The letter delivered by the larger owl was from Viktor. It contained information about Viktor's agent, fees, and contact information, as well as advice on how to best deal with the wizard. At the end of the letter was a short missive to say hello to Hermione for him. Hermione groaned and lightly thumped her head on the kitchen table, suddenly remembering she had promised to write Viktor a letter. Hermione knew there was no time now to compose a letter to her old friend and decided to bring ink, quill and parchment with her to the game. Besides, she didn't think she could stomach the sight of her husband at the moment, and figured keeping her nose down might be a good way to keep from having to look upon him.

__*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*

'I really wish Hermione would gain a few pounds,' Severus groaned internally, noting the rather bruised sensation along both hip bones. He made a promise that unless she put some weight on, shagging her in a missionary position with her legs down was not an option. Banging hip bones was high on his priority list of things to avoid.

As he practically hobbled to the bathroom to relieve himself, Severus definitely knew that the seventy-hour brewed batch of the male enhancement potion was only meant for those who were very young, and very physically fit. When he saw Hermione on Sunday, he would try the fifty-hour version, or Draco would have to use a Mobilicorpus to get him to work Monday morning.

Fortunately, Marf did not have the day off this time. Severus could have the house-elf fix breakfast while he slumped over his tea, debating if he should take an Invigoration Draught, or crawl back into bed and sleep away the rest of the morning, which was almost gone anyway.

Though his body was tired, his mind was not. After giving the weekly shopping list to Marf, Severus finished his breakfast while feeling excitement pulsing through his tired veins. His freedom was now going to be a reality instead of some convoluted strategy with indeterminate factors. Most everything was set with nothing too ambiguous left to plan. The only hitch was the fluxweed. He remembered Albert Dobmeir's offer to help him in any way, but he was hesitant to use Albert unless there were no more fluxweed shipments for the rest of the year, and there was no guarantee that the elder Potions master had any in his stores. There was one avenue he could explore, but he would have to word his letter carefully to Katherine Bigelow.

Then, there was Hermione's apprenticeship as well. Severus was very pleased at how events had turned out, and that she would have something to look forward to instead of a lifetime stuck in the Department of S&R. The way her face lit up, and the way she expressed her gratitude, was a greater reward than he could have imagined. It was not only the right thing to do, but it made him feel good inside, something he hadn't felt in a long time. And the best part was that he did not have to use her apprenticeship as bribery to make her agree to give him the restricted Polyjuice Potion ingredients.

Suddenly anxious, Severus decided that it was best if he went into work and kept busy instead of sitting around his flat all day thinking and rethinking about his upcoming escape. He could have thought about his time with Hermione, and the many different ways he'd had her time and time again, but that would only arouse him and he wasn't feeling like a wank this morning, as his balls were still aching.

It was nice to Floo directly to Lovely Lavender's headquarters instead of having to avoid people on the street. With none of the office house-elves, Miss Brown, or Draco around, the office was quieter than usual. Most of the house-elves were still busy on the production floor making cauldrons full of beauty products, but as the only one in the offices, Severus enjoyed guaranteed peace and lack of interruptions.

There was the temporary hair dye problem he still had to finish solving, as he had been interrupted Thursday, and Friday he’d been too tired to do anything but drink tea, nap, and mope all day. But first, he pulled out the letter from Katherine Bigelow.

He’d had the occasional owl from her since her relocation to Spain, her letters filled with a few questions about local Spanish customs, and ideas for a few exports to Britain, since she still had so many distribution contacts there. The past three letters expressed concern about making enough money the first year. Expenses were far more than what she had anticipated, as the Spanish Ministry of Magic seemed keen on coming up with a few extra fees that, in very plain terms, amounted to extortion. Katherine was seeking counsel from Sebastian Delgado, Severus’ alias, for some plants she could grow in Spain that were in short supply in apothecaries, as she too had been reading the trades on the devastating rains in the eastern United States.

Severus didn't know why he hadn’t thought of it last night, but counseling Katherine to grow fluxweed was certainly a viable option once the initial panic of the situation wore off. He had not been thinking very clearly last night, as the male enhancement potion had placed his brains squarely between his legs, in addition to the post-shag exhaustion.

Though fluxweed is an annual, he knew that due to the southern latitude of Spain, she would be able to get three good months of growth in before harvest, the growing season even going well into December. The only thing was, could Katherine even obtain the seeds to grow any?

After a quick check with the latest Potion ingredient trade papers, Severus wrote a letter to Katherine recommending plants to grow with a quick harvest schedule that were currently scarce or would be in the near future, including fluxweed on the list. Fluxweed could probably, in ideal growing conditions, provide the first crop in a little over two months. He also recommended sending an Owl to one of the major apothecaries in Diagon Alley for their latest price list to see what was out of stock and what was fetching a rather high price. He also recommended growing wild ginseng, as large specimens fetched astronomical prices, but that would require leaving the plants undisturbed for the next ten years before harvesting.
The next few hours were spent retracing his steps to the point of epiphany – to resolve the filmy issue from the temporary hair dye – before he’d been so rudely interrupted with the surprise inspection.

As Severus stood and scanned his library for a particular book, his eye caught sight of, A Potions Apprentice's Guide to Master-level Techniques. Picking it up, he passed a reverent hand over the cover, remembering when he purchased it just before he had begun his own apprenticeship. Instead of putting it back, he set it aside and began pulling out other books Hermione might find useful in preparation of her apprenticeship.

’I could give her a head start on her apprenticeship, since it's only a matter of waiting until I can leave before she can begin under Dobmeir,’ Severus thought sensibly.

He started pulling down several advanced-level reference books, including, Catalysts and Their Combinations, Basic Bases and Simple Solutions, and Potion Analysis and Retrograde Potions Theory. Over his many hours of conversation with Hermione, he knew there was little about ingredients she had left to learn, having worked in her job long enough to have nearly the same level of expertise as a Potions master. It was Potions theory and brewing, Herbology experience of tending a Potions master's garden, anatomy, code of ethics, and five languages she still had to master.

When he had set aside a sizable stack of primers essential to the master-level of Potions work, he went back to his task of improving the temporary hair dye. It wasn't so much concern over loaning some of his precious books that made him periodically stop working to regard the teetering tower of tomes, but something akin to nurturing and the anticipation of Hermione's reaction when he loaned her his books that made him smile to himself, and then go back to his work.

She couldn't look at Ron. Every time Hermione lifted her head up and spied her husband by the Chudley Cannons goal posts, the chaotic emotional turmoil inside of her would begin burning once more. So instead of subjecting herself to any more unpleasantness, she kept her eyes fixed on the letter she was writing to Viktor. To keep prying eyes, namely Christy and Nicole, from reading over her shoulder, Hermione placed an Obfuscation Charm on it so that only she could read it and it would appear as unintelligible blurred lines to anyone else.

Occasionally, the game announcer would talk excitedly over the roar of the crowd during a thrilling play, in which case Hermione would look up, and inevitably her eyes would travel over to Ron. The announcer made the comment about Weasley flying exceptionally well, and Hermione could not help but snidely think that maybe it was because Blaise had shoved an additional broom up Ron's arse, thereby helping him fly better that day.

Spying the letters on the back of Ron's jersey, Hermione had the most irresistible urge to Charm the letters to say something else.

'W-A-N-K-E-R. Yeah, that's a good one. Wonder how long it would take for anyone to notice it.'

To amuse herself, when Hermione wasn't concentrating on her letter to Viktor, she began thinking of other things to Charm on the back of Ron's jersey, including: Whore-sley, Poofter, Arse Pirate, Rump Roger, Crack Crammer, Bugger Boy, Fuck Face, Sausage Jockey, Sluttykins, Tramp-oline, and Bludger Bat Bitch. If it wasn't for the fact that all the other players' wives were sitting around her, and it was a stiff penalty fine to cast spells on players during a Quidditch game, she would have cast at least one new nickname to flash on Ron's back.

It was taking so long for the Snitch to show up, Hermione had finished her lengthy letter to Viktor detailing her evening at the Grand Royal Supper Club, and everything that had happened in her life since the end of the war. Sitting there with more blank parchment on her lap, she was tempted to write a letter to Severus, but what could she say that she couldn't say to him in person? Somehow, Hermione didn't think that Severus would be the sort to swoon over receiving love letters, and she wasn't in the habit of keeping a diary. She could write them for the sake of putting her thoughts to paper, but if anyone ever discovered them, it would likely lead to an ending worthy of a Greek tragedy. And though Hermione was well versed in Muggle and wizard literature, she was not one to write poetry either.

Instead she began writing out a shopping list, since she didn't have a chance to go to the farmers' market earlier that day. Hermione had been barely able to get a present for Percy before rushing off to the game. Her trip had been made even quicker knowing that Percy had a fondness for eagle quills, so she didn't have to spend any time browsing around for ideas. It was while she was working on a list of long-put off chores around the flat that a great cheer erupted, signaling that someone had caught the Snitch. The Cannons' Seeker, Wally Bristol, made a victory lap around the pitch, holding the golden orb aloft for all to see.

Not wanting to get caught in the rush of the crowd waiting for the ritual end-of-game handshake or fight between teams, Hermione made polite farewells to the other Quidditch players' wives, and made her way towards an exit. Just before Hermione descended the stairs, she looked up and saw Ron give a friendly pat on William Kidd's bottom.

The bile in Hermione's throat rose up as she wondered if William was bisexual too, and if they did things to each other in the locker room that her mind did not want to imagine.

She did not want to wait for Ron to emerge from the locker room before departing for the Burrow; Hermione wanted to go ahead and avoid her husband at all costs. The other wives finally filed down and waited like good little witches for their husbands to emerge freshly washed, and fawned over by the reporters who covered the game. Hermione kept herself preoccupied thinking about all... the things she would learn during her apprenticeship under Potions master Dobmeir, but then reality set in: her future boss would be Lavender Brown, who just happened to set Ron up with Zabini. Or maybe Zabini wore a mask like Severus did and hid his Dark Mark, and Ron just wanted a random shag with some black bloke. She did not want to be thinking about these things again shortly before Ron would emerge from the locker room, only to have her resolve tested not to deck him in front of all the reporters, calling him an unfaithful poofter.

Other than the time she saw Ron descend the stairs from Zabini's flat, she had no other conclusive proof that Ron was unfaithful to her, and with another wizard. If she had one other shred of evidence, she'd use it to leave her husband in a heartbeat. There was the time when he was confronted by Harry over dinner as to where Ron went during that week he was gone, but other than his evasive answer that he was staying with a friend, there was no proof of his infidelities. It could have been only one time with another wizard, and she just had sod's law luck to be there when he left. Who knew?

Ron emerged from the locker room smiling and talking with William, and Hermione could only dread Ron saying that they had been invited to another insipid dinner party. They only made the briefest of eye contact before Hermione looked away, repulsed by Ron. She tried to keep her features schooled, feigning a headache to explain the grimace on her face.

“Did you see that Quaffle I caught, barely hanging onto my broom?” Ron asked excitedly, noticing Hermione's pensive mood.

“Not really. I've had a headache for most of the game, and the sun was bothering me.”

“Which is why you had your head buried in some papers on your lap during the game,” Ron retorted a bit shortly.

Hermione closed her eyes and decided she didn't feel like an argument, no matter how much her pride demanded her to stand up and verbally eviscerate the bastard. “We should go over to the Burrow now, as Percy's party will have started by now,” she deflected.

Ron had no reply, and they both walked silently to the Apparition point near the stadium.

The party was in full swing by the time Hermione and Ron arrived. After Hermione handed Percy his gift, Ron pulled her aside and asked what they had gotten his brother. Hermione could only roll her eyes, and stop herself from demanding her husband take his filthy hands off of her.
“You'll find out when he opens it,” she growled at him irritably.

Ron let go of his wife as if the mere touch of her burnt his hands. Figuring she was sore again over their departure from one another on their anniversary night, he did not retort and headed out the door to see if a pick-up game of Quidditch had been started yet.

Hermione headed towards the kitchen for something to drink. Earlier that day she made a promise not to touch anything with alcohol, as she had finally noticed she made a nasty habit of doing foolish things under the influence while she was suffering from stress at the same time.

In the kitchen she found Ginny with a cool glass of water in her hand, easily talking with someone. As Hermione rounded the fireplace, she saw the redheaded witch talking to Harry. Hermione froze in her tracks and momentarily gaped, feeling panic rise in her chest, as if she had been caught.

'Breathe, Hermione! Dammit, breathe!'

Suddenly images of Harry cornering and confronting her about her sudden appearance at the Red Ginseng Thursday night flooded her mind. Knowing she was standing there like a fool, she recovered by saying, “Oh, Harry! I thought you'd be outside. Ron went out there, probably looking for you.”

“Really? Okay, he must want to start up a quick game. Thanks.” Harry gave Hermione a quick welcoming hug before going out the kitchen door to look for Ron.

Once Harry was gone, Hermione collapsed against the kitchen cabinets, bracing her hands on the scrubbed wooden counter, trying to catch her breath. She closed her eyes and willed her knees to become solid once more, and to stop from shaking. 'God, I hope I wasn't transparent.'

Sensing her friend's distress, Ginny walked over and placed a supportive hand on the older witch's back. “You all right, Hermione?”

She whispered urgently, “No, we need to talk. Now.”

Knowing that the kitchen was no place for a private conversation, going outside would run the risk of intrusion, and bedrooms could be disturbed by people looking for you, Ginny urged Hermione to follow her with a jerk of the head. The two slipped up the back stairs to the attic, which was still overly warm from the summer heat.

Once the door was secured with an Imperturbable Charm, Ginny spun around and asked in equal amount of anxiousness and concern, “What the hell is wrong?” She could clearly see the signs of distress in Hermione's drawn face.

Hermione, glaring at Ginny, flatly said, “You can cut the ignorance act. I know you know about me visiting Severus, for starters.”

Ginny laughed and relaxed visibly. After doing a couple quick spells to remove the dust and a Cushioning Charm, she sat down on the attic floor. “So, you're willing to admit you're visiting him then?”

Ignoring the dust on the arched-top chest, Hermione sat down, oblivious to the large swath of gray filth now smudged across her bottom. With an exasperated sigh, she admitted, “Yes. After Ron left me at the Grand Royal Supper Club–”

“What?!” interrupted Ginny hotly. “What do you mean he ‘left’ you there?”

Knowing that if she didn't explain quickly and simply, Ginny was going to confront Ron on the matter, Hermione gave Ginny a breakdown of events, including his refusal of her sexual advances, as ammunition for more information yet to come.

“So, after Viktor walked you to the carriage,” Ginny said, “you went straight home.”

“Not exactly.” Hermione confessed. This time, Hermione gave her friend a very pared down version of her encounter with Severus, and finished her tale by mumbling, “ThenwekissedandIranaway.”

“I beg your pardon?”

“We kissed.”
“I gathered that,” Ginny replied dryly. “What's this about running away?”

“I don't want to go into it.” Hermione buried her face in her hands, unable to look at Ginny, wondering if she would be furious for her sort of cheating on Ron.

“You have to see Severus as soon as possible. You just can't leave him like that, running away like that!” Ginny pointed out, panic rising in her voice.

“I saw him last night.” Hermione looked up to see Ginny's face shining with hope. “We talked.” ‘We did a lot more than talk last night.’ “I will help get the ingredients, so you can stop pretending like you don't know about everything.” Hermione began to wonder if Ginny's tolerance for her seeing Severus was more out of a need for her to get the Polyjuice ingredients, rather than empathy over a loveless marriage.

Ginny's face broke out into a beaming smile as she rushed to embrace Hermione. The younger witch crushed her friend in a fierce hug as waves of tears overcame her. Overwhelming relief and joy filled Ginny's heart, and it felt like a weighty burden had been lifted from her shoulders. “Oh God, Hermione,” she wailed. “I can't tell you how long Draco and I have waited. I can't tell you how happy you've made us.”

Sensing Hermione was not sharing in her happiness, Ginny pulled back and, after wiping away a few tears and blowing her nose on a conjured handkerchief, asked, “What are you not telling me? There's something else, isn't there?”

Hermione nodded dumbly, wondering how Ginny would take the news. “Last night as I was leaving Severus' flat, guess who I saw coming downstairs from Blaise Zabini's flat?”

Propping her chin on her hands, eager for a juicy piece of gossip, Ginny asked excitedly, “Who?”

Hermione turned her face away in shame of what she was about to tell her friend and sister-in-law. Memories of the smug look on Ron's face, as he tucked his shirt in, came back to the forefront of Hermione's mind. She wanted nothing more than to destroy him at the moment. “Ron.”

“Ron who?” Ginny asked dumbly.

“Your brother, my husband, the redhead wanker that has made my life hell being married to him.
Ronald Bilius Weasley, that's who!” she bit out with all the vitriol that had been building up inside of her during the day. Burying her face in her hands, she wept listlessly, “Oh God! What did I do to drive him into the arms of another... wizard.” Just saying it aloud with revulsion made it sound just as horrid as the situation seemed.

Bowled over by this revelation, Ginny just sat there in silence. Finally, she said, “Are you sure?”

“Of course, I'm sure!” Hermione yelled defensively. “I saw his fucking smug face just outside of Severus’ door. He stopped and tucked his shirt in. Severus and I heard him howling all night long, telling Zabini to 'take it like a dirty bitch' while he shagged him like a madman! No wonder he calls me a lousy lay. How can I compare to the talent of a gigolo who can give him head or take it up the arse all night long?” Hermione was assaulted with more random thoughts of Severus fucking other witches, possibly hundreds as he had earlier confessed, in his bed, the very same bed she had laid in last night. Suddenly, Hermione felt very dirty, and believed that no amount of caustic cleaning solutions or hot showers would ever get her clean again.

Ginny could not believe that Ron was gay. Not her brother. Before she could stop herself, she said tentatively, “Well...”

Hermione’s head snapped around and she fixed Ginny with a wild look. “Well, what? What? You knew?”

“No! God, no! It's just that... No. That would mean that... No. Forget it,” Ginny insisted, but knew Hermione would not let the matter rest.

“Tell me.” It was not a request or a plea; it was a demand.

A blush crept up Ginny's neck until it reached her ears. “I promised Harry I wouldn't tell, but fortunately he passed out before he made me take a wand oath.” Hermione nodded her head that she understood, urging her friend to keep spilling her secret. “You know how Harry is when he gets really drunk.” Both witches laughed, knowing that Harry, if plied with enough alcohol, would tell his friends any and everything. “Well, one time we got really drunk and Harry wanted to know if I had ever done anything with my dorm mates.”

Hermione thought deeply for a moment before comprehension dawnded across her face. “You don't mean...”
“Yes, that's exactly what I mean.”

Snorting with disgust, Hermione added, “What is it with guys getting off on girls doing each other?”

“I don't know, but Harry asked if I ever did anything with my dorm mates: kissing, touching. I won't go into all the things he asked. So I told about how my roommates and I were comparing breasts when they started growing and such.”

Hermione felt deeply embarrassed by this news, as she hadn't even felt comfortable getting undressed with Lavender and Parvati in the same room watching.

“So,” Ginny continued with her tale, “I asked Harry if he and his dorm mates compared... well, you know.” They both laughed nervously. “And Harry said, 'Not exactly.' Then I asked him to explain and he told me about this time during his fourth year that he, Ron, Neville, Dean, and Seamus got into this contest.”

“For what? The biggest hard-on?” Hermione guessed correctly.

“Yes, and more.” Ginny started tittering and giggling. “For who could come the fastest.”

Sputtering in surprise, Hermione asked, “Are you serious?!”

Nodding emphatically, the young witch squeaked, “Yes!”

“Oh my God.” Hermione shook her head and could not expunge the vision of five fourteen-year-old boys wanking off.

“This is the best part,” Ginny said, trying not to laugh. “There were prizes.” Both witches disintegrated into laughter. In between gulps of air, Ginny went on, “Zonko's jokes and Honeydukes sweets to who had the biggest one, and then they all sat in a circle and started jerking off so they could make sure no one cheated. And then..., and then...” Ginny's voice rose in pitch and she tried to contain her laughter. “The grand prize to whoever shot the farthest!”
Hermione's stomach ached, and Ginny had tears coming out of her eyes. Mrs. Weasley needed to laugh, for the only other option available was to cry bitterly.

“So, I know Harry has never even remotely done anything with another wizard beyond that little competition. I don't know what else to say, Hermione. I would have never guessed... Blaise Zabini?” Ginny said, her disbelief hanging about like some ghostly manifestation in the room.

The older witch nodded somberly, brought back to the reality of the situation.

“I'm so sorry, Hermione.” Ginny stood and walked over to give her friend a consolatory hug.

The other thing niggling in the back of Hermione's mind begged for dominance. “Ginny? Did Harry say what he was doing Thursday night at work?” She prayed Harry had told Ginny where he was working.

“Yeah, there was this murder case he came upon. Shook him up pretty bad. He was pretty quiet over breakfast; said he had a lot on his mind after what he saw.” Mrs. Potter frowned to herself.

'If Harry was busy with a murder case, then maybe it was another Auror who watched the building.' This thought unsettled Hermione even more. Perhaps it was only a matter of a few days before Alastor Moody or Kingsley called her into their office to ask why she had gone to the Red Ginseng last Thursday night. Remembering two other things she needed to discuss with Ginny, she blurted out, “There is a Floo point at the Red Ginseng.”

“Really? When did they connect it?” Ginny asked.

Hermione filled Ginny in on the details of the new Floo connection, and Severus' idea for dinner for all four of them Sunday afternoon, along with the rehearsed lie of the two witches going shopping all day. Mrs. Weasley left out the part about spending time with Severus testing out another batch of the Male Enhancement Potion. She was keenly aware that Ginny would probably correctly surmise that she and Severus had been intimate, if she hadn’t guessed it already. There was no point in bringing the issue up.

Knowing that if they did not emerge soon people would come looking for them, the pair finally left the attic just as small children were sent forth by their grandmother to call everyone to dinner.
A long table was set up in the back garden, making use of the last of summer's glorious days. It had rained that morning. The sun warmed the damp earth creating a muggy atmosphere that was only kept at bay by the freely flowing pumpkin juice, and shade from the pergola draped with rambling roses giving one last vibrant show of summer's bounty. Under the honey-scented blossoms of pale gold, peach and pink the Weasley clan ate and drank amid the chatter of several conversations going on at once.

Hermione sat between Ginny and George, as Ron had sat down across from his wife. This might have seemed odd if it weren't for the fact that Michael, Bill and Fleur's oldest, begged his Uncle Ron to sit next to him. Michael kept asking his uncle if he could get tickets to the next Chudley Cannons’ game. Bill and Fleur mentioned that since Harry, Ginny, and Hermione had taken the kids to the game while Fleur was recovering from childbirth three weeks ago, Quidditch had been all that Michael could talk about. Ron was attentive and explained several aspects of the game in clear and simple terms that a five-year-old could understand without talking down to him. Were it not for the fact that Hermione was currently pissed beyond all reason at her husband, she would have found it endearing to watch the exchange. Instead, she spent most of the meal talking with Ginny before casually bringing up her so-called idea to go shopping the next day.

As the meal started winding down, George nudged Hermione conspiratorially. “So. Have you given any consideration to that career opportunity we discussed last month?”

For a moment, Hermione had no idea what George was talking about until she remembered his offer to run the “adult novelty” store he mentioned. “Oh!” Taking a second to gather her thoughts, she replied, “Well, erm. Actually, something else has come up.”

“You got another job?” George asked, surprised Ron hadn't made mention of it during the family Quidditch game earlier.

“Not exactly.” Hermione hemmed and hawed.

“What then?” Fred piped up from across the table, sitting a few seats down from Michael and Ron.

Cornered, Hermione realized she hadn't thought about how she would announce her pending appointment, so she decided to keep it brief, but truthful. “I think I may have an apprenticeship coming up.”

“What?!” chorused Harry, Ron, and Ginny at the same time.
Ginny furrowed her brow and nudged Hermione with her arm, wondering why her friend had forgotten to inform her of that detail.

Giving a half-shrug of apology, she said, “I just found out... last night.” Ron gave her a quizzical look, and she suddenly realized she was caught in a quickly disintegrating lie, and had to lie a little, and believably, or the jig would be up. Looking to Ron sheepishly, she added, “I had a meeting last night and I didn't want to get anyone's hopes up except mine. I really didn't want to say anything until my plans are more, um, solid.” She gave him her best awkward grin, and he seemed to buy it completely. “I was so distracted by my upcoming meeting that I left an experiment simmering at work.”

Hermione gave herself a small pat on the back for the quick recovery to explain her late return home last night. If she could have, she would have let out a huge sigh of relief. As it was, she was too nervous to relax just yet, and felt her knees begin to tremble from the adrenaline rush of fear. She prayed that she could keep the lie going with more half-truths while not digging herself any more holes to fall through. It seemed the scope of her lie only increased with each word uttered. She decided to stick with as much truth as she could in order to reduce the number of lies she had to remember.

Bill, who was in conversation with Arthur, stopped and turned a brightened face to his sister-in-law. “What type of apprenticeship?”

“Potions, actually.” Hermione hoped that would end the matter and other topics would dominate the table, but this was not the case. More people stopped their conversations and paid attention to this latest bit of news until just about the whole table was listening to Hermione's every word.

Jostling her newborn into her other arm, Fleur asked, “Aren't you a bit old for an apprenticeship? They usually don't take someone who has been out of school so long?”

Now, Hermione wished she hadn't said anything and just wished she had told George she was still considering his offer instead of being subjected to so many inquisitive looks as to how she had landed a Potions apprenticeship. Remembering that Albert Dobmeir had just dropped Trevor Spawn as a future apprentice, she ad-libbed by responding, “The apprentice the Potions master had lined up didn't work out. He remembered me and...” She let her sentence trail off, figuring it was best that she shut her mouth before this lie got any more complex. Hermione decided to let everyone else fill in the blanks.

Smiling at his wife, Ron asked, “When do you start?”
That was a good question. Deciding to cut and run from further entanglements in this bit of deceit, she said, “It depends on a few contingencies. I don't know. When I know more, I'll keep you all informed. Right now it's all tentative.”

She hoped that would close the issue, but her insistence to keep quiet only seemed to pique everyone's interest in her affairs even more.

“Who is the Potions master?” asked Harry, who was sitting on the other side of Ginny.

It was all she could do to keep her mind and mouth from blurtting out “Severus Snape.” If Hermione did slip, she could always say it had been a joke. “Albert Dobmeir,” she announced.

Bill lifted his glass in salute. “Congratulations. I hear he's a good and fair one to apprentice under, unlike a few others I've heard of.”

Ron snorted and yelled out, “Yeah, like Snape!”

It was all Hermione could do not to choke on her own spit while the Weasley boys burst into laughter. She hid her discomfort byducking her head and pretending to laugh into her hand; Hermione would not risk looking at Ginny until the moment passed for fear that someone would see them exchange meaningful glances. Arthur and Molly smiled, but did not join in the laughter.

Glaring down at his plate of food, Draco disdainfully commented, “Plain roasted chicken. Your culinary skills are slipping. Or are you still too hung-over from yesterday to bother with a little rosemary?”

Severus ignored Draco's comment, knowing full well the young wizard was attempting to taunt him into divulging information about his Friday night meeting with Hermione; so far, he had told Draco nothing.

Up to this point, Draco had been constantly nagging Severus for information about his progress with Hermione. Since he had entered Severus' flat, he had not mentioned the meeting or questioned Severus how well it had gone.

“I decided to move our formal weekly dinner to tomorrow instead. I'll be serving leg of lamb,” Severus informed his friend as he carefully sliced into the meat with his knife and fork. “And it's not plain roasted. I peppered and salted the cavity and skin before roasting. It is lightly seasoned.” He chewed with relish as Draco glared back at him.

“Fine. I'll ask how it went with Mrs. Weasley last night,” Draco huffed irritably. “From the fact that you have not killed yourself intentionally with poison, or accidentally with alcohol, nor did I arrive to find your place ruined once more, I can only assume our plans are back on track.” Severus sipped his wine, and gave a genteel nod of his head so that Draco could continue with his rant. “So, she'll get us the ingredients. And just how soon can we get them?”

With intentional cultured grace, Severus set his wine glass down, and dabbed the corners of his mouth with his napkin before replying calmly, “That depends.”

Having been schooled in the way of manners by his father, Draco knew exactly the methods Severus was using, as Severus had learned some of his mannerisms and charms from Lucius, especially the elder Malfoy's evasive and stalling tactics. “Very well, what are the contingencies that will delay us from leaving within one month's time as you had originally scheduled? And of these delays, what measures can be used to expedite the process so that we may leave this damned country sooner?” The blond wizard sat back in his chair, and swirled his wine in his glass with a practiced hand.

“The Boomslang skin and Bicorn horn are not an issue; the fluxweed picked during a full moon is.”

Draco's eyes narrowed. “What do you mean, the fluxweed is a problem? The stuff is a weed, and literally grows like one.”

“Yes, but no great plan can be carried out without some overwhelming hurdle to overcome,” the raven-haired wizard said, waxing philosophical. “You know nothing is ever as easy as it should seem. I planned for the human element to be the problem when actually nature is to blame in this instance. Hermione agreed wholeheartedly to help us in this matter without any begging, coercion, or promise of a Potions apprenticeship. The matter fully rests with Mother Nature, and her willingness to cooperate with us, or her bending to the will of the Fates, who seem to take great joy in fucking up my life as well as yours.”

After a synopsis of the situation of the scarce ingredient, Draco pinched the bridge of his nose, a mannerism he had picked up from his mentor. “Is there any other way to obtain fluxweed? Maybe we can send Ginny over to France to buy some then bring back?”

“You know, as well as I do, that the moment she comes back through the Floo, Apparition point, or Portkey, anything Ginny tries to smuggle back will wind up in the customs locker down in the Ministry's basement,” the older wizard lectured Draco. “Then, she would only be hauled in for questioning as to why she was trying to smuggle a regulated Potions ingredient into the country.”

“What about Muggle means of transportation? She can take a Portkey to Paris and then take a train back through the Chunnel,” Draco suggested, desperate for a quick solution.

“If England's borders were secured during the Napoleonic Wars to prevent ingredients from being smuggled in, even via Muggle ships, what makes you think the Ministry has not already secured the Chunnel as a smuggling port as well?” Sensing Draco's desperation, he put the idea out of the younger wizard's mind by adding, “Or, would you rather risk Ginny getting caught and interrogated by Moody with Veritaserum, spilling every secret she knows against her will?”

“So we sit and wait for the gods of weather to smile down on the east coast of the United States? Is that all we have left to hope for?” Draco asked with defeat.

“There is Katherine Bigelow in Spain. I have recommended that she should grow some fluxweed for a quick cash crop. I sent the owl to her today, so it should be arriving there by Monday at the latest.” Severus set his napkin on the table, as his appetite had waned with the discussion, but he continued to pour more wine for himself and his guest.

They sat in companionable silence drinking, and thinking about the future, both near and a long way down the road of life.

Studying Severus, Draco decided to test out a theory he had growing in the back of his mind during dinner. He waited until Severus was in mid-swallow before asking, “So, when did you finally bang Hermione?”

The sight of Severus spewing his wine halfway across the table was all Draco needed to confirm that they had actually had sex. The baleful glare Severus shot Draco only solidified his hunch that it was last night.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: And this is the part where future chapters are posted as fast as my betas can edit them and then get through the validation queue at Ashwinder. I am posting to AFF and AO3, in addition to Ashwinder. Once they are up on Ashwinder, after begin validated, I'll post on AFF and AO3 as well since there is the odd error that my betas have missed and I need to correct before it's validated and posted. So it will be easier that I wait for it to be validated on Ashwinder and post on the other fanfic hosting sites after.

If you want to watch for future posting announcements and when chapters are up, you can subscribe to the Twitter page I have set up just for posting updates at: @ATDLHEAbetz
Or on my Tumblr page that also features fan art for this fic, or something that is relevant to the story: http://atdlhea-betz.tumblr.com/

I will include the odd post from Leviosa on Twitter and Tumblr, since I am the Hotel & Logistics Director and also resident HP Mixologist for Leviosa, a Harry Potter & YA Lit conference being held next year in Las Vegas, July 7-10, 2016: leviosa.org.

I have the ENTIRE rest of “And They Didn't Live Happily Ever After” written out and I have proofed it one final time. It's complete. The only thing keeping from posting it all in one go is that I need my betas to go through and clean it up, as all good fanfic should have at least one beta to edit.

So you will not have to worry about me posting more chapters to yet leave this unfinished for yet another nine years before more chapters are written. It is done. Just be patient with my betas as they will edit as fast as they can. Remember, they have lives and are betaing for me for free out of the kindness of their hearts.

A huge round of thanks to my wonderful betas (in random order): GinnyW, JuneW, and Horserider. And addition thanks to my regular sounding board, cocoachristy and GinnyW.
Summary of chapters 1-50

Chapter Summary

For those of you who first read this story ten years ago and wish to have a recap of the first fifty chapters instead of reading them again from the beginning, which is 350,000+ words, here is the summary of the major points so far.

Four years after the end of the war, Harry asks Hermione to spy on his wife, Ginny, who he suspects is having an affair. Hermione reluctantly agrees and, with the use of Harry's Invisibility Cloak and a pair of Extendable Eyes, spies on Ginny and Draco in a very intimate and erotic moment. After Ginny leaves Draco's apartment, Hermione confronts Ginny and becomes aware of not only of their relationship that began before the end of the war, and before Harry started courting and eventually marrying Ginny, but of the Death Eater Decree. The decree was a set of rules enacted shortly after the end of the war in which all Death Eaters are forced to live under involving no Potions brewing, no Apparating, travel restrictions to prevent leaving the country and a severe restriction on which spells they can perform.

After the decree came out, Draco disappeared, which caused Ginny to give up hope on seeing him again and finally agreed to date Harry under pressure from her mother, Molly. It was years after the decree was passed Ginny came across Draco again.

Upon learning about the finer points of the decree, since it came out while Hermione and Ron were away on their Honeymoon, Hermione becomes incensed to learn that it is equally applied to Draco Malfoy and Severus Snape since they were loyal to the Order. However, the two spies for the Order were falsely accused of Dumbledore's Death and letting Death Eaters into Hogwarts during the last days of the war by Moody without any proof. Hermione also discovers that Ginny pays Draco to see him as a gigolo, with Lavender Brown as his madam, since the Death Eater Decree resulted in all monies and property taken from all Death Eaters. They are now only allowed to work in humiliating low-level Ministry jobs like scrubbing toilets, being a lift operator and such. The Ministry also turns a blind eye to other disenfranchising jobs such as begging, trash picking and prostitution.

Hermione tells Ginny she is going to tell Harry about her affair with Draco, which results in Ginny pleading for Draco's life insisting Harry would send Draco away to Azkaban for a Dementor's Kiss or kill him and get away with it without question since Harry is an Auror and defeated Voldemort. Hermione, convinced by Ginny's pleas, is now conflicted and does not want to cause the possible death or more unjust incarceration of Draco because of their affair, yet feels the need to tell Harry.

Hermione insists Ginny stop seeing Draco, but Ginny also confesses she has been in love with Draco since before the end of the war and if she could, she would leave Harry to be with him.
Ginny lets Hermione also believe that her marriage to Harry can be salvaged in order to buy some time, informing Hermione that if Draco dies or goes to Azkaban due to Hermione snitching to Harry, Ginny would leave Harry on no uncertain terms.

Unable to talk with anyone about her conundrum, Hermione goes to a bar in distress where Lavender Brown, who is not only Draco's madam but founder of the hugely successful The Lovely Lavender Company, a beauty and cosmetics potions company, comes across her before she begins drinking. Lavender confesses she has an innate sense to know when people are in distress, which is how she initially came across Ginny, who was depressed and lonely being married to Harry Potter. It is because of her talent to find conflicted and distressed souls that leads Lavender to find many of her clients (and two key employees), who seek either a sympathetic ear, sexual favors or a combination of the two, with one of her gigolos, since Draco is not the only one in her employ in this capacity. Lavender offers Hermione an evening with one of her gigolos in order to offer her a sympathetic ear. To Hermione's own surprise, she agrees to spend the money to have an unbiased sympathetic ear to listen to her while she decides if she is going to tell Harry about the affair.

Lavender Brown secretly set Hermione up with Severus Snape, who is one of Lavender's gigolos. Initially he refuses to agree to see Hermione until Lavender bribes him with a larger than normal percentage of royalties for a line of sex potions they are about to begin work on, since Severus secretly works as Lavender's Potions master, helping her develop lots of the products.

Lavender employs Severus, desperate to have a Potions master to help her develop products and aware he was a spy for the Order, even if he is persecuted under the decree as a Death Eater. Her knowledge that he was a spy for the Order is revealed during a memory in her Pensieve she later shared in the story. In the memory, Lavender and her best friend, Parvati Patil, were abducted during their last year at Hogwarts and held hostage in the Rookwood dungeons. Parvati was hauled off to be raped and Crucioed by Macnair, while Blaise Zabini, who later becomes a gigolo in Lavender's employ, helped Lavender escape. After escaping and winding up in the infirmary at Hogwarts, Lavender comes across Severus incapacitated by a slew of vicious hexes by Lucius Malfoy, in which she sees his Dark Mark and is prevented from killing him after Dumbledore stops her and explains he is a spy for the Order. Parvati returns to Hogwarts in a complete state of shock from her assault and is a permanent resident of St. Mungo's to this day.

Severus works for Lavender consulting and researching, but avoids doing any actual brewing to avoid violating the Death Eater Decree. Draco works as Lavender's director of advertising and marketing; the gigolo night jobs are a cover for Lavender to employ their skills for her beauty potions company under the decree.

Severus hides his identity from Hermione and his other clients with head scarves and masks. Hermione spills her guts to Severus during an evening of tea and tears, unaware it is him. During the conversation, Severus steers her into a decision in which not to tell Harry about Ginny's affair and convinces her into trying to save the Potters' marriage, which is ironic considering Hermione's own marriage to Ron is on shaky ground.
After her one meeting with Severus, Hermione promises never to visit that gigolo ever again, but changes her mind during a drunken bout fueled by anger, loneliness and depression. She views her subsequent visits to her gigolo, Severus, who goes by the pseudonym “Calleo,” as a way of saving her marriage by giving her the intellectual stimulation Ron does not give her.

During these many evenings together, Severus learns of Hermione's low level job in the Department of Standards and Regulations testing all Potions ingredients that enter the country. Severus views Hermione's job as his and Draco's salvation to leave the county and, much later on in the story, eventually convinces Hermione to give them ingredients to brew Polyjuice Potion in which they can assume the identities of others and eventually escape to sanctuary. Three key ingredients that are part of the Polyjuice Potion recipe are highly regulated, and this plan using Hermione is viewed as the only way to obtain them without the Ministry of Magic becoming aware of two Death Eaters' intent to escape. Upon Draco leaning about Hermione's job, he informs Severus of his intent to bring Ginny along during their escape.

Home life for Hermione is no less rosy with a strained marriage to Ron, further stressed by Ron's periodic departures for days at a time when they fight. Ron is a second-string Keeper with the Chudley Cannons, which pays very little, and he works nights as a barkeep at The Listing Broom so that between their three jobs they can barely cover the necessities of life. Molly has been harping on Hermione and Ginny to have children. During Hermione's initial confrontation with Ginny, she finally learns about the magical binding properties of children, making divorce an impossibility once children have been born. Hermione feels betrayed, and possibly entrapped, that Molly has left out such an important detail, assured she had been told by her mother-in-law everything entailed in a wizarding marriage before marrying Ron.

Hermione begins seeing Severus once a week for conversation, and upon seeing how thin she is, Severus begins offering to make dinner for her. Between the dinners and intellectual conversation, an attraction instantly grows between the two. Their mutual attraction becomes more intense after Hermione begins taking dancing lessons from Severus after Ron, in an attempt to help repair their crumbling marriage, suggests they go to the Grand Royal Supper Club for their anniversary, which features dancing. For Hermione to learn the basic dances, their clandestine meetings now happen twice a week: Mondays and Thursdays.

Meanwhile, after one drunken rage where an inebriated Harry yells at Ginny, Hermione demands that they begin seeing a marriage counselor. Eventually Hermione, seeing her own marriage falling apart, gives Ron the ultimatum of marriage counseling or divorce, which he agrees to the former when pressured.

Draco begins pestering Severus when he is going to reveal himself to Hermione and ask her for the Polyjuice Potion ingredients, which Severus becomes very short tempered, willing to drag on the pretense of being Calleo in which to bask in Hermione's affections towards him. Draco's nagging is spurred on by the fact that Goyle was found poisoned in an alley and Pansy Parkinson was found gruesomely murdered. Lavender begins to get rather short tempered with Severus herself when Severus begins consulting with Hermione during their evenings together regarding some “Potions theory,” since Hermione is still unaware of Severus’ true identity, despite the hints he has started to give. Hermione has expressed she has wanted to become a Potions mistress, but was denied any opportunities for an apprenticeship. Severus discovers that Calpurnia Fudge, his once a month chess companion through Lavender's side business and dear friend to Dolores Umbridge, has had a direct hand in blocking Hermione's attempts to gain an apprenticeship. He then devises a plan: if he is able to flee England, he will set Hermione up with an apprenticeship with the Potions master, Albert Dobmier, who would replace him.

During Harry's birthday party, Hermione is able to accidentally overhear Moody and Kingsley Shacklebolt, who is Severus and Draco's parole officer, discussing the two Death Eaters and figures out Calleo is Severus Snape. Hermione is shocked, mortified and feels humiliated, unable to come to grips with the fact that she the wizard she has fallen in love with is her old Potions professor, who warned her in less than kind words about the folly of marrying Ron the night before her wedding and made her cry.

Upon their next meeting, while both know the game is up, they continue pretending as Hermione begins to adjust to the fact that she has fallen in love with Severus Snape, while Severus has been battling against his own desires and deepening feelings for Hermione. Eventually they reach a point where after finding themselves in a compromising position yet again, Severus asks Hermione for an answer if she wants to take things further since he had been holding back based upon her stated reasons that her visits to him were to save her marriage. Hermione promises to give him an answer after her anniversary dinner with Ron, convincing herself that if she feels nothing during a perfect romantic dinner out with her husband, she will allow herself to begin an affair with Severus.

During Hermione's anniversary dinner with Ron, despite both parties are going through the motions, there is no spark left. At the Grand Royal Supper Club, Hermione meets Bascom Nettleton, the man who is the owner of the Mercury Broom Company, Ron's new sponsor since Ron had recently become the first-string Keeper for the Cannons. In addition, Ron has been picked to become the 2004 Mercury Broom calendar pin-up beefcake, which has resulted in Ron going through a rigorous training program and taking potions to gain muscle that make him more aggressive, temperamentally and sexually. Besides meeting Bascom, Hermione sees Viktor and the two catch up on the dance floor during a few songs, with Ron no longer expressing any signs of his old jealous streak.

After dinner, dessert and a stroll through the romantic gardens, they both sense the evening is beginning to drag on when there is an emergency Floo call from Ron's old employers at The Listing Broom. The pub owner's wife, Rogina, begs Ron to help clear out a drunken wizard's brawl that has already sent her husband and the barkeep who replaced Ron to St. Mungo's. Knowing the evening was becoming more strained, Hermione tells Ron to go, but not before she asks, spurred on by a Blue Fairy Martini that is making her feel randy, if she should wait up for Ron so they could have sex when he gets back. Given the slew of fights they had recently regarding sex, Ron refuses her which makes Hermione feel quite bitter and rejected. After Ron leaves, a wizard Hermione “innocently” flirted with at The Three Broomsticks some weeks prior, Alan, accosts Hermione and insists on a dance. Viktor comes along and saves the day, escorting Hermione back to her carriage to take her home in Diagon Alley.

After the carriage lets her off, still feeling bitter and rejected, Hermione decides to go over to Severus' flat for a revenge fuck. When Hermione shows up on his doorstep, Severus is enchanted and immediately responds to her charms. The game is up and she calls him by his name, in which he finally casts his mask aside. During some rather passionate snogging, but before it turns into passionate shagging, Hermione tries to tell Severus to stop and that she can't do this. She doesn't want her first time with Severus to be based on revenge, but for the fact she loves him. She tells him, “Not tonight,” which he mistakes as her saying “Not ever.” She runs away in tears, leaving Severus angry, hurt and rejected. He also thinks he royally botched up his chance of asking Hermione for the Polyjuice Potion ingredients. Severus destroys his flat in a drunken rage.

After a sleepless night by both, Severus confronts Hermione and yells at her, thinking she had rejected him now faced with the reality of who he is. Hermione understands she has inadvertently hurt Severus and explains why she wanted to wait, expressing her love for him without right confessing “I love you.” They make love and afterwards, Hermione tells Severus she will get him the ingredients he needs for the Polyjuice Potion. During their long evening of making love, the client in Blaise Zabini's flat, which is directly above Severus', is howling very vocally during sex. As Hermione leaves Severus' flat that night, her and Severus spy Ron descending from the staircase above, shocking Hermione with the revelation that Ron plays both sides of the Quidditch pitch.

Severus brings Draco up to speed on recent revelation regarding Hermione agreeing to help them escape by getting the ingredients, but there is a slight snag, given that fluxweed shipments from North America have been erratic due to a succession of hurricanes wiping out many of the growing grounds crops of the essential ingredient. Meanwhile, Hermione confesses to Ginny that she has been seeing Severus, which Ginny knew about from the beginning, and that she will help her and Draco escape, along with Severus.
Hermione had never felt so relieved as when Ron announced bright and early that he was going to get in an early morning workout. As she lay in bed, Mrs. Weasley strained to listen to the Floo address he called out, and breathed a sigh of relief when it was the club headquarters for the Chudley Cannons.

'Doesn't make a difference. He could arrive, then turn right around and Floo to the Red Ginseng from there.'

Ignoring the pessimist in her head, which was being more sensible than the part of her which was trying to deny that Ron could be off to have another shag with Zabini, or maybe even his personal trainer, Hermione got ready for the day. There was nervous excitement building within her as she shaved her legs and put the extra effort into primping herself for Severus. She used a deep cleansing shampoo and conditioner to try and bring back some of the luster her hair had lost since she had started working at her current job; moisturizer was slathered and massaged into her skin so it would be soft and inviting to touch. Though Hermione was not a vain creature, she did want to make herself as attractive as possible for her lover. Was it a sense of doing something significant for a man who had made her feel so special that she wanted to go through the effort of preening herself? Perhaps it was the fact she knew she had to compete against the beauty of a hundred other witches who had visited his bed before her? Severus had declared her lovely the day she came to him bedraggled and lacking sleep. Still, she wanted to make the effort for him.
Staring at her lingerie drawer, she muttered, “I have got to get something a bit more enticing than this.” A drawer full of safe and boring white, cream, and flesh-colored lingerie was all she had to pick from, save for the red knickers and thigh-high stockings that went with her new red formal dress. Hermione contemplated if she wanted to swing by Madame Maurelle Mandel's during her lunch break that week, to do a little lingerie shopping. On the one hand, Madame Maurelle would only offer her the best that would look good on her; on the other hand, she wasn't sure if she could face another one of Madame Maurelle's astronomical bills so soon, nor Ron's snide comments. She would have to ask Ginny before they departed for the Red Ginseng.

Dressed and ready early, Hermione fidgeted on the couch while waiting for Mrs. Potter. To while away a little time, the anxiously eager witch trotted off to the kitchen to make some tea. As the kettle began to whistle, Ginny stepped through the fireplace and into the living room.

“Hermione?”

“In here,” came the reply. Now that Ginny had arrived, Hermione wanted to forget about making tea. She turned the kettle off and didn't even stop to put the tea away. “We should go before Ron comes back from his workout,” Hermione explained, not bothering to offer a cup to her friend.

Ginny agreed, and they left in haste.

As Hermione exited the fireplace at the Red Ginseng, she noted the room was bare, except for a few nails and wires left on the wall. Dust bunnies lingered about the corners, and pale squares of green where pictures once hung, contrasting with the darker green of the walls, an obvious statement about the grime coating the walls. Hermione wondered who lived here last and how long the place had been vacant.

Shivering in her skin, Ginny whispered with reverent horror in response to Hermione's silent question, “Macnair used to live here. That is, until the Aurors finally hauled him away.”

With enough of her curiosity satisfied, Hermione just wanted to leave. The knowledge alone made the bare desolation of their surroundings more sinister than forlorn and neglected.

A quick check confirmed that the coast was clear and they could ascend the stairs unobserved. Ginny waited by Draco's door, not knocking on his door until Hermione reached the fourth floor.
The echo of Ginny's hand had not faded before Hermione heard Malfoy's door open and shut once more.

Standing in front of Severus’ door, Hermione took one deep cleansing breath. The anticipation thrumming through her body made her quake, and she knew her voice would quiver as well if she spoke. This time she knew she would wind up in Severus' bed, enjoying not only the mental, but physical company of each other. Hermione raised her hand and knocked upon her lover's door, unable to wait any longer to be back in his embrace.

Never had Severus anticipated the arrival of anyone at his door more than while waiting for Hermione that morning. Even waiting for her on Friday was with a certain amount of dread, but this was different. No more lies, masks, or pretense, just the open warmth of his lover, and her acceptance of him just as he was.

He had wanted to do so much more with Hermione on Friday than just lay her out flat on her back and fuck her like an unfettered animal. Well, there were the times she was on her knees, or he was on his back, and then a few other positions he introduced her to that made her gasp in surprise when his cock stroked the inside of her in a way she had never experienced before. The point was that she had complained these many weeks of a lack of foreplay from her husband, and yet Severus did nothing more than take her without much beyond a lot of humping, a bit of friction, and a whole lot of orgasms. In the end, Severus chalked it up to a feverishly blind want that needed to be satisfied, and Hermione certainly exclaimed, during her many religious epiphanies, that she had never felt anything so good in her whole life. Still, Severus wanted to bring Hermione to a slow, unbearable boil of irrational desire. He wanted to make Hermione beg with the same desperation that he did the night he ground himself so urgently against her bottom in the kitchen and on the settee. Severus wanted to see her face twisted in agony, pleading to be filled and released, to only find satisfaction from his vast array of techniques he could test upon her – to see which ones would provide the most vocal and pleading responses.

Severus was pacing the main room, thinking about how he could slowly seduce her, while keeping his own raging hormones in check when he heard her knock at the door. His pride demanded he walk over leisurely, but the biological part of his mind pushed him to rush over and open the door quickly.

All the rehearsed hellos that they both practiced in their minds disappeared. Hermione rushed over the threshold to Severus, locking her arms around his neck while Severus wrapped his arms around her, slamming the door shut in the process. Necks bent and craned, and lips met lips. Though it had only been almost thirty-six hours since they had last seen each other, they kissed each other as if it had been a lifetime parted from one another. Their hunger for each other had become more intense after their joining. Like any addiction, their only solace was to consume more of what they craved.

Hermione grabbed at Severus' body, and he pulled her to him with equal fervor; all his plans for a slow teasing seduction were momentarily abandoned. As they kissed, Severus' hands started pulling at her cloak, while her hands were already pulling at his shirttails. The cloak hastily left on the floor was joined by Severus' shirt moments later. Feeling Hermione's nails scraping along his back brought him back to the present, as he pulled his mouth from hers to let a long suffering sigh escape from his lips. He didn't care how much Hermione knew he needed her, as his arousal pressed firmly against her abdomen was more telling than any vocalizations.

Realizing if he didn't slow himself down, he would only have her clothes half off before burying himself in her, Severus pulled back. Hermione made to reach for him, to close the gap he created, but Severus retreated, giving her his best seductive smile and a slight shake of his head. He had to slow down, but that didn't mean Hermione had to, in his mind; in fact, he wanted to put his witch into such a state that any stimulation, be it tactile, auditory, or visual, would make her body tremble with desire.

Thinking correctly that this was a game, Hermione smiled at him and tried once more to catch Severus within her grasp. Ducking to the side, Severus stepped around her so quickly that before she understood what he had done the wizard was standing behind her, pinning her against his chest, her arms trapped at her sides.

“Not so fast,” he warned her with a playful growl.

With Severus' arms caging her and his hands possessively splayed across her chest and stomach, Hermione could not help but remember her sexual fantasy of her Death Eater-clad gigolo in a dark cloak taking her roughly from behind while chained spread eagle. She whimpered, surrendering herself to the moment by offering up her neck. Severus latched onto her neck, living up to that odd rumor of him being a vampire that circulated around while she was still his student.

Endorphins flushed through her system, turning a slightly painful love bite into something pleasurable. Instinctively arching her back in order to rub her bottom up against him, and enjoying the fact he was losing enough control to grind back against her, she placed one hand atop Severus' and egged him on to palm her breast.

This would not do. The gigolo was losing control of himself once more, and one thing he always was, was in control in the bedroom. It was the only place he could exercise any dominance and direct the outcome, since everything in his life had been dictated by the whims of others. He would not let Hermione direct his actions, despite the delicious feel of her round bottom swiveling sweetly in just the right spot. Holding fast, Severus grasped the encouraging hand by the wrist and brought it up over her head.

Hermione had never felt so vulnerable or more turned on in her life. Severus' grip felt like iron. Not only was he resisting her attempts to be seductive by not jumping on her and taking her immediately – like Ron – thus prolonging the foreplay, but she trusted Severus enough to give up control to him.

Over the years, Hermione had admitted to herself that she was somewhat of a control freak. She had tried to conduct every part of her life so she could obtain the predicted outcome. She had mapped out every step and even prepared for things that might go wrong. Now, however... though she knew they would reach a pleasurable destination together, she had no idea what Severus would do next, or what he would make her do. It was the journey towards a blissful orgasm that held the fascination and allure for her. To what depths would Severus make her abandon her normally logical self to become a creature of pure physical sensation, totally lost within the moment without a thought beyond her impending climax, she could scarcely imagine, though she was desperate to experience it once again.

“Frog march” would not have been the proper term for what Severus did to Hermione to propel her towards the bed, as she went willingly, but there was a small bit of playful resistance on her part.

Once at the edge of the bed, Severus let go and stepped back. Though his gaze smoldered enough to singe parchment, it made an icy chill of anticipation race up her spine. Leaving Hermione at the edge of the bed, he backed up further until he could sit on the settee. Flopping onto said piece of furniture with feline grace, Severus waved his hand casually to indicate he was indeed the one in control and coolly ordered her, “Undress. Slowly.”

One of the things on Severus’ agenda was to help Hermione get over this complete lack of confidence where her sexuality and body was concerned. This exercise was supposed to not only help this timid creature before him bloom into a confident temptress capable of paralyzing even him with her sensuality, but fulfill one of his many fantasies about her. Even with her lack of self-confidence, Hermione could still make him temporarily lose rational thought and revert to his baser nature.

Out of habit, Hermione set her wand on the bedside table and turned her back to Severus, as she would undressing in front of her husband.

“No, turn around and undress for me,” he commanded in a soft, but firm tone.

Through unsure lowered lashes, Hermione looked at him. Her uncertainty was threatening to overwhelm her, obviously never having explored any part of her voyeuristic and exhibitionist nature.

To rein in some calm on the situation, Severus elaborated, “How have you imagined yourself undressing for me when you're alone? How have you fantasized about teasing me with a glimpse of your body?"

The poor witch had been exposed to plain vanilla sex, and Severus knew he was pushing the boundaries of what she had ever experienced, but he thrilled in the idea of making her taste what seemed like forbidden fruits, gorging her on them until she became addicted to them and him. She needed to relearn what foreplay was all about. It wasn't just the lubrication of the body, but the honing of one's mind to a certain level of excitement and anticipation.

The blush that crept upon her cheek and her inability to meet his eye was countermanded by Hermione's slow and deliberate unbuttoning of her blouse.

Though not prone to chit-chat in the bedroom, he knew she needed reassurance of her progress from him. “Yes, just like that. Imagine it's my hands undoing your blouse. How would you like my hands to undress you?” To give her additional encouragement, Severus shifted in his seat and readjusted himself, watching her with unblinking eyes.

His mouth watering, he swallowed unconsciously as Hermione slowly pulled her blouse off one shoulder. Her fingers lightly caressed her arms as the fabric slipped past her elbow before she attended the other shoulder. Hermione's eyes would occasionally dart to his, checking to make sure she was doing it right. Each time she would look away quickly, unable to believe Severus was looking at her with unadulterated hunger. Adding to the growing list of things that differentiated Severus from Ron in the bedroom, Hermione realized that when Ron looked at her lustfully, she felt cheap and uncertain; when Severus looked at her in the way he was doing right then, she felt aroused and attractive. Emboldened, she turned her back to Severus so that he could watch the fabric slip from her shoulders, exposing the expanse of skin to enjoy. She remembered how Severus commented that he liked the view of her back before.

Glancing over her shoulder, Hermione was somewhat shocked to see Severus lightly stroking his erection through his trousers. Ron had always treated masturbation as a private matter, and she had done so as well, conducting hers in solitude, too. It was strange to see a man touching himself so freely in front of her.

Severus growled appreciatively, “Lovely, simply lovely.”

Keeping her back to Severus, she unzipped her zipper slowly. When she started to bend over, giving Severus a perfect view of her arse, she suddenly realized she still had her tights on. Hermione thought the sight of her in nothing but heels, plain white cotton knickers and tights on would look rather silly and so she began to try and rectify the situation by pulling her tights down before her skirt, but Severus stopped her.
“No. No, leave them on for now. Take your skirt off, and then you may remove tights,” he directed her in a distracted manner, his eyes firmly glued to the sight of the half-undressed witch before him.

Letting go of the waistband of her skirt, she allowed it to fall from her hips to puddle on the floor. Hermione stepped out of it and bent over to pick it up. The hum of appreciation from Severus made her prolong the act of standing back upright. She carried out the removal of her tights with deliberate torpidity. While bent over, Hermione glanced back and viewed from a sideways angle Severus slightly slack-jawed in awe. When he caught her watching him, the mouth snapped shut and he gave a reassuring smile to continue in order to go back to his unobserved inspection of her backside.

Severus watched as Hermione silently crawled up onto his bed and lay back with her knickers still on. He considered asking her to remove them, but said nothing, knowing that the hint of clothing could be more erotic than being completely nude. To continue his observations, Severus walked over to the edge of the bed and stood there with no intention of sitting down.

Hermione gazed up at him expectantly.

A faint smile curled at the corner of Severus' lips. “I want to know how you pleasure yourself. I want to know how you arouse yourself.”

Hermione simultaneously frowned and blushed. “I...” She just wanted Severus to undress and make her feel wonderful again. She had been touching and fingering herself for years as it was, but now she wanted to feel Severus' fingers and not her own.

His hand reached out and stroked her cheek, brushing hair away from her face in the process. “How can I learn if you don't show me?”

“I could tell you,” Hermione blurted out, desperate to feel the intensity of Severus consuming her whole once more instead of lying on his bed mostly naked and being directed to play with herself. Though Severus gave her no reason to think he found any fault with it, she still felt very self-conscious about her body because of the many deprecating comments she had received from Ron over the years.

His fingers swept once more, gently brushing them over her eyes. “Close your eyes,” he instructed her in soft reassuring tones, trying to coax her. “Let my voice guide you. You're lying in bed, you're all alone in bed at home.” Hermione momentarily frowned harshly, but quickly shoved aside the many reasons why she would find herself alone at home while Ron was gone. “No one will disturb you.”

“Can we dim it a bit in here?” Hermione requested as she sat up. “I'm used to it being a bit darker.”

Complying with her request, Severus waved his wand, and the drapes drew themselves closed. “Better?”

She smiled back and nodded shyly.

Severus knew he could have just gotten undressed and had her, and she would have probably been perfectly happy with that, but he wanted to give her much more than a good shag. He wanted to bring out the hidden sexual goddess held within that ill-at-ease shell Hermione wore as battered armor. “Continue.”

Hermione sighed with resignation and lay back down.

This was not going exactly as planned for Severus. She was resisting the moment, and looked as if she was going to revolt at any second. Changing tactics, he said, “Imagine you have me tied down. I'm unable to touch you, I can only watch. You want to tease me, torture me, tantalize me by touching yourself, making me wish it was my hands upon you.” It worked, as he saw Hermione smile and willingly close her eyes.

Keeping her eyes closed, Hermione stroked her face with her finger tips a few times, bringing her hands down to trail a single finger down from her pulse point to the hollow of her throat.

Severus studied the way she touched herself, alternating broad sweeps with the pads of her fingers to a single one, then back to multiple points of contact, each varying in speed and pressure. There was one long, slow deep inhalation of breath when her fingers reached her breasts, but instead of touching the areolas and nipples, she teased herself, dragging fingers along the sides and underside of her breasts. As he watched, Severus silently slipped out of his trousers. Hermione was so lost in her own world, she barely noticed the slight shift on the mattress as he lay down next to her, without touching her, to continue watching.

Severus’ cock was rigid from observing Hermione's almost innocuous touching of herself and the small hums of pleasure coming from the back of her throat. It was different from how many other women he observed pleasured themselves, usually going straight for their own breasts or vagina, but Hermione was taking her time. By the time Hermione lightly touched her own breasts, her nipples were peaked and aching for any stimulation. As Hermione ran the pad of her finger across the hardened nipples, Severus unconsciously licked his lips. He wanted nothing more than to lean over and take one of her plump nipples in her mouth and suckle on it like a greedy piglet, but he could wait a little while longer.

Plucking at one nipple, Hermione sighed as her back arched.

The responsiveness of Hermione’s body to her own touching tested Severus' will power to remain quiet and still.

To his relief, Hermione moved her hands down her torso towards her stomach, where she played with her navel and paid particular attention to the area around her hipbones and along the thigh joint.

She played with her curls, gently pulling at the hair before finally slipping a finger down between her lips.

Severus sat up and swung around on the bed to watch from a better angle. He was pleased when Hermione spread her legs slightly; however, the wizard wasn't sure if she did this for better access or for his viewing benefit. Either way, Hermione's shyness seemed to have departed a while ago, confirmed when her toe blindly reached out and stroked Severus' chest and arm.

Though originally reluctant, Hermione became increasingly turned on by the idea of touching herself in front of Severus. There was a forbidden aspect to it that enticed her. And though there is nothing morally wrong with the act itself, it was something she had never pictured herself doing in front of a man. The more she touched herself, hearing small hums of appreciation from Severus, the more she was spurred on to continue. She still couldn't bear to see him watching her, so she kept her eyes closed, but the idea that he was watching her inspired her. Finally relaxed, her fingers ventured lower, and she sensed him moving to get a better look. Knowing Severus was now gazing at her most intimate regions was initially unnerving, but she rationalized that if he could stick his cock in there, then what was the harm in him looking there as well?

As her fingers moved languidly, stroking her outer lips, then sliding between them, Severus simply murmured, “Beautiful.”

Hermione was relieved to hear this from Severus. She had no basis of comparison to compare those particular parts of her body to other women, so it was reassuring that he didn't make any odd comments, unlike what Ron had said to her in those too candidly insensitive moments of his.

Heartened, Hermione spread her legs a little wider and began stroking herself, using tried and true techniques to make her reach orgasm quickly. It didn't take her long, as just the physical presence of Severus was enough to enhance the mood more than anything she could have done by herself alone at home. Her breaths became strained and short as her hips began to rock slightly, keeping very quiet while her fingers worked quickly over her clit, while she worked a couple fingers in and out of herself. She could orgasm without his assistance, but Hermione wanted to feel her G-spot stimulated as she came. More so, she would have felt more comfortable with Severus participating with her instead of just watching her.

“Please, Severus. Please help me. Just stroke that spot inside of me. Help me,” she pleaded with a whinge.

Sensing she was close, he obliged. He had learned enough for the time being that he was now eager to watch her climax. Licking two fingers to wet them, he slowly pressed his fingers alongside Hermione's.

She removed her own fingers and put to use her now free hand on her nipples. As Severus eased his fingers into her, Hermione let out a strangled gasp. Her back arched and arms reaching above in surrender, her hands grasping at the sheets. As her hips began to gyrate and rock in order to match each movement of Severus' hand, she completely abandoned all intentions of masturbating anymore. Feeling her lover's fingers inside of her only fed the fire, demanding that she join with him as soon as possible.

“Severus, I need you,” she sighed. Hermione held out her arms to encourage Severus to crawl up between her legs and slide into her.

Severus didn't want to rush this. Oh, he understood about desire and hunger and the base need to copulate, but they had all day, and he wanted to bring Hermione up to a slow and unbearable boil before finally sinking himself into her at the moment when she would be beyond all reason, basically irrational and senseless with wanton need. At the moment, Hermione had not even had her first orgasm yet. Considering that most of her sexual experience was with a wizard who was done before she had yet even begun, Severus understood her trained reaction to shag before the moment was over.

“Shhhh,” he soothed, keeping the movements of his hand steady and slow, stroking her sacred spot with each pass. It pleased him to note how her eyes would look heavier the longer he stimulated her G-spot. “We have all day. There is no rush. Relax, enjoy the moment.”
This seemed to put Hermione in a different frame of mind altogether. No longer were the small noises from the back of her throat rising in pitch, like some urgent need to be sated. She sighed and relaxed, still moving her hips in response to her lover's touch.

Stretching his arm out, Severus’ other free hand began to touch Hermione in the same manner that she touched herself, mimicking the movement. Instead of small hums of pleasure, Hermione gasped and groaned loudly, arching her back once more into his touch. When the pads of his fingers stroked the skin over her hip bones, the reaction he elicited from her was akin to some women's orgasmic bliss, complete with crying out. Unable to resist, Severus dipped his head and began to kiss his way down Hermione's stomach until his mouth reached the spot he wanted to devour. Before his tongue even darted out for that first tentative, teasing taste, her legs were shaking with intoxicating anticipation and her breaths were short rasping grunts.

Elation would be a word that could describe Hermione's reaction to Severus' deft tongue work between her legs, as much as “nice brush work and use of light” could be used to describe a Rembrandt painting. She could honestly say in retrospect that she never felt anything quite as exquisite as what Severus did to her, making her body feel things she had only imagined or heard about in excerpts of trashy romance novels that Ginny used to quote to her years ago.

By the time Hermione climaxed, she was beginning to realize that she had missed out on a lot of good foreplay over the years if it could be this great. Feeling temporarily sated, Hermione sighed, feeling pleasantly exhausted for the moment, but soon discovered she would get no respite.

Having brought his lover to a rousing orgasm the likes of which should have prompted Draco to knock on his ceiling a few times – if it were not for the fact that Hermione remembered halfway through to put up a Silencing Charm so the rest of the building would not hear their activities – Severus was ready. He had brought Hermione a great deal of joy, and a sore throat from all her screaming, but watching the twisting grimace of her face as she came made him want to join her more than anything else.

As he slid up between her legs to position himself, Hermione's eyes lit up with understanding that he had yet to take care of his own needs yet. Suddenly realizing that all the pleasure she had experienced was entirely for her alone, made her welcome him into her with eagerness.

The feeling of Severus sliding into Hermione was nearly overwhelming for both parties. Hermione was still relatively tight, and all the blood engorging her lower region made everything even snugger. Once again for Hermione, it was finally being filled and feeling complete with something long, hard, and thick inside of her.

Knowing Hermione’s needs had been more than taken care of, he took everything he could from her in the act, culminating in savagely thrusting into her. He was encouraged by her cries of exaltation, some of them muffled as they kissed fiercely. Though normally quiet during the act, Severus found himself to be more vocal than usual and groaned and screamed as he approached climax, which only seemed to excite Hermione even more. As he came, he could not open his eyes, as they were shut tight from the total paralysis his body experienced as he emptied himself into Hermione.

Hermione watched with awe as her lover lost himself in the act of making love to her, and though she nearly came once again, she didn't mind for once. Severus had assured her they had all day, and she still felt blissful from her previous orgasm.

As Severus nearly collapsed on top of Hermione, exhausted but satisfied, he noted the completely elated smile on his lover's face.

Hermione immediately snuggled up next to a panting Severus, feeling the light spangle of sweat across his chest as she threw a possessive arm across him. She blew lightly across his brow to help him cool down.

Severus closed his eyes and enjoyed her tender ministrations, the sort that two lovers might share. He certainly did not engage in this sort of intimacy with his paying clients, even when they asked for a bit of post-coital cuddling. Any cuddling done with other witches, he did so grudgingly. But Hermione was different in many ways. For one, he didn't wear his mask during the act, something he found liberating; the other was the fact that for once, he had some emotional attachment to the woman he was shagging. Though he might claim sex is sex, there was an undefinable aspect of caring for Hermione that took the simple transitory act of fucking and transcended it into something more visceral and substantive.

“Would it be cliché if I said that was amazing?” Hermione asked with a weak laugh. She brushed a damp tendril of hair out of his eyes.

Opening his eyes, Severus smiled. “Yes, it would, but I'll allow it just this once.”

Hermione gave a playful laugh with a nudge to his ribs before settling back down and snuggling up next to him once more.

Severus didn't want to ask, but he knew he should. “Did you take both the vials I gave you the other night?”
Lightly humming to herself, she then replied, “No. All I needed was one, and I slept through the night.”

He tried to keep his voice light with none of the gravity of the subject he was going to bring up. “You should have taken both. One was a sleeping potion, the other was for your protection.”

“You don't have to worry about me. I'm already on contraceptive potions.”

“It's not just contraception the potion provides, but protection,” he added.

“Protection from...” There was a pause in her question.

Severus hoped she would put the pieces together without having to spell them out.

She did not finish her question.

“The second potion I gave you protects you from not only pregnancy, but all maladies of a carnal nature.”

Hermione stiffened and sat up. Her stomach began to twist into knots upon the realization that she could have contracted something from Severus. “You mean venereal disease,” she clarified in a tone bordering on accusatory.

“Yes,” Severus bit back sharply. “But I would not have given you any disease, as I take the potion as well, as required by Ministry standards.”

“Ministry standards?” she practically shrieked.

“Yes.” He knew if he did not clarify a few things, it was going to be a long morning, but even given the situation, Severus knew this was going to be an unpleasant conversation, particularly for Hermione. “Back in the late seventeenth century, there was a problem with many wizards contracting venereal diseases, mostly through Knockturn Flies.”
“Knockturn Flies?” she interrupted.

“A period term used for damsels who used to frequent Knockturn Alley to sell their favors at the time. Damsel is also the name of an insect... damsel flies... I think you can see the origin of the term now.” Severus sat up and rolled over and reached into his bedside table and pulled out another vial of the one he had hoped Hermione took the other night.

“Wizards were coming home and infecting their wives,” he explained. “Since many Ministry officials also did not want to explain to their wives why they had to take certain potions or have the fabric of society disintegrate upon news their husband gave them the clap, or suddenly have bastard sons showing up on their doorstep years later, they made it requisite for all persons of a certain profession and clients to take an elixir. It avoids complications of pathological and societal nature.”

Lifting up the vial for her inspection, he concluded by saying: “I take this, as does Draco, even Ginny. Considering the fact you do not know with whom your husband has been with other than Zabini, I recommend you take this for your protection at home as well.” Severus knew he had to bring up that factor as well, concerning Ron Weasley's other possible sexual partners, but his clarification and illumination of that fact pushed Hermione into tears.

She didn't want to admit it, but the thought of Ron bringing home something to their bed, and infecting her, had crossed her mind more than once on Saturday. Hermione took the vial from Severus' hand and swallowed it quickly. “Will this interfere with the potions I'm on now?”

“No, they are designed to not counter any contraceptive potions you are currently taking.”

It was bad enough to realize her lover had to take this for his job, but that aspect of his “profession” had to leak into her secluded sanctuary, soiling what would otherwise seem like an ideal and perfect extramarital affair. Lying back down, Hermione felt drained. Without trying to stop herself, she began to cry. She didn't try to hide it, but she tried to do it quietly as she lay next to Severus. Hermione knew he could tell, as her tears were rolling off her cheek and nose onto his chest and shoulder.

He said nothing. Stroking her hair and back was the only sign that he acknowledged her suffering, though he would have done that even if she wasn't crying.

After a while, Hermione rose and went to the bathroom to take care of her needs and wash up her face. A little Lovely Lavender's Puffy Poof Eye Crème and she felt presentable.
Shuffling back to the bed in Severus' black silk dressing gown, she found the raven-haired wizard sitting up in bed with a predatory smile. Hermione heard him cast some Charm spoken in Arabic and she instantly felt freshened up. Before she could ask what Charm he cast, he pulled her into his bed and announced with a growl that it was time to begin more research into the Male Enhancement Potion, knowing a bit of “research” always cheered her up.

~~~~~~~*~

Thoughts about her husband, or of Severus' official profession, stayed at bay mostly during the next few hours. She was too busy enjoying what could simply be called the best one-day jaunt she ever had. Granted, she never left Diagon Alley, but it certainly was more enjoyable than any trip out to some castle ruins or a hike.

Lunch time rolled around and Hermione was dismayed when Severus demanded his silk dressing gown and had nothing for her to wear. She stole his linen shirt instead, happy to have something covering her that smelled of him. Walking into the kitchen, her nostrils were assaulted by the scent of fresh garlic and crushed rosemary; it was strong, but a pleasantly savory scent.

“Since you offered to help me in the kitchen, I thought I would take you up on your offer,” Severus announced.

“Great!” she answered brightly with eagerness. “What do you want me to do?”

Severus handed her a bowl full of apples and a peeling knife. “I thought we'd start with something that is also an exercise commonly done by Potions apprentices. Peel one apple, and try to take off the skin only, leaving as much flesh of the apple as you can.”

“This is an exercise?” she asked with uncertainty.

If Hermione truly was his apprentice years ago, he would have snapped at her for questioning him. However, he knew her question was merely to seek an understanding behind the exercise.

“Some ingredients are very rare and costly. Peeling apples is a good way to hone your skills of using a knife while wasting as little as possible in the preparation process.” He could see the comprehension in her eyes. “Peel one, and then I will see how you've done after I've put the lamb into the oven.”

Wanting to make a good impression, Hermione peeled very carefully. Though she was fairly skilled with a knife after working at her job for years, she tried to be extra careful when peeling the fruit. By the time the lamb was set in the oven and Severus had cleaned his hands, she was done.

Sitting up with a straight back and a proud gleam in her eyes, she presented Severus with the peeled apple.

“Show me the peelings.”

She scooped them up and handed them over to the Potions master. There was no smile, but there was no frown either. “Not bad for someone who hasn't begun their apprenticeship.”

“Not bad? I barely took any skin off!” she protested.

Severus took the knife from her, and scraped the edge of the blade along the back of the peel, showing Hermione just how much of the fruit she had taken off. Presenting her the juicy pulp stuck to the blade, he said softly, but firmly, “That, my dear, on a rare Miniature Man-Eating Masdevallia orchid seed pod is about ten Galleons, given the price runs at about forty Galleons for each pod.”

“Well, if it's that expensive and precious, I'd be more careful,” Hermione insisted defensively. “And the price is now fifty Galleons a pod,” she corrected him.

“The point is that apples are a cheap means of practicing your skills so you don't waste anything when it comes time to prepare rarer, costly ingredients.”

“Show me.”

Severus felt a bit self-conscious. Though cooking had helped keep his skills somewhat up to par, they were not nearly to the level they were when he was still a teacher at Hogwarts wielding a knife every day for lengthy periods. Picking up the apple, he studied it for a moment before putting blade to fruit. In one quarter the time it took Hermione to peel her apple, Severus had peeled his. He looked at it and shook his head.

'I have gotten rusty.'
Hermione studied one peeling and could find no fault with his technique. By the grim set in his mouth, she could tell he wasn't pleased with his own attempt.

With a grumble, Severus mumbled, “I could do better.”

“Better? There's nothing but peel.”

Severus took the blade of the knife and scraped a thin film of creamy pulp away from the skin to show her his own shortcoming. Before Hermione could comment, the Potions master took another apple and began to carefully peel it slowly. He presented Hermione with a peel that was translucent with virtually no flesh left on it. Holding it up to the light, she could see the light from the window through it and could make out faint shapes.

“That is the level of skill you must attain during your apprenticeship.” Severus fetched another knife and presented it to Hermione. “I'm baking a French apple tartin for dessert. You can begin practicing and I can get a little practice in as well.”

As they peeled apples, Severus was reminded of his own apprenticeship, where Potions master Chuff used to make a game out of it. Though Reginald Chuff was a bastard at times, he knew how to make even the most mundane tasks seem a bit fun. Usually shots of Ogden's Single Malt Firewhisky were involved.

This time, he decided to make a different game. So far, he had performed cunnilingus on Hermione no less than three times, but he had yet to ask for her to reciprocate.

Severus knew of Hermione's attitude toward fellatio when reciprocation was given poorly and grudgingly. However, he had performed with zeal and produced the most pleasant results for both parties. Now it was time to engage Hermione's interest in the act.

Reaching for another apple, Severus paused and said casually, as if suddenly struck by inspiration, “I have an idea for another wager.” He did not restrain the amused lilt in his voice.

Knowing that tone very well by now, Hermione willingly took the bait and said, “And just what do you have in mind this time?”

His eyes drifted to the half-full bowl of unpeeled apples. “We'll each take an apple, similar in size.
I'll even take the larger one if you think your skill is not good enough. We'll each peel our apple. If your peeling weighs no more than twice mine, I will do anything you ask of me in bed.” Severus knew he'd win, as he had seen how much flesh Hermione left on her peeling.

“And if they weigh more than twice yours?” Hermione asked, trying to be demure, but failing miserably as a knowing smirk crept upon her lip, and her face flushed brightly.

As his hand reached out to trace her lips with his thumb, his voice dropped to a husky whisper in earnest anticipation of her answer. “Then I would like to have your lips wrapped around parts of me that have yet to be caressed by them.”

Hermione could feel the heat rushing to her face. When phrased that way, and with that voice, she was more eager than ever to give Severus a blow job. Of course she had wanted to return the favor he had done to her earlier, but she felt very uncomfortable broaching the subject. It's not that she was a prude; she was just uncomfortable with bringing up her desire to try. Though there was nothing wrong with a witch wanting to give head, she couldn't bring herself to appear enthusiastic.

“I could agree to those terms,” she said quietly, her head ducked down, feeling the urge to tuck in her shoulders and cross her legs at the ankle like a timid maid.

Severus could see her coyness was not some act.

Each took care to peel carefully. Though his attention was on his own apple, he could see Hermione glancing at his trying to observe his technique. Since Severus was not allowed a set of scales, even for cooking, or Charms that replicated them, Hermione cast her own Weighing Charm. It was deemed that Hermione's peeling weighed exactly twice Severus', since the Charm was only accurate to the nearest quarter of a gram. Technically, Hermione won. They both knew that if a proper set of scales could have been utilized that Severus could have possibly won.

As Severus made the crust, Hermione sliced the peeled apples. Assisting Severus in the kitchen made Hermione a bit melancholy, knowing this is what she would prefer in a marriage than what she had with Ron. They worked together, Severus requesting ingredients and Hermione Summoning them for him, then she would return them to their place in the cupboards as he requested the next. It was all very mundane, but even the simple things in life could hold great meaning for her. Once the tartin was in the oven, Marf was instructed when to pull it out to cool on the counter, as they both knew they would be too busy fulfilling the wager to bother later.

Once lunch was over, they wandered back to the other room. Standing next to the bed, Severus awaited Hermione's direction. He preferred to not be in a situation reminding him of his obligation to fuck other women by fulfilling their requests, but – he reminded himself – Severus wanted to please Hermione. This was for her, and not done for an exchange of coin or to perpetuate his cover.

He prompted her to make her request. “Tell me what you want?”

“Please sit on the bed.” Hermione had no idea how to ask for guidance without sounding vulgar, but she tried anyway. Kneeling next to the bed, she insinuated herself between his knees. While she stroked her hands over the tops of his thighs, she tried to meet his eyes but couldn't. Instead, her eyes fixated on her lover's semi-flaccid member laying there between his legs. “I want... I want...” She couldn't bring herself to flat out ask.

“Tell me.” Severus placed a finger under her chin and lifted her face up.

“I want you to tell me how you want my lips to caress other parts of your body.” There. I said it, and it didn't sound too vulgar.’

The raven-haired wizard cupped her cheek and gave her his most gentle and reassuring smile – an act he did not do very often. “Touch me with your hands.”

By beginning with simple touch, Severus could eventually work Hermione up to fellatio itself. Her hand was small compared to his own, and it felt so wonderful wrapped around his stiffening length. With awe, the witch commented how much it amazed her about the difference in size between soft and hard. All comments from her abated, and Severus barely noticed once her mouth found its way to the tip of his cock. Tentative licks only seemed to increase the anticipation of her mouth engulfing him entirely.

When Hermione was a student, her over-eagerness was somewhat nettlesome to Severus in the classroom, but in the case of this lesson, it was quite welcomed. She was observant to notice changes in his breathing, and was willing to experiment with techniques with the slightest prompting, and sometimes with no prompting at all. It was an exercise in experimentation, testing to see which swirl of the tongue elicited the greatest response, and if alternating with slow then fast then slow was better than a nice steady rhythm.

Lost in the moment, Severus barely remembered to warn her he was about to orgasm. Either he didn't enunciate it very well, she didn't hear him, or she didn't mind; Severus came with her lips still firmly wrapped around him. There was a moment when she choked as she tried to swallow, and then finally pulled away. By the time Severus opened his eyes, Hermione was already Summoning a tissue for her face and hair.
“Allow me.” Taking his wand, he waved it over Hermione’s head and said, “Kala ma’hab’bi irruh.”

That same refreshing feeling returned to Hermione as the anointed parts of her were suddenly clean. “What spell was that?” she asked with great curiosity.

“An old Arabic spell,” he told her, as it was nothing, and not caring to elaborate.

“Really? Where did you learn it?” Hermione practically flopped on her belly and propped her chin in her hands in eagerness to find out more. Sexual charms in the British wizarding world seemed as taboo a subject as flashing knickers and piano legs during the Victorian period.

Severus could see he could not really get out of answering her question, so decided he might as well tell her. She might even appreciate the result of her question, thus satisfying intellectual and sexual needs.

“The book landed on the bed with a soft thud. It was bound in carmine leather with ornate gold Arabic calligraphy engraved into the cover. Passing a hand reverently over the cover, Severus knew Hermione would ask how he obtained such a rare copy, in the original Arabic, so he volunteered to tell her.

“I used to take commissions during the summer to pad my vault. The usual method of payment was half upfront, and the other half upon delivery of the potion. One particular client had some financial difficulty that nearly bankrupted him while I was brewing the potion, so as payment he allowed me to take any book from his extensive library as the other half of the payment.”

“Who was it?” she inquired, wondering who had such a book collection.

“That is a matter that I can never discuss. But I can tell you that it was one of the more impressive private collections I had seen. Though most of the books he had were either available at Hogwarts in the Restricted Section, or in the private collections of many of the professors there – which we regularly shared amongst ourselves – I came across this and knew I’d never see another book like it again.” Severus would not have been surprised if Albus had a book like this in his own extensive collection, but the old Headmaster was never in a habit of sharing books with “morally questionable content.” Dumbledore may have been wise and a bit odd, but he still projected the proper facade of a gentleman wizard, a product of being born and raised during the Victorian era.

“Was it Lucius Malfoy?” Hermione had to ask, though she knew she might risk irritating her lover.

“No. And if you had guessed correctly, I still would have said no. End of discussion,” he told her firmly with a tone that he would not brook any more questions on the matter.

Knowing when she had pushed him to the limit, Hermione went back to the topic of the book. “So what is the title again? What does it translate into? And I didn’t know you knew Arabic as well.”

“Saha al kw’wai’yis nasa’mi: gemel sha’h’wa’ni sa’hir. Loosely translated: 'Awakening of the Perfumed Soul: The Sensual Sorcerer.' And yes, I forgot to include Arabic in my list of languages that I know. But as I was saying, from what I could tell from research, with a little help from Madam Pince, this was written before the Muggle version, 'The Perfumed Garden for the Soul's Recreation.' One bibliophile I owled with informed me that there is speculation amongst several wizard Arabic scholars about the author of both The Sensual Sorcerer and The Perfumed Garden.”

Hermione settled herself on the bed ready to listen, and raised and crossed her ankles. When Severus went off on one of his informative tangents, they usually proved to be most informative and illuminating.

“Some think that the author of 'The Sensual Sorcerer' was a wizard in the court of Sheikh Nefzaoui, the author of 'The Perfumed Garden'. It is rumored that Sheikh Nefzaoui knew of the wizard's magical capabilities. Though there are some authors of the time period who might be attributed to writing the book, any correlation between wizarding documents and Muggle ones to confirm wizards who were in the Sheikh's court were destroyed when the Hafsid dynasty collapsed, and the Ottomans took over. Changes in power do not always go smoothly, and fires have a habit of erasing history,” Severus noted with some lament. He was not about to go into his own self-pitying maudlin funk about how the death of Albus brought about equally disastrous changes, and quickly continued on with his historical literary oration. “But analysis of writing style points to Ibrahim Zakariya, the Elder. He wrote several informative and anecdotal books on Transfiguration that are still used as reference in the Arabic world.”

Opening the book, Severus opened it to a page featuring a moving illustration of a mostly nude male sitting between the thighs of his lover. A trail of scented flowers streamed from the man's mouth and caressed the prone female form that writhed and smiled.
Hermione moved back over next to Severus to view the book better. She could smell the scent of damask roses, orange blossoms, and mint wafting up from the pages each time the man in the illustration blew across his lover's skin.

“This is the lover's perfumed kiss,” Severus said, reading the text under the illustration. He leaned sideways and brought his mouth to that spot behind her ear that made her whimper to his delight.

Distracted by his warm breath, Hermione missed the incantation spoken in Arabic. The flutter of flower petals brushing that sublimated upon contact with her skin was like no other sensation she had experienced, like a hundred butterflies brushing her with their wings. She reveled in the cloying scent enveloping her: jasmine, roses, and violets. When she opened her eyes, she was on her back looking up at Severus, who gazed intently at her.

Enthralled, she whispered, “Teach me more,” as she gazed up at him.

To say that time flew would state the obvious. With each new spell Severus taught her, Hermione tried it as well, each taking turns at sensual Charms the book described and illustrated. The young witch was reluctant to admit it, but the illustrations added to the sense of eroticism, as if she were a voyeur spying two lovers in the moment, then wishing to repeat the same act with her own lover.

As Severus was helping her with the Arabic pronunciation of a spell that was supposed to help increase the blood flow to a woman's pelvic region, Marf appeared by the side of the bed with a pillowcase over his head for the sake of Hermione's modesty.

“I is so sorry, Master, but you is having company over at four o'clock. Marf knows you and Missus wish to make yourselves presentable. I is so sorry to disturb, Marf will go and punish—“

“No!” Hermione interrupted with a start. “No, thank you, Marf. You don't need to punish yourself.” Though the small creature had something covering his eyes, Hermione still felt obligated to clutch the bedclothes to her person. She ignored the small growl in the back of Severus' throat indicating a little punishment may not have been out of line for disturbing their playtime. “That was kind of you to remind us that we need to get ready.”

There was the temptation for Hermione to nudge him not so gently in the ribs about his attitude towards the house-elf, but she guessed it would only dissolve into a heated argument about house-elf rights, or more sexual play which would leave them still naked and covered in dried sweat and bodily fluids by the time Malfoy and Ginny arrived.
To his dismay, Severus did note the time. Marf had given them just enough time to freshen up, but if dinner was going to last a couple hours, as it usually did, especially when Ginny joined them, then there would be little time left afterwards for him and Hermione to be alone before she needed to leave. He prayed his Sunday night client would owl him at the last minute and cancel.

Both had hoped their shower together could have been more leisurely, fulfilling all those fantasies they had had about each other over the weeks involving soap, water spray, and feet firmly planted against a cold tile wall with a back braced on the opposite wall and lots of friction, but alas, it would have to wait for another time.

Hermione had barely finished placing the drying charm on her hair and slipping her shoes on, and Severus just tucked his shirt into his trousers, when Draco gave his signature knock.

Surreal was an understatement as to how Hermione felt at that moment as Malfoy and Ginny strolled into Severus' flat, arm-in-arm like a young married couple, while their host greeted the pair. It was a snapshot of some alternative universe she could have lived in. Hermione could have never married Ron and eventually dated then married Severus, while Ginny and Draco were never parted and eventually married. It was even stranger to watch Ginny approach Severus, stand on her tip-toes and place a chaste welcoming kiss on his cheek, and Severus return the gesture with a fleeting kiss upon her cheek.

“Severus, it's so good to see you,” Ginny nearly exclaimed with a gleam in her eye and a rosy glow about her person.

“And you, Ginny. Draco,” the older wizard greeted the younger.

Draco was too busy staring at Hermione, and she stood there unable to move, pinned by his gaze. Ginny and Severus exchanged glances, Mrs. Potter the more nervous of the two, as they thought of what might erupt between old enemies.

Hermione had the good grace to give a perfunctory tight-lipped smile. This was Severus' flat and Draco was his friend; she would not do anything to embarrass or cause a scene, but if provoked, she would defend herself. “Malfoy,” the brunette witch said carefully, trying not to sound too frosty or saccharine.

Draco slid his hands into his trouser pockets and returned her smile with a cavalier smirk of his own. “Mrs. Weasley,” he drawled insolently.
Hermione could feel her back going up in response to his attitude. The prat purposefully stressed her married title, and said her last name in the same way that used to drive Ron up a wall.

Noticing the tension in the room went up an order of magnitude, Ginny suddenly piped up, “Severus! What's for dinner? It smells absolutely delicious.” Her overly bright tone was not missed by anyone.

Severus suspected that at some point Hermione and Draco would cross paths, but it seemed they could not put their differences aside any easier than he could with Sirius Black. He knew better than most how old grudges could not be put aside so easily.

Dinner was a pleasant, but slightly strained affair. Conversation flowed easily enough, but it seemed neither Hermione nor Draco addressed each other directly. Draco had the good grace to keep all sotto voce comments to himself, though Ginny knew him well enough to hear them in her own head. Hermione was only slightly worse as she ignored some of Draco's comments to Ginny or Severus, interjecting remarks that steamrolled over him, disregarding his input in the conversation. To be so easily dismissed irked him as easily as his arrogance vexed Hermione.

“What a simply marvelous dinner, Severus,” Ginny complimented her host. “As always.”

Severus bowed his head slightly in acceptance of her compliment.

Hermione was finally becoming used to the easy way in which Severus interacted with Ginny, though he did have a somewhat polite formality about him as he conversed with her.

“Ginny, would you be so kind as to come to the kitchen with me and help me pick out a wine to go with dessert?” the older wizard asked. There really was no need for Ginny to help Severus, as he had already picked out a lovely Sauterne to go with the apple tartin. In truth, he needed Hermione and Draco to speak freely and get their hostilities out into the open without the presence of Ginny stifling the inevitable heated exchange to come. Of course, he would still have Marf eavesdrop for him in case there were difficulties, and then he would have a witness to truthfully account the matter.

As Severus pulled out Ginny's chair and escorted her to the kitchen, the redhead cast a worried glance over her shoulder at her lover and best friend, glaring at each other across the table from one another.
Once the door swung shut Hermione was the first to bark, “Fine, Malfoy. Why don't you just say what you really want to say. Go on, Severus isn't here now, so you can spew your vile remarks and call me nasty names again. I know you've been dying to.” Her hand clutched tightly to her wand, expecting to deflect some curse, momentarily forgetting about the restriction of the Death Eater Decree and Draco's wand.

Draco’s stare went from somewhat amused to deadly cold. All humor left his face and he bore a frighteningly close resemblance to his father. “For someone who purported the equality of Muggle-borns to those who are pure-blood, you can be quite the elitist snob yourself. Whatever happened to the merits of one's actions?”

“Actions? What actions? As far as I know, this is some elaborate hoax where your end goal is for Ginny to leave Harry, thus humiliating him by making his wife leave him for a Death Eater, oh, I'm sorry...EXDeath Eater,” Hermione yelled, throwing her napkin down on the table in disgust. “And I am not a snob, nor an elitist,” she added with conviction for good measure. It galled her that he called her a snob, just like Ron. She momentarily wondered if Ginny ever told him about that bit of name calling between her and her husband.

“And how do I know you are not engaging in some hoax. Potter did ask you to spy on Ginny. Maybe you're just going to gather enough damning evidence so that Potter will fly into such a rage, he'll kill me without a second thought, he would be exonerated of all abuses of his Auror powers; no one would bat an eye over the death of the last Malfoy.” Draco tried to appear calm, but the twitch in his jaw muscle was more telling of his building anger.

“And why would I do that? That would get Ginny into almost as much trouble as you would be in, if Harry knew.”

“Yes, but how much trouble would you be in if he knew you were shagging Severus? And by the way the chandelier in my flat rocked about today, I'd say it was rather rigorous shagging,” Draco drawled with that damn smirk fixed upon his lips again.

“Is that a threat?” she asked incredulously. “Are you going to try and blackmail me? Get Severus into trouble to settle your own score against me?”

“You think this is about you or Potter, but it's not!” Draco stood up and threw his own napkin down. “Dammnit, but you're annoying! I don't know how Severus finds your company tolerable. He has more patience than I give him credit for, because I certainly would have risked the Death Eater Decree and hexed your mouth shut,” he grumbled to himself. Spinning around he glared at Hermione. “This is not about you! This is more than the animosity between us. You just don’t understand the scope of things. Always rushing off trying to save the world when you have no idea what the fuck is going on around you.” After running a hand through his hair, the young wizard rubbed at a knot of tension building in his neck.

“Malfoy, always the drama queen,” Hermione drawled derisively, slightly shocked at the sound of her own tone. “If it's not a hippogriff who attacked you, who has wronged you this time? Hagrid's dead, so you can't blame him.”

The sudden memory of her old friend, and that she had so casually used him to lash out at her opponent across the room, brought on the pricking of tears behind her eyes.

Hermione's comment struck truer than she knew, and Draco slumped against the mantle, seeking strength from the wall to keep him upright. His head bent, he mumbled, “If I could cast one hex, one curse, one Unforgivable, I'd cast it upon Molly Weasley.”

“What?”

Lifting his head up, Hermione could see a seriousness in his eyes that could only be matched by the look on his face when Severus had first brought Malfoy to the Order, explaining he was ready to become a spy for their side.

“Molly Weasley. I hate that witch more than you ever could imagine. If it wasn't for her damn meddling, Ginny wouldn't be married to Potter,” he explained plainly.

“I'd think Moody or Fudge would be first on your list. And what has Molly ever done to you? I mean, I know how she pushed Ginny into dating Harry –“

Hermione was cut short when Draco grabbed a small piece of decorative crockery from the mantle and threw it against the wall with fury. She flinched at his sudden outburst, but before she could say anything, he began to tell his tale.

The now disheveled wizard turned once again to Hermione and yelled, “I was there! The morning the decree came out, I went to the Burrow to see Ginny. I came through the Floo and Molly told me in no uncertain terms that I should go. She said if I didn't leave soon, she'd Floo the Ministry and have the Aurors remove me. I wanted to see Ginny so badly, but she kept insisting I go. Finally when I threatened to stay put until Ginny came back, she promised to give Ginny my message. If my mind wasn't so... if it wasn't for that damned decree distracting me, I would have had the sense to make her take a wand oath on it. Instead, like a fool in love, I left.”
Hermione remembered how Ginny told her how she had thought Draco never tried to make contact with her after the decree, that he dropped off the face of the earth without word. There was nothing Hermione could say at the moment. If she had a daughter, she might feel compelled to lie to someone like Malfoy to keep him away from her as well. What mother would want their daughter involved with a convicted former Death Eater with no prospects and whose fortune had been taken away, without a Knut to his name?

To fill the oppressive silence, Hermione lifted her glass of wine and sipped at it daintily. Something was niggling in the back of her mind, but she discounted it. Instead, she continued to stare at the kitchen door while praying Severus and Ginny would return so she could go on disliking Malfoy, instead of dealing with this welling feeling of sympathy for the sod.

It perturbed her to no end she was actually feeling something along the lines of compassion towards him, and tried suppressing it by finally speaking up. “Maybe if you didn't become a Death Eater in the first place, then Molly might not have sent you away. You’d still have your money and no decree to worry about.”

There was something about Malfoy that just set Hermione off in such a way she would do things that seemed totally uncharacteristic of her, including saying obvious and incredibly insensitive remarks, in addition to smacking the bastard upside the head.

“Let me see you say no to a syphilitic lunatic father with a wand pressed against your temple, telling you to go through with some damn initiation binding you to a madman,” Draco snarled at her. “You deal with the threat of having your mind scrambled to the point where Goyle and Crabbe would have been my intellectual superiors, and see how well you can reason your way out of that scenario!”

Hermione had to admit she’d never asked Ginny if Draco ever wanted to become a Death Eater or if he regretted it only after becoming one, but from the blond wizard's tone and remarks, it seemed he’d never wanted to be one in the first place. It would certainly explain why, when Severus first brought Malfoy to the Order, explaining how he was willing to be a spy, the younger wizard had seemed to have aged by years overnight, and how he had a hollow look about his eyes until the end of the war.

It suddenly occurred to Hermione that she had never asked Severus why he became a Death Eater either, or why he turned spy, but wondered if she would be overstepping her bounds and straining their tenuous affair by asking.

To her relief, the moment was broken by Ginny bursting back through the kitchen door holding four glasses and the dessert wine. Severus trailed behind holding the apple tartin, which he could have easily had Marf serve, but didn't. Dinner dishes were cleared away with a sweep of the wand, sailing through the air and into the kitchen, making room for the final course.

Dessert was consumed at a civilized pace with relish. The Sauterne seemed to make Hermione feel a bit tipsy, and she was tempted to bait Malfoy, but didn't have enough energy to put up a good fight if it came to words. She knew in this slightly tired and intoxicated state, he could probably find far better words to parry than she. Besides, she didn't want to ruin her first dinner with her new social subset.

Odd, how Ginny and Severus were becoming part of this alternative life she was leading, she mused to herself. Mrs. Weasley really didn't want to involve Malfoy, but he was part and parcel of it. To help Severus and Ginny with acquiring the Polyjuice Potion ingredients was, by default, helping Malfoy.

As Ginny and Malfoy left Severus’ flat, Hermione knew her day with Severus was coming to an end soon. Mrs. Potter gave Severus a kiss upon his cheek, and Malfoy and Severus clapped each other on the back in a brotherly fashion. Hermione watched the exchange between comrades, trying to hold fast to her own preconceived notions of who and what Malfoy was. In her rapidly changing world, grasping onto the familiar was comforting. It was one of the few shreds of her original world left to hold onto, now that it seemed to be unraveling so fast.

Ginny glanced at Hermione and said softly, “Knock on Draco's door when you're ready to go.”

Hermione nodded briefly before Ginny and her lover slipped out the door. With the snick of the door's lock, Hermione and Severus were alone together once more. Sensing their time short, Hermione walked over to Severus wordlessly, stood up on her toes and kissed Severus with a desperate urgency.

His arms wound around her possessively in response to her kiss. Both knew what was to come. As their tongues stroked each other and their hands roamed, gorging on the sense of the other before the night ended, Hermione's heart ached more than ever. Now that she and Severus had cast aside all pretense and made love, she longed to stay with Severus in his flat more than ever.

To stop herself from crying, she let slip a self-deprecating laugh, muffled against Severus' neck. “We never got around to dancing the tango.”

Severus was thankful for the distraction, as he was torn between his desire to tell his Sunday night client to sod off when she showed up, and peevishness at himself for feeling so emotionally needy. He had let himself care for someone too much once before, and it had taken years for his heart to recover, though “recover” would be not be an accurate term when his heart had never healed properly in the first place.

His wand made quick work of the dinner table. It was cleared, followed by the chairs and table ambling off to the kitchen, meandering like livestock heading off to the trough.

The music began and they fell into step immediately. There was no holding back as they danced. Their eyes – fixed upon each other as they glided around the room – spoke pages of their passion for one another. Severus' fingers grazed along Hermione's lower back, pressing her closer to himself. Hermione felt his erection pressing against her hip, and she was tempted to give up on the dancing for one last love-making session before she had to go. They had agreed that Hermione could keep up on her pretense of Monday night dance lessons; and Hermione couldn't give a care if Ron protested one bit, especially since she discovered his own extracurricular activities. But having to be parted for twenty-four hours seemed rather unbearable for her at the moment.

After a couple more dances, Severus soon had Hermione pressed up against the wall, his hand skating up under the hem of her skirt. The knowledge they could not consummate their desires seemed to heighten the moment. Raising her leg, she wrapped it around his and slid it up the back of his thigh, encouraging him to settle between her legs. Severus began to grind himself into her through their clothes.

“One last time, Severus. Please,” she whispered with desperation.

Though he told himself he would much rather make her squirm with anticipation all day tomorrow, his own body craved one last release. His resolve dissolved instantly as Hermione latched onto the side of his neck and rotated her hips enticingly.

Breaking apart from her for a brief second, he yanked her knickers down hastily, stood up, undid his trousers, pulled himself free and lifted Hermione's leg back up. He adjusted his stance, positioning himself just so and making sure Hermione's back was properly braced against the wall before he slid into her quickly.

Hermione's head knocked lightly against the wall as she threw her head back, reveling in the sensation of being filled so quickly. Her first thought was of the one time she and Ron tried this in a broom closet once at Hogwarts, but that thought was quickly banished as this was so much more erotic and intense when it felt good, instead of uncomfortable and dank.

Severus grunted with each thrust and his lover thrilled in listening to him gradually lose control. When Severus came, it was either very quiet and controlled, or loud and furious. This time, he came with almost a pleading whimper, as if he was surrendering some part of himself as he came.
He wanted to hold out until Hermione came, but the knowledge that she would be going home with his essence still inside of her – with her husband none the wiser – excited him in a way that it never had before, even after working as a gigolo for years. Severus was marking his territory, claiming the prize of this witch from another wizard. It seemed irrational to him at the moment, but it still brought him to a quick orgasm.

As Severus withdrew from Hermione, he offered to bring her to climax manually, out of courtesy. Hermione kissed him with gratitude of his consideration of her pleasure, and told him he could pay her back Monday night – with interest, of course.

Once she was quickly reassembled, Hermione left, but not before one last urgent, yet hurried kiss before exiting Severus' flat.

He heard her knock on Draco's door, collecting Ginny before the two witches Floo'ed home.

Now that she was gone, he felt the emptiness of her presence. It more than unsettled him.

Severus questioned how he would function without Hermione once he was free and living far away from her.

'You could always take her with you,' the ghostly mirage of Albus piped up.

“Are you out of your imaginary and sugar-addled mind?” Severus retorted, swiveling on one heel to face his mental manifestation sitting on the settee.

'Severus is right this time,' the image of Minerva added, who had taken a seat in a wing back chair.

“See, even she agrees with me,” Severus gestured towards her with his hand.

'But what would she have if she stayed here that she could not have if she went with you?' Albus pondered aloud, stroking his ethereal beard. 'An inquisition from Moody, should he figure out it was she who gave you the Polyjuice Potion ingredients? A loveless marriage, that considering some of her recent reading material, is probably going to end in divorce, which in turn will turn her into a social pariah, coupled with Calpurnia Fudge's ongoing machinations to keep her 'in her
'Yes, but what of Hermione's Potions apprenticeship, which has been arranged,' Minerva countered, 'and then there is her salary working for Miss Brown. Plus she would never be able to see her parents again.'

'Muggles do have the ability to travel over land and sea, Minerva,' Albus reminded her.

Normally when Severus' memories of Albus and Minerva instantiated in their gossamer forms, they were always in agreement with one another, debating with Severus' conscience choices. This was a turn of events, with imaginary Albus and Minerva at odds with one another instead of mutual agreement.

Severus was ready to add his own observations, but the two subconscious apparitions continued on before Severus could butt in on his own mental debate.

'I am fully aware of all the technological marvels Muggles are capable of,' Minerva tartly replied, her Scottish brogue becoming thicker. 'However, having Mrs. Potter and two ex-Death Eaters suddenly leaving the United Kingdom under dubious circumstances – as the Ministry will phrase it – will no doubt be cause for the Ministry and Moody to go into a panic. But to have two ex-Death Eaters, Mrs. Potter and Mrs. Weasley, who is friend to both Harry Potter and Mr. Weasley, would no doubt result in an even bigger incident resulting in the Ministry taking even more drastic measures to bring Severus and Mr. Malfoy to so-called justice.'

'And all the more reason why Hermione should leave with Severus. Moody will put no one above his suspicions, even her,' insisted Albus. 'Besides, once Harry realized his wife has left him, he will try to follow her anyway. The danger during their escape will be no more or less perilous if Hermione were to join them.'

“At no point have I made any mention of Hermione fleeing with me,” Severus interrupted. “The plan is for Ginny, Draco, and I to leave. I am not complicating this by adding another body, which is yet another factor to result in possible failure, to the list of departing. End of discussion.”

The vision of Albus gave a sign of dissatisfied resignation, while the image of Minerva gave a short nod in agreement that it was the end of the matter and she was in the right.

Severus reached up to pinch the bridge of his nose, but was stopped short by a knock at the door signaling that Mrs. Paxton had arrived.

A few quick, and allowable, spells were cast to set the room to rights and Summon a mask before letting his Sunday night client through the door.

Mrs. Paxton trounced in with a twinkle in her eye that signaled to Severus she was in no mood for talking, but for a good and thorough rogering.

Severus was relieved he at least remembered to cast the Arabic freshening charm on himself, as it would not be entirely good etiquette to have Hermione's bodily fluids still clinging to his own cock.

To not prolong his duty any further than necessary, Severus found a left-over bottle of forty-eight hour enhancement potion, which would give him just enough vigor to get a perfunctory shag out of the way.

'Ugh, this is getting to be tiresome,' Severus thought as he went through the motions. Mrs. Paxton remained oblivious to his boredom, bucking and rocking against him on all fours. He couldn’t help a mental sigh each time he slammed himself deeply into her.

The potion gave his body a believable performance of interest in Mrs. Paxton, but he had to catch himself from yawning once or twice since his mind was engaged in other matters, such as calculating the volume ratio of kettle to cauldron, and what the weather was like in the eastern portion of the United States right now.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 51 A/N: Someone in a review brought up the issue about STD's, which I addressed by casually mentioning in Chapter 22, "Catch Me If I Fall" or "In Vino Veritas,": “...he had wine, a vial of the usual combination post-coitus contraceptive-venereal disease eradicating potion, and a deaf ear ready for her weekly rant.” But I felt this had to be more thoroughly explored in this chapter.

Kala ma'hab'bi irruh translated from Arabic is “Remove love essence.” Saha al kw'wai'yis nasa'mi: gemel sha'h'wa'ni sa'h'ir translates into "Awakening of the Perfumed Soul: The Sensual Sorcerer." Kindest thanks to Potion Mistress (AKA Jen) for her translation services. Some of you may recognize the original book that inspired the book for this chapter, “The Perfumed Garden for the Soul's Recreation”, translated by Sir Richard Burton.

Next I would like to give a huge round of applause to my betas, JuneW and Rogue_Panda, for editing and correcting this monster chapter. Also, thanks to JuneW for her title suggestion.

Yes, yes, I know. It's been nine plus years since I updated, but life happened. My mother-in-law died of cancer in 2006, I went back to work full time, I lost my job during the 2008 crash, was depressed that I was unemployed, did other things, and dealt with another death in the family, but still this story kept rattling around in my brain all these years, demanding to be expunged and committed to keyboard. I've had people at various Harry Potter cons over the years ask me if I ever intended to finish, and I said yes. And I meant it. So in January 2014 I started finishing chapter fifty-one, which I first started back in April 2006, and started writing, and writing, and writing.

And the one thing I swore was that I wouldn't post any more chapters until I finished the whole damn thing, including epilogue, so that way I would not have to write my way out of any more holes again. No more WIPs; too stressful. Well, the story is done and it will be posted in its entirety. Thanks to the many who have contacted me over the years hoping I'd finish it some day. Your periodic emails and reviews hoping I'd finish spurred me on to write this story to its completion. Thanks for being so patient.

You can watch for updates either through this fanfic archives' update page or these two social media sites: Tumblr, which includes fan art links that you can view now since some links have died over the years, and will feature new fan art I've commissioned: http://atdlheabetz.tumblr.com/
Twitter: @ATDLHEAbetz

_Point of note: Regarding Twitter and Tumblr, I'll also include some posts for Leviosa, a Harry Potter conference (July 7-10, 2016) that I am helping organize as I'm the Hotel & Logistics Director and resident con Mixologist. Other than the occasional Leviosa post, those sites will be for ATDLHEA updates only._
Chapter Summary

Hermione begins her temporary 'life of crime' by stealing ingredients. Later, Severus and Hermione reverse engineer Ron's special potion.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Fifty-Two

“The Vapors”

Disclaimer: I saw the best fanfic writers of my generation disclaim by legalese (as do I), stating Rowling owned Harry Potter, dragging themselves through Diagon Alley at dawn looking for a lemony fix, angelheaded fanfic! Dracos burning for the ancient heavenly connection to the scar-headed Harrys in the slash of night, who Potterverse and OTPs and Deathly Hallows and Potions masters sat up casting spells in the wizarding darkness with characters shagging in Prefect bathtubs floating in towers of Hogwarts contemplating Wizard Wrock...

A/N: This disclaimer is a parody of Allen Ginsberg’s opening of Howl.

Hermione did all she could from audibly squealing with delight when she caught sight of the shipment of powdered bicorn horn. It was even the varietal from Russia, which Hermione thought was a superior product to the Turkish variety Severus originally recommended. There was a box of bicorn horn from China as well, which would have worked if there was a shortage like the fluxweed.

Setting the bicorn horn and some other random ingredients aside in a pile, Hermione told Trevor that they were ingredients she would test herself since they required a more practiced hand to be done correctly, but she would show him how to perform them, training him to better perform his job.

Madam Dushka had been reminding Hermione with greater frequency that her performance review was coming up, and that Mr. Spawn had better improve for her to earn a good review and possible raise. It took all of Hermione's fortitude to plaster on a believable visage of concern and fear of Madam Dushka, and not want to smugly smile knowing that better prospects were on her horizon and that her cunt boss would be no part of it. But Hermione continued on, pretending as if things were to remain status quo, and played her hand close to the vest.

She worked hard to help train Trevor to come up to snuff on the testing of ingredients, since it was in her best interest to not only try her best, satisfied by a job well done, but that once she was gone, someone competent would be in place to test ingredients. That way, The Lovely Lavender Company would not suddenly be besieged by a bout of faulty ingredients that had not been tested properly.

The testing of the bicorn horn usually took about half an hour, so knowing that Trevor always left at the chime of noon, Hermione began testing the Russian powdered bicorn horn at a quarter to twelve.

At the stroke of noon, Hermione looked out of the corner of her eye, expecting to see Trevor bolt for the door with his cloak, when she noticed him standing behind her observing how she stirred the bicorn simmering away.

“Oh, Trevor,” she said, trying to not sound guilty or surprised by his continued presence. “I thought you were heading to lunch. I didn't notice you standing there.”

It was true; she wasn't expecting him to be there.

“I'm just observing, since you said the powdered bicorn horn was a tricky ingredient to test,” he offered as an explanation for his presence.

'Bugger, now he takes his job seriously.'

“This is the Russian batch, and we still have the Chinese bicorn to test. So, how about you head off to lunch and I'll save the Chinese batch for you? That one is more tricky, as the bicorn is not as evenly ground and is more challenging,” Hermione explained, informing Trevor of the differences between the two.

“Oh! You'll let me handle the more difficult batch?”
“Well, I'll be supervising, but yes, I think you can handle it,” she added, trying to equally bolster his confidence, which had been shaky since the lab burning incident, and to coax his backside out the door. Then she could get around to creating a false report of a ruined experiment to cover the fact she was going to smuggle some regulated potions ingredients out of the Ministry.

“Thanks! I guess I'll see you after lunch then,” the young wizard shouted over his shoulder before grabbing his cloak and exiting the lab in a hurry.

Once he was gone, Hermione placed her face in her hands and gave a great sigh of relief.

Hermione noted earlier in the morning that Trevor had left a box of actual magical Mexican jumping beans, not the silly Muggle ones infested with larvae, atop a teetering pile of other ingredients that needed to be tested. The box was poorly taped and rather beaten, looking as if a troll had used it for a pillow. Normally she would have taken him to task that this would result in another batch of ingredients strewn to the four corners of the lab, similar to the walking irises incident, but now she saw it as an opportunity for her ruse.

Hermione then went to grab an empty box, after quickly locking the doors to the lab. Grabbing the box of Mexican jumping beans, she found a seam along the edge of the box that was close to splitting open. With just a little coaxing with the edge of her fingernail, the box split open and Hermione dumped the entire box's contents into a fresh box, placing the paperwork from the shipper inside. She then scooped up a small handful of the beans and knelt down to scatter them with force across the floor, making them skitter across the tiles to wind up under various cabinets, tables and desks. What few beans weren't under some piece of office furniture were kicked lightly with the side of Hermione's boot. To finish off the staged scene, Hermione tipped over the teetering pile of boxes the Mexican jumping beans sat atop (after making sure none of the boxes contained any glass jars), lightly crushed the beans’ original box a little to make the split seam a little larger, and placed the damaged box in proper alignment with the other fallen boxes.

Moving back to her bench, she withdrew a vial from the pocket of her robes. While securing the pilfered bicorn horn in her pocket, the witch gave a thankful sign that the amount required for the Polyjuice Potion was less than the amount she used for standard testing. It wasn't enough for two batches, but there would be a little left over in case some was accidentally spilled.

‘One down, two to go,' she noted, hoping the other two “accidents” would be just as easy to stage. In order to hide the lifting of certain ingredients under the Ministry's radar, Hermione would have to botch a few other tests so that it would not be obvious that only regulated Polyjuice Potion ingredients needed retesting. As opportunities arose, the clever witch would have to ruin more experiments on purpose. Granted, she had an excellent record of not wasting ingredients with additional tests, but Trevor Spawn was providing a plethora of accidents to exploit. He had already caused a great many ingredients to be retested since beginning work at the Department of Standards and Regulations, so this would merely be a continuation of the current streak.

By the time Trevor returned from lunch, Hermione was filling out the paperwork to record her supposed botched test, as was required by the Ministry. Since Trevor began working there, she had become on expert on filling out form 42a/hgg, listing which ingredient required additional testing, how much was used, and why. The warming charm Hermione placed on the original batch added credibility to the perception that Hermione had just finished testing the Russian bicorn horn a second time.

Sounding peevish, Hermione told Trevor to pick up the boxes that he had left to fall over carelessly. She mentioned that there still might be a few more Mexican jumping beans on the floor, waving her hand off in the direction she had strewn them, without bothering to look at Trevor, as she finished filling out the form.

Knowing the less said was better, Hermione let Trevor imply on his own that the Mexican jumping beans spilling all over the floor had caused Hermione to be distracted and the batch ruined in the process. This was confirmed by Trevor, with no prompting from her, apologizing for making her test the bicorn horn a second time. Then he began setting up the testing of the Chinese batch under Hermione's supervision.

~~~~~~~*~

Pacing the room, Severus tried to stop the bile rising in his throat. His new Wednesday client was due any moment, causing the former spy to be agitated with good cause. He had used the latest reformulation of the hair coloring formula to temporarily dye his locks a rather nondescript medium golden brown, and he had picked his bauta mask to conceal his whole face.

He nearly jumped out of his skin with the knock on the door signaling his client's arrival.

Severus opened the door and welcomed Molly Weasley into his flat.

“Good evening, Madam. Please, enter,” Severus said with a Spanish Castilian accent, raising the pitch of his voice from his natural baritone to a passable tenor.

Severus hoped that by changing his hair color, the depth of his voice and affecting a slight foreign accent, Molly would never be able to place Severus as the gigolo she was seeing for a sympathetic ear.
The middle-aged witch nervously scanned her eyes about the place before walking through the threshold. With a quick glance back over her shoulder to make sure no one was spying, she entered the residence.

“Please, have a seat,” he urged, sweeping his arm towards the choice of a wingback chair or the settee.

Molly quickly shuffled over to the wingback with uncertainty and sat down, still wearing her cloak.

“Let me take your cloak.”

She rose and took off her own cloak, trying her best to avoid any physical contact with Severus when she handed it to him. He then handed the cloak off to Marf, who appeared only for an instant before disappearing again.

“Oh! You have a house-elf,” Molly remarked, her overly bright tones trying to mask her nervousness.

“Marf is under the employ of my employer. He is not mine,” Severus replied, remembering to use more hand gestures when talking, since that was a conversation mannerism of witches and wizards from Spain.

“Where are you from?” she asked, noting Severus’ accent.

“I come from Spain. Have you ever been?” he asked, hoping to keep the conversation as light and non-personal for as long as possible.

“No.” The single word reply hung in the air, adding to the awkwardness, until Molly added for further clarification, “No, but it always seemed like such an interesting place to visit. You speak very good English for a foreigner. I have a daughter-in-law who is a foreigner.”

There was additional silence that stretched. Severus was finding this to be a very difficult conversation to bear, as Molly's comments almost sounded as if she was in denial of her slight xenophobia and was over-compensating.
“Is your daughter-in-law from Spain?” he asked, knowing Fleur was French, but trying to spur Molly along.

“No, she's French, but she's still a good wife to my oldest son, Bill.”

It took considerable strength for Severus not to cringe at the way Molly thought her backhanded remark about Fleur's national origins was acceptable when qualifying it with her domestic skills.

Severus decided to interrupt this painful discourse with the offer of refreshments.

“Tea would be lovely,” Molly answered with relief.

Both members of the Order of the Phoenix needed the fortitude of a little tea to get through this night.

After tea and a little more small talk, Severus broached the subject at hand.

“I was informed you needed a sympathetic ear,” he prompted her.

That was the last thing Severus said for the next two hours, while Molly poured out every personal detail regarding how unappreciated she felt by her children, how much she wished her husband, Arthur, was more ambitious instead of wallowing away in a position that brought little chance for advancement or pay raises, and finally on to the subject of how her daughter and her youngest son's wife were denying her the happiness of grandchildren. However, she added for measure her hope that Ginny would soon be coming around to her way of thinking, since Hermione said she herself was going off potions to let nature take its course.

This last topic of the night tested Severus' ability to act as a sympathetic ear. He had heard from both Ginny and Hermione the arguments they had used – in counterpoint to Molly's nagging – about why they were not interested in getting pregnant. And Severus definitely knew, from first-hand experience, that Hermione was definitely not going off potions, and this was a ruse to stall Molly from harping on her any further regarding the subject.

Severus' only physical contact with Molly was a sympathetic pat on the top of her hand when he noted she had all run out of steam and was done railing on for the night.

“I feel so much better,” Molly sighed cheerfully as Severus called for Marf to bring Mrs. Weasley her cloak. “I can't wait until next week. Thank you.”

And before Severus could be the gentlemanly good host, Molly marched with renewed vigor over to the door and showed herself out, lightly slamming the door closed.

Gobsmacked, Severus collapsed into a wingback and asked Marf to bring a snifter of something strong to help muddle and dull some of the memories of the evening. The alcohol would never erase the memory of that torturous evening, but alcohol certainly seemed like a damn good excuse to help diminish the pain.

“She never even asked my name,” Severus noted dryly, before draining the last sip and rising to go to the bathroom. He hoped the hair coloring solution would come out with one wash, so he could finally declare this potion finished and no longer have to fiddle with it.

~~~~~~~*~

If it wasn't for the fact that Hermione was getting shagged good and proper twice a week now, she was sure she'd be in Azkaban for having performed an Unforgivable on Ron.

While Ron wasn't home, she was able to grab another sample of the potion he had been taking as part of his new exercise and fitness regime in order to build up muscle and tone, in preparation of his upcoming photo shoot spread for the 2004 Mercury Broom Company calendar. She was convinced steroids and hormones were key ingredients, since Ron had been showing increased agitation, aggression and a great deal of muscle piling on quickly.

Even the shirts he once wore that had hung loosely on his frame were now too tight. Ron had gone out to the tailor’s to get some fresh shirts made, ditching his usual t-shirts and casual wear for something a little more refined, picking up a couple pairs of tailored slacks to go with his new wardrobe. There were a few new T-shirts he'd bought to replace his old ones, but now he was dressing more like an adult instead of an overgrown adolescent.

Hermione welcomed Ron's interest in improving his grooming habits and appearance, but it also came with the side effect of a little more preening. Hermione noticed that some of her beauty lotions that she used sparingly were suddenly cleaned out.

When the exasperated witch asked Ron if he had used the last of her Lovely Lavender Maximum Moisturizer, her husband got rather short with her. He admitted he’d used it since it seemed she hadn’t, and he needed it since he spent so much time out in the elements and needed to look his best for the upcoming photo shoot.

“Ron,” Hermione ground out with tried patience, trying not to set her husband off on another rage, which had become a more frequent occurrence, “it’s called Maximum Moisturizer because you only have to use very little. A tiny dab goes a long way, which is why it is so effective. That jar would normally last me a whole year and you’ve used it up less than a week. ‘Maximum Moisturizer’ is not a direction to use the whole jar in one go.”

“I didn't use the whole jar, only half,” he bit back, as he plowed through the ice box looking for some quick protein to snarf down before leaving for practice.

She wanted to point out that he’d used six months of her lotion in a mere week, but decided to shut her mouth and avoid Ron busting up any more crockery. There were only so many times you can Reparo the same shattered platter or mug until the spell would no longer work. And considering how often Ron was now busting up the dishes in a sudden fit, she didn't want to add any most costs, considering she was going to have to buy a new jar of moisturizer and Ron's new tailored shirts weren't cheap.

If Ron was going to start using beauty potions, she was going to get him something cheap, and hide her good and expensive stuff from him.

“So, you still going to dance lessons Thursday nights?” Ron asked out of the blue.

“Uh, yeah.” Hermione replied, sounding a little stilted, surprised by the non sequitur. She might have mentioned she was taking “dancing lessons” on Monday night as well, but figured that the less said, the better.

“Good, you seem to like them and certainly seem like you're in a better mood the day after,” her husband noted nonchalantly.

Hermione bit the inside of her lip and turned to face out the kitchen window in order to prevent any tells from betraying her otherwise impassive face.

Standing over the cauldron, Hermione let her hair drape around her face, creating a curtain in which to trap the scent of Ron’s potion as it slowly released volatile oils and light tendrils of fragrant steamy vapor, per Severus’ instruction.

She was glad Severus had prepared that night a light meal of trout and salad, so her sense of smell would not be hindered or dulled by strong scents from dinner.

“Slowly drag the spoon through the potion, and then inhale deeply once again,” her old Potions professor instructed her.

Hermione caught the scent of a new ingredient, something musky. “It's definitely something familiar,” she said to herself. “Goat. I think it's a scent gland from near the horns.”

Severus leaned his head over the cauldron to catch the vapor as Hermione moved her head aside so he could give her a second opinion.

“No, not the glands near the horn, that's just plain old goat penis,” Severus corrected her, scrunching up his nose as he recalled the scent.

On a piece of parchment, Mrs. Weasley wrote down “goat penis” at the bottom of an ever growing list of ingredients. Hermione had brought a small cauldron and various utensils from home with her so that Severus could truthfully answer, during future interrogations, that none of his kitchen items had been used for any Potions, even for the reverse engineering of one.

Glancing in the slowly simmering cauldron, Hermione noted that the potion had nearly evaporated and inhaled one last time. Severus breathed in and out one last time, and confirmed Hermione's opinion that the goat penis was the last ingredient.

As Hermione reviewed the list she’d compiled, Severus sidled up behind her and glanced at the parchment. They had put off making love until after the lesson was completed, as Severus had informed Hermione that sex can alter one's abilities to smell certain scents correctly.

“No wonder he has the temperament of a bull lately,” Hermione said more to herself than for Severus' benefit. She knew this potion was a temporary thing, until the photo shoot was over, but she didn't know how much longer Ron would be taking it, nor when in November the shoot was scheduled.

“The scent of this potion is having an effect on me,” Severus murmured into her hair, noting the potion through inhalation was affecting him as well.

With a small gasp of surprise, Hermione felt Severus position himself right behind her, pressing his erection firmly into her backside. She could feel a slight twitching of his cock, the pulsing matching the beat of Severus' heart, which she could feel through his chest on her back.

“Tell me what symptoms you feel,” she asked, feeling aroused by her lover's sudden amorous attentions, but also disconcerted as Severus merely inhaled the fumes of this potion, whereas her own husband has been taking two vials of this stuff daily.

Strong hands possessively grabbing her hips moved up to latch on to her breasts with much more force than Severus had ever shown before. “That if I don't fuck you until you split in two, I'll go mad and tear this room apart,” he growled into her ear, his voice thick with impatient tension.

Before Hermione could continue her line of questioning, Hermione felt Severus roughly grab the hem of her skirt and yank it up forcefully, followed by the shoving of her knickers barely down her thighs with one hand and his other hand undoing his trousers.

As she was about to suggest they move to the bedroom, Severus' arm swept across the table, clearing it of the cauldron and Potions equipment. He placed a firm hand on the back of Hermione's neck, guiding her face down onto the table. With one quick thrust, Severus entered Hermione without preamble and began to fuck her with bestial abandon.

Severus roared aloud as he sunk his nearly painful erection into Hermione’s core. Hermione gave a yelp, a mixture of pleasure and surprise. If she wasn't already somewhat aroused and slightly slick with anticipation, Severus’ rough penetration would have been painful. Grabbing her hips once more, his fingers digging into her flesh, Severus began to grunt with each fervent thrust.

Hermione clutched to the edges of the table to hold herself in place as Severus' movements were tossing her about as if a toy. She arched her back to allow deeper penetration, which spurred Severus to tuck his hips under and begin hammering her with jackrabbit-like speed. Before Hermione could climax, Severus screamed hoarsely, adding in the odd swear word as he orgasmed. The stunned witch felt Severus' body give a sudden shudder before his knees gave out and he collapsed on the floor, his trousers tangled about his knees and his shirt tails hitched up around his midsection as he lay on his back.

Gasping great gulps of air, Severus breathlessly croaked out, “I am so sorry.” He paused, panting a few more times before continuing, “I should have known the vapors would affect me in such a way.”
Hermione, who was finishing smoothing down her skirt and blouse, eyed Severus with astonishment.

“Wow,” she said.

Severus cracked an eye open and could not decipher the wide-eyed look on his lover, whom he’d taken so roughly. “Wow, as in...”

“Wow, as in if the vapors alone did this to you, no wonder Ron howled like a beast with Zabini. No wonder he flies into a rage at the slightest provocation,” she explained, continuing, “And ‘Wow,’ as in that was incredibly wild and I never thought I’d ever see you lose control like that, and that was pretty incredible and yet almost a little scary had I not trusted you like I do, and ‘Wow,’ as in I’m glad I was a little ready for you to begin with or else dry penetration like that would have been extremely painful.”

Severus winced, shamed his own knowledge as a Potions master did not foresee such a quick and visceral response to the potion's vapors. “May I see the list?” the worn-out wizard asked as he slowly tried to raise himself from the floor and pull up his trousers.

Hermione fetched it from the corner of the kitchen, as it had been flung from the table in Severus' moment of blind lust.

Scanning over the list, he noted that some of the ingredients were the same as the male enhancement potion he was now testing with Hermione, but many of the other ingredients dealt strictly with muscle development, testosterone production, and reduction of fat.

Now sitting in a chair, Severus gave a pained sigh while hanging his head, forehead resting against his hand. “I should have had something to counter the effects on hand. Damn, I hate these restrictions. If only I had my Potions lab, I would have had something to negate the effects and not do what I did,” he lamented, waving his other hand at the mess caused by his momentary lapse of reason. “As a Potions master, you're supposed to have safety protocols in place so that you do not become a victim of your own Potions work.” He glanced at Hermione from between his fingers and a hank of hair that had fallen across his face, looking a bit ashamed of himself.

Hermione walked over to Severus and moved his arm to sit herself in his lap, lacing her hands around his neck, after tipping his chin up to meet her square in the eye. “One, I've learned something new today. And two, of all the Potions to fall victim to, this one was at least “I didn't even let you orgasm before I selfishly satisfied myself,” he retorted bitterly.

“Well, you can always make it up to me tonight,” the young Potions apprentice retorted. “Besides,” she added, a mischievous glint in her eye, “I wouldn't mind you under a less potent version of that potion's vapors.” Nuzzling her nose along Severus' neck, she whispered, making sure her warm breath grazed his ear, “I hope you aren't averse to fulfilling a little fantasy of mine.”

Severus' eyes rolled up in his head before he closed them, relishing in the way he was being seduced and the idea he would be part of Hermione's fantasy.

“The me, restrained. Tied down... or chained up... A dose of that lubrication potion coursing through me, making me so...” Hermione sighed, licking the curve of Severus' ear. “Very...” she continued, her hand raking across Severus scalp, noting his increased rapid breaths. “Wet... Unable to escape. Yours to do anything...” she paused for dramatic effect as she grazed her nose along his cheek. “Anything you want.”

Severus grasped Hermione's face and kissed her forcefully, but not so much as the same force he used earlier. He held back enough to signal that he was in control of his faculties, as opposed to earlier. He had tied down many a witch, but the fact he was being so deliciously enticed to fulfill this request made it all the more arousing.

Arriving home, feeling thoroughly relaxed after several orgasms, and smiling with the knowledge that Severus was going to fulfill her little fantasy sometime in the future, Hermione strode through the door of her flat, ready to take a quick shower and go to bed.

She didn't notice the tall figure in the kitchen who slipped from shadow and followed her into the bathroom.

Lost in recalling Severus' analysis of the potion Ron was taking, Hermione thought about how the inhalation of fumes resulted in a different reaction than imbibing. The Potions master gave some detailed analysis about how olfactory and digestive systems absorption differed, and discussed with her the properties of the solids that they scraped from the bottom of the cauldron during their post analysis.

'So Ron will have a raised libido, but the solids from some ingredients temper the sexual arousal part of the potion. Makes sense, not to have a bunch of hormonally uncontrollable wizards running about on this potion,' she surmised just as she noticed the sound of the shower door opening.

Her husband was naked, entering the shower with a similar glint in his eye that Severus had in his eye before his uncontrolled bout of urges overtook him.

“It's been too long, 'Mione,” Ron growled.

Hermione noticed then his voice had become a little lower in pitch over the past few weeks, a sign of increased testosterone levels.

'Between us, not long enough.' She turned her head back, keeping her back to him.

The air was thick with tension as Hermione waited for Ron's next move while she continued to pretend to ignore him. Ron slowly slid up next to his wife. He pressed his erection against her hip and slid a possessive hand across her belly before gliding it down lower until his hand was cupping her mons.

With a single finger, he started to slide his digit back and forth, stroking her clit.

Hermione silently damned the prolonged effects of the natural lubrication potion she was still under. She didn't want Ron touching her, but considering how long it had been and how normally she'd be crawling out of her skin by now without a fuck by her husband for weeks, she figured she better get around to shagging her husband or else arouse suspicion by turning him down.

“I can tell you want me,” he hissed, his fingers stroking her between her folds in a way he had never touched her before.

Hermione hated the fact that the way he was touching her right now felt pretty good. Coupled with the fact she had been fucking her brains out earlier in the night, her body was already aroused and took little to bring it back up to its heightened state once more.

'Aw, fuck it all, he is my husband. Maybe this time I can finish before him.'
Hermione didn't fight off Ron's hungry attentions and even arched her back in invitation to join with her, dissembling her own indifferent emotions.

“Not so fast,” Ron laughed throatily in reply to his wife's nonverbal signal. “You want to orgasm first, well then…”

He began stroking Hermione's clit with longer strokes, his other hand entering her and searching for that elusive spot, making her spread her legs wider. Ron's long finger eventually found it, making Hermione hitch her breath; she was surprised he actually knew what he was looking for, as the pressure and speed of his fingers on her clitoris increased.

Unbidden, Hermione began to whimper, lost in the feeling of an impending orgasm. She did her best to imagine it was Severus finger-fucking her in the shower. Pitching forward in the shower, Hermione braced her hands on the wall and rode out her orgasm, letting Ron hear her scream to verify completion. Before she could finish coming down off her orgasm, he grabbed her by the hips and lifted her up, while spinning her around, quickly hitching her leg up over his arm and then driving himself into Hermione.

She braced her back against the cool tiles, as Ron grunted and howled as he fucked his wife. Hermione was surreally reminded of the night's earlier events, distracted by the strong sense of déjà vu; the same animalistic loss of control, the brutish grunting, the feral look in the eye. Severus did warn her that her husband would have an enhanced libido, as a side effect of the potion, and Ron did show a bit more restraint than Severus did, though not by much. At least Ron's hands didn't leave bruises on her hips like Severus' did, which Hermione had made sure to spell away before dressing to come home that night.

Hermione allowed herself one more orgasm, as she just ignored her reservations and revulsion about her husband and let herself enjoy the moment. It was a pity, she thought, that it had taken this long for Ron to finally give her an orgasm that she would have been rapturously grateful for three months prior. Now she was glad at least Ron's efforts weren't a complete waste of her time, this time.

Plastering a believable smile upon her face, she beamed up at her husband while breathlessly exhaling, “That was fantastic.” If anything, a little praise may soothe the savage beast.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 52 A/N: I know, Hermione fucking Ron. But she doesn't want to arouse suspicion, like Ginny did with Harry by changing her behavior patterns.
There were a few correspondences addressed to Sebastian Delgado waiting in Severus' office as he arrived at work with a spring in his step, despite the fact his weekly parole meeting was that morning. Things were humming along nicely, except for the possibility that Tropical Storm Henri would yet again continue the ruination of the 2003 crop of fluxweed, which needed to be picked during a full moon. The moon didn't necessarily have to be shining above during harvest, but fluxweed had to be collected during that phase, nonetheless.

The next full moon would be September 10th in five days; Severus counted each day, hoping Henri would not develop into a hurricane. Even so, tropical storms were strong enough to cause plenty of havoc on crops; Hurricane Bill, back in late June, had decimated most of the fields where fluxweed was grown, just a month before the summer harvest usually began. Each successive crop that was sown afterwards was usually washed out by yet another hurricane or tropical depression that roared through the mid and south Atlantic. Even along the northern Atlantic coast where fluxweed grew naturally, wild stands of it were turned to slime from the incessant summer rains.

Severus would not let something as unpredictable as the weather foul his mood that day. Hermione had delivered the powdered bicorn horn to Ginny, and she estimated a Friday shipment of boomslang skin would await her when she came into work that morning.

Opening his correspondence, he smiled to see the first letter was from Katherine Bigelow.

-------

Dear Sebastian,

Thank you for the recommendation of crops to grow for some quick cash flow. Greasing these Spanish bureaucrats' palms is something I'm going to have to factor into the price of my plants. It is quite the other side of the coin to be working as a grower, harvester and exporter to Britain instead of an importer, but the climate is far more tropical, which seems to agree with me and the rare plants I once only imported. It's been a while since I've done this much physical labor, but it feels good to get my hands back in the earth once again, despite the slight ache in my back at times.

I was able to get a crop of young nettles sown and harvested, since there seems to be a shortage coming from the Americas, as you mentioned. Additionally, the burrowing four o'clock and Appalachian rose gentian. I should be able to get them both to flower before winter comes, providing a much needed infusion of Galleons. Unfortunately, due to the protected designation of fluxweed by both American Muggle and magical department agencies, and the damage sustained by this year's weather, I am unable to procure any fluxweed seeds. It seems they are keeping all seeds within the United States in order to ensure at least one crop this season through successive plantings, and something to plant next year in case there are no seeds to harvest this year.

As always, thank you for your continued guidance and frank opinions. Should you need anything, please do not hesitate to ask.

Kindest regards,

Katherine

-------

'The one thing I would ask for and she cannot help me.' Severus gave a small huff of disappointment.
Setting the letter aside, with dour and dark clouds now brewing above his head, Severus petulantly picked up the latest catalog from Pawnography in search of a new chess set. He had accidentally decapitated several pieces during his drunken and apoplectic bout of destruction after his first kiss with Hermione, which led to a very great misunderstanding, resulting in the aforementioned fit of rage. Severus’ chess set would no longer play, especially since all of the monarchs of the set were beheaded.

Glancing through the pages, there was the usual Merlin era set, with a Guinevere model for the queen who was sculpted wearing a richly embroidered bliaut and mantle. In the catalog photo of the set, both Guinevere and her counterpart Morgana twirled to show off the fine craftsmanship of their costuming. Different periods were represented with their own themed chess board, each with their own historically accurate costuming.

When Severus reached the twentieth century section of the catalog, he came across a page promoting the new Albus Dumbledore chess set, and he dropped the catalog, flinching as if it bit his fingers. Severus did not want to look at the page and be reminded of his late mentor. He did not want to even view the figure of the Dark Lord, or see if he himself was made a replica in wood or semiprecious stone. Who knew which side he was placed in those sets, but he could guess – since he was not honored as a hero after the end of the war, but instead persecuted as a war criminal.

He picked up the catalog once more and selected a chess set from the Renaissance period: an Italian costumed ensemble. It had classical looking figures and looked refined without bordering on ostentatious.

Severus wrote a quick missive to Lavender that he required her to purchase the set for him. He handed the note with the catalog off to Wonkle to relay to their employer, Miss Brown.

The temporary hair dye formula was now completed and the male enhancement potion had been thoroughly tested with the help of his lover and temporary Potions apprentice, Hermione. Severus pulled out his notebooks from the nearly four years he had worked for Miss Brown and began paging through them. The edible body paint was still not finished, but he would have time to work on that later.

It would create a sticky situation for his employer should it be pieced together that Severus Snape’s disappearance coincided with the “going abroad” of her former Potions master, Sebastian Delgado. Therefore as a way for Severus to help Miss Brown to counter any claims that Severus Snape and Sebastian Delgado were one and the same, Severus would need to draft letters creating proof of the ongoing owl correspondence between Miss Brown and Master Delgado, based on his notes.
The thought of his nom de guerre brought back memories of his latest meeting with the elder Mrs. Weasley.

The part-time gigolo still inwardly winced when recalling the name Molly assigned to him two days ago, during their second meeting.

‘Eduardo.’ He shuddered.

Severus noticed that when Miss Brown read the letter to him, having received it while he was in her office at the time, she did not mock him for adopting the Spanish accent, and gave him merely a sympathetic grimace.

Given that Molly was now a client, he prayed for his escape to come as soon as possible.

Having woken up late Friday morning, Hermione's day would only go from bad to worse. She had come home just after midnight, the night before, having helped Severus test the last batch of male enhancement potion. Sixty-six hours was nearly as potent as the seventy-hour version, and left her no less bow-legged and exhausted than after her first marathon fuck fest with Severus, in which they tested the most potent of brews. She was thankful she wasn't too tired to remember to cast the Arabic post-coitus freshening charm and spell away the bruises and love bites before returning home, as Ron was waiting for her and pounced upon her once she set foot through the threshold. Ron went much longer than usual and came twice, never losing his erection after the first orgasm to continue on to a much longer session for his second go at his wife. Hermione was beginning to think she was getting callouses in her delicate areas since she wasn't sore anymore where she normally would be. She figured her body was becoming adjusted to a very healthy and rigorous sex life. By the time Ron finished, it was nearly two in the morning and Hermione was exhausted beyond all measure.

In addition to oversleeping, Hermione's mirror kept on winking and giving her an exaggerated thumbs-up, having witnessed the longest and most “successful” coupling Hermione and Ron ever had; Hermione came more than once, something Ron even congratulated himself for before falling asleep eventually. The mirror was not being very cooperative as she was rushing to get ready for work, which delayed her even more. She also wanted to take Ron to task for letting her oversleep, but she didn't have time for a row with him since she was running late as it was.

The line at the Twenty-Four Blackbird Bakery was unusually long that morning, as she arrived later than normal, and by the time she got to the front of the line, they were out of all sweet baked goods. No scones, no hot runic buns, no brioche, no sweet croissants – just plain croissants and unsweetened breads. The croissant she grudgingly purchased shattered into a thousand tiny buttery shards upon the first bite, Hermione had to spell the croissant flakes off her robe twice as she rushed off towards work, eating and running at the same time; she wished she had the forethought to fix breakfast at home, since it would have been faster.

Madam Dushka was waiting for her in the hallway, tapping her foot impatiently, alternating between glancing at her wristwatch and folding her arms with obvious impatience and displeasure as Hermione bolted down the hallway to reach the lab.

“You're late,” her boss barked at her.

“I'm sorry, this is the first time I have overslept for work and it won't happen again,” Hermione apologized, trying not to snap at her boss. It was very unlikely Hermione would get fired, but considering how important her position was in helping Severus and Draco escape, she did not want to imperil her employment status either. “I'll stay late to make up for lost time,” Hermione added.

This seemed to give Madam Dushka some satisfaction, as her scowl turned into a triumphant smirk. She minced off towards her office.

Still running down the hallway, Hermione hurriedly changed into her work robes.

Bursting through the lab doors, careful not to startle Trevor if he was in the middle of testing a batch, Hermione's eyes scanned the pile of boxes, reading the labels of ingredients marked on the side.

'Where is the boomslang skin,' she worried, beginning to panic that a shipment didn't come in. 'It should be here.'

Before Hermione could turn around, Trevor piped up, “I got here a little earlier today and started in on the Re'em blood and boomslang skin. I hope that's okay,” he added, sounding a bit uncertain if he was qualified enough to test them without her supervision.

Hermione winced, then schooled her features before turning around with a reassuring smile that it was okay that he showed some initiative. “No, that's good. You're perfectly capable of testing those ingredients.”

'There is always next week,' she told herself, making a mental note to cut short her Thursday night with Severus in order to make sure to beat Trevor to work next Friday, when the next batch should be arriving. She just hoped Ron would not keep her up half the night again, or she'd have to make sure to feed Ron a sleeping draft so he could get in a decent night's rest and wake up extra early.

Trevor stayed late, helping Hermione. They both were in a foul mood, as the box marked “Powdered Limonite,” which is commonly known as yellow ochre, was mislabeled. In the process of cleaning up the lab after the explosion, Trevor and Hermione deduced that the shipper had switched the label for the powdered limonite with the label for powdered sulfur and vice versa. Both ingredients were yellow, but though the color difference between the two should have been enough to cause suspicion, even Hermione admitted to herself that if she was distracted enough – as Trevor had been when he opened the box as Madam Dushka came in to invite Trevor for a leisurely lunch – she might have made the same mistake.

At least it was Trevor's fault for blowing up the lab, which was only slightly different from his recent accident of nearly burning down the lab. But Trevor found his lunch invitation with his boss rescinded, as Madam Dushka had to make an emergency appointment with her hairdresser, since half her hair got burnt off in the explosion because she had been standing closest to the cauldron.

Once the lab was put back into order, Trevor and Hermione had some paperwork to fill out as to why they had to test the powdered sulfur again, as blowing it up is not a measure of purity for Ministry standards. There were also forms to inform the shipper of the mislabeling so they could notify all their other customers of the mix-up before someone in another country blew themselves up on accident.

“Thanks for staying late,” Hermione told him, as he changed out of his work robes.

“It's the least I could do considering I nearly blew us all up,” he replied morosely.

She gave a small quirk of a grin. “Well, at least the explosion was small, though I don't think our boss would say that.”

Trevor cringed in memory of the furious look on Madam Dushka's face as she stormed out of the lab on the verge of tears. “I have buggered it big time.” He sighed despondently. “What should a bloke do when flowers, candy, and wine won't cut it for an apology this time? She's really pissed at me. You're a witch, what do you suggest?”

Hermione was momentarily stunned, as Trevor had just indirectly confirmed that the two were having an affair, which – considering that Madam Dushka was married and considerably older than him – would be scandalous should it become common knowledge within the Ministry. It wasn't so much of a shock to Hermione since she was having her own affair with a man old enough to be her father. But so far, despite Madam Dushka's obvious flirting with Trevor in front of her, Hermione had not heard any rumors from others about an office romance; however, she wasn't eating lunch with the other office witches anymore due to time constraints, so she couldn't be certain of that.

“First of all, discretion. Any suggestions I give you, don't let her know I gave them to you.” Hermione knew that knowledge — without the other party knowing you're in possession of it — can lend one the upper hand, so she didn't want Trevor to tip his hand to his lover that Hermione knew of their tryst. “Second, jewelry is always a good idea, but considering your current financial status and your father cutting you off, I can't recommend that.” Pondering a moment, Hermione looked away and up at the ceiling while she thought. “I would bet that her husband makes her do all the cooking at home. Cook for her and give her a nice massage, as not having to do a chore and being pampered a bit would certainly be a treat that one can't necessarily buy.”

Hermione could certainly attest to the fact that Severus cooking for her and giving her massages certainly wooed his way into her heart.

“Wow, I never would have thought of that,” the young wizard admitted honestly. “And thanks. Yeah, maybe I should have been a bit more subtle. I shouldn't have aired my dirty cauldron like that,” he admitted sheepishly, now realizing how he lacked discretion.

“No need to raise the ire of Mister Dushka, if he is unaware or would become overly concerned,” Hermione added, driving home the point that Trevor should not make his mistress' indiscretions more public than they already were, with her obvious flaunting with Trevor.

Hermione had started to like Trevor since he turned over his new leaf, after having his apprenticeship taken away from him and being financially cut off from his father. He had been making an honest effort to work at his job and be more humble. If anything, the death of Trevor Spawn at the hand of an enraged jealous husband would mean Hermione having to train a new person for the position of Potions ingredient tester, and possibly someone more annoying and incompetent than Trevor initially was.

“Thanks.” He gave her a lopsided smile and left the lab with smudges of burnt sulfur still clinging to his cheek.

After the door swung shut, Hermione summoned the latest copy of the Daily Prophet and checked the world weather report, frowning as Tropical Storm Henri showed a track that threaten Georgia and the Carolinas before the next full moon.
A/N: A bliaut is an over-tunic, worn over the chainse (chemise) in Medieval period dress.

A short chapter, but most future chapters run in the 6,000 to 9,000 word range with a few topping out at 10,000 to 12,000 range.

Once again, thanks to my wonderful betas, JuneW and Rogue_Panda. Send them a little love and thanks for their generous help.
“Of Bets and Brandy, of Binges and Brave Gryffindors, and Why the Bath Is Boiling Hot”

Chapter Summary

Severus teaches Hermione about the origins of Fairy Brandy, as well as telling her what the staff at Hogwarts used to do for amusement. Plus, inspiration strikes when one least expects it.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Fifty-Four

“Of Bets and Brandy, of Binges and Brave Gryffindors, and Why the Bath Is Boiling Hot”

Disclaimer: I claim to disclaim, yet by disclaiming, I am making a claim. How silly this logic puzzle is to simply state that Rowling owns Harry Potter, and I do not, though if you've read this far it should be pretty bloody obvious.

============

The rap upon Severus' office door had a cadence to it, indicating that Miss Brown was in a good mood, something of a welcome sign considering how she had been running hot and cold as of late.

“May I enter,” the witch asked, looking more cheerful than usual, “or would you rather come to my office?”

The weary wizard gauged his employer's mood. He didn’t know if something would turn her disposition sour and thereby risk having all his papers strewn about his office in a fit should something upset her. Playing it safe, Severus suggested they go to her office, using the truthful fact there was more room in there to talk and possibly take tea as well.

Settled upon a comfy chair, with his cup and saucer in hand, Severus prompted her that he was ready to talk.

“Well, first of all, your chess set came in. Would you like Wonkle to deliver it to your flat, or have Marf pick it up?” she began.
“Either way works for me,” he replied, trying to keep his mind off his upcoming meeting with Hermione that night. He was hoping she was able to procure the boomslang skin that she predicted would have come in last Friday.

“Next,” Lavender soldiered on sunnyly, not noticing Severus’ distracted behavior, “everything is settled with the lawyers regarding Albert Dobmeir and his legal problems. The monies have been returned to Haymitch Spawn, Trevor's father. The judge, who took over the case from that dodgy arbitrator, has rendered a quick, fair, and equitable resolution to Albert's wife's will. The relatives are gone, and though my lawyers could not get all the Galleons that his wife's cousins pilfered, the judge did rule that they had to return three-quarters of the cost of the room and board they incurred.”

Severus hummed in acknowledgment absentmindedly. He had heard everything Miss Brown said and understood it, but his mind was elsewhere. He was happy for this news, it was just that his mind became more and more fixated in coming up with contingencies should the fluxweed prove to be unobtainable via the original plan. Tropical Storm Henri had swept through Georgia and the Carolinas over the weekend, and the full moon was tomorrow. He wondered how the fields fared.

“Also, I have purchased a place in Diagon Alley for the adult novelty store and was able to get it at a decent price. I signed the paperwork over the weekend, and crews are beginning the refurbishment today,” she announced with some small amount of smug triumph. “I'm having them work on the top floor first, making it into an office space. It should be done by the end of the week. Once it's done, I'll Obliviate everyone who worked on that office and cast a Fidelius Charm on the office as well, with me as the Secret Keeper.”

Severus was brought out of his reverie with the mention of a Secret Keeper. He had been listening, but Lavender had finally grabbed his attention, mostly. Now that his mind wasn't elsewhere, he finally noticed that Wonkle had brought a tray with his favorite nibbles with the tea service. He grabbed a jammy thumb biscuit before sitting back in his chair, giving Miss Brown his complete regard.

“You, Ginny, and Draco will be the only ones who'll know, besides me,” the witch continued, giving Severus a pointed glare that Hermione was not to be included in this part of the plan. “Once you are gone and safely wherever you have gone off to, I'll end the Fidelius Charm. But while it's in place, you and Ginny will be able to brew the Polyjuice Potion without the risk of being discovered while construction continues on the floors below you.”

“And getting there without being unobserved?” Severus interjected.
“Floo connection. From the research I've done on the Fidelius Charm, it will allow only those within the Secret Keeper's informed circle to know of or access the Floo.” Lavender gave a self-satisfied smile, knowing she had done her research beforehand to address nearly every conceivable possibility. “The Floo connection should be done either tomorrow or Wednesday, but I informed the construction crew to not use it once it's connected – not before I take care of memories and charms,” she added.

Nodding to himself, Severus checked some things off the list in his mind. “And have you and the Weasley twins come up with a name for this adult novelty store yet?” He didn't want to imagine the name he'd be calling out when Flooing to the office to work with Ginny. “And I thought the twins would also be buying the property jointly with you,” Severus added, concerned if – as co-property owners – the twins would wonder where their top floor space had gone. He questioned if Miss Brown was quick enough with a wand to Obliviate them both.

His employer's face suddenly looked pained as she placed her forehead in her hand, as it to ward off an impending headache. “One name the twins want to call it is 'The Wicked Witch,' which is wrong on so many levels.” Severus scrunched his eyes up in revulsion to the suggestion, recalling recent events. “It's so sophomoric,” she groaned, “besides, there is a strip club named that already.”

Severus forcefully shoved the memory of The Wicked Witch out of his head, as it was behind that particular strip club that Pansy Parkinson was found dead. “Well, what name do you suggest?”

“I was thinking something along the lines of 'Circe's Boudoir' or 'The Purple Rose,' but Draco came up with 'The Sirens' Secrets.'”

“That's it,” Severus jumped in. “It's subtle. It's alluring without being lurid.”

If Severus went through all that bother to create sex potions, he would at least like to know that they were being sold at an establishment that didn't sound like a strip club. He also didn't want a name from a trashy romance novel that some of his older clients were prone to quote from when describing the sexual favors they were searching for.

“That's just about what Draco said,” she admitted. “As for the twins, they were happy with my insistence to put the capital upfront for the property and have it titled in my name, since they are using their own capital invested to make most of the goods to stock the store. We're splitting the construction costs.

“But on to other business. Now that the male enhancement potion is done and the temporary hair dye will begin production in time for the Ministry Masked Ball, how is the edible body paint Severus really hated working on the edible body paint. He had done all that work using moonstone, which tasted like chalk no matter what he did, to finally come to the realization with Hermione's prompting that moonstone would not be the best ingredient to use. She pointed out that the moonstone could give away a person's feelings a little more honestly than they were willing to admit. Instead, body-temperature reactive body paint was a much better avenue to explore, with fewer complications and the chance of fewer disgruntled and unhappy customers. Between other last-minute interruptions, surprises, and creating the paper trail of Delgado's correspondence with his employer, Severus hadn't put much work into this latest potion.

“Honestly, not very well.” Gazing at the fire slowly burning in the fireplace grate, the Potions master knew what he would have to do, but he knew Miss Brown would not want to hear it. “I have to put this project down and step away from it temporarily. I need to let my mind get away from this and approach it anew once I've had a rest from it. Inspiration has usually struck when I've been stumped like this before.”

“And when do you anticipate your holiday,” she hinted delicately. “I hope you will have time to complete it beforehand. We are also looking at an opening date of December 6th, just in time for Christmas shopping season. It would not make or break the store should Mr. Dobmeir need to finish your work, or should you finish it after the store's opening, but I would prefer to have as many items available for the grand opening as possible,” she explained, hoping to let him know from a purely business perspective that she needed to know.

Draco had nagged him, despite being assured that he would be notified when there was an update on the procurement of each ingredient, but that didn't stop his incessant harping on the subject that vexed Severus. As much as he wanted to be short with Miss Brown, the Potions master held the sharpness of his tongue, as she only made mention of it when prompted by his mentioning.

“These things have a way of working themselves out,” he found himself saying, to his own chagrin. This was advice he could only fully believe in when it came to own his talents and the craft where Potions was concerned, but would scoff at if suggested to apply this philosophy to real-life experience in everything else.

~~~~~~~*~

Hermione found the drudgery of work to be a welcome escape from her home life. Since Ron was no longer working nights at The Listing Broom, he spent his evenings home now instead, when not going out to the occasional business dinner with Bascom Nettleton, owner of the Mercury Broom Company and the Chudley Cannons’ First String Keeper's new sponsor. Since he started going on muscle-enhancing potions, Ron's libido had reached the level of a rabid niffler in the middle of mating season. Even after coming home from a post-practice workout with the Mercury Broom's personal trainer, who was trying to get Ron beefed up and ready for their upcoming 2004 calendar shoot, the young wizard was ready for a tussle or two with his wife. Though his technique had not... improved much, his increased stamina in the bedroom merely meant that Hermione had to put up with shagging her husband for longer periods of time. And though since Severus had helped train her body to relax and she found orgasming to be a much easier pinnacle to reach, the increased frequency and prolonged act of Ron humping his wife into the mattress, or random piece of furniture, still proved to be tiresome to her. Her sexual indifference to her husband only made it more of a chore.

There was no passion in the act for Mrs. Weasley, as her love for him did not grow or develop into anything more intimate. She still resented Ron due to the knowledge that she caught him shagging another wizard, though Ron was none the wiser she was aware of this fact. Him fucking her was something to tolerate, an act that she must pretend to be ever grateful for, since Ron's previous lack of stamina had been an issue of contention for Hermione before. Knowing that a change in Ginny's bedroom behavior led to Harry's accurate suspicions of his own wife having an affair, Hermione kept up the act in order to avoid any perceivable deviations from her usual behavior.

So Monday night, Hermione stayed at work until it was time to go over to Severus' place.

As Severus opened the door, Hermione trudged in and straight into her lover’s arms, burying her head against his chest, with a sigh of relief escaping her lips now that she was in her sanctuary.

With a bit of mock overacting, Severus inhaled deeply. “Come straight from work, have we?” he asked jovially, trying to lighten the mood. “Hmm, what do I smell?” He inhaled deeply once more, exaggerating the sound. “Chinese Chomping Cabbage.” He sniffed again, burying his prominent nose into her hair, barely confined by a bedraggled braid. “Valerian, birch and...” He inhaled once more. “Exhaustion?”

He tilted her head up, a slight smile played upon his lips.

“Oh, Severus!” she whinged, before shuffling over to one of the wing back chairs to flop ungracefully into it. She dreaded this moment, but she figured it was best to get it over with so they could at least attempt to enjoy the rest of the evening together. “I couldn't get the boomslang skin.”

With her eyes closed, Hermione knit her brow together in discontentment as she emitted a small whimpering groan from the back of her throat.

Severus was a little insulted that she started out their evening with the news that she could not procure a needed ingredient for his plans. Granted, he had high hopes and expectations of her having gotten a hold of some boomslang skin, but it stung him a little that she threw that information out before even a proper kiss and greeting.
“Is that all you think I have to look forward to with your company?” Severus asked, trying not to sound bitter. “That ingredients are all I wish to see you for?” It was his initial desire just a few months back, but their relationship had changed so dramatically since then. The wizard moved to sit in the matching wing back chair next to her.

Hermione's brow became even more furrowed as she leaned forward to place her face in her hands in order to collect her thoughts before speaking.

After a deep cleansing breath, she lifted her hands away from her face and turned her tired countenance toward her lover.

“I'm sorry. I thought that I'd get this bit of bad news done and out of the way so we could move on and enjoy the rest of the evening together. It’s been hell since I left here last week, and I'm rather exhausted,” she explained, hoping to take away whatever slight Severus felt. “I know how you truly feel about me, and I know you're not using me. I just thought I could just get it off my chest right away since it's been bothering me all weekend.”

“What happened? Another catastrophe in the lab?” Severus asked in jest.

“Yes,” she replied flatly. “One of the shippers mixed up the labels for lemonite and sulfur.”

Severus hissed in response to this news, flinching, knowing what sort of damage that could result in.

Hermione continued ranting, “But that happened after I overslept for the first time in over four years on the job, and, additionally, Trevor showed initiative and showed up early to work for once and tested the boomslang before I even got there.” She let out yet another sigh of exasperation.

Chastising himself for keeping her up past midnight that Thursday as they tested the last of the male enhancement potion, Severus apologized, “I'm sorry I kept you awake as long as I did, then, the night before.”

Hermione cut him off before he could continue. “You weren't the reason I overslept. Ron was.”
Severus looked at her, a scowl growing upon his face. “Was he abusive to you again?”

“No, no, nothing like that. It's that damn potion he's taking,” she explained, exasperated just thinking about the hours of Ron rutting she had had to endure as of late.

Comprehension dawned on Severus’ face. And while Hermione was not being emotionally abused by her husband anymore, she still looked to be suffering from her husband’s attentions.

“At least if I was interested or enjoyed it, it wouldn't be such a chore. I mean the last time I showed any interest really at all in Ron was the night of my anniversary,” the witch rambled on.

Severus stared at her, his face an unreadable mask.

Hermione noted the odd and unsettling lack of expression on Severus' face, then went on to explain herself. “I had a drink at the Grand Royal Supper Club. A Blue Fairy Martini. It made me horny as hell – and I've no reason why as alcohol normally doesn't make me feel that way. That’s when I came on to him and he rebuffed me, and I was upset he rejected me. So, I came here that night upset and angry, out of revenge...” She trailed off with her hand gesturing that they both knew the rest of story.

Looking at the dark-haired wizard anew, she saw a smirk play at the corners of his mouth.

“What?” Considering how awful that night played out, she was confused as to why he was smirking.

“You had a Blue Fairy Martini and you don't know why you were 'horny as hell?’” Severus asked, looking more and more amused.

“Should I?” Hermione looked a little bewildered, too tired to hide her lack of knowledge or as to guess why.

“Do you know how they distill Fairy Brandy?” he asked, which was answered with a shake of her head. “First of all, you know that Himeros is a progeny of Aphrodite and is sibling to Eros, Anteros, and Pothos?”
Hermione nodded, trying to find the mental energy to fully pay attention. Normally she'd be alert, but the sound of Severus' low and sonorous voice coupled with her exhaustion was making her eyelids feel heavy.

“Can we have a bit of tea to wake me up before we continue? Your voice, your lovely deep voice, is lulling me to sleep. As fascinating as this is, you are making want to curl up and drop off,” she admitted unabashedly, too tired to be coy about how alluring she found his voice.

Marf gladly served up tea, and Severus waited until Hermione was more alert and ready to continue listening.

“As I was saying, you know about Himeros, the god of sexual desire and impetuous love, and his family,” Severus continued. Hermione nodded that she was alert and knew her basic Greek mythology. “Well, not much is generally known beyond that. However, in the Restricted Section I found an obscure Greek Potions tome that had a chapter covering a variety of emotions one could elicit with certain potions. They didn't create the emotions out of nowhere, but merely amplified any feelings that already existed, even if they were subconscious emotions the person was not consciously unaware of. So if one was slightly envious of a person, a potion could enhance that into full-blown jealous rage. Another potion might bring out feelings of admiration, another anger, which if used improperly could result in someone flying into a blind rage. In the chapter, I found a potion regarding sexual desire, and it included the use of Fairy Brandy.”

“So what you are saying is that an Amortentia may make one infatuated with an intended target you may have no attraction to at all, but a potion of sexual desire would merely increase the desire one already had for someone?” Hermione asked, seeking clarification.

“Yes.”

“Ahhhh,” she replied, suddenly understanding why she was attracted to her husband and repulsed by Alan, who had accosted her after Ron left that night. It also explained why Hermione felt inexplicably drawn to Severus' flat that night as well, besides having a revenge fuck.

“Himeros, as explained in this book, supposedly had an affair with a naiad named Langia who lived in the freshwater spring in Nemea, in southern Greece; because she was tied to that particular spring, Himeros went to live with her. Their issue were winged creatures, supposedly the first winged water faeries.” Severus paused to take a sip of tea and gauged Hermione's continued interest before going on with his explanation. “Now this may all be mythological conjecture put to paper, but on the slopes of the hills of Nemea is an ancient magical vineyard, hidden from Muggles, which is irrigated with the waters of Langia's spring. And in the Spring evenings, winged fairies – the supposed descendants of the Greek god of sexual desire, which are commonly mistaken as moths by the local Muggle population – pollinate the grape blossoms. Those grapes are then turned into wine, which through further distillation of their essence results in Fairy Brandy.”

A pained groan suddenly escaped Hermione’s lips. Embarrassed by the realization, she buried her face in her hands. “Urgh, Pete should have never served me that shot of Fairy Brandy,” she mumbled into her hands.

“Wait, you had a full shot of Brandy Fairy in your Blue Fairy Martini?” Severus queried. He was shocked she showed that much restraint as she did the night she showed up.

“No, I swung by The Listing Broom one night. Actually, it was the night I came over and realized who you were really were,” she confessed. “I was still terribly confused and conflicted by the end of our evening, so before going home I swung by the bar for a drink to settle my nerves and give me a little courage. Well, Pete – the barkeep who took over for Ron when he left – gave me a full shot of it when I asked for something strong.”

Severus snapped his mouth shut realizing his mouth had fallen open. “Either the clueless dolt had no idea what he was serving you, or he hoped to land you in his bed later that night,” he ground out, annoyed by the ignorance of the boy.

“No, I think it was ignorance, since he was rather new at bar keeping and recently just out of Hogwarts,” Hermione said, standing up for Pete's defense in absentia. “He probably failed his Potions O.W.L.s. Besides, I did fairly well in Potions and I still had no idea about Fairy Brandy.”

“So what happened to you with a full shot of Fairy Brandy?”

Hermione fidgeted in her seat uncomfortably. “Well the Blue Fairy Martini was only a quarter shot, mixed with vodka, vermouth, blueberry liqueur and passion fruit juice, and that was enough to get me in the mood for sure.”

Severus gave her a stern glare that he was not fooled by her evasive answer, but the effect was lessened by the curious quirk of one amusedly raised eyebrow.

Closing her eyes, as she was embarrassed enough from remembering it alone, she professed, with reluctance, “I got up onto the bar and started singing.”
He kept staring at her knowing she hadn't fully divulged everything.

“All right,” she huffed in defeat. “I started stripping my clothes off, too. It was a good thing Rogina, the pub owner’s wife, stepped in and stopped me when she did.”

Severus had a satisfied and somewhat predatory smile upon his lips when Hermione finally looked at him.

“Do you have a rather lovely pair of coconuts,” he purred.

“Gah!” Hermione buried her hands in her face one more time. “I was hoping you hadn't read about that post-N.E.W.T.s binge.”

“I lost several Galleons that year as I had bet it was going to be Seamus Finnigan who would have wound up on the front page of the Daily Prophet. There is always someone who goes on a royal bender and winds up being front-page news,” he confessed unabashedly.

Hermione really did want to crawl into a hole at the moment, as she was his student and Severus was her professor at the time of that infamous incident.

Slightly lost in thought, Severus recalled, “Minerva won the bet that year. I had to question whether she encouraged you or provided some of the liquor involved in the incident.”

Hermione was aghast now, looking at Severus with shock that not only did the staff bet on which student would do something phenomenally embarrassing enough to make front-page news, but that her own Head of House bet on her.

“Don’t look so shocked. You’d be surprised at what the staff at Hogwarts did, at least when I was there, to help break up the mind-numbingly mundane chores of teaching the same classes year after year, correcting mountains of scrolls of illegibly scribbled homework, and performing the other day-to-day duties we had,” the former professor explained. He suddenly desired a drop of something strong himself to help banish the memories that came flooding back from that period of his life.

Conceding that she really had never thought of her professors being equally bored as some of her classmates were with the rigors of studying and academia, Hermione felt a little bit more sympathetic towards Severus' years as a professor, more than she could initially appreciate until after having to train Trevor Spawn.

“So, you both bet on Gryffindors?”

“Yes, as Gryffindors, once properly pissed up to their eyeballs, are the only ones with enough fortitude to go ahead and do something outlandishly brave,” Severus went on, exaggerating the word with mocking air quotes.

“What, and no other House has students to be that foolish,” she retorted a bit tartly, the pride for her House slightly stung through this admission.

“Usually no,” Severus shot back, a bit smugly. “Ravenclaws are too smart to drink themselves that blisteringly blind. Hufflepuffs, if that drunk, tend to look out for one another and make sure their Housemates don't do anything too outrageous due in part to loyalty to one another. Slytherins try to engineer it so that if they do get that drunk, they're more discreet in their alcoholic-induced adventures; and if caught, they can at least bribe, Obliviate or blackmail their way out of it so that their exploits do not wind up in the Daily Prophet. Gryffindors, as a habit, tend to egg on the drunken party, convinced that it is characteristically brave to go ahead with some randomly suggested dare, or to go ahead with whatever drunken idea pops into their head.”

Hermione folded her arms, feeling as is some part of her character had been attacked and belittled. Severus never said she was a foolish drunk, but with a broad paintbrush, she felt that he painted her as one.

Knowing he had let his Slytherin pride be a bit too rough with his Gryffindor lover's dignity, he added, in hopes of thawing the distinct chill wafting from Hermione, “But be that as it may, Hufflepuffs are the biggest party poopers, ready to give up on a party in order to put in a good night's sleep than let loose. Ravenclaws usually prove to be a bunch of uptight arses, trying to figure out how much to drink without getting too drunk and tend to over-analyze everything. And never, well,” he paused, reaching across the space between his chair to gently squeeze Hermione's hand, “mostly never, with a few exceptions, Slytherins are not to be trusted around drunks since they will take advantage of the situation. Gryffindors, when it comes to drinking, can be fun and lively, and will not exploit a poor drunk sod. Their noble natures mean they can be a trusted friend to drink with,” Severus recalled. He remembered the many times he and Minerva, Sprout, Flitwick – his fellow Heads of House – would have several rounds of drinks at the end of the school year once the students had left on the Hogwarts Express; and what a good drinking companion the Head of Gryffindor was.

Hermione felt that that was the best apology he could give her for indirectly insulting her.
"And of these few exceptional Slytherins who can be trusted," the circumspect witch asked, "can you name anyone who should, or can, be trusted?"

Severus got out of his chair to stand before Hermione, offering his hand to help her out of her chair. "There is one particular Slytherin I can name whom I think you can trust, considering he trusts you completely."

Hermione placed her hand in his. She allowed him to pull her up out of her chair and back into his arms in a post-bickering embrace, despite how tired she still felt and would have preferred to keep sitting.

"Can I trust this Slytherin to make sure that if I fall asleep, that I'll at least get out the door at a decent time tonight?" Then with an exasperated huff, she added, "Not that that would do any good if my husband is waiting to jump my bones again the moment I walk through the door."

"Short of a Sleeping Draught, I don't know how to stop or curtail it. And if I complain about too much sex, then that's a risk of making him suspicious, since I complained he didn't have enough stamina before." She tilted her head up, eyes pleading, "Any suggestions?"

"Have you eaten dinner?"

Hermione nodded, explaining she brought her lunch and dinner to work that day.

