self-control.

"How does the potion work, sir?"

Slughorn smiled at the student who had posed the question.

"Well, Mr Nott, firstly a little bit of blood of the test subject is needed. That blood is then mixed with the Ortus Potion. Applied to a piece of parchment the mixture will then reveal the year of birth of the test subject."

Hermione didn't like what she was hearing right now. The Ortus Potion? She'd never heard of that before. A potion to reveal the year of birth? That was the last thing she needed right now. Her year of birth was 1979. How would she explain that outcome? Or maybe the potion would just estimate her age and then give a year of birth according to that. So that would be 1925. But she couldn't be sure. That stupid potion could ruin everything. Typically Slughorn, he just knew how to make her already miserable life even more miserable. She had to look up that potion though she doubted there was anything to find about the effects of time travel on the Ortus potion. Then her last solution would be to sabotage her own potion. Good luck, with Riddle breathing down her neck. She nervously played with her quill.

_Not now, Granger,_ she told herself. _Riddle's sitting right beside you._

He would notice if she was upset about something. And then he would try to find out what it was she was upset about. She had to calm down. The potion needed some time to be brewed. She had still time to find a solution.

For the rest of the lesson Slughorn continued to lecture about the different age revealing potions and their advantages and disadvantages compared to each other. Hermione couldn't really concentrate.
What with Riddle sitting right beside her and the Ortus potion hanging over her like the sword of Damocles. She was relieved as the lesson was over and she could leave the potion classroom.

Hermione's next class was Defence against the Dark Arts. Normally she liked Defence very much. It had been a really helpful class in her time period. But now she dreaded to go there. She had learned that DADA was, like potions, a Gryffindor Slytherin class. So Riddle would be there too. She could see it coming, he would mock her just like he did in Potions.

She entered the classroom together with her Gryffindor friends. Hermione nearly groaned as her gaze fell on Riddle. He was sitting in the front row. And right now he was looking at her with a smug smile plastered on his face. Hermione looked away from him. She followed Longbottom, Weasley and Lupin to their table which luckily was situated far far away from Riddle.

"So, what are we doing today?" Hermione asked more to divert her thoughts away from Riddle.

"I'm not sure. But I hope we are duelling again," Weasley answered.

"Oh, we are duelling in this class?" Hermione was mildly impressed. Aside from the disastrous Duelling Club in her second year they had never taught duelling in her time period.

"Don't worry, Hermione," Lucia said. She, Rose, Diana and Viola were sitting at the table right beside Hermione. "You don't have to attend the duelling. In fact all girls aren't."

The other girls at her table were nodding at that. Hermione inwardly rolled her eyes. What did they think? That an evil Dark Wizard wouldn't attack them just because they were women? At that the professor entered the classroom. Hermione looked up at him. Rather young for a teacher, she thought. He was a tall, thin man with blonde short hair.

Riddle saw the professor entering. He was new. Started this year and Riddle didn't know how to gauge him yet. He seemed to know his stuff. But then again: Defence against the Dark Arts. The subject in itself was just a waste of Riddle's time. He smiled smugly at that. Why would he need to defend himself against something so beautiful and exciting?

"Hello, class," the professor greeted them and then discovered DeCerto.

Well, she wasn't easy to overlook, Riddle thought. With her hair looking like a lion's mane.

"Oh, you must be Hermione DeCerto."

"Yes, sir," DeCerto answered shyly.

"Nice to have you here, Ms DeCerto," McGray told her.

Riddle rolled his eyes. No, it was definitely not nice to have that chick here.

"But now let's continue with our lesson. I hope you all studied the spells I suggested to you. Because today we are going to duel again." A murmur went to the room and in some cases a groan.

"For the ones who decided to not participate in duelling," McGray turned to the girls of the class and held up a few sheets of parchment. "I prepared these assignments. Kindly go to the library and work on them. I will come and collect them after class."

McGray started to hand out his assignments to the students who wouldn't participate in the duelling. Riddle shook his head. Those gits where even to damn daft to know how to hold a wand. He watched as McGray went to the Gryffindors to give them their sheets. As McGray offered a sheet to DeCerto Riddle heard her say,

"Sir, I would prefer to participate in the duelling. If that's possible."

So that stupid slut thought she knew how to duel? Riddle snorted at that.

"Yes, of course Ms DeCerto," McGray smiled at her.

An idea was forming in Riddle's mind and a smirk on his face as McGray returned to the front of the class and announced, "Please, take your wands and follow me. You won't be needing anything else."

He opened a door beside the blackboard. The students got up and an excited murmur broke out. Riddle followed the other students in the next room. It was twice the size of the classroom. The other students gathered around the professor. Riddle made sure to stand near DeCerto. If he was lucky he could get her without breaking any school rules.

And sure enough McGray said, "Please find yourself a partner. You know your skills so find someone that matches them."

At that Riddle strolled towards DeCerto.

A duelling lesson was finally, something exciting. After the fiasco at her previous lesson Hermione looked forward to a little physical activity. It seemed ages since last she had duelled. Maybe she could partner up with Lupin. He seemed to be quite good with his spell work.

"Wow, Hermione, are you sure you don't wanna come with us?" Lucia asked her as Hermione stood to follow the professor.

"Yes, don't worry. It's just a lesson after all," Hermione answered.

She really couldn't understand why they didn't want to come. But after Legifer's near fainting episode after seeing Hermione's wand holster she shouldn't be surprised. This time period seemed to be pretty hard on women. The professor led them to another room. It was huge. It looked like the Room of Requirement had during their DA meetings. There was more than enough room for several pairs of duellers.

"Please find yourself a partner. You know your skills so find someone that matches them," the professor announced.

Hermione sniggered. Such a risk free way of fighting. She was used to something much more sinister. At that she felt a tap on her shoulder. As she turned around she found herself once again trapped in Tom Riddle's gaze. He smiled again but the coldness in his eyes was still present.

"Would you like to partner with me?"

At first Hermione didn't get what he wanted. When she finally did understand she turned pale and just wanted to run away, screaming. Riddle was still waiting for her response though.

"Uhm…" she stammered.

Damn, she really needed a way out of this. She looked around but it seemed everyone had partnered up in the mean time.
"Come on. I won't bite," he said laughing attractively.

Yeah, sure. Hermione thought. But there was no way out of it now. If she refused he would become even more suspicious of her than he already was. And that was the last thing she wanted. The Dark Lord on her case.

"O…Okay," she said in a very small voice.

He smiled contentedly and walked over to a free space. Hermione was forced to follow him. The other pairs had already started to duel. Riddle was waiting for her. Standing there, he carried an air of authority. He twirled his wand casually in his hand. Hermione could see a glint of gold on his right hand. She recognized the golden ring with the black stone. That was the Gaunt's ring. If Riddle was wearing it now that meant he had already killed his father and grandparents. Information Hermione really didn't need right now. Panic was slowly starting to override her. She couldn't face him again. Her breathing was becoming faster. They were standing in a perfect duel distance now. Riddle still smiled at her but there was an evil glint in his eyes.

"Ready?" he asked politely.

No, no, no, no, no, no!

"…yes," a very soft voice.

Riddle held his wand now properly and bowed to her. Hermione's mind was clouded with fear but she managed to flick her wrist and her wand landed reassuringly in her hand then she bowed at him never breaking eye contact.

So she knows how to duel? Riddle thought amused as DeCerto bowed at him. At least the pleasantries. Oh, he was so going to enjoy this. She looked frightened now. That was exactly how he liked them.

Hermione was shivering. Calm down, she told herself. Focus! Now is not the time to lose your nerves!

She tightened the grip on her wand and faced Lord Voldemort. He stood a few metres from her and looked calm, self-assured. Combined with his murderous glare he made a fearsome impression. The other pairs of duelers were busy with their own fights. Hermione could see them out of the corner of her eyes. But they were only using simple spells. An Expelliarmus here and there, maybe a Stupefy or something equally innocent. Hermione doubted her duel was going to be innocent.

That was the moment Riddle chose to strike. He sent a curse her way and Hermione was surprised when she recognized it as a simple Jellylegs Spell.

What was he playing at?

With a casual wave of her wand she deflected the spell off its course. She could see Riddle raise an eyebrow at that but his smirk was still in place. Next he raised his wand and brought it down a blue spell left the tip of his wand. That was another harmless spell, the Confundus charm. Hermione didn't even have to raise a shield to block that charm.

What did he plan?

She couldn't end her train of thought as he had sent another curse her way. This time the Reducto curse, and this time Hermione had to raise her shield.
Protego!

That curse was not really powerful but it certainly was more powerful than his preceding spells. Hermione could see now what he was doing. He was testing her out. Hermione narrowed her eyes at him. He was still smirking offendedly at her daring her to attack.

Well, if you insist. Have it your way.

She flashed her wand and yelled, "Stupefy!"

The red light of the stunner left her wand and sped towards Riddle. He waved the spell away lazily. Never losing his composure. But Hermione hadn't expected him to. Of course a Stunner wouldn't bring down Lord Voldemort. But she didn't want to really attack him. That would reveal too much of her skills.

He had to admit, she wasn't bad. Actually he had expected her to lose right after his very first spell. But she seemed to know a little bit. Riddle sniggered cockily. She was more amusing than he had hoped for. She had even attempted an attack of her own. Not that he claimed a Stunner to be an attack but he had to applaud her cheek. Even so, now it was time to take off the gloves. That girl deserved punishment after all, for annoying him and being an eye sore. What spell best to use? Ah, yes, that would do just fine. She would be carried off to the infirmary and he would claim it was an accident.

Now he was lagging again. Hermione was bewildered. But his hesitancy bode nothing well, of that she was sure. He seemed too amused by their duel. He was definitely up to something. Riddle flashed her a grin and sniggered at her. Then he flicked his wand expertly in a complicated pattern. Before he was finished Hermione had recognized the spell by the movements. She felt a chill running down her spine. It was the Acidula curse. That curse would form a mist of acid that would burn everything upon contact. Nothing life threatening but certainly painful.

A sickly green mist left Riddle's wand and sped towards her. Hermione had to raise a shield. But a simple protego wouldn't do. The protego charm protected the caster only from one side. The Acidula curse couldn't be stopped by that. It would just wobble around the shield and attack her from behind.

Hermione concentrated her magic and summoned one of her stronger shields.

Scutulatus!

A white light emerged from her wand it gained in size until it was a diamond-shaped shield and incased Hermione completely. The green mist connected with her shield but couldn't penetrate it. It flowed around the whole shield as if searching for an opening. Hermione needed to get away with it.

She raised her wand and pointed it with her arm outstretched to her right side above her head. Then she brought the wand down in an angular motion so that in the end it pointed to the floor left of her. The green mist disappeared with the movement of Hermione's wand as if she had woven it away. After that she canceled her shield as it was using up to much magic. She looked back at Riddle. His smug smile had vanished and was now replaced by a furious scowl. He snarled at Hermione as he waved his wand in another attack and a purple curse sped towards her. This time she didn't recognize the curse and she had no time to avoid it. So she crossed her arms before her body, summoned her magic and then spread her arms to the sides.

Subsisto!

A thick yellow shield formed itself before her. Riddle's curse smashed into it with a resonating crash.
As the yellow shield absorbed the curse's power it turned dark orange before it flickered and died. The last remnants of the curse that the shield hadn't absorbed rushed to Hermione and sliced open her left shoulder. She could feel her robes soak up the blood that spilled from the cut.

Hermione looked back at Riddle. He was radiating so much raw magical power that the air crackled with it. She looked in his eyes and could see a flicker of red. It was like being back in the Ministry. Another dark haired boy had attacked her there but the eyes had been just the same. She was trapped in his gaze. Hermione felt faint. Riddle and her mental image of the possessed Harry merged inside her mind. Those eyes, so full of bottomless hate. She had to stop him. Hermione no longer realized that she wasn't fighting Lord Voldemort but teenage Tom Riddle. She forgot she was in Hogwarts right now, on safe ground. For her only Voldemort existed.

_Cinis!_

Hermione thought as she waved her wand in the familiar motion. A ray of bright light shot from the tip of her wand. It rushed towards Riddle with a swishing noise. Riddle's eyes widened as he recognized the spell. He had no time to raise a shield so he flung himself sideways to avoid the spell. The spell smashed with a loud crack into the floor. It dissipated and left behind a small hole which was drilled deep into the stone floor. The brinks of the hole were white hot molten stone.

Hermione saw that Riddle had momentarily lost his balance so she sent another curse his way.

_Verbero!_

White smoke emerged from her wand. It buffed in Riddle's direction but the nearer it came the more solid the smoke was. More and more smoke came in a thin line out of Hermione's wand. The spell looked like a silvery grey rope whose one end was still smoky and connected with Hermione's wand tip the other end was very solid and snaked its way towards Riddle.

Riddle was still on one hand and one knee on the floor as he saw Hermione's new attack. He got up on his feet again and rose a shield of his own for the first time in this duel. Hermione waved her wand and the point of the silver rope gained in momentum. It smashed into Riddle's shield and breached it. Riddle's eyes widened in shock as the rope wound itself around his torso. Hermione smirked at that and pulled sharply at her wand and the rope. The rope tightened its hold on Riddle and Hermione could see Riddle wince in pain.

He shakily waved his wand and the outline of the whole rope became smokier and smokier until after a few seconds it lost its solidness completely. Riddle straightened up but still held his left arm wrapped around his abdomen. He looked at Hermione in astonishment. But his predominating emotion was rage, Hermione could tell. His face was determined and an angry frown formed between his eyebrows.

Hermione looked at him. Her face equally determined. She wasn't going to give in. Voldemort was not going to hurt her. Not anymore. He had taken so much from her. She was not willing to give him anymore. They both took simultaneously the dueling stance and locked eyes. This duel was far from over Hermione realized. She steadied her breathing and summoned her magic. It formed again the familiar, reassuring flow of energy in her body.

Then Hermione could see Riddle beginning with his attack. He whirled his wand. But this time she wasn't going to just take his curse. She waved her own wand and transfigured her outer black robe into many small shining arrow heads. With a wave of her wand the cloud of sharp cutting edges floated in front of her. Just as Riddle finished his curse Hermione ordered her army of knives to attack him.
The curse of Riddle sped towards her at the same moment as Hermione's knives rushed towards him. Suddenly a huge iridescent pale blue barrier formed between the two of them. Both curses smashed into the barrier. Just a few of Hermione's daggers crossed the barrier and slashed into Riddle who groaned in pain. The power of Riddle's curse was broken as it crashed into the barrier. But a little bit of it came through and hit Hermione. She fell on her knees as the curse ripped at her body. She could feel a blinding pain running through her. But after a few seconds the pain ebbed away and Hermione opened her eyes again.

"What the hell do you think you are doing?" She heard someone screaming.

She looked to her right and saw Professor McGray. He stood with his wand raised. He had obviously cast the blue barrier that had stopped both of their attacks. McGray looked livid.

Hermione got slowly on her feet again. Her whole body ached and she could feel her left shoulder throbbing. She blinked and looked around her. During the duel she had at some point totally forgotten where she was. But now everything came back into focus. The huge hall with its stone floor and the many mats lying neatly arranged on the floor to separate the various dueling pairs from each other. But mainly Hermione noticed the other students again. They had all stopped dueling. And if Hermione had to make a guess they had done so a while ago. Every face in the hall was staring at her and Riddle who had gotten now on his feet as well. The hall was completely silent. Hermione could see the other students looking at her with different emotions: astonishment, awe, disbelief and in some cases even fear.

"DeCerto, Riddle! Follow me!" McGray hissed at the both of them before he turned towards the other students. "You stay here and wait for my return. And don't dare cast even one spell while I'm not here."

McGray went for the door. Hermione saw no other option as to follow him. Riddle had come to the same conclusion as he too limped after the professor. McGray waited for them in the classroom. When Riddle and Hermione entered the door was slammed shut behind them.

"Do you have any idea how irresponsible that was?" he yelled at them both. "I can't believe you used those spells. They are dangerous! You could have killed each other."

Hermione raised an eyebrow but didn't dare to point out that that had been the general idea. "Mr Riddle, I really expected more of you," McGray turned to Riddle who looked rather contrite.

"I am very sorry, professor. I got carried away. It was never my intention to harm Ms DeCerto," Riddle said his voice an example of repentance.

Hermione couldn't help but admire his acting skills. She nearly rolled her eyes. McGray obviously couldn't see through his act as his eyes softened a little bit.

"Professor, there is nothing to excuse my behavior," Riddle pleaded with him his voice dripping with honesty. "But I really didn't mean to injure anyone."

If Hermione hadn't been at the receiving end of his wand she would have believed him. He was incredibly convincing. Time to get her own act together.

"Sir, I don't know what got into me," she said carefully forming her voice into a soft whisper. She hung her head as she continued. "I am very ashamed of myself."
There, Riddle! I'm not a bad actress myself.

"Very well. Ms DeCerto, Mr Riddle, what you have done today was very wrong," McGray looked at them his voice still strict but his eyes had gone soft again. "But I can see that you regret what you have done."

"Yes, of course, sir," Riddle muttered, he still looked contrite.

Rather persistent, aren't you? Hermione thought at that. But she too tried to look ashamed herself. Though she really didn't know why she should be. It was Riddle after all who had attacked her so viciously. She had just defended herself.

"But I still have to punish you. 50 points from each of your houses. And you will both be serving detentions with me," McGray said sternly. "And now I want you to go to the infirmary. Mr Riddle I hope you can show Ms DeCerto the way without causing anymore harm."

"Of course, sir," Riddle answered softly.

Professor McGray returned to the dueling hall and left the both of them standing in the classroom. Hermione suddenly felt very alert again. The last thing she wanted right now was to be in a room alone with Tom Riddle. She looked from the now closed door back to Riddle. His eyes were shooting daggers at her while his face was again totally blank. Hermione was ready for the next attack when he abruptly turned away from her and stalked to the door. She remained were she was, rooted to the ground, as she stared after his retreating back. He crossed the whole length of the room but as he passed through the door he stopped. Without turning around he said impatiently,

"What are you waiting for?"

Hermione jerked as he spoke to her. What? Oh, yes, the infirmary. She walked tentatively towards him.

They walked in silence to the hospital wing. Hermione fell in step beside Riddle. That was a fairly awkward situation, she decided. Maybe she should just go back to her dorm. Admittedly her shoulder was hurting but she was sure it wasn't anything serious. Just a cut. Nothing to really worry about. And the Gryffindor tower was in the opposite direction so she wouldn't have to walk any longer with Riddle. She looked from the now closed door back to Riddle. Admittedly her shoulder was hurting but she was sure it wasn't anything serious. Just a cut. Nothing to really worry about. And the Gryffindor tower was in the opposite direction so she wouldn't have to walk any longer with Riddle. She glanced at him. He strode along as elegantly and arrogantly as ever. Though Hermione could see him limping a little bit. She felt quite satisfied at that. His robes were torn open in a few places and Hermione could see he was bleeding underneath it. Well, her little daggers had been a success then. The only down side was that she had to buy a new robe now. She could transfigure the daggers back into her black school robe but she really didn't want to use it again. Not after being drained in that git's evil blood.

Riddle was… absolutely shocked. How did DeCerto know all those spells? That was just impossible. He had never met another student who could equal him in a duel, and a girl at that. Even most of the teachers couldn't take him on. But she had blocked his curses expertly. The shields she had used were highly advanced magic. Very difficult to learn and certainly not taught at any school. Hell, most grown wizards didn't know how to cast them. It wasn't worth the trouble to learn them unless one really needed them. And her attacks had been equally advanced. He had been barely able to counter her attack with the smoky rope. He had had to tweak the magic a bit and depend on the Dark Arts to stop the rope from strangling him. He had always refrained from using Dark Magic in presence of others aside from his followers. He was very lucky McGray hadn't seen him using it. How did DeCerto know how to fight like that? He glanced sideways at her. She was walking beside him, seemingly deep in thought. Riddle could see her shoulder. There was a deep cut there. Her black sleeveless pullover and her white blouse were soaked in her blood. But she just didn't care.
Every girl he ever knew would be crying by now. Most of the boys would too. But she was walking calmly beside him as if there was nothing wrong.

They had reached the infirmary and he knocked on the door.

Finally! Hermione thought relieved. That walking alone with him had been highly unpleasant. She had been alert all the time to him attacking her. She was actually surprised he had really led her to the infirmary and not to some secluded dungeon to finish her off. He knocked on the door and then opened it. A brunette woman in her twenties came rushing towards them.

"Oh my, what happened to you?" she asked in a worried voice. "Come, come! Sit down here! I'll fetch the healer." She sat them on a bed and hurried in the adjacent office.

After a few moments she came back accompanied with a man. The man was small and had white hair and a very wrinkled face. In fact he looked ancient. A wonder he was still standing on his own two feet. He wore the lime green healer's uniform with the golden buttons down the front that Hermione knew from the healers in St. Mungos. And now he hobbled towards Riddle and herself still followed by the brunette.

Upon arrival he eyed Hermione and Riddle closely. He bent and pulled the cut material of her blouse a little away to have a look at the wound on her shoulder. He tsked at the sight. Why though Hermione didn't know. Either he wondered why she wasted his time with this small an injury or he just disapproved of destroying a perfectly nice blouse.

"So? What did happen?" he asked, not sounding too interested.

"Defence against the Dark Arts," Riddle offered as explanation.

"I always say they are too risky those classes," the brunette woman said shaking her head.

"Now Now, Madame Dulan. I'm sure it's not that bad." The old healer patted her on the back. "Can you look after the cut on the shoulder of this young lady? And you-" He turned to Riddle "-follow me."

Riddle got up and followed the healer behind the drapes but not without sending Hermione one of his nasty glares.

Hermione sighed at that. The brunette woman misinterpreted her sigh and said, "Don't worry, dear. It won't hurt at all."

Hermione looked at her and smiled. This woman seemed to be nice. At least she showed a little bit interest in her patients. Not like the old healer.

The woman took out her wand while she asked, "What's your name, dear. I haven't seen you around?"

"I'm a new student, Madam. My name is Hermione DeCerto."

"I see. A new student. And now you got injured already." She shook her head again disapprovingly. "Those classes are just too dangerous."

She then waved her wand and the cloth around Hermione's shoulder vanished.

"I'm Madam Dulan by the way."

Hermione nodded at that.

Madam Dulan started to clean Hermione's shoulder of all the caked blood. Hermione glanced sideways and could see the cut. It looked quite deep and had started to bleed again. Madam Dulan reached for a vial with a bluish liquid inside.

"Now, that can hurt just a little bit, dear," she told Hermione.

Then she drizzled some of the liquid on Hermione's cut. It stung a little but nothing really bad. After that Madam Dulan went to get a potion for Hermione. She offered the cup with a green potion to Hermione.

"Here drink this. It'll help you and you'll feel better."

Hermione took the cup and drank. The potion was warm and despite its sickly colour it didn't taste too bad. Hermione felt a pleasant warmth spreading through her body. She really felt better now. Somewhat refreshed. After that Madam Dulan began to bandage Hermione's shoulder. As she was finished she said,

"That's all I can do for you. The cut is quite deep but I think it will heal just fine. You have to come tomorrow so I can change the bandage." She smiled at Hermione kindly. "Now you just rest here for a while, hm? Just lie down for a while. You can go back for dinner."

"Yes, thank you," Hermione answered.

At that Madam Dulan left and headed for the office. Hermione leaned back on the bed. What a day it had been again. She rubbed the bridge of her nose. Since she got here things had gone from bad to worse. After this little display of her skills Riddle was bound to become suspicious. But there had been no other way. She had had to defend herself. The curses he had used had been too dangerous. That evil prick!

Even at such a young age Lord Voldemort was already very powerful. That duel had been so intense. And he hadn't even used his evil dark ways to fight her. Hermione didn't know if she could beat him if the two of them fought in a real battle. She doubted it. Riddle was not easy to assess, she decided. She was brought out of her reverie as she heard steps coming towards her. She looked up and saw the subject of her musings standing before her. Riddle glared down at her. Hermione saw a white bandage around his left hand and she could see something white flashing through the cuts in his clothes. Well, at least she had managed to hurt him as much as he had hurt her. Her gaze went back to his face. He had again that fearsome glare plastered all over his face. But what unnerved Hermione the most was the calculation underneath.

"DeCerto, it seems I have underestimated you. A mistake I will not repeat, rest assured," his voice was a whisper but that didn't make the force behind it any less.

She looked in his stormy grey eyes and gulped. Then she surprised herself again as she answered him in a steady voice, "Well, then you should just stay away from me, shouldn't you?"

After that daring retort she could see his face morphing into a mask of fury once again. He leaned forward, his arms on either side of Hermione's sitting form on the bed. His face was now mere inches from hers. Hermione shied away from him but couldn't move very far as she was trapped again.

Then he spoke in a deadly cold hiss, "Careful, DeCerto. Don't start a war with me. You would regret it very much."
Hermione wasn't able to say anything to that. She wasn't even able to breathe right now as she stared into his eyes. They were boring into her daring her to contradict him. He continued to stare her down for a few more moments. Then after what seemed to be forever to Hermione he abruptly got up again. He looked down at her shaken form with his pitiless eyes and smirked at her before he turned and walked away, out of the infirmary.

What Is It Like To Be Hated?

As Hermione finally left the infirmary it was evening already and she headed down to the Great Hall for dinner. The story of their little duel during DADA should have reached the other students by now. Hermione really didn't want to be the topic of any rumour or gossip but at the moment she couldn't change that. Her original plan of maintaining a low profile was slowly crashing down around her. What would Prof McGonagall say if she could see her now, mucking up the time line? Would probably hex me on the spot, Hermione smiled.

She reached the entrance to the Great Hall and stepped through it. Most of the students already sat at their house tables and were eating. As Hermione entered, the murmur in the Hall died down. All of the students began to stare at her. Not so much stare, Hermione noticed bewildered, but they threw her hostile glares. She had been prepared for the Slytherins staring her down. She had, after all, fought with their evil leader. But it wasn't just the Slytherins' dark glares she had to endure. No, similar glares were coming from the Ravenclaws and Huffelpuffs and, Hermione noticed with a jolt, even from Gryffindor. What had she done wrong? That couldn't be about the duel now, could it?

Suddenly very self-conscious Hermione hurried to the Gryffindor table. She could feel those glares following her every move. As she arrived at the table she searched desperately for an open seat to sit down and get out of the spotlight. But every time she found a free space it miraculously vanished upon her approach. Obviously no one wanted her to sit beside them. Hermione didn't know what had gotten into them. She had gotten along with nearly everyone before. Why did they shun her now? After some time Lupin caught her eye. He silently invited her to the place beside him. Grateful, she walked over to him and sat down.

"Thank you," she whispered softly to him.

He nodded at her without a smile.

The chatter had started again around her but she could still feel the hostility towards her. No one was talking to her. She wanted to ask Lupin what happened but she didn't dare do it now while everyone could eavesdrop. She loaded her plate with a little bit of the sausages and fried potatoes and began to eat but wasn't very hungry anymore. She could hear her name mentioned in a few of the conversations going on around her. After a while of shoving the potatoes around on her plate she stood up and left the Great Hall. As she walked out of the Hall someone bumped into her. Hard. Hermione felt a sharp pain coming from the cut on her shoulder. The shove was strong enough to slam her into the wall. A group of Ravenclaw girls passed by. Obviously it was one of them who had shoved her. They all looked at Hermione as if she was a particularly disgusting piece of filth. Some of them even grinned evilly as Hermione held her shoulder painfully. As Hermione watched them pass by she could hear one of them say,

"Slut!"

The other girls laughed at that spitefully. In bewilderment and a little bit hurt by their behaviour Hermione walked back to the Gryffindor common room. She stepped through the portrait hole into the room. It was deserted. The others were still in the Great Hall, eating. As she had nothing else to do Hermione walked up the stairs in the dormitory. The tidiness of the room annoyed her now.

Stupid Legifer!

She sat down on her bed.
What was with them? Hermione leaned back on her pillow.

This hostility couldn't be explained solely by her duel with Riddle. Sure it had been stupid of her to engage herself in a fight with Riddle, of all people. But at the time she hadn't had a choice. But why would the others hate her because of that duel? Well, she had lost some house points. But not that many. No, it was something else. Something must have happened during the time she had been in the infirmary.

She then heard someone coming up the stairs. As the door opened her four roommates stepped in. They glared at her, though Viola looked more indifferent than hostile. Lucia went to lie on her bed next to Hermione's. She slid to the side of the bed farthest away from Hermione and began to write in her pink diary. Viola disappeared into the bathroom and Diana rummaged through her things. Rose looked over one of her essays, every now and then she looked up and glared at Hermione. Hermione was really annoyed by them now. She hadn't done anything to deserve something like that.

After a while she yelled at no one in particular, "What's wrong with you?"

Diana ignored her outburst completely and Lucia stared at her and frowned but said nothing. Rose looked up from her essay and hissed, "Nothing's wrong with us. But you are a snaky little bitch, aren't you?"

Hermione was stunned by the cutting sharpness in her voice. Rose normally never spoke like that. And no one, not even Diana, objected to her use of insults. Hermione didn't want to discuss anything with them right now and pulled the covers of her bed shut. She grabbed her Arithmancy book and began to read the chapters they were going to cover the next day in class. She really had other things to worry about than those stupid school girls trying to harass her. Others had tried that before. After a few hours of reading the book slid down and Hermione fell asleep.

"You worthless Mudblood!" the Death Eater spat and kicked Hermione in the side. She lay rolled up into a ball at his feet. How could she have been so careless? She had left their hiding place to go to the village for some food. They hadn't been able to get anything to eat for days. A full blown war was raging now between Voldemort and the Ministry. Voldemort's Death Eaters were everywhere. It was getting harder and harder to find a safe place to put up their tent. Every Death Eater knew their faces. They couldn't just go into some shop and buy something to eat without the risk of getting caught.

"Where is Potter?" another Death Eater asked. There were five of them, encircling her. Hermione didn't answer. So the Death Eater pointed his wand at her and hissed,

"Crucio!"

The familiar agonizing pain of the Cruciatus curse was ripping at her. And though it was familiar there was no getting used to that pain. It was slicing down to the very core of her being until there was nothing more left than this all consuming it stopped. A hand grabbed her arm and pulled her brutally into a sitting position.

"Where is Potter?" the Death Eater asked again.

Hermione looked up at him and shook her head. She was never going to tell them. The Death Eater then spat out on her and slapped her. She was plunged to the side. Blood was dripping down from the corner of her mouth.

"You ugly piece of shit!" he yelled at her. "I should just kill you now, Muggle-whore!"
Hermione cried. They were going to kill her eventually. But not before they had tried to get the information out of her using every means possible…

Hermione woke up and felt tears trickling down her cheeks. Merlin, get a grip! She chastised herself. The population of the school ostracizing her was no reason to cry over. It could complicate her work on getting back to her own time but it was no reason to despair. Hermione got up, changed and then left the dormitory. The others hadn't spoken one word with her. They were outright ignoring her. Hermione thought about going to the Great Hall for breakfast but decided against it. She wouldn't be able to eat anyway while everyone glared at her like they had yesterday. So she headed for the History of Magic classroom.

The History class was horrible. Professor Binns was unbearably boring as he droned on about one Goblin war or other. The other students were ignoring her most of the time. If they were not ignoring her, they were trying to curse her. Some time into the class her inkwell exploded. She got covered in her black ink from head to toe. No one had tried to help her get rid of the ink. Everyone had laughed at her evilly.

Later that day, Hermione walked to the Great Hall for lunch. She really didn't want to go there but as she had skipped breakfast she was now quite hungry. Further down the corridor she could see Longbottom, Weasley and Lupin. Time to get behind the mystery of her being shunned, she thought.

As she caught up to them she greeted them, "Hey!"

Longbottom looked at her. Hermione could see disappointment in his eyes. Why was he disappointed with her? He didn't say anything but walked away from them. Hermione couldn't help but feel hurt by his behaviour. Lupin and Weasley seemed less offended by walking beside her and stayed.

"Now, can anyone tell my what's wrong?" she said impatiently.

Weasley and Lupin looked at each other uncomfortably until Lupin said, "Well, it's about you and Riddle."

"What about me and Riddle?" Hermione asked when he didn't explain any more.

"They know about you asking him out and…" Here Lupin dropped out.

"Excuse me?" Hermione asked indignantly.

"You did ask Riddle out, didn't you, Hermione?" Weasley said more forcefully.

Hermione stared at them. What?

"No, I did no such thing!" she said disgusted by what they were insinuating.

Weasley raised his eyebrows. "You did not?"

"Of course not!" Hermione was annoyed now.

"I thought so," Lupin said.

Hermione turned back at Lupin. "Then tell me what this is all about."

Lupin cleared his throat and then told her, "There's this rumor, Hermione. They say you went to talk to Riddle and asked him on a date. But he declined."
"What did I do?"

"There's more I'm afraid," Lupin continued. "After he turned you down you got angry and started to yell at him and insult him. And as he still didn't want to date you, you threatened him."

"I threatened Riddle?" The whole thing was grotesquely funny, Hermione thought. She, threatening Riddle?

It's the other way around!

"I'm sorry but that's how the rumor goes." Lupin looked at her sympathetically. "To get your revenge on him for turning you down you attacked him during the DADA class."

"You're kidding, right?" Hermione couldn't believe her ears. "He was attacking me. I had to defend myself, hadn't I?"

"Well, you did use some pretty serious spells on him, Hermione," Weasley threw in. "Like that bright light. It melted a damn hole in a stone floor."

Hermione shrugged at that. Yes, that spell was really dangerous. But no spell was strong enough if cast on Lord Voldemort. He'd deserved it.

"His spells weren't harmless either. But who started those silly rumours anyway? Like I would ever ask Riddle on a date." Hermione rolled her eyes.

"I don't know." Lupin frowned. "But the bad thing is, everyone's believing it."

"Yeah, even Longbottom," Hermione said bitterly.

"He's stupid, Hermione," Weasley tried to console her. "He's just so touchy with anything concerning Riddle. He really hates him, you know."

Hermione sighed. "I just hope they'll realize how wrong they all are."

This rumour explained everything. Tom Riddle was a very popular guy. Hermione had grudgingly to admit that. He had built himself a perfect reputation among the student body and even the teachers. For them he was the poor but brilliant orphan. So brave and handsome. The girls fell for him head over heels and the boys respected him and wanted to hang out with him. He had them wrapped around his little finger. Hermione doubted there were many people who knew the real Tom Riddle. Dumbledore was certainly one of them. And Riddle's Slytherin followers, the future Death Eaters, knew him and feared him. But beyond that? Hermione didn't think there were many people who even suspected him. And now she, the new girl, had attacked their golden boy. Of course they would hate her, attack her and in short make her life as miserable as possible. Hermione had to think back at Riddle's words.

'Don't start a war with me. You would regret it very much.'

Maybe that war between them had already started? And Hermione was now experiencing his first attack. She was pretty sure it was Riddle himself who had started this cock and bull story.

Lunch was as pleasant as the History class before. Hermione had tried to eat fast so she would be able to leave the Hall again. Somehow those death glares weren't very relaxing. After a Bad Bogey Hex had hit her in the back she had somewhat lost her appetite. So she left the Great Hall and headed to her Charms class. Now that would be nice considering who her desk neighbour was. Hermione sighted. She did that a lot lately, she noticed.
I wonder why?

And she had started to use too much sarcasm too.

As she arrived at the Charms classroom she sat down on her seat wishing she could sit somewhere else. The students arrived one after the other at the classroom and went for their tables. But not before throwing her a few nasty glares. It was getting old, Hermione thought. But as long as they didn't throw curses at her she couldn't be bothered.

Riddle strode elegantly to his Charms class. He had just informed Primus Lestrange about their next meeting. Lestrange would see to it that the others were informed. Those meetings slowly grew into an inconvenience. Riddle had started this little group all those years ago to have someone to practice the Dark Arts with; or rather on. But today he really didn't need practice anymore. So maybe it was time to disband the group? On the other hand those meetings were an excellent recruiting ground. He could sway all those stupid little pureblood wizards to his cause. The heirs to a few rich and influential pureblood families were already loyal to him. They were rather useful to do the dirty work for him, too. No, he had to maintain those meetings. The benefits were just too big to ignore. So he had to go through those meetings however dull they were. Maybe he could crucio someone on the next, that would be fun.

He rounded a corner on his way to the classroom as a girl bumped into him. Couldn't those imbeciles look where they were going?

He put on his charming smile. No one could resist him then and said, "Are you alright? I didn't hurt you, did I?"

The girl, a Ravenclaw, blushed deeply. She was rather pretty. Riddle thought he knew her somehow. Her name was something like Denvin... or Dunhill. He wasn't sure. And really, he didn't care.

She answered in a jumpy high voice, "No, I'm alright. It was my mistake."

Yes, it was your damn mistake. I would so like to curse her now.

Riddle was about to continue his way to the classroom as she asked, "Tom, I wanted to ask you if you are okay. After that new girl attacked you so insidiously."

Tom? Who gave her the right to call him Tom? He could feel a burning hate rise in him. He looked back at her. She shied away a little. Damn, his hate must have shown in his face. He fixed that and smiled at her again. But why did she dare call him 'Tom'? Now that he looked closer, she was rather familiar. Where was that again? Riddle pondered. Ah, yes! He could remember now. He had shagged her. That was it. He nearly sniggered at that. Too easy. Those girls were just too easy to get. But still it didn't give her the right to call him 'Tom'.

He answered in his sweetest voice, "Don't worry. I wasn't hurt that bad. Just a few cuts."

At that the girl muttered something indignantly like "How could she!" He didn't know. He wasn't really listening.

Then she said, "Is it true? Did she attack you because you turned her down?"

At that Riddle nearly laughed out. Oh, his little rumour was spreading very nicely. But he answered in a hesitant voice, "I'm sure that's not related."
She smiled at him in a way she definitely considered to be flirtatious but was just ridiculous, "You are just too nice, Tom."

He really had to go now or he risked breaking down and laughing insanely. "I have to go to my class now. It was nice talking with you."

And with that he walked away from the deluded girl.

His rumour had worked nicely. DeCerto was now shunned from the whole school. He had quite enjoyed creating that little attack on her social life. But still that girl was a mystery. Her dueling abilities had been a surprise. He had to find out more about her. Maybe she would join his group after all. She would definitely be a powerful follower. But somehow he doubted he could persuade her to join. She had seemed to hate him from the very first day.

At the very least she distracted him from his other problem. Where he now seemed to be in a dead-end. But he would definitely use the ring…

He arrived at his classroom. DeCerto was already sitting at their table. Riddle could see the other students glaring at her. DeCerto was reading in her charms book and seemed to be rather unconcerned by the hostility of the rest of the class. Riddle felt a bit irritated by that. He walked over to his place and sat down.

"DeCerto," he greeted her.

"Riddle," she said blasé, never looking up from her book.

That infuriated him even more. Why was that girl so insistent on ignoring him? And why did he care anyway? But he did.

"So, how was your day?" he asked in a sugar-coated voice. Well, how good could your day have been? With the whole school hating you?

He could see the knuckles on her hand holding the book turning white. She looked up at him and her eyes were burning with anger. So, she probably surmised that it was him who started that rumour. He smirked at her.

She answered him in an equally sweet voice that didn't quite match her face right now, "So, how are your cuts?"

That insufferable bitch! How could she talk to him like that? He leaned in to her and whispered so that only she could hear, "How do you know all those spells, DeCerto? Tell me!"

His last two words had been spoken with so much force and authority that Hermione felt cold shivers running down her spine. But she wasn't going to tell him. So she whispered as softly as he had spoken,

"Well, how do you know all the spells?"

His grey eyes were boring into her again, shining with anger, "Sooner or later I'm going to find out anyway. Why do you have to make it so difficult for the both of us?"

That prick! Hermione was really pissed now. Why did he have to be such an asshole? And why, oh why, was she the only one to see him for what he was – evil?

And now that he was so close again she could see this impossible colour of his eyes again. They were a pure grey with small dots of dark blue around the pupil. His face was well-proportioned and his dark hair fell elegantly into his eyes. He was so handsome. And that pissed Hermione off even more. How could he say those things and look like that? In her time, Lord Voldemort had at least had the decency to look just as evil as his soul was.

Hermione shook her head in disbelief, "Pff, like I'm going to tell you anything."

There it was again. How she addressed him and how she looked at him. There was hate in her eyes, but with the hate Riddle could live. No, there was also a great amount of contempt. Like he was something way beneath her. The worst of it though was this glint of pity he could sometimes see when she spoke to him.

He narrowed his eyes at her and hissed, "There will come a time where you will beg me on your knees to let you tell me your pathetic secrets."

At that DeCerto chuckled. How could she laugh after such a declaration of war? Then she leaned into him. He tensed as he could feel her hand brush his arm.

She whispered in his ear emphasizing each word, "In your dreams."

Before Riddle had a chance for a retort the door to the classroom opened and Professor Merrythought stepped in. Hermione leaned back in her chair and glanced sideways at Riddle. He still looked at her. His face was a blank like always but somehow Hermione could interpret the many little nuances in his face. Underneath his emotionless mask Hermione saw disbelief and anger. And to her surprise he looked a little bit flustered. Lord Voldemort was flustered? By her? She had the irresistible urge to laugh out loud but instead smiled at him sweetly. That seemed to infuriate him even more she noticed satisfied.

All those emotions he was trying to hide told Hermione something about Tom Riddle. He was not Lord Voldemort yet. At least not the Lord Voldemort from her time. He had been cruel and ruthless. He knew no mercy and would never have looked flustered in any situation. Hermione knew Riddle was by far no nice and normal boy. He had already killed at least four people. But he was not like the Voldemort of her time. That Voldemort had had no emotions. Not because he was better in hiding them but because he simply didn't have emotions like any normal human being. Hermione wondered what had happened during those fifty years that had changed Riddle so much. She just knew that somewhere during the progress he would lose his humanity. How terrible! she thought as an inexplicable sadness took hold of her.

Professor Merrythought brought her out of her musings as she said in her kind voice, "Now, class, last time we have dealt with the Procella charm to create wind. Let's move on to the other weather charms"

Professor Merrythought beamed at the class. She clearly enjoyed teaching very much. Hermione remembered Professor Merrythought from her time. She had been one of the examiners of her OWL exams. In her time Merrythought had been ancient. Hermione had been beyond nervous through her OWLs but she remembered how Merrythought had helped her calm down. Hermione liked her now even more.

"Now, who can tell me what the other weather charms are?" the professor asked.

Hermione saw Riddle raise his hand beside her. She quickly scanned the classroom. He was obviously the only one who did know the other weather charms. Well, aside from her of course. Hermione decided to raise her hand too. Now that Riddle seemed to have an interest in her anyway there was no need for her to hide her knowledge.
Merrythought smiled at the both of them fondly and said, "Yes, Ms DeCerto. Can you name another weather charm?"

"Yes, professor. Aside from the Wind charm there are four other weather charms. The first is the Pluvia Charm with which it is possible to create rain. The second is the Snow charm, though the incantation is the same as in the Pluvia charm but with slightly different wand movements. The third is the Caligo charm. It creates a thick fog around the caster. The last is the Solismico charm, the Sunshine charm. It does not actually create sunshine but it is the counter curse to the other weather charms"

After that little speech Hermione could see Professor Merrythought's smile growing even wider, Riddle scowled at her and the rest of the class threw her evil glares. But Hermione really didn't care what the others were thinking and smiled back at the professor, who said,

"Very good, Ms DeCerto. Those are indeed all the weather charms. Take 10 points for Gryffindor."

She turned to the whole class and continued, "Today we will be practicing the Snow charm. It is pretty easy to perform after you know how to use the Rain charm. The only differences, as Ms DeCerto correctly explained, are the wand movements."

Then Merrythought droned on about how that charm was invented, how it could be used and showed them the correct wand movements. Hermione wasn't paying much attention as she already knew how to perform all the weather charms. The only remotely useful of them was the charm to create fog. It could be used to hide in it. Unfortunately the counter charm was as easy to perform as the Fog charm itself. So it wasn't very safe to use it while sneaking over enemy territory.

After some time of daydreaming Hermione heard the professor say, "Now, I want you to practice the Snow charm. And don't forget the incantation is Pluvis."

Hermione heard the familiar rustling of paper and scraping of chairs that usually followed such a statement. A soft murmur broke out in the classroom. Merrythought started to walk between the students and help whoever had problems with the charm. Hermione watched the other students trying their luck with the Snow charm. Some of them had managed to produce sleet falling down around them, wetting all their school things. The only one how managed something that actually looked like real snow was Lupin. Small snowflakes were raining down on his table. Merrythought had noticed and awarded him 5 points. Hermione smiled at him. He smiled back and waved at her. Hermione could see that Marc Longbottom who was sitting beside him still ignored her. It really depressed her that he wouldn't even look at her anymore.

"So, what school did you attend in France, DeCerto?" She heard Riddle beside her ask innocently.

Subtle, Riddle. Subtle! She thought as she turned to him with one eyebrow raised.

"Shh, I'm trying to learn here," Hermione smiled at him. Then she waved her wand as she thought, Pluvis!

White fluffy snowflakes were beginning to fall softly on Riddle's black hair. Before he could curse Hermione in turn Prof Merrythought ended the class.

"I want you two write a one foot essay on the weather spells. To be handed in next week."

Hermione hastily got up from her seat and left the classroom. She didn't want to argue with Riddle anymore.

Riddle waved his wand lazily and the snow falling down on him stopped. That girl was really something else. He stared after her as she left the classroom. He got up, took his bag and left the room. She was still contradicting him. Even after all the things he had said and done. No one of the other students had ever dared to talk to him like that. And certainly no girl at that. But here she was, standing up to him. He had seen the fire in her eyes. That just didn't work. He was fascinated by her fire but at the same time he desperately needed to extinguish it. He needed her to look at him with the same fear and awe like everyone else did. But he felt like he would lose something if DeCerto changed into one of the others. Around the next corner of the corridor he heard voices. He stopped to listen in to the conversation.

"-to have the audacity to sit beside him after all you've done, DeCerto."

Riddle recognized the voice. It belonged to Susan Yaxley a Slytherin sixth year. He didn't like her. She was always trying and failing to seduce him. Now she seemed to be talking to DeCerto, and continued in a sharp, mean voice,

"It would have been better if you had stayed in France, you bitch. Maybe then Grindelwald would have killed you."

Riddle raised his eyebrows at that. There was a strange feeling in his stomach at the thought of DeCerto being killed by Grindelwald.

"Yes… maybe that would have been better," DeCerto answered softly and it sounded more like she was talking to herself. Then he could hear her walk away.

Riddle was surprised by the severity in her voice.

What was that? Never before had he heard this tone in DeCerto's voice. Her voice was normally full of emotions. The predominating emotion was hate if she talked with him. But that answer she gave Yaxley had just been void of anything.

Stupid cow! Hermione walked to Professor Legifer's office. It was five minutes to six and Hermione had to go to her detention with the professor. A detention for being a little bit messy. Hermione was very infuriated. Whatever would come next? A detention for having the wrong hair colour? As she arrived at the office she knocked a little bit harder on the wooden door than was necessary.

"Come in!" Hermione's anger level rose as she heard Legifer's cold voice.

She opened the door and stepped inside the office. Legifer was sitting at her desk where she had been grading some essays. Hermione nearly shook her head.

"Ah, Ms DeCerto," Legifer smiled at her cruelly. "Five points from Gryffindor."

Hermione stared at her incredulously. "Why?"

Legifer indicated to the clock hanging on a wall. "You are late."

The clock showed one minute past six. Hermione felt her anger boiling over but she managed to keep her mouth shut. For the first time ever she could comprehend how Harry must have felt about Snape. Legifer still smiled at her smugly.

"So, Ms DeCerto as you so obviously don't know what cleanliness is I want you to read through those essays." Here she gestured towards a huge pile of parchment lying on the desk before her.
"They are from my first year students. I think you can learn a lot from them," Legifer elaborated in her piercing voice as she took one of the essays in her hand and held it up so Hermione was able to read its title.

_The chores of a house witch_? Hermione felt like she would snap any minute but tried to not curse the foul woman sitting in front of her.

"Yes, professor," she managed to say in a rather pressed voice.

She stepped forward and accepted the essays from Legifer who smirked at her. Then Hermione sat down on the chair in front of Legifer's desk and looked furiously down at the pile of parchment in her hand. She had never thought that the day would come were she wanted to burn a pile of homework. But here it was. Hermione had to resist the urge to look around in Legifer's office for a fireplace. Instead she took the first essay from the pile. It was from a Malissa Stanson, a Ravenclaw first year, Hermione read. She continued to read what Malissa had written in her spidery writing:

'It is the responsibility of every good wife to keep order in her home. So her husband can relax when he comes home from his work. A good wife should also prepare a meal so that her husband can have something healthy for dinner. The good wife should wait for her husband and welcome him home after his long day in the office.'

Hermione could almost physically feel the indignation taking a hold of her. What was that? She couldn't believe what she had to read here. She was suddenly so glad that she had been brought up in the eighties and nineties. It seemed here in the forties the emancipation of women had still a long way to go. The worst of all was that these innocent girls, like Malissa Stanson, had to write nonsense like that. Maybe they even came to believe it.

"Keep reading, Ms DeCerto!" Hermione nearly jumped as Legifer hissed at her. "I can see when you stop."

Hermione glanced at her professor. Legifer still sat behind her desk grading some essays. She didn't look at Hermione but Hermione could still see the smug smile on the professor's face. Hermione had to fight to not lose her composure. She balled her hands into fists, nearly crumbling Malissa's essay.

"Yes, professor," she answered mechanically and was surprised herself at how unemotional her voice sounded.

Hermione left Legifer's office more than three hours later. She couldn't believe that foul hag had kept her that long. She could have used that time for something useful. Like going through the library for books on time travel. Even sitting on a chair and staring at the wall would have been more productive than that stupid detention. But now it was nearly ten already. The library was closed by now. Hermione decided to go back to her dorm, let her room mates insult her a little, as they obviously so liked to do, and then try to get some sleep and forget this day had ever happened. As Hermione rounded the next corner she saw a boy walking in her direction. When he came closer she recognized him as Ledo Avery, a seventh year and the Slytherin Quidditch captain. And of course member of Riddle's little Death Eater group. She groaned at that.

Well, it could have been worse. Could have been Riddle.

Avery seemed to recognize her too because he had started to smirk at her darkly.

_Great!_ Hermione ignored him and tried to walk by him. But he suddenly blocked her way.

"If it isn't little Ms DeCerto!" he said in an oily voice. "What are you doing this late in a dark Hermione didn't like that disturbing glint in his eyes as they glided appreciatively over her body.

"I don't see that being of your concern," she answered in a steady voice but her right hand tensed. She just needed to flick her wrist and her wand would fly in her hand.

"Aw, DeCerto, why so dismissive?" Avery took a step nearer to Hermione. "I know you must feel disappointed that Riddle turned you down. But I'm sure I could comfort you very well."

Hermione was disgusted as he winked at her lasciviously. "I don't think so. And now go out of my way!"

To her surprise he really stepped away. But as Hermione passed him she felt his hand closing around her left wrist. She hissed in pain as he wrenched her back. She collided with his chest.

"Ah, that's much better," he purred in her ear as he entangled his muscled arms around her waist.

Hermione wriggled and tried to get away from him but he held her firmly. "Let me go!" she yelled at him indignantly.

But he just smirked at her. Now, Hermione had had enough. First Legifer's stupidity and now this horny ruffian. She flicked her wrist and felt her wand reassuringly land in her hand.

"I think that's enough, Avery!" Hermione heard a quiet voice say just as she was about to hex Avery to kingdom come.

Riddle had just left the library after having browsed the books in the restricted section. For the tenth time! He just couldn't find the information he needed. He couldn't believe that he was the first one to ever have this idea. Wasn't that the obvious next step one had to make? Apparently no-one ever had done that. Or they were smart enough not to write it down. He sighed and fiddled with the golden ring on his right hand. Maybe it was just Hogwarts' policy of banning any book that was remotely useful. If the information wasn't to be found in a book then maybe he should try other sources. Who would know? Dumbledore surely knew something.

Yeah, that would work. He rolled his eyes. All he had to do was knock at Dumbledore's door and ask him nicely.

How about McGray? No, that wouldn't work either. McGray was a new teacher. He wasn't yet under Riddle's charm. Riddle doubted that he knew anything anyway. McGray was a disturbingly 'good guy'.

Then maybe Slughorn? Yes, that was better. Slughorn was a sneaky little bastard but he knew a great deal about the Dark Arts. More than he let normally show. But Riddle would have to plan his proceeding very cautiously. What he wanted to know was a sensitive subject after all. He didn't want to make Slughorn suspicious of him.

As he walked down the corridor on his way back to the Slytherin dungeons he heard an angry voice, "I don't think so. And now go out of my way!"

That was DeCerto! He sneaked nearer to hear some more. He heard some footsteps and then a rustling. The noises were coming from another corridor. He stepped cautiously nearer, always remaining in the shadows. A little bit ahead he saw DeCerto. With a jolt he realized that someone was embracing her. Who was that? He narrowed his eyes.

"Ah, that's much better."

Riddle recognized the boy now. That was Avery. DeCerto was now trying to get away from Avery. Obviously that embrace wasn't a mutual matter, Riddle realized relieved. Wait, why did he care anyway? He just turned to walk away as he heard DeCerto yell in an angry voice,

"Let me go!"

He looked back and saw how DeCerto flicked her wrist and her wand landed in her hand. Avery obviously hadn't noticed as he continued to hold her. A sinister smile began to form on Riddle's face. He would really enjoy seeing DeCerto curse that idiot. Yes, or he could 'save' her and then try to get some information out of her.

He stepped out of the shadow and said, "I think that's enough, Avery!"

Hermione looked over Avery's shoulder and saw Riddle standing a few metres away in the corridor. How great! Now it was not only Avery but also Riddle she had to deal with. Right now, she would prefer to battle a mountain troll. Avery had in the mean time let go of her and stepped a few paces away from her as he turned towards his leader. Riddle strolled towards them and stopped in front of Avery. Avery was a few inches taller than Riddle but right now he somewhat cowered before the other. It was clear who was in command here.

As Riddle spoke his voice was quite but deathly cold. "Avery, I think it would be a good idea for you to go back to the dungeons."

"But I-"

"Now!" Riddle said, his voice never rising in volume but it was clear he would not allow any contradiction here.

Avery winced at that and nodded. Hermione was surprised he didn't say 'Yes, Master!' before he turned and walked away. She shook her head and turned to continue her way back to the Gryffindor common room.

"Aren't you going to thank me, DeCerto?" She heard Riddle's smug voice behind her. He obviously had abandoned the deathly touch to his voice and was now teasing her again.

Hermione turned her head around and looked at him. He was standing in the corridor, looking as attractive as always and smirked at her. His eyes shining with amusement.

Hermione answered, "I don't see why. For all you knew I could have been snogging Avery."

She then continued to walk away from him. She heard him chuckle and then he fell in step beside her.

"Feisty, DeCerto. What got you so angry? And by the way your 'Let me go!' didn't sound like you enjoyed Avery's affection very much."

Hermione snorted at that. "Oh, and you felt the inexplicable need to save me or what? Let me tell you one thing: I can look after myself!"

Riddle chuckled again. He really began to infuriate Hermione. "I know that. I do remember our duel after all." He looked at her before he continued conversationally, "Just tell me, that curse you used, the rope, what is it called? I never heard of it."

"Course you didn't. That curse was invented in 1974. But Hermione enjoyed knowing more than Riddle about magic. She realized they had nearly arrived at the entry to the common room.

"I don't think I'm going to tell you, Riddle. Don't want you to use it on innocent people."

Riddle abruptly stopped and as Hermione turned to look at him he grabbed her arms and pushed her against the wall. She looked up at him shocked. His look had now a predatory air around it. Riddle let go of her and placed his hands on either side of her head on the wall, trapping her effectively. Hermione felt her heart beating very quickly now. She really didn't want him so near her. It was unsettling. He was again emitting that raw magical energy. It surrounded her and breached her body painfully. She looked up at him, her eyes widened.

"W… What are you doing?"

He smirked down at her. He enjoyed seeing her so afraid of him, Hermione could tell. His eyes were assessing her. She shuddered at their intensity.

"Why are you so hostile towards me?" he whispered in her ear now. "What is it you are hiding, Hermione DeCerto?"

Hermione gulped. He couldn't know anything. That wasn't possible. But he obviously guessed that there was something strange about her.

"Not good!"

Hermione had planned to keep a low profile at Hogwarts. And now just a mere week after arriving she had the Dark Lord on her tracks.

She looked away from him and said, "I… I don't know what you are talking about."

Riddle chuckled at that. He moved closer to her. His chest was now nearly brushing her. Then he took her chin with one hand and forced her face to look up at him again. Hermione knew her eyes were wide with fear now but she couldn't help it. Riddle was smirking down at her darkly.

"DeCerto," his soft voice was now compelling. "There is no use fighting me. You can only lose."

His eyes were boring into her with such intensity that Hermione was feeling faint. His warm hand was still holding her chin softly in place. Hermione was terrified. She was trapped and she wouldn't be able to use her wand. Riddle was not as stupid as Avery. He would notice if she tried anything. She just wanted to get away from him. This commanding aura he was radiating was just disturbing. She needed to get away.

"Please, let me go," she whispered shakily.

His smug smile widened at her plea and her display of fear. But surprisingly he did let her go and stepped away from her. Hermione breathed out, relieved. Riddle smiled at her disheveled form contently and said,

"Just don't forget who is in command here."

And with that he turned and with a swish of his black robes he was gone.

Hermione leaned on the wall for support and tried to even her breathing. Sometimes in the classroom or the Great Hall it was easy to forget who Tom Riddle really was. But right now she had been dealing with Lord Voldemort. Her hands shook terribly and she felt slightly sick. He was so damn frightening it was unsettling.

She needed some time to calm down enough to be able to enter the Gryffindor common room. The warmth and chatter in the room comforted her a little bit. She loved the red and gold colours of the common room now even more. With them she felt at home. In a far corner she saw Lupin, Weasley and Longbottom. Weasley had obviously seen her entering as he was waving her over. Hermione hesitated because Longbottom was sitting with them. But Lupin was smiling at her, so she decided to walk over to them. She sat down on the sofa beside Weasley.

"Hi," she said timidly, not looking at Longbottom.

"Hello, Hermione," Lupin said while he still smiled at her. Hermione was remembered of Remus Lupin now even more by his calm manner.

"Hey, Mione." Weasley grinned at her, "You don't mind if I call you Mione, do you?"

"No, not at all." Hermione smiled at him.

Lupin cleared his throat and said while glancing at Longbottom. "I think someone has to say something?"

Hermione looked confused from Lupin to Longbottom. Longbottom was fiddling around with the quill in his hand while staring guiltily at the ground. Lupin nudged him softly in his side.

Longbottom looked up and faced Hermione.

Then he said awkwardly, "I'm sorry, Hermione."

Hermione frowned at him, still confused.

"Lupin and Weasley told me," Longbottom continued contritely. "That you never asked Riddle out. And that everything is a lie. I'm sorry I believed it." Longbottom looked at her anxiously.

Hermione understood now. He was apologizing for being such an idiot lately. She smiled at him.

"Its okay, Marc. You are not the only one who believed those lies."

Hermione felt relieved that Longbottom spoke to her again. She felt isolated enough in this time period without everyone hating her.

"Apology accepted. But you owe me now a nice butterbeer in the Three Broomsticks," she added teasingly.

The three boys laughed at that relieved. They seemed to be as happy about the reconciliation as Hermione was.

"So, now everything's all right again?" Weasley asked, "Because your stupidity was slowly getting to me," he said to Longbottom who laughed again.

"Yeah, I think so," Longbottom answered happily looking at Hermione.

Hermione was very glad to be on speaking terms with him again. Somehow those three were the only friends she had in this time. And they reminded her so much of Harry and Ron. They seemed like a lifeline connecting her with her lost friends.
"Yes, everything's alright." She smiled.

The four of them sat in the common room, joking and laughing. Hermione enjoyed that intimacy very much. It felt like the old times when she had been sitting in this very room talking with Harry and Ron. In a time before everything had gone bad. A time were she had been completely happy. It seemed like an eternity lay between those happy times and now. But Hermione enjoyed it to pretend, even if it was only for a short time, to be that happy Hermione again.

It was nearly midnight as she stepped in the dormitory. The other girls were all lying in their beds asleep. Hermione preferred them that way. She took her pyjama and went to the bathroom. After changing and brushing her teeth she gladly lay down on her soft bed. She closed the red curtains around her finding solace in the solitude.

The old Hermione she had been playing down in the common room, she wondered when she had died. Was it after Sirius' death? That had been a heavy blow not only on Harry but on her too. Sirius had been the first victim in the war she had personally known. Diggory and Crouch Sr. had both died before him but Hermione had never even spoken to them. Their deaths had been shocking but they had been dampened by the anonymity.

But even after Sirius had died there had still been hope in her. This burning spark in her hadn't yet gone out.

Then Dumbledore had died and after him so many more. But she had always been on the move then. She had always been fighting. There never had been the time to dwell in those deaths. Maybe that change in her had been more of a process. And at its end stood this bitter and hardened Hermione. She felt sad at that thought but she also knew that this process was irreversible. There just was no way for her to go back to her other innocent self.

Her thoughts went back to Voldemort. He was the reason for all the misery in her life. All the suffering she had had to endure. And now she had to face him again. He was still as frightening and dangerous as ever before. The coldness and ruthlessness wasn't yet present but Hermione had seen a glimpse of his darkness today. And she didn't want to face it again. She was tired. She had been fighting for so long now and had lost everything on the way. I need to go back home even if I'll be lonely there. I can't bear to stay here.

Hermione walked down a lane. She had her hood pulled down deep in her face. She was alone in the middle of the night walking down this backstreet in London. She was searching for a Horcrux and she didn't even know what it looked like. A creation of Ravenclaw. But what was it exactly? And more importantly she didn't know where he had hid it. His old orphanage was only a guess. And a poor one at that. Hermione didn't believe it herself. She couldn't see him hiding something so important in a place he despised so much. But Harry and Ron had agreed with her not to take anything for granted. So she had been checking the place. She had convinced Harry and Ron that if she went alone the possibility of her being caught would be lower. Alone she was inconspicuous. But her excursion had been in vain. The orphanage didn't exist anymore. And Hermione hadn't found any Horcrux in the near vicinity. It was time to go back to the tent and tell Harry and Ron that she hadn't been successful. It was discouraging.

Suddenly she heard an inhuman scream somewhere down a dark intersection. It made the hair on the back of her neck stand. A burst of insane laughter followed the scream. Hermione's blood run cold as she stared in the direction the voices were coming from but she couldn't see anything in the dark. The laughter died down and then someone whispered an incantation before Hermione heard the soft pop of a disapparation. She gasped as she saw the disgustingly familiar green sign taking shape in the nightly air. A snake was coiling around a skull. Hermione sneaked into the dark alley.
Maybe she could help? Deep down, she knew that hope was unfounded.

As she stepped closer to the gleaming green sign she came upon an abominable scene. There, lying on the grimy ground was a mangled body. Hermione saw dark-blond long hair. The body had belonged to a woman. She wore muggle clothing. Everything else was barely recognizable as human. Her limbs were broken. Bone was protruding the skin on several places. A pool of blood was building under her. Her right side was a bloody mass. Having been smashed by something into a pulp. Bowels were sprawled on the pave stones. All the while the moonlight illuminated the scene serenely diving it in an otherworldly sheen.

Hermione gagged and stumbled back. Then she turned and ran away. Away from the blood, from death and it's sickening smell. Gulping in large breaths of the cold air. But the feeling of being stained never left her. And somehow Hermione knew it would never leave her ever again…
Hermione sat in the library. It was midday now. Her Herbology class had just ended. As she didn't feel very hungry she had decided to skip lunch in favour of another library session. Herbology had been refreshingly quite. At least nobody had tried to curse her. Ever since that little rumour about her and Riddle had started people were hexing her wherever she went. It was slowly getting a bother. Even with her war-hardened reflexes a few curses had breached her defences. As a result she was limping around since that leglock jinx had caught her after breakfast. So Herbology had been quite a rest for her. Her Gryffindor housemates had been too distracted by picking the needles off a Spanish curse-pine. And though the Hufflepuff students were better at Herbology they obviously didn't like Riddle as much as the rest did because they hadn't cursed her either. Or they just didn't revert to using hexes to get to her. Because quite honestly, they hadn't been any nicer than the other houses. For example other than the teacher, Professor Sato, no one had talked with her during class. But what did she care if they were talking to her or not? She didn't need them. She even preferred it that way. She would be leaving here anyway so why bother with the people here?

That was getting her back to the problem at hand: returning to her time.Regardless of how huge this library was there seemed to be no book with the information she needed. Hermione had never thought it possible but she started to hate the library. She had spent every free minute she could spare in the library but so far she hadn't found anything remotely helpful. There were so many books about time travel she couldn't believe they were all useless. But they were. She had even read some of them twice. But that didn't improve their contents. So she had decided to find some information on the Deathly Hallows. But to her horror those books were even worse than the time travel books. The tale of the Deathly Hallows was a myth. And that was what the books about them were like: Full of fairy tales. Luna would have liked them very much.

The information she could gather from all that rubbish was mostly on how to find the Hallows. It was just that Hermione didn't need to find them. She already knew were exactly they were. The Elder Wand was with Grindelwald, the Potter family was in possession of the Invisibility Cloak and the Resurrection Stone was part of the Gaunt's ring that was currently worn by Riddle.

What she needed was not an advice on how to find the Hallows. She needed information on the powers of the Elder Wand. And though the Elder Wand was the Hallow she could find most of the information on, no book mentioned it's time traveling ability. She hadn't expected to stumble over a step-by-step instruction on how to activate the Elder Wand's time travel mode but she had hoped to at least find some hint. But there was just nothing. Not on the Hallows and neither on other time travel methods. She was in a dead-end here. But how to proceed now? The library was obviously no use. She needed someone who knew a great deal about magic, about the essence of magic.

She could still go to the Ministry, she mused. Talk with someone from the Department of Mysteries. But just at the thought of trusting the Ministry she felt slightly nauseous.

Then who else? There was one she had always been able to go to ask for help. Until his death that is. Dumbledore! He was the most powerful wizard alive. Hermione longed to tell him everything. He had always been able to sort out all problems. Or so it had seemed. But no, Hermione would not, could not ask him for help. She was in this alone. Dumbledore didn't know her in this time, why would he trust her? And did she trust him? Trust him to do what was best for her?

_Dumbledore and the Deathly Hallows…_

Hermione knew at some point in time he had been obsessed with them. Finding them and use the stone with the ability to bring back the dead. So he probably had researched them. When was that?
Hermione leaned back in her chair at the hindmost table in the library. Maybe she was onto something here. She skimmed her fingers along the spine of the last book she had read.

She just had to slip into his office and then maybe, if she was lucky, Dumbledore had been more successful with his research than she had been.

Hermione checked her watch. A quarter to one. She had to go to her next class now, Arithmancy. Another class she liked, just like Herbology. First of all no Slytherins and that meant no Riddle. And there were aside from her only Ravenclaws in Arithmancy. And only boys at that. So she wouldn't have to deal with vindictive Riddle fan-girls there. Hermione strolled to the exit of the library.

"Ms DeCerto you really shouldn't always spend your precious breaks reading old books," Ms Peters the librarian chided her gently. She looked at Hermione concerned.

"You are right, Ms Peters," Hermione smiled at her. "But there is so much to do. I have still to adjust to Hogwarts' curriculum."

"I see. But you really shouldn't overexert yourself. There are still other things besides study, hm? Don't forget to enjoy life." Ms Peters winked at her.

Hermione smiled again. "I won't forget. Don't worry."

With that she left the library.

Don't forget to enjoy life. Don't forget to enjoy life. Enjoy life!

How?

At some point in time, way back when she still had been the innocent Hermione, she had known. Not anymore. No, there were just the missions. Get the Horcruxes…kill Voldemort… get back to your time…

---

Riddle sat on the floor leaning his back on the shelf full of books behind him. He normally wouldn't assume such an undignified position but at the moment he didn't care. And as it was lunch time now it wasn't very likely for any students to stumble upon him. He really didn't know why he still tried though. None of those books were any help. Slughorn seemed to be the best idea now. He could ask him at their next meeting. He would have to handle the delicate matter with caution so Slughorn wouldn't get suspicious. But after all Slughorn was very fond of him. Riddle just had to use his charm and his powers of persuasion and Slughorn would tell him everything.

Riddle absentmindedly traced the beginning of the scar that marred his left forearm and ran up until it reached his upper arm. This scar was a constant reminder of what he was fighting against: weakness. Then after a while he stood up from his brooding place on the floor.

Even if Slughorn didn't know anything Riddle would still do it. There was just no way he could fail. He pretty much knew the original incantation, the procedure and the necessary items. At least for that the stupid library had been useful. Well, it had cost him nearly two years to gather the information but it had all been here hidden in the books of Hogwarts' library. Actually he shouldn't be surprised that maybe he really was the first to have the idea to create more than one. He was brilliant after all.

Riddle walked down an aisle as he heard a soft sigh coming somewhere from one of the tables. He frowned. Maybe he was not as alone as he had assumed. Then he peered over the books on the shelf at the table in a corner. He was surprised to see DeCerto sitting at one of the tables. She was bent over a large ancient looking book. She looked frustrated and apparently angry at the book she had been reading in.

Maybe too stupid to understand human written language?

No, Riddle knew since their duel that DeCerto wasn't stupid. And her performance in class was good too. Come to think of it her performance had improved lately. Had she needed some time to adapt to Hogwarts or had she been holding herself back before? Damn girl! There were so many things about her that didn't make sense. He needed to find out the truth about her. Her elusiveness was frustrating and annoying.

DeCerto leaned back in her chair she was obviously contemplating something. Maybe he should just go over there and force the truth out of her. Why not? No one was here, so no witnesses. He saw DeCerto checking her watch, a really silly looking wristwatch. Then she got up, waved her wand so that the books on her table flew back in their shelves and left the library.

Riddle left his hiding place behind the book shelf and strolled over to the table the Gryffindor girl had occupied just moments before. His fingers skimmed over the old wooden surface of the table as he passed it. He walked over to a book shelf someway behind the table. He had seen one of the discarded books flying that way. He scanned the shelf and sure enough there on the left side stood the old dusty tome DeCerto had been reading in. He reached for the book and pulled it from its place on the shelf. He flipped it over so he could read its title: Fables and Myths of Olden. He frowned and opened the book. The parchment was yellowed and fragile and the writing was bleached out and hard to read. He checked some of the chapters, The Apologue of the Weaver's Wife and the Dragon King, The lying Flower of Wisdom, The Mermaid's Bestowment for the poor Stable Boy.

What was that? A book of fairy tales? Why had DeCerto read it? She didn't strike him as the girl to read children's stories. He remembered her frustrated look as she had stared at this book. She had been searching for something. And that something was certainly not a nice bedtime story. Riddle closed the book again and looked at its brown leathery cover. No, there was definitely something more to this book. Riddle was brought out of his musing as his gaze fell on the big grandfather clock standing not far from him. This late already? He would be late for his next class. He hated to be late. Damn you, DeCerto! He hurriedly left the library but not without checking out the ancient brown book.

"Really, DeCerto! Can't you keep a little bit order in your things?"

Hermione woke up to the annoyingly nagging sound of Lucia's voice. She opened her eyes and saw Lucia kicking angrily at Hermione's trunk. The trunk's lid closed with a loud bang and Hermione was now wide awake. She sat up in her bed glaring at the other girl. In fact Hermione wasn't a sloppy person. No, she rather liked a neat and clean room herself but here she didn't put any effort into cleaning up her space of the dormitory. Maybe it was because Hermione knew it annoyed her room mates who were not very nice to her lately or it was some form of stupid mutiny against Legifer's inspections, Hermione didn't know.

"Why, I never knew it bothered you," she told Lucia in a sugar sweet voice.

The other girl glared at her sinister for a moment then turned and ignored Hermione completely. Hermione shrugged, then got up and made her way to the bathroom. As she closed the door she could hear Lucia whisper to Rose,
"Did you hear that? Really, who does she think she is?"

Hermione locked the door and walked over to the sink. She leaned down on it and stared at her reflection in the mirror. Her hair was bushier than ever, which she had never thought possible, and her face was rather pale. She sighed.

"A good morning to you too."

After washing up she took off the t-shirt she had been sleeping in to have a look at the cut on her left shoulder she had received during that legendary DADA class. She removed the bandage and cringed as she ripped off a little of the caked blood. The wound looked still raw and fresh even after one week. Apparently the potions and ointments Madam Dulan had used to heal it weren't working properly. Maybe the curse Riddle had used was preventing the wound to be healed by magical means.

That bastard!

Well, she would have to let it heal the natural way then. If she was right about the spell he had used then any attempts to heal it magically could make matters even worse. So Hermione wasn't planning to go back to the Hospital Wing and take that risk and she didn't need the help of Madam Dulan anyway. She knew perfectly well how to take care of an injury like that. Luckily Riddle hadn't caught her right arm. Hermione waved her wand and conjured white mull out of thin air. After another wave of her wand it wrapped itself tightly around her shoulder. She then dressed in her uniform and left the bathroom again. The others had already left for breakfast and hadn't felt the need to wait for her. No surprise there.

On her way to the Great Hall someone behind her flung the Bodybind Curse at her. But Hermione had been ready. She had cast the counter curse in no time. She turned and saw a group of Ravenclaw and Gryffindor fifth year girls hiding behind a corner. Really it was getting old. But she still couldn't get over it that even her own housemates chose to side with Riddle. He was the future Dark Lord for God's sake. Hermione shook her head and resumed her way to the Great Hall.

As she arrived there her eyes immediately fell on the Slytherin table. She saw Riddle sitting on his usual place holding a cup elegantly in one hand as he read in the Daily Prophet. He stopped reading the newspaper and looked at her. A smirk was forming on his face as he scrutinized her. She glared at him angrily then turned away and took a place at the Gryffindor table between Lupin and Longbottom.

"Morning, Hermione," Lupin greeted her.

"Morning," Hermione replied unenthusiastically as she reached for a jug of orange juice.

"Ready to face yet another day full of new interesting classes?" Longbottom asked while nudging her in the side.

Hermione scowled at him but didn't dignify his question with an answer.

"What's wrong?" Longbottom asked as he buttered his toast.

Hermione sighed. "Legifer."

"Oh." Longbottom patted her back understandingly. "Yeah, she is one evil witch."

Hermione couldn't help but laugh at his accurate description of her. "But you don't even have her in class!"
"True! I'm just lucky I'm a guy, huh?"

At that the owls were flying into the Great Hall to deliver the morning post. To Hermione's bewilderment two owls were landing in front of her.

"Oh, look you've got letters, Hermione," Weasley offered superfluously from across the table.

"Stating the obvious today, are we?" Lupin asked him.

Hermione took the letters from the two owls and offered them a little bit of her bacon. They took it, hooted friendly and then flew away. Hermione took the first letter and opened it,

Dear Ms DeCerto,

Your detention will take place today at 7 p.m. We will meet at the Front Gates. Please be prepared to spend some time outside.

Kindly,

Professor McGray

"What's it about?" Longbottom asked beside her.

"My detention with McGray," Hermione muttered.

She glanced at the Slytherin table and could see Riddle reading a letter too. So they were probably spending their detention together. How very comforting. Hermione reached for the second letter. The envelope was of green parchment. Hermione opened it.

Dear Ms DeCerto,

With this letter I would like to invite you to a little Club I have established some years back. Many of your school mates have already joined and I would be delighted if you would also join us. I do hope to get a positive answer in our next class on Monday.

Sincerely,

Professor H.E.F. Slughorn

An invitation to the Slug Club? Hermione was confused. Why did he invite her? She looked up at the teachers table. Slughorn was sitting there talking animatedly with Merrythought. As he saw her looking at him he smiled and waved at her. Why did he want her to join the Slug Club again? She had attacked his favourite student after all. Hermione knew that Slughorn was very fond of Riddle.

"Who wrote you?" Weasley asked from across the table.

"Really, must you two be so nosey?" Lupin chastised the two other boys.

"Its fine, Amarys," Hermione told Lupin. "It's a letter from Professor Slughorn. Apparently he's inviting me into some club of his."

"Oh, the Slug Club," Longbottom said excited.

"What?" Hermione acted ignorant as she wasn't supposed to know that name.

"It's a club Slughorn founded. All the students from well-known families or with a famous relative are members. I really wanna go too. I've heard the parties are great."

"Well-known families? Why did he invite me then?" Hermione asked.

"Well, he's also inviting bright students, isn't he?" Longbottom said.

"It's no wonder then you weren't invited," Weasley shot at Longbottom and then he turned to Hermione and said, "'Cause he's going to want you Hermione. You're brilliant. Just like Lupin, he's a member too."

Hermione looked at Lupin. "Really?"

"Yeah," he answered humbly.

"So, you think I should join too?" Hermione asked, wondering if she had another choice without making herself suspicious.

"Sure!"

"Why not?"

"I don't see why you shouldn't, Hermione"

---

Hermione stepped into the Household Charms and Spells classroom and made her way to her table. She tried to ignore the evil glares the other students were throwing at her. Hermione was increasingly irritated by their antics. She really wanted to curse those stupid girls – with the Cruciatus Curse and then I'll laugh insanely and become the next Dark Lady.

She really needed to find a way back home or one of these days she would burst from all the accumulated sarcasm. She sat down on her seat beside Lucia and Rose, who were edging away from her.

"It's not like I've got the plague."

Hermione still thought that they shouldn't ostracize her for hexing Riddle, they should be handing her a medal. Her already gloomy thoughts weren't brightened by her least favourite teacher entering the classroom.

"Good morning class!" Legifer's sharp voice greeted them.

Today she wore another of her impossibly flawless outfits, a neat black skirt and a white blouse underneath her outer black robes. Her black hair was put up in a strict and perfect hairdo. All this perfectness made Hermione rather dizzy.

"Today we won't have a practical lesson," Legifer declared. No-one dared to groan at that as they would have done in their other classes. "It will be a lesson about the duties and the behaviour that are expected from house witches."

Hermione felt a headache starting in her temple. Maybe she should have just stayed in bed and accepted the detention for skipping class like a man… or like a house witch. She chuckled at that thought. Legifer glared at her coldly but fortunately didn't say anything.

For the next hour and a half Hermione tried to daydream the time away. Sometimes she really had to work to blind out Legifer's persistent, shrill voice and all the offensive things she lectured about.
"Good luck, Hermione!" Weasley waved after her as she left the Gryffindor common room.

Hermione thought that she very well needed good luck as she was heading for her detention with McGray. Not that she was afraid of the professor. No, it was more the company that unsettled her. She was pretty sure to meet Tom Riddle standing in the Entrance Hall. And she was not to be disappointed, she noticed as she stepped down the last steps of the stairs. Riddle was leaning nonchalantly against the wall beside the front door. He had his arms folded before his chest and looked rather annoyed. He wore a thick black cloak and heavy boots. So he was prepared to spend some time outdoors as McGray had written. Angrily Hermione had again to admit how incredibly attractive he looked. She walked over to him but didn't acknowledge him in any way as she stood a few steps beside him. He glared at her but didn't say anything either. What the hell was he so annoyed about? Hermione scowled at him. After all it was entirely his fault that they had to do this detention. If he hadn't attacked her during DADA they never would have gotten into this mess. Hermione heard someone approaching and turned around. McGray was walking towards them.

"Good evening, Ms DeCerto, Mr Riddle," he greeted them. The professor wore a cloak similar to Riddle's but his was brown instead of black.

He took in their appearances. "I see you are prepared for a little bit of outside activity. Today we are going into the Forbidden Forest. Professor Sato asked me to retrieve a few fresh blood-acorn seedlings. You are going to accompany me."

Riddle nodded at that curtly. "Yes, professor."

Hermione wondered briefly why so many detentions at Hogwarts included strolls into the Forbidden Forest. It was forbidden for a reason after all.

But she also nodded and said politely, "Of course, sir."

"Good good. Now follow me!"

McGray then turned to the Entrance Door and opened it. He walked outside and Hermione and Riddle had no other option but to follow him. As Hermione stepped outside the cold autumn air assaulted her. She was glad she had bought the warm winter cloak back in Diagon Alley.

---

Riddle was pissed. He really had better things to do with his time than to waste it away with stupid detentions. He waited in the Entrance Hall for McGray. He still couldn't believe he had to do a detention. It was years ago since he had to spent his last detention. He was very cautious to never let the teachers catch him or his followers at open wrong-doings. Tom Riddle just didn't do detentions. But now he stood here.

And whose fault is this? he asked himself.

He looked up as he heard someone approach him. It was DeCerto. His level of annoyance rose a few notches. Her hair was ridiculously frizzy as usual. She wore a heavy black cloak, he noticed. Not very trendy but practical. He didn't know another girl in Hogwarts who would abandon their sense of fashion to these extents. He somehow liked how DeCerto didn't dress up like all the other girls. Those fashion dolls were rather tiresome. Riddle was suddenly annoyed that there was something he liked about DeCerto. He glared at her. And his glare grew even darker as she started to scowl at him in return. DeCerto was saved from him cursing her as McGray approached them. The professor greeted them and announced that they would be spending their detention in the Forbidden Forest. Riddle wasn’t that surprised as he had seen something like this coming. He glanced at DeCerto beside him and was surprised that she didn’t seem to be scared by the prospect of going into the Forest. But then again, thanks to him, no-one was talking to her anymore, so maybe she didn’t know about the Forbidden Forest.

Riddle followed the professor outside. As they walked towards the edge of the forest the professor said, "You will stay close to me when we are inside the forest, understood? No running off alone. It's dangerous in there."

Riddle suppressed a sarcastic smirk on his face. He glanced sideways at DeCerto. She walked beside him, still not looking scared. Riddle narrowed his eyes, maybe he should change that?

"Is it true that there are Centaurs inside the Forest?" he asked McGray innocently. Centaurs were widely feared by wizards, he knew that.

"Yes, right you are, Mr Riddle. There is indeed a colony of them living in the Forbidden Forest," McGray answered.

Riddle looked triumphantly at DeCerto. Surely now that stupid girl would be terrified to have to go inside that forest. He was surprised to find her still calmly walking beside him. She didn't seem to care about the Centaurs at all.

"How far do we have to go inside to find the seedlings?" Riddle now asked.

"I'm not sure. But not very far I think," McGray answered reassuringly and DeCerto smirked. Riddle cringed inwardly. Now it was looking as if he was afraid to go inside.

Hermione knew what Riddle was trying to do. He wanted to scare her. I'm not afraid of a little walk in the dark, scary forest, mister.

They had now reached the edge of the Forbidden Forest and McGray turned around to them.

"Now let me repeat: You are not to go off alone. It's easy to get lost in that forest."

It's easy to get eaten, you mean. Hermione didn't need another lecture about the dangers in the Forbidden Forest. Really she had faced worse. Much worse. McGray began to walk into the forest. Riddle and Hermione hot on his heels. Hermione took a deep breath. The air was damp and spicy and smelled of earth and decaying wood. The noise of their steps was now muffled by the many layers of old leaves on the ground. Hermione liked the forest. For the last two years she had practically lived in forests. Harry, Ron and her had preferred to put up their tent in isolated regions. It had been too dangerous for them to be seen near settlements so they had often apparated to remote places. There they had sometimes enjoyed the rare feeling of safety. Even if that feeling had been nothing more than an illusion, Hermione still liked the forest very much. They walked in silence for some time. McGray in front, Hermione in the middle and Riddle at the rear. Then Hermione saw McGray stoop down. He examined something on the ground.

"Look at that," he exclaimed and held up his hand.

Hermione saw that his fingertips were covered in something that looked like blood.

"I think the blood-acorn should be somewhere around here. Keep your eyes open."

The forest was especially thick here. The thicket seemed to be one impenetrable wall. But McGray began to fight his way through it. Hermione followed him and glanced back at Riddle. He seemed to be even more annoyed than at the beginning of this excursion.
Probably thinks it's beneath him to stumble through this mess. Hermione thought as she wormed her way through the thicket. After a few more steps she broke out of the coppice and ended up standing on a clearing. In the middle of the little clearing stood an impressive old tree. It was pitch-black and its trunk was at least a meter in diametre. Although it was just the middle of October there was not one leave on its many branches. It looked dead like the trees of late winter. Hermione could see in the moonlight that a viscid fluid was running down its black bark. She walked over to the tree where McGray was standing. Riddle who had arrived at the clearing was following behind her.

"That is really an impressive specimen," McGray said.

Hermione extended a hand to the tree and run it over its bark. She looked then at the palm of her hand which was now covered in something that looked like blood.

"Yes, professor, we're lucky to have found it," she said in a soft voice.

"Yes we are," McGray agreed as he rummaged through his bag.

He extracted two little bags and handed one each to Hermione and Riddle.

"Here, look around on the ground and collect the fallen acorns. Professor Sato will be very grateful if we can bring her a few. The bark of the blood-acorn is a main ingredient of the blood replenishing potion."

Hermione accepted the bag and saw Riddle reluctantly do the same. They then started to go over the area and picked up the fallen acorns. After a while Hermione had collected quite a lot of the tiny little nuts. She just stooped down to pick up another as she heard a soft thud. She looked up and saw that a threstral had landed on the clearing. It sniffed the air and assessed the three intruders of its territory with curiosity.

Threstrals were, in Hermione's opinion, no beautiful beings. They were built like horses but the reptilian touch evoked in any observer the feeling that something was not right with them. Their greenish skin was stretched over their body and made the threstrals look more like a skeleton than a living being.

Hermione watched the threstral which had just landed on the clearing folding its wings together. It was certainly no beauty but just like all threstrals it radiated a certain aura of dignity. Ever since Hermione had seen her first threstral she had liked them. She hadn't liked the circumstances which had led to her being able to see them. But the animals themselves were just fascinating.

"Watch out, Ms DeCerto! A threstral just landed a few steps in front of you," McGrey warned her.

Hermione looked behind her. A few metres away stood her professor. He obviously could see the threstral and had tried to warn her about the animal's presence. Of course he wouldn't know that she, too, was able to see it. Hermione glanced at Riddle and nearly jumped as she found him staring at her. She was pretty sure he would be able to see the animal too. After all he had killed his own father. So he had seen death and that enabled him to see the threstrals. But why was he staring at her? Hermione turned back to the animal and walked towards it.

"Ms DeCerto, stop. You are walking right in its direction!" McGrey warned her again.

Hermione turned her head around and said softly, "I know. I can see it."

The animal hadn't moved so far and it now stared at Hermione with its vigilant eyes. Hermione reached the creature in a few strides. It was a rather large threstral, Hermione observed.
"Hello, there!" Hermione said in a soft voice to the horse-like creature.

She extended her hand towards it. The threstral shied away a little bit but in the end its curiosity won and it sniffed at Hermione's hand. Hermione smiled at that. Gently she touched the creature's neck and petted it. The threstral's skin was smooth and warm to the touch. Hermione wondered how these gentle beings that appeared so full of life could be seen as omens of death in the wizarding world. The threstral bent its head down and nuded Hermione's left hand. Then it started to lick the palm of her hand. Hermione looked down and saw that her hand was still covered in the blood-like liquid from when she had touched the tree bark. The blood-acorn was obviously the reason for the threstral to be here. Hermione laughed softly as the slippery, forked tongue glided over her skin.

What a stupid detention! Riddle stalked around at the little clearing and searched for fallen acorns. Really if he had wanted to waste his time he could have had a chat with one of the insufferable girls who so enjoyed to idolize him. He glanced at DeCerto who was also collecting the acorns. Well, she certainly wasn't one of those girls. She might even be the only girl in Hogwarts who didn't have a crush on him. She was an odd one, he decided. What infuriated him was that she still wasn't in the least bit scared to be here in the Forbidden Forest. That would have been a little bit entertaining. But no, she was walking through the woods as if she did it every day. She even seemed to enjoy it. Riddle wished he would be alone with her now. Then he could just crucio her.

Riddle's gaze fell on something on the dark nightly sky. He narrowed his eyes at the black mass that seemed to be headed for the clearing. His hand went to his wand. After a few more seconds he could recognize the black mass as a threstral. His hand released his wand. Threstrals were no dangerous beings. Quite ugly, yes, but not dangerous. The creature landed on the clearing a few metres ahead of DeCerto. A smirk crept on Riddle's face. Maybe that detention was now getting a little bit more interesting. Only those would be able to see a threstral who had seen someone die. Riddle didn't know if DeCerto would be able to see the animal. She was coming from a war zone in France after all so it could very well be possible that she could see it. Either way, he was fairly sure she would not like the threstrals presence.

"Watch out, Ms DeCerto! A threstral just landed a few steps in front of you," Riddle heard McGray say.

DeCerto looked back at McGray. She didn't answer to his statement. But to Riddle's immense disappointment she didn't look in the least bit alarmed. She turned then back to the threstral and walked towards it. Obviously DeCerto was able to see it, Riddle concluded.

Riddle heard McGray again mumble needlessly a warning. And this time DeCerto answered him in a soft and calm voice, "I know. I can see it."

Riddle watched as DeCerto approached the threstral. Her steps weren't hesitant. On the contrary she seemed to be rather confident. As she reached the creature she offered the threstral her hand and then started to pet it. Riddle could see DeCerto's face. She was looking at the threstral serenely. Like she just met an old acquaintance after a long time. But Riddle could also see sadness shining through her eyes. He was surprised at how changed DeCerto now looked. He desperately wanted to know what had caused it that DeCerto was able to see the animal. Whom had she seen dying? Riddle could feel his anger building up in him again. He hated it not to know things. And so far DeCerto had been able to hide her secrets from him very well.

"Ms DeCerto!"

Hermione felt someone take a hold of her arm. She turned away from the threstral and saw that Professor McGray was standing right beside her. He now pulled her away from the creature.

"That's quite enough!" McGray said sternly.

He led her back to where Riddle still stood. Hermione glanced at Riddle and was not really surprised to find him glaring evilly at her.

"It's late. I think we should head back to the castle," McGray announced.

"Yes, professor," Riddle said in his most polite voice.

Hermione rolled her eyes at that. Did that prick ever stop to play the teacher's pet? Merlin, that was a little bit too much even for her. They walked back out of the forest in silence. Hermione felt a bit sad to leave the realm of the forest behind. She didn't want to go back to the castle. She did like Hogwarts but she hated its inhabitants currently.

As they reached the castle's huge wooden door McGray said, "Even though tonight was very successful I trust that we don't have to repeat it. I hope you won't do something like the incident of our last Defence class ever again."

"No, professor," Riddle seemed to be ashamed of himself. And once again Hermione admired his acting skills.

"Okay. I have to bring these-" McGray raised the bag with the acorns up. "-to the greenhouses. I trust you bring Ms DeCerto back to her common room, Mr Riddle?"

Hermione frowned at that. Was that another forties thing? Where a girl wasn't able to find her way to her own dormitory?

"That won't be necessary, Professor McGray," Hermione said. "I'm sure I can find my way back all right."

"No no, Ms DeCerto," McGray chastised her. "It's really late. I don't want you to wander about alone. And Mr Riddle is a prefect so I'm sure he won't mind."

"Of course not, sir," Riddle replied.

Hermione sighed at that. McGray didn't hear that but Riddle who stood right beside Hermione did, she was sure but didn't care. She really didn't want to be alone with Riddle. The last time he had tried to pry information out of her again. But Hermione couldn't see a way around it. And so it came that once again Hermione found herself quite alone with a certain Mr Riddle. They were walking side by side to the Gryffindor common room. Hermione felt very stressed. Her right hand twitched and was ready to release her wand from its holster.

"Why so tense, DeCerto?" Riddle smirked at her.

Hermione didn't answer. She didn't want to provoke him in any way but at the same time she felt unable to not insult him if she answered him. So the best way was to not say anything at all. She glanced at him and could see that he still smirked at her smugly. She was sure he could see how infuriated she was.

"Did you enjoy our little trip into the Forbidden Forest?" Riddle continued conversationally. "It was, after all, your fault that we had to do it."

Now, that was enough, Hermione felt anger bubbling up in her. "My fault?" she yelled angrily.
"You attacked me in that duel. I was just defending myself. And then you sent all those harpies after me."

"What are you talking about?" Riddle stared at her in mock surprise. "You attacked me so viciously. And it really is not my fault that everyone in this school hates you now."

Hermione narrowed her eyes at him but didn't answer. He was clearly trying to rile her up. He looked at her and chuckled. Hermione could see that he was amused by her anger. She turned away from him. Why was that damn common room so far away?

As Riddle spoke the next time, Hermione could hear that all scorn was gone from his voice. It was cold and threatening again, "Now, are you finally going to tell me what you are hiding?"

Hermione stared at him. There was again that malicious glint in his eyes. Hermione gulped.

"I still don't know what you want from me," she managed to whisper.

Riddle grabbed her wrist harshly. Hermione hissed in pain as he turned her sharply around so that she was facing him.

"Don't play games with me, DeCerto."

He grabbed her other wrist too, so that she had no chance to get away from him or to pull her wand. She was utterly frightened by him. He towered over her and held her in place while he stared at her. She was unable to look away from him, caught in his demanding glare. There was a flicker of red in his hypnotizing grey eyes but Hermione hoped it was just a trick of the light. She was trembling now and she knew that he could feel it through his hold on her.

"Where are you from?" he demanded in his cold voice that wouldn't tolerate any resistance. "What do you want here?"

Hermione was terrified by him but she knew she couldn't cave in now. "I… I'm from France," she stammered timidly. "I'm a refugee…"

Riddle wrenched her arms brutally as he commanded, "Don't give me this shit. Tell the truth!"

Hermione whimpered at his words and at the pain in her wrists. She was sure she would get bruises where he held her so tightly. But before he could do anything else they heard voices coming from ahead the corridor. Hermione felt relief wash over her as the voices grew louder and louder. Someone was coming this way. Riddle had turned his head and was looking in the direction the voices were coming from. Hermione could see an angry frown forming between his eyebrows. He was clearly not happy with those intruders interfering with his interrogation. But Hermione couldn't be more relieved.

Whoever was coming their way Hermione could now recognize that the voices belonged to girls. Maybe two or three. When they were just a few meters away around the corner Hermione jumped as she saw Riddle suddenly smirk at her. He then took a few steps back until he hit the wall of the corridor with his back. All the while he pulled Hermione along with him. As the voices of the girls were really close Riddle suddenly said loudly,

"DeCerto, please stop this now. I am NOT going out with you."

Hermione stared at him incredulously. He was smirking down at her while his voice had been so severe – with just the right amount of indignation and apprehension. She heard the voices stop but she dared not turn her head and look at the place she knew the girls would round the corner very soon. Hermione heard a few more footsteps and then the sharp intake of breath told her that the girls could now see them standing in the corridor. She glanced in their direction and saw three girls standing there. They were from Gryffindor and maybe fourth or fifth years.

Hermione knew perfectly well how the whole situation must look to them. Here she was, the crazy new girl a known stalker of the popular and handsome Slytherin prefect, standing with her victim in a lonely corridor. Riddle was now pressed against the wall and had a look of shock on his face. Oh, he was an amazingly convincing actor. He still held to her wrists fiercely but he had his arms now pressed to the wall as well so it looked more like Hermione was pinning him down.

He turned his shocked looking face away from her and to the three girls standing in the corridor. Hermione glanced again in their direction and could see them staring angrily at her.

Great, she thought, now they think I'm harassing him!

She felt Riddle release his grip on her wrists and she instantly took a few steps away from him. She knew that that wouldn't exactly help her convince the girls of her innocence but couldn't help it right now.

"Look, DeCerto," she heard Riddle say in a soothing voice. "I'm sorry, okay? But I don't want to date you. Please accept that."

Hermione felt sick at this apparent honesty in his statement. That was just one big lie but she knew how convincing he was. There was no way those Gryffindor girls wouldn't believe him.

"Is everything all right?" Hermione heard one of the girls ask suspiciously.

Riddle turned towards her and looked at her relieved while he said in a somewhat embarrassed voice, "Um… yes," he then smiled charmingly at the girls and Hermione felt like throwing up when she saw the girls blush at that.

"I was just walking back to my common room," Riddle continued.

He then took a few steps away from Hermione and towards the three girls.

"I… er, just go then okay?" Riddle told them.

"Do you want us to accompany you?" the girl with the brunette long hair asked him while she stared wickedly at Hermione.

Riddle laughed attractively and replied, still sounding embarrassed, "No, no. That's not necessary."

Then he looked back at Hermione hesitantly. Hermione knew the girls would see this and she knew they would misinterpret it. And of course that was the sole reason Riddle did it in the first place. Then Riddle bid them goodnight while ignoring Hermione completely and quickly walked away.

Hermione stood in the corridor and stared at his retreating back. She was dumbfounded by his audacious behaviour. How could he still look in a mirror after doing stuff like this? Hermione had never met someone so incredibly devious and manipulative. Not even the Voldemort from her time was like this. He would never have lowered himself and acted in such a way. Not that her time Voldemort had been morally superior to this Tom Riddle, no, he most certainly was not but at least he had never pulled a stunt like this.

Hermione had to stop her train of thought as she heard a shrill voice yell at her, "How can you do something like that, you vile bitch?"
Hermione looked back at the three girls still standing in the corridor. One with long brunette hair, the other with blond locks and the last with short brown hair. Hermione was sure that those girls were normally nice and friendly and in different circumstances Hermione could have even been friends with them. But right now the three girls wore similar expressions on their pretty faces which reigned from rage and fury to disgust and indignation. And all of those hostile feelings were directed at her. Hermione wondered shortly what she should do now. Explaining to the girls that it was all Riddle's fault in the first place would be wasted time. They would never believe her. So maybe going back to the common room was the best cause of action?

"Hey, slut, I'm talking to you!" the girl with the blond hair spat at Hermione.

Hermione was yet again surprised how many swearwords those girls knew. What would Legifer say to that? she thought stupidly. Maybe award them some house points as they were insulting her. Hermione chuckled at that.

"You hear that? She's laughing! Crazy bitch!" the blond girl whispered indignantly to her friends and then continued aggressively to Hermione, "You keep your hands off Tom. He doesn't want you. If you keep it up you're going to get it. Understood?"

Hermione looked at her with a blank face. This was so absurd. These girls were actually defending Tom Riddle. How could they be so blinded by him? But then again, he wasn't yet the Dark Lord. And if Hermione didn't know that he was a lying creep she too would believe every word that fell from his mouth.

Hermione shook her head and said quietly, "Whatever you say." Then she passed the three girls and headed for the Gryffindor common room.

As she stepped through the portrait of the Fat Lady she could see the common room was crowded. Students were sitting here and there on the chairs or sofas, doing their homework or just chatting. Hermione just wanted to be left alone and thus headed for the dormitory.

"Hey, Hermione. How was the detention?" a voice called after her. Hermione turned and saw Longbottom. He was apparently in the middle of a chess game with Weasley.

"Lovely," she replied dryly.

"That bad, eh?" he said with a lopsided grin on his face.

"… I'm going to bed." Hermione really wanted to leave the common room.

She didn't want to be there when the three girls would arrive to add a new rumour about the crazy girl who harassed innocent, handsome prefects. As Hermione entered the dormitory she was relieved to find it abandoned. She knew she wouldn't appreciate company right now.

She changed into her pyjama and after washing up she lay down on her bed and pulled the curtains shut around her. For a moment she considered putting up a warding charm on her bed. She didn't exactly expect her room mates' behaviours to improve after the new lie Riddle had created about her. She sighed and waved her wand to create a minor warding spell. She was faintly reminded of her fourth year. There had been a similar rumour about her going around. It was the year of the Triwizard Tournament and the stupid cow Skeeter had written in the Daily Prophet that Hermione was Harry's girlfriend and that she was cheating on him with none other than Victor Krum. Oh, the girls had hated her back then too. One day she had awoken and found that all her things had been transfigured into a pile of dead insects. She still wondered how they had managed that. And in their fourth year at that. So, that little warding spell was in order, she thought as she yawned loudly and lay back on her bed.

Hermione felt the familiar twinge in her stomach as she thought about the people from her time. She wondered vaguely what had happened to her old dorm mates. After she had left Hogwarts two years ago she had never met them again. She could just hope that they were alright. But then again, they weren't even born yet. The absurdness of her situation hit her again. All the terrible things that she had had to live through hadn't happened and yet her memories of them were as real to her as the world she now lived in. She needed to end this nightmare as fast as she could before she really went crazy. There had to be a way to transport her back. Dumbledore's office, she told herself before she dozed off. He must have found something on the Deathly Hallows.

Curses were flying everywhere. Hermione was ducking behind a pillar. Neville was sitting right beside her.

"How many?" he screamed over the noise of the incoming spells.

Hermione leaned to one side to have a better view of her surroundings. "At least five I can see!" she yelled back at him.

They were currently in the old building of the Ministry of Magic sitting in a hallway in the upper floors. This building had housed the Ministry of Magic until it had been abandoned in the late 1960s. After that the Ministry had moved to another, bigger location. The old Ministry building had been used since then as a museum of sorts. And as an old and prestigious part of wizarding history Hermione was convinced that Voldemort had used it as a hiding-place for one of his Horcruxes. That was the reason Harry, Ron, Neville and herself had infiltrated it. Somewhere here the Dagger of Gryffindor must be hidden.

A curse hit the pillar heavily and parts of the stone cracked away.

"We have to move!" Hermione yelled.

Neville nodded and then the both of them left their cover and attacked the Death Eaters. Hermione had no idea how they had found them but she hoped Harry and Ron didn't run into some of them as they managed to struck down the Death Eaters without getting hurt too badly. Hermione sent a Stunner at the last Death Eater and saw him fall down.

"Okay, let's get going!" Neville said as he stepped over one of the bodies on the ground.

Neville walked towards Hermione as she saw the last Death Eater she had hit getting up again. He was behind Neville so he couldn't see the danger he was in. Hermione screamed a warning and Neville spun around. But it was too late. The Death Eater had sent a curse his way. The bright red curse rushed towards Neville and Hermione heard a crunching noise as it collided with Neville's chest. As Neville hit the ground Hermione sent a curse of her own at the Death Eater. He fell back and lay there motionless.

Hermione ran towards the fallen form of Neville. She fell down on her knees beside him. Blood was flowing out from a huge wound on his chest. He moaned and whimpered in pain. Hermione pulled away his shirt. She gasped as she saw how badly wounded Neville really was. His thorax was ripped open. She could see parts of broken bone everywhere. Dark red blood poured out of the horrible hole in his chest. And she knew there was nothing she could do. Neville was going to die.

She held him as he struggled against his fate. But this time he lost. His moans were getting quieter and quieter until even his breathing died down. Hermione trembled and cried as she repeated one sentence over and over,
"I'm sorry! I'm sorry!"

Her fault that he was dead. No-one else's...
Hermione woke up the next day very early and didn't feel rested at all. As it was Saturday the other girls were still sleeping when she got up. She was grateful for that. With a wave of her wand she ended the ward she had put on her bed last night. Then she headed for the bathroom. As she slipped into her clothes she noticed that she needed to change the bandage on her shoulder again. She removed the old bandage. The cut was still not healed. There was caked blood but she couldn't see any progress in the actual healing. That wound seemed to need abnormally long to heal. She wondered, and not for the first time, which spell Riddle had used to create an injury like that. As she steadily worked on her shoulder her gaze fell on her wrists. They had purple stains on them. That was where Riddle had grabbed her yesterday.

Well, my initial plan of staying away from him seems to work really well. She rolled her eyes at that.

When she finally stepped out of the bathroom her room mates were still sleeping. Hermione walked over to her bed and started to rummage through her trunk. She needed that bruise ointment she had bought in Diagon Alley. After some time she angled the small pot with the ointment out of her trunk. She opened the pot just to find it empty. With a frustrated hiss she threw it back in her trunk. Obviously she would have to let her wrists heal the natural way. There was no way she would go to the infirmary. She looked down at her sore wrists.

That bastard!

Hermione walked down to the Great Hall to get some breakfast. She entered the Hall. There were some students already there. Most of them were Ravenclaws. As she walked to the Gryffindor table she felt the other students glaring at her. She sat down at the table as far away from the other Gryffindors as possible. They wouldn't want her near them anyway. Hermione loaded her plate with some toast, sausages and scrambled eggs. She then reached for a jug of pumpkin juice. As she began to pour the juice in her glass the jug suddenly exploded. Hermione was soaked in juice. The tiny class shards of the broken jug flew everywhere. Some of them injured Hermione's hands. Blood was flowing down the back of her hands. Hermione looked up to see what had happened. The other students had obviously noticed her mishap as they were looking at her. None of them tried to help her. On the contrary they even smirked at her. She saw a girl at Ravenclaw table laughing loudly at her. Hermione couldn't prove it but she was fairly sure that one of them had hexed the jug. She was furious and disgusted by the behaviour of the other students. Right now she would really like to curse the lot of them. The first would be Riddle. She looked at the Slytherin table and sure enough there he sat smirking at her.

That manipulative prick!

She clenched her fists as she narrowed her eyes at him. She could feel the blood dripping from her fists. Riddle raised his eyebrows at her as if to ask where her problem was. Hermione had to breathe in deeply to stop herself from throwing a hex at him. Then she stood up and flicked her wrist. Her wand landed in her hand. She clasped it firmly as she held her gaze with Riddle for a few more moments. He was staring at her unemotionally, still having that sickening polite smile on his face. As if to dare her to attack him. Hermione closed her eyes and then turned around. She waved her wand casually. Her clothes cleaned themselves and were dry again. Another wave of her wand and the mess on the table and the floor was cleaned. Then the tiny glass shards began to hover and gathered together floating over the table. Even those embedded in her hands joined them. Hermione jerked as they left the wounds on her hands but she didn't care right now. She waved her wand a last time and the shards melted together and reformed the jug again. After a few seconds the jug landed on the table looking as if it never had been destroyed. Hermione took the toast from her plate nonchalantly, tucked it in her mouth and left the Great Hall.

Riddle walked to the Great Hall. He had gotten up very early though it was a Saturday. He really hated to get up so early and was accordingly in a foul mood. But he needed to finish that Ancient Runes essay for professor Nota. Because of that stupid detention yesterday he had lost time and was now lagging behind. If it weren't for that dumb girl, he could have finished the essay yesterday. But no, she had had to drag him into the detention. His thoughts went back to DeCerto. Slowly she was really getting on his nerves. She still stubbornly refused to tell him her secrets. Riddle didn't think that they were that interesting but still he wanted to know anyway. The more she resisted his attempts to wrest the secrets out of her the more he needed to succeed.

How did she know all those spells and curses? Where did she come from and why was she here? He had started to doubt the story she had told them. And what the fuck made her so different? She seemed so confident, self-assured and so fearless. True in some occasions she had shown some fear.
When he had cornered her yesterday after the detention for example. But even then there still had been this fire burning behind her eyes. She might have been afraid of him but she was not broken.
He had the feeling that that girl would never bow down to him no matter what he did to her. And that thought infuriated him to no end.

Riddle entered the Great Hall and walked over to the Slytherin table. He sat down on his place and started to fill his plate. He noticed that the Slytherin table was fairly empty. He was pissed that the others still lay sleeping in their beds. He looked up from his plate as someone sat down beside him. It was Melanie Nicolls a fifth year. He suppressed a groan as he looked at the girl beside him. She had dark brown long hair and a pale porcelain skin. He had to admit that she was pretty. That was the sole reason he had shagged her. It had been in his fifth year. And ever since she had tried to seduce him again. But he really wasn't interested anymore. She might be pretty but she was a pain in the side.

"Good morning, Tom," she greeted him. "Up so early?"

"Yes, Melanie. I have some homework to do," he answered politely.

"Oh, come on. You are top of every class anyway." She laughed and her hand skimmed over his arm.

He flinched away from her touch not wanting her anywhere near him. "Yes well, maybe that's because I actually do my home work."

She laughed at that. Riddle looked her in the eyes. He saw admiration and lust in those eyes. He shuddered at that. Nicolls eyes were brown, the same colour as DeCerto's. But their aura was so different. DeCerto never looked at him like Nicolls just did. Nicolls was pathetic. She was one of those stupid chicks who so easily fell into his traps.

"Oh, look, Tom." Nicolls brought him out of his musing. "It's that new girl."

Riddle looked to the entrance door. And sure enough DeCerto had just entered the hall. She was now walking over to the Gryffindor table. She held her head high and walked confidently over to a seat at her table apparently oblivious to the hostile glares the other inhabitants of the hall sent her.
Riddle was disgruntled by her behaviour. She seemed to be immune to the little rumour he had created about her and the resulting dislike the school's population now held for her. She just ignored it like she ignored him. As if the whole thing was just beneath her… as if he was…
"Are you all right, Tom? You look so pale." Nicolls leaned in to him and her hand grasped his arm.

"Yes," he answered. He really shouldn't let DeCerto get to him like that. Now he had Nicolls clinging to his arm.

"You know, Tom," Nicolls continued in a soft, seducing voice that made Riddle want to just crucio her. "Next week's a Hogsmeade weekend."

Riddle tried to not roll his eyes at her blatant try to coax him into a date with her. Don't make me laugh. A little shag? Maybe. But I'm not spending time with you were I have to actually listen to your pesky voice.

So he answered distractedly, "Really… ?"

Fortunately right then something happened at the Gryffindor table that put an end to this pointless conversation. Riddle looked to the Gryffindor table as he heard a loud clash followed by stifled laughs. It didn't take him long to find the source of this commotion. DeCerto sat on her place and she was covered from head to toe in pumpkin juice. He could see glass shards covering the table. Obviously someone had hexed that jug of juice so it exploded in her face. Riddle could feel the corners of his mouth curl slightly into a smirk as he saw her flustered face.

"Oh, it's that stupid slut again," Riddle heard Nicolls comment bored.

He felt slightly angered that Nicolls called DeCerto a 'stupid slut'. Nicolls of all people hadn't the right to call anyone stupid. Riddle decided to ignore her unnecessary statement and continued to watch DeCerto. He was surprised to see her face now morph into an angry scowl. Any other girl would have fled the hall by now. Crying. But he really shouldn't be surprised, he mused. It was DeCerto after all. Now she looked around, maybe to identify the perpetrator. He wasn't surprised that her gaze fell on him very fast. He could see the angry fire burning behind her eyes as she glared at him. He was by now really amused and raised his eyebrows at her. He knew this would infuriate her even more. And it did. She abruptly stood up, still glaring at him. Riddle was mildly astounded as she pulled her wand. She wasn't really going to hex him now, was she? He looked in her eyes and saw that she seemed to at least consider it at this moment. His gaze went back to her wand. He noticed that blood was running down her hand. Those glass shards from the jug must have hurt her. Good!

…though he should curse whoever did it…

DeCerto suddenly turned away from him, apparently having decided that it was not a good idea to attack him when so many witnesses were present. Well, actually it wasn't a good idea to attack him at all. Witnesses or not. She could never beat him. He saw her waving her wand and thus cleaning herself and the surrounding area off the juice. Another wave and the glass shards assembled, hovering over the table. Riddle raised his eyebrows in surprise as they reformed the jug. Not a scratch remained on the jug as it landed softly on the table. That was no easy spell DeCerto had just performed and nonverbal too. He watched annoyed as DeCerto grabbed a piece of toast and walked calmly out of the hall as if nothing had happened.

Good! …though he should curse whoever did it…

Hermione strolled down the corridor, away from the Great Hall, still nibbling at her piece of toast. Her gaze then fell on her right hand and the cuts in her skin. It seemed the act Riddle had played yesterday was working out well for him. This was the first time that one of those stupid girls had drawn blood. Those cuts were not severe or anything but they showed Hermione that now Riddle's fan-girls had taken their gloves finally off. Hermione cursed rather colourfully as she walked down the corridor.
"Ms DeCerto!" a sharp voice hissed at her indignant ly. "Watch your mouth!"

Hermione stopped dead in her tracks. She knew that voice and she had come to hate it. Slowly - very slowly - Hermione turned around while trying to school her features and ban the disgusted expression from her face. And sure enough there, standing in the corridor, was professor Legifer. She wore her usual spotless black robe, her starched blindingly white blouse and a grey pleated skirt. Her hair was made into a bun with not one strand of hair out of place and right now she looked at Hermione with a frown between her eyebrows and a scandalized look on her face. Hermione had to really work to not roll her eyes at her least favourite teacher.

"You are incorrigible, Ms DeCerto." Legifer's piercing voice echoed through the corridor and Hermione felt a headache beginning to throb in her temples.

Did the world hate her? First Riddle, then his vindictive fan-girls and now Legifer. She couldn't escape anything today it seemed. Whatever did she do to deserve something like this? In the meantime Legifer walked towards Hermione and was now standing right before her. Legifer glared at her and raised one of her thin eyebrows as her hard gaze wandered over Hermione.

"I have never met such an undiscerning girl like you, Ms DeCerto," Legifer said while she shook her head. "One should have thought that after the disaster during your first lesson in Defence against the Dark Arts you would come to see how wrong you are. And that you would then abandon your indecent attitude"

Hermione frowned at the professor. What was she talking about? Not the duel with Riddle, surely? Legifer had obviously seen Hermione's confused face as she said in a triumphant voice, "Yes, I have heard all about your unacceptable behaviour during professor McGray's lesson."

"Unacceptable behaviour"? Hermione felt anger boiling up in her as she continued to stare in disbelief at Legifer. What was this woman going on about?

"I must say, I am ashamed of you, Ms DeCerto. Attacking poor Mr Riddle like that!" Legifer continued to chastise Hermione. "I tried to convince professor McGray to release Mr Riddle from the detention as he was clearly not responsible for your presumptuous behaviour."

Hermione gaped at the professor.

But Legifer, it seemed, wasn't yet finished with her, "I hope you now see that there is no place for girls in duelling lessons. You just don't have the intellectual grasp nor the magical power to compete with your male fellow students. Let this duel with Mr Riddle be a lesson to you, Ms DeCerto. And I advise you to apologize to Mr Riddle for your insolent behaviour."

After that Legifer threw another of her nasty glares Hermione's way before she turned on her heels and walked away.

…leaving behind a very speechless and very pissed Hermione.

It was late afternoon as Riddle was on his way towards Slughorn's office to one of the professor's private get-togethers where he only invited his most priced Slytherin students. And of course what would such a meeting be without Tom Riddle? Riddle smirked as he walked down the corridor that led to Slughorn's office. He absentmindedly twiddled the gold ring around his finger. Today he would finally ask Slughorn what he so badly needed to know. He would have to be careful and he would need all his power of persuasion but then Slughorn would surely spill his secrets. After all who could resist Tom Riddle…

Riddle arrived at Slughorn's office and knocked at the door. Moments later the door was opened by none other than Slughorn himself.

"Ah, Tom, m'boy, we just wondered what kept you," Slughorn said in his booming voice.

Riddle smiled at him smartly and then said in his smooth voice, "But professor, I would never miss one of our little meetings."

Slughorn beamed at him and stepped out of the way so Riddle could enter. Riddle stepped inside and quickly scanned the room. There were seats arranged around Slughorn's ridiculous winged armchair. Riddle saw that Primus Lestrange, Abraxas Malfoy, Ledo Avery, Alfold Black and Anthony Alba were already here and seated on the chairs. He had to suppress a smirk from forming on his face at the thought that they were all his devoted followers and only Slughorn was totally clueless. Riddle could send the Killing Curse at Slughorn right now and no-one of the people in this office would ever testify against him. But that would be imprudent. After all Slughorn was still useful…

Riddle walked over to one of the seats the others had obviously reserved for him as it was standing right in the middle. He sat down and watched Slughorn returning to his own fluffy seat. He sank down, put his feet on a velvet pouffe and picked up a small glass of wine from the side table. Riddle noticed pleased that the box of crystallized pineapple he had ordered Malfoy to send Slughorn in Riddle's name was also standing on the side table. If one wanted to get information out of people the first step to success was creating an opportune moment.

… and it appeared Riddle had to wait really long for that opportune moment to arrive. Slughorn was babbling on and on about his famous ex-students. Soon Riddle was only inches away from just hexing the potions professor. He needed to intervene now as he couldn't stand this stupid twaddle any longer.

Riddle smiled disarmingly at Slughorn and asked, "Sir, is it true that Professor Merrythought is retiring?"

Riddle had picked up that little information as he had eavesdropped into a conversation between Dippet and his least favourite teacher, Dumbledore.

"Tom, Tom, if I knew I couldn't tell you," said Slughorn while wagging his finger at Riddle but winking at the same time. "I must say, I'd like to know where you get your information, boy. More knowledgeable than half the staff, you are."

Riddle flashed Slughorn one of his most innocent smiles.

"What with your uncanny ability to know things you shouldn't, and your careful flattery of the people who matter – thank you for the pineapple, by the way, you're quite right, it is my favourite-"

Smooth, very smooth. Riddle inwardly rolled his eyes at Slughorn's blatant obviousness.

But the professor wasn't finished yet. "-I confidently expect you to rise to Minister of Magic within twenty years. Fifteen, if you keep sending me pineapple, I have excellent contacts at the Ministry."

Riddle fought to keep his modest smile plastered on his face. He really had to work today to get his information.

"I don't know that politics would suit me, sir," Riddle said. "I don't have the right kind of background, for one thing."
Riddle saw the smirks the other boys cast at each other. So they knew, or rather suspected, who he was related to. Good to know.

"Nonsense," Slughorn said briskly. "Couldn't be plainer you come from decent wizarding stock, abilities like yours. No, you'll go far, Tom. I've never been wrong about a student."

Riddle could feel the first signs of losing his temper. Decent wizarding stock'? Yes, of course! He remembered his uncle Morfin, the sottish old lunatic. If that was 'decent wizarding stock' then Riddle didn't want to belong to them anyway. His uprising temper prevented Riddle from hearing what Slughorn said next but judging from the others getting up Slughorn had just dismissed them.

Showtime, then.

Riddle stayed behind as the others left the office.

"Look sharp, Tom, you don't want to be caught out of bed out of hours, and you are a prefect…"

"Sir, I wanted to ask you something."

Here it was, Riddle's chance to find out whether his researches had been correct or not.

"Ask away then, m'boy, ask away…"

Riddle looked at Slughorn while his face was carefully arranged into a mask of innocent curiosity. "Sir, I wondered what you know about… about Horcruxes?"

Slughorn considered him for a while. Riddle knew he was wary now but that was to be expected. "Project for Defence Against the Dark Arts, is it?"

Of course Slughorn never expected that Horcruxes were a topic in Hogwarts' curriculum, so the truth was required here.

"Not exactly, sir," Riddle said with the needed amount of hesitancy in his voice. "I came across the term while reading and I didn't fully understand it."

"No… well… you'd be hard-pushed to find a book at Hogwarts that'll give you details on Horcruxes, Tom. That's very Dark stuff, very Dark indeed."

You have no idea what one can find in the Restricted Section if one knows where to search, Riddle sneered at Slughorn in his thoughts. But then braced himself for his next act.

"But you obviously know all about them, sir? I mean a wizard like you-"

First a little bit adulation.

"Sorry, I mean, if you can't tell me, obviously. I just knew if anyone could tell me, you could – so I just thought I'd ask."

Then attack his pride.

As he ended with his little speech Riddle held his breath. He had planned what to say for some time. Now it would be decided if Slughorn would tell him anything.

"Well," Slughorn said rather reluctantly. "Well, it can't hurt to give you an overview, of course. Just so that you understand the term. A Horcrux is the word used for an object in which a person has concealed part of their soul."
"I don't quite understand how that works though, sir," Riddle said. He needed confirmation that his researches were right.

And Slughorn answered him, "Well, you split your soul, you see, and hide part of it in an object outside the body. Then even if one's body is attacked or destroyed, one cannot die, for part of the soul remains earthbound and undamaged. But of course, existence in such a form… few would want it, Tom, very few. Death would be preferable."

Then most people are idiots! Riddle thought as the fingers of his right hand skimmed over the scar on his left forearm.

"How do you split your soul?" Riddle asked Slughorn. He knew how. He had read it. But was it really true? He needed Slughorn to confirm it.

"Well, you must understand that the soul is supposed to remain intact and whole. Splitting it is an act of violation, it is against nature," Slughorn told him, seemingly disgusted by the very idea behind the Horcrux.

"But how do you do it?" Riddle pressed. He needed exact instructions.

Slughorn answered him but only reluctantly, "By an act of evil – the supreme act of evil. By committing murder. Killing rips the soul apart. The wizard intent upon creating a Horcrux would use the damage to his advantage: he would encase the torn portion-"

"Encase? How-?" Riddle interrupted Slughorn.

The spell, I need the spell!

"There is a spell, do not ask me, I don't know!" Slughorn said and then continued agitatedly, "Do I look as though I have tried it - do I look like a killer?"

What's the big deal about it? Riddle thought but said in an apologetic voice, "No, sir, of course not. I'm sorry… I didn't mean to offend…"

"Not at all, not at all, not offended." Slughorn stared at Riddle then he continued, "It's natural to feel some curiosity about these things… wizards of a certain caliber have always been drawn to that aspect of magic…"

"Yes, sir," Riddle said.

He didn't need Slughorn to find excuses for Riddle why he delved into the Dark Arts. What he needed were answers. So now, the next question was maybe the most important one. The others he mostly knew the answers to and just wanted Slughorn to validate his information. But this, he hadn't found any information about.

"What I don't understand, though – just out of curiosity, I mean, would one Horcrux be much use? Can you only split your soul once? Wouldn't it be better, make you stronger, to have your soul in more pieces? I mean, for instance, isn't seven the most powerfully magical number, wouldn't seven-?"

"Merlin's beard, Tom!" Slughorn yelped. "Seven! Isn't it bad enough to think of killing one person? And in any case.. bad enough to divide the soul… but to rip it into seven pieces…"

Slughorn looked deeply troubled now as he stared at Riddle. And Riddle disappointedly realized that he had lost him. Slughorn wouldn't tell him anything anymore… but from his scandalized expression, Riddle could deduce that Slughorn had never before heard of a person having more than one Horcrux.

Interesting.

"Of course," Slughorn said though he still seemed rather troubled. "This is all hypothetical, what we're discussing, isn't it? All academic…"

Of course, belie yourself, why don't you? "Yes, sir, of course," Riddle said innocently.

"But all the same, Tom… keep it quiet, what I've told… that's to say, what we've discussed. People wouldn't like to think we've been chatting about Horcruxes. It's a banned subject at Hogwarts, you know… Dumbledore's particularly fierce about it…"

Riddle felt anger rising up in him. Of course, if Dumbledore doesn't like the topic then we are not allowed to speak about it.

"I won't say a word, sir."

Riddle then left the potion master's office. And as he stepped out into the dark corridor the evil smile that had been hidden behind his mask of innocence finally found its way unto Riddle's face. Though the professor hadn't answered all his question that conversation had still been more than enlightening. Riddle now knew that his researches had been correct. He knew how to create a Horcrux.

The supreme act of evil'

Riddle chuckled darkly. It would be a gratification to create one of those 'evil' Horcruxes right under Dumbledore's nose. But Riddle wouldn't stop there. He would do what no wizard had ever done before…

A few weeks went by and nothing changed Hermione's situation with the other students. They, aside from Longbottom, Weasley and Lupin, either shunned her or were openly hostile towards her. And Riddle's little act after their detention with professor McGrey hadn't exactly helped her situation. The whole thing would have been easier to bear if Riddle hadn't been silently mocking Hermione whenever they met. She tried to just ignore the whole thing. It was utterly ridiculous. The other students were being hostile towards her because they thought she had threatened Lord Voldemort? The whole situation was so bizarre it would have been almost funny if Hermione didn't have to constantly watch her back for evil curses coming from misguided Riddle fan-girls. Though she always told herself that she would be home soon and shouldn't let Riddle get to her she couldn't prevent herself from becoming slightly thin-skinned.

One day Hermione was on her way to the library - she hadn't yet completely given up on finding something useful there - as she rounded another corner she felt a little shift in the magic surrounding her. After all those attempts to attack her during those last weeks she had become very cautious. So she had cast a weak warding charm around her that would alert her if any magic was directed at her. And right now she could sense magic coming towards her. She turned around and simultaneously cast a Protego. She saw as a red spell, most likely a Stunner, crashing into her shield and then it died down. She looked at who had cast the spell. Two Slytherin girls were standing not far away and glaring at her. One of them still had her wand raised.

"Ugly hag! Leave Tom alone!" one of them spat at Hermione before they all turned and swiftly walked away.
Hermione shook her head. How stupid could one get? Really! First they throw a totally harmless spell at her and to top it of they actually turn around and walk away while baring their back to their supposed enemy. Not very smart. But Hermione had to admit she was a little bit relieved that they had been from Slytherin. She was used to being hated by Slytherins. What really got to her was her own house mates hating her.

Stupid Riddle!

That bullying was slowly getting to her. Maybe she should do something against it? She mused about her options as she entered the library.

"Hello there, Ms DeCerto," Ms Peters greeted her. "Back again?"

"Good morning, Ms Peters," Hermione was thankful to see a friendly face at last.

"Don't stay too long. It's really nice weather outside," Ms Peters told her kindly.

Hermione strolled to her usual place in the back of the library and started yet again her quest for information on the Deathly Hallows. She searched and searched for hours but she didn't find anything. The Elder Wand was as elusive as ever. Hermione closed the book she had been reading with a loud thud. It was rather disappointing. Hermione felt a little bit betrayed by the library.

Now that the library seemed to be a dead-end that left Dumbledore's office as the most important source of information. She just had to break in, get the information and get out. Nothing too difficult. At least nothing she hadn't done before. And this time if she got caught, that would only mean a detention or at the worst expulsion. Not a horrible death. Hermione sighed. Maybe someday she could earn her money with this breaking and entering business. Because after this episode she was bound to really get good at it. Hermione got up from the chair, produced her bag from under the table and left the library. She headed for the common room. She needed time to plan her next steps of action. If she was to break into Dumbledore's office she needed to know his routine. When was he normally in his office? She needed a time frame where he left his office. The best time would be after curfew as there were no students in the corridors thus a lesser risk at getting caught. Of course then the patrolling teachers and prefects would be a problem. Well, she had to avoid them then, hadn't she? Now that she had decided what to do next she instantly felt better. It was always good to have a plan, she thought. It made her situation a little bit more bearable.

Hermione was brought out of her reverie as she sensed a spell coming towards her. Not again! she thought frustrated. She turned on the spot while pulling her wand and saw a blue spell spreading towards her. The caster stood a few meters away. Hermione recognized the spell. It was a Reducto. And a badly aimed one at that. She didn't raise a shield as the spell would never hit her. Sure enough the spell hit the wall behind Hermione. Unfortunately it was strong enough to damage the stone wall. Fragments of stone were now raining down on her. One of the stones hit her on the head. Hermione could feel the skin on her left temple split open. Her hand shot to her head. There was blood seeping through her fingers. Through all of this she had never let the caster of the spell out of her field of vision lest she tried another spell. With a jolt in her stomach she identified the caster as a Gryffindor girl. And she was not alone. Hermione now recognized the three girls. Those were the same three girls who 'caught' Hermione while harassing Riddle. The girl with blond locks who had sent the Reducto looked shocked at the destroyed wall behind Hermione. She was obviously surprised by the power of her own spell. But apart from that shock Hermione could also see disappointment. She was furious as she realized that the girl was disappointed that the spell hadn't hurt her more. The two other girls seemed to be a little bit shaken, too, by the destruction the curse had caused but it didn't stop one of them to yell at Hermione furiously,
"You perverted bitch! Don't you get it?"

Her friend standing beside her continued in an equally hostile tone and spat at Hermione, "Do we have to spell it out for you? You are not welcome here!"

"Yeah! Go back to the whorehouse where you belong! And leave Tom alone!" The girl who had cast the Reducto obviously thought it necessary to make her little contribution.

Now Hermione really was a patient and generally mild-mannered person but enough was enough. Since Riddle had spread this rumour about her and particularly since he had pulled that stunt after the detention, his stupid fan-girls had made her life hell. They had cursed Hermione wherever she went, they had insulted and belittled her. Hermione was angry at Riddle because it was his fault she was in this situation. But right now her fury was mostly directed at those stupid girls in front of her. Riddle was an evil person, the Dark Lord, so Hermione had never expected him to behave nice. But those girls, they should now better. They shouldn't hate her due to a stupid rumour; they shouldn't attack her with potentially dangerous curses. And they certainly shouldn't admire a totally devious Slytherin who had no morals. Hermione felt her magic beginning to flow through her body. It was now more like an angry torrent and not the calm flow it normally was. It mirrored her emotions quite well.

"If you ever go near Tom again…" the girl with the short brown hair hissed and pointed her wand threateningly at Hermione.

That was the point where Hermione lost her temper. She swiftly raised her wand and brandished it in a fluid movement.

Abicere!

The girl that had just threatened Hermione was thrown back and collided with the wall behind her. Her two friends stared at their fallen friend in shock and never raised their wands. Hermione, though, was not yet finished. She waved her wand again.

Substringo!

Invisible bonds were winding themselves around one of the girls and she, too, fell defeated to the ground. The last girl, the one who had attacked Hermione at first, looked at her with wide eyes. Hermione raised her wand slowly and pointed it at the girl who tensed at that.

Then Hermione whispered in a eerily calm voice, "Petrificus totalus!"

As Hermione's spell hit her attacker the girl fell back unable to move a muscle. Hermione slowly walked over to the petrified girl. She tried to get her anger back in control. It wasn't often that she lost her temper. As Hermione reached the petrified girl she looked down at her coldly. The girl stared up at her. She could only move her eyelids.

"Next time you use a spell make sure that it really hits its target. Otherwise your target will strike back," Hermione told the girl in an emotionless, cold voice.

Then she turned around and left the girls lying on the cold stone floor. To learn that particular lesson herself had cost Hermione a lot. And back then she hadn't been hit with a harmless Petrificus totalus. So she didn't feel guilty at all for letting the girls lay there on the floor. They would be found sooner or later. Hermione breathed in slowly and stowed her wand away in her holster. Somehow that had been rather satisfying.

"That was pretty merciless." Hermione heard someone say in a deep melodious voice.
She turned the next corner and saw Riddle leaning casually on the wall. He looked at her amused.

"I didn't think you had it in you." He smirked at her, his eyes sparkling with amusement.

Hermione decided to just ignore him and continued her way back to the Gryffindor common room. It wasn't long and to Hermione's dismay Riddle fell in step beside her.

"You know, I'm a prefect. I could take points from you for attacking a fellow student," Riddle said while smirking at her.

"So you could," Hermione answered shortly.

"Not very talkative today, are we, DeCerto?" Riddle chuckled at her.

Hermione sighed and then said impatiently, "What do you want?"

"Why so hostile? Is it a crime to talk to a fellow school mate?" Riddle replied while he smiled charmingly at Hermione.

Hermione was annoyed by his mocking attitude. "Considering the aggressive behaviour of the girls I just hexed. Yes, it seems to be a crime to talk with you," she said stiffly.

Riddle laughed at that. "Well, I can't help it that I'm so damn popular. Girls get jealous, you know."

"No, it was you who fed those lies about me to the rumour mill in the first place, Riddle." Hermione huffed at him.

"Aww, but Hermione," Riddle sneered at her. "We both know there is a little bit of truth in every rumour."

"WHAT?" Hermione screeched. She stopped walking and faced Riddle. She was furious at what he was implying.

Riddle had stopped walking too and looked down at her. His eyes were still glinting with amusement while Hermione stared at him angrily. Suddenly he took a step forward and before she could react he snaked an arm around her waist and pulled her to him. She collided with his chest and he used the moment of her bafflement to wrap his other arm around her waist. Hermione was utterly shocked at his actions. She felt his arms around her waist pulling her to him so that she leaned into his chest. She tried to wriggle herself free but he held her steady. Hermione began to panic.

Lord Voldemort is hugging you! her mind screamed at her. She was so scared she didn't even dare to breathe. What did he plan?

She stiffened as she felt his hand gliding up her back. His other arm was still holding her in place. He then took her chin in his hand and forced her to look up at him. Hermione's eyes widened in fear as she locked eyes with him. His face was far too near to her. His grey eyes bored into her brown ones. Hermione was once again amazed by how handsome he really looked. From so close she saw his flawless, pale skin, his well-proportioned face and his dark hair falling softly into his eyes. He looked down at her with his eyebrows slightly raised and a smile tucking at his lips.

"Come on, Hermione. Just admit it," he whispered in a seductive way. "You think that I am irresistible."

Hermione tried to wriggle free from him but again to no avail. She felt her heart beating faster. All she wanted to do now was to run away from him. She couldn't bear it to have him so near her. There were so many people who had lost their lives because of Riddle. His closeness brought her memories of those people back. Memories that hurt her like physical pain.

"Let go of me!" she snarled at him.

Riddle just chuckled at her distress and then bend his head down so that he could whisper into her ear. "Just tell me who you really are and I will stop the students from hexing you."

Hermione tried to bend her head away from him to get as much distance between them as was possible. But Riddle didn't allow her much freedom.

"I don't know what you want from me," Hermione replied shakily.

"I'm sure you'll change your mind sooner or later, my dear," Riddle again whispered in her ear.

Then he began to trace kisses on the line of her jaw. Hermione shuddered as she felt his lips on her skin. She tried to push him off with her hands on his chest.

"What are you doing? Get off me!" Hermione yelled at him.

She could feel him smirk against her skin. Then he placed one last kiss on her cheek before he broke from her but continued to hold her to him. He smirked down at her as he reached into his robe and produced his wand. Hermione inhaled sharply as she recognized the pale wand of Lord Voldemort. Riddle laughed softly at her apparent fear. He pointed his wand under her chin and forced Hermione to raise her head, baring her throat. Hermione was shaking from fear as he slowly skimmed the tip of his wand along the side of her face. She looked with huge eyes at Riddle and saw the mocking smirk still marring his handsome face while his eyes glinted maliciously down at her.

As the tip of his wand reached her left temple he whispered, "Episkey."

Hermione felt the wound, she had received when the Gryffindor girl had attacked her with the Reducto curse, close. She looked at Riddle, her eyebrows raised in bewilderment. Riddle stared smugly into her eyes before he pulled her abruptly into his chest and whispered coldly in her ear, "You are going to tell me all your secrets, DeCerto."

Then he let her go, turned around and walked confidently away. Hermione stared at his retreating back. Her heart was still racing at a ridiculous speed and her breathing was fast. She felt shaky and sick.

Then she shook herself out of her stupor and quickly walked in the opposite direction that Riddle had just left.

She couldn't believe what had happened. Her original plan had been to stay as far away from Voldemort as possible. But since she had arrived at Hogwarts she had drawn his attention to her and he had threatened and attacked her at more than one occasion. He was definitely suspicious of her now. There was no more denying it. Hermione didn't think that he knew anything specific but he was certainly aware that she was hiding something. If she had only let him hex her at their duel during DADA then he wouldn't be suspicious now. But there was no taking that back. He had seen a glimpse of what she was capable of. Of course he was curious. Hermione massaged absentmindedly her left temple that Riddle had just healed.

How can I get out of this mess?

She could still leave Hogwarts. But she didn't want to use that option unless it was absolutely necessary. What then? She could pretend to join Riddle. Become one of his followers. Hermione felt a wave of nausea hit her at that thought. No, she could never join him. Pretence or otherwise. She would never take the side of Lord Voldemort.

She just couldn't think of any way to get out of it.

Then, if she was in this mess anyway, why not make it a little bit more bearable? Riddle had played dirty so far. He had used his influence on the students to rile them up against her. In doing that he had separated her from everyone. Driving away any alliances she could have had. So no-one would help her should anything happen to her. Then he had intimidated and threatened her in an attempt to destroy her morale.

If he wanted to play dirty, Hermione thought angrily, then she would pay him back in kind.

As she reached the portrait of the Fat Lady she still felt shaken from Riddle's last attempt to threaten her but she had a plan how to strike back. She did know that it was a risky business to defy Tom Riddle. Then again if anything should go wrong she could always leave Hogwarts. He would never be able to find her as she didn't really exist in this time period.

Hermione stepped through the portrait hole and scanned the common room. As her gaze fell on the group she had been searching for she strolled over to them.

"Oh, hey, Hermione!" Longbottom looked up from his Potions essay.

Lupin was sitting beside him. He too was immersed in an essay. Weasley obviously had given up on his own Potions essay which lay abandoned on the desk. He amused himself with a book. Hermione saw the title of the book: The British Quidditch League, and tried not to roll her eyes.

"Am I disturbing you?" Hermione asked innocently.

"No," Longbottom answered. "I'm in fact glad you're here. Maybe you can convince Lupin that we have still time to finish this stupid essay."

"We've to hand it in by Monday!" Lupin said indignantly as he frowned at Longbottom.

"Well, you know," Hermione said hesitantly. "There is something I need your help with."

Weasley put away his book and raised his eyebrows at her.

"You need our help? Hermione, you are better in school than we all put together. Well, maybe except Lupin. How could we help you?"

"It's nothing school related," Hermione explained. "It's more prank related."

She noticed pleased that she now had both Weasley's and Longbottom's full attention. Smiles were tucking at their faces.

"You wanna pull a prank?" Longbottom smirked at her. "Then you've come to the right people. Prank is my middle name."

"Yeah, we are the kings of pranksters," Weasley confirmed. "You know last year we found this spell to lock doors permanently. No Alohomora nor anything else would help. Cost the teachers more than a month to finally open all the classrooms in the fourth floor again."

Weasley and Longbottom high-fived at that while Lupin rolled his eyes at them. Hermione smiled and sat down at the sofa beside them.

"So, how can we help you, Hermione?" Longbottom smirked at her.

Hermione pulled her wand and waved it at their surroundings while she said, "Muffliato!"

All background noise turned at once into a quiet buzzing.

"What'd you do?" Lupin asked astonished.

"Just a small spell," Hermione explained. "So no-one can eavesdrop in on us."

"Wicked!" Weasley said.

"You've gotta teach me how to do that," Longbottom pleaded.

"Sure, sure," Hermione said. "But now back to my problem. You of course all know about the rumours concerning me and a certain Mr Riddle that are going around?"

Weasley and Lupin nodded at her darkly while Longbottom looked contrite as he said, "You know I'm sorry about that, Hermione. I shouldn't have believed-"

Hermione cut in, "I'm not angry at you anymore, Marc. That's not it. No, the thing is I found out who started the whole thing."

Longbottom raised his eyebrows, "Who was it? I'm so going to kick his ass."

Hermione smiled at him, "Yes, that's the plan."

"Stop putting us on the rack, Hermione. Who was it?" Weasley whined.

Hermione's smile turned into an evil smirk as she said, "Tom Riddle."

The three of them stared at her with mouths hanging open. Then Longbottom yelled, "I knew it. I always knew it. That little cur."

"Wow, really? Riddle? How'd you know?" Weasley asked Hermione.

"He told me," Hermione replied calmly.

"He just told you?" Lupin asked incredulous.

"Yes, he just told me," Hermione said before she added darkly. "More like, mocked me about it."

"That bastard!" Longbottom said furiously.

"Why'd he do something like that?" Lupin asked her.

"I don't know," Hermione looked at him helplessly. "I think he just doesn't like me or something like that."

"So know you want to pay him back. Yes, Hermione? Please, tell me you wanna pay him back," Longbottom pleaded.

Riddle was on his way back to the Slytherin dungeons. He was very pleased with how things had turned out. He could still see DeCerto's scared eyes as he had held her. She had been so terrified of him. A subdued DeCerto was much more preferable to an indifferent one. It had been quite annoying how she had ignored him before. It was about time that he showed her what a big mistake it was to defy him. He laughed quietly as he remembered how she had trembled in his arms. Oh, she had been so delightfully frightened. It wouldn't take long now, he thought, and then she would cave in and tell him her every secret. And maybe, if he was generous, he would grant her the honor and would listen to her pitiful secrets. And after that he would punish her for wasting his precious time. She was going to wish back the time were he had held her so closely.

He could still almost feel her warmth were he had held her to his chest. She had been so soft and comfortable in his arms. He blamed the actions that had followed on that pleasant feeling. Because he had never planned on kissing her. Even if it was only on her cheek. But as he had whispered in her ear her scent of lilac had been so seductive that he hadn't been able to hold back. And why should he hold back? It was his right after all to take whatever he wanted. The girls should be grateful if he spent time with them.

With an unpleasant jolt in his stomach he remembered how DeCerto had stiffened as he had kissed her. And how she had tried to bend away from him…

Well, what did it matter, he thought angrily. He would break her soon enough. What did he care what the cheap trollop thought about him?

He arrived at the entrance to the Slytherin common room and hissed at the portrait, "Lepor lepos!"

The portrait accepted the password and admitted him in. He stepped into the common room. The wallpapers had a nice, unobtrusive green colour. In the far corner burned an inviting fire in the fireside. Black leather couches and armchairs were arranged in the room to allow its inhabitants to sit down and relax. Riddle strolled over to a couch where he had previously discarded his school bag. He registered pleased that no-one had dared to touch it in his absence. He sat down and opened his bag as he heard someone greet him,

"Riddle."

He looked up and saw Ledo Avery and Abraxas Malfoy standing before him. They looked at him expectantly obviously waiting for his permission to sit down beside him. He nodded curtly at them and they sat down but still kept a respectful distance to him.

"What do you want?" Riddle asked impatiently.

Malfoy answered in his usual smooth voice, "I got what you asked me to find."

He then took a small parcel out of his elegant and surely expensive bag and handed it over to Riddle. Riddle accepted it without thanking Malfoy.

"Was that all?" he asked instead.

Avery shook his head before he said, "You know Patric Lynns? He is a Ravenclaw seventh year."

Riddle nodded at that absentmindedly. "So, what?"

Avery cleared his throat then said, "Well, he's hitting on the same girl as me…"

Riddle looked at him annoyed. "And what do you want me to do about that?"

Avery cowered a little bit away from Riddle. "Nothing! I just… wanted to ask if it was okay if I curse him a little bit."

Riddle raised one eyebrow. The rest of his face remained an emotionless mask. "Hm, curse him?"

Avery stiffened and paled slightly as Riddle's scrutinizing gaze fell on him. Riddle let him stir for a little bit more before he said,

"I don't see why not." Avery relaxed at that.

Riddle continued, "But nothing too serious! And don't leave behind any evidence. Dumbledore's too suspicious of us as it is."

Avery nodded at him. "Yes, of course. Thank you."

Riddle shifted his attention back at the parcel Malfoy had given him and waved Malfoy and Avery away with a motion of his hand. Before he opened the parcel he scanned quickly the common room. Nobody seemed to look his way so he opened the parcel and an ancient looking book fell into his lap. He took the book in his hands and touched the brown leather binding lovingly. There was no title on the book but he knew what it was about. This was an old manuscript about magic at its purest form. It had been written long before the Ministry had divided magic into approved and dark. Riddle could almost feel the knowledge pulsing through the thick leather binding. This book would hopefully supply him with more information about the ritual he was interested in. He basically had all the information he needed and Slughorn had more or less confirmed that what he knew was right, but it wouldn't hurt to learn more about it. It was after all a dangerous ritual. If he made a mistake he could lose his life. Of course someone had to lose his life during the process but he would make sure that that someone wasn't himself, Riddle thought while smiling evilly.

He reached for his school bag. He didn't intend to read the book now. That would be too risky as he didn't know if the book had been warded in any way. Which was entirely probable. He had to test that before he attempted to open it. The best place would be the Come and Go Room. There he would be undisturbed.

As he opened his bag his gaze fell on a book inside. He reached for it. It's title was: Magick At Its Most Evile. He smiled down at the book as a nostalgic feeling came over him. He had read about Horcruxes for the first time in that book. It had been totally useless back then because it had just been mentioned shortly in this book without any further explanations. But it had awoken his curiosity and he had then learned more about what Horcruxes were. And soon the creation of a Horcrux had become his hope, a hope to finally overcome that helpless weak boy who was represented by the scar on Riddle's left arm.

And now after nearly two years he had gathered enough information to finally go through with it. He would even take a step further. Further, perhaps, than anybody before him.

"So, you know what to do, yes?" Hermione asked the three boys.

"Yep, don't you worry, Hermione," Weasley replied.

They still sat on the comfortable sofa in one corner of the common room protected by Hermione's Muffliato spell.

"And you're sure it's enough for us to delay Slughorn a little bit?" Longbottom said with a bit disappointment in his voice. "You don't want us to curse Riddle, huh?"
Hermione grinned at him. She knew he would love to hex Riddle as he never seemed to have liked him. But hexing Riddle was a risky business and she wouldn't let anyone try that.

"No, I'll take care of him."

"So, what are you going to do?" Weasley asked as he leaned conspiratorially towards her.

"You'll see," Hermione answered elusively. "I'm just going to make sure that no-one believes those absurd rumours anymore."

After her last statement she waved her wand and canceled the Muffliato spell. The four of them continued to sit in the common room and chatted and played wizard's chess. Hermione really enjoyed it though all the time she had to ignore the pain in her chest that reminded her of two other Gryffindors she should be sitting with now.

It was nearly one in the morning as Longbottom stretched and declared he would go to bed now. Weasley who was lying half asleep sprawled over one sofa joined him. Hermione was also getting off the couch as Lupin caught her arm. She looked back at him and as she saw the determined look on his face sat down again.

"What's wrong, Amarys?" Hermione asked concernedly.

"You know, I can understand that you want revenge for what Riddle did," Lupin began. "But… " he hesitated.

"Yes?" Hermione asked.

"You are new here, Hermione. So you don't know but there are some nasty things going around Riddle and his little group of Slytherins," Lupin elaborated.

"Nasty things?"

"Yes. Nothing certain. But last year there was this incident were students were petrified. It took the staff two month to revive them again. The whole thing resulted in the death of one student. That was really horrible."

"And you think Riddle's behind that?" Hermione asked though she knew the answer to that better than Lupin.

"I don't know," Lupin said quietly. "Dumbledore at least seemed suspicious of him. And there are more stories like that though that was the worst one. Two years ago, for example, there was this girl, Elisabeth Bingle, from Huffelpuff. She was infatuated with Riddle. She was always waiting for him after classes and following him around everywhere. But he never returned that affection. I think he was peeved by her behaviour. And then one day she just disappeared."

"Disappeared?" Hermione asked incredulous. She'd never heard that story about Voldemort's days at Hogwarts.

"The teachers told us she had transferred to Beauxbaton. But I had a feeling there was something strange going on. I don't know, Hermione. Maybe I'm just seeing things. But what I wanted to tell you is: Be careful. Riddle is definitely dangerous."

Hermione looked at Lupin. His face was severe and she could tell that he was honestly worried about her. She felt incredibly thankful for that. It was good to know that at least some people still cared about her. He was right to be worried, Hermione thought. He didn't know how right he was about Riddle.

"Don't worry, Amarys. I'll be cautious," she tried to reassure Lupin.
I Know Your Name

Hermione used the remainder of the weekend to catch up on her homework and have another library session. As she had decided she would set about the raid on Dumbledore's office after her little revenge on Riddle she didn't try to spy out Dumbledore's daily routine. And so the weekend passed without any occurrences.

The following Monday found Hermione waiting in one of the dungeon's corridors not far from Professor Slughorn's office waiting for the three boys. They had agreed to meet at 7 a.m. Longbottom and Lupin arrived first. They were both carrying their school bags which seemed to be slightly fuller than necessary for the school day.

"Morning," Hermione greeted them. "Do you have everything?"

"Sure!" Longbottom answered with a lopsided grin.

"Where's Richard?" Lupin asked Hermione.

"He'll be here shortly I'm sure," Hermione replied confidently.

And sure enough as she said that Weasley came jogging down the corridor.

"Is Slughorn in the Great Hall?" Hermione asked Weasley as he had reached them.

"Yes, sitting at the teachers table and stuffing his face with bagels," Weasley reported breathlessly.

"Perfect," Hermione said relieved. "Now to the next step. You three go to Slughorn's office and set everything up. It shouldn't take you more than ten minutes. In the mean time I go back to the Great Hall and have an eye on Slughorn."

"Aye aye, sir!" Longbottom saluted in front of her while grinning mischievously.

"And you really know what you are doing, aren't you," Hermione asked them again concerned.

Weasley rolled his eyes and said, "Hermione, we've gone through this at least a hundred times. We know what to do. And if we fail there's still Lupin, huh?" He punched Lupin in the side. "He's a genius, he'll fix everything."

"Okay okay. I know you'll do it," Hermione replied. "And you know how thankful I am that you are helping me, don't you?"

Longbottom laughed at that.

"Aww, Hermione. You've thanked us enough already. And besides we really enjoy this kind of stuff. So don't worry."

"Thanks," Hermione whispered again

"Now I'm really anxious to see what you'll do," Longbottom grinned at her.

"Damn, and I'm going to miss it," Weasley stated. "Stupid Divination!"

Hermione smiled at them. "Good, then let's get going."
With that the four parted ways and Hermione headed back to the Great Hall alone. She was nervous about the whole thing. She was challenging Lord Voldemort after all so a little bit apprehension was in order. And she felt bad about dragging the three Gryffindor boys into this. But she had taken care that nothing would lead back to them. If the whole thing went wrong she would be the only one Riddle would go after. Hell, even if everything went as planned he would still go after her skin.

She could just hope the diversion in professor Slughorn's office would go smoothly. Weasley, Longbottom and Lupin would brew a little potion in his office. The Kapnos potion to be exact. Hermione was glad Lupin had agreed to take part in the whole thing as he was very good at potions. The Kapnos potion was an old potion Hermione had found in her History of Magic book. It had been invented by the old Greeks. They had used it to smoke out enemies. So all the three boys had to do was brew the potion, as it must be used fresh, and then spill it all over Slughorn's office. After some time it would begin to transform into thick, heavy smoke, no spells could get rid off. At that point Weasley would come to the Great Hall to get professor Slughorn. Longbottom, Lupin and herself would go down to the potion's classroom. Professor Slughorn would have to deal with the mess and would be accordingly late for his class giving Hermione time to get back on Riddle.

Hermione arrived at the Great Hall and sat down at the Gryffindor table. She then had her breakfast like she normally had and waited for Weasley to arrive at the Great Hall to get Slughorn. After some time she saw him as he walked towards the teachers table. Hermione smirked. That would give her at least ten to twenty minutes until Slughorn would arrive at potions. Ten minutes were more than enough to get her plan into action. She strolled down to the dungeons. There was no need to hurry because she knew Slughorn would be late and she needed all the other students to be present to witness her little 'confession'. The potions class was just perfect for her plan. She was sitting right beside Riddle but more importantly Rose and Lucia were sitting at a table behind her. They would be able to hear every word. And they were the worst gossip mongers Hermione'd ever met.

Hermione arrived at the door to the potions classroom. She could hear chatter coming from the room. So the students were already there. She made to open the door but before that she got rid of the evil grin on her face and tried to look depressed. Then she entered the classroom. With one look she confirmed that most of the students were there and that Riddle was among them. The chatter had died down somewhat upon her entry. But as the students realized that it was her and not Slughorn who had entered she was met by the now familiar evil glares. She let her head hang and walked slowly over to her place. Riddle was already sitting at the table. One of his arms hung elegantly over the back of his chair and a small curl was tugging on his lips as his gaze fell on her. Hermione sat down on her place. In the corner of her eyes she could see Riddle looking at her. He was obviously enjoying the whole situation.

Not for long! Hermione grinned inwardly. Outwardly she looked frightened at Riddle. She could see his eyes shining with amusement and triumph at her submissive behaviour.

In a very small voice Hermione said hesitantly, "Riddle…?"

He raised an eyebrow at that and looked at her cockily, "Yes, DeCerto?"

Hermione carefully measured the hesitancy in her voice. "I… I wanted to apologize to you."

She could tell he was now really surprised.

Hermione continued, "I know it was wrong of me. I should never have pressed you."

Here Hermione saw Riddle's expression change. His cockiness went and was replaced by suspicion. They both knew she had never in any way put him under pressure.
"I'm sorry I used those spells on you in DADA. And... and that I cornered you in that corridor."

Hermione noted with satisfaction that the chatter around them had died down. So the other students were hearing into this conversation. It was really crucial that they heard everything.

So now she had to get this conversation in the right direction. She said timidly while looking at Riddle, "But I told you why I had to ask you."

Riddle's glare was growing even darker now and he said, "No, you didn't"

Hermione sniffed softly and tried to wipe some non-existent tears from her eyes. "It's okay. I never expected you to listen," she said, seemingly fighting a brave battle against the tears threatening to fall from her eyes.

Hermione took notice of some shuffling behind her and she even thought to hear someone indignantly exclaim 'poor girl'. Now there were really some tears threatening to fall from her eyes – tears of suppressed laughter.

Riddle scowled at her rather darkly. Then asked, "So why did you ask me out?"

He obviously wanted to embarrass her by forcing her to say something stupid like, 'Because you are so handsome.' Hermione had to really work to not laugh out loud as she continued,

"I told you about my friend back home in France. Oh, he was so very important to me." At that she looked down, averting Riddle's eyes. "He even asked me to marry him."

She paused a little bit to let the information sink in. Though to the others it seemed like she tried to regain her composure. Then she looked up at Riddle again. He was still scowling at her. He clearly didn't see were this was going.

So Hermione continued, "And then, you know, I told you, that horrible thing happened. And he... he..." She broke off and sniffed before she choked out, "My friend was killed."

Behind her someone breathed in sharply. But Hermione looked in Riddle's grey eyes. She could feel a tear tickling down her left cheek. Oh, she was good.

"I had to leave my home and I came to England to enroll in Hogwarts." Hermione stopped here. She could nearly feel the curiosity of the other people in the room. And she wasn't going to disappoint them. "I told you about my friend before but what I didn't tell you is that you... that you..." She looked pleadingly at Riddle before she burst out, "You look just like him! Just like that friend. You could be his twin."

Riddle looked shocked at her. But that was an act, wasn't it? So much a lie like her fairy tale story was. He could see right through it but was unable to do anything about that. Hermione could see the fury behind his mask and would have liked to be able to laugh in his face. But she had to control herself.

"I just had to ask you for a date. I know it was stupid. He is dead. But whenever I looked at you I saw him." She wiped off the tears on her cheeks. "And when you rejected me I got angry. Not at you but at me for being so stupid as to run after a dream. I'm sorry I was venting that on you."

Riddle glared at her. But he didn't want to give up yet. So he asked her in a curious sounding voice, "I'm sorry for your loss. But those spells you used in DADA, they were quite dangerous. Did you really use them just to vent your anger?"
He sounded understanding but Hermione could hear the underlying coldness. But it was a fair question. He was good, Hermione had to admit. Though not good enough, she thought smugly because she had an answer to that.

"Those spells. They were dangerous," Hermione spoke now in a quiet voice. "I got carried away. I am so sorry." She wanted him to coax the answer out of her.

Riddle looked at her. She could see something like triumph in his eyes. Bring it on! she thought.

"Why would you attack someone who looks like that dear friend?" he asked in his sweet voice.

"You have to know, my friend wasn't killed by HIM." Hermione broke off. She could hear some whispers behind her and was sure everyone knew whom she was referring to, Grindelwald. "My friend was a good man. But the atmosphere in France is tense at the moment. So much fear, so much uncertainty. And my friend got to know the wrong people and he kept bad company. That's when he changed."

Hermione started to cry again and continued in a soft voice, "He was seduced by the Dark Arts."

She could hear a few gasps behind her.

"I left him then because I couldn't follow him where he was going. The last thing I heard from him was that he had joined HIM. And then he attacked his own family because they wouldn't join his master."

Now this one was important. Hermione had to play this card very cautiously.

"During that attack he... he..." Hermione choked and then whispered. "He killed his own father, Riddle."

Hermione locked eyes with Riddle. He was staring at her. His eyes still the familiar cold grey. But there was something more. Hermione just couldn't place it.

"Can you imagine that? Someone killing his own father? What a despicable crime!"

Hermione knew he would be able to imagine how killing one's own father would feel like. He had done it already. Just a few months ago.

"I had left France already when I heard that Aurors had gotten to him. They had tried to arrest him. But he fought them and he got killed." Hermione's voice was a soft whisper now. But she made sure that it was loud enough for the people sitting around them to catch every word. "During our duel I got so confused. I mixed you two up. You attacked me. But for me it was him attacking me. So I got scared and used spells I should never have used. I hope you can forgive me."

She looked at him expectantly. As did many more people in this room, she was sure. He was sitting in his chair with a straight back and staring at her. He clearly was pondering his options right now. Hermione suppressed a grin from forming on her face. He really didn't have much of a choice. What could he do? Telling the poor girl who had lost her friend that he didn't forgive her? No, that would destroy his perfect reputation he had so worked on. Riddle obviously came to the same conclusion as he smiled at her charmingly,

"Of course I forgive you. I can understand you. You had to go through a lot."

"Thank you," Hermione answered sounding relieved. She flashed him a smile. But they both knew that that smile was more a smirk than anything else, it was as honest as his forgiveness had been.
At that very moment the door to the classroom opened and professor Slughorn stepped in. Hermione nearly chuckled at his perfect timing. He couldn't have arrived at a better moment. Professor Slughorn looked slightly disheveled as he walked over to his desk.

"Sorry for the delay but there was a small mishap I had to solve first," he said. "But let's not waste anymore time." He pulled a pile of parchments out of his bag and then started to hand them out to the students. "I've read through your essays about the Ortus potion," Professor Slughorn declared while he handed one essay to Lupin. "And I am rather delighted that most of you have grasped the understanding of this exquisite potion. Though others should go over the basics again." He frowned down at Longbottom as he handed him his essay back.

As the professor reached Hermione's table he handed one essay to Malfoy without comment. As Riddle received his essay, professor Slughorn smiled down at him fondly.

"Excellent work, as usual, Mr Riddle."

Professor Slughorn handed the next essay to Hermione.

"Ms DeCerto, your essay about the Ortus potion was formidable. Never read something more detailed. It was really enlightening." Professor Slughorn beamed down at her.

To Hermione's amusement she could see from the corner of her eyes Riddle scowl at the professor angrily. Riddle obviously didn't like her being praised. But Hermione wasn't surprised that professor Slughorn had liked her essay. Ever since he had mentioned that they would brew the potion during the year Hermione had read every work available about the Ortus potion, accumulating a lot of information. And it had been worse than she had expected. This potion was indeed able to determine the actual date of birth of the person it was tested on. She was in deep trouble.

During the rest of the lesson professor Slughorn lectured about how the differences of ingredient's quality can affect a potion. Hermione thought it was rather interesting until she noticed that Riddle wasn't taking any notes like he usually did. Instead he was glaring murderously at her. There was even a slight red sheen to his eyes. After Hermione noticed his hostile stares she rather felt frightened and really wished for the lesson to be over soon so she would be able to flee Riddle.

Her plan had unfolded perfectly though. Time would show if the other students believed her and finally stopped their absurd hostility towards her. But it was very probable that they would. The best part was that she had achieved that by forcing Riddle to accept her apology. He himself was responsible now if the other students stopped to attack her. Unfortunately, judging from the death glares Riddle was sending her he too was convinced that she had outsmarted him. Hermione was sure he would retaliate in some way. But her revenge had been sweet. Riddle had used his popularity to discredit her, to rile the other students up against her. He had made sure that every one of her peers hated her. The result had been that they had shunned her and made her life very difficult. Hermione had had no other choice than to get back at him. But how to hit him best? She could have tried to curse him or to ridicule him in another way. But that wouldn't have been satisfying. Most probably, Riddle would have turned such a blatant proceeding against her.

No, Hermione needed something much more subtle. Riddle had put so much effort into creating that lie about her that Hermione had decided to use that very rumour and turn it into something that would play to her favour. Riddle's rumour about her being a crazy stalker had been cleverly constructed. Riddle had created the rumour to show his superiority by locking her into this inescapable maze of lies. So, Hermione had taken his evil rumour and had woven her own lies around it. Thus changing Riddle's very own creation into something that would attack him instead. It had been more than satisfying to do just that and to rub it in his face. As he had accepted her fake-apology his eyes had been burning with hate because Hermione had brought him into this situation, she had controlled the situation and he was forced to do exactly what she wanted him to do. And of course, for Lord Voldemort the worst thing was to admit defeat.

Hermione brought out of her musing as Professor Slughorn ended the lesson. The students got up gathered up their stuff and left the classroom. As Hermione passed professor Slughorn’s desk he looked up at her and said,

"Ah, Ms DeCerto. Please, if you have a moment."

Hermione looked at the professor and saw that infamous glint in his eyes. She somehow knew what he wanted from her.

"Of course, sir," she answered politely.

Hermione could see Longbottom standing at the door. He was gesturing to her that they would wait for her. Hermione was grateful for that because she really wouldn't appreciate it right now if Riddle caught her alone on her way back to the Gryffindor common room.

"Now, Ms DeCerto, I hope you had time to consider my invitation to the Slug Club." Professor Slughorn said as he beamed fondly at her.

Hermione tried to smile. She didn't really want to join the Slug Club but she knew how persistent the professor could be. And she really didn't need him snooping around her in addition to Riddle.

"Yes, sir. It's a pleasure to join," she lied through her teeth.

"Perfect, perfect." Professor Slughorn smiled. "I'm glad you'd join. And you are perfectly on time, too. Because there's a small party at this week's Friday. I hope you have time?"

Hermione had to fight to maintain the polite smile on her face. "Of course, professor."

"Good," Professor Slughorn said. "We will start at around eight and of course you are allowed to bring an escort. I am sure you have plenty of admirers." He winked at her.

Hermione left the classroom while contemplating how very little professor Slughorn would change during the next fifty years. It was almost frightening. His hair was a little bit fuller and his belly a little less fat but aside from that there was no difference to his older counterpart. In some twisted way it was also reassuring.

Hermione saw Longbottom and Lupin standing in the corridor waiting for her. Longbottom was waving at her while Lupin looked slightly pensive.

She had barely reached them as Longbottom started to talk, "Wow, Hermione, that was some acting you pulled there. I've never seen Riddle look so baffled. The stupid git really didn't know what to say in the end."

Hermione had to smile at that. "You think it will work?"

Longbottom put an arm around her shoulders playfully. "Sure thing! This evening at the latest the whole school'll know and then they'll all stop teasing you!"

Tease? Hermione thought amused. She wouldn't have used that exact word to describe what the others had done to her the last weeks but she was glad to hear that her little plot had been convincing.

She scanned Lupin. He was still looking reserved.
"You don't approve?" Hermione asked him.

"I don't know, Hermione," he said hesitantly. "That story was just a little bit too much."

"Yes, about that. Let's talk about it in the common room. I don't want any eavesdroppers hearing in on us," Hermione said.

They walked back to the Gryffindor common room. Hermione was thinking about how much she would tell her friends while Longbottom was talking happily about how he had enjoyed to see Riddle be outsmarted.

As the three sat down on a couch in the common room Hermione waved her wand and whispered, "Muffliato!"

Before any of the boys could say anything Hermione turned to Lupin and said seriously, "I can understand why you didn't like my proceeding. Inventing a sob story so that everyone pities me just to get back at Riddle? It seems paltry."

"Don't be so harsh on yourself. I thought it was brilliant," Longbottom cut in while chuckling.

"Well, the thing is," Hermione continued quietly. "That story wasn't purely fictional."

Hermione saw Lupin's eyes widen in surprise and Longbottom stopped laughing.

"That wasn't…?" Lupin mumbled surprised. "It was true?"

Hermione looked down on her hands and breathed in deeply then said softly, "Part of it, yes."

"Which parts?" Lupin asked quietly as he put a hand on Hermione's arm.

"I had a friend that really looked a little bit like Riddle."

Sorry, Harry! But it's true. Hermione silently apologized to Harry.

"I loved that friend like a brother. He knew a very dark wizard. But Harry, my friend, never joined him like I told Riddle," Hermione told them quietly. "He would never have joined someone so evil. He even tried to stop that dark wizard. And he succeeded," Hermione said with pride in her voice. "Harry was an exceptional wizard."

"Was?" Lupin asked her gently.

Hermione breathed in deeply to get her emotions back under control.

"Yes, was," she said with a soft voice that shook a little before she continued slowly. "That dark wizard was very powerful. And though Harry managed to stop him he couldn't save his own life."

Longbottom and Lupin both stared at her. Hermione looked down on her hands folded in her lap. She hoped Harry would forgive her for using his story so shamelessly. But then again she had used it to get back at Riddle. Probably Harry would have liked it. She smiled sadly at that thought.

"I'm sorry."

"Yes, we never knew."

Hermione looked up. Longbottom and Lupin still sat on the sofa but now looked very put down.
"It's okay," she smiled at them. She didn't want to see sad faces anymore. She had had enough of that to last her a lifetime. "I'm sure wherever Harry is right now he's laughing his head off."

Before she added mischievously, "He wouldn't have liked Riddle either."

During the rest of the day Hermione contently watched her little scheme unfold. As she walked to her next class she noticed that the number of girls glaring darkly at her was decreasing. During lunch there was only one curse flying her way instead of the usual minimum of ten. She was surprised and pleased as a Gryffindor even walked over to the Ravenclaw girl who had sent the curse and told her off indignantly. In short, Hermione could almost see how the story of her performance during Potions was spread through the gossip mill of Hogwarts. She would have enjoyed it even more if it weren't for Riddle's dark glares. As the glares from the other students were lessening Riddle's gaze was getting fiercer and fiercer. During lunch right after the Gryffindor told the Ravenclaw off for sending a curse at Hermione, Riddle caught her gaze. He was looking right at her and his grey eyes were radiating off hatred and a promise for retribution. Hermione could feel a chill darting down her spine and she quickly looked away from Riddle.

So after a long day Hermione was glad to finally find refuge in the sanctuary that was the Gryffindor common room. She sat down beside Weasley, Lupin and Longbottom on a sofa near the fireplace. The fire was crackling merrily and Hermione leaned back on the soft sofa and closed her eyes. She was tired. Actually the whole situation was tiring. She had fought against Voldemort before and she didn't want to repeat that experience. She knew what a cruel enemy he could be. Last time she hadn't been alone. Her friends had fought alongside her but here in the past she was utterly alone. No-one here knew about her predicament and Hermione wasn't going to burden anyone with her knowledge of the future. It was still a mystery to her why she had been sent here, five decades in the past. Why did the Elder Wand have to punish her? And why this specific time?

Hermione sighed deeply.

"Hey, Hermione, you all right?" Hermione heard Longbottom's voice ask her.

Hermione opened her eyes and looked at the three boys sitting next to her. Lupin and Weasley were obviously right in the middle of a game of wizard's chess. It looked like Lupin was losing spectacularly. It seemed the ability to do well in chess ran in the Weasley family. Hermione smiled at them though the memory of another Weasley was making her heart hurt.

"Just tired," Hermione replied.

"Well, obviously spinning intrigues is a tiring matter," Weasley said as he looked up from his chess pieces and grinned at Hermione.

"Yes," Hermione grinned right back at him. "But at least it was worth the effort."

"Told you so," Longbottom said happily. "By the end of today everyone'll know about it. And see," Longbottom looked around the common room as if he expected some sneak attack. "No evil curses flying your way anymore."

"What did Slughorn want by the way?" Lupin asked her abruptly.

"Huh?"

"He held you back after potions. Remember?" Lupin elaborated.
"Ah, yes. He asked me about the Slug Club. So I joined," Hermione had to fight to keep the reluctance out of her voice. "And then he invited me to some party at Friday."

"Ah, the 'Slug Club'!" Longbottom said as he leaned back in the sofa and his gaze wandered to-and-fro between Lupin and Hermione. "So, you two brains going together then?"

Lupin broke out into laughter at that point. Hermione was bewildered and raised an eyebrow at him. "What's so funny?"

"It's just, he always wanted to go to one of Slughorn's famous parties," Lupin told her between giggles.

"Yeah, smooth, Marc, smooth," Weasley said as he elbowed Longbottom in the ribs. "Way to go!"

"Ah, so you want me to take you there?" Hermione asked Longbottom innocently though the smirk on her face wasn't as innocent.

"Pretty please?" Longbottom gave her the puppy-dog-eyes.

"I don't know, Longbottom. I have a lot of admirers. I can't just take anyone," Hermione told him and the smirk on her face was widening.

"Yep, you could ask Riddle," Weasley said seriously.

The four of them stared at each other for a moment before they snorted in laughter.

"Yeeees, I should really do that just to see his face," Hermione laughed. "But seriously, Marc, it would be a pleasure if you would accompany me to the party." She turned towards Longbottom and patted his shoulder. It was quite amusing for her to see his face getting red.

Then she got up from the sofa.

"I'm going to bed. I'm really tired," she declared before she took off in direction of the girl's dorm.

"Night, Mione," she heard Weasley's still amused voice calling after her.

Hermione reached the dorm and to her annoyance found Diana, Rose and Lucia sitting on Lucia's horribly pink bed and reading in a fashion magazine.

Hermione walked silently over to her bed as Rose greeted her benignly, "Hermione, are you going to sleep already?"

"Oh, so now it's 'Hermione' again? Hermione thought angrily.

"Yes, I'm tired," she replied politely but offhandedly.

"No, you can't go to sleep!" Lucia said in a whiney voice. "You have to tell us about the boy who looks just like Riddle."

Hermione breathed in deeply to control her temper. Did they expect her to just forget the past weeks in which they hadn't spoken one word with her? ...apart from the occasional insult of course. Hermione turned around and glared at the three girls.

Then she said stiffly, "Considering that this friend of mine is dead I'm sure you understand that I am not inclined to talk about him."
The three girls had at least the decency to look a bit ashamed. Lucia looked down on her hands and mumbled in an embarrassed voice,

"Of course."

Hermione turned around and walked, still fuming, over to her bed. The nerve of those girls!

"Hermione?" she heard a tentative voice call for her.

Hermione looked back at the three girls sitting on the bed.

"We were horrible to you," Diana said sincerely, "We're truly sorry."

The other two girls sitting beside Diana were nodding hastily. Diana looked like she really meant what she said. Or maybe it was the fact that Diana was a relation of Harry that made Hermione's anger dissolve.

"It's okay," Hermione said while she looked into Diana's green eyes.

Diana smiled at her shyly and Hermione smiled back at her before she finally retrieved her pyjama from her trunk and left for the bathroom.

Riddle was on his way to the Slytherin common room. His hands were balled into fists and he had to really work to keep his magic from lashing out at random people, passing by.

_That bitch!_ Who did she think she was? She had made him look like an idiot!

He remembered the conversation he had had right after this nauseating act DeCerto had pulled during potions:

"Oh, Tom." One of those stupid girls really had the nerve to speak to him and call him by that disgusting name. "Did you really know that about DeCerto? The poor girl. Why did you treat her so bad then?"

Riddle breathed in slowly to get his temper back under control. Fuck, not only had DeCerto managed to redeem herself in the eyes of the other students, no, now those silly girls were after him.

"We know you don't want to have her for a girlfriend," another of those silly girls threw in. "But maybe you should try to befriend her."

Riddle had to restrain himself from pulling his wand and cursing the stupid girl. Instead he smiled, and he knew that this time he didn't quite manage to let it look honest.

"You know, maybe you should apologize to DeCerto."

Now this one was enough. Riddle's magic was raging inside of him, begging to be released.

"You were so dismissive towards her. And you didn't listen to her story. I'm sure she had been crying secretly."

Riddle bit his tongue to stop himself from uttering this really dark curse that needed to be hurled at those stupid girls. DeCerto crying in secret? Riddle knew that whatever DeCerto did in secret it sure as hell wasn't crying.
"Think about it," another of the girls who were hassling him said in her shrill voice. "DeCerto's fiancé died. I'm sure she just wanted to talk with you about it. And you didn't listen. You were so cold towards her. You need to apologize to her."

Where were all those mentally retarded girls coming from? Riddle had to fight to keep the polite smile on his face and to look a little bit guilty. When in reality he was beyond furious.

Those dumb girls had followed him around for the rest of the day. Some of them pestering him about how he could be so cruel to poor DeCerto, some others were only watching him. Riddle didn't know what they were expecting from him. Maybe they were following him around to not miss it if he was going to apologize to this apparently 'poor' girl.

He had actually considered to really apologize to DeCerto, just to get rid of those silly girls following him around. But in the end he knew he wouldn't be able to stand that triumphant smirk that would surely be on DeCerto's face if he did that. Riddle felt his magic peak again and he had to concentrate to stop the Dark Magic from crackling around him. She had tricked him. DeCerto had really tricked him. He had to admit it, she was good. Her little sob story had convinced all those brainless gits. Now they would stop attacking her and that would take the pressure off DeCerto. The pressure he had put on her. Instead of going after her, now those girls were after his blood. It had been a clever move of her. But he wasn't going to let her get away with it. No, he was going to show her why it was a bad idea to start a fight with him.

He entered the Slytherin common room, passed it without talking with anyone and then entered his dormitory. To his annoyance he found Lestrange and Alba there. They looked up upon his entry and Riddle glared at them.

"Get out!" Riddle hissed dangerously.

Alba got up from his bed and made to leave the room. He had obviously realized the mood Riddle was in. Lestrange wasn't that sharp so he whined,

"Aww, Riddle, we just got here. Let us stay."

Riddle scowled at Lestrange sitting on his bed. And then without saying anything Riddle pulled his wand and pointed it at Lestrange who flinched away.

"Abicere!" said Riddle.

A dark blue light left Riddle's wand and sped towards Lestrange. As the spell collided with Lestrange he was thrown off his bed and collided hard with the floor.

Lestrange lay groaning on the floor and Riddle said again in a low aggressive tone, "Get out!"

Lestrange got quickly up from the floor and hastily left the dorm avoiding Riddle's eyes. As he was finally alone Riddle sank down on his bed.

That damn girl!

The following days passed relatively uneventful. Hermione enjoyed it that the other students stopped their hostile behaviour towards her. It certainly made life easier for her. Though now Riddle's dark glares made up for that. Hermione found that rather unsettling. She knew he was planning something and tried to ignore him as best as she could. So she ended up spending a lot of time in the library. Her long library sessions made Ms Peters chide Hermione again for wasting away her youth with some old books. Hermione always smiled at her then. She quite liked the kind librarian. And that was why she didn't tell Ms Peters that her youth had ended a long time ago.

Friday, the day of professor Slughorn's dinner party, came much too soon to Hermione's liking. She really didn't want to go. Riddle would be there for sure and Hermione didn't think it would be a good idea to spend any more time with him than she absolutely had to. On top of that she didn't want to socialize with people who had hated her just a few days ago. But unfortunately, Hermione had accepted the potions professor's invitation. So she grudgingly grabbed one of her more formal skirts and a white blouse and tried her best to look like a normal student from the forties which was frustratingly difficult to achieve. She was glad it was professor Slughorn's party and not Legifer's. As Hermione finally left the girls dorm she found Longbottom and Lupin sitting in the common room and waiting for her. She could see Longbottom's face getting red as his eyes scanned her.

"Hello, Hermione. Ready?" Lupin smiled at her.

"Sure. Let's go!" The sooner they arrived there the sooner she would be able to leave again.

As they walked down to Slughorn's office Longbottom said, face still red, "You look nice, Hermione."

_Uh oh, I hope he doesn't think it's a date._ Hermione thought.

She did like Longbottom but not in that way. Hermione didn't think she would ever love anyone again. Not after Ron had been ripped from her. Her heart sank at the thought of Ron. She missed him so terribly. She could still not believe that she would never see him again. The memory of their fight in the Ministry was still as clear as if it had happened yesterday. Whenever Hermione closed her eyes she would see the green curse coming from Bellatrix' wand hitting Ron in the chest and then Ron's grotesquely peaceful face as if he were sleeping.

"Are you all right, Hermione?" she heard Longbottom's worried voice.

Hermione looked at him and smiled. "Yes."

"You don't have to worry about Riddle," Lupin told her sympathetically. "He won't dare do anything to you today."

"Yeah, we won't let him!" Longbottom said confidently.

Hermione couldn't share their optimism but she felt happy that they worried about her. It made her feel better and not so lost and alone anymore. Though she knew that was a treacherous impression. Neither Lupin nor Longbottom knew the truth about Riddle.

Before long they arrived at professor Slughorn's office. It looked just like the last time Hermione had been invited to a Slug Party though that was - or would be - 50 years in the future. The room was large but packed with people. Hermione recognized a few students, members of the Slug Club. Of course most of them were Slytherins, no surprise there. But there were also other guests. Hermione didn't know them but guessed they were either important members of the Ministry of Magic, famous Quidditch players or other celebrities.

"How about we get something to eat?" Lupin asked and pointed to an extravagant looking buffet.

Hermione agreed gladly. She had skipped lunch in favour of another, fruitless, library session and was rather hungry now. But before the three of them could reach the buffet somehow professor Slughorn appeared out of thin air.
He beamed at Hermione and Lupin but seemed to overlook Longbottom somehow. "How nice of you to join our little get-together, Ms DeCerto, Mr Lupin," Slughorn said to the both of them.

"Good evening, sir," Hermione said politely. "Thanks again for inviting me."

Slughorn beamed at her, "Not at all, not at all. One of my most promising students, you are. Wouldn't have wanted to miss you. And of course I wanted to introduce you to someone."

Slughorn then seemed to look for someone before he waved at a man standing a few metres away chatting with a group of people. The rather plump looking man smiled at Slughorn and came over to them.

"Anthony, there you are." Slughorn beamed at the man. He seemed to be in his mid-twenties, with thin brown, greasy hair and a rather prominent nose. "Now, Ms DeCerto, this is Anthony Vickers a very promising attorney of the Ministry's Court and someday he will be Highinquisitor, I'm sure." Here Slughorn winked at Vickers blatantly.

Hermione frowned at Slughorn. Why was he introducing them?

"And this, Anthony, is the young lady I've been talking about. This is Hermione DeCerto," Slughorn said as he turned to Vickers.

Vickers extended a hand towards Hermione and she shook it though it felt rather sweaty. "A pleasure meeting you, Ms DeCerto."

Hermione nodded. She still didn't get what that was about. But then Slughorn brought light in the matter with his next sentence.

"You must now, Ms DeCerto, Anthony has now arrived at the point where a man wants to settle down, have a family…"

That was when Hermione finally understood and her eyebrows shot up. Slughorn, the Dating Doctor? She shot a glance at this Vickers man. He was looking at her with interest in his eyes and Hermione felt a shiver running down her spine. The only way a woman could be successful was by marrying a yuppie like him? The forties were surely full of options for a young, talented woman. Hermione nearly rolled her eyes.

"Er… that is… er… fascinating," Hermione couldn't stop her voice getting higher at the end of the sentence so that it sounded more like a question than a polite statement.

"Say, Hermione," Lupin broke in on this absurd conversation. "Didn't you promise Diana to be right back? I think she is waiting for you."

Hermione turned to Lupin and frowned perplexed. What was he going on about? She never promised Diana anything. Then she saw Lupin wink at her inconspicuously.

"Oh, yes. Of course!" Hermione said, then turned to Slughorn and Vickers and continued exasperatingly. "I am so sorry but I have to go, someone is waiting for me."

"Not at all, Ms DeCerto. Don't let your friend waiting," Slughorn beamed at her then continued to Vickers. "See? What a reliable young lady."

Hermione quickly hurried away from the potions professor and his match-making intents.

"Thanks for saving me," she whispered to Lupin as they headed for the buffet table.
Lupin grinned at her and said, obviously more amused with the whole matter than Hermione was, "For a moment there, I was debating whether you wanted my help or not…"

Hermione prodded him in his side but smiled back at him.

"Really, that old pimp!" Longbottom looked back with a sour look on his face.

Hermione had to laugh at the whole event. Her laughter seemed to be contagious as her two friends were starting to laugh too. Then they finally managed to get some food so they sat down at a free table with loaded plates. After the Slughorn fiasco nothing bad happened and Hermione was glad to just enjoy a cheerful evening with her friends.

Some time later Lupin excused himself as he had obviously seen Stella Lovegood walking by. Hermione nearly fainted as she heard the name. Was that girl somehow related to Luna?

"He's a crush on her," Longbottom informed her as she looked after Lupin's retreating back.

Hermione raised her eyebrows. A Lupin and a Lovegood? Well, why not? She imagined Remus Lupin going out with Luna Lovegood and had to giggle at the idea.

Later that evening Hermione stood a little bit away from the other people and watched them chat. Longbottom had just gone to get them something to drink. Hermione hoped Slughorn and his bachelor friend wouldn't find her.

Suddenly somebody whispered in her ear, "Are you enjoying yourself?"

Hermione spun around and found Riddle standing right beside her smirking down at her with his strangely emotionless face. She scolded herself for not being more vigilant. The one person she had wanted to avoid was standing right beside her.

"It's nice," she answered and her voice was just as emotionless as Riddle's face. Then she added before she could stop herself, "Aside from the company." And looked pointedly at Riddle.

He raised one eyebrow, his empty smile not dropping from his face though Hermione could tell that she had managed to make him angry again. She had a talent for that it seemed.

"Careful, DeCerto, you don't want to appear ill-mannered, do you?" Riddle hissed at her.

Hermione took a step away from him. "What do you want, Riddle?" she asked him and was surprised that her voice didn't shake because he was scaring her again.

"Why, I just wanted to congratulate you," Riddle said nonchalantly though there was a certain amount of coldness in his voice. "For being such an exceptionally good liar."

"Not at all, Riddle," she replied. "We both know that that crown belongs to you."

Suddenly Riddle stepped forwards and quick as a lightening clutched her right wrist. Hermione gasped as she felt his hand closing around her wrist and she looked up at him with wide and frightened eyes. He wasn't going to do something here, was he? Not when the room was full of people, potential witnesses? Hermione took in a sharp breath of air as she felt Riddle radiating off this raw, aggressive magic. He stared down at her and his face was still an expressionless mask apart from his eyes. There was a dark and murderous glint in his grey eyes. Hermione shuddered as she saw the cruel coldness.
Then Riddle leaned forwards and whispered viciously in Hermione's ear, "Don't get complacent. You shouldn't think that I'm going to let you get away with your impudence."

Hermione stiffened as she felt his hot breath, which accompanied his icy cold words, on her skin. Her instincts were screaming to run away as fast as possible. But she knew from experience that running from him wasn't going to help her situation. So she gathered all her remaining courage, stood on tiptoes to reach his ear and laid her hand lightly on his arm then she whispered to him,

"Don't worry. I won't get complacent. Because I know who you are, Voldemort."

Hermione could feel him tense as she uttered the last word and his grip on her right wrist was becoming painfully tight. He stepped away and stared down at her. Hermione could see shock and a glint of upcoming suspicion in his eyes before he controlled his emotions again and glared at her furiously.

Hermione was sure that he was either going to slap her now or worse curse her. But she was saved from finding out which one as Longbottom appeared beside her. He was glancing at her worriedly and then his eyes narrowed as his gaze wandered to Riddle.

"Is everything alright?" he asked Hermione but continued to glare at Riddle.

Hermione felt Riddle releasing her wrist. His face was blank again as he looked somewhat bored at Longbottom.