"Then let's discuss some possibilities while taking a bath," he suggested, unable to stomach the discordant aroma of different ingredients commingling on her person.

~~~~~~~*~

The bath was commodious, large enough for both to comfortably fit without being cramped. Hermione sat in between his legs and let Severus lather her hair, luxuriating in the feeling of his long and nimble fingers massaging her scalp. She reveled in the intimacy of the moment, closing her eyes and trying to engrave the moment in her mind – the feeling of Severus’ chest against her back as he breathed in and out, the contours of bone and tendon as she rested her hand on his knee, the black hairs on his pale legs.

"So you say just a few drops of Sopophorous bean oil, mixed with a regular oil like almond oil or olive oil, will make a person drop off to sleep?"
“Yes, and applied during massage it will knock him out, but not suddenly like a Sleeping Draught would do. It will appear to be a natural reaction to the soothing touch of a massage,” Severus finished explaining.

Hermione was about to drop off in the bath to Severus’ soothing touch herself. “Are you sure you didn’t use any on me, because I could fall asleep right here, right now,” she murmured.

Nudging her forward off his chest, he filled the dipper with water. She tilted her head back and he rinsed the lather from her hair. The weight of the water pulled her hair long and straight against her back, and it tickled his lower abdomen and caressed his thighs.

Severus moved her hair aside before grabbing a bar of soap and washing her skin from the pungent scents that still clung to her. Hermione drew her knees to her chest and rested her cheek upon her knee, relaxing under her lover’s tender ministrations.

“Is there anything else I can do to get him to stop humping me like a dog with a leg?”

“You’re fairly knowledgeable about Potions ingredients. What other ingredients can you think of that might help him to sleep, or relax him so much as to counter the libido side effects of his potions?” he prompted her.

“Lavender...”

Severus hummed in agreement for her to go on.

“Eschscholzia californica.”

“But what parts of Eschscholzia californica?” he prompted her.

“The aerial parts.”

“Yes, very good. What else?”
“Lemon balm, valerian, motherwort, red clover, Anthemis nobilis and catnip.”

Severus filled the dipper once more and rinsed her back, then coaxed her to lean back against his chest as he started soaping her arms.

“You forgot another one, passion flower,” he added.

“Passion flower? I thought it was used more in love potions than as a sedative,” Hermione countered.

“It can be used for both. Anxiety can hinder arousal, while relaxation is conducive to arousal,” he expounded, as his lather-filled hands moved across Hermione's shoulders to begin slowly massaging her breasts.

Hermione, feeling simultaneously drowsy and aroused at the same moment, could appreciate the logic of Severus’ explanation, and arched her back in response. A throaty chuckle came from the back of his throat, turning Hermione on even more. In response to Hermione aching for his touch, he lightened his attentions even more, delicately playing with her nipples which were quickly turning into firm peaks from his gentle teasing. A mewling plea came from her, as she arched her back even more trying to press her breasts more firmly into his soapy hands.

“Now,” he continued, hoping to continue their discussion while she was under a lust-filed fog. “How could one create a potion and discreetly administer it to someone unsuspectingly, in your situation.” For effect, he lightly flicked the tips of her nipples making her gasp at the pleasurable effect it had.

Hermione could only whine for Severus to continue.

“Now, now, how can one train to be a Potions mistress without being able to think under stressful conditions,” he murmured into her ear, continuing his attentions to her breasts. “How can. You slip him. A potion. Without. Him. Noticing.” he said, pausing every few words to play with Hermione’s nipples in order to tease her into trying to think while distracted.

Hermione stuttered a few incoherent vowels out before finding her tongue. “Um, in his juice at night?”
“And does he drink the same juice at breakfast?” Severus asked.

“Yes,” she gasped as one of Severus' hand slipped from her breasts and slipped down her stomach to cup her mons.

“Then how would you ensure he wouldn't drink it in the morning?” he prodded her into thinking, while also slipping a finger between her folds to start stroking her clitoris.

“I... I... I'd have to serve up the juice myself and slip it in?” she answered questioningly, since she was having great difficulty thinking at all.

“Yes, and how long do you think that will work until he catches on?”

“A couple times,” she moaned distractedly as her hips began rocking in time to the motion of Severus' hand.

Severus started having trouble concentrating as well as Hermione's movements were inadvertently stroking his now rock-hard erection against her back. A little repositioning and he could easily bury himself in her.

“So how else could one slip him a sedative?” he growled, trying to remain in control.

“Face cream.”

“What?”

The water in the tub started sloshing back and forth vigorously, splashing over the sides and onto the tile floor.

“Face cream!” Hermione fought to shout out. “He's using face creams at night to improve his skin before his photo shoot.”
Normally Severus would have given a derisive snort over the vanity of a man using night creams, but he was busy concentrating on the intellectual grilling of Hermione during his seduction of her.

“Does he have one he only uses at night?”

“Yes!”

Severus grabbed her hips to guide her up and slipped his own hips beneath her before guiding himself into her.

“Yes!” Hermione continued to shout, in response to Severus' last questions and in encouragement of what he was doing to her physically.

The water in the tub was now splashing violently over the sides as they rocked together, Severus' hands guiding her hips.

“And... And...” Severus gasped. ‘Fuck it all, I'll finish the lesson later,’ he thought before fully concentrating on the current task at hand.

Feeling relaxed, and yet also equally refreshed, Hermione used a towel to dry her hair before she would use a spell to finish drying it before going home. Severus was lying in his bed next to her, his eyes heavy.

“I can't drug him every night, as much as I'd like to,” Hermione admitted with resignation. “And then there is the question of the success of your male enhancement potion.” She swiveled her shoulders around to regard Severus. “If the male enhancement potion is similar to the effects I'm having to suffer through myself from Ron, then you might wind up with a bunch of witches trying to drug their husbands and lovers too.”

Severus blinked owlishly, suddenly feeling more alert with this fact Hermione pointed out. Realization that a bunch of non-interested witches putting up with unwanted amorous advances – well, it finally dawned on him that it was a problem.

Continuing with her current tangent of thought, she added, “But if you sold the male enhancement potion along with Blue Fairy Martinis, then women getting bored with their husbands' extra attentions wouldn't be an issue. They'd be just as eager for a good shag as well.”

Now Severus was sitting up, his mind quickly changing gears from blissful post-climax to Potions master mode. “What did you say was in that Blue Fairy Martini?”

“Quarter-shot of Fairy Brandy, Siberian vodka, vermouth, blueberry liqueur, and passion fruit juice,” she replied, suddenly remembering that she herself wondered if the passion fruit juice mixed with the Fairy Brandy was the impetus of her lust that night. Recalling Severus' recommendation for passion flower, she asked, “How does passion flower and passion fruit juice differ in their properties? You suggested passion flower for putting Ron to sleep, but the Blue Fairy Martini has passion fruit juice?”

Sitting forward now, his mind alert, he said, “Well, passion flower is good for sedatives, something I'm sure you've tested in your job, while the juice of the fruit is a much milder sedative, but with aphrodisiac properties. It's like oysters and chocolate; it's an ingredient to be used in aphrodisiacs, but is primarily imported as a food item so it is something that would not have come through your department for testing. Passion fruit juice would act as an enhancing agent for the Fairy Brandy, magnifying sexual desire one has already possessed.”

This made sense to Hermione and confirmed her hunch that the passion fruit juice coupled with the Fairy Brandy did arouse her desire -- what little she did have left at the time -- for her husband.

Severus rose from his bed and put on his dressing gown as Hermione finished drying her hair with a charm before getting dressed to go home.

Once dressed and her cloak placed upon her shoulder, Severus held Hermione, tipping her chin up to view her face as he tentatively spoke, “I would have to speak with Miss Brown, but I think she would be eager to agree to my suggestion of a new potion. If she agrees, would you like to work on a new potion with me? A female libido enhancing potion?”

Hermione smiled broadly. “I would love to. And who says it has to be for females only?” she added, remembering how Ron had not been in the mood at times when she was in need of a good shag and they had been fighting.

Severus recollected Hermione's laments about her being spurned. “Yes, indeed.”
Even though Hermione would be coming back over to his flat in three nights, it was no less difficult for either to say good night to the other. Kisses were slow and languid, unhurried in their fashion knowing that they'd eventually have to stop.

“I'll send an owl to you in the hand of Sebastian Degaldo with a list of ingredients to bring, in addition to the usual cauldron, utensils and implements we might need,” he informed her, speaking softly into her hair as they gave their final embrace of each other.

“Oh, darling,” Hermione sighed with a lighthearted gibe, “it's so sexy when you talk Potions.”

“Be careful, or I might have to give you a detention with that cheeky attitude,” he threw back at her in a matching tone.

“Will detention involve spankings?”

“Only if you're very good.” Severus held her at arm’s length, gently pushing her away. “Be gone, temptress, before you make me ravish you again.”

Hermione laughed lightly, realizing this was the first time they had sexually joked about their previous relationship as student and professor.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 54 A/N: The title inspired by Lewis Carroll's “The Walrus and The Carpenter” poem from the section: "The time has come," the Walrus said, "To talk of many things: Of shoes--and ships--and sealing-wax-- Of cabbages--and kings-- And why the sea is boiling hot-- And whether pigs have wings."

Langia is a genus of moths in the Sphingidae family. Yes, it is primarily a species located in Eastern Asia, but who is to say that the magical issue of a Greek god and water naiad would bother to follow the whims of taxonomists.

Eschscholzia californica is the Latin name for California poppy. The “aerial parts” refers to all parts of the plant above ground.

Anthemis nobilis is Roman Chamomile. “Both Roman and German chamomile have excellent calming properties, but Roman chamomile is more effective for irritation, impatience and feeling disagreeable, and has great value in treating PMS and other menstrual and menopausal problems, while German chamomile is superbly effective on the skin, not only to soothe and calm, but to heal and for tissue regeneration.”

http://www.essentialoils.co.za/essential-oils/chamomile.htm
“Green-Eyed Monsters, Fairies and Sirens”

Chapter Summary

Hermione and Severus continue on with their experimentation. Now it's Severus' turn to learn something new.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Fifty-Five
“Green-Eyed Monsters, Fairies and Sirens”

Disclaimer: Doth Harry Potter and its legal courtly entourage belong to aye? Nay, verily I protest, with most sincere of heart, that yon intellectual property pertaining to Harry Potter, including its tender concepts and chattel, thus belong to that of Mistress Rowling, the story’s enchantress.

============

Miss Brown was not as pleased as Severus had hoped. Here he was, offering up a new potion, a libido-enhancing potion, to compliment the male enhancement potion; it was something that should certainly sell very well, and yet she was looking more aggrieved than pleased. The source of his employer's testiness could have been partially due to the fact that Severus had informed her that the potion was Hermione's idea; however, it could also be because Severus mentioned to her that he would have Hermione help develop the potion at his flat instead of at The Lovely Lavender Company headquarters. A mention of five percent royalties to Hermione did not seem to improve her mood either.

“Don't tell me that you're jealous of Hermione,” Severus inferred.

“What?!?” yelled Lavender with a bit more force than she meant. “Why would I be jealous of her?” Miss Brown began to pace about her office as she barked, “WONKLE! Tea! Now!”

“Maybe because I am working with her on a potion without you. That you feel supplanted. I would think you'd be glad you'd have one less product in need of development requiring your precious time, freeing you up in order to work on other potions in time for the opening of Sirens' Secrets.” He surveyed her face for any sign that might confirm or counter his deduction.
"I just don't like the fact that you've been talking business with her behind my back without consulting me first," she snapped.

"As I mentioned before, Hermione was the one who pointed out that, in light of her own experience and perspective, maybe not all those witches will view a significant increase of their husband's libido as something to cheer about and may find the act of coitus with their spouse a more bothersome bit of prolonged drudgery to endure," Severus bit out, trying not to snarl at his boss. "Hermione is not the first witch to complain of such problems. I've had plenty of other witches before her compare their husband's carnal efforts to be on par with scrubbing cauldrons, some witches even saying the act itself is much like a scrub brush abrading an empty pot that hasn't had a fire lit under it for ages."

"You know, there are plenty of witches out there who are happy fucking their husbands, and are not so miserably mismatched in the bedroom," Lavender groused, sounding like a petulant child, as she poured herself a cup from the service Wonkle had discreetly brought in.

"True enough, and there are plenty of wizards who have the stamina of a bull, but that isn't stopping us from selling the male enhancement potion, and your argument should not stop us from developing an arousal potion," the Potions master countered. "I never said this potion was to be for females exclusively either, because it would work for wizards as well. I'm sure there are a few witches who would like to put their husbands in a more amorous mood at times, not just ready and hard like a stud for service."

His employer said nothing but continued to sip her tea.

Severus wondered what else was going on in her mind that would make her so hostile in light of progress.

"Whatever issues you have with Mrs. Weasley, I suggest you iron them out," he insisted. "When I'm gone, she will be Dobmeir's apprentice, and she will be underfoot everyday. However, if you place your faith in Dobmeir to work without your supervision, you won't be confined to the lab, since he is under no restrictions as I am, therefore leaving you free to work on other areas of your business to which you have been unable to give as much attention. But your paths will cross frequently, so whatever it is about her that abrades your nerves, you'd better deal with it before her apprenticeship begins."

The normally unflappable Miss Brown gave Severus a worried look before schooling her features. "I'm sorry, Severus. There has just been so much change going on lately. I guess I'm used to being involved from beginning to end of all aspects of all my products. I feel a little out of place that" some aspects of the male enhancement potion, and now this libido potion, have been discussed and worked on without me there the whole time. I’m used to being in control of everything.”

Severus set down his cup of tea. “When I first became Head of Slytherin House, I had a great many things to do in addition to teaching Potions. Professor Dumbledore taught me that being able to delegate to the right people would allow me to be a better Head of House to my students. I had to learn to trust and utilize the Head Boy and Head Girl and the Slytherin Prefects. Just as Dumbledore could not do everything,” Severus said, and paused dramatically, rolling his eyes for effect as he continued with a sarcastic drawl, “despite his outward appearance that he could do and know everything, he delegated many thing to the Head of each House, and each Head of House delegated certain duties to free us up to tend to more important matters. As such, you must learn to delegate and decide over what you can give up control, and what you must attend to personally.”

Lavender chucked the other half of her uneaten biscuit in the fire. Sighing, she agreed, “You’re right, Severus. But I do wish you to leave the business of royalties to me. You didn't have to promise her five percent. And instead of having Hermione go shopping for materials, give me the list, as I can get them at wholesale and have Wonkle deliver them to your flat. The less paper trail Hermione leaves before she officially begins her apprenticeship, the better.”

“I didn't mention any royalties, nor promise her any for this potion. But since she was the one who originally came up with the idea on her own, without my prompting, it is only fair that she should have a share of the profits.” On the other matter, Severus could see the logic behind having Lavender provide the materials for the research and development phase.

Severus was almost certain he could hear Miss Brown grind her teeth, but it could have also been the sound of the floor creaking as well, as he shifted position in his seat.

“Just make sure that you don't inadvertently do any Potions brewing on your own, and she takes all her equipment home. Marf can deliver samples here,” she instructed, much to Severus’ chagrin as he felt it was beyond bloody obvious after so many years that he'd never do anything so foolish as to slip up so carelessly.

“I hope I can accomplish that simple task after years of restraining myself here in your labs. I wouldn't want to inadvertently slip up in my own home,” Severus uttered acerbically, ignoring the withering glare she gave him for being the target of his sarcasm. “Now if you will excuse me, I have to prepare for Mrs. Fudge's arrival.”

As a parting shot, in addition to having the last word, Lavender snipped at his back as he left her office, “Next time you go to the spa, you should have the elves trim your hair. You're getting a bad case of split ends.”
As much as it thrilled him to stick around and be the emotional whipping boy for his employer's irrationally foul mood, it was more prudent and enjoyable to prepare himself mentally for a long afternoon with a formidable chess partner and even more challenging conversational sparring with a fellow Slytherin.

---

Hermione was a little disappointed that she didn't have to go shopping for materials, as indicated in Severus' letter to her, under his nom de guerre, but it was a relief. She had skipped her period and was stressed enough – until confirming with a simple charm that she was indeed not pregnant yet again – without having the additional task of hunting down and buying ingredients. The letter did contain a list of equipment to bring, and though she would have remembered to bring her mortar and pestle and a sieve, she would not have thought to bring her chinois. She fortunately had one, so she didn't have to go out and procure one.

Ron had gone out drinking and schmoozing the night before with Bascom Nettleton, so that gave her the chance to get everything together without him asking questions or trying to hump her in the kitchen again. She just hoped that when Ron made dinner for himself Thursday night, he would not wonder where a few of the cooking implements or some of the choice knives had gone. With a simple shrinking charm, Hermione was able to fit all the equipment into the inner pocket of her cloak and not alter the way it hung about her shoulders.

When Hermione arrived at Severus' flat, she greeted him with much more enthusiasm than the Monday prior. She was rested and did not have to endure any Trevor-induced catastrophes at her work that week. So far.

Severus served up a simple dinner that was ready when Hermione arrived. A kettle of fish chowder was slowly simmering on the stove, and a large loaf of crusty bread, fresh from the oven, rounded out the meal. It was simple yet hearty fare that would keep her full of energy for the night of work that lay ahead. They didn't dawdle as they supped, but chatted about what first they would need to do before beginning on the libido-enhancing potion.

Once dinner was finished, under Severus’ instruction, Hermione began preparing an anaphrodisiac tincture she could administer to herself and Severus, should they be overwhelmed by the effects of the potion they were working on. The reverse engineering of Ron's muscle-enhancing potion made it clear that antidotes should be prepared ahead of time, just in case. Severus wasn't sure if his table was durable enough for another bout of unrestrained rigorous shagging.

A mixture of mint, cilantro and finely chopped black licorice was macerated with plain vodka before being strained, and then the blood of an Arctic mongoose was added to the mixture. Severus had used a similar mixture as an antidote when he and Miss Brown were working on the male enhancement potion and both felt the effect of the vapors. Fairy Brandy was different from Ashwinder eggs, but he was sure that this tincture would also make an adequate antidote for their research tonight. And if that failed, Miss Brown supplied a box of bezoars.

Once the antidote was complete, Hermione began halving and scooping out the seeds and jelly-like flesh of the passion fruit, straining the juice through the chinois to collect in a bowl below, leaving behind a sticky mash of seeds and pulp in the strainer. Next, under the direction of Severus, she went on to grind almonds, chop figs, crush dried rose petals, mince fresh rose petals, pulverize to powder dried pomegranate seeds, juice fresh pomegranates, and prepare a smattering of other ingredients that Severus thought might increase the effectiveness of the potion, starting with a base of passion fruit juice and Fairy Brandy.

With an array of prepared ingredients before them, Hermione and Severus began their experiment.

“First we should start with a mix of Fairy Brandy and passion fruit juice to feel the effects of the Blue Fairy Martini,” Severus began.

“What about the vodka, vermouth, and blueberry liqueur?” Hermione queried.

“The vodka adds nothing, since the Fairy Brandy already has alcohol in it. The vermouth was to sweeten the taste, and the blueberry liqueur may or may not affect it, but we can always research that later tonight if need be,” he explained.

“Since it had a quarter-shot, and a shot is twenty-five mL, a quarter-shot would be six-point-two-five mL. A teaspoon is five mL, so I would say start with one teaspoon?” She raised a questioning face to her mentor.

“That would be a good start. And how much passion fruit juice would you say your martini had?” he asked, encouraging her to continue.

“I would say it was a four- to five-ounce glass,” Hermione began recalling. “Subtract about one ounce for the Fairy Brandy, vermouth and blueberry liqueur combined, and two ounces for the vodka. So that would leave two to three ounces for the passion fruit juice, but since it was shaken and nicely chilled, I would say possibly up to an ounce of that was melted ice from the mixing process. So I would recommend starting with two ounces,” she concluded.

“Very well, begin.” Severus extended his arm out, indicating that she should proceed.
After measuring the Fairy Brandy and passion fruit juice into a small glass, Hermione held it up to the light. It was an unappetizing orange-brown color, as the Fairy Brandy had darkened the color of the fruit juice and given it an oxidized color resembling fruit that had started to turn bad.

“Well? Bottoms up,” said Severus, suppressing a chuckle, aware what would happen next. He would finally know what it was like to be on the other end of the master-apprentice relationship, remembering how Reginald Chuff made Severus drink all his own experiments first.

Hermione tipped the glass up to her lips and drained it in one go.

Watching her face carefully, Severus noticed the sudden dilation of the pupils, the warm rosy glow spreading across her cheeks, the change when her eyes suddenly became heavily lidded, and the way she began to regard Severus hungrily.

“What effects do you feel compared to the Blue Fairy Martini?” he asked, trying to remain impassive as Hermione slunk over towards him with a sly predatory smirk upon her lips.

“Not as tipsy,” she mused as she began toying with his buttons, “but just as aroused.” Boldly, she grabbed hold of Severus' zipper and pulled it down.

Before she could continue her seduction, Severus gently cupped her cheek and whispered silkily, “Close your eyes.”

When Hermione's eyes slipped shut and her lips parted ready for a kiss, Severus put a dropper full of the antidote into Hermione's mouth. With a sputter, she choked it down.

“Gah!” Hermione bent over and swore like Mundungus Fletcher. “I hate the taste of black licorice!” A violent shudder then suddenly shook Hermione to the core. “And that antidote is like being hit with an ice shower. What a way to kill the mood.”

“That was the point,” Severus reminded her. “We need to work on something small, potent, and not the color of troll vomit.” Looking at the bowl of remaining passion fruit juice, he suggested, “Perhaps if we reduced it through simmering, that might make it a smaller dose to handle.”

“The taste was fine, but the color is disgusting,” Hermione added. “Will cooking the juice change the flavor, color, or potency?”
“Only one way to find out.”

Hermione then measured out one cup of the juice and reduced it slowly in a pot she brought herself, simmering it down to one-half cup. With it reduced, she used half as much juice and the same amount of Fairy Brandy.

The color seemed to intensify with reduction, but the color was still unappetizing when mixed with the Fairy Brandy, which had a vibrant blue-green color.

“The flavor is a little more intense,” the lust-crazed witch began, “but I bet it still doesn't taste as good as your cock in my mouth right now.” Hermione whipped out her wand, and before Severus could disarm her, she dropped his pants with the intention of getting on her knees and performing fellatio right then and there.

The wizard who had once easily disarmed Gilderoy Lockhart in a duel, did not anticipate Hermione using her wand on him in such a sexually aggressive manner. Granted, it would have been fun to let her eagerly wrap her lips around his stirring cock, but this was a time for work, not play. Severus would have plenty of time to have Hermione test out how long the potion would last once they figured out potency, taste, color, texture and viscosity.

“Expelliarmus.” Severus hitched up his pants with one hand, while holding Hermione's wand and his wand in the other.

Once disarmed, Severus had to pin Hermione up against a wall to force another dose of antidote down her gullet, which was a little difficult considering she was trying to kiss him desperately.

While Hermione was easily overpowered by Severus’ height and strength, he wished he could use a binding spell, but alas, binding spells were among the many spells he was prohibited from using due to the Death Eater Decree. Severus’ old Potions master had used a binding spell on him plenty of times to make him sit or lie still while pouring the antidote down his throat.

Once again, Hermione protested at the taste of the antidote before finishing with another uncontrollable convulsion.

“I don't remember you being this rambunctious the night you showed up at my flat,” the Potions master noted bemusedly. “And I don't think you were quite as frisky with your husband in such a public space at the Grand Royal Supper Club.”

Grabbing a napkin to dab the drop of antidote that didn't make it into her mouth, Hermione replied with a scowl upon remembering that night, “First of all, you said this potion would amplify feelings one already has. I am far, far more attracted to you than I am to my own husband. Second, being rejected by Ron was not exactly an antidote, but certainly kicked down my attraction to him afterwards. Third,” she continued to tick off possible reasons why she was more restrained that night, “running into that twat, Alan, certainly put a bit of a damper on my mood, crushing some of the potency even more.”

“Alan?”

“The berk from the Three Broomsticks, who came on to me after Ron left, and that Viktor had to rescue me from.”

Severus acknowledged that he now recalled the incident, and signaled for her to continue.

“Fourth, I was nervous as hell when I came over that night. Nervousness, you have mentioned before, can hinder libido. And last, I think the vodka, vermouth or blueberry liqueur, or a combination of them, lessens the effect. It also could be that we have done the deed and therefore I feel far less inhibition in terms of being sexually assertive,” Hermione surmised. “Shall I try a Blue Fairy Martini to see if the effect is the same as just the passion fruit juice and Fairy Brandy alone?”

“It's the only way to be sure,” he agreed.

Severus had restocked his bar and had all the necessary ingredients on hand should they need to make a proper Blue Fairy Martini as part of the potion testing process.

After closely recreating the cocktail, Hermione placed a bluebell flame atop of the concoction.

“You didn't mention a bluebell flame,” Severus said, a bit shortly.

“Sorry,” Hermione apologized meekly. “There were many things that night I have tried to put out of my head. It slipped my mind. Will it affect anything except burn off alcohol?”
Severus wondered. “We’ll try it with the bluebell flame and then without.”

As the night wore on, small variations were tried. The first variation discovered was that the bluebell flame did lessen the effect of the Fairy Brandy, which was good news, as Fairy Brandy was an expensive ingredient so less would be needed to be effective in the final potion. Hermione was certainly aroused, but much more in control of her senses and her hands. Another variation resulted in the discovery that the blueberry liqueur made Hermione feel more energized, which made it all the more difficult for Severus to pin Hermione down to give her another dose of the antidote. After each Blue Fairy Martini variation, Hermione swallowed a vial of Sobering Potion so that each new trial resulted in observations based on a clean and sober test subject.

Eventually, they had worked out a routine where – before she took the next trial potion – Hermione would bind herself to a chair, leaving one hand free and then handing her wand over to Severus. The Potions master would then hand her the latest test batch, get a verbal comment on her present state of mind and level of arousal, give her the antidote, and then give her back her wand to free herself before preparing the next batch. It was tiresome and made the process go slower than Severus would have preferred, but he had to be vigilant in his actions so he could truthfully answer he had not engaged in brewing any potions or confess anything illegal, when subjected to another round of Veritaserum under Moody's supervision at his weekly parole meeting.

By the end of the night they had figured out that powdered pomegranate seeds and fresh pomegranate juice were just as effective as the blueberry liqueur in terms in increasing energy, and made the mixture a more appetizing rosy color instead of the weird blue-gray color produced by mixing the blueberry liqueur with the orange-colored passion fruit juice. Almonds made the mixture feel gritty in the mouth and added nothing in terms of arousal or taste, and coriander did invoke more lustful feelings, but ruined the taste. The powdered hooves of the Mooncalf made Hermione want to dance, and the dried tongue of a turtle dove made Hermione sing about her desires. It was the addition of a pinch of powdered mother of pearl that Severus thought they might have come across something really interesting and unique. The ingredient was used in some love potions, so he wanted to see what would happen if it was used in an arousal potion.

When Hermione drank the potion containing Fairy Brandy, fresh pomegranate juice, reduced passion fruit juice and the powdered mother of pearl, she displayed the expected dilated pupils, heavy-lidded eyes, and licking of lips. What Severus did not expect was that there was an alluring glow about Hermione that he was having a hard time to resist. Each breath Hermione drew pulled his eyes to her chest, bound tightly under her own spell. Her skin took on a lustrous color that made Severus want to stroke her skin longingly. Her eyes took on a positively hypnotic quality about them. Upon realizing that the potion not only was affecting Hermione, but him as well, Severus quickly handed the object of his growing desire a vial of antidote before he would succumb as well.

“Oops, I seemed to have dropped it,” Hermione purred with false sincerity as she intentionally let Severus didn't react to the shattering of the glass vial on the floor.

The voice that came out of Hermione seemed to place a fog over Severus' mind. All he could think about was holding Hermione in his arms and making love to her until his last breath escaped him.

“Hand me my wand, Severus,” she bid him.

Severus was about to do as she commanded when he suddenly shook his head violently in order to help break this lull he had fallen into. With all his fortitude, he forced his mind back to the present: he grabbed another dose of antidote and poured it down Hermione's throat before she could speak again.

Once the antidote took effect, Severus felt the potion's power lose hold over him.

Hermione came back to her senses as well with a rather stunned look on her face that bordered on bewilderment.

“Whoa. That was unexpected,” she exclaimed. “Did the potion affect you, or was I imagining that?”

“You were not imagining that. That is a rarity for a potion to affect people other than those who took it themselves.” The shaken Potions master was surprised that the mother of pearl would react in such a way with the ingredients. When it was included in love potions, it never created an effect in anyone but the imbiber.

This was something revolutionary and new; then again, it may not be new, but considered so dangerous as to have been buried away in ancient books, hidden from witches and wizards who would use such knowledge carelessly. One could claim that love potions were currently being hawked at Weasleys' Wizard Wheezes, much to Severus' chagrin. Also, one could counter that the Dark Lord was the issue from a witch who had recklessly used a love potion on a Muggle, resulting in a twisted orphaned child who rose to power to use magic wantonly and without conscience.

Hermione understood the importance of Severus' cautiousness. He looked a bit frightened by the power of the potion they had created and the fact he’d almost succumbed to it, but there was a hint of excitement in his face that he discovered something he had never read about before.

“How was this different from previous batches?” he queried, looking for any change from previous variations, besides his own affects.

Trying to find the words, Hermione began, “Everything was the same as in the last previous batch, but...” She paused, closing her eyes to recollect that fleeting and indescribable feeling that was different this time. “When I took the previous potions, as much as I was turned on and aroused, I was aware that you could not fall for my attempts to seduce you, try as I might and hoped, before you gave me the antidote. But with this latest batch, I felt more confident. It was as if you couldn't resist me and I knew you were enthralled.”

There was a moment of silence while both thought of the implications of such a potion, before Severus finally remembered to give Hermione her wand back to free herself.

“If this potion only amplified feelings that are already felt by the imbiber, would the addition of mother of pearl also only affect those who are already attracted to the imbiber?” she asked, wondering the same thing Severus was contemplating. “And if the amount we used was this incredibly potent, perhaps the use of a much smaller portion of the mother of pearl should be used instead.”

Severus considered a trial using himself, Draco, and Ginny in the room. If Ginny drank it and only Draco was affected, it would confirm Hermione's hypothesis.

Now free from her own bindings, Hermione inspected the jar of powdered mother of pearl. “This doesn't say where this was harvested from or what type of oysters,” she noted with disappointment. Curious, Hermione had a feeling she might be able to determine its origins.

After cleaning her cauldron and drying it, she took a pinch of the powdered mother of pearl, added some white vinegar and brought it to a slow simmer.

Severus watched quietly, noting the steps Hermione was taking to test the ingredient using the addition of some dried whole red rose petals they hadn't crushed earlier that night. Hermione extinguished the flame under her cauldron and dipped a few rose petals in the cooling liquid before laying them out on the table for inspection.
“I thought so!” the triumphant witch exclaimed. “See how the iridescence breaks up into individual colors, as light through a prism?” Severus leaned the table over to observe the phenomenon Hermione was describing. “If this was regular mother of pearl, it would not do this; the iridescence would not break into a rainbow pattern. This particular mother of pearl does break into a rainbow prism, which means this is mother of pearl harvested off the Italian island of Capri.”

Amazed she was able to discern the origins of this particular mother of pearl, Severus asked, “How were you able to discern the specific locale of this mother of pearl?”

Hermione gave Severus a small smirk of her own before explaining, “Because, this is the mother of pearl the twins use in their love potion. And I know this because I’m the one that told the twins about the potency of this particular mother of pearl.”

She sat back down in her chair before continuing. “Ron and I went on a two-week honeymoon to Italy. While there, I wanted to go to Capri and see the Sirens off the coast – while wearing ear protection, of course. So while we were in Capri, we ate at this little restaurant owned by a wizard who harvests the oysters from the same bed that the Sirens eat from. And on the cliffs above the oyster beds is a grove of limes, from which the blossoms of limes drift into the sea. After a dinner of the Sirens’ oysters and lime-ade perfumed with lime blossoms, you can imagine the night I had afterwards.” Hermione trailed off, not bothering to elaborate on the heightened amorous feelings they experienced, even if the sex was still mediocre.

Severus sat heavily down in his chair while digesting the implications of mother of pearl gathered from the same oysters the Sirens ate from, as well as the addition of a lime grove next to the oyster bed's locale. He remembered the use of lime blossoms for lust when he was still experimenting for the male enhancement potion. “But how did you know how to test it?” he queried. “When I was working there years ago, there was only one type of mother of pearl shipped in at the time.”

“See, after ingesting the oysters and feeling its aphrodesial effects, I asked the restaurant owner about them. He proceeded to tell me about the magical properties of the oysters – and how they are very popular with honeymooning couples – and the mother of pearl from these oysters. He sold a few of the shells to some local women who ground up the mother of pearl into beauty powders, but not enough to use up all the shells he piled up. So, knowing the twins use mother of pearl in their love potions, I brought some shells home and gave them to the twins; they were so happy with the results they opened up an exclusive trade with the restaurant owner, buying up all his shells. The twins told me how to test for this particular mother of pearl's purity to compare with regular mother of pearl, as the owner showed them when they went to Italy to broker the deal. So when a box of this comes through, I use vinegar and rose petals and watch for the prismatic reaction to ensure it actually is Caprese mother of pearl.

“But if the twins have an exclusivity of this ingredient, how did you get some of it?” Hermione asked.
Both their faces alighted upon the same thought.

“Miss Brown and her 'secret partners,’ no doubt,” he drawled, referring to how his employer referred to the twins when first discussing her business arrangement with them.

“The twins told me Caprese mother of pearl costs twice as much, but is eight times as potent as regular mother of pearl.” Hermione got up and looked at the measuring spoons she used. “We used a pinch of this for that one dose.” Thumbing through her measuring spoons, she noted her smallest measuring spoon was a smidgen, which was half of a pinch.

“Do you have a hint or fleck-sized spoon?” she admitted, holding up her rudimentary measuring set.

“Unfortunately no, but you can make the batch four times larger and use your smidgen.”

As Hermione mixed up this latest batch, she wondered aloud, “Will you be trying any of the potions or am I the only guinea pig for tonight? We should see if it will work on males as equally as females... just to be sure,” she assured him with mock sincerity.

Severus glared as Hermione while letting a knowing smile spread across his lips. “I don't know if that would be wise. I don't know if you're up to resisting my charms even without the addition of a potion.”

Glancing at the clock on the wall, he noted the time and saw that it was still early enough that if they both were lost in the enchantment of the potion, he would get his lover home before midnight. She would be rested enough to make it into work early, considering Hermione was expecting the weekly shipment of boomslang tomorrow.

Hermione made up a quadruple batch using a dosage one-eighth the strength.

“You know, maybe as with the male enhancement potion, we should try various doses of mother of pearl, should this dosage prove to be negligible,” the budding apprentice suggested.

“Let's see how potent this batch is before committing to further testing,” Severus replied.
Upon Hermione draining the vial, she displayed the expected symptoms, and while there was a slight change in the appearance of Hermione's skin and eyes, it was negligible. Severus did feel a small lull from the sound of Hermione's voice, but not enough that he would consider it significant.

To test the potion’s effects, should the imbiber kiss the object of his or her affections, Severus let Hermione kiss him. As their mouths met and her tongue swept over his, he discerned the remnants of the potion mixed with Hermione's natural taste; he let what little he ingested himself through their kiss begin to infuse his senses.

Hermione moaned with release, now that her efforts to kiss Severus all evening were no longer being denied. Clutching him more urgently to her, she blindly ripped the front of his shirt open, the sound of buttons skittering across the floor unheard under the muffle of frantic pants. Neither could say anything coherent as the potion took them both.

Feeling the insistence of his own potion-induced lust, Severus picked up Hermione and sat her on the edge of the counter, hitching her skirt up in the process.

“Now,” she gasped, in between devouring Severus' neck and his shoulder.

And while the reaction was not as instantaneous at the male enhancement potion, the urge to bury himself was no less dire as that moment.

Finding Hermione's knickers to be a hindrance, he was torn between shoving them aside or parting from Hermione momentarily to remove them. The decision was removed from him when Hermione wordlessly spelled them away and then latched her legs around Severus' hips as he quickly undid his trousers.

With one thrust, Severus sank himself into Hermione to the hilt. Her back arched at the sudden and welcome intrusion, while trying to keep her hips tucked under while sitting on the edge of the counter to allow for maximum penetration. Her leg moved in time with Severus' hips, her heels digging into his flanks, encouraging him, spreading herself as wide open as possible.

Both grunted and chanted their wordless songs of pleasure, their movements egged on by the sounds they elicited by the other.

There was something different about this coupling for both of them besides the potion. There was a lack of reservation from either. Severus felt himself lost in a strange swelling he felt rise from his chest, making him thrust each time with a building earnest intensity. Feeling vulnerable, he buried his face into Hermione's shoulder, should she open her eyes and see his face truly unmasked.

Hermione was experiencing an intensity of her own, feeling uninhibited with her own feelings. As Severus made love to her as if he was pouring his own soul into her, a fleeting thought came to her mind, and it was only the shock of it that kept her from saying it aloud.

’If I only married you instead of Ron...’

She screamed with pleasure to mask her own voice from betraying her own subconscious thoughts aloud. Her wail prompted Severus to orgasm and whimper as he emptied himself while buried deeply inside her.

When Severus finally lifted his head from her shoulder, she wasn't sure if it was the potion affecting her or him, but there was something in Severus' eyes that was unguarded for a transient moment before his usual schooled features covered them up like a shroud.

After removing himself from her, Severus helped Hermione down and they began dressing. Hermione crossed the room to retrieve her knickers that she had spelled away.

There was a slight awkward silence that Severus broke when he asked, “Do you still feel the effects of the potion?”

“No, it seems that once we...” ’Made love?’ They had both thought of it as making love, but never dared call it that before. “… we finished, the effects of the potion greatly waned. I'm still feeling aroused, but the desire to... to couple is not as insistent.”

Both were still catching their breath when Hermione asked, “Are there any ingredients in this that are also included in Veritaserum? I was feeling quite...” Hermione swallowed thickly. “Uninhibited in my thoughts and feelings.”

Severus looked at her warily, and he knew she was feeling the same effects from the potion as he was at the time. As a Potions master teaching an apprentice, one must be as honest as possible when sharing observations, as uncomfortable as those observations were to Severus.
“I too felt a certain...” Severus trailed off and hoped Hermione didn't notice the slight shaking in his hands. “A certain unguardedness.”

She could see the way that the potion unnerved Severus. As they were lovers experimenting with a potion that could cause one to say things that one normally would never deign to say aloud, much less admit consciously, Hermione decided to release Severus from future burdens.

“Then let us agree that anything said under the influence of the potion is not to be taken as anything more than things said under abnormal circumstances,” she said.

He was glad that Hermione could comprehend the gravity of things said under the influence of the potion, even deeply emotional and provocative statements that were true, and that she was prepared to ignore them.

Hermione glanced at the clock, noting the time. “I suppose I should clean up and get going home.”

Marf assisted Hermione in the bottling of the rest of the potion test batches Severus thought worthy for Miss Brown to sample for herself for comparison. Once tubes were labeled and her equipment was cleaned, shrunk, and placed in the pocket of her cloak, Hermione left the kitchen. She found Severus lost in thought on the settee as he stared at the crackling fire.

When she joined him on the couch, Severus announced distractedly, “We should try the potion at stronger doses than this. The change in you from my perspective was nominal. Next time we should try a pinch, the original measurement as before, and the various doses in between that and the fleck-sized dose.”

Hermione wanted to ask if that would be safe, considering how overwhelming the original pinch-sized dose was and how overpowered both felt with the smallest of doses of a fleck.

“We should also do a comparison, together with and without the mother of pearl. Possibly sell it with and without,” Hermione added.

“That's for Miss Brown to decide, but I will forward your suggestion to her.” He would suggest it as his own idea, since he had been thinking the same thing, and his employer seemed to be hostile towards ideas that originated from Hermione.
They sat for a while in quiet contemplation of the fire, holding hands, lost in their own thoughts. When the clock chimed eleven, Hermione rose and Severus placed her cloak about her shoulders.

As they embraced, Severus whispered huskily, “Can you come this weekend?”

Hermione shook her head slowly, her face filled with sadness and longing. She resembled a tragic heroine in a pre-Raphaelite painting with her long hair undone.

“I can't,” she sighed ruefully. “There is a game Saturday. And Sunday there is a family event.”

Severus suddenly remembered how Molly went on the night before about the upcoming Weasley clan gathering when she came to visit “Eduardo” and suppressed a shudder.

They stood, continuing to embrace each other, unable to let go. “And next weekend is...” Hermione started crying silently, her body heaving as she tried to suppress her sobs.

Severus tipped up her chin to look at her. “What?” he gently coaxed her.

“It's my birthday,” she choked out. “Twenty-four and my life is nothing as I imagined it.”

Severus rocked her, empathizing with Hermione as he soothed his distraught lover.

“Life is what happens along the way while we were making plans,” he said, mimicking the same words and tone Albus had used when he would catch Severus wallowing in a pit of self pity. “Sometimes it takes a little longer for some to find their path in life.” He was forty-three and was hoping to finally be on a path of his own choosing before he turned forty-four.

Hermione hated her birthdays. It was not just that she felt as if she was still stuck between adolescence and adulthood. When she was still a child attending Muggle schools, she didn't have many friends, being slightly isolated as the swotty bookworm. In addition, at the beginning of the school year, few enough people knew her to bother celebrating or knowing about her September 19 birthday. Some years, the few friends she did have moved away during the summer. She silently envied those whose birthdays fell in the spring, as they had developed friendships during the school year and usually had the best and largest parties, if she was even invited.
Attending Hogwarts and becoming friends with Harry and Ron assured her that a few dear friends always remembered her birthday, even if it did fall at the beginning of the school year. And since joining the Weasley clan, things had not changed much. Molly had a policy of not throwing birthday parties for her in-laws, only the blood relations, which – considering the size the Weasley clan had expanded to – made perfect financial sense. But still, a melancholy feeling always haunted Hermione regarding her birthdays. She knew she should be grateful she hadn’t had birthdays as a child that were as horrible as what Harry had experienced, but it still didn't take away the lingering feelings imprinted upon her as a child.

“I suppose I should view this as the year that everything could change for me and the chance for new beginnings,” she said, trying to buck up her own spirits. “An apprenticeship on the way. And despite everything else, I am much happier now than I was last year.” She squeezed Severus a little tighter to let him know he was the source of her joy.

That swelling in Severus’ chest that had unnerved him while under the potion's influence returned. It made his head feel a little light and his heart a little elated.

“You should go so you can get a good night's rest,” Severus coaxed her. If she stayed much longer and overslept again, missing the chance to pilfer some boomslang, they’d both kick themselves afterwards.

“Monday, then.”

“Monday,” he replied before she slipped from his arms and reluctantly through the door and into the night.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 55 A/N: A chinois is a conical type of fine mesh sieve that includes a wooden pestle for straining and pressing food though. It can also be called a food mill.

There are several foods that are associated with the reduction of libido, usually involving the slow suppression of testosterone levels, but also folklore and bad science. Here is a list of eleven foods, which include mint, black licorice and cilantro: http://www.11points.com/Food-Drink/11_Foods_That_Just_Might_Kill_Your_Sex_Drive

Some of you, who remember Chapter Three, might remember Ginny being chained up spread-eagle and surmise that Draco used a binding charm on Ginny, but alas, he did not. Just good old-fashioned man-handling her into manacles. So just in case you thought I might be inconsistent on that... And yes, the Ministry does allow the Death Eaters to still use Expelliarmus as a matter of simple self-defense.

My measurements for this fic: A pinch is 1/16th of a teaspoon. A smidgen is 1/32nd. A hint is 1/64th. A fleck is 1/128th of a teaspoon, which is one-eighth of a pinch.
Ron's game passed as a blur to Hermione. She sat there and cheered dutifully in the right spots using the cues of the crowd around her to guide her, but her mind was elsewhere. All she could do was relive in her mind the feelings experienced under the influence of the potion. Thoughts and feelings she was too scared to even consciously acknowledge had bubbled forth during her coupling with Severus.

Severus had been affected by the potion, as she’d noticed changes in him, and she kept recalling time and time again under the September sun the naked expression of what might be considered love on his face. He had openly looked at her with lust, desire, friendship, admiration and even amusement before, but the fleeting moment of what looked like love had crossed Severus' face. It was this look that made Hermione wonder if this potion did more than amplify feelings of arousal. Or was it that both she and Severus were using their physical attractions for one another as a mask for the growing love between each other?

Hermione had already admitted to herself she had fallen in love with Severus, although she would never say it aloud to him. Had he fallen in love with her as well? There were brief moments as if they behaved as a couple in love, but there was always a certain amount of reservation from Severus that made Hermione realize long ago she could never expect him to declare his love for her, if he felt the same way. And she accepted this arrangement.
A Sunday afternoon spent at the Burrow was yet another day Hermione spent going through the motions of life without engaging herself in the moment of her surroundings. One of the Weasley grandchildren was having their birthday, and Hermione didn't even remember to buy a present for her nephew until her husband asked what they were going to give him. A quick trip to Diagon Alley before they left corrected the oversight.

Ron made no mention of Hermione's forgetfulness, as it was uncharacteristic of her to forget such things, usually being on top of the obligations of family.

“So do you want to make another trip to Flourish and Blotts for your birthday?” Ron prompted her.

“Sorry, what?” Hermione replied, her mind lost in memories of time spent with Severus and their recent Potions work.

“Earth to Hermione,” Ron said slightly annoyed. “And you say I never listen to you.”

“My mind was on work,” Hermione truthfully confessed, remembering with disappointment that no shipment of boomslang came into work that Friday, despite her efforts to arrive there at six-thirty in the morning.

As much as the promise of new books usually improved Hermione's mood, the complete lack of effort from Ron to attempt to get her something different, despite his terrible track record for coming up with ideas for presents, annoyed her. At least when Severus gave her one of his books, it was given with great consideration and thought, and with the knowledge that he was giving up one of his own treasures, as if giving a little piece of himself. Hermione and Severus both viewed books as if they were friends to be cherished and parted with great reluctance.

“I guess,” she acquiesced. “Or maybe a day at the spa.” She was ready to admit she didn't care anymore.

“Oh, Ginny's taking you to the spa this Saturday for your birthday,” he replied brightly. “I'll be at a game abroad, so you'd have Saturday free anyway. She says you're really going to look forward to the treat she has in store for you. Some sort of full body treatment, she said. Or if you want to go to that place, Madame Maurelle Mandel's.” It seemed as though it pained Ron to reluctantly suggest... the place. “I mean, if you really like the type of dresses they sell there,” he added begrudgingly while gritting his teeth. A hint of a sneer disturbed the smooth line of his upper lip.

Hermione had a feeling Ginny put him up to putting forth that suggestion, since he averted his eyes when he mentioned the place.

As much as she could have given up and tell Ron that some books were fine as a present, a small and petty part of Hermione wanted to poke at Ron’s sore spot out of spite. “Why, Ron, dress shopping sounds like it would be fun. I think that would be a lovely birthday present. Thank you.” To rub it in, she stood up on her toes and gave Ron a kiss on the cheek to show her “gratitude” for the suggestion and offer.

“Oh,” Ron added, “Bascom wants me to go with him to some broom convention in Italy after the game Saturday and be there Sunday to introduce me to the press, so I won’t be back until late Sunday. You going to be all right on your birthday weekend without me around?”

“We have dinner Friday night with my parents,” Hermione assured him. “That's fine, don't worry. Go and have fun.” A weekend in a foreign country did sound like it would have been a fine birthday present, but she knew Ron would be busy conducting business with Bascom. Considering how uncomfortable Mr. Nettleton had made her feel the last time they crossed paths, and the way he undressed her with his eyes publicly, she was happy to let Ron have Bascom all to himself. “I have chores to catch up on and errands to run.”

Fleur and Molly were busy playing co-hostesses, running back and forth to the kitchen while periodically sitting down to eat for a while. The party was originally planned to be at Bill and Fleur's home, but a recent infestation of aggressive brownies that had taken residence in a rapidly growing patch of blacksnare brambles caused the party to be relocated. Fleur had tried to get rid of the brownies herself, but it was a job larger than even a witch of her talents could do, especially with the demands of five children.

During dinner, Philippe – Bill and Fleur's second oldest child, who was turning four – got to sit in the place of prominence at the head of the table by asking to sit in his grandfather's lap. The other children also sat by their grandfather and the birthday boy, since all the balloons and decorations were over at that end of the table. This left the adults to occupy the other end of the table, where the twins discussed in quiet tones their latest business venture, using euphemisms should there be a wayward child lurking beneath the table.

“How's that apprenticeship position coming along,” Fred asked Hermione.
“Still contingent upon some unknown factors,” she answered honestly.

“I know how that goes. Even our silent partner seems to have some things waiting upon some unspecified contingencies as well.”

Hermione knew very well to whom the twins were referring. She could have said that Albert Dobmeir, her Potions master, would be working for Lavender Brown, so in some respects they were all working with the same person. However, she didn't want to say anything until after the fluxweed was procured and the Polyjuice Potion was already brewing with certainty of completion. She wondered if the fluxweed was the contingency the business mogul witch was referring to when talking with the twins, but she didn't want to presume.

~~~~~~~*~

In order to see if the arousal potion, with the full pinch of Caprese mother of pearl, was just as effective on men as on women, Severus took the potion Monday night.

Hermione had bound him to the chair and plugged her ears, after Severus' report about her own voice under the potion being quite hypnotic.

It had been a long time since Severus had been rendered immobile in the way Hermione had bound him, and he could feel the fear building inside of himself. He hid his fear, as being a master of Occlumency meant mastering one's emotions, but the sensation brought back memories of being temporarily bound and hexed by Lucius that time that resulted in him winding up in the Hogwarts infirmary for a while. Severus remembered he was in the presence of Hermione, who would never harm him. He was safe with her.

She poured the elixir into Severus' waiting mouth, unaware of the reeling panic Severus was mentally talking himself down from. Hermione admired the rosy iridescent color of the mixture as it drained along the sides of the glass.

Severus rolled his head back languidly, exposing his neck. All fear had now left his body, replaced with growing ardor.

Hermione could feel the effects of the potion herself. Severus' skin took on an enticing quality. She wanted to kiss his neck with long and possessive kisses.

Her hand held the antidote, but it was forgotten, placed on the table so she could caress his skin with both hands. Severus caught her eyes in his own and Hermione felt lost in them, their blackness calling to her.

“I need you,” were the words she read from his lips.

Stroking his hair, she felt his breath upon her cheek as she kissed his temples, trailing over his eyelids, down his nose, and closer to his mouth.

Severus' eyes were heavy with desire, begging her to release him from his bounds so he could take her – despite him saying no words. She was ready to kiss his mouth when, out of the corner of her eye, she caught sight of the antidote on the table. The vial was on its side with the liquid dripping across the table top and onto the floor.

Hermione suddenly regained her senses with considerable effort. Rushing over to the table and away from Severus, she grabbed another vial of the antidote that was ready and, while avoiding eye contact with Severus, poured it into his mouth.

Severus shook violently as the antidote countered the potion's effect. He nodded at Hermione that it was safe for her to remove her ear plugs.

Releasing him from his bounds, Hermione said with awe, “That potion makes you quite irresistible. If I had not noticed the antidote dripping onto the floor, I probably would have kissed you and then...”

Both were curious as to how the sex might be while under the enchantment of this particular strength potion, but they still had some experimentation to conduct before they could relax and play around.

Severus marveled at the way the potion had made him feel. He had felt like he was a sex god and Hermione could not refuse him. Though she ultimately had – barely – it was due largely in part to her own willpower, just as his own willpower had prevented him from succumbing to Hermione's charms under the same potion strength.

'Irresistible. That's the perfect name for it,' Severus noted to himself.

On Saturday, Ginny had come over to visit Draco. The three of them conducted the experiment where Ginny partook of the potion with the full pinch of mother of pearl. And while Severus noted with detached objectivity that Ginny did seem to appear slightly more attractive, he was not drawn to her any more than before, nor her to him. Draco, on the other hand, had become completely overwhelmed, and the two young lovers began to ravage each other without noticing the lingering presence of Severus in the room. He excused himself wordlessly, as they would not have even noticed if the world fell down around them.

Draco gave him a report afterwards that Ginny's kiss imparted some of the potions effects to him to a much lesser degree, as expected. The full effect of the potion seemed to have lasted a little over two hours, which was somewhat different from Hermione's report that the effect waned greatly after coupling with a smaller dose of the integral ingredient. It could be the amount of Caprese mother of pearl extended the effects of the potion. It would be something to test out without the antidote to shorten the observable effects.

“Ginny said the potion lasts for two hours. Considering Miss Brown has decided to go with the sixty-six brewed-hours version of the Male Enhancement potion, which lasts two hours as well, maybe women will need a couple hours in order to find the fortitude to remain enamored of their husbands' interests,” he admitted, thinking of the length of time both potions would remain effective if sold as a pair, packaged as a “Romantic Evening” enhancement.

Severus did not elaborate regarding his declaration of his need for Hermione that it was more of a confession of his heart than his loins.

Hermione had agreed that nothing would be taken seriously while taken under the potion's power, but he still found it a disquieting feeling to lay his emotions so openly to another.

As the evening wore on, this time it was Severus who was bound to the chair trying the potions with various levels of Caprese mother of pearl added and afterwards noting the effects, with Hermione taking down his remarks on parchment paper and noting her own observations. They had tried the strongest dose at the beginning of the evening and worked backwards towards weaker doses, until Hermione gave him the weakest dose – the same one Hermione and Severus had both tried during their last session of lovemaking the week before.

The back and forth between consuming concupiscence and the abrupt halting of his libido with the frigid antidote was exhausting to Severus.

“Did you find yourself tired after all this potions testing last week?” he asked, hoping it wasn't a sign he was getting old.

“Yes, I slept like the dead Thursday night,” she informed him.
“You didn't seem that tired by the end of the night.”

“I was excited to finally get around to doing some Potions work that didn't involve testing ingredients. Something that I can actually apply towards my apprenticeship, but I was dog-tired by the end of the night, now that I think about it,” Hermione recalled.

They ended their Monday night earlier than usual. After cleaning up, Hermione tucked Severus into his bed, noticing how he’d nearly fallen asleep at the kitchen table and definitely had drifted off while partially reclined on the settee. She undressed him and placed a loving kiss upon his temple before letting herself out and locking the door.

~~~~~~~*~

It was Tuesday night, and once again it was time for the trotting out of Hermione's and Ron's grievances with each other with a Muggle playing referee. Their marriage counselor, James Hoover, had noticed the increase in Ron's aggression and the shortening of his temper.

James even remarked, “Ron, I'm quite concerned about this change in behavior since you have begun taking these drugs—”

“Wizards don't do drugs like Muggles,” Ron interrupted. “Us wizards can control ourselves, unlike some of those Muggles I see in dirty alleys out in London and the needles sticking out of their arms. We take potions, and we are able to control ourselves.”

Hermione wanted to crawl off into a hole at that moment. Ron sounded like he was half a step away from being a full-fledged Death Eater to her ears.

“That's not true, Ron,” Hermione retorted. “I've seen some witches and wizards lost in the stupor of some potion hoping to forget the dire situation they are in, seeking an escape.”

“Yeah, but those were Death Eaters living 'al fresco' and they're all dead now,” her husband said, casually throwing the argument back in her face.

“Wait, what?” James interjected, lost on the finer points of Ron's innuendos.

Hermione turned to James to explain how many Death Eaters after the war had lost all their money, and many had been ejected from their residence after it was seized by the Ministry. In the aftermath, many Death Eaters were homeless, living outdoors and sheltered in alcoves and back alleys until taking poison to end their lives, or taking potions to obscure their bleak reality until wasting away.

James looked horrified that the general wizarding population had such a blatant disregard for life and their fellows’ well-being, despite their being criminals.

“Well, they killed enough witches and wizards – pure-blood, half-blood and Muggleborn – as well as Muggles, that they got what they deserved,” Ron threw out as if it justified their treatment that they were all the same. “Besides, I don't see you Muggles doing much to deal with all those drug users I see out in the Muggle world.”

“We do,” James informed him. “We have laws regarding the manufacture, distribution and consumption of certain drugs, and medical and government programs to help those get help to break free of their addiction.”

“Yeah, well, the rest of us normal witches and wizards don't have a problem.” Ron folded his arms with a certain finality. He clearly wasn't open to any debate that might inform him of the other side's point of view or acknowledge facts.

“Oh, and love potions have never, in the entirety of wizarding history, ever been abused?” Hermione asked rhetorically.

“There is such a thing as love potions that actually exist?” James asked, shocked.

“Yes, James. And Voldemort,” she paused to let the effect of that name wash over Ron, “he was born because his inbred mother used a love potion to seduce and marry a Muggle who left her once the potion wore off. And nothing bad ever happened from that,” she announced sarcastically.

Ron glared at her. “That's because he was a Muggle and didn't understand anything about our wizarding world. Maybe if you were raised in our world you'd understand these things better.”

Hermione felt a chill race down her spine as her back became ramrod straight. “You're a bigot, Ron. I can't believe that after all we went through, and the bias I fought as a Muggle-born, that you would be so callous as to say these things.” She fought the tears that were building behind her eyes.
“Ron,” James stepped in, “do you realize how hurtful your attitude is regarding Hermione's background? You say you have nothing against Muggle-borns, but then you say that if she grew up in 'your' world that she'd understand. Do you comprehend how your choice of words seems contradictory and even hurtful? Hermione has fought against this sort of bias for years within your community, and yet you say these things? Do you see?”

“What's hurtful about the truth?” Ron said.

Hermione could see that Ron's logic had shrunk with the continued use of this muscle-enhancing potion and was now near non-existent. It could have been that his sense of logic was only limited to the chess board and he’d never applied it in any other part of his life, but to Hermione it seemed that Ron was becoming more and more irrational.

“If I'm so fucking clueless about 'our' world,” she asked, using exaggerated air quotes while over-enunciating the choice of her pronoun, “then why the hell did you ask me to marry you?”

“Because my mum told me to!” Ron yelled back.

Hermione was stunned and felt the breath in her chest freeze in place. But before the tears came, her brain latched on to an earlier thread of the conversation. “Well, that truth certainly fucking hurts, you spineless git.”

Determining that this session was over, Hermione Accio’ed her wand and bolted for the door before Ron could see her cry.

James called out to her as she ran to the rear exit that James reserved for his wizarding clients. As he reached the threshold, Hermione Apparated away; the only sound was a pop from the vacuum of space she left behind.

“I don't know why we even bother coming,” Ron muttered, sounding more angry than defeated.

James never suggested divorce for any of this clients unless there was some abuse involved – physical, emotional or mental – but Mr. Weasley's admission of his reasons for proposing certainly changed the dynamics of their marriage and the reasons why they were still together. Given the lack of counseling progress and this latest confession, James Hoover didn't think even he could save this marriage. If it could not be saved, he would try and pave the way for as smooth and clean a separation as possible.
Hermione was glad Ron didn't come home Tuesday night, and she really didn't care that he didn't come home Wednesday either. If they weren't avoiding each other or fucking, they usually were fighting. The time apart from Ron was a relief. She could relax in her own home without being on edge that she would be pounced upon by either Ron's erection or his snide comments. It certainly was a relief she didn't have to go to the market in the middle of the week to restock the cupboard, as Ron's appetite was still in high gear as he continued to gain muscle.

A check of the cupboard showed that nearly all his muscle-enhancing potion was gone, which meant he either hadn't restocked, or he came home while Hermione was asleep or at work and cleared out his supply. Ron's duffle bag and some clothes were gone as well, which meant she might be going to her parents alone for her birthday, which would make for an awkward situation. She might be able to convincingly lie to them that Ron had to travel early for his game in Russia, but her mother was pretty astute in knowing when her daughter was troubled.

Even her Thursday night dinner at Severus' flat was a slightly strained affair. He could see the trouble Hermione was having digesting this latest revelation about her marriage. Since he knew her mind would not be solidly on Potions experimentation, he canceled the work they were going to do and instead had her rest.

They hadn't made love the Monday prior, and he did not initiate any intimacies with his lover other than a long cuddle in front of the fire.

“He married me because his mother told him to,” Hermione said aloud, more as a reiteration to herself to help mentally process the concept than for Severus' knowledge.

“Marriages arranged by the parents are far more common than you'd believe,” Severus said bitterly.

Hermione wondered if his open disgust was more in criticism of society in general, or was there some personal experience of his own he hadn't shared with her; she remembered the name Gabrielle that he'd once murmured in a dream. She curbed her curiosity and decided to let it slip by without further query.

“It makes me wonder if the marriage was more a whole lie to please his parents than his desire to be with me.” Hermione questioned her value to her husband versus the convenience of doing what he was told.
“Friendships and sometimes true love can bloom in such arrangement,” the older wizard expounded further upon his original thought. “And you claim that there was a strong friendship before any romance. Some marriages never develop into friendships. And without the basis of friendship, there can be no trust or deep and truly meaningful love. Maybe yours is a marriage of friendship without the passion and romantic love you expected it would be.”

Hermione was too emotionally worn out to contemplate the philosophical aspects of a marriage based on friendship versus true love, and the many variations of such contractual arrangements. She stared at the fire until she drifted off against Severus’ shoulder, feeling safe in her spiritual sanctuary.

Severus gently woke her with a kiss to her forehead and the soft calling of her name.

As Severus placed her cloak about her shoulders, she noticed him swallow with difficulty as if his throat had gone dry.

“I've had a cancellation Saturday,” Severus said, trying to sound not too eager. “Would you like to stay Saturday night with me? Dinner, dancing, and no need to leave at the end of the night.”

Hermione had informed him earlier in the evening that Ron would be gone for the weekend.

It seemed a bit brazen, given her married status, to stay the night at her lover's flat. Then again, Hermione had no idea where Ron was staying the nights he was gone after their many fights. Ron’s latest marital revelation had certainly severed any loyalty Hermione felt tied to her husband. And while she would not flaunt her infidelities to Ron, she no longer felt any compunction about continuing her affair with Severus, unabated by whatever facade of morals she used to have regarding her husband.

Smiling with as much strength as she could muster, Hermione said, “Yes, I can. I would love to.”

There was a moment of relief on Severus’ face, as if Hermione might reject him. He was very glad Miss Anne had canceled their habitual Saturday appointment earlier in the week, mentioning she was joining a friend in Italy for the weekend, as that meant there was no need for Hermione to rush home from the spa on Saturday. The revelation of Hermione's husband’s business trip fomented the idea in his mind to invite her to stay the night.

“I look forward to seeing you Saturday,” Severus said, as he discreetly pinned a small corsage of celandine, white clover, and a single purple pansy to the breast of Hermione’s cloak before giving her a lingering farewell kiss.

It was only as she was removing her cloak at home that she observed the corsage that had gone unnoticed until that moment.

’Celandine for ’Joys to come.’ White clover for ’Think of me.’ Purple pansy for ’You occupy my thoughts.’ ’

Hermione laid back on her bed, staring at the ceiling and the corsage clutched to her chest, her heart much lighter and her head feeling a little dizzy.

“Oh, Severus, I think of you far more than I can freely admit,” she confessed to her empty room, unaware her mirror watched her while smiling on.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 56 A/N: Well, now that the Kneazle is out of the bag and Ron has admitted he married Hermione because Molly told him to, how much longer will this marriage last? Stay tuned.
Hermione had mixed emotions when she woke to an empty bed on her twenty-fourth birthday. It was a relief that Ron was not there, but the fact he was still gone cast a pall on her outlook for the day.

As she made her way to the kitchen for a quick morning cup before swinging by the Twenty-Four Blackbird bakery for her habitual scone on the way into work, Pigwidgeon alighted on his perch with a missive for Hermione.

-------

Hermione,

I will be there with you tonight for your birthday at your parents' house. I don't want to put you on the spot as to why I'm not there.

I'll see you at the flat when you get home from work.
As grateful as she was that Ron would be there to provide a united front, despite how false it was, she was even more glad that she would not have to lie to her parents as to why her husband wasn't there.

The echo of her boots along the cobblestone seemed to mock the isolation Hermione felt within her own world. Even the bakery was empty, except for the sole baker who manned the counter in between shuffling pans of freshly baked goods in and out of the oven until the counter staff arrived later. The fog that had drifted over Diagon Alley veiled Hermione as she continued on her way to work. Behind her, she heard the cadence of a familiar pair of boots – accented with the syncopation of another pair of boots – approaching the bakery she had just left. She knew without looking it was Severus and Draco on the way to their Friday morning parole meeting.

As tempted as she was to turn around, she forged on, not wanting to risk anyone seeing her giving any recognition to the ex-Death Eaters.

It was her birthday, and as a present to herself she hoped for the simple pleasure of a box of boomslang to be waiting for her upon her arrival.

Severus saw the faint silhouette of Hermione march off into the fog.

“Linger any longer, and I'll think you're a man in love,” Draco ribbed Severus half-jokingly.

The older wizard hesitated at the bakery's threshold, gazing onward.

He wanted to argue, asking Draco what he would know of love, but the younger wizard knew far more about the subject than Severus' own limited experience.

Hermione's birthday was proving to be far better than she expected. Upon entering the lab, she saw several boxes of boomslang from three different suppliers. The boxes’ markings showed that some of the shipment took a wrong turn during their transit, explaining why none arrived last Friday for testing.
Trevor showed up at an early time, but it was after Hermione was able to fake a botched test and secret some boomslang skin away in the inner pocket of her robes. He’d brought Hermione a small bouquet of dwarf sunflowers, signaling his admiration for his mentor on her birthday.

Harry showed up to take Hermione out for lunch as a birthday treat. He even presented her with a small gift of some Self-Inking Quills made with pheasant feathers for which she thanked him, pheasant feathers being her preferred choice for quills.

Since it was her special day, she didn't stick around at work, but left at five o'clock. She even encouraged Trevor to go home instead of staying late, though she did have a slight unshakable fear he might burn down the lab yet again if left alone.

As promised, Ron was waiting for her when she came home. Hermione was convinced Ron gained another whole stone of pure muscle since she saw him three days ago. It also could have been the cut of the shirt that gave that impression, since it was tailored to his body, accentuating the strapping physique his body had morphed into recently.

“Let me take a quick shower and change before we head over,” Hermione said, trying to avoid interacting with her husband.

Ron sheepishly shrugged, not knowing what to say.

Emerging from the bathroom, Hermione wore one of her more Muggle-like outfits of a basic blouse and plain black skirt. It was understated and appropriate for a simple family gathering.

“You look nice,” Ron admitted. He was avoiding looking Hermione in the eye.

“If you don't want to go, Ron, I can always say your coach decided last minute to get the team to Russia to acclimatize to the local time zone and climate before the game,” Hermione offered.

“No, I said I'd be here for you, so I'm here.”

Hermione thought that Ron behaving in such a way as to point out the rift between them might prove to be even more awkward, but Hermione figured since he was here there was nothing to do but go ahead and brace for the questions from her parents later.
As they arrived via the Floo, Hermione was greeted by her mother with a welcoming hug and buss upon the cheek.

Ron followed in right behind her with, to Hermione's shock, a believable smile upon his face as he greeted his in-laws. He did a fine job of acting the happy husband to their daughter. It seemed like the Ron she remembered from a time long ago when they were still dating and first married, but she knew his behavior tonight was an act for her benefit. Mrs. Weasley wondered how much of their entire marriage was an act for her benefit to spare her from the truth she now knew.

Aunt Christine and her husband, Tim, showed up about a half hour later. Wendy Granger made sure her sister would show up after Hermione's arrival so she would not have to explain to Christine that she had a magical daughter and son-in-law emerging from a blazing fireplace. As much as the International Code of Wizarding Secrecy (ICWS) allowed Mrs. Granger to tell her sister about Hermione's talents, being a close blood relation, she decided that it was best not to inform her sister of her daughter's unique abilities.

Ron had only met Hermione's Aunt Christine and Uncle Tim once before, and fortunately remembered their names. Hermione had few relatives, so there were not many names to memorize anyway.

As Wallace was pouring drinks before dinner, Wendy Granger took Hermione aside to speak privately.

“I was wondering if you or Ron could do your father and me a favor. It seems the Jaguar is having some sort of difficulty. We've taken it to the shop three times this week as it won't start, but every time we bring it in, they can't seem to find anything wrong with it. We drive it home and then it won't start the next day. I was wondering if you had an idea of what might be wrong with it if it isn't a 'conventional' issue,” Wendy implied, hinting that the problem might be not of the Muggle mechanical kind.

“Erm, sure, Mum. Do you want me to look at it now,” Hermione said, then darted her eyes in the direction of her aunt and uncle, “or we can do it later?” meaning after they have left.

“Later is fine, sweetie. Thanks. Sorry for foisting this on you on your birthday,” her mother apologized.

“It's not a problem,” Hermione said, actually grateful that this would be something to occupy her, keeping some distance between her and Ron, since her husband knew nothing of cars other than what he learned second-hand through his father, plus that Hogwarts event with the Ford Anglia.

“Mum?”

“Yes, dear?”

“Since you're making my favorite prawn dish, I was wondering if you could teach me how to make it?”

“Absolutely! I'd love it if you helped me in the kitchen. How are your knife skills?” Wendy teased Hermione, knowing her daughter spent most of her workday testing ingredients all day long.

After sharpening her mother’s knives to her level of satisfaction, Hermione began deveining the jumbo prawns with the precision of a surgeon.

Regarding her daughter's knife work, “You would have made an excellent doctor with those knife skills.”

Knowing her aunt and uncle were on the other side of the house, Hermione replied, “Actually, I'll be starting a Potions apprenticeship hopefully before the end of the year. And according to one Potions master, my knife skills have much room for improvement.”

“Really? That's excellent news!” Then Wendy corrected herself as she coarsely chopped the cilantro. “I mean about the position, not the commentary on your handling of a knife.”

“It's been judged fair, but by the time I'm done with my apprenticeship, they are supposed to be much better than this,” Hermione admitted.

“And how long will this apprenticeship last?”

“Depends on how fast I master certain skills, including five foreign languages.”

“Anti-translation spells on certain books,” she informed her mother.

“Ah, trade secrets,” Mrs. Granger correctly surmised.

“Yep.”

“What about trade secrets?” Aunt Christine chimed in, entering the kitchen with a drink in her hand.

“Just dental things, Christine,” Wendy deflected, knowing her sister was not interested in such topics.

“Are you here to help chop the garlic?” asked Hermione knowing her aunt would never deign to ruin a fresh manicure with something as messy as cooking.

“I think I'll leaving the cooking to you two. I'll just freshen up my drink,” she said, scrunching her nose with disgust at the scent, before fleeing to avoid being conscripted into doing something else.

Hermione fetched the butter and olive oil while her mother pulled out her large skillet.

“Where is the Amontillado?” asked Hermione while looking for the sherry.

“Amontillado? Impossible! And in the middle of the carnival!” barked Tim with over-the-top theatrics in the doorway to the kitchen.

Hermione and her mother laughed with Tim's reference to the Edgar Allen Poe story.

“Hello, Uncle Tim!” Hermione went over and gave her uncle a hug while keeping her garlic tainted hands off of his person, before going back to chop the pungent bulb on the cutting board.
“Garlic, and lots of it. I know I’m going to love this dish,” he professed.

Hermione felt little affinity for her maternal aunt, at times wondering how her mother and Christine could be related, but then remembering the great difference in age. Hermione’s mother was already in her early-mid fifties, while Christine was still in her late thirties. Despite the lack of connection to her own blood relative, Hermione was quite fond of her uncle, even though she rarely saw him.

“So you’re what now? Twenty... Help me out here,” Tim begged.

“Twenty-four,” Hermione helped.

“And not looking a day over twenty-four,” he jibed. “Uh oh, I think I’m needed,” he excused himself before bolting off hearing his wife call for him.

Hermione wanted to say something about Christine probably breaking a nail, but decided keeping her mouth shut with a snide comment would be more sensible, considering how her aunt had snuck up on her and her mother a few moments ago.

During dinner, Christine was looking a bit peaked. She picked at her dinner, refusing the aromatic shrimp seasoned with garlic and cilantro, choosing only to nibble on unbuttered bread.

Wallace raised his glass as he cleared his throat. “I’d like to toast to my beautiful and loving daughter on her twenty-fourth birthday. Hermione, may your days be filed with joy and your sorrows be fleeting. To Hermione!”

Everyone around the table clinked glasses, even Aunt Christine who was starting to look a little green around the gills.

“And I don’t meant to steal any of the glory on your day, Hermione, but I’d like to make an announcement. Christine and I are expecting our first child—” Tim began, but stopped as Christine ran off for the loo for another bout of morning sickness that was hitting her during the evening. “Sorry, back soon,” he said as he joined her.

The door muffled most of the sounds of retching, but not all.
“I guess the garlic explains why dinner wasn't agreeing with her.” Hermione looked back at the door and said, “Do you think they'd notice if I spelled the smell away?” She looked over at Christine's place at the table and finally noticed that her aunt was drinking iced water, not her usual white wine.

Wendy nodded, liking the idea, but knowing it would tip her sister and brother-in-law off that something was a bit odd.

“Hang on. Have you got lemon and ginger in the kitchen, Mum?”

“Yes, what are you thinking?” Wendy replied.

“A simple cure, Muggle ingredients only,” Hermione said.

Running off, she brewed a quick cup of ginger and lemon tea for her aunt, and placed a quick cooling spell on it to chill it down.

Hermione tentatively knocked on the door. “Aunt Christine?”

Tim answered the door. “We're sorry for ruining your party, love.”

“No, don't worry. Ron has several sisters-in-law, and this happens all the time when one of them is pregnant. Here is some cold ginger and lemon tea. This always helps them. Hopefully it will help her.”

Christine was barely able to choke out her thanks before the retching started up again.

“When she's done, have her sip some and it will calm her stomach immediately,” Hermione assured him despite Christine’s reluctance to attempt to drink anything.

Once a few sips went down, Christine looked relieved. “Oh, that's much better.”
“Had I known, I would have picked a different entree.” Hermione gave her uncle an apologetic look.

“Well, we wanted to surprise everyone and I guess we did,” Tim confessed sheepishly.

“Congratulations,” Hermione said meekly.

Tim and Christine cut their visit short. Hermione gave her uncle the recipe for ginger and lemon tea, informing him that it should be chilled as it would sit better with his wife's stomach versus being served hot. Ron provided a strong shoulder of support, helping Christine out to the car while Tim brought the car to the front of the house.

Once back in the house, they sat down and realized dinner had gone cold. Now that Christine and Tim were gone, Hermione whipped out her wand and performed a simple warming charm on the food so they could continue their dinner.

Before cake, while dinner settled, Hermione went to the garage with her mother to see if there was a magical cause behind the Jaguar's malfunctioning.

Wendy popped the bonnet and lifted it, propping it up with a support arm.

“Lumos.” Hermione began probing around the engine with the illuminated tip of her wand, peering about.

She saw something moving around behind the air filter before it skittered along the back and ducked underneath the cylinders to hide.

“Did you see that?” Hermione asked her mother.

“See what?”

Her mother’s response confirmed her suspicion that gremlins were invisible to Muggles.
“Did you hear it skittering?”

“Hear what?”

“You've got gremlins, Mum.”

Even Muggles had heard of gremlins, and the mechanic even joked it was gremlins before handing Wendy Granger the bill for probing around her car with no results.

“Gremlins are attracted to grease, and lemons cut grease. Lemon makes an excellent repellent. Go squeeze the rest of the lemons, then mix the juice with water and put it in a spray bottle. Spray down the garage with the lemon water,” she instructed her mother. “Hang a lemon-scented car freshener in the car, and they'll be gone in less than a day. You better get out of the garage while I try and clean out the ones in the car.”

Hermione cast a spell that caused the scent of lemons to perfume the engine compartment area, flushing out three gremlins who tried to find refuge in her father's lawn mower.

“Confringo!”

The gremlin exploded into tiny bits, leaving some small hunks of meat clinging to the side of the car before sliding off onto the floor of the garage. She found the other two in the midst of trying to crawl into her father's hedge trimmer. Since the ventilation slots were too small for them to crawl through easily, she found them stuck half-way in, attracted to the grease fumes.

Hermione used her wand to clean up the area in case her mother could see dead bits of magical creatures, even though she couldn't see them while alive.

Exiting the garage, she found her mother coming back with a spray bottle with lemon water.

“I wonder if the gremlins came in with the Gypsies,” Wendy wondered aloud.

“What Gypsies?”
“You know that empty field around the corner with the big oak tree? Some Gypsies camped there earlier this week, saying some of their vehicles broke down. Since then some of the neighbors have complained about their cars not working either.” Wendy began spraying down the garage.

“They don't like to be called Gypsies, Mum. They prefer the term ‘Roma.’” Hermione had that same gentle lecturing tone in her voice as when she was trying to correct Ron's latest misconception about Muggles.

Hermione asked for pen and paper in order to write up a short letter to the Department for the Regulation and Control of Magical Creatures, notifying them that there was an infestation of gremlins in her parents’ neighborhood. She included a list of nearby streets to check, based on her mother's retelling of neighborhood gossip of whose car was working and wasn't. The Ministry would probably send a crew during the day – while the Muggles were at work – to clear out their garages and cars, and visit some of the local mechanics in case some of the infected cars had been towed there.

After fetching Maxwell from the owl box at the back of the yard, her parents’ owl silently took to wing in the dark of the night.

In the meantime, Hermione would visit the Roma camped out around the corner and deal with the possible source of infestation.

The Roma of Europe, particularly Great Britain, not only tended to operate around the fringes of Muggle society, but the fringes of the wizarding world as well. There was a blending of some of the wizarding world into the culture of the Roma in centuries prior, but with the ICWS and the gradual industrialization of England, the Roma tended to drift further away from the wizarding community, since most in the Roma community were squibs or Muggles.

During the summer before Hermione created S.P.E.W., she did a lot of research on disenfranchised members of wizarding society, including the house-elves, Roma, centaurs, and werewolves. While she was no expert, she knew and was aware of the wariness the Roma community had of the wizarding community. There had been a period of time where the Ministry forcibly removed the magical children of the Roma with the purpose of integrating the magical children into the wizarding world. The Ministry had encouraged these children to abandon their Roma families and roots, so they could fully function as adults in the magical world.

Hermione told her mother to tell Ron that she was taking a walk around the old neighborhood, giving her mother a brief explanation as to why Ron would protest vehemently against his wife visiting “a bunch of dirty Gypsies,” as Ron had described them in the past. She knew her husband... would not approve; he would most probably say something incredibly insulting and offensive in the process, should he demand to accompany her in some useless exercise to protect her. Hermione was a witch fully capable of defending herself should the need arise.

As she rounded the corner and saw the open field at the end of the street, Hermione could hear the rising sound of a guitar gently strumming. Windows were lit from the interior of the caravans, and there was a communal fire crackling in the center of the circle of vehicles. It was a mish-mash of modern aluminum-sided caravans with some of the old-fashioned wooden caravan trailers painted in bright colors with square or rounded profiles, all pulled by modern automobiles of various vintages. Some of the caravans looked very old and well cared for.

Walking slowly, but with no purpose of stalking, Hermione stopped when someone spotted her.
She was approached by a man who appeared to be his forties, with a slightly weathered face

“Can I help you?” the wary man asked, used to some pesky town council members coming up to him to tell him that his family group had no business camping in an unused field.

“I understand that you're having some trouble with your cars,” she stated.

“Are you a mechanic?” he asked, looking her up and down and at her hands for any sign that she was a grease monkey by profession.

“No, but I just rid my mother's car of three gremlins and I think your cars might be infested with them too, which is why they might not be working,” she explained plainly.

“Bun!” the man hissed, and placed his hands in the shape of a bull, extending the index and pinkie, his hand placed at his forehead and bowed in a gesture to ward off evil.

Hermione knew the word he’d exclaimed meant “evil witch.”

“I'm here to help expel the gremlins and then leave you alone,” she said. “The Ministry of Magic will probably be sending people tomorrow to exterminate the gremlins from the Muggle households around here. I know you have no love for the Ministry, but I can get rid of the gremlins for you so they won't bother you.” She held her hands up as a sign she meant no harm.

The strumming of guitar had stopped, and a small crowd of people of various ages had gathered at the edges of the shadows to watch the scene unfold.

Before the older man could say anything further, a wizened elderly woman shuffled forward. “Let me see her.”

The man nodded his head in the direction of the woman who appeared to be the head of the clan. She directed Hermione to move forward while still gazing cautiously at her.

Hermione walked slowly, not wanting to appear to be a threat to the group.

“Let me see your hands,” the Drabarni commanded Hermione.

Hermione held her hands out for inspection.

The elderly woman, with a face tanned like well worn leather, grabbed both of Hermione’s hands and shook them in hers, before flipping them over to inspect the palms and then the back of the hands.

“Stick out your tongue.” The elderly matron of the group was dressed in several layers of tiered floral skirts and a cropped wool jacket, looking every bit the old Gypsy woman.

Hermione did as she was bid.

The old woman gently cupped Hermione's face with both hands and peered into her mouth.

“Your parents are the dentists around the corner.”

“You can tell that by looking at my mouth?” Hermione asked, perplexed she could divine that much from glancing in her mouth.

“No, I saw you coming out of their house,” the old woman answered with a mirthful chuckle. Then she addressed the crowd. “She's a good witch. Let her look at your cars.” She spoke with authority that brooked no argument.
Hermione went around to the dozen or so cars, chasing out the gremlins with the scent of lemon before casting the same Blasting Curse she used at her mother's house.

The children of the group, who screamed with a mix of fear and delight as the gremlins ran from the cars, proceeded to stomp gleefully on the mangled remnants of flesh that remained behind. Once Hermione's work was done, the children used a shovel to pick up the gremlins' remains and throw them into a hastily dug pit to burn. She was surprised at the percentage of children who could see the magical creatures.

After being satisfied that all the gremlins hiding in cars were killed, Hermione made one last round to make sure there was no more random machinery that a gremlin might have hidden in. Hermione informed the people at the camp that the scent of lemons would help deter future infestations of gremlins.

Hermione was about to bid farewell when the Drabarni called out to her.

“Come here,” the older woman said.

Unsure what else the clan leader might want, Hermione went over. She was hoping not to stay too much longer as her husband might get worried and try and find her, and stumble upon his wife surrounded by a bunch of partially magical strangers.

“Sit,” the Drabarni said, pointing Hermione to a chair facing the one the old woman herself was sitting in.

Hermione obliged and sat down across from her.

“We don't have any money to pay you.”

“It's no bother, please. I'm just trying to be helpful,” Hermione began, but was cut off.

“We cannot let you go while we feel indebted to you. No one wants to have you leave and live with an unpaid debt to a witch.”
Hermione was starting to feel a little nervous wondering if she could Apparate if anything funny happened.

“Let me read your palm as payment,” the Drabarni said.

Hermione silently let out a sigh of relief. Of all the magical arts, Hermione felt Divination, including palmistry, was one of the most inexact and unreliable forms of magic. But if this woman wanted to do a bit of palmistry to put her and the rest of the clan’s mind at ease, then she was willing to put up with a bit of silliness.

The woman examined Hermione’s left hand at first, turning it over before flipping it back. The palmist played with the skin on each knuckle a little, peer between fingers, and examined the length of each digit and nail.

“You were in a war,” the old woman began.

Hermione wondered how much this old woman knew of the wizarding world, since Hermione was well known enough, being Harry Potter’s best friend.

“A lot of people were in the war,” Hermione countered.

“Yes, but you were there with the Chosen One. You’re his close friend.”

A lot of people knew Hermione was friends with Harry. It meant nothing.

“You’re in an unhappy marriage,” she continued.

A lot of people were unhappy in their marriage. This was merely a fishing tactic used by some charlatans, Hermione told herself.

“You work with your hands.” Before Hermione could say anything, the woman added, “You have some impressive callouses,” as if sensing the dismissive attitude Hermione was trying to mask in order to avoid being rude to these people.

Hermione remained silent.

“You’re not happy in your work and you wish there was more accomplishment in your life. A sadness. Many friends lost during the war.”

Another generalization Hermione dismissed, but it hit close to home.

The old woman inspected Hermione’s heart-line on her left hand and gave Hermione a knowing sly smirk, before setting her left hand down to begin her work on Hermione’s right hand.

“The left tells the past on a woman, and the right the future,” the old woman explained.

Hermione knew this, but let the woman ramble on.

“Ah, I see a major career change ahead. But this depends on...” The woman paused and flipped Hermione’s hand over, back and forth a few times, before continuing. “... it is still unclear. I can't see this part of your future.”

Hermione wondered how much longer this would continue.

“Your marriage will not last the rest of the year.”

Hermione's heart began to hammer in her chest. There was no way this old Romani woman would know anything about her problems with Ron, but it was probably another stab in the dark that hit true to the mark. Even a broken clock could be right twice a day.

“Your lover...” She gave Hermione that same sly smirk again. “He has a very dark and troubled past, but he has a good heart. A great bond between you two, very deep. He is...” The old woman trailed off and made a fist with her hand as if to imply Severus' sexual prowess and virility. The others listening in snickered quietly, understanding what her gestures implied sexually.
Hermione was ready to yank her hand out of the old woman's grip when the palmist tightened her grip after sensing the witch's desire to flee.

Gazing deeply into Hermione’s eyes, the Drabarni announced flatly, “Within the next six months, a blood relation will die and another will be in the hospital. If you have the opportunity to leave with your lover, do so. But if you do not leave with him, you will see him again in the future.” She finally let go of Hermione's hand to sit back in her chair, appraising the young woman as if there was nothing left to hide.

Hermione sat there, her mouth agape. She had read about the rare Roma palmist who had “the gift.” They never accepted money, as they felt coin would taint their gift. People who came to them begging for their fortune to be told would be rejected. It was only when it was a reading freely given that these Roma palmists would give true readings of any value. It was the debt the Drabarni had wanted to relieve herself of that caused her to read Hermione's palm in payment for the witch's help.

“Thank you,” Hermione croaked out, finally finding her voice.

“Don't thank me,” she replied, without sorrow. “Some people find knowing the future to be a curse they cannot escape. They change their course of action in order to run away from it, only to find themselves on the path they were trying to flee from in the end.”

With nothing to add to the old woman's words of wisdom, Hermione bowed her head slightly in respect and quietly left the camp deep in thought.

When she got back to her parents’ house, Ron greeted her.

“I was about to go out looking for you. Have a good walk?”

“Yeah,” his wife said distractedly. “Lots of memories,” she said to mask the nervousness that she couldn't shake.

“I think your mum is ready to serve cake.”

Hermione followed Ron inside and sat in her chair as her mother brought out a chocolate cake she had bought at Marks & Spencer. It was delicious, but Hermione could not taste it, still unnerved by
As the evening came towards a close, Wendy took her daughter aside.

“I didn't want to say anything and I didn't want you to worry,” Hermione's mother began, “but next week I'm going in the hospital for a day.”

“What?” Hermione shrieked, suddenly feeling panic rising in her chest.

“It's nothing, just removal of a couple fibroids from my uterus. It's nothing to worry about.” Mrs. Granger seemed to be perfectly fine about her upcoming operation, but the news of this sent Hermione into a tizzy.

“You're going into the hospital?” Hermione was trying not to hyperventilate.

“It's perfectly fine. The receptionist at our office had the same surgery done a few years ago and she's fine. It is a very simple procedure.” Wendy tried her best to calm her distraught daughter.

Despite her mother's assurances, Hermione began recalling the palmist's reading, remembering the prediction that a blood relative would be in the hospital and another dead within six months. Hermione had very few blood relatives, which meant a high probability of her mother or father possibly being the one who might die.

Hermione wanted to tell her mother about the reading of her palm from her trip to the Romani camp, but then decided she would not say anything after remembering the words of warning from the old woman. Despite how she might try to avoid her fate, she might be choosing to run towards her destiny regardless of her actions.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: At this point, I'd like to put out a call for an alternative for my second beta. One of my betas can get quite busy, and my buffer of edited chapters is now gone. I'd like an alternative beta in which to add as either a part time or full time beta (to edit when my second beta can't, or to be included as a third beta), depending on how much you can commit to editing my chapters. Hey, we all have a life. I'm looking for an experienced beta who has done beta work before, mostly for spelling, grammar and punctuation. Private message me if you are interested.

And of course, thanks to my current betas, JuneW and Rogue_Panda.

In no way am I implying the Roma brought the gremlins into Hermione's neighborhood. They caught a case of them from someone else in the neighborhood when they stopped to camp the night in the field, which is why they suddenly had trouble with their vehicles. Hermione's mother assumed wrongly, it was one of her neighbors who was the source of the infestation, as noted in a follow up memo by the Ministry as to finding the original nest of them three doors down from her parent's home.

“There are four basic types of magicians in Romani tradition; a Chovani (f) / Chovano (m), basically a Sorceress and sorcery, who works with the elements and their energies; a Drabengro or Patrinengri, a kind of Hedge Witch, or 'Good Witch', who works with herbs and potions mainly; a Drabarni, Wise or Cunning Woman, who tells fortunes, heals and answers questions; and finally the Borsorka, or 'Evil Witch', who harms people. The names of these varies in the many Romani dialects, for example amongst the Romnichal of England an 'evil' witch is called a Bun, and a Sorceress a Choviar, but these are the names most used in the academic literature and derive from the dominant Balkan tradition (principally of the Kalderas). In addition to these specialists any Romani can learn and use magic, the elders in particular were once said to use it to punish miscreants or protect the community. The popular use of magic amongst ordinary Romanis however is usually a sham, particularly when used to frighten or con the Gadjos.”

Chapter Fifty-Eight

“Testing, Testing, Testing”

Disclaimer: The characters contained herein are not mine. No money is being made from this fiction, which is presented for entertainment purposes only.

Ron had spent the night of Hermione's birthday at their flat, but voluntarily slept on the couch. He had successfully transfigured the slightly worn and definitely lumpy piece of furniture into a bed large enough to fit his entire length.

By the time Hermione woke up on Saturday morning, Ron was gone and the couch changed back, the flat returned to its previous state as if her husband had not been there at all.

Ginny arrived shortly after breakfast, having made their appointment at Madam Hope's Eternal Springs and Day Spa for ten o'clock, and hinting that it would be an all-day treat.

As Hermione handed Ginny the stolen boomslang skin, she mentioned she had plans later that day after the spa.

The red-head replied with a twinkle in her eye that Hermione should just bring everything with her that she would need after the spa, since they were probably going to be there a while.

Hermione didn't want to exactly tell Ginny she had plans to spend the night at Severus', but wondered if Ginny already knew.
As they entered into the foyer of the spa, Hermione inhaled deeply, smelling the mixture of various scents of floral and herbal body scrubs; she already felt herself beginning to relax. She thought about how she would be scrubbed herself within an inch of her life, making her skin soft for Severus. She knew how her face would be exfoliated, and the annoying little blackheads around the corners of her nose would be gone, making herself beautiful for her lover.

They were about to enter the women's side of the spa when Hermione noticed that the men's side was closed again. She wondered if it was always closed, or was it merely coincidence that the men's side was closed when she and Ginny came.

Inside Hermione’s dressing area – or undressing area – the wall had a panorama mosaic of an Italian palazzo amid the Campania countryside, with Mount Vesuvius in the background; it made her wish she could go to another country for real, she thought longingly as she undressed.

“I have a very special treat for you for your birthday,” Ginny spoke through the tapestry divider between the two cubicles. “I think you'll be surprised. Are you ready for me to come over now?”

Hermione had her towel tucked around her to cover herself since she wasn't as confident about her body as her more curvaceous sister-in-law. She pulled the curtain back and was surprised to find her friend fully wrapped in a towel like herself, since Ginny usually walked about the women's side with her upper torso exposed.

Sauntering into Hermione's area, the red-head pulled the curtain closed and gave Hermione a wicked grin. Standing next to the wall, Ginny gave it a gentle rap with her knuckles in a spot where the shape of a key hole was discreetly placed in the middle of the mosaic palazzo.

A door quietly cracked open, exposing a portal large enough for one person to pass through at a time. Cocking her head, Ginny indicated quietly for Hermione to follow.

Passing through the dark and narrow corridors that snaked and turned with the walls, Hermione started to ask questions, but Ginny shushed her as they stealthily padded along. Ginny then nudged her head towards a door adorned with shells, indicating Hermione should enter.

“What about—” Hermione whispered quietly.
“You'll see,” Ginny said with a wink, before slinking off down the passage and around the corner out of sight.

Hesitantly, Hermione pushed the door open and stood agape at the grandeur of the grotto before her. The architecture definitely spoke of time long past, an era of romanticism and embellishment.

“I hope you find Ginny's present a suitable surprise,” said Severus as he emerged from around a screen, startling Hermione in the process.

He was standing there with a smirk upon his lips, dressed in nothing but a towel about his hips.

Hermione quickly rushed over to Severus and threw her arms about him, peppering his face with quick kisses. “This was unexpected, but certainly the best birthday surprise ever,” she said, beaming, when she finally stopped kissing him. “But this place?” she said, still in awe of her surroundings.

“Rebuilt during the Restoration period, with secret passages for royalty, high-level Ministry officials and the crème of wizarding society to rendezvous with paramours and courtesans,” he said, keeping his gaze upon her as she looked about. “We have the grotto from now until just after lunch, while Ginny and Draco go frolic on the men's side.”

“Wait, does this mean that every time I've come to the spa with Ginny, she's gone off for a rendezvous with Draco?” she asked. It would finally explain why every time she came she saw the men's side closed down, and also explain the long periods when Ginny was supposedly getting “treatments.”

“Yes, we have the whole men's side to ourselves.”

“But doesn't that cost a fortune to close down the whole men's side?” Hermione brought up, wondering the price of such a monthly stunt.

“Miss Brown is a silent partner of the spa. She has the men's side shut down monthly so Draco and I can do final testing, in secret, on products before they go to market. I will not go into all the various formulations of no-chip nail polish, dandruff-suppressing shampoo, body scrubs, moisturizers and other products Draco and I have tried over the years,” he confessed, dramatically rolling his eye up to the shell-encrusted ceiling.
Hermione suppressed a small giggle at the image of Severus having to wear pink nail polish. She stopped when she realized that she would be having to do the same things when she finally took her Potions apprenticeship, and she'd be the human guinea pig for Lavender's products.

In the grotto was a large reclining area that could double as an expansive bed or lounging couch, covered with firm pillows of various shapes and sizes, and soft white sheets used by the spa. It reminded Hermione of an extremely large opium bed.

“Do you think between now and lunch we'll have enough time,” Hermione said breathlessly, as the mood changed from admiration of the surroundings to arousal, being in close proximity to her lover.

Severus placed a vial of natural lubrication potion in her hand. “Then we'd better not waste any.” Though he had not taken any potions for his own arousal, his towel was already beginning to tent from his growing erection.

Hermione downed the lubrication potion in one go, as Severus released her towel and watched it slip down her torso, gliding along her hips and legs before falling to the floor. With one hand he guided her to the makeshift bed, encouraging her to lie down.

Propped up on her elbows, Hermione watched as Severus approached the bed with a hungry look in his eyes before discarding his own towel. Crawling on all fours, Severus had the look of a panther about to devour his prey. Positioned above Hermione, they kissed slowly, knowing they had all day to take their time. She noted the slight scruff on his face, which was a different sensation on her skin than the clean-shaven feel she was used to.

Severus kissed his way down Hermione’s neck, stroking the sides of her ribs in the way she taught him, making her gasp and shudder involuntarily.

Giving up on trying to prop herself up, Hermione fully reclined back. She luxuriated in the feel of Severus' hair tickling her skin as he nuzzled and sucked gently at her breasts before he continued his path down her body. He spent a while licking and nipping at her stomach and hip bones before finally settling himself between her legs to delicately kiss the folds of flesh that covered that precious pearl of her sex.

Using his fingers to part her, his tongue tentatively licked her clitoris, at which Hermione's head shot up as she gasped loudly, her body taut with anticipation. Severus dove into her more hungrily, and Hermione shouted wordlessly at the intensity of feeling as his mouth licked and devoured her, lapping at the juices the natural lubrication potion magnified.
Hermione gazed down to see a dark head of hair partially curtaining a pair of black eyes staring back at her. It was all too much for her. She laid her head back and arched her back, her hands grabbing fistfuls of Severus' hair as he continued until he brought Hermione to her first of many orgasms.

Before she could finish catching her breath, Hermione quickly spun around and guided Severus’ cock to her mouth as he faced her feet. Grabbing his hips, she began guiding the pace of his movements and encouraged him to slide into her mouth, indicating a depth and speed that was comfortable. Periodically, Hermione would very slowly guide him to shove all of him into her mouth as she felt the curve of his cock bend around the back of her mouth and down her throat, and then he removed himself slowly before her gag reflexes kicked in. In this position, the curve of Severus’ cock made it much easier for her to deep-throat him.

Severus had had many blow jobs in his days and even given instruction as a gigolo, but what Hermione was doing was quite incredible even for him. Her pacing was languid and nearly torturous in its drawing out of pleasure. He wanted nothing more than to pump himself furiously into her mouth, but knew he should relinquish control to Hermione and he should relish the moment despite his innate urges.

Hermione gently played with his sac with one hand while continuing to guide his hips with her other hand. She could hear from the rasping of Severus’ gasps that he was near.

“I'm...” he cried out, indicating he was about to orgasm and was going to pull himself from her mouth. But then she grasped his hips firmly and slowly shoved him all the way down her throat, wanting to swallow all of Severus' seed. He shuddered violently as he came, his cock throbbing with each pulse, and he spent himself in her.

Hermione swallowed as best as she could – some spilled out of the sides of her mouth – and choked a little bit towards the end. When she sat up finally, some beads of the pearly fluid still dribbling from the corners of her mouth, Severus then reached over and kissed her furiously and deeply. He could taste himself on her lips just as she could taste herself on his tongue.

Finally breaking apart from one another, Severus went to grab a towel to clean away the last of himself from her face, while Hermione fetched a couple glasses of water.

Laying back, entwined in each other's arms, Hermione asked, “So you get this place to yourself once a month, every month?”
“Yes.”

“That explains why Ginny loves coming here so often,” she surmised, not mentioning her observations that Ginny always looked very relaxed at the end of the day.

Hermione rolled over onto her stomach to regard Severus as he laid back, an arm tucked behind his head to he could regard the object of his desire.

Unbidden, the memory of the old Romani woman the night before flashed in Hermione's mind, as vivid as if she was there. If you have the opportunity to leave with your lover, do so. But if you do not leave with him, you will see him again in the future.

The sudden change of Hermione's mood did not go unnoticed. One moment she was gazing sweetly at Severus, then as quick as a summer storm, trouble clouded her eyes and she buried her face in his side to hide her distress.

“What's the matter?” her lover coaxed her to unburden herself, lovingly stroking her hair.

She would tell him eventually, so there was no point in waiting. Hermione relayed the story of the trip to her parents’ house and her encounter with the palm reader, omitting the last two lines about fleeing with Severus. He was ready to dismiss it as she had, until Hermione informed him of her mother's trip to the hospital after she returned back to her parents’ house.

Severus stared at the back of her head as he curled up to spoon behind her, unable to form a response. What could one say to comfort Hermione, with the knowledge that a blood relation of hers could die within six months? The hinting at Severus and Draco's flight, and Hermione's new career. With Hermione not telling him the last two lines of her fortune, he took the palm reading to mean that cooperation of the weather for the final ingredient was a nebulous future that she could not see, which frightened him.

They lay curled together on their sides for a while until Severus began tenderly kissing Hermione's shoulders. Hermione arched her back, pressing her bottom into his lap while guiding his hand to cup her breasts. Severus felt the stirrings of his arousal. Wanting to see his face, she turned to lay on her back, throwing her top leg over his hip and settling the other one between his legs for him to grasp with his thighs, as she guided him into her, her body perpendicular to his as their loins met. It was a position that required little effort and allowed for an unhurried movement of hips.

The lovers knew that their time together would not last forever, that eventually he would leave. Hermione held the undisclosed knowledge that she had the option to go with him, but she wanted to fight her destiny and had already decided to stay behind to spite the Fates.

Severus increased the speed, eventually shifting above Hermione, as he propped up on his hands, with his arms stiff. Her body twisted, one leg still between his, the other leg braced against his torso, her foot just above his shoulder, partially supporting his weight. Gazing up, she marveled at the hypnotic sway of his hair as it framed his face, and the way the muscles on his torso flexed and tightened as he pushed himself deeper into her before withdrawing to return again, like the rhythm of the waves along the shore.

Since Severus had not taken any potions to enhance his virility, it took much longer for him to orgasm a second time. They had changed position many times and Hermione found one where the curve of Severus' cock stroked her just so that she rode him furiously with desperation. He helped bring her over the edge when he moved his thumb to stroke her clit, causing her to shut her eyes tight with an exquisite grimace upon her face. Enthralled with the beauty of her lost on pleasure, Severus surrendered to his own needs and came, growling as he held her tight.

After taking care of her bodily needs, Hermione joined Severus in the pool of hot water in the one corner of the grotto. Sitting on opposite sides of the tub, their feet grazing each other's legs, they sat silently, letting their bodies recuperate. When Hermione started feeling overcome by the heat, she removed herself from the warm tub to sit in the cold plunge tub, squeaking as the chilled water came in contact with her overheated skin.

Severus enjoyed watching her body react to the cold, especially as her flesh goose-pimpled and her nipples puckered tightly in response to the temperature change. Removing himself from the warm tub, he jumped in the cold plunge quickly, reacting little to the shock of temperature change.

“How can you handle that?” asked Hermione, implying the drastic change in temperature without physically cringing.

“Many years having to harvest ingredients from the lake at Hogwarts. Potions to keep the chill off the bones while diving don't last forever, and some people eventually can gain a tolerance to the cold,” he told her.

Hermione gave a shudder while remembering how cold the water was up in Scotland, especially that one time Ron accidentally knocked her into the lake. A drying charm had removed nearly all of the water then, but there was a dampness that chilled her to the bone that she couldn't rid herself of until she got back to Gryffindor Tower to take a hot shower, change clothes and get a cup of hot tea into herself before she was no longer cold.
Removing herself from the cold plunge, the witch went to recline on the bed, laying on her side, propped up on one elbow so she could continue to watch Severus soak.

“Care for a massage?” she offered.

Severus rose from the tub immediately. “Absolutely,” he accepted eagerly.

Lying face down, Hermione began to work on Severus’ back, reciting the various muscles and bones she had been working to memorize from her mother's old copy of Gray's Anatomy. There were a few muscle names that she switched, and he corrected her, but for the most part, she identified the parts correctly as she rubbed plain almond oil with care along his skin. By the time she had reached his feet, Hermione noticed he was softly snoring, having dropped off somewhere shortly after she worked on his calves.

Not wanting to disturb him, she grabbed a heavy cotton blanket that was placed along the side of the bed and covered him up; she was lying next to him, her legs touching his, but not cuddling so close as to wake him. Hermione allowed her own mind to drift off and sleep for a while until an unseen house-elf discreetly rang a bell to announce that lunch had been served.

Rising from their brief slumber, Severus and Hermione donned plush cotton bathrobes before padding over to the middle of the grotto, where beneath the skylight a table had been placed, filled with an array of fare.

“I hope you don't mind, but I instructed the spa elves to prepare a light lunch since we still have the pool, sauna, steam room and some latest product testing to look forward to this afternoon,” Severus said, as he helped Hermione into her seat.

“We are testing products?” Hermione asked, curious as to what was involved.

“By this point in the product development cycle, when Draco and I test them, we have worked out most of the kinks, but there is the trial phase to see if they work as planned,” he explained as he lifted the lid from the tureen of soup and ladled a cup of curried pumpkin soup into a small bowl before handing it to his lunch companion. “Be glad I have worked out most of the problems with the temporary hair dye solution and this is the final weekend of testing. It should take only one shampooing to rinse it clean instead of the four shampooings to get rid of the film it originally left behind. This will be part of your job working for Miss Brown as Dobmeir's apprentice. What we've done at my flat is what you'd be doing under a traditional Potions apprenticeship, plus other duties.”
As they sampled an array of sandwiches perched on a tiered stand, and the lightly dressed salad served up on delicate china plates accented with an aquatic theme, they discussed other aspects of the products they'd be testing and the process Severus went through while developing them.

When they were done, Severus extended his hand to help Hermione up, tucking her arm into his as they crossed the grotto before guiding her down the labyrinth of passage ways towards the men's side of the spa. Upon reaching a door, Severus rapped upon it in a particular pattern, signaling it was him.

“Just a moment,” Draco called out from the side of the door.

There was the noise of feet scuffling and the distinct sound of Ginny giggling before the door opened up to reveal Draco and Ginny in matching spa robes.

“Lunch should be ready and waiting by the time you reach the grotto,” Severus informed them as he and Hermione emerged from the secret corridor.

Hermione gave Ginny a brief hug. “Best present ever, thank you,” the older witch beamed.

Ginny returned a kiss upon her friend's cheek. “Happy birthday.”

Draco and his lover quickly passed through the door before it closed behind them to leave Severus and his own lover alone in the expanse of the men's side of the spa.

Severus dropped his robe and dove head first into the vast natatorium. Hermione slipped from her robe and gently toed into the pool, unsure if it was the same cool temperature that it was on the women's side. Sliding fully into the tepid crystal water, Hermione swam out into the middle to meet Severus.

Above the two, as they floated limply on their backs, the stained glass figure of Poseidon was getting rather frisky with the Nereids. His erection grew rather stout before he mounted one of the many coyly frolicking ocean nymphs, who protested before succumbing to her carnal desires in typical Greek mythological rape/comfort fashion. Once done, he would start the cycle over again, chasing after another stained glass Nereid, trapping her, then engaging in some non-consensual canoodling before she succumbed to Poseidon's sexual charms and “enjoyed” it in the end.
“Does Poseidon always behave like a sexual predator when the men's side of the spa is open, or is this mythological rape reenactment for our viewing pleasure alone,” Hermione remarked with little amusement. The whole scene reminded her too much of how she was not that enamored of Ron pouncing and then mounting her, while she pretended to enjoy their coupling for the sake of not raising Ron's suspicions.

“Poseidon usually gets 'inspired' after watching Draco and Ginny frolic, but otherwise he's usually well behaved.”

It was unnerving enough to have the stained glass figures watching, but considering all the things the portraits of Hogwarts watched Hermione engage in, there was little cause for her to be prudish.

They floated for a while in comfortable silence.

“Severus?”

“Hmm.”

“If you didn't go into Potions, what do you think you might have done for a career?”

“I've known from a young age I had always wanted to go into Potions,” Severus confessed. “I can't imagine myself doing anything else. But I suppose something involving Defense Against the Dark Arts. Perhaps an Auror, but considering my background and disposition when younger, that would have never happened.”

Hermione floated for a while, somewhat envious that Severus knew what he wanted to do with his life. She had felt herself drawn in a dozen different directions, pulled by many disciplines with the urge to learn them all. But even when her opportunity to apprentice in Transfiguration and Charms was removed, she had turned her attentions toward other areas of study in her pursuit of an apprenticeship. Perhaps if she was as passionate about one subject as Severus was about Potions, she might have been driven to find some avenue to master an area of study with more determination.

As she floated, she drifted closer to Severus.
“Hermione?”

“Hmm?”

“If you never were a witch, which Muggle profession would you have gone on to study?”

Hermione had recently discussed this with her mother, so it didn't take any time for her to contemplate an answer. “Something in the medical arts. Doctor, possibly. Maybe a dentist like my parents, or a research scientist.”

They floated for a while longer before she added, “I sometimes wonder how different life would have been if there had been no Dark Lord, no first or second war. But wondering and wishing can't change what has already passed.” She refrained from using Voldemort's name in Severus' presence, understanding how greatly it upset him to this day.

Hermione was getting tired of trying to ignore Poseidon and his repeated sexual assaults above her head. She suggested a change of venue.

The sauna on the men's side seemed to run hotter than the women's. It could be that the frequent use by others on the women's side – versus the few occupants using the men's side – allowed the sauna to build up more heat in between the opening and closing of the door. Severus was able to stand the heat longer than Hermione could.

She had chilled down in the cold plunge pool and was ready to visit the steam room by the time Severus emerged, glistening with sweat over his entire body. Hermione decided to rehydrate with some raspberry leaf and lemon-infused water, reclining on a chaise lounge while waiting for Severus. She handed him a glass to sip while in the cold plunge.

As they sat in the steam room enveloped by the sultry mist, Severus noted how much he was enjoying Hermione's company. They spoke periodically about various topics, but Hermione was also very comfortable to let long periods of silence pass without feeling the urge to start chattering in order to fill the void of conversation. In many way, she was a much more companionable partner during his day at the spa than Draco could be. Though Draco was not prone to idle rambling, he was a bit more chatty with a slight sophomoric streak of humor, but Hermione's level of verboseness at times, or lack of it, seemed to be a better match to Severus' own level.

After a few more rounds of the sauna, cold plunge and steam room, Severus was ready to show “Black? I’m dying my hair black?” Hermione asked, looking at the temporary hair dye solution Severus handed her.

“Draco already tried it, but we need to test it on someone with a different natural color and texture. I already tried various shades of brown and dark- to medium-blond.” Severus was in another stall, so she had no idea what color he got stuck with.

Hermione read the directions on the bottle twice and applied it with little difficulty, glad it would not stain her skin and stick only to her hair. Her mother dyed her hair and she remembered the use of Vaseline, gloves, plus the pungent stench of ammonia that followed with the Muggle mixture.

Emerging from her stall, she went to the nearest mirror to view her changed appearance. While noticing how much paler her skin looked now, she glanced at her reflection over her shoulder as a platinum head appeared behind her. Shrieking and grabbing a towel to cover herself, she thought it was Malfoy who had wandered in on her – only to finally realize it was Severus with a head of platinum locks.

“I thought you were Malfoy for a moment.” Hermione still held a hand to her chest while regaining her breath.

“I should take that admission as a compliment that the hair dye does a good job of covering my natural color completely. Though I’m not sure Draco would find it much of a compliment that you mistook me for him,” he joked lightly.

Hermione examined the coverage of the temporary hair dye with a closer inspection. “Amazing, it looks as if this was your natural color, though your eye brows really should be colored as well as there is such a stark contrast it makes it look like an otherwise very good bleach job,” she noted, as she twisted a hank of Severus’ hair and viewed it in the light of the men's shower area to watch how the highlights shone along the strands.

“You...” Severus began, his eyes alight. “This is a rather stunning color on you. Should you attend the Ministry's masked ball this Halloween, I highly recommend this color on you. It's quite fetching.”

He played with a damp tendril that had fallen forward and along the tops of her breast.
“I thought about dyeing my hair red like Ginny’s once or a much lighter chestnut, but she said with my coloring, and with the latest additions to my wardrobe, I should keep my dark chestnut coloring.” Then Hermione suddenly remembered something. “Damn! Ginny and I were going to go to Madame Maurelle Mandel’s to go dress shopping before we came here.”

“You can always go tomorrow,” he suggested as he slid behind her and dipped his head down to start nibbling on her ear. “And then you can always model for me whatever you purchase.” His breath was hot, and his voice low and rumbling. “Preferably something easy to slip from your body.” Severus’ hand slipped down Hermione's back to caress her hip. “With matching knickers.” His hand slid further down to caress the top of her thigh. “Stockings.” One hand skated up her stomach to cup her breast. “And don't forget the matching bra.”

Leaning her head back against Severus’ shoulder, she caught the sight of two strangers in the middle of a seduction in the mirror behind the sink.

She knew it was her and Severus, but the dramatic change in hair color made them both almost unrecognizable even to her own eyes.

Noticing where Hermione's attention was directed, Severus met her gaze in the reflection. “You want to watch,” he whispered.

“Yes,” she breathed, feeling as if this was something esoteric. She couldn't stand the idea of her own husband watching her masturbate, but the idea of her lover watching while they performed in a mirror turned her on in ways that made a twisting curl in her belly throb in its forbidden allure.

“What else arouses you that you dare not admit,” Severus prompted her. The resonating sound of his voice bid her to confess what she had trouble admitting to herself in her own mind.

“I want...” she began, but stopped when her breath hitched as Severus reached his hand down to start stroking her labia.

“Yes,” he purred, making her reservations melt away.

“I want to be restrained.” She had mentioned this before to Severus, but it was under the spell of the libido-enhancing potion and therefore to be dismissed. This time she admitted it without the influence of the potion. She closed her eyes.
“Open your eyes,” he commanded her.

She obeyed, and she was rewarded with the stroking of her clit in the only was Severus knew how to touch her to slowly build the tension.

“How.” He wanted to know more.

His eyes bored into hers, locking them in place. Everything melted away around them except the vision of each other's eyes and the sensation they were causing in each other's bodies. Hermione reached behind her back and found Severus’ stiffening flesh, and she slowly began to stroke him as he continued on. This was better than the fantasy she had of “Calleo” that first night they met.

“You've captured me. And I resist, but you seduce me, make me unable to resist you, tease me until I beg you to take me,” she confessed.

“Do I whip you?” he asked.

“Would it be painful?” she asked, slightly nervous.

“Not unless you want it to hurt,” he assured her. “You'd be amazed at how the body, in a heightened state of sexual arousal, produces a phenomenal amount of natural painkillers.” He moved his head lower while nipping the top of Hermione's shoulder with his teeth lightly while keeping eye contact. “Imagine the bites I have set upon your neck before in the heat of passion, how those bites would have hurt had you not been aroused, had you not begged me to bite harder, digging my teeth deeper into your flesh.” Severus slipped two fingers into Hermione. “Marking this territory as mine. You liked it when I have claimed you in such a primal fashion, have you not?”

Hermione was finding it hard to keep her eyes open, but she maintained eye contact with Severus as he continued to seduce her. Her hand kept the same slow stroking pace.

“Yes, I have.” Hermione's mind, set loose from its normal confines of self-consciousness ventured on. “And tell me what you want to do to me that you have held back from asking. What do you want me to experience at your hands that I have never known before,” she asked, willing to entertain any idea that Severus put forth in her current state of mind.
Severus removed his hand from Hermione’s folds and brought his hands up to his mouth to lick her essence, before adding more of his own saliva to his fingers to bring down behind and part her cheeks, stroking his finger around her anus.

“This,” Severus professed. “I want you to experience the pleasure of an erogenous zone you have yet to explore.”

Hermione's eyes momentarily flickered wider with surprise. He could see the hesitation.

Ron and Hermione had attempted anal sex once; it was an unmitigated disaster filled with embarrassment, tears, pain and uncomfortable apologies. But this was Severus, the man who had brought her sexuality to bloom as a rose in the warm summer sun.

“I am willing to learn,” she gasped, trying to keep her nervousness tamped down.

In the basket nearby was an assortment of various potions Severus might find useful for his day at the spa with Hermione, besides the product they'd be testing. One of them was a bottle of lubrication he had packed just in case.

Returning behind Hermione, he relaxed her by going back to kissing her neck while gazing into each other’s eyes in the mirror. One hand slid down to return to her folds to rebuild Hermione to the level of prior arousal.

“We'll go slowly, very slowly,” he cooed in her ear.

Hermione began playing with her own nipples, enthralled by the tableau of eroticism she was witnessing.

Sensing she was relaxed, Severus applied the lubrication to one finger and slowly stroked the outer entrance of Hermione's anus. Immediately, he felt her tighten up.

“Shh, slow. Remember to relax,” he reminded her as his fingers on her front slipped into her vagina, making her gasp haltingly.
When he sensed that she had relaxed, he slowly introduced his finger into her anus and watched her face for her reaction. Her eyes went a little wider, but her eyebrow knit in that familiar fashion they did when she was lost in pleasure. Hermione's mouth opened to create a perfect circle.

A long low moan escaped her mouth.

This was nothing like what she had experienced with Ron. The intrusion of Severus’ finger felt strange, but also titillating, even risqué. It was slightly uncomfortable, but she eventually relaxed and no longer found the sensation bothersome, but welcomed.

Convinced that Hermione was now accustomed to the presence of his finger in her, Severus began to slowly move his finger in and out, matched by the rhythm of his other hand which was fingering her vagina.

Hermione found it very hard to continue to stand up straight, so she bent forward to brace herself along the edge of the sink, keeping eye contact with Severus in the large mirror.

Presented with Hermione's sweet backside, Severus removed his fingers from her vagina and replaced it with his cock.

The parallel sensations of Severus inside of her while his finger worked slowly in and out of her arse brought her to a slow but powerful orgasm, resulting in her voice echoing off the tiles as she screamed. Her eyes finally broke contact, shut tight to revel in the new sensations Severus had made her body feel.

Severus tried with all his might to not have his own knees buckle from underneath him. He leaned forward bracing his hands next to Hermione's on the sink, his sweat-bespangled brow resting in the middle of her back.

He knew that if he and Hermione were going to make love again later in the day, he'd need the help of the male enhancement potion to give him the fortitude and strength to perform. One or two orgasms in a day without the potion's assistance was not hard, but a third time was really pressing the bounds of his natural stamina.

Slowly he removed his finger from Hermione and went to wash up, while Hermione took care of her own needs.
They spent the next few hours trying the various formulations of body scrubs in patches on each other's bodies, noting the grittiness of one and the smooth texture of the other. Hermione was not fond of a particular astringent Severus seemed to like, so she suggested it be used for the Valiant Wizard line of products, since it was too intense for her skin, and probably most other women. There was a shaving crème Severus tried on his own face that Hermione used on her legs and raved about how it left her legs smooth, but he didn't care for the cool minty burn afterwards. Hermione was almost a little sad when they had to rinse the temporary hair dye. The blond hair wasn't that complimentary to Severus' color, but it did make for an interesting change.

Hermione finally mentioned her belongings left back in her cubicle on the women's side and her wand, but Severus informed her that the spa elves had already moved them to a cubicle on the men's side.

Severus was going to dress in the same cubicle as Hermione, but she shooed him out telling him it was a surprise. She had packed something a little special for Severus.

Emerging from her cubicle, her three-quarter cloak in place and her other clothes stowed away in her small reticule accented with glass beads, Hermione found Severus waiting for her dressed all in black with a matching cloak. They were all dressed up as if ready to head out on the town for the night to paint it red.

“If you didn't have dinner planned,” she said, “I might have suggested we go out together and hide out in the Muggle Theater District, finding some last-minute tickets to a Shakespeare play or a musical. But given that Draco and Ginny were spotted all those years ago, it's a pity that we can't. You certainly look fashionable enough, though.” Hermione surveyed Severus in his outfit. But all she would need was some witch or wizard wandering around Muggle London who recognized Severus and Hermione, and it would be over faster than you can say, “Rita Skeeter Exclusive.”

Severus' eyes raked over Hermione in her outfit as well, a sly smile spread across his face.

“I thought you said you didn't get a chance to visit Madame Maurelle Mandel's yet,” he said. He admired the dress and cloak combination and the application of make-up, noting it was just enough to accent her eyes and face, but not so much as he'd have the lingering taste of it in his mouth when he would kiss her.

“I didn't,” Hermione replied as she twirled around so Severus could see the outfit better. “This is the dress that Ron hates that caused all that trouble.”
“Ah, the infamous little black dress,” he remembered, his face lighting up as his smile broadened. “May I?” he asked, as he made to temporarily remove her shortened cloak and view the back of the dress.

“How about you wait to unwrap your present until we get back to your place?” she countered.

“Happy birthday to me,” Severus muttered under his breath as he guided Hermione towards the Floo that would take them back to the Red Ginseng.

Fortunately there was a discreet Floo on the men's side of the spa they could use, so Hermione would not be spotted out in the main foyer as they left.

Severus emerged first and made sure that there were no pesky Aurors hiding around the building before Hermione came through the Floo a few minutes later.

As they walked up the stairs together, Severus provided an arm to help Hermione while she walked in high heels.

Arriving at Severus' flat, Marf had set everything in place so they could enjoy the Beef Bourguignon Severus had prepared and placed in the oven before meeting Hermione at the spa. Marf had been left in charge to make sure it was pulled from the oven and kept warm; he also had orders to prepare the rest of the meal, which thrilled Marf to no end that he could finally employ his under-utilized cooking skills.

It was all Severus could do to remember they were about to start dinner when he helped Hermione with her cloak and saw what the fuss was about regarding her dress.

“And you left the party unmolested?”

“Barely. Though I think my conversation skills chased them away,” she said dryly.

“Thereir loss.” His eyes raked up and down her form possessively.

They dined by candlelight as twilight settled over the London skyline visible from Severus' flat.
After the main course, a light salad to cleanse the palate was served by the elf before brandied pear tart with caramel sauce and crème Anglaise finished the meal.

After dessert, Severus presented Hermione with his present to her. It was a difficult-to-find Potions book he had procured for her. It wasn't exactly something to fit into the curriculum of an apprentice, but something for her once she reached her level of mistress, a silent admission that he knew she would succeed. Ron had offered her books for her birthday, but this held so much more meaning in that it was selected just for her.

As they relaxed on the settee, Hermione gave a long and satisfied sigh. Severus gave her shoulder a light squeeze in response, non-verbally signaling he was in agreement.

Hermione's mind drifted. She mentally pictured herself introducing Severus to her parents and how they might react to her having a 'significant other' so many years older than herself. Then her mind remembered what the old fortuneteller said, and then imagined how her parents might react to the news of her divorcing Ron.

Severus’ own mind reflected on this perfect day. He had Hermione with him to satisfy him intellectually, physically and, yes, even emotionally – though he still had trouble coming to terms with that last aspect. Still, a vision of Hermione reclining in a hammock, gently swaying as the evening tropical breezes came in, book propped up on her lap while he was working on a potion in his personal lab painted a very appealing picture in his mind. He knew he couldn't ask her to come with him, but the thought was recurring to him with greater frequency.

“I believe I promised you dancing,” Severus offered. “Unless you'd like to pass.”

“Not a chance,” she replied, anxious to fulfill a fantasy she’d had since purchasing the dress – a fantasy of Severus' hands on her back as they danced.

Severus set the music box to something slow and sultry. “I Left My Heart in San Francisco” played, since it had quickly become one of her favorite requests.

As they danced, their feet barely moving, Severus' hand was placed delicately at Hermione's waist, but didn't remain there long as his hand began stroking along her spine, eliciting shuddering sighs from parted lips.

The next song was a tango, in which there was no restraint of their desires. Severus' hands possessively skated up Hermione's legs, appreciating the feel of the silk under his hands. He roughly brought her chest to meet his, his eyes burning with need.
Hermione didn't know how much longer she could dance without succumbing to her greater desire to disrobe and have Severus yet again. She snaked a leg around his, hitching it high up on the back of his thigh, skating it back down with increasing pressure, covetously clutching him to her like a clinging vine.

The song ended and another one began, but neither moved. Severus' hand went to release Hermione's dress from her shoulders, but found it resisting him.

Hermione breathed, “Finite Incantatem,” and the spell holding her dress in place ended.

Severus slipped the dress from her shoulders and watched as it fell to her hips. Gently pushing it past her hips, it finally fell to her feet.

Offering his hand, he helped Hermione step away from the dress, and stepped back to admire her in nothing but her knickers, thigh-high stockings and heels. Her wand was held in a small loop at the top of her stockings.

“Absolutely ravishing,” he breathed with awe.

It was only for the fact they had already made love many times he was able to take his time. Hermione, younger and with more energy, tried to keep the slow pace set by Severus.

She tried not to hurry as she undid his buttons, making sure to take time to suckle and play with his nipples. If it felt so good for her, it must equally feel as good for a man as well. Severus threw his head back and let an exhaustive sigh slowly escape his lips, aroused by the sensation of Hermione's lips on him.

Once his shirt was unbuttoned, Hermione led him over to the settee. She had enjoyed the sight of Severus looking up at her from between her legs earlier in the day, and she wanted to return the favor. After undoing his trousers and then removing his shoes and socks with slow purpose, she guided him to sit down before settling between his knees, kneeling before him.

There was something empowering to Hermione when she would perform fellatio on Severus. The swirl of her tongue around his head, alternating the intensity of suction, the intoxicating look of adoration he would give her as she glanced at him through lowered lashes before she engulfed him entirely in her mouth and watched his brow knit in overwhelming consternation. The way his hands would reverently play with the locks of her hair, sometimes gently guiding her pace with the coaxing of his hands, but never with force.
Severus was feeling his fortitude flagging and summoned two vials: one for himself to restore vigor, and one for Hermione since the lubrication potion had long worn off for her.

The rest of the night was spent making love by the light of the fireplace. Its light struck dramatic shadows against their bodies as they made love on the settee, on the floor, against the wall and in his bed.

After Severus climaxed the final time that night, he was asleep before Hermione could even remove herself from their tangled legs. Hermione walked as quietly as she could, though with great difficulty since she was feeling permanently bow-legged, and she was having trouble walking to the toilet to take care of her needs for the last time that night. Walking back to the bed to climb in along Severus, Hermione braced a hand against the wall for support, not minding the slight tenderness between her legs as she walked.

Feeling equally exhausted as her lover, Hermione slept deeply, but not enough so that she didn't notice the way Severus talked in his sleep or tossed and turned. It was normal for Severus to have a restless subconscious, but he had dealt with this pattern for so long, he was unaware of it, forgetting by morning the troubles that bubbled up as easily as others forgot their dreams.

That night, as Severus and Hermione slept, Hurricane Isabel, which had been threatening the fragile fluxweed crops, dissipated over Ontario, Canada after running roughshod over the southern and mid-Atlantic states. If there was nothing harvested during September's full moon, hopefully Hurricane Isabel did not ruin what might be harvested in October.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: I commissioned luxsidius, on DeviantArt, to do a bit of fanart for this chapter featuring Hermione and Severus dancing the tango with her wearing that infamous little black dress. You can view it here: http://luxsidius.deviantart.com/art/Snape-Hermione-567239887

On my Tumblr page, I have the fanart work, along with a GIF of the artwork as it's being created: http://atdlhea-betz.tumblr.com/post/137090218690/fanart-by-luxsidius-commissioned-by-me-for

Hurricane Isabel did dissipate on Saturday, September 20th, 2003, same day Hermione went to the spa with Severus. http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Hurricane_Isabel

And once again, thanks to be wonderful betas, JuneW and Rogue_Panda.
Chapter Summary

Hermione is getting rather worn out from her long days at work and long nights at Severus' flat, while she does her best to avoid Ron.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

Chapter Fifty-Nine: “Dolor Hic Tibi Proderit Olim” (Someday this pain will be useful to you)

Disclaimer:
There once was a writer named J.K. Rowling. She came up with the concept of Harry Potter and wrote a bunch of books from which we borrow her characters, concepts, and ideas. Then came along a scary fanfic writer named Betz who disclaimed ownership of any of the HP universe. After disclaiming, Betz slunk back into her writing hole to write more fanfic, while Rowling turned a forgiving blind eye. And the scary fanfic author didn't make a single dime from this fanfic, though she spent good money on fan art commissions to go along with it. The End.

==============

While his Wednesday night client, Molly Weasley, rambled on, Severus found his mind drifting back to his weekend with Hermione.

There was the tender hand reaching to seek him out in the dark of night, followed by Hermione snuggling up alongside of him once more, closing the space between them. He remembered the strange sensation of waking up next to a warm body, an experience long forgotten but welcomed. The quiet rustle of the Sunday Daily Prophet in the kitchen as they both read in silence while eating a simple breakfast Severus had prepared, then a lazy morning tussle in the bed before Hermione left to meet Ginny for some dress shopping, and the strangeness of parting by the light of day instead of saying their farewells in the dark of night.

“Eduardo?”

“Qué?” Severus shook his head, acknowledging that his mind was elsewhere, and he was rousing himself from his reverie. “A thousand pardons, Señora. Your description reminded me of my family back home in España. I was lost in remembrance,” he lied convincingly, since Molly did drone on about domestic issues quite a lot.

“Oh, I am so sorry you miss your family back in Spain,” Molly assumed with sympathy. “Maybe you should visit them. Nothing that a good visit with family doesn't fix.”

The masked wizard was unsure if the senior Mrs. Weasley had no idea that Miss Brown only employed former Death Eaters in her gigolo enterprise or if she was unaware of the travel restrictions of the Death Eater Decree. Either way, Severus just hummed in agreement with her and dropped the subject.

As the evening plodded along, Severus did his best to concentrate on the conversation, lest he slip and speak without his accent, which he nearly did before.

~~~~~~~*~

Reinvigorated, Severus was back to researching an edible body paint, much to his employer's delight. The weekend together with Hermione, in addition to their bi-weekly meetings of research and sex, had metaphorically and literally put the pink back in Severus' cheeks.

Draco had given his post-test analysis of the libido enhancing potions, as well as Ginny's own notes, remarking that the potion enhanced feelings that already existed and seemed to remove a lot of inhibition regarding declaration of emotions and physical expression of desire. Indeed, Severus could attest to that, having had Hermione come on to him rather unabashedly in a manner that was not like her usual slightly reserved self. Though even before the development of the potion, Severus was doing a fine job of breaking down those reservations himself.

Hermione and he had agreed that nothing said during their experiments should be taken seriously, but the feedback from Draco confirmed his fears that the things he had exclaimed to Hermione were more than just some potion-induced hysteria. He had not declared his love to Hermione, but he had been rather effusive in his praise of aspects of her he found alluring, and not just of the physical kind, during his short periods under the influence of the elixir.

Miss Brown had given her own feedback, giving a potent dose to some unknown male, exclaiming that it was the most mind-blowing love-making she had experienced. She wanted Severus to put all his efforts into finishing finding the right dosage of the Capresee mother of pearl so he could begin testing length of effectiveness without taking an antidote and its shelf-life potency, when he wasn't working on the edible body paint.

This aspect was somewhat daunting to Severus. Miss Brown wanted him to test what the effects would be if he took the libido- and the male-enhancing potions together. Could a wizard handle such a combination of both, and would there be any side effects? She also wanted to have him and Hermione both take the libido-enhancing potion to see what happens when both partners take a full dose. The final test would be for Severus to take the male-enhancing potion and, concurrently, he and Hermione would both take the libido-enhancing potion.

So far, he and Hermione had taken the antidote rather quickly after ingesting the test potion in turns. He began to personally understand why so many Potions masters would up marrying their female apprentices, and why married Potions masters rarely took female apprentices on, which explained the dearth of females in his profession – love potions were par for the course to master during an apprenticeship. He knew this beforehand, but only in abstract. It was just the experience of experimentation that opened his eyes to more aspects of the master/apprentice relationship.

Severus didn't worry about Dobmeir making any amorous moves on Hermione after Severus left, knowing that the age difference would be too great and that the aged master had great-grandchildren who were about Hermione's age. Besides, Dobmeir was still very much in love with his recently deceased wife and would probably be mourning her for the next ten years.

Before Severus would have to face such a potent combination of amorous theriacs, he and Hermione would still have to find the right dosage of the enigmatic Italian ingredient.

Every morning Hermione did her best to rouse herself early and get to work before Trevor, presuming that there would eventually be a shipment of fluxweed picked during a full moon. There was a box of fluxweed picked during a new moon that arrived the week before, so that gave her hope that one would be arriving the next week, if there had been a harvest on September 10th. Fluxweed picked during a new moon was in far less demand than picked during a full moon, so that led to her assumption that at least a couple boxes would be coming in soon.

Hunched over her bench, instinctively clutching a hot cup of tea in between sips, the weary Mrs. Weasley rubbed the crust away from the corners of her eyes. Hermione had fled the flat when she heard Ron waking up and wanted to get out of there as fast as possible, trying to ignore her husband as best as she could. She had left her still steeping cup of tea on the kitchen counter back at her flat untouched and was in need of her ritual caffeine fix.

On Tuesday, Hermione and Ron both informed James that they would no longer be seeing him for marriage counseling. After the nasty blow-ups over the succeeding weeks, it seemed like a natural progression. Both had given up on the marriage but were going through the motions, with Ron occasionally trying to claim some of his husbandly rights in the bedroom, which she mostly parried with claims of headaches, the Old Crone, or some gynecological malady of inconvenience she still needed to treat. Hermione, exhausted from her current schedule of work plus her moonlighting as a young Potions apprentice-cum-Severus' lover, was beginning to wear out. If it was just sex, it was nothing she couldn't handle, but it was the potion-testing sessions that were exhausting on the body, followed by the equally taxing antidote reaction. Such drastic changes in the emotional and physical state were tiring, and to do so multiple times in one evening was an even greater stress on
She could have rested up on the two days she wasn't seeing Severus, but she was either at work or hiding out at Flourish and Blotts, reading to kill time until closing, before going home when she was certain that Ron was asleep in bed and wouldn't jump her bones yet again. Then there were the occasional times where Hermione just continued to pretend to be asleep while Ron did his business. If anything, their relationship had devolved into a situation of roommates with fringe benefits who avoided each other, though the “benefits” seemed to be strictly for Ron's sake.

It was times like this that Hermione wondered if Invigoration Draughts were as addictive to witches and wizards as conventional drug-based stimulants were to Muggles. She was unaware of such abuse cases in her world, but then again, the wizarding community was prone to dismiss a lot of problems that Muggles were far more likely admit.

It was Friday and Hermione was secretly hoping to not be invited to lunch with Harry, per their recent ritual. If anything, a nap on the couch in her office was more welcomed than a hot meal in her stomach. She had been stocking the cupboard at home to the gills with all sorts of healthy foods, as Ron requested, so there was plenty for her to eat. She made sure to bring some of that fresh fruit to keep on her desk for a quick snack, in addition to her packing a daily sandwich. Still, if Harry showed up, she would go happily, trying to make no show of a change in her routine that might signal something was amiss. There was no reason to give Harry any more cause into poking into her life, given her current extracurricular activities. Thankfully, he never came around that day.

As the day drew to a close, Hermione dreaded the coming weekend. She and her husband agreed that she would continue to attend Quidditch matches when played within the British Isles to give no rise to suspicion within their families, the team, or the gossip magazines. Ron was a rising star; photographs of the star Chudley Cannons Keeper at the recent Italian broom convention were already circulating, touting him as some international hopping sports star. Fortunately, the gossip magazines had left her alone, since touting the wife seemed to put the kibosh on the sex appeal of a player and hence magazine sales from young adoring female fans. Hermione didn't mind the idea of gaggles of young witches lusting after her husband since she didn't. She ignored the thought of young wizards lusting after Ron, and him taking them up on their offers.

Hermione dragged her arse home, having stayed late again at work again, to find Ron at home, dressed and waiting for her.

“Um, hi.” Ron shuffled his feet a bit and grimaced at the discomfort of it all.

Blinking vacantly, Hermione had to rouse herself from the slight shock of running into her husband before she finally replied. “Hello.”
They stared at each other for a moment before Hermione marched in, closing the door and heading off to the bathroom to disrobe and wash the day's stench from her person.

“Um, I was thinking maybe we could go to dinner tonight,” Ron called out from the bedroom. “That way you don't have to cook.”

Standing under the pounding stream of hot water as it washed over her aching shoulders and back, Mrs. Weasley contemplated just how disastrous this dinner out might be compared with the last few times – the dinner party, their anniversary dinner, and that time with the over-priced rubbery chicken. Still, Ron wasn't much of a cook and Hermione actually welcomed the idea of not having to step into the kitchen. Besides, it wasn’t like their meals at home were that much more pleasant, as it usually involved silence and awkwardness when they would occasionally eat together. Still, the risk was that this would be in a public setting and therefore something a snooping photographer could catch should they have a blow-up.

“Sure, I'd love to,” Hermione called out over the sounds of the water running. It would mean getting dressed instead of throwing on a frumpy yet oh-so-much-more comfortable nightshirt and robe, but it was a sacrifice she was willing to make that night to avoid cooking.

The restaurant was a better class than they usually frequented, on the rare occasion they did go out, barring the Grand Royal Supper Club. Instead of the usual dingy dust-covered iron sconces dripping old wax, and smoke-darkened oil lamps, the place was lit with cream-coloured candles, some back-lit with mirrors to amplify the light that was diffused by frosted glass sconces. It almost looked Muggle in influence, if it weren't for the complete lack of electricity. The linens were crisp and the décor almost Zen-like in its minimalism. Hermione was glad she at least pulled out something decent to wear or she would have felt under-dressed for the occasion.

As they walked to their table, Hermione noticed a few pairs of eyes flash in recognition of her husband, giving him fleeting smiles before focusing their attention back on their own dining companions. It did not escape Hermione's attention that they were seated at a choice table partially screened from the other diners, not in some forgotten corner near the kitchen door.

Husband and wife avoided conversation for a little while longer while glancing at their menus. Once food was ordered and menus collected, there was no more pretense to avoid talking to one another.

Hermione broke the ice to get the talk flowing, since she could see the dismay in Ron's knit brow as he tried to think of something to say. “How are your workouts coming along?” There was little enthusiasm in her question, and it was said more to be polite than out of any real interest in the “Fine. I've progressed faster than anticipated, so they'll be cutting back on my muscle-gaining potions and we'll start working on sculpting fat away next.” Ron gave a half-shrug as if trying to converse with his wife was as equally exhausting as Hermione found the act herself.

'Thank God,' she internally sighed, hoping that the glassware and dishes would no longer be the victims of Ron's periodic outbursts.

“That's good news, Ron.”

He nodded, a look of disquiet stealing over his face causing his brow to temporarily knit. Neither had anything else to say in response to the other.

There was a lengthy pause before she plodded on. “And any update on your contract negotiation? What does your agent say?”

“Oh!” Ron's face changed quickly from troubled to relieved. “That's going really well. The agent that Viktor recommended is in final negotiations with the Cannons and Bascom Nettleton. We were going to sign in early November when the season ends after the last game, November 1st, but with the big Ministry masked ball on Halloween, we'll be doing it in late October so we can make the announcement during the event when all the press is already there.”

“I saw a photo of you and Bascom in Italy in one of the rags floating around the Ministry staff room while I was making tea. How was that trip?” she prodded him, hoping to avoid talking and happy to let Ron ramble on.

“Rome is just as pigeon-infested as ever, the pasta still as delicious, and the people just as 'friendly' as well,” he quipped. He was making reference to the way that the complete strangers they encountered during their honeymoon, all local Italians, were rather affectionate in greetings and farewells, compared to Ron’s and Hermione's more subdued British dispositions.

Ron's wife laughed in remembrance of seemingly better times.

Hermione wanted to ask about the hotel he stayed at, but was interrupted when the food arrived. Before the waiter excused himself, she asked him, “What is this on my food?”
“It is a cucumber and basil foam on top of your leek and salmon ravioli,” the young wizard replied with the same attitude one would use to placate a small child in order to prevent an impending temper tantrum.

Hermione thought it looked an awful lot like the frog spawn she had tested earlier in the day, but held her tongue. She had decided to scrape it to the side instead of protesting about the incorporation of the Muggle fad of molecular gastronomy, which she had previously heard about from her mother.

Considering how the restaurant looked more at home in Muggle London than wizarding London, it shouldn't have surprised Hermione that some of the culinary fads might have been incorporated into the menu as well.

Ron was dining on some overly dressed plate of offal. The kidneys and heart of some unknown animal were sliced and presented with a variety of sauces used more for decoration than to flavor, topped with a dollop of caviar. Hermione thought it was a bit pretentious when it would probably taste a whole lot better served up in a pie with a good stock gravy.

Both of them began to relax as they dined. It was the most pleasant time spent in each other’s company in a long time.

As they neared finishing up with their entrées, Ron tried to keep his voice in the same light tone, but failed when he asked, “So you mentioned you might be starting a Potions apprenticeship sometime in the future. Any update on when that might happen?”

Hermione nearly dropped her fork, but kept her grip on it before gathering her wits. After taking a sip of wine, she stared at her plate when she answered, “There are some… contingencies that have to be resolved before that can progress any further.”

She tried to make it sound final, hoping Ron would pursue another topic, but he pressed on. “What sort of contingencies? What has to happen?”

Mrs. Weasley had to craft her wording very carefully so that she would belie nothing she didn't intend to.

“There are some legal matters to resolve and other things I am not privy to,” she lied. The legal matters had been long settled by Lavender's lawyers and, on everything else, she was in the know.

“Well, this current job is just wearing you out. You're there late nearly every night, plus I don't know how you have the energy to go out dancing on Thursday nights.”

Hermione choked on her last bite of ravioli and almost spilled water down her front trying to wash it down.

Ron continued, “I was just wondering how soon you'd be moving out of this job into your position. You did mention that you'd have a chance to earn money while doing your apprenticeship.”

Hermione realized she hadn't worked out with Lavender how much her wages would be. She knew it wasn't going to be much, but certainly hopefully at least as much as what she was earning working at the lab at the Department of Standards & Regulations. There really was no point in negotiating monies until the last ingredient for the Polyjuice Potion had been procured.

“I still have to negotiate how much I'll earn, but as for timing, if things go well I may be starting before the end of the year,” she said, trying to keep from digging herself into hole she'd later regret.

’If anything, this marriage will be ending by the end of this year,’ she thought with resignation.

Hermione wasn't about to start volunteering that she was going to get royalties on two potions she helped develop so far, considering she wasn't even technically working for Lavender yet. How could she explain that? Besides, she was not counting on anything until those Galleons were in her hot little hands, or safely in her and Ron's vault at Gringotts, or – if they divorced – in her own vault.

“Is there anything I can do to help?” Ron offered.

'Smuggle some fluxweed picked during the full moon back into England without getting caught, for starters.’

“Thanks for the offer, but there's nothing to be done but wait.” That at least was true.
Back at their flat, Hermione went into the kitchen to make a cup of relaxing herbal tea before bed and noticed something amiss.

“Roooooon?” she called out of the kitchen, the pitch of her voice rising at the end.

“Yeah?” Ron was getting undressed in the bedroom.

“Where did the lemons go?”

Ron came into the kitchen dressed only in his underpants. “You mean those dried up leathery old things? I threw them out. I tried juicing one and there was nothing to juice, just dried pulp.”

Hermione put her hands on her hips and huffed in annoyance.

“What? Don't tell me you wanted to keep rotting fruit? I thought you'd be thankful that I helped cleaned up around here,” Ron began to yell. “You complain I don't do enough around here. Well, I've been helping with trash and cleaning the kitchen a lot more. And since you're at work late, I’ve been making my own dinners more often and cleaning up after myself. I thought you'd at least appreciate that.”

Standing in the kitchen with her head down, Hermione pinched the bridge of her nose and shut her eyes tightly trying to keep her temper, and not encourage Ron to blow up once again since it took little to provoke him into screaming at her.

“I was drying them out because I was going to experiment on them in that state,” she ground out, trying to be patient. To end the confrontation she conceded and gave up. “It doesn't matter, I can get some more at the Hogwarts Cemetery.”

“The cemetery?” Ron shrieked as if confronted with a spider.

“Yes, Ron, the cemetery. Those came from the lemon tree growing from Dumbledore's graveside,” she explained, understanding Ron's fear regarding things taken from graveyards and their usual association with dark and forbidden magic. “Headmistress Sprout gave them to me since it is so unusual for a citrus tree to grow at such a northern latitude, and the fruit it bears is strange as well. I was going to experiment on them to see if there was something magical to the fruit, but you threw them away before I got a chance.”
“Maybe if you weren't at work so late, you'd have the time to get around to it. But I don't think it would have mattered; they were dry as paper, so I chucked the lot. Maybe if you told me I wouldn't have thrown them out.” Ron folded his arms petulantly, which made him appear twice as wide with his muscles budging from his shoulders and arms.

Ron was pouting and Hermione was made to feel the bad guy. The jutting of his lower lip hinted at the ghost of a boy Hermione used to know, but seemed to have faded away since they married. She knew she shouldn't have expected Ron to read her mind, but she wished he would have mentioned something before tossing them. Given how she was avoiding her husband, it's not like there were many chances to ask her, though.

Hermione just wanted to go to bed and get a good night's sleep before having to face another Saturday – playing the dutiful wife in the Quidditch stands, while wondering if Ron was buggering his teammates in the locker room after the game. She had put out of her mind that she caught her husband leaving Blaise Zabini's flat after a boisterous shag, but the vision of her husband in the showers naked with a bunch of other well-built Quidditch players brought that memory fresh into her mind while she waited for him after the games ended.

As she attempted to leave the kitchen, Hermione was faced with a wall of muscle. Ron was standing in the doorway blocking her exit, his arms still crossed. She looked up at him blankly, wondering why he wouldn't move, until he gave her a smile that insinuated that he was in the mood to claim some of his husbandly rights again.

It didn't surprise Hermione that he was in the mood for a shag. Dinner wasn't a painful experience for once, and any night that didn't end in a fight gave Ron the impression that his wife would be in the mood for fucking as well.

Hermione smiled up at Ron coyly. “How about I give you a massage before we begin,” she said, trying to imply that her attitude had thawed somewhat.

He gave her a big, eager grin which was as sincere as the erection now plainly pressing against his underpants.

“Just let me get some oil,” Hermione explained. “Go lie down, I'll be in soon.”

Thankfully Hermione had gone out and purchased some almond oil, lavender oil, and essence of sopophorous bean recently. Remembering Severus' directions, she made a mixture to help her husband fall asleep, instead of facing another round of sex with him.

“How is it that you can use your hands to spread it on the skin and it wouldn't cause you to fall asleep, yet it works on the person you're applying it to?” Hermione remembered asking Severus.

“That's because the palms of the hands and soles of the feet have a special layer of skin called stratum lucidum that slows the absorption rate of the oil, in addition to calluses. The oil, spread over a large portion of the skin, such as the back, allows for quicker absorption. You may feel a slight relaxation, but as soon as your husband falls asleep and you wash your hands, you should not succumb to the sleeping agent.”

Hermione found her husband lying nude, on his stomach with his chin propped up on his overlapped hands, grinning like some gingered Cheshire cat. Ignoring the knowing smile he gave her, she poured a small amount of the unctuous elixir into her hand, before setting the bottle down on the table next to the bed and straddling Ron's hips.

“You know, 'Mione, this would be a whole lot sexier if you were undressed, too,” he insinuated.

“Patience,” she cooed.

For good measure, he bucked his hips up underneath her to hint at his eagerness and Hermione nearly lost her balance and almost fell off of him and the bed. To keep the mood playful, and to avoid it devolving into a fight if she let her true emotions come forth, she slapped his arse with the hand not cupping the oil and insisted he be good or he wouldn't get any massage.

“I know what I need you to massage after my back,” Ron insinuated with a lustful drawl and a look from the corner of his eye.

“Shhhh. Patience,” she kept insisting, trying not to let her upper lip curl with a sneer.

Finally having a chance to begin, she spread the oil across his back in broad strokes. His back was much wider than the last time she gave him a massage, and she was having trouble recalling the last time she gave him one.

With the heel of her hand, Hermione dug into Ron's longissumus thoracis, beginning from his lower back and moving up before applying pressure to his trapezius, mentally naming the muscles.
With Ron's current physique, it was much easier to see where each muscle was.

Ron gave out a long appreciative sigh and dreamily announced, “That feels fucking amazing.” He stifled a yawn as he muttered something about massaging her breasts before quickly dropping off, and he began snoring in his usual fashion, signaling deep sleep.

Hermione went to wash up and hide the massage oil, lest Ron think it was appropriate for applying to his face for moisturizer – and lest he figure out she put something in the oil after falling asleep face-first on the bathroom tiles. Anything in her arsenal to keep Ron off her was a weapon she was going to keep to herself.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Let's welcome my new beta, Cytherea, and give a round of thanks to her and my other beta, JuneW, for their hard work on this chapter.

The stratum lucidum (Latin for "clear layer") is a thin, clear layer of dead skin cells in the epidermis named for its translucent appearance under a microscope. It is readily visible by light microscopy only in areas of thick skin, which are found on the palms of the hands and the soles of the feet. Located between the stratum granulosum and stratum corneum layers, it is composed of three to five layers of dead, flattened keratinocytes. The keratinocytes of the stratum lucidum do not feature distinct boundaries and are filled with eleidin, an intermediate form of keratin.

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Stratum_lucidum
Chapter Summary

With the trial of Pansy Parkinson's murder over, the tables have turned and now Hermione needs to be there for Severus.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

Chapter Sixty
“Chicken Soup for the Soul”

Disclaimer: Once upon a fanfic dreary, while I wrote on tired and leery,
Over many a quaint and curious chapter of forgotten woe—
While I wrote a load of crap, suddenly there came a pinging tap,
As of some one gently rapping, rapping at my instant message window.
“’Tis lawyers,” I muttered, “reminding me to disclaim ownership of Harry Potter for it belongs to JK Rowling—
Only this and nothing more.”

A/N: Disclaimer a parody of Edgar Allan Poe's “The Raven”

=============

“Your head's not in the game today, Richard,” Calpurnia gently chastised Severus.

There had been a great many things on the former Head of Slytherin House's mind as of late. Hermione informed him that there was no September shipment of fluxweed picked during a full moon, despite the delivery of some picked during a new moon. The hurricane season along the North American Atlantic coast had stayed away from the growing fields once Hurricane Isabel passed through in mid-September, so there was still hope that a crop might have been picked during October's full moon four days prior on the 10th.

In addition to the Polyjuice Potion weighing heavily on his mind, there was the Amorous Enhancing Potion he and Hermione had been testing. During their last testing session, Hermione confessed about the magical dildos the twins had sent her and suggested that she bring them over sometime for them to incorporate into their sexual repartee. Though they had made a promise to discount anything said under the influence of the potion, Hermione did admit, once she came down off of it, that she was still up for playing around with them if Severus was still interested. His mind kept drifting back to what fun he was going to have the next time Hermione came over with new toys.

Then there was the recent rush development caused by Miss Brown informing him that several dress makers and couture mavens had asked for the temporary hair dye, but in bright colors to match many of the dresses they were selling. Severus and Draco had to spend many recent evenings coloring their hair in shades of gold, silver, bronze, copper, crimson red, electric blue, peacock green, puce, cerise, forest green, tangerine, turquoise, royal purple, cyan, rose pink, salmon, baby pink, dark coral, aquamarine, mint green, maroon, kelly green, aubergine-plum, lemon yellow, and, of course, lavender. Even Hermione had to help, participating as a test subject of several shades. Severus took pity on her and kept it to three different colors during each visit before they ended the experimentation on her hair and started experimenting with her hormones instead. The metallic colors took three washings to rinse clean, and Severus was still trying to figure out how to fix the solution to wash out in one shampooing.

“I'm quite sorry, but your descriptions of the upcoming Ministry ball have me thinking about what a stellar gala it will be,” Severus said.

Calpurnia knew her chess companion was lying, but out of courtesy, she allowed the lie to pass as if it were truth. Severus knew she was aware of his lie. Neither acknowledged when they knew the other was lying, as it would have been rude to point out the obvious.

Severus forced himself to focus on the rest of his game out of cordiality, even though his lapse of attention had already cost him the game.

Ron was getting wise, or at least starting to put two and two together. When hinting he was interested in sex, he began using vulgar euphemisms and gestures more often, pantomiming that his cock was his wand, swishing and flicking it in an erect state. 'That's not fourteen inches,' Hermione dryly thought to herself. Instead of plainly speaking her mind, she coyly suggested more massages, to which Ron rebuffed and insisted on a massage afterwards instead since he began noticing Hermione's special touch was making him drift off to sleep before his needs were met.

'That defeats the whole fucking purpose of the massage, then.'

Hermione was in no mood to shag her husband. At least she still had the menstrual card to play and begged off by saying it was 'that time,' to which Ron immediately agreed with a slight grimace of disgust and went off to the bedroom for a good wank instead.

As she sat in the kitchen with a cup of raspberry leaf tea, the pensive witch ignored the faint sounds coming from her bedroom.

"At least Severus isn't repulsed by menstrual flow," she thought, recalling the day before at Severus' flat. She had offered to put off sex if he was bothered by it, to which he replied he wasn't at all. They still experimented with the Arousal Enhancing Potion; the sex that followed was quite surreal with Severus at the end of their coupling unfazed by the sight of her menstrual blood smeared all over his manhood, down his thighs, and clotted in his pubic hair. There was a frothy pink foam still clinging to his sac and base of his cock.

She still couldn't believe she suggested bringing dildos over for sexual play.

After all these years married to Ron, Hermione had never had sex during her menstrual cycle and was a little shocked herself at the sight of it. At least Severus had the good sense from experience to lay down several towels on the bed, or she feared it would have looked like a murder scene where she had lain.

This cycle was proving to be rather taxing on her since she had skipped the previous month. Still, Hermione should be glad, at least, she wasn't pregnant, though with the potion she took every night she had sex with Severus for pregnancy and venereal diseases, per Ministry regulation, there was no chance of that happening.

As she was finishing her tea, she heard her husband call for her from the bedroom.

"Don't tell me you changed your mind," she prayed.

“'Mione? 'Mione! Can I get one of those great massages?” he wheedled, as he was wiping up the dribbles of cum from his stomach and chest with a tissue. “My muscles feel so relaxed afterwards, it really takes all the knots out of my back, especially when I can't get a time slot with the team's masseur.”

Now Hermione's curiosity was piqued.

Coming into the bedroom, she surveyed her husband reclining on the bed and pulling out more tissues. She could have taught Ron that Arabic post-coitus cleaning spell she had learned from Severus, but then there would be the inevitable question of where she had learned a spell like that.
Ron, as a young wizard, had expounded with great authority that all the dark wizards came from Slytherin House. As an adult he also had an equally “profound opinion” about magic regarding things of a sexual nature and “good” witches not knowing those types of spells.

As Ron finished destroying the last of the soiled tissues with his wand, he beckoned her to come in and join him.

“So tell me more about how relaxed your muscles feel?” Hermione questioned her husband.

“When you're massaging my back, it's like wherever you rub with that oil, the next morning all the kinks and knots in my back are gone. Is there something special about that oil?” he asked.

'Bugger!' Hermione kept a sweet smile upon her lips. “Just some stuff that said 'Relaxing Massage Oil.'”

“It certainly does the job. Makes me drop right off,” Ron admitted.

'The jig is up. Double bugger.' Hermione started wondering about slipping a time-delayed sleeping agent into Ron's dinners on the nights when she was home early enough to cook.

“Well?” Ron flopped onto his stomach on his side of the bed. “Can I get another massage?”

Hermione supposed it was better than Ron up half the night wanking away, keeping her up in the process, and it would only take a few moments anyway.

“Sure,” she replied as she went to fetch the elixir.

As during previous applications, Ron was snoring soundly in less than five minutes.

Curious to the muscle-relaxing properties, and given that she was going to go to bed anyway, Hermione tucked herself under the covers and took a small amount and rubbed it across the tops of her shoulders that were tight from work. As Hermione felt the warmth spread across where the simple potion made contact, she could feel her muscles twitch as they began to relax.
‘I should try applying this across my lower abdomen next time I get menstrual cramps,’ she thought just before she dropped off herself, sleeping more soundly than she had recently.

Severus was reading with great interest one of the books Ginny recently bought for him from the same Muggle bookstore Hermione showed her back in July. In order to conceal it, he had a dust jacket from one of his “boring old” potions tomes covering it, fitting it perfectly as if made for it. Should Moody continue to consider Miss Brown not above suspicion and inspect the Potions master’s office, he would merely see a room filled with Miss Brown's research materials and no incriminating books to tell otherwise.

Engrossed with reading about the local weather, rain patterns and temperature variations based on elevation, Severus didn't hear his employer enter his office.

“Severus? Severus!” his employer called out in louder tones, continuing to knock on his door despite having already opened it as she stood in the threshold.

Realizing her presence, he placed a bookmark in his book before setting it down.

“I didn't know a book on exotic fungi could hold your attention so raptly.”

“Quite,” he replied as he leaned back in his chair.

“Could you come to my office? I'd like to discuss a few things with you.” Lavender waited for Severus to nod his head in acceptance of her invite before going back to her office.

Severus could tell that there was something he wouldn't like by the way that Wonkle had already brought the tea service before he arrived. His employer was pouring him a cup before even asking if he wanted any. She even had a heaping pile of jammy thumb biscuits, and those lemon crème sandwich biscuits she rarely served, on a tiered tray with the service. He loved those lemon crème sandwiches as much, possibly more, than the jammy thumb biscuits.

“Will this be our usual Friday status meeting, or is the Minister of Magic stopping by for a visit,” he drawled, as he ran a finger along a freshly washed doily, surveying how she had some of her nicest linens, crispy pressed, laid neatly on the low table before them.
“First of all, I want to thank you for rushing the job of the new hair colors. We're selling them as fast as we can manufacture and get them to the shops.” Lavender took a sip of tea that seemed more perfunctory than enjoyable.

Severus looked about and casually observed, “Won't Draco be joining us for tea?”

“I'll be having a separate meeting with Draco later on. He's busy at the moment.” She didn't elaborate, which was odd since she usually explained what Draco was busy working on at the time to explain his absence.

“I'm more than happy to come back at a later time so you can speak with us both, since I know you have a busy schedule,” Severus offered, trying to show her hand, since he could tell she was trying to soften him up for something.

“No, no. I have time.” She gave a constricted sigh as if trying to not show too much of her hand, though she knew Severus was on to her.

“Then, please, continue.” He leaned back in his chair, crossing his legs with a show of casual relaxation, a counterpoint to his employer's growing agitation.

“As you know, the Ministry's Halloween masked ball is two weeks from today.” She placed her tea cup down and folded her hands on her lap, doing a fair imitation of a much younger and far less confident McGonagall.

Severus held his tongue about that point being obvious, waiting for her prologue to continue unabated.

“And given that, should certain factors of the weather in North America cooperate, you may be retiring from your position. And relocating as well.” She swallowed hard and she could see her struggle as she defiantly jutted her chin in the air and announced, “Which means that given that 'Sebastian Delgado' will be leaving my employ nearly around the same time that one of my 'Death Eater gigolos' flees the country, that may be a bit obvious. So at the Ministry's masked ball, I need you to appear as Sebastian Delgado, Spanish accent and all, in order to give credence to my claim that it is mere coincidence that 'Sebastian Delgado' goes back to Spain at the same time Severus Snape manages to escape.”

Severus glared at her for a moment before simply replying in a quiet, threatening tone, “What?”
His employer had even hinted previously that Severus should attend the recently announced Ministry Halloween Masked Ball, dyeing his hair and employing other simple disguise methods that did not use charms or transfiguration, such as make-up to darken his skin tone, something stuffed down his shirt to give him a pot belly and so on. She even suggested Severus use his “Spanish accent”, having received an owl from Molly Weasley about the “gentleman with the foreign accent” and her now weekly tea and harping bookings with Severus.

“You heard me. I don't like it either, but I have to cover my arse,” she threw back at him.

“And you're not asking Draco—” he began.

“Draco will hopefully be doing this as well.” She looked as nonplussed as Severus. “Draco has a nom de plume for his work, too, seeing how I can't exactly say Draco Malfoy, famous ex-Death Eater, is working in a non-sanctioned capacity.”

Severus was unaware of Draco using a false name and wondered why he never made mention of it before, but dismissed further contemplating on the matter in order to concentrate on the matter at hand.

“I'm speaking to Draco later and making the same request as I am presenting to you.” Lavender got up and began pacing around her office. “I have just as much to lose. Should I not provide any proof that Sebastian Delgado and James White ever walked the earth, then if you succeed in leaving and Moody gets it into his head that I helped you escape, then all this is for nothing. All my money and yours will be confiscated. That's the end of your royalties and my life should I survive a Dementor's Kiss.”

“Draco's false name is James White?” was all that Severus could ask.

“You can ask him about that later, but what I need to know is if you'll come to the ball,” she asked, looking a bit frantic that Severus might balk, which he was considering doing.

Still, he did see the point of her needing him to make an appearance under his alias.

“It's a masked ball and, from all the chatter in social circles, people are showing up masked hoping that between their outfits, the hair dye and the masks, no one will guess who they are,” she offered to convince him. “And we can get a fake padded belly for you, and use hair dye to hide your signature locks. I'll even pay for dress robes to be fitted with your new 'pot belly.'"

“A pot belly?” He cocked a brow at the thought of himself sporting a less than svelte figure.

“And I'll brew some Ageing Potion for you both,” she added, hoping to convince him to go through with the idea. “Just show up, allow me to introduce you to a few people, shake a few hands, have a cup of punch, and then excuse yourself when the dancing starts.”

Severus contemplated it. If he could get himself back into the graces of the Dark Lord and play the role of faithful Death Eater for years, he could pretend to be Sebastian Delgado for one short evening.

“I'll do it on one condition,” he finally said.

“What,” she asked with hesitation, fearing some unreasonable request.

“That Draco must be older than me.”

His employer erupted into gales of laughter.

Severus didn't understand what was so funny, as it made sense that – to throw Moody and his ilk off Miss Brown's trail – if the Potions master was younger than the marketing executive, it would be harder to assume that young Malfoy and old 'James White' were one and the same.

“Draco is going to hate the fact that he'll be older than you,” she finally choked out.

“Considering that this helps assure him that the money he earned under your employ is safe, you'd be surprised what Draco is willing to put up with,” Severus explained.

Draco was used to the best growing up and reinforcing that vanity, but since having his fortune removed, concern over his finances became more an issue of security of the basic necessities than for flaunting status or strutting like a peacock. And then there was the issue of doing anything to help make sure his escape with Ginny ensured as few complications as possible. Besides, Severus could see the young wizard having some fun at the ball by dancing with Ginny right under Potter's nose while being disguised as some doddering old wizard.

“But just in case, you'd better bring in some chocolate bonbons for Draco to help put him in the mood to acquiesce,” Severus noted, gesturing with his hand toward the tea service. “This morning, Kingsley informed us that the trial for Pansy's murderer is Monday, and Draco is feeling quite foul, and justifiably so.”

Severus could have sworn a flash of sympathy flickered across Miss Brown's face, despite remembering there was a great deal of animosity between the Gryffindor and Slytherin witches during their school years.

Momentarily relieved that the most awkward part of their conversation had been addressed, Lavender asked, “Now that that's out of the way, tell me about your progress on the Libido Enhancement Potion.”

“It's progressing. I still require a few more weeks for testing since I only see Hermione two nights a week.”

“Well, you can make it three, if Hermione is free on Saturdays. Miss Anne owled me last night to say her current paramour and she have gotten quite serious as of late and she's ready to end her visits to you, especially since she's bowed out of seeing you the past few weeks. She didn't want to say goodbye in person and make things awkward and complicated, so she wrote this note for me to hand to you when next I saw you,” Lavender informed him as she pulled a letter from her desk drawer and handed it over to its recipient.

Severus noted the clean and elegant penmanship on the envelope before tucking it into his robes to read later in private. “I suppose that if I'm back down to two clients a week, you'll have to find a third in order to have a pretense of me 'earning my keep,’” he insinuated with cold detachment.

“If the last ingredient was procured, I would say there would be no need to bother, but considering it is unknown how much longer we remain in limbo, it is best if we did keep up appearances.” Lavender refilled her cup of tea, but not before offering to refresh Severus', which he accepted.

“And the body paint?” she prompted him. “Is there any progress on that front?”

“Actually, yes,” he said plainly. “I think I may have come across a solution that makes it quick-drying, lickable, and peelable, and comes in several different fruity flavors. But I have some more research to do before I can begin experimentation.”

Severus made no mention this time that Hermione was the one who came up with the idea of using instant jelly after hearing him complain bitterly about being uninspired regarding the edible body paints. She had promised to bring over a couple of boxes purchased from a Muggle market next time she came over. He was keen on trying the black currant and raspberry when she listed off flavors to choose from.

The Potions master silently wondered how much Miss Brown would complain about yet another potion quandary solved with Hermione's help. Though he did have to admit that jelly was an unusual dessert item in the wizarding world, outside of Hogwarts serving it up during Welcoming and Leaving Feasts, and that gelatin-based foods tended to be more of the savory aspic kind than sweet and fruity.

~~~~~~~*~

Hermione hoped Severus wasn't too disappointed that she couldn't come over Saturday at the last minute. She wrote in her reply that her husband had a game at home; it was unknown when the game would end and her presence, as Ron's wife, was expected. It was prudent of her to reject Severus' invitation to come over for an evening of potions experimentation, as the Chudley Cannons versus the French Marseilles Manticores Quidditch game didn't end until almost eleven that night. She was thankful at least she'd brought a Potions apprentice-level book Severus had given her several weeks back to study, in order to kill time until that damned elusive Golden Snitch finally turned up and was caught.

One thing Hermione looked forward too, should her marriage to Ron end, was the freeing up of her weekends from Quidditch games and mandatory attendance at all the Weasley gatherings that sucked up her little free time. She was looking to an evening with Severus involving Potions work, sex and a little splashing.

Knocking on the door Monday night, Hermione was greeted by a rather haunted looking Severus. By the look of his being and the half-empty bottle of spirits on the table by the settee, Hermione could tell something was gravely bothering him.

“What is it? What happened?” she asked. Concern was etched deeply in her face as Severus let go of her hand limply and gracelessly threw himself into a chair, indicating he was slightly drunk.

“You do know about the murder of Pansy Parkinson?” Severus asked, sounding bitter and angry.

“Yes, from what I read of the papers,” Hermione admitted, though she did not mention that Ginny had told her that Harry stumbled upon a murder scene that she later surmised was Pansy's murder.
She also recalled that the murder happened the same night as her anniversary, but kept that to herself as well.

“And are you aware of the prior betrothal that Mr. Malfoy and Miss Parkinson had, which was broken upon the fall of the Dark Lord?” Severus said, over-enunciating some of the words to compensate for his drunken state.

“No.” Hermione went to kneel by Severus to hold his hand in comfort and to observe his face more closely. “I was unaware of that fact.”

“Though he had no great love for Miss Parkinson, they did have a sort of friendship, and after beginning working for Miss Brown, he gave Pansy a monthly stipend to help her since, as you are aware…” Severus turned his head and fixed Hermione with a sardonic smile while his eyes became even more distant. “… our job opportunities are few and far between other than selling our arses.” He swept his hand across the room, indicating the room itself as a place where he peddled his own flesh for coin. “Or scrubbing toilets at the Ministry,” he added at the end without disguising his rancor.

He continued snarling at no one in particular, “Though that is what she did, when she wasn't stripping in seedy ‘wizards’ clubs,’ as they call them. ‘Strip clubs,’ if you want to be less euphemistic and more realistic.”

Severus was drunk and angry. Hermione had seen him angry at her once before and that scared her; Severus rambling, drunk and angry was a different beast and possibly more frightening. He had the scent of a cornered animal about him.

“Draco asked me to go with him for moral support to the trial today,” Severus hoarsely croaked as he began to recall, lost in introspection. “We sat in the back with our hoods up like the other witches and wizards who came to watch the circus spectacle, but not be seen, in the highest and darkest rows of the Wizengamot chamber.”

Hermione Summoned a cushion from the settee to make sitting on the floor next to Severus’ chair more comfortable, while holding his hand as he continued to talk.

“Were you aware your friend, Potter, was the one who came upon Miss Parkinson's body?” he asked.
Hermione somberly nodded.

Severus continued on. “All those years I resented the boy for being famous because his mother...” He paused, as he choked on the words. “She loved him more than her own life. He was merely an infant; it was the focus of her love that saved him. Her love was never celebrated. He was. It was the fact that her love that saved him and made him who he was, temporarily destroying...”

Severus shut his eyes tight to fight back the tears as he returned to his previous drunken train of thought.

“When the verdict was read, despite all the obvious evidence short of a Pensieve memory of him slaughtering her himself, he was rendered not guilty and Potter objected. Moody gets to use Veritaserum on me on a whim, yet they would not use it in this trial. The only reason why Potter was able to address the Wizengamot was because of his celebrity. As much as I loathed him for years for his unearned celebrity, as much as I thought he received undue favoritism because of it, he used it to try to change the Wizengamot’s judgment. But to no avail. The murderous bastard walked free in the end. The one time I was glad for Potter’s celebrity to do something worthy, but nothing became of it.”

Hermione and Severus sat there together saying nothing for a long while as the fire slowly burned, casting flickering shadows across the rug and the walls, accentuating the lines in Severus’ haggard visage.

After a while, Severus Summoned the bottle of alcohol. He dispensed with sipping from a glass and drank straight from the bottle. Hermione wondered if this was the type of drunken stupor Marf hinted at when Severus destroyed his previous chess set the night of her anniversary, when she had left him after a misunderstanding.

“Hand me the bottle, Severus,” Hermione gently commanded.

He glared at her up through a hank of hair that fell across his face, giving him a sinister look.

“When was the last time you ate?” she asked.

Severus waved his hand in a noncommittal manner, which could have meant, “I don't know,” “I don't remember,” “I don't care,” or “Go away.”
Hermione marched off to the kitchen.

“Marf? Marf!” she called out.

The house-elf presented himself with a slight bow. “Marf is so glad you are here to... to temper Master Snape's drunken mood.”

“Marf, when is the last time he ate?”

“Lunch time, just before he left for the trial,” the house-elf eagerly informed her.

Glancing at the clock, she noticed it was past nine-thirty.

“Go get a vial of Sobering Potion from his cabinet, and I'll fix something for him to eat.” There was no point in fixing something to put in his stomach if he was going to vomit it right back up, too drunk to keep anything down.

There was the thought of going downstairs and fetching Draco, but Hermione crossed that off the list of possibilities. She wondered if Draco was even more blind, stinking drunk, trying to drown away bad memories like his mentor was currently doing.

Finding the carcass of a partially-carved roasted chicken, Hermione fixed a quick and simple chicken soup with some noodles added, along with some carrots, celery and a small amount of onion. It was very simple fare, but something easy on the stomach, which is what would be the best thing for Severus right now.

She ladled the soup into a bowl and found some bread to go with it before setting it on the kitchen table.

Walking back into the main room, Hermione regarded Severus in his pitiful state. She wondered if it was prudent to take Severus out of his drunken state and sober him up. Remembering how she was just a few months ago, drowning in her own drunken pity, she probably would have fought the idea of someone pulling her out of her despair she’d wallowed in like a pig in the mud. But 'Calleo,' as she knew Severus at the time, would have told her to buck up, get sober, stop pouting and do something instead of lying there in such a state. Now it was time for Hermione to do to Severus what he would have done for her when she drank too much and ate too little.
“Get up,” she commanded.

Severus cracked one eye open to balefully glare at her, in a manner that reminded her a lot of Crookshanks in a foul mood.

“You heard me. Get up!” She grabbed an arm and tried to coax him up.

“Have you got the fluxweed?” Severus slurred mockingly, stumbling over the syllables.

“No, but if I did, it would not have changed what happened today. I am sorry for Pansy's death, I am sorry her murderer got away, I am sorry that a whole lot of shit in your life has not gone as planned. Neither has my fucking world. But we are moving forward to do something about it. So get your drunken arse up out of that chair and come to the kitchen with me,” Hermione barked at Severus in a stern yet motherly tone.

“Fuck. Off.” Severus slurred while crossing his arms and jutting his lower lip out, and nearly fell out of his chair.

Hermione was livid that he used that tone and those words with her. But considering how drunk he was, and that the bottle that had been a third full when she went off to the kitchen was now empty on the floor, she wondered if he was so drunk he would even remember what he said to her.

“Have it your way.”

Hermione sat Severus upright in his chair before binding him to the chair. Then she charmed the piece of furniture to walk into the kitchen and set itself in front of the table with the still hot bowl of soup awaiting Severus.

“What... the...” Severus looked about the kitchen in confusion, wondering why he was in the wingback chair, but he couldn't move, his body too numb to notice his bindings. His confusion was further compounded by the fact he was in the kitchen, but he was still his wingback chair. Why was the wingback chair in the kitchen? He thought he was in front of the fire. Where did the fireplace go?
“Open wide,” Hermione announced before holding Severus by the jaw and pouring a vial of Sobering Potion down his throat. She’d had lots of practice forcing antidote down his throat recently, so this was comparatively easy considering he was too drunk to resist.

Severus sputtered and said in a low and slowly measured voice, signaling his sobriety, “Undo these bindings.”

“Are you done telling me to fuck off?” Hermione stood there with her arms crossed, her brows arched and her mouth set in a thin line.

“I did what?” Realization spread across his face at what he had done. “I am very sorry for speaking to you in such a manner,” he apologized sincerely, then went on to explain, “I am unaccustomed to anyone other than Draco dealing with me when I'm that drunk. I should have sent an Owl that you should stay home so you wouldn’t have to see me in such a state.”

“Severus, I would have come anyway had I known before how upset you were.” Hermione waved her wand and made Severus' bindings disappear.

“I would have preferred that you hadn't,” Severus retorted, unable to look Hermione in the eye at the moment.

“So what, you can suffer alone in pain without any comfort? To brave this... this... tribulation alone? No,” she said with conviction. “Before you came into my life, I suffered alone. And despite being some brave Gryffindor, my bravery did not lessen the pain and disappointment that weighed me down. And when I met you, just having someone to talk with, to share my burden, it didn't make the problems go away, but it made them less unbearable. My life is still full of pain and problems and shit and things that I'm scared of facing, Severus, but right now, you are the only bit of sanity in my life that keeps me going. You have been there for me, and I am here for you now.” During her diatribe, tears began falling down Hermione's cheeks.

Severus got up out of the chair and pulled Hermione into a crushing embrace. It finally dawned on him that Hermione was the one bit of sanity in his own life right now as well, and it scared him how he might fall apart once he left. He was equally frightened to think how Hermione needed him just as much as he needed her. In the past, needing someone this badly usually led to them being taken away from him. The difference now was that in time Hermione would not be taken away from him, he would take himself away from Hermione instead. It would be voluntary, by choice. He’d never had the choice presented to him before.

Hermione eventually pulled away to smile up at him with a tear-streaked face. “Now sit down and eat something before I bind you again and spoon-feed you,” she laughed weakly as she wiped her tears away.

Severus sat down and gratefully tucked into a simple bowl of chicken noodle soup, which is exactly all his stomach could handle at the moment.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Jelly in Britain is what we would call Jell-O in the States: fruit-flavored gelatin dessert.

As some of you are aware, I am involved with an upcoming Harry Potter conference called Leviosa (http://leviosa.org), being held in Las Vegas, NV July 7-10, 2016. One of the things they are offering right now during the four days of the conference is meet-ups slot times. I would like to poll to know not only of those who might be going, but of those going, who might be interested in a meet-up where I do a reading and hand out printouts of the next unbeta'ed three to five chapters to be published at the time of con (July 7th, 2016). For instance, if I publish chapter 76 by the time Leviosa happens in early July, I would have print outs for chapters 77-79 or maybe chapters 77-81, pre-beta errors included, for you to keep depending on how many are interested. If there are maybe ten people, I've print five chapters, if there were dozens, then three chapters because the cost for printing would come out of my pocket, and printing for three chapters alone on cheap stock and simply stapled would run me about $7.00/copy, based on average chapter length. My chapters tend to run 10-20 pages long, so this would be at least 45 pages (three chapters) of fanfic you'd get an advance read of.

Is anyone interested in coming to Leviosa and coming to a reading and a sneak-peek with handouts? To vote yes, just reply in the comments simply “Aye.” That will let me know how many are interested in coming to Leviosa and want printouts, if any.

Tumblr does not have a polling system and my LiveJournal is f-locked, so this would be the easiest way to count.
“Sex Is Hard Work”

Chapter Summary

Chapter 61 Summary: What happens when Severus is required to take the Male Enhancement Potion and the Arousal Potion at the same time? There is a lesson: More is not always better.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

Disclaimer: It was the best of fanfics, it was the worst of fanfics, it was the age of crossovers, it was the age of one-true-pairings, it was the epoch of archives, it was the epoch of social media, it was the season of open canon, it was the season of closed canon, it was the spring of alternate universes, it was the winter of dying fandoms, we had wi-fi, we had no connectivity, we were all going to fandom conventions, we were all too far away to drive to the nearest one — in short, I had to disclaim any ownership of the concepts, characters, and ideas that are in this particular Harry Potter fanfic; they all belonged to Rowling and not me.

A/N: Disclaimer is a parody of A Tale of Two Cities by Charles Dickens.

============= Since they began experimenting with various dosages of the Caprese mother of pearl in the Sexual Arousal Enhancing Potion some weeks prior, they had been increasing the amount of the mother of pearl and timing how long the effects lasted for both Severus and Hermione, and how much the potion's effects abated after coupling, sometimes multiple times. That Saturday, a little less than a week away from Halloween, while Ron was playing his second-to-last game for the season away in Spain, Hermione and Severus had both tried the dosage of a smidgen, and found the effects lasted only an hour. This was not enough time to make it a compatible potion strength if it was to be sold with the Male Enhancement Potion, which had an effectiveness of two hours.

Hermione also brought over the boxes of flavored jelly, in addition to some plain gelatin, pectin, “fruit leathers,” and fruit juice concentrate. Severus found the Muggle commercial brand of jelly not only unpalatable, but chemically inferior in flavor. He discovered through experimentation that by using a biscuit cutter, the fruit leathers could be cut into shapes and pressed onto the body to be eaten. Severus nibbled a star-shaped grape-flavored fruit leather from Hermione's shoulder, while Hermione discovered that sticky fruit leathers and chest hair do not go together. By the end of their first foray into gelatin-based fruit-flavored body paint, they had discovered that a lot of gelatin would be needed and the fruit concentrate reduced even further. A drying agent that would activate, once exposed to oxygen, which Severus did not have on hand, would have to be procured for the next round of testing.
The following Monday they both partook the Libido Enhancing Potion using the full pinch measurement of mother of pearl. It seemed to take their intimacy and concupiscence to a new level they did not think possible before. They finally broke Severus' kitchen table; though it was easily repaired, it was never quite the same afterwards. That night, Hermione discovered just how much Severus enjoyed having a prostate massage, especially during fellatio. In turn, Severus learned that Hermione liked to have her hair pulled roughly like the mane of a horse while being pounded from behind. They were so lost in the heady experience induced from the potion that neither remembered much of what was said during the rare moments when they weren't screaming, begging, or moaning, or had their mouth full of various body parts. Hermione was able to remember how Severus initially giggled (a sound rarely heard before or since) while having his toes sucked, but immensely enjoyed it once the initial ticklishness wore off. Even during their usual post-coitus cuddle, there was a deep sense of connectedness they hadn't felt before; they knew something was different between them, yet neither said anything.

Thursday, the night before Halloween, Severus was getting the last of some custom tailoring done by some of the Lovely Lavender elves who'd had some sewing experience prior to working for Miss Brown.

Severus rushed home from work, just in time for Hermione. Fortunately, he had had the good sense to ask Marf to fix dinner, since he would have no time himself before Hermione came. He enjoyed cooking with Hermione and for her, but – considering the Ministry’s masked ball was the next day – between getting ready for the ball and his Potions research, he'd had little time to cook that week.

Marf, thrilled that he was getting a chance to cook more often for Hermione and his master, whipped up a lovely stuffed and rolled pork loin with roasted potatoes and other root vegetables.

Upon opening the door to welcome Hermione in, Severus was met with a quick gasp of surprise.

“How much of that Ageing Potion did you take?” Hermione asked.

“Like you could be McGonagall's older brother,” she answered truthfully.

“Forty plus years? I wasn't shooting for that much, but anything to throw them off the scent,” he admitted.
Hermione circled around him to gauge how his body had aged. The flash of white at the temples peppered with gray certainly made him look more distinguished, and his back was still straight. Examining his hands, she noticed a few faint spots, more wrinkles, and a moderate loss of muscle mass. His nose was a bit more hawkish and ears were a little larger, considering that cartilage continues to grow throughout one's life. His eyes still carried the same fierce gaze, but the crow’s-feet around his eyes were much more pronounced and added even more authority in the way he looked as he stared back at her. He still fit his button-down frock coat that he had taken to wearing again once the cool weather set in during the autumn.

“Like a good red wine, you age well,” Hermione admitted.

He grabbed her and placed a playful kiss upon her lips, noting the mild twinge in his back as he bent as a slightly odd angle.

“We'll have to wait until this potion wears off before we try the combination of potions tonight,” Severus said, rubbing at his lower back as he guided Hermione to the table for dinner.

“So this last trial, I'll be taking the full dose and you'll be taking the full dose as well as the Male Enhancement Potion?” Hermione wondered how the coupling of two strong sexual potions together might affect him.

“Actually, we have one more trial yet to do,” the Potions master explained as he served up some slices of the pork roast on Hermione's plate before serving himself. “One where I take the Male Enhancement only and you take the Arousal Potion only, since that is the combination they will be sold in. But for tonight's trial, yes, I will be taking both potions. Which is why, considering how they are both rather potent, you'll be binding me to a chair initially. I'll need you unaffected by any potion so you can administer the antidote, should any complications arise initially. I am not sure how much in control of my functions I'll be, and I don't want to... injure you in any way,” which was Severus' delicate way of saying he didn't want to fly into a blind rage of lust and wind up being too brutal.

“Based on your years of experience as a Potions master, what unpleasant effects are you anticipating that I should look out for?” the young apprentice asked.

“Painful erection, hyperventilation, animalistic behavior – and I don't mean the good kind you like – bordering on brutish or worse.” Severus served up some potatoes for his lover and himself as he continued to list possible complications as if reading a shopping list. “Heart palpitations, ruddy cheeks, blurry vision, numbness of extremities, loss of consciousness, cramps, vulgar language, loss of hearing or ringing in the ears, memory problems, and headaches.”
“That's quite a list of possible complications.” She cast him a wary look as speared a bite of food.

“Quite, but I did say possible,” he conceded. “The point is, as Potions master, it is my job to make sure certain combinations of potions will not wind up causing more harm than the good they are supposed to be providing. Miss Brown is concerned that if we sell these two potions as a pair, some wizard will get it into his head that if one potion for him is good, then two potions must make it better. It is my job to see if the pair should come with a warning not to take both together or if it is perfectly safe. Miss Brown does not want a lawsuit and, considering some of the lawyers that came from Slytherin House, she has good cause to be concerned about avoiding going to court.”

“So the best ones come from Slytherin House?”

“Indeed. There is a reason why my House symbol is a snake, and it's not just because Salazar Slytherin was a Parselmouth. Snakes won't bite a member of Slytherin House out of professional courtesy.”

Hermione wasn't sure if Severus was joking about the snakes not biting until she saw him give his iconic arch of the brow that he was having one on her. She still laughed at his dry attempt at humor, despite her better judgment that it would only encourage him.

Over the course of dinner, Hermione noticed the Ageing Potion began to slowly fade as Severus’ hair went back to its normal raven-black and the lines around his face diminished, as well as his form filling out.

“So how long did it last?” she asked, referring to the Ageing Potion.

Glancing at the clock, Severus replied, “About six hours. Enough time to show up, ‘press the flesh’ as Miss Brown likes to call it, and be home before I turn into a pumpkin.”

After dinner, they wasted little time before beginning the experiment.

Due to prior experience with the other iterations of the Arousal Potion, Severus removed his frock coat and unbuttoned his shirt; there was little point in making Marf sew buttons back on unnecessarily. For good measure, he unbuttoned his trousers and adjusted himself, just in case. His apprentice bound him to a chair, making sure he was tied down good and tight. Safety protocols were in place; Hermione had ear plugs in place and several vials of antidote ready, as well as an open box of bezoars. The agreement was to let the experiment play out unless Severus was at risk of injuries requiring a trip to St. Mungo’s. Should no complications arise the first half hour, Hermione was to take the potion herself and release Severus from his bonds. Remembering what happened when they were reverse engineering Ron's muscle-gaining potions, Hermione took a dose of Natural Lubrication Elixir to avoid any dryness.

“The Arousal Potion first,” Hermione announced as she poured it into Severus' mouth.

Severus' eyes dilated, and his skin began to glow with a slight luminosity and radiated warmth, as was expected. As he nodded at her, with heavily lidded eyes that spoke of his desire for her, Hermione poured the Male Enhancement Potion into Severus' mouth and waited.

Rolling his head back, Severus let out a long, low bestial growl which morphed into a keening wail.

“FUCK! Oh God!” Severus yelled at the top of his lungs, and not in a way that indicated any pleasure whatsoever. “My bollocks are going to fucking pop if you don't fuck me now!”

He grimaced in a way Hermione had only seen on his face once before – when he’d thrust into her once, missed, and bent his erect member nearly in half.

She remembered Severus' detailed instruction to let the experiment run its course unless a bad case of blue balls was going to result in a trip to St. Mungo’s. However, just to be sure, she asked, “Do you want the antidote to end this now?”

“No!” he barked at her. “Just let me loose so I can fuck you until I split you in half!” He glared at her with a feral eye.

“Vulgar language and painful erection: check and check,” the Potions apprentice said with clinical detachment as she checked off the little ticky boxes on a list of symptoms they had drawn up before the experiment began. She was able to hear through the ear plugs because of the volume at which he was yelling at her.

“You can put that mouth to better use by blowing me than talking,” he snarled before another wave of pain seized him. “Oh! Merlin's balls, the pain. DO SOMETHING!” he begged.
Unable to stand the sight of him in pain, she increased the bindings around his feet and chest before removing the bindings from around his hips that held him firmly seated to the chair.

At least he had the foresight to loosen his trousers before I bound him, she thought with some relief, as she pulled his very firm and surprisingly hot-to-the-touch erection free.

Before she could even wrap her hands around him to provide some relief with a hand job, the mere stimulation of Hermione's hands to free him sent him into premature ejaculation. Severus came with a surprised yelp as his semen spurted forth and hit the ceiling above their heads.

Hermione looked in shock as the white substance clung to the ceiling, amazed that he ejaculated that far.

“Powerful ejaculation,” she noted, but before she could wave her wand to clean it up and make a notation on the parchment, Severus began screaming again for relief.

“Just let me loose and let me fuck you!” he demanded, rocking his chair side to side as he strained against his bindings, but the force of his commands were diminished with the pleading in his voice.

Hermione knelt down beside him, as he was still bound to the chair, and began to stroke him out of compassion. It was less than ten seconds before Severus came again with nearly the same force, wrenching a scream from his throat in the process.

“Are you sure you want to continue?” Hermione asked again, as she cleaned up once again with a wave of her wand using the Arabic spell she had learned from her lover.

“If you were truly a Gryffindor, you'd be brave and let me loose to find out what a real fuck is like,” he vituperated, his erection continuing unabated as if he’d never orgasmed in the first place. “Or are you too scared? You could finally let me fuck you up the arse, let me pound you until you wouldn't sit right for a week!”

“Definitely vulgar language,” Hermione dryly remarked as she went back to stroking him.

Severus let out a low moan of appreciation as Hermione continued stroking his length, noting the time between each orgasm lengthened until it was a couple minutes between orgasm and his ejaculate only reached up to his chest.
Aroused by the sight of Severus’ still erect cock, warm and pulsing with the beat of his heart, Hermione bent over and tentatively licked the head. Severus let out another gasp and came immediately.

“Warn me before you do something like that again or I'll fuck your grandiloquent mouth until you gag!” he roared, his eyes winced tight in pain.

Hermione didn't bother to clean his dribbles of cum as they clung to his face while she took her time to grab the piece of parchment. “Memory loss: check.” She used a little extra flair of her quill as she marked the ticky box, then set her quill down with purpose before bothering to clean Severus up.

“Memory loss?” Severus questioned with hostility.

“Yes, you obviously have forgotten that not ten minutes ago you said I could put my mouth to better use by blowing you than talking, then demanded I 'do something'. I did something.” Hermione gave Severus an impudent smirk in return.

“If you don't let me go now, I'll fuck your brains out and you won't be able to tell the difference between this wand,” Severus intoned with a jerk of his head toward his still erect member bobbing in need of more attention, “and the one in your hand.”

“I would think that someone who was tied up, as per your own instructions, would be a bit more...” Hermione knelt down again, this time in front of Severus, grasping his cock at the base firmly, pleased to hear a hiss escape his lips, “… cooperative and...” she added for good measure to add to her point by licking Severus' cock from the base of his balls all the way to the tip in one wet swipe of her tongue, “… appreciative of how I am trying to help relieve your discomfort.”

Severus threw his head back and groaned with relief. “Please.”

“Please what?” she teased, knowing that might just drive him back to be the sexually frustrated beast she was trying to tame.

She looked up to find him glaring murderously at her.
“Please what?” she asked once again while flicking the tip of his head with her tongue while stroking his length.

Severus' eyes rolled up into the back of his head as he ground out, “Please, just fucking please, fuck me.”

She engulfed him in her mouth andbobbed her head up and down, encouraged by the sounds coming from Severus, even muted through the ear plugs. Hermione could tell he was close. She wasn't sure how powerful his ejaculation was going to be this time, so she withdrew, noting that at least if she swallowed next time, he wasn't going to shoot up into her sinuses if he came in her mouth.

Severus' erection finally flagged for the first time and he gave a sigh of relief, but it wasn't long before he was erect and begging for relief from the pressure.

Hermione noted on the parchment that he came nine times before his erection waned for the first time.

Kneeling before him again, her desire building within herself even without the Arousal Potion, she unbuttoned her blouse and removed her bra. Grasping the sides of her breasts, she pushed them together as Severus' cock rested between her cleavage as she moved up and down. Licking Severus' head with a sweep of her tongue, she began using her breasts instead of her hands to stroke his rigid length, each time licking the tip with the rise and fall of her movements.

She had never done anything like this to Severus. Without prompting, she showed creative initiative, which thrilled Severus, making him even more impossibly aroused.

Watching her kneel before him, pressing her breasts together, licking him with relish, Severus came once again, but this time there was nearly nothing left. He choked out a guttural grunt of pain as his balls began to dry heave, having spent everything inside of himself. Sweat began to drip from his brow and sting his eyes.

As his orgasm waned, with just a few paltry drops of semen dribbling from the tip, Severus wondered if he was truly up to seeing this through to the end. This was nearly as bad as the time during his apprenticeship when Chuff made him test the potency and length of a rash-and-boil-inducing potion. Severus had to suffer for six hours until the potion waned and results were recorded for Chuff's research, in which Severus was the test subject.
The seizing of his balls when there was nothing left to ejaculate was bad enough, even aching, but even with the Male Enhancement Potion increasing his stamina and strength, he was ever physically ready to go after countless orgasms. Still, he was a Potions master and Hermione did not exactly have the right equipment to faithfully test this on herself. And there was no way Draco would agree to this phase of testing. He decided to see how much longer he could stand this as a testament of his own resolve.

It was nearly half an hour and Hermione signaled it was almost time for her to take the Arousal Potion herself. Was he truly up to having Hermione shag him when there was nothing left to give? His erection was still there, begging for more than her hands or mouth, but could he delay his orgasm to avoid another dry orgasm?

Severus nodded that she should go ahead and take the Libido Potion, the double dose of his own potions still making him hungry to sink himself into Hermione. Perhaps coupling was the way to relieve himself of this innate desire to bang Hermione senseless; it appeared that masturbation was an ineffective stop gap, given that intercourse seemed to have lessened the Arousal Potion's potency in the end during previous trials.

Upon Hermione drinking the full-potency arousal solution, she didn't bother to release Severus from his bounds as she ditched her shirt and underpants in haste and proceeded to mount Severus in his chair, facing away from him. As she sheathed Severus in her, he gave out a great whimper, more as if in relief from pain than from satisfaction of finally entering her.

Severus cried and begged to be released from his confines, which only seemed to speed up Hermione's movements atop him. Finally, it seemed that Hermione took pity on Severus, as he noticed a flick of her wand and then his bindings were gone.

Grabbing Hermione by the hips, he nearly fell forward out of his chair, his muscles sore from straining against his bonds, and slid out of the chair. Hermione stayed joined with him and sank down onto her knees in front of him as he entered her from behind, his knees finally making contact with the floor.

It was desperate and sloppy. Even after Severus suffered from another dry orgasm, his cry more in pain than in pleasure, he kept on going, his erection still firm and needy. Severus' hips seemed to move out of their own accord with little regard for position or pleasure. Sweat dripped from his nose and chin in heavy drops to fall on Hermione's hips as she bucked back.

Hermione, in her own potion-induced desperation, was unaware of how Severus' condition was deteriorating. She tried arching her back and angling her hips in a way to give her more pleasure, but she could tell that the strain of the two potions in Severus was already taxing him close to the limits of his own strength.
Severus was panting and sweating. His breath was ragged and his lungs hurt as he tried to get more oxygen into his lungs to keep moving in a way his body demanded without reason. He repositioned himself so he was on his back as Hermione remounted him, continuing to face away from him.

The wooden floor was unforgiving to her knees, but she ignored the discomfort, desperate to fuck Severus.

Upon turning around to face him, as she continued to rock and bounce, Hermione saw Severus' face. He was looking like he was ready to collapse from sheer exhaustion. Sweat-soaked hair plastered his face, and his eyes were heavy and unfocused from the exertion. Seeing him in such a state, she felt the effects of the potion quickly wane to the point where she decided to climb off him and check on him. He protested weakly at the removal of his member from her warmth.

Placing a hand at Severus' neck to check his pulse, she noticed it was high and a bit erratic.

Concerned that other complications were arising, Hermione held three fingers aloft and asked, "Severus, how many fingers am I holding up?"

"Four?" he weakly muttered.

"Do you have any ringing in your ears?"

"No," he groaned.

"How is your head feeling?"

"Missing your tightness."

"No, Severus, your other head," she said, her voice becoming more concerned. "Do you have a headache?"

"I don't know. Maybe," he said uncertainly, his eyes squinting.
Hermione pried one eye open to look at his pupils. His eyes were naturally black, but normally she could at least tell where the pupils ended and the irises began upon close inspection. Tonight, it looked like they were nearly all pupil.

Severus lifted a hand to shield his eyes from the brightness of the kitchen light.

As the sweat continued to pour down his forehead and drip down his check, his cock still twitched for attention. His breathing was becoming shallow and more labored.

Hermione, feeling the effects of the arousal potion nearly gone with the adrenaline of Severus in danger, reached for the vial of antidote and announced, "Severus, we're ending this now."

"No," he protested, as he weakly tried to push Hermione's hand away, but failed. His eyes began to roll up into his head.

Not waiting any longer, Hermione poured the antidote down Severus' throat and waited for him to snap out of this state.

A shudder overtook his body and he violently convulsed on the floor, slumping sideways against Hermione. She held onto him, hoping this was just a reaction to the antidote, remembering the involuntary shudder that overtook her body after taking it.

The seizure stopped and Severus continued to lie there panting heavily, his head resting in her lap.

In a voice much closer to his normal tone, versus the strange delirious one he’d spoken with moments before, he croaked, "I wanted to see how this double potion behaved."

Hermione tenderly swept the sweat-soaked tendrils out of Severus' face as she began listing off all the physical signs she’d noted before giving Severus the antidote, including the eyes rolling up into his head.

"I don't remember..."
"Memory loss was something you did list as a side effect," she reminded him.

"That I did indeed," he suddenly recalled. "Then you chose a fine time to end the experiment if I was that far gone."

Severus and Hermione continued to lie on the kitchen floor, both partially clothed and completely disheveled.

"Can you get up and to the bathroom? You're drenched with sweat," his apprentice noted.

"I'm not sure, but we'll find out now, won't we."

Severus had great difficulty getting up and needed to lean on Hermione to get himself to the bathroom. Once there, she helped him disrobe and slip into the bath. After he settled, Hermione began tending to him, washing his hair and soaping him down. Severus was completely worn out.

"Are you still feeling any effects of the potions, or did the one dose of the antidote take care of that?" she asked.

"Completely done and over," he sighed, as he tried to stay awake, feeling the tender ministrations of Hermione lovingly wash him. "Did you take the antidote?"

"No, seeing you in distress seemed to have countered the effects rather suddenly," she remarked, then added, "Much like being rejected by Ron, then running into Alan, tampered down the effects of the Blue Fairy Martini. Fear, anger, or adrenaline of some sort seems to counter the effects."

"Interesting," Severus replied drowsily. "Include it in your report. I don't remember much except the pain, ceaseless orgasms, dry orgasms, mindless need to hump anything, and only snippets of the delirium. Your report will be the one Miss Brown needs to read carefully."

"I'll write it up just as soon as I've got you tucked into bed," she answered him, but noted that he had suddenly fallen asleep in the bath.

Hermione rinsed him off and cast a Mobilicorpus to lift and carry his body back to bed, drying him off with a towel before lowering him into bed, tucking him in for the night.

Once put to bed, Hermione went off to the kitchen to set the room to rights. She cleared out her equipment that she brought, and marked any remaining potion for Severus to have delivered back to his work. Then she began writing her report for her future boss.

Recalling events clearly, Hermione wrote down the sequence of events, the order in which they occurred, and their approximate time. After she had filled out three scrolls with all necessary details, she rolled them up and left them for Severus to find in the morning.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 61 A/N: Some of the side effects of Severus taking the Male and Libido Enhancing Potions are side effects of Viagra, the little blue pill for erectile dysfunction.

As for Severus’ joke about snakes not biting members of Slytherin House, it a play on the old joke about the lawyers and sharks:

“Why won’t a shark attack a lawyer swimming in the ocean?
Professional courtesy.”

And let's give a round of thanks to my betas, JuneW and Cytherea, for their work on this chapter and the previous one, Chapter 60.
Chapter Summary

Hermione and Ron go to the ball, and what a fete it is. Come meet Severus and Draco's nom de guerres, and sample the fare such as “sandwiches” and tainted punch.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Sixty-Two
“The Ministry's Halloween Masked Ball”

Disclaimer: It is a truth universally acknowledged, that JK Rowling, in possession of a good story, must own Harry Potter and all its concepts. However little known the feelings or views of such a writer may be on her first encountering fanfic, this truth is so well fixed in the minds of the surrounding fanfic writers and readers of Harry Potter fanfic, that it is considered polite and a legal necessity to claim that Harry Potter is the rightful property of Rowling.

A/N: Disclaimer is a parody of Jane Austen's Pride & Prejudice.

Severus awoke to Draco shaking him firmly by the shoulder.

"Testing went that well last night?" Draco chuckled, a wry smile upon his lips.

Lifting his head from his pillow, Severus looked about in confusion, his hair heavily mussed from having been put to bed still slightly damp. He couldn't remember how he had made it to the bed last night. The last thing he remembered was Hermione washing the sweat from his body in the bath before exhaustion overtook him.

"Better get up; it's time for our parole meeting," Draco reminded Severus before going to his armoire to yank out his friend's clothes, chucking underpants, shirt, trousers and socks at his head, while Severus was trying to rouse himself, still feeling disoriented.

His body ached.
Last night was a partial blur once he took the second potion. Severus would definitely be recommending a strong warning on the box that no one should ever take both potions.

Before Severus left with Draco for his weekly meeting with Kingsley, Marf informed him that Hermione had left some marked vials and scrolls for him on the kitchen table. Severus directed the house-elf to deliver them to his office for review later.

At the Twenty-Four Blackbird Bakery, Draco had to order something for Severus, since the older wizard was still out of sorts.

"So what happened to you last night that has you more wankered than a house-elf drunk on butterbeer?" Draco prompted the Potions master.

Severus was still rubbing his face, noting he forgot to shave that morning. "I took both the Male Enhancement Potion and the Arousal Enhancing Potion last night." He paused for effect before adding, "At the same time."

Draco gave him an amusedly surprised look. "One of those is enough to wear any wizard out, but both at the same time? That intense?"

"That bad," Severus morosely answered, blinking owlishly as he was still trying to gather his scattered wits. "My 'assistant' had to give me the antidote after about the first forty minutes," he said, eluding to Hermione without naming her, should there be anyone overhearing them that early Friday morning in Diagon Alley. "I can barely remember what happened, but it will be interesting to read her account."

"Eww, glad I didn't try it myself. Which I was considering, until you said to wait," Draco added.

Once seated in Kingsley's office, Draco's mood began to turn for the worse, having been reminded of the recent events of Pansy's murderer's trial.

"I can't believe he got off, either," Kingsley said, in response to the look he got from Draco when the topic came up.

"How is it that despite the clear and damning evidence, he got off?" Severus asked, still upset over the verdict.
"Friends in high places. Bribes. The Ministry swinging in the complete other direction where attacks against Muggles were tolerated more during the last war, so showing tolerance for unjustly killing a Death Eater to somehow balance a previous injustice. Who knows," Kingsley said with dismay, perplexed himself as to what he thought was a simple open-and-shut case. "Some of us in the department have taken a keener interest in watching the bastard who got off scot-free." He nervously ran a hand over his bald pate.

This gave Draco little comfort, knowing the wizard who had killed his former fiancée would never be punished for her murder, but it was better than nothing. Kingsley was one in a very small circle of friends Severus and Draco could trust, but given that Kingsley was an Auror under the watch of Mad-Eye Moody, that trust could only extend so far.

"Now, today we'll have to keep this brief. As I'm sure you're aware, the Ministry’s Halloween ball is tonight, and I have a great deal of work to do to prepare for it. Moody is in quite a state regarding security, as this is open to everyone and no invitation is required, so he's rather concerned about who might show up," Kingsley further explained, giving a pointed glare at both of them.

"As if Moody would be able to tell. From what I've heard, it's a masked ball and the whole point in that everyone is to remain anonymous and unknown." Severus cast about a bored glance.

"Which is why Moody is certain this will be a chance for someone – under the guise of invisibility in a throng of other masked individuals – to come and create a security hazard."

"Please," Draco drawled, as he rolled his eyes dramatically. "I wouldn't be caught dead at such an event, if Moody thinks I'm going."

"I didn't think so," Kingsley replied, regarding Severus as well to gauge the level of disdain he had marked upon his face at the idea of going to such a thing as a ball that would involve dancing, socializing and merriment. "Then I'll see you next week, gentlemen," he announced as he rose, seeing the pair out as he began his long day of preparations.

Hermione was up bright and early, arriving at work even before the Twenty-Four Blackbird Bakery had opened at six that morning.

The Ministry had sent a memorandum around to all the departments that they were closing every department down at noon so that people could go home and prepare for the ball. Also, they wanted the preparations to commence for transforming the Ministry for the ball without employees getting Knowing that she would be expected to keep up with the inflow of shipments, despite having her work day shortened, Hermione got there extra early. She was pleased when Trevor showed up twenty minutes after her, having taken her suggestion to come early since they were closing down early.

As they both worked quickly and diligently to test the ingredients that had come overnight and kept arriving, since a lot of ingredients were harvested in the autumn and this was near the peak of season, Hermione kept a keen eye for an elusive box of fluxweed picked at full moon.

Watching the clock, Hermione noticed the time was coming close to wrap everything up for the day and week. Trevor and his mentor began cleaning up the lab and were about to head out the door when another shipment of boxes came in, followed immediately by Madam Dushka.

"All right. Time to get going. Thank you for having everything finished by noon," their supervisor said as she tried to rush the pair out of the lab.

"Hang on a second," Hermione said, pretending to leave something behind while checking the side of the boxes. Obscured by the boxes, she pretended to pick up a dropped quill as her eyes scanned the labels.

For a moment, Hermione knelt there, frozen, eye-to-label with a large and sturdy looking box of fluxweed picked at full moon, the large printing staring right back at her.

"Mrs. Weasley!" Madam Dushka bellowed. "Preferably today?" she said sarcastically in order to hurry her employee out so they could lock the lab, per Head Auror Mad-Eye Moody's instructions.

There were going to be thousands of witches and wizards packed into the Ministry tonight, and security was to be extra tight for areas not only in the Atrium, but other places in the Ministry where the public would not be allowed. As Hermione, Trevor and their boss walked along the corridor, Kingsley Shacklebolt walked in the opposite direction towards them.

"All locked up," Madam Dushka announced.

"Thank you. I'll just make one last check since I need to be sure," the Auror said and continued on his way, but not before giving Hermione a brief nod in greeting, acknowledging the fellow Order of the Phoenix member.

Trevor and Madam Dushka missed the subtle exchange, which was fine with Hermione.

~~~~~~~*~

Severus' morning was no less busy. He was pleased by the detailed account that Hermione had left for him and Miss Brown, yet equally appalled at the results of the previous night's experiment which he could scarcely remember. He surmised that Hermione had finished bathing him and moved him to bed.

Pansy's murder trial and last night after testing. He did not like to rely on anyone, but it touched him that Hermione had been there when he had needed someone.

Lavender was too busy to read his short report of what he could remember, much less Hermione's more lengthy and accurate detailed account. She was busy sending last-minute owls to the press about her impending announcements at the masked ball, which seemed to have turned from a celebration into a platform for various people and organizations to make their announcements to the press since they would be there en masse, including many foreign journalists.

While Severus reviewed a Muggle cookbook Hermione had recently purchased for him that had recipes for fruit leathers and other "fun foods for children," Draco came over to knock on Severus' office door.

"Deciding on opening a kindergarten in your next life?" the blond wizard joked.

"Hardly. Research for that elusive edible body paint that seems to be an ongoing process," Severus informed him.

"Why not get one of those Muggle edible body paint kits and reverse engineer from that?"

"Because we already did that, and half of the ingredients required a doctorate in Muggle Chemistry to pronounce, besides tasting worse than the French onion soup at the Three Broomsticks," Severus replied. "Even experimenting with Muggle jelly was rather unpleasant, flavor-wise."

Severus flipped over to a page featuring children's edible finger paints and felt the beginnings of inspiration unfurl in his mind.
"Well, don't take too much longer. Lav wants us to start getting ready for the ball soon. She's made up a batch of facial hair growth potion, and she wants your final opinion on it before letting us both use it for tonight," Draco said, before leaving to start his own preparations.

Hermione didn't want to get ready for the ball. She was too excited that the fluxweed had finally arrived. She hoped Trevor would come in around his normal time Monday morning so she could pilfer some before he arrived and fill out another false report.

Ron was busy getting a haircut at the stylist's salon, as Bascom wanted him to visit a particular hairdresser to make him look sharp tonight, especially for the press. Of course, Ron would show up with a mask, but when it came time for the Mercury Broom Company to make some announcements, Ron would be unmasked.

Hermione hadn't shown Ron the latest dress she had purchased from Madam Mandel. Not that she needed his approval, even if he did disagree with some of her choices.

Going into the bathroom, she applied the temporary black hair dye. Fortunately, Madam Mandel had helped Hermione pick a color for her dress that would suit her temporary black locks for the ball, as well as her natural dark chestnut tresses.

Once applied, she set her hair to fall about her shoulders in smooth waves, since her gown was very reminiscent of the old Hollywood glamour style. She even affixed a large blue rose, in full bloom, to the side of her head, just above and behind her left ear as suggested. Madam Mandel had recently been looking to some of the vintage Muggle glamour looks for new inspiration for some of her designs. At the Yule Ball, during Hermione's fourth year at Hogwarts, teenagers were more likely to adopt the more modern fashion of Muggles, with wizarding flair of course, but the adults in the wizarding world seemed perpetually stuck in Victorian and Edwardian fashion. When Hermione purchased the matte silk charmeuse dress with the deep halter neckline, she was assured that no one would have a dress even remotely like hers, since many in wizarding society were still insisting on buying the full-skirt ball gowns, some proclaiming that it wasn't a proper ball gown unless they had the hoop petticoat or bustle to go with it.

Hermione liked the fact she'd have a sleek profile in which to slip through the crowds she expected, versus fighting with yards and yards of a ruffled and tiered skirt with its own postal code. Her dress could also work for an evening out in Muggle London, since retro fashion had come back into style for even her old world.

This was yet another dress that required that she not wear a bra, but Hermione knew the charms to hold herself in place, plus the charms for her black seamed stockings.
Slipping the dress on, she really liked the plunging halter neckline. It certainly dipped down far enough to give anyone glancing her way a peek at her cleavage since it dipped to the bottom of her chest line. She wasn't well endowed like Ginny was, but she still felt comfortable with what this neckline revealed. And though the back did not plunge nearly as far down as her black dress that Ron loathed, everything above her waist was exposed. At least she had a matching cloak to go with it. The opera length gloves in the same color put the final touch to the elegant and understated outfit.

Once dressed, she admired herself in the mirror, whose reflection kept breaking into broad smiles. The reflection even felt brave enough to speak this time and comment, "You are gonna knock them dead tonight, sweetheart."

Ron finally came home looking smart, freshly styled and shaved, before he ran off to the bedroom to change into his new dress robes for the evening. As he was buttoning his white shirt, he called out, "You dressed and ready to go, 'Mione?"

Ron's hair remained in its natural state, since he was going to do photos for the press at the event.

"Yes," she answered and appeared in the doorway, her cloak hanging over her arm still.

"That's your slip, right?" Ron asked.

"No, this is my dress," Hermione corrected him, fearing another blow-up over her choice of clothes.

"But ball gowns are supposed to..." he trailed off, his hands making gestures indicating to the voluminous skirt he expected Hermione to be sporting for the ball, his nose scrunching up, unable to articulate with words.

In order to cut him off before it turned into another row, Hermione said, "Just imagine how easy it will be to navigate the crowds if I don't have a skirt as big as a Quidditch hoop around my ankles."

Ron stopped and pondered that for a moment. Hermione could see the gears grinding furiously, and she nearly expected smoke to start coming out of his ears.
"You know, that's a lovely dress, Hermione. Good choice. Nice color, too," he remarked of the electric royal blue that complimented her hair and skin just so.

Once Ron was dressed in a set of black formal robes Bascom had had tailored just that week, they affixed their color-coordinated masks matching their outfits before Apparating to the Ministry.

~~~~~~~*~

The Atrium of the Ministry was already packed when Mr. and Mrs. Ron Weasley arrived at a quarter past six. The event was not fifteen minutes underway, yet it looked like everyone was already there.

Just as Madam Mandel predicted, most of the witches there wore voluminous ball gowns, some looking as if they fit in better during the mid-nineteenth century than in the early twenty-first century. Ron immediately saw the wisdom in Hermione's choice of apparel, even though he thought a bit too much skin was exposed for his liking. Despite any reservations he may have had, he mostly kept his opinions to himself for once.

Near the recently installed statue, a band played music suitable for the socializing part of the evening while drinks and hors d'oeuvres were being served.

Ron was supposed to meet up with Bascom first thing upon arriving. They had agreed to meet near the elevators, which just also happened to be right by one of the seven bars set up at the ball.

After wading through the crowds and ducking trays of floating savories and nibbles, Ron finally spotted his sponsor and his wife, Mrs. Dagmar Nettleton. He waved at them as they approached.

"Ronny!" Bascom greeted his rising star before swiveling his gaze upon Hermione. "Hermione," he purred like a cat about to pounce on a bird.

Hermione stiffly offered her arm out to formally shake his hand at arm’s length. "Mr. Nettleton," she said sweetly, but with little warmth.

Instead of shaking, he bent down and kissed the top of her gloved hand, Hermione did her best to keep a sweet and detached smile upon her lips, while refraining a shudder of revulsion.

"Let me introduce you to my wife, Dagmar," Bascom announced to the pair. "Dagmar, this is Ron and Hermione Weasley. Ron will be our new 2004 calendar model."
"I'll bet he is," Dagmar agreed a little too wholeheartedly as she detached herself from her husband's side; the heavy silk taffeta of her red and black bustled skirt rustled as she sashayed over. Sidling up to Ron, she grasped his upper arm possessively as her eyes raked over Ron's form with the same appraisal Bascom was using on Hermione.

The older witch turned to view Hermione. "Ron, Bascom never told me what a lovely wife you have. Such a darling figure shown off in such a slinky dress!" Mrs. Weasley would have been initially flattered by such a compliment by another witch, but found the hungry look Dagmar gave her a bit disquieting.

Dagmar slipped a chummy arm into both Ron's and Hermione's before saying, "You two really should come over for dinner some time while Bascom is busy on one of his business trips. It would be lovely to get to know both of you so much better."

Hermione's eyes opened wide with the sudden knowledge of what the woman's remark implied as Mrs. Nettleton's hand had discreetly slipped from Hermione's arm, to gently goose Hermione's young and firm arse through the smooth silk. At that moment, Hermione could see the advantages of a hoop skirt or bustle.

"I think I see Albert Dobmeir over there; I really should go say hello to him," Hermione said suddenly, trying not to be too flustered, her eyes nearly bulging with urgency to escape.

"Okay, I'll catch up with you later," Ron said blithely unaware that another witch had just come on to his wife.

Hermione beat a quick path away from the older couple and her husband in order to catch her breath and process just what happened. Glancing behind her shoulder, Hermione noticed Dagmar's hands were still fondling her husband's biceps. Ron seemed to be enjoying the attention and was flexing his biceps for her admiration, unaware that he was being appraised like a piece of meat by the older witch. Ron could really be a bit thick at times.

Leaning up against a pillar to survey the scene, Hermione looked about before spotting the twins, in matching outfits, with their hair still in its natural red state, standing near the punch bowl. She recognized them instantly, even with their masks. As she slid past the other guests, thankful for Madam Mandel's recommendation for formal wear as she slipped between hoop skirts like a fish swimming around rocks in a stream, she saw the twins peer about before doing something that she could not view from her current vantage point. As she got closer, she saw the twins look about once more before quickly walking away from the punch bowl, unaware that Hermione noticed them acting suspiciously. Glancing at the punch bowl, she saw the liquid swirl about as if it had just been hastily stirred, much like when an ingredient had just been quickly whisked into a cauldron.

Looking about, she spotted other witches and wizards imbibing in glasses of punch, procured before the new secret ingredient had been added. Discreetly scrutinizing the color and comparing with the punch in the bowl now, she noticed the iridescent pearl color and knew immediately the twins had put mother of pearl – and who knows what else – into the punch. It was one of the few non-alcoholic drinks available at the ball. Hermione was tempted to use her wand and "accidentally" cause the punch bowl to tip over, but before she could take any course of action, she heard someone call out her name.

"Hermione?"

She spun around to see a tall wizard with broad shoulders and a slender muscular frame, smiling at her with a warm and disarming smile.

"It's me," he said, before removing his mask to reveal himself. "Neville."

"Neville?" Hermione said in shock. She didn't remember Neville ever looking this good. He had been a bit of a pudgy boy during his early years at Hogwarts, but he certainly grew up to be quite a handsome young wizard. Even at the statue’s dedication ceremony and Harry's birthday party, she hadn't noticed how much he had changed from her old impressions that she still had of him in her mind.

"You look fantastic," Hermione said in earnest. 'Really fantastic; he cleans up very well. Stop staring, Hermione.'

"Well, look at you," Neville offered. "You were lovely at the Yule Ball, but this..." he trailed off. "Ron is quite a lucky wizard." He smiled at her in such a way that she knew he’d meant that in all sincerity, and not in a covetous manner, but as an old friend remarking how well she looked.

"Listen," she said, interrupting their reunion. "I just saw the twins put something in the punch."

"Not again," Neville complained. "They did that at the Yule Ball as well."

"They did?" Hermione was surprised she didn't know that.
"Oh, yeah. Told McGonagall, and she had the house-elves discreetly swap it out before anything got out of hand. Doesn't surprise me." Neville shook his head, not surprised that the twins still were up to the same old high jinks.

Hermione's admiration for Neville just went up several notches.

"Just a moment," he said as he excused himself momentarily.

Hermione watched as he went over to the bar and whispered something into a bartender's ear before joining Hermione once more.

"Taken care of," he said casually.

Glancing back over to the bowl, she suddenly noticed it was empty and one of the bartenders was bringing a new punch bowl over with fresh punch, this time with a closed glass lid charmed shut so nothing could be clandestinely added.

"I have a friend I'd like you to meet," Neville said to Hermione.

Hermione wondered if Neville had a new girlfriend he wanted to introduce. It had been almost a year since Luna called off the engagement. She had even returned his ring and they had remained friends, but Hermione wondered if he was seeing someone new.

As they came around a gaggle of witches with tall hair-dos and even taller feathers in their hair to match their masks, Hermione spied Lavender Brown amid a gathering of older wizards.

'Oh, my God, is Neville dating Lavender?' was the first thing that came to her mind.

Leading the way, Neville said, "Hermione, I'd like to introduce Albert Dobmeir."

Upon hearing his name, an older wizard, who looked like he was slightly over a hundred years old, turned around. He was a tall, slightly portly gentleman with salt-and-pepper colored hair – mostly salt – bright brown eyes, a ski-slope nose that was slightly bulbous at the end, and a distinct double chin.
"Albert, I'd like to introduce a long time and dear friend of mine, Hermione Granger."

Hermione finally had a face to go with the Potions master she would be apprenticing under. Severus had mentioned that she might have a chance to finally meet him at the ball. Her face brightened as she smiled openly at the older wizard who would be her mentor for the next few years at least.

"Mr. Dobmeir," she began with her hand outstretched to shake his, but was cut off.

"Call me Albert," he insisted, shaking her hand enthusiastically. "And you're the indomitable Mrs. Hermione Weasley." Off behind Albert, next to Lavender, an elderly wizard with silvery hair and an elaborate mustache began choking on his drink. "I'm so glad I've finally have had the chance to meet you, Hermione."

"And I, you."

"I'm sorry I haven't owled beforehand to meet with you in person, but there have been a lot of family and legal matters to deal with, I'm sure you understand," Albert apologized.

"I certainly can understand." Hermione assured him with a wave of her hand that it was no bother.

"I was just mentioning to Neville here about taking on a new apprentice, but I had no idea he knew whom it was, since I didn't mention it to him. But since you're such dear friends, that doesn't surprise me."

Neville swiveled his head between Albert and Hermione. "You mean," he interjected into their conversation, "that Hermione is your new apprentice?"

Hermione noticed a slight flash of surprise that she was the one, along with that familiar look she was accustomed to when people saw a witch of her age applying for an apprenticeship.

"Yes, that is why I thought that, since you're friends..." the elderly Potions master assumed.
"Neville and I haven't had a chance to catch up in a long while," Hermione offered, as a way to smooth over any possible embarrassment.

"So you're his new apprentice? That's fantastic, Hermione." Neville shook his friend's hand lightly in congratulations, before turning back to Albert. "I can't tell you how many times Hermione saved my neck in Potions."

Next to the elderly wizard with fancy waxed mustache and Lavender, a tall wizard dressed entirely in gold began to cough.

"Really now?" Albert said with keen interest behind some of those stories. "But since Neville speaks so highly of you, I can only feel better knowing I've taken on such a talented apprentice."

Hermione hoped she wasn't blushing.

"So, this is excellent, since as part of your apprenticeship, you'll be studying under Neville for some of your more advanced Herbology and taking care of my garden," Albert went on.

Hermione finally figured out how Albert Dobmeir and Neville were friends, at least.

Over Albert's shoulder, Hermione spied Lavender approaching.

"Hermione," Lavender said sweetly and gently hugged her, as if greeting an old friend, though they weren't that close despite having been dorm mates for seven years.

Lavender Brown was dressed head to toe in her signature color that matched her name, with even her hair matching her gown and mask.

"You know each other as well?" Albert asked.

Before Hermione could answer, Lavender began, "We were both in Gryffindor in the same year."

Hermione made a valiant effort not to react unfavorably to Lavender, knowing this was the same witch who set her husband up with one of her stable of "boys," Blaise Zabini, for a shag, not to mention arranged her initial meetings with her own paramour, Severus.

"My goodness, but you all know each other so well, this is like a reunion," Albert replied to the news of them being well acquainted.

"Hermione," Lavender said, her smile as perfectly cool and flawless as her appearance, "I'll like to introduce you to James White, my head of Marketing and Advertising."

The elderly wizard with the elaborate waxed mustache came forward and enthusiastically and warmly shook her hand. "Mrs. Weasley," the wizard drawled with an American southern accent that seemed familiar somehow.

Comprehension dawned behind her eyes briefly – before she schooled her features – that this much, much older wizard with the silvery-gray hair was Draco Malfoy. She had finally remembered Severus mentioning what Draco did for his unsanctioned work for the Lovely Lavender company. If it wasn't for her knowledge about Malfoy beforehand, she would have never guessed it was him.

"Mr. White," Hermione replied, shaking his hand back, a convincing smile upon her lips. "Please, call me Hermione."

"Why certainly. And you can call me Jim, though some friends call me Jimmy. Just don't call me late to dinner!" he laughed at his own joke and slapped his knee before resting his hands back on his cane.

Neville, Lavender and Hermione all laughed politely at "Jim's" corny and very old joke.

Hermione was stunned at how Draco looked nothing like his old self, and at his very good American accent, though the accent was so familiar in some way that she couldn't quite place it. His back was bent from age, and he had lost so much muscle mass, it was hard to believe that not hours before he was a tall well-built wizard beneath that old frame due to the Ageing Potion. In addition to that, he had a very prominent smile as if his teeth were almost too large for his mouth; when he smiled, it appeared to be all teeth that were somewhat askew, different from Draco's normally straight teeth. His hair was shorter and a silvery gray and up-swept, as if caught in a strong gust. He wore a simple black mask, so she could not tell if he had even changed his eye color or not. The waxed mustache was ridiculous, but quite appropriate for a wizard of his supposed age, as it had a very late Victorian quality about it, which suited the time period Draco was trying to impress for age. He was wearing a rather old-fashioned style set of dress robes, even though they were new and neatly pressed. And his cane had a rather large and obnoxious head of an American bald eagle cast in silver with one ruby eye and one blue sapphire eye.

Well, if anything, between the cane head, bad jokes and his accent alone, Draco was going to do a very good job of convincing everyone he was American. Hermione was sure of that.

"And this is Sebastian Delgado," Lavender continued, introducing the wizard who looked like a strutting gold peacock, "my Potions master. But you already are acquainted through correspondence."

Hermione blinked twice in surprise at the vision before her.
Severus had taken the Ageing Potion and his frame indicated he was older as she had seen him before, but the outfit was just so uncharacteristic, the word “ostentatious” would not have accurately described it. Granted, he was supposed to be a Spaniard, and Spanish wizards were known to be a bit over the top in their manner of dress compared to British fashion, but even Hermione was having trouble believing Severus willingly put on this outfit of his own volition.

The Potions master was wearing a pair of tasseled boots with what must have been a three-inch heel, for he was a couple inches taller than normal. He was wearing what looked like high-waisted gold breeches and a gold matador's jacket with puffed sleeves, heavily embroidered with ornate beadwork. His very frilly shirt was the only thing that wasn't gold on his whole being. And then there was the gold hat, which looked like it would have been better suited to be on one of the Three Musketeers than on a puffed-up matador peacock in head-to-toe gold. His "paunch" protruded slightly past the opening of his bolero-style jacket. And then there was the hair – very short, and also gold to match the gold pointed goatee he sported on his face. Even his eyebrows were gold, which blended into his gold mask.

Never in a million years would Hermione ever guess this Midas monstrosity, now giving a courtly bow before her, was Severus.

Hermione finally registered that Lavender mentioned that "Delgado" and she were acquainted through correspondence.

"Oh, you already know each other," Neville chimed in, to Hermione's dismay. "How did you meet?"

Even she and Severus had not quite worked out how they were going to justify Hermione's royalties on Potions when she and "Delgado" had never met, though Lavender just dropped the first hint.

"I'd love to hear the story behind that," Draco chirped, his eyes twinkling behind his mask, his grin broad and toothy.

"Oh, yes, though this is the first time we've met in person," Severus trilled, speaking with a Castilian accent; his voice was much higher than what Hermione was used to, more like a tenor; it had a sing-song cadence to it. "Mrs. Weasley owled me some years ago regarding an Potions apprenticeship, but at the time I was not taking any applications. But I remembered her application.
So thorough, so thoughtful and well written," he said effusively, using his hands expressively, very uncharacteristically of the Severus she knew.

"So when I was stuck regarding the mass brewing of a certain potion Miss Brown here will be introducing later this year, I owled her for ideas. I had already asked a few other of my fellow Potion masters for ideas. They were stuck. Nada. So at my wits’ end, I thought I would owl this brilliant witch here who might have some new ideas. And indeed she did!" he exclaimed, grasping her hand and patting it affectionately, in gratitude.

"Really, that's amazing, Hermione," Neville remarked.
"And I when I decided to go back to Spain, I thought I would recommend her for an apprenticeship with Albert here, if she was still interested, which she was," Severus finished, having covered all the areas of question of how Hermione and Sebastian Delgado knew each other, should questions arise after Delgado and Snape left England around the same time.

Hermione did her best to play the humble witch who just had a simple idea, casting her eyes down in embarrassment of the bubbly praise of this Spanish wizard. In her mind, she was reeling, processing and committing to memory the story that was now public record with Albert, Neville and who knew who else as witnesses. She wondered if Severus had already worked out that story beforehand or had he made that up on the fly. The best lies are the ones based on a thread of truth, and in truth, Severus had been stumped as to how to brew the Male Enhancement Potion in large batches and Hermione was the one who’d offered the solution with brewer's kettles.

"I'm parched," Hermione said brightly. "How can a witch get a drink around here?"

"Let me show you the way to the bar, little lady," Draco offered, taking Hermione hand and tucking it into his arm, as if he was escorting his granddaughter. "That is a lovely color on you," he complimented her. "And is that your natural hair color or did you dye it like most of the witches here tonight? If you don't mind me asking. Hope it's not too forward of me."

"Not at all. It's dyed for the ball," Hermione answered him as she let herself be led off to the bar by a very graciously behaving Draco.

Now it struck Hermione: Draco sounded like that cartoon character, Foghorn Leghorn. But then again, that's how most English thought all Americans from the south sounded anyway.

Once they had put some distance between them and the group, Hermione let out a long breath.

Patting her hand, Draco assured her under his breath, "Just keep breathing, sugar." He maintained his southern accent.

"So, Jim. Or do you want me to call you Jimmy?" Hermione said, pretending this was truly the first time they had met.

"Whichever one you feel more comfortable with, my dear." He gave her another one of those overly toothy smiles.
While they waited in line at the bar, they kept up a believable patter of conversation befitting two people who just met and were becoming acquainted with each other.

Just as they were nearing the front of the line, Hermione heard her name called once again. Turning around, Hermione spotted Ginny, whom she recognized since they had gone dress shopping together and recognized each other by their outfits.

Ginny was wearing an emerald green sleeveless dress with a sweetheart neckline; the dress hugged her voluptuous curves until the mermaid skirt flared out dramatically just above the knee. She had also opted to wear something with a slimmer profile versus the other witches who looked like they would fit in with a Victorian ball. Together, Hermione and Ginny would have blended in perfectly with the glamorous golden days of Hollywood long past. Ginny kept her signature red locks, since so many others were going to dye their hair and hers was naturally striking, her hair complimented by the vivid green hue of her dress, mask and gloves.

"Ginny!" Hermione called out, glad to see another familiar face among the thousands that had packed the halls of the Ministry.

"Harry, Ginny, I'd like to introduce you to James White. He works for Lavender doing marketing," Hermione said, introducing the older wizard who was escorting her as the Potters approached.

"And advertising," Draco chimed in.

"Yes, I'm sorry, Jim. And advertising." Hermione tried to put on a performance as believable as the one Draco was putting on.

"Jim, these are my dearest friends, Ginny Potter and her husband, Harry," Hermione said, her hand gesturing for introduction.

Draco’s face brightened. "Harry? Harry Potter?" His face busted out into a broad and vibrant grin. "Well, butter my butt and call me a biscuit! Why, we've heard of you back in the States, even." Draco stuck out his hand and began vigorously shaking it, as if he was Harry's biggest fan. "My great-granddaughter, Tallulah, will just be so thrilled when I tell her I met you."

Harry started looking uncomfortable in the way he always did when treated as a celebrity, meeting strangers who were more familiar with the name and deeds than the person.
Draco went right on prattling in an excited fashion, "Can I get an autograph for my great-granddaughter, if you don't mind?"

Looking about nervously, Harry suddenly said, "Can I get back to you on that? I think my boss, Kingsley, is looking for me."

"Not a problem, Mr. Potter. Or can I call you Harry?" Draco asked with believable sincerity.

"Harry is fine," he said before slipping away off into the crowd to get away from yet another admirer.

Just then, it was Draco and Hermione's turn at the bar.

"I'll have a bourbon and butterbeer," Draco said firmly, slapping his hand on the counter.

"I'm sorry, sir, but we don't have bourbon," the bartender informed him, a bit put off by the brashness of this American. "We have Ogden's Old Firewhisky and Ogden's Single Malt Whisky."

"Fine. Two fingers of your strongest with ice cold butterbeer on top," Draco said heartily. "And you young ladies?"

"Two champagnes," Hermione replied, knowing what Ginny was going to ask for already.

Once they had their drinks, they meandered off to the side to let a group of wizards behind them "belly up to the bar," as Draco phrased it.

"What shall we toast to?" Draco asked.

Inspired, Hermione offered, "To all our hopes and dreams coming true, and sooner than we think."

Ginny looked at Hermione, to which Hermione nodded minisculely indicating that the fluxweed was a sure thing.
Glasses clinked and they drank.

Leaning forward, Ginny whispered in Hermione's ear, "Did you get it?"

"No, but the box came in right when they were closing up the lab. Monday, it will be done."

Wearing a smile as bright as the sun, Ginny said, "So Jim, you work for Lavender? How long have you been doing that?"

"Little over three years, but I'm missing family back home. So I'll be retiring soon anyway, time to head back. As lovely as my stay here in England has been, I'm itching to go," he said as he played with the twisted end of his heavily waxed mustache.

Hermione caught some of the double meaning behind Draco's words. She wondered where this new home for the trio would be. Severus had not divulged that to her, despite her guess that it might be Greece.

As the evening wore on, Hermione excused herself from the conversation Draco and Ginny were engaged in, noting they kept it very cordial. Hermione even introduced Draco's personality of James White to a few other people who had come over to talk with her, including Trevor, who was dressed in a rather vibrant set of plaid robes. Draco remarked he had a pair of curtains in his study back on his plantation in that exact pattern as Trevor's outfit. Trevor seemed to find no offense as Draco's underhanded slight at his choice of fashion, and began a lively discussion with the "elderly American" wizard about opportunities for Potions apprenticeships in America.

Besides Draco, Severus was putting on his very own stellar performance that evening. At one point, Mad-Eye Moody came over to greet Miss Brown, sizing up Severus in his full Delgado ensemble.

The two wizards shook hands briefly. Knowing what a gruff and paranoid person Moody was, Severus began a full court press of trying to engage in conversation with the Head Auror, asking him all sorts of questions about his work, his part in the war, and other topics that would seem normal for a complete stranger.
"So I've never seen you at Miss Brown's headquarters," Moody mentioned.

"That is because I spend most of my time at home, taking care of my lovely garden. I grow so many of my own ingredients, it requires a lot of my time, so I mostly owl Miss Brown and come in when she needs me. She's so gifted, I rarely need to come in," Severus explained with more gesticulation of his hands, which seemed to quell any further questions in the Auror's mind, especially when Severus put a friendly hand upon the Auror's shoulder, an action that would be completely in character for a Spaniard.

The physical contact by a relative stranger made Moody jump a bit and nearly pull out his wand.

"I am sorry," Severus said, his hands put up in surrender. "Have I offended you?"

Feeling a bit foolish for over-reacting, Moody explained, "No, it's just that here in England, we're a bit more reserved than you foreign folk. That's all."

To further avoid any further contact, accidental or intentional, with the strange, foreign wizard, Moody quickly excused himself with a curt farewell to Lavender, not bothering to acknowledge "Delgado."

Severus wanted to excuse himself and find Hermione, but considering that Miss Brown was using this opportunity to lay the foundation of witnesses who had met and talked with Sebastian Delgado, he stuck by her side for a while longer, letting her introduce him some of her other business associates. Even her silent partners, the twins, swung by to talk shop for a bit and meet Delgado. They even asked Severus about how their brand of British jokes and humor might translate to the Spanish youth back home in his country, since they were considering expanding their Treble W shop internationally.

As much as Hermione was looking forward to eating some of the scrumptious comestibles on the floating trays that circulated, magically refilling as the savory bite-sized treats were snapped up by hungry witches and wizards at the ball, Hermione's nervousness that Draco and Severus were to be discovered somehow suppressed her appetite. The alcohol on her empty stomach was beginning to make her head a little light, so in order to keep her wits about her, and to prevent any accidental slip of the tongue, Hermione stuck with pumpkin juice and water for the rest of the night. Despite how much as she wanted to eat and drink the night away, this was no time for mistakes to happen.

Making her way back towards where she last saw Ron, Hermione saw Harry talking with her husband. Joining them, she slipped her arm into her husband's, putting on a pretty believable façade that their marriage was great, given that Ron had recently confessed that he'd married Hermione out of pressure from his mother, rather than out of love.

Harry kept his mask down over his face, hoping it would give him a little anonymity for the night, though his signature scar was still visible through his black hair that framed his forehead. Ron had already taken his mask off, saying it was going to mess up his hair for the upcoming photo op later. After chatting for a little while, Harry excused himself, this time truly in need of speaking with Kingsley.

Once Harry left, Ron leaned over and confessed with befuddled surprise, "I had to escape Dagmar. She propositioned me, right under her husband's nose, though I'm not sure he noticed. God, I hope he didn't. I don't want anything to mess up this sponsorship."

"At least she didn't goose your arse, like she did mine," Hermione confessed, much to Ron's shock.

"She didn't."

"She did," Hermione confirmed darkly. "Though it's only a matter of time before Bascom comes right out and propositions me outright as well."

"He wouldn't," Ron countered, unable to believe his newest friend would cheat on Dagmar by propositioning his wife.

"For a keeper who can catch a Quaffle, you're pretty blind. My guess is, if we didn't both get away in time, Dagmar would have suggested we make her into a Dagmar sandwich," Hermione quipped blandly, and fairly accurately, too. "And if Bascom does know about his wife's dalliances, and she his, they might have suggested swapping as well."

Ron's face fell in disgust at the suggestion that a witch, who was old enough to be his mother, would have asked him and his wife for a three-way, much less trade his wife off to a man old enough to be Hermione's father or possibly grandfather. Ron was about to ask where Hermione learned about such things, wondering how she could even conceive of such ideas, when Minister Fudge appeared on a floating platform above the crowd gathered for the night.

Casting the Sonorus Charm, he spoke, "Ladies and gentlemen. Thank you all for attending the Ministry's Halloween Masked Ball. This gala, suggested by my beautiful and talented wife, Calpurnia, is a celebration that we have recovered fully from the dark times of our recent past, and there is a bright future for our society. So let us raise our glasses and toast to the bright future ahead. Cheers!

Nearly everyone had a drink in their hand, and those that did raised them in salute to the Minister's words, Draco and Severus especially.

"And now, it's time to dance!" Fudge announced before guiding the platform back down and ending the charm for his voice.

The band, which had been playing quietly in the background, struck up a waltz, the noise amplified louder. On an easel next to the band was a sign signifying the next type of song that they would play after the current song, which was going to be a foxtrot.

Hermione nudged her head towards the dance floor, wondering if Ron would at least have one go-round on the floor with his wife, but he begged it off, saying, "Later," above the loudness of the notes played.

Bascom came back over to Ron and Hermione. Shouting above the music, he indicated it was time for Ron to do his appearance for the press and photographers. Bascom promised to return Ron back to her later, speaking more to her chest than to her face as he leered down her front, glimpsing the swell of her breasts.

As Hermione was left alone amid a crowd, she began to look around for a familiar face. The problem was that nearly everyone was wearing a mask, and many had their hair dyed strange colors, making it harder to recognize anyone she knew.

There were times she thought she spotted Tonks, but it was just a witch who had dyed her hair pink for the night. And Luna was hard to spot as well, as many had dyed their hair a very similar light golden ash blonde as the Editrix of The Quibbler.

Meandering amongst the throng of people crowded around the edges of the dance floor full of witches and wizards, twirling in pairs like apple blossom petals falling from a tree in spring, Hermione spied Trevor with two other people. From the mincing gait, she could only assume that it was Madam Dushka who was the witch next to him. The wizard, who was shorter than her, flanked the other side of Trevor. Hermione didn't know who he was, but he was quite possibly Madam Dushka's husband, though she had never met him before. However, based on the photo of the married couple on Madam Dushka's desk, the size and build looked to be about right.
Curiosity piqued, given that the only thing down that hallway the trio strolled was stairs to the basement level where Hermione worked, she walked as inconspicuously as possible toward where they had gone. She checked to make sure that the trio had turned the corner before venturing down the hallway.

After peering back, looking to see if she would slip away unnoticed, Hermione turned the corner and saw the door to the lab swing shut. Madam Dushka had locked the lab earlier that day and Kingsley had double-checked it, but why were Trevor, their cunt boss, and Mr. Dushka going into the lab?

Slowly skulking up to the door, she was about to press her ear up to it, wishing she had a pair of Extendable Eyes or at least Extendable Ears, when a hand clamped around her mouth from behind, muffling any scream that might have escaped her lips.

"I would have thought a witch like you would have retained more of your stealth abilities, after all those years of sneaking around Hogwarts after hours," a familiar Castilian Spanish-accented voice whispered into her ear.

Hermione gave Severus a look that was a mixture of anger for momentarily frightening her and relief that it was him and not someone else.

"Maybe if I had Harry's Invisibility Cloak, this would be easier and I wouldn't have been noticed," she whispered back peevishly.

"I only noticed you because I was watching you, not the people dancing."

"Let's hope you're the only one who was watching me," she prayed.

"In a dress like this? Not likely," he murmured sweetly, a finger running delicately up her spine along bare flesh, his voice still holding an accent.

Hermione stifled a shuddering sigh, thinking this was not the best place for them to get caught together.
"Really? Now?" she said with an impatient whisper. "Trevor, Dushka and her husband just went in there. Just as I was being rushed out the door at noon today by her, a box of fluxweed picked at full moon came in," she hissed, trying to impart her lack of interest in Severus' attentions right now and why she was keenly interested as to why the unlikely trio were in there. Should anything happen to that box while those three were in there, that might mean a delay of nearly another year before Severus, Draco and Ginny could escape, if that was truly the only and last shipment of the year.

Understanding why Hermione was so terse with him, Severus suddenly became equally serious and grave. Now he was very curious as to why those three were in the lab as well.

"You think they might steal some and sell it on the black market?" asked Severus, his Castilian accent giving him a slight lisp.

"I don't think so, but I can't think of why they might be in there all alone."

Hermione and Severus leaned in and pressed their ear to the door, comprehension dawning on their faces.

Cracking the door open a smidgen, just enough to peer in, their suspicions were confirmed and further elaborated with visual sighting of Madam Dushka lying back on the sturdy testing bench while Trevor was plugging away at her, bent over her while his mouth was firmly latched onto one nipple. Madam Dushka was wailing rather loudly, masking any noise Hermione and Severus might have made cracking the door open or whispering amongst themselves. Behind Trevor was Mr. Dushka, buggering Trevor from behind, making a Trevor sandwich. The older wizard was making a whole lot of noise himself as well.

Hermione threw her hand over her mouth to stifle a gasp of shock when she realized what the short wizard was standing atop of in order to make himself tall enough to penetrate Trevor from behind. Under Mr. Dushka's black shiny shoes – and bright yellow trousers and polka dot underpants hanging about his ankles – was the box of fluxweed.

Severus understood what Hermione was frantically pointing at, and saw her shoulders seize up, violently cringing as the box suddenly buckled and a corner broke upon, spilling fluxweed all over the floor. Hermione clamped her hand over her mouth tighter to keep from gasping aloud.

There was a shout from Mr. Dushka as he pulled himself free from Trevor, kicking the box aside in frustration, spilling even more fluxweed all over the lab floor, before going to grab a sturdy stool on which to mount Trevor from behind once more.
Reeling, Hermione fell back against the wall, panting in panic that all that fluxweed was strewn about all over the place so carelessly. If anything, this would make it very easy for Hermione to sneak away plenty of the Polyjuice Potion ingredient without having to write up that she botched an experiment. She just hoped the box would not be patched up and reweighed before she came in Monday morning. Still, for the past two months she and Severus had been praying for a delivery of the scarce ingredient, only to watch so much of it casually wasted.

Severus was looking equally pained at what he just witnessed.

Before they could say anything, Severus heard the approach of footsteps before Hermione could register the sound.

"Slap me," he quickly whispered in his Castilian accent before he pinned Hermione up against the wall and planted a deep tongue kiss upon her mouth.

Finally hearing the footsteps and grasping the implication of his suggestion, she shoved back against his form and slapped him soundly across the face, just as Kinglsey Shacklebolt rounded the corner.

"I'm a married woman. How dare you!" Hermione yelled hotly, before storming off past Kingsley back towards the ball and the rest of the guests.

Severus looked at Kingsley sheepishly and gave a cavalier shrug before saying, "You can't blame a wizard for trying. Am I right?" He gently rubbed the side of his face where Hermione's hand made contact and added, lipstick still freshly smudged across his mouth, "But it was worth it."

Kingsley approached Severus, looking him up and down with a disapproving glare. "This area is closed off. What are you doing down here?"

"The young witch and I were discussing Potions, someplace where we didn't have to shout above the band, when we noticed some people going into her lab." Severus tilted his head in the direction of the door he was standing next to. "I was rather inspired by the moment, if you know what I mean." Severus sauntered off, whistling a jaunty tune.

As Severus was rounding the corner, heading back towards the ball, he heard a small choir of voices from inside the lab react in shock to being caught in flagrante delicto.
At some point, Severus would have to make a public apology to Hermione for acting so forward and presuming too much, seeing as how Kingsley was a witness. Given how stunning she looked that night, Severus wouldn't be surprised if he wasn't the last whose advances she would spurn.

Making sure she was looking properly reassembled after that sudden ravishing by Severus' mouth, fixing her smeared lipstick as well, Hermione rejoined the party. She wondered who else was making use of unused offices for a quick tryst.

Not surprisingly, she finally spotted the Weasley clan grouped together over by one of the few corners that didn't have a bar. Just like during Victory Day, they had congregated together. Fortunately, there were enough house-elves available for temporary hire to take care of all the Weasley grandchildren back at various homes, as this was a function meant for adults that went far past the bedtime of many little witches and wizards.

Penelope looked like she was long past overdue to pop, and she was sitting down, fanning herself with her mask that she had already removed, oppressed by the heat of so many bodies within a confined space. Even Hermione had long checked her cloak with the cloak girl for the evening, glad she had a cool dress on.

All the Weasley women, with the exception of Fleur, had dressed in the more traditional ball gown with huge skirts that required a lot of space in which to maneuver. Fleur was wearing something more sleek like Hermione, looking lovely in an empire-waisted silk column, having regained her slender shape shortly after the birth of her and Bill's latest child the night of Harry's birthday party. Fleur praised Hermione's choice of attire, remarking how chic it looked and the color was so lovely. Molly gave her a look up and down, Hermione noting that her mother-in-law didn't exactly care for the style, but then had quickly plastered on a sweet face, saying her daughter-in-law looked "nice." Molly was in her own champagne-coloured wedding cake confection, with tiers and tiers of ruffles down the skirt, taking up a fair bit of real estate herself. Bill returned with drinks for Fleur and himself.

Hermione spent a fair amount of time chatting with her in-laws, not wanting to join Ron and deal with Dagmar or Bascom coming on to her again. She could have rejoined Lavender, "Jim" and "Sebastian," but considering how she just slapped Severus across the face for show, it would not make much sense for her to seek their company if she was pretending to be upset with the Spanish peacock, though only Kingsley was the only witness so far that they knew of. She talked with the twins about their business, and they mentioned meeting some "Dago bloke" to which Hermione acted slightly aggrieved at the mention of his name, keeping up the pretense.

Looking about, she saw over in one corner Ron coming back from his time with the press. The flashes of light signified someone else was right now the center of attention for the journalists in attendance.

Ron looked quite relieved to be back within the sanctuary of his family, even amid the crowd of people. Hermione could only guess how difficult Dagmar was to deal with. Though Hermione and her husband had drifted apart in their marriage, they still kept up the pretense of a happy marriage for the benefit of his family, even with much of the bad blood and recent revelations that had passed between them recently. If anything, it gave the believable front of a happy marriage to the rest of the Weasley clan. Hermione wondered how Molly would react if the old fortuneteller's prediction came true and their marriage was indeed going to be over before the end of the year.

As the chatter and flashes from the press area died down, and started up anew once more, Hermione spotted a witch and wizard making a direct line towards her and Ron. When the pair came closer, she suddenly recognized that gait.

"Viktor!" Hermione said warmly, and greeted her old friend with a kiss upon his cheek.

"Ron! Her-my-nee!" he greeted the pair, returning Hermione's kiss upon her cheek and clapping Ron heartily on the back in a great hug.

"Did you just come over from the press area?" Mrs. Weasley asked.

"Yes, I just made the announcement I mentioned to you before." The former Quidditch World Cup player was beaming with joy. "And not only that, I have just announced that I am engaged."

Hermione and Ron's eyes turned to the voluptuous strawberry blonde witch next to Viktor.

"May I introduce to you Lady Anne Battenberg, my fiancée," Viktor announced with pride. "Anne, these are old friends I met during the Tri-vizard Tournament at Hogvarts."

Ron and Hermione took turns congratulating the newly engaged couple.

"When did you propose?" Hermione asked.
"Last night. It's all been so sudden. The same night I saw you the Grand Royal Supper Club, we met for the first time," Viktor confessed. "But I am positively in love with this divine creature. So we agreed that when I made my announcement that I would be Puddlemere United's new coach starting next season, we would also announce our engagement."

"Really? That's fantastic, mate," Ron exclaimed and gave Viktor an even bigger hug.

While the wizards began chatting about Quidditch, Hermione talked with Lady Anne. "I had no idea Viktor was seeing anyone. I'm so thrilled for you both, I wish you both all the happiness in the world."

"Thank you, Her-my-nee," Anne said with her very polished British upper crust accent.

"Actually, it's Hermione. Viktor always had a little trouble pronouncing it," she clarified.

"Oh, I'm so sorry. I'm used to him referring to you with that particular pronunciation."

Hermione assured her it was not a problem. As they talked, Hermione made sure not to bring up her royal lineage, since it seemed the press was rather fixated on the fact that the Muggle royal family had finally produced a witch, so she was the closest thing to royalty in wizarding society, even though she was third or fourth cousin to Prince Phillip, removed once or twice possibly – Hermione couldn't remember. Hermione understood, along with Harry, the pressures of celebrity. Even that damning snapshot of Hermione giving Harry a hug just before the first Tri-wizard event haunted her for a long time, then there was the post N.E.W.T. drunken binge reported in the papers as well that added to her "reputation." Instead they talked about safe and innocuous matters, such as wedding details. It was a safe subject to discuss, considering that the couple had just announced their engagement.

Just as Hermione was beginning to relax, she spied Severus approaching her. As much as she would have enjoyed spending more time with Severus, his Delgado personality was certainly a bit off-putting, as per his plan.

Pulling his gold hat off and sweeping it with a grand gesture, bowing before Hermione, he said, "I am so sorry if I have offended you, a thousand pardons, Señora Weasley."

All Hermione could think was, 'Really, Severus? Right here, right now? In front of my husband, family, Viktor and his fiancée?' but she decided to play along. Severus, after all, was a long time spy with a fantastic head for strategy and playing a believable part. She had to trust him that there was a purpose to him coming over and publicly apologizing to her in front of everyone she knew.

Hoping she was going to say the right thing, she replied with a look of disdain, "Of course I was offended."

"My deepest apologies, Mrs. Weasley. I took your enthusiasm for Potions as something else," Severus said with plausible deep remorse. "Back in Spain, when a witch speaks to another wizard with such passion one could only assume such things. I am ignorant of British customs and mistook your academic excitement for something else." Bowing once more, this time even more deeply, "As I said, a thousand pardons. I am a fool."

Ron started looking over this puffed-up Spanish version of Gilderoy Lockhart with an accusatory eye. Before Ron could confront "Delgado," Hermione said begrudgingly, "I guess I could accept your apology, as it seems it was a cultural miscommunication."

Hermione held her nose in the air and gave him a slightly haughty look that made Severus proud that she had acted so well the part.

To Severus' delight, Molly seemed to have overheard his Spanish accent and had quietly moved as far away from him as possible, to the far side of the Weasley clan, making small excuses as she tried to navigate with her huge hoop skirt. Even Lady Anne, the witch standing next to Viktor Krum, that "Eduardo" had shagged in ways that even "Miss Anne’s" fiancée could never imagine, was looking at him with dislike.

It all worked beautifully. Hermione was made to look like the faithful wife, securing her reputation from the possible onslaught of accusations if her marriage did end soon; Molly seemed to be rather nervous around him, which might lead her to reconsider her weekly bookings with "Eduardo" and freedom from hearing her prattle on once a week. Then there was a certain amount of smug satisfaction that Lady Anne was no wiser that the same man whom she had begged to violate her any and every which way was the same man she was looking at like he was completely beneath her.

Severus bowed dramatically several times as he moved backwards, away from the Weasley clan and Hermione, even clumsily bumping into another wizard on purpose, in which he apologized even more as he removed himself from the scene.

"As if he thought he was of your caliber," Lady Anne sniffed haughtily to Hermione, the witch's lip set into a curl of disgust at the idea of that wizard pawing her new friend.
"Just how do you know that pompous arse anyway?" Ron asked.

"He was one of the wizards I owled regarding an apprenticeship over the years," Hermione explained, remembering the public backstory.

"Glad he didn't take you as his apprentice," Ron snorted, looking indignant.

"Well, I am grateful to him, since he was the one who helped arrange my apprenticeship with Albert Dobmeir," Hermione explained.

"Why did he do that?" asked Viktor, now interested in hearing how his friend and that Spanish berk had crossed paths.

"Probably thought it would let him get into her knickers," one of the twins interjected, to Ron's dismay.

"It's not like that," Hermione insisted.

Hermione recalled the story Severus had related earlier about being stuck and most of the rest of the relevant story, which seemed to placate Ron, Lady Anne, Viktor and the rest of the Weasley clan that had gathered around her for support and to hear the tale.

"And to think I asked that Dago twat about helping us with contacts in Spain to set up a new store," George said aloud.

"Well, from what I understand, he's going back to Spain soon, so he wouldn't be a problem, which I don't think he'll be anymore after tonight," Hermione said with some finality, hoping everyone else would go back to focusing on other topics of conversation.

Viktor turned to his fiancée and asked, "I hope you don't mind, but I'd like to ask my old friend for a spin on the dance floor. For old time sake."
"Not at all," Lady Anne said sweetly. "I remember you telling me about the Yule Ball. As long as Hermione doesn't mind me asking her husband for a dance as well?"

Hermione smiled. "As long as Ron is willing to venture on the floor, I don't see why not."

Ron suddenly found Lady Anne taking his arm as the pair followed Viktor and Hermione to the floor before beginning a Viennese wizarding waltz.

As Hermione was spun about the floor in Viktor's arms, Hermione said, "Anne seems like a lovely person."

"She is," Viktor replied. "Being a celebrity, she understands about the problems it can cause, so we initially bonded over that. But we've since found we have much in common. It just feels right, like it is the most natural thing in the world. I can truly see myself growing old with her. Is that strange?"

"Not at all, Viktor," Hermione replied, thinking about how naturally that feeling had developed between her and Severus and had bloomed into a love they could not admit to each other. It made her realize that though she had trouble imagining herself growing old with Ron, the idea of spending the rest of her life with Severus seemed natural and even something she could look forward to. Suddenly, Hermione was feeling very melancholy as the realization that Viktor had found the happiness that had eluded her and Ron, and that she was denied with Severus based on circumstances.

"I think I need to sit down," Hermione said, as a way to excuse herself so she could be alone with her thoughts. "I'm feeling a bit warm."

Hermione made her way to the ladies' loo and bolted the stall door in order to let herself cry. After she had let her emotions run their course, she went to the sink to make herself presentable once more. Even though she had a mask to hide the redness and puffiness around her eyes, she hoped no one would notice.

"Here," offered some random witch who was touching up her make-up in the mirror. Standing next to Hermione, she handed the teary witch a small tube of Lovely Lavender's Puffy Poof Eye Crème. "You look like you need this as badly as I did earlier."

"Thanks," Hermione said, dabbing some around her eyes before returning it to the kind anonymous
Hermione stared at her reflection in the mirror in which to brace herself for the rest of the evening, since she had no idea what else lay in store.

Severus was getting tired prancing about in these high heels. His feet ached, and he felt a great deal more empathy towards witches who ran around in heels all day and begged him for a foot massage when they came to visit him at his flat.

Speaking under his breath, his Spanish accent still in use, he said to his employer, "You did your announcement, the press did photos with you and Albert, I've completed all the arranged scenarios and even the twins will not bother to follow up with me later on. Can I at least leave?"

"Yes, Sebastian. I think your evening is complete if you choose to leave now," Lavender acquiesced.

"I do choose. I've made myself the fool and covered your arse in the process. My feet are killing me," he complained, his voice lilting with a sweet tone as if he was discussing some lovely holiday he had recently.

Making a dramatic bow for show, he said in a normal volume, "It was a pleasure to see you again, Miss Brown." He bent over and kissed her hand softly.

"And it was so good to see you, Sebastian. We must have tea one last time before you leave," she added for good measure, should anyone observe their exchange.

"But of course, Señorita."

Severus would have liked to see Hermione just one last time, if only from across the room, but he had already made his farewell and was heading towards the Floo. As he crossed the Atrium, Draco and he did exchange glances, in which Severus gave a discreet nod that Draco could make his exit any time he wanted if he wished.

Currently, Draco was dancing a Scottish ceilidh with Madam Agatha, his elderly Saturday client. who came to visit Draco as his younger self for a sympathetic ear and a bit of companionship. Draco did like Madam Agatha, as one would like their grandmother, and decided to give the old witch a thrill by offering to dance with her as an elderly gentleman, which he knew he would be hearing about tomorrow night when she would come to visit him at the Red Ginseng next. Young Malfoy did have a sweet streak about him that few understood, though Severus saw flashes of it periodically, glad that the Dark Lord had not burned out this aspect of the boy.

Ginny had helped bring some of that sweetness back to his disposition, making it bloom once more as a neglected rosebush blooms once tended to regularly. One could say that Hermione had been tending to Severus and made long forgotten parts of him flourish once more, as well.

He wondered if Hermione had brought out the hidden part of himself he had buried long ago in an attempt to keep his inner self and thoughts from the Dark Lord. Draco hadn’t spent nearly two decades hiding away part of his soul, like what Severus had done.

As he approached the Floo to take home, he spied Hermione seeking some solitude away from the crowds in a dark corner. She spotted him as well, and for a brief moment, they exchanged glances that were hidden from others by their masks. Hermione didn't need to have Severus remove his mask to understand the fleeting glance he gave her, nor did he for her. He knew she wanted to leave with him, but had an obligation to stay. He didn't have to be close to her to know that she had been crying earlier, he had come to know her well enough that he didn't even have to ask. Severus knew from her body language alone. And as much as he wished he could place his cloak around her protectively and take her home to his flat, they could not even truly acknowledge each other.

Hermione was the first to look away and Severus felt his heart ache at seeing her this way; alone in a crowd, much like he had felt for most of his life.

With a green flash of Floo powder, that was the last Hermione ever saw of Sebastian Delgado.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Viking Carrot graciously accepted my commission to do the scene where Hermione first meets “Delgado.”
You can view the fanart work here with the emoji: http://atdlheabetz.tumblr.com/post/141823175330/fan-art-by-vikingcarrot-hermione-meets-severus
And the same fan art without the emoji here: http://40.media.tumblr.com/b138fcf78c91b89d9c86a3de9d3ab147/tumblr_o4r7xg6HHk1ugsuuho1
Her Tumblr page is here: http://vikingcarrot.tumblr.com/
As for the inspiration behind Hermione's dress? Imagine this dress in a matte electric royal blue silk charmeuse, without the embroidery. This was Hermione's dress for the ball:

And a most wonderful round of thanks to my betas for this very large chapter: JuneW and Cytherea.
At the last Chudley Cannons’ game of the season, they played the Tutshill Tornadoes, which had become somewhat of a rival over the past few years. Hermione was thrilled that she would have all her Saturdays back, until the next season began in mid-February. If what the old Roma fortuneteller said would come to pass – that her marriage would not last the rest of the year – she wouldn’t even have to worry about that ever again.

It was a mostly cloudy day with a light breeze and a slight chill. It reminded her of the weather during a lot of school Quidditch games back at Hogwarts.

After the game, there would be the big post-season party, and she hoped Ron did not want to linger too long, though she knew he would probably stay until the bitter end. However, given his rather strict diet for his upcoming calendar shoot, she thought he might want to avoid the temptation of too much drink and rich fatty foods that were usually served up at these affairs. Even last night at the Ministry’s Halloween Masked Ball, shortly after Severus left, Ron had asked if Hermione wanted to go home as he wanted to go to bed early and get a good night's rest before the last game of the year. Hermione was more than happy to cut her night short as well. Ron had even limited himself to one alcoholic drink last night and tried to avoid the more butter-laden fare.

Up on his broom, she noticed he was flying particularly well that day. He exuded confidence and caught the Quaffle every time. His workouts seemed to give him better balance and strength on his broom, which was a good thing, considering this was his career after all.

After a few hours, the Snitch showed up and was promptly caught by the Cannons' Seeker, Wally Bristol. Glad to have the game finally over, Hermione meandered down to the club room for the party.

As the wives were waiting for their husbands to come out of the club's locker room, Hermione noticed Christie Kidd and Nicole Stewart glancing over towards her as they stood near the ice sculpture of a set of Quidditch goals, miniature versions of Quidditch players rendered in ice flying about the hoops. She was tempted to look at them and shout uncharacteristically, "What the fuck are you two cunts staring at," but held her tongue. It was out of character to be too confrontational, but it was exactly how she was feeling at the moment.

Finally, Christie sauntered over and said, "That was quite a dress you wore last night. It was the talk of the ball."

Hermione wanted to roll her eyes. She didn't know where this conversation was going to head, nor did she care. She wasn't even sure if Christie was being sincere or not, not that it mattered to her either way. She had bigger things to deal with in her life than a couple of witches who had made a point of taunting her over the past several years.

"I didn't notice," Hermione honestly replied. She wasn't sure if her dress was a hit or not, but Fleur and many other witches she trusted and knew seemed to like it. Most of all, she did not need or want this witch's approval.

"Well, it was," Christie insisted. Nicole came up next to Christie to join in the conversation, if you could call it that.

"So we saw you talking with Lady Anne Battenberg," Nicole piped up.

'Ah, here we go. Now I know why they are bothering to acknowledge me,' Hermione accurately surmised.

Tired at the prospect of bothering to engage these two, Hermione turned to face them, putting her drink down to stare Christie right in the face and blandly replied, "And?" She didn't even bother to hide the boredom plainly written on her face.

"We were just wondering--" Christie continued, but stopped when Hermione turned around and walked away from the pair.

"What? What the..." Christie said in confusion to Hermione's abrupt departure from the conversation without even some excuse as to why she walked away.

Hermione left the club room before the men had even emerged. She wanted to go sit in the stands and be away from the noise of a crowded room with cheerful faces and loud talking.

A cheer arose as the men came out, and eventually Ron went outside to find his wife.

"I don't feel like going back in," Hermione began, knowing he would ask her why she was outside in the cold instead of inside enjoying the free food and drink.

"Any particular reason?" he asked.

It surprised her that her husband had asked a simple question for an explanation instead of jumping on her back, accusing her of being unfriendly to the other wives – a claim she had countered with her own tales of how horribly they had behaved towards her over the years – or wheedling on about how he needed her to put up a good front and be a good sport, suffering them for just a bit, for his sake.

Hermione wanted to recount her encounter with Kidd and Stewart, but just wearily shook her head.

Instead of launching into a tirade about her attitude, he said, "I'll just explain that you're worn out from the ball last night and you have a headache."

Hermione looked at her husband and smiled weakly. "Thanks, Ron. I appreciate it."

It saddened Hermione to admit it, but ever since Ron admitted he’d married her after being pressured by Molly, and since they both had silently acknowledged their marriage was over, they had been behaving much more civilly towards each other than they had over the last few years. Though Ron had not suggested divorce or even a separation, she could sense it was coming, if she didn't suggest it first.

Before leaving her to rejoin the party, Ron said, "Bascom has changed some aspects of the calendar shoot. I was informed just last night, and you looked tired so I thought I'd wait until today to tell you."

Hermione held her breath wondering what bomb Ron was going to drop in her lap.

"Instead of shooting all around the United Kingdom, Bascom wants to go all over the world," Ron elaborated. "India, Tanzania, Japan, the Americas. He wants to make the calendar more internationally appealing by including more exotic locales to boost sales abroad. So that means I'll be gone for three weeks."

She nodded, indicating she understood.

"I can't take you with me, though that might have been nice for you, I suppose. A real holiday, a chance to relax since you deserve one so much – though I'll be busy with the photography. But that means I'll be gone three weeks, leaving Wednesday. Is that okay?"

It was sweet that Ron was asking if it was alright if he up and took off for three weeks. It wasn't like she had much of a choice either, since Ron had to go as part of his contract, but it seemed he was trying to be accommodating for once.

Placing her hand along the cheek of the man before her, she said with a bittersweet smile, "Go, Ron. Have fun, see the sights, and owl me a postcard. I'll be fine," she assured him.

"Thanks, 'Mione." He leaned over and gave her a gentle peck on the cheek before going back into the clubhouse once more.

Hermione Apparated home, feeling a little bit more hollow inside.

~~~~~~~*~

Arriving at work at seven in the morning, Hermione unlocked the lab and found the box of fluxweed still sitting in the corner where Mr. Dushka had kicked it in a fit during his shag fest with his wife and their mutual paramour the other night during the Ministry's masked ball.

It was a twenty-pound box, but it looked like at least a good pound of it had fallen out of the box and spilled onto the floor.
Hermione was tempted to pick through the fluxweed strewn on the floor, but all that Severus and Draco needed was to have fluxweed contaminated with someone's hair from the floor, be it Trevor's, the Dushkas', Kingsley's, or even a rat’s hair, and the whole thing would be for naught. Not even a Summoning Charm for impurities could assure with 100% certainty that the fluxweed wasn't contaminated.

After quickly putting aside enough uncontaminated fluxweed for two batches of potion and storing it in the pocket of her robes, Hermione began sweeping up the ruined fluxweed and discarding it in the trash. Just as she was dumping a dustpan full of the botanical into the dustbin, Madam Dushka burst into the lab, surprised to find Hermione already there and at work.

Knowing what had happened, but pretending she had no clue, Hermione said, "I was just about to call the Aurors. I think someone broke into the lab during the ball and tried to steal a highly regulated Potion ingredient."

Madam Dushka paled upon realizing what box her husband had busted open during their three-way tryst. "No need. Aurors have already taken care of the matter. Nothing was stolen. Just write up a report and make your best guess how much was ruined," she said nervously before leaving quickly.

This suited Hermione just fine. Kingsley had seen the lab, and – should it be recalled in a Pensieve memory – the box of fluxweed was already busted open with the plant material most probably clinging to the trousers and underpants of Mr. Dushka, since it was his feet and weight that broke it open.

Of all the ingredients, the fluxweed was the most scarce, yet easiest to steal from the lab.

'How ironic,' she mused.

For lunch, Hermione met Ginny at a Muggle restaurant on the outskirts of London. Hermione had heard from her mother about this place with fabulous curry she had tried recently. Mrs. Weasley suggested it as a place where she could discreetly pass off the fluxweed to Mrs. Potter with little possibility of a witch or wizard being around. Hermione even went to Gringotts and got some Muggle money with which to pay for the meal, insisting this once that she should treat Ginny instead of their usual split check.

Ginny's hands nearly shook as she took the ingredient and carefully placed it in a pocket of her Muggle-style jacket, zipping the inside pocket closed for good measure.

Over lunch, they avoided mentioning Draco and Severus, or any interaction they had with them during the masked ball in their alternate personas. Instead, Hermione updated Ginny on her encounter with Christie and Nicole after the game, and on Ron's upcoming three-week trip.

"That sounds like such a good idea," Ginny said in response to Ron's trip. "I really should book one for Harry and me. In fact, I think I'll insist on it. It's been far too long since Harry and I went on holiday."

This was Hermione's Pensieve memory to use should one be asked for regarding the sudden disappearance of one Ginny Potter. The red-haired witch didn't say as much, but it was understood.

It finally struck Hermione that not only would Severus be gone soon, but that her dear friend, Ginny, would be as well.
Hermione felt the pricking of tears behind her eyes, but held them back, knowing that it might ruin the memory and indicate foreknowledge of Ginny and the Death Eaters' flight.

They spent the rest of Hermione's lunch hour discussing innocuous topics. Hermione noted how the time flew and it was far too soon before she had to return to work.

~~~~~~~*~

In the afternoon, Miss Brown had taken Draco and Severus to the fourth floor office space of The Sirens' Secret, which was its own little secret since Lavender cast the Fidelius Charm and she was its Secret-Keeper. She had already Obliviated the workers downstairs as to the location above their heads. They were busy working away, preparing the shop for its grand opening on first Saturday in December, just in time for the Christmas shopping season.

Miss Brown had procured a new cauldron according to Severus' directions. It sat in the middle of the room, calling to him. Severus could scarcely believe it, but in approximately one month's time, he would be able to brew anything he wanted and cast any spell without the risk of a Dementor's Kiss. He could almost taste the freedom that was yet to come.

Just as they were about to leave, the fireplace over in the corner roared to life and Ginny stepped out of it, still wearing her short black leather Muggle jacket.

"I got it!" she crowed triumphantly as she unzipped her inner pocket and held aloft the package.

Ginny handed it over to Lavender as Severus rushed over to look over the last ingredient needed for their freedom.

In the light of the attic space, he examined the fluxweed without touching it, looking for its quality and any hint of contamination, given that a short wizard had been buggering a boy while standing atop of the fluxweed box. He knew Hermione would make sure she hadn't given them anything contaminated, but he wanted to make sure to put his own mind at rest, observing that Hermione had provided enough for two batches.

The quality and consistency was good. Satisfied, he let Draco examine the fluxweed before Lavender placed it on a table that included all the other ingredients.

Severus then began to give very specific and detailed instructions to Ginny on how to begin stewing the lacewing flies for twenty-one days. One could not exactly purchase pre-stewed lacewing flies, and even if one could, Severus would not trust the quality of the product. If anything, the twenty-one days required to stew them would give Ginny time to purchase Portkeys for the three of them and convince her husband that they should go on holiday, should anyone from the Portkey office mention anything about his upcoming trip to his face.

All Ginny needed was for some idiot to ask Harry, "So, looking forward to your big trip?" where everyone could hear and for Harry to reply, "What trip?" Then all their plans would go pear-shaped.

Severus, Draco, and Ginny had carefully planned for every contingency so far, and with a whole lot of preparation and a little luck, it would go off without a hitch.

Once the lacewing flies were slowly simmering, there would be little to do since the rest of the ingredients were added either the day before or the day of the potion's completion. Of course Severus would make a trip every day to check on the status of the stewing lacewing flies, or Draco, should he not be able to check himself.
As they all left by Floo, Ginny for home, and the rest back to Lovely Lavender's headquarters, Severus couldn't help but look over his shoulder one more time to see the cauldron sitting there with a small fire beneath it, his key to freedom simmering away.

~~~~~~~*~

When Hermione arrived at Severus' door for their ritual Monday night rendezvous, no words were spoken.

Hermione threw herself into Severus’ arms and they began kissing with urgency. As they moved towards the bed, they spun around each other, trying to make their way to the bed as they disrobed each other and themselves at the same time.

She downed a vial of Lubrication Potion as Severus was settling himself on the bed. Once on the bed, Severus sat with his back against the headboard and Hermione quickly mounted him, neither in need of foreplay as they were both ready.

What was first a dire need for each other, the need to consume each other in haste, lessened. Hermione rode Severus with purposefully languid movements as they gazed intently into each other’s eyes. Eyes locked onto each other, Hermione rose and fell, Severus' hands guiding her hips up and down, rocking his hips in time to her movements. The emotional intensity between them was visceral and burned brightly.

As Severus' hands moved up to palm her breasts, Hermione finally let her eyes close shut, overwhelmed by the feeling of love for Severus. Pulling his head to her chest, he responded by grasping her tightly to his own chest and thrust up from underneath her with fierce intent, lost in the moment of his own love for this witch he had fallen for.

Had he already declared his love to her openly, he would have exclaimed it once more in that moment.

Severus came knowing Hermione had not reached her own orgasm yet. There was no hesitation or shame in his seizing of the moment for his own needs. They still had one more test batch of the Arousal Potion and Male Enhancement Potion to test later that night.

Hermione remained still, reveling in the sensation of Severus clutching her so possessively, his length filling her, his scent of sweat and musk filling her nostrils, the softness of his hair tickling her breasts and arms, and the feel of their lightly sweating skin sticking to each other. When he was gone, she wanted to remember how she felt in his arms, needed so much by this one man.

Finally, she spoke. Hermione wanted to cut the tension, since if she didn't lighten the mood she would start to cry, and she didn't want to cry tonight.

"Who was that obnoxiously loud buffoon at the ball?" Hermione asked, expressing incredulity that Severus and Delgado were the same man. "There is no way that anyone would ever believe that the golden arse you behaved as and Severus Snape could ever be the same person!"

She began laughing at the thought of recalling this strange alternate personality Severus displayed.

"That was the whole point of the exercise," the former spy pointed out. "Should anyone even suggest that Sebastian Delgado going back to Spain shortly before I leave England are more than mere coincidence they will be laughed at. My natural personality is so ingrained into the minds of so many, no one would believe – I hope – that it could have ever been me in disguise."

"Well, I certainly wasn't prepared. You didn't tell me you'd have that silly accent and that ridiculous outfit. And your hair. It was short and gold," Hermione remarked, playing with several strands of Severus' hair which was once again long, black, and straight. "Why didn't you warn me?"

"Because it's more believable that you'd be shocked by my appearance as opposed to having to manufacture a false initial impression."

"Well, that performance you gave, had it been on the film screen, would have earned you a BAFTA award," Hermione said dryly.

Severus didn't know what BAFTA was, but he understood her implied remark regardless.

As suggested by Severus during the previous week, Hermione came over early enough for them to dine together before they began more experimentation. At the end of the night, they were both in agreement that the full pinch of Caprese mother of pearl had the right length of potency to complement the Male Enhancement Potion, both wearing off about the same time.

Sitting on the settee in front of the fire, after a nice relaxing post-shag shower, Hermione mentioned Ron's upcoming three-week trip.

"He even said he wanted to bring me along, but couldn't. Even so, if he could bring me along, I still would have refused." Hermione snuggled up closer to Severus and squeezed him lightly about the chest to let him know he was the reason why she would have stayed behind if invited. "Still, a holiday did sound awfully nice. It's been ages since I've even had a weekend away."

An idea suddenly formed in Hermione's mind.

"Are you free this weekend, Severus?"

Pulling his head back a little to gaze down at the top of her head firmly planted on his chest, he mused, "I could always cancel Sunday evening. I suppose I am available. What do you have in mind?"

"I have a credit card and a driver's license. I even know how to drive. I could rent a car and we can go away somewhere this weekend. Get away from this flat, for a change of pace. As much as this place has become a sanctuary for me, it would be nice to get away for once, someplace different."

"And we would need two days to drive because England is so vast?" he joked, giving a sarcastic arch of his brow.

"I was thinking we could find a little out of the way bed and breakfast," she suggested.

"Muggle accommodations?"

"As opposed to wizard accommodations where everyone knows your name and face, and many know mine as well. What better way to have a little anonymity than to go somewhere witches and wizards would never deign to go," she reasoned.

"You do recall that being out in public together is what tipped Lavender off about Ginny and Draco being together," he countered.

"And the soaps he ordered from Lavender especially for Ginny didn't help matters either. Besides, that was out in London where there are thousands of wizards walking about anywhere at any time."

"And what about us being seen together in a car in Muggle London, running the risk of being seen together while we're stopped at a zebra crossing, waiting for some little old lady to cross the road?" Severus pointed out.

"I'll get a wig, you wear a hat, and we'll both wear sunglasses," she offered.

Hermione sat up and regarded Severus. She could see him considering it and weighing the possibilities of a snag hindering his plans in the near future.

"Severus, you have cooked for me, listened to me, nursed my soul from the brink of despair, and have been my friend and lover. Let me treat you to this one thing before you leave. As my indulgence for you since you have been a sole source of solace for me since the day I stepped foot into this flat." Hermione placed her hand softly upon his chest above his heart.

Severus’ initial inclination and instinct was to say no, but he wondered if he would regret this one splurge at the insistence of his lover. Women had only ever come to him to demand their pleasure be served. Hermione was taking care of him this time, seeking to bring him some joy, as she had been doing more and more as their time together passed. Against his better judgment, he agreed.

As they sat together in front of the fire, they discussed possible destinations to drive to while considering the locales of many villages populated with multitudes of wizards and Quidditch pitches around the country. In the end, they agreed that if they drove out towards Norwich, there would be little chance of them coming across others in their community. Hermione assured Severus that they would easily find a bed and breakfast in the region with a room available at the last minute, since November was definitely not the high season.

~~~~~~~*~

Severus was actually feeling chipper. He had come up with an initial formulation for the body paint that Miss Brown whipped up earlier in the day, and both were pleased with the initial results. It was a simple mixture of cornflour, gelatin, sugar, various flavoring, a few common magical ingredients, and coloring agents; it even changed colors based on body temperature. Most of the ingredients were things even available to Muggles with no chance of seasonal fluctuations, since many of the flavoring agents were dried and powdered forms of different fruits, which were stocked year-round.

The Potions master found this mixture much easier to lick clean from his arm hair than the other mixtures he and Hermione had experimented with. He would have worked with Hermione on this, but she had work during the day and time was now limited. Still, he suggested to Lavender that Hermione at least get a small percentage in royalties since she did help with some of the research and did buy him the book that put him on the path towards an edible body paint that was palatable in pleasing colors.

He couldn't wait to try it out on Hermione Thursday night.

Miss Brown was thrilled that he had finally come up with something that met her expectations, since this one particular product seemed so difficult to create, given all the dead ends Severus had reached.

On top of progress on that front, Lavender agreed that she would owl Mrs. Paxton that his company for Sunday evening was unavailable due to a case of Troll Flu, which freed up Severus for a weekend with Hermione without any worry about getting back for any particular time. And the cherry on top was a last-minute missive from Molly Weasley saying she had something come up last-minute and would be unable to join "Eduardo" that evening for her usual tea and bitching.
Lavender asked Severus if he did anything while disguised as Delgado to Molly, and he truthfully answered in the negative. But he did not volunteer that he made his very public and clumsy apology to Hermione at the ball right under Molly's nose, which may have made her skittish about being in close proximity to another Spaniard for some time, despite the fact that "Eduardo" had been nothing but gracious and genteel in her company. She had proven, through her various conversations during her visits, to lump all foreigners together; her assumption of one badly behaving Spaniard could easily be projected upon all Spanish wizards.

Severus, Draco and Lavender still had to work out when exactly each of their nom de guerres would "resign" from their respective positions, as it would be highly suspicious if both quit the same day. But that was to be hammered out at their weekly Friday meeting, over tea and biscuits.

Having just checked on the condition of the stewing lacewing flies after dinner, he found that Ginny had been there earlier in the day and added the correct amount of water to avoid the lacewing flies boiling dry overnight, even if it was a very low and slow simmer.

Not wanting to go back to his empty flat, and eager to read some more books Ginny had found on their final destination that he kept back at his office, Severus decided to Floo back to work and read there for the evening.

The house-elf at the front desk was surprised to see Severus at the office so late. Severus had spent many a late night there at work researching, but he supposed it had been a while since he stayed there late.

As he reached the top floor where their offices were, he heard a shriek come from his employer's office, and it didn't sound like the sort of angry scream she had let loose when he caught her having a temper tantrum before. Nor did it sound like the argument he'd briefly eavesdropped on a few months ago when Padma Patil came to have yet another screaming match with Miss Brown regarding her sister, Parvati, who was a permanent resident at St. Mungo's. There was a crash of something hitting the floor, which made Severus certain Miss Brown was in danger this time, in addition to a more piteous wail.

Wand drawn, he burst through the door to find Miss Brown lying on her desk on her back, blouse undone, one breast pulled free of her brassiere, her skirt hitched up about her waist, one shoe on the verge of slipping from her stocking covered feet, and her legs spread wide open while Ron Weasley was plugging away between her legs, savagely grunting and thrusting with wild abandon as he grasped her ankles. A piece of broken crockery that had fallen off her desk and onto the floor indicated the crash he had heard.

"Weasley," Severus snarled with utter loathing.

Ron stopped pumping his hips into Lavender, aghast at seeing his old Potions master in the doorway while the Gryffindor was shagging his paramour.

"Severus!" Lavender squealed in shock before clutching her undone blouse to her chest for modesty, viewing him from her upside down vantage point.

"Snape!" Ron bit out. Suddenly realizing how Lavender addressed the greasy git, Ron then looked down at his lover, whom he was still inside of, and asked with growing confusion, "Severus?" wondering why she was on a first-name basis with the intruder to their farewell shag.

Still taking in the scene, Severus kept his wand pointed at Weasley and drawled bemusedly, "Miss Brown?" waiting to see how she would explain her way out of this one.
Looking up at her lover pleadingly that he shouldn't jump to conclusions, she said sweetly, "Ron."

Ron immediately withdrew from Lavender, his cock now instantly deflated upon this surprise, and attempted to pull his trousers up. Lavender quickly got up and yanked her skirt down with one hand while still trying to clasp her blouse shut with the other.

"Do you know this... this... Death Eater personally?" Ron bellowed with umbrage as he fumbled with his buttons and zipper. Granted, the intruder was once their professor, but at no time during their school years were they ever on a first-name basis with the Potions master.

"It's not what you think, Ron," she began, panic in her voice as she turned her back to Severus, slipping her breast back into her brassiere and buttoning up her blouse.

"Then why are you addressing him like he's some friend or something?" he asked, his voice rising in pitch and volume. He finally had his own wand out and was pointing it at Snape.

"And here I was thinking you were shagging Kingsley," Severus added with mock befuddlement to the conversation, just to add some grease to the fire for his amusement and to add greatly to Miss Brown's discomfort since everything suddenly made perfect sense to him.

Swiveling to face Lavender, his face turning a deep red from sudden rage, Ron screamed, "You're fucking Snape and Kingsley?!?"

Lavender placed herself between Severus and Ron and screamed back at him, "I've been fucking no one but you for the past three and half years!"

Now Severus could place when they first got together. He knew for certain when Hermione would talk of Ron taking off where he was staying for sure, but there was one other thing.

"And you, Weasley," Severus said, interrupting their screaming match, "I thought you were shagging Blaise Zabini."

Both Miss Brown and Ron stopped to fix Severus with a look of confusion mixed with disgust – the disgust mostly coming from Ron.

"What?!?" they shrieked in unison.

"I would never–" Ron began.

"What makes you think Ron is shagging Blaise?" Miss Brown asked, talking at the same time as her lover.

"– if that isn't the most disgusting thing I've ever heard," Ron continued.

"How in the world did you ever come to that conclusion?" Miss Brown went on.

Severus was upset at discovering that his employer was the one who was fucking his own paramour's husband. And with this new knowledge, it explained Miss Brown's short temper when it came to the topic of Hermione and Potions work he was doing with her, and why she was irrational in her behavior when the topic of Mrs. Weasley came up. It also explained why she offered to drop Hermione's gigolo fees, if anything to ensure she would continue to see Severus and possibly draw attention away from the fact that her husband was fucking around on her. Then there was the pained look Miss Brown gave Severus when he cornered her into offering Hermione an apprenticeship position with pay as a condition of lining up Albert Dobmeir as his replacement.
It was such an ironically cozy circle of dalliances between them. Severus was fucking Hermione; Hermione was fucking Ron; Ron was fucking Lavender; Lavender employed Severus, who used to fuck Miss Anne, who was now marrying Viktor Krum, Hermione's old boyfriend; Severus used to fuck Mrs. Nettleton, who is the wife of the man sponsoring Ron; and soon Hermione would work for her husband's mistress. It was almost comically incestuous and convoluted. Severus even wondered if Mrs. Nettleton had tried to fuck Ron yet.

Ron made the first aggressive move when he advanced towards Severus with his wand drawn and threatened, "How dare you. I'm going to do what Harry should have done to you."

Before Severus, who was quick as lightening in a duel, could react to Weasley, Lavender shouted, "STUPIFY!"

Ron fell to the ground, stunned with a look of shock on his face, still clutching his wand.

Turning to face Severus, Miss Brown commanded him with a pointed finger towards a door, "Go hide in the loo. I'll Obliviate Ron and tell him something from the shelf above fell on his head. We'll talk after I get him out the door, which he was going to do soon anyway."

Taking direction from his employer, Severus did as he was told without hesitation for once. From inside Lavender's toilet, he could hear through the door Miss Brown cast the spell and start feeding Ron a new set of memories.

"Poor thing, that nasty poltergeist knocked that jar on top of your head. Let me see that. Oh, it's not too bad, at least your handsome face was untouched. And it looks like it's almost time for you to leave if you're going to make your Portkey with Bascom to Morocco tonight. You had better get going. Here's your duffel bag, sweetie. I'll miss you. I can't wait to see you when you get back. Have fun and owl me a postcard."

Severus heard Miss Brown shuffle Weasley towards the door and shut it behind him. She then pulled the door open to see Severus glowering at her with a stare that could freeze brimstone.

He was well aware of her quick wand skills and kept his own wand drawn, should she choose to change some of Severus' memories as well.

The Potions master and gigolo was in no mood for tea. Something much stronger was called for, but he wanted to stay stone cold sober for this little talk.

"Sit. Talk," he ordered her, once she had a cup of tea in hand to calm her nerves.

Miss Brown divulged everything. There was no need for Veritaserum or spells to compel her to disclose the truth.

She began with how she and Weasley crossed paths during Hermione and Ron's first big fight, shortly after the Potters' wedding, just as Severus suspected. Miss Brown had found Ron drinking himself nearly blind, morose over the fact he was stuck in a marriage he'd never wanted from the start. Hermione and Ron's personalities clashed when forced to live in close quarters with one another. Miss Brown, naturally drawn to despondent souls, had played his confessor and they'd talked through the night. Eventually Ron had mostly sobered up when Lavender, moved by the moment, leaned forward and kissed him. He kissed back, followed by going back to her place to spend the next several days shagging their brains out before Ron felt guilty and compelled to return to his wife. He felt honor- and duty-bound to stay married to Hermione, despite the fact they had no children to bind the magic of their marriage yet.

Severus thought back and noted how Miss Brown had become a bit more secretive about her personal life at that point. He had already been working for her as a Potions master for seven months when this all transpired.

"And setting me up with Hermione," he prompted her.

Lavender then went on to confess that she knew at some point, Hermione would become vulnerable herself, and Lavender would most probably come across her in the same way she had found Severus, Ron and Ginny beforehand. And it seemed like the perfect fit that someone who worked in the Department of Standards & Regulations testing Potions ingredients could help provide Severus, and Draco and Ginny later on, a way out of England.

She did admit that as the relationship between Hermione and Severus developed, Lavender did begin to hope that perhaps Severus would take Hermione with him, given that Ron was going to leave her eventually. Lavender even confessed that Ron promised to ask for a divorce when he got back from his three-week trip, and the three weeks apart might help make Hermione realize that they were happier apart than staying married to one another.

If anything, Hermione leaving Ron to be with Severus would save a lot of hassle regarding the divorce if she decided to leave her husband first and the country as well. But with the apprenticeship that Severus had forced Lavender into agreeing to, that option was no longer on the table and they would have to deal with each other, face to face, and Hermione would be working for the witch her husband would leave her for.

"And just what in the world made you think Ron was shagging Zabini?" she asked, wondering where that idea came from.

"Because Hermione came over to my flat the night after her anniversary dinner, and we heard him howling that Zabini should 'take it like a dirty bitch.' Then as Hermione was about to leave, we spied him coming down the stairs from Zabini's flat and tucking his shirt in with a very self-satisfied smirk upon that freckled mug of his," Severus elaborated, gritting his teeth in anger.

Lavender buried her face in her hands before removing them once she could speak. "That was me. We were on the roof having a sunset picnic since the view is so nice from up there. Ron was shagging me, not Zabini." She was suddenly mortified that she and Ron had both forgotten to put up a Silencing Spell and that Severus, and evidently half of Diagon Alley, had overheard them.

Severus threw a hand over his face, pained by the suffering Hermione had had to endure over the past few months thinking her husband was buggering other wizards instead of having a plain old heterosexual affair with another witch. "Hermione is under the mistaken impression that boy plays both sides of the Quidditch pitch. She thinks he's been fucking around with Merlin knows how many other wizards."

"Then maybe it will be a relief that he was only shagging me instead of half of the wizards in London," Lavender sarcastically threw out. Now she knew why Hermione was so cool towards her at the ball, thinking she had set her husband up with a gigolo.

Neither said anything for a while as they digested the night's events and revelations.

"So wait," Lavender suddenly spoke up. "Where did you get the idea Kingsley and I were intimate?"
"Because I saw you hugging him as he left your office once, and then Kingsley told Draco and me that he was separated from his wife," Severus explained.

"No," Lavender replied, somewhat exasperated. "That was the time I heard the good news, that the healers at St. Mungo's might be able to reverse some of the damage Macnair did to Parvati's mind. Macnair agreed to a deal: to avoid getting a Dementor's Kiss and to live the rest of the time in Azkaban, they could use his memories and his wand to try to fix some of the damage he's done." Lavender began to cry. "It hasn't done much, but a month ago she said my name for the first time in years. Anyone's name. And the screaming has lessened somewhat. She'll never be able to leave St. Mungo's, but she seems to be in less mental pain than before."

Severus sat there recalling Miss Brown's Pensieve memory and restrained a shudder, his stomach twisting in sickened knots as the visions came flooding back.

"She'll never be the same witch, but she was my best friend. If it wasn't her, it would be me at St. Mungo's as a permanent resident. Because of Zabini, I was able to escape." She sighed, worn out from the long day. "As much as I would prefer Macnair dead, I'm willing to let him live if Parvati is in less pain, even if he was the one who caused her this anguish."

They sat in contemplative silence for a while longer.

"Monday evening, I will bring Hermione here and you will confess everything," Severus demanded. "You will tell her everything: your scheming, your plotting, your ongoing affair with her husband, your plan that she would leave with me and leave Weasley behind for you to snatch up for your convenience. All of it."

"Why not tomorrow night, since you'll be conducting more Potions experiments," she sarcastically carped, using her fingers to make air quotes indicating exactly what Hermione and Severus got up to during their sex potions trails.

Severus stood up from his chair and leapt across the office to put his face dangerously close to hers, glaring daggers at her, his lip set into a sneer. "You're the one who engineered Hermione to fall into my bed as part of your machinations. Don't get flippant with me, Miss Brown."

"So fine, bring her here tomorrow and let's clear the air then," Miss Brown said cavalierly, waving her hand above her desk with a flip as if swatting away some offending gnat.

"No," he snapped at her brusquely. "Hermione and I are planning a quiet weekend."

"Ah, that's why you asked me to lie to Mrs. Paxton about you and the Troll Flu this weekend," she bit back.

"Don't talk to me about lies and cover stories. You're the last to throw that back at me right now," he warned her. "Let Hermione have this one weekend of peace and quiet before you rip her world and her preconceived notions apart," he insisted. "Perhaps if she's angry enough, she just may fulfill your desires and decide to quickly follow after me, and she won't be around to remind you of what you've accomplished with all your scheming."

"My scheming is leading to your and Draco's freedom, which you have wanted far longer than you have loved Hermione," she reminded him, "or did you forget that?"

He did not refute Miss Brown’s correct assessment regarding his feelings for Hermione.

Severus hated the fact that Hermione, whom he had come to care for greatly, even love, had become a useful pawn in this web of deception, infidelity, crisis of conscience, and loss of faith.
Granted, she had admitted that she had never been happier than when she was with him, even with everything else in her world living far below her hopes and expectations, but that she was used in this complex game made his heart ache in empathy. Severus had been used by The Dark Lord and Dumbledore towards end goals in both wars, and he had been a pawn as long as Hermione had been alive. He knew what it was like to feel used and moved about for the amusement and by the whims of others with cold calculation. It still didn't make the feeling of being used and betrayed any less painful.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: A big round of thanks to my betas, JuneW and Hope for cleaning up my writing and making it bearable. I may write this fic, but they make it readable.

Title and disclaimer a parody inspired by the show tune, “The Trolley Song,” featured in the 1944 movie Meet Me In St. Louis, which includes the lyrics, “Clang, clang, clang went the trolley.” Written by Hugh Martin and Ralph Blane.

I hope this chapter answered some of the questions and suspicions you readers have had for a while. Of course Lavender was fucking Ron, but what fun would it have been if it was straightforward and no red herrings to distract you? And what was the first big hint that Lavender’s lover was Ron? Chapter ten, “Dead Men Walking.”

Hermione's letter that she wants to see the gigolo with the incredibly sexy voice arrives at Lavender's office:

The landing of a small owl on her desk distracted Lavender's attention.

Reaching out for the small bird, she smiled. "Well, I wasn't expecting you today. Got something for me?"

Pigwidgeon held out his little leg with the note still attached.

Lavender recognized Ron's owl, thinking it was a missive from him instead.

And then there is the part from chapter 15, “Knowledge Is Power”:

"So it was a guess? The luck of the draw that the situation presented itself?" Severus asked.

"Partially. However, I have my own plans afoot. I have certain goals where Hermione is concerned. It was as time went by that I thought of how to use her to help you, Draco, and Ginny."

...

"I assure you, Mr. Snape, what plans I have concerning Hermione will not stop you three from fleeing. As a matter of fact, your flight from the country just may serve my ultimate purpose," Lavender said with a smug smile. "If that answer still does not meet with your satisfaction, then I will eventually tell you what you want to know. Until then, I prefer to keep my own counsel on the matter."
There you go. For those of you still clinging to the notion Ron and Lavender were having an affair, despite my Zabini red herring, ten points to the House of your choice.
Chapter Summary

Chapter Sixty-Four: "Come Away With Me" Hermione and Severus get away for a quiet weekend together. Unfortunately, the perfect weekend doesn't end so perfectly.

Chapter Notes

WARNING: NC-17 fan art embedded into story chapter

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter Sixty-Four
"Come Away With Me"

Disclaimer: (Sung to the song “When I'm Sixty-four”)
When I began this really long fic
Many years ago
Will you still be reading my disclaimers
Rowling owns this, that you all know
If I’d been writing ‘til quarter to three
Would you still get bored?
Will you still read me, will you still review me
Disclaimer sixty-four...

============

Having Ron gone was actually quite a relief to Hermione. She found she could come home after work at a reasonable time and not fear dealing with him, either with a fight or his sexual demands. The fighting had been less as of late, but they still battled.

Even facing a quiet and desolate flat was preferable to having him there.

Maybe this three-week business trip was just the thing Hermione needed to test if she was truly mentally ready to deal with the possibility of divorce. If at the end of three weeks she dreaded his return more than welcomed it, that was surely a sign that it was time to ask for one. And even if he didn't grant it, based on her recent readings, she could still obtain one without his permission. She just had to make sure she didn't get pregnant – at least not with Ron's child.
Her book on wizarding marriage and divorce covered the socially delicate issue of impregnation by someone other than the husband for the first child, in which the marriage was still not magically binding until husband and wife had produced a child between them, thus making the marriage inescapable. It was a matter of shared blood through children that cemented the magical bond that was the key issue to remember.

Knowing now that Molly had pressured Ron into marrying Hermione, and connived Harry into proposing to Ginny, she better understood Molly's insistence to bind their failing marriages with children, ensuring they everyone would be miserably stuck with each other, unhappy ever after. There was the possibility of living apart and separate lives, but the marriage was a magical contract set literally until death do they part.

As much as she was certain she wasn't pregnant, she was still looking forward to her cycle starting, though she hoped it would not come until after her weekend with Severus. Hermione had packed a few vials of A Little Witch's Best Friend to help with her cramps, just in case.

After picking up the car, she affixed the short blond wig to her head, looking into the rear view mirror in order to be sure she’d tucked away all the telltale signs of her brunette locks. It was a cheap wig, but it would do the job to partially conceal her identity. With sticking charms in place to hold the wig during the drive, given that Hermione had rented a convertible so that they could both enjoy the wind on their faces as if they were flying on brooms, imparting a sense of freedom. For the finishing touches, to not arouse too much suspicion with her disguise, she also tied a scarf around her head, as she had seen done by other women to keep the windblown look to a minimum when driving a convertible; once they were on the open road, she would remove the wig but keep the scarf. A large pair of sunglasses finished her disguise.

Checking the weather reports, she was pleased that there would be no chance of rain until late Sunday. It would be easier to drive around if she didn't have to stop and pull up the car’s top, since the model she got did not have an automatic top.

They had arranged for Hermione to pick Severus up five blocks from Diagon Alley in front of a hotel, so he would blend in among everyone else getting in and out of cars. She had given Severus a black wool fedora she’d picked up for him and his own pair of sunglasses Thursday night. He had a large black Muggle-style overcoat he still had from his spy days when he needed to go about with Muggles and blend in. instead of sticking out in his usual cloak. It was from the early 1980s, and it still fit him. It was vintage, which was the cool look among Muggles, making him appear to be stylish instead of off and dated.

As she pulled up, Severus threw his own bag into the back seat and hopped in. With a squeal of the tires, Hermione took off, driving as if she was maneuvering the Knight Bus.
Severus didn't seem to mind her style of driving, unlike her mothers’ reaction to her driving techniques. Once out on the M11, Hermione drove around the same speed as the other drivers. She didn't want to draw unwanted attention to herself on the open road, despite how aggressive her driving style was in the city.

Pulling off his hat and glasses on the open road, Severus let the wind fly through his hair, reveling in the feeling he had missed so much. With the Death Eater Decree, he was not barred from flying a broom, but taking a broom with you through a Floo was damned inconvenient and awkward. Portkeys were a pain to procure last minute for a quick afternoon of flying, not to mention he would be heavily scrutinized considering his status as a former Death Eater and the decree, and his Apparition license was revoked. Taking the train via Muggle methods to some place where he could fly unobserved by Muggles was nigh impossible. Short of being on a broom himself, this – driving in an open convertible at high speed – was the closest thing he’d felt to flying in ages, especially since he sold his broom for money after the Death Eater Decree, before he began working for Miss Brown. He would have to thank Hermione for this wonderful suggestion of a drive, since it momentarily made him forget his troubles.

After a couple hours, they reached Norwich. Neither was ready to stop for lunch quite yet, so they decided to let the road take them wherever they fancied, taking turns on roundabouts in directions towards the coast. Once they reached Great Yarmouth, they turned north and drove up the small back roads, passing through Caister-On-Sea, Hemsby, and finally stopping for lunch at a pub in Horsey. Hermione promised him this weekend was her treat and she would take care of everything, since she was the one with Muggle money and a credit card. This made it a sort of early present, since he would be gone by the time Christmas and his birthday rolled around.

Severus still felt a bit odd letting a witch pay for a meal, since it was the custom of the more old-fashioned mindset of the wizarding world that paying was a wizard's duty. Still, this was the Muggle world, and they were a bit more liberated when it came to such customs.

Hermione had a hot cup of tea and Severus had a pint of ale with their lunch. The menu offered classic pub fare, plus a few international dishes and, to Severus' dismay, burgers as well; Severus enjoyed the steak pie, and Hermione tucked into some bangers and mash. It was quite surreal to dine together with others around, since they were used to eating alone in Severus' flat with no one to observe, much less notice them.

During their lunch, the waitress asked if they were there to observe the seals, as the females had come back recently to birth their pups. After some directions, they drove over near where the rookery was to observe a bit of wildlife. They hadn't planned it, and they took the opportunity as it presented itself.
They stood next to each other, hand in hand, watching one pregnant seal lope along the sand, while another nursed a pup. It was still early in the season and only a couple pups had been born so far. Had Hermione's and Severus' relationship been like a normal one, the scene before them might have been a salvo to begin talking about their feelings about children or a life together, but theirs was anything but a normal relationship.

Once their curiosity was satisfied and they had their fill of watching wildlife and walking about the chilly windblown coast, they headed back to the car to continue their meandering drive about the Norfolk Broads, continuing northwards.

It was already dark and Hermione had not arranged accommodations ahead of time, given they had no real plan of where they wanted to go or end up. As they drove into Weybourne, they stopped at yet another pub for dinner.

After ordering, Hermione asked the waitress, who just also happened to be the pub owner, if there were any places locally they could stay the night.

"Hang on a second, dearie. Let me check," she said as she walked back around the bar picked up the phone and made a few calls.

"I found a spot round the corner, ensuite and all for £65 a night. Will you just be needing one night?" the pub owner asked, her hand over the receiver of the phone as she called out to them across the small pub.

"Yes, one night will be perfect," Hermione assured her.

"Right, and your name?"

"Granger."

Severus gave Hermione a look, and she said quietly so as not to be overheard by others, "It's the name on my credit card and license."

"Right, Mr. and Mrs. Granger," the pub owner said into the phone before hanging up and coming back over with a pint for Severus and a half pint for Hermione.
Neither of them commented on the pub owner’s assumption that they were married. They figured it was because Hermione was wearing her wedding ring and the pub owner assumed Severus was her husband, given how chummy they were together as a couple.

As they supped in the dimly lit pub, they talked. No one was sitting next to them at the moment, and they used quiet voices to avoid being overheard. They discussed some of the work they had been doing recently, and the ways they could improve the edible body paint. There was some discussion over the latest Potions journal Hermione had read, but Severus had not gotten around to reading it yet. They talked about some of the new regulations that would be going into effect with the new year regarding the importation of certain goods. Severus told Hermione a little more about his time at Hogwarts as a student and some of the changes between when he attended and when she was a student, giving her a little recent historical perspective.

Hermione was glad Severus did not ask about her maiden name on her credit card and license. No one knew of the “escape box” she kept secret from Harry and even her husband.

Once dinner was over, they drove to the bed and breakfast a few hundred yards down a side road from the A149, the “Coast Road” they’d used to drive into town.

Checking in, the bed and breakfast owner took down information from Hermione's driver’s license and charged her card. Her parents would get a statement at their address, and Hermione would owl them money to cover the bill. She rarely used her credit card, and she was sure she would get questions the next time she saw them about her weekend get-away and if the place was nice.

The owner invited "the Grangers" to the parlor for sherry and board games, which they politely declined.

The owner sighed and merely said, "Ah, newlyweds."

Hermione and Severus didn't think they acted overly affectionate with each other in public, and they were not, but something about the way they leaned towards each other or gazed at each other must have led the pub and bed and breakfast owners to assume otherwise.

Severus surveyed their accommodations for the night, pulling out his wand and doing a sweep of the room. Years of being a spy meant old habits died hard.
Bags on the floor, curtains drawn and door locked, Severus stood behind Hermione and rubbed her arms tenderly. Away from their habitual environs, it felt like they had all the time in the world. Hermione had no husband waiting for her at home, Severus had no obligations that weekend either.

"Thank you," he whispered into her hair.

"So I guess this wasn't such a terrible idea then," she tried to lightly joke, but it came out as more of a whisper, the air tense with the realization they were out for a romantic weekend together like normal lovers.

"Almost as perfect as you," Severus murmured sweetly into her hair.

"I'm a fairly flawed individual, as you are well aware, so that doesn't say much," she admitted demurely.

"You're perfect for me," he confessed before bending his head down and gently kissing the side of her neck.

Hermione craned her neck to let Severus trail his mouth slowly along her skin. Her heart felt like it would burst with love for Severus for his admission.

Severus' hands slid over her sweater before grabbing the hem of it to pull over her head.

As her sweater was carelessly discarded on the floor, Hermione turned around and began to kiss Severus back, pulling at his clothes, leisurely undoing his belt, buttons, and various clasps.

Once disrobed, Hermione crawled onto the bed only to discover that the bed squeaked, and comically so. Bouncing up and down on the bed a few times, to hear the springs and brass bed frame protest against the movement of the mattress, Hermione burst into fits of giggles.

Seeing her sitting there nude and laughing, Severus said, "So you think that's funny?"

Hermione began laughing even more, caught in the jovial mood.
Jumping onto the bed, Severus said with a waggle of his brows, "Then I'll give you something to really laugh about." He pushed her backwards on the bed and began to ravish her, their legs trying to find a comfortable position in which to intertwine.

All the movement made the bed lightly rock and squeak even more, which made Hermione burst once more into gales of laughter, reminded of the corny notion of bedsprings creaking because of couples having sex.

Reaching down, Severus found Hermione's ticklish spots and began to poke and prod at those areas. This made her squeal and begin to scamper away from him, which was hard considering Severus had her pinned down to the bed with his body and weight.

"You think that's funny?" he asked as he continued to tickle her. "Do you?"

Hermione was out of breath, begging for him to stop, the bed continuing with its voluminous protests.

Relenting, Severus stopped. As he lay atop of Hermione, both panting, he thought he'd never seen anything lovelier. Hermione's hair spread all around her, her cheeks flush, eyes bright and smiling up at him, laughter ebbing from her lips.

Hermione couldn't hold back any longer. Seeing him gaze at her with such adoration, she said, "I love you, Severus."

As much as she had feared saying those words, given their arrangement, she felt it was time to say them, not wanting him to leave England without hearing them from her lips.

He had longed to hear them, but never expected she would ever say it. His mouth came crashing down upon hers, and suddenly a swift fever of want overtook them both.

Hermione moved her legs and Severus quickly settled himself between them.

Her hands grabbed at his shoulders, as his hand skated down between her legs to check to see if she was wet and ready for him since she hadn't taken the lubrication potion yet. She was more than Braced on one elbow above her, he positioned himself above her.

Lovingly, he stroked the hair out of Hermione's face and breathlessly confessed, his own eyes shining bright with a rare vulnerability, "And I love you," before sinking himself into her.

Hermione's back arched and she screamed in pleasure. With her hands reaching for the brass bed rails above her head, she moved her legs up higher until they were over his shoulders.

She began chanting his name over and over again as he began to drive into her. The bed began squeaking in a loud rhythmic pattern like a metronome, each protest of the springs signaling each time he sunk himself into her deeply.

As his thrusts became more powerful, the headboard began making contact with the wall behind it, thumping in time to Severus' movements.
Overwhelmed with the love she felt for Severus, their confessions, and his passionate lovemaking, Hermione eventually began to orgasm, screaming even more hoarsely. Severus began ramming himself even harder into her, the bed making a loud thump-thump-thump noise though neither cared at that point if the rest of the bed and breakfast heard. Everyone assumed they were newlyweds anyway, and making love is what newlyweds did.

Just as her orgasm waned he came, collapsing on top of her, his body damp with a light sweat. He moved his hips languidly, each successive thrust with less force in time with each spurt of his seed into her, each movement accentuated with a gentle sigh of release until he was spent.

Hermione brought down her legs to rest over the backs of his thighs.

Tenderly, she stroked his hair and back as he continued to pant breathlessly onto her shoulder and the pillow beneath her head.

"And I love you too," she said softly.

Severus, still inside of her, though his erection began to wane, lifted his head up and looked at her in awe. Despite his past and his own lengthy list of faults and imperfections, she still loved him. He’d strongly suspected she loved him, and maybe even deep down in his heart he already knew. But to hear her say it to him, they had crossed a line that both had silently agreed to not cross, back at the beginning of their relationship. And once he heard her confession, there was little point in him not admitting he felt the same way for her as well.

Laying himself down next to Hermione, he watched as she curled up next to him, her head on his chest, a finger playing with his patch of black chest hair.

Eventually Hermione needed to excuse herself to take care of bodily needs, to avoid a bladder infection. As she returned to the bedroom, Severus was there reclining on his side, his head propped up on one hand, the blanket down far enough that his chest and stomach were exposed.

She stopped and admired him on the bed. Severus may not have been considered attractive by most women, but he was certainly very handsome to Hermione, looking like some raven-haired sex god awaiting her in their bed. At that moment, she could not think of a more handsome man.

Before crawling back into bed with Severus, Hermione pulled her wand out of the pile of clothes on the floor, handing Severus his in the process from his own discarded clothes, and cast a charm to silence the bed from making any further noise. She then cast a Cushioning Charm between the headboard and wall so there would be no more banging against the wall.
As they sat up in bed next to each other, their fingers intertwined, the pads of Severus’ fingers tracing the tops of her knuckles, he said, "When I leave, come away with me."

He had thought about this over the course of the day, having never felt so at peace in so long, all because of Hermione and her love. He’d sworn to Draco over the past several months, since she had entered his life, that Hermione was not coming along when they escaped, even when Draco pointed out the changes in Severus that he noticed. Today had changed his heart and plans, though recent revelations about Lavender and Hermione's husband were also a factor.

"What?" Hermione said, stunned at his offer, sitting up straighter in bed and turning to face Severus.

"Really. What is keeping you here in England and not joining me abroad?" he asked.

"Well, for starters, I'm still married."

"And so is Ginny, yet the day we leave she intends to end her marriage with the return of her wedding ring and the incantation, as indicated in your book. Even your husband, he only married you due to pressure from his mother. You've said for months how you felt the death of your relationship was approaching, and that you were never in love with him either. Even the old Roma woman predicted the end of your marriage by the end of the year," he recounted.

Flustered, Hermione countered, "But what of my Potions apprenticeship?"

"I'll train you. We've already proven to work well together," the Potions master insisted, as he tried to snuggle up next to her as a show of affection, but was hindered by her scooting away from him to look him in the face and continue on with their argument.

"I can't!" she insisted.

"Why?" he demanded to know, his brow beginning to furrow, a feeling of rejection creeping into his heart.

"Because that old Roma woman said if I had the chance to leave with you, I should go with you, but that if I don't go with you, I would see you again," she blurted out. She had hoped never to have to tell him that part of her fortune.
"You never mentioned she said that," Severus said, feeling affronted she had neglected to disclose that to him. That last bit of the fortune also indicated that his escape was certain, and would have saved him weeks of worrying about the fluxweed.

"Because I don't want to let the Fates determine my destiny in some predetermined course of events that I have no control over. You have said yourself how you have felt like you have had little control over your own life. I would think you would understand the desire to fight against being forced into a situation that was not of your choosing," she said hotly, feeling angry at the world that it had robbed her of many choices in life so far.

"Besides," she continued peremptorily, "I want to stay behind and fight to clear your and Draco's names."

"This again?" he sighed with exasperation, knowing it was going to be yet another battle based on her tone.

"Yes, this again," she insisted, irritated he was dismissing her desire to continue pursuing this yet again. "There must be something, somewhere, somehow your name can be cleared. You and Draco have not exactly had any support from anyone in this matter. Everyone is already willing to assume the worst, and that is what they have already done."

Severus turned to face away from Hermione, feeling his own anger at the world bubble up in his chest.

Continuing on, Hermione added with certainty, "I know you're innocent, Severus, but I also know you had nothing to do with Dumbledore's death or the attack on Hogwarts, and that you were true to the Order and Dumbledore to the end, as was Draco. You have not had access to resources nor the ability to look objectively into possible sources for your exoneration."

"And short of Dumbledore's will magically popping up years later, just how do you plan to do that?" Severus snorted derisively, feeling bitter and no longer blissful. "Even if you ask his portrait at Hogwarts, he doesn't know. The Ministry asked his portrait and it was clueless as to Dumbledore's will's whereabouts. The portrait is only an echo of the great wizard that once was." Severus was suddenly missing his old mentor very much. Even the mental apparitions of Albus in his flat had not been much as of late.

"I don't know, Severus, which is why I want to apply myself towards establishing your innocence," she insisted.

Innocence was such the perfect word for the moment. Earlier in the week, shortly after Ginny began stewing the lacewing flies, Severus did as promised and confessed to Draco the history about his wife, Gabrielle, and his part in her death; she’d been pregnant when she was killed after trying to convince Death Eater wives about the fallacies of pure-blood propaganda. Draco had insisted that Severus tell Hermione, but Severus refused. Though given that he had just asked her to come with him, it might be necessary if she were to truly comprehend the man she would be running away with. The secret would eventually come out in time, which might cause her to leave him, horrified by his past actions. Draco insisted in honesty. Perhaps telling her would only harden her resolve to stay and reconsider seeking to clear his name, given his crimes.

This was not the time for disclosure. This was supposed to be a perfect weekend away with Hermione before she had her own litany of horrific truths to face regarding her husband and Miss Brown on Monday. Severus wanted to let her have some peace and quiet, and here they were already fighting.

"I'm not exactly innocent," he merely said.

"I know," she acknowledged. "And if you ever choose to tell me about why you became a Death Eater or not, it still doesn't change the fact that I love the man you are right now, here with me. I know you have made choices you regret, but that doesn't change the fact that I have fallen for the man you have become."

Severus wasn't sure Hermione could ever forgive him for what he had done regarding his wife; He hadn't even forgiven himself after all these years. He wasn't even sure he could even confess the whole tale to her before he left. It was hard enough to disclose everything to Draco. Draco had been under threat by his own father and the cold stare of The Dark Lord in order to accept the Dark Mark against his will and carry out his own set of atrocities in order to stay alive, even when playing spy for Dumbledore. Draco understood, but Severus doubted Hermione could, with her soul still filled with light and all that was good in the world. Severus didn't think Hermione could comprehend why he did what he did, despite all his reasons and excuses.

Sliding up behind Severus, who sat facing away from her, his legs hanging over the edge of the bed to hide his face, she said, "I want you to go, Severus. I want you to be free, and you deserve to be. But how can you be truly free if you must flee and never be able to come back of your own free will, if you chose to do so without facing a Dementor's Kiss if everything that you're accused of is not proven wrong? That's not free, that is running away. You deserve to be free, Severus. I want you to be truly free to go anywhere in the world of your own free will, without persecution. But no matter what, I will stay here and fight for you, until you are."
He couldn't love her any more at that moment if he tried. Despite her love for him, she did not ask him to stay, but to go. She believed in him. She was willing to fight for him when no one else still living would. Dumbledore fought for him, but had also used him for his own ends in the war. Hermione was doing this out of love for him, with no expectation of any benefit other than knowing he would one day be free, even potentially facing ridicule from those she would argue against. She was the only one who would ever selflessly fight for him, and it humbled him.

Hermione's hand stroked his back, an act of comfort as she sensed the conflict roiling within him. Severus leaned into her touch, eventually reclining against her, with her hands softly stroking his hair with tender affection. He had his cheek pressed to her breast while listening to the beating of her heart.

"I love you, Severus. And I always will for the rest of my life," she assured him.

Severus knew she meant every word she said, the sounds of her beating heart echoing her words, but he wondered if he did confess his sins to her, whether Hermione would still mean those words.

\~\~\~\~\~\~\~\~

Sunday morning they stayed in bed making love, after deciding their limited time together was more precious than some mediocre Continental breakfast, tinned fruit, or overcooked rubbery eggs. Check-out was at eleven, and they wanted to make the most of their mini-holiday. Breakfast could have been fabulous as well, but they still would not have cared.

As they drove back towards London, taking the scenic route to delay their return, they held hands across the center console. Eventually it began to drizzle – earlier in the day than originally forecast – and Severus helped Hermione pull the convertible’s top up, avoiding using their wands to prevent drawing attention to themselves.

Passing through Cambridge, she told Severus that if it was sunny, she might have pulled off so they could go punting on the Cam, having a romantic afternoon repast of wine, fruit, cheese, and crackers, even if it was a bit chilly outside. But it was raining and the chance to be recognized was too great, to their regret.

Both were comfortable with the silence as they drove homeward, but Hermione, out of curiosity, turned the radio on to know what Muggle pop and rock sounded like as of late. Severus found a classical station they both agreed was much more pleasant, considering the present restful state of their minds.

After a leisurely lunch at some restaurant in Buntingford, they got caught in Sunday afternoon traffic as they approached London. The lovers did not prolong their goodbye or give each other a kiss as she dropped him off back in front of the hotel where she had picked him up in front of the day before. There was no need to risk them kissing in London where witches and wizards abounded, even though Hermione had put her wig back on and Severus was sporting his new hat.

Once the rental car was returned, she went back home to her empty flat to find Maxwell, her parents’ owl, waiting for her with a note tied to its leg.

-------

Hermione,

Your Aunt Christine is in the hospital and we think she might lose the baby. We are at the local hospital. Come when you can.

Love,

Mum
-------

Looking over the note, she did not see a date.

"Did you come here today?" she asked the bird.

The owl turned to face away from Hermione as a sign that he had been waiting longer.

"Yesterday?"

The owl hooted as a sign of affirmation.

"Shit."

After giving Maxwell a big bowl of owl treats, since Ron had taken Pig with him for his trip, she changed quickly and dropped off her bag before grabbing a handful of Floo powder and heading over to her parents’ house.

Her father was the only one at home when she arrived. Rushing into his embrace, she quickly apologized, "I was away this weekend and I just got home to see Maxwell waiting for me. How is she?"

To Hermione's dismay, she learned that her Aunt Christine had already lost her baby. She had been almost five months along and was still at the hospital recovering.

Father and daughter got in the car and drove over to the hospital.

During the short drive over it struck Hermione that this was probably the blood relative the old Roma woman was referring to in her fortune. Hermione wondered though, since the child had not been carried to term, if that truly was the blood relative to die as foretold. There was still the slight possibility of another blood relative dying over the next four months.

Weighing the possibility of her father dying or her Aunt Christine losing her child, Hermione realized that she would gladly deal with her aunt's loss rather than face the death of her father. She knew it was a bit selfish and cold to be thankful for such a thing, but she was not willing to part with her father, even though that unborn child had its whole life ahead and would never live to see it.

"I wish I could have done something," Hermione said, feeling helpless. "Unfortunately, even if I had come back in time, there are still laws regarding the use of magic on Muggles, even close blood relations, that would have prevented me from helping."

Hermione regretted lying to her mother months ago that she could use a Potion to help a Muggle who was an immediate family member. In the aftermath of Marge's death, she had spoken in haste and grief. Using magic to heal a Muggle, even if they were immediate family resulted in a lengthy trip to Azkaban and possibly having one's wand snapped. It was the sort of offense that might cause some to seek sanctuary if they felt they were unjustly persecuted for trying to save the ones they loved most dearly.

"I know," Wallace Granger said, patting her hand in sympathy. His daughter had explained to him and Wendy how she could not use magic on Muggles, after initially saying she could in a moment when she’d felt helpless despite all the magic coursing through her veins.
Even though her parents understood, it didn't lessen the feeling of helplessness that consumed her. She felt like she was a bystander in many of the events of her life as of late, all things beyond her control. As much as she understood she could not have changed anything, even if she could have a hand in steering events, there was not much that would have changed anyway in the end.

When Hermione showed up at Severus' flat, she looked like she had been up most of the night, which she confirmed that she had. Upon recounting the last twenty-four hours or so since she’d dropped him off, Severus could only give her comfort with a supportive hug and some kind words.

If he could have delayed the news Hermione was to receive tonight by a day in order to lessened the quickness of such blows, he would have. As it was, Miss Brown would be waiting for both of them that evening.

Severus served up a diner that would be light on her stomach, as such news that she was about to be given would certainly upset her digestion.

After dinner, Hermione begged off doing any Potions work, to which Severus informed her he was taking her to meet Lavender. She assumed it was to discuss wages, start dates and such, but something in Severus' subdued bearing gave her pause.

Arriving by Floo, they took the lift up to the top floor where the offices were. It did not escape Hermione's attention that there were only house-elves she saw, even though she knew that Lavender, Severus, and Malfoy were the only humans at the company.

Rapping upon the office door, Severus and Hermione were bid to enter.

Severus noticed that not only did Miss Brown have a fresh tea service ready, along with post-supper nibbles and desserts, but that there was a decanter of strong spirits and three glasses ready and waiting. Not in all his years of working for Miss Brown and all the bombs, bits of bad news and unreasonable requests had Miss Brown ever offered him distilled liquor in order to soften the blow – except when getting him to sign the contract to work for her.

Lavender rose from behind her desk. She gestured with her hand for Hermione to take a seat and offered tea, which Hermione accepted.

Once again in Lavender's presence, Hermione felt under-dressed and dowdy. And given the rather trying previous night, she was looking much worse for wear, sporting dark circles and bags under her eyes.

"Thank you for coming tonight, Hermione," Miss Brown began, as Severus continued to stand, refusing to take a seat. He stood there glowering at Miss Brown from behind Hermione, his arms folded across his chest.

Hermione was still upset at this witch for setting her husband up with Zabini, but held her tongue. She knew she had to be professional and put such matters behind her. It wasn't Lavender's fault that Ron was bisexual and had needs to be filled, though she resented the fact that this witch across the desk from her had provided them.

Lavender continued on. "Since you are Albert Dobmeir's new apprentice, there are some things we need to clear up before you begin. First is pay."

Hermione nodded in agreement, since even she wasn't sure how much she was going to make, given that private apprenticeships don't pay and most businesses don't pay apprentices anything.

"I was thinking along the lines of 3,500 Galleons a year," Lavender began, but stopped when Severus cleared his throat.

"Sorry, I meant 4,000 Galleons a year, which is more than what you're currently earning," she corrected herself.

Hermione noticed what Severus did. She was glad she had him to help negotiate her salary, though there was little to negotiate since it was more than she was already earning at the Ministry, which was only 3,000 Galleons per annum.

Already she knew that it would still not be as much as her and Ron's salaries combined when he was still working at the pub and being paid a paltry sum as second-string Keeper. However, given that she would be leaving Ron, there would be fewer expenses, mostly the food bill and broom care, so she could scrape by on that.

"And then there is the matter of royalties," Lavender continued.

Hermione almost forgot about that and thought that those would certainly help make up the difference of her and Ron's old combined income. She set her tea cup down on the edge of Lavender's desk in front of her.

Lavender continued with her discussion, "I was informed that because of your ingenuity that the price of Ashwinder eggs has dropped in price, solely due to your new testing methods. I'm using my connections at the Ministry to incorporate your methods into the new testing procedure policy."

A small bit of pride rippled through Hermione, knowing she was the sole cause of that.

"And," the blonde witch went on, "there are the brewers kettles you suggested and the other potions you have helped Severus develop, including a part in the edible body paint." Lavender glanced up at Severus and gave him a pointed glare. She added a little dig by volunteering, "Another project that seemed to have completely escaped his otherwise immense talent to solve until you helped him."

As much as Hermione wanted to turn around and gauge Severus' face, she kept her face forward, giving her future employer all her attention.

After Lavender cleared her throat, she said, "And then there is the matter regarding a misunderstanding."

Hermione wasn't sure what was misunderstood, but continued to remain quiet and would learn soon enough.

"It has come to my attention," Lavender began, but stopped to take a sip of tea, "that you believe that I set your husband, Ron, up with Blaise Zabini."

Hermione sudden felt her cheeks go hot, and her ears begin to burn. A white hot flush spread throughout her chest. Hermione was sure there was no misunderstanding about seeing her husband descend the stairs from Zabini's apartment.

"Ron was not shagging Zabini upstairs in his apartment."

Now Hermione was thoroughly confused, for there was only one flat above Severus' and that belonged to the particular wizard.
"Ron was on the roof with me," Lavender admitted.

A wave of numbness swept through Hermione. What was once a building rage inside of her fell away into an overload of all her senses. Her body felt numb, it seemed the room had darkened, and her hearing had suddenly diminished as her mind raced to process what Lavender just said.

"As a matter of fact, Ron and I have been having an affair since May of 2000," Lavender added.

Searching her mind, which was now overloaded by so many emotions, all of them passionately intense, Hermione flipped through the calendar of her mind and recalled that it was about a month after Harry and Ginny's wedding, which was when she and Ron had that big fight and he was gone for about a week. Now she knew where Ron was when he left her and he said he was at a "friend's" house. Hermione finally understood why Lavender dropped her fees for Hermione to see Severus, as the blonde was fucking Hermione’s own husband and probably felt guilty about it.

Had Hermione's arms and legs not felt as if they were made of lead, she would have leapt up and soundly backhanded Lavender across that now pale and drawn face. The blonde’s lips were set in a grim line, staring at Hermione with an equal mixture of shame and defiance. Hermione could have hexed her, but kept her hand still.

Suddenly, Hermione remembered Severus was standing behind her, and she understood why his demeanor was so grim that night. The light dinner, and the soft sympathetic look on his face when he greeted her even before she’d told him about her aunt.

Turning around to face him, she asked accusingly, "You knew?"

"I only just discovered this myself Wednesday night."

"Why didn't you tell me Thursday?" Hermione asked with exasperation.

"Because I did not want the knowledge that Miss Brown has been committing adultery with your husband for so long to mar what should have been and was a perfect weekend. I thought that since it had been going on for so long, ninety-six more hours would make no difference at all," he explained.
"Adultery?" Lavender challenged, her voice rising into a shriek. "You two have been going at it since summer and you hypocritically accuse me of adultery?"

"Because you bribed me with money to first see her, but with an ultimate goal of hoping that she would leave her husband for me so that you could snatch up Weasley for your own without a fight," he hissed at his boss. "Is that not the ultimate goal you had in mind when you arranged for us to meet each other at first, Miss Brown?"

"I hoped that Hermione could help you procure ingredients for the Polyjuice Potion so you could escape, or did you forget that?" she countered hotly.

Hermione sat between the two watching them as one would a tennis match, a volley of angry words thrown at the other. She chose to remain silent for the time being to see what other things Lavender had been scheming.

"And yet you don't deny the fact that an alternative purpose was to draw Hermione away from her own husband so you could have him for yourself."

"Well, she was pretty fucking miserable with Ron when I met her, and she seems to be pretty happy seeing you, so I don't see the harm in that!" Lavender screamed. "Or do you not care about Hermione's happiness and you're just more concerned over the fact that I manipulated you two to be together – more than the fact you're both in love with each other, and happier for it."

"I never said anything about love," Severus snarled back at her, finally challenging her correct observations about their emotional attachment for one another.

"Puh-leese! It's plain as fucking day you two are deeply in love with one another. And considering how Hermione was never in love with Ron, nor Ron with her – and was pushed into marriage by his mother – what difference does it make?" she threw back at him mockingly.

Hermione could not stand it any longer, talking about her as if she wasn't there, and stood up. "Because Ron was my husband!" Mrs. Weasley shouted.

"'Was' or 'is'? Interesting choice of words, Hermione," the blonde witch pointed out smugly.

Even Hermione had missed that Freudian slip, having already decided that she would ask Ron for a divorce when he returned. She didn't need to wait the three weeks, she already knew. Stunned at the realization of her own words, Hermione sunk back into her seat.

Lavender admitted, "Yes, I put you two together in hopes that Hermione could provide the Polyjuice ingredients. Yes, I was hoping you two would fall in love and Hermione would leave with Severus, leaving Ron for me alone. Yes, I admit to it all, but it still doesn't deny the fact that Ron and I are deeply in love. You should know the only reason he hasn't asked Hermione for a divorce long ago is the fear of facing his mother, who bullied him into proposing to Hermione in the first place. There is also his worry that Hermione would not be able to take care of herself on her salary alone, should he leave her. But given that she'll have an apprenticeship – with pay, I might add – plus royalties, and free boarding at your flat, Severus, once you leave, if she chooses, then she will not perish in penury as Ron feared.

"He felt some noble Gryffindor obligation to look after you, even though he's not in love with you, Hermione. And as much as I have begged and pleaded with him to leave you over the years, I also admire him for standing by you and not abandoning you like I wish he had."

Had Hermione had a heavier dinner, she surely would have thrown it up by now. She was glad for Severus' thoughtfulness on that small detail, which was the only thing she could think of despite everything she had just heard.

Hermione felt like fine china held too tightly; the cracks were beginning to show and she would fracture into a thousand pieces at any moment.

"And if you choose now to rescind your apprenticeship and reject my offer of employment, I completely understand," Lavender said in closing.

'If you have the opportunity to leave with your lover, do so. But if you do not leave with him, you will see him again in the future,' the fortuneteller's words rang in Hermione's mind. It seemed so clear now, she finally understood.

If Hermione stayed behind, she would see Severus again, meaning that it was most likely she would clear his name, as once he reached sanctuary he would be untouchable, as long as he remained within the boundaries of said sanctuary. Severus was careful and she knew he would not be caught and brought back to England otherwise, unless he came back willingly as a free man. If anything, this firmed her resolve not to go with Severus, but stay behind. This meant that she would have to accept her apprenticeship with Dobmeir, which meant working under the witch who stole her husband. But what was there to steal if Ron's heart was never hers to begin with?
Lavender had admitted Ron would have left her years ago if it wasn't for his mother and worrying about Hermione making ends meet. And now she had already decided to ask for a divorce herself. There was nothing left to decide, she had already made her choice.

"I'm staying and keeping my apprenticeship. I'll agree to work for you, and you can have Ron. You're right. 'Was' shows that I had already made up my mind to ask Ron for a divorce. And you can have him on the condition that you come with Ron and me when we break the news to Molly about the divorce – and that Ron will be marrying you instead," Hermione dictated. "You two do want to get married. Am I right?"

"Yes," Lavender replied, looking now even paler, the color having drained from her cheeks once more.

Hermione looked to Severus, then back to Lavender. There was something else, she could tell from the exchange of glances. Since everything was being put down on the table, she didn't want to be left in the dark about anything else.

"What?" the brunette witch asked with little patience, as she noticed Severus give Lavender a knowing smirk.

"Shall I tell her or you?" Severus asked, an amused lilt in his voice.

Lavender waved her hands, indicating Severus could have the distinct pleasure.

"Your mother-in-law, Molly Weasley," he began, "has been visiting me for the past ten weeks for tea and a sympathetic ear."

Horrified, Hermione's face fell in disgust. "You don't mean..."

"Merlin, NO!" Severus assured her. "There is no amount of money in the world for me to even..." he trailed off with his body shuddering slightly at the repulsive thought.

"Thank GOD!" Hermione sighed with relief before turning back to Lavender. "But how could you, knowing that...?" She let out an unladylike snort to try and convey the very messy circumstances of everyone involved.
"I didn't want to!" Lavender protested, throwing her hands up. "She cornered me. She had heard from some friends about how I had wizards in my employ who lend a kind ear, and she forced me into it. I couldn't say no since she implied she knew people who would make my life difficult if I didn't comply."

Hermione sat back, feeling as her mind would explode with everything that had been revealed. Her tea sat there cold and forsaken. Even the slice of Victoria sponge that had caught Hermione's eye when she first entered the room was forgotten.

Severus was also contemplating if this was the right time to inform Hermione that Calpurnia Fudge was responsible for her inability to land an apprenticeship until now, but decided against telling her. There wasn't ever a good time before to tell her about Fudge's wife since he and Miss Brown were able to eventually subvert her plans. The opportunities he did have to tell her, Severus didn't want to upset Hermione since there were seemingly far more pressing matters that she was currently facing, including the death of her marriage, and now the events of the past twenty-four hours. As she was about to begin her apprenticeship, he saw little need to tell her. There was little chance for Calpurnia Fudge to learn of Hermione's apprenticeship.

Then there was the possibility of telling Hermione. His lover had a hidden revenge streak that, should she seek to take on Calpurnia Fudge, even Hermione's cleverness would be tested to its limit should she square off against the older witch. Given how soon he would be leaving, he would not be around to provide her counsel on how to out-master a formidable chess player and someone who epitomized the House of Slytherin where cunning was concerned. No, it was best, for Hermione's sake, not to tell her about Calpurnia.

"You know," Hermione began in a surprisingly calm and amused voice, "When we announce to Molly that Ron and I are getting a divorce and that you two will be getting married instead, you can always use this to blackmail her should she object. Having Arthur discover his wife had been paying to cry on another wizard's shoulder for sympathy and support would not sit well with him."

Hermione liked Arthur, but if Molly had engaged in manipulation of her, Ron, Harry, Ginny, Draco, Lavender and who know who else, then Hermione was willing to use that knowledge to their advantage.

"Once you marry Ron, she'll be harping on you about providing her with grandchildren," Hermione warned her in addition.

"I'm already well aware of that, having heard from Ron for a long time."
Hermione realized she couldn't stop Ron from seeing anyone once she divorced him, but for the fact that she had been suffering a terrible marriage with him all this time under some false pretenses – and a shoddy facade that had already fallen away when he was in love with someone else – didn't stop it from smarting. Her pride was deeply wounded.

Hermione Floo’ed directly home from the Lovely Lavender headquarters, energized solely from the knowledge she would finally get to pen her resignation letter to Madam Dushka, which was the only bright spot in her entire evening. She would begin work as Dobmier's new apprentice starting two weeks from that day.

The Ministry had a policy of one-week’s notice, but Hermione decided to be kind for the sake of Trevor Spawn. She would surely help in finding her replacement during the last remaining weeks of her tenure there in the Department of Standards & Regulations. She didn't want Trevor to catch the brunt of Madam Dushka's wrath since he had made a valiant effort to come up to speed on testing Potion ingredients and had done a good job of it.

Just as she began to undress for bed, she noted her menstrual cycle had already begun. This would surely clear the way for a quick and easy divorce with Ron.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: mywitch, on LiveJournal, has created a lovely and sensual piece of fan art for me of Hermione and Severus making the bed go thump-thump-thump at the bed & breakfast. mywitch did the same drawing with three different color tones: warm (embedded in the chapter above), cool and gray. You can view the cool and gray versions here: http://atdlhea-betz.tumblr.com/post/142574530115/braced-on-one-elbow-above-her-he-positioned Much thanks and applause to my wonderful betas, Hope and JuneW, for the talents in making my drivel more readable.

You can learn more about the seal rookeries of Horsey here: http://friendsofhorseyseals.co.uk/

Title for this chapter inspired by Norah Jones' song, “Come Away With Me.”

Disclaimer inspired by the chapter number mixed with lyrics by The Beatles song, “When I'm Sixty-Four,” written by Paul McCartney, John Lennon. Copyright: Sony/ATV Tunes LLC.

Oh, and the bedsprings squeaking scene? I wrote this scene about two months before the show “Outlander” had a similar scene with Claire and Frank in Inverness at the bed & breakfast, so I did not borrow it from them, though it seems to be a favorite type of scene to write.
Even with everything that had happened to Hermione over the past few days, the singular thrill of handing Madam Dushka her resignation letter almost made it worth it all. Almost. She had fantasized about this moment since the first week she’d started working for the mincing harpy, shortly after the war. The harpy’s stunned look of disbelief, the growing realization that her most competent worker, who had been vastly underpaid for so long, was heading for greener pastures just made it all that much sweeter.

The icing on the cake was that morning when Hermione had walked into her office, Madam Dushka opened the conversation with the announcement that Hermione’s review was complete and that she had done a very good job of training Trevor, so far; however, there was no extra money in the Ministry’s budget with which to increase her salary this time... again, or so Madam Dushka claimed. This was an ongoing problem since it had been three years since the Ministry had given her a raise. Hermione relished setting that resignation letter down in front of her, in response to another year without a pay raise.

Hermione understood why Molly and Arthur scraped by, if the Ministry continued to keep denying raises to some, even if inflation – which existed even in the wizarding world – kept inching up prices higher and higher every year. She never discussed salaries with Arthur, but she couldn’t imagine him demanding a pay increase if denied one; instead, he would be saying like Molly that they would just make do the best they could.
Madam Dushka asked Hermione what she was going to do now that she was leaving, and Hermione was tempted to tell her it was none of her business. Since the wizarding world was a small one and Madam Dushka was going to find out anyway, Hermione informed her boss that she was leaving for a paid Potions apprenticeship.

Hermione's boss burst into whoops of mocking laughter, exclaiming that no one ever got paid for an apprenticeship, or if it was a "paid" apprenticeship, it was probably only five Knuts a year for some obscure tax reasons.

The new Potions apprentice merely let Madam Dushka think that she still had the upper hand. The older witch made some comment about Hermione being a sweet but extremely naive witch who still had a great many things to learn about the world.

Hermione had more than enough experience in this world between her years growing up at Hogwarts and the constant peril she had encountered, the war, and now the Machiavellian manipulations by the hands of her future employer. There was no mention that Lavender Brown would be paying her during her apprenticeship.

If anything, Hermione wanted to stick around and have a say in hand-picking her replacement. There was no point in leaving on bad terms, unable to give her insight into the selection of a new candidate; if the new candidate was incompetent The Lovely Lavender Company would then be plagued with shipments of bad ingredients. Madam Dushka did give Hermione permission to have final say in who the final candidate would be, avoiding the fact that Madam Dushka had picked Trevor Spawn, who initially was a completely incompetent walking disaster until he straightened up and flew his broom right.

Once in the lab, she had the unpleasant job of informing Trevor she would be leaving. It wasn't that she would miss Trevor that much, as he had turned into an all right work mate, but that she was taking his old apprenticeship.

Trevor seemed to handle the news well enough, understanding that it was his burning down the lab that was a major cause of him losing his apprenticeship, but he was a good sport and congratulated her. He was sincere in his congratulations that between the two of them, she was the one who truly deserved it.

Hermione made it a point to keep an eye on Trevor over the next few years. Should he continue to improve and apply himself, she would recommend him for an apprenticeship under Albert Dobmeir or another master once her apprenticeship was finished, but her recommendation would be based on merit, not a greased palm.
The rumor mill was in full swing that day. Even though Hermione had only told two people at eight that morning, by eleven, it seemed that half the Department of S&R had swung by to ask Hermione about her new apprenticeship, who it was with, and if it was true she was getting paid. They asked how much, to which Hermione just said that was confidential.

Lavender Brown had made the announcement to the press at the Ministry's Halloween masked ball that Albert Dobmeir was her new Potions master, but so far, few people put two and two together.

By noon, Harry had come around, having heard tongues wag. He congratulated Hermione, having been in the loop about her apprenticeship pending on some contingencies. Her old friend even offered to take her out to lunch in celebration, which she gladly accepted. She hadn't seen Harry much, as of late, and was hoping to catch up with him.

As Harry and Hermione lunched at this Muggle Chinese restaurant Harry had recently found, she filled him in on the details, knowing he would not recount them to others, except Ginny. Hermione mentioned to Harry that Albert Dobmeir was Lavender Brown's new Potions master and her pay would be from her, not her Potions master. She asked Harry to not mention anything to Ron, and that she wanted to be the one to tell him the "good news." No doubt, she could imagine the look on his face when she would tell him – upon Ron’s return from his three weeks abroad – that her new boss was his mistress, padding their vault. With a divorce, though, it would soon be "her" vault, after monies were segregated.

Curious to think that Ron's reason for not divorcing Hermione was due to money, but that his mistress and second wife-to-be would be paying her. Life had proven to be stranger than fiction as of late.

Reflecting on how monies in their Gringotts vault would be split made Hermione think about the long list of things she had to do in preparation, including getting her own owl. She could just ask her parents for Maxwell, but her parents did like having the creature around, since voles and other critters around house and garden were dramatically reduced, easing up the chore of trying to discover what ate the strawberries and tomatoes.

As the meal ended, the bill was presented with two fortune cookies. They both laughed at the prospect of random proverbs inserted into a cookie that could have any prophetic qualities to it whatsoever. Harry even told her about this Muggle tradition he’d learned about: that anything you read, you're supposed to interpret it sexually, adding on the tag line mentally of "between the sheets."

It surprised Hermione that Harry had made a sexual joke.
Harry cracked his open first and read his aloud. "You will step on the soil of many countries." Laughing he said, "Actually, this one is pretty spot on. I finally asked for time off of work to take Ginny on holiday. We'll be leaving in a little over three weeks."

Hermione had been so busy, she hadn't had time to catch up with Ginny if she succeeded in getting Harry to agree. Now things were truly set into motion.

"Pity it'll be right before the twins open that new store with their partner. I'll be glad not to be going though since it sounded a bit racy. They never said who their partner was," Harry noted.

"Lavender."

"So wait? Fred and George are in business with Lavender? Which means, you'll be working for the twins too?" Harry asked.

"No, not exactly. I'll be helping Dobmeir develop potions for Lovely Lavender; some of those will be sold at The Sirens' Secrets," she clarified.

Harry leaned across the table and whispered, trying not to sound scandalized, "You mean you're going to develop sex potions? Does Ron know?"

There were a lot of things Ron didn't know, the least of which that Hermione personally tested out every variable of the Male Enhancement Potion with their old Potions professor, every variation of the Arousal Potion she had a hand in developing herself, and combinations of the two together. She had fucked Severus' brains out for hours to the point where she had trouble walking many times afterwards.

Waving her hand dismissively, she said, "I'm sure it's nothing like what you think. There is probably a way of testing these things without it getting too friendly."

Hermione wanted to change the subject, but realized she still had her own fortune cookie to open and read.

As the golden-hued treat broke apart, she picked out the small rectangular paper amid the pieces. Holding it aloft, she cleared her voice before reading aloud, "Be prepared to accept a wondrous opportunity in the days ahead." Her face fell as she read it.
To mask her true emotions, she screwed her face up in confusion and said lightly, "Well, can't apply that between the sheets since Ron is gone for two more weeks, and I already have my Potions apprenticeship." She shrugged, which seemed to make Harry laugh at how his was spot on, but interpret that hers missed by a mile where timing was concerned.

She wondered if the fortune was belated, since Severus had presented her with such an opportunity, three days prior, to leave with him.

~~~~~~~*~

To Severus' delight, Molly Weasley canceled all further meetings with "Eduardo," stating in her owl that recent family obligations prevented her from having much free time. Hermione informed him that Percy's wife, Penelope, had just given birth a few days ago and there was probably a great deal of truth behind her excuse, as Molly was busy helping over at their house.

Now began the task of wrapping up the last of the loose ends. First was an owl to Katherine Bigelow who had relocated to Spain. If anything, Sebastian Delgado going back to his homeland would only make correspondence that much easier between the two. Since where Severus was going was not going to be the easiest place to owl from, he stated that Sebastian had some family matters that would take up all his time back home in south-central Spain, and would need to refer all future consultation to his fellow Potions master, Albert Dobmeir. He thanked her for her correspondences and wished her future success with her business.

The only thing left to wrap up the fabricated enigma of Sebastian Delgado would be the correspondence between Hermione and Delgado regarding the brewer's kettles and other potions in which she was to receive royalties.

Even the edible body paint was complete and was already going into production for The Sirens' Secrets grand opening in a little over three weeks.

Miss Brown had already begun buying many copies of Severus’ books, since the Aurors had inspected the "Research Library", which was Severus' office, and had seen all the shelves crammed with books. Of course Lavender would not replicate all of Severus' library he housed in his office, but many of the more obvious books she was procuring as of that moment. He gave her a list of the ones that a person of her skill level and expertise would be reading and use for her work, that were in his own library.

Lavender kept the newly bought books off-site at The Sirens' Secrets office space that was also the location where the Polyjuice Potion was currently brewing. To fill the space of what she did not replicate from Severus’ library, she had house-elves go to every wizard estate sale and buy up dusty looking books to make it look as if the library was exactly the same as before, if one didn't
The night before Ginny, Draco and Severus were to leave, all the books she was storing would be swapped out with Severus' and the house-elves in Miss Brown's employ would bring back Severus' library to his flat to be packed away in a bag with an Extension Charm. Other than his books, a few cooking implements, some clothes, and his armoire, there would be little else to take. He wasn't even sure if he would be wearing many of the same clothes as he wore here in England. His new home would be much warmer, and from the books he had read, all written by Muggles, it seemed that wool was not worn much at all, but linen, cotton and cool silks were the preferred fabrics of choice when packing.

Most of the furniture was courtesy of Miss Brown, as the place came furnished, since he had bartered away everything else he'd owned, except his books and armoire with flame mahogany and bird's eye maple, after the Death Eater Decree. There were bed linens, but who knows what he would be sleeping in or what size the new bed would be.

Of course nothing back at his flat would be packed before the morning of his departure. A surprise Auror visit would tip them off that something was amiss should his flat look barer than usual. So far he had only had two surprise Auror visits, and that was plenty. He and Draco still had to provide a tip to lead Aurors on a wild goose chase the day he would leave in order to delay them in their pursuit. At their parole meeting a few weeks prior, he and Draco had said that they had overheard Jugson in a pub talking about obtaining a spare wand in Knockturn Alley in order to cast spells that would not turn up when his own wand would have a Prior Incantato cast to provide proof he had not been using any prohibited spells. Of course this turned out to be true, as Miss Brown had used a few of her house-elves to find some nice incriminating evidence that might get other Death Eaters in trouble. Kingsley thanked Severus and Draco for their tip the following week. This set the stage that another "anonymous tip" would send Aurors to the far corners of the United Kingdom, allowing them to get away.

The only thing he wish he had to pack that was not in his possession was a photograph of Hermione. He would ask Ginny if she had one of Hermione that she could give him and to pack it with her own belongings.

~~~~~~~~~

Trevor Spawn held his head in his hands, despair overwhelming him. He emitted a low keening whimper from the back of his throat, sounding like a beaten and cowering animal.
"Please don't tell me I was half as bad as that last candidate?" he begged, his voice creaking and despondent.

"That witch had seven spelling errors on her C.V. You had only four." Hermione felt a small bit of satisfaction that Trevor was getting a dose of what she had gone through when trying to find a replacement for her old co-worker, Marge Mallowton. "Perhaps this next candidate will not be so bad since he seems to have earned an E in Herbology and an A in Potions for his N.E.W.T.s and had no spelling errors on his C.V."

"Please, Merlin," Trevor sighed dramatically.

Both were rather worn out by the candidates who had immediately applied for the position of Potions Ingredient Tester for the Department of Standards & Regulations. The ad listing an opening for the job was in the Wednesday Daily Prophet and Madam Dushka was swamped with owls by that afternoon. It appeared that many of the people who recently graduated from Hogwarts had spent their summer having fun; now that summer was over, they were looking for gainful employment.

There were a few candidates who were older, but most of them were witches whose children were grown up and moved away, and the mothers were now ready to earn a bit of pin money. However, many of those witches were sorely out of practice when it came to identifying some basic Potion ingredients, or their cauldron simmering skills had diminished since leaving Hogwarts many years ago. During one test, one middle-aged witch cast a flame far too hot and evaporated the ingredient instantly, turning it into a billowing cloud of blue smoke. It took at least twenty minutes for the lab to air out before Hermione and Trevor could stand to go back in. The applicant apologized and made the excuse that she was used to cooking in large batches for her family, and needed a flame that big and hot to get the cauldron going with soup or stew.

Finally, one particular witch came in. Her C.V. was spelled correctly, but she was a much older witch, which probably meant poor cauldron skills. Hermione and Trevor hoped that when giving her an aptitude test on some basic skills, with a little bit of luck she would not blow them all up.

She was nearly eighty years old with gray-streaked brown hair pulled back into a practical ponytail. She walked into the room with a smile and shook Hermione and Trevor's hands with a firm shake before she seated herself.

"So, Madam Fastrada Johnson. I will just get to the point quickly. What makes you think you are qualified to test Potion ingredients here at the Ministry's Department of S&R?" Hermione didn't want to be rude, but it seemed like this witch was wasting their time. It had been decades since she had any experience behind the cauldron, based on her resume.
"Well, unfortunately, most of my experience I was not able to put on my C.V., since I was not what can be called 'gainfully employed.' My husband was a Potions master for many decades and I helped him in his lab, working as his assistant," Madam Johnson explained. "Since I was married and no salary was drawn, I can't exactly put that on my application. I helped tend his personal garden, did most of the shopping for ingredients for him at the apothecary, went with him on Potion collecting trips, and helped him personally test many of his experiments."

Hermione and Trevor looked at each other, and their eyes lit up with hope.

"And why are you looking for work now, Madam Johnson?" Hermione asked.

"Because my husband passed away a few months ago. And though I have enough experience to qualify me as a Potions mistress, my husband and I never got around to formally getting me accredited. I can't exactly go around claiming to be a Potions mistress if I am not certified." Madam Johnson held her chin up high, proud and defiant that these two before her might dismiss her years of work at her husband's side, simply because of a piece of paper he never got around to signing and filing with the Ministry, which would have gotten her a review before the accreditation board. "I am a hard worker, I am careful and precise, and I keep my area clean."

Hermione placed a small box on the table and asked Madam Johnson to identify its contents.

"This is aconite," the elder witch said scoffingly, as if it was too easy.

Trevor and Hermione gave a sigh of relief before Hermione grabbed one more box and handed it to her.

"Could you please identify this as well?"

Madam Johnson opened the box and pulled out a very large white feather.

"Looks like Roc..." she began, but held it aloft, examining the rachis, inner vanes, and curve of the feature. "Is this a joke? This is an eagle quill that has been enlarged."

Hermione nearly leapt from her seat in joy. She had kept the fake Roc feather as evidence of the Damocles Brothers trying to pass off faulty and fake ingredients.

"One more test, Madam Johnson. Could you please give us an example of your cauldron skills?"

The three all went over to Hermione's testing bench.

"What would you like me to test?"

Hermione wanted to see just how good she was and pulled out a rare ingredient for Madam Johnson to show her level of skill.

"Ah, the seed pod of the rare Miniature Man-Eating Masdevallia orchid," Madam Johnson noted before taking a knife to the small oblong pod.

Hermione watched with rapt attention as Madam Johnson used a knife with quick skill and grace, taking off only the outer husk and leaving nearly all the pulp behind.

"I'm sorry," Madam Johnson apologized. "It's been years since I've had to handle one of these."

Hermione looked in awe of the leavings, noting she herself wasn't even one fourth as good as this witch with her knife skills, and until Severus pointed out how far she had yet to go, she thought she was pretty good already. Madam Johnson put Hermione to shame.

The job candidate grabbed a small copper cauldron. She added the peeled pod and some base solution to it, setting it on a very small low flame. She brought it up to a simmer, observed how the pod expanded as it absorbed the water, and killed the flame just before it began to break apart. Placing the swollen pod on the cutting board, she cut it in half and scooped out the seeds before mincing them finely and adding them back into the cauldron once more with some water. Once it starting coming to a slow boil, she added a dropper full of acid solution and watched for the reaction, and a green froth bubbled up near the rim of the copper cauldron before subsiding.

"Slightly stale pod, but still within what I would call acceptable standards for a fresh Potion ingredient. I think this would pass Ministry standards," Madam Johnson remarked.
"You're hired!" Hermione exclaimed.

There was no need to have Madam Dushka even consult on Hermione's decision. Madam Johnson was as good as Hermione, if not better. She could think of no person better qualified to leave in charge of the lab upon her departure. Granted, Trevor had seniority in terms of tenure, but even he could see that he could learn much from this witch and would gladly defer to her.

"Really?" Madam Johnson said with a broad smile.

"In fact, I insist on taking you out to lunch to celebrate. My treat, Madam Johnson," Hermione insisted. "And you'll be my treat too, Trevor, as a farewell luncheon."

"You're leaving?" Madam asked, a little crestfallen. "And please, call me Fastrada."

"Yes, Fastrada. I am leaving for a Potions apprenticeship in less than two weeks, and you're my replacement."

"Really? Who is your Potions master?"

"Albert Dobmeir."

"Albert? Oh, my goodness! Wait, I thought he took some wizard as his apprentice?" Fastrada asked with puzzlement.

"That would be me," Trevor spoke, his hand meekly raised. "But I lost it when I nearly burnt down this lab shortly after starting here."

Fastrada gave Trevor a wary look until Hermione stood up for the wizard and added, "Trevor, since then, has learned his lesson and applied himself. He now understands the importance of this job and the responsibility it carries. He has learned a great deal since he has taken this job more seriously, and though he still has much to learn, I can't think of anyone better than you to help him along the way."

Trevor stuck out his hand and said, "Welcome to the Department of Standards & Regulations,
Over lunch, Hermione and Trevor went over not only Fastrada's duties, but recent problems with suppliers, including the recent mislabeling between the lemonite and sulfur mishaps, in addition to how to deal with Madam Dushka.

Hermione had to bite the inside of her cheek during some comments Trevor made about Madam Dushka, as he was unaware that she had spied him in a three-way sandwich between their boss and her husband during the Halloween masked ball.

Fastrada, it turned out, was friends with Albert Dobmeir, as he and her husband had been good friends who had collaborated periodically. She mentioned how Albert recently lost his wife of many decades.

The older witch guessed that Albert had decided to take a position in the commercial sector and take on an apprentice to keep himself occupied since his wife, Dangerose, passed. Hermione knew a great deal more behind the story, but wasn't about to volunteer unless asked directly, and even then she would try to be vague.

"So how exactly did you land the apprenticeship, Hermione?" Fastrada asked, leaning across the table, dying to know.

"Since Mr. Dobmeir is replacing Mr. Delgado, Mr. Delgado recommended me since I had had some correspondence with him," Hermione admitted.

"Delgado? You mean that Spanish oaf at the ball? Oh, my goodness!" Fastrada exclaimed, breaking out into peals of laughter.

Hermione shrugged noncommittally and tried not to egg her on, but Fastrada's eyes lit up.

"Oh, my," Fastrada said, realization dawning on her face. "Were you that witch in that stunning slim blue dress and the black hair?" she asked, looking equally aghast and amused.

Trevor piped up, "That was you? Merlin's teeth, you looked amazing! I had no idea that was you."
"You were one of the few who didn't look like an over-baked meringue."

Hermione hid her face behind her hand and nodded that she was indeed that witch, and the focus of Sebastian Delgado's very public apology to her in front of half of British wizardkind.

"What did he do to make such a scene to apologize like that?" Fastrada went on, despite Hermione's hopes that the topic would be dropped.

"A cultural misunderstanding. He thought talking about Potions with great interest equaled interests in 'other' things as well," Mrs. Weasley explained with an edge of exasperation in her voice, hoping that would be the end of the matter, distressed that Fastrada had witnessed the exchange.

"That's the Spanish for you!" Trevor commented knowingly.

No more Quidditch games and no more Weasley family obligations until Bill Weasley's birthday party on the 29th, after Ron's return. Hermione came over to Severus' flat on Saturday. It wasn't just Saturday she came over. She had come over to his flat nearly every night that week, dining with him and spending the evening either making love, reading, or talking, and often all of the aforementioned.

That Saturday was different from her previous recent visits since she was giving him an early birthday party, just the two of them. He would be gone by the time his actual birthday rolled around, and she insisted that since he cooked for her and gave her such a lovely birthday, she should at least return the courtesy.

Severus insisted that their getaway the week before was a perfect present, but she insisted that she have the pleasure of cooking for him once, in addition to any other requests, suggesting even a massage. Her insistence to give back to him the same care and consideration he had given to her all these months touched him, and he relented. He was territorial about his kitchen, but agreed only if he could watch, curious as to what she was going to prepare for him.

The fish monger at the farmers' market had the extra large jumbo prawns she was looking for, in addition to all the ingredients she needed. The wine merchant had a bottle of Amontillado for cooking, and a nice white Spanish Albariño for drinking that would work well with the shellfish without overpowering the flavor. Given Severus' recent performance at the ball, she thought it was fitting to get a Spanish wine to go with the meal.

"Just how much garlic are you using?" he asked, taking note that if he liked the meal, he would make it himself in his new home.

"This originally called for a whole large bulb for three pounds of prawns, but I'm using almost half a bulb for the pound of prawns for the two of us. It's a bit more, but it's nearly impossible to use too much garlic for this dish," she said as she chopped the fragrant bulb.

He watched as she added an equal amount of olive oil and butter to the pan, noting the moderate flame and temperature, when she added the garlic and shellfish before the turning of each large prawn to the other side once its carapace began to turn from a bluish-gray to a bright orange-pink. She added a heavy splash of the Spanish sherry half-way through, the pan erupting into a column of bright yellow and orange flame before subsiding to be extinguished. As the prawns cooked, they began to split along the back where she had deveined them. At this point, she turned the prawns so they sat upright, their tails up in the air as their interiors cooked. An extra large pinch of the chopped cilantro was added at the last minute. She swirled the sauce swirled the pan a few times before she removed the prawns and placed them in shallow soup plates, then poured the garlicky sauce over them.

A large loaf of crusty French bread was served up in order to mop up the sauce from the soup plate.

Severus ate his early birthday dinner with relish, complimenting the chef.

"Had I known you were such a good cook, I think I would have asked you to cook for me a long time ago," he said, a glimmer in his coal black eyes.

"Severus, you cook for me because it's the only time you can legally lay your hands on a knife. I usually come over here exhausted, tired of cooking for Ron, and you have been more than happy to show off your culinary skills to me. I know you love it when I praise each wonderful and delectable meal you have ever made for me. You have enjoyed pampering me and I have truly appreciated it, but let's not kid ourselves," Hermione plainly stated, giving him a skeptical look.

"Besides, your cooking is far superior to mine," she continued. "This is the dish I usually ask my mother to make for my birthdays, and that is why I know how to make it. Otherwise my cooking is much more plain and simple out of sheer convenience." Hermione didn't mention the fact that Ron liked simpler fare; she didn't want to hear him complain about fancy spices, herbs or too much garlic, which he used to do until she toned down her cooking style.

Hermione said, "You'll have to teach me your ratatouille and cassoulet before you leave."
It was then that they both realized that there would be an end to their dinners, conversations, and time together. Both were aware of it from the beginning of their romance once she agreed to help him procure the Polyjuice ingredients, but realizing he would no longer be cooking for her made them both a bit introspective for the moment. They ate in silence for a while before Severus asked Hermione about the new candidate she’d hired to replace her at work.

~~~~~~~*~

As much as Hermione wanted to sleep over at Severus’ flat, as he invited her to every night but Sundays until Ron’s return, she kept it to Saturdays only. She still went to his flat after work every weekday, all day Saturday, and part of Sunday. They took turns cooking for each other, Hermione feeling inspired to cook the way she liked versus catering to Ron’s blander palate.

She didn't want to risk someone coming over by Floo, like Ginny and Harry had done in the past, to find her gone and the flat appearing abandoned. She felt it best to keep up appearances since neighbors might observe a change of pattern of Mrs. Weasley returning to her flat or not at all for days at a time. Who knew who the Aurors might question if Hermione became a suspect in Severus and Draco's disappearance.

It was a prudent decision as one night she came home from Severus' flat to find Trevor waiting in her own flat. He was in distress over the fact that Madam Dushka was pregnant, and neither of them were sure if it was his child or Mr. Dushka's.

Trevor Spawn didn't know who else to talk to or trust speaking with.

He confessed about his affair with Madam Dushka, expanding to include her husband once he discovered their affair. It was all hunky-dory until the recent revelation that day that Madam Dushka was expecting. They would have to await the birth of the child before they would discover if the child was sired by her lover or her husband, which would change the magical bond between her and her husband, since they had not gotten around to having children during the past two decades of marriage. It seems that not even magical contraceptives were one hundred percent fool-proof.

Now Trevor feared losing his job.

Hermione pulled out her copy of The Magical Contracts of Marriage and Children and agreed to let him borrow it for a few days. She would need it herself when Ron came back, but she didn't tell Trevor that.
"Listen, if anything, I will vouch that if she chooses to terminate you, it will be unjust since you are a fine employee. If you contest it, there can be an inquiry at your request, and then there would be questions about personal reasons behind her firing you, if she did. Trust me, she will not want to make this an issue of public record. But I would suggest that you and the Dushkas sit down and make a plan that will ensure your continued employment and a course of action," she suggested. "I'm not privy to all that has happened, but I'm sure you have a memory or two that could be viewed in a Pensieve that would sure call into question her objectivity, should she fire you."

Trevor thanked her profusely for her help and promise of discretion before he Floo'ed back home.

Once gone, all Hermione could think is that she would not be around when Madam Dushka's pregnancy progressed. Who knew how much more of a harpy she would become once morning sickness was in full gear, not to mention the mood swings, fatigue, and everything else that came part and parcel with the condition. Hermione had seen enough of her sisters-in-law go through all the various stages numerous times, and she knew exactly what to expect.

~~~~~~~*~

Time flew faster than Hermione realized or wanted. Before she knew it, it was her last day at the Department of Standard & Regulations. It was spent having Fastrada shadow her throughout the day, and when Trevor botched up an experiment on some irregularly ground dragon bone he had on a flame that was too high, he had Fastrada fill out the report before signing it himself. They doubted Fastrada would need to fill out many of those herself, but it was good to know what paperwork was involved.

The three all went to lunch together, as Madam Dushka bowed out at the last minute looking a bit green around the gills. Hermione guessed it was morning sickness, but said nothing.

After lunch, Hermione had to finish sorting through the last of her stacks of Potions and Herbology magazines, Ministry-owned books she had yet to return to their library, and a copious number of journals she had read but never bothered to chuck or sort.

Fastrada had already read most of the materials at home since she still had owl delivery after her husband's passing, but she asked to have them for her own archives at work, for reference.

Once done with her sorting, Hermione noted her couch was a whole lot bigger than she remembered, now that one end did not have a teetering stack of reading materials upon it. Normally she was a neat witch, but lack of adequate bookshelf space had made her improvise over the years.

At five o'clock, Hermione handed her keys back over to Madam Dushka. She Floo'ed home to shower and change before heading over to Severus' for a celebratory dinner he’d promised. He’d also finished his last day at The Lovely Lavender Company under his nom de guerre of Sebastian Delgado, so it was a double celebration.

There was a lesson in ratatouille and preparation of the duck confit for tomorrow, which required preparation the day before for the cassoulet, since she would learn how to make that dish on the following day, Saturday.

After dinner, there was dancing followed by rigorous love-making without the use of any potions, except the Lubrication Potion. As they showered afterward, the moment demanded that they go at it one last time for the night. Hermione and Severus discovered there was some rot in the wall behind the tiled shower wall. Hermione had her feet sturdily braced against the shower walls opposite, and she’d pressed her back against the rotted tile-covered wall while Severus thrust firmly into her. The wall slightly caved, and they had a good laugh over it, deciding to finish their canoodling in the bath instead.

Lying in bed, their hair still damp and Hermione occasionally bursting into spontaneous fits of giggles and chuckles, Severus said, "I'm sorry to leave you a place that is falling apart, if you intend to take Miss Brown's offer of free lodging."

Hermione hadn't even decided if she wanted to live in Severus' flat once he vacated. The lure of rent-free living did hold a distinct monetary allure; given that she had recently been enjoying a few more Galleons in the vault with Ron's bump in salary and position as first-string Keeper for the Chudley Cannons, she was strongly considering it. It wasn't like she’d spent that much extra money with Ron's pay raise, but it was nice to be able to go out to dinner once in a rare while. Then there was a new set of robes when one set was getting too ratty and worn, and it was convenient to not need to count Knuts just before pay day as she had done for years.

She noticed that the study had enough shelf space for even her book collection, which was large, but not as large as Severus'. Most of her books were currently in the cellar space under her and Ron's bed. The cellar was already there when she and Ron moved in, sold as a place to put Christmas decorations, extra brooms, and storage that their tiny flat otherwise lacked. Severus' bed was far more comfortable than hers, and the kitchen was more spacious with more cupboard space. There was no contest when it came to his bathroom.

"Are you leaving the bed?"

"I have no intent to take it," he replied. Severus hoped it would be easy to buy a nice feather bed where he was going.
"Sold. I suppose I should wait to move in until after you've been declared missing, this place turned upside and gone over with a fine-toothed comb, Sneakoscope, Foe-Glass, and who knows what else Mad-Eye will use to look for clues as to your whereabouts."

"That would be the prudent thing to do," Severus agreed as he nuzzled his head against her breast, enjoying the way she lazily stroked and played with his hair.

They lay there entwined with each other before he added, "Though I would consider bringing it along if you came with, if you're that attached to it."

He hadn't mentioned his offer for her to go with him since their weekend in Weybourne two weeks prior.

Hermione didn't want this to turn into another fight and she was tempted to placate him by saying that she would think about it, but that would be leading him on. Severus had been honest with her, once his mask was discarded, and she would not begin lying to him now.

"I have my reasons for staying, Severus. If anything, I know that if what the fortuneteller said is true, then I will see you again."

"Even if you clear my name and I could come back, I doubt that I ever would. England has become a prison for me. I can't travel up to Hogsmeade or even Wales without special permission." He lifted his head from her chest to regard her, brushing the hair away from her face. "If I were to come back to England, it would not be willingly. Which means that if you see me again, it will be because you've left England as well."

Hermione hadn't thought about it in those terms; Yet, Severus omitted the other possibility – of him being caught and dragged back against his will. Still, she had assumed that he would come back once his name was cleared. She hadn't considered that even if he could come back that he would still stay away. When she thought about it, what person ever willingly went back to sit in their jail cell once freed?

And if Severus would never come back, would that mean that she would never clear his and Draco's name, giving up and joining him abroad?

There was no time period the old Roma woman gave as to when Hermione would see Severus again when he left. It didn't mention if he would even be alive, just that she would "see" Severus again.
Now what seemed clear to Hermione once again became nebulous and uncertain.

Chapter End Notes

A/N:

I know, I know. I used the same Extension Charm as Hermione's bag in DH, and I already established I would not use any new canon from HBP onward, but the Extension Charm was already established in GoF with the Weasleys’ tent.

This recipe is very close or is about the same recipe that my mother taught me:

Hermione's Prawns
Serves two

1 pound Colossal or extra large jumbo prawns/shrimp
1/3 bulb of Garlic
1 Tablespoon Cilantro (heaping)
1/4 cup Olive Oil
1/4 cup Butter
1/4 cup Amontillado Sherry

Directions:

1) Draw a sharp knife along the back of the prawns, deep into the interior of the meat so it is mostly butterflied. Devein the shrimp, removing and discarding the intestinal tract. Leave the shells on, as they add flavor to the sauce.

2) Peel and finely chop the garlic, set aside.

3) Coarsely chop enough cilantro to equal one heaping tablespoon – or a very generous pinch, and set aside.

4) With a large skillet, set the heat to medium. Once the pan is warm, add the oil and butter.

5) After the butter has melted and started to bubble a little, add the garlic and cook for about ten seconds.

6) Add the prawns, laying them on one side. Let them cook until the color of the shells change and they become bright pink-orange.
7) Flip the prawns to cook on the other side.

8) When both sides are bright pink-orange in color, the prawns should start spreading apart where you cut through the backs, splitting open.

9) Once both sides are brightly colored and the backs have started to spread open, add the sherry. Stand back as the alcohol vapors will probably catch fire. The alcohol will burn off quickly and the flame will subside.

10) Turn the prawns to “stand up” where the interior meat is now facing down on the pan, shells on top, and the tails are curled up into the air. Cook for a few more minutes until the interior of the prawns are cooked. Do not overcook the prawns or they will be rubbery.

11) Add the cilantro to the pan and swirl the pan about to mingle the cilantro with the sauce.

12) Serve up the prawns into two soup plates, then split the sauce between the two plates.

13) Serve with a large loaf of sliced-up crusty French bread and a nice dry white wine. Add an empty bowl to the table to hold discarded shells.
Chapter Summary

Chapter Sixty-Six: "Last Tango in London" Hermione and Ron finally get around to brass tacks. Later on, it is the last night together for our two lovers; tears are shed, confessions made, and a promise given. Fan art and a drink recipe included!

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Sixty-Six
"Last Tango in London"

Disclaimer: En español – Google translate
Todos los personajes reconocibles pertenecen a JK Rowling y asociados. Ninguna infracción de derechos de autor pretendía. (All recognizable characters belong to JK Rowling and associates. No copyright infringement intended.)

Severus had discovered over the past three weeks that he actually enjoyed some of the ordinary mundane aspects of domesticity. The only things the couple didn't have to deal with in that arena were issues like money matters, visiting family or friends, and most chores, since Marf took care of those. It wasn't like he had any family to visit since both his parents had long since passed, and he had no other family that he was in contact with except for some distant cousins that he wasn't even acquainted with. Hermione rarely visited her parents, though he wondered how they would react to their soon-to-be divorced daughter being romantically involved with an ex-Death Eater twenty years her senior.

Severus was almost forty-four, but still could pass for a man in his thirties, though some aspects of working as a spy had aged him a bit, most notably around the eyes. Once in a rare while he had what some Muggles called the “thousand-yard stare.”

Regardless of all the minor details of life they didn't have to deal with together, Severus was regretting the end of their unfettered stretch at playing house.

Since "Delgado" was no longer employed, that first Monday he found himself rising out of habit to only realize half-way through breakfast that he didn't have to rush off to work. He could sit on his arse all day like some bored housewitch, waiting for Hermione to finish her day at her new job and come "home" to tell him about it. It was quite the gender reversal.

Now free to do anything he wanted, he read. There were some old Sanskrit tomes he had been meaning to read once again, first to refresh his memory, and second to practice his Sanskrit since it was a little rusty.

He wondered if he would have the opportunity to employ more use of the foreign languages among the members of his new community. There was much he was uncertain of, but the only thing he was certain of was that this was the last place in the world that truly offered sanctuary.

Greece once used to have a sanctuary for witches and wizards who ran afoul of their wizarding government's laws or were persecuted justly or unjustly, but since it was a popular place and easy to reach for the European wizarding populace, the guardians to Greece’s sanctuary began demanding payment for entrance: a fee to be free. Just as unscrupulous politicians can be bought or pressured, the magic regarding the several millennia-old sanctuary in Greece was changed through some very powerful spellcasting. Now for an even larger fee from a determined government, witches and wizards could be unwillingly extradited back to their homelands to face jail, Dementors, or execution.

Where he, Draco, and Ginny were going was still a place where they did not have to pay to enter; they would truly be safe from any Aurors who might try to capture and take them back. The magic, he was told with great authority, was quite strong and powerful.

Lost in a book and off his usual schedule, Severus suddenly realized he had not done anything to prepare dinner as Hermione knocked upon his door. Upon entering, she greeted him warmly, eager to tell him about her first day with Albert.

Before she could continue, he stopped her and apologized that he hadn't done anything regarding dinner, to which she suggested that she head out and bring back some take-away from a great curry place that she and Ginny had tried recently.

Once again, Hermione was paying for something that he felt obligated to pay for; she insisted that if he felt strongly about it, if they did take-away again, he could always pay for it then, though she would still be the one to fetch it. Hermione told Severus not to worry about him forgetting dinner, as she had upon many occasions forgotten all about dinner with her nose in a book.

After a trip via Floo and a bit of Apparating, Hermione knocked on his door once more with a couple bags of hot food. Severus had forgotten how much he really liked curry, as he hadn't explored Indian cooking on his own, despite having a couple cookbooks. Additionally, Miss Brown didn't care for it and never had the house-elves at Lovely Lavender serve it for lunch. Besides, the strong odors usually interfered with one's ability to properly smell afterwards and required a change of clothes as well to escape the scents.

As they ate basmati rice, naan bread, Rogan Josh, Chicken Tikka Masala, Aloo Gobi, Riata, and Channa Masala with a couple of chutneys on the side, Hermione recounted her first day as Albert Dobmeir's Potions apprentice.

"Why didn't you tell me that the house-elves provide lunch for you every day?" Hermione asked as she put a bit of Riata on her naan to cool the mellow spices from the Rogan Josh warming her tongue.

"I had become so accustomed to it, I had forgotten it was a perk of the position," he admitted with a shrug. "Besides, it's not like Miss Brown wants to have two ex-Death Eaters spotted leaving her headquarters around lunch every day, to re-enter an hour later."

"Well, it certainly will be easier for the fact I don't have to head out to lunch every day or pack my own, which is what I did many times."

"And did you lunch with Miss Brown?" He gave Hermione a curious glance, his one brow cocked.

"Yes, and it was a little awkward, but we pretended as if there were no bad blood between us. There was no need to embarrass Albert with the salacious details of our personal lives that will hit the papers soon enough once it becomes public knowledge when Ron and I file officially." Hermione used her spoon to push around the curry-soaked rice about her plate, suddenly feeling her appetite wane a little.

There was the question of whether they would file the divorce privately or at the Ministry. Either way, it would magically appear in the Ministry's records for all to see once complete. Hermione hadn’t looked into getting her own Gringotts vault yet, and there was still the issue of buying her own owl. Either action might be viewed as suspicious, if scrutinized too closely by the Eeylops Owl Emporium employees or the Goblins at the bank.

Severus placed his hand atop hers. It was comforting to know that he would still be around when she divorced Ron and would have a shoulder to cry upon, should she deal with any emotional baggage that had yet to be expunged. She had cried enough over this latest development in her marriage, and now she had reached the level of quiet resignation and acceptance.
When Hermione came home Tuesday night, having spent the evening at Severus’ again, Ron's owl, Pigwidgeon, was waiting for her with a postcard in his beak. Once she retrieved it, the little Scops owl dove into the tray of owl treats and began eating nearly the whole bowl down in one go.

Turning over the card, she looked at the date, realizing this was the first postcard Ron sent her. He’d sent it over a week ago.

-------

Hermione,
Thailand and India were amazing. Morocco was too dry and sandy.
South America - mix of good and bad. Home soon.
Ron

-------

Flipping the card back over, she more closely looked at the photograph on the other side. It said, "Greetings from Tahiti", with a picture of a tropical beach, an empty hammock, and palm trees swaying in the breeze. She could see the waves gently lapping at the white sandy beach.

"You came all the way from Tahiti?" Hermione asked the diminutive owl.

Pig hooted at her with his beak full of owl treats that he was still wolfing down.

"I'll get you a nice fresh mouse tomorrow. How does that sound?"

The owl hooted twice and snuggled up against Hermione's hand in appreciation of her offer.

"Fine, two mice. You earned it."

In anticipation of Ron returning home Wednesday, Hermione decided not to visit Severus the day Ron was supposed to come back. She would go back to the old Monday night and Thursday night routines until Ron or she had moved out. More likely, it was Ron who would leave for Lavender's place, preferably the night he returned.
Looking in her cupboard and pantry, she realized she had let her food stores whittle down since she only ever ate breakfast at her flat now. She had come home from work, and there was very little to cook. Ron wasn't home yet, so she made a quick run out to the butcher’s for a couple steaks, and she would cook up some noodles and carrots she still had in her pantry.

As she was putting the groceries away, she heard the Floo roar to life.

"'Mione? 'Mione, you home?" Ron called out.

"In the kitchen," she hollered back.

"Wow, you're home?" he said in surprise, used to her coming home late most nights, even Wednesdays.

Hermione stood in the doorway and looked Ron over. His hair was rumpled, his face tanner, and it looked like he’d gained even more muscle, but his face was thinner, indicating he had really chiseled down his body fat even further.

As much as it would have been natural to run across the room and throw her arms around him in welcome, it was not going to happen.

There was an awkward silence as Ron didn't make any move to run over and embrace her either.

"I started my apprenticeship with Albert Dobmeir this last Monday," she informed him blandly. "That's amazing!" Ron said, sincerely happy for her.

"Albert Dobmeir is Lavender Brown's new Potions master."

Ron's face fell.

Over all the talk of her apprenticeship with Albert Dobmeir, Hermione had forgotten to mention that Dobmeir and herself would both be working for Lavender. Had Ron been aware of that fact before that moment, he may have confessed himself about the affair before she found it out from Lavender herself.
"I want a divorce," she said flatly without emotion. Before Ron could object, she added, "I am making enough money now, working for Lavender. Between that and my royalties, plus free rent at a block of flats she owns in which I've been offered a place to live, I won't have any money troubles, Ron."

Ron just stared at her. His face was ashen.

When he continued to stand there and do nothing, Hermione turned around and went back into the kitchen to begin cooking dinner.

"You still like your steak rare?" she called out from the kitchen.

Ron finally found his feet and his voice and rushed to the doorway of the kitchen.

"'Mione, I can explain," he blurted out.

Hermione stopped and swiveled on the spot to fix him with a glare that would freeze a phoenix's arse, the cooking knife in her hand and pointed towards his chest. "Shall I recount everything Lavender has told me and then you can add anything she left out, or shall I let you blather on and dig yourself deeper into a hole?"

Ron weighed the possibility between keeping his mouth shut or rambling on. He decided on the latter.

"But if you know all this, why are you working for her if you're this upset?" he asked, wondering how Hermione could work for the woman he was having an affair with.

"Because, Ron, this apprenticeship is something I have wanted for a long time. And when I finally have it, I'm not going to give it up because you couldn't keep your wee willie out of some other witch's fanny." Hermione punctuated the end of that statement with a sharp and forceful chop of her knife, cutting a small carrot in half with precision.

Ron winced at the implication of her subconscious gesture.
"I know you've been fucking her since that first big fight shortly after Harry and Ginny's wedding," Hermione began as she listed off each point as she wielded her knife with precision, focusing her frustration on the phallic vegetable in front of her. "I know when you've been gone and said you've been at a 'friend's' place, you've really been at her place. I know she has begged you to divorce me for years. I know that you only married me because your mother coerced you into it. I know we never really loved each other the way a husband and wife should. I know you're in love with her and she with you. I know that you have not divorced me because you were worried about me having enough money to live on, a problem now resolved with my new job, thanks to your mistress, who is paying me, and that you're too scared shitless of your mother to tell her if we do get a divorce, which we will have." She finished chopping up the carrots and put them in a pot to boil. "Did I leave anything out?"

"Yeah, not only did Mum push me into marrying you, she threatened that if I didn't propose soon, she would kick me out of the house and financially cut me off, job or no job."

Hermione almost felt some pity for Ron as he'd proposed shortly after dropping out of Auror training. It was before he landed his position as second-string Keeper and part-time barman.

Ron sounded very bitter at having been strong-armed by his mother. He had expressed recently how he wished he was stronger when dealing with her domineering personality; he hadn’t had the fortitude to push back against her bullying. Hermione realized he had been, in some ways, just a kid at the time and fresh from a war that had damaged everyone's soul it touched. Everyone had been too tired to fight anymore, even Ron.

Still feeling less than generous towards her husband, Hermione threw back in Ron's face, "Why didn't you just go stay at Harry's, then?"

"You know what she's like. Or have you forgotten about her nagging about children already?" he countered, his voice rising in anger.

The emotionally-drained witch slumped against the counter, her hands braced on the chipped tile for support. She knew exactly what Molly Weasley was like. The rancor she felt towards her mother-in-law was near equal to the anger she still felt over Ron's betrayal. It wasn't like Hermione was any more faithful towards the end of their marriage, willingly falling into Severus' bed after writing off her marriage at the end of her anniversary dinner.

Hermione and Lavender both agreed that Ron was to never find out about his wife and Severus being together. Not only about that, but Lavender's side gigolo business as well. Ron would never understand about any of it. Ron was going to have a hard enough time dealing with his little sister running off with Draco, leaving Harry, his best friend, alone and forsaken.

The slow burning rage in the pit of Hermione's stomach made her want to tell Ron about his own mother's visits to see a gentleman named "Eduardo," but that would be hexing her own foot off. Instead she tamped it down and calmed herself enough that she could at least face eating without wanting to throw it up.

The pan was sizzling hot, so Hermione threw the steaks on and told Ron to sit. They were to have one last dinner together as husband and wife, then after dinner he was to pack up his things and get the fuck out of their flat and go stay at Lavender's. He could come back tomorrow while she was at work to pick up the rest of his things.

They would sort out who got what and splitting of the money in their vault later. She would even force him to take that cheeky mirror she had spelled silent for the past three weeks so she did not have to listen to it bitch at her any more, but she wasn't going to share a bed with him any longer.

Ron didn't argue; he only shook his head in agreement, his head hanging down like the guilty dog he was.

~~~~~~~~~

Bill Weasley was celebrating his thirty-third birthday. The whole family was going to be there, even Percy, Penelope, and their newest child, Prunella, as well as her older siblings, Parker and Primrose.

Since Hermione was no longer going to be Ron's wife, Lavender got the duty of finding a birthday present for Bill. Hermione gladly handed that chore off to her, having had her fill over the years of buying presents for the various Weasley family members. That one obligation alone that she would no longer have to part Galleons over would probably save her a small fortune. Lavender was rich; she could afford to buy Bill whatever her tastes desired.

Hermione, Ron, and Lavender Apparated together to the path near Bill and Fleur's home. No one held hands as they approached the house.

Knocking on the door, they were greeted by Fred, who asked, "What are you doing here, Lav?" He wondered why his business partner had shown up for a private family function.

Ron rushed inside and masked his nervousness by acting a bit overly cheerful. "Has the party started yet?"
Hermione and Lavender both entered the home behind Ron and waited for the questioning glances and looks to subside as to why Miss Brown was there. Ginny, who already had a glass of Fleur's famous champagne cocktail in her hand, just stared quietly.

Hermione and Ginny had had lunch recently and the older witch updated her friend on the goings on as of late, but it still hadn’t quite prepared Mrs. Potter for what was transpiring before her eyes.

Molly was making noise in the kitchen that, "Ron and Hermione better arrive soon or they'd have trouble to deal with," when she rounded the corner with her hands full with a casserole dish.

A small shriek of fright erupted from Molly, her eyes wide and full of terror. Her hands dropped the casserole; it landed on the floor with a crash, roasted squash splattering all over her brown heeled shoes and stockings.

All eyes in the room swiveled from Lavender, who was like an interloper, to Molly who reacted so violently to seeing her there.

"Oh, my! Why didn't you tell us you'd be bringing a guest to Bill's party?" Molly began nervously, stammering.

Molly pulled her wand out and the casserole was restored, dish and squash intact as if it had never hit the floor. She was forgetting the fact that there was probably lint and hair now contaminating the squash casserole, and it would still need to be chucked in the bin.

As Molly rushed to put the casserole on the table, before dropping it once more, Ron said, "I have an announcement."

He swallowed hard; suddenly surrounded by his entire family, his voice failed him.

"Hermione's pregnant?" Molly blurted out, her face suddenly turning from dread to hope.

Hermione, sensing that Ron was going to lose his nerve stepped up next to Ron and clasped his hand as a sign that though she may be angry with him, she was with him at that moment.
"No," Hermione said defiantly, "Ron and I are getting a divorce."

The room erupted into a cacophony of riotous noise.

Lavender, who had been standing back watched in awe as the room became a flurry of waving hands, mothers clapping hands over their children's ears as if "divorce" was a dirty word, which it sort of was in the wizarding world, and shouts of disbelief.

"How could you do this to me!" Molly shrieked in shrill tones at her youngest son.

"Wow, and I thought Mum finding out about our sex shop was going to be hard," George muttered to Lavender as an aside.

Philippe turned to his mother, Fleur, who was equally shocked. He asked, "Mum, what's a divorce?"

Charlie got into Ron's face and started asking him if this was some joke the twins put him up to.

Penelope gave Hermione the stink eye before saying snidely, "I hope this bad news doesn't make my breast milk go sour."

Ginny just continued to sit there while Harry ran over to confront Ron and Hermione about this out-of-the-blue revelation.

Bill sat down in a chair, bewildered and overcome by the news.

Molly continued railing on, "And you couldn't have waited until after dinner and cake to tell us this? You just ruined your brother's birthday dinner!"

"There are more important things than Bill's birthday dinner, like you forcing me to propose to Hermione when I didn't want to!" Ron shouted back at his mother in a booming voice.
The whole room went deadly silent. All eyes once again turned to look at Molly, whose face was starting to turn a lovely shade of cerise.

This time, Arthur was the first to speak, "What do you mean, Ron, when you say she forced you?"

"It's nothing, Arthur," Molly interrupted. "He's just exaggerating. I did no such thing."

Ron had finally found his backbone and stood up even straighter, the full force of his muscular physique dwarfing his mother. He said very clearly, over-enunciating each and every word, "Really? Shall I have someone fetch a Pensieve? I can show everyone my memory of you threatening to cut me off and throw me out of the house if I didn't get around to proposing to Hermione and 'right quick', as you put it!"

Arthur turned to look at his wife, disbelieving his wife had pressured Ron into a marriage he was neither ready for nor wanted.

The room devolved once more into screaming, questions and accusations before Molly shouted, "Well, you can't get a divorce."

"Actually," Hermione interjected, "we did it this afternoon from home, just before we came over. When the Ministry opens on Monday morning, it will appear on their registry that we are no longer married." She let go of Ron's hand to sit down, now feeling quite tired.

"Well, undo it!" Molly insisted.

Harry yelled at Ron, "Why didn't you two tell me and Ginny about this?" He presumed his wife didn't know, and she didn't correct him.

"This still doesn't explain why Lavender's here!" George yelled loud enough for everyone to hear.

Lavender walked up next to Ron to clasp his hand to present a unified front and said, her chin jutting defiantly, "Ron and I are going to get married."

Molly howled with incredulity, "YOU'VE BEEN HAVING AN AFFAIR...WITH HER?!?" in a voice so loud some of the grandchildren cowered and began to cry.

"And just what is wrong with Lavender? I am deeply in love with her and we have been for a long time. Maybe I would have married her and been happier and had children already if you hadn’t forced me to marry Hermione in the first place," Ron shouted back.

"Yes, Mrs. Weasley," Lavender said in a cool voice that denoted a calm attitude and that she was in charge of the conversation. "Just what is wrong with Ron marrying me? We have been in love each other for years."

"You mean you’ve been committing adultery all along?" Harry asked, ready to hex his friend for cheating on Hermione.

"It makes no difference now, Harry," Hermione said calmly, putting her hand on Harry's wand arm, noticing how it was twitching, itching to cast some jinx at his oldest friend. "We were never in love to begin with, and this marriage has been over for a long time. We just finally both have the sense to finally end it and part ways."

Hermione could have added that she was now working for Lavender, but that would have created a whole new ruckus, so she figured that it would come out later.

Not surprisingly, Fred came over to stand next to Hermione and said very quietly, "You do realize that Albert Dobmeir – the guy you're apprenticing under – is Lav's new Potions master, right?"

Hermione nodded and said somberly, "I already had my first week at my new work. Trust me, I'm well aware."

Fred whistled long and low, shaking his head. "Man, you Muggle-borns have some pretty liberal attitudes. Almost as bad as the Spanish."

Hermione ignored Molly, who was still railing on, and went over to Bill. "I'm sorry I ruined your dinner party, Bill. But this has been coming for a long time, and we had to break it at some point. Happy birthday, Bill."

She shook his hand and went to head to the door.
"And just where do you think you're going?" Molly questioned shrilly, spying Hermione making her exit past Ron.

"I am going home." Hermione exited and walked out the door, closing it gently.

Outside along the path, George ran after her and asked her to stop for a moment.

"I know my mother can be a bit much, but even though you're not married to Ron any more, you'll always be a part of this family, even if you are divorced. If you and Ron were never in love with each other, I don't blame you for ending it. Charlie, Percy, and Mum might be having a fit right now, but some of us are a bit more understanding."

Hermione gave George a hug and thanked him.

"Ginny knew, didn't she?" George asked quietly.

"Do you think I could have gone through all this and not tell my dearest friend?"

"You didn't tell Harry, since he was just as shocked as Mum," George observed.

"Harry has his own issues to deal with, and he doesn't need my troubles heaped on top of his," she said cryptically, without giving details of Harry and Ginny's own crumbling marriage.

"Well, I hope you're still coming to the grand opening of The Sirens' Secrets next week," he said.

"With bells on," she assured him.

Before she Apparated away, George suddenly shouted with inspiration, "Ooh! Bell nipple pasties! Thanks for the idea, Hermione!"

~~~~~~~~~

Since Severus had his days free now, his madam, Miss Brown, had arranged some daytime visits by some older witches looking for a bit of company. As his client list had whittled down to just Mrs. Paxton on Sunday, appearances had to be kept up that Severus was earning his keep by peddling his companionship. It was just for one more week, but Severus did it in order to help create a believable story that she had no idea he was leaving, by keeping him solidly booked, but the other six nights were still strictly free for Hermione.

If anything, he got to use his masks one last time before getting rid of them. He decided to keep his Casanova mask embellished with a few gold baroque swirls as a reminder of the night he and Hermione met each other. If anything, it symbolized the mask she had stripped away from him and his heart.

Most of the witches were thankfully not interested in anything sexual, though one did get a bit frisky, to which he had to inform her that he wasn't being paid for that type of company, especially the meager sum she had offered for his time through Miss Brown. Marf was happy that he got to make a lot of tea and sandwiches that week.

Now that Ron was gone from her life, Hermione came over every night, since Severus was mostly a Beau du Jour gigolo now.

Time was speeding up faster for the two lovers. Though it seemed his day of departure would never arrive, he wanted each night to last forever so he could be with Hermione just a bit longer before she went home to her own flat each night.

That Monday morning, the Daily Prophet had a headline in bold print that read: "QUIDDITCH STAR DIVORCES WIFE FOR BEAUTY EMPIRE QUEEN!" There was an old photo of Ron and Hermione's wedding that the paper had from when they published the announcement years ago. It was tearing in half with a photo of a sultry-looking Lavender Brown popping up between husband and wife. Lavender was winking, making the photo look as bad as the story implicated.

It was even written by Marietta Edgecombe, the budding reporter at the Daily Prophet who still had the word “SNEAK” written permanently across her face in old acne scars, thanks to Hermione's secret jinx imbued in the Dumbledore Army contract in her fifth year. Marietta's article was almost as scathing as if Rita Skeeter had written it herself, no doubt taking pointers from the prevaricator.

Their divorce was public record, but as for how the hacks at the Daily Prophet discovered that Ron was with Lavender, she wondered if there were a few more unregistered Animagi at the paper than just Rita Skeeter.

Hermione was glad she could Floo directly from her flat to work, as there were reporters who knocked on her door at home at all hours asking for an exclusive, and the house-elves kept the press away at work. Lavender came into work complaining about how Ron was being harangued by the press equally. Hermione felt much less pity for those two.

Bascom Nettleton wasn't too upset over the news and seemed to find perverse joy in it, declaring that every witch would want a calendar featuring the Chudley Cannons’ Keeper, Ron Weasley, since he must have been pretty hot looking for the beauty empire queen to steal him away from his wife. Lavender seemed to also mention Bascom Nettleton's name with a slight shudder. Hermione secretly wondered if Lavender had had an equally smarmy encounter with the older wizard, but didn't ask.

Albert Dobmeir had the decorum to offer a kind ear without judgment. Hermione declined for now, saying she might talk to him later about it, but she just wanted to concentrate on her work instead. He kept her busy by having her work on Greek, the first language she chose to master, when she wasn't working on new beauty Potions with Albert or going to his house to tend his personal Potions garden.

She could scarcely believe it, but this was the last night she was going to visit Severus. He had become such an integral part of her life, her routine, her heart, that she didn't want to believe it. Their evenings together, first with Severus posing as Calleo, then known for his true self, had become the one bright thing in her life amid the depressing drudgery of being married to Ron and working in a dead-end job she loathed.

Severus had provided a soft shoulder and some tea, becoming her friend before they became lovers. And now he would soon be gone.

Staring at a fresh bowl of lemons she had procured from a recent visit to the Hogsmeade Memorial Cemetery earlier that week, Hermione said to the peculiar fruit, as if she was speaking to her old Headmaster in person, "Why didn't you take care of Severus and Draco? How could you die and leave them without some proof that they should not be persecuted?"

She played with one of the lemons in her hand, noting the leathery quality of it, since she had picked it up off the ground and who knew how long it had been there before she’d grabbed it. There was a temptation to throw it against the wall in anger, but instead she placed it in the pocket of her cloak to give to Severus.

The two lovers tried to pretend as if this was just another evening together, but the portent of what would happen tomorrow loomed over their last night together.
They ate a salad accented with fresh pomegranate seeds and shaved fennel over a bed of spinach and arugula with a light dressing, alongside the main entree of roasted goose glazed with apricot jam Severus had canned in late spring. It was a lovely last dinner to share together.

The salad reminded Hermione of the Greek myth of Persephone eating a few pomegranate seeds. That act had resulted in the origin of winter and how seasons occur, since they were on the cusp of the coldest and darkest of seasons, when Persephone parted from the ones she loved against her will.

As they dined, Hermione practiced a bit of her Greek with Severus, who helped her with her pronunciation and a few mnemonic tricks he knew. After supper, they retired to the settee for a bit to let dinner settle before dancing.

Severus began by playing Hermione's favorite song, “I Left My Heart in San Francisco.” It was by the third song, a slow tango, that they stopped dancing and began making love for the last time.

They took their time, taking it slow. Both wanted to remember it all in perfect detail.

There was an urgency in their kisses. It wasn't like the first time they kissed where they needed to consume one another to fulfill a long denied hunger. This was different. They needed to gorge themselves on each other in order to last the months or years until they would see each other again. Even Severus had silently admitted to himself that when the old fortuneteller said Hermione would see him again, it didn't exactly imply he would still be alive.

He had Hermione undressed first and on her back in his bed. His mouth and fingers probed and delved into her, bringing her to orgasm twice before he would let her up off the bed to reciprocate. She let him guide the pace when it was his turn, wanting to let him do anything he wanted. When her gag reflexes kicked in, he eased up, but her hands guided him to go deep into her mouth and down her throat. He was in awe of the sight of her lost in the rapture of giving him pleasure.

Finally, unable to wait any longer, Severus removed himself from Hermione's mouth and pulled her up onto his lap. She quickly impaled herself on him and rode him, feeling as if she would cry. He grasped her tightly and thrust up from underneath with a desire to keep her there forever in her bed. As much as he needed freedom more than he needed Hermione, he briefly thought about what would happen if he did stay behind to be with her.
His head planted firmly against her chest, his arms tight around his love, Severus came, screaming and howling, no longer holding back his reserve. Hermione angled her hips in such a way that increased the friction against her clit and came as well, as Severus was nearing the end of his orgasm.

They laid together in his bed, both unable to speak for a while, before Hermione rolled over and began to kiss him again. It wasn't long before Severus was ready once again. This time he had Hermione on her back, her legs spread wide and far apart, her knees practically up under her shoulders. He slammed into her, each thrust accented with a fierce grunt, as she watched him. His eyes were shut tight as he was concentrating on the sensation of her warmth tightly wrapped around him. She watched the way his long, straight raven locks swayed with each movement, like the boughs of a tree in a steady summer breeze.

"I love you, Severus," she choked out, her voice thick with emotion and her eyes filling with tears. She didn't want him to go and almost begged for him to stay.

Hearing Hermione declare her love yet again, he came, but this time his face did not screw into an exquisite grimace of furrowed brow and grim set mouth, but that of one in pain, as if surrendering in defeat. His brows lifted and his eyes pleaded with hers, his mouth slack.

Collapsed on top of her, he firmly kissed the whole of her face: Her forehead, her cheeks, her eyes, her brow, her chin and mouth. They were both panting laboriously, Hermione kissing him back similarly, kissing his shoulder and neck as well.

He had to say it one last time.

Draco had taken Severus to task for offering to bring Hermione along recently when – not some months before – Severus had reamed him out at the insistence of taking Ginny. Their plan was set and here he was willing to risk it for a witch, who at the time was still married to Weasley.

"It's not too late," Severus said, still trying to catch his breath, still buried inside of Hermione. "You can still come with us."

He didn't care if this would turn into another fight; he knew he would regret it if he didn't try one last time.

Hermione's heart felt as it would break in two right then. Her resolve was sorely tested, his voice was almost pleading, begging nearly in the same way he had begged to have her when he ground himself up against her in the kitchen when he still wore his mask. His voice had been heavy with desperation for release and need then; his voice held that same expression of his need for her now.

"I will see you again. I know it in my bones, Severus," she whispered with certainty into his hair, her hand gently stroking his back, legs still wrapped around him.

He wanted to believe her, and perhaps he did. It still didn't stop the hole that was opening in his heart, already missing her though she was right there in his arms, beneath him, still locked in a lovers' embrace.

Memory of Draco's insistence that Severus tell Hermione about his wife came once more unbidden to the forefront of his mind. For the fact that he had been battling with the question more and more as the weeks progressed made him think that he did need to unburden his sins upon his lover. Even the ghostly images of Albus and Minerva had been nagging him with increasing urgency that he tell her.

Maybe his story might evoke some pity in her and she might change her mind and still come with him in the end; or she might hate him and end his futile hope that she would come with him. And even if he never did see her again, she would know him for who he truly was and not the man behind the mask who hid his pain and shame. This was his last mask to strip away for her.

"Draco thinks I should tell you some parts of my past. And perhaps he is right. Should you change your mind and come with me, it would be best that you know," Severus began as he crawled off of Hermione to lay next to her, staring at the ceiling, unable to look her in the eye.

Hermione laid next to him and held his hand to let him know that whatever he might confess, she was still there for him, comforting him in his pain as he told his tale.

"I became a Death Eater because of the people who I thought were my friends. I was foolish and young, confusing the seduction of inclusion – and of a false sense of belonging with flattery and praise – with actual friendship. In order to belong, I let my own opinions be swayed by others’, since I had never really fit in before."

Hermione gave Severus' hand a squeeze, remembering how alone she’d felt her first year at Hogwarts and the overwhelming loneliness, unable to find a way to fit in or make friends, until befriended by Ron and Harry.
Severus continued. "It took a while before I realized the mistake I had made. In my seventh year, my father had arranged a marriage for me to a pure-blood witch three years my senior."

Hermione sat up and looked at Severus in surprise, but kept hold of his hand, squeezing it once more.

"We were married shortly after I had taken my N.E.W.T.s and came home from Hogwarts. She had been caught by her father in bed with a Muggle she claimed to be in love with. Being from a pure-blood family, this was unacceptable. The only course was for her to be married off to another pure-blood as soon as possible."

Hermione had no idea Severus was ever married, but given his own cryptic bitter comments about arranged marriages, it shouldn't have surprised her.

Severus only kept going, urged on by the soft reassurance of Hermione's touch in his own hand, encouraging him. "We loathed each other at first. We were both resentful with each other that we were forced into a situation against our own wills. Something I think your ex-husband can relate to, I'm sure."

Turning away from Severus, the tears came, realizing the Ron probably held some resentment towards her all these years after having his own mother pressure him into a marriage he wasn't ready for. She wiped away the tears before regarding Severus once again.

"She was a Ravenclaw, and she saw the logic in trying to make the best of a bad situation. Eventually we established a friendly rapport with each other. I may have even loved her, as you loved your husband. But we were not in love."

This time Severus squeezed Hermione's hand back, indicating silently that he had fallen in love with Hermione as he had not with his wife.

"Eventually, she became pregnant."

He paused, trying to hold back his own tears. Even after all these years, he still had trouble dealing with the fact that he’d almost became a father. The fact that Draco and his unborn child could have even grown up together and possibly been friends had crossed his mind more than once.
"The problem with Ravenclaws is that sometimes they think logic is the cure for all ills of the world. That everyone should see things logically, especially when evidence is provided that can support ideas with facts. What my wife..." He almost could not say her name, but he soldiered on, "… Gabrielle, could not comprehend is that prejudices are not based on facts, but cold hard ignorance that does not wish to be erased. Prejudices can be as zealous as blind faith. And the other Death Eaters and their wives had nothing but that to prove their unwavering faith in the Dark Lord."

He closed his eyes, wincing at the utterance of the wizard who still struck terror in his soul. "Gabrielle, having dealt with Muggles, and once having one as a lover before marrying me, thought that with intellectual debate she could convince the wives of Death Eaters that Muggles were not to be feared or hated, but embraced and welcomed. Needless to say, she was made an example of."

Hermione gasped in shock of this news. She began softly sobbing in sympathy for Severus loss, even though she had not heard the whole story.

"I was summoned by the Dark Lord..." he trailed off, trying to find the courage to speak his most grievous sins. Severus swallowed thickly, his mouth gone dry and his voice began to tremble as he recounted, "Gabrielle was there, bound on the wet ground, caked in mud. She was five months pregnant with our child. The Dark Lord said that a pure-blood witch who commingled with Muggles and espoused their equality was unfit to live, much less wield a wand and call herself a witch. He even questioned the paternity of the child. Lucius added in the crude joke about possibly being cuckolded by her old Muggle lover. I was ordered to... dispatch her."

She was crying silently, but he could feel the bed shake as she tried to keep quiet as the sobs racked her body.

"I hesitated. How could I kill her?" His voice overwhelmed, almost laughing at the despair that flooded him upon recalling those memories. "When the Dark Lord sensed my wavering obedience, he offered to have Lucius Malfoy do it if I could not.

"I knew that if I did not do it, then not only would she and my child die, but that I would, too. And if I was dead, then I could not avenge her, fight against those who would force me to kill her. I knew I had to do it or else I would have died in vain."

Hermione buried her head into his shoulder, her tears soaking the sheets beneath his skin. Still, she kept as quiet as possible while she cried.
"I summoned all my rage against her that I could. The resentment of having to marry her against my will, the petty battles we’d had, my anger at Lucius who looked like he was enjoying this as he smirked at my pain, my utter hatred that I had ever felt towards anyone, and I cast the Killing Curse."

Hermione finally let her sobs find voice and she cried pitifully. Severus wasn't sure even he could stand the sounds of her cries, as she was not crying for herself this time, but for him.
"Afterwards, I went to her parents' house to offer myself up to whatever punishment they wanted, but I found that they had already been killed. So I went to Dumbledore. I threw myself at his mercy, and even begged him to kill me himself, poison me, even. But he made me promise to fight against the Dark Lord and spy for the Order."

Hermione's sobbing began to subside somewhat.

"After the war, the Headmaster kept the killing of my wife a secret, knowing I lived with the remorse of it every day, even now. My work as a spy was the justification as to why the Wizengamot could not delve into what I had done during the first war. But nothing can excuse me, not even your forgiveness, if you were to give it, of what I've done."

Hermione threw herself across Severus’ chest as her sobs returned anew.
"I'm so sorry, Severus. I had no idea. My God, what could you do?" she wailed into his shoulder.

"I could have died alongside her like I deserved," he replied, emotion drained from his voice in defeat.

"No! No, Severus," she insisted. "If you had died, then the war might have been lost. I wish she hadn't died, I wish your child hadn't either, but there was nothing else to do. It's their fault she died; you were forced to do it, just as Draco was forced to take his Dark Mark against his will as well. You did it to survive, Severus. And until one is put into a life or death situation, no one is ever sure of what they will do, and they may question for the rest of their life what they should have done. But you did what you thought was right for the moment. I cannot judge you, Severus. I can forgive you, but I cannot judge."

Severus rolled away from Hermione, feeling as if he was undeserving of her pity and forgiveness.

"Severus, I did things during the war that I wish I had done differently. But we make the choices as best we can. You chose to live, to fight back and avenge her. For the fact that you did not give up and let them win, I can only assume that you would have done all that you could to save her, but couldn't." Hermione felt her own remorse wash over her as she remembered the second war. "I wonder myself, if I had done something different, if I didn't hesitate, struck for a brief second by fear, if I could have cast the counter-curse and saved Remus or Minerva in time. I wonder who else I could have saved if I wasn't periodically frozen with paralyzing fear and bone-weary fatigue, trying to make my mind work, unable to recall some spell, or aiming wrong because my hand shook too hard. You're not the only one who lives with regrets, Severus. But we move on and do the best we can. That is all we can do. Keep living for those who don't any longer."

Hermione was sitting up in bed by this point, her knees drawn up to her chest, her face red and tear-streaked, eyes puffy.

That sat in silence for a long while. He had spoken enough.

Eventually, Hermione said, her breath hitching as she came down from a good cry, "I still love you, Severus. And I still think you should be free, which is why I should stay. Had you no remorse over your actions, that would be one thing, but I know you do. And it is because of that that I can forgive you and still love you as much as I did before."

They fell into each other's arms, holding on to each other as if clinging to a raft, trying to save each other from drowning in the depths of their sorrows.

Severus' heart did not feel lighter nor did he feel any less shame than before. The only thing different was that Hermione knew, which seemed to change nothing in her mind about coming with him or her intent to clear his and Draco's name. He wondered if it was truly worth it.

In time, they rose to shower. As they soaped each other, it was more like an act of absolution than the rinsing of sweat, like the symbolic washing of one's soul after confession. Severus' contrition would never diminish, but Hermione's tender ministrations as she lathered his hair and washed his back felt as if she gave him the peace that he needed to look her in the eye once again and finally accept her affections once more.

After their shower, they returned to the settee for tea and dessert.

It was fitting that the last time they were together that they should once again share a cup of tea, just like the first night they met each other.

As their night drew to a close, Severus placed Hermione's cloak about her shoulders, his hands deliberately slow as he brushed her shoulders, sensual and tender. It was much like when he was trying to seduce her during their first meetings, when he would try to arouse her with a gentle caress of her skin.

Hermione turned around as she reached into the pocket of her cloak. Pulling the lemon out, she carefully placed it into Severus' hand, placing her hand on top.
"Take this as a symbol of my promise that one day I will see that you and Draco are truly free."

He looked at it and studied it for a moment. This was one of the lemons from the famous tree that grew at Dumbledore's graveside. He had heard about them, even read about them. Severus even knew the epitaph upon the headmaster's grave was, "The answer to all your questions can be found in a Lemon Drop."

The former spy almost laughed at the irony that this lemon seemed to hold no answer except a broken promise. At least the old Headmaster told Severus how to reach sanctuary before he passed, should he require it.

Hermione placed her hand upon his cheek, her love was full of grace. "Never doubt my love for you, Severus. And though you may never forgive yourself, I hope one day you can find peace."

They kissed one last time before Hermione turned to head out the door, tears falling as she descended the steps, her shoulders slumped.

Severus closed the door only after he could no longer see her from his doorway.

The sound of the door clicking shut echoed with finality about the empty atrium of the block of flats of the Red Ginseng.

Chapter End Notes

I'm posting this chapter a bit earlier in the week than usual as I'll be away to Las Vegas this weekend for the final staff site visit before Leviosa, the Harry Potter conference where I am Hotel & Logistics Director. Oh, didn't know there was a Harry Potter conference happening this summer, July 7-10? Wanna come for four days of fandom fun? Hurry, registration deadline is May 31st: http://leviosa.org/

A round of thanks to my betas, the fabulous JuneW and the wonderful Cytherea. Without them, you would be bothered by my many errors they catch and correct.

Yes, I know Severus is half-blood, but when I began this story back in 2004 before Half-Blood Prince, this was not known yet, so I am keeping true to the originally perceived canon at the time.
And yes, this is exactly how I envisioned Severus killing his wife way back in 2004 when I introduced Gabrielle into the story, and going to Dumbledore afterwards. You can imagine the shock of reading Severus in the books and his memories, and how I felt a little thrill that I got sort of close to the actual canon before it was published.

Belle du Nuit is the French euphemism for "lady of the night." “Belle du Jour” is the name of a French movie about a women who prostitutes herself, but only during the day, a play on the phrase. Beau du Jour refers to him being a man of the day in the same euphemistic manner.

And here is Fleur's champagne cocktail recipe, that Ginny was sipping; I developed the recipe for Leviosa. The variation of this is the Beauxbaton Bracer with no Elderflower Liqueur and 4.5 oz of champagne instead, which will be served at Leviosa.

The Fleur Delacour

Ingredients:
4 oz. champagne or sparkling white wine
1/2 oz. Blue Curaçao
1/2 oz. Elderflower liqueur
1 sugar cube
Lemon for zest

Directions:
1. Zest lemon rind to create a 2”-3” piece of zest.
2. Place sugar cube in bottom of champagne flute.
3. Pour 1/2 oz. of Blue Curaçao and 1/2 oz. of Elderflower Liqueur over sugar cube.
4. Tilt the champagne flute at 45-degree angle and pour in one to two ounces of champagne into flute along the side of the glass, allowing the champagne to froth up without spilling over. Once the froth has subsided, keeping the flute tilted, pour the rest of champagne into the glass.
5. Add lemon zest and serve.
Chapter Summary

It's time for Severus, Draco and Ginny to finally leave for sanctuary; Hermione is having second thoughts.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

Chapter Sixty-Seven
"Free Bird"

Disclaimer: (In Greek: Google Translate)
Όλα τα αναγνωρίσιμους χαρακτήρες ανήκουν στην ΤΖ και συνεργάτες. Δεν παραβιάζει πνευματικών δικαιωμάτων προορίζεται.
All recognizable characters belong to JK Rowling and associates. No copyright infringement intended.

============

Hermione tossed and turned all night. She could see clearly in her mind’s eye the moment Severus’ door shut, when he would give the signal to Marf. Then all his books that he had hidden away, were brought back to his flat, to be packed away into an old handbag of Hermione's.

Severus was leaving disguised at her. She had given him everything he would need to wear on his journey from his flat to the Portkey Office at the Ministry. He would be traveling along with Draco – Polyjuiced to look like Harry – with Ginny by his side.

Ginny had ordered a Portkey, not for two for that Friday, but for three. She had told her husband,
Harry, that the Portkey was at 9:00 p.m., when in actuality, the Portkey for the three of them was at 9:00 a.m. Everyone at the Ministry who knew Harry, knew he was going on holiday with his wife soon, so there would be nothing amiss with seeing Mr. and Mrs. Potter strolling across the Ministry floor. All the Aurors would be about on a wild goose chase, so no one in Harry's department would be asking why he wasn't out and about. And "Hermione" would be along looking as if she was seeing two friends off.
Severus had suggested that – were Hermione to join them – she should bring a set of her husband's clothes and some bits of him, and Severus would transform into her husband instead. It wouldn't be much bother to add an extra person to a Portkey, since three were already going. Last-minute additions to holidays were common enough so that no one would question it otherwise.

That was the plan.

Hermione laid in bed staring at the ceiling and walls. She could find no peace; not when she opened her Greek language book, nor with a cup of calming herbal tea.

As the sun broke the horizon, a panic overtook Hermione. Her heart seemed to beat irregularly, as if it had been transformed into a bird trying to take flight. Sweat broke out along her hairline. Glancing at the clock, it was 7:49 a.m.

Her resolve broke, and she bolted for the bedroom and began looking for the set of clothes Ron had left behind, forgetting to pack it when she’d kicked him out of their flat. She had meant to return the clothes, giving the set to Lavender, but she had forgotten. Or it could have been she had forgotten on purpose.

As she found shoes, socks, trousers, shirt and an old cloak, she began to look for bits of Ron to add to the Polyjuice Potion.

Frantically, with her hands shaking, she searched for anything of Ron. His hair brush was gone and so was his toothbrush. She couldn't find anything of Ron, until in the back of her medicine cabinet she discovered his razor. Carefully, on a piece of parchment she tapped the razor, and to her delight found a few whiskers still clinging to the blade that came loose. Grabbing a small vial, she deposited the whiskers in it and Floo'ed directly over to the Red Ginseng.

~~~~~~~*~

Severus had finished casting the last of the illusionment charms to make it look as if none of his books were missing. The charms would hold for at least a week or until the Aurors showed up and ended the spell, revealing that his library was gone and definitely the bibliophile Death Eater as well.

Everything was packed into the bag Hermione had provided with an Extension Charm.