"Of course. I was just talking with DeCerto here," Riddle said in an indifferent voice.

"Sure," Longbottom said sarcastically while he still eyed Riddle angrily. Then he turned to Hermione and said in a kinder voice, "Let's go, shall we?"

Hermione just nodded at him. She was rather glad for the opportunity to leave Riddle.

"Really, that bastard!" Longbottom huffed after they had walked away from Riddle. "Who does he think he is?" Then he turned to Hermione and looked at her concernedly. "He didn't do anything, did he?"

Hermione shook her head. "No, it's okay." Then she chuckled and said, "I'm actually surprised he didn't curse me on the spot. Thanks for saving me by the way."

"Anytime," Longbottom said, smiling down at her.

"But now to something much more interesting," Hermione said in an amused tone. "So, what's going on between Amarys and Stella Lovegood?"

Longbottom laughed out loud. "Stella and Amarys. That's a looong story. And we are all still waiting for the happy ending."

Hermione was lying in her soft bed in the dormitory. In the end it had been rather late until she had left the party. And she was surprised that it had even been fun.

Well, parts of it.

The part where Riddle had cornered her hadn't been that much fun. Hermione turned around in her bed in search for a more comfortable position.
Why did she tell him?

She had called him by his name, his chosen name. Voldemort. Now he was not only enraged by her outsmarting him with her little stunt during potions. No, he could be certain now that she knew things about him she wasn't supposed to know. That was safe to assume. She wasn't supposed to know that name. Hermione didn't think that at this point in time very many people knew his name. Most likely only his junior Death Eaters. Telling him had certainly been a bad move. But she couldn't change that now, could she? Hermione stifled a yawn. She would deal with the Tom Riddle problem tomorrow. Now she was just too tired to think straight.

Hermione ran. Down the wet path. Through puddles of mud and over roots breaking through the flattened earth of the path. They were after her. She could hear them chasing her. Somewhere behind her in the dark. She knew she would never be able to outrun them. But every metre she ran meant more safety for Harry and Ron.

Hermione hadn't been able to sleep tonight. So she had left the tent. But as she had walked a little bit away from their tent suddenly she had heard voices. She had crept closer, silently, cautiously, her wand drawn in her hand. And then she had seen them, Death Eaters. They had been searching the surroundings. Hermione's heart had nearly stopped. They had been dangerously close to the tent already. Hermione hadn't had much of a choice then. She needed to lure them away from her friends. So she had attacked them and that was why she was running right now. Away from the tent and her sleeping friends.

A curse shot by her. So close that she could feel its power burning on the skin of her cheek. It was no use to run anymore. She had to fight now. There were four Death Eaters so her chances of winning were not high. As Hermione passed the next tree she flung herself behind its trunk and didn't hesitate to fire curses at her pursuers. Those men were hunting her and her friends. They wouldn't hesitate to kill. So Hermione couldn't afford hesitation either. She hurled curses at them, dark curses, evil curses. This was war. It wasn't about fighting Dark Magic, it was about fighting Lord Voldemort. If Hermione had to taint herself by using dark spells then that was a sacrifice she would have to make.

She could see one of the Death Eaters crumble to the ground as he was hit by her curse. She shot another curse at the next Death Eater and her aim was true again. An incoming spell tore open her right arm and blood started to flow down her arm, her hand and dropped to the ground but Hermione wasn't noticing it. She fired another curse and the next Death Eater fell.

Before she could cast a curse at the last Death Eater he vanished into thin air just to reappear right before her. Hermione's breath stopped as she saw the smirk underneath the white mask. Then the Death Eater grasped her right wrist brutally and Hermione lost hold of her wand. Her eyes widened in fear as she stared into the empty eyes behind the mask. The man laughed cruelly before he leaned forward and whispered coldly in her ear,

"You will regret this, bitch!"

Then he hit her hard in the face so that Hermione was hurled to the ground before his feet. Black dots were dancing before her eyes but her mind was still focused and she felt the cold hate creeping up inside her. She wasn't going to allow this man to kill her. If she did, the man would then fulfill his true mission, to find Harry Potter. Hermione searched with her hand blindly on the ground. Then she felt the smooth surface of her wand. Her eyes shot up at the man standing before her. She wasn't going to allow him to find Harry and Ron, she thought and in her eyes burned a ferocious fire…
The next day Hermione woke early, at least for a Saturday. Her room mates were still lying in their beds, fast asleep. Hermione got up and left the Gryffindor common room half an hour later, fully dressed and prepared for yet another day in this foreign decade. As she arrived at the Great Hall she sat down at a relatively empty Gryffindor table. There were just some first and second years sitting at their places and eating their cereals. It was quite a relief that she was no longer the target of all the curses and hexes those Riddle-fans had hurled at her.

Hermione slumped down on a seat at Gryffindor table and poured herself a coffee while she scanned the other house tables. Ravenclaw’s was crowded, as expected, whereas Hufflepuff’s was just as empty as her own house’s table. Then Hermione risked a glance at the Slytherin table. She was relieved as she didn't see Riddle there, though she saw Malfoy sitting at the table looking rather tired. Malfoy stared right back at her and Hermione quickly averted her eyes. She wasn't in the mood for a staring contest. So she was rather glad as she saw Malfoy leave the Great Hall a short time later. She leisurely ate her breakfast and then left the Great Hall in direction for the library.

The castle was empty as most of the students were still lying in their beds. Hermione walked down a long corridor as suddenly the door she just passed opened and a pair of hands grabbed her and pulled her inside. Hermione gasped as she felt the strong hands grabbing her upper arms before she was hurled against the wall. She led out a hiss of pain as her back hit the wall hard. Then she looked up with wide eyes and found herself staring into a pair of icy cold grey eyes.

Riddle tightened his grip on her arms as he pushed her brutally against the stone wall. Hermione squirmed and tried to get away from him. But he was way stronger than her and had no problem holding her firmly in place.

"Let me go!" she shrieked.

"Who are you really?" Riddle said his voice a hiss, icy cold and demanding.

"W…What do you mean?" Hermione answered shakily.

Riddle pushed her into the wall again. "You know exactly what I mean!" his eyes were boring into her again. They had a red tinge around them. "How do you know that name?" his voice now a deadly command.

Hermione swallowed.

What now? The situation was completely out of her control. He was too strong and she couldn't get at her wand. She was scared. His grip was now so tight it was hurting her. But she mustn't tell him. He must never find out who she was. And where or rather when she was from.

"Answer me!" Riddle yelled at her.

She looked fearfully at his face. His look was murderous. His eyes were glowing red. They bored into her and she could again see this unbound hate in them. Suddenly she could feel something tugging at her mind, tearing at her thoughts and trying to gain entry to her inner most secrets.

Legilimency!

He was trying to rip the answers from her if she wasn't willing to give them freely! No, he wasn't allowed to see them. If he ever found out who she was - about what Ron, Harry and she had done - he would find a way to stop them. A way to save himself and destroy the peaceful future Hermione had fought for. The future her friends had died for. She raised her Occlumency shields. She knew they were strong maybe he wouldn't be able to break them. But would he stop, now that he knew something was not right with her? He would never give up. If he didn't get his answers now, he would...

Hermione hesitated. Do what? Threaten my friends? Murder my family? Kill my love? There's nothing left he can take from me.

She could feel a new resolution flowing through her. She raised her head and gazed into his red eyes. The panic was completely gone from her as she stared at him. She was determined now. He was not going to win this. She owed that to Ron, Harry and all her friends who had died.

And then she used a spell she had never used before. One that didn't need a wand to be performed. One that was made to steal information but could be used to hurt too.

Legilimens!

She could feel her Occlumency shields change. They had been a steady and solid barrier before but now they moved. She could move them. And she did. She rammed them against Riddle's mind. Faintly she could hear Riddle take in a surprised breath of air. But she had to concentrate on other things right now. There was a wall around Riddle's mind. It protected his mind and held her out. Those were his Occlumency shields. She tested them, she pushed against them. Then she attacked them with all the force she had. Riddle let go of her arms and stepped away from her. Hermione still stared at him unmoving. His Occlumency shields shook under her attacks violently. But they still held her of. She did not stop her onslaught though. She summoned all her power.

Then she sensed it again, that foreign magic in her that she had felt the first time during Transfiguration. It was still entwined tightly with her own magic. But this time Hermione didn't just look at it. She tried to use it. And that foreign magic seemed to cooperate with her. So she used the combined magic and struck Riddle's shields heavily. His shields crumbled and then disappeared. Hermione had now access to all his thoughts and memories. But she didn't want to look at them. Riddle's mind was evil and she didn't want to get infected by his darkness. There were other things she could do though. She didn't look at his mind but she ripped and struck at it. Riddle fell to his knees while clutching his head. He moaned in pain.

Hermione retreated then and left his mind.

She noticed that she still stood leaning against the stone wall where he had pressed her. She hadn't moved a bit. But Riddle had. He had moved a few steps away from her and was now trying to get on his feet. He looked at her. Hermione could see shock, hate and anger on his face. But there was something more. His eyes were back to grey. The glowing red was gone. And there was another emotion in them. An emotion she had never related with Voldemort.

He was afraid.

"Stay away from me, Riddle," Hermione whispered. Her voice void of all emotion. Then she turned and ran away from him.

{{{{{{{{+}}}}}}}}

Just like Hermione had told him, Riddle did stay away from her. If they accidentally met in one of the many corridors in the castle, Riddle would ignore her. He didn't even look her way. When they were having a class together, he didn't acknowledge her presence in any way, even if she was sitting right beside him. It was the same when they were eating in the Great Hall. Riddle never looked over to the Gryffindor table. In short, he was completely and thoroughly ignoring Hermione.

It didn't put her mind at ease, on the contrary his impassive behaviour was making her nervous. She knew Riddle as she knew Voldemort and he was a lot of things but certainly not a person who gave up easily. The only reason for his aloofness would be that he was planning something. Hermione tried to evade him whenever possible. But at the same time she knew that if he really wanted to get to her she wouldn't be able to stop him. The only way to really get out of his reach was to leave Hogwarts altogether but for Hermione leaving Hogwarts was not an option at the moment. She needed to get her hands on the Elder Wand and the best way to achieve that was by staying close to Dumbledore.

So weeks went by and very soon the castle was covered with a thick layer of snow. Hermione usually loved the cold weather but under the circumstances she couldn't quite enjoy it. So it was a cold Friday morning as Hermione entered the Transfiguration classroom and sat down on her seat next to Longbottom, Lupin and Weasley. She looked at the three boys beside her. Weasley seemed to be half-asleep, Lupin was re-checking his essay and Longbottom had apparently fallen in a state of panic while he glanced over Lupin's shoulder at his essay.

"Why's your essay this long?" Longbottom asked the other boy in a rather high pitched voice. "I thought we were supposed to write two foot."

Lupin didn't even look up as he answered in his composed voice, "We were. But I got carried away 'cause it was so interesting."

Here Longbottom stared at his friend incredulous before he said slowly, "Let me get this straight. You wrote twice as much as we had to because 'it was so interesting'?" The blond shook his head and continued, "You are crazy, you know that?"

Then Longbottom turned to Hermione and said, "He's crazy, isn't he, Hermione?"

Hermione grinned at him then she reached into her bag and produced her own essay and said, turned to Longbottom, "I don't know, Marc. I actually wrote about five feet but I still think I left so much out."

Hermione could see a small smile on Lupin's face as he continued to read his essay and Longbottom stared at her for some time, then again shook his head and mumbled something like, "Crazy super-brains." before he tried to smooth his crumpled two-feet-essay on the table.

Hermione smiled serenely as she arranged her parchment, quill and ink-well on her table. She was grateful that she had found such nice people here in the past. Without Lupin, Weasley and Longbottom the whole thing would have been even worse. Of course it still wasn't exactly a joyous experience, Hermione thought as she remembered who was occupying the seat right behind her. She could almost feel Riddle's stares boring into the back of her head. It made her nervous. Even more so as she was firmly convinced that he was planning something. Something evil to get back at him after his Legilimency attempt had backfired on him. Hermione looked up as she heard someone enter the classroom. Professor Dumbledore walked up to the teacher's desk. His blindingly-orange robes were clashing horribly with his auburn hair. Hermione grinned at her transfiguration teacher's eccentric taste of clothing.

"Good morning, class," Professor Dumbledore greeted them. He beamed at the students and continued, "I hope you found it as entertaining to write the essay about the transfiguration of magical objects as I undoubtedly will find reading them."
Then Dumbledore waved his wand and the essays flew from the tables of the students and piled up on the teacher's desk.

"Now, let's begin with our lesson," he said. "What do you know about devices to store magic in?"

Hermione frowned at the question. She didn't know the answer. She had never heard that it was even possible to store magic somewhere.

"No-one?" Dumbledore asked in a friendly manner. He obviously hadn't expected them to know. Though Hermione was sure that Riddle might know about it. But he never answered any questions Dumbledore asked them.

"Then let me enlighten you," Professor Dumbledore continued as he produced a small, black-velvet pouch out of his pocket. He pulled a small grey pebble from the pouch. "This is just a normal stone. A stone you could find at the shore of any lake." Professor Dumbledore elaborated as he saw the curious faces of his students.

Then he waved his wand over the pebble in his hand. Hermione could see a glow engulfing the stone shortly before it died down again and the stone looked like it had before. Hermione wondered what the spell had done to the stone. Dumbledore, seemingly satisfied with his wandwork, put his wand away and handed the small pebble to Weasley.

"Please, Mr Weasley, tell your class mates what you can feel." Dumbledore said as Weasley accepted the stone from him.

Weasley frowned at the stone in his hand and then he raised his eyebrows in wonder.

"It's radiating magic!" he exclaimed.

"Yes, exactly, Mr Weasley," Professor Dumbledore beamed at him fondly.

"What happened to the stone, sir?" A Slytherin girl, Susan Yaxley, asked curiously.

Dumbledore smiled at her before he began to explain, "I have changed the nature of the stone. Before I used the spell, the stone was a lifeless object without an ounce of magic inside. What I did is I transferred a small portion of my magic inside the stone. Not much, just the equivalent amount of magic used to produce a simple spell, like the Levitation charm for example. In doing such, I transfigured the stone into a magical object."

Hermione saw Weasley staring at the stone in his hand in wonder as professor Dumbledore continued.

"Now, can you think of a use such a transfiguration could have?"

"You could store up magic and use it as a back up?" one of the students said.

Dumbledore beamed and said, "Yes, that certainly would work. You could store magic inside an object and use it later to boost your magic in times of need. But there is another use for this transfiguration. Can you think of any object you know that might be created by transferring magic into it?"

Dumbledore waited here and after a while Lupin slowly raised his hand.

"Yes, Mr Lupin?" Dumbledore encouraged him.
"Um… the Sorting Hat?" Lupin asked slowly.

"Yes, very good. Five points to Gryffindor." Dumbledore smiled kindly at his student. "Yes, the Sorting Hat is a very good example for an object that was created by transferring magic. It was, as you all know, created by one of Hogwarts' founders. Godric Gryffindor made the Sorting Hat all those years ago by transferring his magic into an old hat. Of course he used more advanced spells to create the Sorting Hat than I did on the stone right now but the basics are the same. It is the exact same spell that underlies every magical object you know. And although it takes much more to create something like the Sorting Hat, the fundamental idea to store magic inside an object remains the same."

Dumbledore lifted up the black pouch in his hand and said, "I want each of you to take a stone and try to transfer some of your magic into it. The incantation is 'Confero'."

Hermione waited for her turn to take one of the pebbles out of the pouch. She looked at the inconspicuous stone lying on the palm of her hand. It was indeed, like Dumbledore had told them, a totally ordinary stone. Nothing special and certainly not magical. As Hermione looked at the stone she mused about what Dumbledore had just told them.

Every magical object is constructed in the same way! Objects like the Sorting Hat and …the Elder Wand?

Hermione breathed in deeply and closed her fist around the small stone in her hand. But what did it help her to know how the wand was created? Hermione thought frustrated. What she needed to know was how it could be used to bring her back where she belonged. But to know how the wand was created might be the key to the understanding of how it worked.

Transferring magic…

To create a magical object one had to transfer magic into the object. That's what Dumbledore just told them. Didn't she know about a strange and foreign magic that had inexplicably appeared out of no-where? Hermione opened her fist again and stared contemplatively at the pebble. That alien magic inside of her had appeared the first time as she had tried to transfigure that black lizard during class. Before that incident she had never felt anything remotely similar to this strange magic that seemed to be interwoven with her own magic.

The second time she had sensed this magic was the day Riddle had threatened her again and had tried to use Legilimency on her. Back then Hermione had even used the magic. Without the help of the strange magic she would never have been able to destroy Riddle's Occlumency shields.

So what exactly was that new magic? Where did it come from?

So far Hermione had more or less ignored the occurrence of the alien magic. It certainly had been strange but she hadn't put any energy in finding out what exactly had caused this magic to appear. There had been more pressing matters to take care of, finding a way home, getting the Elder Wand or not getting killed by Riddle for example. But maybe that strange magic was more important than she had thought.

She had never experienced something like that magic before… Before what?

It then hit Hermione and she knew where the magic had come from. It was like she had known it all along. It was easy, really.

The new magic had never appeared before she had travelled back through time – before she had destroyed the Elder Wand! As she had snapped that wand in two a flow of magic had started to pour out of the wand and inside of her. Hermione had thought the Elder Wand's magic had left her again. As she had woken up on that meadow near the village of Steepleton more than fifty years in the past she hadn't sensed any remains of the Elder Wand's magic. So she had just assumed the magic had been gone altogether.

But what if the Elder Wand's magic had never left her again? What if it was still inside of her, somewhere?

"Hey, Mione? What's wrong?"

Hermione looked up and found Weasley staring at her questioningly. He was holding one of the pebbles in his left hand and his wand in the other.

"Don't you wanna try?"

Hermione looked at the stone in her own hand then said to Weasley, "Sure, I was just thinking about something."

Weasley grinned at her and said, "Yeah, yeah, I know that. Happens to me always during History class. Wonder why?"

Hermione smiled and then focused her attention back at the task at hand. She put the stone down on the table and then brandished her wand while she muttered,

"Confero!"

Instantly she felt something pulling at her magic. She had to concentrate but then she was able to influence the direction in which her magic flowed. She readjusted the direction so that it now flowed towards the small pebble on her desk. Then she tried to change the amount of magic she aimed at the pebble. But just as she put more of her magic into it the flow flickered and then died down.

Hermione frowned at the pebble in front of her and then tried again. She managed to direct the flow of her magic at the pebble but as she tried to put more magic into it the flow broke again. It seemed transferring magic wasn't as easy as it had seemed when professor Dumbledore had demonstrated it. Hermione looked up from her table and scanned the classroom. She wanted to see how the other students progressed. Weasley was waving his wand furiously at his pebble as beads of sweat appeared on his forehead but it seemed his efforts were futile. Longbottom who was sitting right beside Weasley seemed to have given up completely and now amused himself by watching Weasley's fruitless attempts. Judging by the frustration on Lupin's face he wasn't any better than Weasley.

It must be really hard then, Hermione thought. If not even Lupin can manage the spell.

Hermione let her gaze wander over the classroom but she didn't spot any student who did better than her or Lupin. But maybe there was one who could do it after all, Hermione thought. She gathered up all her Gryffindor courage and threw a glance at Riddle who sat behind her.

Riddle sat at his table and looked down at the stone in front of him as he held his white wand elegantly in one hand. Hermione could see a frown appear between his eyebrows. Then he waved his wand over the stone but he didn't mutter the incantation. Hermione was surprised that he tried it nonverbal. She could see Riddle narrow his eyes in concentration as he stared at the stone. After some time he ended the spell. Hermione raised her eyebrows in surprise as she saw the same bright glow they had seen on Dumbledore's stone engulfing now Riddle's stone. Riddle had obviously managed to transfer some of his magic into the stone. Hermione was impressed. Though she really shouldn't be surprised. No-one had ever doubted that Riddle was an exceptional wizard.

Hermione then noticed that Riddle was staring at something behind her. His eyes were glinting with cold anger and loathing but she was surprised to also see defiance in them. Trying to not attract his attention Hermione followed Riddle's gaze and found Dumbledore. The transfiguration teacher was standing at the other end of the classroom and was looking at Riddle. Hermione was sure he had seen Riddle accomplish the task he had set for his students. But Dumbledore didn't award him any points or acknowledged Riddle's success in any way. Then after what must have been nothing more than a few seconds Dumbledore looked away and turned to a student to help him.

Hermione risked another glance at Riddle. He was looking pensively at the small stone in front of him then he waved his wand over the stone. The small pebble started to melt like ice in the sun. After some time there was nothing left.

Hermione turned away from Riddle. That had been really strange, she decided. Not the hate she had seen on Riddle's face and not his reaction at being ignored by Dumbledore. No, Hermione was taken aback by Dumbledore's behaviour. She hadn't seen hate or anger in Dumbledore's expression as he had looked at Riddle but he still had ignored him. Hermione had never seen Dumbledore do anything like that before and certainly not to a student. But then again at this point in time Dumbledore already knew what Riddle had done. He knew, though he couldn't prove it, that it was Riddle who had killed Moaning Myrtle.

Dumbledore's cold behaviour still disturbed Hermione. It was just so out of character for him to be anything but condoning and kind.

Later that day, Hermione was standing at the top most point of the Astronomy tower. Classes were over for today and she had climbed the Astronomy tower and was now standing on the platform outside. She leaned against the balustrade and looked over Scotland's rough beauty. Her gaze wandered over the lake glistening from the last sunrays of the day, over the snow covered tree tops of the Forbidden Forest and beyond Hogwarts' boundaries to the rugged mountains at the horizon. Hermione closed her eyes and breathed in the fresh cold air. A blanket of snow had fallen over the land. The peaceful scenery was somehow calming on Hermione's troubled mind.

Everything was so uncertain. Where would she go from here? Back to the future and to a wartorn land, where she belonged but where nothing waited for her? Or would she stay here, in the past? Living in a foreign world and watching the future unfold again? Unable to help?

Hermione sighed. She opened her eyes again and looked at the white landscape in front of her. Then she turned around. She hadn't come here to indulge in depressing thoughts. She didn't know whether she could manage to travel forwards in time. She didn't even know if such a thing was possible at all. But she would try. She needed to be successful lest she caused a ripple effect that would tear the future apart.

The Elder Wand seemed to be the best chance to get home.

Hermione then concentrated on her magic. She summoned the steady flow of power that always pulsed through her. It had always been there ever since she could remember. Though in her childhood she hadn't quite known that it was magic. But she had always known that it was a good thing. She tried to evoke all of her magic. She felt it inside of her, that familiar force. But now she needed to find the part of that force that was not so familiar. The part that was new and didn't quite belong to her. Hermione explored her magic in search of traces of the Elder Magic.
Beads of sweat were building on her forehead as she tried to find those strands of foreign magic. Quickly she felt exhausted as she had to concentrate very hard. Just as she was going to give up she found something. There it was, deeply embedded in her own magic, were strands of a different kind of magic. It was the same power she had felt during this transfiguration lesson and as Riddle had attacked her with Legilimency. Hermione tried to grasp this power, she tried to draw upon it or to influence it in any way. But this power seemed not be willing to cooperate. It slithered away from her grasp whenever she came near it. But the longer she tried, the more familiar the power felt. Hermione wasn't able to use that new magic but now she could see what it was. She had felt that force before. She hadn't been able to recognize it until now because the first time she had felt it, it had overflown her body in a much larger quantity. But now that she looked closely there was this unmistakable similarity. This foreign magic, interwoven with her own, was indeed the Elder Wand's Magic that still resided in her body.

Another evening wasted, Hermione thought as she left the hiding place behind the suit of armor. She had spent a few hours sitting there on the floor, facing the door to Dumbledore's office. It was rather frustrating. Dumbledore's daily routine was unpredictable. Sometimes he stayed in his office, working on Merlin knew what, until the early hours of morning. Sometimes he left his office at the early evening just to return hours later. He was unpredictable. Hermione needed time to slip into the office and search it. That would be after she had disabled the wards protecting Dumbledore's office. She couldn't have it that the professor caught her red handed when she was going through his things.

The main problem of this venture was that it was Dumbledore she was dealing with. He had a vast knowledge of magic. So if Hermione broke into his office and in the process brought down his warding spells she had to be extremely cautious. He could have all installed some spells in his office Hermione had never heard off. In triggering them she could consecutively get whole thing was rather risky. But it was a risk she had to take. At this point Dumbledore's office was her only chance to get her hands on something useful about the Deathly Hallows. And if she was caught...

Well, she would go over that bridge when she had to.

But she couldn't give up this venture. Not now that she had found out about the Elder Magic, still inside her. It had become most essential to learn more about the Elder Wand. She needed to learn how the wand worked. Or more specifically, how it was constructed. Each magical object was created by transferring magic. That was what Dumbledore had told them during transfiguration. The magic now inside of Hermione was exactly the magic that had served to create the Elder Wand.

But for today, Hermione thought as she stifled a yawn, she would leave the observing business and get some sleep. So she walked back to her dormitory, of course always careful not to alert any teachers or patrolling prefects to her presence. It was after curfew after all. Hermione felt quite exhausted tonight. This sneaking around in the castle at night was really bothersome. She couldn't comprehend how Harry and Ron had seemed to enjoy it during their days at Hogwarts. Harry had even sneaked out of the castle into Hogsmeade during his third year. Hermione had to smile faintly at that memory. She herself had never approved of them wandering the castle at night.

And now, look at me.

Harry and Ron would be surely proud of her now. Though the circumstances in which she was forced to break school rules were much more severe than they had been back in her time period. Hermione rounded another corner. She just had to walk down this corridor and in the next one was the entrance to the Gryffindor common room. She really looked forward to have a reunion with her soft pillow.
As Hermione walked down the dark corridor she suddenly felt a strong source of magic heading directly at her. She turned around quickly and raised a shield. She could just see the eerie purple light of the curse illuminate the corridor before it smashed into her shield. She could feel the force of the curse as it was absorbed by her shield. That hadn't been a harmless curse.

She saw a figure standing in the corridor but it was too dark to make out who it was. Hermione raised her wand at that figure ready to defend her again if need be. Then she felt a curse surging towards her. Again it came from behind her. There were two of them! Attacking her from two different sides. Hermione summoned her magic and raised the Scutulatus shield which incased her whole body. While raising the shield she stepped towards the wall of the corridor so that she stood with her back to the wall. The curse collided with her shield. Hermione could feel the shield drawing at her magic to stop the curse.

They were attacking her heavily, firing serious curses at her. Hermione could see the second attacker standing down the corridor in the opposite direction from the first one. Hermione was trapped in between.

Who were those people?

No, not now! Concentrate!

Hermione aimed her wand at the first attacker. She canceled her shield to be able to attack. Then she swished her wand in a fluid movement and a deep red curse left the tip of her wand. It sped towards the dark figure in the corridor.

Hermione could see her opponent raise a shield. It shone bright-blue in the dark corridor. She recognized it as a simple Protego. That was not nearly enough to stop her curse. And she was right. Her curse didn't even lose momentum as it shattered the Protego shield and then crashed into her opponent's chest who was propelled backwards and landed hard on the floor. Hermione didn't have time to concentrate further on this opponent as she felt another incoming curse. The second assailant had cast another curse. She sprang out of its way.

The curse rushed by her missing her by mere inches. As it passed she could feel it emanate vast quantities of strong magic. It hit the floor a few meters away fizzling dangerously. They were certainly not playing around.

Hermione just faced the second attacker as she heard steps behind her. She turned her head slightly and stiffened. There were more people creeping up on her. She was outnumbered. There were now at least five opponents. In the bare corridor she couldn't take cover anywhere. Hermione had barely time to raise a shield before she was attacked by a barrage of curses.

The curses hit her shield now heavily. The Scutulatus shield was a powerful spell but it wouldn't hold them up forever. She could feel the shield losing force with each spell that hit. How was it possible that she was attacked inside of Hogwarts? Didn't no-one hear the fight? Obviously not since no-one came running for her.

Suddenly Hermione saw a bright golden curse sped towards her. She didn't recognize it but she could feel it was very potent. The magic crackled in the air as the unknown curse rushed towards her. It crashed into her shield and Hermione had no chance of maintaining her protection. The golden curse was far too strong. It broke her shield down effortlessly before it hit her. It felt like she was hit by a car as she was hurled backwards. She hit the floor hard and skidded a few metres before she came to a halt. Black dots danced before her eyes. Her whole body was numb and aching at the same time. She only remotely felt her wand leaving her hand as the Disarming spell hit her. Then she heard steps. They were echoing in the now deathly quiet corridor.
Hermione wasn't surprised. Somehow she had known it since the first spell had been cast. Her suspicion had become certainty as she had seen the force behind the golden curse.

Tom Riddle was smiling down at her nonchalantly.

"Nice of you to join us," he said in his smooth voice.

Hermione stared up at him. That was bad. Really bad. She was unarmed, hurt and Lord Voldemort was out to get his revenge.

"I hope I didn't hurt you there," he said in mock-concern before he raised his wand at her.

The last thing Hermione saw was the red light of the Stunner before blackness engulfed her.

"Enervate!"

Hermione groaned in pain as her senses were coming back to her. She opened her eyes. She was staring at the black sky above her. Stars were twinkling down at her. Hermione was hurting. Her chest hurt where the golden curse had hit her and her back where she had landed painfully on the ground after she had been hit. The worst was the sharp throbbing pain coming from her left wrist. It was a familiar pain and she was sure the wrist was broken. Hermione rolled to her side and tried slowly to sit up. She felt shaky and cold.

"Back among the living?" Hermione heard a deep voice ask. It was followed by several snickers.

She blinked and tried to focus her eyes again. She then looked up at Riddle. He was standing a few paces away from her and was smirking down at her. In the corner of her eyes she could see that she was surrounded. There was a flicker of blond hair. Malfoy? And there beside Riddle stood Avery. How very nice. The old crowd united again.

There were more of them. Hermione thought she recognized Alphard Black among them. A Slytherin seventh year. And there, was that Lestrange? She could see at least five of them. And Riddle of course. He was standing there in the middle of his followers, radiating an air of authority as he looked down at her triumphantly.

Hermione felt her heart beating ridiculously fast. She was surrounded by her enemies. She was unarmed and outnumbered. There was no doubt in her mind what Riddle planned. She had defied him and now he was here to get his revenge.

"Now, DeCerto. You didn't really think you could challenge me and then just walk away, did you?" Riddle asked her lightly.

Though his tone was conversational Hermione felt a chill darting down her spine as he spoke. She looked up at his face. He showed no emotions besides the evil smirk that tucked at the corners of his mouth. And his eyes? They were deathly cold and his gaze was hard as steel as it bore into her.

"You know," he continued in his eerily composed voice. "You have been getting on my nerves for quite some time now."

Riddle walked towards her and began to circle her like a predator stalking its prey. Hermione tried to steady her breathing. But it was no use.
She could hear the soft sounds of his steps, then he said, "I have been lenient towards you. But not anymore."

Riddle stopped circling her and stood right in front of her. He extended a hand and Hermione twitched as she felt him touching her face. He caressed her cheek gently. She looked up at him with huge eyes, feeling like a deer trapped in the headlights of a car. Riddle looked down at her, smiling his cruel smile. He clearly enjoyed her fear.

Then he tucked a wisp of her hair behind her ear as he said, "You dared to mock me. I am not willing to tolerate that sort of behaviour."

Then he raised his wand. Hermione took in a sharp breath of air as Riddle pointed his wand at her. He whispered in a soft almost gentle voice,

"Crucio!"

Pure pain hit her. It was not the first time she had been put under the Cruciatrus curse. But there was no getting used to that kind of pain. It ripped at her body, at her every nerve. There was no way to block the pain out. It was all-consuming. Her mind was not longer able to think coherently. There was only the agony. She fell down on the ground. Her body twitched uncontrollably. It felt like she was burned alive. It felt like a thousand knives slashing at her, peeling the flesh from her very bones.

Then, it stopped.

She lay on the ground, tremors shook her body. Her breath was uneasy and cold sweat was running down her face.

Someone chuckled in her ear, "That is what awaits those who defy me."

Voldemort! Hermione's pain clouded mind apprehended. He was crouching down beside her, scoffing at her. Was he going to kill her now? What was it to him? One life more or less? He was a murderer anyway! Cold, calculating, merciless. She trembled in fear. Hot tears were running down her cheeks. She was so afraid of him, of what he could do.

"Now, you tell me what I want to know! You tell me where you come from and what you are trying to do here! And you tell me where you got your information about me!" She heard him say in a commanding voice that wouldn't tolerate disobedience.

There he was again. Wanting to know about her past, about his future. She must never give away her secrets. She would doom the future to a terrible fate... but he was going to torture her. He was going to kill her if she didn't tell him.

Death. Hermione didn't want to die. But...

was it really so horrifying? She would meet them all again. Her friends. Her family. Harry. Ron! No! She was not going to tell Voldemort. She was not going to betray her friends. If she had to die then she would!

Hermione propped herself up on a shaky arm and managed to get into a sitting position. Her body ached everywhere. She felt sick and looked up at Voldemort. He was still crouched before her, smirking down at her evilly.

"No," Hermione whispered in a hoarse but firm voice.

Hermione heard surprised whispers and shuffling coming from his followers who still stood in a circle around her and Voldemort. The smirk on Voldemort's face dropped replaced by a murderous glare in his eyes. Hermione looked into his eyes and she could see her own death in them. She was so scared that it became difficult to breathe. But even so, she was not going to divulge anything. She had chosen her path and she was prepared to follow it wherever it took her.

"'No'? You are not going to tell me?" Voldemort said in a quiet voice. "Perhaps you need a little bit more persuasion?"

Hermione squeezed her eyes shut as she was again hit by the Torture curse.

Riddle looked down at the girl lying at his feet. She was twitching and squirming in pain. He knew her screams would be tearing the silence of the night right now if he hadn't cast a Silencing spell on her right before he had cast the Cruciatus. He couldn't risk someone hearing her. They were a good distance away from the castle, at the edge of the Forbidden Forest, but one could never be too cautious.

Riddle felt the power of the curse burn through his wand. He felt the power he had over the girl. And it felt good! DeCerto had long enough contradicted him. Tonight she would pay for her insolence. He had to admit though she hadn't been easy to capture. Riddle had been disappointed with his followers. They weren't even able to overcome this girl. No, he himself had had to cast the final curse that had brought her down.

But no matter now, he thought as he looked down at the suffering girl. He would deal with his followers later. Now it was DeCerto's time to pay. He was going to break her and force her to submit to him. Tonight he would finally crush that offensive fire in her eyes.

Even if he had liked that fire a little bit…

Riddle readjusted the grip on his wand. The power of the curse was still washing through his body. It was a nice, exhilarating feeling. This good feeling he had was counterbalancing the pain his curse was inflicting on the other end.

He knew he would have to maintain the curse a while longer. He had been astounded how DeCerto had stood the first go. She had been feeling the pain, of course. She had even cried. But as she had looked up at him after he had cancelled the curse, her eyes had still burned with unbroken resistance. He had never met someone like her. No one had ever withstood his curse. Not his followers or this Bingle girl he had tortured two years ago. She had succumbed after a few seconds under his curse. He had then ordered her to leave Hogwarts and never come back. She had obeyed.

But DeCerto was something else. She wasn't so easy to break.

She was still lying on the ground writhing in pain. Riddle saw blood trickling down from her mouth. Maybe she had bitten her tongue? He cancelled the spell. It had been long enough.

Hermione felt the pain leaving her. All that remained was this dull ache all over her body. Her breathing was uneasy and laboured. Her head spun and she was sick. There was the metallic taste of blood in her mouth.

"Now, my dear. Did you have a change of mind?" Hermione heard Voldemort's calm voice ask pitilessly.

A change of mind? No, never. She closed her eyes and tried to breathe in deeply to soften the nauseous feeling and to stop the tremors that shook her body.

"Not very talkative anymore, are you?" Voldemort mocked in his smooth voice.
There was no way out of this, was there? Hermione wondered. Her mind was strangely calm. There was no chance for her to escape him. Well, it had been a miracle that she had survived back in the Ministry of Magic. Maybe those last months here at the Hogwarts of the past had been nothing more than a procrastination of the inevitable. Was it meant this way all along? That she should die at his hands? It wasn't so bad after all. They had fulfilled their mission. Voldemort was defeated. At least in the future.

She suddenly felt strong arms grabbing her roughly under her shoulder, hoisting her up. A wave of nausea hit her again as she was forced to stand up. One of Voldemort's followers had grabbed her and was holding her up.

Hermione looked up. Voldemort was standing a few steps away from her. He must have ordered his follower to pick her up. He was standing there his wand in his hand, sneering at her and looking as handsome as ever. Hermione felt disgusted by him. His mere presence made her sick.

"DeCerto, I would advise you to answer my questions now. Unless you want another go with my favourite curse?" Voldemort smiled vilely at her.

'Another go'? Hermione didn't think she could bear the pain again. But she wasn't going to beg him. Voldemort was a disgusting creature.

"Flight from death?" Hermione chuckled softly, though it sounded more like a cough. "Fitting name for you. Fleeing from the inevitable. You know? That's not going to work."

Hermione could see anger distorting Voldemort's beautiful face. She knew to gibe him now wasn't the best thing to do. But at this point in time it was the only thing she could do.

She looked pityingly at him and shook her head sadly as she said, "So brilliant and at the same time so stupid."

She could almost see the fury taking hold of him. He was really angry now. Hermione could see him moving his wand. Maybe he was going to end it now quicker. She would certainly prefer the Killing curse to being tortured into insanity. But before Voldemort could react to her impertinence his follower, who was still holding her up, moved. He obviously felt as insulted by her badmouthing his master as if she had insulted himself. He had pulled his wand and was now holding it under her chin forcing her to raise her head.

"How dare you say that?" he hissed aggressively in her ear.

Hermione reacted in an instant without thinking about it but trusting in her instincts and experiences. She grabbed the wrist holding the wand at her chin and bent it down while she cast a silent curse, Tergus!

Immediately an impenetrable mist was flowing out of the tip of the wand obscuring everything from sight. Before her captor could react Hermione cast another curse.

Percutio!

That curse sent a painful jolt through her attacker's body and at the same time Hermione turned his wrist painfully in the wrong direction until the hand let go of the wand. She took the wand and stepped away from her captor. That manoeuvre hadn't cost her more than a few seconds but she still had to act quickly now. Her deception wouldn't hold them up for long.

She could hear Voldemort's voice ordering his followers, "Get her! Don't let her escape!"
Luckily they didn't dare fire any curses in case they hit an ally. She could hear Voldemort whisper under his breath. He was trying to break the mist she had created. She had only seconds until he would succeed or one of his followers managed to grab her.

Hermione pointed the wand at herself and muttered softly, "Speculum."

A ghostly copy of herself detached itself from her body. The mirror image stood before her copying her every move. It looked just like her although it was a little bit blurry and transparent. The mist around her was clearing up. Voldemort had managed to break her spell. Hermione pointed the wand again at herself and felt the unpleasant though welcome feeling of eggs rippling down her body as she became invisible. Then she took off, away from Voldemort and his cruel followers. She noticed satisfied that her mirror image was running away too. It was running in the exact opposite direction from her, mimicking her every move. She had chosen to run away from the castle although she would be safe there. But now her ghostly image was running towards the castle. Hopefully that would convince her attackers that the image was really her and they would follow it.

Hermione didn't turn around to check whether her diversion was successful. She just ran as fast as she could. Knowing that if they caught her she was lost. She only slowed down a little bit as she reached the edge of the Forbidden Forest. Her breathing was now laboured and she could still feel the echoes of the pain the torture curse had inflicted on her. It almost made the sharp pain in her wrist drop in the background… almost. She hid behind a large tree and risked a glance back.

There a good distance away she could see her mirror image. It was still copying everything she did. It now had stopped running and leaned to one side. There a little bit away from the image she could see Voldemort and his followers. They were coming after the image firing curses at it. Hermione had to cancel the image now otherwise Voldemort would realize what it was and he would know where she was hiding right now.

Hermione flexed the unfamiliar wand in her hand, thus cancelling the Mirror spell. She nearly laughed out loud as she saw Riddle stop surprised as he saw her copy dissolve into thin air.

She didn't stay to watch more. She took off again to get as much distance between Riddle and herself as she could. Hermione run down at the edge of the forest. She always stayed in the cover of the large trees but she didn't run deep into the forest. She needed a way back into the castle. Riddle and his lackeys were sure to search the grounds now and she really didn't want to fall into their hands again. The first thing they would do now was to watch the entrances to the school. So going back to the castle wouldn't be the best idea right now.

Hermione had to end the spell that made her invisible. It was using up too much of her magic. She just wondered how she could get into the castle unseen as she saw the Quidditch pitch some distance away. She left the cover of the trees and run towards the pitch. She had a reckless idea in her mind worthy of Harry or Ron. Before she reached the pitch she made a turn and ran down to the locker rooms. The locker rooms were situated in a small building at the edge of the Quidditch pitch. That was where the school team players changed before they went to practice or to a match. As Hermione arrived at the building she ignored the doors leading to the actual locker rooms but continued to a door on the far end of the building. That was where the equipment was stored. She reached the door and tried the handle. It was locked.

Hermione brandished the stolen wand and said, "Alohomora!"

There came a faint click from the lock. The door was now open. Hermione entered the dark room. It smelled of sweat and leather. She didn't dare to light her wand in case Riddle or his lackeys would see. So she had to search around in the dark. There were old bludgers lying on a shelf. They seemed to be broken and needed some repairing. On another shelf were a few rather torn Quidditch robes. In the far corner of the room Hermione saw a locker. She went over and opened it. It was full of brooms. Those were the old school brooms and exactly what she had been searching for. Hermione grabbed one relatively intact looking broom. She wasn't exactly a friend of brooms - in fact she was a little bit afraid of heights - but this broom was a godsend and her ticket back into Hogwarts.

She left the equipment room again. Outside she mounted the broom and took off the ground. Wind was whistling by her ears as she ascended into the nightly sky. Quickly she had reached the height of the goal hoops on the Quidditch pitch and she was rising further. The wind up here was stronger than down on the ground and ripped at her, making her broom shake. Hermione tightened her grip on the broom handle and tried to suppress her fear. She really didn't like brooms.

When she was as far up as she dared to go she began to head for the castle. She could see the castle of Hogwarts a distance away. From up here it looked even more magnificent than it already did from the ground. A few windows were still lit and they twinkled invitingly like beacons in the night. She flew over the grounds of Hogwarts with a speed Harry would have laughed at but it was as fast as she dared to go. She passed the spot where Hagrid's hut would be but it was empty. She wondered briefly were Hagrid was right now. Riddle had already made sure that he was expelled.

As she neared Hogwarts she could see movement on the ground. Down there were Riddle's followers. They were still searching for her. Sure enough they were watching the entrance into Hogwarts. She could see a dark figure lurking right beside the entrance door. Hermione shook her head and passed the dark figures on the ground quickly. She flew over the Great Hall and noticed that the enchantments of the hall showing the sky from the inside were not working on the outside. She couldn't look into the hall.

She flew over the main building of the Great Hall and headed for one of the high towers. Her destination was a richly decorated window on the north side of the tower. She knew that window very well as it belonged to the Gryffindor girls dormitory. As she reached the window she hovered before it and cast an Alohomora at it. The click told her that her spell had worked so she stepped shakily on the window sill.

She opened the window quietly, hoping that her dorm mates were all asleep. Then she hopped down from the window sill into her dormitory. Inside she let out a relieved breath of air. She had made it! As she had lain down there at the edge of the Forbidden Forest threatened by her enemies she had believed she would never see this dormitory again. It had been a stroke of good luck that she had been able to steal the wand. She felt a pang of regret as she thought about her own wand. It was now most likely in the robe pocket of Riddle and she would never see it again. It had been her second wand but she had been quite fond of it. Hermione went over to her bed and fell down on it not bothering to change into her pyjamas.

_Hermione watched helplessly as the little girl was again hit by the Crucio curse. But the girl's piercing screams were drowned by the sounds of the battle between the Death Eaters and the Order and Aurors that raged around them. Hermione tried to rob over to the girl but she knew even if she managed she was in no position to help the girl. Hermione's leg was shattered. The Death Eater who now tortured the little girl had cursed Hermione as she had been protecting the girl. Now her leg was broken on several places and it was impossible to move. As Hermione tried to get nearer to the girl the unbearable pain was even intensifying. But Hermione knew that her pain was nothing compared to the agony the small girl was in right now. She looked at the screaming girl in horror and silent tears were running down her cheeks. Her gaze wandered from the poor girl to her torturer. The Death Eater was standing over the girl and pointed his wand at her to maintain the evil curse. Hermione noticed that he wasn't wearing the usual Death Eater mask. She could see his face._
But that fact was making the whole situation even more terrible. For the man wasn't looking like an evil demon or a homicidal murderer. He was looking normal, nothing out of the ordinary. If she had met him walking down Diagon Alley he wouldn't have stood out in any way. A perfectly normal man doing abhorrent things to a child who could have been his daughter. Driven by a cruel ideology where that innocent girl was subhuman just because she was unable to do magic. Hermione was appalled by this blatant contrast between his appearance and his disgusting behaviour.

She forced to watch as the Death Eater continued to hurt the girl, to torture her in the worst way possible. Hermione felt sickened by herself as she couldn't do anything. Anything to help her, to lessen her pain. To stop the screams.

Finally after a long time, an eternity, Hermione saw the girl die. Just like that. It wasn't dignified in any way, it was cruel and it was disgusting to watch as the small child did her last struggling breath. Then she lay still, unmoved by the Cruciantus curse that still hit her. Hermione looked at the girl's face, there was still the plead etched in her now hollow features, her rosy lips were slowly turning white. And as Hermione looked at the girl she knew that yet another part of herself had died. It was going to accompany the girl and it was never coming back to Hermione.

Then Hermione was hit by a piercing pain in her leg. She looked up. The Death Eater was pointing his wand at her now.

"Don't worry, girl. I haven't forgotten you!" he teased cruelly.

Hermione saw that he held her own wand in his other hand. He must have found it where it had fallen on the ground. Hermione watched as the man held her wand in front and whispered sadistically,

"Incendio!"

Hermione's wand burned.

"And now, for helping those animals." The Death Eater kicked the dead girl with his boot. "you are going to pay."

Hermione cast a last glance at the poor girl, then she looked back at the Death Eater. Hate was burning up in her. He was going to pay. She focused at the wand in his hand and then extended one arm towards the wand while she muttered,

"Exorior!"

And to the horror of the Death Eater and to Hermione's surprise his wand shot out of his hand and towards Hermione…
Once Upon A Time Master Peverell Wrote A Book

Hermione woke pretty early the next morning. The other girls were still asleep in their beds. Hermione rolled to one side and groaned in pain. Her whole body felt sore and aching like she had run a marathon race yesterday. She knew those were the after effects of the Cruciatius curse and she shuddered involuntarily as she remembered the agony the curse had inflicted.

But she had been extremely lucky yesterday. Her escape had been nothing but pure coincidence. Hermione was convinced that if this boy, she didn't know his name, hadn't threatened her with his wand thus giving her the chance to steal it from him Riddle would surely have killed her in the end. At this point in time he had already killed his own father, his grandparents and Moaning Myrtle. What was one more dead girl to him? No, she had been really lucky to be able to flee him.

She should be grateful that it was teenage Tom Riddle she had faced yesterday because she doubted that she would have been able to escape the Lord Voldemort from her time period.

Her situation here at Hogwarts was getting more and more precarious. Riddle now obviously thought her an enemy. Until yesterday he had never really physically attacked her. He had threatened and intimidated her, yes. He had even used his popularity with the other students to ostracize her. But so far he had never cursed her or really hurt her. Yesterday though, he had used one of the worst curses in existence on her.

Hermione again rolled over in her bed trying to find a more comfortable position.

Originally she had come here to Hogwarts to find a way back into her time period and not to make an enemy out of Tom Riddle. He was suspicious of her now. And knowing Riddle he wouldn't stop trying to get the information out of her until he succeeded. Hermione could see the predicament she was in. She needed to stay at Hogwarts because Dumbledore was here and he would have the Elder Wand sooner or later. But at the same time she really shouldn't stay at Hogwarts because Voldemort was after her now.

What to do?

Hermione sighed deeply and sat up. Her whole body was achy and she just wanted to lie down again and sleep for the next week or so. Instead she stood up and limped over to the bathroom. Maybe a hot shower would do her some good.

Hermione undressed and stood under the shower. She turned the taps and nice hot water washed down on her.

She let the hot water fall on her for some time and tried not to think about her problems. After the hot shower Hermione turned to her injuries. She couldn't do anything about the after effects of the torture curse but she could at least tend to her extremely painful left wrist.

After some twenty minutes she stepped fully dressed and with a tight bandage around her wrist out of the bathroom.

"Oh, g'morning, Hermione.", Rose yawned at her. She was just getting out of her bed. "You are up early today."

"Yes, couldn't sleep anymore." Hermione replied politely though there was a certain degree of coldness in her voice. She hadn't forgotten how they had treated her those weeks ago.
Hermione saw the other girls in the room getting slowly out of their beds too.

"I think I'm going down to breakfast." She declared to no-one in particular as she walked over to the door.

"'k, see you." Lucia mumbled in reply.

Hermione left the Gryffindor common room and headed for the Great Hall. As she walked she pulled the wand she had stolen yesterday and examined it. The wand was bigger in diameter compared to her wand but in length they were fairly similar. The wood was beige, maybe birch. And the core…?

Hermione sent a flush of her magic through the wand. It worked, but it did feel strange. There was some kind of resistance inside the wand. It wasn't enough to stop her from using it but it was making using it an unpleasant experience. This wand was by no means a compensation for her lost wand. Hermione silently cursed Riddle.

She had to use this new wand for now but she dearly wished for her old wand being back in her hands. Not only was it a thousand times better than this wand but it was also the last tangible link she had with her own time period.

Hermione sighed and, reluctantly, put the new wand in her wand holster on her right arm.

Hermione then reached the doors leading into the Great Hall. She hesitated to enter the Hall. She knew Riddle would most likely be there and she didn't want to see him right now. In fact, she never wanted to see him ever again. But trying to avoid Riddle was a futile venture.

Hermione ran a hand through her frizzy hair.

If she now started to avoid him or if she showed him how unsettled she truly was by him he would only attack her harder. She had to appear strong regardless of how frightened she was by him.

Hermione steeled herself and then she reached out for the large oak doors leading into the Great Hall.

She entered the Great Hall. The bright blue sky was visible through the bewitched ceiling and dove the Hall in an inviting light.

But Hermione knew the inviting atmosphere of the Hall was as treacherous as the blue December sky outside.

Hermione went over to the Gryffindor table. She had just spotted Longbottom, Weasley and Lupin sitting at the table and eating their breakfast. Longbottom was waving at her beckoning her over. As Hermione scanned him he looked up from the newspaper and his eyes quickly found hers. His facial expression did not change but Hermione shuddered as she saw the hate and fury in his eyes. And all of it was directed at her.

Riddle sat nonchalantly at the table, holding a cup in one hand and the newest copy of the Daily Prophet in his other. Just as Hermione scanned him he looked up from the newspaper and his eyes quickly found hers. His facial expression did not change but Hermione shuddered as she saw the hate and fury in his eyes. And all of it was directed at her.

She even thought she saw his hand twitching towards his wand. Hermione breathed in deeply and then she did something impetuous: She smiled at him sweetly.

As she did that she could see his grey eyes narrow and his gaze was becoming even colder.
Then Hermione waved at him in a friendly manner. He was now clenching his jaw and Hermione was sure the only thing holding him back from cursing her were the other people in the Great Hall.
Hermione then broke eye contact with him and continued her way to the Gryffindor table.

She knew by spiting him she was most likely digging her own grave. On the other hand, she didn't think her situation could be any worse, so why not enjoying it a little bit?

---

How could she have escaped? He had had her cornered, she had been unarmed and yet she had gotten away.

Riddle clenched his hand around the black wand, her wand. He was sitting on one of the leather sofas in the Slytherin common room and was in a bad mood. His magic was crackling around him aggressively which kept the other students a good distance away from him. They knew better than to talk to him when he was this angry.

His gaze wandered back to the wand in his hand. It felt strangely comfortable. Riddle's own magic flowed pleasantly through the black wand. The Wand's surface was smooth and polished and the wand was obviously well cared for.

The obtainment of the wand had been the only thing that had been successful yesterday, Riddle frustratingly had to admit. His plan had been to capture her and then to force her to finally submit to him. Of course Riddle had known that DeCerto was an opponent he shouldn't underestimate so he had expected more resistance than he normally did. But her resistance hadn't faltered even as he had hit her with the Crucius curse. That curse wasn't called 'unforgivable' for nothing. It was, unlike the Imperius curse, unblockable and the pain it inflicted was so intense it could drive people into insanity. That curse was supposed to break people, to make them suffer and to force them to give away even their best guarded of secrets.

But DeCerto had endured the pain. She hadn't begged, she hadn't pleaded with him and she certainly hadn't submitted to him. She had accepted the pain. Riddle remembered how she had looked at him after he had hit her the second time with the curse. There had been pain in her eyes and fear but also resolution and unbroken resistance. And there had also been…

Riddle looked at the wand with clenched teeth.

Disgust?

He breathed in deeply.

He hadn't achieved anything yesterday. DeCerto hadn't broken down and she hadn't divulged anything. She was still antagonizing him.

At first DeCerto had been nothing more than a pain in the side but now she had developed into a real problem. She seemed to know a lot about him. Things she shouldn't know. Where did she learn that name? Voldemort.

Every time DeCerto looked at him he had the uncomfortable feeling that she knew about him, about what he had done and about what had happened to him. But how could she? She had been here in England for only a couple of months. So how could she have managed to learn so much about him?
Was he just imagining things? But no, there had been this incident during potions class. DeCerto had told this stupid story about her friend who, surprise there, looked just like Riddle himself. Riddle, of course, knew she had made the story up to get back at him and to redeem herself in the eyes of the other students but there was more to it.
Said friend in her story had murdered his own father. Was that a coincidence? Or more? How much did she know?

Riddle rolled her wand absentmindedly in the palm of his hand while his magic still flowed undisturbed through the black wood.

The most shocking thing though was the fact that DeCerto had managed to break down his mental shields. Riddle knew he wasn't a master in Occlumency, at least not yet, but he wasn't an amateur either. And yet, DeCerto had penetrated his shields. She had had access to his thoughts and although she hadn't used that access back then the whole situation still was intolerable. She could decide at any moment that she did want to read his mind after all. Riddle couldn't stand it that she had the upper hand in this matter. That was the reason he had ambushed her, but that hadn't worked out either.

Riddle threw a last irritated glance at the black wand before he put it in his pocket and then got up from the sofa.

Ten minutes later he arrived at the Great Hall and sat down at his usual place at the Slytherin table. A glimpse at the Gryffindor table told him that DeCerto hadn't yet arrived at the hall. Riddle poured himself a cup of coffee and began to flip through a copy of the Daily Prophet. After some time of reading he suddenly had the unpleasant feeling of someone staring at him. He looked up from the paper and it wasn't long until his eyes found DeCerto who was indeed staring at him. His eyes narrowed involuntarily as he stared right back at her. She didn't seem to be frightened by him which infuriated him to no end. Damn, he had hit her with one of the most evil curses and she was standing there, looking at him as if nothing had happened. Riddle could feel his magic starting to boil up in him again. But he couldn't allow it to crackle around him here in the Great Hall. And still DeCerto was looking at him, slightly bored even. He wanted nothing more than to just curse her. His hand itched to pull his wand.

Suddenly DeCerto smiled at him. Not a triumphant smirk proclaiming her victory, no, it was a sickeningly sweet and friendly smile. Riddle would have preferred the evil smirk. His blood was boiling now and he was barely able to hold his magic back.

To top it off, DeCerto even waved at him in a companionable manner. And Riddle knew the only reason she had for doing this was to aggravate him – and it was working.

DeCerto was mocking him! And there was no way to pay her back. Riddle clenched his hands into fists.

Then DeCerto looked away from him, as if he wasn't worth losing more time over, and she jauntily continued her way to her house table.

Riddle was left behind, seething with anger.

"You look awful!"

Hermione raised her eyebrows at Weasley and sat down beside him at Gryffindor table.

"Why, thank you." Hermione said sardonically. "Now, I feel better!"

She reached for a jug with tea but avoided to look at the pile of fried potatoes standing right in front of her. She still felt somewhat nauseous and didn't think she could stomach anything at the moment.

"What happened?" Lupin asked her while he ate a huge sandwich with bacon. "Had a bad night?"
Hermione sighed and began to stir her tea with a spoon.

"You could say that." She muttered tiredly.

"Really, Hermione!" Longbottom said who had up until now wolfed down his plate full of sausages and potatoes. "You should brighten up. Tomorrow's the start of the break. No more homework for the next three weeks!"

"Mhm." Hermione replied rather unenthusiastically.

But Longbottom was right. The Christmas break would start tomorrow. That left Hermione only today to break into Dumbledore's office and finally search it, as last week she had signed herself in for leaving Hogwarts over the break. And now she was pretty glad about that decision. She knew Riddle would stay at Hogwarts over the break. Of course, where else could he go? Hermione wasn't very keen on spending any more time with Riddle than was absolutely necessary. And after yesterday night she didn't even want to be in the same room with him. But spending three weeks with him inside a relatively deserted castle? That would be suicidal, if anything.

"You didn't tell us what you're planning for the break, Mione!" Weasely's voice brought her out of her musings.

"Yeah, 'My'nee, yu neffer told us." Longbottom managed to say with what seemed to be half his breakfast in his mouth.

"Oh, yes." Hermione said slowly. "I'm going to visit some friends."

Truth was, Hermione wasn't really sure what to do during the break. She just knew she didn't want to stay at Hogwarts. Because of Riddle and because she just needed some distance from the castle and its inhabitants. Living in this wrong time period and always having to playact was slowly getting to Hermione.

Aside from the plan to search Dumbledore's office Hermione felt like being in a dead end. She had no clue as to how to get back in her time. And then there was the magic of the Elder Wand, still inside her. Hermione needed to investigate that magic some more. Three weeks alone would surely help her with that.

She just needed some time to get some order into her thoughts. And without the pressure of having to act normally around her peers and professors and of course without having to worry about Riddle's sinister plans, she was sure she would get an idea of how to leave this time period for good.

"You know someone from England?" Lupin asked her.

"Yes." Hermione felt bad about it but she just needed to lie to her friends in that matter. "Some friends of my parents. I'll stay with them over the holidays."

Hermione had observed Dumbledore's daily routine now for quite some time. And the only thing she could say for sure was that he was one chaotic, unorganized, old man. Sometimes he stayed in his office until well after midnight. What he did during those hours Hermione didn't know. Probably studying some obscure spell or other. On other days he retired really early. On one of those days Hermione had nearly been caught. She had seen him leave at around nine and had then waited for another two hours to make sure that he was really gone. Then she had decided to try to enter his office. Just as she stepped out of her hiding place Dumbledore came hurrying along the corridor and entered his office. He only hadn't seen her because he was so preoccupied and deep in thoughts at the moment. Hermione thought that maybe he had had an idea and needed to research it. Hermione herself had the best ideas when she was trying to get to sleep. But though she could understand his behaviour it was at the moment frustrating.

Hermione wanted to search his office today. Maybe the whole thing was a waste of time anyway and Dumbledore didn't have any information on the Deathly Hallows. Hermione didn't want to waste more time on it than was really necessary.

So that was the reason Hermione now stood in the hallway right by Dumbledore's office. She had decided to go inside today whatever happened. And if she had to wait till four in the morning, she would break into his office.

Hermione leaned against the cold stone wall and tried to stifle a yawn. Her feet hurt and she was beginning to get tired now. She checked her watch: 8:34 p.m. Well, there seemed to lie a long night before her. After another five minutes she slid down the wall and sat down on the floor her legs bend so that she could lay down her arms on her knees.

She was situated right beside a huge suite of armour so that Dumbledore wouldn't be able to see her when he left his office.

Hermione was brought out of her boredom as she heard steps coming towards her. Her head shot up and she slowly bend forwards to see past the suit of armour. Someone was coming down the corridor but it was to dimly lit to recognize the person. Maybe just another student, Hermione thought.

As this person was just another few metres away from her she could recognize him. It was Riddle. Hermione's heart began to beat faster.

Just as he would have passed her he slowed down. Hermione felt cold sweat running down her forehead. But to her immense relief Riddle didn't turn towards her but faced the old, wooden door that led to Dumbledore's office. Hermione couldn't see his face but his straight back told her that he was tense. What did he need from Dumbledore? Hermione knew that they were far from being friends. So why was Riddle here?

Riddle took another step towards the door but didn't knock. Hermione wondered what he was waiting for as a crazy idea hit her. Whatever they had to discuss maybe it was worth overhearing. Hermione reached in her pocket and produced an old quill. She held it in her hand as she summoned her magic and thought, Mutatio arachne!

Contently she watched as her quill transformed into a small black spider. As the transformation was complete she cast the next spell. That one was a bit more complicated. She directed her magic through her wand as she touched her ears and both of her closed eyes before she pointed her wand at the tiny spider in her hand and thought, Esto Oculus! Esto Auricula!

Those spells didn't take her longer than a few seconds. After that she let the spider down and it hurried towards where Riddle was standing. He was still facing the door. Hermione heard him take in a sharp breath of air before he raised his hand to knock at the door.

"Come in!" Dumbledore's voice came from inside.

Riddle opened the door and stepped into the office. Hermione watched pleased how her spider managed to get inside too before the door was closed again.

As the door was firmly closed Hermione pointed her wand at the door and whispered,

"Infit!"

That spell activated the other spells she had cast onto the spider. Hermione closed her eyes and was now able to see and hear the things inside Dumbledore's office through her spider. Those spells had come in handy in more than one occasion. Ron had called it her Spy Spells, Hermione remembered fondly.

Through her spider Hermione noticed amused that Dumbledore's office was still a mess. All the tiny silver instruments were still scattered all over the place. Although from her point of view as a spider they weren't so tiny anymore. She directed the spider towards an ancient looking cabinet and let it climb up the surface a little bit. Now from this point she had a perfect view of the office.

She could see Dumbledore sitting behind his desk. Spread out in front of him were some opened books and slips of parchment that were scribbled all over. But currently Dumbledore wasn't paying his research materials any attention. He looked at the young man who stood before his desk.

"Please sit down, Tom" Dumbledore said as he gestured to a chair facing his desk. Riddle wordlessly sat down on the chair. His back was straight and he faced his teacher with a blank face.

"You know why you are here?" Dumbledore asked him. Hermione noticed that his voice was cold and the twinkle in his eyes was missing.

"Yes, sir." Riddle replied in an emotionless voice. "You are punishing me for things I've never done."

"We both know that you are guilty, Tom." Dumbledore fixed his eyes on Riddle who didn't even stir as this penetrating gaze hit him.

"You have no proof!" Riddle said and for the first time anger was showing through the emotionless mask on his face.

Dumbledore leaned back in his chair still looking piercingly at Riddle.

"Don't make it harder than it already is, Tom. Hand me over your wand and then you can go."

Riddle's eyes widened at that and he hissed,

"You can't make me go back there! It's not even the summer break."

Dumbledore raised his eyebrows and then stated in a cold voice that Hermione had never before heard from the professor,

"We've been through this. You can either surrender your wand now and leave Hogwarts for the break or I will make sure that you get expelled. It is your decision, Tom."

Riddle's mouth was a thin line now and a scowl appeared between his eyebrows. His grey eyes burned with a murderous hate as they were fixed on Dumbledore. Dumbledore on the other hand still looked at him expectantly, seemingly unaffected by the fury Riddle was showing.

Abruptly Riddle got up from his chair. He looked down on Dumbledore with a fierce scowl on his face. There was a moment were neither of them moved. Riddle was still staring at Dumbledore furiously while Dumbledore remained unaffected and was merely looking at Riddle curiously.

After a while Riddle slowly reached into his robes and pulled out his wand. The knuckles on his hand were turning white as he clasped his wand. Then ever so slowly he put his wand down at Dumbledore's desk. During the whole process Dumbledore kept staring at Riddle. As the wand finally lay on the desk Riddle stepped a few paces away still staring at his white wand lying on the desk.

"After the break you can come to my office and I will return your wand to you." Dumbledore told him dryly.

Riddle's gaze wandered back to the face of the older wizard his grey eyes radiating cold anger. Without another word he turned around and reached the door in a few paces before he left the office.

Hermione had to make an effort to ignore her magically extended vision and concentrated on her own two eyes. She could just see how Riddle stormed down the corridor he had come from. Then she skipped back into her spider-vision. Dumbledore was still sitting at his table. He now held Riddle's wand in hands and looked down at it sadly. After a while he stood up, went to one of his cupboards and put the wand in a drawer. He locked the drawer with a spell Hermione didn't recognize. After the wand was stowed away Dumbledore returned to his desk and resumed to read in his books.

Hermione decided to leave the office now. She directed her spider under the cupboard it had been sitting on. Then with a conscious effort she returned her senses back to her own body. She opened her eyes and saw the dark corridor again instead of Dumbledore's office. Then Hermione pointed her wand at the office door and thought, Finite!

With that she cancelled the spells on the spider. And now an old, battered and innocent-looking quill lay under the cupboard in Dumbledore's office.

Hermione leaned her back against the stone wall.

What was that all about?

Dumbledore just took Riddle's wand from him. And what did Riddle say? 'You can't make me go back there!'

With 'there' he obviously referred to his orphanage. Hermione was bewildered. She had thought that Riddle only went back to that orphanage during the summer break. At least that was what Harry had told her. She knew that Riddle really hated the orphanage.

Of course he would, Hermione rolled her eyes. It was a muggle orphanage after all. And if there was a muggle-hater out there it had to be Riddle. He must so detest it to be forced to live with the lowly muggles.

That evil git!

But it seemed to be some sort of punishment that Riddle had to return to the orphanage this Christmas break. Riddle had abandoned his wand to Dumbledore and he was going back to his hated orphanage. That meant that Dumbledore had something against Riddle in his hand. Otherwise Riddle would have never followed Dumbledore's orders.

What could that 'something' be? Hermione wondered.

And hadn't Dumbledore threatened Riddle with expulsion? But why did Dumbledore wait. If he had some evidence for Riddle's crimes he should expel Riddle immediately. Riddle was an evil bastard. He didn't deserve to be a student at Hogwarts. Hermione wondered why Dumbledore hesitated. Was his evidence not compromising enough to get Riddle expelled? Or was Dumbledore hoping that he could somehow save Riddle? Show him the light, so to speak? If so, he was sorely mistaken, Hermione thought. Riddle was beyond any help.

After three hours Hermione still sat on the same spot in the corridor and still thinking about the scene she had witnessed in Dumbledore's office. She pondered possible explanations for Dumbledore's behaviour and different scenarios as to why and how Dumbledore had forced Riddle to give into his punishment. As the time passed by her scenarios were becoming more and more unlikely. She was finally released from her unproductive brooding as Dumbledore left his office.

After he had left Hermione waited for another hour then she put her plan into action. She stood up from her spot and went over to the office door. Then she pointed her wand in each direction down the corridor while she muttered,

"Incipio!"

Thus activating the wards she had previously cast. They would alarm her if someone came down the corridor. That would give her enough time to leave the office should Dumbledore return. It was still a risk though. Dumbledore was an exceptional wizard. Chances were that he would notice Hermione's wards. She was actually surprised that he hadn't noticed her enchanted spider.

So she had to hurry and finish the job here. Hermione pointed her wand at the office door. She summoned her magic and channeled it through her wand at the door. Her magic hit Dumbledore's wards as if they were a physical barrier. She probed them and was relieved to still find just the simple warding spells she had noticed earlier. Dumbledore obviously didn't expect someone to break into his office. Hermione was once again reminded of his trusting nature. But that didn't stop her to enforce the flow of magic from her into his wards, intending to break them. After some time she could feel the satisfying change in the flow of her magic. The wards were down.

Hermione reached for the handle and opened the door to Dumbledore's office. She stepped in and closed the door behind her. The calming atmosphere of his office hit her once again. But this time she had no business feeling reassured inside here. She was a thief after all, Hermione had to remind herself.

Hermione lit her wand with a silent Lumos! and crept over to Dumbledore's desk. The books were still scattered all over the table. Hermione lifted one and read its cover, _The Creation of magical Artifacts and their inherent Magic._ She reached for other books, _Magical Power in Inanimate Objects, Ways of Transmitting Magic._

Hermione's bookworm heart craved to read the books but she had other things to do right now. With regret she put the book back on the table and returned to searching the office. She went over to the big book shelf that covered two walls of the office. It would take hours to search through all of those by hand. Hermione didn't approve of searching through books by magic. It was just not thorough enough but this time she had not enough time. So she thought of the subject she wanted to find information about.

_Deathly Hallows, Elder Wand!_

She concentrated very hard on it and then raised her wand, pointed it at the shelf and whispered, "Invenio!"
After a while a few books soared towards Hermione. Her heart sank as she counted only three. She caught them and looked at their titles. Disappointment hit her as she recognized all the titles. Those were books she had already read. Copies of them were available in the library. They were useless to her.

With a wave of her wand the books flew back to their place on the shelf. Hermione turned away from the shelf and faced the office again. Where would Dumbledore hide things inside here? Hermione went through all the drawers and cupboards she could find but it was useless. She didn’t find anything interesting beside some nasty tea kettle that tried to bite her fingers off.

Well, it was a long shot to begin with, Hermione thought frustrated as she sat down on Dumbledore's chair behind his desk. There was no place in the office she hadn't searched. Well, aside from the drawer Dumbledore had put Riddle's wand in. Hermione hadn't been able to break that ward. If Dumbledore had hit something else by magic Hermione was pretty sure she would have noticed it. She rubbed the bridge of her nose tiredly as her gaze fell on the wastebasket on the floor. A yellow piece of parchment had caught her eyes or more accurately the name on said parchment, Flamel.

Hermione retrieved the parchment from the wastebasket and then smoothed it down on the table.

Albus,

This is sensational! Phenomenal! I cannot believe I am holding this manuscript in my hands. How were you able to find it? This is truly unbelievable. I am so grateful that you give me the opportunity to study this piece of magical history. I know how long you have been searching for something like this. And now imagine I even mocked your tenacity.

I am sure this will bring us a few steps further in our study. The Peverell brothers were true masters in their art.

We have to meet very soon. There is so much to discuss already and I have only read the first two chapters.

We can meet in my new residence here in London. I have a formidable laboratory here. It is in Foxham Rd number eight. Come by whenever you like.

With warm regards, Nicolas Flamel

As Hermione read the letter one word caught her attention, Peverell. The Peverell brothers were the supposed creators of the Deathly Hallows. Hermione could feel her heart skip a few beats as she processed what the letter was implying. There was a manuscript written by the brothers themselves? She needed to read this book. Desperately. She was bound to find something inside that book that would help her with her predicament. Maybe this was her ticket out of here. She would be finally able to leave this period of time behind and head back to her own time. Hermione's hand shook as she waved her wand over the letter from Flamel. An exact copy of it appeared out of thin air. She clutched the conjured letter and put the original back in the wastebasket. She wanted to leave the office in the same condition as she had entered it.

She left the office with the letter put securely away in one of her robe pockets and closed the door. After that she erected Dumbledore's warding spells again. He would never notice that someone broke into his office tonight.

Hermione woke the next day and for the first time since an eternity she didn't feel completely lost. This letter Flamel wrote to Dumbledore was a ray of hope for her. Finally, she could see light at the end of the tunnel. Her return to her own time period seemed now not so impossible anymore. She just needed to get the book and then she was bound to find some information inside Peverell's manuscript that would bring her back home.

Hermione hopped out of her bed and grabbed some clothes from her trunk. She didn't need to wear her uniform today as it was the start of the Christmas break. Hogwarts' express would leave at eleven o'clock and Hermione intended to mount it. In the letter Flamel had informed Dumbledore where he lived. So, all Hermione had to do now, was to go to Flamel's flat in London and steal the manuscript.

Hermione left the dormitory and walked down the stairs that led to the common room. She intended to have a quick breakfast and then return to the dorm and pack her things. As she walked through the common room a nervous looking first or second year approached her.

"Excuse me." The small girl piped sheepishly.

"Yes, dear?" Hermione asked kindly.

"The headmaster wishes to speak to you." The girl said in a hurried voice.

Hermione's heart sank as she heard that. They didn't know about her breaking into Dumbledore's office, did they?

"The password to the headmaster's office is 'Infigo!'" The girl said and then added in a small voice, "And... and professor Legifer wants to see you, too."

Hermione tried not to break down into a panic attack but smiled kindly down at the small girl.

"Thank you, dear."

The girl nodded, seemingly relieved that she had managed to deliver the message. Hermione, on the other hand, was not relieved in the least bit as she left the common room and headed for the headmaster's office.

They couldn't know anything, she tried to assure herself. She hadn't left behind any traces in Dumbledore's office.

"Infigo!" Hermione whispered as she reached the stone gargoyles guarding the headmaster's office.

The stone gargoyles pounced out of her way thus exposing the stairs that lead to the office. Hermione had a sinking feeling in her stomach as she climbed the stairs. Arriving at the top she knocked reluctantly at the dark, wooden door leading into Dippet's office.

"Come in!" She heard the voice of the headmaster.

Hermione opened the door and stepped into the office. It still looked like the last time she had been inside here. The room was tidy, nothing out of place. The glass cabinet with the golden trophy cups and medals stood imposingly at one wall of the office. The large, intimidating desk made of dark wood stood in the middle of the office, dominating the atmosphere of the room. Behind the desk, Dippet sat in a comfortable looking chair. His grey hair was trimmed into a short, accurate haircut and he wore an embroidered, grey waistcoat under his black wizard's robe. Currently he was reading through some papers lying on his desk.

"You wanted to speak with me, headmaster?" Hermione asked politely.
Dippet looked up from his paper. His stern gaze wandered over Hermione. Hermione was a little relieved as she noticed that he furrowed his brow, obviously trying to remember who she was or why she was here. That couldn't be about her breaking into Dumbledore's office then.

"Ah, of course, Ms DeCerto." Dippet said after a while in his pompous voice.

"Normally your head of house should be speaking to you now. But unfortunately professor Dumbledore had to suddenly leave Hogwarts and will not return until the end of the holidays."

Hermione felt like a bothersome task the headmaster wanted to get over with as fast as possible.

"Yes, headmaster." She said.

Dippet then reached for a neatly arranged stack of paper and took one sheet.

He scanned it and then looked back at Hermione,

"You are planning to leave Hogwarts for the holiday, Ms DeCerto. I was under the impression that you don't have family here in England, where do you intend to stay?"

Dippet seemed to be not really interested in her plans for the holidays. It was obviously just a bothersome obligation he had to fulfill as she was currently a student at Hogwarts and her head of house was not present to do the task for Dippet.

"I do have some relatives here in England, headmaster. I will be staying with them for the holidays." Hermione said.

Dippet glanced at her again and nodded curtly. He seemed to really not be overly interested in Hermione's life as he didn't ask any more questions.

"Very well, Ms DeCerto, I wish you a pleasant holiday then." Dippet said distractedly as he was reading through a new stack of papers again.

Hermione took that as a sign to be dismissed and said,

"A pleasant holiday to you too, headmaster."

Dippet didn't look up from his paper or announced in any way that he had heard her. So, Hermione left his office again. She was rather relieved that this hadn't been about her nightly activity yesterday. But it would have made things a lot easier if she had known before that Dumbledore wouldn't be at Hogwarts during the break, Hermione thought as she passed the stone Gargoyles. Then she wouldn't have gone through all the waiting and observing of his office.

Hermione walked down the corridor. She had still one other appointment to attend. Five minutes later she stood before professor Legifer's office and knocked reluctantly.

"Yes?" Hermione heard the loathsome voice answer.

As Hermione entered she found Legifer sitting behind her desk and staring coldly at Hermione.

"I shouldn't be surprised, should I?" Legifer said in a reprimanding way before Hermione had the chance to even open her mouth.

Legifer's cold gaze wandered from Hermione to the clock hanging on the wall.

"Your continued tardiness is spectacular."
Hermione raised her eyebrows. But she didn't point out that Legifer hadn't said anything about when Hermione should see her.

Legifer leaned back in her seat and her stern eyes scanned Hermione again. Then she said in her sharp voice,

"Now, Ms DeCerto, your inability to follow my lessons is quite alarming."

Hermione had to work to swallow the insult that begged to be screamed at the professor.

"I am not going to tolerate any of my students to fail my subject no matter how ungifted they might be." Here Legifer glanced at Hermione pointedly.

"So, I want you to work through this during the holidays."

Legifer pushed a thick book that had been lying on her neat desk over to Hermione. Hermione took the book and read it's cover: Etiquettes for the Young Housewitch.

Hermione's fingers trembled from suppressed rage as she stared down at the heavy book.

"I expect a written summary after the break." Legifer stated in a sharp voice.

Hermione's gaze wandered from the book to the professor sitting at the table.

"Yes, professor." Hermione said in a pressed voice.

"You may go then." Legifer dismissed Hermione.

Hermione fled the office. Her magic had started to whirl inside of her furiously and she feared she wouldn't be able to control it any longer should she stay in the office.

With the ridiculous book pinned under her arm Hermione walked back to the Gryffindor common room.

That stupid hag!

Now, Hermione had to skip breakfast thanks to that evil witch. She still needed to pack her things and the Hogwarts express would leave at eleven o'clock sharp.

One of these days I'll snap and then I'll curse that silly excuse for a witch!

Hermione stood, trunk in her hand, at the platform at Hogsmeade station and looked at the Hogwarts express. It looked just like it always had. The big, steaming locomotive, the many wagons with the compartments inside and of course the chaos on the platform. All the students with their trunks and pets and what not. They were chatting and laughing and were happy to go home for the holidays.

The train, Hogsmeade and the students, everything was just like Hermione remembered from her six years at Hogwarts. It was nice having the chance to relive this part of her childhood. But deep down Hermione knew, she didn't belong anymore. She was standing here with her trunk in her hand and she was just pretending. She was no student anymore, she was not one of them.

"Hey, Hermione." A voice beside her said. "Something wrong?"

Hermione turned. Beside her stood Longbottom, Lupin and Weasley. Lupin who had just spoken looked at her somewhat worried.
"No, no." Hermione said and tried to smile reassuringly at them. "I'm all right."

Longbottom furrowed his brow in thought, then suddenly brightened up and said,

"But of course. You've never seen the Hogwarts express, have you?"

Hermione was just going to object as she remembered that he was right. Hermione Granger had seen the express the first time as she had been eleven and nervously awaited the journey to the magical castle. But Hermione DeCerto had never used the express as she was a transfer student from France.

"It's really fun." Longbottom continued enthusiastically. "We'll get a compartment and then we can laze around a little. You know, to train for the next three weeks!" He smirked mischievously.

Hermione smiled at him and the other two boys.

"Yeah, let's do that."

She tightened her grip on her trunk and followed the three boys to the train. Lazing around was just the thing she needed to do right now. At least for the ride to London.

Then, she had work to do. Hermione planned to get herself a room at the Leaky Cauldron again. After that she would have to search for Flamel's flat where, hopefully, she would find a certain book she desperately needed.

But for now, she would enjoy the time with her friends. Just like she always had when driving home with the Hogwarts express.
Riddle slammed the lid of his trunk close and resisted the urge to kick it. He balled his hands into fists as he furiously stared down at his innocent looking trunk.

Why did he have to go back there?

It was the Christmas break after all. Normally Dumbledore only forced him to go back during the Summer break, which was bad enough. But the Christmas break? Oh, how he hated that old fool.

One day he's going to pay! Riddle thought furiously and sat down on his bed in the Slytherin dormitory. He still glared angrily at the trunk standing in front of him. It hadn't cost him much time to pack his things, because admittedly there wasn't much he wanted to take along. His gaze wandered from the trunk to the shelf of books that stood right beside his bed. He had so wanted to read that book he had found just last week in the Restricted Section of the library but he couldn't risk taking the book with him. Riddle could feel his magic bubbling up inside of him angrily. He breathed in to calm himself down.

Someday, Dumbledore would regret his actions, dearly! Riddle would make sure of that.

He looked away from the books and his gaze soon fell on the black wand lying on the side table. That was the very wand he had taken from DeCerto. And now every fibre of his being screamed at him to take the wand along. It was tempting. Very! But Riddle knew he had to restrain himself. He wasn't allowed to do magic outside of Hogwarts. Normally Riddle wouldn't give a damn about any rule. But this one he couldn't risk breaking. Especially now that he could still feel those remnants of Dumbledore's magic tingling on his skin. The ward had been so crudely and blatantly done that Riddle was sure Dumbledore did that on purpose. The familiar cold fury took hold of Riddle again. Dumbledore wanted Riddle to know that he had put a ward on him. Was that a warning? Or a derision?

Riddle cast a last, longing look at the black wand lying on the table before he got up from his bed, took the handle of his trunk and reluctantly left the dormitory, without having touched the wand at all.

It was here. Hermione was sure. She could feel the wards surrounding the area. That had to be the place where Flamel's flat was. The houses in this neighbourhood were worn down and Hermione wondered why Flamel lived here. But then again. Britain was currently engaged in a war with Germany. All London looked worn down.

Hermione entered the house number eight. This apartment building was obviously radiating magic. She opened the front door with a quick, silent Alohomora and stepped into the dark corridor. Then Hermione began to search the house for any traces of magic. In the second floor she could feel a huge source of magic. She confirmed that there were no muggles watching her before she pulled out her wand. After that she prodded the aura of magic with the tip of her wand. Then she closed her eyes and allowed her magic to flow from her body, through her wand, into the wards of Flamel's flat. She let her magic wrap itself around the wards to identify the spells. There were some Muggle repelling wards, several intruder spells which would attack anyone who stepped into the flat and a ward to alarm Flamel if anyone tried to disable the other wards. The spells were powerful and cleverly constructed. Hermione had to work for nearly ten minutes on them before she was able to open the door to Flame's flat.
As Hermione stepped inside his flat she was surprised. It was really spacious. A lot larger than it looked from the outside. Flamel had obviously used some magic to enlarge the flat. She walked through the well furnished rooms. Flamel obviously had style. As she stepped into the impressive library she instantly felt the force of a magical ward. That had to be the place where the Peverell book was hidden. She quickly identified a simple cupboard as the source of the magic. Hermione sighed as she detected the ward. That was going to need some time. It was a particularly complex warding spell. In some ways similar to the wards protecting Hogwarts though luckily not nearly as strong. Hermione sat cross-legged down in front of the cupboard and began to work.

Beads of sweat were building on her forehead as she worked her way through Flamel's protective spells. In the end she needed a good part of an hour until finally the door of the cupboard sprang open and revealed its precious content. An old book was lying innocently in the cupboard. It was not very thick and bound in brown leather which looked rather withered and tattered. In spite of its inconspicuous look Hermione's hands shook as she reached for the book. The book lay lightly in her trembling hands. There was no title on the cover so she opened it. The pages were filled with a fine handwriting. It was faded on some places but all in all good to read. Hermione went back to the first page which was blank apart from one sentence written in the same smooth hand,

I, Ignotus Peverell, devote this work to my two brethren Evander and Oleander.

Hermione's breath caught as she read the names. Peverell! This was it! She had made it. This was the manuscript written by Peverell himself.

Crash!

Hermione was brought abruptly out of her glee as she heard something shatter in the living room. The noise was followed by some cursing. She put the Peverell manuscript in her cloak pocket and got up. Then she sneaked over to the door leading from the library to the living room. As she walked she flicked her wrist and her wand was in her hand. Someone was in the flat. Maybe Flamel had come home? Hermione didn't know but she couldn't afford to be seen. Especially not by Flamel. He would tell Dumbledore and if Dumbledore knew she stolen the manuscript he would eventually find out the whole truth about her. She couldn't have that.

Hermione hid behind the door frame. She could sense someone was in the other room. She had no idea how good Flamel was in duelling but she guessed he was a master. After all he worked together with Dumbledore.

"Damn! Did you find anything?"

Hermione heard a male voice ask.

"Nothing," A cold voice answered. "I'll take this room. Go to the next!"

What was going on? That was surely not Flamel. What did those men do here? Hermione suddenly heard steps coming towards her. One of them was going to enter the library. Adrenalin was rushing through Hermione's veins. She needed to get out of her. Hermione stood behind the door as a person clad in a black cloak entered the library and passed her. She didn't recognize his face but she noticed that the man had his wand ready in his hand. Who were those people?

Now there was one man in the library and at least another in the living room. She was trapped. It was only a matter of time until they would notice her presence. Hermione needed to act now. She still had the element of surprise on her side. Hermione raised her wand and aimed it at the man with the black cloak.
Red light shot from her wand and collided with the back of the man. He fell forward, unconscious. Unfortunately, as he fell down, he smashed into the small side table. With a loud crash the table burst.

"What was that?" Came a voice from the other room.

"Dunno," someone answered.

_There are more?_ Hermione leaned forward to have a peak into the other room.

"Hey! Pierce! What ya doin?" someone called from the living room.

Hermione could see him now. This other man was too clad in a black cloak. He walked towards the door Hermione was hiding behind. Suddenly he stopped dead in his tracks. He must have seen the other man lying unconscious in the remains of the side table. Hermione tried to calm her breathing. She needed to focus now. There were still at least two opponents in the flat. In the mean time the man had pulled his wand and was now hiding behind the green sofa.

"Someone's here. Pierce is down!" he called to his ally.

Hermione could see movement in the hallway leading to the front door. Then she could hear another voice ordering, "Someone's inside. Keep your heads down, boys!"

_Oh god, how many are there?_

Then that same voice yelled, "Flamel! Is that you? You are surrounded! You cannot escape. You know what we want. Surrender the book and we won't harm you."

_What book?_ Hermione's hand went automatically to her pocket were she felt the hard outline of the Peverell book. Were those people after this book?

"We know you have it, Flamel!" the voice yelled again. "Just turn it over to us."

Hermione gulped. She recalled the lay-out of the flat. The living room was in the centre. One enemy was in the living room hiding behind the sofa. From the living room one door led to the library where she currently was. Another door on the right side from where she stood lead to the kitchen. The door on the left led to the bedroom. She had no idea if there were any enemies. The last door opposite from the library led to the hallway and out of the flat. The supposed leader of her attackers was in that hallway with an unknown number of enemies. Hermione needed to get out of the flat. But the front door was not a good option. Suddenly she saw a green light heading towards her. It flashed by her and hit one of the bookshelves behind her with a loud bang. The books and the wood of the shelf turned black and smoked where the curse had hit them.

_The Killing curse?_

"Go, go, go!" the voice from the hallway ordered.

Now a barrage of curses was heading in her direction. They hit the wall, the door frame and the bookshelves behind her. Based on the number of the curses there had to be at least three or four more opponents. That made five or six in total. Too many to take them lightly.

Then Hermione saw that the man behind the green sofa was moving. He was using the covering fire of his companions to sneak towards her. Spells were still hitting heavily on the door frame behind which she was hiding. Hermione had to move now or the enemy would trap her inside the library. She crouched down ready to sprint forwards. Then she pointed her wand inside the living room. She couldn't aim as the incoming spells were still hitting hard on her hiding place but that didn't matter.

_Bombarda!_

Hermione felt the spell leave her wand and shortly afterwards there was an explosion in the other room as her spell hit. Hermione used the confusion her spell had created and sprang into action. She plunged herself into the living room and used her momentum to slid forwards on the polished parquet on her side simultaneously aiming her wand up at the black cloaked man who had tried to sneak up on her. She could see his eyes widen in surprise as she cast her curse.

"Adstringo!"

Ropes flew from her wand and wound themselves around the man. They nearly choked him as they bound him so tightly that he fell down on the floor unable to move. The other men in the hallway started to fire again. Curses flew towards Hermione and she had to raise a shield.

_Sub sisto!_

The thick yellow shield appeared before her and absorbed the incoming spells changing its colour with every spell it took. Hermione sprang back on her feet and sprinted towards the kitchen door. Her shield was good but it wouldn’t hold the spells off forever. A bright blue spell hit her shield and it began to flicker. The next spell that hit destroyed her shield. Hermione tried to dodge the spell but her left arm was hit. She felt a sting in her wrist but ignored it for now. She hurled herself through the kitchen door.

"Get her! She's in the kitchen!"

Hermione scanned the room. There was a window. She heard the men in the flat move. She quickly pointed her wand at the kitchen door and said, "Obfírmo!"

The kitchen door closed and locked itself. That would gain her a few seconds. Hermione scurried to the window and flung it open. She was in the second floor. What was that? Three, four metres down? It should be possible. Hermione climbed on the window-sill as the door behind her burst open. She looked behind and saw two men entering the kitchen with a third one behind them.

"Freeze!" one of them ordered.

They pointed their wands at Hermione threateningly. Hermione yelled the first curse that came to her mind, "Caligo!"

Fog spread into the kitchen obscuring everything. A curse flew out of the fog and crashed into the window beside her head shattering the glass so that the shards cut her face. Hermione didn't hesitate and sprang out of the window. As she fell down she heard the counter curse for her Fog curse behind her,

"Solismico!"

As she landed down on the street a sharp pain shot from her ankle. She ignored the pain and sprang to her feet again. She was in a small backstreet. A curse was then hitting the pave-stone a few feet from her sending pieces of stone flying everywhere. She aimed her wand at the window above her and yelled,

"Reducto!"
As it hit she heard a satisfying yell of pain.

Another one down!

But she didn't stay to see more. She ran down the backstreet. A thud behind her told her that one of her pursuers had also jumped from the window. Hermione turned into the next back alley just as another curse hit the wall behind her. As she rounded the corner she crashed into someone so that they both fell down.

"Ow! What the hell are you doing?"

Hermione's head shot up as she recognized the voice.

"Riddle?" she asked faintly.

Sure enough she was staring at none other than Tom Riddle. He was glaring down at her with his icy grey eyes and a frown appeared between his eyebrows. He was wearing a ragged grey shirt and worn out black trousers and was currently getting back on his feet.

"DeCerto? What are you doing here?" he asked in his smooth deep voice.

Hermione heard someone approaching behind her. Her attacker had finally caught up again. Hermione grabbed Riddle's wrist and pelted forwards pulling him with her.

"No time for small talk. Run!" she yelled behind her.

Riddle seemed to be too surprised by her sudden action to buck against being pulled away though he said in a confused voice, "What are you-"

A curse hit the wall of the house beside them missing Riddle by inches. Hermione tugged him behind the next corner. There Riddle stopped and Hermione was forced to stop too. She turned around to him.

"What is going on?" Riddle yelled angrily at her.

"We don't have time for this!" Hermione screamed back. That man was still hunting her. They couldn't afford standing here and arguing.

"Get your wand out!" she ordered him as she scanned their surroundings.

This backstreet was just as deserted as the others. The houses were standing so narrow that the alley was at most two metres wide. No hiding places in sight. She looked back at Riddle expectantly. What was he waiting for? Wasn't he supposed to be the next Dark Lord? Surely he could stop that man with a small flick of his wand. But he wasn't even pulling his wand. He was staring down at her. His face was a blank mask again.

Then he spoke in a soft and controlled voice, "I don't have my wand with me."

Hermione's eyes widened in shock. Of course how could she have forgotten? Dumbledore! He took Riddle's wand back at Hogwarts. With shock she realized, He is unarmed!

In the corner of her eyes Hermione saw a bright light flying towards them. She had barely time to raise a shield as the curse hit. It crashed into her shield with such a force that she was hurled backwards. Shortly she was airborne before she hit the ground hard. Her head collided painfully with the pave stones. She lay on her back and stared up to the sky. Her head pounded and her whole back hurt badly. She rolled over to her side and coughed. Her whole body ached.

"What are you doing here, filthy Muggle?" Hermione heard a male voice yell aggressively.

She opened her eyes and tried to focus. She saw a few metres away her attacker clad in a black cloak threatening Riddle with his wand. With a jolt Hermione realized how utterly defenceless Riddle was right now. She tried to get back on her feet but as she sat up a wave of nausea hit her. Her head still pounded painfully.

"Useless scum!" She heard the man hiss at Riddle.

Then to her horror she saw a yellow beam leave the man's wand and collide with Riddle's chest. Riddle was hurled against the stone wall and slid down the wall. He came to a rest sprawled down on the floor. He held his chest and was looking up at the man furiously.

Hermione had to do something. She tried again to get up to her feet and this time she used the wall as a support. She managed to stand shakily on her feet. Then she heard loud steps and voices coming from the street behind Riddle and the man. The other men from Flamel's flat had found them too. She had to get out of here or they would get her. She stiffened with fear as she heard the man who pointed his wand at Riddle utter his next curse,

"Avada-"

Hermione reacted in an instant. That curse had cost too many lives already. The Death Eaters, they used that curse so mercilessly. Hermione wasn't going to let them take another life. An uncontrollable fury took hold of her. And Hermione used that hate to fuel her magic. She thrust the magic through her wand and formed it into a curse.

Saevio!

The powerful curse left her wand and it crackled with magic as it soared towards the man in the black cloak. The man looked up and his face warped into a mask of fear. He had just time to raise a shield. But the curse shattered the shield effortlessly before it crashed into the man's chest. White hot flashes of electric blue lightning struck his body. He screamed in pain as the flashes burned his skin and ripped through his body. Then the power of the curse intensified. The man's eyes rolled up in his head and he fell over. His body hit the street with a soft thud.

Hermione saw Riddle stare incredulously at the man and then his gaze wandered towards Hermione. Hermione was brought out of her stupor as three men in dark cloaks rounded the corner ready to attack. She had to hurry or they would finish them off. She ran towards Riddle, fell down beside him and grabbed him around the chest. She closed her eyes and concentrated hard on the destination. She welcomed the dark pressure of the apparition with relief.

They reappeared a few miles away in the Apparition area of Diagon Alley. Hermione was still embracing Riddle who was still sprawled out on the floor. There were now people around them. Witches and wizards who were visiting Diagon Alley. Hermione looked up and saw an old witch glaring down at her. She was wearing ancient looking velvet witch's robes and fixed Hermione with a disapproving stare. Her eyes travelled from Hermione's face to Riddle and then to Hermione's arms which were still wrapped tightly around his chest. The old witch shook her head and tsked at Hermione before she turned and walked away.

Hermione now noticed that the other people were too staring down at them. Some with the same scandalized look on their faces that the old witch had shown while others grinned down at Riddle and Hermione. Hermione felt blood shooting into her face and she quickly let go of Riddle. She was getting up on her feet again and mumbled something like,

"Apparition accident…"

Riddle too had gotten up and was now standing beside her. Hermione saw that he threw her one of his notorious death glares. She grabbed his wrist and pulled him out of the apparition area. She could feel that her head was still bright red.

"Where are you dragging me now to?" Hermione heard Riddle ask her irritably.

She looked back at him. He was glaring at her angrily and seemed to be inches away from losing his temper. She was tempted to just leave him here and head back to her cozy room in the Leaky Cauldron. She needed a rest now. Her ankle hurt. Maybe she had sprained it during her jump out of the window. Her head and back hurt too. Actually her whole body was aching. But she couldn't leave Riddle here. During that fight he had been hit by a curse. Maybe he was hurt now. And that would be completely Hermione's fault. Aside from that she had apparated him here without asking him, so it was her responsibility to bring him back to wherever he wanted.

"Let's just sit down for a while. Okay?" she said.

She had seen a pub not far away. It looked a little bit shady and was situated not far from the entrance to Knockturn Alley but Hermione didn't mind that right now. As Riddle wasn't objecting Hermione entered the pub. It was rather dark inside. There were a few dark figures sitting at the tables or the bar nursing their drinks. Hermione headed for a table at the far end of the pub. She was relieved to be able to sit down. Her ankle was hurting quite badly. Riddle took the chair opposite from her. He narrowed his eyes at her.

Oh boy, now he's going to interrogate me, Hermione sighed inwardly.

"So, what the fuck was that right now?" Riddle hissed at her.

"What do you mean?" Hermione asked innocently. She was in the mood to rile him up some more. He didn't have his wand after all, did he?

"Why were those men after you, DeCerto?" Riddle said, his voice icy cold and dangerous.

"I don't know. Maybe wanted to mug me?" she answered him in a controlled voice while she produced a hanky from her pocket to clean the blood and muck off her face with.

She saw a flash of red in Riddle's eyes. Then he ordered her aggressively, "Don't lie to me!"

"And how do you know I'm lying? Because you are such a good Legilimens?" Sarcasm was seeping from Hermione's voice as she reminded him of what had happened the last time he had tried to legilimise her.

Riddle glared at her. From the way his jaw was clenched he seemed to try not to lose what little there still was of his self-control. Hermione was really glad he didn't have his wand right now.

"First you drag me into this fight where I was nearly killed and then you have the impudence to insult me afterwards?" Riddle said through clenched teeth in a quite but sharp voice.

He was right, Hermione had to admit. If she was in his stead, she would be angry too. That man had nearly used the Killing curse on Riddle. She felt suddenly very guilty and looked down on her hands.
"I'm sorry," she told Riddle in a small voice. "I didn't mean to endanger you."

Hermione looked up at him again. He seemed to be a little taken aback by her apology. Obviously he hadn't expected her to be repentant. Hermione saw a man coming over to their table. As he reached them he asked in a heavy voice,

"Wha' can I bring ya?"

"Firewhiskey!" Hermione answered instantly. She needed something strong right about now.
"Two?" she asked Riddle who just nodded shortly. "Make that two Firewhiskey, then," Hermione told the waiter.

"So, are you telling me why that man was after you?" Riddle asked after the waiter had left their table.

"Well, let's just say we had a little misunderstanding," Hermione told him.

"Yeah, sure!" Now it was Riddle's turn to be sarcastic. "A little misunderstanding. So that's why he tried to murder you, huh?"

"Why's that so important? He didn't manage to kill either of us. It's water under the bridge."
Hermione didn't want to talk about it. She didn't need Riddle to know about Flamel's flat and the book of Peverell.

"Why's it so important? For God's sake, DeCerto! Maybe it's normal for you to have people try to kill you. For me it's not an everyday occurrence," Riddle said exasperatedly.

"Well, if you had your wand on you, it wouldn't have come to that," Hermione answered defensively.

To her surprise Riddle didn't jump in her face after that statement. There was an unfathomable expression on his face. If it had been anyone else, Hermione would have said he looked forlorn but as it was Riddle she really didn't know. The expression lasted only for seconds before it was replaced by his usual emotionless mask.

"Why, you seemed to have everything under control," he said as Hermione found herself once again caught in his gaze.

A triumphant smirk was tucking at the corners of his mouth before he said, "You nearly killed that man, didn't you?"

"Don't be so condescending!" Hermione hissed at him. "At least I didn't use an Unforgivable."

Their conversation was interrupted as the waiter brought them their Firewhiskey. Hermione took her glass angrily and gulped down its contents.

"Easy, easy," Riddle said amused as he sipped at his glass.

"And what business did you have anyway straying around those backstreets?" Hermione asked him angrily.

"Whoa, why's it suddenly me being in the dock?" Riddle asked her lightly. "I didn't cast that curse at the man. You know that was Dark Magic, don't you? I should go straight to the Aurors and turn you in."
"Pff, Dark Magic," Hermione said. "You hypocrite! What was the last spell you used on me again? Oh yes, the Cruciatius Curse. I'm sure the Aurors will be very interested in that too."

"You know, DeCerto? You are quite amusing."

Hermione glared at him sitting leisurely in his chair and sipping his firewhiskey. He was enjoying this conversation a little too much for her liking. Hermione didn't want to talk with him anymore. He was getting on her nerves. And as he didn't appear to be injured it was about time she brought him back to his orphanage.

"Okay, if you are quite finished with insulting me, then let's go," she told him as she put a few coins down on the table to pay for the Firewhiskey before she stood up. A sharp pain shot through her ankle as she put her weight on it but she ignored it. Riddle was looking at her with raised eyebrows but didn't get up from his chair.

"Where to?" he asked.

"As this whole fiasco was my fault I'll apparate you back to your orphanage."

Riddle narrowed his eyes at her. "How do you know where I live!"

"Oh sorry. Is that another one of your many secrets?" she asked in mock-concern though she was rather upset that she had again let something slip.

"I can walk back on my own," Riddle said coldly as he got up from his chair.

"And what if those dubious men are still in the vicinity? They have seen your face. How are you going to fight them without a wand?" There was now a little bit of genuine concern in her voice. "No, I'll accompany you back."

"Oh, where is that concern about my safety suddenly coming from?" Riddle asked darkly as they left the pub.

"Certainly not because you are such an amiable person," Hermione muttered.

Riddle walked over to the Apparition area. Despite his words he seemed to take Hermione's offer to apparate him back. Hermione followed him, limping slightly.

"So, where do you want me to apparate to?" Hermione asked Riddle impatiently as she had reached him.

"Do you know the main street just a few streets down from where we disapparated from?" Riddle asked her.

"Yes, and I know just the secluded place where to apparate to. Hold on!" Hermione said holding out her arm. Riddle took it and grabbed it tightly.

Hermione concentrated on her destination. She knew where she had to apparate to. She could have even apparated right beside Riddle's orphanage. She knew where that was as she had once visited his old orphanage back in her time period in the hope to find a horcrux. But Riddle would surely get suspicious if Hermione let show how much she actually knew about him so she decided to apparate into an alley a few minutes away from his orphanage. They left Diagon Alley and stepped into the unpleasant feeling of pressure to reappear a few miles away in a small alleyway. Riddle instantly took off down the alley. Hermione rolled her eyes. What did she expect? Surely not a 'thank you' from Lord Voldemort. She limped behind him cursing Riddle and her painful ankle. Quickly they reached the main road. There were some people on the sidewalk and even a few cars drove by. They walked for some time, Riddle in front and Hermione following him, until he stopped and turned around.

"Why are you still following me?" he asked angrily.

"Well, I said I'll bring you back, didn't I"

"You did apparate me here. So, why don't you bugger off now?"

"I'm just making sure that you reach your destination, okay?" Hermione was getting angry herself now. Why did he have to be so unpleasant?

Riddle didn't say anything else he just turned and continued to walk down the street. Hermione didn't really know why she was following him. Whoever those men in Flamel's flat had been she was quite sure that they were gone by now. Even if not, she would be more than surprised if they would attack in the middle of a street full of muggles.

So why was she following Riddle? Hermione somehow found herself wanting to see where he lived. She had never seen the orphanage. In her time period it didn't exist anymore. Was she on a perverted sight-seeing-tour?

Fortunately she couldn't dwell on these disturbing thoughts any longer as they had reached the orphanage. They stood before a pair of iron gates. Hermione could see the orphanage. It was a rather grim looking square building. Riddle opened the front gate and stepped through. Hermione followed him into a bare front yard. They passed the yard and headed for the front door of the building. Riddle reached the door.

Then he turned around to Hermione and hissed angrily, "What? Do you expect me to invite you to tea?"

Hermione was surprised by his aggressiveness. "Okay okay, I'm leave-

She was interrupted as the front door was abruptly flung open. A brawny man stood in the door way. He was glaring angrily down at them. Hermione saw Riddle tense.

"Tom!" the man yelled at Riddle. "Where have you been?"

Riddle didn't have time to answer the question as the man reached out for him, grabbed his collar and pulled Riddle brutally inside. Hermione was perplexed by the man's behaviour. He hadn't even acknowledged her presence. She didn't know what she was supposed to do now. Wasn't Riddle allowed to leave the orphanage? Maybe that man dragged him now to the patron of the orphanage. What was her name again? Harry had told her once. Colls? No, Cole. Mrs Cole.

Hermione could still hear the man yelling at Riddle. She stepped through the door inside the building and followed his voice. She passed a hallway and entered something like an entrance hall. Riddle and the man stood in that room. The man was still clutching Riddle by the collar.

"I ordered you to clean the dining hall, didn't I?" the man yelled into Riddle's face.

"Yes, sir. I'm-" Riddle tried to say in an almost subdued voice.

"But you just ran off, didn't you, Tom?" the man yelled furiously.

"I did-"
"Do you think you are special? Do you think you can do whatever you want?" the man continued to yell at Riddle and started to shake him by his collar.

"No, I-"

"Damn right. Because you are nothing special, Tom," the man spat at Riddle. "And if I tell you to do something, then you obey! Is that clear?"

Riddle didn't answer to that which seemed to enrage the man even further. He shook Riddle again brutally by his collar.

"Is that clear?" he asked Riddle again in a sharp voice.

Riddle still didn't answer and the man seemed to lose the little self-control he still possessed. He raised his hand and then slapped Riddle hard in the face. Hermione gasped as she saw the man hitting Riddle. As the man raised his hand again, Hermione stepped forward and yelled,

"Stop!"

The man did stop and he looked surprised over to Hermione. He seemed to realize just now that she was there. He narrowed his eyes at her and asked,

"Who are you?"

"Luisa Donohue," Hermione lied, silently apologizing to Luisa the waitress of the Leaky Cauldron for borrowing her name.

"And what are you doing here, Ms Donohue?" the man asked her dangerously.

"I…I…" Hermione stammered. She needed to lie now. The man was staring at her angrily. Hermione cast a look at Riddle. He was gazing back at her, seemingly surprised. She could see an angry red mark beginning to take shape on his left cheek. Hermione breathed in deeply and directed her gaze back to the man. She smiled at him politely before she said,

"I am sorry to intrude here like this, Mr…?"

"Carter. Peter Carter. I am the patron of this institution," the man, Carter, spat at her.

Hermione was surprised. Harry had told her that Riddle's orphanage was led by a Mrs Cole. She didn't let her surprise show on her face though but continued to smile at Carter.

"It is my fault that Tom neglected his duties. Please, don't punish him."

"Why would it be your fault, Miss?" Carter asked suspiciously. Though the rage was by now gone from his voice, Hermione noticed relieved.

"You see, Mr Carter. My father was just released today from the hospital. He fought on the frontline against those Nazis but he got wounded and was sent back home."

A sob story was just what she needed, Hermione decided.

"So I went to the hospital today to pick up my father. He still can't walk without help, you know? I was walking my father back to our home as we passed your orphanage. And Tom here saw us. I was really struggling then. My father is a tall man so I had problems supporting him properly. Tom offered to help me. I accepted his offer. It was very decent of him to help us. I hope Tom doesn't get problems now when all he did was helping me."
After that spectacular lie Hermione looked at Carter expectantly. He now had very little room to react. She knew she was laying it on a little thick but it seemed to work. Carter had calmed visibly down. She didn't know if he really believed her. He did know Riddle after all. And in the story Hermione had just made up Riddle was quite out of character.

Carter cleared his throat before he spoke, "If that is what happened then I can hardly punish him." He turned to Riddle. "Tom, go to your room!"

Riddle seemed to be perplexed by this sudden dismissal or he was surprised that Hermione had helped him. She didn't know. He was not easy to figure out after all. He glanced at Hermione with his penetrating grey eyes before he turned and headed to the staircase behind them.

Hermione looked back at Carter and said, "I hope I didn't cause you any inconveniences, Mr Carter."

Carter cleared his throat before he replied, "No, not at all."

Now that Hermione had the time she eyed Carter a little bit more closely. He was a tall, brawny man with short brown hair and a moustache. His face seemed to be constantly purple like he was enraged about something. Hermione could see a large silver cross on a chain lying on his chest.

"Let me bring you to the door," Carter offered.

Hermione followed Carter as he led the way.

"I apologize again for intruding like this, Mr Carter. That is not how I normally behave," Hermione said politely. "And let me congratulate you for having raised such a helpful young man like Tom."

She lied through her teeth.

Hermione wanted to engage Carter into a conversation. She was curious as to what had happened to Mrs Cole.

"Well, I'm glad Tom slowly shows some manners," Carter said. "He is a rather difficult boy."

Hermione raised her eyebrows. Should he be telling her this?

"In what way is he difficult?" Hermione asked and she tried to not let her curiosity seep into her voice.

"You see, Ms Donohue, I am a religious man." Carter looked at her.

Hermione didn't see were this was going so she just nodded.

Carter continued, "I took the direction of this orphanage out of the goodness of my heart."

Yeah! Hermione thought and nearly rolled her eyes. You are quite the saint!

"And I try to raise those poor children in the way of God. But Tom…" Carter looked somehow disgusted as he continued. "Tom is twisted, unnatural. He needs a strong hand to show him the right path, God's path."

Hermione was scandalised. 'A strong hand'? And he had just hit Riddle…

That vile man! Hermione thought angrily as she looked at Carter. No-one had the right to hurt their wards no matter how psychopathic the ward concerned might be.

"I try my very best to show Tom the true path. But I have my doubts he will be able to leave his warped ways and the depravity he always shows." Hermione heard Carter continue. "He needs to be watched closely and punished strictly otherwise he will be lost."

Hermione tried to keep her anger inside. That man was just horrible. Sure Riddle was evil. But Hermione doubted this Carter person really knew that. No, she assumed that when Carter talked about the 'warped ways' of Riddle he was referring to the fact that Riddle was a wizard. Hermione didn't think that Carter knew Riddle was a wizard but he obviously guessed that there was something not right with Riddle. Hermione hated to think what Carter meant with Riddle had to be 'punished strictly'.

"Was Tom always like this?" Hermione asked and had to really work to keep her anger out of her voice.

"Yes, I think so," Carter answered. "I wasn't here when Tom grew up here. But I heard horrible stories about his behaviour." Carter shook his head.

"Oh? Since when do you watch over this orphanage, Mr Carter?" Hermione asked tentatively.

"That must be nearly four years now," Carter said.

By now they had reached the front door and Hermione was rather glad when she was finally able to walk away from the depressing looking building. That orphanage was really awful, especially Carter. He was a right stuck-up bigot. Hermione could now understand why Riddle hated it so much to have to return there. She had qualms as she walked down the street and away from the orphanage. She really didn't want to leave Riddle in the custody of Carter.

But then again, it was Riddle. What did she care? Even if he was beaten by Carter didn't Voldemort deserve something like this?

In spite of these thoughts Hermione felt uneasy as she entered a back alley from which she planned to apparate to Diagon Alley.

Back in her room in the Leaky Cauldron Hermione put up a few privacy spell, warning charms and the like to prevent anyone from coming near her room. Then she sat down on her bed and with trembling hands pulled the book of Peverell out of her cloak pocket. The thin book lay innocently in her hand. The brown leather cover still looked old and battered. Hermione breathed in deeply and opened the cover. A lot of her hopes lay in the little book in her hands. If the book proved to be a dead end Hermione might remain stranded in the wrong time period for the rest of her life. The parchment of the book was yellowed, the scripture handwritten and faded at some places. Hermione closed her eyes and prayed that her hopes wouldn't be shattered, then she opened her eyes again and began to read:

With the help of my brothers I, Igontus Peverell, have delved deeper into the power, residing in all things, than anybody before. Together we travelled realms hitherto unknown and left behind the boundaries narrow minded people have erected to conceal their own deficiency. In short, my brothers and I have worked with the pristine power that is called Magic.

This all-embracing power is vastly different from the so called magic self pronounced masters teach their disciples. They have the impertinence to proclaim their knowledge of wizardry when they know nothing about the ways of Magic. They instruct their students in fatuous wand swinging and the foolish parroting of incantations when true Magic is so much more.
For so long Wizards have curtailed Magic and bereft it its former beauty. Thus, all that now remains is a mutilated shadow of what once was a glorious force. Magic is a natural force that flows through everything, it is ubiquitous and eternally changing. To wedge it into unyielding spells and wand movements is a crime beyond imagining. So my brothers and I renounced the old, fusty ways which have done nothing but cage up this beautiful force. They might call us traitors or felons but we will never falter from the true path.

Hermione stopped reading. Those words Peverell had written sounded horribly familiar. ‘Magic is eternally changing…’ That was almost the exact same wording Snape had used all those years ago to so lovingly describe the Dark Arts. The Dark Arts are eternal and ever changing.’ Hermione looked back at the book in her hands. Who was Peverell really? An unrivalled master in his field of knowledge or just a gifted Dark Wizard? Hermione sighed. Either way, she was dependent on his knowledge. Dark Artefact or not, she needed to understand the way the Elder Wand worked.

For the next days Hermione nearly never left her room. She only went down to the bar of the Leaky Cauldron to get herself something to eat. The rest of the time she studied the book of Peverell. Igontus Peverell and his two brothers were without a doubt geniuses but Peverell's way of describing magic was reminding Hermione more and more of Dark Magic.

Hermione wasn't proud of it but unfortunately she knew a little bit about the Dark Arts. She had resisted for a long time to learn dark spells but at some point in time she had decided to use any spell if it would save the life of a friend. She knew it was wrong to use the Dark Arts. The more she had learnt about Dark Magic the more she had come to see how devious and twisted it really was. But back then she had been ready to use any means possible to stop Lord Voldemort. If that meant she had to use his own weapons against him, then she would do it. At first she had studied the Dark Arts not with the intention to use them but to understand what she was facing, later as the war had been dragged on she had decided to use them in battle. It had been a horrible decision and the first one she had made without Harry and Ron but it had been necessary.

At some passages, Peverell's view on magic was frighteningly similar to those Dark Art works she had read, though he never really used the term 'Dark Art' directly. Hermione hadn't managed to read much but she could already tell that the concepts Peverell described were extremely sophisticated and complex. She had a hard time understanding them so she couldn't be completely sure whether they were dark or not. And she was by far no expert in that matter. She did know which spells and curses were dark but she didn't know where to draw the line. Peverell's book didn't seem to deal with charms or spells as such, it dealt with the nature of magic. And how could the nature of magic itself be dark? Additionally, Peverell's manuscript was very old. Back then the Dark Arts might not have existed at all.

Whichever way, Hermione had to read the manuscript as it was her only chance to find a way home.
The Aftermath Of War

Hermione woke up from her sleep by a loud explosion. She shot out of her bed while she grabbed her wand from under her pillow before she was really awake. She looked around her room but saw no attackers. Was that noise just now only in her dream? A yawn broke free as she looked down on her wrist watch. Three in the morning?

Too early to worry about any nightmares, she thought grumpily.

She just lay down again as another explosion could be heard. She got up quickly and walked over to the only window in the room. Those explosions were coming from somewhere outside. Hermione drew the curtains away. She now had a view of Diagon Alley and beyond that she could see London. Hermione gasped horrified as her gaze fell on the city. The nightly sky was lit up with a forbiddingly red and orange sheen. Columns of thick, black smoke were rising here and there from the buildings of the city. Up in the sky, against the shine of the burning city underneath, Hermione could see rows and rows of aircrafts. There were so many of them that the frightening sound of their air-screws could be heard like thunder over the mayhem down in the city. Those monsters in the air opened their metal bellies to release their murderous cargo. Bomb after bomb dropped down on the city. Each crashed into the defenceless buildings with a horrible explosion.

Hermione's stomach knotted in a mixture of fear and disgust as she witnessed the German air raid attacking London. Tears were running down her eyes unnoticed. She had heard and read about the Second World War but to see it and experience it herself was so dreadful that she felt nauseous. All those innocent people out there, men, women and children, were dying. Hermione's hands curled into fists as she watched helplessly how the bombs rained down on the city. She knew that she was safe here in Diagon Alley. Strong wards were protecting this wizarding settlement. But what about the people out there in this inferno?

"Riddle!" Hermione whispered shocked.

He was out there in this burning city, unprotected by any wards. And, Hermione remembered with a jab in her chest, without his wand. What if the orphanage was hit? He wouldn't be able to save himself without his wand. That would be difficult even with a wand. Hermione continued to watch the direful scene unfolding in front of her unable to help or to do anything. The German bombers continued to drop their abhorrent cargo for an eternity. As they finally broke off and flew away they left behind a destroyed and broken city. Long after the bombers had left the fires continued to burn and lit the sky threateningly.

Hermione fell into an uneasy sleep in the early morning hours. She lay curled into a ball on the floor in front of the small window. She woke up from a nightmare ridden sleep just a few hours after she had fallen asleep. She stumbled up and again looked out of the window. It was no longer dark outside and the rays of the morning sun broke through the clouds on the sky. Hermione could still see black smoke rising from the city. Some of the fires were still smoldering. Hermione couldn't believe what she had witnessed this night. To her the Second World War was a part of history. Something so far away that it had transformed into dry facts and dates out of a book. But now it crashed down around her as hard reality where people were affected and lost their lives.

With a sigh she turned away from the window and the view it showed. War! What a stupid idea. And yet it seemed to follow mankind. She herself was no stranger to it. She had fought in the war against Voldemort and she had seen its ugly face. Regardless of the side you were fighting on there was no way to get out of the war and still remain clean and innocent.
Hermione walked over to her wardrobe and pulled out some clothes. She got washed and dressed before she left her room and headed down to get something to eat. Although it was quite early Hermione saw a few customers already sitting at the tables and eating their breakfast. She walked over to a free table and sat down. After a few moments Luisa the waitress and maid of the Leaky Cauldron came over to her table.

"Good morning." She smiled down at Hermione kindly. "What can I get you?"

"Oh, just a few slices of toast and a coffee, please," Hermione replied tiredly.

"Right away. You look like you need the coffee. Couldn't sleep, eh? What with all that racket the Muggles were making it's no wonder." Luisa shook her head. "Poor things. I'm just glad we are safe here in Diagon Alley."

"Yes," Hermione said. "How often does something like that happen?"

Luisa looked down at her sadly. "Too often if you ask me. I just hope they can solve whatever they are fighting over soon."

Hermione nodded. But she knew that this war would continue for nearly the next two years. Luisa went to get Hermione's order and Hermione was left to her own thoughts. She didn't want to admit it, not even before herself, but she was a little bit worried about Riddle. He had been out there last night. Maybe he had been hurt. Maybe his orphanage had been hit by one of those bombs. Hermione knew his orphanage didn't exist anymore at her time period. But she didn't know when it had been destroyed. She was fiddling a strand of her hair nervously as Luisa brought her her breakfast. She put the plate and cup down in front of Hermione smiled at her before she left again. Hermione began to eat but her thoughts were elsewhere. Riddle was alive in her time period. So it wasn't possible that he had died last night in that air raid, Hermione reasoned.

But maybe he is hurt! a voice inside of her threw in.

Yeah? So what? another side of her answered angrily. He was the enemy! What did she care whether he was hurt or not? He would deserve something like that anyway.

Hermione's thoughts wandered back to the day she had last seen him. He had been hit by a curse back then. She remembered how she had defended him and grabbed him to apparate away. It had reminded her of the war she had been fighting in. They had never left someone behind. That same feeling of protectiveness had overcome her again and had taken her to save Riddle.

She drank the last bit of her coffee before she put down the cup, sighed and stood up from her table. It wouldn't hurt if she just checked on him briefly. To satisfy her curiosity. Most likely he would be all right anyway.

Hermione left the Leakey Cauldron and walked over to the Apparition area of Diagon Alley. As she walked she transfigured her witch's outer robes into something less conspicuous in the Muggle world. When she reached the apparition spot she turned on her heel and dived once again in the unpleasant feeling of pressure. She reappeared at the other end of London in a secluded alleyway. After she made sure that no muggle had seen her unusual way of travelling she stepped out of the small alley. Then she walked down the street in direction of Riddle's orphanage. As she so strolled down the lane she was instantly hit by the atmosphere of despair that dominated Muggle London. This area of London seemed to have been spared by most of the bombs. But the people she saw still looked rather shaken as they hurried along the streets. After a few minutes of walking Hermione came upon a terrible sight. There on the right side of the street she was walking along was a huge crater where once had been a house. The adjoining houses were destroyed too. But their remaining structures could at least still be recognized as houses. Hermione hurried along the street hoping that the building she was searching for didn't share their fate.

She felt immensely relieved as she stood before the dreary, grey building that was Riddle's orphanage. It seemed to be undazzled by the German bombs. There had been no need to be afraid after all. She was just turning around to head back to Diagon Alley as she remembered Mr Carter the patron of the orphanage and how he had treated Riddle. Now that she was here anyway she could at least check on Riddle to make sure he was okay.

But how to do that? She didn't want to walk in there and speak with that despicable man again. Then how about she cast a few Muggle repellent charms and Notice-Me-Not charms on herself? With them she could walk in calmly and no-one would even notice her. Beside Riddle of course. He was a wizard so he would be able to look underneath the charms.

Yes, that sounded definitely like a plan, Hermione thought.

She walked over to a secluded area right beside the outer wall of the orphanage before she pulled out her wand and cast the necessary spells on herself. After that charm work she went back over to the entrance gate and opened it. As she walked to the entrance of the orphanage building she had to remind herself that she couldn't use any magic from now on. Riddle was still underage and thus not allowed to use any magic during holidays. Every magic used in the vicinity of his orphanage would be blamed on him.

Hermione's wand was safely stowed away in her wand holster as she stepped through the entrance door. Fortunately the hallway was empty so Hermione continued her way undisturbed. She reached the next door and opened it. She now stood in the entrance hall. Though 'hall' was not the right word to describe it. Maybe chamber was a better way to call it. It was small and the grey, once white, wallpapers made it rather depressing. In front of Hermione was a double glass door which obviously let to the dining facility. On her left side were a few doors and on her right were some stairs leading up. Hermione decided to first search for Riddle upstairs. The design of the building suggested that the rooms for the orphans were on the second floor. Hermione climbed the stairs. And she had been right. The rooms of the orphans were here. Hermione faced a corridor which had on either side many doors. Children were running down the corridor skipping from room to room and playing in their rooms. Hermione noticed how they all wore a similar grey tunic. She remembered that Riddle had worn it too. Maybe that was some kind of uniform here. Though a rather ugly one at that, Hermione decided. She walked slowly down the corridor. She had to watch out that none of the children accidently ran into her as she was invisible to them. The children themselves looked well cared for and seemed to be relatively happy. But Hermione wasn't surprised that some of them looked rather thin. They were living in wartime after all. Luckily most of the doors she passed were open. She just had to peer inside to confirm that it wasn't Riddle's room. And the few that were closed were quickly opened. But as she reached the end of the corridor she hadn't found Riddle. She looked out of the window that was at the end of the corridor. She had an overview of the back yard of the orphanage. The yard was fenced by a huge concrete wall. Some of the orphans were playing down there. But Hermione couldn't see Riddle there either.

Where was he?

Hermione walked back the way she had come from and down the stairs. She ended up in the entrance hall. A quick look into the dining facility confirmed that Riddle wasn't there either. She just wondered where she should search next as one of the doors next to her opened. Mr Carter stepped out followed by one of the staff girls. She seemed to be very young Hermione noticed astounded. Barely older than some of her charges.
"I told you Emma. New toys are too expensive." Hermione heard Mr Carter lecture the girl. "It's getting more and more difficult now to find any donator."

"Yes, Mr Carter," the girl answered timidly.

"Now off you go, Emma. I'm sure there are still things you have to do," Mr Carter said.

With that the girl hurried away.

"Now now, Peter." Hermione heard a woman from inside the room say. "You work my girls too hard."

Mr Carter turned around and said while smirking at the person inside the room. "But, Michelle, you know me. I would never do such a thing."

As he said that a woman stepped out of the room. She was in her late forties and was rather plump, with brown hair strained with white.

"Whatever you say, Peter," she said amused.

Mr Carter laughed at that disgustingly. Hermione felt her dislike of him rise again. And as she looked at the sharp features of the woman she felt that she didn't like her either.

"What about little Simon?" the plump woman asked lazily. "Is he still making problems?"

"Oh, no," Mr Carter answered. "Those little pests just need a strong hand is all. They are just being normal kids." He seemed to consider something before he continued, "Not like that Tom."

Here Hermione's head shot up and she was paying utmost attention again.

"That boy is an obnoxious little bastard."

Hermione raised her eyebrows at that insult.

"Yes yes. He's a really creepy boy," the plump woman said with a disgusted face. "Something's not right with him."

"Yes," Mr Carter said firmly. "It seems that boy has deviated far from God's path."

The plump woman crossed herself at his statement.

"Since I started working here I have tried to put him back on the right path," Mr Carter stated with a hard voice. "But he always seems to go back to his warped ways, regardless of how often I give him the strap."

Hermione didn't want to believe her ears anymore. That sick bastard! And someone like him was to watch over children?

"Yes, right you are," the plump woman agreed with Carter. "By the way for how long is he to stay in the cellar?"

Carter shrugged at that. "For at least a day more."

Hermione stared at the two, unbelieving. What was wrong with those people? She stopped hearing in to their offensive conversation and turned around to eye the staircase instead. Cellar?
One of the stairs was leading upstairs where the orphans' rooms where. Another was leading downstairs. Hermione hadn't paid that one any attention before. She went over to the stairs and took the one leading down. After a while she reached the dark and dirty basement. The walls were bare concrete and cobwebs were hanging from the ceiling. There were puddles of foul water on the ground. Hermione took a tentative step down the passage. Her eyes needed a while before they were adapted to the twilight down here. She took a few more steps into the littered passage. After some time stumbling in the dark she came upon a solid looking door. She went over to that door and tried the handle. It was locked. Hermione looked around. That door seemed to be the only one down here. So it was very likely that Riddle was behind that door, Hermione reasoned. She searched inside her pockets for something to pick the lock. She came up with a paperclip.

That should do the trick.

To know how to pick a lock the Muggle way had proven immensely useful during the war. Hermione had once learned it from Fred and George. She bent up the paperclip and stuck it into the lock. She wasn't as good in lock picking as Fred and George had been but good enough so that after a few minutes the lock finally sprang open.

Hermione opened the door slowly. The room inside seemed to be a little bit brighter than the passage due to the small grated window high on one of the walls. Unfortunately its window glass was broken, letting in the cold December air. Hermione stepped inside. It was a rather small chamber. And it was just as dirty as the passage way had been. Mildew was growing on the grey walls and the floor was damp and dirty. But Hermione didn't pay that any attention. Her eyes were focused on the fallen form lying in the middle of the room. She rushed over to the heap on the floor. Hermione recognized Riddle curled up into a ball and lying on the grimy floor of the room. She fell down beside him. She saw that his eyes were closed and his face was warped into a mask of pain. There were bruises and old blood all over his face, contrasting sharply with his pale skin. To Hermione's horror she could see that the back of his shirt was soaked in blood too.

"Riddle?" she said softly as she touched his arm gently.

Riddle jerked away from her touch.

"It's me, DeCerto," Hermione said in a soothing voice.

Riddle slowly opened his eyes and looked at her blankly. Hermione shuddered as she saw the pain in his beautiful grey eyes.

"What are you doing here?" he asked in a hoarse voice.

"Well, what do you think? Enjoying my day in this inviting environment of course," she gently joked with him as she wiped a few strands of his dark hair out of his face. "Come, get up," Hermione ordered as she gently pulled at his arm.

Riddle winced in pain as he tried to sit up. With Hermione's help he managed to get into a sitting position. She noticed that he held his right arm protectively to his chest and his back seemed to be extremely stiff. That and the bruises on his face told her everything she needed to know. She was sure that evil man, Carter, had beaten Riddle. Hermione had to support Riddle so he wouldn't tip over. She had her right arm wrapped around his shoulders. He was trembling slightly either from the pain or the cold, Hermione didn't know.

"We have to get you out of here," she whispered softly to him. "Do you think you can walk?"

Riddle turned his head and looked at her questioningly. Hermione saw that his eyes were still clouded by pain. She nearly winced as she looked at the dark purple bruises that marred his handsome face.

"Why are you here?" he asked her again with his hoarse voice.

Hermione smiled at him reassuringly before she answered seriously, "To get you out of here."

He didn't move and continued to stare at her suspiciously as if he assumed she had an ulterior motive.

"Now enough questions," Hermione told him in her no-nonsense-voice that she had so often used when Harry or Ron had yet again planned one of their stupid and rash adventures. "I need you to get up, Riddle. I can't carry you, you know?"

Hermione then arranged one of her arms under his left shoulder and tried to heave him up. He softly groaned in pain as she tried to hoist him up. In the end she managed to get him to stand up. He staggered a lot and Hermione had to support him quite a bit so that he didn't fall over. She took his left and seemingly uninjured arm and put it around her shoulders so he could lean on her. Then she wrapped her right arm around his waist to steady him.

"Now we get up the stairs," she told him. "And then we get the hell out of here, okay?"

Riddle didn't answer so Hermione took his lack of objection as a 'yes' and guided him out of the disgusting room. He followed her but he obviously had difficulties with walking. Hermione could hear his laboured breathing and he leaned heavily on her. From time to time she could hear him moan in pain. As they reached the foot of the staircase Hermione was exhausted but she wasn't going to give in to that. She adjusted her grip on Riddle so that she held him more safely and then she helped him climb up the stairs. With her left hand she clasped the banister to prevent herself from losing balance and to pull them both up. As they had nearly reached the next floor Hermione stopped and sat Riddle down on one of the steps. She gently cupped one of his cheeks in her hand to get his attention and then she told him softly,

"I'm going to check if the coast is clear. I'll be back in a moment."

Riddle looked at her with his grey, unfathomable eyes and then he nodded curtly. Hermione smiled at him shortly before she got up again and sneaked up the last steps. She reached the entrance hall and confirmed that Riddle couldn't be seen from this point of view. She then hushed over to the dining facility to make sure that no-one was inside right now. After that she left the entrance hall in direction of the hallway that lead outside. The hallway, too, was empty. She passed it and opened the front door. The cold December air hit her as she stepped out of the orphanage building. She scanned the front yard. No-one here, either. She reentered the building again and walked through the hallway. She would have to just risk it now. Hopefully they wouldn't be seen leaving.

And if someone tries to stop us, I'm going to hex them! Hermione thought fiercely. Underage magic or not, I'm not letting Riddle stay here.

Hermione reached the entrance hall again and hurried over to the staircase. She breathed out relieved as she saw Riddle still sitting on the step where she had left him. Hermione could see that the back of his shirt was indeed covered in blood. She hurried the steps down and stooped down in front of him. He had his head leaned against the wall but he opened his eyes as he had heard her coming. He seemed to be thoroughly exhausted. Hermione hoped she could get him out of here.

"Let's go," she said as she grabbed his arm again.

With some effort she managed to get him up again and they staggered up the last steps to the entrance hall. Riddle now leaned on her even more heavily than before. Hermione needed to leave here fast. They stumbled through the entrance hall and the hallway until they reached the front door. Hermione opened it and together they stepped out. It was now just the front yard that separated them from a safe apparition point. Hermione led Riddle in direction of the exit and they had nearly reached the metal gate as Hermione heard a shout. She turned her head and saw a man standing in the doorway they had just left. She stopped breathing as she recognized Carter. He was waving his arm angrily at them. Hermione could hear him shout enraged, "Stop!" Before he began to run towards them.

Hermione sprang into action again. She tightened her grip on Riddle and ignored his painful moans of protest as she hauled him forwards forcefully.

"You are not getting away, you ungrateful little bastard!" Carter yelled behind them.

Hermione noticed that his yells were now frighteningly near them. But it was only one more step and they reached the metal gate. Hermione flung it open. As they stepped over the threshold Hermione risked a quick glance back. Carter had nearly caught up with them. He was only a few metres back. She could see his red furious face snarling at them, or rather Riddle as she was still invisible to his eyes. Hermione had to be quick now. She held Riddle tightly and pulled him over to the right. They reached the cover of the concrete wall that fenced the whole area of the orphanage. Carter wasn't able to see them now. Hermione scanned the street for any passersby. She was immensely relieved as she didn't see anyone in the close vicinity. Then she redoubled her hold on Riddle so that he groaned in pain but she couldn't help that now. She heard Carter's footsteps as he had nearly reached the metal gate. Hermione closed her eyes and concentrated on her destination before she span on the spot and disapparated with Riddle just a second before Carter passed the gate. He had expected to see Riddle hurrying along the street and was utterly perplexed that he could see neither hide nor hair of him.

In the meantime a few miles away Hermione and Riddle appeared in a dark alley way just a few steps away from the Leaky Cauldron. Riddle staggered and would have surely fallen if Hermione hadn't supported him.

"Nearly there, nearly there, Riddle," she whispered soothingly to him.

Then she put off her coat and flexed her right wrist so that her wand landed in her hand. She was relieved to feel the smooth surface of the wood in her hand. She waved her wand at the coat and transfigured it into a black cloak which she wrapped around Riddle. She didn't want to be questioned by the other guests in the Leaky Cauldron as to why Riddle was in such a state.

After that she supported him again and they walked over to the Leaky Cauldron and entered the bar. The bar was now rather crowded with people who were on a trip to Diagon Alley. She maneuvered Riddle over to the stairs leading to the guestrooms without rising suspicion and with some effort managed to bring him up to her room. Standing before the door and steadying Riddle she rummaged through her pockets to find her room key. After a while she produced it from one of the pockets and opened the door. As she entered her room she let out a relieved breath of air. They had made it!

She walked Riddle over to her bed where she sat him down. Then she crouched down in front of him and looked up into his face. His breathing was still laboured and Hermione wondered if he had broken some of his ribs. His face was even paler than normal and he looked down at her guardedly.

Hermione smiled at him and said kindly, "You are safe now. That's my room in the Leaky Cauldron." She gestured at their surroundings. She looked back into his eyes and then said, "You are hurt, Riddle. I need to see to your injuries. Is that okay?"
At that Riddle cringed away from her a little bit and held his right arm firmer to his body.

"I'm not going to do anything bad. I just want to heal those injuries," Hermione soothed him. "I'm quite good at that," she added with a wink.

Then she got up and walked over to her school trunk that stood in one corner of the room. She opened the lid and rummaged through her belongings. After a while she came across what she was searching for. She pulled out a wooden box which she had dubbed her 'first aid kit'. She opened the lid and sorted through her stock.

Skelegrow? Probably.

Bruise ointment? Definitely.

Disinfect? Yes.

Potion to close cuts? Obviously.

Painrelief potion? Of course.

With the bottles and pots she returned to Riddle. He was still sitting on the bed stiffly and had obviously watched her.

"Now, let me see your arm," Hermione ordered.

Riddle narrowed his eyes at her before he said tentatively, "Why are you doing this, DeCerto? Why are you helping me?"

Hermione sighed at his stubbornness. Unfortunately, she didn't even know herself why she was helping him. He was Lord Voldemort after all. But now that she had started to help him she couldn't just stop halfway through it, could she?

"Oh, come on. We don't all have some hidden agenda like you Slytherins always seem to have. You are hurt, I want to help you. Is that so hard to believe?"

Riddle continued to stare at her warily while Hermione glanced at him with her eyebrows raised. After a while Riddle ever so slowly extended his injured arm towards her. She smiled at him and said,

"Now was that so difficult?"

Riddle didn't dignify that with an answer so Hermione sat down beside him on the bed and took his arm gingerly in her hands. Then she took out her wand. She could see Riddle tense at that but he didn't jerk away his arm. Hermione took that as a good sign and muttered an incantation while she waved her wand over his arm. Instantly the part of his shirt surrounding his forearm vanished. Hermione could now see the damage of his arm. His forearm was swollen and dark bruises marred the skin. But that wasn't the worst, Hermione assumed. She probed his arm and found her assumption confirmed. Riddle moaned softly in pain as she examined his arm. She looked up at him.

"It's broken," she informed him. "I need to relocate the bones. That's going to hurt a bit."

She took her wand in her hand again and cast a Numbing charm on his arm though she knew it wouldn't help very much. Then she summoned her magic to cast the more complex spell which would relocate the bones. She remembered the last time she had used that particular spell. That had been shortly after her time travelling trip. She had had her arm broken too. Though it had been her Hermione glanced up at Riddle. "Ready?"

He nodded at her so Hermione channeled her magic through her wand and into his arm. Riddle hissed in pain as the bones in his arm arranged themselves anew. After that spell Hermione waved her wand again and conjured bandages out of thin air. With another wave of her wand the bandages wound themselves tightly around Riddle's arm.

"Okay, that's it. Now drink this," Hermione told him as she handed him a small vial.

He took it with his left hand but didn't drink it. Hermione rolled her eyes at his distrusting behaviour.

"It's Skelegrow. That will help mend the broken bone."

He glanced at her assessing and then downed the potion. Hermione sighed. He was not being an easy patient. She took the empty vial back from him and then instructed,

"Now, get your shirt off."

He raised an eyebrow at her and Hermione sighted again frustrated.

"Your back is hurt, Riddle. I need to see to that, too."

He still refused to move so Hermione told him, "Don't be silly. Nothing I haven't seen before."

She didn't quite know what she was referring to. Seeing a half naked man or the wounds on his back. Because quite honestly she really had seen both of it before.

Fortunately not always connected with one another. She thought with a smirk.

Riddle reluctantly removed his shirt. Hermione had to help him a little bit as he couldn't quite use his right hand. She noticed there was an old but huge and ugly scar on his left arm, beginning on his forearm and reaching up to his upper arm. Hermione briefly wondered where he got that but she had more pressing matters now.

She told Riddle to lie down on the bed. Riddle hesitated again but Hermione didn't take it this time and shoved him so that he was lying down on his front. As she examined his back a fury at Carter rose inside of her. The skin of Riddle's back and his sides was full of dark bruises. But that wasn't the worst. There were many deep gashes all over his back. They stood angrily out on his pale skin. Not one spot of skin was untouched. Several of the gashes were rather recent whereas others seemed to be older and were caked over with dark blood. Some of the gashes were still bleeding though, adding to the old blood that already was everywhere on his back. Hermione took her wand and removed as much of the dried blood as she could without reopening the gashes again. After that she applied several of the potions, she had prepared, to the wounds. Riddle endured the whole procedure without saying anything. He just sometimes twitched or moaned softly in pain. Hermione tried to work quickly as not to prolong his pain. After she had attended to the wounds she conjured another bandage. This one covered his back. Hermione looked at his bandaged back. She knew she would have to repeat attending to his wounds to prevent an inflammation and to ensure that they would heal properly but for now she was finished.

She stroked softly over his head as she told him, "I'm finished you can get up again."

Hermione retrieved his shirt she had discarded on the floor. She cast a quick Scorgify on it to get rid of all the blood. She turned around to Riddle and handed him the shirt. He accepted it and started to pull it on. Hermione frowned as she again noticed the bruises on his face. She sat down on the bed beside him and picked up the pot with the bruise ointment. As Riddle was finished with putting on his shirt Hermione took his chin in one of her hands and bent his face towards her. He looked at her with wide eyes. She had to smile at that. Then she took a little bit of the ointment out of the pot and applied it to the dark bruises on his face. After that she looked contently at his face as she said,

"Try to not rub it off. It needs time to take an effect." After considering him for a while longer she added, "How about I get you something to eat? You look starved."

Without waiting for a response she got up and walked over to the door. Before she left the room she turned back to him and said, "And don't go wandering off alone."

She left before he had time to retort to that. Hermione walked down to the bar of the Leaky Cauldron.

"Oh, hello," Luisa greeted her. "I haven't seen you come back. What can I do for you?"

"Could you get me a few sandwiches?" Hermione asked. "Oh, and do you have another free room? For a friend of me."

"Another room? Let's see…” Luisa studied the room reservations. "Ah, the guest in the room next to yours is leaving today. Your friend could take that one."

"Perfect," Hermione smiled at her.

"Good. And now I'll get you your sandwiches," Luisa replied happily.

After some time Hermione returned to her room with a plate of sandwiches in one hand and two bottles of butterbeer in her other. As she entered her room she saw that Riddle had fallen asleep on her bed. Hermione walked quietly over to him and put the plate and the bottles on her nightstand. She didn't want to disturb him. He had looked extremely tired and exhausted as she had left him. He surely needed some rest. She took her blanket and put it over him cautiously as not to wake him. Hermione looked down on his sleeping face.

He looks so innocent when he is asleep. Hermione shook her head. 'Voldemort' and 'innocent' were two words that should never be associated with each other.

Her gaze fell on the grey tunic from the orphanage he was still wearing. Even after her Scorgify it still looked dirty and ragged. Hermione felt sick just from looking at it. That orphanage was abhorrent. She couldn't believe that Riddle was forced to return there every summer. And Dumbledore? Did he know what was happening at the orphanage? No, that wasn't possible, Hermione thought. Though he did have a dislike for Riddle. That was apparent during Transfiguration classes. But Dumbledore would surely never go so far as to punish Riddle by sending him back to this abusive man.

You are talking about the man who sent Harry back to the Dursleys every summer! And he even liked Harry, a voice in her head threw in unwanted.

Well, there was a reason to that, Hermione answered angrily.

She left her room again and headed for Diagon Alley. She needed some time for herself now and a breath of fresh air to clear her head. She still had trouble to process what had happened today. First that air raid over London and then that disgusting orphanage. And how the hell did she end up saving Lord Voldemort? Hermione was deep in thought as she left the Leaky Cauldron and stepped out on Diagon Alley. It was rather crowded.
Well, it is nearly Christmas, isn't it?

Those people were probably doing their Christmas shopping. With a sharp stab in her stomach Hermione noticed that this was going to be the first time she would spend Christmas utterly alone. Last year hadn't been that fun either with a war raging around her and her parents dead but at least she'd had Ron and Harry. What would they say if they saw her now?

Maybe they would be disgusted by me, Hermione thought sadly.

How could she have gone and helped Riddle? Of all people? He was evil! Lord Voldemort definitely deserved to be beaten up. He actually deserved a lot worse. Why did she have to check on him in the first place? She had known that he wouldn't be injured during this air raid otherwise Voldemort wouldn't have existed in her time. So why did she have to go to the orphanage? Whatever had happened to her initial plan of not getting involved with him? That had worked really well. Since coming to Hogwarts it had gradually gotten worse. And now Tom Riddle was lying asleep in her room.

But she could never have left him behind in that sad excuse for an orphanage. Carter, he had really hurt Riddle.

So what? an angry voice in her head huffed. That man murdered your parents!

Images of her burnt home resurfaced from her memory. Images of the burnt…

Hermione sat down on a bench. She was feeling sick. Her parents hadn't been the only ones she had lost to Voldemort. So many of her friends were dead. No-one of them had deserved to die. And those who didn't die were not the same anymore. Like Mrs Weasley! Hermione remembered how she had been before the war had started. Mrs Weasley had been kindhearted, protective and always friendly. Then during the war so many members of her family had died that it had left Mrs Weasley behind as a broken and hopeless woman. An empty shell compared to her former self.

Hot tears were running down Hermione's cheeks. She wiped them away angrily.

Stop that now! she told herself. What would all those people think of Hermione now? How dare she help the enemy? Their murderer?

But Hermione had seen so much pain and sorrow. She didn't want to take any more of it. Not if it was in her power to stop it. And Riddle had been in pain. So much was clear. Maybe he didn't deserve her help but as Hermione had seen him lying there in this dirty chamber, hurt, she hadn't been able to stop herself. She had had to help him.

I can't change that now.

Hermione knew she would never be able to take him back to the orphanage. Not now that she knew how he was treated there. She somehow felt responsible for Riddle.

She sighed frustrated and got up from her bench. She didn't want to deal with her guilty conscience right now so she walked over to the small apothecary. She needed to buy more healing potions as hers were nearly used up.

Hermione left the apothecary with a few bags in her hands. She then headed back for the Leaky Cauldron. As she strolled down Diagon Alley she walked by a shop that was apparently some predecessor of Madam Malkin's. Hermione stopped to look inside the shop window. After a little bit of hesitation she entered the shop. She had decided to buy some clothes for Riddle as she really didn't want him to wear that disgusting grey shirt anymore.

So it was a while later than she had planned that Hermione arrived back at the Leaky Cauldron. She nodded towards Luisa as she passed the bar and headed for the staircase leading to her room. She entered the room without knocking. It was her room after all, she thought stubbornly. As she entered she saw Riddle was awake. He was sitting on her bed and was now eyeing her guardedly. He looked a little bit better. At least he didn't seem to be so exhausted anymore, Hermione noted contently. His face was still bruised though. It would need a few days for the bruise ointment to change that.

"Hey, Riddle," Hermione greeted him friendly.

He didn't return her greeting but continued to stare at her blankly. Hermione discarded her shopping bags on the floor, walked over to him and sat down on the bed next to him as there were no other seats in the room. Her gaze fell on the untouched sandwiches on the plate sitting on the bedside table.
Hermione was sure Riddle must be starved but he hadn't touched the food. She didn't think he did that out of politeness. No, he obviously didn't trust her. With a sigh she leaned forward and took the plate.

"You know, I didn't poison those," she said as she put down the plate with the sandwiches on the bed between them.

Hermione hadn't eaten herself since breakfast. Now it was evening already. So she took one sandwich and began to eat. Riddle still refused to eat. He was staring at her with this unnerving blank face.

He really has a difficult character, hasn't he? Hermione thought as she grabbed another of the sandwiches and held it out to him. He just looked at it with his grey eyes.

"Come on. I know you are hungry. Just take it. It's really good," Hermione gently tried to coax him into taking it.

His gaze travelled from the sandwich in Hermione's extended hand to her face and locked on her eyes. His face was still an emotionless mask but she could see the distrust in his eyes. She looked at him reassuringly.

"It's okay," she told him. Then grinning mischievously she continued. "Did you forget? I'm a Gryffindor. And unlike you Slytherins, Gryffindors don't spike food with poison. If we want to kill someone we just do it." She winked at him. "With an open and honest curse."

Hermione wasn't sure but she thought she saw the corners of his mouth curl upwards a little bit. Then he reached out and accepted the sandwich from her. She smiled at him and continued her own sandwich. They finished the meal in silence though Hermione didn't take more than her first sandwich. She decided that Riddle needed the food more than she did. As he was finished Hermione vanished the plate with a flick of her wand.

Then she said, "I nearly forgot! Here this is for you." She produced a key out of her pocket and held it out to Riddle.

He frowned at her and eyed the key with narrowed eyes. "What is that?"

Hermione had to smile. "Why, Riddle, I thought you were supposed to be so smart." She grinned and then added, "It's a key."
He glanced at her. "I can see that. Why are you giving it to me?"

"It's the key to the room next doors. You didn't expect me to let you sleep in my bed, did you?"
Hermione smiled.

Riddle seemed to be confused as his gaze darted from the key in Hermione's hand to her face and back again. Then he asked in a soft voice, "I... I'm staying here?"

Hermione raised her eyebrows. What did he think? That she would take him back to the orphanage? "Of course you are staying here. I'm not letting you return to that foul place!"

He looked at her and again had that unfathomable expression on his face. Slowly he reached for the key and Hermione gave it to him.

"Okay, now come on," Hermione said in a cheerful voice as she got up from the bed. "I'm going to show you your room."

She held a hand out for Riddle. He looked at her and Hermione could still see the distrust in his grey eyes. She sighed, leaned forward and took his arm. She could feel him tense at the contact.

"Get up," she ordered him gently. "I want you to go into your room and lie down. You really need a good night's sleep."

Hermione didn't know how long Riddle had been locked up in that room in the cellar of the orphanage but she guessed it must have been at least some days. She didn't think he would have been able to sleep at all during that time. So he needed rest now. And the wounds on his back and his arm would heal better if he wasn't totally exhausted. Surprisingly Riddle followed her orders and got up from the bed. Hermione guessed that maybe he was too tired to oppose her.

She had to support him a little bit as they were walking to the door. On the way Hermione picked up the bags from Diagon Alley she had previously discarded on the floor. Then they left her room and walked slowly over to Riddle's new room. Riddle was leaning on her. He was still not able to walk unsupported. Hermione could not believe how he was forced to return to that orphanage every break. It was awful.

As they reached the door Hermione took the key from him and unlocked the door. They entered the room. It resembled her own room. There was a bed at one side and a closet on the other. Left from the entrance door was another door leading to the bathroom. Hermione walked Riddle over to the bed. Her eyes fell on the table positioned right under the small window.

Hermione smiled as she said, "Look. You even have a chair. That's more than I can say about my room."

She sat Riddle down on the bed. He groaned softly in pain as his back was bent. Hermione put the bags she had been carrying down on the floor.

"What are those?" she heard Riddle ask.

Hermione smiled at him brightly. "Glad that you ask," she said as she produced the clothes she had bought in Diagon Alley out of one of the bags. She laid them carefully over the back of the chair. "You can wear them tomorrow."

Riddle looked puzzled at the clothes. "You bought me clothes?"

He seemed to be quite surprised. Hermione didn't know whether he was surprised that someone would buy him anything or whether he was surprised that it was her who had bought him something.

"It might surprise you, Riddle, but rags are not necessarily en vogue." Hermione grinned at him as she tugged at his grey shirt teasingly.

She then reached for the second bag. Inside were the healing potions she had bought at the apothecary. She produced a large vial containing a bluish, transparent fluid out of the bag.

"That's some Sleeping Draught," she told Riddle. "I want you to take it before you go to sleep. Your body can heal better that way. And this-' Hermione took a second, smaller vial out of the bag."-is a Painrelief Potion. You should also take it before you sleep."

She put down the vials on the bedside table and then eyed Riddle concerned. "If there's anything you should need. You know where my room is so just come over. Okay?"

He looked at her blankly and didn't reply anything so Hermione assumed it was time for her to go back to her own room. She had just turned around to walk away as she felt a hand clasping her wrist. She looked back at Riddle questioningly.

"I don't get you. We have been nothing but enemies since you came to Hogwarts. And now, you help me. Why?"

Hermione turned around again and grinned at him as she said, "Come on, we haven't been that bad, have we?"

"I put you under the Cruciatuus curse." Riddle said bluntly.

"Yeah, you did," she replied seriously before she continued. "We can discuss my motivations tomorrow. You've been through a lot. You need to rest now."

Hermione left Riddle and returned to her own room. She closed the door behind her and walked over to her trunk. She opened it and waved her wand so that the secret compartment was revealed. From there she produced the Peverell book. With the book in hand she went over to her bed and lay down propping her head up on the oversized pillow.

It was after the fifth time reading the same paragraph that she had to admit she couldn't concentrate on the book. Her thoughts were always flying back to the events of the day and to the young man in the room next doors.

For the last two years her sole purpose of living had been to defeat and eventually kill Voldemort. Every waking hour Harry, Ron and herself had worked on finally accomplishing that mission. That had been her world, to survive and to fight. During those two years one by one her friends and allies had lost their lives to that mission until only she had been left. But they had succeeded. In the end Voldemort had been beaten. Hermione had lost everything on the way but at least she had known that her friends and her family would be proud of her. After that, Fate had played her cruel game and had sent Hermione back in time. Back to face her enemy again. He was just as frightening and cruel as ever he had been. But there was more. Lord Voldemort had been this bizarre and abstract image of all that is evil and cruel in the world. He had been more of a demon than an actual human being. The Tom Riddle Hermione had come to know here in the past was still evil, still a murderer but he was not inhuman. And Hermione had no idea how to handle that new Riddle. With Voldemort it had been easy. He was the epitome of evil so Hermione had hated him. Riddle was evil too but he was also vulnerable and he was suffering. People had hurt him, people like Carter and even Dumbledore. Hermione had seen his weak side and she had decided to help him. And that decision was driving Hermione crazy now. It had obviously been the right thing to get him out of the orphanage where he had been abused. At least it would obviously have been the right thing to do if it wasn't him suffering.

Doesn't he just deserve something like this? Hermione thought hesitantly. For all the things he did?
Or would do?

The answer was, yes, he did deserve to suffer. But still she had saved him. And if she was honest she would do it again.

So, helping Riddle, Voldemort, was the right thing to do? What would her friends say to that?
Wouldn't they just call her a traitor? But her friends couldn't say anything anymore because they were dead. Voldemort had murdered them.

Hermione rubbed her forehead. She could feel an upcoming headache. This moral dilemma was awful. But her decision had been made since she had entered the orphanage today. Now he was here. And she had this misplaced feeling of responsibility towards him. It was all too grotesque. She may have a guilty conscience now but there was no turning back anymore. She had made her decision and she would carry it out. Tom Riddle would stay with her for the remainder of the Christmas break.

Hermione sighed deeply.

The next day Hermione got up rather late as she couldn't get to sleep the night before. She rummaged through her trunk and found a skirt and a blouse. After all those months in the forties she still wasn't used to the clothing. So she rather missed her favourite jeans.

At least I'm still boycotting the hairstyles of the forties, Hermione thought as she brushed her hair, making it even bushier than it already was. In the end she tamed it with a ponytail. After she had washed up she left her room and walked over to Riddle's room. She wondered how he was feeling today. Yesterday he had been in a really bad condition.

Hermione knocked at the door, then waited. As no-one answered she knocked again and cried, "Hey, Riddle! You up? Open the door!"

After a while she heard him approaching the door and open it. Hermione's gaze wandered instantly to his face. He was still rather pale and the bruises on his face looked horrible but he seemed to be more relaxed than yesterday. Hermione smiled at him.

"How do you feel today?"

He looked at her with his emotionless mask in place and said, "Better."

"Now, that's good, isn't it?" Hermione answered cheerfully. "How about breakfast? Do you want to come down with me to get something to eat?"

"Yes," Riddle replied quietly.

"Okay! Follow me then. I'll lead the way." Hermione winked at him before she headed down to the bar.

Riddle followed her and she noticed relieved that he was now able to walk unsupported, though not very fast. As they reached the first floor Hermione entered the bar and walked over to a table and sat down. Riddle sat down opposite her. His gaze was wandering around the room. Hermione noticed that he was wearing the clothes she had bought him yesterday, black pants and a dark green jumper. As she had been in the store she had been tempted to buy him a bright Gryffindor-red jumper but green obviously suited him better after all.

"Good morning, what can I bring you?" Hermione was brought out of her musings as she heard Luisa's voice.

The waitress of the Leaky Cauldron was standing at their table with her notepad in hand.

"Good morning, could you bring us some breakfast? And coffee would be good," Hermione answered.

"Of course." Luisa wrote something down on her notepad before she eyed Riddle. "You must be the friend Hermione had been talking about?" She frowned as she looked at the bruises on Riddle's face. "Whatever happened to you, deary?" Luisa asked Riddle concerned.

Hermione could see Riddle's face shutting down before he scowled at Luisa. Hermione had to stop herself from rolling her eyes. If he wasn't playing the role of the charming student, he was rather unpleasant. But again, should she really be surprised?
"Well, he wasn't willing to keep me company here so I had to persuade him somehow," Hermione told Luisa in a serious tone before a grin broke out on her face and she had to laugh.

Luisa smiled and shook her head at her. "Okay, okay. I'll just bring you your breakfast then."

As Luisa had left, Riddle stared at Hermione with his penetrating grey eyes. His face was again giving nothing away though Hermione could tell that he was contemplating something. He didn't say anything but continued to fix her with his stare. After some time Hermione had had enough so she asked irritably,

"What's wrong? What are you looking at?"

He didn't answer at first but frowned at her. Then he said slowly, "Friend?"

Hermione was confused. "What? Did you lose the ability to talk in complete sentences?"

"You told that woman I was your friend?"

Oh, so that was it? Hermione understood now. Of course, Lord Voldemort was confused by the concept of friendship again.

"Well, I had to tell her something as I was getting you a room here. What was I supposed to say? That the room was for a fellow-student-who-apparently-hates-me? I just thought that would be too long."

Riddle broke eye contact with her. "Who said that I hate you?" he asked softly.

Hermione grinned at him. "That was just a guess on my part. Though the last curse you put on me was a dead giveaway."

"If you think I hate you then why did you help me yesterday, DeCerto?" Riddle asked forcefully.

Hermione raised her eyebrows by his sudden change of demeanor. But she answered his question truthfully. "Because you needed my help, Riddle."

He looked at her again. Hermione was surprised by the whirlwind of emotions she could see in his grey eyes. He seemed to be genuinely confused. Hermione reached out for him and laid her hand on his left forearm. She could feel him tense at the contact so she smiled at him kindly.

"Don't worry about it too much. You are here now that's all that counts. And you are not returning to the orphanage."

"I can't stay," Riddle whispered. Hermione saw a look of despair on his face before he controlled that.

"Why can't you stay here?" Hermione asked him gently.

Riddle looked down at his hands as he answered softly, "I have to stay at the orphanage or he is going to expel me."

"Who? Dumbledore?" Hermione asked him gingerly.

Riddle nodded his head.

"Look, I don't know what is going on between you and Dumbledore. But I'm sure he wouldn't send you to the orphanage if he knew how you are treated there," Hermione told him suavely.
Riddle didn't comment on that but continued to stare at his hands so Hermione continued, "If it makes you feel better, I'm not telling Dumbledore that you are here. And if he ever finds out, you can blame the whole thing on me, okay?"

Riddle looked hesitantly up at her and Hermione smiled at him reassuringly. She let go of his arm as Luisa arrived with their breakfast. They ate in silence, each lost in their own thoughts.

After they had finished Hermione leaned back in her chair and eyed Riddle. His face was a few shades paler than usual and he still looked tired and somewhat ill. He would need some time until he would be his old obnoxious self again. Hermione felt the sudden urge to storm to the orphanage and curse Carter. That vile man would certainly deserve it. But being a nice witch and no Death Eater Hermione resisted that urge. She refocused her attention back to Riddle and said,

"So, what do you want to do today?"

Riddle raised one eyebrow and gazed questioningly at her.

"Well, it's the holidays so we should do something fun," Hermione elaborated.

Riddle frowned at her and asked in his smooth voice, "'Something fun'?"

Hermione had to laugh at his puzzled expression before she said, still giggling, "Well, it should be something reasonable. We can't go around tormenting people like you normally so enjoy."

Riddle scowled at her.

"Aw, come on, Riddle. You know it's true." Hermione giggled at him. Then she continued in a more conciliatory voice, "We could just walk down Diagon Alley. I think you need a few things anyway since you left everything behind at the orphanage. And I would like to go to Flourish and Geare, the bookshop. How does that sound?"

Riddle looked down at his hands as he answered, "Okay."

Hermione smiled at him kindly. She was glad he had agreed to accompany her. She wanted to cheer him up a little bit...though on second thought wanting to cheer up the Dark Lord was a rather disturbing plan.

Hermione got up and told Riddle, "Wait here. I'll be back in a moment."

She didn't wait for him to respond but walked directly to the staircase that led up to the guest rooms. She went to her room and searched for her wallet which she tucked in her pocket after she had found it along with a potion vial. Then she put on her black cloak and her scarf. It was December after all and really cold outside. After that she picked up the cloak that belonged to her school uniform. Yesterday she hadn't thought about buying Riddle a cloak. But he needed one now or he would catch a cold on top of everything. So Hermione charmed her school cloak and it became larger and would fit Riddle. She still had to buy him a real cloak though. The charms on her cloak wouldn't hold forever. She returned with the cloak lying over her arm to the bar of the Leaky Cauldron. Riddle was still sitting at the table where she had left him. As she approached the table he looked up at her, his face showing no emotion but Hermione smiled at him anyway. She was somehow getting used to his coldness. She could sometimes even see the emotions underneath his blank mask.

"Okay. Let's go," she said as she handed him the black cloak.

Riddle took the cloak and eyed it pensively for a while before he looked back at Hermione, narrowed his eyes and said slowly as if trying each word on for size,
"Thank you."

Hermione nearly had a heart attack as Lord Voldemort thanked her, a Muggleborn. But she managed to cover it up very well and just smiled at him.

"You're welcome."

Riddle stood up from the table. As he put the cloak on he felt a sharp pain coming from his back. He nearly hissed in pain but managed to suppress it. The cloak fitted him very well though and he could sense the charms DeCerto had obviously used to change it. It must have been one of her own cloaks that she had charmed so it would fit him. He was surprised that she had put so much effort in it. Another thing he had to add to the long list of things he didn't understand about her.

DeCerto was standing beside him and waited for him. As he was finished with putting on the cloak she handed him a vial.

"Here, drink this," she told him in her soft voice.

Riddle was again surprised that her order didn't aggravate him. DeCerto seemed to have the unusual gift of ordering people around without it sounding like a command.

"It's a pain relief potion," she informed him as she smiled up at him. "It should help your back. And don't worry we won't be gone for long. But I think a little exercise will help the healing process."

Riddle took the vial from her. He hesitated only for a second before downing the potion. If she had wanted to poison him she had had enough time to do so by now. After drinking the potion he could instantly feel the sharp pain in his back lessen until it was only a numb throbbing.

"Good," DeCerto smiled at him as she took the now empty vial back from him. "Now, let's go!"

Before Riddle had a chance to protest she had grabbed his arm and led him out of the Leaky Cauldron and into Diagon Alley. Riddle had tensed involuntarily as the girl touched him. She was not easy to figure out and made him slightly nervous. He really hated not to know things. DeCerto had a lot of secrets. Normally he was good at getting information out of people. But she seemed to create new secrets before he was even able to solve the old ones. As they stepped out of the Leaky Cauldron the cold December air pierced Riddle's skin. He took a deep breath of fresh air and felt slightly better.

When was the last time he had been outside? He couldn't remember. How long had he been locked up in the cellar this time?

The last few days were one big blur to him. There was only the coldness of his prison in the cellar and the unbearable hunger, thirst… and the pain. He could still hear the clicking of the lock. Each time before Carter had visited him, Riddle had heard him unlocking the metal door first. This sound had told him that there was more pain to come. He shuddered as he remembered that pain and the powerlessness. Riddle could feel a hand squeezing his arm gently. He glanced down beside him. DeCerto was looking at him with huge and worried eyes. Why was she worried?

"Are you all right?" she asked him.

Riddle just nodded as he was too perplexed to answer. Why was she even caring?

"Okay," she beamed at him again.

After that she dragged him down Diagon Alley. There were several other people walking down the alley and doing their shopping. After a while DeCerto had obviously reached her destination as she was pulling him into a shop. Inside she quickly grabbed some items which were most likely intended for him.

"You know, I don't have money," Riddle said as he saw DeCerto adding an expensive but warm looking scarf to the already huge pile of things she held in her arms.

Riddle heard her muffled voice from behind the pile of things, "Don't you worry about that."

Then she walked over to the counter to pay for the things. After a while DeCerto returned to him with a huge bag clutched in one hand with the other hand she grabbed Riddle's wrist and led him out of the shop. Riddle couldn't understand her. Why was she doing all this for him? What was she gaining by helping him? People who helped others normally wanted something in return. But what could DeCerto want from him? Usually girls were doing him favours because they fancied him, because they thought he was handsome and desirable. But DeCerto had never fancied him. At times she had even seemed to be disgusted by him. Then again a few people in Slytherin thought he was an evil bastard but they still sucked up to him because he could give them power. Though DeCerto didn't seem to be after power. She wasn't the type to do something like that. So what was it then? Why was DeCerto so nice to him?

Maybe it's Dumbledore? Riddle thought.

DeCerto was on good terms with Dumbledore. Maybe Dumbledore was using her to get Riddle to leave the orphanage. That would provide Dumbledore with an excuse to finally expel him from Hogwarts. Something Riddle knew the professor would love to do.

Riddle could feel a burning hate erupt from inside him as he thought about the transfiguration teacher. Since that incident those years back, Dumbledore had an advantage over Riddle. And he had used that advantage ever since. Dumbledore had no right to do that. He had no proof against Riddle.

That damn tosser!

But Riddle couldn't risk a direct confrontation with Dumbledore. At least not yet. He was too powerful and way too influential right now. The threat of Grindelwald was hanging over the wizarding world. Many believed that only Dumbledore was able to finally stop him. So who would oppose their saviour in favour of a poor, insignificant orphan?

So was this all an elaborate plan from Dumbledore? But the next question was, would DeCerto participate in such a manipulative scheme? Riddle glanced down at the witch. She was walking beside him still clutching his wrist absentmindedly while she goggled at the shop windows. If all this was just an act then she was a damn good actress. Riddle felt a strange stab in his stomach at the thought that she was just pretending. Suddenly there was a pull at his arm. He again looked down at DeCerto. She had stopped before a shop window and as she was still holding onto him had successfully stopped him too.

"I never knew this store," Riddle heard her softly mumble to herself. Then she turned to him and continued louder, "Let's go inside, okay?"

Riddle's gaze wandered from her enthusiastic face to the shop she was staring at. It was Anderson's Bookshop. Riddle glanced back at DeCerto. She was this delighted at the prospect to go into a bookshop? She was really an odd girl. He had expected some fancy clothes store. DeCerto was still staring at him obviously waiting for an answer. Riddle really wouldn't mind going into the bookshop. He himself rather liked to rake through old books. But he never had the money to actually buy anything so he had always preferred it to go through Hogwarts' Library.

He shrugged his shoulders and DeCerto seemed to take that as a 'yes' because she instantly entered the store. Riddle followed behind her and had barely the time to see her vanishing behind one of the huge bookshelves. He strolled at a more dignified pace through the shop. He passed a section with books about transfiguration, shuddered and went on. The next section seemed to show books about animagi. Riddle shook his head. He couldn't quite see the use in being able to transform into something like a rabbit. He passed a few other rather uninteresting sections of books until something caught his eyes. It was a shelf hidden in the back of the shop. Riddle stopped before it and read some titles.

The Dark Arts and How to Control Them

Maledictions Most Potent

Darkest of Bewitchments

He raised an eyebrow. This wasn't Knockturn Alley, was it? He reached for an old looking tome. Some of these books were really fascinating. He had never stumbled across them in Hogwarts' Library. And that was saying something. Hogwarts' Library was one of the largest in whole of Britain. Needless to say that Riddle had read almost all the books in the Restricted Section. Gullible Slughorn had always been very willing to give Riddle permission to enter the Restricted Section.

He read through the books for some time, enthralled by the knowledge they offered until he heard a chuckle behind him. He spun around and found DeCerto standing behind him. She was eyeing him smugly.

"I knew I would find you here," she said and grinned at him.

Riddle saw a huge pile of books in her hands. She obviously hadn't been idle while he had read through the books here.

"Did you find anything?" the girl asked while she eyed the book in his hand.

It was the ancient looking tome he had first looked at. That book was fascinating and full of curses even Riddle had never heard about. DeCerto took the book from his hands.

"Maledictions Most Potent?" she asked as she eyed the cover. "Is it any good?"

Riddle nodded.

"Okay." DeCerto added the book to the already large pile in her hand. Then she looked back at him. "Do you want anything else?"

Riddle raised his eyebrows at her and couldn't quite manage to ban all the incredulity from his voice as he said, "You are going to buy that for me?"

"Sure," she said casually. "Now, come on, let's go. It's getting late."

Hermione eyed Riddle. He looked rather pale again. She thought it would be best to head back to the Leaky Cauldron so he could get some rest. Fortunately she had been able to buy everything she had planned to get. This bookstore here was rather nice too. In her time period this shop didn't exist anymore. Hermione had been surprised as she had passed the shop. A new - or rather old - bookstore in Diagon Alley? She had had to go inside. It had been worth it, Hermione thought as she contently looked at the pile of books in her hand. Even if the shop seemed to be a little bit shady. The section of books about the Dark Arts she was standing in proved that. She could just hope that the book she had taken from Riddle wasn't too dark. But maybe that book could prevent him from getting bored. A bored Lord Voldemort couldn't be a good thing, she decided as she headed for the counter of the shop.

A few minutes later she stepped out on Diagon Alley again the books safely stowed away in a bag. She charmed the bag so it would be lighter before she headed down the alley in direction of the Leaky Cauldron. Riddle followed behind her. Hermione saw that he walked a lot slower than before and he winced every few steps.

His back must be hurting him again.

The effect of the painrelief potion seemed to be tailing off. Those wounds on his back were rather deep. It was bound to hurt. But Hermione couldn't give him more of the Painrelief potion as it was a strong potion. Maybe she would give him another vial in the evening. She waited for Riddle to catch up with her. As he reached her Hermione took his arm so she was able to support him a little bit. She could see Riddle raise an eyebrow as she clasped his arm but he didn't say anything.

"Back to the Leaky Cauldron, huh?" Hermione said as she beamed up at him.

They headed down the alley and then entered the Leaky Cauldron. Hermione was quite glad when they reached the bar as Riddle was again leaning on her heavily. Hermione waved at Luisa who attended to the guests sitting at the tables. Then she continued towards the staircase and they quickly reached the second floor where the guest rooms were situated.

Before Riddle could open his door Hermione told him, "I have to see to your wounds and change your bandages. Come on." She gestured for him to go into her room.

Riddle hesitated and Hermione again had to grab him by his arm and pull him into her room.

"I'm fine," Riddle said defensively.

Hermione looked at him with narrowed eyes. "Really?" she said unbelievingly. "Then why did I nearly have to carry you back here?"

Riddle just looked at her sullenly and didn't move any further into her room. Hermione sighed at his stubbornness. Then she took his hand in hers a bit gentler than before. She couldn't force him to cooperate so now she would try to coax him gently.

"I need to look after those wounds, Riddle. You don't want them to catch an inflammation, do you?" she told him softly. "It's not going to take long, okay?"

She pressed his hand reassuringly and then pulled him gently over to her bed where she sat him down. Hermione went to her trunk and retrieved the box with her healing potions. With the box in hand she sat down on the bed beside Riddle. Then she took his right arm in her hands and pulled up the sleeve of his pullover. The white bandage she had conjured up yesterday was still wrapped around his forearm. With a wave of her wand it vanished into thin air. The skin underneath was still swollen and bruised horribly. Hermione examined his arm gingerly. As far as she could tell the broken bone seemed to be mended.

"Does it still hurt?" she asked Riddle.

After a short pause he answered quietly, "Not so much."

Hermione nodded and grabbed the bruise ointment out of her potions kit. She applied a little bit of the ointment onto the bruised spots on his skin. Then she waved her wand and conjured another bandage which wrapped itself tightly around Riddle's forearm.

Hermione looked up at him and told him, "I think the bones are mended. But you should still wear the bandage for some time to support the bone."

Hermione put the pot with the bruise ointment back in the wooden box, then turned to Riddle again. "Now let me see your back."

Riddle who had examined his newly bandaged arm obeyed her only reluctantly. After he had taken off the green jumper and the black shirt underneath Hermione made him lie down on his front on the bed. The bandage on his back was still in place but Hermione could see that on a few spots blood had seeped through, turning it red. She waved her wand and the bandage vanished just like the bandage on his arm did before. His back looked still terrible. The whole area was full of green and purple bruises and the many gashes looked raw and painful. Hermione felt hot anger bubbling up inside her. She just wanted to storm into the orphanage, get Carter and hurt him just as much as he had hurt Riddle. How could a monster like him be allowed to do something like this?

Hermione grabbed her wand tightly and began to clean his wounds cautiously. After she had removed as much of the dried blood as she could without reopening the gashes she applied the healing potions on his sore back. During the whole process Riddle's body was very tense and Hermione knew that it was hurting him. But she needed to tend to his injuries. After she was finished she again conjured up a bandage and put it on his back.

"Okay, I'm finished," she told Riddle softly.

Riddle sat up on the bed and winced when his back was bend. Hermione handed him his shirt and the jumper. As he put his clothes back on Hermione told him,

"It looks better but it'll need some time to heal."

She went over to the bag full of books and rummaged through it. "How about you lie down a little bit and rest? I'll bring you something to eat later," she said as she searched through the books in the bag.

Finally Hermione found what she was searching for. She retrieved the old, leather-bound book that she had bought for Riddle. Then she handed the book to Riddle who now stood by the door.

"Here," Hermione beamed at him. "You can read a bit if you get bored but try to lie down, okay?"

As she said this Riddle's gaze wandered from the book in his hand to Hermione's face. His face was an emotionless mask again though she was sure he wanted to say something. But he didn't. He just nodded curtly and then left her room.

Hermione shook her head at his odd behaviour. Sometimes she really didn't know how to deal with him. It was difficult to always have to guess what he was thinking or feeling. That impenetrable mask he was wearing was hard to break through. Right now for example, she hadn't known whether he had tried to thank her for getting him the book or if he had wanted to kill her for meddling in his things. Why did he have to be so guarded with his emotions?

_Maybe that is a Slytherin thing_, she reasoned

But that wasn't it, was it? Hermione remembered her sixth year. That was when Harry had had those extra classes with Dumbledore. At that time Dumbledore had told him about Voldemort's past. Harry had always discussed it with Ron and her afterwards. Even as a child Voldemort seemed to have been secretive and strange. Then again, if she had grown up in that disgusting orphanage, she would have been secretive, too. It must have been doubly difficult for him in contrast to the other children. He was a wizard, so strange things were bound to happen around him and no-one, including himself, would know why.

During Hermione's childhood there had been a few strange incidents too. When she had been in primary school a few of the other kids had always teased her. One day on her way home those kids had pushed and insulted her. Hermione had felt so powerless and angry. That was when a burst of magic had left her and attacked the other children. It had made all things fly out of their satchels and fall down on them as a rain shower of books, paper and pens. The kids had been freaked out and had run home crying. Hermione had to smile at the memory. Her bursts of accidental magic had mostly been funny.

But for Riddle it must have been bad. He was an exceptional wizard, Hermione had to grudgingly admit it. So his bursts of magic must have been a lot more powerful than hers. And the forties weren't exactly famous for their acceptance of strange people who differ from the norm. So maybe that was the reason for his guarded behaviour? His upbringing must have been a difficult time for him. And then he had been offered the wonderful chance to enter a magical world just to be sorted into a house where his heritage was frowned upon. To hide his emotions must have been the only way for him to survive.

That. Or he is just a nutcase.

Hermione retrieved the Peverell book from her trunk. She planned to read a little more in it. That book could very well be the only way home she had. She sat down on her bed leaning against the wall with a pillow behind her back and then opened the book. By now she had read a few chapters in the book. But so far neither the Elder Wand nor any other Hallow had been mentioned. In the first chapters Peverell described the nature of magic, or what he conceived as the nature of magic. It was incredibly difficult to follow his train of thought. It was abstract, his ideas impressive and his knowledge of magic so deep Hermione didn't know anyone who could rival him. Even Dumbledore worked together with Flamel to understand the book so what chance did she have to understand Peverell's theories?

sat opposite of her.

"I'm glad you have a table in your room," she informed him happily. "Otherwise I would have been forced to eat on my bed and spill sauce everywhere."

"Or you could have simply conjured up a table," he suggested politely but Hermione could see a smile tugging at his lips.

"What? And miss your company?" She stared at him in mock surprise. "I don't like eating alone," she continued. "I guess I'm so being used to eat in the Great Hall with all the other students that it feels weird to eat alone."

When they were finished Hermione waved her wand and the plates vanished into thin air. Then she leaned back in her chair and scanned Riddle. Why did he have to return to the orphanage every break? She just didn't get it. It had something to do with Dumbledore of that she was sure. It was him who had confiscated Riddle's wand. And he had sent or more like forced Riddle back to the orphanage. But why did he do it?

After a while of considering him Hermione had plucked up enough courage to ask him, "Where's your wand, Riddle?"

Riddle's head shot up and he eyed her suspiciously. "What?"

"Your wand," Hermione repeated. "Where is it?"

"Why?" he asked slowly.

"You obviously don't have it with you. So where is it?"

"Why do you need to know?" he asked her with narrowed eyes.

"I don't need to know," Hermione said. "I'm just curious."

Riddle stared at her for some time. His grey eyes seemed to scrutinize her. Just as Hermione was sure he wasn't going to tell her he said in a controlled voice,

"It's at Hogwarts."

Hermione raised her eyebrows at him. Silently asking him for an explanation. He sighed softly and looked away from her before he quietly said,

"Dumbledore took it."

Now they were getting to the core of the problem, Hermione thought. "Why did he do that?"

Riddle looked back at her. His eyes were icy cold and his face a blank. He wasn't going to tell her, Hermione realized disappointed.

"I don't see that being any of your concern," Riddle said coldly.

"Okay, okay!" she said resigned. "I'm not forcing you to tell me."

She looked back into his eyes. Then she said cautiously, "But it was also him who sent you to the orphanage."

Riddle didn't say anything but continued to look at her blankly. Hermione just couldn't understand it.
Dumbledore sent one of his students back into a war zone? Unarmed? Why would he do that? Granted it was Riddle but it still was a vile thing to do. Hermione had to think back to the air raid she had witnessed. It had been so frightening even for her when she had been safe at Diagon Alley.

"It's just..." Hermione looked down at her hands. "It's dangerous... you could have died."

She looked back up at him and was surprised to notice that the coldness had left his eyes.

"Yesterday night, this air raid on London..." Hermione whispered. "I could see everything. If you had been..." She hesitated but then continued, "That's why I came to the orphanage. To check on you."

She shuddered at the thought of what might have been if she hadn't. He would still be lying in that awful chamber in the cellar. Maybe even more hurt than he already was. Hermione was staring at his right forearm. She could see a part of the white bandage which still protected his newly mended bones.

"And I'm glad I did," she whispered.

Later that day Hermione was lying on her bed with the manuscript of Peverell in her hands. The more she read in the book the more she came to realize how exceptional it really was. This text was centuries of years old and yet it was unrivaled by anything she had ever read. Hermione knew that at least some parts of the magic described in the book were dark but Peverell's theories were still amazing and incredible. They scraped at the very nature of magic, playing with it and in the end Peverell managed to create something completely new. His ways of understanding magic were unlike anything she had ever heard of. But the book was as amazing as it was complex. Peverell's theories were hard to understand. He was delving so deep into the structure of magic, Hermione had troubles following him. She needed ridiculous amounts of time to read even one page of the book. She somehow knew the book was way over her head but that was unacceptable. Not only because it wounded her pride to not be able to understand a book but she just needed to understand Peverell's inventions. She needed to know how the Elder Wand worked. Without that knowledge she would be stranded here in the wrong time forever. And that was something she just couldn't risk. Her sheer presence here could have fatal consequences. She might unknowingly change a tiny detail of the past which could develop into a dramatic alteration of the future. Hermione was not going to change the future her friends had created. They had died to ensure this future so she was, as the sole survivor, responsible to maintain that peace. As Hermione read in the book she sometimes found private notes of Peverell embedded in his theoretical explanations. It was something like a diary.

To understand the nature of Magic is my most important wish but as I have engaged myself with every aspect of Magic there is one field of knowledge that impresses me in particular. So I have taken it upon myself to study the fine art of creating magical objects. It is one of the most difficult branches of Magic and it is the most rewarding. This extraordinary art deals with the creation of things that contain and emanate Magic.

The beauty of this art is undeniable. It starts with a mundane object, which can be everything, from an old wooden bucket to a sword made of the finest iron, and changes this object into something exceptional. The objects get filled with Magic and thus become a part of the Magic itself.

I have studied every work that deals with the creation of magical objects. I have spoken to masters of this art and learned from their skill. But as I delved into this alluring art I quickly encountered its limits and its unacceptable boundaries. I was surprised and most shocked at how rudimentary this magical art truly is. For all that its worth, for all the breakthroughs that have been achieved in this branch of magic, so far it still is in its infancy and very much uncouth. But I intent to change that.

The first obstacle I stumbled upon was the gratuitous difficulty and intricacy with which the magicians confer their power into the object. This first step to create a magical object is also the most important one. The Magic, transmitted from the magician into the object, is the footing for every following manipulation of the Magic and thus the object. If the Magic is weak or impure the magical object itself will be faulty.

So I had to first improve this basic part of the creation of the magical object. Thus I invented a new spell that can easily transfer Magic into an object. Its incantation is 'Confero' and it is a truly powerful spell. It allows me to channel my Magic directly into the object and then I can anchor the transferred Magic inside of it. With this new spell I will be able to create truly amazing things.

Hermione stared at the words Ignotus Peverell had written all those centuries ago then she slowly closed the book. For today she just couldn't read anymore. Her head had started to hurt a while ago and she felt dizzy. As she checked her wristwatch she was surprised to see that she had been reading nonstop for the last five hours. No wonder she had a headache now. It was useless to try to force the knowledge in her head. So, a break was in order.

She stood up from her bed and hid the manuscript of Peverell in her trunk using the usual wards to protect the book. Then she went in the bathroom, opened the tab and splashed some water in her face. As she looked up again she saw her reflection in the mirror. Her face was pale and there were dark rings under her eyes.

You look terrible, she told her reflection.

The whole situation was putting a strain on her. She should be surprised that she hadn't broken down yet. In addition to her time travel problem there was Riddle. It was just strange. He was Lord Voldemort after all. How was she supposed to deal with him? He was evil… and yet sometimes he was not! It just didn't fit together. And she was caught in the middle of it. But now that she had made her decision, she had to go through with it. Regardless of how confusing it was, it seemed that Tom Riddle needed her, at least for now. For the time being she would just ignore how absurd that sounded. Hermione left the bathroom and retrieved her cloak from her trunk. What she needed now was a bit of fresh air.

She wrapped her black cloak tightly around her as she stepped out of the Leakey Cauldron. The sky above was grey and the December air was biting at her exposed skin. But the coldness was somehow soothing and helped clearing her thoughts. Hermione started down Diagon Alley. There were a few late shoppers on the street hurrying along the shopping mile with bags clutched in their hands. Hermione just strolled down the alley, not minding the offers in the shop windows. Her hands were buried deep in her pockets and she regretted not having brought her gloves. A small witch with red hair walked past her. She was wearing a ridiculous long, knitted green and yellow scarf and was laden with shopping bags. Hermione tried to ignore the familiar jab in her stomach as she was reminded of Molly Weasely. She quickened her step and resisted the urge to look back at the red-haired woman. It seemed the ghosts of her past weren't going to ever let her go.

Hermione rounded the next corner. She now had nearly reached the bookshop she had visited with Riddle earlier that day. She continued to walk down the lane as her eyes darted to a person sitting on one of the benches. It was odd as the weather was actually too cold to be sitting around outdoors. As Hermione neared the person she was surprised to see that it was Riddle sitting on the bench. Why was he here? She had thought he was in his room at the Leakey Cauldron, sleeping. He was hurt and certainly wasn't supposed to be walking around alone. But here he was, sitting on the bench with a vacant look on his face.
Hermione walked over to him and sat down beside him. She saw Riddle tense as he noticed someone sitting beside him. He turned his head and for a moment she thought she could see a small smile on his face as he recognized her. But then his face transformed into the familiar blank mask and Hermione was sure she had imagined things.

"What are you doing here?" she asked him gently.

He considered her for a while with his unfathomable grey eyes then he said in his smooth voice, "I needed a breath of fresh air."

"Hmmm…" Hermione leaned back on the backrest of the bench. "Me too. It helps clearing the thoughts."

Riddle didn't reply so she glanced at him. He was again staring blankly at the street in front of him. Hermione noticed that his face was again very pale. He really shouldn't be sitting out here in the cold.

"You never really answered my question," Riddle abruptly said.

Hermione raised her eyebrows. "What question?"

"Why you helped me."

Riddle turned towards her and scanned her with his grey eyes. They were still as impenetrable as always but as he stared at her Hermione could, for a second, see a glimpse of the emotions underneath. She was surprised to see mistrust in his eyes. Riddle was guarded around her and he clearly didn't trust her. Hermione felt strangely sad at that.

"At Hogwarts we were enemies. I don't see what you could gain by helping me. Yet you did help me. Why?" Riddle asked quietly.

Hermione moved closer to him on the bench and smiled up at him as she said, "I really don't know myself." She shrugged her shoulders. "I just did. And I'm not regretting it."