He dressed in his usual white shirt, black frock coat and trousers, boots and long black winter-weight wool cloak before joining Draco for their last parole meeting.
They stopped at the Twenty-four Blackbird Bakery, Draco with his habitual croissant, Severus with his usual brioche. There would be no more chance sightings of Hermione on Friday mornings along Diagon Alley.

Their boots echoed throughout the overcast morning air. There were no flowers blooming in the flower boxes above their heads. Soon the windows and lampposts would be festooned with evergreens and boughs of pine for the upcoming Christmas season. But for now, there was nothing but empty boxes beneath windows.

Kingsley began the parole meeting in the same way he always did. Once the official business was over, the Auror checked the room for any spying devices Moody might have sneaked in. Kingsley said he had a lead as to connections Pansy's murderer might have had within the Ministry, which might explain why he was let off despite being otherwise proven guilty without a doubt, short of a confession to the crime. Draco nodded mutely in response to this latest development.

Before they ended their meeting, Severus said, "We have another 'anonymous' tip."

Leaning forward, Kingsley said, "Really? What is it?"

"We overheard a Death Eater talking about fleeing the country today. I didn't see his face, but I saw a flash of the Dark Mark on his forearm. But he said something about leaving by ferry, boat, or large ship, willing to lower himself to leave by Muggle methods."

Kingsley sat forward in his chair, his face etched with serious concern. "Did he say which port?"

"No, but he said no one would have guessed it. So it could be a big port or small. I don't know," Severus said. "Liverpool, Dover, Plymouth. Could even be a small marina in a village for all we know."

"Thank you, Severus. I'll dispatch all the Aurors to every port right now and begin looking. If this pans out like your last tip, this might certainly help pave the way for Moody to stop being so suspicious of you both," Kingsley assured them.

'Not bloody likely, even if it was true,' Severus thought derisively.
As Severus and Draco crossed through the atrium of the Ministry, Aurors were Flooing in by the dozens, including Harry Potter who ignored the two cloaked figures moving in the opposite direction.

Back at his flat, Severus checked the time and noted it was an hour until their Portkey. Ginny would be back home at Number Twelve Grimmauld Place casting the incantation. Her wedding ring would be placed upon her marriage certificate to Harry Potter; once the incantation was complete, the ring would be broken in half, like two people bound together unbound. She had already penned her letter to Potter as to why she was leaving and Molly's part in keeping her and Draco apart. She and Potter had already talked in marriage counseling about how Molly had pushed them together, much like Ron Weasley was pushed into marriage with Hermione, but with the threats directed at Ginny instead and much more subtly.

Severus began undressing, neatly folding his clothes, which would be stored in a separate pocket of Hermione's cloak for easy and quick access once the Polyjuice Potion began to wear off. He glanced at the clock one more time.

The Polyjuice Potion had been completed the same day Ron Weasley returned from his trip, but this was the day Ginny had arranged for the Portkey. They had tried the Polyjuice Potion in the office space of The Siren's Secrets, resulting in Ginny transforming into a carbon copy of Draco Malfoy. Draco, the real one, was so thrilled, he swung Ginny, who now looked like him, up into a kiss. Hermione had provided her own hair, snipped into small pieces for easy inserting into the flasks and vials Severus had. Draco and Severus had several small bottles of the Polyjuice Potion. They were to wait until the last moment before adding bits of Hermione and Harry at the last minute, and then only at two vials at a time. The rest of each vial was to remain without the last ingredient, so that in haste, if they were followed quickly and identified, they could grab bits of hair from random people as they fled and transform into them if necessary to escape detection. There were even a few vials Ginny had with some hair from some random Muggle about her size, but with a badly dyed blond job, a larger nose, and a pair of thick lips.

Severus waited as long as he could in hopes that Hermione would change her mind and come. He could wait no longer. The Potions master added the small pieces of Hermione's brown hair to the vial and downed it in one go.

Watching in front of the mirror, he watched his nude form transform into Hermione's shorter and more feminine form. His hair grew out and began to spiral into her natural waves and curls, his nose shrank, breasts protruded and his penis shrank between his legs beneath a triangle-shaped patch of dark curls. Severus could have stood there all day long, but he had to go.

He began dressing, putting on a pair of pink underpants, followed by a brassiere that he had a little trouble hooking. Considering how many times he had taken one off of her and other women, it was harder to put one on. Then came the tights, which he spelled not to run, and her skirt, blouse, and shoes. Finally slipping the cloak on, he was done.

There in the mirror was a reflection of Hermione in her dingy blue navy blue cloak and dowdy blue skirt. He was glad she was finally getting rid of the unflattering outfit, along with the slightly over-washed blouse he’d hated from the first day he saw it on her. If anything, he would be less noticeable looking slightly frumpy in such garb as he entered the Ministry later.

Grabbing Hermione's bag, with his library, his favorite knives, clothes, armoire, and a few other personal items packed in it, he was ready to go.

The only thing that needed to be done was to toss all his masks into the fireplace. He saved the Casanova mask from their first meeting. Everything else was to be incinerated in the fireplace.

Marf had already given Severus a tearful goodbye and thanked him for being a kind Master, with the promise to take care of Mistress Hermione.

Grabbing the door handle, he looked back and waved his wand, ending the charm on his bed curtains which changed them from their perpetual black, back to registering various colors based on the shades of people's auras.

The bed curtains flashed and swirled in shades of pale yellow, indicating hopefulness.

The ex-Death Eater, former Hogwarts professor, spy and gigolo closed the door to his old life, now looking forward to a new one of his own choosing.

Hermione came through the Floo. She bolted out of Macnair's old flat and began to run up the stairs, two at a time, straining her legs in an attempt to reach Severus in time.

She spotted Ginny and “Harry” descending the stairs. “Harry” gave her a glare, his eyes flashing with anger behind his glasses.

Behind them stood a copy of herself, dressed in her old navy blue outfit.

Ginny and the copy of Harry Potter moved past Hermione as she stared past them at her own living Severus walked down the stairs to face her.

"I have Ron's clothes and bits of him," she excitedly blurted out.

Reaching into her pocket, she pulled out the one small vial containing some of Ron's old whiskers, but in her excitement, it slipped from her shaking hands.

The vial bounced against the wooden rail of the banister before cascading end over end. Neither Severus nor Hermione could reach their wands fast enough to stop the vial from falling before it hit the tiles in the lobby below with a high-pitched shattering crash, shards of glass spread all over the floor.

They could not retrieve the bits of Ron. Any attempt might mean contamination of anyone else's hair, including the odd mouse that scurried about. They couldn't risk it and it was almost time for their Portkey.

Hermione slumped onto the stairs, crying hysterically.

"I had it. I wanted to go," she wailed.

Severus bent down beside her and held her tightly. "I know," he said, her voice coming from his mouth instead of his soothing baritone.

They stood up, and Severus clasped Hermione's face in his hands that were small and calloused now. "I will see you again. I know it as well."

Hermione's eyes shone bright with tears, frustrated that Fate had chosen to keep them apart.

"I love you, Hermione. Thank you," he said and kissed her soundly.

It was strange to have a version of herself kissing her, as if something from a dream. She kissed him back knowing that underneath that bushy brown hair and soft form was the man she loved.

They broke apart and Hermione could see there were tears in her own eyes, knowing Severus was crying too. She had never seen him cry and now it was as a version of herself she finally saw it.

Severus continued down the stairs, joining Ginny and a very impatient looking version of Harry Potter.

Hermione stood there on the stairs unable to move. When she heard the Floo roar to life, she knew that he really was gone this time. There would be no more chances.

Trudging up the stairs, she opened the door to Severus' flat and sat on the settee.

Hermione had lost her sanctuary, as it was Severus who made it one for her. Now he was leaving to seek his own.

She would wait until nine o'clock before going into work. At that point, her copy would be far away and the brokenhearted witch would be alone.

Severus could almost hear the grinding of Draco's teeth as they walked across the floor in the atrium of the Ministry. Ginny walked beside Draco, holding his hand for support and to help calm him down. Severus could tell he was livid.

The Potions master walked behind the pair, having to walk much faster than he was used to; his legs – Hermione’s legs – were much shorter, and these heels made it more difficult to keep up with Draco's pace. It helped that Draco was now pretending to be Harry, which meant shorter legs for him as well. It was these small and inconsequential details that kept Severus’ mind focused on the task at hand – that he was finally fleeing England, but without Hermione by his side now. Severus forced the tears to stop, knowing he could mourn later.

Seeing her run up those stairs and tell him she was coming with him made his heart soar, which made the loss of the vial all the more tragic. As that vial broke, so did Severus' heart, knowing from the look on her face that she was resigned to stay behind now.

As they approached the Portkey Office in the Department of Magical Transportation, they noticed there was a bit of a line. Looking at the signs above there were two lines: one for scheduled and one for unscheduled Portkeys. The longer line was for impromptu requests, whereas the line for the pre-booked Portkeys was very short.

Had Hermione come with them, no doubt they would have had to wait in the unscheduled Portkey line, which would have delayed their flight from England. Draco turned around and gave Severus another glare, his head nudging towards the implication of waiting to add Hermione last-minute to their itinerary.

As it was, they were going to have to make more last-minute Portkeys along the way until they reached their final destination.

Going up to the front of the line, Ginny spoke first. "Yes, I have a scheduled Portkey for three at nine o'clock."

"Names?" the witch behind the counter asked.

"Harry and Ginny Potter, and Hermione Weasley," Ginny answered.

The witch behind the counter looked at the Polyjuice version of Hermione to look back down at the ledger, then back up to regard Severus again.

"Wow, talk about timing. When Mrs. Potter booked this, I bet you had no clue your husband was going to be leaving you soon anyway," the witch volunteered, offering up her own opinion when it was not asked for, nor wanted.

Severus held his tongue. Now would not be the best time to hex someone nor lambaste them in a way that was uncharacteristic for Hermione.

"This way," said the witch. She led them to a room with a small table in the middle of it.

On the table was a table fan. The Portkey Office tended to, but not always, match items in size to the number of people who would be traveling. A large party of twenty might require a lawn mower, couch, or an automobile fender. Since it was just going to be the three of them, a table fan sufficed for them to all grab at the same time.
"You have a ten-minute window in which to activate it, otherwise you'll have to go back in the unscheduled line if you change your mind last-minute," the witch informed them. She was citing standard protocols since there were some travelers who hemmed and hawed about going away, or forgot something back at home, and missed their scheduled window.

"I'll just close the door and be back in ten. Have fun, and don't get a sunburn," the witch said as she closed the door.

All three looked at each other. The Polyjuice Potion would hold for at least three hours until they needed another dose. They had already spent an hour in their altered form. They hoped one dose would be enough to get them there.

"Ready?" Severus said, hearing Hermione's own voice.

All three reached their hands out and touched the table fan.

Severus closed his eyes as he felt the old yet familiar pull of something grabbing him behind his navel and yanking him forward into an ethereal abyss.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter 67 A/N:
~o0o~ END of SEASON II ~o0o~

Come betas, take a bow! For this chapter, please thank JuneW and Cygnuz. And to all my betas who have worked on this since I picked this up again and started posting once more with Chapter Fifty-One: JuneW, who has been with me for years as a friend and an invaluable beta on every chapter since I started posting again; Hope, Cygnuz, Cytherea, who have made my work better with their keen eyes and raw SPAG talent; and Keladry Lupin/Rogue_Panda, another dear friend who betaed most of the chapters in the 50's who improved my work that I forgot to acknowledge in the A/N section at the time with JuneW.

Well, this really isn't so much a fanfic in clearly defined acts, but more serialized.
Think of this as a season cliffhanger of a serialized story, like a TV show. Besides, this isn't following any formula when it comes to acts. If we wanted to be more traditional, we could have had Act I end when Hermione figured out who Calleo really was.
So, where did Draco, Ginny and Severus go? Will Hermione follow? Does she even know where they are going? Will Hermione and Severus ever be reunited? Who murdered Pansy? And what is it with those damn lemons?

The title for this chapter is inspired by the Lynyrd Skynyrd song lyrics, “Free Bird,” written by Allen Collins and Ronnie Van Zant:
"I Left My Heart in San Francisco"

Chapter Summary

The clock is now ticking. Join our fleeing trio on their journey to sanctuary. Watch Severus try not to be frank with Frank.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Sixty-Eight
"I Left My Heart in San Francisco"

Disclaimer: (In California-speak)
You know, like, totally know that all the guys you might recognize and say, “Hey, I totally remember that guy from the books” is Rowling's stuff. So Rowling and all her peeps, they own it, 'kay? And, don't be all butt-hurt, 'cause no infringement is, like, meant or done, like, on purpose. Alright?

==============

The clock was ticking. Now that not only one, but two Death Eaters had left England without permission, alarms would be going off back at the Ministry where the Aurors normally sat at their desks. But since they were all out scouring the four corners of England, after an anonymous tip had warned them about a Death Eater fleeing, the alarms would be turned off and the attempt to find one Death Eater at some conventional Muggle port or marina would intensify. None would be suspecting that two Death Eaters had left via magical methods at the Ministry itself, right under their very noses.

As the trio of British travelers landed in the Portkey arriving area, they quickly moved aside and exited the area, should the next arrival land on top of them and knock them to the ground. It was common Portkey courtesy which most employed, but some forgot, similar to the way that some Muggles would not remember common courtesy when exiting and entering a Tube carriage.

Looking around, the trio glanced at the sign.

WELCOME TO THE CAYMAN ISLANDS
The Cayman Islands were a British Overseas Territory. Although they were closely tied to the Muggle and wizarding governments of the United Kingdom, there were some aspects that made them independent of said government entities; most notably their banking system.

Just as the Cayman Islands were a banking haven for many in the Muggle world, so it was for the wizarding world as well. And as the Malfoy fortune in the British Gringotts vaults had been seized by the British Ministry of Magic, the Malfoy family fortune in other Gringotts branches around the world were left intact, including the one Malfoy vault in the Cayman Islands.

Though Lucius Malfoy was a syphilitic lunatic who slowly went mad, his mind corrupted by a venereal disease and close association with the Dark Lord, he at least had the soundness of mind to make sure that the Malfoy fortune was dispersed about in various Gringotts vaults worldwide.

Now that the travelers had arrived in the country where one of those untouched vaults lay, Draco rushed off to take care of some banking matters while Ginny and Severus, still in Polyjuice form as Hermione, went to arrange another Portkey on to their next destination.

As luck would have it, being a popular banking haven meant that the Gringotts branch in this tiny island country opened extra early, usually in time with European branches. It stayed open late, closing at the same time as the Chicago Gringotts branches, U.S. Central Standard Time.

Ginny had taken some money from Lavender, a small deposit of the fortune Draco and Severus had amassed, and would use some of it to pay for the next Portkey. When things would die down back in England as to Severus' and Draco's disappearance, Miss Brown was going to make discreet transfers to some foreign Gringotts branches in the name of setting up some corporations abroad. It would be a convenient money-laundering operation to hide the money that Draco and Severus had earned during their unsanctioned work for Miss Brown that didn't involve peddling their flesh or company.

It was three o'clock in the morning. Since this tiny nation took travelers from all over the world, the Portkey office was fortunately open twenty-four hours, just like the one back in London.

Ginny and Severus were to wait before getting a Portkey, delaying until Draco returned from Gringotts, as the Goblins would no doubt ask why someone with the Malfoy vault key was asking for entrance and looked like Harry Potter. Draco could use the truth as part of the lie, stating he was going to a Polyjuice party, and even turned his wand and key over to the Goblin as identification. Draco even held aloft a small vial of Polyjuice Potion, which convinced the Goblin to allow Draco access to his vault and also allow for transfer of funds to a branch at their final destination. The Goblin was not aware of the Death Eater Decree back in England, and if he was, he would not care.

Once done, Draco raced back to the Portkey Office at the Ministry where Ginny and Severus were waiting.

Severus was relieved that Draco had needed a little less than an hour to take care of money matters. Draco even agreed to float Severus as much money as he needed until funds from Miss Brown could be finally accessed.

There was only one hour left on the effectiveness of the Polyjuice Potion, and they hoped it would be enough.

As they entered the line for unscheduled Portkeys, they had to wait behind a witch who was asking the wizard at the desk for recommendations, since she wanted to get away for a three-day weekend and wasn’t sure where to go.

Severus was tempted to suggest Azkaban or the Black Hole of Calcutta were lovely this time of year, but once again, he held his tongue.

Ginny stepped up and suggested some places in Italy, remembering some of the details Hermione shared about her honeymoon. The witch thanked her for the suggestion and quickly booked a trip there.

Draco let out a huge sigh of relief and muttered a quiet thanks to his lover for her quick thinking.

"Three Portkeys to San Francisco, California, please," Ginny said.

"Thanks!" the wizard behind the counter said with an exasperated sigh. "I didn't think she was ever going to make up her mind." He paused for a moment before asking, "Didn't you just come in?"

"Yeah, but we needed to take care of a few things here before we went to the States," Ginny replied, keeping it as vague as possible.

The wizard shrugged and arranged for a Portkey to take them in five minutes.
Grabbing hold of the shade of the table lamp that was used as a Portkey, all three of them were transported to the Portkey hub in San Francisco.

As they exited the arrival area, they heard music playing loudly on the other side of a door that led the way to the lounge and bar area.

Walking quickly over to the Portkey Office ticket window, they saw a sign that said, "Back at 2:00 a.m." The hand on the clock affixed to the window was counting down. It read 56 minutes, then 55 minutes.

Glancing at the clock on the wall, it was 1:05 a.m. They had just missed it. The trio would have to wait nearly an hour before the person who attended the window was due to return.

Their Polyjuice Potion dose would be wearing out about the time that the Portkey officer would return, and so they decided to wait a half an hour before taking a second dose in order to keep their current forms.

They had only one dose with pre-added bits of Harry and Hermione, and hopefully, they would not require a third dose. This was their last jump.

They could have taken a Portkey from London to their final destination, but that would have immediately indicated that something was severely amiss, and then everything would have been exposed. The jump to the Cayman Islands was to keep them within the British realm, which would minimize suspicions of Ginny's choice for a holiday with Harry. From there, they could jump to the United States, giving themselves a harder trail to follow, should Aurors be close behind. And a third Portkey away would make following that much more difficult to pinpoint.

With nothing to do but cool their heels, Ginny and Draco decided to hang out in the lounge and listen to the music that was playing, since it appeared there was a live band.

A sign by the door announced that tonight it was "Muggle Music Thursday." The other signs listed days such as "Classical Sunday," "Monday Wizard Blues," and "Tuesday Pot Luck" with finer print indicating that wizard and Muggle music were both played, Wednesday and Friday were wizard jazz nights, with Dixieland on Wednesday and cool jazz on Friday. Saturday had a variety of acts that came through with a schedule of upcoming bands.
It seemed that the music supplied six days of week for the Eye of the Pyramid Lounge was played by the band called “Tommy and his Two-Bit Strung Out Pluckers”; Tommy Donovan on piano and brass, Jimmy "Two-Bit" Hoar on drums and percussion, and Eustice Ernesto on guitar and strings.

As the door swung open, a wall of sound entered the waiting area, overwhelming Severus for a moment, making him place his hands over his ears momentarily in response to the sudden change in volume. The singer was belting out something about some white boy playing "that funky music 'till you die." The crowd was jumping up and down, swaying to the music as the deep bass guitar thumped in time to the drums.

Ginny and Draco went through the door and quickly joined in the swaying throng dancing to the 1970's disco funk. They were unfamiliar with the song, but doing anything they could to blend in with the crowd and appear normal.

Severus stayed behind to peruse the travel literature on a rack near the door. Amid the brochures, he saw advertisements for tours to wizard wineries and resort spas in the valleys between Napa and Sonoma, and areas further north, hidden from Muggles. There were tours for Muggle wineries with warnings that the International Statute of Wizarding Secrecy was still in effect no matter how much wine anyone sampled.

"Hmm," Severus mused aloud, "Potion gathering excursions," as he picked up one brochure arranging instructional ingredient collection tours with shaman wizards of various Native American tribes. He had always wanted to do a Potions sabbatical to Australia, but this also piqued his interest, should he be able to freely travel the world one day without persecution as Hermione promised.

There were regional tours to various tribes in different regions: Plains, Southwest, Pacific Northwest, Great Lakes, Texas, South, Appalachia, and New England.

"What the...?" Severus plucked up one that touted Muggle Camp.

Ever want to learn how to drive? Watch television? Fly in a plane? You can at MUGGLE CAMP

A one-week all-inclusive experience where you can try to learn and do everything the Muggle way.

Itinerary includes:
- Cooking lesson and how to cook with a Muggle stove
- Trip to a movie theater
- Lesson on how to ride a bicycle
- Instructions on how to use a telephone and cellular phone
- Driving lessons with a certified driving instructor
- A trip in a twin-prop airplane at some locations
- Surf lessons available at some locations
- Introduction to Muggle electricity and devices including computers, the Internet and electronic mail
- Access to television programming every night and Muggle board games

Contest and prizes for who can go the longest without using their wands

Book now for winter snow camping to experience how tough the Muggle pioneers had it!

Severus put the brochure back with a shake of his head, brown tendrils of Hermione's long hair swaying.

Looking at the clock, it was nearly time for Draco and him to take another Polyjuice Potion dose. Entering the lounge area, he scanned his eyes about, trying to look for a redhead standing next to a wizard with a black mop.

Had he not been Polyjuiced into being Hermione, he could have spotted them easier. As it was, he was now several inches shorter and had trouble seeing over the crowd, much less through it.

Winding his way through the jostling and bouncing witches and wizards singing along to Muggle songs, he spotted the two at the front of the stage. They were dancing along with the rest of the crowd, enjoying themselves. Draco was unaware of Severus approaching, until he tapped his hand upon his shoulder.

Just then the song finished, so he didn't have to shout as loud into Draco's ear that it was time to go take another dose of Polyjuice. The plan was to go to the toilets, find a stall, and down a vial away from prying eyes curious as to what each wizard was taking, and possibly asking if he had whatever he was taking to share.

As Severus was about to turn and walk towards the toilets, Tommy Donovan said, his voice amplified with the Sonorus Charm, "This song is for the beautiful brunette in the dark blue at the front of the stage."

Severus suddenly realized that all eyes were fixed on him and Tommy Donovan was looking right at him, giving him a wink before launching into song.

"She's got big red lips
She's got big brown eyes
When she treats me right
It's a big surprise
She won't do anything
That she said she would
She makes me feel good
She makes me feel good..."

Severus glared at the crooner with a bored look and promptly turned around and stomped off towards the loo, Draco following right behind while Ginny stayed at the front of the stage, bursting into fits of laughter.

The older Death Eater was so irritated that he had been come on to while in female Polyjuiced form, he almost went into the "Men's Restroom."

Draco fortunately grabbed him firmly by the back of Hermione's cloak and pointed him over to the "Ladies' Restroom."

'Why would someone need to rest?'

Severus shrugged over the local language dialect and went inside. Once in a stall by himself, he downed his second dose with bits of Hermione's hair in it. He felt the similar ripple sensation course through his veins, noting that he continued to remain looking the same. Severus flushed the toilet to make it appear as if he'd used it for its intended purpose and went to wash his hands.

The witch next to him, who was reapplying her make-up and readjusting her breasts in her brassiere to make them seem fuller and more globulous, remarked, "Boy, Tommy must be sweet on you. He doesn't sing that song for just anyone."

Severus had the distinct feeling that Tommy often used that song to woo some witch and bed her later, something that would definitely not be happening if it involved Severus.

Walking back out into the lounge area where the song dedicated to him was wrapping up, Severus looked out to observe the view.

The Portkey office and neighboring bar and lounge were in a basement of a former French restaurant located on a discreet alley between Post and Sutter, half a block from Union Square. The restaurant had closed down ages ago, complete with old brick front and tattered striped awning, and was a front for the current wizarding hub of San Francisco. The "window" Severus was looking out of was charmed to reflect the view from the top of the Transamerica Pyramid, which was located six blocks away as the owl flies.
It was raining, which seemed counter to the reputation of California being always sunny. California had a Mediterranean climate, which mean rain in the winter and dry the rest of the year, so it made sense that it was pouring down as it was right at the beginning of their rainy season.

As if reading Severus’ mind, Tommy began to sing about how, "It never rains in California."

Severus was wondering if this was Tommy's way of trying to flirt with him while he was in Hermione's form, noticing "her" observing the rain out the charmed window.

Turning around, Severus saw Ginny and Draco had joined the others in singing the song’s refrain, the lyrics simple and uncomplicated, their arms around each other and surrounding strangers, swaying side-to-side.

Severus went to the bar and ordered a stiff drink. The wizard next to him offered to pay for it, to which Severus just replied with a polite but brusque, "Thank you, but no."

When the song wrapped up, Tommy decided to take requests from the audience. Someone shouted a request for the Rolling Stones, another asked for Madonna, while someone else shouted for Red Hot Chili Peppers. Severus had never heard of any of these bands, and he didn't care. A lot of this music sounded as obnoxious as the music that Hermione initially played on the car radio during their weekend away until he'd found the classical music station.

For some reason, Tommy must have taken Severus' cool indifference for teasing and said, "Why don't we take a request from the young witch at the bar with the drink in her hand."

Severus swore to himself that if he ever again had to go about in public in Polyjuice form, it would never be as a female as long as he lived. He wondered if Hermione and other witches had wizards picking up on them so regularly, but he suspected that it was just his lucky night he’d caught the eye of this piano-banging wizard who just happened to have the attention of the whole room focused directly on him.

"I Left My Heart in San Francisco."

It was the only Muggle song he could bring to mind, and it was the song Hermione and he danced to during lessons. She had told him about the little snow globe her parents had bought her from a souvenir shop, probably purchased just a few blocks away from where Severus was sitting right now. That song had unofficially become their song.

A small complaint rose through the crowd, one person saying, "Not again!"

Tommy calmed the grumbling crowd when he said, "Now, now. We haven't played it in a few weeks, and I think we can humor the Australian witch at the bar, since she's obviously a tourist and was hoping to hear it. Besides, it's time for a slow dance."

The piano began tinkling out notes that filled the room as he began to sing.

"The loveliness of Paris seems somehow sadly gay
The glory that was Rome is of another day
I've been terribly alone and forgotten in Manhattan
I'm going home to my city by the bay..."

Severus wondered if Tommy got the right song, since the version on Lavender's music box didn't include the intro, when Tommy began to croon sweetly.

"I left my heart in San Francisco..."

Now Severus could recognize the song's melody. It had become a particular favorite of Hermione's when they danced the foxtrot at his flat over the past several months.

He gazed at the window, wishing he could dance with Hermione right now as the couples did, swaying back and forth to the slow rhythm of piano, a soft snare drum, and gentle strings of the violin. Draco and Ginny were dancing, her head placed upon his shoulder, and they moved to and fro.

As the song ended, the crowd erupted into cheers like they did at the end of most songs, a little romance thrown into the night's play list.

"Another request," Tommy called out.

"Free Bird!" someone shouted.
The crowd chanted, "Banned! Banned! Banned!"

Tommy pointed to the sign that hung behind his piano that read in large, bold letters,

```
NO REQUESTS FOR FREE BIRD
MARGARITAVILLE
MUSTANG SALLY
BROWN-EYED GIRL

ANY REQUEST FOR THESE SONGS
RESULTS IN IMMEDIATE BANNING
FOR THE NEXT 24 HOURS
```

Tommy threw a ball at the wizard's head who had shouted out the offending request. The man was immediately Portkeyed to some unknown place, most probably the buffalo enclosure in the middle of Golden Gate Park.

A witch with vibrant green hair shouted, "Rock Your Body!"

The trio began playing some music that seemed to place more emphasis on a droning mindless beat and little melody. Severus had had enough. He threw a Galleon in the tip jar for the band in a show of gratitude that, despite protestations from the crowd, Tommy had still played his request. At least in the waiting room the sound would be greatly diminished, and he could see how much time was left before the Portkey office was open again.

Upon entering the waiting room, he saw a wizard place his wand at the lock to the Portkey office and unlock it to enter it. Severus hoped the wizard, who was at least five stone overweight and was sporting a week's worth of facial hair growth, would take down the sign that he would be back later, but he just went to sit at his desk behind the counter, pulled a burger out of a brown paper bag, and began eating.

Severus stared as the Portkey officer paid him no mind. The wizard was shoving the overly-large comestible into his gaping maw before taking a bite – not noticing the slice of avocado that was slipping out the side of his burger, nor the piece of bacon that didn't quite make it all the way into his gob – chewing with his mouth open. There was something dark brown that smelled like barbecue sauce that dribbled down from the corner of his mouth; Ginny had given Severus a bottle of the American condiment after Harry's birthday party to try, and he identified it by the color and scent.
Had this been Severus' first encounter with an American, he would have instantly agreed with Lucius Malfoy's derisive remarks that those former colonists across the pond were uncouth slobs who probably picked their teeth with their own wands.

To Severus' horror, the wizard took his wand out and did just that. He unhinged his mouth like a snake and shoved it way back amidst his tonsils, probably to dislodge the slop from the trough he'd gorged himself on earlier.

To make matters worse, the Portkey officer finally bothered to notice Severus, Polyjuiced as Hermione, and noted how "she" was staring at him with rapt attention. The wizard wiped his barbecue sauce-soiled hand down the front of his ratty faded red T-shirt, adding to the other colors of the wizard's previous meals visible on the shirt's mottled, spotty palette. It looked more like a bib than a T-shirt at this point. The shirt had the phrase "Which Wand, Witch?" printed on it, an obvious come-on line from long ago that had gone out with bell bottoms and disco. The shirt looked so old due to the faded letters from too many washings, it probably was decades old. The wizard winked at him, mistaking Severus' stare of disbelief for interest.

Severus checked the countdown clock on the window. There was still five minutes more. He debated sitting in the same room as this first cousin to a Mountain Troll, versus having Tommy announce more pick-up lines in front of the rest of the packed lounge.

The fleeing Death Eater decided two hundred witches and wizards in a darkened room staring at him was better that waiting one more minute with this monstrosity. Besides, it was almost time to fetch Draco and Ginny.

As the patrons clapped while singing, "Don't stop believing," Severus found Draco and Ginny in the middle of the crowd, and thankfully not next to the stage. He flashed his hand, indicating there were five minutes left.

They nodded and began heading through the crowd towards the waiting area, which also held the window for the Portkey office.

As they neared the door, Severus hissed in Draco's ear, "Quick, pretend you're my boyfriend."

Before Draco could ask what was going on, Severus clasped Draco's hand tightly and plastered on a sweet smile that even Ginny had a hard time believing as they entered the waiting room.
Just as they walked in, the countdown timer on the window finished and the wizard with the heavily food-stained shirt rose from his desk. Waving his wand, the sign and clock disappeared, and he charmed the glass partition to slide aside.

Seeing that the brunette hottie was taken, since it appeared she was with her boyfriend, the wizard focused his leer on the red-headed smokin' babe in front of him.

"And how can I help you?" he asked, his voice sounding a bit too helpful for a government employee.

"Three Portkeys to Hawaii," Ginny said.

"I can get you a Portkey back to New Zealand directly, if you're heading home," the Portkey officer said, assuming they were from yet another British Commonwealth. Australia, New Zealand, whatever.

"No, Hawaii is where we want to go," she insisted.

"Okay, fine. Which island?"

"Malu Palekaiko."

The unkempt wizard who smelled of grease and beer gave Ginny a second glance, suspicion beginning to etch his brow and narrow his eyes.

She turned on the charm and purred in a sultry manner, "When I come back through here next week, how about you and me go out for a bite?"

This seemed to take the wizard's mind off of any question as to why they wanted to go to an island known for sanctuary rather than one of the major islands instead, like the Big Island or Oahu, even though Malu Palekaiko had a larger wizarding population compared to the other islands. Most wizards and witches went to the major islands for vacations when Portkeying there.

After the wizard gave Ginny some contact information hastily scrawled on a torn-off piece of parchment, she said she was looking forward to it as she paid for their trip.

All the while, Draco did not yank his hand out of Severus', as much as he wanted to. He understood why Severus was desperate to have him pretend they were attached. And Ginny was so much better, and far more practiced, when it came to turning on the feminine wiles to beguile a wizard, even one as slovenly as the cretin behind the counter.

Severus would have said something acerbic and most probably make the wizard consult a dictionary after they left. The wizard did have a name badge on that said "Frank" that Severus was going to take as a literal suggestion and be so with him.

From under his desk, the cretin grabbed a box of half-eaten double-fudge cream center “cookies,” smudged with half-dried mustard, and transformed into a last-minute Portkey.

As the three of them grabbed onto this excuse for a Portkey, Ginny gave the officer one last wink before they disappeared.

Looking around, the three hoped they had reached the right spot, questioning Frank's competency based upon his hygiene habits and charm alone. The waxing gibbous moon was about an hour and a half past the celestial meridian, indicating that they were at the right longitude.

Behind them the ocean lapped at the moonlit silvery sands, the soft reassuring sounds of small waves gently crashing mixed with the raucous chorus of frogs from the jungle in front of them. It was a wall of darkness that loomed up at the edge of the moonlit sand, the jungle and a single large mountain looking black in contrast to the night's star-filled sky. The light of the moon glinted off the palm fronds that lightly swayed as if in a trance.

The weather was warm and they removed their cloaks, feeling the humid breeze against their cheeks.

The only light was a small porch light by the door of a simple one-room thatched hut at the edge of the sand, perched beyond the jungle that looked like it was about to swallow it.

Walking over the sand seemed to want to envelop their boots, they finally got up onto the porch and saw three signs with bells hanging below them, ropes dangling.
"Lumos."

All of the signs were in Hawaiian.

Severus tapped his wand on each and they changed to English.

The first one read, "For Portkey passage through, please ring."

The second one read, "If this is your final destination and are visiting, please ring."

The third one read, "If you are seeking sanctuary, please ring."

They all looked at each other, Severus' wand light giving everyone's face a pale blue-white cast. Severus reached out and pulled down on the rope hanging from a brass bell underneath the third sign.

As the clapper struck against the bell, a large man in a batik-printed sarong and a simple, clean T-shirt, who was nearly the size of Hagrid, instantly appeared on the front porch next to them.

"Oh, man, what time is it?" he asked, rubbing his bleary eyes with the back of his hand.

"Eleven o'clock, or thereabout," said Severus, the Polyjuice Potion still working. Severus thought there was a three-hour difference from San Francisco, as his Muggle books Ginny got him said so.

The huge wizard looked down to spy the trio standing there. "All three of you are seeking sanctuary?"

They all answered in the affirmative.

"Oh, man, Gary isn't gonna like this, but I better get him," he muttered to himself before Summoning this Gary.
An older Asian-looking wizard in a pair of shorts, who was in the midst of taking off his Hawaiian shirt, appeared next to the giant wizard.

"What the... Why the hell..." the smaller, older wizard began, but stopped short when he realized that there were three people on the front porch besides the wizard who had Summoned him there.

"Three?" Gary asked.

"Yep," the larger wizard replied, popping the "p" at the end at accent his attitude.

"Well, better get Halulu."

"Naw, man. I ain't gonna get her. You can catch shit from her for gettin' her out of bed. I ain't gonna do it anymore," the bigger wizard refused.

Glancing at the three of them, Gary said, "Maybe I should get another witch from the council, or do one of you ladies not mind being questioned by a wizard?"

Severus raised his hand. "I'm a wizard," he stated plainly.

Gary looked at him with disbelief until Severus explained with two words: "Polyjuice Potion."

"Ahh," Gary said with understanding. "Okay, hang on a second, let me go get the other person and we can begin."

A minute later, a woman in her thirties appeared next to them. She had a long fall of dark brown hair that went past her waist, and was hastily putting some sandals on as she mumbled, "Can't wait a minute while I get some shoes on?"

Looking at Gary and the larger wizard, she said, "This better be good."
"Three for sanctuary," Gary explained.

"Three, Mounga?" Halulu asked the giant wizard for confirmation.

"Yep," he said once more, popping the "p" at the end again.

"Well, we'd better get started," the older witch asked. "Which one of you witches is going to go with a wizard for questioning?"

"That one's Polyjuiced," Mounga said, pointing to Severus, who still looked like Hermione.

"All right then. Let's get this over with and hopefully we'll be done before sunrise," Halulu said, her tone indicating her disgruntled attitude over the fact she would probably be denied a good night's sleep.

Halulu placed her wand against the knob of the door to the hut, and a click could be heard. She opened the door. Inside was a large space with a well-appointed waiting area with a corridor off to the side with several doors.

"Who do you want, Gary?" Halulu asked.

"I don't know." Gary turned to look at Severus and Draco. "Which one of you wants to spill your guts out to me? 'Cause it's me or him, boys." Gary jerked a thumb over at Mounga.

"I'll go with him," Severus volunteered, pointing to Mounga. The mountainous wizard was the least verbal of the bunch, and that suited Severus just fine.

Mounga went to fetch something from behind the counter and handed a small vial to each of his associates. Each one seeking sanctuary was then escorted to their own door along the corridor and bid to enter, followed by their inquisitors.

The room was bare and near gleaming white all around.
Mounga made some movements with his wand and a table and two chairs appeared. A toilet formed out of the wall in the corner with a small privacy screen, and another screen popped up in the other corner, forming a dressing area for some privacy when Severus would change back. It did not escape Severus' attention that the screens were placed in such a way that during interrogation that Mounga would not lose sight of him, but they would still afford some privacy.

Severus hung Hermione's cloak on a hook that appeared on the wall near the door and took a seat opposite of Mounga.

"Please place your wand and everything in your pockets on the table, please," Mounga asked politely.

Severus placed his wand on the table before fetching the cloak off the hook he had just placed. From the cloak's pockets, he removed the set of clothes he would change into once the Polyjuice Potion wore off, a few extra vials of Polyjuice, the lemon that Hermione had given him, and her handbag.

Mounga waved his wand once more, and a glass with water appeared. From the front breast pocket of Mounga's T-shirt, he pulled out a small vial.

Holding it for Severus to see, he said, "This is Veritaserum. I assume you know what it does?"

Severus nodded.

"Now, by law, you asked for sanctuary, and I must give it to you. However, in order to know what type of people are coming into our community, we'd like to know what you are fleeing from. Some people, it's an obsessive lover or violent spouse; others it's because of laws they have broken; some for political reasons and they are a target of their government. But we've had a few come hear seeking sanctuary that have done some pretty gruesome crap, and they thought that they could continue on with their... habits. As such, we'd like to know why you're here."

Severus nodded once more that he understood.

"Should you prove to be a wizard..." Mounga paused as his eyes looked Severus up and down still in feminine Polyjuice form. "... who might prove disruptive to our community, we will encourage you to set up house in the more remote areas of the island, and you'll be closely watched. We don't want trouble from you, and we won't give you trouble."
The Potions master understood the gravity of his statement.

"I can't force you to take this," Mounga began, but stopped short when Severus gave a derisive snort. Mounga cocked an eyebrow at Severus before continuing. "Well, technically, I can't force you, but should you agree to taking the Veritaserum and telling me everything, that will certainly make things smoother, should you want buy a house, have people willing to do business with you and such..." He trailed off implying that if Severus agreed to tell this wizard everything, life would go smoothly.

"A confession under duress?" Severus asked, his tone a bit cool.

"Well, let's say you don't take it. We don't know if you're a mass murderer. People will wonder why you didn't take it. Are you such a horrible person that you refuse to take it?" Mounga gave a great sigh and leaned forward, his meaty arms resting on the table. "If you're worried about everyone knowing your past, don't worry. I am bound to keep confidential what you say here in this room during your processing for sanctuary. I cannot tell anyone. But should you commit a crime that would go to trial, I am allowed to bring up your past crimes as proof that this is a past behavior you have engaged in that has not ceased, and if you pose a danger to our community, then you can get expelled from even here. You can go pay those Greeks to take you, and good luck with that."

Severus reached his hand out for the glass of water, as Mounga poured the Veritaserum in it. He would soon know if killing his wife would make him live as an outcast among outcasts.

As the water slid down his throat, he could feel the familiar sensation. He could feel his body relax and the desire to tell Mounga any and everything.

"Now, if there anything else besides these items on this table in your pockets or that you're hiding on your person?" the interrogator asked.

"No," Severus answered truthfully.

"Let's start with your name," Mounga said as Severus' lengthy confession began.

Chapter End Notes
A/N:

I have to be honest. I had a lot of fun writing the character, Frank. Almost too much fun.

Point of note, I wrote this chapter nearly two years ago, long before Rowling came out with her recent “History of Magic of North America” essay on Pottermore. Any resemblance between what she wrote and what I wrote in this chapter and going forward in this story is purely coincidental.

Thank you to my betas for this chapter, JuneW and Cygnuz.

Yes, I have an exact place in mind for the Eye of the Pyramiud Lounge. It's just just as I described, as there is an closed down French restaurant located at 44 Campton Place on a small alley-like street in San Francisco.

"Play That Funky Music" was written by Rob Parisso and recorded by Wild Cherry.

"She Makes Me Feel So Good" was composed and performed by Lyle Lovett

"It Never Rains in Southern California" was written by Albert Hammond and Mike Hazelwood

"I Left My Heart in San Francisco" was written by George Cory, and most popularly performed by Tony Bennett as his signature song. To see a lovely rendition of this song performed in a video, please watch this rendition on YouTube: "Union Bank of California promo. Beautifuly danced by Na Lei Hulu I Ka Wekiu. SF own local halau, lend their talking hands to the story of the city by the bay."  https://youtu.be/JCMj2U3xj7s

Considering Severus goes through San Francisco and requests this song and winds up in Hawaii, I thought this video was rather fitting. You even get a peek of the Transamerica Pyramid in the background.

"Rock Your Body" was written by Justin Timberlake, Chad Hugo, and Pharrell Williams, and performed by Timberlake.
"Don't Stop Believing" was written by Jonathan Cain, Steve Perry & Neal Schon, and performed by Journey.

Malu is the Hawaiian word for "safe." Palekaiko means "paradise." The island they finally Portkeyed to translates into "Safe Paradise."

As for sanctuary being located in Hawaii, the inspiration for sanctuary in this fic come from the City of Refuge on the Big Island of Hawaii that I visited myself a long, long time ago (and recently in April 2015 again) and remembered. Here is some information about this place:

“In ancient times, Hawaiians lived under strict laws. Commoners could not get too close to the chief, nor were they allowed to touch any of his possessions, walk in his footsteps or even let their shadows touch the royal grounds. The penalty for violating a sacred kapu (taboo) was death.

“Breaking a kapu was believed to incur the wrath of the gods. Hawaiians often chased down an offender and swiftly put him to death unless he could reach a puuhonua, or place of refuge. There he could be absolved by a kahuna (priest) in a purification ceremony, then return home with his transgression forgiven. Defeated warriors and non-combatants could also find refuge here during times of battle.”

Five stone converts to 70 pounds.

Halulu is a Hawaiian girl's name meaning "to roar, thunder, loud noise, racket."

Mounga is a Polynesian boy's name, meaning "mountain," pronounced mo-oon-gah.
Chapter Summary

Chapter Sixty-Nine: "Aloha" Severus and the two love birds find accommodations in their new home. Harry confronts Hermione regarding her knowledge of Ginny's affair with Malfoy, and her own affair with Snape.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Sixty-Nine
"Aloha"

Disclaimer: (In Hawaiian)
Kēlā mea ‘ike po’e mana’o no JK Rowling a ‘ohana holo’oko’a. ‘A’ole ‘ai.hue mana’o kūlia.
(All recognizable characters belong to JK Rowling and associates. No copyright infringement intended.)

Hermione showed up to work at nine o'clock sharp, certain that Severus was, at that very moment, going to places far and away from her. She still didn't know where he was going, and perhaps it was best she didn't until she cleared his and Draco's name.

As she passed the reception desk where a house-elf greeted her, the heart-broken witch grabbed a sample vial of the Lovely Lavender's Puffy Poof Eye Crème and dabbed some around her eyes in the lift. She was in desperate need of it after her sleepless night and her recent hysterical breakdown upon dropping the only vial of Ron's hair she had, destroying her chance of leaving with Severus.

Just as Hermione was about to knock on Albert's office door, Lavender came out into the hallway and called her into her office to speak with her privately.

Her employer had a full tea service ready and waiting. There were miniature croissants, butter, jams, tiny quiches one could eat with one bite, and fresh fruit.
"I wasn't sure if you had breakfast before coming in," Lavender began.

Hermione shook her head that she hadn't, looking quite despondent at the moment. She had been too preoccupied thinking about Severus and then rushing to meet him at the last moment that she hadn't gotten around to eating.

Lavender gestured her hand towards the miniature buffet, to which Hermione declined, only accepting a cup of tea instead.

"Since the papers will be screaming headlines about two escaped Death Eaters by the time Monday morning rolls around – or possibly sooner – I have a suggestion as to distract from the news," Lavender began.

Hermione let an unladylike snort escape. "That news will be hard to beat. What do you suggest?"

"Well, I think you, Ron and I should sit down with Luna Lovegood, and give her an exclusive into your divorce from Ron, and our affair."

The beginnings of a headache began to build at the base of Hermione's neck. She asked for a vial of headache relief potion, which Wonkle promptly provided.

"What do you mean, 'give her an exclusive'? Isn't it bad enough everyone knows Ron and I are divorced now? Isn't your reputation tarnished enough – and justly so," Hermione threw in bitterly, "that an exclusive article will do what? Satisfy the prurient curiosity of our salacious affairs to the public at large?"

"The article will detract from the fact that two Death Eaters have just escaped from England, and therefore reduce pressure from the Ministry on us," Lavender stated.

"Think about it," the blonde witch explained, "the Ministry does not want to look bad that two Death Eaters escaped at the same time. If anything, they will want to keep it quiet. The recent murder of Pansy Parkinson and her joke of a trial were kept pretty quiet in the papers, wouldn't you say?"

Hermione did notice that the stories of Pansy's murder trial did tend to be buried further back in the paper than on the front page, whereas her news deserved to be read, and not even the murder
"If we give an exclusive to Luna which comes out on Monday, it will cause people, who have only so much free time and a limited attention span, to focus on us rather than on Draco and Severus." Lavender paused to take a sip of tea and eat a miniature quiche in one bite before resuming her explanation. "The Ministry will no doubt be glad that our story will draw the heat away from them and public pressure regarding Death Eaters, since many of the Death Eaters have been dying over the years in ways the wizarding population is less than proud of and the Ministry has swept under the rug dismissively. And if people are distracted by a story about a love triangle, it means less pressure on the Ministry. Less pressure on the Ministry means less pressure on me, as I was the escaped Death Eaters' employer, and possibly less pressure on you, should you be linked to their disappearance in any way, though we've tried to engineer it so that would be hard to do."

The Potions apprentice noted the key word here was "try." Severus and Lavender may have tried to obscure Hermione's link to them, but only time would tell if they succeeded.

Reluctantly, Hermione agreed. She felt as if there was no other option. The press had already assumed much about her in the few stories she did bother to read about her divorce; much of it was pure conjecture and speculation, so she guessed it would be better to set the record straight in a way that would suit her purpose as well. If anything, she would use it as a platform against marriages where Muggle-born and half-blood witches and wizards who were unaware of the magical binding properties of having children would become informed of such risks. Had she been informed that such powerful magic could kill you with a divorce, then she would have definitely waited to marry Ron, or even break off their engagement.

Lavender sent an owl off to Luna offering an exclusive interview Saturday, to be published Monday.

Once it was settled, Hermione rose to start work for the day.

Before she left, Lavender said, "If there is anything I can do to help you clear Severus' and Draco's name, let me know."

Hermione replied with a weary thanks, her heart and her body feeling heavy.

Ginny was the first to finish with her interview. She had begun her story about how she'd dreamed of Harry Potter when she was a young witch with a bad crush. From there she went on to explain about her first year with Tom Riddle's Diary, as that experience later on helped her form a bond with Draco. There was her long pining for Harry Potter, his famous story, and the background about how her mother had encouraged Harry not to court Ginny during the war. Molly did not want Ginny to suffer worse should she and Harry fall in love and then for the Boy Who Lived to die.
Ginny knew it was her mother's way of trying to protect her only daughter and youngest child.

The young witch went on to tell about, having given up and moved on from her crush with Harry, she had fallen in love with Draco during the war and their growing affections. Here her story became more tragic. It was with the ending of the war the love between her and Draco bloomed, and then immediately following Hermione's wedding the Death Eater Decree was declared.

There were relevant details into her marriage which showed how she didn't want to marry Harry, but was pressured from her mother. There was also the story Harry told her about how Molly had egged him on to court and propose to her; Ginny related what her husband had confessed during their marriage counseling sessions.

The tale went on to include how Lavender had arranged to put Draco and Ginny back together, Draco's seamy "profession" and their rendezvous, and subsequent discovery by Hermione. From there the tale moved forward to include how Hermione had helped with the procurement of Polyjuice Potion ingredients and working around the legal restrictive aspects of certain Potion ingredients after the war. While Ginny didn't go into details about her and Draco's intimate moments, there was no question about their affair, nor their love for one another and her reasons for fleeing with him. There was nothing that Ginny omitted, compelled by the Veritaserum, and even then, without that Potion, she was willing to tell it all.

After a few hours, Ginny was done. Halulu did a cursory spell to make sure Ginny was indeed not pregnant, as it sometimes took a few days for symptoms to appear in a normal detection spell. If Ginny was pregnant, she would live throughout the pregnancy, but die shortly after delivery, just like Tom Riddle's mother.

Once confirmed that the redhead was indeed free and clear of her ex-husband without complications, Halulu shook Ginny's hand and welcomed her to Malu Palekaiko. Halulu even invited the young witch to come perform one of her belly dance routines at the luau on Saturday, since Halulu ran a hula school and was interested in seeing a new type of dance at the community party.

The elder witch assured her it would be a great chance to meet others in the community and break the ice.

Ginny stepped out onto the porch to enjoy the night, but she quickly went back in as a storm system had moved in over the past couple hours and there was a downpour of rain that would probably be brief. Meanwhile, she sat in the foyer inside, waiting for Severus and, most importantly, her lover. It would be a couple more hours until Draco would emerge.
Draco almost balked at taking the Veritaserum, but relented. He had a bad enough experience with the stuff dispensed by Mad-Eye Moody. What was ironic was that Mad-Eye Moody never used it to get a confession from Draco or Severus regarding the accusation of killing Dumbledore or letting the Death Eaters into Hogwarts. Draco, as well as Severus, had offered to prove their innocence with Veritaserum, but Moody had refused, using his unproven suspicions as evidence to damn them both under the Death Eater Decree.

Still, Draco had relented and drank it down, spilling every secret he had, even some he had not told to Ginny or Severus. Every last detail from his reluctance to accept the Dark Mark, down to his altered appearance with the Ageing Potion at the Ministry of Magic's Halloween masked ball and dancing with Ginny right under Potter's nose. He described his work on the sly doing advertising and marketing for Lavender Brown, and his cover work as a gigolo.

At one point, the Polyjuice Potion wore off and Draco barely had enough time to get out of Potter's clothes before growing back into his taller, larger form. There was no privacy screen for Draco since he and his inquisitor were both wizards, and he was not transforming across genders like Severus.

Gary seemed to understand that this young wizard was forced into a situation not of his choosing, despite being eager to become a Death Eater like his father in his formative years. At the end, the older wizard clapped Draco on the back and gave him some encouraging words; he told him he would fit in fine, since Draco seemed like a normal wizard who just wanted a nice quiet life with Ginny. Gary welcomed Draco to their little patch of paradise in the Pacific, and handed him a packet with some basic literature about local laws and customs, along with a list of merchants and services they might need to help settle into their new life.

Exiting from his interrogation room, Draco was relieved to find Ginny sitting in the waiting room reading her own relocation packet and making notes in the margins and on the free notepad.

They rushed into each other's arms and kissed fiercely. Tears began to stream down Ginny's cheeks as Draco continued to hold her tightly; neither could hardly believe that they were free to be together now.

Halulu, who had waited with Ginny, nudged Gary in the ribs and said, "Ahh, to think, we were that young once."

"I was never that young, and my wife was never that hot looking, but don't tell Iolana I said that or I might just find my balls in a jar on the mantle again," Gary joked quietly.
"Come on now," Halulu protested, "when you married her, you said she was the most beautiful witch you have ever laid eyes on."

"Yeah, I know. I'm just kidding." Gary sighed deeply. "But I love her just as much, if not more than the first day I met her." Nodding towards the young couple still locked in an embrace, he added, "I hope these two have a marriage as wonderful as what Iolana and I have."

"If they do, I'll be sure to tell Draco how to reverse that castration hex," Halulu threw back.

It was almost dawn before Severus had told Mounga everything. He was exhausted, having had additional doses of Veritaserum, since each dose only lasted for one hour.

About half-way through the interview, the Polyjuice Potion wore off and Severus excused himself behind the screen to allow the transformation back to his old self and dress himself in his regular clothes.

When Severus was done talking, Mounga shook his head and said with pity, "Man, that's just fucked up."

Severus was grateful the Mounga was mostly silent during his lengthy confession, only speaking to ask for a little clarification on some history and people he was not familiar with. Even Mounga knew who Dumbledore was, so it cut down some time, but not much.

"So you regret killing your wife?" Mounga asked.

"Every day of my life," Severus answered truthfully, still under the effects of the Veritaserum. Whoever brewed it was a talented Potions master, as it was very potent.

"And you have no intention of doing any Death Eater type stuff any more?"

"Was I not clear enough of my regrets and how I was forced to do some things for the war under the direction of Dumbledore?" Severus asked back, being more truthful than sarcastic in his
"Just checking, man." Mounga gave Severus a slightly worried look and asked, "And you don't want to do any more of that gigolo stuff?"

Severus gave him a glare back that it was pretty obvious he didn't. Although he did admit that he'd initially enjoyed having a bevy of witches in his bed over the years, it was clear he had grown tired of it – with the obligation to keep his cover working for Miss Brown. He even told of how in the process of falling for Hermione, he had grown to dislike his gigolo work greatly, wanting to bed only one witch exclusively.

"Trust me, you don't have to worry about me ever pursuing that for a vocation or hobby ever," he assured Mounga.

"And this Mad-Eye guy wouldn't let you use Veritaserum to prove your innocence?"
Severus shook his head. "Would that I could. The old Auror has had it in for me for years, and this was his excuse to keep me under his thumb. Even my request to take the Veritaserum it in front of the Wizengamot was denied. Only Dumbledore could have spared me, and even his will would have been binding enough to have freed me. But alas..."

Mounga looked at the lemon on the table, picking it up to examine it. "I'm not supposed to let you bring in random fruits or vegetables from abroad, as we have some pretty strict importation laws. But as this is a magical lemon from a magical tree, and from what you describe, it isn't really for eating or planting, I can let this pass."

The huge wizard handed the withering lemon back to Severus, adding, "I hope that Hermione chick figures out how to clear your name. You seem like a nice guy who just had a lot of bad luck and was forced into some bad situations you made the best of."

Mounga stood and went around to Severus, indicating the interrogation was over.

"I think you'll find people here are pretty easy and you'll like it here," the larger wizard assured him. "Aloha. Welcome to Malu Palekaiko."

As Severus stood, Mounga grabbed him and gave him a huge crushing hug, followed by a hearty clap on the back that Severus was sure might have cracked a rib or two.
Exiting the interrogation room and entering the waiting area, he was rushed by Ginny who threw her arms tightly about him, burying her head against his shoulder. "I'm so glad you finally made it. Everything okay?" she asked frantically with worry, wondering if Severus was going to be able to stay with her and Draco.

Severus eased her fears, and Ginny hugged him back even tighter.

Draco came over and the two wizards embraced in a brotherly fashion, having been through so much together, sharing a bond similar to what only soldiers in battle can know.

"Oh, this is for you," Mouna said, once hugs and greetings were done. He handed Severus his own welcoming packet, just like the ones Ginny and Draco were reading while they waited for their friend and mentor to emerge.

"Come to the luau tomorrow night at the community center," Mouna invited them. "It's our big Christmas show. There's a potluck, so free food, free drinks. A chance to meet other Potion masters and such."

"Ginny said she'd even dance for us," Halulu volunteered.

"You hula?" Gary jumped into the conversation.

"No, belly dance, though I'm not that good," Ginny scoffed demurely.

Draco laughed and said, "That's what you think. Besides, you've danced in a few recitals and won that one Muggle competition."

Ginny waved her hands dismissively, unsure about her own talent.

Severus had never seen Ginny belly dance, but he had heard about her skill from Draco. He remembered the way Draco would recount, with glazed-over eyes, how she could roll a Galleon down her stomach.

It would be interesting to see her dance finally.
When they stepped out into the early morning air, the faintest glimmer of dawn was approaching; the moon had set long ago. The rain had stopped and the air smelled of the ocean, decomposing vegetation in the jungle, and the perfume of flowers. Even the chorus of frogs had dissipated, supplanted by a concerto of birdsong.

Out on the sand, Ginny and Draco ran to the edge of the water and began dancing around in circles, laughing. Severus approached the edge where the sand changed from dry to wet and watched the happy couple rejoice in their newfound freedom.

Ginny, noticing Severus standing to the side, ran over to him and grabbed his hand. She was shortly followed by Draco as they dragged Severus into joining their merriment, dancing around in a circle.

Caught up in the moment, Severus began to smile and laugh for once himself, finally realizing he was free to do whatever he wanted without restrictions, and his life was his own to control now. The only thing that marred the joy that Severus felt was the absence of Hermione.

She had told Severus he would never truly be free unless he was free to go wherever in the world he wanted without persecution.

And she was right. Only as long as Severus remained on the small island of Malu Palekaiko, no Auror could drag him back.

Malu Palekaiko was technically a part of the United States, though their U.S. wizarding government was separate from the Muggle one. The U.S. and most other countries had a cozy extradition relationship with the United Kingdom, and vice versa. Had Severus been caught in San Francisco, he could have done nothing about it, and would have been brought back to England against his will.

Severus could venture to the other Hawaiian islands and even other countries and the mainland, and come back to Malu Palekaiko, as long as he wasn't caught. It was only the magic imbued into this small island that could stop an Auror from forcing Severus and Draco from returning. As long as he stayed within the geographical bounds of this particular island, which included up to three miles out to sea, he was safe.

Should an Auror come to Malu Palekaiko and attempt to secretly kidnap anyone who had sought sanctuary – using a Portkey or Side-Along Apparition, for example – the magic of the island would
But despite the heaviness in his heart where Hermione was concerned, Severus was still happy and reveled in the lightness of his being, no longer feeling the oppression of the Death Eater Decree weighing upon his shoulders. Freedom was liberating and Severus felt as if he could fly without a broom, his feet light and his body almost floating.

Once their celebratory jig was done, they agreed to go find accommodations. There was an eleven-hour time difference between London and Hawaii, and their bodies told them it was nearly time for dinner. Thankfully their interrogators had brought them some food to hold them over during their interviews.

As it was nearing breakfast time, they agreed to Apparate into town for breakfast. On the welcoming packet's restaurant brochure, Ginny had circled a place that offered "Fabulous Hawaiian breakfasts for even the most serious appetites." Given the size of Mounga, he must have had an appetite that was downright grim.

For the first time in years, Severus and Draco were free to Apparate, and they disappeared with Ginny from the soft sand beach where they had first arrived.

When they traversed the short distance from the Portkey hut into “downtown,” it seemed the town was still asleep. Sunrise was still half an hour away, and the only life around was a dog who ambled through the center of town in the middle of the road. There were some holiday decorations up around town with hanging baskets of poinsettias and garlands of magnolia leaves, and a few shop windows were painted with festive holiday scenes and symbols.

There was a crowing of a rooster in the distance that rose above the morning chorus of birds that began to sing with the approach of the sun.

Looking at the map and the address, Ginny found the restaurant, but the sign indicated it would be another hour until they opened.

To kill time, they went to look for a hotel or bed and breakfast. There was one official hotel in town and a long list of people who rented out lodging at their private homes. There was little tourism to this small island, except for the annual Pele Festival in the middle of summer and Oktoberfest. Most of the witches and wizards who came to the Hawaiian Islands stayed on one of the islands that were known to Muggles as well. As Malu Palekaiko was a sanctuary, many governments suppressed the publication of books and literature about the place, even editing maps to erase the island from the knowledge base of wizarding societies around the world, something that even Dumbledore was guilty of.

Dumbledore not only suppressed knowledge about this Malu Palekaiko, but all of the Hawaiian Island chain as Voldemort began his rise. Many of Grindelwald's followers, after Dumbledore defeated him in 1945, fled to various sanctuaries around the world, mostly to Greece, but many to Malu Palekaiko as well. Since it was harder to erase knowledge about Greece and her famous sanctuary from the mind of the wizarding world, and given that Greece had succumbed to monetary influences to allow extradition on the sly, it was decided that the Hawaiian Islands would be easier to erase from British wizardom. As Voldemort rose, Dumbledore did not want to have someplace where his followers could flee to and hide, or worse, regroup if or when he fell.

It was only on Albus' deathbed, sensing his time was near, that the old Headmaster told Severus about Malu Palekaiko and to seek sanctuary there should Harry Potter fail. Severus wondered – if Dumbledore could foretell his own impending death – why did the Headmaster not make sure his will would be found after his death.

Draco knocked on the hotel's front door, after finding it locked.

A diminutive witch with dark brown skin and a wild mop of frizzy black hair that stuck out of her head at violent angles answered the door. She looked at the three up and down before saying, "Yes?"

"We'd like to get a couple of rooms," Draco said.

"Wow, been a while since I've had tourists other than during the festivals. Except for those who come to visit family on the island and the family are too packed to have a free bed for them," she added.

"We were just granted sanctuary," Ginny replied.

The diminutive witch stopped in her tracks and turned to stare at the three with a speculative eye. "You did?"

"Yeah, and Halulu, Gary, and Mouna gave us these welcome packets," the red-headed witch volunteered. “Your hotel was listed as a place where we could rent some place to stay? At least until we get around to finding a house."
The witch saw the packets still clutched in their hands and gave a sigh of relief. "Well then, aloha!"

The witch was much warmer to her guests upon spying the relocation packets in their mitts.

"I have a honeymoon suite, if you two are interested?" the hotel owner asked, seeking as how Ginny and Draco were joined at the hip.

"Well, the honeymoon doesn't start until we're married as soon as possible, but yes, we'll take it," Draco said, beaming as he gave Ginny a glowing smile. Ginny smiled back at him brightly.

"Ah, young love!" the tiny witch beamed. "I love a good wedding!"

Then turning to look Severus up and down like she was appraising a fine piece of meat, the proprietor said, "And I guess it's just you for the other room, tall, dark and handsome?"

Severus nearly startled at the blatant come-on from the tiny witch. She wasn't that much older than him, and she wasn't that bad looking, but he certainly wasn't interested.

Ginny started giggling, and through her chuckles, she queried, "What is it with you and the... ahem... opposite sex today, Severus?"

Before Severus could protest, Draco and Ginny began singing in time together, "She's got big red lips, she's got big brown eyes..." Ginny shook her shoulders back and forth in time to the song.

Severus glared at Ginny, but even he could almost find humor in their joke. Almost.

"I'll take the room farthest away from the overly hormonal nifflers here," Severus sneered. To make his own joke, he added, "Just in case someone forgets to put up a Silencing Charm."

Draco leaned over and said, "At least I can use one of those charms now."

Severus nodding, suddenly remembering that there were a lot of things he was free to do now, including casting spells and brewing potions.
The tiny witch, who introduced herself as Justina, showed them to their rooms. Draco and Ginny found the spacious honeymoon suite was decorated with a tropical theme featuring dark woods contrasting with gleaming white linens, intricately woven thatch lining a high ceiling, and a large balcony with a view of the town, volcano, and ocean. There was a large king-sized bed with a white billowy canopy and mosquito netting in the bedroom. They hadn't even closed the door before they were at each other, yanking at clothes, Draco's foot finding the door and slamming it shut while Ginny's wand cast the charm to keep the rest of the hotel hearing what they got up to in there.

Justina gave Severus a wink before showing him to his slightly more modest accommodations at the other end of the corridor.

There was a queen-sized bed, with a simple wooden canopy frame outfitted with mosquito netting, a bedside table, a dresser, two chairs with small table between them, a closet, and bathroom. The room was decorated with medium stained wood, and had a high ceiling with a much smaller balcony facing west that overlooked the hotel's small private garden. It was not as highly decorated or as large as the honeymoon suite, but just still had its own understated elegant charm.

"How well do Potions and Charms work to keep the mosquitoes away?" Severus asked Justina, seeing the mosquito netting as a common theme in the rooms.

"Charms wear off and Potions fade," she informed him. "Trust me, even if you're a talented wizard, I'd still use them just in case. For some reason, mosquitoes seem to be more impervious to magic than other creatures on this earth. And given that we tend to keep our windows and shutters open most of the year, I'd use the netting. You'll not meet any resident on this island who doesn't use it themselves for sleeping. But when you're out and about, Potions and Charms seem to work just fine."

Severus had read in his packet about recommended Potions and Charms to use to keep the offending insects away. He wondered if Ginny and Draco had remembered to use them before getting busy. English blood might prove a delectable treat to the little buggers.

Remembering how Justina had reacted to finding out about them seeking sanctuary and then spotting the packets in their hands, Severus surmised that welcome packets were only given to people the interviewers viewed as good and worthy of sanctuary – people who were not going to be breaking laws, hurting people, or causing trouble. Not being informed about Potions and Charms to keep the mosquitoes away would be one way to not make things 'go smoother' as Mounga phrased it about wizards who would be pushed to the fringes of their enclave.
With the door shut, Severus kicked off his boots and socks. He even took his trousers and shirt off to lay on the bed on his back in only his underpants, feeling the tropical breeze dance across his skin through the opened shutters. Severus made sure that he was under the mosquito netting; early morning and evening times were when they were most active, and it was peak time.

"I definitely need a more tropical wardrobe," he sighed, noting how his summer-weight woolen trousers, which he had changed into during his interrogation, were a bit oppressive, even in the cool morning air.

A cool December morning in Hawaii was like a pleasant sunny summer day in England; the low temperatures were in the low-seventies in Fahrenheit. At least he had some linen shirts, but given how everyone seemed to be either in short sleeves or sleeveless tops, even his long-sleeved shirts might be a bit too much. His blood was far thicker and could stand much chillier temperatures. In time, he would acclimatize, but for now, he needed new clothing, as he didn't have any linen or cotton trousers, and certainly no shorts. And leather boots in the tropical humidity would not do. Even he thought that he could tolerate the idea of sandals if it meant keeping him from overheating. And though he had a cool cotton cloak, he was sure he would not be wearing it today or even tonight.

As the sun began to rise and bring brightness to the vibrant color palette of Severus' new home – the forest just outside his window painted in rich hues of dark greens, vivid chartreuses, shocking pinks, luscious reds, glaring yellows, cerulean blues, and a whole array of surreal colors – he drifted off to sleep, worn out by the Polyjuice Potion.

~~~~~~~*~

As Hermione stepped out of her Floo back home, weary after a long day at work, she found Harry sitting there on the couch.

His face was stern yet impassive. Hermione knew he had been home to find Ginny's wedding ring cleaved in two, the singe marks on their wedding certificate from the breaking of the ring, and her letter explaining why she was leaving him.

"Where are they?" he asked in a calm, but cold voice.

"I don't know," Hermione answered truthfully.

"Don't lie to me anymore. I figured out you finally knew about Ginny and Malfoy fucking each other, yet you still said nothing. Omission is the same as lying, Hermione."
"I'm not lying, Harry. I really don't know where they went," she insisted, suddenly feeling as if defeated. The jig was up and Hermione could no longer hide the truth from Harry any longer. The questions were: how much truth did Harry already know, and how much could she avoid telling him to damn herself even further.

"And how long have you been fucking Snape?" Harry bit out, venom dripping from his voice.

Hermione's mouth went slack, shocked he had figured that out, until anger started to rise in her chest. "Certainly not nearly as long as Lavender was fucking Ron," she threw back at him. In the time since she and Ron announced their divorce at Bill's party nearly a week ago, Harry had not come to speak to her once. She had left the party with Harry and Ron shouting at each other.

"So it is true," Harry gasped in amazement.

Hermione couldn't believe she got caught in that trap, confessing before asking what proof Harry had.

"How could you?" he screamed.

"How could I? How could Ron be fucking Lavender for years and you not say anything to me?" Hermione yelled back.

"You think I knew he was banging her?"

"You certainly could ascertain Severus and I were, for the few months we were, yet for three and a half years you couldn't figure out Ron was screwing her?" she screamed, her voice becoming more shrill. "And you call yourself an Auror?" Now she was being cruel, but she didn't mind. Lashing back at Harry was convenient, and he'd set the tone of their conversation.

"Had I known, I would have asked him why and told him to stop," Harry insisted.

"And yet you knew for how long Severus and I were seeing each other, yet you said nothing before now?" Hermione pointed out.
"I wasn't sure you and the bat were doing anything, but if I was sure..."

"If you were sure, you'd do what? Tell me to stop going to see him? What, Harry? What would you do?" she challenged him. "You did nothing when you had your suspicions about me. And yet you said if you knew Ron was having an affair you'd speak to him."

"You challenge me about knowing and saying nothing? What about you knowing about Ginny fucking Malfoy and saying nothing?!?" Harry was now standing, nearly jumping up and down on the balls of his feet as he yelled.

"Because she's in love with him, Harry. I know it's hard to conceive someone could love that prat, but Ginny loves him with all her heart and she said if you found out, you'd get him hauled off to Azkaban and make sure he got the Dementor's Kiss, or you'd kill him yourself and justify it away by claiming he had attacked you. Ginny was so certain that you would go off your rocker and go mad, taking Draco out, she convinced me of her fears. And given to some of your outbursts as of late, I believed her."

"And it turns out Ron is in love with Lavender, yet you're angry about that, and somehow I can't be angry about Ginny being in love with Malfoy?!? Come on now, Hermione. You're not a hypocrite."

Hermione slumped into a nearby chair.

"And so what, you decide to shag Snape to get back at Ron?" Harry continued on with his tirade.

The fight had gone out of her. "No, Harry."

"Then tell me how it is, Hermione. Because Ginny fucking Malfoy and running off with him is okay without telling me, but me not figuring out Ron was cheating on you all these years is somehow my fault, so you go off and fuck Snape to get back at Ron?!?"

"I didn't know Ron was fucking Lavender until a month ago."

"If you didn't know then, then why did you fuck him in the first place?!?" Harry shouted, his eyes becoming more vividly green as his face twisted with building rage.
"BECAUSE I'M IN LOVE WITH HIM!" she shouted back.

Harry fell back into his chair, the wind knocked out of him.

Her shoulders slumped forward, Hermione began to silently cry.

"I don't think you know. And even if you did, I don't think you'd tell me." Harry stood back up and stood next to Hermione who hung her head in shame.

"You can't tell Ron," Hermione begged.

"Why, so he can look like the bad guy and you can look like the saint, with all the papers espousing you for the ditched dowdy wife and Lav as the beauty queen who stole his heart from you?"

"His heart was never mine to begin with," Hermione said, her tone flat and firm.

"Tell me one reason I shouldn't tell Ron?" Harry asked, sounding impatient with this witch who seemed to have suddenly adopted a set of double standards.

"Because it would kill Ron. He would die knowing his wife willingly made love with a former Death Eater – one you two mocked for years growing up. He wouldn't understand."

"And somehow I'm supposed to understand my wife was fucking a gigolo Death Eater prat behind my back for years as well and eventually ran off with him?" he questioned her.

"Ginny never loved you the way she loved Malfoy. You already understood Ginny was forced to accept your courtship by Molly after counseling. Didn't you even register that Ginny's indifference and reluctant affections were because her mother nagged her into accepting dates with you beforehand? And eventually a marriage proposal? Ginny said she was going to leave you a letter explaining how Molly interfered and stopped Draco from pursuing her, and Ginny gave up hope of seeing Draco and only relented to marriage because her mother bullied her into it. The same way that Ron was bullied into mine?"
"Yes, it was all spelled out in the letter she left and more, but I was hoping it wasn't true," Harry finally admitted. "But it seems even you, until she begged you not to tell me, didn't even notice that."

"I was deluded into thinking if you two were happy, Ron and I should have been happy too. All these preconceived notions of who we were supposed to marry when we grew up, and truth about the magical binding of children when it came to marriage – all that was withheld from you and me." She sighed with resignation. "We married too young, Harry. All of us.

"Ron and I have come to accept that our marriage was never meant to be," she said. "But you can't tell him about Severus and me. He's having a hard enough time dealing with his mother, Charlie, and Percy. And then there is the press. To discover that Severus and I were..."

"Bonking like garden gnomes in the spring?" Harry threw out bitterly.

"In love, I was about to say," she ground out, her strength and her patience waning.

As Harry moved towards the fireplace he said, "It doesn't matter. I know where she is."

Hermione turned around in her seat, her eyes hopeful, and asked, "Really? Where?"

Harry gave her a sardonic smile, looking older and more cruel than his sweet boyish self, which seemed to be slipping away more and more each year. "You may have known her secrets, but I know her tells. If you don't know, then maybe perhaps Snape didn't love you that much and just used you knowing it would drive Ron mad should he find out. So I guess I won't tell Ron as that would only have made Snape happy.

"I don't know how they escaped exactly, but I will find Ginny and discover how they did it. And if I can, I will bring them back," Harry adamantly promised.

"Her tells?"

"Ginny may have been good at lying and keeping secrets from me – oh, and I do know about the belly dancing, in case you didn't know – but her cookbooks were a dead giveaway. I'm surprised a witch as clever as you didn't see that one from a mile away," he sneered, rubbing Hermione's nose in it before leaving via Floo.
A/N: Thank you to my betas, JuneW and Cygnuz, for improving this chapter.

If you want a peek at what Severus' room looks like, you can go here: https://www.wheretostay.com/prop_photos/92000/92164/Villa-Lama-St-Barts-Ch-1-vue-terrasse-copie.jpg

I know, the place is in St. Barts, in the Carribean, and not the South Pacific, but hey, it was close in my mind to where Severus is staying now. Here is the hotel, this room goes with: https://www.wheretostay.com/Villa_Lama-stbarts-villa-92164

And here was a hint I dropped in chapter 16, in the kitchen scene after the Quidditch game:
“Since Ginny had never been able to convince Harry to take vacation time off, she’d taken to learning the native food of places she wanted to visit.”

Remember in chapter 18, “The Inner Hunger,” when Ginny offered Hermione to come over for Hawaiian pork with a mango-pineapple salsa during their picnic in St. James park? Yep, that was Ginny’s tell that Harry picked up on: cooking and cookbooks.

BOOM! There it was, if you knew where to look.

Thank you to the Hawaiian dictionary, http://ulukau.org/index.php?l=en, for translations of words. Unfortunately, Google translator does not fully translate into Hawaiian yet. And yes, the disclaimer is probably butchered, but some words I had to find synonyms to translate the concepts.
At the London Portkey Office was a long line of witches and wizards who had decided to make the most of the weekend and go away at the last minute. Right after work ended on Friday was the busiest time for scheduled and unscheduled Portkeys.

Harry didn't have time for this. As he scooted past others, moving ahead towards the front of the line, there were grumbles until Harry turned, apologized, and said it was emergency Auror business.

Seeing the Boy Who Lived say that it was important made people immediately stop complaining and step aside to allow him faster access towards the front.

Once at the front of the line, Harry flashed his credentials and stated his name in order to get the staff to understand he needed an emergency Portkey to Hawaii that instant, and it was certainly and absolutely for business reasons only.
He couldn't necessarily blurt out he was on the heels of two Death Eaters who had somehow escaped England.

As the wizard behind the desk began working to make an emergency Portkey, the man stopped and said, "Wait a minute..." The wizard went back to the scheduled Portkey itinerary ledger and looked at a long list of names.

"Hang on," the wizard said, "I have you registered for a Portkey this morning for nine o'clock. And it shows that you already left with your wife, Ginny, and one Hermione Weasley."

"What?" Harry said, his face going white. "Who did you say was on that list?"

"You, Ginny Potter, and Hermione Weasley. The Portkey was scheduled for nine o'clock this morning, and you left on time for the Cayman Islands. Does that matter?" the wizard asked, confused.

It suddenly struck Harry how two Death Eaters had escaped, and how Ginny could have gone with them unnoticed.

"Get me a Portkey to Hawaii. Now!" Harry barked urgently.

“Erm...” The Portkey officer hemmed and hawed, trying to explain to the famous Harry Potter that the wizard couldn't make a Portkey to someplace that didn't exist. Hawaii? No one had ever heard of it.

As Harry arrived in Honolulu, he looked around for the Portkey officer in charge.

He couldn't believe there was a single soul in the Portkey office at the Ministry of Magic back in London that not only didn't know where Hawaii was, but that it wasn't even listed in the registry of Portkey destinations. Instead, Harry had to take a Portkey to New York, and then take one from there to Hawaii.
As he approached the counter in Honolulu, Harry said, "I'm an Auror with the British Ministry of Magic. I need to speak to someone in charge."

"What's this about?" called a witch from behind a desk towards the back.

Harry explained who he was and that he was chasing two criminals who had fled from England via Portkey earlier that day.

The witch, who was head of the Portkey Office for the Honolulu Transit branch walked Harry back behind the counter. She started pulling up records, as records from the arriving destination would magically show up on the ledger at their office.

After looking for all records for the past fifteen hours, despite the fact that Harry last saw Ginny twelve hours ago, there was no sign of a Ginny Potter, Harry Potter, Draco Malfoy, Severus Snape, Hermione Weasley, or Hermione Granger. Some Portkey offices didn't bother to take down names of those passing through, so their names might not have wound up on the ledger unless they were staying in Hawaii. At least, that's what Harry thought.

Stumped, he suddenly thought of something. "There are a bunch of islands in Hawaii, right?"

"Uh, yeah. It's why they are called the Hawaiian Islands. Why?" the head Portkey officer asked, thinking that was a rather obtuse question.

"What other Portkey offices do you have here in Hawaii?"

The witch began ticking them off on her fingers. "Well, there is Maui, the Big Island, Molokai, and Kauai – all of them can let other people Portkey in. And then there is Malu Palekaiko, but nobody goes there, unless it's festival time or they have family there."

"Why?"

"Because the only other people who go there are usually seeking sanctuary."

The witch's eyes and Harry's both got wide.
"You did say they were criminals, right, sir?"

"Yes."

"Are they dangerous?"

Harry said, "I'm hoping they won't be."

Severus had been sleeping blissfully for the past couple hours when he was awakened by Justina’s shouting and screaming at someone.

Roused from slumber, he was about to roll over and pull a pillow over his head. He started to consider looking later in the day for new lodgings, when he distinctly heard Harry Potter's voice.

"I know she's here! I found her with a locator spell!" Potter yelled, his voice becoming louder as he passed by Severus’ door, only to to diminish in pitch and volume as he walked on.

Leaping from the bed, Severus quickly yanked his trousers on and grabbed his wand, not even bothering with his shirt or shoes. Draco and he had not gone through all that they did just to have Potter show up and ruin it all.

Just as Severus exited his room’s door, Harry burst through the door of the honeymoon suite.

Ginny screamed in fright, having just woken up to her ex-husband finding her – and holding his wand drawn and pointed at Draco.

"Get Halulu now!" Ginny shrieked at Justina.

The hotel owner Apparated away on the spot.

Severus ran down the hallway to point his wand at the Auror and growled, "Drop your wand, Harry spun around and pointed his wand at Severus now.

"I'm not leaving here without Ginny and you two!" Harry shouted back, glancing over his shoulder to make sure Draco wouldn't get the drop on him.

Beyond Harry, Severus could see Draco jumping up out of bed and grabbing something to throw on to cover himself while fetching his wand, seeing that Severus temporarily had Potter distracted. Severus saw Ginny busy hunting for her wand, lost in the midst of a tangled pile of clothes, while clutching a bedsheets to her person for modesty with her other hand.

"It's too late, Potter. We've been granted sanctuary, and by the magic of this island, you cannot take us against our will anywhere!" Severus shouted back.

"What? Sanctuary? What does that even mean?" Harry asked, not clear on the finer points of the concept. "I'm taking you and Draco back whether you like it or not, for sure."

"EXPELLIARMUS!"

Halulu had Apparated into the hallway behind Potter and disarmed him before the Auror could register the witch had even arrived.

Severus caught Potter's wand as it fell through the air.

"You must be Harry Potter, Ginny's ex," Halulu said calmly with great interest.

"Who are you?" Harry was disarmed and at the mercy of this witch who'd gotten the better of him.

"I'm the one who interviewed and processed your ex-wife's claim for sanctuary. You are not taking her anywhere," Halulu said in even measured tones.

"Really? We'll see about that," Harry said defiantly. He ran past Halulu and over at Ginny, who was still crouched near the bed, the white sheet the only thing covering her otherwise nude form.

"No, I wouldn't – "

Before Halulu could finish warning him, Harry grabbed Ginny's arm and instantly disappeared with a small pop.

"Where did he go?" asked Ginny, just as bewildered as Draco at the sight of Potter disappearing without his wand, which was still in Severus' hand.

Severus had had an inkling this might happen.

"Great," Halulu sighed with exasperation.

Just then, Justina came back, and Halulu turned to her and said, "Can you alert the town that we have a bounty hunter without his wand somewhere? Depending on his intent, he could be anywhere from stuck in a treetop to dumped three miles out to sea."

The three sanctuary seekers looked to Halulu, who quickly recounted that anyone who tried to remove those who granted sanctuary against their will would be dealt with by the protective magic of the island. She gave them a brief rundown of what happened to one particular bounty hunter. It seems that that bit of information about this type of magical protection was not imparted to the trio during their interview process or included in their welcome brochure, but Severus was somewhat aware of this particular magic beforehand.

Halulu closed the door to let Ginny and Draco get dressed, while Severus went back to his room to put something on for the day before meeting Halulu downstairs in Justina's kitchen for some coffee.

Minutes later in the kitchen, Severus was sitting down savoring a wonderful blend called Kona coffee, making him reconsider tea as his morning beverage. As Ginny and Draco came into the kitchen to join him, Justina came back and announced they had found Harry Potter.

"Seems he got thrown back to the Portkey hut. So it looks like he wasn't going to hurt her, but it could have been worse," Justina informed them.
Halulu then recounted the tale of one such bounty hunter who had tried to take a wizard back, but was transported the first time to a precarious ledge half-way down a thousand-foot cliff above the jagged rocks just above the crashing surf. The next time the bounty hunter tried to take the same wizard back, he was magically transported into the middle of a shallow lagoon, surrounded by aggressive sharks. The third time, the bounty hunter found himself on the edge of the caldera of an active volcano, and he decided that whatever magic that protected this island was not going to let him bring that wizard back to his country for justice. That particular wizard who was being hunted and pursued was not exactly the innocent type with a clean record, but since coming to the Malu Palekaiko sanctuary, he had proven to be a model citizen.

"Too bad the piranhas didn't get a taste of The Boy Who Lived," Draco muttered into his coffee.

Ginny gave him a harsh glare and gently elbowed him in the ribs. She may not have been in love with her ex-husband, but she certainly didn't wish him harm.

"We don't have those fish here. You're thinking of the Amazon," Halulu corrected Draco, then made her eyes go comically wide. "We have sharks. Hungry ones, too."

Draco gave Halulu a slightly weary look. Ginny might be having a more difficult time getting Draco to swim in the ocean now.

Seeing the look on Draco's face, Halulu and Justina burst into laughter. "I'm pulling your leg, boy. The sharks only bite the Muggles, and rarely at that."

Draco let out a small sigh of relief and, quietly, so did Severus.

As Potter walked into Justina's kitchen at the hotel, Severus was twirling Potter's wand in his left hand, while keeping his own wand in his right hand at the ready.

Severus handed Potter's wand over to Halulu to do with as she saw fit, which to his and Draco's disappointment meant handing it back to Potter.

"What just happened?" Harry asked, unsure how one second he was going to drag his wife – ex-wife – out of the bed she was lying in with Malfoy and get some clothes on her, and the next second he was standing on the sand without Apparating himself.
"Magic!" Halulu sang overly cheerfully, smiling brightly and making jazz hands.

Draco, between Halulu's sarcastic response and the dumbfounded look on Potter's face, burst out laughing and threw his whole body forward, his head down on the table as he guffawed loudly.

Severus, who also saw the completely befuddled look on Potter's face, was infected by Draco's laughter and also began to laugh. He placed one hand up to his mouth in an attempt to stay serious, but Halulu's response was too good not to enjoy and even he started laughing harder.

Draco, seeing Severus laugh, started laughing even harder, his fists pounding on the table.

Seeing the two serious wizards dissolve into laughter, and knowing Harry wasn't hurt at all – that he just had a good fright – made Ginny start to giggle, too.

"Could someone please explain how I was upstairs and then suddenly on the beach in front of the Portkey Office?" Harry asked, trying to be heard over the laughter of everyone who decided laughing at his confusion and sudden disappearance was pretty darn funny.

"This is how it is, honey. Let me explain it so you can get this into your head..." Halulu began as her own laughter died down. She gave Harry a breakdown of the magic that was now protecting Ginny and the two ex-Death Eaters from any chance of being extradited, captured, removed, or kidnapped against their will. Portkeys, Apparition, vanishing cabinets, brooms, flying carpets, even plain old Muggle boats and planes – nothing could remove Draco and Severus from Malu Palekaiko unless they left of their own free will, and that went for Ginny as well.

Harry sat down in a chair on the other side of the kitchen, unwilling to sit anywhere near Malfoy or Snape, grasping the fact that he now knew where the two escaped Death Eaters had gone, but there was nothing in this world that he or even Moody could do to bring them back.

"Can I at least have a moment to speak with my wife – ex-wife?" Potter corrected himself, looking to Halulu.

"It's up to her. She's a free witch here. But I warn you, you lay a hand on her with any intent–"
"I was just going to throw some clothes on her," Harry hotly interrupted her.

"Naw, it was more than just clothes." She waggled a chastising finger at him. "The magic would not have chucked you back to the Portkey office if preserving her modesty was your only reason for grabbing her," she pointed out, knowing the power and near-sentient quirks of this particular type of magic far better than this Potter boy.

Harry did have the intended purpose of eventually dragging Ginny back to England with him, and though he denied that was the reason for grabbing her, the magic of the sanctuary knew what Harry's heart had intended to do.

"Be glad you didn't wind up at the edge of the caldera," Halulu warned the young Auror. "The volcano has been pretty actively lately."

Ginny assured Draco that Harry couldn't take her away. Draco didn't want to leave her side, but she asked for a moment to speak privately with her ex-husband to clear up some matters.

Draco was planning on standing next to the doorway to the kitchen when Halulu pulled him aside and said, "She'll be fine. No one can take her away from you anymore."

Halulu, Draco, and Severus sat in the small lobby of the hotel waiting for Harry and Ginny to emerge.

Eventually, Ginny and Potter came out, both sporting splotchy faces, red eyes, and runny noses, and wiping away at errant tears.

Ginny sat down next to Draco, who kissed the top of her red hair and squeezed her hand, placing a protective arm about her.

"Do you really love her, Malfoy?" Potter asked.

Looking up at the wizard, who now looked more like the small boy he’d met in Madam Malkin’s shop before their first year at Hogwarts than a grown man, Draco said with great solemnity, "I would have sooner chosen to die than leave England without Ginny. I love her, and I always will."
The serious and heartfelt response of Draco's answer seemed to allow Potter to finally let go of Ginny. Of course his heart was now broken, but he was sure that Ginny was in good hands of someone who could love her unconditionally, and that she loved back with equal ferocity.

Potter turned to face Severus. Glaring at his old Potions professor, he said shortly, "A word with you, Snape."

They decided to take their conversation out into the back garden.

Amid the hedges of large, bright red hibiscus flowers and the white feathery fronds of the blooming sugar cane, Potter asked, "Why did you seduce Hermione?"

"You assume I seduced her." It was an evasive answer meant to draw Potter out into giving away what he knew, and thereby what he didn't know.

"It makes perfect sense. Many of the key ingredients in Polyjuice Potion are highly regulated. Anyone who purchases them at an apothecary has their name registered. Smuggling is impossible. What better way than to get them when they come into the United Kingdom, as Hermione has access when she tests them? And what a coincidence that shortly before you disappear, she gets a Potions apprenticeship she has always longed for, but has, until now, been unable to obtain. And Lavender's Potions master, Sebastian Delgado, leaves to go back to Spain at a time that is also very coincidental. That's a whole lot of coincidences, don't you think?" Harry asked too innocently for the topic of conversation, a hint of bitterness underlying his series of deductions.

Severus said nothing, but continued to walk alongside Potter, his hand on his wand wondering if a Memory Charm would violate the local laws of his new home.

"What did you do to get her to agree to give you the ingredients? Seduce her first or dangle the promise of an apprenticeship in front of her nose to make her cave?" Potter asked snidely.

"If you think Hermione would cast her ethics aside for an apprenticeship or because of whom she bedded, then you do not know her at all," Severus calmly parried Harry's remarks. "And to think, she considers you a friend. One who evidently doesn't know her very well if you're making such accusations."

"Do you deny she gave you the ingredients?" Harry asked, wanting to at least hear Snape confess, though there was nothing he could have done about it anyway.
Severus pondered the choice of Potter's words and considered negating the boy's assumptions, based on a syntax error.

"Hermione gave no such ingredients to me," Severus truthfully answered, in a manner of speaking.

"Did she give them to Ginny?" Harry countered.

Severus was amazed the boy had picked up on his subtle use of language.

As much as Severus tried to play it cool, he was starting to get a pit of worry building in his stomach over Hermione's safety. Would Potter lash out at him and Draco by ruining Hermione's life by exposing her help towards helping two Death Eaters escape? She was guilty, without a doubt, but would Harry obey the law blindly, having Hermione brought up on charges before the Wizengamot and ruining her chance of finishing her apprenticeship, not to mention her whole life, over a grudge and a duty to obey the law, no matter how unjust it was? Or would Potter bend the rules like he had done to suit his own needs for so many years at Hogwarts, to justify his goals?

Severus stopped walking and turned to face Potter. "Do you remember when your godfather, Sirius, was accused of betraying your parents? How he was assumed to be in league with the Dark Lord? And when you found out the truth of how he was betrayed and unjustly punished, did you and Hermione not abuse the use of a Time-Turner to help a wizard who was wanted for the murder of Pettigrew – a murder that he did not commit? Even though many others were certain of his guilt, Hermione helped you to set to right a wizard who should not have been punished for crimes he did not do."

Harry took a step back, having the memory brought up. The wound from that memory and the loss of Sirius suddenly felt raw and torn open once more.

"Hermione does not defend those unless she is certain of their innocence," Severus said firmly and with conviction. "When you go back to England, ask Moody why he would not accept Draco’s and my request to take Veritaserum to tell the truth about the death of Dumbledore and regarding the supposed crime of Draco’s and my letting Death Eaters into Hogwarts. He refused our offer to confess our innocence under Veritaserum, for he would then have no suspicions to claim as fact and use to persecute us, though Draco and I were always true to Dumbledore and the Order. Ask him that, if you are truly the brave Gryffindor that you are heralded to be. Let's see what happens when Moody is confronted with your questions."
Severus turned to walk away from Potter, but stopped and turned to fix him with a steely glare, his eyes glancing quickly at Harry's scar. "And should you cause any harm to Hermione, I might just risk coming back to England to finish what the Dark Lord did not."

He turned once more and stalked away towards the hotel leaving Potter to contemplate his words and all that it implied.

"My God, he does love her," Potter muttered to himself before he went to walk back to the Portkey office.

---

Hermione's Saturday was going to be very busy. She had a morning interview with Luna, where she would have to sit next to Lavender and Ron and recount something not only recent and painful, but very personal to be published for all of wizardom to see. She also had to attend the noon grand opening of The Sirens' Secrets, as the Christmas shopping season in Diagon Alley was kicking off.

After speaking with Lavender via Floo regarding Harry and his claim that he knew where Ginny, Draco and Severus had gone off to, Hermione took a vial of something that promised her a restful night's sleep in hopes that a different brand of elixir would deliver the promise of a good night's rest for once. The vial should have been more accurately labeled "Temporary Coma."

Waking, her body felt rested, but her mind still felt as if it have been stomped all over by Grawp during a temper tantrum. She then admitted to herself yet again the importance of dreaming to allow the mind to clear out the detritus that cluttered one's mind and decided that no sleeping potion, no matter who brewed it, was going to let her avoid nightmares and allow her to get a good night's sleep. She wondered if she could pick up a vial or three of Wit-Sharpening Potion at the local apothecary, since didn't have time to brew herself any in time before the interview started.

Lavender had suggested what Hermione should wear, as they would try to both dress in a way that one did not look better than the other. Her employer said it should look like Ron had not picked Lavender and ditched his wife due to looks, but because of matters of the heart. But as there was going to be a photographer, pictures spoke louder than words.

With a vial of Wit-Sharpening Potion tossed down along with a quick cup of tea and a piece of toast, Hermione Floo'ed over to Lavender's.

Upon her arrival, Wonkle greeted Hermione while Lavender was running about the solarium making sure everything was perfect. There was still a half-hour until Luna would show up.
Lavender stopped her preparations and came over. She looked Hermione up and down, checking her over, and then shook her head.

"Your clothes look perfect," Lavender began, "but may I fix up your hair and make-up?"

Hermione nodded, feeling like she was being primped like a dog for a show. She didn't even tell Lavender that she didn't even bother with makeup. All those years of working in a Potions testing lab required one's face to be in a natural state, because one's makeup might accidentally taint a testing batch.

After a few twirls and flicks, Lavender nodded with approval.

Checking in the large mirror in the grand foyer, Hermione saw that her hair was arranged in a well-controlled cascade of smooth waves while Lavender wore her hair down as well, smooth and straight, loosely curled at the bottom. Their eyes were both accented and a bit of rouge highlighted their cheek bones in a way that flattered both their faces. Hermione had to admit that perhaps she didn't look half bad with a bit of primping. At least the bags and circles under her eyes were gone after her mini-coma, but that still didn't take away the haunted look in the brunette witch's eyes.

Ron came out into the foyer, saying, "Which shirt did you want me to wear again, Lav?" He was holding a cream-colored, tailored button-down dress shirt in one hand and a pale caramel-colored one in the other.

He stopped short when he spotted Hermione.

Hermione noticed immediately that Ron was shirtless, since it was hard not to notice the rather impressive set of abs her ex-husband was sporting.

'Why didn't Ron have abs like that when we were married?' she momentarily thought to herself bitterly, now a little jealous that Lavender got an upgraded version of Ron while she’d had to deal with the one who had the meager salaries while holding down two jobs, had willingly dressed like a slob, and hadn't quite yet filled out.

Hermione couldn’t kid herself. Even towards the end of her marriage when Ron did have a body like that, the sex was still mediocre and they still fought like cats and dogs, more so with the influence of those potions he was taking for gaining muscle.
"The darker one, Ron," Lavender said, then paused to watch the exchange between the exes.

Ron stood there unmoving. This was the first time they had seen each other since Bill's party and the announcement of their divorce to the Weasley family.

Finally remembering that his fiancée had replied, he said, while pointing with the shirts in his hand back towards where he'd come from, "Oh, right, well, I'll just go... and... finish getting dressed."

Hermione turned away and went to look in the mirror to make sure she didn't look like she was about to start crying.

"The mascara is run-proof," Lavender said quietly.

"Thanks; I think that will be very helpful today," Hermione noted somberly.

Before Luna showed up, Lavender had Ron and Hermione sit together and air whatever they needed to say so that it would not come out in some dam-burst of emotions during the interview.

It was mostly polite small talk. Given that Ron was not having an apoplectic fit, she could only assume that he had not yet learned of Ginny divorcing Harry and running off with Malfoy, the Death Eater and his long-time nemesis, taunter, and pain in the arse. She would leave that privilege to Harry, to whom she was feeling a little less charitable. She certainly was not going to do it now, given that Luna was due to appear any minute and then all three of them had to later show up for The Sirens' Secrets grand opening.

At nine o'clock promptly, Luna Apparated to the edge of Lavender's property, which was a modest mansion located in Kent. After knocking on the door, the Editrix-in-Chief of The Quibbler was greeted at the door by Lavender, instead of the house-elf, Wonkle, giving the impression that she was not so haughty as to not answer her own door.

As Luna and Lavender entered the solarium, Ron and Hermione were engaged in polite conversation, Hermione pouring a cup of tea for her ex-husband in the process. It was all very staged.

Luna, with her keen perception and child-like honesty, said "You don't have to pretend for me. We're old friends. The photographer won't be here for another hour."
Hermione and Ron let out a huge sigh and sat a little farther apart, but not before Hermione finished pouring Ron a cup of tea.

Now that they were all seated, Luna began by saying, "I'd like to thank all three of you with giving me your story. I know there has been a lot of gossip printed in the other papers and magazines, but I promise you that I will do my best to accurately reflect what we discuss here today."

"It is because you have shown integrity in the past when it comes to publishing the truth that we thought of you," Lavender replied, in reference to how The Quibbler had been the forum for Harry to honestly discuss the return of Voldemort when the Ministry's propaganda rag, the Daily Prophet, refused to acknowledge the truth and had painted Harry in a bad light.

"So, why don't you or Ron tell me in your own words what happened?" Luna asked, looking at Hermione.

Hermione appreciated the fact that Luna did not make any accusations in her question and left it open-ended for them to begin.

"Well, Luna, I think what anyone reading about this should know is that Ron and I had a long and solid friendship to begin with, but friendship is not quite enough when it comes to marriage, at least for us," she began.

Over the next hour, Hermione and Ron took turns discussing how they both slowly realized over the years that though they did love each other, it was not the type of love needed to sustain a marriage, especially a marriage he wasn't ready for.

After some time, they reached a point where Luna asked how Ron's romance with Lavender began.

"I saw Ron sitting alone and looking miserable one day," Lavender began. "I remembered him from school and I struck up a conversation with him. He confessed that he and Hermione had just had a big fight, and he had confided in me marriage was a lot bumpier than he’d expected, having been married for less than a year.

"After we had been talking for several hours, I felt a sort of connection with him," Lavender confessed, excluding the part about him going over to her house and sleeping with her that night.
Ron jumped in, adding, "It was a natural and easy kind of rapport we had with one another. And as much as I felt terrible about it, Lavender and I developed a deep friendship and fell in love."

Hermione could not help but think about her and Severus had started with conversation, with him listening to her own martial woes at first and offering a shoulder to cry on at the beginning of their relationship. Hermione remembered how awful she’d felt falling for Severus while married to Ron, and how she’d battled with the conflict within her.

"But even though I had fallen in love with Lavender, I felt that my first duty was to remain with Hermione," Ron finished.

"And why is that, Ron?" asked Luna for clarification.

"From what I know in the Muggle world from Hermione," Ron answered, "divorce is pretty common, but I was raised that when you marry someone, it's for life. I felt I had to take care of Hermione. And that if I were to leave her, how could she live on her meager salary at the Ministry alone? I felt it was the noble thing to do, to stick through it even though we were growing apart."

Hermione nodded, her eyes downcast.

"If you understood that marriage is for life, Ron, why did you marry Hermione in the first place if you never were deeply in love with her?" Luna queried, her insight allowing her to go to the heart of the issue quickly.

"I suppose you could say that I caved into pressure from family, friends, and society, that this was what expected of me." Ron left out the part when Molly coerced him, as it would have been too humiliating to admit to being bullied by one's mother.

Hermione added her own comments, saying, "It seemed that we both felt that we were expected to marry each other. But we rushed into things too quickly, too young. The war had only just ended, and perhaps in a way of trying to put the sadness and loss we felt behind us, after losing so many people close and dear to us, our getting married was somehow a way of forcing ourselves to be happy with something joyous when it would have been more prudent to wait and be sure."

Luna nodded herself, looking a bit lost in her own thoughts before she continued with the interview. "Now, Hermione, since you are more familiar with Muggle divorce, maybe you can "Certainly. As many, but perhaps not all of, your readers might know, I am a Muggle-born. As such, both my parents and their families are Muggles. In the Muggle world, when two people fall in love and get married but it doesn't work out, or they marry for the wrong reasons, they can undo the legal binding of their marriage contract. There is a petition to file for divorce with the legal system. If they do not part amicably, there is a process where they go to court and it is decided who gets what, of whatever property and monies that were accrued together during their marriage," Hermione said, recalling her aunt's divorce proceedings. "For example, let’s say the wife does not hold a job and the man does. Then, during the divorce, it would be decided how much the man must pay in alimony each month to help support the wife; the support is something that ends, should the wife marry another man. Or vice versa."

"Very interesting," Luna remarked. "After this interview is published, I would like to do an article explaining more about Muggle divorce for our readers. I hope I can talk to you more about that?"

"Sure, Luna, though I recommend you talk to the Muggle marriage counselor Ron and I went to through the Muggle Alliance Network," Hermione said. "He helped us get through some rough patches, and it was through our counseling that Ron and I discovered that we never should have married in the first place. Especially after I learned about children."

"What did you not know about children, Hermione?" Luna asked, looking a bit confused.

"In a Muggle household, divorce – even with children – is a legal matter, not magical. Should a Muggle couple with children get a divorce, the children go off to live with one parent or the parents have joint custody. In the wizarding world, divorce with children means death. Being initially raised in the Muggle world, I didn't understand that, nor was I told beforehand."

"Really?" Luna said, looking almost shocked, considering her naturally calm demeanor.

"Yes," Hermione replied, trying not to let the anger and bitterness in her voice rise, or go into a tirade blaming Molly Weasley for everything. "It seems that in the rush to plan the wedding shortly after the war, it was never explained to me about the magical binding property of children where marriage was concerned. You can imagine how stunned I was to learn that, after being married for almost four years. I can only say that I'm thankful that Ron agreed with me that we should wait to have children. Had I learned the facts – about children making the marriage permanent and irreversible – after getting pregnant, it would be been an even bigger shock to me then."

This wasn't entirely truthful, as Ron did bug Hermione about having children once or twice.
However, after hearing her explain the additional burden requiring time, money, and the thought of having to face nappy changes, Ron then agreed to wait, even with pressure from his mother.

Luna went on to ask about how Hermione learned about Ron and Lavender, to which Hermione and Lavender spun a believable but fabricated lie, saying that Ron broke the news about Lavender after they agreed to a divorce. Hermione didn't like having to lie, but it would be too embarrassing to have everyone know Lavender had told her about their affair in her office while discussing Hermione’s future employment. That would make Hermione look like she was giving up her husband in exchange for employment during her apprenticeship.

"And I understand you have an apprenticeship under Albert Dobmeir, Lavender's new Potions master? Did that make it awkward?" Luna asked, honestly curious as to how Hermione handled that situation, but not out of morbid curiosity.

"Yes, at first. I had already arranged to have my apprenticeship with him before Ron and I mutually agreed to a divorce, and before I discovered Ron and Lavender were in love," Hermione said, which was an almost true timeline of events, "but this apprenticeship is something I have longed for and sought for many years. So I decided to be professional about this and not let a personal matter interfere with a business relationship."

Luna then turned to Lavender, "But as Hermione's employer, as I understand this is a paid apprenticeship, does this make it difficult to you?"

"Well, Hermione came highly recommended to Albert Dobmeir, who himself is a very talented Potions master," Lavender said graciously, bending over to offer Luna more tea, which she declined. "And so far, even this early into her apprenticeship, Mr. Dobmeir has said that he is very impressed with Hermione's knowledge and skill level. It doesn't hurt that she has so much experience where Potions ingredients are concerned, considering her previous job at the Department of Standards & Regulations. She had proven herself to be an invaluable member of the company in the short time she has been here."

The interview seemed to be wrapping up, and Luna gave each of them a chance to have something to say in closing. Lavender espoused how she regretted hurting Hermione, and hoped that one day that they could become friends once again. Ron gave a cautionary warning about people not succumbing to pressure from anyone into something so important and life-long as marriage.

"And you," Luna said, turning to Hermione. "What would you like to say that you haven't had the chance to address?"
Hermione paused for a moment to collect her thoughts. "If it was me who had fallen in love with someone else during our marriage instead of Ron, someone with whom I felt a deep and visceral connection, who seemed to understand me and listened to me, who was the first person I thought about when I woke up and the last person when I went to sleep at night," Hermione said, her eyes far away, recollecting her own feelings and how she fell in love with Severus, "someone I was drawn to mentally, spiritually and physically, whom I could talk to for hours, be lost in their arms, making me experience the heady and delirious sensation of falling deeply in love..." Hermione suddenly stopped when she realized she was confessing her own situation. She amended it hastily with, ",...as I'm sure Ron and Lavender fell for each other, then I hope Ron would understand that I never meant to hurt him. Just as I understand he never meant to hurt me, but could not help whom he fell in love with along the way."

With her little speech, recounting her own experience of falling for Severus inadvertently, she better understood and comprehended how Ron and Lavender fell for one another. It was not something done out of spite, but two souls who just happened to come across each other at the wrong time, just like her and Severus.

"Ron's heart was never mine to begin with, no matter how much we tried to convince ourselves otherwise," Hermione continued. "This is why I hope Ron and Lavender have a long and happy life together."

Ron placed his hand atop Hermione's, which was resting on the couch next to him, and asked, "Really, 'Mione? You want us to be happy?"

Hermione felt herself get a little misty-eyed as she looked at Ron and Lavender sitting next to each other, comfortable and supportive in each other's presence, and recalled how she felt the same way with Severus. She would want Ron to wish her happiness too if the roles were presently reversed.

"Yes," she nodded, her smile a little bittersweet.

Just then the camera flash popped and captured the moment that would be featured at the top of Luna's exclusive, showing reconciliation, forgiveness, and understanding amid divorce and an unintended affair.

The photographer left promptly once the interview was over. Lavender was about to rise to show Luna to the door when the blond editrix suddenly confessed, "I can certainly understand about how people should not rush into marriage. It was because I still had trouble dealing with my father's death towards the end of the war that Neville and I called off our engagement. As you said, this is something life-long, especially once you have children. And Neville understood. It was better to wait while I sorted through some things, and we both eventually agreed that we were too young to marry. I think what you have to say is important for others to hear, especially if it might steer people from jumping into marriage recklessly or without giving it enough thought. Thank you; this was most illuminating and should definitely make people think."

Once Luna was gone, Ron looked at his ex-wife and asked, "You really, really meant that you want Lav and me to be happy? That wasn't just for the interview, was it?"

"Yes, Ron," she assured him. "I do want you and Lavender to be happy. You fell in love with her. And perhaps if we hadn’t rushed into marriage, you would have married her instead of me and we both would have been happier these past four years."

Lavender showed Hermione to the dining room where a light lunch was served up. All three of them ate together, the air having been cleared a little, before they headed off to the grand opening.

As Hermione ate, she realized that some of the bitterness she held towards Ron had dissipated. Of course she hadn't completely forgiven Ron, but putting herself in Ron's place – had she fallen for Severus years ago instead of months ago and felt an obligation to stick with Ron for monetary obligations and familiar pressure – she could see herself carrying on an affair with Severus for years, wanting to leave Ron but unable.

It made her heart a little lighter, but her heart was still heavy with her guilt regarding Harry and her grief for missing Severus.

More than anything, she wished she could look forward to heading off to Severus’ flat, sipping a nice cup of tea and sharing her day with him before dining on something wonderful he whipped up for her. Then there would be snuggling in his arms on the settee afterwards, reading together in companionable silence or making love. As it was, she was already experiencing the mental and emotional equivalent of withdrawal from the man who had quickly become her best friend and lover, who knew her better than anyone, even Ginny, Harry, or Ron.

Swallowing a mouthful of salad, Hermione wondered what Severus was up to at that very moment and what it was like where he was.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: A huge round of thanks to my betas, JuneW and Cytherea. Give my betas some well deserved love.
Chapter Seventy-One: "Jumbo Cockroach Clusters" Join Severus, Draco and Ginny as they experience their first day in sanctuary. Hermione is worn out from the grand opening of the Sirens' Secrets.

Disclaimer: Miss Jo (Rowling) owns everything. I own nothing in this story, except a really dirty imagination.

If you want a soundtrack to go along while treading this chapter, then open this YouTube link and listen while Severus, Draco, and Ginny enjoy their first day in sanctuary:
https://youtu.be/fjbiKCzlFZQ

The first day in the town of Malu Palekaiko, which shared the same name as the island Severus now called home, was certainly a memorable one.

The new sanctuary seekers went out for breakfast, famished, especially after the "thrilling" excitement of the morning with Potter showing up unannounced and causing a scene.

Severus recommended Draco and Ginny take their welcome packets with them as they went about the town. Deciding to see if his hunch was correct, he told Ginny and Draco to place their packets on the table in front of them at the restaurant, and Severus would keep his hidden.

At the Ohana Family Diner, the waitress greeted them with a warm "Aloha" and asked if they were tourists.
Ginny informed the waitress they had all been granted sanctuary that morning. The waitress smiled warmly at the two young lovers, but gave Severus the stink-eye until he pulled out his packet and innocently asked if she could recommend someplace in town to buy new clothes. Upon seeing Severus had his own welcome packet, she warmed up to him immediately and pointed to one shop on the list, giving them a brief set of directions to get there.

"What was that all about?" Ginny asked Severus after the waitress left to get their food.

He clued the two into the nonverbal stamp of approval the welcome packet provided, letting the townsfolk know they were not just to be tolerated, but welcomed with open arms.

They would have to cart them wherever they went until the luau tomorrow night. That is when they would most probably be introduced to the community, and then wouldn’t have to carry them as some giant paper badge of approval.

Breakfast for Severus consisted of a couple eggs, Portuguese sausage, toast, and more of that delicious Kona coffee he was quickly becoming addicted too. The plate originally came with rice, but he opted for something he normally associated with breakfast since rice seemed like a dinner starch. He eyed the pineapple marmalade suspiciously; he tried some on a corner of his toast and decided he would stick to citrus-based marmalades.

Draco raved about the macadamia nut pancakes with coconut syrup, while Ginny decided to be brave and go with what was marked in the menu as the local favorite: rice, a fried egg, and a hamburger patty with gravy.

Severus noted there was a lot of Spam on the menu.

"What's Spam again, Severus?" Draco asked, unfamiliar with the “delicacy.”

"Spare parts of anonymous meat," he muttered with distaste. Growing up poor, his mother served it up frequently as a cheap source of protein, and he still could not stand the sight or smell of it to that very day.

The sight of Spam sushi on the lunch menu almost ruined his appetite.

Then there was the heaping pile of fresh fruit that came in addition to what was listed on the menu of each dish they ordered. It was meant as garnish, but it seemed like a whole other entree by itself.

Ginny had slices of starfruit, a fresh navel orange, and a big piece of papaya on the side. Draco had a huge slice of mango, fresh pineapple which was sweeter than anything he had ever eaten before, and strawberries, which were a real treat since strawberries were never in season in winter or autumn back in England. Severus had his own slice of pineapple, a large chunk of watermelon, and sliced banana.

Severus could see that if this was what was grown locally, he was going to be including a lot more fresh fruit into his diet. It was all so sweet and flavorful, far more than the stuff grown in the hot houses by wizards for the farmers’ market in Diagon Alley.

After a filling breakfast, they headed off to go clothes shopping. Severus, in his lightest weight woolen trousers, coolest linen shirt, and black leather boots, was already beginning to sweat. The heavy breakfast didn't help matters, and he wished he had stuck with a pastry and some coffee instead. It was barely ten o'clock, and Severus was tempted to roll his sleeves up, as was Draco, but refrained, both self-conscious about their Dark Marks.

They reached the recommended clothing shop and entered.

A wizard, who looked like he was barely old enough to shave, welcomed them all with a warm, "Aloha."

"Yes, we just relocated here, and we need more appropriate attire for your local clime," Severus said.

"Dude, what?" he said, looking at Severus blankly. Noticing the welcome packets clutched in their hands, the shopkeeper suddenly brightened up and said, "Ah, sanctuary seekers. Sweet. I guess you'll be needing new duds if yer gonna live here, huh?"

"Yes, you could say that," Severus remarked dryly. The young wizard had a dark golden tan and light brown hair that was sun-bleached toward the tips of his unruly mop – but certainly did not speak like a proper Englishman.

"Alright, then. Wahine, this way," the young wizard said, his arm outstretched toward one side of the store.
Severus, Ginny, and Draco didn't know who he was referring to.

"Ladies," the shopkeeper clarified before showing Ginny over to the section featuring fashions for the tropical witch.

He even showed her different ways how to tie a pareo, which was nothing more than a large, patterned rectangle of cloth artfully wrapped around the body. It could be worn as a dress by itself, as a skirt, or just a cover-up while wearing a bathing suit. Then there were muumuu dresses of various styles from billowy with long sleeves to snug-fitting spaghetti-strap ones that would hug her curves. Ginny pulled out an armload of clothes and began trying them on in the fitting room, which was nothing but some hung cloth dividers.

From the radio in corner, the local Wizarding Wireless Network was playing some Hawaiian music. The sounds of a slack guitar gently strumming away while someone sang in the Hawaiian language was just loud enough to be heard, as soft background music. It was all very restful and relaxing, and Severus, though not accustomed to the music, did not find it grating on his nerves at all, but even a bit soothing.

"Kane... that means men," the young wizard said, directing Severus and Draco to the men's fashions on the other side of the store.

"Um, there certainly are a lot of short-sleeved shirts," Draco remarked.

Looking at them with their long-sleeved shirts and their pale skin, the shopkeeper said, "So where you guys come from, Ireland?"

What was it with these Yanks guessing they came from every country but England? Could they not hear their accent and tell the difference? Evidently not, based on a third assumption they were from yet another country other than England.

"England."

"Cool." The young wizard bobbed his head up and down for a bit, some nonverbal gesture showing he approved. "Yeah, my grandfather sought sanctuary from England back in 1945, but he doesn't talk about it. He certainly lost a lot of his accent since he doesn't sound anything like you guys."
Severus' back went straight. The only wizards from England who would be seeking sanctuary in Malu Palekaiko around that time would be Grindelwald's followers after Dumbledore defeated him. It was the exodus of Grindelwald's followers to this tiny island that cause Dumbledore to expunge the entire Hawaiian Island chain from every wizarding book in Great Britain. There were one or two books which referred to "The Sandwich Islands", but even then, it was in passing with no specifics. But as Mounga told Severus, people usually changed their ways once coming here, seeking to fit into society and not cause trouble anymore.

The former spy would have to see if there would be bad blood still felt towards them by Grindelwald's former followers, should they discover he and Draco were once Dumbledore's men.

Even Draco knew his history and gave Severus a fleeting glance that he too was concerned.

Most everything on the racks was bright and a bit obnoxious. The shopkeeper, who did know a bit about fashion, steered Draco towards the pale pastels, helping him pull out a pale blue and silver Hawaiian shirt with a subtle bamboo pattern. He said it would accent his eyes and not make him look so washed-out, considering the blond hadn't built up a tan yet.

Severus was directed to the darker shades. The shopkeeper pulled out a black Hawaiian shirt with an asymmetrical pattern featuring green foliage, and another in a dark wine-red with a hibiscus pattern in white.

As for trousers, the only ones were denim for those who wanted to go hiking out onto the lava bed. Severus bought a pair, as he knew he would be doing that while exploring the island. The denim was practical, since he read in his welcome packet some formations of lava were very sharp, with one type of lava called a'a (ah-ah), which is exactly the sound one would be making should one fall on it. Its texture was described as broken glass, and just as sharp from the lacerations one would suffer if one fell on it.

Severus and Draco knew they'd have to start wearing shorts, as it seemed to be the prevalent style and they would fit in better with the locals. Also, it was not even noon and they were dying to get into something cool and made of cotton, even if it meant their pasty white legs were exposed.

Severus came out of the changing room sporting a pair of beige-colored shorts with lots of pockets and a loop to hold his wand, and the black Hawaiian shirt that was selected for him.

The shop keeper said, "Whoa, that is some wicked ink there, dude. What is that? Wizard or Muggle?"
Severus uncomfortably noticed the young wizard was pointing to his Dark Mark. Severus decided not to make an issue out of it as that would only draw attention to it. "Wizard," he replied, his voice a bit clipped.

"That's totally sweet. I got this one bit of wizard ink when I finished school last summer. My mom had a total cow, but oh well," he said in his particular drawl that was not exactly like the others they had met, and seemed more American than the very slight hint of Hawaiian accent Halulu and Mounga spoke with. At that point, the shopkeeper started unbuttoning his shirt to show off the wizard ink on his chest of a shark surfing along the waves. "They call me Shark and I like to surf, so it only seemed natural."

The wizard tattoo of the shark was swimming with the wave, surfing along as it crested, its tail moving back and forth.

Severus politely nodded. He hoped they could finish shopping soon and move onto getting some footwear soon.

Draco came out and instantly looked like he belonged as a local, except for the blindingly white skin. His long hair, lean silhouette with a muscular form, and insouciant attitude made him look like he'd blend in once he got a bit of sun. Which brought up a whole new set of issues.

Malfoys burned easily to a crisp in the sun.

They would have to get some potions to help ease the tanning process, otherwise Ginny and Draco were not going to have any opportunity to be intimate if Draco was suffering from a sunburn. There were potions to take the pain away and ease the transition from days to a few hours, Severus had read that in his literature provided, but sunburns were not fun to suffer through even for a short period of time.

During Severus' Potions apprenticeship, Reginald Chuff had dragged Severus out into the deep deserts of Northern Africa, and had not warned Severus where they was going or to bring protection from the sun. Chuff, who had brought a hat and appropriate attire for himself, seemed to find some perverse pleasure in Severus suffering from a sunburn, feeling cold at night in their tent, and unable to pull a blanket over to cover himself as the blanket seemed to warm the skin and make the skin burn even more. Severus did not have any potions for sunburn or anything to ease his pain, so he had to deal with it for three days until he got back and could brew something himself. Severus would not let Draco suffer like he did.
Ginny emerged from her own dressing room in a bright green tight-fitting sleeveless muumuu that contrasted with her red hair nicely, as well as accented her figure.

The two lovers kissed briefly and remarked about each other's clothes before Ginny went back to put on the other clothes she had yet to try.

Severus wound up getting six pairs of shorts in the same style but in different colors, and seven shirts. There was surely more clothing stores on this island, as there were about a half-dozen listed in the welcome packet, but this would get him started without having to run off to have laundry done every day.

Shark didn't sell any shoes, but he directed them to some place three doors down that did.

Ginny paid for their clothes, since she was the one with the money and Draco had yet to visit the local Gringotts branch.

Once outfitted with new clothes and footwear – a mix of lightweight shoes, sandals and a pair of hiking boots for Severus – they stopped by the apothecary for sunburn and tanning potions, plus some mosquito repellent.

Suddenly, between the heat of the day that was building and their activities, all three decided to go back to their hotel and take a rest, feeling the effects of Portkey lag and an eleven-hour time difference. Their circadian rhythms had not reset to their new time zone.

Back at the hotel, Severus hoped he could sleep this time without being woken up by obnoxious Aurors or a screaming Justina.

As Severus lay in bed beneath the mosquito netting, he imagined Hermione wrapped in a pareo, a single knot tied around the back of her neck keeping her clothed, with nothing on underneath. How one simple knot could be undone and reveal her body to him appealed to him greatly.

Had the vial not slipped from her trembling fingers, she would be there with him, lying there nude, commenting on how warm it was.
His hand reached out and touched the pillow next to him, imagining her smiling back at him and asking if he liked her new outfits. They would be wondering what the luau would be like, both of them guessing how close Ginny's attempt at Hawaiian cooking from a cookbook back home really matched local cuisine.

Glancing at the clock, he saw that it was a little past noon, which meant it was about eleven in the evening back in Diagon Alley. The Sirens' Secrets would be having its grand opening in a little over twelve hours; and wondered how the reception would be, considering the sexual nature of the products to be sold, and the recent news of Miss Brown having an affair with Ronald Weasley, as it was known she was a co-partner in the store. He hoped that the scandal would not keep customers away, or just the sheer attraction of going to a store owned by the now infamous Miss Lavender Brown might drive even more customers to it. Either way, he hoped the Galleons from the potions he developed, especially for the store, would help line his vault, once Miss Brown did a bit of money laundering.

As he was falling asleep, Severus could tell that the two love birds had forgotten to put up a Silencing Charm. Instead, he cast his own so he could sleep without being disturbed.

~~~~~~~*~

Exhausted and with her feet killing her from having to stand around the entire time she was there at the grand opening of The Sirens' Secrets, Hermione kicked off her shoes and flopped face down onto her bed. She wanted desperately to get out of these damn tights, but wondered if she had the strength to do it.

"Fuck it," she mumbled into her pillow. Reaching for her wand, straining to pull it free, she finally waved it and all her clothes were off, folded over in a corner in a neat pile.

Hermione didn't use a wand in a way that she thought would be a sign of laziness, such as putting her clothes off and on, brushing teeth, chopping vegetables, and doing other simple tasks she could do herself, but she was thankful she knew the spell to undress.

Now she was nude without a nightgown on. She didn't care and crawled under the covers, recently having grown a likeness for sleeping au naturel. It was a habit she had picked up falling asleep Saturday nights at Severus' flat since he did as well, usually both dropping off after making love.

Now, instead of snuggling in his arms, she dropped off to sleep while thoughts of the evening’s events danced in her head.

Working at The Sirens’ Secrets grand opening had been truly work and not pleasure. She’d had to become acquainted with all the Lovely Lavender Company’s potions so that she could answer questions about them, including potions she hadn’t helped develop. The only thing that helped her keep her sanity from the scandalous stares she received while standing around and answering those questions, was the fact that all the potions were flying off the shelves. Some people were buying four or five bottles at a shot.

Two potions nearly sold out by the end of the night. One was the Male Enhancement Potion that was given the rather obvious name of "Sequoia," which was the genus name for redwood trees. It was a rather obvious attempt to make men think that this potion would give them a big, red piece of wood. The other potion that flew off the shelves was the Arousal Potion Hermione had personally developed with Severus, that had been given the apt name of "Irresistible."

The two potions, besides being sold separately, were also sold together as a "Romantic Evening" package, with a very obvious warning no one was to take both potions that one was for men and the other for women. On the back was a long list of complications that would arise should some wizard get it into his tiny, little, sex-addled brain to take both. There was an emergency antidote included, should someone be thick-headed enough to try it.

With all those potions sold, Hermione could see the Galleons rolling in, which made her not quite so grumpy.

Ron had made a brief appearance and then had to go meet with Bascom regarding an update on the press and Luna's interview with him, which would come out Monday.

Molly hadn’t even shown up, most probably not wanting to be seen in such a shop. Arthur made a quick appearance as well to congratulate the twins on the launch of another business, and Lavender as well, who would soon be his new daughter-in-law. He gave an uneasy smile and glanced about with a nervous eye, no doubt wondering what wizardom was coming to for such a shop to open, but kept his opinions to himself.

Arthur had taken the news of Ron and Hermione's divorce a bit rough at first, but upon being informed about how Molly had practically kicked Ron in the pants into a marriage he neither wanted nor was ready for, and Ron's sincere intentions to be a good and very faithful husband to Lavender, Arthur warmed up to the new arrangement. He wasn't completely happy about the situation, but saw for the three persons involved in this love triangle, it was for the best.

Arthur greeted Hermione and apologized for Molly's behavior. He insisted that had he known that his wife had been so... peremptory with Ronald, he would have stepped in and said something. Hermione wondered if Arthur just chose to ignore his wife's overbearing attitude, instead of acknowledging it when it was a problem at the time. He certainly said or did nothing when Molly harped on about children at family gatherings in front of the whole Weasley clan.
But Hermione supposed that his love for Molly made him blind to her faults, accepting her just as she was. Just as Hermione accepted Severus for his own faults, willing to look past them and take them part and parcel of the whole package.

Bill and Fleur had a house-elf watching the children, since this was not a store for children. Also, the shop had a minimum age restriction of seventeen, the age of consent in the wizarding world, to enter – similar to the age barrier around the Goblet of Fire. Fleur asked about the "Romantic Evening" package; Hermione could not confess she had personally tested it out herself, so instead she answered that she’d read about the effects.

Charlie – who was upset with Ron, Hermione and Lavender, regarding the divorce scandal and siding with his mother, despite his otherwise carefree and contemporary attitude he exhibited – did not show up.

Percy found the whole idea of a sex shop to be beneath his brothers, and the idea that Ron's second wife to be was involved in this enterprise appalled the primmest and most uptight of the Weasley men. He made some excuse that he might come by sometime to check to make sure the shop was up to Ministry standards.

The twins had given Hermione a warm welcome and thanked her for the last-minute idea to add some seasonal flair to their wares. It seemed the bell nipple pasties with pre-spelled sticking charms were a big hit. The pasties rang out little Christmas songs once applied. The store sold out of them before the night was out. George had to run over to the workshop to make more, and they were selling faster than he could make them and stock them on the shelves. The twins had heard from Lavender about how Hermione was going to earn royalties on a few potions she’d consulted on with Delgado, and in return for her inspiration, they’d offered her five percent royalties on the profits from the bell nipple pasties.

Fred had cornered Hermione and asked her if Ron had been a guinea pig for any of the Potions she’d consulted on. Hermione truthfully answered she hadn't tried them with Ron, but Lavender might have, which could have happened; she didn't know, but wouldn't put it past her. Lavender had told Severus she tested them herself, which means Ron must have been part of the testing process as well.

The twins wished that Ginny hadn't arranged her holiday with Harry right before the opening, but couldn't wait for her reaction once she got back. Hermione smiled and nodded, not saying anything.

Hermione would have to check on her vault, the one that was in her name alone, and see how much she’d raked in over the weekend from royalties.
It seemed during the course of the day everyone who was there in Diagon Alley had swung by and checked out the newest shop. Of course the windows were discreetly covered in such a way that no one could see the wares that were sold, but tastefully rendered artwork indicated that this was a shop for adults only without making mothers cover their children's eyes when they passed.

The magical dildos were certainly an item of curiosity, with many witches looking about furtively as they hid one under their cloak to take up to the counter for purchase, so no one would see them traipsing through the store holding one.

A copy of the store's Owl order catalogs were included in all the bags so anyone who wanted to purchase more items, but were too shy to make a personal appearance at the store again, would not be denied the business of pleasure.

And how much more awkward would it have been had Hermione agreed to manage The Sirens' Secrets as she had once been offered by the twins? At least working for Lavender, she was now working on her Potions apprenticeship and not all the potions she would work on would be sex-related.

The Daily Prophet came to report on the opening of the new store, but given the nature of the items for sale, the article would probably wind up on the back page, beneath the obituaries. The placement would likely bring in complaints from grieving family members, who would be even more upset when the newspaper offered to post the obituary again at a reduced rate. That hadn’t stopped the newspaper from taking Lavender's money to do a full-page center spread advertising the store and its grand opening.

Before Hermione dropped off to sleep, Galleons dancing in her head, she made a promise to finally get around to buying an owl for herself and Owl her parents that she would be coming over for dinner some night soon. She had yet to tell them about her divorce and wondered how they would handle the news, though they had probably already read about it given they had a subscription to the Daily Prophet.

Dobmeir had said even though apprenticeships were a seven-day a week arrangement, he understood there were some things Hermione had to do for Lavender that would cut into their time to work together as master and apprentice. He was also amenable enough to let her ask for one day off a week, if she needed it for family and personal business. She would talk to Dobmeir about taking either Saturday or Sunday off next weekend in which to visit her parents.

Given that Wendy Granger's sister, Christine, was divorced, Hermione thought that her parents would probably take the news in stride. Luna certainly had been surprised to discover during the interview earlier in the day that Hermione had an aunt that was divorced and was happily married to another man.

When the Monday edition of The Quibbler would hit the stands, it would be interesting to gauge the wizarding population's reaction to the story. Perhaps once the interview was read by nearly everyone, people would stop staring at Hermione as if she was wearing a scarlet letter.

~~~~~~~*~

While Severus was passed out cold, suffering the after-effects of the Polyjuice Potion, Draco and Ginny had woken up and headed to the local Gringotts branch to check on Draco's vault, too excited to rest. The bank transfer had gone off without a hitch. There was enough money in the vault to last for many years, plus enough to lend Severus to set him up comfortably, but should it run low, there were other vaults all over the world Draco could visit. And hopefully Hermione would not take years to clear their names, as that would mean Draco’s being at risk for being caught abroad should Draco need to run off to another country to transfer funds back to the Malu Palekaiko Gringotts branch.

Then again, once Ginny was married and officially a Malfoy, she would have her own key and her name would be added to the list of people who could access the Malfoy family vaults, as right now Draco was the sole person. If anything, Ginny could go abroad and transfer funds without an Auror hauling her back to England to be brought before the Wizengamot, unless she was convicted in absentia of helping two Death Eaters escape – then all bets would be off.

Waking up, groggy and momentarily confused, Severus wasn't sure looking at the clock if it was ten past six in the morning or in the evening. The light was about the same with the sun down at that time, which meant the sun would rise in half an hour or it had set a half hour ago.

The sound of children playing in the distance and people chatting, filling nearby bars and restaurants with Friday night patrons, told Severus he hadn't slept the clock around. He had traveled by Portkey over different time zones before, but this was by far the hardest time shift to adjust to.

After rising, showering, and shaving, he dressed in some of his new clothes before going to knock on Ginny and Draco's door.

He was bid to enter and found the two engrossed in a game of wizard poker. Draco was winning. Wizard poker was a standard diversion in the Slytherin common room, since it taught Slytherins strategy, how to be more cunning, and to keep an impassive face no matter how good or bad of a hand they had. Ginny, having grown up with six older brothers, wasn't far behind.
Having skipped out on lunch, Severus was famished and suggested that they head out to dinner. Before going out into the night air to walk along the town’s main street, they remembered to bring along their welcome packets in order to smooth over the introduction process.

As they passed one bar called “Bongo's,” its front door wide open to the street, they heard someone call Severus' name out.

"Severus! Sev!" Mounga called out and waved the three of them inside to join him.

As they entered the bar, the bartender spotted new people and shouted "Aloha!" which the patrons mimicked in unison a beat later, greeting the trio.

"Sev, you don't mind if I call you Sev, do you?" Mounga asked.

Severus was about to protest and insist on his full name, but Mounga and the rest of the population had a very laid-back and relaxed attitude; it didn't seem like an insult or a way to diminish any respect for him, just a way of being friendly.

He replied, "It's alright, you can call me Sev, though I'm not used to it," he added hesitantly, hoping they got the hint.

Ginny almost burst into giggles.

Severus couldn't believe that the atmosphere was affecting him as much as allowing that abominable nickname to be associated with him, but he let it slide. If he found he couldn't stand it by the end of the night, he would ask people to use his full name.

"Great, Sev. I'd like to introduce you to my wife, Rainbow," Mounga said with great pride.

The witch sitting next to him on a bar stool was tall, with an average build. She was a striking-looking woman with wavy dark brown hair, skin almost as dark and golden as her husband's, and large brown almond-shaped eyes full of warmth and that spoke of a life of happiness.

"Aloha, Sev. I understand you just came here last night for sanctuary."
"Yes," Severus said, shaking Rainbow's hand, which didn't seem to be enough of a greeting as she got off her bar stool and gave Severus a welcoming hug. "And I'd like to introduce my friends who also came with me seeking sanctuary, Ginny Potter and Draco Malfoy."

"Drake, Ginny, pleasure to meet you," Rainbow said before – not even bothering with a handshake – she embraced the pair like they were old friends.

Severus wondered if the people were just this friendly in Hawaii, the alcohol was loosening polite decorum when meeting new people, or people in cultures of lower latitudes were always this affectionate. He remembered hearing Hermione's tale of the overly affectionate Italians she'd encountered during her honeymoon. Perhaps all three were true.

"Dra-co," the blond wizard muttered as he accented the second syllable, not wanting to have his name turn into a one-syllable nickname – Drake, like the duck – as his mentor was seemingly willing to put up with.

"I'm sorry, Draco," Rainbow apologized. "So what's this I hear from Justina about a wedding?" Rainbow's eyes lit up and Severus could have sworn that her eyes changed color from brown to gold, but given the dim light in the bar, it was hard to tell.

"Well, I just divorced my husband, who I was forced to marry by my mother, after being tricked by her into believing that Draco had disappeared," Ginny explained, trying to keep the long story as short as possible. "So now that I'm free to marry Draco, we want to get married as soon as possible."

"Why not a Christmas wedding. Ooh, or better yet, a New Year's Eve wedding! I hear those things are pretty popular in Scotland. You're from Scotland, right?" Rainbow asked.

"England," Severus corrected her.

'That's four. Yet another country to add to the count,' Severus thought.

"But ooh, it sounds like your love story is so romantically tragic, but with a happy end," Rainbow gushed with relish, placing her cheek in one hand, her elbow resting on the bar.
"Trust me, romantic tragedies might be fun to read in romance novels, but they are depressing as hell to live in real life," Ginny said somberly, her eyes diverted downwards.

"But you're here now, together, and it all worked out in the end. Drinks on us," Rainbow insisted, before waving the bartender over for a round of drinks.

Pointing to Draco first, she said, "A Sharktini for the blond, an Over the Rainbow for Pele's little twin sister, and a Wipe-Out for the Byronic hero," she finished, pointing to Severus.

Had Draco had a mouthful of beverage in his mouth already, he would have spit it out of his mouth. Rainbow seemed to have Severus' number to a tee – Byronic hero indeed.

Severus noted that while Mounaga was more of the silent type, his wife, Rainbow, more than made up in verbosity for the two of them.

"Pele's little sister?" Ginny asked for clarification.

"Pele, goddess of volcanoes, lightning, and wind; the one who made this paradise we live on and the Hawaiian chain with her fire and lava? Known for her power and passion?" Rainbow prompted them. "Lots of siblings?" Draco started sniggering. "Did you read that in your packet yet?"

"No, we've been trying to get some much-needed sleep, breakfast, and clothes," Severus explained for Ginny's lapse in knowledge. "Speaking of which, I didn't eat lunch. Did you?"

Draco and Ginny both shook their heads. They had been busy with Gringotts and each other to bother much with food.

"Well, it'll be one drink then," Rainbow said. Then she warned them, "But within your first week here, you must make a trip to the edge of the caldera and make an offering to Pele in thanks for providing you with sanctuary. To not thank her would be a great offense and bring bad luck." She nodded with great seriousness that she was not joking.

Severus had read about Pele in the Muggle tourism books, but wasn't sure how much of the myth transcended across to wizardom. The Muggle books included horror stories – as a warning – of those who had thought to take a piece of lava rock back home from Hawaii as a souvenir, only to have a string of bad luck, each incident more horrible and ridiculous than the next, until they mailed the rock back and had the string of bad luck end.

Considering this sort of stuff was happening to Muggles, and myth was often based in fact, he wasn't going to risk it and would suggest that all three of them make the trip tomorrow to make an offering to Pele to ensure nothing went wrong. Severus was not superstitious and did not worship foreign deities, but he was cautious.

Just then, their drinks arrived. Draco's Sharktini drink was in a large martini glass; it had a couple blue gummi sharks swimming around that tried to bite his finger when he tried to fish them out to take a sip. Ginny's Technicolor concoction was a drink layered with various fruit juices, liqueurs, and spirits where the colors were exactly in the same order of a rainbow; the tall glass was as shapely as Ginny's silhouette. With each sip, Ginny's cheeks flushed rainbow colors before going back to her naturally freckled pale skin.

Severus' Wipe-Out drink was served up in a very large pineapple that was carved out in the center. Along the rim of the carved out pineapple was an array of various decorations, fruit, and accoutrement. First he picked out the umbrella, then the little plastic red monkey that had already eaten half of his maraschino cherry, a large hibiscus flower, a slice of lime, a sprig of mint, and lastly a zest curl of orange rind skewered with a shaft of fresh bamboo that had still had some leaves attached, but he left the straw.

Peering into the fruit hull container, he sniffed at it and scrutinized it.

"You're a Potions master, aren't you!" Rainbow piped up.

"How can you tell?" he wondered.

"Only a Potions master would analyze a drink like that before drinking it," she astutely observed. "Do you tutor?"

Severus had just had his first sip and he wasn't sure what it was that made him choke. It could have been her question about tutoring, having been glad to no longer face teaching children ever again, or it could have been the mix of distilled palm sap wine mixed with rum and vodka, topped with pineapple juice, coconut liquor, guava juice, and something else masked by the various fruit flavors, but it was most probably both.

As he was about to make it perfectly clear he no longer worked in academia, the first sip hit his stomach and went straight into his veins and up to his brain. Suddenly, Severus was feeling calm. It was like taking a whole vial of Draught of Peace, but his face and fingertips were starting to feel a little numb. If he could remember later, he would have to figure out what that mysterious ingredient was that he couldn't identify.

'I better have another sip of this to see if I can identify that last ingredient,' Severus thought to himself.

Silly wizard.

Suddenly, he realized he was nodding as Rainbow went on about her twelve-year-old at home who needed help with Potions, since she taught her own children herself. She claimed their community was too small to support a fully-staffed wizarding school, and most people home-schooled, bringing tutors in as needed.

"So you might consider tutoring, Sev?" she asked as Severus was on his second... or was it his fourth sip?

"Sure," he said, his speech a little slurred.

Draco quickly took Severus' drink away, which made the older wizard give him a look that was a cross between being affronted and confusion.

"Drinks have been lovely," Ginny said quickly as she and Draco each put an arm under Severus. "So nice to meet you, Rainbow; it was good to see you again, Mounga. But we really need to get some food into him now."

Severus was practically carried out the door. His friends could have used a Mobilicorpus spell, but that would have been even more embarrassing for Severus and his yet untarnished reputation in this small town.

The Potions master had a high tolerance level of alcohol. What he was not used to was the mix of lots of sugar and alcohol together, but Draco suspected there might have been something a little extra added as well. The sugar fed the alcohol, amplifying the effect greatly. On Severus' empty stomach and the strength of the distilled spirits in that alcoholic-filled edible bromeliad, the normally formal Potions master would have danced a jig on the bar singing "I've got a lovely pair of coconuts" if you asked him to; or it could have been that last unknown ingredient(s) that now sent him three sheets to the wind.

Draco was used to seeing Severus drunk on an empty stomach on scotch, gin, whiskey, and vodka, but whatever he’d drank certainly made Severus pissed in no time flat.

As they walked along the boardwalk, their packets rolled up and shoved in various pockets, while they used both hands to carry Severus, one under each arm, they spotted a noodle joint. Carting him inside and plopping him in the nearest chair at a table, since the sign said, "Seat Yourself", they asked the waitress for recommendations for something quick as their friend had just had a drink on an empty stomach and it had gone straight to his head.

"Eh, Eddie!" the waitress bellowed. "We got an empty bottle here! Ramen and fast!"

Before she’d even finished yelling across the small hole in the wall called a restaurant, a bowl of ramen noodles appeared right in front of Severus, topped with slices of pork, bean sprouts, green onions, and fish cake, all sitting in a rich pork broth.

Severus grabbed the chopsticks and tried to arrange them in his hands, but because his fingers were numb, the thin sticks of wood kept slipping out of his hands.

After the third try, one stick fell on the floor and Severus attempted to fetch it off the floor when Ginny huffed in exasperation, "Oh, for Merlin's sake!" She turned and was about to use her wand to Summon a fork when the waitress handed her a fork and spoon for Severus to use, giving her friend a look of pity.

Placing the fork in Severus' hand, Ginny watched with great difficulty as Severus forked a huge mouthful of ramen into his gob, but couldn't find the end of the long noodles, so he started chewing with a bunch of noodles still hanging from his mouth, draping into the bowl. He looked like Chtulu's idiot little brother.

Glancing over at Draco, Ginny saw that he was enjoying this immensely, trying not to bust up into fits of laughter.

"Oh Ginny, when we get a Pensieve, we have got to show Severus this."
Ginny glared at Draco, but then started laughing herself.

Once Severus got the hang of how to use a fork – again – they ordered a couple bowls of noodles for themselves. Ginny ordered a bowl of Vietnamese pho, and Draco ordered the Chinese wonton soup.

Half-way through his dinner, Severus started to come back down to reality.

"How did we get into this..." the confused inebriate was fumbling for the right word, "food-place."

"Restaurant," Ginny offered.

"Right, restaurant?"

"What was the last thing you remember, Severus?" Draco asked, wondering just what the hell was in Severus' drink, because Draco's Sharktini had also been potent, but it hadn't knocked him for a loop like Severus' did.

Severus looked around, no longer slumped over his bowl of ramen. "I just had a sip of that drink. What was it called?"

"Wipe-Out," Ginny answered.

"Perfect name," Severus commented. "Or was it two sips... then next thing I know I'm here and evidently have eaten some...?"

"Ramen," Draco answered this time, enjoying his own bowl of soup, using a spoon.

The waitress – a name tag that said “Flo” – came back over and looked at Severus with her brows raised and asked, "Feeling better, sunshine?"

"Yes, much. Thank you." Severus saw the way the waitress smiled a little sardonically and shook her head as she walked away.
Severus did not even want to ask what spectacle he’d made of himself before coming to his senses. Even in his blindest drunk stupor, he could usually recall everything perfectly, even that time Draco found him piss drunk the night after he’d revealed himself to Hermione, and the offering of gin to Draco. There was that time he’d told Hermione to fuck-off, but that was a rare moment he did not recall with clarity while completely blathered. But whatever he’d drank made his mind a complete blank when trying to recall the events between the first sip and just a few minutes ago.

"I think Rainbow ordered that drink to get you to agree to tutor her son in Potions. You seemed to keep nodding your head as if agreeing," Draco filled his mentor in on lost time.

Severus was in the middle of shoving a fork full of twirled ramen noodles into his mouth when he gave a look to Draco as if to say, "I did not agree, did I?"

After chewing and swallowing, Severus said, "I will just have to clear the matter up with her later. But for tomorrow, a trip to offer something to Pele will be on the agenda. And then I guess we’d better make our appearance at the luau tomorrow night, since it seems we are expected. Besides, once there, I doubt we'll have to haul these around everywhere we go," Severus said as he pulled out his welcome packet which was now curled up and a bit rumpled, having been shoved in his pocket and sat upon.

He tapped his wand on his packet and it was once again flat and no longer creased.

Once dinner was over, paid for by Draco since he did make a trip to the bank, they perambulated down the sidewalk. Draco and Ginny were arm-in-arm, and Severus walked next to them, three abreast. Ginny eventually placed her other arm through Severus’ and the three strolled along, enjoying the tropical breeze that blew up from the shore nearby.

It was nearly nine at night and Severus felt wide awake as if it was morning time. He would have to brew some Invigoration Draughts and sleeping potions until his body adjusted to the new time zone. Then he realized he didn't have any space to work, now that he could brew Potions, nor did he have any equipment except for some knives and a few kitchen implements he’d brought along. He would have to see if Justina had a spare cauldron he could use in her kitchen to do some simple brewing until his long-term housing arrangements could be ironed out.

Ginny and Draco, who had not slept nearly as much as Severus did, were ready to turn in early. Given all that had happened in the last twenty-four hours, they were ready to get some much needed rest.
Severus said he would return to the hotel later and wanted to drink in the night.

The shore was a few short blocks away, so he walked towards it along the beach that stretched along the harbor in the nearly full moon. Looking about, he noticed a strange movement in the sand and wondered if it was a trick of the pale silvery light. Holding his wand out down towards the ground, he said, "Lumos."

The beach was covered in a carpet of insects crawling in every direction. It certainly took away the romantic notion of wishing Hermione was there walking with him, with the palm trees swaying and the moonlight on the shimmering water.

Ignoring the insects, as they were crushed beneath his sandals, Severus could imagine Ginny and Draco finally reaching the room to see giant cockroaches on the wall and mosquito netting he had read about, and had just viewed by wand-light.

These weren't ordinary cockroaches that scampered for darkness when you turned on the light, these were the infamous giant Hawaiian cockroaches, approximately one to three inches in length, that practically told you to fuck off and would fly at you, should you try to chase them away.

Yes, he could almost make out the distant noise of Ginny’s strident shriek of terror, but the sound of crashing surf masked the sound. Maybe Severus should have warned Ginny not to banish the geckos from their room. Pity she and Draco didn't read far enough along in their packets.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: I have commissioned Miokah to do a piece of fan art of Drunk!Severus trying to eat ramen. You can view it here: http://www.deviantart.com/art/Drunk-Eating-COM-598629023

Thank you to be betas, JuneW and Cygnuz for their excellent beta skills in cleaning up this chapter.

Ohana means “family” in Hawaiian, so the Ohana Family Diner is actually the “Family Family Diner.”

If you want a sample of what was coming over the WWN while Severus, Draco and Ginny were shopping in Shark's shop, you can listen to some Hawaiian music here on YouTube: https://youtu.be/fjbiKCzlFZQ

I wrote this chapter in June 2014. So when I went to Kailua-Kona, Hawaii in April 2015, imagine my surprise when I discovered there was a restaurant called “Bongo Ben's” right in the heart of town, less than a year after I wrote about a bar called “Bongo's.” Talk about hitting very close to the mark.

If you think I am making up the cockroaches for my story, you are sadly mistaken. The cockroaches really are that big and aggressive in Hawaii: http://www.instanthawaii.com/cgi-bin/hawaii?Animals.roach

My mom recounted the story of her and my father's second honeymoon for their 25th wedding anniversary. On Kauai, they had a room right on the beach. On one moonlit night, they decided to sit on a long log on the beach by their room and enjoy the moonlight on the water.

As my mother sat there, she said, "Honey, the sand is moving."

My dad said, "You're imagining it."

Until he looked closer and they both noticed the entire beach was covered with crawling insects.

They promptly went inside.

It was in the middle of summer and the insects are less prevalent on the beach in winter. I know it is early December for this chapter, but this was too good a scene not to incorporate into my story.
Chapter Summary

Severus, Ginny and Draco attend the Christmas recital and luau: Ginny dances and Severus attracts a few admirers.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Seventy-Two “Friends, Food, and Flirtation”

Disclaimer: (in Pig Latin)
Allyay ecognizableray aracterschay elongbay otay Jay Kay owlingRay andyay associatesyay. oNay opyrightcay infringementyay intendedyay.
(All recognizable characters belong to JK Rowling and associates. No copyright infringement intended.)

Severus and Draco were waiting in the hotel lobby for Ginny to come downstairs The invitation to the luau said it would start at four o'clock, and it was already four-fifteen.

Draco's foot tapped impatiently while he muttered under his breath about Ginny planning her time better.

Even Severus did not want to show up late. It would not make a good impression to arrive late for introductions before the festivities began.

Ginny had to dig out all her belly dancing wear from the bottom of her own handbag that had been enlarged with an Extension Charm, plus find her music box that had all her belly dancing music on it. Then there was the decision of what to wear – the green or the red-orange-gold outfit? Or should she wear the peach-colored outfit? Maybe the blue one? Turkish-style belt or Egyptian-style? What finger cymbals did she want to use – her large ones or the smaller ones with the higher pitch? And then what caftan to wear as a cover-up until it was time to dance? At least all her scarves were easy to find and none of the silk had torn in transit, which she worried about despite her very careful packing.
Justina had already taken off for the luau, saying she had to get there early to help set up and get dressed, since she was dancing with the hula teachers at the beginning of the evening.

Draco was about to run upstairs and drag Ginny out, ready or not, when she finally emerged from their room and descended the stairs. Severus could hear her long before he saw her, with her costume sewn with rows of coins. Not that Severus could see them, as she was already wearing her caftan over her outfit. She had her long silk scarf wrapped around her neck to place it somewhere until it was time to dance.

She was wearing some bejeweled sandals and heavy make-up around the eyes, accenting them with lots of eye shadow, kohl, and mascara. When Draco asked why she needed more sandals if she already had the ones she was currently wearing, she explained that they were for her costume.

"But you dance barefoot. I don't see why you can't wear them besides when you dress up?" he lamented.

Ginny shook her head as they headed off to the community center, the wizards hoping they wouldn't be perceived as rude for showing up late.

They arrived at the large outdoor center, its sides open to the cool evening breeze. There was a large stage at one end and a communal kitchen towards the back. The tables were full of food, but hardly anyone was there.

"Did we miss it?" Draco asked, holding Ginny's music box that he'd carried from the hotel.

Someone who was placing some rice balls along the table, trying to find an available spot among the other dishes that packed the long buffet, just looked at Draco and laughed.

"The invitation did say four o'clock," Severus said, aloud.

The old wizard who had brought the rice balls came over, laughing to himself. "You must be the new folk. You're on Hawaiian time, haole. When they say four, they mean it might start by five, but will probably really get going at six. Aloha and welcome to Malu Palekaiko."
The old wizard wandered off snickering to himself, leaving the three alone amid the empty community center.

"I told you," Ginny hissed with irritation. "But would you two listen to me? Noooo. Justina even told me not to rush. But you two—"

Draco didn't want to hear her harping on, so he grabbed her and kissed her firmly. Ginny initially protested, but she eventually relented.

"Better now?" Draco asked.

Ginny gave him a satisfied smile, before her eyes went wide and she gasped, "My lipstick!" before running off to the toilet to fix it, rummaging around in her caftan pocket for her tube of lipstick and her wand to remove the smudges.

"Better early than late," Draco mused allowed.

Even though Severus agreed with Draco, he did feel a little foolish. Even the Muggle tourism books warned about the lax punctuality of the local population, but being from England and conducting classes for all those years at Hogwarts where every minute of class time was precious and filled with instruction, Severus was still a slave to the clock. It would take some time to get used to this new attitude regarding time and punctuality – or lack thereof.

At last, people began filing into the community center, bringing their instruments, dragging along children, many of them dressed in little ti-leaf skirts or muumuus for the big Christmas recital and show. The adults began introducing themselves to the newcomers, having heard through the grapevine about the three who were just granted sanctuary.

Eventually Halulu showed up and told Draco where to put Ginny's music box. But before she went to begin coordination of all her dancers for the evening ahead, she presented Ginny with a lei of purple and white orchid flowers. Following the more formal tradition, Halulu held it aloft about mid-chest and allowed Ginny to take it from her and place it on herself, followed by a kiss on the younger witch's cheek.

Draco was also quickly thereafter greeted by Gary, who presented him a lei of white orchids and white double Arabian jasmine flowers, a palette of white to match the wizard's pale features in the same manner. The blond wizard had to bend down a little to receive his kiss from Gary.
Mounga greeted Severus with another great hug and clap on the back, but without the same bone-crushing quality to it. Rainbow was standing next to her husband, holding the lei for him while he greeted the Potions master. Severus was presented with a double twist lei of white and green orchids and kissed upon the cheek by the wizard who knew his secrets. Rainbow also greeted Severus and gave him a kiss.

"I helped make your lei, Mr. Snape," piped up one child next to Mounga, holding her father's hand and smiling up at him expectantly.

"Well, thank you. It's very pretty," he told her. This child had helped in making him feel welcome, and it stirred something in Severus.

As a Potions master at Hogwarts, and Head of Slytherin House, Severus was used to the prejudices of the other children against his House. Even Ron Weasley had made the blanket statement that only bad wizards came from Slytherin. And his reputation as a hard task master and demanding instructor often preceded him, so children had already formed their own opinions about him before first seeing him at the head table during the Welcoming Feast. Those attitudes were usually either hostile, disrespectful, or full of fear, as in Longbottom's case. This small child held no preconceived notions of him and treated him respectfully and with a little kindness.

Severus was introduced to Mounga and Rainbow's children. The oldest was a witch, Akela, who was fifteen; she looked very much like her mother, and was almost just as tall. Rainbow was nearly Severus' height, it was surprising to see a young witch who was almost eye to eye with him. She greeted him with a handshake, and he could have sworn she was blushing.

Their second child was Iakona, the twelve-year-old wizard in need of some Potions tutoring. The boy was looking a bit shy, but stuck his hand out and said, while looking Severus in the eye, "It's a pleasure to meet you, sir."

The third and youngest of their children, the one who'd helped make Severus' lei, was Kaimi, who was eight. Upon Severus learning her child’s name, Rainbow muttered to her husband as an aside, "I still can't believe you named our child after a Quidditch position."

"Kaimi means 'The Seeker',' the young witch volunteered. "Do you like Quidditch, Mr. Snape? It's my favorite sport, more than swimming!"

Severus smiled at this child and spoke to her with the same respect she had shown him. he said, "I "Really?" Kaimi beamed brightly. She turned to her father and said, "I really like him, Papa. He's even nicer than you said he was." She then found her attention drawn to a gaggle of her friends of the same age and then ran off to play with them, before they would have to line up in groups to dance.

The two other children went off to join their own friends, and Severus was left standing with the parents.

"You have a lovely family," Severus said a little wistfully.

Rainbow grasped Severus' hand and thanked him for his compliment.

Standing next to each other with no one listening in, Mounga said to Severus quietly, just enough so that only Severus could hear, "Perhaps if that witch of yours sees you again, you can have a family just as wonderful as mine. It just takes lots of love, Sev. Remember that love is the most powerful thing in the universe."

Severus' heart stopped for a moment in his chest. That last sentence was the same exact words his vision of Albus had said to him as Severus fought his growing affections for Hermione; Severus never made mention of that sentiment during his recent interrogation.

"Did you ever have a chance to meet Albus Dumbledore, Mounga?" Severus asked, just to be sure.

"No, but it sounds like he was a pretty cool dude who knew what he was talking about, even if he did try to wipe all memory of Hawaii from everyone in Great Britain." Mounga patted Severus on the back before excusing himself to go talk with some other friends.

News of Severus being a Potions master had spread, no doubt from Rainbow's lips since Mounga was less likely to gossip, as he was bound to hold Severus' secrets confidential. The two other Potions masters on the island introduced themselves and they began an animated discussion about their favorite subject, asking what Severus did before arriving to the island. Learning that he had taught at Hogwarts for so many years and had experience in commercial manufacturing, research, and development, led to a promise to meet next week to talk shop some more.
Ginny and Draco were swarmed by others, fascinated by Draco working in advertising and marketing, since that seemed such a Muggle pursuit. However, given the heavy Muggle influence in the community, as many of the other sanctuary-seekers over the years tended to be predominantly Muggle-borns, it was not looked down upon.

As Severus was talking to one witch who inquired about Potions tutoring, a small child, approximately five years old, came up and yanked on the edge of his shirt.

Looking down at the moppet, he was met with a pair of honest dark brown eyes and a head of straight black hair.

"Are you an albino?" the child asked curiously.

Severus was flummoxed by this child's question, and before he could formulate a diplomatic response amid the crowd of people – trying not to snarl at the urchin for posing such a rude question – a witch ran over and apologized profusely, grabbing her child by the hand to lead him away.

"I am so sorry. Miguel, you apologize to the man immediately," she lightly chastised her son.

"But Mama, he's so white. I read about albino animals and you said it was because they didn't have any pigment in their skin," Miguel protested, unaware of the social faux pas he committed.

"Well, that wasn't a very nice way to ask him if you were curious," she told him. "Besides, if he was really albino, his hair would be white like his skin. He has black hair, see?"

"I'm sorry," the small boy apologized to Severus, sniffling as he buried his head against his mother's skirt, ashamed. Then spotting Draco, he pointed at him and said, "Then will you ask that wizard if he's albino?"

Severus suddenly found humor in the child's question and began to laugh against his better judgment. He could just imagine how Draco would react to some random brat asking if he was an albino, and Ginny bursting into fits of laughter.

"Hi, I'm Maria," the mother of the socially awkward child introduced herself as she extended her hand. Her accent sounded like she spoke Spanish, but it had a South American flavor to it that he had trouble placing.

"Severus," he replied, and shook her hand.

"I know. Well, I guess I'll be seeing you around," Maria said.

As she left, he could have sworn she was almost batting her eyes at him, as she guided her child over to meet Draco and Ginny. Hopefully they would make a smoother introduction than the one he had just experienced.

The buffet line finally opened and everyone herded over to sample a little bit of everything people had brought to the potluck. The food was as diverse as the town's population. There was chicken satay from Thailand, Japanese rice balls, American southern fried chicken, and a spicy Ethiopian vegetable dish with okra, potatoes, onions, garlic, ginger and pepper sauce. There was also Peruvian Papa a la Huancaina, bowls heaping with chop suey or glass noodles mixed with sesame oil and finely sliced vegetables, Russian pierogies, meat and vegetarian Indian dishes, Mexican pork and beef tamales, stuffed chilies smothered in a mole sauce, German sauerkraut with smoked Hanover sausage, and Italian veal stew. And then there was the seafood! Fish and shellfish of every type locally caught, prepared with teriyaki sauce, soy sauce, chili sauce, lemon sauce, garlic sauce, and tomato sauce. The fish was grilled, baked, fried, poached, sautéed, cured, and sliced raw as sashimi with pickled ginger and freshly grated wasabi on the side.

And then there were nearly a dozen different versions of macaroni salad, as well as the ubiquitous poi. The gray-purple goo, made from taro root, looked as appetizing as wallpaper paste, and the Muggle tourism books warned that to some it tasted the same as well. The books said that poi was a “local delicacy” that was a bit of an acquired taste.

Severus had a hard time choosing. He tried to get the equivalent of one small bite of each appetizing dish, but considering the copious number of dishes, even he wound up with a heaping pile of food he knew he would have trouble finishing that night.

While standing in the buffet line, as he selected from the various dishes, a Chinese witch stood next to Severus and began chatting excitedly in Mandarin with another Chinese witch on the other wise of the buffet table.

"So this wizard next to me is a Potions master," said one witch with a slightly weathered face, wearing a bright red silk jacket with a Mandarin collar.
"Really? Do you think he takes commissions? Arnold won't take it since he knows my husband, and he's such a blabbermouth," said her friend, who was wearing a floor-length pale olive green cheongsam and was about the same age.

Severus listened in, since he spoke, read, and wrote Chinese, classical and vernacular – the latter similar to Mandarin. He let them continue on with their conversation, pretending he didn't understand them.

"Couldn't hurt to ask," the witch in red urged her friend.

"Yes, but would he brew a vial of Iron Mountain of Marital Happiness for Bao?"

Severus secretly smiled to himself, listening to these two wonder if he could brew a potion for the witch in the green dress to improve her husband’s virility.

Speaking in vernacular Chinese, Severus piped up, "Of course I can take commissions, but I need to purchase some new Potions equipment first. I have recently developed a Potion just as potent with a duration of up to three hours, or as mild as two, whereas the Iron Mountain of Marital Happiness only lasts for a little over one hour. If three hours is too long, I can always brew the—"

Severus was familiar with the Chinese virility potion as he had used it as a reference, along with the Beam of the Red Oak potion, for creating the potion now sold under the name "Sequoia" at The Sirens' Secrets.

The two witches’ mouths initially hung open in shock that he could not only speak Chinese, but had heard their entire conversation. Upon hearing Severus boast about a potion with more than twice the duration of the Iron Mountain of Marital Happiness potion, they cut him off when he considered brewing the shorter-duration potion.

The witch in the green dress excitedly said, "No! No, three hours would be wonderful! Please let us know when you can make some! Please, any price."

Between this request and the requests for Potions tutoring, Severus began reconsidering them as a source of income, should the small fortune he earned working for Miss Brown be tied up for an undetermined about of time. He would think more on this later; for now, there was food to consume.
At the end of the buffet line was a huge pig that had been slowly cooked in a pit for at least twelve hours. There were wizards at the end carving it up and placing the tender cooked meat on plates as people passed. It wasn't so much as carving the meat – it was shredding it, since the pig had been cooked until the meat was falling apart.

As Severus received his own portion of luau pig, he was told desserts were going to be laid out later. Severus was going to be stuffed; he didn't think he would have room for any sweets.

Joining Ginny and Draco at the communal-style picnic benches that would be easily transformed into forward-facing seating later on, he noticed Ginny had little food on her plate, then remembered she would be dancing in the show.

As they ate, people continued to come over and introduce themselves to the three. Some of them spotted a little bit of their own contribution to the potluck, asking the newcomers if they liked their dish.

In the middle of working down the heaping pile of food, the lights dimmed towards the front of the pavilion and spotlights were focused on the stage. A group of middle-aged women, including Justina, took the stage and began a slow hula, dancing along to the witches and wizards on the side of the stage playing guitars, ukuleles, mandolins, a didgeridoo, a piano, and various native percussive instruments and drums.

Ginny watched with rapt attention, noting the similarities and differences to her own belly dancing style she knew. Severus admired the graceful movements and slow purpose to each placement of their hands, the gentle sweep of an arm, the turn of the head, movement of hips, and position of the feet. At the end of each dance, there was applause. After two dances, the troupe of witches left the stage to make room for the next dance group. There were lots of performers, and Severus noted that it looked like half the crowd would be performing on stage whether singing, dancing, or playing music.

The next group were the keiki, or the young children's group. A string of little witches, all between the ages of three and five, walked on stage, all holding hands. As they began to dance their hula – some showing a natural talent more than others, some turning in the wrong direction before correcting themselves once they noticed – there was a collective murmur and cooing from the audience. The children were quite adorable as they performed on stage, doing their best to make their parents proud.

Glancing over at Ginny, Severus noticed how her eyes were glowing, as she was pointing to Draco to notice one small little witch who seemed to show a little more sass and confidence than the rest. Ginny looked smitten, like she was going to ask Draco if he could pick one out for her, like a kitten from the litter.
Severus could tell that Ginny would be going off contraceptive potions before their first wedding anniversary, and by the way that Draco seemed to be gazing at the little witches with the same adoration, he didn't think it would take any convincing for Draco to agree.

The keiki were doing a Christmas hula, placing their hands above their heads like antlers, with the singer to the side singing about Santa and his reindeer. Their second hula was a story about giving and getting presents, and Christmas wishes, where the boys joined the girls on stage, dancing the more masculine style of hula.

Once done, the next succession of groups came up and took turns doing two songs before leaving the stage, each troupe rising in age, in different brackets. There were a few boys-only hula troupes. There wasn't a lot of children, since the island didn't have a population of more than five-thousand, but it seemed that nearly most of the children were involved in some form of the Hawaiian performing arts. Kaimi performed with the six- to eight-year-old group, and Akela with the fourteen- to seventeen-year-old group. Iakona was one of the musicians who rotated in and played guitar while his older sister danced.

Before the adult women's groups came on, Halulu signaled to Ginny that it was time.

"Wish me luck," she nervously whispered before walking over to the corner of the stage.

Halulu put her wand to her throat and cast the Sonorus Charm. "Aloha, everyone!"

Everyone chanted Aloha back.

"Let's have a round of applause for all our children's groups and our hula teachers who started out the program tonight."

There was a round of applause that eventually died down.

"As most of you know, we have three new additions to our community. Severus, Draco and Ginny. Why don't you stand so everyone can see you," Halulu urged them.

Severus and Draco stood, gazing about as all eyes turned to them.
"Let's all give them a warm Aloha!"

The crowd loudly chanted a hearty "ALOHA!"

Severus and Draco knew the call-and-response protocol, and said back as best as they could muster, "Aloha" before promptly sitting back down, hoping to never be the center of attention quite like that ever again. Severus could address three-hundred students at Hogwarts without batting an eye, but this was far different.

Halulu continued with her introduction. "Now I personally interviewed Ginny here when she asked us for sanctuary. And she has agreed to let me share with you that she does Middle Eastern belly dancing. I have asked her to perform tonight and she has agreed, so let's welcome Ginny to the stage."

There was applause and murmurs of excitement now that Ginny had taken off her caftan. She was wearing her red, orange, and gold-colored outfit. Her red bra was covered with intricate beadwork of the three colors, a couple rows of coins, and fringe in orange and gold that hung freely down from the band of her bra, brushing the edges of her rib cage as she walked.

Her belt was adorned in the same pattern of beadwork, coin, and fringe. Ginny's skirt, which came down to the floor, was a custom dye pattern of red at the top blending to orange in the middle and golden yellow at the bottom. She had her silk scarf – dyed in the same red, orange, and yellow color-bleeding pattern – floating free behind her. She decided at the last minute to ditch the finger cymbals, leaving them on the table with Draco, and just dance with her scarf.

She was shapely with a full bust and a long fall of red hair. Ginny looked like a fire-made human.

Striking a pose, the nervous dancer signaled to Halulu to begin her pre-selected music.

There was a swell of violins, the plucking of an oud, and the sweet call of a wooden flute holding a sustained note in the air for a long introduction before the melody began.

Ginny began by swirling her silk scarf around, its light gossamer fabric floating without the aid of magic. Her arms moved with a serpentine grace, and she controlled the direction and movement of her scarf as if dancing with a lover.
She held it in front of her, as a partition between her and the audience, lowering it slowly, revealing her chest and stomach more and more as she began to undulate her hips and stomach muscles with precision, her shoulders and bust slowly rotating and swirling in time to the music.

Severus had never thought of Ginny in a sexual manner, even though he was fully aware of her and Draco having a very satisfying sex life, but until that moment, he had never seen the sensual side of Ginny that she was expressing on the stage, her eyes glancing about with long sultry stares. He had viewed Ginny like an adopted daughter or a favorite niece, but he could certainly understand the temptation of a witch like that and could not deny he found her quite alluring at that moment. Now Severus knew why Draco got that far-away look in his eyes when he would tell him that Ginny had recently danced for him.

As the intro ended, the keyboard and drums picked up and the beat quickened. Ginny twirled her scarf behind her and held it behind her, draped behind her back. She began to shimmy her hips and move her chest, making it rise and fall in sharp movements, moving her rib cage independently from her stomach and hips.

In the middle of the song was the short drum solo in which Ginny shook her hips up and down, back and forth, making her stomach roll like waves on an ocean, alternating with her chest and shoulders, and sometimes moving them at the same time. It required a lot of coordination and practice, and Ginny had been dancing for ten years. Her experience showed, and she was a mesmerizing vision to behold. There were a few shouts from the men in the audience in appreciation of Ginny's dancing abilities.

As the dance came to a close, she twirled faster and faster until striking the final pose with the final beat of the song.

The whole community center erupted in raucous and jubilant applause, most standing and clapping, many of the men whistling, a few sending sparks shooting out of the ends of their wands and into the air where tiki torches floated above.

Severus leaned over and said quietly to Draco, "You are a very lucky wizard indeed."

Draco beamed with pride, smiling to himself, and said, "I know."

Ginny bowed, her hands in front of her with her palms pressed together, and nodded in gratitude of their applause before she exited the stage. There were a great many sounds of disappointment from... the audience that Ginny wasn't going to perform a second song, until Halulu told the crowd that at the next community show, Ginny would perform two songs like the rest of the groups. Halulu reminded them that Ginny had traveled a great deal recently, and that they should not over-exhaust her on her first week there.

A group of young witches ran up to Ginny and began excitedly asking the new belly dancing star about her dancing style and if she taught.

"You have to dance as Pele at the Summer Pele Festival!" one young witch gushed.

Ginny put her caftan back on, answering questions, but then suggested that the girls talk to her later since she didn't want to miss the adult women's performances.

The women's group came on, and they danced with precision and grace. There was one group who danced Tahitian-style with the quick swirling and twist of the hips, in time to fast drums and percussive beats played on gourd drums and wooden logs carved to create a certain sound. Some of the moves were similar to Ginny's dancing.

The men's group came out and danced their hula as well, knees moving together and apart, arms strong and forceful in their movements. Severus nudged Draco's arm and jutted his chin in the direction of the shirtless men dancing on stage, silently asking Draco if he would take up hula. The pale blond wizard gave him a look that said it was not bloody likely.

Once the men finished there was one more request for applause for all of the dancers who had performed tonight. Then they announced that dessert was now served at the other end of the pavilion.

Severus was still stuffed to the gills, but he did have a cup of Kona coffee. As a young couple was talking to Severus, Akela, Mounga and Rainbow's oldest daughter, came up with a small plate with a dainty coconut tartlet on it.

"I made these for the luau," Akela said demurely. She was glancing down, but looking up through her lashes at Severus in a shy yet flirtatious manner. "I was hoping you would try one."

Severus graciously accepted her offer and took the plate, taking a bite out of courtesy so as not to hurt the young girl's feelings, despite feeling overly full from dinner. It was very good and he gave her his honest opinion that it was delicious. She smiled sweetly at him before running off, obviously smitten.

Draco sidled up next to his mentor and with a sotto voce voice said, "They have a term for that in the States. It's called 'jail bait.'"

Severus fixed him with a furious glare and growled under his breath, "Don't even joke about that. Not ever."

The former older gigolo had bedded many a young witch who had reached the age of consent, straight from the halls of Hogwarts. They had wished to have their first time with someone who would be gentle and knew what they were doing, versus the boys their age who were selfish, impatient and clueless as to what to do with a woman's body. He had taken enough maidenheads, and that chapter of his life was now closed and over with.

It was a long evening of food, meeting new people, song, and dance. Severus couldn't wait to get back to the hotel and fall into his bed, as he was finally starting to synchronize with the new time zone.

Draco and Ginny stayed behind and chatted with people, while Severus excused himself by explaining he was still suffering from Portkey lag.

Back at the hotel, lying nude upon the bed, Severus imagined Hermione dancing the hula for him. He envisioned the slow graceful movement of her arms, the movement of her hips in time to a softly strumming guitar.

His hand reached down and began to stroke his own flesh, his body missing Hermione and the release and comfort that she brought him. As Severus’ eyes slowly closed, he envisioned her in a simple ti-leaf skirt, topless, her hair falling down her back and along the tops of her breasts, moving in time to songs Severus still had echoing in his mind from earlier in the evening. He could almost imagine her there in bed with him, a garland of orchids in her hair, her breasts swaying and bouncing as she rode him, telling him that she loved him.

Severus came with a strangled gasp, as he realized he had forgotten to put up a Silencing Charm; he remained as quiet as possible. The sticky semen was splashed across his stomach, clinging to the black hairs that trailed from his chest to his pubic region.

This was going to be hard. From an active sex life to a non-existent one once again.
He hoped it wouldn't be too long before Hermione cleared his name and finished her Potions apprenticeship. Not only did his body miss her, but his heart as well.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Please give some praise towards my betas for this chapter: JuneW and Hope. All my betas are wonderful unsung heroes that deserve some of the praise you people give to me in your reviews. Betas make fanfic a much better experience for you readers.

Haole (howl-lee) is a Hawaiian word for “stranger” that is now used as a term for tourist or white Caucasians. Often used in a not very complimentary manner.

Ti-leaf skirts are made of large green leaves from the ti (tee) plant. The skirt is often called a “grass” skirt but it is not made of grass; the ti leaves can be finely shredded so that the skirt looks like grass.
"The Child Is Gone"

Chapter Summary

Harry returns back to England, while Ginny sends a special delivery to the Burrow. Pull out some marshmallows for this spectacular roast.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Seventy-Three
"The Child Is Gone"

Disclaimer:
Here's the story by a lovely lady
Who was writing about Harry and his tale.
All the characters belonged to Rowling, which I acknowledge,
The lawyers stay away.

Here's the story, of a fanfic writer,
Who was busy playing with fanon on her own,
There was lots of smut, and an endless story,
Yet she kept writing on.

Till the one day when the writer finally finished
And she knew it was much more than a fic,
That this story became really fucking epic.
That's the way it all became the long fanfic.

The long fanfic,
The long fanfic,
That's the way it became so bloody long.

A/N: Disclaimer a parody of The Brady Bunch theme song.

==============

Hermione intended to sleep in as long as she could, since it was Sunday, and Albert wasn't expecting her to show up at his home until noon to work on his garden. She was still worn out from the interview with Luna and the grand opening, which went late, closing at ten o'clock the night before.
The hooting of an owl by the kitchen window woke her up.

Throwing on a terry dressing gown, she shuffled out to the kitchen to find Hedwig waiting for her. She opened the window and Hedwig hopped right in, helping herself to the bowl of owl treats Hermione always had at the ready despite her not having an owl any more. Pig had left when she’d kicked Ron out of their flat, following his master to their new home.

Picking up the letter, she opened it and found a note from Harry as Hedwig took off into the cold morning air.

------

Hermione,

I need to talk with you. I'll be over at your flat around 9 this morning.

Harry

------

Glancing at the clock, she noted that he was due any minute. She wondered how long Hedwig had been waiting.

Just as Hermione was quickly putting something on, with not even a cup of tea in her yet, the Floo flared a brilliant green, and Harry stepped out.

"In here, hang on. Be right there," she called out as she threw on some jeans for her work later in Albert's garden.

Stepping out of her bedroom, she spotted Harry looking defeated. She offered him a cup of tea, as he looked like he needed it more than she did.

Sitting in the kitchen, the gloom of the overcast sky was as dark as the ominous feeling Hermione had building in her stomach; Harry kept his gaze firmly on the mug in front of him.
"I found her," he said, his face impassive and voice bleak.

Hermione's insides began to churn. Her heart beat faster with anxiety at the thought of what had transpired between them to make Harry look the way he did. When Harry left Hermione's Friday night, he was angry, bitter, and full of venom. Now there was this deflated sense of resignation from him.

After being called out on keeping Ginny's secrets from Harry, she felt she had no right to ask him what happened. It was a quid pro quo. If Harry decided out of spite to keep secret what he and Ginny had said or what happened, she would accept that, as much as she yearned to know.

"I saw you that night," Harry began as a non sequitur. "You were all dressed up for your anniversary. I saw you enter the Red Ginseng looking as beautiful as ever in that red dress. I later found out why your dinner ended so early with Ron, but at the time I couldn't believe that on the night when you were supposed to be with Ron drinking and dancing the night away, you were going off to that place."

Hermione's stomach fell through the floor. She remembered that night quite clearly, uncertain until now if she had been spotted.

"I was supposed to watch that block of flats under orders for Moody. He was suspicious as to the types of people who were going in and out of the place. I had my Invisibility Cloak on so I wouldn't be seen, but I saw you. And then not fifteen minutes later you ran out of there, cloak missing, hair mussed. and in tears. I could only assume the worst. But I guess since you admitted to having sex with Snape, my guess wasn't far off."

Hermione was not about to recount the finer details of the timeline and correct Harry until he asked, "Was it a fuck out of revenge?"

"When I offered to wait up for Ron after he was done dealing with the bar fight, he rejected me with a snide comment. Though that was my original purpose for showing up there that night, I left before it went that far with Severus. It was because I suddenly realized I didn't want our first time to be out of revenge that nothing happened that night," she admitted.

"Over three months fucking Snape?"
"And it was over three years for Ron. We're both guilty for falling in love with people other than who we were married to during our marriage, Harry. Even Ginny was in love with Malfoy, but she was in love with him before you two had even dated." Hermione took a sip of tea, tasting the tears that had silently slipped down her cheeks.

They sat together in silence for a while before Harry said, "It was a little while after you left the Red Ginseng that night I heard the scream and found Pansy Parkinson's body in an alley. It was because of her murder I began to take your insistence over Snape and Malfoy's innocence seriously."

Hermione put her mug down and regarded the man next to her. He looked haunted, and she recalled the way Ginny said he was quite disturbed by what he had found.

"The bastard who killed her claimed to have come upon the scene, but I saw the last of the spell come from his wand as I rounded the corner," recounted the young Auror, who now looked far older than he should have. "Had this been any other witch who had died, procedures would have been done differently. As it was, Moody did not cast a Prior Incantato on the sick fuck's wand, I was reassigned to another case quickly, so I could not follow up on her murder. He had this damn smirk on his face, I swear, as if he knew he was going to get away with it."

Harry shook his head, and a small shudder made his body momentarily quake.

"I can't even describe what he did to her body," he whispered with horror. "I still have trouble sleeping some nights; it was as bad as some of the things I had seen during the war. And they wouldn't use Veritaserum on him at all. I wonder if it was because he'd killed a Death Eater that he got away with it, or his possible Ministry connections. Probably both."

The table thumped and wobbled a little when Harry's fist came down on the tabletop in anger.

"I may have not liked Pansy and hated her for being a Death Eater, but even she should not have died in that manner," he said with more force in his voice. "It was as if her life mattered less, and therefore the murderer got away scot-free. What makes us any better than the Death Eaters then, to do something like that? Even when I testified in court, they disregarded my testimony and said I had not seen him cast it, so it was purely circumstantial."

Hermione’s tears fell faster. She wondered if the murder victim had been Severus, would his death at the hands of a murderer be treated so callously and flippantly? She was sure of it.
"Snape told me that he and Malfoy offered to confess their innocence to Moody under Veritaserum regarding Dumbledore's death and the Death Eater attack on Hogwarts. Did you know that?" he asked.

She mutely nodded. Severus had told her when she told him of her plan to find some way to clear their names. Severus doubted she could, if a confession of innocence under Veritaserum would not even be granted.

"So you were right. You did know where they went," Hermione said with subdued amazement.

"And I would tell you, but considering how much you're involved with this, the less you know the better," Harry said, refusing to tell Hermione their location. "Should Moody put the pieces together and you're in his cross-hairs, you will not be spared. But I did talk with Kingsley this morning, so that might help."

Harry didn't elaborate on what he'd said to Kingsley or how he might help. Instead, he said he had to go. Since he was supposed to be on holiday for the next couple of weeks, he would just carry on as if everything was normal, despite the fact that the Ministry would now have on record Ginny's divorce from Harry.

She could just imagine what the headlines of the Daily Prophet would scream on Monday once that bit of news in the magical registry was discovered.

"Wife Leaves Boy Who Lived!"

It certainly would be a busy day for the papers on Monday, since news of two escaped Death Eaters hadn't made it into the papers on Saturday or Sunday, and the interview with Luna was coming out that day as well.

Hermione looked up at Harry who was now standing. He hadn't even finished his tea.

"Where will you go?" she asked.

"Somewhere I can clear my head for a while. I should be back before Christmas, since I only scheduled two weeks off."
Before he went to reach for a handful of Floo powder, Harry stopped and looked over his shoulder. "Will I ever find someone who loves me as much as you love Snape, or Ginny loves Malfoy?"

"I don't know, Harry." She rose from the kitchen table to lean against the doorjamb, observing the wizard with the slumped carriage of someone who was browbeaten and world-weary. "Love finds us when we least expect it. I certainly wasn't looking for it, but there it was, as much as I tried to fight it. And I don't regret one minute of it."

Then Harry was gone.

Hermione didn't even have time to sit back down and finish her cup of tea (that had gone cold) before there was a gentle knock at the door. She wondered if it was more people from the press seeking to interview her and offer her money for an exclusive.

As she opened the door to tell whoever it was to sod off, she blinked back in surprise at the sight of Kingsley Shacklebolt waiting on her doorstep.

"May I come in?" the senior Auror asked.

"Yes, please," she replied as she stepped aside to allow him in. "Would you like a cup of tea?"

"Yes, that would be lovely."

They moved into the kitchen and Hermione began to make tea for them both, making herself a fresh cup.

Seated at the table, Kingsley said, "I saw Harry this morning."

She only nodded, unable to speak, wondering what Harry told him. Harry had only said that he had gone to see Kingsley and that the older wizard might help, but that didn't mean he still might not arrest Hermione. Harry's cryptic remark also could have meant that Kingsley would make sure Hermione wasn't punished too harshly.
"Harry told me about how he found where Draco and Severus went," he began, adding, "and about Ginny."

The kettle began to whistle and Hermione poured the water into the mugs, wondering if he would allow her to finish her tea before hauling her away. She offered him milk and sugar, which he declined.

As she swirled the spoon in her mug to keep her hand occupied and prevent it from shaking, Kingsley said, "I saw your name on the Portkey office register for departure Friday morning. Along with Harry's and Ginny's."

Hermione was not going to talk unless it was necessary to answer one of his questions. And she would be truthful since there was little point in lying. Moody wasn't afraid to use Veritaserum, much like Umbridge's liberal use of it in Hermione’s fifth year, if it suited the purpose of their designs. Kingsley... would he just have Moody do the dirty work for him?

"Did you give Severus or Ginny your hair willingly for the Polyjuice Potion?"

He knew. She might as well ask him now, to quell or feed this pit of panic in her gut.

"Are you going to take me to Azkaban now?"

"Is there a reason I should take you there?"

"No more reason than why two innocent wizards had to flee to escape unjust persecution despite a clear lack of evidence, and the denial of them to prove their own innocence," she replied, her back straight and eyes full of defiance.

"I once told Severus that if there is anything I could do for him and Draco legally to just ask," he said, his voice devoid of any accusation. "Well, during the war, I did many things illegally to fight against Voldemort and darkness. Injustice is a darkness, and the legality of the Death Eaters Decree is a line I am willing to finally cross in order to help Severus and Draco."

Hermione was filled with relief and hope that someone else besides Lavender and Harry was willing to step up and help clear their names. She let out a huge sigh, releasing the breath that she had not realized she had been holding.
"Which is why I removed any record of you, Harry, and Ginny taking a Portkey Friday morning. I Obliviated the three Portkey officers: the one who Ginny dealt with when booking it, the one who saw your Polyjuiced version, and the one Harry talked to that night when he followed them."

Kingsley was momentarily caught by surprise when Hermione leapt up out of her chair and rushed at him, clasping him in a hug of gratitude, her sobs heaving and expressive.

"Thank you, thank you," she cried into his shoulder.

The Auror patted her back soothingly. "It's all right," he assured her. "I'm glad that there was someone capable of helping of them. Though Harry didn't say it, I suspect you helped provide the materials for the Polyjuice Potion through your old work at the Ministry, is that correct?"

"Oh, shit," she muttered into his shoulder.

If Harry and Kingsley could both figure that out, then the chance of Moody figuring it out was even higher.

"So I take that as an affirmative?" he asked, raising one brow at her as she lifted her head up to regard the Auror.

Had Kingsley not already eased her fears and said he was willing to help, she would have phrased her answer with obfuscation and careful wording.

"I pretended to botch the tests for two key regulated ingredients, but the last one, fluxweed, the box was already destroyed when I came in the Monday after the Ministry's ball," Hermione confessed as she let go of Kingsley to sit back down with her tea once more. "But you already witnessed that with Mr. Dushka having kicked the box aside after using it as an impromptu stepping stool. Or did you miss the fluxweed clinging to his trouser legs when you found him in the lab with his wife and Trevor Spawn," she said, jogging his memory that it was her by the door when she slapped Severus for show.

The Auror placed his forehead in his hand to look down at the table. She wasn't sure if he was embarrassed by recalling discovering the three in a sexual act or found it funny, until he lifted his head suddenly after remembering something else. "Was that Spanish lothario..." Kingsley began to ask, but trailed off.
"Was Delgado what, Kingsley?" Hermione asked back blankly, unwilling to give away Severus' nom de guerre and confirm it was him.

"Severus, you sly, old Slytherin," he remarked to himself, stunned with growing amusement. "There is no way even Moody would think Delgado and Severus were one and the same."

Now Kingsley understood what they did on the side, since he’d always suspected Severus was not going to work as a gigolo for his sole source of income.

Hermione was not going to confirm or deny Kingsley's correct guess. There were enough secrets spilled between the two of them to damn them both, had Moody stolen Harry's Invisibility Cloak and spied on their morning conversation.

"I made a promise to Severus that I would clear his and Draco's names. I will figure out a way. Some way, somehow, I will see to it," she assured him.

"I hope you do, Hermione. I certainly hope you do."

The way that Hermione had promised to clear their names made him wonder if this particular witch and Severus had a relationship beyond the procurement of a few ingredients, but the Auror would not pry.

"I will do my best to make sure Moody cannot factor you into their escape," Kingsley promised. "As it is, Harry, Miss Brown, you and I are the only ones who know about the Polyjuice Potion."

"Actually, it is just Harry, you and I, as I was instructed by Lavender to do a Memory Charm on her to that bit of knowledge, since having two of her employees who were Death Eaters escape will put her in line for questioning, so you don't have to worry about that."

Kingsley nodded his head with approval. "And with Harry gone on holiday to someplace, it will just be you and I who truly know how they escaped for the next few weeks. Which means the Department of Magical Law Enforcement can still pursue them fleeing by boat, based on an 'anonymous' tip we got the morning before the alarms went off. And as this same 'anonymous' tipster had proven useful with correct information about a Death Eater who had tried to procure an extra wand for illegal purposes, it will continue to be regarded as a solid lead until proven otherwise." He gave a great theatrical sigh when he added, "Who knows if we'll ever find them. So
He tsk-tsked as he lifted his mug and took a long sip of tea. Hermione wondered if Severus was this particular anonymous tipster, but decided that was a question for after their names were truly cleared.

"I didn't see the report of two missing Death Eaters in the paper yet." Hermione gave a sigh of relief, heaving her shoulders before slowly exhaling.

"We're trying to keep it out of the papers," the Auror admitted. "Fudge is suppressing the news for as long as he can, given that there is an election next year. Amelia Bones, Moody's and my superior, is ready to run against Fudge in the next election. I have talked with her; she is open to a fully accounted exoneration and public apology to both Severus and Draco if they can be proven innocent by some legally recognizable means, so you can count on one more ally in your quest to clear their names."

The task of trying to clear their names no longer seemed quite so insurmountable, given she had three people now who were in agreement regarding the ex-Death Eaters' innocence. It was three more than when she woke up that morning.

"Do you think you can suppress the papers from writing about Ginny divorcing Harry until at least Tuesday?" she asked. "There is an interview Lavender, Ron and I did with Luna that will be published in The Quibbler on Monday that might change a few minds when it comes to divorce."

"I'll see what I can do, as that is public record," he said, one large hand nervously rubbing the back of his bald pate. "It'll be hard to stop the press from latching on to that. Perhaps an exclusive for the Daily Prophet with Amelia making her announcement to run for Minister might make them decide to wait until Tuesday. I'll owl her."

"Thanks, Kingsley."

As Hermione walked Kingsley to the door, she gave him one more hug in appreciation for all that he had done. It was nice to know that Severus had more allies looking out for him than she initially knew of.

Once the door was shut, Hermione went to the kitchen to cook herself a large and proper breakfast. With her hopes up, her appetite had returned. Given that she would be doing a lot of late autumn chores in Albert's garden all afternoon, she would need something solid to keep her going through the day.

As she fried up some eggs and mushrooms, Hermione began to run through the list of the different types of cuisines Ginny had cooked as of late, as Harry said it was her cookbooks that gave away their locations.

"Spain?" she wondered aloud, given that "Delgado" had gone back to Spain and Ginny had done a lot of Spanish cooking at one point. Hermione would have to do some research if there was someplace in Spain that offered sanctuary.

~~~~~~~

Bill, Fred, and George were helping their father with a major chore that weekend.

A recent storm had blown over the shelter in the pig sty and a new one needed to be built, especially since it was old and the posts were partially rotted.

As the twins were busy digging post holes, jabbing and twirling their wands in the air with a Defodio spell, Bill and Arthur were corralling the pigs into a temporary structure to hold them, so they wouldn't get in the way.

Meanwhile, an owl was flying with the swiftest of speeds, intent on delivering its payload to its intended recipient as soon as possible. The letter it was carrying was beginning to smolder.

As the great horned owl flew over a copse of beech trees – now bare of leaves, its branches looking like skeletal fingers reaching up as if to pluck the bird from the sky – the owl began to descend.

Molly was in the kitchen cooking up a nice hot lunch for her husband and boys, pleased that they had come over that day, despite having been up late the night before with the grand opening of that lewd business. To think that the twins were in business with that witch, who had the gall to show up at Bill's party and insist she was going to marry her son. That witch who sold the company of men on the side, a service that Molly shamefully took advantage of herself.

But she felt she was in the moral superiority, since she had just paid for a sympathetic ear. She wasn't the one peddling men's favors; some indulgences she had heard about involved more carnal pursuits.
Just as Molly opened the window to call the men in to lunch, she spied the great horned owl barreling towards the window.

She ducked just in time. The bird barely slowed down as it tucked its wings alongside its aerodynamically evolved form while it passed through the window frame. Dropping off the letter with haste, the owl spread its wings once more to brake, its speed still a blur to any human eye that could have tried to follow, and turned sharply as if chasing a hare between the pines. It went out of the kitchen, around through the parlor, swerved again, and tucked its wings in once more as it exited through the same kitchen window. The owl began to pump its wings furiously, trying to get away from the house before the letter it delivered would go off.

The brief shriek Molly gave in fright in reaction to the bird made the Weasley men make haste to run towards the house to see what was the matter.

They ran into the house to see Molly staring at the red letter that was beginning to smoke around the edges. Ginny had arranged for her Howler to be time-delayed. The postponement put the Howler into a stasis that would not go into effect until it was delivered. However, with all the seething rage and vitriol that Ginny had poured into her Howler, it began to wear on the stasis charm during delivery. Had the Weasleys lived farther away, it might not have made the trip.

As Molly reached out with a tentative hand, wondering who had sent her a Howler, a large flock of starlings took off from the great oak tree next to the Burrow, as if startled from a gunshot.
Molly and the Weasley men stood in shock as Ginny's Howler cited chapter and verse of Molly's interference in her life, from stopping Harry from pursing her during the war, to lying to Draco and threatening him the day the Death Eater Decree came out. Ginny's Howler went on to recount how her mother had lied to her, saying that Draco had never come to the house. The Howler was an exceptionally long one considering how much Ginny needed to vent and set the record straight. Ginny bellowed on about how Molly had encouraged Harry to date her despite her lack of interest, and Molly's threats to Ginny that she had better accept Harry's courtship, or the matron would slip a love potion into Ginny's food sometime to hasten her along. It was another instance of bullying into yet another marriage, like Ron. And then to add icing to the piping hot cake, there was the retelling of Molly telling Harry of her assumptions that Ginny had been sexually abused by Tom Riddle, which Ginny's Howler vehemently denied, taking umbrage with her mother's presumption, and interference with her sex life with Harry. But the cherry on top was the final news that she had divorced Harry and had run away with Draco Malfoy in order to marry the wizard she has always loved and should have married in the first place.

Molly fell to her knees, mortified and angry. Fists clenched in the air, she screamed with hysterical fury that her plans had been subverted. Malfoy had got Ginny in the end. Her precious little girl was in that monstrous Death Eater's clutches now. She began to rend her clothes in her frenzy, a near madness overtaking her. First Ron and that gigolo peddler, Lavender, and now this. The scandal of it all, reflecting solely back on her. It was more than she could bear.

The Weasley men stood around, unable to move, ignoring the smoldering pile of ashes on the table from what had been Ginny's Howler. Even Arthur could not move his legs to run to his wife's side to console her, shocked by Molly's coercive interference in yet another of their children's marriages, and the news of Ginny's departure and sudden divorce, even with Molly’s wailing lamentably on the floor.

George noticed that lunch was beginning to burn, and he used his wand to remove the pot from the cooker.

It didn't matter. No one wanted to eat.

Bill, still slightly stunned from the bomb that was dropped at his birthday party with the announcement of Ron and Hermione's divorce, shook his head with pity as he gazed at his hysterical mother.

In the years to come, no matter how much Molly scrubbed that kitchen table, used every potion, charm or spell, the singe marks from Ginny's Howler would never disappear. Even with an opaque tablecloth placed over it, the singe marks still showed through. It was a constant reminder to Molly and the rest of the Weasley family of Ginny feeling betrayed by her own mother and her mother's selfish manipulations.

~~~~~~~*~

Justina had gone with Severus, Draco and Ginny up to the caldera to bring their offerings to the goddess Pele. Justina had taken them out shopping to help them pick out the right flowers and Pele's favorite fruits to offer as their show of thanks for providing them with sanctuary. It was Pele’s magic that was imbued into the island that safeguarded them, so she was, in a sense, their protector.

There were red lehua flowers and strawberries from Ginny and Draco.

Justina explained the symbolism behind the red flowers, involving a tale of two lovers who had been separated, then joined together once more.

Considering their own tragic love story and their reuniting, it was a most fitting offer for Ginny and Draco to make, as the lehua tree is a favorite of Pele’s, one of the first plants to grow and bloom after a lava flow.

Severus was to offer red hibiscus blossoms and 'ōhelo berries. The curious Potions master was about to try one of the delicious looking red berries he’d bought from the local store’s produce section before wrapping up his purchase. Instead, he was soundly slapped on the back of the hand by Justina before he committed a great insult to Pele. “We could all get lost in rain and fog on the way to the volcano as punishment for not offering one to Pele first,” Justina admonished.

The local witch told Severus and his companions the story of the 'ōhelo berries, which were an incarnation of Pele's sister, Ka'ōhelo. After Ka'ōhelo was buried by her son on Kilauea volcano, Pele's home, the bush grew along its slopes. When walking on the way to Kilauea crater, one must offer the first 'ōhelo berry to Pele, tossing it in the volcano, then – once the offer is given – one may enjoy as many 'ōhelo berries as desired on the walk back down.

It seemed there were a great many things the three of them still had to learn to avoid breaking local customs, but they were all fast learners and the townsfolk were more than happy to teach them.

As the four of them trekked up the side of the mountain towards the top of the volcano and island, they had a glorious view to the island below and the vast ocean that surrounded them. About thirty miles to the north north-east lay the Big Island, where Kilauea volcano was currently erupting.

The volcano for Malu Palekaiko erupted periodically too, as Justine explained that Pele also makes her home here sometimes to keep company with those who have magic like her.

Malu Palekaiko was invisible to Muggles, as most magical places in the world are. Ships sailed around the island unaware they had veered off course and then back to their original headings, and people in planes never saw it.
Once at the top of the island, Justina said a heartfelt prayer to Pele on behalf of the newcomers who had come to seek sanctuary and were offering her thanks for her shelter.

Severus, as instructed, tossed a small handful of ‘ōhelo berries into the caldera, leaving the rest on a small, primitive altar, which was nothing than some artfully arranged lava rocks. Ginny and Draco did the same, also leaving their offering by the edge of the caldera.

They all said "Mahalo," which was Hawaiian for "thank you." All of them were sincere in their thanks that they had found sanctuary and were free.

As they began to descend from the top of the island, Severus was also thankful he’d purchased a good set of hiking boots, while Ginny and Draco each wore a sturdy pair of trainers.

Justina warned them that should they come across a beautiful woman with long flowing hair or an old woman with long white hair, that they should always offer her help and respite, and always say "Aloha" to her. Pele had been known to take human form once in a great while.

Scrambling over the rocky lava flows, he asked Justina about the offering of gin to Pele.

"Pthth! That's just a stupid made-up story by a Greek Muggle," the tiny witch said scornfully. "He wanted to get her drunk so she'd put on a show for the tourists that ate at his restaurant. As if! If you really want to please Pele with something alcoholic, you must brew or distill from the fruits or vegetables that grow along the slopes of this island, from the very soil that she made."

Feeling more confident now they had the blessings of Pele secured, they headed back into town for some lunch, Severus picking more ‘ōhelo berries along the way to stuff in his many pockets or pop in his mouth. During lunch, the trio began to scan the local rag listing of properties for sale.

~~~~~~~~~

That Monday, the house-elves did a good job of keeping people out of the lobby if they did not have business directly dealing with The Lovely Lavender Company.

The Quibbler hit the stands early that morning and was all that anyone could talk about throughout all of British wizardom. Even the European wizarding press had latched on to this exclusive, as The Lovely Lavender Company had a strong presence on the continent.
As Severus was not there Sunday night to meet Mrs. Paxton, Mrs. Paxton sent an owl to Miss Brown; this was Lavender’s cue to notify the Aurors that not only was Severus missing, but Draco as well. Madam Agatha had canceled her Saturday appointment, which delayed telling the Aurors by another twenty-four hours that two of the “boys” from her stable, who were Death Eaters, had gone missing.

Now that the Aurors had finally identified which two Death Eaters had fled England, they were still focusing on ports and marinas. Posing as Muggle policemen, Aurors swept through every major port, showing pictures (the non-moving Muggle kind) of Severus and Draco's faces to port authorities, shipping companies, and anyone else who might have had an unknowing hand in their escape. When nothing turned up at the major ports, the medium and small ports were then canvassed.

Moody and several inept junior Aurors swarmed over The Lovely Lavender headquarters that Monday. The house-elves were very put out when the young Aurors were accidentally knocking over drums and barrels of items, which then had to be picked up and decontaminated, should it ruin a batch of some potion.

Hermione and Albert were working together on a potion for removing age spots when they were rousted from the Potions master's office. They had to wait in the hallway while their office was tossed for any clues to the two Death Eaters' disappearance.

When Moody interrogated Miss Brown, she could be heard bellowing loudly through the door that she was just as upset as Moody since now she was down two wizards for her side business and would be losing out on money, not to mention her reputation with the clients who she had already pre-booked and would have to be told of the cancellations. There were Galleons to be returned, and apologies to be owled, and it was all a great inconvenience to her.

The demand by Moody that Miss Brown turn over her ledger containing names and amounts paid by people to visit her gigolos was met with a harsh glare and a firm no.

"Should some of the names on this list be discovered by you, or – much worse – made public, let's just say you won't be working for the Ministry for very much longer. You can just start working on your resignation letter right now if you keep pushing it," she promised him.

There was absolute truth in her statement, and Moody, who had interrogated enough people over time to know when someone was telling it, balked. He wondered if it was Fudge, McPeebles, or Amelia Bones who was listed on that ledger, or some close family member whose exposure would cause great embarrassment.
Moody delighted in going after Death Eaters. There was a thrill of adrenaline, plus a never-ending, never-satisfied streak of vengeance that made him so driven to find Severus and Draco, but he loved his job more and the pay was good. He wasn't a man to be bought easily, but given the potential political nature of Miss Brown's secret client list, even he could see that he could do more good by staying in the job and letting this one lead drop by the wayside. Besides, other clues were out there, bound to be discovered and explored.

With nothing left to comb through, Moody and his team of Aurors left. Lavender promised extra butterbeer for the house-elves as compensation for the inconvenience, which was met with wee cheers about the building.

Hermione only hoped that while the Aurors searched Draco and Severus' old flat, that Severus' old place would not be trashed too badly, and any damage done could be repaired. She did intend to move in once the Ministry had peered and spied into every nook and cranny of the place for more clues to their disappearance.

As Severus, Draco and Ginny began to settle into life, still living in Justina's hotel until they could find new homes, the young lovers spent more time apart from Severus. They still all went to breakfast and dinner together most of the time, seeking each other's company daily. But other opportunities to expand their social circle began to draw them apart into their own daily routines.

Severus had bought a new swimsuit, since his musk-ox hair swimsuit, which had the properties to keep him warm even when he was wet, was not suited for swimming in warm ocean waters, versus the chilly lake at Hogwarts. Arnold, one Potions master Severus had become acquainted with, took him diving in a particular area; Arnold pointed out the many potions ingredients that could be collected, while also pointing out that which was protected and could not be collected.

Most days after breakfast Severus would go for a swim in the clear crystal blue waters of the sheltered bay. The vibrancy of the fish swimming close enough to touch was fascinating to him. His afternoons were spent hiking among the jungle forest, becoming familiar with local plants and studying the local wildlife. Ranjit, the other local Potions master, had given Severus a guide book he had written regarding the local birds, insects, and animals; it included a guide for collecting, as some birds were protected on the island.

Ginny had begun spending a lot of time with Halulu after her performance at the Christmas luau. The hula teacher wanted Ginny to start teaching belly dancing, and Ginny started taking private lessons from Halulu who wanted the young redhead to dance the part of Pele at the Summer Pele Festival. There was a lot of dancing to learn and new moves to master.

Draco was busy looking for a place for Ginny and him to call home. He latched onto this notion that he didn't want to marry Ginny until he found them a proper home and could carry her over the threshold, instead of going back to the honeymoon suite at the hotel. The suite was a fine room and it was romantic, but Draco wanted to make their first night as husband and wife the first night in their new home as well. It was really quite old fashioned and gallant, when one thought about it.

All three of them had finally gotten around to buying new brooms since Draco and Severus both had to sell theirs in order to make ends meet under the Death Eaters Decree before Miss Brown hired them. Once working for Miss Brown, the revocation of their Apparition license made it pointless to buy another one.

Ginny had left her broom back at Number 12 Grimmauld Place, as it was a present from Harry. In fact, she had left behind all the jewelry, fancy lingerie, and gifts he had given to her over their courtship and marriage. When she packed to leave her husband, she took her plain clothes, her cookbooks and personal library, a few photos, and her music box and belly dancing materials; she left behind everything else they had accrued together during her marriage, or they bought together. It was a way of breaking from the past and making as clean of a start as possible.

Even Draco had sent all the monies Ginny had spent to see him as a gigolo back to Potter, transferring the funds through Gringotts, though there was a question of if Potter would even notice since his vault was also rather full.

They had made a date that all three of them would go flying one afternoon. It would be the first chance Severus had had to fly a broom in years, and he was anxious to ride the wind once more. He’d bought a slightly cooler and lighter-weight version of Quidditch gear for casual flying, purchased at the Pililani Broom and Quidditch supply store in town.

Dressed in his new flying attire, Severus went over to the honeymoon suite and knocked on the door. He wondered if the couple was ready to go, as they had arranged.

There was the sudden change in air pressure and Severus noticed that a Silencing Charm was just brought down. The door cracked open a few inches. Ginny was peering through with a blanket clutched to her person in a way that indicated she was probably nude underneath.

"Yes?" she barked with impatience, glaring up at Severus.

"We were to go flying this afternoon?" Severus reminded her.
Uncharacteristically, Ginny rolled her eyes and turned her head back toward Draco. She said shortly, "You forgot to tell me that was this afternoon."

"Well, I'm sorry, but I forgot when you suggested--" Draco cut off when Ginny hurriedly shushed him.

Turning back to Severus, Ginny said, with a smirk that was similar to one Draco would sport, "Come back in three hours."

Severus smelled the Polyjuice Potion on Ginny's, or should it be Draco's, breath.

The door was shut in Severus' face and the Silencing Charm was put back up, as he could hear "Draco" beginning to giggle, but then it was suddenly cut off.

There would be no way either would be up for flying in three hours. They would be up for lots of sleep if they were going to make the most of the Polyjuice Potion and a bit of role-reversal.

The Potions master contemplated the possibility of playing a joke on them when next he saw them; he would ask them if they had taken precautions, as otherwise Draco was at risk of becoming pregnant. Of course it was impossible, as Ginny's body on contraceptive potions would be just as effective for Draco. There were, however, two previous recorded cases of male pregnancy due to couples playing around with Polyjuice before the witch knew she was pregnant. It would still make for a good trick, especially considering how they had ribbed Severus often about his growing base of female admirers, including Justina, Maria, Antonia, Svetlana, Gretchen, Tina, Miyuki, and the under-aged daughter of Mounga, Akela.

Ginny told him it was his nose that was the advertisement, indicating the old saying about noses and men's endowments. Severus choked on his coffee over that comment.

He wondered if he should wait for Ginny, Draco, or both to have a mouth full of beverage before he played the male-pregnancy joke on them over breakfast.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Thanks to my wonderful betas, JuneW and Hope, for cleaning up this chapter and making it presentable for public consumption.

Jade Hallett/k6034's DeviantArt page here: http://k6034.deviantart.com/

The title for this chapter was inspired by the Fiona Apple song, “The Child is Gone.”

I know so many of you who have read my fic have told of your loathing of my interpretation of Molly. I hope this chapter satisfied you.

Here is the story behind the Lehua flowers:
http://www.lehuaukulele.com/lehua_flower.html

The legend of 'ōhelo berries can be found here.
http://www.mauimagazine.net/Maui-Magazine/November-December-2012/Oh-Hello/and http://the.honoluluadvertiser.com/article/2006/May/19/il/FP605190309.html

Strawberries and red hibiscus flowers have also been listed as favorite offerings to Pele.

Here are some more stories regarding Pele:
http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2013/09/10/hawaiian-legends_n_3898664.html

Here is the real story behind the myth of offering gin to Pele:
http://www.kaahelehawaii.com/pages/culture_hookupu.htm

Pililani means "close to heaven." Fitting for a broom store, don't you think?
Chapter Summary

Severus and Draco both find what they have been looking for, while Lavender has a big favor to ask of Hermione.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Seventy-Four
"Love Finds Us When We Least Expect It"

Disclaimer: I could torture you with a parody of a disclaimer with altered lyrics from the Gilligan Island's theme song, in some long and convoluted way, to say that Rowling and various corporate entities own Harry Potter, and I do not, but even I have limits on how cruel I am to my readers... But notice how Severus and Draco are sort of stuck on a tropical isle?

============

The day after The Quibbler came out with their exclusive interview with Hermione, Ron, and Lavender, the news broke in the Daily Prophet of Harry and Ginny's divorce. The paper reported accounts of seeing the Potters together Friday morning in the Ministry, without specifying it was at the Portkey Office, and that neither were available for comment, since it was reported they were on holiday. There was a great deal of speculation if they went together or separately.

The tone of the interview in The Quibbler certainly set the way Ginny's divorce was written up in the Daily Prophet. There were questions by the reporter if the Potters married too young or if there was pressure to marry.

One Daily Prophet story about her ex-mother-in-law certainly caught Hermione's attention.

"MOLLY WEASLEY: Bad Mother Or Bad Luck? Two divorces in one week for Weasley children!"

It was sensational yellow journalism at its finest, courtesy of Rita Skeeter. Hermione felt little pity for Molly. Ron's mother had taken Skeeter's words as truth when Hermione was painted in a poor light during the Tri-wizard Tournament coverage and snubbed the young witch at the time. Now it was Molly's turn to be the center of falsely speculative gossip and wallow in it for a bit. Hermione didn't bother to read it, but could imagine all that was contained within the printed lie.

Lavender sent some flowers over to St. Mungo's since it seemed Molly had to be admitted because of her nerves. It was advised by Arthur that Miss Brown avoid her future mother-in-law until things settled down.

Some of the witches' fashion and social advice magazines began to run stories with checklists of things witches should think about before accepting a marriage proposal. One of those things listed was pressure from family and friends. There were also exposés on Muggle divorce and even talk about introducing a mandatory two-week marriage and family supplemental course for sixth years at Hogwarts, for the Muggle-borns and half-bloods who were just as unaware as Hermione about the magical bonds of marriage and children.

One proponent of the new Hogwarts coursework put forth a hypothetical question involving two Muggle-borns with children who had no knowledge of the life-long bonds of marriage; what would happen if they were to divorce without knowing such things? The opposition countered that this talk of divorce might make witches and wizards put off children for so long that birth rates would plummet. Or possibly witches and wizards would take up the Muggle practice of living together and having children, but not marrying in order to give themselves an escape clause for marital and parental responsibility. There were plenty of married witches and wizards who were doing that already, leading separate lives and engaging in infidelity in high numbers, so that the argument was groundless.

Hermione, Ron, Harry, and Ginny jointly set off wizardom's questioning of one of the basic societal customs and turned it on its head, making people reexamine things which had been taken for granted for decades, if not centuries.

Some witches came up to Hermione in Diagon Alley in the subsequent weeks and shook her hand, exclaiming that after reading her interview in The Quibbler, it made them reconsider their engagement they had felt pressured to accept, even if they were already aware of the magical bonds children brought. There was a new section in the Daily Prophet of broken engagements, located under the obituary section. The death of love was considered as tragic as death. However, not treated as something just as tragic would be if those witches and wizards had gone through with the wedding, neither party sure of their choice, only to deeply regret it later.

Hermione's parents took the news of her divorce rather well, though both of them were initially shocked when they first read about it in the paper. Wendy Granger asked if her daughter would like to talk with her Aunt Christine about what she was going through. Hermione said she might later, but not now. She even found the bright side to the bad news saying that there wouldn't be any question about her coming over for Christmas and other holidays, as the Weasleys would not be demanding her time anymore. She made a promise to visit her parents more often.

Lavender gave Hermione her own lab space adjoining Albert's, since she needed a place to work on both potions for the company and her apprenticeship.

A trip to Eeylops Owl Emporium resulted in the purchase of a Northern Hawk-Owl. The bird – with brown and off-white spotted markings on her back, and banding on her front – spoke to Hermione’s spirit. Its large and intelligent looking eyes connected with the witch. She felt an instant kinship with the bird, similar to the way she had taken right to Crookshanks upon spying him. The owl did not have a name, so Hermione gave her one: Calleo.

It was a boy’s name, but Calleo didn't mind. She had a new master who seemed to appreciate her and bought a nice large cage for her, larger than the one the shop owner was keeping her in beforehand. The new master also bought her some of her favorite owl treats and a few mice.

Hermione and Calleo didn't live in her flat for very long, as Severus' flat was now available to move in to. The Aurors had done all they could to discover more clues, and had declared the place cleared for habitation once again. Hermione's landlord was more than happy to not have one month's notice she was moving out, eager to have the divorced witch out of her block of flats.

Marf was thrilled to see Hermione, helping her move from her old flat with packing and setting up house. The house-elf had restored the flat to the way it looked before the Aurors took the place apart – tearing up floor boards, ripping out wall paneling, and tearing away wallpaper. Now everything was the same again, right down to the rickety kitchen table the couple had destroyed while shagging like rabid Pygmy Puffs, and the settee she had grown very attached to.

The bed curtains were a different color, she asked Marf, who then found out about the aura-projecting properties of the curtains, which had been imbued with powdered moonstone and certain charms. Hermione had always wondered if she ever imaged them a different color at some point, and her suspicions were finally confirmed. She could have changed them to stay black as she remembered them, but decided she could live with the color-changing properties for a while.

Marf was thrilled to cook for Mistress Hermione, as the witch sometimes came home very late from work, tired and appreciative of the wonderful meal he had cooked her. There were nights she stayed up late studying her Potions books or some new language she was learning, and he was always happy to provide a cup of tea to invigorate or relax her as she needed. Marf took care of her as he’d promised Master Severus he would.
He didn't even throw out those nasty old lemons Mistress Hermione demanded to be left alone to be tested and analyzed when she had a bit of spare time, which was not much. Besides, Marf knew they weren't really lemons anyway.

~~~~~~~~~

Tina was getting a bit exasperated. She worked part-time at the local apothecary in town and supplemented her income with a little real estate work and crafts on the side. She had practically jumped through Quidditch hoops to get the blond British wizard to agree to let her be his real estate agent. There were two others in town, who were also part-time real estate agents, since properties in Malu Palekaiko didn't sell very often.

The houses that did come onto the market were usually owned by second-, third-, or fourth-generation sanctuary seekers. The original owners had sought sanctuary, and then the children, grandchildren, or great-grandchildren inherited the house. Because the inheritors usually had a house of their own or they were not being sought after by foreign governments, some of them moved outside of the sanctuary of Malu Palekaiko to live elsewhere, usually the mainland United States. That was when the homes were then put up for sale.

There were houses that had been on the market for months, in some cases years. Tina received a small fee to help maintain them as part of her contract with the seller to keep them in a presentable state, sometimes renting them out. Of course there were properties she didn't maintain that she showed to Draco, because regardless of which house he bought, there would be a commission in it for her.

Besides, right now her biggest concern wasn't a sale so much as that deliciously tall, dark wizard who was Draco's friend – a wizard she wanted to snag for herself.

Tina figured that if she got to meet with Draco every day, she would have her chance to flirt and flaunt her feminine wiles at that brooding wizard with the piercing black eyes and pale skin, that yummy accent that practically made her swoon, and that nose that promised a man who was built for her appetite below.

Severus was the freshest piece of meat on the market, and the youngest and best looking thing that had come around in years, as that Draco boy was already taken. Tina was already battling with half the single witches in town for Severus' attentions. She was set on catching his eye, hell or high water.

In her sweetest American southern accent, she tried to make conversation with him when she would see him in the mornings, when she was picking Draco up to go about town and to more remote properties on the island. However, Severus was certainly playing hard to get.
It was the thrill of the chase that made her not want to drop Draco and tell him to go with another agent in town. When they'd look at one house after another, Draco kept sticking his nose in the air like a wizard whose farts didn't stink. He couldn't name what he wanted, but complained of the plumbing system on one house, the architectural layout of another, the rotted siding of yet a third house, which was decomposing and she would haven't let it get that far if she was in charge of taking care of that house, but the list of complaints went on. This one “cozy vintage cottage” (read: tiny dilapidated shack) smelled of rancid curry and onions; that one he claimed he wouldn't even let a house-elf live in.

She was getting close to giving up and was ready to tell Draco that if he didn't help her finagle a date with Severus, then the deal was off and he could find his own damn little hoity-toity castle himself.

Draco couldn't believe the hovels this witch was trying to pass off as domiciles. Some of them were mere shanties that should have been condemned long before he was even born. Many were large enough for his needs, but some of them seemed so flimsy, built with nothing more than some dried-up palm fronds along the side of a rickety frame and some posts. And there was one that was made with wood so punky, his foot fell right through the floor. The witch had the audacity to say he should watch his step and that this is what happens when anti-termite charms get stale.

It seemed all the habitable homes he would have gladly picked out were already occupied. He knew there was at least one decent house out there for him and Ginny to call home. Draco was getting quite antsy to marry her, and a delay in finding a house was a delay in finally being able to call Ginny his wife.

One late humid afternoon, after a quick rain shower had just passed through, Draco and Tina trudged back towards the center of town. It was yet another day with no luck or even hope of finding anything.

"As I heard through the grapevine, Severus is unattached," Tina began, hoping to use this as an opening salvo to get Draco into setting her up with that hunk of a wizard she wanted for herself.

Draco knew what Tina was up to. You couldn't out-Slytherin a Slytherin. Of course he had known from the start that one of the main reasons she'd begged to be his real estate agent was for a chance to jump Severus’ bones. Draco knew she was getting fed up and was ready to lay down the ultimatum of a date or no more house-hunting.

"Well," Draco hemmed and hawed, spinning his tale to suit his purpose while trying to avoid promising her a date and keeping her as his real estate agent. "One could say that he is available."
"Did she break his heart? Did he leave her behind? Is he a widower? Divorced? Omigawd!" Tina began chattering on like a monkey.

The rumors were already flying about Severus' past. It was known he was officially unattached, but that was the only information out there, which gave the witches in town hopes of snagging him. Draco did not allude to any woman in Severus’ past. For all anyone knew, Severus could have never dated and was still a virgin. No one wanted to even entertain the notion he preferred wizards.

"That's not for me to say. He is a private man, that I can say." Draco valiantly tried not to smirk, and barely succeeded.

Tina was hooked now, and would never stop showing Draco properties until he found the right one.

The rain clouds drifted across the sky just long enough to let the sun peak through. It caused a rainbow to suddenly appear in a grand arch in front of them, hovering above the town with one end of the rainbow cascading onto a white cottage, set back from the road a bit, just up ahead.

It was a moderate-sized home with a broad front porch. It had proper windows they could close to keep out the elements, but that could open wide to allow the cool ocean breezes to enter, and had shutters. The witch was out on the front porch using her wand to move things out of the house, past the front lawn and garden and down to the curb.

Draco raised his hand up and called out, "Aloha, Sumiko!"

"Aloha, Draco. Tina." Sumiko came down to the road to chat, eager to take a break.

"Cleaning house?" Draco ask.

"More like clearing out house of curbside freebies," Sumiko confessed. "My husband's case has been reviewed and he's been fully exonerated. They found the wizard who killed those Muggles in that faked industrial accident years ago, and we can go back home now."

Feeling empathy over being unjustly persecuted himself, he exclaimed, "That's wonderful!" He gave her a brief hug in congratulations.

"So I was wondering, Draco, you still looking for a house?" the Japanese witch asked, a look in her eye.

"Yes!" Tina and Draco eagerly answered in unison.

"Come on in. I'm in the middle of packing, so forgive the mess. Take a look around and see if this is what you are hunting for." She beckoned them to follow her up to the house.

"It's four bedrooms. Our children were all grown when we had to flee for sanctuary, but we hoped they would come visit so we bought it a little larger than what we needed for just ourselves. Unfortunately, they never did visit," Sumiko said, a little sadness in her voice.

"Here's the kitchen," she pointed out as they walked through the room, Draco noting the mix of American cottage style with Japanese influence. "The dining room. The living room," she said. Sumiko suddenly noticed Draco had stopped at the sliding glass door that went from the living room out to the garden she and her husband built.

Draco stood there at the sliding door staring out onto the little semi-enclosed Japanese garden in the back. It was almost as if they had plucked the garden he’d created for Ginny in his flat for their romantic picnic and placed it there. A few of the plants and trees were different because of the tropical climate, but it was essentially the same. The engawa, the steeping stones, the small stream that burbled and babbled, meandering slowly through the middle of the garden. There was a beautifully pruned Royal Poinciana tree instead of the cherry tree he had created, but the tropical tree that was substituted would be covered in glorious red blossoms in the summer, given that the Hawaiian climate wasn't cold enough for cherry trees.

Sumiko saw the way he looked lovingly at their garden. "It's almost like the one we had at home. But we had to get something different than a cherry tree."

Draco could almost feel the tears brimming in his eyes. "It's perfect. Name your price."

He would spend any amount he could to bring his bride home to this ideal patch of land in paradise.
"Well, the Japanese Ministry of Magic has agreed to compensate my husband handsomely for convicting him based on false testimony, sloppy Auror work, and an over-zealous prosecution, so it's not like we'll need the money. And you and Ginny are such lovely people, so much in love. A young couple should have a nice home to raise a family. How about I sell it to you for a discounted price as a wedding present," Sumiko offered.

Draco was touched by her offer, but he wanted to pay her a fair market price, as she and her husband had created the perfect future home for him and Ginny.

"I have plenty of money," he assured her.

Tina let out a sigh of relief, as a discount meant less of a commission for her.

"No, I insist on it. Consider the discount price as a wedding present for you and Ginny. How about fifty-thousand Galleons," she offered.

"Done." Draco turned and shook Sumiko's hand. The place was worth at least sixty-thousand. He was prepared to pay ten times that amount, just to have this place.

"We'll be moving out on December 22nd, so you can have the place on the 23rd. Will that work for you, Draco?" she asked, as he was still shaking her hand, not so much that they had closed the deal, but in thanks for her selling her quintessentially perfect home to him and his bride.

Tina was fuming. Not only was her commission going to be less than she had hoped, thanks to Sumiko's "generosity," but she hadn't even blackmailed Draco into getting her a date with Mr. Mysterious.

~~~~~~~~~

Hermione read the article over again. It amazed her how much Fudge still had influence over the paper to publish what they did. Fudge did a lot of the same manipulation of the Daily Prophet and other papers during the early days of the war, until public opinion swayed in favor of believing Harry, so it didn't surprise her.

Near the back of the paper was a small article with equally small print. She knew the real story behind it, and this one time she was a little happy that it was not known to everyone yet.

"Two Wizards Sought For Questioning"
Two wizards are sought by the Ministry for questioning regarding an ongoing investigation. No photos of the wizards could be provided by the Ministry, but they are described as follows:

- 6', approximately just over 13 stone, shoulder-length straight black hair, black eyes, prominent nose.
- 6'2", approximately 14 stone, long straight light blond hair to below the shoulder, gray eyes.

Should you see these two wizards, please contact the Department of Magical Law Enforcement, Auror Division. Do not approach."

It did not miss Hermione's attention about the omission of any "tattoos."

Hermione didn't want Severus or Draco named as the suspects until she found evidence to exonerate them, or at least make them no longer subject to the Death Eater Decree.

Hermione folded up the paper and placed it in a stack she had put aside for when she saw anything of interest that might apply to Severus or Draco, or anything regarding the last days of the war. Just then, there was a knock at her lab door.

"Come in."

Lavender poked her head in the door, looking almost sheepish. "I was wondering if you would come over to talk with me regarding something personal." Then she added quickly, "When you have a moment."

"Is now all right?" Hermione asked.

"Oh, by all means."

Lavender had the tea service ready.

Severus had warned Hermione that anytime Lavender had tea ready for you when you already came into her office, then it was a clue that she was going to ask you for something you might not like and this was her way of softening you up before delivering her request. The nicer the nibbles, the worse the news.

'There is no alcohol around, so that's a good sign,' Hermione dryly thought to herself, remembering the presence of it when she was given the upsetting news about her then husband.

Once Hermione had been served tea by her boss, she waited for Lavender to start the conversation.

"Ron and I have set the wedding date," her boss began.

'Okay, here it comes,' she thought, bracing herself.

"We're getting married Christmas morning. And I'd like to ask you if you would be my bridesmaid."

Hermione blinked back in shock at the request, stunned that the witch who had been having an affair with her husband for so many years was now asking her to be her witness at her wedding. It was unorthodox to say the least.

"Well, what about Padma?" Hermione asked, knowing that Lavender's best friend, Parvati, was in a perpetual vegetative state, when she wasn't screaming.

"Padma blames me for Parvati's condition. She said I should have offered myself first instead to save Parvati. On several occasions, Padma has said it should have been me who wound up in St. Mungo's, not Parvati. As if Padma knew what happened. Parvati and I both were doomed to the same fate, if it wasn't for Blaise helping me to escape." Lavender's hand shook a little, and she put her tea cup down in order to regain her composure; she was on the verge of tears, remembering the horror.

Hermione knew Lavender felt some sort of obligation towards Blaise, but didn't know the reason until now. Blaise had been barely civil to Hermione, still holding a dislike for Muggle-borns. He behaved, but was curt on the few occasions where they crossed paths during work.

"Well, aren't there any other friends? I mean, it seems a bit strange that you would ask me when..." Hermione trailed off. She didn't want to bring up details.
"All the other witches I would call friends are dead. And for other witches I’ve met after the war, none of them are what I would call anything more than business associates or acquaintances," Lavender said, her voice steely and firm. "I may look like I talked to some of these witches at the ball as if we were old friends, but it is nothing of the sort. It is a game of chess, playing social standing against others, parleys of alliances towards goals, business arrangements for Galleons, and networking opportunities. They are not friends. I wouldn't trust them as far as I could throw a troll without my wand."

Hermione hadn't thought about it that way. She had lost a great many friends in the war too. Ginny was her only close female friend, but now she was gone as well. There was Fastrada, the witch who had replaced her at her old work. They had been meeting for lunch every few weeks and felt a sort of kinship bond, but Fastrada was certainly not what she could consider a close friend as of yet.

"You and Ron are the only true friends I have. And Harry and Neville, but I don't know Harry well, like you do," the blonde witch admitted.

Hermione felt a little sadder now. She and Harry were close, but it seems that this business with Ginny – and his initial request for Hermione to spy on his wife to see if she was cheating on him – was the beginning of a wedge that was driven between them. The situation made their friendship more strained and less unconditional. Harry had now been gone for two weeks, and she wasn't even sure how long it would be before Harry could trust Hermione, if ever again. And if there was no trust, how could one truly be friends?

"Yes, Lavender, I'll be your bridesmaid. I'd be honored," Hermione agreed.

Considering all that had transpired between the two witches, Hermione was humbled that Lavender would request this of her when Hermione had every right to refuse.

~~~~~~

Severus really needed to find a place of his own. And fast. Justina was now offering to bring his coffee up to his room in the mornings. She also knocked on his door at night to see if there was anything else he needed, sometimes offering him a nightcap, which he politely declined.

He was doing a lot of polite declining lately.

Now that Tina was done with her one client, Draco, she offered to help Severus find his own little cozy cabin, an offer he politely refused as well. Severus had already made arrangements with a wizard to start looking for a home of his own. Severus had something very specific in mind in regards to what he needed. He didn't want to waste time with a witch who would drag him to the other side of the island to some rat-infested lean-to just so she could pounce on him. She might even be taking fertility potions in hopes of entrapping him, for all he knew.

So far, there were no leads. Severus needed one bedroom for himself, but at least two other rooms as well. One room needed to be a library, and one a Potions lab; he was willing to convert bedrooms into those rooms to meet his needs. If Hermione came to join him some day, he could add on as needed. The house construction needed to be solid, not some bits of woven bamboo mat nailed to some unfinished posts. The site also had some very specific needs, since Severus would be having his very own Potions master's garden. He'd never had one of his own, as the gardens at Hogwarts were Pomona's domain and she helped grow whatever Severus needed; and since the Death Eater Decree, his own garden was certainly not a possibility.

Then there were the requests that began pouring in for Potions. Many of the requests seemed to be from people who didn't want to deal with Arnold, who didn't exactly hold to the Potions master credo of discretion. Also, Severus did not have the puritanical streak that Ranjit had. The Indian Potions master was Muggle-born and had grown up with many of the uptight Victorian mores from British empire colonialism that had seeped into the culture, which was ironic because this was the same culture that had produced the Kama Sutra. As a Muggle-born, Ranjit had grown up with the more socially conservative mindset of Indian Muggles versus some of the Indian wizarding populations, which was much less influenced by British Muggle “morality.”

Severus was tired of working in Justina's kitchen. It was undignified for a Potions master to brew in a kitchen, though that's exactly what he and Hermione did in his own flat.

So in addition to looking for a home, he also was looking for a small shop in which to set out his own shingle. It would be better if he had some place in which to conduct business, as he didn't feel like having to conduct business in the sanctuary of his home. He'd spent years having his own flat as his place of business when selling his own company and flesh, and he wanted to separate those two aspects of his life so he could get away from work while home and vice versa. Besides, he could even do tutoring at his shop and not in a home with other children running about as distractions. His one-on-one sessions with Hermione proved that being undisturbed by others led to much more progress.

Draco had found his little dream home and was preparing to move into it like a male bird putting a whole lot of effort into preparing an attractive nest to captivate a mate. The wedding was in a little less than a week and he still had much to do, while Ginny was busy getting her dress and picking out flowers.

While joining Draco on one of the many shopping excursions to the local homewares store – Hearth, Hale & Ho'okipa – in order for the groom to set up his house, Severus expressed his concern.
"Shouldn't you let Ginny pick out her own furniture, china, flatware patterns, bed linens, and such? Witches tend to be very territorial and want to impose their own style on their home instead of adopting someone else's," the older wizard warned his friend.

"First of all, I want this house ready for Ginny the day we move in, right after the wedding and dinner. Speaking of which, I made reservations for the seven of us at Mario's, and he promised us a room in the back for our reception," Draco said. The group of seven included everyone in the wedding party: Ginny, Severus, who was going to be his best man, Halulu, as Ginny's matron-of-honor, Greg, Halulu's husband, Mounga, who was going to be the officiant, his wife, Rainbow, and himself. It was going to be a very small reception.

"Second, right after Hermione introduced Ginny to that Muggle bookstore in July, Ginny went back multiple times and bought a lot of those Muggle magazines that feature houses in tropical locations. They had titles like Aloha Style and Island Dream Home. So while you two were busy with dance lessons and Potions experiments, Ginny and I poured over these magazines, talking about our dream home and all the little touches it would have. I know Ginny's style and what she likes as well as I do her body. I know she'll be thrilled with what I'm picking out for her," Draco assured his mentor.

Severus had no idea that they had been doing that and was a little surprised. It was very domestic of Draco to involve himself in such things that normally were considered the domain of witches in their society. But given how much Ginny and Draco had dreamed to be together, it was a way to fill the time and keep hope alive while they waited until the Polyjuice Potion ingredients were gathered and their escape was possible.

He had spent enough nights lying awake over the years imagining how his own home would look, from the view he would have from his Potions lab, to the location of his kitchen garden just off the kitchen and his Potions garden on the other side, adjacent to his lab. The Potions master had even pictured exactly where the sink for his lab would go, and how many feet of shelving he would need for his various ingredients.

As Draco and Severus headed back from the homewares store, they walked along a small side street as a shortcut back to the hotel. In a nearby alley, a small sun-faded sign caught Severus' eye as he passed by.

It said "For Lease or Rent."

Using his wand, Severus cleaned away what looked like years of accumulated dirt and grime on the glass window. He put one hand up to the window to shield his eyes from the glare of the sun, as the awning over the obscure storefront was torn and threadbare.
The front part of the store seemed narrow and cramped, but Severus had good night vision. He could see that beyond the first ten feet of the vacant store, it opened up into a much larger area. The front of the store seemed to give a false impression that the whole store was just as narrow and cramped as the front.

There was contact information on the sign and Severus noted it was the wizard he had hired to find him a home and store. He wondered why his real estate agent, Manny, hadn’t shown this place to him yet; he would have to ask him about it.

If he was lucky, the Potions master could get a lease agreement signed, get the awning fixed, and have his shop cleaned up and set up in time for the New Year.

As Calleo dropped off her Friday morning copy of the Daily Prophet, Hermione remembered that Harry was due to come back the next day. It was two weeks since Ginny had left Harry. She stood there waiting for the kettle to boil and pondered if she should go visit her friend, or if she should wait until Harry came to see her, if he was still upset with her regarding everything that had passed between them.

With a hot mug of tea in hand, Hermione opened the copy of the Daily Prophet and saw the front page.

The mug fell from her hand and crashed on the floor. Small shards of crockery cut her ankle as they flew across the room, and hot tea splashed her feet.

"Harry Potter Injured in Transcontinental Broom Race"

Quickly scanning the article, she saw the accident had happened three days ago and the news had only just reached England. Evidently, while flying at night during the Istanbul to Vladivostok Bi-Annual Broom Race over the Pamir Pass, where the borders of Afghanistan, Tajikistan, Pakistan and China join together, Harry had fallen off his broom. The high terrain, freezing temperatures and heavy snowfall, low oxygen levels, lack of light during a waning crescent moon, and exhaustion were possible factors behind the accident. The Pamir Pass was known as the 'Roof of the World' since it was part of the Himalayas.

There was no news of Harry's condition, how badly he was injured, if he had been treated yet or when he might recover, as he had lain exposed to the elements in sub-zero temperatures for hours before another flyer spotted him lying unconscious on the snow once the sun rose in the morning.
There was no news if Ginny Potter was on the scene or reports of her presence during the race.

Her broken mug of tea forgotten and unaware of the small bleeding cuts on her ankle, Hermione dressed as quickly as possible and Floo’ed directly over to the Ministry.

Running into the section where the Aurors had their offices, she knocked urgently on Kingsley's office door.

The senior Auror was already there and was packing quickly, having read the news shortly before.

"Harry!" Hermione said frantically, seeing a copy of the Daily Prophet on his desk as well.

"I know," Kingsley replied as he was packing a traveling Healer's kit to take with him. "I've already sent a memo to the Portkey Office for an emergency Portkey to be ready and waiting."

Glancing over at the distraught witch, he said, "I'll take care of him and bring him back, Hermione. I promise."

Hermione remembered Harry's promise to bring Ginny back only then to return empty-handed and defeated. It made her heart sink to think Kingsley might bring Harry back, possibly not alive.

Manny twisted the key in the lock. The lock had been spelled so kids wouldn't be able to use their wands to unlock the place and get up to trouble away from parental eyes. It was only the key that could open the lock.

Severus liked it since he would be storing a great many potentially dangerous potions and ingredients, should idle hands try to break in and do a little unsupervised brewing. He had enough experience with his stores being pilfered by various students and magical creatures back at Hogwarts.

There were a few candles in the hanging chandeliers that were mostly burnt down, but there was enough wax to light the place for a little while. There were also some skylights to let some natural light in during the day; they were shuttered closed to keep it dark for now.
Just as Severus expected, there was a narrow area towards the front that would serve nicely for a waiting area. Once past the narrow section, it opened into a large area that was plenty large enough for his needs. There was space he could partition off for private tutoring, another section he could partition off for his office and private consultations, two areas for brewing, and then an area for his stores. There was even a back section that was large enough to hold all the ingredients he would need for a fully stocked Potions master’s shop.

"Why didn't you show this place to me before?" Severus asked Manny.

"Well, I thought you wanted something along the main street, so you'd be more visible to customers. More foot traffic. And this place is a bit run down, and I didn't think you'd want to put that much effort into cleaning it up," he confessed.

"This is exactly what I need. It's actually preferable that I don't have a lot of people peering into the window to see who is waiting. My profession requires a certain amount of discretion–" he explained, but was cut off by Manny.

"Something Arnold seems to have forgotten over the years."

Severus was not about to disparage another Potions master to someone who was not a master or mistress of the art. Arnold ruined his own reputation by shooting off his mouth, which is why he had a brisk business making potions for the local clinic and standard potions at the apothecary, instead of doing commissions. Severus had, during his conversation with the two Chinese witches at the buffet during the Christmas luau, discovered his niche. And Ranjit seemed to think himself above taking certain commissions – his rejections based on their being too simple, too small, too time-consuming to complete, morally questionable, and a long list of other conditions – which left a lot of people in need of someone who was not above such things and could keep their big, fat mouth shut.

When Severus told the two Potions masters about the last few potions he’d developed for Miss Brown, Ranjit was appalled that Severus had lowered himself to do "those types of potions." Arnold wanted to know who he tested his potions on and with.

Severus would tell Manny nothing. It was none of the real estate agent’s business

Severus agreed to take the place starting with a two-year lease with an option to renew afterwards a year or more at a time. Now he had to talk to Draco about drawing more money from his vault, since Draco had promised to cover him until money matters abroad with Miss Brown were settled. Draco even refused the interest that Severus offered to pay, as Draco had told Severus that if it wasn't for him, he'd probably be dead or a soulless husk in Azkaban, and Ginny would still be stuck in a miserable marriage with Potter.

Once money was drawn, Severus could begin cleaning up the place, building and setting the interior to his needs, and buying equipment he was still missing and ingredients he couldn't collect himself. Then, he’d finally feel like a proper Potions master once again.

~~~~~~~*~

It was three days until Christmas, and three days since Hermione had read about Harry's accident in the Daily Prophet. It took until Sunday to report in the paper that Kingsley had found Harry and was working to heal him, but updates on Harry's condition were unconfirmed and the severity of his injuries unknown.

Hermione busied herself with shopping for a Christmas present for her parents over the weekend, hoping the cheerful Christmas carols that played over the loudspeakers in Muggle shops and the bright and colorful decorations might lift her spirits. It was all she could do to not burst into tears in the middle of the store, surrounded by Muggles who were jostling about in their own rush to finish last-minute shopping.

There was little Christmas shopping to do this year at all. Ron and she were no longer married, Ginny was gone, having found sanctuary and happiness with Malfoy, Harry was likely to be gone still, if Kingsley didn't come back with him soon, and Severus was gone as well.

She did get Fastrada a little something for when they would meet for lunch on the 23rd, and Hermione got some guidance from the bookseller at Flourish and Blotts on appropriate gifts from an apprentice to the Master they were studying under. She bought Albert a very nice blank journal in which to record his notes and experiments. Journals were always needed and welcomed; a Potions master could never have enough of them.

Hermione could have bought something for Lavender, but it still felt too awkward. What does one buy for their very rich employer who is marrying your ex-husband?

With her nose in a book on advanced Greek grammar and sentence structure, the young Potions apprentice did not hear the knock on her door.

Hearing no response from her, Albert popped his head through their adjoining door to their offices. Then the elder wizard called out, "No, she's here. She probably just didn't hear you knock."
Albert’s apprentice recognized his voice.

There was another knock on her door and Hermione bid whoever it was to enter.

Kingsley entered her office with a smile on his face.

Hermione got up from her desk and ran around it to rush into his arms. Hugging him fiercely, she asked, "I take it from the look on your face Harry is okay?"

Pulling herself away after realizing she was jubilantly affectionate with the imposing Auror, she looked behind him and asked, "Where's Harry?"

Kingsley began chuckling to himself before asking if he could sit down.

Hermione offered him a seat and asked if he wanted a cup of tea, which he declined. He still had to check back in with the Ministry, but came to see Hermione first since she was the closest one to Harry, and Ron and Harry had a momentary falling out over Ron's long-term affair with Lavender. In addition, Hermione was the first and only one who came to his office once the news broke before Kingsley had left to take an emergency Portkey to Dushanbe in Tajikistan. That was where he’d expected to find Harry, as that was the closest major city with a significant wizarding population to where his accident happened.

"So where is Harry? Is he all right? What happened?" she asked, her curiosity turning into speculative fears, expecting the worst.

"I found Harry. He's all right. There was little left for me to heal once I arrived there. Fortunately, Harry seemed to wind up being taken care of a very competent Healer. Although I doubt she's old enough to have had any formal training, she is skilled enough," he said with a smile upon his lips.

"So where is he? Is he all better or does he need time to heal some more before he can come home?" Hermione asked, still worried about the fate of her oldest friend.

"His body is perfectly healed," Kingsley assured her, waving his hands in a way to assure Hermione that she could sit back down and calm herself. "But you could say there are other things that are being mended right now as he remains in the care of the people who took him in when Yuri Novgorodich, the wizard who found him, brought him there."
Hermione gave the Auror a very puzzled look, unclear what else was wrong with Harry if his body was healed.

"Let's just say his heart is being mended by a certain nomadic Kyrgyz witch who was initially taking care of him until I showed up, and she seems to be equally taken with him. Even her father seems to like him. Their yurt is quite lovely." Kingsley smiled to himself once again and shook his head.

"Harry, this very instant, is in a yurt in the Himalayas, being tended to by a nomadic Kyrgyz witch, and he's all healed, and he didn't come home?" she asked, seeking for clarification, in case she missed any of the finer points already covered.

"Yes." His grin got even broader, and he nodded his head up and down. "Oh, and Harry has a message for you. He said you were right. 'Love finds us when we least expect it.' I guess that's referring to a conversation you two had."

Hermione smiled to herself, happy that Harry had found a little bit of love. She hoped this would last, and be as deep and glorious as the love she had for Severus, but it also disturbed her Harry could fall in love so quickly while still getting over the shock of Ginny leaving him recently. She wondered if this was just a temporary rebound romance.

Kingsley, noting the slightly faraway look in Hermione's eye, cleared his throat. "If I may ask, how close were you and Severus?"

Hermione felt a sudden lump in her throat, and the tears began welling in her eyes before she could stop herself. Her lips were set in a grim line, refusing to let them wibble or frown.

Kingsley's suspicions were confirmed. And he had a sense that Severus' feelings ran just as strong as hers, having noticed the changing attitude of his parolee over the months before he fled. One couldn't be an Auror without noticing these types of small changes in the disposition of someone you knew for years.

He rose and patted her hand, telling her Harry promised to be back the day after New Year's Day. Now Kingsley had to go to work and fill out a disability form for Harry, given he needed an extra two weeks from his accident.
Once Kingsley let himself out and shut the door, Hermione threw her head down on her desk and began to sob. In part from relief that Harry was okay, and in part because she suddenly missed Severus so much it felt like her heart was breaking in two once again.

===========================

BONUS SECTION:

The Daily Prophet
Rite Skeeter Exclusive

MOLLY WEASLEY: Bad Mother Or Bad Luck?

Two divorces of in one week for Weasley children!

December 10th, 2003 – Anyone with a pulse above an Inferi and intelligence above a troll will have no doubt heard the scandalous news that Harry Potter, the boy who eventually defeated You-Know-Who and was raised by Muggles under tragic circumstances, and Ginny Potter (née Weasley), the youngest in an overly long line of children, have filed for divorce!

The Potters were spotted together last Friday morning walking towards the Portkey Office, where they left to go on holiday, but Ministry records show by the time they were reported to have departed they had already severed their marital bonds that morning. One wonders if they went their separate ways upon arriving at their destination, a destination kept under wraps for some secret reason.

This divorce is yet a second one that has recently rocked the wizarding world. The first noteworthy divorce was when Ron Weasley, star Keeper for the Chudley Cannons and pin-up eye candy for the Mercury Broom Company's 2004 calendar, left his shrewish wife Hermione Weasley (née Granger) for Miss Lavender Brown, founder and owner of the cosmetic beauty empire. The Weasleys' divorce is the first one recorded in decades, the last one being when Tom Riddle Sr., Muggle and father to You-Know-Who, divorced Merope Gaunt, descendant of Salazar Slytherin. Let us all hope that the former Mrs. Weasley is not pregnant and history does not repeat itself with yet another forsaken magical child, damaged by divorce, eventually wreaking terror upon the wizarding world in the decades to come. It would not surprise this reporter that Hermione Weasley would be capable of spawning such an insidious monster.

As for the Potters' divorce, was the Weasleys' divorce the impetus? Or is there someone with whom the blame of these shocking events should be placed? Since Harry Potter and Hermione Weasley were both raised by Muggles, it is through no fault of their own pitiable upbringing and blind ignorance that they were not more careful when entering upon marriage, given their backgrounds. However, that does not excuse Ron Weasley and Ginny Potter, the two youngest children of Arthur and Molly Weasley, both children pure-blood.

In wizarding society, witches are often given the responsibility to raise, educate, and ingrain the next generation with the values, customs, and mores of wizarding society. So how is it that two pure-blood children from the same family wind up filing for divorce within a week of each other? Let us look to Molly Weasley, matron of the Weasley family and mother of seven children.

Mrs. Molly Weasley is a pure-blood witch of the Prewett family, whose brothers, Fabian and Gideon Prewett, died during the first war. Unfortunately, they passed before marrying and producing any offspring of their own. Could the loss of two brothers in the flower of their youth have driven Molly Weasley to produce enough children to ensure the continuation of the Weasley line? Given all of the Weasley children survived the second war, it is safe to assume her plan succeeded and the Weasley name will not die out, unlike so many other old and prestigious pure-blood families that are now forever gone. One could say she went a bit overboard and should have stopped after producing the financially successful twins, Fred and George.

One must wonder, though, having so many children, did she have too many, and in doing so fail to instruct her two youngest children about the importance of marriage in our society? From Ron Weasley's interview in another unnamed publication, he stated he felt pressure from family to marry. Did Molly Weasley harangue her youngest son into proposing to Hermione Granger? Or was there a love triangle during the war between Ron Weasley, Hermione Granger, and Harry Potter that caused Ron to propose first, given the history of Hermione Weasley toying with Harry Potter's heart years before, during the Tri-wizard Tournament at Hogwarts. Could Ginny Potter, knowing her husband pined away for Hermione Weasley, been driven to seek a divorce from a wizard who didn't love her?

This reporter thinks there is more behind the story that what the public has been allowed to glimpse from the interview that Lavender Brown, and the formerly married couple Ron and Hermione Weasley, so carefully meted out, like a carefully rehearsed lie. How could it be that Hermione Weasley did not know her husband and her now current employer were carrying on for so long. For a witch who had been crowned the brightest in a century by her instructors at Hogwarts, it seems the former Mrs. Weasley wasn't too bright – to have not known her husband was having an affair for so long. And then to go on and take a job working for her ex-husband's mistress? Either Muggle morals are even stranger than we have suspected, or there is something more going on.

As a reporter seeking the truth for her loyal readers, I promise to get to the bottom of this story and won't rest until it is laid out clearly and truthfully, as if dictated under Veritaserum.

Chapter End Notes

Big round of applause to JuneW and Cygnuz for their always helpful and excellent beta work!

Before you take me to task for remarking about Indian culture being more reserved regarding sexuality, I am taking a nearly verbatim quote from an Indian friend of mine regarding Indian culture's attitude towards sex and sexual ideas/items. She referred to her own culture as puritanical and unreasonably prudish. This was her very own assessment about her own culture. She even told me the story about how she was nearly an adult until she finally learned where babies came from, being the youngest in her family and having been told the “story” that she’d been bought for a quart of rice and that how babies came to be, being purchased by a family. Had she been a middle or older sibling, she would have learned about where babies came from since she would have been around when younger siblings were born, but given she was the youngest, she was not informed of this biological fact.

An engawa is a Japanese veranda, a wooden platform border that runs around the outside of the house, usually under the roof line. Often a place in which to relax, sit, and enjoy the garden.
Hale is Hawaiian for home.

Ho'okipa is Hawaiian for hospitality.

I have no idea if there are magazines with the exact titles of 'Aloha Style' and 'Island Dream Home,' but it seemed like the sort of magazine titles one would come across.

There are two ways to spell Kyrgyz. The other way is Kirghiz. A Google fight determined which one I should use.

There is a movie about them called "Roof of the World" that I highly recommend: http://www.theroofoftheworld.com/themovie.html
Draco had finished preparing the house and outfitting everything they would need in time for the wedding. During the ceremony and reception dinner, a free house-elf that Draco hired would finish taking the last of their things from Justina's hotel and setting it up before Draco carried his new bride over the threshold.

House-elves were free on Malu Palekaiko, as some had sought sanctuary once being freed. They often made money by helping people with their cooking, laundry, gardening, and other household chores, which allowed many witches to focus on home-schooling their children and working. Some of the elves on Malu Palekaiko were house-elves that Hermione had freed during the war with her ruse of clothing Transfigured into common items that some Death Eater witch or wizard handed off to their diminutive slave, only to turn back into clothing.

The day before the wedding they picked out their wedding bands. Draco complained that he didn't even have a chance to buy Ginny an engagement ring. She replied that she didn't need diamonds for him to prove his intent, but that diamonds were still welcome and he could buy them for her later. She was more intent on getting a simple gold band on her finger than something sparkly.

Ginny had made it clear she didn't want a big wedding like her first wedding. In fact, she wanted everything to be the opposite.

Harry had been prevented from seeing Ginny and her dress before the wedding ceremony. She also had a veil on and a blusher signifying her virginity, at her mother's insistence. Ginny had been so disinterested in the planning of her wedding to Harry, that Molly took over; it was the wedding Molly had always wanted. All the old wizard traditions and superstitions were observed, an auspicious time was picked, from the rising of the clock hand to the waxing of the moon. And the guest list was huge, resulting in a large and very formal reception that was tightly scheduled to have all the right dances in the right order with the right people and the right traditions observed, from the garter to the bouquet and the tossing of rice at the right time.

Today, Ginny and Draco dressed for the wedding in the honeymoon suite together. Ginny had long ago lost her virginity and she didn't want a veil anyway. If anything, Ginny eschewed many wizarding traditions and wanted to go the more casual Muggle route. Draco was happy to let her have it her way, as he was just glad to be able to marry her in the first place. And if making her wedding to Draco nothing at all like her wedding to Potter made her happy, he was just fine with that.

As sunset neared, they descended the stairs together. She had a simple white gown made of the lightest silk, as she still found the middle of December to be quite warm and was glad it would be nice and cool by the beach. There was a crown of plumeria, jasmine, and orchids in Ginny's hair, and a bouquet of pink and red anthuriums and white orchids in her hand. She remarked how the anthuriums looked like hearts and chose them to symbolize her love for Draco.

Draco was in a Hawaiian shirt – white with a subtle cream-colored maile lei pattern – and a pair of long white linen trousers.

In the lobby, they exchanged leis.

Draco and Ginny presented a lei to Mounga, who was not only the local judge but also a priest. Severus presented Draco his lei made of white ginger, while Halulu presented Ginny with her lei made of jasmine and orchids. The bride and groom in turn presented their witnesses with leis made of carnations and orchids.

A few days prior, Severus had asked Ginny if she wanted him to give her away to which she said that her own father passed her off like a piece of chattel, putting her hand in Harry's during her first wedding, as if transferring property from one owner to another. She had said she was walking to her wedding with no one passing her off as something to be owned, as this time she was going to marry of her own free will. Having been forced into an arranged marriage himself, Severus could definitely respect her wishes and admired her symbolic choice.

As they exited the hotel to begin to walk the short distance to the beach to be married by the sea, the ocean was the music to their own wedding march; people started coming out of their businesses or were already waiting along the sidewalk to watch the bride and groom. The whole town had become enchanted about their story of love denied and regained. Though no one else was invited, many in the town followed behind the bridal party to watch the two lovers finally unite, in a marriage that no one, especially a certain mother, could put asunder.

Once upon the sand, Ginny and Draco faced each other while holding hands. Neither paid much attention to the glorious sunset that blazed in the most vivid of hues, coloring the bridal couple with shades of orange, pink, and gold. They only had eyes for each other.

Rainbow handed Mounga a large conch shell, which he blew three times, a Hawaiian tradition for asking divine presence at the start of the ceremony.

Upon seeing the nearly two-hundred who had followed them down to the beach, Mounga had to cast the Sonorus Charm on himself to be heard – over the sounds of the waves upon the beach – by those who had come.

Ginny didn't mind that the town had come out to watch them be married. All that mattered is that she was there with Draco beside her.

"We are here today to officially join Ginny and Draco in the eternal bonds of marriage. Marriage is a step I would caution all young lovers to consider greatly, but as Ginny and Draco have shared with me in preparation of the ceremony all that they have suffered and fought to overcome to finally be together, I know that they understand the seriousness and commitment to which they enter. Even Severus has allowed me to share a little bit of how he helped these two lovers be together and here in sanctuary where they are finally free to marry."

Severus saw only the back of Draco's head, but he knew the blond was smiling at Ginny. Ginny's face was aglow from the sunset and the love she had beaming for her groom that she could not contain. She was truly a radiant bride. Should Severus see Hermione again, he would have to share this memory with her in a Pensieve.

The best man was wearing a red Hawaiian shirt, as Halulu said that red and pink are the preferred Hawaiian wedding colors as they symbolize love; red was a color normally shunned in European wizarding cultures to wear to a wedding. He was also wearing a pair of long linen trousers like the groom, but with a different cut and in cream instead of white. The matron-of-honor was in a pink-and-red muumuu, holding a bouquet of pink orchids and white carnations.

"They grew up together as they attended the same school. They were no school sweethearts, for at the time they had a rivalry between their families that was not that different from Romeo and Juliet," Mounga said. "Ginny even told me about a particularly interesting Bat-Bogey Hex she cast upon Draco."

There was a murmur of laughter among the crowd, amused that two people so in love were once hostile towards one another.

"It was not until the war drove Draco to some very dark places, where he was saved by Severus, that their friendship began to bloom. During the war, it was Ginny's friendship and their growing love for one another that gave him hope to strive to live to see the end of the war. But as the war ended and their romance resumed, they were driven apart once more by lies, deceit, and injustice."

Ginny began to wipe away at a tear, and Draco gave her a handkerchief to dab at her eyes. Severus noticed how Draco's own hand moved to wipe away an errant tear from his own face.

"Hope was temporarily lost, but their love did not die. Eventually, Ginny and Draco were reunited and that hope was renewed. At the time, Ginny was trapped in a marriage she did not want from the start and had been pressured into accepting against her will. Draco was unjustly punished for criimes he did not commit. But as long as they had each other, they had hope. With the help of a mutual friend of Severus and Ginny’s, all three of these people here before me were able to escape and come here to find sanctuary. And now, after so many years of waiting, there is nothing to stand in the way of Ginny and Draco declaring their love for one another, and being joined in marriage."

Severus could hear several witches behind him blubbering on and blowing their noses.

"And since they have waited so long," Mounga said with a bit of levity, "I think it would be a shame to make them wait any longer to exchange their vows."

When Ginny married Harry, it had been an abysmally long ceremony, as her mother had arranged it all it was nearly an hour long. Ginny could still remember her feet hurting while she stood in heels her mother had picked out – shoes that were too high to stand in for long periods of time. This time, Ginny picked something low and sensible, especially since she would be walking on sand, and she wanted to keep the ceremony as short as possible.

Severus handed Draco Ginny's wedding band, while Ginny was given Draco's by her matron-of-honor.
The bride and groom promised each other – in front of Severus, Halulu, and about two-hundred impromptu guests – to love, honor, respect, and cherish each other, and to support and stick with each other through the best and worst of times to come.

Mounga even added an extra comment that if they had already stuck with each other as long as they had and after all they had gone through, then marriage would be a piece of cake for them, since they seemed to have dealt with the worst of it already. This seemed to make the bride and groom laugh a little as they still gazed adoringly at each other. The crowd even laughed a little and Severus smiled, moved by Mounga's simple and eloquent interpretation of events during the ceremony.

For the next part, Mounga had beforehand helped the bride and groom pick out what they would say.

Mounga guided them slowly through the last part of the ceremony. "Now if each of you will please repeat a few words in Hawaiian: Ku'u lei..."

Draco and Ginny both repeated the words in unison, the bride slightly stumbling over the pronunciation.

"Nau ko`u aloha..."

This time Draco had a little trouble repeating the words. Severus could see the younger wizard's hands shake a little bit, due to excitement that the ceremony was almost over and Ginny would truly be his.

"No keia la..."

The bride smiled even wider, if that was possible, as she repeated the words with her groom.

"No keia po..."

Severus could sense the building excitement in Draco's voice.

"A mau loa."

They repeated the last of their vows.

Mounga translated for the crowd. "For those of you who don't speak Hawaiian, they said 'My beloved. My love is yours from this day, from this night, forever more.'" Mounga pause before adding, “Well, go on. Kiss her, dude, she's yours."

Draco didn't have to be told twice and swept his wife into a passionate kiss, not caring who saw them. Ginny kissed her husband back, tears of joy streaming down the side of her face. They pulled apart and Ginny was laughing, the tears refusing to stop, as she dabbed at her eyes with the handkerchief Draco had given her. Halulu gave Ginny her bouquet back.

"It is with my utmost pleasure that I have the privilege to announce you as Mr. and Mrs. Malfoy," Mounga said with great pride, a huge grin across his wide face.

Severus clapped decorously, while others in the crowd cheered, whistled, hooted, and hollered.
It was then that Ginny and Draco noticed that someone had been taking pictures of them during the ceremony.

The crowd, which had gathered around the couple in a semicircle, parted. As the newlywed couple began walking up the makeshift aisle, the small children who had come to watch began throwing flowers at them in a shower of petals. Witches and wizards held their wands aloft and sparking shapes erupted from their wands. Hearts, orchids, a few cupids, and showers of sparks, twinking and fading, like brilliant fireworks in the dimming light of the sun that had just set, shimmered above the bride and groom's heads.

Severus followed behind the bridal couple, with Halulu and her husband behind. Moungea and his wife were the last to follow the bridal couple.

As Ginny and Draco began the walk up the center of the main street towards Mario's, the townsfolk still following behind, Mario came running out of his restaurant, looking a little panicked.

"I'm so sorry. I cannot serve you dinner right now. Something has happened," the restaurant owner with an Italian accent said, bowing at the bride and groom, his head hung in shame. "Please, this way. Please come with me," he insisted. "I must show you."

He guided Ginny and Draco a couple blocks over and away from his restaurant, Mario apologizing for his mistake.

Ginny and Draco tried to get Mario to say what the problem was, as they would not let a kitchen fire or a problem with reservations ruin an otherwise perfect day.

As they rounded the corner, Ginny and Draco stopped in their tracks and stood, their mouths open in shock. The town had decorated the community center with flowers and streamers, and there was a big buffet table brimming with food, nearly as much as the night of the luau. There was a big banner with a picture of bells ringing back and forth, and flowers blooming on it, that said, "Congratulations Ginny & Draco."

"I'm so sorry I cannot serve you your wedding feast in my restaurant," Mario explained, "when the town was insistent upon throwing you a proper wedding feast to celebrate a love such as yours."

Ginny turned to Draco and buried her face in his chest, unable to find the words, overcome by the generosity of the people who had welcomed them so warmly and made them feel at home from the moment they were granted sanctuary. She clutched the handkerchief to her face and wished desperately she would stop crying, regretting not packing a vial of Lovely Lavender's Puffy Poof Eye Crème into the pocket where her wand was, or into her bouquet.

Draco looked back at the expectant crowd of faces and said jovially, "I think she's happy and is trying to say thank you." Even Draco was feeling a bit overwhelmed at the moment.

Some of the people close to them laughed and clapped.

The bridal couple walked into the community center and were ushered to their seat of honor by those who had helped set up the place while the ceremony was happening.

Turning to Severus, Ginny asked, "Did you know about this?"

Severus smiled and shook his head. "I'm as shocked as you appear to be. I know you wanted a small, quiet wedding, so I hope this is not--"

"No, no!" Ginny protested. "I think this is perfect. I was happy with a small reception, but this is even better, because..." The bride felt the tears come once again.

Severus reached into his pocket and discreetly produced a small tube of Lovely Lavender's Puffy Poof Eye Crème and handed it to Ginny. The former gigolo was very familiar with witches and their fits of crying regarding emotional situations, and he'd come prepared.

Ginny thanked him and ran off to the restroom to freshen up.

Severus took this time, while Ginny was not attached to Draco's side, to shake the groom's hand and congratulate him.

"And thank you, Severus. If it wasn't for you..." Draco trailed off, the history so well-known between them that no further words were required. The groom went to reach to give Severus a hug, but backed off suddenly after remembering they all had leis on and he didn't want to crush them.

Severus patted Draco on the back, showing that he understood the feelings of gratitude felt by the younger wizard.

Ginny emerged from the restroom looking as fresh as when she’d descended the staircase at the hotel, her make-up restored.

Some people ran off to get their instruments from home. They came back to serenade the bridal couple and all the guests at the reception.

This time, Severus restricted the amount of food he put on his plate so it was something more manageable. The townsfolk had even roasted a whole pig, which was being carved up at the end of the table.
"I told you I smelled pork," Severus heard Ginny say to Draco. "I knew I wasn't crazy."

The band was a rotation of people, some playing several songs before someone else took over so the first person could go grab something at the buffet. Others played a few songs before letting someone else take a turn at playing.

Tiki torches floated high above the guests and bridal party, illuminating the reception as dusk settled in and moved towards twilight.

Severus was sitting next to Draco when Mario came over.

"I hope this is an acceptable substitute for the dinner you had reserved," the restaurant owner asked.

Ginny and Draco thanked him profusely for his part in making their wedding all that much more special.

"If there is anything I can do, Mario," Draco offered.

Mario nodded his head about as if contemplating and suggested, "If you could pay me for your wedding cake, that would be all I would ask."

"You made us a cake?" Ginny said, in shock that everyone seemed to have thought of everything.

Mario shrugged and said it was coming out later once the dinner buffet was cleared away.

People began to clap and clink their glasses, demanding the couple kiss, which Ginny and Draco did not hesitate to fulfill.

Though Severus would not let a crowd goad him into kissing Hermione, had he been marrying her that day, he could not fault the bridal couple for expressing their affection and getting caught up in the infectious moment.

Once most of the guests had finished dinner, Halulu coaxed Ginny and Draco out onto the dance floor. Neither of the newlyweds were counting on dancing, but they gladly went out into the middle of the floor that had been cleared with a few flicks of a few wands of the communal picnic table seating, after people had taken their plates to the kitchen area in the back.

"What'll it be, Draco? A foxtrot? Cha-cha?" called out a large, portly Polynesian wizard of Samoan descent with a ukulele in his hands.

Gazing at Ginny lovingly, the groom said, "A waltz, please, Jimmy."

The wizard talked to a few other band members before replying, "Well, this is an anniversary song, but I think this fits the mood right now." He gave a count to the band to begin.

Jimmy and another wizard, Lamar, sang the melody in harmony, accompanied by the simple playing of Jimmy's ukulele and a stand-up bass played by a witch.

The bridal couple swayed back and forth before they began to spin about the floor. Their eyes never left each other's gaze.

Severus recognized the familiar melody of Iosif Ivanovici's "Donauwellen Walzer," also known as "Waves of the Danube," but was surprised when the Tongan wizard began singing words to the melody. Severus sat and listened to the lyrics, and how perfectly they did seem to fit the moment.
"Oh, how we danced on the night we were wed,
We vowed our true love, though a word wasn't said.
The world was in bloom, there were stars in the skies,
Except for the few that were there in your eyes..."

Severus remembered how Hermione would look at him – with the same loving intensity that Ginny was looking at Draco with as they danced – especially during their last days together. As much as Severus felt happiness for Draco that he and Ginny had had their storybook ending, the best man wondered if he would ever live happily ever after, or if he was doomed to the typical bachelor uncle-like figure paradigm, never pairing off himself with his own true love.

As the song ended with the slow strumming of Jimmy's ukulele and the gentle deep plucking of the bass keeping time, Draco spun Ginny about, lifting his arm up high so she could pass under it before sweeping her up into a kiss at the end.

Halulu leaned over towards Severus and said just loud enough to be heard over the crowd's applause, "Everyone loves a happy ending to a good love story. Wouldn't you agree?" she asked, catching the slight undercurrent of melancholy on Severus.

"Unfortunately, there are not enough of them in this world. I'm glad these two had theirs finally."

Halulu put out her hand and said, "Come on. It's tradition that you and I have a spin on the floor."

"As long as it isn't the cha-cha," Severus warned her. He reviled that dance. Severus was a tango man, if Latin music was involved.

To his relief, the band struck up a moderate tempo foxtrot and Severus guided Halulu to the floor, using all the grace and manners his mother had instilled in him for dancing.

Halulu was a very good dancer with an excellent sense of time and grace. Ginny glanced over and smiled, seeing Severus out on the floor enjoying himself.

Halfway through the song, Halulu's husband, Greg, stepped in and said, "Mind if I cut in?"

Severus bowed out and removed himself; Greg and Halulu danced away.

As Severus was making an exit off the dance floor, weaving between other couples who were moving to and fro, Rainbow stepped in front of him.

"Not so fast, I think I'm entitled to at least a half a dance," she insisted before Severus obliged. He took her hand in his, and placed his other hand delicately upon her waist.

It certainly was a change to dance with a woman as tall as himself, especially since she was wearing heels with a few inches on them and was now taller than him. It wasn't bad, it was just that he was used to dancing with Hermione, who was shorter in stature.

"I hope you put on your dancing shoes because I think your dance card is going to be full tonight," Rainbow warned him, her eyes darting to the side, directing Severus' to the various women around the edge of the dance floor. They were obviously looking for an opportunity to bolt onto the floor and snatch up Severus as a dance partner, once Rainbow was done dancing with the most eligible bachelor on the island.

Tina, Gretchen, Miyuki, and Svetlana looked like they were flyers at the starting line of a broom race waiting for the cannon to go off.
As the song came to an end, Rainbow curtsied to her dance partner and thanked him. On the way off the floor she did her best to delay a couple of the witches who were making a beeline by stepping in front of them and then stepping to the side, continuing to be in their way, apologizing with believable sincerity.

Fortunately for Severus, Ginny stepped in front of him and said, "My turn."

He let out a slow sigh of relief that he had a stay of execution. Some of the witches at the edge of the dance floor gave an impatient huff that they had to wait a little longer.

"Thank you, Severus. Thank you for doing so much for us, and especially keeping Draco safe all these years," Ginny said, her hand placed upon his shoulder and her other hand lightly in his other as another foxtrot with a slower beat began.

"There was a time after the decree where I should have taken better care of him, before Miss Brown found him," he said.

"But you had yourself to look after too," Ginny reminded him. "I can't fault you. It was a hard time for you both. I'm just glad that you were there for him during the war, that's when he needed you the most. You've helped make our dream come true, and that's the best wedding present I could have ever hoped for."

"Then I guess you won't be needing the wedding present I got you both then," he joshed lightly.

"Of course we'll still take it. If you gave it, it must be something we really need or that we'll really like. Or both. You've been very thoughtful and considerate, Severus. I think Hermione would agree with me on that matter."

Just at the mentioning of her name, a small cloud of darkness dimmed the smile on his face.

Ginny smiled a little less and said, "I know. I miss her too." After forcing herself to smile a little more than the bride felt at the moment, she added, "I left a little present for you in your room, when you get back later tonight."

Mounga and his daughter, Akela, danced up alongside Severus and Ginny. Rainbow was busy dancing with Draco while chatting up a storm, the groom nodding his head unable to get a word in edgewise.

"I was wondering," Akela asked, with a little uncertainty, "if I could have the next dance with you, Mr. Snape?"

Severus weighed his options and considered whether a young witch with a schoolgirl's crush was a better option than the other witches – who were of the age of consent and willing to battle each other to get their hands on him first. He wondered who would cast the first hex between the witches anxious to dash onto the floor if an opportunity presented itself.

"I'd be honored," Severus replied gallantly.

"I guess that means I finally get a chance to dance with the bride," Mounga added, implying he was Ginny's next dance partner.

The song soon ended, and before the anxious single witches could even step onto the floor, Severus took Akela up as his new partner, swapping with Mounga.

The music started and Akela said, "Oh no, it's a tango. I don't know how. Maybe the next one?"
"Nonsense," Severus replied as they stood there, the other couples moving about the floor around them. "I'll teach you. It's easy. Just pay attention to my hand on your back to guide you, and my other hand will help direct you when and where to turn."

He began moving slowly, letting Akela find the rhythm, giving her small verbal cues as to whether he was going to move forwards, back, or sideways.

"That's it, you're getting the hang of it," the teacher encouraged his young pupil. "Eyes up. Look at me in the face," he said in order to teach her the habit of not trying to watch their feet. "There, you're dancing the tango. That wasn't so hard, was it?"

Severus saw the look of adoration wash over her face, and he wondered if he praised her too much. She was a sweet girl and Mouna's oldest, so he felt an obligation to be extra patient with her, something he never was back at Hogwarts. He just hoped his extra patience wasn't mistaken for something more. He did not want to toy with her fragile heart, remembering what it was like to be young and his own crush on Lily, only to be dashed later.

It was a short tango, and as the song came near the end, Severus guided Akela into a simple pose that was appropriate for a young witch, versus the leg curl around his thigh Hermione would often end with. His list of safe partners to dance with was nearly exhausted, and he faced the fact that he would have to excuse himself from the floor soon.

Gretchen and Tina were closest to Severus and practically bowled over other dancers to get to him first. The sought-after bachelor saw Tina cast a tripping jinx, and Gretchen went face down onto the floor, other dancers helping her up from her fall.

Without asking his permission for a dance, Tina thrust herself into Severus' arms and proudly crowed, "You're mine now."

Severus spotted Draco changing partners to dance with Justina, the hotel owner. The groom gave him a look of pity, but failed as a smirk crept across his face. Severus narrowed his eyes at Draco, indicating there was nothing funny about this at all.

The music the various assortment of musicians played was an equal mix of wizarding favorites and Muggle songs, a few of the Muggle ones even Severus was familiar with.

A wizard waltz started up and Severus began dancing with Tina, out of obligation to not verbally eviscerate her and make a scene at Ginny and Draco's wedding. He could have easily torn her to shreds with a few multi-syllabic choice words and a sneer upon his lips, making her run off into the night crying. He chose, however, to play the part of dutiful best man and be gracious, not wanting to ruin one moment of the wedding for the sake of his dear friends.

Severus was a Slytherin and was not going to be bested by this Southern fried upstart tart. Spinning her around in a grand arc, he managed to "accidentally" bump up against another couple while forcing her to spin under his arm, his foot placed a little too far out. Tina went down like a sack of potatoes.

After apologizing profusely at his clumsiness, his sincerity almost believable, Severus bent down to help her up, to which she complained and winced. Tina had lightly sprained her ankle. He graciously helped her to a chair, at which point, Rainbow, who worked as a Healer part-time at the local clinic, came over to take care of the injured witch.

"Oh, my," Rainbow said, a bit over dramatically. "What happened?" She shook her head back and forth in sympathy.
Severus could tell she was biting the corners of her mouth to stop from smiling.

"I guess I got carried away in the moment and Miss Angstrem suffered the result of that," Severus lied sweetly. "I do hope you accept my apologies."

Tina plastered on a saccharine smile, now quite less enamored of her prey. "It's all right, sugar. Rainbow will have me fixed up in a jiffy, and then you and I can have another go at it."

Severus bowed lightly and quickly made his exit.

As he made his way back towards his seat, begging off other offers from other single eager witches for a dance, the next song started up.

The words may have been sung in Hawaiian, but he recognized the melody instantly. It was the same song he'd requested at that lounge in San Francisco; it was also one of the songs he remembered teaching Hermione to dance to, the night she was blindfolded and he first begged to have her as they ground against each other desperately while fully clothed in the kitchen. It was the song she requested the most when they danced at his flat.

Suddenly feeling as if there were too many people and not enough room to breathe, the atmosphere too oppressive, Severus exited the open-air pavilion out the side towards the grassy area of the town's central park. The park had a giant Norfolk pine decorated with Christmas lights at one end, and a tall bronze menorah with six large white candles burning away at the other end since it was the fifth night of Hanukkah.

Listening to the song he knew so well, he didn't notice Mounga walking towards him until he was standing beside him.

"You all right, man?" asked the large wizard, who had become Severus' friend in his short time there.

"This was our song." That was all Severus had to say for Mounga to understand.

Severus suddenly remembered that London was eleven hours ahead of their time. He pondered if Hermione had awoken yet, as it was Christmas morning by now, and if Marf gave her the small box as instructed. It was his last gift to her in the hope that he could help fulfill her wish.

Before the song ended, Avi ran out to look for the two wizards who stood in silence before the town's Christmas tree.

"It's time for the Hora," he informed them.

Avi was one of the Jewish wizards in Malu Palekaiko. He and his friend, Saul, were Muggle-born wizards who came seeking sanctuary right at the end of the 1948 Arab-Israeli War. Avi and Saul had both used their magic to influence the outcome of the war, breaking the International Statute of Wizarding Secrecy of 1689, as well as several other international laws restricting wizards and witches from using magic to influence politics and wars where Muggles were concerned. But as they had been born into Muggle society, these two wizards felt an obligation to help their Muggle friends and family in the fight, Magical Ministry rules and sanctions be damned, by which they were. At the close of the war, the Palestinian and newly-formed Israeli Ministry of Magic both went after the two wizards for interfering with Muggle politics and governments with the use of magic.

There were also a few Palestinian witches and wizards on the island who likewise became sanctuary-seekers after the same war for the same reasons. It seemed that both groups of witches and wizards, though on opposite sides of the war, wound up becoming friends over the years after moving beyond their initial hostilities, though it had taken some time.

It seemed that some of the Muggle-borns who’d sought sanctuary on Malu Palekaiko had used their magic in similar ways during many Muggle conflicts over the decades, including a few Irish Muggle-borns during the Irish fight for independence, and India's struggle as well, in which Ranjit had done the same as Avi and Saul. There were many other countries over the world, besides those four listed, where Muggle-borns had become involved in Muggle political concerns and later needed to seek sanctuary. This explained a lot of the Muggle influence of music and a few adopted traditions into the local Hawaiian wizarding culture.

Avi and Saul had fled Israel as bachelors, but their sweethearts followed them shortly afterwards. They had the full traditional double Jewish wedding, and many friends from Israel Portkeyed in for the wedding. One bounty hunter, who thought this would be a good time to bring back at least one of the wanted criminals during the wedding, wound up getting transported three miles out to sea, where he accidentally kicked a shark that happened to be swimming by at the time. The shark, aggrieved that he had done nothing to provoke the kick, bit the wizard's foot off. The wizard was able to grow it back, but the blood in the water certainly put the shark in a more aggressive mood until someone rescued the wizard and sent him on his way back to Israel with a newly re-grown foot.

Avi and Saul's double wedding was so memorable that one of the traditions the local population adopted immediately was the Hora. Tonight, the dance was about to begin, but could not until men with strong backs could come help. And as Severus was a capable wizard, and the best man, of course he had to participate.

Severus, Mounga, and several other wizards stood round in a circle while the two Jewish wizards gave a brief set of instructions for those who had forgotten the finer points and for Severus' education. Once that was done, they could begin.

As the song that was currently playing finished up, two chairs were pulled into the center of the dance floor. Ginny and Draco had no idea what was going on as everyone cleared away from them, and the newlyweds were encouraged to sit in the chairs provided.

Saul stood to the side, his wand ready, just in case, while Avi positioned five of the strongest men around Draco and four more around Ginny.

"Hold on tight," Avi warned, as he handed a large white handkerchief and instructed Draco and Ginny to hold each end of it.

The women surrounding the couple began to titter, knowing what would happen next, some of them remembering their own weddings.

Severus asked, while he was getting his mini-lesson in Hora chair-lifting, why they didn't use wands instead of their backs to lift the bride and groom, to which Avi merely said, "It's tradition!"

As the band struck up, playing "Hava Nagila," all the wizards simultaneously lifted both chairs, lifting Draco and Ginny high into the air.

Ginny squealed and Draco made some noise about the sudden change in elevation. It wasn't the height that surprised them, both being excellent broom flyers; it was the unexpectedness of it all.

Severus was helping Mounga, Greg, and a couple other wizards whose names he had yet to learn, hold Draco aloft in his chair. Draco let go of the end of the handkerchief as he tried to hold on and stop from sliding off. Saul, with his wand, guided the end back to Draco so he could grasp it once more. The wizards began to move them about, the bride and groom circling each other, while the witches at the reception circled the bride and groom, holding hands, dancing around in a circle clockwise. The wizards made another circle outside of the women, holding hands and moving in the opposite direction, counter-clockwise.

Ginny and Draco laughed as they tried to hold onto their seats with one hand, and holding onto the handkerchief with another. Since the bride was wearing a silk gown, Saul had to help hold her in place on her seat, with his wand, as they moved about to keep her from sliding off.

It was certainly the most unexpected and thrilling wedding ritual the newlyweds had ever encountered and they loved it. It was yet another surprise in an evening full of them.

When the song ended, the men lowered the bride and groom, who fell into each other's arms laughing and out of breath.

It was time for the toast and cake now. Normally, a wedding reception would have more dancing before moving onto these two traditions, but it was Christmas Eve and parents needed to get their children off to bed or, as they warned their children, Santa might pass by their house that night if they weren't tucked in and fast asleep.

Severus, noticing the crowd starting to thin a little as some people had already wished the couple good luck and excused themselves earlier, decided to keep the toast short and sweet. Even if he had all the time in the world, he would rather embrace brevity than bloviating.

Holding aloft a glass of passion fruit-flavored champagne, Severus said, "To Ginny and Draco. May all your sorrows be behind you, and all your days ahead be filled with love, joy, and blessings. To the bride and groom. Cheers!"

There was a wide variety of people who said cheers in response to Severus' toast, including prost, sláinte, salute, l'chaim, na zdorovie, gan bay, kan pai, chok dee, and yamas.

The cake was a towering confection that could feed two-hundred, as that was about how many people said they would show up when Mario secretly polled the townsfolk. It was a moist yellow cake with a whipped cream frosting and beautifully arranged fresh locally-grown fruits atop each layer.

Draco and Ginny cut the first piece and fed each other their first bite. At first they were very delicate about it, but a little whipped cream astray on the nose wound up becoming a mash of cake in each other's face. Draco took a whole slice and shoved it down the front of Ginny's dress and then grabbed her in a tight embrace, smashing it up against her chest and up the front, smearing cake all along Draco's shirt as well. The bridal couple kissed fiercely, battling for supremacy until Ginny submitted and surrendered in her husband's arms.

Severus could not help but recall the time he'd roasted duck and the pair were late to a Saturday dinner at his flat. He went downstairs to Draco's to find the pair in the midst of a nude food fight, in which Severus wound up getting food splattered all over his boots and trousers when Ginny violently yanked up a picnic blanket to cover herself in the process. Even Severus and Hermione had experimented with a bit of food play, so he could certainly understand, but this mashing of cake at one's own wedding reception seemed unseemly, especially for Draco.

The bridal couple spent the next five minutes spelling cake out of various orifices, hair, clothing, folds of skin, and undergarments while the guests were served cake, until they were as clean and unsoiled as before their sophomoric outburst.
Some families wrapped their cake to go, wishing the bridal couple the best, as it was time for bed and tomorrow was Christmas. Ginny and Draco thanked each and every person there with heartfelt gratitude and thanks for making their wedding and reception better than they ever could have imagined as they bid goodnight and a Happy Christmas.

Once the cake was finished, it was time for Ginny to toss the bouquet. She hadn’t bothered to wear a garter, and Draco was more than happy to forgo that tradition as he didn't feel it was very dignified for a wizard to be flashing his wife's legs for the entertainment of the bachelor wizards in the crowd. Severus thought this was a bit incongruent from the same wizard who had just mashed cake into his wife's cleavage not fifteen minutes prior.

All the witches who had set their sights on Severus, plus other ones who were single while in a committed relationship, and some young girls, made a loose group at one end of the dance floor, while Ginny stood at the other.

Ginny held her bouquet aloft in the air with her wand, her back turned towards the single witches ready to catch the bouquet. The bride placed her other hand over her eyes and flicked her wand, sending her bouquet arching over her head towards the witches who began to frantically jockey for the best position to catch it.

Severus could have sworn that a few of those witches played professional Quidditch, as there was elbowing and bumping in a manner that Severus would have called foul, had he been refereeing the match. A gaggle of them tripped over each other and landed in a pile as they dove for the falling bouquet.

When it was over, Kaimi, Mounga's youngest child who had helped make Severus’ welcoming lei at the luau, was holding the bouquet aloft as her prize, as if she was showing off the Snitch at the end of a game.

Severus could tell that Mounga's youngest was going to be a very talented Quidditch player, as he’d watched how she daintily leapt over the pile of witches who were barreling towards her, ready to crush her. She dodged them, jumping up to catch the bouquet as skilled as any Seeker he had seen play professionally. She certainly did live up to her given name.

"Did you see me? Did you see me?" Kaimi shouted with delight as she ran into her father's arms, as he scooped her up and swung her about, his pride and joy.

"Like a champ!" Mounga praised his daughter, beaming with pride.

Severus went over and congratulated the budding Seeker. "That was very impressive!" he told her sincerely.

"Really?" she said with awe. "Did you hear that, Papa?" Turning back to the wizard her older sister was always swooning over and talked dreamily about, she asked, "We always go flying Christmas day. Will you come with us, Mr. Snape?" She turned to her father and asked him as well, "Can he, Papa? I bet he's a really good flyer if he has refereed games."

"Yes, he is welcome, that is if he doesn't have any other plans for the day," Mounga warned his daughter, trying not to get her hopes up if Severus wished to decline the invitation from the eager child.

Severus didn't have to think long, as Draco and Ginny would certainly not be coming up for air within the first twenty-four hours of their honeymoon, nor did he have any other plans set. He decided to give himself that day off from fixing up his shop, so he accepted the child's invitation to join the family for flying.

"And you're welcome to stay for Christmas dinner too, if you haven't accepted any offers yet." Mounga added.

Spying the other single witches who were disentangling themselves from each other and casting dirty glances at each other that it was the other's fault and they should have caught it, the bachelor wizard accepted the offer with thanks for Mounga's hospitality.

The party wound down quickly, and Ginny and Draco made their exit amid another shower of sparks from people's wands as they left the open-air pavilion.

Severus and the rest of the guests followed the bride and groom up the main street, around the corner and a few more blocks up, walking up hill as the streets became slightly steeper as they approached the long gradual slope of the volcano that towered above the town. About halfway between the center of town and the edge, the newlyweds reached their little home.

Ginny remarked how perfect it looked, as she had not seen it. She had promised Draco not to look at it before the wedding so it would remain a surprise. They now walked hand-in-hand up the path to the front porch.

Draco opened the door. He swung Ginny up into his arms and carried her over the threshold. The groom closed the door with his foot, his bride still in his arms, and that was the last anyone would see of the newlyweds for the next week.

Severus let out a sigh, the day finally over. Draco's dream had come true.

As he walked back to the community center to help with the post-reception clean-up, he saw others walking past, going back to their own homes to get ready for Christmas.

Here it was, the night before Christmas, when most people are busily concerned with last-minute gift-wrapping, preparing Christmas feasts, putting up the last touches and stuffing children's stockings. Instead, amid the usual bustle of last-minute preparations, these people had taken time from their full schedules in order to cook a potluck wedding feast, spend time away from their own Christmas preparation, and join Ginny and Draco – who they hardly knew – for their wedding, and decorating the community center on top of that. To think of all this, it made Severus wonder what type of life he might have led had he grown up in a community full of supportive warmth and caring as these people had shown the three sanctuary-seekers.

Christmas was a time of hope and glad tidings, and Severus wasn't so cynical over such sentiments for once, having witnessed it first-hand with the townsfolk who had taken them into their bosom.

Hermione arrived at Lavender's house, wearing an understated set of plum-colored dress robes that could also double for a very elegant set of business attire appropriate for important meetings and more formal social functions. Lavender had offered to pay for an outfit if Hermione didn't feel she had anything nice enough, or that was too fancy for the occasion. That certainly described her wardrobe, and she took her boss up on her offer. The bride had suggested Madam Maurelle Mandel's House of Haute Couture, since she was getting her wedding dress there; Madam Mandel would know what to pick to flatter Hermione without upstaging the bride or looking under-dressed.

Marf said there was a Christmas present for her when she woke up, but since the wedding ceremony was that morning, Hermione promised the house-elf she would open her gift after she
She did allow Marf to help her with an elegant French twist for her hairdo, which was promptly pulled down and redone by Lavender's stylist, who also did a complete redo of Hermione's make-up. At least she didn't have to change her outfit.

Hermione found Lavender in her bedroom getting ready while Ron was in one of the guest suites. They had slept in separate beds for the night, observing the custom that it was bad luck for the groom to see the bride before the wedding, and especially her dress. Hermione wanted to assure Lavender that that tradition would not make or break her marriage, but there were other more important factors to consider regarding the success of a marriage than following some silly superstition.

This was Lavender's wedding, and Hermione let the bride cling to her notions. This was her day. Little was discussed between the two witches, and Hermione could tell the bride was nervous, but happy.

Soon it was time for the ceremony to begin. Lavender's father came and knocked on the door.

Hermione emerged. She was followed by the bride, covered by her veil and blusher, a simple bouquet of lavender roses in her hand.

The former Mrs. Weasley had been to enough weddings, including her own, and knew what to do. She walked down the long hallway and entered the solarium, where an official from the Ministry and Ron awaited at the end of the aisle.

It was surreal to Hermione that she was walking down the aisle once again with Ron waiting at the end, but this time it was not for her. She took her place as Lavender's bridesmaid as the organ that had been brought in for the occasion struck up Wagner's "Bridal Chorus," which the wizarding community had adopted from the Muggles.

As Hermione turned to look back, she noticed Ron's face and the way he gazed with absolute adoration at the vision of Lavender as she entered through the doors of the solarium. He had never looked at Hermione with that same look of utter and consuming love as he wore upon his face that very instant. Even after looking at her own wedding photos, she had noted her own lack of enthusiasm on her own wedding day to Ron, and she knew neither were ever meant for each other the way Ron and Lavender were.

Lavender joined Ron's side, and the ceremony began.

It was a rather long-winded affair. Hermione listened to some of the officiant's words and noticed there was a slight chastising tone in his choice of words about fidelity, forsaking all others, making very subtle hints that Ron screwing around on his second wife was just plain old not going to happen. She wondered if Lavender had a choice in the words spoken or if this was something the official from the Ministry added, putting his own commentary into the ceremony, especially regarding the recent divorce scandal. For a wedding ceremony, it almost seemed a bit somber. The only ones who seemed to be smiling were the bride and the groom.

Eventually vows and rings were exchanged, and a kiss sealed their nuptials. As the bride and groom walked back down the aisle, Hermione had to be paired off with William Kidd, Chaser for the Chudley Cannons and Ron's friend.

She wondered – if Harry wasn't gone, would he have been Ron's best man a second time?
Christie Kidd gave Hermione a patronizing look as she walked down the aisle on William's arm.

The guest list was small. There were a few members from the team, their wives, Arthur Weasley, Bill and his wife Fleur, the twins without their wives, Albert Dobmeir, Neville, Seamus Finnegan and Dean Thomas.

They moved to the dining room where a wedding breakfast was served. Lavender had the good sense not to sit Hermione anywhere near Christie Kidd or Nicole Stewart, the harpies who had made her life hell with their snide remarks while Ron was a mere second-string Keeper.

Hermione was seated between Lavender's father and Bill Weasley, who was flanked on the other side by his wife. Lavender's mother was not there since she had died during the war, otherwise she would be sitting where Hermione currently sat. Traditionally, Hermione should have sat on the other side of Ron, but given the situation, that would have made the subdued reception that much more awkward.

There was a string quartet that played quietly in the corner. Hermione didn't think there was going to be any of the more lively traditions seen at most weddings, such as the first dance. And there would be no tossing of the bouquet, since Hermione was the only single witch at the entire wedding.

After breakfast, a very beautifully decorated small wedding cake was served, along with the finest champagne from a wizarding winery in the Champagne province. William gave a long-winded toast to the happy couple, making a few faux pas, accidentally calling the bride Hermione once. Hermione raised her glass and clinked glasses with the people near her. She could have said something much more eloquent with fewer words, but given that she was the ex-wife of the groom, she sat quietly instead, making polite conversation with Lavender's father, Ruthven, and Bill.

Bill and Arthur had a somewhat haunted look about them. Even the normally jovial twins seemed to be a bit more subdued for such a festive occasion.

Hermione had heard about the Howler Ginny sent and how it put Molly into fits, which required a stay in St. Mungo's. Arthur was hoping to bring his wife home after the wedding in time for Christmas dinner, if the healers said she was well enough. The Draughts of Peace they kept pouring down her throat were helping.

The bride and groom were happy, and the way they looked at each other spoke of their profound and boundless love and affection for one another. Hermione wondered if Harry was just as deeply in love with the Kyrgyz witch and she with him by now. She was lost in thought, recalling the heady sensation of falling in love with Severus and how she still seemed to float on air thinking about him. Upon self-reflection, Hermione wondered if it would have been even more wondrous had she not been restrained by her guilt of falling for a wizard other than her husband at the time.

As the cake and champagne were finished, there was little left to do.

Guests began making their farewells, sensing that the occasion had come to a close. Christie and Nicole gushed on about how wondrous Lavender looked, which she did. It was a lovely four-ply silk with a bias cut that seemed to give the whole dress a seamless drape as it was made from one piece; it fit the bride perfectly, as if it was spun and woven around her form. It was neither too tight, nor voluminous. It was as understated as the wedding was, yet simply elegant.

Neville bid his farewell to the bride and groom, grinning sweetly at the couple, happy for them both. When he came to bid Hermione farewell, he mentioned how he looked forward to seeing her in the New Year with the beginning of her Herbology portion of her apprenticeship.
Seamus and Dean also wished the happy couple their felicitations, but Hermione didn't care for the look in Seamus' eye when he said he was looking forward to seeing her around. Dean was much more gentlemanly when he gave her a brief hug and a peck on the cheek goodbye.

Arthur clapped his son on the shoulder before giving him a hug, restrained in his happiness for his son that he finally married the witch he truly loved. Lavender even got a brief hug from her new father-in-law as well. When it came time for the head of the Weasley family to say goodbye to Hermione, she noticed how he fidgeted about, his eyes downcast as if almost ashamed to meet her eyes.

"It was good to see you again, Arthur," Hermione told him, hoping he understood that she held no ill will against him.

He seemed to brighten at Hermione's roundabout forgiveness and gave her a small hug before going over to St. Mungo's.

The twins said they'd like to take Hermione out to lunch sometime to catch up and talk shop, which seemed to cheer her up a bit.

As they shook Ron's hand and gave Lavender a kiss upon the cheek, Hermione heard one of the twins lean in and say to Ron under their breath, "Just don't fuck this marriage up too, little brother." It wasn't said lightly, but with grave implications.

Albert made his farewells too, with a reminder that Hermione was expected to show up to his place soon, since Christmas roses could only be harvest on Christmas Day. He normally would have given his apprentice the day off for such a holiday, but potion ingredients must be harvested when they must.

She silently chastised herself that she'd forgotten, with the lie to her Master that she didn't forget.

Bill and Fleur were the last to leave. Bill took his littlest brother aside to impart some last-minute advice. Meanwhile, Fleur gave Lavender a few tips, should Molly start harping on about grandchildren and Ron and she weren't ready yet, wanting to enjoy some time alone before children came.

Hermione shook Bill's hand, and he asked if it was all right if he and Fleur still had contact with her. In reply, Hermione hugged Bill in the same fashion as when she was still part of the Weasley family; she assured him that the only one she had hard feelings towards was Molly. Bill looked away, embarrassed, before giving Hermione a faltering smile.

Fleur and Hermione exchanged brief kisses upon the cheek with an invitation for Hermione to join them New Year's Eve, if she was available. Hermione said she would have to check with Albert if she was available, as sometimes things during her apprenticeship would spontaneously require her attention and she might have to bow out.

Now that everyone had gone except for Ruthven Brown and herself, Hermione gave her sincerest wishes to the bridal couple that they would be happy together. She gave each of them a kiss upon the cheek before she Apparated back home.

Once back home, she told Marf she had to delay opening his present to her, feeling a bit taken back she hadn't gotten anything for him. She made her apologies before changing her clothes and heading over to Albert's house to begin harvesting the Christmas roses in bloom.

After Hermione was done with that one task, she would rush back to her flat and then maybe open the present, if she wasn't rushed to go over to her parents’ house. The now single witch had promised she would be there for Christmas dinner by three o'clock.

Who knew how long it would take to harvest all those Christmas roses, given that it had snowed the night before.

Off in the Pamir Pass, Harry had just finished setting up his very own yurt. It was outfitted with everything he would need.

He had the foresight to bring a whole lot of Galleons along, should he need the money during the broom race for food, lodging, and other sundries. It was those Galleons that paid for the warm yurt he was sitting in now.

The other men around the fire were from the small group of nomadic wizard herders, with whom Harry had become quick friends. They talked with the English wizard about his plans.

Thanks to a translation spell Harry knew that Kingsley had taught him, he began asking for advice on how best to kidnap his bride, since that was the expected custom for this part of the world when it came to nuptials.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: I have a lovely fanart commission by Deaa drew for me you can view on my Tumblr page here (with commissioned ukulele performance to go with chapter segment): http://atdlhea-betz.tumblr.com/post/146318921950/anniversary-song-sung-by-david-cassel-the-ukulele or on Deaa's DeviantArt page here: http://deealov3.deviantart.com/art/Commission-estump-565122246

I also commissioned a ukulele musician through Fiverr.com, Ukulelebandito, to perform “The Anniversary Song” Ginny and Draco dance to for their first dance. You can listen to it on my Tumblr page (link above). UkuleleBandito's Fiverr page is here: https://www.fiverr.com/ukulelebandito

Thank you to my wonderful betas, JuneW and Hope, especially JuneW for correcting my Hawaiian here and there as needed.

'Ekolu means three in Hawaiian.

Male 'ana means wedding. 'Ekolu male 'ana means three weddings.

"The Anniversary Song" is an adaptation by Saul Chaplin and Al Jolson of Iosif Ivanovici's "Donauwellen Walzer."

Bride kidnapping? Harry kidnap a bride? All will be explained in Chapter 78. Just wait.
As Severus cracked an eye open that clear Christmas morning, he fixed his gaze on his bedside table at the object Ginny had left for him, wrapped with Christmas paper and a little bow.

The note attached to it said she thought he might like this one the best of the ones she had, and she hoped he liked it.

He opened it warily, accustomed to disappointment and having no prior experience with receiving gifts from Mrs. Potter – no, from Mrs. Malfoy.

There, in a silver picture frame that Ginny must have bought since coming to Malu Palekaiko, was a photograph of Hermione.

The photograph captured a brief moment in time. She was reading a book, her knees drawn up, her face holding a thoughtful expression, until she suddenly realized she was being photographed. She looked up and spontaneously smiled, lightly laughing as if to say to not take her photo, her hand waving to point the camera away from her before she gave a look of bashful resignation that it was too late, before she went back to reading her book. It was perfect.

The photo was taken after the war, but before her marriage and career began to wear her down, just as eons of erosion can wear down even the strongest and tallest of mountains. She was not nearly thin as when she first came to him, and she did not have the look of a woman made weary by the world yet, as if there was hope in her future and her dreams had not been dashed. It was a slice of Hermione's life he had not witnessed and was glad to have at least seen her as such.

He watched the photograph repeat the same scene over and over. Severus suddenly longed for a proper cup of tea.
Since coming to Hawaii, he had tried a cup of tea once. It was awful. The person did not bring the water to a full boil. The tea they used tasted stale, as if it had sat in the back of the cupboard for years, and was that horrid Orange Pekoe dross. It was presented with honey and lemon, and no milk or sugar. When he asked for milk, the waitress gave him some cream instead.

What they graded to be Orange Pekoe in the States would certainly not have been graded the same in the British Isles. Severus couldn't find anything but the American brands of tea in the local general store. He definitely would be adding a few Camellia sinensis bushes to his garden and growing his own tea once he found and bought a property.

Rising, he showered and shaved before dressing. Justina let Severus have free run of her kitchen, especially since he rented a second room in order to use as a temporary library, as he was tired of Summoning books from Hermione's handbag, then to have to sort them back into the tiny bag. It was a temporary solution, as he would be moving his books to his new shop by the New Year. Some books were to be put in his personal library at his new home, but since he hadn't found one yet, his shop would have to do for now.

After a cup of coffee, toast, an egg, and a heaping pile of fresh fruit, he was ready to go flying. Severus grabbed his broom and flying gear and headed up the empty street towards Mounga and Rainbow's residence. They said any time after eight that morning would be fine, since the kids always woke up at the crack of dawn on Christmas, dying to open their presents.

Mounga's residence was a two-story house, built in the tropical plantation style with a covered balcony on the second story and front porch on the first. The windows were trimmed in white, contrasting against the cheery yellow exterior paint. There were swags of tropical vines that were meant to emulate the swags of evergreens that colder-climate houses had for Christmas decorations. There was a large ten-foot poinsettia bush, its bracts bright red and festive, and five palm trees in the front yard. At night, Severus could see the Christmas fairy lights in those palm fronds from his room on the second story of Justina's hotel.

Severus set his broom on the front porch before knocking on the door, using the knocker. A Christmas tune played when the knocker hit the door, charmed to be festive for the season.

Akela opened the door, but upon seeing Severus on the front porch, she screamed and slammed the door shut. Before Severus could knock on the door again, Mounga opened the door, looking at Severus in puzzlement and then back into his house.

"Akela! Why did you shut the door? I told you Severus was coming over." Mounga shrugged, shaking his head. "Teenagers."

Mounga was still in his striped pajama pants, without a top on. Rainbow popped her head out of the kitchen and said, "Mele Kalikimaka, Severus."

He had yet to master the Hawaiian holiday greeting, so he greeted her in return, sticking to English. "Happy Christmas, Rainbow."

"Mele Kalikimaka, Mr. Snape!" Iakona and Kaimi called out from the living room, from where they could still see their guest.

He greeted them back in English as well.

Akela came out looking far different from when she first opened the door. Instead of mussed hair and pajamas decorated with palm trees and snowmen wearing sunglasses, her hair was now neatly brushed and braided, ready for flying, and she wore appropriate flying apparel.

"Mele Kalikimaka, Mr. Snape," she said, trying to hide her embarrassment. She turned to her mother and hissed under her breath, "Why didn't you tell me he was coming over this early, Mom?" giving Rainbow a petulant glare that only teenagers can give their parents.

"I assure you, you looked no worse than hundreds of other teenage witches in my House over the years who were up all night studying for their O.W.L.s and N.E.W.T.s," the former professor assured her.

Akela's jaw hit the floor. "You had hundreds girls in your house, and they were studying owls and newts?" she gasped with astonishment.

Mounga laughed and said, "I told you I couldn't say anything. You can explain that one, dude."

Rainbow had an interesting expression on her face, her eyes changing subtly from green to black, before Severus began to explain the House system at Hogwarts. He also gave a brief description of the Sorting Hat, his role as Head of House for Slytherin, and the examination protocols for the British wizarding educational system. The strange look on Rainbow's face disappeared as he described the context behind his choice of words, and her eyes changed to a more calm blue.

"Oh, my God. You were a Potions teacher? You must have been the nicest teacher in the whole school," Akela rhapsodized, looking at him a bit dreamily.

Had Ginny and Draco been there, he was sure they would have burst into gales of laughter, and taken a long time before they could stop dissolving into hysterics.

"You'll have to ask Mr. and Mrs. Malfoy when you see them next," the former Hogwarts professor deferred diplomatically.

"You taught them?" Kaimi chirped excitedly. "Really? That's awesome."

"I'm sure Ginny and her brothers would beg to differ," he replied quietly so that only Rainbow and Mounga caught his remark.

"Would you like some coffee?" Rainbow asked, trying not to laugh at Severus' sotto voce comment.

"Yes, that would be lovely, thank you."

Severus and Mounga moved to the living room where they could sit in peace while Rainbow finished cleaning up the kitchen from breakfast, and the rest of the kids could finish getting dressed for flying.

The Christmas tree was a traditional fir tree Portkeyed over from the Pacific Northwest. It was decorated with little snowmen who crept up and down the branches, reindeer that pranced about, and angels which played hide-and-seek behind glass ornaments, in addition to the assortment of decorative, non-magical ornaments. There were torn-up Christmas wrappings on the floor, and an assortment of gifts that had been unwrapped but were yet to be put away in their respective rooms.

Mounga asked Severus about the progress of getting his shop ready for opening in the New Year. Severus asked about how Mounga became the town judge, learning about the differences between the American and British wizarding judicial systems. Mounga had already been given a brief of how the British system worked, based on Severus' rather lengthy confession the night he arrived seeking sanctuary.
The front door flew open with a bang. A young raven-haired witch bolted through the door with a wrapped Christmas present in her hand, and ran down the hallway, using her wand over her shoulder to slam the door shut with yet another bang.

"And a Mele Kalikimaka to you too, Kiki," Mouna called out dryly, just as the door to Akela's bedroom door slammed shut.

"That would have been ten points from whatever House she would have been sorted into, had that been a student who entered my classroom like that," Severus thought aloud.

"Hmmm, maybe I should do that point system around my own house as an incentive for the kids to pick up their rooms and do their chores and school work," Mouna mused.

"Be forewarned, the rivalry between Houses at Hogwarts could get rather intense, with some sabotaging other Houses, setting them up for point deductions," the former Head of Slytherin warned, not clarifying that his own House was the one most notably known for that dirty trick.

"Yeah, there is that."

Off down the hallway, the screams from Akela and her friend Kiki could be heard, even through the door and walls. There were squeals and other common sounds that the teenage witches made. Severus was fully versed in the various noises and figured they were probably talking about boys.

Mouna wanted another cup of coffee before going to change his clothes, offering Severus use of the guest bedroom to change into his own gear that he’d brought with him.

As they were in the kitchen, Akela and Kiki rushed in and went up to Mouna.

"Look what Kiki got me for Christmas, Papa!" the young witch raved, a blissful look upon her face as she held it up for her father to inspect.

Before Severus could figure out what it was, she thrust it under his nose and sighed wistfully, "Isn't he just dreamy?"

There in front of Severus was Ron Weasley astride his broom, shirtless, with bulging pectorals, rippling abdominals and all exposed in the 2004 Mercury Broom calendar. The palm trees were swaying in the background, extolling the beauty of Tahiti.

Severus was overcome with a flood of memories, most clearly one when he’d walked in on Weasley banging his employer on her desk. A rage quickly engulfed Severus, remembering how Hermione came crying to him about her husband’s emotional cruelty – how he had made Hermione hate her body and question her own sexuality and self-worth. Every grievance against Ronald Weasley came rushing back, right down to the incident with the flying Ford Anglia.

His head tilted back and a sneer curled upon his lip as he snarled in a low and dangerous tone, "Get that thing out from underneath my nose this very instant, Miss Finau."

Akela looked at Severus in shock, her eyes brimming with tears that the wizard she was so smitten with had suddenly turned so hostile towards her. She bolted out of the kitchen and into her room, followed by Kiki, who slammed the door.

Feeling suffocated, Severus ran out the front door.

Mouna found Severus leaning against a stout post on the front porch and breathing heavily.
"Severus," his friend said, bewildered by Severus' sudden change in personality and hostile attitude towards his daughter. "What was that about?"

"Ronald Weasley," Severus said as he tried valiantly to regain control of his emotions.

"Yeah..." waiting for further clarification.

"Hermione's husband."

"Whoa... You mean..."

Severus' breathing finally slowed. "Yes, the very one who was having an affair with my employer all those years," he said quietly, should Rainbow or certain teenage girls be eavesdropping.

"Dude, I didn't connect the dots. You mentioned there were a lot of Weasleys, so I thought it was a common name, but I had no idea it was the very same. I never would have let Akela show it to you if I had put two and two together," Mounga apologized.

Severus looked over his shoulder at his friend. "I suppose I should go apologize and explain myself. I think I frightened the poor girl."

"Maybe she'll be over her crush on you now, so there could be a bright side to it," the larger wizard added, trying to find humor with the situation. "But yeah, you should tell her since I can't."

Severus went back into the house and knocked on Akela's door gently. Kiki opened the door and looked at Severus with wide and timid eyes.

"May I speak with Miss Finau for a moment, please?" he asked in calm and soothing tones.

Kiki looked back over her shoulder and Akela nodded, still clutching a large stuffed dog, her eyes full of tears. The friend excused herself saying she'd come back later after they were done flying.

Severus left the door open so Mounga could listen in from the hallways, knowing that's exactly what he would do if he were Akela's father.

Akela was still sniffing and wiping away tears. Severus conjured a handkerchief and handed it to the upset witch, who took it tentatively from him, now a bit more skittish around him.

"I feel I must apologize. How I reacted was uncalled for. I'm sorry I frightened you," he began as he took a seat in the chair at Akela's slightly cluttered desk, covered in bits of parchment with half-finished school work and doodles. Severus even caught the sight of one piece of parchment with the signature of "Mrs. Akela Snape," but pretended not to notice it.

On the bed next to Akela, he spotted the calendar opened to a different month. He caught the sight of Weasley dressed in full winter-weight Quidditch gear, with a majestic view of the snow-capped Canadian Rockies and a glacial lake with milky blue waters in the background.

"I know that wizard in your calendar," he confessed, his voice straining to remain calm and impassive.

"You know Ron Weasley?" Akela said with amazement.

"Unfortunately, yes."
Drinking in Severus’ response, Akela surmised, "And I guess you don't like him?"

"Dislike would be putting it mildly." Severus clenched his teeth and restrained himself from letting his anger seep into his voice again.

Akela should not bear the brunt of his hatred for the boy, he reminded himself. She was just an innocent girl with a silly crush on a wizard with more brawn than brains, and little knowledge of how the wider world worked, sheltered by a family and community that loved her. She would soon be exposed to boys as callous and vapid as Weasley soon enough, unfortunately.

Severus took a deep breath before soldiering on, since Akela didn't know what to say next, still recovering from the shock of her crush reacting in such a hostile fashion to her favorite Christmas present. "He was a former student, and not a very good one at that, who broke many rules and was disrespectful to me. But what angers me the most about him is that when he was older and an 'adult,' he was very cruel to a dear friend of mine."

Akela looked down at the calendar next to her, then looked back to Severus, with a confused look knit upon her delicate brow. "But he looks so nice."

"Looks can be deceiving."

He could give Akela a long history of wizards who looked "nice" but had a cruel streak a mile wide, starting from the once handsome and charming Tom Riddle, to James Potter and Sirius Black, down to this red-headed Quidditch star now plastered across her calendar.

"Draco is really handsome." Then she stopped and got a silly smile on her face. "Really handsome," the young witch added once more a little dreamily. "But he's really nice."

"Draco wasn't always the gentleman you now know him to be," Severus informed her. "He was unkind in his youth sometimes. The difference is, he grew up and became a better person. As an adult, he cast away what he finally realized was wrong."

Severus' last statement had many layers to it besides the topic at hand, but he would not delve into it.

"But Weasley, he never grew up, remaining the same as if he was a boy without taking into consideration the feelings of others. Never let another person take away your self-worth or make you question your mind, feelings, or looks, as he did to my friend. Especially don’t let another wizard do it to you." Severus added somberly, hoping to prepare her for some boy's hurtful comments that might be thrown at her someday.

Akela seemed to ponder his comments deeply, nodding, lost in contemplation.

"And if I might warn you, please do not show this calendar to Ginny. Not at least until I have prepared her," he asked.

"Why, does she know him too? Was he cruel to her too?" Akela asked, her face full of anxiety. She only knew Ginny's first married last name, not her maiden one.

"Well, it all depends on if you think Iakona is cruel to you."

Akela's eyes lit up with comprehension with the reference to her brother.

"You mean Ginny and Ron are brother and sister?" she asked, her face stunned by the revelation.
"Yes. And I hope that you will consider this conversation we had as a private matter. You can share with your father, but I ask no one else. There are a lot of things about Ginny, Draco and my own past we are trying to move beyond with our transition here. We are not running away from them or trying to forget them, but it will take some time for us to deal with some of the things we have recently gone through."

"Of course, Mr. Snape. Not even Kiki, my best friend, or my mom," she added, her face very serious. She made a cross over her heart with the tip of her wand to express the sincerity of her promise.

'Oh, certainly not your mother, unless you want it spread all over town' Severus thought to himself.

How is it that a man as discreet as Mounga married the town chatterbox and biggest spreader of news, Severus could not fathom.

"I appreciate your discretion on the matter, Akela." There was a pause before he asked, "So I hope you understand my reaction to suddenly seeing that?" His eyes darted to the calendar beside her.

"Yes, I can, Mr. Snape. I think I'll go and burn it now," she said, a little sadly. "Now that I know what a big, fat jerk he really is, I don't want it up on my wall now." It was once her favorite present and now she couldn't stand the sight of it.

Severus was secretly pleased that Ron Weasley would now have one less witch in his fan club, but it was also a bit regretful he had made her favorite gift something she wanted to destroy within minutes.

"Don't burn it, but save it for Ginny," he suggested. "Maybe she'll tell you some more unflattering stories about her brother. And maybe one day I'll tell you about the time he stole his father's flying car, broke the International Statute on Wizarding Secrecy Law by flying it in front of Muggles, and crashed it into the school grounds, which almost resulted in his expulsion. But that is a story for another time."

Akela's eyes gleamed with this little tidbit of information.

"And that story about him and the flying car you can share with all your friends," Severus added with a smile, looking forward to tarnishing Weasley's name from half-way around the world. Then he added for good measure, "And that he's a cruel 'jerk,' too."

Severus stood up from the chair. "So I hope you will accept my apology."

"Of course, Mr. Snape. I think I would have acted the same way if he was a low-life creep to my friends too. There's nothing to apologize for, I totally understand," she assured him.

"Good. I hear that the winds are favorable for a bit of flying this morning," Severus said as he excused himself from her bedroom.

Out in the hallway, as he suspected, Mounga was standing there, having heard their conversation, which Severus did not mind at all. He'd want to hear everything said between an older wizard and his young daughter in her bedroom, too.

"Thanks," the father said, patting Severus on the back. "I think you just saved me a lot of hassle trying to explain about some aspects of boys when she gets older. I think it meant more coming from you than hours of talking from me," which was a strange thing for Mounga to say since Severus couldn't imagine Mounga talking for hours on anything, since he was very economical with his words.
Severus made a promise to himself when the stationery store opened tomorrow, he would buy a lovely calendar for Akela to replace the one she was possibly burying in the bottom of a drawer this very instant.

Hermione Floo’ed back home, still stuffed to the gills from Christmas dinner and bone-tired. The Christmas roses in Albert's garden took longer than expected, and she barely made it over to her parents before they started carving the turkey.

They had given her a large plastic container full of leftover turkey, stuffing, roasted chestnuts, roasted potatoes, bread sauce, and some Brussels sprouts. There was a little container of extra gravy to go along with the food she brought home.

She was also holding a large paper bag, decorated with Christmas motifs, which contained presents from her parents. There was a nice jumper and a very expensive looking leather handbag. Hermione didn't want to tell her mother that witches didn't carry handbags, as they usually carried everything in their charmed pockets. Handbags were more for accenting a piece of clothing than serving a functional purpose, though the one she gave Severus was decorative with an older outfit she once had and was very functional with its Extension Charm. If anything, she could use the new handbag for going about London if she needed to blend in with the Muggles.

Hermione gave her parents an I.O.U. with the promise to purchase tickets for a particular musical which was going to open in the summer of 2004 that they were looking forward to seeing, since she couldn't find anything in the Muggle stores for them. She was going to try for opening night tickets, if possible, or at least within the first week of its premiere. Her parents were thrilled with her gift, even though it would take a while before they could enjoy it.

The exhausted Potions apprentice was glad she didn't have to go buy anything, since she had little time as it was to purchase anything, much less put up a Christmas tree, which she didn't. It was becoming more difficult to shop for her parents as they got older. They had everything they needed and wanted little else.

Marf relieved her of her various bits, putting the food away and storing her gifts in the appropriate drawers.

Once done, he came up to Hermione and said, "I must give this present to you, Mistress Hermione."

She looked down at the small creature and said, "I feel awful, Marf. I didn't get anything for you."

The house-elf blinked twice with its large luminous eyes and said, a little perplexed, "I did not get Mistress Hermione anything. Should I have? Am I a bad house-elf?" Marf’s lower lip began to wibble.

Hermione could tell that Marf was about to go on another self-induced masochistic punishment bender if she didn't nip it in the bud.

"No, no, Marf. That's perfectly fine, you didn't have to get me anything. But if you aren't giving me a present, then who is this from?" the witch asked, confused as to the origin of its giver.

"Master Snape said to give this to you at Christmas, should it be safe and the Aurors gone," Marf informed her.

Her hand tentatively reached out and plucked it from the house-elf's outstretched hands.
She reverently caressed the outside of it, noting the perfect folds at the end, the precision in which the seams of the plain red gift wrap met into a symmetrical shape at the end, the small white ribbon wrapped around it, and a hand-tied bow atop.

Unwrapping it, she found a wooden box with three vials in it, each capped with a different color, along with a note.

--------

My Dearest Hermione,

If you are reading this, than you must have chosen to stay behind. It is my hope that the memory contained in the red-capped vial will help with your endeavor to clear my and Draco's names.

The yellow-capped vial is for you personally.

The blue one is for you, should you choose to join me. It contains my last memory of Dumbledore as he told me where to go, should I need to seek sanctuary.

It has been an honor and a privilege to call you my friend and lover.

Eternally,

Severus Snape

--------

Hermione sat on the bed staring at the note. It became harder to reread it once again as her eyes were full of tears, blurring her ability to clearly see the spiky script.

The box was simple and brown on the outside, with slightly tarnished brass hinges and a small swiveling hook closure. The inside was lined with a deep midnight-blue velvet with little depressions for each vial.

She would have taken one out and examined the silvery threads that floated within, but considering how her fingers had recently lost grasp of the vial containing a few whiskers of Ron’s, she was not going to risk losing these memories Severus had left behind for her.

Heaving a great sigh, Hermione realized she didn't have a Pensieve. She couldn't even view the red-capped one tonight, even if she wanted to.

Pensieves were expensive and she would either have to borrow one or buy one. She didn't know anyone who had one, but she would have to ask Albert if he had one she could use.

Staring out at the night from her window, the despondent witch saw the overcast ceiling of clouds, lit from underneath with a sickly orange and gray from the city street lights and glare of brightly shining advertisement lights in nearby Leicester Square and Piccadilly Circus. She wondered what Severus was doing at that very moment. Was it warm where he was, and could he see the stars at night wherever sanctuary was?

~~~~~~~*~
Skimming above the ocean at the same altitude as a flock of pelicans that flew in a loose formation a few hundred yards off to his right, Severus' heart was elevated with the feeling of freedom upon his broom.

He could finally fly again.

The Potions master's first love was Potions, but Quidditch and flying were a close second. He wasn't a Quidditch head, though he did love the game, but he loved flying most of all between the two lesser favorites.

Severus hung back from the flying Finau family, observing their styles of flying and if there was a regional difference in the way one might fly. Over the years he’d noticed slight variations in the way players from different countries rode their brooms; the Japanese grasped their broomstick handles with a looser and more relaxed grip, while the Canadians were more of the white-knuckle type, aiming for shorter games, but more dramatic dives and acrobatics. Even the way Russians rode their brooms, sitting slightly more forward than the British style of sitting farther back, did not escape his observation over the years.

Iakona, Mounga's son, rode in a middle position on his broom with a double Webster grip, one hand underneath, the other towards the side, permitting for quick hand-position change, while allowing for quick stopping. Akela was a more cautious rider, riding in the more common textbook posture and position.

Kaimi was the adventurous one, leaning far forward on her starter broom, trying to eek every last bit of speed out of the first-level broom as possible. It was a hand-me-down from her older siblings, and it was getting a bit worn out. Mounga said she would be getting a proper broom for her next birthday, since she had proven to be such a competent and responsible flier.

Mounga and his wife rode side-by-side, slightly ahead of the children, guiding their path around the island. The parents’ made sure their children stayed within the three-mile boundary of the island in order to remain behind the illusory magic which hid the island from Muggle eyes.

Having risen higher up, Severus glanced down and saw a pod of dolphins swimming underneath, chasing the shadows of the fliers above. The dolphins porpoised, leaping up out of the water as they jetted forth, expelling air quickly to exchange the air in their lungs with fresh oxygen before sliding back into the turquoise waters to join their fellow cetaceans once more.

As the pod turned to race away, chasing after a school of fish, Severus looked up once more only to see Kaimi falling from her broom towards the water below. Leaning forward, Severus put on a sudden burst of speed and raced to catch the small child before she hit the water.

Diving down, he barely caught Kaimi in his arms before she could hit the water, and whipped out his wand to catch her broom before it fell into the ocean swells below.

Placing her on his broom in front of him, he asked with great concern if she was all right.

The little witch was giggling and squirming with delight, seemingly having no concern she fell off her broom.

"Did you see that, Papa? Wow! I told you Mr. Snape was a really good flier. He caught me in mid-air. I've never seen that before!" she exclaimed with the zeal that only a young child could exhibit.

Had Severus been a Muggle, he surely would have had a heart attack.

Mounga came down beside Severus to hover alongside him. "Wow, that's was some pretty impressive flying there, paniolo."

Rainbow, Akela, and Iakona swung back around to hover alongside them as well.

"Did you see that, Iakona? Better flier than you! I told you so!" Kaimi announced proudly, sticking her tongue out at her brother.

Perplexed, Severus said, "Does no one care that this child almost fell off her broom and into the ocean?"

"Dude," Mounga laughed. "She did that on purpose."

"And you let her?" Severus retorted, his voice filled with incredulousness.

"Dude, you live on an island surrounded by water, you better know how to get back up on your broom, should you fall in the ocean," the father clarified. "It's good practice, and that way, when she's older and flying on her own, I won't have to worry about her. She'll know how to kick off out of the water. Besides, makes good exercise for when they fly above ground, if they learn how to fall instead of fighting it. Iakona had a seventy-foot fall over the grass during one game and rolled onto the ground, getting nothing more than a few scrapes."

"Yeah, all of us learned to do that before Papa would let us get our first real brooms," Iakona added.

"Here, watch." Mounga nodded his head at his daughter. Kaimi slipped of Severus' broom and dove into the water, coming back up. "Let go of her broom. It's okay."

Severus reluctantly let go of Kaimi's starter broom and saw it fall into the ocean.

Kaimi swam over to it and straddled it. Then she kicked her legs underwater to burst forth up from the ocean swells and back into the air to rejoin her father's side.

"See, it's easy!" she claimed.

Severus sat there agog that this eight-year-old child kicked up out of the water.

"You should learn to do that too," Mounga advised. "Here, just dive down, and I'll bring your broom down."

"But saltwater is terrible for brooms," Severus whinged.

"Dude, you think there is a single broom sold on this island that isn't charmed and sealed with special waxes to repel saltwater and any moisture damage? You obviously weren't told of the finer points of the broom you bought," Mounga said with almost a laugh.

Reluctantly, Severus dove off his broom and into the water, wishing he was wearing his swim trunks instead of his flying gear. But if this was a critical flying skill living there, he would eventually have to learn it.

Mounga flew down besides Severus and gently tossed his broom atop the water. Just the sight of his new broom floating atop the saltwater made him flinch at the sight of it.

"Now, the key is to kick down hard enough that you create an air bubble beneath your feet, otherwise, you feel like you're treading in quicksand," Mounga advised. "Ready?"

"Why not just use my wand--" Severus began.
"Wands can get lost or slip from your hand," the larger wizard warned. "And then there are lightning strikes. It's better to learn the hard way so you don't drown, if seas are rough."

Severus knew that hurricanes occasionally passed through, so he guessed it was for the best.

Placing the broom under the water, he straddled it, fighting to stay atop of it as the natural buoyancy of the broom made it ride up between Severus' legs. With his feet, he tried to kick powerfully downwards to create an air pocket to catch and ride upwards. It was much harder than he had anticipated.

Severus was getting a little winded as he fought it, feeling as if he was caught in quicksand as Mounga described. He bobbed up and down, rising and falling as each swell passed him by. He was used to having solid earth beneath his feet for kicking off.

In the air, Iakona gave a demonstration of the leg movements and the synchronization of the legs in order to help create the pocket of air. After studying Iakona's movements, Severus finally shot up out of the water on the twelfth try.

Panting, he grasped his broom, trying to hold onto the handle as beads of saltwater raced off of it, watching the charm dry his broom out in the process.

"That was harder than I expected," Severus admitted, still catching his breath.

"Do that at least fifty more times, and it'll become second nature," Rainbow said before she took to a higher altitude to guide their children back home, the family's circle of the island nearly complete. But first, she led the group on a little detour to swing by a spot frequented by a couple surfers off the island's west shore.

Iakona had told Severus about a move he and the other fliers on the island had picked up from surfers who were shooting curls. They called it 'threading the needle,' where they rode their brooms inside the air pocket of a wave as it began cresting near the shore break.

Sure enough, Shark – the clothing store owner – and another surfer were out surfing the waves on Christmas day. There were a couple cabanas set up on the beach, marking where they were having their Christmas day barbecues with their families.

As Shark sat astride his board while waiting for his next wave, he watched Iakona give Severus an example of the maneuver. Severus thought it looked challenging not to get caught in the crashing wave, to be tossed about like a rag doll in the surf. After Iakona completed the trick, Shark gave him a high five.

It was time to head back so Rainbow could get the Christmas ham into the oven in time for Christmas dinner, at which Severus would join them as their guest.

Severus could only imagine the look of horror on Ginny and Draco's faces the next time he went flying with them and took a dive off his broom on purpose. He supposed he should warn them ahead of time so they wouldn't panic like he nearly did. He should teach them this new essential flying skill. Better yet, have twelve-year-old Iakona teach Draco and Ginny, and see how well they take flying instructions from a child half their age.

The young wizard did give him a very good demonstration that made it easier to understand than Mounga's verbal instructions.

He could almost hear Draco's bitching about the saltwater on his broom. Not that Severus whinged about it; he had merely protested.
A/N: Severus, Draco and Ginny have a little video Christmas card they put together for everyone, wishing everyone a “Mele Kalikimaka” to everyone. You can view it on the ADTLHEA Tumblr account here: http://atdlhea-betz.tumblr.com/post/146528386305/draco-ginny-and-severus-wanted-to-send-you-a or on YouTube here: https://youtu.be/UYTc4Y7XBQ8

Thank you to my ever hard-working betas, JuneW and Cygnuz. Send them a bit of praise in your review sometime.

Of course I had to include a witch named Kiki. How could I not honor Miyazaki and his delightful film about a teenage witch from "Kiki's Delivery Service"?

Paniolo is Hawaiian for “cowboy.” So Mouna calls Severus "cowboy" after watching him wrangle Kaimi. (The first cowboys in Hawaii were Mexican vaqueros, who spoke Spanish – Español; the Hawaiian language has no “s” sound, so the word quickly evolved into paniolo.)
“Should Auld Acquaintance Be Forgot?”

Chapter Summary

It's New Year's Eve and Hermione and Severus are missing each other terribly.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Seventy-Seven
“Should Auld Acquaintance Be Forgot?”

Disclaimer: Happy New Year. Another disclaimer saying Rowling owns Harry Potter and I don't.

=============

Bill's owl said that she should come over around seven that night. Hermione was grateful their New Year's Eve party would start late enough for her to finish her work for the day and get a bit of studying time in, before she went to their home. She was almost done with the latest book assigned to her from Albert. It was about the delicate blending of opposite elements and the art of not blowing oneself up in the process.

There was also a book on ethics she was supposed to memorize as well, since there were certain codes of conduct for Potions masters and mistresses, but the book was a large tome, with small print and thin pages. It would take her a full year to commit most of it to memory, given her full-time work. Reading through it, it seemed like these rules and guides to ethical behavior and common laws that pervaded all countries where Potions were concerned were more like common sense than anything else, which made it that much easier to learn.

The Weasleys' invite said it was a casual affair; just a few family and friends. Hermione wore something she wouldn't mind if a drink got spilled all over her, as it almost invariably happened at these gatherings where alcohol was a large factor. She had a wand to clean herself up, but still.

Apparating over to Bill and Fleur's house, she noticed it was pretty quiet and the party hadn't really started yet.

Fleur greeted her at the door warmly and invited Hermione in. They were still setting up the food. Bill brought Michael and Philippe out to greet her, admitting he invited her to come over a little early so she could see the boys before they went to bed.

Hermione did miss seeing her nephews at Christmas a bit, since they were always eager to give their aunt a hug and a kiss.

"Can we still call you 'Auntie,' Aunt Hermione?" Michael asked, looking a little forlorn.
"Well, of course you still can." She gave Michael a hug to console him.

"But Uncle Ron has a new wife and she's Aunt Lav? She's nice, but I don't want to give you up too," he insisted. "How can you both be my aunties if you're not married to Uncle Ron anymore?"

Hermione made a face and noise to show that she was thinking. "Well," she said, her eyes glancing up at the ceiling. "Not being married to Ron doesn't mean I love you any less. Do you love me now as much as before, when I was married to Uncle Ron?"

"Of course I do, I love you just as much." Michael gave Hermione a hug back, squeezing her with all his might, feeling his little arms strain as he expressed his fondness for her.

"Then no one can take the love you have in your heart away from you. Even though I'm not married to Ron anymore, it won't stop me from caring about you," she assured him.

"I'm glad I get to keep you as my auntie," Michael sighed with relief.

Hermione patted Michael's back as he hugged her once again. She felt joy in the simple and uncomplicated love from a child.

Philippe was standing next to his brother, listening with great interest. He also gave Hermione a big squeeze and a kiss on her cheek before Bill wrangled them off to bed.

Once the children were tucked in, Bill came over and sat next to Hermione on the couch.

"Michael was a bit upset after my birthday party," Bill said, looking a bit somber. "He wondered why you left so early. Then when my mother went on about how you were 'dead to us' for divorcing 'her' son, I had to explain to Michael that you didn't really die. And then when you weren't there for Christmas, Michael was confused why you weren't there and was a bit upset. So I wanted to have you come over to assure him you weren't dead and that you were okay."

Hermione shook her head at the way this had all transpired. Molly seemed to take this whole divorce thing as some personal attack against her.

A part of Hermione wanted to know how her ex-mother-in-law was recovering, but another part of her was bitterly glad that she was suffering in some way. To ruin four lives for the sake of what she thought would be best for them, Hermione felt that it was only just that Molly suffer the repercussions of what her own decisions had wrought. If she couldn't handle it, Molly shouldn't have played with people's lives as if they were her own personal chess pieces.

"Any word from the newlyweds?" Bill asked, since Hermione did work for Lavender. Hermione's new boss had placed the company temporarily in her and Albert's hands to coast through the week she'd be gone.

"No. Though she said before I left after the reception that she'd be back on the second, which is just two days away. The company hasn't fallen to bits, so I guess Albert and I did all right to hold the castle down while she was away." Hermione shrugged indifferently.

There was a bit of strained silence until Hermione spoke up again. "Thanks for inviting me, Bill. It'll be nice to socialize a little, since I've been pretty busy with my work and apprenticeship."

"Well, Dad, the twins, and I aren't holding a grudge against you. It is sad how it came to this, but if you and Ron are both happier this way, then who am I to judge what is best for you?" Bill looked at Hermione, ducking his head down to gaze at her face a little more closely to gauge her reaction. "Are you happier?"
A bittersweet smile quirked at one corner of her lip. Hermione had her Potions apprenticeship. She didn't have to deal with Ron's moods or demands for mediocre sex. There was no more fighting, no more questioning herself, no more belittling remarks. Even the pay and work under Lavender was more rewarding than at her old job. Of course she'd be even happier if Severus was still around, but given everything else, her life was better.

"Yes, Bill. I am happy. The happiest I've been in a long while."

Hermione helped Fleur finish getting ready for the party. She arranged food on some trays while Fleur worked on an ice sculpture featuring dancing figures beneath exploding fireworks. Tiny shards of ice ejected in all directions with each burst, sublimating before reaching the ground.

The party started rolling around nine o'clock. A few other wizards and a witch from Gringotts were there, most of whom worked in curse-breaking like Bill. There were also a few Hogwarts classmates from the same year as Bill, as well as Fleur's little sister, Gabrielle, and her fiancé, a French wizard named Guy. Guy's brother, Baudouin, also came along to join the party.

Of course the twins, their arms full of fireworks and party favors to set off at midnight, came to the party with their wives. Dobby was playing baby-sitter for the twins since Harry was away. The elf still lent a hand to the Weasley family even though Harry was divorced from Ginny. Harry had told Dobby to help the Weasleys, if he chose to do so, which the elf did. Dobby liked being helpful to people who appreciated him.

Hermione made small talk with Bill's co-workers. She learned that their latest project involved a cursed Spanish Galleon off the coast of the Yucatan Peninsula in the Gulf of Mexico. It required Gillyweed to search, since Bubble-Head Charms were foiled by the curse attached to the sunken ship. It was estimated that there would be a vast treasure, based on records the Goblins had on the expected shipment of gold coming from the Americas in the early 1700's.

The wine and ale were flowing freely.

Fortunately, Bill and Fleur had the good sense to put a Silencing Charm up so that the children would not be awakened by the party revelers. Fleur had to run off and take care of their infant, Eric, with a nappy change and late-night nursing, but otherwise the children were sound asleep the rest of the night.

Noshing on some wonderful Brie en Croute that Fleur made, paired with some mellow Merlot, Hermione brainstormed with George about ideas for The Sirens' Secrets for the upcoming Valentine's Day shopping season. Just over George's shoulder, she saw Baudouin glancing over at her periodically, checking her out.

Hermione was not in the mood, nor was she on the market for a new wizard to warm her bed. She still pined for Severus and would be for who knew how long.

"So we need a witch's perspective on something romantic to add to the store for the season. I mean, there seems to be only so much one can do with cupids and hearts. At least with Christmas there are more objects associated with the holiday we can alter for our purposes or use as a theme," George went on, stuck for inspiration.

Hermione nodded, indicating she was listening, and she was. Mostly. As much as it was nice to get out and talk to other people, she was missing Severus so much that night. She would have loved to have spent the whole night alone in the flat with him making love, drinking champagne together and off of each other's bodies, or making more bets to be paid off, both parties happy with the result of the wager. Severus could have even made cioppino, an Italian fisherman's stew, using seven different kinds of fish for good luck. He and Draco had been eating it every New Year's Eve for good luck in their quest to escape, and it seemed it only took four years for their luck to kick in.

"- but I need something that not only is sexy but erotic, subtle, sensual," George went on. "I mean, what can you do with roses besides give them to a witch?"

Hermione closed her eyes. She thought back to the time in Severus' bed and that Arabic spell in which he cast flowers that brushed up against her skin, as if being caressed by a thousand butterflies, with the scent of jasmine, roses, and violets enveloping her.

Inspired, she asked George, "How good is your Arabic?"

"Not very. What do you have in mind?"

The next hour was spent cutting out heart shapes from left-over red tissue paper that Fleur dug out from Christmas storage. Then there was a charm to add the scent of flowers, make the heart cut-outs fly like butterflies – Fred came over to help with that one – and then disappear once they had caressed the skin.

It took a few tries. On the first attempt the heart-like butterflies flew at Hermione and practically attacked her. It would take more work to finesse it to something they could sell, plus there was the matter of directing the butterfly hearts to the right spot on the body, as some wound up alighting on Hermione's hair before dissolving into nothingness.

It wasn't as elegant as the Arabic spell, but it was something to put in a box and sell for a few Galleons, which was what Fred and George were looking for. Besides, not everyone could pronounce the spell in Arabic and get it right, especially if they were too horny and wound up to do the proper pronunciation. That spell was one of the few she knew in Arabic that Severus taught her from his old and very rare tome, but she wasn't about to volunteer how or where she'd learned the spell.

The twins promised her a forty percent royalty on profits, should they be able to get the product ready in time for Valentine's Day.

Once the twins ran off to tell their wives about this great new product they would need their help developing, Baudouin made his move.

"That was quite clever of you," the French wizard with a thick accent praised Hermione. "And quite sensuous. I didn't know British witches were familiar with the more erotic Arabic spells of the fifteenth century."

He sidled up to Hermione and ran a finger up along her arm in a way that was supposed to be sensual, but just made Hermione's skin crawl.

"I read it in a book, if you are insinuating otherwise," she told him icily. "Or were you not versed by Fleur about my prolific reading habits."

"Well, there is a difference between knowledge and experience," he said, his dark brown eyes raking over her body in a manner similar to the way Bascom Nettleton had done to her before. "But as you are a divorced witch, I'm sure you have enough experience to teach even me a few things."

And this is what Hermione should have expected. Evidently, there was this misconception in the wizarding world that divorced witches were an easy lay, since their virginity was long gone. Also, having been used to being serviced by a husband, she wouldn't be too picky about any wizard "filling" her needs in her empty bed.
"I may be divorced, but I'm not a slag who is going to fall on my back for some wizard who happens to know about a few esoteric spells," she threw back at him, as she slowly pulled out her wand, ready to make her point clear she wasn't interested if he got any fresher with her.

"You British witches. Why must you be so uptight about this sex thing. You're available; I'm rich, handsome, and available. Why shouldn't you come home with me tonight?" Baudouin argued, as he tried to pin her up against a counter.

Feeling her back pressed up against the tiled edge, Hermione slid her wand down. "Either remove yourself from my presence, or my wand 'accidentally' goes off. And I know hexes that will take St. Mungo's three days to undo." To make her point, she pressed the tip of her wand against Baudouin's trousers in just the right spot where there was no mistaking the seriousness of her promise.

Playing the cool opponent who had let her win this round, Baudouin began backing away, his hands held up in surrender. "Your loss, Mrs. Weasley."

He turned and sauntered out of the kitchen just as the witch from Bill's work came stumbling in. "Ooh, he's cute. Is he available?" Bill's co-worker asked, a glass of champagne in her hand. Her eyes were a little glassy as they were firmly fixed on the posterior of the exiting French wizard.

"Yes," Hermione informed her before lowering her voice in a more secretive tone, "He's just waiting for a very nasty case of 'oak root fungus' to clear up before he said he might owl me. But he's all yours if you want. I won't stand in your way."

The witch made a rather disgusted face, her interest turning quickly to revulsion once Hermione used the euphemism for a particularly nasty wizarding venereal disease that was on par with Muggle herpes. Once you got "oak root fungus," you could never fully get rid of it, only manage the condition's symptoms. He could have had it for real, for all Hermione knew.

"Eww. No longer interested." The witch stumbled out of the kitchen in search of a fresh libation.

Bill came into the kitchen laughing. He leaned up against the counter opposite of Hermione, giving her a look that said she could still surprise him.

"It's a good thing you and Ron parted on good terms," Bill remarked. "I'd hate to see what would happen to Ron if you didn't."

Hermione was studying the bottom of her glass. "You missed the fights we had in marriage counseling. There was that time we hexed each other, then there was the one time I hauled off and decked him flat," she admitted ruefully.

The red-headed wizard whistled while he shook his head. "I didn't know."

Hermione was studying the bottom of her glass. "You missed the fights we had in marriage counseling. There was that time we hexed each other, then there was the one time I hauled off and decked him flat," she admitted ruefully.

The red-headed wizard whistled while he shook his head. "I didn't know."

"And that's the way Ron and I wanted to keep it, though Ginny and Harry knew."

There was another awkward silence between them before Bill spoke.

"Did you know about Ginny and Draco?" he asked, his voice quiet so to avoid being overheard by anyone beyond the edge of the kitchen.

Hermione closed her eyes and sighed. She could trust Bill, but he was also Ginny's brother.

"By the time I discovered that, Ginny had already made up her mind to leave Harry and be with Draco," she confessed.

Hermione almost added that if she could have stopped it she would have, and she did try at first. However, given everything she knew now, would she still have tried to stop Ginny from being with Malfory? Or do all that she could to help her friend be with the love of her life – that she was denied due to Molly's interference from the start?

"Do you know where she is?" Bill asked, a quiver of hope trembling in his voice.

"No, but I might have an inkling. I have to do some research first."

Hermione could have asked Bill if he had a Pensieve, but then he might want to view the memory for himself as well. These were Severus' memories, and Bill had no idea about Severus or her involvement with him. And that's how it was going to remain.

Harry knew where Ginny was, but currently he was high up in the Himalayas busy wooing a nomadic witch. She would speak to Harry once he got back, and see if he could ease Bill's mind.

So far her own research into Spain and sanctuaries had yielded nothing. The only thing she'd found regarding sanctuaries was in reference to wizards who were monks working for monastic orders. Hermione never remembered Ginny cooking any Greek cuisine. Her own research into the sanctuary in Greece revealed some interesting recent accords for a bidding war regarding who got to stay or who got hauled off back to their country of origin.

Severus and Draco might have made money working for Lavender, but not even they had enough money to outbid the British Ministry of Magic and the money they would spend to drag them back to England.

Using Harry's hint about Ginny and her cookbooks, Hermione had also looked into Italy, Japan, India, France, Brazil, and Egypt, but even those places had no sanctuaries that she could find in her research.

At that moment, Hermione was glad she didn't have a Pensieve, otherwise she would have already viewed the last memory for Severus just to satisfy her curiosity where he was. At least she could truthfully answer Bill that she didn't know where Ginny was, though omitting that Harry did.

"If there is anything I can do to help you find her, let me know. I don't want to bring her back, I just want to make sure she's safe and happy," Bill assured her.

He was right to suspect Hermione might not tell him if his intent was to bring Ginny back. Hermione knew he was telling her the truth, though.

When he woke up New Year's Eve morning at the hotel, there was a note for Severus floating in front of his door as he headed down to the kitchen to make breakfast.

Ever since Hermione's photo was placed on his bedside table, Justina stopped offering to bring him coffee or join her for a nightcap. She must have figured out that his lack of interest in her charms was not just because there were a bevy of other witches he could have his pick of. Severus had his options, but he didn't choose any of them.

Justina would have normally knocked on his door to notify him he had a message, but she didn't. Either the note arrived very late or exceptionally early, or she had completely given up on ever having a chance with the most eligible bachelor in town.
Draco and Ginny were finally resurfacing from their week-long secluded honeymoon at their cottage. The note was an invitation for Severus to come over for dinner.

There was a request if he could make his delicious cioppino, since Ginny had heard of it but never tried it. Severus would have to run down by the docks that morning to see what the local catch was, but he could pull it together last-minute. They offered to serve him lunch, and he could arrive no earlier than noon.

With a basket full of fresh seafood, some dry white wine, a loaf of French bread, tomatoes from the local market, onions, garlic, dried red pepper, bay leaves, and a bunch of holly as a symbol of domestic happiness, Severus made his way up the street, around the corner and up the gentle slope to the white cottage where the Malfoys lived. A pineapple was placed on the front porch, a signal that they were finally welcoming guests. It was a long practiced custom to display a pineapple as a sign of hospitality.

The lawn looked like it was recently mown. He wondered if Draco did it, or had the free elf do it before the one-week rent-a-butler service the creature rented himself out for expired.

Severus knocked on the door and was met with a very relaxed and blissfully happy Draco. The smile plastered on the boy's face couldn't have been removed with even the worst of hexes. He looked that euphoric.

It was disgusting, and Severus was happy for him.

Ginny greeted Severus, looking equally relaxed with a fiery twinkle in her eye. She thanked him for the holly, before taking the bunch of foliage accented with red berries and the groceries from Severus.

"Thank you so much for the bottle of Fairy Brandy and gallon of fresh passion fruit juice for the wedding present," she thanked him with a kiss upon his cheek.

Severus returned the thanks, "And thank you for the gift you left for me."

Ginny flitted about the kitchen as if she was walking on air, putting Severus' supplies away for now.

Meanwhile, Draco and Severus went to the living room to relax before lunch was served.

As the two wizards gazed in silent contemplation at the peaceful Japanese garden, Severus asked, "Is it really just like the one you made?"

"Down to the placement and selection of the tamate stone lantern and the tetsu bachi basin," Draco confirmed. "Ginny said I couldn't have picked a better home if I had read her mind."

Draco dropped his head back on the couch and let out a small but satisfied groan. "You didn't happen to pack any extra vials of that Sequoia stuff, did you?"

"No, but I think that will be one of my first commissions once I set up shop, if those Chinese witches are still interested, which I think they will be."

Draco lifted his head and remembered, "That's right. Two days from now. Are you ready?"

"I have my equipment in place, the rooms are built out, Floo is connected, supplies are all in to get me started, awning is fixed, windows painted, shingle hung, business license obtained, and I even put a small ad in the local paper," Severus updated his friend.
Draco nodded approvingly. "Count me in for a case of Sequoia if Ginny keeps this up," he groaned. "Talk about making up for lost time."

"You're newlyweds. What did you expect?" Severus reminded him. "And besides, do you mind she's as equally amorous?"

Draco gave Severus a goofy smile and shook his head. "Not as all."

There was a level of tension in Draco that was stripped away. It could be the island affecting the younger wizard, it could be because all his biggest dreams had come true, or the week-long uninterrupted shagging – perhaps all three. Whatever it was, Severus wondered if he would become as relaxed and at peace with himself as Draco seemed to be at that moment.

"Did Lavender make you sign any noncompetitive agreements with your contract?" Draco asked, wondering about the legal implications of Severus making the same potions he once developed for their former employer.

"It was limited to countries where she currently had a presence in, so the Americas, Japan, China, and Southeast Asia down to Australia and New Zealand are fair game, should I sell anything abroad. India is not quite a settled matter. Though I have a feeling I'll be busy enough with commissions and tutoring locally to keep me busy and keep me comfortable."

Ginny called the wizards to the table for lunch. They ate fresh spring rolls stuffed with Thai basil, mint, finely julienned carrots, lettuce leaves, bean sprouts, and lightly pickled ginger, served with fresh wedges of lime and soy sauce. There was lightly battered deep fried shrimp wrapped around a piece of sugar cane, and steamed rice.

"So what have you been up to this past week, Severus?" Ginny asked, having not heard their earlier conversation.

Instead of rehashing the same thing, Severus thought he would add a bit more information.

"Oh, the usual. I got my shop ready for opening on January second. Learned to kick off flying from the middle of the ocean. And to top it off, Mounga's teenage daughter shoved a copy of the Mercury Broom calendar under my nose – featuring your brother, to my surprise."

Ginny stopped eating for a minute and looked at Severus to see if he was joking about the last two. There was nothing humorous in his expression.

Draco spoke first. "Did you at least wait for it to be removed from her hands before blasting it to ashes?"

"Oh, I restrained myself," Severus informed him. "I merely sneered and yelled at her before she ran off in fright, tears streaming from her face."

"Nothing you haven't done to most of the students at Hogwarts at some point in time," Ginny added dryly.

"I bought her a calendar featuring the most beautiful magical castles and palaces in the world to replace the one she no longer wanted, once I explained my reaction to it."

Draco and Ginny exchanged glances.

"And what exactly did you tell Akela?" Draco asked.
"That he was a... as she put it, 'a big, fat jerk,' to a dear friend of mine." Severus used his fingers to exaggerate Akela's quote. "A cruel and not very bright student of mine. I did ask her not to say anything, except I did give her free license to tell her friends he's a big, fat, cruel jerk – and that flying car incident – should she feel free to spread some truthful gossip."

Draco bust up and was in stitches. Even Ginny started giggling.

"Akela did say she was going to burn it, but I told her to hang on to it in case you wanted to see it, Ginny. From all the muscles he had, I can certainly understand the difficulty Hermione had with the muscle-gaining potions he was on. That must have been a very potent potion," Severus thought aloud, remembering his own reaction as he and Hermione tried to reverse-engineer one vial of it.

"Was there anything else you told her?" Draco asked, wanting to be prepared.

"Rainbow and the children got a brief about my work at Hogwarts, the House system, and that you were once students of mine. Akela is under the impression I must have been the nicest professor in the whole school," Severus said with a roll of his eyes.

Ginny had to turn her head to the side and spit out the mouthful of coconut water and pineapple juice she was in the middle of sipping, in order to avoid choking on it while laughing, or spraying it out her nose.

Even Draco had to stop and catch his breath, as he was laughing too hard to do much of anything else.

As they finally settled down, Draco said, "So you must be joking about the kicking off in the ocean, right?"

Severus wondered if maybe he shouldn't warn them and just do it while flying out with them some time. Catching a fleeting glimpse of shock on Draco's face as he would take a swan dive off his broom just might be worth it.

~~~~~~~*~

Around the time Severus was finishing lunch, Hermione was standing outside Bill and Fleur’s in the chilly night air, her cloak wrapped about her to keep her warm. It was in the mid-thirties Fahrenheit and a strong and constant breeze was blowing, whipping her cloak about her ankles.

She almost begged off to go home early, but she made a promise to herself to at least stay until midnight to wish Bill and Fleur a Happy New Year, since they did invite her.

People were getting drunker, and she found more comfort in the solitude than feeling alone in a room full of people.

This was going to be the first night in years she hadn't spent New Year's Eve with Harry and Ron, and she was all right with that. More than anything, she wanted to be with Severus, and she wondered if he thought of her with the same ache in his heart as she had when she thought of him.

In the parlor, she could hear the countdown begin. Grabbing her drink she had set upon the stone wall, she went back inside to join the last few second to the New Year. People hugged, couples kissed, and Baudouin and that witch from Bill's work were making out. Hermione's former in-laws gave her a hug and peck on the cheek. Even Grace and Florence, the twins’ wives, gave her the same affectionate gesture. The twins set off fireworks within the house, which due to the Silencing Charm, thankfully didn't wake up the sleeping children.
Everyone sang Auld Lang Syne, though Hermione didn't have the strength to sing it more than above a whisper. The song was about remembering friends of the past and not letting them be forgotten. She could never forget Severus, and the lyrics made her heartsick for him all the more.

When their song ended, Hermione made a quick exit, thanking Fleur and Bill for their hospitality before she could break into tears.

The cioppino was even better than before. The Opah fish was a delectable addition to the shrimp, squid, scallops, crab, clams, and Mahimahi that swam in the tomato, wine, and shellfish broth that Severus had to make from scratch.

It was just the three of them for New Year's Eve.

It was nice to see Ginny and Draco once again. He had actually missed them with their week away, even though they never left town. They were comfortable and familiar people in his life and he felt a little adrift without their presence, especially at the hotel. Still, he had made enough friends and acquaintances since coming to Malu Palekaiko that he wasn't lonely. Severus was by nature a bit of a solitary creature, but even he found solace in the genial companionship of those who knew him well.

They sat together relaxing in the living room, chatting about Ginny's work with Halulu to pull together a class schedule for introductory belly dancing for different age groups. She asked Severus for tips about laying out a lesson plan.

Severus gave the pair an update on town gossip, which Rainbow had been more than happy to supply to him. The newlyweds were more attuned to social goings on and wanted to know what they missed.

Now that Draco had got the girl and feathered their new nest, he needed a new project to keep him busy. He was used to working, so sitting around doing nothing – while Ginny was busy at the dance school teaching, when she wasn't learning hula – wasn't going to be good for his psyche or their marriage. Severus mentioned that tutoring seemed to be a popular thing, since all the kids were home-schooled, and many of the mothers worked part-time. There was talk of lessons in Charms and Transfiguration, which Draco excelled at, but he wanted a few days to think about it.

He had his life ahead of him now and the choices were endless. Severus reminded Draco that tutoring might be a short-term thing while he sorted out his life's passion for a career choice, not that Draco needed the money. Still, it was good to have a goal to strive for, and work tended to give one a sense of purpose.

As midnight approached, Ginny popped the champagne and poured it into flutes. Off in the distance they could hear their neighbors chanting out the countdown. They watched the clock and wished each other a Happy New Year with hugs and kisses upon the cheek, the newlyweds giving each other more than just a peck, of course.

Severus had a lovely voice, but he rarely sang in front of others, even Draco and Ginny. He mostly sang when learning a new language, since that helped greatly with pronunciation, and usually alone in the shower or bath.

Draco and Ginny sang Auld Lang Syne, which brought Severus’ mind back to Hermione.

It had already been the New Year for eleven hours back in London. He wondered if she'd sat alone. in his old flat, or if she'd gone to a party. Severus wondered about a great many things regarding Hermione.

Severus was so used to hearing updates about her daily life that he had missed them terribly. The simple mundane task of lending an ear for her latest triumph or tragedy in the lab at work filled a corner of his mind that was now bare and empty of the latest happenings in Hermione's life. He wondered how the fall-out of her divorce was progressing, and if she was no longer the favorite topic of gossip magazines. He longed to hear about her apprenticeship, and tried to imagine how different Dobmeir might be training her than if he had been her Potions master instead.

In his head, Severus would have conversations with Hermione telling her about his day – such as how he had to explain to the local business licensing office that his was more than a service business, but that he would also be providing products for commission. His mind filled with the sound of his voice as he would go on about how inept some government officials could be, and he could imagine her soothing him with empathetic words, telling him her own experiences, and providing a suggestion of her own. He almost found himself talking to himself aloud in public as he would have these conversations in his head, and had to cover it with pretend humming as a witch passed him by.

It was these little conversations in his head with Hermione that kept him from fixating on how much he missed her in his life. To not have these imaginary conversations with her in his mind would only remind him how much more he missed her with the absolute silence of no one there to listen to him, as he had listened to her.

Now that the hour had struck, the year was new and the champagne drained, Severus excused himself to go back to the hotel. Ginny and Draco were getting more affectionate, and he knew it was time to bow out.

There was a promise of flying the next day, and Severus reminded them that should they get “distracted” again, please owl him ahead of time.

On the stroll back to his room at the hotel, he saw the odd firework here and there rise up above the town’s rooftops and explode in an array of outlines shapes featuring babies in sashes, clocks, phoenixes and other appropriate festive designs.

Back at the hotel, reminded of the incident when Draco answered the door Polyjuiced as Ginny, Severus’ eyes darted to the drawer where he kept the unused vials of Polyjuice Potion and snippets of Hermione's hair. He felt a twinge of shame, almost in the way he felt after spying Hermione masturbating at the spa without her knowing he was watching.

After locking the door, he closed the shutters, put up a Visual Obfuscation Charm – just in case anyone could peek in through the closed shutters from the second story, and a Silencing Charm.

As he pulled open the draw of his bedside table, the photo of Hermione – reading a book, then smiling and laughing – caught his eye. He placed it photo-side down on the nightstand so that she could not watch what he was about to do.

Pulling out one vial of the Polyjuice Potion, he set it aside while he removed a single small sample of Hermione's hair. He didn't know how many more times he would do this, so he used one small piece.

He undressed and stood in front of the non-enchanted mirror. As he tipped the vial back, he felt the potion slide down his throat and creep with its numbing heat throughout his body, infusing his veins with her essence.
With fascination, he watched his body in the mirror change to match Hermione's the day she gave him her hair.

Severus missed her so much that he nearly cried out at seeing her reflection in the mirror, even knowing that he was projecting a shell of her image. He wanted to place his head upon the very breasts he saw in his own reflection and let her stroke his hair so tenderly.

His fingers - Hermione's fingers - caressed the face he wore. The familiar calluses grazed his skin. They were hers and at the same time his own. His hands trailed down the body he knew so well from memory, now refreshed anew.

Severus closed his eyes momentarily as his fingertips grazed his neck, remembering when he asked her to teach him how she touched herself.

As his fingers reached his breasts, he noticed how the perception of touch was different, as if it was more intense as he played with his nipples than in his normal male form. The sensation of it, he noted, pulled tightly in his core, an aching in the lower abdomen that was unfamiliar, yet familiar. It was more internal, and he knew it was Hermione's uterus pulling and tightening in response to the stimulus.

Laying down along the edge of the bed so he could continue watching himself in the mirror, Severus mimicked the movements of Hermione's hand. He'd memorized her movements from many nights together, dragging pads of his fingers along his own rib cage, hip bones, and navel, noticing his body arch in response similarly to Hermione.

The sensation was the same, yet not. Her skin was softer, and also a little more sensitive.

A soft sigh escaped his lips, and he found himself even more turned on by the sound.

"Severus," he whispered to himself.

It seemed a bit indecorous, but he felt needed this. Hermione admitted to him how she had used a couple of the magically charmed dildos the twins gave her, confessing in her huskiest whisper that she had imagined it was him. She told him of how she masturbated while thinking of him, calling his name out when she could no longer wait to see him next.

How different she was near the end than from the sexually timid creature he first made love to. He was the one who brought out the sexual goddess within her.

And now he would masturbate to fantasies of Hermione begging him, just to hear his name called out once more.

"Please, Severus, I need you," he pleaded, not quite catching the right accent or cadence, but it was close enough, it was unmistakably her voice he heard in his ears and his own head.

His fingers slipped between his legs and he gasped as the sensation of fingers slid over the clitoris. It was just as sensitive as the tip of his penis, perhaps even more so, because the feelings of intensity as his fingers began to slide back and forth was deliriously good. The bundle of nerves was concentrated into a smaller area, which made it seem nearly overwhelming.

Dipping his fingers lower, he found that Hermione's body had reacted with the same familiar response. Wetness spread across his fingers, adding lubrication as he went back to stroking Hermione's clit. Had he known how good this felt, he would have done a whole lot more of this to her.
His other hand slipped lower and began to probe himself, sliding two fingers in. Severus now understood why Hermione begged him to fill her. The tightening in his lower abdomen was building. Remembering how he made her come before, he used those same motions and speed to bring himself to orgasm.

Looking back over at the mirror, he spied Hermione reclined along the bed, knees pulled up, back arched, hair splayed like a fan across the bed, chest heaving, cheeks flushed and eyes heavily dilated.

Severus came with a hoarse cry, the electric sensation spreading from his abdomen outwards, tendrils of white heat racing out towards his limbs. It was different from the sudden all-over body sensation that he experienced as a man. Different, but just as glorious.

Instead of feeling exhausted like he would, had he ejaculated, Severus found himself not only relaxed, but energized. Now he could understand why sometimes Hermione seemed to have more vigor after the first coupling than before. It was only after several powerful orgasms that Hermione would want to drop off to sleep as badly as Severus.

Bringing his fingers up to his mouth, he licked each one, reveling in the taste of her. It was technically himself, but this was Hermione's body. It tasted like her.

He spent the next few hours re-familiarizing himself with the body he missed. If he could not be with her, then this would have to satisfy his needs for now.

Severus dragged fingers through the mane atop his head. He leisurely played with Hermione's breasts, making note of things he found pleasurable versus Hermione's own techniques. Should he see her again, he would have to try them on her to see if she liked it as much as he did.

As the hour grew late exhaustion eventually over took Severus, having climaxed twice more.

Before he drifted off to sleep, the Polyjuice Potion having not yet worn off, he pulled the photo back up and put it back in its place next to his bed. He wanted her to be the first thing he saw in the morning when he woke up.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Thank you to my beta, JuneW, and please welcome a new beta, thegreyladies, who also edited this chapter.

This will be the last chapter I post until after June 13th, once Leviosa (The Harry Potter con July 7-10) is over.

Here’s a link to a very good recipe for cioppino, from Bon Appetit magazine: http://www.bonappetit.com/recipe/cioppino-2. I traditionally fix it on New Year's Eve (or go out to eat it at a good seafood restaurant) and use seven different kinds of seafood, so I would cut down on the amount of fish and shrimp and add some crab and lobster to the shrimp and fish, along with clams, mussels and scallops so you have the right number for good luck.
"Discretion Guaranteed"

Chapter Summary

Severus opens his little Potions shop, and Harry has a surprise.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Seventy-Eight
"Discretion Guaranteed"

Disclaimer:
Rowling own Potter
Lawyers might sue
If I don't make disclaimers
I'm gonna get screwed

============

Sipping a cup of coffee at the hotel, Severus wondered how many customers he would have the first day his shop opened.

He had placed a small ad in the town paper, The Daily Times & Tides, advertising his services.

"Severus Snape: Potions Master
Over 20 years experience, certified E.T.F.C.
Available for tutoring, commissions and consultations
No potion too small or large, too easy or complex
Discretion guaranteed
Opening Friday January 2nd
Business hours: Monday - Friday 9 to 6
Evenings and weekends by appointment only 42 Humuhumunukunukuapua'a Lane"

Looking over his ad, he wondered if he needed to add one of those friendly hibiscus graphics, given that people sometimes needed something flashy to grab their attention. Draco was better suited to this advertising stuff. He wondered if he should have had Draco write something up for him and design the graphics before his wedding.

If business was slow, he could have Draco put together something for him for next week's paper.

Just then, the very same wizard Severus was thinking about showed up.
"Ready to open shop like a regular working slob?" Draco drawled, leaning against the doorjamb, his hands in the pockets of his shorts.

"I am not slovenly," Severus retorted.

"Except when you've drunken yourself blind over Hermione," the blond wizard reminded him.

Severus didn't need to be reminded of that, and ignored the comment.

"Come on," Draco urged him to get going as it was almost nine o'clock. He started singing the chorus from a wizard song about dragon parts for sale, rubbing his hands like a greedy goblin. "It's money, money, money by the pound..."

Draco walked with Severus across the street and down one of the major side streets towards the small back-alley lane where his new business was ready and waiting to open.

The younger wizard saw the people lined up around the street, standing along the sidewalk.

"What's going on?" Draco wondered aloud.

As the two wizards rounded the corner, they noted the line went along the street's sidewalk and turned right down the small alley where Severus' shop was waiting to open.

"There must be close to two hundred people in line!" Draco said, which seemed to have caught the attention of the people in line who turned around and beamed bright smiles at the town's newest Potions master.

Some witches had their children in line. Some had dragged as many as four children along, though some were too small to start studying Potions and were probably there because their mother was in line along with their siblings.

"Care to earn a little pin money playing secretary for me today?" Severus asked in a deadpan voice.

"I guess I'm here to help."

Getting to the front, the people moved away while he unlocked the door. As soon as the door swung open, people rushed at the door.

"Wait, just wait a minute!" he called out in his best professor voice when he sought to regain order amid chaos in the classroom. "Please remain in line."

Looking at the mix of people, he instructed them to part into two lines: one for tutoring, the other for consultation and commissions.

"What if we're here for both?" one witch called out who had two children with her, one around ten, the other who was about fifteen.

"Then once you are done with the line for tutoring, you can get in the consultation/commission line," the Potions master informed her, to which there seemed to be a least a few groans from the other people in line who’d had the same idea.

Draco said he would be right back and ran off.

Severus went inside and made extra copies with a quick duplication spell before handing out packets to each parent in line who had come to inquire about tutoring, one packet per child for his services.
As he handed them out, he informed the parents that their child should fill out the form, with their supervision. The form was a questionnaire about the child's current level of skill regarding Potions, including a list of potions with little columns of tickey boxes – one column to mark for which potions the child had attempted to brew, and one for the potions where they had succeeded, with an additional section at the bottom to list potions not already included in the lengthy list. There was also a section requesting a list of which books the child had studied regarding the subject. As he handed them out, he suggested that people go home, and come back to schedule an appointment once they’d filled out the form.

Draco came back and tapped his wand to a couple packs of playing cards. He then started handing them out to the people standing in the consultation and commissions line.

Severus' helper announced that as it would take a while, once their card was called, the card would flash and vibrate. It would also mark in the corner, in smaller print, how many people were still ahead of them, and the number would drop with each client served. Those farther back in the line could go about their business and come back when their card was called, depending on how long it took to get through the people in line before them.

Once that was done, Severus lit the candles and torches inside, donned his new black cotton robes and called his first customer from the commissions line.

Draco was shown where the appointment book was and began taking reservations for those who decided not to wait for their card to be called, even though they could be at home relaxing in the meantime. Some people had to get to work and made evening and weekend appointments. Severus instructed Draco to make sure to leave half the day available for tutoring, since there seemed to be a huge call for it, starting on the 12th of the month. It would take at least a week to get through all the consultations regarding the children's current level of education and aptitude.

By the time lunchtime rolled around, Severus had met with over twenty consulting and commission clients alone. Some merely needed guidance on a potion they were working on at home for personal use, some wanted to pay Severus to brew something to help them be more attractive to their spouses or get rid of an embarrassing rash in a delicate area. A few wanted some Veritaserum in order to get their wives or husbands to confess if they were cheating or not. There was one witch who requested Wolfsbane Potion for her daughter. The Chinese witches came and asked Severus for that male stamina potion he’d mentioned the night of the luau. A few broke down into tears, needing a bit of coaxing from the former gigolo – who was used to weeping witches – as to the nature of their visit to him. There were a few wizards who needed a potion for gout and other ailments, as they didn't like Arnold, the other Potions master in town who couldn't keep his mouth shut. Ranjit's gout cure formula tasted like spicy flavored vomit, which they didn't care for, and his arthritis formula was less appetizing.

It seemed there was a lot of dirty laundry that could have been aired in public, had many of these witches and wizards gone to Arnold, which is why Severus had so much business. The new business owner was sure the part in his ad that said "discretion guaranteed" was the cause for many of his consultation visits.

In addition to booking clients, Draco also played cashier, collecting monies from whatever Severus wrote down on a scrap of parchment, charmed to not be altered between Severus' desk and Draco's hand. Each one was marked in the ledger with name and potion order, as the standard was half the payment up front, half upon delivery, based on Severus' previous freelance work during summers.

Ginny popped by to present a sheaf of wheat, symbolically wishing Severus riches and prosperity for his new business, and saw that the line was still substantial. She offered to go pick up a couple of sandwiches for the new Potions master and his “assistant” to eat while they worked.

Severus didn't like to eat and work, preferring to concentrate fully on one or the other, but he needed to make an exception this first day.

By early afternoon, some of the witches with children who needed tutoring were bringing back the filled-out questionnaires. Severus suggested to Draco to book them in fifteen-minute blocks per child. The consultation was free, as it was his time teaching that would cost money. No doubt Rainbow had told half the town about all his years of experience teaching.

Some of the witches and wizards took a good few minutes to come back when their cards were called, as they were no doubt back home doing other tasks while waiting for their turn. One wizard Apparated to the alley in front of the shop, still rinsing the shampoo from his hair with a towel wrapped about his waist, not wanting to miss his turn.

A reporter from the town paper swung by and took a few photos showing the long lines still down the block, and asked Severus for a quote.

"I'm thrilled I can provide a valuable service to this community that has welcomed me with open arms and made me feel at home," Severus said in his statement. It was so diplomatic, it sounded as if Malfoy had written it for some advertising fodder.

When it was time to close, there were still some people who had cards but hadn’t been served. Draco adjusted the charm to reflect their place in line, and they would be dealt with on Monday morning when Severus opened up for business again.

There was a stack of tutoring questionnaires that had been returned during the day that Malu Palekaiko's new Potions tutor would work on over the weekend, when he wasn't dealing with some of the weekend appointments.

Draco had booked him from nine to noon for Saturday and Sunday, which would still allow Severus time to go through the questionnaires and begin brewing some of the Potions he had been contracted to concoct.

As he closed up shop, after his first day in business, Draco patted Severus on the back and congratulated him on a successful launch.

"We'll see how successful the tutoring portion goes once they deal with me," Severus remarked grimly.

Just a cursory glance through a few of the questionnaires told him he had his work cut out for him. He wondered if there was no standard curriculum that these home-schooling witches and wizards went by when teaching their children, or just that some of them were coddling their children by not pushing them hard enough to achieve a level of academic competency that was expected by a certain age.

Severus already had a book regarding the American testing standards for American witches and wizards, the SAT: the Stupendously Augean Tribulation. It seemed that there was one standard test once a child had reached the same age as Hogwarts students were when they took their NEWT's, and there was no equivalent to OWL's. If parents wanted their children to pass the Potions portion of the SAT, he might have a very, very busy time indeed.

Hedwig delivered a note from Harry that seemed a bit cryptic, but Hermione had a feeling she knew what to expect, based on Kingsley's update on Harry when she last saw the senior Auror.

Arriving in the afternoon at Number Twelve Grimmauld Place, Hermione was greeted by Harry with a broad, warm smile.

Before Hermione could ask Harry about his accident, the broom race, or anything else, he said gushingly, "I'd like to introduce you to my wife, Zhubanysh."

Hermione thought he might be bringing the witch to England as his girlfriend or fiancée, but she had no idea Harry would marry so quickly after the traumatic and sudden divorce from Ginny.

Harry stood next to his blushing bride, who smiled shyly at Hermione. Zhubanysh was still wearing her native dress, which involved a lot of felt and decorative stitchwork on a long-sleeved blouse, a vest, several layers of skirts, a highly decorative apron, and woolen felt boots.

Hermione knew she shouldn’t look shocked, and she did her best to cover it up by smiling and trying to be happy for Harry, but a large part of her was wondering if this was nothing more than a rebound romance that got swept away with the moment.

"Wow, Harry. This is so... sudden!" she tried to say brightly, her smile faltering a little as she tried to hide her shock.

"Yes," Harry sighed, his voice plainly expressing the heady sensation of someone who had fallen in love and was still enraptured by the initial thrall of it all.

Sticking out her hand, Hermione said with as much grace as she could muster at that moment, "I'm very pleased to meet you, Zhubanysh."

The young bride, who barely looked like she was of age of consent, clasped Hermione in a hug. "Harry said you were like sister," she said with her thick accent and slightly stilted and awkward English. "That make... makes you my sister."

Hermione hugged her back, knowing that this witch was in some ways very innocent and there was no duplicity in her broad and open face. It was then that Hermione noticed she had green eyes, like Harry, but a different shade.

Zhubanysh's face had the almond-shaped eyes and skin coloring that was halfway between European pale skin tones and the warmer brown and yellow tones of the Chinese to the east. She really captured the look of someone who lived along the old Silk Road where cultures crossed and blended. Her face had the roundness that was exemplified with the Russian matryoshka dolls, the eyes of someone from eastern Asia, the eye color of the Europeans, along with a European smattering of freckles across the bridge of her nose and cheeks, and the long, thick, dark, straight hair of the Indian subcontinent. She was uniquely and sweetly beautiful.

Harry turned to his bride and spoke to her in Kyrgyz, a Turkic language, a subgroup of the Kypchak languages.

"When did you learn to speak their language, Harry?" Hermione asked, perplexed at the fluency in which he was speaking a foreign tongue.

"Translation spell. It's easy, Kingsley taught me," he explained, teaching Hermione the spell so she could converse with Zhubanysh.

Dobby served up lunch, but he felt a little out of place since it was uncertain how much Zhubanysh wanted his help. She had never seen a house-elf and was uncertain how Dobby would fit in with her domestic duties to her husband. Harry explained to his wife that even though Dobby was a free elf, the house-elf felt a debt of gratitude to Harry and remained in his service out of a sense of honor, though he could leave any time he chose.

After lunch, Zhubanysh poured tea for her husband and his guest, even offering a cup to Dobby, which endeared her to Dobby with her kindness, before pouring a cup for herself.

Hermione wanted to drag Harry aside and ask him if he had gone mad. Before she could do that, Hermione played the dutiful guest and listened to how they had fallen in love.

It was very sweet. Yuri Novgorodich, a fellow broom racer, found Harry in the snow and took him to the nearest yurt he could find, since who knows how many more miles he would have had to fly with Harry before finding other help. Zhubanysh explained how she fell in love with him at first sight without even knowing who he was. She had never even heard of Harry Potter, so she was unaware of his celebrity status or why he was famous.

It seemed that Zhubanysh playing nursemaid to Harry and tending to him so attentively endeared her to him and quickly won over his heart, especially with her sweet songs Harry claimed healed him.

Since she was a young witch, who was barely seventeen and ripe for marriage since witches tended to marry young in her culture, the father was always present. So with little chance to do physical wooing, their courtship consisted of trying to communicate until Kingsley came along and healed Harry's frostbitten parts. After learning a translation spell, they could converse more easily and spent lots of time talking, though they had already fallen for one another by that point.

By the time that they finished telling Hermione, she was much less circumspect about the sincerity of these two regarding their bond. Harry recounted the wedding customs he had observed, which appalled Hermione, since bride-kidnapping seemed akin to abduction and rape. He assured her that it was an old tradition based on some very, very, very old customs – and the kidnapping does not occur without the bride's consent and her family's. She was a witch after all, and to take her against her will would prove to be a short marriage. Zhubanysh was very proficient with a wand, to be sure.

Hermione eventually asked Zhubanysh if she could speak to Harry regarding some other matters of a personal nature.

Harry's bride smiled sweetly and replied, "Of course, sister," before rising to go to another room.

Ending the translation spell, Hermione said in urgent hushed tones, "Harry, are you mad? How long have you known her, and now you're married to her in what? Less than a week?"

Harry looked at Hermione flatly and said, "And how many hours did you spend with Snape before falling in love with him? And did you fall in love with him or while he was under some pseudonym?"

Hermione's face fell. She didn't tell Harry about that part, but she guessed while he was lying there in a yurt in the Himalayas, he'd probably figured out that Severus originally didn't introduce himself as Severus Snape. Or Ginny might have made mention of it, but he doubted it. Plus Kingsley did warn Hermione that Moody knew about the masks Severus and Draco used. So that probably trickled down to Harry's ears as well.

Hermione was guilty as charged. She had spent less than forty hours in Severus' company under the guise of Calleo before she had fallen for him, then realizing she was in love with Snape after overhearing Moody and Kingsley talking at Harry's birthday party. Even then, once she knew who he really was, she was already hooked and had fallen for Severus.

Harry had spent nearly a whole week in the company of this witch doing nothing but talking before deciding he loved her enough that he wanted to marry her. There was no desperate dry humping in the kitchen, no dance lessons where they were in each other's arms, nor their hormones driving them towards each other – only the simple act of conversation. Granted, Hermione and Severus did talk a lot, but there was also a whole lot of physicality added to the fire between them that urged them on.

Recalling Bill's comments from New Year's Eve, Hermione asked herself, 'If Harry is happier this way, then who am I to judge what is best for him?'

"Are you happy?" she asked her friend.

"I thought I was happy with Ginny, but we both were kidding ourselves and I didn't want to see it. But with Zhubanysh, yes. Happier than I have been in a long while," he admitted, smiling brightly, his eyes crinkling towards the edges like when he was younger.

Looking at him, she saw more of the boy she once knew shine through than of the man who had looked tired and haunted in recent years and months.

Patting him on the leg, she said, "Then I'm happy for you, Harry. For you both. I hope you both have a long and wonderful marriage together."

Suddenly remembering Bill's wish, she said, "I went to Bill and Fleur's for New Year's Eve. He wants to know if Ginny is safe and happy. So if you could let him know that you talked with her and she is indeed, that would ease his mind."

Harry nodded, but also indicated he would not disclose her location. He knew that some members of the Weasley family might not respect Ginny's decision and could show up to make a scene, or worse, try to haul her back. Molly might be transported to the edge of the caldera, if she was foolish enough to try and take Ginny away from Malfoy.

"I hope you know that when the press finds out you married someone so quickly after your divorce with Ginny, they're going to have a field day. There was speculation wondering about Ginny's whereabouts, the notice of your divorce in Ministry records, neither of you available for comment..." Hermione began listing the many things that would invariably happen, having recently been through the wringer herself lately.

Harry assured her he had already warned his wife of what might happen. He said that a statement has already been sent to the press that would show up in Monday's Daily Prophet.

Hermione also asked if Harry had a Pensieve she could borrow. Unfortunately, Harry didn't have one, but indicated he was thinking of buying one.

Zhubanysh was urged to rejoin them. She brought out a tray of honey-soaked fried bread with more tea, eager to show off her culinary skills to her new sister.

Hermione, using the translation spell once again, told Harry and Zhubanysh about Ron's wedding to Lavender. There was a lot of back-story that the younger witch did not know, but she knew that Ron and Hermione were once married, but were not anymore. She also knew that Harry, Hermione, and Ron were childhood friends. Zhubanysh wasn't told of the finer details of Ron and Lavender's history and their affair behind Hermione's back.
"It was a very... solemn wedding," Hermione admitted, not wanting to say it was more like a funeral. She didn't want to confuse Zhubanysh as to why it wasn't the joyous occasion it should have been, but wasn't. She would eventually learn many of the details over the years, or probably sooner.

Hermione was invited to stay for dinner, at which Zhubanysh proudly served her national dish to her new "sister." To Hermione's relief, Zhubanysh couldn't get any horse meat so beef was used instead. It was a dish of meat stewed for about three hours and served with homemade noodles sprinkled with parsley and coriander. It was very filling and delicious.

She asked Zhubanysh if sometime she could teach Hermione how to make it. She was eager to learn a new dish, feeling inspired to expand her repertoire of dishes since learning new ones from Severus. Harry's bride was flattered and ebullient that her cooking was appreciated, not just by her husband, but Hermione as well.

Harry and his new wife ate with their hands, which Hermione copied, having done the same when she had eaten Moroccan food with Severus while blindfolded.

After dinner, Hermione excused herself. She had much more studying to do since Albert was going to test her that week on how much Greek she had learned and absorbed so far.

The newlyweds bid Hermione farewell with hugs and kisses, before she Floo'ed home to the Red Ginseng.

Sitting in her study, Hermione suddenly realized that of all these divorces, that she was the only who had not paired off already. She was guessing that Ginny and Draco tied the knot shortly after arriving at wherever their sanctuary was.

There was a moment when she wondered if she had left with Severus, would he eventually have proposed to her, or was the memory of Gabrielle, his first wife, too painful for him to consider marriage ever again. And though Severus had closed his note – the one that he included with the vials of his memory – with the word "eternally," a thread of doubt crept into Hermione's mind.

'What if he met someone else where he is now? How long would Severus wait for me? What if I show up and he no longer wants me or loves me the same way?'

There were things they never talked about, or more likely they avoided to deflect the unpleasantness of the topic.