She was surprised to realize that it was true. She did not regret having gone to his orphanage to check on him. And she didn't regret having rescued him from that disgusting chamber in the cellar. She was actually glad she did do those things.

Hermione looked at him. His gaze had softened a bit but there was still distrust in it, so Hermione told him, "I wanted to help you, so you don't owe me anything. Okay?"

Riddle continued to look at her, seemingly gauging whether she was telling the truth or not, and after a while he nodded curtly. Hermione was glad that he slowly started to believe her. Then a cold breeze hit her and she was freezing again. She looked at Riddle and noticed that he was shivering slightly. Hermione reached out and took his hand into hers, it was icy cold. Riddle had tensed at the contact and now looked at her.

"It's freezing cold," Hermione said softly. "For how long have you been sitting here?"

Riddle didn't answer but continued to look at her somewhat surprised.

"We should go back to the Leakey Cauldron," Hermione said now more firmly. "If you want to sit around and brood, you can do that just as fine inside where it's warm."

She got up from the bench without waiting for a reply and tried to pull him up. Surprisingly enough, he complied.

Riddle walked over to the small window. From here he could look down on Diagon Alley. He could see people hurrying along the street, their cloaks wrapped around them tightly.

Riddle still felt sick and his back was hurting fiercely. He hated it to be in such a weak state. He wasn't even able to use his magic as his wand was in Hogwarts, stowed away inside Dumbledore's office. A barely controllable rage was burning up in him as he thought of Dumbledore. Riddle's hands were clutching the window sill so tightly his knuckles were turning white. Why did Dumbledore have to send him back this break? Normally it was only the summer break Riddle had to worry about. He remembered how shocked he had been as Dumbledore had sent for him back at Hogwarts. Dumbledore never wanted to see him, which was just fine by Riddle. And he normally only sent for Riddle shortly before the summer break to take Riddle's wand. So it had been an unpleasant surprise for Riddle as Dumbledore had taken his wand and had forced him to return to the orphanage this Christmas.

How he hated that place! Every time he had to return there it was like being pulled back into the time before he knew about magic, before he knew that he was not an abomination. Back then he had always lived with the fear of being dumped into an asylum. Mrs Cole had been suspicious of him and had threatened him with the asylum on more than one occasion. But even back then Riddle had somehow known that he was not insane, that he just had a talent the others couldn't understand. He had hated them for not understanding, for shunning him. It had been his last resort, the hate. What else did he have?

Then one day as Riddle had returned from Hogwarts Mrs Cole was gone and was replaced by that man. It was always a horrible experience having to return every summer to that depressing place but Carter had made it even worse. Mrs Cole had never liked Riddle but at least she had never tried to change him either, maybe out of fear or laziness. But Carter was different…

Riddle closed his eyes as he remembered the helplessness. There was no way to stop Carter. If Riddle did, he would risk expulsion from Hogwarts which meant he would have to abandon his wand. To him that would be a worse fate than death. So he had to endure the pain each time he had to return to the orphanage. He was reminded of that pain by his achingly throbbing back.

Riddle breathed in deeply, but it didn't calm him. On the contrary he felt like suffocating. He opened his eyes and turned from the window. The room seemed suddenly so small… like that chamber…

Riddle felt sick again. He couldn't stand it anymore to be inside, he felt locked up. He nearly ran from the room, grabbing only his cloak on the way out. He didn't stop until he stood outside on Diagon Alley. It was cold and the wind was blowing icily but the wide sky above was somehow reassuring. Riddle took a few deep breaths of air. The feeling of having to suffocate was slowly leaving him again. He took off down Diagon Alley. He needed to walk a bit.

He had walked some distance down the alley as his back was beginning to hurt quite badly again. It hadn't exactly helped the matter that he had nearly run out of the Leaky Cauldron. A few steps away Riddle saw a bench. Maybe a short break and then he would walk back to the Cauldron. So he sat down on the bench, carefully avoiding to lean with his back on the backrest.

As he sat there in the middle of Diagon Alley, he was feeling very frustrated. The whole situation was just intolerable. It was ridiculous that he could be forced to return to the orphanage every year. He didn't want to bear that any longer. But it wasn't in his power to change that. That was the core of all his problems. He wasn't yet powerful enough.
But maybe he didn't have to worry about that any longer. DeCerto had told him that she wouldn't allow him to return to the orphanage. Riddle furrowed his brow at that thought. Where did that come from? Since when did he rely on others? Since when did he need the help of others? He couldn't even trust DeCerto. Honestly, he didn't know anything about her. He was annoyed by the hope he felt as he thought about her.

Suddenly he felt someone sitting down beside him on the bench. Riddle turned his head and was surprised to see DeCerto sitting beside him and staring at him concerned. Somehow Riddle felt relieved to see her.

"What are you doing here?" she asked him in her soft voice.

Riddle looked at her for a while deciding if he should answer. But her question hadn't sounded demanding, just concerned. So he answered,

"I needed a breath of fresh air."

"Hmmm…" The witch smiled absentmindedly as she sat back on the bench. "Me too. It helps clearing the thoughts."

Riddle was again wondering why the hell she had helped him in the first place. He wouldn't be able to stand it if this really was all an elaborate scheme of Dumbledore to finally get rid of him and throw him out of Hogwarts and out of the wizarding world.

"You never really answered my question," Riddle said quietly.

"What question?" DeCerto asked, seemingly confused.

"Why you helped me."

He looked at her, searching her features. If she was going to lie to him he needed to notice.

"At Hogwarts we were enemies. I don't see what you could gain by helping me. And yet you did help me. Why?" Riddle needed to know.

DeCerto suddenly slid closer to him on the bench and then she smiled one of her sincere smiles. "I really don't know myself," she said, confusing him even more. "I just did. And I'm not regretting it."

But how could he believe her? How could he be sure that she wasn't planning something?

"I wanted to help you, so you don't owe me anything. Okay?" DeCerto said suddenly while she looked at him seriously.

If she was really working with Dumbledore then there would be no need any more to maintain this charade. He had left the orphanage thus giving Dumbledore a chance to throw him out of school. But so far nothing had happened. Maybe DeCerto was saying the truth?

He was brought out of his musing as he felt a warm hand clutching his own. Riddle looked at the girl again.

"It's freezing cold," she said, a frown appearing between her brows. "For how long have you been sitting here?"

Why did she care?

"We should go back to the Leakey Cauldron," DeCerto ordered now. "If you want to sit around and brood, you can do that just as fine inside where it's warm."

Somehow Riddle didn't mind to be ordered around on this occasion so he allowed her to pull him with her, back to the Leakey Cauldron.
A Lonely Christmas

The next day Hermione woke to an annoying sound coming from her window. She turned around in her bed to try to catch some more sleep but the scraping sound didn't stop. In the end she grudgingly got up from her bed and went over to the window and pulled the curtains. On the window sill lay at least two inches of snow and fat fluffy snowflakes were falling down on Diagon Alley. Three owls sat on the window sill pecking with their beaks onto the glass, demanding to be let in.

Hermione frowned at the three owls. Who would send her something? She really didn't know that many people here in the forties. She opened the window to permit the birds in. The owls flew gracefully into the room and settled down on the bed. Hermione saw that each of the owls was carrying a parcel. It was then that it hit her. Today was Christmas.

How could I have forgotten?

As soon as the owls had dumped their parcels on the bed they took off again, hooted friendly as they passed her and flew out of the window. Hermione eyed the three parcels on the bed as she absentmindedly closed the window again. She sat down on the bed and took one of the parcels in her hand. There was a card attached to the parcel.

Dear Hermione,

I wish you a very merry Christmas. I hope you are enjoying the holidays. Today my whole family is here to visit us. It's going to be really straining, let me tell you that, as I have a huge family.

So, wherever you are (why didn't you tell us?) I hope you have a nice time,

Bye bye, Richard

Hermione smiled down at the card Richard Weasley had sent her. Then she opened the parcel. Out fell a huge package of chocolate frogs. Hermione hadn't known that they were on sale as early as the forties. They were wrapped a little differently though. Aside from the chocolate Wealsey had given her a huge, warm looking, bright red scarf. It was perfect. She grabbed another parcel. This was from Lupin Hermione noticed as she read his Christmas greetings. Lupin had, of course, sent her a book.

Common Mistakes of Potion Brewing and How to Avoid Them

The last parcel was from Longbottom. It was the smallest of the three and as Hermione opened it out fell a silver necklace. She took it in her hand and admired its beauty. There were tiny blue stones wrought into the silver. She loved it. Hermione put her presents on her bedside table and eyed them pensively. How nice it was of the three boys to send her something. They had only known her for a few months and considered her a friend already. To her surprise Hermione felt tears running down her cheeks. She brought her hand up to her face and then looked bewildered at the tears that now hung to her fingers.

Why did she cry? Wasn't it nice of them to give her something for Christmas? They were her friends, weren't they?

Yes, they are, Hermione thought. But...

They were friends but they knew so little of her. They didn't know the true Hermione. She had told them naught but lies. They were nice people and they were nothing like her. They hadn't had to live through what she had. She had seen so many things. Awful things. Those things had changed her.
She liked Longbottom, Weasley and Lupin but at the same time she knew she could never reach them. Not anymore. It was like they lived in a totally different world. They lived happily with their families. Their only problems were the upcoming NEWTs next year or maybe that their crush didn't notice them.

She on the other hand, she had fought in a war. She had seen people die. People she loved. They had been ripped from her in the cruelest of ways. And she had killed in return. It didn't matter that she had done it to save her friends and herself. She had taken life. Had looked them in the eyes as it had seeped out of them. She had used curses that never should be used. Sometimes it felt like she had sold her soul. What had Dumbledore called it? For the Greater Good? Yes, that was what she had done. She had fought fire with fire. And in the end her side had won but she had lost everything.

The worst thing was that as time had passed she had gotten used to the way of war and had become callous. Even today she didn't regret having killed those people. Of course she felt bad because of it and she knew it was a despicable thing to take life but she would do it again if it could save her friends. What frightened her most was that she knew she could.

But her friends were dead! All of them! There was no-one left. Only her. Hermione closed her eyes, desperately trying to not think about them. But she couldn't stop the pictures showing up in her head.

Luna was dying in Hermione's arms. She was screaming in pain as blood ran from her eyes, ears and her mouth.

Neville fought for his life. The curse that had hit him had destroyed his chest leaving behind a horrible and fatal wound.

Ginny had been hit by a devious curse during a fight. They had been able to apparate her away to safety. But the curse was unstoppable. Ginny died after two weeks of terrible pain. It broke Harry.

Hermione's parents had been burnt to death trapped in their own house.

So many… so many of her friends had died. There surely was no way back for her to normal life? She somehow knew she would never recover from what had happened to her. Hermione pulled her knees up and wrapped her arms around. There was no way for her to stop the images that run through her head. And she knew where it would end.

Ron was hit by Bellatrix' curse. Hermione saw it in slow motion, like through a blurry veil as the green curse hit her boyfriend in the chest.

And Harry…

Her last friend. There had been no-one else left. He was so strong and brave. He had managed it in the end and had stopped the evil. But cruel Fate played her dirty game again. She forced Hermione to kill the last of her friends herself.

There was an abrupt knock on the door of her room. Hermione's head jerked up. She had been so lost in her memories she had totally forgotten where she was. There was another knock.

Hermione stretched her legs so that she sat normally on her bed and then said, "Come in."

Riddle opened the door and stepped into her room. Hermione raised her eyebrows. He had never before come to her room without her having to drag him in. But now he stood there, handsome as ever, his grey eyes scrutinizing her. He was seemingly at ease.

Hermione looked at him and asked, "Is something wrong?"
"No." Riddle eyed her with his unfathomable gaze. Then he added, "You are late."

Hermione checked her watch. He was right. It was after ten already. She had planned to get up at nine. She had told him yesterday that she would get him at around half past nine and then they would go down for breakfast. Hermione looked back up at him.

"Yes, I'm sorry." She tried to smile but couldn't manage it. "I got presents," she informed him unnecessarily.

Riddle's gaze wandered from her face to the small pile of presents on her bedside table. He walked over to the pile and eyed it as he said quietly,

"And that is causing you to look so down?"

He turned around and looked at her sitting on the bed. He was standing just a few steps away from her and his grey eyes were boring into her brown ones. Hermione had to look away from him. She could feel fresh tears burning in her eyes. After a while he sat down on the bed beside her. But she was still not looking at him, instead she was staring down at her hands in her lap and tried to suppress the tears she felt building up inside her.

"What is wrong, DeCerto?" Riddle asked her in his smooth voice.

"Nothing," Hermione whispered and her voice shook slightly.

She closed her eyes to try to regain her composure. But everything she could see were her dead friends lying before her.

"There is something wrong," Riddle said gently. "What happened?"

Hermione saw Ron lying before her, his face looking like he was asleep. But she knew he was dead. Then she saw Harry's face. His skin grey and his eyes now empty and lifeless.

Hermione couldn't help it anymore. She felt hot tears running down her cheeks. Then she whispered in a barely audible voice,

"I miss them."

There was a pause in which Hermione tried to wipe away the tears. But it was no use as they were replaced by new ones.

"Longbottom?" Riddle asked in a somewhat cold tone.

Hermione looked up at him and frowned in confusion. He looked at her with his blank face. Then Hermione could see his gaze darting to the pile of presents on the table and she understood.

"No, not them," she whispered.

How nice… how nice it would be to miss friends she could actually see again. No, she would never see her friends again. They were dead. More tears were running down her cheeks. Hermione still looked at Riddle. He would see her tears but she didn't care anymore. Riddle stared at her. His face was still covered by the emotionless mask he always seemed to carry.

"Your friends from before you came to Hogwarts?" he asked slowly. "From France?"

… from the future.
"Yes," Hermione said softly. "I miss them. I miss them so much."

She raised her hands to her face and tried to wipe away the tears that were now falling rapidly down on her pants. Then she felt a warm hand touching her shoulder gently.

"Maybe you will see them again," she heard Riddle say.

Hermione sobbed. She would never see her friends again. Even if she somehow managed to get back in the right time period no-one was waiting there for her. She was alone. She turned towards Riddle who still clutched her shoulder. Hermione could see him looking down at her. Was there concern in his eyes?

"After the war is over you could return to France," Riddle suggested softly.

Hermione sobbed again and then, without thinking, without considering how odd it was, she wrapped her arms around Riddle and pressed her face into his chest. She couldn't stop to cry as she clung to him.

"They are dead," she managed to say between her sobs. "They are all dead."

Hermione cried and cried as she clung desperately to Riddle. She needed to hold someone. She couldn't bear it to be so alone anymore.

Then she could feel his arms embracing her. Hermione sobbed even harder as she felt his arms reassuringly around her. She couldn't hold it back anymore. All the sorrow and pain that had built up inside of her was flowing out of her. All the while Riddle was holding her.

Riddle woke up and yawned tiredly as he reached for his watch he had dumped on the bedside table yesterday. Past nine already. He rolled over in the bed and sat up. He sat there for some time trying to finally wake up. He was really no morning person.

After he was as awake as he would get he stood up and crept to the bathroom dumping his shirt on the floor on the way. It was a bliss not having to share his room, he thought as he stepped into the bathroom. No annoying room mates who would enrage him with their stupidity. It was really awful having to share his dormitory in Hogwarts with those stuck-up idiots. But next year that would stop anyway, he thought as an arrogant smirk formed on his face. Dippet would surely make him Headboy. Who else was there to be worth considering? Then Riddle would move into the Heads quarters and have a room for himself.

He really hated it not having things of his own. As far as he could think back he had never owned anything. In the orphanage everything had been 'community property.' The toys, the books, everything had belonged to all the orphans. Mrs Cole had always tried to make them see the good in sharing things and wanted them to be grateful for the little they got. Because all had been donations from some rich wanker or other who would get a warm feeling from donating a few pounds to the poor orphans.

Riddle hated to share things. He really couldn't understand why he should feel grateful for being so damn poor that he couldn't even afford a book of his own. The only things he had really owned back then were the things he had stolen from the other orphans. Until Dumbledore took them from him of course.

His old hate for the transfiguration teacher rose up in him again. He had forced Riddle back then to return all the things to their former owners. He even had had to apologize for stealing them. Well, Dumbledore had seemed to hate him from the start. A mutual feeling. Then Riddle had left the filthy orphanage for Hogwarts. Only to be stuck into a dormitory full of rich, spoiled brats who had everything they could ever wish for. And he was stranded with his second hand books and the hand-me-down robes.

Riddle left the bathroom again and got dressed. He looked in the mirror and stared at the clothes DeCerto had gotten him. No-one before had ever bought him anything. Of course some of the Slytherins had given him some presents but only because they wanted something from him. But DeCerto, it seemed, didn't expect anything from him. She had bought the things for him and hadn't asked for anything in return. She had even bought him a book just because he had liked it. It was strange and new for him. He had never had someone buying things for him just because he liked them.

Riddle walked over to the bedside table and retrieved his watch. He raised his eyebrows as he saw that it was after ten o'clock already. He hadn't realized how long he had needed to get ready. His back was hurting and he couldn't move normally that was why he needed more time than normal. Riddle wondered where DeCerto was. She should have had fetched him by now. She had told him yesterday that she would get him at half past nine. Maybe she had overslept? As Riddle was hungry by now he decided to go down alone and have some breakfast. So he stepped out of his room, locked the door and took off down the corridor to the stairs. As he was halfway down the corridor he hesitated and looked back.

It was really weird that DeCerto was this late. Maybe there was something wrong? He sighed and turned around. As he was walking back he wondered why he was even caring. But somehow it seemed that he did. As he stood before the door to her room he took a deep breath and then knocked.

"Come in," he could hear DeCerto say.

Riddle opened the door and stepped into DeCerto's room. He saw that she was sitting on her bed and he nearly fell over as he saw what she was wearing. Those were surely the shortest pants he had ever seen a woman wear. They not even covered half her thigh. The shirt she was wearing was hardly any better. Was she sleeping in those things? He had never seen any woman wearing something as tight and short. Even for a nightgown it was short. And he had seen a few women in their nightgowns.

Why had she answered the door when she was wearing something like this? He narrowed his eyes at the thought that someone else could have seen her in those clothes. He didn't like that idea.

"Is something wrong?" DeCerto asked him, abruptly bringing him out of his musings.

"No," Riddle answered. "You are late."

She checked her watch and seemed to be surprised that it was this late already. So she had overslept, Riddle thought. But as DeCerto was looking back up at him he realized something was off. Her eyes were puffy and red. She seemed to have been crying.

Who made her cry? Riddle thought angrily. Then he was surprised that he was angry at all.

"Yes, I'm sorry," DeCerto said in a flat voice. Somehow her normal cheeriness was missing. "I got presents," she continued but without any enthusiasm in her voice.

Riddle looked at the pile of parcels on her bedside table. Ah, yes, he had totally forgotten. Today was Christmas, wasn't it? He walked over to the table and looked at the presents. There was a book and some chocolate but what caught his gaze was the silver necklace that lay on velvet in a box.

Who had sent her jewelry? A man?

He scanned the card that was still applied to the box. Longbottom… of course, he thought furiously.

That prat was always all over DeCerto. They even went together to the Slug Club. They weren't a couple, were they? Riddle balled his hands into fists. Then he remembered how DeCerto seemed to have been crying.

"And that is causing you to look so down?" he asked, trying to make his voice sound indifferent.

He faced the girl again and looked at her. He searched her features and then looked into her eyes. He wasn't going to tolerate it if she flirted with Longbottom, of all people. DeCerto looked away from him. What was wrong with her? Normally she never backed out from a staring match between the two of them. It seemed she wasn't going to answer his question so he walked over to the bed and sat down beside her. But she was still ignoring him.

"What is wrong?" Riddle asked her.

"Nothing," DeCerto answered softly.

Did she expect him to just buy that?

"There is something wrong." Riddle tried to sound understanding. "What happened?"

Riddle could see tears starting to run down her cheeks. He felt a stab in his stomach as he saw her cry.

Then she said in a soft voice so that he nearly couldn't understand her, "I miss them."

So that was it, wasn't it? Riddle felt anger building up in him. She was missing her stupid little boyfriend? He never thought DeCerto would be so shallow.

"Longbottom?" he asked.

At his question DeCerto looked up at him. Riddle could see confusion in her eyes. What was she confused about? Longbottom had sent her his Christmas present - Riddle looked at the lousy necklace on the table - and now she missed him so much she was crying.

"No, not them," she whispered.

"Not them?" Riddle was confused. She wasn't crying because of Longbottom? She had been surprised as he had mentioned the name. She hadn't even been thinking about that tosser. Somehow Riddle felt immensely relieved by that.

But then why was she crying? He looked at her. She was staring at him and tears were streaming down her cheeks. What had made her so sad. Who did she miss? It couldn't be someone from Hogwarts he reasoned. Those three Gryffindor idiots were her only friends there but she apparently didn't miss them. So who else could it be?

"Your friends from before you came to Hogwarts?" he asked slowly. "From France?"

"Yes," DeCerto said with a shaky voice. "I miss them. I miss them so much."

More tears were running down her cheeks and she tried to wipe them away. She seemed to be so hopeless. He had never seen DeCerto like this. He had seen her cry before. But this was different. She radiated so much despair and sorrow and the burning glint in her eyes that characterized her was totally missing. Riddle couldn't stand seeing her like this. He raised a hand and put it on her shoulder hesitantly. He wasn't good at comforting people.

"Maybe you can see them again," he tried to cheer her up.

But that made everything even worse as DeCerto started to sob now. She then looked at him. Riddle could see the desperation and sorrow in her eyes. There was nothing left of her cheerful self.

"After the war is over you could return to France," Riddle told her, not really meaning what he said. He somehow didn't want her to return to France. He wouldn't allow her to leave.

DeCerto started to sob again. Then suddenly she threw herself at him and wrapped her arms around him. Riddle tensed as she clung to him. She pressed her face into his chest and cried. He didn't know what to do. He had never expected DeCerto, of all people, to hug him.

But then she whispered in a muffled and teary voice, "They are dead. They are all dead."

Riddle was shocked by this. He had known that she had had to flee France because of the war there. But he hadn't known that the war had been so dangerously near to DeCerto that her friends had died in it. He didn't want to think that it could have been her who had died.

He put his arms around her and pulled her closer to him. No-one, aside from himself perhaps, was allowed to hurt her. The girl clung to him and he could feel her trembling as she continued to cry into his chest.

Hermione couldn't stop to cry as she clung to Riddle. All the memories, her awful memories she had so worked to repress, were flooding her mind. During the war she had seen so many horrible things. Things no-one should ever have to witness. She had lived through them but she had never had the time to deal with those memories. She had always been fighting. There never had been the time to stop and deal with all the sorrow and pain she had had to endure. So instead of coping with those things she had suppressed them, deep down in her mind where she hoped she would never find them again. But now they broke free of their hiding-place and invaded her thoughts once again. It felt like she would never be able to stop those tears running from her eyes. There had happened so many atrocities even if she would cry a lifetime it wouldn't be enough. Hermione clutched the fabric of Riddle's jumper tighter in her hands and she buried her face in his chest. She felt so lost and alone. It didn't matter whose arms it were that were wrapped around her as long as someone held her and drove away the painful loneliness.

Hermione didn't know how long she cried into Riddle's chest but eventually the stream of tears lessened and then her sobs died completely down. She felt better now. Her memories were still there and they would never leave her ever again but for now they appeared a little bit more bearable and less painful. She let go of Riddle and slid a bit away from him on the bed. Then she looked up at him. His grey eyes were watching her intensely. When Hermione had before been unsure, there now was definitely concern in his eyes. It wasn't reflected on his face but she could see it radiating from his eyes. She had never seen that expression on him. It seemed to enhance his already handsome features even more. Hermione knew that she shouldn't have cried in front of him. He was Lord Voldemort. Wasn't he the source of her problems? But it didn't feel wrong to her. It had even felt good. She had liked it how he had held her. She had needed it. Hermione wiped the remaining tears from her face.

"I'm sorry," she whispered, her voice was rough from all the crying. "I shouldn't have dumped all my problems on you."
"It's okay," Riddle said in a soft tone, his eyes never leaving her.

"It is just… today is Christmas and I was never alone on Christmas," Hermione said softly.

"I am here," Riddle said quietly.

Hermione smiled at him. "Yes, you are here."

Then she leaned forward and hugged him while she whispered in his ear, "Thank you."

DeCerto let go of Riddle but the strangely electrifying feeling her touch had evoked on his skin was lingering. Riddle was almost annoyed that she could evoke such a reaction in him but at the same time he liked it as this strange feeling wasn't necessarily a bad feeling. He watched as DeCerto wiped the tears off her face. She seemed to still be a bit shaky but it didn't look like she would start to cry again. Riddle wondered what had happened to her. It had sounded almost like everyone she knew was dead. How did that happen? Sure Grindelwald was active in France but not to this extent, it was not yet an open war. So, it wasn't very likely that everyone DeCerto had known had been killed unless she and her friends had been dangerously close to or involved in the fighting. Riddle was sure that there was more to it than DeCerto was telling. Something was amiss.

He had never seen DeCerto like this before. She had broken down completely. Though Riddle would never admit it in front of her he knew she was a strong person. So whatever had happened to her it must have been severe and it had hurt her incredibly.

Riddle saw DeCerto slipping a hand under her pillow and producing her wand and her wand holster from underneath it. He raised his eyebrows surprised. He didn't know that many people who slept with their wand under their pillow… It was actually just him. DeCerto was rather paranoid, wasn't she? Or, Riddle thought angrily, someone or something had forced her to act so defensively. He watched as she expertly donned the holster to her right forearm and then stowed her wand safely away in it. Then she turned to him again.

"It's gotten rather late," she said in her pleasant voice. "Give me ten minutes and then I'll come down to the bar."

Riddle nodded and got up from her bed. As he left the room he threw a last glance at her. And although her eyes were still puffy and red and her face was rather pale she somehow looked nice. Riddle had never before noticed how pretty she was. Though that impression might be caused by the forbidden short clothes she was wearing right now, he reasoned.

Hermione sat on the bed and watched the door through which Riddle had just left the room. What had come over her? She had hugged him. Really hugged him. On her own volition. Granted, she had been in a rather hysterical mood but he was still Voldemort. She should be grateful that he hadn't attacked her on the spot. But the really crazy thing was that he had seemed to be genuinely concerned about her. Hermione knew how good an actor Riddle was. But he wasn't that good. So, since when did Lord Voldemort care about other people?

Hermione shook her head in frustration. This Tom Riddle wasn't at all like the Lord Voldemort from her time. There sure had been many occasions where Riddle had acted like his future counterpart, when he had tortured her with the Cruciatas Curse for example, but there was so much more to Riddle. More emotion, more compassion, more… humaneness.

Hermione found that rather disturbing. She was used to hating him but right now she had even enjoyed how he had held her. It had been nice and comfortable. What was wrong with her? First she went and saved him and then she liked hugging him? Hermione sighed deeply and then got up from the bed. She couldn't sit here forever debating whether her sanity had finally left her or not. So she strolled over to the bathroom and washed up quickly. Then she rummaged through her trunk to find some clothes. Oh, how I miss wearing pants! Hermione thought as she pulled a dark blue skirt out of the trunk.

True to her word, she walked ten minutes later into the bar of the Leaky Cauldron her eyes scanning the room for Riddle. She found him sitting at one of the tables with a cup of coffee in front of him. Hermione walked over to him. Riddle looked up at her as he heard her approaching. His gaze was as hard and impenetrable as ever but she couldn't help but notice that there was a certain softness creeping into his gaze as his eyes fell on her.

"Feeling better?" Riddle asked in his smooth voice as Hermione sat down.

Hermione glanced at him and then said in a small voice, "Yes."

"So, what do you want to do today?" Riddle asked innocently as he looked at her with his grey eyes.

Hermione raised her eyebrows questioningly at him.

"Well, it's Christmas, so we should do something fun," Riddle said as a smirk appeared on his face.

A small smile tucked at Hermione's mouth as she remembered those words. She had used them the day before to cheer Riddle up. Was he trying to cheer her up now? Hermione would never have thought that Tom Riddle would do something like that. But here he was, sitting opposite her and smirking at her while he really tried to be nice to her. And there was still this unexpected concern shining in his eyes.

"Let's go someplace outside Diagon Alley," Hermione said in a soft voice. "I've seen enough of Diagon Alley but I haven't of London."

That was actually only partly true, Hermione thought. Because she knew London quite well, the future London that is. The London of the forties she really hadn't seen much so far.

"You are lucky then," Riddle said as the smirk on his face widened. "Because I know my way around London."

And so it came that Hermione Granger got a tour around London from none other than Tom Riddle. The city was vastly different from the London in her time. Of course the war had left its ugly traces on the city, but there were other things too. Beautiful places Hermione had never known existed. London from the future was a huge and fast city. Here in the past though everything seemed slower and not so hurried, the traffic on the streets, the people walking on the sidewalks.

Riddle really was very familiar with London. He knew were they had the best view on the famous sites of London but he also knew the hidden beauties of the city like the nice little park they used to take a break and sat on one of the benches. It was amazing that Riddle never lost his way as they strolled through that disorienting maze of back alleys. Hermione had never expected it but she had to admit that the day really was quite fun.

Currently they were sitting in a small café with view on the Thames. Hermione had decided that they should take a break. Riddle was still hurt and she didn't want him to overexert himself. She nursed a cup of hot chocolate as she watched the boats chugging down the Thames. It was so…

peaceful?

Hermione couldn't remember the last time she had felt this safe and at ease. The last two years of her life had been a constant battle. She had always been fighting her enemies and if she hadn't been fighting, she had been on the alert, expecting the next attack or trained her fighting skills. She had witnessed so many horrible things, so much misery, that she would have felt guilty by feeling anything but cold determination. There never had been a time where she could have relaxed or forgotten about the war raging around her. Harry, Ron and herself had always been fighting while following hints to the next Horcrux. They had been prepared for battle at all times. Since the last two years Hermione had never let her guard down. That would have been too dangerous. But sitting here in this cozy little café and drinking a cup of hot chocolate, Hermione couldn't help but feel relaxed and safe even. She didn't have to expect any attacks, anyone trying to curse her and hurt her. She breathed in and leaned comfortably back in her chair. The strangest part of this situation was that she was feeling this content while in the presence of Tom Riddle.

Hermione cast a glance at Riddle. He was sitting opposite her, staring pensively at the river flowing slowly by. She wondered what he was thinking about. As she scanned him she noted satisfied that the bruises on his face had faded a great deal since she had found him in the orphanage. Hermione shuddered as she remembered how she had found him and how hurt he had been. But soon, his wounds would be healed and nothing would stay behind from those injuries – at least nothing visible. Hermione dreaded to know how long it had been going on like this. The first time she had met Carter she had coaxed some information out of him. He had told her that he had been the patron of the orphanage for four years already. Hermione hoped that Riddle didn't have to endure this abuse since the last four years. Four years ago he still had been a child. And no child should have to go through something like this. Hermione wanted to know why he had to return to the orphanage. Why had Dumbledore taken his wand and why had he forced Riddle to return to that sad excuse of an orphanage? Did Dumbledore know about what he was condemning Riddle to? But Hermione wasn't going to ask Riddle again. He obviously didn't want to talk about it. So, she would wait until he felt like talking.

As she was looking at him, buried in thoughts, suddenly grey eyes flashed at her and blinked. Once again Hermione was surprised by this impossible grey colour. Riddle's eyes were the lightest shade of grey she had ever seen, around the pupils they were speckled dark blue. It was a shame, really, that one day they would turn this angry crimson colour.

She saw Riddle furrowing his brow and looking at her in confusion. He had obviously caught her studying his face but Hermione didn't look away from him. She smiled faintly and then said in a soft voice,

"You know, you can be really nice if you want to be."

Hermione watched amused as his eyebrows shot upwards in surprise. Then he controlled his features again before he said in his smooth voice, "Where is that suddenly coming from?"

Hermione now positively beamed at him and then said, still amused, "Well, I got so used to us cursing each other, it is a nice change of pace, don't you think?"

Riddle shrugged at her and still had his blank mask in place.

"If you miss it," Hermione said in a teasing voice. "I could always hurl a curse at you."

Riddle leaned back in his chair and eyed her. Then he took Hermione by surprise with his next question, "Say, why do you live alone in a hotel during the holidays?"

"W…what do you mean?" Hermione asked with a suspiciously shaky voice.

She, of course, couldn't tell Riddle the truth about her stay at the Leaky Cauldron. What could she tell him? You know, I use this hotel as a base camp for my thieving trips here in London. So, I stole this book the other day. Hopefully it can help me travel forward in time fifty years. Either Riddle would think she was insane or, even worse, he would believe her and try to get the book himself.

"Well, why aren't you staying with your family?" Riddle asked while he continued to stare at her piercingly.

The truth was definitely not an option here and Hermione didn't want to talk about her family anyway, so she decided to revert to lightly mocking him again.

"Whatever are you thinking? If I had spent time with them, I would have missed your most pleasing company," she said in a saccharine voice while she smiled at Riddle disarmingly.

Riddle looked at her blankly for some time, then one of his trade-mark smirks began to form on his face. "You are a mystery, DeCerto."

The smirk plastered on his face even widened. Hermione had to smile at that. She had almost missed his patronizing smirk during the last few days.

"What?" she asked equally amused.

"You are not easy to figure out. Not easy at all," Riddle said. His eyes were glinting with excitement telling her that he would try everything to crack her secrets.

"Pff, don't be silly," Hermione smirked at him in return. "I am plain and simple. No secrets, no hidden evil master plans."

"I'm sure." Sarcasm was oozing from his voice before he continued in a more contemplative tone, "Sometimes I wonder why you haven't been sorted into Slytherin."

"What makes you say that?" she asked earnestly confused.

The Heir of Slytherin thought her worthy to be part of the House of Snake? If someone had told her a few months ago she would have laughed her head off.

"For example that stunt you pulled on me that day Slughorn was late for potions?" He glanced at her. "And I had so worked on ruining your reputation," he added with an infamous smirk on his lips.

Hermione laughed. "Yeah, I have to say so myself: that was brilliant."

"Very inventive story, by the way," Riddle said offhandedly. "My supposed twin being your friend in France."

Hermione sobered up instantly at the thought of Harry. She watched Riddle pensively before she said quietly, "That part was actually true."

Riddle's eyes widened. "You didn't make that up?" he asked incredulously.

Hermione smiled sadly at him, "He was my best friend. And you do look a little bit like him."

She had no idea why she was telling him this. But since Harry and Ron had died she hadn't had the chance to talk about them. She missed them incredibly. Her gaze wandered from Riddle's face to his jet-black hair.

"You even have the same hair colour," she said. "But yours is way tidier. His was always a mess." Hermione then smiled mischievously and leaned forwards. "More like this," she said as she ran her hand through his silky hair destroying his perfect hairstyle.

He looked baffled at her, his impenetrable blank mask lay abandoned and his hair was standing at odd angles. Hermione couldn't help herself she broke out into giggles.

"What happened to him?" Riddle asked. He tried to smooth down his hair and to regain his composure.

The smile on Hermione's face instantly dropped. Riddle seemed to notice as he stared at her somewhat curiously.

She closed her eyes and breathed in deeply. As she opened them again she said softly, "He got killed."

"I suppose it weren't Aurors like you said in your story?" Riddle asked in such a gentle voice Hermione would have thought he wasn't capable of.

"No, it was a dark wizard," she said.

Riddle studied DeCerto's face. There was this sad and painful look in her eyes again as she stared out of the window, not seeing anything. He again wondered what had happened to her.

"When did that happen?" he asked DeCerto gingerly.

Her hazel eyes shot back at him. The sorrow was still present but now Riddle could also see this guarded look on her face. She seemed to ponder if she should tell him.

After a while she said in a soft voice, "That happened a week before I came to Hogwarts."

Riddle raised one eyebrow. That was unexpected. It was only two and a half months ago?

"Is that why you fled from France?" he asked her.

DeCerto sighed tiredly before she said in her soft voice, "More or less."

Riddle looked into her hazel eyes and he could see that she wasn't going to give him more information. Whatever had happened to her, she obviously didn't want to tell him. Here was yet another secret the witch was hiding from him, Riddle thought frustrated. Though he sensed that this could very well be the most important one.

He had never seen DeCerto break down like she just had in her room. Sure at times Riddle himself had managed to make her lose her cool or to intimidate and frighten her but not to the extent she had shown as he had found her in her room. She had been so despaired, so…

…vulnerable?

It didn't fit together. DeCerto was an exceptionally powerful witch. She had even endured Riddle's Cruciatus Curse and afterwards had had the strength left to mock him. So what had happened to her that could cause her to break down? Had she been closer to the war then she had told?

Riddle glanced at her. She was still sitting opposite him and was looking out of the window. The light from the window illuminated her eyes and they now glowed in a pretty caramel colour. Riddle had never noticed how pretty her eyes were. At that thought he quickly looked away from her eyes. His gaze wandered over her bushy hair. He remembered how he had seen DeCerto the first time and how he had hated her hair back then. Now, he couldn't understand why. Sure it was rather bushy and seemingly untamable but that only made it all the more exiting. He wondered how it would feel like to run his hand through her hair. It looked so soft.

"What do you think? Should we head back?" Riddle was abruptly brought out of his musings by DeCerto’s soft voice.

He looked at her face again, trying to ignore the fact that her eyes still shone so invitingly in the light coming from the window.

"Y… yes," Riddle said.

He watched DeCerto raise her eyebrows at his stammered answer.

The last week of the old year passed rather quickly. It was still strange for Hermione to have Riddle around. For so long he had been her enemy and now he was living next doors. Stranger even, it didn't bother her anymore that he was so close by. Even the ridiculous feeling of responsibility for him didn't leave her.

The whole situation remained confusing for Hermione. In the future together with Harry and Ron she had been fighting against Lord Voldemort. He was their enemy. If she was honest, he had been her enemy since she had entered the wizarding world at the age of eleven. Back then the wizarding world had been a place full of wonders and adventures, an exciting place where great secrets and thrilling knowledge lurked behind every corner. But even back then the threat of Lord Voldemort had already hung over everything like a dark cloud. As Hermione grew up this threat had become more and more real and concrete. Voldemort was this evil, dark man who ruined everything.

Accordingly, as Hermione had arrived in the past Tom Riddle had, in her thoughts, still been this evil and frightening person. Lord Voldemort and Tom Riddle were one and the same. But somehow during the process, that had changed. After she had found him in the orphanage her view of him had changed. She had seen a new side of him, a side where he was not the frightening and evil adversary, when he was not cold and unfeeling. She had seen glimpses of the person underneath his cold façade. Sometimes he was quite nice. He had comforted her at Christmas when she had been so down. He had been there and he had held her. Hermione would have never said it out loud, but as Riddle had held her she had felt surprisingly safe and protected.

Hermione walked over to the apparition area of Diagon Alley. Riddle followed behind her. The area was rather crowded. It seemed a lot of people intended to do last minute shopping before the holidays. It was New Year's Eve after all. Hermione had to work to find a free apparition spot. As she finally had a little bit free space she held out her hand at Riddle.

Riddle frowned at her outstretched hand and said, "Do we really have to?"

Hermione smiled up at him, "Don't be such a spoilsport. It's New Year's Eve, we have to do something."

And it's your Birthday, Hermione added in her thoughts.

Riddle sighed before he took Hermione's hand in his. She smiled up at him before she turned on the spot and they plunged into the feeling of pressure from the apparition. A few miles away they appeared in one of the small back alleys of London. Riddle frowned and turned towards Hermione.
"That is not where we wanted to end up, is it?" he asked her curiously.

"No, I'm sorry," Hermione said as she rummaged through the pockets in her cloak. "I just remembered I forgot something at the Leaky Cauldron." Hermione looked at Riddle apologetically and then continued, "I'm going to fetch it. Wait here, I won't be long!"

Hermione turned on the spot and reappeared back at Diagon Alley. She quickly walked to the Leaky Cauldron, through the bar and up the stairs. How could she have forgotten the most important thing? She had planned to take Riddle out of London. They had spent enough time in the crowded area of Diagon Alley. She needed a change of air. That was why she had retrieved her old beaded bag from her Gringotts bank vault yesterday. Of course she had extracted all the potentially compromising material from inside the bag, like the books that were a few decades too new to belong to the forties. But she had left the tent inside the bag. She had lived most of the last two years in that tent and somehow missed it. Though she was a little bit afraid to enter the tent again as when she had left it the last time Harry and Ron had still been with her.

But it would be nice to camp outside, far away from the noise of the city, Hermione had decided. That was why she now retrieved the beaded bag from her trunk, annoyed with her own forgetfulness, and put it in her cloak pocket. Then she walked back to the apparition area where she disapparated and reappeared in the small back alley where she had left Riddle behind. It couldn't have been more than five minutes since she had left him there, ten at the most, but as Hermione looked around she couldn't spot Riddle anywhere. Where was he?

Maybe he got bored, Hermione reasoned. So she walked down the alley and quickly reached a main road. People were walking down the sidewalks and a few cars drove by. Hermione looked out for Riddle but again to no avail. That was odd. Where could he be? Hermione was starting to get worried. She hadn't been gone for long so where could he have wandered off to? She walked down the road but she couldn't spot Riddle anywhere. After some time she decided to use a bit of magic to find him. So she stepped into the concealed corner of a house and pulled her wand. She laid it on her palm and whispered,

"Point me."

The wand in her hand rotated like the needle of a compass searching for North until it stopped and pointed in one direction. But unlike a compass her wand wasn't pointing at North it was showing her the direction in which she would find Riddle. Hermione tried to memorize that direction, then she put her wand away and walked in the direction the wand had indicated.

She followed that way for some time, checking at intervals with her wand that she was still walking in the right direction. After a while the streets and houses were getting awfully familiar. It wasn't long until Hermione stood before the dreary grey building that was Riddle's orphanage.

What had happened?
Friendship Between Enemies?

"I'm going to fetch it. Wait here, I won't be long," DeCerto said before she turned on the spot and disapparated.

Riddle breathed out frustrated. He knew why she had left him here. If she had taken him back to Diagon Alley, he would have stayed there for sure. She wouldn't have been able to persuade him again to leave the Leaky Cauldron. He really didn't want to celebrate New Year's Eve. He hated it!

New Year's Eve, that had been the day he had been born and the day his mother had died. He really couldn't see why he should celebrate that. From that day forth he had been forced to live in that vile orphanage. Left alone by his mother who had died and abandoned by his father who disowned him.

Riddle sighed and looked at his watch. DeCerto was gone for some time already. Riddle was bored so he took off down the alley. Soon he reached a main road intersecting with the smaller back alley he was on. The street was somehow familiar to Riddle but he wasn't surprised by that. Since he could remember, he had been roaming the streets of London. He would have done anything to escape the orphanage even if it was just for a few hours. He leaned against the wall of a house and watched the scene of the street. DeCerto would turn up eventually in the backstreet he had just left so he didn't want to wander too far away. After he stood there for some time, leaning on the wall, a shabby grey car stopped in front of him. Riddle's eyes widened in shock and his blood turned cold as he recognized the man who got out of the car.

"Tom!" Carter snarled at him sharply.

Before Riddle could react Carter had reached him and grabbed him by his upper arm tightly. Then he wrenched Riddle over to the car, opened the passenger door and hurled him inside. He closed the door in Riddle's face and locked it even. Riddle could only watch with wide eyes as Carter rounded the car and then got into the driver's seat. He started the engine and they drove off.

"You are in big trouble," Carter hissed at Riddle threateningly.

Riddle balled his hands into fists. He could feel the nails digging into his skin. Carter's threat hung in the air until the car stopped in front of the hateful square building. Then Carter got out of the car, opened the passenger door and once again grabbed Riddle by his arm before he brutally pulled him out of the car. He dragged Riddle all the way to the front door of the orphanage. As they reached the door Carter opened it and threw Riddle brutally inside. Riddle lost his balance and moaned in pain as he fell on his shoulder. Carter stepped into the hallway and walked over to where Riddle was lying.

"Get up, you useless piece of scum!" he snarled as he grabbed Riddle by his collar and pulled him up violently.

Riddle winced as Carter again clutched him by his now bruised upper arm and hauled him through the hallway, into the entrance hall and towards the stairs leading down to the cellar.

"No," Riddle whispered.

Carter ignored Riddle's protests and redoubled his hold on him as he pulled Riddle down the stairs. They had nearly reached the basement as Carter shoved so violently that Riddle lost his balance and fell down the last steps. He collided hard with the concrete floor. As he tried to get up again he could feel blood flowing from his knees and the palms of his hands. Carter grabbed him again and dragged him over to the rusted metal door. Riddle was thrown into the small chamber behind the door. He had so hoped to never see this prison cell again. Before he could get up again he heard Carter enter the room and closing the door behind him.

"Did you think you could get away unpunished?" Carter asked in a cold voice.

Riddle sat up and faced Carter who stood by the door.

"You disobeyed me, you ran away. This time you've gone too far," Carter took a threatening step towards Riddle. "I'll have to punish you hard so you never do that again."

Carter walked over to Riddle and looked down on his sitting form. Riddle flinched away from him.

"Get your shirt off!" Carter ordered in a voice that left no room for disregard.

Riddle looked up at Carter and he knew what the man was going to do to him. Riddle didn't think he was able to bear the pain again. He had thought he would never see Carter ever again. Suddenly the man lashed out at him and hit him so hard in the face that Riddle was plunged sideways.

"I said get your shirt off, you worthless bastard!" Carter yelled at Riddle furiously.

Riddle got hastily up into a sitting position. He could feel blood trickling from the corner of his mouth as he started to take his shirt off with trembling fingers. He removed his shirt and then put it down on the floor. He now kneeled before Carter, stripped to the waist.

"I've dealt with your abnormality for long enough. I will teach you once and for all never to disrespect me again."

Carter stared down at him with pitiless eyes as he slowly removed his belt. Riddle watched as Carter wrapped one end of the belt around his right hand and then he closed his eyes as the hateful man walked around him and stopped behind him. Riddle clenched his teeth and braced himself for the first strike.

He heard Carter move behind him. The hard leather of the belt struck his back mercilessly and Riddle took in a sharp breath of air as the belt cut into his skin. The next blows followed rapidly. Each blow was inflicting a sharp pain. Soon Riddle felt the skin rupture and warm blood was flowing down his back. The pain was getting unbearable. But still the blows were falling down on him. He couldn't hold back anymore and as the next blow cruelly hit him, he gasped in pain. But still Carter didn't stop. He continued to hit Riddle relentlessly. The blows were pelting down on Riddle, each more agonizing than the one before. Then Riddle lost his balance as he doubled over in pain and fell down on the grimy floor where he curled up into a ball. His back was on fire, it hurt so much that he was feeling slightly lightheaded. He did only notice that Carter had walked over to him as the man kicked him brutally in the side. Then he grabbed a handful of Riddle's dark hair and hauled him up.

Riddle moaned in pain as Carter snarled at him evilly, "I'm not finished yet, freak!"

Then he let go of Riddle's hair and readjusted his grip on the belt. Riddle tried to remain in a sitting position. He knew if he fell down again, it would only make the man hit him even harder. The next blow on his back stung unbearably and Riddle bit on his lip to stop himself from screaming out. He couldn't take anymore but he knew Carter wouldn't stop until he was totally broken.

Hermione looked in shock at the wand lying on her palm and then at the building it was pointing to. There was no mistake, Riddle was inside the orphanage. But why? How did that happen? She had left him only for a few minutes. The images of her last visit to the orphanage rushed through her head. She saw Riddle lying on the floor in that disgustingly grimy chamber in the cellar of the orphanage. He had been badly hurt. Hermione shuddered as she remembered the deep gashes on his back. She clasped her wand tightly as she looked up at the grey building in front of her. She wasn't going to let that happen again. Carter wasn't allowed to hurt Riddle.

With that determination in mind Hermione hastened through the front yard of the orphanage and towards the door. She didn't even think to put up any Disillusionment charms this time. Luckily the front door wasn't locked so Hermione entered the orphanage building without any problems. The hallway seemed to still be as dirty as before. But she wasn't paying much attention as she darted through the hallway and into the entrance hall. She noticed absentmindedly clatter of cutlery and children's voices coming from the dining hall nearby. Hermione didn't stop though but immediately took off towards the staircase. She had no doubts that if Riddle had been forced back to the orphanage, she would find him in the cellar and not in the dining hall having dinner.

Hermione hoped that she was wrong as she rushed down the stairs. She quickly arrived in the dimly lit passage way of the cellar. From there it was only a few steps until she reached the ominous metal door behind which she had last time found Riddle. She was so unsettled now that she didn't notice how her magic reacted to her state of mind and it lashed out at the door as she reached it. The door was flung open by the force of her magic and Hermione stepped quickly inside the chamber. She stared with wide eyes at the scene in front of her. There was Riddle, kneeling on the floor while blood was flowing down his abused back.

She was too late!

Hermione's gaze wandered from Riddle on the floor to the man standing behind him. Her eyes narrowed as she looked at Carter and the bloodstained belt in his hand. There was surprise written on his face as he in turn stared at Hermione. She could feel her apprehension turn into cold fury as her eyes lingered on Carter. As her magic had before been a whirlwind raving inside of her, it now changed along with her emotions. Its intensity and ferocity did not diminish it even intensified but now it was an icy cold power with purpose and direction.

"Get away from him!" Hermione hissed at Carter with barely suppressed rage as she took a step further into the room.

Her magic was still building up but she was too enraged to notice. She didn't even notice as her wrath awoke the Elder Magic inside of her. It clashed with her own magic and then connected with it, joining the storm inside of her.

"I knew it!" Carter said his tone hard and thick with triumph. He had in the mean time found his voice back, along with his cockiness. "I knew you were with him." Carter gestured at Riddle with the belt in his hand.

Hermione's mouth formed now a thin line as she eyed Carter hatefully.

"I saw at once that you are no good," he spat at Hermione furiously. "What are you, his whore?"

Outwardly Hermione's appearance didn't change but inside of her her magic was running wild.

"No decent person mingles with dirt like him," Carter continued enraged.

"I said, get away from him!" Hermione said slowly, cold hate was seeping through her voice but she still sounded eerily calm.
"You can't order me around, little missy!" Carter yelled at her. "It seems you need to be punished just like Tom!"

Carter then tightened his grip on the belt and started to walk over to where Hermione was. As he passed Riddle he turned towards him and kicked him hard in the side, so that he was flung to the floor. Riddle moaned softly in pain as Carter yelled at him,

"Don't think I'm finished with you!"

That was when Hermione finally released the magic that had been building up inside her. It flowed out of her and quickly engulfed the whole room. Hermione only incidentally noticed how changed her own magic felt. The magic was somehow stronger and there was a raw energy behind it. She could even sense warding spells spanning around the room like spider's webs. Last time she had been here she hadn't been able to sense them. Those were probably the spells from the Ministry against the underage use of magic. Hermione just pushed them away and was surprised by the force of her magic.

In the meantime Carter had reached her and grabbed her wrist brutally. Hermione's eyes snapped to his face then she hissed at him coldly, "You are never going to touch him again!"

Carter smiled at her evilly. "And who will stop me? You?"

As an answer Hermione directed her magic towards Carter. She watched satisfied as his eyes widened in shock and his hands darted to his throat while he gasped for air.

"If you ever lay a hand on him again-" Hermione extended a hand towards Carter's throat as if to strangle him but she never touched him. "-there will be hell to pay."

Carter stared at her. Hermione was satisfied by the shock and fear she could see in his eyes. He still desperately gasped for a breath she didn't allow him to take. Then she let her magic wrap itself completely around his form as she moved a step away from him. Carter was eerily lifted into the air so that his toes only just skimmed the floor. His arms now hung limply at his sides and he looked like a puppet, hold by an invisible string. He stared in horror at the young woman standing in front of him.

"And don't be mistaken," Hermione hissed at him in a low voice. "I will hear about it if you hurt him again."

Then her magic lashed out at Carter so that he was plunged backwards where he collided hard with the wall. He groaned at the impact and then slid down the wall until he lay sprawled on the floor, unconscious. Hermione's eyes wandered from the still form of the disgusting man to Riddle who was hunched on the floor. He stared at Hermione. She could see pain in his grey eyes. They continued to stare at each other, neither speaking a word. Then suddenly Hermione could feel hot tears running down her cheeks. She sniffed and then ran towards him. She dropped down beside him, wrapped her arms around him and hugged him tightly while she sobbed,

"I'm sorry, I'm sorry!"

She felt his arms wrapping around her waist tentatively. Hermione squeezed her eyes shut. She just wanted to get him away from here, as far as possible. So she summoned her magic once again, concentrated on her destination and then plunged into the dark pressure of apparition. If she had stopped to think she would have remembered that it was impossible to apparate inside of Diagon Alley as it was protected by many warding spells. But she didn't and so it would take her a while to realize what she had just done as she apparated through the heavy wards of Diagon Alley. They reappeared directly in her room at the Leaky Cauldron. Hermione released Riddle only to grab her healing potions that lay in her trunk. Then she hugged him again and they apparated away. Just to reappear miles and miles away on a secluded mountainous area. Hermione pulled the old beaded bag out from her pocket, opened it and pointed her wand at it.

"Accio tent," she whispered.

After a few seconds the tent flew out of the opening of the bag. Hermione just waved her wand at it and it began to unfold itself. It didn't take long and the tent stood on the snowy ground. She glanced at Riddle while she still clung to him with one arm wrapped around him. Riddle stared at the small greyish tent in front of them and then his eyes wandered to the snowy mountains surrounding them.

"Where are we?" he asked and there was genuine surprise in his normally indifferent voice.

"The Highlands of Scotland," Hermione smiled up at him shyly. "We should go inside. It's cold," she added as Riddle was not wearing a shirt.

Hermione helped Riddle up and together they entered the tent. He stopped abruptly and a frown appeared between his eyebrows as he saw the interior of the tent.

"That's a magical tent?" he asked her softly.

"Yes," Hermione answered while she led him to one of the beds.

Riddle sank down on the bed and she sat beside him. She eyed him concerned. There were bruises beginning to take shape on his arm and face. The worst was his back though. Blood was flowing freely from the gashes in his skin. But she was relieved that there were not as many wounds on his back as the first time she had found him in the orphanage. She had been able to prevent worse this time. But still, it was her fault that he was hurt now.

Hermione looked down on her hands and whispered softly, "I'm so sorry. I shouldn't have left you alone in that backstreet."

Riddle looked in astonishment at the witch sitting beside him. She was staring down on her hands seemingly not daring to meet his gaze. Did she think she was responsible that Carter had found him? Why was she feeling guilty about the whole thing? Why did she care? But she did, Riddle realized surprised as he looked at her face on which guilt and worry were written, clear as daylight. Riddle never before had anyone standing up for him… or protecting him. No-one had ever cared enough about him to do what DeCerto had just done for him.

"It's not your fault," Riddle told her.

She looked uncertainly, timidly even, up at him. Her huge brown eyes were scanning his face fearfully.

"You are not angry with me?" she then asked hesitantly. "It's my fault you ended up in that backstreet. So it's my fault that he… he…"

Riddle was startled as he saw fresh tears running down her cheeks. Somehow he didn't like seeing her cry. So he wrapped his arms around her and pulled her over to him.

"No, I'm not angry with you," he tried to calm her in a soothing voice.

DeCerto looked up at him. There was still uncertainty in her eyes as she bit her lip nervously. But then she nodded and even tried to smile at him.
"Okay," she said relieved.

Then she got up from the bed. There was an odd feeling of loss as she ended the embrace. Riddle watched as she walked over to the table. She had discarded her cloak on one of the chairs standing around the table. The wooden box she had been carrying was now standing on the table. DeCerto took the box and then sat down on the bed beside him again.

She smiled up at him and then said softly, "Let me tend to your injuries."

The sharp pain on Riddle's back had gotten worse and he could still feel blood flowing from the wounds that surely were on his back. Riddle clenched his fists. Oh, how he hated Carter and the power that man had over him. He so wished that he was in a position to fight back, to take revenge for all the pain and humiliation he had had to endure. An all-consuming hate rose up in Riddle as he thought of how he was forced to submit to that hateful man. That disgusting Muggle. Any toe out of line during the break, any use of magic, would automatically lead to his expulsion from Hogwarts and he would lose his wand. Dumbledore would surely see to that, with pleasure.

Riddle narrowed his eyes as his thoughts wandered to Dumbledore. The hate that had been building up in him intensified and turned into a barely controllable rage. Just one more year and then he would turn seventeen and no-one would be able to force him to do anything anymore. After he would leave Hogwarts he would finally have the chance to get his revenge. On Carter, on Dumbledore, on everyone who had dared to displease him. He would see to it that they regretted to have ever crossed his path. A sinister smile played around his mouth as he imagined how exactly he would make them regret.

He was brought out of his train of thought as he felt a weight shifting on the bed beside him. He looked down at DeCerto and was surprised to find her staring at him fearfully while she clutched the wooden box in her lap so tightly that the knuckles on her hands turned white. It was then that Riddle noticed that his magic was crackling around him violently, mirroring his murderous emotions. Normally he would have been delighted by the dark force behind his magic but her frightened eyes were enough to make him withdraw his magic.

"That wasn't directed at you." Riddle turned to her and tried to banish all the hate he had been feeling from his voice. "Sometimes my magic just goes wild."

Hermione released the breath she had been holding in and unwound her fingers from the potions box she had been holding in a murder grip. That had been scary, this aura Riddle had suddenly emanated. That had been Voldemort, the Voldemort from her time period. She would recognize that kind of dark and aggressive magic anywhere. Hermione tried to even her breathing again. Just now, as she had felt his magic, she had been brought back to the day she had been fighting against him in the Ministry. A day she would like to forget and to bury along with her memories. Hermione flinched and took in a sharp breath of air as she felt a warm hand on her right forearm.

"DeCerto?"

She heard Riddle ask softly, the insecurity in his voice contrasting sharply with the dark magic he had just been radiating. Hermione looked at his face. There were no traces left of the hate he had been transporting through his magic before. His eyes were scanning her and Hermione was relieved to find no red tinge in his grey eyes. It was Tom Riddle sitting beside her and not Lord Voldemort.

She smiled reassuringly at him and then gestured at his back, "Let me see to that, okay?"

Hermione treated his injuries and was relieved that they were not as bad as the first time she had had to do that. There were some rather deep cuts but not as many as before. So she cleaned the wounds, used some potions on them and then bandaged his back. As she was finished she retrieved the beaded bag from her cloak pocket and accioed a jumper from inside the bag which she handed to Riddle. He took the jumper and put it on. Then he eyed the beaded bag in Hermione's hand curiously.

"What is that?" he asked her in his soft voice.

Hermione looked from his face to the small bag in her hand and a smirk was beginning to take shape on her face before she said in a conceited voice that would have made even Malfoy proud, "That, my dear Mr Riddle, is one of my more brilliant creations."

She laughed at his baffled face but then handed him the bag and said in an amused tone, "It's very much a bottomless pit. Really handy if you ask me."

Riddle examined the bag in his hand and then looked up at her. "What did you use? The Amplifico Spell?"

"No, it was the Infinitio Charm," Hermione smiled at him.

Riddle raised one eyebrow and looked back at the bag in his hand, slightly impressed now, "True infinity then… that is a very advanced charm."

Hermione sat down next to him and said, "Yeah. But don't be overly impressed. I needed three tries and two bags until I finally had it right."

Then Hermione looked at her wristwatch. She was surprised that it was nine o'clock already. No wonder she was so hungry.

"Aren't you hungry?" she asked Riddle. "Because I'm starving."

She took the bag from his hands and opened it. "Accio wicker basket!"

Out of the bag flew a large basket. Hermione had asked Luisa back at the Leaky Cauldron to pack some food for her. She carried the basket over to the table and at the same time waved her wand at the kitchen. Plates, cutlery and cups flew out from the cupboards in the kitchen and placed themselves on the table. Then Hermione opened the lid of the basket and produced the food from it. She had to smile as she found a bottle of wine. Luisa really was a very thoughtful person. After the events at the orphanage Hermione had almost forgotten that it was New Year's Eve today.

"You are well-prepared," Hermione heard a voice. She looked up and found Riddle standing behind her and eyeing the set table.

"Yeah, well, I had planned to come here all along," she said quietly as she looked down on her hands.

They sat down at the table and started on the meal. Soon Hermione noticed that Riddle's gaze was flying towards the entry of the tent every other minute.

"What's wrong?" she asked him concerned.

He glanced at her before he said, "I'm still underage and not allowed to use magic at... home. You just used magic..."

Now Hermione understood. She had used some magic back at the orphanage. Riddle didn't know that she had pushed the warding spells of the Ministry away, thus disabling them. And now he was afraid he would be blamed for underage use of magic.

"Don't worry," Hermione tried to soothe him. "They won't notice that I used magic back at the orphanage. I worked around the warding spells of the Ministry."

Riddle raised his eyebrow at that and asked somewhat suspiciously, "You deactivated the Ministry spells?"

Hermione felt uneasy. Now that she thought about it, it really was supposed to be impossible to work around the wards. But she had obviously used the Elder Magic again to do just that. She couldn't tell Riddle, of course. So she said offhandedly, "Yes, I did. No big deal!"

Surprisingly enough Riddle accepted that and didn't persist on the matter. Maybe he was too relieved to want to discuss it any longer.

After a while Riddle said contemplatively, "Where'd you get that tent?"

Hermione considered him for a while and then said, "Brought it from home."

Riddle nodded at that. "I thought so. It's rather nice," he said as he looked around the one-room-apartment.

Hermione smiled. A lot of memories were stored in this old magical tent. Good ones and bad ones. She had lived in this tent together with Harry and Ron ever since they had left Hogwarts after their sixth year. Always on the run, always in search for the next Horcrux. But Hermione still connected the tent with the feeling of safety and warmth.

"I would hope so. I have lived here for nearly two years," she said absentmindedly as she wallowed in her memories.

A curious voice answered her, "You have lived here for two years? Why?"

Hermione's head shot up and she looked at Riddle with shocked eyes. Why'd she tell him? Her cover story was that she came from a small village in France. She was a Pureblood living with her family in that village, how would straying around and living in a tent for two years fit into that story?

"Stupid! Stupid!"

Hermione saw that glint in Riddle's eyes. The glint he always had when he was onto something.

"Why did you need to live in a tent for that long a time?"

"Uhm..." She grabbed the teapot standing before her and poured some tea in her cup with trembling hands. "Tea?" she asked Riddle, completely ignoring his question.

"Smooth, Hermione, smooth! Now he definitely knows I'm hiding something!" She inwardly shook her head at her poor acting skills.

"DeCerto?" Riddle asked in a half-amused, half-pressing tone.

Hermione glanced up at him tentatively. Still there, that glint in his eyes. "What I meant to say was I lived two weeks in here."

Riddle frowned at her before he simply stated, "No, that is not what you meant to say."

Hermione sighed at his persistence. He wasn't going to let her out of this one so easily.
"Look, we all have our secrets. But I will tell you why I lived here for so long if you are telling me why Dumbledore took your wand away from you."

Riddle now scowled at her and Hermione beamed back at him as she said, "Whenever you are ready."

After they were finished with eating Hermione waved her wand and transfigured one of the beds into a soft leather couch. Another wave of her wand and a crackling fire appeared in the fireplace. Then she retrieved the bottle of wine from the basket and sat down on the couch. Riddle had watched her actions and raised an eyebrow.

"What's happening now?" he said in his deep voice.

Hermione eyed him amused, "Now, my friend, we are waiting for the New Year."

It was only when Hermione saw Riddle's eyes widen in surprise that she noticed what she had said. Friend…

Was that it? Their relationship? They were no enemies, at least not anymore… or not yet? Hermione didn't know. So were they friends now? Could she… was she allowed to befriend Lord Voldemort? No! But he was not Voldemort, not entirely. She had caught glimpses of his other side. When he was kind and compassionate and protective – when he was likeable. She had always tried to deny it before herself. Had insisted that she hated him, that he was the enemy. He had destroyed everything that was important to her so why should she like him?

Hermione looked at his face. It was so different from the face she had come to hate, the face with the pitiless crimson eyes. She knew he was still there, Lord Voldemort, an inseparable part of Tom Riddle. But if she hated him so much, why did she go and save him? Twice? How did she explain the fury she had felt as she had seen Carter abusing him? If she hated him, she should have cheered Carter on. She wouldn't be sitting here treating his wounds. No, Hermione had to admit it, she did like Riddle.

She breathed in deeply. That insight was rather hard to admit. She noticed that Riddle was still eyeing her. There was disbelief in his grey eyes. Hermione smiled at him and patted on the spot beside her on the sofa.

"What are you waiting for?"

Riddle stood up from the chair he had been sitting on and then walked slowly over to her. As he reached the sofa he hesitated to sit down beside her, seemingly unsure of what to expect next. So Hermione reached out for him, grabbed his hand and pulled him down to her. Riddle sat rather stiffly beside her.

"It's still so early," Hermione complained. Then informed him while smiling, "I've always hated waiting for midnight."

She looked at Riddle beside her and was confused as she saw him looking uncharacteristically nervous. Then she noticed that she was still holding his hand and released it quickly.

"Do you want some of the wine?" she asked him and couldn't help but feel a heat wave hitting her face.

Riddle nodded and so Hermione poured two glasses from the bottle of wine and handed him one. Then she leaned back on the sofa and sipped from her own glass.
"I don't exactly know whether I like New Year's Eve or not," she told him pensively. "It is nice celebrating a new year but it somehow feels like a goodbye too."

"I don't like New Year's Eve," Riddle said softly.

Hermione glanced at him. So he didn't like his birthday?

"Why not?"

Riddle just shrugged as a response.

"Then what do you normally do on New Year's Eve?" Hermione asked him.

"Normally I would spend it at Hogwarts," Riddle said as he looked down on the glass in his hands.

"Alone, as everyone else would be at their homes," Hermione continued his sentence.

Riddle just shrugged again, still staring at the glass in his hands.

"Hmm… then you can hardly say that you don't like New Year's Eve. I mean, if you've never really celebrated it before."

Riddle looked up from the glass in his hand and eyed Hermione. "Then how do you celebrate the new year?"

Hermione considered him over her glass of wine before she decided to answer this rather private question.

"I remember New Year's Eve three years ago. My parents took me to a cottage in Switzerland. You can't imagine the snow we had there." Hermione smiled at the memory. A memory from better days, when her parents had still been alive. "But my father had apparated down to the village anyway and bought some of the local foods and this really silly board game. We played it the whole time until midnight. Though we never really worked out the rules."

Hermione laughed softly. That had happened during her sixth year. Before her parents had died and along with them the innocent and happy Hermione.

"Then why are you not with your parents now?" Riddle frowned at her.

"Mmmh… They died," Hermione said softly. She didn't like it very much to talk about her parents. But somehow she didn't mind talking with Riddle about her parents.

"What happened?" he asked her in a surprisingly gentle tone.

"They died two years ago. War victims," Hermione sighed. "That's a long time ago, so much happened, so much changed, but I still miss them incredibly."

She looked up at Riddle. His face was a blank again, giving nothing away but she noticed this strange flicker in his eyes. She wasn't entirely sure but could it be concern?

"It's not easy without them," she whispered.

"Probably not," Riddle said quietly.

"What happened to your parents?" Hermione asked him softly.
She knew what had happened to them. But what she didn't know was how Riddle felt about it. Before she had come here to the past she had thought that Voldemort didn't care one bit about what had become of his parents. But now, she wasn't so sure anymore.

Riddle hesitated but then began to tell her in a low voice, "My mother died giving birth to me. That's why I grew up in an orphanage."

"What's with your father?" Hermione asked him tentatively.

Riddle looked away from her before he said softly, "He disowned me. He never wanted me."

"So he is still alive?"

Riddle looked down on his hands. "No. But I met him once before he died."

"How was he?" Hermione asked him. She clasped his hand reassuringly. At first Riddle stiffened as he felt Hermione's hand on his but then he seemed to relax.

"I hadn't expected much in the first place. He… despised me. Told me I was not good enough to carry his name…"

"I'm sorry," Hermione told him as she squeezed his hand gently.

"Don't be. It's in the past."

"Yeah, but sometimes it's not easy to get over the past," Hermione said, smiling sadly at the double meaning of that sentence. She pressed his hand again before she smiled up at him and said, "Now, let's do something less depressing."

Then she picked up the beaded bag, opened it and frowned at it. "Hmmm… I think it should be there… somewhere… hopefully."

She flicked her wrist and her wand landed in her hand. Riddle watched curiously as she pointed her wand at the bag and murmured, "Accio Ron's cards."

After some time a battered looking pack of cards flew out of the bag. Hermione caught it and looked triumphantly at Riddle, "Ha! I knew it was still there."

Riddle arched one eyebrow gracefully and said, "And now we're… doing what exactly?"

Hermione grinned impishly, "Why, playing poker, of course."

Riddle smirked at her, "Did you just dare to challenge me?"

Hermione smirked right back at him and waved her wand over the pack of cards. The cards instantly began to fly from the pack like they were dealt out by an invisible hand. They had good fun playing the cards, though Hermione quickly realized that she was no match for Riddle. But she wasn't in the least bit surprised, after all he had the perfect poker face even without playing cards. Hermione just refilled their glasses as her gaze fell on the old clock hanging on the wall opposite them. It was nearly twelve. She hadn't noticed how the time had flown by.

"Ah, we nearly missed the New Year!" she said excitedly while she grabbed Riddle's arm and juggled it.

He looked in amusement at her flushed face and then at the clock. Hermione ignored his light taunt and continued to squeeze his arm while she watched the points of the old clock. And then the hands of the clock both pointed to twelve.

A new, old, year had begun!

It was somehow strange to celebrate the start of a year that lay more than 50 years in the past but Hermione enjoyed it anyway. Then she turned to Riddle and hugged him. That seemed to become a more and more common gesture…

"Happy 1944, Riddle!" Hermione said before she kissed him on the cheek.

After she released him she noticed amused that there was a strange blush on his otherwise so pale cheeks.

Then Riddle looked at her and said softly, "I think it's all right if you call me 'Tom'."

Hermione was baffled at that but she was also elated. So she beamed at him and said, "You sure? Because 'Hermione' is an awfully long name."

Riddle smiled one of his rare true smiles that seemed to enhance his beauty even further and nodded.

They remained sitting comfortably on the transfigured sofa staring into the roaring fire in the fireside. Then Riddle reached for his glass of wine standing on the table and as he leaned forward the sleeve of his pullover slid up a little bit so that Hermione noticed that strange scar on his forearm again. She had seen it before as she had looked after his injuries. It was an ugly and rather huge scar. Hermione remembered that it started at the inside of his left forearm and run up almost all the length of his arm until it ended midway at his upper arm. The scar was old it seemed but the cut must have been rather deep to leave behind something like this. Hermione wondered how he had gotten that scar.

After Riddle had put his glass back down on the table she leaned towards him and she touched the beginning of the scar gently as she said, "How did you get that?"

Hermione noticed how Riddle had tensed as he had felt her finger on his scar and he had jerked his arm away. Now he tried to pull down the sleeve of his pullover to hide the scar again as he said, "It's… it's nothing."

She furrowed her brow but said, trying to sound lightly, "Come on, something must have caused it. What did you do? Fought off some dragon? Or maybe a hippogriff?"

Riddle glanced at her shortly but then looked away again. Hermione was surprised as he answered her nonetheless in a low voice, "That happened during the summer break."

Her eyes widened as he said that. Her gaze darted back to the place where the scar was now hidden under the fabric of his jumper. If he had received the scar during a summer break, that meant that he had been at the orphanage as it had happened.

"What happened?" Hermione asked him gingerly.

Riddle looked back at her. The blank mask was back in place but she wasn't fooled. She'd had some practice by now to read his facial expressions and she knew that he was by far not as indifferent as he would like to appear. Hermione moved closer to him on the sofa and gently took his hand in hers. She felt him again tense at the contact but this time he didn't flinch away from her. She guessed that something bad must have happened during that summer break. But she didn't want to force him to tell her. If he wasn't ready to tell her, then she didn't need to know. So they sat, Hermione still holding his hand, on the sofa and stared into the flames of the fire crackling inside the fireplace.
After some time Riddle unexpectedly spoke again, "I got it after I returned to London after my second year at Hogwarts." His eyes darted to her face shortly before he looked back at the fire and continued in his low voice, "Mrs Cole, the matron of the orphanage, had already been replaced by Carter. But she didn't go before telling Carter some horror stories about me."

Then Riddle added bitterly, "That woman has always hated me, you know. She thought I was some dangerous psycho as strange things kept happening around me."

"Because you are a wizard?" Hermione asked him gently.

"Yes," Riddle said firmly as he looked at her with his unfathomable eyes. "And she didn't hesitate to tell Carter how disturbed I apparently am."

"What did he do?" Hermione asked, not sure she really wanted to know the answer.

"At first nothing. He just had a close eye on me," Riddle told her, his voice was strangely free of every emotion. "Then halfway through the holidays I was summoned to his office. As I entered I saw this book lying on his desk. It was mine… from Hogwarts' library."

Hermione stared at him, then asked in an anxious voice, "It was about magic?"

Riddle nodded before he continued in his emotionless tone, "I hid it in my room. I never expected anyone to find it. Carter must have searched my room."

He broke off there and again stared into the fire. Then after some time he abruptly turned to Hermione again, "He was furious. Said it was blasphemy, the book, and burned it. Then he dragged me down there."

She was sure he was talking about the chamber in the cellar she had found him in. She pressed his hand reassuringly.

"You know, Mrs Cole never liked me but at least she never beat me either," Riddle said, his tone free of emotion. Then he raised his left arm and rolled back the sleeve of his jumper a little bit, exposing the scar underneath. "Before Carter left he stepped on my hand and cut my arm open with a knife."

Hermione shuddered as her gaze traced the horrible scar on his arm. Then she was startled as Riddle laughed mirthlessly. "He told me, that the next time he found something like the book he was going to kill me."

Hermione stared at his face incredulously. He looked at the scar unmoved as his finger skimmed over the marred skin.

"By the time he left I was hurt pretty badly. I don't know how long I was locked up in that room but the wound got infected and I was very ill. I think it was my magic that somehow saved me and kept me alive. Because otherwise I would surely have died."

Riddle ended his story in the same indifferent voice he had started it with.

Hermione was shocked. She had known that it was hard for him to grow up in that orphanage but this was just terrible. She snuggled against him and then whispered in a shaking voice, "I'm sorry."

Riddle looked down at her with a puzzled expression on his face.

"I never knew how hard it was for you," Hermione said softly.
"No one does," Riddle answered, obviously bewildered by her compassion. "And no-one cares."

Hermione was sad that there was no bitterness in his voice. He seemed to have resigned himself to that fact. She breathed in deeply and leaned her head against his shoulder as she closed her eyes.

"I care."

Tom didn't answer to that but he allowed her to stay snuggled against him.

More Than Friends

The next morning Tom woke up with a severe kink in his neck. He was still lying on the sofa, he and DeCerto…

No, Hermione.

…had occupied the night before.

A quick glance at his wristwatch told him that it was half past ten already. He yawned, trying to dispel his tiredness. As he got up from the sofa he noticed the quilt covering him. That must have been Hermione, he thought surprised. As his gaze wandered through the room he noticed that she wasn't anywhere to be seen. Tom wondered where she could have gone as he walked over to the bathroom. He washed up while trying to ignore the dull pain in his back. As he looked at his reflection in the mirror his gaze wandered to his left forearm and the scar.

With dread he remembered the conversation he had had with Hermione yesterday. He now blamed it on the wine that he had told her so much about himself. Why did he have to tell her? He never told people things about himself. But Hermione seemed to now know a lot of his secrets. And she had seen him in a weak and pitiful state. Yet, she still stayed with him and didn't use his weakness against him. A thing he surely would have done if their roles would have been reversed, he had to admit.

But here she was, helping him even after all the things he had said and done to her. Hermione remained to be an enigma.

Tom left the bathroom again and sat down at the kitchen table. That summer break he had told her about was one of the worst times he ever had to endure. It was the first summer break he had had to leave Hogwarts without his wand. Dumbledore had taken his wand back then, like he did every summer break after. He had threatened Tom with expulsion should he ever use magic during the break ever again or if he heard about any misbehaviour. Tom would never under any circumstances risk that. If he were to be expelled, even today, he would have to abandon his wand for good and as he didn't have any magical relatives he would have to leave the magical world and return into the muggle world and to the orphanage.

It was ludicrous really, that Dumbledore had this much power over him. Tom hated and feared Dumbledore at the same time because of that power Dumbledore held over him. But one day, he thought furiously, he would revenge himself upon that man. After his seventh year Tom would be free. Free to do whatever he wanted. A dark smirk formed on his face at that thought. He would make sure that Dumbledore and Carter and everyone who had ever mistreated him would regret their actions dearly. But before that he would make sure to never get into a situation like during that summer break again.

He remembered how he had arrived back at the orphanage and for the first time had met Carter. From the start Carter had seemed to despise him but Tom hadn't been concerned. He had learned to never expect anything different from those Muggles. But then Carter had found the book and had punished Tom. He still shuddered as he remembered that day. He had been so powerless. So defenceless without his magic. After Carter had been finished with him he had left Tom lying in that dirty chamber. Tom remembered the agony he had been in and how sick he had felt as he had remained locked into the room for days. He had felt his consciousness slip in and out as the minutes had ticked painfully slowly by. Always when he had been in a more lucid state of mind he had been afraid that the next time he lost his consciousness he would never wake up again. Tom knew that it had been just a lucky chance that he hadn't died back then, lying alone in the chamber. He could remember the darkness lurking for him, wanting to devour him. Never in his life had he been so scared, scared by this void claiming him. Even to this day Tom was still terrified by the void. Every time he had to return to the orphanage, every time Carter tugged him down into that chamber, Tom was afraid. He would do anything to get rid of that fear.

Tom looked up as he heard someone enter through the front door. Hermione walked into the apartment. Her cheeks were flushed from the cold outside and she was wearing her heavy winter cloak. Tom noticed that she was carrying a bag in her hand.

"Good morning, Tom," Hermione smiled at him widely as she spotted him sitting at the kitchen table.

Oh, how he hated that name. But somehow it sounded so nice coming out of her mouth.

"Not an early bird, are you?" Hermione said teasingly as she took off her cloak. "I went to that little village not far from here," she continued, seemingly in a rather chatty mood. "It's really small. But I managed to find some bread." Here she pulled some buns out of the bag she had been carrying. "The landscape here is amazing though. The mountains are impressive. And it snowed during the night some more. It's just beautiful. We have to go out later. You really shouldn't miss it."

Tom couldn't understand how someone could be so enthusiastic and talkative so early in the morning but it was somehow nice to listen to Hermione's pleasant voice.

Hermione eyed Tom concerned as she placed the bread on the table. He had looked so depressed as she had entered the tent. So, she tried to distract him from his dark thoughts and went on chatting with him, or rather to him as he wasn't being very responsive.

"I like the winter more than summer anyway," Hermione said as she walked over to the kitchenette.
"Can't stand the heat."

She boiled water for the tea and then levitated the tea pot over to the table with a wave of her wand.
After that she took two plates out of the cupboard, returned to the table and sat down facing Tom.

"How did you sleep?" she asked him as she reached for one of the buns.

Tom just shrugged at that and then poured himself some of the tea. Hermione frowned at him. He really seemed to be moody today. Not that he was a very cheerful person to begin with but it was even worse today. She wondered if he still thought about their conversation from yesterday. She herself had been shocked by the things he had told her.

She remembered how Harry had told her and Ron about Voldemort's past, about the orphanage he had grown up in and about his days at school. But as Harry had told her about the orphanage it hadn't sounded that bad. Well, it never was a good thing having to grow up in an orphanage but it hadn't sounded like Voldemort had been mistreated in any way. Then again Harry had only seen bits and pieces of Voldemort's life. Memories Dumbledore had managed to preserve. Those memories were just fragments of Voldemort's life though. Did that mean that Dumbledore never knew about Carter? Otherwise Harry would have seen him in one of those memories. Or had Dumbledore simply withheld that particular information?

Hermione glanced at Tom. He was sipping at his cup of tea and still looked rather dejected.

She had now seen more than just glimpses of his life. And she didn't like what she had learned yesterday. She had feared it but now she knew it for certain. Carter had mistreated Tom since that vile man had shown up at the orphanage and had taken over Mrs Cole's job. Hermione knew that Tom had never been an angel. She remembered the stories Harry had told her about Tom's days at the orphanage. Tom had obviously bullied the other children, had threatened and stolen from them and he had used his magic to scare them. Hermione could understand that Mrs Cole hadn't exactly been a fan of Tom.

Then Carter had shown up and had obviously heard stories about Tom. Carter's opinion of Tom had been biased before he had even met him. So he had been expecting Tom to misbehave. Then Carter had punished him in an unacceptably way. Tom's behaviour didn't justify what Carter had done to him. She felt sick as she remembered that huge scar on Tom's arm. Whatever he had done, however bad he had behaved, Carter had never had the right to hurt him like that and certainly not because of a book Tom had brought from Hogwarts. Carter had hurt Tom and left him half-dead in that chamber in the cellar. Hermione now hated that man even more. Tom had nearly died back then. Hermione didn't want to think about how scared he must have been. Sure he was Lord Voldemort and Lord Voldemort was supposed to be evil to the core but as Carter had hurt him Tom had only been twelve years old. He had still been nothing more than a child. However disturbed or evil Tom might have already been as a child, he still remained to be that, a child. Back then he had been seriously hurt and he had been alone. Hermione was sure that he had been terrified.

But now that Hermione knew about that episode of Tom's life, a few things seemed a lot clearer to her. Back in her time period she had always wondered why Lord Voldemort had been so obsessed with the idea of immortality. Or more precisely, why had he already been obsessed with immortality when he had only been a teenager. She knew that he had created his first Horcrux, the diary, sometime during his later years at Hogwarts. Why would a sixteen year old search for ways to gain immortality? Hermione had always understood that Lord Voldemort would want to be immortal. He was an evil, dark wizard after all and many people wanted him dead. But why should a teenage Tom Riddle need immortality?

Now, she could see why. Tom had been so badly hurt when he had been twelve years old, that he had nearly died. He had been confronted with the concept of his own death much too early. Hermione herself had been in a few situations where her life had been endangered. Those experiences had been scary, they had been terrible. She knew that those experiences had changed herself immensely. But in contrast to Tom, she had been grown-up as those things had happened to her. She didn't want to imagine how bad it must have been for a child to experience things like that.

Hermione looked at Tom again. He was still holding his cup and had a blank but dark look on his face. She didn't want to see him so depressed anymore.

"So, did you make any resolutions for the year?" she asked him, trying to sound cheerful.

Tom looked up at her and a confused frown appeared on his face.

"I always make some stupid resolution," Hermione continued. "But they never work out."

"What is your resolution for this year?" Tom asked her, not really paying attention.

A smile formed on Hermione's face as she looked at him mischievously. Then she said in a conceited and mocking voice, "Well, I'll try to let you answer some questions in class for a change, so you don't look so bad any longer."

Tom arched one eyebrow indignantly and Hermione couldn't hold back anymore, she broke out into giggles. But she noted satisfied that he didn't look so depressed anymore. Instead he frowned at her.

Now he narrowed his eyes and then said slowly, "It's time we get back to Hogwarts. You've gotten way too cocky."
Hermione beamed at him. He might be scowling at her right now but she wasn't fooled. She could see the amusement shining in his eyes.

"Well, Tom, you seem to be very confident." Hermione continued in her conceited voice as she looked at him with raised eyebrows. "You really think you can beat me in any class?"

"I've been top of my year since I started at Hogwarts," Tom said while a haughty smirk tugged at his lips.

"Yeah, that's because I wasn't there when you started at Hogwarts," Hermione shot back.

"For someone who came two months late for the school year, you seem very confident," Tom said teasingly as he reached for one of the buns lying on the table.

"That's only going to make your defeat all the more bitter," she taunted right back.

"It seems we have to wait for the end of the year to finally crush your delusional ideas, Hermione," Tom said nonchalantly.

She could still see this delightful glint of amusement in his eyes. That was loads better than the depressive look he had sported before. She put her elbows on the table and propped her head up on her hands while she smiled at Tom. He glanced at her hesitantly as she didn't respond to his taunt. He arched one eyebrow questioningly.

After some time he asked, "What are you staring at?"

"Nothing," Hermione said, still smiling. Then she added, "You just called me 'Hermione' for the first time."

Her smile even widened as she saw a slight blush on his face. She would never have dreamed of seeing Tom Riddle with such an adorable blush on his face.

"What do you plan to do after graduation?" Hermione surprised herself with that question.

Didn't she already know what he planned to do?

Tom stared at her confused. "I… I don't know yet," he said after some time in a quiet tone. "Searching for a job, I guess."

"What job?" Hermione asked him with raised eyebrows.

"That doesn't matter. As long as it gets paid well," Tom said slowly, but then added as he saw Hermione's questioning look. "I need to pay back some of the student loan I get from Hogwarts."

"Oh." Hermione hadn't known that he would have to pay back some of the money he got for buying the school books and everything else. "And after that?"

"I'm not sure," Tom said. Then he had a pensive look on his face while a small smile tugged at the corners of his mouth.

His eyes wandered back to Hermione and he stared at her as if he was deciding if he should tell her or not. After some time he began in a soft tone, "You know, I've never really left England. It's only ever been London or Hogwarts." Tom paused shortly as if to contemplate something but as he continued there was this glint of excitement appearing in his eyes, "There is so much knowledge out there that's never being taught at Hogwarts. I've heard of this group of wizards in Albania for example. They have a very different grasp of magic than what we have. There's this spell they've developed. It enables you to fly, without the help of any magical item, like broomsticks. And it's said that those wizards know how to travel through dreams."

Hermione watched with joy as she saw Tom's face brighten up and his eyes seemed to glow with exaltation. He seemed so different now. She had never seen him this enthusiastic or happy even.

"I want to go there," he said as he smiled at Hermione. "I want to find that knowledge. What we learn at Hogwarts is not nearly enough."

Hermione looked at Tom and found herself captivated by this exciting glint in his eyes. And where did that strange fluttery feeling in her stomach come from?

"You are doing it again." Hermione was brought out of her train of thought as she heard Tom's voice.

She raised her eyebrows at him.

"You are staring at me," he said. "Are my plans so stupid that you don't know what to say anymore?"

Hermione smiled at him, "No, they are wonderful."

"What are your plans for the future then, Hermione?" Tom asked her.

Instantly, Hermione's smile dropped from her face and her eyes widened a little as she stared at Tom.
Her plans for the future? For her own future? Honestly, she didn't have any. Or did 'staying alive until you complete your mission' count as a plan for the future? Probably not.

Hermione remembered that before she had left Hogwarts and had entered the battlefield, as she still had been this innocent girl, she had had dreams and plans for the future. Lots of them. Some of them silly or unrealistic like working with SPEW. Others had been more down to earth, like trying to become a healer or working as a researcher at the Ministry of Magic. But then, the war had caught up with her and her dreams had somehow died. There hadn't been room for dreams any longer.
Dreams were dangerous, especially if you didn't know whether you would survive the next month or not. Since the last two years, Hermione hadn't dared to dream anymore. What could she dream about anyway? There was nothing. Nothing she wished for, nothing she needed. She had had all the things she would ever need but then they had been ripped from her. Her family, her friends, her love…

Hermione looked up and found herself staring into a pair of grey eyes which unexpectedly shone with…

…concern?

Tom eyed Hermione and regretted having posed the question. As he had asked her about her plans after graduation her formerly so cheerful face had suddenly shut down completely. She had even looked a little scared. And now that Hermione glanced up at him, Tom was shocked by the sorrow and desolation screaming at him through her hazel eyes. He had seen this horrible look on her face once before, at Christmas as he had found her in her room at the Leaky Cauldron. Back then she had had the same expression on her face. Now her eyes and her every movement were radiating off this despair, grief and hopelessness again.

Hermione was very good at hiding this pain but Tom now realized that it seemed to be a part of her.
He found himself again wondering what had happened to her that had caused this sorrow which seemed to be so deeply engrained in her very being. To his own surprise he felt a familiar fury building up in him and taking hold of his mind. He desperately wanted to know what had caused Hermione's pain and then he would make sure that whoever did that to her would regret having hurt her very much. No-one was allowed to hurt her – if he didn't permit it.

Then Hermione broke eye contact with him and the plea in her eyes remained unspoken. She stared down at her hands, seemingly completely lost in thoughts, or in her memories? Tom continued to watch her. He had feared she would cry again like she had back at Christmas. But she didn't. Suddenly her brown eyes flashed back at him and she said in a soft but otherwise firm voice,

"I don't have any plans."

Then she averted her eyes again and seemed to get lost in her own thoughts again. "I don't have a future I could make plans for," she whispered in a hollow tone and Tom doubted she had noticed that she had spoken those words out loud.

Then Hermione breathed in and as she looked back at him Tom could see that the pain was gone from her eyes, hidden somewhere inside of her where he couldn't see it any longer. But he knew it was still there.

Hermione was surprised by the softness she could see on Tom's face as she looked up at him again. There was still a certain amount of concern shining through his eyes. She chastised herself for making him worry. She had wanted to cheer him up and not pull him into her own problems.

_I need to get a grip on myself!_ She wouldn't permit herself to drown in self-pity. That was pathetic.

Hermione smiled at Tom and then said, "So, how about going outdoors a little? I still need to show you that beautiful view I had from that hilltop."

Tom arched one eyebrow at her and Hermione had the impression that he wanted to discuss her awkward behaviour some more. But surprisingly he didn't say anything and dropped the topic. She was grateful because she didn't think she could stand the thought of her past any longer and right now she wouldn't have been able to make up a believable lie to cover up the not so peaceful parts of her life.

Tom eyed Hermione. It certainly wasn't very satisfying to not be able to find out what had happened to her. But he knew it wouldn't help his matter if he pressed her right now. And he didn't want her to feel even sadder. He nearly laughed out loud at that thought. Since when did he care about how other people felt? Normally he wouldn't have hesitated to wrench the secret out of Hermione. He wouldn't have cared about how much he would hurt her in the process. No, he would have used any means possible to get her to spill her secrets and he wouldn't have given a damn about how she would feel about it.

He shuddered as he remembered that he had done just that already. And for a completely useless reason, too. He glanced at Hermione and remembered how she had lain at his feet as he had hit her with the Cruciatus curse. He had hurt her, back then. Very much. He watched as Hermione stood up from her chair and started to clean up the table with a wave of her wand. Tom looked at her.

Then he said in a quiet voice, "Hermione… I am sorry."

Hermione stopped waving her wand and she heard how one of the plates crashed down on the floor. What did he just say? She looked down at Tom who still sat at the table. He was staring at her. The blank mask was back in place, she noted frustrated. But she knew that he always wore that face when he wanted to really hide his emotions. Hermione's gaze locked onto his eyes. She was startled by the storm of emotions she could see raging behind his grey eyes.
What had happened? What was he sorry about?

Tom had obviously seen her perplexed expression as he now said in a low voice while he still stared at her, "I'm sorry I used the Cruciatus curse on you."

Hermione's eyebrows shot up. She was astonished. She had never thought she would see the day when Tom Riddle apologized for something. She had nearly forgotten that incident. It seemed to be ages ago. Back then Tom hadn't been 'Tom' yet, he had been 'Riddle' or, even worse, 'Voldemort'. Hermione remembered how scared she had been of him. As he had used that evil curse on her she had been scared to death. She had been convinced that he would kill her.

Hermione was still gazing at Tom. There was so much softness in his grey eyes. Hermione wondered how those could be the same eyes that had once radiated this bottomless hate as they had looked at her. She walked towards Tom, rounded the table and stopped right in front of him. He looked up at her, with slightly raised eyebrows. Hermione could see a guarded expression on his face, as if he tried to steel himself for her accusing him now. She bent down and hugged him. He tensed as she wrapped her arms around him.

"It's okay. I forgive you," she whispered in his ear, Hermione closed her eyes and squeezed Tom even tighter as she felt his arms slowly, almost cautiously, embracing her in return. After a while, she ended the embrace and bent up again. She smiled down at Tom who looked at her in surprise and with a rather charming looking insecurity on his face. He was really very handsome, Hermione thought as she stared down at him.

She could feel her face heating up and she quickly turned away from him. Hermione cleared her throat and then said in an embarrassed sounding voice, "Now, that that's straightened out, how about going outdoors?"

---

They walked along a narrow trail. Hermione's winter boots sank with each step into the soft coldness of the snow. She breathed in the cool winter air and then let her gaze wander over the wilderness of the Scottish highlands.

Hermione smiled and said, turned to Tom, "It's beautiful, isn't it?"

He was following behind her. The cold winter wind was ruffling up his dark hair. As he looked at her with his blank face, Hermione was almost sure that she could see a small smile tugging at his mouth. They continued to follow the trail for a while but then it started to snow and thick, fat snowflakes were falling down on the already snowy mountains and the two wanderers passing through the nature. Hermione wrapped her rough cloak tighter around herself. It was starting to get colder. But just as she was thinking about apparating back to their tent she spotted a place where the rock was forming a small cave. Underneath the rock was a relatively dry patch which could shelter them from the wind and snow.

"Let's rest for a while," she said to Tom as she pointed to the protected space under the overhanging rock.

He nodded and Hermione set off towards the small cavern in the rock. As she reached the protected place she sat down and leaned with her back against the rocky wall. Tom sat down beside her and Hermione smiled at him.

"Now we only need a little bit of warmth, huh?" she asked as she flicked her wrist and her wand landed in her hand.

She brandished the wand and whispered, "Ferventer tectum."

No visible spell left her wand but the cold wind instantly stopped and the air around them started to heat up distinctly. In the end it was warm enough for them to take off their winter cloaks. Hermione sighed contently and leaned her head back against the stone wall.

"Ah, that's better," she whispered.

They were sitting for some time in this small, protected cave. Hermione watched the snowflakes falling down, adding to the already thick blanket of snow that covered the ground outside of their shelter.

"Can I ask you something?" Tom suddenly said out of no-where.

Hermione turned her head towards him and eyed him. He was looking at her and again had his impenetrable, blank mask in place.

"Sure," Hermione said slowly.

"Yesterday, when you apparated us away from the orphanage, you apparated directly into the Leaky Cauldron," Tom said in a quiet voice and Hermione instantly tensed because she could see where this was going.

"How did you do that?"

She stared at him with wide eyes. What could she tell him now? He was right. Hermione hadn't thought about it at all but it was supposed to be impossible to apparate inside of Diagon Alley. But she had just done that. Of course she knew how she had managed it. She had obviously used the Elder Magic again to break through the wards. But Tom wasn't supposed to know that. Hermione eyed Tom again. He was still looking at her expectantly.

"It wasn't that hard," Hermione said trying to play down the issue. "No big-"

"-no big deal." Tom said thus ending Hermione's sentence for her. "You've said that before. About the Ministry's wards against the underage use of magic that you have somehow disabled. Which is equally impossible, I might add," Tom said in a calm voice. But Hermione knew that he was now very interested in the matter.

"So how did you apparate through the wards?" he continued. "And please don't tell me that it is no big deal because it is."

Then he looked at her, his eyebrows raised questioningly. Hermione was starting to get very nervous. It was out of the question to answer him truthfully. If she told him about the Elder Magic, she would have to tell him about the Elder Wand and then about her time travel. Then why not mention Lord Voldemort and the war? And if she was at it anyway, why not throw in information about Harry Potter? Hermione sighed tiredly. She couldn't tell Tom, but she didn't want to lie to him either.

"Well, my dear Tom, it just so appears that I am an amazing witch then. And you were witness of my incredible, magic-revolutionizing abilities," Hermione told him in a mock-conceited voice, deciding to revert to humor instead of a real answer.

Tom instantly began to scowl at her. Of course he was now angry with her. But Hermione couldn't help that now. There was no way she could be honest with him, at least not in this matter. But he would surely get over it, she reasoned with herself. She nervously nestled with a strand of her hair as she glanced at Tom who still looked at her through narrowed eyes. He seemed to be really annoyed by her now. Hermione felt rather guilty because she couldn't tell him the truth.

But as Tom was glaring at her so enraged something struck her. If Tom had looked at her this angered a few weeks ago she would have been very scared by him. She certainly wouldn't have felt guilty for having to lie to him. It seemed, without Hermione having noticed it, their relationship had fundamentally changed. For, if she had dared to speak to him like that a few weeks ago, he wouldn't have been sitting so calmly beside her anymore. He would be attacking her right now, threatening or cursing her.

"Hermione, your evasiveness is slowly getting on my nerves!" Tom finally huffed frustrated.

She looked at his disgruntled face for a second but then she couldn't hold back anymore and started to laugh.

Tom stared at Hermione as she broke out into laughter. His anger at her secretive behaviour was instantly forgotten. He had never seen her laugh this gaily. It was a pleasant and somehow innocent sound. This was a completely new facet of her. The guardedness that normally surrounded her like a wall was completely gone. It felt like he now saw the true Hermione for the first time. He hadn't even known that she could be so free and at ease. Tom was baffled at how beautiful she looked right now. It was like she was radiating off serenity. Then Hermione's laughter eased up though giggles were still shaking her body as she watched Tom, seemingly still very amused. Her hazel eyes were shining with laughter as she beamed at him.

Tom was captivated by this strange girl sitting beside him. Hermione was a mystery. She was a strong and powerful witch and yet sometimes she appeared to be so vulnerable and fragile. She could be a fierce opponent but there was also so much kindness in her actions. Tom stared at her sitting beside him. She still smiled so warmly and her eyes shone excitingly as she looked at him.

Later, Tom wouldn't be able to say why he did what he did next. It seemed that for the first time in his life his otherwise so rational mind was deserting him. He reached out for Hermione and cupped her cheeks in his hands. Her pretty eyes were widening in surprise. Then Tom leaned forward and placed a light kiss on her soft, enticing lips.

Hermione was taken by surprise as she felt his lips on hers. Tom was kissing her tenderly and his hands were holding her face gently. Hermione's head began to swirl and she was suddenly very grateful for those warm hands holding her in place. She closed her eyes and surrendered herself to the bliss of the moment.

Then, too soon, he broke from her. Hermione opened her eyes again and looked up at Tom's face. He was scanning her with his impossible grey eyes. She could see demanding expectation in his eyes and even a certain amount of smugness. But she wasn't so easy to fool, she had learned to look underneath his many masks. He was wearing a mask right now. Hermione locked her eyes with his. And then she could glimpse it. Aside from the self-satisfaction he was certainly feeling right now, there was also something else. And if Hermione wasn't much mistaken, Tom felt a little bit insecure at the moment. Maybe even afraid to be rejected.

Without thinking she reached out for him and placed her hand gently on his shoulder, then she leaned into him. This time it were Tom's eyes that widened as Hermione placed her mouth onto his. But his surprise quickly vanished and he responded to her kiss. She felt him wrapping his arms around her waist and pulling her closer to him. One of Hermione's hands was ruffling through his silky soft, jet-black hair as she deepened the kiss and Tom complied with her.
It felt so good and right. There was this long lost happiness taking a hold of her. It was a very long time ago since last she had felt this happy. Why was she supposed to hate Tom again? She couldn't remember right now. The only thing she was aware of were his lips on her own, kissing her so wonderfully. And his hands holding her so tightly that she was pressed against his chest, the velvety feeling of his hair in her hand, his pleasant scent and the comforting heat his body was radiating. She felt his hand glide up her back and pleasant shivers followed his movements. His hand continued up her back, her neck until he held her head gently while his other arm still pressed her against his body. Hermione's heart beat so fast, her head swirled and there was a familiar fluttery feeling in her stomach.

Then Tom broke the kiss. Hermione breathed out softly before she opened her eyes and looked up at him. He stared down at her, his stormy, grey eyes swirling with emotion. It was a mixture of so many emotions, she couldn't identify them. But what made his face look so otherworldly beautiful now was the contentment Tom was radiating. The same contentment Hermione was feeling right now. Never before had she seen that look on his face.

Slowly a smile was beginning to take shape on his face. At first it was a small curl of his lips, then he was beaming down at her. Hermione couldn't help but smile at him in return. With that smile on his face Tom was looking so incredibly handsome. Hermione couldn't have stopped herself even if she had wanted to. She leaned in to him before she again brushed her lips against his. Then she wrapped her arms around him, snuggled against him and put her head on his chest. All the while she could feel Tom's arms holding her tightly.

They stayed like this for some time. The snow continued to fall around them but they were protected from the coldness by Hermione's spell and the contentment they both felt.

---

Her spell, that still protected their little shelter from the snow outside, was slowly fading but Hermione wasn't feeling cold. She was still leaning into Tom, resting her head on his chest. His arms were wrapped around her, protecting her from the cold. Then she could feel him running his fingers gently through her hair.

"I like your hair," Tom muttered in a low voice.

Hermione snuggled even closer to him and sighed contently as Tom's fingers continued to caress her so gently.

"You would be the first one," Hermione whispered into the fabric of his jumper.

She felt Tom bending down to her and placing a light, tingling kiss on her forehead.

"Let's go back, shall we?" Hermione heard Tom's melodious voice whisper in her ear.

She nodded her head only reluctantly. She didn't want to go. She wanted to stay like this forever. Here in this little world which seemed to be so conveniently separated from real life. Her sorrow and grief were for once forgotten. Just the happiness remained.

But her spell had now almost stopped working and the cold winter air was starting to blow icily into the small cavern, invading their little world. Hermione raised her head and looked up at Tom. He was smirking down at her. But her heart skipped a few beats as she saw this new softness shining in his grey eyes. Before she could think about what she was doing she had wrapped her arms around his neck and pulled his head down to her. Then she quickly pressed her lips against his. Hermione could feel Tom's arms tighten around her as he pressed her against him and started to nibble at her lip.

After a while, in which her brain seemed to have momentarily stopped working, Tom released her again. Then he grabbed her hand and pulled her up with him into a standing position. They both stepped out of the cover the little cave provided. Hermione followed behind Tom, very conscious of the warm hand that was clasping her own.

She still felt somehow lightheaded and that fluttery feeling in her stomach didn't leave her either. Hermione knew that feeling very well. But she had been so sure it had left her forever. Since that horrible day in the Ministry of Magic, Hermione had been convinced to never ever feel this way again. But here she was, feeling this incredibly happy while her eyes wandered over the person walking in front of her. Hermione watched Tom's smooth dark hair, his broad shoulders and his pale hand holding her so unexpectedly gentle. She could feel her heart skipping a few beats. There were so many reasons why she shouldn't feel that way, why it was reprehensible. But all doubts she may have had were smothered by this incredible joy she now felt.

They stepped into the magical tent. Hermione felt strangely lost as Tom let finally go of her hand.

"I didn't think I would like our little walk but I have to say it was rather enjoyable," Tom said with a wide smirk on his face as he sat down on the sofa.

Hermione could feel a blush hitting her face and was rather surprised by that. Normally she wasn't easy to embarrass. But it seemed Tom had a huge influence on her.

Well, I am acting strange around him. She thought as she strolled over to Tom sitting on the sofa. Right from the very start, actually.

Hermione sat down beside Tom on the sofa, a distance away from him. She was actually a little unsure of herself. Or of Tom's feelings, for that matter. So she glanced at him. He was sitting there with his arms nonchalantly spread out on the backrest of the sofa and still smirked at her rather smugly. But Hermione tried not to be impressed by this self-satisfaction he displayed. True enough, if she ignored his smirk, she could still see the softness in his grey eyes as they sparkled at her.

Hermione bit down on her lip as her eyes wandered over Tom's form. She had already kissed him and that had been entirely too pleasurable to start having doubts about it now. So she decided to just trust her instincts for the time being. She hesitantly skidded nearer to Tom until she sat right beside him. As if he had waited for that Tom lifted his arm from the backrest, wrapped it around her and pulled her over to him so that Hermione leaned against his chest. She sighed softly and closed her eyes as she leaned into Tom. It was so long ago since someone had held her. Just held her. It was now, at this very moment, that Hermione realized how much she had missed that.

After some time, she voiced something that had been on her mind since Tom had kissed her so gently.

No, since he has stopped cursing me at every opportunity.

So, Hermione whispered in a soft voice, "I thought you didn't like me."

She could feel Tom shift a bit then he wrapped his arm a little tighter around her before he answered in a slightly mocking voice while his fingers caressed her cheek gently,"If I remember correctly, it was you who started this little quarrel between us. So it should be me asking why you seemed to hate me right from the start of our acquaintance."

Hermione's eyes shot open and she looked up at Tom's face. Ready to tell him that it had not been her who had started this 'war' between the two of them.
But instead she blurted out, "I don't hate you, Tom."

Hermione's eyes widened as she realized that it was true. She might have hated Voldemort, with all her being. Tom was Voldemort. But right now there was no hate. It seemed the white-hot hate, that had been her constant companion since at least the last two years, had left her. It was a relief to look into those grey eyes and not feel hate and fear any longer.

But it was bliss as she didn't find that incomparably deeper, all-consuming hate burning behind those beautiful grey eyes either.

Hermione looked in amazement into his soft grey eyes as Tom continued to stare down at her, his smirk finally abandoned. She could see something flicker in his eyes. But it was gone before she had the chance to recognize what it was. Then, unexpectedly, he bent down to her and placed his lips onto hers. Hermione's eyes fluttered shut as she felt him kissing her again. This time, though, Tom wasn't so gentle anymore as he pressed his lips, almost desperately, against hers. He was less restrained, less hesitant. His arms around her were possessive and demanding. Hermione's arms wrapped around his neck and pulled him even closer as she responded to his kiss just as passionate as he was.

It was different than the first kiss they had shared but it was equally exiting and enjoyable, she thought as she could feel his hands roaming her body while his every touch left behind a burning, tingling sensation on her skin.

---

Later that day found Hermione standing in the small bathroom and staring in shock at her reflection in the mirror.

What had happened? What had she done?

Her brain must have momentarily stopped working. That had never happened to her before. She was normally such a rational person. As she looked at her reflection her wide eyes slowly wandered to her mouth.

Why had she allowed him to kiss her? That was wrong in so many ways. Had she forgotten who he was? Did she really have to spell it out?

He was Lord Voldemort! The Dark Lord, for God's sake! The very person that had murdered so many of her friends. The person that had thrown the country into war and by the way had destroyed her life. How could it be that she felt something else than aversion when he was kissing her? Even worse, not only had she allowed him to kiss her, no, she had even initiated one of their kisses.

Really, what was wrong with her?

She had enjoyed it even. How could she? Hermione was inwardly disgusted by herself. At some point she had enjoyed it so much, she had completely forgotten who he was. What he was to become.

But he is so different! a small voice spoke up inside her. That was also true. Hermione had to admit reluctantly. There certainly were some things that separated Tom Riddle from Lord Voldemort. He was definitely more human than his older counterpart. But was that enough?

Hermione skimmed with her fingers over her lips, still staring blankly at her reflexion.

She had told him so today but did she really forgive Tom? Forgive the things he had done to her in the future? Hermione didn't even know whether it was her place to forgive him. She hadn't died after all. That had been her friends. And countless innocent people along with them.

On the other side, how could she blame Tom for the things Voldemort had done to her? Sure they were one and the same person but Tom was yet innocent of the crimes that had happened to her. Did she do him wrong by accusing him of crimes that hadn't even happened yet?

In the last week she had practically lived with him. She had seen his true self. He wasn't exactly a very kind person but he wasn't cruel either. At least not always. Somehow, she did like him. And there was still this strange protectiveness she felt for him. So many bad things had happened to Tom. Now that she knew about them, she could even understand why he had started to hate people so much.

But still, he is the Dark Lord!

Hermione breathed in deeply, trying to calm herself. But it didn't work for there was another alarming thing she had to think about. As Tom had kissed her there had been that feeling. A feeling she had buried and thought lost. Hermione hadn't experienced that feeling very often in her life but whenever it had hit her it had hit hard.

The first time she had felt like this was a long time ago. Hermione smiled fondly as she remembered Simon Hillson, a boy from her neighbourhood. She had really liked him. It had been a silly infatuation of a child. But still that feeling had been the same as he had finally kissed her during the summer before she had gone off to Hogwarts. Then there had been Viktor Krum. Hermione had felt very flattered as Viktor had shown interest in her. He had been older than her after all. Even though their relationship hadn't lasted long Hermione could still remember the happiness as they had spent time together.

And then… then there had been Ron. Hermione had to breathe in deeply as her thoughts wandered to her last boyfriend. Though boyfriend wasn't the right word to describe what Ron had been to her. He had been her companion, friend, lover. He had been her world, her everything. Hermione had loved him very much. She had been so sure that they would marry one day, never to be separated again. But then things had happened. War had struck and Ron had died.

That war had taken so much from her. It had destroyed her. Piece after piece of her just broke. And those images, those horrible images… they never left her alone…

Since the war had started, since so many of her beloved ones had died, it had felt like she herself had stopped living, too. She had still fought on, tried to accomplish their mission, but she felt so hollow inside. It was like being trapped in a nightmare. Like her soul had been sucked from her. Everything had been taken from her, her friends, her family, Ron, just to be replaced by that unbearable grief.

In a way that existence was worse than death and Hermione had often silently wished for death to claim her. Like He had claimed so many of her friends.

Hermione opened the tap and cupped the water in her hands before she plunged her face in the cold water. Then she reached for a towel.

As Tom had kissed her that terrible hollow feeling had somehow stopped tearing at her. He had been able to drive away that aching loneliness that was eating her away. She had been able to forget and to start to feel alive again. Tom had held her, he had comforted her and he had kissed her. If Hermione was honest, she had to admit that she had enjoyed every single minute of it. She couldn't remember when that change in her feelings towards Tom had taken place but it was now undeniable.
As she had arrived back here in the forties and had met Tom for the first time, she had hated him. Hated him with the same ferocity she had hated Lord Voldemort with. Tom hadn't given her much reason to do otherwise. He had been cold, pitiless and cruel. Just like his older counterpart from her time period had been. Now though, that hate was gone. No trace was left of it. It somehow had vanished during the process. A completely different feeling had overwhelmed her as Tom had kissed her.

But, Hermione though in anguish, he is still Lord Voldemort.

Tom was pacing. Many thoughts were running through his head right now.

At first he had been a little unsettled by his sudden impulsiveness. He never acted impulsive, at least not when a girl was involved. Girls didn't normally make him nervous. Usually he just had to use his charm and the girls were willing to do just anything for him. Honestly, it wasn't much of a challenge. So, Tom rather had a lot of experience with the opposite sex. He hadn't just kissed them, no, he had slept with many of them. But all those girls had been dispensable. He had never cared for the girls, the only thing he ever had in mind was his own pleasure. If one girl started to make demands or if she just bored Tom, he had quickly dumped her without a second thought. After all, there were so many girls and they were so easy to get. With his looks and his charm he had never had problems to get a girl into his bed. So, it was safe to say that no girl ever managed to make him nervous in any way.

What was it then that had made him act so impetuous now? That was a question going through Tom's head. But another, perhaps the most important question was what drew him towards the girl he had just kissed so impulsively?

For there was no denying it, he was drawn to her. Thinking back he had been drawn to her for quite some time now. Admittedly though, back at Hogwarts that attraction towards her had been fueled more by hate than anything else. He had taken notice of her for the first time shortly after her arrival at Hogwarts when she had just ignored him. That had been novel to him, a girl ignoring him. It had irked him but nothing more. Then after their duel during this DADA class and her consistent defiance he had started to see her as an opponent. Someone he had to fight and to subdue.

Now the incentive had changed but the result remained to be the same. He was drawn to her. It had been that inexplicable attraction that had confused him and had led to him kissing her today. But now, he knew. As he had kissed her and had held her so close he had finally been able to see the cause for his attraction towards her.

Tom stopped his pacing and sat down on the sofa.

It was strange, really, but now that he understood the motivation behind his actions he was surprised that it took him this long to realize it. For whenever Hermione was around him, there was this feeling coming over him. It was strange that this familiar feeling should be directed at her. He hadn't expected something like this to happen. That might be the reason why he had needed this long to recognize the feeling, Tom thought as he looked down at his hands.

On his right hand he still wore that shiny golden ring. The very ring he had once stolen from Morfin Gaunt.

No, not stolen, Tom thought as he stared at the gold-ring with the black stone. That ring was rightfully his after all. He had just reclaimed it. He could still remember the feeling of superiority as he had taken the ring from his unconscious uncle. That sottish old bastard hadn't been able to stop him because he was disgustingly weak. As Tom had paid his uncle a visit in Little Hangleton he actually had had other things on his mind than obtaining that family heirloom. But as he had seen the ring he had known that it belonged to no-one else but him. He had wanted to own it. He had needed to get it. And all of this had been accompanied by this feeling. A well known feeling. For the golden ring was just one example from many as this feeling, this desire, had overwhelmed him.

It was that very same feeling which took a hold of him whenever he looked at Hermione.

Greed.

Just like the ring, she meant something. She was important. That witch was mysterious and she was valuable.

Powerful…

Tom looked down at his hands. He had to admit it, even though it was strange. But this avidly feeling was somehow directed at her now. He wanted to possess her, to own her. She belonged to him. Like the ring, she was rightfully his. No-one else but him was allowed to have something so valuable.

To acquire her, though, would be a lot more difficult than getting the ring. He couldn't just claim her like he had done with the ring. It wouldn't be easy to bend her to his will and to force her to submit to him, she was too strong and stubborn. But she was his now and he wasn't going to relinquish his ownership ever again.

Tom heard the door to the bathroom open and looked up. Hermione walked out of the bathroom and Tom caught his breath as he noticed that she was again wearing this ridiculously short nighty. The pants were not even covering half her thighs and the shirt was, well, sleeveless and tight.

She smiled at him, though rather hesitantly he noticed, and then hopped down on the sofa beside him. She sat on her knees, leaning with her side on the back of the sofa and faced Tom. His gaze wandered over her form, sitting beside him. It was back again, that greedy feeling.

Hermione leaned leisurely on the soft leather sofa she had transfigured from one of the beds yesterday. Briefly she had toyed with the idea of just running away and leaving her disturbing feelings behind. But to her increased annoyance she found herself unable to abandon Tom like that. So now she was still here and felt rather tired after this long and quite eventful day. Hermione's eyes wandered to Tom sitting beside her. He seemed to scan her form, taking very long to do that.

What is he thinking about? Hermione wondered and raised her eyebrows in question.

After a while Tom asked in a quiet voice, "You are not wearing that at Hogwarts, do you?"

Hermione frowned. What? She looked down on herself. She was wearing her favourite pyjama. How happy she had been as she had found it in the beaded bag. That is rather pathetic, come to think of it. But what was Tom's problem with the clothes? Okay, they were for hot summer days… Hmm, maybe they were not as forties compatible as she had thought.

"What's wrong with that?"

"Well, it's tight and… and short."

Hermione grinned at him and then poked him in the side as she said in a mock-surprised tone, "Mr Riddle, you are rather prim, aren't you?"
"No, I just don't want those Gryffindor idiots seeing you like this," Tom mumbled.

Hermione chuckled at him. "I'm not dancing around the common room in this if that's what you fear."

Then she yawned and stretched her arms. "I'm tired. I think I'm going to sleep."

She stiffened as Tom suddenly leaned towards her. His hand was skimming gently over her shoulder as he brushed his lips against hers. Then he whispered in her ear with his smooth voice,

"Good night, Hermione."

"Good night," she managed to stammer flustered.

She couldn't resist anymore. The warm feeling was back again. The feeling she had told herself was inappropriate. It engulfed her once more and made her forget all her resolutions. So despite the fact that her mind was screaming at her to stop, Hermione leaned towards Tom and placed a light kiss on his lips. Then she got up from the couch rather hastily so that she missed that infamous smirk playing around Tom's mouth. She walked over to her bed and sank down into the soft mattress before she pulled the blanket over herself.

What a day it had been, she thought as she curled up on the bed.

Was it really just two months ago that she had arrived here in the forties? It felt like more. It felt like a different lifetime actually. She had been so lost and alone as she had appeared on that meadow after travelling decades back in time. And now she was again in the middle of nowhere but not lost anymore, not alone. Tom was here with her. Sure she shouldn't forget who he was but it was such a painfully long time ago that she had last felt this secure and... happy even.

Yes, it was grotesque, that she felt secure and protected in the presence of Tom Riddle. Before, his name had only evoked fear and hate in her. But now if she was honest with herself she was glad to have him around. Hermione noticed her thoughts slowing down as sleep was taking over her brain. She was already half-asleep as a last thought ran through her head. How can you be happy when you are betraying your friends?

_Hermione watched helplessly as Ron spun around and his eyes widened in shock as he saw the green curse coming towards him. It was too late he had no time to dodge it. The light hit him square in the chest. Hermione could only watch in horror as he fell backwards and hit the floor where he remained lying. Ron was dead..._

_Something was not right with Harry. He was in pain. And... he was clutching his scar. "I'm sorry. He is too strong. Finish him!" It seemed each word cost Harry tremendous effort to get out. He closed his eyes, his hands again holding his forehead and his whole body trembled. Suddenly the trembling stopped and Harry removed his hands slowly from his face. But as he opened his eyes again they weren't green anymore. They were glowing red. Hermione looked into his eyes. Those red orbs were so full of hate-

"Hermione?"

"Hermione, wake up!"

Hermione's eyes shot open and looked into a pair of worried grey eyes. Her breathing was fast and ragged. She tried to sit up in her bed and noticed that her whole body was shaking. A warm hand was clutching her shoulder gently, supporting her.
"Hermione?" a soft voice asked her.

She looked up and found Tom crouched beside her bed, looking at her worriedly while he still held her shoulder reassuringly. Hermione breathed in deeply and brought a hand to her face. She was surprised to find it wet. Sweat? No, tears! She frowned and then looked back at Tom.

"Nightmare?" he asked her in his soothing voice.

Hermione nodded.

"Are you okay now?" Tom asked her.

"… yes," she breathed in a hoarse voice.

She was still shaky so she lay down again and closed her eyes. Then she felt Tom caressing her cheeks gently, wiping away the tears before he got up, intending to walk back to his own bed. Hermione opened her eyes again and then before he could walk away she clasped his wrist.

"Please… stay," she whispered.

Tom looked at her for a moment, then he sat down on her bed and slipped under the blanket beside her. Hermione quickly huddled against him and she could feel his arms pulling her towards him. She closed her eyes and breathed in his pleasant scent while she listened to the relaxing sound of his breathing. The trembling that still shook her body was slowly wearing off as she felt Tom’s arms comforting around her.
Hermione woke up the next day. For the first time since an eternity she felt rested and relaxed. She didn't open her eyes but wanted to enjoy that content feeling some more. She snuggled deeper into her pillow which was surprisingly hard and warm. Then her still sleep muddled mind was noticing those strong arms wrapped around her gently and holding her comfortably. Hermione opened her eyes slowly. She found herself huddled against Tom's chest while he held her protectively. As she looked up she was quickly caught in the gaze of those beautiful grey orbs. Hermione stiffened. Why was he in her bed?

Okay, she thought panicky, she had kissed him yesterday, which was bad enough on its own, but why had he obviously slept in her bed?

"Good morning, Hermione," Tom said in his deep, melodious voice. Hermione could see amusement glinting in his eyes. She was pretty sure that he had been able to guess her thoughts quite accurately. Though that wasn't exactly difficult at the moment as she couldn't help but still stare at him with wide eyes.

"No more nightmares?" Tom finally asked her while a smirk tucked at his lips.

That was when it occurred to her at last. This night she had had one of her nightmares again. She couldn't remember what it had been about but it must have been bad. Then there had been Tom, Hermione remembered. Had she really asked him to stay with her?

Hermione stared up at him and replied to his question softly, "No."

Tom pulled her closer to him and she could feel him placing a kiss on her forehead as he said, "Good."

She couldn't help but relax as she felt him holding her so gently. She closed her eyes again and rested her head against Tom's chest. It was strange. Normally she would feel totally drained after having one of her nightmares. But this morning she felt good and rested. And it was the first time since she had lost Harry and Ron that she didn't feel alone anymore. How had she managed to go on for months with that ever present loneliness? It was now that she realized how much that loneliness let her suffer. Hermione didn't want to endure that painful loneliness any longer. It was unbearable. One by one her friends and members of her family had died until she was the last one left. Then she had been hurled back in time and she had ended up in a foreign world where she didn't know anyone. She had fought for so long. She had done her part to ensure peace. Wasn't it finally time to just let go?

To stop fighting?

Hermione was tired. Tired of always having to watch her back. Tired of having to wear her wand in a quickly accessible holster. Tired of seeing those terrible pictures each night when she slept. Hermione was tired from living in fear.

She had sacrificed so much. Too much!

Didn't she deserve some happiness? Wasn't it time for her to leave the battleground? She had been there for so long already. Her war, wasn't it over? Was she allowed to put her weapons away and live her life? Would her friends understand if she tried to…
Would they accept if Hermione tried to find some closure?

Suddenly Hermione could feel Tom's fingers skimming over the bare skin of her side while he asked her in a quite tone, "What are those?"

There was an electrifying feeling pleasantly flitting over Hermione's skin where he touched her. She looked down at herself. Her pyjama top had slid up a little exposing her belly and sides. Tom's slender fingers were currently skimming over the web of white scars on Hermione's skin that started at her side but she knew it extended her back upwards until it reached her right shoulder. Those scars where remnants of a very dark spell she had been hit with. Back then she had tried to protect Harry and had nearly lost her life as the curse had sliced open her body. Now Tom traced his fingers along the long and big scar that reached from her belly over to her side. She had received that scar the day she had fought in the Ministry, the day she had been hurled back in time.

"Where did you get those?" Tom again asked her quietly. Hermione saw his gaze darken somewhat as it followed the line of her scar.

"Well, I don't know," she said hesitantly. She, of course, couldn't tell Tom where exactly she got those scars. Then a mischievous glint lit up in her eyes as she said in an innocent voice, "There are so many I forgot. But-" She reached up and exposed her shoulder where she knew a fine, white line was also marring her skin. "I do remember where I got this," Hermione said as she pointed to the scar on her left shoulder.

She watched Tom raising his eyebrows before she continued, looking at him with huge eyes, "You know, there was this evil, devious Slytherin who hurled a very mean curse at poor, innocent me during a duel in DADA."

But if Hermione thought that display would make Tom feel ashamed of himself, then she was sorely mistaken as she could now watch a smirk taking form on his face.

"Did he, now?" he said in a smug voice as he touched the fine scar. "You know, maybe if you hadn't provoked said Slytherin he would never have felt the need to attack you."

"What?" Hermione huffed. "I have never provoked you!"

She narrowed her eyes at him as he chuckled amused.

"I'm surprised though," he said as he scanned the scar. "That it healed so well. The curse slows down and weakens the healing process a great deal."

Hermione still pinned him with a scowl and then said, "I know. It took me weeks to heal it."

"You didn't go to the Hospital Wing?" Tom asked her lightly.

Hermione just shook her head.

"Good, because that would have made it worse. That curse reverses every healing magic that is used on the wound it inflicted."

Hermione's eyes widened. She hadn't known that. It really was a good thing then that she hadn't returned to the Hospital Wing after the first time.
"You knew that and you still accompanied me to the Hospital Wing and didn't say anything as Madame Dulan tried to heal that cut?" Hermione asked him incredulous.

Tom just shrugged at her, "Well, we still hated each other back then."

She stared up at him rather miffed. Tom just chuckled again and then smiled sweetly at her, "Oh, come on, Hermione. That is ages ago. Don't be angry with me."

Hermione sighed. Tom should account himself lucky for being able to smile so charmingly otherwise she would have cursed him now. But as it was, she was again bewitched by his suddenly very innocent looking smile. Tom leaned down to her and kissed her softly. Hermione was caught by surprise. She hadn't yet decided if it was all right for her to kiss him. He was Tom Riddle after all. But as she felt his lips on her own she somehow found herself responding to the kiss.

As Tom ended the kiss Hermione opened her eyes and looked up at him. She wasn't that surprised to find him smirking down at her rather smugly. Strangely though, she wasn't annoyed by his smirk. Instead Hermione leaned over him and watched satisfied how Tom's eyes widened in surprise but then she only reached for his wristwatch which he had discarded on her bedside table some time during the night.

After she checked the watch her eyes flew to Tom, "Did you know how late it is? We need to be at Kings Cross at eleven!"

Tom took the watch from her and checked it while he put it around his wrist. "It's only nine. Enough time to get there," he said lightly.

"Really! …only nine," Hermione mumbled reproachfully as she pushed at Tom to get him out of the bed.

Hermione felt faint as she checked her watch again. It had taken them ages to pack everything, return to the Leaky Cauldron and then, again, pack the things they had left at the hotel. And Tom wasn't any help. On the contrary, he seemed to be rather amused by her panic. Hermione glared at him. They were currently sitting in the tube of London on their way to Kings Cross station. They couldn't apparate there. It was always full of Muggles. So they had to take the underground. As if they weren't late already, Hermione thought annoyed. She didn't want to miss the Hogwarts express. That would draw unnecessary attention towards her. And by the way, in her six years at Hogwarts she had never missed the Hogwarts express.

She checked her watch again.

"You know, we won't be any faster if you do that every minute," Tom's mocking voice told her.

Hermione's eyes flashed at him. Tom was sitting leisurely on the seat beside her and seemed to be completely at ease.

"If you weren't such a late riser, we wouldn't be tardy now," Hermione hissed at him, which, annoyingly, made the smirk on Tom's face even wider.

"I actually woke way before you did," Tom didn't hesitate to inform her in a light voice.

"Then it's still your fault we are late now. You could have woken me up," Hermione answered him, disgruntled by his good mood.
Tom suddenly bent down to her and tugged her hair behind her ear before he purred rather seductively in her ear, "Aw, but Hermione, I couldn't bring myself to wake you. You look so alluring when asleep."

Her heart sped up as she felt Tom so close by again. She could feel his warm breath against her skin and his hand skinned softly over her hair and then down her back. As his hand had reached her waist Hermione felt Tom arranging his arm around her waist so that he could pull her over to him. She was in no condition to continue her ranting as her mind seemed to have stopped working again. What was Tom doing to her? Right now, what she should do would be to spring to her feet and then get as much distance between Tom and herself as possible. But she did no such thing. Instead she closed her eyes and sighed contently as she leaned against Tom. She didn't even notice the scandalized looks the other passengers were casting her way as they saw that young woman behaving so lewdly in the middle of a tube wagon.

After some time Tom asked her in a soft voice, "Say, what did you dream about? Why do you have nightmares?"

Hermione looked up at Tom, who was scanning her with curiosity in his eyes.

"I…" she began in an uncertain voice but then stopped again. What to tell him? Maybe a part of the truth? It wouldn't hurt, Hermione thought as she looked up into Tom's grey eyes. Then she said in a soft but firm voice, "There happened some terrible things in my past, Tom. Really bad things. And sometimes I still dream about them."

Hermione watched as Tom's eyes filled with concern. But there was also something else, something darker, as he looked down at her.

"What happened?" Tom asked her.

But as Hermione didn't answer, Tom continued and now there was a dangerous tint in his voice, "Who hurt you?"

Hermione wrapped her arms around him as she whispered, "It doesn't matter. It's in the past."

In the end, they managed to arrive at Kings Cross station on time, though they had to hurry to get to platform 9 ¾. But as they stepped through the barrier separating the Muggle world from the wizarding world they could see the red Hogwarts' express still standing on the tracks. Hermione was relieved, though the arrogant smile on Tom's face was a little of a put out. The last thing that was missing was him saying something like 'I told you so!'.

So, Hermione was grateful when instead of mocking her Tom took her hand in his and led her through the people standing on the platform, waving at their children and wishing them a nice time at Hogwarts. The students were already in the train, sitting in the compartments and chatting noisily, Hermione noted as she followed Tom to the train.

After he had hoisted her trunk into the train Tom turned to Hermione and said, "I have to go to the prefects' compartment."

"Do you have to stay there the whole journey?" Hermione asked him. In her time period the prefects only had to meet shortly before the train arrived at Hogwarts.

There was a scowl on his face as he replied, "Unfortunately, yes. I really can't remember why I wanted to be a prefect in the first place. It's a pain to listen to those idiots ranting on and on about Hermione giggled at him and then said in a mock-serious voice, "Well, you could always use Legilimency and entertain yourself with looking into the other prefects' minds."

Tom looked at her pensively before he said, "I actually did that already. But it's not really packed with suspense either."

Hermione drowned him in a very stern look. "Really, Tom, you can't use Legilimency in such an irresponsible way!"

He looked down at her and she could now see one of his infamous smirks tugging at his mouth. Then he bent down to her and leaned with one hand against the wall of the train, trapping Hermione between the wall and his body.

"You really need to learn how to have fun, Hermione," he whispered sensuously into her ear.

Hermione had tensed as he had bent down to her. He was so dangerously close to her again. And she had no idea how to react to him. There actually was just one thing she should do now. But somehow she couldn't find it in herself to push him away.

Hermione turned her head a little and then said in voice that sounded a lot more confident than she actually felt, "And you need to learn how not to misuse your magic."

The only effect her light rebuke had on Tom was that his smirk grew even wider. Then he snaked his arms around her and pulled her against him.

"You know me. I would never do something like that," he whispered wryly in his silky voice before he gently brushed his lips against her own.

He again kissed her. And again she didn't do anything to stop him, Hermione thought frustrated. It seemed as if her body didn't want to obey her anymore and reacted to Tom in a way it really wasn't supposed to. After a while Tom let go of her again and bend up.

"Do you want me to help you carry your trunk to your compartment?" he asked her in his smooth voice.

Hermione stuttered, "No, it's okay. I can manage." Then she breathed in deeply and tried to calm herself down again. "Don't want you to lose your important prefect status because you were late on my account," she said teasingly before she took the handle of her trunk in one hand and pulled it after her in direction of the compartments.

As Hermione walked down the train she noticed that they were already moving. She had to walk down almost the whole length of the train until she finally found her Gryffindor friends sitting in one compartment. Hermione slid open the door and stepped into the compartment. She smiled at its three occupants. Lupin was sitting right beside the window with a book in his hands. Longbottom and Weasley were sitting opposite each other and obviously played some exploding snaps. All three heads shot up as Hermione entered the compartment.

"Hermione!" Longbottom exclaimed while he beamed at her in joy. "We already thought you've missed the train."

"Yeah, why so late, Mione?" Weasley asked.

"Hi," Hermione greeted her friends happily. Somehow she had missed their carefree and easy going
"Yes, I'm glad I managed."

"Come on, sit down!" Longbottom said and patted on the seat beside him. "You've gotta tell us about your holidays."

"Please, Marc," Lupin said in his composed voice. "Let her settle down first." Then he looked at Hermione and smiled. "How was your holiday Hermione? Had fun?"

Hermione smiled at him while she sat down beside Longbottom. "It was quite exciting," she said and leaned back in her chair.

_The Hogwarts express, Hermione thought fondly, Who would have thought I'll ever use it again?_

They arrived at Hogsmeade station late in the evening. The train ride had been quite enjoyable for Hermione. She liked it to have her three Gryffindor friends around again. She had missed them after all. They took her mind off her worries. That was a good thing because Hermione didn't want to think about Tom any longer. She was now back at Hogwarts with plenty of room to keep out of his way. As they were climbing the carriages that would bring them back to Hogwarts Hermione admired again the beauty of the threstrals harnessed in front of the vehicles.

"What ya staring at?" Longbottom asked her.

She forced her gaze away from those amazing creatures and smiled at Longbottom. "Nothing really." Then she took his arm and tugged him into the carriage where Lupin and Weasley were already waiting for them. "Let's go!"

As Hermione sat in the carriage she looked out of the window. Her gaze quickly fell on Tom. He was obviously preoccupied with his prefect duties and was currently trying not to lose one of the first and second years. Hermione furrowed her brow. She hadn't even noticed that she had been searching for him until her eyes had fallen on him.

_The break is over, Hermione told herself. It's time to return to reality again. I still have a mission to complete!_

She felt the carriage move as it began its journey towards the castle. They had just reached the boundaries of Hogwarts grounds as Hermione suddenly felt a prickling tingle all over her body. It wasn't exactly a painful experience but it was certainly not pleasant either. It felt like pins and needles on her skin. It was similar to the feeling of blood rushing back into a limp that had gone numb. Hermione rubbed her arms as she stared out of the carriage window. The feeling of pins and needles on her skin left her slowly.

What was that strange feeling right now?

As Hermione stared out of the window searching for the cause of this sudden strange feeling she noticed that they had now entered Hogwarts grounds. Was there a connection between this feeling and entering Hogwarts? Hermione wondered and let her gaze travel towards the castle. She gasped in surprise as her eyes fell on the castle. It was dark already and the castle proudly stood, illuminated by its windows, still some distance away. But what made Hermione catch her breath now was this bright blue sheen that was encasing the whole castle. The light radiated off the stone walls of the castle and seemed to pulse brighter in regular intervals, like the castle was alive and breathing.

"Something wrong?" Hermione heard Lupin's voice ask.
She turned away from that strange sight in front of her and turned to Lupin.

"Can you see that?" she asked weakly while pointing towards the blue glowing castle.

Lupin frowned his brow as he looked at the castle. Longbottom and Weasley were leaning out of the other window in their carriage and stared at the castle.

"No! What do you mean, Hermione?" she heard Longbottom's muffled voice from beside her.

"Yeah, there's nothing out of the ordinary," Lupin said as his gaze wandered over the castle.

Hermione's eyes shot back at the castle but the blue sheen was still there. Why couldn't the others see it?

She breathed in deeply to calm herself and then said, "It just looked like the Great Hall wasn't yet lit up. I thought the house elves have forgotten that today's start of the next semester."

Longbottom leaned back in his seat and shook his head at Hermione, then he said amused, "Really. Would that have been so bad? You can't wait for school to start again, eh? I wouldn't mind to extent the holidays some more."

She breathed out relieved. It seemed her friends didn't notice that something was wrong. Though Lupin did cast her a curious glance. Hermione's eyes wandered back to the castle. It was still there. That pulsing blue light.

What in Merlin's name is that?

The nearer her carriage came to the castle the more Hermione could feel that pulsing, too. It was like a small vibration going through her own magic. And the whole thing had started as the carriage had passed Hogwarts' boundaries, Hermione remembered. Was this some new protection the teachers had put up during the break? But then, why was she the only one who could feel and see this magic? Hermione was sure now, that that blue sheen was magic. The feeling of that force was too familiar not to notice.

But still, why was she the only one who could see it?

Her gaze wandered over the blue illuminated castle. Hogwarts' grounds were protected by strong charms and spells, warding magic, to protect the castle and its inhabitants. The tingling she had sensed while entering Hogwarts' grounds combined with that bluish sheen, where those the warding spells, protecting Hogwarts?

Hermione's thoughts wandered back to the other strange incidents that had taken place around her. The blacklizard she had transfigured into the chalice for example. She had used the Elder Magic to overcome the natural wards of the creature. Then the next time Hermione had used the Elder Magic to destroy Tom's mental wards as she had legilimized him. After that she had used the Elder Magic as she had found Tom and Carter in the orphanage. Back then she had suddenly been able to feel the Ministry's warding spells. And Hermione had even been able to push them away. Her next action had been to grab Tom and apparate with him directly through Diagon Alley's wards.

All those incidents had one thing in common: warding magic. Hermione stared at the blue sheen. Could she now somehow see the wards surrounding Hogwarts?

Was that new power a manifestation of the Elder Magic inside of her? Hermione had already read a good part of Peverell's manuscript. But she had yet to stumble upon something concerning the Elder Wand.
I need to finish that book quickly, she decided as she continued to stare at the castle. Though secretly Hermione feared that she wouldn't be able to understand the theory of the wand even if she stumbled upon it in the book. She balled her hands into fists. That wasn't acceptable. She didn't want to admit that the book was way over her head.

Nicolas Flamel stepped out of the fireplace and into the well organized chaos that was his friend's office.

"Good evening, Albus," Flamel said softly, turned towards the wizard sitting behind the desk.

Dumbledore looked up and Flamel was surprised at how tired and exhausted his friend looked. Even the twinkle in his eyes seemed to have dimmed a little.

"Nicolas," Dumbledore greeted him. "I did not expect you at this late hour."

"I hope I do not disturb you," Flamel said.

Dumbledore got up from his chair and walked over to Flamel. Flamel couldn't help but notice the ridiculously flamboyant robe Dumbledore was wearing. He had never understood why his friend insisted in this absurd style of clothing. But he had to admit this flashy yellow colour was somehow quite entertaining. Especially if you added the tiny, little unicorns that were embroidered here and there on the fabric. Ridiculous, but also entertaining, Flamel thought amused. But then he quickly dropped the smile that had been tugging at his mouth. The reason for his visit was anything but funny.

"Please, sit down," Dumbledore gestured at the two comfortable looking armchairs.

They both sat down. Dumbledore waved his wand and two cups of tea instantly appeared on the side table. Flamel took his cup and nipped at the tea. Peppermint, of course. Dumbledore was a considerate man, he even remembered Flamel's favourite flavour of tea.

"So, what brought you here to this end of the country?" Dumbledore asked as he scanned Flamel through his half-moon spectacles.

"I am afraid it is only bad news that I have to bring, Albus," Flamel replied slowly. He really didn't want to break it to his friend but there was no other option.

Dumbledore raised his eyebrows at that, "Nothing happened to Perenelle I hope?"

"No, no," Flamel quickly answered. "Perenelle is quite well. She sends you her best wishes."

Flamel skidded uncomfortably in the chair before he continued, "I am very sorry, Albus. Peverell's manuscript. It was stolen."

Flamel could see the shock flickering though Dumbledore's eyes. But in the end he was surprised at how collected his friend's voice sounded as he said,

"How could that happen?"

Flamel stared into his friend's eyes. He knew how long Dumbledore had worked to finally get the Peverell manuscript. It was a shame that someone managed to steal it from Flamel's own hands.

"Someone broke into my flat. You know the spells I have used to ward it with, Albus," Flamel told his friend. "Whoever broke into it, they knew what they were doing. Then they found the hiding place of the book and managed to break my spells again. I have no idea how they did it. Those were powerful spells I used. But the book is lost now." Flamel ended his story in a grave tone.

He stared into Dumbledore's blue eyes. His friend seemed to be shocked and surprised at that unexpected theft. Just as shocked as Flamel had been as he had discovered the thievery. How did they manage to break those warding spells was still a mystery to Flamel. Only someone with much experience in breaking wards could have done it. Or a very powerful wizard.

"There is more," Flamel continued. "There were traces of a fight in my flat. I called in the Aurors and they confirmed my suspicions."

Flamel watched as Dumbledore leaned back in his chair. There was a pensive expression on his face. Did he know who could have stolen the precious book?

Flamel voiced his question, "Can you think of someone who has the volition and the know-how to be able to steal the book from me?"

Dumbledore's eyes wandered back to Flamel before he answered in his collected voice, "I have some ideas, Nicolas. There are several people to be worth considering. But I cannot be sure. I know some wizards who would have been able and willing to go to such lengths to achieve what they want."

Dumbledore sighed tiredly before he continued in a soft voice, "One of them is very likely. It would fit his character to revert to thievery. Though I hope it was not him. But he is very resourceful and I think he would have been interested in the knowledge Peverell's manuscript could provide him with. I know that he was in London at the time. I shall look into it, Nicolas."

Flamel looked into Dumbledore's face. He wondered who that wizard was his friend was speaking about. As Flamel scanned Dumbledore he again noticed how exhausted his friend seemed to be.

"You look tired, Albus. What did you do the last weeks? I tried to contact you right after I discovered the theft. But you were nowhere to be found."

"Ah, yes. There were some things I had to take care of," Dumbledore answered.

"Gellert?" Flamel asked anxiously.

"Yes," came the swift reply.

"Did you find him?" asked Flamel.

Dumbledore sighed again before he said in a grave voice, "I could have, Nicolas. I think I could have. But he was one step ahead of me. I am afraid I hesitated too long to face him. My fear let me falter where I should not have faltered. Now he is hiding again."

"Don't always blame yourself, Albus. You are not responsible for the whole world. And you are certainly not responsible for Gellert's actions. He has chosen this path himself," Flamel said in a firm voice.

Dumbledore's eyes flashed at Flamel. And Flamel was surprised to see this uncharacteristic uncertainty in those blue eyes.

"You know, Nicolas, I was once just like him. And you also know what that had cost me."

Flamel shook his head slightly before he said in a gentle voice, "You cannot blame yourself for those things forever, Albus. That is so long ago, and you have changed."

"'Long ago', Nicolas?" Dumbledore sighed. "You, of all people, should know how little time means."

Hermione leaned back in her seat and listened contently to the noise around her. She had missed Hogwarts, though being eighteen years old, she wasn't even supposed to still be here. But then again, she reasoned, she had missed her last year at Hogwarts, so it should be okay for her to stay a little longer. What she hadn't liked, though, was that ridiculously long speech she had had to endure.
Dippet had seemed to talk and talk for hours. His pompous style was rather tiresome. All of that even before they had something to eat. Back in her time Dumbledore had always had mercy with them and hadn't talked for long. Dippet, it seemed, just liked the sound of his own voice. Thank Merlin that was over though.

"-and then my sister blew up the Christmas tree." Hermione tuned into the conversation between her three Gryffindor friends. Weasley was obviously telling them about his, rather strange, Christmas.

"You should have seen my mother," Weasley grinned widely. "She was so happy!"

"Wait, wait," Lupin interrupted Weasely. "Your mother was happy that your sister blew up the Christmas tree?" Lupin eyed Weasley incredulously.

Weasley laughed and said, "Yes, well, my sister's eight, you know, and she never showed any signs of magic. We just thought she wasn't magic." Weasley shrugged. "But then she had this accidental magic. And it was really spectacular, too. The tree just blew up like this."

Weasley tried to pantomime a burning Christmas tree, which was unrecognizable, but all the same very funny. Longbottom was lying on the floor laughing insanely.

"Took my dad nearly a day to repair the damage on the house," Weasley concluded the fiasco. "My whole family was totally happy about the tree and my sister. Aside from Aunt Henrietta of course."
Weasley added as he saw the questioning look on Hermione’s face, "She's at least a hundred years old and stone deaf. She didn't notice anything was wrong until her wig caught fire from the burning remains of the Christmas tree. Wasn't very happy about that, Aunt Henrietta. Told me it was a rather expensive wig."

Weasley grinned.

"Did you buy a new tree?" Longbottom managed to ask between giggles.

"No, no, my mother insisted that we use the charred remains of the old one. Said, it was a lucky tree or something like that." Weasley grinned.

As they were finished with eating the four friends got up from the table still giggling childishly. Then Longbottom put an arm around her shoulder and said mischievously, "Say, Hermione, what sort of prank do you plan for this semester. That smoke potion was all fun but now we have to do something even better."

She smiled up at him. It was nice having her friends around her again. They were so refreshingly carefree.

Yes, she was happy to be back at Hogwarts.
How tedious, Tom thought as he listened to Dippet's unbearably boring speech. Did he try to bore the people to death? If so, then he was on the right way. But Tom's boredom didn't show on his face. He never once abandoned that expression of polite attention. Even though that pompous twit was just laughable. But he was the headmaster after all and thus Tom needed to ensure that Dippet was fond of him. Actually that wasn't too hard. It was so easy to fool all those idiots, Tom thought and he allowed a small smirk to take form on his face. His mask of the hardworking model student was just perfect. Who would be able to see through it? It was almost sad how easy it was to manipulate them all. They were all so dazzled by this front of the charming and brilliant orphan he had created for himself that no-one ever tried to look underneath. How surprised they all would be, Tom thought as his gaze swept over the people sitting in the Great Hall, if they would get to know his true self.

Finally his gaze landed on the Gryffindor table and on the witch sitting there.

Hermione was different. Right from the start she had seemed to be immune against his attempts to charm her. She had never been seduced by his looks and she could always see right through his acting and never fell for it. She knew him quite well. She not only knew this front of the model student he put up for everyone at Hogwarts, no, she had managed to look underneath.

The strange thing was that even though the girl had seen a glimpse of his true self she had still stayed with him. She had even helped him. Tom almost shuddered as he was forced to think back to the orphanage and Carter. That disgusting Muggle! Tom had always wished to show him what true pain was. To be able to curse him. Now, Hermione had done that for him. He still couldn't really understand why she had decided to help him. But somehow it didn't matter anymore. Whatever her motives it was now obvious that she liked him. She might not want to admit it at the moment, but Tom had felt it as he had kissed her. She definitely liked him. Even after all the things he had done to her and all the things she had learned about him. Tom would never have thought that anyone could still like him after they learned about this dark side of him. Honestly, he had never cared about it before either.

His eyes wandered over Hermione's form sitting at her table and laughing gaily. That she seemed to like him would make things a lot easier. It would help her accept that she belonged to him now. Tom knew that she was still very unsure about their relationship. They had been enemies for so long and she was reluctant to forget their dispute. He would have to play his cards very cautiously or he would drive her away from him. But whatever happened, Tom thought as he watched Hermione greedily, that witch was his. There was nothing she could do about that fact.

Tom saw her now getting up from the table, followed by those three Gryffindor gits. His eyes narrowed angrily as he eyed the three boys. They were always around Hermione. He didn't like that at all.

Then a murderous desire to hurt came over him as he watched how Longbottom touched Hermione. He really had the nerve to put his arm around her shoulders. Tom balled his hands into fists. That was another thing he had to teach her. He was the only one she needed.

"Oh Tom. I'm so glad to see you again." Tom heard a female voice whisper to him in what was most likely intended to be a seductive way.

He turned around and found Melanie Nicolls standing behind his chair. Her dark brown hair was braided into a long queue and she now leaned down to him and put a hand lightly on his shoulder.

"I've missed you," she breathed to him.
Tom nearly rolled his eyes at her. What did she want from him? Sure, he had shagged her once, she was rather pretty after all, but after that he had completely lost interest in her. If she continued to mither him like that, he was going to show her that it was a very stupid idea to anger him. He shot a glance back to where Hermione was but couldn’t spot her any longer. Great, thanks to Nicolls he had lost track of Hermione. Tom's eyes wandered back to the girl in question. She was still looking at him expectantly. He narrowed his eyes in anger then he got up from his seat before he told Nicolls in a cold tone,

"If you excuse me, I have to take care of something."

He could see a disappointed glint in her brown eyes before he left and headed for the exit. There really was something he had to deal with. There was something he had to retrieve. His feelings were conflicting though. He really didn't want to go to the transfiguration teacher's office but he wanted to have his wand back. So, there wasn't much of a choice there. Yet another reason why he hated that old wizard so much. The old fool put him always in situations where Tom was forced to do something he didn't want to do at all.

His steps led him though the castle's many corridors until he stood before an old, wooden door. Tom knocked reluctantly. He really didn't want to be here. It always made him feel weak and inferior. A feeling he despised and had sworn to destroy. But today he needed to bear it once more.

"Enter." Tom heard the hateful voice coming from inside the office.

Reluctantly he opened the door and stepped into the transfiguration teacher's office. Tom's gaze swept over the interior. He had to stop himself from wrinkling his nose at the messiness in the office. All those valuable objects were scattered over the whole place. Objects Tom would kill to have. Like that small silver device that looked like an old muggle sundial. But Tom knew it was actually a magic amplifier. It enabled it's user to intensify his magic for a short moment.

"Good evening, Tom," Dumbledore's voice brought him out of his musings and back to the situation at hand. "I have awaited you," Dumbledore continued in his infuriatingly condescending tone.

Tom tried not to scowl in hate at his teacher who now gestured at the chair standing in front of his desk. A silent invitation for Tom to sit down. More of an order actually. Tom could feel this burning hatred bubbling up in him again. He slowly walked over to the chair and then sat down.

"How was your holiday, Tom?" Dumbledore asked him in a kind voice.

Tom couldn't hear scorn in Dumbledore's words but he was convinced it was there.

"Fine, thank you, sir," Tom replied in a tight voice.

Then Dumbledore asked him while he looked at him expectantly, "Is there anything you need to tell me?"

Anger flooded Tom's mind as he in turn stared at the professor. What was he going on about?

"No, sir," he finally answered in a cold but calm voice.

Dumbledore's eyes were scanning Tom now intensely. Tom nearly shuddered as this penetrating gaze hit him. But he didn't. He didn't want to show any weakness in front of Dumbledore. Instead he put up his strongest Occlumency shields. There was no way to know if Dumbledore would try to legilimize him or not. Tom couldn't afford to reveal his secrets. He wasn't going to give anything away, he thought as he gazed back into those blue eyes. Tom was very tense, his eyes narrowed and his mouth was forming a thin line as he stared icily back at his teacher.
After a while Dumbledore sighed softly. Tom was surprised to see a tired, almost sad, look on his face. Then the professor got up from his chair and walked over to one of the drawers in the shelf standing behind the desk. Tom nearly shook his head at those stupid, yellow robes Dumbledore was wearing. Really, what was wrong with that man? Dumbledore waved his wand over the drawer before he opened it and produced a wand out of it. Tom's eyes widened and his hands balled into fists as he recognized his pale yew wand. Dumbledore sat down at his desk. Tom nearly growled as he had to watch his wand in the hands of that stupid, old coot.

"I hope you understand why you can't be allowed to have your wand over the holidays," Dumbledore spoke and again there seemed to be an incomprehensible sadness tinting his voice.

"This arrangement is safer," the professor said in a grave voice.

"It's safer for the people around you and in the end it is safer for yourself," Dumbledore finally ended his little speech.

No, it was certainly not safer for him without his wand, Tom thought furiously. Instead he answered, "Yes, sir." He was barely able to keep his voice from shaking with hate.

Dumbledore sighed again, which started to anger Tom even more, then he offered the yew wand to Tom. He leaned forward and slowly extended a hand to accept his wand. Tom's hand clasped around the smooth wood. But Dumbledore didn't immediately let go of it. Instead he said in a severe tone,

"Be careful in what ways you use your magic, Tom. For it can come back to haunt you."

Tom's eyes flashed angrily back at Dumbledore. He shortly saw surprise on the professor's face as the man stared at his eyes. Maybe Tom's hate had shown in his eyes? He didn't know. Then Dumbledore finally let go of the wand. Tom quickly took it, put it away in his pocket and stood from the chair before he left the office as fast as possible without actually running.

Tom closed the door behind him. He walked a distance away from transfiguration teacher's office until he allowed himself to breathe out relieved. All the while he was very conscious of the small weight now in his robe pocket. He reached into the pocket and produced his wand out of it.

What a glorious feeling! The smooth, cool wood. His magic was flowing pleasantly through the wand. And the wand hummed with his magic, begging him to use it. It was a relieving feeling, to be able to do that again. Without his wand, without his magic actually, Tom had felt incomplete, vulnerable and weak. It was disgusting, really, that weakness. But now, he thought as his hand clasped the pale wood of his wand, his freedom was back.

A frighteningly dark and sinister smile tugged at his handsome face.

Now, his power was back.

Later that day found Hermione curled up on one of the soft sofas in the Gryffindor common room with a book in her hands. Lupin was sitting at a table nearby playing a game of wizard's chess with Diana. Hermione wondered what Tom was doing right now. Since they had separated in the Hogwarts express she hadn't been able to talk with him again. She was more than a little annoyed.
with herself as she found herself missing him somehow.

_Really, get a grip, Granger!_ she chastised herself. _You are back at Hogwarts, he doesn't need you anymore!_

It was true, wasn't it? The only reason Tom had stayed with her during the break was that he didn't have much of an alternative. It was better if they didn't spend any more time together anyway, Hermione decided. She knew that she had interpreted that inappropriate feeling, she had had as he had kissed her, quite correct. There was no use in denying it before herself. It seemed she had developed an affection towards Tom that exceeded the boundaries of friendship. It was a silly infatuation. For even friendship between them was…

Hermione hesitated to think 'wrong'. But that was what it was after all.

She ran a hand through her hair and stared back at her book, not seeing the words. It had felt so good, having Tom around. As he had been with her she had for the first time since an eternity felt relaxed and safe.

_Protected._

Since that damn war had engulfed her she hadn't been able to feel safe. Too much had happened around her. She had constantly felt strained. In the end she had shut her feelings down. That had been the only way to survive all the horrible things she had seen. But whatever she had done there had always been that grief and loneliness underlying everything. That terrible grief became her companion but at least its constant presence had enabled her to let it drop in the background. After some time she had managed to get used to that, too. It had always been with her though. It had been with her during the war and then it had still accompanied her as she had stumbled through the past.

Now, Hermione thought frustrated, Tom had taken that grief and loneliness from her temporarily. For a short, glorious time she had been freed of her sorrow. It was unjust. Now that she had been reminded of an existence without her ever-present grief it hit her even harder as it came back to haunt her once again.

The grief and the loneliness.

She wanted to feel free again. It was wrong and selfish, she knew that. But now that she knew how life felt without her ghosts haunting her, she wanted to experience that liberating feeling again.

She wanted Tom to drive them away once more.

Her train of thought was interrupted as a group of girls started to giggle annoyingly. Hermione looked up from her book and her gaze fell on a group of third or fourth year girls that was sitting on a sofa beside the entrance to the common room. They were indeed giggling foolishly and each of them had a blush on their face.

Hermione's eyes widened in surprise as her gaze fell on the cause of their stupid behaviour. Tom had just entered the common room. He stood right by the door and scanned the room with his impossibly grey eyes, obviously searching for her. His gaze quickly fell on her and he smirked attractively, then he walked over to her. Hermione couldn't help but notice how the noise in the room died somewhat down as the students recognized Tom.

"I'll never understand how you can stand these disturbing red and gold colours," Tom said teasingly as he sat down beside Hermione on the sofa.

"Well, we can't all be sneaky little snakes and live down in the dungeons," Hermione retorted lightly though she felt rather shocked to have Tom sitting beside her again.

Tom just chuckled and continued to scan the Gryffindor common room curiously. He completely ignored the inquisitive stares the other Gryffindors were throwing at him and Hermione.

"How did you get in here anyway?" Hermione asked suspiciously. "You don't know the password."

Tom looked at her again and an evil smirk was tugging at the corners of his mouth as he answered in a silky voice, "Aww, but I'm a prefect, of course I have all the passwords."

"No, that's not true. Prefects are not privy to the passwords of the other houses," Hermione said.

"You are too smart for your own good, Hermione." Was the only answer she got from him. Tom leaned leisurely back on the sofa, seemingly very pleased with himself, and the smirk on his face was growing even wider.

She sighed.

"So, why are you here?" she asked him resigned.

Tom was suddenly serious again as he said, "I wanted to give you something." Then he looked around the common room and noticed the other students watching them bluntly. "Let's go someplace more private."

Tom got up from the sofa and offered Hermione his hand. She took it and allowed Tom to pull her from the sofa. Then he took off towards the exit from the common room dragging Hermione behind him. She saw the frown on Lupin's face as his eyes followed her and Tom. She released a relieved breath of air as she finally left the common room and the prying eyes of its inhabitants. She really didn't like to be in the spotlight like that. Tom on the other hand didn't seem to care at all. They were now walking down the dark and deserted corridor. He still held her hand.

"How did your prefect meeting go?" Hermione asked him in an uncharacteristically timid voice as she had suddenly noticed that while they might have escaped her curious house mates she was now pretty much alone with Tom.

"Oh, nothing particularly interesting," Tom answered. "Just the normal things. Like who's going to go when on patrol and who's responsible for the first years. Rather boring."

After a few more steps Tom said in a now soft voice, "And I went to Dumbledore's office."

Hermione's gaze shot back at him. His hand was grabbing her firmer and Hermione could see insecurity on his face.

"Did you get your wand back?" she asked gently.

Tom nodded at that.

Hermione squeezed his hand reassuringly and said, "That's good, isn't it?"

"Yes," he whispered and then added after some time. "I just hate going there."

They wandered down the corridor until they came upon a door. Hermione recognized it. It was the door leading to the Arithmancy class room.

"That's good enough," Tom said, the insecurity had disappeared from his voice again.
Hermione involuntarily stiffened as she then watched him pulling his wand. Her eyes wandered over the pale wood of his wand. Voldemort’s wand.

Tom hadn't noticed her display of unease and waved his wand at the door. Hermione could hear a soft clicking noise coming from the door's lock. He opened the door and grabbed her hand again before he pulled her inside. Then he waved his wand and the candles standing on some of the tables lit up. Hermione couldn't help but feel a little troubled as she saw Tom with a wand in his hand. During the break he didn't have his wand. That fact had somehow made things a lot easier, she now realized.

"So, why did you bring me here?" Hermione asked him and was surprised by how strong her own voice sounded. Because she didn't feel very strong right now.

Tom who leaned nonchalantly against one of the tables now eyed her intently. Even in the semi darkness of the class room Hermione could see a smirk tugging at the corners of his mouth. Then he slowly walked over to her and stopped standing right in front of her. Hermione couldn't help but notice this predatory air in his movements. She looked up at him. The smirk still played around his mouth and there was a strange glint in his eyes as they scanned her.

He reached out for her, wrapped an arm around her shoulders and pulled her over to him. Hermione felt herself relax against his chest. She knew she shouldn't but she did enjoy it how he held her. Her actions now collided with her previous anxiety but the feeling of his arm around her was somehow reassuring.

"Why, Hermione," he whispered in a silky voice. "I can only think of one reason why I should bring an innocent young lady to a place like this."

Yes, Tom with his wand was definitely more dangerous than he was without the wand, Hermione thought. And a lot more demanding.

Then she whispered, "Whatever makes you think I'm innocent, Mr Riddle?"

She looked up into his grey eyes. They were sparkling at her and she was relieved to see amusement shining through.

"Oh my, you are right," Tom said, his eyes wide in mock-surprise as he clutched her by her shoulders and held her at arm's length. "Must have mixed you up with one of the other girls."

Hermione poked him in the side. "Stop that or I'm going to hex you."

Tom chuckled softly but then let go of her and she was surprised that his blank mask was once again in place.

"That's what I wanted to talk with you about."

Hermione raised her eyebrows confused. "What? My wandwork?"

Tom eyed her seriously before he said in an emotionless tone, "No, your wand."

Her confusion disappeared as she watched how Tom produced a wand from his robe pocket. Hermione instantly recognized the black wand. It was hers. The one she had brought from the future. Tom offered the wand to Hermione and she tentatively reached out for it. As her hand closed around the smooth wood she could feel her magic flow freely through the wand. It was a pleasant feeling. Hermione hadn't known until now how much she had missed her old wand. She smiled down at the black wand in her hand and was overjoyed with their reunion. As she looked back at Tom she found him staring at her still with his cold mask in place.

Hermione smiled at him and said, "Thank you, Tom."

Tom raised one eyebrow at her. "You are not angry with me?"

"Why should I be?" Hermione asked.

He broke eye contact with her before he said in a soft voice, "I... I stole that wand from you. And then I..." He looked back at her and whispered, "I put you under the Cruciatus curse."

"Oh, that." Hermione smiled up at him. "Don't worry about it. I told you, I'm not angry. At least not anymore. Let's just forget about it, okay?"

She again admired the wand in her hand.

"By the way it wasn't the first time I was hit with the Cruciatus," she said absentmindedly.

Hermione saw Tom tense as she said that. Then he snarled in a dangerous voice, "What? Who did that to you?"

Hermione looked up at him. There was an angry scowl on his face.

"Relax," she said. "It's in the past." Or rather, the future.

"Did it happen while you were in France?" Tom asked and there was still a certain amount of anger in his voice.

"Yeah," Hermione said softly.

"Why? How did it happen?" he asked her short-tempered.

She looked back up at him. There was anger flashing in his eyes making them glow a bit crimson in the dim light of the room.

"Don't worry, Tom. It's over now," she said in a soothing voice.

He narrowed his eyes at her before he said in a commanding tone, "What have you done in France? Tell me!"

Hermione raised her eyebrows at him. He seemed to certainly be angry now, as she could almost feel his dark magic in the air. But in spite of the fact that he now glared at her so enraged a small smirk of her own stole on her face.

"I thought we had a deal," she told him calmly. As Tom now furrowed his brow confused, Hermione continued in a light voice, "Don't you remember? As you've asked me why I had to live in a tent for so long I promised to tell you. That story includes what I did in France. But I'm not going to tell you anything unless you reveal why Dumbledore took your wand over the break."

Tom scowled at her for a while. Then he said in a soft voice, "I could force you to tell me."

Despite the threatening tinge in his voice Hermione smiled up at him and said, "I seriously doubt that."

His scowl grew even darker. But Hermione didn't react to his frightening behaviour and continued to smile at him. After a while Tom sighed frustrated.
"Your impudence is intolerable."

Hermione's smile grew even wider. "Yes, that's me."

Then she flicked her wrist and her wand landed in her hand. Well, it wasn't exactly her wand. It was the wand she had stolen from one of Tom's followers. She had never really gotten used to that wand and was now very glad to have her own wand back. Hermione looked lovingly at her black wand before she stowed it away in her wand holster. Then her gaze darted back to the other wand.

"What am I supposed to do with that now?" she asked Tom as she lifted the wand up.

He just shrugged with his shoulders and said indifferently, "I don't care. Throw it away?"

"Doesn't it belong to one of your fellow Slytherins?"

"I'm certainly not going to run after Alba to return his wand. And besides if I remember correctly, he tried to curse you with that wand." Tom said, completely ignoring the fact that it had been his order that had almost made Alba curse her.

"Now, enough of this," he said, took the wand from Hermione and muttered an incantation under his breath.

Her eyes widened as the wand in Tom's hand caught fire and combusted with a bright green flame until nothing remained of it. She was a little bit shocked by his actions. But as she had never liked that wand, she didn't care too much.

Tom stepped closer to her and again wrapped an arm around her shoulders. That embrace of his, Hermione thought, had a very possessive streak about it. But she didn't linger on that thought because right now she could feel Tom's fingers gently skimming over her cheek. As his fingers reached her chin he took a hold of it and lifted it up. Then he gently kissed her. Hermione's eyes fluttered shut as she felt his lips on her own and she wrapped her arms around his neck. Her voices of protest were strangely silenced as she felt Tom deepening the kiss.

Later Hermione slid back into the Gryffindor common room and was rather relieved to find it abandoned. She climbed the stairs leading to her dormitory. As she opened the door she found it already dark. Her roommates seemed to be asleep already. So Hermione tiptoed to the bathroom and after that to her bed. But before she lay down she retrieved Peverell's manuscript from her trunk. She stretched out on her bed with the book on her chest but she didn't open it. There were so many thoughts swirling through her head.

What was that thing between her and Tom? Hadn't she decided that it would be better to stay away from him? But then he only had to show up in her common room and she immediately threw that decision out of the window. Again and again she allowed him to hold her, to embrace her or even to kiss her.

That has to stop!

She couldn't kiss him. She really shouldn't. What would her friends say if they could see her right now? Hermione shuddered as she imagined their disappointed faces looking at her. She knew she had to stop seeing Tom. But as she had this thought she could feel her heart clench.

She sighed tiredly and rolled over to her side. She didn't want to think about Tom and their weird relationship any more. So she decided to look into one of her other problems.
Actually the most important of your problems! an enraged voice hissed at her angrily.

That blue sheen, she had seen around Hogwarts castle, had certainly been alarming. She desperately needed to find out more about the Elder Wand. It seemed to slowly change her own magic. That was more than worrying. She needed a way back into her own time period and not any more trouble with that wicked magic. It had already wreaked enough havoc.

So she read a few more pages in Peverell's manuscript. Unfortunately it was still as hard to understand as always. She even had the impression that the book was becoming more and more complex as she read on. Whatever Peverell had been, evil dark wizard or crazy scholar, no-one could deny that he had been a genius. His theories were fascinating but beyond anything else they were highly sophisticated and nearly impossible to comprehend. After some time she again stumbled over one of Peverell's personal notes. Again it was of questionable nature.

Now that I have grasped the concept behind the art of creating magical objects I wanted to put my new knowledge into use. The first magical object I created by using my new spells was a rather crude attempt. But even though it had immense deficiencies it still was vastly superior to any other magical object I have ever seen before.

As base I used a looking-glass made of the finest silver and trimmed with gold. After I had successfully stored a considerable amount of my Magic inside of the object I started to bend this Magic to my will. I molded it and formed it into a beautiful curse.

And as I was finished I had managed to change the nature of the looking-glass completely. It would still show the reflexion of whoever dared to use it but my Magic would change the mirror image. For the reflexion would be now of such an ineffably beauty and bring pure joy to just watch it that anyone who beheld his image in the looking-glass would from now on be unable to ever look away again. The poor soul will be ensnared by his own vanity so deeply that he will waste away in front of my creation. Fully able to understand the trap he had fallen into but unable to escape it.
Hermione woke up the next morning in her Gryffindor four poster and at first felt a little disoriented. Over the break she had gotten used to her little room at the Leaky Cauldron. But the chatter going on around her was enough to tell her where exactly she was. She opened the curtains of her four-poster and stood up.

"Morning," Rose said in her shrill voice.

"Mornin'," Hermione mumbled while she ran a hand through her already ruffled hair.

"Ah, you're up," came Lucia's voice.

Hermione looked up and nearly groaned as she saw all her dorm mates assembled and now eyeing her expectantly. What did they want now? Lucia prodded her playfully in the side while she said,

"We've seen you yesterday in the common room." Here she added something that most likely was supposed to be a dramatic pause, before she whispered, "With Tom Riddle."

"Why did you meet him?" Viola asked in her usual priggish voice.

It was almost funny, Hermione decided, as she saw the other girls sharing excited glances with each other. Honestly get yourselves lives!

"Did he ask you out?" Lucia said excitedly in her shrill voice while she now tugged at Hermione's shirt.

"What makes you think that?" Hermione frowned at her.

She couldn't quite picture Tom ever doing anything like that. It wouldn't match his character to ask a girl out politely with flowers in his hands. Most likely he would just grab the girl he was interested in, push her into some dark corner and start to kiss her. Just like he did with her at every opportunity, she mused as her thoughts wandered to last night as Tom had kissed her in the Arithmancy class room.

Damn, you shouldn't allow him to do that! a furious voice screamed at her enraged.

"He came to see you in the common room and then you left together," Rose now nearly screamed in excitement.

"Yeah, Hermione," Lucia said while she started to jump up and down. "He likes you! Tom Riddle likes you!"

"Oh, that's so exiting," Rose managed to say between her giggles.

Hermione now stared at them with wide eyes. Sure those girls were in general rather shallow and more interested in the gossips going around in this castle than in anything else. But what they now said made Hermione feel a little faint. Since they had kissed the first time during the break she had felt panicky about her feelings towards Tom which were inappropriate and just dangerous to begin with. But what did Tom actually feel towards her? His behaviour towards her had totally changed. That was undeniable. But what was the motivation behind this change? Hermione watched how Lucia now slumped down on her ridiculously pink bed and stared with misty-eyes at her.
"Oh, think about it. Tom Riddle! You are such a lucky girl," she said dreamily. "I would give anything to just hold his hand. He's so cute and a real gentleman."

Hermione furrowed her brow. Okay, Tom was quite handsome but the perfect gentleman? Clearly, Lucia had never seen the true Tom Riddle, Hermione thought amused.

"But I thought you didn't like him," Diana said turned to Hermione.

"Yeah, I didn't," Hermione said pensively. More like hated him from the very bottom of my heart.

"And now he is trying to win you over?" Lucia screeched delighted. "That's so romantic."

Hermione had to work to stop herself from rolling her eyes in exasperation. "If you say so," she said in a low voice.

"You've gotta tell us everything that happened yesterday," Rose piped up.

Hermione stared at her for a second, then said, glad to have found an excuse, "It's rather late. We don't want to be late for class."

"Oh, come on, Hermione," Lucia whined.

"No no, Hermione is right," Diana said in her stern voice. "We can't be late for class. So hurry up, everyone."

Hermione was very grateful for Diana's rule-abiding attitude as it gave her now an excuse to leave the gossip-girls behind. So, she stepped into the bathroom and locked the door. As she left it again sometime later she was unpleasantly surprised to find her four roommates waiting for her eagerly. It seemed they wanted to pester her with more questions on their way to the Great Hall for breakfast. Of course she had been right. The girls besieged her with questions, commentaries about Tom's handsome appearance, about how they thought he was such a perfect boyfriend. All the while their ranting was accompanied by bursts of silly giggles. As they finally reached the Great Hall Hermione was seriously considering to curse them. It would certainly be a satisfactory feeling.

---

Tom was sitting at the Slytherin table with the Daily Prophet in his hands. Currently he was studying an article attentively. At first sight there had been nothing especially interesting at that article. But it had somehow caught Tom's eye so he had stopped to read it properly.

Housebreaking in the middle of London

On December the 18th a burglary occurred in a flat in Islington. The victim of this break-in that took place at mid-afternoon was Sir Nicolas Flamel. Mr Flamel called the Aurors at once as he entered his flat. Auror Grimes was among the firsts on-site. He stated that Mr Flamel 'was very lucky to not be at home at the time the break-in took place' as the Aurors found traces of a fight in the apartment. According to Auror Grimes the burglars obviously got tangled with each other, most likely over the divide of the stolen goods. Mr Flamel stated that the only thing stolen was a priceless book he kept in his private library.

Sir Nicolas Flamel is the most renown Alchemist of our time. He is the inventor of the Reservopotion, which to a certain degree allows to stop time around an inanimate object, and is the supposed owner of a Philosopher's Stone. (For more information see pg. 6 to 8)

Tom put the newspaper down and frowned. That was odd. The eighteenth of December that had been at the beginning of the Christmas break. Tom could remember that day very well. He had managed to slip away from the loathsome orphanage and had been roaming the streets of London. Which wasn't very pleasurable in winter time but still better than to stay at the orphanage. On that occasion he had met Hermione for the first time during the break. He could recall how she had suddenly run into him. At that point in time Tom had still been very annoyed by her pure presence and had been accordingly quite irritated to have to meet her. But before he could have said anything to her they had suddenly been attacked by a black-cloaked man who had obviously been chasing Hermione. In the end she had managed to apparate them away to Diagon Alley but the street where he had met Hermione was in Islington. Was that just a strange coincidence or was Hermione somehow involved with this break-in the Prophet was reporting about? Back then he had asked her about the men in black cloaks but she had avoided the issue.

Like she always does! Tom thought frustrated.

Hermione was incredibly elusive when it came to him questioning her. He had never met someone who was so closed up. Normally he could always get people to reveal their secrets sooner or later. He was very convincing after all, Tom thought conceitedly. But the small smirk quickly dropped from his face as his thoughts wandered back to Hermione. Why would she break into some flat? No, it couldn't have been her, Tom reasoned.

But then again, it's Hermione. Maybe it really was her.

His gaze skimmed again over the article. Why had these men in the black cloaks been after Hermione? Had she really broken into Flame's flat? Tom's hands balled into fists. He hated it not to know about the things going on in her life. It was not only this issue about the men in the black cloaks that irked Tom. No, there were a lot of things Hermione kept stubbornly quiet about. What had she done in France? Why did she seem to know so much about Tom? How had she managed to apparate through Diagon Alley's wards? Why was she able to do all this incredibly advanced magic? There were so many secrets swirling around her and she was not in the least bit responsive to his normal tactics of getting information out of people.

This state of affairs was just intolerable.

The witch belonged to him and he was not going to accept it if she kept him in the dark about her life. But he couldn't start to interrogate her now. Not when she still didn't trust him completely. No, the first step would be to make sure that she accepted the ownership he had over her. Before he could try to break her secrets he had to make sure that Hermione submitted to him and didn't run away from him.

Tom's gaze wandered over the Great Hall until it landed on the entrance. Sure enough he found Hermione standing by the door. There were a few other Gryffindor girls around her, giggling inanely. Hermione looked like she was going to curse them any minute now, Tom noticed amused. His eyes wandered over her body. Suddenly he felt the urge to walk over to her and to hold her. He wanted to make sure that everybody knew that she was his and that they kept their hands off her. But he couldn't do that, not yet. He needed to be patient. But in the end, he knew, Hermione would submit to him. Her eyes had found his and Tom smirked at her, knowing that she couldn't resist him for long.

As Hermione entered the Great Hall her gaze went automatically to the Slytherin table, searching for Tom. She quickly found him sitting leisurely at his usual seat and he seemed to be scanning her right now. Then Hermione watched as one of his haughty smirks formed on his face.

The perfect gentleman, indeed, she thought wryly.
But as her eyes travelled over his form, Hermione had to agree with Lucia. Tom really was very handsome, but 'cute' was definitely the wrong word to describe him for there seemed to always be a certain darkness swirling around him. Then she again looked away from Tom and continued her way to the Gryffindor table. Hermione saw Lupin, Weasley and Longbottom already sitting at Gryffindor table. So, she strolled over to them and sat down beside Lupin.

"Good morning, Hermione," Lupin greeted her with his calm voice.

"Morning, Mione," Weasely smiled at her.

"Sit down! Sit down!" Longbottom grinned at her. "Slept well?"

"Yeah," Hermione answered and sat down beside her three friends.

She reached for the coffee pot in front of her. She needed some caffeine today, she decided.

"So, ready for the next semester?" Weasely asked her.

But before she could reply something Longbottom threw in, "Mate, you know her. She'll be okay." Then he said in a grave tone while looking sadly at Weasely and shaking his head, "It's us I'm worried about." He sighed dramatically before he continued, though he couldn't quite hide the grin on his face anymore, "I've heard Legifer's taking in guys now as well."

Weasely threw his arms up in the air exaggeratedly and exclaimed, "Oh, no! Please, spare us! We are doomed!"

Hermione narrowed her eyes at them while they now started to giggle uncontrollably. "You know," she said slowly. "If that really happened, you wouldn't be laughing anymore."

The two Gryffindors stopped laughing. Then they looked at her with grave faces. But that new seriousness lasted just for about a few seconds before they started to break down in laughter again. As Hermione stared at them a small smile began to play around her mouth. They were silly and childish. Somehow it was rather nice having those carefree people around. It certainly distracted her from her problems.

"Enough with this nonsense," Lupin said sternly as he got up from the table. "In case you haven't noticed, it's time for class."

"Aww, Amarys!" Longbottom said in a whiny voice. "You are such a spoilsport."

Still laughing they got up from the Gryffindor table and set out for the Charms classroom. Hermione followed Longbottom and Weasley as she felt a hand on her forearm. She turned her head and found Lupin frowning at her. He fell in step beside her letting the other two boys walking a little distance ahead before he asked in a soft tone,

"Hermione, why did you meet Riddle yesterday?"

Her eyes widened a little as she continued to stare at Lupin. But of course, she thought panic-stricken, Lupin had seen her yesterday in the common room together with Tom. What could she tell him? Right now she didn't want to discuss her and Tom's relationship. Especially as she didn't even know herself what exactly it was that was happening between them.

"Oh that," Hermione said, carefully keeping her voice in control so it sounded unconcerned. "He just wanted to return something I had lost." Not exactly a lie.
Lupin narrowed his eyes before he said, concern tingling his voice, "He doesn't threaten you, does he? I mean, he's bound to be angry after you pulled that stunt on him before the break."

"No, no," Hermione quickly tried to reassure Lupin. "Nothing like that."

She had completely forgotten about that rumour incident all those weeks ago and how she had gotten back at Tom for it. In the mean time so much had changed. The dynamics of her relationship with Tom were completely different now. Though if that was a good development, Hermione was still unsure about.

"You sure?" Lupin asked and there was still a certain amount of concern in his soft voice. "You can tell me if he's harassing you."

"No, really. Don't worry." Hermione smiled nervously at him.

"Okay," Lupin finally said though he didn't look convinced. "But if he does something you tell Richard, Marc or me right away. I told you, Riddle is dangerous. You shouldn't take him lightly."

Hermione nodded at him.

Suddenly Longbottom called back at them, "Hey, what ya waiting for? I thought we were late for class."

They walked the rest of the way to the Charms classroom together. Longbottom and Weasley continued to fool around. Sometimes Hermione joined them, sometimes she just had to shake her head and smile at their jokes. As they entered the Charms classroom the three boys strolled to their seats in the back row. It was then that Hermione suddenly remembered who her seat neighbour was. And sure enough Tom was already sitting elegantly in his seat right under the window. One of his arms dangled casually over the back rest of his chair and he now eyed her rather arrogantly, a small smirk tugging at the corners of his mouth. Hermione was once again struck by how handsome he really looked. It was no wonder the whole female population of the castle fancied him. Lupin was right after all, Hermione thought, Tom was definitely dangerous. But not in the way Lupin had meant it.

She breathed in deeply and grabbed her school bag a little tighter. Then she slowly walked over to Tom. She sat down on the seat beside him. He still smirked at her rather conceitedly while his grey eyes sparkled softly.

"Good morning," he whispered in his melodious voice.

Hermione glanced at him before she replied softly, "Morning, Tom."

She remembered her first Charms class in the forties. Back then she had been rather scared as she had been forced to sit beside Tom. If she recalled correctly Tom had been equally peeved by her presence. But now, he seemed to be rather pleased with the seating arrangement if that strangely possessive glint he cast her way was anything to go by.

Tom eyed the witch sitting beside him. She appeared to be a little nervous, he noted amused. A smirk tugged at the corners of his mouth because it seemed that he was the cause of her nervousness. He liked it to have such a huge influence on her. Tom knew that Hermione was still very unsure about the relationship between them. He didn't know why but since she had arrived here at Hogwarts all those months ago she had seemed to hate him. She had fought against him at every opportunity. Even now she was trying to convince herself that she still didn't like him. It was somehow amusing, Tom thought as his eyes wandered over her, how she was trying to resist him. Because that was just futile. She would submit to him.

Before the Christmas break he, himself, had despised her and accordingly had treated her that way. A mistake he intended to right because now he had finally realized the worth of her. He was surprised that it had taken him so long to see her for what she was. A very powerful and gifted witch. Strange in her ways but definitely valuable. Not at all like the other people around him. To him other people had never been important. So he had always used them without having scruples. He had manipulated and seduced them into doing things he wanted them to do. If they hadn't obeyed, he had never hesitated to use force to coerce them. But Hermione, he found, was more than one of those pieces on his chessboard. Much more.

His eyes wandered back to her face and his smirk even grew wider as he saw that small blush. She had obviously noticed how he had scanned her. That was good, that impact he had on her. He remembered the first few weeks after she had arrived at Hogwarts. Back then he had never managed to get a reaction out of her. He had been severely annoyed by that lack of reaction. But now, he noticed satisfied, she was responding to him. She might still be trying to deny that she was drawn to him, but now that he was determined to win her over she didn't stand a chance to resist him. Who could, really? Whenever he had set his mind on something he always won in the end, Tom thought haughtily. Now as he had decided that she belonged to him there was not much she could do about it. Because that greedy and possessive feeling hadn't left him again. Whenever he looked at her it came over him.

Hermione noticed that Tom was still scanning her shamelessly. She was annoyed that she felt her face heat up a little bit. Why was he able to unsettle her like this? She looked away from him. How did he manage to confuse her so? This attraction she felt towards him was wrong. There was no other way to describe it. She knew too well who he was. During the Christmas break she might have discovered that he was not entirely evil but that didn't mean he was a good person now. There was actually just one thing she should do now and that would be to stay away from him.

Hermione looked up as she heard professor Merrythought enter the class room. Professor Merrythought wasn't a very tall woman but even so she wasn't easy to overlook. That woman constantly radiated off a contagious joice which made Hermione like her even more. Now the old lady stood in front of her class and beamed at them.

"A very good morning to you," she said in her friendly voice. "I hope you all had a nice holiday and are prepared to learn some more charms."

The professor put her old, leather bag down before she leaned against her desk and faced the glass.

"Now that the new semester has begun let us start with something different," the professor said while she still smiled at them. "Who knows the Infucatus charm?"

Hermione furrowed her brow. It somehow shocked her but she had never heard about that charm. How could that be? Maybe she should have read the text book in advance? Her gaze fell on her charms book with the red binding in front of her. Really, how could she have slacked like this? Hermione wondered frantically. That wasn't at all like her. After the lesson she should really go to the-Hermione halted her mental ranting and a small smile started to form on her mouth. 'To the library,' she ended her thought. There was now a nostalgic touch in the smile playing around her mouth. Yes, 'to the library' had once been her cure for everything, back in the old days – when she had still attended Hogwarts. Right now, just for a second, she had somehow forgotten that she was in the past and she had reverted back to the know-it-all bookworm she once had been.

...to the innocent and happy girl she had been. How strange.

Her eyes wandered to Tom sitting beside her. She wasn't in the least bit surprised to see his hand in the air. She inwardly rolled her eyes, of course he knew the answer to professor Merrythought's question. Tom was an even worse know-it-all than she had ever been.

"Yes, Mr Riddle?" the charms professor smiled encouragingly at him.

"The Infucatus charm can alter the colour of whatever object it's directed at according to the wishes of the caster," Tom stated in his smooth voice.

"That is completely right, Mr Riddle." Professor Merrythough beamed at Tom. "And do you know the incantation for the charm, too?"

Hermione watched with discomfort as Tom pulled his wand. To see him with a wand still made her a little uneasy. Now he started to wave the wand in an elegant movement. She stiffened as she realized that he directed the charm in her direction.

"Infus," Tom whispered in a light tone.

Hermione didn't feel anything change. The professor, though, seemed to be impressed by whatever Tom had done as she now said in her kind voice, "Excellent, Mr Riddle. Take ten points for Slytherin."

Hermione could see a few of the Slytherins in the class smirk at her, so she looked down at her robes. Should she really be surprised? The red and gold rims of her black school robe and her Gryffindor emblem had changed. They were now Slytherin green and silver. Hermione looked back at Tom. He wasn't paying her any attention anymore but was listening intently to professor Merrythought who now explained the magic behind the colour change charm.

Hermione leaned a little over to Tom and whispered irritated, "Now, can you change it back?"

A smirk formed on his face but he still didn't look at her. "I like it that way. It suits you."

Hermione continued to glare at him which annoyingly only made Tom chuckle softly. Of course she would be able to change the colour back herself. But the spell she would use to do that would be a little bit too advanced not to draw the attention of everyone towards her. In addition to that she wanted to know the actual counter charm to the Infucatus charm.

After a while Tom turned towards her and whispered under his breath, "Confuto."

Sure enough, her robes changed back into the familiar red and gold colours. Hermione shook her head slightly before she turned away from Tom ignoring the mocking smirk he threw her way and tried to follow the lesson again. She had her quill in her hand and scribbled everything down the professor told them. It was quite interesting because she herself had never delved into those kind of charms. Since she had left Hogwarts the only charms she had taken the time to learn were all offensive or defensive ones and could be used during a fight. So she had never learned something as innocent as the professor was now teaching. It was somehow nice to be remembered that magic was not all about fighting and battles, that there still existed that innocent part of magic.

As Hermione was so preoccupied with writing down the professor's explanations she suddenly felt someone touching her hair. She looked up and found that Tom was running his fingers gently through her hair. He was sitting elegantly in his chair and seemed to listen intently to everything the professor said while from time to time he wrote something down in his neat and elaborate handwriting. His other hand, though, was stroking lightly over her hair, now and then playing with a strand of it teasingly. Hermione was very irritated by his actions and wasn't able to follow the lesson at all anymore. That tingling feeling in her stomach was back, too. The feeling she had told herself didn't exist, must not exist.