In the absence of Severus' reassuring presence, the faith that he had helped restore in herself began to falter, no longer nourished by his words and encouragement. A part of Hermione was withering from the lack of Severus, and the care he gave her. She didn't doubt her love for Severus, but began to doubt herself that she was worthy of him to wait for her.

~~~~~~~*~

Work was good for Severus. It kept his mind off of how much he missed Hermione. But at the end of the day, when he got back from a long day at his shop after staying late into the night brewing, he would walk back to the hotel, up to his room, and find it empty. The photograph of Hermione was his only company late at night when he longed to feel her arm thrown possessively across his chest, as if claiming that he was hers. And he was. Still.

He had been working late so many nights that he had taken to eating take-out, since he didn't have much time to cook now. The food was good, but there was something more satisfying about a home-cooked meal. There were invites from the Malfoys for dinner, but playing catch-up to the surge of work he had when his business first opened claimed much of his time, and he often had to bow out.

Severus did leave work at six o’clock on his birthday, which fell on a Friday that year, and went to the Malfoys for a birthday dinner. It turned out to be more like a mini surprise party. The whole Finau family was there, along with Halulu and her husband, Greg, Gary, Gary's wife, Iolana, Arnold and Ranjit. There was a barbecue in the backyard, and chicken and fish were grilled up, drinks were served and everyone enjoyed themselves. Iakona and Draco talked about how Draco could improve his kick-off from the ocean, since he was still having trouble learning that move. The Potions masters talked shop, with the two old-timers congratulating Severus on his business and thankful they didn't have to turn away so many customers any more. Neither Arnold or Ranjit were the least bit interested in tutoring.

Ginny baked a cake and Severus enjoyed himself, but still wished Hermione was there to share the day with him. He wondered if she remembered his birthday, or was she so busy with work and her apprenticeship that she forgot, and if her affections for him were just as strong, or were they waning with him far away. Severus wondered if she had received those memories Marf promised to deliver and if she had seen them yet. Then there was the inevitable question of would she join him if she did know where he was?

Draco was still coming into work with Severus every day, happy to continue working with the wizard who mentored him and worked alongside him at The Lovely Lavender Company. They had a good working rapport with one another and it was easy when they knew each other's habits and nuances. The backlog of potions was beginning to ease up, and the schedule was more moderate and not overwhelming. Still, now that Severus was tutoring students, each one between one and five days a week, he was rather busy.

Some of the witches began asking for recommendations of a Charms and Transfiguration tutor. Draco hadn't studied under a Master, but Severus recommended him highly, which was enough for the parents to trust their children's supplemental education curriculum under his care.

Draco used Severus' Potions questionnaire as a template for his own. He finally began to understand why Severus had pinched the bridge of his nose so often during class. There were major gaps in the education of some of these children. Some were learning things that would be considered sixth-year level without mastering some other spells that were considered essential for a first year. It was appalling.

Rainbow had done a fairly good job of teaching her own children, as Iakona was a very talented student. He was only twelve, and already doing potions that a fifth year would do. But there were still gaps in some of his basic Potions skill set that explained why he was having some difficulty advancing in his studies. It surprised Severus that Rainbow – who worked as a part-time Healer – didn't cover more of the basics that were missing.

Severus considered bringing up at the next town council meeting the creation of an education curriculum standard that would address these issues. To him, it seemed more like a hodgepodge where the better educated parents were doing a better job, while the lesser educated parents were barely able to teach their children the basics. This current approach to local education was hindering any chance of the poorly-taught students of bettering themselves by scoring high enough on their SAT's to go onto an apprenticeship. Given his years working in institutional academia, he hoped his advice would bear some weight with the locals.

In a rare moment, there was an hour in the afternoon when there were no consultation appointments or tutoring for Severus. Draco was currently working with a student regarding his Charms work in a second tutoring room Severus had built out. There were no students doing their practical Potions work in the front lab where Severus supervised and guided them. Instead, in the rear Potions lab that was his work space, Severus made the most of his time by beginning to stew some iridescent jeweled scarab beetles that needed to simmer overnight when the front door opened.

There was the small chime of a bell to let Severus know a customer had come in. He made sure the flame was set at the right intensity before going to see his next customer.

Severus entered the waiting area to see Halulu standing there, her face a little more weighty than her usual smiling self.

"Do you have a moment to speak about a commission?" she asked, her voice less commanding than customary.

"Of course. I have the next forty-five minutes free until my next appointment," the Potions master said as he ushered her into his office he used for such business.

The office was charmed so that no one could overhear anything said within the confines of the space, in order to stop nosy parkers from sticking their wands where they didn't belong.

Shutting the door, he turned to his friend and asked, "What can I do for you?"

Halulu licked her lips, and he could tell she was having difficulty trying to say why she was there. She took a steadying breath before looking Severus in the eye and saying, "I need a fertility potion."

Witches were naturally fertile women, as their magic tended to lend a certain ability to conceive without the issues that many Muggle women could suffer from. This kept witches from experiencing problems such as an imbalance in hormones, infections of the ovaries that could damage them, unusual-shaped uteruses that could interfere with implantation, endometriosis, and a whole host of other problems of a congenital, genetic or secondary cause. For a witch to need a fertility potion was a great scandal that made some witches question if they were truly magical.

"Have you seen a Healer?" he asked, seeking to address a host of other causes before using a fertility potion.

"Yes, and Rainbow says that everything is working fine. I'm ovulating, Greg is fertile, my cycles are regular, I'm not anemic..." She trailed off as she began to cry.

Severus had a box of tissues on his desk, and he pushed it towards Halulu for her to use as needed.

"Thanks."

Her list crossed off many of Severus’ first line of questions. "How long have you been trying?" he asked, since he didn't know how long they had been married.

"Ten years, though, for the first five years we were married we decided to wait. Fifteen years together and no children. I'm beginning to lose hope," she said, the tears coming back once more.

"What were you using for birth control for those first five years?" Severus asked.

"Arnold supplied contraceptive potions to the local apothecary, and I used those. Other witches have used them, but after they got off the potions they later get pregnant, so that's not it," Halulu informed him.
That was another thing checked off on Severus’ list of questions.

"If I may ask, how long are your cycles?"

"Twenty-nine days."

"And if I may also ask, how often do you and your husband have sex between your seventh and seventeenth day of your cycle?" Severus asked. He kept this as professional as possible, since this was a very personal question.

"Every other day. We were told that trying every day when I'm most fertile might lower his fertility, so we try every other day."

He nodded, trying to think of other things. If he was going to brew a potion for her, the Potions master needed to know what had and hadn't been addressed in order to narrow down the possibilities.

There was something he remembered from a few books he had regarding fertility, arousal and sex potions. Just as stress and anxiety can interfere with arousal, so it could as well with fertility.

Severus knew Halulu was a busy woman. She ran the local hula school, was a town council member, worked part-time in the Portkey office, and worked part-time in the Department for Imports and Exports as well. Whenever Severus saw her, she was always on the go, and he did not know when she found time to socialize. She seemed so full of energy, but now sitting in front of her, she looked tired and exhausted.

An idea struck upon Severus. It was a bit unconventional, but he thought it would make for a good case to study, exploring the aspect of stress and fertility.

"When was the last time you and Greg went on a holiday?" he asked, trying to confirm a suspicion of his.

"Gee, I don't know," she strained to recollect. "Um, maybe thirteen or fourteen years ago? Before I opened the hula school? Yes, it was a few months before I opened the hula school. Thirteen years," she confirmed her earlier guess.

"And you've been trying for ten?"

"Yes."

Severus sat back in his chair and steepled his fingers in front of him, his elbows resting on the arms. "I could take your Galleons, Halulu, and brew you a fertility Potion. But I don't think my potion will be nearly as effective as you and Greg taking a two-week holiday abroad."

"But...?"

"Stress has been suspected to affect fertility. With your busy schedule, you and your husband have had little time to relax and let your mind and bodies rest," Severus went on.

"I can't just go away for two weeks!" Halulu insisted.

"Why not? Do you not have other women who have substituted for you at your hula school in the past? One day or two weeks, it will not be the end of your school. Besides, what is more important to you right now? Living up to the expectations of others and this grueling schedule you keep yourself to, or conceiving a child?" he flatly asked her.
Halulu gazed blankly in front of her. She had kept a busy schedule, trying to live up to some self-imposed image and high set of expectations she had set for herself. Severus knew the type, since it had once been his own lifestyle. He had run himself ragged before, especially during his days in the past trying to play Potions teacher, Head of Slytherin, reluctant slave to The Dark Lord, and faithful spy for Dumbledore. He had drawn himself so taut that he’d nearly snapped a few times, living on Invigoration Draughts to keep himself going.

"So do you take Invigoration Draughts to keep up with the schedule you set for yourself?" he asked, wondering if she did.

"I... Well..." She looked away, perplexed that this wizard had seen through a careful facade of the ever put-together, on-top-of-it-all Halulu who could do everything, and usually did.

"Japan is lovely in April with the cherry blossom festivals, I hear. Though they say that in spring, Paris is for lovers." Severus remembered Hermione's tale of her honeymoon with Weasley, then added, "And then there is the Island of Capri off the Italian coast. It has a little wizarding restaurant that serves the most wonderful aphrodisiac oysters. They are harvested from the same beds as the Sirens eat from. The restaurant also serves them with a lime blossom-infused limeade that supposedly can be quite... stimulating, regarding conjugal bliss. It can enhance the already romantic setting of Italy."

"But what about my work?"

"Everyone else seems to take a holiday now and again. I'd say you were overdue." He quirked a brow at her, slightly surprised that she should dare to refute him. "You work in the Portkey office. I think you could arrange something in the near future. April is three months away. Plenty of time for you to put your affairs in order for a two-week holiday that is long overdue. And no more Invigoration Draughts."

"But what if..." She didn't want to say what if she couldn't get pregnant.

"If within two full cycles after your trip you have not conceived, then I will take your Galleons and will use all my knowledge and my entire library to help you and Greg conceive," Severus promised. "But for now, I recommend a nice relaxing holiday far way. You can forget your troubles, relax, sleep in, and not worry about trying to get pregnant. Take a sabbatical from life and your worries."

Halulu seemed to give a sigh of resignation, as if finally admitting to herself that she could not do it all.

"I have been where you are now," he confided to her. "Sometimes you have to recognize your own limits, even though you think it can all be done."

Severus did not tell her he did do it all, but it had ravaged his body and strained the limits of his mind when he needed his mind the most to keep him alive.

Hermione was eating the last piece of cake. She had baked it on Severus' birthday, lit a candle, and softly sung "Happy Birthday" for him, though she was all alone.

Each night, while she studied her Greek that she wasn't grasping as fast as she had hoped, Marf served her a cup of tea and a slice of cake. It had taken her two weeks to finally eat all of it, not wanting to gorge herself on it. She didn't want to buy a new wardrobe if she couldn't fit in her current one. Besides, she finally had some really nice dresses, and she wanted to be able to keep wearing them for a long while.

Working in Albert's garden certainly made up for the fact that she was no longer lifting and hauling boxes around the Department of Standards & Regulations. Using magic to lift boxes of magical ingredients was not exactly the smartest thing to do, as some ingredients might react to even the slightest bit of wand work. And given that she was now working most of the day every Saturday for Neville, fulfilling the Herbology portion of her Potions apprenticeship, she was getting an extra work-out. Even her biceps had become leaner, but more muscular.

Fortunately, working with Neville was helping her master Greek. Neville was fluent in Greek and Latin. He explained that though it wasn't part of his apprenticeship, he had decided to learn them since most plants were named using Greek and Latin. The Greek and Latin words often described the plant and its characteristics. For example, his beloved Mimulus Mimbletonia – the Latin “-ulus” diminutive indicates the Mimulus is smaller than the Mimbus.

Hermione knew all the binomial nomenclature for all the Potion ingredients she had tested over the years, which helped her learn some Greek. However, Hermione and Albert did not often converse in Greek at work. To help her, Neville would converse with her in the language, which made learning the language a bit easier.

The old classmates would be in a heated repotting shed conversing back and forth. With their arms elbow deep in freshly mixed potting soil, Neville would guide her with proper conjugation, tense, and grammar. At times, he would expand her vocabulary with a word that better fit the context of the conversation.

Hermione hoped when she learned Latin, the next language she was going to master, that it would go much easier. But Neville was happy to help her, as she had helped him back at Hogwarts, especially in Potions.

She wondered if she should work on two languages at once, but was cautioned by Albert it was better to work on one language at a time. He had tried the same thing, and wound up making slower progress than when he stuck with one language at a time.

As Hermione was repotting dormant daylilies that she was dividing, she thought to ask Neville, since nearly everyone else was unable to help her.

"Say, Neville, you wouldn't happen to have a Pensieve, would you?" She tried to make it nonchalant, but she was getting quite anxious to locate one since she had been in possession of Severus' memories for nearly a month.

"Nope, sorry to say that I don't. I did think that maybe I would need one to help organize my thoughts. Anything specific you need it for?" he asked, curious to her need for one.

"Just need to review some old memories regarding some research I'm doing." she sort of truthfully explained.

Hermione was stumped. Everyone she knew was either thinking of buying one and hadn't gotten around to it, or didn't have one. The only person left Hermione hadn't asked was Lavender, but she didn't think her boss had one. Lavender didn't seem like the type who would have one, like Dumbledore had. Usually the more academic types tended to have them for review of historical analysis, and to organize their thoughts and see patterns for research. But Hermione figured it couldn't hurt to ask since no one else seemed to have one.
A/N:
Humuhumunukunukuapua'a is the state fish of Hawaii, pronounced hoo-moo-hoo-moo-nu-koo-nu-koo-ah-pooh-ah-ah. It is an aggressive reef triggerfish with a pig-like snout.

There is a song called “Every Little Piece from the movie, Pete's Dragon. I borrowed a line from the lyrics: "It's money, money, money by the pound..."
There is a link where you can listen to the song without video here: http://disney.wikia.com/wiki/Every_Little_Piece?file=Pete%27s_Dragon_-_Every_Little_Piece American testing for college entrance exams are called SAT's for Scholastic Aptitude Test. The wizarding population adopted a similar acronym so witches and wizards could complain about their SAT’s and Muggles would be none the wiser.

Zhubanysh is a Kyrgyz girl's name meaning "comforter."

Thank you, Wikipedia, for being an invaluable resource. Here is their page on the Kyrgyz language: http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Kyrgyz_language
Chapter Summary

Hermione views two key memories, and gets invited to meet other Potions masters. Severus is still adjusting to his new life in a new country, and receives his own invitation for a bit of regular socializing.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Seventy-Nine
"English Tea and Old Memories"

Disclaimer:
I can't write no good disclaimer
I can't write no good disclaimer
'Cause I try and I try and I try and I try
I can't write no, I can't write no
With Rowling owning Potter
And her tweets comes on the Internet
She's writing more and more
About some Cursed Child play
Adding to canon every day

I can't write no, oh no, no, no
A hey, hey, hey, that's what I disclaim

A/N: Disclaimer a parody of “Satisfaction,” by the Rolling Stones.

It figured the last person Hermione thought to ask if they had a Pensieve was Lavender. The magical object was expensive, and the common perception was only academic types had one in order to help organize their thoughts. She knew Lavender had the money to afford one, but Hermione did not perceive her as the type to require it for mental matters.

When Hermione asked if she could borrow it for some memories Severus left behind which might exonerate his and Draco's name, her boss was more than happy to lend it for as long as she needed it. First, though, Lavender needed to clear out a few memories she kept stored in it.
Hermione wondered if one of those memories was of Bascom Nettleton, since Hermione asked Lavender why the owner of the Mercury Broom Company wasn't at the wedding. Ron and Bascom had become rather chummy over the months and it surprised her he wasn't there. Lavender admitted to Hermione that Bascom and she had been on intimate terms when she first left Hogwarts, and it was not an amicable parting. When Ron had initially invited Bascom and Dagmar to the wedding, Lavender had to inform her husband-to-be of her prior involvement with Bascom. Needless to say, Ron had since been spending far less time with the Nettletons upon learning such news.

When Hermione showed up to work one morning, the stone bowl was waiting for her on a part of her desk which was not covered in books, scrolls, and sheaves of parchment. It was all she could do to concentrate on her current project for Albert and Lavender – researching a potion for longer and thicker eyelashes without turning the witch into looking like a camel. Four-inch eyelashes were a bit too long for anyone who was not of the Camelus genus.

After her work for the day finished up, she rushed back home to fetch the box Severus had left her for Christmas.

Once back in her office, she locked her door and cast a few security spells. Hermione did not want to be disturbed, even though Albert and Lavender had already gone for the day.

Holding up the red-capped vial, she watched the silvery threads of the memory float languidly, its sultry dance within its glass confines belying the turbulent thoughts contained within.

After pouring the contents of the vial into Lavender's Pensieve, she leaned forward and let herself be pulled into the memory.

Initially disoriented, having only been in a Pensieve memory once before, Hermione recognized she was in a corridor at Hogwarts near the Infirmary. Hearing the familiar clack of boot heels on the stone floor, Hermione turned and saw Severus and Draco walking down the corridor towards her.

Severus was clad in his old frock coat and billowing black robes. Draco followed slightly behind and to his right, dressed in all black as well, in a full woolen cloak. The blond wizard was at his full adult height, but had not filled out yet, looking more like a frightened willowy boy than a young man. The Head of Slytherin was looking gaunt and stern, looking older than when Hermione met him again years later than of this memory.
As the wizards took long strides down the dimly lit corridor, Hermione ran to keep up as they entered the infirmary.

Madam Pomfrey greeted the pair, looking stricken and nervous. "I've contacted St. Mungo's for a Healer. It seems that this is beyond even my capabilities," the school nurse fretted. "They said it may take a while since there was another attack and they are quite busy right now. He asked for you and Mr. Malfoy immediately, Professor."

They crossed the infirmary to an area partitioned off with cloth-sheathed dividers. Normally, Poppy would have shooed any visitors away, but even she seemed to sense that time was short for the Headmaster and there was something important he needed to say. She did not tell Severus to keep it brief and let him rest like she did with most visitors who came to see her charges.

Hermione followed in behind Severus and Draco as they entered the semi-private area. It was then she realized that she was witnessing the last known memory of Dumbledore’s. Severus had told her that he was the last person to speak to Dumbledore alive, which is why suspicion was cast so heavily upon him and Draco regarding Dumbledore's death and its unfortunate timing before the attack on Hogwarts.

Recalling the date, she remembered where she was at the time of this particular memory. It was June 26th, 1999. She, Harry, and Ron were looking for Wormtail, trying to get him to make good on his wizard's debt to Harry for sparing his life in the Shrieking Shack.

The school was officially closed for the summer, but for this one instance, Dumbledore let as many students stay who desired do so. He had been approached by many parents to have someplace safe for their children to stay, when so many Death Eater attacks were happening all over the country.

In the memory, Dumbledore was sitting up in bed looking far frailer and older than the last time she had seen him, which was three days prior to this memory. It looked like he was trying to hold on to life, but it was stealing from his grasp as grains of sand slip easily through one's fingers.

"Severus, Draco," the old Headmaster gasped, his voice brittle and dry. He reached out a papery thin hand that looked as white as the ghosts that haunted the halls of Hogwarts. Blue veins stood out prominently, raised up from the back of his hand, contouring over the bones.

"Headmaster, we came as soon as I heard you called for us," Severus said, looking grave, his forehead etched with concern.
Draco said nothing. His eyes were wide with worry. Hermione could tell what he was thinking, as she had thought the same thing that was plainly written on the younger wizard's face.

"If Dumbledore dies before the end of this war, will we lose?"

Sybill Trelawney’s prophecy may have been about the war being fought in the end between Harry and Voldemort, but without Dumbledore, could the Order still stand against the Death Eaters?

In time, it bore out that it did, and Harry won in the end. But at the time, the future was dark and nebulous.

"I have a mission for you and Draco," Dumbledore said, his voice barely above a raspy whisper. "I need you to go to the orphanage where Tom Riddle was born and lived. Just as he used the gravesite of his father for his regeneration, I believe that there is something significant about the gravesite of his mother."

Dumbledore coughed. Severus offered the Headmaster a glass of water, but he declined for the moment.

Continuing with his request, Dumbledore said, "I have sought for many clues and items that might help Harry defeat Voldemort over the years."

Severus winced and Draco flinched at the mentioning of the Dark Lord's name, but Dumbledore would not use a euphemism. The Headmaster believed in using the name in order to remove the fear from it.

"I believe that there is something buried at the gravesite of his mother. She kept her married name of Riddle, though Tom Riddle Sr. divorced her. Just as her death was the impetus for Tom Riddle Jr. to abandon his humanity, I hope there is something tied to his humanity that he left at her gravesite. I hope it will help Harry defeat him."

"Headmaster, are you certain there is something there? And if so, what do you think it might be?" Severus asked.

"I am not certain of anything, Severus, except that what ails me is nothing that can be cured by Poppy or even the Healers of St. Mungo’s. There is no cure for time, and even Time-Turners..."
should not be used to delay the inevitable. As for Merope's gravesite, I do not know if it will yield anything or not. You and Draco must go since I cannot. Some of the far-fetched hints have yielded promising clues as to how to defeat Voldemort, and some of the most encouraging have resulted in nothing. But you must go and soon."

"What if we can't find her grave?" Draco asked.

"Severus knows where the orphanage is where Tom Riddle grew up. I have seen her grave and know it is there. I have been unwilling to desecrate it, until now. Time is short. I know the final battle will come in four days’ time."

"How can you be so sure?" Severus' face became etched with even more worry.

"June 30th was the night of the prophecy. Tom will seek to bring about its completion on its anniversary." Dumbledore gave Severus a piercing stare. "You remember that night, Severus. Do you not?"

Even with the Headmasters' frailty, it made Severus nearly cower knowing he was the one who had told the Prophecy to the Dark Lord, before he became a spy for the Order. It was after Severus told the Dark Lord of the prophecy that he was forced to kill his wife, Gabrielle. It took the death of his wife for him to change allegiances. Hearing the news of Lily being targeted by the Dark Lord, it only strengthened his resolve to fight against those he’d once aligned himself with.

"Yes, I remember," Severus croaked, hanging his head in shame. Hermione had already heard about how Severus had relayed the prophecy to Voldemort a long time ago.

"Then you must go now, as Harry, Ron and Hermione will need you most during the final battle to come. Protect Ron and Hermione as much as you would protect Harry, as he needs them by his side to help him in the end. Should they fall, so might his resolve."

"I promise I will do my best," Severus vowed.

"And I, Headmaster," Draco added.

Hermione thought she might have seen Draco during the final battle casting a deflection spell which might have hit Ron, but she wasn't sure until now. Upon hearing his promise to Dumbledore to protect them, she was certain of it. Draco may have actually saved Ron, but never made mention of it.

"Then you must go now," the aged wizard commanded. Draco made to leave, but Dumbledore's hand shot out and grasped Severus by the sleeve.

Just then the memory ended. It seemed like there was more memory to come, but Hermione found herself back in her office wondering what Dumbledore was going to say next. There was proof that Dumbledore told Severus to go and leave Hogwarts. However, there was also no proof that Severus did not poison the Headmaster, resulting in his death, as some of the accusations insinuated.

Severus was the last known person to speak with Albus Dumbledore, as Madam Pomfrey had found the Headmaster passed away in his sleep when next she checked on him a few hours later.

Pulling the memory from the liquid substance in the Pensive's bowl, Hermione put the memory away in the red-capped vial before pulling out the one with the blue cap. She had a feeling that the memory continued on from there with the second one, since the first one ended so abruptly.

Once the memory from the blue-capped vial was in the Pensieve, she let herself be pulled once more into the rune-rimmed bowl.

She was correct. The memory picked up from where the last one ended. Dumbledore had a tight grip on the edge of Severus' sleeve.

"A moment with Professor Snape alone, if you please, Mr. Malfoy," the Headmaster requested.

Draco bowed his head and left the enclosed area, parting with a respectful, "Of course, Headmaster."

Once the echo of Draco's boots signaled that he had left the infirmary, Albus let out a small grunt of discomfort.

"Headmaster!" Severus sensed his mentor was suffering.
Dumbledore waved his hand dismissively, having more important things to discuss than a few aches and pains.

"Severus, I must tell you something, and you must pay careful attention."

Severus and Hermione both leaned in closer.

"Should Voldemort win, and should you and Draco have been found to be spies for me, you must seek sanctuary. There you will be safe where no one can hurt you any longer." Albus winced once more and coughed.

Dumbledore's face got a very faraway look, as he began to recall, "When Grindelwald fell, some of his top followers fled for sanctuary. I followed them and tried to bring them back. Unfortunately, the magic imbued into this sanctuary is so powerful that each attempt I had to bring one particular wizard back resulted in me being transported to a location more and more dangerous; the last time I was transported to the edge of the volcano's caldera. It was then I realized nothing I did could allow me to bring these followers of Grindelwald to justice. They had been granted sanctuary. And if we fail, so must you and Draco find sanctuary."

"But where is this sanctuary, Headmaster?" Severus asked.

"Malu Palekaiko, a magical island hidden from Muggles. An island that is part of the chain of Hawaiian Islands in the middle of the Pacific Ocean." Dumbledore gave a bittersweet smile before turning his gaze back to Severus.

"There is no place called Hawaii, and certainly no place like that in the middle of the Pacific, Headmaster," Severus corrected him.

"Or so you think, Severus." Even on death's doorstep, there was that damn twinkle in Dumbledore's eye. "After I was unable to bring back Grindelwald's followers, I began a very thorough and systematic erasing of any mention of Hawaii and Malu Palekaiko from all of British wizarding society. Books, maps, news articles, anything, everything. I even petitioned other governments to do the same. Though some of the European Ministries joined in my efforts, other countries did not, especially the United States, since Hawaii was one of their territories at the time. I didn't want any more of Grindelwald's followers finding out and following on to Malu Palekaiko and reforming their army there. And when Voldemort fell the first time, I felt vindicated in my erasure of this part of the world from our society's memory. I had erased the memory of this place of refuge from the minds of all witches and wizards through mass memory charms, omission, and eradication of knowledge," Dumbledore admitted, now looking more like he was filled with regret than triumph.
"Little did I suspect that Albania, a place with no sanctuary, would be the starting ground for the second rise of Voldemort." Dumbledore sighed wearily. "If you seek Muggle sources, you will be able to learn more about Hawaii, but be careful. There are those few who still know about Malu Palekaiko, like Moody who I told, should he need to stop Death Eaters from reaching Hawaii. And should he know that I told you, he might seek to erase that memory from you."

Now the prohibition of Death Eaters leaving England without special permission made all that much more sense to Hermione. The revocation of Severus and Draco's Apparition license, as one could Apparate to another country that hadn't erased the memory of Malu Palekaiko from the wizarding collective conscience, the restriction to travel. Everything.

"Should you and Draco be persecuted, flee, my boy. Go to Malu Palekaiko and make a new life for yourself there. I promise you will find peace and happiness there. A chance for a new beginning for you both," the old Headmaster vowed.

Hermione repeated the name of the island to herself in order to help commit it to memory. She could come back to view this memory as many times as she needed, but when it was done, she would look for Hawaii and the island that granted sanctuary.

Dumbledore stopped and broke into a fit of coughing. His hand stretched out to the glass of water Severus had offered him before. The Potions master handed the glass to the Headmaster who took a small sip, helping his cough subside.

"A bit of lemon, Severus" Dumbledore requested, gesturing over to the lemon cut in half resting on the bedside table.

Severus grabbed it and offered to squeeze a bit of juice into his water.

Dumbledore shook his head and said, "No, allow me," insisting on doing it himself, using his wand to extract the juice.

As the drops of juice fell into the glass, he said, "Now you must go. Time is of the essence, Severus."

"Yes, Headmaster," Severus said as he bowed and exited.
Hermione watched Severus leave in a swirl of black robes before finding herself once more in her office.

Running to a world atlas of magical plants she had, she opened the book up to the map of Oceania. There was the continent of Australia, the islands of New Zealand, Papua New Guinea, New Caledonia, the Solomon Islands, Tonga, Micronesia, French Polynesia, the Marshall Islands, the Northern Marianas, Fiji, Vanuatu, and the Equatorial Islands – but no Hawaiian Islands. Moving to a map showing more of the North Pacific, she saw the Japanese Islands of Hokkaido, Honshu, Shikoku and Kyushu, in addition to the Alaskan Aleutian Islands chain stretching over a thousand miles across the northern Pacific. There were the Midway Islands, but that was the only thing on this map in the middle of the Pacific. Another map of the Southern Pacific towards the east showed the Pitcairn Islands, the Galapagos Islands, and Easter Island. Being Muggle-born, she had heard of the Hawaiian Islands before, but suddenly realized she hadn't thought of the place in many years.

Hermione had heard her parents lament once that on their year-long trip to the United States the only places they didn't visit that they wish they had gone were to Alaska and Hawaii. They said something about a six-hour flight from the West Coast, so that meant that it was far from the mainland.

Another book which included a world map showed no listing for Hawaii. Hermione wasn't sure where to look in the Pacific, since the memory of Dumbledore said it was in the middle of the Pacific, but he didn't exactly give any latitude or longitude coordinates.

There was one more memory Hermione could view, but she decided her curiosity was getting the better of her. She could not devote her full attention to the memory Severus left for her until she found a map with Hawaii on it.

After rushing home to secure her box of memories from Severus, Hermione threw on her best Muggle-like clothes, including the purse her mother had given her, and Floo’ed directly to the Leaky Cauldron. She could have ran there, but decided to save five minutes. She wanted to reach the Muggle bookstore before it closed. Fortunately, the bookshop she took Ginny to before was not far away. She just hoped they were still open.

Reaching the bookstore, she glanced at the store hours posted on the door and noted she had half an hour before closing time.

Hermione's eyes scanned the section titles in desperation, until she found the area she was looking for.
Arriving in the travel section, she found a map posted on the wall nearby. She began looking about, her finger grazing over the laminated paper, until she found it.

"There you are," she whispered triumphantly.

Her finger found the small island chain located just east of the International Date Line, and just barely south of the Tropic of Cancer. It was rather prominent, compared to many of the other islands in the Pacific that were listed in the first book she’d looked through back at her office.

It was quite amazing that Dumbledore had single-handedly made a land mass of this particular size disappear from the minds of British wizarddom, but then again, without books and maps, how could one know anyway about much of anything. There could have been stories, but she wondered if Dumbledore had erased the memories of those who knew about the place as well. Could one wizard cast an Oblivious Spell on all of wizarding Great Britain? If anyone could do it, it could only be Dumbledore who could have pulled it off.

Going over to the bookshelves packed with travel guides, she found a few books on Hawaii and pulled them out. Scanning through the pages, she saw beautiful tropical flowers, palm trees lining white-sand beaches, and smiling friendly faces of people presenting trays of tropical fruits in welcome. A time difference chart showed that Hawaii was eleven hours behind London time. A glance at the store's clock said it was nearly quarter to eight, which meant that where Severus was, it was quarter to nine in the morning.

A quick F.A.Q. guide showed local temperatures indicating it was much warmer, which made Hermione wonder if Severus was still clinging to long sleeves and using cooling charms, or did he adopt some of the local attire shown in the travel guide, notably, Hawaiian shirts and shorts. Hermione wondered how different wizarding fashion in Hawaii was from the Muggle population. She couldn't imagine Severus in a Hawaiian shirt and shorts. It was incongruent with the wizard she knew.

A chime rang out over the loudspeaker. She heard the announcement that the store was closing soon, and shoppers should bring all purchases up to the front. Hermione cursed herself for not having any Muggle money with her. She made a promise to convert some of her money to Muggle currency tomorrow during her lunch break, and to come back at the end of the day. She just hoped the house-elves weren't serving poached salmon for lunch, since she really did enjoy that particular lunch selection.

Rising at the crack of dawn, Severus donned his swim trunks, a shirt, a pair of flip-flops, and a towel over his shoulders. He headed down to the shoreline for a morning swim before eating breakfast and opening his business. He found that if he worked off some of his pent-up sexual energy first thing in the morning with a rigorous swim, he was much less likely to snap at his customers, students, and Draco during the day.

For some reason, the ocean seemed to drain a lot of energy from him so that he didn't walk around taut as a wire and just as ready to snap. Since coming to Malu Palekaiko, he had become much more relaxed, but that feeling of calmness was beginning to wane the longer he was away from Hermione.

He didn't want to regain his reputation of an irritable and brusque person, since people on this small island had been very friendly and respectful of him. They had no preconceived notions of the Potions master or his reputation that was known among the British wizarding population. Severus liked the fact that people on the street smiled at him and didn't dart their eyes in suspicion or fear of him. Even among those who knew him well back in England and at Hogwarts, there was a standoffishness that people had towards him, especially given his dark and troubled history. Malu Palekaiko was a place where Severus could reinvent himself, become the person he could have become had life been different and a bit more kind to him.

But missing Hermione, and the copious amounts of sex they used to enjoy, was bringing back some of the old habits of his irascible temperament, which required daily exercise to keep his temper in check.

Walking back to the hotel after a long swim, Severus waved to the shopkeepers who opened early and greeted him with a friendly "Aloha."

In the shower, after rinsing off the sand and salt from his body, he usually had a good wank to take any further edge off. After he toweled off, he dressed in a long pair of cotton trousers, closed-toe shoes, and a short-sleeved shirt.

After a breakfast of fruit, toast, and coffee, he would go to his shop to open for the day. Draco would usually arrive shortly after him.

The schedule had become much more manageable as of late, with half the day filled with tutoring in fifteen- to thirty-minute increments, and small thirty- to ninety-minute-long Potions classes, of five to eight students, since there wasn't enough time in the day to hold individual Potion brewing sessions. The small class size, without the House rivalry involved, allowed Severus to cover more material in a shorter amount of time with more personal instruction. In addition, he grouped children based on skill level, not age, which seemed to make the environment more conducive to learning. The former professor found the experience much more rewarding and the children more attentive, since he didn't have to monitor a class of about twenty – when who knew what catastrophe would occur for the minute or two he had his back turned.
One policy he had to institute was a clothing policy for the children. For brewing, students were to wear either long trousers, a long skirt that went past their knees or a long sarong. Closed-toe shoes were also a requirement, with stockings to protect the calves if the child was wearing a skirt or sarong. Work robes were always to be worn. Severus found that most of the children didn't have proper robes or gloves, so he had some made and incorporated use of them into his tutoring fees. Another expense was that he used a local laundry, run by a free elf, to wash the black cotton robes and gloves the children spilled experiments on all day long, as well as his own. Potions – spilled on bare skin – could prove to be most... corrosive at times. Severus made the dress code requirements mandatory after one child, who didn't heed his warning to come in proper shoes, lost a toe that had to be re-attached at the local clinic. Some children started bringing their own gloves and robes as time wore on, especially since Severus tended to keep his shop a bit on the cool side with cooling charms.

The other half of his day was filled with consultations and requests for commissions. There were very few evening and weekend appointments. He had a few vampires who commissioned him for an additive to pigs' blood to keep it close to body temperature without spoiling and make it taste more like human blood.

These hours allowed Severus to have more free time to explore the island, collecting ingredients and scoping out potential places where he'd like to build a house.

Manny, his real estate agent, couldn't find anything regarding Severus' specific needs. The agent suggested he buy some land and build, since the only other thing to do was wait for someone to die or move away before anything else would come onto the market, and Severus had seen every available house out there on the island. Severus even considered buying two parcels of land, one close to town and another on the western side of the island which tended to be much drier and in the rain-shadow of the volcano. The extra parcel of land would be an ideal spot to grow Mediterranean plants that didn't like it where the town was located. Any extra ingredients, he could ship to the other apothecaries on the other Hawaiian Islands. The town was located more along the south side of the island and was quite wet, but not as drenched as the east side of the island, which received rain every day and was a tropical rain forest.

Arriving at work one morning, Draco wore a big smile.

"Guess what I've got?" Draco asked in a sing-song voice.

Severus wanted to say something snide, like "The wizarding clap?" but held his tongue. He was getting tired of living at the hotel and wanted a place of his own that afforded him a bit more privacy and room. Also, the fact he still wasn't quite satisfied with a long swim and a wank that morning meant that it was going to be a long day.
"Tea!" trilled Draco, producing a tin of loose leaf tea.

Severus snorted, disbelieving Draco would find this exciting news. He had drunk the crap they tried to pass off as tea here. He had decided he would stick with coffee, until he could grow his own tea.

"It's from England!" Draco added in the same sing-song voice.

Severus stopped and reached over, snatching the tin from Draco's hand like a greedy, grabby child to look at it. He tried to remove the annoying plastic tape seal, getting fed up with the Muggle packaging and using his wand to remove it. Then he cracked open the top and inhaled deeply, feeling the tension seep away just from the scent of it.

"Where did you get this?" Severus asked in awe, coming out like a sigh of relief.

"Muggle run to the other islands," Draco informed him. "It seems that because there are some of us who cannot leave here without risk, there is a small niche service where this witch runs to the other islands to bring back wizarding and Muggle items not available here. Naomi, who runs the service, does a run once a week. She found a Muggle grocer who specializes in foreign food imports. Sauerkraut and pickles from Germany, sardines from Morocco, pastas and tomato sauces from Italy, and teas, condiments, and biscuits from England. Among other things."

Severus inhaled once more, his eyes fluttering shut before he exhaled once more, letting the scent envelop his senses. "Thank you," he breathed. It was Muggle tea, but it was still good British tea.

God, how he missed a good cup in the morning. Kona coffee was exquisite, but he was missing his habitual morning beverage.

Draco continued prattling on while Severus was lost in the smell of glorious tea. "She asked me if I wanted any of the tinned Scottish haggis next time she went back, and I told her I'd have to ask you. She gave me a list of all the British food items they stocked. They're all Muggle, but at least it will be pretty close to what we had at home, though I don't think they'll have any pumpkin juice or butterbeer. I did see Seville orange marmalade on the list."

"Count me in for a jar of marmalade on the next trip. How much do I owe you?" Severus asked, feel eternally grateful to Draco just at that moment.
"Consider it a gift. Anything to help improve your mood as of late is a gift," Draco noted dryly.

Severus knew he was getting a bit snappish lately, but he didn't want to apologize for it either. There was a small bit of grumbling in the back of Severus' throat as he took the tin to the back Potions lab and pulled out his good teapot which had already started collecting a little dust on the shelf.

Setting the kettle on, Severus offered a cup to Draco who politely declined. "I got a tin for Ginny and me, and I had three cups this morning already." This explained why Draco seemed a little more lively than usual.

The older wizard was ready to down a whole pot by himself, just to satisfy his withdrawal.

He didn't want to admit it, but there were things Severus was missing about England. After all those years of dreaming to get away, there were some things he was longing for. One was a butcher who could provide good lamb, since lamb didn't seem to be a popular meat for the locals. Pork, beef, chicken, and seafood were the bill of fare in Malu Palekaiko, though the butcher did say he could get some good American lamb from the mainland – and also from New Zealand – by Portkey, if Severus had something in mind.

Severus was unfamiliar with the differences between the lamb from either place, as he was used to good English and Scottish lamb raised on the green and lush pastures. He would have to get lamb from both and do a taste comparison with Draco and Ginny. Perhaps a good leg of lamb from each region with some freshly made mango chutney, since mangoes practically grew in nearly everyone's backyard and couldn't get any fresher. He could also get fresh ginger here, though it was better to use candied ginger in his recipe. Then again, depending on the time of year, spring happened at opposite ends of the calendar for America and New Zealand, so "spring" lamb might be available year-round.

It was not just the lamb, or the jammy thumb biscuits – which were called cookies in his new home – that he had to get used to either being different or called by a different name. Biscuits were not cookies, but in American lingo referred to Southern-style baked rolls. Crisps were called potato chips here. Chips were "French" fries – though chips were originally a Belgian dish. A jumper was a sweater. And everyone dropped their u's when spelling words like "color," "favor" and "humor." It made grading a frustrating process, as he had to stop marking certain spelling corrections on submitted homework.

Despite the downsides of Severus' new home, he was willing to learn to tolerate them since he was free, and there was no price one could put on freedom. A few idiosyncrasies from the locals and their customs were worth it. Then again, Hermione's voice in his head reminded him he was not entirely free if he could not go anywhere in the world that he pleased, free from persecution. As much as he missed Hermione and the comforts of home in England, he still preferred his freedom. He knew that if he'd stayed for her, in time he would resent her. Perhaps if she had secured his freedom, then there would have been no resentment for staying behind, but in the end, he knew that this new life was better for him. It was a fresh start.

As Severus finished his first cup of proper tea in nearly two months, Draco knocked on his office door.

"Your nine o'clock is here. And Ginny and I were wondering if you want to join us for drinks Friday night. We join Mouna and Rainbow at the bar on their Friday night date nights. Since you're not as busy with the shop in the evenings now, we wondered if you want to join?" Draco offered.

Severus' initial reaction was to say no, but then he thought that maybe relaxing with friends with a drink Friday night after a long work week might just be the thing he needed to help him remain more relaxed.

"All right. What time?"

"Six, at that bar where Rainbow blindsided you with that Wipe-Out drink."

"I never did figure out what that elusive ingredient was, since all those fruit flavors seemed to mask it," the Potions master admitted.

"Lovage macerated in vodka and essence of valerian," Draco volunteered.

Severus gave him a stunned look.

"I watched him make a couple of them over the weeks and paid him a few extra Galleons to find out what those 'secret ingredients' were."

That explained why Severus had been knocked for a loop. Lovage was used in Confusing and Befuddlement Draughts, and valerian root was used in the Draughts of Living Death. Add to that a generous tipple of multiple spirits acting as catalysts, it was no wonder Severus hadn't remembered much of anything and was gone by the second sip.

Draco could see the grim look on Severus' face, knowing a drink like that had been served up to him unknowingly.

"I think Rainbow wanted to see just how much you could hold your own, since she says that Potions masters are notorious for holding their liquor. And given how much I've seen you drink, I'd say that's a fair assessment," the blond wizard admitted.

It was a good thing Rainbow had otherwise been a good and gracious friend to Severus in all other respects, since that was a stunt he could hold a grudge against for a long time. He was almost willing to forgive her for that one transgression, but not quite. In time he might forgive, but he would never forget.

Severus' mind was brought back to the present when his nine o'clock appointment entered and sat down. It was a wizard who came in seeking help to reverse a home brew of his own to eliminate back-hair. It didn't go as planned, resulting in a thick and luxurious fur pelt on his back instead. The Potions master pinched the bridge of his nose, knowing he'd have to figure out what the wizard did wrong before he could reverse the potion's effects. Reverse engineering bad brewing was an exceptionally trying task, but he had enough experience with children doing it over the years, so it wouldn't be that hard.

~~~~~~~*~

Albert was showing Hermione the finer points of pruning trees for shape, growth, and fruit production. Apple trees had to be pruned in a particular way, since the trees did not fruit on vertical branches, but horizontal ones. In contrast, stone-fruit trees did better with a vase-shape pruning, allowing sunlight to enter the center of the tree to ripen the fruit.

Later that day, once she was done working on Albert's garden, Neville was going to show her grafting, which was essential for any Potions master to know. They would be grafting fruit trees onto rootstock.

Hermione was glad she didn't have to dig up any more spring perennials for dividing, since it took several hot baths and a few drops of soporhorous bean oil in almond oil to work out the kinks in her muscles and back after that chore. Her biceps would be screaming tonight, considering all the fruit trees she had to prune that morning.

She was sorely tempted to ask Lavender if she could get a discount for a massage at Madam Hope's Eternal Springs and Day Spa. Lavender was a silent partner there and closed the men's side down every month still for Blaise and Albert to test the latest products. Hermione couldn't get the same privilege as the men, and had to test the products at home by herself, as Lavender didn't want anyone at the spa to see or possibly steal one to sell to her competitors before it came to market. There was too much business with the women's side on the spa on weekends for them to close it, while the men were more than willing to have their side closed down once a month for "maintenance" without being put out, unlike some witches.

Albert had a small orchard of various fruit trees for his personal kitchen use and Potions ingredients. Apricot kernels were an exceptionally valuable Potions ingredient. While he could have easily used the ones imported from Iran, he preferred to grow his own, ensuring freshness. And peach blossoms were quite delicate and didn't transport very well, most often becoming bruised by the time they reached the apothecary. The Asian pears were of no use for Potions, but he liked the Asian varieties compared to that of the European pears for eating.

As Hermione pruned away, making sure to cut last year's growth to an outward-facing bud, directing growth from away the center of the tree, she wondered how much of the same work she was doing had Severus done during his own apprenticeship. And would he be growing any apple or stone-fruit trees in Hawaii? Since many of the fruit trees she worked on had a requirement of chill hours – during which the tree had to grow in conditions when it was exposed to hundreds of hours while dormant between zero and seven degrees Celsius in winter – she wondered if he would only grow tropical fruits in his Potions master garden there.

"So, Albert," Hermione began, "do all Potions masters have an orchard and grow orchids in a greenhouse like you? How typical is your garden compared to other Potions masters? What sort of things would one find in any Potions garden, and what in yours is unique?"

"Well, having visited other Potions masters' homes, I'd say each one is as unique as the Potion master... or mistress," Albert mused, pausing from pruning a large cherry tree. "I'm rather fond of fresh fruit and canning my own surplus in the summer and autumn. I'm also quite enthralled with the ability to cross-breed species of orchids, and experiment in Potions with the results of those hybrids. Some masters and mistresses have lots of greenhouses and grow other tropics. Mediterranean plants are a specialty of some, and then some grow alpine plants, or cacti and succulents. In time you'll figure out what plants you will tend to use for the types of Potions you prefer brewing, and the ingredients you want to grow yourself will indicate what you'll grow in your own garden come day."

Hermione nodded to herself, wondering what type of garden Reginald Chuff had and what plants Severus tended for his master.

"Speaking of other Potions masters, some of us get together for drinks once a month. I'd like to introduce you to my colleagues," Albert added. "It's a good way to talk with other masters and learn from them, as many are willing to give guidance to an apprentice of a fellow colleague who is within our little circle of friends."
"Of course," Hermione responded immediately, thrilled to be invited. "When is your next gathering?"

"Next Saturday, Valentine's Day. Unless you already have plans for that day," Albert looked at her, a little uncertain.

"No, Albert. Trust me, I have nothing planned for that holiday," she assured him, indicating with her tone she was still very much single and had no romantic interests on the horizon.

"Yeah, a few of the other masters still have wives and are bowing out, but there are a lot of us bachelors and widowers to still call a quorum," he joked. There would be no vote, but it was his way of indicating there would be enough people there to make it an interesting evening.

"Did Dangerose come to many of these gatherings?" Hermione asked, curious to know if his wife came along.

"Yes, she did," he replied with a faraway smile. "And she and Fastrada Johnson, your friend who replaced you at the Department of S&R, were good friends. They'd chat up a storm while I talked shop with her husband, Ganfrey, and the boys. But they usually wound up talking Potions like the rest of us, joining in the conversation."

It pleased Hermione that though the wives were not fully-accredited Potions mistresses, they were allowed to participate in the conversation as equals – at least that's how it seemed they were treated, by Albert's tone.

Hermione chatted the rest of the morning in Greek, practicing with Albert. She was getting more confident and comfortable with the language, and Neville's weekly Greek tutoring sessions during their work together was certainly helping.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: As always, thank you to my glorious betas for this chapter, JuneW and Cygnuz.

I know I said I wasn't going to use any canon from HBP and DH, but we knew beforehand that Tom Riddle's mother died, but we just did not know her name. So I will use her name which was revealed in HBP since it allows me to refer to her than just "his mother" for the story. Then there is the addition of the prophecy overheard by Severus, but I tried to backtrack that into the story somehow quietly.

There is speculation on the exact time of year the prophecy was overheard, so for the purposes of this story, I'm going to say it was June 30th, since that is when I wrote Victory Day to be.
“Missing Her, Missing Him, and a Narrow Miss”

Chapter Summary

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

Chapter Eighty:
“Missing Her, Missing Him, and a Narrow Miss”

Disclaimer: I'm a little fanfic, long and rambling,
Here is my plot, broad and ambling.
When lawyers get all steamed up,
Hear me blast:
Rowling owns it all
Don't sue my ass

WARNING: Minor character death and description of a murder scene (one paragraph) towards end of this chapter. I can't send all of you comfort food, but I can at least offer a recipe for a comfort food favorite. Don't forget to scroll to the author's notes at the end for a new recipe.

==============

Severus mostly enjoyed himself that first Friday for drinks with the Finaus and the Malfoys. Most everyone drank their alcohol laced with various fruit juices, flavored liqueurs, and crushed ice, except him. Eventually he was convinced to try a Muggle drink called an “Old Fashioned” which used Bourbon whiskey, bitters, a pinch of sugar, a splash of water, a maraschino cherry, and a slice of orange over ice. Though he preferred his spirits straight, Severus did find this rather refreshing in the tropical climate. While gin and tonic would have been a British gentleman's drink in hot climates, even in the wizarding world, he still was not too keen on gin after the bender he went on the night of Hermione's anniversary dinner. For good reason, that spirit had not quite appealed the same to him since.

The following week found Severus joining his friends for a drink after he closed up shop on Friday. He made sure to go to the bar on a full stomach. As diverse as the dining scene in London was, this small island contained a number of new cuisines he hadn't been exposed to back in wizarding England. A Korean restaurant that Severus had taken a liking to was open a few days a week. They had a very good tofu soup they served with black rice that was more purple than black. It had a nice nutty flavor to it he liked. And besides, the banchan – or side dishes – were worth the trip to the restaurant alone. They served kimchi so spicy that it could clear out even Severus’ prodigious sinuses, as well as fishcake, glass noodles, steamed broccoli, pickled daikon radish and lotus root, turnips in chili sauce, chilled steamed bean sprouts with sesame oil, and seaweed with sweet vinegar and salt. Severus was also able to practice his paltry Korean with the waitress in an effort to improve his vocabulary, which expanded with each trip to the restaurant, though it usually involved learning new food names.

Severus entered the bar to find Arnold leaning against the piano, already belting out an Elvis tune accompanied by a pianist who was banging away on the piano keys. Maurice, a Cajun wizard who had fled for sanctuary back in the sixties – after getting himself involved with some Muggle war protest groups and using his magic in some “anti-establishmentarianism ways” – played the accordion. A witch who was clearly old enough to be Severus’ grandmother was strumming away on a guitar.

After ordering an Old Fashioned from Bongo, Severus joined the Finaus and the Malfoys, who were already half-way through their first round of drinks.

“Severus!” Mounga called out, spotting his friend. The big man clapped Severus on the back.

“So is every Friday date night?” Severus asked.

“Yes, gotta keep the passion alive, can’t let the drudgery of day-to-day let me forget why I fell in love with Rainbow,” Mounga said, grabbing his wife around the waist and jostling her with a hug and a pat on the hip.

“So what, just drinks out?” Severus asked, wondering if this was all there was to their weekly “date night” night out.

“Of, no!” Rainbow refuted. Leaning in, she said in a conspiratory whisper, “Sometimes we go out for a movie or theater show amongst the Muggles, but we go to a little hot spring after drinks most times. Moonlight, a waterfall, secluded. We share it with a few other friends. We’ve decided to let Draco and Ginny have Monday nights, and they just started going to it.”

“I didn’t know there were any hot springs on this island, since I haven’t come across any in my explorations,” Severus admitted. This revelation made him realize why Draco had looked exceptionally relaxed on Tuesday mornings during the past few weeks.
Mounga leaned in and quietly said, “That's because they are mostly held under the Fidelius Charm, passed down through families. People don't necessarily want to have their little spots overrun with others crowding them and ruining secluded romantic spots. Plus if word got out to the tourists... Usually folk share with a small circle of friends and arrange to have certain nights. Since the hot spring was handed down to me from my father, and I'm the Secret Keeper, I get first pick. Wednesdays are available if you want some place to soak one night a week.”

Severus nodded his head that he was definitely interested.

“Fine, you can follow Rainbow and me after drinks. We'll show you where it is, and you can start visiting it Wednesday nights.”

The night was spent chatting about various things. Mounga had a legal conference he needed to go to at the end of the month in Nevada, in a wizarding town in the middle of nowhere. It was an area often associated with space aliens. Setting up a wizarding village where the Muggle military helps keep nosy people away was definitely one way to keep Muggles from discovering your magical town and community. Then there was the Finau family trip in the summer to Germany to visit the village where one of Rainbow's great-grandmothers came from, plus do a little genealogical research.

Severus gave Rainbow and Mounga an update on their son's progress with Potions tutoring, and put forth the idea to Mounga about a standardized curriculum to guide parents to follow so that their children would be better prepared for their SAT's. Draco chimed in with his own observations on the irregularity of knowledge from child to child, even of the same age. Severus could tell Mounga was seriously considering his idea, since he got that very thoughtful look on his face as he silently nodded.

The Potions master had gone to court once so far in his time on the island, having to testify that a particular witch had been in his office seeking a private consultation. She was being accused of a small crime, but Severus was her alibi at the time of the crime. Severus had his appointment book and ledger as evidence to her whereabouts, and the witch was not in possession of a Time-Turner. Mounga had listened to the case and had the same serious look on his face, and nodded his head in the same manner, as he weighed the evidence and considered the testimony. In the end, the witch was found innocent.

“That is something worth serious consideration,” Mounga replied, which gave Severus hope it might come up at the next town council meeting.

Arnold was back up by the piano again, crooning yet another Elvis song. Granted, Elvis Presley was a Muggle savant, and known by many in the wizarding community, but even Severus was perplexed by Arnold's fascination with the singer.

“Does Arnold always sing Elvis songs?” Severus asked, gesturing to the older, balding Potions master with the slight paunch.

“Oh, Arnold never told you?” Rainbow asked, her eyes changing color from dark blue to bright golden with mischief.

“Told me what?” Severus asked cautiously. He wasn't sure he wanted to know if Arnold had not told him himself. He respected other people's private matters, a polar opposite compared to Rainbow, who was always eager to share everything she knew about everyone.

“He never told you why he sought sanctuary?” she prodded.

“No, and should he choose to divulge that to me, I will let him be the one to tell it,” Severus said shortly.

Rainbow's head jerked back in shock. Mounga hid a smile behind his hand, having rarely seen anyone shut his wife down when it came to opening her mouth.

“Well, I-I just...” she began to stammer.

Draco and Ginny could feel the tension mounting, and Mounga looked like he wasn't going to do a thing to step in. Draco knew Severus' temper and was familiar with his verbal lashings first-hand. He didn't think Rainbow had the fortitude to deal with a full-frontal verbal assault from Severus, should he feel provoked. And given the glint in Severus' eye, he could tell that his mentor was getting fed up with this witch's mouth that tended to run off a bit too much for discretion.

It would not be good for anyone should these two square off against one another. Draco knew he needed to diffuse the situation, and fast.

“Akela's Charms and Transfiguration work is coming along nicely. I think she will receive exceptionally good marks when she takes her SAT's eventually,” Draco remarked, noticing that the subject of Akela brought Rainbow's attention away from the near-confrontation as her gaze shifted to the young wizard and back to her family. “She hadn't told me what she is interested in studying.
Has she expressed what subject she would like to pursue for an apprenticeship?

Rainbow dramatically placed her elbow on the bar and plopped cheek into her hand. Her eyes opened wide with sarcastic flare and said, over-enunciating while giving Severus a meaningful look, “Potions.”

Severus could have sworn Rainbow's eyes changed to three different colors just during those two syllables.

Lifting his drink up to his lips, tempted to down it in one go, he muttered, “It's probably just a phase.”

“Let's hope so,” Rainbow bit back.

Arnold and Ranjit had never taken any apprentices over the decades. In addition, it was common knowledge about how many single Potions masters wound up bedding and usually marrying their female apprentices. This was something that Severus was somewhat guilty of himself with his work with Hermione, though they had already fallen into the sack before she began her work with him.

Severus had no interest in taking Akela as an apprentice, and even if he did, there was certainly nothing romantic that would ever happen between them. Ever. Besides, Severus didn't think he could stand the idea of a mother-in-law who was nearly ten years younger than him, who couldn't keep her mouth shut. If anything, if Akela was interested in a Potions apprenticeship, he'd see if there was a Potions Mistress back in England who was interested in a female apprentice.

“Why not let Severus tutor her?” Ginny suggested, which garnered looks of shock from Draco, Severus, and Rainbow. “Trust me, anyone who had studied under Severus, who can be a hard taskmaster when it comes to brewing, would certainly lose any interest when faced with his demeanor in the classroom.” Draco smirked at the thought and Rainbow's face began to brighten, seeing the wisdom of Ginny's idea. Severus could only glare daggers at Ginny.

Severus had been exceptionally patient with his new students who patronized his business, and took exception to Ginny's old characterizations of him, though they were rather accurate.

“It's true, Severus,” Ginny insisted, looking him square in the face; he noted she left out any mention of Hermione, since she seemed to be the exception to the rule. “One verbal dressing down by you, and she will definitely not be interested in a Potions apprenticeship.”

Severus looked at Mounga, knowing the larger wizard could read the look on his face.

“Hey, if taking your kid gloves off with her will help Akela get over her infatuation, then fine,” Mounga offered, throwing his hands up in surrender.

Akela's parents didn't want to destroy her crush on Severus, but they felt it a tad inappropriate for a girl so young to be attracted to someone so much older, especially one who was not interested in her that way. Severus thought of her like a niece, especially since Kaimi, Akela's younger sister, had started calling him “Uncle Severus.” The Potions master had been unceremoniously adopted into the Finau family. And given that Mounga knew all of Severus' secrets, as a father, he certainly didn't want his daughter to remain too attached to him as well.

It was still quite the surreal experience for Akela's parents to openly discuss their daughter's infatuation with Severus.

A second round of drinks were ordered.

“So, Severus, are you going to the Singletons' Ball tomorrow night at the community center?” Rainbow asked, slowly nursing her drink, a dragon blood wine spritzer. Since coming to Malu Palekaiko, Severus had shunned all advances of the single witches on the island, and her curiosity was getting the better of her.

“No,” he replied firmly. Severus didn't even bother looking her in the eye, instead choosing to acknowledge the question with no more than a simple one-word response.

“Aw, c'mon, it's for charity,” she cajoled him. “A single wizard like you, half the single witches in this town chasing after you, you'd fetch a handsome price.”

Severus glanced at Mounga, who gave him that fleeting look he had on his face when the larger wizard would otherwise say, “I can't say anything, dude.”

Draco, Ginny and Severus had heard about the charity event in which the unattached witches and wizards, who were at least age of consent, got together on Valentine's Day for a ball. Some – from both sexes – offered themselves up for bidding of a date that night or a future night, in order to help raise money for various causes. At the auction, items were also offered up for bidding, and many items were donations from the community at large.

One of the places the money raised would go for was the cost of maintenance of the community center. Another place was for a fund for sanctuary-seekers who came to the island without any money. Draco, Ginny, and Severus were fortunate to have money, while many who came did not. The monies for the fund were used to house, feed, and clothe sanctuary-seekers and help them get back on their feet. There was also a fund for helping children whose parents could not afford to send them to the mainland for their SAT's, which usually involved staying the night in a nearby wizarding hotel, food, and other travel costs. There was also a widows and orphans charity, and a few others.

Draco had offered some blocks of time for Charms and Transfiguration tutoring, which – considering most of the single witches and wizards attending had no children – would most probably fetch a small price, or someone might bid on it for their niece or nephew.

The Potions master had not offered his time, but elixirs. All of them tended to be more advanced potions that required a great deal of time and expensive ingredients, including a few vials of the ones that were being sold at The Sirens' Secrets. It was Valentine's Day, and those types of potions might fetch a good price at the auction that night, especially by a wizard who thought he was definitely going to get lucky. Severus thought many of the charities were worthy causes, which is why he bothered to donate the potions in the first place. Had it not been for Draco having Galleons in other Gringotts banks around the world, Severus himself would have been in need of the Sanctuary-Seekers' Charity Fund.

Severus glanced at Draco, gauging just how uncomfortable he was with the subject of people offering themselves up for money, and noticed the younger wizard's jaw clench a little. The two Slytherins had closed that chapter of their lives permanently. Ginny was also looking mildly irritated at the subject, but was trying to not let her face give anything away.

“Madam,” Severus drawled coolly, “I find the idea of someone having their flesh peddled repugnant.”

Surprisingly, Mounga kept his face impassive in response to Severus' comment.

Rainbow scoffed, tossing her hand forward dismissively as if batting away his objections. “Pfft! It's not like we're running a prostitution ring. I didn't take you for a prude, Severus.”

Before Severus could reply and address Rainbow's dismissive attitude, Draco spoke up.
With restrained anger, Draco replied, “After the war, a former classmate of mine was ‘disenfranchised,’ and forced into prostitution. She was later found to be murdered in a most gruesome fashion, a murder that would not have happened had she not been driven into such a profession. This is not a subject Severus or I take lightly, Rainbow.”

Rainbow's eyes went wide with shock. “I had no idea,” she gasped.

“And your discretion on this matter is strongly suggested,” Severus added, glaring at Rainbow in full Death Eater-mode.

Severus could have sworn he saw Rainbow quail a little bit, getting a glimpse at how dangerous and formidable he could be if push came to shove.

The subject was dropped, and Rainbow's curiosity to ask why Severus wasn't dating any witches was tempered for the moment. Given how they had clashed twice in one night, the group silently decided to stick to less inflammatory subjects.

The tension finally began to ebb away between Rainbow, Draco, and Severus as they finished up their second round of drinks. It did not escape Severus' attentions that Mounga did not defend his wife when Severus called her out on her penchant for gossiping earlier in the evening. The larger wizard even looked bemused.

Draco and Ginny eventually excused themselves and wandered off into the night for a stroll before heading home. The Finaus and Severus walked to the edge of town before Mounga Side-along Apparated with Severus to the hidden hot springs while Rainbow Apparated by herself.

Looking about, it was pitch black. The stars were their only illumination since the last quarter-moon had not yet risen. They used wand-light to make their way up the embankment with lava stones set as a stairway into the hillside.

Mounga cast about some glowing orbs to float above the water to illuminate the area, and Severus saw the light reflected in the gentle ripples of the water. The softly-glowing light revealed the jungle that sheltered this area, enrobing it in a verdant tangled wall of wild vines and vegetation. Only from the middle of the hot spring, which was more of a hot pool, could you see the sky above.

The ripples were caused by a waterfall that spilled into the pool, cooling the magma-heated water to a wonderful 100 degrees F – up to a simmering 105 degrees F, depending on what part of the pool you soaked in. Severus was amazed that someplace so ideally perfect existed, looking as if this place was designed on purpose for lovers. It was truly romantic.

“This is amazing.” Severus said. “Wednesday, can I come here during the day to see what it looks like in the light?”

“Sure, all day Wednesday, starting from sunrise, until Thursday, just before dawn. There are a few of us who like a morning soak, just in case you arrive a little early or leave a bit late,” Mounga warned him.

Looking back across the slope of the volcano that gradually descended down to the seashore some distance away, Severus looked at the stars and gauged that he was somewhere along the north-eastern side of the island. Off in the distance, straight ahead was the Big Island, a few faint lights in the far distance indicating where the Muggles lived, unaware of this place.

Severus bent down and stuck his hand in the water, feeling the warmth. It was a perfect temperature. He made a mental note to tell Draco not to book any after-hours clients on Wednesday.

He thanked Mounga and Rainbow for their offer to enjoy this private spot before Apparating back to the hotel, so the Finaus could begin enjoying the rest of their date night alone.

Back in his hotel room awaited the photograph of Hermione.

“You should have seen it,” he said, imagining the conversation he would have had with her, had she been there. “Waterfall, lush foliage ensuring privacy, a Fidelius Charm to keep others from bothering us, perfect temperature, it was just as beautiful as those photos in those Muggle tourism books.”

Undressed and lying on his bed, the proper charms in place to avoid being overheard, Severus began stroking himself, thinking of Hermione's nude body standing in the pool near the edge. He could envision her skin glistening with beads of water catching and refracting the moonlight, a single white plumeria flower in her hair, placed on the left side signaling that she was a taken witch: his witch.

He sighed her name as he came, fantasizing about making love to her in the jungle at night. He wished she could be there with him to celebrate Valentine's Day tomorrow. As it was, his memory of her would be the only thing to fill his aching heart.

~~~~~~~*~

Hermione awoke to find herself surrounded by a pile of books on Hawaii. She had gone to the bookstore on Friday night and bought the large stack of books, then promptly fell asleep while reading them. Some of them were travel guides, others were on the culture of Hawaiian and Polynesian islands, and a few were “coffee table” books featuring beautiful photographs of some of the most breathtakingly gorgeous places in the Hawaiian Islands.

Lava tubes, lush tropical jungles, beaches with swaying palm trees, moonscape fields of recently-erupted lava cooled to a shiny and wrinkled black, papaya and coffee farms with rows of trees, jaw-droppingly beautiful waterfalls that poured into a series of pools with Muggles diving head-first into the cool looking waters, dry grassy lands surrounding a lava stone church built in the 1800's, and dark and seemingly impenetrable forests of bamboo. All these scenes and more filled the pages of the books she'd bought.

Gazing at one particularly tranquil photograph of a cascading waterfall and pool, edged with bright tropical flowers, Hermione imagined herself and Severus skinny-dipping there.

Reaching her hand down between her legs, she began to think of Severus, pressing her up against the side of the pool near the waterfall, the rush of water drowning out her cries as he filled her. Blindly reaching to her bedside table, Hermione grabbed a bottle of lube and a dildo the twins had given her months ago. After lubing it up, she inserted it into herself and set the charm to slide in and out of her. Her eyes shut tight, she could almost see the vivid colors surrounding her, the call of wild birds in the nearby forest, the scent of strange and exotic flowers in the air.

She sighed longingly, “I need you, Severus. God, how I've missed you.”

Stroking her clit, she tried to remember the sensation of his body between her thighs, the feeling of his skin moving against hers, his weight bearing down atop her as he moved into her.

Hermione came, but it was not quite as satisfying as she had hoped.

“Happy Valentine's Day, Severus,” she whispered to the pillow next to her.

Feeling more depressed than relaxed from her orgasm, Hermione dressed for the day. She would be working in Albert's garden that morning, followed by an afternoon with Neville at his nursery.
The one bright thing to her depressing day ahead was that instead of sitting alone at home on Valentine's Day, she would be joining Albert for a monthly gathering with other Potions masters. A bit of intellectual stimulation with fellow academics was just what she needed to keep her mind off of Severus for the night.

Marf served Hermione up a hearty breakfast, since Saturdays were particularly laborious for his Mistress.

As she nibbled on her toast absentmindedly, she continued reading “Antigone” by Sophocles, mumbling the words aloud, her pronunciation hindered by her breakfast. Hermione got in a couple good hours of studying before heading off to Albert's. It seemed that for most Potions apprentices, working on a Potions master's garden was a daily chore, but with Hermione's arrangement of working for Lavender as well, Albert kept her duties down to one day a week. The weekly half-day apprenticeship with Neville would more than make up for her lack of practical Herbology experience in his own garden, as it would expose her to a greater variety of plants than what he grew solely in his garden.

Besides, Albert liked puttering around in his garden after work as a way to unwind and feel connected to his late wife, since it was a chore they had shared together during their many years of marriage.

Her gardening chores for the week involved adding more mulch for the spring, but not before raking and aerating the winter mulch that had compacted over the season from snow and being trod upon. Hermione could tell that her back was going to really enjoy a hot soak in the tub tonight, since many of these chores could not be done with a wand. Wizards used wheelbarrows, as using one's wand to move mulch was a somewhat messy process, usually resulting in lots of particles being airborne and making one cough. Shovels and rakes were the way one moved and hauled mulch, even in the wizarding world. Hermione understood how Neville suddenly got his broad shoulders.

'So much for magic making things easier,' Hermione groused silently to herself, wishing there was a charm with which to do some gardening chores.

Once the mulching for Albert was done, it was time for her to go over to Neville's nursery.

Apparating near the gates of Longbottom Horticulture & Herbology Ltd., she found Neville digging up fruit trees, bare-rooting them before heeling them in a soft berm of soil. He was digging up the trees in expectation of those who would be planting fruit trees soon, since it was the beginning of the season for that garden task.

He handed her a shovel and showed her how far away from the trunk to use the spade to cut the roots. He used a garden fork to gently lift and rock them from the soil, before taking them over to the berm of soil to heel them in for easy selection. There were a few customers throughout the day's work who snatched up trees she had bare-rooted not moments before. In each section for each variety of tree was a photograph showing the tree blooming and fruiting, like Muggle time-lapse photography. Hermione barely had time to attach little tags to each tree showing the genus, species, and variety before some customers took them over to the cashier for purchase.

“So how's your Greek coming along?” Neville asked as he brought the blade of his spade down sharply to cut a root.

“Not bad, though I feel I should be progressing faster than I am,” Hermione admitted. She periodically grunted as she gently lifted an apple tree from the ground, rocking the garden fork up and down.

“What are you doing tonight?”

“Albert's taking me with him to some monthly social with other Potions masters tonight,” Hermione replied.

“Oh.” Neville sounded a little crestfallen, and Hermione suddenly wondered if he was asking her out on a date.

“But I guess I'm free next Saturday,” she added, feeling a bit awkward.

“Oh, great,” he replied more cheerfully. “Because I thought what better way to improve your Greek than hanging out with some. There is a Greek restaurant and bar I used to go to when I was trying to improve my Greek. I thought I might take you there to help with yours.”

Hermione suddenly felt a little silly, thinking he was going to ask her out on a date. She was recently divorced, and Neville was probably still pining for Luna. It was nothing more than an offer to help her with her language skills.
Finally done with her Saturday gardening and Herbology chores, Hermione dragged her tired arse back to her flat. Now she had to take a shower and make herself presentable for the social function. Fortunately, Marf had a nice, hot meal waiting for her.

Albert had told Hermione to dress lady-like, but on the conservative side. Many of Albert's colleagues were older like him, and they had certain notions regarding witches wearing trousers. And given that some of these Potions masters were still bachelors, she needed to dress as non-provocatively as possible, especially since she was recently divorced and Albert was recently widowed. Anything else would set tongues wagging in their circle, even if Albert was old enough to be Hermione's great-grandfather, and that he was still mourning his wife.

Arriving at Albert's home, he complimented her on her choice of outfit, indicating it made her look quite respectable. She wore a simple black skirt that went to just above her ankles, a pair of sensible boots that were freshly polished by Marf, a high-necked emerald green blouse, and a long black cloak.

They Floo'ed over to the home of Niles Goggin, a fellow Potions master who was about a decade Albert's junior. Niles greeted Hermione warmly and offered to get her a drink, to which Albert said he would fetch one for her.

Albert had warned his apprentice that because she was a single – well, actually a divorced witch – that she shouldn't accept any drinks from anyone unless she poured them herself or Albert had. Potions masters evidently liked to add a little something extra to the drinks of single witches who came to these affairs, but usually it was to play tricks on one another. Hermione didn't want to suddenly have an extra pair of hands sprout out of her ears nor an aphrodisiac slipped in on the sly, and she took Albert's warning seriously.

Hermione kept a couple bezoars in her skirt pocket just in case.

Most everyone else was there, including Reginald Chuff. Introductions were made and Hermione made sure not to grimace when introduced to the old Potions master that Severus had apprenticed under, especially after hearing some of the things Chuff had made Severus do and suffer.

Sipping her gin and tonic, Hermione mostly listened to the old masters ramble on, picking up little tricks and tips they casually mentioned about brewing some new potions, or recalling one they had concocted many years ago.

“So Hermione, how would you judge Albert as a master so far?” Royston Bentwick, a Potions master about ten years older than her, asked. He was the baby of the bunch, since most of the other Potions masters were sixty years or older.

“So far, I'd say that Albert has been an excellent master to apprentice under. He's been very helpful and supportive,” Hermione replied truthfully.

For some reason, the other Potions masters found this funny and started laughing, as if she had said something uproariously hilarious.

“Albert,” Royston gasped, “didn't you tell her what happened to your first apprentice?”

Albert swirled his drink and raised his eyebrows, indicting he wasn't about to volunteer such matters and would remain tight-lipped.

Royston had only heard about the tale, but Niles decided he would fill Hermione in on the details. Albert should have known that they would drag this little story up, though every Potions master there had his own tale to tell regarding some rather embarrassing moment.

“So, Albert here,” whimpered Niles, in between subsiding laughs, “was teaching his apprentice... Brendon–” “Brandon,” Albert corrected him, as he gave Niles a look telling him his own little story was next on the block for recollection.

“Brandon, who was a very handsome young wizard and engaged to a lovely witch, Agatha, I think was her name...” Albert nodded that Niles recalled correctly. “Anyway, Albert was teaching Brandon about love potions. Some birds, I think it was pigeons...”

“Crows,” Albert amended.

“Right, crows, land on the skylight above his workbench area and start pecking at something on the roof. Well, some debris was jostled loose from ceiling and fell into the cauldron of the love potion, which exploded in spectacular fashion all over the lab. Most notably, all over Albert and Brandon. Now, you must know that Albert had only been a Potions master for about five years. Brandon was his first apprentice and was only about eight years his junior at the time. So the love potion goes everywhere. Dangerose and Agatha go to visit them in the lab to call them for lunch, and find Albert and Brandon in a deep lip-lock.”
Hermione's face fell, finding this story rather embarrassing and feeling pity for Albert at having the mortifying experience dragged up in front of others, especially to her. There was nothing funny about the accident, which could have happened to anyone. Hermione's finding no humor about the story did not stop the rest of the wizards there from busting up laughing. A few spilled their drinks in the process, even though they had heard the story numerous times over the years.

“Agatha almost called off the wedding, and Albert had to convince Dangerose that he didn't secretly play both sides of the pitch.” Niles brayed like a donkey in between his howls.

Hermione remembered how she thought Ron was bisexual for a time. The anger and feeling of betrayal were still quite fresh in her mind, and she was sorely tempted to throw her drink in Niles' face, but refrained, refusing to join in on the laughter. Albert wasn't laughing either.

“Awww, c'mon, you gotta admit that's funny!” Royston ribbed her.

“Thinking your husband is playing around on the side with someone behind your back? No, I don't see the humor of that,” Hermione said flatly. She felt empathy for Dangerose for the anguish she went through until the matter was cleared up.

Suddenly everyone remembered that Hermione's husband had recently left her for a witch he'd been seeing behind her back for years. The laughter quickly died from their lips upon realizing their faux pas.

Given how embarrassing that was, even though it was many years ago, and how Albert's last apprentice was slothful, Hermione could see why he had been reluctant to take on a new apprentice.

“Well, Hermione, at least I hope you aren't a sour pain in the ass as one of my apprentices was,” Reginald Chuff threw in, trying to break the tension.

Even without giving a name, Hermione had a strong suspicion as to who this “sour pain in the ass” was before he continued rambling on.

“You'd think someone who was in an arranged marriage with a guaranteed piece of arse to bed every night would have been happy, but no. And then his wife up and died on him, and he was even worse to deal with. I was just glad that he was a quick learner and had already finished learning his five languages so I could accredit him and cut him loose shortly after the funeral,” Chuff grumbled.

Reginald was trying to lighten the mood, but failing miserably. Hermione could now see first-hand why Severus referred to him as a bastard.

Royston decided to offer up his own embarrassing Potions failure to change the mood, making Hermione eventually laugh when he went into great detail about how he accidentally got a cementing-type potion on his hands and wound up getting stuck to everything he came in contact with, including a large cast iron cauldron. He eventually fell over and got covered in various Potions ingredients that made rashes and boils pop up all over his body.

“Hermione,” Niles called out to grab her attention. “Tell me how you managed to wrangle an apprenticeship with Albert here, given his aversion to taking one on.”

Shaking her head, she tried to deflect from the question, which seemed to make the other wizards there even more curious. “Well,” she deferred, glancing at her master, “Albert can tell it far better than I can.”

Albert gave a rather brief description about the circumstances regarding Dangerose's will and Trevor Spawn. Sebastian Delgado was mentioned, to which several wizards snorted amusedly. There was the “encouragement” by Delgado to take her on as an apprenticeship, though Albert didn't say it was a mandatory condition of the clause for Lavender Brown to take him on as her new Potions master, it was subtly picked up.

“And just what did you do for Delgado that made him blackmail Albert into taking you on as his apprentice?” Jack Braxton, a short, fat wizard who had a bulbous nose, asked rather bluntly.

“Saved his arse on a Potions problem when conventional methods of thinking would not make it financially feasible to manufacture large batches of the Sequoia Potion,” Hermione threw out, challenging any other insinuations to the contrary.

“Oh, you came up with the brewer's kettles idea? That was brilliant!” Niles gushed with admiration.

Severus did owl a few other Potions masters, but no one had a solution to fit Severus' needs for Miss Brown.
“Thanks to the Muggle Alliance Network, it was an easy solution,” she admitted, trying to be humble, but feeling a great deal of pride in her idea.

Royston quirked an amused brow. “So, Hermione...” He paused momentarily, his mouth twitching with a smile at one corner, before asking, “Did you help Delgado with that Sequoia Potion personally?” His eyebrows were climbing higher and higher up his forehead the longer it took for Hermione to answer his question.

She didn't like the tone of his question, though that's exactly what she did with Severus. All eight various brew times, plus the use of the Sequoia Potion with each variation of the Arousal Potion, Irresistible. There was a whole lot of testing going on in Severus' bed and around his flat for some months.

“Hermione only corresponded with Delgado and didn't have a chance to meet him in person until the Ministry's Halloween Ball,” Albert informed the fellow wizards, saving Hermione from having to answer that herself.

Royston was definitely interested in Hermione, especially since she was the only witch there and close to his age. He was currently in between girlfriends and found the idea of a female Potions apprentice a rather alluring prospect.

“Wait!” Niles noted with surprise. “Were you that witch Delgado was apologizing to at the ball? Did you dye your hair black? The one in the little royal blue number?”

“Unfortunately, yes,” Hermione bit out.

Royston let out a wolf whistle. “No wonder Delgado made a fool of himself over you. Just what did he do to get on your bad side?” the youngest Potions master of the group asked.

“It was a cultural misunderstanding,” Hermione said, trying not to sound too irritated. She was getting tired about people bringing up that incident at the ball.

“Probably thinking his lips could better translate that thick accent if they were on yours!” Braxton shouted out.
Hermione folded her arms and crossed her legs.

The group of six wizards, minus Albert, all made “ooh” noises, knowing Braxton had hit the mark.

“He's lucky I only slapped him and didn't use that curse involving turning a wizard's bollocks into cannonball-sized lead weights,” she tossed out as a warning.

There was a collective gasp and groans of sympathetic pain as several wizards crossed their own legs. Albert sat there smugly, glad Hermione could hold her own against this crowd.

The challenge portion of the evening came around. Each Potions master presented a task, and the one who performed the worst had to down a shot of whatever libation they were pouring that night. Anyone who could not complete the task had to drink every shot from those who didn't perform the worst.

Hermione began to understand how Severus had such a huge alcohol tolerance, given that one time she had found him drunk after he'd downed most of the bottle and had polished off the last of it so quickly. These guys were absolute lushes with a hollow leg for liquor.

The first task was to identify a Potions ingredient based on smell alone, hidden in a box. Everyone wrote down their answer on a scrap of paper, and everyone who got it wrong had to take a drink. Hermione won that round as she was the only one who not only identified the ingredient correctly, but also identified the country of origin and subspecies of the Potions ingredient. Everyone bowed to her in awe of her talent and downed their drinks, since they had only listed the genus and species.

The next task was prompted by Reginald Chuff, involving peeling a particular ingredient. Niles offered the choice between apples from his pantry and knoggelwalden egg-fruits he had just harvested from his greenhouse. Knoggelwalden egg-fruits were bright pink, shaped like a large egg, had a thin shell-like rind, and – should you pierce the inner membrane – would make your hands smell like a dead skunk. This was a timed event, so it was the last to finish who had to drink everyone else's drinks.

Hermione had tested knoggelwalden egg-fruits before, but never had to peel them. When she tested them, she boiled them whole, which neutralized the stench the fresh fruit carried, before she sliced them open for inspection. For some Potions, knoggelwalden egg-fruits were peeled, leaving the inner membrane intact and then gently poaching them, since the shell-like rind could counter or change the properties of some potions.

Chuff chose the egg-fruits over the apples. Hermione wondered if Chuff picked this particular test knowing Hermione would fail. Which she did. Niles had to fetch something to de-scent her hands, now that she smelled like a deceased member of the Mephitidae family. Once her hands no longer reeked, she had to down most of the drinks, except for Royston's because while he didn't pierce the membrane, he didn't finish within the allotted time.

There was a chopping competition, which Hermione didn't win. She didn't lose either, but came somewhere squarely in the middle.

As the evening wore on, Hermione began to lose more challenges and finally bowed out when she thought one more shot would make her regurgitate the entire evening's imbibings. At least whatever she was drinking was not going to make her jump up on the furniture, partially disrobe and sing, “I've got a lovely bunch of coconuts,” though she thought that some of the wizards there wouldn't mind a bit if she did, especially Royston.

Sitting on the couch, holding on to the arm of it to keep from spinning off of it and hitting the wall, Hermione almost didn't notice Royston plop his drunk arse down next to her. In the other room, Niles was singing some maudlin ballad in Russian that was very familiar, but she couldn't quite name it given her drunken state.

“So how about you and me go out for a drink sometime,” Royston asked. He held one hand over one eye so he would only see one Hermione.

“We're already drunking,” Hermione slurred, using the wrong tense in the wrong way.

“Nawwwwww,” Royston said, drawing out his response. “I mean, like a date. Maybe dinner.”

Hermione shook her head. “Nope. No way. Not a chance. Not interested. Nuh-uh.” God, she had to stop shaking her head or she really would lose the entire contents of her stomach soon.

“Aww, you gotta get you-shelf back on the market sometime,” he insisted, slurring a bit himself. “What'cha doin' next Saturday?”
“Going to a geek restaurant – a Greek restaurant with Neville to work on my Greek,” she admitted, but then slowly realized in her drunken state she shouldn't have said as much.

“That boy? Longbottom? He is green as gas – grass. You need a man!” Royston said, puffing out his chest, which was one of those lovely examples of why some witches from other countries made fun of English wizard's physiques. He had one of those shallow, hairless, caved-in chests.

“That boy is a friend an' the same age as me. No, wait, older. I mean, younger,” she warned him, glaring at him with a challenging eye, should he continue to berate her friend.

“What, he got to your bed before, before me?” Royston chuckled dismissively.

Hermione was glad she had drunk as much as she did at that moment, as she nary felt the impact of her fist making contact with Royston's jaw. Had she been sober, it would have hurt like hell.

Royston fell to the floor, laughing, having been knocked off the couch. He was too drunk to fully feel the effects of Hermione's right hook.

The latest game that was being held, involving naming Potions ingredients in reverse alphabetical order, suddenly stopped. Even Niles stopped his crooning.

Albert came over and looked down at Hermione who was looking a bit green.

“What happened?” he asked with wonder.

Pointing an incriminating finger at Royston, who was still on the floor laughing, she defiantly stated, “He accused me of shagging Neville when I turned him down for a date. Turned down Royston for a date. Honor was at stake.”

Albert conjured a bucket and put it to hover right in front of Hermione just in time before the evening's libations all came up. Hermione suddenly remembered how awful it was to vomit alcohol not just out one's mouth, but out through one's nose as well.

The round of challenges was halted while Royston was checked out and found to be all right, though Albert insisted on letting the younger Potions master keep the injury to his jaw as a reminder to mind his manners where Albert's apprentice was concerned. Royston would feel it tomorrow and have a lovely bruise to hopefully jog his memory of what he did.

Niles clapped Hermione on the back, telling her she had done all right for her first time at their monthly booze-up. He said she was welcome to come back to future gatherings, while he handed her an elixir to help with the post drinking-vomit wooziness she was experiencing. Hermione blew her nose, but it still felt like there was some chunks of vomit still clinging to the lining of her sinuses, to her discomfort and disgust.

Royston was not necessarily chastised by the group for his behavior, but it was not condoned either. Hermione and the young Potions master had “worked out their differences” and the group would let it be. They wondered if Royston was drunk enough to not remember the evening and would try propositioning Hermione again at the next meeting.

Niles also tended to Hermione's hand, which was beginning to swell. After checking it, Niles determined that there were no broken bones.

Albert decided it was time for Hermione to go home. Once they had bid the rest of the Potions masters good night, with Hermione giving a begrudging grunt at Royston, Albert Side-along Apparated with his apprentice to the street in front of the Red Ginseng, since he didn't want her to get splinched or slur her address and wind up coming out of the wrong fireplace via Floo.

Arriving at the Red Ginseng, they found the place crawling with Aurors.

“What the...” Hermione began, but was at a loss for words.

“Hermione!” Harry called out and ran over to her. He embraced her and gave out a great sigh of relief. “Where were you?”

“Hermione was with me and several of my colleagues at a social function this evening,” the elder Potions master informed her friend.

Harry suddenly got a whiff of how much “socializing” Hermione had done for the evening. “How much did you drink?”
“Too much,” she admitted guiltily.

Harry then caught the faint scent of vomit on her breath.

Hermione squinted at all the activity going on. “Just what is going on?” she asked. She moved past Harry and made to go to the entrance of her block of flats. She slipped past an Auror who was supposed to stop anyone from entering.

“Hermione!” Harry called out. He tried to stop her, but suddenly found his cloak snagged on an old iron joint in the brickwork in the wall across from the entrance to the building. It hindered him from stopping her in time.

Gazing up at the block of flat's open atrium, Hermione saw the reason why the place was swarming with Aurors. Blaise Zabini was suspended in mid-air. A spell did not hold him in place, but rather his skin had been peeled away from the front of his body and hooks that came out of the wall, placed there magically, grappled the ends of the thin pieces of flesh suspending his body as if floating. His abdominal wall had not been pierced, but it looked like all his major organs had been somehow magically transported outside of his body and laid there in a puddle in the middle of the atrium floor beneath his body, most probably done with an Entrail Expelling Curse.

Hermione turned right around. She stumbled out of the building and onto the grimy damp cobblestones. She thought there was nothing left in her stomach after throwing up at the party, but she was proven wrong. Now on her hands and knees she wretched up the last bit of what was in her stomach, even dry-heaving at the end for good measure. Her body wanted to make sure there was nothing left.

Moody came over and stared down at Hermione. “So, did you know Mr. Zabini?” he asked very matter of factly, seemingly unaware or unconcerned over the physical distress Hermione was in currently.

Albert had crouched next to Hermione to help hold her hair out of the way while she finished retching. “Really? Now? Can't you wait until she's at least not on her knees from the shock of it?” the Potions master chastised the Auror.

Gathering her wits, Hermione made sure to remember that Zabini officially only worked only as a gigolo. Even Albert was told of the unsanctioned marketing and advertising work that Lavender had Zabini do for her. Albert was not sympathetic to Death Eaters, but he was not exactly in agreement with some aspects of the Death Eater decree. The decree treated those who were reluctant Death Eaters, forced into joining, the same as the most zealous of Voldemort's adherents.
Albert was willing to play along with his employer's ruse that Zabini was only a gigolo, and why she bothered to employ him if he was a Death Eater.

There were some things Albert understood that he was not entitled to know about. His employer had made mention of Zabini saving her from a fate worse than death, and that was enough for Albert to not pursue the topic.

“He lived in the flat above me,” Hermione truthfully answered.

“And you were all right with the knowledge of a known Death Eater living one floor above you?” asked Moody incredulously.

“We didn't bother each other,” she bit back, challenging his implied accusations. “Besides, the rent is free. You try living on what I'm making as an apprentice and paying for a flat.”

The pay wasn't exactly bad, and it was better than what the Ministry had until recently been paying her, but Moody didn't need to know what her new salary was. Just the statement that she was a paid apprentice made her sound as if she was living in poverty and thereby the statement of free rent sounded justifiable to the Head Auror, despite who her neighbors where.

“Apprentice?” Moody questioned, having temporarily forgotten seeing Hermione there with Albert when he came in to question Miss Brown after Draco and Severus' disappearance.

“Yes,” Albert replied, standing up and going nose-to-nose with the Auror. “Albert Dobmeir, Potions Master, E.T.F.C., and she is my apprentice.”

“Well,” Moody said a bit gruffly. “Where was Mrs. Weasley this evening, if you'll allow me to ask her,” he said a bit sarcastically.

“She was with me and six other Potions masters for a social function. So if you are accusing her of anything, she has a solid alibi.”

Moody blinked and said, “I wasn't accusing her of doing it.”
“Well, that’s what it sounded like,” Albert barked at him.

Harry came over to join the conversation. “Hermione, your flat is no place to stay tonight. The Aurors will be here all night. Why don’t you come back to my house, and Zhubanysh will make up the spare room,” he offered, placing a protective arm around her. “You can come in and answer questions tomorrow morning when you feel better and sober.”

“My clothes?” Hermione said, thinking of what she’d need.

“Dobby will wash your clothes tonight. We have a few spare unopened toothbrushes, so you can take one. Just don’t stay here tonight, Hermione,” her friend insisted.

She nodded.

“Why don’t you take tomorrow off,” Albert said, allowing her to take care of matters with the Ministry and the aftermath of the night’s events.

Moody gave leave for Harry to take Hermione to his home before he came back to finish helping his fellow Aurors with the crime scene.

~~~~~~~*~

“Heads up!” Draco called out.

With one hand, Severus caught the package tossed over to him across his office.

'Ooh, Ginny's banana chocolate chip bread.'

“Happy Valentine's Day,” Draco said sincerely, not meaning to prod a delicate spot, but did so inadvertently.

Severus grumbled and opened a drawer to chuck the baked good in it before slamming the drawer shut with his wand, his mood suddenly soured.

The pair of wizards had come to the shop for a few Saturday morning clients. Even with an extra lengthy swim and long wank in the shower, it did not relieve the emotions simmering below the surface of Severus' impassive visage. The day was meant for celebrating love, and here he was with the object of his affection half a world away.

Draco threw himself into the chair on the other side of Severus’ desk, setting one foot on the edge of Severus' desk. He scrutinized his mentor’s demeanor.

“Why don’t you just send her an albatross?” Draco suggested, as it was the most fucking obvious thing in the world.

“Who knows if the Aurors are still watching my... her flat,” Severus reasoned.

“Then send an albatross to her at work,” Draco huffed with slight exasperation. “Lavender has been known to get an albatross now and again. It would not be unusual.”

There was no need to name who Draco was referring to. Even he had noticed that the happiness that Hermione brought Severus in the last few months in England had nearly ebbed away. The blond wizard could certainly empathize. When he was parted from Ginny for nearly a year and a half, he came close to losing his mind. Given how Severus was a man who didn't openly express his emotions, Draco could tell that he felt them quite deeply and viscerally, which meant that despite the Potions master’s cool exterior, the man was withering away on the inside.

Severus thought about it. He had owled Hermione a missive once, but it was under the guise of another personality in order to ensure she would return to him. The second time was just a terse note as himself after Hermione's anniversary dinner. But of the sweetly-toned letter, how close was that personality of Calleo to his own? His genteel and courteous persona had to have come from somewhere, or was it just another mask of his? He was finding it harder to remember who he really was, with Hermione not around him any longer.

“I'll think about it,” Severus replied, just before his first morning appointment arrived for some one-on-one tutoring.

Draco nodded, acknowledging Severus' response. He recognized the sense of hesitation and fear of rejection from when he had thought about seeking out Ginny shortly after the Death Eater's Decree came out, even after Molly threatened him.

As Draco's first student came in for some Charms tutoring, he grumbled a little to himself.
Tutoring was something he was good at, but he didn't quite enjoy it as much as the work he once did for Lavender. Draco still hadn't decided upon a career, but as the weeks pressed on, he knew he didn't want to spend the rest of his life tutoring. He actually missed doing advertising and marketing for Lavender. At least he found that work to be fun and challenging, not mind-numbingly repetitious and frustrating like his current occupation. Draco was patient, but even he was finding it hard not to call a few of his students dunderheads to their faces when they didn't bother to do the homework he'd assigned. Then they complained they didn't understand the work, even with him practically holding their hand, step-by-step. If some of his students at least attempted to try and do the work, they might understand it.

Suddenly inspired, Draco's attitude improved. He would talk it over with Ginny over their Valentine's Day dinner at Mario's that night. It was so simple that he wouldn't be surprised if Ginny had already considered it herself.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Thank you to my most highly valued and talented betas, Junew and thegreyladies.

Placing events into the timeline of my fic, Severus gave the prophecy to the Dark Lord in early summer of 1980, but then killed Gabrielle shortly after that. So within a few months of getting his apprenticeship, Severus began teaching at Hogwarts in September 1980.

Mephitidae is the Family to which skunks belong to.

Here is the recipe for Ginny's banana chocolate chip bread I was able to get from her:

Ginny's Banana Chocolate Chip Bread

2 cups regular all-purpose flour ("plain flour")
1 tsp. baking soda
1/2 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. salt
13 oz. weight very ripe peeled banana (approx three large bananas, see tip in #4)
1/4 cup oil (safflower or grape seed oil recommended)
1/4 cup buttermilk
1 cup sugar
2 eggs
3 TBL. milk
1 TBL. vanilla
1-1/2 cups semi-sweet chocolate chips

1) Preheat oven to 350 F
2) Prepare 4 mini-loaf pans (2-cup capacity). Spray each pan with non-stick baking spray, or coat with butter and flour.

3) Into a medium bowl, measure flour, baking soda, baking powder, and salt. Sift or mix until ingredients evenly distributed. Set aside until Step #6 below.

4) In a large bowl place peeled bananas and gently mash with a potato masher or fork. Mash until just softened. Do not over-mash. Tip: For best results, use bananas that are at least 75% brown or black. Using 100% brown or black bananas that have just begun to liquefy in the peel is perfectly fine too. The more overripe, the better.

5) Add oil, buttermilk, sugar, eggs, milk, and vanilla to the mashed bananas. Gently whisk until just barely mixed. Avoid using a power mixer to avoid lengthening starch molecules in bananas. The less you work it, the more crumb-tender it will be.

6) Add in flour mix and whisk until you still have a few small clumps of flour still not mixed in. Remember, less working of the batter means less chewy banana bread.

7) Fold in chocolate chips. Tip: Use 1 cup regular chocolate chips and 1/2 cup mini chips for better suspension of chocolate chips throughout batter. Fold with spatula until no more flour clumps remain and chips are evenly mixed.

8) Pour batter evenly into the four mini-loaf pans.

9) Bake for 20 minutes, then rotate the pans and bake for 20 more minutes.

10) Check if the loaves are baked thoroughly – pierce a loaf with a wooden toothpick or bamboo skewer. If the toothpick or skewer comes out clean, the loaf is done. If not, add up to five minutes more bake time, especially if doing a double batch.

11) Cool on a cooling rack. The bread stores beautifully in the freezer, wrapped in a freezer storage bag.

12) Note: If you want to make this quick bread recipe even more crumb-tender, for the flour: use 1 cup regular flour, and 1 cup cake flour.
Chapter Summary

Severus' heart is rendered mute upon the page, so he goes to clear his mind to find the words. Meanwhile, now that Lavender is out her Advertising and Marketing Director, Hermione suggests who might replace him.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Eighty-One
“Disclosure and Bombshells”

Disclaimer: Harry Potter, a fanfic frontier. These are the literary ramblings of the OTP ship Snermione. Its 10+-year posting: to explore strange new lemony smut, to seek out new plot twists and new tropes, to boldly disclaim by stating Rowling owns it all.

A/N: Disclaimer a parody of the Star Trek: The Original Series prologue.

=========

Hermione could finally understand how Harry could fall in love with Zhubanysh so quickly. Once Hermione was back at the Potters' home, Zhubanysh helped bathe the shell-shocked witch and tucked her into a guest bed.

Hermione was convinced she wouldn't be able to sleep at all that night, with her mind filled with the fresh memories of gore and a torturous scene of Zabini's death. Then Zhubanysh started singing a soft, sweet song to Hermione, while stroking her hair and face.

Hermione found herself drifting off to a restful sleep, free of nightmares that would have normally kept her up after such an incident. Waking in the morning, she found herself feeling rested and relaxed, almost at peace. She wondered if there was something magical in the song Zhubanysh had sang, or in her touch.

The memory of Zabini's murder was still fresh in her mind and still caused her great distress, but somehow Hermione felt a little stronger the next morning. She felt as if she would be able to face going to the Ministry that morning and discussing the events without breaking down in the process. Hermione wondered if Zhubanysh's particular talent had helped Harry heal and quickly move past his sudden divorce with Ginny.

More than anything, Hermione wished she could have woken in Severus' protective arms. He was the only other thing, other than Zhubanysh's special talent for soothing her, who could have made her feel as if she could face the day ahead. When she needed sanctuary the most, he was gone. Hermione would have to find the strength within herself to deal with her problems, until she saw Severus once again.

But when would Hermione see him again?

Hermione had scanned the Daily Prophet the other day, noting the cost of Portkey prices to places like Auckland, San Francisco and Tokyo. Averaging out the price, she figured how much a one-way Portkey to Hawaii would cost, based on the triangulation of those three major Portkey destinations. There was a fleeting moment where she entertained the idea of spending a whole lot of Galleons and just showing upon his doorstep, but she squashed the idea. She had promised to clear his name. How would it look – since she had stayed behind – to drop that promise and arrive without completing the task yet? Hermione had tried to leave with him at the last moment, but given how Fate had decided she was not to go, she figured there must be a reason why she was stuck in England and was not in Hawaii with Severus.

With freshly-washed clothes, Hermione dressed and went down to breakfast. Dobby had made breakfast since – the elf proudly told her – Zhubanysh had been up most of the night tending to Hermione, ensuring she slept peacefully. Harry came down as Hermione was finishing her breakfast; he was looking up as if he too had been up most of the night.

Once at the Ministry, Hermione answered some questions, with Harry there beside her for support. Moody and Kingsley asked her some questions, and she truthfully answered them. Fortunately, she didn't have to answer any questions about unsanctioned work, as she would have to lie about that. Given how Moody could smell a lie from a mile away, she was glad that she didn't have to manufacture any until that point.

As the interview wrapped up, Moody got a strange look on his face. Holding up one of Hermione's recent purchases, he asked in a curious tone, “And while investigating Zabini’s murder last night, we had to enter your flat, Mrs. Weasley. I saw a stack of some interesting books.”

In Moody's hand was a copy of Fodor's Guide to Hawaii.
“You went into my flat?”

“We had to make sure the killer wasn’t hiding out there while we cleared the building. An interesting selection, Mrs. Weasley.” Moody thumbed through the book absentmindedly.

“And why would you say that?” Hermione asked, feeling her cheeks get hot and trying to not let the wild thumping in her heart give anything away.

“No reason,” Moody said. “Just wondering why you have so many books on Hawaii in your flat. Thinking of going on holiday there?” the Head Auror asked.

“Considering the fact my parents talked about going there, since they didn't get a chance to go when they were in America during their year-long ‘holiday’ to the States during the war, and they wondered if I was interested in going with them, considering I haven't been on a holiday in years and I'm recently divorced, yes. I am thinking of going there for a holiday. What of it?” the witch threw back at him hotly, trying to play innocent as to why she was being grilled about her choice of books.

“Muggle books,” Moody mused.

“Considering I'd be going Muggle-style with my parents, since they are Muggles, I thought it prudent to do research with Muggle books. Why this fascination with my choice of books, Moody? You want to come on holiday with me to the Aloha state?” she added sarcastically.

If anything, she wanted to deflect from his line of questioning to avoid Moody being suspicious of her knowledge of Hawaii, which he and only a few others knew about. Harry and Kingsley knew about Hawaii, but Moody didn't know that.

“Why are you acting as if a few Muggle books are so suspicious, Alastor?” Kingsley questioned his boss. “She's a Muggle-born, so Muggle books are not foreign to her?” Kingsley was directing that the suspicion Hermione was supposedly perceiving from Moody was for the fact they were Muggle books, not the choice of location.

To follow along Kingsley's lead, Hermione added bitterly, “Well, it's a good thing you didn't find my stash of my Muggle parents' old medical books I've been reading. Heaven forbid you come across a copy of Gray's Anatomy!"

“Now listen here,” Moody started in, but was calmed down by Shacklebolt who put his hand on his shoulder.

Hermione burst into tears, more for effect than the need to cry. It didn't take much for her to need to cry, despite how much Zhubanysh's gentle ministrations eased her mind the night before.

“Hermione hardly slept last night, and she's quite tired, Alastor,” Harry defended her, understanding the ruse Hermione and Kinglsey were pulling. “We're all tired this morning. Now if there is nothing else, I suggest I take Hermione back to my home where she can rest until the Aurors are finished.”

“I want a Floo connection directly to my flat so I don't have to walk in the atrium of that building ever again,” Hermione suddenly spoke up.

Moody began to stutter, but Kingsley quickly replied, “I think we can get that taken care of today, Mrs. Weasley. I can certainly understand your reluctance to have to walk through the area daily,” he assured her. “I'll take of it personally and make sure it's done before the end of the day.”

Hermione and Harry left, but not before Hermione took back her book that Moody had swiped from her flat. The two top Aurors bickered, given that Death Eaters used to be the sole occupants of that particular block of flats. As the door was closing, she overheard Kingsley remind his boss that there were no more Death Eaters living in that building at all.

“Listen, Hermione, I'm worried about you,” Harry admitted as they walked across the atrium of the Ministry. “This is the second murder that has happened in or around your block of flats. And I think it might be the same person, since Moody won't entertain the idea. There are some aspects that are the same, like a calling card.”

It chilled Hermione's soul to think that this is the second murder done in such a fashion.

“I want you to wear this,” Harry handed Hermione a necklace with a small locket. “Should you need me, just grab hold of the locket and call out to me in your mind. I will know you need me, as I'll be wearing its twin. It also acts as a locator so I can find you.” Harry pulled an identical necklace out from under his shirt and showed Hermione.
“That's brilliant, Harry. Did you come up with that?” she asked with great admiration.

“No, these have been in use with the Aurors' office since the last days of the war. Aurors tend to work in pairs, so if they get split up and one is in trouble, it's a way for us to find each other, even if one had been Apparated away. They've been working on a new version of these where you don't have to hold them to mentally call for help, but this older version will probably be enough to keep you safe. Few know about these in our arsenal, and we want to keep it that way. So your discretion is required.” Harry tucked his pendant back under his shirt.

“Harry, do you really think–”

“I don't know what to think,” the young Auror admitted, running his hand through his shaggy black mop that was in need of a trim. “But right now, I'm concerned about you living at the Red Ginseng. If you had come home during the time the murder was being committed, you might have been hurt as well, and we're not sure if the killer had an accomplice or acted alone this time. Just give me some peace of mind and wear it. Hopefully, you will never need to call me. But should you need it, I'll be there.”

Heaving a weary sigh, Hermione placed the necklace over her head and tucked the pendant under her blouse. “Fine, Harry. If you are that worried, I'll wear it.”

Hermione traveled via Floo back to the Potters' home while Harry went back to work in trying to figure out who killed Zabini.

~~~~~~~*~

The wastepaper basket in Severus' hotel room was overflowing. After starting his umpteenth letter to Hermione, he became frustrated yet again. The words had flowed so easily from his lips when they were together, which wasn't much given how he wasn't an effusive wizard who spouted off about his feelings. Now apart, it was even harder and the words stumbled around blindly in his mind, as if trapped in a dark, door less room. Now he regretted all the things he could have said but hadn't.

He was well read and normally eloquent, but now – while trying to put his heart to quill and parchment – he found himself dumb and lacking the resources which seemed just beyond his ability. Severus could write scrolls and scrolls about Potions, magical theory, literary analysis based on historical events at the time of a book's publication, Herbology, business matters and a slew of other areas of interests, but finding the right words to express his heart when his heart had lain quiet for so long was humbling to his ego. Intellect and brilliance were no match against the torrent of his emotions.
Severus could have consulted with Ginny, since she was a witch and knew Hermione well. She could help him, but his pride refused to let him seek assistance. His feelings for Hermione were a private matter. Even if Ginny could tell how much Severus was missing her, she never brought the subject up. There were fleeting moments where the two would exchange a glance and know the other was wishing Hermione was there as well.

'My darling Hermione...' There was another crumple of paper to fill the silence of his hotel room.

“Damn!”

'Dearest Hermione...'

Examining the parchment, he thought that that wasn't too bad. It had taken ten pounds of parchment for him to finally come up with a suitable two-word greeting to his letter. Now if he could only get a first draft written by the end of the day, he might have a suitable final draft to commit to parchment by the end of the week. But at this rate, it was going to be summer before he would have anything to send off.

Needing to take a break from this vexing task, Severus decided to go for a hike to clear his mind. Maybe the fresh air and sunlight would blow away the cluttered and unorganized thoughts, and help him find inspiration for his first opening sentence to Hermione.

The day was a bit warmer than usual, so he wore a pair of shorts and a short-sleeved button-front shirt, along with his hiking boots and a broad-brimmed hat to avoid sunburn. He packed some fruit for a snack and set off shortly before lunch time, as he had spent all Sunday morning on his letter to Hermione.

He reached the edge of town and began wandering off into the jungle, observing the plants and wildlife teeming about.

Using his wand, he cast a machete-like charm to cut through the thick growth. Once he passed through, he used his wand to repair the flora to preserve the habitat.

Muttering to himself, thinking that perhaps speaking the words instead of coming up with them in his mind alone might help him, Severus nearly tripped on the rotted fence that had fallen down. Swearing at the offending pieces of disintegrating wood that the jungle was reclaiming once more, he came across a sign.

Flipping it over, it said: “For Sale.”

Looking about, there seemed to be no house. Severus followed the rotting fence line around the property, cutting his way through the vines, bamboo, and other plants that had woven themselves in and around the old property perimeter. Once he had made a full pass around, he determined it was a good acre in size, plenty large enough for his needs. Exploring inside the property boundary, he found a clearing. There was a stone-and-cement pad indicating where a house once stood. The remains of a fireplace, mostly demolished, was at one end of the house's footprint. It was made of large chunks of black lava rock. The white grout, in between the stones on the partially dismantled chimney flue, was dotted with moss and ferns.

Severus gazed out at the view from what must have once have been the front porch. There was a lovely view of the Malu Palekaiko, with the edge of the main part of town about a quarter to a third of a mile away. You couldn't see the streets, but you could see the second and third stories of the taller structures just above the palm trees that lay on the slope below him. He could even see the top of the roofline of his hotel.

He found and followed the old stone pathway that went from the outline of the old house down to a walkway that had become overgrown. Cutting through with his wand, he followed the path until it ended. Close to where the path ended, Severus could hear voices. Scything and cutting away at the thick growth, Severus found himself along a road that led back to town. He had walked this road before, as it had led up to a few other houses of people he had come to know and visited, as well as being the major trail that led up to the volcano from town. A few hundred yards up the road was a couple walking back up to their house. He had passed by countless times, and never knew the place even existed.

Heading back up the now cleared path, Severus looked about the property, noticing there was a fresh water stream that trickled through it, mostly covered by the undergrowth. There were areas that were flat and some that look like they had once been terraced, much like some of the small taro and rice farms he had seen next to some homes in the more rural parts of town and around the island.

There were spots he would need to clear to make his two gardens, but for the most part, this was perfect, except for the part that there was no house. Severus would expand the footprint of the house, making a second story terraced above and behind the first story, just as he had always imagined.

Picking up the sign once more, he almost could make out the name on the sign for whom to contact. With a wave of his wand, the name at the bottom was restored.
“Bugger,” Severus muttered.

Tina, Draco's real estate agent and infamous wizard-chaser, was the one he had to deal with. Severus was willing to pay full price, and even extra, if that meant he didn't have to go out on a date with her in order to secure this property.

Severus already had to decline her request for a commission of a love potion. There was little doubt who the intended target of his commission would be.

Sitting on the edge of the concrete-and-stone foundation, the Potions master transfigured a rock into a glass, spelled some chilled water into the glass, and drank the water while eating his fruit. Surveying the lay of the land and the orientation of the foundation, he thought the house would face almost squarely south, slightly angling off towards the west.

As he munched on some fresh pineapple, Severus mind began to fill in the gaps. He could clearly envision a row of cucumbers, tomatoes, and sweet peppers for his gazpacho. Over there would be his Potions lab, and next to it, his Potions garden, filled with plants that Pomona grew in her greenhouses, but he would grow them out in the open air in the rich volcanic soil. There would have to be a shade structure, as some of the plants he wanted to grow required partial to full shade, and not full sun.

Severus was no closer to having any idea what he wanted to write to Hermione, but he had, in his wandering, stumbled across the future site of his home, a home that maybe even Hermione could live in as well. Just the idea of having his own home once again made him feel as if his life was finally coming together bit by bit. He even smiled a little as he got up and dusted the dirt from his shorts to begin the trek back down the overgrown pathway and into town.

If Tina wasn't working at the apothecary, where she worked part-time, he would brave going to her residence in person. Severus had a new project to look forward to and to keep his mind off of how miserable he was without Hermione. It wouldn't make the longing for her any less, but it would keep his mind otherwise preoccupied.

Walking briskly with a purpose, Severus didn't notice the Albatross which had taken flight as it was circling the town. It was climbing higher and higher in order to catch a favorable wind current that would carry it off towards its distant destination, with a letter clasped in its webbed feet.

~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~_~~
once again at Hermione's work, grilling Lavender about Blaise Zabini's work for her as a gigolo. Not only had two of her Death Eater gigolos gone missing, but now a third was dead. Miss Brown assured Moody she had no more interest in keeping the side business in operation, given the only three she would trust enough to carry out the work were now gone, and Macnair was in Azkaban. Upon further questioning as to why Macnair was ever in her employment, he dropped that line of questioning after Lavender gave him the short and grisly version of why she’d had him in her employ, a story which seemed to please Alastor. There was no mention about Parvati. Moody knew all too well the history behind that.

Not only were Hermione, Albert, and their employer, Lavender, dealing with Zabini's death, though Hermione had no great affection for him, but now the president of the company was out a key employee who was doing a good job. Blaise had been picking up the slack where Draco had left off. Zabini didn't have quite the finesse of Draco, but he had been getting the hang of it.

Once the Aurors were gone, Lavender had used her business connections to see if there was anyone with marketing and advertising experience to take over the vacated position. There were a few who might have fit the job, but lacked a certain je ne sais quoi Draco had in spades and Blaise possessed in clubs, but was honing his skills with time.

By the time Friday rolled around, Lavender was fit to be tied. There were deadlines in upcoming publications, and new products which were to be launched soon. While Blaise had kept his boss thoroughly in the loop, Lavender had other things to do to run her business than deal with this aspect, though she would if it was absolutely necessary.

During the weekly staff meeting, Lavender went over Albert and Hermione's progress regarding the development and testing of some new products. But then the company president and owner picked up her tea cup and threw it against the fireplace in frustration.

“Damn it all to hell!” she bellowed at no one in particular.

Hermione wondered if Lavender let her temper get the better of her at home with Ron around, and how well he handled it.

Knowing it was futile, but wishing to offer some comfort upon seeing the pressure her boss was under, Hermione asked timidly, “Is there anything I can do?”

Spinning around on her heel, Lavender looked at Hermione and rolled her eyes, while snidely saying, “Oh, if you just happened to know someone well versed in advertising and marketing who can take Blaise's place and help run that department – because my company will fail if I don't find someone competent eventually. Otherwise, no, there is nothing you can do. Thanks for asking.”

Suddenly, Hermione remembered she did know someone. She would have to speak to her parents first, but for the moment, she thought she would give Lavender a glimmer of hope since the blonde witch looked like she was near the end of her rope and close to panicking.

“Actually, I do.”

“What?” Lavender and Albert said in unison, the witch responding more vocally of the two.

“My Aunt Christine. She's a vice president at some big, multinational advertising and marketing corporation.”

“Why didn't you tell me this before?” her boss nearly shrieked.

“Because she's a Muggle and doesn't know I'm a witch! That's why. And until you mentioned it, I didn't even consider her,” Hermione admitted a bit hotly in response to Lavender's tone.

Lavender started stuttering, stopping and starting a string of unfinished sentences. Her frustration was partially out of exasperation that the source of her solution was working across the hall from her all this week, and partially out of excitement that she found someone who would have a fucking clue what to do.

“Well?!? Let's go tell her you're a witch and get her into the Muggle Alliance Network!” Lavender blurted out excitedly.

“First, I need to talk with my parents.”

“Can I come along? Anything to help,” Lavender offered.

“Considering you're the one who Ron left me for, that might not be the best thing right now,” the former Mrs. Ron Weasley gently reminded the new Mrs. Ron Weasley. “Aunt Christine might be a bit more understanding and you should come along when I go meet with her and break the news about me being a witch, but we'll break that other bit – you being the one Ron married – to her and my parents later.”

“Oh. Right.” Looking at Hermione she said, “Well...? Go! Go Apparate over to your parents and tell them you need to tell your aunt that you're a witch.”

Hermione looked at Albert for his approval, since she had been planning on doing work with him today, but he shrugged and said, “Our boss says to go. Our work will wait, the publication deadlines will not.”

It was nearly lunch time, and Hermione knew she would probably be able to catch her parents before they left to catch a bite together.

~~~~~~~*~

Tina and Manny glared daggers at one another across the table. Tina had sold the abandoned property finally, but she was still no closer to a date with Severus than before.

That talk, dark, yummy British wizard showed up on her doorstep the day after Valentine's Day. She thought her winning charms and looks had finally brought him to her, inspired by the holiday. Her hopes soared for a brief moment, only to be dashed when he handed her the "For Sale" sign indicating his interest in buying the property.

It wasn't even worth that much, considering there was no structure to inhabit. Severus was able to steal the place for a little under 20,000 Galleons, but it would probably cost another 20,000 to 30,000 to get a house built on site, depending on how large and complicated the design was.

Manny was pissed he had to share his commission with the witch. He felt that he was entitled to the entire commission, since he had been doing all the leg work, dragging Severus around the island. But it was by sheer luck Severus had stumbled across the abandoned property. It had been on the market for so long, nearly everyone forgot about the place. The house had been razed in a hurricane which had blown through there several decades ago. The property's current owners, the grandchildren of the original owner, kept paying Tina a small "maintenance fee" to mind the property and to sell it, though there was nothing to maintain, given that the house was destroyed.

Severus sat there gauging the tension between the two real estate agents. Even though Manny and Tina couldn't see it, Severus could plainly see the sexual tension between them. Manny was single, and Tina was single. Though Manny was not the most handsome of wizards, he wasn't that bad looking, if only he would ditch the bad comb-over. And though he was a bit older than Severus, Manny wasn't so old as to not be within the acceptable dating parameters for Tina, given that she was no longer a spring chicken herself.
Perhaps Severus could brew a double love potion batch, gratis, without informing Tina, should these two need a little help recognizing the attraction between them. Better yet, there was still one more meeting until the deed was handed over to Severus. Surely that would be time enough to brew a version of Irresistible, the Arousal Potion, but he would use regular mother of pearl in the mixture instead of the Caprese mother of pearl, since Lavender and the twins had an exclusive distribution deal on that ingredient.

Yes, a nice box of homemade chocolates with passion fruit, pomegranate, and Fairy Brandy liquid centers left in the room for the two to partake would certainly move things forward so Tina could stop harassing him and set her sights on some other wizard.

Life was moving along quite swimmingly this week for Severus, even though he had yet to finish his first draft of a letter to Hermione.

~~~~~~~*~

Though Wendy and Wallace Granger were a bit circumspect about Hermione's intent to tell her Aunt Christine that she was a witch, they were much more open to the idea after their daughter's explanation about her boss' need for someone with advertising and marketing skills. It seemed that those were specific skills which few in the wizarding world possessed or encouraged as a career, nor was it even a job description widely recognized in the wizarding world.

Hermione's Aunt Christine had recently left her high-powered and very well-paying job at a large international marketing and advertising firm. It seemed that – despite the company's Human Resources Department assuring her that they were supportive of Christine in the time after her miscarriage – her superiors were not exactly patient or understanding. They were mostly men who told her to get a stiff upper lip and crack on with her life, haranguing her as to when she was going to get back to work as soon as possible.

After telling them where they could shove their well-intentioned and completely insensitive remarks, Christine Taylor – with the support of her husband, Tim – decided it was time to start her own small firm where she was her own boss. She could set her own hours instead of being a slave to the pressures and demands of her old job. It would hopefully cut down dramatically on her stress, which her obstetrician said had been a possible factor in her trouble conceiving the first time and her recent miscarriage.

Hermione and her boss Apparated to a nearby alleyway that was a four-block walk away from Christine and Tim's house. It was the closest place they could Apparate to without being seen or splinching, as Hermione had been to her aunt's house before and was familiar with the area. She was also familiar with how nice her aunt's front yard used to look when she had a high-paying job and could afford to pay for a full-time gardener. The yard looked rather scraggly now. This only made Hermione more determined to see her aunt take the job offer.
After Hermione and her boss knocked upon the door of the two-story house, Uncle Tim opened the door.

“Hermione! Your mum told us you were coming over. And this must be your friend... Lavender, right?” Tim said cheerfully, welcoming them into their home.

Hermione and Tim exchanged a brief hug before Lavender and Tim shook hands. Tim popped his head out the front door and asked strangely, “Where's your car?”

“Oh, we took the train,” Hermione lied plausibly, as the train station was a six-block walk away.

“Well, Christine is in the spare bedroom we converted into an office for her,” he explained as he showed the two witches the way down the hall.

Hermione walked past the room that was going to be the nursery and noted the door was shut.

Knocking on the door to his wife’s newly-converted office, Tim called out, “Dear, Hermione and her colleague are here.”

Christine bid them to enter, as she was busy on her computer typing something up. Rising from her seat, she walked around her desk and gave Hermione a brief hug, showing more genuine affection for her niece than Hermione could ever remember.

Hermione asked her uncle to stick around for the meeting, since he would need to hear this as well.

“It’s good to see you,” Christine said.

Hermione could tell her aunt was still recovering from the emotional strain of losing her child, but seemed to be making the best of it. Her bosses at her old work were certainly of no help to her in that regard.

“Aunt Christine, this is my boss, Lavender. Lavender, this is Christine Taylor, my aunt.” Hermione purposefully omitted Lavender's last name for the time being.

The two women shook hands. Christine offered them a seat, as she had two chairs ready and waiting for them. Tim stood up against the wall behind them, leaning sideways against a couple of short filing cabinets.

“Wendy told me over the phone you need someone to do marketing and advertising for your business, Lavender. Is that correct?” Christine began.

Hermione and Lavender exchanged curious glance at one another.

“Yes, that is correct, Christine,” Lavender replied. “The... person I employed who did all my advertising and marketing recently met with... an untimely death. And I'm rather in a bind.”

“Well, I'm very sorry to hear about your loss. I'm sure it was a great shock to you both,” Christine said with great empathy. “But I'm afraid I'm in the dark about how I can help, as Wendy didn't say exactly what your company does or makes.”

“It's a beauty and cosmetics company,” Hermione jumped in, trying to avoid any unusual jargon that Christine might find too strange, until more information was revealed.

“Have I heard of this company, or are you a new start-up? You look like you're barely out of university, so is this a small operation?” Christine asked.

“Actually, I have my products sold and distributed in all European countries, plus northern Africa, the Middle East, Russia. I'm planning on expanding into India later this year,” Lavender informed her.

Christine's eyes got very wide, a mixture of surprise and disbelief. “And just what is the name of your company? And did you inherit it?”

“It's The Lovely Lavender Company. And no, I started it from scratch and built it from the ground up myself, with my own blood, sweat, and tears.”
Now Christine was really suspicious. She crossed her arms and leaned back in her chair. “You say it's not a start-up and you sell in several countries, yet I've never heard of such a company. Considering I had clients in the beauty industry recently, I would have heard of you before if your distribution is that broad, since I still read all the trade rags.” She practically snorted at her potential new client.

“The reason why you haven't heard of her company is because it's not in any circles you're familiar with, Aunt Christine,” Hermione gently informed her.

“Uh-huh. And why is that?” she casually threw back, squinting her eyes, thinking this was either a cruel joke or waste of her time.

“Because I'm a witch,” Hermione announced.

Tim jumped into the conversation. “You're not a witch, you're a lovely person. Who would call you such a thing?”

Hermione turned around in her seat to look up at her uncle, her face perfectly serious. “No, I mean I'm an actual witch.” To prove her point, she pulled out her wand and said, “Wingardium Leviosa.”

The pen-holder on Christine's desk began to float, guided by the movements of Hermione's wand.

Christine leaned forward to touch the floating pen-holder. “Is this a trick?” she asked with disbelief.

“No, it's not,” Hermione corrected her aunt. “I didn't go to that posh boarding school that Mum and Dad told you about. Well, I did go to a boarding school, but I went to a special boarding school for training witches and wizards for seven years, starting when I was eleven.”

Christine and Tim looked at each other and began laughing hysterically. “Either you're fucking bonkers and you've lost your mind after Ron left you, or this is the best joke I've ever had played on me,” the circumspect Muggle insisted as she leaned back in her chair.

Hermione stood up and decided to cast a powerful Transfiguration spell on all the furniture around her. She changed Christine's desk into a giant aardvark, all her desk clutter into blooming flowers and twittering birds that hopped about, the ceiling fixture into a small replica of the tower clock of London mounted upside down that began to chime, the curtains into a waterfall that stopped short of the floor and left the carpet dry, the carpet into a grassy meadow, and the filing cabinets into a couple stone gargoyles. When her aunt stood to inspect everything, Hermione transfigured her chair into an ostrich.

“Whoa, did someone secretly slip me some acid or ‘shrooms,” Tim asked in awe, his eyes agog at the visions before him.

With a wave of her wand, Hermione ended the spells she had cast.

There would be no Ministry officials showing up, since Hermione had given them notice she would be informing a close blood relation, who was not a parent or sibling, of her magical abilities in order to encourage them to join the Muggle Alliance Network. Had she not informed then, Ministry officials would have started showing up and adjusting the Muggles' memories.

“No, Uncle Tim, you are not on drugs. I'm a witch and so is my employer,” Hermione informed her Muggle relations. “There are approximately 15,000 witches and wizards in Great Britain alone, with a total of over 300,000 in the countries where Lavender currently sells her products. With her emergence in India, that will double to over 600,000 potential customers. That is almost one-third of the world's population of witches and wizards, to whom she needs to market and advertise her products.”

“One... third of the world's population?” Christine asked for clarification.

“Of the world's wizarding population,” Lavender amended. She wanted Hermione's aunt to understand that though the scope was not as grand as marketing to millions or billions, it was still a large segment of the wizarding world.

Hermione could tell this was a lot to process for her aunt.

“If you're so magical, why didn't you save my baby.” Christine glared at her niece, her face showing how distraught she was. The tears began to fall.

Lavender had been briefed on Christine's recent miscarriage, so she was not surprised by this response.
“Because there are laws preventing me from using magic on people who are not magical, even close family members who know that I am a witch. If Mum or Dad were dying, I am prevented by the International Statute of Wizarding Secrecy of 1692 of using my magic to save even them – because then every Muggle they knew would wonder how they ‘miraculously’ survived.” Hermione looked gravely at her aunt, feeling just as torn that she could do nothing if she had been there. “As much as I wanted to do something, I still couldn't have done anything for you and the baby. I'm so sorry.”

Christine steeled herself, trying to make the tears stop. “Well,” she bit out, “isn't that convenient. Your magical society can use the resources of us non-magic people while we can't use anything of yours.”

“It's a slow process, Aunt Christine,” Hermione tried to assuage her aunt's bitterness. “All the concern about secrecy started because Muggles were persecuting witches and wizards – burning them at the stake and such, as you remember from history lessons. It was only because of the war I was able to get a movement started to allow the Muggle Alliance Network to include people who were not just immediate blood relations, but more distant blood relations as well. It is a way to begin an outreach between our two societies while still observing secrecy laws.”

“Muggle?” Tim prompted, perplexed.

Lavender turned around and simply said, “Muggle means non-magical people like you and your wife.”

“How long have your parents known?” Christine asked.

“Since I turned eleven and the Headmaster of my school arrived to inform them that I was a witch, and he invited me to attend Hogwarts School of Witchcraft and Wizardry.” It was one of the most memorable days of her young life, and Hermione would never forget a moment of it as long as she lived.

“And you're only telling me this now because you need my skills?” Christine asked, taking a slight accusatory tone.

“Expanding knowledge of our world to more distant blood relations is only permitted when there is a viable reason to include them into the Muggle Alliance Network, which only came about because of the war. Otherwise, it is discouraged in order to hold within the ISWS,” Hermione explained.
"The war? What, the Afghanistan and Iraq war going on now?" Tim asked for clarification.

"No, the wizarding war that ended in 1999," Hermione said, her voice somewhat hollow.

"A war of wizards? That sounds cool, like it could be the name of an old Doctor Who episode," Tim responded with inappropriate zeal.

"Seeing all the friends I had die in the war, many right in front of me, there is nothing 'cool' about that, Uncle Tim," Hermione said with a quiver in her voice, her response morphing into a sob.

Lavender began to silently weep.

"I'm so sorry. I had no idea," Tim apologized with great remorse.

Lavender conjured handkerchiefs for herself and Hermione, which startled the two Muggles who were still unaccustomed to magic performed in front of them.

"Thanks, Lav."

"If you don't mind me asking, did you lose friends in the war, Lavender," Tim asked trying to be delicate.

Lavender spun around in her seat and looked at Tim harshly with red-rimmed eyes. "If you call having my best friend's mind scrambled by a curse while she was being raped in the next dungeon cell, besides losing friends in the war too, then I guess you could say so. Oh, and the wizard who did all my advertising and marketing – the one who died recently – he saved me from her fate."

There was a long pause of silence while Hermione and Lavender collected themselves.

"Maybe this was a bad idea. Maybe we shouldn't have come," Lavender said somberly.

"No! Please, I want to help," Christine pleaded. "I have been calling leads, but all the contacts I have are large corporations. Given the fact I am now a company of one, none of my old contacts wants to hire me. And it's hard trying to break new ground with small- and mid-sized business. I need the work. Please.

“You'll have to join the Muggle Alliance Network for a small fee, but that will give you access to work for Lavender and any other businesses run in the wizarding community,” Hermione said.
“Unfortunately, you can't tell any of your Muggle clients about the work you do for us or any other wizarding businesses. It's in this contract, should you agree to join.”

Hermione waved her wand and a thick contract suddenly appeared on the desk in front of Christine. She jumped back a little, being suddenly startled by yet something else suddenly appearing or changing before her eyes.

“I guess if I'm going to have any work, I'm going to have to agree to this.” Hermione's aunt flipped quickly through the pages, which made a soft thwapping noise.

Tim came along to stand next to Christine's desk and asked meekly, “Does Ron know you're a witch?”

Hermione and Lavender turned to each other and began laughing simultaneously. “Ron and I met at the school we both went to,” Hermione said, gesturing to herself and Lavender. “He comes from a pure-blood family.”

“Pure-blood?” Tim asked.

“It means he comes from a long line of witches and wizards on both sides,” Lavender volunteered.

“Probably thought he was too good for the likes of you then, which is probably why he divorced you,” Christine snarled.

Just then, Christine's computer began to blink and brighten spontaneously.

“Lavender, calm down,” Hermione warned, sensing the computer's surge in power was due to anger suddenly building in Lavender. The blonde witch might fry her aunt and uncle's electronics in the room.
Christine looked at her future client and said, “Don't tell me you side with Ron for dumping Hermione?”

“Aunt Christine,” Hermione began, trying to diffuse the situation, “Ron and I both agreed to a divorce. He was pressured into marrying me, I felt obligated to accept. We never were really in love from the start.” Hermione had only volunteered a minimum amount of information to her parents as to why they divorced. “The divorce was amicable and mutual.”

“If she's your friend, then why does she look that way when I bring up your ex?” Christine challenged, pointing a finger at Lavender.

“It's complicated,” Hermione replied, placing a hand over her eyes, hoping she wasn't about to get a headache.

“Well, since we're having quite a bit of disclosure, I think I can handle a bit more, if it will clear some things up.” Christine folded her arms and sat back in her chair.

“You want my business and the full disclosure?” Lavender asked, feeling a bit hostile at the moment.

“Yes, considering some of the shit I've seen pulled in the corporate world and this recent revelation about this magical world I was unaware until a few moments ago, I think you can lay it on me. Hit me with your best shot,” Christine dared, throwing down the gauntlet.

As much as Lavender was crossing swords with Christine, who needed her as much as she needed her, Lavender admired this Muggle, who seemed like she had a backbone and a set of brass ones. She needed someone a little fearless to help take her company into the future.

“Fine.” Lavender huffed and stood up as she began to pace back and forth across the converted bedroom.

Hermione had seen that look on her boss' face and had heard stories from Severus. She knew there was nothing to do but let the storm blow over, ducking for cover at the appropriate moments, especially if crockery was involved.

“Ron and I had been having an affair for most of Hermione and Ron's marriage,” Lavender yelled, beginning her tirade. “Ron was miserable, Hermione was miserable. I had been hoping for an opportunity to pry the two apart, since Ron was reluctant to divorce Hermione, feeling some obligation to stay married to her for financial reasons and his family pressure. I set Hermione up with a former employee of mine, and he set up an apprenticeship for her to finally leave her miserable job for better pay. Then Ron could finally leave her. Ron and Hermione are now divorced, both happier for it. Hermione is in a long-deserved apprenticeship – by me, as it happens – and with better pay. Shortly after the divorce, Ron and I married. He’s now my husband. Any questions?”

Tim went over to the cabinet and poured himself a drink, holding the bottle up to offer something to steady anyone else's nerves that were as suddenly as frazzled as his.

“Don't tell Mum and Dad,” Hermione insisted. “I'll tell them all that in time, just not now.”

Sarcastically, Christine raised her eyebrows and looked around. “Gee, I wonder why?”

“So who was this bloke you were involved with, Hermione? Where is he now?” Tim asked after drinking half of his Scotch in one go.

“It's complicated,” Hermione groaned into her hands.

“Oh, please.” Christine snorted again. “It can't be more complicated than you working for the... witch who stole your husband and now work for.”

Hermione glared at her aunt. “You have no fucking clue, and I'm divulging nothing more. You already know far too much. Be glad I will not cast a Memory Charm on you to wipe away this whole meeting,” Hermione snapped, looking every bit as serious as her promise.

“I could use a cup of tea,” Lavender stated plainly, her tone civil once more. “Do you think we could adjourn to the kitchen?”

Christine's head felt it was close to imploding from all these new revelations.

“Memory Charm?” Tim asked with a squeak, wondering if he wanted to know.
“A commonly used magical spell, often used to erase or adjust the memories of those who you want to forget certain information. The Ministry often uses them on Muggles who have inadvertently witnessed the use of magic and shouldn't have,” Lavender said, a little too cheerfully for the tone of the conversation.

Tim and Christine exchanged worried glances.

“Oh, don't worry. We won't cast one on you,” the blonde witch assured her future marketing and advertising consultant. "It's in the contract."

The four of them moved to the kitchen. Hermione made tea, using her wand to fetch the cups and saucers that were on the top shelf, as she couldn't reach them without a stool.

Christine's hands shook a bit as she drank her cup of tea.

“So, let's say I do take you on as a client. And let's say you do hire me to consult for you,” Christine began, her voice faltering a little. “What sort of retainer did you have in mind?”

Pausing for a moment, Lavender thought. “Well, considering your experience, as this would be nearly a full-time job, I was going to suggest 20,000 Galleons a year, plus bonuses tied to meeting certain sales goals.”

“Galleons?” Christine asked.

“She's offering you approximately 100,000 pounds a year,” Hermione said, doing the conversion in her head.

“And your retainer will go up to 35,000 when we launch in India.” Lavender looked at the Muggle sitting across from her. “Is that acceptable?”

Considering that Christine was bringing in zero pounds and was spending money in order to try and get new clients – with the purchase of a new computer, business cards, stationery, web domain address, website design, business license – 100,000 pounds a year to start was pretty damn good for her first client.
“We have a deal,” Christine agreed and stuck out her hand.

The two women shook on it.

"The Muggle Alliance Network will advise you on the taxes and banking, Aunt Christine."

“We’ll need to get you an owl,” Lavender offered.

“Owl?” Christine asked, her face looking a little stunned at yet another revelation.

“Yes, it's our mail delivery system,” Lavender rambled on. “Hermione's parents have one in their backyard. They can help you learn about the care and feeding of your owl, since I'll need to purchase it for you. I can take you to Diagon Alley so you can select one that agrees with you.”

“Diagonally?” Tim queried.

The rest of the afternoon was spent bringing Christine and Tim up to speed on many aspects of the wizarding world they would have to adapt too. Christine eventually fetched a pen and notepad and took copious notes.

“So...” Christine said, glancing over her notes. “I can use the... Floo to contact you, by sticking my head in the fireplace, but I can't use it to transport through? Is that correct?”

“Yes, it's something to do with the charms, the connections, and the magic imbued in the Floo powder. It gives Muggles just enough magic to make a Floo call, should you be approved for a connection, but not enough to travel. We can get you a connection within a week or two,” Lavender assured her.

“And you have no computers, and no electricity. You use candles and quills. You have printing presses run by magic. You have photographs that move but make no sound,” she asked for further clarification.

Hermione produced a copy of the latest Daily Prophet to give her aunt a sense of the style and layouts common in the wizarding world, especially the magazines, which included moving Lavender produced a few magazines herself, showing Draco's work for the Valiant Wizard line and the cologne for men called Haunt. There was also some ad work by Draco for The Sirens' Secrets, and various other layouts over the past couple years.

“This guy is good, who designed these. A natural. Is he the one who died,” Christine asked delicately.

“No, he left,” Lavender replied. “His replacement was the one who died. His replacement was on the job for almost three months. So you can understand why I am in a bind. Publication dates are coming up, and I don't want to miss the launch of some things for the spring.”

“I'll need editorial calendars, rates, and so on,” Christine informed her new client. “Also a list of publications you currently advertise in and the ones you don't, and their demographics.”

Talking advertising and marketing was putting Hermione to sleep, even with two cups of tea in her. This was devolving into marketing gobbledygook that just went over her head.

Instead, Tim and Hermione went to the living room and let the two women talk business.

Letting out a huge sigh, Tim said a bit wistfully while staring blankly at the wall, “You know, if you talked to me yesterday, I'd sooner believe that aliens from another galaxy lived among us than to believe there was a magical world existing right alongside ours, with us completely unaware of it. Quite the little reality shatterer.”

“You'll get used to it. I supposed since I was approached at age eleven, it wasn't quite the shock to me. Given that strange things had happened for most of my life up to that point, it was just one more thing that explained how my magic was popping up inexplicably at the weirdest moments.”

“Oh, like the time when you were a child and you claimed to have jumped off the roof with an umbrella and floated down?”

“Yeah, that and more.”
“And we can't tell anyone. Except your parents, who already know,” Tim asked.

“Yes, that's it in a nutshell.”

“Fuck me sideways with a pineapple,” her uncle sighed with awe.

There was a long pause before Tim spoke again. “So that ginger and lemon iced tea thing. Was that magical?”

“No, it's just regular ingredients that help any pregnant woman with morning sickness.”

“Because that really did the trick until...” There was more awkward silence.

“I really wish I could have helped,” Hermione confessed. “And by the time I found out, it was too late. I was away for the weekend at the time.” She sighed, remembering how it ruined an otherwise perfect weekend with Severus.

Her uncle noticed an odd look on Hermione's face. "That guy. The one you got involved with. Do you want to tell me? I promise not to tell your aunt,” Tim said seriously.

“Uncle Tim, it took me months to come to terms with some of the aspects of that particular situation and half the things involved with that story would make what we just discussed pale in comparison,” the witch warned him. “Perhaps sometime in the future, but it's something still very raw for me. It is beyond complicated.”

“Well, I'll be ready and waiting with a sympathetic and confidential ear, should you need one,” he offered.

Hermione had been missing someone she could confess all the troubles on her mind, as if the pressure behind the dam was building, given that her lover and former confessor was gone. But given Tim's lack of context and history of many aspects of her world, it would be hard to drag up many of those memories with which to fill him in. Hermione would suffer them in silence instead.

Chapter End Notes
A/N: As always, thank you to my lovely and helpful betas for this chapter, JuneW and Cygnuz.

To calculate the rough approximation of the wizarding population, I used the Harry Potter wiki site (http://harrypotter.wikia.com/wiki/Wizarding_world) which estimates the wizarding population at 12,000 to 15,000. I decided to play it generous and stick with 15,000. England's population is roughly 60 million, so that winds up being one out of 4,000 who is a witch or wizard.

Adding together the populations of other countries – roughly, Europe as a whole (740 million), Russia (125 million), the Middle East (300 million), North Africa (50 million guesstimate) – that is a population of about 1,225,000,000. Divided by 4,000 leaves a little over 300,000 witches and wizards. India's Muggle population alone is approximately 1,225,000,000, so adding them to Lavender's distribution would double her potential customer base of over 600,000 if every witch and wizard used her products.
“Remus & Hagrid”

Chapter Summary

Severus figures out how to be more productive with his time, while Hermione is given a new opportunity to look forward to.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Eighty-Two
“Remus & Hagrid”

Disclaimer:
Hickory-dickory dock
Rowling owns Potter and lot
Betz disclaimed that she had no claim
Hickory-dickory dock

=====================*

Returning from the toilet, Severus opened the door to the conference room and found Tina and Manny half-undressed with their tongues down each other's throats.

“Oh, pardon me,” Severus said with the most sincere voice he could dredge up.

The potion-laced chocolates he'd left in the middle of the table were half-eaten, and the two real estate agents barely noticed they had been found in a compromising situation.

Severus closed the door quietly and looked at the clock on the wall. He figured if he came back in a couple hours, the potion would have run its course. Given that Severus had waited this many weeks to find a home, a couple more hours wouldn't hurt before the deed was handed over to him.

Walking back to the waiting room, he whistled a chipper tune. He watched while Manny's secretary minced in the opposite direction towards the conference room, her arm full of files and more paperwork for Severus' transaction.

'Three... two... one...'

Right on cue, Manny's secretary let out a piercing shriek, which seemed to cause the two lust-crazed lovers to make some hasty and awkward noises of their own, before a few shouts were exchanged and a door slammed.

Manny's secretary marched back to her desk as fast at her fat, short legs would let her, muttering under her breath, “The decency of some people. They should get a hotel room if they are doing to do that. Honestly!”

Looking over at Severus, who barely hid his amusement, she said as diplomatically as possible with a saccharine smile, “They'll just be a few more minutes.”

“I guess they still have some details to hammer out then,” Severus replied with a quirk of his brow.

Manny's secretary looked a bit flustered and went back to making busy work, nervously shuffling papers and making agitated huffing noises.

'Two down, six to go,' Severus mused to himself, as Justina was no longer chasing him either. And when Akela began her tutoring under Severus next week, or possibly two weeks, there would be one less witch chasing after him.

Akela wasn't exactly pursuing Severus, but she was lumped in with the other witches who were seeking to snag him for a date or more.

“You know, I left something brewing back at the shop. Why don't you just have Manny come find me when he's ready,” Severus suggested, with a jerk of his thumb as he was heading out the door.

Manny's secretary gave some grunt of acknowledgment, not finding the humor of the situation like Severus did.

Sauntering along the sidewalk, his hands in his pockets, Severus smiled. He had felt he had done a good deed, not just for himself, but two people who would be a bit happier. But most of the joy came from the knowledge that Tina would no longer be employing her obnoxious methods in her pursuit of Severus. Manny could have Tina's attentions all to himself.

Given how he had heard from various sources why Tina had sought sanctuary in Malu Palekaiko, Severus hoped Tina would never catch Manny in bed with another witch. The townsfolk of Malu Palekaiko would not take kindly to a double-homicide in their little town, given that Tina said it was a crime of passion that led to her request for sanctuary – or so the gossip around town had hinted.

Severus unlocked his shop and checked on some potions that were simmering over the weekend, pleased that everything was coming along nicely. In his office, he finished correcting the latest batch of homework, glad to see that the students who needed his help the most were improving the greatest amount.

There were a few concerns he had regarding some of his students whose parents had meager incomes. Some of the parents requested to cut back the number of brewing lessons and hours tutored, which saddened Severus a bit. He couldn't necessarily start offering a discount rate for the poorer students, as then there was the question of sliding scale and resentment that others should get his services at a reduced cost. Then there was the fact he had overhead every month to deal with – namely rent, laundry services for rented robes and gloves for students and for himself, Potions ingredients for brewing classes, equipment replacement as cauldron bottoms were melted out or ruined, and so on.

It was a business and he was not in it to run as a charity. He had a house and business he needed to eventually repay Draco for. Miss Brown still had not set up her banking interests abroad yet, as she was needing more time, he guessed.

Setting the homework aside, Severus pulled out some fresh parchment and began calculating how much his time was worth, then began calculating how much time he spent scrubbing cauldrons himself, collecting local Potions ingredients that he normally harvested himself, the amount of time required for finding different ingredients from various sources around the island, and preparing harvested ingredients for pickling, drying and preserving. Then there was time spent sweeping, changing candles, chipping and cleaning up melted wax from the chandeliers and torches above, and so on. Even with spells to do most of these chores, all those still took time away from more profitable tasks.

Severus calculated that his time was most valuable doing tutoring, brewing, commissions, and consultations. For some of the scut work around his shop, he considered hiring a couple of the older and more responsible students in exchange for tutoring services. A couple hours of work in his shop could easily translate into fifteen to thirty minutes of tutoring time or a brewing session, depending on the chores. And there was always at least an hour or two of work required to clean his shop up at the end of the day. At Hogwarts, detentions served to cut down on his time spent to maintain his classroom. The use of children to do more of the mindless work to keep his shop in order would be a fair exchange.

Then there were ingredients. Not having to go himself to hunt for fresh sea cucumbers, specific corals, and other sea life would be a great help. Severus didn't mind diving, but he would rather enjoy a good swim than spend time hunting for ingredients that sometimes could not be found in the areas that were safe for swimming – that didn't involve getting dashed up against the rocks. And there were other things – like butterflies, local beetles, flowers, roots, bark, leaves and other ingredients – he didn't feel like paying full price for at the local apothecary when he could harvest them himself for “free” in the nearby forests. Spending his time doing that did not necessarily make it free, since time was money.

The children were well versed in the local flora and fauna of their island, so he felt confident that he would be assured quality ingredients that were fresh for his needs, and correctly identified. He would pay a fair market price, more than what the local apothecary would pay, but cheaper than purchasing them at full retail price. The children could then use that money to pay for Potions lessons, or pocket money for themselves. It was a win-win situation that would free up more of his time and be more cost-effective.

Severus made a list of those parents who had approached him about reducing tutoring due to costs. He began drafting letters to each of them, requesting an appointment to discuss a solution to address their financial difficulties while not cutting back on their child's or children's education.

Having grown up poor himself, he could certainly empathize. If his education growing up was based solely on how much his parents could afford to pay for tutoring, instead of a formal academic environment like Hogwarts, then he would have had major gaps in his education. Given Severus' love for knowledge, he did not want anyone who truly loved knowledge as much as he did to be deprived of it either. But they would still have to pay for his services somehow.

Showered and dressed, after a long and exhausting day, Hermione promised Neville she really would go with him to that Greek restaurant and bar. A quick owl to Neville the week before explained there was an emergency at work and she had to take a rain check for next week. She didn’t bother to explain she was at her aunt's, divulging a lot of secrets and baggage to her, while helping Lavender contract her aunt for some consulting work.

Because she was gone for an entire Saturday the week before, Hermione had double the chores to catch up on at Albert's. She had to move a lot of potted plants from the greenhouses out to the fields at Neville's nursery.

Dressing in her best Muggle wear, since Neville did say it was a Muggle Greek restaurant in Palmers Green, a Greek enclave in the borough of Enfield, Hermione Apparated over to Neville’s place first.

He was living in the little cottage his parents had, moving into it after graduating from Hogwarts. It had been kept in fine condition for him until he came of age.

It had a lovely front garden filled with snowdrops poking up through the late winter snows, with a low wall of aged and worn brick demarcating the front edge of the property.

Knocking on his front door, Hermione was greeted by Neville who was sporting some very modern Mugglewear that would certainly make sure he blended in. He was wearing a nice button-down shirt, gray Muggle-style trousers, and some stylish shoes.

“Ready to go?” he asked, eyebrows raised and eyes cheerful, picking up a potted cactus before heading out the door.

They Apparated together to a spot in Palmers Green that Neville knew would be a safe place to arrive.

Walking into the restaurant, Neville was greeted by the host in a very friendly manner, involving hugs, kisses upon the cheek and lots of excited chatting in Greek. They spoke so fast, Hermione had trouble keeping up with the conversation.

Neville introduced Hermione, who was soundly kissed upon the cheek, having been introduced as an old friend. She could have sworn there were some hand gestures by the host remarking about Hermione. She caught the word “beautiful” before catching snippets from Neville that they were nothing more, using the word appropriate for non-romantically attached friends of the opposite sex.

At the end of their greetings, Neville presented a new cactus to the host, so he could place it by the front door with the other cacti the herbologist had brought as gifts over the years.

“What's with the cacti?” Hermione asked, glancing at the collection of cacti near the front.

“In Greek,” he gently reminded her.
“Why do you bring cactus?”

“Why did you bring a cactus” he corrected her before answering in Greek.

“Because in Greek culture, the thorny spikes ward off the evil eye.”

Hermione nodded, making sure to remember that custom.

Other staff members of the restaurant came over to greet Neville as an old friend. They were shown to a nice table near the dance floor.

“If had know I there be dancing, I would have worn dance shoe,” Hermione said.

“If I had known there would be dancing, I would have worn dancing shoes, he corrected her. “Trust me, the flatter the shoes the better, for this type of dancing. When you get the hang of it, if you want to come back, then you can wear heels. But for learning to dance, your shoes are just fine,” Neville assured her, his Greek easily tripping of his tongue. He spoke without hesitation as if he was a native speaker, though Hermione didn’t speak Greek well enough to know if Neville spoke it with much of an accent.

Neville offered to pay for dinner as his treat, since he was getting free labor out of Hermione, even though her labors were going towards her apprenticeship.

He recommended the avgolemono soup, a chicken and lemon soup with rice that Hermione found quite savory, despite the surprise of the citrus flavor. Neville had the moussaka while Hermione ordered kleftiko, a piece of bone-in lamb slowly baked with lemon and garlic. While they ate their entrees, the restaurant began to fill up and the band began playing.

Early on in the evening, most of the patrons sat while enjoying the music, but as the evening wore on, more and more people began dancing.

The two friends chatted while they ate, discussing some of the seasonal aspects of Neville's business. They also discussed his relationships with some importers and exporters, including one who had recently moved her business to Spain – a witch by the name of Katherine Bigelow, who’d mentored him.
As they sat finishing up a bottle of Italian red wine, waiting for dinner to settle before Neville took Hermione out onto the floor to teach her how to dance, he asked, “So what do you plan to do once you become a Potions mistress?”

The two had given up speaking Greek when the wine started making Hermione's head a little fuzzy near the end of the second glass. It was taking too long to conjugate some verbs for there to be any flow in the conversation.

Hermione had been focused so much on just getting an apprenticeship in the first place, she had given little thought as to what to do with her accreditation once she attained it. Right now, she was so focused on learning all she needed to reach the level of mistress and mastering her five languages, she really hadn't thought much beyond that. The only thing she considered was that one day she might go to Hawaii and hopefully join Severus there. As to how to make use of her knowledge in a strange new land, she hoped it would all work out. There was still time to make plans.

“I'm not sure what I'm going to do exactly,” Hermione pondered aloud. “It will be a while until I master everything I need to know. Perhaps an opportunity will present itself in the meantime. I have a couple years to go, or longer depending on how quickly I master certain skills, learn the basics and four more languages.”

The taste of lemons throughout the evening had reminded her that she had a mound of dried lemons back in her flat; she hadn't bothered to unravel their secrets yet. She had been too distracted – with work, her apprenticeship studies, learning Greek, the recent murder of Blaise Zabini which was barely mentioned in the papers, reviewing Severus' two memories over and over for hints to how to find a way to prove his innocence, and dealing with her Aunt Christine for whom she was acting as a temporary liaison – to even consider working on the lemons.

Hermione knew there was something significant about the lemons, but could not decipher why Dumbledore had a lemon tree growing out of his gravesite. There was a hint on his headstone's epithet about the lemons, but Hermione just had no idea what the importance of it was, and how it fit into the tree that grew lemons with little juice and dry pulp.

Sighing, while swirling her wine in her glass and studying the way the liquid clung to the side of the stemware's bowl, all Hermione could think of was how much Severus would have enjoyed the wine, and the lamb she ate. Hermione wondered if Severus had started up his own Potions shop by now, as he mentioned he might do.

Sensing Hermione in a melancholy mood, Neville decided it was time to dance as a way to cheer her up.

Holding out his hand, he nodded his head towards the dance floor.

Hermione had watched the people dance during dinner, and while she could see there was a repetitious pattern to the footwork, the movements seemed almost counterintuitive. When she thought someone was going to step twice, they stepped only once, sometimes moving on a four-count, sometimes as if moving on a three-beat count, changing directions in a way that seemed arbitrary but was part of the pattern.

Neville assured her that as long as she was having fun, she couldn't dance wrong, and there was no one who was going to judge her so. The only purpose was to enjoy the music and feel joy in dancing.

The people on the floor joined each other side by side, grasping each other's arms or hands, moving sideways. It took a couple songs, but Hermione eventually picked up the pattern of the steps.

Laughing, she felt her troubles ebbing away for a short while. There were no thoughts about how her loneliness was starting to consume her bit by bit each day. There was no fixating on the fact that there was yet another Death Eater killed (and this one in her own block of flats), pushing away fears of what might have happened had Severus and Draco still been living there at the time and if they would have been victims too. There were no dark thoughts about murders, aching hearts or anxiety about an uncertain future with Severus – only feeling her movements in time with the music, and the infectious revelry of everyone on the dance floor having a good time.

A few of the staff, who were on the dance floor guiding patrons to the steps that went along to the music, broke away to the inner circle. Neville was coaxed to join them, and the small group of men began dancing with and around one another. There were shouts of “Opa!” when one man did a particularly graceful movements or complex step. Neville did his own squat-and-bounce step. It almost surprised Hermione what a good sense of rhythm Neville had, given she still had old impressions of him being a clumsy and shy boy those first four or five years at Hogwarts.

As the evening wore on, Neville and Hermione periodically sat down to take a break. They were starting to sweat with the exertion on the dance floor, which could sometimes speed up with dancers running around in large circle.

Neville ordered a bottle of Tsipouro, a distilled grape marc spirit. To Hermione's relief, it did not include any anise or fennel in the manufacturing process, as some distillations did. It was bad enough she could smell the Ouzo (distilled anise) coming from neighboring tables, which only reminded her of the libido-killing antidote she and Severus had used during their weeks of Potions experiments.

In-between trips to the dance floor, they downed shots of Tsipouro. Hermione swore never to mix the grape and the grain again, but Tsipouro was distilled from the pressed leavings of grapes, so technically, it was not a grain spirit. Hermione made a promise to stop after the third shot, remembering that two weeks' prior she had drunk far too much.

They stayed until closing. As the rest of the patrons trailed out at the end of the night, Neville and Hermione stayed behind. Neville and some of the staff were sitting in chairs chatting in Greek like old friends while Hermione, in her pleasantly inebriated state, tried to follow and occasionally made a few comments when she understood what the topic was about and caught most of what was said. The other men and the few women who were there chatting encouraged Hermione and complimented on her proficiency, given she had only been learning the language for almost three months.

Eventually, farewells were said, with effusive hugs, kisses upon the cheek, and shaking of hands.

Neville and Hermione decided to hop on a late train and ride it north for a while, letting the alcohol work through their system until they were sober enough to Apparate home from some station stop along the route. Neville wanted to be the gentleman and insisted on making sure Hermione made it home safe without splinching herself, given she had drunk the same amount as Neville but with far less body mass than him to metabolize it.

Eventually, they Apparated inside of her flat, since Hermione explained briefly why she didn't want to Apparate to the outside of her building. Neville was partly aware of Zabini's murder and was kind enough not to press her on details, especially since the Aurors had asked that she not share any information as they still had not caught the murderer(s) yet.

Neville gave Hermione a brief hug before Floo-ing home.

As Hermione laid on her back in her bed, still drunk and dressed, feeling a little bit carefree for the first time in a while, a hallucination of Hagrid and Remus stood by her bedside. They were leaning over her.

'Oh, my' the vision of Remus remarked in his particularly eloquent accent, 'had a bit too much to drink tonight?'
'Neville seemed quite the gent'elman, not taking advantage of our Hermione, now,' Hagrid added in his gruff voice and thick accent. 'But then again, Neville 'as always been a gent'elman. His Gran raised him right.'

Had Hermione been sober, she would have judged the sudden ghostly appearance of two dead friends, who she always considered as a source for good advice and companionship, as shocking. As it was, she was drunk, so it seemed like this was just part of a very surreal hallucination brought on by some very strong foreign drink. The swirling colors of the bed curtains didn't help either.

'Does this mean you're dating Neville now,' the ghostly vision of Remus asked.

“No way. We're just friends. Besides, I don't think of him that way,” Hermione insisted, ignoring the memory of him looking quite attractive the night of the Ministry's Halloween masked ball.

'Besides, Remus, 'Ermione is still in love with Severus. How would it be if her an' Neville were more than friends?’ the large manifestation of Hagrid reminded the vision of Remus.

'Yes, how indeed?’ Remus dryly replied.

“I must be really blind stinking drunk if I'm hallucinating you two both discussing my love life or lack thereof,” Hermione groaned, wishing she had the strength to get out of her clothes she had been sweating in for most of the night.

'Or maybe we're just manifestations of your conscience, since you seem to be battling a small attraction to Neville, feeling as if it is somehow being unfaithful to Severus,' her former Defense Against the Dark Arts professor noted.

The vision of Remus nailed the source of the small pit of guilt that had gnawed at Hermione during the evening.

“Nothing is going to happen between us. I promise you,’’ she insisted, pulling a pillow over her head to try to block out the sight and sound of the two wizard apparitions.

If Hermione's flat was haunted, she wondered why Severus never made mention of it or had never seen the two ghosts before that moment. Perhaps it was a manifestation of her subconscious mind. If it was, this was a new type of magic she had never heard of, but would not be surprised by.
Before she could meditate on the matter much further, Hermione fell asleep in her clothes.

Of course, of all the days for the sun not to be cloaked by London's morning fog, it would be the day after Hermione had drunk too much the night before and left her curtains open.

As the sun pierced her eyes and straight into her brain with the needle-sharp precision of a surgeon, finding the right spot in which to cause maximum pain, she groaned and rolled over, pulling the bedclothes she had fallen asleep on top of over her head. The mere fact of making any noise and the changing of her body's orientation caused even more grievous injury to her skull, which throbbed like a big bass drum in time to each beat of her heart.

“Marf,” she whimpered pitifully in a whisper, “hangover relief potion.” Her hand shot out blindly beyond the covers, her fingers waiting for the house-elf to fetch a vial of the much-needed elixir.

Fortunately, Hermione had the foresight to brew several doses ahead of time, given the fact she'd be attending a monthly binge party with her Potions master in the months to come.

Marf gently placed the vial in her hand, which slithered back under the bed-covers. There was a rustle of the covers, indicating that Hermione had tipped the vial back, and a gentle sigh of relief escaped her lips.

Hermione swished her wand and the curtains were closed before she removed the bedclothes from over her head. She was no longer suffering from a hangover, but that didn't mean that the morning sun wasn't offending her eyes that day.

After slipping out of her rumpled clothes, which smelled of dried sweat and garlic, and into her terrycloth dressing gown, she stumbled into the kitchen.

It was a good thing Hermione had already taken her hangover relief potion, as the scream she let loose upon seeing the shimmering apparitions of Remus and Hagrid – sitting at the kitchen table, smiling at her as if awaiting her arrival for breakfast that morning – would have surely caused her head to feel as if it was a ripe melon splitting open.

“Wait, I'm not drunk anymore. Why are you two still here?” Hermione asked, her face frozen in stunned amazement.

She knew they couldn't be ghosts, since Remus and Hagrid had passed to the other side and left no part of themselves behind.

'As I mentioned last night, we're just manifestations of your conscience.' Remus smiled at her.

'An' it does seem you have been in needin' of unloading some parts of your subconscious as of late, 'Ermione, Hagrid added in explanation for their appearance last night and this morning.

Hermione knew it was definitely not the ghost of Hagrid, as the original Hagrid's vocabulary was not expansive enough to use the word “subconscious” nor understand the finer aspects of psychology. It surely must be a manifestation of her mind, as the vision of Remus had already explained.

Slumping into an unoccupied chair, Hermione put her face in her hands and her elbows on the table, which still wobbled just a little.

“God, I miss Severus. This wouldn't be happening to me if he were here,” she moaned sorrowfully into her hands.

'Probably not. But as it is, we are here, which means you must need to resolve some issue you are battling within your head or heart.' Remus remarked.

'I don't need this shit,' Hermione thought to herself.

'No one asks for 'this shit,' but here we are.' the pale manifestation of Remus replied to the thoughts in her head.

'Such language, and from a nice witch like you,' Hagrid gently chastised her.

Now she knew that these really weren't ghosts, since “Remus” read her thoughts. She just really might be going mad, or this really was some strange way for her mind to deal with the fact that she no longer had Severus, her confidant and confessor, around anymore.
Standing up from the table, suddenly filled with anger, she blurted out, “If you're in my fucking head, they why can't I solve the problems of these damn lemons?” She stomped over to the counter and picked one up, throwing it at the head of Remus, who did not flinch. The lemon passed right through the silvery vision of Remus and hit the kitchen wall behind him, rolling across the floor before coming to rest by the leg of her chair.

"As I said, we're in your head. So if you haven't figured that out by know, we would not know either," Remus answered before amending his statement. "But given that Dumbledore hid the Philosopher's Stone in a rather unique but simple way, it would not surprise me if he had a simple answer for unlocking the secret of these lemons."

The thought had already crossed her mind before, but hearing it said aloud from another source, even if the source was her own mind, gave Hermione something to ponder.

If the answer was so simple, then why hadn't anyone at the Ministry unraveled the secret yet. Since Hermione no longer worked at the Ministry, she would not have access to what methods the Ministry used to determine the significance behind the lemons or what tests they had conducted. Even if she still worked there, she wasn't even in the right Department anyway. Perhaps Kingsley would know what the Ministry had done so far, so she would not waste time replicating their experiments. But even if they did conduct certain experiments on the lemons, she would probably do them herself, just to confirm the results or see if it was just sloppy work resulting in error.

Dumbledore had once mentioned how witches and wizards were prone to use magic, not logic, to solve their problems. She figured that this problem must be something that would require more common sense and deduction than any spell to figure out.

Hermione didn't have time to spend that morning on the enigma of the lemons on her counter. She had to eat breakfast and head over to Albert's home.

Sundays were intensive study days, making up for time during the week that she spent doing work for Lavender that didn't apply towards her apprenticeship. There would be brewing, preparation of ingredients for preservation, including pickling and dehydrating, discussions delving deep into the theory of Potions, and the assignment of more books and scrolls for her to study during the week. Though Hermione had been out of school for over five years, she now wondered how she'd had the stamina to spend all that time at Hogwarts studying, in addition to going off on various adventures with Harry and Ron, and attending Quidditch games. She didn't think her energy could have flagged so much within a few years, since she was still young. Perhaps the constant fear of dangers lurking around most corners of Hogwarts with the rise of Voldemort had spurred her on, but maybe it was that she was no longer a teenager full of boundless energy.
Of all the things she wished she could bottle, it was that vim and vigor of youth she wished she could brew and distill. Invigoration Draughts only did so much.

Once at Albert's, she spent her time in his laboratory, skinning, eviscerating and butchering snipes, which the Potions master had hunted and caught during the night. He promised to take her snipe-hunting next month, which was best between the new moon and the full moon in the middle of the night. March was usually the peak of the season when the little buggers were plump and ripe for mating season. The ones Hermione was butchering were still a little on the small side, as it was still February, but February was almost over.

Hermione hated this part of her apprenticeship. If she inserted the knife in the wrong place or too deeply, she punctured the bowels of the snipe and the lab would smell of fecal matter and some parts of the offal would be ruined. The liver and spleen were exceptionally valuable, and the contamination of fecal matter from pierced intestines meant that she had to catch and prepare that many more snipes next month. Then there was the blood. It was thickly sticky and was an odd vibrant pink. Had it been more viscous and darker red, she would have needed a Calming Draught, as the sight of that much blood would have brought back memories of the war. The harvesting of the brains from the skull was a rather gruesome task that truly tested the limits of her stomach.

Once the meat and organs were harvested and prepared for immersion in preserving fluid, she moved onto the bones. She would have to boil them to remove the remaining bits of meat and dry them for the next month. In one month's time, the Potions apprentice would have to then grind and powder the bone and cartilage for various potions Albert brewed.

Since Albert had experienced a great deal of financial hardship during the contesting of his wife's will, he had to refrain from buying more ingredients, and even sell off some of the more valuable Potions ingredients in order to keep himself financially afloat. Since his stores were depleted, it was up to Hermione to help Albert restock his personal inventory with the preparation of new ingredients.

While the two were filleting snipe, removing the membrane surrounding the small hunks of meat, Hermione asked, “Albert? What would happen if I couldn't finish my Potions apprenticeship with you? You know, just for the sake of curiosity, as I'm definitely going to finish my apprenticeship.”

Albert gave Hermione a curious look. “Is there a reason why you wouldn't finish your apprenticeship with me that I should be aware of, Hermione?”

“No, but after Zabini... I was thinking, what would happen if something happened to you?”
There was a long pause before Albert replied, as he formulated his response. “Well, I know I'm not as young as I used to be – no, hold the blade at a shallower angle so you'll leave more of the meat behind,” Albert said, interrupting his answer to instruct her on how to improve her knife skills. “Yes, perfect, like that. As I was saying, I know I'm not as young as I once was, but even wizards younger than me have passed away from natural causes. I can understand your concern. But should something happen to me and I was unable to finish instructing you, another Potions master or mistress would step up and offer their help. Niles, Braxton, or Royston would probably offer to help you finish.”

“Not Royston,” Hermione immediately responded.

“Yes, I could certainly see why, given the propensity for masters and female apprentices to marry. Especially since he is close to your age.”

Hermione could not help but think about Severus' offer to teach her, offering himself as her master if she agreed to come with him.

“Of the situations where a bachelor master and a single female apprentice work together, how often do they wind up marrying? Just out of curiosity?” Hermione added for clarification.

“I can't think of a single instance within the past 300 years where a single Potions master who was unattached and a single female apprentice, who were within 30 or 40 years of age of one another, didn't wind up getting married. And of the married Potions masters, cases of infidelity with a female apprentice, whether she is married or not, is fairly high.”

“Infidelity in the wizarding community without masters and apprentices is already pretty high,” Hermione said darkly.

“Yes, I suppose that is true,” Albert freely admitted. “But be that as it may, it's easier for female apprentices to get apprenticeships with female mistresses. That is why some married male masters tend not to take female apprentices, married or not.”

There was a pause in the conversation which Albert mistook for awkwardness from Hermione as she had not said anything.

He amended his answer by saying, “Not unless the age difference is great. So I don't think there is any risk of us, in case you were worried. Plus, I'm still mourning Dangerose and probably still will for quite some time. And I can tell you're mourning yourself, which is a bit understandable even if you said you're happier now after the divorce. You seem quite heartsick, if I may be so bold as to state the obvious.”

Hermione had not been worried about her and Albert falling into each other's arms at all, now realizing he'd mistaken her silence regarding that particular matter. The revelation that in 300 years, every single male Potions master wound up marrying their single female apprentice set Hermione's heart aflutter. She could only wonder if Severus' apprenticeship offer had been his indirect way of proposing to her. She knew about Severus’ first marriage and how he had been thrust into it against his will, so she could see his reluctance to flat-out ask her to marry him. It had taken until the last month of them being together before either one of them could openly say those three words to one another that always changed the dynamics of a relationship.

Given Hermione's bad marriage and the tragic end of Severus' first marriage, it would be that much harder for either to say two more words: “Marry me.”

Dragged back from her reflecting upon Severus’ offer to teach her with Albert's last comment, she almost instinctively said she was not mourning over her divorce of Ron at all. To admit as much would only then lead to speculation about whom she actually was heartsick over.

Maybe this is why the old fortuneteller had told Hermione to go with Severus if she could.

She felt a sudden urge to see how much money she had in her Gringotts vault at that very instant. The potions she was receiving royalties on were doing well, and the twins said her butterfly hearts idea was a huge success at The Sirens' Secrets. She hadn't bothered to count how much was in her vault, but merely noted each time she went back, she took out far less each visit than she had accumulated since the last visit. Hermione was amassing a nice amount of gold on her own, and she wondered if it would be foolish to suddenly splurge for a Portkey to Hawaii.

Filled with a certain notion, Hermione suddenly wondered if she did go to Hawaii, could she have the strength to leave Severus to go back to England and finish her apprenticeship with Albert.

“Since we are talking hypothetical situations: What would happen if you were perfectly capable of teaching me all the way through my apprenticeship, but I chose to switch to another Potions master or mistress to finish? Has that happened before? Not that I'm going to leave you, since I think we have a fine working relationship, but just out of curiosity.”

Albert shook his head as he finished up one batch of meat, chucking it into a large wooden bowl before grabbing more pieces of meat to de-membrane. His mouth was set in a grim frown. “Those sorts of instances have happened, but it's not good. It's a sign that the Potions master did not take the time to fully vet his apprentice, and his apprentice did not have the discipline to see their term through to the end with his or her first master. And then the apprentice who is finally accredited is not looked upon kindly in our little sub-set, since it seems everyone knows everyone.

"Hypothetically speaking, should I still be living and able, and you left for another Potions master to finish your studies, it would be a move that would haunt you for the rest of your career, unfortunately.” He paused and amended his statement adding, “There is the instance where if you wanted to study a language I may not be versed in, you might partially study under another master or mistress who was fluent in that language, but it would only be for between two to six months away at most. But then you would come back and finish your apprenticeship under me anyway.”

Hermione kept her face as impassive as possible.

Albert looked over at Hermione, pausing in his task, to add, “Had I taken Trevor Spawn, and he did not have the discipline to be an able apprentice, given the history of his failures at the Department S & R, I think I might have made the move to pawn him off on another master. As it was, I would have been stuck with him out of financial obligation, being paid handsomely by his father to take him. I think it's hard to tell from a few interviews and letters of recommendation if a master or mistress and a potential apprentice will get along well. I think it is a bit short-sighted and discriminatory for our community to take such a petty attitude regarding switching masters or mistresses. But unfortunately, that is the prejudice we currently have, and it is one I hope will eventually vanish. It's like divorce – sometimes it just doesn't work out in the end, and both parties are happier if they part, given from what you've told me of own your divorce so far. I hope I'm not being too bold.”

“No, not at all Albert,” she assured her master.

It figured that the same attitude regarding divorce in the wizarding world would be the same between master or mistress and apprentice, both parties encouraged to stick it out and suffer, no matter how disastrous or unhappy they are with the arrangement.

With Albert's insight, Hermione squashed the idea of running off to see Severus before the end of her apprenticeship. If she saw Severus, she would probably never leave his side again.

__*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*

It certainly didn't take long for the invitation to arrive at Severus' shop. The wedding invitation to Tina and Manny's wedding arrived via snowy owl, as the couple had chosen to use white owls to deliver their invitations, other than those they handed out personally.
Severus wondered if he was invited because Tina was in hope of accruing a large pile of gifts from guests, or that Manny considered him enough of an acquaintance to bother inviting. It seems that Draco and Ginny had received an invitation as well. He would have to ask Ginny for recommendations of a gift for the couple, that was under a certain denomination.

Severus’ wedding gift to the Malfoys was based on the fact that Draco had already bought everything to set up house for Ginny, so his gift was more for something to enjoy immediately on their honeymoon.

Draco still occasionally grumbled that he wished he could retrieve his mother’s sterling silver flatware since the Ministry had seized Malfoy Manor, all its contents, and his entire Gringotts vault in London. Perhaps as a first anniversary present, Severus would send Naomi off to England in search of his mother’s sterling flatware, since it was a full service of 24 place settings that had been handed down through the Black family for over 300 years before Narcissa received it as part of her hope chest and dowry. Not many families needed a silver service for 24, or wanted one associated with a family more renown for being Death Eaters than of the headmaster that once ran Hogwarts a long time ago.

For his lunch break, Severus went over to the shop where the wizard who was building his house was busy planning a beam of ‘ohi’a wood. He had picked ‘ohi’a for the main support and frame of his house because it was a very hard and dense wood, he wanted something that would last a long time, since Severus had no intention of ever moving away from Malu Palekaiko. Many other houses on the island used koa wood for construction as it was a very good hardwood, but Severus wanted something a little bit more durable, and something a little different, though the price was just a bit more.

Draco had fronted Severus all the money he needed to purchase the land and also for the construction of his dream home. He hated to be literally in debt to Draco, but he was willing to put his pride aside since he would be able to pay Draco back, eventually.

Severus had worked with the builder for a few weeks on the design of his house. He preferred tall open-beamed ceilings, especially in his Potions lab so there would be room for the smoke and fumes to rise above into the rafters and not choke him out of his own lab. This was because a few advanced potions required the burning and scorching of some ingredients in order to unlock some of their magical properties.

There were specific requirements for the room he had designed specifically as his library. Severus had visited the island’s one and only bookstore many times, compiling a long list of titles he wanted to purchase, but refrained until he had his house built. Currently, Severus was storing his entire library at his shop, and there was barely enough shelf space for both his work and personal library. Once his house was built, about half of the books would be coming back home. He made sure to have enough shelf space to hold his entire library, plus room to grow in hopes that Hermione might join him someday, and since buying and reading books was one of Severus' few compulsions. And it was a fine hobby to have, especially since he could afford to buy most of the books he wanted now. But since opening his shop, he wasn't able to spend as much time reading as he once had.

Running a business was a full-time job. It was almost as demanding of his time during his tenure at Hogwarts during the school year, but there were no sudden calls from the Dark Lord to drag him away from scrolls of Potions homework that needed correcting anymore. At least during the summers, while teaching at Hogwarts, Severus had plenty of time to catch up on reading that he didn't have during the term. But running his business was a week-in, week-out demand of his time. There were some scheduled breaks coming up in the year, as there were various harvests throughout the year that would demand much of the children's time as they helped on the various farms all around the island. There was sugar cane, pineapple, mango, papaya, taro, coffee, other exotic fruits, plus the cut-flower trade, all of which was exported mostly to the mainland and other countries. There were some Potions ingredients that were harvested and exported, but the amount was much smaller than the agricultural side of the export trade.

But given how the schedule seemed to run with six to eight weeks of tutoring with a one- to two-week break, this actually would be more beneficial to the students retaining knowledge, since there would be none of the degradation of the students' knowledge from a three-month break that he normally encountered at Hogwarts. For some reason, a three-month break meant that some of his lessons and pearls of wisdom he imparted to his students dribbled out of brains and out their ears, since it seemed he spent the first month of every year going over the previous year's lessons that the students seemed to have forgotten during their lengthy break. Frequent short one- or two-week breaks would mean that knowledge would still remain fresh between the ears.

Such a break was coming up soon in early April. It would be a one-week break for Easter, since many of the island's multi-generational inhabitants were practicing Christians, a hold-over from when Christian missionaries first came to the islands, unaware that before they came Hawaii had an integrated society where Muggles and wizards lived side-by-side. It was shortly after the International Statute of Wizarding Secrecy that the islands were discovered by not only Muggles, but by the rest of the wizarding communities, which forced the segregation of Hawaiian society. There was still a lingering resentment over that fact, but the resentment seemed to wane more and more as the generations passed, and the last of the ones who had lived during the days when their society was split in two had passed away over one hundred years ago. It was for the fact that Muggles and wizards had once lived harmoniously with one another in the Hawaiian Islands that Muggle culture was not shunned to the degree it was in England.

Severus was certain that if he had been born and raised in Malu Palekaiko, he would have been a different person. His parents still might have been just as awful, abusive, and neglectful, but the people who would have surrounded him in this community would not have been of the same caliber as the Slytherins with whom he'd attached himself at Hogwarts – who had seduced him into the Dark Lord's cult.

~~~~~~~~~
It was time for the weekly staff meeting at The Lovely Lavender Company. Hermione had fetched her Aunt Christine from in front of the Leaky Cauldron and escorted her through the old pub, out the back, through the moving brick wall, and into Diagon Alley before arriving at the company's headquarters, which was located past Gringotts and off on a side street.

Aunt Christine, despite being through Diagon Alley a few times before, kept craning her neck around to see all the various quaint stores and odd dress of the wizarding population, which seemed to find Christine's business suit just as equally strange, garnering stares back. Even the trip to Gringotts and the introduction to the goblin bankers was quite the experience, since Christine could not have Lavender deposit funds into her Muggle bank, and would require a vault at Gringotts for the wizarding side of her consultation business. The goblins would then convert Galleons into Muggle money as Christine needed. However, Hermione or Lavender would always have to be with her to help her get into Diagon Alley and deal with the goblins, since goblins were reluctant to deal with Muggles unless they were accompanied by a witch or wizard. It was an issue the Muggle Alliance Network leadership promised to look into, once the Alliance was large enough to be taken seriously by the goblins.

As the four staff members sat there, Lavender had Wonkle bring tea, which caused yet another startled response from Hermione's Muggle aunt. The sight of house-elves was quite disturbing, having her preconceived notions about elves being cute and adorable smashed with the grim reality of seeing an actual elf, with bulbous eyes, bat-like ears, wrinkled skin, sparse wisps of hair, tatty rags and all.

Christine found her composure once again as talk of business began. There were layouts for new ads that Lavender found ingenious in their concepts, but made some suggestion for her to change regarding word choices, since there were a few Muggle cultural references that didn't translate very well into the wizarding world. The launch plan for India was in the beginning phases and Christine was in her element, as her specialty was launching into new regions.

Albert and Hermione had updates regarding the latest Potions they were testing. Unfortunately, since Christine was a Muggle, she could not participate in the trial phase, or even sample a potion. It was up to Hermione and Lavender to give Christine feedback regarding a product's effects.

It seemed that the business at hand was drawing to a close; however, it wasn't. Lavender was holding a very weather-beaten letter in her hand. It seemed to have traveled a long way, given how it was worn around the edges and along the fold, and the water stains.

“I was wondering how your apprenticeship is coming along, Hermione?” Lavender questioned, fondling the letter.

“Well, Albert would be the better judge of that since he knows how much I have left to learn, though I still have four languages to master,” Hermione deferred.

“Four more languages?” Christine asked with astonishment.

“Many Potions books have anti-translation spells. Trade secrets and such,” Hermione answered.

Now Christine recalled walking in on such a conversation before between Hermione and her sister, Wendy. She finally pieced together what the two had been talking about when she walked in on them in the kitchen at Hermione's birthday party.

“I can help you with French, if you need any,” Christine offered.

“Thank you, but next I'll be working on Latin,” her niece replied.

“Which brings me to something I wanted to discuss with you, Hermione. After you master Latin, what other languages did you have in mind to master?” her boss asked.

“Well, I was thinking of Arabic, German, and Chinese.”

Lavender folded up the letter and moved it back and forth, playing with it, almost like a fan. “What if I were to suggest that perhaps you might consider Japanese and Spanish instead of Arabic and German?” Lavender asked, her brows raised, almost looking amused.

“Well, I guess I could, though learning German allows me to learn other Germanic and Scandinavian-based languages faster. And Spanish will be quite easy to master once I've learned Latin,” Hermione surmised. “Why the interest in those two languages?”

Lavender leaned back and began slowly swiveling her chair from side to side. Smiling, she said, “I figure by the time you have finished your apprenticeship, I'll be ready to launch in eastern Asia, Australia, and the Americas, given my launch in the Americas was put on hold. And given that Mexico, Central America, and most of South America speak Spanish, it would be a very useful language to learn.”

“You're launching into India soon. Wouldn't Sanskrit serve me better, given that India is home to a population nearly as large as China?” Hermione countered.

“Well,” Lavender said slowly, smiling secretly to herself, “there is more than just expanding into these markets I'm considering. You see...” She paused wondering the order in which to reveal several bits of new information. “I'm thinking of possibly having you run the Asia-Pacific region of The Lovely Lavender Company, in addition to developing Potions for regional markets, as the Eastern Asian markets have certain cultural preferences that would be far different versus European and American markets.”

Hermione stammered. “I... I don't know what to say. I'm flattered you would consider me, but I know nothing about running a business, especially a regional office for such an operation.”

“Oh, but you will. You see, I want to train you to help run my company, Hermione. As I will definitely need your help in the near future. Say in another eight months or so, I'll be a bit too busy with other things in order to come into the office full-time, and I'll need your help,” Lavender admitted, lazily stroking her still flat abdomen.

“You're pregnant?” Christine accurately guessed, recognizing the unconscious stroking of her abdomen from her own pregnancy and the way Lavender smiled.

“Yes!” Lavender gushed with a huge smile.

Christine jumped up and ran around Lavender's desk to congratulate her one and only client. Albert also got up and walked over to shake Lavender's hand in congratulations as well.

Hermione's initial reaction was to say, “Better you than me,” but held her tongue. Thinking about it, she was actually happy for Lavender and Ron. Ron had wanted children, and better that he have them with someone whom he truly loved.

“So, Hermione. I need someone who will help me run my company while I'm recovering and spending time with the baby. The twins wanted you to run The Sirens' Secrets, so if they wanted you to run that, I have faith in you to help run my company while I'm working with far, far, fewer hours for a while, and to eventually run operations for Asia-Pacific. What do you say?” her boss asked.

It was a thrilling prospect, running an operation of near equal size, plus developing Potions, making use of her talent, but suddenly, she wondered how Severus would fit into all this. She wanted more than anything to be with Severus and was ready to turn Lavender down, even though she and Severus had made no promises to one another.

“I... well...” Hermione hoped it would be somewhere close to Severus so that perhaps she could Portkey into work. “Do you have an idea where you want this Asia-Pacific office to be?” she asked, feeling nervous that it might be someplace like Tokyo, Beijing, or Lima – and keep her traveling so much that it would strain her possible future relationship with Severus.

“What better place to have you manage that region from than to have you smack dab in the middle of it. I was thinking someplace like, oh...” Lavender said, dragging out the suspense, “... like... Hawaii?”

Hermione didn't know if she should laugh or cry. In short order she was doing both, feeling relieved and thrilled that the fates were working to put her and Severus back together.

“Hawaii? Where's that?” Albert asked, which confirmed Hermione's suspicion that Dumbledore not only wiped Hawaii and Malu Palekaiko from books and maps, but from the minds of the British wizarding public.

Christine looked over at Albert and asked flatly, “You are joking, right?”

Hermione looked at her aunt and minutely shook her head, indicating this was something not to question and she would fill her in on it later.

Lavender, sensing the potential for a future problem, interrupted the conversation between Albert and Christine. “So, Hermione, are you interested?”

Hermione jumped up and ran around and hugged Lavender, thanking her profusely and also congratulating her on the happy news.

For some reason, this news about eventually moving to Hawaii gave Hermione the courage to finally view the third and last memory from Severus. For some strange and silly reason, she couldn't view it before, fearing what his message to her might be. She had no reason to assume it would bear bad news, but she couldn't find the strength to pour it into Lavender's Pensieve until now.
The only reason Hermione could think of Lavender suggesting setting up operations in Hawaii was because Severus had owled her with the suggestion. She wondered if Severus was going to go back to working for Lavender, or if there was something else he would do. Maybe he'd opened his Potions shop and this was a way to bring her back to him once she was done with her apprenticeship. Lavender did say that around the time Hermione was done with her apprenticeship she would be launching in the Asia–Pacific region. Maybe if Hermione applied herself even more, she could finish her apprenticeship quicker, and be on her way to be reunited with Severus that much sooner.

Albert and Christine left Lavender's office, heading back to their respective offices, as Lavender had set up a place for Christine to work when she was on-site for Fridays. Hermione stuck around, hanging back, eager to talk more with Lavender.

“Is there anything else Severus says in his letter,” Hermione asked, eager to hear more news about him.

Lavender's smile faltered. “Severus didn't write to me, if that’s what you were thinking.”

“Well, the letter in your hand, and your decision to set it up in Hawaii...” Hermione could feel the tears filling up in her eyes. She had hoped it was Severus who had written the letter, but it was not.

“I'm sorry if you assumed he wrote it. It was Draco,” the blonde witch admitted.

“Draco?” Hermione didn't know what to think. She thought Draco still couldn't stand the sight of her, given that murderous look he had given her when he was Polyjuiced as Harry the day they fled. They grated on each other's nerves.

“It seems Draco misses doing advertising and marketing, finding it more rewarding than his current occupation,” Lavender said without giving away even of a hint of what Draco was doing for work.

Hermione flopped back into her chair feeling a bit defeated. She had thought that Severus had found some way to bring her back to him without outright begging, which was not in his nature to do. Well, except for that one time she was blindfolded and their hormones got the better of them. But Hermione remembered how it had almost pained him to beg her to come with him. She should have known. Her heart felt a little less elated.
Lavender must have seen the chance, between teaching Hermione how to run the business for her upcoming maternity leave and Draco's suggestion to open up a regional office in Hawaii, to blend them into a new opportunity for Hermione.

Squaring her shoulders, Hermione put on a brave face and went back to her own office. Even with her hopes wavering between elation and disappointment, she made a promise to stay late and view Severus' third and final memory that night. Her curiosity had finally become stronger than her fear, or so she thought.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Thank you to both of my lovely betas, JuneW and Hope, for their work on improving this chapter.

You can read about Palmers Green, the Greek enclave in North London, on wikipedia: http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Palmers_Green

“No Greek home would be complete without at least one cactus positioned somewhere near the front entrance. In a big ‘Feta’ can or garden pot, a cactus with its thorny spikes, takes it place proudly warding off the evil eye from the property.”
http://www.faliraki-info.com/susie/superstitions/greek-traditions.htm

You can read more about tsipouro here:

Snipes are the mythical creatures Muggle men say they are taking women in search for as a euphemism for taking them some place discreet for a bit of canoodling.

“ 'Ohi’a (METROSIDEROS POLYMORPHA) is unique to Hawai‘i. It is one of the trees initially used by native Hawaiians for critical construction applications such as tools, and wear-strips along the gunwales of canoes. Its modern applications are typically in flooring, furniture and cabinetry. It is the most common endemic tree in the state, can be a major component of mixed forest stands, and is one of the very first trees able to take root on new lava fields. The tree is present in shapes ranging from shrubs to 100 feet in height. The wood ranges in color from pale brown to a dark reddish brown. It is fine grained, very hard, strong, and dense (specific gravity .70) In furniture and cabinetry applications, 'Ohi'a is nearly indestructible. However, great care and experience must be brought to bear in the seasoning of this notoriously unstable wood.”
http://www.winklerwoods.com/ww/hawaiianwoods.html
“Never Provoke a Friendly Slytherin”

Chapter Summary

Akela decides to ask a favor of Severus, which brings back the full-blown snarky Potions master. Hermione visits some memories in Lavender's Pensieve, one memory having the distinct hint of lemons.

Chapter Notes

WARNING: NSFW fan art embedded into story further down as you scroll.

On Friday, Lavender had proposed that Hermione move to Hawaii to open a regional office and manufacturing facility. Despite Hermione's promise to herself to look at Severus' third and final memory that Friday, she waited until the following Monday. She had hoped that Severus might have sent an albatross by now. Given the fact Severus had only written to her twice before – a sweet missive under the guise of Calleo and a terse note as himself – she wasn't surprised. Besides, Severus was paranoid, and justly so. She surmised he probably considered it prudent not to create more incriminating evidence linking himself to her, as the hunt for the two Death Eaters who had escaped England was still not solved. Given that Moody had recently searched her flat and found her books on Hawaii, it was a good thing she had no letters from Severus laying about. At least her escape box where she kept Severus' memories was left undisturbed, as she had hidden it in her underwear drawer with a charm to remain unnoticed. Thank Merlin, the Aurors had left it alone.

Opening the simple, brown wooden box that she had luckily been storing in her escape box, Hermione pulled out the vial with the yellow cap. His note said that this memory was for her personally.

Her door was already locked and everyone else had gone home for the day.

Falling into the memory, she found herself back in her flat, though actually in the memory it was still Severus' flat. He was sitting in one of the wingback chairs, dressed in his black frock coat, a dark burgundy shirt, and black trousers – the outfit that she had last seen him wearing. In the background, Marf, Dheef, Wonkle and a few other house-elves Hermione recognized from work were Apparating in and out of view, each time carrying a towering stack of books to set on the floor behind Severus, only to disappear and return with another teetering stack of books.

Hermione could place the memory to their last night together. She must have just left and the house-selves were bringing his books back from being secreted away for temporary storage in the office loft space at The Sirens' Secrets.

It was good to see the Severus she knew so well once again. She had seen the Pensieve version of Severus looking emaciated and haunted, his soul threadbare during the last days of the war, many times during her quest to re-examine his memories to find a way to clear his and Draco's names.

He was staring straight ahead as he addressed the air in front of him, knowing it would be Hermione who would be seeing him in a Pensieve.

“Hermione, if you are viewing this memory, then hopefully you've seen the two other memories.”

Hermione stood in front of the memory of Severus, his eyes focused beyond where she stood as if seeing through her like a ghost.

“I want to start by saying that come morning, or some later time, after hearing my confession about my wife, should you choose to reconsider your choice to clear my name or join me in the future, I will not hold it against you. Your insistence of your constant love for me and trying to find the best in people is what makes me love you that much more. You're one of the few decent people in this world who has yet to disappoint me, forgiving those small indiscretions in your youth. I'm made unforgivable mistakes in my youth, so I cannot fault you for those small ones anymore.

“You have made me fall in love with you, as much as I did not want to and fought against it. My heart is not easily won over, and yet you have done just that.”
Severus paused for a moment, inhaling sharply as if in preparation of something.

“It is my hope that someday, when you finish with your apprenticeship, you will come to join me once more. If you have seen the memory with the blue cap, then you know where you can find me.”

Severus' gaze dropped and Hermione could see him struggle within himself.

“And should you choose to not follow me, coming to your senses that you wouldn't want to live with your old professor who was once a Death Eater and who killed his wife...” Severus lifted his head up higher, putting on his own brave face. “... then I hope you have a wonderful life full of love, joy, and success. You've given me a chance to experience love as I've never had before, and I will always cherish how much you made me feel needed and treasured by you. And I hope the light that is inside of you, that is like a beacon, never diminishes.”

Severus stood up from his chair, continuing to gaze towards the wall on the other side of the room.

“Goodbye, Hermione.”

Finding herself back in her office, Hermione slumped to the floor and wept, her heart aching as much as the morning that Severus fled.

The old fortuneteller's nebulous words came back to haunt her now. “But if you do not leave with him, you will see him again in the future.” Seeing Severus just now in the memory fulfilled her prediction. The certainty she would see Severus in person again, even with the news of her future employment in Hawaii, seemed even less so now.

~~~~~~~*~

To Severus' relief, he did not have to take Akela on as a tutoring student in order to help her get over her crush on him. A handsome local wizard about three years older than her, by the name of Ulrich, had finally noticed what a lovely young witch she had blossomed into and the two were courting.

Ulrich was quite comely, and unfortunately knew it. There was something about the boy that hit a particular nerve in Severus, like the twinge of an old injury if aggravated. It was his cocky attitude, driven on by his talent as a wizard and his good looks, that reminded the older wizard of Sirius Black and James Potter.
Mounga said he was a good boy from a good family and didn't get up to trouble like others, and given that Mounga was the local judge, he knew who the trouble-makers were. His reassurances still didn't ease Severus' suspicions about the young wizard.

Severus didn't think there would be anything left for him to teach Akela in preparation for her SAT's anyway, since the questionnaire she had filled out, and had signed by her mother, indicated she had mastered all the necessary Potions in order to pass her test with flying colors, plus she had taken on some more advanced elixirs on her own. If Akela was interested in still becoming a Potions mistress, he would contact a couple Potions mistresses he knew back in England, probably under his nom de guerre, since Severus Snape was still persona non grata, even in Potions master circles.

It was late Friday afternoon. Severus would be closing up shop in another hour so he and Draco, along with Ginny, could join the Finaus for their habitual end-of-week drinks.

The shop was quiet, as Draco had just finished with his last student for the day before the week-long Easter break began. Severus had some homework that he needed to finish grading before they could close up shop.

The door opened as Severus had his head down over his desk, checking over the ledger and appointment book to see how busy he would be next week with his students off. With the chime of the bell, he bid whomever it was to come into his office.

“Uncle Severus?” Akela addressed him. She had adopted the addressing of him in the same manner as her little sister, as her crush had waned and she wasn't quite as infatuated with him anymore.

“Akela. Come in. What is it?” he asked, curious as to why she was there.

Walking through the threshold, she kept her eyes down and quietly closed the door. Taking the seat on the other side of Severus' desk, she sat down, looking timid and demure.

“Is there something the matter?” Severus asked, wondering if there was some bad news, since she normally was a cheerful and effusive girl.

“I would like to pay you for a commission,” she stated, her gaze briefly flitting up to meet the Potions master's eyes.
He could have stopped her right there, since underage witches and wizards could not request commissions without parental approval. And anything that she was legally able to buy for Potions brewing for her age, she could easily purchase at the apothecary, and probably cheaper than what his brewing time was worth.

His eyes narrowed slightly as he scrutinized the young witch in front of him who was acting strangely. Severus leaned back in his chair and steepled his fingers. His curiosity was piqued, and given how she seemed to be there clandestinely, judging by her behavior, he wanted to know what she was seeking.

“And just what potion are you willing to pay me to brew for you?” he asked in a cool tone, keeping his face impassive.

Akela's eyes glanced back up at Severus only to dart away again nervously. “I want you to brew a contraceptive for me.”

It was that Ulrich boy. Severus wasn't sure if he was pressuring her into sex or if she felt she was ready. That young wizard he strongly disliked was the impetus behind Akela asking for that particular elixir.

“You do realize that contraceptives are available for purchase at the local apothecary,” he prompted her.

“Yes.”

“Then why don't you purchase them there instead of seeking to pay me for my time and skills?” Severus prodded. He knew the answer, he just wanted to draw her along a line of questioning like a barrister in a courtroom would draw a defendant out into admitting his guilt. This is why Slytherins made the best lawyers.

“You know why.”

“Enlighten me,” he said firmly, his voice becoming deeper and more serious.
“Because I'm not seventeen yet. I'm under the age of consent,” she confessed, her eyes firmly fixed on the box of tissues Severus had placed at the edge of his desk. Akela didn't need a tissue, but it was someplace convenient to fix her gaze other than to look Severus in the eye.

“And what makes you think that if you could not go to an apothecary that I could brew one for you?” Severus continued with his probing questions.

Akela's eyes flitted up and were pleading. “Because you're my friend?”

It angered Severus that this girl could think that because she called him “Uncle Severus” that he would break the law and the Potions Master Code For Ethical Behavior by brewing this underage girl a contraceptive potion behind her parents' back.

Madam Pomfrey did hand out contraceptive potions like candy back at Hogwarts, but she did so because there was an unspoken rule at Hogwarts that they didn't want witches suddenly leaving their education because of a little “complication.” Severus didn't exactly tell his underage students to go to Madam Pomfrey, but by informing the students who were of age during their seventh year, word trickled down to the younger students who began exploring their sexuality before turning seventeen. Severus did his best to discourage further incidents and accidents by roaming about the castle to stop those caught in the act, especially the Astronomy Tower and numerous broom closets that dotted the vast school.

But given that Akela was not at a boarding school, far away from her parents for months at a time, he was under obligation to follow certain rules of conduct and laws. And even if he could, he would prefer not to, especially since that arrogant upstart twat, Ulrich, was involved.

“Do not think that because we are on familiar terms with one another, given the friendship I have with your parents, that I would break the law by providing a contraceptive to an underage witch without parental consent,” Severus lectured, his eyes piercing and simmering with umbrage.

“And why not? You don't want to see me get pregnant, do you?” Akela threw out as a challenge. Her rhetorical question was phrased as an implied threat that if she did have sex and became pregnant because he didn't give her a contraceptive potion, it would be his fault, not Ulrich's.

Severus was a master of spotting a fallacious argument from a mile away. She was doing a poor job of hiding her shoddily constructed argument from being torn to shreds.
“Should you find yourself with child, it will be through no fault of my own, but from your poor choices in not waiting until you are of age, and your choosing a partner who would pressure you into anything you are too young to do,” Severus hissed, glaring at the young witch who tried not to cower under his penetrating gaze.

Jutting her chin out defiantly, Akela countered, “Ulrich isn't pressuring me to do anything. My sixteenth birthday is in a couple weeks and I figure that it's time. It's my virginity, I'll do what I want with it. And I'll give it to anyone I choose, and I choose Ulrich.” Akela sounded more petulant than certain of her choice.

“Ulrich is an arrogant boy, who you have accused in the past of ignoring you, having heard you wail about like a lovesick fool,” Severus snarled. And he had heard her whine about Ulrich shunning her until quite recently.

Given how over the past few months, Akela was blossoming even more, becoming more shapely, he could understand why Ulrich was suddenly taking an interest in the young witch.

Continuing on with his lecturing, he added, “I think Ulrich is only interested in your superficial charms, not appreciating the person you are without your beauty. And a person who only is attracted to you by looks alone, disregarding you when your mind and personality was not enough, is not someone worthy of such a gift you are offering him.”

“But I love him!”

“And if he loves you, he will wait until you are of age or have convinced your parents of the deep and unshakable love between you,” Severus said, his voice booming, as he stood behind his desk, his palms flat on his desk as he leaned forward to drive his point home. “But I would bet my sterling silver cauldron that if you refuse him, he will quickly direct his affections towards another young and more foolish witch whom he will bed without a care for you.” There was a smirk upon his lips, knowing he was right.

Akela sat there stunned by this side of Severus she had never seen before. There was almost a cruel satisfaction in his tone.

Severus continued on with his diatribe. “And because you came to me, I must inform your parents of your request.”
“You wouldn’t,” she breathed in disbelief. “Your sign says ‘discretion guaranteed,’ you can’t.” Her eyes darted to the wand in her pocket, wondering if she could cast an Obliviate on him so he wouldn’t tell on her, but she knew he was faster with a wand and it would only wind up getting her into more trouble.

“I can and I must, given you are underage,” the Potions master informed her. “If you are so keen on studying to become a Potions mistress, you would have already begun to familiarize yourself with the code of ethics involved to becoming accredited as one. And while some Potions masters choose to ignore some aspects of the code, I will not disregard my principles because you perceive that our chumminess supersedes the code of ethics I am bound by.”

Akela stood up and pulled the door open, stopping at the threshold to turn at glare at Severus, her eyes full of tears and hatred that only a teenager could direct at any adult who questioned her decision.

In a shrill voice, she screamed, “I thought you were cool, but I was wrong. You’re an asshole, JUST LIKE MY FATHER!”

Stunned to be talked to in such a tone, and by a girl who had always been sweet and a bit overly affectionate with him, Severus almost yelled, “Fifty points from...” but suddenly remembered he was not at Hogwarts anymore. The last time any young witch addressed him like that was while he was still teaching there, and would easily result in point deductions and lots of detentions.

Draco stood up and ran to the threshold of his office to see Akela run past him and out the door, tears streaming from her eyes. Glancing back at Severus' door, he saw his mentor standing behind his desk, a fury in his face that he had only seen when Potter had been impudent and cheeky with him in the classroom.

Seeing the perplexed look on Draco's face, he shouted, “Go on! Go after her before she does something infinitely more stupid.”

Draco had no idea what she did, but it must have been something pretty spectacular for her to get Severus to yell at her like that.

Rushing out the door, Draco saw Akela run around the corner. He heard her footsteps stop once she was out of view of the shop.
Walking to the end of the lane, Draco peered around the corner to see her sitting there on the sidewalk, slumped down, her back braced against the brick wall.

Raising his brows up questioningly, he asked, “Mind if I join you?”

“Not if you're going to yell at me like he did,” she sniveled, sniffing and wiping away at her tears with the back of her hand.

Draco walked around the corner and sat down on the sidewalk next to her, aware that Severus had sneaked up behind him and was right around the corner, ready to listen in, with Akela not knowing. No doubt, Mounge would later be filled in on the details of what had transpired, and Severus was better at remembering everything said, down to the last word.

“Care to tell me what happened? You must have really gotten under his skin for you to make him yell at you like that.”

There were a great many things that made Severus yell and snarl and growl at people, but since coming to Malu Palekaiko, the causes for him to react as such had become few and far between. Miss Brown no longer was throwing little bombs into his lap, buttering him up with tea and fancy biscuits. He no longer taught at Hogwarts, and Hermione wasn't giving him mixed signals anymore. But Severus never yelled at his students anymore, especially since parents were paying per session and could take their business away should he prove too curmudgeonly. Akela was not a student of his, but she was the daughter of the Finaus, Severus' friends, who they were going to meet for drinks in about forty-five minutes.

Hiccuping through her gasps and hitching breaths, Akela whined, “Ulrich and I are in love. I wanted to have sex with him for my sixteenth birthday to prove my love for him, but Uncle Severus said that Ulrich only wants me for sex. That's not true. All I asked him for was a contraceptive so I wouldn't get pregnant my first time.”

“Oh, boy,” Draco sighed, as he conjured a handkerchief for Akela to blot her moist face. “Akela, I can't say you should wait, since it would be hypocritical of me to say wait until you are seventeen, but I can say from experience, you would do well to wait.”

“How old were you when you first had sex?” she asked.

“Too young.”
“How old,” she asked him, her voice indicating she was not in a mood to be bullshitted by hemming and hawing.

“How old.”

“Fifteen.”

“See, and I'm almost sixteen, and girls always have sex at a younger age than boys,” Akela surmised, thinking Draco's answer justified her decision.

“Akela, it's not like that. Trust me when I say that having sex when you are too young can be an awkward, embarrassing, and – for the witch – a possibly painful and boring experience. Especially since a lot of boys have no clue what they are doing,” Draco admitted, rubbing the back of his neck with his hand nervously.

“If you're worried about my hymen, I lost that a long time ago. I do ride a broom, you know.” she said sarcastically.

Letting out a sigh of exasperation, Draco said, “Listen, if Ulrich really loves you, he will wait. Love is patient; it transcends time by waiting for when the time is right for you to be together.”

“But that time is now. I love him, and he says he loves me,” she insisted.

“And if he really loves you, he will wait until you are a little older. I mean, how long have you two been seeing each other now?”

“A little over a month,” Akela mumbled.

“A month? Come on! That's barely time enough for him to get a hand under your shirt at your age.”

Severus almost fell over at Draco's comment, but stilled himself to remain quiet. It would not do Draco any good for Severus to give away he was listening in the whole time.

The blond wizard, who was closer in age to Akela than to Severus, nudged her with his elbow.
“Don't you think you're taking things a little too fast by pushing things ahead so quickly?”

“But he's so cute, and I want him so badly,” she pleaded longingly. “And I'm sooo horny I could snap a broom between my legs,” Akela growled with frustration.

Draco burst into fits of laughter over Akela's blatant honesty. “I'm sorry. I shouldn't laugh, but that's an amusing turn of the phrase. But if you are really that frustrated, there are potions to turn down the heat. And trust me, they do work. I know how vexing it can be with your hormones running amok, but sex doesn't make the desire go away, it only feeds the fire. Trust me, I know what I'm talking about and I'm young enough to remember it all.”

“Uncle Severus, the way he reacted, you'd think he never had sex or was in love. And here I was thinking he was some sexy experienced guy. Turns out he's a big, fat prude,” Akela pouted, crossing her arms in front of her, kicking at a stone just beyond the reach of her foot. “Probably a virgin,” she added out of spite.

Draco would pay Severus a hundred Galleons just to see the look on his face in a Pensieve memory of overhearing Akela's assessment of his mentor.

Valiantly, Draco succeeded in keeping his face serious and not letting his amusement at her comments seep into his voice. “Severus is a complex wizard. There is a lot you don't know about him. Even I don't know everything about him. But if he refused to brew you a contraceptive, it’s probably because first and foremost because you are underage. He could get into a lot of trouble if he provided one to you without your parents knowing. And your father is the town judge. How would that look to your father that a wizard who he trusted and was his friend broke some pretty basic and fundamental laws? I mean, if anything, if you really want to have sex with Ulrich so badly, then you’ll just have to convince your parents that not only are you old enough, but mature enough to make this decision yourself. You have to convince them, not Severus.”

Akela sniffed a bit more, wiping away the last of her tears, seeing the logic in Draco's argument begrudgingly, especially since he didn't bark at her like Uncle Severus had.

“Yeah, I guess you're right,” she reluctantly agreed. “I don't want him to get into trouble, but I hate the way he just lit into me, and said Ulrich only paid attention to me for the sole purpose of sex.”

“Severus is a pretty observant person,” Draco noted with admiration. “He is very astute, so I wouldn't necessarily discount his opinion. He may be older, but he's been around long enough to recognize certain things.”
“Yeah, well, he's still a jerk for yelling at me.”

“And did you yell at him first? Were you disrespectful?” Draco asked, knowing she probably got into his face or got demanding.

“No,” she replied in a way that Draco knew she was lying and trying to kid herself.

Letting her lie slip this once without calling her on it, remembering how petulant and deluded he used to be at that age, he said, “Well, I recommend that you tell Ulrich you want to wait. And if he really loves you, he’ll understand. He may be frustrated, but he will understand. Consider it a little test of his love. Just don't 'test' him too much.”

“Okay, thanks... I guess.”

Severus could hear the two getting up off the pavement and he silently rushed back to his shop and slipped inside before Akela crossed the small lane on her way home, since she was supposed to be home to babysit her little sister. This meant being at home before her parents left for their weekly date night.

Sitting in his office and pretending he had been there the whole time, he heard Draco enter.

The younger wizard stood in his doorway, studying the older wizard who had his nose firmly planted in his ledger.

“Did you hear the conversation?” Draco asked.

“Every word of it.”

Draco made to turn to go to his office to lock up for the night when Severus said, “Thank you for diffusing the situation.”

He didn't look back, but nodded that he understood.
It was close enough to closing time, and Severus didn't think he would have any more customers for the night. A couple of his students, as payment for tutoring, had already cleaned up his shop for the night, making sure everything was ready for the next day – fresh candles were in place, counters and bathroom cleaned, floors swept, trash taken out, cauldrons scrubbed and neatly stacked, and recent deliveries put away in the back for Severus to sort later. After checking on some potions that were simmering away in his work lab, Severus locked up and walked with Draco to the bar where Ginny was already waiting for them with Mouna and Rainbow, who waved at the pair of wizards as they entered.

Bongo called out “Aloha,” to which the rest of the bar joined in welcoming the Friday night regulars.

“Ogden's Old Firewhisky, and make it a double,” Severus ordered, his face austere as his voice. The few decorations placed around the bar for Easter were only slightly more insipid than the St. Patrick's Day and Valentine's Day frippery Bongo put up. It was all Severus could do not to blast the hopping bunny to bits with his wand.

“That good, eh?” Rainbow chimed in cheerfully.

Severus' eyes glanced sideways at the witch's offhanded remark before Summoning a quill and bottle of ink Bongo kept by the cash register.

Grabbing a bar napkin, Severus began scribbling down some notes.

Mouna, intrigued by Severus’ mood and what he was writing leaned over sideways, but could not tell what he was scribbling.

Done with his scribbling, Severus stood up and handed Rainbow the napkin with instructions for a potion.

“What's this?” she asked.

“Mint, cilantro, and finely chopped black licorice macerated with plain vodka. Strain and add the blood of an Arctic mongoose,” Severus said before dropping his voice just quiet enough so that just Rainbow and Mouna could hear, leaning forward. “That should cool the most fiery and fervid ardor of the most hormonally-addled teenagers, given your daughter just approached me to brew a contraceptive potion by claiming she was ready to become more intimate with Ulrich.”

“What?!?” Rainbow shouted. This caught the attention of the whole bar, as everyone stopped talking to turn and look at her. Even the four people playing some honky-tonk tune on guitar, piano, hammer dulcimer, and a small drum kit stopped momentarily before playing once more.

With a glare from Rainbow, everyone went back to minding their own business.

Mounga put a hand over his face, obviously pained.

“What?” Ginny said, having not heard.

“I'll explain later, Ginny” Draco explained.

“You were there too?” Rainbow asked, looking to Draco.

Severus gestured towards Draco. “You should thank him, as I think he may have talked her into waiting, since I yelled at Akela after she tried to pin blame on me should any unfortunate consequences occur, causing her to run away in tears.”

Bongo served up Severus' drink, which he downed most of in one go.

“Oh, she didn't,” Draco remarked with astonishment, having not heard the conversation since Severus door was closed until the end. Now the blond wizard understood exactly why the Potions master blew up at the young witch.

Severus smiled sardonically, giving Akela's parents a look to let them know he was not pleased by her attempt to twist his arm in such a fashion.

“Oh, fuck me, dude,” Mounga groaned, putting his face back into his hand. The large wizard rarely swore, so for him to do so indicated the gravity of the situation.

Severus was still so livid over the experience, he said, biting out his words, “And should you care to know word for word what transpired, I'll gladly offer up my memory of your daughter's petulant whinging for viewing in a Pensieve.”

Rainbow looked like she was ready to take Severus up on his offer, but Mouna shook his head and put his hand on Severus' arm. “That won't be necessary. Thanks for coming to us, I'll talk to Akela about it. I'm sorry she put you on the spot like that.”

“I'm obligated by law to tell you,” Severus reminded him.

“I know, but still. Thanks for telling us,” Akela's father said. “And that potion you wrote down, what does it do exactly?”

“It's an antidote for when Potions masters work on love potions and other such brews of an ardent nature. It truly kills the libido. Trust me,” he assured them.

Rainbow folded it up carefully, putting it in her pocket with the intent on brewing some up as soon as possible.

Severus downed the rest of his drink, the fire of the spirit burning his throat with the same fire with which his temper was aflame.

“Also, she called me 'an asshole, just like her father,'” Severus threw in, just to make life just a little bit more difficult for the young witch, given that she had truly gotten on his bad side.

Looking back up at Mouna, having that tidbit out there, Severus saw the larger wizard looking quite serious. “What did she say?” he asked quietly, in a controlled voice barely above a whisper.

Severus repeated it, which Mouna drank in.

Standing up straight to his full height, Mouna somberly said, “I apologize for my daughter's behavior, Severus. That was uncalled for and not something her mother and I taught her. If you will excuse us, Rainbow and I need to cut our date night short. We have some matters to discuss with Akela. Immediately.”
The Potions master had never seen a look quite like he saw in Mouniga's eyes before, nor his face look so stern. He just hoped he would never have Mouniga ever look at him in the same way, since it was fierce enough to make even Severus a little bit fearful. It was on par with a very upset Dumbledore. Mouniga was a gentle and patient wizard, but it seemed that Akela had finally overstepped a certain boundary with her behavior and she was going to be in a whole lot of trouble, and shortly.

“If you will excuse us,” Rainbow said somberly. “Ginny, Draco, Severus, you are welcome to have use of the hot springs tonight since we will not be using them. We need to go home.”

Mouniga and Rainbow paid for not only their drinks, but Severus' as well as a small gesture of contrition for their daughter's behavior.

As Severus stood at the bar next to Ginny and Draco, he felt a certain smug satisfaction that Akela was going to wish she never addressed him in such a manner. Her parents seemed to have taken her request of a contraceptive potion in stride, but her disrespectful attitude was not at all to be tolerated. He was glad that her parents seemed to have the decency to not let such an impudent attitude run rampant. The former Head of House and professor wished more parents of Hogwarts students took a firmer hand with their children's attitudes, as he was the one mostly left in charge of shaping their character. It was nice that for once he didn't have to dole out the detention.

“Why don't you take the hot springs tonight,” Draco offered, patting Severus on the back softly. “I think you need a chance to unwind after today.”

Severus nodded his head in thanks for the offer. He would definitely need something to help him relax, given that the last time he was this upset, Akela had shoved that calendar of Weasley into his face.