So, Hermione spent the rest of the lesson trying to convince herself that she didn't enjoy the feeling of those fingers running through her hair so gently. As professor Merrythought finally ended the lesson Hermione was very relieved. For the first time since she had felt him touching her hair she cast a glance at Tom. He had now stopped stroking his fingers through her hair but had started to pack away his parchment and quill calmly. Her gaze wandered to his face. Tom wasn't looking her way but Hermione could find a conceited smirk curling up his lips.

That little...

He seemed to know perfectly well, the impact he had on her. But somehow Hermione couldn't find it in herself to be angry with him. Maybe she should be really concerned about that lack of anger? She ran a hand frustrated through her hair before she grabbed her own things and stuffed them into her bag. As she got up she let out a surprised gasp as she nearly collided with Longbottom's chest. She hadn't noticed that he had walked over to her. She looked up at his face and found a furious scowl furrowing his brow. He wasn't glaring this enraged at her, though, instead it seemed to be directed at Tom. Next, Hermione could feel a hand clasping around her wrist before Longbottom pulled her over to him and away from Tom.

"What do you think you are doing here?" Longbottom asked Tom angrily, his voice shook with suppressed rage.

Hermione looked back at Tom. He was scanning Longbottom with his grey eyes, giving nothing away. Though she could see a dangerous glint in his eyes as they wandered over Longbottom's hand which still held her wrist. Now Tom got slowly up from his chair before he leaned against the table and twirled his wand nonchalantly through his fingers.

Then he said in an eerily calm almost bored voice, "What does it look like I'm doing? I was just trying to follow the professor's lesson." His eyes wandered to Longbottom's face before he added in an arrogant tone while a condescending smile played around his mouth, "Of course that is a new concept to you."

Hermione felt chills darting down her spine as she heard the coldness in Tom's voice. He was leaning elegantly against the table, seemingly completely at ease, but right now he was radiating off nothing but this detached coldness. It was frightening, that hard glint in his eyes. Hermione had forgotten how scary Tom could be. During the Christmas break he had never spoken to her in that threatening tone he was now using.

"You keep your dirty fingers away from Hermione!" Longbottom blustered at Tom enraged.

Tom pushed away from the table and now faced Longbottom for the first time during this argument. He had stopped twirling his wand through his fingers but now held it properly. The blank mask was back on his face though he allowed a certain degree of cold hate to shine through as he scanned Longbottom with his steel hard eyes.

"Careful, Longbottom," Tom said in a soft, composed voice. "You shouldn't insult the wrong people."

The threat behind his words was clear. Hermione stared at Tom with wide eyes. Right now, he was very intimidating. She had really forgotten that he could be this way, too.
"And you should stay away from Hermione!" Longbottom now nearly yelled at Tom. Hermione was silently glad that they were by now alone in the charms class room.

"You can't threaten her, understood?" Longbottom continued in his angry voice.

Hermione watched a cruel smirk taking form on Tom's face.

"You would be surprised by what I can actually do," he sneered at Longbottom in cold amusement.

Then tom took off in direction of the door. As he passed Hermione he skimmed his fingers gently over her shoulder. She could still see that arrogant smile on his face but there was also the softness back in his eyes as they flashed at her shortly. She watched Tom stalking confidently out of the class room.

"That conceited prick!" Hermione heard Longbottom huff.

He was glaring angrily in the direction Tom had just disappeared to. Longbottom's face was still an angry shade of purple. But the anger soon left his face as he now looked down at her. Concern was shining in his eyes as he scanned her.

"He didn't do anything to you, did he?" he asked in a worried tone.

Hermione's eyebrows shot up. Then she answered in a soothing voice, "No, don't worry. I'm alright."

Though actually, Tom did do something to her. She just wasn't sure yet whether it was a good or bad thing.

"Okay," Longbottom said as he still scanned her concerned. "But you'll tell me if he tries anything." Longbottom's eyes wandered back to the door Tom had just left through. "He's an evil bastard," he said angrily.

Hermione wanted to answer, 'Well, he's the Dark Lord, what can you expect?', just to see Longbottom's face. But in the end she remained silent. Longbottom continued to glare at the door for a few seconds before he finally turned towards Hermione again and said, in a now friendlier tone,

"Let's go or we'll be late for lunch."

Tom exited the Charms class room. As he walked down the corridor he breathed in deeply, trying to get his temper back under control. His magic was still raging inside of him furiously, begging him to be released. That insolent son of a bitch had dared to touch Hermione again! Tom's hands balled into fists as he remembered how Longbottom had grabbed her wrist. It had cost him a lot of self-control to not curse that bastard into oblivion. Oh, the sweet pleasure it would have been to hurl his dark curses at Longbottom. But Tom couldn't do that. Not in the middle of a class room. And certainly not in front of Hermione. It was incomprehensible and irksome but she seemed to consider that Gryffindor idiot to be one of her friends. Tom couldn't walk around and curse her so-called friends. At least not yet when Hermione still felt insecure about her relationship with him. To now openly use violence against her friends would certainly not help him to bind her to him. So he had left the Charms class room lest he did something he would regret later. He had known it right from the start, that it would be difficult to gain Hermione. He couldn't force her to submit to him. That hadn't worked before the Christmas break as he had tortured her with the Cruciatus curse. Now it wouldn't work either. Strangely Tom didn't really want to hurt her anyway. Not if there were still other options to gain her.
"I tell you, he's threatened her," Hermione could hear Longbottom hiss at Weasely.

Currently she was sitting in her History of Magic class and tried to not fall asleep. Professor Binns was again being his old boring self. He was going on about one Goblin war or other. His monotonous speech was lulling Hermione to sleep. Somehow she had always attributed his unbearably boring lessons to the fact that Binns was a ghost, unable to understand the concept of suspense any longer. But here in the past he was very alive and still boredom incarnate. So, as not to fall asleep in the middle of a class Hermione had decided to listen into what her friends had to discuss. Lupin, Weasley and Longbottom were sitting at a table behind her in the last row. Since Longbottom had had this dispute with Tom after charms he had been quite angry. Now, he had a heated discussion with Weasely who sat beside him.

"I'm sure you just misunderstood him, Marc," Weasely whispered back to Longbottom.

"No, I didn't," Longbottom huffed, rather loudly. But Binns seemed not to mind as he was still talking about this Goblin war. Then Longbottom continued a little quieter, "You've seen what he did during Charms. How do you explain that?"

"I don't know." Weasely's voice was now a little unsure. "But he just touched her hair. What's so threatening about that?"

"He was running his dirty fingers through her hair like he's owning her," Longbottom hissed furiously. "He's planning something evil."

"Oh, not again your theory that Riddle is evil," Weasely sighed in exasperation.

A small smile curled up Hermione's lips as she heard that.

"That's no theory!" Longbottom replied heatedly.

"And what proof do you have?" Weasley asked in a low voice.

"Why do I need a proof when it's plain to see that he is one snaky bastard!" Longbottom said, his voice shook from suppressed rage. "And he's after Hermione now."

The smile dropped from Hermione's face as she heard Longbottom say that.

_He is right_, she thought. Tom was really after her. Maybe not to attack her, like Longbottom assumed, but still Tom wanted something from her. What it was he wanted, Hermione was still unsure about. During the Christmas break his behaviour towards her had started to change. The last Charms class spoke volumes.

What did he want?

But more importantly how should she react to him? Her current behaviour was just wrong and completely out of place. Longbottom was right after all, Tom _was_ evil. She had witnessed firsthand what he was capable of. He might yet be innocent of the crimes Voldemort would one day commit but Voldemort's tendency to evilness was already present in Tom. Hermione knew that but why was she still unable to stay away from him? Why did she want him to hold her again, even now?

She sighed softly.

Maybe the only solution to her problem was now lying in her dormitory, safely stowed away in a secret compartment in her trunk. With the help of Peverell's manuscript she would hopefully be able to leave this time period behind. Leave Tom behind…

She felt an unwelcome twinge in her stomach as she formulated that thought.

She had now lived so long in this time period. Mostly this decade was quite annoying but still her life here at Hogwarts was peaceful. Something she hadn't experienced for the past two years. What would her life look like after she had returned into her right time? Back to a wartorn land? The war was over now but the country still lay in ruins. She would need to built herself a new existence. And she would have to do that alone.

Hermione stared at the teacher standing in front of the class but she didn't really see him.

There was nothing waiting for her in her time period. Still she had to return. Her place was there and not here in the forties. It was dangerous playing with the time line. She had already changed too many things. No, she had to get a grip on herself. She had fought through so many things already and this was just another one. Another mission to complete. There was no room for doubts. She needed to be strong once again.

Hermione closed her eyes and breathed in deeply, trying to get her emotions back under control. Tom, he had shaken her determination by showing her a life without her sorrow. It was making this whole thing even more difficult. Was this nightmare she had been thrown into never going to end?

Suddenly she felt a hand on her shoulder. Hermione opened her eyes and looked up. Longbottom was standing beside her table and looked down at her concerned.

"Are you alright?" he asked her in a gentle voice.

Hermione frowned and then looked around the class room. It seemed that Binns had ended the class already. She hadn't noticed at all. Her eyes wandered back to Longbottom. Then she smiled weakly up at him.

"Yes," she answered his question.

She allowed him to take her by her arm and to help her up. Together they left the class room. Weasely and Lupin had waited for them outside. Hermione couldn't help but notice that silent conversation taking place between her friends. They seemed to be concerned about her. But she couldn't find it in herself to ease their concern right now. She wouldn't be able to find the right words for the lies she would have to make up to do that.

Hermione was still feeling rather depressed as she sat in the Great Hall having dinner. She wasn't feeling hungry at all. Her friends were trying to cheer her up but it didn't really work. It just made her feel guilty as she had to watch how they exchanged concerned looks. They probably thought that she was this down because Tom had 'threatened' her during Charms. At least she could see Longbottom throwing nasty glares in direction of the Slytherin table.

Hermione's own gaze wandered to the Slytherin table. Her eyes quickly landed on Tom. He was sitting there and was right now looking back at her with his incredibly grey eyes. Strangely Hermione felt a little better, knowing that he was somehow watching over her. She cast him a small smile before she got up from the table.

"Where are you going, Mione?" Weasely asked her while he stuffed what seemed to be an entire dumpling into his mouth.

She tried to smile down at her friends. "Back to the common room. I'm not really hungry."
Then she took off in direction of the doors. As she left she could just hear a few words of a new discussion between her friends.

"What's wrong with her?" She heard Weasely ask in a worried voice.

"Didn't I tell you already? It's Riddle!" Longbottom answered enraged.

Hermione left the hearing range and walked over to the exit and left the Great Hall quickly. Then she took off in direction to the Gryffindor common room. The corridor was deserted as everyone was still having dinner in the Great Hall. Her dark thoughts were still swirling around her head as she suddenly heard someone following her. She turned around and was surprised to see Tom strolling down the corridor. Somehow Hermione felt relieved to see him. She was feeling so lost right now and didn't want to be alone any longer.

"Why did you leave so early?" Tom asked her softly.

He stood in front of her and looked down at her. Hermione could see something like concern behind his eyes but she was not really sure. His expressions were not easy to read after all.

"Didn't feel like eating," she said in a small voice while she glanced up at him.

"Is something wrong?" he asked her in his smooth voice.

Hermione smiled up at him sadly. What could she tell him?

No, I'm not all right because my whole life is a heap of shards and I'm just broken.

But she didn't say anything instead she stepped closer to Tom. Then she wrapped her arms around his waist and clung to him tightly. She closed her eyes and buried her face into his chest as she could feel his arms reassuringly around her. It felt so good, his embrace. She felt so protected in his arms, as if her problems could never reach her here.

After a while Tom kissed her on the forehead then he took hold of her chin and bent gently it up. Hermione found him smiling down at her.

"Feeling better?" he asked her in his melodious voice.

Hermione smiled up at him as she nodded slightly. Tom's grey eyes sparkled down at her, satisfied with her response. Then he took her hand in his and led her down the corridor in direction to her common room. They walked through the castle's many corridors in comfortable silence and Hermione was incredibly glad to have Tom holding her hand now. It made her feel not so alone anymore.

As they reached the portrait of the Fat Lady Tom turned around towards her and looked down at her. Hermione was again surprised to find concern in his eyes as he smiled at her. For such a long time she had only associated negative emotions with him. To now have him looking at her with something other than hate and contempt was still new for her. But it was somehow wonderful.

She smiled hesitantly up at him. Even though she liked those new feelings she could discover on his face she couldn't help but still feel insecure around him. There was so much unclear between them. Tom extended one hand towards her and gently cupped one of her cheeks. Hermione felt an exciting burning tingle on her skin where his hand touched her as she looked up at him.

"You know, you can tell me if something is troubling you," Tom then said in a soft voice.
Hermione looked at him with huge eyes. There were so many things that were troubling her, she wouldn't know where to begin. But there was no way she could tell Tom about them. It would be nice to talk with someone about her many problems but she knew she had to solve them alone.

Tom looked down at her with that concern still shining in his grey eyes. Then he bent down to her and brushed his lips gently against her own. Hermione still had to fight against that fluttery feeling in her stomach caused by that brief contact as Tom had bent up again and turned towards the portrait of the Fat Lady.

"Velvet ant," he whispered the password to the common room.

"Right you are, my dear boy," the Fat Lady announced contently as her eyes wandered over Tom's form, seemingly enjoying what she saw.

Then the portrait sprung open thus revealing the way into the Gryffindor common room. Tom turned around to Hermione again and she saw that the provoking smirk was now back on his face as his eyes wandered over her body.

"If you have nightmares again you can always come and sleep in my bed," he whispered in his silky voice into her ear after he had stepped closer to her again.

Then he placed a gentle kiss on her cheek and threw a last smirk her way before he turned around and walked confidently away. A smile stole on Hermione's face as she watched his retreating back, then she stepped through the portrait hole and entered the Gryffindor common room.

---

Tom was on his way to the Slytherin common room, deep in thought. He had instantly recognized that expression on Hermione's face as she had looked at him in the Great Hall. There had been so much sorrow in her eyes, so much despair. The first time he had seen that look on her had been at Christmas as she had broken down in his arms. What had happened to her?

This was yet another secret Hermione had from him. Though this one seemed to be really important. Something had hurt her, broken her. Tom was determined to find out what had happened to her. Maybe he should have stayed with her now? But Hermione was still a little insecure in his presence. He knew that and he needed to change that. But it wouldn't help his case if he forced himself upon her. So he had left her alone for now.

He turned into another corridor and an evil smirk formed on his face as he saw that group of Gryffindors walking down the same corridor towards him. Weren't those Hermione's redundant friends? Tom's cold eyes wandered over Longbottom's form. He remembered how he had grabbed Hermione by her wrist and how he had wrapped his arm around her shoulders. Tom wouldn't tolerate such behaviour. No-one, aside from himself, was allowed to touch her. He could feel his magic awakening and it began to rage furiously inside of him.

Longbottom was pathetic. A weak wizard. Just an inapt fool, really. Why did Hermione insist on being friends with such an idiot? Tom's smirk grew wider as he saw Longbottom scowl at him darkly. He was accompanied by those other Gryffindors Hermione deemed to be her friends. The red haired one was obviously a Weasley. The other one was Amarys Lupin. That one seemed to be a little brighter than his two sidekicks. But not really a threat to Tom. Then again, who was a threat to him? Tom smiled conceitedly.

He then raised an eyebrow at Longbottom who had stopped walking and now stared at Tom provocingly. What did that git think he was doing? Tom thought amused. It certainly wasn't a very good idea to defy him. Since that old coot had taken his wand from him before the break Tom hadn't been able to use his more darker curses. His hand itched to pull his wand and hurl some of those curses at Longbottom. But he knew he couldn't just curse him. Hermione would surely hear about it. But after Tom had seen Longbottom touch her he had decided to stop playing his front of the polite model student around those Gryffindor boys. He needed to show Longbottom his place. He couldn't do that while still maintaining his mask of innocence. Right now Hermione wasn't around, so why the hell not spite those idiots a little? Tom eyed the three Gryffindors mockingly.

"Look at that, three Gryffindors. What an honour," he smiled at them disarmingly but there was cruel sarcasm dripping from the words.

It was amusing to watch Longbottom narrow his eyes at him. That git was so easy to spite. Almost too simple actually, Tom thought as he watched the angry purple colour taking shape on Longottom's face.

"See?" Longbottom now hissed at the Weasley boy. "I told you he is an evil asshole." Then he turned towards Tom and yelled at him in anger, "I won't repeat myself, you stay away from Hermione."

Tom chuckled at that pitiful attempt of at threat. Then he said in a bored voice, "You know, I don't think I'm going to do that."

How easy it was to rile that idiot up. Just a few lies and threats and Longbottom would surely try to curse Tom. A perfect excuse for Tom to attack in return. After all, he had to defend himself, hadn't he?

"I'm not intending to let her get away with her insolent behaviour towards me," Tom told them in a light tone.

As expected Longbottom's furious glare became even darker. Tom noticed that even the two other Gryffindors now stared at him enraged and a little surprised too. Well, it was always a shock for them if the people around him suddenly saw his true nature, Tom thought as he enjoyed this expression of honest indignation on their faces.

"Leave Hermione alone!" Longbottom yelled furiously. "I won't allow you to hurt her!"

Tom sneered at him darkly, "Like you are able to stop me. If I want to hurt her then you can't do anything about it."

He watched in cold amusement how Longbottom seemed to lose the little self control he still possessed. Even if he had wanted to, Tom couldn't have stopped that look of disdain he now cast at Longbottom. The two other Gryffindors still stared at him in surprise and shock.

"There's something seriously wrong with you, Riddle!" Longbottom now yelled at him rather furiously. "Hermione didn't do anything to you. Keep away from her!"

Tom sneered at him in a derogatory way. "You should accept the facts, Longbottom." He hissed the name with so much contempt that it sounded more like an insult. "If I decide to punish her for her cheek, then there is nothing you or your little friends can do about that. You really can't compete with me."

Tom had expected Longbottom to draw his wand and try to curse him but suddenly that idiotic boy just lunged at him. He grabbed Tom by his collar and rammed him violently against the corridor wall. Tom nearly gasped in pain as his back collided hard with the stone wall. Those gashes on his back still weren't healed completely. And now they stung again sharply. Tom could even feel blood starting to trickle down his skin. That pain combined with someone grabbing him by his collar and choking him made him lose his self-restraint. It reminded him too much of how Carter treated him.

"You are not going anywhere near Hermione!" Longbottom yelled at him furiously.

But Tom didn't reply anything to him he just pulled his wand and brandished it in the familiar pattern.

"Lacesso," Tom hissed.

The dark curse left his wand and impacted with Longbottom's chest. He instantly let go of Tom's collar as he was hurled back and collided hard with the floor. Tom stepped away from the wall he had been pushed into. He was really angry now. No-one was allowed to attack him like that. He brandished his wand and again sent the lacesso curse at Longbottom who by now tried to get back on his feet. The curse crashed into him and sent him flying against the opposite wall. Tom wasn't really surprised to be able to hit this stupid git two times in a row with the same curse. He was just deciding which curse to use next as he saw in the corner of his eyes a red spell being hurled at him. It didn't take much to identify this basic spell. The stupefy spell, of course. Tom rolled his eyes as he waved his wand lazily. The red spell changed its course and crashed harmlessly into the corridor wall beside Tom.

A cruel smile curled up his lips as he let his gaze sweep over the scene in front of him. Weasley helped a still shaken Longbottom to stand up while Lupin aimed his wand at Tom. It had obviously been him who had hurled the stunner at Tom. All three Gryffindors had a ridiculously angry expression on their faces. As if they could hurt him in any way, Tom thought haughtily. And now that Longbottom was standing again he and Weasely, too, raised their wands and aimed it at Tom.

Longbottom looked shaken but he still yelled at Tom enraged, "You sick bastard!"

Which only made Tom laugh out loud. That seemed to anger Longbottom even more as he now waved his wand.

"Reducto!" Longbottom shouted, followed by Weasley's "Petrificus totalus!" Lupin on the other hand cast a nonverbal spell but it took no genius to recognize the spell as a simple binding spell. The three spells rushed towards Tom.

At least they can aim, he thought amused and snickered darkly.

Then he waved his own wand in a small movement. Instantly a glowing dark-red orb appeared in front of him. It wasn't very big just the size of one of those crystal balls used to scry. The glowing red orb hovered in front of Tom. Sure enough the three curses the Gryffindors had hurled his way were gravitated towards the red orb. They impacted with the surface of the orb and merged with it. The red glow intensified and Tom noticed amused the looks of shock on the faces of his opponents.

How very pathetic, Tom thought arrogantly as he now sent his magic through his wand and towards the red orb. The orb obeyed him and rushed towards the Gryffindors. As the red orb was near enough Tom flicked his wand which made the orb stop before it blew up in a rather beautiful red colour. All three of them were thrown away by the force behind Tom's spell. They collided hard with the wall behind them. Before they could catch their breath again Tom waved his wand to disarm his opponents. He watched with satisfaction how the three wands flew from their owners and landed with a loud clacking noise some distance away in the corridor. All three Gryffindors were now completely unable to continue the fight. And Tom had only used one simple curse to do that. Really, how pathetic was that?
He took a confident step towards them and still watched the scene in front of him amused. The Gryffindors tried to get back up while they glared at him furiously. Tom just grinned at them.

"Don't think this is the end of it, freak," Longbottom now snarled at him.

The grin on Tom's face dropped. This dipshit never learned, did he? First he had the audacity to touch Hermione and now he kept insulting Tom? That was just intolerable, he thought. He could feel his magic swirl around him angrily as he waved his wand.

_Noceo!_ he cast a nonverbal spell at Longbottom.

Bright green strands of magic left his wand and flew towards Longbottom. Tom watched with satisfaction how those green veins of magic trailed themselves around Longbottom's body. As Tom's magic touched his body Longbottom fell down on his knees and began to scream. A cruel smile formed on Tom's face as he now saw the other boy bending over in pain. Tom pointed his wand at the Gryffindor to maintain the dark curse. The smile still tugged at the corners of his mouth as he observed how Weasely crouched down beside his friend and tried to help him getting rid of those green veins. _What a wasteful effort_, Tom thought as he could still feel his magic rushing angrily through his wand and towards Longbottom. The spell he had just cast was very dark magic so he doubted any of those Gryffindors knew the actual counter curse to his attack. Tom smiled evily down at the Gryffindor who still squirmed in pain. But after a while Longbottom's painful screams started to bore Tom and he had enough of standing around in this corridor. He still had more important things to do. So he ended the curse before he confidently stowed his wand away in his pocket. The green veins of magic around Longbottom's body flickered and then died. The Gryffindor stopped screaming in pain and his two friends held him now so that he didn't fall over.

"Do you even have an idea what spell you just used?" Tom's eyes wandered to Lupin who had asked the question in a shocked tone.

He raised one eyebrow, slightly impressed. That Lupin boy really knew a bit. The noceo spell was a very dark spell and not widely known. But that honest outrage in Lupin's voice was just absurd.

Tom smiled at the boy viciously as he said in a snide tone, "Believe me that was nothing compared to my more painful curses." His smile grew wider as he added arrogantly, "Do you want me to show you?"

Tom sniggered as he saw that indignation in Lupin's eyes. Then he cast a last malicious smirk at the three Gryffindor boys before he turned around and walked calmly away.

_That certainly was entertaining._

Tom left the Gryffindors behind and stalked confidently in direction of the dungeons. After this display of his power those Gryffindor boys would surely stop getting in between him and his plans to gain Hermione. And if not, Tom thought as a frightening smile formed on his face, he had no problem with explaining them again what a bad idea it was to anger him.

Hermione lay curled up on her Gryffindor bed. She had the curtains drawn and enjoyed the silence in the dormitory. The other girls were still down in the Great Hall and, thankfully, Hermione didn't have to endure their chatter. Right now she felt surprisingly calm and no dark thoughts ripped at her mind anymore. Since History of Magic she had felt extremely down. Her situation here in the past had seemed so hopeless. But since Tom had embraced her so comfortingly that hopelessness had somehow left her.
One of her hands skimmed subconsciously over her cheek where Tom had kissed her while her other hand held Peverell's manuscript in place so she could read in it. Peverell's words were still hard to understand. And he still hadn't mentioned the Elder Wand in any way. After a while Hermione came across one of his personal notes again. It was somehow odd and she didn't know what to make of it.

Those ridiculous idiots! Such absurd ignorance I am confronted with. It is like throwing pearls before swine! There are not enough insults to do justice to the foolery of those people.

After I had created that masterpiece, my perfect looking-glass, I travelled to the city of Chester to show it to my fellow magicians as I wanted to share my brilliance with them. Chester is known throughout the country for its knowledge and achievements in the magical art so I was convinced the magical folk there would recognize my creation for what it was, a magical object in perfection.

But they did not! They were blinded by the rigidity of their own less-gifted comprehension of the magical arts. So they badmouthed the noble name of Peverell and even called my creation evil and fiendish. Could they not see the beauty behind my curse? I was scandalized by their stupidity and stubbornness as I had expected those so-called scholars to be more open minded. But they insisted that my way of Magic is of foul nature and a perverted venture leading right into hell itself. They even wanted me to forswear. How ridiculous! I will never do such a thing. I left that disgusting city and its narrow minded inhabitants behind. I will never return into their community. My way of Magic, of freeing it from its century old restrictions, is the only true way. So I decided to break with the other magical folk and turn my back on them.

Now that I no longer have to follow the oath I had sworn to the magical community, I am finally free. I will work unyieldingly to shake of the yoke that has for far too long hemmed that wonderful force, called Magic.

Tom stole out of the Slytherin common room. It was already after curfew but there was still one thing he had to take care of today. Slowly it was getting an inconvenience, those meetings with his knights, Tom thought as he walked down the dark passageways. He wondered really if it was worth the effort anymore. But those idiots were still useful to him. For it to stay this way Tom needed to maintain the influence he had on them. Though influence wasn't the right word…

More like total control, he thought as a sinister smile played around his mouth.

He quickly reached the fourth floor and found his knights already waiting for him before the entrance to the Come and Go room, as they should be. Tom walked over to them and noticed with satisfaction how they made room for him, even inclined their heads slightly to show their respect.

"Open the room," Tom ordered Avery.

Avery instantly obeyed and began to walk to and fro in front of the entrance to the Come and Go room. He knew what the room was expected to look like. After he had passed the entrance for the third time a wooden door appeared where moments before had only been bare stone wall. Then Avery stepped forward and opened the door so that Tom could walk inside. Tom stepped inside and let his gaze sweep over the room. It was a rather large room. The floor was tiled with black, shiny flagstones and the walls were carved out of rough stone. On either side of the room were huge, richly decorated windows which let the last rays of the dying sun fall into the room, diving it into a blood red light. From the ceiling hung oil lambs, burning with a flickering flame.

Tom strolled over to the only seat in the room standing right under one of the windows. He sat comfortably down on the wooden chair, though it actually looked more like a throne. It was made of dark wood and fine figures were carved out of it. The armrests resembled two curling snakes on which Tom now leaned one arm. His gaze wandered over the group of his followers. They had gathered in front of him in a deferential distance and were looking at him with admiration and, Tom noted amused, a good amount of fear.

"My knights," Tom said while he eyed the Slytherins in front of him. "It's already too long since we had our last meeting." Then he added in a cold voice while letting his eyes wander threateningly over his followers, "I hope you stayed true to our ideals in the meantime."

A cold smile tugged at the corners of his mouth as he heard the fearfully muttered affirmations from his knights.

"Good," Tom said. "Malfoy, step forward. I have a job for you."

Malfoy left the group and approached Tom slowly then he stopped, still a distance away from Tom. Tom reached for the inner pocket of his robe to produce the folded copy of today's Daily Prophet out of it. Then he held the paper out for Malfoy to take. The fair haired boy accepted it from him and then looked at Tom expectantly.

"There was something stolen from a certain Nicolas Flamel," Tom told him lightly. "I want you to find out as much as you can about that theft, especially what exactly it was that was stolen."

"Of course," Malfoy said in his smooth voice.

Tom gestured for him to step back again. Malfoy inclined his head elegantly before he joined the other Slytherins again. Tom wasn't sure whether Hermione really was involved with that burglary of Flamel's flat but he intended to find out. Malfoy had, through his family, excellent contacts not only into the political world but also into the Auror division.

Tom looked back at the group of boys standing in front of him and a cruel smile formed on his face. "Now let us begin with our little meeting."
Next morning Hermione woke up and found Peverell's manuscript lying on her chest. She must have fallen asleep while reading it last night. She lifted the book up and scowled at its leather cover. That book proved to be really bothersome. Hermione had never read such a complex book. It was frustrating. To top it off Peverell had the annoying habit to jump abruptly from one topic to the next without any explanation. It was almost impossible to follow him. Hermione had to admit that at times she didn't manage to understand what he was writing about. She could just hope that when, or rather if, he started to write about the Elder Wand she would be able to at least grasp the concept.

She sighed, rolled over and stood up from her bed. Then she stowed to book away in its secret compartment in her trunk. Her dorm mates seemed to still be asleep. Hermione noticed relieved. Somehow they were slowly getting on her nerves. Their shallow chatter was rather hard to endure. The only exception was maybe Diana Potter. She was not as annoying as the other girls.

A while later Hermione climbed down the stairs to the common room. A small smile appeared on her face as her eyes wandered over the common room. It was one of the few things that hadn't changed due to her time travel. The wallpapers were still Gryffindor red, the sofas still invitingly soft. Just like she remembered it to be from her time in Hogwarts. It was nice to find something like home in this strange land she was stranded in.

As her gaze wandered over the room it finally fell on the three boys sitting on one of the sofas at the far end of the room. Hermione furrowed her brow. It was very seldom for Longbottom or Weasley to be up so early. Lupin, she could understand, he was quite often up even before Hermione. But Longbottom or Weasley? And today she had gotten up even earlier than normal. Hermione walked over to them. As she approached them the frown on her face grew even deeper. She could see that Longbottom had rolled up the sleeve of his shirt, and there was an ugly red mark on his arm. It looked as if something had wound itself around his arm and had left behind a mark on his skin that looked like a burn. Lupin was right now imbuing some potion on a cloth.

"Ouch, watch it!" Longbottom winced as Lupin began to dab his arm with the cloth.

"Don't be such a wimp, Marc," Lupin said in his calm voice while he continued to treat the other boy's wounds.

Hermione had by now reached their sofa and looked down at the angry red gashes on Longbottom's arm.

"What happened?" she asked him concerned.

The heads of all three boys shot up and they stared at her. Obviously they hadn't noticed her walking over to them. Hermione's gaze wandered over Longbottom's exposed arm. Those wounds looked rather painful and they seemed to continue beyond the part of skin that she could see right now.

"What happened to your arm?" Hermione asked again.

The boys still stared at her, not saying anything. Hermione frowned at them. Why were they suddenly so odd?

Finally Longbottom said in a nervous tone, "Hermione, where did you appear from so suddenly?"

"I didn't appear. I just walked over to you," she replied before she continued in a strict voice. "Now, what happened to you?"
Longbottom seemed to squirm in his seat under her scrutinizing gaze. Hermione was really curious now. Then Lupin cleared his throat and she looked over to him expectantly.

"It's nothing serious," he told her in his calm voice. Though Hermione noticed that he seemed to hide something. Then he continued, "Really, you don't have to worry."

"'Nothing serious'..." Hermione repeated slowly as she again scanned Longbottom's injured arm. Then her eyes flashed back at Lupin. "It doesn't look so harmless to me."

This time Lupin didn't answer but avoided her eyes. It looked like her three friends didn't want to tell her. It almost seemed as if they kept silent because they didn't want to frighten her with whatever it was that had happened to Longbottom. That plan certainly didn't work as she was now very alarmed by their silence. She sat down on the table in front of the sofa and scanned her friends. All three of them didn't meet her gaze.

"You can tell me," Hermione said in a gentle voice, trying to coax them into telling her. "I can deal with whatever it is."

Longbottom looked now at her rather concerned then he said in a soft voice, "Look, you would only feel frightened if we told you."

She cast him a small smile. "Whatever it is, Marc, I really can deal with it." She leaned a little closer to him and then said, "Just tell me."

Longbottom looked at her and after a while he seemed to cave in. Then he said in a low voice, "It was Riddle."

Hermione's eyes widened in shock then they darted to the painful looking wounds on his arm. "To-Riddle did that?"

She looked up at Longbottom. He eyed her concerned. Hermione jerked as she felt a hand on her arm.

"You don't need to worry," Lupin said in a soothing tone. "He won't get to you."

She stared at Lupin. "Why would he? It was Marc he attacked, not me," she asked confused. "Why did he do that?"

"That lousy bastard threatened you during Charms," Longbottom suddenly said furiously. "So I told him to stay away from you. Then he attacked me."

Hermione looked at Longbottom's now angry face. She was quite shocked that Tom had attacked him. Though why was she so surprised? He was Voldemort after all. Did he really need a reason to be evil?

"Hermione you need to be very careful now." Lupin's voice told her seriously. "Riddle is really ruthless. He's told us he would be after you now."

Hermione stared at Lupin.

"He did not," she said incredulously.

"You really don't have to worry." Longbottom tried to reassure. "Whatever happens we won't let him get to you."
Hermione eyed the three boys in front of her. They seemed to be really concerned about her. Whatever Tom had told them it seemed to have shaken them quite a bit.

"You don't need to protect me," she told them in a firm voice. "I can defend myself."

She didn't want them to feel responsible for her. They were normally so cheerful people and Hermione didn't want to pull them into her world full of problems.

"Hermione," Lupin now said in a grave voice. "We know that you can look after yourself. But Riddle is incredibly powerful. And he doesn't hesitate to use Dark Magic. He even used the Noceo curse on Marc."

Hermione's eyes widened as she stared at Lupin. She knew that spell well. It was a very dark curse and its sole purpose was to inflict pain on its victim. Similar to the Cruciatius curse. The Noceo curse left painful traces on the person it had been cast on. Hermione suddenly felt anger burning up in her. Why did Tom always need to do things like this? How could he sometimes be so gentle but then hurl the most evil of curses at people? Hermione's hands balled into tight fists as she stared enraged at Longbottom's arm. She could feel herself losing her temper now and her magic awakened and began to angrily pulse through her. So Hermione abruptly got up from her place on the table. Then she turned around and stalked over to the exit from the common room. She stepped through the entrance hole and ignored her friends calling after her. If she was going to explode then she would make sure that it would hit the right one.

Her magic was raging inside of her as she walked the corridors of the castle and climbed down the stairs, ignoring the other students she met, until she arrived in the dungeons. Actually she had no idea where exactly the entrance to the Slytherin common room was. But she was pretty sure to run across Tom somewhere here. At least that was the direction the Slytherins always came from on their way to the Great Hall. Her magic was still flowing angrily through her as she stalked down the corridors.

How could Tom have hit Longbottom with such a dark curse? What was it that drove him to always do such cruel things?

She had by now met a few Slytherins on their way to the Great Hall, needless to say that all of them had either glared evilly or hissed offensive things at that Gryffindor girl that dared to enter snake territory. But Hermione wasn't in the least bit concerned by their behaviour she was still too angry to pay them any heed. As she rounded the next corner she finally found what she had been searching for. Her gaze fell on a group of Slytherins. Her eyes narrowed angrily as she recognized Tom. There he was, walking down the corridor calmly as if nothing had happened. Of course, Hermione thought enraged, he was surrounded by his henchmen. There were Avery, Lestrange, Malfoy, Black and the last one must be Alba. Why did those Slytherins always need to look so evil and dark, she wondered briefly as her eyes travelled over the group before her.

Really what is the Sorting Hat thinking? Hermione wondered enraged. 'Let's sort all the evil people in one house, so they don't bother the normal ones'?

By now Tom had obviously seen her standing in the corridor as he now raised an eyebrow questioningly at her. Hermione nearly shook her head. As if he didn't know perfectly well why she would be here. Tom stopped in front of her and looked down at her with his unfathomable, grey eyes. His stupid followers had stopped too and now glared at her threateningly. But Hermione was way too enraged to notice their hostile glares. She looked up at Tom and fixed him with her angry stare, which only made him frown at her.

"You!" Hermione hissed at him furiously while she jabbed her index finger into his chest. "What have you done?"
She could hear outraged and angry whispers coming from his followers as they saw her speaking to their leader in that way. They seemed to be quite annoyed by her impertinence. But Hermione was still too angry to care about their aggressive behaviour.

"What do you mean?" Tom answered her in his calm and smooth voice.

"Don't play dumb, Tom!" she snarled at him, seething with anger.

In the corners of her eyes Hermione could see his followers shuffling and stepping closer to her. But she wasn't fazed by their behaviour. If they wanted to curse her, she was ready for them. She just had to flex her wrist to get her wand. Right now she was furious enough to hex them all into oblivion. Tom wasn't answering her but continued to look at her in polite expectation. His behaviour irritated her to no end.

She finally snapped and yelled at him furiously, "You cursed Marc yesterday!"

As he heard the name a dangerous glint seeped into Tom's grey eyes. "Longbottom?" he asked softly but there was now a deathly cold touch in his voice.

"Yes, Marc Longbottom!" Hermione hissed at him enraged. "Do you always have to hurt people? What's wrong with you?"

There was now a murderous glimmer in his icy cold eyes as he said, still in that eerily calm voice, "He just got what he deserved."

Hermione drowned him in a withering look before she snapped at him snidely, "You are really just an evil bully, aren't you?"

Tom glowered at her darkly but before he could retort anything Hermione heard another voice hissing threateningly at her, "Shut up!"

Hermione pulled her wand as she turned around in one swift movement. She found one of the other Slytherins glaring at her fiercely while he pointed his wand at her. Hermione recognized him. He was Primus Lestrange, a tall, burly boy with a brutal look on his face.

"I'm going to teach you never to speak to your superiors like that, little slut!" Lestrange spat at her while there was a murderous look on his face.

"Pff, superior," Hermione scoffed at him. "Don't make me laugh!"

Her statement was followed by angry hisses and threatening glares from the other Slytherins. Hermione fell into her dueling stance as she saw the other boys following Lestrange's example and pulling their wands, too.

"You are going to regret your insolence!" Lestrange now snarled at her darkly.

Then he waved his wand furiously but Hermione was prepared. She just started to brandish her own wand as she heard a commanding voice from behind her,

"Stop."

Lestrange really stopped his attack and even lowered his wand though the murderous look didn't leave his face as he fixed Hermione with a glare. She turned her head slightly to have a look at Tom who had just ordered Lestrange to abandon his attack. Tom's hard gaze was gliding over the group of boys standing in front of him. They seemed to squirm uncomfortably as his cold eyes scanned
Finally Tom said in a soft voice that nevertheless carried the air of authority, "Leave now."

"Please, Riddle, let us have her," Lestrange started to plead with Tom.

"Yeah." Now it was Avery who spoke. His eyes travelled over Hermione's body in an offending way. "We'll show her never to speak to you like that."

Hermione really didn't like Avery. There always was this disturbing glint in his eyes when his gaze fell on her. And right now he was glaring at her darkly while he still held his wand in his hand. Actually Hermione didn't know how strong Tom's followers were. So far she had never really fought against them. Aside from that time as they had attacked her in the corridor before they had dragged her to the edge of the Forbidden Forest. But back then Tom had been fighting on their side. Hermione was very confident in her own magic but currently she was facing five opponents which never was a good position. On top of that her opponents were something like Death Eaters and she didn't have good experiences with fighting them. Her grip on her wand tightened and she subconsciously stepped a little away from the Slytherins in front of her and towards Tom.

"I said leave," Tom hissed at them. The fearsome tone in his voice made chills darting down her spine. "I'm not going to repeat myself again."

Hermione watched as the group of Slytherins now reluctantly stowed their wands away again and then started to walk away. Of course not without throwing threatening glares her way. She didn't lower her wand until she could watch them rounding the next corner. Then she released a relieved breath of air. She knew they were not nearly as dangerous as the Death Eaters she had had to fight in her time period but they still made her feel uncomfortable.

"So, what were you just accusing me of?" She then heard Tom's unemotional and cold voice coming from behind her.

She turned around and all her worries about future Death Eaters left her and were replaced by anger as she faced Tom again. He was looking down at her while his face was again covered by this blank mask.

Hermione scowled at him and then said in a sharp voice, "You attacked Marc."

"And you just assume that I started it?" Tom hissed at her as he took a step towards her.

"I don't care who started it, Tom. But I don't see you limping around because you have been cursed," Hermione shot at him angrily.

"Like those idiots could ever curse me," Tom sneered cockily.

"You can't just walk around and hurl dark curses at everyone you don't like," Hermione said exasperated.

Tom narrowed his eyes at her before he said with a cold tint in his voice, "Why not?"

That made Hermione run a hand frustrated through her hair. "It just doesn't work like this. Okay?" she snapped at him angrily, irritated by his lack of understanding.

Hermione nearly shuddered as Tom's gaze now wandered over her. There was a deathly cold glint in his eyes.
"It works fine for me," Tom said in a strangely calm voice though she could hear the underlying coldness seeping through his tone.

Hermione breathed in deeply. Her eyes were locked with his and she was appalled with what she saw in them. It was like a dark abyss had suddenly appeared in his beautiful grey eyes. Staring at this darkness made her feel uncomfortable. Even afraid, because she knew that darkness well. It had haunted her. Tormented her. And in the end, it had broken her.

How could she have ever believed that Voldemort had a good side?

So Hermione didn't reply anything to Tom. She just turned around and walked away. She didn't want to deal with him right now. In fact she didn't want to ever face this darkness ever again. She stomped down the dark corridors of the dungeons, annoyed by the gloomy atmosphere down here. Right now she just wanted to leave this depressing place behind. She had wasted enough time of her life in dark places. She had already walked some distance and was just beginning to climb the stairs to the first floor intending to go to the Great Hall as Tom caught up with her. Hermione ignored him completely as he fell in step with her.

They had nearly reached the first floor as Tom finally spoke again. His voice was still filled with that detached coldness. "We were in the middle of a conversation and you just walked away."

Hermione cast a sideway glance at him. He was scanning her and the anger still shone in his eyes. "Well, you should be grateful that I walked away," Hermione said snidely. "And didn't curse you. Like you would have done."

Hermione was now quite angry. Angry with Tom for hexing her friends and angry with herself for trusting Tom to actually not do evil things. Whatever had she thought? That he was not an evil Dark Lord? By now they had reached the first floor and Hermione took off towards the Great Hall. Irritatingly, Tom was still following her.

"I don't understand why you are so angry," Tom now said short-tempered. "It's not like I used any dangerous curses."

Hermione stopped walking and her head shot at him. "'Over-reacting'? she asked in disbelief. "The Noceo curse, Tom? You know what that is, don't you?" She didn't give him the time to reply but answered her own question, "Dark Magic."

Tom looked at her, furrowing his brow, then he said lightly, "Pff. Don't you think you are over-reacting a bit?"

Right now they stood before the entrance door to the Great Hall. Hermione could already hear the chatter going on in the hall as the students had their breakfast. But she didn't pay any attention to that instead she gaped at Tom.

"'Over-reacting'?" she asked outraged. "It's called Dark Magic for a reason," she finally snapped at him.

Then she turned away from him, pushed the double door open and stomped into the Great Hall. But she only managed to take a few steps until she felt Tom grasping her arm.

"Wait," said Tom while he pulled at her so that she had to turn around to him.

"What?" Hermione blustered at him. "Do you want to curse me now?"
She glared angrily up at him. Strangely though, the fury in his eyes seemed to leave quickly until there was nothing of the anger left on his face. Then Tom started to say in a quiet voice,

"I would never."

"Let her go!" another voice cut across Tom.

Hermione turned her head and nearly groaned as she saw Longbottom walking up to them. Sure enough there was an angry scowl on his face as he eyed Tom. She could even see that Longbottom's right hand had wandered to his robe pocket undoubtedly ready to pull his wand. Lupin and Weasley were hot on his heels. Tom turned to them but Hermione noticed that he didn't let go of her. He still clasped her arm tightly. Of course - Hermione rolled her eyes - the mask of blankness was back on Tom's face.

"Longbottom," Tom said swiftly. His tone was controlled but icy cold. "How nice of you to join us." His last statement was accompanied by a good amount of sarcasm.

Hermione watched how Longbottom's face now turned dark purple from fury as his eyes were fixed on Tom.

"I told you to leave her alone," he finally spat at Tom rabidly.

Hermione nearly jumped as she heard Tom beside her chuckle eerily.

"Oh yes. I forgot," Tom whispered and there was cruel amusement in his voice. "Please, remind me. Was that before or after you grovelled before me in the dirt?"

Hermione stared at Tom with wide eyes. She couldn't believe what he had just said. It wasn't only his mocking words alone. No, this cold malice underlying his tone had reminded her suddenly of who he really was. Tom's tone, his posture, the expression on his face, everything reminded Hermione of him. Lord Voldemort.

The memory of her last encounter with him in the Ministry of Magic was still burned into her mind. She remembered too well that cruel magic swirling around the Dark Lord. It had felt like his hate had manifested itself in form of his aggressive magic. Back then she had been unable to detect any emotion in him aside from hate and wrath. He had appeared to be a being made solely up from that bottomless hate. Even his words had been like poison dripping from his mouth. Only meant to hurt and to destroy.

Cruel. Merciless. Evil.

Hermione's breathing had quickened as her memories of Lord Voldemort crashed down on her again. Now she tried to wriggle away from Tom's hand. She didn't want him to touch her, not if he was like this. Like him. She couldn't bear to have him near her now.

Tom's eyes had left the three Gryffindors in front of him as he felt her struggling against his hold on her. His grey eyes scanned her and it almost looked like there was concern shining through his unreadable expression. But it couldn't be. Hermione was convinced that she had imagined things and continued to try to disentangle herself from him.

"Let go!" she said, now panic-stricken.

Tom released her. She quickly took a step away from him and stared with huge eyes up at him. She could feel her heart beating ridiculously fast. Right now, he had been Voldemort. And she had been...
They still stared at each other. The emotionless mask was covering Tom's feelings once again. Hermione was too panicky to concentrate and try to look underneath his mask. She was scared of what she might find there. She then stiffened as she could feel an arm around her shoulder, holding her gently. She turned her head and found Longbottom by her side. He glowered furiously at Tom, then Longbottom led her away from him. Surprisingly Tom didn't stop them.

Tom just didn't get why she was this enraged about that little curse he had used. Okay, it was Dark Magic but it wasn't a curse that could really inflict harm. Now Hermione just turned around and walked into the Great Hall. Ignoring him again. Tom was frustrated and annoyed by her behaviour. So he followed her into the hall and then grabbed her arm to stop her.

"Wait," he said before he twirled her around so she was forced to face him again.

She glared angrily up at him and Tom was feeling equally angry now. This whole thing was starting to threaten his plans of gaining her. He just couldn't have her running away from him. If he needed to force her to accept him he was prepared to do that.

"What?" she now hissed at him. "Do you want to curse me now?"

Merlin, no! That was the last thing he wanted to do, Tom thought as he stared down at her flushed face. Did she really think he would do something like that? He had only cursed her stupid little friends because they had gotten on his nerves. But they meant nothing to him. Completely unlike Hermione. The fury that had been boiling up in him left him quickly as he looked at her angry face. She really seemed to think he would curse her.

He needed to put that right so he opened his mouth and started to say, "I would never-"

He couldn't finish his sentence as he was interrupted by someone else. "Let her go!" an angry voice yelled at him. Tom's eyes left Hermione and quickly fell on Longbottom. And his anger was back again. Though now it was directed at the Gryffindor boy. Did he always have to stick his nose into things that didn't concern him? Tom could feel his magic rising again. It flowed through him angrily, wanting to be released. His fury peaked as he now watched how Longbottom's hand twitched, obviously getting ready to draw his wand. Tom would really like to attack that dork now. His magic was furiously begging him to do it. But he needed to restrain himself. So Tom breathed in deeply before he sneered at the Gryffindor wryly,

"Longbottom. How nice of you to join us."

Predictably that fool seemed to immediately lose all his self control again.

"I told you to leave her alone," Longbottom finally hissed at Tom.

He had needed a long time to come up with that witty a reply, hadn't he? Tom thought snidely. He chuckled softly at the other boy's stupidity.

"Oh yes. I forgot," Tom scoffed in a low voice. "Please, remind me. Was that before or after you grovelled before me in the dirt?"

It was almost sad how easy it was to rile that fool up. Tom watched in amusement how Longbottom gaped at him indignantly. His two friends behind him looked equally scandalized. They obviously couldn't believe how he could have said something like that. Well, at least his reply had been a little more artful than Longbottom's empty threat. An evil grin took form on his face as Tom scanned the three Gryffindors in front of him haughtily.

Suddenly Tom felt Hermione moving beside him. His gaze wandered from the Gryffindor boys towards her. Tom was confused as he saw that she was trying to get away from him. He was still holding her upper arm tightly but Hermione now fought against his hold on her. She looked up at him and Tom's eyes widened a little in shock as he saw panic in her hazel eyes. She seemed to be scared. Why was she suddenly this frightened? Surely not of him?

"Let go!" Hermione now said and Tom could really hear fear tingling her voice.

He quickly released her and she hastily took a step away from him, seemingly wanting to get distance between the two of them. Tom was concerned now as his eyes wandered over her form. What had scared her so?

After she had stepped away from him she looked up at him again. Then Tom could see it in her eyes. This strange flicker he had seen before in them. Sorrow and grief were again screaming at him through her eyes. This time, though, it was different. Because this time there was also fear in her eyes and that fear seemed to be directed at him. She looked at him with her huge, frightened eyes and it almost seemed as if she wasn't really seeing him but someone else. It appeared that whoever that someone was, Hermione was afraid of him. Tom wanted to step closer to her and to hold her.

But before he could do anything Longbottom had walked over to her and he now put an arm around her shoulders. Tom clenched his fists as he saw him touching Hermione again. He wanted nothing more than to curse that Gryffindor boy. But he didn't do it as he now saw how Hermione's gaze wandered from him to Longbottom. That horrible expression left her face as she looked at Longbottom. She didn't seem to be scared by him. So why had she been so afraid of Tom? He didn't stop the Gryffindor boy as he led Hermione away from him. He just didn't know what to make of the events. He definitely needed to talk with Hermione. But that wasn't a very good idea right now. In the worst case it would drive her even farther away from him. So Tom suppressed the urge to grab the girl and drag her away from the Great Hall. Instead he walked over to his own table.

Hermione just followed Longbottom. She was shaken after this display of coldness from Tom. She felt weak and sick from her memories ripping at her again. She was still rather shocked as they finally reached the Gryffindor table and sat down. Hermione quickly let her gaze sweep over the table. Had someone noticed that dispute right now? A few of the Gryffindors looked at her curiously but not all of them. Obviously no-one had noticed how serious that conflict had really been.

"Hermione, what were you thinking? Running of like that." Hermione's eyes wandered back at Lupin who had just spoken.

"Yeah, and right after we told you that Riddle is after you, too," Longbottom said with concern in his voice as he ran a hand through his blond hair making it look even more wind-swept.

"Uhm… no… I mean… you really don't have to worry about me," Hermione stuttered weakly.

"Really?" Longbottom asked in disbelief. "And what was that right now? Riddle cornered you."

"No, he didn't." Hermione really didn't want them to worry about her. "We were just talking."

"Didn't look like talking. He grabbed you. And I'm sure he was just about to curse you," Longbottom said in a strangely serious tone. "You are lucky you were in the Great Hall as it
"Yes, he won't do anything in public," Lupin told her in his calm voice, though right now even his calmness seemed to be shaken a little. "He's not stupid."

"I'm just glad he didn't catch you alone in one of the corridors," Longbottom said quietly as he stared at her in concern. "I don't want to think what he could have done to you."

Hermione broke eye contact with him and looked down at her hands. She was feeling a bit guilty now. Her friends seemed to be really worried about her. After what Tom had done yesterday she could understand where that concern was coming from. But she was still feeling too shaken by Tom's behaviour herself to try to allay their fears. Though she knew that they didn't need to worry about Tom cursing her. It should rather be her being frightened by how easily Tom had lured her into believing that he was harmless.

"Okay, come on now."

Hermione was brought out of her thoughts and looked up at Longbottom. He had gotten up from his seat and was now extending a hand towards her. She furrowed her brow at him.

"Where to?" she asked him confused.

"I'll walk you to your class room," Longbottom answered as if that was the obvious thing to do now.

Hermione continued to look at him confused. Her next class was Arithmancy now. Neither of her friends attended that class. So Longbottom had no reason to accompany her.

"Why would you?" she asked rather stupidly. "You don't have Arithmancy."

Longbottom just shook his head at her in exasperation. "I won't let you walk around alone if that evil jerk is after your blood."

"Yeah, Hermione," Weasley said, seemingly trying to calm her down. "We won't let Riddle get anywhere near you."

Lupin, who sat beside him, nodded while there was a grave but determined expression on his face. Hermione didn't know how to react. It was a nice thing to know how very much her friends liked her and how they were concerned about her well-being. But she couldn't have them trailing her every step. She still had things to do she really didn't want them to see. Like finding out what that disturbing, blue sheen wrapped around Hogwarts castle was and how it was linked with the Elder Magic. But it seemed for now she had to accept her friends' smothering concern. So she took Longbottom's hand and let him pull her up from her seat. Then she grabbed her school bag and followed him out of the Great Hall and towards her class room.

Tom watched Hermione's progress through the Great Hall with narrowed eyes. His magic screamed angrily in protest as he saw Longbottom's hand holding Hermione's. It was unbearable having to watch how that idiotic Gryffindor grabbed his possession. The worst was that Tom knew that at the moment he was unable to do anything about that. His hands balled into fists as he saw Hermione leave the Great Hall together with Longbottom. Tom had to fight the urge to go after them and show that idiot boy how lucky he had been yesterday just to be hit by the Noceo curse. There were some curses Tom needed to show Longbottom. He really didn't want Hermione to associate with that Gryffindor boy any longer. And he certainly didn't want her to be alone with him. Tom really needed to teach Hermione to stay away from Longbottom. But at the same time he knew it would only harm his matter if he used violence to achieve that. Hermione would definitely not take it. But how could he get rid of Longbottom without having her hate him again?

If she doesn't already hate me, he thought in frustration.

He nearly cringed as he remembered that look on her face just now as he had held her arm. Before that she had been really angry with him. He shouldn't be surprised by that. He had to admit it, it had been a huge mistake that he cursed her stupid friends. What had he expected? That she would never find out about it? Or that she would forgive him? No, it had been imprudent and just rash having attacked her friends. Of course she wouldn't just consent with his actions. Hermione was after all very protective and on top of that hot-tempered too. That was partly the reason why he was so interested in her in the first place but it made dealing with her all the more difficult. He should never have cursed Longbottom. At least not at this point in time where every tiny little detail could sway Hermione's opinion of him in the wrong direction.

Tom leaned frustrated back in his chair. He breathed in sharply as his back hit the chair. Some of the gashes on his back had broken open as Longbottom had hurled him against the wall yesterday and now they hurt again rather badly. All the more reason why he wanted to murder Longbottom right now.

It was that stupid boy's fault that Tom had lost his composure yesterday. Tom never lost his composure. He had learned too well after his first year what could happen if he lost his self-control. He had never planned to curse the three Gryffindors in that corridor. Yes, he had wanted the jibe them a little bit but he had never planned to really curse them. He had known that Hermione would never approve of such behaviour. But he had just lost control and that had now gotten him into this mess. If he ever wanted Hermione to trust him, he needed to get a grip on himself.

Tom was brought out of his dark thoughts as he noticed someone standing beside him. He turned his head and nearly groaned as he found Avery standing beside his seat, looking rather nervous and obviously trying to catch Tom's attention.

"Yes?" Tom asked impatiently.

He didn't want to deal with this idiot now. Avery made his already bad temper even worse. So Tom glared at him angrily which made the other boy flinch away a little from Tom.

"We… we just wanted to ask you when the next meeting is taking place," Avery said in a slightly shaky voice. "You never told us yesterday."

Tom narrowed his eyes at him. Then he abruptly got up from his seat thus making Avery shy away from him even more. As he passed Avery Tom hissed at him in a cold voice, "Then it seems you have to wait until I do tell you, doesn't it?"

With that said Tom left the Great Hall without looking back. His magic still boiled angrily inside of him and he was frustrated that he was unable to vent his anger on the one who was responsible for his foul mood.

{{{{{{{{+}}}}}}}}

Hermione sat in her Arithmancy class with her quill in hand and an empty piece of parchment in front of her. Somehow she just couldn't concentrate on the lesson. She stared at the professor, standing in front of the class, but she didn't really hear what he was lecturing about. At least she didn't need to worry about the professor addressing her unexpectedly because he had never, in the whole school year, asked her anything. Even if she had raised her hand he had never picked her. She was the only girl in Arithmancy so Hermione assumed that this was another forties thing. Obviously people thought it impossible for a woman to know how to do math. She had stopped to try to get professor Gauß' attention very early in the school year and had contented herself with taking down his explanations. This being ignored and belittled had always frustrated her but today she was glad to be left alone. Because there were a few things running through her head right now.

Her fingers played nervously with her quill, threatening to break it. But she was too distracted by her thoughts to notice how she ruined her writing utensil.

Hermione was more than annoyed with herself. She had told herself again and again to stay away from Tom. But she had just ignored that resolution. It had only been a matter of time until something bad would happen. Her thoughts wandered back to those painful-looking burn marks she had seen on Longbottom's arm. Immediately her anger rose again. How could Tom have done something like this? But somehow she should be glad about it, because now she had finally realized how dangerous he really was. If that curse he had used on Longbottom wasn't enough to convince her, she only had to think back to how he had just now behaved in the Great Hall. It still made her shudder as she remembered how Tom had insulted Longbottom. He had scoffed and laughed at the other boy, obviously enjoying his discomfort. But this cold amusement he had shown wasn't even the worst. No, what really had unsettled Hermione were the things Tom had hid underneath that condescending mask. She had seen a glimpse of his hate and malice that seemed to always burn inside of him. What had scared her so, was the fact that this hate was all too familiar to her. The Dark Lord had radiated the same deathly cold hate. The only difference was that Lord Voldemort just hadn't gone through the trouble of hiding his hate any longer. Hermione knew that whatever this hate touched, would be destroyed. She desperately tried to forget this abysmal hate. To be confronted with it once again had been just terrible. It had been unexpected. Because during the break, Tom had never been like that. He hadn't been frightening or intimidating in any way.

Yes, and you know why, don't you? an angry voice scoffed at her which made her sigh softly. Yes, she did know why Tom had started to appear so harmless: During the break he didn't have his wand.

He had appeared so nice not because he actually was nice but because he didn't have the opportunity to do his evil deeds. But now his magic was back, his power was back, and the first thing he did was attacking her friends. Totally unprovoked surely. Hermione knew that Tom was magically a lot stronger than Longbottom. So how could Longbottom have forced Tom to use those spells? No, the most likely scenario was that Tom had attacked him just because he didn't like Longbottom and wanted him to suffer.

Hermione closed her eyes and breathed in deeply. As she opened them again her gaze wandered down to the now ruined quill in her hand. She put the broken quill down on the table but didn't reach for her bag to get her spare one. She wasn't intending to follow the lesson anyway, so why bother?

As the lesson was finally over Hermione had come to a conclusion. There really wasn't much of a choice. She needed to stay away from Tom, ignore her traitorous feelings and find a way back home. She knew what she was giving up by evading Tom. He was the only one who could make her feel whole again, not broken anymore. But it wouldn't be the first time that she had had to sacrifice something to complete a mission.

Professor Gauß ended the lesson and Hermione stuffed her unused parchment and the broken quill into her bag then she got up from her place and left the Arithmancy class room. As she stepped into the corridor she found Lupin leaning against the wall and obviously waiting for her. Her friends seemed to take that bodyguard business rather seriously. She didn't know whether she should be annoyed by that or relieved. But hopefully it would help her staying away from Tom.

"How was the lesson?" Lupin asked her as she had reached him.
She shrugged her shoulders and said, "Rather boring."

Lupin beamed at her and then said, "Well, what do you expect. It's Arithmancy after all."

Hermione couldn't help but smirk. It didn't happen often that Lupin was talking that snidely about any lesson.

"No fan of numbers and equations then?" she asked him in a mocking tone.

Lupin grinned down at her and said, "Not really." Then he asked, "So, what's your next class?"

"Free period."

"What did you plan to do?"

Hermione had to make something up now. She couldn't very well tell him what she had really planned. The truth was definitely not a good idea here. She actually wanted to go and have a look at that strange blue sheen that surrounded Hogwarts. Or she might read a new chapter in Peverell's manuscript. She really needed a way to travel forward in time. It would be funny to see Lupin's face if she was to tell him about her plans but that wasn't worth it to be locked away in St. Mungo's wing for mental illnesses.

So Hermione said, "I wanted to go to the library. You know, start on that essay for professor Merrythought."

"Perfect," Lupin said while he pushed away from the wall. "I wanted to go to the library too."

Hermione nearly groaned. She had hoped that Lupin would just bring her to the library and then leave her alone. Giving her the opportunity to do her own stuff. But it seemed she had no such luck. So she had no other choice but to follow Lupin down to the library. Who would have thought that she would ever be pissed by having to go to the library? Hermione wondered shortly. But she had no time to dwell on that thought as they had finally reached the entrance to the library.

"Ah, Ms DeCerto," Ms Peters, the librarian, greeted her kindly. Then her gaze wandered to Lupin beside her. "And Mr Lupin, too. I was wondering when I would see you two again. And it's already the second day after the break. However did you manage to stay away from the books for so long?" she asked with friendly taunt in her voice.

Hermione beamed at her.

"Hurry along then." Ms Peters smiled fondly at them. "But be warned it's rather crowded today. Professor Kettleburn is sick today so his classes had to be cancelled."

"Yes, thank you," Hermione said.

Then she entered the library. It seemed Ms Peters had been right. There were a lot of students sitting at the tables, doing their homework. Hermione sighed. It seemed to be hopeless to find themselves a free space.

They had to walk nearly all the length of the library to finally find a free table. Hermione went over to the table but before she reached it she stopped dead in her tracks. Her gaze had wandered to the neighbouring table and she had spotted Tom sitting there. Right now he was looking up from the book he had been reading in and his eyes quickly found hers and locked with them. Hermione breathed in sharply as she was once again caught in those beautiful grey eyes.
Lupin beside her had spotted Tom, too, and was now leaning down to Hermione and whispered in her ear, "We can just leave. You can write that essay in the common room."

Hermione still stared with wide eyes at Tom. Why was it so difficult to just evade him? How was she going to ignore him when her heart started to beat so fast whenever she met him?

"No… it's okay," she answered Lupin in a soft tone. "Let's stay."

"You sure?" Lupin asked and there was concern tinting his voice.

She just nodded and continued her way towards the table. She sat down, opened her bag and pulled a piece of parchment and her undamaged spare quill out of it. She was annoyed how nervous she felt just because Tom was sitting not far away. If she wanted to forget him, she really needed to get a grip on herself. She risked another glance at Tom and found him still staring at her. His face was a blank. But Hermione couldn't help but notice how his eyes sparkled softly as he looked at her. She quickly averted her eyes and bit her lip. She mustn't let herself being seduced by him again. This whole thing was ridiculous anyway. She couldn't run around losing her nerves because of a stupid crush. She had a lot of other, more pressing problems. Her thoughts involuntarily wandered back to the last day of the holidays. They had kissed then. For the first time since an eternity that horrible loneliness had left her and she had felt safe and even protected in his arms. It was so very tempting, that comfort Tom was offering her. But it was an illusion, wasn't it?

Hermione ran a shaky hand through her hair. She knew that he was still staring at her, probably with that strangely concerned look in his soft grey eyes. But Hermione knew that the nice persona he now always played in her presence wasn't his true self. His true self had attacked Longbottom so cruelly yesterday with no reason at all other than that Tom didn't like him. Hermione tried to block all thoughts of Tom out of her mind. She didn't want to think about her problems any longer so she concentrated on the essay she had to finish for Charms.

Tom stared at Hermione sitting at the opposite table and frustration washed over him. Right now she was writing something down, probably working on some essay or other. She had done that for the last hour. Without ever looking in his direction. It seemed as if she was purposefully ignoring him. Maybe he should just approach her now? But that Gryffindor boy, Lupin, was still sitting beside her. Tom needed to talk with her alone. Without one of her friends being around and influencing her.

Oh, if he could just cast a curse at that annoying boy. Then Tom would grab Hermione and force her to stay with him, where she belonged. But unfortunately he couldn't do that. Cursing her bothersome friends had led to her ignoring him in the first place.

Tom felt his magic raging inside of him furiously as he had to watch how close that Lupin boy sat to Hermione. She was still writing her essay and still ignoring Tom. If she insisted on ignoring him, he would need to change his strategy. Problem was that even if he decided to proceed more forcefully in the future that didn't guarantee his success. He knew that he couldn't force her to do anything. At least it would be very difficult to do so. She was a very powerful witch after all. To subdue her Tom would need to use curses he really didn't want to use on her. No, that was only the last resort. He would only revert back to that if all else failed. But Hermione really was difficult to handle. Since she had arrived at Hogwarts Tom had never seen her being submissive to a male in any way. Otherwise he could have used that to somehow direct her back on the right way. Her independence was rather bothersome at this moment in time.

He watched how Hermione rolled up the parchment on which she had been writing. It seemed she wanted to leave the library now. As she and Lupin got up from the table Tom decided to approach her. He didn't want to wait any longer. So he stood up and walked over to her. Hermione had obviously noticed him as she now stared at him with wide eyes. Regrettably the Gryffindor had also spotted him as he was now glaring at Tom rather darkly. Tom noted angrily how he even stepped a little in front of Hermione as if he tried to protect her. His eyes narrowed as he looked at Lupin. Hermione surely didn't need that weak wizard to protect her. Tom would do that for her.

"We told you to leave her alone," Lupin said in a tight voice.

Tom's blood was boiling and he had to work to prevent his magic from swirling around him angrily. But he contained himself, detached his gaze from Lupin and looked over to Hermione. She was still staring at him and looked rather nervous.

"I want to talk with you," Tom said.

She averted her eyes before she whispered in a soft tone, "I wouldn't know why."

Then she allowed Lupin to grab her arm and lead her away. Tom didn't follow them. It seemed his problem was even worse than he had anticipated.

It was late in the evening as Hermione wandered around the grounds of Hogwarts. She owed it to her invisibility spell that she could do that alone. After she had left the library together with Lupin they had gone down to have lunch. At that opportunity Lupin had told her two other friends how Tom had tried to get to her. After that they hadn't left her alone for a second. They had escorted her to her next class, had waited for her after class and had then brought her back to the common room. They were being a little paranoid. Hermione had gotten irritated by their over-protectiveness very fast. It was nice of them to be so concerned about her but that was just too much. So Hermione had pretended to go to bed early. Though she had just entered her dorm long enough to cast an invisibility spell on herself. Then she had cautiously left the Gryffindor common room. Luckily her friends hadn't noticed anything. So right now, Hermione was strolling around Hogwarts' grounds. She wasn't far from the lake now, with a perfect sight on the castle. The bluish sheen was still pulsing around the castle. It wasn't as prominent as it had been against the nightly sky as she had arrived back at Hogwarts but still it was unmistakably there. Hermione still didn't know why she was suddenly able to see it. She needed to find out more about it. Was this blue sheen really the warding magic spun around Hogwarts?

Hermione stopped her walking and stood on a small hill covered with snow while facing the castle. She breathed in deeply, closed her eyes and summoned all her magic. Instantly she could feel that steady flow of power running through her. She concentrated very hard now and tried to let her magic unfurl. It spread from her and made contact with all the things around her. The snow on the ground, the group of trees standing not far away, the water of the lake. Just everything that was around her. It was very straining to let her magic wander so far away from her and beads of sweat appeared on her forehead. Her eyes were still closed as she now willed her magic to concentrate on that pulsing vibration coming from the castle. It wasn't long and she could feel it again. It was a steady pulse that seemed to originate from the castle. Now that she was looking so close Hermione realized that everything around her seemed to be pervaded by that pulse. Everything her magic now touched sung in the same rhythm. With shock she noticed that even her own magic hummed in unison with that pulse from the castle. She examined her own magic closer. But the more she looked the clearer it became. If that blue sheen really was warding magic then that ward seemed to suffuse her own magic completely. As Hermione was so deeply looking into her own magic she came upon the Elder Magic again. It was still there. Interwoven with her own Magic. Still she couldn't really get a hold of it. But something she did notice. Though everything around her including herself seemed to hum with that pulse coming from Hogwarts the Elder Magic seemed to be completely unaffected.

Hermione then opened her eyes again and her magic quickly flowed back to her. That had certainly been interesting. Whatever that bluish sheen was it seemed that not only was it the Elder Magic that enabled her to see it but the magic itself seemed to be immune against that steady pulse. Was the Elder Magic really able to withstand the century old magic of Hogwarts? True, Hermione had known that the Elder Wand was very powerful but this was impressing. She had always thought that wands didn't hold magic of their own. That they were just mediators between the wizard's magic and the spell.

Maybe she should just try to get more control over the Elder Magic? It had helped her in some situations. Like that time as Tom had tried to legilimise her. So it seemed to be possible to use that magic. Until now she had never really consciously tried to use the Elder Magic but maybe all it needed was just training. Maybe she should just do that. It was better than to just depend on a book she might be unable to understand anyway.

Hermione let her gaze sweep over the blue sheen. Then she took off and started her way back to the castle. It had gotten late and she began to feel cold so she hurried back to the entrance with her cold hands buried deep in her pockets. She was hit by comfortable warmth as she entered the castle and walked through the entrance hall. Her steps echoed loudly on the stone tiles of the deserted corridors. It seemed the rest of the population of the castle was already back in their common rooms. That was where Hermione was headed right now. She was really looking forward to lie down on her soft and warm bed. So she climbed the moving stair cases and then stepped into the next corridor, just to find Tom walking down that very same corridor towards her. His grey eyes quickly found her and Hermione thought she saw a small smile on his face as he recognized her. But she wasn't sure, the corridor was rather dark after all.

Why did she always have to meet Tom in dark, secluded corridors anyway? Hermione wondered frustrated.

She felt her heart beating faster and she frantically searched for a way out of this. She had decided to evade him but it wasn't exactly very easy to do that if she always ran into him wherever she went. She breathed in deeply to calm herself down and then proceeded her way down the corridor. She would just go down the corridor, pass Tom, ignore him and then leave. How difficult could that be?

So she averted her eyes from him and hurried down the corridor. But just as she had just passed him and had walked a few steps away, she heard his voice,

"Hermione?"

She stopped and then slowly turned around to him. He was standing there, looking at her with his grey eyes.

"Yes?" Hermione asked with a calmness in her voice she really didn't feel.

He took a step towards her and now stood just a metre away from her.

"Why are you ignoring me?" he asked in his smooth voice, though she could her a demanding tinge in his tone.

He was now frowning down at her obviously expecting an explanation for her behaviour. Hermione felt angry again. Why did she have to justify her actions? She hadn't done anything wrong. That had been him.
"I'm sure you know perfectly well why I don't want to talk with you right now!" she snapped angrily.

His gaze became darker and he was now glaring down at her rather furiously. But Hermione wasn't intimidated by him as she was way too enraged herself.

"No, I don't know why," he hissed at her coldly. Then he continued rather short-tempered, "Okay, I had a little encounter with your friends. But why are you still talking with them while ignoring me?"

Hermione raised her eyebrows indignant at him. Why would she stop talking with her friends? Tom had been the one who had attacked them so deviously. They had certainly done nothing wrong.

"You attacked them," she huffed at him while hitting him with a withering look. "And you threw the Noceo curse on Marc."

A dark look crossed Tom's face and there appeared a dangerous red tinge in his eyes.

"So, I'm not allowed to curse Longbottom but it's perfectly fine if he grabs me and starts to choke me, is it?" he snarled at her annoyed.

Hermione's gaze shot at his face and she continued to look at him with huge eyes. What did Longbottom do? She hadn't known that. The burning fury in her instantly died down, just to be replaced by that oddly out-of-place protective feeling. The feeling of responsibility towards Tom seemed to flare up in her again.

Then she said softly in a concerned tone, "He really did that?"

"Yes," Tom hissed at her in anger.

Hermione scanned him alarmed.

"He didn't hurt you, did he?" she then asked him.

"W…what?" Tom seemed to be so perplexed by her sudden concern that he even abandoned the threatening tone in his voice.

Hermione's eyes still wandered worriedly over his form until they locked with his grey eyes.

"Are you hurt?" she repeated her question in a gentle tone.

Tom looked away from her before he said in a soft voice, "No."

"Good." Hermione sighed relieved as she stepped nearer to him and took his hand in hers.

She did know that Tom was more than capable to defend himself against Longbottom. She knew that even if all three of her friends attacked him, Tom wouldn't have any problems to overwhelm them. So it was rather irrational of her to be so worried about him. But the events during the Christmas break were still fresh in her mind. And she didn't want anyone hurting Tom again.

Her previously made resolutions were forgotten as she held his hand and smiled softly up at him.

"But that still doesn't give you the right to curse Marc like that," she chastised him gently.
Now Tom narrowed his eyes at her and then said in a tight voice, "Why must you keep calling him Marc?"

Hermione rolled her eyes. He was being very difficult today.

"Because that's his name."

There was now a vicious glint in Tom's eyes again as he hissed, "I don't like him."

Hermione sighed loudly. "I can accept that. But could you, please, try not to hex my friends in the future?"

Tom looked at her and suddenly an offensive smirk was slowly forming on his face. Then he snaked an arm around her and pulled her over to him before he purred in her ear, "I can't promise anything."

Hermione rolled her eyes at him. But she still allowed him to hold her and then she even leaned against him comfortably as she felt him placing a kiss on her forehead. Why did she keep doing that? She thought, and still, her arms slowly wrapped around Tom and held to him tightly.

Hermione noticed Tom wincing in pain as she embraced him so tightly. She quickly released him and then looked up at him.

"What's wrong?" she asked alarmed.

"Nothing," Tom answered swiftly but he avoided to look her in the eyes.

"Tom?" Hermione said in a stern voice.

His grey eyes slowly wandered back to her before he said, "I'm fine."

Hermione just raised her eyebrows at him. But he didn't react to her silent request to tell the truth. So Hermione stepped nearer to him again and then put one hand gently on his arm.

"Is your back hurting?"

Tom didn't reply anything so Hermione just grasped his arm and then she started to walk away, gently pulling him with her. As they came upon a door leading into a class room Hermione stopped and opened the door. The class room was dark and seemingly unused. Hermione pulled Tom into the class room and then closed the door behind them. She even waved her wand at the door and locked it magically. Then she waved it again and a brightly shining orb left the tip of her wand, flew up to the ceiling and illuminated the class room. She turned around to Tom. He still stood where she had left him right by the door. Hermione walked over to him again and took his hand in hers. Tom's eyes shot at her as he felt her touching him. She smiled up at him

"Come here," she said softly while she pulled him over to one of the many seats in the room. "Sit down." She gestured at the chair.

Surprisingly Tom obeyed her. He sat down and then looked at her with his blank face. Hermione sighed. It really wasn't easy to assess his emotions.

"Let me have a look at your back," Hermione told him gingerly.

Tom's unfathomable eyes wandered back to her face then he said in a soft voice, "I can look after it myself."

"Don't be silly," Hermione chastised him mildly. "And now take your shirt off."
He continued to fix her with his gaze but she just stared expectantly back at him. After a while he broke eye contact and started to undo his tie. Hermione breathed out, relieved that he was complying with her. Then she waved her wand and summoned her potion box from her dorm. Instantly the wooden box appeared out of thin air and now stood on the table right beside Hermione. She opened the lid and went through her stock. It seemed everything she needed was there. She then turned around to Tom. He had by now removed his black outer robes and the green sleeveless pullover and was right now taking off his white shirt. As he slid the shirt off Hermione couldn't help but notice how very nice Tom looked without his clothes. But she had other things to take care of right now, Hermione scolded herself. So she went over to him and had a look at his back. A bandage still covered his back though it wasn't the one she had conjured up. Hermione waved her wand and the bandage disappeared. The bruises that had been on his back had disappeared by now she noticed relieved. But the cuts were still very prominent on his pale skin. Hermione was angry with herself for not better taking care of Tom. It was only four days ago as Carter had done this to him. Of course the wounds were not healed yet. It even seemed that some of the gashes had recently broken open and were now slightly bleeding again. Maybe Tom got hurt as he fought with her Gryffindor friends. He had told her that Longbottom had grabbed him.

Hermione used her wand to clean the wounds then she applied a few of her potions on Tom's back. They would support and quicken the healing process. As she was finished with treating the wounds she again brandished her wand and a new bandage now covered his back. Then she put her hands on his shoulders and leaned forwards so she could speak into his ear from behind.

"I'm sorry," she whispered softly into his ear. "I should have looked after you sooner."

She felt Tom stiffen as she whispered those words to him. Then after a while he said in a low, colourless voice, "I thought you hate me again."

A small smile stole on Hermione's face and she said in a mock-serious tone, "Of course I do."

Then she leaned even closer to him and placed a light kiss on his cheek before she straightened up again. Tom tilted his head a little so that he was able to look at her. His face was still an impenetrable mask but Hermione was able to see that soft sparkle in his grey eyes. She liked that softness radiating of his eyes when he looked at her. It made her feel so comfortable, somehow unburdened. And it made him look a lot less scary. Not at all like that angry Tom she had seen this morning in the Great Hall as he had insulted Longbottom. Back then he had been so much like Voldemort it had thrown Hermione into her horrible memories.

"You still are a mystery," Tom finally said in his smooth voice, still looking at her.

Hermione smiled down at him, "And it's going to stay like that."

Finally that evil smirk slowly took form on his face telling her that he was surely going to crack her secrets.

"Now enough with this," Hermione said. Then she turned away from him and began to stow the potion bottles back into the box. "Get your clothes on. We don't want to stay here forever."

As she was rummaging through her potion box she suddenly could feel Tom standing behind her and wrapping his arms around her.

"You sure?" he purred into her ear.

His chest was now pressed against her back and Hermione had to breathe in deeply to get herself under control again. But it got even worse as she remembered that right now he wasn't wearing any "So? Now that I have my clothes off anyway," Tom whispered in his alluring voice as he kissed the skin of her neck softly. "Want to stay a little longer?"

Hermione closed her eyes. It was such a nice feeling having Tom embrace her again. She could feel the heat of his body against her. It was just very luring, this nearness. It again made her forget the loneliness that otherwise always gnawed at her. Actually she did want Tom to embrace her like this. To be so near her. But she couldn't, no, she wouldn't allow him to do that. Today, Tom had reminded her of who he really was and she couldn't just ignore that side of his personality again. Back in the Great Hall as he had insulted Longbottom this morning, she had been scared of Tom. The coldness and malice behind his words had cut into her very being. And for a short moment it had felt as if she had been thrown back into that world of war and fear. It was scary to know that the only person who could make her forget her painful memories was also the one responsible for the things that had let to her getting those memories. This whole thing left her confused and even a little bit afraid.

Obviously Tom had noticed how she had stiffened as he had embraced her and he now turned her around in his arms. Hermione looked up at him with huge eyes. Right now, she just felt incredibly insecure. How was she supposed to deal with a situation like this?

Tom looked down at her with his impossibly grey eyes. Then he put two fingers under her chin and tilted her head up a little bit before he bent down to her and kissed her. Hermione closed her eyes as she felt Tom's lips on her own. This time his kiss wasn't demanding though. It was soft and even caring. It felt more like a promise than anything else. It was telling her that she didn't need to be afraid of him.

But is that really true?

Despite her thoughts Hermione wrapped her arms slowly around his neck and then hesitantly started to respond to his kiss. As he could feel her kissing him in return Tom put his arms tightly around her and pressed her against him. Hermione's thoughts were strangely calmed as he was kissing her so tenderly. Then Tom released her again and Hermione leaned her head against him. As she felt his arms wrapped around her so protectively the comfortable feeling of not being alone engulfed her completely.

After a while Tom untangled his arms from her and smirked down at her before he turned around and started to put his clothes back on. He dressed again in his white shirt and the sleeveless pullover then reached for his tie and hung it loosely around his neck. He put his black outer robe over his arm and then stepped to Hermione again and took her hand in his. She looked up at him hesitantly. The insecurity was still there. She just didn't know what to make of her strange feelings towards Tom.

The smirk on his face had vanished and he smiled down at her softly. He looked so changed now. There was nothing left of the fearsome darkness she had seen in him this morning in the Great Hall.

Tom then walked over to the door of the class room and Hermione followed him. As he reached the door he pulled his wand and ended the locking spells Hermione had put up before. Strangely Hermione noted how it didn't disturb her so much anymore to see Tom with his wand. Her gaze wandered over the pale wood of his wand but she wasn't feeling panicky by that sight any more.

The lock of the door clicked and Tom reached for the handle before he opened the door. As they stepped out of the class room Hermione saw a group of girls walking down the same corridor Tom and herself had just entered. It was a group of three girls and as they walked towards them Hermione finally recognized them. Those were her dorm mates, Rose, Lucia and Violet. Right now they were chatting and laughing rather loudly so they only noticed Tom and Hermione as they had nearly reached them.

Tom was just closing the door of the class room again as Hermione could see how the girls now stared at the pair of them rather blatantly. She watched how the girls' eyes wandered over her and Tom's hands holding each other before their gazes went over to Tom, obviously taking in his appearance. He still held his outer robes over his arm, his tie hung loosely around his neck and the top buttons of his white shirt were open. Hermione could almost see the conclusions the girls seemed to draw from Tom's appearance combined with them coming out of a deserted class room. Sure enough the girls then started to giggle inanely. Rose and Lucia had even the nerve to wink at her suggestively. All Hermione wanted to do now was banging her head against the next wall. They were never going to let her live this one down. She was surely in for one of their agonizing gossip sessions when she would arrive back in her dorm later. Hermione knew that this was just too good a gossip matter for them to keep quiet about it and not tell the whole school. She really needed to prevent that.

At least those girls had enough decency left in them to not stop and point at her. Hermione was rather glad to see the back of them as the continued their way down the corridor, predictably beginning to chatter excitedly as they were a distance away.

After the girls rounded the next corner and their chatter slowly died down Tom looked at Hermione and she nearly groaned as she saw that conceited smirk on his face. Then that smirk transformed into one of his annoyingly charming grins.

"Now that they are going to spread this rumour anyway how about giving them some real reason to do so?" Tom said in a suspiciously innocent voice while he gestured back at the class room door.

Hermione just rolled her eyes frustrated at him which made him chuckle in amusement.
Hermione woke the next morning in her Gryffindor four-poster and felt surprisingly well rested. She had come to savor ever night without one of her horrible nightmares. Though lately it seemed she had been spared more often than not. When was the last time she actually had one of her nightmares? Hermione wondered as she rolled on her side and closed her eyes again, trying to relish that feeling of comfortable calmness. It certainly was frightening to every night have to relive those terrible things that had happened to her. So whatever it was that had driven away her nightmares, she was surely not going to complain. But Hermione couldn't concentrate any longer on her sleeping habits as she now realized the chatter that was going on in the dorm. It hadn't penetrated her still sleep muddled mind but now that she was more awake she could hear that talking. And Hermione nearly groaned. The curtains of her four-poster were drawn but that didn't stop the voices of her dorm mates to reach her. Yesterday Hermione had been quite lucky because she had managed to slip back into the dorm without meeting them. But now it seemed there was no evading them any longer. She really didn't want to face them, not after what had happened yesterday. Her gossipy dorm mates had met her in one of the corridors as Hermione had been accompanied by Tom. She didn't want to think about what those girls made of that. Surely they had already spun some really for fetched stories about her and her supposed relationship with Tom.

It's not as 'supposed' as you would like it to be!

That angry part of her again screamed at her as she remembered how Tom had kissed her in that class room, just mere hours after she had decided to never see him again. What was it that made it so impossible for her to stay away from him? Hermione felt terribly guilty for letting him get so near her. She didn't want to imagine what her friends would do if they could see her. But they were so far away now. They had left her behind. Hermione sighed deeply before she sat up in her bed. She couldn't very well stay in bed for the rest of the day, trying to solve the chaotic state her feelings were in. So she reached for the curtains of her four-poster and drew them open. Just to immediately be greeted by the excited stares of her dorm mates. Hermione felt a headache coming up as she blinked back at them frustrated.

"Finally!" Rose screeched. "You are up!"

"We were just about to wake you," Lucia agreed.

She was standing beside her blindingly pink bed and nearly jumped up and down with excitement. Hermione was tempted to just draw her covers shut, lie back in her bed again and pretend this whole thing had never happened. But the nosiness radiating from her dorm mates was telling her that it would be impossible to hide from them.

Rose slumped down beside Hermione on the bed before she said in a shrill tone, "You've gotta tell us everything." Then she poked Hermione in the side before she continued in a self important voice, "What did you do with Tom Riddle yesterday?"

All girls were now starting to giggle even Diana who now sat down beside Viola on Lucia's pink bed so that they were now both facing Hermione. Hermione on the other hand didn't feel like laughing at all. However had she gotten into this mess?

"I never believed that Riddle was really after you," Viola said in her usual condescending tone. "But now that I've seen it with my own eyes..."

"Tell us, tell us!" Lucia seemed to burst with excitement now. "What did he do? Did he snog you?"
Rose giggled inanely, "I'm sure he did much more."

Hermione stared at her. How was she going to get out of this one?

"Now look, I really don't wanna talk about it," Hermione said stiffly.

What a lame thing to come up with, she huffed at herself. Those chatty girls would surely accept that. Hermione inwardly rolled her eyes.

"No, no," Rose said sternly. "You are going to tell us."

"Yeah, no secrets," Lucia threw in. "We are friends after all."

Hermione frowned at her. They surely were not friends. Just because they slept in the same room didn't mean that they were suddenly friends.

"He reminds you of your fiancé, doesn't he?" Diana asked her now in a soft tone.

Hermione's eyes shot at her. Once she was again mesmerized by those amazingly green eyes which looked so frighteningly similar to Harry's. But now Hermione furrowed her brow. What was Diana talking about? She needed a moment to remember that sob story she had made up before the break to get back at Tom for spreading that stupid rumour of her liking him.

Ironic, isn't it? a voice inside of her scoffed meanly. Not really, Hermione thought before she stood up from the bed. She finally had enough of this stupid chatter. She really didn't want to talk with the girls any longer.

"Where are you going?" Rose nagged in her whiney tone.

"It's late," Hermione said in a tightly controlled voice. "Marc, Richard and Amarys are surely already waiting for me down in the common room."

"Aww, Hermione," Lucia complained. "You can't always spend all your time with those boys."

Then she grinned at Hermione before she said in a taunting voice, "Tom surely won't like that."

"Yeah," Rose threw in. "He might get jealous."

Hermione didn't say anything. Her patience was slowly running out. So she continued her way to the bath room.

"Ohmigod, ohmigod!" Lucia yelled almost hysterically. "Yesterday during breakfast we've seen you with Riddle and Marc. They were already fighting over you, weren't they?"

Hermione stared back at them. Those girls just didn't know when to stop, did they? Maybe she should just obliviate them and get it over with. It was tempting at the moment. Sometimes it would be nice to be a dark witch.

"Marc Longbottom likes you too," Rose then whined. "That's so unfair, two hot guys liking you."

Hermione stared at her. Longbottom liking her, too? That was…

… probably true. Considering his behaviour lately. Hermione inwardly rolled her eyes. Then she closed the door to the bathroom shut.

Sometime later Hermione walked down to the common room. Regrettably she was still accompanied by her dorm mates. And they were still trying to get more information out of her. As she arrived in the common room she was rather surprised to really find her three Gryffindor friends sitting on one of the sofas and obviously waiting for her. It was rather late already because Hermione had been deliberately slow in the bathroom, hoping her dorm mates would leave without her. No such luck there but why were Longbottom, Weasley and Lupin still waiting for her?

"Morning, Mione," Weasley beamed at her. "Slept well?"

"Quite." Hermione smiled at him. Then she continued, addressing all three boys, "Why are you still waiting for me? It's already late."

"Pff, I told you, didn't I?" Longbottom replied. "We are not going to let you walk around alone. It's not safe."

A voice coming from behind Hermione asked suspiciously, "Really? Why's it not safe?"

Hermione turned around and found her dorm mates still standing behind her and hearing in to the conversation.

"Not that it concerns you-" Longbottom said, turned to Rose who had posed the question. "-but Riddle's after Hermione so we need to protect her."

That statement only provoked a new fit of giggles coming from the girls. Hermione stood there in the middle of the common room and really wished to just be somewhere else. Preferably somewhere without silly girls blabbing about other people's lives.

After some time Lucia had calmed down enough and patted Hermione's shoulder in a friendly manner. "Two admirers, eh? Quite popular, aren't you?"

Hermione didn't answer anything and was very glad that the four girls then resumed their way to the Great Hall and left them alone.

"What's up with them?" Longbottom stared after the girls and ran a hand through his blond hair in confusion.

"I have no idea." Hermione said in a quiet voice, readjusted her bag and started to walk to the exit of the common room.

"Wait!" Longbottom shouted and hurried after her.

He, Weasley and Lupin followed her all the way to the Great Hall. Hermione knew that they were just worried about her but slowly this being always monitored got on her nerves. But sadly, there was no way to stop them as they were being extremely persistent on this bodyguard business. Well, she could tell them that they needn't protect her from Tom because he was no longer trying to kill her.

Are you really sure about that? that nasty voice echoed through her mind again.

Hermione sighed softly which only seemed to trigger a new barrage of concerned looks from her three friends then she passed the entrance to the Great Hall. As she walked over to her house table she couldn't help but notice how many of the other students seemed to observe her. Some of them secretly whilst others stared at her rather blatantly.

That was fast, she thought as she quickly walked through the hall. It seemed the rumour about her and Tom had already spread quite nicely. Though it was a mystery to her when exactly her dear dorm mates had had the time to start that rumour. Hermione tried to ignore the stares and, in some cases, glares, walked calmly over to the Gryffindor table and sat down. Then she reached for the coffee pot standing right in front of her and poured herself a nice cup of black coffee. All the while she was well aware of all those pairs of eyes being fixed on her.

Well, she reasoned, it can hardly be as bad as the time they all thought I was a crazy stalker.

At least, this time, Tom wasn't going to fuel the rumour mill even further. Hermione's gaze slowly wandered over to Tom. He was sitting at the Slytherin table, looking as handsome as ever, and right now he smirked at her rather conceitedly.

Or it's going to be worse, Hermione thought frustrated and sipped at her coffee.

"What's wrong with them?" She heard Longbottom's confused voice.

"I have no idea," came Weasley's answer.

Hermione glanced at them shortly. They were sitting right beside her while Lupin had taken the seat opposite her. The boys had obviously noticed the other students staring at her nosily and the bewildered expressions on her friends' faces told her that the rumour had after all not reached everybody.

Then an angry sounding voice huffed at them, "You really don't know?"

Hermione looked up and nearly groaned out loud as her eyes fell on the girl who had just spoken. She didn't know the girl's name but she could remember her face and the faces of the two girls sitting beside her. They were the very girls who had met her and Tom after that stupid detention with professor McGray. Back then Tom had pulled that infamous act which had led to the student body hating her even more. And a while later those very same girls had tried to curse her. Hermione's eyes narrowed at the girl with the blonde locks. She was the one who had fired the Reducto curse at Hermione. Right now all three girls were glaring back at her darkly. Hermione wondered briefly why they were so persistent on hating her but soon found that she didn't really care. This whole affair was just ridiculous.

"Know what?" Lupin asked in his calm and collected voice.

The girl with the short, brown hair threw a nasty look Hermione's way before she sneered at Lupin, "That your little friend here is a cheap whore."

"Watch what you are saying!" Longbottom blustered at the girl enraged.

"Why? It's the truth," the girl with the blond hair spat at him. Then her blue eyes wandered from Longbottom to Hermione before she said in a depreciating way, "You are just a dirty slut, aren't you?"

Hermione had no idea how to answer to something like that. All of it was just so stupid. She really had nothing against those girls but still they seemed to hate her.

"Stop insulting her!" a new voice cut across the girl.

Hermione frowned and turned her head slightly to see who had just now defended her. As her eyes swepted over the table in search of her defender she wasn't really surprised to find every Gryffindor following this dispute rather curiously. It seemed that it had been Lucia who had spoken just now. That was a surprise. Hermione hadn't expected her dorm mates to ever come to her aid. Though the next sentence Lucia spoke ruined that positive impression again.
"You are just jealous." Lucia looked at the other Gryffindor girl triumphantly. "Why don't you accept it? It's Hermione, Riddle likes. And not you."

"Excuse me?" Longbottom now stared at Lucia indignantl. "What exactly is Riddle doing?"

Hermione would have liked to curse Lucia as the girl threw her an apologetic look before she told Longbottom in a pitying tone, "I'm sorry, Marc, but it seems Riddle likes Hermione."

"Yes," Rose threw in and she seemed to enjoy the whole thing very much, judging from the glint in her eyes. "Riddle's in love with her," she ended her unnecessary speech while giggles shook her.

"He's not!" The blonde girl snubbed at her angrily.

"Yeah, are you insane?" Longbottom stared at Rose furiously.

That was the point at which Hermione had had enough. This relationship between Tom and her was already quite confusing. She really didn't need it to be discussed in the open. She threw a glance at the Slytherin table. Of course Tom seemed to be very interested in the things going on at the Gryffindor table. There was a smirk curling up his mouth as he looked at her in amusement. Hermione just rolled her eyes at him, then she got up from her seat and started to walk over to the exit of the hall. She hadn't managed to walk very far as Longbottom fell in step beside her. In the corner of her eyes she could see Lupin and Weasley following behind him.

"Really, what's wrong with them? Are they stupid?" Hermione heard Longbottom's enraged voice. "It's plain to see what's going on."

Her eyes darted back to him. Was that really so plain to see? She was a little panicky to find Longbottom staring down at her and looking quite enraged.

But then he said, "It's Riddle again. He's done it before. He's trying to ruin your reputation."

"Yeah, you are right, Marc," Weasley threw in. "He tried that before the break, too."

"Hmm, I don't know," Lupin demurred. "It doesn't sound plausible. Why would he do it again? It didn't work the first time. Why try again?"

Longbottom glared at Lupin and shook his head before he said, "He's evil. That's why." Then he continued in an offending tone. "And he's stupid."

"No, he's not stupid!" Hermione hissed at him with more force than necessary.

What was wrong with her? Why did she need to defend Tom now? Her eyes slowly wandered back to Longbottom. Right now he was staring down at her and there was confusion shining in his blue eyes.

She was quite glad as Lupin said, "You are right. He's not stupid." He now frowned at her. "And that's why he's so dangerous."

Longbottom's gaze left her and he looked at Lupin before he said slowly, "That only means that we have to protect Hermione even better now. That evil bastard is planning something."

Hermione nearly groaned as she heard him say that. Would she never get her freedom back?

She had been right. The protectiveness of her friends got even worse after hearing that rumour about her and Tom. After breakfast they had walked with her down to the Care of Magical Creatures class.
Obviously professor Kettleburn was well enough to teach again, though he had lost what seemed to be a few fingers of his right hand. His class had taken place outside on the grounds of Hogwarts. Hermione had gotten rather peeved by her friends' behaviour during class. They had always stayed close to her as if they expected an attack any second. What did they think could happen to her during class. Even if Tom still tried to hurt her, he would certainly not do it during any class. Accordingly Hermione had been rather glad as professor Kettleburn had ended his class and they had walked back to the castle.

So right now Hermione was sitting in the Ancient Runes class room and listened to professor Nota. But she couldn't quite concentrate on the professor's explanations as she was again rather annoyed. Lupin was sitting right beside her but he wasn't the one who now annoyed her so. No, it was more that whispered conversation going on at the table behind her. It was a group of Ravenclaw girls who sat at that table and to Hermione's increasing displeasure they had only one discussion topic.

"So they found them in a class room?" one of the girls whispered to her friends.

"Yes," another girl answered. "And obviously they had been snogging."

Hermione grabbed her textbook tighter as she felt her magic flowing through her angrily. It seemed that over the time the rumour had somehow gotten worse. But it was the next statement that really made her angry.

"No, no," an excited voice whispered. "I heard it from Susan. You know the Hufflepuff. According to her, Riddle and DeCerto were found in a broom cupboard. And-" Here the Ravenclaw girl added a dramatic pause before she whispered, "-they were doing it."

After that Hermione could hear muffled giggles coming from behind her. She felt anger bubbling up in her. Couldn't those girls see that she was sitting right in front of them? They were not exactly being quiet with their conversation. If they so enjoyed it to gossip about other people, they should at least have the decency to make sure the person concerned wouldn't hear them. Her right hand itched to pull her wand and curse those stupid girls.

Hermione was still trying to stop her magic from lashing out at those girls as professor Nota finally ended the lesson some time later. Hermione took her quill, parchment and the Ancient Runes textbook and stuffed it angrily into her bag. Then she got up from her table and started to walk over to the door.

"Look, Hermione." She heard Lupin say in a soothing tone. "Don't listen to what they say. They are just being stupid."

Hermione turned around to him. He was still stowing his things away in his bag. She just wanted to tell him how very right he was as professor Nota addressed him, "Mr Lupin, could you please stay behind?"

"Of course, professor," Lupin said politely.

Then his eyes wandered back at Hermione and she could see concern in them.

"You don't need to worry," she told him. "I can look after myself."

"Okay," Lupin said but she could see doubt on his face.

Hermione threw him a reassuring smile before she turned around and left the class room. As she strolled down the corridor, trying to ignore the curious stares of the other students, she decided to not go back to the common room. She wanted to be alone now. She didn't want to admit it but somehow that new rumour about her was getting to her more than she would like. It wasn't so much the fact that she was again the target of Hogwarts' gossip mill. No, the problem was that this time she didn't know whether the gossip was partly true or not. What was there going on between Tom and her?

Hermione decided to use this unexpected opportunity to be alone. It was quite bothersome that her friends still thought that she needed protection twenty-four-seven. She knew that they were really trying to help her but slowly it annoyed her. Right now she just wanted to be left alone so she had time to think things through. Especially her relationship with Tom. That the whole school seemed to be talking about it didn't make it easier for Hermione. She was very unsure of herself and her feelings. Sure she did like Tom. That much was clear and there was no use in denying it any longer. She liked him very much actually. But there was still a part of her which constantly yelled at her to stop seeing Tom. Maybe it was her conscience, Hermione didn't know. But it never ceased to remind her who Tom really was. It was undeniable after all. He was Lord Voldemort. His behaviour towards Longbottom was the best proof of that. But another thing was also undeniable. Hermione felt better whenever Tom was around. It was a long time ago that she had abandoned all hope to ever feel free again. Free of her sorrow and free of those horrible images that haunted her so mercilessly. Of course, the things she had experienced during the war were still troubling her. Most probably she would never be able to completely forget them but now that Tom was around they were no longer so unbearable. They were definitely less painful and even started to sometimes drop in the background. That was more than she could ever have wished for.

Hermione rounded a corner and now walked down another deserted corridor. Her steps echoed loudly as she walked on the stone floor. Right now she didn't exactly know where she was headed to. She needed some solitude. At first she had thought about heading to the Room of Requirement but then she had remembered that Tom knew about it, too. Most likely he used it for his little Death Eater meetings. The last thing Hermione wanted to do was to burst in one of those meetings. So she had ended up wandering rather aimlessly through Hogwarts' many corridors.

Still, she needed to come to a conclusion for her problem. Should she stay away from Tom or not? It was definitely dangerous staying close to him. Not only because he was the Dark Lord in the making but he was also very sharp and he loved it to solve secrets. Hermione had a lot of secrets she didn't want solved. Then there was Tom himself. Hermione didn't exactly know what Tom was feeling. Did he like her? Or did he stay close to uncover her secrets? Was he just playing with her? If she was honest with herself, she knew what she had to do. Her first decision had been the right one. She needed to stay away from Tom. It would be sheer folly to not avoid him. There were so many reasons why to stay away from him. She still was in the past right now. It already was a risk to even speak with the people here.

Hermione was brought out of her musings and her head shot up as she heard an oily voice, "DeCerto, what a nice sight for my sore eyes."

She was more than startled as she saw a group of Slytherins standing not far from her down the corridor. How could she have not noticed?

"Just the one we have been searching for. What a nice coincidence. Don't you think, Avery?" one of them said in a mocking voice.

Hermione recognized him, it was Lestrange. Right now he was smirking at her darkly. Avery stood right beside him and he, too, was smirking at Hermione. Though there also was an appreciative glint in his dark eyes as they wandered slowly over her form. Behind Lestrange and Avery Hermione could see a third boy. That was Black. And leaning against the wall beside his friends was Alba, the one Hermione had once stolen his wand from. Hermione had a sinking feeling in her stomach. Surely they didn't just want to chat with her.
"Yes, a very nice coincidence," Avery drawled in his arrogant voice.

Hermione started to scan her surroundings but she never let those Slytherins out of her field of vision. The corridor was completely deserted. Currently they were in a relatively unused part of the castle. Hermione nearly cursed out loud at her own stupidity. Why did she have to wander into this part of the castle? She had been so deep in thought, she had completely let her guard down. If something like that had happened during the war, she would have been dead by now. But no use crying over spilt milk.

Focus! she reprimanded herself.

A few metres down the corridor, Hermione remembered to have seen a door. Maybe that led into an old, unused class room. That could be helpful later. But maybe she was able to prevent a fight with them. Hermione glared at the four boys standing in front of her before she said in a strong and firm voice,

"And why have you been searching for me?"

Avery now started to walk towards her and Hermione instantly fell into her dueling stance.

"There is something we have to straighten out, little girl," he sneered. And Hermione could make out the threat behind his words.

"And what, pray tell, would that be?" she asked him cheekily.

Hermione could feel her right hand twitch in anticipation. She was ready for battle now.

"You know exactly what, you cunt!" Lestrange now yelled aggressively at her.

Hermione's eyes narrowed as they wandered from Avery to Lestrange.

"Please, do enlighten me," she replied in a soft and mocking tone.

"You have dared to offend our leader, slut. Did you think you would get away with that?" Lestrange hissed at her threateningly.

Hermione raised her eyebrows. She was confused. Their leader? That was Tom, surely. What did Lestrange mean with she had offended Tom? What was he going on about? Hermione stared at him confused until it finally occurred to her. Yesterday morning as she had argued with Tom his followers had been present. But she hadn't really insulted Tom. She had behaved in her normal way around Tom.

…okay, I was rather angry and snubbed at him…

Suddenly a thought flashed through her mind. Had Tom sent his followers after her? To put her in her place? There was a sinking feeling in her stomach as she had that thought.

"Does he know you are here right now?" Hermione glared at Lestrange angrily.

The small flicker of insecurity on his face was enough to tell her that Tom, in fact, didn't know about his followers' antics. She felt strangely relieved to know that.

"So, he doesn't know," Hermione stated in a firm voice. "Maybe you should get his consent first before you try to threaten me. Not that you are a threat to me in the first place." She smiled at the boys in front of her innocently.
Lestrange snarled at her and pulled his wand. The other boys followed suit. Hermione just flicked her wrist and her wand landed in her hand.

"I'll show you your place, filthy bitch," Lestrange growled at her darkly.

Then he waved his wand and a blue curse left its tip. The curse rushed towards Hermione but she didn't raise her wand to fend it off. That simple curse was just beneath her so she sidestepped it. The curse crashed into the floor behind her.

"You've got to have more than that to beat me!" she taunted Lestrange.

Which, admittedly, wasn't her best idea as now the other Slytherins joined the fight while a very potent curse left Lestrange's wand.

"I'll teach you to never talk back to our leader again!" Lestrange spat at her while he whirled his wand.

Hermione could glimpse a smug smile on his face as his curse sped towards her. The magic behind the spell crackled aggressively. And the other three boys now started to throw curses at her too. And those were powerful ones as well.

_Well well, whoever taught them such dark curses?_ Hermione wondered wryly.

But now was not the time for sarcasm. She raised her wand and brandished it swiftly in a complicated pattern.

_Aberrare!_

Hermione watched satisfied as the curses rushing towards her suddenly turned off their course and crashed into the wall beside her. But the Slytherins, it seemed, weren't so easy to impress as they now sent another barrage of curses her way. Hermione ducked and threw herself towards the wall. She could feel the power behind the curses as they soared threateningly over her head. She was now crouched down with her back against the cold stone wall which wasn't a very good position to fight back. She needed to move now. To somehow take cover. A magical shield wasn't the best option as she wouldn't be able to attack while being covered by the shield. Hermione then remembered the door she had seen before. It was just a few metres behind her.

"Not so cheeky anymore, are you?" Lestrange sneered at her in a mocking voice. "You'll apologize to our leader on bended knees in no time."

Yeah, sure! Hermione nearly rolled her eyes but then she just waved her wand and thought, _Tergus!_

Immediately the corridor was filled by an impenetrable mist. Hermione used the confusion her spell had created and dashed back the corridor in direction from which she had come. Her spell wouldn't last long she knew. So she just dashed back to the wooden door she had noticed earlier. She wasn't fast enough. The mist she had just created began to clear up again. Then she could hear the Slytherins back in the corridor cast new spells. Hermione flung open the old wooden door and took cover behind the opened door. Seconds later the spells hit the wood of the door heavily. Hermione could feel the door shake with each impact. That door might look rather solid but now that those curses crashed into it it didn't seem to be a reliable cover at all. Just as Hermione started to crawl into the class room an especially potent curse hit the door. It crashed through and hit the floor, leaving behind a smoking hole in the now charred wood of the door. Hermione looked down at herself and found a deep cut in her left thigh. The blindingly bright curse had obviously grazed her. There was a rather large slash in her skin which now started to bleed heavily. She could see the blood flowing... down her leg until it was soaked up by her stocking. It didn't hurt, though. Hermione knew there was too much adrenalin running through her body right now, damping the pain. But that cut was bound to hurt later.

Stupid Slytherins! Hermione thought angrily. And stupid, paper-thin door!

"So what, little slut? Want to kneel down already?" Hermione heard Lestrange yell triumphantly. "I wouldn't mind if you'll kneel down in front of me." His statement was followed by dirty laughter.

That was enough! Up until now Hermione hadn't unsheathed her more dangerous curses. She didn't want to really fight against students. But they were asking for it! She clasped her wand a little tighter and stood up from her crouching position. The door was still shielding her from the curses the Slytherins hurled her way. But she could hear them moving in the corridor. They obviously tried to get closer to her.

Good!

Hermione stepped a little away from the door, raised her wand and swiped it furiously at the door.

Subverto!

Her wand didn't touch the wood but the door suddenly burst and splinters of wood flew everywhere. Hermione used the same motion with which she had destroyed the door and performed her next spell. The flying splinters lost their momentum so that the pieces of wood now hung in the air like a cloud, unmoving. It looked like the exploding door had somehow frozen in time. Hermione's view of the corridor behind was now free so she glanced at the group of Slytherins. They had split up and were trying to attack but they were not really working together. Hermione could see Lestrange nearby. He now began to move his wand again. But Hermione didn't wait to see which curse he would hurl at her. She moved her own wand swiftly in the familiar pattern.

Exuro!

The splinters of wood burst into flames. Hermione now thrust her magic into those burning pieces of wood which were still suspended in midair until she could practically feel each of those pieces through her magic. Then she whirled her wand forward and the burning wood obeyed her. The pieces soared through the air, getting faster and faster, flying towards her attackers. Hermione watched as Lestrange and Avery each put up a blue shield in front of them. But she knew, it would be useless. Her fiery projectiles were protected by her own magic. Neither Avery nor Lestrange would be able to fend them off. Sure enough the splinters breached the shields before they impacted. Hermione smiled satisfied as she saw her burning weapons explode with her magic upon contact. Lestrange was hurled backwards as one of the pieces hit his chest. He crashed on the floor and slid a few metres. Avery, Hermione noticed amused, wasn't any better. Splinters had hit his leg and shoulder. Black and Alba hadn't put up a shield but tried to dodge the splinters. That was useless because there were just too many. So, they were also hit. It was rather entertaining to see those brawny boys being beaten by her magic.

But Hermione didn't want to linger and wallow in her success. Her nice, little curse had caused enough damage but it wasn't anything too dangerous. So the four Slytherin boys were already getting up again. And she certainly didn't want to still be around when they started to attack again. The furious look on Lestrange's face was funny enough she didn't need to see more. So Hermione smiled at Lestrange mockingly which seemed to enrage him further. Then she turned around and ran away. Down the corridor and away from that little battlefield.

She had run down four corridors until the first signs of pain coming from her left thigh hit her.
Hermione was forced to slow down a little. The cut was still bleeding. The blood flowed down her leg making the injury look more dramatic than it actually was. As Hermione turned around the next corner she finally recognized where she was. If she remembered correctly there was a toilet if she turned left into the next corridor. And she was right. Hermione opened the door and stepped into the girls' toilet. Fortunately it was empty. She quickly waved her wand at the door, locking it so that she wouldn't be disturbed by anyone.

Hermione leaned against one of the many sinks that lined one wall and looked down at her leg. The cut was still bleeding heavily. She bent down a little to examine the cut closer. It was a rather deep but clean cut. It didn't appear to have injured anything vital. So Hermione waved her wand over the cut and whispered,

"Curatio!"

She watched as the blood crusted over thus making the wound look a few days old instead of a few minutes. Hermione waved her wand over the leg and the blood which had flown down her leg disappeared. At least now it didn't look anymore like someone had tried to saw her leg off. After another wave of her wand white bandages appeared out of nowhere and wound themselves around her thigh. Hermione gasped softly as the bandages wrapped tightly around her leg. It hurt.

 Damn Slytherins! Hermione cursed silently before she slowly limbed over to the exit.

She stepped cautiously out into the corridor. But those Slytherin boys seemed to be nowhere around, she realized relieved. As she walked down the corridor her leg began to throb painfully. What to do now? Maybe she should head back to the common room and then lie down a little in her dorm.

Yeah, because your stupid room mates'll leave you alone and won't pester you with their nosy chatter. Hermione nearly rolled her eyes. Then just the common room? But that wasn't such a promising option either. Her friends might be there and Hermione didn't want to be confronted with their concern about her right now. That would only make her feel guilty. She still had her school bag with her, so why not go to the library and do some homework? Maybe no-one would pester her there and at the very least no sneaky Slytherins would attack her… hopefully.

So it was just a short time later that Hermione entered Hogwarts' library.

"Hello, Ms DeCerto," Ms Peters, the librarian, greeted Hermione while she smiled at her. "Back already?"

Hermione grinned at the librarian.

"Be careful or you'll waste away here with those old books," Ms Peters chided her lightly.

"That won't happen," Hermione promised while still grinning.

Though a little more wasting away and a little less getting attacked by overeager wannabe Death Eaters would be fine by her, Hermione thought as she walked into the library. She saw that most of the tables were already occupied by students doing their homework. There were still a few free seats but Hermione wanted a table of her own because she had noticed that right now some of the students were again staring at her. Especially that group of fourth year Ravenclaws, sitting right beside the section with books on ancient runes, eyed her rather blatantly. Hermione decided that she needed to be alone now. So she walked quite a distance until she found an unoccupied table. Luckily it was so far away from the books needed for homework that she was pleasantly undisturbed by the other students.
Hermione sank down on one of the chairs and sighed relieved. That cut in her leg had started to hurt nastily. She slid up her skirt a little bit to have a look at her thigh. The white bandage, she had conjured up previously, was still wound tightly around her leg. But there was a slight red stain where the cut was situated. Well, whatever, Hermione thought as she pulled her skirt down again, she'd had worse already. At least it wasn't a cursed wound. Maybe she would look after it later. She shrugged her shoulders, reached for her bag and rummaged through it until she found her Herbology book. Professor Sato had asked them in class yesterday to write a two foot long essay about the different uses of Devil's Claw. Hermione wanted to finish that essay right away. She opened the book and searched for the chapter about Devil's Claw. Somehow she wondered why she even bothered with homework. She didn't really have to work so hard for school. After all, she had no intention to stay here for long. The only reason she was here was to get the Elder Wand from Dumbledore, wasn't it? An image of Tom suddenly flashed through her mind. Now, that was uncalled for, Hermione thought.

The Elder Wand, remember? That's why you are here!

Hermione sighed and started to read the chapter in the Herbology book anyway. It seemed she wasn't completely able to abandon her bookworm-ish way. After some time, she had already managed to write at least three foot, she felt someone sitting down on the chair beside her. She stopped her writing and looked up to find Tom sitting beside her. He was lounging elegantly in the chair and was right now skimming his fingers lightly over the cover of one of her books.

"What are you doing?" he asked in his deep voice while his grey eyes wandered over her parchment. Hermione sighed. "Well, what does it look like I'm doing?" she said and looked back down at her parchment. "Homework."

"I've searched for you for quite some time," Tom said in a calm tone. Though there was a demanding tinge in his voice as he continued, "Where have you been the whole day?"

Hermione stiffened as she felt his fingers now skimming over her forearm. His touch again evoked that strange feeling in her. The feeling she shouldn't have. Not directed at Tom after all. But Hermione couldn't help but enjoy that tingling sensation his fingers left behind on her skin.

"And why should I tell you what I've been doing today?" Hermione asked him in a surprisingly firm voice.

'Surprising' because she wasn't feeling nearly as unaffected as her voice sounded like. She heard Tom chuckle softly before he leaned down to her and purred rather seductively in her ear, "Because I don't want you to stroll too far away from me."

Hermione's eyes widened as she then felt him placing a light kiss on her cheek. After he had bent up again she cast a glance in his direction. Tom was eyeing her amused and there was again this self-satisfied smirk playing around his mouth. As his eyes were scanning her attentively Hermione was surprised by this unexpected softness shining in them. But there was something else. There was this strangely possessive glint radiating off Tom's eyes as they wandered over her form. Well, there was no getting finished with her homework now. So Hermione rolled up the slip of parchment on which she had been writing her essay for professor Sato.

"So, why did you search for me?" Hermione asked Tom while she stuffed her things back in her bag.
Tom leaned casually back in his chair and watched her stowing her things away.

"No real reason," he answered in an amused tone and Hermione didn't have to look at him to know that he was smirking at her right now.

She was getting irritated by him. Why was he always around her? Hadn't she decided that she should stay away from him? Yes, she should stay away from him! But just as she had formulated that thought she realized that she didn't want him to go away… to leave her alone. So many people had left her already. Hermione looked at Tom. He was smirking arrogantly down at her. Again she wasn't angered by his offending smirk.

You have to stay away from him, Granger! she screamed at herself as she again felt that traitorously feeling glowing up in her.

She grabbed her school bag and stood up. Tom followed suit, the smirk never left his face, though. Hermione tried to ignore him and started to walk away. As she put her weight on her left leg a blazingly sharp pain shot up from her thigh. Hermione gasped in pain and grabbed Tom's arm to steady herself. She squeezed her eyes shut and waited for the pain to ease up again. How stupid. She had totally forgotten the cut she had received earlier as the Slytherins had attacked her. It had been rather deep so she should take it easy until it healed some more. Hermione felt an arm being wrapped around her waist, steadying her. She allowed herself to lean against the body behind her.

"What's wrong?" Tom's voice asked worriedly

He helped her to sit down on the chair again. Hermione opened her eyes and smiled at Tom shakily. He was crouched down in front of her. His gaze wandered over her body seemingly searching for the cause of her pain. His eyes quickly fell on her left leg. The white bandage she had conjured up was only partly covered by her skirt. Tom's eyes narrowed dangerously as he spotted the bandage. He extended a hand towards her skirt, not hesitant at all, and then pulled the skirt up a little bit, exposing the bandage underneath. There was now a rather large red spot where the cut was under the bandage.

"How did that happen?" Tom demanded to know as he looked up at her again, his voice was cold and commanding.

Hermione raised her eyebrows as he fixed her with his piercing gaze.

"It's nothing serious," she said in a soft voice, took the fabric of her skirt from his hand and pulled it down, again hiding the bandage. Then she tried to get up from the chair but Tom put a hand on her shoulder and stopped her from rising.

"How did you get hurt?" he again ordered her to tell him.

Hermione locked her eyes with him. There was a great deal of anger glinting behind his eyes.

"Let's say I had a little encounter with your dear followers," she told him in a soft but firm voice.

His eyes widened a little in surprise. "What do you mean?"

Hermione sighed and leaned against the backrest of the chair. Obviously she wasn't getting away so easily.

"Well, your stupid followers don't seem to like me that much." She offered him as explanation. "And they certainly didn't like it how I've talked to you yesterday morning either. So, they tried to get back to me for that."
There was now an eerily crimson touch to Tom's eyes as he said in a tightly controlled voice, "What did they do?"

By now Hermione was a little unsettled by this fearsome expression on his face. But she answered him nonetheless, "They attacked me in one of the corridors."

Tom's dark magic started to crackle around him murderously and those eyes which still stared up at Hermione were now almost completely red.

"They attacked you?" he said in an eerily calm tone.

Hermione felt a chill darting down her spine as she gazed into those crimson eyes. That was certainly intimidating, that glare of his. She breathed in deeply to calm herself down. Then she got up from the chair and this time she didn't let Tom stop her. She took her bag and started to limp away, ignoring the sharp pain in her leg. Tom who had stood up, too, followed after her.

"Where are you going?" he asked her in a still cold tone.

Hermione flashed a glance at him. Still there, those scary red eyes.

"To the common room," she replied in a firm voice as she continued to walk away.

Tom took a hold of her upper arm thus successfully stopping her. Her eyes flew up at his face. He glared down at her and Hermione was unable to recognize any emotion in his eyes. The red colour made that impossible.

"I don't think so," he hissed at her in a commanding voice.

Her eyebrows shot up and she continued to stare at him with wide eyes. She felt like being petrified as she stood there caught in his gaze. Tom took her bag from her shoulder and readjusted his grasp on her arm before he started to walk away, half carrying her with him. Hermione was very alarmed by the curious stares the other students threw her way as she was being dragged through the library.

They left the library shortly afterwards. And she somehow still found herself following the dominant wizard beside her through the corridors, not really knowing why she didn't resist him. His hand was grasping her upper arm tightly but somehow he supported her so that she didn't have to put too much weight on her left leg as she walked. After a while Hermione glanced at Tom's face. She was rather relieved to find his eyes now being that beautiful shade of grey again.

"Where are we going?" she asked him.

Tom's eyes flashed at her shortly before he answered curtly, "Where you should have gone immediately after you were hit by that curse. The Hospital Wing."

"It's not that serious," Hermione said automatically.

Tom stopped, looked at her and frowned. Now that his eyes were back to grey Hermione was able to see some of his emotions. Tom seemed to still be angry but there was also concern now shining through his eyes.

After a while of staring at her he stated in an unemotional tone, "There is blood flowing down your leg."

Then he tightened his grip on her and resumed his way to the Hospital Wing. As she followed him Hermione looked down on herself. And he was right. There certainly was blood trickling down her leg. It was nothing compared to earlier but there were again traces of blood on her skin. The cut must have reopened again, Hermione assumed. After a while they finally arrived at the door leading into the Hospital Wing. Hermione really didn't want to be here. She still thought that the cut wasn't serious enough to warrant a trip to the Hospital Wing. But it was too late now as Tom just knocked at the door. A moment later Madame Dulan opened the door. Her eyes quickly wandered to Hermione's leg and she exclaimed in a worried voice,

"Oh no, what happened, dear?"

Then she stepped aside and permitted them in. Tom led Hermione to one of the beds. She sat down on the soft mattress. In the mean time Madame Dulan had hurried over to them and now eyed Hermione concerned.

"Oh my dear, you are an unlucky girl, aren't you?" she said while she shook her head sadly. "First your shoulder and now your leg. Unfortunately Healer Perry is not here right now," the brunette woman told Hermione. "But I'll do my best to help you."

Hermione furrowed her brow in confusion until she remembered that ancient looking healer she had met the last time she had been in the hospital wing. That had been shortly after her duel with Tom.

Madam Dulan eyed Tom, standing right beside Hermione and looking uncharacteristically upset. Then she said, "Now, young man, if you excuse us. I need to look after your girlfriend."

Hermione nearly choked as she heard that.

"Girlfriend?" That woman seemed to jump to conclusions, didn't she? Hermione could feel her face heat up and it got even worse as Tom smirked down at her before he said to Madam Dulan in a polite voice,

"Of course, Madame."

Hermione then watched Madame Dulan drawing the drapes shut around the bed. Why was she making such an effort, drawing those drapes shut anyway? Hermione wondered. Why the fuss? It was just her leg that was wounded. Nothing Tom hadn't seen already. Her thoughts jumped back to the last day of the break, as Tom had slept in her bed. Hermione was very annoyed as the blush on her face was back.

"Did you conjure that up yourself?" Hermione was brought out of her musing by Madam Dulan's voice.

She looked down at herself and found Madam Dulan gesturing at the white bandage still wrapped around her now exposed thigh. Though in the mean time a huge part of the bandage had gotten red.

"Yeah," Hermione replied.

Madam Dulan nodded then she pulled her wand and waved it over Hermione's thigh. The bandage vanished and revealed the cut underneath. Madam Dulan examined the cut with narrowed eyes.

"How did that happen, my dear?" she asked Hermione in a kind voice.

"Er… a stray curse?" Hermione muttered.

The brunette woman sighed, shook her head and then started to wave her wand over the wound. Hermione felt a tingling warmth in her leg. After that Madam Dulan took a small potion vial and turned towards Hermione.

"This will help close the wound. But I'm afraid it will hurt a bit."
Hermione nodded. Madam Dulan opened the vial and then poured the red potion cautiously over the cut in Hermione's thigh. It did hurt a little but it was not really bad. As she was finished Madam Dulan waved her wand and a bandage wrapped itself tightly around Hermione's thigh. This bandage was a lot softer and thicker than what Hermione had conjured up herself.

"That's it. You'll be up and about in no time," Madam Dulan exclaimed. "I'm afraid there will be a scar, though." Here Madam Dulan looked at her as if a little scar was the end of the world. "I'm sure your nice boyfriend won't leave you because of it." She smiled encouragingly at Hermione.

Hermione inwardly rolled her eyes.

Yeah, they nearly cut off my leg but the most important thing is that my boyfriend won't mind the scar. The forties remained to be a foreign land to Hermione.

In spite of her thoughts she said politely, "Thank you."

After that Madam Dulan got up and removed the drapes again. Hermione was surprised to find Tom instantly by her side. He scanned her leg with narrowed eyes. Then his gaze wandered from Hermione to Madam Dulan.

As Madam Dulan saw his gaze she told Tom, "You don't have to worry about her. She'll be okay soon." Then she cast a glance Hermione's way before she continued, "There will just be a small scar. But nothing too big."

Hermione stiffened as she saw a red touch appear in his eyes as Tom heard Madam Dulan's last statement. Madam Dulan misinterpreted her reaction and put a hand on Hermione's shoulder.

"It really will be just a very small scar," she told Tom as if she tried to convince him not to abandon Hermione.

Somehow this situation was a little funny, Hermione then decided.

Who would have thought that there would come the day when a crazy nurse tries to convince Tom Riddle not to leave me?

"Thank you for tending to her," Hermione heard Tom say in his smooth voice.

Then he again clutched her arm and helped her to stand up. Hermione was glad to be able to leave the Hospital Wing again. Madam Dulan was really a nice woman but Hermione just didn't like having to go there. She allowed Tom to grab her by her arm and to lead her out of the Hospital Wing. That cut in her leg was really nothing serious but now that she walked again she had to admit that it did hurt quite a bit. So Hermione now leaned rather heavily on Tom, trying to put as little weight on the leg as possible. After a while of walking in silence Tom said in a quiet voice,

"Why didn't you tell me right away that they attacked you?"

Hermione's eyes wandered up at him but he wasn't looking in her direction.

"Why should I have told you?" she asked him confused.

Tom turned his head and now looked down at her.

"Because they could have attacked you again."

She frowned at him before she said, "I can look after myself!"
He sighed in frustration and his grip in her arm tightened a little. Then he said in an authoritative tone, "Next time you are hurt or someone assaults you, you tell me. I'll take care of it."

"Do you really think I can't defend myself?" she said in a firm voice.

"That's not a matter of how strong you are," he replied, still in that cold voice. Then his eyes wandered over her left leg. "And by the way it doesn't look like you can defend yourself well."

"That was a stupid accident," Hermione huffed. "Could have happened to anybody."

"That wasn't an accident. That was a dangerous curse," Tom said while he pulled her closer to him. Then he continued in a commanding voice. "In the future you are going to tell me if you are threatened by somebody."

Hermione glanced up at him. He was looking down at her sharply. His grey eyes were boring into hers daring her to contradict him. Why was he suddenly so tenacious about that matter? Why did he seem to be so enraged about her being attacked? Hermione didn't know what to make of that. He was so strange lately. Hermione knew that their relationship had changed over the Christmas break but she didn't know into what it had changed. What did Tom want from her?

As Hermione didn't reply to his statement or order or whatever it was Tom readjusted the grip on her arm and then started to walk again, dragging her with him. Hermione was too confused to do anything more than just follow him through Hogwarts' many corridors. As they walked in silence through the castle Hermione was deep in thoughts. Before the break Tom wouldn't have cared at all if she had been hurt in any way. Even worse, he would have been delighted.

But now…

Now he seemed to be interested in her. The big question remained to be why he was so interested in her activities. She didn't like that sudden interest of his at all because it resulted in him being always around her. And that collided with her resolution of staying away from him. Even now as he had been so commanding and dominating again she still had enjoyed it how he had held her. He was way too near her now. His hand clasped her arm and she leaned on him so closely that she could even smell his pleasant scent. His closeness made her waver in her decision. That was something unacceptable. Hermione hated herself for feeling protected and safe when he was around.

Protected? With Lord Voldemort around? You must be insane! an enraged inner voice screamed at her. Yes, insane, Hermione thought as she closed her eyes and breathed in deeply. After she had opened her eyes again she cast a quick glance at Tom. He was still walking beside her and held her gently so that she didn't have to put her whole weight on her leg.

What had changed? Hermione wondered again. Tom was still scary sometimes and certainly intimidating but somehow Hermione found that she wasn't afraid of him anymore. That feeling had been replaced by something else.

Something that is wrong!

After they had passed a few more corridors they finally arrived at the entrance to Hermione's common room. She was rather grateful for that because her leg had started to throb painfully. Hermione let go of Tom and turned towards the portrait of the Fat Lady. Before she could utter the password, Tom suddenly grabbed her by her arm again, pulled her over to him and wrapped his arms around her thus pressing her tightly against his chest. Hermione was taken by surprise as she felt his arms around her. As if they had a life of their own her arms snaked themselves slowly around his waist so that she clung to him. Then she even closed her eyes and leaned against him. It was so liberating, having someone holding her, to know that someone was there for her. Hermione had been so sure that this feeling had died with her friends, with her family in the future.

After a while Tom whispered to her in a tightly controlled voice, "Those idiots are never going to bother you again!"

Hermione stared up at him. He was looking down at her and his grey eyes burned with determination.

"You are not going to kill them, are you?" she asked in a weak attempt to joke.

"Not if they are repentant," Tom replied in a serious voice and Hermione wasn't completely sure if he was joking.

Then Tom bent down to her and placed a soft kiss on her lips. Hermione's eyes fluttered shut as she felt him kissing her so gently again. She was still befuddled by his sudden actions as she felt him releasing her again. She reopened her eyes and found him now smirking conceitedly while his grey eyes sparkled softly down at her.

Then he turned towards the portrait of the Fat Lady and said in his smooth voice, "Plover."

The Fat Lady had obviously been observing the scene rather nosily and seemed to now be disappointed that it ended so abruptly. But the portrait still sprung forward and admitted Hermione in.

"Where did you learn the password?" Hermione asked Tom as she drowned him in an irritated look.

He didn't answer instead he just smiled at her charmingly which made her roll her eyes. Then she turned around and climbed through the entrance.

"See you tomorrow," she heard Tom's amused voice calling after her.

After he had accompanied Hermione back to her common room Tom stalked back to his own common room. Now that Hermione wasn't around anymore he allowed his magic to crackle around him furiously. How could they have dared to attack her? Tom's hands balled into tight fists as he remembered that bandage on Hermione's thigh. Those useless gits had really dared to act without his orders. Hermione was his. And Tom didn't like it very much when others stained his things. That was something he never tolerated.

He walked down the last metres to the entrance to the Slytherin common room and tried to rein in his magic. It was still dancing around him so delightfully angry.

"Anguis," Tom hissed the password to the Slytherin common room.

A stone door appeared on the bare wall and slid open, permitting him in. Tom entered the common room. His gaze quickly fell on a group of Slytherins sitting on their usual couch at the other end of the room. Tom started to walk over to them as he felt a hand on his arm. He slowly looked down beside him and his eyes narrowed in anger as he found Melanie Nicolls. Right now she was looking at him expectantly before she said in her pesky, shrill voice,

"Tom, where have you been? I've been waiting for you the whole day."

Tom had to consciously work to stop his magic from lashing out at her. Though he wondered briefly why he put an effort in it anyway. That girl really started to get on his nerves. Just because he had shagged her didn't mean she could bug him all the time.

"I don't have time right now," Tom answered her in a cold tone and pulled his arm free of her unwanted grasp.

He ignored the disappointed expression on Nicolls' face and continued his way towards the group of boys. His magic flared up threateningly as his gaze wandered over his followers. They were sitting there on the sofa, fooling around and laughing stupidly.

Not for long. Tom thought as a familiar coldness took hold of his mind. They noticed him walking over to them very quickly which wasn't really surprising as Tom didn't bother to completely reign in his furious magic. It now danced around him ferociously and glowed so delightfully with his anger. As he had finally reached the boys sitting on the sofa he let his gaze slowly wander over them. They had by now stopped their stupid babbling and were looking at him with a mixture of fear and reverence. But, Tom thought coldly, they were not as afraid yet as they should be.

"Follow me!" Tom hissed at them before he turned around and walked towards the exit of the common room again.

He didn't look back to make sure that they were really following him. They knew too well what would happen if they dared to disobey him. So Tom led them through the many corridors of Hogwarts without once turning back to them or speaking one word to them. But still they followed him. After some time they reached that familiar passageway. It looked so inconspicuous but nevertheless hid the entrance to one of Hogwarts' many secrets. This time Tom didn't order one of his followers to open the Come-and-Go room like he normally did. Instead he himself walked three times by that familiar patch of bare wall until a door appeared. He stepped over to the door, opened it and faced the room behind. It was a very long, dimly lit chamber. Imposing stone pillars rose high up to the ceiling which was hidden in darkness. A green sheen seemed to lit the chamber somehow. Tom's mouth curled up a little as he stepped into the Chamber of Secrets. He swiftly moved further into the chamber's darkness, still not turning around to make sure the other boys were still following him. He could hear their hesitant footsteps echoing from the cold walls. Tom passed a few stone pillars on his way into the heart of the chamber. Snakes carved out of stone wound themselves around the pillars and reminded every intruder angrily of whom that room belonged to. Tom could almost feel the presence of the basilisk as he strode down the chamber. He had to remind himself that this was just a replication made up solely from his memory. The real chamber still lay deep down in the underground of Hogwarts. Thanks to Dumbledore, it was now unreachable to Tom. A burning fury boiled up in him at the thought of the transfiguration teacher and the air around Tom started to bristle irately with his magic again.

Then he passed the last columns and stepped in front of the statue of Salazar Slytherin. Tom let his gaze sweep over the stony figure of his ancestor before he turned around and faced his followers. They were standing just a few metres behind Tom and were huddled together as if afraid the chamber itself would attack them. Which wouldn't be so farfetched if this hadn't just been an imitation of Slytherin's chamber.

Tom breathed in deeply. It felt good being back here even if it was just a mere copy. It had taken him the good amount of four years to find the entrance to the chamber. It was a great loss that no-one would be able to see the chamber ever again now that Tom could no longer risk to enter it. Maybe he should take steps to ensure that Slytherin's noble work would somehow be continued. But now was not the time to dwell on those thoughts. His eyes flashed back at his followers and the white hot rage took hold of his mind again. They needed to be punished for disobeying him and for attacking his possession. So Tom gestured for them to come nearer and they were quickly forming a semi-circle around him. His cold gaze wandered slowly over the boys standing in front of him. Each of them squirmed uncomfortably, Tom noted satisfied. They seemed to be very afraid of Tom and they had every reason to be. He tried to restrain his magic from lashing out at those idiotic boys, at least for now. In his mind's eye he could still see the bloodstained bandage on Hermione's leg and how she had gasped in pain as she had tried to walk on that leg. That witch belonged to no-one but him. He was not going to allow anyone other than himself to hurt her. But his foolish followers had dared to do just that and their stupidity had left behind a mark on Hermione's body.

They are going to pay. Dark, icy cold thoughts swam through his mind, ensnaring him and demanding to take revenge. A murderous determination took hold of him and he knew he wasn't going to resist that deathly urge, he didn't want to resist.

"My dear followers," Tom began lightly and the tone of his voice was not transporting any of the wrath he was feeling. "Just now, word of your doings today has reached me."

His eyes glided over the Slytherins standing in front of him. His wrath burned unrelentingly inside of him as he saw a touch of pride in the eyes of some of his followers. Did they expect to be praised?

"So I decided to come here," Tom continued in his quiet voice which echoed eerily from the stone walls of the chamber. "To give you the chance to tell me about it without nosy people to hear in on us."

Yes, that was one reason he had come here. The other was that from inside this chamber no-one would hear their screams. Tom now started to pace in front of his followers, staring at each of them in turn. But none of them answered his request. Had they finally sensed the danger they were in? Tom stopped in front of Black who shrank back from him a little.

"You don't want to keep things from me, do you?" Tom asked and for the first time he allowed a little of his fury to seep into his words.

Black averted his eyes before he hastily stammered, "No, of course not."

Tom continued to fix him with his stare a little longer before he turned away from Black and now stepped in front of Avery.

"What did you do today?" Tom asked him. His voice was hard and he would not tolerate any lies.

He saw Avery flinch away from him. But then that fool seemed to muster up the little courage he had and answered Tom, "We just punished that insolent girl."

"You punished DeCerto?" Tom slowly asked in a deathly calm voice.

Hate was now rushing through him so forcefully that he was almost unable to maintain his calm appearance. His magic was ripping at him, demanding to be set free.

"I didn't order you but still you felt the need to punish her," he stated in that same emotionless voice.

Panic was now in Avery's eyes as he stared back at Tom. Then he rushed on in a shaky voice, "That slut insulted you. We were just trying to teach her some manners."

Finally Tom wasn't able to hold back any longer he raised his wand, pointed it at Avery and whispered, "Crucio."

Instantly the chamber rang with Avery's painful screams. He crumbled down, bashing and twitching with pain. Tom observed with cold detachment how Avery suffered. His anger cooled down a little as he saw that expression of pure pain on Avery's face. The other boys still stood on their spots, not doing anything. They didn't try to help Avery or to stop Tom. They were just standing there and hoping that they would not share Avery's fate.

After a while Tom ended the curse and the screams, echoing from the walls, stopped. Avery still lay on the ground and he was now breathing laboured. Tom just smiled down at him evilly but his wrath wasn't yet satisfied. It still burned inside of him. He turned his back towards Avery's fallen form and his cold grey eyes wandered up the statue of Slytherin until they landed on this ancient face carved out of the stone. Then he said in a quiet voice,

"I can't remember giving you the order to defend my honour."

Tom detached his eyes from his ancestor's face and turned around to his followers again. He could almost smell their fear in the air as he hit them with his deathly cold gaze.

"Say," he continued, still in that completely controlled voice. "did you assume that I was too weak to do so myself?"

He took a step towards the boys who still stood in that semi-circle before him. Now he allowed his magic to leave him and to crackle around him furiously. He smiled sadistically as he watched his followers shuffle nervously as his magic hit them.

Then he said in a dangerous, low voice, "Do you think I need your help to put that girl in her place?"

His dark glare wandered over his followers and Tom enjoyed the fear he could see in their eyes. After a while it seemed Alba couldn't take this pressure any longer. He stepped out of the circle and then stammered in a fearful voice,

"Of course not. Please, we just wanted to be of use to you."

Tom faced the boy standing in front of him and saw him shaking in fear. He raised his wand and allowed his furious magic to flow through the wand and formed it into a curse.

Sagitta!

His magic left the wand and now took the form of many small, glowing arrows rushing towards Alba. As the arrows hit him Alba screamed in agony and fell down on his knees. Though there were no wounds where the arrows had hit him Tom knew that he had done some serious damage. This spell was not designed to hurt the body but to attack the magic itself. Alba's magic was now mauled and would need some time to mend.

"Do you really think I need your assistance?" Tom asked and the cold hate left behind from the previously used curse still rippled through his magic.

"I do not need assistance!" he hissed in a sharp tone, emphasizing each word while he again twirled his wand.

Alba was hurled to the ground and Tom relished those painful whimpers coming from Alba's fallen form. But then he abruptly turned to Malfoy who stood right beside Alba. He was very disappointed with Malfoy. Normally he was reliable and never dared to contradict Tom in any way.

"Malfoy, tell me. Did you participate in this?" Tom asked him commanding voice.

"I did not." Malfoy whispered his scared sounding reply.

Tom's eyes wandered over his form. So he was not one of those who hurt Hermione? But still, Malfoy seemed to be unable to meet his gaze, Tom noticed.

"But you knew about it. And didn't tell me?" he asked in a low voice.

Malfoy's eyes shot at him shortly and Tom could see his guilt. So he just raised his wand and sent another torture curse at Malfoy. Just like Avery he fell to the ground and screamed in pain.

Tom had just ended the curse and Malfoy's screams still echoed from the chamber's walls as he said in a threatening voice, "Whose idea was it? I advise you to confess now. Believe me, I have methods of finding out myself. And you do not want me to force the truth from you."

His statement was met by an angst filled silence. Then a panicky voice tore the silence, "Lestrange! It was Lestrange."

Tom turned to Avery whose voice had just now given away the traitor. Avery had managed to get on his shaky legs again and now he looked at Tom, pure panic on his face. Tom stared into his frightened eyes and didn't hesitate to use Legilimens on the other boy. His mental assault breached Avery's unprotected mind. Tom cut though his vulnerable memories which made Avery hiss in pain. But it seemed he was telling the truth. Tom retreated again from the other's mind and Avery crumpled to the ground, holding his head. Tom didn't pay him any heed as he now stepped over to Lestrange. So, this was the one responsible for Hermione's wound? Tom's eyes narrowed as they scanned Lestrange. He had led the others to attacking her and hurting her?

An icy coldness wrapped itself around Tom's mind, suffusing him completely until there was nothing left than the murderous drive to cause pain. His magic sang in contentment with his malign thoughts, espousing and supporting them. There was no way to stop now, Tom needed to assuage that powerful need to hurt and to destroy.

"So it was you?" Tom whispered in a low voice. He was not able to hide his wrath any longer. It dripped from every word that left his mouth.

He watched without even a trace of pity how Lestrange flinched away from him and then stuttered shakily in a voice filled by nothing but fear, "Please, I was just trying to serve you. I would never flout your orders."

The other's display of submissiveness did nothing to calm down that piercing coldness which now was the only thing driving Tom's thoughts. There was no room for anything else but this burning hate.

Tom brandished his wand while he thought, Ensis!

A blindingly bright curse left the tip of his wand and soared towards Lestrange. It grazed Lestrange's leg before it smashed violently into to stone floor behind him. Lestrange screamed in pain and his hands flew to the now heavily bleeding wound in his leg. The sight of the blood didn't satisfy Tom's wrath in any way. He waved his wand again and Lestrange was instantly thrown to the floor. The power of the curse sent him skidding until he came to a halt a few metres away. A blood red stain followed the way he had been skidded over the floor. Tom walked over to Lestrange until he again stood right in front of him. Lestrange groaned in pain and Tom delighted in the agony, visible on the other's face.

"Forgive me," Lestrange whimpered. "I didn't mean to displease you."

Tom didn't reply. He just waved his wand again and let his magic wind itself around Lestrange. Then Tom ordered his magic to lift him up. Lestrange yelled in pain as he was brutally yanked up.
Tom just laughed coldly at the other boy's agony who now hung in mid-air with his feet not touching the ground. With a small movement of his wand Tom forced Lestrange's arms to extend from his sides so that it looked as if he had been crucified. Then Tom's magic wound around Lestrange's right arm until it reached his hand.

The very hand he had used to hold his wand as he had attacked Hermione, Tom thought with a disturbing coldness.

He took a step toward Lestrange so that he now stood not even a metre away from him. His eyes bored into Lestrange's frightened ones as he said in a eerily calm voice, "You are never going to disobey me again."

While he hissed those words at Lestrange Tom's magic wrapped itself around Lestrange's index finger and bend it slowly upwards in the wrong direction. An abhorrent glimmer of amusement appeared in Tom's eyes as he felt through his magic how the finger was bent beyond the point that was anatomically possible. But he still didn't stop and Lestrange howled in pain. Then the bone of the finger dislocated from the joint. Lestrange's painful screams peaked and filled the chamber but Tom continued. His magic wandered to the next finger and began to likewise bend it in the wrong direction.

"Please, stop!" Lestrange managed to cry out. "I beg you!"

Tom cocked his head to the side and looked at Lestrange with that detached smile still on his face.

"There is no use begging me."

Lestrange's screams peaked again as the second finger, too, was broken from its joint. Tom sniggered as he now saw tears running down the other boy's face.

"Have mercy! I won't do it again! I won't do it again!" Lestrange whimpered.

Tom laughed a high pitched laugh then he said, "Of course you won't. And I will make sure that you really understand."

While he said that his magic wrapped around the next finger of Lestrange's hand and started to bend it up, too. Lestrange screamed in pain. His pitiful tears didn't stop Tom until he had broken every single one of the fingers on Lestrange's right hand. Then Tom pulled his magic abruptly back and Lestrange fell hard to the floor where he remained lying. He still cried in pain. Tom turned away from him and looked with unpitying eyes at his other followers who still stood where he had left them.

"Now listen to me closely because I won't repeat myself." His gaze wandered to Lestrange who still lay on the floor whimpering in pain then he looked back at his other followers. "You will stay away from Hermione DeCerto. She is mine."

Tom stared at each of them in turn, daring them to not accept his orders. But none of them did. They were too frightened by him, Tom noted satisfied.

Then he leaned over Lestrange who still snivelled on the ground and said in a disturbingly normal voice, "It seems you injured yourself during a Quidditch practice. How clumsy." Lestrange's pain clouded eyes looked up at him, understanding his hint to keep silent about Tom's involvement in his injuries.

Then Tom continued in a helpful sounding tone, "Maybe you should go to the hospital wing?"
Tom's laughter echoed from the cold walls of the Chamber of Secrets as he slid his wand back into his robe pocket and let his gaze wander over his followers. All of them looked terrified at him which made Tom laugh even harder. Then he just turned around and walked confidently towards the exit of the chamber.
Hermione sat in the class room and was very annoyed. Today was Friday. Since she had been thrown into this foreign time period she had come to hate Fridays. And the reason for that new aversion against Fridays was just now stalking into the class room.

"Good morning, class." Legifer's sharp voice rang through the room.

"Good morning, professor." The whole class chanted back though Hermione wasn't joining in.

She had decided to just ignore the whole thing a long time ago. This class was ridiculous. It wasn't worth the energy to get aggravated over it. But that resolution didn't stop Hermione to get quite irritated as her gaze wandered over the hateful professor. Why did that woman always need to look so perfect? Everything from her spotless, shiny shoes and her impeccable clothing to her immaculate hairdo was just perfect. Why did she seem to think it was necessary to waste time with trying to achieve this useless perfection? Hermione would have been able to accept that need for the impossible but that woman expected the same perfection from her students. And judging from the sour look Legifer now cast her way the witch didn't seem to think that Hermione was doing very well. She didn't react to Legifer's evil glare but just continued to look back at her blankly. After a while Legifer shook her head irritated before she said in her stern voice,

"After this long break we now have a lot of things to catch up with."

Hermione's gaze unlatched from the hateful professor and wandered over to one of the windows. There really was no reason to pay attention to the class. So Hermione entertained herself with staring out of the window and let her thoughts wander. Soon they were once again circling around a certain Slytherin with black hair. Hermione knew all too well that she was in a predicament here. Her continued interaction with Tom was just wrong. This whole thing was very dangerous.

This morning during breakfast she had seen that bandage on Lestrange's arm. Hermione was pretty sure that it was Tom's doing. He had obviously punished his followers for having attacked her yesterday. He himself had told her that he would make sure they never hurt her again. Obviously he had kept that promise. Hermione was still surprised that he had felt the need to somehow protect her. She had never expected Tom Riddle to actually protect her. That was just something so absurd that she had never even thought about it. So she had been taken by surprise yesterday as she had seen the anger on Tom's face after he had discovered her injury. Her bewilderment had even grown as he had then brought her to the Hospital Wing and had seemed to be rather concerned about her. The whole thing had resulted in him taking action to prevent something like that from happening again. The frightened looks his followers had cast Tom's way where enough to tell her that he had been quite convincing yesterday. While it was nice to know that he was willing to take care of her it was also very frightening.

Hermione run a shaky hand through her frizzy hair thus ruffling it up even more. Legifer's stern gaze wandered shortly over Hermione's now rather bushy hair. But Hermione never noticed that look of disgust on the professor's face as she was too deeply immersed in her own thoughts.

Tom's behaviour yesterday was scaring Hermione a great deal. It wasn't so much that she was scared by that violence he had obviously used against his followers. Him using violence and cursing people was of course wrong but it was not something new and unexpected coming from Tom. No, what had truly unsettled Hermione was the protective and caring behaviour he showed towards her. Hermione remembered how he had held her cautiously as he had led her to the Hospital Wing. After that he had again kissed her while he had embraced her gently. It was exactly that softness that scared her.
Because the caring behaviour was just completely uncharacteristic for Tom.

Why that drastic change in his behaviour? He was the Dark Lord after all. And the Dark Lord didn't show that sort of concern towards anyone.

Of course he might be pretending to be nice to gain something. But after yesterday Hermione had started to doubt that Tom was just acting again. She knew that he was a good actor and that he was quite proficient in manipulating people but she assumed that he had stopped to act around her. At least those small affectionate gestures he showed towards her seemed to be genuine. Why had he changed so dramatically? He wasn't supposed to change. At least not because of Hermione. She was stranded in the wrong time period and she really wasn't allowed to change anything of the past. Actually she wasn't even allowed to speak with the people here.

Hermione started to fiddle nervously with a strand of her curly hair.

To change the past was incredibly dangerous. What she needed to do was to get a grip on herself and then find a way back to her right time period as fast as possible. But as this idea of accidentally changing the past and thus destroying the future might be frightening there was something that stopped Hermione from just grabbing Peverell's manuscript and fleeing Hogwarts on the spot. It was egoistic and it was despicable. Hermione knew that and she was ashamed of her own feelings. But she had to admit that she kind of liked that new softness in Tom's behaviour. She just liked it how he held her, kissed her and even protected her. It was so nice that after such a long time of being alone and having to fight for herself finally there was someone again taking care of her.

Hermione's gaze wandered from the window back to Legifer who still stood in front of the class and lectured about some offending thing or other. But Hermione wasn't listening to her. She didn't even really see the professor but was just staring vacantly in front of her.

Since that war had started in her time period she had stumbled through darkness. So many horrible atrocities had happened to her and to the people around her. Back then the only thing that had kept her from just giving up and surrendering herself to that darkness had been the presence of her friends. They had never left her. They had protected each other. Hermione knew that without Ron and Harry she would be dead by now. But then…

…they left me. Hermione thought numbly as the sadness tore at her again.

It had been so terrible to be suddenly robbed of their loving protection. She had had to fight on alone. No-one had been taking care of her anymore. Suddenly she had been exposed to all those horrible things and she had been completely unprotected. Hermione had often wondered, while travelling alone through the past, why she fought on. Why did she put an effort in trying to get back in her time? Why not let the darkness take her?

She could just give in and stop to fight. Since they had died Hermione had always longed to see her friends again. Very often that longing had nearly gotten stronger than her will to live on. Why should she keep struggling and try to return to a place where she would again just be alone when it would be so much easier to give up? How could one live without hope?

Hermione closed her eyes and breathed in deeply before she opened them again and continued to stare into space. Here in the past she had found something she had thought was lost forever. That comfortable feeling of someone touching her was back. Someone tried to reach her, to save her. How could she throw that away? When she half knew that by doing so she would also throw away her last chance to survive.

"Ms DeCerto?" Hermione was so deep in thought she wasn't paying any attention to the things going on around her. So at first she didn't hear that sharp voice addressing her, "Ms DeCerto!"

At last the strict voice managed to pierce her thoughts. Hermione raised her head and found professor Legifer standing directly in front of her table. She glared down at Hermione rather evilly.

"Yes?" Hermione asked while looking up at Legifer's narrowed eyes.

She then watched with a morbid fascination how a rather frightening glimmer appeared in Legifer's dark eyes.

"I see you are still as uncouth as you were before the break," Legifer hissed at her fiercely. "Ten points from Gryffindor, Ms DeCerto."

"Why?" Hermione sassed.

She could hear a few muffled giggles coming from behind her but didn't pay them any heed. That sharp frown on Legifer's face intensified alarmingly then she spat at Hermione in a still surprisingly controlled voice,

"For not paying any attention, for not standing up when asked a question and for addressing me in an improper way." Legifer still hit her with a piercing gaze as she continued, cruel sarcasm dripping from her words, "Now, Ms DeCerto, I would be very delighted to hear your opinion on our topic today."

Hermione frowned at the professor. She had, of course, no idea what the hag had tried to teach them today. So she began, "I don't-

"Stand up, Ms DeCerto," Legifer cut across her impatiently.

Hermione exhaled slowly to get her rising temper back under control. As she stood up from her seat she had to suppress a groan of pain as she shifted her weight shortly on her left leg. That cut in her thigh still hurt rather fiercely.

Then Hermione spoke again and she really tried to ban all the cheekiness from her voice, though she didn't completely manage, "I am sorry, professor. I seem to have been distracted shortly."

Hermione nearly rolled her eyes in exasperation as she now saw that triumphant look on the professor's face.

"That's another five points from Gryffindor," Legifer snapped at her.

Hermione decided to not point out that Legifer had already taken points from her for not paying attention. So she remained silent and stared back at the professor blankly. After a moment Legifer cast a last disapproving glare Hermione's way before she turned abruptly around and started to pace in front of the class. Hermione took that as a sign that she was allowed to sit down again. She was rather relieved to be able to sit. The cut in her thigh throbbed painfully whenever she put any weight on the leg.

"Now after this unpleasant occurrence let us continue with our lesson, ladies," Legifer said. "Some of you might be hopeless cases-" Here Legifer threw another nasty glare Hermione's way. "-but I know that the majority of you will one day become good wives. Ms Reeves, what have we been discussing right now?" Legifer asked, turned towards Lucia.

Hermione watched with amusement how Lucia sprang hastily up from her seat as she was being addressed. Then she said in a rather nervous voice, "The rights of women, professor."
"That is correct, Ms Reeves," Legifer said.

Hermione now raised her eyebrows. Now that was really unexpected. For once she was paying attention to what Legifer lectured about.

"As future wives your job will be to keep the house in order and to watch over the children so your husband can come home after a hard day's work and can relax undisturbed in a comfortable environment." Legifer addressed the whole class again. "For doing that you are entitled to receive a little money that you can spend for yourself. Of course the amount of that pocket money is still the decision of your husband as he is the one who earned the money after all."

_How very generous_, Hermione thought and nearly rolled her eyes.

"Now let me give you this advice," Legifer continued. "Don't spend all of this money at once. It is the best to save some of it. You could even get a vault of your own at Gringotts. Of course you would need the consent of your husband before you can open one."

Here Hermione could almost physically feel the indignation taking a hold of her. So women weren't even allowed to have a vault of their own without their husband allowing it? She shortly wondered how she had gotten her own vault at Gringotts. Maybe she was just lucky because there was no husband who could forbid her to have one. Or, Hermione mused, the Goblins just didn't care about that strange wizarding custom.

Hermione didn't know why but she suddenly felt the need to contribute something to this silly class. So she raised her hand and looked at Legifer expectantly. She could see the eyes of the professor narrow slightly as she saw her raised hand but surprisingly Legifer then said,

"Yes, Ms DeCerto?"

Hermione obediently stood up before she said in cynical tone, "As I don't want to become a burden to my future husband and trouble his unequally more intelligent mind with my tiny little woman-problems how about getting myself a job and earn my own money?"

Hermione stared stoically at Legifer and prepared herself for being yelled at. But surprisingly Legifer didn't seem to be angered by her little speech. Obviously Hermione's cynism had been lost on that woman.

"Now, Ms DeCerto, I believe that was the first time you said something constructive in this class." Legifer drawled at Hermione. And Hermione furrowed her brow as she heard that half-praise.

Legifer continued, this time addressing the whole class again, "Ms DeCerto is right. You shouldn't expect your husband to do all the work. If it is possible and doesn't impact negatively on your household chores you should consider working part-time. Of course your main task still remains to keep the house."

_of course_, Hermione thought enraged and wondered if a person could choke on their own sarcasm.

"But never forget to ask your husband before you accept any job. It is after all his decision whether he allows you to work or not." Legifer lectured her class then she proceeded in her strict voice, "As a general rule it is always the best thing to consult your husband about anything concerning financial matters as men are far better in dealing with such things than women."

Hermione just couldn't decide if she should start to cry or to laugh. These so called rights a woman had, according to Legifer, were just ridiculous. Hermione looked around the class room and saw with displeasure how the other girls seemed to listen intently to what Legifer told them. Some of them even took notes. It was awful having to watch this. All those girls, every girl at Hogwarts really, appeared to be trapped in those role conceptions this decade intended women to fulfill. Hermione could understand that it was difficult to escape that path women were supposed to walk in this time period but for herself, as an outsider, it was just hard to watch the talent of those girls gone to waste. The best example was the DADA class. Girls just didn't participate in the dueling lessons on principle. Hermione was of the opinion that it would be important for them to learn how to defend themselves, especially because they were women. Her only consolation was that she knew that in the future things would be different. Not perfect but still better.

After this little insight Hermione was more than happy to just drown out Legifer's annoying voice again. It seemed to be an eternity until this pointless class was finished. But finally Legifer ended the class and Hermione reached for her bag and got quickly up from her table. She wanted to get out of the class room as fast as her painfully throbbing leg would allow her to leave. Hermione had just reached the door as she heard that sharp voice again.

"Ms DeCerto, please stay behind."

Hermione sighed rather loudly, turned around and slowly walked over to Legifer's desk. As she reached it the other girls had all left the room by now so she was alone with Legifer.

_How fun..._

Hermione tried to reign in her sarcasm and looked at Legifer in polite expectation. She had no idea what that woman could want from her.

Legifer had again fixed her with a cold glare then she said in her clipped voice, "I would have expected you to come to me immediately after the break ended."

Hermione frowned at the woman in front of her. Why would she want to meet Legifer? There really wasn't anything the two of them had to discuss. Legifer continued to stare at Hermione. Obviously she expected Hermione to do something. But Hermione was just lost so she did nothing but stare back at the professor.

Legifer then shook her head disapprovingly before she snapped, "The summary, Ms DeCerto! You still need to give me the summary I wanted you to write over the break."

Hermione's eyes widened a little as she heard that. She had totally forgotten about it. But now she remembered. Before she had gone to London Legifer had wanted to talk with her. Back then she had given Hermione that stupid book and had demanded that she wrote a summary on it. Of course Hermione had never done such a thing. There had been a lot of more important things going on during her break. So she didn't even know where the book was right now. She had certainly not taken it with her to London. Most likely it still lay somewhere in her dorm. Hermione's gaze wandered back to Legifer.

"…er…" Hermione mumbled.

She could then see how Legifer's eyes narrowed in anger, though it didn't look like she was particularly surprised.

"Don't tell me that you did not write that summary, Ms DeCerto," Legifer hissed at her.

"It might have slipped my mind, professor," Hermione answered before she could stop herself.

She could almost feel those waves of hate coming from Legifer as the woman now glared at her rather evilly.
"That is another thirty points from Gryffindor, Ms DeCerto," Legifer huffed at her angrily. "But don't think you can get away so easily."

Hermione had to resist the urge to get her wand as she then watched how Legifer pulled her own wand and waved it in angry movements. Shortly afterwards the huge book appeared out of thin air and landed with a dull thud on Legifer's desk. Obviously Legifer had summoned the book from Hermione's dormitory. Legifer picked it up and held it out for Hermione to take. Seeing no other option, Hermione reached reluctantly for the book.

"As you seem to be unable to work unsupervised you will finish the summary during detention," Legifer snarled at her. "You will come to my office every Friday after dinner, starting next week, until you can present me a satisfying work."

Hermione's mouth was pressed into a thin line and her hands clutched the book so tightly that her knuckles turned white. Did that stupid old crone really think she had nothing better to do than waste her time with writing this foolish summary?

"Yes, professor." Was the only thing Hermione managed to say without yelling obscenities at that evil woman.

Hermione was seething with anger as she watched Legifer leave the class room.

Hermione could hear her voice coming from the corridor, "Mr Weasley, what are you doing loitering around in the corridor?"

Hermione groaned softly. Of course, her friends still insisted in protecting her from Tom's evil machinations. Right now Hermione was really not in the mood to deal with their concern so she quickly dived behind Legifer's desk. From here she couldn't be seen. Just a few moments later she heard someone entering the class room.

"Oh no, must've missed her." She heard Weasley's seemingly upset voice.

Then Hermione heard him leaving the class room again. She assumed that he was now going to try to find her. Somehow she did feel a little guilty as she crawled like a thief out of her hiding place on the floor but she really wanted to be alone now. Hermione stood up from the floor and then straightened her robes. After that she stuffed the offending book into her bag and then left the class room. As she stepped out on the corridor she was quite relieved to find that Weasley really had left already. Hermione checked her watch. It was still some time left until her next class, Transfiguration. As the Household Charms and Spells class room wasn't too far away from the library Hermione decided to go there. The atmosphere of the library had always had a calming effect on her mind. And she really needed to calm down right now.

So it was just a short time later that Hermione entered the library. There were a few students sitting at the tables and working. Though Hermione noticed annoyed that a few of them were now staring at her rather curiously. She could even hear that group of Hufflepuff girls starting to chatter excitedly as she passed them. She couldn't understand everything they said but the words 'Riddle' and 'broom cupboard' were enough to raise her already hot temper even further. Those stupid gossip mongers were slowly getting on her nerves. But right now that heavy book she was carrying in her bag was even more infuriating. Why did she need to read this stupid book? Legifer even forced her to write a summary. Hermione felt her blood boiling furiously. She stomped down a few aisles in search for a little solitude while simultaneously trying not to tear that stupid book apart in a fit of anger.

As she entered the next aisle she spotted Tom sitting at a table standing right under one of the huge windows. She looked around but it seemed no other students were in the vicinity right now.
Hermione hesitated shortly but then she walked over to the table Tom was occupying and slumped down in the seat beside him. There were books and parchment spread out in front of him. Hermione assumed that he was in the middle of doing his homework. Normally she would support that venture but right now she was too enraged to be considerate.

Tom had looked up as he had noticed someone approaching him. Hermione could again see that softness creeping into his gaze as he looked at her over that book he held in his hands. But that softness was not enough to calm her completely down so she stared rather darkly at Tom. He raised one eyebrow questioningly at her but didn't say anything. Hermione glared at him for a moment but then she just couldn't hold back anymore.

"I can't believe that stupid cow gave me detention!" Hermione blustered. "I mean, really, what have I done? That evil hag had it in for me since I met her!"

Tom closed the book he had been reading in and turned to Hermione. She could see he had one eyebrow raised as he eyed her.

"Dare I ask whom you are speaking about so complimentary?" Tom said in his deep voice.

Hermione's eyes narrowed as she hissed the hateful name, "Legifer!"

"Hm, Household Charms and Spells. Your favourite class I assume?" Tom said innocently, but Hermione really didn't like the smirk that was forming on his face. "How did you manage to get yourself into detention? I mean, it's only the first week after break."

Hermione continued to glare at Tom darkly. He had now fully turned towards her and looked at her intently, seemingly paying her utmost attention. But Hermione could see the mocking amusement glinting in his grey eyes. She reached for her bag, she had discarded beside the table and pulled the disturbingly huge tome out. Instead of answering Tom she shoved the book in his direction. He raised his eyebrows questioningly but as she didn't answer and continued to glare at the book Tom took the book.

"Etiquettes for the Young Housewitch?" Tom read the cover. Then he glanced back at Hermione. "What about the book?"

Hermione detached her gaze from the stupid book and looked up at Tom.

"That insane fanatic wanted me to read that trash." Hermione gestured to the book. "Imagine that!"

"What a horrible task," Tom said, his voice bordering on sarcasm.

Hermione's eyes narrowed again as she scowled at Tom. "Yes it is," she huffed. "And she even wanted me to write a summary on the book."

"Which you didn't do?" Tom asked lightly as he flipped through the book.

"Of course not," Hermione exclaimed. "I'm not wasting my time with that rubbish! I mean, come on, etiquettes for the housewitch? Like I need something like that!"

Hermione crossed her arms before her chest and made a very unlady-like snort as she stared daggers at the book in Tom's hands.

"Yeah, I really can't see why you would need that," Tom said and now there was definitely sarcasm dripping from his voice.
Hermione's fierce glare wandered from the book to Tom's face. He was still flipping through the book calmly.

"If you like it so much, then how about you read it?" she said with a tightly controlled voice.

Tom sighed and looked back at Hermione. "So when is your detention?"

Hermione looked away from him, still rather enraged. "Obviously every Friday evening until I'm finished with the book and writing the summary," she said angrily.

There was a pause in which neither of them said anything. Then Tom spoke again, this time there was no mock in his quiet voice, "What do you mean every Friday?"

"Like I said. I'm not getting off the hook until I've read every single chapter in that lousy excuse for a book and have written the summary," Hermione repeated the conditions for her detention.

She glanced back at Tom. There was now a frown furrowing his brow.

"Every Friday?" he said darkly. "I should curse that woman."

Hermione leaned back in her chair and said frustrated, "Now we are thinking along the same lines."

She stared angrily at the huge tome, lying on the library table. Why did she have to waste her time with reading this stupid trash? There were a lot of really important things she had to do.

Hermione stiffened as she suddenly heard Tom's silky voice whispering in her ear, "I could really curse her, you know. No-one's ever going to find out it was me."

Hermione slowly turned her head and looked at him with a furrowed brow. He grinned down at her and there was a glint of amusement in his grey eyes but she was not really sure whether he had been joking right now or not.

"I think you already did your part of cursing people yesterday," Hermione said as she eyed him in suspicion.

Tom then leaned back in his chair and smiled at her with a completely innocent expression on his face.

"I'm sure I don't know what you are talking about," he said in a confused sounding voice.

Hermione wasn't fooled by that display of innocence or there was a glint of self-satisfaction in his grey eyes. And Hermione knew that he was not innocent. This morning she had seen the bandage on Lestrange's arm. His followers had seemed to be even more intimidated by Tom than they normally were. Tough Hermione didn't feel particularly sorry for them she still didn't approve of Tom cursing his followers.

"Don't bother to deny it," she told him while still hitting him with a disapproving glare. "I know you cursed them."

Tom didn't seem to be impressed by her glare in any way as he continued to smile at her. Then the smile on his face slowly transformed into a rather evil smirk.

"They deserved it," he finally said in a vicious tone. Then the smirk left his face and he narrowed his eyes at her. "So, how are you feeling today? Does your leg still hurt?" he asked demandingly.

His grey eyes left her face and wandered to her leg. Hermione raised her eyebrows as she heard that commanding tone in his voice but decided to answer him anyway.

"It's not that bad. You don't need to worry," she told him in a soft voice.

"'Not bad'?" Tom said unbelievingly.

Then he reached for her skirt and slid it up a little bit to have a look at the bandage underneath. This time there was no red spot on the white bandage. Tom skimed his fingers gently over the white material as he stared down at her leg with an angry frown between his eyebrows. His gaze wandered back to Hermione's face and he locked eyes with her.

"If it starts to hurt again, you are immediately going back to the Hospital Wing," he ordered her.

Hermione stared right back into his eyes and it was again there. This wonderful but at the same time so dangerous concern she could see radiating from those otherwise so cold eyes. Hermione bit her lip as she looked up at this tempting affection which glinted so evidently in Tom's grey eyes. She knew that this inviting glint could very well be the demise of the future her friends and herself had helped to secure but at the same time this softness was like a salvation to her. She tried to resist for she knew what was at risk here but she had felt so lost and just broken since her friends had left her forever. While she was incredibly scared, at the same time the expression in Tom's eyes seemed like a beacon of hope. It protected her from all those horrible memories that otherwise tore at her without mercy.

As Hermione was looking up at his grey eyes she slowly, even hesitantly, skidded nearer to him. The rational part of her mind screamed at her to stop but the other part which was somehow broken, desperate and hurting drove her on. She couldn't stop herself as she leaned towards Tom and then cautiously snaked her arms around him until she clung to him tightly. She closed her eyes and leaned her head against his chest as she felt his strong arms reassuringly around her, pulling her even closer to him. Her pain and doubts were forgotten as she embraced Tom so tightly.

Tom was confused as he held Hermione in his arms. She had been fine just a minute before but then she had suddenly looked at him in that strange way again. He had seen a glimpse of that inexplicable despair and grief that seemed to sometimes overwhelm her. Not for the first time he wondered what had caused her pain. She had looked up at him with her hazel eyes and he had seen the unbearable sorrow again. Something had happened to her and it had broken her.

Tom could feel his magic rushing through him furiously as he held Hermione. He needed to find out what it was that had hurt her so. Hermione now belonged to him and he wasn't going to allow anyone to hurt her again. But right now all he could do was to hold her closely as she clung to him almost desperately.

After some time she ended the embrace and looked up at him. The sorrow was still hidden in her eyes but now there was something more. There was dangerous insecurity flitting over her face. He could always see that insecurity when Hermione was around him. Tom knew that she still was unsure about their relationship. It even seemed like there was an internal battle raging inside of Hermione. A part of her wanted to be with him but then there was another part which still detested him. Obviously Hermione hadn't yet decided which part she should listen to. But that was something unacceptable. Because now that he had claimed her he was never going to let her go again.

Tom reached out for her and cupped one of her cheeks in his hand. Then he leaned down and kissed her softly. She hesitated shortly but then he was very pleased as he could feel her responding to him. She might be struggling or trying to resist but he was not going to allow her to leave him again. She was his.

Hermione was shocked again by her own actions. So when Tom released her she got hastily up from her seat. What had gotten into her? Again?

"I… I have to go…" she stammered as she looked down at Tom.

She quickly averted her eyes from him as she found him smiling at her softly. Then she grabbed her bag with trembling fingers and turned away from Tom, intending to leave as fast as possible. She had only taken a few hurried steps as she heard Tom's gently taunting voice,

"Didn't you forget something?"

Hermione stopped and then slowly turned around to him. He was still sitting elegantly at the table and now a smirk tugged at the corners of his mouth as he eyed her in amusement. Her eyes wandered to his hand which held Legifer's book up. The smirk on his handsome face grew even bigger as he waved the book in a small casual movement. Hermione hesitated shortly but then she walked back to him. As she reached him Tom held the book out for her. She extended a hand to accept it. As she took the book her fingers shortly skimmed over Tom's warm hand. The very annoying tingling sensation in her stomach was back again. Her hand clasped the book tightly and she stuffed it angrily into her bag. After that Hermione intended to turn around and leave again but before she could do that she involuntarily gazed down at Tom again. He was still looking at her and his eyes shone so softly. Hermione felt like drowning in them. She should really leave now.

She had just formulated that decision as she found herself somehow bending down to Tom. Her hand suddenly run through his silky dark hair and before what she was doing registered in her mind she had placed a kiss on his lips.

Then she hastily bent up again and felt rather startled by her own rash behaviour and by that pleasant and content feeling in her stomach. She grabbed her school bag tightly and almost ran away. She was too frightened by her own odd feelings so she didn't pay Tom any attention as she fled the library. Otherwise she would have been able to see a rather triumphant smirk on his handsome face as he watched her leave.

"Hermione! There you are!" Hermione heard someone yelling as she hurried down yet another corridor in her venture to bring as much distance between her and the library as possible.

She turned around and found Longbottom, Lupin and Weasley walking towards her. She could see expressions of concern on the boys' faces.

"We have been searching for you," Weasley exclaimed rather breathlessly as he had reached her. "Where have you been? I've waited for you in front of the class room."

"Really?" Hermione said, trying to sound surprised. "I haven't seen you. So I left."

"We told you that you can't walk around alone," Longbottom said in exasperation as he looked down at her.

Hermione couldn't help but feel a little peeved by that concern flashing in his eyes for she knew that this protectiveness was quite unnecessary. That knowledge was reminding her bluntly of how much Tom's behaviour towards her had changed. She was frightened by that change in his actions a great deal. Though right now, she was more frightened by her own behaviour and her wrong feelings. She just couldn't be trusted around Tom, it seemed.

"But he didn't get you, did he?" Hermione was brought out of her musings by Longbottom's worried voice.

She again looked up at him and then asked confused, "Who?"
She watched Longbottom shake his head before he said in a serious tone, "Riddle, of course. You really have to be more careful. He's after you again."

Hermione frowned at him. She was not really sure how to respond to that. Partly it's even true, she thought strangely amused. Though that really was no funny matter, she reprimanded herself.

"Look," she began in a soothing tone, "I really don't think he'll try anything."

But obviously her appeasing words were lost on her friends as they were still looking at her in concern.

"You shouldn't be so careless," Lupin told her in his calm voice.

"Yeah," Longbottom instantly agreed. "That evil git is planning something, believe me. You don't even want to hear the rumours he's made up about you again."

Hermione stared at him. He was right, she really didn't want to hear the rumours. Worst thing, though, was her guilty conscience as she knew that at least some of the rumours were indeed true.

"Don't worry," Lupin told her. He had obviously mistaken that shaken look on her face for fear and now tried to console her.

"Yeah, nothing'll happen to you," Longbottom said. Then he wrapped an arm around her shoulders before he announced happily, "Let's go to transfiguration or we'll be really late and get ourselves thrown into detention."

Hermione smiled. Yes, she really didn't need any more detentions.

"So," Weasley asked her while they walked towards the transfiguration class room. "How was Household by the way?"

Hermione looked at him and there was an expression on her face like she had just bitten into a lemon.

"Ugh, don't ask. I wish I could drop that stupid class."

"Well, you'll never find a husband if you think that way," Longbottom suddenly said in a very accurate imitation of Legifer's voice.

Hermione giggled at him, "Pff, maybe you should marry Legifer."

Longbottom's eyes widened in horror before he said, "Don't joke about things like this, Hermione." Then he grabbed his chest in a melodramatic pose and breathed, "Oh, how I yearn for that woman, you have no idea."

Hermione stared at him for a second before they all simultaneously broke into laughter.

"Yeah, right," she managed to say between her giggles.

It wasn't long until they reached the transfiguration class room. Hermione wasn't angry with her friends anymore. Sure, they were currently unbearably protective of her but they always managed to cheer her up no matter how panicky she might have been.

As Hermione entered the transfiguration class room she couldn't stop her gaze from instantly falling on Tom. He was already sitting at his table. Obviously he hadn't needed as much time to walk to the class room as she had. Maybe because he hadn't fled in panic from the library to then run aimlessly through Hogwarts' many passage ways. So he already sat elegantly in his seat with one arm dangling casually over the backrest of the chair. He seemed to be totally at ease, radiating off an air of superiority.

But as Hermione looked closer she could see the small differences in his posture. Right now, Tom seemed to be very tense. She didn't have to guess why he was feeling this way. This was the first transfiguration lesson after the break. Hermione knew, Tom just hated Dumbledore. She could even understand why Tom wasn't exactly fond of Dumbledore. It was Dumbledore, after all, who had forced him to go back to that horrible orphanage. And it was also Dumbledore who had taken Tom's wand away. Hermione still thought that if Tom had just told Dumbledore everything about the orphanage, the professor would surely never have sent him there. Tom had still not told Hermione why Dumbledore took his wand in the first place. There must have been a reason behind it.

Hermione walked over to her table in the front row. She smiled hesitantly at Tom whose grey eyes softened a bit as they fell on her. Then she sat down at the table in front of Tom and started to pull her parchment and quill out of her bag. At that moment the class room door opened and Dumbledore entered. He was again wearing one of his flashy robes. Though lime green definitely wasn't his colour, Hermione noticed amused.

"Good day to you, my dear students," he greeted them with his kind voice as he walked over to his desk. "I hope you enjoyed your break and didn't forget all the things we have learned. Though I would understand fully if your brains have used the opportunity to get rid of all that abstract information again." Dumbledore said while his eyes twinkled at them mischievously.

"Can anyone tell me what spell we learned in our last lesson?" Dumbledore asked them.

Out of habit, Hermione's hand shot up.

"Yes, Ms DeCerto?" Dumbledore turned to her.

"We learned about the 'Confero' spell, professor," Hermione answered quickly.

"Right you are, Ms DeCerto," Dumbledore beamed at her. "And can you tell me what that spell is used for?"

Hermione nodded, then said, "It is a spell used to transmit magic."

Hermione knew quite a bit about that particular spell by now. It was after all an invention of Peverell and he had devoted a whole chapter in his manuscript to that spell. Though Hermione had to grudgingly admit that she had at best understood half of what he had written.

"Right again, Ms DeCerto. Take five points for Gryffindor." Dumbledore smiled down at her.

The rest of the lesson Dumbledore tried to explain the theory behind the Confero spell. Hermione quickly noticed that he was just talking about the simpler connections between the spell and the transmitted magic. She already knew this part from the Peverell manuscript. Obviously Dumbledore deemed the more complex parts of the spell's theory as too difficult for his students. Hermione couldn't blame him because she herself hadn't understood everything.

"Now, after this exhausting theory let us try a practical approach to the Confero spell," Dumbledore finally said.

He then turned around and took a small wooden box from where it had stood on his table. The professor handed the box to Lupin while he said, addressing the whole class,
"I want each of you to take one of the knitting needles and then try to transfer a little of your magic into them. Don't be disappointed if it doesn't work right away the Confero spell is not easy to learn."

As Lupin had taken one of the knitting needles out of the box he handed it to Hermione. She took one and then stared at the needle with a frown on her face. The last time she had tried to use the Confero spell it hadn't worked at all. She cast a sideways glance at Lupin. He had already started. But it seemed that he wasn't making any progress if that frustrated look on his face was anything to go by. Hermione sighed softly then she put the knitting needle down on the table. She flicked her wrist and her wand landed in her hand.

"Confero," she whispered softly as she waved her wand over the needle.

Instantly she could feel her magic flowing towards the needle. Though it was incredibly difficult to maintain the flow as it seemed to flicker unsteadily. In the end her concentration broke and the flow died down again. It really was rather frustrating. Trying to direct her magic in the right direction was like wanting to catch a fish with bare hands. It always seemed to slip away.

But Hermione wanted to at least try it once more. This time, though, she concentrated her magic before she uttered the spell. As she was trying to get her magic completely under control she again noticed that strange pulse which seemed to always surround Hogwarts. She wondered if this pulse was really the ward protecting Hogwarts. Though she was surprised to be able to feel it now because Hermione had never before felt this pulse inside of the castle. But now she could feel that it flowed through everything, including her own magic. It was rather strange having to feel how her own magic was influenced by something she couldn't control.

Hermione continued to concentrate on her magic and it wasn't long before she stumbled over the Elder Magic. Again the Elder Magic seemed to be the only thing which was completely undisturbed by the pulse. Hermione always felt a little uneasy when she felt the Elder Magic inside of her. It was still alien to her. But now she was rather glad that at least one thing seemed to be untouched by this strange pulse. Cautiously Hermione tried to get a grip on the Elder Magic. She reached out for that strange magic inside of her and tried very hard to draw upon its power. But as expected, the Elder Magic was as elusive as ever.

Hermione had just retreated again from the Elder Magic as she could suddenly feel how it stirred inside of her. It moved and jerked and then abruptly it seemed to grow. Hermione couldn't stop it in any way and then the Elder Magic wrapped itself completely around her. It only lasted for seconds, but during that short time Hermione could feel how she was completely unlinked from that steady pulse of Hogwarts' magic. The Elder Magic surrounded her and seemed to protect her from the warding magic. But before Hermione could comprehend what just had happened the Elder Magic collapsed and unwound from her again. It broke down until it was again hidden beneath her own magic.

"Are you alright?" she could hear a worried voice ask her.

Hermione looked beside her and found Lupin frowning at her. He hadn't noticed anything, had he?

"Yes," she said and smiled at him reassuringly.

Longbottom who sat beside her said, "You really shouldn't overexert yourself." Then he leaned to Hermione and whispered in a mischievous tone. "If you ask me, I think that transferring thing is impossible anyway."

Hermione chuckled amused. Though she knew that he was wrong there. Otherwise she wouldn't be in this mess where a strange magic had somehow taken refuge inside of her. Her smile dropped from her face and she worriedly glanced over to Dumbledore. He hadn't noticed the Elder Magic, had he? But she was relieved to find Dumbledore standing at the other end of the room and currently trying to explain something to a student. Hermione breathed out. She then turned her head around and was more than relieved to find that Tom wasn't looking her way either. He had a rather scary look on his face and seemed to stare darkly at Dumbledore. A knitting needle lay neglected on his table and Tom hadn't even drawn his wand. It didn't seem like he was going to try the Confero spell. Then again he was the only one who had managed to do it even before the break.

It seemed that she had been lucky. Neither Dumbledore nor Tom had noticed her little stunt with the Elder Magic. It would have been difficult having to explain to either of them where she had gotten that strange magic.

Hermione turned around again and put her wand with a trembling hand down on her table. She wasn't going to try the Confero spell again. She didn't want to have the Elder Magic invading her. It had been rather stupid to try to reach the Elder Magic here in the class room anyway, where everyone could see it. Up to now the Elder Magic had never done something like it just had. So Hermione hadn't expected it to wrap around her suddenly.

What had just happened? Hermione wondered frantically. Did the power of that magic somehow grow? Or was it that she had suddenly gained more access to the magic? Either way, Hermione thought as she gazed pensively down at her black wand, she needed to read on in Peverell's manuscript. She decided to start on the next chapter in the book this night.

{{{{{{{{+}}}}}}}}

It was some time later that day as Hermione and her Gryffindor friends walked down to the Great Hall for dinner. Before the entrance to the Great Hall they saw a crowd of people standing before the notice-board. Normally that was where the next Quidditch match or a Hogsmeade weekend was announced. Judging from that excited whisper something interesting must be published there.

"What are they staring at?" Hermione asked as she was standing on tiptoes and tried to see over Longbottom's shoulder.

Longbottom turned his head as he heard her question. "It's the apparition lessons," he told her while there was an excited glint appearing in his blue eyes. "The sixth years are allowed to take the apparition test."

"That's so wicked!" Weasley exclaimed as he was smiling at her broadly. "We'll learn how to apparate. How brilliant is that?"

Hermione smiled back at the two boys standing in front of her. They were so excited about being able to learn how to apparate. Somehow Hermione liked this innocent enthusiasm she could see radiating of their faces. She remembered that she had been equally excited in her sixth year as she had heard they would learn how to apparate. Hermione had to smile as she remembered how Ron had lost half of his eyebrow as he had taken the test. Of course he had passed with the second attempt. But still that image of him without half his eyebrow was quite funny. Thinking back, those had been jaunty days, Hermione thought wistfully. Though back then she wouldn't have agreed as there had seemed to be drama lurking behind every other corner. And, Hermione's smile disappeared of her face, the dark menace had already been visible on the horizon.

"Why the long face?" Longbottom diverted her thoughts before they could get really depressing. "Do you think it's that difficult? Learning to apparate, I mean."

Hermione looked up at him and had to grin again as she imagined how he would look without his
"You don't need to be afraid of failing," Weasley grinned at her while they resumed their way to the Great Hall, leaving the crowd behind. "You're a know-it-all, just like Lupin. Of course you'll manage."

"Watch it, you," Hermione said in a mock threatening voice. "I'm not a know-it-all."

Longbottom put an arm around her shoulder as he said with an amused glint in his eyes, "He's right, Hermione. You have to accept it. But at least your nerdy power will allow you to learn how to apparate in no time."

Hermione was just going to retort something as she heard a cold voice behind her say, "She's not going to learn anything if you are always all over her."

She turned around and saw that Tom was standing just a few paces away, carrying an air of authority as he fixed Longbottom with a cold glare. That was quite bad, Hermione thought frustrated. She knew that Tom and Longbottom hated each other. In the corner of her eyes she could see how Longbottom had stiffened now and his right hand even twitched a little, obviously wanting to pull his wand. Longbottom was hotheaded and could do some imprudent things when angered.

"I don't think that's any of your concern," Longbottom hissed at Tom enraged.

Hermione's eyes wandered back to Tom and she saw that angry frown on his face. Although Tom appeared to always be able to contain himself she knew that in reality he had quite the hot temper, too. She really didn't want him to get in a fight with her friends again. So she looked up at him pleadingly. Tom's eyes sparkled down at her softly but then his gaze hardened again as it wandered back to Longbottom. Hermione bit her lip as she saw that evil expression on his face.

"Oh, but it is my concern," Tom drawled at Longbottom. "You see, I'm a prefect. I would really hate taking points from DeCerto, here, for wasting the apparition instructor's time."

"What are you trying to say, Riddle?" Longbottom huffed at Tom angrily. "That Hermione is stupid?"

Tom's eyes shortly swept over her and Hermione could see an unexpected mischievous glint in them, then Tom turned to Longbottom and sneered at him derisively, "Well, at least I'm sure DeCerto is not nearly smart enough to learn how to apparate. I even think she would be so foolish and try to apparte through Diagon Alley's impenetrable wards. Then she'll get splinched."

Hermione's mouth twitched traitorously as she tried to suppress a grin. Yes, it was very much impossible to apparate through Diagon Alley's wards. But that hadn't stopped her to grab Tom and apparate with him through those wards during the Christmas break. Back then he had been more than curious to learn how she had managed that.

"Don't be silly, Riddle," Hermione said in a condescending voice. "Everyone knows that it's impossible to apparate through Diagon Alley's wards."

Tom narrowed his eyes at her angrily. But Hermione wasn't fooled by his acting. She could see the amusement in his grey eyes. He seemed to enjoy that little banter.

"Pff, so it would seem," he scoffed at her. "But you don't have much common sense so I wouldn't be surprised if you tried anyway."

"Stop insulting her!" Longbottom huffed at Tom as he stepped protectively in front of Hermione.
Tom raised an eyebrow gracefully at him. Then a rather evil smirk slowly took form on his face.

"You can't protect her forever," Tom told Longbottom in a smug voice.

Tom's gaze darted shortly to Hermione. The softness in his grey eyes was telling her that she didn't need Longbottom to protect her. Then Tom turned around and stalked confidently away.

"That evil git!" Longbottom blustered enraged as he watched Tom walking down the corridor in direction to the Great Hall.

Tom stalked into the Great Hall. He was still quite angry and his magic rushed through him. He slowly walked over to the Slytherin table while trying to reign in his temper again. It had been unbearable, having to watch how Longbottom had wrapped his arm around Hermione. As Tom had seen that, he really had had to work to stop himself from throwing a very dark curse Longbottom's way. That Gryffindor boy wasn't allowed to touch Tom's possession with his dirty fingers. He reached the Slytherin table and now walked over to his seat. As he passed Lestrange who already sat at the table Tom was very pleased to see a look of fear on his face before Lestrange avoided his eyes. His other followers looked at him with the same awe and terror in their eyes. They already know, Tom thought satisfied, what happens to those who mess with me.

Tom quickly needed to finally convince Hermione that she belonged to him, then he wouldn't need to act so cautiously around her so-called friends any longer.

Finally Tom had reached his seat and sat down at the table. Then he let his gaze wander back to the entrance to the Great Hall. He saw how Hermione just walked into the hall. His eyes narrowed dangerously as he saw that she was still accompanied by those Gryffindor idiots. Tom watched Hermione walking to her house table. Everything would have been much easier if she had been sorted into Slytherin. Hogwarts' stupid house system was quite annoying at the moment. But that wouldn't stop him from gaining Hermione, Tom thought haughtily as he watched the witch sitting down at Gryffindor table. He had already made progress with her, hadn't he? Tom thought back to the incident this morning in the library. Hermione had been angry and had needed someone to talk to. And she had come to seek him out. She hadn't gone to her silly friends, no, she had wanted to talk with Tom.

A smug smile appeared on his face as Tom watched Hermione, sitting at the other end of the hall.

The best thing was, that back then Hermione had initiated one of their kisses. She might have been unsure of herself and rather shocked by her own actions but still she had kissed Tom. He knew that he just needed to push her some more and then she would finally cave in.

"Hello, Tom," a silky female voice whispered into his ear.

Tom turned his head and frowned as he found Melanie Nicolls sitting down in the seat beside him. This stupid slut started to really annoy him. Tom slowly regretted to ever have shagged her. Since then she always pestered him with her unbearably boring presence. Maybe he should just curse her. Or better yet, order one of his followers to curse her then he wouldn't lose any more time over her.

"Good evening, Melanie," Tom replied in a polite voice that didn't betray any of his sinister thoughts.

Then he looked away from her again and tried to ignore her. His gaze once more wandered back to Hermione.

"I'm sure you are rather disgusted by those rumours going around, aren't you?" Nicolls' pesky voice again broke his concentration.
Tom slowly looked back at Nicolls and found her staring at the Gryffindor table.

"Oh, look at that silly girl," Nicolls exclaimed with a sour look on her face. "I bet DeCerto made those rumours up herself."

Tom exhaled slowly to try to calm his seething magic down again. It begged him to be released. Preferably in form of a dark curse and in direction to Nicolls.

"Like you would ever spend time with someone like her," Nicolls continued in her snobbish tone.

I can't believe that I'm spending time with you actually, Tom thought enraged as he stared down at Nicolls.

Then Nicolls suddenly put a hand on his arm before she leaned over to him and whispered into his ear, "How about we do something to prove to them that you are not spending time with that disgusting Gryffindor?"

Tom could feel his fury intensify as he could almost hear that 'But with me.' which Nicolls hadn't said out loud. But they both knew what she had just suggested. Nicolls then leaned back again but she still clung to his arm. Tom wanted nothing more than to shake off her unwanted clasp.

"I don't know," Tom said and then he could barely ban the scoff from his voice. "You surely are the most beautiful girl in Hogwarts." Tom nearly laughed out loud as he could see that vain look on Nicolls face. Then he continued. "But DeCerto is kind of pretty, too, isn't she?"

For a second Nicolls stared at him scandalized. But then, to Tom's displeasure, she started to giggle inanely.

"You nearly had me there," Nicolls simpered into his ear as she clung even tighter to Tom's arm.

Now Tom was definitely irritated by Nicolls' behaviour. He just wished that he would be alone with her. Then he could do something to her that she surely didn't have in mind as she tried to seduce him.

---

Hermione was still very pleased that the encounter between Tom and her friends hadn't resulted into something more sinister. So she was happy as she entered the Great Hall and then walked over to her table. She noticed the curious stares the other students threw her way but she wasn't paying them any attention. If they wanted to believe in stupid rumours, then she wouldn't be able to do anything against that anyway. So Hermione sat down at the table beside her friends and began to eat. After some time her thoughts went back to the transfiguration class. That occurrence had been more than troubling. Why had the Elder Magic suddenly behaved so abnormal?

Well, is there anything 'normal' about that damn magic? a voice asked sarcastically.

Hermione sighed. That magic was truly unpredictable. The only positive thing was that the Elder Magic had only started to behave so strangely after she had tried to get a grip on it. That meant that she had at least a little influence on it. Which was a good thing. She couldn't have that magic running wild inside of her. She really needed to finish Peverell's manuscript. Though Hermione slowly started to doubt that it would be any help to her. It was incredibly hard to understand and Peverell hadn't even mentioned the Elder Wand yet.

She tried to suppress her worries and let her gaze wander over the Great Hall.
Soon all thoughts of the Elder Magic were forgotten and her eyes narrowed in anger as she stared at the Slytherin table. Tom was sitting at his usual place at the table but he wasn't the cause of her anger. Her gaze wandered from Tom to the girl sitting beside him. The girl had dark brown, shiny long hair and a flawless porcelain skin. Hermione had to admit, the girl was pretty. As she was watching that brown haired girl Hermione's mouth formed a thin line and she tried to rein in her fury.

Right now, the girl was chatting with Tom animatedly. Hermione watched as Tom replied something which made the girl simper sillily. Then her gaze turned into a dark scowl as she saw that the girl leaned into Tom and put her hand on his arm. Hermione's hand balled tightly around her fork as that stupid witch whispered something into Tom's ear.

What did that witch have to tell Tom? And why did she have to touch him to do that?

"Hermione?" she heard a voice beside her ask.

Hermione turned around and found Weasley staring at her expectantly.

"Huh?" Hermione mumbled distractedly as her eyes wanted to wander back to the Slytherin table.

"So, are you coming along?" Longbottom who sat beside Weasley asked her now.

"Where to?" Hermione still wasn't really paying attention.

_Who is that stupid girl?_

"To the Quidditch match of course," Longbottom exclaimed.

Hermione now looked back at her friends sitting beside her. There was a Quidditch game? She hadn't known and felt accordingly a little guilty. Longbottom and Weasley were, after all, members of the Gryffindor Quidditch team.

She smiled at them. "Against whom are you playing?"

"Aww, Hermione!" Weasley exclaimed as he ruffled his hair frustrated. "We've been talking about this for the last what? Days?"

Hermione chuckled at him. Really, what was that with boys and Quidditch?

"I'm sorry," she told them, but couldn't keep all of her amusement from her voice. "I am paying attention now." She propped her head up on her arms and stared at them intently. "Just tell me, which team are you playing?"

Lupin, who sat right beside her, chuckled softly. Hermione knew he wasn't a great Quidditch fan either.

Longbottom cast a warning look at Lupin before he said, turned at Hermione, "We are playing Slytherin, Hermione."

She raised her eyebrows. _Of course, they are playing Slytherin_. She inwardly rolled her eyes.

"So, you've gotta come and cheer us on," Longbottom continued and hit her with his puppy-dog-eyes.

Hermione giggled, "Sure sure, I'll come."

"If you didn't know we were playing Slytherin, why did you just glare at their table?" Weasley suddenly asked her.

"Pff, like you need a reason to glare at those gits," Longbottom announced as his eyes wandered over the Slytherin table. "We are so going to smash them!"

Hermione giggled again and then she, too, looked at the Slytherin table. Her smile, though, quickly died on her face as she saw that this girl was still all over Tom. Telling him something and still whispering in his ear by doing so.

Who was that?

"It's just a pity that Lestrange's not playing." She then heard Weasley complain.

She detached her gaze from that annoying Slytherin girl and looked back at Weasley.

"He's not playing?" she asked innocently. "Why not?"

She knew perfectly well why Lestrange wouldn't play. She had seen his bandaged arm. And she knew who exactly was responsible for that. But she somehow wanted to hear the excuse Tom had come up with.

Weasley now looked at her before he said in a disgruntled voice, "He's obviously gotten injured during practice, that idiot."

"Why do you want him to play anyway?" Hermione asked. "Is he a terrible player?"

"No no, he's actually quite good." Weasley leaned back in his chair. "But he's a beater just like me and I seriously wanna get back at him for hurling a bludger at Marc in the last match."

"Yeah," Longbottom growled angrily. "It's his fault I broke my arm."

"Well, actually his and Avery's," Lupin threw in rather helpfully.

"You are right." Longbottom's face brightened up again. Then he turned to Weasley and said rather maliciously. "You can hurl a bludger at Avery."

"Can do," Weasley laughed.

Hermione smiled at them but it wasn't long before her eyes wandered back to the Slytherin table. And Tom. She was quite furious to see that he had gotten up from his seat and that this dark-haired girl clung to him by grasping his arm with both her hands. Hermione watched with growing displeasure how the two of them walked together out of the Great Hall.

Where are they going?

After dinner Hermione walked to her dormitory. Her thoughts still circled around that brown-haired Slytherin girl. She even managed to block out the inane chatter of her dorm mates who accompanied her to the common room. She had had to promise Longbottom that she wouldn't wander off alone again otherwise he wouldn't have let her walk back alone with the girls. They just passed a corridor as Hermione saw a group of Slytherin girls walking by. She spotted that brown haired girl among them. Hermione was rather relieved that this time that girl didn't cling to Tom.

"Who is that?" Hermione asked Rose, who walked right beside her.

"Who?" Rose said in her squeaking voice.
"The girl with the long brown hair."

"Ah, you mean Nicolls," Lucia threw in.

Hermione turned towards Lucia and raised her eyebrows in question.

"I see," Hermione said in a low voice while she fixed this Nicolls girl with a dark glare.

"Why do you want to know?" Rose now asked nosily.

"Just curious," Hermione replied curtly. Then she hesitated but in the end her curiosity got the better of her, "I've seen her talking with Tom."

Hermione furrowed her brow as the other two girls were suddenly staring at her rather oddly. Then Rose opened her mouth and exclaimed excitedly, "Ah, you call him 'Tom' already?"

Hermione narrowed her eyes at her before she said in a tight voice, "Well, it's his name after all."

"Are you jealous?" Lucia now asked in a teasing voice.

Hermione started to get really annoyed by them again and regretted to ever having started this conversation.

"No, I'm not," she snapped at Lucia. "Now what about Nicolls?"

"Of course, you don't know," Rose now said. "It happened last year before you came to Hogwarts. You see Melanie Nicolls was Riddle's girlfriend."

"Yeah, but they broke up," Lucia threw in. "She's tried to get him back ever since."

Hermione's eyes narrowed at Nicolls.

"Girlfriend?" she asked in a low and dangerous voice.

Fortunately the girls didn't notice that darkness in her tone.

"Yes, well, look at her," Rose said in whiney tone. "She looks just perfect. Beautiful. Every guy in this school wants to have her for a girlfriend."

"Yeah, and every girl wants to have Riddle as a boyfriend," Lucia said longingly. "Of course those two would end up together."

Hermione's gaze wandered back to Nicolls. She had to admit it, that girl really looked just beautiful. She wasn't very tall, had a slim figure, pretty hair and fine features.

Tom's girlfriend?

"But they broke up, did they?" Hermione asked in a quiet voice that didn't betray how very interested she now was.

"Yep, like I said. Riddle ditched her," Rose told her in a silly, self-important voice. "Nicolls wants him back. That's no secret."

"So are you jealous, Hermione?" Lucia again asked and stared expectantly at Hermione.
"Why would I be jealous?" Hermione huffed while she still glared at Nicolls.

Then she looked away from that annoying girl and marched back to the Gryffindor common room. Her dorm mates followed her and didn't stop to pester her with their unneeded comments. As they had reached their dormitory Hermione finally had had enough of their idle talk. She stalked into the bathroom, washed up and changed into her pyjamas before she returned into the dorm.

With a final and rather angry sounding, "Good night!" she slumped into her bed and drew the covers shut, thus stopping every attempt of her dorm mates to involve her into any further conversation.

For a while she lay in her bed, angrily stared up at the Gryffindor red drapes of her four-poster and tried to block out the chatter still coming from the other girls.

Then her thoughts jumped back to the events in the Great Hall. She could still see it before her mind's eye. How that Nicolls girl had clutched Tom. How she had whispered in his ear with that seductive look on her face. Tom hadn't done anything as that snotty girl had clung to him tightly. Hermione felt anger washing over her and her magic flowed through her furiously. Why hadn't he just cursed her? Had he liked it how Nicolls had clasped him?

It hadn't escaped Hermione's attention that at least Nicolls had looked up at Tom with a disgustingly love struck expression on her face. She had been his girlfriend last year, Hermione remembered while she seethed with anger. But surely Tom didn't want her back, did he? she wondered uneasily. Nicolls was quite pretty after all.

Hermione rolled over in her bed and tried to lie on her left side. But a sharp pain coming from her left leg reminded her of the cut she had received yesterday. A soft groan of pain escaped her mouth before she cautiously rolled over on her right side to avoid putting any weight on her hurt leg.

The pain had shortly distracted her from her enraged thoughts so that now Hermione could warily examine her boiling emotions. She still was rather furious. But that was utterly incomprehensible. Why was she so enraged by this incident in the first place? If Tom wanted to talk with Nicolls or have her clinging to his arm, that was no business of Hermione. Tom could do whatever he wanted after all.

But then she remembered how he always looked at her with that softness shining in his grey eyes. She found that she didn't want him to look at Nicolls in that way. Hermione closed her eyes tightly as she remembered how Tom had embraced her so gently in the library this morning. Then he had kissed her. She rubbed one hand angrily over her face before she opened her eyes again.

Tom's caring behaviour towards her, the concern she could sometimes see in his eyes, that meant so much to her. But did it mean anything to Tom?

Hermione breathed deeply and tried to get her agitated emotions back under control. Wasn't it good if Tom turned his attention away from her? It was dangerous, after all, this closeness between the two of them. Despite her thoughts Hermione still felt angry as she imagined how Nicolls was right now in the same common room with Tom.

…maybe even lying in his arms, she then thought almost fearfully.

This was ridiculous. She tried to calm herself down. Then she reached for the small book she had pulled from her trunk previously. She had hidden it under her pyjamas so her dorm mates wouldn't notice. But now she looked down at the leather-bound old book. Then she opened it with a sigh. As she began to read in the book she did it more to divert her thoughts from wandering back to Tom than because she was interested in its content. After a while of reading Peverell's hard to comprehend
In the last weeks of the dying year my two brothers decided to pay me a visit in my humble home. I had not met with them for nearly three years. Thus we celebrated our reunion with all the enjoyments my land was able to provide. The next day I took pleasure in showing my brothers through my laboratories. They had already known about my obsession with the creation of magical objects. But so far they never took a deeper interest in that magical branch themselves, thinking it was not prestigious enough.

As their eyes fell on my creations they instantly understood the power that stands behind them. The house of Peverell has always borne strong wizards so my brothers are great sorcerers, just like I am, and know to recognize a brilliant invention when they see one.

Deeply impressed by my achievements they swore to delve into the act of creating magical objects themselves. I was rather pleased by their discernment and delighted that they wanted to follow my lead because I knew that I would always be superior to them.

It was that knowledge that made me agree with the challenge my brother, Oleander, suggested. We would meet again in exactly one year and one day and each of us was to bring a magical object made by himself. Then we would compare our work in regard to power and craft and award the best out of the three.

I was very confident to win this challenge.
Quidditch And Decisions

Ouch!

Hermione looked in anger down at her leg. It hurt. Consequently she was in a bad mood. Or that was what she tried to talk herself into believing. Aside from her leg there really was no other reason why she should feel so enraged, was there?

She reached for her wand which she had discarded previously on the rim of the wash basin. Then she waved the wand at her leg. The bandage around her left thigh disappeared instantly. The cut was still clearly visible on her skin and dark blood had caked over it. It didn't look too bad, considering that she had received it only two days ago. Obviously Madam Dulan's potions had been effective. With a flick of her wand a new bandage wound around her leg. It wasn't long now and she would be as good as new.

Hermione left the bathroom and stepped into her dorm. Her dorm mates were still here, she noticed. They were getting ready to head down to the Great Hall and after that to the Quidditch pitch as today was the day of the 'important' mach of Gryffindor versus Slytherin. The school rivalry between those two houses was just as strong as it had been in her time period. So this match promised to be a very intense one. Hermione couldn't really share the enthusiasm her dorm mates showed. She watched how Lucia was just producing her red and gold scarf from her trunk and Diana seemed to charm a bright red badge so that it read the letters: 'Lions always win!'. Hermione rolled her eyes. She did like her own house but somehow the school spirit had left her since she had been forced to leave Hogwarts to go to war.

"There you are, Hermione!" Lucia exclaimed as she saw Hermione standing by the bathroom door. "We've been waiting for you."

How very nice of you! Hermione thought while she felt annoyance building up in her.

Lucia then walked over to her and wrapped an arm around her in a friendly gesture. Hermione couldn't appreciate it at the moment.

"It must be so hard for you," she said in a sombre voice, though there was amusement glinting in her eyes.

Hermione furrowed her brow, then asked confused, "What are you talking about?"

She turned her head away from Lucia as she heard Rose giggle stupidly.

"Well, which side are you going to cheer on?" Rose asked in a slightly teasing voice, while she still managed to giggle annoyingly. "Marc plays for Gryffindor. But then Riddle is a Slytherin."

"Slytherin. Cheer for Slytherin," Viola advised in her usual gruff tone while she picked up her black school cloak which lay on her bed. "Riddle's not going to like it if you cheer Marc on."

Hermione frowned at her dorm mates. Then Lucia released her again, before she said in a ridiculously serious tone, "We'll support you with trying to get Riddle."

"Gee, thanks," Hermione replied with sarcasm seeping from her words.

Those girls were really starting to annoy her this morning. They were making it sound like she wanted Tom to like her.
Well, you do like him. Wouldn't it be nice if he-

An inner voice started to lecture her but Hermione angrily blocked it out as she marched over to the door. Despite her unfriendly demeanour her dorm mates followed her and were quite adamant to keep chatting about Tom. Hermione clenched her jaw and tried to just drown their voices out. Though now that she wasn't listening to the girls her thoughts were free to wander to wherever they liked. Her level of annoyance rose a few notches as they jumped back to dinner yesterday. She could still see that Slytherin girl clinging to Tom and whispering in his ear. Nicolls, his former girlfriend!

Why did that girl have to be all over Tom?

Hermione stomped through the common room and over to the portrait hole. She pushed against the portrait with more force than necessary which caused the Fat Lady to shriek rather shrilly. Hermione ignored her calling after her in anger but continued her way to the Great Hall. Her room mates were still hot on her heels. Hermione would have really enjoyed to curse them now. Especially because they now laughed knowingly at Hermione's rash behaviour. Hermione managed to suppress the urge to hex them but her enraged thoughts wandered back to Tom – and Nicolls.

It had been a shock, Hermione had to admit, having to see how near that Slytherin girl was to Tom. She had talked to him, clutched his arm and whispered sweet words in his ear. Hermione didn't really know if those words had been sweet but at the moment she was quite convinced of it. It infuriated her to no end. Why was she enraged by the whole thing? What did she care? she wondered confused. But her blood still boiled angrily while her magic flowed through her furiously whenever she thought about Nicolls. Obviously she did care! Why though, her mind wasn't yet ready to admit.

Since she had arrived here at the Hogwarts of the past she had often heard stories about Tom. He was quite the popular one with the female students. There were Tom fan-girls all over the place. What had she expected? That he would suddenly stop seeing girls? Why would he do that? Hermione mused while she walked down the moving stair cases.

More important though was another question. Why did she want Tom to stop seeing other girls? In the back of her mind she knew perfectly well why she wanted Nicolls to stay away from Tom but she still couldn't be honest with herself.

Though she knew, part of her problem was that somehow she had stopped hating Tom. Then this not-hate had slowly developed into something like affection. It had been a slow change in her feelings but since the Christmas break Hermione had started to like Tom. The whole thing was very hard to accept. After all she knew too well who he really was. But in her thoughts, in her mind, Tom Riddle had stopped to be Lord Voldemort long ago. He was just Tom now. She wasn't afraid of him in any way. She even enjoyed it to talk with him. She liked it when he embraced her and kissed her. Still the guilt was ever present. How could she enjoy being with Tom? If her friends still lived and could see her they would be disgusted. Not to speak of the possible temporal catastrophe she could cause by her sheer selfishness. But the guilt still didn't manage to change her feelings. It certainly hadn't stopped her from kissing Tom. Now Nicolls had popped out of nowhere, inconveniently forcing Hermione to a confession she was very reluctant to make. But she couldn't push it around the hindmost corners of her mind any longer. She liked Tom. Very much actually. Maybe now was the time to finally be honest with herself, Hermione thought not just a little panicky. Wasn't it pointless to deny it? The feelings seizing her whenever he was around, her rather rash actions in the library yesterday, wasn't that proof enough? This was no longer a stupid little crush. No, Hermione knew the signs.

Obviously she had fallen for Tom.

Just how deep is the question, Hermione thought wryly.
Still, the fact remained to be that she wanted Tom to be with her and only with her. It was wrong in so many ways but still she liked him.

Hermione sighed deeply which invoked a new barrage of interpretations of her behaviour coming from her dorm mates. She ignored it. Finally she was able to accept her stupid amorous feelings but then there was Nicolls again flashing through her thoughts. Now that her feelings were straightened out Hermione started to wonder about Tom. Maybe he was just playing with her, Hermione thought anxiously as she now walked the passage way which led to the Great Hall. As that thought run through her head she suddenly felt her stomach clench painfully.

Why would he start liking her anyway? She wasn't pretty like Nicolls and she didn't behave like a normal girl of this time period at all. She was neither docile nor liked to play the damsel in distress. Even if she put that aside, truth be told, Hermione wouldn't understand how anyone could like her. She was broken. She knew it all too well. That war had cut through her very being. Left behind was something maimed and sullied. Who would want to love that?

Hermione run a hand through her bushy hair which caused Rose to reprimand her, telling her that she would never be able to seduce Tom if she looked like a wire brush.

If only it were so easy. No, her hair was her last problem at the moment. Hermione knew that she was quite good at veiling that broken soul inside of her. She was pretty sure that no-one in this time period knew of the sorrow ripping at her. That was, apart from Tom, of course. He had seen glimpses of it. Hermione wasn't able to maintain her act when he was around. He was the only one seeing her pain and he was the only one able to soothe it.

But now that she had sorted out her confused feelings and was worried about Tom's feelings towards her how should she proceed from here?

Maybe she should just ignore the whole thing? Feelings did go away after some time, didn't they?

In the mean time they had reached the entrance to the Great Hall. Hermione more than reluctantly entered. Right now she wanted to be alone, to think things through. As she walked into the hall she noted that it was rather crowded for a Saturday morning. Of course there was only one explanation for that. Sure enough she could see the members of both houses, Gryffindor and Slytherin, throwing each other nasty glares. Some of them even hissed insults to the rival house. A small smile crept in Hermione's face. Some things never changed, did they? She even had a little pity on the two other houses whose tables were crammed in between.

As Hermione then walked over to her own house table her eyes glided involuntarily to the Slytherins. Very quickly they landed on Tom. He was sitting on his usual place and right now he looked back at her. Hermione had to breathe in shakily as she saw that soft smile on his face as he scanned her.

What did she want from him?

Then her eyes left him and searched the seats next to him for any sign of Nicolls. Her heart dropped as she found the girl sitting not next to Tom but right opposite from him. Hermione narrowed her eyes in anger as she scanned Nicolls. She was sitting there with her shiny hair and looked beautiful. So Tom liked girls like her? Otherwise she wouldn't have been his girlfriend. Hermione balled her hands into fists then her eyes wandered back to Tom. He was still looking at her innocently.

Was he playing with Hermione?

She averted her eyes from him. She didn't know what to do with her boiling emotions. Since her friends had died one after the other she hadn't been able to feel anything anymore. Now she was hit with all those emotions and didn't know how to deal with them.

Hermione continued her way over to her table. She quickly spotted her friends sitting at the table. Longbottom and Weasley were involved into a heated discussion with the other Gryffindors it seemed. Hermione saw Lupin sitting nearby obviously not listening very attentively. Hermione didn't have to guess what the others had to discuss. Obviously something Quidditch related. She walked over to Lupin and sat down beside him.

"Morning," she said.

Lupin looked up and smiled as he recognized her. "Good morning." Then he leaned over to her and said, "I'm glad that finally there is another sane person around."

Hermione grinned at him. "Quidditch?" she asked while gesturing towards the other Gryffindors.

Lupin just sighed in response.

"-yeah, and then we'll just DRUB THEM!" Hermione heard Longbottom announce which was followed by cheers coming from the other Gryffindors.

"Oh, hey, Hermione," Longbottom had spotted her sitting a little away from the others. A big grin grew on his face. "You'll see the best match ever," he promised her enthusiastically.

"I'm sure," Hermione answered amused.

Tom suppressed a yawn. He was tired. Why did he have to get up so early on a Saturday? He let his gaze wander over his house's table. Everyone seemed to be so enthusiastic about this stupid Quidditch match. Tom snorted inwardly at them all, including the rather loud Gryffindors at the other table. He would have preferred it to not get up this early just to watch some idiots risking their lives while flying around on those sticks. But he was a prefect after all. How would it have looked if popular Tom Riddle wouldn't show up to support his house? Oh, the things he did for his reputation.

His mood didn't brighten as he now saw Melanie Nicolls sitting down on the seat right opposite from him and throwing him rather flirtatious looks. Was that girl trying to anger him? But his attention was quickly diverted from Nicolls as Tom saw Hermione entering the Great Hall. She was accompanied by a few other Gryffindor girls. Tom felt himself calming down a little as he saw her. Though that avidly feeling was back again as his eyes wandered over her body. Obviously it was getting worse. He needed to find a way to gain her quickly. She was his after all and it was high time that she admitted to that fact.

Hermione then let her gaze sweep over the hall and Tom was very pleased that her eyes quickly fell on him. He smiled at her. But she quickly averted her eyes from him without having returned the smile. Tom furrowed his brow as she seemed to now scan the Slytherin table for something. She appeared to be nervous. Was there something wrong with her?

After a while Hermione's eyes suddenly shot back at him. All Tom could do was to stop his eyebrows from rising in surprise. Because now Hermione glowered at him rather fiercely. She seemed to be mad at him. For the life of him, Tom couldn't say why. Had he done something wrong?

Well, he had jinxed that first year right after he had gotten up and stumbled into the common room this morning. But that little pest had been just too loud too early in the morning. By the way, it was impossible Hermione could have heard about that. Still, she glared at him enraged. Tom wanted to walk over to her and ask her what was wrong. He was quite annoyed with the fact that he couldn't do that. By the look on Hermione's face, though, that might not have been the best of ideas anyway.

Abruptly Hermione turned away from him and stalked over to her table. Tom stared after her. What had gotten her so enraged? It wasn't still this incident with his followers, was it? Though now that Tom looked closer he could see that she was limping slightly. He could feel anger boiling up in him hotly. Hermione seemed to still be in pain because those wankers had attacked her. He should have punished them harsher. Especially if Hermione was now angry with him because of their antics. But they had attacked her the day before yesterday and back then she hadn't seemed to be mad at him. Why would she have changed her mind now? Tom frowned at Hermione now sitting at the Gryffindor table and talking with that Lupin boy. Or maybe was it something else that angered her so?

"Good luck!" Hermione called after them as Longbottom, Weasley and the rest of the Quidditch team rose from the table.

They needed to leave before the others because they still had to change into their Quidditch robes.

"We don't need luck," Longbottom called back to her while there was a big grin plastered all over his face.

Hermione smiled at him and waved.

"Don't encourage him," aid Lupin, who still sat beside her, amused.

Hermione giggled but then turned her attention back to the scrambled egg on her plate. She finished her breakfast without a rush unlike the other Gryffindors who seemed to be too excited about the upcoming match to eat at a reasonable speed. After she was finished with breakfast the Great Hall was nearly empty. Hermione shot a glance in direction of the Slytherin table. With an unpleasant jolt in her stomach she realized that Tom had already left the Great Hall. Nicolls was missing too. Hermione couldn't help but feel unsettled by that fact. They didn't go together down to the pitch, did they? she wondered anxiously as a picture of Nicolls clutching Tom's arm affectionately flashed through her mind.

"Coming?" Hermione was brought out of her worrying as she heard Lupin's voice.

He had already gotten up from the table and now waited for her. Hermione smiled at him and then got up from her seat. The two of them exited the Great Hall and took off in direction of the Quidditch pitch. As they walked through the Entrance Hall Hermione could see Dumbledore just about leaving the castle.

"Professor," Hermione addressed him politely as they reached him. "Good morning."

Dumbledore's eyes twinkled down at her kindly as he recognized her. Hermione noticed that he wore a travelling cloak. It was fluffy light-blue but still, a travelling cloak.

"Ah, Ms DeCerto." Dumbledore beamed down at her. He added as his gaze wandered from her to Lupin who stood beside her, "And Mr Lupin. A good morning to you too. Wonderful weather for Quidditch, isn't it?"

"I suppose so, sir," Lupin said, not very enthusiastically.

Hermione didn't manage to suppress a giggle and even Dumbledore chuckled softly.
"Are you going to watch the match, sir?" Hermione then asked him.

Dumbledore's eyes left Lupin and wandered back to her. Hermione nearly raised her eyebrows in surprise as she saw that the so familiar twinkle in his eyes seemed to be somewhat dimmed.

"Unfortunately not, Ms DeCerto," Dumbledore answered and his tone seemed to be more sombre than just a second before. "I have to take care of an issue that occurred quite recently. There are some things I have to sort out in London this weekend."

Then the twinkle was suddenly back in his eyes and he smiled fondly down at Hermione, "But that shouldn't keep you from enjoying a wonderful day with your friends. And of course," The head of Gryffindor house added mischievously. "let's hope that the right house wins the match."

Hermione smiled at him. Then Dumbledore bid them good-bye and left the Entrance Hall.

"He's a weird one," Lupin said after a while, though he said it in a friendly tone.

"Quite." Hermione smiled at him. "Wonder what he's got to do in London."

"No idea." Lupin shrugged his shoulders. "Let's go down to the pitch. Marc's going to kill us if we miss the kick off."

As they finally reached the Quidditch pitch Hermione wanted to just turn around again and walk straight back to the quiet of the castle. The stands around the pitch were full of jeering students. Big banners with the crests of the two adversarial houses were put up. Hermione sighed and let Lupin lead her to the pandemonium that was the Gryffindor part of the stands. So they climbed the stairs up to the stands and Hermione instantly ducked behind Lupin as she saw her dorm mates not far away.

"Let's try to avoid my dear roommates, shall we?" Hermione whispered to an amused Lupin.

"Why, I never knew you don't like to indulge in gossip," Lupin said in a mock surprised tone.

Hermione just rolled her eyes and tugged him towards a corner far away from the girls. And they were just in time as she could now see the two Quidditch teams walking unto the pitch.

"And here are our two teams!" Hermione could hear a magically enhanced voice ringing through the stadium. "Slytherin and Gryffindor!"

She craned her neck and could see a Hufflepuff boy standing by something that looked like an old microphone.

"You might have heard about the change in the Slytherin team," the commentator continued. "Lestrange is not playing today. He got injured during practice. His replacement is Stephen Wilkins. Let's see if he is as good as Lestrange."

His last statement was followed by cheers from the Slytherin ranks and boooing from the Gryffindors. Hermione just shook her head and looked down at the pitch again. The two teams had by now assembled in the middle and the team captains did the compulsory handshake. Hermione was quite put out as she saw that Avery was the Slytherin team captain. Trust those Slytherins to elect the meanest one of them to be their captain. Hermione could see Mr Cooper, the flight instructor, reaching for his whistle. She didn't know Mr Cooper at all as she always tried to avoid being near any broom. She really hated flying, except for the good, old-fashioned way of just boarding a plane. Mr Cooper seemed to act as the referee for this match. Now he whistled loudly thus starting the match. The teams kicked off the ground and immediately soared through the air. Hermione was feeling dizzy just from looking at them.
"And Longbottom has the Quaffle. Is he going to score?" the commentator's voice yelled excited. "Yeeees! Longbottom scores. 10:0 for Gryffindor."

The stands erupted into loud cheers. Hermione for once cheered along with them.

"That's Hopton passing to Miller passing to Longbottom aaand-"

Hermione could see Avery flying directly towards Longbottom who now had the Quaffle. Avery didn't stop his flight and crashed into Longbottom.

"Ow, that was foul play by Avery!"

Obviously Mr Cooper hadn't seen this foul as Slytherin didn't get a penalty. Now a Slytherin player had the Quaffle. They passed it quickly between each other until they reached the Gryffindor goal hoops. Avery took the Quaffle and hurled it at one hoop.

"And goal for Slytherin. 10:10! They are even."

Pff, do they even know how to play fair? Slimy Slytherins, Hermione wondered silently. Then she remembered another one of those slimy Slytherins and her eyes wandered over to the stands covered in green and silver. It took her a while but finally she did find Tom standing among his house mates. He was wearing his black cloak, had his hands buried in his pockets and seemed to follow the play. Though the bored expression on his face told Hermione that he wasn't very interested in it. A small smile crept on her face as she watched Tom. She wondered shortly if he knew how to fly a broom. She couldn't quite picture him riding one. At least he obviously was no Quidditch fan, Hermione thought amused as she saw how he checked his watch. She was actually surprised that he even went to the match. It was quite early after all and a Saturday. Hermione knew what a late riser he was. But probably his presence here was part of his policy of playing the perfect student.

"Hermione?" she heard Lupin's voice beside her and looked away from Tom.

"Yes?"

There was now a girl standing beside Lupin. She wore the dark blue colours of Ravenclaw house. The girl was rather small, even smaller than Hermione. She had a round, friendly face and bronze-coloured skin that didn't quite match her dirty blonde hair.

"That's Stella," Lupin said and Hermione was quite surprised to hear that his normally so calm voice wasn't calm anymore.

So that is Stella Lovegood? Hermione wondered amused as she saw that nervous expression on Lupin's face.

Then she beamed at Stella and said, "Nice to meet you. I'm Hermione."

"Oh, Hermione DeCerto. I've heard a lot about you already," Stella said in an enthusiastic voice.

"Hopefully only good things?" Hermione said.

Stella eyed her in a strange way then she smiled brightly and said, "No, not really. Some of my friends say that you are crazy. And a stalker."

"Oh…er… really?" Hermione stammered.

That was rather awkward, Hermione decided. Though Stella didn't seem to share her opinion. She still looked at Hermione with curiosity though not in an offending way. She even smiled at Hermione amiably.

"Yes," Stella now said happily. "Are you really a stalker?"

"Um… no?" Hermione was quite confused and didn't know how to deal with Stella's openness.

"Oh, you are not?" Stella asked in a dreamy voice. "What a pity. I would have loved to hear all about your stalking techniques."

"Er… well…" Hermione was seeking for help so she looked at Lupin.

But he was in no condition to save anyone. Hermione could see a deep blush on his face as he stared with glassy eyes at Stella. Thankfully Hermione was saved from this rather odd conversation as she heard the commentator cry,

"20:10 for Gryffindor!"

The stands erupted in applause and a conversation wasn't anymore possible. Hermione cast a quick glance at Stella. She was now whispering something in Lupin's ear, though Hermione doubted that he would be able to understand anything she said. He seemed to be too distracted by her staying so near him. Hermione couldn't help but grin at them. What a strange pair they made. Stella seemed to be as odd as Luna Lovegood had ever been. Likeable, surely, but still odd.

Hermione looked back at the pitch and tried to follow the impossibly fast players zooming around on their brooms. She thought she had seen a blur of blonde. Maybe it had been Longbottom but she wasn't sure. Gryffindor was scoring again. They seemed to be quite good today, Hermione mused. But she was really no expert in Quidditch. Slytherin wasn't giving them anything. In the end the score went up to 70:50 for Gryffindor. Hermione was happy that Longbottom managed to score a few quite impressing goals.

Standing there and cheering for her house's team made Hermione feel a little nostalgic. It had been such a long time ago since she had seen her last Quidditch match. The last match she had seen, that had been in her sixth year in Hogwarts. The match Ravenclaw versus Gryffindor. It had decided the House championship. Of course Gryffindor had won. Hermione grinned. Though back then Harry hadn't played because he had been in detention. Suddenly Hermione could feel her heart sink at the thought of Harry so she quickly steered her thoughts away from such dangerous waters. She didn't want to sink into her memories today.

"90:70 for Gryffindor!" the Hufflepuff commentator yelled loudly through the whole stadium.

Hermione concentrated on the match again. The Gryffindor Chasers were passing the Quaffle between each other while the Slytherins tried to win it back. Hermione breathed in sharply as she saw one of the Slytherin Beaters hurl a Bludger directly at Longbottom. Luckily Weasley was fast enough he flew into the trajectory of the Bludger and hurled it right at one of the Slytherin Chasers.

"100:70 for Gryffindor!" the commentator cried loudly.

Hermione grinned happily. She cast a sideways glance at Lupin and found him still standing beside Stella. He had a deep blush on his face while he seemed to listen to something Stella told him. It was rather funny to see him losing his cool, Hermione thought. Normally Lupin was always so calm and unperturbed.

Now that she thought about self-controlled people her eyes involuntarily wandered back to the Slytherin stands. She quickly found Tom still standing at the same spot. Hermione nearly lost control of her magic as she spotted Nicolls standing right beside him. Hermione balled her hands into tight fists and she had to stop herself from pulling her wand and hurling a curse in the girl's direction. Why did that witch have to stand so near to Tom? Hermione thought furiously as she saw how Nicolls' shoulder was brushing against Tom's arm. And there was again this disgustingly lovestruck expression on Nicolls' face. She wasn't even paying attention to the game in front of her but just looked stupidly at Tom. Why did she have to come to the game if she didn't want to see it? Hermione narrowed her eyes at the witch. She was seething. Right now she wanted nothing more than to run over there to the Slytherin stands and throw a nasty curse at Nicolls. But she wouldn't do it. What did she care anyway? So, Tom liked to have Nicolls near him.

Whatever! Hermione breathed in deeply and tried to control her raging feelings again. Though it didn't really work.

---

Tom was bored out of his mind. Why did he have to get up at an impossibly early hour just to stand around in the cold? He buried his hands deep into the pockets of his cloak. This was just a big fat waste of his time. He should use this time to do something productive. Like finding out why Hermione seemed to suddenly be so angry with him. He still couldn't understand what had happened this morning to make her look at him with so much fury radiating from her eyes. He didn't like that look at all.

"90:70 for Gryffindor!" He heard Panshaw, the Hufflepuff commentator, yell enthusiastically. Merlin, how long was that stupid match going to last? Tom was getting more and more irritated by the minute. Then he was brought out of his rather dark thoughts as he heard a voice coming from beside him,

"Hello, Tom."

Tom turned around and found Nicolls standing beside him and beaming up at him.

"Melanie," he acknowledged her in a curt tone.

"Do you think we are going to win?" Nicolls tried to make conversation while Tom was just annoyed by her pure presence.

He shrugged his shoulders and tried to ignore her.

"If you were in the team we'd surely win, Tom," Nicolls smiled flirtatiously up at him.

Obviously the witch had never seen him on a broom. Tom made a non-committal sound that could have meant anything.

"Why are you not on the team?" Nicolls asked, being quite persistent on the matter. "Some of your friends are in the team, too."

As Tom heard that his mouth twitched traitorously and he had to suppress a rather evil cackle. Those fools being his friends? How absurd! He didn't need any friends. And certainly not such buggers.

Tom turned towards Nicolls and was surprised himself that he managed to ban this evil smirk from his face as he said, "But Melanie, all those training sessions would collide with my prefect duties. I would really hate to neglect the duties I owe the school."

Nicolls looked up at him with admiration gleaming in her eyes, "Aww, Tom, you are always so responsible."

Then Tom was rather glad that this waste of a conversation was interrupted by the commentator's voice, "100:70 for Gryffindor!"

Thankfully Nicolls was distracted from Tom and now watched the players on the pitch. Tom looked down at her with narrowed eyes. Maybe he should just push her down the stands? No-one would notice, right?

He sighed softly. Then he unfixed his eyes from Nicolls and tried to find Hermione. He quickly found her standing amongst the other Gryffindors. But unlike her house mates Hermione wasn't following the match. Right now she was looking over to the Slytherin stands, Tom noticed surprised. With unease he saw that there was again this dark look on her face. Like she was really enraged by something. Tom had learned by now that she could have quite the violent temper when angered. He couldn't have her being angry with him again that would jeopardize his plans of obtaining her.

But the fierce scowl was still on her face as she glowered darkly in his direction. It was then that Tom realized that she wasn't staring at him this enraged. He tried to follow her gaze and ended up looking at Melanie Nicolls who still stood right beside him. He furrowed his brow in confusion. Why was Hermione glaring like this at Nicolls? The two of them didn't even know each other. Hermione had no reason to look like she would curse Nicolls any second now. That was strange.

Tom thought back to breakfast. Back then Hermione had seemed to be angry as well. But she had only glared at him so darkly until after she had let her gaze wander over the Slytherin table. Tom remembered that Nicolls had sat right opposite him this morning. Why would Hermione be angered by Nicolls' presence? Tom wondered. Was it Nicolls that angered her or something else?

Then very slowly a rather cocky smirk appeared on his face as he finally understood Hermione's motive. So Hermione didn't like it when Nicolls was near him, did she? Maybe Nicolls wasn't as useless as he first had thought…

Hermione unfixed her eyes from Nicolls again. That was stupid.

Get a grip, Granger! she reprimanded herself. Okay, she did like Tom and didn't want any girl to get near him. But that was just silly. Her traitorous feelings were wrong. And dangerous, if anything. But still…

Hermione forced herself to not look back at the Slytherin stands but at the match in front of her. Though that didn't help to dissipate her foul mood as she now saw that Slytherin was in possession of the Quaffle. The Slytherin Chasers where passing the ball between each other until it ended up in Avery's hands. He rushed towards the hoops. Not even Weasley's try with the Bludger could stop Avery as he now hurled the Quaffle at Gryffindor's goal hoop. And he scored.

"100:80 for Gryffindor. But Slytherin is catching up!" the commentator cried.

Now Hermione could see Longbottom catching the Quaffle from one of his team mates. Then he darted forward in direction of Slytherin's goal hoops. He had nearly reached the hoop as Hermione saw Avery rushing towards him. He obviously intended to foul Longbottom again. Hermione clenched her teeth as Avery got nearer and nearer to Longbottom.

Then out of nothing a Bludger appeared. It hit Avery with a loud crash. He held his arm with a pained expression on his face as he tailspinned down to the ground. In the mean time Longbottom had reached the hoops, he hurled the Quaffle and…
"110:80 for Gryffindor!"

Longbottom soared towards Weasley who had hurled the Bludger at Avery. The two of them high-five as the whole stadium, sans the Slytherins, broke into applause. Hermione cheered along with the others.

Then her gaze involuntarily wandered back to the Slytherin stands and to Tom. As she finally found him the smile on her face died instantly down and her eyes widened in horror. The scene in front of her seemed to be frozen in time, drowning out even all this cheering and yelling coming from the Gryffindors. Hermione could see how Nicolls stood on tiptoes as she leaned into Tom and clutched his arm with both her hands. She had her eyes closed as she kissed Tom on his cheek. There was a smirk on Tom's face. Did he like that?

Hermione was shaken by that display and only remotely heard the commentator's ecstatic cry, "Dave Howe caught the Snitch! Gryffindor wins! 260:80!"

The stadium once again erupted into loud cheers. But Hermione stood frozen to the ground as she stared at Tom and Nicolls. Nicolls now looked up at Tom with dreamy eyes while she still clung to his arm.

"Let's go down," Hermione heard Lupin say but she didn't look away from that disgusting scene in the Slytherin stands.

"Okay," Hermione replied in a hollow voice. "Just go ahead. I'll be there in a sec."

Lupin frowned at her in concern but then he was distracted by Stella who now tugged at him. The two of them walked down to the pitch where the Gryffindor team was celebrating their victory. Hermione remained standing where she was, still staring at Tom and Nicolls. By now her magic rushed through her angrily. So, that Slytherin witch liked to kiss Tom, did she? Hermione thought enraged as she balled her hands into tight fists. Her blood was boiling as that scene of Nicolls kissing Tom kept replaying in her head. She breathed in deeply to regain some of her lost calm. But it was completely hopeless. She was furious.

Her magic was raging inside of her as she now saw how Nicolls beamed up at Tom in adoration. Then the two of them were leaving the stands together. Hermione's mouth formed a thin line.

She was not going to let that continue! With that decision made she left the stands. She was going to follow Tom. So Hermione ignored her house mates who had assembled in the middle of the Quidditch pitch and were celebrating their team but she tried to find Tom among the Slytherins. She needed some time to find them again in the mass of students surging back to the castle. By the time she spotted them again, the Gryffindors had already left the pitch. Undoubtedly to celebrate their victory in the common room. The Slytherins quickly walked back to the castle, too. But it seemed Tom and Nicolls weren't in such a rush. The two of them were deliberately lagging behind. Hermione narrowed her eyes. What did they plan to do if they wanted to be undisturbed?

Sometime later Hermione was walking back to the castle. Thought actually it was more like sneaking back to the castle because she was still tailing Tom and this Nicolls girl. That display during the Quidditch match had just been enough. Hermione was furious and determined. She wasn't going to allow that disgusting girl anywhere near Tom any longer. She watched with narrowed eyes how Nicolls took Tom's arm and clung to him. Why didn't Tom curse her now to kingdom come? Normally he wasn't this hesitant.

Hermione now heard the girl giggle inanely. And she still snuggled against Tom. Hermione's hands balled into fists. She looked around and noticed that she was quite alone with the pair right now. The other students had already gone back to the castle.

"Do you really want to go back to the castle?" Hermione's eyes shot back at Nicolls as she asked Tom that in a rather seductive tone, promising him something Hermione didn't like at all.

Now that was just enough. Who did that girl think she was? Hermione fumed as she abandoned her cover. She walked faster and quickly reached Tom and Nicolls, neatly cutting off their path. They both had to stop. Hermione saw Tom raising an eyebrow questioningly at her. But she didn't care as she was too preoccupied with glaring at Nicolls right now.

"Get your hands off him!" Hermione growled at Nicolls.

A scandalized look crept on Nicolls pretty face, while a rather conceited smirk appeared on Tom's face.

"Excuse me?" Nicolls said in a sharp voice.

"I want you to leave him alone," Hermione said in a low voice as she still fixed Nicolls with a dark scowl.

At that Nicolls sniggered condescendingly and she still held to Tom's arm, Hermione noticed enraged.

"Did you hear that, Tom?" Nicolls said in her snobbish voice. "That ugly Gryffindor really dares to order me around."

Hermione's eyes wandered slowly over Nicolls' form until they landed on her hands which still clutched Tom's arm. Hermione's right hand itched to pull her wand and just curse this arrogant witch.

"I'm not going to repeat myself," Hermione said slowly as her eyes shot back at Nicolls' face. Her voice was now a hiss. "Let go of him!"

"Who do you think you are?" Nicolls asked and there was a disgusted expression on her face as she scanned Hermione. "You're nothing but a stupid fan-girl. Do you really think Tom would ever waste his time with you?" Scorn now dripped from Nicolls' voice.

Hermione's lips were pressed to a thin line. She noticed that Nicolls now clung to Tom even tighter. There was still this self-satisfied smirk on Tom's face as he watched the dispute between the two girls. Hermione's gaze shot back at Nicolls as she heard that dumb girl sniggering again.

"Don't tell me you really think you have a chance with Tom!" Nicolls said in a mock-pitying voice as she shook her head sadly at Hermione. Then she continued and there was now open contempt in her tone, "How delusional are you? When was the last time you looked in a mirror, ugly hag?"

Hermione had to restrain herself from drawing her wand and cursing that girl. A tiny part of her feared that Nicolls was right but mostly she was just furious right now.

"What did you think, little bint?" Nicolls scoffed at her. "That you create a few nasty rumours about yourself and Tom and he'll suddenly fall for you?" Nicolls now laughed at her conceitedly. "Face it, Tom doesn't want you!"

White-hot fury now ripped at Hermione. Even her hands trembled from the suppressed anger. She could feel her magic turning into an angry whirlwind as she watched how Nicolls now looked seductively up at Tom and skimmed with her fingers softly over his arm as she said in a velvety voice,
"Let's go back, Tom. I'm sure we can do something much more entertaining than listening to this stupid slut."

That was when Hermione finally snapped. She flexed her wrist, her wand left its holster and landed in her hand. Then she raised her hand and pointed her wand directly at Nicolls. Nicolls' eyes widened in shock as she was suddenly threatened by Hermione's wand. But she didn't pull her own wand. Neither did Tom, Hermione noticed satisfied. Hermione glared at Nicolls furiously before she said in an eerily calm voice that didn't quite match with that dangerous expression on her face,

"Discidium."

As she muttered that spell Hermione brought her wand down in a straight line. Instantly a glistening grey shield erupted from the tip of her wand, it followed the wand movement and thus cleanly separated Nicolls from Tom. Hermione watched satisfied how Nicolls was pushed away by the spell so that she stumbled and nearly lost her balance. Tom on the other hand wasn't pushed away he remained standing where he was.

"Are you insane?" Nicolls managed to yell at Hermione after she had regained her balance.

Hermione smiled at her sweetly before she waved her wand again. A deep orange curse left her wand, sped towards Nicolls and collided with her chest. It was a very satisfying feeling for Hermione as she got to watch how the orange curse wrapped itself completely around Nicolls' form. Then it merged with her body thus tinting her skin bright orange upon contact. Shortly Nicolls didn't realize what had happened. But then she looked down at her hands and arms and as she saw that orange colour she started to scream. Hermione was rather peeved by that shrill tone in Nicolls' voice so she walked towards Tom who watched in amusement how Nicolls tried to wipe the colour away. Which was totally useless, Hermione knew. As she reached Tom she grabbed his hand and then pulled him away. Tom didn't hesitate to abandon Nicolls and followed after Hermione.

Hermione stalked angrily away from Nicolls who still screeched in her pesky voice. That stupid witch didn't even know the counter curse to that basic spell. Hermione rolled her eyes at the witch's incompetence. After a while Nicolls' voice became quieter and quieter until it died completely down. Thankfully they were now out of hearing range. But Hermione's hand still clasped Tom as she dragged him after her.

"What was that right now?" Hermione heard Tom's voice ask her innocently.

"Nothing!" Hermione snapped, still enraged.

"Didn't look like nothing." Came Tom's amused reply.

Hermione's eyes narrowed and her fingers clasped tighter around his hand. She didn't reply anything but continued to drag him after her.

"Why are you so angry?" Tom asked her, still in this innocent sounding tone. But he didn't manage to ban all the amusement from his voice. "Your house won the match. Shouldn't you be celebrating right now?"

"Why have you been with Nicolls?" Hermione finally hissed at him, still enraged. "Why do you always talk with her?"

"Oh, I'm sorry," Tom said in an apparently honest tone. "I wasn't aware that I'm forbidden to talk to Melanie."

Hermione's eyes flashed back at him. She could see amusement and a certain amount of triumph flashing behind his grey eyes. She turned her head away from him again as she mumbled darkly,

"Pff, Melanie."

She never let go of Tom's hand as she pulled him back to the castle. Tom didn't say anything but he followed Hermione up the steps to the front door. They walked through the Entrance Hall as Hermione finally stopped and turned around to face Tom again. He, too, had stopped and now watched her attentively. Hermione narrowed her eyes angrily at him before she snapped,

"She was your girlfriend, wasn't she?"

Tom raised an eyebrow elegantly while his lips curled into a small smile.

"Who told you that?" he asked in a self-satisfied voice.

Hermione snorted at that, "Did you forget, Tom? This castle is just one big rumour mill." After a while she added in an irritated tone, "So, do you want her back?"

She heard Tom chuckle which made her fierce scowl even darker. Tom locked eyes with her and she noticed that the condescending smirk had left his face now. Then he took a step towards her before he said in a serious voice,

"Don't be silly. Nicolls means nothing to me."

Her anger dissipated instantly as she heard him say that. The dark scowl left her face and she looked up at him with huge eyes. Did he mean that?

"R…really?" Hermione asked him in a soft and shaky voice.

A small smirk tugged at his mouth as he looked down at her. His grey eyes sparkled invitingly and Hermione was again baffled by how handsome he looked.

"Yes," Tom said in a firm voice.

Then he clutched Hermione's upper arm and pulled her over to him before he said in a commanding voice, "Enough with this nonsense, Hermione."

Without waiting for a reply he started to walk again. Hermione was forced to follow him as he still held her tightly by her arm. But right now she didn't mind that he was being so dominant again. She was just incredibly relieved at the moment. A small smile crept on her face as she looked up at Tom who walked in front of her while he still clutched her upper arm. Somehow Hermione didn't mind that he was grabbing her almost painfully tight or that he dragged her behind him so roughly.

She was in a state of bliss so she didn't realize where Tom dragged her to. They were just walking down a corridor passing a painting that showed the scenery of a forest and a huge castle in the background. They had passed the picture as Tom suddenly turned around, took hold of her other arm and pushed her into a small alcove right beside the painting. Hermione gasped in surprise as she felt herself being pushed against the stone wall. Then Tom's lips were over her own as he kissed her rather demandingly. His body was pressed tightly against hers, trapping her effectively between the stone wall and himself. There was again this tingling feeling coming over her as Hermione's eyes fluttered shut. She couldn't stop herself to respond to his kiss. Then she could feel Tom deepen the kiss and his hands began to roam her body.

That was when Hermione started to hear her doubts again. This was feeling so good, but it was wrong, wasn't it?
She put her hands on his chest and pushed slightly. Tom instantly ended the kiss and took a step back from her. Hermione looked up at him and found his grey eyes scanning her, there was a frown between his eyebrows. She breathed in deeply before she said in a soft voice while staring into his beautiful, grey eyes,

"Tom, what is that, going on between us?"

A smirk appeared on his face, then he said in a conceited tone, "I thought that was obvious?"

Hermione felt a blush hitting her face. "No, it's not," she whispered hesitantly.

The haughty smirk didn't leave Tom's face as he answered her, "You are my girlfriend now."

Hermione stared at him in bafflement with wide eyes. "And… and… I don't have a say in this matter?" she stuttered weakly.

Tom bent down to her and then whispered with his silky voice in her ear, "No."

"You can't just decide that by yourself," Hermione said, now in a firmer voice as she again pushed him away.

"So you don't want to be my girlfriend then?" Tom asked her in a provoking tone.

"What?… I…" Hermione flustered and she looked away from him before she whispered. "I never said that."

"What is your problem, then?" Tom asked her amused.

"It's that…"

Then she looked back up at Tom. He was looking down at her and this inviting softness shone in his eyes.

"Do you even like me?" she finally asked him in a soft voice.

And again that conceited smirk was back on his face. "Otherwise I wouldn't consider you to be my girlfriend," he drawled at her.

Hermione averted her eyes again. "Didn't you already have a few girlfriends before?"

"I never had a girlfriend." Came Tom's swift reply.

Hermione's eyes shot back at him. Why did he lie so blatantly now?

"That's not true. I'm not stupid. Didn't I just tell you? I heard stories about you," Hermione contradicted him.

Tom arched one eyebrow elegantly as he eyed her. Then he said in a serious voice, "It is true. I won't deny that I've had some experiences with women. But I never considered any of those girls to be my girlfriend. Not one of them."

Hermione stared at him, momentarily speechless while the mocking smirk returned on Tom's face.

"Now let's end this pointless discussion," he again took a step towards her, put his hands on her waist and bent down to her.
"You are my girlfriend now," he whispered to her in a commanding tone before he brushed his lips gently against hers.

Hermione could feel his lips softly touching her own. But aside from that light contact Tom didn't do anything else. It seemed as if he was waiting for something, Hermione realized.

Contradicting thoughts started to suddenly run through her head. She liked that feeling of his lips on her own. But that wasn't just any guy she was kissing right now. It was Tom Riddle. She was playing with fire here. He would one day become the darkest wizard who ever grazed the earth. The one whose hate should destroy everything. His unbound hate would burn down a whole country.

But as Hermione could feel his lips touching her so gently her thoughts and doubts suddenly just stopped running through her head. The only thing she was aware of right now was Tom. His lips on hers, his hands holding her by her waist, his pleasant scent. He was everywhere. Her heart beat so fast now and the tingling feeling in her stomach was back. Tom still didn't do anything to deepen the kiss. He was obviously waiting for her to make her decision.

Hermione's hands trembled as they slowly slid up Tom's back. She pressed herself tighter against him and started to respond to his kiss. Tom snaked one arm fully around her waist, pulling her even closer to him. His other hand now held her cheek gently as he started to deepen the kiss.

Hermione was breathing heavily as Tom released her again some time later. There was a conceited smirk curling up the corners of his mouth as he looked down at her, taking in her state. Hermione raised her head and looked up into his grey eyes. They seemed to be glowing in the semidarkness. She could feel her face heating up as Tom's gaze wandered over her body possessively. Then he put his hand lightly on her shoulder and bent down so he could whisper in her ear.

"Next time, you listen to what I say right away and just obey me."

Hermione couldn't stop the smile taking form on her face. She wrapped her arms tightly around Tom and buried her face into his chest before she mumbled,

"I really doubt that's ever gonna happen."

She felt Tom's arms reassuringly around her.

"Well, you've still time to learn." Came Tom's dry reply.

Tom ended the embrace and flashed her one of his charming grins before he took her hand in his and led her out to the corridor again. They rounded another corner then Tom stopped before a perfectly ordinary classroom door.

"Why did we come here?" Hermione asked in bewilderment.

"You'll see."

Tom pulled his wand from his pocket and tapped it against the classroom door. Then he opened the door and Hermione could see the dark classroom behind it. After that Tom closed the door again and then tapped it twice with his wand. Suddenly a red sheen engulfed the door for a few seconds until it died down again. As Tom opened the door again Hermione was surprised that it no longer led into a classroom. Tom stepped into the new room and Hermione followed behind him. The former classroom looked now like a smaller version of the Gryffindor common room, though without the red and gold colour. On one wall was a fireplace with an invitingly crackling fire, on the other stood a large leather sofa. On the wall farthest away from the door was a beautifully decorated window.
"What's this?" Hermione asked as she took in this new room.

"I really don't know," Tom answered as he again wrapped one arm around her waist. "I found it by pure coincidence. The only down side is that it's only useable if no-one occupies the classroom. That means it's only safe to come here after classes are finished."

Hermione followed Tom to the couch. They sat down and he instantly pulled her over to him. She relaxed against his side, slowly slid an arm around him and clung to him tightly. She closed her eyes as she felt Tom caressing her cheek gently.

"I knew you wouldn't be able to resist me for long," he said after a while in a slightly taunting voice.

Hermione smiled but didn't open her eyes as she said, "Ah, and what makes you think that it's not the other way around?"

Tom chuckled softly then she could feel his hand on her cheek wandering to her chin until he raised her head a little. Hermione opened her eyes and found him smirking down at her.

"You are quite defiant for my girlfriend," Tom whispered.

Before she had a chance to reply he bent down to her and pressed his lips against her own. The fluttery feeling was back in her stomach as she could feel him deepening the kiss. She wrapped her arms around his neck and huddled even closer to him.

So many doubts, so many reasons to stop. But somehow they suddenly didn't matter anymore as Hermione could feel Tom kissing her so tenderly. Yet his arms around her were so demanding, even possessive as he pulled her even closer to him. Hermione was overwhelmed by her own feelings as she kissed him in return. It was so exciting and wonderful and everything she needed right now. She wrapped her arms tighter around him. After such a long time finally Hermione was feeling just happy again.

She didn't know for how long they stayed in that cozy little room. It felt like seconds but it could have been hours. During all the time the happiness never left her again. Tom now held her so close to him that it seemed like he never wanted to let go again. Hermione would have just been happy if he didn't. Her head rested on his chest and she breathed in his pleasant scent. Then she could feel Tom placing a soft kiss on her forehead before he whispered to her,

"I'll never let you go again."

Hermione snuggled closer to him and said, "And I don't want you to leave me alone."

Tom run his fingers gently through her hair then he said, "Let me bring you back to your common room."

Hermione nodded at him, the happy smile still on her face. Tom unwrapped his arms from her and she looked up at him. His grey eyes sparkled down at her softly and his fingers caressed her cheek before he gently tucked a strand of her curly hair behind her ear. He bent down to her and softly brushed his lips against her own. Then he took her hand in his and cautiously pulled her with him as he stood up from the couch. Together they left the room which turned back into the dark and silent classroom as they exited.

They walked the corridors to the entrance of the Gryffindor common room in comfortable silence. Hermione for one was content and just happy as she felt Tom's warm hand holding her own. Too quickly to her taste, they had reached the painting of the Fat Lady. Tom eyed the portrait of the now sleeping Fat Lady with distaste.
"It's a pity you are in Gryffindor," he said in a low voice. "You should be in Slytherin."

Hermione giggled at that. Then she grabbed his hand tighter and looked up in his eyes before she said in a serious voice, "Yes, you are right. But I've a better idea. We'll talk with Dippet. I'm sure he would transfer you to Gryffindor. You would fit in well with us."

Tom looked down at her in disgust and Hermione couldn't hold back anymore. She broke down into laughter and clutched his arm to steady herself.

"I now see why you are in Gryffindor." She could hear Tom's quiet voice tell her. "You need a lot of stupid bravery to say something like that into my face."

She glanced up at him. He was glaring down at her darkly but Hermione wasn't unsettled by his scowl. She could see the amusement shining in his grey eyes so she grinned up at him. At that Tom sighed and then pulled her into his chest.

"I really need to teach you to abandon your insolence."

Hermione closed her eyes and just enjoyed the feeling of his arms around her. It was so nice to have him embracing her so protectively. After a while Tom released her again. Then he took her chin in his hand and raised it a little before he placed a light kiss on her lips. After he bent up again he turned towards the portrait of the Fat Lady and tapped softly at the frame of the canvas. The Fat Lady slowly opened her eyes and yawned tiredly. But before she could do more than to leer at Tom, he whispered,

"Coati."

Hermione furrowed her brow and turned to Tom. "Why do you always know the password?"

But Tom just smiled his evil smile at her and said, "Because I'm a devious Slytherin."

Then he turned around and walked away. Hermione shook her head at his retreating back before her eyes wandered back to the Fat Lady.

"Rather late aren't you?" the Fat Lady eyed her disapprovingly. "The others are all inside already."

Then the portrait sprung forward and admitted Hermione in. She was greeted by her celebrating house mates. The happy atmosphere in the Gryffindor common room mirrored her own mood quite accurately.
Remorse

Hermione was angry. It was more than anger.

Her magic rushed through her. It boiled inside of her, fiercely asking her to take revenge.

It was more than anger. It was hate.

Hermione waved her wand and instantly a blue shield appeared in front of her. The incoming curse was neutralized and harmlessly disappeared into nothingness. Hermione paid the whole thing no heed but continued to chase after the Death Eaters. They had been innocent, the children! They had nothing to do with this whole disgusting war. Yet these perverted freaks had murdered them.

No, they had been slaughtered!

"Hermione, stop, come back!" She could hear Harry's voice calling after her.

She didn't stop. The hate would have never allowed it. She dashed around the next corner of a house, still following behind after the Death Eaters. As the war protracted it was impossible to say which side was predominant. But it was undeniable that the Death Eaters gained in leverage. They were getting bolder and bolder. This time they had attacked an Auror and member of the Order of the Phoenix. Kingsley Shacklebold had been a powerful wizard. He had fought valorously. But he had been unable to stop them all. Hermione could still see the images before her mind's eye. She could see Shacklebold lying in a pool of blood in the hallway of his own house. A curse had hit him and wounded him fatally. He had bled to death. Maybe he had lived long enough to hear the screams of his family as the Death Eaters had murdered them as well. Hermione could accept that the Death Eaters had tried to kill Shacklebold. She might not like it, but she was able to understand it. Shacklebold had been a part of the enemy the Death Eaters tried to beat. He had been a combatant. But his two sons were not. They had been so young that they still didn't even have a wand. That had not stopped the Death Eaters to kill them. Hermione still felt sick as she remembered the broken bodies of the two young boys.

The hate again took hold of her as she run after the Death Eaters. They had finished their mission and now intended to leave the scene of the crime. Shortly they would reach the anti-apparition wards which stretched around Shacklebold's house and its surrounding. Hermione rushed down the next street as she heard the soft pops of Apparition in front of her.

They were NOT allowed to get away so easily. Hermione raised her wand and sent a curse at the Death Eaters. A painful scream told her that she had at least stopped one of them to flee. As she neared the spot they had apparated from she could see a dark figure lying on the wet asphalted street. Currently the figure tried to get up again. Hermione narrowed her eyes and waved her wand again. A curse left her wand and hurled the Death Eater violently against the red Ford Escord, parking on the lay by. There was a bump in the mud guard wing and the Death Eater now lay huddled on the street and moaned in pain. Hermione's fury though wasn't satisfied at all. She raised her wand again to cast the next spell.

"No, please," the Death Eater then pleaded with her. "I didn't mean for that to happen."

Hermione didn't say anything. Her magic still rushed through her furiously. A curse was now at the brink of her wand's tip. Her hand clasped tightly around the smooth wood of her black wand. There was no begging her now. This creature needed to be punished. Hermione needed to take revenge. Her magic was so enraged that it left her body and crackled around her dangerously. She saw the Death Eater shying away from her. But there was no pity in her as white-hot fury was ripping at her.

The creature would be punished. That was the last thought which rushed through her mind before Hermione waved her wand and allowed her magic to take the revenge she so graved for. She whirled the wand and again cast the same curse she had used before. This time, though, there was a lot more power behind the spell. Hermione watched unemotionally how her curse crashed into the chest of the creature. The body was flung against the car and she could hear a sickening cracking noise. The body crumbled down on the ground where it remained lying. Hermione stood not two metres away. The hand holding her wand fell numbly back to her side.

The hate was suddenly gone. The rage had completely died down. Hermione stared at the body which was still lying on the wet street. Unmoving and lifeless. The unstoppable fury and the blind need for revenge had left her as well. Hermione felt hollow and sick.

Hesitantly she walked over to the body. Then she crouched down beside it. The white mask looked up at her. A death mask now. With a shaking hand Hermione reached for the mask. Slowly she removed it. She gasped as she stared down at the face. It was covered with tears. Fear and pain were still etched in the features.

Hermione knew that face. She knew the person she had just now murdered in cold blood. She had gone with her to school for six years. Had even shared a few classes with her.

Hermione gasped as she woke from her nightmare. Her breathing was quickened and she was drenched in cold sweat. She could feel her heart hammering away at a ridiculous speed. Slowly and shakily she sat up in her bed. Her head hurt piercingly thus making her feel slightly sick. As she opened the curtains of her four-poster bed she found the dorm still wrapped in a peaceful silence. Hermione was glad that she hadn't managed to wake her dorm mates up. Right now, though, she couldn't bear this peaceful atmosphere of the sixth year girls' dormitory. She needed to get out.

Still feeling shaky Hermione got up from her bed and quickly slipped into her shoes before she took the black robe from her uniform and wrapped it around herself. Then she cautiously made her way to the door leading out of the dorm. The images of her previous dream still flickered through her head as Hermione exited the Gryffindor common room and walked the dark corridors and passage ways of the castle. She didn't care where she was heading to nor was she concerned about being caught out of bed after hours.

So she was a little surprised to find that her feet had led her to the highest point of Hogwarts castle and she now stood before the door leading out to the platform of the Astronomy tower. Hermione reached for the handle of the door. Maybe that was exactly what she needed. A breath of fresh air. She stepped out on the platform. She shuddered and wrapped her black Gryffindor robe tighter around herself as she was hit by the icy cold Scottish air. Though the thin cloth offered no protection against the piercing cold. The small platform was covered in a layer of snow. Hermione walked over to the balustrade, leaving behind footprints in the snow. She shuddered as she clasped the cold stone of the balustrade. It was still January after all and the coldness now tore at her exposed skin but Hermione didn't care as she let her gaze wander over the darkness in front of her. The sky was dark blue and the stars seemed to be obscured by thick winter clouds. The only sources of light were the opened door behind her and the pale moon above her which was surrounded by a milky white halo, heralding more snowfall for the next day. Hogwarts grounds and the Forbidden Forest were only visible as a black mass lying at the foot of Hogwarts castle.

Hermione breathed in deeply. She still felt sick and shaken from the nightmare. Why did she have to dream about her past? Why now of all times?
For the first time since an eternity, really, she had been happy. Just happy while no hidden grief or sorrow had stained her contentment. Why did her ghosts chose to come back now?

It was in the back of her mind that she knew why that particular memory had chosen to haunt her tonight. Pansy Parkinson was not the first life she had taken. But it had been an act born from revenge, not self-defense or anything else. She had lost control and had then cursed Parkinson. With her there had died something important inside of Hermione as well. Something innocent and pure. The darkness had again claimed another part of her.

Hermione's fingers clasped tightly around the stone of the balustrade.

It had been today that she had lost control again. Luckily the consequences of her lack of control today hadn't been as irrevocable as the death of Parkinson. But still, what she had done had been wrong. It was something inexcusable. Sure Melanie Nicolls wasn't exactly a likable person but that still didn't justify Hermione's actions. She had raised her wand against Nicolls, a teenage girl who was in no way able to defend herself against Hermione's magic. How could she have lost control like this? She hadn't always been like that, had she? So ungoverned and sometimes even cruel. One thing, though, was undeniable; she was no longer that innocent and nice girl that had once attended Hogwarts to learn magic together with her friends. That girl would never have cursed Nicolls so vindictively.

Hermione's eyes wandered from the blackness that was the Forbidden Forest up to the pale moon. It felt like that innocent and pure side of her was now just as unreachable to her as the moon high up in the sky.

When was it that the innocent girl had decided to disappear? As Hermione had been confronted with war? Obviously that had caused her to change. She had been touched by darkness and it had left behind traces on her. She had seen and done so many horrible things. Then she had been unexpectedly hurled back in time. But still that darkness had followed her.

She was again confronted by the cause of her sorrow and grief. But the teenage Lord Voldemort wasn't what she had expected him to be. During the Christmas break she had for the first time seen glimpses of Tom's humanity. He wasn't yet that emotionless monster she had had to fight in her time period. He wasn't exactly innocent either but still there was a part of him that was not evil and merciless. Hermione knew that during the course of the next five decades he would lose that part of him. She had always thought that his striving for immortality had ultimately led to him losing that essential part. But what if it was something else?

Hermione wrapped her arms tightly around herself as she continued to stare at the barely illuminated landscape in front of her.

Despite all her efforts she knew that she had already changed things here in the past, she had influenced the people here. Professor McGonagall had warned her in third year, hadn't she? No-one was allowed to change the past.

Hermione felt her breathing quicken as she involuntarily had to follow her thoughts to a result she didn't want to see. A question popped up in her mind that queried all her previous efforts.

Is it even possible to change the past?

Before that war had flared up in her time period and before she had fought in that very same war, she had already been here in the past. Had done the things she now did, had talked and interacted with the people here. She had already brought her darkness to the past.
What if I am to blame? Hermione asked herself numbly, not really wanting to comprehend the significance of that question.

What if she was the reason for all the misery? It was at least possible. It was a question of cause and action. What had happened first? Her stay here in the past or the events in her time period?

What if it had been her presence here that had caused the creation of Lord Voldemort? Had it been her who had destroyed that last spark of humanity in Tom because of that darkness residing inside of her?

Her hands on the balustrade started to tremble. Hermione felt sick and her eyes were opened wide as all her horrible memories flooded her mind. All the people who suffered so cruelly. All the lives that had been lost during the war. Hermione felt like drowning as those terrible images rushed through her head mercilessly.

Tears threatened to fall from her eyes but she suppressed them. There was no use in crying over a thing so horrible that no amount of tears could remedy this evil. What if everything is my fault?

Tom was walking down a dark corridor. It was rather quiet tonight despite the fact that this oh so important Quidditch game had taken place. Tom really hated having to do his prefect duties. He could do better things with his time than patrolling the corridors, searching for rule breakers. But then again being a prefect had its advantages, too. And they compensated for the dull duties he sometimes had to fulfill.

As annoying as this chore was it didn't do anything to smother the good mood he was in. Today had been rather successful after all, hadn't it? Well, it had only been a matter of time until he would finally convince Hermione to become his.

A sinister smirk appeared on his face as he remembered how Hermione had pulled her wand to curse Nicolls. Hermione had been so angry, so furious and ruthless.

Beautiful.

Tom had always known that there was something dark inside of her. It had been a pleasure to bring that darkness forth. Though he had to admit that he had been a little surprised at how well his plan had worked. But Hermione could be quite ardent sometimes. She always tried to contain herself but Tom knew that she had a fiery temper. She had again proved that by hexing Nicolls.

And, the smirk on Tom's face grew even wider, later, too, as we made out. Oh yes, it had been a successful day, Tom thought self-satisfied. Because finally, Hermione had submitted to him. Of course, Tom had always known that in the end she would, but still it hadn't been easy to convince her.

He checked his watch as he turned around the next corner. Past one in the morning already. Maybe he should call it a day and head back to the Slytherin common room. Just as Tom formulated this thought he passed the staircase leading up to the Astronomy tower and a cold draft hit him. Either someone had forgotten to close the door leading on the platform or this night wasn't as quiet as he had first assumed. Tom shortly toyed with the idea of just ignoring the whole thing but then he began to climb the stairs after all. Sometimes catching rule breakers could be very beneficial to him. After all, blackmail material was rather hard to come by, Tom thought and a small smirk stole on his face.

He quickly reached the topmost point of the tower and could see that the door indeed stood wide open. A figure was standing at the far end of the platform. Tom stepped out onto the platform and immediately a cold wind ripped at him. He scowled at that person standing here in the cold. Whoever it was, that person was going to get thrown into detention for having made Tom going through so much trouble. As he neared the person he could see a mass of tousled curly hair.

"Hermione?" he asked in confusion.

As Tom walked nearer to the person he recognized her. It was indeed Hermione but she wasn't answering him. Tom frowned at her. What was she doing out here? As he reached her he noticed that she wasn't wearing any cloak but only her thin school robe despite the piercing cold wind. Underneath her robe she seemed to be dressed in that ridiculously short nighty Tom had seen during the Christmas break. What was she doing, wearing something like that and wandering the castle? It was still winter, hadn't she noticed?

Hermione still didn't acknowledge his presence in any way. She was clasping the balustrade of the platform tightly and stared vacantly in front of her. It seemed that something was wrong with her. Tom reached out for her and laid a hand gingerly on top of one of hers. It was icy-cold.

"What are you doing here?" Tom asked her gently.

She didn't immediately answer him but as she did she whispered her reply in a strangely dead tone, "… just thinking."

"Hermione, it's ice-cold and really late," Tom now said in a rather stern voice.

He reached for his wand and cast a warming charm on her. His actions seemed to have finally woken her from her odd state as Hermione now turned her head and looked at him. Tom's eyes widened in shock as he stared into Hermione's hazel ones. He could see it again, the sorrow and desperation. It seemed to flow in waves from her and Tom wondered how he could have missed it before.

"What's wrong?" he asked her and was surprised by that worry in his own voice.

Hermione just continued to look at him. Tom had the unpleasant feeling that she wasn't really seeing him but somebody else. After a while she averted her eyes and again looked indifferently at Hogwarts' grounds.

"Why do you think something is wrong?" she then asked in a colourless tone.

Tom remembered the last time he had seen her so forlorn and even hurt. That had been during the night before they had headed back to Hogwarts after the break. She had had a nightmare then. Tom had no idea what she had dreamed about but it must have been bad. Why was she again in this condition?

So Tom ignored her previous question and instead asked her gently, "Did you have a nightmare again?"

Hermione just shrugged her shoulders and continued to stare at the Forbidden Forest in front of her. Tom took another step towards her so that his chest was almost brushing against her shoulder. Hermione still didn't pay him any more attention. She seemed to be lost in her own world. Judging by that pained expression Tom could see in her eyes he hated to think how that world looked like.

"Do you want to talk about it?" he asked her softly.

Actually he desperately wanted to know what she had dreamed about. What was it that could upset her so? Anger suddenly flared up in him. He wondered if those dreams she had were actual memories. She had told him once, hadn't she? That there happened some bad things in her life and that this was the reason for her nightmares. Tom had to restrain his magic from crackling around him furiously as he imagined someone daring to hurt her. He would make that person regret his actions very much, he thought enraged.

Tom had to remind himself that Hermione came from a country were currently a war raged. Not only that muggle war but also a wizarding one. From the few things she had already told him it appeared that at least some people she had known had died in the war. So that meant Hermione had been very close to the fightings. Probably she had seen some terrible things as she had fled the country.

Tom looked down at her. But she was still ignoring him and hadn't reacted to his question in any way. He removed his hand which still lay on one of hers. Then he gently skimmed his fingers over the skin of her cheek.

"Something is troubling you," Tom whispered in a soothing tone. "Why don't you tell me about it?"

Slowly Hermione turned her head and she looked up at him. Again that inexplicable grief was screaming at him through her eyes while the rest of her face was completely blank.

"It's nothing," she said in a cold tone.

He could hear her voice shake slightly and he knew that there certainly was something tormenting her.

"Hermione," Tom tried to talk her into confiding in him. "I'm your boyfriend. You can tell me everything."

Tom was a little alarmed as he saw a flitter of regret crossing her face as he said that. He could see her hands holding the balustrade tighten around the stone. Now there was a certain amount of determination on her face as she said in a firm voice,

"You shouldn't be with me, Tom."

Tom stared at her for a moment. That certainly wasn't good.

"Why do you say that?" he asked in a quiet tone.

"I… I'm…" Hermione's voice faltered and she shortly shook her head before she continued in a now stronger voice. "There happened some bad things in my life. They changed me. And I am not who I used to be." Hermione looked away from him before she continued in a soft voice that sounded more like she was talking with herself than with him, "I… I don't know… but I lost something." Then her eyes shot back at him and her tone was again firm as she said, "No-one should waste time with me."

Tom chuckled softly then he said, "Are you seriously telling me that you might be bad company?"

"This is not funny, Tom."

"No, it's not," he said, suddenly serious again. Then he continued in a rather commanding tone, "But I told you. I am not going to let you go again."

She looked up at him and Tom saw hesitation in her eyes before she replied, "You should. There are so many girls who like you, Tom. And they are all better than me."

"Nicolls?" Tom asked softly.
"She really likes you," Hermione whispered her answer.

Slowly Tom regretted his decision of using Nicolls to make Hermione jealous. Obviously he had caused a lot more harm than he had intended.

"And I told you that I'm not interested in her at all."

"You toyed with her?" Hermione asked in a flat tone, though it sounded more like a statement than an actual question.

Tom was really worried now that he could hear accusation in Hermione's voice. Sure he had used Nicolls. But he wouldn't lose any sleep over it. He didn't care about Nicolls. She was unimportant and dispensable. But he couldn't have Hermione change her mind about her decision again.

"I shouldn't have cursed her," Hermione whispered and Tom was surprised to hear so much regret in her voice.

"Why not?" Tom asked her in a light tone. "You are more powerful than she is. Why not use your superiority?"

The instant he said it he knew he had made a mistake. Hermione's hands left the balustrade as she now fully turned to face him. Tom could see fury on her face as she narrowed her eyes angrily at him.

"I shouldn't have expected any more from you," she hissed at him in a snide tone. "You just don't understand."

She was right. Tom really didn't understand why she was so enraged by this whole thing. His confusion must have shown on his face as she now said in a low voice,

"It was wrong to curse her. She didn't deserve it." Then she continued and there was a mixture of repentance and bitterness in her voice, "But I did curse her and just because you provoked me."

Now, this was really bad, Tom thought while Hermione glared at him rather enraged.

"Come on. You don't know Nicolls. She really deserved something like this," he tried to calm her down.

"That's the point!" she snubbed at him rather aggressively. "I do not know her. I didn't have a reason for cursing her and yet I did do just that."

"Hermione, please, it's not like you used any dangerous curse on her. She'll survive," Tom said in what he hoped was a reassuring voice.

"This time," Hermione replied darkly.

Hermione stared at him. Again the images rushed pitilessly through her head. She could again see herself as she raised her wand to curse Parkinson. It had been war back then. Hermione knew that Parkinson wouldn't have shown her any mercy either if she had been in Hermione's place. She realized that it wasn't so much the fact that she had killed Parkinson that disturbed her now. She knew that by killing that Death Eater she had most probably saved a few innocent lives. That was the reason why she had fought in that war in the first place: to prevent more deaths. No, what Hermione really disturbed was that cold detachment with which she had murdered Parkinson. She had even felt a little gratification as her curse had hit Parkinson. That was inexcusable and it made her feel sickened by herself.
Hermione looked up at Tom's grey eyes. She could see that he still didn't understand. He didn't understand what she had done nor how wrong it had been. Couldn't he see the darkness that surrounded her? Or was it the darkness he liked? It was his fault after all. He had hurt her so much and he had forced her to do all those horrible things.

But maybe it had been her who had smothered the last human part of him in the first place. Her who had created Him and her who was responsible for all the pain.

Suddenly she could see Tom's face soften a bit as he stared down at her. Then he put a hand gently on her shoulder before he said in an unexpected fit of honesty, "Okay, maybe I've really used Nicolls. But I did that only because I knew that otherwise you would never admit your feelings, Hermione."

"I know that you've manipulated mem" Hermione said in a tight voice, not in the least bit reassured by his apparent sincerity. "But that still doesn't change the facts. You didn't force me to curse Nicolls. I did that on my own free will."

"I still don't know why you make such a big deal out of it." Tom now raised is voice a little in exasperation.

"Unlike you, there are some of us who still have a conscience!" Hermione blustered and again she could feel her anger rising in her as she glared at Tom.

Right now she didn't know who was more despicable. He because he had manipulated her into becoming his girlfriend or her because she had let him do it.

Tom looked down at her, clearly contemplating how to proceed from here. After a while he again tried to calm her down, "I admit that the circumstances have been a little unfortunate. But I know you and I know that you are feeling something for me."

Hermione stared at him while her furious magic burned through her. She was enraged. Enraged by the truth behind his words. She couldn't contradict him, could she? She did like him after all. That was the reason she was in this mess right now. Her blood was boiling and Hermione was glad to be able to replace her sorrow and pain with wrath. But it had been his last statement that finally let her snap.

Hermione yelled at him with anger seeping through her voice, "You don't know anything about me!"

She swiftly stepped away from him while simultaneously drawing her wand.

"You don't know the things I can do. You don't know about the things I did do!" she hissed at him.

All the anger and frustration that rushed through her was suddenly directed at Tom. She hated him for not understanding, for being so manipulative and for having used her. But above all else she hated herself because she had allowed him to use her and because she knew that she still liked him. He needed to leave but she didn't want him to go.

Hermione lashed her wand in an angry movement in Tom's direction.

_Fragor!_

A bright blue current of energy left the tip of her wand. It crackled with Hermione's angry magic as it rushed towards Tom. Obviously he hadn't expected her to attack and hadn't drawn his own wand. But he still managed to dodge her spell by plunging to the side. The spell missed him and crashed into a stone gargoyle which stood on the balustrade. The blue spell snaked around the stone figure. and then it seemed to close tightly around it. Cracks appeared in the stone until finally the gargoyle burst with a loud bang. But Hermione paid the destroyed sculpture no heed as her eyes were fixed on Tom. He was crouched on the floor with a foot, one knee and both hands on the ground. Currently he stared at her with an expression of disbelief on his face. But Hermione wasn't losing any time as she had again brandished her wand and the next curse soared through the air.

Obtero!

This time Tom wasn't fast enough. He still stared at her perplexedly as the curse hit him. Hermione heard him gasp in pain as the power of the curse flung him to the floor. But that didn't saturate her wrath at all. She felt her magic still rushing through her, singing in unison with her rage. She moved her wand as she directed her magic into the remains of the stone gargoyle. The pieces of stone glowed shortly before they obeyed her command and shot into the air. With a flick of her wand the pieces pelted down on Tom. Before they had the chance to hit him they suddenly turned into dust. Hermione scowled at Tom who now slowly got up again. She could see that he had his wand in his hand.

"What are you doing?" Tom asked in a slightly shaky voice.

He looked at her still with confusion shining in his grey eyes but Hermione could see from his posture that he was more guarded now.

"I don't want to fight with you," Tom said in a soothing tone while he raised his hands in a peace offer.

"I never wanted to fight you either!" Hermione snarled at him venomously. "But that didn't stop you, did it?"

She didn't care anymore that he was yet innocent of the things she accused him of now. Her magic crackled around her, espousing her fury even further. The air seemed to be charged with electricity and the snow that lay on the platform melted around her.

"I never wanted any of this!" she screamed at him and her anger even intensified as she could now feel unwanted tears running down her cheeks.

She breathed in shakily as her horrible memories invaded her mind again. So many. So many people had died. Why couldn't she have accompanied them? Then she wouldn't be here, fighting against the darkness that tried to clasp her. And she wouldn't have brought this darkness with her to contaminate the people here.

Hermione was pulled out of her memories by Tom's voice, "Hermione, please, what happened?"

"Everything!" she screamed at him.

Her stomach clenched as she saw concern on Tom's face as he looked at her. But she didn't need concern right now. She didn't deserve it. The fury boiled up again and Hermione raised her wand. She twirled it swiftly in a practiced movement while she held her left hand, palm up, in front of her.

Lampas!

A small fireball appeared over Hermione's outstretched hand. It quickly gained in volume as she directed more force into the spell. Soon the fireball crackled and spit dangerously. The air above the ball of fire flickered with heat. Hermione moved her hand from under the ball up to its side. Then she abruptly closed her hand and balled it into a tight fist. Instantly the fireball began to move. It dashed towards Tom. She watched unemotionally how he took a small step back as he was confronted with her spell. Then he brandished his wand swiftly and a yellowish shield appeared in front of him. But she still had her hand tightly balled into a fist and her fireball crashed fiercely into the yellow shield. Hermione could see how Tom struggled as the ball of fire continued its onslaught. He frowned in concentration as he tried to maintain his shield. Then he seemed to change his strategy. He whirled his wand again and suddenly Hermione could feel his powerful magic in the air. His magic instantly attacked her spell and Hermione watched how her ball of fire first flickered feebly until it completely died down and there was nothing left of it. The red light of the fire disappeared and the platform on which they stood was once again covered only by moon light. Hermione glowered at Tom. She could still feel her magic rushing through her as a raging current.

"I don't want to hurt you," Tom now said and Hermione was surprised to hear desperation in his tone.

"Too late!" she yelled at him.

There was a look of confusion and even fear crossing his face as he heard that. Hermione didn't care. It was true after all, wasn't it?

Or had it been her who hurt him? She didn't know. Not anymore. The only thing she knew was that she was lost. And alone. More tears run from her eyes and Hermione sobbed, not really knowing what she mourned over. As he saw her crying Tom started to walk over to her. Hermione stiffened as she noticed his movement and she instantly raised her wand again and pointed it at him. He stopped to approach her but looked at her still with that concern shining softly in his grey eyes.

Hermione stared at him. He needed to go. She had to be alone. I don't want to be alone.

Hermione closed her eyes shortly and tried to suppress the tears. Then she breathed in and opened her eyes again. While she felt shaky and sick the hand holding her wand was as steady as rock.

Hermione summoned her magic while she twirled her wand in a circular movement. The air around her swirled towards her always following her wand. It didn't take long and a raging vortex appeared in front of her which seemed to suck in all the air. The swirling tempest was mixed with parts of Hermione's magic as it grew bigger and bigger. It didn't take long and Hermione felt that the power of her curse had increased so much that she was barely able to control it any longer. That was when she stopped to twirl her wand but pointed it towards Tom.

Then she cried her next curse like a prayer, "Dimitto!"

The vortex quivered shortly then Hermione could feel how it broke away from her and rushed towards Tom. She could see his eyes widen in shock as if he hadn't really expected her to attack him with that curse. Then he instantly moved his wand in a complicated pattern while he chanted an incantation under his breath. Hermione couldn't see anything change nor did a shield appear to protect Tom but she could feel the magic in the air subtly change. There now seemed to be a web of Tom's magic as it grew bigger and bigger. It didn't take long and Hermione felt that the power of her curse had increased so much that she was barely able to control it any longer. That was when she stopped to twirl her wand but pointed it towards Tom.

"Hermione, calm down." Her eyes shot back at him as Tom tried to soothe her.

He stood there, a few metres away, while he pointed his wand at her. As he scanned her she could again see concern flashing through his eyes. More tears run down her face until they dropped on her robe. Hermione didn't want to cry. There was no reason for her to cry, was there? She felt enraged by those unbidden tears flowing down her cheeks. She summoned her magic and tried with all the effort she could muster to cast off Tom's magic which still held her in place. But it was useless.

"I am sorry." Hermione stopped her struggling as she heard Tom's gentle voice.

He was walking towards her. Again Hermione could see the softness in his eyes as he looked at her.

"I shouldn't have manipulated you," he said in a soft-spoken tone.

No! No apologies. Hermione closed her eyes. He couldn't apologize. She wasn't allowed to forgive, neither him nor herself. Again she tried to call upon her magic though she knew she wouldn't be able to break Tom's magic. But as she mobilized every bit of her power, the Elder Magic suddenly chose to show itself again. Hermione nearly gasped out in surprise as the Elder Wand's magic wrapped itself completely around her. Instantly she could feel how she was unlinked from Tom's magic; she was able to move again and stumbled a step backwards. Then the Elder Magic broke down again and disappeared underneath her own magic. Tom had stopped dead in his tracks as he had felt his magic lose contact of Hermione. Her vision was obscured by the tears but she could see the astonishment on Tom's face as he stared at her.

Slowly Hermione raised her wand at him. Then she waved it and whispered, "Minuo."

Hermione could see a flicker of recognition in Tom's eyes as he heard the incantation and saw the azure curse leave her wand. He obviously knew that curse. His hand holding his wand twitched shortly but then he didn't raise it to cast the counter curse.

The curse still rushed towards him, angrily crackling with magic, while Tom just stood there.
Hermione's eyes widened as she realized that he wasn't going to defend himself. Without thinking she again waved her wand and her curse deviated from its original trajectory. It rushed through the air, grazed Tom's right arm and then crashed with a hissing sound into the ground behind him.

Tom still looked at her with a blank face, he hadn't even twitched as the curse had sliced him. But Hermione could see blood running down his hand and dropping on the ground where it turned the white snow red.

She took a step backwards and felt her back hitting Hogwarts' outer wall. She leaned against the wall weakly. She was breathing heavily as she stared at Tom with wide eyes. He didn't say anything as he stowed his wand away in his pocket then he walked slowly over to her. He didn't pay any heed to the wand that was still pointed at him. As he reached her he stopped in front of her and looked down.
His face was a blank. Then slowly he wrapped his arms around her and pulled her cautiously towards him. Hermione didn't stop him as he pressed her tightly against him.

"I won't let you go again," he whispered to her gently, and this time it sounded like a promise.

Hermione closed her eyes as she felt him embracing her. She suddenly felt so tired and weak as she leaned against him.

Tom could feel blood trickling down his arm as he embraced her tightly. It hurt but it didn't matter.
He was just glad that obviously Hermione didn't want to hurl any curses at him anymore. He still couldn't understand why she had so suddenly attacked him. Just now she had radiated so much anger and hate that he was actually surprised that she had stopped her last attack.

What had happened?
The last time he had seen her she had been fine. There had been no trace of that terrible sorrow in her eyes. But then just a few hours later he found her and she seemed to be totally despaired. Tom could feel her trembling slightly in his arms as he pressed her against him. But she wasn't returning the embrace, she was just leaning limply against him.

What was it that had broken her so? Tom asked himself worried. He just hoped that it hadn't been his fault she was in this condition now. But he was quite sure he had at least caused some of the anger Hermione had just now vented on him. He should have never spat her so during that Quidditch match today.

Tom was quite surprised by the worry he experienced right now. Hadn't he already achieved what he had wanted? He had manipulated Hermione and he had intentionally made her jealous to the point where she had cursed Nicolls. Then she had finally submitted to him.

Hermione was his now. Hadn't that been his goal?

But now he was standing here and was very concerned about her well-being.

All he had wanted was to own her. She was a powerful witch, something rare and exceptional. Something that only he deserved to possess. So he had had to get her, no matter what it took him to do so. What did he care how she was feeling about the whole thing?

But then where was that odd concern suddenly coming from? Now she was trembling in his arms and he found himself wanting to console her. He wanted to make her feel better and forget the sorrow which so obviously tore at her.

Why did he care?

Somehow he did, though. He wanted to protect her and to take care of her. He certainly didn't want her to suffer anymore.

How strange.

As he was pressing her so tightly against him he felt how cold she seemed to be. Tom remembered that she was only wearing her school robe and those scandalously short clothes which didn't cover up anything. He ended the embrace before he took off his black robe and wrapped it around Hermione's small frame. She looked up at him with a blank face, but Tom nearly cringed as he could again see the sadness in her eyes. He cautiously put an arm around her shoulders and then slowly led her to the door. He walked her back to her common room. Hermione just followed him. She didn't say anything but still had that blank look on her face. Tom didn't like that look at all. It was actually quite disconcerting. Hermione wasn't supposed to look so devoid of any emotion. He knew that she normally burst with emotion. What had happened that had managed to destroy that fiery temper of hers?

After a while they reached the Gryffindor common room and Tom whispered the password to that ridiculous portrait which guarded the entrance. Then he stepped into the common room. It was cast in darkness. All students seemed to have gone to bed which wasn't that surprising as it was almost two in the morning. Tom walked over to the stairs which he knew led up to the girls' dormitories. Before he climbed the stairs he drew his wand and cast a spell at the stairs. He didn't fancy to be thrown down the stairs which would turn into a slide the instant any male tried to climb them.

Stupid old-fashioned school founders.

As Tom climbed up the stairs he again cast a worried glance at Hermione. Her face was still devoid of any emotion as she stared vacantly in front of her. He doubted she was paying any attention to where he was leading her right now. But he knew she wasn't following him because she trusted him.
It was more that she didn't seem to care about what was happening to her. As Tom finally reached the sixth years' dorm he cautiously opened the door. He was quite relieved to find the dorm was dived into darkness, just like the common room had been. The last thing he needed right now was a bunch of girls interrogating him about what he wanted in the girls' dorms. Tom entered and after a quick scan he quietly walked over to the only vacant bed in the room. Hermione was still blindly following him. In the past he would have been delighted by her docility but now it only troubled him.

As they reached her part of the dormitory Tom cautiously slid his black robe, which was much too big for Hermione, from her shoulders. Then he removed her own robe and discarded both on the backrest of the chair standing at the small table beside her bed. Hermione now stood there in nothing but this strange nighty she insisted in wearing while she looked up at him with huge eyes. She appeared to be so vulnerable and frail now. Completely unlike that person who had crackled with magic as she had attacked him with seriously powerful curses on top of the Astronomy tower.

Tom really didn't know what to make of her. He was at a loss. What had happened to her?

Hermione was following Tom through the dark corridors of Hogwarts castle. She didn't know where he was leading her to nor did she care. Coldness was ripping at her. She could feel Tom's arm wrapped around her shoulders, but it didn't do anything to drive away that coldness which seemed to penetrate her so deeply that she doubted it was only related to temperature. She felt slightly sick and again a piercing pain throbbed behind her temples. But somehow she couldn't find it in her to care.
She was feeling incredibly empty. It felt like all her feelings and emotions were strangely numbed.
There was just nothing. The burning anger had left her and even the hate was gone. It felt as if the raging fury that had just now angrily dictated her actions had destroyed all other emotions until there was nothing left. Just emptiness.

Next thing she noticed was Tom gently removing her black uniform robe. She looked up at him.
There was still concern flashing in his startlingly grey eyes. Then he took her hand in his and tugged her over to a bed. Hermione was mildly surprised as she realized that it was her own bed. They were in her dorm? Suddenly feeling very tired Hermione sat down on the bed. Tom took the blanket and wrapped it around her before he sat down on the edge of her bed. He drew the covers of the four-poster and even cast a Silencing charm on them. Hermione pulled the blanket tighter around her to finally dispel that coldness. Then she leaned her back against the headboard and drew her knees up.

"What happened to you?" She heard Tom ask.

Though his voice had been gentle Hermione could hear a certain resoluteness seeping through the words. Her eyes wandered back to him. He was sitting there on her bed and eyed her rather attentively. What did he want her to tell him? That she was a despicable person? That she had done horrible things in her past? That she was a murderer?

The irony of it all didn't escape her notice. She was sitting here with the man who would one day become the uncaring initiator of a war that would take countless lives. But right now, between the two of them, it was her who had ended more life.

Hermione didn't say anything but just continued to stare at him numbly. As she wasn't replying, Tom slid closer to her on the bed until he sat cross-legged directly in front of her.

"This can't be just about you cursing Nicolls. There is more," Tom stated in a soft voice while he glanced at her.

Hermione stared back at him. He was right, after all. This was more than just Nicolls. Much more.

"Just now you accused me of not knowing anything about you," he said in a quiet voice. "Why don't you tell me?"

"I… I can't…" she finally whispered.

"Hermione, what happened before you came to Hogwarts?" he asked her in a soft voice. "Have you somehow been confronted with the war in France?"

Hermione averted her eyes from him. It always came down to this, didn't it? War. She could feel tears threatening to fall from her eyes. This was ridiculous. How could she sit here and start to cry after all the things she had done?

"You already told me about your friends and your family," Tom now said in a pensive tone. "And you told me that they died."

She couldn't hold them back anymore. Traitorous tears trickled down her face.

"But how did they die?" he asked her gently. "Did they fight in the war?"

Hermione still couldn't look at Tom.

"Did you have to fight in the war?" he finally asked her hesitantly.

"No," Hermione said quietly, her voice level. Then she turned her head slowly towards him. He was looking at her with that softness shining in his eyes. He seemed to be relieved by her answer but Hermione wasn't yet finished so she continued in her emotionless tone,

"I didn't have to fight. I chose to."

Tom stared at her for some time. Disbelief was washing over him. He didn't even know why he had asked the question. He had known that something had hurt her. Since he had seen her break down at Christmas, he had known that something had happened to her. And it was somehow connected with the war she had fled from. But this, he hadn't expected.

He looked at her and saw tears flowing from her eyes. This contrasted sharply with the complete lack of emotion on her face.

"Why?" he finally asked.

"Because it was in my power to change things. Because I couldn't forsake my friends," she whispered in that voice which was missing all emotion.

"But…but…" Tom stammered as he stared at her in shock. "You are only seventeen."

Hermione laughed mirthlessly.

"Do you think wars have age restrictions?" Then she continued and the empty smile disappeared from her face, "I didn't want to fight. I really didn't. But there was no other option left." Hermione paused shortly and Tom was again shocked by that hard look on her face, it didn't seem to match her hazel coloured eyes.

"It was okay, though. I had a reason to fight and I had my friends. But then…" More tears flowed down her cheeks. "…then they died," she whispered in a broken voice. "And I couldn't help them."

Tom stared at her. The sorrow was back in her pretty eyes. But now he knew why she wore that expression on her face. He had always assumed that Hermione had in some way been confronted by the war as it had ultimately led to her fleeing the country. But Tom had never expected her to have taken part in the actual fightings. He didn't want to imagine that she had to fight against those dark wizards.

It did explain a lot though. Hermione was able to do magic that was normally beyond any sixth year. And it did explain why her body was covered in so many scars. Tom balled his hands into tight fists as he remembered the web of white scars on her body.

"I wanted to return life to how it was before the war." Tom heard Hermione's shaky voice continue. "I wanted to stop the evil."

Tom's eyes wandered back to hers and he found her staring at him strangely.

"But we were fighting for so long, that slowly I was forgetting about our cause." New tears trickled down her cheeks as she said in her soft voice, "And so many of my friends died that even hope left me in the end. All that remained was to somehow survive and to fight on."

Tom watched how Hermione raised a hand and tried to wipe the tears away. Then she looked back at him and there was suddenly a pained expression on her face.

"I'm a hypocrite," Hermione whispered in a shaky voice. "I've always thought I fought on the right side, the good side. But am I any better than the dark wizards I tried to stop?" She paused shortly before she continued and now there was bitterness in her voice, "I might be even worse. I proclaim to be good and just, but at the end of the day I am nothing more than a murderer."

Tom raised his eyebrows in surprise at her.

"There was no other way," Hermione said in an almost pleading voice as she saw the surprised expression on his face. "Those people couldn't be stopped by only stunning them."

"I don't blame you," Tom finally assured as he had overcome his initial surprise. "You did what you had to do to survive. I would have done the same."

"Maybe," Hermione said colourlessly.

Then she averted her eyes from him before she said quietly, "And Nicolls? Before the war, I would have never cursed her. But now…"

Suddenly she hissed with disgust in her voice, "I hate the person I have become." She continued in a softer voice, "That person is horrible. I'm afraid of her. But-" She hesitated then her eyes wandered back at him. "For two years I have surrendered myself to that war. I had given up all hope. And now, I think it is too late."

"What is too late?" Tom asked her concerned.

"To come back," Hermione whispered in a shaky voice.

She looked up at Tom, begging him to tell her that it was not too late. Afraid to hear the truth: that she didn't deserve any better than to suffer like this. She could see something flicker in his grey eyes as he stared at her. But she wasn't sure what it had been. Then, suddenly, Tom slid closer to her until he sat directly beside her and leaned with his back against the headboard. Without saying a word he just wrapped one arm around her before he pulled her over to him. Hermione stiffened as she felt him holding her.

She shouldn't be so near him. He was the reason she had had to go through so much pain.

No, he shouldn't be so near her because she was spreading this darkness which could smother everything that is good.

Hermione was just confused now.

And she was lost in a dark place.

Too late to come back.

"It's okay, Hermione," Tom's gentle voice crooned to her. "Wherever you are, you are not alone. I'm with you."

Hermione drew in a shaky breath as she heard him say that. Then her hands clasped tightly the green fabric of his sleeveless pullover and she leaned against him. Silent sobs shook her body as she wept. She could feel Tom wrapping his other arm around her before he pulled her tighter against him. Hermione buried her face into his chest as tears still run from her eyes.

She felt terrible about the things she had done during the war. The abhorrent pictures that had accompanied her for so long still invaded her mind. She had seen so much misery and pain. She knew that this war had somehow broken her. Something inside of her had died. Since she had left her time period behind and particularly since everyone who could have understood her sorrow had died Hermione had been utterly alone and isolated from everybody else. Life had continued around her but strangely she had been unable to really partake. She only had her mission to fulfill. But wasn't there more to life? More than just fighting and trying to complete a mission?

She didn't want to endure the loneliness anymore.

Her hands clasped the fabric of Tom's pullover tighter. She felt the reassuring heat of his body as she clung to him. Maybe it really was time to step out of her solitude. Perhaps she should accept the contact he so obviously offered her.

Hermione continued to clasp Tom as she sobbed into his chest.

She didn't know how long it took until her sobs died down and her eyes ran dry. But eventually she stopped to cry though she still held tightly to Tom. She felt weak and so incredibly tired. Then after a while she could feel Tom placing a soft kiss on her forehead before he whispered to her,

"It's late. Try to sleep a little bit."

Hermione nodded at him and allowed him to lay her down on the bed. She curled up under the blanket. Finally she could feel warmth spreading through her body and dispelling the penetrating coldness. Then she could feel Tom stroking gently over her head before he got up from the bed. She grabbed his hand and looked up at him. The softness was still in his beautiful grey eyes.

"Can you stay until I fall asleep?" she asked him hesitantly.

Tom smirked down at her.

"Does that mean that you are not leaving me after all?" he asked in a slightly teasing voice, though Hermione could hear the apprehension behind his taunt.
Hermione stared at him for a long time. Thinking about the war that would start in fifty years time and about all the people she had lost to that war. She was pondering about dark wizards, prophecies and the unpredictability of time itself. Time was too large a concept to presume that she could fathom out its whole magnitude.

"Yes," she finally whispered in a soft voice, not knowing if she committed a terrible crime by staying with Tom. But she decided to trust that warm feeling which engulfed her right now.

Hermione smiled softly up at him as she saw a look of relief crossing his features. Then he again sat down on the bed next to her with his back against the headboard. Hermione snuggled closer to him. She was so tired now. But she felt better, somehow lighter. She huddled against Tom, breathing in his pleasant scent and feeling the reassuring heat of his body.

He didn't have to say anything. His presence was enough to comfort her. She felt better knowing that he was there for her.

After a night without any more nightmares Hermione sat well rested in the Great Hall having breakfast. She reached for a pot of coffee and poured herself a nice cup. As she placed the pot back on the table her eyes wandered over to the Slytherin table. Her gaze landed on Nicolls who sat at the table and seemed to be talking with a bunch of other Slytherin girls. Hermione was relieved to see that Nicolls looked normal again. Her curse had done no lasting damage. She still felt bad for having cursed the girl. Hermione unfixed her eyes from Nicolls and then her gaze finally fell on Tom who sat on his usual spot. He was looking right back at her and she could see a small smile playing around his mouth and the now familiar softness glinted in his grey eyes. A smile of her own crept on her face as she scanned him.

As she had woken today Tom had had left her dorm already. In a way Hermione had been disappointed but maybe it had been for the better. Otherwise it would surely have been a field day for her chatty dorm mates if they had found Tom Riddle lying in Hermione’s bed.

Hermione's thoughts wandered back to last night. To the things that had been said and done.

She didn't know whether her decision to stay with Tom had been right. It felt like she was betraying her friends. Betraying her every conviction. There still was the fear that she was somehow tearing the very fabric of time apart alone with her presence here in the past.

Yes, she was very afraid. But still, she had made her decision. There was no knowing if she was changing time with her actions here in the past or if it were her actions here that created the timeline she knew in the first place. It was presumptuous to assume she would be able comprehend the effects her presence had on the past.

It was grotesque considering the circumstances but she had decided to follow an advice Ron had once given her. He had told her to stop over-analyzing things and just trust her feelings.

Hermione still looked at Tom. She knew that there were a lot of feelings involved when it came to Tom Riddle. Not all of them were positive. She couldn't just forget who he was. Too much had happened. The darkness in Tom was already visible, though most of the people couldn't see it. Hermione could. Sometimes she could see it lurking behind his grey eyes, this black abyss. But aside from this frightening darkness there was so much more to him. He was the only one who could make her feel better. Maybe there was darkness inside of him but he was able to pull her out from her own darkness. There was no denying how much she needed him. As she looked at him she could feel it again this warm and tingling feeling.
Hermione breathed in deeply. Her decision was made. She would stay with Tom. Maybe she would regret it later, maybe not. There was no telling what the future would bring.

She had to chuckle softly at that. Somehow everything was twisted.

"Did you even listen to me?" A voice beside her asked in exasperation.

Hermione looked up and found Longbottom frowning at her. He was sitting right beside her. While Lupin and Weasley had taken seats opposite from her. Hermione nearly groaned as she saw the looks of concern on the boys' faces. Yesterday they had been too exhilarated by their victory of the Quidditch match. Though in Lupin's case Hermione assumed his excitement had had more to do with Stella Lovegood. Whatever the reason, their good mood had stopped them from berating her about her sudden absence after the match. A mistake they apparently wanted to make up for.

"You can't just suddenly disappear on your own," Longbottom continued his ranting. "What if he had found you all alone?"

With 'he' Longbottom obviously referred to Tom. Her Gryffindor friends still thought he was harassing her. Hermione knew that it was high time she told them about Tom and her. Particularly now that she had decided to stay with Tom. But she didn't know how to tell them. They really mistrusted Tom. Even hated him, at least in Longbottom's case. She had to admit that their aversion wasn't exactly unfounded.

"Look, you don't have to worry about me so much," Hermione told Longbottom in a soothing tone. "Really, I can look after myself."

Longbottom just sighed and shook his head at her in frustration. Then he turned to Lupin and said, "Whatever did you think, letting her wander off on her own?"

Hermione raised her eyebrows as she saw that look of contriteness on Lupin's face.

"I told you already I'm sorry about it," Lupin said in a small voice.

Oh Merlin, I really need to tell them, Hermione thought as she followed the discussion between her friends. But how?

"Hermione, you should really be more cautious," Weasley now told her in a surprisingly serious tone. "Riddle's ruthless. And he knows a whole bunch of evil curses."

"Yeah, he's a bastard," Longbottom didn't hesitate to inform her.

You are a coward! Hermione screamed at herself in her mind. But the three Gryffindors were the only friends she had in this time period. Hell, they were the only friends she had left in any time period, including her own. She didn't want to lose them. But this procrastinating the truth was surely not making the whole thing any easier.

"Er… listen…” Hermione started to say in a stammered voice.

She was run over by Longbottom as he told the other two boys, "Let's just forget about yesterday. It's water under the bridge. But from now on we have to take better care of Hermione. That evil prick will never get anywhere near her."

Hermione saw the other two boys nod at that and this time she couldn't suppress this frustrated groan from escaping her mouth. Her self-proclaimed guards weren't paying her any attention anyway and didn't hear it. She then just dropped out from their conversation and let them continue to make plans.
on how to best protect her from Tom's evil schemes. All the while that tiny but persistent voice in her head didn't stop to call her a coward.

After a while Hermione was glad to notice that her friends had now stopped talking about her. The conversation had wandered to another topic.

Longbottom was right now retelling the best moves from the match yesterday quite enthusiastically, "I'll never forget the look on Avery's face." He grinned at Weasley rather evilly. "Your Bludger hit him very nicely, don't you think."

"Sure." Weasley laughed.

"Serves him right," Longbottom exclaimed satisfied.

Hermione felt relieved that they had obviously stopped worrying about her, at least for the time being. Though, that didn't mean she could continue to lie to them forever. They really needed to know about Tom.

And you really need to stop being such a coward! the tiny voice informed her.

Finally they were finished with breakfast and Hermione got up from the table while she wondered about how she could escape her friends later. She was still deep in thought as the four of them made their way towards the exit. Suddenly she noticed that her friends had stopped talking so she looked up at them. She was surprised as she saw the smiles dropping from both Weasley's and Longbottom's face. She frowned at them and then followed their gaze. Her eyes quickly landed on Tom walking towards her. He had obviously seen her getting up from her table and wanted to talk to her.

Hermione smiled at him.

As Tom approached her Hermione saw a frown appearing between his eyebrows as his eyes darted from her to the three boys. She looked beside her and found Weasley, Longbottom and Lupin standing at her side and they were all scowling darkly at Tom. That was bad, Hermione thought panicky. She should have told them after all. Tom stopped in front of her and her three bodyguards.

"What do you want?" Longbottom hissed at Tom aggressively.

Tom just arched one eyebrow gracefully and looked at Longbottom bored. Then his gaze wandered from Longbottom to the two other boys until it finally landed on Hermione. Tom was standing there, in front of her, nonchalantly staring at her and his blank mask was once again in place, Hermione noticed somewhat disappointed. Until she saw this mischievous glint in his grey eyes as he looked at her.

"I was just checking whether DeCerto here has survived yesterday's match," Tom said indifferently, turned to Longbottom. "I was rather hoping a Bludger hit her head. She's a pain in my side."

Hermione saw Longbottom's face getting red while his wand hand twitched. Weasley and Lupin both now glared at Tom sinisterly. But before either one of them could yell at Tom, Or curse him!, Hermione said, while trying to sound as cold as Tom,

"I was just thinking along the same lines. It's a pity you are still here, isn't it?" Hermione told Tom.

Hermione could see the amusement behind Tom's mask of fake-anger as he narrowed his eyes at her and said arrogantly, "Really, DeCerto, you should have stayed where you came from. Where was that again? Germany?"

Hermione raised her eyebrows took a step towards Tom and then sneered at him, all the time desperately trying not to break into laughter, "Not Germany, stupid! It's France!"

"You dare insult me?" Tom hissed at her threateningly as he too took a step towards Hermione.

Hermione was once again impressed by his acting abilities. He was good. She would be scared by him if it wasn't for the amusement she could see glinting in his eyes.

"I think you need to be punished for that!" Tom continued in a low and dangerous voice.

In the corner of her eyes Hermione could see her three Gryffindor friends tense as they heard Tom say that. But before they could react Tom had taken the last step that separated him from Hermione. Then he snaked an arm around her waist and pulled her towards him. His other hand found her chin and raised her head so she would look at him. His face was still a blank but Hermione wasn't fooled. She could see the softness in his eyes as he silently asked her for permission. Sooner or later her friends would find out anyway, better to get over with it fast, Hermione thought, not just a little bit nervous.

Then she smiled up at him in agreement.

She closed her eyes as she felt Tom's lips on her own. Her hands wandered up his back and clutched the fabric of his black Slytherin robe as she felt him pulling her even closer to him. All thoughts fled from her mind as he kissed her softly. She only remotely heard the surprised and outraged gasps from her friends. Se didn't notice at all how the noise level of the Great Hall lessened considerably.

Then Tom broke away from her and Hermione sighed as she leaned her head against his chest.

"What… what are you doing?" Hermione heard Longbottom's enraged voice and wondered whom that question was directed at. Tom? Or her?

She looked up at Tom and saw him smirking conceitedly at the three Gryffindors standing behind her.

"Wipe that smirk off your face," Hermione ordered him sternly.

Tom looked down at her and then whispered amused in her ear, "Sorry, it's not deliberate. It's this Slytherin thing, you know."

Hermione rolled her eyes before she said exasperated, "You are still doing it, Tom."

Tom chuckled at her, then he let go of her. Hermione braced herself before she turned around to face her friends. They were standing there, each one of them staring at her in varying degrees of surprise and anger. Hermione clutched Tom's arm with one hand as she scanned her friends. Lupin seemed to be genuinely surprised. He didn't exactly approve of her actions Hermione guessed but at least she could see a little bit of understanding and acceptance in his eyes. Weasley was standing next to him. He, too, was staring at her in bewilderment as he shook his head in disbelief.

Longbottom, though, was a different matter. His face had turned an angry shade of purple and his hands were balled into fists as his gaze wandered from Hermione to Tom and to Hermione's hand clutching Tom. Hermione breathed in deeply to calm herself down. It didn't help. Now she needed to be honest with them.

"Er… " Hermione began in a soft and timid voice. "… you all know Tom. Well, obviously." She laughed nervously then she continued hurriedly, "We… er… we are, kind of, dating."

"Kind of?" Tom asked and raised his eyebrows at her.
Hermione poked him in his side and whispered in a sing-song voice, "You are not being very helpful here, Tom!"

Tom chuckled again and said teasingly, "I never said I would." Then he leaned down to her and kissed her on her cheek.

Which caused Longbottom's already rather red face to darken more. Hermione could see that his right hand still twitched slightly as if he wanted to pull his wand. She felt guilty now. Maybe she should have given him an advance warning or something before she just kissed Tom in front of him. Judging by that murderous look on Longbottom's face, though, she should really talk with her friends now. Lest she risked Longbottom challenging Tom to a duel.

"Tom?" Hermione looked up at him. "I need to speak with them. Could you leave us alone?"

Tom detached his gaze from the three Gryffindor boys in front of him and now looked down at her. Hermione nearly sighed in frustration as she could see that angry frown on his face.

"Why do you need to be alone with them to do that?" he demanded to know.

"Come on. Don't be like this. I need to sort this out with them," Hermione tried to convince him. Then she shoved at him slightly and said, "Don't you have something to do? Like ordering around your dear followers?"

Tom just narrowed his eyes at her but didn't move.

"Please, Tom," Hermione said while trying to fight her frustration. "We can meet later, okay?"

She looked up at him with a pleading expression on her face and Tom still scowled down at her. But after some time he seemed to cave in and said reluctantly,

"All right. But we'll meet afterwards."

Hermione nodded at him and again shoved him gently away. This time Tom obeyed and left them. Though he didn't leave without throwing a nasty glare Longbottom's way.

Hermione looked back at her three friends, at least she hoped they were still her friends. They were standing there and staring at her incredulously. The first to be able to break from his stupor was Longbottom. His face was still purple and an angry frown appeared between his eyebrows as he grabbed Hermione and started to pull her into an empty classroom. Weasley and Lupin followed behind them. While being dragged out of the hall Hermione got a glimpse of the other students still sitting at the Gryffindor table. They were gaping at her and clearly followed the spectacle. Even the other house tables were watching, Hermione noticed frustrated.

Longbottom did only release her wrist as he had pulled her into an empty classroom. Hermione saw Weasley and Lupin enter the classroom. Weasley closed the door behind him and then stared at her again, his face looked uncharacteristically unsmilin.

"What was that right now?" Hermione's attention was brought back to Longbottom as he yelled at her angrily.

"I… I…" Hermione stammered as Longbottom's fierce stare hit her again. Then her voice died away and she began to nervously fiddle with the long sleeves of her black uniform robe.

"Why did you allow Tom Riddle to kiss you?" Longbottom roared at her.
Hermione flinched as he yelled at her. She knew that Longbottom hated Tom. Of course he wouldn’t be exactly understanding.

"I'm sorry," Hermione said timidly as she looked down on her hands. "I should have told you sooner."

"Told me what?" Longbottom asked angrily. "That you are snogging that dirty bastard? And in the Great Hall, too. You are lucky no teacher saw you doing that. Especially Legifer. You would be in detention until your graduation."

What? Why would she get detention for kissing somebody? Hermione was bewildered.

"Marc, please," Lupin said in a soothing voice. "Calm down. I'm sure Hermione can explain the whole thing."

Longbottom narrowed his eyes at Lupin and folded his arms before his chest but he stopped yelling. Hermione looked thankfully at Lupin.

"I know that I had my conflicts with Tom-" Hermione was interrupted as Longbottom snorted wryly at that. "But I was wrong about him." She continued in a soft but firm voice. "We've met during the break by chance and he was really nice and-"

"Oh," Longbottom cut in with scorn dripping from his voice. "So, he was nice, was he?"

"Marc, let her finish," Lupin chastised his friend quietly.

Longbottom turned to Lupin and said in a barely controlled tone, "That's just ridiculous. We are talking about *Riddle*here. He's an asshole, you know that."

"He's not!" Hermione said and there was now anger in her voice, too.

"He's EVIL, Hermione!" Longbottom yelled at her.

Hermione opened her mouth to retaliate but…

Well, he's kind of right. Hermione had to grudgingly admit as she closed her mouth and stared at Longbottom angrily.

"See? You can't even deny it," Longbottom exclaimed triumphantly.

"He's my boyfriend!" Hermione now yelled furiously at Longbottom. She surprised herself with that conviction in her voice.

Longbottom didn't answer to that but stared at her enraged. Then without saying anything he turned around and stormed angrily from the classroom.

Hermione looked at the door Longbottom had just disappeared through and suddenly all the anger was leaving her. She sighed tiredly and leaned against one of the desks. That hadn't worked well at all. Longbottom seemed to be really angry with her. But what could she do about it? She liked Tom and if Longbottom couldn't accept that she couldn't force him.

After a while Hermione was brought out of her thoughts as a soft voice asked hesitantly, "Is he really your boyfriend?"

Hermione looked up and found Weasley standing a few steps away from her and looking at her questioningly. Lupin was sitting on a desk beside Weasley and he, too, was staring at her expectantly. She breathed in deeply. It again hit her how strikingly similar this Weasley looked to her Ron. She had to remind herself that he was not Ron before she said in a soft voice,

"Yes, he is."

Weasley continued to look at her contemplatively for some time. Then a small smile crept on his face and he nodded at Hermione. She smiled back at him. Grateful that at least one of her friends could accept her relationship. Lupin who had watched this exchange got up from the table he had been sitting on, walked over to Hermione and leaned beside her against the desk.

"Are you sure about that?" Lupin asked her tentatively.

Hermione raised her eyebrows. "What do you mean?"

"Well, Riddle's not exactly known for being very faithful to his girlfriends," Lupin said in an awkward voice.

"I trust him," Hermione nearly choked on her own words. They sounded so wrong, but felt so right.

Lupin looked at her and Hermione could see the doubt in his eyes. "How can you be so sure? It's only a few weeks ago that you still hated him."

Yes, he was right. She had hated Tom back then or, to be more precise, she had hated Voldemort. But during the Christmas break so much had changed, her perception of Tom had changed completely. She had looked behind his mask of coldness and she had found a likeable and sometimes even compassionate person. She was sure Tom had found something in her too otherwise he would never have allowed her to come so near him.

Hermione doubted that he was even able to let others behind the many walls he had erected around himself. There were so many of them that he had buried himself underneath them completely. She still couldn't quite understand how she had managed to slip behind his walls. But somehow she had and Hermione knew that the affection Tom had towards her was something very special. He had grown up in an environment where he couldn't allow himself to trust anyone. Something as simple as to trust another human being was for him unbelievably difficult. During the time when most children had loving parents or guardians Tom had had nothing. He had been alone. Back in her time Dumbledore had been right. Voldemort was not able to feel love. Because he had never had the chance to learn how to do that.

Hermione looked at Lupin again and then said in a convinced voice that left no room for argument,

"I am sure and I do trust him."
Hermione, aimlessly, wandered the many corridors of Hogwarts castle. She felt just horrible since her little confession. Longbottom had reacted in the worst way Hermione could have imagined.

Well, at least he didn't curse me... or Tom. Hermione thought frustrated as she strolled down the corridor. Her steps echoed loudly on the stone floor. Right now she was in a rather secluded part of the castle as she desperately tried to avoid the company of other students. They were sure to either pelt her with questions about Tom or would skip the talking and just hex her.

She sighed loudly and pondered what to do next. She couldn't very well wander the castle's corridors forever. But returning to the Gryffindor common room was certainly not an option either. She strongly assumed that that was where Longbottom had stormed off to so furiously. Lupin and Weasley should be there too and probably tried to console Longbottom after he had received those shocking news. For another matter Hermione didn't want to go to the common room because then she would run the risk to meet her chatty dorm mates. After this display in the Great Hall they would surely try to squeeze as much information out of her as they could. Maybe the best course of action would be to just flee the castle and start a new life far far away from here, Hermione thought wryly. The Caribbean should be nice at this time of the year.

Hermione chuckled softly as she rounded a corner and entered a new passage way.

Or Albania. Maybe the weather is not as mild there but then Tom would come along.

Hermione was deeply immersed in her escaping plans as she heard a deep voice behind her, "What did your dear friends say?"

She turned around and found Tom leaning against the corridor wall. Hermione nearly rolled her eyes as she saw a smirk plastered all over his face while he scanned her in amusement.

"What are you so happy about?" Hermione asked him somewhat irritated.

Her anger only invoked that smirk on Tom's face to grow even wider.

"Nothing," he said in an annoyingly cheerful tone.

Then he pushed from the wall and walked over to her. The Slytherin-smirk was still tugging at the corners of his mouth as he looked down at her. Then he took her hand in his and started to walk.

Hermione sighed but she followed him.

"I thought we would meet right after you talked with those boys," he said, surprisingly without any accusation in his voice. He seemed to be in a good mood.

Hermione made a non-committal sound that could have meant anything.

"So? What about your friends?" Tom inquired again as he led her through the corridors. His voice was light as if he was pondering the weather. It was annoying.

"What did they say to your shocking relationship?"

Hermione narrowed her eyes at him warily. "Why do you suddenly care about what my friends say?" she countered with suspicion in her voice.
Tom chuckled in amusement, "I just want to be prepared if your stupid friends decide to assault me."

"They're not stupid," Hermione retorted while she hit him with a withering look.

Tom didn't seem to be concerned by her dark scowl. He just continued to smile at her innocently which caused her level of annoyance to rise a little further. As they entered the next passage way Hermione instantly noticed a group of Ravenclaw girls walking in their direction. They were probably fourth or fifth years. Hermione nearly groaned as she saw the hostile stares some of those girls hit her with. Since she had left the Great Hall she hadn't met other students so she didn't really know what Hogwarts' population thought about her relationship with Tom. But now those Ravenclaw girls gave her an impression of how the other students were reacting to the news. She could see that one or two of the girls were eyeing her and Tom curiously but the rest of them were throwing rather nasty glares Hermione's way. Though she guessed that they would prefer to throw actual curses at her if Tom hadn't been with her right now. Hermione sighed tiredly. That was just the last thing she needed, a bunch of vengeful Tom fan-girls out for her blood. It reminded her of that episode before the break as they all thought she was a crazy stalker who tried to molest Tom.

Thought back then at least her friends had tried to cheer her up. Something they would surely not do again, Hermione realized with a pang of regret. She wasn't really concerned about those misdirected girls. She had already known that a lot of them didn't like her very much but she could live with that. Honestly she had survived worse. A lot worse actually.

No, what really got to her was that look on her friends' faces as she had told them the truth. She just hoped Longbottom would somehow forgive her. She kind of needed him to forgive her because that hurt look on his face had been exactly the expression she had always imagined to be on Harry's or even Ron's face if they could see her now. If Longbottom couldn't forgive her, then her friends from the future would never have accepted her new relationship either. In addition to that she knew it would hurt her if her friends turned away from her. They were always giving her that feeling of normalcy she had lost a long time ago. With them around she could sometimes feel like a normal girl.

As if never been touched by darkness. Hermione shuddered as that thought hit her and she huddled a little closer to Tom while clutching his arm with both her hands. He looked down at her with one eyebrow raised questioningly.

"Didn't go down too well, did it?" he asked her and the slight taunt had by now disappeared from his voice.

"Well, Amarys and Richard were rather understanding," Hermione said softly then she hesitated. "Marc on the other hand…"

"Longbottom?" Tom asked quietly.

Too quiet to be actually true, Hermione thought.

"Yeah, he doesn't like you that much," she said tentatively.

Tom sniggered at that rather darkly then he said, "Really?"

She decided to not comment on that.

It was after a few more corridors that they stood before some well-known, huge wooden doors and Hermione furrowed her brow.

"The Library, Tom?" Hermione asked him somewhat surprised.

He just smirked down at her and stated rather condescendingly, "It's Sunday, dear. Believe me, we will be pretty much alone in there."

Hermione just shrugged and followed him inside. At the entrance she saw Ms Peters sitting at her usual place. Hermione shortly wondered when, if ever, that woman had a day off.

"Ah, Ms DeCerto," Ms Peters exclaimed happily as she spotted Hermione. Then her gaze wandered to Tom standing beside her. "And Mr Riddle. I was wondering when the two worst bookworms of this school would find each other."

"Hello, Ms Peters," Hermione smiled at the librarian.

Then she allowed Tom to drag her into the Library. Hermione was not really surprised that he pulled her in direction of the Restricted Section. Though as they reached the Restricted Section they didn't enter but passed it. Hermione scowled at the Dark Arts books she could see standing in the shelves. She could almost feel the ungodly dark aura they were radiating. Tom seemed to have sensed her displeasure as he now asked,

"Don't like that Section of the Library, do you?"

"No," Hermione replied while she still glared at the Dark Arts books.

He raised an eyebrow at her. "Ms DeCerto not liking books. I am utterly shocked," he said dryly.

Hermione unfixed her eyes from the Dark Arts tomes and looked back at him. Then she said in a quiet voice, "Those books are dangerous."

"I find them fascinating," Tom replied as his gaze traveled shortly over the Restricted Section. Hermione wasn't particularly surprised to hear that but she didn't like his enthusiasm at all.

"I think those books are restricted for a reason," she then told him.

Tom frowned at her. "So you think its okay to limit the access to knowledge?" he asked her while his face was once again covered by this emotionless mask.

She pondered him for a moment then she replied, "If that knowledge is dangerous, then yes."

Tom stared back at her before he stated colourlessly, "I think ignorance is a lot more dangerous than knowledge can ever be."

Hermione looked up at him. In a way, he was right. In a way.

Another few steps and they finally left the gloomy atmosphere of the Restricted Section behind. Tom seemed to head for a huge window on the far end of the Library. It was quite hidden here in the back where normally no student set foot on. They had to step around another shelf full of old, dusty tomes to finally reach the window. Hermione had to agree with Tom's earlier statement. It was very unlikely that anyone would disturb them here. Under the window was a huge wooden windowsill. It looked rather inviting, Hermione decided. The weak rays of the winter sun fell softly through the glass of the huge window. Outside she could see the grounds of Hogwarts which were still covered by a thin layer of white snow while the Great Lake lay glistening in the sun, though its water looked ice cold.

Tom pulled his wand and waved it at the windowsill. Some comfortable looking cushions appeared out of thin air. Then he sat down on the sill and pulled Hermione down with him.
"I often come here to read," Tom told her with a sideways glance.

Thus the close proximity to the Restricted Section? Hermione wondered while she looked at him, though she didn't voice her suspicion. Instead she sat down beside him.

"I am quite surprised by you," Tom said in his teasing voice as she had comfortably snuggled against him.

She raised her eyebrows at him questioningly which only caused a smirk to take form on his face.

"I never really thought you would tell your… friends about me," Tom said casually. "I rather had the impression you were ashamed of me." As an afterthought he added in quite the conceited tone, "And let me tell you, that was something new for me. Any normal girl would parade me through the school."

Hermione narrowed her eyes at him which caused him to chuckle in amusement.

"I am normal!" she blustered before she nudged him.

She was quite surprised as he winced in pain when she punched his arm lightly. Hermione frowned in confusion until she remembered that she had hit him with a cutting hex on that arm. She felt a stab of guilt in her stomach as she watched him rubbing his arm cautiously. She had really lost it last night on the Astronomy Tower, hadn't she? Those had been quite the dangerous curses she had hurled at Tom. If it wasn't for him being such a powerful wizard, she could have caused some serious damage. Hermione slowly looked from Tom's arm back to his face.

"Tom, I… I don't know what came over me yesterday," she mumbled softly. "It was… I was just so angry, and..." She searched for the right words as she stared up into his grey eyes. "It was just too much," she finally whispered.

"Well, at least my skin is still the same colour," Tom taunted while a small smirk curled up the corners of his mouth.

Hermione averted her eyes from him and looked down at her hands. The guilty feeling even intensified as she was again reminded of how she had cursed Nicolls. Back then she had really lost control because she had known that Nicolls wouldn't be able to defend herself.

"Aww, please, Hermione," Tom then said arrogantly. "Don't tell me that you are still feeling guilty about Nicolls."

She looked up at him again and found him smirking. Then he said in a light tone, "You know, this morning in the common room Nicolls seemed to already have forgotten everything about your attack on her. She felt good enough to try to seduce me again."

Hermione's eyes widened and she stared at him.

"She even asked me if I was alright. And if you had hurt me," Tom said in an innocent and conversational tone while even his smirk had left his face.

There was now a look of shock on Hermione's face.

"Don't worry," Tom continued in his most honest voice. "I lied. I told her you would never hurt me."

"What?" Hermione asked weakly.
She stared at Tom with wide eyes while he just looked back at her. His face was carefully arranged into an expression of innocence while his eyes glinted with sincerity. But after a while he couldn't hold back any longer and broke out laughing.

"Really, you Gryffindors are just too gullible," he finally managed to say while still sniggering at her. "I can now fully understand why they put you in that house."

Hermione glared at him angrily. But that didn't stop him from still laughing at her.

Which caused her to huff at him, "I really hate Slytherins."

"But you've only known us for what? A few months?" He smirked down at her. "I'm sure you'll learn to appreciate our fine humour."

The glare she hit him with grew even darker then she said in a low voice, "I don't think so."

Tom didn't seem to be concerned by her rather hostile scowl. Instead the smirk left his face and he now looked at her with a mock-sad expression on his face.

"Still feeling bad about having cursed me?" he asked her in a solemn voice.

"No," Hermione informed him in a clipped tone. "I can suddenly remember why I cursed you."

Tom chuckled again but then she was surprised as there now appeared a smile on his face. This time it was not a smirk but a genuine smile.

"See? You really don't have to feel guilty," he whispered softly.

He smiled at her reassuringly and there was again this tingling feeling in her stomach as she looked up into his startlingly grey eyes. Tom extended a hand towards her and skimmed with his fingers gently over her cheek. The fluttery sensation in her stomach intensified so Hermione decided to follow that feeling and huddled closer against Tom. Then she slung her arms around his neck before she pulled his head down to her. She closed her eyes as she pressed her lips against his. One of her hands wandered up his back and ruffled through his dark hair, thus completely destroying his perfect hairstyle. But Tom didn't seem to mind, pulled her even closer to him and then deepened the kiss.

Hermione panted slightly as they finally broke apart. She snuggled against him and put her head down on his chest. His arms were still gently wrapped around her. They stayed like this for a while and Hermione couldn't have felt more comfortable.

After some time Tom shifted slightly then he asked her in a soft voice, "How do you feel today?"

Hermione looked up at him and found a little bit of concern shining in his grey eyes. She was surprised as she now noticed that Tom looked a little tired.

"Fine," Hermione answered his question in a small voice.

Tom wrapped his arms tighter around her and pressed her against him.

"Maybe I should always sleep in your bed," he then whispered seductively in her ear. "Don't want you to have any more nightmares," he tried to convince her innocently, though Hermione could feel him smirk against her skin before he kissed her on the cheek.

"In fact, why don't you move into the Slytherin dorm?" he continued in his milky voice.

Hermione glanced up at him. He was smirking down at her but she again noticed the tiredness on his "Don't be silly. The gloomy atmosphere would surely drive me nuts," she sneered in a good imitation of Tom, though the amused grin on her face gave her away.

Tom chuckled before he said in a patronizing way, "It's not gloomy. It's sophisticated classiness. But of course, you wouldn't understand."

"Sure," she replied amused. But then she narrowed her eyes at him as he tried to suppress a yawn. He seemed to be really tired. "When did you leave my dorm last night?"

"Hm?" he looked down at her through hooded eyes. "Don't know. Late, I think." He smiled at her.

"You didn't need to stay so long," Hermione said softly.

"But what if you had another nightmare?" Tom taunted gently before he sighed melodramatically. "Whatever would you do without me?"

Hermione leaned back against him and enjoyed the comfortable feeling of his arms wrapped around her. It even let her ignore his light mock. After a while she asked, "How did you get up the jinxed stairs to the girls' dorms anyway?"

Tom didn't reply anything.

"Tom?" she asked and then slightly turned her head to look up at him as he still didn't answer.

His eyes were closed and he leaned against the window frame while his arms were still looped around her. Hermione smiled as she scanned him. Obviously he had been more tired than he had admitted. She flexed her wrist and her black wand landed in her hand. Then she waved the wand at the shelf of books standing not far away from their window. Instantly an ancient looking book with gilt edges soared towards her. Hermione caught it and read its title: Magical Flora and Fauna of the West Indies. She didn't want to wake up Tom so she suppressed a chuckle as she read the title. That just fitted too well into her previous, far-fetched escape plans.

She could still feel Tom's arms around her as she opened the book. The content smile never left her face as she started to read.

"I can't believe she's together with that freak," Longbottom huffed furiously.

"Yeah, I'm surprised myself," Lupin admitted as he looked up from the book he had been reading in.

"Do you think he hexed her?" Longbottom asked while he looked with raised eyebrows at Lupin. "Maybe he confunded her and she doesn't really want to be with him."

Lupin sighed at his friend's hopeful expression. "No. She didn't appear to have been hexed."

Longbottom leaned angrily back against the sofa he was sitting on. Then he continued to glare furiously at nothing in particular and mumbled angrily away to himself.

After a while he lost his temper again and burst out, "She can't be serious. Riddle's a creep. An evil creep. How can she like him? After all the things he did."

A few other Gryffindors threw curious glances Longbottom's way. The three friends were currently sitting in the Gryffindor common room and Longbottom was still more than angry about finding out about Hermione and Riddle.

"Well, we can't do anything about that," Weasley said softly thus trying to calm his friend down.

He stiffened as Longbottom now glared angrily at him. "She can't have forgotten all the things Riddle did to her before the break," he hissed enraged. "I mean he tried to ruin her reputation. And then that disgusting snake even threatened her."

"Yeah," Weasley conceded. "But she told us that she met Riddle during the break. Maybe he apologized to her."

Longbottom just drowned Weasley in an incredulous look. "Like that git would ever apologize to anyone!" he bellowed irately. "And even if, how can she forgive him?"

"Well, whether he apologized or not, obviously Hermione has forgiven him," Lupin said in a collected voice. "Think about it, Marc, Riddle never tried to curse her or really hurt her. Hermione barely knows him for a few months. She has no reason to hate him."

Longbottom now glowered darkly at Lupin who just continued to look back at him stoically.

Then Longbottom spat at him bitingly, "Never tried to hurt her? You haven't seen what happened during Slughorn's party."

Lupin raised his eyebrows in question at him so Longbottom continued his rant.

"Back then I've only left Hermione for a few minutes but when I found her again Riddle had already cornered her. And he had grabbed her by her wrist!" Longbottom clamoured furiously. "I'm sure he was about to hit her. There was this evil glint in his eyes."

"Are you really sure?" Lupin asked unbelieving as he frowned at Longbottom. "I just don't think Hermione would let anyone treat her that way."

Longbottom threw his arms up in frustration. "You know Riddle! He's an evil bastard!" he exclaimed rabidly. "What can Hermione do against him? She's just too nice."

Then Longbottom continued to badmouth Riddle while he started to question Hermione's soundness of mind. His two best friends tried to calm him down a little. But the blond Gryffindor was just too enraged to listen to them. He was really angry with Hermione.

After some time the three of them saw Hermione enter the common room. Her eyes quickly darted to the three boys sitting on the sofa. She hesitated shortly but before she could walk over to them, Longbottom looked away from her pointedly and crossed his arms before his chest. A sad expression crept on her face as he was ignoring her. Then Hermione turned towards the stairs and continued her way to the dorm. All the while she completely ignored the curious glances the other occupants of the room were throwing her way.

Hermione felt horrible as she made her way to her dorm. Obviously Longbottom was not going to forgive her anytime soon. That angry and even disappointed expression on his face had told her so. As she entered her dorm she instantly retrieved Peverell's manuscript from her trunk, flopped down on her bed and quickly drew the covers shut around her before her dorm mates could storm into the room and start to question her. Then she eyed the book lying in her lap. Was this her only hope? Or something that could spoil her happiness? She wasn't sure anymore what it meant. Her thoughts wandered back to the Library. She had felt so comfortable as she had sat there snuggled against Tom. It was such a nice feeling having him around.
Hermione's fingers skimmed over the old leather binding of the book. After they had left the Library again she had told Tom that she still had some homework to do for History of Magic and that was why she needed to return to her dorm. It had been a lie. Her essay for professor Binns was already lying finished on the table beside her bed. There was no essay she had to write, there was only this thing, Hermione thought as she looked down at the small book in her lap. She felt guilty for having to lie to Tom but she also felt guilty because she had neglected the book for so long. It still was her mission to somehow find a way back in her proper time period, wasn't it? Still, she was loath to continue that book. After she had finally achieved to steal it during the break that book had seemed to be her last chance to find a way home where she belonged. Now it was just an irksome remainder of a duty she still had to fulfill but slowly began to question.

Hermione sighed as she slowly opened the book. Then she reluctantly began to read. Peverell's way of describing magic annoyed her now. It was complicated and just unintelligible. Hermione read for some time until again she came upon one of his personal notes. As she read it she instantly understood the importance of the entry. She would have been excited by it before, now it only scared her.

After I racked my brain for weeks and weeks I finally decided on the object I would create to win the challenge between my brothers and I. I needed it to be powerful and deeply magical. There is really only one thing that is nearly as powerful as a magician himself and that is the wand he uses. So I decided to create an entirely new kind of magical object by combining the venerable craft of wand making and the art of creating magical objects. Now that I have seen the possibilities I know that those two formidable arts belong together. They are so similar and yet so different. They complete each other and seem to be nothing without the other. My brothers will be very astound when we will meet in nearly a year time, because I will surely win our challenge. I have set my mind on creating the perfect magical object, bound to be the most powerful creation ever made.

I will create an unbeatable wand.

With a loud thud Hermione hastily closed the book. Her breathing was quickened as she stared down at the book in her hands. As she read Peverell's last words she realized that subconsciously she had been hoping for some time now that the book was a dead end. She lifted it up with a trembling hand. While she tried to suppress that lump of guilt in her stomach she got up from her bed and hid Peverell's manuscript again in that secret compartment in her trunk.

I'm going to read it later, she promised herself, though she knew damn well that there was no real reason why she didn't continue the book now.

"I can't believe he wants to spend time with that ugly trollop!" Lestrange exclaimed loudly.

"I dunno about the trollop," Avery sniggered darkly. "But she's not that ugly, is she?"

"You've gotta be kidding me," Lestrange hissed at him. "Her hair looks like a pot scraper and she's totally insolent."

"She just needs someone showing her her place," Avery countered. "If you know what I mean," he added while winking in a dirty way.

"DeCerto still is one insufferable Gryffindor," Alba threw in the conversation angrily.

His magic was still damaged due to the fact that Riddle had thrown that dark curse at him after he found out they attacked DeCerto. Alba still held that against DeCerto.
What a bunch of idiots, Malfoy thought as he followed the other boys’ ranting. He really couldn't understand how those fools dared to doubt Riddle's decisions like that. If he ever found out, they were in big trouble. A small smirk appeared on Malfoy's face and he turned back to the book in his hands. He had no intention of participating in that potentially dangerous conversation.

"I'm sure Riddle's just playing around with her," Avery said slowly.

"Of course he is," Lestrange sneered at him. "But surely he can find someone better than her."

Malfoy suppressed an evil snigger as he heard that. Was that stupid prick trying to get himself killed? If Riddle ever found out about this, Lestrange would be in so much trouble.

Currently they were all sitting in the sixth years' dorm. They often did that when they felt the need to discuss things they didn't want the other Slytherins to hear. No-one of the other students would dare to burst into the room they knew Tom Riddle was living in. Today Malfoy had come here to have a bit quiet and finish his book. Unfortunately, his dorm mates as well as Avery who was a seven year had decided to force their annoying presence on him. Malfoy was sitting in one of the armchairs while the other three boys lounged on the sofa right beside him. So it was rather impossible for Malfoy to ignore their conversation.

Right now they were discussing Riddle's newest fling. Malfoy himself had been rather surprised, to say the least, as he had seen Riddle snogging that Gryffindor girl in the middle of the Great Hall. He had not been surprised by the act in itself but more by the girl. DeCerto just didn't seem to be a girl Riddle would like. Lestrange had been right after all. DeCerto was certainly not the prettiest of girls in Hogwarts and she really was incredibly impudent. Then again she had managed to beat those idiotic boys single handedly, Malfoy remembered as his eyes wandered back to the boys sitting on the sofa. Not that he thought those gits were really powerful opponents to begin with. But still, DeCerto seemed to be quite gifted for a witch. Riddle had always been interested in power. DeCerto certainly was intriguing. Malfoy remembered that day before the Christmas break as they had cornered DeCerto and then dragged her to the Forbidden Forest. Back then Riddle had hit her with the Cruciatus curse but the girl had still refused to tell him what he wanted to know. Malfoy knew how it felt to be hit by the Torture curse. He shuddered as he remembered that unbearable pain. He had been a little impressed by DeCerto then. Riddle was very intimidating when he really wanted to extract information from someone. But DeCerto had never caved in. Malfoy had no idea what it was Riddle wanted her to tell him but obviously he had changed his strategy now. He wasn't going to take the information by force but tried to pry it from her. That had to be the reason he had so suddenly started to seduce her. Malfoy had to admit that he was quite impressed by Riddle's ability to charm girls. After all Riddle had hit that Gryffindor girl with the Cruciatus curse. It was a miracle that she now allowed him to kiss her. Obviously Riddle could get away with everything.

"That slag really needs to be put in place," Lestrange continued to badmouth DeCerto.

Avery laughed filthily and a rather evil smirk appeared on his face, "I would really enjoy to be the one to make her scream."

Alba looked at him in disgust, "You're twisted. There's no way I would touch that ugly cunt. You don't even know where she comes from."

"What do you mean?" Lestrange asked.

"I mean did you ever hear of any DeCertos before?" Alba replied in a snobbish tone. "I'm sure she's just a dirty mugglewhore."

"You think she's a Mudblood?" Lestrange asked while a disgusted expression appeared on his face.
"At least we cannot rule out that possibility," Alba drawled.

Malfoy shook his head as he heard the new direction their conversation had taken. Now this was really dangerous. They were insinuating that Riddle spent time with a Mudblood. Malfoy knew that Riddle would do a lot of things if he thought they would help him gain whatever he wanted. He was quite the manipulative bastard after all. But even if he tried to get information from DeCerto, Riddle would never touch her if she were a Mudblood. Riddle hated all Muggleborns and Muggles with a passion. Even Malfoy, who had grown up in a rather prejudiced family, had been surprised by the aversion Riddle held for Muggles. Malfoy assumed that Riddle hated them because he had had to grow up in a filthy Muggle orphanage. Riddle would still curse anyone who brought up this family background of his. Malfoy could understand that he tried to hush up that embarrassing part of his life. Malfoy shuddered as he remembered what Riddle had done to the poor soul who had last tried to ridicule his parentage. He still wondered how Riddle had managed to come out of that one without a stain on his clean slate.

To sum it up, yes, Riddle was a little… touchy when it came to his parentage. Malfoy was pretty sure that Riddle was no Mudblood even if he had to grow up amongst Muggles. He couldn't prove it but he was quite convinced that Riddle was the Heir of Slytherin. Those attacks on Mudbloods last year were just Riddle's style. But if Riddle really was the Heir of Slytherin, then he was also responsible for the death of that girl last year. So Riddle didn't even shy away from murder. Not that Malfoy was really surprised.

Malfoy's eyes slowly wandered over the group of boys sitting on the sofa. They really shouldn't talk like that about DeCerto. Not when Riddle was interested in her.

"I would so like to curse that disgusting girl," Lestrange hissed rather darkly.

You already tried that, idiot. Didn't work out as you planned, did it? Malfoy sneered at the other boy in his mind.

"After Riddle loses interest in her we could have our fun with her," Avery proposed in a low voice.

Malfoy doubted he was only talking about cursing the girl. Avery had quite the warped mind. But he didn't really care what Avery wanted to do to DeCerto so Malfoy turned back to his book.

"I really hope you are not talking about Hermione here." Malfoy stiffened as he heard a quiet but all the same icy cold voice. "For your own sakes," the voice added with dark amusement.

Malfoy dared to look up from his book and found Riddle standing by the door of the common room. He could see that Riddle had carefully arranged his features into a mask of boredom but there still was a murderous glimmer shining in his eyes.

"So, my choice doesn't meet your standards?" Riddle asked in a light, almost conversational voice while he strode over to the small sitting area in the dorm.

His gaze swiftly wandered over the three boys sitting on the sofa and as Malfoy saw that disturbing cold glint in Riddle's eyes he was glad that he hadn't participated in the previous conversation. He barely dared to breathe as Riddle had finally reached them and sat down in one of the chairs opposite from him. Luckily Riddle didn't pay Malfoy any attention but faced the other boys.

Malfoy dared to carefully glimpse at Riddle. He sat casually in the chair and looked with mild interest at the three boys. Malfoy wasn't fooled by Riddle's show of nonchalance. There were unmistakably traces of his dark magic in the air. As Riddle's gaze wandered slowly over the boys in front of him there appeared a vicious glint in his steel hard eyes.
"I had hoped you would take my little rebuke at heart," Riddle now said in his strangely light tone which made the hairs on the back of Malfoy's neck stand on end.

"Especially you, Lestrange," Riddle continued and there now was an evil smirk on his face as his hard gaze swept over Lestrange's bandaged hand.

"We would never doubt your choices," Lestrange chocked out in fear.

"Hmmm…" Made Riddle and the lack of emotion on his face was quite frightening.

"She… she's a Gryffindor," Alba finally and very stupidly blurted out what probably everyone of them was thinking.

Malfoy could see a dangerous crimson tinge appear in Riddle's eyes as they flashed at Alba, though he still managed to reign in his obviously angry magic.

"So what?" Riddle hissed.

For once Alba showed a little common sense and remained silent as he stared in fear at Riddle but avoided to meet the other's eyes.

"Do you think I care about what that stupid sorting hat says?" Riddle spat and his authoritative voice was tinted with cold anger now. "Which, by the way, was created by that same Gryffindor you so despise."

He continued to stare at the boys and there was now a deathly cold glint in his eyes. The other Slytherins squirmed uncomfortably in their seats. But no-one dared to say anything as they were suddenly hit by that raw magic Riddle seemed to emanate.

Malfoy inhaled deeply and tried to suppress the upcoming fear. Riddle sat elegantly on the chair as if he had no concern in the world but his hate and malice was flowing from him in form of his vicious magic. Malfoy gulped nervously as his eyes glided inconspicuously over Riddle's form. He wondered how Riddle managed to maintain that front of the perfect and innocent student in the eyes of the staff when he was in fact the most dangerous wizard Malfoy had ever met. And he had met a few of them back in his father's manor, even some of Grindelwald's closest followers. The fact that Riddle's halo never slipped in front of others made him even more intimidating.

Malfoy flinched as Riddle suddenly leaned forwards in his chair.

"I think I was really indulgent with you so far." Riddle's voice was now a whisper but that didn't dim the fearsome tint in it. "Haven't I already told you in a very nice way to stay away from Hermione?"

Malfoy was very disturbed as he could see that Riddle had drawn his wand now and twirled it elegantly through his fingers.

"But you impose on my kindness and insist in troubling her, don't you?" Riddle inquired and by now his voice had completely lost the light touch it had at the beginning of this conversation. It was a hiss with an edge of malice in his tone.

"No, no," Avery whined and there was now panic in his voice. "We would never go against your word!"

"Yes, that is what you say now," Riddle replied and there appeared a dark and sinister smile on his face. "But I think a little reminder is in order? So you don't forget who is in command here."
Malfoy then saw Riddle waving his wand. Even though Riddle did the spell nonverbal Malfoy had recognized the wand movement. It was obviously a Silencing spell which now spanned around the dorm. Riddle didn't want anyone to hear what was going on in the dorm it seemed. Again Malfoy was very glad that he hadn't taken part in the other boys stupid ranting as now the furious dark magic Riddle emanated even intensified.

"Now, I don't want you to scare away any first years with your screaming and begging, would I?" Riddle explained amused as he could see the fear in the eyes of the three boys in front of him. The lack of any emotion in his voice other than this cruel amusement was disturbing.

Riddle slowly got up from his seat and started to calmly pace in front of the other boys. He seemed to be totally at ease and was rather enjoying the whole situation as a sick smirk twisted up his features. All the while Malfoy could feel Riddle's magic crackling around him forcefully, now and then angrily lashing out for the three Slytherins on the sofa. Finally the fear radiating from those three had escalated so far that Malfoy could almost feel it in the air. He nearly jumped as his eyes wandered back to Riddle and he now saw a feral smile curling up the corners of his mouth. Then Riddle raised his wand and pointed it at Alba. Alba stiffened in fear as he saw that pale wand aimed at him.

"Please, I'm sorry," Alba whined panicky. "I would never disobey you."

Riddle just chuckled eerily. The fearsome red gleam in his cold eyes intensified then he hissed in a vicious tone,

"Crucio."

Hermione woke up the next day and it already started horribly. As she crawled out of her four-poster she was greeted by her dorm mates. Lucia and Rose were sitting on Lucia's pink bed while Diana and Violet stood nearby. All of them wore expressions of curiosity on their faces. Hermione really didn't have to guess what exactly they wanted to discuss right now. Yesterday she had slipped back into the common room without talking to anybody. She had even avoided her friends or, more precisely, Longbottom. She knew it was rather cowardly but she somehow was afraid to face Longbottom again. He had been really angry with her as he had found out about her and Tom.

But right now, she had other problems as her four dorm mates still fixed her with their inquisitive stares. Hermione just stared back at them, unwilling to give them any information voluntarily.

After a while of staring at each other Rose asked her with barely suppressed nosiness, "So, slept well without your Prince Charming?"

Yep, they definitely wanted to squeeze more information out of her, Hermione thought frustrated. She looked at Rose with raised eyebrows.

Actually no. I always need a man in my bed to feel well. That was what Hermione wanted to tell them, just to see their faces. It would be hilarious.

Instead Hermione sighed and replied politely, "Yes, thank you."

"Ha, we knew you would become his new girlfriend," Lucia all but squealed in delight. "You are such a lucky girl"

"Yeah!" Rose contributed to the conversation. "You've been here for just a few months. But you managed to get what every girl here wants."
Hermione just frowned at her. She very much doubted that any girl would want to be stuck in this moral dilemma she was in right now.

"You allowed Riddle to kiss you in front of the Great Hall," Viola stated in her gruff tone. "That was rather daring, don't you think?"

Hermione was confused by Viola's comment. Though Longbottom had said something similar yesterday. Why was it such a big thing that Tom had kissed her in public? Hermione wondered while she tried to hold her own against those inquisitive stares she was still hit with.

"You really shouldn't have done that." Hermione's eyes wandered to Diana and she was again mesmerized by those emerald green eyes, Harry's eyes. "If a teacher had seen you, you would have been in trouble," Diana chided in her soft voice while she scanned Hermione concerned.

"Aw, Diana. Don't spoil everything," Rose exclaimed. Then she took one of Lucia's pink pillows and hugged it against her chest while there appeared a glassy look in her eyes. "That was just perfect, how he kissed her. Sooo romantic."

Lucia nodded eagerly while she broke down in giggles. Hermione on the other hand was starting to feel sick. That was just a tad bit too much girls' talk for her to stomach. So she turned away from her dorm mates and opened her trunk. A sick feeling of guilt tore at her as her gaze glided over the part of her trunk where she knew the Peverell manuscript was hidden in. She hadn't continued reading the book yesterday despite the fact that she had had plenty of time to do so. Well, she couldn't read it now, Hermione reasoned with herself. Not with all her dorm mates around and by the way today was Monday. She had to go to the classes. So she just pulled her uniform out of the trunk before she walked over to the bathroom.

Unfortunately Hermione didn't really manage to escape her dorm mates. They insisted in accompanying her down to the Great Hall. All the while they were chattering happily about Hermione and her new relationship. But during the last few months Hermione had grown quite proficient in blocking out their annoying voices. Though that didn't help her to heighten her spirits as now her thoughts wandered back to the book lying in her trunk.

They passed the Gryffindor common room and Hermione wasn't really surprised that she was hit by many curious and a few hostile stares. She could see no way to evade the other students any longer. Now that she walked the crowded corridors of the castle in direction to the Great Hall she realized that Hogwarts buzzed with the newest rumour. Though now that Tom had kissed her in the Great Hall Hermione doubted that it could be classified as a rumour anymore. Whatever her relationship with Tom was, it seemed to be the most favourite gossip topic in the school. Hermione could almost feel the stares following her wherever she went. Some of them were just curious whereas others would be better described as glares. Evil dark glares actually.

As she arrived in the Great Hall and had her breakfast it got even worse. Obviously it wasn't only the Slytherin and Gryffindor students who were interested in her new relationship but the other houses as well. Hermione got a little irritated by the constant stares. She glanced at Tom's direction but couldn't find him at his table. She wondered where he was but then decided to end her breakfast early as she couldn't eat anyway with all those curious eyes around her.

It was a mystery to her why her relationship with Tom had caused such an uproar. Obviously it wasn't only the Slytherin and Gryffindor students who were interested in her new relationship but the other houses as well. Hermione got a little irritated by the constant stares. She glanced at Tom's direction but couldn't find him at his table. She wondered where he was but then decided to end her breakfast early as she couldn't eat anyway with all those curious eyes around her.
"Morning," Lupin greeted her and Hermione couldn't help but notice that concerned glint in his eyes as he looked at her.

"Good morning," she mumbled awkwardly.

Then she glanced at Longbottom. He still sat at the table and ignored her as best as he could, Hermione noted sadly. Obviously Lupin had noticed where she had looked at as the pity in his eyes intensified.

"He's not going to talk to me again, is he?" Hermione asked in a soft voice.

"He's just disappointed, Hermione," Lupin replied.

"I'm sure he'll get over it," Weasley tried to cheer her up while he smiled at her encouragingly. Hermione could see the doubt in his eyes.

"Why didn't you tell us about Riddle before?" Lupin suddenly asked her reproachfully.

Hermione bit her lip as she stared at him then she said in a small voice, "I just wasn't sure about it myself. And… I didn't want you to be angry with me."

Lupin sighed then he said while he eyed Longbottom, "Well, that is exactly what you managed."

Hermione looked down at her feet and whispered, "I'm sorry."

She raised her head as she felt a hand on her shoulder. Lupin looked down at her and she could again see that concern in his eyes.

"No need to apologize," he told her gently. "We're just worried about you. I know most teachers and students think Riddle is a nice guy." He paused shortly as if he tried to find the right words to soften the blow then he said in a grave tone, "But there is something wrong with him. I think you should be really careful around him. Riddle is dangerous."

Hermione stared at him. What could she reply to something like this? That Tom was not dangerous at all? That would have been a lie. And there were already enough lies in her life as it was.

"You don't need to worry," she said and opted to be as truthful as she could be under the circumstances. "Tom's not going to do anything to me."

There was again the doubt on both her friends' faces as they eyed her concerned. They obviously thought that either Tom was using her to gain something or that he was just playing a cruel game with her. Judging from Tom's behaviour up until now Hermione could see where their concern came from.

"We just don't want you to get hurt," Weasley said softly.

Hermione cast him a small smile. "I'll be careful," she insured, trying to assuage their concern.

Later Hermione was on her way to the Potions class room. On her own, she realized with a pang. Longbottom had still not spoken one word with her. Weasley and Lupin had wanted to accompany her to the class room. But Hermione had known that Longbottom would never join them if they were with her. She really didn't want to take away his best friends. The other reason was that both of them would every so often glance at her with a concerned frown on their faces and then sigh. They were apparently thinking she was making the biggest mistake of her life by staying with Tom – which she probably was but she didn't need them to remind her of that. So she had told Weasley and Lupin that she would walk alone to potions. She slowly regretted that now as she was rather exposed to all those stares following her. So she was glad as she arrived in the dungeons and the Potions class room. She stepped into the room and was again hit with nasty glares.

Out of the pan and straight into the fire, she thought dryly as she slowly made her way to her seat.

Most of the other students already sat on their places. Hermione's eyes quickly darted to her Gryffindor friends' table. Lupin looked back at her curiously as if he still tried to understand her decision. At least there was no hate in his gaze. Weasley who sat right beside Lupin looked at her a little compassionately. Hermione cast the both of them a small hesitant smile. As her eyes wandered from them to Longbottom her stomach flopped and the smile on her face quickly died down. Longbottom had his eyes narrowed at her and she could see the suppressed anger in them. He seemed to be enraged by her pure presence. As Hermione stared at him she suddenly heard a hard voice coming from behind her,

"So there you are dirty whore."

Hermione turned around and looked at the group of Slytherin girls sitting at the back of the class room. They all glared at her evilly.

"The nerve of you!" one of the girls spat at her aggressively. Hermione recognized her. It was Susan Yaxley and she had never liked Hermione. "You come from Merlin knows where and have the impudence to steal our men. And don't think we don't know about what you did to Melanie, bitch."

Hermione raised her eyebrows at the girl's apparent disgust. She really seemed to hate her. Though it was rather ridiculous what she suggested. It sounded as if she had forced Tom to stay with her.

"You're just jealous, Yaxley." Hermione frowned at Rose who now stared at Yaxley triumphantly. "Because a Gryffindor is now Riddle's girlfriend and not one of you snake-women."

Hermione didn't know if she should cry or laugh now. It was so absurd. Those girls were quite the nuisance. She didn't really care what the girls thought about her so she just turned away from them and continued her way towards her seat. All the while she ignored that heated discussion which had now broken loose between Slytherin and Gryffindor girls.

Hermione could feel her stomach clench as she realized that this time neither of her friends had defended her. Something they normally would have done. She glimpsed in their direction and Hermione's heart sank as she found Longbottom staring out of the window. He seemed to really insist on ignoring her. She felt a little better as she saw that Lupin and Weasley cast her encouraging smiles. But obviously they, too, thought that she had to solve her little popularity problem alone.

Hermione sighed softly as she sat down at her table which wasn't that pleasant an experience as she shared it with Malfoy. He already sat at the table with an empty seat between the both of them. Hermione tried to ignore Malfoy's eerie and calculating glances while she wondered where Tom was. She retrieved her things from her school bag and arranged them on the table. Then she reached for her potions text book and began to read, all the while she tried to ignore the other students and the whispered conversations that were going on around her.

Tom still sat in the Slytherin common room and he knew he would have to skip breakfast if he wanted to be on time for potions. But still this thing here was more important, he decided as he stared down at the Auror report. The word 'confidential' was written in red letters across the front of the thin folder but Tom ignored it completely and flipped through the pages. Malfoy had handed him the report this morning. Obviously his contacts into the Auror department had been successful and Malfoy had managed to complete the task Tom had given him last. Not that Malfoy had another option. Tom never accepted failure. Malfoy would have regretted it very much if he had disappointed Tom.

Last week Tom had ordered Malfoy to find out everything he could about that theft which occurred in Nicolas Flamel's flat. Tom had read about the theft in an article in the Daily Prophet. It had caught his eye because there were quite a few odd coincidences that made Tom suspect Hermione had broken into Flamel's flat. Finally, Malfoy could present him some results. It wasn't much but enough.

Tom turned the next page over. There he found a list of the objects that had been stolen from Flame's flat. It wasn't a long list. According to the report the only thing stolen during the theft was a book written by one Ignotus Peverell. Tom's eyes widened as he read that name. He, of course, knew who Peverell was. He was a legend in magical history. One of the greatest wizards ever. A book written by Peverell himself was nothing short of invaluable. Tom wondered longingly what wonders of magic would be stowed inside of the pages of that book.

As exciting as that discovery was Tom continued to skip through the Auror report until his eyes landed on the witnesses' statements. Those people hadn't seen the actual crime but could at least tell the Aurors who had entered the house during the time the theft took place. As Tom scanned the list of the witnesses he frowned. Only Muggles! he thought disgusted but he still read the statements. It seemed that some of the witnesses had seen a bunch of dark cloaked men entering Flamel's flat around the time the theft must have taken place. That information was intriguing. Tom remembered how Hermione had been hunted by men clad in black as he had met her for the first time during the Christmas break. That had been the day Flamel had been robbed. As Tom read on he came upon something that was really interesting. It seemed that one of the witnesses had seen a woman entering the house. He described the woman as young with long curly brown hair.

Tom sat back in the Slytherin sofa while a small smirk appeared on his face.

Finally all the clues and his suspicions came together. He had been right! He'd known it since he had read that article in the Daily Prophet. Here it was, the evidence. The sighting of that strange woman combined with the black cloaked men finally turned his previous assumption into fact. The day the theft had taken place Tom had run into Hermione in the vicinity of Flamel's flat while she had been hunted by men in dark cloaks.

It was Hermione. She broke into Flamel's flat. Judging by the hostile behaviour of the men in black, she had also managed to steal the book written by Peverell. Tom's eyes glided again over the Auror report lying in front of him. The question remained to be why Hermione had stolen the book. That girl was just full of secrets, it seemed. Tom intended to solve them all.

It was some time later that he entered the Potions class room. The Auror report was safely stowed away in the Slytherin dorm but Tom's thoughts still swirled around this new discovery of his. So as he stepped into the class room his eyes instantly darted to Hermione. Right now she sat at their table and was occupied with arranging her potion supplies. Her curly hair was falling into her face as she leaned over the wooden box. Involuntarily a small smile appeared on his face as his eyes wandered over her. Since he knew Hermione she had always been full of secrets. It certainly was a challenge to uncover them all. Tom didn't doubt that in the end he would surely solve them all.

Sadly the Peverell problem was just one of her many secrets, Tom decided as his gaze wandered slowly over her form. She had always been a mystery, bursting with secrets and half-truths. The longer he knew her, though, the more secrets he managed to uncover. She had even willingly given some of them away. It had shocked him quite a bit as she had unveiled that she had had to fight in a war. Granted she hadn't told him much but she had nevertheless shared a little of her past with him. At the very least now he knew why there sometimes was so much grief and sorrow in Hermione's hazel eyes. He didn't like the reason at all.

His furious magic died down as he again scanned her, still sitting at the table. She hadn't noticed him yet. Somehow Tom was glad that she had told him a little about her past. He knew it meant she finally started to trust him. He was pretty sure that she had told no-one but him about her past. Not even her so-called friends knew about it, he thought a little haughtily as his eyes darted briefly to the three Gryffindor boys.

She trusts me, Tom thought satisfied as his gaze wandered back to Hermione. As he looked at her this avidly feeling was back again. He wanted to possess her. The urge to own her was still as demanding as ever. The greed always ripped at him. Now that she was his girlfriend Tom knew the bond between them had solidified. She belonged to him and he was never going to let her go again.

Though now that he looked at her Tom had to admit that aside from the greed there was something else. It was strange and completely alien to him. He had consciously noticed it for the first time as she had broken down the night after the Quidditch match. She had seemed to be so desperate and frightened then. As he had seen her in this vulnerable state Tom had found himself wanting to console her. He had wanted to protect her. Tom had never before felt the need to comfort or protect another person. He had never cared about anybody but himself. Though now, that seemed to have changed slightly. He had yet to decide if that new feeling of his was a good or bad thing.

As he looked at Hermione he suddenly noticed an angry frown between her eyebrows. She seemed to be a little irritated, annoyed even. Tom had an inkling of why she seemed to be a little aggravated. He had noticed all this chatter going on around him after all. But he was quite satisfied that aside from that anger Hermione seemed to be okay. She didn't appear to be tired or exhausted this morning. That meant she obviously didn't have another of her nightmares. Tom was relieved. He didn't want her to have to go through all those horrible dreams.

Here I go again with wanting to protect her, he realized somewhat amused.

Though that wasn't going to stop him to try to solve her many secrets. She hadn't told him anything about Peverell's book after all. Whatever Tom felt towards her he wasn't going to tolerate her tendency to have her secrets from him. And if she wasn't willing to tell him, well, then it seemed he had to find out himself, Tom decided as he continued his way towards her.

Hermione tried to sort her potions ingredients so she had something to occupy her with and didn't need to pay attention to the other students in the room. She just rummaged through her dried salamander tails as she felt someone sitting down beside her. She looked up and found Tom smirking down at her.

"Good morning," he purred at her with his smooth voice.

"Mornin'," Hermione replied rather unenthusiastically. Though she was really glad he was here now. At the very least he had stopped that stupid chatter.

Tom arched one eyebrow elegantly before he said with a good amount of sarcasm in his tone, "You are quite the sunshine today, aren't you?"

Hermione ignored that but asked him reproachfully, "Why are you so late?"

Tom didn't comment on her irritated tone but replied, "I had to sign-in for the apparition lessons."
Then he leaned casually back in his chair and eyed Hermione amused before he scoffed, "You know, I completely forgot about it because I had to convince this stubborn Gryffindor girl that I am irresistible."

Hermione narrowed her eyes and glared at him darkly. Then something struck her and she started to giggle. She leaned in to Tom, which caused some of the girls sitting in the class room and Longbottom to stare at her angrily. Then Hermione whispered teasingly in Tom's ear,

"Does that mean the powerful Tom Riddle doesn't know how to apparate?"

Tom frowned down at her which only caused the smirk on Hermione's face to widen. Obviously she had been right.

"What about you then, my dear?" Tom jibed. "You never showed me your apparition licence. Did you even got one before you started to apparate people around against their will?"

"Of cou-" Hermione started dismissively before she stopped herself. Well, she did have a licence though that was dated to the year of 1996. It wouldn't be exactly a good idea to show Tom her licence, would it?

She glanced at Tom. He was still looking in expectation at her with an annoyingly innocent smile on his face.

"I never took the test," Hermione mumbled grudgingly.

Tom just tsked at her in a reprimanding way before he turned away and started to get his things from his school bag.

"As if you never broke any rules," she hissed at him.

Which only made him chuckle infuriatingly as he placed his quill and parchment neatly on the table. Fortunately for Tom, as Hermione now really wanted to hex that smirk off his face, professor Slughorn entered the class room. He smiled widely at his students as he made his way towards his desk.

"Good morning, good morning," he greeted them with his booming voice. "How very nice to see you all again after such a long break."

Hermione watched how he now pulled his wand and swiftly waved it at the blackboard behind him. Instantly white letters appeared. She took in a sharp breath of air and her hands grabbed the edge of the table tightly as she read the instructions for the potion they would brew next. She had totally forgotten about that! Her head began to swirl and her eyes darted nervously towards Tom and then back to the blackboard. But the writing was still there.

"Are you alright?" Hermione stiffened as she heard a gentle voice whisper to her.

"Y..yes," she mumbled softly but avoided it to look at Tom.

Luckily he couldn't question her further as now Slughorn said in his cheerful voice,

"As promised, we will now start to brew the Ortus Potion. It is quite the difficult potion-" Hermione could hear some groans coming from the Gryffindor side of the class room."-but I am sure most of you will succeed."

Here the professor winked at her and Tom. Hermione nearly rolled her eyes at his enthusiasm. For the first time ever she wanted to fail a class.

The Ortus Potion! How could that have escaped her mind? The stupid thing could very well be her downfall. She remembered how she had researched that potion before the break. It was an age revealing potion, which was in itself not the problem. The real disaster was that the Ortus Potion didn't determine the age of a person but the actual date of birth. That was really bad. Fatal, if anything. For Hermione's birthday was in 1979.

She had no idea what would happen if the potion was run with her blood. Maybe it would really reveal the year she was born in. Then everybody would know that she was in fact from the future. Or the potion would simply not bear any results at all if run with her blood. That would be more than suspicious as Hermione knew that the Ortus Potion was a very reliable potion. It was a catch-22 situation.

"-you know what to do then." Hermione had completely drowned out professor Slughorn's voice as she had gone straight into her panic attack but now she tried to listen to him again. "Today we start simple, with just brewing the foundation of the potion. The instructions are on the board," Slughorn said as he gestured at the black board behind him. "You may begin."

What to do now, what to do now? Hermione thought frantically as she pulled her wand and shakily waved it to ignite the fire under the cauldron. Somehow she must have waved it a tad bit too much as now her text book, lying on the table, caught fire. Tom pulled his own wand and brandished it quickly at the book. The flames instantly died down. Then Hermione could see how he eyed her with suspicion. At least she was convinced that glint in his eyes was suspicion. He could probably see right through her, she thought panicky.

"You sure you are alright?" Tom asked her concerned.

"Why wouldn't I be?" Hermione replied and really hoped she had managed to ban all the panic from her voice.

Tom continued to look at her and now there was a dangerous frown between his eyebrows.

"Normally you don't set your surroundings on fire," he stated slowly. "At least not accidentally."

"Er… well… I'm just a little over-enthusiastic this morning?" Hermione said in a suspiciously shrill tone.

"Hmm." Tom didn't seem to be very convinced and Hermione squirmed as he continued to hit her with his inquisitive stare.

She breathed out relieved as he then turned away from her and started to light the fire himself. She pretended to read the instructions on the blackboard as her thoughts ran wild in her head.

Calm down, Granger! she told herself.

There was no need to panic like this. At least not yet. To brew the Ortus Potion would take a lot of time, probably the best part of the second semester. So there was still time. She just needed to somehow find a way out of this. She quickly glimpsed at Tom who now started to cut the toadstools. She needed to proceed really cautiously if she didn't want him to notice anything. Tom was terribly perceptive.

For the rest of the lesson Hermione tried to come up with something to ruin that stupid potion. Consecutively she couldn't concentrate on brewing the foundation of the potion and was no help at all. Her clumsiness caused Tom to frown at her a lot. Which caused Hermione to be even more jumpy and that led to quite a few accidents like the one with her text book.

So Hermione was very glad as the lesson finally came to an end. She was even a little impressed that Tom had managed to prevent her from harming anyone with her clumsiness and simultaneously had also succeeded in brewing the foundation despite her questionable help. As Slughorn saw the silvery colour of the potion he praised Tom's work to the skies.

"That is the best work I have ever seen," Slughorn exclaimed happily as he bend over the cauldron full of silvery grey potion.

As he straightened up again he beamed at Tom, Hermione and even Malfoy who also was in their group.

"Twenty points to Slytherin for each of you," Slughorn announced to the two Slytherin boys while he smiled proudly at Tom.

Then his gaze left Tom and Malfoy and he smiled suavely down at Hermione.

"And of course twenty points to Gryffindor. Good work, Ms DeCerto."

Hermione could feel a blush hitting her face as she stared back at the professor. She so not deserved his praise.

It was later that day when classes were over that Tom slowly walked down a corridor. In his hand he clutched a small slip of parchment so tightly that it was completely crumbled now. A third year had delivered it to him as Tom had just left the Slytherin common room to search Hermione who had been rather strange since Potion today.

At first Tom had thought the slip of paper was a letter from Slughorn to invite him to one of his get-togethers. But as Tom had opened the letter he had instantly recognized that fine handwriting. Dumbledore wanted to see him.

Now he walked to the transfiguration professor's office. He had shortly considered to just ignore that summon. But in the end he had to accept that he really didn't have a choice here. What did Dumbledore want from him? Tom's hands balled into tight fists, crumbling the parchment even further. This time he had no idea what the hateful professor could want from him. It was still months until the next break so it couldn't be about him having to go back to London, he reasoned with himself. Whatever it was Dumbledore wanted from him, it couldn't be a good thing. It never was.

As Tom reached the door leading into Dumbledore's office he put the crumbled piece of parchment into his pocket skimming his fingers slightly over his wand as he did so. Then he breathed in deeply before he knocked at the door.

"Enter," Dumbledore answered through the door.

So Tom opened the door and stepped reluctantly into the office of his least favourite teacher. His gaze instantly wandered to the person sitting behind the desk. Dumbledore was wearing one of his ridiculously flamboyant robes and was hitting Tom with one of his glares. Tom looked right back at him. He didn't want to appear shaken by that piercing stare Dumbledore was throwing his way. As he reluctantly walked over to Dumbledore's desk his eyes wandered over the disorder in the office. How could anyone be so messy? Tom felt annoyed at having to obey someone who didn't even have control over his own things. But as it was, Dumbledore still had the upper hand.
"Please, sit down, Tom," Dumbledore said as Tom reached his desk.

Seeing no other option, Tom sat down but remained to be very tense. Dumbledore sat opposite him and looked at him intensely. Tom had no idea what the professor wanted from him but he wasn't going to let that old man play his games with him. So he got rid of all emotions that could have showed on his face and stared coldly back at the professor.

After some time Dumbledore sighed before he said in a soft tone, "I know that you think I hate you, Tom."

Tom couldn't stop his eyebrows from rising up a little as he heard the professor's statement. What was he planning? He really didn't like that grave look on Dumbledore's face.

As Tom neither denied nor agreed with his statement Dumbledore continued, "But that is not true. My behaviour towards you might have appeared as harsh, but I always had only your well-being in mind.

Tom clenched his jaw and had to breathe in slowly to not immediately lose control over his magic. It rushed through him like an angry, burning current which desperately tried to find a way out. He stared into Dumbledore's eyes and was appalled as he saw this fake honesty in them. The hate boiled up in him and he almost trembled from the suppressed force behind his anger. What did Dumbledore plan? Despite his anger Tom knew he had to somehow react to the other wizard's statement. Though he was walking on thin ice here because Tom had no idea where Dumbledore tried to go.

So Tom raised his head slightly and then said in a perfectly controlled voice, "I do know that, professor."

Dumbledore would never buy that, of course, but Tom wasn't going to contradict him. Not when Dumbledore obviously had a scheme after which he was acting now. Tom watched a sad smile taking form on the older wizard's face as his blue eyes still gazed at him so piercingly.

"You have always been a very convincing actor, Tom," Dumbledore told him, still in that unnerving soft voice which was surprisingly not in the least bit accusatory.

What was going on here? Tom wondered in suspicion. Why did Dumbledore suddenly let go of all pretence? They both were acting here. They always did whenever they met. Tom didn't know how to reply to Dumbledore's statement. The professor was acting different today and Tom didn't like that sudden change in his behaviour at all. Surely Dumbledore hadn't summoned him to chat about the tense situation between the two of them. So Tom stared back at Dumbledore and tried to hide his confusion. The last thing he wanted to do was letting show how much Dumbledore unsettled him.

Right now Dumbledore's eyes wandered swiftly over him and Tom saw a strange look of wistfulness in them.

After a while he spoke again, "You are gifted, Tom. You have a talent others would kill to have. Things that appear to be impossible, you can accomplish effortlessly."

As he heard Dumbledore saying that, Tom's mistrust intensified. Dumbledore had never before praised him in any way and Tom doubted the old fool had suddenly found a new affection for him. Tom just couldn't see what the old wizard intended to achieve so he still remained silent.

Dumbledore leaned forward in his chair and eyed Tom sharply before he continued in that same soft voice, "Such talent is a gift not many of us are lucky enough to receive."

Tom could see a strange expression flitting over the older man's face but before he could identify it it was gone again and Dumbledore continued, "But that talent is as much a curse as it is a gift. While you can achieve wonderful things with that talent it is simultaneously incredibly dangerous."

Dumbledore's eyes still fixed Tom with that strange stare and Tom was surprised to see sadness crossing his face.

Then Dumbledore continued in a grave voice, "It is so very tempting to think that because you are so powerful, you are superior to the people around you. That conviction is just one step away from beginning to use your power to force others to do what you think is right. That is the danger lurking behind such extraordinary talent."

Tom nearly frowned at the professor. Why was Dumbledore telling him this? Tom again felt anger bubbling up in him. Did that insane old geezer sent for him just to tell him this rubbish? He was just wasting his time here while listening to this pointless rambling.

"I don't know what you are trying to tell me, sir," Tom said in a polite but all the same icy cold voice. His anger intensified as he saw a sad smile taking form on Dumbledore's face.

"Of course not," the old wizard said in a sincere and understanding voice which made Tom want to curse him on the spot. "It is very difficult to understand, especially for someone as young as yourself. Let me try to explain it in a more comprehensible way."

Slowly Tom was getting really angered by Dumbledore's patronizing way. His magic still rushed furiously through him and he wanted nothing more than to just give in to that need and release his magic. But Tom tightly controlled his magic and continued to look at the professor with his fake polite interest.

"Since I have met you the first time, Tom, I have known that you are an incredibly talented wizard," Dumbledore continued while he still hit Tom with his penetrating gaze. "I can remember very vividly our first encounter. You have been so young and you had no idea that something like the wizarding world could exist. I have always enjoyed it to introduce young Muggleborn witches and wizards to the magical world. They are always so very excited and surprised to discover this world full of magic and wonders. Just like you, Tom. You have been very excited as you heard about you being a wizard. But unlike the others you haven't been surprised. You already knew that there was something more to you and your powers."

Tom felt very uneasy as he stared back at Dumbledore. He still managed to hide his discomfort behind his mask of politeness but Tom was now definitely alarmed. The most disturbing thing was this expression of sadness or regret he could see on Dumbledore's face.

"Already you thought you were something special. And you were quite right. You have a natural understanding of magic that cannot be learned from books. That indeed distinguishes you from most wizards. Back then I told you that you were right and that you really were something special. I remember that you were quite happy with that insight." Here Dumbledore stopped shortly and Tom again saw that horrible look of regret crossing the other's face. Then Dumbledore sighed softly before he continued, "But I knew better, Tom. Being special is not something desirable. No, it is a burden. It can misguide us and lead us to doing things that are detestable. I knew of that danger so I decided to help you on your way, to prevent you from going astray and stumble down a path that only leads to grief and sorrow."

Tom felt his temper rising again as he heard those words, spoken in apparent false sincerity. That man really had the audacity to say he wanted to help Tom? His magic started to rip at him again and furiously demanded to be released. Dumbledore had never helped him! He was the one who always punished Tom and sent him back to that abhorrent orphanage every summer. How was that any help?

Tom's hands were clutching the armrest of his chair tightly as he continued to listen to Dumbledore's voice. Still he could hear that fake kindness in the older wizard's tone, "Since you started at Hogwarts I have watched you very closely because I knew about that dark path you have always been confronted with. With increasing sorrow I have seen how you took your first tentative steps down into the darkness until you truly walked this path. It let to you doing horrible things."

Dumbledore's eyes filled with sadness and even pity as he stared at Tom.

"It started with the incident that occurred after your first year. Back then I had already known how very far ahead your were power wise in contrast to your year mates. But I have to admit I had not expected you to already be able to control such powerful magic like you performed during that summer break. It came as I had feared, you used your power to control and to hurt others. I had been shaken as I discovered your crime for I could already see were that path would one day lead you. But as I found out about the crime you committed I decided to protect you, Tom, and not to surrender you to justice. You were just a child back then, and I was convinced that I could still save you."

Dumbledore looked at him and Tom now felt his mask of fake politeness slowly melting from his face. He wouldn't be able to maintain his act for long now. What did Dumbledore have in mind?

"So I took measures to prevent you from again getting in a situation where you would use your powers in the wrong way. You were still so young and I knew that if I managed to keep you away from the temptation, you would eventually see the wrongness behind that path."

"But just as I had decided to keep a closer watch on you there appeared an unexpected threat that had nothing to do with you. It demanded my attention as the appearance of this threat was partly my fault." A tired tinge appeared in Dumbledore's voice as he said that. "So I could no longer watch you as closely as it would have been necessary. Though my absence didn't stop me from hearing about the crimes you committed. I know a lot of them, more than you presume. They were appalling and unsettled me but they were not so severe that I felt the need to intervene. But then last year you did something that again shook me up."

Dumbledore fixed Tom with that piercing gaze again before he said in a grave tone, "I can't prove it, Tom, but I know that it was you who opened the Chamber of Secrets."

Tom stiffened as he heard those words. Obviously Dumbledore didn't expect him to answer to this accusation as he continued in a severe tone, "As I heard about that new crime you committed I was devastated. For it proved that my previous efforts had been in vain and you were still walking down that path I so desperately tried to protect you from. So as I learned that you opened the Chamber of Secrets I knew I had failed to protect you once again for now a death lay on your conscience."

"Even after that incident I still had hope left. I still thought I could tear you away from that path you have decided to follow. That death was dreadful but everything indicated that it had been an accident. So I hoped that you had just made a terrible mistake and that you had never planned to take a life."