~~~~~~~*~

The Red Ginseng was becoming a money-sink for Lavender. Having gone from four gigolos earning their keep down to one apprentice she was subsidizing for housing, Lavender could afford to lose money on this property, but she didn't like it. It was decided that she would renovate the Red Ginseng and make it more appealing to attract new tenants, with the promise to Hermione she would leave her flat alone until after she moved out of it in the future.

The renovation was a gesture from Lavender for Hermione, given that Hermione had sworn never to step foot in that atrium ever again. Perhaps with a complete remodel, it would look drastically different from the old one and no longer remind Hermione of the sight of Zabini’s body hanging from several hooks, his skin peeled, his organs removed and piled on the floor. Lavender was glad she had not seen Blaise's body that way; she had enough memories from the war.
Hermione was too busy with work to notice the construction taking place on the other side of her front door. She was at work most of the day and into the night, coming home after the work crews had gone home, and rising before they began.

Marf made sure to have a hot meal ready for her when she came home, since she was often so tired, some nights she fell asleep before eating anything.

Hermione's schedule was quite full, even more so with the news that she needed learn how to run the business while Lavender was on maternity leave. In addition, with the news that Lavender was to have her start up a regional office in Hawaii, Hermione was even more driven to finish her Potions apprenticeship that much quicker.

Sitting down with Albert and Lavender, the three of them worked out a schedule for Hermione to come up to speed on the operations of The Lovely Lavender Company, while also keeping her on track with her Potions apprenticeship. Albert gave Hermione a list of the books that she would be required to read and learn during her whole apprenticeship, instead of handing them off to her a week at a time. It stunned Albert what a quick and voracious reader Hermione was, and he decided to let her read at her own pace instead of dictating the speed of her reading curriculum.

Getting up earlier than usual, Hermione began showing up to work one hour early to have the goblin accountant teach her bookkeeping, as they did it in the wizarding world. It was similar to that of the Muggle world, but there were Charms that made entries in one book show up in other ledgers automatically so one did not have to write the same numbers down multiple times. There were accounts payable and receivable, plus the goblin accountant showed Hermione how to calculate price based on materials and labor, and factor in other sundries, such as advertising costs.

Since she was getting up earlier, Hermione began making a daily trip to the Twenty-Four Blackbird Bakery. The Red Ginseng atrium, when it was finally remodeled, no longer reminded her of unpleasant visions, so she was able to walk to work once again. She had missed her habitual morning runs to the place, and the bakery also brought back ghost memories of Severus. She could almost hear the sound of his boots echoing along the empty cobblestone streets, or see the flash of a black cloak disappearing around a corner as she strolled towards work.

Instead of saving money and enjoying a free lunch cooked by the house-elves at The Lovely Lavender headquarters, Hermione Apparated to Palmers Green daily to eat at a little greasy spoon cafe near the restaurant Neville took her most Saturday nights after a day of working together at the nursery. The married couple who owned the little lunch spot had a couple of their children working there too. The whole family bickered at each other in Greek, which added more time for Hermione to immerse herself in the language. Neville was impressed with how her Greek was getting better with her little lunch trips, and even with the few vulgar words Hermione asked about, unsure what they meant since she couldn't find them in any dictionary.

Right now, Hermione was focused on mastering Greek as soon as possible so she could move on to the other languages. She now had a goal to strive towards, and blowing a few quid on a lunch special was definitely worth it to her if it would bring her closer to Severus sooner.

With her grueling schedule, even though she was truly exhausted by the end of the day, Hermione was beginning to find it harder and harder to fall asleep at night. Her attempts to masturbate in the months since Severus left had become less and less satisfying, and the tension within her was mounting. The change from having a lover she had sex with several times a week to having nothing was testing even her resolve to not become snappish. Fortunately, her work in Albert's garden and Neville's nursery gave her a chance to exorcise the nervous energy she had building up inside of her during the week, but it was still not enough.

It was Friday night and Albert said he was going to go home a little bit earlier to spend some time in the garden, puttering about. He wished Hermione a good night and reminded her that the monthly booze-up was tomorrow night.

Smiling and nodding that she was still up to going, she waited until Albert was gone before throwing her head down on her desk to groan. At the March binge party, Royston had playfully given Hermione a pat on the arse and she nearly broke his arm over it with a hex she had recently learned from Harry.

Harry had been worried about her, given that two murders had happened recently in and around the Red Ginseng and had been adding to her knowledge of defensive spells – some not so defensive. But even with her expanding knowledge of nasty jinxes and hexes, Hermione wasn't sure it would be wise to employ them at a social gathering of fellow Potions masters, especially when some of the wives would be there as well.

Hermione just wished she could just have one good shag with Severus, or at least one solid orgasm to take the edge off, so she could face tomorrow night.

Lifting her head up off her desk, she spotted the Pensieve sitting over on the shelf, having been put there when she wasn't using it to review Severus' memories.

As wrong as the idea initially seemed, there was something deliciously forbidden and erotic about the idea. It also made her a bit self-conscious. Then again, she was rather turned on by watching Ginny and Draco go at it, when she first discovered the redhead was cheating on Harry. Hermione didn't like to admit it, but she liked to watch. Even Severus was bemused and aroused by her blooming voyeuristic tendencies she was reluctant to embrace.

Checking about the office, she found out that Lavender had already gone home for the weekend, suffering from sudden bouts of fatigue. Earlier in the day, Hermione had already escorted her Aunt Christine back out to Muggle London, done with her latest projects for the week.

Secure in the knowledge that the only ones left were the house-elves, who would leave her in peace unless called for, Hermione locked her office door and put the Pensieve on her desk.

Now came the hard part. Which memory should be brought forth? As it was getting close to dinner, Hermione suddenly remembered one particular memory.

Placing her wand to her temple, she tried to recall it with the greatest clarity. Hermione pulled her wand away from her temple, she held it over the Pensieve and let it slip like amorphous silken threads from her wand, dispersing and swirling about the glowing waters.

After securing her wand in her pocket, she placed her hands on either side of the bowl and leaned forward, letting herself be pulled in to her own memory.

In the memory, Hermione burst forth from the kitchen laughing, followed by a mischievously smiling Severus, who was chasing her, holding something in his hand.

“But you know that won't work,” Hermione insisted, trying to be serious, but failing as she kept laughing lightly as Severus tried to pin her into a corner.

“Oh, but how do you know it will fail unless you try it first? Some of the greatest discoveries have come from witches and wizards challenging long-held notions that were later proven false,” he purred with a smirk.

“But honey, as a body paint?” Hermione questioned.

The real Hermione watched, remembering what was going through her mind at the moment, concerned about what a sticky mess it would make all over Severus' bed.
“Are you adverse to a little experimentation?” Severus challenged her, quirking an eyebrow at her, a smug smile plastered across his lips.

“But...”

“But what? You don't even know what type of honey I have. It is a delectable and rare honey, even one where I can stand the taste straight without finding it cloying,” the Potions master informed her, holding it up like some rare artifact for her to admire.

“Really?” The real Hermione could see her memory self drawn into Severus' trap based on the fact he used her own curiosity against her.

Moving closer to look at it, Hermione was suddenly grabbed by Severus and pulled up into his arms as he swiftly kissed her, devouring her mouth.

Initially she resisted, but quickly surrendered, kissing Severus back with equal need.

As Severus ceased kissing her, he whispered, “But this is still not as sweet as your delectable mouth.”

Hermione remembered how his wooing words made her head swoon, delirious for being called sweeter than honey.

The real Hermione now knew why she had called this memory up, as it was one of the few instances in which Severus was very playful, since he tended to be quite a serious person. His playfulness showed up in small ways, but this was one of the instances in which he was more lighthearted than usual.

Enthralled by Severus' desire for her, Hermione's eyes slipped shut and craned her neck in submission to him.

Setting the jar of honey on the table, Severus began unbuttoning Hermione's blouse, slipping it from her shoulders and arms as his mouth worked on languidly kissing her neck.
Her own hands went to work on her skirt, slipping off her shoes and kicking them across the room. One of the shoes passed through the real Hermione who was watching Severus seduce her.

It was almost as strange as watching her real self during her third year when she had used a Time-Turner and viewed herself, retracing steps that night she and Harry saved Sirius.

Severus made short work of her tights and underpants, chucking them over his shoulder carelessly before quickly undressing himself. Hermione crawled onto the bed backwards, still a bit uncertain, but game to play.

Now that the pair of them were nude, Hermione laid on her back while Severus fetched the jar of honey. Twisting the lid off, he placed it on his bedside table and held the jar above Hermione's body, a glint in his eye.

“This shouldn't be too cold,” he promised.

Dipping one finger into the jar, he coated his finger and pulled it away.

The pale amber liquid fell in a long and thin thread atop Hermione's breasts, making small curls and circles as he moved his finger that he held high above her body.

Feeling the cool honey make contact with her body, Hermione inhaled and arched her back against the bed.

“Oh look, it's not as warm as I thought it was,” Severus remarked with bemusement, noticing how Hermione's areola and nipple reacted to the contact with the cool honey. “Let me warm you up.”

Severus placed the open jar back on the table before lowering his head to began to gently licking and suckling at Hermione's breast.

Both the real and memory Hermione let out a sigh, both similar in pitch and cadence.
The real Hermione slowly slipped a hand under her skirt and underpants. Standing by the edge of the bed, she watched as Severus' eyes closed and his mouth continued to work on her nipple as his finger began smearing the remaining honey on her other breast, his fingers playing with her nipple just to make sure that he wiped the last of it off.

Watching herself and Severus, she noticed how his hair clung to her breast where he licked the honey off not moments before as he began attending to the other breast.

“What does it taste like?” her memory-self sighed.

Severus moved up and kissed her firmly. Hermione recalled how it tasted like toasted marshmallows with hints of vanilla mixed with the taste of Severus.

Lifting his head up from her face, he smiled down at her, stroking her hair out of her face lovingly.

“Let me try,” she sighed, licking the tip of Severus chin, catching the tip of his nose in the swipe of her tongue.

Severus let Hermione push him off her, and she ordered him to roll onto his stomach. Placing his chin on his hands, arms resting to his sides, he closed his eyes.

Hermione kneeled next to Severus before dipping a finger into the jar of honey. As the long thread dripped from her finger, Hermione trailed it back and forth along his spine, starting from just below where his long hair ended to the top of Severus' arse crack.
Kneeling down, Hermione began licking along Severus' spine, humming and sighing, enjoying the sweet clean taste of the honey that tasted like marshmallows and the taste of Severus' skin. Her tongue worked, laving and flicking down his spine. One hand began to slowly caress his arse cheek.

As her tongue reached the top of Severus' arse crack, her tongue continued to go down further. Hermione was not into rimming, but she loved playing with the area above that spot, knowing how good it felt, having had Severus give attention to that area on her before. She wanted to return the favor of that sensual experience.

“Did the honey go down that far?” he asked in a curious tone.
“Hmm, have to make sure I get all of it,” she mumbled into his skin.

Severus let out a long sigh, indicating his increasing arousal.

Using her hand, while still licking along the top of his arse, she nudged him to roll over onto his side. From between his legs, she reached forward and grabbed his stiffening cock, stroking it while her tongue continued working on him from behind.

The real Hermione gazed in wonderment at the look on Severus' face, seeing it so serene and lost in the pleasure she was giving him. She had not seen his face as she was busy elsewhere during the creation of this memory. Now she saw how enraptured he was by her ministrations.

Severus rolled onto his back as Hermione guided him so she could take him into her mouth, licking him once before taking a small bit of honey and drizzling down the length of his cock. Hermione engulfed him fully, sucking, slurping and greedily licking with gusto. She paused for a second to slather her own saliva along her middle finger before moving it down and between Severus' legs.

Severus adjusted his legs knowing what his lover would do next and welcoming it. As Hermione's mouth worshiped his cock, giving it most of her attention, her finger pressed up against his anus and sought permission to enter. Severus made himself relax and Hermione slipped her finger into him.

The real Hermione watched as his face momentarily twitched and winced, suddenly relaxing once more, his face beatific in a euphoric smile as the memory version of herself had found his prostate and began to gently stroke and massage it with her finger, her mouth still wrapped around his member.

A plaintive sigh escaped his lips, a sound she had missed before reviewing this particular memory.
It was sweet in its surrendering susurrations.

The sounds that came from his mouth spurred the real Hermione on and her fingers began to stroke her clit in earnest, feeling the tension within herself building. Hermione had missed the sound of Severus' voice, especially while they made love.

Her memory-self continued to bob her head up and down, greedily devouring Severus until he decided he could wait no more.

Severus hauled Hermione back up onto the middle of the bed, throwing her down onto her back and he quickly settled himself between her legs, sliding into her quickly with a short grunt.

The memory version of Hermione let out a wail of pleasure, her back arched and her hands reached up over her head for the headboard, temporarily forgetting that Severus had her sideways on the bed. Instead her hands moved to reached up and began clawing at Severus' back.

Watching, fascinated by this play of give and take, Hermione could feel herself close to orgasm.

Severus began pumping furiously into Hermione as her legs began to slide up and around his waist, higher and higher, spreading herself as wide as she could to take more of him deeper.

The real Hermione moved around to watch Severus thrust into her. She loved the curve of his back, and the times when they had used a mirror, was fascinated with the way the muscles in his back flexed and bulged when he fucked her.
“Oh God, Severus,” her memory-self began to wail over and over again, eyes shut tight and hand reaching down between them to stroke her clit.

The real Hermione watched Severus' face begin to screw up, signaling he was close. She loved the look of his face when he came.

Suddenly, the real Hermione came, falling over, slumped against the side of the bed while an orgasm rippled throughout her body, warming her all the way to the tips of her appendages in the glowing thrill that coursed through her.

Slumped on the floor, next to the bed, she heard her memory-self finally climax, and a few minutes later she heard memory-Severus grunt and growl as he did when he also peaked.

The bed finally stilled.

She could hear the soft murmur of tender words spoken between them. She didn't have to hear them since she remembered them.

Suddenly she heard Severus say in a louder voice, “I love it when you speak nomenclature at me.”

Hermione recalled she had asked for the name of the type of honey Severus used, to which he informed her it was meadowfoam honey. She had given the Latin name for the plant, which caused his response.

The memory ended as Hermione's laughter at Severus' joke ebbed away.
Using her wand, Hermione put the memory back into her own mind, not wanting to leave it unattended in her office.

Once she was back in her flat, Hermione ate a quiet dinner and decided to go to bed early that night, feeling quite sleepy.

Hermione slept deeply and undisturbed, feeling far more relaxed than she had in months.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Thank you to my betas, thegrey ladies and JuneW, for their excellent beta work cleaning up this chapter.

NSFW fan art by LadyKenora, commissioned by me, to go with the honey licking memory scene available for viewing on my Tumblr page here: http://67.media.tumblr.com/94a4fb755e22e939e5703ec2187ad387/tumblr_inline_oand74nNrr1tcck http://ladykenora.deviantart.com/

Meadowfoam honey really does taste like toasted marshmallow.
Almost everything was finally packed up. Severus had been living at Justina's hotel for almost five months by the time his house was finally ready for him to move into. All of the items he had temporarily stored in Justina's kitchen were packed away, as well as all the new clothes and personal items he had bought since arriving in Malu Palekaiko.

The only things that still needed to be packed were the photograph of Hermione and his still unfinished letter to her. It was his exasperation in being unable to scratch out a simple letter that led him to tramp about the jungle and find his new home. Since then, with working with the builder and the shop, he had been too busy to sit down and work on the letter again – or so he convinced himself. He had maybe two passable sentences he had scribbled down over the nearly three months since he'd first attempted to write his lover.

Picking up the photograph of Hermione, he wondered if she was still intent on joining him or if she had come to her senses. Severus still had no idea if she had viewed the memories he'd left for her, but given that Marf would make sure she would receive them, he was sure she had viewed them by Most Potions apprenticeships took between two and three years to complete, but he had finished his in two, even if one included the months of working at the Department of Standards & Regulations testing Potions ingredients which was required as part of his apprenticeship.

Hermione was a quick learner who already had a great deal of experience from her years in the same department, so that would shave some time off of her apprenticeship. She had been reading a lot of Potions journals as part of her job, and was familiar with many theories and concepts most apprentices aren't introduced to until their apprenticeships begin. He knew that the only thing stopping her from finishing her apprenticeship in as little as a year would be the mastering of five languages.

Severus wondered if Hermione had mastered Greek yet and was on to Latin as she had planned. It had taken him nearly six months to master his first language during his apprenticeship, and it was Arabic; he was already fluent in Spanish, since his mother spoke it at home and it was his second language growing up. At least the Latin was easy to learn, given he already was fluent in a Latin-based language. Unfortunately, Reginald Chuff did not allow Severus to count Spanish as one of the five languages he had to master since he was already fluent in it before he began his apprenticeship. It was one of the many reasons why Severus considered Chuff a right bastard.

At least Hermione wasn't apprenticing under Chuff, as he was the sort of unscrupulous lech who would secretly spike Hermione's experiment with a love potion in order to bed her, and probably make her feel like it was her fault for not recognizing the effects of a love potion afterwards. If Albert was taking Hermione to the monthly Potions master drinking binges, he would have the good sense to not let Hermione accept a drink from Chuff.

He calculated that the best of all possibilities would be that it would be at least another year and a half, possibly two until Hermione would be done with her apprenticeship.

Glancing at the unfinished letter, Severus wondered how he was supposed to put to parchment and ink how he had been feeling as if he was missing part of an appendage that had been splinched off and had not been reattached yet. Then there was the question of what to put in his letter of the long wait ahead for her to finish. If anything, he knew he should not tempt her to abandon her apprenticeship to finish with him, knowing how it would damage her reputation as a Potions mistress. When he had first asked her to join him, it was early enough in her apprenticeship that it would be easily forgiven and overlooked, but given how she was now fully into her apprenticeship with Dobmeir, switching masters was nigh on impossible at this point. He would just have to wait for her, and he would.

Severus Snape may have been in love with Hermione, but he was not prone to spout off flowery words of wooing and worship. All his attempts to craft a letter that plainly spoke his heart had been later reduced to piles of cinder upon reflection. No, writing Hermione a love letter could not convey his sentiments without him tripping over his own words. Instead of packing his draft of a letter to Hermione, he destroyed it, as anything else would not have been true to his nature. Hermione may have stripped Severus of his masks, but he still wore armor around his heart, which had grown thicker with her prolonged absence.

Finally checking out of Justina’s hotel, Severus walked up the street to Mouna’s house. Before Severus could step foot in his new house, he needed to make a proper offering to Pele.

Not only did the granting of sanctuary require a visit to the caldera to make an offering to Pele, but building a new home or new business required one as well, Severus making his trip the week before he opened his shop. Had Severus bought a house already built, the trip would not be necessary, but given how every so often a lava flow could destroy one house while leaving the one right next to it unscathed by the fiery temperament of the goddess, it was prudent to follow tradition. Even Draco and Ginny had made a trip after their week of seclusion to make an offering to Pele, seeking protection for their new home from her lava, even if it was already built. Hopefully Severus’ offering would please her, and his house would remain undisturbed for many decades to come.

Fortunately, the migrating dragons that had temporarily nested atop the volcano had moved along, continuing their migratory flight path from Japan to Peru where they would mate on or near Easter Island and lay and hatch their eggs along the chain of volcanoes in the Andean mountain chain. If not, Severus would have had to wait before making the trek to the summit.

Climbing the side of the volcano, Severus carried a basket filled with ohelo berries, red hibiscus flowers, banana, red fish, and a bottle of palm sap wine fermented by the Potions master himself, as Justina suggested. He had worked on his Hawaiian with Mouna, who would give the prayer at the edge of the caldera. Mouna had needed to make the trip himself, since it had been about a year since he had last made an offering to Pele on behalf of his family.

It was warm, but Severus wore his denim pants, given how the last time he climbed down, after making an offering for the opening of his shop, he’d almost tripped and fell on some sharp a’a lava flows. At least the thick fabric would give him some protection. Even Mouna wore his heavy pants, telling Severus about some nasty lacerations he’d received on one trip when he was foolish enough to wear thin fabric pants.

“So you're having a house-warming party?” Mouna asked his friend, surprised by the fact as Severus didn’t seem like the party type.

“I wasn't planning on one, but Ginny insisted I have one. I told her, since she was so enthusiastic about the idea, she could throw it for me, since I am not the party host type,” Severus replied, reinforcing his friend's perceptions.
“You’re not a big crowds type of guy.” Mounga reached out and picked a couple ohelo berries to add to his own offering to Pele he was carrying.

“Put me in front of 300 students in an academic setting and I can command their attention. Stick me in front of more than ten adults in a social setting and I’d rather be home with a good book.”

“Not everyone is cut out to be a social butterfly,” Mounga noted. “As my dad used to say when it comes to friends, it's better to have one gold Galleon than 493 bronze Knuts. Only reason why I know so many people is because of my job and position on town council. Also, Rainbow drags me out of the house. Otherwise, you'd probably find me with my nose in a good book, like you. I've become less outgoing in my old age.”

“At least Ginny is keeping the guest list to under twenty, though Draco says she's cooking for fifty, a habit she no doubt picked up from her mother,” Severus said, a bit of bitterness in his voice when referencing Molly.

Mounga gave a heavy sigh, and it wasn't because of the size of his basket he was carrying. “She's got a lot of hostility regarding her mother. I hope one day Ginny and her mom will patch things up. It's not good to hold on to anger; it will eat you alive and consume you just as lava will cut a path through the forest. Both burn and leave nothing but barren ashes in their wakes, and it takes a long time for anything to grow afterwards. You don't have to forget, but at some point, you should forgive.”

“Given the feeling of betrayal and manipulation, I think you can understand that it would take a while for that to simmer down before being trod upon,” Severus remarked continuing the analogy between lava and Ginny's anger.

Severus still couldn't get what this big deal about forgiveness was about. The little stuff he could understand, but some things were just too egregious to forgive for him.

“So any word from England?”

“Nothing. Which could be good or bad. For the fact that Hermione has not shown up seeking sanctuary herself tells me that her part in it had not been found out. Yet.”

Severus wondered if he and Draco were to be exonerated, whether Moody would still seek to persecute Hermione, should her part in their escape ever be discovered. It would be typical of Moody to want to prosecute her for helping them even though they were not guilty of anything anymore.

“So, mentioning you in front of a bunch of students... Draco and your proposal for a proper school, ages ten and up, is moving forward,” the larger wizard updated Severus. “There is the question of how to pay for it, but we have something in the works that might address that.”

“Really? Because for tutoring alone, I have several families I'm working with, employing their children doing mindless chores or collecting ingredients in order to pay for lessons. If these families are struggling to pay for tutoring lessons for one subject, how can we be sure they can pay for a proper schooling, given you mentioned that state and federal give little toward wizarding education versus Muggle?”

“There is a company that is interested in setting up a regional office here, but that's in the works. It's all very nebulous right now. It could wind up employing some people, especially those who need the money to help pay for school, but we'll also start up a charity fund to help pay for those who can't afford to pay for it. Plus, taxes alone from the business could help cover the costs of the school, so there would be little in terms of costs for the parents other than school supplies, if we're lucky. There will be partial and full scholarships, as you've mentioned your Ministry did with Hogwarts for books and supplies, since you did say tuition was free at Hogwarts. Worst case scenario is that tuition won't be entirely free, but we can get some federal funds to help cover books that children borrow for the year. Draco and Ginny have already offered to chip in and cover in case the charity fund doesn't have enough for those in need.”

Severus was pleased that Draco had not taken his father, Lucius', attitude regarding money and access to a decent education. Lucius had made very disparaging remarks about the Weasleys and their finances over the years. And then, as if suddenly remembering that Severus was in the room, the elder Malfoy would give a halfhearted amendment to his comment that the Potions master was an exception to the rule given the near abject poverty he had grown up in. It was condescending at best, and a backhanded slight to remind Severus that Lucius perceived himself superior to him in many ways when it came right down to it. Draco and Ginny's offer was no doubt spurred by Ginny's large dose of empathy towards money issues for children growing up.

Nodding, Severus said, “Well, given that many of the witches will have free time if they aren't schooling their children daily, this possible business opportunity for employment will certainly help offset the costs of schooling.”

Severus did not inquire to the nature of the business that might come to the island, as it was still uncertain and details would come later. Mounga would tell him.
As they reached the top, a witch and wizard that Severus recognized, but didn't know the names of, were just finishing their offering to Pele. Everyone exchanged the habitual Aloha greeting before the couple excused themselves and began their trek back down the side of the volcano.

Severus grabbed a few pieces of lava rock and arranged them in an aesthetically pleasing manner. He wasn't allowed to use his wand, as recommended by Mouna. The reason why was the same as why Severus and Mouna could not Apparate to the top of the volcano, and had to make the long trek by foot. The effort was part of the way of making an effort to show gratitude and honor the goddess. Only the old, the very young, and infirm could Apparate to the top of the volcano, children Apparating with their parents if they were too large to carry safely and too small to walk the whole way. Pregnant witches were allowed a Portkey dispensation, since they couldn't Apparate.

Mouna also created his own impromptu altar. Both wizards placed their offerings upon the rocks.

Standing near the edge, Mouna held out his arms in supplication and began to sing his prayer on behalf of Severus. A normally quiet man with a soft voice and economical with his words, a large and sonorous voice came booming forth, filled with feeling and reverence. It was a clear and deep bass sound that seemed to echo off the sides of the caldera.

Severus had heard Mouna sing on occasion at the bar on Friday nights, egged on by his wife to belt out a tune now and again, but this was nothing like the voice he used in the small bar. There was a lot of power behind the voice, a sound that matched the wizard's size.

Once Mouna was done, Severus threw a few ohelo berries into the caldera.

Mouna began a prayer for his own home and family. The cadence and pace was faster, and the tone seemed not as somber. He too threw in a few ohelo berries once his prayer was done.

As the two trekked back down the side of the volcano, heading back towards the village, neither spoke. Severus collected some ohelo berries for himself in his basket, since he had already made his offering of them to Pele first.

Coming around an outside bend in the trail atop a particularly steep cliff, they came upon an old woman walking down the same trail. They had not seen her during their trek up and figured that she had come along from one of the spurs off the trail along the way, coming from a more secluded part of the island.
The old witch ambled along at a slow pace, using a cane made of ohia wood to assist in her walking.

“Aloha,” Mounga called out in greeting to avoid startling her, since this part of the trail was particularly narrow and the drop-off was rather steep. They had wands to stop anyone from falling too far, but avoiding a slide down a steep hillside of sharp lava was preferable.

The old woman with long white hair waved at the two wizards. She looked to be particularly old and tired.

Remembering the custom to offer strangers along the trail rest and respite, the pair stopped. Severus conjured a stool and offered her a few of the ohelo berries he had already picked, while Mounga created a bit of shade with a charm and offered water, which she refused while munching on some berries.

She didn’t stay for long and rose from her stool. She thanked the two for their kindness and asked if she could walk with them a bit down the trail. At one point, Severus and Mounga waited for her, offering to help her, which she refused saying she was almost where she needed to go.

Coming around another blind outside curve in the trail, a sizable rock avalanche suddenly let loose down the side of the volcano directly in front of the three, the sound a roar of rock gnashing against rock.

Severus threw out an arm to protect the old witch who was directly behind him, but when he turned, she was suddenly gone.

“Madam? Madam?!!” Severus called out.

Neither of the two wizards heard her Apparate away, as neither heard the telltale vacuum pop. And given that she was right behind Severus not a moment before, he would have felt the rush and eddies of air with her disappearance.

Mounga gazed blankly ahead once the dust settled. He noticed how wide the avalanche was that covered the trail.

“Severus?”
The Potions master was confused as to where the witch went, but turned his attention back to his friend when he heard his name called.

“Where did she go?” Severus asked, perplexed. “I know she didn't Apparate.”

“How much do you think that old woman slowed us down, Severus?” Mounga asked, still looking at the amount of trail covered in several feet of lava rock, with a few sizable boulders.

“I don't know. Maybe a minute or two at most?” he said absentmindedly, looking along the trail, which was otherwise barren of any plant life this high up on the volcano.

Mounga’s chest heaved with the rush of adrenaline as he was still trying to catch his breath. “And if we hadn't come across that old woman, do you think we would have been caught up in that avalanche?”

“I don’t know, possibly...” Severus looked along the trail ahead, now seeing the amount of rock that had come down suddenly. Realization dawning on his that he and Mounga were almost caught in the rock slide.

“Do you think we could have Apparated away in time?” the larger wizard asked.

“It was rather sudden,” Severus replied.

The two just looked at each other, wondering if the old woman was indeed Pele who had appeared and slowed them down long enough for them to avoid getting caught in the avalanche of rock and boulders. In Hawaii, there were the odd tales of an old woman or beautiful young woman, both with flowing hair, one white-haired, the other dark. Those that had offered her rest and help had been saved from a terrible fate or accident, in gratitude for their kindness.

Severus tried to remember the face of the old witch, but could not clearly recall any defining features of her face, as in the shape of her nose or eyes, but as if recalling a face from a long forgotten dream, undefined and slipping away from his mind.

Using their wands, they cleared away the rock from the trail, before continuing their trek back.
Back at Mounga's house, Rainbow greeted the pair and asked how the trip was, to which Mounga gave his wife a reassuring smile and replied it was just fine. Severus had grabbed Hermione's handbag, filled with his possessions, which he had left at Mounga's house.

As the two walked toward Severus' new home, the Potions master asked, “Why didn't you tell her?”

“Because then I'll have everyone in town asking about what Pele looked like, asking you and me to rehash details ad nauseam. I don't want to do that. Do you?”

Severus looked at Mounga, noting the slightly shaken look on the large wizard's face.

“Where's the funeral?” Draco said, as he suddenly popped up, having come down from his house with Ginny to join Severus at entering his new home. He had noted the rather graven faces of his friends.

“We had a rather close call on the trail back home,” Severus admitted.

“You're both all right?” Ginny asked with great concern, noting the slightly shaken appearance of Severus.

“Yeah.” Mounga put on a brave face, trying to reassure the young couple they were fine.

Once the four of them reached the front gate, they stopped. The front yard was still overgrown, but the path had been restored up to the newly-built house that had incorporated the design of modern Balinese architecture with some American craftsman design elements. Severus didn't know what the architecture styles were called; he had flipped through several books the builder had, indicating what he found appealing and functional for his needs. His home had a tropical feel to the overall look, but still had a simple homeyness to it.

“Severus?” Draco said, offering up a pineapple.
Severus took the fruit and impaled it onto the fence post, right next to the front gate, indicating he was receiving guests and that they were welcome. Well, as welcome as Severus would make them feel, depending on who it was.

The four walked up the path to the house.

“That front porch looks like it will fit a hammock nicely,” Mouna noticed.

Severus imagined Hermione in a hammock reading a book back when he was in England as he pondered inviting her to join him. Now that vision seemed that much clearer, envisioning the light coming from the west slanting across the front porch in the early evenings, given the south-facing orientation of the house.

Placing his wand to the door, Severus unlocked it and entered his home.

Severus had been to the house many times during its construction, but now that it was complete and it was all his, it seemed as strange and foreign as the first moment he arrived in Malu Palekaiko, the scents of the ocean and jungle unfamiliar and peculiar. He’d had a home once, during his youth, but it was the brick hovel that he’d grown up in and was as unwelcoming as it was familiar. It had been taken away from him by the Death Eater Decree. This new home was his, and he would fill it with pleasant memories this time.

Sensing the portentous moment, Ginny walked over to her friend and gently touched his arm. “Welcome home, Severus. Ho'omaika'i i 'ana.” She embraced him, remembering what it was like the moment she first stepped into her new home with Draco, feeling a sense of finally belonging, another long sought-after dream finally realized.

He hugged her back, and also received hugs and claps on the back in congratulations from Draco and Mouna. Only these three understood how much this home had meant to Severus. Hermione understood too, but she was not there, and her presence was missed. Even though Mouna had only seen Hermione once when Severus was Polyjuiced into her form, he knew that Severus had designed this house in hopes that she would someday join him.

This was not a house built for a bachelor, but for a family. Severus may not have consciously designed the home as such, but that's what it was built for.

Mouna offered to help unpack, but Severus declined his offer, knowing where everything was going to go. It didn't take long for Severus to pull everything out of Hermione's old handbag. The armoire was the trickiest part to pull free, as a drawer pull had caught on the button loop of the bag, but that was easy enough to fix. The rest involved putting away clothes or kitchen items.

Severus had purchased a large bed and had a custom frame made for it. It was already delivered and set up in the master bedroom. It was in a dark-stained teak carved with heavy posts, supporting a canopy and draped in mosquito netting. Neither Ginny nor Draco made mention that it looked very similar to the bed Severus had back at his old flat that Hermione was most probably sleeping in now. Though this one looked much larger – it could easily sleep two and then some – and the bed curtains were white instead of black, essentially it was nearly identical.

There were a few other pieces of furniture Severus had bought ahead of time, such as a bedside table, a comfortable chair for reading in his new library, a kitchen table and chairs, and some necessary linens, but the rest of the house was unfurnished. Severus would move his books from his shop later that week.

Mounga went to help Ginny and Draco bring food, more chairs, a spare table and other items to help host Severus' house-warming party. By the time Severus finished putting nearly everything in its place, the party was set up and ready to go. There were a couple other things Severus needed to put away, but he would do that once company had left at the end of the night.

Ginny had set up the food in a buffet-style service with plates, flatware, and napkins, and cooked some of Severus' favorites that he'd taught her over the years. There was gazpacho, paella, and other dishes she had learned from various cookbooks, in addition to heaping mounds of fresh fruit. There was a fresh fruit punch Ginny had made by mixing guava, pumpkin, and orange juice with slices of strawberries floating in it, in addition to other more sophisticated libations.

Severus did offer to reimburse Ginny and Draco for the cost of the party, to which they insisted it was their housewarming gift to him.

With the pineapple now displayed by the front gate, the guests began arriving.

Rainbow and the children came, presenting Severus an umeke, a bowl carved from koa wood. Severus placed it in a place of honor in his entryway, considering it was a gift symbolizing that all who enter are welcomed as family. For the time being, he transfigured one of his kitchen chairs into a console table in which to display it, since it was a gift given with considerable thought. The Finaus had brought a Hawaiian umeke for the Malfoys as a wedding gift, so he was familiar with the symbolism behind the present.
Kaimi made Severus another lei in congratulations of his new home, a gift which he accepted graciously and wore. Iakona and Akela congratulated Severus on his new home, the latter very subdued in her manners. Akela was no doubt feeling very shameful over her behavior, given the last time Severus and Akela talked, she had called him an asshole.

Halulu and Greg showed up shortly afterwards, looking very relaxed and blissful from a long overdue two-week vacation. The newly-returned couple presented Severus with a fine vintage of Italian Chianti brought back from their trip, and a bouquet of coral-colored roses as a symbol of congratulations.

Gary and Iolana arrived right behind them with an orange tree, a common tree given to symbolize sweetness and generosity in Western culture, and happiness and prosperity in Chinese culture. The tree's orange fruit also symbolized gold, a harbinger of wealth and good luck, often given around Chinese New Year. It seemed nearly every house on the island had some Chinese residents at one time over the decades, as at least one orange tree was planted in most yards or sat in a large pot on their front porch.

Arnold and Ranjit were the last to come, bringing Severus Potions equipment for his personal lab at home for their gifts.

Everyone who was invited was finally there. Ginny even brought over her music box, setting it to play something non-obtrusive to the conversations going on about the house.

Ginny declared the buffet open and people went to fill their plates, eager to try some of Ginny's cooking.

Gary looked about the table and said, "You have salsa, but where's the chips?"

"What salsa?" Ginny asked.

"That salsa," Gary indicated, pointing to the bowl of gazpacho that people were not serving up in the bowls Ginny had brought over. Instead, they were using the ladle to pour the gazpacho over the paella, thinking it was a condiment.

It was culinary sacrilege.
Reminding himself that there were no current Spanish expatriates in Malu Palekaiko, Severus calmly said while trying not to grit his teeth, “That's not salsa, that's gazpacho. It's a chilled Spanish summer soup.”

Digging into the paella, with the soup dumped on top of the rice and seafood mixture, Gary said, “Well, it makes a great salsa.”

Severus could feel the corner of his mouth twitch, but decided he would merely use this as a chance to expand the culinary knowledge of this gastronomically diverse community.

Draco muttered under his breath, “Bloody peasants.” It amazed Severus how much he sounded exactly like his father at that moment.

Fortunately, Draco and Ginny had brought over enough chairs for all the adults to have some place to sit. The Finau children sat on the front porch while they ate, their feet dangling over the edge, given that Severus had not installed a railing, the front porch feeling more like an open veranda.

Once everyone was done with their food, Severus gave everyone a tour of the house at once, spending the most amount of time in the Potions lab, talking with great pride about how he had designed his lab. It had a lovely view of the town below and ocean beyond with the shutters opened. The ventilation he planned was based on the predominant winds that came from the east-northeast. There were the benches built at an optimal height for him, and shelving that would soon be filled with jars, boxes, pots, canisters and containers holding a variety of ingredients.

Mounga and Iakona seemed most impressed with the library, wondering if Severus had enough books to fill up the shelving already or was it made in estimation of more books he would add to it over the years. Ginny and Draco liked the outdoor shower he had installed, based on the fact Draco and Ginny had one at their house. They had remarked about how nice it was to have one right off the bedroom, which reduced the amount of humidity introduced to the inside of the house, cutting down on mold they had to fight in the bathroom, in addition to the enhanced romantic atmosphere.

Twilight settled in and Ginny had set some tiki torches about the outside of the house for those that decided to talk outside.

Severus had decided he needed a moment to himself, having been far more social than he was used to, even with his business and Friday nights at the bar. He sat on a felled log in the backyard that had been cut down to make room for the second story tier he had built above the living room that held the master bedroom and Potions lab. The north walls were level with the ground, given the slope of the land.
Gazing up at the sky, Severus noticed that the house's roofline blocked all light pollution from the town below, what little there was. He made a mental note to build a deck for a telescope for a bit of star-gazing.

Enjoying a bit of solitude from the noise of the party, he almost didn't hear Akela approach.

“Uncle Severus?”

She was climbing up the slope of the hill towards where he was sitting.

“Yes?” he asked, his voice a bit curt. Severus was still upset with her, given he had not received an apology from her regarding her behavior.

Even in the light of the gibbous waxing moon that was already rising in the sky, he could tell that she had been crying.

“I want to apologize,” she choked out, trying to hold herself together until she could finish what she was saying, which only seemed to make her cry more.

Given how petulant she had behaved, it surprised Severus how remorseful she was, which pleased him.

Since she seemed genuinely sorry, Severus accepted her apology. “Very well, I accept your apology,” he said a bit stiffly. “I hope you understand now why I was upset with you.”

Before Akela could apologize any further or grovel at Severus feet, admitting her most grievous sin of behaving so poorly towards him, she threw herself onto the log next to him and buried her head into his shoulder while wailing pitifully.

Severus recognized this particular type of crying, having been exposed to it so often.

Akela opened her mouth and began sobbing her woeful tale, confirming his suspicions.
“I told Ulrich I wanted to wait and he dumped me,” Akela confessed, pausing every few words to try and speak the words before dissolving into tears each time. “You were right, you were so right.”

Severus put an arm around the girl and patted her consolingly, hoping she wouldn't mistake it as anything other than friendly support. Too often witches who had come to him as a gigolo in such a condition had thrown themselves at him as a form of comfort, often mistaking sympathy for interest, hoping to shore up their flagging confidence with validation that another wizard found them desirable after being dumped.

Reminding her, “As I said, a boy who does not value your mind and personality without your physical charms is not worthy of you.”

Akela burst into tears once more. “He called me a frigid prude.”

Remembering how Hermione had been so equally sexually dismissed by her own husband, Severus' anger toward Ulrich became more intense. Granted, this young witch was deserving of some of this misery, given how poorly she had behaved towards Severus, but she was naive and a bit foolish, as young people sometimes were wont to do. If he wanted to rub salt in the wound and be cruel, he could have brought up the fact that she owed him a new sterling silver cauldron. But this latest parallel between Weasley and Ulrich made him loathe the young wizard, who had treated Akela with casual cruelty and callousness, that much more.

Severus just hoped that Rainbow was still giving Akela that libido-suppressing potion, as he did not want this young witch throwing herself at him, much like when Hermione suddenly performed fellatio on his fingers after suddenly confessing how her husband called her an ice queen.

“There, there,” he said, making sure to choose his words carefully.

Before he could figure out what else to say while not giving the distraught witch any wrong impressions, Akela burst into hysterical tears once more, her breath periodically hitching. “And... and... and what's worse... (hic) is he's now dating my best friend... (hic) Kiki!”

'So much for best friends,' Severus thought dryly.

Severus conjured a handkerchief, something he was well practiced at doing, and handed it to the young girl so she would stop using his shirt as a snot rag, especially since he was in short sleeves.
Akela just clutched to Severus' arm, leaning heavily against him, like a little girl would fully throw herself up against her father in the midst of a crying fit. Severus was glad she wasn't clutching on to him in a more affectionate manner at least.

Rainbow came looking for Akela and saw her crying up against Severus. Spying Akela's mother spotting them, he gave Rainbow a look that she should come get her daughter.

The older witch, either oblivious to the look on Severus' face or deciding this was payback from when they had crossed horns before, decided she could leave her emotionally fragile daughter in the arms of an older wizard who once was a surrogate father figure to so many young witches before. Obviously, Akela must have been over her crush of Severus for Rainbow to just acknowledge to Severus that she was happy to leave the two alone to talk.

“First loves rarely end happily,” Severus reminded her.

Lily had crushed his heart when she took up with Potter, but it was just that, a crush. A very deep and all-consuming crush, that felt like love, but it was not. Even his own marriage to Gabrielle was one that had turned into love, but it was an amicable sort of love built upon the convenience of them thrust together. No, his first true and real love was Hermione. There was nothing convenient or easy about their love affair, but despite the difficulties they had, they had fallen completely and hopelessly for one another. He just hoped that Hermione would not meet an untimely death like Lily and Gabrielle. It seemed that the witches he had become attached to did not live long.

“Who was your first love?” Akela asked innocently enough.

“The last person I ever expected to fall in love with. As I was with her as well.”

He didn't know why he admitted as much to this young girl. Perhaps to give her hope that love sometimes can be found in the most unexpected places at the most unexpected times, but perhaps to remind himself why he loved Hermione.

Sitting up straighter, Severus gently grabbed Akela by the shoulder, encouraging her to pull herself together and find her dignity. “Dry your eyes. Ulrich is not worth the tears you shed for him. I understand the sense of betrayal you must feel, but you are strong enough to move past this and be a little wiser for it. A harsh lesson in the ways of men, but better you learn them when you are young versus when you are older and possibly married to a man who will not treasure you accordingly and be a 'big, fat jerk' to you.” He used the phrase to remind Akela of what a terrible husband Weasley had been to his “dear friend” he once referenced a while back.

Akela wiped away her tears, feeling a little better now. “I really am sorry for screaming at you. My mom has me on that potion you wrote for her and looking back, now that I don't feel all crazy and hormonal, that really was unfair of me,” she admitted. “And I'm sorry I called you a big fat prude.”

“You called me a big fat prude? When was this?” Severus lied convincingly, pretending he hadn't listened in on her and Draco.

Akela just gave him a glare. “C'mon, I know you were right around the corner. I have Iakona as a brother, you don't think I know when someone is trying to eavesdrop on me?” She made some disparaging snort at Severus' stealth skills. “You know, it's a good thing you were never a spy, you would have been terrible at it.”

The young witch hopped off the log and walked back towards the party as Severus sat there, his mouth agape that he'd had his spying skills so easily dismissed by this teenager who knew nothing about what he had done or accomplished. Most of all, Severus wasn't about to set the record straight with her.

~~~~~~~*~

The written part of the test wasn't so hard. In fact, Hermione found it the easiest part of Albert's test to see if she truly had mastered Greek well enough that he could accredit her the language towards completion of her apprenticeship. Hermione's pronunciation was still a little off, but Albert attributed that to the particular dialect she had picked up from the Greek restaurants she frequented. The final test was when Albert handed her a Potions text with an anti-translation spell; she had to brew and complete something from the book. It was a way of testing how far her brewing skills had advanced, and her ability to decipher the ingredients listed, given that some of the ingredients were listed using Greek euphemisms as a way to further trip up those who might be using a dictionary instead of knowing the language itself.

Hermione had used all the correct ingredients, understanding that a few of the ingredients were puns. Had she used ingredients based on the literal translation, Albert would have halted the test, given the fact he didn't want to blow up his lab at home.

In the end, Hermione had a cauldron of Dionysus' Fever, a potion that caused a certain mad frenzy of dancing and blissful drunken-like euphoria, that Albert was very pleased with. It had the right color, consistency, and smell. As the final test, Hermione had to take the potion herself so that she could feel the effects of it, in order to better understand the potion itself. Albert made sure to relieve Hermione of her wand and handed her a specially charmed garment to change into. It was made of young deer skin and would prevent her from disrobing, given the fact the potion got its name based on the periodically naked dancing that the maenads sometimes participated in during their worship rites of the ancient Greek god.
Albert had placed a protective charm barrier about the two acres of wild woodland he had behind his house. The barrier would keep Hermione close for observation while the potion ran its course over the next couple hours.

There was a general antidote that Hermione had prepared ahead of time, should she get too carried away from the effects of a potion and hurt herself. Albert would administer it in much the same way that Hermione used to administer the antidote to Severus during their testing days together, most notably with a binding spell.

Standing on the edge of the twilight-cloaked forest, dressed in the simple fawn-skin shift, Hermione tipped the vial back and felt the strange tendrils of magic from the Dionysus' Fever potion pulse through her veins, as if they were vines snaking around the bones in her body, pulling her like a puppet held by invisible strings. Her mind drifted into a state of careless bliss, as her body began to move to the song of some distant drum and flute that seemed to draw her into the woods. Her body felt numb, similar to when she was drunk, her muscles unaware of any fatigue as if filled with boundless energy that she could not contain.

The trees around Hermione began to sway and move, dancing with her like a corps de ballet and she was the prima ballerina in this delirious production. Their branches reached down to her and she reached up to touch their tips as if dancing a reel, moving between trunks that were her partners where only fingertips touched.

Albert watched Hermione begin dancing to some unheard tune as she moved off into the woods, with him keeping an eye on her from a distance. There were other potions he could have had Hermione brew and sample as final proof of her skill at this juncture, but he felt that since she had been pushing herself so hard lately, she needed something a bit frivolous. Even at the last booze-up in April, it seemed more like she was drinking and doing the skill-based bets more out of obligation to strive towards an end than for a chance to relax and cut loose for a bit. He hoped the Dionysus Fever would do her a bit of good and give Hermione a chance to relax for once instead of working herself into a near state of exhaustion if she didn't take a break. He had seen other apprentices push themselves this hard only to nearly break down during their apprenticeship. Hermione had a great deal of mental discipline and he admired her for it, but even Albert knew that she needed to relax once in a while.

The golden light dripping down from the branches swirled and dissipated like fairy dust in the darkening night sky, causing Hermione to raise her hands up and run her fingers through the floating illuminated particles, laughing at the obscene beauty of it all.
From around a tree, she saw a pair of eyes staring at her. It was a game. Running around the tree, the eyes were just beyond her ability to find who they belonged to in the silvery light of the waxing gibbous moon, yet the eyes were chasing her and she was equally running away from them. She could not even tell if she was the prey or the predator. Perhaps both, since there was this duality inside of her seeking to tear everything apart, yet finding harmony with herself and peace with the world. Had Hermione been in her right mind, she would have called it madness, but under the thrall of the potion, it was perfectly logical.

The eyes finally revealed themselves to be a pair of black eyes surrounded by a familiar head of long black hair and a mischievous grin that seemed to recall some memory from long ago, as if from a recent dream. Strangely enough, Severus was wearing a beard. He looked good with a beard, filling out his face and making him look even more masculine. Emerging from behind the tree, Severus was looking more muscular than she remembered him from before.

Of course, now it all made perfect sense. Severus was a satyr. Satyrs represented the carefree life, lovers of women and wine, and ready for every physical pleasure. Hermione had never felt so carefree as when she was with Severus, and he had pleased many women, plus he was quite the wine connoisseur. He obviously was a minor Greek deity.

Severus and Hermione chased each other about the trees, the witch laughing gaily at their game. Severus' very erect phallus bobbed and enticed her, arousing Hermione further. She certainly didn't remember Severus being that large, but she longed to be filled by him, and violently.

“Make love to me like the Greek god that you are,” Hermione begged him, yearning to be ravished by her lover.
Severus produced a flute and began to play it seductively, which made Hermione dance without accord. Her body writhed, enticing Severus to play on with even more sensuality; Hermione's movements and his music fed upon each other until Severus pounced on Hermione knocking her back onto the ground as he began to take her, yanking her shift up in order to mount her.

From between the trees, Albert saw the darkened silhouette of Hermione fall onto the ground as the next segment of the potions hallucination began, which usually included vivid sexual dreams. She had fallen gently and he was sure she had not hit her head, given the soft ground. There was some garbled mumbling she shouted out, but he had not been able to discern what she had said. Presently she was grabbing at her shift, and would have already rid herself of any and all clothing if it had not been charmed to remain in place to retain some of her modesty while under the influence of the potion. And now the cries of ecstasy and thrashing commenced.

Severus the Satyr mounted Hermione without foreplay or preamble, thrusting into her quickly. She felt like she was nearly going to be split in two, filled by Severus' now larger than normal erection. Hermione shrieked, more out of pleasure than out of pain, rejoined with Severus after such a long separation. The endurance Severus displayed seemed to go on forever with Hermione orgasming time and time again as they rolled about the forest floor, sometimes with her on top riding him and sometimes with Severus entering her from behind, braying and howling like a wild animal. Severus didn't talk at all, but it was almost as if she could read his thoughts, or was it merely a projection of her thoughts upon what Severus would say. She could not tell, as the whole vision seemed to flood and overwhelm her senses.

Albert could tell that Hermione had brewed a particularly strong batch as Hermione was taken into quite a deep trance with this elixir. He had brewed it a few times before, once during his own apprenticeship, and it lasted almost two hours. It was nearly two and a half hours before the effects of Hermione's potion finally wore off and she groggily stumbled out of the caliginous woods.

“Was that all a hallucination?” she asked, still uncertain what was real and what was not.

It seemed so real, and she could almost feel the ghost sensation of Severus inside of her, like waking up from a dream of falling down and still remembering the sensation of one's body hitting the ground.

“Yes, but don't worry, your shift kept you covered and I could not understand anything you said,” Albert assured her. “You mostly danced and thrashed about on the ground.”

Hermione could not help but blush, given the very sexually graphic vision she just had and what she was doing in that hallucination. Albert had the good sense not to mention that he probably figured out what her visions entailed.

“How do you feel?” he asked, hoping the Dionysus' Fever took a bit of edge off the tension that emanated from her.
Still feeling a touch disoriented, Hermione put her hands to her head to try and accurately gauge how she felt. “Actually, pretty relaxed. And a bit tired.”

“Well, your brew seemed to last two and a half hours, a bit stronger than anticipated, but desirable nonetheless.” Albert smiled and patted his apprentice on the back. “Congratulations, you mastered and passed your first language. Now you can move onto Latin.”

Hermione felt a sense of relief, now that she was one step closer to being with Severus once again.

Albert gave Hermione a list of Latin books he recommended at the end of the day before she Floo'ed back home. Once back at her flat, even though she felt quite worn out, Hermione felt too excited to go to sleep or eat, as Marf had a hot dinner ready and waiting for her.

Instead, Hermione headed out the door to Flourish and Blotts to buy the list of Latin books Albert recommended. Fortunately, Hermione had been to the bank recently and had the money to buy all of the books listed on the parchment.

As she meandered the foreign language section, Hermione heard a voice that was familiar, but she couldn’t quite place it by sound alone.

“Hello, Hermione.”

Spinning around, she could not find the source of the voice until the lone figure emerged at the end of the aisle.

“Alan?”

It was that wizard she'd carelessly flirted with briefly at the Three Broomsticks that one night after watching a play, and who harassed her the night of her anniversary dinner at the Grand Royal Supper Club that Viktor rescued her from.

“You remembered my name. I'm impressed.” Alan smirked as he sauntered down the aisle looking like a cat assessing its prey.
Hermione glanced behind her making sure that the aisle behind her was not blocked, should she need to make a quick escape. Alan was charming, which is why she initially flirted with him, but just talking with him set off some alarm bells in her head. There was something slightly unsettling about him that she could not name.

Hoping that he would get the hint, Hermione decided to merely nod and go back to looking at the basic Latin grammar book she had been eyeing when Alan made his presence known. She pulled the book off the shelf and flipped through the first few pages. Her eyes weren't really reading anything, as her attention was on the wizard approaching her on her left. She wondered if she could reach for her wand with her right hand without being noticed, should it become necessary.

Stopping a few feet away from her, he leaned up against the bookshelf in a very self-assured manner. “No husband around tonight?” Alan asked with amusement. “Oh, that's right. I read about your divorce. And I don’t see any international Quidditch stars to come and bother us.”

Was this a subtle threat that she was unprotected, or merely some failed attempt at seduction?

“How observant,” she drolly remarked as she kept her eyes focused on the page in front of her while casually moving her elbow in such a way as to free her cloak so that it would be easier to whip out her wand.

“Latin grammar? My, such light reading.”

At this rate, Hermione was never going to get all the books on her list should this arse keep bothering her all night long.

Snapping the book shut with a crack, she turned to face Alan with a somewhat bored look on her face. “Is there something I can help you with?”

Alan ran a finger lazily along the edge of the bookshelf in front of where Hermione was standing. “My throat is parched. Care to join me for a drink?”

Glaring at him, she drawled irritably, “Not really, I have more interesting things to do.”

“Reading about Latin is more fun than having a social drink?” Alan's finger was now playing with the edge of the book in Hermione's hands.
“Studying Latin, actually. And yes, that is more appealing to me.” Hermione was getting aggravated the longer this continued on. She wondered what it would take to give this wizard the hint she isn't interested any more. For a brief second nearly a year ago, she was, but wasn't any more.

“It's not like you have an apprenticeship you're working on,” he threw out dismissively.

Hermione's eyes flashed wider momentarily, wondering if he was making a blind stab in the dark to dismiss her remark, or if he somehow knew about her apprenticeship and was being insulting.

Alan's eyes narrowed. “You do have an apprenticeship.” For a moment, he took a half step back in disbelief. “But...” Alan stopped whatever he was about to say and schooled his features once more.

“And I have a lot of Latin to catch up on. Good night.” Hermione turned and marched away, discreetly placing her hand on her wand under her cloak as she turned her back on Alan.

She didn't bother looking back as she went up to the front to pay. There were several other books Hermione needed to buy from Albert's list that he'd given her, but she could always come back another time. And if Alan was waiting for her again, she could always order and have them delivered via owl.

As she pushed the door open to leave, Alan called out halfway across the store, “You looked lovely in that slinky blue dress at the Ministry ball.”

Hermione's pace nearly faltered and she almost stopped with Alan's remark. He had recognized her somehow. Most probably because Ron didn't wear his mask half the night and she was with him a good portion of the time. Hanging out with Viktor and Lady Battenberg, given that Viktor and Ron were photographed together that night and listed as good friends of one another, might have also given it away since she did dance with Viktor that night and he was pretty recognizable, even with a mask on.

It was then that Hermione remembered that Viktor and Anne's wedding was going to be in about a month's time. They had picked June for a wedding date and Hermione was invited. No doubt Ron and Lavender would be there as well. Hermione realized she might have to go shopping again for yet another dress. The plum outfit she wore to Lavender and Ron's wedding would not be appropriate for the evening event, and her red and black dresses would not be appropriate either, since those were definitely inappropriate colors to wear to a wedding. Her blue dress was also just a bit too revealing to be decorous. Another trip to Madam Mandel's would be in order.

Back in her flat, Hermione threw the Latin book on the bed and went to her wardrobe instead. Opening it up, she looked through her dresses. Not one could she wear to the wedding next month.

It irked Hermione that it seemed like she was getting all these nice dresses, but could wear them for one night and nothing else. There was that black dress she wore for Severus on her birthday a second time, but they never went out in public that day.

Pulling the black dress out, she held it up to her body, remembering how Severus looked at her in the dress after a memorable day at the spa. There was that same hunger in his eyes she recalled from her hallucination earlier in the day. The satyr version of Severus took her without holding back.

Hermione hung the dress back up and went to the kitchen to eat the hot dinner Marf was no doubt keeping warm for her. Eating the lamb stew that filled her, not realizing just how hungry she really was until she sat down, Hermione's eyes kept glancing over at the bowl of lemons.

The lemons from Dumbledore's gravesite were completely dried out, as she had done nothing with them for months.

“That's it,” Hermione huffed at no one in particular.

Putting down her fork, Hermione got up and stomped over to the bowl of lemons. “What is it with you,” she snapped at the inanimate pile of fruit.

Summoning her best knife, a cutting board, grater, shredder, and other various implements, Hermione began dissecting them. She spent the rest of her Sunday night boiling, baking, simmering, stewing, frying, broiling and grilling the lemons she had. At the end of the night, all she had was a pile of pulpy mush, and she was no closer to figuring out what it was behind those damnable lemons.

The conundrum of those lemons was as frustrating and perplexing as how she could prove Severus and Draco's innocence. She was no closer to creating a solid argument for taking in front of the Wizengamot.

Chapter End Notes
A/N: Thank you to my betas, Hope and JuneW.

Fan art of Hermione and Severus as “The Maenad and the Satyr” by akatnaedeaster, commissioned by me: http://akatnamedeaster.livejournal.com/
Also posted on my Tumblr page here: http://atdlheabetz.tumblr.com/post/149207832555/chapter-eighty-four-the-maenad-and-the-satyr

Ho'omaika'i 'ana: Congratulations in Hawaiian.

“The Hawaiian umeke, or calabash bowl, is a symbol of welcome and aloha. Early Hawaiians were very communal and generous when it came to their possessions and food. Families often shared a meal of cooked vegetables, fish, or steamed taro out of a communal bowl or umeke.

“Throughout generations up to modern Hawaii, the umeke symbolizes sharing and aloha to all who enter a home. Umeke are often given as housewarming gifts, wedding gifts, or birthday gifts. This classic Hawaiian bowl is placed in a place of honor in a living room or entry room to signify that all who enter are welcomed as family.”

https://www.martinandmacarthur.com/blog/item/262-hawaiian-umeke-symbol-of-aloha

Regarding the Dionysus rites: "During these rites, the maenads would dress in fawn skins and carry a thyrsus, a long stick wrapped in ivy or vine leaves and tipped with a pinecone; they would weave ivy-wreaths around their heads or wear a bull helmet in honor of their god, and often handle or wear snakes."

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Maenads

In the classic Greek interpretation, satyrs did not have faun-like legs, horns or goat-like tail, which was a modification of the satyr myth by Romans. In the classical Greek interpretation, satyrs were strongly built, with full beards and long elf-like ears. I ditched the ears for Severus.

And thanks for the wait for this latest chapter. I was away on vacation, sans Internet, for 10 days.
As Albert and Hermione filed into Lavender's office for their weekly meeting, they chatted back and forth in Latin. Hermione had picked up the ancient language as if she was born to speak it. Given the fact she was so familiar with the nomenclature of so many plants and animals, it helped greatly. So many spells were based in Latin which also was a boon in understanding the language, and the conjugation of verbs and sentence structure seemed to make more sense to Hermione than Greek.

Christine was already in Lavender's office, deep in discussion with the company president and founder. The arrival of the two Potions experts signaled it was time to begin the meeting.

“The launch for India – starting in October when the monsoons end – is right on track. And as I've been advised not to Portkey the last few months of my pregnancy, I've decided you, Hermione, will have to be there in my stead, since I am appointing you vice president. It makes sense, since you are taking on so many duties and will be running the company during my maternity leave,” Lavender announced. There was congratulations from Christine and Albert with Hermione's promotion.
“Of course there is a pay raise, given you are coming up to speed and have been taking on some aspects of the company. Christine will also be going to India, and I'd like you to be there as well, Albert. It will be a weekend event. Unfortunately, I can't get a Portkey for you, Christine, so you will have to fly out on an ae-reo-plane. That won't be a problem, will it?"

“Not at all, travel via airplane will be fine until end of November,” Christine assured her client.

Puzzled, Hermione looked at her aunt. “Why would travel by plane be a problem?”

“Because I'm pregnant,” Christine announced, beaming brightly.

Hermione hugged her aunt, joyful that she was able to conceive again and quickly after her miscarriage. “Congratulations. Uncle Tim must be over the moon.”

“He is,” Christine said, trying to not break into tears, feeling her emotions suddenly go all wonky and intense.

Albert congratulated Christine with some kind words and encouragement before they went back to discuss business.

“Christine will make the arrangements, you just have to show up, say some pre-scripted words Christine will come up with for public relations, look lovely for the photographs – I'll have a stylist on hand to take care of your hair and make-up, and Christine's too,” Lavender assured them both. “Also shake a few hands and do the same sort of thing I did at the Ministry ball. Talk shop, make a few business connections and such.”

Hermione wanted to roll her eyes. That is exactly the sort of stuff she hated. She didn't want to schmooze. She would rather have a nice lengthy discussion about Potions theory with some of the Indian Potions masters, not hobnob with the press and “the beautiful people.”

She guessed if there was a promotion and raise involved, there would be some unpleasant aspects of the job which would be compensated with pay.

“In addition, Christine has told me that in the Muggle world they have beauty products just for babies. So I've decided to have you both create a line of products just for infants. Shampoos, soaps, bubble bath, lotions, and so on. Christine and I are still working on a name for the line, but we'd like you to begin work right after you finish with that roll-on henna tattoo kit you've been working on.”

Hermione couldn't wait until they were done with the roll-on henna tattoo kit that didn't require users to sit still for several minutes to hours to apply like the traditional method still employed by witches in India, even with Charms to add an extra hand, literally. Her skin felt raw from having to scrub off the henna that was guaranteed to stay on for two weeks, no matter how many times you bathed, swam, or exfoliated. Albert gave her a solution that could remove it, but it really was wreaking havoc with the skin on her arms and legs where she tested the product. The henna tattoo stayed on for two weeks, but they didn't have the right color yet, since the ingredient used to make it last longer lightened the intensity of the color, which was undesirable.

Working on a line of products gentle enough for a baby's skin sounded preferable to scrubbing off henna tattoos.

The rest of the meeting went quickly, which Hermione was thankful for. She was glad Lavender kept meetings to the point, after hearing her Aunt Christine go on about how some meetings in the Muggle world could go on for over an hour with nothing much said at all, and people having no idea at the end of the meeting what they were supposed to do.

At the end of the day, Albert swung by Hermione's office.

“Ready to go squonk-hunting tonight?” Albert said, a chipper gleam in his eye.

“I understand that squonk tears are valuable in beauty potions, but the poor animal is just a pitiful creature,” Hermione complained, feeling more sympathy for the creature than Albert did.

“Despite their horrid appearance, they are rather prolific breeders, and if we don't capture them, their population will get out of control.” Albert lectured her, knowing her stance on killing animals for sport alone. “Besides, they are very destructive to some forests, gnawing away the bark of some old and ancient trees. Neville has a nest of them who have been destroying some fruit trees he has at his nursery, so we'll be doing him a favor by capturing them.”

“Well, when you put it that way, I am not so reluctant to participate.” There were other potions ingredients just as effective as squonk tears for use in beauty potions that improved skin tone, but if the animals were a nuisance and there was no threat to their population, Hermione was willing to go.

It looked like Hermione was committed to going squonk-hunting after all. Instead of staying late in the office Friday night and viewing Severus' memories, and possibly recalling another memory of her and Severus being intimate, she'd be tromping about underbrush of the full June moon following a trail of tears by wandlight and bagging squonks.

~~~~~~~~~

There was a torrential downpour as Severus and Draco walked to the bar after locking up Friday night. The Parapluie Charm that arced over their heads, shielding them from the rain, did not stop the rain from splashing up from the sidewalk and all over their shoes.

This was supposedly the dry season, but that didn't mean that they didn't have the occasional rainstorm. Hurricane season did officially start at the beginning of the month and it was only June fourth. This wasn't a hurricane, but it certainly was quite a storm.

Entering the bar, Bongo greeted the pair, followed by all the other patrons.

“Aloha,” Severus and Draco called back in greeting.

Mounga was singing some Barry White, his voice perfectly mimicking the disco behemoth’s deep bass range. The large wizard waved at his friends as they entered since he was busy. No doubt Rainbow had harangued him into singing again.

The matriarch of the Finau family had been bugging Draco and Severus to sing at least once during their Friday nights at the bar. Ginny had already sung a couple times, belting out a few songs that were popular back in England that had made it to the states and were played on the local WWN. Her voice was sweet and a little breathy, and she stayed in key except for a couple high notes she had trouble reaching.

Severus ordered an old fashioned and Draco ordered a gin and tonic, the sultry evening demanding they have something refreshing to quench their thirsts.

Mounga finished and came back over to join his wife, the Malfoys, and Severus. Ginny was nursing an ice cold beer, with the glass charmed to keep it chilled. There was a local brewer who made a pilsner which was almost as good as what was available in England, but Draco and Severus preferred their ale and bitters on the warmer side. They were unable to understand how Ginny could drink it so cold, despite her insistence it was perfectly palatable.

The band consisted of Maurice playing his accordion, a witch on piano, the same old wizened witch on guitar, Agnes, and another couple wizards who brought their trumpet and violin. They were playing some mellow impromptu jazzy country-western composition.

“Draco, Severus, are you going to try your hand at the beard-growing competition this year?” Rainbow asked. “And you can't use any potions. It has to be all natural.”

Ginny broke into peals of laughter. “Facial hair on a Malfoy? Buahaha!”

Draco gave his wife a rather nonplussed sneer. “Malfoys can grow facial hair. You have never seen the portraits back at Malfoy Manor. My great-grandfather, Ransom Malfoy, had a rather prodigious beard.”

“Only because of the rumor that he was the bastard child of a werewolf,” Severus threw out, knowing that old story that had not a lick of truth to it would nettle him.

“Pure speculation and malicious conjecture based on bitter accusations of a jilted mistress, I assure you,” Draco insisted, lifting his nose up in the air.

“Ten Galleons says I can grow a better and thicker beard than you,” Severus threw out as a challenge.

“Ten Galleons and the loser has to make cassoulet according to the winner's preferences,” Draco accepted, upping the bet.

“Wait, there is a contest already for who will win that will be judged at the Pele Festival,” Rainbow butted in.

“If neither of us wins, the bet is still on,” Draco said.

“It will be a snowy day in Malu Palekaiko before I make cassoulet with lamb, tomatoes... and bread crumbs,” Severus drawled haughtily, pronouncing the last ingredient with great distaste.

“Not the fucking cassoulet again,” Ginny mumbled to herself before taking a long sip of her pilsner.
“Are you backing out of our bet?” Draco asked, looking smug.

“Not a chance.” Severus stuck out his hand and the two wizards on it shook.

“What's a cassoulet?” Mouna asked, noting there must be some serious history behind the story for those two to get in each other's faces over it.

“A sublime French dish made with primarily beans, carrots, onion, and various cuts of pork and duck.” Severus elucidated his dear friend, taking a sip of his drink while exuding an aura of cultural sophistication.

“And lamb, tomatoes, and bread crumbs,” Draco added, his own aura a bit more imperious and haughty.

“A proper cassoulet does not need bread crumbs to get the proper crust,” Severus insisted, getting into Draco's face.

It wasn't an outright hostile skirmish, but it was a dog-eared debate which had once again brought back old prejudices and firm opinions that could not be budged.

“Will you two just shut it!” Ginny snapped, slamming her fist on the bar top. “Draco, go sing!” She pointed angrily over to where the musicians were just finishing up their song. “You promised you'd sing for me tonight.” To drive her point home, she folded her arms in front of her, an indication she was in no mood to bicker or to put up with their frivolous nattering on any more.

“Fine. I'll sing,” Draco announced with a smirk.

Walking over to the piano player, Draco leaned over and talked with the witch, who nodded her head and talked briefly with the other players before Draco stood up and took his place by the piano.

Draco started singing, the band beginning after the first count of four.
“Ain’t no sunshine when she's gone
It's not warm when she's away…”

Severus watched as Ginny beamed a glowing smile at Draco, overwhelmed with love for him and the song of pining he sung for her.

"And I know, I know, I know, I know,
I know, I know, I know, I know, I know,
I know, I know, I know, I know, I know,
I know, I know, I know, I know, I know,
I know, I know, I know, I know, I know,
I know, I know, I know, I know, I know,
Hey, I oughtta leave the young thing alone
But ain't no sunshine when she's gone”

The crowd in the bar cheered, impressed with Draco's control and ability to sing the whole repetitive stanza in one breath, his voice emoting the aching of longing. He dredged up the painful memories of heartbreak and yearning for Ginny after reading about her marriage to Potter, giving an exceptionally soulful rendition.

As Draco finished, the bar erupted in cheers, amazed Draco had been hiding such a good voice all these months. There was clapping and whistles from several patrons, including Bongo, the bartender.

The aching in Draco's rendition only served to stir up repressed emotions for Severus of how much he was missing Hermione and the simple joy of bathing in her love that she radiated towards him. The lyrics only reminded him of how much his own house did not feel like a home without her.

Joining the group back at the bar, Ginny gushed at her husband, “You remembered!”

“Was that your song?” Rainbow asked.

“Right after the end of the war, before that stupid decree passed, Draco and I went out to a movie,” Ginny answered.

“The decree – you mean the law that Severus and Draco were prosecuted under?” Rainbow asked for clarification, since she hadn't been filled in on the details.
“You mean the same movie where Miss Brown spotted you both?” Severus asked, knowing that Draco had only ever been to a movie theater once before.

Severus had advised Draco not to go out in public with Ginny back then, since there were Death Eaters still roaming about Great Britain right after the war. Either of them could have been spotted and one or both hurt in a wand battle in a dark movie theater, or Ginny used as blackmail against Draco, had they figured out Draco was a spy.

“Yes, that one,” she replied to both questions. “Well, it was one of those romance type of movies. There was a point where the boy and girl are separated, and they played that song to show how much the boy missed the girl. Not that we watched much of the movie after that song played,” she added with a smile, remembering their first kiss.

Severus thought how very accurately the song embodied a sense of longing, given how morose he was suddenly feeling, longing for Hermione.

Ginny turned back to Draco. “When did you memorize it?”

“Lavender loaned me her Pensieve,” Draco admitted, and Severus could have sworn he added under his breath, “a few thousand times.”

Lost in thoughts about Hermione, Severus had to be nudged by Draco's elbow to bring his attention back to conversation.

“Hmm?”

“We have been given the pleasure to finally hear Draco sing. Can we finally convince you to sing us one song?” Rainbow coaxed Severus, trying to be sweet without pressure.

Severus was confident he had a good voice, since Chuff had made him sing for hours on end in order to improve his voice so when his Master finally deigned to drag Severus to his first Potions masters booze-up towards the end of his apprenticeship, Chuff would not be embarrassed by his apprentice singing poorly. During his apprenticeship he felt like he was being trained like a caged bird ordered to sing for their amusement alone. Severus did not want to be pressured into singing when he was not inspired to do so. He was usually inspired when he was alone, when no one else could critique his ability. Old resentments bubbled up, making him feel as if he was an animal being prodded to perform upon command for the entertainment of others, and not of his own volition – and without inspiration.

'You want to hear me sing?'

Severus dredged up the most maudlin and heartbreaking ballad he could think of at the moment. He wanted to sing something which would be such a downer and kill the jovial mood in the bar, no one would ever harangue him to sing again.

“Fine,” he bit out shortly, his eyes flashing.

Mounga didn't think this was going to be such a good idea and wished his wife would have waited another night to pester Severus. It was evident she was oblivious to the sudden somberness that stole over the brooding Potions master during Draco's song. Mounga could tell that his friend was missing Hermione, recognizing the look he would get on his face whenever she was brought up – even very briefly in passing, and never in front of his wife.

Severus spoke to the violin player before setting his drink down on top of the piano.

He momentarily closed his eyes, and recalled the way the one wizard from the Highlands at the Hog's Head sang the song. It was mournful, and even the most hardhearted of wizards often did not have a dry eye when he was done singing. Well, except for Aberforth, but he heard the old wizard sing it many, many times over the years.

Drudging up every ounce of longing he felt for Hermione and the agony of being separated from her, Severus opened his mouth and began to sing acapella, the wizard from the violin joining in after the first stanza, once he could discern the notes and cadence to play along.

“A wizard call'd Eòin Greumson
Of bonnie Blackbriar Dornoch
Was bid to fight the goblin horde
Rebellion rose an' duty call'd

He left his love, fair Maighread
His promise: a gowden ring
That they should wed 'pon his return
No later than the Spring
A year had passed and not return'd
Poor Maighread was waefu'
Her lover fear'd lost for dead
Maighread's breast brokenheart'd

A poison quick upon her lips
The witch did drink 'ere deeply
To see her Eòin on the other side
Join'd e'er in eternity

As Eòin came home, he found his bride
Light fading from her eyes
She thought she had join'd him beyond the veil
And pass'd to the other side

No ghost remain'd, her soul pass'd on Though Eòin was not to be found
She wandered lost without her love
Maighread found no relief in death's bound

Young Eòin gaed to join his bride
His heart could beat no more
In gravely beds, they lie aside
Join'd e'er beyond Grim's door.”

Severus' baritone voice rang clear and true to this slow funeral dirge of a happily ever after denied. He captured the essence of the song with the same commiseration and sorrowfulness as the Highland wizard who used to sing it in the Hog's Head.

When he finished, the bar was deathly silent, except for the odd sniffling noises from some of the witches who had broken down into sobs during the song.

Severus lifted his glass to his lips and drained the last of it before slamming the empty glass back down on top of the piano, and quickly stormed out of the bar.

Ginny grabbed a bar napkin and blew her nose. Even Draco wiped a few tears from the corner of his eyes, remembering how it sounded exactly as he remembered the few times Severus had taken him to the bar during the war, on business for the Order.

Rainbow wiped away the tears from her eyes and said in a manner trying to lighten the mood, “Severus has got to get laid one of these days.”

Mounga could not understand what his wife's fascination with Severus' personal life was. Maybe it was the fact that Severus didn't share a lot of his past openly, and that left a lot to her imagination. Maybe it was because since Severus had been informally adopted into the family, she felt it was her obligation to make him happy and know his business, as if he was something to fix. Maybe it bugged her to no end that she didn't have any juicy gossip on him that she had to fill in the blanks in her own mind, but Mounga was getting tired of Rainbow's obsession with the private details of Severus life that he didn't share. Knowing Severus' secrets didn't make it any easier for Mounga to bear, knowing the pain his friend felt.

Mounga drained the last of his own drink, after wiping away the last of his own tears, and set it on the bar when he fixed his wife with an impatient glare. “Rainbow, remember that I love you when I tell you this, but shut up. It's none of your damn business.”

Rainbow stuttered and stammered a bit, trying to find some way of saying she meant well, her eyes flashing several different colors before turning black.

“And Ginny and I really should get going to dinner,” Draco said overly brightly, knowing that there was a possibility of a fight brewing between the older married couple.

They paid for their drinks and bid them a good night while the Finaus glared at each other. Draco could tell it was going to be an awkward night at the hot springs.

Severus strode back home, glad for a chance to stretch his legs before he got home, as it gave him a chance to cool down. He didn't like wearing his heart out on his sleeve, and he felt as if he had just laid bare his soul for the town to see with all the emotion he poured into that song. He wouldn't have done it if he had a much cooler head, especially after he and Draco both got riled over that cassoulet bet.

His snipping at Draco was partly because he had a case of blue balls that was backing up into his brain, making him a bit short as of late. More so than usual. With the increase in temperature and the lengthening of daylight, Severus' testosterone levels were increasing, making him even more sexually frustrated. It didn't help that he had run out of Polyjuice Potion, and the current batch he was working on would not be ready for at least another week, given the lengthy time required to stew lacewing flies.
He had used up the last of his vials of Polyjuice Potion over a month ago, and he longed to see Hermione one again. Not that he had a mirror, which was something else he needed to buy for his barely furnished home. There was a mirror charm he could cast and it would serve his needs, but a proper, non-enchanted mirror, is what he needed.

Severus sat on the bed and picked up the photograph of Hermione he kept on the bedside table. He hadn't put it by his bedside the day he moved in until all the guests had left for the night. He didn't want to field any questions as to who the witch in the photo was, though some of the people at the party would have known.

Next to her photo, Severus kept that dried lemon that Hermione had given him as a promise that she would clear his name and one day he would truly be free. He wondered if she had made any progress on that front.

He felt emotionally drained. Lying back on his bed, he didn't even feel like a wank, which usually helped when he was missing Hermione. Severus knew he should have something to eat for dinner, but he didn't feel like getting up and cooking. Even the thought of sitting in his reading chair with a book in his library brought him no solace. There were chores to do around the house, but even he couldn't find the motivation to get up and do them.

Severus still sent his own clothes out to be washed by the elf who ran the laundry service, but he no longer had an elf around his home in order to dust, do the floors and dishes, wash the windows and other various things he got used to with Marf around. There were the summer’s home from Hogwarts when he had to take care of his own housecleaning, but it had been years. Now the drudgery of keeping house fell squarely on his shoulders alone, and he didn't feel like hiring an elf to clean house, finally having a place that was all his with no one else wandering about.

There was a brief moment when Severus pondered how much it would cost to buy a Pensieve. At least then he could visit the memory of Hermione, but wondered if that was just a bit too desperate. Right now, he didn't care how pathetic it may have seemed, his bones ached for Hermione and her touch.

At least he would go out flying with Mounaga and his family tomorrow, since they had invited him. Perhaps a little flying would improve his mood the next day.

~~~~~~~~~~~*~

“Lumos!”
Hermione could finally see the trail of tears, glistening by wandlight. Neville was off in another patch of woods, following a squonk that had left another trail to follow, while Albert was on the trail of a third. There was a whole nest of them.

She had seen some of the damage done to Neville's inventory when she arrived that night; the squonks had really gone to town on wreaking havoc at his nursery since her last visit nearly a week prior. At least they didn't get into his greenhouses where some of his more valuable plants were kept. Now Hermione was enjoying the hunt, feeling no pity for the destructive little buggers.

The trail was fresh and it didn't take long for Hermione to find the four-legged creature, covered with warts and odd growths, ambling about the underbrush of some overgrown hedges. With the use of her wand, she corralled the creature into her sack and Apparated back to the spot where they had a pen to hold the squonks before they started to liquefy.

The pen was already filled with a few other squonks who were weeping pitifully, in the process of dissolving into a pool of bubbles and tears. The pen was built to capture all the fluid left behind after the creatures would cry themselves into non-existence. There was a slot and a funnel at one the end of the pen, and a large jar to collect the fluid.

Hermione opened the door. While the other squonks scurried away to the other side of the pen, she dumped out the squonk in her sack that had begun sobbing.

“Serves you right for ruining Neville's nursery,” she said with some satisfaction.

Neville's nursery wasn't completely trashed, but he had probably lost all of his month's profits with the damage done.

Squonks had been imported into England about 200 years ago for use in beauty potions. However, some had gotten loose and the squonk population had flourished, hiding out in the countryside ever since.

Now she needed to go find a new trail of tears, since it was estimated this nest held about nine squonks and they had only captured six so far. Squonks tended to nest in multiples of three, and they didn't think there were twelve squonks in this nest. Albert and Neville were on the trail of two more, which meant Hermione had to find one more for the night.

Stalking about as quietly as possible, Hermione thought she heard the rustle of a squonk off towards her right near a large tree. She kept her wand dark in order to prevent scaring it off and having to give chase. Quietly creeping along, she heard the crinkle of some leaves right behind the tree.

Hermione leapt out from behind the tree right when Neville also jumped out, thinking Hermione was a squonk herself.

The pair had startled each other in the process. Hermione began to stumble backwards and Neville, in an attempt to prevent her from falling, tried to grab hold of her. With his long arms, he reached for her, but in the process, he lost his balance as well, his one foot positioned upon a wobbly rock.

Neville slammed up against the tree with his back, Hermione clutched in his arms protectively.

There was a great expulsion of breath and a slight groan as the wizard made contact with the stout oak, a nob on the trunk digging into his back.

Neville and Hermione began laughing at the fact they had scared each other and nearly caused the other to fall over.

The laughter died down as each suddenly realized how they were in very close proximity to each other. Neville's chest rose and fell, Hermione's hand pressed against it as she was leaning into him from their stumbling.

The moon was high in the sky, casting their faces with a dappled silvery pale light beneath the great spreading oak.

It had been too long since Hermione had felt a man's arms about her. It felt so good to be held like this, and she could not move.

Glancing up, Hermione saw Neville gazing down at her with desire shining in his eyes. Hermione's stomach began to flutter, realizing Neville was attracted to her, as he had never indicated any interest in her that way before. And suddenly, she was feeling very drawn to Neville as well. Hermione knew her friend was merely a substitute for Severus, but didn't stop her from wanting to stay in his strong arms just a little bit longer, missing the touch of another man.

The shout of joy in the distance indicated Albert had found another squonk, interrupting the moment of intensity between the two friends. Hermione pulled herself off Neville and began smoothing down her clothes, fidgeting nervously over the moment that had almost happened between them. Had Albert not yelled, it would have been natural for Neville to crane his neck down and kiss Hermione.

Neville pulled himself away from the tree, hissing and rubbing at the spot where the knot jabbed him.

The two were about to make some awkward apology or dismissive remark, both feeling a little embarrassed, when there was another rustle off towards the left this time.

Hermione and Neville followed the sound until they were sure they were close. By wandlight, they found a pair of squonks in the middle of mating, the source of the noise. Squons, because they cannot stand even their own reflection in the water, mate with their back towards each other so they do not have to look at something as ugly as themselves.

Considering how Hermione and Neville had been in an intimate embrace not moments before, it only added to the awkwardness of the situation to find the two creatures mating.

Neville and Hermione wrangled the pair who were stuck together, as the male squonk knots during copulation, into the sack and Apparated back to the holding pen.

Albert had just finished closing the cage when the two appeared, Neville with the sack over his back.

“I think this makes nine,” Neville said, as he put the last two in the cage, still joined at the genitalia.

Albert noticed the nervous shuffling of Hermione and the way that Neville seemed to try to avoid looking at Hermione.

“Yeah, yeah,” Hermione said hastily. “We thought each other was a squonk and sort of ran into each other.”

Neville rubbed the spot on his back still aching, knowing it was going to leave a nasty bruise.
It would take another fifteen minutes for the last of the squonks to be done transforming and its liquid collected in the large jar. The three humans made conversation, using Latin, since Hermione had become quite fluent in it.

After Albert screwed the lid on the jar, Hermione used her wand to fold and collapse the holding pen into a small box Albert could put into his pocket and place back in his lab.

Neville was happy that he'd had a free extermination service performed. Albert was thrilled he could sell some squonk liquid to Lavender for a pretty Sickle, and for less than what she would have paid for it wholesale.

Hermione shuffled her feet, kicking the toe of her shoe at the gravel on the ground. “I guess I'll see you tomorrow after I'm done working at Albert's.”
“Yeah,” Neville replied a bit nervously.

They exchanged a somewhat awkward hug, both unsure how friendly or platonic to embrace the other given their encounter earlier.

Albert refrained from rolling his eyes at the awkwardness, spotting the reluctant sparks between them.

Severus had agreed to go flying with the Finau family, but he didn't fly alongside of them much. Iakona, Mounga and Rainbow's son, challenged Severus to a speed race. Severus was older, but he was still the better flier. He left Iakona in his dust, eating the older wizard's eddies. If anything, the simmering frustration Severus felt, hating himself for needing Hermione so much and how it was affecting him so, spurred him on, giving him the will and desire to fly away from his troubles as fast as possible.

By the time Severus had crossed the landmark they used to designate as a finish line, Iakona was far behind him and the rest of the Finau family was even farther yet.

He had made mention he needed to do a bit of collecting during their flight, so he flew over towards the sheer cliffs where white-tailed tropicbirds were nesting, in order to collect a few eggs. Grabbing his bag from a pocket on the leg of his flying gear, Severus hovered his broom over towards a nest that had a couple eggs in them.
Being careful, as the nest was located just above some viciously thorny bougainvillea, Severus reached over sideways. He was hoping to not crack the shells during the collection process since they were very fragile.

As he reached a little farther, he felt something in his back twinge and he seized up, twisting his body. Grimacing in pain, he also swore, as his broom faltered, and Severus and his broom drifted suddenly into the cascade of bougainvillea, scratching him up badly in the process.

Severus dropped the bag and winced as he set himself upright on his broom, in pain from having to bend over and grab his broom handle. As he sat up as straight as possible on a broom, Iakona joined him.

“You all right, Uncle Severus?” the young wizard asked.

“No,” Severus ground out between gritted teeth. “My back.”

Iakona sped off and got his mother, who was over half a mile away still.

Rainbow flew over and saw the way Severus was sitting on his broom. “Oh, dear. You wrenched your back, didn't you?”

“Yes,” he said, his eyes shut tight as just trying to balance on the broom was making his back hurt that much more.

Rainbow brought her broom alongside Severus and pulled out her wand.

A few spells and Severus' back was well enough to get him back home, but he would still need to see a specialist. Rainbow said she knew someone who could fix him up good as new, and she would owl the person once they got back to their home.

The flight around the island was cut short as Severus, much to his humiliation, was escorted back to the Finaus' home.

Once they were back, Severus was set up in the guest bedroom with a charmed ice-pack on his lower back while Rainbow contacted the specialist.

“Don't feel bad, Severus,” Mounga assured him. “My dad was as fit as they come, and he threw his back out when he was five years your junior on the amateur adult Quidditch league during one dive for the Snitch.”

Severus had seen family photos. Mounga's father was as large as Mounga, possibly larger. If he was a Seeker, he was probably the world's largest Seeker ever to have played in a game professionally or as an amateur.

Mounga's comment should have consoled Severus, but it didn't. It made him feel old and decrepit. Severus had promised to act as a substitute referee for the junior league game of the Warriors versus Sharks the next day, as one referee had to bow out due to family illness. Now he would have to abdicate and another referee would have to be found last-minute. Severus acted as an alternate referee when one of the referees could not make it, and this would have been his fourth game substituting, but it seemed he would need a substitute for himself now. Mounga assured him not to worry about it, as there were a couple others who could fill in.

Rainbow came back into the guest bedroom where Severus was laid out on his stomach. “Well, you have an appointment with a chiropractor and masseuse who will fix you right up. She takes care of Mounga when he tweaks himself periodically. You'll be right as rain by tonight.”

She took the time before Severus' appointment to clean up the scratches on his face, arms and legs. The bougainvillea had torn right through the fabric and punctured and scratched him with its long, piercing thorns.

Lunch was being served up, and Severus was asked if he wanted to join the family, but he decided to just continue laying down, his appetite severely diminished due to the pain. Rainbow's spells to help with the pain reduced the severity, but still did not take away all of it. She could have given Severus a potion, but she said that the specialist he was going to see had her own potions to give him for his treatment session.

When lunch was over, Rainbow came back into the bedroom and gave Severus the address of where to go. Severus said he'd come back later to pick up his broom, to which Mounga said he'd keep it in the broom shed until he could fetch it later.

As Severus slowly hobbled the four blocks to where this “specialist” had her office, he hoped she could help provide him some relief. He would have Apparated, but he feared the act would wrench his back even more, and the specialist's office did not have a Floo connection.
The initial awkwardness between Neville and Hermione quickly dissipated as they got to work on deadheading some of the early-season roses and other late-spring perennials which had already finished blooming. Neither said anything about the incident in which they found themselves in each other's arms. They were back to their usual friendly banter, talking in Latin, and discussing the upcoming election where Amelia Bones was challenging Cornelius Fudge for the seat of Minister of Magic.

The election would be held around mid-August, so there was a lot of time before people would vote on the matter.

As the day was coming to an end, Seamus Finnigan and Dean Thomas stopped by the nursery at closing time, as they had done periodically, to visit their old school chum.

“So Neville, you up for a pub crawl tonight?” Seamus asked. His eyes periodically darted over Neville’s shoulder to view Hermione’s backside, as she bent over to pick up a bag of potting soil to move to the potting shed. “We’re hoping to hit all four countries – England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland – tonight. Last one who doesn’t splinch themselves wins. You game, mate?”

Neville gave his friends a lopsided smile. “Sorry, but I’m taking Hermione out to dinner tonight.”

It was all very platonic and innocent, but not the way Seamus interpreted it.

“All right! Banging the divorcee. Good job, mate,” Seamus congratulated him, with a jocular clap upon the shoulder. “It’s about time you got back on the old broom after Luna dumped you.”

Hermione barely caught what Seamus said, and what little she did hear, she chose to ignore. What she definitely heard was the sound of Neville’s fist making contact with Seamus’ face. Neville could have used his wand, but there was something a bit more chivalrous about him hitting their old classmate instead of hexing him.

“What the fuck did you do that for?!?” screamed Seamus, his hand held to his nose to stem the flow of blood, as he laid half-sprawled on his arse while looking up at his old classmate.

“You apologize to Hermione right this instant,” Neville demanded, whipping out his wand and pointing it squarely at Seamus’ chest.
“What for?” Seamus questioned, sounding like he had a cold as his nose began to swell.

“How dare you talk about Hermione that way!” Neville stood up to his full height, towering over Seamus.

Dean said nothing. He held his hands up in surrender, a reminder that he had nothing to do with the choice of his friend's words.

“She must really be a fabulous piece of cunny for you to deck me like that,” Seamus bit out with a snarl, spitting out some blood, giving his friend a contemptible look.

“Hermione and I are just friends. And if we were more than that, it would still be none of your business. As for Luna, you know nothing on that matter either.” Neville's voice became deep and threatening, full of promise to make Seamus regret his words. The look on his face matched his words. “Now apologize to Hermione.” He prodded the tip of his wand at Seamus' throat to encourage him to do the proper thing.

Seamus had seen Neville like this only during the war. The herbologist was normally a very sweet and affable fellow, but when provoked, he could be as dangerous as any well-trained Auror.

“All right, all right.” Seamus put his hands up. Glancing over at Hermione, who was standing with her arms crossed over her chest with a glare, he said, “I'm sorry, Hermione. I shouldn't have said that. I assumed—”

“That's right, you assumed.” Hermione didn't want to be the center of gossip, especially if Neville would be dragged into it. He was too nice to be subjected to the rumor mill that she had been through enough over the years. She was still dealing with the looks she got for being known at that witch who divorced her husband, the star Quidditch player.

“I'm sorry. I thought that since he was taking you to dinner, you two were dating,” Seamus explained with a meek shrug as he hauled himself up off the ground.

“Hermione is doing part of her apprenticeship working for me... for free. I don't pay her, but I take her out to dinner as compensation for all her hard work she does around the nursery. She certainly works harder than you did, and that was when I was paying you,” Neville chastised his friend.
Seamus winced as being called out as a lazy worker. His nose was still bleeding and if he stuck around much longer, who knows how much more his ego would be bruised.

“I guess I'll catch you later. Mate,” Seamus said begrudgingly.

Dean gave Neville a faltering smile and shrugged, not knowing what to say about his friend's poor behavior, but not abandoning his friend either, choosing to leave with him.

The pair of wizards Apparated from the spot, leaving Neville and Hermione alone in the main nursery greenhouse.

Neville was still breathing heavily when Hermione came over to him.

“Thank you, Neville. You didn't have to do that, but I appreciate it,” Hermione said with admiration.

“A lady like you shouldn't have to put up with talk from a wizard like that,” Neville said solemnly. “Who cares if you're divorced or not. Ron wouldn't have gotten the same attitude for being divorced, there is no reason why a divorced witch should be treated that way while a divorced wizard is not.”

It was exactly the sort of thing Hermione had thought about in the past several months. A wizard did not face the same social stigma of being divorced, but a witch was certainly treated like a social pariah and a slag. It was wholly unfair and a double standard, but then again, the wizarding world was full of gender double standards, except when it came to Quidditch.

Hermione went to reach for Neville's hand to see if he'd injured it.

Looking it over, she saw that his knuckles were beginning to swell.

“It's all right,” Neville said dismissively. “Besides, it was worth it.”

It touched Hermione that Neville had stood up for her. Tapping her wand to his hand, she healed it.
Neville let her hold his hand for a bit longer when she didn't release it. With his other hand, he tipped her chin to look up at him.

When she glanced up, she saw that same look of desire in his eyes as the night before. Before Hermione could look away and drop his hand, Neville swept his arm around her and firmly kissed her upon the lips.

In shock to Neville's gesture, Hermione didn't move, but she didn't push him away either. Neville's other hand gently cradled the back of her head and he deepened the kiss, his tongue seeking entrance to her mouth, which she granted, despite the sensible part of her mind screaming at her, wondering what the hell she was doing kissing Neville back.

Her own arms reached up and grabbed greedily at Neville's shoulders.

An urgent response to his kisses spurred him on to be bolder, guiding Hermione backwards toward an empty bench in the greenhouse.

Neville's kisses were possessive and spoke of someone who wasn't timid or unsure. There was a certain confidence in his attitude that overwhelmed her, making her want to submit to his advances. It was sexy in the way that there was no hesitation or doubt in his touch, while not being overbearing.

His hand palmed her breast and Hermione gasped, wishing it was Severus and willing to imagine it was. Only God knows what possessed Hermione, but her hands began fumbling with the buckle of his belt. She had been aching for a good and solid fuck since taking the Dionysus Fever potion, remembering the feeling within the hallucination of being savaged by lust made manifest.

Understanding her intention on just how far she was willing to go, Neville grabbed hold of Hermione and Side-Along Apparated with her directly to his bedroom. Once in the seclusion of his home, Hermione yanked at Neville's shirt while he began unzipping her trousers. Neville hadn't even removed Hermione's shirt yet when she was relieved of all clothing below the waist.

In the back of Hermione's mind flitted the silent prayer of thanks she was still on contraceptive potions, more out of necessity to regulate her cycle than to prevent pregnancy.

Neville kneeled before Hermione and kissed her stomach, inching her top off. Once her top was removed, he began hungrily kissing and suckling at her breasts while Hermione closed her eyes and ran her fingers through his hair, moaning in response to his touch. It was different than Severus' touch, but she didn't care. She ached with need.

His broad shoulders were tanned from working shirtless in his own garden at home. He definitely had the build of someone who worked the land.

Guiding her down onto the bed, Neville's eyes met Hermione's and he asked silently for permission as his mouth trailed lower from her breasts down her stomach. Hermione sighed, laying her head back. She spread her legs, letting Neville go down further.

He was gentle and patient, licking and nibbling, probing and suckling at various parts of her. A part of her was feeling guilty as if she was cheating on Severus. In a way she was cheating, even though there were no promises between her and Severus even with the plan to move to Hawaii in the future, but if she stopped herself now, she felt she would surely cry. Shoving any feelings of guilt aside, she begged Neville to take her, unable to wait any longer. He hadn't brought her to orgasm yet, but she didn't care. She just wanted to be shagged senseless. She would deal with the guilt later.

Neville stood up and finished disrobing before settling himself between Hermione's legs.

After rubbing the tip of his cock around to ease penetration, he slid into Hermione.

Hermione's back arched and she let loose a scream, finally feeling the sensation of something other than a magical dildo in her for the first time in months.

The feeling of Neville's body between her legs, the sensation of skin against skin, the musky scent emanating from him, the sound of his breathing and grunts, the weight of his body above her – this was so much more satisfying than masturbating in solitude in her flat or in a Pensieve.

Neville, guided by Hermione's cries, thrust into her, trying to satisfy the consuming need. He was making her hysterical as she thrashed and clawed at his back, growling with animalistic shrieks.

Right now Hermione didn't care if she came or not. She needed this more than some masturbation-induced orgasm which left her feeling in want of more. It took a great amount of control not to shout out Severus' name as she kept pretending it was her lover.
Neville reached down and stroked her clit, trying to bring her to completion, but he couldn't hold out much longer.

His hips stilled as he came.

“Oh, Luna,” he breathed.

Hermione's eyes flew open. She was not the only person in this bed who was pretending it was someone else.

Neville lifted his head and looked Hermione in the eye. His face spoke of great remorse and embarrassment.

Climbing off Hermione, he sat on the edge of the bed, his head hanging down in shame.

“I'm sorry,” he breathed. “I've been missing her so much. And in a moment when you were so close to me, I...”

Hermione felt great empathy for Neville. She had been missing Severus and had been willing to bed Neville in hope of bringing back the memory of him once more.

“I hope you can forgive me, Hermione.”

Sitting up, Hermione sat next to him, her knees bent and her feet tucked up onto the bed. She placed a tender hand on his shoulder, finally noticing the large bruise on his back where he'd slammed against the tree the night before when he tried to prevent her from falling.

“Don't be ashamed, Neville. You're not the only one pretending it was someone else,” she admitted, unable to look him in the face. She felt a little sore, having engaged in sex without the addition of lubrication.

A perplexed look stole over Neville's face as he scrutinized the witch he'd just bedded. “If you miss Ron so much, how can you work for Lavender then?” he asked, confused by their arrangement, especially now that Lavender was having Ron's child.
Hermione closed her eyes and spun around to face away from Neville. “Ron wasn't the only one who fell in love with someone else while married,” she admitted with some shame, the tears silently falling.

“I thought Ron was the only one who was unfaithful. Who is it, and does Ron know?” Neville thought he knew the story behind their divorce, but evidently there was more to it that Hermione had first admitted.

“Ron doesn't know, and he can't.”

“Why, so you can make him look like the bad guy?” he confronted her hotly, his tone accusatory.

“It's far more complicated than you can imagine, Neville,” Hermione responded with anger. “One day I will tell Ron, but I assure you, this divorce was mutual and I was the one who demanded it to end.”

“What difference would it make if you told Ron now versus a year from now?” He spun around to look at Hermione, regarding her as she sat there nude, her knees drawn up to her chest.

“There are some things I need to do first before the truth can be known. And even then, I think you'd be shocked.”

Hermione could only imagine the look of horror on Neville's face with the news that she'd fallen in love with and helped with the escape of the same Death Eater professor who had made Neville a nervous wreck for so many years.

“Lavender knows the truth,” she confessed. “And this goes beyond just Ron and me. Like I said, it's very complicated.” Hermione stared at her top and brassiere that were laying in a rumpled heap in front of her.

Not wanting to get a bladder infection, Hermione got up and walked off to the bathroom to take care of her needs, leaving Neville to ponder her cryptic words.

~~~~~~~*~

Upon reaching the address on the scrap of parchment Rainbow gave him, Severus opened the door.
“Just a moment?” a witch’s voice rang out from behind an open door. She had a Spanish accent.

Maria emerged from the back and smiled at Severus. It was the same witch whose son had asked if he was an albino at the Christmas luau.

“Rainbow told me you hurt your back. Care to tell me how?” She tilted her head and gave him a curious look.

Severus knew Maria had a decent grasp of English from their previous brief encounters. She sold mangoes from her garden at the Saturday farmers’ market that he periodically visited when he wasn’t busy with morning appointments at his shop; she also was one of the few single witches who wasn’t blatantly pursuing him. For the purpose of avoiding any confusion, though, Severus began speaking in Spanish with her.

“I was flying on my broom and trying to collect some eggs from a nest when I hurt my back.” Severus stood up straighter in order to reduce the tension and pain.

“Collecting eggs? Which hand were you using?” she asked in order to better understand how he wrenched his back.

“My right.”

“And were you reaching up, across, or down,” she said, positioning her body and arm in such a way as to give Severus an understanding of what she meant.

“Across and a little down. There was a crosswind.”

“Using your hands like a clock, what position were your arms in when you reached? Twelve o’clock?” she asked putting her arms right in front of her, before putting them out to the side. “Three o’clock? Or somewhere in between?”

Severus closed his eyes and remembered to how he reached out. “Two o’clock.”
Maria nodded. “Come, I have a table ready for you.”

Severus didn’t know Maria was a masseuse and chiropractor, since most witches and wizards tended to be fully-practicing Healers specializing in magical accidents and illnesses. But given that touch could be healing as well, he supposed it was only natural. He had given many massages as a gigolo. There were witches and wizards who were massage specialists, but the acupuncture and chiropractic disciplines were unique. It was sort of a Muggle profession, but given the propensity on this island to embrace Muggle ways – as he had discovered, there were some witch/wizard and Muggle mixed marriages locally – he shouldn’t have been surprised.

“Are you a Muggle-born? If you don’t mind me asking? Most witches and wizards I know back in England in the healing arts don’t specialize in these areas.” Severus asked, explaining the nature behind his question.

“Yes, I am Muggle-born. My father was a chiropractor, who also studied Chinese acupuncture. My grandfather was an acupuncturist from China. And when I found out I was a witch, I still wanted to incorporate what I learned from my father and grandfather into my field. I was fully trained as a Healer, but find this much more rewarding. Sometimes I help at the clinic when Rainbow is short staffed.”

Severus remembered Ginny’s wish to become a Healer. Between Rainbow and Maria being Healers, he wondered if the young witch might finish her work to become a fully-trained Healer some day. He would have to bring the subject up when Draco and Ginny came over for their ritual Sunday-night dinner the next night.

In the private room, Maria told Severus to undress and gave him the option to keep his underpants on or not. Once she left the room and closed the door, Severus struggled to undress himself, still in his Quidditch flying gear, his regular clothes already thrown over a chair to change into after his treatment. He undressed completely, knowing she would have to massage portions of his hips to work on his back, since everything was interconnected.

There was a knock on the door, and Severus bid her to enter. He was face down on the table with the sheet pulled up to his hips, just as he used to do it when he was massaging clients who visited him as a gigolo.

Maria didn’t talk much except to place her hands on certain areas and ask it something hurt or was tender, or if the pain referred elsewhere.

There was a potion she gave him which numbed most of his trunk region, while she rubbed other potions on his back and hip areas. While face down and numb, he couldn't tell that Maria was inserting thin acupuncture needles into his back and hips, but he occasionally felt some pressure applied with her hands.

At one point, she instructed him to take a deep breath and not to flinch, but to remain relaxed. She had placed her wand at certain points along Severus' spine and set the charm to pull; this straightened out his back and helped pop the disc that slipped back into place. Even with the potion to numb him, Severus felt instant relief once he was realigned, but she still had some work to do.

It took two hours to fix Severus, an operation on par with piecing Humpty Dumpty back together again. Reversing charms that morphed one's head into a tea kettle or restoring body parts splashed with Swelling Solution – those were easy enough to heal, but fixing the soft connective tissue and muscles when one did not injure oneself by magic was another thing. Injuring oneself in the same way a Muggle did sometimes required a bit more skill to fix than a quick charm or simple potion.

Once she was done, she gave Severus a potion to end the numbing effects of the one she had given him earlier.

With feeling returned to his body, Severus felt as good as new. Even that nagging knot in the upper back from hunching over his cauldrons was gone.

Maria was done, but she didn't tell Severus to get up from the table yet. Dragging the tips of her fingers lightly along his spine, she was rewarded with a shuddering sigh from Severus.

He had been missing the feeling of a woman's touch.

Still, ignoring Maria's attempts to seduce him, he asked while still face down on the table, "How soon before I can go back to swimming, gardening, and flying?" He had finished weeding a patch in his garden, and was hoping to get some seedlings planted tomorrow after the Quidditch game that he would no longer be refereeing.

"I'd say if you avoided strenuous activities for a week, you should be fine. But some activities are not as strenuous than others, wouldn't you say?" she asked as her hand slipped under the sheet and slid up the back of Severus' thigh, grazing the inside of it.

Severus' breath hitched, suddenly feeling an erection coming on. He was laying down on top of it as it demanded to spring free from being suddenly bent the wrong way. It was certainly professional enough of her to wait to seduce him until he was better, but given how he was still undressed, except for a thin white sheet, it was not the best professional behavior. Then again, he hadn't been exactly on his best behavior when he was massaging Hermione when he was still pretending to be Calleo. Karma was being an ironic cunt today.

Wincing, he lifted himself up off the table, while trying to remain covered. Sitting up, his legs dangling over the edge, he kept the sheet clutched across his hips and legs, his chest and back exposed.

Maria took the opportunity to approach Severus, standing in front of him between his legs.

“We haven’t had much of a chance to talk, but we can do things other than talking to get to know one another,” she purred, her Peruvian Coast accent indicating she came from an upper-class family.

Severus knew she was married, having heard through the usual island chatter channels that she'd left a physically and emotionally abusive husband and fled for sanctuary while her son was still an infant. The husband was back in Peru. Maria, being Muggle-born, had also been unaware of the magical bonds of marriage regarding children until after she became pregnant and her husband's true colors emerged.

Mustering restraint, Severus closed his eyes and grasped at the edge of the massage table as Maria began to slide her hands up his thighs towards his erection, which was tenting the sheet that concealed him.

“Señora,” he said sternly, trying to find the strength to not give in to her advances, and to impart his disinterest despite what his body was otherwise indicating.

“Maria,” she breathed and leaned forward and kissed Severus.

A part of Severus wanted this. He’d had sex with other clients while he was sleeping with Hermione, but that was his old life. He was no longer a gigolo, and a part of him felt as if he was being unfaithful to her. But he needed this as badly as he needed Hermione. In the Pensieve memory he’d left for Hermione, he had given her permission to lead a new life without him. Who was to say if she had not already done that? Severus wanted to wait for her, but he no longer had the strength to deny his baser needs that would be willingly satisfied by this witch who wanted him now.
His hands grasped her firmly, crushing her to him. Strong arms pulled her to his chest and he kissed her back ferociously, devouring her like prey.

Maria nearly yelped in surprise in this sudden turn in Severus' disposition. She thought he would be the quiet and deliberately slow lover like she imagined, based on how he very carefully selected the mangoes from her table at the farmer's market. There, his hands would delicately slide over the ripe fruit, purposefully picking out the best one with graceful movements of his hands, but here he was now, as if he was possessed by some demon.

"Are you on contraceptives?" he asked breathlessly.

"Si!"

Maria had made sure of it, as she had planned to seduce Severus once she got Rainbow's owl. Rainbow had dropped a hint in her missive about this being an "opportunity," but Maria was already ahead of her friend. She had taken a vial of contraceptive before Severus arrived.

"Bueno," he growled into her ear right before he bit her neck a bit harder than he intended.

Maria's hands finally reached Severus' erection as they continued kissing. "Ai! La Sachamama!" she cried out, feeling his length and thickness. She was making a comparison of Severus to the magical boa constrictor of the Peruvian Amazon rainforest, an animal that could grow to enormous size.

She moaned as Severus kissed her like she imagined a "real man" would. Maria had only been with one other man, her husband, and he was very small by any comparison. Even Ron Weasley would have been considered well-endowed when compared to Maria's husband. Needless to say, Maria's husband had some issues when it came to the bedroom, often compensating with his abusive behavior.

The noises this witch was making were nettlesome to Severus. He was pretending she was Hermione, but this yammering in Spanish was completely ruining it.

Severus' hands roughly yanked up Maria's dress and unceremoniously pulled down her panties. Without preamble, Severus rose from the table, letting the sheet fall away from him. Pushing Maria up against the wall, hitching one of her legs over his arm, Severus positioned himself before entering her with little consideration for her pleasure.
She had wanted a fuck; Severus was going to give her a fuck, but for his pleasure, not hers.

Maria winced, never having had a man so large inside of her. The only thing that kept this experience from being painful was for the fact she had already given birth, and she wasn't as snug as she had been before the birth of Miguel. She thrilled at the sensation and screamed with pleasure.

She began chanting with each thrust from Severus as he had her pinned up against the wall. “Hoy! Hoy! Hoy!”

Gritting his teeth, Severus refrained from clamping a hand over her mouth. Shutting his eyes tighter, he focused on fucking her, feeling something warm and tight around his length.

In his mind, he imagined Hermione laying on his bed, her head thrashing back and forth, screaming his name.

He came, and without even caring if Maria had reached completion or not, he breathed Hermione's name as he finished emptying himself.

It wasn't that satisfying of an orgasm; it merely took the edge off.

Setting Maria’s leg down, he withdrew from her and went to sit back on the massage table. He grabbed the sheet to cover himself once more, not wanting to be under any more scrutiny from this witch. If Severus had picked up the Muggle habit of smoking, he would have pulled out a cigarette and smoked one without even offering one to Maria. He hoped her curiosity was satisfied and she wouldn’t taunt him any further in the future.

“That's it?” Maria asked with disappointment, going back to English.

“What did you expect?” Severus said with little care that she was left unsatisfied.

Severus had prided himself on what a wonderful and considerate lover he was, giving pleasure to witches when other wizards could not, but he no longer cared. It was an empty act that only left him feeling hollow inside.
“Who is Hermione?” she asked, anger growing in her eyes.

“None of your business,” he said casually, as if he couldn't be bothered to tell her, even if he wanted to.

Maria was incensed. Picking up his clothes, she began throwing them at Severus. “I'll be sure to send you the bill,” she snarled at him.

“And how much should I add for tip? Or was my performance to satisfy your curiosity enough to compensate for any extra gratuity?” he threw back at her with a self-satisfied smirk.

Her look of disgust at the sheer gall of Severus' remark confirmed his suspicion that the island's other witches who were still in pursuit of him would soon lose interest, since gossip from Maria's lips would surely spread like wildfire. He had prided himself for years on being a sarcastic bastard, but rarely had to employ this side of himself since coming to Malu Palekaiko. However, it did give him some secret thrill to know he hadn't completely lost his touch, that he was not going too soft in order to be left alone where his heart and his cock were involved.

Maria stormed out of the small treatment office, slamming the door behind her. The one down side to this whole scene was Maria would no longer sell her mangoes to Severus anymore, which was a pity, because she had such nice mangoes.

Chapter End Notes

As always, a huge round of applause to my hard working betas who clean up my punctuation and grammatical mess. For this chapter, please give some love for JuneW and Cygnuz.

Yes, "The Ballad of Eòin and Maighread" is an original ballad composition of mine, I tried to incorporate a little bit of the Scottish language into it without making it too indecipherable. Here is a key to a few of the words:

gowden = golden waefu’ = woeful gaed = went
If you wish to hear it read by a Scot with a heavy northern Scottish accent, then pop on over to the video I put together quickly and posted to YouTube: https://youtu.be/Qf74x2YptVs

This is read by Alastair Stephens, podcaster from StoryWonk, including the wonderful writing podcast, The Journeyman Writer: http://storywonk.com/podcasts/the-journeyman-writer/

You can also hear Alastair, who is Scottish, read Robert Burns' “To A Mouse”, the reading beginning at the 7:23 mark: http://storywonk.com/the-scot-and-the-sassenach-52-to-a-mouse/

The first seven minutes gives a biographical background of Burns,

I know, I know. “How could Hermione or Severus fuck anyone else but each other? Wah!” But look at this logically. No formal proclamations or marriage proposals have been made. Severus said to join him, but he didn't exactly say he would wait for her like a monk. Plus, he gave her permission to move on with her life without him. Nor did she say she would remain chaste until her apprenticeship was done. Each is feeling very vulnerable, and temptation came along. Even Neville fucked Hermione because he was missing Luna so much. And is he supposed to be waiting for Luna to sort out her head while he waits indefinitely after she broke off their engagement? No one is perfect in this fic. Everyone is flawed, just like in real life.

The inspiration for using squonks in this chapter comes from Genesis' “A Trick of the Tale” album and the song "Squonk." The song is based on the Pennsylvania legend of an animal so ugly, it is ashamed of its appearance. Once caught, the animal will cry until it dissolves into a pool of bubbles and tears.

Songwriters: RUTHERFORD, MICHAEL/BANKS, ANTHONY

Parapluie is French for umbrella.

I must acknowledge I ripped off the phrase “disco behemoth” from the show Ally McBeal when referencing Barry White. That phrase will forever be stuck in my brain when thinking about Barry White because of that show.

And if you haven't guessed yet, the movie Draco and Ginny saw in early August 1999 was Notting Hill, which came out in late May in the U.K. I figure they were watching a showing at the end of the run at the movie theater, going to a movie in hopes of few people attending and spotting them. “Ain't No Sunshine” plays during the movie, which is why Draco sang that song.

“Ain't No Sunshine” was written by Bill Withers.
White-tailed tropicbirds, Phaethon lepturus, are native to Hawaii and the South Pacific islands.

The legend of La Sachamama is as follows:

“The Sachamama is a boa constrictor of enormous size. Legend tells that as the snake grows and grows and grows it can no longer move through the jungle, so it searches for a swampy area to make its permanent home. As time passes, jungle trees, ferns, and flowers grow around and over the boa. It becomes completely camouflaged from view by people or jungle animals. At this point the Sachamama is said to be imbued with a magical, magnetic power to attract prey. As the poor, unsuspecting animal or native passes by, he is pulled into the boa’s enormous mouth and devoured.”

http://www.peruvianamazon.com/folklore.htm
"For Whom the Wedding Bells Toll"

Chapter Summary

An inadvertent discovery will lead Severus to a new business venture. Hermione attends Viktor and Anne's wedding, which doesn't feature green pond scum punch, fortunately.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Eighty-Six
"For Whom the Wedding Bells Toll"

Disclaimer: Oh, for Merlin's sake. Rowling owns Harry Potter and I don't. I just play with her characters. How many times must I repeat myself?

Severus felt unkempt. The community's beard-growing competition started two days ago, and so far all he had was two days of growth that made him look old and haggard. He wasn't a vain wizard, but he always liked to present a neat appearance. He had even kept up with occasional teeth-whitening treatments, and exfoliated periodically to keep his skin looking fresh instead of dull from dead-skin build-up. There was even the use of a new shampoo he made to bring back the luster of his hair, since he now had his head stuck over cauldrons most of the day, just like when he was back at Hogwarts.

It was a shallow world, but he was forced to live in it, and figured he might as well at least make an effort to make the best of it. Severus had a business to run. Good grooming required him to keep up appearances, since perceptions colored the public's view about a person, even though his reputation was solidly established on the island. But the beard-growing competition was a big event on the island, and no one made mention of his facial hair, except to wish Severus luck.

Draco also sported two days of growth, but his was a pale golden halo about his face, highlighted against his tanned skin.

Going over some paperwork regarding a recent shipment, Severus heard a knock upon his office door.
Bailey, one of his students who collected ingredients to help pay for lessons, came into his office. He was holding several different bags of various flora and fauna he had collected during the week.

“Do you have time to see me now, sir?”

Severus nodded and they went to Severus' work lab in the back, once he let Draco know he'd be busy for a bit.

The first item Bailey pulled out was a large puddle of banana slugs in an over-sized glass jar with very tiny air holes in the lid that would allow them to breathe, yet not escape. The large yellow gastropods were congregating together in some bizarre mating mass.

“I used one and put it on my sister's plate this morning next to her papaya. She almost ate it. You should have heard her scream,” the young wizard snickered.

Severus should not have found humor in the boy's confession, but he had to admit it was a pretty harmless and amusing prank. It was far less terrible than the pranks he had pulled on him by Potter and Black.

Pulling out his set of scales from a bookcase on the far side of the room, Severus weighed them after taring the weight of the jar.

“Almost a full pound. Impressive.” Severus pulled out his price list from the local apothecary and calculated a fair price. “How does one Galleon, two Sickles sound?”

Bailey agreed to the price, since it was better than what he would have gotten at the apothecary for the slugs.

There were other items, like ginger roots, the broken shells of hatched nene geese from an old nest, dried protea and pincushion flowers and their seeds, some dragon droppings Bailey found from the latest migration, and various other leaves and flowers still fresh from a recent rain shower.

While examining a bag of delicate fungi that Bailey had collected from high up the side of the volcano where the clouds often shrouded the top with fog and mist, Severus picked up something that didn't belong with the fungi.

“What is this?” Severus asked with great interest.

Bailey took the furrow in Severus' brow as disappointment that he'd left something that didn't belong with the fungi fall into the bag.

“Oh, I'm sorry, sir. That's a weed next to where that mushroom grows. I must have accidentally picked one when I was collecting and thrown it in the bag. It won't happen again,” he said a little nervously as Severus was fixated on the small pod.

“It's just a weed, sir,” Bailey went on. “And a nasty one. The flowers tend to bite. One took off a corner of my nail, sir.”

Severus couldn't believe it. He gazed with amazement, wondering if it was really what he suspected it was. There were a lot of plants that had been brought to the Hawaiian Islands from all over the world, but he wondered if this one plant had somehow made its way on purpose with the intent of luring someone to grow it here, or by accident by hitching a ride in a crate of goods like some other plants had that had come to the island chain.

“Let me see your finger,” Severus demanded.

Looking at the nick in the boy's fingernail, it looked like it might be the right size.

Grabbing the boy firmly by the shoulder, he said, “Show me where you collected this.” He was nearly giddy.

“In my back yard. It's an hour and a half hike there, sir,” replied Bailey. He was a little worried, given the odd excitement the Potions master showed regarding this obnoxious little weed.

“I don't care. Do you have a Floo connection?” he asked with growing enthusiasm.

The confused boy shook his head.
“Then we can Apparate there.”

Severus told Draco that he might be late for drinks with Ginny and the Finaus, and to lock up if he wasn't back by closing time. Draco gave his friend a puzzled look as Severus practically bolted out the door with the boy in tow.

As they stood out in the middle of the main street, which afforded the best view of the volcano that towered above the town, Severus said, “Show me where your house is, since you said it was in your back yard.”

Bailey pointed towards an area near the top of the volcano. It was just at the edge of where there was dry and barren lava and the forest began. He trekked a long way to come to Severus' shop for lessons on foot a couple times a week.

'Of course that's where it would be,' Severus thought, noting the cooler climate due to elevation of the constant source of moisture, with the flow of clouds providing a cool misty environment.

“Hold on,” Severus told the boy, and held him while they Side-Along Apparated to a spot that was a two-minute walk from that particular patch of forest.

Where they wound up was almost in Bailey's back yard. The spot Bailey had collected from was within the property lines, since Severus warned him and others he paid about collecting on other people's property.

The trail was narrow and a bit perilous. Severus had to shuffle along a narrow ledge, holding on to vines in front and above his head that kept him from falling down a 300-foot sheer cliff. The whole trail was only barely wide enough for one to carefully walk single-file. The place where Severus Apparated to was the closest spot for two people to stand together and not fall over the edge.

Once they reached the place, Severus was nearly hysterical with joy. It was sheltered by trees above whose branches gathered the mist that swirled around the volcano mountaintop and dripped with dew.

“Bailey, how would you feel if I said you and your family would never have money troubles ever again?” Severus said with reverence.
Before Severus was a large swath of Miniature Man-Eating Masdevallias. Each pod was worth fifty Galleons – more if they were freshly-picked and plump.

Miniature Man-Eating Masdevallias were an orchid native to the high-cloud forests of the Andes in Ecuador, Columbia, Peru, and Bolivia. Since they were very valuable and prized as a Potions ingredient, they were over-harvested and only a few wild stands were left in South America. Those stands were closely guarded, most often under a Fidelius Charm to keep poachers away, given the high price of the plant and its pods. The magical version of the orchid was an exceptionally hard orchid to grow in a pot, and all attempts to commercially grow them had failed so far. The only solution was to leave the orchid to grow wild wherever it found a patch of ground to flourish, and harvest from there. There was easily over 100,000 Galleons worth of pods in this patch alone.

Bailey picked a pod from a plant near his foot and said, “What? This?” He dropped the pod and crushed it beneath his shoe, unaware of its worth.

“Bailey, do not destroy another single pod,” Severus commanded the boy.

Bailey looked at Severus as he began to understand the value of this little weed he had often picked and chucked over the cliff out of boredom over the years.

Severus asked to speak with his parents, since this patch was on their land.

“My mom's still working at the taro farm on the east side of the island. She'll be back from work in a couple hours. My dad is off somewhere, probably drinking,” Bailey confessed, shame and embarrassment reflected in his tone.

Severus could empathize. When he was growing up, he was exposed to his own father's penchant for the bottle and the violent episodes that would follow.

“Then we'll speak only with your mother.” He placed a hand upon the boy's shoulder, seeing a bit of himself in this lad.

Bailey was a bright student with great potential. The only reason he was able to continue on with lessons with Severus was due to all the ingredients the boy brought Severus weekly, which barely covered the cost of the lessons and materials. This boy would never have to collect ingredients again, unless he wanted to. Severus hoped the young wizard would continue, since he usually brought Severus some of the nicest and freshest ingredients of all his students he paid for their collecting.

Bailey invited Severus into his meager home, that was nothing more than a large shack perched precariously on the hillside, held up on stilts. The boy offered to make him a cup of coffee while they waited for his mother to return home from her long day at the taro farm. Bailey's sister was over at a neighbor's house down the mountain, since she was still too young to be left home alone.

Lady Anne Battenberg was a vision in virginal white with a long veil and a blusher, the choice of a blusher being pretty ironic considering all the depraved things she had begged and paid Severus to do to her. The witch hadn't blushed in a very long time. Only Lavender knew of the bride's former activities, among the many high-society and famous guests in attendance, since she was the one who had arranged her meetings with “Bob,” her gigolo. Lavender normally wouldn't have been invited, despite their acquaintance – and especially since she knew of Anne's secret trysts with Severus, having fielded her requests for certain activities. However, she was now Ron Weasley's wife, and Ron was a good friend to Viktor Krum, the groom and her husband-to-be.

Hermione had no idea of Lady Anne's relationship to Severus. Lavender would never tell her, due to client confidentiality, but she also knew Hermione wouldn't want to know about Severus' former clients, even if she could ask him.

The former Mrs. Weasley had gone to Madam Mandel's and, with the help of the haute couture fashion designer, found a dress suitable for the occasion that was neither too strong in color nor too flashy, as it was never good manners to take the spotlight away from the bride on her day.

A simple floor-length dress with short capped sleeves in royal purple flattered Hermione. Emerald and forest green, and ruby red, were also flattering colors for her, but entirely inappropriate to wear to a wedding that included a Muggle-born bride, since those colors were inappropriate for Muggle weddings.

Hermione sat next to Lavender and Ron, which garnered a few odd stares. She didn't know anyone else at the wedding, given the social circles Viktor and the bride ran in. Lavender was on a first-name basis with many in the crowd, but it was most often through business contacts and networking. Hermione was going to have to learn their names, since she would be filling in for Lavender in a few months.

The new Mrs. Weasley was wearing a dress that fit her expanding midsection yet didn't look like it was made by Omar the tent-maker, as many maternity designs often did. Ron looked quite dashing, still sporting his muscular physique and nicely-cut robes, no doubt picked out by his wife, who had good taste.
The bride's parents were Muggles related to royalty. They were second- or third-cousins, once- or maybe twice-removed from Prince Phillip, husband and consort to the Queen of England; Hermione couldn't remember the exact lineage. They seemed at a bit of a loss, given their daughter's association with so many witches and wizards. The bride's parents were disappointed that it was not being held in a proper church, but given that the Church of England still held a certain viewpoint about witches, in addition to the I.S.W.S. of 1692, they accepted a ceremony officiated by a Ministry of Magic official. The parents invited very few of their Muggle friends.

Officially, in the Muggle world, Lady Anne Battenberg didn't even exist, as she'd been conveniently wiped from ancestral records upon discovery she was a witch. The Ministry of Magic had helped with the erasure of many items of Muggle documentation and artifacts to help cover this up, upon the request of the Muggle Ministry and the Crown.

Upon her marriage, Anne would be giving up her title and, in a way, severing the last ties to her Muggle life. She would still be in contact with her parents and her one sister, a Muggle as well, but most probably would drift farther away from her roots. This is what Hermione had done over the years, drifting from her own parents, whom she had not been visiting as often as she had promised she would since her divorce.

The outdoor ceremony was not too lengthy, which was nice considering that Lavender had to fan herself, feeling a bit overly warm out in the sun where the guests were seated, watching the ceremony take place in front of them in a wooden pavilion. No cooling charms were permitted, since there were Muggles present. Fortunately, Lavender didn't have to get up to excuse herself, her pregnancy making her hot and uncomfortable. There was a tent set up for the reception afterwards, and it would be more cool in there than the shaded area they were currently sitting in.

Hermione's invitation allowed her to bring a guest. She had almost considered asking Neville to be her date, but given their falling into each other's arms and Neville's bed, she was glad she didn't. It would have been more awkward had Neville been there; she never would have rescinded her offer.

She had already asked Albert for that Saturday off for the wedding. That was good, considering she felt like she needed a little breathing room from Neville, what with how awkward they reacted towards one another after Hermione got dressed. She even bowed out of dinner that particular night, going home to her flat and feeling guilty over what had happened.

The ghostly visions of Remus and Hagrid had made it no easier for her to deal with what she had done that night. The spectres of her consciousness asked some very pointed and uncomfortable questions. They had reminded her that they were manifestations from her own mind, but it didn't make their grilling any less uncomfortable, bringing up subjects she didn't want to address that night.
The wedding ceremony finally ended. The bride and groom kissed, and everyone clapped decorously before the newlyweds walked down the aisle to take photos elsewhere, since they had not seen each other before the ceremony.

Everyone adjourned to the reception tent and nibbled on hors d'oeuvres that were pretty tasty and probably cost a small fortune, considering that each one looked like a miniature piece of art. Hermione sipped champagne while Lavender had her choice of water with or without carbonation and a slice of lemon, since the choices for teetotalers was rather limited. Ron was very attentive to his wife, helping her to a chair when her feet got tired or she felt out of breath. He fetched her water and took away whatever canapes suddenly offended her olfactory senses, since she was still a bit sensitive to some smells.

Ron went to chat with some of the other Quidditch players who were invited to the event, while Lavender and Hermione chatted about work and the upcoming India launch. Harry and his wife, Zhubanys, were supposed to have been seated with them at their table, but for some reason, the Potters never arrived. Their absence was marked by the two empty seats. Ron had been hoping to catch up with Harry since they had recently patched their friendship.

The bride and groom finally made their grand appearance. A reception line was formed in which everyone would have a chance to congratulate the couple and meet everyone in the bridal party. The bride's parents seemed to find some of the wizarding world's fashion choices rather questionable, but seemed to find less offense with their stares at what Hermione and Lavender wore than Ron's robes.

Food was served and eaten, and polite conversation made with the others who sat at the same table with Mr. and Mrs. Weasley and the former Mrs. Weasley. Everyone had the good manners to not bring up the divorce nor make mention of the fact that Lavender and Hermione were so chummy, considering the scandalous nature of a husband moving from the one witch to the other.

Hermione and Lavender were becoming friends, as Lavender was the only person with whom she could openly and frankly discuss some matters. Even Lavender had taken to openly grousing about some annoying habits Ron engaged in and asked for Hermione's advice on an occasion or two. Hermione still visited Harry and his new wife, Zhubanysh, about once a month for dinner, but even she could not talk about Severus much with her oldest friend.

The bride and groom danced, and most people found their way to the dance floor as the live band played on. Lavender was up for only one slow dance with Ron, and then decided that was enough for her.
Ron was begged away for a dance from the wife of one of his teammates, with Lavender waving him away, telling him not to worry since Hermione was keeping her company. Hermione was not feeling like dancing much and preferred to sit. Perhaps if Severus had been there, she would not have been adverse to going out on the dance floor.

As Hermione and Lavender discussed some more ideas for products targeted specifically for infants, Dagmar Nettleton came over and sat herself down at their table without invitation.

“Dagmar, it has been a while since we last spoke,” Lavender said cordially.

Hermione could tell there was little joy in Lavender seeing this particular witch, as she had that certain smile plastered across her face that was a mask for indifference or loathing.

Hermione had come to recognize it after watching her at the Ministry's Halloween ball, even with an actual mask on.

“Well, I just had to come over and give you an update,” Dagmar simpered with great self-satisfaction. “It seems that present you helped me procure for Bascom's birthday was far better than I had hoped. He was quite thrilled with it, I should say. Not what I expected at all, though we are now better for it, if I do say so myself. It is a pity about that unfortunate incident in February, though I had already expanded my circle of ‘friends', so it was not too great of a disruption.”

Lavender nodded her head politely. “I am so glad that it seems to have all worked out for the best. How fortuitous.”

Dagmar suddenly looked at Hermione, recognition making her eyes widen and alight. “I remember you from the ball. Mrs. Weasley.” Her eyes then turned to Lavender. “And the new Mrs. Weasley. My, what a cozy arrangement. Do you share?”

Hermione may have missed the entire context of what Mrs. Nettleton was discussing with Lavender before, but she certainly caught the meaning of her question regarding Lavender, Ron, Hermione, and their relationship.

Before Hermione could respond to such a suggestion, Lavender discreetly placed a calming hand on Hermione's arm under the table to silently indicate she would deal with the matter.
“Dagmar! Honestly. You shock me, which isn't easy to do,” Lavender confessed with the hint of a blush, even fooling Hermione at being stunned by such a proposal. “Not everyone is so open minded to such possibilities, nor is everyone suited to such arrangements. We're just conventional witches. Whatever arrangement you have with Bascom now seems to suit you both.”

“Perhaps with age comes wisdom to explore new possibilities. But I shan't shock you any longer,” Dagmar said, fanning herself dramatically, as if the topic of conversation was too hot for present company. “I just wanted to thank you.”

Dagmar rose and sauntered off, her eyes scanning the reception for fresh meat of either sex.

Once the older witch was gone, Lavender's face fell, becoming equally somber and disgusted. “My God, what have I done? I've created a monster.”

“That witch pinched my arse at the Halloween ball,” Hermione added, still repulsed by the concept.

“Why I am suddenly not surprised,” Lavender growled. “And here I was hoping Bascom would have keeled over from a heart attack, but alas no. Figures he'd like it.”

Hermione was about to ask what Lavender was talking about, but Lavender dismissed it with a wave of her hand and said it was a topic for another time in another place.

Before Hermione could mediate on the matter, Viktor came over while circulating among the guests. He greeted the pair of witches.

“Her-my-knee. Lavender. It is so good to see you both. And might I add congratulations on the news,” Viktor said, his eyes glancing down at Lavender's swollen abdomen, obviously into her second trimester.

“Thank you, Viktor. You and Anne seem very happy. May you have many wonderful years together,” the blonde witch said warmly. It did not escape her attention that the bride was not socializing at this table.

“Thank you so much. And if I may steal Hermione away for a dance?” Viktor asked, his hand outstretched.
Hermione looked to Lavender, who gave her a stern glare, out of view from Viktor, that she had better get up and accept, or Lavender was going to use her wand and dump her out of her chair that instant.

“Of course. You'll be fine, won't you Lavender?” she asked, looking at her boss.

Waving her hand dismissively, without a care, she casually sighed with a song-song voice, “I'll be fine. Go have a dance or two.”

Viktor tucked Hermione's hand into the crook of his arm and escorted her to the dance floor. They began dancing to a waltz, moving to and fro before they began to spin about with the other couples, moving like multi-hued floating petals swirling above a lazy whirlpool.

“I am sorry to hear about your divorce with Ron. I had no idea that things were so bad,” Viktor said, beginning their conversation on a serious note.

They had owled each other periodically, but both had avoided the topic before in their correspondence. Hermione had assured him that she was fine, and left it at that. How could one discuss such a topic through letters?

“It was mutual, and we're both happier for it,” she assured him.

“I don't wish to be im-pert-tent-tent...” he stumbled over the word.

“Impertinent?”

“Yes, that word. But you do not look as if you are faring for the better.” Viktor tried looking in her face to gauge her reaction.

“I'm working on a Potions apprenticeship. I'm just very tired from working and completing my apprenticeship at the same time. After a long day at work, I have to crack the books.”
Hermione sighed; it was more than her work load that had taken some of the sparkle from her eyes since Viktor saw her last at the Ministry Halloween ball. Severus was gone, and with him, that glow that he brought forth within her.

“It surprised me to discover that you are working for the witch that Ron is now married to. A bit unconventional. But you and her seem to be friends,” her old friend noticed, a slightly perplexed look on his face regarding their arrangement.

“Yes, actually, she and I have put the unpleasantness regarding Ron behind us. This apprenticeship means the world to me, and Lavender has been a very fair and equitable employer, more so than the last job I had.” Hermione smiled a bit upon reflecting that Lavender was giving her opportunities to expand her knowledge base through practical experience, things she could never learn in a classroom or a book.

The wizarding world didn’t exactly have a flourishing trade in books on how to be a better business witch or wizard, and Hermione wasn’t about to start reading the Muggle business management books unless it was absolutely necessary. It was bad enough when her aunt droned on about such matters.

The waltz ended. Viktor and Hermione changed to dancing a simple foxtrot, moving their feet, but concentrating more on their conversation.

“Perhaps you can come over for lunch some time. It will give us a chance to talk more and for you to better acquaint yourself with my bride,” Viktor offered.

“It will have to be a dinner, since my weekends are full with my apprenticeship working in my Potions master's garden or in his laboratory. Sundays are most convenient.”

Hermione sighed, trying to not dread the monthly booze-up that was happening next weekend, now that she remembered what was on her calendar ahead.

Viktor agreed to the arrangement and promised to owl her once they were back from their honeymoon.

As Severus walked to Tina and Manny's wedding, he was nearly broadsided by a young wizard on a skateboard who rounded the corner on the sidewalk.
“Watch it!” he snarled at the youth.

The skateboarder went on his merry way with a brief apology shouted back as he continued coasting, intoning he was still getting the hang of the device. The young wizard was followed by a bicycling witch, who could barely steer her way down the street.

The summer Muggle Studies program had begun last night.

On a large white sheet erected in the community park the night before, they had shown the western movie “Shane,” which Severus had missed. Someone who had ties to the witches and wizards in Los Angeles was able to get the magically adapted projector during summers to show movies every Friday night. Supposedly next week they were going to show a musical, but it was unknown which one they would screen. They had to wait until the film was Portkeyed over before anyone would know.

Severus had discovered that in addition to the Muggle Studies program, which was funded by the community, a large number of students who had taken their SAT’s wound up scoring top marks in the subject. Because of the large Muggle influence on the island, which included mixed marriages, and the Muggle Studies program every summer, a large number of kids from Malu Palekaiko went on to work for not only the United States Department of Magic, but many other foreign governments as liaisons and consultants between the wizarding and Muggle world, or jobs that dealt with Muggle devices. The ones who had the marks to become an Auror were often placed in divisions that required pursuing cases that allowed them to blend in with Muggles in deep undercover assignments.

While flying about the island, Severus had seen the Muggle campus that also operated as one of those Muggle camps for adult witches and wizards he'd read about in that sales fodder while waiting to Portkey from San Francisco. The streets mimicked the real Muggle world with streetlights, concrete sidewalks, and traffic signs. They had a livery of nearly a dozen automobiles of all types, and the children who were at least sixteen would be able to learn to drive. Some had actually gone on to get their driver's license in hopes of getting a job that would make use of their knowledge of the Muggle world in a magical job capacity, after finishing their schooling. It wasn't like there was a lot of job opportunities on the island. Being exceptionally well-versed in the Muggle world was often a ticket out, and onto bigger and better things.

Severus watched another witch flail her arms about like a windmill as she tried to master roller skates, her feet laced into ankle-high boots. The gravity of the sloped street was pulling her faster towards the bottom of the hill that led towards the beach.

Not wanting to get knocked off his feet, since who knows who else would come barreling down the street or boardwalk, Severus cast a cushioning and deflection protection charm about his person. He was carrying a wedding present; he didn't need to get himself bowled over or for the present to be knocked out of his hands on the way to the wedding.

Arriving at the church, it didn't surprise him that the whole place looked like unicorns and Pygmy Puffs had vomited all over the church interior, as it was decorated with an ungodly amount of pink and lavender. The flowers, bunting, wall color... everything except the pews, altar, and crucifix was suddenly the color of a cheap love potion. Severus felt mildly nauseous from the color saturating his field of vision.

After placing his gift – some tasteful glassware wrapped with silver and white gift paper – on the table to the side so he didn't have to hold it during the ceremony, Severus took a seat next to Draco and Ginny, who had saved a seat for him.

“Where were you last night?” Draco asked in a hushed whisper, understanding the Muggle protocol to speak quietly in a house of worship. “You missed the movie. It was actually good, I was surprised.”

“I had some very pressing matters regarding a student of mine. Which reminds me I need to speak with Mounga after the wedding.” Severus wasn’t going to say much more on the matter and was thankful that the organist had started playing music indicating the procession of bridesmaids and ushers.

The bride came in on her father's arm, looking like one of those crocheted toilet paper roll covers he was forced to learn about in Muggle Studies when they covered the modern arts and crafts back in the 1970's at Hogwarts.

Tina was a Muggle-born and was raised a Southern Baptist. She had found a wizard who was also a Southern Baptist pastor to perform the wedding ceremony. Manny was rather ambivalent about religion, as many witches and wizards were, but agreed to having a Christian pastor for the wedding since it seemed quite important to her.

There was a whole lot of speaking by the officiant, and prayers during which Severus noted he was expected to bow his head. He observed with a sort of detachment. Not soon enough, the bride and groom were pronounced husband and wife, and the wedding moved over two blocks to the community center that Tina and Manny had rented.

When Ginny and Draco had their reception, it was a community-inspired event to give the young couple a proper wedding feast. The town had become enamored with the couple's romantic story, unaware of Draco's financial ability to fully afford to throw a grand reception even after buying a house. In contrast, Tina and Manny were known to the community, and everyone knew the two could afford to pay for their own reception.

The community center was decorated with more of that vomitous sugary pink hue and sickly lavender color. At least the lavender that Lavender picked for herself did not have a undertone that was comparable to bad-tasting medicine, unlike Tina's choice for colors.

Much to Severus' dismay, he learned that it is common for Southern Baptist weddings to have no liquor at the reception. The upside was they also tended to refrain from dancing, though some weddings of that particular denomination did have dancing. Severus was certainly not up for any dancing, even though his back was all better. At least there was a live band playing music in the background, though it was rather bland and innocuous.

Severus congratulated the bride and groom in the receiving line, then joined Ginny and Draco, who had taken a spot near the back. Many of Tina's Muggle relations had come. The event was a rather raucously noisy and boring affair, especially with the lack of alcohol.

Heading over to the punch bowl to get himself a drink, Severus offered to get drinks for Ginny and Draco, which they politely declined. When he got there, he finally understood why they had refused. The punch was a bright lime-green murky sludge, with what looked like pond scum floating atop of it.

One of Tina's Muggle relations had come over with the same idea and asked Severus for a cup of the “refreshment.”

“What exactly is this?” he asked, trying not to recoil in horror of the festering pus-like color in the bowl before him.

“It's 7-Up and lime sherbet, silly!” huffed a large Muggle woman with a Southern accent thicker than Tina's. The Muggle's hair had a distinct chemical-orange color and was piled up in a large bouffant atop her head.

Severus stuck with water.

For all the lack of refreshment options, at least the food was the most pleasantly memorable part of the entire event. Tina's Muggle relations had decided to cater the event themselves. Severus knew that Muggles could cook, but even he was impressed with the quality of the food. There were ribs and brisket that had been smoked for several hours and was near falling-apart tenderness. Because Tina was originally from South Carolina, they served the pork barbecue with a mustard sauce, and the beef with a sweeter Memphis-style tomato-based sauce. Both were excellent in Severus' opinion, and he finally found a reason not to regret accepting the invitation to the wedding and reception. While Severus had an aversion to barbecue sauce after his run-in with Frank, the slovenly Portkey officer in San Francisco, he was willing to set his prejudice aside for the day, much to his palate's delight.

Light and airy cornbread, savory and smoked beans, coleslaw with a nice vinegar bite, potato salad laced with bacon, corn on the cob grilled within its own husk, a variety of pickled summer vegetables (including okra, carrots, cauliflower, watermelon rind and cucumbers), grits served with shrimp, fresh slices of onion and tomatoes, and succotash were some of the many side dishes.

There may have been only about seventy or eighty guests for the whole event, but there was enough food to feed at least twice that many. Given how much Tina's relations ate, it was no wonder there was so much food. Even Ginny was aghast at the amount of food some of those Muggles piled away.

The tossing of the garter was an embarrassing affair, as Tina's male Muggle relations kept egging Manny to inch the bride's dress higher and higher. Given that these were the bride's male relations made it a bit uncomfortable and creepy. Tina tossed her bouquet and the single Muggle women there seemed to take the fact that a witch caught it, fair and square, as some offense, thinking she has used magic to catch it instead of good old-fashioned hand-eye coordination and sharp elbows to the other rivals.

Thoroughly stuffed, Severus excused himself from the event, giving the bride and groom a cursory farewell and slightly snarky, innuendo-laced “good luck.” He was not bothering to wait for cake, since there wouldn't be any champagne served with it.

He had more pressing matters to address as well. Severus needed to speak with Mouna regarding the property owned by Bailey's parents, given that it was now worth a small fortune due to the secret crop of Miniature Man-Eating Masdevallia orchids that had been growing there freely for some time.

Last night, Bailey's mother, Blanche Condre, met with Severus. After the Potions master discussed with her the value of the rare crop growing freely in her backyard, and reasons behind why it was a rare and valuable Potions ingredient, she agreed to meet with Severus at Mouna's house. There, they would draft up a contract in which Severus would help manage the resource, since over-harvesting and initial poor management in South America had made the ingredient an even rarer commodity. They would discuss a Fidelius spell for the part of the property where the orchids grew.
Also, upon some personal disclosure, Blanche confessed this was her opportunity to set her husband up with a stipend and living quarters so he could live far and away from her and their children. It was clear to everyone what a poor father and husband he had proven himself to be over the years.

As for Blanche and how she came to own the most valuable piece of property on the island based on its resource alone, her great-grandparents came seeking sanctuary many decades prior, and she inherited the property after they passed away. She stayed in Malu Palekaiko because she had a place to live, especially after she married her husband who was from an equally impoverished background. Blanche, having grown up locally and not obtaining good enough SAT scores to go on and have some career to get her off the island, wound up working in the fields, like so many others.

When Severus rounded the corner, after leaving the reception, he saw Blanche sitting on the front porch with Mounga. Severus had suggested that Mounga set up the legal paperwork and contract for this partnership.

The property was to remain in Blanche's name, handed down to her children, with Severus as manager of the field of orchids. He would receive fifteen percent of all profits for the first ten years; the fee would be renegotiated later depending on how much he was needed to help continue managing the business and field. He knew through his extensive knowledge the best harvesting practices, as well as being far more versed in Herbology than Blanche, Bailey, or his little sister, Bernadette. It would take years to learn and possibly one of the children taking an Herbology apprenticeship in order to become competent enough to manage the reserve without Severus' supervision. Severus was to also be in charge of supervising the harvesting, packaging, and shipping of the valuable pods until he could teach Blanche how to run the office side of the business. The children would help when not busy with their schoolwork.

Walking up the steps, Blanche rose from her seat and greeted Severus with a handshake, a hopeful smile upon her face since she could see an end to backbreaking work in the taro fields and the start of her husband living far away. “Ready to go into business together?” she asked Severus.

“I'm always ready when there is money to be made in a venture,” he freely admitted.

Growing up poor could certainly give one a sense of drive to never be in that position ever again.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Thank you to be glorious betas, JuneW and thegreyladies.
A group of slugs is called “a puddle of slugs.”

Banana slugs are native to northern California up through Alaska, along the coastal region. They are not a problem in Hawaii – I don't even know if they even have them in Hawaii, but they are so cool and unique (and the mascot of University of California Santa Cruz) that I had to incorporate them somewhere into the story.

Nenes (pronounced NAY-nays) are the state bird of Hawaii.
Chapter Summary

Hermione and Severus both wallow in the guilt of their actions.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

Chapter Eighty-Seven

“Nemo Malus Felix” (Peace Visits Not the Guilty Mind/No Rest for the Wicked)

Disclaimer:
In a dark Scottish castle, cool wind in my hair
Warm smell of pumpkin pasties, rising up through the air
Up ahead in the distance, I saw a shimmering wand
My fic grew lengthy and my plot grew thin
I had to stop, I could tell
There he stood on the blank page;
I grabbed my mouse and I clicked
And I was thinking to myself,
"This could be decent or this could be shit."
Then he spoke in my fanfic and he showed me the way
There were lawyers down the corridor,
I thought I heard them say...
JK Rowling owns all of Harry Potter.

A/N: Disclaimer a parody of “Hotel California.”

==========

At the June Potions master social gathering, everyone made their first toast in congratulations to Hermione for passing her Latin test with flying colors, and so quickly.

“Two down, three to go,” Royston said cheerily before downing his drink in one large swallow.

“What language is next on the agenda?” Reginald Chuff asked as he was refilling his glass with more strong spirits that would be gone long before the ice melted.

Nursing her drink to pace herself, Hermione replied, “Well, since I just finished Latin, I was thinking Spanish next and get that out of the way quickly, because I still have Chinese and Japanese to master as well.”

Gesticulating with his arms, as he was prone to do, Chuff said with his booming voice he used when the alcohol was beginning to hit him, “One apprentice of mine already knew Spanish when he started with me. I thought it was a shortcut and he shouldn't be given the privilege of having to learn only four new languages, so I didn't allow him to count that one.”

Hermione recalled Severus telling her that detail. 'Yep, still a right bastard.'

“Besides,” Chuff rambled on, “if you were my apprentice, I wouldn't let you count Spanish since it's so close to Latin. I would have made you learn German or Arabic.”

“Given where my career might lead me once my apprenticeship is complete, Spanish will serve me far better,” Hermione let accidentally slip.

Everyone's ears at the party perked up.

“Really? Already have something lined up? Do tell. Do tell!” Braxton coaxed her.

Hermione wasn't supposed to say anything, given that some of the very same Potions masters in the room with her periodically consulted with Lavender's competition. The blonde witch didn't want to tip off her competition as to her future moves in order to beat her to new markets. Lavender's main competition was already scrambling to launch in India, hoping to have their own product launches there within a few months after The Lovely Lavender Company had their big launch in October, a mere four months away.

“Actually, I've said too much. But things are in the works.” Hermione put her drink up to her lips to avoid accidentally spilling any more news that was still secret. She hated how alcohol would sometimes make her mouth work faster than her brain at these booze-ups.

“Hmmm, learning Spanish,” Niles mused a bit over-dramatically. “Don't tell me that dago lothario Delgado asked you to come join him in Spain, now that you're a 'free witch' and available.”
Where Niles got that notion, Hermione couldn't fathom, but he was close to the mark. Change the names and locations, and that was exactly what it was.

“Ooh, she's blushing,” Royston jibed. “I think you got it, Niles.”

“It's the drink,” Hermione deflected, sounding very petulant. She had to stop herself from crossing her arms, a tell-tale non-verbal cue, but her lower lip was already beginning to jut out.

There was a chorus of more oohs and ahhs from her drinking companions. Chuff was the worst, giving her a leer that was quite uncomfortable.

“If you boys will excuse me, I've got to go take a piss, if you're done taking the piss out of me.” Hermione rose, her drink still in hand, and went to the loo to collect her thought and get a grip on her emotions.

Niles' comment certainly hit a nerve, as Hermione had become more fretful as of late, wondering about the steadfastness of Severus' feelings towards her after her own momentary lapse. It took a few moments, but Hermione was able to calm herself down to the point where she wasn't about to burst into tears once again.

She had been battling with the crushing guilt of sleeping with Neville, and her thoughts had been plagued with wondering if Severus had begun sleeping around with other witches in Malu Palekaiko. If she faltered, what was the likelihood that Severus was now welcoming another witch in his bed?

Hermione pulled out a vial of Sobering Solution, downing it quickly and rinsing her mouth out so the other Potions masters wouldn't detect that she had “cheated.” Of course, when she emerged from the loo, she would pretend to be just as drunk as when she had sauntered in, but at least if she was accidentally prodded in that particular sensitive spot where Severus was concerned, she wouldn't burst into tears like a “silly little girl.” It was easier to control her emotions when she was sober. The Potions masters may have been grown men, but they still behaved like inconsiderate boys at times, with the exception of Albert, who was protective of her in a fatherly fashion.

Steeling herself, Hermione emerged, keeping her eyes a little heavy to fool the others. She was alert, trying to keep on her toes should any more random questions be too close for comfort.
“Who is ready to play 'Identify the Ingredient?'” she prompted, knowing she would win that game easily yet again and avoid drinking more for a bit longer.

The American spring lamb was superb. Ginny raved on about how this was his best leg of lamb ever. The latest batch of mango chutney was sublime, and the roasted new potatoes – sprinkled with fresh rosemary and parsley from Severus' kitchen garden and coarse sea salt – were fantastic. Draco added to the list of compliments with his own praises of the wine and sautéed vegetables, as they dined inside the Malfoys' home since there was a brief rainstorm passing through.

As much as he should have reveled in their compliments during their ritual Sunday dinner together, Severus' mind was elsewhere.

He hated to admit it, but that brief tryst with Maria was weighing more and more heavily on his mind and heart. It didn't bother him so much that it was one less witch chasing him – actually, it was four less witches chasing him since Maria shared her own opinion of their encounter with the other admirers of Severus – but that he wondered how Hermione would react if she ever found out.

Draco and Ginny had heard of what happened from Rainbow's insinuations, as the matron herself had been briefed afterwards by Maria. Draco had informed his mentor the rumor mill was in full swing, and to be prepared. If Rainbow knew, so did most of the island, as Maria was giving her opinion of their encounter to more than one person, for sure.

If Hermione ever did come to Malu Palekaiko, how would she react to hearing the rumors, even if it was just one encounter? Rainbow was surely to open her mouth at some point.

It was ironic that when he was being paid to service countless witches over the years, there was no question about discretion. Now he fucked one witch for no money and it was blabbed about for salacious fodder to entertain the locals in this quiet town.

Severus had to be physically prodded with a soft touch of Ginny's hand upon his upper arm to have his attention brought back to the present.

“I said, how is that new business with Blanche working out? I understand you have already made two shipments so far and orders are starting to pour in from abroad?” Ginny asked, looking a bit concerned, since Severus was usually very attentive.

“Fine, fine,” Severus replied noncommittally without expanding any further on the details. He pushed a piece of lamb about his plate absentmindedly.

“And did Blanche's husband, Mark, agree to the new arrangements, moving back to the mainland and accepting a monthly stipend?” she asked, seeking further details.

“Yes,” Severus said, not really feeling much like conversation, though he normally enjoyed these weekly dinners with his friends immensely.

Draco and Ginny briefly exchanged worried glances, before Severus excused himself from the table and went outside to get some fresh air.

Ginny nodded her head towards Severus, indicating Draco should follow and speak with him of what they suspected was weighing heavily on their friend's mind as of late.

Draco knew to wait a bit to let Severus collect his thoughts first before approaching him.

Pushing the sliding glass door aside, he joined the older wizard sitting on the engawa that overlooked the Japanese garden.

Both sat there in meditative silence. The babbling of the small stream running through the garden joined the subtle chorus of rain falling on broad-leaf foliage, and birds beyond the house nesting in nearby trees.

“Have you had any contact with her? Did you ever send her that letter?”

Draco wondered if his friend heard the question when he didn't reply. He was met with only silence, until Severus finally spoke.

“I tried. I can't put to paper all that I wish to say. And it's not like I wrote to her much before.” Severus gave a heavy sigh, his heart gone mute.

“Was there any other way you communicated your feelings?” Draco knew there had to be something besides physicality between them to express deeper sentiments.
“Flowers.”

Draco almost gave a short laugh. That was a terribly romantic notion, and Draco didn't think the older wizard sitting next to him as prone to such sentimental gestures.

“That was a terribly romantic notion, and Draco didn't think the older wizard sitting next to him as prone to such sentimental gestures."

“Then send her some flowers,” Draco suggested.

It wasn't like Severus hadn't thought of that solution before. However, flowers, even with charms and spells, would not likely survive the 7,300 miles via albatross.

Scratching his fingers through the thick growth of black whiskers now sprouting upon his face, Severus was struck with inspiration. He could kill two birds with one stone, taking care of another matter he had been thinking about for some months while also having some flowers delivered to Hermione in one fell swoop. It might cost a pretty Knut, but it would be well worth it.

Seeing the gears in Severus' mind grind furiously, Draco rose to leave his friend alone. As he stood and opened the sliding glass door, he suddenly remembered something.

Stopping, he turned his head over his shoulder to regard Severus' back. “Remember that movie we saw in the park last night?”

“That musical, My Fair Lady?” Severus swiveled his head and glanced up at Draco, given the amused tone in his voice.

“Yes. Well, I finally remembered where I'd heard one of the songs before.” Draco stopped explaining for a moment and laughed to himself, internally remarking on some of the ironic similarities. “When you began giving Hermione dance lessons, that first night I saw her waltzing down the staircase singing to herself about how she could have danced all night and begged for more.”

Draco gave one more muted chuckle and shook his head before going back inside.

Severus let a smile cross his lips upon remembering that night when they'd first danced. From Draco's description, he could very clearly imagine her singing that song and gliding down the staircase during those heady days when they were first falling in love. It had been a while since he'd smiled and his heart didn't feel quite so heavy.

It was then Severus realized that the day before was the one-year anniversary of when she'd stepped into his flat and his life changed forever. How much his life had changed since then, and mostly for the better.

His appetite returned, Severus rose and went back to join his friends for dinner. It would be such a waste not to enjoy a good leg of lamb, especially since it came out so well and the compliments were flowing so freely.

~~~~~~~*~

In the kitchen at The Lovely Lavender Company, Hermione was cutting up the ginger root, but her mind was elsewhere. The task wasn't anything difficult, since it was just some ginger and lemon tea she was brewing for Lavender and her Aunt Christine, who were both in need of something to settle their stomachs during their pregnancies. Even Harry's wife, Zhubanysh, had taken to drinking that tea, since she was pregnant as well. Harry was more than happy to brew the simple tea, according to directions Hermione had written down for him. It had been a bad case of morning sickness that went well into the night that prevented the couple from attending Viktor and Anne's wedding.

Her knife rocking up and down, she kept cutting up more root so she could brew some Wit-Sharpening Potion for herself. She could brew that one in her sleep, as – considering how hard she had been pushing herself lately – she had a few times.

Eager to finish mastering Spanish so she could go on to attack learning Japanese and Chinese – which involved whole new sets of characters, and neither language were part of the Indo-European language families – the Potions apprentice had begun taking the mind-honing elixir in hopes that she could absorb the material that much faster. It wasn't anything that Albert encouraged or even knew about, but Hermione was desperate to finish her apprenticeship and join Severus as soon as possible. She was miserable without him, even though she was currently getting everything she'd ever wanted before he came into her life.

She was working on her apprenticeship, she was earning more money in a far more fulfilling job, and she was even free from a marriage she wasn't particularly happy in. Hermione had everything she dreamed of, but without Severus, it seemed that there was something missing that made all the effort worthwhile.

Tipping back the vial of Wit-Sharpening Potion, she ignored the bitter taste of the armadillo bile, glad she had access to the necessary ingredients. She was allowed carte blanche access to use inventory in the Lovely Lavender warehouse for her own personal brewing, as a perk to her job and apprenticeship.
She had also begun brewing some Invigoration Draughts for the days when she lacked energy – such as when she could barely drag her arse out of bed the day after working all morning in Albert's garden, followed by an awkward afternoon at Neville's nursery. Even though Hermione and Neville had both agreed to put the incident behind them, both silently admitting it was a mistake, it had strained the easy camaraderie they had once shared.

She hoped that now she had something to help clear her mind of the constant fatigue that plagued her from pushing herself, and from silently punishing herself for sleeping with Neville, she could come up with an idea for her apprenticeship. One of the things Hermione had to do to become fully accredited as a Potions mistress was to come up with a new potion of her own design.

Given the work she did on the Sequoia and Irresistible potions might have counted, but Severus had already developed the Sequoia potion on his own before she came along. Even the Irresistible potion was developed more in partnership than on her own, thus Albert could not count it. Besides, he was supposed to supervise the development in order to judge if the new potion was original or plagiarized, and he could not verify the work, even though he trusted Hermione.

She considered creating a menstrual relief potion to supplant A Little Witch's Best Friend, but after some research, it seemed that many menstrual cramp-relief potions had to be tailored to each witch, since symptoms varied in intensity and number of them as well. A Little Witch's Best Friend worked so well because it was an all-purpose muscle-relaxant and analgesic, though Hermione thought she could improve upon it based on that one discussion she had with Severus in which he aroused her while trying to discuss Potions theory.

Hermione had already created a custom potion for herself, which upon first attempt resulted in Albert having to brew a quick antidote. Hermione had vastly underestimated the potency of a few ingredients when used in combination and had nearly caused her heart to stop. A few more adjustments under Albert's tutelage, and she finally had a new formula for herself.

She still needed to come up with a new potion of her own design and her own research for general use by the population. She found that it was getting harder to come up with something that had not been created already over the 3,000+ years of recorded Potions work.

As the Wit-Sharpening Potion began to awaken her mind, she hoped inspiration would soon strike, as she was desperate for an idea.

Trying to look more alive than she felt, Hermione picked up the tray and brought the pitcher of ginger and lemon tea into the weekly Friday meeting. Lavender and Aunt Christine would surely be glad to have a tall cool glass of that before addressing that week's business, including the latest on the India launch.

~~~~~~~*~

At first a bit reluctant, Severus eventually relented and agreed to grant an interview to the reporter from the Canadian publication, All About Apothecaries.

Word of Miniature Man-Eating Masdevallia orchid pods being shipped from the Hawaiian Islands spread like wildfire throughout the Americas, East Asia, and Australia. While the South American exporters viewed this as competition that impinged on their sole monopoly, everyone else was thrilled there would be another source for the rare ingredient. Prices were still holding steady at fifty Galleons for a fresh seed pod, but given that there would be more stock on hand for purchase, prices remained high and demand rose.

The Canadian wizard was wearing a pointed fur-trimmed toque in the tropical heat, charmed with the equivalent of Muggle air conditioning on the inside of the crown to keep the wearer cool. He asked, “And just how did you discover this previously unknown stand of orchids?”

Severus gave a brief synopsis on how one of his tutoring students had brought it in initially by mistake, and the ensuing events afterwards that had led to the forming of a partnership with the property owner.

Just then, Blanche Condre entered Severus' store and apologized for being late, but said that there were some personal and legal matters she had to settle first.

The reporter asked some questions regarding the property, to which Severus signaled to Blanche to remain as vague as possible. The location was a secret under the Fidelius Charm with Blanche as the Secret-Keeper, but that wouldn't stop people reading the article from coming to Malu Palekaiko trying to find the locations themselves, or tearing up the island in hopes of finding another undiscovered stand of the rare orchid and its highly valuable seed pods. Blanche's answer, as coached by Severus, would give others the impression that the stand of orchids was found on one of the more populated Hawaiian Islands, without outright explicitly saying so.

Once the interview was done, the reporter asked if he could take a picture of Severus and Blanche together, posed in front of a bench with cauldrons lined up for a brewing class Severus was going to begin once the interview was over. The reporter kept waving his hands for them to stand closer and closer until they finally gently bumped into each other, just as the flash went off.

The reporter thanked Severus and Blanche for their time. He promised to owl a copy of the magazine to each of them when the story published in the July issue, coming out in about a week.
Blanche shook Severus' hand and left the store, needing to go out and purchase more boxes for shipping later that week, as Severus suggested. She was learning to do many of the simpler tasks first to run the business, including processing the orders. Now that she no longer had to work at the taro farm, as the Galleons had started rolling in, she could take over more duties. Severus was glad to help her learn, since his own business was still taking up most of his time.

Just as Blanche left, Naomi entered, sauntering in after having received an owl from Severus about a special run he needed her to do on his behalf.

“Let me guess, you need me to go to the mainland for something. I have to warn you that it'll cost more, since time and Portkey costs are both more,” she began, not even letting Severus explain his request before she tried to guess what the errand would entail.

“Oh, I have the Galleons,” he assured her, flushed with more money from his fifteen-percent cut of the profits from the sale of the orchid pods, and from his thriving business. “But this is farther than the mainland. I need you to Portkey to London for a couple errands that cannot be done via albatross, but must be done in person.”

“London, England?” Naomi asked, her jaw dropping in an ungainly fashion. Her eyes popped open wide with surprise, having only ever gone as far as Tokyo, Seattle, and Mexico City for the rare odd run for something that wasn't available within the Hawaiian Islands.

“No, London, Kiribati, located 2,000 miles due south in the middle of the South Pacific,” he dryly said with a straight face. When Naomi didn't pick up on his sarcastic tone, he clarified, “Of course, I mean London, England.”

Naomi blinked and beamed brightly. “Cool! I've always wanted an excuse to visit Limeyland, and now I'll have my Portkey paid for. Sweet.”

Severus didn't miss her not-so-subtle dig in response to his snark.

Silently, Severus decided that if he ever began using words such as “sweet,” “cool,” and “wicked” as interjections instead of using them appropriately as adjectives, he would ask Draco to immediately put him out of his misery.

“First is to hunt down a set of silverware. I need your discretion, as this is a surprise present to the Malfoys for their first wedding anniversary. Hopefully, it won't take you until Christmas to locate Draco's mother's silver that was seized by the British Ministry of Magic and most probably sold off to a shop in Knockturn Alley.”

Severus pulled out two pieces of parchment, his finger indicating the design on one of the sheaves. “This here shows what the silver pattern looked like. There should be a full set of 24 place settings. It's charmed – or should I say hexed – not to be broken apart, so it should have all the pieces listed on this sheet, from salad forks all the way through to dessert forks.” He had eaten enough dinners at Malfoy Manor over the years to know all the pieces that were in the set, including the grapefruit fork and knife, fish fork and knife, snail tong and fork, and lobster pick settings.

“And the other errand?”

“Just as, if not more important. I need you to order a bouquet with very specific flowers to be delivered. No substitutions allowed.” His voice dropped in order to impart the importance of that last direction. If Severus was going to send a message of his love for Hermione, he didn't want it to get botched up with miscommunication, given how they had misunderstood each other in the past.

Naomi gave Severus a sidelong glance with a sly smirk.

For good measure, he added, “And no telling Rainbow, or anyone else, as this is none of her business, nor anyone else's on the island. I'll even tip you handsomely for your discretion, since that seems to be a commodity in short supply here at times.”

It was bad enough Naomi had probably heard through the grapevine about his interlude with Maria and how it was not exactly mutually enjoyable.

Looking over the second piece of parchment, Naomi's eyes trailed down the specific list of flowers, noting their symbolism. She let out a low whistle.

“Wow, a bouquet like that and the rumors of you pining for someone back in England must be true. No wonder Maria didn't exactly inspire you if you're sending these flowers to this... Hermione,” she surmised, reading the name and address at the bottom.

“Discretion,” he reminded her, his tone warning her to keep her mouth shut and her opinions to herself.
Severus reached into his pocket and pulled out a small note sealed with wax. “And make sure to have this small note included with the delivery of the flowers as well.”

Naomi took the folded and sealed note with his initials on it and put it away for safekeeping, nodding her head to signal that she understood this was indeed a very personal matter. It wouldn't do to get a reputation for violating people's privacy by informing others of what she fetched on some of her runs. Discretion was always required, just like in Severus' business.

“I'll leave on the Monday before the Pele Festival begins. She'll probably have her 'package' by Friday, the day the Festival begins. Does that work for you?” Naomi asked, noting that some of Severus' students were trickling in for their lesson, so she said "package" in order to remain discreet.

Severus nodded that would be adequate, before Naomi told him she would get back to him on her Portkey and travel costs for this particular errand.

Now that he had taken some action toward contacting Hermione since they parted all those months ago, the pining Potions master was feeling a bit more relaxed and was much more patient with his students, as he began class.

Chapter End Notes

Thank you to my wonderful betas for this chapter, JuneW and Hope.

_The "engawa" is in front of the garden. It is like a balcony or wooden floor, and you can step out from a room. This is the place from where we can see the garden in a relaxed mood and take the air._

“Hotel California”: Written by Don Henley, Glenn Frey, and Don Felder.

There was a request for it, so here is the recipe for Hermione's ginger and lemon tea, which helps settle upset stomachs. When my sister was pregnant (years before Harry Potter came out) and could keep nothing down for months, I made her a special tea to brew and drink half an hour before eating. It consisted of ginger, blessed thistle, lemon, and raspberry, and it did help, but I think it was mostly the ginger and lemon that did it since lemon and ginger are the two recommended ingredients for pregnant women to consume to help with morning sickness. My brother-in-law, in snarky tones, referred to me as a “witch,” but was thankful I came up with that tea brew for his wife. Also, ginger is a good analgesic, I've heard (I'm not a doctor or pharmacist), so when I have bad headaches, I drink this as well.

Hermione's Ginger-Lemon Iced Tea
Prep time: 10 minutes
Brew time: 4 hours minimum, 12 hours preferred

Ingredients:

1 large (3- to 4-inch) piece of ginger
1 quart water for boiling
1/4 to 1/2+ cup honey (orange honey is the best, flavor-wise)
1/2 of a lemon

Directions:

1) Peel the piece of ginger, and slice thinly.

2) In a plastic or glass 1-quart container, place the sliced ginger and up to half a cup of honey (orange honey preferred), depending on how sweet you like it.

3) In a teapot or pan, boil a quart of water.

4) Pour most of the boiling water into the ginger-and-honey container, leaving room for a half-cup at the top of the container.

5) Stir until honey is dissolved. Cover the container loosely, or put a lid on loosely, to allow steam to escape. Place in the refrigerator overnight to brew, or at least four hours.

6) After brewing it and letting it cool down, ream half of a lemon into the quart container and add the reamed lemon rind half. Stir.
7) Fill a glass with ice, and place a strainer/sieve over the glass to catch ginger slices and lemon seeds. Pour the cold ginger-lemon-honey tea over ice, filling the glass halfway.

8) Take a sip. If too strong, then add water the rest of the way, or just add some water to water down the spicy bite of the ginger. If not too strong and just right for your personal taste, continue filling glass and don't add water.

NOTE: Remember, the longer it brews in the fridge, the stronger the ginger flavor and the spicy bite become. To help counter the spicy bite, you can add more honey and/or add a greater proportion of water.
With one unsteady hand, Hermione tipped the vial of Invigoration Draught back, while holding the Auror's locket Harry had given her in her other hand, rubbing it distractedly like a worry stone. Closing her eyes, she could feel the threads of magic in the potion restore her energy once more.

Now that she was awake, she tipped back the vial of Wit-Sharpening Potion so she could have the focus of mind to get in some studying before she would have to go to the Victory Day ceremony. She was only attending because Harry said he wanted her there.

She only had a couple hours of sleep the night before, staying up late as she was looking through various tomes to see if one idea she had for her apprenticeship final potions project had been attempted before, only to discover someone had already created a potion for that very solution 50 or 500 years ago.

Her hand shook momentarily as her body fought the magic forcing her body and mind to alertness, but the potion won out and she was fully awake and calm once more.

Marf had expressed his concern over the condition of his mistress, since he did give his promise to Master Severus that he would take care of Hermione. However, she assured the house-elf that she was fine and had pushed herself this hard during her Hogwarts days, especially during that year when she had a Time Turner.

Nodding his head with a look of worry still etched on his wrinkled forehead, Marf made Hermione breakfast to ensure she would eat something. She was becoming thin once again, nearly as thin – possibly more so – as when she'd first turned up on Severus' doorstep a year ago.

Entering Bongo's bar for his usual Friday night drinks, Draco by his side, Severus and his friend were hailed by the usual “Aloha” greeting, which Severus returned a bit more cheerfully than as of late.

The American flags along with the stars-and-stripes bunting strung about the bar added to the festive mood, since it was the Fourth of July weekend. The holiday celebrating independence from British rule was observed by American Muggles and wizards alike. At least there weren't any leprechauns and shamrocks decorating the place like during St. Patrick's Day. To Severus, it seemed like there was some sort of holiday to celebrate every month in America.

Ginny was there sitting in her usual spot, as well as Mounga and Rainbow, with the addition of Halulu and Greg.

“Halulu, what brings you to join us for drinks this Friday night?” Severus asked, knowing that the pair were especially busy, as the Pele Festival was starting in a week.

Rainbow was also curious to know why the pair was there, since they had broad smiles on their faces and refused to divulge the good news until Draco and Severus had arrived.

“Yes, please. Now that Severus is here, can you please tell us what has got you as giddy as a schoolgirl on Euphoria Elixir,” Rainbow said with some exasperation, dying to finally know what was going on.

“It's an Elixir to Induce Euphoria,” Severus corrected her smugly, his nose a bit in the air.

“Yeah, yeah, whatever,” she said, waving her hands flippantly at him, hoping he would shut up and let Halulu spill the beans.

“Well...” Halulu began. “I'm pregnant.'
There was a chorus of female screams from that corner of the bar that made three of the four males wince and flinch. Greg was too elated to be bothered by the sudden noise, joining in the excitement as well.

“And it's all thanks to your advice, Severus,” Halulu said, shaking his hand gratefully.

“That vacation was exactly what we needed to relax and let nature take its course,” Greg added, shaking Severus’ hand as well, grateful that he and his wife were finally going to be parents.

Severus noticed the odd tight smile about Rainbow's lips and the fleeting moment of somberness in Mounga's face, but decided to say nothing.

Once word spread to the rest of the bar, there were random shouts of congratulations from other patrons.

Severus offered to buy the next round for their group in celebration of the good news, feeling generous due to his improved mood. Naomi would be leaving in a few days to Portkey to England to run a few errands for him, and he received the July issue of All About Apothecaries, which featured a cover photo of him and Blanche. It was the main featured story, giving a rather glowing, and still accurate, account of how he'd discovered the previously unknown stand of Miniature Man-Eating Masdevallias. It also included a bit of background about his thriving Potions business on Malu Palekaiko and his work tutoring the youth on the island. It was a rather positive article, and not at all like the biased hack journalism he was used to in the Daily Prophet.

Once the excitement over Halulu and Greg's news settled down, Severus shared the copy of the magazine featuring him for everyone in the group to see. Draco had already read it and was proud of his mentor. This was the sort of recognition the Potions master should have received back home for his talents, but was finally receiving in their new home on the other side of the world.

Everyone in the group remarked about what a wonderful photo it was and that his beard looked nice and thick in the photos, with added comments that Severus might win first place.

Draco scratched at his beard a bit meekly knowing that he would probably lose the bet, even if Severus didn't win first place and he'd be forced to make cassoulet the way Severus preferred it. His beard was coming in nicely and it was a more golden blond than his platinum locks, but he could tell that he wasn't going to win, between the two of them.
Mounga read the article aloud to the group of friends gathered around, and a few other bar patrons who knew Severus ambled over to listen in. Mounga's voice carried so it wasn't hard for anyone else in the bar to listen in, even with the dueling piano and harpsichord tinkling away in the corner.

Once done, Severus was clapped on the back and his hand was shaken by many in the bar.

The next round, Severus was treated by one of the other bar patrons, in congratulations of the article. It was a wizard who had commissioned Severus for a Potion that had helped him with a rather personal matter, the same potion Severus once brewed for Remus Lupin years ago for his problem. Many in the town were grateful there was a Potions master in town that was discreet and didn't turn his nose up at tutoring or certain commissions.

There was talk about the upcoming Independence Day celebrations Sunday night, including fireworks with a band playing music during the pyromagic display. Normally for this type of holiday there might have been a parade or community luau, but given that the Pele Festival fell within a week after the Fourth of July, everyone was going to be busy with last-minute preparations.

Even Ginny was helping Halulu, and was too busy to have dinner ready on the table by the time Draco came home from work. For the past week, Draco had been joining Severus for dinner at the various restaurants around town after work. It was during one dinner that Draco convinced Severus to hire a part-time house-elf to clean and cook for him. Severus had been grousing about the drudgery of housework as of late, and having to cook for himself once he got home. As much as Severus didn't mind putting the work into keeping his Potions lab spit-spot clean, he was empathizing with Hermione and the way she used to complain about the copious amount of chores required to keep house in addition to working full-time.

As the Finaus were getting ready to leave, Halulu drained the last of her non-alcoholic drink and asked, “So, off to the hot springs now?”

That is when Severus saw the grim look pass fleetingly between Rainbow and Mounga, who then plastered on plastic smiles, saying they had some matters to deal with at home for some task they had to attend to the next day.

Severus could tell something was amiss. When he'd greeted Akela and Iakona on the street a few days prior, he found Mounga's oldest daughter distraught, her eyes red and face drawn. The pair passed him by with barely an acknowledgment to the adopted family member, the young wizard's arm around his older sister in a supportive fashion.
He wasn't about to pry, as it seemed it was a confidential matter that they did not want to share, but he was concerned. The Finau family had become his family, but he would respect their privacy. Surely this was not a matter they wanted to include him in.

Before they left, Severus put a hand on Mounga's shoulder and said quietly, as an aside, “I know you have people coming to you to unburden themselves, but you can come to me if you need the same.”

Mounga nodded his head, thanking his friend before he took Rainbow's arm to escort her out the door and home.

Though Severus was tired of having people unloading their problems on him over the years as a gigolo, Severus did find in retrospect that unburdening his own secrets to Mounga when he first came to Malu Palekaiko had been a great help towards him emotionally coming to terms with some aspects of his life. Severus wanted to return the favor for his friend this one time.

It was not a panacea for all the emotional and mental scars Severus had suffered over the decades, but with his confession at the time, he was able to recognize some aspects of his life that he had intentionally forgotten or put aside. Finally acknowledging them, he was able to put some of those aspects behind him.

In Malu Palekaiko, Severus found the peace that Hermione had hoped he would find. And with the knowledge that Naomi would be delivering a special bouquet to his love within the week, he felt more at ease and more at peace with himself than ever before.

Naomi was having a grand time. She got to see the crown jewels in the Tower of London, where she laughed that the Star of Africa was “supposedly” the largest flawless cut diamond in the world – well, at least according to these Muggles protecting it with glass boxes and other Muggle security contraptions. Granted, the British Ministry of Magic also had wards around them to add to the Muggle ones, but it amused Naomi that the Muggles thought their security measures were quite stringent. But as for being the largest cut diamond, she had seen larger as a child when she'd accompanied her grandfather to his Gringotts vault in Singapore.

She wished she could have stuck around England long enough to catch a Quidditch game, since they all seemed to be played on the weekend, but she needed to be back in time for the Pele Festival. There were the rumors back home about Ginny's brother being a famous Quidditch player, and she wanted to go see him for herself. But she had her itinerary full, visiting all the great magical and Muggle sites around the country. She even took the Knight Bus, ignoring the strange look from Stan Shunpike when she asked him to take a photograph of herself in front of the bus.
Diagon Alley was really cute and quaint, by her standards. Everything was so tiny and charming and cramped, compared to the broad main street and wide covered wooden board sidewalks of Malu Palekaiko, lined with palm trees and tiki torches. In addition, everything was askew in Diagon Alley, having its foundations settled for hundreds of years until they looked like teetering boxes about to fall over.

Naomi had to buy herself a real woolen cloak, since the cotton one she brought that was suitable for the tropics was not doing the job of keeping her warm enough. Granted this was “supposed” to be summer, but this felt like the dead of winter in Hawaii by comparison. And when it rained, she finally understood why the English could drink hot tea in the summertime. Now she wished she had brought her heavy woolen cloak she had for when she made trips to the top of Mauna Loa and Mauna Kea when there was snow atop the Big Island.

Her witch’s hat, woven from palm fronds, garnered a few stares, as everyone else wore more formal hats made of velvets, tweeds, and heavy felt. Naomi’s clothing – featuring bright colors and bold Hawaiian tropical prints – also added to the odd stares she received now and again. Her sandals added to the disdainful look she received from one wizard in Flourish and Blotts. She distinctly recalled hearing that wizard she bumped into mutter, “Americans,” under his breath disparagingly even after she sincerely apologized.

Severus, Draco, and Ginny, despite their fancy accents, were a whole lot nicer than some of the people she met in Diagon Alley. Based on her impression from Severus and the Malfoys, she was led to believe that most English witches and wizards were as nice as them. It was a disappointment to be met with such chilly hospitality by the general population. At least the witch she came across in the bookstore was really sweet.

Naomi was looking for a tourist guidebook of wizarding Britain. She found the thin witch with the bushy brown hair pulled into a braid to be extremely helpful. The guidebook section was right next to the language section, where the slightly frazzled-looking witch was looking for more books on the Spanish language, muttering to herself about making a Potion in which to literally absorb languages faster while rubbing her thumb on some pendant that hung from a long necklace.

Naomi thanked the helpful witch with dark circles under her eyes for her recommendation on a guidebook and a good place to get some authentic English pub food, besides the Leaky Cauldron, before she went to the front to pay for her purchase. After a nice meal of fish and chips or bangers and mash, she’d go to the florist to order those flowers, then head on over to Knockturn Alley to start looking for that silverware.

'Knockturn Alley. Hmm, wonder if it’s as darling as the rest of Diagon Alley. Hope there is a cute shop I can find something to bring back for my mom. Maybe that Borgin and Burkes place will have Draco's silver, like Severus suggested, and a cute little miniature version of the Knight Bus for a souvenir. And maybe they sell some postcards, too...’ Naomi thought to herself as she ambled towards the Leaky Cauldron and out into Muggle London for some good Muggle pub grub.

Hermione was finding it hard to focus. The Invigoration Draught and Wit-Sharpening Potions she had taken earlier that morning were starting to wear off. She was so muddled that by the time she realized she wanted to ask the American she'd helped if she was from Hawaii – since her florescent orange muumuu and hat were very tropical, and she had an American accent – the Yank was gone.

“I could have sworn she was just here,” Hermione mumbled to herself, her thoughts scattered like a broken strand of beads rolling across the floor.

“I have got to get back to work,” she continued muttering to herself, knowing that her lunch break was nearly over.

First order of business was another dose of those two elixirs that were allowing her to push on, letting her study and work twenty hours a day.

So lost in thought, Hermione almost walked out of Flourish and Blotts before paying for the book still grasped in her hand. Fortunately, she caught herself and walked to the end of the queue to pay.

With her belly filled with yummy shepherd's pie and a pint of ale that was too warm and flat for her liking, but she'd drank it anyway, Naomi went back to Diagon Alley and straight to the florist.

Entering the shop, she looked about, gazing at the large variety of flowers. She was thankful that they would probably have everything Severus had on his list.

An old witch with a beak-like nose, bulging eyes that looked like they went in opposite directions, a drooping, sagging neck that looked a little scaly, and a mop of wiry and curly white hair greeted Naomi. She looked like a chicken, and when she spoke, she sort of squawked like a chicken too.
Naomi wondered if she was a failed Animagus who didn't entirely get returned back to her original human form.

“Can I help you, miss?” The witch cocked her head to the side a bit suddenly, much like when a chicken would determine if it was going to peck at something or not.

“Yes. I'd like to order a bouquet of flowers to be delivered tomorrow.” The Hawaiian witch glanced over the shoulder of the counter clerk, noticing the old witch in the back who was setting flowers into the vase. It was a beautiful composition, and now she understood why Severus insisted she go to this particular shop.

“Excellent. Tomorrow, July 9th, I see will be the date. Anything specific in mind?” she clucked.

“Yes, I have a list right here as to what will be included.” Reaching inside her cloak, she pulled out the small note Severus had given to her with his initials on it. “And this is to be included in the delivery.”

Looking over the list, the witch made a sound as if she was pleased. “Yes, yes, that will make quite a lovely bouquet indeed. So much feeling in this selection.”

The sales clerk drew up a receipt, copying the list of flowers down in addition to the specific direction of no substitutions.

After paying, Naomi asked the sales clerk for directions to Knockturn Alley and couldn't understand why the older witch had a look of horror on her face, before raising a hand and – with a shaking finger – pointing her in the right direction.

As Naomi left the florist, she was nearly bowled over by a very angry-looking young wizard with hellfire in his eyes. He barely apologized to Naomi before walking up to the counter, requiring assistance immediately.

Stephen Stronder was in a snit. He had discovered his fiancée in bed with his best friend, and he was livid. He was going to send her a bouquet in order to break up with her, calling her out on her infidelity.

The witch took down the list of flowers the young man wanted, noting their symbolism aloud.

“Abatina for fickleness, laurel cherry for perfidy, bilberry for treachery, fish geranium for disappointed expectation, and michaelmas daisy for farewell,” Stephen ticked off on his fingers.

“What about yellow roses for infidelity?” the old witch suggested.

“She might misinterpret them as friendship, since it can mean that as well. And she might think that we would be parting on good terms, which we're not.” He crossed his arms before adding, “Some St. John's Wort for animosity would not be amiss. Yes, add that too, please.”

After paying for the bouquet with directions to be delivered the next day, that included a note with his initials on it, Stephen Stronder left the shop and headed off towards the Leaky Cauldron, intending to get right pissed in order to drown his considerable sorrows. No doubt, the Daily Prophet would be posting the breakup of their engagement under the obituary section after his soon-to-be ex-fiancée received her flowers.

~~~~~~~*~

Sleeping peacefully and without a care, Severus was jolted awake by an earthquake. Leaping up out of bed, wearing only his underpants, his heart hammering like a Taiko drum, he felt the whole house shift beneath his feet with a rumble and a brief shudder.

Pele had announced to the whole island she had come back to her other home to observe and bask in the celebration. The island goddess had returned to be present for the festival named in her honor.

The chorus of startled birds died down, but Severus' heart had yet to recover. He had never been in an earthquake before. Granted, he was warned by the natives and long-time residents that Pele always made this sort of little announcement to the island upon her yearly return for the festival, and on a few days in between during the year, but this was far more thrilling than he had expected.

As the shaking in his hands subsided, Severus opened the floor-to-ceiling teak plantation shutters, noting that the sun was just peeking up above the horizon.
“Merlin, I need a cup of tea for my nerves,” he muttered aloud.

It was time Severus got up anyway, as nearly the whole town was going to make the trek up the side of the volcano that morning. There, by the edge of the caldera, Mounga would lead the ceremony thanking Pele for all that she had provided, from the island built from her lava to the magic imbued into the soil that protected all that sought sanctuary.

There was one more mild aftershock, causing Severus to grip the edge of the counter in hopes it wouldn’t become more violent while he was waiting for the kettle to boil. Thankfully, he had taken the builder’s advice and installed specially-built shelving that would prevent jars from sliding off of shelves in mild to moderate earthquakes. He had even upgraded his own shelves at his shop, being warned how a good jolt would cost him possibly hundreds or thousands of Galleons in lost ingredients, if his ingredients weren’t stored properly in preparation of the local geologic activity.

‘Thank Merlin I paid the builder for the self-plumbing upgrade.’ He wondered how askew his house would become if this was a yearly occurrence. The charm would correct any listing or settling that would occur because of the seismic activity.

There wouldn’t be any time for a morning swim, but the hike up the side of the volcano would still ensure he had his morning exercise.

As much as he wanted to eat his breakfast of toast and a heaping pile of fresh tropical fruit, he found he didn’t quite have the stomach for it, as if it was twisted in a knot. He figured it was an adrenaline rush from the quakes that had depressed his appetite. Then he went to dress for the morning.

In honor of the goddess and the opening ceremony by the edge of the caldera, the custom was for everyone to dress in their finest clothes, or ceremonial native dress if they had such wear.

English witches and wizards did not have a national costume, nor did the Muggles from that country. Instead Severus would wear his formal wardrobe – starched high-neck collar, buttoned-up frock coat, and boots – but ditching the long black cloak for the long hike. Putting them on, Severus noticed that the trousers’ waist was loose, but the coat’s shoulder and arms were a bit snugger than he remembered. It still fit, but it should have been taken to the tailor for adjustments before the festival. It would do for now, but next year, he would be prepared to have a better-fitting outfit for the festival.

To keep cool while wearing his full woolen outfit during the hike uphill, Severus had made a potion to keep his body cool. He also added a few charms he’d been taught by the locals, who had Standing in front of a non-magical full-length mirror that he'd recently purchased for the house, he gazed at his reflection. It was the same clothes, but it was a different man staring back from the one who used to wear these clothes a mere year ago.

Walking out his front door and down the path, he joined the procession that began in the middle of the main street. Mounga was at the front leading the way, with his family beside him, and most of the island's residents trailing behind. There would be a small contingency of folks who would Apparate or Portkey up to the top of the volcano, but it was only the very old, sick, or pregnant, or mothers with small children who could not make the hike up themselves.

Higher up on the volcano, pathways were shored up, temporarily paved over or broadened with temporary board sidewalks to accommodate the mass of people heading up to pay their respects to Pele. All that could walk were expected to make the trek on foot without magic, a symbolic gesture that the ultimate magical being on the island was Pele herself.

Severus fell in with the crowd, walking beside Ginny and Draco who also were in their full formal wizarding wear they had brought with them from England. Draco was in his long gray cloak and formal suit with cravat, and Ginny in her dark forest-green cloak and a formal day dress that went down to her laced-up boots. Others in the procession wore ethnic costumes, most often indicating their country of origin, or ancestry.

Some, like the Finau family, were dressed in formal Hawaiian ceremonial garb. Mounga was wearing a plumed headdress of bright yellow and red feathers. He was bare-chested, except for the various leis he wore that had been handed down through the generations – leis made with shells, feathers, and kukui nuts, and one that included human teeth. His sarong consisted of hand-dyed fabric and ti leaves. He wore a cloak covered with the same bright yellow and vibrant red feathers as the headdress.

There were people wearing beaded buckskin, indicating some ancestral heritage of one of the Native American Plains tribes. Others wore an Amália dress, showing their Greek heritage. Some wore sarongs woven with threads of gold and elaborate tiered headdresses, some wore full-length kaftans with a kufi cap. Arnold was wearing a formal black kimono that he'd brought from his home country of Japan when he fled for sanctuary. Ranjit wore a richly hued silk sherwani. Halulu wore a multi-hued chiapas dress, reminding Severus of the story she'd told him about how her grandmother was a witch who had participated in the Mexican Revolution that began in 1910, resulting in her seeking sanctuary nearly a century ago in Malu Palekaiko.

There were some Muggles and Squibs in the group who made the trek, also dressed in their finest clothes or national costume. Severus had come to learn there were more non-magical humans on the island than he'd originally suspected, since there were still a few countries that persecuted or harassed witches and wizards who married Muggles or Squibs. The Muggles blended so well in with the magical society on the island, not reacting so violently or with fear or awe as he was used to back in England, that he'd had to learn to not assume everyone he dealt with socially or in business in Malu Palekaiko was magical. Some of the Muggles and a few Squibs worked on the other end of the island at the Muggle Camp, that was shut down for the week between the Fourth of July and the Pele Festival. Some worked in the restaurants and businesses in town, or on the various farms around the island.

Even the goblins, hags, a few centaurs, and the free house-elves on the island joined in the procession, dressed in their finest clothing, letting Severus finally see just how many non-humans truly inhabited Malu Palekaiko. The few vampires on the island, who had sought sanctuary over the years or retired there by choice, would make the trek to pay their respects to Pele once the sun had set.

During the procession, some had brought guitars and ukuleles and strummed them. People joining in, singing in Hawaiian to pass the time during the long walk up.

Once at the top, not everyone could fit on the flat plateau next to the caldera, but did their best to listen in along the path near the very top. The crowd was over 5,000 in number, as some had come from abroad to witness the opening ceremony for the Pele Festival. Some had grown up on the island and moved away as adults, returning for the yearly festival. Many were from the American mainland, Japan, China, Australia, New Zealand, and the Philippines, along with a few from various South American countries. There were no visitors from any European countries that Severus could spot, only those who had sought sanctuary.

Standing near the edge of the caldera, Mounga used a Sonorous Charm in order for everyone at the top and down the trail to hear him.

He began with a greeting of “Aloha” to which the thousands replied in unison. He welcomed everyone, and gave a brief explanation for the purpose of the ceremony for those who were new to the island or came from abroad.

Once done with the introduction, Mounga ended the Sonorous Charm and sang his prayer in his voice without magic, just as they all had journeyed to the top without magic. Even those down the trail could hear Mounga's voice as it boomed and echoed through the clear morning air.

As Mounga sang, Severus looked about. Ulrich and his new bride, Kiki, Akela's former best friend, stood side-by-side, uncomfortable in each other's presence. Severus had discovered earlier that week that Ulrich had impregnated Kiki, the witch Ulrich had dumped Akela for. At wandpoint, Kiki's father insisted that Ulrich make an honest witch of her so his first grandchild was not born a
The strained look on the Finaus' faces the night at Bongo's bar had been due to the fact that the next day they would be present at the wedding, with Mounga as officiant. Kiki had asked Akela to be her maid of honor, and despite their falling out, Akela had reluctantly agreed. As much as Severus wished to impart some words of wisdom to the young distraught witch, he knew that their earlier encounter – that had led to much shouting and anger – would be cause enough alone to not broach the subject.

He did bet Akela, with great schadenfreude at the time, that if she refused to have sex with Ulrich, the boy would quickly direct his affections towards another young and more foolish witch whom he would bed without a care for her. Unfortunately, Severus had hit the mark.

'Better her than you, Akela,' Severus thought to himself when he saw Akela glance morosely at the newlywed teenagers.

As Severus turned his attentions from Ulrich and Kiki back to Mounga who was still singing prayers in praise, his eye caught sight of an old woman with long flowing white hair. His heart stopped for a moment. It was Pele, and he knew it. It was the woman who had delayed him and Mounga on their journey down the mountainside that one time, long enough for them to avoid being caught in a rock slide.

She had her head tipped up and eyes closed, her face absorbing the sun's rays on her weathered skin, as she drank in the sounds of Mounga's songs of prayer.

Severus turned to get Draco's attention to point out the old woman, but when he turned back, she was gone. The people in the crowd seemed unaware of her disappearance, if they’d even noticed her at all.

“What?” Draco said, noting the slightly agitated quality to Severus tugging on his cloak sleeve.

Shaking his head, Severus indicated it was nothing. He had not told Draco, nor Ginny, about his suspected encounter with Pele. Now, after spotting the same old woman amongst the crowd of people – a woman who had just disappeared – there was no point but to drop the subject.

When the prayer ended, offerings were brought forth and laid near the edge of the volcano. Ohelo berries, lehua flowers, red fish, a variety of produce brought from people's gardens, bottles of home-brewed beers and spirits made from the produce harvested on the Hawaiian island chain, and long strands of leis were set forth. Then Mounga called an end to the ceremony, announcing his hope that their respect and gifts for the goddess would cause her to continue to grant those who lived on the island sanctuary, and grant the town protection from her fiery lava.
People began meandering back down the mountainside to go back home in order to change out of their clothes and get ready for the festivities later that day.

Not only did the Pele Festival serve as an event to honor the goddess with song and dance, but it was also an excuse for the magical community throughout the Hawaiian Islands to hold a sort of state fair. There were to be contests judged, including cooking, arts and crafts, magical talent competitions and gardening, including the beard-growing contest Severus was hoping to win.