Dumbledore shook his head sadly before he continued, "Now, Tom, I am not so sure anymore. Maybe it was I who made mistakes. I have ignored the facts for far too long. Because now, just a few months later, you again broke the laws."
"What are you talking about, professor?" Tom asked calmly as he fought to maintain his self-control.

Dumbledore hit him with a hard gaze as he answered, "I know that you left your orphanage during the break."

Tom couldn't help but draw in a sharp breath of air. How did he know? He stared with wide eyes at Dumbledore. Tom could feel how he slowly lost his cool. Dumbledore was not allowed to know that he had left the orphanage.

Then Dumbledore continued and his voice was now terribly cold, "We had an agreement, Tom. Yet you broke your word. Again. I have given you plenty of chances but it seems nothing gets through to you. You still just do whatever you like."

"I am quite sure you left the orphanage during the summer break too, but this time I can prove it. I have talked with the patron of the orphanage and Mr Carter confirmed that you haven't been there for more than a few days."

Tom stared at Dumbledore. He still managed his face to look blank, but only just. His emotions underneath were swirling.

Dumbledore leaned forward in his chair and looked directly into Tom's eyes as he said in his cold tone, "It appears that my efforts were in vain and you are incorrigible. But don't think I have given up on you, Tom. I won't abandon you. I just have to change my strategy slightly."

Then he again leaned back in his chair but his hard gaze still hit Tom. "I know about the temptation that comes from Dark Magic. Those with an exceptional understanding of magic have always been the ones the most easily to yield to that temptation."

"Before, I have tried to show you the wrongness of your path but it is clear that you are not able to withstand the allurement Dark Magic offers. Now, I will take away the temptation."

Tom's breathing was now quickened as he stared back at the older wizard. Dumbledore still looked at him with that strange sadness showing on his face. But it were his next words that made Tom feel like someone had kicked him in the stomach,

"It is very regrettable, but I will speak with headmaster Dippet about your expulsion."

Tom's eyes widened in shock and his head started to swirl. Then Dumbledore continued and Tom felt sick as he heard that pity in his quiet voice,

"You should not see this as a punishment, Tom, but as a chance to begin anew. On this new way you won't run the risk to succumb to those temptations. I know that it will be difficult at first but it is a necessary step. You are strong, I am sure you can manage."

Tom stared in panic at the older man.

"You can't send me back there," he finally hissed at the professor in a sharp tone. By now he was unable to maintain his self-control.

Dumbledore just looked at him sadly then he said in a horribly soothing tone, "It is not the end of the world. You can still lead a fulfilling life. Even without your magic."

Tom felt the panic now taking a hold of him. He couldn't go back. If he really had to go back into the Muggle world, he would be forced to live in the orphanage for the next two years until he was eighteen. It was worse enough to be send back into that hell during the holidays but he wouldn't stand it to be forced to live there for years. Without any hope. Just the knowledge that there was no way to escape. He would never survive it.

Tom felt his hands starting to tremble slightly.

Memories of his last stay at the orphanage resurfaced again. It had been horrible. He had been locked into that chamber for days, always in fear that Carter would return and hurt him more. No, he could not go back there. Without his magic, he was nothing.

He stared down at his hands laying in his lap. Then he whispered in a soft voice, without looking up at Dumbledore, "Please, don't send me back."

There was a pause but then Dumbledore spoke again and Tom cringed as he heard that finality in his voice, "It is the only way. I will speak with the Headmaster about your expulsion."

Tom slowly raised his head to again look at Dumbledore but he only found conviction and grim determination in the other's eyes. Then Dumbledore said in a hard voice,

"You should go now and pack your things, Tom. Though I am afraid you will have to leave everything behind that can be related to the magical world."

{{{{{{{{+}}}}}}}}}
"Just a bit more," Hermione whispered while beads of sweat were running down her forehead.

Right now she was standing in the middle of a deserted class room. Her eyes were closed in concentration and she tried to draw upon all her magic. She needed to consciously control every ounce of magic inside of her. Only if she had her own magic completely in control, could she find that alien magic which was buried deep inside of her. That was what she was currently searching for: The Elder Magic.

Last transfiguration class, the Elder Magic had suddenly chosen to show itself again. Hermione didn't like it very much that this strange magic seemed to have a mind of its own. Sure, so far the Elder Magic hadn't harmed her in any way, more like helped her, but still Hermione would prefer it if she had some kind of control over the magic.

So now that classes were over for today she had decided to try to make some progress with the Elder Magic. By doing so she had also conveniently overlooked the fact that it may have been the better and more sensible strategy to just read Peverell's manuscript first. His last entry had been about the Elder Wand after all. Maybe now Peverell was going to delve deeper into the magic behind the wand.

Yeah, maybe, Hermione mused hesitantly. Maybe he was going to reveal why she had been sent back in time and how she would be able to return. So, how about she finished the book? Then again Hermione couldn't understand the book anyway and she had decided to read it later. Yes, that was the plan.

You are avoiding the book, aren't you? a tiny but persistent voice disrupted her train of thought reproachfully.

No, that was not it, Hermione thought while she tried to quench the guilt that rose up inside of her. She did plan to read the book. She just hadn't found the time to do so.

Why not now? the same voice demanded to know.

Well, that was because right now she tried to find the ever-elusive Elder Magic. Glad to have found an excuse, Hermione completely ignored the real reason why she hadn't touched Peverell's manuscript since yesterday. The Peverell manuscript was dangerous. What if she read on and then really found a way to use the magic to get herself back in her time period? What was she supposed to do then? Travel again through time just to end up in a place where she didn't want to be?

Hermione balled her hands into tight fists and called back her stray thoughts. She smothered them together with the guilt and again concentrated on her magic. As she summoned her magic she again noticed that familiar pulse of power which suffused the whole of Hogwarts castle and its inhabitants. She strongly suspected that this were indeed the castle's warding spells. They seemed to influence just everything.

With one exception, Hermione thought determined as she finally found the Elder Magic hidden underneath her own magic. She cautiously nudged the strange power. She wanted it to wake up again like it had done during her transfiguration class. But as she touched it, nothing happened. Hermione then put a little more power behind her approach and tried to draw upon the Elder Magic. It remained to be unresponsive and wasn't at all impressed by her attempts to raise it. Nothing worked.
Hermione let out a sight of disappointment. Then she relinquished her hold of the Elder Magic. The moment her hold on the magic lessened she could feel it give a small jerk. She stiffened and held her breath as then the Elder Magic began to move and simultaneously grow. It wasn't long and the magic completely wrapped around her. Like during transfiguration Hermione felt how she was unlinked from the castle's wards.

This time around she wasn't taken by surprise of the magic's behaviour but tried to maintain its current state. It was tricky and cost her a lot of willpower but she managed to keep the Elder Magic wrapped around her. Hermione's breathing was ragged now like she had just run a mile. There was no way she would be able to pull her wand and perform a spell. That was what she originally had wanted to try. But just to keep the Elder Magic from collapsing was incredibly draining. To use a spell now was impossible. It was becoming more and more difficult to maintain the Elder Magic's current state of being wrapped around her. With a gasp Hermione finally couldn't hold the magic back any longer. She released it and instantly the Elder Magic broke down again until it was completely hidden. As the Elder Magic left, Hermione staggered and had to grab the edge of a nearby table to not lose her balance. She felt dizzy and her breathing was still quickened but there now was a triumphant smile on her face. She had made it! It was possible after all to use the Elder Magic and even to some extents control it. The only thing needed was time and training.

She straightened up and breathed in deeply. It certainly would be nice to have something like the Elder Magic at her disposal. To achieve that she would have to practise with the magic. Which would also be a lot safer than reading Peverell's manuscript. She didn't want to admit her reluctance to read on in the book and didn't allow her guilty conscience to indulge in that thought for too long.

By the way she really planned to finish the manuscript. Honestly. …just not today. She was now really tired from her attempt to use the Elder Magic. So Hermione just pulled her wand and waved it at the door of the class room thus removing all the locking and warding spells she had put up before. Then she exited the class room. She had decided to search for Tom now. She hadn't seen him since classes were over.

Sometime later Hermione still walked through the castle. She had already been to the library, the Room of Requirements and had even climbed down into the dungeons. But she couldn't find Tom anywhere. It was strange. He had told her after DADA today that they would meet later but so far she had seen neither hide nor hair of him. Somehow his absence was making her quite uneasy. She knew that there was no reason to be so unsettled just because she couldn't find him immediately. He probably had just forgotten about their date and was now sitting somewhere or other, reading a book or was again ordering his stupid followers around. But still Hermione couldn't help but feel strangely worried as she now rounded a corner and entered another passageway which was illuminated by the sun falling through the many huge windows that flanked one side. She was currently in the first floor but intended to climb the stairs up to the Owlery. She was getting desperate and had no idea where else to look for Tom because it felt like she had already searched everywhere. So Hermione walked though the passageway. Her hurried steps echoed loudly on the stone floor. As she passed one of the windows her gaze wandered to the Great Lake. She was just averting her eyes from the peaceful scenery again as something caught her gaze. She stopped in her tracks and stared out of the window. Someone was sitting at the shore of the Great Lake, right under that huge willow. Though that person was too far away for her to recognize Hermione just knew that it was Tom. She furrowed her brow. What was he doing there? It was still January and thus rather cold outside. As she stared out of the window she had again that feeling that something was not right.

Hermione turned on the spot and walked back in the direction she had been coming from. It wasn't long until she reached the Entrance Hall, opened the door and stepped outside. The cold air hit her at once and she pulled her uniform robes tighter around herself before she continued her way to the Great Lake. Soon she could see the imposing willow tree that stood at the lake's shore. The person, clad in one of Hogwarts' black uniforms, still sat at the foot of the tall tree, unmoving. The ground was frozen and a thin layer of snow scrunched under her feet as Hermione hurried over to that person sitting under the tree. Finally she was near enough to be able to recognize the person. With a jolt she realized that it really was Tom. He was sitting there with his back propped against the tree trunk and he let his head hang in a very uncharacteristic gesture. By now Hermione was very alarmed for she knew that something was wrong with Tom. She quickly reached him and now stood in front of him and stared down at him. He hadn't shown in any way that he had noticed her presence. But then very slowly Tom raised his head and looked up at her. Hermione was shaken as she could see the hatred burning in his beautiful grey eyes.

"What's wrong?" she asked him worried as she frowned down at him.

Hermione stiffened as she could then watch anger seeping into his gaze.

"He can't do that," Tom suddenly hissed in barely suppressed rage. "He has no right to do it."

He continued to stare at her while the anger was now visible all over his handsome face. It was unsettling as Tom normally had his emotions tightly in control. She could even feel traces of his dark magic swirling around him.

As he didn't say any more but just glared at her, Hermione raised her eyebrows questioningly and tried to encourage him to go on, "Tom?"

He broke eye contact with her and turned his head away from her. Hermione frowned at him but then crouched down in front of him. She still got no reaction out of him.

"What happened?" she asked him while scanning his form concerned.

She could see him cringe slightly as he heard her question. But he still didn't answer so Hermione put a hand gently on his shoulder. Whatever happened it must have unsettled him a great deal, she thought worried as she looked at Tom.

After a while he spoke again and this time the rage had left him and his voice was numb as he told her hesitantly without looking her way, "He found out that I've left the orphanage during the break."

Hermione's eyes widened in shock as she stared at him. She instantly knew whom Tom was speaking about: Dumbledore. A conversation they had had during Christmas break sprang up in her mind. It had been the day after she had found Tom in the orphanage as he had told her that it was Dumbledore who forced him to stay at the orphanage during the break. Tom had also told her that he would get expelled should Dumbledore ever find out that he left the orphanage.

Hermione sat down beside Tom. The ground under the tree was snow free though still wet and rather chilly but she didn't care as she stared at Tom. He avoided her eyes and gazed vacantly in space. His face was a blank and Hermione was unable to tell what he was thinking right now but she could see that his hands trembled slightly. She slid a little closer to him and then asked in an anxious tone,

"What did he say, Tom?"

He didn't answer at once. But then he slowly turned his head and looked at her. His face was a blank but anger burned in his eyes. Hermione's heart clenched as she could see the desperation and even fear behind the anger.

"He… he is going to have me thrown out of school," Tom finally said in a cold tone.
Hermione stared at him in shock. Dumbledore couldn't do that. She knew where Tom would have to go if he was to be thrown out of Hogwarts. Hermione felt sick as she remembered how she had found Tom in the orphanage. He had been so hurt. An image of Carter with a bloodstained belt in his hand flashed through her mind. A fierce resolution now started to overwhelm her. She wasn't going to let that continue! Hermione ignored the complete lack of emotion on his face but reached out for Tom and pulled him towards her before she wrapped her arms around him. There was no way she would allow Tom to be send to that disgusting place, she thought with grim determination. She could feel how Tom slowly slid his arms around her waist before he leaned his head down so that it rested on her shoulder.

"I can't go back," he whispered. His voice was still cold but Hermione could hear it shake slightly.

She ran a hand gently through his dark hair then she said in a soothing but all the same firm voice, "I told you before, didn't I? I am not going to let you return there."

He didn't reply anything but Hermione could feel him embracing her even tighter.

"You are not going to be expelled," she tried to comfort him. "Even if you were expelled, I still wouldn't allow you to return to the orphanage."

She turned her head and then placed a kiss on his cheek before she ended the embrace. She took his hand in hers and held it. Her gaze again wandered over him in concern. He avoided it to look at her and had his eyes downcast. Hermione frowned at him. It was horrible to see him like this. She could feel anger boiling up in her. Tom had suffered in that disgusting orphanage for long enough, there was no way she would allow anyone to chuck him back there. Not even Dumbledore was allowed to do something like that, she thought enraged. What was that man thinking anyway? Didn't he know about Carter? Hermione was disappointed with the old professor and more than furious. No way in hell was she going to let Tom return to that terrible place. Carter would never again raise a hand against Tom.

Hermione had to breathe in deeply to get her burning emotions back under control. This was Dumbledore's doing after all so she needed a calm mind to find a way out of this. With force, at least, she wouldn't be able to achieve anything. Her gaze wandered back to Tom and she unconsciously bit her lip. He still let his head hang down and didn't look at her. Whatever it was Dumbledore used to blackmail Tom with, he was very reluctant to confide in her. Hermione leaned a little forward then she cupped Tom's cheeks in her hands and gently raised his head so that he was forced to look at her again.

"Tom," Hermione began gently, though there was now a certain amount of sternness in her tone. "You need to tell me why Dumbledore can expel you just like that."

Tom lifted his head up a little and now looked at her with his grey eyes. She could still see that unbearable desperation in his eyes but now there was also guardedness. He obviously didn't want to tell her.

"Why can he force you to return to the orphanage every break? Why can he take your wand away from you?" Hermione again asked him, this time her tone was strict. "What does he have on you, Tom?"

Hermione could see how Tom now recoiled from her a little bit. The guardedness in his eyes intensified, then he looked away from her. Whatever it was Dumbledore used to blackmail Tom with, he was very reluctant to confide in her. Hermione leaned a little forward then she cupped Tom's cheeks in her hands and gently raised his head so that he was forced to look at her again.
"I can't help you if you don't trust me," she said in a soft voice while she stared into his eyes.

He still didn't speak. But Hermione needed to know what had happened. She could hardly convince Dumbledore to let Tom stay at Hogwarts if she didn't have all the information she needed.

She released him again and watched him intently before she said, "Whatever it is you did, you can tell me. I won't abandon you."

She frowned as Tom then exhaled slowly. Had he been afraid she would go away if she found out what he had done? Hermione could still see reluctance in his eyes before he again broke eye contact and stared down at his hands. But then he suddenly spoke in a soft voice,

"You have no idea how much it meant to me to learn that I am a wizard." Tom looked up at her. The desperation still burned in his eyes as he continued. "I grew up in that orphanage and I always knew that I was different. But I didn't understand. I didn't know what it was that made me so different. I had this odd power and I could make things happen around me but I didn't know why."

"They told me I was crazy. That I should be locked away." Tom glanced at Hermione. He seemed to hesitate to go on. But then he decided to continue, now with a hard tinge in his tone, "I didn't care what they thought about me. They didn't matter, they couldn't understand. But I didn't want to be chucked away in an asylum either."

"And then… you know… Dumbledore turned up in the orphanage. He was the one who told me that I am a wizard. As he told me that the strange power inside of me was magic, everything seemed to suddenly fall in place. Everything made sense. So I left the orphanage and went to Hogwarts." A small smile crept on Tom's face. "It was bliss being able to leave there but Hogwarts was even better. Finally I didn't have to pretend or hide any longer."

"My first year passed in an instant but then I was sent back to the orphanage. I wasn't allowed to stay over the break." There was a certain amount of bitterness in his voice as he said that. "I didn't want to return. I didn't want to give up my freedom."

"Being back there was as if I had never left. Mrs Cole still hated me. The other children still despised me and over the year they had forgotten what I could do to them." Hermione noticed the coldness that suddenly seeped through his voice. "But I could have lived with it all if just I hadn't been forbidden to use magic."

"I was cut off from everything," Tom hissed, the accusation clear in his tone.

Hermione took his hand in hers. She could understand what he was trying to say. He had obviously been lonely and had felt abandoned. As he felt her hand on his, Tom seemed to calm down a little. He stared at her and Hermione smiled softly to encourage him to go on. It obviously was difficult for him to be open with her right now. She was quite certain that he had never before confided in anyone like he did now. She could hear him sigh softly. Then he averted his eyes from her but still continued his story. Though his voice was now so soft she could barely understand him.

"One day, we were in the yard outside of the orphanage and no-one was watching us, the other children decided to… tease me again. Until then I had always contained myself. But they didn't stop… and I lost control."

Hermione looked at him concerned. Tom still didn't meet her eyes. There now was a feeling of foreboding building up in her. This feeling even intensified with Tom's next statement.

"I had my wand always on me although I knew I couldn't use it."
Hermione tried to suppress the bad feeling and inquired in a hesitant tone, "What did you do?"

Tom looked in her eyes as he said in a tone completely devoid of any emotion, "I drew my wand and then I cursed one of the children."

Hermione furrowed her brow. That was bad. Underage use of magic was forbidden. So Tom using magic like that would have put him in trouble. And he had used magic in front of muggles. That was really bad.

"I see, the Ministry's wards would notice you using magic. But that still doesn't explain why Dumbledore can blackmail you." Hermione frowned at him. That wouldn't explain anything unless…

She looked at him sharply, "What spell did you use?"

Tom stared at her for a while. His face was covered by his blank mask but Hermione could tell that he was pondering whether to tell her. His grey eyes regarded her and even though Hermione stared back at him she was not able to say what he was feeling right now. His eyes were cold, grey wells and made chills darting down her spine. Then after a long time he seemed to have decided whether to tell her the truth or not. He opened his mouth and said in a soft but completely controlled voice,

"Haz Zoubar."

Hermione's eyes widened in shock.

_Haz Zoubar? _She stopped to breathe as she scanned Tom incredulously. He did not use that curse at the age of eleven! Hermione was unfortunate enough to know the curse. It was deep magic and very dark. It was a curse designed to temporarily transform a person's hatred into magical power which would then attack the opponent causing pain and severe injury. It was similar to the Unforgivable Curses which were also based on the emotional state of the caster. They could only be used when the caster really had the intention to harm, possess or even to kill.

There was another similarity to the Unforgivables. For, Hermione knew that the use of that curse was worth a one-way ticket directly to Azkaban. It was just as bad as the Unforgivables though it was not as widely known. Probably due to the fact that the caster needed a fair amount of skill to cast the curse. As Hermione stared at Tom there was a sinking feeling in her stomach. She didn't know what to say next.

As Hermione didn't react to this revelation other than staring at him Tom tried to explain, "I was so angry back then I just lost control."

A frown appeared on Hermione's face. Then she said, and by now the softness had left her voice, "But, Tom, the _Haz Curse_?"

Tom stared at her but didn't say anything while Hermione now glared at him darkly. Why did Tom always need to use Dark Magic on others? She wasn't even going to ask him how he had managed to find a book about such Dark Magic when he had been only eleven.

"What happened then?" she then asked him gruffly. There were the first signs of anger building up in her.

"I botched the spell up," Tom replied, his tone level.

"What?"
"At first it worked like it should have," he told her in his smooth voice, though his eyes had again left her. "But then somehow the curse broke and the magic lashed out at the other child. I was hit myself and blacked out. The next thing I remember is me waking up in St Mungos."

He shortly glanced at Hermione but as he saw that angry frown on her face he quickly averted his eyes again.

"There were a lot of people who wanted to speak with me," he continued with his story, "Aurors, Ministry officials. They interrogated me. I was told that Dark Magic had been used in the premises of the orphanage. They asked me what I knew about the incident. I lied and told them I couldn't remember anything."

"And they believed you?" Hermione asked scandalized.

Tom looked up at her, then said in a hesitant tone, "I'm not sure. But at least they never suspected me. I had been hit myself by the rebounding curse. And I was still a first year back then. They were quite convinced that no first year could ever perform that curse because--"

"-because it is too powerful," Hermione ended the sentence for him in a quiet voice.

"Yes," Tom inclined his head.

"But you were guilty," she stated angrily. By now she could feel her magic rushing through her furiously, mirroring the churned up emotion inside of her. Still, she tried to reign in her rising temper.

Tom didn't reply anything to her last statement so Hermione asked, her voice was sharp and cold, "Why didn't they ask the other children. They could have told them."

Tom could obviously see her upcoming anger but he still answered her with a steady voice, "As the Aurors arrived at the orphanage they found me and the other child unconscious in the yard. As it was a muggle orphanage they instantly obliviated everyone of the other children. That's the standard procedure in such a case."

Hermione's eyes hardened.

"So no-one would be able to tell them that it was you who fired the curse?" she asked indignantly.

"Yes."

"What happened to the child you attacked?" Her voice was clipped.

"He fell in a coma." Tom replied, his tone completely emotionless.

Hermione's mouth formed a thin line as she stared at Tom in anger.

"Did he wake up again?" Her voice was icy-cold now.

"No," he whispered.

Hermione stared at him. She couldn't stop her temper anymore and anger was washing over her as she finally understood the consequences Tom's actions had entailed.

"Did you know that could happen as you cursed him?" she asked him in a low and barely controlled voice.

"I didn't," Tom quickly assured. "I didn't know much of what the curse could do."
"And yet, you used it," came her abrupt reply.

Tom looked at her and she could see the emotions swirling in his eyes. But right now, she didn't really care how he was feeling. She just glared at him angrily and had to fight to not lose her composure. She wasn't going to ask him if he felt guilty for having cursed that innocent child. Somehow she already knew the answer to that question.

"How comes Dumbledore into all of this?" she instead asked him curtly.

"He came to the hospital as he heard what had happened," Tom explained quietly. "Then he wanted to talk to me. I think he used Legilimency on me. I don't know, I didn't know about this kind of magic back then. He didn't hand me over to the authorities, though, as he learned what I had done. He made me promise never to use such a spell again-

Hermione snorted wryly.

"-and he told me that if I wanted to stay at Hogwarts, I would have to follow his rules. So every following summer break he took my wand from me before I had to return to the orphanage."

Tom ended his speech and stared at Hermione. She was glaring at him very darkly. This did explain a lot, she thought, still enraged by what Tom had just told her. The curse he had used was on a par with the three Unforgivables. And Dumbledore knew what Tom had done. If he decided to tell the Aurors, being expelled from Hogwarts would be the least of Tom's problems. Despite the fact that Tom had been a child as he had used the curse, the Aurors would surely start to investigate. Hermione knew that Tom had quite a few skeletons in the cupboard. He could not afford Aurors to look into his life. Back in her time period she had never heard about this incident. She now wondered why Dumbledore hadn't told Harry during sixth year. Hell, she actually wondered why he had hushed up the whole thing. It just was abhorrent.

It wasn't so much the fact that Tom had used such horrible Dark Magic that shocked her now. She had always known what he was capable to do. It wasn't even the fact that he had permanently hurt that child. It was of course horrible what he had done and she was disgusted by the fact that he had destroyed that child's future. What was really getting to her was the idea that Tom already knew how to use that curse at the age of eleven. Hermione herself hadn't even known that something like this curse existed as she had been eleven. Let alone use it.

Her eyes glinted irately as she stared at Tom.

Just what is wrong with him?

She knew all too well that there was something dark and sinister inside of him. But now it looked like that evil side of him had always been there. Apparently it hadn't developed because he had to grow up under dreadful circumstances. No, it had always been a part of him. He had been offered the wonderful chance to leave the orphanage for the wizarding world and what was the first thing he did with his new knowledge? He used it in the worst way possible and hurt others.

Hermione felt her anger slowly bubbling over. She was furious. How could Tom have done something like that? And after this experience one would have thought he would never use Dark Magic again. But no, he was still fascinated by it. She balled her hands into tight fists and tried to reign in her furious magic and not hex Tom on the spot.

"Do you hate me now?" Tom suddenly asked her in a very soft voice.

Hermione's eyes snapped back to him. He was sitting in front of her and again he let his head hang and avoided to look her in the eyes. She didn't answer him. She was too enraged and would have just yelled at him if she said anything now.

As she didn't reply to his question Tom slowly raised his head. His eyes hesitantly wandered to her own. He looked at her and his face was giving nothing away, aside from his eyes. They were swirling with emotion. His grey eyes were scanning her anxiously, almost fearfully, and there was guardedness in them. It almost looked as if he tried to steel himself against something. It seemed as if he was expecting her to stand up and walk away any moment now. Hermione's fury completely died down as she gazed back at him.

Did he think she would leave him?

Hermione couldn't take that. She didn't want him to be afraid of her leaving him. So she reached out for him and put a hand gently on his arm. He tensed as she touched him.

"What you did was very wrong, Tom. And I'm really angry with you for doing it," Hermione could see how he cringed as she said that. "But, no, I don't hate you," she finished in a firm voice.

Tom looked at her with surprise written all over his face. Hermione frowned. What had he thought? That she would leave him because of this story? She actually knew a whole lot worse things about him. But maybe Tom wasn't used to people liking him despite them having seen his dark side.

"I said I wouldn't abandon you regardless of what you did," Hermione reassured him gently.

Tom seemed to relax a little as he heard that. It shook Hermione that he had really expected her to leave him after this confession. No wonder he had been so reluctant in confiding in her.

He shouldn't have to worry about that, she thought sadly as she scanned the relief on his face.

It was odd that he had believed she would abandon him. Yes, that story was rather horrible. And Hermione had to admit that she was still angry with Tom for having done something like that. He had, after all, destroyed the future of that poor child. There was really no excuse for that. But in comparison to the other things she knew about Tom this incident seemed to drop in the background. It even had been something like an accident that the child was now permanently in a coma.

Her gaze wandered back to Tom. He was still looking at her with his blank face but she could feel how he tightly held to her hand. Why had he been so scared of her leaving him?

Then again, he had no idea how much she actually knew about his crimes. He had never told her that he had murdered his father or Moaning Myrtle. To be fair, Hermione DeCerto could not possibly know about any of the crimes he had committed so far. He had no reason to believe that she could know more. So this story he had just told her was really the worst thing she now knew about him – at least from his point of view.

Hermione felt the anger leaving her completely. This incident was now years and years ago. She shouldn't be angry with him. She pressed his hand reassuringly and smiled faintly at him. She was not going to judge him by this mistake he had made. Obviously others already did that.

There still was another problem at hand, she thought. Then she asked him in a grave tone, "As you talked with Dumbledore today what exactly did he say?"

"I… Just that he is going to expel me," Tom whispered, clearly still taken aback that she hadn't left him by now.

"Yes, but on what reason?" Hermione queried. "He can't use that story about you casting the Haz Curse. That wouldn't just get you expelled but directly into Azkaban."

"He'll just make something up to get me expelled. And I have to confess to whatever he fabricates against me because otherwise I would be carted off to Azkaban," he replied and there now seeped bitterness in his tone. "That's why he can always order me around like that. If I refuse to obey, he will tell everyone what I have done."

Hermione stared at him for a moment while it hit her how right he was.

"I understand that," she finally said slowly. "But what I don't get is how he can prove what you did. Sure he legilimized you and saw what you've done. But a forced Legilimency confession is no evidence. I don't really think you can be convicted on it. In addition to that, you've been only eleven as it happened."

Tom sniggered mirthlessly before he said, "He is Albus Dumbledore. Who would ever accuse him of lying? If he decides that I am evil, then everyone is going to believe him, regardless of how old I am or was. And he decided a long time ago that I'm a hopeless case. No-one is going to doubt his opinion. He is, after all, the most powerful wizard alive," Tom spat then he continued scornfully. "Or so they all hope. Because if he isn't then who's going to beat Grindelwald?"

Hermione's mouth was pressed in a thin line as she stared at Tom. She realized how serious the situation truly was. Dumbledore seemed to have the upper hand here. He knew what Tom had done during that summer break. He had seen it in Tom's mind. Despite of what she had just said if Dumbledore showed anyone his memory of what he had found in Tom's mind, there was a chance that Tom would get convicted. At the very least it would lead to an investigation which could get Tom into severe trouble.

So ever since Dumbledore had found out about Tom's crime he had used it to threaten and blackmail Tom. That fact infuriated Hermione to no end. She wasn't going to let Dumbledore continue with that. A determined glint appeared in her eyes as she stared at Tom. He was not going to ever return to that orphanage.

She got up from her place on the chilly ground and tried to pull Tom up with her. "Let's go," she ordered him while she tugged at his arm.

Tom frowned up at her, "Where to?"

"I need to talk with Dumbledore," Hermione answered him.

"He's not going to change his mind," he told her in a flat voice.

She continued to pull at him while she said, "We'll see about that. Now, get up."

Tom looked at her skeptically but then he stood up anyway. Hermione took his hand in hers and then started to walk back to the castle while pulling Tom after her. She led him through the castle's corridors while still holding to his hand tightly. Then they finally stood before the two gargoyles guarding the Headmaster's office. Hermione hoped that it wasn't too late yet. Things would be a lot more complicated if Dumbledore had already told Dippet about his plans of expelling Tom.

Hermione whispered the password to the headmaster's office, "Infigo."

Obviously Dippet had changed the password over the break as the stone creatures blocking the entrance didn't pounce out of their way. Hermione lost her patience and then just pulled her wand. She didn't have the time to guess the right password. So she waved her wand in an angry movement at the two gargoyles. The power behind her spell was strong enough to wake the stone sculptures and force them to jump out of the way. She was glad that right now Tom was too upset to question how she managed that. She just pulled him after her as she climbed the stairs to the headmaster's office. When they finally stood before the door leading into the office Hermione could hear voices.

"Now, see here, Dumbledore." Dippet's voice was booming through the door. "Why would Riddle do something like that? Remember, it was him who caught the real culprit."

"Rubeus Hagrid is innocent," Dumbledore's calm voice replied.

"Yes, you've said so before but all the evidence says otherwise," Dippet's voice said. "Why would Riddle, of all people, do something like that? He's a prefect and he will become head boy next year. How will the school look if we have to expel one of our best students?"

Hermione raised her eyebrows as she grasped the topic of their conversation. So Dumbledore planned to use the Chamber of Secrets incident of last year to get Tom expelled. She cast a sideways glance at Tom. His face was again covered by a blank mask. Hermione tightened her hold on his hand before she knocked on the wooden door, leading into the Headmaster's office.

"Come in," came Dippet's voice.

Hermione opened the door and entered the room behind while still pulling Tom with her. Dippet's office was like she remembered it from her previous visits. Still tidy, even to the point of looking sterile and uninviting. Dippet sat behind this imposing desk. He wore a black richly embroidered waistcoat on top of a white shirt. And right now his stern gaze had fallen on her.

Dumbledore stood before the desk and he, too, stared at the new arrivers. He looked like he had just stopped mid-step whilst pacing in front of the intimidating, huge desk. But now he had ceased his pacing and scanned Hermione over his half moon spectacles. He looked mildly surprised at her but then Hermione could see his gaze harden and a dark look crossed his face as his eyes landed on Tom who stood slightly behind her.

"Mr Riddle, just the one we have been talking about," Dippet said in his strict voice.

Hermione noticed how Dippet completely ignored her. She was quite sure that he didn't even know her name, judging from that confused look crossing his face whenever he looked her way.

"We have a little problem here," Dippet addressed Tom while he looked at him sternly. "You, of course, remember the events of last year which unfortunately led to the expulsion of one of our students? I now have to ask you again. Did you have anything to do with opening the Chamber of Secrets?"

Hermione could feel Tom tense. Then his grey eyes darted from Dippet to Dumbledore who now stared at Tom expectantly. His gaze was clearly saying that Tom should admit to this or else he would have to face the consequences.

Before Tom could answer the question Hermione cut across him loudly, "Headmaster, this is exactly why we are here."

Then her eyes wandered to Dumbledore and she said, "I need to speak with you about Tom, sir." Hermione was surprised that her voice didn't shake but sounded even strong.

She could see the professor's eyes wander from her back to Tom. There was again this coldness in his gaze. Somehow it upset Hermione to see that sharp and even calculating glint in his clear blue eyes. The kind twinkle that normally brightened his face was completely missing now.
Then Dumbledore spoke and even his voice was devoid of all the kindness she normally connected with the professor, "I already discussed everything with Tom, Ms DeCerto. There is nothing more to be said."

Hermione bit her lip nervously as she heard Dumbledore's resolute voice. That cold glint in his eyes made her feel very unsure of herself. For the first time she understood how someone could be scared by him. But then Hermione could feel Tom's cold hand grasping her a little tighter. She locked eyes with Dumbledore and met his suspicious gaze squarely.

Then she said in a perfectly calm and firm voice, "You didn't have all the information as you made your decision, sir. Please, let me explain."

Hermione saw the suspicion in his eyes intensify but after a while he said, "Very well, Ms DeCerto. I will listen to what you have to tell me."

"Yes, that is a very good idea," Dippet who had followed the conversation now announced in his pompous voice. "I am sure this whole incident is just a mere misunderstanding."

An almost relieved look crossed his otherwise so stern face as he continued, almost as if talking to himself, "Wouldn't know how to explain that to the school governors. Expelling our best student. No, no. That won't do."

Then the turned to Dumbledore and said, "Please, talk with them, Albus. This needs to be cleared up."

Hermione was now very glad for Dippet's impatience when it came to dealing with students. He tended to shuffle such tasks off on his professors. All the better, Hermione decided. She needed to talk with Dumbledore alone anyway.

So it came that they left the headmaster's office and Hermione followed Dumbledore through the corridors of Hogwarts to his office while pulling a now very reluctant Tom with her. They quickly arrived at his office. Dumbledore admitted them in before he sat down behind his desk and then gestured to the chairs in front of his desk.

"Please, sit down and I will give you the opportunity to explain yourself." Hermione felt disheartened as she could hear a certain harshness in his tone.

Nevertheless she pressed Tom's hand reassuringly then she walked over to Dumbledore and pulled Tom with her. She sat down on the comfortable seat and saw that Tom took place on the chair beside her, though he remained to be very tense. Hermione's eyes wandered back to Dumbledore and she found him looking at her intently.

She breathed in deeply to calm herself down then she said, turned to Dumbledore, "Sir, it was my fault that Tom left his orphanage during the break."

She watched how Dumbledore raised his eyebrows. Though she could tell that he was not surprised but looked more like his suspicion had just been confirmed.

"Ms DeCerto, you don't need to lie for Mr Riddle," Dumbledore finally told her in a severe voice.

"I am not lying," Hermione said in a strong tone.

Dumbledore cast a short disapproving look Tom's way before he said to Hermione, "I know that Tom can be quite persuasive if he needs to be but whatever he told you, you don't have to help him out here. If Tom is in trouble now, then that is alone his doing."
"Sir, I beg to differ," Hermione replied. Her voice was still frighteningly calm. Frightening at least to herself as she knew that she was not nearly as unperturbed as her voice suggested. "It's not Tom's fault he is in trouble now. It is mine. You can't punish him."

Dumbledore sighed tiredly then he turned to Tom and Hermione could again see a hard glint in his eyes as he said in a cold voice, "Tom, I need to speak with Ms DeCerto alone. Could you wait outside, please?"

Hermione frowned at Dumbledore. Why did he send Tom away now? Though, on second thought, she could understand his actions. Dumbledore surely thought that Tom was threatening her and that he was forcing her to lie for him. Of course Dumbledore wanted to speak with her alone. So that Tom couldn't influence her anymore.

"Yes, professor," Tom said in a completely emotionless tone.

Hermione looked at Tom in concern. He was just getting up from the chair. Hermione could see that his face was again covered with that blank mask. Then he turned around to walk to the door. As he did so his eyes shortly shot at her. Hermione looked into his grey eyes and was again hit by the desperation burning in them. He seemed to be really scared. Hermione was shaken by this desperation. She would never let Dumbledore sent him back.

Hermione could hear the soft thud of the office door and knew that it was more than just the wooden door that separated her from Tom now. She had once broken into Dumbledore's office and she knew there were a few wards in the air, protecting the transfiguration teacher's office. Even if he tried, Tom wouldn't be able to hear into this conversation.

Hermione looked expectantly back at Dumbledore.

"I wasn't aware that you are friends with Mr Riddle," Dumbledore said in a quiet voice while he scanned her with his clear blue eyes.

"Oh, but I am," Hermione said cautiously.

She didn't like it very much that she had to be cautious around this younger Dumbledore but she mustn't let her old nostalgic feelings get the better of her. This Dumbledore didn't know her, at least not yet, therefore he had no reason to trust her.

"You think it is your responsibility to protect your friend?" Dumbledore asked sympathetically, even kindly.

"Yes," Hermione said without hesitation. She would always protect her friends. No matter what.

Dumbledore sighed softly and looked at her in a strange, almost sad, way.

"I respect your loyalty towards your friend?" he said gently but then looked as if he prepared himself to break a terrible truth to her. "But you have to know that Mr Riddle is a special case."

"In what way, professor?" Hermione asked though she knew what he was trying to say.

Dumbledore again sighed then he leaned back in his chair.

"Ms DeCerto, I can see that you like him. It honours you that you try to help him." He paused shortly as if to decide how to proceed best. Then he continued in his gentle voice, "But before you do that you should ask yourself if Tom deserves your help."
Hermione was momentarily speechless. She had known that Dumbledore wasn't exactly a fan of Tom but for him to so openly admit it was hard to swallow. She had always known Dumbledore to be a very forgiving man. He liked to give second chances. But obviously he had given up on Tom.

Dumbledore seemed to have spotted that look of surprise on her face and continued in a suave tone, "I said it before, Tom has the ability to charm people very well. I know that my actions might seem a bit harsh to you but they are necessary. There is something very dark and dangerous in him and he is an expert when it comes to shrouding that rather dark part of his character."

Oh, he was right. Hermione knew it even better than he did. There certainly was a terribly dark part of Tom. But couldn't Dumbledore see that abandoning him in that vile orphanage would only fuel the dangerous hate inside of him?

Hermione looked the old wizard squarely in the eyes as she replied in a calm voice, "Even if you are right, sir, you still can't punish Tom for a thing he hasn't done. I made him leave the orphanage. If you need to punish someone, it should be me."

"I see, you insist in protecting Tom," Dumbledore stated sadly. "I do not know how Tom managed to persuade you to help him, Ms DeCerto, but you would change your mind if you knew why he has to stay in the orphanage."

"I know about that incident after his first year, sir," Hermione said quietly.

For the first time during this conversation she could see a genuine look of surprise on the old wizard's face.

"Tom, told you about it?" he asked somewhat incredulous.

"Yes."

"What did he tell you?" Dumbledore inquired suspiciously.

"That he used the Haz Curse on one of the other orphans," she said in a steady voice.

"I had not expected him to confide in you." Dumbledore seemed to be genuinely surprised.

"And yet he did," Hermione proceeded cautiously. She wanted to use that little bit of doubt she could see shining in the other's eyes. "Sir, if you have judged him wrongly in that case, maybe you shouldn't expel him due to another judgement you made of Tom."

Dumbledore looked at her over his half-moon spectacles. He seemed to mull over her last words. While he remained silent Hermione desperately searched for a way out of this. He seemed so completely convinced that Tom needed to be banned from the wizarding world. Somehow, she had to admit, she could even understand him. But still, she wasn't going to let that happen.

"Sir, I know that you protected Tom after you found out what he did. You saved him from the Aurors and did not tell them about his crime." Hermione hit Dumbledore with a perfectly calm gaze, though inwardly she felt terribly unsure of herself. But she had to go on. It was the truth after all, so she asked, "Why did you save Tom in the first place if you now continue to punish him for a thing he did as he was eleven?"

"I am not punishing him. But Tom is too powerful for his own good," Dumbledore said and Hermione was surprised how tired he suddenly looked. "He can't be left alone with that power. He needs rules and restrictions. If there is no-one strictly controlling him, he can go down a very wrong way." Dumbledore pause and seemed to be lost in thought and there was an almost pained expression on his face. Then he said softly, "That is a horrible experience I don't want Tom to go through."

Hermione looked in confusion at Dumbledore.

There was more. Dumbledore was talking about more than just Tom. She could see a sad and even pained look on the old wizard's face. Hermione knew that look very well. For she could always see it when she looked in a mirror. That expression, it told of loss and pain.

As she saw it now on Dumbledore's face, Hermione finally understood his motivation. She could see why he so insisted in pulling Tom away from that 'wrong way'. He tried to save Tom from the darkness because Dumbledore himself knew from experience what was waiting at the end of that way.

Her thoughts shot back into her past. After Dumbledore had died at the end of Hermione's sixth year Rita Skeeter had published a book about him. Hermione remembered how enraged she had been because it at been Skeeter, of all people, who wrote it. Nevertheless, she had read the book. And she grudgingly had to admit that Skeeter had done a halfway decent job. Harry had been very angry as he had read it, Hermione recalled, for the book illuminated Dumbledore's rather colourful past. Harry hadn't liked it very much that his idol had suddenly been reduced to a normal human being who was able to commit mistakes.

And mistakes he had made. Once Dumbledore had been friends with Grindelwald and he had believed in the same inhuman principles Grindelwald still followed: The absolute supremacy of wizards.

Back in his youth Dumbledore had already been an incredibly talented wizard. Just like Tom now was. There certainly had been a dark belief behind the young Dumbledore's actions. The same darkness that was now visible in Tom. Then, after Dumbledore had graduated from Hogwarts, his mother had died and he had been left alone with the responsibility as head of the family. But that also meant that he hadn't had to answer to anyone anymore. No-one was controlling him anymore. Just like Tom who never had parents who would look after his well-being or give him rules.

Dumbledore's new freedom had led to a tragic incident, Hermione knew. During a dispute between himself and Grindelwald Dumbledore's sister, Ariana, was hit with a curse and died. Hermione could only imagine how guilty Dumbledore must feel about it.

But this story told Hermione one thing, Dumbledore himself had gone down this 'wrong way' he now tried to protect Tom from. He knew where it could lead to. By pulling Tom away from the darkness, was Dumbledore trying to rectify his own mistakes?

Hermione's eyes softened a little as she now stared at the old wizard. She knew he meant well. It was just the wrong way. Dumbledore seemed to be lost in thought, or maybe in his memories but Hermione still asked him gently,

"Could it be, that you are not trying to save Tom here but someone else?"

She could watch the pensive expression instantly leaving his face. She was rather unsettled as she saw a surprised and then suspicious look crossing Dumbledore's face before he again hit her with his hard gaze.

"What do you mean?" Dumbledore asked her sharply.

"Never mind that," Hermione replied and quickly erected her occlumency shields, just in case.
She decided to change the topic, "Professor, right now a horrible war is covering the whole world. Do you really want to chuck Tom back into the Muggle world where he could fall victim to that war?"

"There is a war raging in the wizarding world as well," Dumbledore threw back and Hermione noticed how cold his tone now was.

"Hogwarts is safe," Hermione interjected cautiously.

"Not for Tom," was Dumbledore's cold answer.

Hermione pressed her lips into a thin line. This was getting her nowhere. Frustration now boiled up in her.

"So you want him to go back to the orphanage where he can be controlled strictly?" Hermione asked him in a firm voice. Then her gaze wandered from Dumbledore to the window in the office. She stared pensively at the scenery outside as her thoughts rushed back to the first encounter she had with Carter.

"Once I had a conversation with Mr Carter, the patron of Tom's orphanage. Do you know what he told me? He told me that Tom needs a 'strong hand' and that he needs to be 'punished strictly'." Hermione couldn't stop the bitterness seeping into her voice.

Her eyes wandered back to Dumbledore and she asked while looking at him unblinking, "Professor, do you really think Carter is the right man for the job?"

The wizard just looked back at her and as he answered his tone was aloof and almost cold, "I know it is not perfect. But sending Tom back to the orphanage is the only way I see right now."

Hermione considered him for some time then she asked, "Have you ever spoken with Carter?"

"Yes," Dumbledore replied steadily.

Hermione stared at him for a second. She had actually not expected him to have ever met Carter. How could he have met that bastard and not seen him for what he was? A sadistic swine!

"Then I'm sure you know what sort of a man he is," she finally said in a tightly controlled voice.

"I do know that it is difficult for Tom having to live in an orphanage," Dumbledore replied and Hermione could suddenly see that hard glint leaving his eyes again.

But strangely the new softness in his voice only managed to rise her temper. A frown appeared on her face as he continued, "But if it prevents Tom from becoming something he will one day regret to be, then I am willing to temporarily sacrifice his freedom. It will spare him a lot of grief."

Hermione raised her eyebrows in indignation. Anger was boiling up in her as she saw that sincerity on Dumbledore's face.

"Freedom?" she asked. Her voice was nothing more than a whisper but it shook with her suppressed fury. Then she hissed at him in a clipped voice, "It is more than freedom we are sacrificing here."

Her eyes wandered back to his face and locked with his light blue ones. If the old professor had spoken with Carter, why hadn't he realized how evil Carter was. Why hadn't Dumbledore legilimized Carter to find out what that swine had done to Tom. Or did Dumbledore know but just didn't care? Hermione pressed her lips into a thin line as she continued to coldly scan the professor.
Did he not care at all how Tom was treated? Had he never taken the time to really talk with Carter? Because then Dumbledore would have surely realized what a bigot Carter was.

Hermione lost her calm and snapped at Dumbledore, "As you spoke with Carter didn't you see what a prejudiced swine he is?"

Dumbledore raised his eyebrows at her outburst but then he stated in his collected voice, "I have talked with Mr Carter right after his predecessor, Mrs Cole, left Tom's orphanage. I realized back then that Mr Carter would be stricter than what Tom was used from Mrs Cole and I knew that it would be more difficult for Tom in his care. But the orphanage was still the only way to restrain Tom over the summer break."

"I am able to watch over him and prevent him from doing any harm whilst at school. But during the summer Tom would have the chance to do his misdeeds as I am not at Hogwarts during summer breaks. So I decided to take his wand from him over the break and send him back to the orphanage where he would at least be watched closely."

Hermione stared at Dumbledore with wide eyes. She still seethed but she was finally able to understand his plan. Though that didn't make her like it any more. Tom had hurt that child during the summer break after his first year. So Dumbledore had decided to take his wand from him whenever Tom had to return to the orphanage. He tried to prevent Tom from ever harming anyone again. But he only sent Tom back whenever he himself couldn't watch him. Therefore Tom had to return every summer break. That did also explain why Dumbledore had sent him back during this Christmas break. Hermione knew that the transfiguration professor had left the school during last break. That probably was the reason he had sent Tom back. That did explain Dumbledore's plan but still…

"After your first encounter with Carter did you ever meet him again?" Hermione asked him slowly.

This was important. If Dumbledore had met Carter again, that would mean that Dumbledore could have legitimized him or through some other way found out how Carter had treated Tom.

"Only shortly during this weekend. Before that we had contact through letters," Dumbledore replied calmly.

"Letters?" Hermione exclaimed incredulous. "You never thought it necessary to check how Tom was doing during break?"

"Ms DeCerto, rest assured that I did try everything to look after Tom but there were other things that demanded my attention as well." Dumbledore's tone was now cold as he hit her with a piercing gaze.

Hermione knew whom he was speaking of right now. Grindelwald, of course. His personal nemesis. So Dumbledore had neglected to look after Tom because he had been trying to find ways to stop Grindelwald. It was ironic, Hermione thought, that by trying to destroy one dark wizard Dumbledore had helped create another, even more powerful one.

She shouldn't be so surprised by Dumbledore's neglect though, Hermione thought enraged as she scanned the man. After all he had left Harry in the care of the Dursleys when he had known perfectly well that Harry would suffer there. After he had dumped baby Harry with the Dursleys he had never really checked on him again. At least not for the following ten years. So why would he devote any more attention to Tom when he hadn't even treated the Chosen-One any better?

But this also meant that Dumbledore didn't know. He had no idea what he condemned Tom to by sending him back to Carter.
Hermione now swayed between understanding the old professor's actions and hating him for hurting Tom like that. She could see why Dumbledore had sent Tom back to the orphanage without his wand. But what about Tom? Hermione wondered enraged. Back then he himself had still been a child. Her thoughts jumped back to New Year's Eve and the story Tom had told her then. He had told her how Carter had hurt him so much that Tom had nearly died.

Whatever Dumbledore's plan had been he should never have allowed something like that to happen. If he really felt responsible for Tom, then he shouldn't just concentrate on how to prevent Tom from doing evil things. No, Dumbledore should also assure that no harm came to Tom. Obviously something the professor had not foreseen in this plan of his.

Hermione sighed then she said somewhat irritated, "Professor, I know you try to help Tom. But can't you see this is the wrong way? Do you think you can constrain Tom forever? Even if you take Tom's wand away and force him to live with Muggles, he will still remain to be a wizard. The only thing you will achieve by expelling Tom and sending him back to the orphanage is that his hate will intensify."

Dumbledore still regarded her with his clear blue eyes.

"No, Ms DeCerto. This is his only chance. He cannot stay here. He has proven it again and again that he can not be trusted. Now he did it again. Against his word he left the orphanage. I am quite sure this was not the only crime he committed during the break."

Hermione had the unpleasant impression that Dumbledore was now speaking about the housebreaking of Flame's flat. Yet another thing Tom was innocent of. But she couldn't tell Dumbledore that it had been her.

"Tom has been with me during the whole break, sir," she instead told Dumbledore though she didn't feel as calm as her voice sounded like. "He never had the time to do anything without me noticing. And he didn't even have a wand."

"Hermione, you must trust my judgment in this occasion," Dumbledore finally said suavely and Hermione noticed his sudden use of her first name. "I have known Tom for quite some time now and you can believe me when I say that I tried everything else to save him." Then he added sadly, "Nothing worked. All was in vain. This is the very last chance Tom has to lead a normal life."

A normal life? Hermione thought enraged. What did Dumbledore intend to do if his plan didn't work out the way he wanted it to? Throw Tom into Azkaban?

"You still want to expel him? I really couldn't convince you otherwise?" she asked in a icy cold voice.

Dumbledore just stared at her and the harsh glint in his eyes told her that she indeed hadn't been successful.

"Professor, I know that you don't believe my story but still you have never asked me why I made Tom leave the orphanage in the first place," she said in a very soft voice.

Actually Hermione didn't want to tell Dumbledore how Tom got abused every time he had to return to the orphanage. She was pretty sure that Tom didn't want him to know. But she really thought that the professor should learn the truth. He was responsible for Tom's suffering after all. She breathed in deeply before she looked back at Dumbledore. He still fixed her with this cold stare that missed every bit of warmth she normally connected with him.
"Please, Ms DeCerto, share your story with me," Dumbledore said frostily. "But do not expect me to change my mind."

Hermione looked away from him and again out of the window. By now sleet was falling wetly down on the castle and the surrounding grounds. It looked cold and uninviting. The weather was just as bad as Hermione's mood. She unfixed her eyes from the window and looked back at Dumbledore. He was staring at her with his piercing light-blue eyes. She could see skepticism and even suspicion in them.

Hermione said in a perfectly steady voice, "Did you know that Tom gets beaten at the orphanage?"

Dumbledore's expression didn't change. But Hermione could see a small spark of surprise in his eyes.

"Did he tell you that?" he asked her and Hermione had to suppress a shudder as she heard the coldness in his tone.

"No, I saw it," she replied, her voice was tight and did not transport any of the emotions which now run through her.

There was still disbelief and even suspicion in Dumbledore's eyes. But Hermione went on for she could also spot a little bit of doubt on the professor's face.

Hermione sighed softly before she began, "You have to know, before the break I didn't like Tom very much. It was only a few days into the break that I met him by pure coincidence. I hadn't even known that he lived in London."

Hermione decided to not tell Dumbledore how she had run into Tom right after she had stolen Peverell's manuscript. So she conveniently jumped over that part of her story and continued, "Anyway, I decided to visit him in his orphanage. And do you know where I found him?" she asked Dumbledore, unable to suppress all the accusation from her voice. Before the old wizard could say anything she rushed on and now she didn't even try anymore to ban the anger from her tone,

"Tom was locked up in a room in the cellar. And he was badly hurt because your dear Mr Carter had thought it necessary to flog him."

Hermione knew her fury was now clearly visible on her face as she glared at Dumbledore. He in turn was looking back at her and a deep frown had appeared on his face. But whatever he thought Hermione could still see the mistrust in his eyes. He wasn't believing her.

"If you don't believe me, sir, have a look at my memory," she snapped at him in a flush of anger. Her eyes locked with his and she shoved the picture of how she had found Tom huddled on the floor in that dirty chamber to the forefront of her mind.

"Have a look," she huffed at him. "I know that you can."

There was surprise crossing Dumbledore's face. But then she could feel the tingling sensation of Legilimency tugging at her mind. Hermione lowered her Occlumency shields to admit him in. She shuddered as she felt another presence in her mind. But she needed Dumbledore to see this memory otherwise he wouldn't believe her. If he tried to have a look at her other memories though, Hermione wasn't going to hesitate to push him out of her mind. After a while she could feel him leaving her mind again and immediately she let her shields fall back in place. Dumbledore looked at her and she could see something like regret in his eyes.
"I can now understand why you are trying to help him," he said in a quiet tone. "I am very shocked at how Tom has been treated."

Dumbledore leaned back in his chair and eyed her pensively. Hermione had no idea what he was thinking right now. But after this revelation she was pretty sure he would not send Tom back to the orphanage. That would be cruel and just wrong.

Dumbledore sighed tiredly and then continued in a severe voice, "It seems I have wronged Tom."

Hermione breathed out relieved. She had known it. She had known that she only had to confide in Dumbledore and then he would help her. He had always helped her. What a great loss it had been for her side as he had been killed at the end of her sixth year, Hermione mused as she scanned the old wizard fondly. She just wished that he had been able to see how strong Harry had become in the end. Dumbledore would have been so proud of him.

Hermione was brought out of her memories as Dumbledore spoke again, "I will see to it that Mr Carter gets replaced."

She blinked in confusion but then said, "You are right. That man shouldn't be allowed to watch over children."

Hermione felt a little guilty. She had always worried about Tom but there were still other children in that orphanage. Only Merlin knew what Carter had done to them.

But then Dumbledore continued, "In the mean time Tom still has to stay at the orphanage. But I will make sure that he doesn't get hurt anymore."

Hermione felt her world crashing down around her as she was gaping at the old wizard with wide eyes. Her head was swirling and her blood turned cold from the shock.

"What?" she exclaimed scandalized. "You surely don't plan to sent Tom still back, do you?"

He hadn't understood the severity, it seemed. Hermione shook her head as she tried to grasp the situation. She had been so sure that Dumbledore wouldn't sent Tom back if he just knew.

"You don't understand," she all but yelled at him, panic and a fair amount of rage got the better of her. "I'm not talking about a small slap on his wrist. Tom gets abused there!"

Dumbledore still looked at her gravely. But Hermione shuddered as she saw determination in his eyes. Then he said, trying to sound soothing, "Do not worry. I will ensure that Tom doesn't get beaten again. But at the moment I am not willing to let him stay here at Hogwarts any longer."

Hermione stared at him in disbelief. She opened her mouth to object but Dumbledore continued as he saw her outrage. His voice was mingled with regret and even guilt but it still didn't shook, the determination was ever present on his face.

"Tom's treatment in the orphanage was wrong and despicable, and it of course has to stop, but this does not change the underlying problem. I have tried to help Tom back on the right path for long enough. I cannot do that anymore. He is not willing to change. We have now reached a point where it is not longer possible to help him at the expense of others."

"But… but…" Hermione stammered as she stared at the professor with wide eyes.

"No!" she then really yelled at him.
Her fury was boiling over and she didn't care anymore to maintain her cool. She jumped to her feet and stared at the wizard furiously. She had to stop herself from flicking her wrist and releasing her wand. Even her magic now flowed through her angrily.

"You can't do this! You can't sent him back," Hermione spat at Dumbledore venomously. "Whatever you say to Carter you can't be sure he's not going to hurt Tom again."

Hermione's thoughts shot back to the last time she had seen Carter. That had been down in that disgusting chamber in the cellar. He had been right in the process of belting Tom. She remembered how she had then lost her control and had cursed Carter. What if that terrible man now wanted revenge for that? Dumbledore could not send Tom back into the clutches of that man.

"At this point in time there really is no better solution. I will no longer risk the safety and even lives of the other students just to accommodate Tom," Dumbledore told her calmly. He was not in the least bit impressed by her angry outburst. He hadn't even batted an eye. Hermione was shocked that he was ready to sacrifice Tom's well-being to protect others from his so-called 'evilness'.

"You have to trust me when I say that I will do everything to prevent Tom coming to any harm," he concluded.

'Do everything'? Hermione run a hand through her hair. This wasn't happening right now. It couldn't be happening!

But here he sat, Dumbledore, while he looked at her expectantly. Did he think she would now just consent with his cruel plan? Her blood was boiling in anger at that thought. She was NOT going to do that. She wasn't going to let Dumbledore proceed with his plan to destroy Tom. Wrath and desperation ripped at her fiercely. Even her magic had by now left her body and crackled around her angrily. She glared at the wizard before her. But Dumbledore was just looking at her curiously. He was not in the least bit affected by the pressure of her angry magic that now hung in the air.

Hermione breathed in deeply and then released the breath slowly. She wouldn't achieve anything by trying to curse Dumbledore. She needed her self-control back. Hermione stared into those clear blue eyes and tried to calm down her temper. The fury left her face and it suddenly morphed into a cold, blank mask, giving nothing away. She could even feel her magic stop to rage around her. It had been an angry torrent flowing inside of her rather aimlessly. Now it just wrapped around her mind coldly, helping to clear her thoughts. She still stared at Dumbledore, though her eyes where no longer burning with ire. They were now just gauging him coldly. Then she slowly sat back down on the chair as a plan started to form in her mind.

Hermione closed her eyes shortly. She knew what she was going to do next would most likely sever all ties she had or could have had with this Dumbledore from the past. She actually didn't want him as her enemy, especially not because she still needed to get the Elder Wand from him. But right now, she didn't see any other way out of this. She was not going to let him send Tom back. So she went on with that new plan before she would lose her nerve.

She opened her mouth and she nearly shuddered as she heard that detached coldness in her own voice, "Sir, whatever you have on Tom. I still have a very clear memory of how I found him in the orphanage."

She leaned a little forwards in her chair and stared at him unblinkingingly before she proceeded, "So, if you want him expelled, I'm going to show everyone how he gets treated in that place. That is not going to put you in a very favourable light."

She could almost see the disappointment seeping into his gaze as he now regarded her. Hermione was irritated as guilt washed over her but what else could she do other than play dirty?

Dumbledore shook his head slightly then he said in a sad but all the same firm voice, "Ms DeCerto, I do not care how the public is assessing me. If I have to lose my face in the eyes of the public to save Tom, so be it."

Hermione was in inner turmoil. But there was nothing of it showing on her blank face as she continued to coldly stare at Dumbledore. She should have known that attacking his reputation wouldn't work. Dumbledore had never attached much importance to how he was seen in public. But there still was one thing she could use. Hermione felt horrible for doing it and she hated herself for blackmailing her old teacher. It was rather sick that this threat was coming from her, a Muggleborn.

"Maybe," Hermione said slowly.

She leaned comfortably back in her chair and forced a cruel smirk on her face. She hated what she was doing here but there was no other way. So, she smirked at him smugly while she inwardly cringed as she saw the regret in his eyes while he scanned her. The evil smile never left her face as she then executed her plan. The voice that now left her mouth sounded foreign to her own ears. It was scary and so full of scorn and malice that it was barely recognizable.

"In the current climate where the hate against Muggles is slowly rising, you don't want the information of a Muggle using physical violence against a wizard-child to make the rounds. Do you, professor?"

There was sadness creeping into Dumbledore's gaze as he looked at her. The twinkle that otherwise made his eyes radiate serenely had by now completely vanished. Hermione had to fight to maintain the cruel mask that still covered her face.

"Would you really go so far?" Dumbledore asked her quietly, the disappointment clear in his tone. "And risk the lives of innocent people?"

No, never! Hermione screamed in thoughts. But her mind was expertly occluded and her face was shut down completely.

So Dumbledore had no way of knowing that she was bluffing as she now replied lightly in an almost bored sounding voice, "It's not me risking anything, sir. It is your decision."

Dumbledore looked at her for a long time but Hermione held his gaze. Though she felt like despicable scum under this scrutinizing gaze of his. She wanted nothing more than to tell him everything. How she wasn't the evil criminal he now assumed her to be. How she had travelled here from a time of war and grief. She wanted him to understand that she wasn't a dark witch trying to free her partner in crime.

But despite her urge to confide in the old wizard Hermione remained silent. Her face was a blank mask only disturbed by the perfidious smirk, still tugging at the corners of her mouth. She was giving nothing away of her inner struggle. Even as Dumbledore's next words hit her very deeply she still didn't let her mask slip.

"It seems I have been wrong about you, Ms DeCerto," Dumbledore said softly but Hermione didn't even cringe as she saw the disappointment in his eyes. Then he acknowledged her victory in a grave voice, "I will comply with your wishes."

Hermione inclined her head slightly though she never broke eye contact with the wizard. Then she slowly got up from her chair. She wanted to quickly leave the office. The disappointment in Dumbledore's eyes were more than unbearable.

Before she could walk away Dumbledore said in a quiet voice, "I hope you know what you are doing, Ms DeCerto. I hope you know."

Hermione nodded more in acknowledgement than because she wanted to answer in the affirmative. Then she turned away from Dumbledore and walked over to the door leading out of his office. All the while she wondered if the old and innocent Hermione who had so obviously died during the war, would have done the same thing.

_Probably not._

Now she could feel it even more than two days ago as she had stood on top of the Astronomy tower. Things had changed. _She_ had changed. She had become harder, more callous. She was ready to do many things if it helped her purpose. For the first time since arriving in the past she wondered into what house the Sorting Hat would have put her if she hadn't intervened. Would she have again ended up in Gryffindor? The house of the brave and honest?

Hermione raised her hand and reached for the handle of the door leading out of Dumbledore's office. It felt like she was leaving behind more than just the messy but cozy transfiguration teacher's office. Without a backwards glance Hermione opened the door and stepped out on the dark corridor. With a soft thud she closed the door behind her.

She turned and found Tom standing in the corridor. Her eyes softened as they fell on him. He appeared to be at ease but from the slight differences in his stance she could tell how tense he really was. The stony expression on his face gave nothing away from his inner tension. She cast him a small smile before she walked over to him. She stopped directly in front of him and raised her head to look up at him. His face was still showing no emotion at all but Hermione could see his anxiety glinting through those incredibly grey eyes.

She raised her hand and laid her palm gently on his chest. The green fabric of his sleeveless pullover felt rough on her skin. But she could feel the heat of his body through the material as she still stared up at his face. The guilt of having abandoned Dumbledore and with him another part of the old Hermione still ripped at her but it was dimmed as she drowned herself in Tom's eyes.

"He is not going to expel you," she finally whispered to him in a gentle voice.

Through her hand which still lay on his chest she could feel Tom releasing a shaky breath as he heard her words. Then he stepped closer to her and wrapped his arms around her before he pulled her against him, almost desperately. She could feel him burying his face in her curly hair.

"Thank you," she heard him whisper.

A smile stole on her face as she heard his words. It was a surprise to hear Lord Voldemort thanking her. Though it was already the second time he did that.

"You are welcome," Hermione told him in a soft voice.

She was never going to make it, Tom thought panicky as he stared at the door across from him. He had his hands balled so tightly that the fingernails were cutting into his skin. Hermione would never be able to persuade Dumbledore. That hateful, old man would never let such an opportunity pass. He despised Tom. Why should he suddenly change his mind? That man had always wanted to expel Tom. Now he had the perfect excuse to do just that. Tom somehow regretted that he had left the orphanage during the break. Maybe he should have just stayed there and endured the pain. He shook his head in frustration. That would have meant two more weeks at the mercy of Carter. Tom ran a trembling hand over his face. Who knew how long he would have had to stay locked up in that chamber if Hermione hadn't found him.

Tom's head shot up as he heard the door being opened. He stared with wide eyes at Hermione as she walked over to him. She looked so serious, Tom thought as he scanned her face. Did that mean she had been unsuccessful?

Tom gulped as she stopped in front of him and gazed up into his eyes. There was sadness glinting in her eyes.

_She couldn't convince him_, Tom realized crestfallen.

No, he couldn't go back to the orphanage. He wouldn't.

Then Hermione opened her mouth and Tom dreaded to hear what she was about to tell him. "He is not going to expel you."

Tension was falling from him as realization hit him. She had really managed to stop Dumbledore? He stared at her in wonder. On impulse he stepped closer to her and wrapped his arms around her before he pulled her tightly against him. He needed to feel her close now. He buried his face in her curly hair and smelled that faint scent of lilac coming from her.

"Thank you." The words had left his mouth before he could have stopped himself.

He then felt Hermione's arms snaking around him while she said, "You are welcome."

Tom was immensely relieved. He had never expected her to convince Dumbledore. She never ceased to amaze him. Though now he was also deeply confused. He had actually expected her to leave him right after he had told her about how he had cursed that boy with the Haz Curse. But she still hadn't left him. She knew what he had done. By using that curse he had condemned that boy to a fate worse than death. Yet here she was, by his side.

Hermione just seemed to accept that dark side of him. She accepted _him_. All his life Tom had never showed his true self to anyone. He had learned early on that he was better of masking that dark part of him.

Thus Hermione… confused him.

"Let's go!" she whispered, neatly bringing him out of his pondering.

Her hazel eyes scanned him softly then she said quietly, "I don't want to stay here any longer."

Tom's eyes shot to the ominous door which led to Dumbledore's office and he nodded. He released Hermione again but still held to her hand tightly as he followed her down the corridor.

"What did you tell him?" he asked her after a while.

She turned her head and raised her eyebrows at him.

"How did you convince him to let me stay?"

"The very same way he tried to force you to go back to the orphanage," Hermione answered him cryptically.
Tom scanned her for a while before he slowly asked, "Blackmail?"

He could see in her expression that she was surprised he had seen the connection so fast.

"Yes," she whispered.

"How?"

There was a sad expression on her face as she whispered, "I'm not very proud of it, let's not talk about Dumbledore anymore."

Tom decided to let the matter drop. At least for now. He was still too amazed that Hermione had actually managed to persuade Dumbledore.

Or blackmail him! he thought contented as he glanced at the witch walking beside him.

He then noticed that the euphoria of being able to stay at Hogwarts was mingled with something else. Now that he eyed Hermione it hit him again, that greedy feeling. Ever since Christmas break it had been his constant companion. That feeling had burned up in him whenever he had looked at her, fiercely demanding to take possession of her. Now he was once again overwhelmed by this avidly feeling as his gaze wandered over her form beside him. A smile crept on his face as he scanned her untamable hair.

He wondered how he could have wasted all this time with fighting her and trying to subdue her before the Christmas break. Now she was so much more than just another opponent he had to defeat. By winning against Dumbledore she had again proven how valuable she truly was. Tom did not intent to ever let her go. With her actions today Hermione had finally admitted that she was his, Tom realized satisfied. She had obviously stopped to fight against it. Tom was glad that he had managed to gain her allegiance in the end and that she had finally abandoned her resistance against him.

He pulled her a little closer to him. She looked up and cast him a small smile.

Tom was quite satisfied with the knowledge that he had finally succeeded with obtaining her. Though he did notice that the greed he felt was now mixed with something else. Something Tom couldn't quite identify. But he didn't fight that odd feeling as it was quite nice. Warm and comfortable.

Tom was immersed in his own thoughts and was surprised at how quickly they had reached the Gryffindor common room. Too quickly, actually. He didn't want to leave Hermione now. The avidly feeling still ripped at him and he didn't want to let her go. As Hermione turned around to whisper the password to that absurd portrait, Tom lost his self-restraint and stopped her by grabbing her wrist. Then he twirled her around so that she tumbled against his chest. She raised her face at him and searched him with confusion in her eyes.

"What-?"

She started to ask but Tom didn't leave her enough time to end her question. He pressed his lips over hers. He could feel her tense in surprise at his sudden actions. But then she began to respond to his kiss. He hugged her tightly against him and didn't leave her much room to move as he continued to kiss her fiercely.

He knew his kiss was demanding, almost bruising. But he couldn't stop himself. It wasn't enough. He needed to feel her now. He wanted to feel her bare skin under his fingers. His hand wandered down her back. As it reached the seam of her blouse it slipped underneath and began to caress the soft skin of her stomach. His other arm still held her pressed tightly against him while he continued to kiss her passionately. Then his lips left her mouth and wandered down her neck. He could hear her cry out in surprise as he bit her gently. His hand still run over her warm skin while his mouth wandered back to her lips to again capture them in another voluptuous and even ferocious kiss.

As he finally released her lips again he needed to gasp for air. He glanced down at her and saw an odd glint in her hazel eyes as she stared at him. Tom feared that he had gone too far as Hermione suddenly removed her arms from their position slipped around his waist. She then raised her arms and cupped his cheeks with both her hands. Tom's eyebrows shot up in surprise as she pulled his head down, rather forcefully. Her lips crashed on his own and she started to kiss him. He could feel one of her hands falling down to his shoulder while the other had wandered to the back of his neck.
Then her lips left his mouth and Tom moaned softly in pleasure as she trailed kisses along the line of his jaw while her hand run demanding and even gruffly through his hair.

By the time she released him again he was breathing heavily. Hermione looked up at him, her brown eyes were sparkling at him so excitingly. Then she leaned against him and put her head against his chest. Tom automatically slid his arms around her and held her to him.

But he quickly released her again as he suddenly heard steps coming from the corridor behind him.
Hopefully that wasn't any teacher, he thought as he took a step away from Hermione. If a teacher had seen them kissing, that would get them both into detention. Though Hermione would be punished even stricter as she was a girl. Tom turned his head to look at whoever walked towards them. If it really was a teacher, he would do his best to talk the professor out of punishing them for PDA.

However, as he recognized the person walking towards them, an evil smirk formed on his face. It was this idiotic Gryffindor boy, Marc Longbottom. Judging by that angry purple colour of his face and the glare he sent Tom's way that git had seen how Tom had kissed Hermione. Tom inclined his head in a mocking gesture of greeting as the Gryffindor boy passed them. He was immensely satisfied as he saw that glare on Longbottom's face intensify. Tom even had to suppressed the urge to snicker evilly as disgust seeped into the other's gaze.

The Gryffindor idiot then passed them without saying a word before he hissed the password at the portrait and entered the common room. After the wanker had left the corridor Tom looked down at Hermione. She just turned around to him again and Tom raised his eyebrows as he saw a sad expression on her face. Then she stepped closer to him and leaned against him, clutching the fabric of his jumper in her hands while she buried her face in his chest. Tom wrapped his arms around her protectively. It was then that he realized that the stupid Gryffindor boy hadn't just looked at him with that disgust burning in his eyes. He had looked at Hermione in the same way.
Green, The Colour Of…

Hermione stepped out of the Household class room. The aversion she had felt for this particular class had slowly developed into hate. The worst thing, though, was that Legifer hadn't hesitated to remind her of the detention Hermione would have to attend today. Obviously Legifer insisted that she read that stupid book.

_Etiquettes for the Young Housewitch._ Seriously, what is that hag thinking? Hermione wondered infuriated.

Whenever she thought about that book lying in her dormitory she could feel her level of annoyance rise to the point where she wanted to just hex Legifer to kingdom come.

Currently Hermione was walking over to her Transfiguration classroom. Maybe that was the reason she indulged into stupid mental rants. The thought of her next class didn't exactly improve her already bad mood. Since she had spoken with - or rather blackmailed - Dumbledore on Monday, Hermione had done her best to avoid her Transfiguration teacher. There always bubbled up the guilt and shame whenever she thought about him. She didn't regret her actions as there hadn't been any other option to help Tom. That knowledge still didn't dispel the guilt. So Hermione had tried to evade Dumbledore. Problem was that today was a Friday and her next class was Transfiguration. No way could she still avoid meeting Dumbledore.

_You've blackmailed Albus Dumbledore, for God's sake!_ an inner voice, which sounded suspiciously like Harry's, screamed at her reproachfully. _To help whom exactly?_

Hermione ran a hand through her messy locks. Her other hand clutched her school bag tightly as she slowly walked towards her transfiguration class room.

_Voldemort!_ the same voice now hissed the answer at her bitingly.

That sounded really bad, Hermione had to admit. She had turned her back on Dumbledore to help Lord Voldemort. If someone had told her that a few months ago, she would have laughed her head off… or hexed the head off whoever suggested something like that. But however bad it sounded Hermione just didn't feel guilty at all for having helped Voldemort.

_No, not Voldemort! I tried to help my boyfriend,_ Hermione corrected herself. _Because I don't want him to get hurt._

Yes, she might feel terrible of having abandoned Dumbledore and with him a part of her old life but she didn't feel bad at all for having helped Tom. Hermione ended that inner argument as she had finally arrived at the Transfiguration classroom. Obviously Dumbledore hadn't yet arrived as the door was still closed and the other students were loitering in the corridor. She couldn't help but notice how the students were neatly separated by house. The Slytherins stood at one side of the corridor while the Gryffindors stood on the other. Though now it seemed those two adverse houses were somehow united, at least the girls from those houses. They were right now glaring rather hostilely at Hermione. Not all of them, of course, but still quite a few. Hermione decided to just ignore this immature behaviour as there were a few things unsettling her a lot more.

She let her gaze wander over the students and it quickly landed on three Gryffindor boys. Lupin, Weasley and Longbottom were standing right beside the door. A small smile appeared on Hermione's face as she saw her three friends. She just wondered if she should walk over to them as Longbottom looked in her direction. His eyes wandered over her coldly and Hermione stiffened as she saw anger flooding his face. It made her sad seeing her friend act like this. Not even the encouraging looks Lupin and Weasley threw her way could convince her to join them now.

Longbottom hadn't spoken one word with her ever since he had stormed out of that classroom after she had told him Tom was her boyfriend. Whenever they met, which didn't happen often these days as he was obviously avoiding her, he just ignored her. Hermione was surprised by how much his rejection affected her. But it did hurt. Especially as she could see disgust glinting in Longbottom's eyes whenever he saw her together with Tom.

"I've missed you." A deep voice came from behind her. The light taunt immediately told her whom that voice belonged to.

A smile appeared on Hermione's face and she ignored the angry frown she could now see on Longbottom's face. Then she turned around to face Tom.

"Hey, Tom," she replied.

He smirked down at her and asked, "How was your day so far?"

Hermione just rolled her eyes. "Horrible, I had Household."

Tom chuckled amused before he said in an innocent tone, "Hmm, Household. Still your favourite class I see."

She forced a sweet smile on her face and then replied while trying to suppress an amused giggle, "It sure is. Maybe next time you could join us."

Tom just smirked condescendingly down at her before he said with light scoff tinting his voice, "No, thank you. I think I'll stick with Arithmancy."

Hermione just wanted to comeback with an especially witty reply as she spotted Dumbledore coming down the corridor. Hermione stepped a little closer to Tom and somehow hid behind him. She really wasn't very keen on meeting Dumbledore after that act of the evil witch she had pulled on him.

Tom had raised his eyebrows in confusion as she hadn't replied anything to his taunt. But now he turned around and saw the cause for her sudden nervousness. Some of her tension disappeared as she felt how Tom gently took hold of her hand. Her gaze wandered from Dumbledore back to Tom. By now his grey eyes were softly sparkling down at her.

He leaned down to her and whispered in her ear, "Don't worry. He still hates me more than you."

As he bent up again a smirk was plastered all over his face but she could still spot softness glinting in his eyes. He pressed her hand reassuringly before he let go again and they walked into the class room. Hermione slowly entered the room and then went over to her table while determinedly trying to ignore Longbottom who was her seat neighbour. But she could still see the angry frown on his face as she sat down beside him. Just to divert herself from her enraged seat neighbour she let her gaze wander the classroom. Unfortunately she somehow found herself looking at the other person she tried to ignore. Dumbledore was looking back at her and Hermione could feel a stab in her chest as she was again hit by the disappointment behind his eyes. She felt rather forlorn to see that suspicion and even hostility on his face but still she didn't allow her feelings to show on her face. She controlled her emotions rigidly and forced an expressionless look on her face. It was shameful, she knew it, but it was also necessary. Dumbledore needed to be convinced that she was in fact an evil witch.
He had to believe that she was capable to go through with the threat she had thrown his way. If he doubted that she would indeed use her knowledge to deepen the hate between wizards and muggles, there would be the risk of him expelling Tom after all. So there now was this despicable mask of boredom covering her face as she stared back at Dumbledore while she tried to ignore the painful stab in her chest. Finally Dumbledore looked away again and Hermione inwardly sighed though she still maintained her cover. Hermione then watched Dumbledore smile kindly at the class in general. Though she couldn't help but feel a little sad as she knew that his kindness wasn't directed at her anymore.

"Today will be a practical class," the old professor then said as his eyes were twinkling merrily.

His announcement was met by enthusiastic chatter but Dumbledore raised a hand and the upcoming noise quickly died down again.

"Kindly take one of those screwdrivers and try to confer a little of your magic into them," he told them serenely. "I know, that spell is rather difficult but I have confidence that you can manage."

With that Dumbledore handed one of the students a box full of screwdrivers. When the box reached her table Longbottom handed her the box without even looking at her. He seemed to be really determined in ignoring her.

Hermione took one of the screwdrivers. She could only hope that Longbottom was going to get around his issues. Instead of worrying more about the blond Gryffindor she now looked down at her screwdriver. She really wondered if all the purebloods in this room even knew what that tool was used for. She grinned, lost in her thoughts. Then her gaze wandered over the class room. She ended up looking at Dumbledore and the grin quickly died from her face. Hermione turned a little in her seat and looked at Tom who was sitting behind her. She noticed that he hadn't even taken one of the screwdrivers. He was just sitting there with a rather scary expression on his face as he threw a dark look Dumbledore's way. But now he noticed that she was looking at him. Tom's eyes wandered from the professor to Hermione and she was glad to see that the frightening anger left him as he now looked at her. His eyes sparkled softly at her and a small smile tugged at the corners of his mouth. Hermione smiled back at him. Maybe Dumbledore now hated her but at least she wasn't alone. Somehow reassured she turned around to her screwdriver again. She glared darkly at the tool. It actually hurt her pride a lot that she hadn't yet managed that spell to transfer magic. It couldn't be that hard could it? Tom had managed it after his first try.

Yeah, but then again he's Tom, a nasty voice mocked her.

Hermione angrily flicked her wrist so that her wand landed in her hand. She waved it at the screwdriver.

"Confero."

Nothing happened. She breathed in deeply to calm herself down. Then she again brandished her wand.

"Confero," she whispered in a firm voice.

This time she could feel her magic reaching out for the screwdriver. There was a small stream of her magic flowing into the tool. But Hermione knew it was no good as she wasn't able to control it at all. Soon after that the stream died down again and Hermione sighed. She looked at the screwdriver lying innocently on the table. It really irritated her how she was unable to get this spell right. She had read a lot about it, after all, in Peverell's manuscript. Involuntarily her thoughts wandered to the small book and then from Peverell to the Elder Wand. Since she had managed to awake the Elder Magic consciously for the first time at the beginning of this week, Hermione had trained this ability. It still was tremendously difficult to control the Elder Magic but it had gotten easier. Her eyes were still fixed on the screwdriver while she tapped her wand impatiently against the palm of her left hand.

Maybe I should just try it, she thought as an idea popped up in her mind. She needed to do that anyway sooner or later. Why not try it now?

Hermione closed her eyes and concentrated solely on her magic. After some time she finally spotted the Elder Magic hidden in her own. She nudged it softly and soon it reacted to her. It grew and grew until it completely wrapped around her. Hermione had to concentrate on the magic to keep it in this state. As she was sure that she had the Elder Magic under control her gaze wandered back to the screwdriver.

"Confero," she whispered in a pressed voice.

She nearly gasped out loud as she sensed the Elder Magic now wrapping even tighter around her. It was difficult to tell where the Elder Magic ended and where her magic began. Before Hermione could dwell on that any longer she could feel a stream of her magic flowing to the screwdriver. Unlike before, though, it was much easier to control. After some time Hermione deliberately ended the stream of magic. The Elder Magic quickly unwrapped from her and fell back in place hidden underneath her own magic. Hermione's breathing was laboured and she felt really drained. But as she looked at the screwdriver she could see how it was suddenly surrounded by a blue light. It pulsed shortly before it died down again. A smile appeared on Hermione's face as she stared at the screwdriver.

No, not screwdriver. Magical object, she thought happily.

She had finally managed that spell. And, Hermione realized self-satisfied, she had used the Elder Magic to do that. It had been rather difficult and she felt now extremely tired but still the Elder Magic had obeyed her temporarily. Hermione looked up from the magical object now lying on her table. Then the satisfied smile quickly died from her face as she found Dumbledore looking at her. He had obviously seen her accomplishing this difficult spell. But there was no kind twinkle in his eyes and he didn't seem to be proud at all that his student had managed this spell. He just looked at Hermione coldly. Then he turned around and began to explain something to another student.

Hermione felt her stomach flop. He had seen her getting the spell right, but still he hadn't rewarded her any points or had acknowledged her success in any way. She looked back at the screwdriver, not feeling so happy anymore. But really, she shouldn't be surprised by Dumbledore's behaviour. He thought she was an evil witch now. Why would he want to praise her work?

Still, it hurt.

"Do you want to go to the Library?" Tom, who was walking beside her, asked.

Hermione glanced at him. "No, I still have… something to do. How about we meet later?"

She actually didn't want to leave him right now but there was really something she needed to do. Something she had procrastinated for too long already. Just to alleviate her guilty conscience she would go back to Peverell's manuscript today.

I'm not going to find anything anyway, she reassured herself as she looked up into Tom's startlingly grey eyes.
"Hmm… okay," Tom conceded reluctantly. "When?"

"I dunno," she replied slowly. Then she narrowed her eyes angrily and continued, "I have detention with Legifer at six."

Hermione pressed her mouth in a thin line as she saw amusement entering Tom's gaze. Then he said infuriatingly helpful, though he wasn't able to ban all the scorn from his voice, "I dearly hope that will improve your seriously lacking housewife skills."

Then he smiled down at her innocently. The amusement in his eyes even intensified as Hermione started to glower at him darkly. Suddenly the mock left his face. He took a step towards her, reached for her and started to twirl one curly wisp of her hair around his finger.

"How about I get you from your common room at eight?" he said. As he saw the confusion on her face he added, "You didn't forget that Slughorn's party is today, did you?"

Indeed Hermione had forgotten. The Slug Club had one of its famous parties. She'd received an owl from Slughorn himself two days ago.

She stared up at him but then an arrogant smile appeared on her face before she said in a smug voice, "No, I didn't forget. But whoever said that I would go with you?"

Tom arched one eyebrow indignantly at her sass but then he bent down and whispered in her ear, "I always said you belong into Slytherin."

Shivers of pleasure ran down her spine as Tom gently brushed his lips against her cheek. After he had bent up again there was a self-satisfied smirk on his face while he scanned her flustered state.

"Of course you are going with me," he told her in quite the conceited tone. Then he scoffed. "Like you could ever resist my alluring company."

After that said he looked expectantly down at her, obviously waiting for some witty retort or other. But Hermione didn't reply anything. She just stepped closer to him. She stood on tiptoes, wrapped her arms around his neck and then placed a light kiss on his lips.

"Okay," she whispered to him seductively. "I'll be waiting for you then."

After she had released him again she looked up at his face. It was once again covered by the blank mask but Hermione chuckled amused as she spotted a faint hint of colour on his cheeks.

"See you then, Tom," she chirped cheerfully, her eyes flashing mischievously at him before she turned around and skipped down the corridor.

"Don't turn into one of those mindless fan-girls," he called after her and a wide smile stole on her face as she heard the taunt in his voice.

By the time Hermione arrived in her dormitory the happy smile had left her face just to be replaced by a frown as she stared down at her trunk. After a moment of hesitation, Hermione crouched down and angled the Peverell manuscript from the secret compartment in her trunk. Then she hopped on her soft bed and drew the covers shut around her. Hermione warily eyed the small book now lying in her hands. Somehow she really didn't want to read on. Whatever excuses her mind had come up with during the last few days there actually was only one explanation as to why she didn't want to find out more about the Elder Wand anymore.

I don't want to go back.
It was as simple as that. Hermione just didn't want to return to her own time period. Nothing was there for her. Only dreadful memories and a desolated land. Why would she want to return there?

Was it really her duty, her mission, to maintain the time line? She didn't even know if it was really necessary to protect it. Maybe it was impossible, after all, to change time. So, there was no use in returning to her time, was there? It wasn't like she had wanted to be hurled back through time in the first place. So whatever happened now it certainly wasn't her fault. She hadn't created that bothersome wand which seemed to play with the lives of people.

But amidst all those very good excuses not to continue reading the book, suddenly Longbottom's face sprang up in her mind and how he now looked at her in disgust and accusation. Then his face changed and it wasn't Longbottom looking at her in that way but Harry. If he could see her now, could see what she had become, he surely would be disgusted. Hermione felt a sharp stab in her stomach at the thought of Harry.

He had sacrificed so much. He had fought so bravely and never once had he let her down. And now, Hermione wondered dejectedly as guilt washed over her, how was she repaying him? He would be angry with her, and rightly so. Her hands grabbed Peverell's book tightly as she now imagined how Ron would have reacted to the whole situation. Maybe Hermione had let down Harry, but Ron she had betrayed. She had loved him and he had loved her. Hermione trembled as she remembered the day before they had gone and faced Voldemort in the Ministry of Magic. She had been so desperate, so scared. Still, Ron had tried to comfort her. He had been afraid himself but nonetheless he had only worried about her. It had been then that they had pledged to get married.

Hermione closed her eyes tightly, trying to dispel those wonderful, terrible memories. Then she opened them again and looked down at the small book in her hands.

She owed them!

Slowly she opened the book and began to read.

_The long awaited day has finally arrived. My work is finished and my brothers will arrive at the end of next week. I was uncertain that I would manage it in such short a time but I prevailed. In the last year I created something extraordinary, something unique. The wand I made is without a doubt the most powerful and impressive thing ever created by man. It is deserving of its name, the Unbeatable Wand._

_First I had to make a wand. It took me weeks and weeks to find the suitable wood for this aspiring project. In the end my decision fell on the wood of the elder bush. Then I cast the necessary spells to change the lifeless wood into a magical wand. After I had finished the wand, I started to transmit more and more of my Magic into the wand using the spells I had invented for the transmission of Magic into an object. Thus I changed the wooden stick from a wand into a magical object. The spells I had previously used to create the wand combined with the transferred Magic will accumulate the Wand's magical power even further, increasing its might illimitable. The more it is used the more its power will develop. The spells and charms I used to manipulate the transferred Magic of the Wand are so cleverly constructed that they work in harness with the residual spells from the wand making process._

_The result of my work is something beyond believe. Whoever wields that wand will be invincible. An ordinary wand's purpose is to serve as a mediator. The sorcerer uses the wand to channel his own Magic through the wood and into a spell or curse. The wand does nothing more than a riverbed does when it is directing the flow of the water. My Wand does so much more. It is filled with Magic and as soon as a wizard's hand touches the wood, this Magic will wrap itself around the wizard thus espousing the wizard's own Magic. Every spell will be more potent and working easier whilst using_ my Wand.

I am looking forward to seeing my brothers soon for I am sure they will bow down before my genius.

Peverell's personal entry ended and with trembling fingers Hermione flipped through the next few pages in the book. She bit her lip nervously as she indeed noticed that Peverell now described the process of how he created the Elder Wand. She stared at the yellowed pages for some time, then slowly and unsure of herself she closed the book.

She needed to read that book fast. That was her mission after all! It was her duty to find a way back in her time period. This mission was the sole reason why she was here at Hogwarts in the first place. It was wrong and dangerous for her to remain any longer in this time period than necessary.

Hermione laid one hand on the ragged cover of the Peverell manuscript. She needed to read on but…

She didn't want to.

What if she really found a way back? Then she would have to leave here. Leave this time period. Leave Tom.

Hermione shuddered as this thought formed in her mind. Nothing waited for her at home and now she had something to lose if she returned. After such a long time, an eternity really, Hermione felt happy again.

So what if she just stayed here in the past a little longer? It wouldn't hurt, would it? After all she had been here for some time already. Up to now she hadn't changed the future at all. Surely no harm would be done if she just enjoyed her life a little longer. Hadn't she deserved something like that anyway? So many bad things had happened but she still had fought for the right cause. Had done her very best. Wasn't it time that her sacrifices were rewarded?

Damn! Tom cursed as he closed another book and threw it at the rather huge pile of books already lying on his table. He grabbed for another huge tome, The Work Of The Greatest Wizards, read its title. He opened the book and flipped through its content until he came upon the name he searched for, Peverell. Then he began to read. After a while Tom closed the book in frustration and threw it to the others on the table. The book only contained a brief description of who Peverell was. But Tom already knew who exactly Peverell was. Honestly, who didn't?

Tom let his angry gaze wander over the pile of useless books. Those books were full of information about Peverell, describing his biography in excruciatingly detail or explaining with an almost embarrassing deference his achievements in the magical art.

Since Tom had read in the Prophet that someone broke into Nicolas Flamel's flat, he had suspected that the thief was Hermione. The Auror report, he had ordered Malfoy to get, had finally confirmed his suspicion. Moreover the report had also provided Tom with the information of what had been stolen: A book, written by Peverell himself. Now Tom searched Hogwarts' Library for any notion of that book but so far he had yet to come over any reference to it. It was rather frustrating, Tom decided as he leaned back in his chair. Why had Hermione risked so much to get this book. What did that book deal with?

Tom tiredly buried his face in his hands and sighed. He was currently lounging at a table in the Library and was rather glad that his table stood in a secluded area. Right now he couldn't stand the never-ending chatter of the other students. He especially couldn't stand those girls who always seemed to swarm around him. They giggled annoyingly or whispered with each other under their breaths whenever they thought he wasn't paying attention. Actually Tom was quite used to such behaviour but since he had kissed Hermione in the Great Hall those silly girls had somehow multiplied. It was really bothersome.

Not that he regretted having kissed Hermione in public, Tom thought as a smirk took form on his face. On the contrary, he was really relieved that she had finally abandoned the idea of hushing their relationship up. Now she seemed to have accepted that she belonged to him.

At the beginning of this week Hermione had done even more. She had helped him. Tom was still stunned how Hermione had saved him from being expelled. He had no idea how she had persuaded Dumbledore to let him stay but she had somehow managed. A small smile played around the corners of Tom's mouth. That had been the final proof that Hermione was his now. Tom grinned satisfied as he remembered how she had kissed him so fiercely in the corridor. That had been just before Longbottom had shown up...

Tom frowned at the thought of Longbottom. He hadn't liked it very much how that stupid Gryffindor had looked so deprecatingly at Hermione. Who did that git think he was? Tom wondered angrily. Though now he realized that it wasn't so much Longbottom's behaviour that disturbed him but Hermione's reaction. Tom balled his hands into tight fists as he remembered the sad expression on her pretty face after Longbottom had glared at her reproachfully. Why was it so damn important to her what that Gryffindor jerk thought about her?

Sure Longbottom is her friend, Tom thought wryly. But still...

Did she like that git so much? he wondered in annoyance. Suddenly a greedy feeling ripped at Tom, fiercely demanding that he took action. Hadn't Hermione gone to the last Slug party together with Longbottom?

This time around, he thought while trying to calm himself down. She's going with me not Longbottom.

It didn't work, though. Tom didn't calm down at all. The whole thing made him quite angry and furious. He actually wanted to curse the shit out of Longbottom and then make him-

"Tom, m'boy, still being studious despite it being Friday?" Tom's rather bloodthirsty thoughts were interrupted by a booming voice.

He looked up from the book in front of him and found Slughorn standing by the table and smiling broadly down at him. Tom quickly put on his charming façade of the perfect student and smiled humbly at the potions professor.

"No, sir," Tom replied politely. "This is just a little project of mine."

Slughorn leaned forward a little bit and looked curiously at the books being scattered all over the table in front of Tom.

After a moment he looked back at Tom before he said, "I am glad you found something else than... you-know-what." Slughorn whispered the last words softly.

At first Tom didn't understand but then he had to suppress a smirk as he remembered the topic of the last conversation they had had in private. A topic which Tom had rather neglected lately...

"I see, I see, Peverell, eh?" Slughorn continued good-naturedly as he let his eyes again travel over the books on the table.

The professor reached for one of the books.

"A rather fascinating appearance, Peverell, isn't he?" Slughorn said as he scanned the book's title. Then he winked at Tom in a conspiratorial way. "But don't get your hopes up, m'boy. Many have tried to find the Deathly Hallows but so far no-one succeeded."

Tom managed to stop himself from frowning in confusion. The Deathly Hallows? What was that?

"Deathly Hallows, sir?" he asked in a smooth voice, not betraying how interested he now truly was. Slughorn just waved a finger at Tom in mock rebuke.

"Don't tell me that's not the reason for your research," he smiled fondly down at Tom.

Then Slughorn pulled a gold clock out of the pocket of his green, silk vest and exclaimed, "God gracious, is it this late already?" He turned back to Tom and said, "Have to go, m'boy, have to go. Still so much to organize until the evening."

Then the professor hurried away but not without turning around once more and asking, "You are coming to the party, aren't you?"

Tom just nodded at the professor, his thoughts already a mile away.

_Deathly Hallows... Deathly Hallows..._

Tom scowled down at the books on his table. Somewhere he had read about that, hadn't he? But where? He skimmed a finger over the dusty spine of one of the books while trying to remember where exactly he had read that term before. It wasn't anything school related, of that he was sure.

_Deathly Hallows.

Tom straightened up in his chair as he remembered where he had read it. He quickly pulled his wand and waved it at the books lying in front of him. The books flew off the table and then soared towards their places on the shelves. Tom hastily grabbed his satchel and hurried out of the Library. He quickly made his way down to the dungeons towards the Slytherin common room. It wasn't long and he stood in his dormitory. Tom strode over to his part of the dorm and started to search through his books standing on a shelf. Then he finally came upon it. A rather old book with a leathery cover. Tom had nearly forgotten that he had checked it out of the Library all those months ago.

He scanned the title of the book: _Fables and Myths of Olden_. Tom could remember how he had found the book in the Library. Back then he had done some research in the Library as he had spotted Hermione sitting at one table and reading this very book. Though back then she hadn't been 'Hermione' yet. She had still been 'DeCerto' and Tom had hated her.

_How foolish._

But that was beside the point, he decided as he opened the old book. It was actually a book of fairy tales. Still he had read it as he had thought that there was something hidden in its pages.

Tom stood in his dormitory and continued to flip through the book until he came upon the chapter he had been searching for: _The Tale Of The Three Brothers._
It was exactly three minutes to six o'clock as Hermione stood before Legifer's office with that ridiculous book pinned under her arm.

_Tell me, why do I do this again?_ she asked herself in frustration. _Because you don't want to blow your cover, time traveller,_ came the unwanted but correct answer. With a annoyed sigh Hermione raised her hand and then knocked at the office door.

"Enter," came the immediate reply.

Hermione reluctantly opened the door and entered Legifer's office. She quickly let her gaze wander over the room. It was very much like she remembered it from her last visit here. Everything seemed to be obsessively tidy. There was not one thing out of place. Hermione tried to ignore this frighteningly cleanliness and instead concentrated on the woman sitting behind that polished wooden desk. Like always Legifer was clad in those annoyingly immaculate clothes. There was not one wrinkle in her perfectly white blouse and her dark-blue robe was equally stainless and just impeccable. Her black hair was again teased into a flawless hairdo. There was just nothing out of place on that woman it seemed.

_Aside from her sanity maybe._

Legifer stared at her with her sharp eyes. "Ms DeCerto," she greeted Hermione in her strict tone "Professor," Hermione said flippantly.

Legifer's eyes wandered from Hermione to the clock hanging at one wall. A rather evil smirk appeared on her face as she said, "I think this is a first, Ms DeCerto. I have never seen you being punctual."

Hermione pressed her lips into a thin line to stop herself from answering to that insult. Instead she contented herself with glaring at the professor darkly.

"Sit down. I don't want this detention to drag out forever," Legifer declared in her piercing voice.

She gestured at the chair standing before her desk so Hermione slumped down gracelessly. Then she slammed the stupid book she had been carrying with a loud thud on the desk while looking mutinously at Legifer. The witch didn't seem to be impressed by Hermione's disrespectful behaviour at all.

"I see there's a lot to do," she just commented dryly.

Hermione almost snorted at her but managed to stop herself in the last moment. Then she reached for her bag and produced a pierce of parchment and her quill from it. Then she looked back at Legifer.

"You may begin," she just said in her cold voice.

Hermione swallowed down her more than impudent reply and dearly hoped she wouldn't choke on all her anger. Then she took her quill and opened the hateful book.

'Chapter One', Hermione read. _From 58. Great!_

Her hand tightened around her quill as Hermione forced herself to read on.

'To achieve graces and a pleasant appearance is the first step to impress your future Husband. There is no better way to gain the favour of a man than to captivate him with your feminine charms.'
Hermione had just read this one sentence and she already felt like throwing up. Her eyes darted shortly to the huge clock hanging at one wall of Legifer's. It was five past six. She shuddered involuntarily. This detention seemed to turn into a torture session, didn't it? Her gaze now wandered to Legifer who still sat in front of her. Right now, the witch seemed to lean over an essay and was correcting the work of whatever poor soul had had to write it. Hermione sighed inaudible before she turned back to that horrible book.

Hermione searched through her trunk. Tossing around her clothes, potion ingredients and books. Finally she pulled a luridly green blouse out of the trunk. She furrowed her brow. When had she bought this crime to the fashion?

"What ya doing?" she heard a shrill voice behind her ask.

Hermione groaned inwardly. Then she turned her head around to have a look at Rose.

"I need to find something to wear," she explained curtly. "I'm going to the Slug Club with Tom."

She was rather late, too, Hermione thought frustrated. That evil hag had made her read in this stupid book for almost two hours. Seriously, what had she done to deserve something like that?

"Oh!" Lucia squealed delighted and sat up on the bed. "Your first date!"

"Yeah!" Rose agreed while there appeared a suspiciously glassy look in her eyes. "You need to be really prepared for that. And, of course, look gorgeous. It's Riddle after all. If he wanted he could have any girl here at Hogwarts. You have to be careful."

_Talk about shallow_, Hermione thought sardonically.

"You know," she told the two girls sitting on the bed, trying her best to dim their enthusiasm. "He already is my boyfriend so I think we are over this first date thing."

Though technically they really never had one, Hermione had to admit. _And thank God for that!_

She then turned away from the girls and intended to again go through her things because, honestly, she really couldn't wear this green monster, she thought as she picked up the green blouse again.

"But, Hermione, you want to look good for Riddle, don't you?" Luisa asked her. "If you wear that thing he's going to think you are ugly."

"That or colour-blind," Rose affirmed.

Hermione stared at them for a moment, still holding the greenish blouse in her hand. Then she said slowly, "I really don't care what he's thinking about my clothes."

She ignored the scandalized exclamations her answer had provoked but again went through her clothes.

"When's Riddle going to pick you up?" Lucia asked her after a while. She seemed to have gotten over her shock faster than Rose.

"Dunno," Hermione mumbled distractedly. "At around eight, I think. Why?"

Hermione jumped and nearly pulled her wand as she heard that panicky cry that followed her statement.
"But Hermione that's already in half an hour. And you still haven't decided what to wear?" Rose exclaimed shrilly.

"Your hair!" Lucia screeched frantically. "And your make-up!"

Hermione frowned as she then watched the two girls springing to their feet. She was more than bewildered as they started to tug at her clothes and her hair. Her magic was boiling up in her in annoyance and Hermione wondered if there was a spell against over-eager hobby stylists.

Precisely half an hour later Hermione waited for Tom in front of the entrance to her common room. Though, she could have had waited inside, too, as Tom seemed to always know the password to Gryffindor domain anyway. But right now Lupin, Weasley and Longbottom sat in the common room and Hermione still tried to avoid any meetings between Tom and her friends. The evil stares Longbottom had thrown her way as she had passed through the common room had been bad enough. Thus she had preferred to wait outside.

After some time she could hear the sound of steps coming from the corridor. She looked up and found Tom walking towards her. Hermione's eyes wandered over him and she noticed that he had exchanged his uniform for some black trousers, a white shirt and black blazer. Hermione had to admit that those clothes hugged his form quite nicely. Once again she realized how handsome Tom really looked. His eyes were a hypnotizing grey and his hair was arranged neatly though there were a few strands of jet-black hair softly falling into his face. Hermione couldn't help but smile at him rather stupidly. As he reached her he stopped in front of her and eyed her contemplatively. Hermione raised her eyebrows at him in question.

"Something wrong?"

"No," he said slowly but then frowned at her. "… what happened with your blouse?"

Hermione narrowed her eyes at him.

"Why? I thought you like green," she replied waspishly.

Tom arched one eyebrow gracefully as his eyes again wandered over the luridly green blouse Hermione was right now wearing, just to spite her dorm mates.

"All in good measure," Tom said in his smooth voice and a grin appeared on his face.

Then he grabbed Hermione's hand and led her down the corridor. She just followed him. They were walking in silence towards the potions professor's office and Hermione felt rather comfortable as she felt Tom's warm hand holding hers. Her comfort, though, was neatly cut short as he asked his next question,

"Say, Hermione, you never really told me how exactly you convinced Dumbledore to let me stay."

She breathed in sharply and cast a sideways glance at Tom. He was scanning her inquiringly.

"I told you, didn't I?" Hermione replied in a rushed voice. "I don't want to talk about it. It was really horrible what I did. Imagine that, blackmailing a teacher. Really!"

"But it worked," Tom said quietly.

"Yeah." Hermione pressed his hand reassuringly. "Don't think I regret it. Because I don't." Here she "Why do you need to know anyway? Let's just forget about this whole thing," she added impatiently.

"Hmm," made Tom. "I was just thinking. Maybe we could use your blackmail material to get him out of Hogwarts."

Hermione raised her eyebrows indignantly at him. "No, we will certainly not try to get Dumbledore sacked."

He frowned at her and then said, "But he is really a bother."

Hermione let go of his hand and now glared at him sternly. "Don't you think that could get us in real trouble? And by the way, it would never work anyway. Not to mention that I feel guilty enough as it is."

"Oh, come on," Tom said trying to convince her. "I'm sure we can somehow manage."

"Pff, trying to get a teacher fired," she just shook her head at him.

Up to now they had kept this conversation really quiet and had only whispered but now Hermione scoffed at him in a rather loud voice so that it echoed from the corridor walls, "Really, Tom, what are you? Stupid?"

Tom narrowed his eyes in anger but before he could reply something, another sharp voice from behind Hermione said, "Ms DeCerto, how dare you speak in that sort of voice?"

It didn't take Hermione much to recognize that piercing headache-inducing voice. She closed her eyes and tried to reign in her rising temper. But it was no use so she turned around. Sure enough professor Legifer stood not far away in the corridor. Right now she glared sternly at Hermione. Hermione just raised her eyebrows questioningly. Whatever was the problem now? She knew that the hateful professor didn't like her but right now she really hadn't done anything wrong. Legifer shook her head angrily then she stalked over to Hermione. Tom was still standing beside her and observed the whole thing. Hermione really didn't like that gloating grin on his face at all. In the mean time Legifer had reached them and now stared sternly at Hermione who met her gaze squarely.

"I am ashamed that you are one of my students, Ms DeCerto," Legifer said in her nagging tone. Then she hissed scandalized, "How can you speak to Mr Riddle in that way? In my entire career as a teacher I have never met such impudence."

Hermione stared at her. What did that woman want from her?

"What?" Was the only thing Hermione could voice at the moment without getting insulting.

At that Legifer's eyes widened a little in outrage. It seemed she was now really angry.

"Do I really have to explain the simplest of things to you?" Legifer asked sharply.

Hermione didn't say anything. She had an inkling as to where that discussion was headed but she was not going to reply anything and then get thrown into another detention with her least favourite professor.

So as Hermione didn't say anything Legifer continued her ranting, "Ms DeCerto, you cannot speak to Mr Riddle in such an insulting way. Have you no decency?"

She looked at Hermione and Tom standing in front of her with narrowed eyes before she said in a much politer voice, turned to Tom, "Am I right in assuming that you are courting Ms DeCerto?"

Hermione's eyes wandered to Tom and she found him smiling charmingly at Legifer. She nearly rolled her eyes. He was such a hypocrite, wasn't he?

"Yes, professor," Tom answered in his silky voice.

"Well, then Mr Riddle, I am very sorry but I have to dissuade you from that," Legifer told him in a grave tone.

Hermione breathed slowly in to calm her magic down which was currently seething inside of her. Even her hands shook from suppressed rage.

Before Tom could reply anything Legifer turned to Hermione again and said in a cold voice, "Ms DeCerto, I don't know why Mr Riddle decided to choose you."

Legifer's gaze wandered slowly over Hermione's form and she seemed to be very unhappy with what she found. Hermione could even hear a soft scandalized gasp coming from the professor as she stared at Hermione's strikingly green blouse.

Then Legifer continued to lecture her in her sharp voice, "I am actually very surprised that anybody is interested in you. I'm sure Mr Riddle can easily find someone who suits him better. But it is not my place to judge his choice. I can only give you the advice not to botch up this chance you've got. It might very well be the only one you will ever get. So, I expect you to never speak to Mr Riddle like you just did. If you work hard on yourself and always obey Mr Riddle, I am sure you can still manage to one day become a good wife."

After that long a speech Hermione just stared at the professor. Her magic was now raging furiously inside of her and Hermione feared that if she was to open her mouth now, the only thing that would come out would be the incantation for one of her darker curses.

Legifer glared at Hermione obviously expecting some kind of reaction but as nothing came she again turned to Tom.

"I hope you know what you have engaged yourself in."

Tom just smiled at her disarmingly before he said smoothly, "Thank you for your concern, professor, but you need not worry. I am sure Hermione is a good choice. And she is a very lucky girl to have such a caring professor."

That small curl of her lips was the only indication Hermione had ever seen that Legifer was even capable of smiling.

"Well, it is your decision, Mr Riddle," she said. "But know that no-one will hold it against you should change that decision again."

Legifer cast one last evil glare Hermione's way and after a short "Good day" she turned around and left them standing in the corridor.

Hermione's mouth was pressed into a thin line as she watched the professor leave. After Legifer had disappeared around the next corner Hermione turned and stalked off in the opposite direction. She was still seething and her magic raged inside of her. Maybe she should have just cursed the woman. It might have been worth it. She looked at Tom who was walking beside her. There was an amused expression on his face.
"Don't you dare say anything," Hermione hissed at him.

Which only made Tom chuckle annoyingly. Hermione ignored him and stomped down the corridor. After a while of walking in silence Tom just couldn't hold back anymore, so he said in an innocent tone,

"You know, she's kind of right, isn't she?"

Hermione turned her head slowly towards Tom. He smirked mockingly down at her.

"Maybe you really should just obey me and I'm sure you will become a nice little wife," Tom said in the same innocent voice.

"That's it!" Hermione hissed at him as she grabbed his arm and pushed him against the corridor wall. "You just couldn't have kept silent, could you?"

That was when Tom finally broke down in laughter.

Hermione still stared with narrowed eyes at Tom as they finally arrived at Slughorn's office. It didn't raise her mood to find that amused grin still plastered on Tom's face. Before he could open the door she just nudged him in annoyance for good measure. It only made him chuckle infuriatingly then he opened the door. He stepped aside to let her enter first while bowing down in mock chivalry. Hermione just huffed at him angrily before she stepped into Slughorn's office.

Like the last time, Slughorn had somehow magically enlarged his office so that it now looked more like a hall than a teacher's office. It still wasn't large enough, Hermione noticed, as there were so many people here. She could see some students, obviously all members of the Slug Club. But there were other guests as well. Probably celebrities, famous Quidditch players or important politicians, knowing Slughorn.

Hermione forgot to be angry with Tom and grabbed his hand to pull him further into the room. He followed her and she chose to ignore the satisfied smirk which had by now appeared on his face. Hermione walked over to the huge buffet as she was quite hungry by now. Thanks to Legifer and her stupid and unnecessary detention she had missed dinner. Before they reached the buffet Slughorn suddenly appeared out of nowhere.

"Ah, Ms DeCerto," he said happily as he recognized her.

Then his eyes wandered from her to Tom, who stood slightly behind her, and to Hermione's hand which still clutched Tom. Hermione could see Slughorn's eyes suddenly brighten up a thousandfold and a knowing smile appeared on his face.

"Good evening, Tom, m'boy," he said, turned to Tom. "I see you've found yourself a lovely date."

Hermione looked up at Tom and found that he had once again adopted his I-need-to-impress-the-teacher face. Honestly, he was even worse than her.

"Good evening, sir," he said smoothly. "Thanks again for inviting us."

"Not at all, not at all. I am glad to have two so promising students here," Slughorn replied.

Then he again glanced at Hermione's hand still holding Tom. There suddenly appeared a glint in the professor's eyes and he now looked like a proud father congratulating his only son on a job well done.
“I must say I am very glad that you two have found each other,” he told them cheerfully. “I do expect great things from the two of you. And of course I would be more than delighted to one day be able to teach your children here at Hogwarts.”

Hermione stared at her teacher and could feel her face grow hot.

“I think there is still plenty of time before we start planning a family,” Tom replied politely, though Hermione could see a slight curl of his lips. Which made her face blush even more.

Slughorn just continued to smile at them happily.

"Anthony will be so devastated," he then exclaimed, not at all looking compassionate.

Hermione frowned at him confused. Anthony?

The same confusion must have shown on Tom's face, too, as Slughorn now explained to him in his booming voice, "One of my ex-students. Has always been very bright, that one. I knew he would go far. And I've never been wrong. Now look at him, Inquisitor Vickers." Then the professor winked at Hermione before he continued, "Anthony has taken quite the interest in Ms DeCerto at my last party. He will be very disappointed to hear that she's already taken."

Slughorn cast a wide smile Tom's way which seemed to say well-done before he excused himself. And Hermione could almost feel Tom frowning down at her.

Sure enough he then asked in a soft voice, "Vickers?"

She looked up at him and sighed, "Don't even ask."

A while later Hermione walked over to the buffet to get herself a glass of wine. Tom still talked with that horribly boring man who obviously was some official or other working in the Ministry of Magic. She was really glad to leave that conversation behind. She just wormed her way through all the people and towards the buffet as she accidentally walked into someone.

"I'm sor-" Hermione stopped mid-sentence as she stared up at the person she had just bumped into. She gulped and then said in a small voice, "Hello, Marc."

Longbottom narrowed his eyes as he recognized her then he greeted her in a gruff and cold voice, "Hello."

As Hermione looked up at him she could again see anger taking form on his face as he stared at her. Without another word he just turned around, clearly with the intention to walk away and ignore her presence. Before he could do that Hermione grabbed his arm and stopped him.

"Wait, please," she tried to hold him back. "Can't we talk about it?"

Longbottom slowly turned around to her again.

"What do you want to talk about?" he asked irritably.

Hermione looked at him sadly. He seemed to be really angry with her. But still maybe she could make him understand her actions.

"Look, I know you don't like Tom," she said in a soft tone. "But just because I'm his girlfriend doesn't mean we can't be friends anymore."
Longbottom stared enraged at her for a while and Hermione just wondered if he was going to answer at all as he suddenly blustered rather loudly,

"Why are you together with that snake?"

"Er..." Hermione stuttered, not really knowing how to answer to that.

"You know what he is," Longbottom then said in a quieter voice. "He's dark, Hermione. And dangerous. If you stay with him, he's going to hurt you."

Hermione shook her head vehemently. "No, you just don't know him. He's not as bad as you think he is."

Longbottom just looked down at her incredulously. The anger was still visible on his face, though.

"Not so bad?" he asked disdainfully. Then he continued sharply, "Wake up! Riddle's just an evil little git. He's playing around with you."

"He's not," Hermione said in a quiet but all the same firm voice.

"Did you already forget how he treated you?" Longbottom blustered at her. "He stamped on your reputation and then he made everyone in the school hate you. And he damn well enjoyed the whole thing."

Hermione shuddered as she heard the hard edge in his voice. He now glared down at her furiously. She felt horrible as she was met by his disapproval. This angry expression on his face reminded her too much of how Harry, or even Ron, would have reacted to her new relationship.

"He's been a lousy sod but here you are, kissing him," Longbottom now bellowed at her irately, "And after all the things he did to you, too. That's just disgusting. You should be ashamed of yourself."

Hermione stared up at him with wide eyes. The indignation and anger was clearly visible on his face. Suddenly, in her mind, Longbottom's face morphed into Harry's. Now it was her best friend, her brother, staring at her with that fury burning in his strikingly green eyes. But then the face transformed again and Hermione started to tremble slightly. Now she looked at Ron's face and all she could see in his eyes was anger and disappointment. Hermione averted her eyes and looked down at her feet.

"I- ... I-" she mumbled, unable to look at him again.

Then Hermione suddenly felt an arm being wrapped around her shoulders. She looked up and found Tom standing by her side. Right now he glared darkly at Longbottom.

"Is that idiot bugging you?" Tom asked in a low, tightly controlled voice.

Hermione's eyes wandered from Tom to the still furious looking Longbottom. Before she could say anything Longbottom just turned around and stomped angrily away from them. Subconsciously Hermione leaned into Tom then she looked at him again.

"Are you alright?" he asked her gently while scanning her concerned.

She smiled weakly at him. "Yes. I'm fine."

She looked over his shoulder and saw that boring Ministry official staring at them curiously.
"Really, I'm okay," she told Tom now in a firmer voice. "You just go back to your new friend and I'm finally getting myself something to drink."

Tom continued to look at her in concern. But then he nodded and cast her a last comforting smile before he turned around and walked away. Hermione felt better. It was really a nice feeling to know that someone was looking after her. Oh, how she had missed that, Hermione thought as she watched Tom.

Then she unfixed her eyes from him and continued her way towards the buffet. She grabbed one glass of wine and nipped from it. As she turned around she saw Lupin standing not far away from her. He was accompanied by Stella Lovegood. Hermione hesitantly walked over to them. She was glad to see Lupin smile at her as he saw her approaching them.

"Hi," he said as she had reached them.

Hermione smiled at him.

"Hey, Stella," she greeted the girl standing beside Lupin. "How are you?"

Stella looked at her with her dreamy eyes. Hermione noticed that her dirty blond hair clashed horribly with the bright red dress Stella was wearing. But she still somehow managed to look lovely.

"Oh, hello," Stella smile at Hermione. Then she said happily, "You have been lying to me, Hermione."

Hermione raised her eyebrows bemused.

"You told me you were not stalking Riddle," the other girl continued while still smiling amiably at Hermione. "But now you are dating him."

"Er… yes?" Hermione mumbled with a cautious sideway glance at Lupin. Fortunately he seemed to have only eyes for Stella right now.

"You must tell me all about your stalking techniques," Stella now continued enthusiastically. "They seem to be rather promising."

"Um… not really." Hermione didn't know how to deal with Stella's weird way. She was almost worse than Luna, almost. "I'm not a stalker."

"Oh, you still won't divulge your secrets?" Stella looked at her with her dreamy eyes. "Well, a pity."

Then she turned to Lupin, smiled and said, "I need to get one piece of this strawberry cake. Be right back."

Lupin blushed and just nodded. He needed some time to calm down again after Stella had left. In the mean time Hermione looked around and tried to see Longbottom again. Though, she really didn't want to speak with him again. It made her sad how he didn't like her any more.

"Is something wrong?" Lupin then asked her concerned as he saw that dark look on her face. "What happened?"

Hermione stared at him for a moment before she said, "Marc is here."

There was a look of understanding crossing Lupin's face then he put a hand reassuringly on her shoulder.
"Did you talk with him?" he asked her in a soothing voice.

Hermione nodded then she whispered, "I think he hates me now."

"No, Hermione," Lupin tried to console her. "He's just hurt a little bit. But he'll get over it."

Hermione just looked at him doubtingly.

"You know how much he hates Riddle," Lupin said softly. "It's just hard for him to accept that you are together with him."

"I know," Hermione replied in a small voice. "But you don't approve either, do you?"

"Hermione, that's difficult," Lupin sighed. "You just don't know Riddle as good as we do."

Wrong, Hermione thought sadly but didn't say it out loud.

"We just don't want you to get hurt," he finally said gently.

Hermione was touched by that honest concern she could see in his eyes.

"How come Longbottom is here anyway?" Hermione now asked. "He's not a member of the Slug Club."

"No, but Diana asked him to accompany her," answered Lupin.

She looked at him in surprise. "Diana? Does she like Marc?"

"No," Lupin laughed. "At least not in that way. The Potters and the Longbottoms were always close. Diana and Marc practically grew up together. They are more siblings than anything else."

Tom furrowed his brow as he watched Hermione talking with that Lupin boy. He didn't like it very much how most of her friends seemed to be males. But Lupin wasn't his main concern right now, Tom decided as his gaze wandered from Hermione back to Longbottom. The Gryffindor stood on the other side of the room, leaning against the wall with a sour expression on his face. That boy annoyed Tom to no end. He had never liked Longbottom. Right from the start actually. That boy was much too Gryffindor. And even proud of it. But what angered Tom so much was how close Longbottom was to Hermione. Obviously it was very important for her what that Gryffindor git thought about her. Otherwise she wouldn't be so hurt by Longbottom's dismissive behaviour.

If Tom hadn't stepped in, would Hermione have ended up with that stupid Gryffindor? he wondered as he glared at the blond boy. Then a small smirk appeared on his face as he watched Longbottom walking towards the exit. Tom made a decision and strolled after Longbottom. This was an opportunity he wasn't going to let go to waste. He stalked confidently towards the exit doors. Before he slipped out of the room Tom confirmed with a short glance that Hermione hadn't noticed him leaving. Then he left the noisy room and stepped into the silence of the corridor. Soft steps coming down the corridor told him that Longbottom was on his way towards the Gryffindor common room. The smirk never left his face as Tom followed after him.

He had tailed Longbottom for some time when he decided that there was enough distance between them and Slughorn's party. So Tom speeded a little up and abandoned his efforts to be as silent as possible. He could now see Longbottom a few metres before him, his ridiculously blond hair standing somewhat out in the dim light of the corridor. The Gryffindor had obviously heard that someone was following him as he stopped now.

_Took you long enough, didn't it?_ Tom mocked him in his thoughts.

Longbottom turned around and Tom nearly snickered as he watched a hostile expression enter his face after the other boy had recognized him. Cold amusement was flooding Tom as he slowly walked over to Longbottom. Though he didn't let his emotions show on his face. Completely unlike the stupid Gryffindor whose aversion and even hate was clearly visible on his face.

"What do you want?" Longbottom hissed at him, his voice shaking with barely suppressed anger.

An eerie smile played around Tom's mouth but it didn't reach his eyes.

"Why, I just want to talk with you," he said, his voice was calm, composed. To some extent even polite.

This politeness seemed to be the exact thing that boosted Longbottom's fury. His face turned an angry shade of purple as he glared at Tom.

"There is nothing I want to discuss with you," Longbottom snarled at him enraged.

Tom didn't let his mask of fake politeness slip while he scanned Longbottom.

"Oh, but there is one thing," Tom said in a suave tone, reveling in the fact that this affability seemed to rise the other's temper even further.

Tom leaned casually against the wall while he continued to scan Longbottom. Then he whispered softly,

"Hermione."

An angry frown appeared between Longbottom's eyebrows as Tom said the name. "What about her?" he growled gruffly.

"You are bothering her," Tom replied in a soft and still polite tone. "And I don't like that very much."

"I am bothering her?" Longbottom stared at him incredulously.

"Yes, don't think I haven't seen those looks you send her way." Tom now dropped the politeness though he was still not being aggressive. "You look at her like you hate her, despise her."

"I- I- " Longbottom stuttered as a look of concern crossed his face. But then he bellowed angrily, "That's none of your business."

Tom couldn't stop himself anymore. He chuckled darkly at the other boy's rage.

"You hate her, Longbottom, do you?" Tom purred, enjoying the indignation taking hold of the other. Then he continued mockingly, like he would reprimand a small child,

"Don't think you can fool me. Those angry looks you send her way, all this hatred and contempt-" Tom's eyes were now locked with Longbottom's blue ones before he whispered in a completely controlled voice, "- is a lie, isn't it?"

"What are you going on about?" Longbottom said in a quiet voice and Tom enjoyed the insecurity he could hear.
He pushed away from the wall to face Longbottom fully now.

"All this anger when in fact you... like her," Tom whispered teasingly while he slowly approached Longbottom, like stalking his prey.

A twisted smile distorted his handsome features as he now saw all colour leaving Longbottom's face. Tom took another step towards the other, now twirling his wand casually through his fingers.

"You fancy Hermione DeCerto. Isn't that right, Longbottom?" Tom said, his voice smooth as honey while this fake concern laced his words.

With malicious satisfaction he saw Longbottom stumbling a step away from him. But it wasn't long and the shocked expression on the Gryffindor's face changed into fury once again.

"And what if, Riddle?" he spat at Tom rabidly while he whipped out his own wand. "At least I'm not an insane psycho. Sooner or later Hermione'll notice what a creepy son of a bitch you are!"

Tom's fist tightened around his wand and he sensed how his magic started to rage inside of him. It turned into an angry torrent and Tom wondered for how long he would be able to hold it back, and if he actually wanted to hold it back at all. The polite mask melted from his face and Tom glared at Longbottom while an icy cold need to hurt welled up deep inside of him. His dark magic danced in unison with this vicious urge to the point where his magic left his body and bristled around him murderously.

Tom opened his mouth and his voice was now cold and hard as steel as he spoke, "Let me tell you this: I do not take it very well that you are after my girlfriend."

His words were accompanied by a flush of his angry magic. It reached out for Longbottom and tore at him unrelentingly. With cruel detachment Tom saw Longbottom wince slightly in pain as Tom's dark magic collided with him. Longbottom shied away from him but he still raised his wand and pointed it at Tom.

"Don't fool yourself. She's not really your girlfriend," he then hissed at Tom angrily. "It's only a matter of time and she'll ditch you."

Tom didn't react at all to the wand that was by now pointed at him but he felt something burn up in him as he heard Longbottom's words. And that something wrenched at him with unyielding ferocity. It wanted to be set free and to attack that Gryffindor boy. Rip him into shreds.

_Hermione would never leave me! I would never allow that!_

Despite his burning emotions, Tom's words were strangely detached and cold as he said quietly, "It almost looks like you are trying to steal what is mine." A dangerous tinge seeped through his words as he continued in a low hiss, "Are you trying to steal from me?"

"W- What are you talking about? Stealing? Hermione?" Longbottom replied indignantly. There was a certain amount of fear glistening in his eyes but his voice was still strong and brave as he yelled at Tom, "You don't own her, Riddle!"

Tom took another threatening step towards Longbottom. His magic still burned around Tom like an angry whirlwind. It was by now suffusing the whole corridor. The torches lightening the corridor flickered dangerously as they were hit by Tom's dark magic and the surface of the tapestry nearby darkened oddly as if it was singed by invisible flames.

"However you might want to define it," Tom said, malice twisting his voice into a murderous threat.
"It remains a fact that Hermione is mine now. And you better keep away from her."

Then Tom raised his wand and the magic in the corridor instantly followed his lead. He whirled his wand to cast a curse and-

"Tom!" a stern and familiar voice yelled at him from behind.

It cost him tremendous effort to stop the curse that was at the brim of his wand. His angry magic howled in disappointment as it had been defrauded of the chance to attack. Tom slowly turned his head in direction from which the slightly shocked voice had come from. He wasn't surprised at all to find Hermione standing a few metres away in the corridor, looking at him outraged, somehow even angry.

---

Hermione tugged nervously at the sleeve of her blouse. She wanted to leave the party. Everyone was staring at her. At least she felt like everyone stared. She really could see those angry glares some of the students, especially the female Slytherins, sent her way. They still hadn't forgiven her for stealing their Slytherin prince away, it seemed. She rolled her eyes in exasperation.

Hermione just wanted to find Tom and then leave. That encounter with Longbottom had been horrible. Talking with Lupin had been nice though. But she didn't want to disturb him and Stella any longer. She knew how much Lupin liked the strange Ravenclaw and Hermione didn't want to disrupt that sprouting relationship. Now that she was thinking about strange relationships. Where was Tom? She hadn't seen him for a while now. Hermione let her gaze sweep again over the large room full of people. But she couldn't spot Tom anywhere. Which was odd. An uneasy feeling hit Hermione as she realized that she couldn't see Longbottom either.

After a short moment of hesitation Hermione walked over in direction of the entrance. She waved a short good bye at Lupin and Stella who stood nearby. They both smiled at her happily. Then Hermione slipped out of the room. The corridor was dark and cold. The room had been rather hot and stuffy from all those people so now Hermione shuddered took off down the silent passage way in direction of the Gryffindor common room. She had walked for some minutes as she suddenly sensed magic in the air. It was a heavy pressure hanging in the air making every movement difficult. It was an unpleasant feeling but at the same time it wasn't unfamiliar. Despite that powerful magic in the air Hermione quickened her steps and hurried towards where she sensed to be the source of that magic. She was just a few metres away from another corner as she heard a cold and frightening voice hiss,

"However you might want to define it, it remains a fact that Hermione is mine now. And you better keep away from her."

Cold chills darted down her spine as she heard that low voice. It was absolutely devoid of any warmth or emotion. The murderous magic still crackled around her and ripped painfully at her body as Hermione walked towards where that cold voice had come from. She had to breathe in deeply to suppress a memory which suddenly flared up in her, reminding her where she had sensed such dark magic the last time.

Subconsciously she pulled her wand as she rushed on. Then she finally rounded the corner. Somehow she had half expected to find Lord Voldemort standing in the corridor, evil and crimson eyed. She was relieved as it wasn't Him but Tom. He had turned his back to her and right now he was slowly raising his pale wand at none other than Longbottom. There was a determined look on Longottom's face as he in turn pointed his wand at Tom. But despite that brave look on his face, Hermione could tell that Longbottom was affected by Tom's powerful magic. As Tom raised his wand Hermione could feel his magic in the air change its direction. It seemed to prepare itself to attack. When she felt that ominous change in his magic Hermione sprang into action again.

"Tom!" she yelled, hoping that her anxiety couldn't be heard in her voice.

She could see how Tom hesitated in his movement as he heard her. For a short moment Hermione feared that he would curse Longbottom anyway. But then he slowly, almost reluctantly, turned his head so he could look at her. Hermione took in a sharp breath of air as she looked into his eyes. They were smoldering pits of a frightening crimson colour.

Her grip on her wand tightened as she tried to overpower her initial fear in face of his all too familiar wrath. Hermione swallowed hard but then she cautiously walked over to Tom. He still hadn't said anything and just looked at her while his dark magic still danced in the corridor. Hermione noticed, though, that his magic didn't rip at her anymore. It let her pass undisturbed.

As she reached him Hermione looked up into Tom's eyes. They were still ruby red and burned with barely controlled hate. She could see that he still held tightly to his wand but at least he had lowered it by now. Then her eyes wandered from the angry Tom to Longbottom who stood only a few steps away. He still pointed his wand in Tom's direction. He seemed to be as angry as Tom though he was slightly shaken too. Hermione couldn't blame him. Not many people could stand their ground against Lord Voldemort after all.

He's not Voldemort! an angry inner voice hissed at her heatedly. Tom might not be Him but his magic felt just the same.

Longbottom's gaze had by now left Tom and he was frowning down at her. Hermione stiffened as she realized that. She looked at his face and there was still the anger and rage visible but she could also spot the disappointment in his eyes as they scanned her.

Hermione whispered timidly at him, "I'm sorry."

She could see confusion flooding Longbottom's eyes but before he could reply anything Hermione turned away from him and seized Tom by his arm. Then she pulled him after her, away from Longbottom who observed the whole process in bewilderment. Surprisingly enough Tom followed her. He even abandoned that dark magic swirling around him. Hermione softly sighed in relief. After she had put some distance between them and Longbottom Hermione spoke again in a tight voice,

"What was that?"

Tom didn't immediately answer but then he replied in an emotionless tone, "I was just making a point."

Hermione didn't say anything to that but just continued to lead him through the corridors.

"Where are we going?" he asked her after some time.

Hermione nearly cringed as she heard that his voice was still cold and free of any emotion.

"To the dungeons," she replied, her voice was just as emotionless as his had been. "I'm bringing you to your common room."

"Shouldn't I bring you to yours?"

Hermione turned her head and looked up at him. He stared back at her and she noticed that his eyes were back to being asoft grey.
"I think it's safer this way," she told him while tightening her grip on his arm.

They walked on in silence. Though as they entered the maze of Hogwarts' dungeons it was more Tom leading her than the other way around. After some time Tom stopped before a rather inconspicuous looking, bare, damp stone wall. It seemed to be the entrance to the Slytherin common room as Tom now turned towards the wall and started to mumble a password. Before he could finish Hermione again grabbed his arm.

"Tom?"

He turned around to her and scanned her with his cold grey eyes.

"Yes?"

She wasn't impressed by his dismissive tone at all but told him in a firm voice, "I want you to stay away from Marc."

He didn't reply anything but continued to look at her. Hermione could see a ghastly red glow beginning to tint his eyes. Then suddenly Tom seemed to lose his composure, his bored mask slipped and he burst out angrily.

"Why do you always protect him?" he hissed furiously before he added with accusation dripping of his words. "Do you like him?"

"Of course I do," Hermione replied in a calm voice. "You know he's my friend."

Tom now clenched his jaw tightly then he hissed bitingly, "I think he wants to be more than just your friend."

Hermione looked up at Tom's face. The blank mask was back again. She knew how good he was when it came to concealing his emotions and hiding them behind that perfect mask of his. But she was just as good when it came to deciphering him. So she locked her eyes with him. His face might be shut down completely but she could always read his eyes. Right now they were swirling with his suppressed emotions. Still one thing was screaming at her furiously through his eyes. Hermione nearly took a step back from him as she was overwhelmed by white hot jealousy which seemed to radiate from his eyes.

But she didn't. Instead she made a step towards him and reached out from him. She took his hand into hers and continued to look into his eyes.

Tom is jealous? she mused as she scanned him.

She had to admit that she wasn't really surprised. She had seen it coming whenever Tom saw Longbottom being around her. The magnitude of his jealousy was rather frightening, though. It was still clearly visible in his grey eyes, almost burning every other emotion in him. But behind that jealousy Hermione could spot something else. Tom really tried to hide it and she suspected that he managed to even hide it from himself. She could see it, though, the insecurity.

There was no doubt that Tom was incredibly jealous about the friendship that connected Longbottom and herself. But that wasn't all. He seemed to also be afraid that Longbottom would snatch her away from him.

Hermione pressed his hand reassuringly then she replied to his previous statement, "Maybe you are right."
She smiled softly at him as something like panic crossed his face and she continued in a soft voice, "But whatever Marc's feelings are it doesn't change my decision. I want to be with you and not with him."

Tom just stared down at her and didn't react to her statement at all. Hermione sighed tiredly. Then she stepped even closer to him and wrapped her arm around him.

"I am not some sort of prize you have to fight for," she whispered to him in a soothing voice. "I'm right here. Okay?"

She embraced him even tighter as she could feel him snaking his arms loosely around her. She allowed him to rest his head on top of hers as she continued to hold him tightly. But after a while, she pulled away from him. Tom only reluctantly let go of her but Hermione took a step away anyway.

Then she looked up at his face. He seemed to have calmed down. At the very least she couldn't spot that fury anymore which had been seething in him just a moment before.

"Feeling better now?" she asked him, her voice was still kind but now the softness had left it.

He didn't reply anything but Hermione took his silence as a 'yes'. So she continued but this time her voice was definitely not kind anymore. It was now stern and had a sharp edge around it.

"Tom, I don't want you to go and threaten my friends. If you do that again I won't just stand around and do nothing," she said slowly, seriously while staring into his eyes. "Just stay away from them."

He continued to look at her. The frustratingly blank mask covered his face once again. But then, before he turned around to the entrance of his common room, Tom nodded curtly at her.

{{{{{{{{+}}}}}}}}
Slowly the weeks went by but the snow and ice was still reluctant to relinquish its hold on Hogwarts castle. Inside the castle's walls the school year continued as if nothing exceptional had ever happened. As if there was no visitor from a different time walking its corridors. Even the visitor herself was slowly lured into thinking that everything was fine. Somehow it really was. There still were times when Hermione was hit with doubts but she would quickly shove all thoughts of the future, time travel and unbeatable wands as far away as possible.

Life here in the forties, as annoying as it at times was, had grown to her. Hermione even managed to endure Legifer's incredibly irksome detentions. Her school mates slowly abandoned their hostile behaviour towards her. They seemed to be getting used to her relationship with the popular Slytherin prefect. Some of them still despised her, Hermione could tell, but they had obviously lost interest in ambushing her and hexing her.

Above else life in the forties was safe. It was bliss to be able to wake up in the morning and know that it was pretty likely that she would live to see the end of the day. She didn't have to worry about where she would sleep the next night, she didn't need to somehow acquire food while trying to not be seen by any evil dark wizards.

And she didn't need to struggle after the pieces of a wrecked soul, desperately trying to destroy them. Here, she was safe. No-one would be ripped from her. No-one was going to die.

Life was, for once,

...nice.

That was more than Hermione had ever hoped for. Back in the future everything had seemed to be rotten. Hope had left her and so had her friends and family. They had all died while darkness had slowly encircled her until all colour had drained from life. Until she herself had died. Her body had still breathed but it had felt as if life had left her long ago.

Now, though, Hermione felt strangely better. Her nightmares had stopped to mercilessly infest her whenever she fell asleep. The ghosts of her past seemed to have taken mercy on her and had left her alone. Hermione was incredibly grateful for that. And she did know whom she had to thank for her new-found happiness. The grotesqueness of her whole situation sometimes still hit her but by far not so often anymore.

Somehow her life seemed to be split. There was her old life and, looking back, it seemed to be so dark and overshadowed by pain and sorrow. Of course there had been a few rays of hope, too. Hermione didn't like it very much to think about her friends, because that chain of thought always led to her remembering how they all had died, but she would never forget them. As much as it pained her to remember her old life she never regretted having met all those people who still meant the world to her.

But now there was her new life. Safe and happy. Separated and protected from her old life. There was someone here who protected her from the darkness that always threatened to slop over from her old life. While Hermione always treasured the fond memories she had from her dear friends she was immensely glad that she had found this someone here in the past. With Tom by her side it was very easy to forget the dangers and fears of her old life.

Yes, life was nice. So Hermione was unprepared as darkness chose to visit her again...
Hermione walked through Hogsmeade. It was surprising how few changes would take place in the next fifty years. This Hogsmeade from the forties was almost exactly the same village Hermione knew from her time period. There was Honeydukes, crowded with students buying sugar quills or something else from that remarkable assortment. A few steps further and Hermione passed Zonko's joke shop. And 'The Three Broomsticks' was just a stone's throw away.

As she sauntered down the main street Hermione checked her watch. It was still more than half an hour until she would meet Tom. So she decided to enter 'The Three Broomsticks'. She was definitely in the mood to have one of those heavenly mugs of hot chocolate they sold there. As she entered the shop she saw Weasley and Longbottom sitting at one of the tables. Hermione hesitated shortly but then she walked over to them and sat down beside Weasley.

"Hey!" she said while her eyes wandered nervously over Longbottom.

There was a glass of butterbeer standing in front of Longbottom and he again did his best to utterly ignore her.

"Oh, hi, Mione," Weasley said good-naturedly, obviously trying to lighten the mood. "What are you doing so alone here? I thought you wanted to stay at the castle."

"Yeah, I did." Hermione said. "But then Tom asked me to meet him in Hogsmeade."

Predictably, Hermione could then watch a rather angry frown appear between Longbottom's eyebrows and he now looked as if he had just bitten into a lemon.

"So, do you always have to do what that jerk tells you?" Longbottom asked snidely.

Hermione tried to ignore his bitter taunt. Since he had learned about her and Tom he had distanced himself from her. It still hurt that she seemed to have lost him as a friend. But she still had hope left that Longbottom would somehow forgive her. She knew he wasn't being mean on purpose. He just didn't like Tom.

Hermione was glad that at this moment the waitress of 'The Three Broomsticks' came to their table and asked Hermione what she wanted to order. Hermione was a little bit surprised to not see Madam Rosmerta until she remembered in what time period she was currently stranded. She finally ordered her hot chocolate without staring too much at the strange, new or rather old waitress.

"What are you planning to do today?" Weasley asked after the waitress had left again.

"Hm, I'm not sure. Walking around Hogsmeade, I guess," Hermione answered. "Unless Tom has planned something else."

"Oh, if you are lucky, then maybe Tommy-boy takes you to Madame Puddifoot's," Longbottom threw in, his voice tripping with scorn.

Hermione looked at him and wondered if her decision to enter 'The Three Broomsticks' had been a good idea after all. She really missed the times as Longbottom hadn't hated her. She really liked him after all. He was one of her best friends. Or had been…

Hermione left 'The Three Broomsticks' a while later. It still had been a little awkward. Weasley had tried his best and Hermione had avoided to talk about Tom again but Longbottom hadn't taken part in the conversation at all. She really missed him as a friend. Hermione drew her cloak tighter around her as she walked down Hogsmeade's high street. It was slowly getting spring but the climate in Scotland was always rather cold. With her cloak wrapped around herself Hermione made her way down the main street. She would meet Tom in ten minutes. She knew what an incredibly punctual person Tom was. He really hated to wait for anyone so Hermione hurried down the lane to their meeting place. On the other hand, she thought amused while slowing down her steps. It's always fun to see Tom losing his cool.

She just passed a side road as she heard someone yell, "Help me!"

She stopped dead in her tracks. That scream had come from the side road she just passed. With her heart beating faster now, Hermione looked down that street. It was a rather narrow back alley squeezed in between two houses. Hermione couldn't see very far as there was a bend not five metres down the lane.

"Help!" the voice yelled again. It was a female voice, Hermione could hear now.

She looked around but there were no other people near her. She seemed to be alone in this. Whoever that yelling person was, she obviously needed some help. Hermione flicked her wrist and felt her wand landing in her hand, then she ran into the dark back alley. Quickly she reached the corner and rounded it. There was no-one to be seen. But further down was another corner so Hermione raced down the street. Though 'street' was a little over-the-top as this alley was not even two metres wide.

"Help!" There was this voice again calling out desperately.

Hermione rounded the next corner hurriedly, her wand still tightly in her hand. The alley widened and formed something like a backyard. The ground was paved with grey and grimy cobble stones and the bordering houses were high enough to dive the backyard in semi-darkness. Hermione stopped running and narrowed her eyes to make something out in the twilight. There in the far end of this yard she could see a dark figure. Maybe that was the person in need? Hermione wondered. But the chills darting down her spine told her otherwise. She tightened her grip on the wand and took another tentative step into the backyard.

"Who are you?" Hermione asked and her voice was firm though she didn't feel confident at all. "Did you just shout for help?"

The dark figure moved and took a few steps in Hermione's direction.

"Yes, it was me yelling," the figure said and it was the same female voice that had called for help just minutes before. But now it didn't sound panicky at all anymore. If anything, it sounded triumphant.

Hermione saw the figure move her arm, then whisper something under her breath and the next time the person spoke it wasn't a female voice anymore. It was a deep male voice and it hissed aggressively at Hermione.

"But I don't need help. Though I can't say the same for you."

Instantly Hermione raised her wand and pointed it at the man standing a few metres away from her. To her horror she saw in the corner of her eyes something move behind her. She risked a quick glance back and her heart sank as she realized that three other men had appeared in the small backyard and were now standing in the way she had come from, successfully blocking her only escape route. She breathed in deeply and looked back at the first man. Her eyes were now adapted to the twilight and she could make him out in more detail. He was a tall man with short brown hair and a sneer on his brutal looking face. Her eyes wandered to his hand and Hermione saw that he had his wand drawn. With a jolt she noticed that he was wearing a black cloak. It was awfully familiar this cloak of his. She had seen this style of cloak before. Just where?
Then it hit her. In Flamel's flat!

The men who had attacked here there had all worn cloaks like this.

"What do you want?" Hermione hissed forcefully at the man.

She could see a malicious smirk on the man's face now.

"You know what we want, DeCerto," the man growled at her aggressively. "The book!"

Hermione took in a sharp breath of air. They knew her name?

"Hand it over-" the man spat at her. "-and we won't harm you."

Hermione needed to get out of this situation. Those men were after the Peverell manuscript. She would never hand it over. Even if she did, they would never let her walk away anyway.

"We know it was you who stole the book. Now give it back to us!" the man growled at her threateningly.

Adrenalin rushed through her as Hermione pondered her options. This backyard was a dead end with the only way out being the alley she had come from. That way was blocked by the three other men in her back. She wondered shortly why they thought they needed four people to overcome her. Were they not confident in their wandwork or did they just cautiously safeguard themselves? Hermione guessed on the latter.

She would have apparated away but Hogsmeade, like every big wizarding settlement, had anti-apparition wards. Sure she had once apparated through Diagon Alley's wards with the help of the Elder Magic but she didn't think she was able to reenact that feat. While the leader of those men had spoken to Hermione she had been able to sense a thin web of magic in the air. It seemed to be some sort of ward. A combination of silencing spells and repellent charms. Obviously those men were no amateurs.

Now she regretted it to have neglected to train the Elder Magic. In a real combat situation it was next to impossible to use the Elder Magic and still concentrate on her tactic and fighting. It seemed Hermione would have to use a good tactic to fight those men. There was no way around it, because handing over the book was definitely no option.

Normally Hermione would have been able to handle four opponents on her own but these men had placed themselves strategically well. She was facing their leader head on and she had three other opponents in her back. This made fighting them extremely difficult as they could attack her from two different sides. They had chosen the fighting place very well, too. This backyard was a dead end. Only the narrow street could be used as an escape route. They had cornered her pretty well, Hermione had to admit.

"The book, young lady!" the leader of her attackers yelled at her again while he extended one hand towards her.

Hermione made her decision. Swiftly and without a warning she waved her wand. A pulsing, green light left her wand and spread towards the leader. Immediately afterwards she waved her wand again and thought,

Scutulatus!

The strong full-body shield appeared around her, effectively protecting her from the spells that now hit her shield in her back. Hermione could feel the shield drawing on her magic heavily as the incoming curses crashed into it. The leader was now brandishing his wand and a greyish-yellow curse left the tip of his wand. Hermione felt the hairs on the back of her neck stand on end from the power that curse radiated. She plunged sideways to avoid the curse while thinking,

Definitely no amateurs.

She reached one house wall and then spun around quickly, all the while curses were crashing into her shield. She wouldn't be able to maintain the shield much longer. But now, at least her position was slightly better. She had the wall in her back and could face all her opponents. But again those men had positioned themselves well. They were building a semicircle around her and sent curse after curse at her. Hermione's shield was getting weaker by the second.

It had been a long time since last Hermione had to fight in a real battle. Her last real fight had taken place back in her time period in the Ministry. But it seemed the time had come again for her to take off the gloves, otherwise those men were surely going to kill her.

She extended the hand grasping her wand to the side. Then simultaneously she ended her shield and brandished her wand like she would a sword to cut someone horizontally in half. With the cutting movement of her wand a huge slash appeared on the ground ripping the cobble stones apart. The slash followed Hermione's wand movement and now the semicircle her opponents were forming around her became their disadvantage. Each of them was hit by the force of Hermione's spell. As she ended the curse a deep slash was traversing the whole length of the back alley. Hermione noticed that she had been able to hit one of her opponents fully. He hadn't managed to raise a shield and the force of the curse had hit him and hurled him against the wall on the opposite side of the yard. He lay sprawled on the ground while bleeding from a deep slash in his chest. The three remaining men had been luckier as they had managed to conjure up a shield. Hermione noticed that their leader was still among them.

Suddenly a bright curse came rushing towards her. One of her opponents had attacked her again. Hermione had no time to raise a shield so she just leaped out of its course. It crashed into the house wall and debris rained down on Hermione. It had been a loud crash but Hermione knew no-one would hear it and come to her help as they were still inside the bubble of warding spells her opponents had put up.

Dust from the destroyed house wall was obscuring her vision so Hermione noticed the next incoming curse too late. She tried to dodge it but it hit her left elbow. A sharp pain shot through her arm followed by the sickening feeling of blood flowing down her left forearm. Hermione got back on her feet while pointing her wand to the ground and whispered,

"Fulgur!"

An electric flash of magic shot through the ground and searched its way to the next person standing on the ground. That spell was powerful but at the same time very dangerous as there was no way to guide the direction in which it would strike, making the curse unusable if fighting with companions. But currently Hermione was alone anyway so she used the curse. She watched satisfied as the man standing nearest to her was suddenly engulfed by brightly glowing sparks of magic that struck him furiously. After a few seconds the man fell down, unconscious.

Hermione had no time enjoying her victory as the next curse came flying towards her. She crossed her arms before her and then spread them to her sides while she thought,

Subsisto!
A thick yellow shield appeared before her and the incoming curse crashed into it. The shield absorbed the force of the curse and the colour of the shield changed into orange. But before Hermione could do anything more she saw a second curse rushing towards her. She had no time to do anything so she just concentrated on maintaining her shield. The curse crashed with force into the shield. The colour of her shield changed again. It became a dark-orange and then an alarming red before it flickered and died completely. The curse had been weakened only marginally by the shield and now continued its way towards Hermione.

It collided painfully with her chest and the air was knocked from her as Hermione hit the wall behind her with force. She slid down and black dots danced through her vision but she managed to hold onto her wand. She tried to focus through the pain and pointed her wand at her opponents.

Contendo! Hermione thought.

The hunks of debris from the destroyed house wall began to shoot towards the two remaining opponents. Hermione saw two blue lights flaring up. They had been able to raise a shield. The hunks of stone crashed into the shields and could do no harm. Before Hermione could get up or attack the black cloaked wizards again she saw two curses flying her way. She waved her wand shakily and managed to conjure up a flimsy shield. The first curse hit her shield heavily and Hermione knew it was no good. As the second curse crashed into the weak shield it shattered and allowed the curse to rush undisturbed towards her. It hit her in the chest and she was again slammed into the wall behind her. Pain spread through Hermione's body, paralyzing her and she couldn't prevent her wand from slipping from her hand and landing with a clacking noise on the pavestones.

The next thing she was aware of were strong hands grabbing her by the collar and brutally hauling her up. Hermione's vision cleared again and she was able to recognize the leader of her attackers staring down at her maliciously. He held her by her collar and pushed her painfully hard into the wall behind her. Behind his shoulder Hermione saw the other man standing in the now destroyed backyard and still pointing his wand at her.

"Impressive, missy!" the leader spat at her with barely controlled anger in his voice. "But that's as far as you can go!"

He pushed her even harder into the wall and Hermione could barely breathe anymore. The leader raised his right hand and then slapped her hard in the face.

"Where is the book?" he yelled furiously in her face.

Hermione stared at him with wide eyes. She was scared but she wasn't going to give him what he wanted. As she stared at him she was able to see something she had previously overlooked. There on his black cloak was a familiar crest. The man raised his hand and again slapped Hermione in the face. Her head was hurled to the side, she felt her lip split open and blood flowing down her chin.

"I will only ask one more time," the leader said in a low threatening voice. "Where. Is. The. Book?" With each word he brutally slammed her into the wall.

Hermione was starting to panic. There was no way to get to her wand. Even if she managed to somehow retrieve her wand, she was not in the condition to fight those men again. Her left arm throbbed achingly where her elbow had been cut open, her chest hurt making it painful to breathe and she felt slightly sick and lightheaded. Hermione stared up at the man still holding her painfully tight.

"That's it!" the man yelled furiously. Then he pointed his wand directly in her face while he still held her in place with his other hand. "I'll make you regret not cooperating with us!"
Hermione squeezed her eyes shut and waited for the undoubtedly painful curse to hit her.

"Let go of her!" She heard a commanding voice – a familiar commanding voice.

Hermione opened her eyes again and immense relief washed over her as she saw Tom standing just a few metres away at the entrance to the backyard. He stood by the backstreet leading out of the yard, carrying an air of authority while his grey eyes wandered over the scene in front of him. Hermione saw concern flickering through Tom's eyes as he looked at her but then his gaze quickly turned to ice again.

The man holding Hermione had turned his head and was now watching Tom with narrowed eyes. The other man had spun around and was pointing his wand at Tom. Tom had drawn his wand, too, but he held it nonchalantly by his side, the tip pointing to the ground.

"Who are you?" the leader hissed at Tom aggressively.

Tom's eyes focused on the man. There was an unreadable expression on his face as he arched one eyebrow gracefully.

"I don't like repeating myself," he said in a controlled voice to the man holding Hermione. "Let her go!"

The leader just barked a laugh and said in an amused and depreciating voice, "I don't take orders from school boys."

Instantly Hermione could see Tom's expression change. His face was still carefully arranged into this mask of mild curiosity but now Hermione saw a deathly glint shining through his grey eyes. As Hermione noticed this slight shift in his appearance there was also a change in the magic surrounding them. It was just a small change but she had too often been the target of Tom's magic not to notice. Those were the first signs of him releasing his angry and dark magic.

"Take him down!" the leader ordered the other man lazily.

The man followed his leader's order and instantly sent a bright yellow curse Tom's way. The curse was very powerful as Hermione could still feel its magic even though she was a few metres away. The curse crackled threateningly as it rushed towards Tom. The corners of Tom's mouth were beginning to form a dark smirk as he watched the curse. He waved his wand in a small elegant movement of his hand. The yellow curse, though, continued its way undisturbed towards him.

The man who had fired the curse at Tom smiled triumphantly as he saw that Tom's defense had been useless. He didn't notice that Tom wasn't in the least bit concerned. Finally the yellow curse reached Tom. But as it made contact with him nothing happened. It just seared through Tom as if he wasn't there at all and continued its way until it hit the wall behind. With a loud crack the wall detonated and the curse left behind a huge crater. The dark smirk on Tom's face widened as he watched the man in front of him stare incredulously at the crater in the wall and then at Tom again.

"Nice try!" he said in his eerily composed voice though there was a fearsome coldness underlying his tone. "Now, it's my turn, isn't it?"

For the first time during this duel Tom raised his wand and pointed it at his adversary. Instantly there was a wave of malign and dark magic flooding the small backyard. Hermione felt the raw power of Tom's magic tearing at her body as she watched Tom's opponent taking a nervous step away from him.

A vicious smile danced around Tom's face as he gently whispered in a soft voice, "Aqua Latus!"
No visible spell left Tom's wand but the man facing him suddenly let go of his wand and clasped his throat with both hands. Hermione watched with wide eyes as the man coughed and spit out water. His face turned red as he sank down on his knees, still coughing up water. Tom laughed coldly down at his opponent before he waved his wand again and the man was hurled to the side. He collided forcefully with a wall and remained lying on the ground, still coughing weakly.

Tom instantly lost interest in the man and re-focused his eyes towards Hermione and the other man still holding her. A murderous look crossed Tom's face as glared at the leader of Hermione's attackers.

"Your last chance." Tom's voice was now deathly cold and Hermione could see a disturbing red sheen in his grey eyes. "Release her!"

But the leader did no such thing. He tightened his grip on Hermione's collar and pointed his wand at her throat.

"Abandon your wand or I'll curse the girl!" the leader hissed threateningly at Tom while he bored the tip of his wand painfully into Hermione's throat.

Tom stared at the man for a few seconds with a blank face. Then suddenly he laughed cruelly before he sneered at the man, "As you wish."

Hermione watched horrified as Tom really threw his wand away. She felt the man holding her relax a little bit as he, too, watched Tom's wand flying through the air. With a soft clacking sound the wand landed on the ground just a mere metre away from Hermione and her captor. The instant the pale wand made contact with the ground, fire exploded from its tip. Something slithered out from the tip of the wand. Hermione quickly realized that it was a snake made up completely of fire. She then heard Tom sinisterly hissing and she knew he was giving the snake orders in parseltongue.

The man who was still holding her was now pointing his wand at the burning snake and sent curses its way. But the snake continued to slither towards him undisturbed by the desperate curses the man sent at it. It quickly reached the feet of the man and began to wind around his legs and climb up. The man screamed in pain as the fire-snake touched him thus burning his clothes and the skin underneath. It had now reached his waist and was still wrapping itself tightly around his body. The man screamed in pain as the snake burned him. Hermione on the other hand couldn't feel any heat radiating from the snake. The man let go of Hermione and staggered away, still trying to get the snake off him but he only managed to burn his hands.

All the while Tom watched the scene in front of him with cold amusement. Though now that the man had released Hermione, Tom strolled confidently towards his wand lying on the floor. He picked it up and then looked pensively at the man, struggling with the burning snake, while the dark smirk still tugged at the corners of his mouth. After a while Tom seemed to have found a spell he could use or he was just too bored to watch the man burn any longer. He waved his wand lazily, the fire-snake disappeared and the man was hurled brutally away and hit the ground hard a few metres away where he remained lying.

Now that the man had released her and the imminent danger was over Hermione slid down the wall she had been pressed against. The multiple hurts of her body hit her again. She could still feel blood flowing down her left forearm, her chest hurt with each breath she took and her jaw was throbbing painfully were the man had hit her. She felt someone taking hold of her chin and raising it gently. Hermione looked into a pair of concerned grey eyes. Tom was crouching down in front of her. She was relieved to notice that the frightening red glow had left his eyes completely.

"Hermione?" he said softly and there was not a trace of the cruel coldness left in his warm voice.
She leaned forwards, wrapped her arms around Tom and clung to him. She put her head down on his shoulder and closed her eyes. She was exhausted and tired. Then she felt Tom putting his arms around her waist and pulling her closer to him. She felt comfortable and protected in his arms. After a while he let go off her, clutched her gently by her shoulders and held her at arm's length while he scanned her. A frown appeared on his face as his gaze wandered over her jaw and her still bleeding lip.

"Are you hurt anywhere else?" Tom asked her gently.

Hermione nodded at him. "My arm. And I got hit by a curse I didn't know."

The frown between Tom's eyebrows deepened as she said that. Then he got up and pulled her into a standing position. She was hit by a wave of vertigo as she stood up and grabbed Tom's arm to steady herself.

"We should leave," he said as he scanned the destroyed backyard and the unconscious men lying where they had fallen. "We don't want to be found here, especially not by any back-up they might have."

Hermione nodded and let Tom grab her by her upper arm and lead her down the back alley.

Before they reached the main street of Hogsmeade again, Tom asked in a quiet voice, "What did those men want from you?"

Hermione tensed involuntarily at his question. She couldn't reveal the real reason they had attacked her.

"I don't know," she answered in a small voice.

For a moment Tom didn't reply anything but continued to drag Hermione after him. Then he said, still in this unnerving, quite voice, "Then let me take a guess." He didn't turn to look at her. "They were after the book."

Hermione stopped dead in her tracks. She stared with wide eyes at Tom. He, too, had stopped and now looked at her with his blank face.

"What book?" Hermione slowly asked in a soft voice while she still stared thunderstruck at Tom.

He looked at her calmly and then said without batting an eye, "The book Peverell wrote. The book you stole from Nicolas Flamel the day we met the first time during Christmas break."

Hermione continued to stare at him. How did he know? She had never said anything about the book in front of him.

"So, did they?" Tom asked in a light voice. "Want the book, I mean."

Hermione looked away from him. Now that he knew anyway there was no reason to deny it anymore.

"Yes," Hermione whispered. Then she looked back at Tom and asked, "How do you know about the book?"

Tom tilted his head a little while he continued to look at her calmly before he said, "I'm not stupid, you know."
He didn't explain any more but grabbed Hermione again, none too gently, and pulled her after him.

"Why didn't you tell me? About the book?" Tom unexpectedly asked her. Hermione couldn't help but notice that the coldness seeped through his voice again.

She couldn't answer him. There were many reasons why she hadn't told him. Every one of them was a good reason but she knew Tom wouldn't like them at all. They had now reached the main street leading through Hogsmeade. Hermione saw students from Hogwarts strolling down the street, chatting with each other and enjoying a day off. Tom wasn't paying them any heed. He continued to drag her behind him, his grasp on her upper arm now painfully tight.

"Why did you steal the book?" he asked her gruffly.

What could she answer him? That she needed the book to work out how to travel forwards in time? That she was a time traveler more than fifty years from the future?

…that she had used to fight against his older counterpart?

Hermione couldn't say anything so she, again, remained silent which didn't improve Tom's already enraged mood. He still pulled her furiously after him. She stumbled while she tried to follow his pace. On the other side of the street she spotted Weasley and Longbottom wandering down the street. They were now both staring at her and Tom. Hermione just hoped they wouldn't come over. Tom was irritated enough right now, without Longbottom to provoke him.

"Where are we going?" she asked him timidly.

"What do you think?" he replied snappishly, his tone still cold. "To the infirmary back at Hogwarts."

Hermione instantly stopped.

"No!" she said rather loudly.

Tom had stopped too and turned around to face her. There was now definitely anger shining through his blank mask as he glared down at her. Hermione was unpleasantly reminded of the earlier days of their acquaintance when Tom had still used to threaten her.

"Hermione," he hissed short-tempered. "You are hurt. Of course you need to go to the infirmary."

He grabbed her by her arm again and tried to wrench her after him but she bucked against his grasp on her arm.

He faced her again and then snarled at her, "Your arm is cut open, you are bleeding and you were hit by an unknown spell. I will bring you to the hospital wing!"

"Are you mad?" Hermione whispered at him. "What am I going to tell them how I got hurt? That some dark wizards are after me because I stole a book before they had the chance to steal it?"

Tom glared angrily down at her. Then he pulled at her arm harshly, leaned towards her and whispered in her ear, "Okay, I won't bring you to the infirmary. But we will still go back to the castle."

Hermione looked into his grey eyes. She knew he was furious because she hadn't told him about the book. Apart from the anger glinting in his eyes she could see something else. Tom was concerned about her.
Hermione now had a really guilty conscience. She looked down on her feet and said in a small and subdued voice, "Yes."

Tom narrowed his eyes at her. He had obviously expected more resistance. But then he grabbed her arm again and pulled her after him. Hermione followed him all the way through Hogsmeade.

They had just reached the path that led to Hogwarts as she whispered, "I'm sorry."

Tom sighed and slowed down a little bit. His grip on her arm became gentler then he turned towards her.

"That was really dangerous. They could have seriously hurt you," he said in a soft voice while his eyes scanned her anxiously.

_He must have really been worried_, Hermione realized.

Tom wrapped an arm around her shoulders and pulled her over to him. Hermione felt herself relax as she leaned into him. Tom bent down to her and gently brushed his lips against hers, carefully avoiding to disturb the painful cut in her lip, before he whispered,

"Now let's go back to the castle."

Hermione smiled up at him and nodded.

---

"What do you think how Amarys is doing?" Weasley asked Longbottom as they strolled down the street.

They had just left 'The Three Broomsticks' and headed for Zonko's.

"I really don't know," Longbottom answered with a smile on his face. "I'm still surprised he actually asked her on a date."

Weasley laughed. "Yeah, well, it was bound to happen one of these days. I think Stella Lovegood has been waiting for this for some time now."

"Yeah," Longbottom had to laugh too. "Maybe we should find them? I still have one of those joke wands somewhere here." He started to rummage through his robe pockets. "We slip the joke wand in Amarys' pocket and the next time he tries to impress her with his wandwork… whoosh!"

"You know, you are evil, Marc," Weasley chastised his friend. But then added mischievously, "I think they went to Madame Puddifoot's."

Then he noticed that Longbottom had stopped laughing and was now staring angrily at something on the other side of the street. Weasley followed his gaze and soon spotted the reason for Longbottom's anger: Tom Riddle.

"What is he doing?" the blond Gryffindor hissed enraged.

They could see that Riddle had grabbed Hermione by her arm and was pulling her after him rather brutally. She seemed to have trouble following him and staggered behind him trying not to lose her balance. Then she whispered something to Riddle. Neither Longbottom nor Weasley could understand what she was saying as they were too far away. But whatever it was, Riddle seemed to snub at her in return. Then she stopped following him and they could hear her yell a rather desperate sounding "No!" at Riddle.

Riddle had turned towards Hermione and stared down at her. Longbottom and Weasley couldn't see Hermione's face as she had turned her back towards them but they could see Riddle. He was glaring at her threateningly. There was fury shining through his otherwise annoyingly blank face. He hissed something at Hermione then he grabbed her arm again and tried to pull her away. She resisted him; she obviously didn't want to follow him. Her resistance seemed to enrage him even further as he now yelled something at her.

"He's threatening her," Longbottom whispered angrily before he pulled his wand.

"Don't do anything harsh!" Weasley tried to calm his friend. "Let's try to get nearer."

Longbottom nodded at that with a grim expression on his face but he didn't put his wand away. Then they both crept closer to Hermione and Riddle while trying not to draw the Slytherin's attention to them. As they got nearer to the pair they had to watch how Riddle again took hold of Hermione's arm and then wrenched at her violently. There was still a murderous look on his face as he leaned towards her and whispered something in her ear. Longbottom and Weasley were finally in hearing range as Hermione answered Riddle.

"Yes," she said in a small and uncharacteristically submissive voice.

Longbottom's clasp on his wand tightened as he heard her scared sounding reply. But before he and Weasley had reached Hermione, Riddle had again grabbed her arm and now pulled her away. The two Gryffindor boys tried to follow them but that turned out to be rather difficult as the streets of Hogsmeade were crowded with students. Soon the couple was swallowed by the masses of people.

"Damn!" Longbottom snarled so loudly that a group of first years which just passed them jumped in surprise and looked at him with huge eyes. "That evil git! Did you see how he treated her?"

"Yes," Weasley said quietly. He was pretty shaken by this thing himself.

"What are we going to do now?" Longbottom asked frustrated.

"I don't know," Weasley said. "But that's the way towards the castle they took. Let's go back and wait for Hermione in the common room."

_H._._._._._.

Hermione and Tom entered the castle through the Entrance Hall. She had clasped his arm and was leaning on him a little bit. The cut on her left elbow stung now rather painfully and her chest hurt where the curse had hit her during the fight. She rubbed her jaw which was throbbing dully where the man had hit her.

_H._._._._._.

How could she have been so reckless and fall into this stupid trap?

And those men? Where did they come from? Why were they after the book anyway? Most importantly, how did they know her name? They were strong enemies and obviously well trained in fighting. It was rather disturbing that they had managed to find her.

Hermione noticed that Tom led her down towards the dungeons.

"Where are we going?" she asked him.

"To the Slytherin common room," Tom answered shortly.
Hermione looked at him with raised eyebrows.

"Don't look at me like that. I wanted to bring you to the hospital wing. I really don't know what you have against Slytherin anyway," Tom said exasperatedly. "You are a little bit prejudiced, aren't you?"

Hermione chuckled at that. It _was_ rather funny, considering from whom that comment was coming. Tom narrowed his eyes at her but didn't say anything. She didn't want to irk him more now that he seemed to have forgotten about Peverell's book, so she remained silent.

Tom led her through the maze of corridors until he stopped before a rather inconspicuous looking bare, damp stone wall. Then he hissed at the wall, "Putus!"

Hermione rolled her eyes at this rather uninventive password. It was so Slytherin. Still, it seemed to be the right password as now a stone door, which had been concealed in the wall, slid open. Tom entered through the door and dragged Hermione behind him. She felt a little bit nervous as she had never entered Slytherin domain before. Back in her time period she had always tried to avoid going anywhere near the dungeons and the Slytherin common room. Due to her blood status the Slytherins had never been very friendly towards her. Now she was entering the snakes' lair. But, Hermione tried to reassure herself, this time around no-one knew she was a Muggleborn.

As Tom was still holding to her, Hermione had no other choice than to follow him. So she stepped into the Slytherin common room. The common room was a long, low underground room. There were Slytherin-green wallpapers on the walls and Hermione saw greenish lamps hanging from the ceiling. Several soft looking, black-leather couches were located in the room. Hermione spotted a few Slytherins sitting on the couches and chairs, doing their homework or just chatting. The students were mostly first and second years as they were not yet allowed to leave the castle for Hogsmeade. But Hermione also saw a few older students sitting in the room.

She noticed that many of the students were watching her and Tom inconspicuously. If it had been the Gryffindor common room, they would be staring openly or even coming over to her and asking her if she needed something. Slytherins were obviously different. They tried to appear uninterested in Hermione but at the same time they were observing very well what exactly she was doing here. Hermione wondered what they would do now if she had come here without Tom. She clasped his hand tighter. Tom on the other hand didn't seem to notice the stares of his housemates or he simply didn't care. He started to walk towards a staircase on the far side of the common room.

"Back already, Riddle?" Hermione heard a deep voice ask as they just passed one of the black leather couches.

Tom stopped and turned towards the person sitting on the couch. Hermione wasn't very taken with seeing Ledo Avery sitting comfortably on the couch. Right beside him she saw Alfard Black, Primus Lestrange and Anthony Alba. She unconsciously stepped closer to Tom. She really didn't like those people. They were now eyeing her curiously. Hermione wondered what exactly they were thinking about her. Probably that she was another one of those girls Tom was playing around with. The most disturbing thing though was the greedy glint she could see in Avery's eyes as they wandered over her body.

"And how is that any of your business, Avery?" Hermione heard Tom's voice say. She nearly shuddered as she heard this authoritative coldness in his tone.

It seemed the fearsome tone in Tom's voice did unsettle his followers as well. They all cringed somewhat at his answer.
"Of course it is not my business. I apologize," Avery said hastily in a rather subdued voice while he fearfully glanced at Tom. "I was just being curious."

"Hmm," Tom said as he let his cold gaze glide over Avery who froze. Then Tom continued in a low, threatening voice towards Avery, "You would do well to rein in your curiosity where I am involved."

"Of course," Avery stuttered fearfully at the other, not daring to meet Tom's hard gaze.

Tom's murderous look left Avery who seemed to breathe out relieved. Instead Tom's cold eyes wandered over the whole group sitting in front of him.

Then he said in a commanding voice, addressing all the boys sitting on the sofa, "I need some time undisturbed in the dormitory. Make sure no-one barges in."

It was a sign of how scared those boys really were by Tom, Hermione thought, as they didn't start to wolf-whistle after such a declaration. Something every other group of boys that age surely would have done if one of them said he needed some time undisturbed with his girlfriend. But as it was, the boys sitting on the sofa just nodded at Tom obediently.

Tom narrowed his eyes at them before he turned away and continued his way towards the staircase, dragging Hermione after him. She was very relieved as they descended the stairs thus leaving the Slytherin common room behind. She really didn't like the Slytherins. They actually scared her a little bit. Maybe that was related with the bad experiences she had made with Slytherins in her time period. Hermione's gaze wandered to Tom walking before her. He was a Slytherin, too, she had to remind herself. But he wasn't scaring her.

…at least not anymore.

They quickly arrived at the foot of the staircase and in a dimly lit corridor. Its walls, the floor and the ceiling were made of solid rock. This corridor seemed to be carved out of the stone. Hermione guessed that they were now so deep under the castle that the builders of Hogwarts had driven the rooms and corridors directly into the rock.

They passed a few doors on their way until Tom halted before a door made of dark heavy wood. He opened the door and strode into the room. Hermione followed him. She saw him waving his wand and instantly the green lamps hanging from the ceiling lit and a fire started to crackle in the fireplace at the far end of the room.

Hermione looked around the room. It was, like the corridor she had just left, carved out of rock. But in contrast to the naked and crude stone walls of the corridor the walls of this room were more sophisticated. The stone of the walls was burnished and was reflecting the light coming from the lamps quite nicely. Here and there a tapestry was hanging on the walls. Hermione wasn't surprised to see a big green snake slithering leisurely through a landscape shown on one tapestry. On another tapestry she could see two knights in full armour fighting fiercely against each other. She walked further into the room and noticed the thick dark-green carpet on the floor, undoubtedly meant to protect the inhabitants of this room from the cold that would surely radiate from the blank stone floor.

While Hermione had taken in the room Tom had walked to one of the beds. She went over to him. Each bed was separated from the next by a room-divider. Obviously the Slytherins liked to have a little bit more privacy than what she knew from her own dormitory in Gryffindor. Hermione arrived at Tom's part of the room. There was a small shelf full of books standing at the wall. Next to the shelf stood a wardrobe. The Slytherins didn't have to live out of the trunk the whole year, it seemed.
Right now Tom had opened one of the drawers in the shelf and was searching through its content. Hermione walked over to his bed standing right beside the richly decorated room-divider and sat down. A dark-green quilt made of velvet was covering his bed.

As Hermione's gaze wandered over Tom's part of the dormitory she was not really surprised to notice how tidy everything was. Maybe she should get Tom to clean up her part of the Gryffindor dormitory so Legifer wouldn't be after her blood the next time she had one of her stupid inspections. Though that would probably disappoint the professor and she would give Hermione a detention anyway. Maybe on the spurious grounds for being too unpredictable to ever become an obedient house witch. Hermione chuckled at that thought.

"You can't be that hurt if you can laugh again." She heard Tom's smooth voice.

She looked up and found him standing in front of her. He held a few potion bottles in his hands and looked down at her with one of his eyebrows raised gracefully. Hermione beamed up at him. He just sighed at that, put the bottles down on the bedside table and sat down beside her. He turned towards her and then reached out for her. He took hold of her head and turned it so he could inspect the cut in her lip and her still painfully throbbing jaw. Hermione saw Tom's eyes narrow in anger as he looked at her injury.

"I should have killed that bastard," he hissed so darkly that it made chills darting down her spine.

Tom reached for one of the bottles he had put down on the bedside table. Then he conjured up a white cloth, put some of the potion on the textile and began to carefully dab Hermione's cut lip and her jaw. After some time he seemed to be satisfied with his work, discarded the bottle on the table again and with a wave of his wand the cloth disappeared.

"What else did you hurt?" Tom asked Hermione in a soft voice. "Your arm?"

She nodded and then took off her black outer robes. She was wearing a light-blue blouse underneath. While the black of her outer robe had been able to conceal the blood flowing from the cut in her left arm, the red of the blood now contrasted sharply with the light color of her blouse. Hermione saw that her blouse was torn where the curse had hit her left elbow. The fabric around the cut was soaked in blood which seemed to have flown down her forearm and stained the rest of her sleeve, too.

In the corners of her eyes Hermione saw Tom scanning her injured arm with his grey eyes before he said in a quiet voice, "That cut is rather deep you should have said something."

Hermione raised her arm and turned it to have a better look at the cut. There was an at least five inches long slash running from her forearm over the elbow and up her arm. It really looked deep, Hermione had to admit. But it wasn't that bad, she reasoned. She'd had worse.

"No, it's not that deep." She grinned at Tom. "See?" she said while bending her arm. "It's still attached to the body."

Tom again sighed exasperatedly. "Stop playing around!" he ordered and then grabbed Hermione's left wrist and stopped her from bending her arm again.

He pulled his wand and waved it over her arm. The sleeve of her blouse disappeared instantly. Then Tom began to gently remove all the blood from her arm with another cloth he had conjured up. As he was finished he applied a potion from one of the bottles on Hermione's arm. It stung terribly on the cut but she clenched her teeth. With another wave of his wand Tom conjured up a bandage which wrapped itself tightly around Hermione's arm.
"I still think you should go to the Hospital Wing," Tom said while he checked if the bandage wasn't too tight around her arm. "Or it might scar over."

Hermione just shrugged, "Wouldn't be the first one."

"There's no need to add more then," he countered swiftly while he looked at her rather sternly. Then he reached for his wand before he narrowed his eyes and said, "And you were hit by an unknown spell?"

Hermione nodded, then added in a small voice, "Twice."

Tom stared at her for a moment and Hermione could see a frightening red tinge appear in his otherwise grey eyes. His grip on his wand tightened and she felt the first signs of his dark magic crackling around him.

"I should really have killed that bastard," he said in a deathly cold tone.

He breathed in and seemed to regain his composure. The pressure of the upcoming dark magic vanished again.

"Okay, let me check if those spells did any harm," Tom said and Hermione was relieved to see that his eyes were this soft grey again.

He placed his left hand lightly on her chest while he waved his wand in a complicated pattern and chanted an incantation Hermione had never heard before. She noticed a warmth originating from his hand on her chest. This pleasant warmth spread slowly through her whole body. After a few moments Tom ended the spell and removed his hand.

"I don't think it was anything serious," he told Hermione. "But I'm no healer, maybe you should-

"-go to the Hospital Wing," she ended the sentence for him. "Yeah, yeah, but I'm not going."

A dark look passed Tom's face as he scowled down at her. Hermione felt a bit guilty again. He had really feared for her and now she was making fun of him. She skidded nearer to him on the bed and snuggled against him while she wrapped her arms around him.

"Don't worry," Hermione soothed while she looked up at him. "I'm fine."

Tom glared down at her and there was still a frown between his eyebrows. But she wasn't concerned because she could see the softness shining through his beautiful grey eyes.

Tom snaked his arms around her waist and pulled her over to him. He bent his head down to her and whispered, "Could have fooled me there." Before he placed his lips onto hers. Hermione closed her eyes as she felt him kissing her softly.

"What are we going to do now?" Longbottom asked frustrated. "He could have dragged her to Merlin knows where."

He and Weasley were currently walking down a corridor near the potions class room down in the dungeons. Since they had seen Riddle tugging Hermione through Hogsmeade they had tried to find her again. So after they had arrived back at the castle they had decided to wait for her in the Gryffindor common room. But Hermione hadn't shown up. After some time Longbottom had lost his nerve and insisted that they should search her. Currently they were looking for the entrance to the Slytherin common room. Riddle was an evil Slytherin after all, so Longbottom had reasoned that he must have dragged Hermione down into the snakes' lair. But to find the entrance was easier said than done. The maze of corridors down in the dungeon was more than confusing. The two Gryffindors didn't even know what the entrance to the Slytherin common room looked like. So they were currently searching for a huge portrait of either Salazar Slytherin or a huge snake. But so far without any luck.

"I don't know, Marc," Weasley replied. "But this is rather pointless. We'll never find the entrance. We don't even know if she really is there."

"I know!" Longbottom cried irritably. "I'm so going to kill that bastard!"

"Let's go back to our common room," Weasley said trying to calm his friend. "I'm sure she'll show up there sooner or later."

"Yeah," Longbottom answered darkly. "That is, if Riddle hasn't murdered her already."

They rounded the next corner and ran directly in a group of Slytherins.

"Oh, what's this?" one of the Slytherins sneered at them.

Longbottom instantly tensed as he recognized him. That was the Slytherin Quidditch team captain, Ledo Avery.

"Look at that," Avery continued, his voice dripping with scorn. "Two Gryffindorks down here. What an honour."

The group of Slytherins laughed meanly.

"Shut up, Avery," Longbottom snubbed at him hotly.

"Watch your manners," the Slytherin sneered at him and then asked conceitedly. "What are you doing here anyway?" Then his eyes glinted maliciously and he said, "Ah, I know, you search for your little friend."

Longbottom tensed, then shouted heatedly, "Hermione? Where do you have her?"

The dark smirk on Avery's face widened.

"Well, I so happen to know where she is," he said snidely before he continued in a rather evil voice, "In the Slytherin dorm. Alone with Riddle." Avery watched in amusement how the colour drained from Longbottom's face. "But I really don't know what he's doing to her right now," Avery ended but winked suggestively at Longbottom.

Sometime later Tom walked Hermione back to her common room. She felt his arm wrapped gently around her waist. She had told him that he didn't need to accompany her back. But obviously Tom was feeling a little bit over-protective since he had found her in that backyard in Hogsmeade. She didn't mind as she rather enjoyed his arm being wrapped reassuringly around her and the warmth of his body beside her.

They rounded another corner as Tom suddenly said, "Now, can I have a look at the book?"

Hermione glanced at him sideways before she said in a soft voice, "No."
Tom looked down at her angrily. Though, Hermione noted, there was more frustration than anger on his face right now.

Then he huffed at her, "Why not?"

She replied in a firm voice, "Because it's my book."

He looked down at her for a moment. She wondered if he was going to snap now. But then Tom said in a relatively calm voice, "Technically it's Flamel's book."

Hermione looked away from him before she said in a small voice, "Technically it's Dumbledore's."

As Tom didn't say anything to that she hesitantly glanced back at him. She was surprised to find him smirking down at her rather evilly.

"You stole a book from Dumbledore?" he said in a gleeful voice. "I have to say I find that rather satisfying."

Hermione frowned at Tom. Sometimes he was really odd.

In the mean time they had arrived at the Gryffindor common room. Before she had the chance to walk over to the portrait of the Fat Lady, though, Tom snaked his other arm around her and pressed her against him. Then he leaned down to her and whispered softly in her ear,

"Let me see that book."

"No," Hermione said weakly as she was now rather distracted by his body pressed so tightly against hers and his hand caressing her back so gently.

Tom leaned even closer down to her and she could almost feel his lips against her skin as he spoke in his seductive voice, "Come on. I just want to have a quick look."

Hermione shivered as she felt Tom now kissing her cheek. Then his mouth trailed down and nibbled sensuously at her neck while his arms still pressed her tightly against his body. She felt her hands sliding up his back and clutching the fabric of his black robe.

"You know in the end I'll win anyway," Tom purred into her ear before he started to nibble at her earlobe.

Hermione could feel his hand sliding down her back until it found the rim of her blouse. His hand slipped underneath her blouse and began to caress her skin.

"No, Tom," she said, though half of her mind wasn't really paying attention anymore but just wanted him to continue.

Tom seemed to be able to read her thoughts even without using Legilimens and didn't stop. He continued to skim with his fingers over her bare skin, leaving behind a tingling sensation, while his other hand now held her head gently and bent it to the side so that Tom could trace kisses on her neck. Hermione closed her eyes, enjoying the feeling of his lips on her skin.

"Show it to me," Tom whispered the command so seductively.

Yeah, Hermione thought befuddled, why didn't she just show him the stupid book? Then they could continue this. At that thought she mentally wagged her head.

Show him the book? Pull yourself together, Granger! For God's sake!
She pushed with her hands against his chest and said in a slightly panting but otherwise firm voice, "I said, no."

Suddenly an enraged voice yelled from behind Tom, "You heard her, dirty bastard! Let go of her!"

Tom straightened himself up and then turned around to whomever had just yelled like that. As he turned around he snaked an arm around Hermione's waist, pulling her against his body. Now that he had moved, she was able to see the person standing right in front of the entrance to the Gryffindor common room. It was Longbottom. His face was morphed into an angry, purple mask as he scowled darkly at Tom.

"I said, let her go!" Longbottom growled again, panting with rage.

Hermione furrowed her brow. What was happening here? She looked confused from Longbottom's angry face to Tom. But he wasn't any help as his blank mask was once again covering his every emotion. Instead a rather bored expression had appeared on his face as Tom scanned the Gryffindor boy. Though, Hermione noticed, there was a dark smile playing around his lips.

"Longbottom, how very impolite," Tom chided in a calm and condescending tone. "Can't you see that I'm in the middle of something here? So rude, no wonder you are in Gryffindor," he ended, his voice a rather insulting sneer.

After that little speech Hermione could watch Longbottom getting even redder in the face. And she noticed that his hands were shaking in suppressed rage.

"Get your filthy hands away from Hermione, you monster!" he finally raged at Tom.

Hermione could feel Tom tense and his eyes narrowed dangerously. She could even sense the first signs of Tom's dark magic in the air. The mocking smirk left his face and there was an icy cold touch in his eyes as he fixed Longbottom with a glare.

"Be careful," Tom said, his voice was a low hiss but the threat it carried was unmistakable. "You don't want to insult me."

Hermione watched Longbottom pulling his wand. As a result the pressure of the dark magic dancing around Tom intensified alarmingly. She needed to act now, Hermione decided. Lest she risked Longbottom getting hospitalized. So she extended a hand and laid it lightly on Tom's arm. He didn't pay her any attention but continued to stare threateningly at Longbottom.

"Tom," Hermione whispered in a soothing voice.

Slowly Tom looked down at her, his grey eyes were still hard as steel.

"Calm down," Hermione said softly while she looked up at him with pleading eyes.

Tom's grey eyes, radiating nothing but hatred, wandered shortly back at Longbottom before they returned to her again. She was relieved to see the burning fury leaving them slowly as Tom looked at her.

Then he bent down to her and whispered coldly in her ear, "Next time, you won't be able to stop me."

Tom straightened up again and cast one last hate-filled glance at Longbottom before he turned around and strode down the dark corridor. Hermione watched his retreating back, glad that she had been able to stop him from doing something regrettable.
…well, at least she would have regretted it.

Hermione sighed tiredly and then started to walk towards the common room entrance. This just wasn't her day. In the mean time, Longbottom had put his wand away and had opened the entrance for her. Hermione glanced at him quickly. He didn't look enraged anymore. Instead there now flickered worry over his face as he looked her way.

What was wrong with him? Why had he suddenly stopped to give her the cold shoulder? It had been weeks and weeks ago since last he had spoken with her with something else than scorn in his voice. What had happened? He hadn't seen her fighting those black-cloaked men, had he? Hermione wondered panicky. As her thoughts darted back to those men attacking her, she remembered the emblem she had seen on the leader's dark cloak. She knew it very well. A triangle, a circle and a line through the middle…

"Sit down, Hermione," she was brought out of her musings by Longbottom's soft voice.

She found herself standing before one of the sofas in the common room. Weasley and Lupin were already sitting on it. Hermione frowned as she saw the same concern on their faces she had seen on Longbottom's. She sat down anyway. She was rather tired by now and her arm still stung a little even after Tom had patched it up. Longbottom sat on the chair across from her and pulled his wand.

He waved it and said, "Muffliato."

Instantly the noise around them lessened and sounded muffled.

"Glad, you finally managed the spell," Hermione said while she smiled at Longbottom.

Smiling, though, wasn't a very good idea, she realized as the cut in her lip hurt again. She winced and rubbed cautiously at her bruised jaw which caused Longbottom frowning at her.

Then Lupin asked in a gentle voice, "Hermione, where did you get that bruise?"

She turned her head so she looked at Lupin. He was staring at her still that worry in his eyes.

"W… what?" she asked weakly.

They surely didn't know about the fight and the dark cloaked men? That would lead to a lot of nasty questions. Questions she couldn't answer. Tom was worse enough with his endless inquisitions. Hermione skidded anxiously in her seat on the sofa. Did they know something? What should she tell them? she wondered frantically. Then she flinched as she could feel a warm hand on her forearm.

"Who hit you?" Lupin asked her in a soft voice.

Hermione looked from his hand on her arm to Lupin's face. What could she tell him? That some crazy dangerous men wanted to kill her? That would be a real damper on the mood.

"W- what do you mean?" she asked weakly.

"You can tell us," Weasley told her in a soothing voice. He, too, was looking at her with concern shining in his eyes.

Then Longbottom said brusquely, "We know who it was. You don't have to hide it any longer."

Hermione stopped breathing and her eyes shot back at him. How did they know?

But then Longbottom said in a furious tone, "It was Riddle!"
Hermione's eyes widened as she stared at Longbottom in disbelief.

"What are you going on about?" she finally asked him confused.

Longbottom leaned towards her and looked at her with...

...pity?

"We have seen you in Hogsmeade today. We've seen you with Riddle." In the corners of her eyes Hermione could see Weasley nod sadly. Then Longbottom continued, "That bastard treats you like dirt. And now, he's obviously beaten you."

Hermione stared at him for a moment, trying to understand what he was talking about. Then her eyes wandered to her two other friends sitting beside her on the sofa. They were looking at her with grave faces.

What were they talking about? Why did they think it was Tom who had hit her? Her thoughts wandered back to Hogsmeade. She had seen Lonbgottom and Weasley there. And then Hermione understood. The two of them had seen her and Tom as they had had a row. Tom had really been rather intimidating back then. Maybe that was why they now assumed it was also him who had hurt her. That was ridiculous.

"No, he didn't hit me," Hermione told them in a firm voice.

The result was that she could watch Longbottom frowning at her in disbelief.

"Who was it then?" he asked her. "If it wasn't Riddle?"

"Um… it was… I..." Hermione stammered.

That was a fine mess she had gotten herself into. She didn't want them to think it had been Tom but she couldn't tell them the truth either.

"Hermione, you should really leave him," Longbottom told her in a sympathetic voice.

"No!" she replied hastily. "You see, he didn't do it, okay?"

"We know you like him," Weasley said in a gentle tone. "But he has no right to treat you like that."

"You don't have to deny it. It's plain to see that the filthy bugger is abusing you," Longbottom huffed. Then his eyes softened and he asked, "Does he demand other things from you as well?"

Hermione looked at him and then said indignantly, "What are you talking about?"

"Is he forcing you to satisfy his sexual needs?"

Hermione stared at Longbottom scandalized. "No, what are you thinking? He would never do something like that."

She ran a shaky hand through her hair. If this wasn't so damn serious, it would have almost been funny.

"Look," Hermione said in a firm voice while she looked them in the eyes, one by one. "It wasn't Tom. I can't tell you who attacked me. But you have to believe me when I say, Tom is innocent."

She could see it in their eyes. They didn't believe one word she had said. How frustrating!
But right now, she was just too tired to deal with them any longer. She squeezed her eyes shut and rubbed at the bridge of her nose before she said, "Let's discuss this another time. I'm tired."

She got up from the sofa and walked to the stair case leading to her dormitory. Hermione could almost feel how their eyes followed her, staring at her in concern.

Somehow it was nice to know that her three Gryffindor friends cared about her so much. It meant a lot to her that Longbottom had obviously abandoned his hostile attitude towards her. He liked her after all. He even wanted to protect her. But right now it was just irritating. Her hand wandered to her still throbbing jaw. Like Tom would ever do something like that, she thought incredulously. On the other hand, Hermione could understand where their concern about Tom mistreating her was coming from. The Heir of Slytherin could be rather frightening at times.

Hermione had arrived in her dormitory and now lay down on her bed, not bothering to change into her drew the curtains shut. Her thoughts left the three Gryffindors, sitting down in the common room and probably discussing her abusive relationship with Tom, and wandered back to the incident in Hogsmeade. Those men in the dark cloaks, how had they managed to find her? The only time they had met before today was as she had broken into Flamel's flat. At that point in time those men hadn't known who she was. They had been as surprised as she had been in finding her in the flat.

The frightening thing was that now, just a few weeks later, they seemed to know a lot about her. Their leader had addressed her by name. So somehow they had managed to find her and identify her. Hermione wondered how they had managed that. She didn't belong into this time so there was not much evidence of her existence. But those men had succeeded in finding her anyway. They had even known that she would be in Hogsmeade today and had prepared a trap for her.

Hermione rolled on her side, hugging her soft Gryffindor pillow.

The next alarming thing was the strength of those men. They had appeared to be well trained. It wasn't so much the magical power of every single one of them that frightened Hermione but the way in which they had worked together. They had been well organized with a leader being the vanguard. All this indicated that they were not a bunch of mere muggers. They were more like a tightly organized team of soldiers. Hermione didn't want to think what would have happened if Tom hadn't found her in time.

But the next question was the most important one. Who were those men?

As the leader of them had grabbed her and pressed her against the wall, Hermione had been able to see that emblem on his cloak. The triangle that was the Invisibility Cloak, the circle was the Resurrection Stone and the line through the middle represented the Elder Wand. Together they were a symbol for the Deathly Hallows. And…

Hermione hugged the pillow even tighter.

And it was the symbol of Grindelwald.

I Love You

After a night of barely any sleep Hermione woke up and groaned as she realized it was a Monday. Normally she really liked Mondays as they were the beginning of another week of classes, homework and things to learn. But lately she had come to hate Mondays. They actually made her quite jumpy. Hermione got up from her bed and shuffled to the bathroom, while ignoring her room mates' chatter.

The reason for her new aversion for Mondays was the first class right after breakfast: Potions. Hermione really didn't want to continue brewing a potion that could very well be her demise. The Ortus portion still weighed heavily on her mind. Mixed with blood this potion was able to give the exact date of birth of the test person. There was no way she could allow anyone to run that potion with her blood. So Hermione had decided to sabotage the potion. Though she still hadn't taken any action yet. It would be unwise to do it now, as they hadn't progressed very far in making the potion. If she was to ruin it now, they would still have time to start a new approach. Hermione didn't think she could pull something like this sabotage more than one time. Tom would surely get suspicious if their potion would be faulty two times in a row. He was incredibly observant.

Hermione washed up and then sighed tiredly while she brushed her hair. Well, she at least tried to brush it, she realized as she stared irritated at her fuzzy hair. Then she gave up and returned her brush to her other toiletries lying on a shelf.

Tom really was too observant for his own good, she thought decidedly as her thoughts wandered back to yesterday. How had he managed to find out about Peverell's manuscript? She certainly had never, in any way, mentioned the book while in Tom's presence. In fact, she had never spoken to anybody about Peverell's book. She had actually racked her brain about how Tom had found out. Though with no success. It was a mystery. But as his inexplicable knowledge complicated her situation, it was nothing compared to her other problem. Hermione's thoughts now drifted away from her boyfriend and to the men who had ambushed her yesterday. The more she thought on it the surer she was that those had been Grindelwald's men. That coat of arms on the black cloaks of her attackers was definitely a symbol Grindelwald had used. It actually mirrored his obsession with the Deathly Hallows. That Grindelwald was trying to steal a book written by one of the creators of the Hallows was no surprise either.

Hermione slowly walked out of the bathroom. With relief she noticed that her dorm mates had already left. She took her school bag from her bed, while her gaze sweeped over her trunk where she knew Peverell's manuscript was hidden.

That Grindelwald had stepped into the picture was a severe problem, Hermione had to admit reluctantly. She certainly didn't want to fight against him or his men. She had already fought against enough Dark Wizards as it was but apart from that, there still was the time line problem. She had obviously stolen a book that would have otherwise fallen into Grindelwald's hands. Had she changed the past with her actions? The guilt again washed over her at that thought.

Pull yourself together! she hissed at herself.

After all, she didn't know for sure if it was even possible to change the past. If so, then she was in big trouble even without having stolen the manuscript. Hermione thought as suddenly an image of Tom rose up in her mind. She shook her head in an attempt to get rid of her disturbing thoughts. There was no use in lamenting over things she couldn't change anymore. Obviously Grindelwald was after her now that was a fact. Fortunately, she was relatively safe here behind Hogwarts' protective walls. Though she shouldn't relax because of that, Hermione decided. Grindelwald's men seemed to be rather well-trained. Maybe it would be a good idea to train her own abilities so she was prepared should they decide to strike again. She hadn't done that in some time, Hermione admitted guiltily. Lately she hadn't worked much on the Elder Magic. It hadn't been a conscious decision to abandon her attempts to gain more control over that magic but there had always been other things to do. She had had to go to classes, do her homework and of course there was Tom. During all of this she had really neglected the Elder Magic. Something she should make up for now. So Hermione decided to start working with the Elder Magic again. After all, she had gained something like rudimentary control over it. She had even managed to use the magic while performing spells. Still, there was certainly room for improvement. Yes, after classes were over today, she would go back to train the Elder Magic, Hermione thought somehow reassured, conveniently ignoring the small book that lay hidden in her trunk.

So she left her dorm and descended the stairs to the common room. But before she arrived downstairs, she could hear voices coming from the common room.

"How dare you…?" an angry voice, which sounded suspiciously like Longbottom, shouted furiously.

"Please, can't we just reconcile?" another voice, calm and exaggeratedly polite, answered with false sincerity.

Hermione sighed as she had recognized the second voice, too. She really should have expected something like this. Though she was glad that Longbottom obviously liked her again, that wasn't going to improve his potentially hazardous attitude towards Tom. Especially now that he thought Tom was a woman basher. Hermione shortly considered to just turn around, get back to bed and ignore she ever heard anything. But that would be negligent, she admitted reluctantly. So she walked down the stairs and entered the common room.

Tom was too tired to ponder how much he hated Mondays as he got up. Why did they have to start classes in the middle of the night? he wondered ill-tempered as he slowly stood up from his bed. It was twenty minutes later as he stepped out of the Slytherin common room, perfectly dressed and with still slightly damp hair from the shower. He had more than enough time before his first class, potions, would start. Tom had gotten up earlier than normal today because he planned to visit the Gryffindor common room to get Hermione. He wanted to make sure that she was alright. After all it was only yesterday that she had been attacked.

Tom shuddered as he remembered how he had found her in that back yard yesterday. That pathetic man had grabbed her while there had been blood trickling from her mouth. Tom could again feel his angry magic awaken when he just thought about that image of Hermione. He tried to prevent his dark magic from swirling around him as he didn't want any teacher to see him like that. Yesterday, though, he hadn't hold back anything. He had been beyond furious as he had found Hermione threatened by those men. He was actually surprised that he hadn't killed one of those lousy wankers. They had hurt Hermione, Tom thought as he balled his hands into tight fists. No-one was allowed to touch her, let alone injure her. That witch belonged to him after all.

Tom clenched his teeth and tried to reign in his angrily boiling magic as he remembered the wounds on Hermione's body. That filthy man had really dared to hit her. There had been a bruise on her face and her arm had been slit open. Whoever those people were, the next time he met them they would be lucky if he didn't murder them. Tom wasn't very forgiving when people tried to hurt his possessions. One thing still puzzled him though. As he had seen Hermione pressed against the wall while that man had threatened her, Tom's fury had been mingled with something else. Something alien. He just couldn't put his finger on what it could have been.

_Fear?_ It was strange. How could he be in fear of somebody else's life? That was new and just, well, strange.

Whatever it had been, in face of his rage it had dropped in the background anyway. Tom could still feel it boiling inside of him, the wrath. Who were those men? Why had they attacked Hermione? It had obviously something to do with that book she had stolen from Flamel's flat. It was important enough so that those men attacked Hermione to get it from her. Tom felt immensely irritated by the fact that Hermione hadn't shown him the book. She had even outright refused to let him see the book as he had told her he wanted to have a look.

How insolent.

After all she was his, so she shouldn't have any secrets from him. By finally becoming his girlfriend, she had admitted to the fact that Tom owned her, hadn't she? Still she stubbornly insisted on having her secrets from him. The girl was not in the least bit easy to manage. With force though, Tom knew, he wouldn't achieve anything with her. No, he had to try to get the information in some other way. Thanks to Slughorn's tendency to blabber away, he now knew that the name Peverell seemed to be linked with the Deathly Hallows. Since he first heard about the Hallows Tom had done some research. Obviously there were three of those Hallows, each one with questionable properties. Tom shook his head disapprovingly. The whole topic was a little too dubious to his taste. The Hallows were more a myth than anything else. There even were rumours about this cult searching for the Hallows.

_Idiots._

One thing, though, Tom had found rather intriguing. It was said that if someone managed to combine all three Hallows, they would be able to conquer death. An interesting fairy tale, indeed. But still, a fairy tale. As far as Tom knew, there existed only one way to evade death. He had done a really extensive research on that. But however dodgy those Deathly Hallows were, it seemed that Hermione was somehow interested in them. Tom still wanted to know why.

By now he had nearly reached the entrance to the Gryffindor common room. It still irked him how Hermione ended up in that bothersome house. Those people got really on his nerve. With pleasure Tom thought back to the day when he had nearly cursed Longbottom. That had been right after Slughorn's last party. He really regretted how Hermione had caught him before he could fire the curse. Back then she had told him that she wouldn't accept such behaviour towards her friends. While Tom didn't think she was in the position to forbid him anything, he still didn't want her to be angry with him. She could be quite arduous when angered. Though he really didn't know if he could pull through with the resolution of not hexing her friends, Tom thought as he had finally reached that ridiculous portrait leading into the Gryffindor common room. As he stepped into the common room he was instantly hit by those unbearably bright gold and red colours.

_Geez, what are they trying to say?_ Tom wondered condescendingly. *'Look at me, I'm a hyperactive idiot'._

He tried to ignore this assault on the good taste and let his gaze sweep over the room. Full of ridiculously cheerful dorks but no Hermione anywhere, he noticed as he couldn't spot her. Maybe she was still up in her dorm. He shortly considered going up there but in the end decided against it. It wouldn't benefit his reputation if the perfect model student would burst into a girls' dorm. Though he wouldn't mind getting a glimpse of Hermione without her clothes on, he thought as a smirk appeared on his face. He was lost in his happy thoughts so didn't notice as a group of Gryffindors walked towards where he was standing by the entrance hole.
"What are you doing here?" Tom was brought out of his daydreams by a rather hostile voice.

He found Longbottom and his two sidekicks, Weasley and Lupin, standing directly in front of him. Tom tried to suppress it but an evil smirk tugged at the corners of his mouth as his eyes wandered over the group. Longbottom seemed to be a true Gryffindor as his aversion and hate was overtly present on his face while he glowered darkly at Tom. The two other boys, too, stared disapprovingly at him.

Oh no, what are they going to do? Tom wondered sarcastically. Maybe trying to curse me with their vastly superior magic? He couldn't help but snigger at that thought.

"Listen, you sick creep!" Longbottom spat at him enraged. "This is the Gryffindor common room and we certainly don't need people like you here."

The deprecative edge in his voice managed to raise Tom's own temper. Though he had to admit that he wasn't doing very much to hold himself back. It was just a pity that he couldn't curse that prick here, Tom thought as his eyes shortly flashed to the other students present. A few of them were watching the whole conversation quite blatantly.

Damn Gryffindors! he thought and decided to pull his innocent prefect act

"I'm just waiting for my girlfriend," Tom replied in a voice dripping with earnest affability. "I don't want to disturb anyone here."

"Don't think you can fool us, Riddle," Longbottom blustered at him. "We all know what a twisted freak you are."

How difficult. Tom could barely hold back his furious magic from lashing out at Longbottom. Still it was worth it to see that look of helpless rage on the idiot's face.

"I'm sorry," Tom whispered, while still making sure that everyone could catch his words. "I know you fancy Hermione, too. But still there is no reason to vent your anger on me."

He then easily arranged his features into a look of honest sympathy as he eyed Longbottom. With pleasure Tom noted those whispered conversations suddenly starting all around him.

"How dare you…?" the blond Gryffindor barked furiously and his friends had to hold him back from lunging at Tom.

"Please, can't we just reconcile?" Tom said with sincerity seeping through his voice.

He knew he was overdoing it a little now but it was just too much fun to spite this idiot. Obviously the other students where buying it, Tom noted satisfied as he saw looks of outrage on their faces.

"Marc! Stop it!" Tom suppressed another evil grin as now a girl interfered in this amusing conversation.

The girl had jet-black, long hair and was obviously the ringleader of a group of other Gryffindor girls. Right now, they all glowered at Longbottom.

"Diana, keep out of this. You don't know what this is about," Longbottom hissed at the black haired girl.

"No, really," another girl with a painfully shrill voice said reproachfully. "You can't treat Riddle this way. He didn't do anything to you."
Tom had to work to not break down with evil laughter. But he was glad that he had managed to contain himself when another girl unexpectedly showed up.

"What is going on here?" Hermione asked with a sour look on her face.

She already regretted not having followed her first impulse and had gone back to bed again, Hermione thought as she let her gaze quickly take in the situation in front of her. There was Longbottom, clearly enraged, while Weasley and Lupin tried to somehow restrain him. Her dear dorm mates stood not far away, still staring disapprovingly at Longbottom. Finally Hermione's eyes landed on Tom. He was standing there in front of Longbottom and looked cool and composed. His face was covered by a mask of fake politeness but Hermione could tell that he was immensely amused by the whole incident. So she frowned at him annoyed which only made him arch one eyebrow gracefully.

"Forget it, I actually don't want to know," she finally sighed tiredly.

Then she turned to the exit of the common room planning to leave for the Great Hall. Tom opened the portrait-door for her before he stepped aside to let her pass.

"Hermione, you can't seriously want to be left alone with that evil git," Longbottom yelled after her concerned.

Hermione turned around and smiled at him. "I told you, you don't have to worry about me," she tried to soothe him.

Then she finally stepped out of the Gryffindor common room, closely followed by Tom. Hermione could just hear Rose's shrill voice nagging, "Stop insulting Riddle like that." then mercifully the portrait closed, shutting out any conversation. Hermione continued her way down to the Great Hall, while Tom fell in step beside her.

"What's suddenly up with that idiot?" Tom asked her after some time. "I thought he hates you."

"Well, thank you very much, Mr Sensible," Hermione replied snappishly. "But obviously Marc's gotten over his 'hate'."

Tom just looked down at her expectantly which caused Hermione to sigh again.

"He found me with this on my face," she said while gesturing at her still bruised jaw and her cut lip. "So of course he was a bit concerned about me."

"Hmm." Made Tom while he narrowed his eyes at her in suspicion. "That might be true but it still doesn't explain why he just now tried to murder me the moment I set foot into your common room."

Hermione looked away from his piercing stare, she actually didn't want to tell him why Longbottom was again on speaking terms with her.

"My friends asked me yesterday in the common room how I got hurt," she said awkwardly and then shot a glance at Tom but quickly looked away from him again. "I couldn't tell them about those guys attacking me, of course. No-one knows that I stole the Peverell manuscript." She rushed on so fast that the words flowed together resulting in one big, incomprehensible splutter, "And now they might think that it's you who hit me."

There was a pause in which neither one of them said anything. Hermione started to fiddle nervously with a strand of her curly hair, while she still avoided looking at Tom.
"And why would they assume something like that?" he finally asked her in a demanding voice, which was slightly tinged by anger now.

"Er… I don't know?" Hermione replied sheepishly.

She turned her head and glanced at him. She found him scowling at her. There was a rather angry frown between his eyebrows and he clenched his jaw tightly.

"Look, I really don't care what your idiotic friends think about me," he stated in a frighteningly cold tone. "But Longbottom's behaviour is rather bothersome. Couldn't you have told him that it wasn't me?"

"I did," Hermione quickly assured before she continued in a meek voice, "But he kinda didn't believe me."

Tom narrowed his eyes at her in anger then he scoffed, "Some nice friends you have there."

"It's not as if you ever tried to be remotely civil towards them," she chided him in a quite tone. Anger was now clearly visible on his face as he glared down at her. Hermione sighed softly then she stepped a little closer to him and slowly slipped her arm around his waist.

"Marc's just a little hot-headed," she explained in a gentle tone, trying to calm Tom down. "He's stupid that way."

She felt him relax a little as her arm was slung around him. But then he hissed at her darkly which made her shudder a little, "Whatever the reason, someone should hold that git back when he's around me. Or I'll show him that I can be just as evil as he assumes me to be."

"How about you just ignore him?" Hermione suggested softly as she started to lead him away, still with her arm around his waist.

Instead of an answer, Tom just glared down at her darkly. But the evil glint left his eyes quickly as his gaze wandered over her face. He raised a hand and gently skimmed over the bruise on her jaw.

"Is it still hurting?" he asked her concerned.

She smiled up at him. "You know me. I've been through worse."

"Surprisingly enough, that doesn't comfort me at all," he just said dryly.

Then he wrapped his arm around her shoulder and pulled her against him. That gesture was rather possessive, Hermione thought but she didn't say anything. She knew that Tom must have been quite concerned about her as he had found her cornered by Grindelwald's men. So she decided to overlook his possessive behaviour and allowed him to lead her down to the Great Hall. They had almost reached the first floor as Tom spoke again.

"Who were those men? Tell me!" he took her off-guard with his sudden demand.

"Um… I don't know?"

Not very surprisingly, the glare was back on his face.

"You don't know? Or you don't want to tell me?" he asked frostily. "Like you don't want to show me the book."
Hermione had to look away from the angry and even reproachful expression on his face. She knew how much Tom hated that she wasn't open with him. But this was a part of her life that she could not tell him about.

"Look, why is that so important anyway?" Hermione said in a soft voice. "They didn't manage to seriously injure me. So it's water-"

"-water under the bridge," Tom completed the sentence for her in a low and terse tone. He turned his head and again scowled down at her. "That reminds me of a very similar conversation we once had in a bar in Diagon Alley. Do you remember?"

Hermione glanced up at him but didn't answer anything. She did remember that conversation, though.

"Earlier on that very same day I was walking through London, minding my own business, as suddenly a girl ran into me. Closely followed by a pack of rather infuriated wizards," Tom said, irritation now oozing out of his voice. "And you might be surprised to hear that those wizards wore the same style of cloaks as the men who attacked you again yesterday."

"Did they now?" she wondered innocently.

"Hermione, stop playing dumb," he hissed at her in a sharp voice. "Why are those men after you?"

She just stared up at him but didn't answer anything. Hermione didn't like it very much having to lie to Tom so she preferred to not answer at all. They had stopped walking by now. He stood before her and glared rather darkly down at her.

"Why do you need that book?" he demanded to know.

Hermione continued staring at him. She could see a dangerous glint in his eyes and knew that he was rather enraged by her silence. But this was something he would have to accept.

"Tell me!" he hissed at her in a commanding voice.

Hermione sighed as she was again hit by his furious stare. Then she reached out for him and put a hand gently down on his arm.

"Tom," she began in a calm tone. "I'm sure you don't tell me everything about you either. So just accept that I have my own secrets."

He continued to glare down at her incensed but she just looked back at him with a blank face. She knew he was not at all concuring with her statement. But after a while he seemed to come to the conclusion that he wouldn't be able to get anything from her right now.

"Fine!" he just snarled at her angrily.

He grabbed her arm and resumed his way to the Great Hall. Hermione followed him. As he was stomping down the corridor she once again wondered how he had learned about Peverell's book in the first place. She knew from experience how persistent Tom could be. She was sure that she hadn't yet seen the end of it. They just entered the corridor leading to the Great Hall as he suddenly asked in a quiet voice,

"Do you think they are going to attack you again?"

He hadn't turned around to her but was still dragging her behind him. Hermione frowned at him but then answered in a soft voice, "I don't know."

Which made him stop and whip around to her. There was again an angry look on his face but she also spotted concern shining in his eyes.

"I really don't know," she whispered honestly.

He didn't reply anything but just continued to look at her. The anger had by now disappeared only the concern remained. Then he suddenly reached out for her and pulled her towards him so that she leaned into his chest. His arms were wrapped around her and he held her tightly. After a moment he ended the embrace again, took her hand in his and continued his way towards the entry to the Great Hall. Hermione was a little confused by his sudden mood swing but she decided to not comment on it. As they finally entered the Great Hall, Tom led her over to the Gryffindor table. Hermione was somehow glad that she would, at least for the breakfast, be able to escape his interrogation.

She sat down at the table and was happy to find a plate of ham sandwiches right in front of her. Somehow she was quite hungry. After the Hogsmeade fiasco yesterday, she hadn't been able to get anything to eat. Hermione just reached for one of the sandwiches as she felt someone sliding into the seat next to her. She looked up and raised her eyebrows in surprise as she found Tom sitting beside her.

She stared at him for a moment before she asked confused, "What are you doing here?"

Tom didn't even grace her with a look but just reached for the ham sandwiches and placed one on her plate before he served himself.

"What does it look like I'm doing?" he asked her in a perfectly normal voice. "I'm having breakfast."

Hermione now furrowed her brow and continued to look at him, pouring himself a cup of coffee.

"Don't you have to sit at the Slytherin table?" she finally asked him slowly.

"No," he replied calmly.

"What, 'no'?"

Tom finally turned his head and looked at her. His grey eyes scanned her and she could see a certain amount of amusement dancing in them.

"I don't have to sit there," he said lightly. "There's no school rule forbidding to sit at another house's table, is there?"

Hermione opened her mouth. But she actually really didn't know about any such rule, so she closed her mouth again. She tried to ignore the triumphant sneer on his face and turned back to her plate. Hopefully Tom was just feeling over-protective and didn't sit here to continue his questioning. She started on her sandwich and let her gaze wander over the other Gryffindors. Most of them had already noticed the Slytherin sitting at their table but no-one seemed to be offended by that fact.

Most of them had already noticed the Slytherin sitting at their table but no-one seemed to be offended by that fact.

Of course not, Hermione thought dryly. Because everybody loves Tom Riddle.

She could even see Rose, Lucia and Viola, her ever so helpful dorm mates, staring at Tom with glassy looks in their eyes. Then Hermione's gaze wandered towards the Slytherin table. She found a few of them, mostly the girls, glaring at her darkly. They still hadn't forgiven her for stealing away their handsome prefect. Not one of the Slytherins dared to glare at Tom though. His followers ignored the whole thing altogether. Hermione just shrugged her shoulders and reached for another sandwich. It was then that Longbottom, Weasley and Lupin sat down on the seats opposite her. Hermione was not surprised at all to find all three boys glaring at Tom angrily. She could feel her stomach drop as she saw that murderous expression on Longbottom's face.

This can't be good, she sighed inwardly.

The three Gryffindors continued to eye Tom as if they were just now contemplating on how to kill him best. Tom on the other hand just sat there elegantly, continued on his sandwich and looked as if he had no concern in the world.

"Why don't you sit over there," Weasley asked Tom, his voice uncharacteristically cold, as he gestured towards the Slytherin table. "With the other snakes?"

Tom just looked at the three boys in boredom before he said blasé, "I can sit there every day. Now I just wanted to be with my girlfriend."

He then laid a hand on Hermione's forearm which made Longbottom narrow his eyes at him.

"But we don't want you here!" the blonde Gryffindor now bellowed acridly.

Tom just smiled at him mildly and said in a sympathetic voice, "That's too bad."

Still he remained sitting at his place and calmly poured himself another cup of coffee. He then continued on his breakfast and completely ignored the three vengeful Gryffindors glaring at him.

After a while Longbottom spoke again. He asked Tom accusingly, his voice shaking with barely suppressed anger, "So how was your day yesterday, Riddle?"

Hermione rolled her eyes as she saw that insincere smile taking form on Tom's face as he looked back at Longbottom.

Then he said in an insufferably friendly voice, "Why, it was quite smashing." Before he turned towards her and smirked wickedly at her, "Don't you think, Hermione?"

She gaped at Tom. He didn't just really say that. Her shocked expression only helped to widen the evil smirk on his face. Hermione almost didn't dare to look at her friends but she pulled herself together and turned her head away from Tom. The look on Longbottom's face was just one thing: dangerous. His face was completely purple, a sharp line had appeared between his eyebrows and he was positively quaking with suppressed rage. In short, he was seething with fury. Lupin and Weasley seemed to be able to restrain themselves better but they, too, were looking far from calm as they glowered darkly at Tom.

Hermione looked back at Tom, now angry herself. He was calmly sipping from his cup of coffee while he smiled rather evilly at the three Gryffindors opposite him. He was obviously enjoying the show. Hermione would have liked to strangle him. Must he behave like this? Now her friends would be confirmed in their belief that Tom had hurt her yesterday. Hermione grinded her teeth as she understood Tom's actions. He was obviously still angry with her for not telling him about Peverell's book and about her refusing to let him see it. Thus he was trying to make her life miserable, too.

"You sadistic asshole!" Longbottom finally clamoured rabidly at Tom, which earned him quite a few shocked and outraged looks from the other Gryffindors at the table. "I'm going to make you regret what you've done to her."

As a reply Tom just leaned leisurely back in his chair, smiled at Longbottom in an offending way and raised one eyebrow gracefully as if to say 'Really? Try me.' Hermione narrowed her eyes in anger at Tom. He was such a lying creep. Then she kicked him angrily in the shin under the table. He unfortunately managed to suppress a painful yelp and continued to sit casually in his chair. In the corners of her eyes she could see Longbottom's hand twitch towards his wand and she knew she had to prevent a duel from breaking lose in the Great Hall.

So she leaned a little forwards and smiled reassuringly at Longbottom before she said in what hopefully was a calming tone, "Don't listen to him. He's just being silly."

The angry frown never left Longbottom's face but at least he didn't reach for his wand any more. Hermione turned around to Tom again and hissed at him, "And you, Riddle. Shut up!"

Tom looked at her and she nearly groaned as she still saw that amusement glinting in his eyes. Though it wasn't mirrored on his face as, despite his apparent delight, he somehow managed to frown at her darkly.

"I don't like that tone you are using, dear. It seems you haven't been paying attention yesterday," he chided in a quiet voice, and Hermione was pretty sure her friends were the only ones close enough to be able to hear every word.

Tom leaned a little towards her, extended a hand and skimmed with his fingers gingerly over the bruise on her jaw.

"You don't want me to teach you again, do you?" His voice was icy cold as he threatened her but Hermione could still see the mischievous glint in his eyes.

She stared at him with a horrified expression on her face. She knew that wasn't exactly beneficial to her situation but she just couldn't help it. How could Tom be so devious? she wondered as he was once again presenting her with one of his trade-mark smirks. Her head whipped to Longbottom who had jumped up from his seat. He was shaking with fury as he glared at Tom.

"You… you…" he bellowed, obviously too enraged to find the right insult.

Hermione quickly got up from her seat, too. This was getting a little out of hand, she thought angrily.

"Look at the time," she declared in a loud voice, trying to distract the curious stares of the other Gryffindors away from the irate Longbottom. "We'll be late for potions."

She leaned down, gabbed Tom's arm and pulled at him. He obviously didn't want to leave yet but as he saw that mixture of panic and anger on her face he took pity on her, reconsidered his decision and got up from the table. Hermione now clutched his wrist and tugged him after her in direction to the exit from the Great Hall. She breathed out relieved as they finally exited the hall but she still clutched Tom tightly as if she were afraid he would walk back and cause more havoc any second now. She could hear him chuckling infuriatingly. She turned around to him and saw a look of amusement on his face as he sniggered at her. She narrowed her eyes in anger.

"Maybe I should teach you how to behave!" she managed to grind out.

Tom took a step away from her and looked at her with wide eyes, feigning fear.

"Are you threatening me?" he mocked her, false anxiety lacing his words.

"Stop that!" she barked at him. "Didn't I tell you to stay away from my friends?"

"Yes, and I will," he replied now perfectly calm again. Then he added innocently, "But you can't expect me to not defend myself should they ever decide to attack me."
Hermione balled her hands into tight fists as she stared at him irately. Tom just smirked at her haughtily. In a flush of anger, she flicked her wrist so that her wand landed in her hand. She whirled it in an angry motion and sent a Stinging hex his way. Unfortunately Tom had seen that one coming and had pulled his own wand which he now waved to deflect the hex. Hermione threw her hands up in frustration as she saw her hex had been unsuccessful and she growled in anger before she continued her way towards the dungeons. Tom sauntered after her, still that contented smirk in place. On their way down to the potions class room, Hermione didn't stop to rant.

"I can't believe you really did that. I mean, don't you have any decorum? And after I told you to stay away from them, too," she lectured him. "You know what you should do after graduation? Become an actor. I'm sure everybody would love you. Or, even better… a politician. No-one would expect you not to lie then. Just perfect for you."

On she went, all the way down to the dungeons. Tom had obviously long since stopped to listen as he stalked confidently after her, still with an arrogant smirk on his face and didn't say anything. They just walked down a deserted corridor as he changed his mind and interrupted her ranting in his smooth voice,

"You know what, Hermione?" She turned around to him and found him smiling at her attractively which only made her scowl at him. "You look cute when you are all nettled like that."

Hermione just stared at him enraged. Her hand twitched but this time she resisted the urge to pull her wand. Instead she turned around and continued stomping down the corridor. His soft chuckling didn't help to lift her mood. She angrily readjusted her school bag which hung over her left shoulder. The bag slid down and banged against her arm. A sharp pain seared through her as it hit the deep cut she had received yesterday. Hermione gasped softly and cradled her left arm. Tom was instantly by her side, took the school bag from her and steadied her. All taunt had left his face as he scanned her arm worriedly. He slid an arm around her waist and led her towards one of the doors in the corridor. As he made to open the door Hermione had recovered enough to whisper,

"What-?"

"I need to look at that," he cut her short while gesturing at her arm.

He opened the door and pulled her inside.

"Tom, this is a girls' toilet," Hermione exclaimed indignantly as she entered.

"Yes, and you are a girl. Where's the problem?" he retorted distractedly as he pulled her over to the sinks.

"But you are not," she said but still followed him.

He turned around to her and smirked. "Glad that you noticed."

Hermione ignored his jibe but just stated, "We are going to be late for potions."

He shrugged at her and then helped her remove her black outer robes before he took her left arm and rolled up her sleeve. With a wave of his wand the bandage around her forearm and elbow was gone. Hermione couldn't see the cut very well but what she saw didn't look too good. The wound looked raw and deep but now also purulent. Black veins were originating from it and even stretched over her still intact skin.

"Hmm." Made Tom as he examined her arm.
"What's wrong?" she asked.

"I thought so yesterday but I wasn't sure," he explained as he looked up from her arm. "It's cursed."

"What?"

Hermione was a little worried now. She knew from experience that a cursed wound was no laughing matter. Her arm certainly hurt more than should be expected from such a small cut.

"Don't panic," he said in a reassuring voice. "I think I can break the curse."

He drew his wand and started to wave it over her arm while he whispered an incantation she had never heard before. She actually didn't even know the language he was using. Suddenly a pleasant coldness spread through her arm. It managed to numb the throbbing ache. The black veins slowly disappeared. Tom stopped his spell and again examined the wound. After a while he looked up at her with a small smile tugging at his mouth.

"See? The curse is gone." Then he waved his wand again and a bandage wound itself around her arm. "It's going to heal properly now."

Hermione looked at the white bandage around her arm contemplatively. She hadn't even noticed that something was wrong. Her eyes wandered to Tom who looked rather self-satisfied as he scanned her. Sometimes she forgot what an exceptional wizard her really was.

"Thanks," she whispered.

He shook his head sadly before he said in mock concern, "You are so helpless without me."

Hermione giggled softly then took his arm and said, "We are late for potions."

"Yes, and I'm going to blame that on you if the old Slug wants to give us detention."

"Whatever happened to chivalry?" she wondered wryly.

"I'm a Slytherin, you know," Tom said in a steady voice as he led her out of the girls' toilet. "We never were into this self-sacrifice business."

Suffice to say that Slughorn did not give them detention. He didn't even take points from them. Hermione had an inkling that the professor would never give his favourite student any detention whatever crime Tom would commit.

Biased Slytherins! Hermione grumbled in her mind as she walked over to her table, trying to ignore the concerned looks her three Gryffindor friends were throwing her way. They had obviously noticed her being late and by the looks on their faces had come to several horrible scenarios as to what had held her up. Especially as her companion had been the evil Tom Riddle.

"Now, where was I?" Slughorn said in his booming voice while smiling down at his class. "Ah yes, the next step of brewing the Ortus potion."

Here he waved his wand and suddenly instructions appeared on the black board behind him. Hermione groaned as she read it. Why did Slughorn always need to make her already complicated life even worse?

Later that day Hermione sat in DADA and tried to listen to professor McGray droning on about some dark creature or other.

"...and those first signs would be a sudden severe drop in temperature followed by a strange feeling of gloom. Though there is a protection spell against them, the best action is still to avoid."

Hermione had her quill in her hand and really concentrated on what the professor said. It was highly likely that she had already met whatever creature he was talking about but she still didn't want to miss anything in class. It seemed her know-it-all nature didn't allow her to not pay attention. But that proved to be rather difficult as her seat neighbours insisted on discussing with her.

"Why don't you realize that he is evil?" Longbottom whispered to her, his voice was mixed with anger and worry.

Here he goes again, Hermione thought tiredly.

"I can't believe you forgive him for hitting you," he continued.

"I told you," she finally hissed back at him. "It wasn't Tom."

"He openly admitted it during breakfast," he returned indignantly.

Hermione sighed and looked at Longbottom. Right now he was scanning her concerned.

"Look, Tom was just joking around. Okay?" she replied impatiently.

"He didn't look like joking," Weasley piped up, now butting into this grotesque conversation.

"And I really don't see how this would be funny at all," Lupin whispered at her from her right side.

"Well, he's got a really bad sense of humour," Hermione said soothingly, trying to make up for the damage Tom had caused.

The looks of worry on her friends' faces told her that she wasn't very successful. Hermione turned her head away from them and let her gaze wander to the Slytherin side of the class room. She quickly found Tom sitting at one of the tables. Right now he was looking back at her with an unsavoury smirk on his face. Hermione's mouth was pressed into a thin line as she looked back at him angrily. Now he even winked at her. She balled her hands into tight fists and sent him a death glare. But Tom just smiled innocently; he was obviously enjoying her predicament.

That scheming, little...

If he had been a little less talented with magic, she would have just let Longbottom attack him. But as it was, she really needed to somehow calm her friends down.

"Then what happened after breakfast? Why were you late?" Longbottom insisted on the topic of their conversation. "You were awfully pale as you finally turned up in potions. Did he threaten you or what?"

"Nothing happened," Hermione said adamantly. "He's my boyfriend why would he do something like that?"

She knew that was a rather weak excuse but slowly she was running out of explanations.

"Hmm, maybe because he's just using you?" Longbottom replied this time in a rather sharp tone. As he saw her opening her mouth to say something he continued seriously, "You should ditch him. He's not good for you."
"Why do you say that?" Hermione was getting irritated. "You don't really know him."

"We warned you about him, didn't we?" Lupin interjected with his calm voice. "Riddle's dangerous. There are all sorts of strange rumours going on about this little group of his."

"Listen, I'm not going to leave him," she whispered insistently.

"Even after what he did to you?" Weasley said, staring at her bruise.

"For the hundredth time, Tom did not hit me," hissed Hermione.

"Can't you understand that we are worried about you?" Lupin said quietly. "We just want to protect you."

Hermione sighed softly then turned to him and said in a sympathetic voice, "I understand. I really do. But you have to understand that I don't need anyone protecting me. I can look after myself, okay?"

The skeptical looks on all of her friends' faces told her that they in fact did not understand or that they didn't want to. Their conversation came to an intermittent standstill. But then after a while Longbottom started again,

"You can't be serious. Did you forget how he treated you before the Christmas break? And now it's gotten even worse. He's abus-"

"That's it!" Hermione exclaimed rather loudly. "I'm not discussing this anymore!"

"Ms DeCerto!" another voice now intervened exasperated.

She looked up and found professor McGrey scowling at her, then he reprimanded, "If you have time for chatter with your friends, then I'm sure you already know the name of the spell able to drive away a Dementor?"

Hermione could feel her face growing hot as the professor frowned at her.

McGrey raised his eyebrows at her. He obviously hadn't expected her to know the answer as she hadn't been paying any attention at all.

"That is correct," he then said. "But I still want you to pay more attention in my class."

"Yes, sir," Hermione answered softly.

McGrey frowned at her seat neighbours and said, "That applies to you, too, gentlemen."

McGrey turned away from them again and continued his class. Hermione threw another glance at Tom and found him smirking at her. It rather infuriated her. He had known exactly in what his inappropriate behaviour during breakfast would result. Now he seemed to thoroughly enjoy the problems he had caused her. In a fit of childishness she stuck her tongue out at him. She could see his eyes widen slightly with surprise but then he seemed to chuckle. Hermione sighed and turned away from him to again listen to professor McGrey's explanations about Dementors.

{{{{{{{{+}}}}}}}}

It was a while after classes were finished that Tom sat in the Slytherin common room, pouring over a roll of parchment. A few books lay scattered here and there on the table in front of him as he was preoccupied with his homework.

"Tom?" a voice disturbed Tom's train of thought.

Irritated by this interruption, he turned his head and looked at the speaker. He inwardly groaned as his eyes fell on Melanie Nicolls. She stood right beside the sofa he was sitting on and observed him with a ridiculously seductive look on her face and a rather disturbing hunger in her eyes as she scanned him.

"Melanie," he replied in a glacial yet still polite tone.

Nicolls smiled at him and obviously took his reply as an invitation to sit down beside him. As she was sitting so near him he almost gagged as he smelt her heavy perfume in the air.

"What are you doing today?" Nicolls cooed at him.

Tom shortly considered to just crucio her. To hell with his untainted reputation. Yeah, and directly into Azkaban if Dumbledore has any say in the matter, a voice snorted at him derisively.

"Nothing much," he replied instead in a bored sounding voice.

And it was true. Hermione had told him that she needed some time to complete her essay for Binns. Tom hadn't believed one word she had said. It was more than unlikely that Hermione DeCerto had not yet finished an essay that was due the next day. No, she probably needed time to study that book she had stolen, Tom mused annoyed. How could she have not shown him? Hopefully her friends were now so idiotically concerned about her that they didn't leave her any time to read the book. On the other hand, Tom didn't know if he would prefer Hermione spending more time in Longbottom's presence instead of reading that mysterious book. At the thought of the blonde Gryffindor Tom's temper rose a few notches.

That dunce. How could the fool think that Tom had hit her? Like I would ever hit her. Unless there was a very good reason, Tom didn't intend to ever hurt her.

He was brought out of his musings by a voice cajoling at him, "If you are free. Then how about we do something together?"

He turned his head and found Nicolls clinging to his arm while she looked up at him in what was probably supposed to be a voluptuous way. That girl was rather persistent, wasn't she?

"Hmm… no, I'm sorry. Wanted to finish this essay," Tom replied, not at all sounding sorry, while he gestured at the roll of parchment lying in front of him.

Instantly a frown appeared on Nicolls' face.

"You are meeting with that Gryffindor chick, aren't you?" she whined at him. "Why are you together with her anyway? She's a Gryffindor and not even pretty. I'm sure you can find someone better…"

Tom looked at her with a blank face, though his brow was furrowed dangerously.

"You really shouldn't talk about my girlfriend like this. I don't appreciate it very much if someone insults her," he said conversationally, though that didn't lessen the hard edge hidden in his tone.

He could watch a deep blush taking form on Nicolls' face and she awkwardly looked away from him while mumbling an apology. Tom didn't care though. That girl really got on his nerves so he turned to his homework again and completely ignored her sitting beside her. He started to review his Arithmancy essay for professor Gauß, though he really didn't need to do it. He never had anything less than an O in Arithmancy. Actually he never got anything other than an O in any of his classes, Tom thought as a haughty smile appeared on his face. He never failed any class. Well, aside from the flying lesson fiasco in first year.

Or Transfiguration... he admitted and the smirk dropped from his mouth. That wasn't due to his inability to do the magic but more to the fact that Dumbledore just hated him. Absentmindedly he noticed how Nicolls stood up from the sofa with a disappointed look on her face. Tom didn't care at all.

Instead he wondered if Hermione was going to fail Transfiguration now, too, just like him. Obviously Dumbledore wasn't so fond of her anymore. Once again Tom racked his brains as to how she had blackmailed the professor to let him stay at Hogwarts. She still refused to tell him, insisting that it wasn't anything to be proud of. Her refusal to divulge her secrets really bugged him greatly.

He was again interrupted in his thoughts as Avery walked over to his couch, stood warily before him and then asked hesitantly, "We wondered when we would have the next meeting."

Tom angrily looked up from his essay. Avery cowered away from him as he saw that dark look on his face. A little gratified by the other's obvious fear, Tom pondered his request. They hadn't had a meeting since more than a week ago. Maybe he could relieve some of his stress and curse one of those twits.

"You are lucky. I don't have anything better to do," Tom declared condescendingly. Then he ordered curtly, "Get the others."

---

Hermione currently stood in one of the many unused class rooms of Hogwarts castle. The door was magically locked and warded so that she would notice if anyone tried to enter. She was glad that she had managed to escape her overly concerned Gryffindor friends. After Tom's warped act during breakfast, they were now more convinced than ever that he was bad company.

Snaky brat! Hermione thought angrily and she could feel her magic swirling inside of her irately.

She had come here to this class room to train the Elder Magic. She took deep and steady breaths of air to calm her temper down again. Quickly she felt her magic transforming into a steady flow. Now all she needed to do was find the Elder Magic inside of her, grasp it and then she intended to perform a spell. She had done that before actually. First time she succeeded doing it with the Confero spell. After that she had tried other simple spells using the Elder Magic. Though she hadn't been as diligent as she probably should have been.

Hermione closed her eyes. Her brow was furrowed in concentration and her hand clasped tightly around her black wand. She squeezed her eyes shut and beads of sweat were forming on her forehead as she tried to summon all of her magic. The flow inside of her intensified. There she could feel it. The Elder Magic had no place to hide anymore. It pulsed through her body with the rest of her magic. Hermione concentrated on the Elder Magic. She caressed it, she lured it out of its hiding place and then she tried to get a hold on it. It wasn't easy but she managed it in the end. Next, she sent the Elder Magic out of her body. It crackled around her powerfully.

Now that the Magic was outside of her, invading her surroundings, Hermione could feel it again, that strange pulse originating from Hogwarts castle. It was humming through everything, the stone walls of the castle, the glass of the windows, the suits of armour standing in the corridors, the portraits on the walls. Hermione opened her eyes and now she could even see that bluish pulse again. Everything inside the castle sang in the rhythm of that powerful force, even its inhabitants. Hermione wasn’t completely sure but she assumed that this pulse was the warding magic protecting Hogwarts.

Now that the Elder Magic was swirling around her, she was somehow separated from that pulse of power. The Elder Wand's magic seemed to serve like a shield around her and stopped the warding spells from reaching her. As Hermione so stood there, protected by this cocoon of magic around her, she suddenly had an insane idea. Normally she would never have considered something as crazy as this but the power of the Elder Magic crackling around her made her feel a little light-headed.

Ah, what the heck! Let's just try it.

So without putting much thought in it, Hermione decided to use the Elder Magic now. She grasped her wand even tighter before she went through the familiar preparations. Then she swirled on the spot and nearly gasped out in surprise as the dark pressure really engulfed her.

After only a few seconds the pressure on her body left again. Hermione's eyes were still closed. She was afraid to open them and find parts of her body spread all over the castle. But, she noticed, she didn't hurt anywhere. As she breathed in she could smell the rich odour of earth and decaying wood. Hermione opened her eyes and found herself standing in the middle of a clearing in the Forbidden Forest. She stared in wonder at the tall Blood Acorn tree standing in front of her. This was the clearing she had had once served detention by collecting blood acorn seedlings with Tom and professor McGray. The very clearing she had focused on to apparate to.

And it worked! Hermione thought excited as she turned around herself and stared in amazement at the tall trees of the Forbidden Forest surrounding her. She couldn't believe it. She had just apparated inside of Hogwarts.

To hell with you Hogwarts: A History!

Hermione giggled. It was just inconceivable. Amazing. Her second thought was she had to show Tom.

So Hermione apparated back into the castle. It worked again, even easier than the first time. She felt giddy. This new power that flowed through her was making her feel like she had drunk too much alcohol. She felt somewhat intoxicated by it. The giddy feeling didn't leave her now that she was back in the castle. Right now she probably shouldn't make any decisions of great importance as the power behind the Elder Magic obviously influenced her but Hermione didn't care. She was feeling too good to ponder her options. She didn't want to act responsible for once. So, she put her wand back in its holster, left the deserted class room and then started to search for Tom.

He was frustratingly difficult to find but Hermione finally thought of going down to the dungeons. Stupid idea, because it didn't take her more than five minutes to get hopelessly lost in that maze of corridors. But she wasn't concerned as she was in high-spirits and the Elder Magic was still flowing through her making her feel rather invincible. Luckily after some time, she stumbled over a group of Slytherins in one of the dark corridors.

Who would have known I would one day call such a situation lucky? Hermione thought amused as her eyes swept over the group. There were Alba, Lestrange, Avery, looking somewhat ruffled, a few she didn't know and there was Tom. He looked at her surprised before he stepped towards her.

"Hermione, what are you doing down here?" he asked in his deep voice.

She smiled up at him, "Searching for you."
Then she grabbed his wrist and pulled him after her. She briefly wondered what his followers now thought as she dragged Tom after her like that. She had to giggle again.

Hermione heard Tom's voice behind her. He sounded a little irritated but also somewhat amused, "Where are you dragging me to?"

She turned around to him and beamed, "You wouldn't believe."

Then they came upon a wooden door. Hermione opened it. It led to an old, unused class room. Perfect! She stepped into the dark class room. Tom followed her.

"Well, I think I already like your plan," he whispered into her ear in his sensuous voice.

Hermione could feel him snaking an arm around her waist while he still stood behind her. She turned around in his arms and looked up at him.

"I'm sure," she said amused while she smiled up at him. "You ready for something friggin' awesome?" she asked while she flicked her wrist so that her wand landed in her hand.

"'friggin' awesome'?" Tom asked her confused.

Hermione giggled again, and then she wrapped her arms tightly around Tom before she summoned the Elder Magic. With a swish of their robes the pair disappeared from the dark class room, leaving nothing behind but a small cloud of dust.

They reappeared at the other end of the country and staggered a little bit as they landed in a back alley of London. Hermione let go of Tom and looked around. It was just perfect. Exactly where she had wanted to apparate to. The Elder Magic was truly impressive. And dead useful, it seemed.

"What…?" She heard Tom ask in surprise. "Where are we?"

"Why, Tom," Hermione chortled. "I would have thought you were able to recognize your home town."

Tom's eyes wandered back to her. She grinned at this confused expression on his face. It was really a rare occurrence to see him like this. And it was funny.

"What do you mean?" he finally asked and his grey eyes bored into her.

"Like I said. We are in London now," Hermione replied while still grinning at him. "So let's have some fun."

She reached for him, grabbed his hand and started to walk away. But he wasn't following her. So Hermione turned around again and raised her eyebrows questioningly.

"Is something wrong?" she asked him.

"What…? What do you mean 'is something wrong'?" he huffed at her. "Of course there is something wrong. How the fuck did we end up here?"

Hermione rolled her eyes at him. The Elder Magic was still humming inside of her making her quite careless.

"Do you always have to ask so many questions?" she said. "It's really arduous."

She watched his eyes narrow at her. Then he hissed in a dangerous tone, "Hermione, how did we end up here?"

It was then that she finally had doubts about her recent actions. Whatever had come over her to grab him and apparate through Hogwarts' wards like this? Of course he was now suspicious. Who wouldn't be? The flush of power from the Elder Magic had made her act stupid and rash. Hermione bit her lip nervously as she stared at Tom. He was standing right in front of her and scowled at her rather darkly.

"Er…” she mumbled. "I… I just thought…"

Problem was, she hadn't been thinking. Now she had yet again put herself in a nasty situation. Tom was still glowering at her and Hermione now noticed that upcoming suspicion in his grey eyes.

"How did you apparate through Hogwarts' wards?" Tom asked her in a commanding voice.

Hermione averted her eyes before she said in a small voice, "I… I can't tell you."

Her head shot up at him as she felt Tom grabbing her upper arms harshly. He was staring down at her and the anger was clearly visible in his eyes.

"I am tired of your secretiveness," he hissed at her coldly. "You are going to tell me everything now!" There was a frightening tone in his voice as he hissed that command.

Hermione stared at him with wide eyes. His grip on her arms was now painfully tight and his eyes were a dangerous crimson colour. She looked at those red eyes and was caught in the familiar wrath they radiated. Everything else dropped in the background and the only thing she could see were these crimson eyes.

…and her memories. They rushed back to her. Invaded her mind and flooded her so completely that there was no room for anything else. She saw the combats, the Death Eaters, her desperation, people suffering, all the blood and darkness. And Death itself. While above all, there floated terrible, red eyes.

Abicere! screamed Hermione in her mind.

Tom released her arms as he was pushed away from her by her magic. Hermione saw how he was flung against the wall. Then she turned around and ran away. As she dashed down the small alley way she felt her wand in her hand. She hadn't even noticed how she had drawn it. Her hand clasped tightly around the wood as if she clung to it for dear life. Farther and farther down the alley she run. Rounded corners and crossed small back yards. The houses stood narrow here and the ground was grimy and full of dirt. But she didn't care. There was only one thing she could concentrate on right now. And that was to run. She didn't even know what she was running away from. She was scared and those images still tore at her mind. Her breathing was ragged but she still didn't stop to run. Her memories and her fear had left her alone for so long now that she was unprepared for them to show up again.

Another alley down and she left the maze of backstreets behind to reach one of the main streets. Cars drove down the street and people walked on the pavement. Hermione stopped and stared with wide eyes at this strangely calm scene in front of her. Her breathing was laboured and she felt her whole body tremble. She felt sick and her head hurt fiercely. With a shaking hand she stowed away her wand in its holster then she took a hesitant step out from the back street to walk down the pavement.

She passed a woman in a blue skirt holding the hand of a small child. The woman stared at her with a frown on her brow. Then she grabbed the child tighter and seemed to drag him away from Hermione. As Hermione continued down the lane she noticed a few people gaping at her. She looked down at herself. It suddenly hit her that she still wore her school uniform. A uniform from a magic school which she right now wore in Muggle London. Of course people now stared at her black outer robes that screamed 'witch'.

The Elder Magic had made her abandon every caution. As the power of the magic had hummed in her body Hermione had felt so intoxicated by it. That had led to her making mistakes. Like apparating to Muggle London in her Hogwarts' uniform.

Or taking Tom with me.

She sighed loudly which made the old man passing her shake his head disapprovingly at her. She didn't pay any attention to the man but turned to the entry of a house and sat on the steps leading to the front door. She felt so drained and tired, somehow even hollow inside. Hermione sat on the stone step and stared blankly at the street in front of her, not taking in anything.

What had just happened? As Tom had grabbed her so harshly Hermione's old memories of the war had resurfaced again. They had left her alone for so long. Why did they have to come back now?

Tom rubbed his shoulder. It hurt where he had been smashed against the wall. He had to admit he had been quite unprepared for Hermione's sudden attack. But he had to attribute that lapse of attention to the fact that he had still been more than confused that she had apparated him through Hogwarts' wards. How could she do that? It was supposed to be impossible.

What was it that enabled Hermione to do the impossible? She had done something like that before. She had apparted through Diagon Alleys wards. But this, Hogwarts' warding magic, was something entirely else. Hogwarts' wards were centuries old and every generation of wizards had added to the castle's wards so that they now were impenetrable.

Well, almost impenetrable, he corrected himself.

How had she done it? Why didn't she want to tell him? This wasn't by far her only secret. Hermione had a lot of them and she was not willing to reveal them to him. His anger at her secretiveness had let to him grabbing her. At that point in time he had been prepared to force the truth out of her. But then she had attacked him rather unexpectedly. Now she had disappeared into the maze of London's streets. Tom knew where exactly he was right now. But that knowledge didn't help him to find Hermione. So a little bit of magic was in order, he thought as he pulled his wand.

"Point me," he whispered at his wand lying on the palm of his hand.

He walked in the direction the tip of his wand was pointing to. It wasn't long until he came across a bigger street. There were a lot of Muggles walking around so Tom took of his black outer robe which would appear rather out of place in this Muggle area. He strolled down the pavement. After a while he finally spotted Hermione. Tom breathed out relieved as he saw her sitting on the steps of an entry to a house. She had a vacant expression on her face as she stared in front of her. He had almost reached her as she finally noticed him and looked up. There was no surprise on her face but still this blank expression. He sat down beside her and she resumed staring at the street again.

After a while she said in a hollow voice, "I'm sorry."

Tom was shocked by that dead tone in her voice. It didn't match with her normally so cheerful self. But he shouldn't be surprised. Not after he had seen that look on her face as he had grabbed her. He knew that she always looked like this when she had to think about her past. Tom hated that look of sorrow and pain on her face. He was quite unsettled that she had looked at him with fear in her eyes. Or was it that in her past someone had grabbed her just like he had? That thought enraged Tom quite a bit.

He looked at the witch sitting beside him and found her still staring numbly in space. It suddenly didn't matter anymore that she was constantly hiding things from him. What mattered was that he didn't want her to look so forlorn anymore. He raised his arm, wrapped it around her shoulders and pulled her over to him. Hermione stiffened as she felt his arm around her but Tom was pleased with the fact that she now leaned into him. He could feel how she relaxed against him as he caressed her cheek gently.

"What are we going to do now?" Tom asked her after some time.

She looked up at him with a confused expression on her face. He smiled down at her.

"You said we were going to have some fun. So, what have you planned?"

Tom was pleased to see a smile taking form on her face as she looked up at him.

Hermione leaned against him. She was relieved to have him sitting beside her. It was terrible to deal with her memories on her own. She needed Tom so that she wasn't exposed to those merciless ghosts. She couldn't fight them alone. She snaked her arms around his waist and clung to him.

"Well, we are in London now, so let's go to a pub," Hermione smirked up at him.

Tom arched one brow gracefully. "Hm, and here I thought I was the evil one in this relationship," he said amused.

Hermione beamed up at him and embraced him even tighter.

"You know what I don't understand?" Hermione's voice was very slurred but she still managed to point with her index finger at Tom, roughly at least.

"No, I don't know," he said in a calm voice.

Currently they were sitting at a table in one of the many pubs of London. It was rather shady, in Tom's opinion. And a tad bit on the dirty side but at least they hadn't hesitated to serve alcohol to two under-age students.

So right now there stood a glass of beer in front of Tom. It was only his first one. Something that couldn't be said about the girl sitting right beside him. He frowned down at Hermione. He hadn't really expected her to end up this drunk as she had proposed they go to a pub. Right now she leaned rather leisurely back in her chair while she looked up at him with glassy eyes. He had to admit she was kind of amusing when drunk. But it still was strange to see her losing control like this. He would never have thought that Hermione would ever let herself getting drunk like this. A frown appeared between his eyebrows as he looked at her. He remembered that scared look on her face as he had grabbed her in that back alley. He knew that somehow her old memories of the war had been triggered again. His magic swirled around him angrily as he wondered whether she was now this drunk because she didn't want to think about those memories any longer.

"I mean… why French?" Hermione suddenly asked. She tried to raise one eyebrow questioningly at him but failed miserably. She didn't care but just continued, "Of all the languashes… mnh…"
languages. You pick French. Do you speak French? It's a beaut-t... beauti... well, a pretty language, I grant you that. But still... why French?"

"I think you had one beer too much, Hermione," Tom said as he frowned at her.

"Or... you had one too less," she exclaimed happily before she broke down in giggles and clutched Tom's arm to stop herself from falling off her chair.

Tom smirked down at her. He had never seen her giggle so inanely before, it was a bit amusing. Though her next statement wiped the smirk right from his face.

"Folder- No no, thas not it. Wait... I'll get there." She narrowed her eyes in concentration before she continued, "Vol- I'm almost sure thers a 'mor' in there somewhere. Volmor- Nope." Then her eyes brightened up and she beamed at Tom. "Volde... mort. This the one. Told ya, I'll find it. Voldemort."

She soon found Tom's hand over her mouth, thus successfully stopping her pitiable attempts with the human language.

"Shh, what are you doing?" he hissed at her under his breath while he looked around nervously to see if someone had overheard that conversation. "No-one's supposed to know that name."

Hermione giggled again though it was rather muffled by Tom's hand on her mouth. She reached for his hand and tugged at it so that she was able to speak again.

"Why so shy, Volde- de- mort?" Hermione looked up at him and tried to focus on his face, though it didn't work very well. "Don't you like the name?" She furrowed her brow in concentration. Something didn't make sense with her last sentence. But then she just shrugged her shoulders and continued, "How long... did you have to – think – to make it up?"

Tom frowned at her, though Hermione didn't notice as she became very interested with the beermat in front of her. She tried to fold it into a crane but only managed to rip it in two.

"How do you even know that name?" Tom asked her in a very quiet voice.

Hermione looked away from her origami attempts and concentrated on him again. Her intoxicated brain needed a while but finally she understood his question.

"What do you think, silly?" she said not very informatively.

Then suddenly she became aware of how very tired she actually was. So she grabbed one of Tom's arms and skidded nearer to him until she was able to put her head on his shoulder.

"Read it in a book," she mumbled sleepily.

Then she slid slowly down until she came to rest lying in his lap. Which made Tom blush slightly as he was now hit by many curious and a few outraged looks from the other guests as they saw a young lady disappearing under the table and bending down to the lap of a young man.

"You definitely had enough," Tom said curtly as he grabbed Hermione and hoisted her up again.

"Mmmm..." Was the only apology he could expect right now.

Tom wrapped one arm around her waist before he stood up from the table and lifted her up with him. She slipped her arms around him and clung to him tightly.

"And how are we going to get back to Hogwarts now?" Tom asked irritated, though he wasn't expecting to get an answer.

Contrary to all expectations his question seemed to have reached Hermione somehow as she now mumbled, "I can't drive anymore."

"Well, who would have thought?" Tom answered sarcastically, though he knew his sarcasm was wasted on her.

"I booked a room," Hermione offered after a while.

Tom stared down at the witch clinging to his side.

"When- How did you-?" Tom ran a hand through his hair. "Never mind. Let's get you into bed."

He half carried her out of the guest room and towards the rather grimy reception. A filthy man with greasy brown hair and a matching beard was sitting behind the counter.

"Did my friend book a room here, sir?" Tom asked and had to fight to keep his voice polite.

The man eyed him but didn't seem too interested before he said gruffly, "Name?"

Tom readjusted his grip on Hermione as she was again slipping down then he said, "Decerto."

The man seemed to check a list, though Tom doubted they had enough guests to warrant a list. Then the man looked up at him again and said, "Nope."

"Riddle?" Tom asked.

Again the man checked the list and again he shook his head bored at Tom. Tom looked down to Hermione and remembered the conversation they just had. His eyes wandered back to the filthy man. He hesitated shortly but then said in a low voice,

"Voldemort?"

The man checked the list and Tom was berating himself for being so stupid. Surely Hermione wouldn't-

"Ah, yes," the man said. "Mr and Mrs Voldemort. Yes. Strange name."

He turned around and reached for one of the keys hanging at a board behind him. Tom cursed under his breath as he stared down at Hermione.

"When you are sober again, I'm going to kill you," he whispered angrily at her.

"Mmmm… what spell are you going to use?" Hermione mumbled inarticulately.

Tom suppressed another string of curses and then accepted the room key.

"Number seven," the man said distracted as he was already reading in his magazine again.

Tom tightened the grip he had on Hermione before he climbed the staircase which seemed to lead to the rooms. Quickly they arrived in a dimly lit corridor. The dirty, red-carpeted floor was as appealing as the flickering light bulb hanging on wires from the ceiling. Tom tried to ignore the inch thick layer of dirt on the window they just passed and the rather ominous stench in the hallway. Then they finally stood before the room number seven. Though the hook on top of the metallic number was somehow broken so that it was now standing upside down, looking more like a weird L than a seven. Tom took the key and tried to open the door. It seemed the lock was broken but the door could be opened anyway, he noticed as he pushed against it.

_How reassuring._

Tom maneuvered Hermione inside the room. It was as confidence inspiring as the filthy corridor had been. He wrinkled his nose as his gaze wandered over the room. There was a double bed standing in the middle of the room. Judging by the grey colour of the bedclothes Tom doubted that it had been changed recently, if ever. The window was opaque from all the dust and he really didn't want to know if that strange brown colour of the carpet was actually its real colour or something else.

Tom sighed before he pulled his wand. First he pointed it at the door and locked it magically. Then he casually waved it at the room in general. The grey bedclothes changed into white and the thick layer of dust and cobwebs everywhere disappeared. Though the grimy window remained grimy as Tom couldn't see any curtains. He again let his gaze wander over the room. It wasn't perfect but loads better than before.

"Legifer would be so proud of you." He heard Hermione's slurred voice.

Tom frowned down at her again. "I think it's really time for you to go to sleep," he told her before he walked her over to the bed and sat her down.

He waved his wand at her and transfigured her clothes into something more comfortable then he removed the wandholster that was still attached to her right forearm. He discarded the holster with her wand on the bedside table then he faced her again. Tom watched amused how Hermione slowly slipped down on her side until she half lay on the bed. He took her legs and put them on the bed so that she could stretch out. Then he covered her with the now white blanket.

Tom yawned tiredly as he slowly removed his own clothes. This had been a rather eventful day, he decided. Who would have thought that the Gryffindor know-it-all was such a drunk? He wondered amused as he looked down at Hermione.

He stripped down to his black shirt and boxers, waved his wand at the lamp hanging from the ceiling to switch it off before he slipped under the blanket beside the sleeping witch. Though Hermione wasn't as fast asleep as he had assumed. She had obviously noticed how he had laid down beside her as she now rolled over and skidded over to him. He could feel one of her hands gliding slowly over his chest while the other ruffled through his hair. She propped herself up on one arm while she leaned over him. Tom raised his eyebrows as she placed a kiss on his mouth. Then she started to trail more kisses on his face. Tom was rather enjoying the whole thing until his conscience kicked in as she tried to climb on top of him and started to remove his shirt.

He could not do that, not when she was totally drunk.

"I don't think that's a good idea, Hermione," Tom whispered a little breathlessly as he tried to disentangle her from him. "You would kill me in the morning."

It took him a lot of self control not to give in to his desires. Especially now that Hermione sagged against him and came to rest lying halfway on top of him. He could smell the seductive scent of lilac coming from her hair as she put her head down on his chest. He exhaled slowly. Hermione should be really grateful that he wasn't taking advantage of her vulnerable state, he decided while he wrapped his arms around her and closed his eyes. He could feel sleep pulling at his mind as he wondered why he was suddenly so self-effacing.
It was nearly eight o'clock in the morning as Tom woke up again. At first he didn't know where he was but then he remembered how Hermione had grabbed him and apparated the both of them through Hogwarts' wards. Tom's eyes wandered to the sleeping witch beside him who had curled up into a ball under the blanket.

How did she always manage to do the impossible? No-one could disapparate inside of Hogwarts. It was completely impossible. Tom stared at the witch lying beside him in the bed. It seemed that she was dreaming. But this time it was not one of her nightmares. And she was talking.

"Ron," Hermione whispered in her sleep.

Tom frowned at her. White-hot jealousy started to soar through him. Who was this 'Ron' that Hermione dreamed about him? But it were her next words that made him almost lose his control.

"Ron," she whispered again and then, "I love you."

Tom exhaled slowly, trying to reign in his magic. It was burning up in him, that dark force, and begged him to be released. She was sleeping so peacefully and Tom wanted nothing more than to strangle her now. Another part of him wanted to wake her up and demand to know who this 'Ron' was. Yet another part of him was just too sad to want anything but curl up in a dark corner and die.
The next morning Hermione woke and felt surprisingly well rested. She had expected to have a headache or something like that after yesterday. But she didn't feel bad at all. Maybe she had had a nice dream?

She was a little confused as she wasn't greeted by the Gryffindor red curtains around her four-poster but a rather bare white ceiling with a lamp hanging from the middle. Then again she surely hadn't been able to apparate yesterday. Not after all the beer she had drunk. She rolled over in the bed and was surprised to find Tom, fully dressed, sitting in a chair and glaring at her furiously. Hermione slowly sat up in the bed and frowned at him in confusion. Why was he so enraged? His eyes were glowing red. Had she done something yesterday? She couldn't remember much. But there obviously was a murderous glimmer in his crimson eyes as they wandered slowly over her body. A chill darted down her spine as she saw that detached coldness on his face. She noticed that his hands were clutching the armrest of the chair tightly as if he tried to force himself not to lose his control. What had happened to have angered him so?

Then Tom said in a fearsome but eerily composed voice, "Who is Ron?"

Hermione's eyes widened in shock. Where had he learned that name?

"W... what?" she stammered in a small voice.

Tom's eyes narrowed at her and then Hermione could feel that raw and angry power radiating from him. She skidded away from him on the bed and her breathing was becoming faster. Tom abruptly stood up from the chair and she was so startled by his movement that she flinched away from him. He took a step towards her and the pressure of his dark magic even intensified. Hermione gulped and stared at him fearfully.

"Who is Ron?" he asked again, emphasizing each word and his tone made it very clear that he wouldn't tolerate it if she didn't tell him.

Hermione still stared at him. Her hands were balled into fists to stop them from shaking.

Suddenly Tom yelled at her furiously, "Answer me!"

Hermione flinched and her eyes shot back at his face. His crimson eyes were boring into hers and there was a deadly glint in them. His magic still flowed from him and furiously tore at her body. But she couldn't tell him. There was no way she could tell him about Ron. She hadn't talked about Ron since he had died. With no-one! She wasn't up to it; she wasn't ready. Hermione felt her body starting to tremble as her thoughts circled around Ron. He was dead. He had died because she couldn't stop Bellatrix from cursing him. He had died because of her.

Tom took another threatening step towards her and she shied away from him. That murderous fury still burned behind his eyes. Hermione remained silent. Suddenly Tom reached out for her, grabbed her upper arm and wrenched her up from the bed. Hermione whimpered as he grabbed her arm so painfully tight.

He violently pulled her over to him and then hissed at her in a dangerous voice, "You speak in your sleep, Hermione. Did you know that?" She stared at him with scared wide eyes as he continued in his low threatening voice, "You said that you love him."

By now tears started to run down her cheeks. Then she grabbed his hand which still clasped her arm and she tried to loosen his grip on her.

"Let go of me!" she screamed at him as she couldn't manage to get away from him.

As an answer his grip even tightened and he shook her.

"You said you love this Ron. Who is that? I'm going to kill him!" Tom snarled at her and he seemed to be beyond furious.

A twinge went through her chest as she heard him say that. Her eyes shot up at him. She stared into his enraged red eyes as she said in a colourless tone, "You are too late. He is already dead."

Tom looked at her in surprise and Hermione used that hesitancy to break free from him. She backed away from him until her back hit the wall behind her. The tears still streamed from her eyes so she raised her hand and wiped them furiously away. There was no reason to cry here. She hated it to cry. Her gaze wandered back at Tom. He was still standing in the middle of the room and stared at her. His crimson eyes seemed to be glowing in the darkness of the room. Hermione could see his right hand twitch as if he longed to pull his wand while his eyes still radiated nothing but rage as they travelled over her form. She wondered if he was going to curse her now. It certainly looked like he wanted to do it. Her own wand lay together with her holster on the bedside table, unreachable at the moment. Though right now, she didn't think she would defend herself even if she had her wand. Hermione stared back into the red abyss behind Tom's eyes and waited for him to do something. Yell at her, curse her, anything.

Suddenly Tom just turned around and left the hotel room, banging the door shut behind him. She was left behind still pressed against the wall and stared at the door he had just left through. Her breathing was quickened. She closed her eyes and inhaled deeply to calm herself while she slowly slid down the wall until she sat on the floor.

She didn't want her memories to come back. They hurt her and she was tired of having to face them. Yesterday they had so suddenly attacked her again. Maybe that was the reason for her dream tonight and the return of her ghosts. She so desperately tried to forget her old life and the harrowing things that had happened to her and to the people she loved. She didn't want to remember those things anymore but she felt guilty for this yearning for closure. It felt like she betrayed them all by wanting to forget the ordeal they all had had to go through. They were dead and she was the only one to remember them, their fight and how they had died. But those memories…

Those memories were just so cruel. She didn't want to be confronted with her old life anymore but at the same time she was terribly afraid to forget Ron's face. What he looked like, the sound of his voice, the mischievous glint in his eyes whenever he and Harry had planned one of their stupid little adventures. She didn't want to forget how it had always been enough to encourage her and give her the feeling of being protected when Ron had just wrapped his arm around her shoulders.

Hermione's breathing got ragged and it felt like icy cold hands wrapped mercilessly around her heart. She raised a hand and put it over her face. The memories still attacked her ruthlessly but she forcefully calmed her breathing down. Tears burned in her eyes but she didn't want them to spill. She leaned her head back against the wall and stared numbly at the white ceiling. She trembled slightly but she stubbornly clenched her jaw and took in deep steady breaths of air.

There's no reason to cry, Granger! she hissed at herself. Pull yourself together!

What would all her friends say if they could see her breaking down like this? That was pathetic.

Surely, you are stronger than this? a voice scoffed at her snidely.
Hermione slowly got up from her position on the floor. There was no use in sitting around and wailing over things she couldn't change anyway. As she got up she noticed for the first time the clothes she was wearing. It wasn't her Hogwarts uniform but a comfortable silk shirt and a pair of silk trousers. Hermione could feel traces of transfiguration on the clothes. She guessed Tom had transfigured her uniform. Only he would have chosen this Slytherin green colour, she thought fondly. The small smile on her face quickly dropped as her thoughts wandered back to Tom. He was really angry with her. Hermione could still see the red colour in his eyes. Unpleasant chills darted down her spine as she remembered the expression on Tom's face. He had been furious. Why did she need to talk in her sleep? Why tonight when Tom could hear it? Hermione knew how jealous Tom could be.

It's not like you are any better than him, a tiny, annoying voice reminded her how she had lost control and then cursed Melanie Nicolls just because the witch had clutched Tom's arm.

Hermione sighed softly. This whole situation was really bad. Tom was angry because of Ron. Hermione could understand that it hadn't been so great for him to hear her declare her love for another guy. It was just very bad timing that she had to dream about Ron exactly this night, when Tom would hear it.

Maybe she should explain it to Tom? Who Ron was and what he meant to her. Once again Hermione felt her throat constrict. She didn't want to talk about Ron. She just couldn't do it. Not when she still somehow thought that it had been her fault he was dead. If she had just stopped Bellatrix, then the witch wouldn't have been able to throw the Killing curse at Ron. She knew that Ron wouldn't blame her. She also knew that she had done her best to stop that dark witch. But obviously it had not been enough. So there still remained the doubt that if she had done things differently, Ron would still be alive.

Stop that! she reprimanded herself. 'What-ifs' weren't going to bring Ron back.

Hermione turned around and walked back to the bed. She took her wand and holster from the bedside table and adjusted it to her forearm. With a flick of her wrist, her wand landed in her hand. She waved it and changed her clothes back into her Hogwarts uniform. Hermione wondered what she should do now. Her old memories were still tugging unrelentingly at her mind. Right now she actually wanted Tom. Maybe she should search for him? But he had been so angry. He probably didn't want to talk with her. She sank down on the bed. Tom couldn't just disappear on her. She needed him. There was no way she could deal with her memories on her own.

Well, at least he wasn't able to get back to Hogwarts without her, she reasoned with herself. Though maybe he was so disappointed in her that he would never come back.

Now, you are over-reacting, Granger. He surely would calm down. He couldn't leave her. Her ghosts would never leave her alone if Tom wasn't around. Hermione groaned frustrated and got up from the bed again. He surely would come back sooner or later. If only because she was his only way back to the castle. So Hermione decided to wait for Tom to cool down and come back to her.

In the mean time, just to occupy herself with something and to stop her thoughts running wild again, she went down to the reception and paid for the room. She had to admit that at daylight and being in a sober state this hostel or whatever it was looked like a disgusting dump. Hopefully Tom would come back soon. As she stepped back into their room she noticed that it was a great deal cleaner than the rest of this establishment. She assumed this had been Tom's doing. Reluctantly Hermione stepped into the bathroom. Obviously Tom's cleaning spells hadn't reached it as it was covered in grime. For the first time ever she admitted that Legifer's household spells might be worth knowing. Hermione sighed, pulled her wand and waved it at the bath room.
"Scorgify," she whispered.

Well, it wasn't awe-inspiring but still clean enough to be used, she decided. So Hermione washed up to then return into the bedroom where she sat down on the edge of the bed and waited for Tom. The longer she had to wait the worse she felt. He obviously needed a long time to calm down again. She felt somehow guilty as this whole thing had apparently rather touched him.

Hermione's head shot up as she finally heard the door open. She was unbelievably relieved to see Tom entering the room. Though her heart sank a little bit as she saw that blank look on his face. Tom had his emotions so completely reined in that she couldn't tell what he was feeling even as she stared into his now grey eyes. He walked over to her and Hermione got up from the bed. He stopped in front of her and looked down at her. She nearly shuddered as she saw that disturbing emptiness in his grey eyes. There seemed to be nothing inside. His gaze was completely void of anything.

Then he said in a low voice, "We should go back to Hogwarts."

Hermione scanned him with worried eyes before she said in a pleading voice, "Tom, let's-

"I'm fine. Let's just go back," he cut across her.

Hermione frowned at him, then she extended a hand and laid it lightly on his arm. Tom looked down at her hand touching him and his façade crumbled for the shortest of moments so that Hermione could see that he was anything but fine. There was still an unbound fury inside him but also disappointment and pain.

"You don't need to be jealous," Hermione whispered in a steady voice.

His eyes flashed at her and she could see this red tinge threatening to break through again. But she didn't remove her hand from him.

"Who says I'm jealous?" he hissed at her and Hermione flinched as she heard the anger behind his words.

Then Tom stepped a little away from her before he continued and sarcasm seeped from his voice, "Why should I be jealous? Because you love another?"

He looked away from her and the emotionless mask was suddenly back in place again. The next time he spoke his voice was soft and terribly empty, "We need to return to the castle or we'll get into trouble."

Hermione knew that she would have to discuss everything with him but he was right. Maybe now was not the right moment. He seemed to be really churned up. When they were safely back at Hogwarts and he had had more time to calm down she really needed to talk with him about Ron. Though Hermione was very reluctant to do so. She didn't feel up to talking about Ron. She was barely able to just think about him let alone tell Tom about him.

For the time being she just wanted to get the both of them back. So she held her hand out for Tom to take. His grey eyes wandered apathetically over her offered hand and she could see that he was reluctant to take it. After a long moment he slowly raised his arm and ever so hesitantly closed his fingers around her hand. Hermione cast him a soft smile which he didn't return then she grasped his hand tightly while simultaneously drawing her wand. She called upon the Elder Magic and it swiftly followed her wish. With a swish of their robes the pair disappeared from the hotel room and stepped into the tight pressure of apparition. Seconds later they reappeared in the cover of a spruce grove not far away from the Great Lake. Hermione felt again a little dizzy as the Elder Magic crackled around her but this time she wasn’t surprised by the sensation and managed to keep a clear head.

Immediately upon arriving, Tom let go of her hand as fast as if he had been burned. Hermione frowned at his dismissive demeanor especially. She didn’t say anything, though, but just checked her watch. It was almost noon already; they had neatly missed their Charms class. Hopefully no-one had noticed their absence. Though that was a foolish hope Hermione had to admit. After all they hadn't been in their dormitories this night. Maybe Tom's dorm mates hadn't said anything as they were too afraid to peach on Tom but Hermione wasn't so sure about her own dorm mates.

"Let's go to the castle," she said, turned to Tom.

He just stared at her with his unbearably empty eyes and nodded curtly. Then he took off in direction of Hogwarts. He didn't turn around to make sure she was following. Hermione felt hurt by his cold behaviour but right now there was nothing she could do about it.

Tom stalked back to the castle. Although he never turned around to Hermione, he knew that she was following him. His hands were balled into tight fists and he could feel his magic wrenching at him furiously. It rushed through him and almost burned him with its insatiable anger. He wanted to do nothing more than to pull his wand and curse the girl following him. He wanted to throw his magic at her and make her hurt. Make her feel pain for those words that had caused so much grief.

Those words still run around his head. Words spoken so softly and affectionately. Words that had fallen so gracefully from her pink lips.

…words that weren't meant for him.

His magic bulged violently and his blood boiled as he remembered how she had slept, rolled up on that bed right beside him, while she had whispered those words for another.

And he had felt…

... empty.

Tom didn't want to admit it. It irritated him and he didn't want to dwell on it further but deeply down he knew that her words had had an incredibly huge impact on him. He quickened his step as if this way he would be able to escape his own thoughts. A new wave of anger rushed through him and made him want to turn around and yell at her. He was so furious and his dark magic was thundering through him aggressively.

But it somehow felt as if all this anger and rage served to hide something else. There was something beneath his violent temper. It clasped at him with icy cold fingers and bored mercilessly into his newly inflicted wounds.

It hurts, he realized surprised.

Tom was utterly confused by this new feeling. But it was there, undeniably. As she had whispered those words, this new feeling had overwhelmed him and he had felt numb by its quantity. Her words had hurt him. They had cut through him and Tom had never felt so vulnerable before. It had only been mere words. Nothing else. Just words. But they had managed to inflict pain he had never known before. How did she do that? It was incomprehensible.

But above all else it was frightening. Why was he so afraid? There wasn't much Tom ever was afraid of. But certainly not of words. How could her words have such an effect on him? It again made him almost tremble when he just thought about those words. Though what made him tremble? Anger? Hate? …fear?
They had almost reached the entrance to the castle and Tom could still hear Hermione's steps. She was following him. But she hadn't said anything since they had arrived here. Tom actually didn't want to talk with her right now. He was too enraged and might say or do something he would regret. But why wasn't she speaking with him? Did she feel too uncomfortable speaking with him now that she had confessed the truth? Tom almost flinched at that thought and this violent reaction he had made him again feel so disgustingly vulnerable. His anger suddenly flamed up and ripped at him again.

Hermione looked at Tom's back as they were walking to the castle. He still hadn't said anything. The silence stretched between them uncomfortably. Maybe she should say something. But Hermione had no idea what. Obviously Tom was still really angry. She didn't want to aggravate him further. So Hermione remained silent as she followed him up the steps to the door leading into the castle. The huge Entrance Hall behind was empty and their steps were the only thing heard as they walked through. As they left the hall Tom turned right and stomped down the corridor. Hermione knew that it would eventually lead them to the staircases and she assumed that Tom was headed for the dungeons. She just wondered if she should follow him as she heard a voice calling after them, "Halt!"

Hermione turned around and found Mr Barnes, the caretaker, shuffle after them. It was almost amusing how he was so similar to Mr Filch she knew from her time.

Sans the cat, of course, Hermione thought as her eyes wandered over the man in front of her. His face was lined and looked somehow weathered despite the fact that he was always indoors guarding the corridors of the castle and looking out for troublemakers. His hair was an unidentifiable colour which could have been grey or a dull brown and he wore a thick greyish cloak. Now he had stopped before them and hit them with a dark glare through his bleak eyes.

"You two!" he bellowed at them. "The headmaster wants to see you!"

Hermione felt her heart sink. Talking to Dippet was the last thing she wanted to do. There were other things she had to take care of. But obviously she didn't have that option as Barnes now gestured impatiently for them to follow him. So they wandered through Hogwarts corridors in silence. Hermione could see Tom glowering angrily at her sometimes which made her rather uncomfortable. After a while they reached the two gargoyles guarding the headmaster's office. Barnes hissed the password at the gargoyles which immediately pounced out of the way. Then he cast them a last reproachful look, grumbled something about 'troublesome pests' before he turned around and walked away.

Hermione gulped before she walked up the stairs to the headmaster's office. She could hear Tom following her with equally reluctant steps. As she arrived before the entrance to the office she hesitantly turned around to Tom. She nearly groaned in frustration as she saw that blank mask on his face. Hermione decided to ignore him for the moment, turned around to the door and knocked weakly.

"Enter," came the reply from inside the office.

She sighed softly before she opened the door and stepped into Dippet's office. Hermione let her gaze quickly sweep over the interior of his office. It was still impeccably tidy to the point where it appeared as uninviting and cold. The shelf displaying different shiny trophies and medals stood impressively behind the headmaster's huge desk, obviously there to show off the achievements of the school. Dippet himself was situated behind his desk while he was busy with sorting through a stack of documents, just like always whenever Hermione had met the man. She shortly wondered if he had placed this stack of documents on his desk just for situations like this where he wanted to appear as busy. The all important headmaster bothered again by mere students.

She couldn't dwell on her thoughts for too long as now Dippet looked up from his apparently important work. He scanned the two students standing before him with narrowed eyes. Hermione was pretty sure that the man had no idea what this all was about as his gaze travelled over her. Then she could see a glint of recognition in his stern eyes as they wandered to Tom who stood beside her.

"Mr Riddle," he finally said severely with a tinge of disappointment in his tone. "That is now the second time this school year that you are causing trouble."

"Yes, sir," Tom answered in this overly polite voice he only used when trying to impress someone. "I am truly sorry."

Dippet swiped his apology away with one hand and continued, "As I understood it you and Ms… " Here Dippet eyed Hermione and she could see that he was trying to remember her name.

"DeCerto, sir," Tom said quietly.

"Yes yes, Ms DeCerto," Dippet retorted impatiently, not in the least bit embarrassed that he didn't even know the names of his students. "So, you and Ms DeCerto, here, have left the castle since sometime around yesterday. Is that true, Mr Riddle?" Dippet finished and hit Tom with a hard stare.

"Yes, sir," Tom replied and Hermione nearly raised her eyebrows as he was being so truthful. "I am very sorry about all of this," he added, apparently contrite. "I assure you, it will never happen again."

"I see," Dippet commented dryly, seemingly not impressed by Tom's act of repentance.

Without another word he got up from his desk and walked over to the fireplace. He took a little floo powder from a vase standing on the mantelpiece and threw it in the flames. Then Dippet stuck his head in the green flames and seemed to talk with someone on the other end. As he was finished he walked back to his desk. He hadn't even reached his chair as a figure stepped out of the fireplace. Blond hair, blond moustache, a rather protruding belly and an obviously expensive taste in clothes; Slughorn had just entered the headmaster's office. Hermione could see the potions teacher look at Tom and her standing in the office. There was an amused glint in his beady eyes as they wandered over them. She was rather taken aback as he then even winked at her in a conspiratorial way.

"Armando," Slughorn said in his booming voice turned to the headmaster. "I hope you haven't been too strict with our young friends here. They look awfully crestfallen."

Dippet, though, hadn't the chance to answer as another figure emerged from the fireplace. Hermione nearly groaned as she recognized Dumbledore. He wore bright aquamarine robes and for a change the colour of his hair didn't clash with his clothes. Unfortunately the expression on his face wasn't nearly as cheerful as his colourful appearance. Instead there was a sharp frown on his brow as he eyed Hermione and Tom suspiciously.

"On the contrary, Horace. We need to be strict with them," Dumbledore commented on Slughorn's last remark while his piercing stare still hit Hermione. "By leaving Hogwarts they broke a very important school rule. Students are not allowed to leave the castle. During the school year, we are responsible for their well-being. Their families expect us to keep their children save."

Hermione didn't comment that neither Tom nor herself had any family left who could be concerned about their well-being. She didn't like that accusatory look on Dumbledore's face at all. It made her feel quite guilty actually. She hadn't forgotten how she had blackmailed him after all. She was ashamed of herself. And she actually thought that Dumbledore was right. It had been absolutely irresponsible to leave the castle like that.

"Come on, Albus," Slughorn said jovially. "We've all been young, once. It's not like they did anything harmful. They just left the castle for a few hours to have fun."

Neither Dumbledore nor Dippet looked like they wanted to agree with him but Slughorn just ignored it. He strolled over to where Tom and Hermione stood. To Hermione's surprise he wrapped an arm around her shoulders, almost squashing her in the process.

"Ms DeCerto, is a fine student," the professor declared cheerfully. "I'm sure she'll have no problem in catching up on the classes she missed today."

After that Slughorn released her again but not without sending her an amused wink. Then he stepped to Tom and said, "And Tom here is the best student we have in Hogwarts. He's very responsible. Why, it was you yourself, Amando, who made him prefect in the first place."

Slughorn patted Tom on the back before he continued, "This was just one harmless escapade. I'm sure they already regret it. We shouldn't punish them too severely."

Hermione had to admit that Slughorn would be a good attorney should he ever decide on a different career.

"You have a point, Horace," Dippet finally said.

He eyed Tom pensively. Obviously Slughorn's words had hit ground. Hermione nearly rolled her eyes. Of course Dippet couldn't punish Tom too severely. The headmaster himself had made him a prefect. It wouldn't look too good if his chosen prefect turned out to be quite irresponsible. Parents wouldn't like that at all. After all, it was the prefects' duty to look after the younger students.

Obviously Dippet was thinking along the same lines as he now said, turned to Tom and Hermione, "I will not note this incident in your school records," he declared pompously. "But you still need to be punished for breaking the rules. I will leave this to the heads of your houses."

Hermione betted that part of the reason behind his 'generosity' was that he didn't want to deal with the whole thing himself. So he shuffled the task on someone else. She nearly groaned as she realized that this someone would be Dumbledore in her case.

"Good good," Slughorn exclaimed happily. "Tom, why don't you come to my office later and we talk about this?"

"Of course, professor," Tom replied politely.

Slughorn beamed at Tom then he said to Dumbledore, "Can I invite you to a cup of tea?"

"Certainly, Horace," Dumbledore answered serenely.

Though the kind twinkle left his eyes immediately as he looked at Hermione.

"I expect you in my office after classes are finished today, Ms DeCerto," he said curtly.

"Yes, sir," Hermione responded, feeling quite miserable at the prospect.

Dumbledore didn't reply anything but just turned around and left the office, following Slughorn. Hermione turned around to Dippet but he was again immersed in his important paperwork. Tom seemed to take that as their cue to go as he now walked over to the door. After a "Good day, headmaster", which Dippet didn't return, Hermione hurried after Tom. He hadn't waited for her but had already descended the stairs from the headmaster's office. Hermione scudded down the stairs, passed the gargoyles and entered the corridor behind.

"Tom, wait," she called after him as he stomped down the corridor.

She quickened her steps until she walked next to him.

"I'm sorry," she whispered contritely. "It's my fault you are in trouble now."

He turned his head and glared down at her. Then he hissed at her irately, "Yes, it is your fault."

"I'm really sorry," Hermione replied timidly in face of his anger.

To Hermione's distress she saw Longbottom walking down the same corridor towards them. As expected, there instantly appeared a frown on his face as he spotted Tom. Tom on the other hand hadn't noticed the Gryffindor or he just didn't care.

"Hermione, where have you been?" Longbottom asked her concerned as he had reached her.

She stopped walking and surprisingly so did Tom. Though the anger never left his face.

"I… um… we-" she couldn't tell Longbottom what really had happened.

"What did you do to her?" the blond roared angrily at Tom.

"I didn't do anything," Tom replied with cold anger in his voice as he was looking at Hermione.

He was barely able to control his temper as he glowered at her darkly. She stiffened as she saw the anger in his eyes. A gesture that wasn't lost on her friend.

"Did you harass her again, Riddle?" Longbottom bellowed furiously.

Hermione could see a dangerous red sheen appearing in Tom's eyes as he now looked at Longbottom. But then he didn't reply anything to the Gryffindor's accusation. Instead he turned towards her again and Hermione was startled as she noticed that the red glint didn't leave his eyes as he looked at her.

"I still have a lot to do," he said in a clipped tone. "So I'll see you later."

Without another word, he turned away from her and started to walk away. Hermione grabbed his arm to stop him.

"I'm sorry. I really am," Hermione said desperately and right now she was not talking about the trouble they both were in.

Tom didn't turn around to her. He just shrugged her hand away and proceeded to walk away. Hermione stared sadly at his retreating back.

"Why did you apologize to that conceited prick?" She heard Longbottom's surprised voice.

Her friends tried to question her during lunch but Hermione was too preoccupied with staring at the Slytherin table to pay them any attention. She even manage to ignore the curious stares the rest of the school's population was sending her way. She didn't even want to begin to imagine what they all thought about her having spent a night Merlin knew where alone with Tom. The dark looks on the Slytherin girls' faces were hint enough, though. This whole thing was not good at all.
During her next class, History of Magic, however, she wasn't able to ignore her friends any longer. Even though they sat a row behind her, it still didn't stop them to whisper to her. Professor Binns didn't seem to mind, though. Even as he was not yet a ghost he already didn't pay much attention to living human beings, it seemed.

"Hermione, what did you do last night?" Longbottom asked her for the hundredth time now.

"Nothing. We just sneaked out for Hogsmeade and then lost track of time. That's all," she replied curtly.

"Why did you do that?" Longbottom insisted in being inquisitive it seemed. "That's just not like you at all. Did Riddle force you to do it?"

"No," Hermione said now irritably. "Tom didn't. It was actually my idea."

She wasn't sure but she thought that she heard a whispered 'Yeah, as if' coming from the table behind her.

"Why did you stay the whole night, though?" Lupin's cool voice came from behind her.

"Riddle didn't do anything to you, did he?" Longbottom interjected worriedly before she had a chance to answer Lupin.

Hermione groaned softly as she heard the concern in her friend's voice. Merlin, what did he think Tom could have done to her? She decided it would be better not to dwell on this particular thought and whispered back to Longbottom,

"I told you. He didn't do anything," she declared irritated. "We went to Hogsmeade, forgot the time and then it had been too late to go back to the castle so we spent the night there."

It didn't sit too well with her that she had to lie to her friends but she couldn't very well tell them what she had really done. Apparition through Hogwarts' wards was still impossible.

Hermione then heard a muffled voice exclaiming indignantly, "You spent the night with Riddle?"

That was followed by Lupin's reprimanding voice, "Marc, stop being so nosy."

If Hermione hadn't been so worried about Tom being angry with her, she would have tried to calm Longbottom down. But as it was her thoughts always wandered nervously back to Tom.

"Did they punish you for leaving the castle?" She suddenly heard Weasley ask her softly.

"Not yet," she whispered back as dread flooded her. "But I have to speak with Dumbledore after classes."

"Don't worry too much about it," Lupin tried to soothe her. "Dumbledore's rather indulgent."

Hermione doubted that he would be very indulgent with her.

"He's not going to punish you too hard," Weasley conceded, trying to cheer her up.

"Yeah, just blame everything on Riddle," Longbottom suggested darkly.

"Certainly not," Hermione hissed at him. "I told you it was my idea. I just dragged Tom along."

Longbottom answered something but Hermione didn't understand it as at this moment Binns ended the class for today.

"...and I want you to read about the goblins' war of 1263, led by Gorik the Bloodthirsty against Wislar King of the Northern Tribe," Binns declared in his narcotic voice.

Hermione quickly noted it down on a piece of parchment, though she guessed that, aside from Lupin, she was the only one doing so. Then she gathered up the parchment and her quill and stuffed it into her school bag. As she exited the class room her three friends were hot on her heels. Before either of them could say anything Rose and Lucia, her dorm mates, passed them. Hermione didn't like this nosy glint in their eyes as the girls grinned at her.

As Rose passed her she looked at Hermione in amusement then she asked in a suspiciously innocent voice, "So, had fun last night?"

After that, she and Lucia broke down in silly giggles and Hermione stared at them enraged. Really, did they not know when to shut their mouths? She didn't answer anything to Rose's unnecessary statement. But the two other girls didn't seem to expect a reply anyway. They just continued to giggle inanely as they walked down the corridor. Hermione scowled at their retreating backs then she turned to her friends again. They were walking beside her and Hermione could see a mortified expression on Longbottom's face. Clearly he didn't like at all what Rose had been insinuating. But Hermione was not in the mood for his stupid jealousy. Tom was already enough to deal with.

So she tried to change the topic of their conversation, "Something happened while I was away?"

Longbottom obviously wasn't happy as he looked like he wanted to discuss her nightly activities further. Fortunately Weasley spoke before Longbottom had the chance.

Hermione's eyes wandered from Weasley to Lupin and she saw with amusement how he blushed deep red.

"Really?" she chirped expectantly. "So what did happen, Amarys?"

"Er… I… that is…" Lupin stumbled uncomfortably while he looked down at his feet.

Hermione smiled at him as she saw him so nervous. Lupin never got nervous like this. With just one exception, she thought amused. The only time as she had ever seen him losing his cool was when a certain Ravenclaw girl had been around.

"Tell me," she inquired innocently while still looking at Lupin. "Does this have anything to do with Stella Lovegood?"

The blush on Lupin's face even intensified and Weasley laughed while he playfully punched Lupin's arm.

"You bet it does," the red-head guffawed. "Guess who has a new girlfriend."

Hermione smiled fondly as she saw Lupin's embarrassment, though there still was contentment visible on his face.

"Congratulations," she said genially. "I always knew that she likes you."

Lupin finally looked up at her and Hermione giggled softly as she saw a small grin tugging at his mouth.
"Well, who didn't?" Longbottom said exasperatedly, finally contributing something to the conversation.

He tried to suppress a grin as he now looked at Lupin in mock sadness and shook his head.

"Gosh, what are you still doing here, man?" he asked slyly. "I'm sure your girl already waits for you." Longbottom pushed him down the corridor. "The Ravenclaws' common room is this way," he stage-whispered at Lupin while gesturing down the corridor.

Lupin turned his head around to Hermione but she just smirked at him amused. He shrugged his shoulders, grinned at her and took off down the corridor.

"You are such a player!" Longbottom yelled after him.

Hermione betted that the blush was back on Lupin's face, though she couldn't see it. But she could see the pack of second years that came down the corridor stare at Longbottom in shock. She giggled and then tugged Longbottom in the opposite direction towards their own common room.

Sometime later Hermione reluctantly wandered to Dumbledore's office. She really didn't want to talk with him. Once his presence had been reassuring now it only unsettled her. It still hurt her how she had had to antagonize him. But back then she hadn't seen any other way than to blackmail the transfiguration professor. Otherwise he would surely have sent Tom back to the orphanage. However disappointed Dumbledore was in her at least she knew that she had a very good reason for displeasing the professor. Hermione swallowed down her guilt as she stood before Dumbledore's office. She donned a conceited expression on her face. She still needed to play the dark witch in front of Dumbledore. He wasn't allowed to suss out her bluff.

She knocked on the door and the professor beckoned her to enter. Hermione opened the door and was immediately greeted by the cozy atmosphere of the office. As her gaze wandered to Dumbledore, though, she was quickly reminded that she was not exactly welcome here. A sharp frown had appeared between his eyebrows as he scanned her through his half moon spectacles.

"Please sit down, Ms DeCerto," he finally said, gesturing to the chair in front of his desk.

Hermione sat down and looked at him expectantly while trying to hide how very nervous she was right now. Her heard sank as she saw that the kind twinkle was completely absent in his eyes. It made her sad how Dumbledore seemed to be convinced that she was dark and evil. She wondered shortly if that was how Tom had always felt towards the professor. She quickly reminded herself that Tom simply hated him in return and would certainly not feel sad about the whole thing. Besides, Dumbledore's mistrust in Tom wasn't completely unfounded either.

The professor still hit her with his piercing stare, then he asked her sharply, "Where did you go after you left the castle yesterday?"

Hermione looked at him and hid her guilt and shame behind a blank mask on her face.

"I- we just went over to Hogsmeade," she finally mumbled with the appropriate amount of contrition in her voice.

"I see." Dumbledore piercing stare did not waver. Then her unexpectedly shot at her, "Where did you stay?"

"What?" Hermione asked confused.
"I'm sure you didn't sleep on the streets," Dumbledore stated in a cold voice, "So where did you stay for the night?"

"I… I…" Hermione was desperate to find an alibi.

"Don't forget Ms DeCerto," he reminded her in a glacial tone. "I can verify your statement by asking the local barmen."

She swallowed hard. What could she possibly tell him? They hadn't spent the night in Hogsmeade, after all. Of course she could still claim that they had apparated to someplace else if there hadn't been the slight inconvenience that she officially didn't have an apparition license.

"I repeat my question," Dumbledore insisted mercilessly. "Where have you been?"

"Okay," Hermione whispered in a soft voice while trying to appear embarrassed. "I didn't want to admit it. Tom and I, we slipped out to go to Hogsmeade," she said while staring down at her hands. Then she slowly raised her eyes to look at Dumbledore again. "We somehow got drunk, you see. We wanted to go back to the castle. But we didn't make it."

Hermione felt horrible for lying again to Dumbledore. It made her sick having to play the guilty student here. She was guilty but for completely different reasons. Her confession now was just a disgusting lie.

But she couldn't let her mask drop so she continued in her embarrassed voice, "We got lost between Hogsmeade and the castle. So we just stayed there for the night. We had our wands so we had not problem putting up warming charms. Then we waited for the morning."

Dumbledore scrutinized her over his half-moon spectacles and had Hermione not been a rather experienced Occlumens she would have thought that he read her mind right now.

After a while he said while the disappointment seeping into his voice made her almost wince, "Ms DeCerto, I've been a teacher at this school for quite some time already. I can tell if students lie to me."

Hermione couldn't help but raise her eyebrows. She had to admit, he was good, even without Legilimency as her Occlumency shields were still in place.

"Why don't you try it with the truth now?" Dumbledore suggested in a sharp tone.

The truth, though, would pose too many new questions. Hermione couldn't very well tell him how she had apparated through Hogwarts wards all the way to London. If she did that, why not tell him about Peverell, the Elder Magic and her temporal problem?

So Hermione replied defiantly, "I am not lying."

Her declaration was met with an uncomfortable silence. Dumbledore looked at her with his clear blue eyes and Hermione had to stop herself from squirming under his stare. She dearly missed the Dumbledore from her time period. He had never looked at her in this way. Like he was suspecting her of having done horrible things. Hermione could barely stand his mistrust. She wanted to tell him everything. She wanted him to understand that she was not an evil witch. That she had actually fought on the right side. She wanted him to tell her that she was doing the right thing.

Hermione felt lost as she looked back at him. Before he had died, Dumbledore had always been their moral compass. Now he was convinced that she was evil. It was hard to maintain her act of the dark witch when she actually wanted him to confirm that she was good and her cause right. But she knew, she mustn't let her mask slip.

After a while, in which she did not cave in, Dumbledore suddenly sighed tiredly, "Do you really want to walk this path, Ms DeCerto?"

"Sir?" Hermione asked, earnestly confused.

"I know how Tom is," the professor replied. "I have watched him for some time now. I've tried so hard to sway him from that dark path." There was now sadness in his voice as he continued, "Alas, I could not pull him back. I think he is forever lost. It is something I regret very much."

Hermione felt horrible as she now looked into Dumbledore's light blue eyes. She somehow understood that he had always tried his best to save Tom. She still didn't like the way in which Dumbledore had tried it but she could see that he honestly wanted to help Tom.

"I always wonder if I could have done more," Dumbledore admitted while there still seeped unbearable regret through his voice. "Maybe if I had put more effort into it, if I had tried harder, then I might have saved Tom."

He leaned a little forward in his chair and looked directly into her eyes. Hermione still couldn't see the kind twinkle in his eyes but now at least the hard glint was gone.

Then Dumbledore continued in his soft-spoken voice, "You see, when I first met Tom as he was only eleven years old but I could already see how vulnerable he is to the lure of Dark Magic. I promised myself then to watch out for him and to protect him." Here Dumbledore paused shortly and shook his head slightly. "I failed him. I could not help him. Now, I have to accept that it is too late to save him. It hurts me, having to watch such talent go to waste. Tom could have been great, a very powerful sorcerer. But he decided to follow another way. He could not resist the pull of the Dark Arts."

Again Dumbledore sighed softly. His eyes had lost their focus shortly but now the shot back at her piercingly.

"I know what the Dark Arts represent, Ms DeCerto," he suddenly declared while he looked at her intently. "They offer power and strength. Dark Magic likes to lure and to ensnare. It promises many things. Things you have always dreamed of but would never have dared to hope for. Abilities you wanted to command but never achieved. The Dark Arts will give it all to you. The more it offers, the more you want to take. As a result you will delve deeper and deeper into the Dark Arts. You will even start to trust them and you will begin to think that you are strong. Strong and smart enough to control the darkness, to know when to stop. You are at the peak of your power, master of the Dark Arts."

"But then, after some time, slowly you will start to have doubts. It is then that you will come to see that there is no controlling darkness. You are just stumbling through the dark, nothing more than a plaything to this magic. It is then that you will realize that Dark Magic is deceitful. But by that time it will be too late for you to turn back. Dark Magic is a cruel mistress, who promises a lot but keeps no pledges. Instead it will eat away from you until there is nothing left."

Dumbledore still stared at her with sadness shining in his eyes. Then he said in a hollow voice, "That is the path Tom Riddle has decided to follow, Ms DeCerto." He added gravely, "It is very painful for me to watch him losing himself in the dark but I cannot help him anymore. He is now beyond my reach."

Hermione stared at him. She didn't let her blank mask drop. But his words had hit her much. She knew he was right. She had seen herself what dark magic truly meant. It was a disgusting branch of magic. Though there certainly was a lure behind that powerful magic. It had never managed to catch her but Hermione had nevertheless noticed it. The Dark Arts unmistakably offered much power. But she knew how dangerous and ghastly such power could be. With one thing, though, she found herself wishing that Dumbledore was wrong. Tom was not yet beyond any help, was he? But she had seen it this morning, that glint of anger and hate in his eyes. She had seen a glimpse of Lord Voldemort in Tom's crimson eyes. She would lie if she said that this hadn't frightened her.

Lord Voldemort had been the most powerful wizard she had ever met, even more powerful than Dumbledore. Voldemort had been very well versed in dark magic and Hermione would say that he had truly been a master of the Dark Arts. But Dumbledore was right, wasn't he? In the end, Voldemort had lost everything to this dark magic. Even himself.

Hermione was totally startled as Dumbledore spoke again, "Are you sure you want to follow Tom?"

"W… what?" she asked weakly.

"I know Tom is a charismatic person," he said softly, almost sympathetically. "He can be very persuasive when he wants to be."

Hermione frowned at him confused what did he try to say? That it was dangerous to be around Tom? Well, she already knew that.

"But you should not let yourself getting blinded by his charisma," he continued. "I implore you not to follow him."

Hermione's eyes widened in shock as realization finally dawned on her when she heard that word, 'follow'. Now she could see what Dumbledore tried to do here. He thought she was one of Tom's followers? He wanted to convince her to leave Tom and not follow him into the dark. She wanted to tell Dumbledore how wrong he was. She did not intend to ever really delve into the Dark Arts.

But she knew, she could not reveal herself. There were too many risks. She was not going to tell Dumbledore the truth about herself. Then there was Tom. Hermione knew that she was the only thing that stopped Dumbledore from expelling Tom and forcing him back in the orphanage. There was no way she could risk Tom's safety. She had tried to convince Dumbledore to let him stay but nothing had helped. So here she was, the dark witch. Hermione didn't like it to have to lie to Dumbledore but at the moment there was no other way.

So Hermione took on a cool and indifferent mask on her face. She tried to look like his words had had no impact on her whatsoever. It was an utter lie but Hermione knew that over the time she had become a very good liar.

Then she told Dumbledore in a conceited tone, "You do not have to worry on my behalf, sir. I am quite old enough to make my own decisions."

Hermione knew she had said it in a very cold and offensive way but she actually meant what she said. She truly didn't want Dumbledore to worry too much about her. He meant well and she hated herself for lying to him. She didn't want to add guilt on top of everything by knowing how concerned he was on her account.

Sadness flooded the professor's eyes and Hermione nearly cringed.

"I see, you do not want to change. But know, that my door is always open for you. If you should realize that to follow Tom into the darkness is a grave mistake, then please feel free to seek me out. I will be able to help."

Hermione didn't nod at him but just got up from her chair and tried to appear calm as she walked over to the door. She grasped the handle and opened the door but before she could step out on the corridor Dumbledore spoke again, "Oh, Ms DeCerto?"

She turned around to him and looked questioningly.

"Forty points from Gryffindor," he informed her in an emotionless voice. "For breaking the school rules by leaving the castle without permission."

Hermione inclined her head slightly. She had actually expected something worse. Was he going easy on her because he still hoped she would change her mind and leave Tom? She didn't know so exited the transfiguration teacher's office, slightly wobbly on her legs.

She felt horrible. Her life was getting more complicated by the minute. Dumbledore obviously thought she was a misguided witch directly on her way into the Dark Arts. Tom hated her because she actually had a past he never knew about and, well, her past enjoyed it how it was to pop up at random times just to torment her. To top it off Grindelwald seemed to want to kill her. Three of those problems she couldn't change at the moment so she would try to concentrate on Tom. She didn't like it how he was angry with her. They really needed to talk.

Later that day Hermione decided to find Tom. She really didn't want to talk with him about Ron but she couldn't stave it off any longer. Since they had had this row in the hotel room Tom hadn't spoken one word with her. As she so wandered towards the stairs leading down to the dungeons she wondered what she should tell Tom. She knew that he was jealous because he had found out about Ron. But he would just have to come to terms with the situation, Hermione decided stubbornly. He hadn't assumed that he was her first ever boyfriend, had he? On the other hand, he had told her himself that she indeed was his first girlfriend. So Tom obviously hadn't much experience in the serious-relationship-department. After the things she had learned about his past in the orphanage and had seen here at Hogwarts, he probably had never had any attachment to any person, romantic or not. That didn't exactly help her situation.

As Hermione strolled though the castle's pathways in direction of the Slytherin common room she was suddenly brought out of her thoughts as a sharp voice yelled at her from behind, "Ms DeCerto!"

It didn't take Hermione much to guess whom that voice belonged to. Only her least favourite teacher was able to screech in that sort of voice. Hermione groaned audibly but she didn't care if the hysteric woman behind her heard her or not. Then she turned around. Sure enough professor Legifer came walking towards her. Her robes were, as usual, squeaky-clean. All this perfection actually made Hermione quite dizzy. Legifer wore her dark hair in a bun without even one strand out of place. Her hard eyes now wandered coldly over Hermione's form. Like always, the woman seemed to be personally offended with what she found. Hermione actually knew that her own hair was extra frizzy today as she hadn't brushed it at all.

Legifer now shook her head reproachfully but she didn't comment Hermione's less than perfect appearance instead she said in her sharp voice, "Don't think I haven't heard about your latest misbehaviour."

The witch then looked at Hermione expectantly as if she wanted to hear some form of apology. Hermione on the other hand didn't see why she should apologize for anything to that crazy woman.
So as she didn't say anything Legifer continued outraged, "I couldn't believe it when I heard. But I really shouldn't be surprised." She eyed Hermione in disgust then she said, "I knew you would cause trouble when I first met you, Ms DeCerto. I have never met a more uncouth young woman than you."

Hermione raised her eyes in challenge. What did the woman want from her? she wondered exasperated. She slowly got the impression that Legifer just enjoyed it to yell at her.

Sure enough, Legifer continued to reprimand her, "I warned Mr Riddle again and again. You are bad company, that's what I told him."

Now that did it. Hermione seethed and she balled her hands into tight fists. She seriously considered pulling her wand now. How dare that woman do something like that and bother Tom? He hadn't even told Hermione about it.

"First you drag poor Mr Riddle into detention after that indecent behaviour you showed during professor McGray's class," Legifer hissed at her in her stern voice. "It was completely your fault. You should know better than try to duel with your male fellow students. It is not your place to do something like that. You are a girl, after all."

Hermione had to press her mouth into a thin line as she tried to stop herself from shouting at the bothersome woman in front of her. She remembered that incident well. Back then Tom and herself had still hated each other. The whole thing had resulted in them using rather severe curses in a duel during DADA. McGray had punished them consecutively. But it certainly had not been solely Hermione's fault, she thought infuriated.

Legifer just ignored Hermione's upcoming rage and continued bitingly, "Now you did it again. You again caused trouble for Mr Riddle." Legifer glared at her with stern eyes. "It is even worse than before. Such behaviour is inexcusable. I was deeply shocked when I heard what you did. It is a shame to have a student like you, let me tell you that."

Well, poor you, was the only thing Hermione could think now that she stared at the enraged woman in front of her. At least she managed to not roll her eyes at her.

"Imagine that, a young woman tugging a young man into some shady bars in Hogsmeade. I've never heard of something like this," Legifer declared indignantly. "It's a disgrace, that's what it is."

The woman's sharp gaze still hit Hermione but she had decided to just ignore the whole thing. It wasn't worth to get worked up on this.

"Are you not ashamed of yourself?" Legifer asked her reproachfully after there came no reaction whatsoever from Hermione. "If you don't care about your own reputation, then you should have at least considered Mr Riddle. He is such a fine young man but all you cause him is trouble."

The irony of it all was just too much for Hermione. Though there was something else and it made her feel uncomfortable. Legifer wasn't right, of course, but still her words held some truth. Hermione, in fact, did feel guilty that she had dragged Tom to London. For completely different reasons than what Legifer suggested but guilt was definitely there. It angered her, having to admit that Legifer had a point here.

Hermione let her rage get the better of her as she now hissed at Legifer, "Professor, whatever you might think about my actions you are not my head of house. You cannot punish me."

She could almost see the indignation seeping into Legifer's dark eyes as the woman glared at her.
"Such impudence," Legifer huffed, her voice tight and angry. "I assure you we will discuss your inappropriate behaviour during your detention next Friday."

Oh joy, Hermione thought sarcastically as she eyed Legifer. In the mean time the professor's cold eyes once more wandered disapprovingly over Hermione.

"I more and more lean to the opinion that you are a lost cause, Ms DeCerto," Legifer finally stated snippily. "If you don't change your ways, Mr Riddle will surely leave you. Only Merlin knows why he decided to give you a chance in the first place."

Hermione seethed now. Even her magic rushed through her enraged.

So she said in a clipped voice, "Thank you, professor. You are right, we should discuss that next Friday."

Then she just turned around and walked away leaving Legifer standing there in the corridor. This just wasn't her day, Hermione thought as she continued her way towards the dungeons.

She needed a while to calm down again after her encounter with Legifer. By that time Hermione arrived down in the dungeons. Now her anger was again replaced by anxiety. The truth behind Legifer's words hadn't left her. It certainly was her fault that Tom was in trouble now. She had grabbed him and apparated to London without asking him beforehand. After that she had talked in her sleep about Ron. Hermione felt sick as she had to think about Ron again but she desperately tried to suppress the upcoming memories. She needed to speak with Tom now. So Hermione stubbornly walked down the dark corridors of the dungeons.

After a while she stood before a perfectly ordinary, bare stone wall and felt very frustrated. She knew this was the entrance to the Slytherin common room but unfortunately she didn't know the password. The one Tom had used a few days ago to take her to his dorm and look after her injuries obviously didn't work anymore. So currently Hermione waited for any Slytherin to show up and get Tom for her. At this point in time, Hogwarts house system was rather bothersome.

Hermione just wondered if she should use a little bit of magic to open the stupid common room as a group of three or fourth year Slytherins came strolling down the corridor. They eyed her suspiciously as they reached the entrance to their common room but Hermione ignored their borderline hostile behaviour and said, turned to a brown haired boy,

"Can you look if Tom Riddle is in the common room and tell him I'm waiting for him?"

Hermione had to suppress an amused giggle as the boy stared at her saucer-eyed after hearing Tom's name.

"R… Riddle?" he stammered nervously. "You want me to address Tom Riddle?" he ended in a rather panicky tone.

Hermione rolled her eyes. Tom and his ability to intimidate people was really something else. Had he ever done something to this poor fourth year or was it only his peculiar reputation that made the boy gape at her rather scared looking?

"Yes, Tom Riddle," Hermione replied exasperated. "Tell him his girlfriend waits for him."

The boy just nodded at her and Hermione guessed that he was too nervous to say anything right now. It looked like Tom didn't bother to play the perfect student when he was in his common room. She watched the now rather pale boy and his friends enter the common room. She wondered shortly if she should enter herself but then decided against it. She wouldn't feel very comfortable in there.
Those Slytherins made her somehow nervous. So she remained standing in the dark corridor.

It was after a good solid five minutes that Hermione started to wonder if the boy had told Tom at all. A little while later and Hermione considered to give up. Then, finally, the common room door opened. Out stepped Tom. He was wearing his uniform pants and shirt though without the green sleeveless pullover or tie.

"Hi," Hermione greeted him timidly.

Tom just eyed her shortly before he said, his tone level, "You wanted to speak with me?"

"Yes. Let's walk a bit," Hermione gesturing down the corridor.

Tom nodded curtly so she took off. He fell in step beside her but he never once looked at her. She could see that his face was completely free of any emotion. Hermione then decided to just be blunt. He was a Slytherin maybe he would be taken by surprise by her bluntness and confess to things he otherwise wouldn't.

So she asked casually, "Are you angry with me?"

But Tom remained silent and Hermione sighed softly.

"I take that as a 'yes'," she replied dryly. "I spoke with Dumbledore," she then informed him. "It might cheer you up to know that it was quite dreadful for me. And he took loads of points from Gryffindor. I'm sure Slytherin'll win the House Cup now."

Hermione cast a quick glance at Tom. He was still walking calmly beside her. His face was once again unreadable but she could at least tell that he was listening to her.

"Oh, and he gave me the 'look' again," Hermione said ominously. "You know, that look he casts at you, too, all the time. It's like he thinks I'm planning something evil."

Still, no reaction at all, Hermione noted frustrated. So she decided to just go on and chatter with him.

Tom eyed the witch walking beside him. She was talking on and on about petty things while neatly avoiding the one thing that plagued his mind. He was greatly unsettled by the incident that had happened this morning. The words she had spoken while asleep still freaked him out. Whoever this Ron was, dead or not, apparently Hermione still had feelings for him. Tom was not going to accept that. She was his after all and he was not prepared to share her with anyone. Tom just had to remember how she had uttered those words, how content she had looked as she had dreamed about that other guy and he would feel sick. It wasn't supposed to go like this. Hermione was his. His property actually. How was it that she had such influence over him? It should be the other way around.

But now she was looking at him with concern in her eyes. She even stepped a little closer to him and gently clasped his hand. A soft smile played around her mouth as she looked up at him and Tom could feel her hand pressing his reassuringly. A pleasant warmth originated from her hand on his skin and it spread through his whole body. He quickly pulled his hand away from her.

She was his property. He had wanted to possess her, had wanted to own her. But at the moment, she was the one in control.

That made Tom angry. He did not like it when others were in control of his life. There had always been people who had tried to control him. Like Mrs Cole or Carter. And Dumbledore, of course. But they would never succeed. He would always fight against them. They were not going to gain any ground. Now there was Hermione. She had a frightening lot of power over him. Today, she had taken over completely. Just like that, without any effort. He hadn't fought her off. He had given her this power willingly.

While all this feelings cursed through him one thing overshadowed everything else. It was the fact that Hermione hadn't answered his question.

Who is Ron?

She hadn't told him. She had dreamed about another guy and she had confessed her love for him. And then she hadn't told Tom anything. She hadn't answered his question. Only that this person was supposedly dead. Did that change so much? It certainly didn't change her feelings. How did she know that guy? When had they met? Had she been his girlfriend? Had he returned her feelings? Tom felt like going crazy as a million questions run through his head. So far, all of them remained unanswered, he thought angrily as he stared down at Hermione.

Hermione felt a little hurt as Tom pulled his hand away from her. He was angry, though. He didn't mean it, she tried to calm herself down. She had unsettled him by letting slip that bit of information about Ron. That was why he reacted so dismissive right now.

The two of them had by now reached the Entrance Hall. Hermione wanted to talk with Tom undisturbed and had decided to do that outside. Maybe a bit of fresh air was able to calm the both of them down. She now opened the door and stepped outside.

"And I met Legifer just as I was walking to your common room," Hermione continued chattering away.

Obviously Tom wasn't willing to contribute anything to their conversation as he insisted in ignoring her. But she wanted him to speak with her. So she tried again, "She wasn't very impressed by my performance either," Hermione told him while trying to sound conversationally. "But I think that woman just hates me whatever I do. Not that I care. She is a right pain in the neck."

Hermione shortly glimpsed at Tom but the distanced look was still plastered all over his face. He wasn't reacting to her in any way other than just ignoring everything.

"One day, I might just go on and curse Legifer," she said and then added thoughtfully, "Perhaps they are going to expel me then. Though it still might be worth it. What do you think?"

Now she tried to deliberately get a rise out of him, but he still refused to react to her. Slowly his silent treatment was getting on her nerves. Hermione took a deep breath to control her rising temper.

Then she inquired tentatively, "So what did Slughorn say? Did he give you detention?"

"No," he replied monosyllabically.

"Well, you are lucky then, aren't you?" she said in a forced cheerful voice.

Tom just shrugged his shoulders and Hermione lost her patience.

"Tom, please, say something," she exclaimed frustrated.

He turned around to her and glowered down at her.

Well, at least that blank look is gone, she thought wryly as she looked up in his angry face. It seemed she had finally managed to make him crack.
"What do you want me to do? Should I dance around in joy?" he asked aggressively. Then he continued while slowly cold sarcasm seeped into his voice. "Because this is such a wonderful day, isn't it? It started so very nicely." Hermione winced at the sharp tone in his voice. "And now it gets better and better. Look, I didn't get any detention for a thing I was completely innocent of. How lucky indeed. Maybe Slughorn suspended my prefect privilege. But, hey, who cares?

Hermione stood before him and stared at him. He seemed to be really furious. Maybe she shouldn't have tried to make him open up because that dark glint in his eyes now was rather intimidating.

"He… he suspended you?" she asked timidly. "For how long?"

Tom just narrowed his eyes at her and then hissed acridly, "Two weeks."

"I'm sorry," she whispered. "I didn't want that to happen."

"Well, congratulations. You still managed," he replied frostily.

"I'm sorry," she repeated weakly.

Hermione felt horrible as she looked up at him. This whole disaster had really been her fault. She shouldn't have dragged him to London. That had been one huge mistake. Tom's eyes were hard as steel as they now wandered over her form. She could see anger but also accusation in them. Though there was something else. She had seen that in him before. He was incredibly jealous.

As though to confirm her train of thought Tom now hissed at her demandingly, "You said you love this guy. How did you meet him?"

Hermione was not really surprised by this abrupt change of topic. She knew this had been the actual problem boiling underneath the whole argument. Now that she got him started Tom didn't stop to rage at her.

"Do you want him back?" he asked defiantly. Then he continued with false concern, "Obviously you love him so much."

Hermione didn't answer. It still was impossible to talk about Ron. So while she could understand Tom's anger, she was not able to say anything.

"Did he love you, too?" Tom asked snidely.

She still remained to be silent. His questions hurt her. Each mention of Ron's name invoked more painful memories which now invaded her mind.

By now they had reached the Great Lake. The grey of the dreary sky was reflected on the smooth surface of the lake, making its water look uninviting and cold. Not far away Hermione saw a small bench facing the lake. Tom's inquisition about Ron was slowly making her feel faint so she walked over to the bench and sat down. Tom didn't sit down but instead paced furiously up and down in front of her.

Hermione knew he was a very jealous person but this was a whole new level. She had no idea how to calm him. She certainly wasn't going to lie and tell him that Ron didn't mean anything to her. Then Hermione noticed that Tom had stopped his pacing but now stood a few steps away from her and stared at her with narrowed eyes.

"Did you sleep with him?" he suddenly asked her in that fearsome, icy cold voice.
Hermione's eyebrows shot up and she stared at Tom incredulously. His grey eyes fixed her with a hard glare.

"What?" Hermione managed to say shakily. "Why is that so important?"

She had to watch as a malign red colour seeped into his grey eyes. Tom took a step towards her and Hermione couldn't help but breathe in sharply as she felt the first signs of his dark magic in the air.

"It is important because I want to know it," he hissed at her in anger. "Tell me, did you sleep with him?"

Tom's last sentence sounded more like a command than anything else. Hermione stared up at him with wide eyes. Her breathing was quickened now but she answered his question in a firm voice,

"Yes."

The dark magic in the air even intensified as Tom heard her answer. There was now a murderous expression on his face as he stared down at her. His red eyes glowed with the fury raging inside of him. Hermione was more than a little unsettled by his anger. But she didn't see why she should feel bad for having slept with Ron. He had been her boyfriend back then after all.

It had been the night before they had had to go to the Ministry of Magic to finally face their opponent. Hermione remembered how scared she had been. She had been so sure that the only thing they would find in the Ministry would be their deaths. That war had been raging around her for the past two years and all of it was going to culminate with the next day when they would either lose horribly or pull the country out of the darkness. Everything depended on their strength.

Accordingly, during that night, no-one of them had been able to find any sleep. Harry had gone out of the tent to be alone and to prepare himself for the task ahead of him. Ron and Hermione had stayed back in the tent. It was then that she had slept with him for the first time.

And for the last time, Hermione thought as she felt a painful twinge in her stomach.

They had been at the eve of a battle they did not want to fight. A battle they knew would most probably cost them their lives. They had fought against the evil for far too long already. Sacrificed so much to their cause. There had been so incredibly much at stake. They just couldn't afford to lose against the darkness. If they lost, the whole country would fall with them. The act of love between them had been overshadowed by this terrible fate they knew was awaiting them. What should have been a wonderful experience had been tainted by fear and desperation.

Hermione felt incredibly sad again as she thought back to that night. It had been the right decision, to spend the night with Ron. Because the other day he had died.

Her eyes wandered back to Tom standing in front of her and still staring at her so furiously. He seemed to be really angry with her. His dark magic was still dancing around him viciously. Why was he so angry with her? Hermione wondered as she could feel her own temper rising. She had done nothing wrong. At least she had slept with a person she loved whereas Tom had slept with a lot of girls he had never given a damn about.

"What are you so angry about?" she hissed at him defiantly. "Didn't you sleep with a lot of girls before we met?"

A dangerous look crossed his face as she said that and his red eyes seemed to burn even fiercer. Then he said in a barely controlled voice, "Yes. But you are a girl, Hermione."
Hermione raised her eyebrows indignantly. Was that again a forties thing? Where men were allowed to do whatever they pleased but all hell broke loose if a girl did the same thing? She watched Tom's hard gaze travel over her form before he opened his mouth and said in a snide tone,

"I can't believe you let yourself getting fucked like a cheap whore!"

Hermione's eyes widened in shock as she heard him hurl those cold, hurtful words at her. How could he say something like that? How dare he insult and belittle that time she had spent with Ron? Suddenly there were tears threatening to fall from her eyes. From anger or sadness, Hermione didn't know but she fought against them. She looked up into Tom's furious crimson-red eyes.

She breathed in deeply to get her feelings under control again then she said in a stiff voice, "It is not your place to judge me."

As she continued to stare at him, not seeing any emotion other than anger in him, she suddenly sniffed. Then she could feel that she wouldn't be able to hold her tears back any longer. So she got up from the bench and started to hastily walk away. She couldn't bear Tom's presence anymore. Not after what he had just said. His cold words had hurt her very much.

She turned her back to Tom and hurried away as she felt the first tears running down her cheeks. But Hermione only managed to walk a few steps until she felt someone grabbing her upper arm, thus stopping her flight successfully. She tried to wriggle away from Tom's grasp but it was no use. Then he turned her around to him but Hermione averted her eyes, she didn't look up at him. She didn't want to see those red eyes again. They always reminded her of things she really tried to forget. The unwanted tears were now running freely down her face.

"Hermione?" She heard Tom say softly.

She still didn't look up. What he had said had been just vile. She sniffed again but tried to suppress the tears that still ran down her cheeks. She didn't want to cry. Not in front of Tom after he had insulted her in such a way. What did he want to do now? Insult her some more? Hermione bit on her lip to stop herself from sobbing. She couldn't take it if he started to talk so derisively about her relationship with Ron again.

Then unexpectedly she could feel Tom's fingers touching her face, gently wiping the tears away.

"I didn't mean to say that." She heard him say in a soft tone.

Hermione breathed in deeply then she lifted her head and reluctantly looked up at Tom. His grey eyes were gazing back at her anxiously.

"I'm not a whore," Hermione whispered in a shaky voice.

She saw a small, hesitant smile on Tom's face as he answered her in a soothing voice, "I know that. I didn't mean what I said."

His eyes sparkled down at her softly and the anger that had been burning in them before was completely gone just to be replaced by worry. Tom really looked a little contrite. That didn't change the fact, though, that his words still stung. As Hermione looked up at Tom and stared into his grey eyes, suddenly memories flooded her again. She was reminded of how she had always looked up at Ron just like this. His blue eyes had always looked lovingly back at her. Even when they had had a row she had always been able to see his love. Hermione had to squeeze her eyes shut. Images of Ron came crashing down on her again. She could remember how he had held her hand as they had walked to the Ministry of Magic to face their fate. He had pressed her hand reassuringly while each step had taken them closer to their enemy. Back then his hand in hers had meant the world to her. Without him she would have been lost. Then suddenly, cruelly, he had been ripped from her.

Hermione had to take in deep shaky breaths of air while her eyes were still squeezed shut. She desperately tried to fight off all those images that now invaded her mind so ruthlessly. Her daemons were back and Hermione did her best to subdue them again. Though she could feel that she was losing.

Tom looked down at Hermione. Her head was bent but he could see that she had her eyes closed. Her breathing was ragged just as if she tried to suppress sobs. He had been so angry with her. He had felt betrayed by her. This had enraged him and he had wanted to hurt her just like she had dared to hurt him. But now he looked down at her and he regretted his words very much. She looked so broken, so desperate. He had wanted to cause this but now that he had succeeded he wanted nothing more than to take his words back.

Her confession about her relationship with Ron had shocked him. She was his and the knowledge that somebody else had touched her made him almost senseless with anger. But he should never have hurt her so.

Hermione still stood before him and had her eyes tightly closed as if she tried to force her tears from not spilling from her eyes. Tom hesitantly raised his arm and then gingerly laid his hand on her trembling shoulder. The instant she felt him touching her Hermione's eyes flew open then she whipped around and tried to run away. Before she could flee him Tom caught a trembling hand. She stopped dead in her tracks as he grabbed her hand and he was relieved that she didn't immediately try to wrench away from him. Though she also didn't turn around to him either. In an attempt to calm her down Tom squeezed her hand gently. He could feel her tense at his contact. They stood like this for a moment, Hermione still with her back to him, and Tom hoped that she wouldn't decide to run away again.

Then abruptly she turned around to him. Before he could say anything she wrapped her arms around him and buried her face in his chest. He could feel how tightly she held to him, almost desperate. He quickly slung his arms around her. One of his hands gently held the back of her head as he pressed her against him. She still held tightly to him but Tom could feel that she was not crying. She was just standing there holding him. They stood like this for a long time and Tom wondered what she was thinking about now.

Was she considering leaving him? Tom nearly cringed at that thought. What he had just spat at her had been really cruel. Again, he had lost his temper so easily. It was as those thoughts run through his head that Hermione suddenly released her hold on him and Tom was reluctant to unwrap his arms from her but he did.

"Let's sit down," he whispered to her while gesturing at the bench.

He wanted to prevent her from running away again. Hermione just looked up at him with her blank face. After a while she nodded. Tom took her hand, which made her tense slightly, then he pulled her over to the bench. She sat down and Tom sat beside her. Hermione drew her knees up and slung her arms around them. Then she just stared numbly at the Great Lake in front of them. Tom cast a sideway glance at her.

"You do know I didn't mean that, do you?" he asked her hesitantly.

She didn't turn her head but just continued staring at the lake.

After a while she said in a strangely unemotional voice, "It's okay."
"I shouldn't have said that," Tom was now rather unsettled by her dead tone. "It was stupid."

Hermione turned her head, her face was still a blank but he could see honesty in her eyes as she looked at him and said, "You were angry. Sometimes we say stupid things when angered. Don't worry."

He felt a little reassured by her words but that lost look in her eyes was still horrible to watch. Hermione turned away from him to again stare at the lake. She didn't say anything for a long time.

As she spoke again her voice was soft and ridged by some unknown emotion, "Have you ever lost anyone you loved?"

Tom's head shot at her. He hadn't expected her to talk with him after he had insulted her like that. She was again looking numbly at the lake in front of her.

"No," he finally replied softly and truthfully

A small smile appeared on her lips but he could see that it didn't reach her eyes.

"That is good," she whispered. "Because it hurts."

By now the smile had vanished, leaving her face abandoned. As her pretty eyes fell on him, Tom nearly shuddered as he could see the pain lurking behind.

She opened her mouth and said almost desperately, "And it doesn't stop."

She shortly closed her eyes but then turned and stared out at the lake again. He could see her arms around her knees tighten.

Then she continued in her empty tone, "I don't know why I dreamed about him. I didn't have any dreams about my past for quite some time now." Her voice was extremely soft. "Actually not since that night when you found me on the Astronomy tower."

Tom glanced at her. He could remember that night very well. She had tried to curse him back then, after all. But it was also the night were she had finally agreed to become his girlfriend.

"This time it wasn't a nightmare, was it?" he asked somewhat worried.

"I can't remember," Hermione replied numbly. "But I don't think so."

"Those dreams. They are..." she started but then stopped in the middle of her sentence as if she was not sure how to phrase it. Then she tried again in a shaky voice, "My friends, my family, Ron... they are all dead. Dreams and memories are the only things I have left of them. And yet those pictures are haunting me."

Her voice was now no more than a whisper, barely audible over the cold wind that skimmed over the Scottish land, but her pain and desperation still hit Tom like she had yelled those words at him. He stared at her but she seemed to be lost somewhere else as her eyes were still fixed at the lake in front of them, not seeing anything. Tom wanted to hold her but she appeared to be so unapproachable now. Another silence tore at their conversation and Tom got the impression that he shouldn't break it.

After a long time Hermione suddenly spoke again, "He proposed to me."

Tom took in a sharp breath of air. That was something he had neither expected nor wanted to hear. He could feel his dark magic reacting to her declaration with rage and anger but the desperation he saw in her eyes stopped him from jumping up and yelling at her.

Instead he pulled himself together and asked, "What did you answer?"

Hermione didn't answer his question she just continued looking at him sadly. Tom actually wanted to shake her and force her to tell him. He desperately needed to know if she had said 'yes'. But again the forlorn look in her eyes held him back. After some time she spoke again.

"War was crashing down on us. As always," she told him in her emotionless voice, "It dragged on and on. And... after some time, there was nothing much left. I felt empty. Tired. I had started to think about giving up. It would have been so much easier. In a way I envied-"

Hermione stopped herself in midsentence and Tom wondered whom she had envied. He couldn't dwell on it longer as she continued,

"It was as I thought about giving up, that he asked me. And for a tiny moment, a precious speck of time, everything vanished and I was just happy." With her last words a serene expression appeared on her pretty face.

That expression was enough to answer Tom's previous question. He would have lied if he had said that this information didn't make him painfully jealous. This Ron had asked her to marry him and she had obviously said yes. Tom could feel his angry magic protesting at the mere thought of her marrying someone else. But he suppressed another fit of anger and managed to master himself even as Hermione continued while that smile was still on her face,

"I was so happy. I wanted to stay with him forever."

As she went on, though, the happiness was suddenly wiped from her face to be replaced by sorrow and pain, "It was then that he left me. Just like that. He died."

Tom looked at her and didn't know how to feel. He was glad that this Ron guy had died. He had been a rival. And as it was, without him dying Tom would probably have never met Hermione. But as Tom now looked into her brown eyes he could see how much she was riven by grief. He had glimpsed her sorrow before and he didn't like it at all. Now he could see it again. The despair seemed to have a mercilessly tight hold on her. Tom didn't want Hermione to have to suffer so much.

He was ripped from his conflicting feelings as Hermione suddenly whispered in a hushed voice, "And it was my fault."

"How?"

As she didn't immediately answer Tom searched her face. The grief was still present in her eyes and now he could also see that she didn't want to go on. She did not want to talk about that incident, he could tell. As she looked back at him one single tear was running down her cheek on her otherwise completely blank face. It was the only emotion she seemed to allow herself.

Hermione turned her face away from him and began to speak in a voice that was hard now and full of raw emotion, "We... we were all fighting. And I was dueling this witch. She was very powerful. I could barely hold her off. But all the same, she was my opponent. I should have stopped her."

Tom noticed how bitter her tone now was and he hated that look on her face, filled with self detestation.

"But I was too weak. I failed them all. I let myself getting distracted. And this dark witch used my hesitation and fired the Killing curse at Ron."
Tom stared at her wide eyed. Hermione had told him how she had had to fight in the war against Grindelwald but what he had not realized was how frighteningly close she had been. She had had to fight against strong opponents who apparently did not refrain from using deadly force. Tom shuddered as he realized that this Killing curse could as well have hit Hermione instead.

He stared at her. She still had her knees drawn up to her chest with her arms slung around them. Her head rested on her knees but was turned slightly so that she could look at him. There was so much pain in her pretty hazel eyes. Tom couldn't stand that. Tom slowly slid nearer to her on the bench. As he sat directly beside her he wrapped one arm gently around her shoulders and pulled her slightly against him. He was relieved as she didn't pull away. She leaned against his side and Tom felt how she put her head down on the crook of his neck. Her warm breath gently skimming over his skin, inducing pleasant goose bumps.

"How did you get away after he died?" Tom asked hesitantly.

"I... I killed that witch," Hermione admitted reluctantly. She added as if to justify her actions, "It was war. There was no other way."

Tom tightening his grip on her and soothed her, "I know. You don't have to feel guilty about it. You tried to save your life."

"But I do. I feel guilty. Guilty about having killed people and guilty because I should have been able to save Ron. I simply failed him," she said acrimoniously. "And now he's dead and it's my fault."

Tom could feel her burying her face in the crook of his neck. As she closed her eyes her eyelashes tickled softly on his skin. There had been so much desperation in her voice. Even worse, conviction. Tom still didn't know what to think about Ron but now he just wanted to make Hermione feel better.

"If Ron was here right now, do you think he would really blame you?" he asked softly.

Hermione didn't answer for a very long time. Just as Tom thought she wasn't going to reply anything at all, she spoke, her voice was muffled as she still leaned against him,

"No... he wouldn't"

She unwrapped her arms from around her knees and slowly slid them around him.

Hermione slung her arms around Tom and held tightly to him. It was reassuring to be able to touch him, to feel his body against hers. Suddenly the unbearable sorrow that had previously burned through her receded. Somehow Tom's words had really made her feel better.

Over and over she had told herself that Ron would never hold it against her. He wouldn't be angry with her nor think that she had failed him. Ron would never blame it on her that Bellatrix had killed him. But the guilt had gnawed at her. So she had tried to convince herself that it wasn't really her fault. There was nothing she could have done to save Ron. That was what Hermione had told herself.

But she had never believed it. Somehow, deep down, she had always blamed herself. Surely she could have done something to prevent Ron and Harry from getting killed.

Hermione still didn't know if she could have somehow saved them. But now Tom's simple words had taken the guilt away. For the first time she had said it out loud: Ron would not blame her. As she had spoken them, those words had felt so true. It was like a revelation. She felt a lot better, so light, without the ever present guilt.
Hermione snuggled closer to Tom. His arms were still slung around her reassuringly. She raised her head from where she had leant it against him and stretched her neck to place an affectionate kiss on the line of his jaw. Tom turned his face so that he was able to look down at her. His eyes were a delicious grey and no trace of red was left. She felt one of his fingers tilting up her chin. Hermione closed her eyes as he leaned down to her. His lips gently brushed against her own and Hermione felt just happy as he kissed her so tenderly.

As he ended the kiss she didn't open her eyes. She just sighed contently to then lean her head against his shoulder. She was incredibly glad that he was with her right now.

Tom was satisfied with the fact that Hermione had allowed him to kiss her and that he had managed to calm her down. She now nestled against him and he could feel how she relaxed as she leaned into him. This whole story about her ex irked him a great deal and it made him almost go crazy with jealousy to know that Hermione obviously still loved Ron, but he wasn't going to rage at her again. He didn't want to invoke that grief again. So Tom rigorously controlled his temper and instead of yelling at her and forcing her to tell him everything about her and Ron, he just wrapped his arms gently around her and held her.

The comfortable silence that wrapped around them was broken not until Hermione spoke again.

"You know, since Ron died everything is different," she told him softly.

Tom stiffened slightly as he heard her words. And he wondered if she meant that her life was different in a bad way. Did she want her life to be like it was before? Did she want Ron back?

Hermione didn't seem to notice how uncomfortable Tom felt but just continued, "Without him, my life is nothing like before. Everything is just upside down. The war is far away. I'm here at Hogwarts. I even made a few new friends. And… I have you," she whispered the last words but they still made Tom relax a little.

"Even my magic is different," Hermione breathed almost inaudible as she tightened her arms around his waist.

Tom furrowed his brow at her last statement. Then he asked confused, "How is your magic different?"

Hermione's head shot up at him. She looked as if she just now realized that she had said the last part out loud.

"I… I…" she mumbled, clearly searching for a way out.

"It's okay. You don't have to tell me," he uncharacteristically offered her.

Hermione looked at him and he could see a strange glint in her hazel eyes. She bit her lip nervously as she scanned him. Tom held his breath as he stared down at her. She seemed to consider something.

After a moment she seemed to have come to a decision. So she told him in an unstable voice, "It's… it's just that after… after Ron died there happened something to my magic. I don't know exactly what it was and I don't know how, but somehow it changed my magic."

"Changed your magic?" Tom asked cautiously.
"Yeah," Hermione continued reluctantly. "I didn't want that. Surely not. But it never left me again. And then it took me here," she finished and left Tom in a state of confusion.

He raised an eyebrow questioningly at her. "What do you mean it took you here?"

"One second I was on the battlefield," she explained, obviously searching for the right words. "Then this power jumped me and ripped at me like it wanted to tear me apart and then I wake up here." As if an afterthought she added, "In England."

"What, you ended up here? From France? But that is too far away to apparate." It made no sense to Tom. Magical ways of travel were surely superior to anything muggle but even magic had its boundaries.

Hermione just looked at him frustrated, clearly thinking that he was slow. Then she tried to explain impatiently,
"I didn't apparate. It was something else. It hurt a lot. I thought I was dying. Actually at that moment I wished I would die. And then I lost my consciousness. After I woke up again I didn't know where I was. But I quickly realized that something was wrong. Then I ended up in London. And, well, after that I applied for Hogwarts. I certainly didn't want to go back. There is nothing there for me anymore."

Tom was excited. He didn't know why she had decided to trust him with so much information now but he was certainly not going to question her openness.

Instead he asked, "You said a 'power' suddenly jumped you. What is it? Where did it come from?"

Hermione broke eye contact and looked away from him.

"I don't know," she said but Tom got the impression that she wasn't telling the whole truth. He let it go for the time being and listened to her go on, "It was suddenly there. Though I realized that only a whole lot later. And now I can even use it sometimes."

Now they seemed to get to something crucial, Tom realized excitedly. But he still managed to make his voice smooth and calm as he asked, "Is that how you can break down wards and apparate through them?"

"Yes." Was her simple answer.

Tom could hear from her voice that she was not going to give him any more. But he still decided to try one more time, "Why did you steal Peverell's book?"

But sure enough Hermione just looked up at him reproachfully. "I told you, didn't I? I have my secrets just like you have yours."

Tom was disappointed that she wasn't going divulge anything else, though she had already told him more than he could ever have expected. He turned his head away from her and looked out at the Great Lake. His arms were still slung around her and he could feel how she huddled against him but his thoughts were elsewhere as he tried to process what information she had given.

So Hermione had gained a mysterious new power and with its help was suddenly able to apparate through wards that were otherwise unbreakable. Was there a connection with Peverell? Or the Deathly Hallows?

Garden Of Eden

Tom was pacing to and fro on the cold stone floor. His steps echoed eerily from the walls. He shortly stopped and looked up at the ceiling. It was so high up that it was lost in the darkness of the chamber, imposing pillars stood like sentries guarding this place. A greenish sheen weakly illuminated the huge stone figure Tom was standing before. His eyes slowly wandered over its face. His ancestor looked indifferently back at him. Tom tore his gaze from Salazar Slytherin and resumed to pace around. He was in the Chamber of Secrets. Or rather, in a very accurate replication of the chamber provided by the Come-And-Go room and his own memory. Since he had found the chamber last year, he had always descended to its calming silence whenever something troubled him. Slytherin's chamber somehow allowed him to better collect his thoughts.

Tom continued to pace around as he let his thoughts drift towards the very problem he sought to solve. Immediately Hermione popped up in his mind. She was still shrouded in mysteries. Though the confessions she had made that day they had arrived back from London had illuminated some of her past. She had spoken of a power which had somehow jumped her. It had 'changed' her magic. Tom wondered what that mysterious power could have been. Hermione obviously knew but didn't want to confide in him. That insight made Tom angry. Hermione had no right to withhold information from him.

Grudgingly, he had to work with what little he got. Whatever origin Hermione's mysterious power had, it definitely was an impressive force. She could do things that were virtually impossible, like breaking down Hogwarts' wards. According to her, this ability was something she had gained very abruptly and very recently during the war in France. Very peculiar, that something could change a person's magic to such extents.

Additionally to this strange new power, there was Hermione's suspicious interest in Peverell. She had risked a lot to steal that book Peverell had written. Why would she do that? Peverell was a prominent figure in wizarding history and was linked to the Deathly Hallows. Peverell and his two brothers were said to be the creators of those fabled objects. Were Hermione and those dark cloaked men who had attacked her after the Hallows?

Tom stopped his restless pacing and leaned against one of the stone pillars. A snake was carved out of the stone and wound elegantly around the cylindric column. He ran a hand over the body of the snake and could feel stony scales adorning it.

To sum it up, Hermione had gained a new power and she was interested in Peverell's work and probably in the Deathly Hallows. Tom pushed away from the pillar and slowly strolled over to Slytherin's statue. He longingly cast a glance at the stony face. Behind the statue's mouth was the entry to the Basilisk's home. If this wasn't just a mere replication, Tom would have been able to summon the great snake. If Dumbledore just wasn't on his case…

Back to the problem at hand. Maybe Hermione's interest in the Deathly Hallows was the key to everything. Tom didn't know, and had a fair amount of doubts, whether the Deathly Hallows really existed. They seemed to be more of a fairy tale than anything else. He shook his head in disgust as he remembered all the esoteric books he had read during his research on the Hallows.

Tom sat down on the pedestal Slytherin's statue was standing on and leaned back, propped up on his arms. Even if the Hallows did not exist, it seemed that at least one of them, the fabled Unbeatable wand, did. Hallow or not, Tom had read a few accounts telling about a wand which was more powerful than any other wand. This wand had left behind actual proof of its existence in history. Unbeatable Wand, Deathstick, Elder Wand... it had many names, but it always had the same properties. It was exceptionally powerful. Whoever was wielding that wand would be virtually invincible.

Incredibly enhanced magic… Tom thought as he stared at the chamber, wrapped in darkness, in front of him.

Didn't he know a certain someone with mysterious magical talents? Someone who could do magic that was impossible? Tom started to wonder about Hermione's wand. Was it possible that she had actually gained the Unbeatable Wand? Was that the reason behind Hermione's incredible magical strength?

Tom ran a hand through his dark hair as his thoughts wandered to Hermione's wand. He remembered how he had once stolen that wand from her. That had been before the Christmas break. He shuddered as he remembered in what circumstances he had taken the wand from her. He had cursed her, stolen her wand and had then even hurled the Torture curse at her. He breathed in deeply, still amazed about how she could have forgiven him.

Back then as he had held her wand, he hadn't noticed anything unusual. Then again, he hadn't used it. So he didn't really know about its powers. Another thought hit him. During the Christmas break, Hermione had apparated the two of them through Diagon Alley's wards. Back then she didn't have her own wand, but she had still been able to break through the impenetrable wards. So in the end her abilities couldn't be ascribed to the Elder Wand, could they?

Still, he shouldn't rule out the possibility. What did he know about the powers of the Elder Wand anyway? Maybe there was a ritual involved when it came to taking possession of the wand. It could very well be possible that the wand and its new owner were irreversibly linked. He had read that it was necessary to beat the previous owner to gain the allegiance of the Elder Wand. By defeating the previous owner maybe a link between wand and wizard was formed, thus changing the new owner's magic?

It pretty much sounded like a dark ritual to Tom and he knew his fair share about Dark Magic. Powerful dark rituals were able to influence a wizard's magic greatly. Something like that could even be able to completely alter the wizard's magic and, combined with the Elder Wand, form something entirely new. After all, anything was possible with Dark Magic.

So being the owner of the Elder Wand could have changed Hermione's entire magic. She had said it herself, hadn't she? Her very magic had been different after something had happened to her during the war. She hadn't told him any details but it could have been the ritual around the Unbeatable Wand she had been talking about.

Still, he definitely needed to re-check the books on the Unbeatable Wand, Tom decided as he walked towards the exit of the Come-and-Go Room. Hermione was not a reliable source of information in this case. But first, he was going to search for her. He hadn't seen her the whole day, aside during meals in the Great Hall. Lately, Tom felt uncomfortable when Hermione wasn't around. So, instead of going to the Library, he turned in the other direction and headed for the Gryffindor common room.

"How did you do that?" Longbottom exclaimed frustrated as he snatched a roll of parchment away from Hermione.

His eyes narrowed as they wandered over the parchment. Then he looked up at her and said reproachfully, "We were supposed to write three foot, Hermione. This-" He held up her parchment. "-is more than four. How do you do that?"
Now Weasley, who sat on the sofa right beside Longbottom, took the parchment from him and he, too, scanned Hermione's writing.

"And your script is tiny and narrow," he said awed. "I only managed to write two foot. And look, I really tried to put as much space between the words as possible."

As if to prove his statement he pointed to a scrap of parchment which was covered to only one third with his spidery writing. Hermione chuckled, then she leaned forward and took her parchment away from Weasley.

"This was about the different properties of the ingredients used in the Ortus potion," she explained in a mock condescending voice. "I couldn't wait to write it. It's so fascinating."

Yeah, fascinating and dangerous, she thought frustrated as she glared at the essay Slughorn had asked them to write in last potion class. As she looked up again she found the two boys frowning at her as if she were insane, while Lupin, who sat on a chair beside their sofa, chuckled softly.

Longbottom sighed tiredly, laid a hand on Hermione's shoulder and said with false graveness, "It seems you are just crazy. But don't worry. As soon as we find a cure against it, you'll be the first to be healed."

"If you continue to not do your homework at all, you'll never find a cure against anything," Hermione grinned at him triumphantly as she held up his, still empty, parchment.

Longbottom huffed indignantly and then tried to get the parchment away from her. Hermione had seen this one coming and pulled it out of his reach while giggling.

"Hey, give it here," Longbottom ordered, though his commanding aura was ruined as he had to laugh, too.

She still held the parchment out of his reach, so Longbottom started to tickle her teasingly. Hermione laughed even harder.

Their playful banter came to an abrupt standstill as someone sat down between them on the sofa, neatly separating them. Hermione glimpsed dark hair, pale skin and the unmistakable green colours of Slytherin house. Then there was an arm around her shoulders and Tom pulled her possessively against him. Hermione looked up at him and found him glaring angrily at Longbottom who had by now slid away from Tom on the sofa and looked at him in disgust.

"What are you doing here?" she miffed at Tom.

He turned his head, looked haughtily down at her and then informed her in his smooth voice, "I can do whatever I want."

Hermione rolled her eyes. "Look, I was in the middle of doing my homework here," she said in a clipped tone and pushed him slightly away from her.

Tom didn't let her push him away but still held her tightly as he narrowed his eyes at her.

"Didn't look like homework to me," he said with a touch of asperity. Then he continued in a ridiculing tone, "Besides you really shouldn't do your homework with those dunces."

Hermione just growled at him which, sadly, also didn't make him release her.

"What do you want here, Riddle?" Longbottom intervened into their conversation; his voice had lost all jocoseness and turned into a sharp hiss.

"Don't get your hopes up. I'm not here because you," replied Tom mockingly.

Then he stood up, grabbed Hermione's arm and tried to pull her, rather harshly, up from the sofa. By now she was peeved by his behaviour and resisted him.

"Stop that!" Longbottom bellowed at Tom indignantly and jumped up from his position on the sofa as he saw this rough treatment of Hermione.

Tom let go of Hermione and turned around to Longbottom. There was a dangerous glint in his eyes as he scanned the Gryffindor hatefully. Longbottom was standing in front of Tom and Hermione got the impression that he was about to attack the Slytherin any second now. She sighed softly.

"Stop treating her like this!" Longbottom barked irately.

A condescending smirk took form on Tom's face as he now looked at the Gryffindor coldly.

"Listen. She is my girlfriend," Tom told him smugly. "So, it's none of your business how I treat her."

"And she's my friend!" Longbottom thundered at Tom, his face purple from anger. Then he took a step towards Tom and threatened, "You better not hurt her again, Riddle."

"Pff, like you could stop me," Tom replied in a perfectly calm voice, though Hermione could hear the fury underlying his cold exterior.

With dread Hermione noticed how her dorm mates, Rose, Lucia and Viola, sat on a sofa nearby. They seemed to follow this dispute with quite the enthusiasm. Hermione wondered in vexation if she should offer them some popcorn and ask them if they enjoyed the show. Then her gaze wandered back to Tom and Longbottom. She groaned as now Weasley and Lupin had joined them, glaring murderously at Tom. During all this, Tom still managed to keep his face impenetrably blank though Hermione did notice a malevolent glint in his eyes. Longbottom reached for his wand and Tom pulled his own wand. Finally, Hermione lost her cool.

"That's it!" she yelled at them.

They looked at her and stopped their attempts to murder each other. The indifferent mask still covered Tom's face but he raised one eyebrow at her questioningly.

As if he doesn't know what's wrong, Hermione thought infuriated.

"I've about had it now. Stop being so immature," she growled at them. Then she flung her hands up in frustration, turned to the angry Slytherin and hissed, "We were just doing homework, Tom. What's wrong with that?"

"Why do you need to do your homework with them?" he shot back. Then he eyed Longbottom and said in a condescending voice. "It's not like they are any help."

As a result, Longbottom's face turned a few shades more purple and he glared at Tom, looking ready to commit murder. Tom was not impressed by this hostility at all but twirled his wand nonchalantly through his fingers. Hermione just narrowed her eyes angrily at them.

She finally snapped and clamoured at the both of them, "If you want to kill each other, go ahead. But don't pull me into this."
Then she turned around and stormed away. She had barely left the common room and stepped through the portrait hole before Tom fell in step beside her. That didn't stop her from brusquely stomping down the corridor, though.

Hermione tried her best to ignore Tom but after some time he said in an innocent tone, "So you don't mind if I kill him?"

Hermione turned her head and glared at him darkly.

"I'll have your head if you try that," she hissed at him enraged.

Tom raised his hands in surrender while he said, not at all sounding ashamed of himself, "Okay okay, calm down."

Hermione just narrowed her eyes at him dangerously and their conversation frizzled out. It was a pity that he seemed to be immune to her glare, she decided as she looked at Tom's, yet again, blank face.

After a while her anger had built up enough and she was not longer able to remain silent, so she inquired impatiently, "Why?"

Tom only glanced at her questioningly and asked in an infuriatingly innocent voice, "Why what?"

"Why do you feel the need to always try to sabotage my friendships?" Hermione inquired in a rather clipped voice.

The blank look disappeared from his face and a rather nasty smile replaced it, "Because I don't like those gits."

At his exclamation Hermione rolled her eyes at him in exasperation but before she could get in a sharp reply, Tom continued his rant, "They are as stupid as Gryffindors can get. And did you see how Longbottom always tries to protect you from me? It's ridiculous."

"Yeah," Hermione replied, her voice now thick with sarcasm, "I wonder whoever gave him the idea that there is the need to protect me from you." She looked at him pointedly.

"Maybe they aren't good friends if they don't trust your judgment," Tom replied stiffly.

Hermione didn't take his bait. She was tired of playing his game.

"Tom, I really don't care what you think of them," she told him in a sharp voice. "I don't expect you to like them. However, I do expect you not to bother my friends."

She could see him balling his hands into fists after her declaration. Of course, he didn't like to hear that, but Hermione thought it was necessary.

"And by the way, I never said anything about your more than dubious acquaintances," Hermione continued, a cold edge had now appeared in her voice.

Tom's eyes wandered back to her and he stared at her in indignation and a good amount of anger.

"I don't like those guys at all," Hermione said in a clipped tone. "Avery for example. He always looks at me in a creepy way. Or Lestrange, he even cursed me if you remember. But I never told you to stay away from them, have I?"

By now she could feel bits of Tom's dark magic bristling in the air, but she wasn't impressed at all.
"But my friends don't try to seduce me," he finally replied in a steel hard voice.

Hermione stared at him and then deadpanned, "I wouldn't be so sure about that, if I were you. Have you ever seen that longing glint in Malfoy's eyes whenever he looks at you?"

Even though the situation was far from funny, she had to stop herself from bursting out in laughter as she saw how Tom's mouth was pressed into a thin line. He glared at her, clearly annoyed now.

"I'm serious here," he finally hissed reproachfully.

"No, you are not," Hermione replied dryly. "You are being silly."

After that Tom just looked at her sullenly and didn't reply anything.

"I'm going back to the common room," she informed him in an offhand tone. "And you are not going to disturb me again," she added sternly, which made the look on his face even darker.

Tom didn't reply, but just turned around and angrily stomped down the corridor without looking back at her. Hermione sighed softly. Maybe he had for now stopped to argue, but she was pretty sure that he wouldn't just let it go like this.

Of course she was right. As Tom marched down the corridor his thoughts flew back to that image of Hermione and Longbottom on the sofa. She had laughed so gaily while that insufferable Gryffindor berk had touched her. And she still insisted on telling him that their relationship was purely platonic?

Ridiculous! Tom huffed.

This incident had been the last straw. He wouldn't allow this to continue. He didn't like it at all how very little control he had over Hermione. Now she even started to order him around, Tom realized frustrated as he found himself walking away from the Gryffindor common room, just like she had told him to.

Her probable ownership of the Unbeatable Wand and her not telling him about it, irked him, but that relationship she had with those Gryffindor boys infuriated him to no end. Before he tried to find out more about her mysterious power, he first needed to ensure that Hermione didn't leave him for one of those berks.

At that thought he could feel his magic starting to course through him angrily. He could barely stand it whenever Hermione was out of his sight. To top it off she was now back in the Gryffindor common room. Together with all her friends.

Her male friends, an inner voice hissed at him, inciting him to take action.

Since that incident when she had told him about her ex, Tom had been overwhelmed by a greedy and jealous feeling whenever he saw her speaking with another guy. It made him extremely uncomfortable to see her interacting with males. It actually made him want to rush to her and curse whomever she had been conversing with. It was a pity that Hermione was such a headstrong woman; otherwise he could have just cursed all those gits around her and gotten away with it. But as it was, Hermione would never tolerate such behaviour.

Why were all of her friends male anyway? he wondered not for the first time. As he so thought about her stupid Gryffindor friends something Longbottom had said came to mind. Normally, Tom wouldn't put much importance to anything that jerk came up with but surprisingly enough this one thing had stuck. It had happened after Slughorn's last party that Longbottom had yelled at Tom enraged.
'She's not really your girlfriend,' Longbottom had hissed angrily. 'It's only a matter of time and she'll ditch you.'

Back then Tom hadn’t taken it seriously because it had seemed to be utterly ridiculous that Hermione would ever leave him. But know…

Tom shuddered as he remembered that expression on Hermione’s face as she had spoken about Ron. It had been so sad and forlorn, that expression on her face, and so full of love.

Tom's hands balled into tight fists and he didn't stop his magic from crackling around him murderously. He didn't even care to suppress this angry torrent of magic as a bunch of third year Hufflepuffs came running down the same corridor he was in. They all stared at the angry Slytherin with scared, wide eyes, but Tom was not in the mood to act the innocent prefect. His thoughts still danced around Hermione and her relationship with Ron. Even if that person had somehow died, as she had claimed, she obviously still loved him. Hermione was not permitted to love anybody but Tom. He was certainly not going to share her with anyone.

Again Longbottom's words came back to him, 'It's only a matter of time and she'll ditch you.' That was ludicrous; Tom tried to calm himself down. After all, who would ever want to leave him? Seriously? Wasn't he the best looking guy here in Hogwarts? He was a prefect, the teachers simply loved him. He was friends with everybody and every female in this castle fancied him. Why in Merlin's name would anybody ditch him? He was the perfect boyfriend.

Lies! an obnoxious, little voice whispered to him.

Yeah, so what? Maybe he had spun a net of lies around him. He had created this persona of the perfect, charming young man who is utterly innocent and completely harmless. It worked, didn't it? This persona. No-one had ever bothered to look underneath his web of lies.

Tom descended the stairs to the dungeons with determined steps, though, he didn't feel as confident as he would like to appear. It was true, wasn't it? Everybody fell for this façade he had put up around him.

Everybody, aside from Hermione, the little voice informed him generously.

Tom could feel his stomach constrict painfully. But it was true. Hermione had made his façade crumble and she had taken a look behind. She knew so much about him. And she certainly knew that the person he acted in Hogwarts was not at all who he truly was. She knew about his darker tendencies as he had, in fact, thrown more than enough dark curses her way. Hermione had seen the evilness behind his perfect façade. She knew that he was not innocent and amiable but dark and mean. Aside from that darkness she also knew about his weakness. There were not many people who had ever seen him in such a weakened state as Hermione had. After all, she had rescued him from that horrible orphanage and he had been pathetically weak back then.

Only a matter of time and she will ditch me, Tom thought numbly. After all the things she knew about him, it was actually a mystery that she had wanted to become his girlfriend in the first place. On top of that there still was Ron. He was the one Hermione really wanted.

…maybe she's going to grow tired of me…

But he was never going to let her leave him! he thought determinedly as he walked through the dark corridors of the dungeons. Even if he had to curse her and force her to stay with him, Tom would never allow her to abandon him. Though it might be better to first try a less violent and more sophisticated way.

How could he make her stay by his side? Tom was faced with a problem he had never met before. He knew how to threaten people into doing what he wanted them to do. He knew how to force people and bend them to his will. But with Hermione this was not an option. If he tried something like this, she would surely leave him.

He felt helpless and insecure about the whole thing. Something he didn't appreciate at all.

What made that Ron guy so special anyway? he wondered infuriated. After all Ron seemed to have received Hermione's love. What if at some point in time another guy walked by and she would decide to go for him? At that thought Tom really had to work to suppress his boiling emotions. Maybe he couldn't force her to abandon her friends, but he could ensure that she never did more with them than friendship would suggest. If Hermione never had the chance to converse with any potential rivals to Tom's position, then she would never leave him.

It was time to have another of those little meetings with his knights, Tom decided as he stopped before the entrance to the Slytherin common room. Then he hissed in a low voice, "Pullus."

Immediately the wall in front of him slid away, thus opening the entrance into the room. Tom strode into the room behind. His gaze swiftly wandered over the common room. The unobtrusive greenish colour of the wallpapers and the invitingly soft black leather couches had a soothing effect on his nerves. Something quite welcome after having to suffer through this lurid colour attack in the Gryffindor common room.

As Tom's gaze swept over the room he noticed that many of the Slytherins present were looking at him in a scared way. He then realized that his angry dark magic still swirled around him. Tom quite enjoyed the intimidated and reverent looks that were cast his way. Sadly, he didn't have time right now to revel in their fear. So, he strutted through the room towards one of the couches standing in the far end. He had spotted Avery and Black sitting in this corner of the room. As they noticed him approaching them they instantly stopped their chatter and stared at him. A vile smirk appeared on Tom's face as he saw something like fear in their eyes.

Finally he stood before them and looked down at them imperiously before he said in a low voice, "There's a meeting now. Get the others."

They immediately nodded at him obediently but Tom wasn't paying attention anymore. He had already turned around to leave the common room again. They knew where they would meet and they also knew what would happen to them if they let him wait. So, Tom wasn't surprised as his knights caught up with him even before he had reached the Come-and-Go room. They didn't say anything as they reached him but just continued to follow him in a deferential distance.

Just a few minutes later, Tom strolled through the Come-and-Go room which had transformed into a huge hall. Its floor was tiled with polished black flagstones. His heels clacked authoritatively as he walked over to a wooden throne-like chair. His gaze wandered swiftly over the dimly lit room. Fat candles stood in small alcoves, which were recessed into the stony, windowless walls of the room. Their flames burned in a flickering light, letting eerie shadows dance over the ceiling. The blood red wax of the candles trickled slowly down the wall and on the black floor.

Tom sat down on the throne-like chair and leaned lazily against the high backrest. Then he let his cold eyes slowly wander over the group in front of him. His knights had gathered around him, forming a semi-circle, and were now looking at him respectfully. A vicious smile tugged at his mouth as he spotted a readiness to follow whatever orders he would give them.
"My knights," Tom began in a quiet and even placid voice. "-again it is too long since last we met."

His gaze grew cold and hard as it continued to wandered over the young men in front of him, making them squirm. As Tom spoke next all softness had left his voice, "You did not presume I had forgotten about you, did you?"

His knights muttered hastily how they would never presume something like that and assured him their loyalty. Tom raised a hand to shut them up.

"I did not summon you, to listen to you sniveling away," he hissed. Then his grey eyes narrowed and a smirk twisted up his mouth. "I have job for you."

He again let his eyes wander over them and noticed satisfied how they stiffened under his gaze.

"I want you to keep an eye on Hermione DeCerto. She's mine now and I don't appreciate it very much when people are getting too close to her. I want you to make sure that no-one bothers her. Especially any males." Tom's dark glare rested unwavering on his knights.

His knights bowed to him, as a sign that they would obey his command. Then Lestrange took a step forward, fell on one knee and didn't dare to look up at Tom as he asked in a shaky voice, "Please, can you reveal to us, why DeCerto is so important?"

Tom didn't answer but just stared at Lestrange. The other still didn't dare to look at Tom but remained kneeling on the floor. He squirmed uncomfortably as Tom remained to be silent. The pressure in the air slowly spiraled up until it was unbearable and Lestrange again spoke.

His fear was now overtly present in his voice as he continued, "She is just a Gryffindor. If you want to extract information from her, we could be of help."

Tom snickered darkly. Then he stood up from his chair and slowly strutted over to Lestrange. The evil grin on his face widened as he saw Lestrange bowing his head even lower. Tom stopped as he stood a metre away from the other.

"You dare question my orders?" he whispered softly at the crouched figure in front of him.

Lestrange's head shot up at him and there was panic present on his face as he frantically tried to explain, "No, never. I was just… just offering our help."

In one swift motion Tom pulled his wand and waved it at Lestrange. The force behind Tom's magic hit the other violently and hurled him to the floor. Lestrange grunted painfully.

Tom put his wand away again and a mercilessly hard tint was in his voice as he sneered, "I do not need you to offer me anything. I take what I want."

Without waiting for any reply from Lestrange, he turned around and walked back to his chair while stating, his words laced with frost, "Whenever I'm not around Hermione, I want at least one of you to guard her. You are going to escort her to her class rooms, to the Great Hall, to her common room or to wherever the hell she wants to go. If you ever see anyone getting too close or even touching her, you are going to deal with that person. Understood?"

His knights instantly muttered their affirmations. Tom reached the chair and gracefully sat down again.

"Though don't be mistaken," he continued in a voice that made sure he wouldn't tolerate any disobedience here. "You are to guard her and to stop any guys from approaching her. However, I won't tolerate it if you start to attack her. If you ever force her to do anything she doesn't want to do or if you curse her or hurt her in any way, I will make sure that you regret it very much."

His knights shuffled fearfully as they heard the threatening touch in his voice.

"So if she gets pissed by your presence or just feels bored and decides to curse you, you are not going to counter-attack. I don't care if it's something harmful she throws your way, you will just take it and after that continue with your mission."

The young men in front of him bowed their heads subserviently. Then one of them spoke.

"What about her friends?" Avery inquired tentatively as if he expected Tom to attack him any second. "Are we allowed to curse them?"

Tom just chuckled maliciously. "I don't give a damn about her stupid friends." Indifference seeped into his voice. "If one of them dares to do something fishy, then you stop them with whatever force necessary."

An evil smile appeared on Tom's face as he added, "Be prepared though. For some inexplicable reasons, Hermione is very fond of her idiotic Gryffindor friends. So it's highly likely that she will react hostile to anyone attacking them."

February turned into March and slowly winter released its hold on Hogwarts castle. Snow and ice finally melted away. Although the Scottish weather was still somewhat chilly, it had lost its biting coldness. So, weeks went by, and nothing changed in Tom's behaviour. If anything it just got worse. During those weeks there were a few incidents that made Hermione's patience wear very thin...

"Hermione, that git is trying to control your whole life," Longbottom huffed at her.

He was right, Hermione had to admit. It did get slowly on her nerves as well. Sadly, she had no idea how to stop Tom's foolish behaviour. He had always been very jealous, but this situation was just unbearable. Since he had found out that she had had a boyfriend before him, and especially since he knew that she had slept with Ron, Tom was unbearably possessive. It was rather arduous dealing with him right now. He didn't tolerate anyone near her. Now he knew that she could like other guys he probably was afraid he could lose her.

Hermione looked back at Longbottom. He was frowning at her. She knew that he was still concerned about her. He didn't trust Tom at all. More like hated him, actually. Ever since he had seen that bruise on her face which she had received from Grindelwald's men, Longbottom was convinced that Tom was mistreating her. It was ridiculous but whatever Hermione told to soothe him, the Gryffindor didn't believe her.

"Tom's just going through a lot lately. He'll get over it," Hermione told Longbottom, trying to calm him down.

"So he's going through a lot, is he?" Longbottom sneered and Hermione could hear the scorn dripping from every word.

He wrapped an arm around her shoulders as he continued, sounding as if he tried to convince her of something quite obvious, "Riddle's treating you like he owns you. You shouldn't defend his behaviour."

Hermione looked up at him but before she had the chance to reply, someone cleared his throat behind them. Longbottom unwrapped his arm from her and turned around to whomever had interrupted them like that. As Hermione turned, she found Malfoy standing in the corridor. Wherever had he popped up from?

"Don't touch her," was the only thing Malfoy said as he stared at Longbottom.

Hermione furrowed her brow at the blond Slytherin. What did he want here? Normally he pretty much ignored her and her friends. Malfoy's emotionless eyes wandered now from Longbottom to her. He shortly bowed to her, which made her feel slightly uncomfortable, then he offered in a cold and distanced voice,

"Lunch is about to be served. I would be pleased to accompany you to the Great Hall."

_How very polite_, Hermione thought as she pressed her mouth into a thin line. Anger started to flow through her as she stared at the blond Slytherin in front of her. She shortly imagined Draco Malfoy ever talking so civilly to her. The shock would have surely killed her, Hermione decided dryly.

By now, though, she was pretty sure Tom had put this Malfoy up to... _what? Guarding me?_

Whatever Tom tired to achieve here, he was sailing very close to the wind, if he thought he could control her through his lackeys.

---

Tom sat in the Library, and he was in a sour mood. Hermione had told him to leave her alone as she obviously needed 'some time for herself'. That was ridiculous, he thought enraged as his fingers drummed angrily against the table. If she needed time for herself, then she could have that but right here where he could see her. To top it off she had gone to her common room. That was the only place where his knights couldn't follow her.

Thus far, his plan of constantly observing her worked rather well. The only down side was that she seemed to be rather miffed by his knights following her. As a consequence she was a little bit thin-skinned lately. She had even cursed Alba the other day. Tom grinned as he remembered that missing chunk of hair on Alba's head. The grin quickly died as he wondered why Alba had felt the need to attack one of her friends in the first place. Had one of those gits tried to touch her? Had he embraced Hermione?

… would she have liked it?
Tom groaned in frustration as he flipped through another book, not taking anything in as his thoughts still circled around Hermione.

She had surely liked it whenever her fiancé had embraced her. She had actually liked to do a lot more with that guy. Unbidden images of Hermione in bed with another guy swirled through his mind. Tom's hand balled into a tight fist, thus crumbling the page of the book he was just reading in.

He forcefully tried to concentrate on the book again. It was just one paragraph later that he again wondered about Hermione. What if she suddenly decided that Tom was no adequate replacement for her almost-husband? He was quite the bother, actually. There were all his problems with Dumbledore, for example. That had eventually resulted in the transfiguration teacher hating Hermione, too. Tom knew how fond Hermione had been of the professor. On top of that, a huge part of the female population of the castle still hated her just because Tom spent time with her. What if she decided he was not worth the trouble?

Tom closed the book in front of him with a loud and determined thud. He got up from his place at the library table and waved his wand casually at the books in front of him so that they soared back to their places on the shelf. Then he took off in direction of the Gryffindor common room. Surely Hermione had had by now enough 'alone time', hadn't she?

---

"So, what do you want to do now?" Tom asked Hermione. "We could sneak out to Hogsmeade."

Hermione just stared at him incredulously. "You are kidding, right?"

Tom's expression told her otherwise, though.

"I am not sneaking out of the castle. And neither are you, Tom," she ordered sternly. "They are going to expel us if we do that again. And by the way I still need to do my Care of Magical Creatures essay. So I'll be off to the common room."

Before she could stalk away, Tom managed to grab her arm. He narrowed his eyes at her and then asked in a sharp tone, "Why do you need to do that in the common room? We could go to the Library."

Hermione just rolled her eyes at him. "Because then you'll finally stop bothering me," she mocked him gently. Then she continued seriously, "We are not even in the same Care of Magical Creatures class. Why should we do the homework together?"

Tom just snorted at her, "I'm pretty sure we have to do the exact same essay. Kettleburn is a lazy bastard."

Hermione raised her eyebrows at him reproachfully as she heard him badmouthing a teacher like that. In reality though, she wasn't really fond of Kettleburn herself. His class was a hazard actually. There was not one lesson where no student, or the professor himself, got somehow hurt.

So she didn't defend the professor but just said, "I'm still going to the common room. I don't have my school bag with me right now."

"I can give you some of my parchment," Tom tried to convince her.

Finally Hermione lost her nerve and said in a clipped tone, "I'm not doing my homework together with you again. That's just pointless."
"Why?" Tom asked before a haughty smile curled up his mouth. "I'm the best student in Hogwarts. What better homework partner could you hope for?"

"You are not the best student. That would be me," Hermione's expression was now nearly as haughty as Tom's.

But then she had to think about the last time she had done her homework together with Tom. That had been a horrible experience. They had written an Arithmancy essay for professor Gauß. Hermione was really good in Arithmancy. Honestly! For this essay they had had to describe a rather difficult derivation rule for arithmetic calculations. So, she had gotten the books necessary for the job, had read them, re-checked with other sources, had tried to summarize everything and then she had started to write her essay. It had not been easy to say the least.

In the mean time, though, Tom had sat there right beside her at the table and had done just nothing. He had doodled on his roll of parchment and had occasionally watched her trying to make any sense out of the books she read. It had quite aggravated her. Her only consolation had been that at least her essay would be a lot better than his.

It had been a good solid two hours after she had started, that Tom had shown signs of doing any work himself. Hermione had been adding the last finishing touches to her essay as Tom had lazily flipped through a book, clearly not really paying attention, then he had started to write. They had finished the work at the same time, though Tom's essay had been half as long as her own. By that time, she had been rather annoyed by his lack of seriousness when it came to homework. She would have scolded him, but back then she had thought the low mark for his essay would be punishment enough.

The worst part of the story was that, in the end, Tom had gotten a better mark than herself. She had then sworn never to do school work together with him. It was frustrating, if anything.

"I'm not working with you again. You are just doing it wrong."

"Excuse me?" Tom raised an eyebrow at her.

"I'm better off without your 'help'," Hermione clarified.

With that she turned around and again walked away.

"Wait," Tom called after her.

Next, Hermione could feel an arm being slung around her waist. Tom had followed her and had again stopped her from walking away. His arm was now wrapped around her waist and his chest was pressed against her back. Hermione's annoyance about Tom's possessiveness abated quickly and was replaced by a tingling feeling in her stomach as she could feel him so near.

"After you're finished with your essay, you'll come back to me," he disguised his order quite well as he whispered seductively into her ear.

Hermione felt herself nod. She didn't even notice how Tom snapped his fingers at Black, who leaned against the corridor wall, not far away. Black inclined his head obediently at Tom, then he pushed away from the wall and followed Hermione as she walked towards her common room.

Hermione entered the DADA class room. Before she could walk over to her place at a table with Longbottom, Weasley and Lupin a hand held her back. Hermione turned her head and looked... questioningly at Tom. He just grabbed her wrist and started to pull her over to the Slytherin side of the room.

"Tom, what-?"

"I want you to sit at my table," was all he gave as explanation.

At that point in time professor McGray entered the classroom. Hermione didn't want to start an argument with Tom right in front of her professor so she followed him over to his table. With a wave of his hand Tom shooed Lestrange away from his place, to then draw the chair out for Hermione. By now, she was very annoyed.

... so, yes, the few weeks that followed Hermione's 'confession' about her former relationship with Ron had been a real pain in her side...

Tom walked down a corridor in direction of the Library. It was pretty late already but he hoped he could manage to convince Ms Peters to let him enter. If that didn't work, he could still sneak into the Library, he thought smugly. Either way, he needed to go through the books on the Deathly Hallows. He was especially interested in the Unbeatable Wand. If there was any ritual involved to gain the wands service, it had to be written down somewhere. Maybe he had overlooked it before. Which was unlikely, he thought haughtily, but he would still check it over.

The more he thought on the matter, the more he was convinced that Hermione had somehow gained the Elder Wand. He knew that she was a rather strong witch but skill alone wouldn't explain how she broke down Hogwarts' wards. Irritation bubbled up in him. Why was Hermione not open with him? He should just steal her wand from her and see if it was the Elder Wand.

Yeah, and then she's going to murder you, a voice scoffed at him dryly.

Though, that would be difficult without a wand, wouldn't it?

Tom sighed tiredly. There was no way he could get the wand from her. She would never forgive him something like that. It seemed he had to take the old fashioned way and sneak the information from her. After all, he didn't end up in Slytherin for nothing.

Tom's train of thought was interrupted as he heard steps echoing in the deserted corridor. He looked up and saw one of Hermione's friends walking towards him. Of course it had to be Longbottom. Tom wrinkled his nose in disgust as his gaze wandered over him. The Gryffindor seemed to have noticed him, too, and glared at Tom darkly. Tom chose to just ignore him. He probably should curse Longbottom, just to make a point, but he somehow wasn't in the mood. It wouldn't be a challenge, anyway, to attack him. He was disgustingly weak. Tom looked the other way, determined to not pay any attention to the stupid Gryffindor. He tried to not think about the fact that he, yet again, did exactly what Hermione had ordered him to do.

Tom passed the Gryffindor and had taken a few steps away from him as he suddenly heard Longbottom yell at him indignantly, "How can you strut around the place after what you did to Hermione?"

Tom slowly turned around to him, just to find Longbottom glowering at him in anger. It was time to play his role of the responsible prefect again, Tom decided. So he just tilted his head and pasted an expression of mild curiosity on his face.

"You shouldn't talk to a prefect in that sort of voice. I might feel offended and take points from your house," he said politely.

With satisfaction Tom noted how the blond's face erupted into a grimace of fury. Then he turned around, intending to resume his way to the Library.

However, he was held back by Longbottom's enraged voice, "Don't you notice how you are bothering Hermione?"

Tom's eyes narrowed dangerously and an angry twitch rippled through his magic, but he schooled his features as he turned and faced the Gryffindor.

"I am bothering her?" he replied in a calm but now unmistakably cold voice. "Did she tell you that?"

Longbottom shot back angrily, "She's much too kind to ever say anything bad about another person. But it's quite obvious how she is bugged by you."

"Funny, that she is still my girlfriend if she doesn't like me," Tom's voice was by now low and dangerous, not wanting to play the nice prefect anymore.

Longbottom didn't seem to notice the change in his behaviour and he yelled at Tom, indignation tinting his tone, "We all know that you are forcing her to stay with you!"

An evil smirk twisted up Tom's handsome features as he now cruelly scoffed at the Gryffindor, "I don't need to force her. She seems to enjoy my presence very much." To infuriate Longbottom even more, Tom added a suggestive wink.

Sure enough Longbottom's right hand twitched angrily as if he wanted to pull his wand. That would be fine by him, Tom thought in cold amusement.

The amusement, though, left him quickly as Longbottom bellowed at him, "Don't delude yourself, Riddle. Someone like Hermione is too good for you. She'll realize that and then she's going to leave you."

As Tom heard that, a thought again flew through his mind. Only a matter of time and she'll ditch me.

Suddenly, his dark magic rushed through him forcefully and fuelled his anger even more. Though there was another emotion embedded in it, but Tom was too aggravated to notice that fearful knot in his stomach.

Instead of analyzing his feelings, he sneered at Longbottom, "She's never going to leave me. I won't allow that!"

"You lousy bastard!" Longbottom clamoured at him enraged. "What are you going to do if she wants to leave you? Slap her again?"

His face was taking an angry shade of purple and he was obviously seething with anger by now. Tom didn't care and just looked at him with a smirk curling up his mouth.

"Leave Hermione alone!" the blonde Gryffindor bellowed at Tom. "I won't allow you to hurt her again!"
"I'm in a bad mood as it is. I wouldn't advise you to exacerbate me further," Tom finally said in an eerily soft voice.

By now he didn't stop his magic to swirl balefully around him. It ripped at himself as much as it seemed to disturb Longbottom. His magic wanted to be set free, it wanted to attack the Gryffindor. Tom could feel a detached coldness wrapping around his mind and restrictions fell from him. Hermione's angry face, as she had told him to keep away from her friends, was pushed into a dark recess of Tom's mind.

It was then that Longbottom, too, seemed to lose the last bit of his control, pulled his wand from his pocket and pointed it threateningly at Tom.

"So you can go and vent your anger on her?" he roared at Tom. Then he waved his wand angrily and yelled,

"Stupefy!"

Tom was prepared. At some point during this dispute he, too, had pulled his wand though he hadn't been as obvious as Longbottom. Now he waved his wand slightly and the red light of Longbottom's stunner flickered and died before it even had the chance to reach Tom. Tom's magic was dancing around him violently, in consent with his dark intentions. A sinister smirk tugged at the corners of his mouth. He waved his wand in a small casual movement, thus casting a nonverbal Silencing spell and some warding magic over the part of the corridor they were standing in. The smile on Tom's face widened. He didn't have to hold back anymore. Longbottom's behaviour had irked him for far too long already. No-one was allowed to speak to Lord Voldemort like that. With cruel amusement, Tom observed the Gryffindor waving his wand again. He didn't even have to hear the incantation to recognize this weak spell.

"Impedimenta!" Longbottom yelled, as if the force of the spell would be intensified by raising the volume of his voice.

Tom just lazily brandished his wand, as if he were waving away a bothersome insect. The jinx never reached him, but impacted harmlessly with the corridor wall. With an unsavory smile on his face, Tom stared at the surprise present on the Gryffindor's face.

The blond again waved his wand in crude movements while bellowing, "Incendio!"

A cold, high pitched laugh escaped Tom's mouth in face of the other's incompetence. He twirled his wand to deflect the harmless spell. It collided with a tapestry hanging on the corridor wall, causing blazing hot flames to lick at the material. Did this fool want to continue throwing childish curses at him? Tom's hand tightened impatiently around his wand.

The Gryffindor then barked his next spell, "Incarce-!"

This time, Tom didn't let him finish the spell. He raised his own wand in one sharp movement, allowing his magic to flow through the wooden stick and form into a curse. His magic eagerly followed his command and wrapped itself around Longbottom. A mad glint appeared in Tom's eyes as he felt his magic completely engulfing the Gryffindor, thus rendering him unable to move. Tom swished his wand in one angry movement to his right side so that the tip now pointed at the wall. Simultaneously, the magic wrapped around Longbottom followed Tom's wand movement and Longbottom's body was hurled like a puppet against the window beside him. The glass cracked loudly but didn't break. Longbottom groaned painfully as he fell down to the ground at the foot of the window. There was a web of cracks in the glass of the window. Twisted satisfaction ran through Tom as he saw that pain on Longbottom's face. His dark magic, though, still rushed through Tom, angrily demanding to cause more devastation. Tom sneered at Longbottom's fallen form. There was a mixture of fear and rage on the other's face.

_Not afraid enough, yet._

Tom brandished his wand in a complicated pattern. This time he preferred to speak the incantation out loud, just to be on the save side, "Malusdeus."

Instantly, the torches flickered and an unnatural darkness fell over the corridor. The shadows, cast by the dying flames, grew darker. Tom snickered coldly as he saw the panic on the Gryffindor's face. Tom's own shadow was by now pitch-black and twitched oddly, even though Tom hadn't moved at all. It was then that a strangely distorted hand seemed to rise from the shadow. Like the shadow, the hand was pitch-black, sucking up all the light around it. An arm soon followed and then a dark figure detached itself from Tom's shadow. At first it consisted only of the deformed upper part of a body. Slowly the figure pulled itself fully from Tom's shadow. It now had the shape of a human being, though there were no features discernible and its contour was blurred, while the whole form flickered strangely. A small wisp of white light, broken by black strands, was embedded in the middle of the torso, pulsating irregularly. The shadow had by now straightened up completely and stood in the middle of the corridor. All light seemed to be sucked into the pitch-black creature so that the corridor grew steadily darker.

Tom grinned evilly as he saw a look of horror on Longbottom's face. Then he turned to his creature. There were actually just a few commands the creature would accept. One of them was 'Kill!'. Though sadly Tom couldn't use that. So he, reluctantly, used another one.

"Extundo," he whispered to the shadow.

The creature followed his command. It began to move towards the Gryffindor. Its motions were oddly mechanical and abrupt as it crept towards Longbottom. While its shape held some resemblance to a human being, its movements were just wrong and made the human-like appearance seem to be hideously out of place. Tom watched contently how his creature slowly advanced on Longbottom, who seemed utterly scared now. The Dark Magic from the spell still rippled through Tom. It was a cold pressure swirling around him and enforcing his magic greatly. It felt good.

By now the shadow had reached Longbottom. Its motions didn't gain in speed as it steadily bent down to him and slowly latched onto him. Longbottom tried to push it away, but it was completely useless. The creature wasn't at all influenced by Longbottom's struggle.

Tom's cold laughter echoed from the corridor walls as he heard Longbottom's painful screams. Wherever the creature touched him, Longbottom's skin lost its colour and paled sickly. It seemed like all life was driven away by the creature's touch. Now the creature's arms had snaked completely around Longbottom's form and his screams intensified as he tried to push it away. Tom watched exited how the Gryffindor began to sink into the shadow. He would very much like to see Longbottom be completely sucked into the shadow, but that would be too much. Tom wouldn't be able to explain the sudden disappearance of a student.

So, Tom strolled towards Longbottom while he hissed in a low voice towards the dark creature, "Quiesce."

The creature heard his order, but it only reluctantly released its victim. As Tom reached them the creature's arms were still grabbing Longbottom. Tom positioned himself so that his own shadow slightly touched the dark creature. With an unearthly wail it finally let go of Longbottom, gracefully fell back into Tom's shadow and melted with it. Instantly, with the creature's disappearance, the light came back to the corridor.
Tom's cold eyes wandered over the Gryffindor who lay before him on the ground. It was a pity, but Tom couldn't risk really hurting Longbottom. A cold smile played around his mouth as he heard the Gryffindor's heavy breathing. Tom slowly circled around his victim, grinning down at him and drinking in the pain he had obviously caused. Remnants of the dark spell were still tangible in the air, making Tom's skin tingle excitingly. Then he casually leaned against the corridor wall and looked down at Longbottom. The blond was still sprawled on the floor and stared with wide eyes up at Tom.

"That was interesting, don't you think?" Tom inquired in a pleasantly suave voice, which contrasted sharply with the mad grin on this face.

He could see the Gryffindor still shivering, heavily weakened by the shadow's ability to suck all strength from its victims. The feral smile on Tom's face widened and, twirling his pale wand elegantly through his fingers, he drank in the other's weakness.

Then he said in a perversely kind tone, "Very interesting, indeed, how you think you can protect Hermione when you can't even protect yourself."

Tom was slightly displeased as he saw a look of rightful anger entering Longbottom's eyes. The fool tried to sit up, but he only managed to lean with his back against the wall. Tom's hand itched to whirl his wand again and finally curse that righteousness off the other's face. The crazed grin finally left Tom's face as he heard Longbottom's answer.

"You disgusting asshole!" the blond groaned hoarsely and even though fear tinted his voice, it was still strong. "You just proved my point: You are not good enough for Hermione! Do you really think she wants to stay with someone like you?"

The grip Tom had on his wand tightened so that his knuckles turned white. His angry dark magic awakened. It came back with a vengeance and rushed through him implacably. Wrapped around Tom's mind, it demanded retaliation. Why should he resist it? Tom decided to use his hate and form it into a truly beautiful curse. So he waved his wand in the well-known motion while he started to hiss the incantation,

"Cruc-"

Suddenly a translucent yellow wall appeared in the corridor, neatly separating Tom from the Gryffindor. The force of the shield made Tom stumble a few paces backwards. Longbottom remained to be unaffected and just stared at the shield in confusion. Tom narrowed his eyes at the shield. It was a very strong defensive spell. Vast quantities of magic radiated from it. He knew that magic. It belonged to Hermione. But it was different somehow. It was more powerful. It felt strange, changed.

Tom turned around. He found Hermione, stomping down the corridor towards him, an angry expression on her face as she glared at him.

Longbottom was surprised as suddenly a yellow shield appeared in front of him, just in the moment when Riddle wanted to hurl another, surely dark, curse at him. At first, he thought Riddle had conjured up that translucent wall which now separated the both of them, but there was a mildly confused look on Riddle's face. Then he turned around to someone. Longbottom took in a sharp breath of air as he saw Hermione walking towards Riddle. Why had she come here?

There was a murderous expression on Riddle's face as he glared at Hermione. Obviously, it had been her who had cast the shielding spell. Obviously Riddle didn't like her actions at all.

Longbottom scrambled to his feet and watched how Hermione told Riddle something. He couldn't hear what she said as there was no sound reaching his side of the shield. He just had to watch helplessly how Riddle seemed to furiously snub back at her. Riddle now vented his fury on Hermione. The Gryffindor was silently proud of her as she stood her ground against Riddle. She even seemed to yell at him angrily. But then fear gripped at Longbottom's heart as he saw that look of malice on the evil Slytherin's face. He could see Riddle's hand tighten around his wand and dangerous green sparks erupted from the wand. Longbottom was afraid that the Slytherin would now start to curse Hermione. Riddle again screamed at her aggressively. Hermione yelled back at him but Longbottom wished she would just try to get away. If she continued to anger Riddle like this, there was no knowing what the Slytherin would do to her. With dread Longbottom remembered the ugly bruise on her face.

He then raised his wand and fired a curse at the yellow shield. "Reducto!"

Even though he had put all his magic behind the spell, it didn't manage to destroy the shield. Longbottom peered back at Hermione. She was now looking at him. He stiffened as he saw that she didn't notice at all how Riddle stalked towards her, still with that murderous expression on his face.

"Watch out!" Longbottom tried to warn her but Hermione didn't seem to hear him.

Riddle reached her and brutally grabbed Hermione's arm. Then he bent down to her and seemed to whisper something into her ear. Longbottom hurled another Reducto at the shield, again with the same results. He saw how Hermione fought against the grip Riddle had on her, but then she seemed to give up. The evil snake tightened his grip on her and then dragged her behind him, away from Longbottom.

Hermione felt panicky as she ran down the dark corridor. That magic in the air was definitely Tom's. It bristled very angrily, occasionally tugging at her aggressively. As a reaction to her panicky state, Hermione subconsciously called upon the Elder Magic. It quickly answered her call and wrapped reassuringly around her.

A few more steps and she entered another corridor. She threw in a breath as she found what she had feared. Tom and Longbottom were in the corridor, a few metres away from her. Tom was looming over Longbottom, who was crouched on the floor. Tom's dark magic was all over the place. It hit her now harder than before.

Right now, Tom was pointing his wand at Longbottom. Hermione shuddered as she saw that look of pure malice on Tom's face. He waved his wand and she stopped breathing as she recognized those wand movements. Fury bubbled up in her as Hermione pulled her own wand and swiftly brandished it.

Obex!

She could feel the Elder Magic rushing through her wand to then form into a powerful spell. Instantly a yellow shield appeared in the corridor. It neatly separated Tom from the Gryffindor. Hermione breathed out relieved. Tom lowered his wand before he turned around to her. The complete lack of guilt on his face, made her grip her wand even tighter as she glared back at him. Then she walked over to him.

"What the hell are you doing?" she hissed enangered.
She now stood just two metres away from him and his angry dark magic tore at her violently. The Elder Magic, though, managed to protect her from this onslaught. Hermione could see that Tom's eyes were of a blood-red colour as he glared at her darkly. Chills darted down her spine as she saw that detached coldness on his face.

"I am putting a few things right. If you don't mind," Tom replied coldly.

"You are putting a few things right?" Hermione spat at him disdainfully. As he didn't react to the accusation in her voice, she yelled at him lividly, "Didn't I tell you to stay away from my friends?"

"Oh, so now, everything's my fault again!" he clamoured, equally angry. "He attacked me first."

"I don't care who started it. Don't think I wouldn't know what curse you were about to use," Hermione thundered at him, unable to suppress her temper. "There's no excuse for that."

"He deserves it!" Tom yelled furiously back at her.

"No-one deserves that!" She glared at him incensed. Then she hissed venomously, "I'm fed up with you! I've put up with this for long enough. You're going to stop this, now!"

"You want me to stop?" Tom replied with incredulity tinting his voice. "How about you stop being all over him whenever there's a chance?" he demanded in a dangerous voice, while gesturing at Longbottom.

Hermione clenched her teeth and the Elder Magic crackled around her furiously. Probably Tom could feel it, too, but she didn't care at all. She was way too angry right now.

"You better not go there, Tom!" she said in a low and bitingly cold voice. "It's enough that you always try to attack him. Unprovoked."

She could see Tom's hand tighten around his wand and his eyes flared up as the crimson colour intensified. They glowered at each other for a while. His dark magic was still crackling in the corridor but it was now met by the Elder Magic which danced around Hermione. The air seemed to be charged with electricity and she could feel, through the Elder Magic, where the two forces collided. Tom's magic pushed against her own but Hermione did not yield.

Tom's eyes narrowed dangerously as he felt her fighting against him. There were angry green sparks erupting from the tip of his wand. It was pretty obvious that he wanted to curse her now. Somehow she wished he would, Hermione thought in a fit of violent temper as she clasped her own wand. At least that would give her an excuse to curse him in return.

In the end he never raised his wand at her, instead he seemed to prefer to yell at her, "Why do you always have to think the worst of me? It's like you expect me to be the evil one."

"Oh, I wonder why," Hermione hurled cold sarcasm at him. Then she spat, "Maybe because usually you are the villain."

Tom pressed his mouth into a thin line and Hermione could tell that he was fighting to keep his self-control. Though he seemed to lose.

"And you are soo perfect. A saint. It's like you never do anything wrong," Tom bellowed furiously. He took a threatening step towards her, intensifying the pressure of magic on her, and then hissed, "Why don't you go have tea with Dumbledore. I'm sure he would be de-lighted to hear everything about my evilness."
"What the hell is your problem?" Hermione snapped as she violently pushed against his magic, forcing it back. "You behave like a lunatic."

"My problem is that my girlfriend seems to thoroughly enjoy the company of other men," Tom shouted at her and strands of his dark magic tried to breach her defence, but the Elder Magic sustained.

"What? You make it sound like I do Merlin-knows-what with them. They are my FRIENDS!" Hermione yelled at him enraged. Her anger enforced the Elder Magic and it finally ended Tom's attempts to take it down.

Then she continued and brutal sarcasm seeping from her voice, "I am soo sorry that, unlike you, I have friends."

"Well, my condolences, if that's the best you can manage," Tom replied glacially while gesturing at Longbottom.

At this point in time Hermione's yellow shield suddenly flared up and showered the dark corridor momentarily in bright light. Hermione turned her head and looked at the shield. It was still working, though it seemed like Longbottom tried to take it down. He had drawn his wand and fired curses at the barrier. He also seemed to shout something but Hermione had no idea what he tried to say as the shield prevented anything from passing, even sound waves. She then felt someone grabbing her upper arm. Her head shot up and she found Tom standing right beside her. There was still fury on his face as he tried to drag her away.

As Hermione resisted his grip, he hissed at her, "I want to continue this conversation somewhere more private."

Hermione's eyes wandered shortly back to her Gryffindor friend. He was still trying to take the shield down. Hermione knew it was quite the strong shield but it wouldn't hold forever. Maybe it really would be better to not continue this quarrel right in front of him. Hermione grudgingly had to admit that Tom had a point here so she followed him down the corridor. He pulled her through the castle's passage ways until they arrived at a bare stone wall. Hermione knew where exactly they were and she was not surprised that Tom had managed to unveil another of Hogwarts' secrets. Sure enough, Tom walked three times by that particular wall. Immediately a huge wooden door appeared in the wall. Tom didn't hesitate but walked over to the door and pushed it open, then he entered and disappeared in the room behind. Hermione huffed at his impossible behaviour. He couldn't know that she had in fact visited the Room of Requirements before. It would have been only polite to at least explain a little bit.

Hermione stomped after him and passed the threshold, stepping into the room. She had barely taken a few steps as she stopped dead in her tracks. She had just entered a huge hall. It was dark and cold here. Imposing stone pillars stood a few metres from each other, flanking a way into the room. Hermione raised her head and followed their structure. The pillars seemed to be lost somewhere high up in the darkness. Hermione felt chilly but she still took more steps into the room. Tom's footsteps could still be heard as they echoed loudly from the cold stone walls, so she followed him.

She'd never been in this place but she had no problems to recognize it from how Harry had described it. Those scary snakes carved into stone were a hint, too. This was unmistakably the Chamber of Secrets. Hermione shuddered involuntarily. Finally, she reached what seemed to be the heart of this hall. She found Tom pacing furiously in front of a huge stone statue. Her eyes fleetingly danced over the statue's face. It was the face of an old wizard with a long beard. Hermione knew who was portrayed here, Salazar Slytherin himself.
As she reached Tom, she asked him in a surprisingly firm voice, "What is this?"

He only shortly looked at her and replied in a clipped voice, "The Come-and-Go Room."

Hermione inwardly relaxed as she heard his answer. Shortly she had really thought this was the Chamber of Secrets and that there existed more than one entry into the chamber. Thank Merlin, it was just the Room of Requirement. Then anger bubbled up in her again as she looked around the chamber. So typical Tom to ask the room to change into something sinister and dark. Abruptly Tom stopped his pacing and glared at her. There was a look of anger on his face.

"I don't want you to talk with him anymore," he snarled at her.

"And with 'him' you mean Marc?" Hermione asked curtly.

"Yes, Longbottom!" Tom spat the name like it was an insult. "I forbid you to talk with him."

Hermione was taken aback by his forcefulness and raised her eyebrows.

"Forbid?" she said, fighting to not lose her self-control. "You can't forbid me anything!"

"You are my girlfriend!" he yelled at her as if that was justification enough.

"Yes, girlfriend," Hermione said in a dangerous, low voice. "Not slave! And certainly not one of your followers!"

Her reply just earned her another of his death glares. Then he asked her snidely, "How can you even be friends with him? He's an idiot. You don't need him."

"Merlin, is that so hard to understand?" Hermione exclaimed exasperated. The scowl on Tom's face told her that it was obviously not so easy to understand so she yelled at him, "I just like him!"

"Oh so you like him, do you?" he said in a derogatory tone.

He cast her a dark accusatory glance before he continued his furious pacing. Hermione just shook her head at the raving mad Slytherin.

"What is wrong with you?" she then asked him gruffly. "Why are you doing all of this?"

She crossed her arms over her chest and hit him with a withering look. Tom, though, did not react to her at all. He just stopped his pacing to look at her reproachfully. He arched one eyebrow questioningly as if he really didn't know where he had misbehaved. Fed up with his undiscerning conduct, she flung her hands up in frustration.

"Need I really remind you?" she hissed at him irately. "First you send your goons after me like a bunch of watchdogs. Then you start attacking my friends to the point where you nearly crucioed one of them. And now you think you can order me around."

She started to pace around in front of him, desperately trying to rein in her temper. Then she glanced at him.

"It gets old, don't you think?" she griped challengingly. "Whatever are you trying to achieve? Destroying my sanity? If so, then you are doing a great job!"

By now fury twisted up Tom's face as he narrowed his eyes at her.

"What do you expect from me?" he hissed at her mordantly. "Should I just sit back and watch how that Gryffindor idiot seduces you?"

Hermione raised her eyebrows at him. "You are not starting on that again, are you? Haven't I told you over and over again that I. Do. Not. Fancy. Marc," she yelled the last words at him in a pique of temper.

Tom wasn't at all impressed by her outburst of fury, instead he took a threatening step towards her.

"Then tell me why you spend all your free time hanging around the git?" he gritted at her.

Tom glared at her incensed, clearly expecting an answer to his stupid accusation. Hermione was very enraged as she stared back at him. The Elder Magic was still wrapped around her and it again bristled around her, joining Tom's magic which swirled around him equally wrathfully. Hermione strongly assumed that Tom had by now sensed this change in her magic. Even though a small portion of her mind advised her to hide the Elder Magic again, she was way too furious to listen to that voice of reason.

Actually, she had half a mind of pulling her wand. Tom's insane jealousy had been jarring on her nerves for far too long already. Why did he need to be so irrational? Hermione glowered at him infuriated.

Tom just scowled back at her darkly then he hissed in a commanding voice, "I'm not going to accept that any longer. You are going to stay away from him!"

She looked at him enraged. Then she inquired incredulously, "Do you really think I'm just going to do whatever you tell me?"

Tom just glared at her infuriated and she could see an eerie red glint flaring up in his eyes. Then he said in a low and fearsome tone, "You better, or else-"

"Or else what?" Hermione cut across him, completely losing her composure by the sight of that red sheen in his eyes. "Are you going to curse me? Are you going to use the Cruciatus Curse on me? It wouldn't be the first time."

It was a low blow. As soon as Hermione said it she realized that. Tom just stared at her with a stony face. Then he turned around and walked away. She instantly followed him. As she reached him Hermione grabbed his arm.

"Wait," she ordered. "Don't run away."

Tom turned around to her and Hermione raised her eyebrows as she saw that a blank mask covered his face. Then he replied in a quiet but all the same sharp voice, "Why? Obviously I'm evil, I'm the villain and it seems that I like to curse you. Why would you want me to stay?"

"Tom, calm down," Hermione said in a stern voice. "And stop being so melodramatic. You are my boyfriend, of course I like being around you."

"I'm not so sure about that," Tom replied acridly. "Maybe you prefer Longbottom's presence."

Hermione still grabbed his arm and looked up at the anger lurking behind that blank expression of his. The jealousy was still burning in his grey eyes. She was tired of this jealousy, especially as there was no reason for him to feel this way. Sure, she liked Longbottom but certainly not in that way. It actually angered her that Tom thought she would just leave him and go for another guy.

Hermione narrowed her eyes at him, feeling aggravated again. But as she now scanned Tom's features, she could suddenly spot something she hadn't noticed before. He still stared at her angrily but there was more visible in his eyes. How could she have missed it before? There, undeniably, was something flickering in his grey eyes that had nothing to do with his anger. Hermione furrowed her brow as she tried to decipher Tom's emotions. Now that she paid closer attention, she could clearly see fear flickering in his eyes. As she finally took notice of that anxiety, her violent temper completely died down. Tom seemed to be thoroughly afraid of something.

What scared him so?

It was then that his last words seeped through to her. He had said it in such a disparaging and insulting way, but maybe he had been shockingly honest. Hermione was shaken by that forlorn look on his face. Was Tom really afraid that she would leave him? Where was that fear suddenly coming from? She frowned at him. Then her grip on his arm loosened slightly, so that she could hold him more gently.

Hermione asked him in a soft voice, "Why are you so convinced that I would cheat on you?"

She could see that he was taken aback by her sudden change of mood. His angry dark magic finally died down around him and he just looked at her with his grey eyes. He didn't reply anything but the fear remained to be visible in his eyes. Hermione sighed softly as she realized, he wouldn't yield so easily. Obviously she needed to convince him gingerly to tell her what upset him so.

"Tom, I decided to be with you. You are my boyfriend," she told him in a gentle but all the same firm voice. "I am certainly not going to run off with Marc."

"How am I supposed to believe that?" he asked frostily. Then he spat in a bitter tone, "Obviously neither Longbottom nor me are your true love." His last two words were oozing with cruel scorn. "You're just killing time, staying with me."

Ah, there it was, the core of his problem. He wasn't really thinking that she would run off with Longbottom. It was something else that troubled him. Somehow she had known it the whole time. Maybe that was the reason she hadn't wanted to talk with him about his problem sooner but had preferred it to put up with all his possessiveness the last few weeks. It was a topic she herself wasn't very fond of talking about. Hermione looked up at Tom's enraged face then she cautiously addressed the true cause of his insecurity.

"Since we went to London, you've behaved strangely," she told him while she still held his arm gently. "Actually since I told you about Ron."

The moment she spoke Ron's name, she could watch his face completely shutting down. An indifferent mask covered everything up. Then he turned his head and avoided her eyes. Hermione had expected something like this. She just looked at him patiently and waited for him to somehow react.

"If he hadn't died, you would be with him now. I'm just second choice," he stated in a painfully hollow voice.

Hermione was shocked to hear that his voice was suddenly so empty. The anger had completely vanished and had left absolutely nothing behind. She stepped towards him until she stood directly in front of him, nearly touching his chest. But Tom still didn't look at her. She extended a hand towards him, took his chin in her hand and bent it towards her, so that he was forced to look at her. His face was still carefully arranged into that emotionless mask. Though his eyes were different now. They swirled with emotion. There was a great deal of anger in his eyes but also fear and pain. Tom was insecure and desperate even.
Hermione locked her eyes with his then she started to say in a firm voice, "I loved Ron. And I will always love him."

She could see Tom's eyes widen for the tiniest fraction as she said that. Her hand released his chin, wandered to his cheek and cupped it gently.

"But Ron is a part of my past. He is gone. Nothing more than a memory. And now you are here with me."

It hurt her to say this about Ron, but it was something she needed to resolve to help Tom and maybe to help herself.

"But…" Tom whispered in a soft tone. "If he hadn't died, you would have stayed with him. Not with me."

Hermione smiled sadly up at him. "I don't know what would have happened if he hadn't died," she told him in a soothing voice. "It was a chain of events that led to me arriving at Hogwarts. Not all of them were connected with Ron. But I did end up at Hogwarts and I met you."

Hermione's hand sank from his face as she stepped even closer to him so that she now almost leaned into him. One of her arms wrapped itself cautiously around him. She looked up into his grey eyes.

"I won't deny that Ron is still very important for me but, Tom, he is no threat to you. I'm not going to leave you for any other guy, okay?"

She could feel him tremble slightly at her declaration and wrapped her arm even tighter around him. Then she put her other hand on the back of his neck and pulled his head down to her. She pressed her lips against his and kissed him gently while her hand fondled with his dark hair. After a while she could feel how Tom cautiously slipped his arms around her and pulled her against him. Then he responded to her kiss and deepened it. After he released her again she smiled contently up at him.

"Do you feel better?" she asked him gently.

He looked at her and Hermione was relieved to see that the desperation and insecurity had left his incredibly grey eyes again. Then he nodded shortly. Her smile even widened before she said in a teasing voice,

"Now, will you stop being so incredibly jealous and call your goons back from stalking me?"

A small, guilty smirk tugged at the corners of his mouth as Tom nodded again.

"Good." Hermione smirked right back at him. "Otherwise I would have been forced to transfigure them into a bunch of fluffy ferrets."

Tom chuckled before he said, "Why ferrets?"

"It suits them, don't you think?" was her taunting reply.

Hermione removed her arms from him and stepped a little away. All jest left her eyes again as she looked up at him.

"Tom, I know that you don't like Marc, or any of my friends for that matter," she said in a serious tone. "I also know that they, at times, provoke you. So, you are not the only one at fault here. But you almost cast an Unforgivable at Marc. This is something I cannot accept."
Hermione saw Tom taking a step away from her, as some of the anxiety re-entered his eyes.

"I'm not going to leave you because of it," she quickly tried to allay his fears but then she continued in a sharp and firm voice, "But you will never do something like that again."

Hermione continued to look at him expectantly. She wasn't angry with him anymore, but she still wanted confirmation that this conflict was now finally resolved. Tom stared back at her and she was slightly assuaged as she saw a bit of insecurity in his eyes.

Then he whispered, "I… I'm sorry."

A soft smile took form on her face as she heard him. She again stepped closer to him and snaked her arms around him, telling him that she accepted his apology. Tom sighed softly then he slung his arms around her. Hermione leaned into him and put her head against his chest. The fabric of his dark green pullover was rather scratchy against her cheek but she enjoyed Tom's nearness. It never occurred to her how very odd it was that she embraced Tom Riddle, the Heir of Slytherin, standing in the very chamber his ancestor had once built in secret.

Later, Hermione accompanied Tom back to the Slytherin common room. He had actually insisted on bringing her to her own but Hermione had declined. She didn't think it would be a good idea if he accidentally ran into her Gryffindor friends again. Before Tom could open the door to his common room Hermione grabbed his shoulders, stood on tiptoes and placed a kiss on his mouth.

"Good night," she whispered at him.

Tom smiled down at her and Hermione was relieved to see that all anger and jealousy but also the fear and insecurity had by now left his face. Then she stepped away from him again and said,

"Don't forget to inform your dear friends to stay away from me."

Tom smirked at her then he said, "I thought we just determined that I don't have any friends."

Hermione smiled at him for she knew that he would tell his followers anyway. She turned around and strolled down the corridor she had come from. It didn't take long and she was back at the entrance to the Gryffindor common room.

"Lion fish," she whispered the pass word.

As soon as she opened the portrait hole and stepped into the common room she was instantly assaulted by her upset friends. Longbottom even hugged her tightly while Weasley and Lupin seemed to check her over for any injuries.

"Guys," Hermione stuttered. "What…? Stop. I'm okay."

"Are you alright?" Longbottom asked as he scanned her concerned. "He didn't hurt you, did he?"

"No, no," Hermione assured with a smile on her face.

Then she noticed the many curious stares the other Gryffindors were sending their way. So, she grabbed Longbottom's arm and pulled him over to one of the many sofas in the room. Her friends followed her but still scanned her worried as if they expected to find any wounds on her body. As Hermione reached the sofa she sat down and pulled her wand.

"Muffliato," she whispered while brandishing her wand.
"What happened?" Longbottom immediately exclaimed. "I just saw how he dragged you away."

"Did he do anything?" Weasley asked, worry present on his face. "Did he curse you?"

Hermione raised her hands to quieten them down. "It's okay. You don't have to worry. I just talked with Tom."

"What did he want from you?" Lupin queried as he narrowed his eyes in suspicion. "Did he tell you to keep away from us?"

Hermione leaned back on the sofa and smiled at Lupin. He was always very sharp. He had assessed the situation rather accurately.

So Hermione smiled at him and said, "Yes, he actually did."

"Did he threaten you?" Weasley stared at her with wide eyes. "He's not going to do anything to you if he sees us together, is he?" He looked around in the common room as if he expected Tom to pop up any moment.

"He can't do that!" Longbottom bellowed angrily. "The evil git!"

"Don't worry. I actually told him something similar," Hermione giggled. "Though without insulting him… much."

She had to giggle even more as she saw those incredulous expressions on her friends' faces. But then she got serious again as she continued, "I am really sorry that Tom attacked you just like that, Marc. I promise you he's never going to do that again."

"We are more concerned about you actually," Longbottom said quietly.

"You don't need to be," Hermione replied confidently. "I've had a conversation with Tom. I told him that I'm not accepting if he starts to attack you."

"You shouldn't speak to him at all," Lupin warned her. "He's dangerous. Just leave him."

"No," Hermione said in a quite but firm voice. "I know you don't like him, but at least now he's going to stay away from you."

"You don't really think he's going to just do that, are you?" Longbottom asked, still enraged.

"I am," Hermione told him calmly. "He promised me to tone it down somewhat."

"Tone it down?" Longbottom exclaimed incredulously.

"What did you have to promise in return?" Lupin's cool voice intervened.

Hermione had to suppress a smirk. Lupin knew very well how a Slytherin's mind worked, didn't he?

"Actually nothing," she told them. "But I would advise you to keep away from him as best as possible and don't try to provoke him. He's not very fond of Gryffindors, you see. And I think it's pretty obvious that you'll never become friends. So it's for the best if you all just avoid each other."

"Not fond of Gryffindors, the evil snake," Longbottom grumbled angrily. "Did he notice that you are a Gryffindor?"

"Yep," Hermione said amused. "And believe me he's not exactly delighted about that fact."
"He should feel honoured that you are spending your time with him," the blond said in exasperation. "He's a conceited brat, that's what he is."

"Probably," she smiled at him. "But do you think you can stop picking quarrels with him? Because that would be really helpful. I'm tired of having to argue with him."

"Don't you want to reconsider?" Lupin said in a calm voice while he looked at her intently. "Maybe it would be better if you, too, avoid him."

"No," Hermione said determinedly. "He's my boyfriend and he'll remain to be my boyfriend. So? Do you think you can live with that?"

Lupin eyed her, unconvinced but then he said, "Yes, if that's what you want."

Longbottom had sour look on his face but then he, too, conceded, "Okay. But if he hits you again we won't just stand back and let him do it."

Hermione smiled at her friends in relief. "He's never hit me so I don't see a problem."

A few days passed and Hermione was more than content to notice that Tom held his word. His lackeys no longer stalked her. Finally Tom seemed to have accepted her friendship with her three Gryffindor house mates. Hermione could see that he was sometimes still jealous but he abode by the truce she had demanded of him. He did not try to attack her friends again.

There were times, when Tom saw her together with Longbottom, that he surely wanted to curse the Gryffindor. Hermione could tell just by looking at Tom, but he never lost his temper again. Her past relationship with Ron probably still played on his mind but Tom now obviously trusted her enough to believe her that she was faithful.

---

Tom was sitting in the Slytherin common room and felt restless. He was lounging in one of the leather sofas and was reading in a book but he couldn't quite concentrate on it. His thoughts always wandered to Hermione. Even after they had talked about everything and she had assured him that he was not just a cheap replacement for her lost fiancé, he still didn't like it when she was not around him. He knew that she wouldn't run away with Longbottom in the near future - … almost sure at least… - but the desire to search the castle for her was still overly present in his mind. The witch was just too stubbornly self-subsistent. Tom's gaze wandered to a bunch of girls sitting in one corner of the common room. They giggled inanely and threw him seductive looks as they noticed his attention.

Her stubbornness is still better than their silly infatuation. He sighed and again resumed his futile attempt to read his book.

After a while he heard a rather condescending, female voice, "What do you want here?"

"None of your business," another voice, tinged with cold amusement, replied.

Tom looked up from his reading as he had recognized the second voice. A smirk appeared on his face as he found Hermione walking towards him. The eyes of the Slytherins in the room followed her but she didn't notice as she was right now smiling at him. Tom was slightly surprised that she had sought him out. It seemed she wanted to spent time with him even without him having to force her.

Hermione sat down beside him on the couch. Tom could hear muffled chatter breaking out and the smirk on his face widened. The other Slytherins knew not to disturb him when he was trying to read a book. No-one of them would have ever dared to sit down beside him. Not even his Knights would ever approach him without showing the necessary respect. Tom's eyes wandered from his indignant housemates to the witch lounging leisurely on the couch beside him.

"How did you enter the common room?" he asked nonchalantly.

Hermione just smiled at him sweetly before she whispered tauntingly, "What? Do you think you are the only one with a mysterious source for the school's passwords?"

Tom raised one eyebrow at her in doubt.

She continued to look at him arrogantly but soon caved in and admitted, "Okay, okay. I was waiting outside the common room and then someone opened it for me. Happy?"

"Yes," he purred at her.

She just sighed and leaned back against the couch.

"Do you want to do something?" Tom asked her. "We could go outside and sit by the lake."

Hermione turned her head lazily at him. "It's raining outside," she informed him before she drawled, "But of course you people of the dungeons wouldn't know."

Tom smirked as he saw that condescending expression on the witch's face.

Almost worthy of a Slytherin, he mused.

"There's no need to entertain me," Hermione said as she bent down to her bag and retrieved a book from it. "See?" She showed him the old leather bound book.

"Manifestation of Magic in inanimate Objects," Tom read its title.

He contemplated the book for a while before his gaze wandered back to her. "Hmm…a pity," he finally concluded airily.

Hermione frowned at him and then at the book in her hands. "What's a pity?"

Tom smiled at her in his most innocent way, which just made her roll her eyes, then he said, "I was hoping you had brought another book."

"What book?" she asked confused.

By now Tom couldn't hide the evil smirk any longer. "Well, there's a certain book in your possession that you acquired by, let's say, bending the law somewhat."

A scowl appeared on Hermione's face as she glared at him. Tom wasn't scared by that fearsome expression on her face but extended a hand towards her and tucked a wisp of her riotous hair behind her ear. He chuckled softly as she shuddered when his fingers skimmed gently over her cheek. She was so sensitive. He leaned down to her which made an adorable blush appear on her cheeks before he whispered in her ear,

"I haven't forgotten about Peverell's book."

Sadly, Hermione seemed to be drawn from her trance as the glassy look, which had been a result of his close proximity, vanished from her eyes again.
"And I already told you: I won't give it to you," she snapped at him.

Stubborn as always. Tom eyed the witch at his side.

"Why do you want to read that transfiguration book anyway?" he sighed as he leaned back and spread his arms out on the backrest of the sofa.

"Because, unlike you, I'm interested in transfiguration," she huffed.

She threw him another dirty look before she opened her book and began to read. He had to grin at her cheeky behaviour but then he, too, returned to his book. It was after a while of comfortable silence that Tom felt how Hermione slid closer to him. She even grabbed his arm and held tightly to him. He looked down at her and found her scanning the common room nervously.

"Something wrong?"

"They are staring at me," she replied in a whispered tone. "I think they don't like me."

Tom looked up and sure enough a lot of his house mates still cast inconspicuous but curious glances Hermione's way. Though the looks coming from the group of girls on the other side of the common room were neither friendly nor in any way inconspicuous. Tom wasn't at all surprised to see Nicolls being one of the girls glaring murderously at Hermione. Tom ignored his house mates and refocused on Hermione.

"Well, I would be disappointed with them if they did like a Gryffindor," Tom taunted her gently.

Though he knew that another reason for the stares was that the Slytherins wondered why he allowed her so many liberties with him.

"We could go down in the dorm. No-one's there," he offered as he saw she wouldn't calm down.

Hermione nodded, stuffed her book back in her bag and quickly got up from the couch. Tom chuckled softly as she then scuffled, rather hastily, over to the stairs. The glares coming from that group of girls grew even darker as Tom followed her in a more dignified pace. He didn't care at all what his house mates thought about his relationship with Hermione. If one of them had a problem with him dating a Gryffindor, then it would be Tom's pleasure to help them solve their problem. A twisted smile appeared on his face as he walked over to the stairs leading down to the dormitories.

As he finally entered his dorm, he found Hermione already sitting on one of the sofas standing in the sitting area of the room. He strolled over to her and sat down beside her.

Hermione looked at him reproachfully before she said, "Why's the Slytherins' dorm at least twice the size of the Gryffindors'?"

He smirked at her arrogantly, "Because most of the Slytherins are spoiled brats coming from rich families with huge manor houses. They wouldn't know how to survive in a place smaller than Buckingham Palace."

Hermione just chuckled softly at his explanation then she curled up on the sofa, reached for her book and continued reading. Tom tried to resume his reading, too, but found that he couldn't quite concentrate anymore. The dim light made reading difficult but the main reason for his distraction was that his thoughts were magically drawn to the witch on the sofa beside him.
It somehow was easy with Hermione. She didn't fancy him because of his good looks or the power he commanded. She wasn't like all the other girls who always swarmed around him, seeing something in him that wasn't really there. It was ridiculously easy to trick those girls. All he had to do was spin a few lies and they would do whatever he wanted from them.

Not Hermione. She had never bought any of his lies. She could always see right through him. Although that ability was quite annoying at times, it was also relieving that he didn't have to act around her. Hermione knew who he really was. She had seen his dark side and even his weakness and still stayed with him. Whenever she was around, he could just drop his façade.

Tom had no idea why she wanted to be with him. If she were a normal girl, she would have ran from him and never come back after all the things he had done to her. But Hermione had come back to him, she had helped him when there was nothing to gain and she had even forgiven him. It was a mystery why she wanted to stay with him. That lack of understanding had led to him trying to force her to stay with him. Now that he had stopped trying to control her every action, it was even better when she still came back to him.

Tom was lost in his thoughts but then he noticed how Hermione again skidded nearer to him on the couch. This time, though, her intentions were completely different, he realized, as he suddenly felt her leaning towards him before she placed a kiss on the corner of his mouth. She took the book from his hands and deposited it on the sofa while she rained more kisses on his face. Tom couldn't suppress a moan from escaping him as she slowly ran her hand up his chest. Her other hand gently held his head while she continued to nibble at his lower lip. All rational thought completely left his mind as he felt her tongue brushing along the seam of his mouth. He opened his mouth slightly, thus allowing her to deepen the kiss. As he felt her tongue exploring his mouth he somehow didn't mind that right now she was the one in control.

Her hands ran demandingly through his hair as she finally broke from his mouth. Then she suddenly grabbed his hair rather gruffly and pulled at it, thus exposing his throat. Tom panted slightly as she began to trace more kisses down his neck. He could feel her body pressed against him. But it wasn't enough. She wasn't close enough yet.

His self-restraint was slowly leaving him, to be replaced by fierce desire. He snaked an arm around her waist and pulled her tighter against him. Then he leaned down to her and pressed his lips against hers, catching her lower lip between his own. By now she was sitting on his lap but she was still not close enough.

His lips left her mouth again to trace more kisses on the line of her jaw. He could hear her breathing heavily which only drove him on to elicit more reactions from her. He could feel her arms being wrapped around his neck as she clung to him, thus making the distance between them nonexistent. The sweet scent of lilac coming from her almost made him go crazy. The consuming desire intensified as he heard her moan in pleasure when he nibbled at her earlobe. She was so close to him now. But this time he needed more.

Hermione was overcome by her feelings as she kissed Tom. She had surprised herself by her sudden actions. But as Tom had sat there on the sofa, reading in his book, he had just looked irresistible. Hermione had been unable to hold herself back. She had had to kiss him. Now he responded to her. She could feel Tom's arm being snaked completely around her waist. He didn't stop to kiss her as he pulled her even closer to him so that she ended up sitting on his lap, leaning against his chest. Hermione wrapped her arms around his neck and ran a hand through his dark hair, ruffling it up. Tom broke from her lips and started to plant more kisses on the line of her jaw. Hermione shuddered with pleasure as she felt his lips on her skin. His warm hand had wandered up her back and was now holding her head in place. As his mouth found her ear, he started to nibble teasingly at her earlobe.
Then he whispered in a soft but resolute voice into her ear,

"I'm going to sleep with you now."

Hermione's eyes widened as she heard those soft spoken words. Tom bent her head to the side and started to kiss the soft skin of her neck while his other arm was still wrapped around her tightly, pressing her against him.

Hermione suddenly felt incredibly nervous. Those feelings she had were so compelling and she really didn't want Tom to stop, he was making her feel so good, but at the same time she was scared. She wanted to be with Tom but she was terribly inexperienced. She had only once slept with a man and now she just felt insecure. Tom's words had sounded like a statement against which she couldn't do anything but she knew him better. She knew that it had been his odd way of asking her. Hermione just didn't know what to do.

Obviously Tom had noticed her insecurity. He gently cupped both her cheeks with his hands and looked down at her. She stared at him with her huge eyes and found him smiling reassuringly at her. Then he bent down and placed a soft kiss on her mouth. As she felt him kissing her so affectionately, she just knew that he would take care of her. She didn't need to worry. Hermione leaned into him and slowly responded to his kiss. The insecurity left her. There was no reason to be scared for Tom was here with her.

As Tom felt her responding to him he started to deepen the kiss while his hands released her cheeks, wandered down to her blouse and started to undo the buttons. He slid the blouse over her shoulders so that it fell softly down on the floor. His fingers skimmed over the bare skin of her back and Hermione felt pleasant shivers following his touch.

Tom shifted again so that he could get up from the sofa. He bent down to her and wrapped one of his arms tightly around her waist while the other positioned itself under the hollows of her knees before he lifted Hermione up from the sofa. He carried her to his bed and gently laid her down on the soft mattress. Then he leaned over her, supporting his weight with his arms. He again kissed her and Hermione felt him nibbling at her lip sensuously. A burning desire slowly took hold of her and her own hands became more demanding as they slid up his chest to undo his green and silver Slytherin tie. After she had removed the tie, she unbuttoned his shirt. Tom quickly took it completely off before he resumed to kiss her. Hermione enjoyed running her fingers over the bare skin of his back. He leaned on one arm and his other hand cupped her cheek while he kissed her passionately. His lips then left her mouth and slowly wandered down her neck. Hermione felt her breathing hitch as he reached her breasts and started to kiss the skin where it was not covered by her bra. One of his hands had reached her skirt. Hermione felt him opening the skirt. He nibbled gently at her neck and Hermione's arms wrapped around him pulling him closer to her. There was a tingling and rather demanding feeling originating from her stomach. It quickly spread and flowed through her whole body.

Tom bent up a little while pulling her with him so that his hand reached her back where he undid her bra. He put her down on the bed again and gently removed the last layer of cloth that covered her breasts. Hermione felt Tom's lips on her skin again. She gasped softly as he now began to caress her breasts. His fingers, his lips and his tongue left behind a burning tingle on her skin.

Then she felt his hands sliding down her sides until they reached the only piece of clothing that still covered her body. Tom slowly removed her underwear and Hermione felt her breathing quicken again. The passion started to overwhelm her as Tom bent down to her and kissed her. He was now half lying on her but Hermione's arms clasped around him pulling him even closer. She needed him near her now, not one bit of distance was allowed between them. The feeling of his bare skin against her own was so exciting. The burning desire nearly robbed her off her sanity as her fingers glided lightly but all the same demanding over the skin of his well toned arms. Tom seemed to realize the state she was in as he now quickly shed his boxers before he leaned over her again. Hermione panted heavily as she felt him against her, this time though they would finally completely merge into one another. Hermione gasped as she felt Tom slowly moving into her. His breathing was ragged now as he lowered his head to again kiss her passionately. He was moving in and out of her and she was overcome by the feeling of ecstasy. It felt like she would burst from it. The only things she was aware of now was this incredible feeling suffusing her and

Tom.

Just Tom. His nearness, his taste, his scent, his body.

Then her thoughts stopped as the wonderful feeling engulfed her completely, sending shivers of pleasure through her whole body.

---

Tom was looking satisfied down at the witch lying asleep beside him. She was huddled against his side. Tom noticed amused how one of her arms was spread across him, holding him rather possessively. That little gesture of hers was nothing compared to the possessive feeling he experienced as he looked at her sleeping form.

Who would have thought into what their relationship would develop, Tom mused, as they had met for the first time in the Great Hall when she had insisted in ignoring him and as he had decided to show her her place. He still wanted to show her her place. Though that place was now right by his side. He was never going to let her leave again. Not his most prized possession.

The bond that tied her to him, which had at first been flimsy at its best, had now strengthened. Tom was extremely pleased with how things had developed. Truth be told, he hadn't expected Hermione to succumb to him this quickly. But he had managed and it had been incredible. Tom had slept with a few girls already but it never had been even close to what he had just experienced with Hermione.

Hermione, it seemed, had enjoyed it just like he had, Tom thought with contentment as he remembered how her body had responded to him. That was a new thing for Tom: that he wanted the girl to enjoy their time together as much as he did. He had never cared about the girls' feelings when he had slept with them. But Hermione, it seemed, was yet again something special.

Tom extended a hand towards her and ran his fingers gently through her soft, curly hair. Hermione stirred as he touched her but she didn't wake up. She just huddled closer against him. Then she whispered in her sleep,

"Tom."

A triumphant smile tugged at the corners of Tom's mouth. His grey eyes filled with a dark glint as they wandered over her form. The greedy feeling that ripped at him whenever he looked at her was for once satisfied. And he basked in to knowledge that she was finally his.

Tom woke the next day and yawned tiredly. He hadn't even noticed when he had fallen asleep. He rolled over and, to his displeasure, found no Hermione lying beside him. He sat up on his bed and looked around the dorm. She was no-where in sight. He was pretty much alone in the room actually. Not even his dorm mates were here. They obviously had had enough common sense to not disturb Tom and his girlfriend. He had no idea where they had slept last night and, frankly, he didn't care either. Though he did wonder where Hermione had gone to.

Tom stood up from his bed. He was completely naked and a small smirk stole on his face as he remembered the reason for his nudeness. Yes, last night had been rather pleasurable, hadn't it? Though, this morning would have been a lot better if it had greeted him with Hermione's nudeness. The smirk on his face widened as he remembered the sight of her body.

…which he now knew a whole lot better than ever before. He knew that it hadn't been her intention to end up sleeping with him as she had started to kiss him, but she obviously hadn't been able to resist him. He chuckled softly as he remembered the softness of her skin under his fingers and how she had moaned in pleasure at his every touch.

Maybe a cold shower was in order? Tom sighed and shuffled over to the bathroom. It had probably been for the better that Hermione had gone back to her dorm sometime during the night. Otherwise her foolish friends might have called the Aurors and accused Tom of having abducted her. He chuckled slightly at that thought. Maybe he should really do that sometime? Sounded like a lot of fun…

He entered the bathroom and walked over to the marble sink with its golden taps. Hermione had been right, he thought amused, Slytherins were rather posh. He didn't mind the luxury though. As Tom looked into the mirror, he had to stare at his reflection and then blinked a few times. But it didn't go away, this deep red lipstick mark on his forehead. He leaned forward, turned his head a little and pushed a few strands of his dark hair away to have a better look. There surely was a sinfully red mark on his skin, left behind by soft lips kissing him on the forehead. A crooked grin broke out on his face.

That little witch…

Had Hermione marked him? He chuckled softly as he wondered how she had done it for she never wore any lipstick. And certainly not such a startling red. Naturally she must have conjured it up. He shook his head at his girlfriend's silliness, still softly laughing. Then he stepped into the shower.

Twenty minutes later, Tom left the dormitory, his hair slightly damp. He ascended the stairs and stepped into the common room. To his amusement he found Lestrange, still fully dressed, sleeping on one of the black leather couches. Tom's other dorm mates must have found asylum elsewhere. He ignored Lestrange and left the common room.

As Tom entered the Great Hall, he was greeted by the usual noise of the other students and clatter from cutlery. He paused for a moment, standing in the door, and let his gaze travel over the hall. Most of the students were already sitting at their tables, but Tom wasn't interested in them. His eyes fell on the Gryffindor table and he searched it for a certain bushy-haired witch. He quickly found Hermione sitting at the table, absorbed in conversation with her friends.

Tom couldn't stop a haughty smile from taking form on his face as he scanned her. Somehow, she must have felt his gaze on her as she suddenly looked up. Her hazel eyes searched the Great Hall.
When she finally saw him, Tom was very amused to witness a deep blush take shape on her face. But even though her face was now beet red, she didn’t look away from him. Instead she just smiled at him. Tom was surprised as he found himself smiling softly back at her. Before he finally lost all his Slytherin pride, he winked at her tauntingly. Instantly, the red colour on her face even intensified and he had to chuckle slightly.

"Why did you come back so late yesterday night?" Rose asked in her usual, shrill voice.

Hermione just grunted in response. Silently regretting that her dorm mates insisted on accompanying her to the Great Hall.

"I know why!" Lucia exclaimed loudly, before she continued while almost breaking down with giggles, "You’ve been with Riddle, haven't you?"

Hermione just narrowed her eyes at Lucia. Her dorm mates were a little bit too chatty to her taste on an early Monday morning. Lucia stepped nearer to Hermione, wrapped an arm around her waist and whispered conspiratorially in her ear,

"Tell us the truth. Riddle didn't want to let you leave. Hm?"

"What did he do?" Rose inquired instantly upon seeing Hermione's distress.

"Did you snog?" Lucia asked, poking Hermione's side mischievously. "Or more?"

At that Rose finally broke completely down in insane giggles and Hermione felt the need to draw her wand.

"You are so lucky, Hermione," she managed to say between her giggles. "Riddle's a real hotty, isn't he?"

"Now, tell us, tell us!" Lucia whined. "Why were you so late?"

Hermione was not going to divulge any secrets in front of the two worst gossip mongers she had ever known. So, she remained to be silent and endured the girls' never ending prodding until they finally reached the Great Hall. Hermione quickly checked the Slytherin table, but was not surprised as she didn't spot Tom anywhere. It was early Monday, after all, and she knew what a late riser he was. She walked over to the Gryffindor table and was more than happy to be able to leave her dorm mates as she spotted Longbottom, Weasley and Lupin already sitting at the table.

"Morning," Lupin greeted her, looking up from his Daily Prophet.

Hermione smiled at him. "Good morning," she replied genially as she plopped down beside Lupin. She reached for a pot of coffee and poured herself a nice cup before she took some of the scrambled eggs and piled them on her plate.

"You seem to be quite cheerful today," Lupin stated calmly while he peered at her over his newspaper.
Hermione stopped piling her plate as she noticed that she had been humming some stupid tune under her breath. Again the silly blush was back on her face. Quite annoying, actually.

"Well, it is a nice day, today, isn't it?" she finally answered without looking at either of her friends.

Merlin, I'm behaving like an idiotic school girl.

"Yeah." Longbottom luckily saved her any more embarrassment as he explained happily, "It's the perfect weather for Quidditch practice."

Weasley, who was trying to eat several sausages in one go, just managed to nod at him.

"Maybe we should ditch DADA," Longbottom contemplated while staring up at the ceiling of the Great Hall, gauging the weather situation. "And have an extra training session. What do you think?"

"Sounds like a plan to me," Weasley answered while reaching for some more sausages.

Hermione's nerdy tendencies were, once again, breaking through as she narrowed her eyes at the two boys, sitting opposite her.

"You are most certainly not skipping class," she said in a bossy tone. "You'll never get any NEWTs with that attitude."

"Aww, Hermione," Longbottom gave her the puppy-dog-eyes. "NEWTs are for seventh years. We are in the sixth. We don't have to worry until next year."

Hermione huffed at him indignantly. Lupin chuckled amused as he resumed reading his newspaper. She was about to explain to Longbottom - in a very nice and surely polite way - that not taking school seriously was a bad idea, as she felt someone staring at her. Hermione paused and furrowed her brow. Then she let her gaze sweep over the Great Hall. It wasn't long and she spotted Tom, standing by the entrance and looking back at her. As she gazed at Tom, memories of last night popped up in her mind and the deep blush returned to her face. She didn't avert her eyes from him, though. He looked quite nice standing there in his sleek uniform. Not even the haughty look on his face irritated her. As he winked at her suggestively, though, she could feel her face burn even fiercer.

Damn Slytherins!

For the remainder of the breakfast, Hermione tried to finally get rid of her stupid blushing problem. Though, however annoyed she was by her blush, she didn't fail to notice that content feeling in her stomach whenever she threw a glance at the Slytherin table.

As it was time for their first class, potions, Hermione walked with her friends to the classroom. She felt uneasy as her friends talked about the potion they were trying to produce in Slughorn's class.

"-and then we can finally move to the next phase," Lupin said enthusiastically. "That's quite tricky, I think. Normally, myrtle flag wouldn't work while also adding starweed. They'd cancel each other's effect. But then again there's still the wartcap powder making up for that."

And on he went, talking about the Ortus potion. Each time that particular potion was mentioned, Hermione felt faint. She yet had to take action to sabotage that stupid age-revealing potion.

"You know," Weasley whispered to Longbottom. "I am really glad he's in our group." Here he pointed at Lupin. "Otherwise we'd surely fail."

"Too true," Longbottom replied, shaking his head with a somber expression pasted on his face.
Though he didn't quite manage to suppress that grin which was shining through.

"Hey, I'm not going to do all the work by myself," Lupin said, staring at the two other boys sternly.

"Oh no." False panic flooded Longbottom's face. "You can't do that to us. We'll surely fail then. Do you really want something like this on your conscience?"

Despite her worries about the Ortus potion, Hermione had to giggle softly. She was startled as suddenly someone took a hold of her hand. Turning her head, she found Tom walking beside her. He smirked down at her but Hermione ignored his Slytherin behaviour and concentrated on the softness glinting in his eyes. Her fingers closed around his hand and she held him gently. In the corners of her eyes she could see her three Gryffindor friends tense as Tom leaned down to her and spoke into her ear.

"Good morning, Hermione," he whispered in his smooth voice. "Slept well?"

A smirk of her own stole on her face as she looked at Tom. She raised a hand and wiped away a few strands of his dark hair which had fallen into his startling grey eyes. She purposefully brushed over his forehead where she had left behind that ridiculous lipstick mark. Then it was her turn to wink at him mischievously. He elegantly quirked an eyebrow at her.

"Quite good, actually," she finally answered his question.

It was then that Longbottom couldn't hold back any more. So he asked gruffly, turned towards Tom, "What do you want?"

Hermione saw Tom narrowing his eyes in anger as he glared at the blond Gryffindor. His arm twitched shortly as if he wanted to sling it around her waist and pull her against him possessively. In the end, he contained himself and settled with glowering darkly at Longbottom.

"You know, somehow I don't see the need to explain my actions to the likes of you," Tom sneered in a clipped voice.

Longbottom just stared furiously at Tom. Hermione sighed as she realized that Longbottom, despite what he had told her, would probably never fully accept her relationship with Tom. She was quite happy as they reached the potions classroom. Maybe Tom was on his best behaviour but Hermione knew that he had quite the volatile temper. If Longbottom pushed too much, Tom would surely loose said temper.

As they entered, Tom grabbed her hand rather tightly and dragged her over to their table. Malfoy was already sitting at the table, the calculating look in his cold eyes disturbing her. Sitting down beside Tom, she tried to ignore Malfoy. She placed her parchment, quill, and potions kit on the table. While she arranged everything neatly, the class room door opened and Slughorn entered.

"Good morning, class." Slughorn beamed cheerfully.

After a mumbled, not so cheerful, reply from the class, he turned to the blackboard behind him and waved his wand. Instantly, the instructions for the next step of creating the Ortus potion appeared.

Hermione had to stop herself from groaning in frustration. She had a hunch that this potion would be her downfall.

"Before you start, let us first go through the different steps for today," Slughorn said in his booming voice. "The first step, for example, cutting the myrtle flag roots, seems to be fairly simple. But don't be mistaken." He then started pacing to and fro in front of his class. "If not cut completely symmetrical, the myrtle flag’s effect will drastically diminish and thus the amount of roots will not suffice. Of course, you will be able to save the potion by adding more roots, though to estimate how much is needed is relatively difficult and requires much experience. So, the best way—"

Hermione dropped out of Slughorn's explanations and her gaze wandered back to the troubling potion. She itched to draw her wand and send a nice Reducto at the potion, simmering innocently in the cauldron. Sadly, she couldn't do that. A more stealthy strategy would be necessary. She needed to sabotage it at the last possible moment. That way there wouldn't be the time to start a new approach. The last step of finishing the Ortus potion was done by adding powdered boomslang skin and fairy wings. It might be difficult do sabotage that. Hermione twirled one of her locks absentmindedly around her finger. Maybe, she should use a step that was rather simple. A step where people wouldn't expect any mistakes to occur.

…maybe the hemlock…

Hemlock would be added shortly before the last finishing steps. It would be perfect. It was a very easy step as there was no special way of cutting the hemlock or anything else.

Yes, tampering with the hemlock could really ruin the potion, Hermione contemplated. It was almost ironic, that she was going to fail her first potions mark while Slughorn, and not Snape, was her teacher.

After some time into the lesson, Hermione noticed how Tom didn't pay any attention to Slughorn's lecture either. Instead, he stared at her intently. His eyes slowly wandered over her body while a greedy look crossed his face. All thoughts about the hazardous Ortus potion suddenly forgotten, Hermione grabbed her quill tighter and tried to re-focus her attention on Slughorn. It was no use. Images of last night's occurrences burned up in her mind. She couldn't help but feel her heart skipping a few beats as it hammered merrily away in her chest. She was completely put off balance as Tom's hand gently skimmed over her arm, sending shivers through her whole body. Hermione tried to block it out but it didn't work.

"-now, I think it's time for the practical approach," Slughorn very astutely announced in his booming voice.

His statement was followed by the usual scraping of chairs and chatter. Just to occupy and divert herself from that fluttery feeling in her stomach, Hermione pulled her wand and waved it at the Ortus potion, which still simmered inconspicuously in the cauldron. The flames, heating up the potion, burned higher. She looked up from the potion and saw that Malfoy had started to cut up the myrtle flag roots. Tom, on the other hand, was still not doing anything but staring at her, his eyes glistening with smugness. Hermione sighed softly and tried to concentrate on the potion. Her concentration, though, was again broken as Tom leaned towards her.

"Why did you leave so early?" he purred at her in his silky voice.

His voice alone was enough to send pleasant shivers down her spine.

"I… I..." she stuttered as she felt the blush hitting her again.

The fluttery feeling in her stomach was now combined with the sudden urge to grab Tom's shoulders and push him down on the table while finally wiping that smirk off his face by kissing him. As Hermione realized the course her thoughts had wandered off to, her face again heated up. Despite her deep blush, she cast a glance at Tom. He still scanned her with his incredibly grey eyes, but the haughty conduct left him as he spotted her flustered face.

His next words weren't laced with taunt anymore as he inquired tentatively, "You… don't regret anything, do you?"

She raised her head and found an apprehensive glint in his eyes. She suppressed a grin as she whispered in a deliberately timid voice,

"I do regret something actually."

He kept a straight face but his eyes widened slightly as he stared at her anxiously. Hermione couldn't hide her grin any longer as she drawled at him, all timidity gone from her voice, "I regret that you haven't been sorted into Gryffindor. Then I wouldn't have had to tiptoe around half the castle to get back to my dorm."

The unease quickly left Tom's eyes and he sniggered softly while he smiled at her relieved.

"Hermione, Hermione," he tsked at her. "You are rather evil, if I may say so," he enlightened her while he leaned comfortably back in his chair. "If anything, then I think the Sorting Hat made a mistake placing you into Gryffindor. Clearly, you are a Slytherin."

"Oh, please," Hermione scoffed at him. "Let's stop talking about idle house rivalries." She leaned towards him, reached out for him under the desk and laid her hand teasingly on his leg. "...when there are so many other things we could do," she whispered to him in quite the seductive voice.

Hermione was pleased with herself as she saw him finally losing some of his impeccable self-control. She removed her hand from him and said, in a bossy tone, "So, don't waste any more time with your chitchat and help cutting the myrtle flag roots."

She giggled quietly. Tom breathed in deeply to regain his composure. Sooner or later, that witch would surely drive him nuts, he thought as he gazed at Hermione. Her eyes sparkled mischievously and an amused smile played around her mouth as she cautiously stirred the potion in counter clockwise turns. Tom's eyes hungrily wandered over her pink lips, then down the soft skin of her neck until they landed on her chest. Now, he had to fight the urge to rip that blouse off her body right here in the class room. Images of her lying underneath him started to fly across his mind. He could still feel the softness of her body under his touch, could sense her every movement and could feel each tremble that ran through her. He needed to touch her hot skin. He wanted to make her scream again. His eyes plummeted further down and now wandered greedily over her slender legs. A longing twinge went through him as he remembered how she had slung those legs around him.

With a regretful sigh, Tom forced his gaze away from Hermione. It was too bad that they were in a crowded class room right now. At least he now knew that Hermione had finally submitted to him. He would never let her go again. She was his, and no-one, not even Hermione herself, could change that.

Out of the corners of his eyes, he again peered at her. She was still stirring the potion and now accepted the cut myrtle flag roots from Malfoy. Tom had to pull himself together to not let his thoughts wander away again. As seductive as Hermione might be, that couldn't completely distract him from her many secrets.

What about her strange powers? She was impossibly strong and could even rip down Hogwarts' warding magic. Where did Hermione's power come from? Tom remembered how angry she had been with him as he had tried to curse Longbottom with the Cruciatu Curse. Back then they had argued in the Come-And-Go room and Tom hadn't been able to hold his own magic back. He knew that his magic was very powerful, especially when he was this angered. There weren't many who could stand up to him. Hermione had, though. Her magic had crackled in the air and had felt changed, feral even.

Tom slightly turned his head and looked at the witch working beside him. Currently, she slowly and meticulously added the cut myrtle flag roots to the boiling potion. What was the source of her powerful magic? His gaze wandered from Hermione to her black wand, she had discarded on the table. His eyes narrowed suspiciously as he considered her wand. It looked like any other wand. Was this wand the explanation for Hermione's incredible power? Was that really the most powerful wand ever created? The Unbeatable Wand? It would explain everything that had happened so far, from her extraordinarily strong magic to her interest in Peverell's book.

Tom's train of thought was interrupted as Hermione looked up from the blue potion and narrowed her eyes at him. Then she snapped, earning herself a raised eyebrow from Malfoy who could hear it as well,

"What? Are you going to just sit around for the rest of the lesson?"

Tom smirked and leaned leisurely back in his chair. "I might as well."

Hermione huffed at him indignantly before she returned her attention to the potion. Tom still smirked while Malfoy threw a confused but all the same calculating look her way.

Later that day, Hermione stepped out of the DADA class room, followed by her friends. For once, she was actually quite happy that classes were over. Somehow, she hadn't been able to focus at all. Her thoughts had always drifted away and away, so that in the end she had no idea what professor McGray had been talking about.

"That was pretty interesting" Lupin said enthusiastically. "I never knew chimereas can be tamed."

An incredulous look appeared on Longbottom's face as he stared at Lupin.

"Clearly there is something seriously wrong with you," he finally told Lupin in a pitying tone. Then a broad smile broke out on his face and he exclaimed happily, "Classes are over for today! No more talking about school work."

Lupin just raised an eyebrow at him before he said unperturbed, "Actually there is this essay for Herbology I still wanted to look over and-"

"I said," Longbottom cut over him loudly. "No more school work!"

Lupin just sighed in face of his friend's enthusiasm. Hermione had to giggle softly.

"So, what are we going to do with this nice day?" Longbottom wondered cheerfully.

"Well, we have Quidditch practice in half an hour," Weasley now threw in.

"Oh?" Longbottom stared at him confused. "Is it Monday again?"

Lupin again sighed before he said in his calm voice, "And you tell me that there's something wrong with me?"
Longbottom wiped that comment off with a casual wave of his hand.

"Never claimed that I'm not crazy." Then he turned to Hermione and asked, "Do you wanna accompany us to practice? It's real fun."

As Hermione wasn't very fond of Quidditch at all, she didn't really want to watch them trying to break their necks on those insanely fast brooms. So, she was going to decline that offer and said,

"Er... actullay I-

She couldn't finish her sentence as someone called her name. Hermione turned around and found Tom walking towards her. There was a tiny smirk playing around his mouth and she could see his eyes wandering over her body. Predictably, the flush of heat hit her face again. Tom reached her and amusement began to dance in his eyes as he looked down at her, taking in her fierce blush. The heat on her face got even worse as Tom took her hand in his and held it gently. Maybe she should go and jump into the Great Lake, Hermione wondered wryly. That would surely stop this silly blushing.

Longbottom had by now obviously spotted Hermione's uncharacteristic shyness and began to scowl darkly at Tom. She didn't want to imagine what exactly the blond Gryffindor thought had evoked her sudden timidity around Tom. Tom, who had seen Longbottom's hostile behaviour, raised one eyebrow at the Gryffindor mockingly. Before Tom could open his mouth and say something probably insulting, Hermione pressed his hand warningly. She was actually surprised as he complied with her. Tom just threw a rather nasty sneer Longbottom's way but remained to be silent. The scowl on Longbottom's face grew even fiercer and Hermione saw him reaching for his wand.

She was incredibly relieved as Lupin broke the tense silence. He smiled at her encouragingly before he said, "How about we meet later again in the common room? You could check my Herbology essay over. That would be helpful."

"Sure." She smiled at him gratefully. "But only if you check mine."

Lupin then turned to his two friends and said, "Now, I thought you had a Quidditch practice to attend to."

Longbottom didn't answer anything but narrowed his eyes at Tom angrily but he managed to control his temper. Lupin grabbed his arm and pulled him away. Hermione heaved a sigh of relief and allowed Tom to drag her away in the opposite direction. He only slowed down and released his rather firm grip on her hand as they had walked some distance away from the DADA class room. They still hadn't spoken one word yet.

Without looking up at him, Hermione whispered, "Thank you."

She could feel how he wrapped his arm around her shoulders and pulled her closer to him.

"Pff, it's just no challenge to curse an idiot like him," Tom drawled at her arrogantly.

Hermione peered up at him and found a rather smug expression on his face. She smiled sheepishly at him and slung her arm around his waist. Even with that rather haughty look on his face, Tom was still incredibly handsome. The fluttery feeling was back in her stomach as Hermione scanned him. Tom was so near that she could smell his pleasant scent. Unable to resist that longing feeling inside of her, Hermione snuggled closer against him. Though now that Tom looked at her so intently the stupid blush hit her again. By now she was rather annoyed by it. Tom seemed to have spotted her red face, too, as a frown appeared between his eyebrows.

"Hermione?" he asked cautiously while scanning her worried. "Are you sure you are okay?"
She could now see concern flashing through his eyes. Hermione bit her lower lip as she stared up at him.

"Y... yes," was the only thing she could stammer.

That answer did nothing to dispel the concern on his face. If anything, it grew worse and now was mingled with a touch of anxiety.

"It wasn't my intention to pressure you into something you didn't want," Tom told her hesitantly while casting her a look of trepidation.

Hermione didn't want him to worry because there was no need for that. There really wasn't anything she regretted. Maybe it hadn't been her plan to sleep with him yesterday but she still was very glad that it had happened. It had been perfect in every way she could have wished for. It had simply taken her breath away. Though as her thoughts had wandered back to last night, the heat on her face had intensified yet again.

"I understand if you don't want to talk about it," Tom continued, sounding very alarmed. "But you do know that you can tell me everything, don't you?"

Hermione looked up at him but found herself unable to listen to him. Her thoughts still danced merrily around last night and it seemed that her gaze was magically drawn to his lips. Maybe that was the best solution to get rid of her ridiculous shyness around him. It promised to be a lot more pleasurable than a jump into the Great Lake.

Hermione still didn't reply anything, causing the worried frown on Tom's face to deepen. He stepped a little closer to her, took her hand in his and held it gently. She could see him opening his mouth to say something surely nice and reassuring, but Hermione didn't leave him the time to do so. She raised her hand, cupped his cheeks and pulled his face down to her. She could see his eyes widen in surprise at her rather rough actions, but that didn't stop her to press her lips against his. Her arms were wrapped around his neck as she deepened the kiss. The fluttery feeling in her stomach burned up and her heart beat incredibly fast as she felt Tom responding to her kiss. He slung his arms around her waist and pressed her tightly against him.

Hermione needed to gasp for breath as they finally broke apart again. Then she looked up at him and a smile broke out on her face as that silly blush finally didn't hit her again. Tom was staring back at her and Hermione noted satisfied that the concern had left his impossibly grey eyes.

"I guess that means you are not angry with me after all," he stated, light taunt seeping through his voice, though the relief was over-present on his face.

Hermione just grinned up at him and said in a teasing voice, "You know what?" She didn't leave him the time to answer but again pulled his head down to her and drawled in a rather haughty tone, "You talk too much."

She kissed him rather forcefully while she started to run her hands demandingly through his velvety hair. Tom didn't respond to her at all, Hermione noted amused. He seemed to be stunned by her sudden actions.

Suddenly a rather sharp voice rang through the corridor, "That is quite enough."

Hermione was so startled that she released Tom and took a step away from him. She turned her head to see who had disturbed them. Somehow she should have known it, Hermione thought in exasperation as her eyes fell on the unbidden guest. Just a few metres away in the otherwise deserted corridor stood none other than Legifer. Her appearance was as impeccable as ever with her squeaky clean clothes and her immaculate hairdo. A furious scowl on her face, the professor glared at Hermione. Hermione actually wanted to roll her eyes but was stopped by that dangerous look on Legifer's face. It was then that Legifer broke the stupor of indignation she had fallen into and walked over to Tom and Hermione. The fierce scowl only shortly left her face as her dark eyes wandered over Tom but was back again, as Legifer stared angrily at Hermione.

"Ms DeCerto," she hissed in a clipped tone. "Never in my life have I been met with such impudence. I actually didn't want to believe my eyes."

Legifer stared at Hermione irately. For once, Hermione knew what was going on in that twisted mind of this woman, but she just didn't care. She planted a look of polite interest on her face as she looked back at Legifer. She knew that this would only aggravate the professor more, but right now Hermione couldn't stop herself.

"Have all those hours in detention not taught you anything?" Legifer spat at her, seething with anger. Hermione didn't reply anything. All she could do was stopping herself from screaming an angry 'no' at the professor. Legifer's level of ire spiralled upwards as Hermione remained to be silent.

"I am disgusted by your behaviour," Legifer finally told her in a cold voice. "How can you hassle Mr Riddle like that?"

Hermione pressed her mouth into a thin line as she heard Legifer's absurd reproach. What did that demented woman think? That Hermione had kissed Tom against his will? How absolutely ludicrous! Legifer threw another cold glare her way before her eyes wandered to Tom. Hermione raised her eyebrows in wonder as there was now something like concern seeping into that crazy woman's gaze.

"Are you all right, Mr Riddle?" Legifer inquired, sounding almost concerned.

"Yes, professor," Tom replied blandly.

A contrite look appeared on his face and Hermione couldn't help but admire his acting skills. As he continued she could hear fake repentance in his voice, though, Legifer seemed to believe his act.

"I am very sorry. I don't know what got into me," Tom said, looking ashamed of himself. "I promise it's never going to happen again."

"There's no need for you to apologize. I know it wasn't your fault," Legifer replied in an oddly sympathetic tone.

Her eyes wandered to Hermione again and aversion flared up in them. Hermione just ignored it and desperately tried to get her furious magic under control. Legifer turned towards Tom again and said,

"Mr Riddle, I have told you before: this girl is not good for you." Her voice had lost its usual sharpness and sounded almost kind. "You shouldn't spend your time with her. She'll only ever get you into trouble."

Legifer sounded as if she tried to convince Tom of leaving Hermione. Consecutively, Hermione really had to fight to stop herself from pulling her wand. Her magic bubbled up in her, enraged by that woman's concern for Tom.

Then Legifer spat at Hermione, the inflection in her voice far from kind, "The only reason I'm not punishing you for that embarrassing behaviour is that I would then have to punish Mr Riddle, too. Seeing as he is innocent, I wouldn't want to cause him any more problems." Legifer's glacial look hit Hermione and clearly told her that the professor thought Hermione was Tom's biggest problem.

Hermione shortly wondered why she was holding her magic back in the first place. That lunatic would deserve to be cursed anyway. After Legifer's last statement, Hermione saw out of the corner of her eyes how Tom seemed to relax a little bit. She cast a sideways glance at him and nearly groaned in frustration as she found a gleeful look on his face. Now that they were not going to get punished for – For having done nothing, in fact! – Tom seemed to be very amused by the whole thing. That rather unsavory smirk, curling up his mouth, wasn't really reassuring either.

"Thank you, professor," Tom said, gratitude tinting his voice while there was not even a shadow of his vile amusement visible on his face. Hermione cursed the fact that he was such a damn convincing actor. "I'm sure Hermione is grateful as well."

He cast her a determinedly insecure smile and Hermione narrowed her eyes at him in anger. She could see a mischievous glint in his grey eyes and she knew he obviously wanted to torment her now. Probably, because she had caused him to worry so much unnecessarily.

"You know," Tom continued towards Legifer in a conversational tone while that innocent look was still on his face. "Hermione can sometimes be a little hot-headed but she is a nice girl."

Here he inserted a pause and seemed to ponder something. Hermione knew, that he only did that to savour that frosty glare Legifer now sent her way. Then he smiled charmingly at the professor and said,

"Even if she is a little bit... er... dominating."

Now, that was enough!

"Tom!" Hermione hissed at him threateningly, anger clearly lacing her voice.

He looked at her with false apprehension, taking a small step away from her, but Hermione could see the triumph in his grey eyes. It couldn't have been more obvious if he had smirked at her.

"It's even worse than I anticipated," Legifer stated mordantly.

Hermione's glare wandered from an amused Tom to Legifer who shook her head in indignation.

"You shouldn't treat Mr Riddle like that," she snapped curtly at Hermione.

Yeah, what I should do is cursing that lying jerk! Hermione thought enraged.

Legifer turned to Tom and said kindly, "If she causes you more problems, don't hesitate to come to me. I can help you."

Hermione could see that by now Tom had to really work to prevent himself from breaking down in laughter. He still managed to answer, though.

"Thank you," he said in a soft voice.

"Yes, thank you!" Hermione almost yelled at Legifer, trying to not completely lose her temper.

She grabbed Tom's hand and gruffly dragged him after her as she stomped down the corridor, away from Legifer before she would really curse the woman.

… or Tom!
As they were some distance away from the professor, Hermione let go of Tom's hand. Her magic was furiously pulsing through her as she walked down the corridor in angry strides. Tom's footsteps behind her told her that he was still following her.

The nerve of him! Hermione lost her temper again and whipped around to him. Her eyes glinted dangerously as she drowned him in a withering look.

"Are you happy now?" she barked.

A smug smile broke out on his face, then he purred contently, "Yes, quite."

"Why did you have to do that?" she thundered at him, nettled by the amusement on his face.

He just smirked at her arrogantly. Hermione growled at him menacingly as she wasn't able to put her anger into words anymore. Her magic left her and crackled vindictively around her. Maybe she should just curse him that would at least relieve some of her stress.

As her magic bristled so violently in the air, suddenly, a strange look passed Tom's face. Hermione narrowed her eyes at him suspiciously. What did he plan now? Did he want to torment her some more? The strange look didn't leave his face as Tom's eyes slowly wandered over her. Without giving an advance warning, he abruptly walked towards her. Instantly, a deep frown appeared on Hermione's face. Her magic was still raging around her, but that force was not enough to stop Tom. Strands of his own magic seemed to be wrapped around him, protecting him from her.

As Tom reached her, he stopped standing right in front of her. Hermione raised her head and continued to hit him with her venomous glare. There was an oddly hungry look on his face as Tom stared down at her, taking in her livid expression. Hermione was just about to draw her wand in order to finally release some of her pent up anger, as Tom suddenly grabbed her shoulders roughly and pulled her towards him. His lips crashed on her own and he kissed her forcefully. Hermione was left stunned by his sudden actions and didn't stop him as he demandingly slung his arms around her, pulling her even tighter against him. Despite her previous anger, she found herself unable to push him away. Her magic still rushed around her and ripped at him fiercely, though anger was strangely absent. A muffled moan escaped her as Tom continued to ravish her mouth. He had pushed her against the corridor wall while his tongue was exploring her mouth aggressively.

He reached for the door that was right beside them and opened it. He never stopped to kiss her as he tugged Hermione into the dark class room. She barely registered his action because her attention was solely focused on the sensation of his mouth on her own. He crushed her against the classroom wall and continued his onslaught while he closed the door. Hermione let out a cry of surprise as he bit her lower lip. His hand had now wandered to the back of her head and he pushed her into position while tracing more kisses down her neck. Hermione's breathing was ragged and she found herself unable to think coherently anymore.

She could feel Tom smirking against her skin, before he straightened up again and pulled his wand. With a small casual movement of his wand he had locked the door and put a silencing spell on the classroom. Hermione looked up at him and found that smirk still curling up his mouth. His eyes darkened considerably as they lazily wandered over her body. Then he raised his wand again and waved it at her. Hermione gasped as her clothes vanished from her body. Before she had the time to protest, Tom grabbed her again and pushed her into the wall. He firmly planted his lips on her own, thus stopping any objection she might have had. Though, admittedly, Hermione was way too distracted by his hands running over her body to be in any state to defy him. His fingers left behind an almost painful burn of desire. All her thoughts had long since fled her mind and the only thing she could concentrate on was to find a way to bridge the distance between them. Tom seemed to have found a very convenient way. He grabbed her around her waist with both his hands and hoisted her Hermione instantly wrapped her legs around him and clung to him. Her back was still pushed against the wall. Tom captured her lips with his mouth and kissed her passionately. She ran both her hands through his dark, silky soft hair while tightening her legs around him demandingly. His mouth left her lips and slowly wandered down her neck. Hermione gasped as he bit her again. But she didn't mind at all. In fact, his actions evoked an exciting tingle running over her whole body and her breathing became rather laboured. The fluttery feeling that had tormented her since potions class turned into a burning need. It welled up inside of her and Hermione was desperate to satiate that desire.

She removed her hands from Tom's velvety hair and moved them down, skimming over his neck and then down his chest. As he felt her movement, Tom looked up at her. Her desire only intensified as she looked into his stormy grey eyes. A predatory glint appeared in his eyes before he again covered her mouth with his, kissing her hungrily. Hermione moaned in pleasure. Then her hands finally found his belt and she quickly opened it. Tom's kiss became even more demanding as she opened his trousers and slowly pulled them and his boxers down. By now Tom's breathing was rather ragged, increasing Hermione's own desire even further. She wrapped her arms around him and pulled him nearer.

She could feel him pushing into her and Hermione had never felt more alive. Her magic was cracking around her excitedly, now joined by Tom's magic. The two forces danced around them. Strands of their magic connected and entwined with each other just as much as their bodies were merged. Hermione was panting, breathing heavily, as she felt Tom so near her. Her hands had wandered to his back and clutched the fabric of his green uniform pullover tightly. If the fabric hadn't protected him, her fingernails would have surely left behind scratch marks on his back.

The feeling of his movement and of their connected magic was too much for her. The burning feeling, originating somewhere deep in her stomach, grew until it quickly engulfed her completely. Hermione's eyes fluttered shut and she clasped Tom even tighter while she screamed out in pleasure, his name hot on her lips.

Hermione lay, still breathing heavily, in his arms. She had put her head down on his shoulder. A thin film of sweat covered her forehead and her body still shivered from the pleasure. She sighed softly and tightened her hold on Tom. He turned his head and placed a soft kiss on her neck before he held her firmly around her waist and put her down. Hermione huddled against him and slung her arms around his waist. Tom embraced her and pulled her even tighter against him. She raised her head to look up at him. There was softness glinting in his eyes as he smiled down at her. Hermione could feel her heart skip a few beats and she smiled back at him. She was very glad that the blush didn't return while she lost herself in his grey eyes.

"Don't think that you can now end every argument like that," she warned him in a stern tone, but she didn't manage to wipe the smile from her face.

"I would never," Tom assured her with sincerity seeping through his voice. The smirk on his face, though, wasn't that sincere.

Hermione was feeling too content to want to argue about his honesty, so she leaned her head against his chest. His arms were still wrapped reassuringly around her and Hermione was just happy to feel him so near her.

After some time she was starting to get a bit chilly as coldness was seeping through her from the stone floor. It was then that she remembered how she was actually not wearing any clothes while Tom was again perfectly dressed in his uniform. She raised her head at him and said,

"Now, are you going to conjure back my clothes?"
He just smirked down at her. "Hmm, I don't know. I prefer you this way."

Hermione scowled at him which only caused him to chuckle softly. Then he bent down, brushed his lips against hers before he released her and took a step away from her. His eyes once again wandered over her body then he pulled his wand and waved it at her. Her clothes seemed to reappear out of nowhere and swirled back around her body. He took her hand in his and led her out of the deserted class room.

Tom liked thinking back to the actions that had followed after Hermione had dragged him away from that ridiculous teacher who had found them kissing in a corridor. He had been surprised that the woman hadn't given them any punishment, but he had always been very convincing, hadn't he? Not even Hermione had been able to resist him, he thought haughtily.

He snuck a look at her, standing before the shelf full of his books. Right now, they were in the Slytherin dorm and Tom sat cross-legged on his bed while trying to finish his Ancient Runes essay. Hermione, being somewhat determined to never do her homework while in his presence, was going through the books he had collected over his years at Hogwarts.

Tom enjoyed the triumphant feeling as he continued looking at the witch. Since he had kissed her for the first time during the Christmas break, he had known that Hermione would be his. She had put up an admirable fight and had forced him to surrender a little bit of himself to her but finally she belonged to him. A dark look crossed his eyes as he stared at her. She had taken one of the books from the shelf and flipped through it before she placed it back. Tom returned his eyes to his essay in front of him but he couldn't concentrate. His thoughts still circled around Hermione. He might have finally claimed her, but there still was a long way to go. After all, there were so many secrets, swirling around her person.

"You can't tell me that you really bought all those books, or that somebody gave them to you," Hermione suddenly brought him out of his thoughts with accusation tinging her words.

A smirk appeared on Tom's face, but he didn't look up at her again. Well, she was right after all.

"Let's just say I acquired them," he told her amused.

"Yeah, yeah, 'acquired'… as if," she mumbled to herself in exasperation.

"Pff, you are just jealous," Tom teased her lightly while rolling up the parchment with his essay. "Because I have so many useful friends, giving me books. In contrast to your Gryffindor idiots who don't even know what a book is. You know."

Tom hesitated as he suddenly heard a soft gasp and then the sound of something falling on the floor. He turned around. Hermione stood beside the shelf, seemingly frozen to the spot, and was staring wide-eyed at something on the floor. Tom furrowed his brow as he walked over to her. There was a strange look of panic on Hermione's face. What had scared her so? Tom's eyes wandered from her to the black book lying on the floor. He instantly recognized the book. He had bought it in Diagon Alley before the start of this school year as he had gotten everything he needed for Hogwarts. It hadn't been expensive, as Tom never had much money to spare, still this black book was a rather important thing. He bent down and picked it up. It had opened when it had fallen down on the floor, but its pages were empty anyway. Tom would never write his secret plans and thoughts down in a book for everyone to read. No, he thought as a small smirk curled up his mouth, he actually intended to fill this book with something else than written words.
"Something wrong?" he asked Hermione gently as he noticed that fearful expression was still on her face.

As if his voice had woken her from her stupor, the trepidation seemed to leave her and she looked up at him.

"No," she replied in a firm voice which betrayed nothing of her fear. "I just remembered that tomorrow's Friday and I have Household again."

Somehow he knew that she was lying but he didn't know why. What had scared her so? It sure couldn't be the book, he thought as his gaze wandered to the small, black book in his hands. It was, after all, just a perfectly normal and ordinary diary.

{{{{{{{{+}}}}}}}}

The next day, Hermione sat hunched up in her chair and tried to appear as inconspicuous as possible. She wondered why she still put up with this farce. Seriously, she should have just skipped this class. Since Legifer had caught her kissing Tom, Hermione had tried to evade the professor. Now it was Friday and Hermione couldn't very well eschew her anymore.

Over her text book she cautiously peered at the professor standing before the class and lecturing about one stupid thing or other. Hermione, for one, had long since stopped to listen. Oh, how she hated Fridays, Hermione thought tiredly as she looked at Legifer's stern deportment. Her clothes were impeccable as always and her hair was pulled back in a neatly and completely immaculate bun. Not one strand of her dark hair was out of place as she stalked in front of the class, still talking about something Hermione tried to ignore.

Hermione hadn't thought it possible, but since that horrible woman had thrown her into detention right after the Christmas break, her dislike for the teacher had even grown. That horrible detention proved to be never-ending. Every Friday evening, Hermione had to force herself to walk to Legifer's office. She had yet to finish the stupid book Legifer wanted her to read. Normally, Hermione was a fast reader, but it was hard to finish a book if after reading only one word you just wanted to rip it apart and throw the pieces at Legifer's head.

...and I always rebuked Harry when he complained about Snape, she thought as her gaze wandered back to Legifer. She silently envied Tom, who sat in his Arithmancy class. Hermione hated the Arithmancy professor, too, as he was one nasty chauvi, but Gauß was still better than Legifer. At least he just ignored Hermione during class.

Sometime later suddenly chatter broke loose and the other students stuffed their quill and parchment into their bags. Hermione looked at them in confusion. The class couldn't be over already, could it? After checking her watch, Hermione saw that she was indeed not so lucky. There was still at least half an hour left. But then why did the other students gather up their stuff? She leaned to Rose who sat beside her and was busy with stuffing her parchment into her bag.

"What's happening?" Hermione asked.

Rose just looked at her with wide eyes, then she inquired in her shrill voice, "Haven't you been paying attention at all?"

Hermione just continued to look at her blankly. Rose giggled infuriatingly before she chortled, "Of course, it's hard to concentrate for you. Been thinking about Riddle, have you?"

Hermione didn't deign to answer to that but just began to pack her things away, copying the other
"Please, ladies," Legifer's annoying voice echoed loudly through the classroom. "Hurry up, we don't have the whole day."

Hermione looked at the professor standing before the class. That incredible and pointless perfection the woman's clothes exhibited was enough to raise Hermione's already seething temper even further. Legifer's dark eyes wandered over the class, seemingly impatient. She wrinkled her nose in distaste as her gaze fell on Hermione. Hermione kept her face absolutely blank as she, without breaking eye contact with Legifer, took her piece of parchment, stuffed it into her bag and then slammed the bag on the floor beside her table. After that she just continued to look at the professor while raising her eyebrows provocingly. In fact, Hermione had no idea why she was behaving like this. It was not at all like her to be anything but polite to a professor. But Legifer, it seemed, was an exception. No matter what Hermione told herself, it was just not possible to be anything but insolent in this particular class.

Maybe it's mum's fault, Hermione mused. She was a hippie back in the sixties. Back then, she had barely been older than Hermione now was. And she had met Hermione's dad. A small smile appeared on her face as she thought about her parents. She really missed them.

Legifer had long since abandoned her attempts of glaring at Hermione and now hissed in her usual sharp voice, turned towards her class, "-and I will stress it again: Don't make any mistakes, for I will be grading your work today."

Hermione was ripped from her happy memories as she heard the word 'grade'. That always managed to trigger her know-it-all mode. So, she focused her attention, for once, at Legifer. The woman waved her wand in one firm movement and, suddenly, out of thin air, packages of eggs, several bags of flour and different backing pans appeared on the tables. Hermione could just frown at this in confusion. What the hell was going on here?

"Now, ladies," Legifer announced in a clipped voice. "I want you to bake a cake. You can use whichever recipe you want, though I recommend one of those I have introduced earlier this lesson."

Her stern eyes swept over the class before she stated in a terse tone, "If you want to get a good mark in this, I suggest you give your very best and also use the charms we've been going into those last few lessons. Don't forget, though, you are not learning all of this just to achieve good grades in school. This will be part of your chores after you are married. Now, you don't want to disappoint your future husband, do you?"

Yeah, imagine that, disappointing my dear husband because I can't bake… Hermione thought dryly before her gaze wandered from the sour looking professor to the ingredients standing on the desk before her. She was feeling rather lost now. She noticed that the other students had already started with their work. Diana waved her wand at the eggs while crying "Foris!". Immediately, the eggs floated up in the air and over Diana's bowl, before they cracked open and landed neatly in the bowl.

Hermione sighed and looked back at her own ingredients. It wasn't like she didn't know how to bake a cake. In fact, she had often baked together with her mum when she had come back from Hogwarts during the breaks. Problem was, though, that she was Muggleborn. Thus, she only knew the Muggle way of making a cake, and that required some form of oven. Whatever spells Legifer had just spoken about; Hermione didn't know any of them. For months, she hadn't been paying any attention in this class. For the first time, she understood how Harry and Ron must have felt during potions, Hermione thought as she stared helplessly at the baking utensils before her.

Ah, whatever. I'll just try my luck.
So, Hermione reached for the flour. There actually was a good nut cake recipe she could try. But as Hermione wanted to put the flour into a bowl she noticed the absence of any measuring cup. Obviously, there was some spell for that. Hermione sighed tiredly. This was going to take some time, she thought, already wanting to quit.

Sometime late, Hermione was just stirring her rather strangely coloured dough with a wooden stick, as Legifer came to her table. The professor narrowed her dark eyes disapprovingly at the dough and how Hermione stirred it.

"Doing it by hand, are you, Ms DeCerto?" was the only thing Legifer hissed derisively, before she strode on.

Hermione pressed her mouth into a thin line and stopped herself from sending a tripping jinx Legifer's way. As her dough was as good as it would get, Hermione stood before her next problem: the absence of any oven. Well, there were quite a few spells that created heat. But Hermione just wasn't sure she could create a heating spell and have it constantly on 350 F° for half an hour. She just shrugged her shoulders. What did she care anyway? This class was stupid, after all. Baking was supposed to be fun. It was ridiculous that she even played along. Hermione just filled her dough into one of the backing pans, before she pondered which spell to use.

After having found a spell, she waved her wand and whispered, "Aestus."

Instantly, heat surrounded the baking pan. As expected, the whole thing soon proved to be rather difficult. The dough turned an unhealthy black on the outside. The table on which the baking pan stood began to smoke slightly.

Hmm, not a very good spell for making a cake then, Hermione decided as she waved her wand again, thus ending her spell.

The cake had by now turned into a nice charcoal black and the table was still smoking forebodingly. There went her efforts of coming out of this as top-of-the-class. Legifer would truly be surprised to see her favourite student fail. Hermione chuckled softly at that thought. Then she put her blackened cake on a plate, sat down on her chair and waited for this stupid class to be over soon.

Before the class was over, Legifer took a piece of parchment in one hand and a quill in the other, then she slowly stalked through the rows of tables. She eyed the different results of the class and wrote something down with each student she passed. Hermione had to work hard to not snort at the whole process. It wasn't long and Legifer stopped before Hermione's table. Only Diana and Hermione had by now managed to finish their cakes. Though, in Hermione's case that was more due to the fact that she had given up. Diana, on the other hand, had even covered her deliciously smelling chocolate cake with a dark frosting. Hermione impatiently checked her wrist watch while Legifer's eyes wandered over Diana's cake. The professor didn't say anything to Diana's efforts but just noted an 'A' behind Diana's name on her parchment, then she continued on.

Only an 'Acceptable'? Hermione wondered annoyed. Too high and mighty to give one measly praise, is she?

Legifer proceeded to examine Rose's and Lucia's work. The professor just wrinkled her nose and narrowed her eyes as she saw Lucia's half done cake, before she turned to Rose. Rose nearly whimpered in fear as Legifer's cold eyes wandered over her. Hermione felt the need to roll her eyes.

"Ms Smith, I dearly hope that is not the best you can manage," was all Legifer commented sternly as she prodded Rose's cake with the tip of her wand.
Rose whimpered for real and replied weakly, "N- no, professor."

Legifer didn't say anything else but just noted a 'P' down on her clipboard. Hermione shook her head indignantly. That was a perfectly fine cake. Hermione, for one, would have been glad if she had had something like that back in her time as she had lived in that tent with no steady food supply. Her eyes wandered to her own baking attempt. That thing resembled more a coal than anything else. She wondered if it was even edible.

"Why am I not surprised?" a condescending voice brought Hermione back from her musing.

She looked up and found Legifer standing right before her. There was an evil smile on the professor's face as her eyes wandered over the black coal on Hermione's desk. Without saying anything to Hermione she just waved her wand over Hermione's baking attempt and the whole thing instantly vanished. Seriously, Hermione couldn't even blame her this time, but that triumphant glee on the professor's face still managed to raise her temper a few notches.

"Now, I don't want you to force Mr Riddle to eat something like that," Legifer stated in a cold voice. "It's difficult enough for him as it is. And he would be too polite to tell you how awful that really was."

Hermione just glared defiantly at the professor.

"I still hope he'll come to his senses," Legifer continued in her sharp voice. "It is a mystery what he sees in you."

Hermione had to bite her tongue hard to stop herself from replying something which would surely get her into another detention… or expelled. Straight into Azkaban, more like. Hermione decided as she spotted that self-satisfied look on the professor's face and she had to resist the urge to pull her wand.

"That is five points from Gryffindor, I think," Legifer declared with a fat smile still on her face. "I've never seen a more pathetic attempt before. I even feel I'm overrating you by giving you a 'T'."

Hermione's mouth formed into a thin line. She had never before failed any class. Aside from Divination maybe, but that was not really a class. Legifer shook her head reproachfully while her cold eyes wandered over Hermione. What else was wrong? Surely, that insane woman couldn't find a fault with her clothes. Hermione was wearing a uniform for Merlin's sake. It was just not possible that anything was out of place with her. But the disgusted look on Legifer's face told Hermione that she would whole-heartedly disagree.

Suddenly, sickening pity entered Legifer's voice as she continued, "Ms DeCerto, if you don't try to change, you will never find a husband. No man would marry someone like you! Not even Mr Riddle would be able to put up with such a failure."

"Unmarried forever – what a horrible, horrible fate that would be," Hermione replied in a steady voice, while fighting to contain her sarcasm.

Legifer just huffed at her and again shook her head as if Hermione was a lost case. Then the professor turned away and continued her way through the class, leaving behind a very pissed Hermione in her wake.

---

Later that day, Hermione angrily stomped down a corridor in direction of the Library. Since that Household class, she had been unable to calm down. That had resulted in her being rather snippy towards her Gryffindor friends. So, she had decided to visit the Library lest she curse an innocent bystander. She secretly hoped she would find Tom in the Library.

Maybe I can curse him… It was his fault that Legifer was so nasty towards her, wasn't it? Hermione ignored her voice of justice that gave a yelp at that train of thought. She was still way too furious to be reasonable right now. That ridiculous class was just unbearable. How was she supposed to deal with so much stupidity?

Really, a 'T'? Hermione growled darkly, making a few Ravenclaw first years jumping nervously out of her way.

She had never gotten a 'T' for anything. Not even in Divination. Though, that was because she hadn't stayed long enough to give Trelawny the chance to grade her. Sadly, dropping Household was not an option. After her very first Household class Hermione had gone to Dumbledore and had demanded to leave that class. She balled her hands into fists as she remembered how Dumbledore had looked at her sympathetically before he had told her that it was a compulsory class for every girl. How dare they force her to suffer through Legifer's insanity?

I can't believe she gave me a 'T'! Hermione thought furiously before she kicked a suit of armour, standing nearby.

She muttered a hasty apology as said suit tried to kick her in return while releasing a string of profanities. Hermione hurried down the corridor. Legifer's words somehow still ran through her head. You will never find a husband. No man would marry someone like you! That was ridiculous, Hermione thought as the fury again bubbled up in her. How dare that woman judge her like that? Hermione was seething, though there was no denying that her irritation was mingled with something else.

Her previously angry steps became more hesitant as she slowed down a little. Hermione knew that the woman was completely wrong. But still, what if there was a modicum of truth in her insanity? She ran a hand through her curly hair as she reluctantly decided to follow that thought a little longer. After all, she was stranded in the past. The expectations men had towards women were different from what she knew from the nineties. But surely, Legifer was over the top, wasn't she? Hermione tried to convince herself, while insecurity still disturbed her piece of mind. All this housewitch stuff where the woman needed to be submissive and obedient towards her husband was just unbearable. Hermione had almost reached the Library as the thought that really bucked her flashed up in her mind. What did Tom expect her to be? Hermione tried to quench her worries and walked into the Library.

"Good evening, Ms DeCerto," Ms Peters, the librarian, greeted her while smiling kindly at Hermione.

"Good evening." Hermione smiled back.

"Really, Ms DeCerto, its Friday evening," Ms Peters now chided her gently. "You don't plan to spend your free time in the library, do you?"

Hermione's smile even widened so that Ms Peters sighed, "You need to have a little more fun, instead of wasting away in the library. That's actually the same thing I told Mr Riddle, but he didn't want to heed my advice either."

"Tom?" Hermione asked. "Is he still here?"

A knowing smile appeared on Ms. Peters friendly face as she spotted Hermione's hopeful expression.
"I see you do know how to have fun after all," the librarian teased her gently. "Yes, Mr Riddle is still somewhere in the library."

"Thanks," Hermione threw back over her shoulder as she hurried into the Library.

She couldn't see Tom at either of the tables. Just a few Ravenclaws where assembled around one of the tables, seemingly busy with their homework. Aside from them the Library was deserted. It was a Friday evening, after all.

As Hermione searched the Library for Tom, her previous chain of thought came back to her. Her anxiety was silly, wasn't it? Surely, Tom didn't want her to be that obedient housewitch Legifer unsuccessfully tried to form her into. Though, he still was a product of his time, while Hermione was a stranger travelling through the past. She could never be that manageable woman, Hermione thought while walking towards the Restricted Section. If Tom expected something like that, he would need to think again.

… or leave me… Hermione swallowed nervously at that thought.

She passed the Restricted Section and walked towards that huge window, hidden behind a huge book shelf. Tom had once shown her that place. If he wasn't there, then Hermione didn't know where else to look. She needed to step around the shelf full of old, dusty books to finally reach the window. A smile instantly curled up her mouth as she found Tom lounging comfortably on the wide window sill. He was propped up against the window frame and held an old, leather-bound book in his hands.

Without looking up from his book, Tom said in his smooth voice, "Hello, Hermione."

She raised her eyebrows in surprise. "How did you know it's me?"

A haughty smirk appeared on Tom's face then he turned his head slightly and scanned her with his grey eyes.

"Who else could it be?" His reply was tinged with amusement.

Hermione just sighed. Then she walked over to him and pecked him on the lips before she sat down beside him. She opened her school bag and pulled out her Transfiguration text book. Dumbledore had asked them in class today to read the chapter on advanced ways to transfer magic. Hermione drew up her legs so that she ended up sitting cross-legged on the window sill with the book in her lap. Before she began to read her gaze wandered back to Tom. He still leaned leisurely against the window frame and had by now refocused his attention to his book. Hermione's eyes swiftly took in the book's title.

"Maledictions Most Potent?" she inquired curiously.

Tom didn't say anything but just peered at her over the book.

"You still haven't finished that?" Hermione jeered at him. "I bought you that book almost three months ago."

"It's actually the second time I read it," Tom countered smoothly. Then a sickeningly cheesy smile grazed his features and he said, "How could I not re-read it, after such a wonderful girl bestowed it to me?" His fake charm was so overtly done that Hermione had to roll her eyes at him.

He chuckled at that, but then there appeared a rather derisive smile on his face before he remarked patronizingly, "Really, Hermione. You are in no position to disapprove of other people's ability to learn." The evil smile on his face widened before he said, scorn oozing from his words, "Not after that obviously disastrous Household class."

Hermione's eyes widened at him. "How do you know about that?"

Tom didn't answer but just shook his head pityingly at her. Hermione was sure the Slytherin girls from the class had told him about her performance during Household today. So, that was how Tom spent his free time? Chatting with inane girls in the Slytherin common room? Hermione narrowed her eyes at him, but he only smirked back at her.

She lost her patience and snapped at Tom, "I should like to inform you that the whole thing was certainly not my fault."

"Uhu," Tom made skeptically.

Hermione glared at him but that didn't dispel the condescending amusement, still showing on his face. So he reached for a rolled-up piece of parchment, containing her Transfiguration notes from today, and whacked him on the head with it.

"Ouch," Tom exclaimed, feigning hurt. Then he again smirked at her and Hermione groaned softly.

"Now, I see why you are so bad in that Household class of yours," he drawled, his voice thick with scorn. "You are just too violent. How can that poor professor be supposed to teach you anything if her life's in danger every time you are around?"

Hermione tried to glare at him, but she didn't manage and instead had to giggle as she imagined the satisfaction of sending a Bad Bogey Hex Legifer's way.

"If she's continuing like that, then her life's really in danger," she informed Tom, still laughing. "And now stop disturbing me, I have to read this chapter."

Tom just sent her another of his arrogant smiles then he went back to reading his book. Hermione finally opened her Transfiguration text book and started to read the chapter about advanced ways of transferring magic. Soon, she had to admit that there still was something nagging at her mind. It was then that Legifer's sharp words came back to her. She glanced at Tom reading in his book. He seemed to be enthralled with the knowledge the book provided him with. A few strands of his silky, dark hair fell into his eyes but he didn't notice.

'It's a mystery what he sees in you.' Hermione now bit her lip as she scanned him.

"Tom?" she asked hesitantly.

"Hm?" made Tom, still distracted by his book.

Hermione scanned him. He hadn't looked up from his book yet. So she mumbled nervously, "Do you- What would you-"

Her stammering somehow caught his attention and he curiously looked at her.

Hermione sighed then she whispered softly like she was revealing a huge secret, "I... I really suck at cooking and baking spells."

Tom chuckled amused before he put his book down on the window sill beside him. "Why do you come up with that now?"
"I don't know… um…" Hermione suddenly felt very unsure of herself. "We learned them in Household today."

"Ah, that's why you are going to fail this class?" Tom scoffed, a fat grin appearing on his face.

"I am certainly not going to fail any class!" Hermione huffed. "No-one could consider this farce to be a class!"

She crossed her arms before her chest and glared at Tom rebelliously.

"Okay, okay. So, you're not going to fail anything. Got that." Tom still smirked at her infuriatingly. "But what are you trying to tell me?"

The insecurity quickly returned and Hermione averted her eyes from him before she said in a weak voice, "Just that I'm really bad at this household thing in general. It's not that I can't do it. But I don't think it's my duty to do everything just because I'm a woman."

"Yes…?" Tom obviously didn't see where this was going.

Hermione continued timidly, "You don't expect me to, you know, give everything up I want to do, so that I can stay at home, watch the house, cook and clean. Because that's never gonna happen."

Tom didn't immediately answer and for a short moment Hermione feared that he had really expected something like that. She looked hesitantly up at him and was totally bewildered as she found a triumphant smile on his face.

"Does that mean you want to stay with me even after we leave Hogwarts?" Tom asked in a half-joking, half-serious voice.

Hermione blushed fiercely. She hadn't thought about it to this extend. Tom sniggered amused then reached out for her and pulled her over to him.

"Don't worry. I'm sure we won't starve just because you are a lousy cook," he mocked her gently. "Unlike you, I am extraordinarily good with cooking spells."

Hermione frowned up at him. "What?"

"Yes, first thing I learned after starting at Hogwarts," Tom said amused.

Hermione still stared at him incredulously. She had actually expected that the first thing Tom Riddle would do after starting his first year at Hogwarts was to sneak into the Restricted Section of the Library and read every Dark Arts book he could get his fingers on.

"Why? she finally asked weakly.

"Clearly you never had to live through something like that horrible food they gave us in the orphanage," Tom replied in a light voice. "I learned the spells so that I would never have to eat that trash ever again."

He paused shortly as if to ponder something then he added, "You can't imagine how annoyed I was after I found out that I had to return to the orphanage during the summer and that we are not allowed to do magic during breaks."

Hermione giggled softly as she wrapped her arms around Tom. She felt him embracing her tightly before he leaned down and placed a kiss on her cheek. The soft touch of his lips on her skin sent exiting shivers down her spine and Hermione suddenly regretted that they were sitting here in the Library in plain view of any student who should feel the need to read one of the books here. But that was something easily remedied, she thought mischievously and flexed her wrist so her wand landed in her hand. Then she called upon the Elder Magic, concentrated on her destination and heard a soft gasp of surprise coming from Tom as they apparated away.

Tom was taken by surprise as suddenly the pressure of apparition wrapped around him. As the pressure left him again the window sill had vanished and he lost his balance. He fell over while Hermione still clung to him tightly. So they both tumbled to the ground. But the impact wasn't as painful as he had expected due to the fact that the hard stone floor of the Library was now replaced by soft grass. Tom propped himself up on his elbow as he scanned his new surroundings in bewilderment. Obviously they were now on what seemed to be a meadow. Here and there young birches interrupted the gentle slope of the landscape. Some distance away Tom could see more trees and the beginnings of a forest. The vernal sun was still hanging above the tree tops shining warmly down on this grassy land. Tom furrowed his brow in bafflement as he noticed the gaily laughing witch who still clung to his side. Right now she looked up at him and seemed to be very amused by his confusion. Tom's eyes wandered from her face to her wand which she held in her hand. As he saw the black wand he finally understood. Obviously Hermione had again done the impossible and had apparated from Hogwarts' grounds.

He asked irritated while trying to ban the bewilderment from his voice, "Where are we?"

Hermione's hazel eyes still glinted with laughter as she answered him, "Somewhere far away from Hogwarts."

Tom narrowed his eyes at her. Since she had apparated them the first time through Hogwarts' wards Tom had racked his brains as to how she had managed that feat. His gaze went back to the black wand in her hand. Was that really the Unbeatable Wand?

"How?" he queried in a firm voice while fixing her with a piercing glare. "How can you apparate inside of Hogwarts?"

To his frustration Hermione now just smirked up at him. Tom raised his eyebrows as he saw a strange burning gleam appearing in her eyes. Suddenly she unwrapped her arms from his waist and took hold of his shoulders before she leaned into him. Tom blinked in surprise as she captured his lips with hers and started to kiss him rather fiercely. He could feel one of her hands wandering from its place on his shoulder up his neck until her fingers played gently with his hair. Tom couldn't suppress that soft moan of pleasure as he felt her nibbling teasingly at his lower lip. Then her lips left him again, leaving behind a cold sense of loss. He opened his eyes and looked down at Hermione. He found her smiling at him and looking rather self-satisfied.

"You can continue to try and squeeze information out of me which is going to fail anyway," she whispered sensuously in his ear, her breath tingling excitingly against his skin. "Or we could do something else."

Hermione then nestled even closer to him and started to trace more kisses on his neck. Tom shivered with pleasure as he felt her soft lips on his skin and he quickly decided to adjourn his interrogation. That didn't mean he was going to let her off the hook, he reassured himself. He would just do it later. He wrapped one arm around her and pulled her against him while his other hand cupped one of her cheeks. He leaned down to her and pressed his lips against her mouth. He gently brushed with his tongue along her lips. As a result Hermione eagerly opened her mouth a little, admitting him in.

As he was deepening the kiss Tom felt one of Hermione's hands wandering down his chest. He started to pant slightly as she slowly opened his belt before she pulled it out of the pant loops. She proceeded to undo the buttons of his shirt to then run her fingers demandingly over the bare skin of his chest. If there had still remained a little rest of his self-restraint, it now went flying out of the window. He grabbed Hermione's shoulders and she let out a soft cry of surprise as he pushed her down on the ground.

Tom was sitting in the Great Hall and had to work from falling asleep. Someone should really curse that self-important codger, he thought annoyed as his eyes wandered over Dippet. If that wouldn't have meant to risk his perfect reputation of the model student, Tom would gladly have helped out here. He stifled a yawn as he tried to appear attentively listening to every word of that git.

"-so that finally the school governors and myself came to the conclusion that we should definitely initiate such an event," Dippet droned on and on with his insufferably pompous voice.

Tom sighed softly and leaned back in his seat. This could go on for hours, who knew. Dippet just so enjoyed hearing the sound of his own voice.

"-that is to say, the invitations have left the castle by now and should reach your parents by tomorrow, depending on where they live," Dippet declared in his self-important voice. "So, Saturday next week we will finally have our very first Parents Day."

Tom couldn't help but groan in frustration. A parents day? That just sounded like so much fun, he thought wryly while scowling at Dippet. Then his gaze wandered over the other students. They seemed to be sickeningly excited about the prospect of such a pointless event. Tom felt the need to curse the whole lot of them.

Dunces!

Tom's eyes narrowed angrily as they wandered over the delight in the eyes of the other students. It wasn't long though and his gaze stopped at Gryffindor table. He found Hermione, surrounded by her seemingly excited friends. Tom quickly realized that even though Hermione smiled at them, this smile didn't quite reach her eyes. It was then that he remembered that she had told him her parents had died in that war in France. Tom balled his hands into fists as he stared at the sad smile on Hermione's face. Maybe he should really curse Dippet, he thought furiously. How dare that fool remind Hermione of the war.

Anger still rushed through him, so Tom hadn't noticed that Dippet had by now ended his speech. He was only brought out of his dark thoughts as he heard a hesitant voice speaking to him.

"Riddle?" that voice asked, rather fearfully.

He turned around and found Avery standing behind his seat, causing Tom to wrinkle his nose in distaste.

"Yes?" he hissed at him in an impatient tone.

"We… we have a request," Avery replied carefully.

Tom scanned the Slytherin in front of him with cold eyes, which made Avery squirm slightly. Tom turned away again before he inquired in a sharp voice, "And what might that be?"

"There is this Hufflepuff, Nathaniel Bowett," Avery whispered, fear tinting his words. "You know, from seventh year."
As Avery didn't continue after that, Tom felt his annoyance rise again.

"No, I don't know," he hissed, now angry. "Why would I want to keep track of this asinine house?"

Tom was a little placated as he watched Avery cowering away from him fearfully.

"Of course," the other Slytherin quickly conceded. "It's just that Bowett started to become a bother."

Tom sat a little up in his chair and eyed Avery now a bit more interested. "In what way?"

Avery didn't immediately answer so Tom commanded darkly, enunciating every word clearly, "In what way?"

Fear glinted in Avery's eyes as he then confessed in a very quiet voice, "He... he saw us practicing some spells."

"Dark?" Tom inquired sharply.

"Yes," came the frightened reply.

Tom breathed in deeply. Then he gestured at the empty seat beside him. "Sit down."

Avery obeyed instantly. Tom stared at him darkly. He didn't even need to ask him if they had had enough common sense to modify that Bowett's memory. He knew well enough that not one of his knights was able to cast the necessary spells.

Useless gits!

"Tell me, Avery, how are you going to get out of this mess?" Tom asked in an emotionless tone, though a frightening glint had by now appeared in his eyes.

"I... we hoped you could help us," Avery mumbled helplessly.

"Me?" Tom asked innocently before a rather evil smirk appeared on his face. "Why would I want to help you?"

Avery shuffled nervously in his seat and Tom's cruel smile intensified. He liked seeing the other suffer. Though in the end, he knew, he still had to somehow straighten this thing out. After all, the Knights of Walpurgis were directly linked to him. He couldn't risk anyone finding out about them. That would only be one small step away to figure out who exactly their leader was.

"Do you think that guy knew what you were doing?" Tom stopped his cruel teasing and came down to business.

"No," Avery said, the relief clearly present his voice. "But he certainly thought it was suspicious. He might want to investigate."

That was bad. The only way out of this would be to erase part of that guy's memory. So, either Tom had to modify the memory himself or he used other means. He didn't really want to ambush that Hufflepuff in some dark corridor. It sounded like the guy didn't know anything for sure. Maybe a complete memory modification wasn't even necessary.

"You are lucky that I am in an indulgent mood," Tom said lightly, though the dangerous touch in his tone was obvious. "This is what you do: You are going to apprehend that idiot. I don't give a damn how you do it, but I advise you to this time not muck anything up. No witnesses, understood?"
"Y- yes, of course," Avery inclining head.

"Then you'll feed him a potion I'll give you later. And miraculously his nosiness will find an abrupt end. Problem solved," Tom ended, cruelty dripping from his voice.

"Thank you," Avery said, almost bowing at Tom.

Tom just waved him away with a casual hand movement. As Avery stood up, Tom grabbed his arm harshly.

"No mistakes, Avery," he threatened the other. "If you mess up again, I will not be so lenient anymore."

After a hastily muttered promise not to blunder around, Avery quickly hurried away from Tom. Tom's hard gaze followed him. His knights were such idiots, he decided angrily. The last thing he needed was Dumbledore getting wind of that little society of his. Tom turned his gaze away from Avery and looked over to the Gryffindor table. He found Hermione still sitting there. With ire he noted how she was conversing with her foolish friends again. Maybe his knights weren't so idiotic, after all. Considering their competition… Well, at least that sadness had left her face.

Tom sighed and got up from the table and walked over to Hermione. There actually was now a free period before his next class, History of Magic. Tom knew that Hermione had a free period as well. It would be the perfect opportunity to try and pry some information out of her. At least he could test his theory concerning Hermione's wand.

Hermione was sitting at the Gryffindor table, talking with her friends, as she felt a hand her shoulder. As she turned her head, she found Tom standing right behind her. Instantly, a smile broke out on her face. He, too, was smiling softly down at her, completely ignoring the hostile looks Longbottom threw his way.

"Are you finished?" Tom asked her.

"Yes," she replied cheerfully.

She got up from the table and grabbed her bag. After a short "See you later, guys." towards her friends she followed Tom out of the Great Hall.

"How were your classes today?" Tom asked her as they walked down a corridor.

He was holding her hand gently and the content smile was still on Hermione's face as she looked up at him.

"Quite okay, I think," she replied and chuckled softly as she continued. "At least no-one lost a limb during Care of magical Creatures."

"Ah, yes, Kettleburn," Tom replied knowingly while shaking his head slightly.

As he didn't add anything else, Hermione asked him, "So, what do you think about that parents day?"

Tom looked at her like he had bitten into a lemon causing her to chuckle softly.

"Yeah, that's what I thought," she said sardonically, but then added pensively, "You know, we could do something else. Hmm, like-"
"Apparating to London maybe?" Tom cut across her. Then he said, voice thick with false innocence, "No wait, we already did that. Edinburgh perhaps?"

Hermione sighed as he gazed at her provokingly. As she didn't react to his challenge, Tom narrowed his eyes at her.

"How can you break down Hogwarts' wards?" he demanded to know, changing his strategy from teasing to commanding.

She just rolled her eyes at him impatiently. "I won't tell you."

His hand tightened around hers and there was anger in his eyes by now. Hermione decided to just ignore his reaction and continued walking down the corridor. They didn't speak for a while. Hermione started to hope that he would let it drop but then Tom spoke again.

"Say, Hermione," he inquired and suddenly his voice was completely expressionless. "You never told me what happened with that book you stole."

Hermione couldn't help but stiffen. She stopped walking and her head shot up at him. Tom stared down at her, his face yet again an unreadable mask. Not even his grey eyes gave anything away.

"What?" Hermione asked weakly.

"You didn't think I had forgotten about it, did you?" Tom stated in a strangely cold voice.

She couldn't help but avert her eyes from him. It didn't help that now a rather guilty feeling hit her, too. She hadn't touched Peverell's book in weeks.

"No… but…" Hermione mumbled awkwardly. Then she mustered up her courage and looked at Tom's inquisitive eyes. "I told you before," she said in a firm tone. "I'm not going to show you that book."

"Hmm…" made Tom. Then his eyes narrowed and he inquired, "But you did steal it from Flamel, didn't you?"

Hermione didn't see where he was going so she thought it best to stay with one word answers, "Yes."

By now the blank look had left Tom's face, just to be replaced by a reassuring smile. That new look only managed to unsettle Hermione more. He obviously was up to something.

"I'm just surprised that you managed to steal something from Flamel," Tom said innocently while still smiling down at her. "I mean he is supposed to be a very powerful wizard." The smile didn't leave his face as he then casually threw in, "Did you know that he is more than six hundred years old?"

"Six hundred and eighteen," Hermione replied softly. "I know. He is the supposed owner of a Philosopher's Stone."

"Yes, that's at least what people assume," Tom worded carefully. "That is really impressive."

Suddenly, Hermione could spot a strange glint in his eyes. She didn't like it at all.

So she queried suspiciously, "In what way?"

"He practically can't die. That is a feat to be admired," Tom replied, excitement tinting his tone. "Though, of course, not perfect. Flamel is still depended on that stone. If he lost the stone, he would eventually die. True immortality would mean that you can't die whatever happens."

By now Hermione was feeling rather sick and there were chills running down her spine.

"True immortality?" she asked in a soft voice, speaking more to herself than to Tom.

"Yes," he said nonchalantly. "You should know about immortality, shouldn't you?"

Hermione's head shot up to him. What did he mean by that? He had arched one eyebrow and seemed to watch her every movement.

"After all, you've read a book written by Ignotus Peverell." The innocence in his tone couldn't quite manage to conceal that he was, in fact, observing her like a hawk. "I'm sure he mentioned something about immortality."

"Why would he?" Hermione asked in a shaky voice, dreading the answer.

It was then that a rather triumphant smirk curled up the corners of Tom's mouth.

"He and his brothers are the supposed creators of the Deathly Hallows. It's said that the owner of all three Hallows will be master of death," Tom said lightly, but she could tell that he was very interested by now. "Do you think that is true?"

Hermione had paled as she heard him talking about the Deathly Hallows. She tried to ban all fear and shock from her face as Tom still seemed to closely observe her. She shouldn't be so surprised. It was Tom after all. Of course he would catch up on the Hallows. Hermione scanned him for a while contemplating how to answer. She really didn't like that excited glint she could see in his eyes.

"Master of Death," she whispered softly. "Yes, I know that myth. But I don't think it is something to be taken literatley."

As Tom raised his eyebrows she inquired, "Did you read the fairy tale?" Tom nodded at her and she continued in a severe voice, "Then I'm sure the morale didn't escape your notice. The true Master of Death is not immortal but just unafraid of death."

He furrowed his brow then he said in a strangely disappointed voice, "So you think the Deathly Hallows cannot conquer death?"

"No, that's not it." Hermione shook her head while still scanning him, a little unsettled by that longing in his eyes. "I don't think that immortality exists."

Tom looked at her with an odd, dark glint in his eyes before he said in a low voice, "You are wrong."

Hermione stared at him for a long time. For the first time since months seeing something in him that was completely dark and evil.

Then she said in a soft but grave voice, "Nothing and no-one is immortal."

She looked away from him and out of the window. Her gaze wandered over the rough Scottish landscape as she continued slowly in the same soft voice, "Everyone dies, sooner or later."

He didn't reply at once so Hermione looked back at him. His grey eyes scanned her intently but she was unable to read the emotions behind them.

Then Tom spoke and his voice was determined and cold, "There are ways. You just don't know about them."

Hermione considered him for a very long time. She knew what he was talking about.

Horcruxes.

How could he be so wrong? Couldn't he recognize those horrible instruments for what they were? It wasn't the murder, necessary to create them, that made them so abhorrent. Certainly, murder was a terrible, terrible crime but it was not inhuman. In fact, it was actually a very human habit. No, what made those Horcruxes so warped and evil was the price with which they came.

Half of your soul.

It sounded not so bad but if you replaced that rather undefined word 'soul' with your 'own self', your 'essence', 'ego' then it suddenly became an unreasonably high price. Immortality certainly was a very luring concept. She had seen too many people die to not understand the craving behind that idea. But it remained to be an illusion. All his Horcruxes hadn't saved Lord Voldemort. It hadn't done him any good.

Hermione had got to know both, Lord Voldemort and Tom Riddle. Voldemort had just been a shadow of the person he once had been. There was just one explanation for that. He had tried to protect himself against his own mortality when in truth he had begun to sell part after part of himself to Death.

Hermione looked into Tom's eyes and said while an inexplicable sadness tore at her heart, "Don't assume my ignorance. For I am sure I know more about those ways than you do."

Tom stared at her with his grey eyes. Hermione could see that he didn't believe her.

"I doubt that," he said in his emotionless voice.

Hermione stepped nearer to him and took his hand in hers. She caressed his hand and then lifted it up and kissed it gently. As she bent her head up again her gaze lingered on the golden ring he was wearing. Her fingers skimmed over the gold-ring with the black stone on its middle. The stone felt strangely cold. She continued to stare sadly at the ring. It was the second Horcrux they had managed to destroy. Dumbledore had done it. In the end he had paid with his life for it. Yet, that ring was still empty. No piece of Tom was inside of it. Her finger kept touching the ring then Hermione let go of Tom's hand and stared up at him again. He was frowning at her in bewilderment.

Hermione smiled faintly at him before she said in her soft voice, "There are things we can neither fight nor run away from."

Almost a week later, Tom walked together with Hermione towards the Great Hall while she told him how very much she hated her Households class which she would have to attend the next day. Silently, Tom was rather glad that he didn't have to go there himself. It really sounded horrible.

As they entered the Great Hall Tom instantly noticed a large group of people. They had obviously gathered around something in the middle of the hall. A frown took form on his face as he scanned the hall. No teacher was present. He sighed tiredly. He was not in the mood to break up any stupid brawl between some third year idiots. Unfortunately, though, he was a prefect. If he wanted to keep his image of the responsible student, he had to do something to clear up this mess. So, Tom reluctantly walked over to the crowd. Hermione followed him.
"Make way!" Tom commanded as he had reached the crowd.

As the students recognized him, they immediately scurried out of his way, so that Tom quickly reached to cause of this mess. There in the middle of the Great Hall lay a student. He was unconscious and, by the looks of it, completely naked. That was, if one didn't count the sign, which was fixed with a string around his neck.

Tom's mouth twitched traitorously as his eyes swiftly wandered over the writing on the sign. It wasn't exactly his style, but Tom had to admit that the whole thing was immensely amusing. Combined with those shocked looks on the other students' faces it was hilarious, actually. But he needed to contain himself, he couldn't burst out laughing right here, in front of the whole school. He wondered, while still trying to hold back his laughter, if that was really blood they had used to write with. It certainly looked like blood. What an artistic way to express oneself, he decided amused as his eyes again wandered over what was written on the sign:

Mudblood

"No!" a voice suddenly echoed through the hall.

Tom watched a girl running to the boy lying on the floor. She fell down beside him and tried to wake him up while tears streamed down her face. Why did she want to help him? If that really was a Mudblood, then he just got what he deserved, didn't he? Tom's eyes wandered over the girl's uniform. She was a Hufflepuff. No wonder she was such a sentimental fool. This time Tom couldn't completely hide the smirk from his face.

"Nate, Nate," the stupid girl now sobbed. "Nathaniel, wake up."

Nathaniel? Tom somehow remembered that name. Where had he heard it again? Ah, yes, hadn't Avery talked about one Nathaniel?

Tom swiftly searched the crowd. His gaze fell on a group of Slytherins with barely hidden looks of glee on their faces. Tom really needed to teach them how to conceal their emotions better. But he wasn't too angry with them right now. This whole thing was just too funny. He caught Lestrange's eye. The other stared back at Tom, still that self-satisfied smirk on his face, then he bowed slightly to Tom. That was all he needed to know. He looked back at the unconscious Mudblood lying in the dirt. Tom now knew that this boy was in fact Nathaniel Bowett. The Hufflepuff student Avery had talked about.

Tom chuckled softly as his eyes wandered over the unconscious boy. Avery hadn't told him that Nathaniel Bowett was a Mudblood. Obviously his knights had dealt with the whole problem quite satisfactorily. He, for one, was very entertained by this show. He thought as he looked down at the naked boy. His Hufflepuff girlfriend, or whatever that blood traitor was, still held firmly to the unconscious Mudblood and cried. What a spectacle, Tom decided coldly as he still tried to suppress an evil smirk from curling up his mouth.

The traitorous smirk was wiped from his face, though, as suddenly his own girlfriend ran over to the unconscious boy and the Mudblood-loving girl. Tom watched with utter distaste how Hermione fell down beside that dirty boy. She then seemed to feel his pulse and checked if that Mudblood was still alive.

Honestly, who cares? he wondered dismissively.

It was certainly more than revolting, how Hermione touched that Mudblood. Tom wrinkled his nose in disgust as he saw her hand on his shoulder as she shook him and tried to wake him up. Why was she doing this? That guy was a Mudblood. Why did she lower herself and even touched something so inferior?

Hermione pulled her wand and brandished it over the Mudblood, obviously trying to find the cause for his unconsciousness. After that she unfixed the sign from the Mudblood's neck. Tom was more than surprised to see an angry expression on her face as she shortly glanced at the word written in blood. Another quick wave of Hermione's wand and a blanket appeared out of thin air. She took it and covered the boy up. What the hell was she trying to achieve here? Tom wondered confused. Did she want to save that guy's dignity? It was a dirty Mudblood, for Merlin's sake! Tom shook his head as he watched how Hermione now tried to console the Mudblood's girlfriend who was still sobbing disgustingly.

Tom just wanted to walk over there and pull his girlfriend away from all the filth and dirt as, suddenly, the doors of the Great Hall were thrust open. He turned his head to see who had entered. Somehow he wasn't really surprised to find his least favourite teacher standing in the doorway.

Dumbledore's eyes wandered swiftly over the hall until they landed on the cause of this commotion. Tom felt the need to snicker darkly as he spotted that look of anger on the other wizard's face. Dumbledore quickly hurried over to the boy lying, still unconscious, on the floor. A furious glint entered his eyes as he scanned the sign that now lay beside the boy. The writing, though, was still legible.

Tom had the mad urge to break down in an evil cackle as Dumbledore's gaze instantly wandered from the sign on the floor to him. Tom contained himself, though, and stared stoically back at the professor, daring him to make any accusations. The anger was visible on the professor's face and Tom could even sense Dumbeldore's unpleasant magic in the air. The other was still staring at him but Tom just lazily erected his Occlumency shields. It was quite obvious that Dumbledore suspected him.

And he is right to do so, Tom admitted amused. But there was no way he would be able to proof Tom's guilt. He so wanted to laugh into Dumbledore's face, but he pulled himself together and planted a mask of mild shock on his face.

Yes, it is shocking that dirt like that is allowed to enter the magical world, Tom thought in disgust as his gaze wandered to the boy lying on the floor.

He was brought out of his musing by Dumbledore's booming voice, "Everybody leave for your common rooms!"

The other students immediately followed this order and began to file out of the hall. Tom sneered at those docile idiots. They just needed someone to lead them and they would do just about anything.

Tom didn't follow them as he wasn't going to leave Hermione behind. To his immense irritation she was still holding that idiotic Hufflepuff girl in her arms. Tom stepped closer to the two girls and then bent down to Hermione and grabbed her arm. She looked up at him as she felt him touching her. There was confusion on her face but Tom just gestured at Dumbledore who was by now tending to the unconscious Mudblood. Hermione seemed to understand as she now let go of the crying girl and allowed Tom to pull her up. Without saying a word Tom dragged Hermione out of the Great Hall, away from that meddlesome old coot.

As they left the hall, Tom didn't follow the masses of students but turned into another corridor. After a few minutes they had left the Great Hall and the noise of the other students behind and were walking down a dark and secluded passage way. Tom still held Hermione's hand and she was following him, walking slightly behind him. They hadn't spoken till now.
Finally, Tom couldn't hold back anymore. He was actually very proud of himself that he hadn't broken down right in the Great Hall. This whole thing had just been way too hilarious. The shocked and indignant expression on Dumbledore's face had topped everything, though. That old fool knew that Tom was behind it but he couldn't do anything about it.

It was then that Tom broke down in cold laughter. He let go of Hermione's hand and had to support himself by leaning against the wall while his laughter rang through the corridor.

---

Hermione followed Tom into the Great Hall and nearly bumped into him as he abruptly stopped. She was just about to ask him what was wrong when she noticed the commotion in the hall. A crowd of students had gathered right in the middle of the hall.

What's wrong? she wondered as she could see looks of shock, anger and even fear on their faces.

Tom resumed his way and Hermione followed him as he walked over to that crowd of students. As they reached to other students, Tom ordered them to let him pass. She was slightly surprised that they obeyed him as the other students seemed to be quite unsettled and, in some cases, even hysterical. Hermione saw a blonde girl, a Ravenclaw, sobbing into the shoulder of another Ravenclaw. A few steps away stood a Hufflepuff seventh year, looking pale as a ghost, as he stared with a stony face at something Hermione couldn't yet see. By now apprehension was bubbling up in her. Whatever had happened here it must have been something serious.

Tom still walked swiftly towards the cause of this misery so Hermione, not wanting to be left alone, hurried after him. After a few more steps he stopped looked at something on the floor. Hermione quickly reached him and her eyes widened in shock as she, too, stared down at the floor. She threw in a shaky breath of air as her eyes wandered over the fallen form of a boy. He was lying on the cold stone floor unmoving and completely naked. Nausea rose up in her as she noticed that sign which was attached to the boy. Only one word was written on that sign and Hermione felt herself starting to tremble as she read the hateful word:

Mudblood

It seemed to be written with blood, Hermione realized horrified. Hopefully not with the blood of this poor boy. Her eyes darted back to the unconscious boy. Panic was starting to rip at her as she saw that the boy looked as if he were dead. Hermione balled her hands into tight fists as memories of dead bodies invaded her mind. She had seen so many people die. It was enough! She didn't want to see that anymore.

She forcefully calmed her breathing down and scanned the boy more attentively than before. After a while she relaxed slightly as she spotted the soft fall and rise of his chest. He was still alive. The sickness, left behind by fear, still coursed through her body, though.

Suddenly a girl rushed towards the boy. Her black hair whipped behind her and tears ran from her eyes as she sobbed, "No!"

As the girl reached him, she fell down beside the boy, grabbed his shoulders and shook him. More tears flowed down her cheeks as her attempts to wake him remained to be unsuccessful.

"Nate, Nate," the black-haired girl cried desperately. "Nathaniel, wake up!"

Her stomach gave a painful lurch as Hermione watched the girl's anguish. The girl's fear and pain seemed to be so familiar. Hermione had been there herself and she knew how much it hurt. There were tears threatening to fall from her own eyes as she remembered how she had wept over her friends' dead bodies.

A new pitiful sob brought her out of her painful memories. Hermione sprang into action. She hurried over to the unconscious boy and the still crying girl. After she knelt down beside the boy she quickly checked his pulse. She nearly cried out in relief as she felt a weak pulse. She then tried to wake him up by shaking him gently but he did not respond so Hermione flexed her wrist and her wand landed in her hand. With a practiced movement she waved it over the boy's form. The diagnostic spells she used ascertained that the boy's life was indeed not in danger. Hermione sighed relieved.

Her eyes again fell on that sign which seemed to be tied to the poor boy's neck with a string. Hot fury started to rise up in her as she read that offending word: Mudblood. In a fit of anger she cut the string with her wand and hurled the sign at the floor. After that, she again turned towards the boy. Now that she knew his life wasn't in immediate danger, she noticed that he wasn't wearing any clothes. With a wave of her wand she conjured up a blanket and wrapped the boy in it. The distraught girl still sat on the floor beside the boy and cried. Hermione just wrapped an arm around her shoulder and hugged her reassuringly.

"He's alive," she whispered softly to the girl. "He's going to be okay."

The black-haired girl clung to Hermione and cried into her shoulder.

"W… what's wrong with him?" the girl managed to ask between her sobs.

"It's nothing serious," Hermione tried to console her. "He's going to be up and about in no time."

She rubbed the girl's back in an attempt to calm her down.

"Everything's going to be okay," she soothed the girl.

The sobs died down somewhat as the girl finally calmed down. Tears still ran from her eyes and she clutched Hermione's robes tightly but she had stopped to cry so desperately. Hermione continued to hold the girl. She knew exactly how terrible it felt to be so worried about an injured friend.

It was after a while that Hermione felt someone grabbing her by her arm. She looked up and found Tom standing right beside her. Concern was shining in his grey eyes as he scanned her intently. Hermione felt relieved now that he was here. He gestured at something. She turned her head and was surprised to see Dumbledore crouching beside the unconscious boy. He had his wand in his hand and examined the boy. When had he shown up here? Tom didn't leave her more time to ponder the professor's sudden appearance as he pulled at her arm again. Hermione looked up at him. He seemed to want to get away from here as fast as possible. But that was no surprise, Hermione realized.

Shortly, she had forgotten that neither Tom nor herself were on Dumbledore's good side anymore. Tom was right. They should leave here quickly before Dumbledore started to question them. So, Hermione let go of the crying girl and let Tom pull her up. He took hold of her hand and hastily dragged her out of the Great Hall. She followed him into Hogwarts' maze of corridors. While she followed him so blindly, she could still see that word written in blood red letters before her minds eyes. Mudblood!

Hermione swallowed hard and grabbed Tom's hand tighter.

So much hate in just one single word…

Hermione felt sympathy for that unknown boy who had lain there in the middle of the Great Hall. He had fallen victim to that word as much as his black-haired girlfriend had. She nearly cringed as she remembered the tears of worry, fear and disbelief that had flowed from the poor girl's eyes.

Those had been Hermione's tears… once.

She breathed in deeply, determined to change the direction her thoughts had so unwillingly turned to. She didn't want to think about that time. So she forced herself away from her memories and paid more attention to her surroundings. It was now that she noticed how Tom led her down some secluded corridor. She had no idea where he planned to go. Hermione furrowed her brow and was just about to ask him where they were headed as Tom suddenly let go of her hand. His back was turned to her as he leaned against the corridor wall. She noticed with worry and confusion how his shoulders shook as he propped himself up against the wall.

She took a step towards him to see what was wrong with him when, suddenly, cold laughter tore at the silence of the corridor. Hermione stopped dead in her tracks and stared with wide eyes at Tom. He had turned so that he now leaned with his back against the wall and still he was laughing loudly. Hermione's heart clenched anxiously as she noticed that cruel malice which was unmistakably entwined in his laughter. Instead of taking a step towards him, as she had intended, she shied away.

Hermione still stood frozen to the spot and stared at Tom as he finally calmed down. A vile smirk still ghosted around his mouth as he looked at her. Her mind was reeling as she saw a dark glimmer flaring up in his beautiful grey eyes and she took another step away from him. He arched one eyebrow gracefully as he saw her cowering away from him.

"What's wrong?" he asked and traces of his twisted amusement were still lacing his words.

"How… how can you laugh?" Hermione choked out in a weak voice. "That was just horrible. Somebody hurt that boy. And that sign… how can you laugh about that?"

Tom pushed away from the wall and took a step towards her. A cold smile still curled up the corners of his mouth as he looked at her. Her mind was reeling as she saw a dark glimmer flaring up in his beautiful grey eyes and she took another step away from him. He arched one eyebrow gracefully as he saw her cowering away from him.

Then he answered, sounding as if he explained something quite obvious to her, "Because it was dead funny, that's why."

Fear suddenly darted through her with a jolt as she spotted appalling satisfaction on his face. A painful feeling of foreboding wrapped around her.

Hermione just stared at him with huge eyes until she was able to formulate a question, she did not really want to pose, "Did you attack that boy?"

"No," he replied casually.

Hermione didn't relax as she could still see that horrible amusement dancing in his eyes. Then he continued arrogantly, "I wouldn't have been so blunt." He shortly reflected something before he sniggered darkly, "Though that idea with the sign was rather amusing."

Hermione took in a sharp breath of air as realization hit her. Then she stated in a numb tone, "Your followers did it."

Tom just looked at her expectantly but didn't reply anything. He didn't need to say it out loud anyway, the warped approval in his eyes was answer enough.

"You… you knew they were going to do something like this?" Hermione asked in a weak voice.

"Not exactly." He dismissed her concern with a casual wave of his hand. "I knew they had planned something, but I didn't know they would be so… public."

Hermione still stared at him thunderstruck. He seemed not in the least bit disturbed by that display of cruelty from his followers instead he approved of the whole thing. Tom took in her shocked state. Slowly the warped glee left his face and was replaced by dangerous suspicion.

He narrowed his eyes at her and inquired demandingly, "Why are you so unsettled by this thing? Didn't you notice? That guy was a dirty Mudblood!"

Tom spat that last word with so much disgust that Hermione stumbled a step away from him.

"Does that change anything?" She could feel her heart beating painfully fast now as she looked at him. "Is it okay to attack him, hurt him and humiliate him just because he is a Muggleborn?"

He frowned at her and a dark look crossed his face. Then Tom answered with just one word.

"Yes."

The conviction behind his icy cold words made Hermione tremble now and she could feel her throat tie up.

"That's… that's wrong," she stammered, horrified by that frightening dark glimmer in his eyes.

A dangerous frown appeared between his eyebrows as he glared at her intimidating. Then Tom stepped towards her and grabbed her upper arm roughly. Before Hermione could buck against his hold he dragged her towards one of the wooden doors in this corridor. He opened the door and pulled her harshly into the classroom behind. He obviously didn't want to continue this conversation in the corridor where people could hear his girlfriend siding with Muggleborns, Hermione thought glumly. Tom closed the door again and turned towards her. The fierce frown was still on his face as he now glared at her angrily.

"What do you mean 'it's wrong'?" he hissed at her bitingly. "Don't tell me you have pity on that dirty Mudblood. That pathetic Muggle got exactly what he deserved. He should never have dared to enter Hogwarts and besmirch it with his unclean blood."

Hermione could feel numb coldness creeping up on her as she heard the hate hidden behind Tom's words. Suddenly she felt very sick and there was the need to run away from him as fast as possible. That hate radiating off of him in angry waves was too much for her. It scared her and she wanted to flee. She observed how Tom's gaze turned into ice as he spotted the shock and disapproval which was surely visible on her face. As she didn't react to his statement in any way, he took a step towards her and Hermione shuddered as she could feel traces of his angry magic in the air.

"You know it's true, Hermione. Everyone knows it," Tom spat at her, fury seeping though his voice. "They don't belong here. They are worthless."

Hermione still stared at Tom with wide eyes. There was so much hate in his gaze. She felt chills darting down her spine as she stared at Tom. She had seen that hate before. Now there was Lord Voldemort lurking behind Tom's grey eyes.

"No, they… they are not," Hermione whispered. She heard her voice shaking with fear as she continued. "They are normal witches and wizards. The only difference is that they have Muggle parents."

"Don't delude yourself," Tom hissed snidely at her. Then he added with so much venom in his voice. "They are scum!"
Hermione flinched as if his words had physically hurt her.

"Those Mudbloods have no right to be here, in the magical world. They should stay with their own disgusting ilk," Tom said with a fearsome tone in his voice.

"But… but…" Hermione stammered as she looked fearfully at Tom. There was still a deathly cold gleam in his eyes. Right now, he wasn't 'Tom' anymore. He was Lord Voldemort. And Hermione was afraid.

She could see it, that hate in his eyes. It was the same hate that had once destroyed her life and had burned down a whole country. Hermione balled her hands into fists as she continued to stare at Tom with wide eyes. She had fought against him, against this hate.

Because he is wrong!

How could he say something like this? How dare he insult the Muggleborns and the Muggles? Her parents? Herself? Hermione could feel her fear turning into anger.

She yelled at Tom enraged, "They are NOT inferior! Neither Muggleborns nor Muggles themselves."

Hermione watched as Tom's face turned into a mask of pure hate. There was a murderous glint in his steely grey eyes.

"Hermione," Tom said threateningly but Hermione didn't cower away. She wasn't going to back down from him, not then and not now. "You are a Pureblood, you should be able to recognize them for what they are: disgusting trash!"

She was staggered as she stared at Tom. He did not just say that. There was a burning fury raising up in Hermione.

"Hermione," Tom said threateningly but Hermione didn't cower away. She wasn't going to back down from him, not then and not now. "You are a Pureblood, you should be able to recognize them for what they are: disgusting trash!"

She was staggered as she stared at Tom. He did not just say that. There was a burning fury raising up in Hermione.

It was impossible to restrain that wrath so she glared coldly at Tom before she snarled at him, "You hypocrite! How can you say that, being what you are?" She watched as a frown appeared between his eyebrows then she continued in the same cold tone,

"Yes, I know all about your heritage, Tom. What about your father?" she asked provocingly.

She could see Tom clenching his jaw as he stared at her. There was a red tinge in his grey eyes now. But Hermione didn't care, she continued while smiling at him meanly,

"Oh yeah, he was a Muggle, wasn't he? And that's why you killed him."

Tom's eyes had turned completely red as he was glaring at her murderously. But Hermione wasn't yet finished. What business did he have to be so enraged? It was the truth she was telling right now.

She looked into Tom's crimson eyes as she hissed in a low voice, "So, Muggleborns have dirty blood, you say? Well, then your blood is dirty, too. At least half of you is scum!"

Tom fixed her with a glare so full of rage that Hermione unconsciously flinched away from him. It seemed like his blood-red eyes were on fire, burning every emotion until the only thing left was this unbound hate.

"How dare you?" Tom whispered in a deathly cold tone, his voice was shaking with uncontrollable fury. While his eyes were still keeping her imprisoned with that fearsome rage.
Suddenly Tom yelled furiously, "How dare you speak to me like that?"

His dark magic now flooded the whole classroom and ripped at her. Hermione looked at his red eyes and she felt cold shivers running down her spine.

"You have no idea what I've been through because of that bastard," he now hissed at her piercingly, his voice was cold and cruel. "He infected me with his dirty Muggle blood and left me to be raised by those sickening animals."

His fury still hit her in form of his dark magic which crackled around him. Hermione refused to show him how much he intimidated her.

So she squared her shoulders and said in a surprisingly steady voice, "Muggles are neither dirty nor animals. They are human beings. Or do you want to say that I have 'unclean blood' that I am 'disgusting trash'"

There was a strange glint flaring up in Tom's eyes but Hermione was too enraged to notice.

She spat at him heatedly, "Yes, I'm a Muggleborn."

As she made that declaration, suddenly, Tom's magic in the air seemed to lose control completely and it attacked her body painfully. Her fury immediately died down and was replaced by fear as she felt his magic on her body. But Tom's dark magic was nothing compared to that murderous look on his face as he now scanned her. Something seemed to snap in his blazing red eyes as he looked at her so dangerously.

Before Hermione could do anything, he suddenly raised his hand and slapped her in the face. She was hurled to the side where she slammed hard into the wooden cabinet which stood at the wall beside her. She slid down the wood until she was huddled at the floor. Her left hand shot up to her cheek which stung painfully. She stared up at Tom, momentarily paralyzed. Then she realized that she had drawn her wand which she now pointed at Tom. She hadn't even noticed how she had flicked her right wrist to release her wand from its holster. It must have been an instinctual act.

Hermione looked with huge eyes up at Tom. Her cheek throbbed achingly and her hand, holding her wand, trembled heavily. Tom was staring down at her. His eyes were still glowing in a threatening red as he scanned her fallen form coldly. Hermione could feel hot tears running from her eyes. She bit her tongue to stop herself from sobbing. But she couldn't stop the stream of tears that now flowed down her face and fell on her blouse, soaking the fabric.

"You don't deserve to bear a wand," Tom now spat at her pitilessly. "You are just filthy Muggle-trash."

There was not one spark of repentance in his crimson eyes as he glared at her, laying at his feet. Hermione stared up at him. This hate in his eyes... She had never thought to meet that bottomless hate again. She had been so sure that she had left it behind.

Her breathing was ragged now and the tears still streamed from her eyes. Then slowly she got up from the floor, never lowering her wand. On shaky feet she slid to the door, always keeping her back against the wall and skirting around Tom. All the while she pointed her wand at him. Hermione reached the huge wooden door and opened it with one hand while the other still pointed her wand at Tom. He was staring at her with his terrible crimson eyes. Hermione slipped out through the door, leaving Tom behind.

As she left the classroom she saw Melanie Nicolls standing right beside the door. She was smirking evilly at Hermione. Had she heard the whole argument? Judging from the triumphant expression on her face, she probably had. Hermione didn't care. She ignored Nicolls and ran down the corridor. Away from the classroom, and away from Tom.

She never stopped until she reached the familiar painting of the Fat Lady.

"Mantis!" Hermione snapped the password at the Fat Lady before she had a chance to say something.

The Fat Lady tsked at Hermione's seemingly rude behaviour but permitted her in anyway. She entered the Gryffindor common room which was crowded with students discussing the incident in the Great Hall. Hermione ignored them all and rushed through the room towards the stairs leading up to her dormitory. She heard the voices of Longbottom and Weasley calling out for her but she ignored them and raced up the stairs, leaving the common room behind. She noticed with mild relief that the dormitory was deserted as she hurried to the bathroom. Hermione entered and locked the room behind her. Then she leaned with her back against the door as silent sobs shook her body. Her feet were so shaky; they were unable to support her any longer. Hermione slid down the door and sank to the floor. She drew up her knees and wrapped her arms around her legs. Her head rested on her knees as she continued to cry. Her left cheek was still hurting where Tom had hit her.

After some time Hermione managed to get herself under control insofar as the stream of tears finally ran dry. She leaned her head back at the door and tried to calm her ragged breathing. Then she pushed herself up before she walked over to the sink. Her whole body was still trembling slightly. She put her hands on the sink and leaned on them. Then she raised her head and looked at the mirror. Her reflection was staring back at her with a pale and tear-stained face. Her eyes were puffy and red. Hermione's gaze wandered reluctantly to the angry red stain that was on her cheek where Tom had hit her. She could see the beginnings of a bruise taking shape.

Immediately new tears were threatening to fall from her eyes. Hermione quickly averted her eyes from her sad looking reflection and opened the taps. She cupped her hands and let the water flow into her hands. Then she plunged her face into the water. The cold water eased the pain on her cheek a little bit. After that Hermione dried her face and left the bathroom without looking into the mirror again. She walked slowly over to her bed in the dormitory. There she sat down, drew the covers shut around her four-poster and curled up into a ball onto the soft mattress. As Hermione closed her eyes the only thing she could see were red eyes glaring at her so full of hate. New tears were running from her eyes and fell softly onto her Gryffindor quilt.
The next morning Hermione woke from a nightmare ridden sleep, still curled up tightly into a ball on her bed. She didn't feel rested at all but reluctantly sat up in her bed. The curtains of her four-poster were still drawn, and she could hear her room mates merrily chattering away as they got ready for the day. Hermione squeezed her eyes shut, trying to ignore the fact that a new day had begun, and that she had to wake up now. She didn't want the memories of last night rushing back to her nor did she want to get ready and then head down to the Great Hall. But what else could she do? She couldn't very well hide herself here, in her dormitory, for the rest of the day. Hermione grudgingly reached out for the curtains and pulled them away. Then she stood up from her bed, grabbed her clothes and shuffled to the bathroom door.

"Good morning, Hermione," Rose chirped gayly Hermione's way.

"Mhm." Hermione wasn't in the mood to contribute anything to her dorm mates' chatter.

She entered the bath room and locked the door behind her before she slowly walked over to the sink. As she stood before the sink she raised her head and stared at her reflection in the mirror. A rather down looking girl was unenthusiastically staring back at her. There were dark shadows under her eyes and her skin was quite pale, which made the bruise on her cheek even more pronounced.

Hermione leaned forward and looked at the bruise. It wasn't that big. She ran a finger over the sore skin. It stung. But Hermione had had worse before.

It wasn't so much the bruise itself that made her nearly cry now. It was the fact that it had been Tom who had hurt her. Hermione sniffed as she tried to suppress the tears. Her thoughts flew back to the fight from yesterday. Tom's gaze had been so full of hate as he had talked about Muggleborns. Hermione hadn't been able to hold back. No-one was allowed to badmouth Muggles or Muggleborns in front of her. Not even Tom.

No, especially not Tom.

So Hermione had fought back. She had lost her temper, she had to admit that, but that topic was just a sore point to her. Maybe she shouldn't have said the things about Tom's father and certainly not in that insulting way. But whatever she had said yesterday didn't justify his behaviour, Hermione thought as she stared at the bruise on her cheek.

'You are just filthy Muggle-trash.' She took in a shuddered breath of air as Tom's last words run through her head.

There was no denying that his words hurt. Especially as they were not new to her. She had been insulted like that before, hadn't she? Coming from Tom, though, this insult was unbearable. Hermione shivered as she remembered that icy cold glint in his eyes as he had thrown those words at her. How could he do that to her?

He's done it before …and worse, a hard voice hissed at her, mercilessly bringing back memories she did not want unburied.

She stared at her reflection and slightly shook her head as if that was enough to get rid of her memories. She didn't want them to come back. Those memories belonged to someone else. A girl that had been devoured by darkness long ago. She shouldn't return.

Hermione raised a trembling hand and once again skimmed a finger over the dark bruise on her cheek. It still hurt. Just like his words which still threatened to throw her back into her past. But she did not want her memories to step back into her life. Even if Tom had looked so much like Him yesterday, it didn't mean He was back. Tom was still Tom.

No connection with my past! Because her past was something that couldn't come back. Hermione ignored the painful knot in her stomach and averted her eyes from the mirror. Then she washed up, put on her uniform and left the bathroom. She didn't want to go down to the Great Hall. Right now, she just wanted to curl up in some dark place and stay there while she finally got rid of those stupid memories. Unfortunately, she didn't have much of a choice.

I've been through worse, Hermione thought, trying to encourage herself. It didn't quite work.

She sighed heavily, took her school bag and left the dorm. Then she walked slowly, unenthusiastically down to the Great Hall. As she entered the hall Hermione remained standing by the entrance door. Her gaze immediately found the Slytherin table, scanning it for Tom. She quickly found him sitting at his usual seat. But he didn't look her way. It even seemed as if he was deliberately ignoring her as he blankly stared into space. His face was a frustratingly emotionless mask. It was impossible for her to say what he was thinking right now, especially because she couldn't look into his eyes.

One thing she did notice though. And that was the behaviour of the other Slytherins sitting around Tom. They had obviously seen her standing by the entrance door and were now staring at her. Some of them whispering with their neighbour while casting glances her way, others scanned her openly with disgust. The worst, though, was Melanie Nicolls. She looked at Hermione with a triumphant expression on her pretty face while an offensive smirk played around her mouth. She mockingly inclined her head towards Hermione, still with that evil smirk on her face. Hermione had to suppress a shiver as she saw that cruelty, glinting in the other girl's eyes. She quickly looked away from Slytherin table. It seemed she had been right yesterday. Nicolls had overheard how she had argued with Tom and now the stupid witch told everyone who wanted to hear how Hermione had had a quarrel with Tom. She clasped her schoolbag a little tighter before she made her way to the Gryffindor table.

As she turned her back to the Slytherin table, she could hear it. It was just one word but it struck her to the core. That word, it was more like a weapon than anything else. This simple, small word had sparked off a terrible war. It had cost so many lives. Hermione hated that word, which was now hissed behind her back.

"Mudblood!"

She didn't let show how that hiss startled her and she didn't falter in her steps. She just continued walking to her table, holding her head high. There was a murmur going through the hall and Hermione felt many gazes following her process. It seemed that the other houses knew as well.
Maybe they didn't care as much as the Slytherins, did but they knew. Reaching the Gryffindor table she sat down beside Diana. Hermione saw Diana's green eyes scanning her curiously. But there was also a tiny bit of concern in those green orbs. For that Hermione was grateful.

"Are you all right?" Diana whispered under her breath.

Hermione looked at her and just nodded.

"Are you really a Muggleborn?" Hermione hadn't noticed that Rose and Lucia sat right beside Diana. And now Rose had posed this stupid question in her squeaky voice.

"Wow," Lucia exclaimed while she eyed Hermione like she would an exotic animal in the zoo. "I would have never guessed."

Both girls were staring nosily at her, ready to absorb whatever gossip they might catch. They weren't the only ones either. The other Gryffindors seemed to watch her with equal interest. With one exception. A few seats away Hermione could see Lupin and he was staring angrily at his house mates. Longbottom and Weasley, it seemed, had yet to show up in the Great Hall.

"Really," Lupin huffed, while he in turn glared at the Gryffindor students sitting at the table. "Why is that suddenly so important?"

Some of them now really looked a bit ashamed of themselves. But not all of them.

"Because she said she's a pureblood," one Gryffindor, a fourth year boy Hermione didn't know his name, was throwing in. "Why did she lie?"

Hermione could hear an approving murmur around her and there was slowly anger building up in her. She looked back to the Slytherin table and found some of them still staring at her. Some with disgust on their faces, some with scorn. But the only one who really mattered still didn't pay her any attention. Tom didn't even look her way.

"I don't think that's any of your business!" Lupin hissed and Hermione's attention was brought back to her own table.

"It's okay, Amarys," Hermione said and she was surprised how calm her voice sounded. "I want to answer that question."

She looked at the Gryffindor boy who had asked the question.

"You want to know, why I didn't tell anyone that my parents were Muggles?" she asked in a cold voice that could even frighten herself.

Hermione paused and stared in turn at the Gryffindors sitting around her and listening into the conversation. How could they not know? How could they be so ignorant and naïve? And right after that boy had been attacked yesterday, too.

She continued, still in that detached voice that didn't quite seem to belong to her, "Because where I come from such a declaration would be a death sentence."

After that Hermione stood calmly up from her seat turned around and left. Her house mates stared at her while all the chatter at the normally so cheerful Gryffindor table had died down. Hermione didn't care and left the Great Hall quickly. Not quick enough not to be able to throw a last glance at the handsome Slytherin sitting at his table. Her heart sank as Tom still ignored her.

She stepped out of the hall, glad to leave those prying eyes behind, and made her way back to the common room. Hermione had decided to ditch Household. She just knew that today she wouldn't be able to bear Legifer's insulting way nor the other students continue to stare at her. She had nearly reached the entrance to the common room as she heard someone call out for her,

"Hermione, wait!"

She turned around and found Lupin rushing after her. As he reached her he fell in step beside her.

"I'm sorry how they reacted," Lupin said in a quiet voice.

Hermione looked at him, walking beside her, and was very glad to at least have a few people still liking her despite of everything.

"Don't be," she said in a soft voice. "It's not your fault."

They entered the common room. Hermione subconsciously breathed out relieved as she stepped into the red and golden decorated room. As her gaze wandered lovingly over the well-known room she quickly spotted where Longbottom and Weasley were sitting, or rather lounging. Weasley sat on one of the chairs with his feet propped up on a table and flipped through a magazine. Quidditch Monthly its cover read. Longbottom was half lying on a couch while eating a cauldron cake. There was a box with more cakes standing on the side table. Hermione noticed amused that Longbottom was still wearing his pyjama top combined with his uniform pants. Upon Lupin's and her entrance Longbottom looked up and then, recognizing them, waved them over.

"What are you doing here, Mione?" Weasley asked her as she sat down on a couch opposite them.

"What's with Household?"

"I'm skipping. What's your excuse?"

"We have a free period whenever there's Household." Longbottom grinned at her.

Then he looked at Lupin sitting beside Hermione and the smile dropped from Longbottom's face. He had obviously seen the grave expression on his friend's face.

"Is something wrong?" Longbottom asked in a worried tone.

Lupin just shortly glanced at Hermione but didn't answer. Hermione sighed, looked at Longbottom and said, "Obviously, Nicolls found out that I am in fact a Muggleborn and told the whole school." She looked away from him and then added bitterly, "And all the Slytherins hate me now."

"What?" Longbottom yelped and sat up on his sofa.

Hermione leaned back on the couch and was more than glad to let Lupin do all the explaining. She tuned their conversation out though Longbottom's angry voice that shouted "Stupid Slytherins!" every so often was quite soothing.

Had she been right? Hermione wondered frantically. Did really all Slytherins hate her now? No, that wasn't possible. She reasoned with herself. Her hand wandered to her left cheek and touched it cautiously. It hurt where Tom had hit her. Hermione could still see those angry crimson eyes staring at her. So full of hate. She shuddered. How could he have slapped her? She felt again tears building up in her.

"Hermione?" a concerned voice called out to her.

Hermione looked up and found Longbottom eyeing her worried. Weasley and Lupin, too, were staring at her.

"How did you get that bruise?" Longbottom asked her in a gentle voice.

"I… " Hermione stammered.

She was suddenly reminded of the last time her friends had found her with a bruise on her face. Back then they had suspected Tom doing it, and Hermione had been outraged by that suggestion.

"Hermione, you know you can tell us everything," Lupin said in his soft voice.
Hermione felt his hand reassuringly on her arm. She lowered her eyes and looked down at her hands, lying in her lap. Last time she had told them that Tom hadn't hit her. She had been so convinced that he would never do something like that to her. Now there were tears threatening to fall from her eyes.

Then she heard Longbottom's enraged voice say, "It's obvious, isn't? It was Riddle!"

Hermione glanced up at him. Longbottom was staring at her with an angry face. The anger though wasn't directed at her, Hermione knew, as he was scanning her left cheek. She averted her eyes and stared down at her hands again. It was terrible but this time she was unable to object. There was no denying it because Longbottom was right after all.

So, Longbottom's statement was followed by a pregnant pause in which neither one of them said anything. After a while Hermione could feel a weight sitting down beside her and then an arm around her shoulders. She looked up and found Longbottom sitting beside her. He looked at her with concern shining in his eyes.

"Hermione," he told her gently. "You can't continue like this. You can't let him treat you this way."

Hermione breathed in deeply, but she didn't reply anything.

"Marc is right," Lupin said in a kind voice.

She looked at him and found him gazing at her steadily. He smiled reassuringly but Hermione could see the concern in his eyes.

"He has no right to hurt you," Lupin continued in his soft voice.

Hermione closed her eyes shortly, trying to get her emotions under control again. They were right... and yet... She just didn't know what to do. She liked Tom so very much. He was her boyfriend and Hermione felt safe and protected when he was around. He liked her too, didn't he? Affection was always glinting in his soft grey eyes whenever he looked at her. But now every time she thought back to yesterday, the only thing she could see were those crimson eyes, staring at her full of hate. As this colour had manifested in his grey eyes, suddenly, Tom himself had disappeared to be replaced by...

No!

Hermione's eyes snapped open again. Her heart was hammering painfully fast in her chest, making her feel slightly sick. She stared at Lupin who looked at her worried. Longbottom's arm was still wrapped around her shoulders reassuringly.

"Look, Hermione," Lupin told her in his calm and kind voice. "I know that you like Riddle, but this is just something you can't let him do to you."

Hermione still stared at him. What did he want her to do? Leaving Tom? She couldn't let go of him. No, she needed him.

... but those eyes...

She knew those red eyes so very well. They had haunted her and made her life hell. The sight of those angry red eyes was enough to make her tremble in fear. She had lost everything to the infinite wrath that burned behind this crimson colour. And as there had been nothing left to be taken from her, those eyes had infested her dreams and turned them into nightmares.

As she didn't react to Lupin at all, suddenly, Longbottom yelled angrily, "Damn! I should go and Hermione's head shot up at him. "No!" she burst out panicky.

Longbottom stared at her, slowly shaking his head. "You can't expect us to just lean back and watch him treating you like that."

"That's… that's something between Tom and me," Hermione said softly, sadness tinting her voice. She didn't want her friends to always worry so much about her.

"No, he hurt you," Longbottom said in a gentle but all the same determined tone. "I won't let him continue with that."

"We are your friends," Lupin supported Longbottom. "We can help you."

"I know," Hermione whispered shakily. "But… please, let me try to solve this myself." She didn't want her friends to get involved into this. Especially now that Tom had turned into… "I ask a lot of you, I know. Still, this is something I need to figure out on my own," Hermione said, opting for a strong voice in order to calm her friends down.

Of course, it didn't work. Longbottom tightened his arm around her shoulders and the concern on Lupin's and Weasley's faces intensified.

"We did promise you to stay away from that bastard," Longbottom told her gently, though the anger still shone through his voice. "But only if he wouldn't hurt you again."

"Which he now has," Weasley concluded in a soft tone.

Hermione bit her lower lip as she stared at her friends. There was no way she could let them oppose Tom. She didn't want him to hurt them.

Like he hurt you? A colder part of her inquired angrily.

"It's not going to help my situation if you attack Tom," Hermione finally said while looking up at Longbottom.

She could almost see the indignation taking a hold of him so she quickly assured, "I'll solve it myself."

"Hermione…" Longbottom started weakly, clearly not convinced.

"Please," she whispered beseechingly.

Longbottom looked down at her helplessly. He clearly didn't want to comply with her plan but he also had a hard time to refuse her anything. Before Longbottom could give in, Lupin cleared his throat so that Hermione's eyes wandered to him.

"Okay," Lupin said reluctantly, gazing at her unsmilingly. "We will not confront Riddle." Here he threw a warning glance at Longbottom. Then he concluded, graveness tinting his voice, "But only if you promise us something."

Hermione kept looking at him while raising her eyebrows. Taking this as his cue to continue, Lupin said in a severe tone, "If you fail to… solve the problem, as you phrased it… so, if you fail, you are going to leave Riddle."

Involuntarily, Hermione's eyes widened as she heard his condition. Panic started to course through her as she suddenly realised that while she had claimed she would solve it, she actually had no idea how.

_He slapped me._ The full force of that realisation finally hit her and flashed through her like a bolt. How was she going to solve something like that? Her eyes lost focus as she stared in front of her.

'Muggle-trash!' Tom had called her. How could he make up for something like that? Did he even _want_ to make up for it …?

_No, no._ Hermione shook her head, trying to bring herself out of her reverie and dispel the insecurity. That was Tom she was thinking about here. Of course, they could put things straight again. So, Hermione's eyes wandered back to Lupin who still eyed her concerned. All three of her friends seemed to wait for her answer. She took in a deep breath and then said in a surprisingly steady voice,

"Okay. I promise."

"I am sure you all will be relieved to hear that Mr Bowett has regained his consciousness again and seems to be well enough, considering the circumstances," Dumbledore said, while standing before his class.

The Gryffindor girl who had posed the question heaved a sigh of relief as she heard his answer.

_Fool._

"Unfortunately, though, he cannot give us an account as to who attacked him," the transfiguration teacher continued.

His clear blue eyes shortly fell on Tom and his gaze hardened considerably. Tom on the other hand looked back at the professor, completely unimpressed, his face arranged into an impenetrably blank mask. He could see the accusation in Dumbledore's eyes and would have like to smirk at the old fool. But Tom contained himself.

"But, sir," another stupid Gryffindor interjected, concern ridging his voice. "Isn't it possible to extract his memories and trace his attackers?"

"No, Mr Burington." Dumbledore looked at him, sadness staining his voice. "Obviously, the traumatic nature of this incident caused Mr Bowett to suppress the memory."

Tom could feel his lips curling up slightly, but he quickly schooled his features again. That Mudblood didn't repress anything. It actually was the potion Tom had provided his Knights with, that had destroyed the memories.

"Don't worry too much," Dumbledore said, trying to calm his class down. "Mr Bowett will completely recover—"

_Pity._

"—and return to class soon." Here Dumbledore smiled at them all reassuringly, which made Tom sick. "So, let us now continue with our lesson. We were talking about the Carcer spell with which it is possible to temporarily confine magic into an object. Who can tell me the incantation—"

Tom dropped out of the lecture. He had no intention of following that ludicrous class. He leaned back in his chair and let his eyes wander away from the professor. It wasn't long and his gaze landed on the girl sitting at the table right in front of him. Again, his thoughts started to circle around the incident from the day before. He could still not believe what he had found out. The burning fury invaded his mind once again and he had trouble holding back his magic from crackling around him fiercely. He couldn't risk losing his control. Not in front of Dumbledore who was already suspicious of him.

Tom's now slightly red eyes were fixed on the girl in front of him. Hermione had her head propped up on her elbow. He wondered what she was thinking about as she didn't seem to pay Dumbledore any attention either. He watched as she raised her head from its position leaning on her hand. Then she propped up her other elbow to put down her head again. As Hermione leaned her head down, Tom saw how she winced in pain. She had tried to lean on her left cheek, he noted. That was where he had hit her yesterday.

There was an unpleasant jab in his stomach as he watched Hermione rubbing cautiously at her cheek. He could see a dark bruise where he had hit her. Tom hadn't realized how hard he had slapped her.

I shouldn't have slapped her at all, he thought, somehow shocked at his own behaviour. But the shock quickly subsided, driven away by a strange coldness which seemed to wrap around his mind. His thoughts were again drawn to the incident from yesterday and the red sheen returned to his eyes as they now wandered with cold detachment over the girl. She had insulted him! Where had she learned all the things about his father? He certainly had never told her that his father had been a Muggle. His housemates were too afraid of him to ever talk about his heritage. Still Tom could hear Hermione's words. 'At least half of you is scum!'

He balled his hands into fists while he desperately fought to prevent his magic from lashing out at her. How could she say something like that? he wondered furiously and had to rigorously control the dark magic. How dare she remind him of that detestable parentage? His bastard of a father had destroyed Tom's life right from the start. How could his mother have fallen in love with a lowly Muggle? It was disgusting to know that in Tom's very veins flowed the blood of a Muggle.

He was the heir of one of the oldest and noblest families in wizarding history. Yet he had to grow up in that shoddy orphanage and had to bow down before the Muggles. It was outrageous, really. If anything, those Muggles should crawl in the dirt before Tom's feet. That was where they belonged. They should thank him on their bended knees that he didn't just kill them.

Oh, how he despised them all, Tom though, his blood boiling with anger. It made him sick to know, that part of him was Muggle. He could feel his magic vengefully tugging at him in protest, denying that very thought, but it was the truth after all. His father had been a filthy Muggle.

Though, Tom had dealt with that problem, hadn't he? He was oddly contented by that thought, while a twisted smile slightly curled up the corners of his mouth. He had obliterated that shameful connection with the Muggle world. In the end, he had cleaned himself of that disgusting heritage. No-one knew, no-one could know what he had done. It was impossible to link him with those murders that had taken place in Little Hangleton.

... no-one knows...

His gaze wandered back to Hermione. She still rubbed her cheek but this time Tom didn't feel a jab in his stomach as he narrowed his eyes at her.

How had she found out?

His angry magic peaked, as he remembered that day when she had legilimized him. Back then she had seemed to be unstoppable. With ease, she had taken down all his Occlumency shields. He had been disgustingly vulnerable as she had attacked him with an overpowering force. How did she manage to break his shields?

An image of her black wand flashed through Tom's mind. He opened his fists and laid his hands on the table. His face was arranged into a mask of indifference. He knew that to everyone else in this room he must appear as composed, slightly bored even. In reality, though, his fingers itched to pull his wand. That was why he put them on the table, to be able to resist that urge. The red sheen in his grey eyes was the only indication of the fury that washed over him. He continued to stare at the girl in front of him.

Had Hermione done it again? Had she invaded his mind and forced the information about Tom's father from him? He breathed in deeply to calm himself down. She might be more skilled in Legilimency, but he would have noticed any attempts of her breaking into his mind, wouldn't he? How was it even possible that she could be better in Legilimency than him? Had she used that wand of hers to overwhelm him? That was the only explanation he could see right now. It couldn't be that she was really more skilled than him. Not when she was...

He clenched his jaw tightly and the red sheen in his eyes deepened as his thoughts reluctantly wandered to the last words that witch had spoken to him. He still couldn't believe it.

A dark look crossed Tom's face and the parchment, lying on the table between his hands, suddenly started to smoke slightly. Black scorch marks appeared, slowly gaining in size while destroying the parchment. Tom's hard gaze was still directed at the girl in front of him.

She is a Mudblood!

She had lied to him, she had deceived him! From the very beginning she had always had her little secrets from him, but this was too much. That girl had tricked him. Tricked him into believing she was a Pureblood when in fact she was nothing more than a filthy Muggle. A Muggle that, by some perverted vagaries of nature, had a little control over magic. She was a worthless, disgusting creature.

It is appalling, Tom decided as his cold eyes wandered over her once again.

No wonder she had had to flee France! And here Tom had racked his brain as to why she had to leave France and what had happened to her. Now, he knew. Grindelwald was fighting a war against all those Muggles and Mudbloods. Of course she had been frightened that she would be one of his victims. So she had run away and then she had pretended to be a Pureblood.

How could she dare to impersonate a Pureblood?

Tom felt disgusted as he remembered how close that Mudblood had been to him. He had even started to trust her. How stupid he had been! He could trust no-one. Tom shuddered as he remembered how much he had let his guard down around her. The things he had told her! All the while she had been lying to him. How much of what she had told him was actually true?

Probably nothing!

She might have even mocked him behind his back. Because he had so easily fallen into her trap. Because he had so willingly believed her lies. Her alluring kindness had awoken a long buried hope in Tom. The hope that someone could care for him, that he was not all alone. He had been foolish to not have discarded that hope once and for all.

Tom knew that Hermione's betrayal had finally destroyed that hope. All he could see now that he looked at the girl in front of him, was something tainted. Something sullied and worthless.

* A Mudblood!

Hermione's hand sank down on the table again. All the rubbing didn't help, her cheek still stung painfully. She didn't want anything more than to just run from the class room. She couldn't follow Dumbledore's explanations anyway. She just wanted to run away. Away from Hogwarts, from this time she was trapped in, from the curious glances the other students were throwing her way, but above all she wanted to run away from Tom. Hermione could almost feel him staring at her. Tom was sitting right behind her and Hermione felt very self-conscious. Unfortunately though, she couldn't run away from her problems.

Her thoughts continued to circle around the argument from yesterday. Hermione now regretted the things she had thrown Tom's way. Not only had she insulted him but she had also given away how much she actually knew about him. She had just been so shocked as he had talked disparagingly about Muggles. Why had she been so surprised by his hate? Hermione wondered numbly. It wasn't new or unexpected coming from him. In the end, Tom was-Hermione reached for her quill and held it tightly, while she forcefully stopped that thought from fully taking form in her head.

It was no surprise that Tom didn't like Muggles that much, was it? After all, he had had to grow up in that disgusting orphanage where Carter had mistreated him. Of course Tom wouldn't exactly like the Muggle world. Hermione could hardly blame him. This didn't change the fact, though, that his eyes had been blazing with hate, yesterday. It had seemed like there was no room for any other emotion. The only thing left had been this unending hate.

That hate was something Hermione wanted to forget. She had faced it before and it had brought her nothing but grief. Hermione had struggled with that evil for far too long, so she had been more than willing to just forget it. It had been so nice to live a normal, a peaceful, life for a change. Hermione knew that she had acted imprudent yesterday. She had revealed too many of her secrets. But as Tom had shown her this other, darker, side of him, he had hurt her very much. She had yelled back at him and had insulted him in return.

Hermione looked down at her hands lying on the table. She bit her lip.

She should have never said those things about Tom's father. That had been stupid. Hermione admitted, it had been unfair to have insulted Tom. She had simply lost her temper. But his reaction hadn't been justified either. It had been wrong of him to have slapped her. That fight had just been unnecessary and regretful. They had both said and done things that had been wrong.

Hermione looked up from her hands again and stared in front of her, not seeing anything.

What she needed to do was to talk with Tom. Hermione didn't really want to face him right now, but it was the only thing she could do. She had no idea whether she would be able to forgive him. But she knew they had to talk.

Her eyes shortly wandered to Longbottom who sat right beside her. He seemed to look at her in concern. Hermione felt guilty for causing her friends so much worry. But they didn't need to worry anymore, she decided determinedly. She would talk with Tom and they would put things right again. Hermione sat up in her chair. Yes, now that she had taken that decision she was feeling a little better. She just had to explain to Tom why she had been so upset about the things he had said. He now knew that she was a Muggleborn, so he would understand why she hadn't taken it well when he had insulted Muggles.
"Kindly read pages 134 to 165 in your textbooks and write a two foot essay about the advantages and disadvantages of the different methods of transferring magic." Hermione heard Dumbledore finish the lesson for today.

She was rather glad that the class ended now as she wanted to get over this conversation with Tom quickly. So she hurriedly stuffed her unused quill and parchment in her bag and then turned around to talk with Tom. He had been faster than her and was just leaving the classroom. Hermione hurried after him. She left the classroom and could see Tom standing in the corridor and talking with Lestrange.

Hermione hesitantly walked over to Tom. Lestrange sneered at her as he spotted her then he turned around and walked away. Tom’s gaze turned to ice as his eyes fell on her, but Hermione wasn’t scared off by that. As she reached Tom, she looked timidly up into his face. Hermione bit her lip as she found him still staring down at her coldly, his grey eyes radiating nothing but anger.

"I… I…” Hermione couldn't help but stammer under his piercing gaze.

She breathed in deeply, reached out for him and put her hand lightly on his arm.

"We need to talk, Tom," she finally managed to say in a soft and shaky voice while she avoided looking him in the face.

As Tom didn’t answer, Hermione cautiously peered up at him. He was currently staring at her hand lying on his arm then his gaze wandered from her hand back to her face. Hermione's eyes widened in shock and her whole body stiffened as she stared up at him. Unmistakably, there was disgust and contempt flaming up in Tom's eyes as he scanned her.

She quickly removed her trembling hand from his arm and could feel tears building up in her as he continued to look at her in this unbearable way. Hermione avoided his gaze, unable to stand the disgust in his eyes, and stared down at her feet.

Then she whispered in a teary voice, "I'm sorry."

The words had barely left her mouth as she spun around and nearly ran from him. She could feel her body shaking slightly as she ran down the corridors. The look on his face was still present in her mind. He had scanned her as if she was a repugnant piece of dirt, something so sickening that he couldn't be expected to stay in her presence. Hermione felt her heart beating painfully fast in her chest as she darted down a well-known corridor. She passed three doors in the corridor before she flung open the fourth and tumbled into the room behind. It was a girls' toilet. Hermione's gaze wandered from the tiled floor to the row of sinks at one wall. She felt sick as her eyes lingered on one sink. There was a strange feeling of numbness spreading through her body as she slowly walked over to the row of sinks. For a few minutes, she just stood there and stared vacantly at the sink in front of her. The disgust in his eyes still haunted her mercilessly. Never had she expected him to look at her like this. So much disdain, so much abhorrence.

So very familiar, she admitted reluctantly.

Hermione took another step towards the sink and leaned a little forward. There she could see it. It was engraved on the tap of the sink, easy to overlook and very inconspicuous, but still present. A tiny snake was engraved on the metal of the tap. It was easy to ignore. If one really wanted, one would be able to never notice the small snake. That still didn't make it go away, though. It didn't change the fact that beneath this normal façade lay one of Hogwarts' worst secrets.

Hermione extended a trembling hand towards the tap. She skimmed one finger over the tiny snake.
She had done that already, a long time ago, as she had asked Harry to show her the entrance. Yes, she had done that before… she should have known better.

"What are you doing here?" a voice wailed behind her.

Hermione whipped around while flicking her wrist so that her wand landed in her hand. But she never raised her wand as she looked at the translucent person who had just spoken. The ghost of a teenage girl was hovering before her. She was staring at Hermione with a look of misery on her face.

"Hello, Myrtle," Hermione whispered tonelessly.

"Ah, so you know my name." Myrtle frowned at her with a wry face. Then she continued with cold sarcasm in her voice, "Someone really knows my name. How very exciting."

Hermione ignored the accusation in the ghost's voice, but continued to numbly stare at her. Then she broke eye contact with the dead girl and looked around the girls' toilet. This was pathetic, wasn't it? she wondered miserably.

"Here's where you died?" Hermione asked in an emotionless voice.

"So it seems," Myrtle replied snippily. Then she lamented in a shrill tone, "But do you think anyone cares? No! Of course not. Not about poor, insignificant Myrtle. Who would ever miss her? No-one, that's who! Not when they have wonderful, popular Olive Hornby."

Hermione's gaze moved from the whinging girl in front of her and once again swept over the room towards the sinks. She shuddered as her eyes fell on the shiny taps. Hermione's grip on her wand involuntarily tightened. She wanted to get away from here where she had all his transgressions thrown at her.

She turned back to Myrtle, who was still complaining about Hornby, and said in a soft voice, "I'm sorry you had to die."

Myrtle stopped her ranting and looked at her in surprise and shock, but Hermione didn't stay to see more. She whirled her wand before she stepped into the dark pressure of apparition. She reappeared miles and miles away. Immediately upon her arrival cold wind ripped mercilessly at her and salty air filled her nostrils. Hermione breathed in deeply. She was standing on a cliff. The stone was washed out and rough from the force of the ocean. Waves of the churned up sea clashed hard against the stone and came dangerously close to the spot where Hermione now stood.

The rock was some distance away from the shore. Normally it was only reachable by boat, and certainly not today as the North Sea was raging furiously against the land. Hermione stood still on the unreachable cliff while she stared at the ocean in front of her. At the horizon the hazy sky and the grey water met and melted so that a parting line was undiscernible. Seagulls were flying in the sky, fighting desperately against the strong wind. Hermione felt drops of sea water showering her face as the waves still thundered loudly against the cliff.

She still held her black wand in her hand while she stared numbly at the threatening sea in front of her. There was the illogical wish to throw the wooden stick away into the angry ocean. Instead of tossing her wand away, Hermione just crouched down on the stony surface of the cliff and stared out at the sea.

She squeezed her eyes shut and rested her head on her knees while the ocean still clashed, deafening loud, against the cliff. There was a sickening feeling in her stomach. It gnawed at her mercilessly and didn't want to release her again. It made her body shiver and unpleasant chills shook her.
Why had he looked at her like that?

Hermione grabbed her wand tighter as this question coursed through her mind.

_How_ could he look at her like that?

Often people had stared at her in that way. Back in her time period many people had despised her due to her parentage. Dark wizards had even tried to kill her because she was Muggleborn. In their eyes she was nothing more than an animal. A pest that had to be exterminated. They were cloyed by here mere existence.

But, not Tom, not her boyfriend.

She was still the same, wasn't she? Nothing had changed. Why would he suddenly be disgusted by her?

He was always so gentle towards her and he protected her. He liked her. She needed him.

He was her boyfriend.

He was Tom.

Hermione squeezed her eyes shut and her face was twisted into a mask of pain as memories flooded her. She saw dark figures attacking her and cursing her. There was hate visible on their faces. They hated her for being a Muggleborn. Suddenly among all this pain and darkness Hermione could see smoldering red eyes. They were filled with malice and disgust as they observed, indifferently, how she suffered.

_No!_ Her eyes shot open again and she stared at the North Sea in front of her. It still raged furiously against the cliff.

He was Tom! No-one else. Just Tom!

She stood up. Her hands were trembling now and dizziness flooded her.

She had escaped this darkness, hadn't she? It was her past. People had despised her, they had attacked her and tried to take her life. She had fought them with all she got. She had tried to stop their hate. It had been horrible, unbearable and agonizing, this life. But it was her past! It was over. She was safe here. There was no need to fight anymore. She didn't want to fight. She wanted to be safe and protected. Not alone and lost in darkness.

Hermione started to pace to and fro in an erratic manner. The small surface of the cliff was jagged and rough. Froth of the waves still hit her face.

The darkness could not have found her again. She was not ready. Hadn't she done enough? She deserved some happiness. Closure. He had not looked at her like that! He had been angry, she thought frantically while she still paced on top of the cliff. Yes, just angry. He would calm down again. Maybe he was even going to apologize.

Her hand wandered to her left cheek and rubbed cautiously over the bruise.

He would realize that he still liked her. He would apologize because she needed him. Her past was not allowed to return. He needed to protect her from the darkness. She didn't want to fight again. And she didn't want to be hit by hate and disdain again. There was no way she could bear that. Not again.
And not from him.

Suddenly Hermione slipped on the algae on the cliff’s surface. She tumbled and nearly fell over the edge but managed to catch her balance. She still fell on the rough surface of the cliff and painfully grazed her knees. Her heart thrummed away in her chest as she stared at the angry sea in front of her.

"He is still Tom!" she screamed desperately at the ocean.

Her voice was lost in the loud thundering of the waves against the cliff.

Hermione didn't know how long she sat there on the cliff, staring at the angry ocean. Her clothes were damp from the salty water that sprayed her whenever a wave hit the cliff. She knew she should feel cold now, but there was nothing.

After a long time, which must have been hours, the sun slowly disappeared and darkness fell over the sea. Hermione stood up from her crouched position on the stone. Her eyes wandered over the now black water in front of her, then she pulled her wand and apparated away. She reappeared on Hogwarts' grounds, at the edge of the Forbidden Forest. Without paying any attention to her surroundings she took off and walked up to the castle. As she entered Hogwarts, she was greeted by empty corridors. Obviously, dinner had already been served and the student population had gone to their common rooms. Like in trance, Hermione wandered through the castle and towards the Gryffindor common room. She had just reached moving staircase as she heard a sharp voice calling after her.

"Ms DeCerto!"

Hermione knew who it was, but somehow she couldn't find it in herself to care. Normally, she was hit by irritation whenever she heard that particular voice, but now there was nothing, just a heavy exhaustion weighting down on her, numbing all her feelings.

"Ms DeCerto." The anger in the voice seemed to have grown. "Did you not hear me?"

Hermione slowly turned around. As expected she found professor Legifer standing in the corridor just a few metres away. She was looking as neat as always with her spotless clothes, emanating an air of superiority as she glared darkly at Hermione. It was somehow strange how Hermione didn't feel in the least bit annoyed by the pointless perfection that woman so liked to flaunt. The evil look on Legifer's face had intensified as Hermione had not reacted at all. The professor briskly walked over to where Hermione was standing, stopped before her and stared disapprovingly at her.

"I would be very delighted to hear what kept you to attend my class today," Legifer snapped irately while still hitting Hermione with her glare.

Hermione continued looking at the clearly enraged professor but her own temper still didn't react at all.

"I… I wasn't feeling so well today," Hermione finally said softly.

A nasty glint appeared in Legifer's eyes and then she spat mordantly, "I don't appreciate it very much if my students cut my class."

"I apologize," Hermione replied in a strangely emotionless voice.

A sharp frown took form between Legifer's eyebrows as she narrowed her eyes at Hermione.
"Be that as it may," she declared in a clipped tone. "It still doesn't excuse your intolerable behaviour."

Hermione didn't answer anything, causing the professor to huff at her irately.

"Follow me," she ordered tartly.

Without another word, Legifer abruptly turned around and walked down the corridor.

"Where to?" Hermione dared to ask.

She didn't want to spite the professor. But that painful numbness was still wrapped around her and Hermione just wanted to be alone.

"You still have detention today," came Legifer's terse reply.

It was then that Hermione remembered it was a Friday. Since the Christmas break, she always had to serve detention at Fridays.

… Christmas break… Hermione visibly flinched as her thoughts wandered to the incidents that had occurred during that break. It had been during the Christmas break that Hermione had, for the first time, seen more in Tom than just-