~~~~~~~*~

It was his parents' fault he had to get a job for the summer. Vradian Bumbershoot wanted the new 2005 Mercury broom, that would be available in August 2004 in time for the new Hogwarts school year. The broom had been modeled by Ronald Weasley in the 2004 Mercury calendar.

Vradian had wanted it so he could have it for Slytherin Quidditch team tryouts that autumn, but since he had the 2004 model, his parents said if he wanted yet another new broom, he could get a job in order to earn the money and buy it himself. They surmised that maybe then he would appreciate the things he had if he purchased them himself. Perhaps, they thought, he wouldn't have chucked his 2004 Mercury broom in the fireplace in a temper tantrum fit if he had spent his own money. Vradian had tried to give his parents a good reason why they should purchase another one for him; burning his old one seemed like reason enough, but it didn't seem to sway his parents to his argument.

Now he was stuck all summer working for these two old witches at the florist shop. Vradian had delayed looking for a job until he realized his parents wouldn't buy him a new broom, and he'd have to work to buy his own. Since coming home on the Hogwarts Express in June, all the other good jobs were nabbed, and this was one of the few left that paid anything above a pittance.

It was Friday afternoon. He couldn't wait to have the day be done and over with, but he had two last deliveries to make before he could collect his weekly paycheck and go home to his “stupid and wholly unfair” parents.

“Please deliver this vase of flowers to Hermione Weasley at The Lovely Lavender Company over on Dorian Loop with this note,” the avian-like witch instructed the delivery boy. “And this vase goes to an Esmeralda Gravenstein in room six at The Leaky Cauldron. And don't forget the note that goes with that one either.”

Vradian took both notes and shoved them carelessly in his pocket. With both vases of flowers in a box charmed to float behind him as he made his way through the magical neighborhood, he went on his way.
Reaching The Lovely Lavender headquarters, Vradian handed the elf at the front desk the correct note to go with the order, but when it came time to hand over the bouquet of flowers carefully arranged in the vase, he couldn't remember which one went with which order. They both looked the same. They both had yellow and blue flowers, geraniums, branches with white flowers, and stems adorned with red flowers and fruits.

“I guess it doesn't matter who gets which one, since they both look the same,” Vradian reasoned to himself as he left the vase meant for Miss Gravenstein at the front desk for Hermione.

Looking over the article in Obscure Oozes & Fabulous Fluids for the umpteenth time that day, Hermione read the story originally featured in the Canadian publication, All About Apothecaries.

It had been waiting on her desk when she arrived at work that morning.

The magazine aggregated potions and apothecary stories from publications all over the world, including this particular one from Canada.

Her hand passed reverently over the photo of Severus, who was standing right next to some blonde in a tank top and shorts. Severus had a beard in the photo, and he looked nearly identical to the version of Severus she hallucinated during her time under the Dionysus Fever potion. His clothing was far different from what she was used to seeing him in. Severus was wearing what looked like cotton robes. They were black, since black hid potion stains, but the way they hung and the weight of the fabric indicated they were meant for warmer climes. He was wearing full-length trousers, but they looked like they were of a much more casual cut and of a lightweight breathable fabric, cotton or linen most likely. And they were beige. His hair was a bit longer, his face much more tanned, and his eyes just as piercing, but the Hawaiian shirt – dark navy blue with green palm fronds and cream-colored ginger flowers – seemed incongruent to the more formal wizard who had left England seven months prior. He looked positively relaxed, even with his upright posture.

In the photo, Severus and the blonde, a witch he was in business together with, were scooting closer towards each other until the flash went off.

Hermione knew first-hand how photos could capture something at the most inopportune moment and be interpreted wrongly, as she remembered the photo of her and Harry embracing during the Tri-Wizard Tournament. Rita Skeeter had spun a tale of romance when it was nothing of the sort.
Hermione was sure that the closeness of Severus to this leggy blonde in the revealing top was nothing more than a business arrangement, but that didn't stop the thread of jealousy and doubt take root in the pit of her being, making her stomach clench and her chest burn. The awkward smile Severus gave the blonde in the photograph, after bumping into her, didn't quell Hermione's fears, fed by her guilty conscience, that Severus had moved on and was somehow romantically linked to this witch he was in business with.

Reading the article, Hermione noticed immediately that any time the word “Malu Palekaiko” or “Hawaii” should have appeared in the article, the ink was smudged and letters were scrambled, making the words indecipherable.

Following a hunch, Hermione pulled out a scrap of parchment and tried to scratch out the word “Hawaii”. As soon as she was done writing the word, the ink smeared and letters rearranged themselves so it was unreadable. She then wrote down a list of other islands in the Pacific Ocean. “Pitcairn,” “Tahiti,” “Samoa,” and “Kiribati” remained clear upon the parchment, but when she wrote the words “Oahu,” “Maui,” or “Hawaii,” the ink would instantly smudge and letters scramble as if spelled with an anagram charm once her quill left the parchment.

Hermione was in awe for the fact that Dumbledore had set a charm so powerful it would remain in effect even after his passing. What Dumbledore couldn't erase was all reference to Hawaii from Muggle books in Great Britain. That explained Moody's suspicious behavior upon seeing her pile of travel books to the remote tropical location in her flat where the words would not scramble themselves or smudge.

Before she could talk with Lavender about this publication of the article, which might clue Moody to Severus and possibly Draco's whereabouts, there was a knock on her door.

An elf notified Hermione that a vase of flowers had arrived for her at the front desk, and asked if he should bring them up to her office now.

Wondering who in the world sent her flowers, since she didn’t have the slightest clue who might, Hermione ask for them to be brought up immediately.

As the elf brought the large vase of flowers in, Hermione spotted the note attached to the bouquet, recognizing the initials on the letter.

Before she even looked at the flowers, she pulled the note free and urgently tore open the letter, desperate for whatever news Severus had to impart.
I hope this bouquet can adequately convey my feelings for you.

Severus

Hermione felt her heart swell, elation infusing her body with a sense that she could fly.

Looking at the bouquet, her heart began to sink.

Hermione scrutinized each stem and the message Severus sent to her personally: Fickleness, treachery, disappointed expectation, animosity, and farewell.

She wondered if Severus knew or somehow found out about her regretful encounter with Neville, but she and Neville were the only two people who knew. It was nigh on impossible for Severus to know, especially on the other side of the world.

Glancing at the photo in the magazine once more, Hermione could see just how cozy Severus and his new business partner were, and she felt her heart break into irreparable shards. Collapsing onto the floor, Hermione began to wail. Her hand clutched weakly to her mouth as the tears fell and her cries morphed into a hysterical sob.

Albert burst into Hermione's office, drawn by her bawling, to find the crumpled note still clutched in her hand and the bouquet on her desk.

Seeing the choice of flowers and the state of his apprentice, all Albert could say was, “Oh, dear.”

Albert ran off to fetch Lavender, who waddled as fast as she could, given her rapidly expanding midsection.
Helping her off the floor, Albert guided the shell-shocked witch over to the couch in her office while Lavender ordered tea, and lots of it.

Hermione was inconsolable.

Lavender looked at the note and looked over the bouquet, as she swore under her breath and made plans to personally hex the balls off the bastard. How dare he dump Hermione in such a fashion.

With tea, and the help of a quickly prepared Calming Draught by Albert's hand, Hermione was able to confess that she and Neville had fallen into bed once – and that somehow Severus must have found out about it, given his inclusion of such flowers.

“Maybe this is a bouquet from him saying that he is sorry for his deceitfulness and that he was unfaithful,” Lavender surmised, after seeing the photo of Severus next to the blonde in the article Hermione showed them.

This didn't seem to help at all as Hermione broke into fresh waves of crying and sobbing. The message was clear in the end. It was over.

Noting Albert's calm demeanor, considering that a known Death Eater who had escaped England was in an article and sending a bouquet of flowers to Hermione announcing their break-up, Lavender asked him, “How did you know?”

There was little to explain the highly contextual meaning of that simple question. He knew exactly what his boss meant.

“I began my correspondence with 'Sebastian Delgado' for some time before the end of the war. I also had a correspondence with Severus Snape for many years. Despite charms to hide his true identity, there were things that gave it away. Preferences for certain ingredients and techniques, a turn of the phrase on parchment. Severus may have fooled the Ministry that he and Delgado were not the same person, but not me. I continued to let him believe that I was fooled, out of my respect for a fellow Potions master in need to practice his art, despite politics.”

There was a brief pause before he added, “Besides, I could tell Hermione was heart-sick, and it wasn't her ex-husband that she was mourning for. The timing and everything. I knew. I just didn't think it was my place to pry where it was none of my business.”
Hermione devolved into more sobs, despite the Calming Draught coursing through her veins. It surprised Albert that his draught wasn't as effective as he expected it to be.

Lavender could have waited, but she decided to ask anyway to relieve Hermione of the burden she may have felt out of obligation. “If you don't want to go to Hawaii when your apprenticeship is done and have our Asia Pacific headquarters there, we can always pick another location.”

“No, no!” Hermione shouted bitterly, wanting to show up in Hawaii looking fabulous with her title of Potions Mistress in hand, reminding Severus every day what a mistake it was to dump her so casually and live to regret it. But then again, he was a sarcastic bastard who had hid his heart away so easily for so long, it probably wouldn't matter. Maybe he wouldn't care, since he didn't seem to think much of her feelings to break it off in such a manner. “Yes. I don't know.”

She would need to think about it. It was too soon, but knowing that Lavender wouldn't force her to work in Malu Palekaiko, where she might cross paths with him, eased Hermione's mind. If she wanted to work in a different country and never set her eyes on Severus ever again, she could. She had seen Severus in the Pensieve, which fulfilled the old fortuneteller's prediction she would see him again. There was no prediction that Severus would see her again.

~~~~~~~*~

Esmeralda was over the moon. Despite fearing Stephen would break off their engagement based on a lapse in judgment and a whole lot of alcohol on her part, his note had said, “I think from this bouquet you can surmise where our relationship stands.” She deduced that he was still deeply in love her and that he couldn't wait to be reunited with her, based on the flowers he sent with the note. She was thrilled that the wedding was still on. She would assure Stephen of how she was very sorry to have shagged his best friend, even though secretly she wasn't sorry since the wizard was hung like a centaur and stellar in the sack.

~~~~~~~*~

Changed out of his woolen formal clothes and into some cool cotton shorts and a casual short-sleeved button-front shirt, Severus went to the community center where the beard judging was about to commence. Before he left, he went to his lab and brewed up something to settle his stomach. Ever since being woken up by the earthquake, he hadn't felt quite right, as if there was something amiss. He had discounted the morning's adrenaline rush since that was over and he still felt off.

Walking down the street from his house, he made a mental note to seek out Naomi and ask her if everything went according to plan. Perhaps it was nerves that something had gone wrong, and he was worried. He hadn't seen her and wasn't sure if she had returned yet, but she assured him before she took a Portkey directly to London that she would be back in time for the festival.

Reaching the community center, where the tables were laid out with various items for judging, Severus spotted Naomi who was setting her Hawaiian quilt down for judging just in time. Upon catching her eye, she gave him a thumbs-up and a nod that indeed everything went well.

For some reason, Severus' stomach didn't seem to feel any better, so he chalked it up to possibly some summer flu that had been running around. Even with his tutoring shut down for the week between Independence Day and the festival, he still must have caught something from one of his adult clients coming into his business. A bit of Pepperup Potion might help him get over whatever was ailing him, after the beard-judging competition.

Stepping up upon the dais, along with Draco and all the other men, including a few who were Muggles, Severus waited as the five judges walked by each man and looked about their faces to see how full they had come in for the one month of growth they were allowed. A wand oath from wizards that they hadn't used magic to make their beards grow unnaturally fast resulted in a few disqualifications. The Muggle men took a diluted sip of Veritaserum in order to truthfully answer that they did not knowingly take any potions or have any charms performed on them.

“Can I stay over at your place tonight?” Draco asked in a sotto voce voice.

“Trouble in paradise?” Severus gently ribbed.

“Let's just say I can't wait for this damned festival to be over so I can go back to having my loving wife who has dinner on the table when I come from work, is reasonable and pleasant, and doesn't go off the rails screaming at me for no reason, harried, crying, bone–tired, and working herself into a fretful state over this festival and her dancing debut as Pele,” Draco growled under his breath.

“I don't have the guest room outfitted, but I do have a hammock on the front porch.”

“I can bring over a bed from one of my guest bedrooms, but let's say I don't think I could stand another night of her breaking into tears over the slightest provocation, then slamming the door in my face when I ask her what's wrong.” The younger wizard let a great sigh of exasperation escape as he waited for the judges to approach him and his mentor.

Severus had no idea that things had been difficult between the two, but it explained why Draco had asked to join him for dinners after work recently.

~~~~~~~*~

Staring at the dusty tome with the cracked leather binding, Hermione didn't even know why she was bothering to study at two in the morning. It's not like she was in a rush to finish her apprenticeship and rush off to Hawaii to join Severus anymore.
Lavender had given her the rest of the day off and Albert insisted she recuperate, but she could do anything other than what she was ordered. As she had done at Hogwarts, when she was stressed or seeking to temporarily forget her troubles, Hermione shoved her nose in a book to escape. She had tried to sleep, but found it was elusive. Not even a nice relaxing cup of herbal tea from Marf could settle her mind. If she was awake, the least she could do is do something productive instead of mope and cry and waste her tears over Severus, who obviously did not care for her any longer, despite the memory he had left her asking her to join him in Malu Palekaiko.

Her mind grasped onto a thread momentarily, hoping this was some sort of mistake and that Severus didn't send her those flowers, or it was some great cosmic mix-up. The only thing she could think of was that her moment of weakness with Neville had cost her happiness with Severus, though in the photo of the magazine, it looked like Severus had wasted no time in finding a new witch to keep him company in bed.

Glancing over at the bed, she could only think of all the times she’d had sex with him and thought back on those moments with bitterness. Maybe that was why she couldn't sleep. Her history with Severus and that bed made it impossible to sleep in without remembering the feel of his body lying next to her as they slept, exhausted after making love, drifting off to sleep in contentment.

And how could he cast her aside so easily? That's what gnawed at Hermione as well. He had been faithful to Dumbledore for all those years and spent decades mourning his wife, whom he wasn't even in love with. For him to cast his own love for her so easily did not seem like the Severus she knew, yet those flowers said it as plainly as if the words had come from his own lips.

There was another potions master booze-up the next night. She had assured Albert she would be all right enough to go – in order to keep pretending that she could easily move beyond this. She needed to be alert for the booze-up tomorrow, so she took a vial of something to help her sleep.

She would show Severus. And how dare he send her fish geranium for disappointed expectation. Wasn't he the one who gave up years ago of ever proving his own innocence? And to throw it back in her face that she had not found some way to clear his name yet? Hermione would show him, if anything to gloat in his face and prove that she was above his petty bitterness, and that she kept her promises.

Waking to another mild aftershock Saturday morning, Severus still didn't feel any better. Something was wrong, almost like the pit of dread he'd felt in his stomach just days before the Death Eater Decree was announced.

As the kettle whistled, Draco ambled into the kitchen, still rubbing at his freshly-shaved face.
Severus had won third prize in the beard competition, while Draco didn't even place. It was a Muggle from Russia who won first prize. Severus decided to keep the beard for a while. He had the good grace not to remind Draco that he was expected to make cassoulet as Severus preferred it, since things were currently strained on the Malfoys' domestic front.

The third place yellow ribbon wasn't the only ribbon Severus had won. He also won first prize for his mango chutney in the mixed-fruit canning competition. And if he was feeling better, he might have placed higher than fourth in the dueling competition.

Draco also walked away with a first-place blue ribbon for his Hawaiian quilt pot holder, Novice Division, surprising Severus as the older wizard did not know his friend had taken up the fiber arts as a hobby. Draco admitted he found it relaxing and was thinking of maybe attempting a quilt within the next year, though that did seem a huge leap from a small potholder.

Tea served, all that Severus could stomach was some unbuttered toast to go with it. Even at the community luau the night before, Severus had little appetite, despite all the wonderful foods that were laid out to enjoy. Draco brought in some oranges to squeeze for fresh juice and a cantaloupe from Severus' kitchen garden.

Severus declined some freshly cut-up melon and forced the toast down.

Even though Draco was looking a bit miserable himself, feeling a bit guilty for spending the night away from Ginny, the distracted quality about Severus did not escape his attention.

“Are you feeling all right? You hardly ate last night, and I know how you enjoy those luaus.” Draco's forehead knit and a small crease marred his brow. He hadn't slept any better last night than his host did, even with bringing a comfortable bed over to sleep in.

“Yeah, probably something going around. I'll be fine.” Severus did the best he could to choke down his tea, hoping to feel a bit better as the day progressed. Maybe it was heartburn, he would brew a quick antacid before they went to watch the hula program.

“Ginny is dancing at noon. I suppose I should be there. This dance has been putting her into a tizzy. And I should be there for support if anything,” Draco admitted reluctantly. “She has been quite the bundle of nerves. Maybe I should have been a bit more understanding to all the pressure she's been under.” Draco looked a bit forlorn. He did promise with his marriage vows to love her through better or worse, and this was a walk in the park compared to the danger and pressures they were under while still living in England.
Severus wasn't about to impart any advice. He would let Draco reach his own conclusions as to how to make amends or patch things up with his wife. He couldn't judge how irrational Ginny had or hadn't been as of late, since he hadn't seen much of her, with her running around with preparations and last-minute late night practice sessions. Draco was known to be a bit dramatic with the hyperbole, but Ginny was known to sport quite the temper at times.

~~~~~~~*~

Even after taking an Invigoration Draught, a Wit-Sharpening Potion, and a Calming Draught in order to keep her wits about her, the alcohol was countering everything those potions were supposed to do. She was finding herself tired and nearly falling asleep while in the middle of a conversation with Braxton and another Potions master's wife on best ways to store dried herbs while still attached to the stem. It was all so fascinating, but her eyes felt so heavy.

It didn't help that Royston was still harassing her about Delgado and asked how her Spanish was coming along, with a soft elbow to the ribs. Hermione nearly turned around and hexed the assaulting body part off, then ran off to the loo for a good cry.

Tipping back some Sobering Solution, she felt it take effect. Hermione held on to Harry's Auror's locket, which had become like a talisman for her, rubbing it with her thumb as a meditative exercise and a way to expend nervous energy when her mind was unsettled. Now clear-headed, she took another dose of Calming Draught and Invigoration Draught so she could at least get through the drinking competition games she felt obligated to participate in, to be chummy with these men who were grating on her abraded nerves. She was finding all company a great burden to bear as of late, male or female. There was a brief moment when Hermione wondered if becoming a drunken misanthrope was part and parcel of becoming a Potions master or mistress, which would explain a lot about Severus, she reasoned.

As she reached for the doorknob, Hermione's hands shook uncontrollably. Her body fighting the potions she had taken, but by force of will, she would make her body obey. Since everything in her life seemed to have fallen out of control, this was the one thing she felt she could control.

~~~~~~~*~

Draco and Severus entered the community center, which had been enlarged inside to accommodate the thousands that had come to watch the dancing, with the hula dedicated to Pele the highlight of the day. Normally the community center accommodated up to 500 persons, but the pavilion was expanded once a year to hold the many that came to see the two days of dance and music.

Currently, the keiki group was dancing. Small children were doing the hula in ti-leaf skirts and hot-pink halter tops, with crowns of flowers in their hair. The band played while the children did a form of hula that was more contemporary, versus the more traditional hula the older students and adults would soon perform. The songs that accompanied the children often included sing-song lyrics in English about girls in grass skirts, eating fish and poi, playing in the waves on the beach and sunshine. The more serious hula dancing was accompanied by songs only sung in Hawaiian and with great solemnity.

Then some of the youth groups would perform before Ginny and the other adults took the stage at noon.

Around the periphery of the pavilion were booths and tables set up to sell food and crafts. Some food booths were set up where all the proceeds were donated to various charities on the island. One booth Tina and Manny were working at helped fund the Sanctuary-Seekers Fund, a charity that helped those who came to the island seeking sanctuary without any money. Tina had needed the help of that fund herself when she first came to Malu Palekaiko without a single Sickle on her person. Other booths donated all their monies toward Muggle Camp for those children whose parents couldn't afford the week-long program during summer. There were many charities and all were worthy. As much as Severus wanted to try all the different food available, he just couldn't stomach the idea of eating anything, especially if it was fried.

Some of the tables were set up to take orders for the holidays, taking orders for tins of home-baked goods that would be Portkeyed, with sign-ups dated for delivery between Thanksgiving and December 18th. Some sold tins filled with manju, mochi, and other Japanese sweets, while some sold pineapple right-side-up cakes. One table sold rum balls, macadamia nut shortbread, and Russian tea cakes, and another specialized in macadamia nut brittle and pumpkin rugelach. Severus ordered a tin of the brittle for himself for delivery sometime in December. Many of them offered their goods in decorative tins featuring snowmen with sunglasses under swaying palms, little wooden stick arms waving cheerfully. He saw some tins that featured a hula-dancing girl in a ti-leaf shirt, bikini top, lei, and a Santa hat, dancing with her skirt swaying gently to and fro. Those first few weeks they lived in Malu Palekaiko, Severus had wondered why he would see a train of boxes floating by Justina's hotel, on their way to the Portkey office. All the pre-ordered tins of baked holiday goods were the reason.

One Muggle woman was weaving palm frond hats, pointed witch-style and regular Muggle-style, for the tourists, while her husband, a wizard, exchanged coin and helped split the fronds with his wand for his wife. They were doing a brisk business.

Severus and Draco found a spot near the front shortly before Ginny was about to take the stage. Seated and watching the mid-teen girls do a more advanced hula, Draco said quietly aside to Severus, “Rainbow just explained to me why Ginny is so stressed. This is not only a dance performance, but a religious one as well. One misstep, no matter how small, and the whole ceremony will be invalidated. Bad luck and sometimes catastrophes have happened after a ceremonial dance that had has even a small mistake. Ginny's afraid if she messes this up, she'll curse the whole island.”

Draco shook his head and wanted to say more, but the light dimmed as the last of the teenaged hula dancers left the stage to make way for the main performance.

Severus could certainly understand why Ginny had recently turned into a basket case, by Draco's description. He wouldn't want the welfare of the whole island resting upon his shoulders either.

As the light rose, two lines of hula dancers, all adult women, flanked Ginny on either side as the music began to play. The spotlight shone brightly on Ginny in the center in a voluminous and flowing skirt and fitted top costume in red and orange, the crowd making subtle and soft noises of appreciation of this year's choice to dance as Pele. Ginny stood with her arms raised, her hair charmed to fly upwards in soft undulating waves. With her red mane, it looked like her hair was made of flames. She truly looked like fire made into human form.

~~~~~~~*~

Hermione felt her eyes roll up in her head as she stood in the kitchen, but she grasped the edge of the counter, willing herself not to pass out. Able to stay conscious, she took deep breaths and felt the world right itself once more.

“Are you all right?” Albert said discreetly, noticing his apprentice looking unwell.

“It's nothing. Just been pushing myself a bit lately. Nothing I can't handle,” she assured her mentor and master.

“You've been here long enough.” Albert put a hand on her shoulder, partly to make sure she wouldn't nearly fall over again. “It's just past eleven, so why don't you say your farewells and go home and rest. You don't have to show up until noon tomorrow, so you can sleep in.”

She wanted to say there was little point in that, since she planned on getting up before dawn to study some more, but said nothing.

“Can you Apparate home by yourself all right?” Albert asked.

Nodding her head, she assured Albert she would make it home fine, and would owl him when she got home if he was that worried she was going to splinch herself. Albert said that wasn't necessary and wished her a good night.

Making the rounds, Hermione said farewell and tried to keep up a bright and chipper smile in order to avoid any questions. The Lovely Lavender Puffy Poof Eye Creme and the Circle of Darkness Begone Miracle Eye Make-up did wonders to hide the tired look about her eyes that night.

Apparating to Le Soleil Levant Mews, Hermione began walking toward the Red Ginseng, eager to take another dose of Invigoration Draught and Wit-Sharpening Potion once she got home. Grasping the Auror's pendant that hung from her neck, her thumb rubbing at it again, her mind was muddled so she didn't hear the footsteps behind her.

“I was wondering how soon it would be before I saw you again,” a voice called out into the night, echoing off the stone and brickwork walls.

Before she reached the threshold of the newly-rebuilt atrium of the Red Ginseng, she stopped and turned around. There was something familiar about that voice, but she couldn't place it.

Looking into the mist that had settled into the narrow turns and nooks of Diagon Alley and its many side streets, a cloaked figure emerged.

“Albert?” 'No, that's not it. That's the name of my Potions master. God, I can't think. I need more potion.' “Alan?”

“I was wondering if you were going to call me something else, but you finally got it.” Alan sauntered towards Hermione at a leisurely pace.

Ginny was magnificent. Severus looked over at Draco's face and saw that it beamed brightly, smiling as the blond watched his wife dance upon the stage. Though Severus was no expert in hula, it seemed to him that there were no mistakes, though if there were, he wouldn't know.

As she moved her hands, hips, and feet following a specific pattern of steps as required with precision of movement and timing, the audience held its breath. Faster and faster she danced, the chorus of dancers moving alongside Ginny in her dance symbolizing Pele's journey and the birth of the Hawaiian Islands.

When the rhythm of drum, percussion, and the chorus of voices ended, Ginny struck her final pose. The ceremony was complete. Severus hoped Pele was pleased.

The crowd erupted in a roar of applause, standing and clapping. Draco and Severus rose and clapped as well, both hopeful that Ginny would be able to relax now that the most stressful part was over. Severus ignored his grumbling stomach.

Before Ginny could step off the dais and take a bow, she collapsed in a heap upon the stage.

~~~~~~~*~

Hermione couldn't believe this berk from the Three Broomsticks was still bothering her, and at this time of night stalking about in front of her flat. She was feeling as if she had hit her own personal nadir: unceremoniously dumped by Severus, overworked, exhausted, still feeling guilty about shagging Neville, and now Alan pestering her yet again.

“I'm really tired, Alan, and I really want to go home and rest. I wish you would get the hint I'm not interested in you that way,” Hermione said, her hand still holding the locket, more out of her growing suspicion that something wasn't right than out of habit.

“Once I'm done, you can rest all you want,” he assured her right before the stunning spell hit her and Hermione went down, face first onto the damp and grimy cobblestones.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Yes, I looked it up. England has no national dress. One of the few that doesn't.

Thank you to my hard working betas, JuneW and Hope.

Keiki is Hawaiian for “children” and is often used to refer to small children.

B/N: Hula dancers often wear a skirt made of green ti leaves, which large and paddle-shaped. Once sewn together as a skirt, the leaves can be shredded finely so that the skirt looks like long grass, but there is no such thing as a grass skirt. ~ JuneW
Chapter Summary

Summary: Truths and motives are finally revealed. Hermione and Severus revisit an old nightmare.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Eighty-Nine
“Terra Incognita” (Unknown Land)

Disclaimer: As Dory from “Finding Nemo” might say, “Just keep disclaiming, just keep disclaiming...” JK Rowling owns Harry Potter and all its little bits. I merely play with the toys she created. OWWW! I just stepped on a tiny elder wand and mini-Voldemort. Worse than stepping on Legos. Grumble

==============

It was the painful throbbing in her face that woke Hermione up. Falling face-first onto the hard and unforgiving stone, Hermione had broken her nose.

Alan had done nothing to stem the blood trickling down her face and onto her clothes. Her cloak had already been removed while she was unconscious. She could have used her wand to fix her nose and remove the blood staining her blouse and skirt, but Alan was twirling her wand in his hand as a form of amusement until she regained consciousness. Hermione would have retrieved it back from him if he didn't have her restrained upright against a post with a binding spell, just like the one she and Severus used during the research and development of the potion, Irresistible.

Hermione was trying to think, which was hard to do considering she was going through withdrawal symptoms of the Invigoration Draught and Wit-Sharpening Potion. She suddenly remembered about the Auror's pendant around her neck, but her hands were bound and she could not hold it to call to Harry.

Thinking back, she wasn't sure if she had called for Harry before the spell hit her or not, but panic and fright she definitely felt while she was holding it. Maybe it was enough to bring Harry, but she wasn't sure. But if it did work, why wasn't Harry there already saving her from this creep? Now she wished Harry had given her one of the upgraded pendants that didn't require one to hold on it to call for help.

“You know, it was sheer luck you got into the lift shortly after I set Dolohov in the correct frame of mind. A few of the right words were all that were needed to help him rediscover his higher purpose in life. It was a pity he didn't snap until after you left,” Alan said casually as if recalling something of little consequence. “I was disappointed at the time he didn't take care of the witch responsible for my godmother's traumatic experience in the Forbidden Forest, but this makes up for it. I've been hoping for years for this opportunity.”

Having trouble thinking clearly, Hermione felt a sudden burst of adrenaline, keenly aware she was not only the hostage of a stalker, but someone with a much darker, vengeful purpose. Grasping on to the implications of his statement, her stomach felt as if it had dropped out from under her. Alan was the one who had set Dolohov on the start of his killing rampage that resulted in the death of Marge, her co-worker.

“Some of the other Death Eaters who were living in back alleys were easy to grid of. Most had already sold off their wands by the time I pretended to befriend them. Some would have hexed themselves into oblivion long before I found them. Pretending to be some compassionate soul, bringing them a little food and a blanket before eventually offering them sweet and painless release...” Alan's eyes drifted towards the ceiling before he closed them, smiling serenely as he recalled the memory with fondness. “The exquisite look of torture on their faces, the long slow process, along with immediate paralysis of their vocal cords and legs, made it much easier to watch without people coming to the aid of a screaming witch or wizard, or having to follow them. Sometimes I would just pull up an old crate and watch. Better than that play we both saw the night we first met, wouldn't you say?”

Hermione recalled the play, 'Merlin and Morgana: The Lost Years’, and first seeing Alan across the bar that night and regretting flirting with him, though by his implied remarks it now seemed he had set his sights on her a long time ago.

“What are you? Some Death Eater, killing those you feel have failed Voldemort? Is this what this is?” she asked, trying to keep him talking, having missed his earlier remark about his godmother. Psychotics loved to ramble on about grand plans stereotypically, by the way Harry told of his times he’d faced off with Voldemort. She just hoped she could continue to keep up the banter long enough for Harry to find her, if she had indeed called for Harry in time. The pendant was still hanging around her neck, made to look like some mediocre family heirloom and nothing more, and fortunately Alan hadn't removed it.

In her mind, she called to Harry, screaming his name repeatedly, but she wondered if she had to hold it to be effective as Harry instructed, or would merely wearing the locket suffice. The fact Harry didn't show up automatically made her hopes of surviving this lunatic dim substantially.
“Me? A Death Eater? As if,” Alan scoffed, but quickly added, “Not that I wasn't sympathetic to the cause. No, I am merely just a humble wizard helping to set the wizarding world back to rights after that awful war which was lost. Before You-Know-Who came long, it wasn't politically incorrect to use the term 'Mudblood,' but his unpopularity within some circles in the Ministry made it a term that was no longer appropriate to use in public, lest one be accused of being a sympathizer to him. Now we had to keep our 'prejudices,' as accurate and truthful as they may be, to ourselves.” He used his fingers gesturing air quotes to add to the sarcasm over the use of that specific term.

Hermione had to keep him talking longer. Any extra minute was a minute extra of hope she had. “So what purpose does killing Death Eaters serve, if you were sympathetic to their cause and shared their attitudes and opinions?”

“You silly Mudbloods don't seem to get that point, but given you're not as good at the rest of us and not really part of our culture, you wouldn't understand. Your disgusting divorce from Ron Weasley and that filth you said in that Quibbler interview merely showed how you do not belong, and your ideas are polluting my culture. So I'll use small words for your Muggle-tainted brain to grasp.”

Hermione would have had harsh words to lash out against his attitude, but given he had killed Death Eaters with no qualms, killing a Muggle-born like herself would mean even less to him. She had to keep her head level and hopefully remaining upon her shoulders.

Alan began slowly pacing back and forth in front of where he had Hermione bound up against the stout post. “See, having Death Eaters around, even in lowly jobs in the Ministry or living like rats in back alleys, is a constant reminder of the war. With those reminders constantly around, we could not move on and go back to the way things used to be; a gentler and more wholesome past without such crude and Muggle things tainting our society, and certainly not that horrid Muggle Alliance Network. With the Death Eaters gone, people would forget why we had the war that much sooner and we could go back to the way it is supposed to be.”

He paused to look at Hermione coolly, his nose held high in the air, jaw set with determination. “The Ministry's recent campaign –Mudbloods shouldn't be excluded from participating fully in our society and should be welcomed with open arms – was just a misguided idea.”

“Is that why you were so surprised that I got an apprenticeship?” Hermione asked, remembering the look of shock on his face when he guessed by accident she had one.

“I was shocked because my Aunt Calpurnia had made arrangements with most of the masters and mistresses throughout nearly all disciplines to refuse you an apprenticeship,” he said with relish.
Hermione gasped in shock. She had no idea she had been singled out by the Minister of Magic's wife to be refused an apprenticeship, knowing only one witch with that much power with that particular first name.

“Shocked, are we? Well, you should have thought of what you did before you set the Centaurs on my godmother,” he added, his face turning into a menacing scowl.

’Centaurs. Umbridge. Alan is Umbridge's godson and Calpurnia Fudge is his aunt.’ Hermione clearly remembered drawing Umbridge into the Forbidden Forest and letting the Centaurs carry her away, not caring if the sadistic bureaucratic toady died or not. Unfortunately, she lived.

“You seemed pretty shocked that I still wound up getting an apprenticeship,” she threw back. It may not have been the wisest thing to say, being confrontational with her captor, but her mind was not as sharp as it should have been, since she'd become addicted to potions which kept her working and studying longer than was prudent.

“Yes, but given that Severus Snape was Lavender Brown's...” Alan paused and made with a fake apologetic face as if his faux pas was not on purpose. “Oh, I'm sorry, Lavender Weasley's Potions master, and I did see you come and go rather frequently from that Death Eater's flat over the months. I even saw you go in that night after you left the Grand Royal Supper Club. I can only assume that you and Snape had some sort of arrangement where he got you an apprenticeship, and you got him... a Portkey to escape Great Britain, or maybe regulated Potions ingredients? Why else would a Death Eater bother to fraternize with a Mudblood like you.”

Hermione could tell that he was fishing for information. This was the reason he hadn't killed her yet.

“Severus Snape wasn't Lavender's Potions master. Sebastian Delgado was,” she corrected him.

A barking laugh of disbelief came from Alan and echoed off the stone walls. “Right, keep trying to lie to me. I had Snape for Potions. The bastard made it so I couldn't get a passing grade high enough on my OWLs. I could have gone on to be a great Auror, if it wasn't for him. I'd recognize that dungeon-dwelling git anywhere, even if he did greet all the witches he fucked for money with a mask on, and he skulked off to work through back alleys in the morning.”

Hermione now knew Alan had been stalking not just her, but Severus as well. And probably Draco, and...
“You killed Blaise Zabini.” She didn't have to ask, she knew.

“Yes, you seemed quite taken with my handiwork, watching your reaction that night. Unfortunately, it was not quite as inspired as when I took care of Pansy Parkinson. That was a true masterpiece of genius, if I say so myself,” he admitted smugly in self-adoration.

Recalling the image of Blaise Zabini suspended by his peeled skin, his organs heaped in a pile under his body, the prisoner vomited violently, the alcohol and nibbles served at the Potions master booze-up coming right back up.

Hermione knew that if someone didn't come and save her soon, she was surely going to die that night.

~~~~~~~*~

Draco and Severus rushed up upon the stage. All hostility Draco felt towards his wife as of late instantly disappeared, replaced with nothing but concern and sheer terror something was wrong with her.

Before they could reach her, Rainbow was already up on the stage, crouching over Ginny. Addressing the concerned murmurs of the crowd, she announced with great calm, “Probably low blood sugar or a little dehydration.” Turning to Draco and Severus as they rushed upon the stage, she said, “Meet me at the clinic.”

Rainbow activated the Portkey for herself and Ginny. The two of them were pulled away, disappearing from the stage as Draco reached the spot where his wife had collapsed.

Drawing their wands, Draco and Severus Apparated to the clinic.

Arriving in front of the clinic's doors, they rushed in and were directed by the Healer's assistant at the front desk to go to one of the emergency treatment rooms towards the back. They passed by one wizard who'd had part of his arm Transfigured into a giant bird's head and kept pecking at the Healer who was trying to help the patient.

“In here,” Rainbow called out as she heard the thunder of their footsteps down the hallway.
Ginny was on her back on an examining table, while already regaining consciousness. Draco went directly over to his wife and held her hand, panic and worry etched upon his face. Rainbow worked around Draco, and continued to wave her wand over and about Ginny trying to discover why she had collapsed.

“And this is why I didn't want you to push yourself. You shouldn't have taken this role. You should have declined.” Draco stroked her face, shoving a strand out of her eyes in a gesture of tender affection.

Severus felt he should leave them alone, but he wanted to find out what was wrong with Ginny before letting the couple alone with their reunion.

“If I didn't push myself, it would have been a risk to the safety of the island,” Ginny protested, before she rolled over to one side and vomited into a bucket Rainbow conjured just in time.

The sight and sound of Ginny in the act was testing Severus' own resolve not to vomit. He was feeling progressively unwell as the day went on, but was feeling far worse now.

“What's wrong?” Draco asked Rainbow as she helped Ginny lay back on the examining table, her wand still moving about Ginny's form after she spelled the bucket away.

“Well, her blood sugar is a little low, but she's perfectly fine. Though I do recommend you take it easy,” Rainbow advised.

“I'll take it easy once this festival is over.” Ginny made to get back up, but Rainbow gently pushed her back down, indicating she wasn't done.

“I recommend you start taking it easy from this moment forward. When was your last cycle?”

Ginny blinked and thought for a second. “About five weeks, but I'm not due for another week or so. I've been quite irregular since going off potions since the wedding.

Rainbow smiled. “Well, you won't be having a cycle for a while.”
Draco looked between Rainbow and Ginny, missing the immediate implication of the statement, since he didn't care to be informed about the finer details about menstrual cycles. Understanding dawned upon his face as he slowly said, “You mean–,” halting before finishing his question.

Rainbow smiled, and patted Draco on the shoulder. “Congratulations.”

Draco and Ginny embraced, both breaking into tears. This was what they had been trying for since they married, Ginny going off contraceptive potions the day they married. Now they would have a child and thus be eternally bound through the magic of their children together.

Severus came over to congratulate the pair, despite the growing discomfort in his chest and abdomen. He began to offer his congratulations to the expecting couple, but a shooting pain through his stomach made him immediately double over, his vision going slightly gray before returning.

“Severus?” Draco said with some alarm, and helped his friend over to another examining table in the adjoining bay.

Rainbow ordered Ginny to stay put while she went to take care of Severus.

“Describe what you are feeling?” Rainbow ordered.

“It's nothing. Probably some flu or something going around,” Severus assured her, dismissing that it was anything, despite how he'd lost his footing and nearly passed out.

Rainbow's wand passed over Severus and her brow began crinkle, her mouth set in a grim line. “It's not flu or a cold, magical or Muggle.” Waving her wand back and forth, she cast a few charms, looking even more perplexed. “Not poisoning, not allergic reaction, no diseases I can detect...” She shook her head back and forth, thoroughly confused. “When did this start?”

Severus answered that he woke up feeling unwell the day before.

Rainbow summoned Lambert, the other Healer on staff who had just finished with the patient down the hall. She consulted with him in hushed tones to the side. The other Healer, a wizard who worked full-time at the clinic, came over and waved his own wand back and forth over Severus, the glow hovering over his trunk never wavering in color or intensity.
“Can you tell me, have you had any changes in diet as of late? Changes in routine?” asked Lambert, hoping for some clue.

“I’m not tutoring any students this week, but other than that, no. No changes at all.” Severus felt like the two Healers were hovering over him were making a great bother over nothing. It reminded him of his trips to the infirmary at Hogwarts and Poppy fussing over him when he was a spy, recalling a far less joyful time in his life.

“Have you taken possession of any new objects this week? Perhaps something you bought or was given to you was cursed?” the senior Healer asked.

Naomi did indicate non-verbally she had somehow procured or found the Malfoy family silverware, but he had not taken possession of it yet. “No,” he shook his head. “Nothing new or old, bought or received.” He wanted to keep the Malfoys' anniversary present a surprise, as Draco and Ginny were in the room watching him. Besides, Naomi was just fine, and she was the one who technically bought it and was still in possession of the silver, should there be any curses still malingering about the set.

Just then he felt a wave of nausea pass through him, and he vomited all over himself.

~~~~~~~*~

“If you kill me, then you'll be the first suspect. You got off from Pansy Parkinson's murder. And anything beyond a simple Killing Curse will indicate your handiwork. You might have gotten a free pass for killing Death Eaters, but killing Harry Potter's best friend will certainly put you in his cross hairs. He's an Auror. And Kingsley Shacklebolt and Alastor Moody would certainly zero in on you should Muggle-borns start being murdered once again, since you've acquired a taste for spectacularly gruesome tableaus. You wouldn't be given a free pass this time, as you did in Parkinson's murder. How did you get off for her murder? Bribes?” Hermione asked as vomit and spittle hung from her lower lip, as she kept trying to keep him engaged and talking longer.

She avoided breathing through her nose, to reduce the likelihood she would vomit again because of the smell of it wafting up as she vomited all down her front.

“Being the nephew of the Minister of Magic helps,” Alan confessed. “Also, Dolores Umbridge still being an influential member of the Wizengamot helps too. Having blackmail material on the Chief Warlock of the Wizengamot is my ace in the hole.”

“Rancelette? What do you have on him?” If the head of the wizarding council where Justice was concerned was being blackmailed, who knows what other important matters have been twisted for Calpurnia Fudge and Dolores Umbridge's designs?

“You'd have to ask Blaise Zabini. Oh, that's right, you can't. But forcing Blaise to give up some of those memories of him being... ahem, intimate with Rancelette with the false promise I'd let him live was foolish of him. Oh, well. Too bad for him. Good for me,” he said in the same way Voldemort would talk about killing people with the same sort of detached calm.

Hermione felt a violent shudder steal through her. It could have been caused by her potions withdrawal getting worse, or revulsion over the cold-heartedness of her potential murderer and what he was capable of that frightened her.

“But how could you possibly get away with my murder, if you'd be the chief suspect?” she asked once more, continuing with her stalling tactics.

“I can just easily claim to have solved how a Death Eater escaped. The best speculative scenario would be you provided potion ingredients for Snape's escape through your work in the Department of Standards & Regulations. The timing of the events work in my favor. I have no idea if you did or not give him ingredients, but it makes for a convenient and believable story. And in the process of being a concerned citizen trying to help find out how two Death Eaters – that's right, I know about Draco Malfoy leaving as well – you were accidentally killed when your own curse was reflected off of a mirror, doing anything you could to protect your secret. A Mudblood, friend of Harry Potter, helped a Death Eater escape for her Potions apprenticeship. Maybe I could embellish it and say you were possibly even in love with him.”

Hermione pulled herself together as best as she could and started to laugh with disdain. “What mirror? And you really think anyone would buy that story? Really? You obviously haven't thought this through.”

“No?” Alan cast a quick spell and Hermione heard the crashing of glass behind her. “That mirror I placed there ahead of time. And as for you and Snape, why are you blushing?” Alan surmised, not fooled by her acting.

Leisurely walking around her as a sculptor would survey a block of marble before beginning their next masterpiece, he studied her. With casual indifference, he lazily drawled, “I wonder if Snape did steal your heart and it's gone.”

With a sudden ferocity, Alan cast a slicing hex that cut across Hermione's chest. She felt the fresh flow of blood begin seeping down her blouse, her flesh stinging brightly as if seared with a white-hot iron. Suddenly, she felt as if she could barely breathe, despite her laborious attempt to scream.

Lambert and Rainbow were at a loss. They continued to check Severus over for any possible source of his illness. When he suddenly grabbed at his chest, they wondered if it was a heart attack, but a quick check assured them it was not.

The pain cut through him, reminding him of the feeling he had when Lucius hit him with the slicing hex that punctured his lung, which had sent him to the infirmary at Hogwarts for a while. Though not as sharp or as intense, it was similar and in a completely different spot that where his old scar remained. He gasped at the surprise of the pain that seemed to come from nowhere with no identifiable or discernible cause.

Shortly after it began, it stopped entirely. The pain began to fade away, and he was feeling quite sleepy.

As Severus began to drift off, Draco was asking frantically, “What's wrong with him? Why can’t you people do anything?”

Immediately after the slicing hex hit Hermione, a bright blue spell that seemed to originate out of thin air stunned Alan; he was out cold.

Harry removed his Invisibility Cloak and ran over to Hermione and released her from her bonds. As she slumped into his arms, Kingsley appeared, having been hidden by a Disillusionment Charm, and cast Alan with a binding spell that would prevent escape.

Pulling out a potion from a pouch that hung from his belt, Harry tipped it up to Hermione's lips. She was barely conscious enough to drink it down before she slipped into darkness.

Harry did his best to heal the slicing hex temporarily, then cast a Mobilicorpus spell to lift Hermione's body from the dank floor. He pulled out a Portkey that would transport them both to St. Mungo's.

“I have him. And this time we have his confession,” Kingsley said to Harry with a nod before the young Auror and Hermione disappeared.

“How long was I out?” Severus asked, his voice a rasp, his throat raw from the acid of the vomit he had yet to rinse from his mouth. Fortunately, Rainbow knew the spells to get vomit out of hair and clothes to Severus' benefit.

“Just a few minutes,” Rainbow said, her wand waving in front of his eyes, checking for dilation and movement. “Follow the tip of my wand, please.”

Severus did as he was told without protest, for once.

Lambert had a few books out. He was flipping through them, trying to discover the cause based on the symptoms and length of Severus' ailments.

“Have you been experimenting on any new potions? Any new research? Any new ingredients? Any change in ingredients you've handled recently, such as a new source or variety?” Lambert asked, throwing out questions as fast as he could ask them, Severus answering in the negative to each.

Nothing had changed, nothing was different. It was a rather ordinary week of no consequence other than the festival. Even then, Severus had eaten the same food as everyone else at the luau the night before, and he had yet to eat any of the food being sold at the festival that day.

The Healers were stumped. By the time Severus was feeling well enough to sit up, Ginny had been discharged after being given something to help stabilize her blood sugar, and candied ginger to nibble on to ease her nausea.

“I recommend you go home and rest,” Rainbow said with the same authoritative tone Poppy used on him over the years. “If you're feeling better, you can go to the festival tomorrow, as long as you sit as much as possible. But something is wrong, and we right now have nothing to go on. Take it easy.” Turning to Ginny, she added, “That goes for both of you.”

Severus finally got up off the table.

Draco approached him and asked, “Are you well enough for me to Side-Along Apparate you?”

“No Apparating for you, witchy-poo,” Rainbow reminded Ginny with a waggle of her finger. “Not until after the baby’s born.”
Ginny turned to Draco and said, “I'll meet you back at the festival by the papusa stand after you're done getting Severus home.”

Draco nodded and gave his wife a brief kiss and a smile, placing his hand upon her abdomen with a gentle possessiveness. “See you soon.”

‘God, I really would have liked to have tried those papusas,’ Severus mused to himself as Draco wrapped an arm around him for support and the two Disapparated.

The trip was too much. When they landed, Severus fell to his knees and suffered a brief bout of the dry heaves, the brief trip too much for his system to tolerate.

Draco was glad there was nothing for him to clean up. If Ginny was going to suffer from morning sickness, who knew how much vomit he'd be spelling away for who knew how many months to come. He had no idea how long the phase lasted, but he was going to learn soon enough first-hand.

Picking Severus up off the floor once the convulsions stopped, he guided his friend over to the bed. He helped him undress and slip into some pyjama bottoms before tucking him in.

“Do you want a book? At least keep one by the bedside table, should you feel like reading?” Draco offered.

He was doing his best to take care of his mentor, given until eight months prior, he had never had to take care of anyone before. Now he felt it was time to step up and take care of those around him now. First and foremost, with his wife, and now with his friend.

Severus felt weak. He knew was perfectly capable of Summoning his own books from his library, as he had done from his bed many times, but he didn't trust his own magic at that moment. Something was wrong. He knew it now, no longer dismissing it as heartburn or a cold.

“Yes, Draco. I need A Potions Master's Guide to Tropical Diseases, located on the second bookshelf to the right of the door, on a shelf somewhere around the middle.”

Though Lambert and Rainbow were very competent Healers, it would soothe his own mind to do his own research and see if there was something they had missed in their diagnosis being inconclusive.

By the time Draco had returned from the library, Severus had drifted off to sleep.

“Ginny and I will check on you later tonight after the festival,” he told the sleeping wizard. Draco wasn’t even sure if Severus heard him or not, as he said it more for himself.

Draco wished at this point that Hermione had come with them to Malu Palekaiko. He had wished it way back in February, after watching Severus mope about missing her. He just hoped Lavender was moving forward with his idea to open an Asia-Pacific regional headquarters for The Lovely Lavender Company. Not only would it be his chance to get back to doing work he enjoyed more, but now it had become more important to reunite Severus and Hermione together again.

Draco had his happily ever after with Ginny; it was time for Severus to have his own.

Hermione found herself in a long, flowing dark robe in the midst of a vast Stygian forest at night. She knew she was someplace else before, but she couldn’t recall where. She was currently surrounded by trees which stood like silent sentinels of the starless night. The treetops blended in with the expanse of the universe above.

Wand in hand, she cast a spell to light her way as she began her trek towards her destination. Why she was going there or where it was, she couldn’t exactly recall. Her mind was shrouded like the mist that hung about the forest floor, partially concealing her path and her purpose.

She had a long way to go before she could rest.

There was a general idea of where she had to go, but the reason why she was going there was not in the forefront of her mind. Dreams never really ever made sense, as while in them one usually took them at face value as the normative, though in this dream she felt more self-aware than ever before.

Walking all night, she never tired. The sky should have begun to lighten with the coming of the dawn, but no sun rose; it remained dark. Onward she trekked for what seemed like miles, yet knowing she would eventually arrive. Where was she going to arrive? She would know when she got there.
Severus was being dragged along the rough and muddy ground. It must have rained recently, and his captors didn’t seem to care that twigs, rocks, and sand abraded against him, scratching his hands and wrists which were bound behind his back, slowly shredding his black woolen trousers and coat.

How he was captured he could not exactly recall. He only knew in his current situation things were not looking so good. There were voices muffled, as the heavy bag over his head dampened the sound, which was further reduced by the wetness of the bag’s fabric. There were some derisive chuckles he knew were in reference to him, given that he was their prisoner.

“Throw him in the middle,” a familiar gruff voice called out.

Whoever was casting the lazy Mobilicorpus, with the intent to drag him on the ground, put the effort into it and flicked their wand. The spell caused Severus to fly up through the air and land on the chilly sodden ground with a thud on his side. He most probably cracked a rib or two in the process, when he landed on a jagged rock poking up through the flattened grassy clearing.

As disjointed as this dream was, Severus’ spy instincts kicked in. He remained silent in hopes of listening in further to discover who his captors were and their plans. He waited.

Severus knew better than to speak up in this type of situation, as that usually resulted in a boot to the head or, most probably, to his already cracked ribs.

Through the bag’s fabric, he could see no light, thus surmising it must be night. With it being night, there was only a slight chill in the air, indicating it was not winter or autumn. And the lack of snow meant that it was probably not spring either. Summer, it was summertime.

The smell of the grass and nearby flowers and trees that seeped through the damp hood, perfuming the night air with their fragrance released from the recent rains, told Severus he was somewhere in England. He knew these smells.

This was not odd, as Severus had often dreamt he was back in England, often forgetting his dream come morning; however, he would not forget tonight's dream.

Hermione came upon the clearing, at the end of what seemed like an endless journey through the forest. This was where she was summoned to go; something or someone drew her here.

Dozens of witches and wizards in long, flowing dark robes, exactly like the one Hermione was wearing, stood in a semi-circle. Her mind instantly recognized this for what it was – it was a Dark Revel, though no one wore masks. Hermione was not a Death Eater, yet she was dressed as one.

She recognized each and every face of those standing in the semi-circle. Moody, Cornelius Fudge, many of the Aurors Harry worked with, members of the Wizengamot, Ministry officials, Rita Skeeter, the Editor-in-Chief of the Daily Prophet, even Ron. What they all had in common, standing there together, she couldn't fathom, not understanding why she was brought before them as if to stand in judgment.

Alan stepped forward from the circle and Hermione began to breathe heavily. She knew she should be afraid of him and that he was dangerous, but exactly why, she could not recall immediately. She longed for an Invigoration Draught and a dose of Wit-Sharpening Potion, suddenly feeling tired and her mind cloudier.

Sauntering over towards the center of the circle, Alan asked, “Does this belong to you?” With a flick of his wand, the bag placed over the prisoner's head disappeared.

Hermione didn't even know there was anyone in the middle of the circle, as the person was caked in mud and blended in, looking more like a mound of dirt than a human being.

She recognized the wizard immediately. “Severus,” she breathed in shock.

He was on the ground, muddied, on his side, his hand and feet bound, his hair wet and plastered against his face as he lay there, a few hanks tangled against his beard.
Sweeter to Severus than the cool air entering his lungs, no longer stifled by the damp bag over his head that was finally gone, was the sight of Hermione. God, how he missed her and she was there. But there was a foreboding growing in the pit of his stomach. There was something very familiar about where they were.

Hermione looked down at Severus, and he looked back up to her with a growing look of dread upon his face. He had to face her now, after he let her go in his memory he’d left for her. Was that a look of odium she cast down at him, that she was going to abandon him there and leave him to the mercies of his captors? There was a coldness in Hermione's eyes Severus had never seen before.

He finally recognized where he was. Hermione was looking at Severus with the same simmering loathing he'd cast upon his wife that fateful night. The night he summoned all his hatred for every grievance against her and his situation in life before he cast the Killing Curse. It was his turn to die, as he should have that night.

With resignation, Severus laid his head back down in the mud, waiting for the course of events to unfold as he had dreamt them many times before. This time, he was the one bound, lying in the mud about to meet his death.

“Well?” Alan prompted Hermione. "Does this belong to you?"

“Belong? Hardly.”

It struck at Severus' heart, having the same words he said that night spoken in regards to him now. And he recognized the wizard speaking to her as Pansy Parkinson's murderer. The wizard had the same smug grin upon his face as he'd worn during the murder trial.

“Then it shouldn't bother you then to dispatch this Death Eater,” Alan addressed Hermione before turning to speak to the rest of those gathered 'round. “His presence in this world is a reminder of the war. Of your pain, of all your hopes dashed, of all your friends dead, chances lost, regret filling your soul of that which you wish you could have done to save the ones you loved. Kill him, and the world will be set to rights.”
Hermione hated Severus for how he'd cast her aside. She thought he would have missed her, but it seemed he had happily moved on with his own life. And now he was there for her to have her revenge for the pain he caused her.

Severus' dream was departing dramatically from the one he knew. It seemed that there was a prior conversation between Hermione and Pansy Parkinson's killer which Severus was not privy to, but the message was clear: this murderer wanted Hermione to kill Severus.

Sensing her hesitation, Moody asked her, “So you feel some sort of affection for him?” It was the same question Moody asked Hermione when questioned about Dolohov the day after he went on his killing spree.

Standing straight up, she sneered, “Not anymore.”

“Then kill him,” Moody ordered. “What difference does it make if there is one less Death Eater in the world? And this one will be so easily forgotten, just like the rest.”

Hermione understood the implications of his statement. The Daily Prophet had reported a string of deaths over the years, but their coverage was masked in code words and understated phrases not meant to alarm the public. They were written up as passings due to old age or accidents. What wizard died of old age at the age of thirty-five? Or as Blaise's murder was reported, a most unfortunate accident in the atrium of his block of flats. Even Pansy Parkinson's murder trial was skewed and biased tripe with Alan's name withheld when reported in the paper. Severus' death would probably be written up and put in a tiny box under an advertisement for hemorrhoid cream on sale at the local apothecary, or some other such ignoble editing choices.

Walking towards Severus, a fierce glint in her eye and a curl upon her lip, Hermione raised her wand.

Severus closed his eyes and hoped it would be quick.

Had it been Macnair or even Dolohov, Hermione would have done it. But this was Severus. He was no Death Eater, any more than she was a Death Eater for wearing the robes currently on her back. She had meant to clear his name and had not, but Severus was innocent on those counts he was falsely accused of. Severus did not let the Death Eaters into Hogwarts; he did not kill Albus Dumbledore. Severus may have broken her heart, but Hermione was not going to kill him.
Sparks flew out of Hermione's wand and she laid Alan out on his back, gasping for breath and twitching in the mud.

A quick spell, and the bounds around Severus' wrists and ankles were gone.

Grabbing him by the collar of his jacket, Hermione helped haul him up, yelling at him to find his legs and run.

Severus couldn't believe it. She had saved him. Despite her obvious hatred of him, she had saved him. He ran towards the trees, making for somewhere other than the clearing he was trying to escape from. Hermione was right behind him, casting spell after spell, while deflecting ones directed towards her and Severus.
Running blindly, with not even the stars to light their path, Severus ran, and Hermione kept right behind him.

Had he a wand of his own to light the way, Severus would have not tripped over the root growing up through the forest floor as he ran pell-mell, and landed nose first into a tree.

~~~~~~~*~

“What is wrong with her? Why won't she wake up?” Harry asked the Healer, as Ron paced at the foot of Hermione's bed.

Lavender was in a chair, trying to keep her fingers out of her mouth and not ruin her manicure. It was too late, she had already bitten off all ten nails while fretting over Hermione for the past couple days.

Zhubanysh stroked Hermione's face as she sat next to her bed. She had spent many hours there singing to Hermione, trying to bring her back the same way she once sang to her husband when he was brought to her yurt that fateful December day, unconscious and broken, physically and emotionally.

“We don't know, Mr. Potter,” Healer Maxelbine said with a shake of his head. “We healed that hex up very quickly, before her lungs filled with blood, thanks to your quick work. Her nose is fixed, and Potions Master Dobmeir already treated her for her withdrawal symptoms for the Invigoration Draught and Wit-Sharpening Potion.”

Albert had recognized some of the symptoms of Hermione's dependence upon the potions, since he had used them a bit too much a few times throughout his own life. A potion to counter the withdrawal symptoms would speed the healing process, but it wasn't the withdrawal which was keeping Hermione in a prolonged state of slumber. It was something that perplexed even the staff at St. Mungo's.

“There is nothing we can do at this time other than monitor her. We'll be back in an hour to check her again. I'm sorry, Mr. Potter, but we're doing all that we can.”

The Healer left the room and closed the door.

Hermione stirred a little, but she had been doing that off and on over the past few days.

Walking over to Harry, Ron asked, “You don't think this was some dark magic he used in that hex to—” His questions was cut short by Hermione speaking.

“Severus? Severus?” Hermione never woke, her eyes still closed. She was talking in her sleep. Earlier, she was mumbling, but nothing that could be discerned. There was no mistaking whose name she was calling out this time.

Ron looked from the prone form of his ex-wife, then to Harry with growing confusion knitting his brow. “Why would she be saying that git's name?”

Harry and Lavender exchanged brief glances. Zhubanysh did not know who this Severus was and was about to ask, but stopped when Lavender made some noises as if clearing her throat.

“Harry, if you would lock the door, I would prefer to not have anyone interrupt us for a bit.”
Patting the chair next to her, Lavender bid her husband to sit down.

“Hermione knows Severus Snape, because actually he was my Potions master. Sebastian Delgado was merely his cover name so he could consult for me. He and Hermione worked together for some months, and during that time, I guess you could say, they became...” Lavender paused looking for the right term that would not send Ron into a screaming fit. This was a hospital after all. “Erm, good friends.”

Comprehension slowly dawned on Ron's face. “How good.”

“Very.”

Harry had the good sense to be ready to cast a Silencio to mute the scream of “What?” that came from Ron's mouth.

At least during her retelling of events, Lavender never disclosed to Ron about the more unsavory aspects of Hermione and Severus' original arrangement, his “legal” line of work, or her role as madam. She omitted as much about Ginny and Draco as possible, as that was still a very sore subject for Ron.

Zhubanysh felt pity for her sister, as she heard the tale and continued to hum softly, stroking Hermione’s face.

~~~~~~~*~

After casting a spell to cause the branches and roots of the trees at the edge of the forest to become a barrier to slow the pursuit of the others, Hermione turned around to follow Severus, only to find that he no longer was in front of her.

Where had he gone? She was right behind him and there was nothing, no sign of him at all. Even the spell she cast to highlight his footsteps ended at a tree with a large root sticking up from the ground.

Looking about, hoping the others behind them would not hear her, she called out in her loudest voice, screaming into the night, “Severus? SEVERUS!”

Where Hermione was certain where she was going before, now she began wandering aimlessly, unsure of what direction to go.
Severus sat bolt upright in bed, gasping, reaching for his nose, still feeling the phantom sensation of his face slamming up against the trunk.

“Severus!” Ginny rose from the comfortable chair she had brought in from his library in which to keep vigil by his bedside.

Sitting up, he rubbed his face, his mouth dry as parchment. Ginny was there, handing him a glass of water, which he drank slowly, his hand shaking slightly.

Noting the slant of the morning sun coming into his bedroom through the plantation shutters, he recalled he was put to bed in the early afternoon.

“Have I been asleep for nearly twenty-four hours?” he asked, his voice cracking.

Suddenly noticing his bladder was full, Severus got up, feeling that his legs at least were working once again, and hurried off to the loo to relieve himself.

Ginny waited until he came back and sat back down on his bed before correcting him. “You've been asleep for nearly two days, Severus.”

Jumping up in a panic, he shouted, “My shop! The potions!” There were several potions he was working on for commissions that he was supposed to check on Saturday night and Sunday as well. He wondered if they had boiled dry over the weekend and his shop was ruined with smoke.

“Don't worry,” Ginny said. She put a hand on his shoulder urging him to sit down, seeing Severus' eyes become a little unfocused for a moment. “When Draco and I swung by here Saturday night, you were still asleep. Draco took your keys and extinguished the flames on all the potions that he could not finish himself, if you were still unwell. Sunday he finished up a few potions he could easily do himself, when we couldn't wake you yesterday. Today, Draco owled all your clients that their appointments were to be rescheduled at a later date, and told your students that tutoring was canceled. Everything is taken care of at the shop.”

Pulling out a playing card from her pocket, Ginny said, “Oh, I should let Draco and the others know you rose, Sleeping Beauty.” Taking her wand to the card, it set the other ones it was charmed to vibrate and flash, a trick taken from Draco's playing-card charm from Severus' first day in business.
Before Ginny even put her wand back in the loop on the side of her shorts, Rainbow Apparated directly into Severus' bedroom, ignoring the impropriety of such a rude gesture.

“You're awake!” Rainbow exclaimed with astonishment.

“Obviously,” Severus drawled.

Though he tried to play the incident off with nonchalance, it worried him he had been out for two days and with only a dream to recall. Then he remembered the dream, noting he rarely if ever remembered them, but this was fresh and not fading like most dreams did after waking. This was clear and vivid, as if it were a memory formed while he was awake.

Rainbow's wand went about hovering, flicking and swishing about Severus' person. She made a harrumphing grunt, still clueless about the cause of Severus' symptoms and extended sleep from which he could not be roused.

“How do you feel? The nausea? The stabbing pains? The dizziness?” the Healer asked as she held the tip of her wand up to Severus' eyes to check for dilation, which was hard to detect considering his eyes were black.

The unpleasantness he was feeling for the past couple days, the ones in which he was awake, had passed. He wasn't back to one hundred percent, but he was feeling much better. His appetite had even returned.

Severus heard the front door opening downstairs and the familiar sound of Draco's footsteps before he saw his friend come into his bedroom.

“Thank Merlin you're finally awake. Rainbow was about to ask for a Healer from San Francisco or Sydney to come and see what was wrong with you.” Draco went over to sit in the chair Ginny was occupying earlier. “Can you recall anything while you were passed out cold?”

Severus did not wish to share his dream, not with Ginny and Rainbow in the room. “Yes, it was nothing of consequence that made much sense,” he said with a dismissive wave of his hand that the matter was to be dropped. As if the words nothing of consequence could ever describe the night he killed his wife, or this new dream version with Hermione present and roles reversed.
Draco knew there was something more, but would not press it until later when they were alone.

“Well, what did you see?” Rainbow prodded. “Dreams can be highly symbolic and give us clues as to why you were not technically sick, but certainly in what Muggles would call a coma.”

Severus evaded the question by saying he was going to have some breakfast, since it still seemed to be morning.

Ginny insisted Severus sit and she would make him breakfast, but when he asked for sausages, eggs, beans, mushrooms, bacon, and buttered toast, she balked and decided she would leave rather than become nauseous by the smells of a proper English breakfast fry-up. Draco set about to cook breakfast while Ginny gave Severus a chaste kiss upon his forehead, saying she was glad he was better, before going back to her home.

Rainbow seemed to be done with her foolish wand-waving and asked Severus to drop by the clinic later that day.

Severus gave her a very ambiguous answer that was his polite way of declining while getting the witch out of his house as soon as quietly possible.

With just the two wizards in the house now, Severus said, “Impending fatherhood and you learned to cook. I'm impressed.”

“I surprise myself sometimes,” Draco admitted dryly. He pulled out the keys to Severus' shop and tossed them back to him. “I think you'll be needing these later when you're well enough to return to work.”

“Thank you for taking care of the potions while I was indisposed.”

“Thank you for not hexing the keys. I had to turn off the Wolfsbane Potion, as that is far above my skill level. I also turned off the latest batch of Sequoia and a few other ones that are noted with acronyms in the ledger, as I couldn't figure out what they were.”

The Wolfsbane Potion could coast for a few days without a flame, not affecting the quality in the end, but the Sequoia Potion and the other highly secretive and personal ones would have to be scrapped and started from the beginning again. The most he lost was a week on one of the potions, the rest would merely be completed a few days later than promised. He would have to owl his clients and inform them of the delay, and hope they still wanted him to fulfill his commissions.

Once breakfast was done, Severus told Draco to leave the dishes for the elf cleaning service, as he wanted to get back to the shop as soon as possible. Work was the greatest solution to avoid thinking about his dream of Hermione and the cold look in her eyes as she’d stared down at him as he lay in the mud. There was no compassion for him in her eyes. He hoped to never see that look in her eyes in real life ever, should they be reunited.

He knew Draco would question him about his dream, but the younger wizard had the good grace to not press the issue. Severus knew Draco would let him bring it up when he was at least a bit more comfortable to address it.

~~~~~~~*~

Trudging through the forest, Hermione wondered if she could ever find her way out of this endless night, as she wandered aimlessly. She tried to continue her search for Severus, but periodically had trouble remembering why she was looking for him. There were times she felt she was walking in circles, but even with marking the tree with her wand, she never crossed her own trail.

'What purpose is there to continue on. I've lost Severus, twice. Why make the effort?'

Hermione felt like giving up. Why bother trying to find a way out of the forest if she had failed in so many other ways. She had lost Severus, and not even cleared his name as she'd promised him.

Slumping against a tree and sliding down onto the damp, peaty soil, she began to cry. Had Death come to cross her path in this forest, she would have surely asked him for release from her pain and this fruitless enterprise.

'Fruit. Something about fruit...'

A wind picked up and brushed against her face, pulling her hair out of her eyes. The wind whistled through the trees and sounded almost like voices. Looking up to the sky, she saw the coming of the dawn as the sky began to lighten slightly.

As Hermione cracked open her eyes, she saw Ron sitting beside her bed, brushing her hair away from her face, a tissue in his hand, blotting away the tears that had escaped in her sleep.

He smiled down at her, circles under his eyes, his face tired. “We were worried we almost lost you.”

It took a moment for Hermione to realize that she wasn't just in a forest, but that it was only a dream. Recalling the events that proceeded her waking up in a hospital bed, Hermione bolted upright in bed. “Alan! Is he– Where...?”

Ron put his hand over her, patting it in a manner meant to assure her. “Harry got him. He's been sentenced to Azkaban, for life.”

Hermione flopped back down, her head hitting the pillow, relief flooding her that he was no longer a threat. At least for now. Others had escaped from Azkaban, so could he.

“Harry! I've got to tell him things Alan said–,” she began, bolting back upright in bed, but was stopped by Ron with a hand upon her shoulder to sit back in her bed.

“Harry got there right as you were regaining consciousness. He and Kingsley heard Alan's confessions to those murders, plus a few more he admitted to under Veritaserum later on.” Ron seemed to find this news of great comfort, but to Hermione it was anything but.

“If they were there, then why didn't they free me sooner? Why did Harry let that bastard nearly slice me in half? How long have I been out?” Hermione's mind began to fill with questions, her mind sharper than it had felt in a while, without the aid of potions.

“You were out for three days,” Ron said with great seriousness. “Albert said it might have been partly due to withdrawal from those potions you were taking, and partly making up for lost sleep, though nothing could rouse you, even once you were healed. No one could figure out why you wouldn't wake.”

Just then a Healer came into the room, staring with great disbelief that Hermione was awake. “You're up?”

There was a great flurry of activity, as the Auror, who had been guarding Hermione's room had one of the Healers send an owl to Harry that Hermione was finally awake. In addition, what seemed like half the staff of St. Mungo's filed through her room to ask her questions, wave wands about her face and body, and perform various other procedures to try to figure out the source of her prolonged sleep. They had ruled out Draught of Living Death within the first five minutes of her arrival that first night, but countless other tests were performed while she slept. Now that she was awake, they seemed intent on performing them all over again.

Harry finally arrived and rushed into the room. “I am so sorry he let him get that first hex in, but he kept talking on, bragging about crimes he either got away with or was never caught before. And given how he escaped justice before, I needed as much damning evidence as possible,” he began, knowing Hermione was wondering why he didn't save her sooner. He knew her well enough to predict exactly what she was going to ask him, given that she had seen him emerge from his Invisibility Cloak and knew he had probably been there in the room with them for a while.

“But why did you wait until after he hexed me? Why didn't you stop it?” Hermione asked, feeling as if Harry allowed her to be hurt to settle some Auror's score.

“He was faster than I anticipated, and given his rambling on and leisurely pace, I thought I would be able to block it in time or he'd start out with something less grievous. I'm so sorry I was wrong. But you're alive, thank God, and that hex alone secured his imprisonment in Azkaban, even without Alan's confessions to those other murders being allowed as evidence at the trial. It's iron-clad, he's going away for a long time, possibly forever.” Harry held her hand in assurance that she was safe. He left a great sigh escape and rested his forehead against their clasped hands, looking as tired as Ron.

After a while, Harry left with a promise to return later on with Zhubanysh, who had been very worried as well.

Ron stayed after Harry left.

“Did you come after practice?” Hermione asked.

“No, I haven't been to practice all week, not since...” Ron trailed off, unwilling to say what it was, an attempted murder. “I can still show up tomorrow and be ready for the game this weekend. Coach understood, considering the situation. You attack was mentioned in the Daily Prophet.”

Hermione groaned at the idea of being at the center of news yet once again. It was bad enough during the other times, most recently with her divorce from Ron, but the nephew of the Minister of Magic? Hermione assumed the Daily Prophet must have had a field day with that news, even with Minister Fudge's attempts to suppress the news.
There was an uncomfortable silence between them before Ron asked, “So, do you want to tell me about Snape?”

Hermione looked at Ron in shock that he had discovered. “How...?”

“You called out his name in your sleep.” Ron paused while Hermione gave him a guilty look and buried her face in her hands, unable to look him in the eye. “Lav told me how he was pretending to be Delgado and that you two had become... erm... close. And it seems Harry knew about it as well, since he didn't look shocked at all.”

Hermione and Ron talked for a while, about her own straying from her vows during the final months of their marriage. She also omitted details about the less savory aspects of Severus' work.

“I must admit, I was initially a bit upset when I found out, but for me to be angry over it would be extremely hypocritical of me,” Ron admitted, which shocked Hermione for him to admit that in such a mature fashion. “Thinking over it, since I found out yesterday, I thought back to that time we did that interview with Luna for The Quibbler. I remembered how you said if it was you who had fallen in love with someone else during our marriage instead of me, someone you had shared a deep connection with, then you hoped I would understand that you never meant to hurt me.”

There was another long stretch of strained silence between them, Hermione unable to find the words to respond to her own words recalled by Ron.

Ron leaned forward and patted her hand. “I couldn't understand at the time how you could forgive me so easily, but now I do. And I can't fault you for finding love yourself.” He sat back in his chair and raised his eyebrows in disbelief. “Granted, Snape would have been the last person I ever thought would have been the one, but if he and you...” He shook his head. “At least he loves you, at least by what Lav told me.”

“Used to,” Hermione corrected him, the tears welling in her eyes.

Before Ron could ask the meaning behind that comment, Hermione caught sight of a mounded basket of lemons on the dresser across the room, next to a couple bouquets of flowers.

“You brought lemons?” she asked.
“Yeah, the ones from the cemetery. You seemed so attached to them for some silly reason, I figured a basket of them to cheer you up would not be amiss.” Ron Summoned one with his wand and tossed it up and down in the air, the fruit making a soft thumping sound when caught. “Seems weird to have a lemon tree growing up out of Dumbledore's grave for no reason whatsoever. Wouldn't it be funny if Dumbledore somehow Transfigured these lemons from something after his death. Seems like something he'd do, the mad old codger.”

Hermione's head felt a rush of adrenaline, more powerful than when under captivity by Alan.

“I am a dunce, an absolute fucking dunce,” she said to herself. Turning to her ex-husband, she said, “Ron, you are brilliant, absolutely fucking brilliant.”

Ron shrugged, a little abashed at Hermione's exclamations about his brilliance, but unsure what she was going on about.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Fan Art by Kallie LeFavre (http://kallielef.deviantart.com/), commissioned by me. Hermione and Severus fleeing together in the dreamworld: https://67.media.tumblr.com/6174330af82b3b59a0915e0263aaa4c3/tumblr_ocy30qqIvz1ugsuuho1

~o0o~ END of SEASON III ~o0o~

Thank you to my fabulous betas for this chapter, JuneW and Cygnuz. Give a round of applause for all my betas that have worked so hard during “Season 3” to make my fic spiffy enough for reading: JuneW, Cytherea, Cygnuz, Hope and thegreyladies Lemons? Will we finally get some answers on these damn lemons finally? You bet!

Will Hermione ever come to learn of the floral mix-up that accidentally broke her heart? Will Severus figure out why he was in a coma for two days? Will Hermione and Severus ever be reunited? Will Draco make cassoulet without bread crumbs?

As Dory from “Finding Nemo” might say, “Just keep reading, just keep reading, just keep reading..."
“The Answer to All Your Questions Can Be Found in a Lemon Drop”

Chapter Summary

The lemon conundrum is solved.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

Chapter Ninety

“The Answer to All Your Questions Can Be Found in a Lemon Drop”

Disclaimer: It was a dark and stormy fanfic; the disclaimers fell in torrents, except at occasional omissions, when the author might have been nuded by a lawyer on behalf of J.K. Rowling which swept up reminded them (for Rowling owns Harry Potter), rattling along the fandom, and fiercely agitating the community to remind them that they need to disclaim any ownership of Harry Potter and its concepts.

A/N: Disclaimer a parody of Edward George Bulwer-Lytton's, Paul Clifford (1830)

==============

Hermione had been approaching the conundrum of the lemons from Dumbledore's gravesite from a Potions angle. So much for all her touting about tackling problems and solving them from a fresh Muggle-born perspective. She had fallen into the same trap other witches and wizards had when faced with a problem she had criticized in the past to Severus, solving them from the one perspective they were familiar with.

Dumbledore was first and foremost a Transfiguration master. Hermione had been working with Potions ingredients for so long, she forgot to approach this from a perspective of a different discipline. If she had taken a Transfiguration apprenticeship, she probably would have attempted this months ago, before Severus left. It was now obvious that Dumbledore Transfigured something into the lemons growing at his graveside. She just hoped it was what she suspected.

Grabbing her wand from the bedside table, she took the lemon from Ron's hand. With a great steadying breath, Hermione prayed she was right, though if she was, it meant no one at the Ministry had done any proper research into the mystery of the lemons at Dumbledore's graveside, or they had eschewed Dumbledore's propensity for simplicity and assumed it was some extremely complex spell to crack.

“Finite Incantatum.”

The lemon began spinning in her hand, expanding and changing shape until it rested in its final form. It was a book of some sort. Hermione was sure she had seen the book before, but reading over the cover, there was no mistake as to what she discovered.

“Fucking hell, is that Dumbledore's will?” An incredulous look Ron was utterly dumbfounded was clearly painted on his face.

“Yes, go get Harry now,” Hermione said, her heart beating faster. This was the key to helping secure Severus' freedom, in addition to the memories he'd left behind for her.

Now she recalled where she had seen this book before. It was laying on the bed right next to Dumbledore, placed on the far side where she could not get a good look at it as she had scrutinized every object in Severus' memories for clues. However, in the memory, it was not titled, meaning Dumbledore was still finishing it, knowing he had not much time left.

Reading quickly through the pages, she scanned for any mention of Severus or Draco's name, smiling as she began to read that section of Dumbledore's will where they were mentioned.

~~~~~~~*~

Rising with the sun, Severus had a cup of tea and some juice before going for his morning swim. It had been four weeks since his episode in the clinic and still unexplained sleeping incident. He was ordered to go one week without any flying or swimming, to make sure he didn't have a relapse.

Donning his swim trunks, a shirt, and his sandals, with a towel thrown over his shoulder, Severus walked towards the beach.

'Red dawn at morning; Flyers heed warning.'

The morning sky was lit with brilliant hues of crimson, scarlet, ruby, vibrant pinks, and cerise. The near glassy calm of the ocean foretold of the quiet before the storm. It was a sure sign a tempest was on the way, and it would be there by night.
The local paper had reported Hurricane Darby had dissipated four days ago. They'd be struck with a much milder tropical storm instead of a full-blown cyclone later that day, with some thunder, lightning, and gusts up to sixty miles per hour. Severus still had time to get a swim in before the storm even began to blow. Even the Quidditch games were still being held later that day with the impending weather until it was deemed unsafe.

Standing by the shoreline, Severus laid his towel over a log, pulled off his shirt, and kicked off his sandals. With a flick of his wand, he cast a small lighted buoy about half a mile out to sea; the buoy would guide him out, before he would turn around and head back. After the past three weeks resuming his routine, he was finally back up to swimming a mile a day out in open waters.

The warm tropical waters rose up his legs as he walked out. With his wand secured in a loop on his swim trunks, he dove into the placid waters of the ocean. It was much easier to swim, since the swells were nearly nonexistent as he swam stroke for stroke out towards the beacon.

As he reached the buoy which hovered a few feet above the waters, he turned around and began heading back towards shore. A wind began to gently blow at his back, and the sea began to rise and fall. Swimming with the swells that were starting to come, heralding the coming storm, Severus was glad he was heading back.

Toweling off, Severus saw the waters had begun to churn and turn choppy. He was lucky he got his swim in when he did, as any later it wouldn't have been prudent.

On the way home, he swung by the doughnut shop run by a Cambodian wizard, Kosal, and his Muggle wife, Chantou. The couple had escaped to Malu Palekaiko when the Khmer Rouge took over their country in the mid-1970's. The Cambodian Ministry of Magic wasn't subject to the whims of one Muggle government changing to another, but they were less than sympathetic to Kosal's pleas to save his wife from the tyranny of the Khmer Rouge, as she was subject to Muggle government rule. Malu Palekaiko had been the couple's home ever since. Though the Cambodian government had changed yet a few more times, this latest time to a monarchy ten years prior, they had no desire to return.

As Cambodia and Vietnam used to be French colonies, many French baking and cooking techniques had influenced the cuisines and Muggles of those countries. Severus found he actually preferred the Cambodian and Vietnamese style of pastries and desserts, compared to the actual French baking techniques. He found that they used less sugar, and their croissants weren't so brittle that he choked on the flakes of buttery dough when biting down on one. These were softer and had a little more chew to them than the ones back at the Twenty-Four Blackbird Bakery in Diagon Alley, which were authentically French. Draco had turned his nose up at Kosal and Chantou's croissants, but that didn't stop him from falling in love with their apple fritters and poi donuts with coconut glaze and chopped macadamia nuts.
Picking at his croissant as he walked home, unable to wait since he'd worked up an appetite with his swim, Severus wondered if he should have included his address in his note to Hermione. He was intensely curious as to how she liked her bouquet of flowers she'd received a month ago. Did he get them to her before she found another wizard to cast her affections upon? Or was she still just as in love with him as the day they parted?

This had been something which had weighed upon Severus' mind since the dream of Hermione looking at him with disdain and denying her ties to him. Granted, he was convinced it was his own mind putting him in the reverse role of a nightmare he had had off and on over the years. Still, it was disheartening to remember the look on her face, when all he could ever recall was the look of love and adoration she gave him during their brief time together.

Once he got home, Severus planned to shower and open up his shop for a few weekend appointments he had, and to check on some potions he had simmering over the weekend. It was Saturday, and later that day Severus was going over to the Malfoys' home to collect on his wager.

Draco was making cassoulet, per Severus' recipe. The Finaus were invited, since Mounga and Rainbow were quite curious about a dish which could cause the two friends to openly erupt into hostile glares and harsh words, and break out into a near duel. It was also going to be an early birthday party for Ginny, as well, since her birthday fell in the middle of next week when it would be harder for everyone to meet for dinner.

Severus already had her gift purchased and wrapped. When he was lost for ideas, Draco had given him some suggestions, and Severus bought her some fancy hair combs she had been secretly lusting after and denied buying for herself.

Yes, despite the awful weather that was to come, it was still going to be a lovely day. A supper of fine food, celebration with friends, and having Draco make good on finally fulfilling his bet they'd made in the bar over who could grow a thicker beard within a month. For good measure, Severus had kept the beard, as a subtle way to gently gloat. He went to the barber for regular trims to keep it looking well-groomed – nothing like the unainly, bushy mass Hagrid sported upon his face. Ginny even said it made his face more balanced.
Draco and Ginny had laid out their best tableware and linens. They had friends over for dinner occasionally, but those were usually casual affairs. Rarely was there an occasion – other than Christmas, Easter, and evidently Thanksgiving too, according to their American friends – for finery to be laid out and a formal dinner to be served.

Severus wore his best tropical wear – a fine pair of cream linen trousers, woven leather shoes in the same color, and a black, crisply pressed short-sleeved button-front shirt. For Hawaii, it was practically the same as wearing formal dress robes back in England.

The Finaus also wore their finest, with Rainbow in a formal floor-length floral muumuu of blue, yellow, and white. Mounga wore a multi-colored plaid sarong with golden threads woven in and a short-sleeved button-front shirt in a complimentary color with a matching plaid bow-tie, opting to leave the formal military-style jacket at home.

The first course consisted of pistachio, chevre, and baby spinach baked in a puff pastry, served with a light Gruner Veltliner. Severus appreciated the light mineral quality of the wine to counter the richness of the cheese. He was even more impressed to learn Draco was doing all the cooking that night, giving Ginny a much-needed break from the kitchen, and when asked, he admitted he wasn't using an elf service either. The one shortcut Draco took was the cake, which he'd ordered Mario to make. Draco had yet to work on his baking skills.

This was definitely a change from the Draco he used to know years ago. The head of the Malfoy family didn't seem quite so averse to cooking for himself and guests, as he now began to appreciate the glory of basking in the compliments of guests raving about one's cooking.

The second course was a soup made from roasted tomatoes. Severus knew this was Draco's silent, yet tactful, protest to the fact he was making cassoulet without tomatoes. There was a small amount of freshly chopped Thai purple basil and Italian green basil to add to the color of the course, accented with a swirl of white crème fraîche. It was paired with a Spanish Albariño, instead of a light red, as the salad course was next to cleanse the palate before the cassoulet.

As the conversation moved from the topic of Akela getting her driver's license while away at Muggle Camp that week to some of the newest island residents Severus and the Malfoys haven't had the chance to meet yet, there was a flash of lightning in the distance.
With that lightning strike, a witch appeared at the Malu Palekaiko Portkey office. She had taken a Portkey from San Francisco, since the idiots at the London Portkey office still had no clue where Hawaii or Malu Palekaiko were located, though that was a matter that would soon be rectified. Hopefully.

Marching into the tiny hut that was bigger on the inside, as fast as she could comfortably walk, the witch looked about for someone to help her.

A local witch with a long fall of brown hair and a name tag that said “Halulu” was filing away some papers when the newest arrival to the island cleared her throat.

“Excuse me, but I was wondering if you could tell me where I could find Severus Snape. He does live here on this island, right?”

Halulu put her papers down and came over to the counter. “Yes, but may I ask why you are searching for him?”

“Let’s just say he’s in big trouble,” Lavender said with great foreboding, a steely glint in her eye as she patted her swollen abdomen. It was obvious that she was close, if not already in her third trimester.

Lavender knew that gesture was highly misleading as to the nature of her visit, but she figured the gloves were off, and if this was a shortcut to get to see Severus face-to-face and give him a piece of her mind, then she was just fine with that. Besides, it was something a Slytherin would do, so he could probably eventually appreciate the resourcefulness of her tactics. Not immediately, but in time. Hopefully.

“He’s having dinner over at the Malfoys’ home.” Halulu's eyes were glued to the newcomer's abdomen, her face still slightly in a state of shock.

Mrs. Weasley knew exactly what Halulu was thinking, and the blonde didn't correct her assumptions.

“Draco and Ginny? Wonderful,” Lavender smiled sweetly, thankful this witch was willing to cooperate. “I’m sure they'll want to hear this too. I have some news for them from back home in England. If you’d be so kind as to give me directions to their house, I would greatly appreciate it.”
Lavender advanced up the street, in comfortable flat shoes and with a slight waddle. Her face had a grim scowl; the storm began to march onto the island right behind her as if she'd brought her own personal army with her. She was the harbinger of the cyclone coming to Malu Palekaiko.

“I must say, the substitution of giant granadilla instead of pear with the artichoke and shaved fennel was a delightful surprise. A wonderful marriage of European and tropical flavors,” Severus said with sincere praise.

It was a refreshing salad that hearkened to the original French salad which used pear as a sweet counterpoint to the other ingredients, and a perfect course to precede the cassoulet.

As Draco stood to clear the third-course dishes and Charm them to float into the kitchen before he served the cassoulet, there was a knock at the door.

Opening the door, Draco was stunned by the sight of Lavender standing on his front porch. He had not expected to see her, but before he could formulate any gracious salutation, he blurted the first thing that came to mind. “Merlin's bollocks, but you're very pregnant.”

Ignoring Draco's statement of the obvious, his old boss marched right in, turning her head from side to side to determine which hallway to walk down and confront the ungrateful twat who broke Hermione's heart.

Severus was swirling the last of the Cabernet Sauvignon Blanc that was served with the salad course, admiring the rosy color, when he noticed Rainbow quirking her head sideways to get a better look at the arrival of the newest guest.

Turning around in his seat, he saw Lavender standing in the door frame, a bouquet in her arms, looking very fecund.

“Miss Brown,” Severus said, just as startled as Draco at the sudden appearance of her upon the Malfoys’ doorstep.

“Mrs. Weasley,” she corrected him.

Severus blinked in slight surprise that Hermione’s ex-husband had made good on his promise. He was about to make a snide comment, asking if her new title was out of obligation for her condition, when Lavender marched right over to Severus, stuck out her arm, and spoke before he could casually cast his insult.

“Here, these are from Hermione.” She presented him with a bouquet of palm fronds and rudbeckia. As he took the bouquet, recognizing palm fronds symbolizing victory and rudbeckia for justice, she added, “And this is from Hermione as well.”

There was a loud crack as Lavender’s palm made contact with Severus’ face.

Rainbow leaned over and said quietly to her husband while staring at Lavender’s swollen midsection, “Did Severus leave a ‘package’ back in England that he didn’t know about?”

Mounaga wanted to tell his wife to shut it, but he didn’t have time as the fight erupted between Severus and this pregnant witch.

“What was that for?!?” Severus asked as he stood up from his chair, angry and confused as to why he was being assaulted with no clue what he had supposedly done wrong.

“Really? You want me to say it in front of your guests? Fine!” she huffed with righteous indignation. “How dare you dump Hermione that way, with that horrible bouquet you sent her. You positively broke her heart.”

“Wait! WHAT?” he thundered back, now even more befuddled by her comment. He put the bouquet on the table in order to not crush them with his rising anger. “I sent her a positively lovely bouquet, dripping with all those syrupy sentiments any witch would gush over!”

Rolling her eyes in dramatic fashion, Lavender countered, “Really? Abatina, laurel cherry, bilberry, fish geranium, and – the kicker – michaelmas daisy. And let’s not forget the St. John’s Wort for animosity.”
Severus stood there for a moment, quiet and still, but the seething rage behind his eyes told that his mind and emotions were anything but.

Very slowly and quietly, Severus ground out, “I told Naomi, NO SUBSTITUTIONS!”

There was a second Draco could have sworn fire was coming out of Severus' nostrils.

Breathing heavily, in order to stop himself from having a temper tantrum of epic proportions in the middle of the Malfoys' dining room, Severus began listing, “Cochorus for 'impatience of absence,' flowering almond for 'hope,' oak-leaved geranium for 'true friendship,' spindle tree for 'your charms are engraved on my heart,' and forget-me-nots. That's what I ordered, not this... travesty you listed.”

“Yeah, right” Lavender snorted with disbelief. “And what about that photo of you and that bimbo, Blanche, that Hermione and I saw of you in Obscure Oozes & Fabulous Fluids?”

Severus had to think about how an article meant for All About Apothecaries had wound up in that publication, then remembered that publication collected and republished stories from journals all over the world. He'd had no clue it would have wound up in a magazine that might be read in England.

“What was Hermione to think? The same day we get that magazine, your bouquet shows up at the office.” Lavender was still not convinced of Severus' professed innocence.

“Did you or Hermione ever think to ask perhaps the bouquet was the wrong one?” he asked through gritted teeth, getting into Lavender's face in a confrontational manner.

“Your damn note came with it! Your initials, your handwriting!”

“Then they attached it to the wrong damn bouquet!” he insisted. Thinking about it for a moment, all those flowers Lavender listed in the bouquet Hermione received would look very, very similar to the one he'd intended her to receive.

“You want proof?” Severus asked, folding his arms across his chest.
“That would be good for starters. And you didn't deny our guess about that bleached blonde bint, Blanche,” she added.

“She's a business partner, and I would no sooner sleep with her than I would with you. Or do you forget I turned down your offer for me to shag you years ago?”

As for Rainbow's little aside about Severus being the father of Lavender's baby, Mounga gave his wife a smug smile that she shouldn't jump to conclusions.

“You offered proof? I'm waiting,” Lavender said with hostile disdain, still not convinced.

The cassoulet had to wait while there was a march of six people, Severus in the front dragging Lavender by the hand as fast as she could dodder along, down the three blocks and one block over to Naomi’s house. Mounga held his wand high above the group, casting a large Parapluie Charm to shield everyone from the rain that had begun to fall.

Pounding on the front door with his fist, Severus bellowed, “Naomi!”

The young witch ran to the front door and threw it open. “Don't bust it down. What's got your panties in a twist, Severus?”

“The bouquet that I spent considerable sums of money for you to order arrived. And I specifically said no substitutions. Instead, everything was substituted. Explain yourself.”

Naomi saw that there was a whole host of people on the large front porch, including the town judge, his wife, and the Malfoys, in addition to a witch she didn't recognize who was very pregnant. Naomi wondered if this witch by Severus' side was Hermione, considering what a romantic bouquet it was he'd sent her.

With her wand, Naomi Summoned the order slip and handed it over to Severus. “There. I did exactly as you paid me to do. Right there on the order, in big letters. 'No substitutions.' Happy now?” She crossed her arms and raised an imperious brow at Severus for banging on her front door and accusing her of screwing up her job.
Looking over the slip, it was exactly as he'd ordered, but Hermione had still received the wrong bouquet.

Turning to Lavender, with Naomi still there at the door eager to watch the exchange, Severus asked, “Did you think to go to the florist to see if there was a mistake?”

Now looking a bit more contrite, Lavender shrugged her shoulders. “What was Hermione to think? She thought you’d found out about her and Neville.”

Severus' face got very somber for a moment. “What about her and Longbottom?”

“Oh, bugger.” She hadn't meant for that to slip.

Rainbow decided to add the comment, “Well, Severus, it's not like you were any more chaste that time with Maria.”

Mounga really wanted to spell his wife's mouth shut, but continued to watch this train wreck of misunderstandings and tragic mix-ups unfold. He just hoped it was fixable.

In order to defend himself against the accusatory look growing in Lavender's eye, Severus said, “It was one time, and I instantly regretted it.”

“Well, that makes two of you, because Hermione has been wracked with guilt over that one time with Neville. So I guess you're both even.” Lavender made a great huff, now without any more ammunition to eviscerate Severus.

She had been thinking about the long tirade of anger she would unleash on him, but it now seemed that it was nothing more than a mix-up with no one but the people at the florist shop at fault, and some poorly-timed assumptions.

“Can we take this back to the house?” Draco prompted. “There is a cassoulet still waiting to be served, and I'm sure Lavender has more news from England she would like to share, other than catastrophic floral mix-ups.” Turning to his former employer – and hopefully future employer – again, he asked, “Would you care to join us for dinner?”
As much as Severus had been looking forward to this cassoulet for weeks, it had lost all flavor to him. Severus was still upset, contemplating of the pain Hermione was in thinking he had dumped her, and with a bouquet of flowers no less. Not to mention, he had feelings of jealousy imagining Hermione and Longbottom in bed, which brought up the guilt of his time with Maria. He could not savor the marriage of flavors in the dish, nor tell Draco he had made a cassoulet as fine as any Severus had ever made.

Over the main course, Lavender told everyone at the table about how Hermione had not only discovered Dumbledore's long sought-after will, but also took her case in front of the Wizengamot to grant Severus and Draco a full exoneration. Mounga offered the use of his Pensieve back in his judge's chambers when Lavender offered her memories of the trial for viewing.

Handing Severus and Draco each one of the famous lemons she'd brought along, she said, "Hermione and I both agree that Ron summarized the situation the best. 'Figures a wizard who would hide the Philosopher's Stone in a way a first-year wizard accidentally found it in his pocket would wind up giving hints about his will with a bad pun on his gravestone. Then the will would be solved with a spell covered in second year. So clever, only incredible dumb luck or incredible brilliance to stumble upon the simplicity to reveal it would be needed.'"

Though Severus thought Ronald Weasley to be rather dim, it was an astute observation.

The ex-Death Eaters both cast the spell, and their lemons turned into copies of Dumbledore's will.

Mounga was rather impressed, as that was the cleverest and most obscure way to hide one's will he'd ever had the chance to see in all his years in law.

They agreed, with the exception of Rainbow who didn't care to watch legal proceedings, to meet at the courthouse and view Lavender's memories the next day.
Dessert was served, gifts were given to the guest of honor, and the evening eventually came to an end. Mounga and Rainbow wished Ginny a happy birthday and expressed their regrets to Lavender that they didn't initially meet under a more pleasant situation. Before they left, Mounga took Lavender aside to speak privately.

Meanwhile, Draco and Severus cleared away the rest of the dishes. Ginny was suddenly overcome with a bout of fatigue and excused herself for a quick lie-down.

Draco walked the Finaus to the door and bid them goodnight, but not before they gave him another round of praise for his cooking and congratulations on being exonerated back home.

Lavender asked about local lodgings, since her plans had suddenly changed and she was staying for part of the week. Draco offered their guest bedroom, as it would give Ginny and her a chance to yammer on about pregnancy matters, and give Draco a sample as to what to expect living with a very pregnant witch.

“If you came here, but didn't expect to stay, what changed your itinerary?” Severus asked, while reclining on the couch.

Lavender, ensconced in a comfortable upright chair that was kind to her aching back, replied, “Well, I'm no longer averse to being in the same hemisphere with you, now that I know it was a mix-up and not your intent to hurt Hermione.”

Severus noted it was quite the ironic phrase for her to say, considering the history behind her involvement in her own love triangle with Hermione.

Draco noticed how Lavender phrased her answer. It had been their intent to keep their plans – for Lavender to open an Asia-Pacific office with Hermione as the head – a secret until later, when they would spring it on him as a surprise. He just hoped no other things would happen that would ruin this from moving forward.

Glancing over her shoulder down the hallway, Lavender wondered if Ginny should be present, but decided it might be best for Draco to figure out a way to break the news to her. But with Draco and Severus, she wouldn't varnish the truth.

“Hermione came upon the idea of how Dumbledore hid his will while she was recovering at St.
Mungo's,” she began, but stopped when the cup of coffee in Severus' hands fell and shattered on the teak wood floor.

Draco cleaned it up with a swish of his wand.

“St. Mungo's? What was she doing there? Did she have a Potions accident?” Severus asked with great concern, panic creeping into his voice despite trying to remain calm.

Suddenly overcome with emotions, recalling the events, her hormones making her unable to remain calm, Lavender put her forehead in her hand. With her voice thick and trying to restrain her sobs, she said, “Alan Parker abducted Hermione, but Harry and Kingsley barely got there in time to save her.”

Severus and Draco were both in shock. They knew Alan Parker's name too well, having attended the murder trial of Pansy Parkinson. They loathed how the Daily Prophet's coverage of the trial hid Parker's name, only listing him as the “alleged murderer” or “possible suspect.”

In very slow and measured tones, Severus asked, “If Potter and Kingsley got there in time, why did she need to recover in the hospital?”

“Because the psychotic murderer kept rambling on and on and on about his other crimes besides Pansy's murder, including—” Lavender stopped upon realizing that the two probably hadn't heard the news.

“Who else did he kill?” Draco prompted her.

“Blaise.” She broke down in tears.

Draco conjured a handkerchief for the near-hysterical witch.

Draco didn't want to cry, but he did, upset over the death of another old classmate of his at this murderer's hands.

“Parker confessed to poisoning many others, too,” she added, in between the hitching of her breath.
It's not that Lavender had any sympathy for those dead Death Eaters, but she was caught up in all the emotions of the moment.

Draco shook his head. “He was the one who must have poisoned Goyle then,” he assumed. He never imagined the wizard who'd mangled Pansy's body so gruesomely was the same one who had poisoned his old friend.

Severus was shattered. So many of his former students, witches and wizards once under his charge, gone by the hands of this monstrosity. And to think Hermione suffered by his malignancies as well – it nearly undid him at that moment.

“You haven't finished telling me why they allowed that butcher to put Hermione in St. Mungo's,” Severus prompted her again.

“One of the reasons why the sick bastard got off at Pansy's trial was for the fact that Moody wouldn't force him to take Veritaserum to confess. And Parker professed his innocence during her murder trial. But when he had Hermione, he kept rambling on and on about all the things he had done, gloating about them. The longer he went on, the more evidence Harry and Kingsley knew they would have to make sure he would never get out of Azkaban again, despite all the tricks he used to interfere with his first trial. What neither of them, especially Harry, counted on is Parker started out with such a lethal hex so quickly to begin with, considering how he bragged about watching the ones he poisoned die slowly, and the way that he was carefully methodical in his murder of Blaise and Pansy. Harry thought he could have stopped him before Parker cast the first hex, but at least stopped him once it was cast and then Harry saved Hermione.”

Severus recalled he promised Potter that should any harm come to Hermione, he'd strongly consider coming back to England to finish what the Dark Lord did not. But both Potter and Kingsley did what Severus would have done, gathering evidence and waiting for a moment to strike. As much as he wanted to personally kill Potter himself, he was thankful Potter had the evidence to bring this serial killer to justice. He was torn between heartfelt gratitude and seething anger at Potter. He was also feeling conflicted towards his old Order friend, Kingsley, as well.

“And the trial?” Draco asked, hoping it wasn't another farce like the one he and Severus attended for Pansy's murder.

“It was quick,” Lavender said with some bitter-sweetness in her voice. “They wanted to keep it out of the papers. And then there were other factors to rush it along that they wanted to keep quiet. Like the fact Alan Parker is Calpurnia Fudge's nephew. Harry also had a confession from Alan that he had blackmail material on the Chief Warlock, Rancelette. All that was reported was Hermione was attacked and survived. Everything else was a whitewash in the papers.”
Draco let out a groan of desperation, wondering if this could get any worse. For all the joy the pair of wizards should have felt that they were free, it seemed like such a heavy price to pay with this new news.

Lavender finished by saying, “Parker was tried and convicted to life in Azkaban without parole before Hermione even woke up three days later.”

“Three days she was out?!?” Severus screamed. “I thought you said Potter got to her right after that hex and saved her?”

“He did!” Lavender shouted back hotly. “She was healed very quickly, and she should have woken right away, but she was so strung out on Invigoration Draughts and Wit-Sharpening Potion, she went through some very heavy withdrawal. Albert was able to counter the withdrawal easily enough the first day, but we just couldn't understand why she didn't wake for three days. Not even the Healers at St. Mungo's could figure out why she couldn't wake. No poisons, no charms, no cursed items,” she listed off.

“Wait, what?” Draco asked, recognizing that listed of crossed off items. “When was Hermione kidnapped?”

Lavender had to stop and think for a moment, the past month a jumble of so many events, and the hormones from her pregnancy were affecting her normally sharp memory. “Erm... It was a Saturday night. If I remember correctly, the day right after the wrong vase of flowers was delivered on Friday the... ninth. Yes, flowers on the ninth, and kidnapped the night of the tenth. Just before midnight.”

Severus and Draco exchanged glances, wondering if it was just mere coincidence Severus was passed out for two days at the same time, with none of the Healers on the island able to discern why he couldn't wake either, or if it was something more.

Lavender missed the exchange between the two, given she was sobbing into her handkerchief, remembering the events and overcome with emotion once more.

Severus wondered if somehow Hermione and he shared some sort of dream experience, both adding their psyches to some ethereal existence. It would explain the look of cool detachment and loathing in her eyes when she stared down at him down in the mud. But despite everything, she could not kill him as bid. In the dream, she fought to save him, choosing a different course of action from the one he'd chosen in real life years ago. If Severus had defied the Dark Lord that night long ago and tried to save his wife, fighting his way out the way Hermione did with him in the dream, he and Gabrielle would have both surely died. Even Hermione admitted as much to him when he confessed to her about his wife's murder.

The bouquet and the magazine article made Hermione think he was casting her aside so easily; it was why she looked at him the way she did, if indeed they both shared the same dream together.

“It was good that you and Draco escaped England when you did,” Lavender went on. “He admitted to knowing who you both were, and had seen Hermione come and go to your flat Severus, several times. He was targeting both of you to satisfy some twisted plan to kill Death Eaters so people could go back to hating Muggleborns without feeling guilty about it. If Death Eaters were no longer around to remind everyone else about the war, then he thought people could easily slip back into old prejudices.”

Severus could take no more. The flowers, Blaise's murder, Hermione kidnapped and injured, her heart broken, the timing of their prolonged sleep, blackmail, stalking. It was too much.

Without speaking, Severus rose and stormed out of the room. The slamming of the front door signaled he had left, unable to bear listening to any more for now.

The storm was beginning its brutal assault upon Malu Palekaiko. Leaning against the wind, he staggered up the street back to his own home in order to seek solace in solitude. Not even bothering to cast a Parapluie Charm, Severus paid no mind to how the rain soaked him to the skin on the short walk home. He was physically numb to the sensation of the weather assaulting him.

Mindlessly ambling into his house, ignoring the mud and water he tracked over his clean floors, he stood and looked about his home. This house was built in hopes Hermione would join him some day. He felt confined and restricted by a house that now seemed far too large and far too empty for him to stand living in anymore. Severus had to get out of his home.

The shock of Lavender's news began to fade and was replaced with a seething anger at the world. Climbing up the steps to the back garden that had been recently cleared of growth, he stood defiantly, his face turned upwards against the wind and rain that pelted his face. Fists clenched by his side, he looked up at the tenebrous clouds, wondering why the Fates had picked him.

“WHY?” he bellowed at the sky. “WHY?!!?”
Why did every woman Severus had ever felt any feelings towards been hurt, usually resulting in death. Lily, his first crush, killed by the Dark Lord because of the prophecy he’d overheard and relayed to his first master. Gabrielle, his wife, killed by his own hands because he’d had to choose between being a Death Eater and remaining alive, or choosing her and their child who would have still died shortly after him if he’d chosen differently. Now Hermione, the only one he had ever truly and deeply loved, abducted and nearly killed because of her association with him.

Severus fell to his knees, sinking into the sodden muck of freshly-turned soil. Falling forward, he began to beat the ground with his fists, screaming with futility at the life he had been dealt.

Sitting back upon his heels, he turned his face upwards and screamed with frantic violence, “WHY! WHY!!!” as he grabbed fistfuls of the iron-rich volcanic soil and began to beat his fists against his chest.

His screams were no longer questioning, but challenging to the pointless cruelty of the universe targeting him and him alone, like some sadistic child pulling wings from a fly.

Severus' screams were answered with a crack of lightning and roll of thunder in the distance.

In response to the universe's answer, he screamed back in anger, a formless shout for the lightning to come and take its best shot at him since he didn't care anymore.

The lightning followed the call and response with another bolt and boom, this time a bit closer.

Unable to bear the burden of knowing Hermione now hated him and he was, in his mind, the cause of her near death, a madness began to overtake Severus' normally sensible mind.

He and he alone was death to anyone he was close to.
His screams began to morph into wails, and Severus began to cry pitifully. Hands caked in muck, he palmed his face like a lunatic, smearing mud all over himself as he sobbed hysterically. It made no sense and neither did Severus anymore.

Somewhere in his grief-stricken and unhinged mind, Severus came upon the idea that maybe if he wasn't around anymore, maybe Hermione would no longer be in danger. The more his temporarily twisted mind analyzed the logic of it, the more it seemed sound at the time. He would offer himself up to the Fates, the gods, or whoever it was pulling the strings of his life in order to save Hermione. She deserved to live far more than he did. He was death made manifest, killing all those who got too close to him.

Hauling himself up out of the mud, he held his wand aloft and yelled, “Accio Peregrine!”

Severus' broom flew out of its cupboard and through the back door he'd left open. He mounted his broom, lifting off with a burst of speed fueled by his anger and determination.

Buffeted by the winds that were gusting stronger and stronger as the heart of the cyclone approached, Severus flew south and east, into the storm. He would fly into the vast Pacific until he could fly no more and let the ocean swallow him up, making himself an offering to the gods or the Fates, whoever would accept his offer. His sacrifice would hopefully be enough to appease them or it, and let Hermione live. Perhaps with his death, the ties which bound her to his cursed self would be severed, and she would be set free from future harm. Severus was bargaining for her life with his offered in her stead.

As Severus passed the three-mile marker buoys, delineating the boundaries of where the magic of the island once protected him, the intensity of the storm continued to increase.

Pele really liked Severus – not enough so that she'd take him as a consort, but he was a very respectful wizard who honored her properly. He brought her the nicest and freshest offerings, and had even been kind to her on that mountain trail. She didn't want him to go off and kill himself over a bit of a misunderstanding and bad luck. As goddess of not only volcanoes, but also wind and lightning, she used her powers to try to help Severus return to Malu Palekaiko instead of offering himself up as a sacrifice to her sister, Nāmaka, the sea goddess.
Severus was barely making headway against the winds that seemed to increase in their fierceness, as if trying to push him back home, but he soldiered on, determined to go out into the vastness of the watery desert to meet his death.

A bolt of lightning came down right in front of him, and he swerved as best he could, despite the fact that by the time he reacted the bolt was gone. Now on a new vector, another bolt of lightning struck closer to him, nearly causing him to lose his grip, but he held tight. It seemed as if the lightning was striking in a way to stop him from reaching his destination beyond.

Leaning forward, he urged his broom onward, faster, when a twin strike of lightning came down just off the tip of his broom and blinded him temporarily. Blind and off-balance, his ears echoing from the thunder's deafening crack, he barrel-rolled and splashed down into the ocean.

The swells of the churning and angry ocean tossed Severus about at its whim. He was still close enough he could barely discern the island in the far distance lit up by flashes of lightning. He floated to the top of a swell before a waved crashed over him, submerging his head under the water. As he popped back up, his head breaking the surface of the water, he barely had a chance to catch his breath before another swell rose and fell, causing another white-capped wave to crash over his head, pushing him down beneath the waves once again. His lungs fought for air as the salty water slammed against his face, forcing him to swallow and inhale the sea.

Severus realized this is what he'd flown over the ocean to do, to surrender to nature, to bring release to his suffering and protect Hermione from danger. As he stopped treading water, the ocean greedily took its offering. The current's cold claws pulled him down deeper and deeper into its inky, crushing oblivion, like some great unseen beast about to devour him in its obscurely fathomless maw.

His water-logged lungs were hurting, but he found he could not exhale and finally let go, as if there was some spiritual cord tied to the center of his being that would not let him slip away. With the increasing pressure around his ribs, his chest burned and his heart felt like it would nearly burst as it thundered with each beat in his chest.

Suddenly, Severus was overcome with an urge to live.
The ex-Death Eater had not survived two wars and years in fear of the Dark Lord to finally give up when he was finally free from his servitude. He had not given up after the Death Eater Decree took his freedom from him once more. Alan Parker had been stalking him in hopes of killing him someday before he escaped, and Severus would not die to satisfy Parker's plans. Hermione, despite her loathing of him, had not fought to clear his name only to have him kill himself in a moment of grief-stricken madness.

Severus kicked against the pull of the current that was trying to drag him still deeper into its bottomless depths. Each kick of his legs was a fight against the vast ocean pressing down from above, trying to keep him submerged. Each stroke towards the surface was his hand reaching out towards the need to see Hermione again.

Breaking the surface of the water, he expelled the air from his lungs and breathed in the sweetness of life, even if it felt like there was an iron band about his chest as he coughed and sputtered. Reaching for his wand which was still secured in the loop on the side of his pants, Severus lifted his arm above the water to summon his broom when another waved crashed over his head, knocking his wand from his hand.

Another wave crashed over him, just as he rose to the surface once more. He could not see his wand in the dark of the night, as it was masked by the choppy waters. He did see another familiar stick of wood. With all his might, he swam against the current and grasped onto his broomstick.

Once mounted upon it, the swells rose and fell about him knocking him over a few times as Severus tried to kick up out of the water. He failed the first two times, but succeeded by the third and shot up out of the water, just as Iakona, Mouna's son, had taught him. Circling about, he spotted his wand amid the flashes of lightning, being tossed about the waves. He scooped down, picking it up out of the water, securing it once more.

Now determined to live, Severus began to fly back towards the island, but the fiercest part of the storm was directly over his head.

Severus was nearly pushed from his broom twice by the gusts and torrential downpour that seemed to come at him sideways, stinging his face and skin through the fabric of his slightly torn clothes, as it pelted him.

Exhausted, he strove on towards shore that was now even harder to see through the sheets of water that obscured his view.

Unable to determine exactly where he was flying towards, he just kept heading towards the island that jutted from the sea in front of him like an undefined black mass against more blackness of the sea.

He saw that he was flying directly towards a spot nicknamed “Chum Reef” for the sharp rocks and coral that would chop you up if you were unlucky enough to get caught in those swirling waters.

As Severus was nearing shore, a sense of relief washed over him. He had made it back, and his grip loosened. A bolt of lightning struck the tip of Severus' broomstick and the handle shattered, stunning Severus.

A limp figure fell towards the reef below, the ocean eager to welcome back the prize it had temporarily lost.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Evil cliffie! MUWAHAHAHA!

I have commissioned Perselus/Patricia Demoraes (http://perselus.deviantart.com/) to do a piece of fan art to go with this chapter, "Madness", which is embedded in the story above. You can view it here:
https://65.media.tumblr.com/6fd0f6fb80e72abb5a3cc51a15994fc4/tumblr_oczsdi4odj1ugsuuho1_1.

Big round of thanks to JuneW and Cygnus, my beautifully talented betas.

Technically, Hurricane Darby dissipated officially on August 1, 2004. Its remnants, a tropical cyclone, hit the Hawaiian Islands on Wednesday, August 4, 2004 with 2.61 inches falling in Honolulu that day, a new record, but for the purpose of this story, I fudged it by a few days. I do like to keep my astronomical and weather records as accurate as possible for my readers, though.

Yeah, Yeah, I know I said no new canon from HBP or DH, but inclusion of Severus overhearing the prophecy works too well not to include in this chapter.
"The Heart Has Reasons That Reason Does Not Understand"

Chapter Summary

Hermione finally rests. Severus recovers and has a chance to view Lavender's memories of Hermione in front of the Wizengamot.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Ninety-One
"The Heart Has Reasons That Reason Does Not Understand"

Disclaimer: This is a work of fan fiction using characters from the Harry Potter world, which is trademarked by J. K. Rowling.

============

With the slam of the front door, Ginny awoke from her nap to discover Severus was gone and Lavender and Draco were in tears. The next half hour was spent filling Ginny in on the news of Hermione and all that had happened.

While processing all that she had learned, still breaking into uncontrollable sobs periodically, Ginny was overcome with a moment of panic. "Draco, remember that time right after Hermione and Ron's anniversary dinner and what Severus did to his flat?"

Draco immediately understood where his wife was going with her line of questioning. Severus now had access to a fully-stocked Potions lab in his house. Who knew, in a moment of rage and despair, what he might do.

Apparating directly from the living room, Draco wound up on Severus' front porch. The front door was left open, the cyclone blowing the door back and forth, slamming it against the wall to bounce back, then get caught by another gust of wind to slam fully open once more.

"Severus? SEVERUS!"
Draco saw the muddy, wet footprints tracked through the house and to the back door. That door was also left open, opening and closing with the pressure of the winds now blowing through the house.

Running out into the pelting rain, his wand casting a bright light, he called Severus' name out into the gale several times more. His only reply was the wind howling back at him.

Back inside the house, he began rushing upstairs to Severus' Potions lab, but stopped short when he noticed the door to the broom cupboard was hanging open, the latch busted. There were a few twigs from the broom swirling about on the floor with the breeze blowing through the house.

Draco didn't have to ponder. He knew Severus must have taken his broom and flown off in the middle of a cyclone.

A pounding on the front door brought Mouna rushing to see what the urgency was about. Without words, a very sodden and shaken-looking Draco told him something was amiss.

---*

She was sure she was going to go mad.

Since recovering from her kidnapping, assault, and still unexplained prolonged sleep, Hermione had continued on with her work for Lavender and her apprenticeship with Albert, in addition to pulling together a case to petition the Wizengamot and Ministry of Magic for a full pardon and exoneration of Severus and Draco. It seemed that even the publishing of Dumbledore's will – explicitly stating their innocence – was not enough to grant them any clemency until Hermione brought the case before the court.

Now the flurry of activity was over, Albert ordered his apprentice to one day of full rest. Hermione was under wand-oath orders to not pick up a book, not study, not brew unless it was for urgent personal necessity, and to relax for one full day. The Potions master had seen other apprentices of his colleagues snap over the years from trying to do too much, and Hermione had nearly done the same. He even urged her to visit her parents, given that she had yet to explain to them about her ordeal. Despite having made a promise to her Aunt Christine to tell them, she had been putting it off for over three weeks.

Aunt Christine had not found out about Hermione's adventures and trip to St. Mungo's until the Friday after everything happened, still not having gotten around to getting a subscription to the Daily Prophet. Upset that she and Hermione's parents were not kept in the loop except from what they gleaned from the paper about the attack, it didn't soothe her much either when she found out the news was kept from them at Hermione's insistence until she could discuss it with them later. Hermione's parents seemed to treat this as par for the course, given there was little about the war she had told them. Unable to share many unpleasant things, Hermione preferred to keep her parents in the dark.

The legal proceedings finished on Friday, with judgment handed down by the Wizengamot less than an hour later for all that she sought in her claim.

Now it was Sunday morning. Hermione figured Lavender was probably in Malu Palekaiko, giving Severus the bouquet she'd bought for him, along with a good slap across the face for what he did to her, in addition to the good news of his exoneration.

"Fish geranium. Disappointed expectations, my arse! That'll show him," she huffed into her mug of tea.

It wasn't just to spite Severus' particular floral choice, but she still felt an obligation to clear his and Draco's name, just as she'd promised. Justice was justice, and right was right, no matter how much she thrilled at the little fantasy of Lavender returning from Hawaii with Severus' balls in a jar. However, that little scenario didn't hold as much allure for her as it did a month ago.

In the month since her attack and recovery, Hermione had gone off the unwise regimen of potions which kept her working far harder and longer than was prudent. Now, with her mind no longer oscillating between the extremes of frantic activity and muddled dubiety, she had time to think about the flowers Severus had sent her.

The note was not laced with any vile jabs or scathing remarks. Read alone, without the bouquet, it seemed sincere and hopeful, despite the few words used. And Severus was not a man to easily switch allegiances. This was a wizard who had stayed true to Dumbledore as his spy out of honor and obligation, despite having the option to taking the easier and less dangerous path. Hermione had granted him his passage to escape, so why he would send a bouquet filled with such hostile intent was beyond her. It seemed uncharacteristic. Then again, the way he'd verbally gutted her during that misunderstanding the day after her anniversary dinner, he was a man who could feel viscerally if he thought he was betrayed. Maybe he did feel betrayed with her encounter with Neville; though how Severus learned of it, she still could not fathom.

Lavender was to return either Thursday or Friday, having gone to scout for possible locations other than Hawaii for the Asia-Pacific facilities. Hermione would know by the end of the week if all of this was as she originally thought, or if this was somehow another tragic misunderstanding between them. The former seemed like the more probable of the two.
Finishing her tea, Hermione decided that since she was banned from studying and even the pleasure of reading, except for the day’s newspaper, she might as well go visit her parents, and her aunt and uncle, bringing them up to speed on all that had happened, or at least the parts that she was willing to share. Her stomach was feeling unsettled more and more, and she chalked it up to her nervousness of confessing during her visit.

~~~~~~~*~

There was a murmur of voices that sounded more like the buzzing of insects. It was bothersome enough that it woke Severus. Now awake, he could discern who was speaking.

"Is Uncle Severus going to be alright?" Akela asked, her voice filled with concern.

"Yes, but you mustn't tell anyone what happened," Rainbow cautioned her daughter. "We don't need rumors swirling about him being mad for flying off into the middle of a lightning storm."

Severus found humor in Rainbow's warning, given she was the biggest town gossip around. He began to chuckle at the absurd hypocrisy of it, but groaned when his chest seized with pain.

"He's up. Get your father and the others," Rainbow said urgently as she rushed back into the room.

Cracking an eye open, Severus saw that he was in the Finaus' guest bedroom, and missing his regular clothes. Somehow, he was in his own nightwear, sans a shirt, though he was missing the memory of how he arrived there.

"Severus? Can you hear me?" Rainbow asked.

"Yes, yes," he said peevishly as he attempted to sit up and decided that that was a bad idea.

"Good, then my spells to repair your ruptured eardrum worked. Any ringing in your ears?" she asked as her wand waved about his face and chest.

"No," he began to reply, but then the ringing began. "Wait, yes, a bit. Right now."
Rainbow swished her wand about and gave Severus a vial of something to drink, which made the ringing disappear.

Draco, Ginny, Lavender, and Mouna all tried to fit into the guest bedroom, along with Rainbow, so Ginny decided to wait out in the hallway and peer in instead.

Mouna conjured chairs for all to sit around the bed. He gave his wife a nod, which she took as her cue to leave them alone for a while. Ginny came in and closed the door.

"Care to share with us what you were thinking when you decided to go flying on one of the worst days of the year to do so?" the huge wizard asked his friend.

"I wasn't thinking." Severus closed his eyes, recalling why he was laid up in the guest bedroom at the Finaus'.

Normally, he probably would have been brought to the clinic, but Mouna probably told his wife to bring him to their home to keep things quiet while treating him, given Rainbow's previous statement.

"Draco filled me in," Mouna began, "and I can understand why you'd be upset, but – right when you have gained your freedom Hermione promised she would do, the one task that was the reason why she remained behind in England as you told me – why on God's green earth would you do something as foolish as fly off into a cyclone? Why? I know you're not a rash person, just tell me what you were thinking."

Severus looked at his friend and wanted to tell him. "Lavender, Ginny. If you could please step outside. Draco, you may stay."

Once the two witches had left and the door was shut, Mouna put up a Silencing Spell to avoid any eavesdropping.

"In a moment of madness it all made sense," Severus confessed, his eyes glassy and distant. "If I offered myself up to the universe, or whatever being out there is toying with our lives for its amusement, then maybe Hermione wouldn't die. It seems any witch I have ever felt anything for has met an untimely and grisly end. Lily, Gabrielle. Any time I've felt feelings for someone, she died. I took the news of Hermione's near-death at a sign from the Fates that she would not live if I did."
"But she didn't die, Severus," Draco reminded him. "And yes, Potter and Kingsley were too slow to stop the first hex, but remember at Pansy's murder trial, how upset Potter was that that bastard would be set free? This time, Potter let him ramble on and confess to everything so he couldn't get off again, and though Hermione got hurt, she's alive, and well enough that she won us our freedom. Now Goyle, Blaise, and Pansy's murderer has been caught and justice is finally served."

"But it was because of me Parker set his sights on her to kill her," Severus retorted.

"No," Draco corrected him. "You ran out before Lavender told me that Parker targeted Hermione long before she started seeing you. Parker is not just Calpurnia's nephew, he's Dolores Umbridge's godson. Remember how Hermione tricked her out into the Forbidden Forest and let the Centaurs carry her away? This was personal. And Parker hated Muggleborns, too. He was the one who set Dolohov off on a rampage at the Ministry. Parker even confessed he was disappointed at the time Hermione left the lift just before the carnage. It wasn't because of you, it was a matter of circumstance that Parker was stalking us as well, and that he saw Hermione come and go to your flat. Ginny as well."

Severus looked ashen. "But at the trial, if that came up during—"

Draco patted Severus' hand, trying to calm him. "Potter and Kingsley had Lavender come over, while Parker was in custody before Moody saw him. Kingsley had her remove those memories so Parker couldn't tell the Wizengamot during the trial about seeing Ginny or Hermione come and go. Though it did come out about Rancelette, which caused quite the furor, as Lavender told it."

Severus was suddenly quite thankful about Lavender's talent for Memory Charms.

Mounga shook his head. So much sorrow and tragedy in his friend's life. "I'm so sorry that all this transpired, my friend. But imagine how Hermione would have felt, having delivered you the freedom you wanted badly enough that you couldn’t stay in England even for her, only for you to kill yourself. And after she had discovered that you never stopped loving her, but that it was merely the wrong bouquet? C'mon, dude. Even Shakespeare was pushing the boundaries of poorly-timed missed messages in Romeo & Juliet. And this? You die? That would be really fucking tragic."

Now that the immediate shock of grief was no longer consuming him beyond reason, Severus could finally begin to see the logic behind Mounga's assessment.

There was a gentle knock at the door. Mounga pulled the Silencing Spell down and unlocked the door with his wand, bidding them to enter.

Peeking her head in, Akela said with contrition, "I'm so sorry to bother you, Papa, but Kaimi keeps bugging me to ask you if she can give Uncle Severus his card." She rolled her eyes over his little sister's pestering and lack of patience.

Severus nodded his head that it was indeed all right.

Kaimi poked her head around the door frame. Mounga assured his youngest that she could enter, but told her to keep it brief.

Shuffling into the room, now feeling a bit uncertain and meek with all the adult wizards staring at her, she ducked her head down.

"You have something for me," Severus prompted her gently. She was a sweet child with a kind heart and an adventurous spirit. He was quite fond of her, as much as Severus could be fond of any child.

"I made you a card." She held it out for Severus to take. Climbing up into her father's lap, she began pointing out the artwork she had drawn, explaining the figures in the drawing beneath a sky filled with menacing black clouds and lightning. "That's you falling, and that's me swooping down saving you before you hit the water. That didn't really happen, but I wish I could have been there to save you like you caught me before."
Severus was moved by her concern. He opened the card and read the words written as carefully as possible in a multitude of colored inks, with her fanciest quillmanship.

--------

'Please get well, Uncle Severus. You're my favorite uncle and I don't want you sick or hurt anymore.

Love, Kaimi'

-------

He could only think of Mounga and Rainbow having to tell Kaimi how he had died, if he had succeeded in his original endeavor. And then he thought of Hermione having to hear from Lavender the same news and how she would react.

Severus broke down into sobbing tears.

"I'm sorry you don't like it," Kaimi began to apologize as she slipped from her father's lap.

"No, honey," Mounga assured her. "I think he likes it very much. He's just very tired right now."

He picked up his daughter and carried her from the room, followed behind by Draco, who shut the door behind him. They left Severus alone in peace to cry, the card resting limply in his hands.

~~~~~~~*~

On the wall behind Mounga's desk in his judge's chambers was an American flag from during the Revolution. It seemed even the town judge had an ancestor who had involved him or herself in a Muggle war and then had to seek sanctuary for interfering in a Muggle political conflict. Mounga's ancestor, on his mother's side, was the first American sanctuary-seeker. James Wright came to Malu Palekaiko in 1783, right after the Treaty of Paris and the founding of the United States Department of Magic, which immediately went after witches and wizards who participated in the war in ways that violated international law. The Battle of Saratoga turned the tide of the war for independence and may have ended differently if Mounga's ancestor, James Wright, hadn't used his magic to interfere.

While Severus stared at the flag and thought about his own freedom from the British Ministry of Magic's tyranny, Lavender ooh'ed and ahh'ed over the beautiful koa, monkeypod, and kiawe wood paneling that lined the judge's chambers, asking Mounga about the exotic woods.

On a round table towards one side of the room, a large Pensieve rested. It was large enough for Mounga, two lawyers, a witness, the victim, and the accused to use at once, if there was a discrepancy in testimony to an account of events. Sometimes after such use, either the witness, or plaintiff would change their testimony or plea.
Mounga, Severus, Draco, Ginny, and Lavender all stood around the Pensieve. Lavender placed her wand to her temple and pulled out a silvery thread of thought, then another. She was placing them in the Pensieve in order, showing the highlights of the trial instead of two full days of legal proceedings which included a lot of breaks for the Wizengamot to review Hermione's memories that she had provided as evidence, and rehashing the wording of Dumbledore's will ad nauseum. Hermione did include testimony from a few who did speak on Severus and Draco's behalf. The exonerated pair had already read over Dumbledore's will that morning.

The five of them were pulled into the first memory, which opened with Hermione addressing the Wizengamot. There was some formal addressing of some members of the Wizengamot and rituals involved, as Hermione had studied cases that had seemed most impossible to win that had actually won, and their keys to success. Somehow, using certain language – and following some silly and pointless procedures that had no bearing on the case – would certainly sway judgment in her favor.

Next in the Pensieve came Hermione to state her case, along with a brief outline of her points, and her promise to provide evidence for each one.

Severus watched how at the mention of his name, her lip curled slightly, just as it had in his dream of her.

"She really does hate me," Severus murmured to himself quietly enough that no one else heard him. He didn't like how thin she was becoming again, and he would speak to Lavender to ensure his beloved was eating properly.

During certain points of the memories, Lavender made some comments so that no one would miss something of interest regarding the trial.

They skipped from one memory to another, moving forward sequentially.

Severus and Draco watched intently as Hermione countered one of Moody's claims. The Senior Auror was arguing against exoneration of their names.

Hermione pointed out, "Did you or did you not deny Severus Snape and Draco Malfoy the opportunity for them to confess their innocence with the use of Veritaserum regarding the matter of the Death Eaters invading Hogwarts on the date in question? And did you also deny them the chance to take Veritaserum again when they wished to profess their innocence in regards to the claim they were somehow involved in Headmaster Albus Dumbledore's death?"
Mounga leaned over and said to Severus quietly, "She would have made a fantastic lawyer. I can see why you love her so much."

Lavender waved her hands that Mounga should be quiet as they were getting to the best part.

"I wouldn't say I denied them," Moody said evasively.

"Well, what would you call it, then? Refusal? Decline? Or just plain old rejection of an opportunity to prove their innocence?" Hermione turned to speak to not only the Wizengamot, but the crowds that packed the stands, eliciting murmurs from the observers. She seemed to sense that pandering to the crowd might sway the Wizengamot if public sentiment was on her side.

Severus noted how Moody was beginning to squirm from her line of questioning.

"There hadn't been time since the end of the war to address such matters," Moody countered.

"But time enough for surprise inspections and forcing Veritaserum down their throats in order to see if they were adhering to the Death Eater Decree? Why didn't you ask them about their innocence then, since you had used Veritaserum on them after the war?" Hermione asked, her voice slightly tinged with mock surprise, drawing the crowd around to her side.

Moody did not answer, which gave Severus great delight in watching the spotlight placed on his nemesis in such a manner.

"I have here the memory of Severus Snape speaking with Albus Dumbledore the night that the Headmaster passed away," she announced, holding a vial high in her hand.

"How did you–" Moody began, but he was cut off by Hermione.

"How I came upon this memory is inconsequential to the fact that you have refused to allow Severus Snape or Draco Malfoy to clear their names in Dumbledore's death, or in the accusation of their bringing Death Eaters into Hogwarts. In fact, you have obscured the fact of their true loyalty to Albus Dumbledore and the Order of the Phoenix."
"I also have here my memories of the final battle," Hermione announced, adding more vials of memories to her hand that remained aloft for the Wizengamot and audience to see. "Of one memory in which Draco Malfoy prevented Ronald Weasley from being struck by a curse from the Death Eater Branby Dollous. And another memory in which both Harry Potter and myself were prevented from being hit by potentially deadly, or at least, gravely injurious spells cast by the Death Eaters Lucius Malfoy and Rabastan Lestrange. Those counter-spells were cast by Severus Snape."

There was a blast of light and the vials that held silvery threads of thought shattered, spilling onto the center floor of the room.

Severus and Draco stood up from their seats aghast, as Pensieve-Moody kept his wand aloft. The spell came from his wand, destroying the memories Hermione had held in her hand. The crowd surrounding them in the memory roared with disapproval.

They were about to start shouting, but Lavender told them to sit down as it was going to get really good.

Memory-Hermione shook her hand, shaking off the last of the memories and shards of glass clinging to her hand.

"There will be no lies or false memories shared in these proceedings," Moody bellowed.

His statement was met with hisses from the crowd. The Chief Warlock, a new one by the name of Blunderbunt, banged her gavel and called for order.

Hermione cast a sardonic smile toward Moody. "Do you think the Wizengamot is so dim and naïve as to not spot an altered or tampered memory?" She shook her head disapprovingly, challenging his assertions. "Either you, a Senior Auror, are poorly qualified for the position you hold, or you are being disingenuous if you think so." Hermione turned around to face the Wizengamot once more. "But since I came prepared in case you might try to destroy evidence, just as you suppressed evidence in the past, those memories I held aloft were not the ones meant for the Wizengamot to view as evidence, unless you think my memory of what I had for breakfast and brushing my teeth this morning somehow pertains to these proceedings."

Hermione's éclat left Severus stunned; he was in awe of her presence, and of her cleverness. Draco laughed heartily and Ginny clapped with excited approval, even though this was just a memory.
Moody's stunt condemned his case, having proven through his actions in front of the Wizengamot, that he was determined to not let anyone prove Severus Snape and Draco Malfoy's innocence.

The memories skipped around a bit more, as the key memories were viewed by the Wizengamot. Near the end, as Hermione was making closing statements, she also insisted since Severus Snape and Draco Malfoy should have never been placed under the Death Eater Decree that all possessions seized by the Ministry should be returned in full. If that was not possible, equitable compensation should be given.

Draco held his breath.

Once Hermione was done with her closing statement, Lavender's memory skipped to the reading of the Wizengamot's decision.

Not only were Severus Snape and Draco Malfoy to be fully exonerated on the charges of Albus Dumbledore's death and any claims they had any part of the Death Eaters attacking Hogwarts, but they were no longer to be included under the Death Eater Decree. In addition, all monies and valuables seized from their Gringotts vaults were to be returned or compensated for at fair value. Residences of both wizards were returned to them as well, and a formal apology from the Ministry of Magic issued, especially regarding Alastor Moody's unprofessional behavior.

As everyone found themselves back in Mounga's chamber, Draco and Ginny kissed, ebullient at the final verdict and the news that Malfoy Manor had been restored to Draco. Severus sat down in a chair in order to soak in the whole experience of what they just witnessed. It was better than any dream he had of a pardon. Well, he did hope for the nomination of an Order of Merlin, First Class as well, but this was better as it was not some daydream – it was a fact.

"I noticed how no one made mention of the whereabouts of Draco or Severus during the trial," Ginny observed.

"Yes, I did too," Lavender agreed dryly as she took a seat and eased herself down into it. "But it seems that the Wizengamot had been apprised of how you two went missing before the trial, especially after Severus showed up on the front cover of Obscure Oozes & Fabulous Fluids. To bring it up in front of the spectators who watched the trial would merely cause more public 'scandal,' in addition to Moody's performance as an Auror in these matters."

There were so many things Severus wanted to tell Hermione, and he wished more than anything she was there. Maybe he finally found something to commit to parchment for Lavender to take back and personally deliver to her, given how he had lacked the inspiration before.

Hermione hated to admit it, but the one day of mandatory rest recharged her batteries more than she could have guessed. It also helped that she no longer had a trial to prepare for.

Looking over the bill of lading listing the materials that had arrived that morning, and the orders for new materials that she would owl off to suppliers later that day to meet demand for the week's production schedule, Hermione calculated gross profits based on the current costs. Once that was done, there was a check of production on the warehouse floor on vats and cauldrons bubbling and brewing away. Only then could she go back upstairs and begin her work with Albert on the latest product they were developing. Hermione was trying to find a way to make sure the baby bubble bath potion would make owl-, cat-, and frog-shaped bubbles down to the last drop.

Lavender's short trip abroad was a good test run to see how Hermione was coming up to speed on running the company. She would have that task while the company's founder was gone during maternity leave beginning around Halloween, give or take a week or two. So far it was nothing that Hermione couldn't handle.

Albert was glad that his apprentice had bounced back after such a harrowing experience. He had known good wizards and witches who had broken under less strenuous circumstances, even without being assaulted. He had given her "the talk" that nearly every Potions master has with their apprentice when they use Potions as a way to keep up with some perceived grueling timeline they must keep up with. He understood why Hermione was rushing to master her languages, theories, code of ethics and all, but he knew there were limits to what even witches and wizards could reasonably do.

Hermione started taking her lunch break to actually rest and eat, instead of rushing off to cram a few more irregular verbs into her understanding of Spanish. With a brief bit of rest, she found she had better retention of what she was reading. She was also eating more by enjoying what the elves at the company served up for lunch, instead of skipping and nibbling meagerly. A month ago, she was starting to look gaunt, but now she wasn't jagged bones anymore.

Putting her mind to her regular Potions work and helping run Lavender's company kept her busy enough so she didn't have to fixate about a certain wizard on the other side of the world, and if Malu Palekaiko was chock full of leggy blondes.

Severus was back to work Monday morning with no one else in the town wiser to what had transpired. All bits of Severus' broom had been salvaged from the beach, and he was going to discreetly order a new one later that week.
Before showing up to work, though, Severus had to brew up a batch of the temporary hair dye he'd developed for his former employer. It seems that being slightly struck by lightning had left him with a small solid white streak of hair at his left temple. Rainbow and Ginny said it made him look distinguished. Akela agreed with Draco that it made him look older.

In order to avoid questions about the sudden streak of white that went from the roots to the tips, he colored it to hide it from view. Later, the Potions master could come up with a more permanent solution where he could gradually introduce the gray a few strands at a time.

Draco came in to work, booking clients for Severus and tutoring students in Charms and Transfiguration.

Since Ginny was done preparing for the Pele Festival, she had much more time during her days, as most of her belly dance students took classes in the latter half of the afternoon and early evening. Ginny was showing Lavender about the island during the day.

Severus and the Malfoys took turns hosting Lavender for dinner at their respective homes, in addition to taking her out to some of the finer dining establishments on the island. Lavender was under the impression it was all pineapples and poi, until she ate at Mario's restaurant, amazed that she was able to find good Italian cuisine so far from Italy. He also had some French, Greek, and Spanish items on the menu, but his specialty was cuisine from his home country.

While sitting around the table at Mario's Wednesday night, sipping on a glass of after-dinner port, Severus asked Lavender, "And when do you plan on returning to England?"

"I was thinking of taking a Friday morning Portkey back home." Lavender was sipping some ginger tea while watching a gecko climb the wall behind Severus' head, glad there was some creature on the island that was keeping the giant cockroach population in check. "If there is a letter or gift you'd like for me to bring back to Hermione, I will personally deliver it myself so that there are no mix-ups."

"Or I can deliver it," offered Draco.

Severus did a double-take, understanding the implications of his remark. "You're going back?"

Ginny answered, "Yes. Since watching Lavender's memories and seeing the title of Malfoy Manor restored to Draco, we decided we'll be going back." She quickly added when she saw Severus' brow knit, "But it's only for a short trip. Draco and I both agree that Malu Palekaiko is now our home, but he wants to check on his vault—"

Draco interrupted her with a small correction. "Our vault."

"Our vault to see if all that the Ministry took has been returned. Then there are repairs to Malfoy Manor, since it has been abandoned these years since the end of the war. Plus, I'd like to see some family."

Lavender jumped into the conversation, asking with disbelief, "Wait, I thought you said—"

"I know what I said," Ginny replied, "and while I'm still angry at my mother, I do want to see my father. And the twins, if they'll still speak with me. And Bill. And from what you've told me, Ron also."

"It was bad enough when she went a little..." Lavender said, expanding upon the comment with a twist of her hand and the crossing of her eyes, adding a short whistle for effect to describe Molly's breakdown.

Severus had heard from Ginny about the Howler she'd sent her mother, and Lavender's description of its after-effects. He would have loved to have seen it upon delivery.

"She still gets a bit twitchy when she sees me," Lavender admitted. "Let's hope she doesn't go 'round the bend once more if you see her."

"Would that be such a terrible thing?" Draco asked snidely, still wanting to hex Molly Weasley and delighted by her misery. She had dished enough of it to him and his wife that payback was only fair.

Severus could only think of Arthur and what he must be going through. Though he held little sympathy for Molly, given what she had done to manipulate so many, Severus did feel pity for the patriarch of the Weasley family, having a wife go temporarily mad.

Draco turned back to Severus and quirked a brow. "So if there is a letter you'd like to finish and a new bouquet of flowers I can deliver, I would be more than happy to do that."
"How long do you think you'll be gone?" Severus asked, happy Draco was able to reclaim his property stolen from him, and a little envious he had the fortitude to return to England once more.

Severus had sworn to Hermione that even if she won him his freedom, he'd never come back. With Potter, he said that if Hermione was hurt, he'd consider coming back to put an end to him. And while Harry had mostly kept Hermione safe, Severus still could not bear the thought of stepping upon British soil ever again. It was too soon and his freedom only recently won.

"About a week. I've already canceled my tutoring sessions for while we're gone. And Ginny can't be gone long, with her first belly dance recital to be held during Oktoberfest in a little over a month."

Draco then looked to Lavender and the two exchanged an awkward glance, full of hidden meaning. Lavender jutted her chin and Draco made a face with his brow knit. The witch raised her brow, giving him a look full of knowing, and Draco gave a look of resignation back and nodded. The nonverbal conversation ended when Lavender tilted her head and lowered her eyes in a manner to suggest that Draco should go first.

Heaving a great sigh, Draco began, "Well, I was going to save this for Christmas or your birthday, when plans were farther along. However, given how you and Hermione left each other on ambiguous terms and how nearly disastrous it turned out, and considering how you're both pining for each other still, I might as well tell you.

Severus wasn't sure if this was going to be good news or bad news, but given Draco was going to tell him in a way that Severus was supposed to find pleasing, he wasn't quite so worried. He still crossed his arms in front of his chest out of habit, not caring for Draco's prologue.

"Back in February, I owled Lavender with an idea." Draco said. "Let's face it, tutoring is merely something to keep me busy, as there are other things I'd rather do for a career. So hopefully next year, Lavender will be opening an Asia-Pacific office and manufacturing branch of The Lovely Lavender Company, with me as the Vice President of Marketing and Advertising of the Asia-Pacific region, right here in Malu Palekaiko." Draco was saving the best for last, so he could see the look of surprise on his co-worker's face. "And this new regional headquarters will be run by one newly-minted Potions mistress, Hermione Weasley."

Severus recalled how Lavender had suddenly changed her travel plans after finding out the flowers were a mistake. "And that's why you stayed with your change of plans? That for the fact it was a mix-up and not my intent to hurt Hermione, you decided to go forward with opening your offices here?"
"Very astute, Severus." Lavender sipped her ginger tea, looking very self-satisfied that it all worked out in the end.

"And how do you know that Hermione will still want to come here, much less take me back, even though I never left her?" Severus was hoping Hermione would forgive him, though he was not the one who required forgiveness.

"If Hermione was able to be my bridesmaid at my wedding to Ron, I think she can easily forgive you over a simple mistake that was not of your doing," Lavender reminded him.

"Wait, What?" Ginny interjected with disbelief. "Hermione was a bridesmaid at YOUR wedding to my brother, to her ex-husband?"

"Yes, and she was the picture of grace and tact, despite the best man using her name during the toast to the bride and groom."

Draco could only laugh and shake his head. "Any other bits of perception-shredding news we should be made aware of before we Portkey back home, in order to avoid a faux pas of epic proportions?"

So much had transpired in England since the three of them left, and so much had transpired for him as well in Hawaii. For the fact that plans had already been in the works for months meant Hermione already knew that she would be returning to him for a while. Those flowers which spoke of betrayal and loathing were why they had hurt her all the more, her hopes dashed. But now it could all be set to rights. Not only would Hermione be looking forward to them reuniting, but Severus now knew that she would return to him someday soon as well.

As part of her apprenticeship, Hermione had to learn to haggle and deal with suppliers. She was getting plenty of experience in that area, helping run Lavender's company and negotiating with commercial suppliers, but Albert needed to teach her the fine aspect of dealing with small-time suppliers of rarer ingredients.

Albert and Hermione emerged from the fireplace, Flooing directly from The Lovely Lavender Company headquarters in London to the Hog's Head in Hogsmeade. After dusting the soot from their cloaks, they looked about until Albert spotted his business associate.
"Business associate" was a generous term for the wizard sitting over in the corner, hunched over his tankard of ale and a grisly haunch of mutton on a pewter platter. The tankard was dented, which seemed to match the wizard's face.

Albert sat down, followed by Hermione. Aberforth came over and gave Hermione a discreet nod, acknowledging a fellow member of the Order, and asked if they want anything.

"Two glasses of Ogden's," Albert replied.

Aberforth returned and placed their drinks in front of them before going back behind the bar. The glassware was just as dirty as Hermione remembered from the last time she was there during the war, or possibly more.

Including the owner-bartender, there were only five people in the entire establishment, which suited the seller just fine. The other patron was a very old wizard on the other side of the room; he was wearing a ragged tartan kilt, with a dirty tam-o'-shanter precariously perched upon his head that was resting upon the table.

"See you got yourself a new wife," the grizzled wizard observed.

"Apprentice," the Potions master corrected him.

"Why buy the sheep if you can get the wool for free, plus a bit of cheese," he chuckled to himself, amused over the cleverness of his own disparaging joke.

Hermione had been warned to take whatever may be said in stride and to merely observe. Learning to deal with characters of this sort were part of the experience of becoming a master or mistress, unpleasant as it may be.

Albert lifted the drink to his lips, but Hermione noted that he didn't sip, only making it appear he was partaking of the libation. This gesture by Albert was to put the other wizard at ease, since drinking and business seemed to go hand in hand with some of the older wizards. Hermione did the same, bringing the drink to her lips and pretending to drink.

This seemed to indicate that business could proceed, as the haggard, unkempt wizard got right down to it. "I've got a hefty lock of succubus hair to sell you. Are you still interested?"
Hermione had never seen succubus hair come through the Department of Standards & Regulations in all her years working there. She had since read of it used in some potions during her apprenticeship, but was unfamiliar with it. Hermione was aware of the Dark Arts aspects of the dark creatures. Whereas hags, banshees, and veelas were integrated and productive members of wizarding society, succubi had a wild and untamable streak in them which made them as dangerous as vampires and hard for men to resist their sexual advances. There were reports of brothels in Turkey run by succubi – wizards and Muggle men entered the brothels, and none left.

Albert fondled the lock of hair, which was long and black, it looked and felt as luxurious as silk.

"Mind if I test a strand for verification?"

The seller nodded his head, but asked that Albert take a small snippet versus the whole shaft of hair.

Albert pulled a vial out and placed the hair sample into it. Hermione had already prepared a testing solution according to Albert's direction before they Floo'ed to the Hog's Head. Inside the vial was a base solution which would react to the acidic nature of the succabus; it would react with a frothing of purple foam when shaken together.

The hair was indeed succubus hair. Albert discreetly slipped the old wizard, whose name Hermione still didn't know, a pouch of Galleons. She wondered if a short-haired succubus was wandering around the British Isles, as any attempt to sneak the hair into Britain would have instantly resulted in it winding up in a Ministry locker for smuggled goods. Then again, succubus hair was not a registered Potions ingredient with the Ministry, and therefore possibly not subject to the same regulation.

"Doing business with you is almost as good as the time I had while getting that hair," the wizard said with a lecherous grin. This showed Hermione his mouth full of half-rotten and chipped teeth, at least the ones that were still in his head.

To conclude business, all three of them drank, Albert and Hermione pretending, the old wizard unaware they weren't imbibing.

Before Albert and Hermione began to leave, the other old wizard in the plaid kilt rose from his seat. Now awake, he ambled over to the fireplace and raised a leg to set upon the andirons that jutted out from the hearth. He missed, and it took another try before his worn leather boot rested
Turning to look at the old Scottish wizard by the fireplace, Hermione sat there in amazement as he opened his mouth and a tenor voice that was sweet and clear came forth. Albert had heard the wizard sing a few times over the decades, and it was the same song the old Highlander sang.

"A wizard called Eòin Greumson
Of bonnie Blackbriar Dornoch
Was bid to fight the goblin horde
Rebellion rose an' duty call'd..."

Sitting there, Hermione heard the old ballad sung with heartfelt longing, bringing tears to her eyes quickly, of lovers separated, with the wizard killing himself in the end to join his witch in death. She could only think of Severus and how circumstance kept them apart. Hermione was unsure if they'd ever see each other ever again, especially now. Listening to the lyrics of how poor Maighread died, she wondered if Severus would have been equally heartbroken as Eòin had she not survived Alan's attack.

Now done, the old wizard from the Highlands ambled back over to his table and laid his head down once more, after downing his firewhisky in one go.

Wiping away the last of her tears, she noticed Albert and even the somewhat gruff wizard were also wiping away their own stray tears as well. She was not the only one affected by the song.

Albert patted her shoulder and indicated it was time to leave.

Hermione wondered how Severus had reacted to Lavender's news of her escape from a death that would have been certain if it weren't for Harry. Would he have even cared?

"Actually, I need to speak to your mother, Rainbow. And I will need your assistance, and Kaimi's as well probably." Severus watched as the young witch blinked back in surprise, wondering how she could help such an accomplished Potions master and more experienced wizard.
"Um, sure. Hang on a sec."

Akela left and came back with her mother, who sat down in the chair opposite from the couch where Severus was sitting.

"As you are aware, there was a great misunderstanding regarding the delivery of the wrong flowers to someone," he began, since Akela was unaware of the finer details of the course of events and he was filling her in. "And with Draco and Ginny going back to England, not only will Mrs. Lavender Weasley be clearing up the matter with the florist, but I wish to also send a lei back to be presented to Hermione by Draco and Ginny. Since I was presented with such a lovely lei upon my welcome, I was hoping you could help me with creating one for Hermione."

Rainbow smiled back serenely and assured him she and the girls would be happy to help him. Severus could have gone to the florist in town, but after living in Hawaii all these months, he'd observed the best flower leis were the ones made by the giver. Every single flower was picked with care from the giver's yard – or their neighbor's. The flowers were all gently strung together with thread, and the ends of the lei were usually hand-tied with a festive ribbon. A store-bought lei wasn't the same.

A lei was supposed to be presented by the giver with a respectful bow and raised to the level of the giver's heart. Draco would have to stand in his stead, since Severus was not going back to England to present a lei.

Akela asked, her mind seeking to make connections between everyone involved. "Mrs. Weasley who is visiting here. Is she married to one of the brothers of that big fat jerk Quidditch player in the calendar I burned?" She remembered how that particular wizard was mean to a "dear friend" of Uncle Severus.

"Mrs. Weasley is married to that particular Quidditch player."

Severus was amazed the girl could unhinge her jaw like a snake as it suddenly hung open. She was gaping in shock, making the connection Lavender was now married to the wizard who had hurt Uncle Severus' "dear friend."

"And I would advise you from referring to Mrs. Weasley's husband with those particular terms, at least while she is still here on the island. Once she's gone, feel free to go back to referring to him that way." Severus said with a slight smile curled upon the corner of his lip.
There was no need to remind the two witches about discretion, especially since Akela had her own history with Kiki and Ulrich, the island's latest little love triangle which ended badly. Akela didn't like being in the center of the rumor mill, and she had already promised months ago to remain quiet about Severus' contentious ties to Ronald Weasley.

They moved into the kitchen and asked Kaimi to join them, since she was particularly skilled at stringing flowers, making sure not to bruise them in the process.

Rainbow pulled out a piece of parchment, along with a quill and ink, ready to scratch out some ideas before they began. "So, what sentiments do you wish to impart in your lei to this Hermione?"

With this lei, Severus hoped whatever hurt Hermione felt could be mended. Hopefully.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Title attributed to quote by Jacques Bénigne Bossuel

Fan art by Pengu, commissioned by me. You can view Kaimi's card to Severus here: http://atdlhea-betz.tumblr.com/post/150095394755/fan-art-by-pengu-no-link-available-commissioned

As always, thank you to be fabulous betas, JuneW and Cygnuz.
Chapter Summary

Some wrongs are righted, and plans to address other wrongs are hatched. Severus gets adopted.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Ninety-Two
"Guess Who's Coming to Dinner"

Disclaimer: O my fanfic like a pale, pale copy,
That's twisted into a new story:
O my fanfic borrows everything from Rowling,
That she owns, not me.

As fair art thou, my darling author,
So deep in awe am I;
And I will luve Harry Potter, my Jo,
Till a' the seas gang dry.

A/N: This disclaimer is a poor parody of Robert Burns' poem, “A Red, Red Rose.”

The squawking in the kitchen woke Hermione up. Rising to see what the matter was with Calleo, she found her owl in the midst of a turf war with Pigwidgeon over the sweetest spot on the perch. This spot granted the best access to the bowl of owl treats Hermione left out for her owl and any visiting ones that came to deliver messages.

"Shove over, Calleo. You get to sit there most of the day, and you'll be too fat to fly if you keep eating too many treats anyway," Hermione chastised her pet. She didn't mean to be short with the bird, but Hermione was anxious regarding news of Lavender's return.

Seeing the note still clasped in Pig's claw, she relieved the bird of its message and gave it a brief pet on the head. This resulted in Calleo taking a nip at Hermione's hand for rebuking her.
Hermione was glad it was not another Howler, as she had received quite a few for winning exoneration for Severus and Draco. One of the worst was from Padma Patil, who called her a "Death Eater-loving turncoat cunt of a traitor that [she] hope dies a tortuously painful death soon." And some of the glares Hermione received in public were just as bad as when news of her divorce initially broke, if not worse. She had taken to gliding about Diagon Alley with her hood pulled up, concealing her face, even on warm summer days and evenings. She had a great deal of empathy as to why Severus had done the same, like when she spotted him in Flourish and Blotts that one sultry evening and knew him only as Calleo at the time.

Hermione opened the letter and sighed that more information wasn’t shared.

-------

Dear Hermione,

Come over to the house for dinner tonight when you’re done with your work today.

Regards,

Lav & Ron

-------

Looking at the handwriting, she knew her boss had written this, not her ex-husband. Hermione got a sinking feeling that they wanted to butter her up with a good meal before delivering news regarding Severus, since Severus was the one who’d first warned her, and was correct, that the worse the news was, the better the nibbles.

Over at Albert’s, while working on his garden she had slightly neglected during her time preparing her legal case, she found out he had also received a note that morning from their employer, bidding him to come over to dinner as well. The more Hermione thought about it, the more she dreaded the event.

Albert kept her busy at work with some late-summer deadheading, and harvesting of herbs and fruits which were at their peak. Berries and other items needed to be laid out for drying in the shed, before they were washed, dried, then preserved in various fluids for later use in tinctures, salves, and other elixirs.
After a busy morning at Albert's, she was even busier over at Neville's nursery, getting the spring bulbs ready for planting in pots to be sold in the spring when they bloomed. There were a lot of bulbs to be potted, and the sand and peat mix was rather dusty. There seemed to be a small cloud of fine peat which rose with each trowel full of the soil mix she used to bury the bulbs and corms to the right depth, making sure to keep them pointing right way up. At the end of the day, there seemed to be a halo of dirt about her head.

Hermione didn't feel like going through the bother of cleaning up if she was going to be handed bad news. As much as she was reluctant to put in the effort, she dragged her arse through the shower and cleaned up for dinner. She picked out something that seemed presentable, but she didn't bother to dress up. Make-up was not even considered if it was only going to get smudged with crying later on.

Upon arriving at Ron and Lavender's via Floo, she was shown into the solarium. Immediately, she spotted Harry and Ron over by the lush Rhapis excelsa, no doubt discussing Quidditch. Albert and Lavender were sitting down in chairs close by the cluster of troll's foot ferns, a glass of some apéritif in the Potions master's hand.

"Hermione!"

She recognized that voice, but had to turn around to spy Ginny. There was her red-headed best friend, standing next to Zhubanysh Potter and Draco Malfoy.

Hermione stood there in shock, not only at the sight of Ginny and Malfoy, but everyone in the same room, and war hadn't broken out yet. Had many of the people present in the room at that very moment been in the same room a year ago, a third wizarding war would have surely erupted.

As the two old friends embraced, Hermione was overjoyed. She said with amazement, "I had no idea you came back! When?"

"Last night," Ginny replied, near giddy from the excitement of seeing Hermione again. "We came back with Lavender after learning of the good news of you winning Draco and Severus their freedom."

Upon hearing the mention of Severus' name, Hermione's mood suddenly soured. She put on a brave face, but it was easy to see she was bracing herself for more bad news.
Draco approached the pair, a gentle smile upon his lips, but his eyes cool as if hiding some simmering resentment. "I think there is someone who owes you an apology." Holding up his hand, he snapped his fingers.

Vradian Bumbershoot, the careless floral delivery boy, was unceremoniously shoved into view of the door frame to the solarium.

Hermione had spun about expecting to see Severus, but instead spotted a spotty youth with a petulant frown upon his mug. He was holding a very large vase filed with stems of corchorus, oak-leaved geranium, and forget-me-nots, with slender branches of flowering almond and spindle tree. Behind him, his employers, the Willow sisters, prodded him along as he shuffled uneasily towards Hermione.

"I'm very sorry, but it seems I delivered the wrong flowers to you. Last month." Vradian didn't look sorry at all, as if he was being forced to do this against his will. "Here." He held out the vase of flowers, while doing his best to not let a sneer curl upon his lip.

He was forced to do this with the threat of all his summer's wages being garnished should this grave oversight not be remedied, once the Willow sisters were informed of the error. The sisters told Lavender about this, as they were smart enough to want the owner of The Lovely Lavender Company on their side; they did not want potential future sales lost.

Vradian already had to dodge a rather nasty hex when Esmeralda Gravenstein was given her bouquet mean for her a month ago. At least he delivered the new bouquet earlier that day before she walked down the aisle and the champagne was uncorked, though it looked like there was going to be a lot of uneaten wedding cake that was going to go in the dustbin that night. Stephen Stronder gave the Willow sisters a big tip, actually enjoying the sight of his ex-bride-to-be receiving her flowers just before the wedding, forgiving the florist for the mix up. It seems the timing of the wedding-day delivery was better since he got a front row seat to watch her humiliated and shamed in front of all their friends and family, reminding him also why he tried dumping her the first time. Neville's grandmother heard the story from a friend of a friend of the Stronder family, a tale she would share with her grandson because it involved flowers, and Neville would later share with Hermione.

The young wizard just hoped this Hermione wasn't going to threaten his manhood, unlike that bride-turned-harpy.

"You mean..." Hermione took the flowers from the delivery boy and looked over each stem, noting the symbolism. Tears begun to brim over and she started to cry. "But I thought somehow he knew about..."
Hermione stopped herself short, not wanting to announce to the whole room that she had slept with Neville Longbottom.

The Willow sisters and their now former employee made a discreet exit.

Draco took the flowers from Hermione, the coolness in his gaze now replaced with warmth and sympathy, while Ginny turned to embrace her friend, whispering quietly into her hair so no one else could hear, "We'll talk later. Just know that he still loves you and has never stopped. Don't worry."

The tone in Ginny's voice told her that somehow Severus knew, but Hermione still didn't know how. Hermione also picked up the tone of forgiveness in Ginny's explanation, and it only made the guilt of the act burn like hot acid, churning in her gut.

Placing a hand over her mouth, to muffle her cries, she sobbed, "I thought..."

The Potters and Ron were unaware of the significance of the flowers to Hermione and what it had meant to her. Lavender knew and was moved by Hermione's emotional outburst, breaking into tears herself, which set off a cascade of more tears with Ginny and Zhubanysh joining in, all their emotions moved easily by their hormonal state.

"Bloody hell, is anyone else going to break into tears?" Ron asked, wondering it was going to get any more contagious.

Hermione laughed, thankful for Ron's tactless humor, since it seemed to give some levity to the moment. Wiping away the last of her tears, she was momentarily stunned when Draco swept her up into his arms and hugged her like an old friend.

"I never got a chance to thank you for all that you have done for Severus, Ginny, and me. Thank you," Draco said with heartfelt sincerity that seemed to push Hermione into a fresh wave of tears.

Hermione finally hugged him back, herself awash with relief that the nightmare of Severus leaving her was over. She couldn't stop crying, she was so overcome after battling with herself and her heart for the past month.
There were times she had tried to convince herself it wasn't like Severus to do this, and at other times, she had convinced herself that he had cast her aside, to easily build yet another wall around his heart. Now she knew the truth. As bruised as her heart was, it began to mend in that moment when she saw the right flowers delivered to her – finally.

Lavender asked the Potters, Albert, and her husband to adjoin to the dining room and leave the Malfoys and Hermione alone for a moment.

When the doors to the solarium closed, Hermione nearly collapsed into a chair as she sat down. "How? If the first bouquet of flowers was nothing but a mix-up, how did he find out about..."

"About you and Neville?" Ginny finished her sentence, confirming that she and Draco, and indeed Severus, knew as well.

Hermione broke into more tears, feeling quite ashamed at the memory of it.

"Lavender, in the heat of the moment, and in her slightly pregnancy hormone-addled mind, let it accidentally slip. It was when Severus quite hostilely, and justly, wondered why you and Lavender would assume that the right flowers were delivered instead of questioning the florist on a mix-up," Draco informed her.

"What?!?"

What was relief had now turned to panic about Severus knowing about her and Neville with certainty. The fact was they had never made any formal promises to one another about fidelity, and in the personal memory he'd left for her he did give her permission to move on with her life. Still, Hermione already had intentions of returning to Severus when she'd slept with Neville, which made it seem like cheating on him, though technically it wasn't. Exactly. Sort of.

"How upset was he?" Hermione asked, wondering about the damage caused to their relationship.

"Let's just say you weren't the only one missing each other terribly and who slipped in a moment of weakness," Draco assured her, making it clear that Severus had no case in which to point a finger at her without becoming a hypocrite.

While this was somewhat of a relief to Hermione that she wasn't the only one who had faltered, strangely enough, it still stung a bit that Severus had been with someone else.

"And he has been moping around, regretting it since it happened. He seems to feel about as guilty about it as you seem to be." Ginny had sat down next to her friend and patted her back, which resulted in Hermione leaning into her for support. "So do as Draco suggested to Severus: forgive each other, put it behind you, and move forward."

There were more details behind how Severus and Maria had wound up in that situation, but Ginny and Draco felt there was no need to tell it. Besides, Hermione didn't need to get a bad impression of Rainbow who had orchestrated the whole opportunity. The healer had thought she was doing a good deed by setting Severus up with an available witch, unaware Severus' heart belonged to another. Hermione and Rainbow would be dealing with each other a lot in the future, and there was no need to cause bad blood between them before they had even met.

Draco patted Hermione on the shoulder before going over to a console table by the wall to fetch a large flat box. Ginny rose and encouraged Hermione to stand as well, knowing what her husband planned to do next.

Reaching into the box, Draco pulled out a lei of deep pink roses, symbolic of gratitude, strung with pikake jasmine flowers in between the rosebuds.

"You have Ginny's and my eternal thanks and appreciation for all that you have done to help us." Draco raised the lei above his heart in the formal ceremonial way of presenting a lei with great respect.

Hermione, having read her Hawaiian guidebooks, knew to take the lei and place it over her own head.

"And the Arabian jasmine flowers?" she asked, wondering if the flower's symbolism was the same in Hawaii as in England.

"For friendship," he replied.

Hermione could hardly believe this was the same wizard who had looked at her with loathing, while he was in Polyjuice form as Harry, the morning they fled. It was only now that Hermione finally noticed the matching wedding bands he and Ginny wore. Now she understood: the couple finally had the life they had dreamed of having together for so many years. And with Hermione winning his freedom, they could come back to England together, no longer hiding their love for one another.

Draco reached into the box once more. "And this lei is from Severus," he announced before presenting it to Hermione.

It was stunning. Hermione wanted to break into tears once more. She pressed her palm lightly against her chest as if the sight of this had taken her breath away.

It was a double-strand lei. The first strand was white ginger flowers, strung with so many flowers that it was full and round, twisted together around a second strand of alternating white plumeria, and purple-tipped white orchids.

"In Hawaii, white ginger is symbolic of love and romance. Plumeria is for new beginnings and hope. And Severus chose orchids based on the European symbolism for beauty." Draco kept the lei held aloft until Hermione could find the strength to take it from him and place it over her head. "Severus helped pick the flowers and string this himself, because no store-bought lei could adequately convey his love for you."

Draco conjured a handkerchief for Hermione when she broke into yet another fresh wave of tears, after she finished placing the lei upon her own shoulders.

"Severus wished he could come back, but he said you would understand why he couldn't," Draco said somberly.

Hermione nodded. She understood why no prisoner would want to return to a cell they had fought so long to escape, which is why she was so surprised to see Draco and Ginny back in England.

"Thank you," Hermione whispered to them both, having lost her voice. She didn't know what she could say to convey how overwhelmed she was by the revelations of that evening.

Draco escorted his wife and Hermione to join the others in the dining room. There, the conversation turned lighter, as the Malfoys told the tale of how earlier in the day they turned up on Molly and Arthur's doorstep with a large basket full of tropical fruit and news of another grandchild on the way.
Hermione was thrilled and congratulated the Malfoys on the news of Ginny's pregnancy. It suddenly struck her that she was the only one present who wasn't expecting a child, as even Albert had another great-great-grandchild on the way. In a brief moment, she wondered if she and Severus would ever have children, as they had never discussed it.

Both Ron and Harry laughed at some of Draco's remarks regarding Molly. All three wizards were still feeling rather uncharitable towards the Weasley matriarch, who had significantly interfered in their lives, and not in a good way.

The rest of the conversation was surprisingly amicable. Hermione found out later Lavender had everyone, except her and Albert, come over earlier and air their grievances before she arrived. There were some heated and hasty words and some initial dueling, but in the end, no one could deny that they were all much happier in their current arrangement. Even Harry had to admit that before Ginny started seeing Draco secretly, their marriage was already heavily strained. Ginny and Zhubanysh got on like old friends from the start, Mrs. Malfoy thrilled Harry had found someone who loved him like he deserved and could, like Ginny could not.

More news of what had happened since the Malfoys left months ago went around the table. Hermione shared that her old boss, Madam Dushka, had finally given birth. The gossip rags had found out about the little love triangle between the Dushkas and Trevor Spawn, and published speculative rumors about the paternity of the child; Hermione had not heard from Trevor if it was his or not. However, that piece of gossip had passed out of favor for news of the upcoming election and how Cornelius Fudge and Amelia Bones were neck and neck in the polls.

The subject of politics brought about quite a ruckus, with everyone ready to give their very heated and personal views on the matter. Lavender banned the topic until after dinner, when it could be discussed when cutlery was not at hand, even though everyone still had their own wands. It was not that anyone disagreed about Fudge being a feckless twat manipulated by his Machiavellian Slytherin of a wife and her machinations, but it did cause tempers to rise that he was still in power, along with his wife who pulled his strings.

Harry shared the good news about Moody's suspension until the senior Auror's actions to suppress evidence to exonerate the two ex-Death Eaters could be reviewed by the Wizengamot at a later date. The Malfoys were quizzed on life in Hawaii, to which Draco gave a very good impersonation of some of the local accents, especially doing a spot-on imitation of Shark, the clothing store owner. Zhubanysh was asked to relay about daily life in a wizarding nomadic tribe living along the roof of the world, and how she was adjusting to life in a new country and new culture. Ginny and Draco told a few tales of their own about adjustments to island life, which amused the dinner guests. They left out the part about the giant cockroaches, since it didn't seem like an appropriate topic for the dinner table.

At one point during the meal, Draco rose from his seat, glass raised in hand as he announced, "I propose a toast. To the one who made it possible for all of us to be together tonight enjoying this fine meal. To Hermione: protector of those unjustly persecuted, seeker of justice."

Ron rose from his seat also, a glass in his hand, and added, "Understanding and forgiving, with a solid right hook and a mean Spider-Bogey Hex." There were a few chuckles from around the table.

"To her relentless pursuit of truth, even when the truth is what no one else wishes to see," Harry said with a bit more solemnity. Those weighty words, coming from him, were not lost on a few other guests present, words filled with multiple meanings.

"To my sister, who has helped those who had – have felt at times a little lost," Zhubanysh said, rising from her seat as well, grateful for Hermione helping her adjust to life in England. Hermione coached her in the finer points of English language and grammar. She also took owls from Zhubanysh at odd hours to reply when the new bride was unsure with local customs, or how to talk to Harry about a topic she was uncomfortable with.

Lavender raised her glass as well, given the inspiration of the moment, although she chose to not get out of her seat as that would have taken far too long. "Hermione, a friend to those who needed a friend the most."

"Insightful and brilliant," Ginny said, standing next to her husband, glass in hand.

Albert rose. "And the finest apprentice any Master of any discipline could ask for. To Hermione."

There was another chorus of "To Hermione" from around the table before everyone drank.

"Will everyone please sit down before I begin blubbering on some more," Hermione jested, her eyes misting again, overcome with the warmth and sentiments of her friends. There was some light laughter as everyone continued on with the meal.

After dinner, everyone retired to the library where fine spirits – aged in oak barrels for decades – were served with fine crystal glassware, as well as herbal teas offered to the pregnant witches. With a practiced hand, Hermione swirled the fine pear brandy about the snifter before taking a sip and savoring the complexity of notes. Before starting her monthly booze-up with the local Potions masters, Hermione would have gone for a simple glass of sherry, but with her binging, she had also been exposed to some of the finer aspects of distilled spirits. Whereas Severus had expanded her knowledge and palate for champagne and wine, her once-a-month drinking companions broadened her horizons regarding harder libations.

Harry was enjoying his own snifter of Calvados when Draco brought up the unpleasant subject of Alan Parker.

"And at no point during his super-villain monologue, nor under Veritaserum, did he indicate Umbridge or Calpurnia Fudge had any knowledge, direction, or sanctioning of his actions?" Draco asked, remembering the conversation he had with Severus before he and Ginny Portkeyed back to England.

"None, as Kingsley and I hadn't the chance to ask, because Moody and half the high-ranking officials at the Ministry barged into our interrogation and stopped it until a time they deemed more appropriate," Harry recounted with an aggravated growl. "That turned out to be the hastily-arranged trial less than twenty-fours later. I mean, who has a trial Sunday night when the Ministry is shut down, unless you don't want anyone to know. At least I was able to point out that Umbridge had to recuse herself due to a conflict of interest, given that Alan Parker is her godson, a fact she did not volunteer."

"That must have caused an uproar," Ginny added, sipping on some chamomile and rose hip tea. "Were Cornelius or Calpurnia present at the trial?"

"They wouldn't have dared to attend. With the election coming up, they wanted to distance themselves from this as far as possible. Even the coverage of the trial was minimal." Harry turned and patted Hermione's hand, giving it a squeeze of support as he added, "Healers at St. Mungo's were threatened to keep quiet and not go on about how Hermione was attacked. The only thing reported publicly was that she was attacked and the wizard, who was unnamed, was apprehended."

"Yes, but even if Calpurnia knew, there is no way to get her to admit it to anyone," Ron said, jumping into the conversation. "No one other than Umbridge. Those two are thick as thieves. I've seen them huddled next to each other at all those functions I have to go to with Bascom. But still, short of it plastered all over the front page of the Daily Prophet, which Fudge controls, there is no way anyone will know how those two are connected to that sicko, and if they told him to do it. And Fudge might get re-elected, which means she gets re-elected."

Hermione, who was feeling quite morose with the topic of Alan Parker and his relations, was suddenly struck with a moment of inspiration, thanks to Ron's unintentionally insightful ramblings. She also had to thank the memories of her Aunt Christine going on about a couple irreparably-catastrophic public relations disasters that she'd had to deal with over the years. As much as her aunt's stories bored her at the time, they served as inspiration now. A maniacal laugh bubbled up from her throat as she tipped her head back, suddenly feeling a rush of adrenaline that came when an idea came along that fit her needs.
"She's gone mad," Ron said as he drained his glass of Ogden's.

"Or madly brilliant," said Harry, knowing the glint that Hermione had in her eye meant she had another great idea.

Suddenly, Hermione face fell. "Bugger. Pity Polyjuice ingredients are still regulated."

"Regulated for purchase, but that doesn't mean you can't get some from a friend," Albert added with a knowing smile. Hermione had not forgotten that Albert had all of the regulated ingredients in his own stores, but did not want to assume he would partake in whatever scheme she had planned. "Unfortunately, I don't have any 21-day stewed lacewing flies."

"But I do," Lavender added. Everyone's head swiveled about in unison to give her a look of disbelief. "What?" she said innocently. "When Severus and Draco took off, do you think I'd leave myself without my own plan for escape in case things went pear-shaped for me?"

Ron looked hurt. With a pout, he asked, "You'd leave me?"

"What would you rather have? A wife living in Paris you could visit every day, or a wife locked up in Azkaban, had Moody decided I somehow had a hand in their escape?"

Ron nodded with a grimace of resignation that she did have a point, but he then realized the hitch. "Wait, but you don't have the regulated ingredients. How would have that worked out?"

"I have the stewed lacewing flies, and the fluxweed picked at full moon – as Hermione procured enough for three batches. I don't have the bicorn horn and boomslang. I would have paid Albert handsomely for those two items." Turning to her Potions master, she asked, "I hope I wasn't being presumptuous."

"Not at all," he assured her with a tilt of his head.

"So what do you have in mind," Draco asked. He realized that he was going to be included in the schemings of Potter's gang for once, and it was a bit of a thrill to be on the other side of said plans.
"Well, first we have to figure out if Umbridge and Fudge's wife knew of Parker's activities before the trial," Hermione began. "Then we'll have a course of action for the real coup de grâce."

~~~~~~~*~

Life in Malu Palekaiko was a bit quieter with the Malfoys gone, sort of. Draco and Ginny had taken a Portkey that morning with the nouveau Mrs. Weasley. Closing up shop Friday was without the discussion of business matters, as the silence was usually filled with talk of a commission that was ready for pickup, or of a particularly dense student who was having troubles in a subject. Walking to Bongo's alone, Severus was greeted with the usual "Aloha", to which his was the only voice that replied.

Mounga introduced Severus to the island's newest resident and sanctuary-seeker, Jerry, an Auror in his early- to mid-thirties from New York City who had decided the Muggle government and law enforcement system was too corrupt to not intervene with a bit of magic to set things right. Jerry was of average build with short dark blond hair with a face which could easily blend into a crowd except for the rather prominent Muggle tattoo of a dragon on his forearm.

Jerry explained the local mob bosses had been putting the squeeze on his father, a Muggle, for decades, and recently had been getting rather rough with him when he refused to pay an increase in protection money. Police and other law enforcement officials decided not to pursue the case because it was too small, not while Federal law enforcement officials were busy building a RICO case against the gangsters involved. Taking action on Jerry's father's case would interfere with the much larger case they were building. Unfortunately, while the RICO case would take years, Jerry's father only had so many bones, and so much money to pay for trips to the hospital – and that didn't include the cost to deal with damage to his business. The U.S. Magical Department of Law Enforcement was already quite clear on their policy of forbidding Muggle-born children from using magic to protect their parents when there was Muggle law enforcement to deal with the matter.

A bit of Veritaserum, some Polyjuice potion, and a live broadcast on television with the Muggle prosecutor and others from the district attorney's office had made for quite the scandal in the Muggle news media when they confessed to taking bribes from the Mafia to stall the RICO case. Needless to say, the people who had made life difficult for Jerry's father – and the law enforcement officials who had turned a blind eye to it – were no longer a problem for the man. Jerry, however, was now persona non grata and a highly sought-after "criminal." Jerry made his own illegal Portkey to take him straight to Malu Palekaiko once his bosses at the U.S. Magical Department of Law Enforcement figured out he was behind the exposé.

"Was it worth it?" Severus asked.

"If someone you loved was going through what my father went through, I don't think you'd even Severus had thought of what he would have done had Hermione died. He decided burning a swath of destruction through to the farthest corners of Great Britain and the world to track down and torture Alan Parker was only the beginning of it. And even if it meant living his life in Azkaban, devoid of a soul, it would still have been worth it. He merely asked if Jerry thought it was worth it for himself.

"So what are you? Welsh?" Jerry asked, picking up Severus' accent.

'And that makes it five' Severus noted to himself, since people had guessed he was from every English-speaking country but England.

Arnold was by the piano, belting out yet another tune from his favorite singer.

Before Severus could reply with a snarky comment, Jerry asked, gesturing with a drink in his hand, "Who's the Elvis fan?"

"That would be Arnold, fellow Potions master." Severus finished his drink and ordered another for himself.

"Is he a sanctuary-seeker, too?" Jerry spun around to better watch the wizard belt out a soulful rendition of "Blue Hawaii."

Severus nodded.

"Why did he come? What's his story?"

Severus picked up his new drink and took a sip before answering, "I don't know. He never told me, and it is none of my business. If he chooses to tell me, he will. A lot of us sanctuary-seekers are not so quick to share our tales of why we came."

Jerry glanced at Severus' left arm and said, "I recognize the ink. Is that why you came?"
With a tilt of the head to acknowledge Jerry's implication, Severus discreetly placed his right hand on his wand in his pocket. "Mounga knows why I am here, and I got the welcome packet, same as you," he said. He flashed a casual smile that held a glint of warning, his eyes darting to the bar top and stopping on Jerry's folder, an unofficial badge of approval for those who had sought and received sanctuary.

Being an Auror, Jerry didn't miss Severus had his hand on his wand. Putting both hands up, his drink in one hand, he said, "Hey buddy, I'm no threat. You don't have to worry about me being a bounty hunter or anything. If Mounga says you're cool, I've no beef with you." Severus noted Jerry's New York accent was particularly strong when he was agitated, becoming quite nasal.

Pulling his hand out of his pocket, Severus made a gesture of good will and flagged Bongo to get another drink for the ex-Auror, Severus' treat.

"You wouldn't have fetched a very good price for me anyway, as I've recently been exonerated." Severus and Jerry clinked glasses in cheers to the good news for the ex-Death Eater.

"You plan on staying? Mounga mentioned the friend you came here with is back home."

"Just for a visit. He and his wife have a new life here. As do I." Severus decided to say nothing more on the matter, which was just as well.

Jerry was applauding now that Arnold had finished singing. Then the ex-Auror picked up his drink to go talk with the crooning wizard, leaving Severus' side without so much as a farewell.

Mounga, who went to sit with his wife at a table closer to the piano, looked at Severus and shrugged. Seems that neither wizard knew quite what to make of Jerry, even with Mounga knowing all of the ex-Auror's secrets, having processed him earlier in the day.

After drinks, Severus grabbed a quick bite of take-out to enjoy at the Friday night movies.

The park was set up with the usual variety of lounge chaises, lawn chairs, and couches, low-hovering flying carpets with cushions, floating hammocks, and picnic blankets. It was a summer tradition, if you could call fourteen years a tradition.
When the summer Muggle studies youth program started in mid-June, so did the weekly Friday night movies, usually featuring a performance on a large Wurlitzer organ. The Muggle organist used to perform at her church before she and her wizard husband moved to retire to Malu Palekaiko. That performance was followed by a cartoon from various periods, from old fashioned black-and-white ones made shortly after sound was invented, all the way up to computer-animated shorts. After that, there was a double-feature focusing on some theme. The first week was Westerns, followed in subsequent weeks by film noir, historical pictures, mysteries, romantic comedies, farces, science fiction, musicals (such as the recent showing of My Fair Lady), and dramatic films, among the many genres included. Usually the first film of the evening was more family-friendly fare, as young children attended, with something more suitable for older teens and adults for the second film that usually started after the young ones were tucked into bed. Those who were more versed in cinema made no mention of the omission of fantasy and horror movies, since their stereotypical portrayal of "monsters," witches, wizards, vampires, and other magical beings was extremely insulting, obviously biased with little relevance to facts.

When Severus found out Mounga was the one behind the summer Muggle studies program, which included the summer movie series and Muggle camps for the kids, he asked what had inspired him to come up with such a curriculum. Mounga was rather evasive and muttered something about removing the temptation of forbidden fruit. It was clear there was more behind the story of its inspiration, but Severus was not about to press the matter.

As Severus finished the last of his Thai yellow curry with shrimp, he flicked his wand so the bowl and utensils would sail below the line of sight of the other movie patrons and discreetly into the proper bus pan. The various restaurants had each put out a bus pan to collect their dirty dishes, as many attendees treated the outdoor movie in the park as a weekly family picnic and outing.

The cartoon had just finished. Severus was ready to watch the movie, a musical-comedy, without having to worry about spilling curry sauce on his shirt.

The Finau family was next to Severus. They were also just finishing up their meal of Japanese fare, when Kaimi, who noticed that Severus was done, went over to him.

"Can I sit on your lap, Uncle Severus?" Kaimi asked without any shyness to her request.

Severus blinked back for a second, momentarily stunned that the child wished to sit in his lap when she normally cuddled in her father's lap during movie night.

"You want to sit on my lap?" he asked. It was what the child had asked, but he had never had any child ask him for such a request and wanted to clarify he had heard her correctly. Glancing over at her father, Severus saw Mounga smile and make some non-committal gesture with his shoulders at him.

"Is that okay? I think you need a hug," Kaimi plainly stated.

Severus wanted to politely decline, but Kaimi was a very perceptive child. Severus did need a hug. Preferably one from Hermione, but the honest and simple affections from this child would certainly do. Reluctantly, he nodded, to which Kaimi hopped into his lap and settled in.

"Don't worry, I'm not a wiggleworm," she assured him just as the opening credits began.

Severus hated to admit it, but it was not an entirely unpleasant experience to have Kaimi snuggled on his lap. Her favorite part was where the main character, a court jester for whom the movie was titled, was babbling on about vessels and pestles and chalices and palaces. He found that having the eight-year-old giggle with delight at that part helped him find it a bit more humorous than he otherwise would have. There was a communal factor to it.

When the movie ended, Severus found Kaimi passed out cold on his lap, still clutching the front of his shirt. Mounga came over and gently lifted her from Severus' lap and into his arms to carry home.

"Kaimi has been very concerned about you and has been asking if you're okay recently," Mounga informed his friend.

"She asked to sit on my lap," Severus replied.

"I told her to ask you if it was okay and that you might not be the cuddling type. She said she could tell you were sad and that maybe a hug might make you feel better. You do look a bit better," Mounga said with a slightly humorous lilt to his voice. "She seems to have her mother's healing touch."

Severus did feel a bit better, but said nothing to confirm Mounga's observation. Even he did not want to admit he was feeling anxious about Draco and Ginny going back to England, and wondering what was currently happening with Hermione and if she was still his or not. He had given Draco another memory to hand her, as putting his emotions to parchment was a futile endeavor with no satisfaction of the end result. He could speak his heart plainly to her with greater ease, which seemed contradictory to his normally reserved nature.
Just as Severus was formulating a reply to Mounga's comments, Arnold and Jerry walked by, wishing Severus a good night. They walked off into the night and Severus cocked his head sideways, wondering if...

"Yeah, looks like Arnold's smitten," Mounga said quietly, confirming Severus' suspicions.

Arnold, in all the months Severus had gotten to know him, had never indicated any preference for men or women, but it seems tonight he was certainly taken with Malu Palekaiko's newest resident, even with an age difference of close to twenty years. Severus was the last to judge about an age difference that great.

Rainbow and the two older children had packed up the family belongings with their wands and were ready to head home.

"Can I watch the next film, Mom?" Akela asked, her eyes and voice pleading, a blanket draped over her arm.

"What's showing?"

"Monty Python and the Holy Grail; it's a comedy," Mounga answered his wife.

"A movie about the Holy Grail, the object that set King Arthur on a path towards a fool's errand, ignoring his kingdom much to the warning of Merlin? Is it probable the Muggle version has little resemblance to the actual account of events as it is supposed to be a comedy? And how do snakes factor into the story?" Severus questioned with circumspect suspicion.

"Trust me, it is written as a whimsical farce from frame one," Mounga assured the skeptical Brit who had grown up in the very same land in which Merlin and Arthur's tale was steeped. "It employs logical dissection of argument, in addition to making fun of Arthurian 'fables.' Stick around and watch it. You might actually laugh."

"Doubtful." Severus arched a brow in disbelief of his friend's claims.

Mounga gave his eldest daughter his permission to stay and watch the film, while Severus assured
Mounga he would escort Akela home safe and sound after the film. Both wizards' eyes had glanced over the slew of young wizards around Akela's age who were still hanging around for the second feature, as well as the few vampires who were there. The vampires in Malu Palekaiko were well behaved and never sampled without express permission, but Akela was an attractive teenage girl. Any father would be concerned.

That weekend was the Japanese Bon festival. Severus attended after he finished with his Saturday appointments, enjoying the festivities and learning more Japanese words. He had begun learning the language, in addition to Hawaiian. There was dancing, taiko drumming, and fireworks over the next three days, in addition to the setting of lanterns to the sea in remembrance of ancestors.

Severus had no wish to remember or honor anyone he was related to. His parents had passed with little to no mourning from him. The only ones he had mourned were those who had become his new family, but many had died during the war. Though Minerva wasn't exactly like a mother or aunt to him, she was a colleague and an amicable friend who always had good advice, though they were not close. Albus Dumbledore had become the father he never had. Of all the ones who had passed, Severus missed him the most.

With the revelation of Dumbledore's will and the proof needed to clear his name, some long-held misconceptions and resentments Severus had regarding the headmaster were now gone. He'd thought Albus had cast him adrift with no one to vouch for his loyalty to the Order and efforts in the war. Severus thought Dumbledore had died without any consideration to his and Draco's names and reputation, but the old codger had done so. It just had taken years before his will was found by Hermione, hidden in plain sight, revealed with a simple spell.

Standing alongside the shore, as the tide began to go out, Severus and many others set their paper lanterns into the water to head out to sea in the Tōrō nagashi ceremony. As there were no major rivers on Malu Palekaiko, people did this in the calm sheltered waters of the harbor. Some waded out into the ocean up to their hips before setting the warmly glowing white lanterns into the water. With the setting of the lantern in memory of Albus upon the softly swelling waves, Severus allowed his disappointment and resentment he'd held for his old mentor drift away as well, letting go some of the anger he had held in his heart for so long.

~~~~~~~*~

Waking to the sight of Severus' bouquet of flowers and the two leis on the bedside table should have been a wondrous sight for Hermione, but the pounding in her head tampered the pleasant feeling down significantly. The wave of nausea and the sandpaper glued to the inside of her eyelids did nothing to improve the morning. Risking the choice of sitting up and vomiting, or continuing to lie in bed all morning, Hermione chose the less wise of the two. Fortunately, upon sitting up, she found a vial of hangover relief potion, courtesy of Albert, waiting for her along with a note next to the vase of flowers.

It was after she drained the vial of its contents Hermione realized she wasn't even in her own bed. She finally remembered she was put up in one of the guest bedrooms at Lavender and Ron's mansion. Ginny and Draco were also staying there during their brief stay in England, and were probably already awake. Reading the note, now that she could focus her eyes, she learned Albert was giving her the day off with the acknowledgment she had some important matters to deal with.

Recalling last night's events, she remembered coming up with a plan to deal with Calpurnia Fudge and Dolores Umbridge, with Albert more than happy to deal a blow to the Minister's wife. He had received some thinly-veiled threatening letters recently, specifically tied to taking Hermione on as his apprentice. The letters seemed to coincide with the timing of Alan Parker discovering Hermione's apprenticeship that night in Flourish and Blotts. Albert Dobmeir did not take kindly to threats, but decided to wait until an opportunity presented itself before he addressed Calpurnia Fudge's imminence. This recent revelation only firmed the resolve of everyone else in the room to help Hermione with her idea.

With the plan laid out, and already a fair amount of alcohol coursing through her system, it was then Draco said they should celebrate and decided to fix everyone who was drinking a new libation he learned in Malu Palekaiko called "Wipe Out." Everything after the second sip was just a blur, though Hermione noticed Albert didn't drink any of Draco's annihilating concoction. She would have to ask Draco for the recipe so she could surprise the other Potions masters with a round of "Name what's in this drink" at the next booze-up. Even she couldn't figure out what she was drinking, the mix of fruit juices and alcohol masking whatever it was that had knocked her for a loop.

Dressed in her clothes which were clean, most probably washed and pressed by the house-elves while she slept, Hermione hobbled down to the breakfast nook where everyone but Ron was up.

"Morning, or should I say good afternoon," Ginny said a bit too cheerily, with a plate full of something that looked like lunch in front of her.

Hermione may have had a dose of hangover relief potion, but it still didn't mean she was entirely recovered. Later on she would concoct her special supplemental hangover treatment that included ginger, lime, and peppermint, but for now she needed tea.

"What did you poison me with last night?" Hermione asked, glaring at Draco who was enjoying his plate of poached fish and lightly sautéed vegetables.
"Same thing Severus drank during our first night in sanctuary, and he was just as far gone as you," Draco said with a satisfied grin. "Don't worry. Before you came over, Albert said if we had a chance to get you to relax this weekend and forget your troubles, we should do so. I told him about the drink and he gave his blessings for me to serve it up, should the opportunity to arise. He said you should try it yourself before serving it up at your next Potions master meeting next weekend."

Hermione didn't know if she should be worried that Albert knew what she was going to drink, or kiss the old bastard for coming up with the same idea she had to serve it up next week.

"Does that drink cause muscle soreness and aching feet?" Hermione asked, wrapping her hands around a delicate china cup filled with tea – glorious, life-giving, sanity-saving tea.

"No, that would be due to the dancing at the club last night," Ginny illuminated her friend.

"I went dancing at a club?" Hermione wondered if this was some joke.

Lavender, who was enjoying a light lunch as well, said with refined poise, "Well, after you and the 'boys' were done with your bets on who could come up with the most raunchiest dirty limericks, Ginny mentioned how she had a craving for Korean barbecue and kimchee, to which everyone decided going out at eleven at night for Korean barbecue was a dandy idea."

"Dirty limericks?" Hermione asked.

"Yes, and you won with your limerick," Ginny said.

Hermione placed her head in her hands and wanted to whimper. She prided herself on not being crass, so this was becoming as painful to listen to as the recounts of her behavior after her post-NEWT binge that wound up in the papers.

Draco cleared his throat as he began to recite,

"A wizard with a wand made of rose
    Had a very prodigious nose.
    His feet were as large
    As a giant's own barge,
    And the rest well endowed, we suppose."
Hermione slumped down onto the table and whimpered pitifully.

"You never did answer Ron's question about the size of Severus' feet," Draco volunteered. He was enjoying this ribbing just a bit too much, which resulted in a sharp elbow in his own ribs by his wife.

"None of your damn business," Hermione muttered against the wooden table top.

"That's what you said last night," Ginny informed her.

"I still think my limerick should have won," Draco insisted. "It was by far, more crass than yours."

He took a sip of tea before reciting,

"A witch who worked as a harlot
Would easily shag any varlet.
In a very rough pub
She yelled, 'Finish yer grub
And I'll fuck every one of the whole lot!'"

Hermione groaned and agreed it was far more crass than hers.

Ginny shook her head, still amazed Draco could be so refined one moment and then something like that could spew out of his mouth. At least with the twins, you could expect something like that from them.

"You still haven't explained why my feet hurt," Hermione reminded her host and fellow guests.

Lavender said, "After some late-night nibbles, Harry spotted a dance club and suggested we all go dancing."

"Harry? Dancing?" Hermione said with disbelief, wondering if Lavender was putting one on her.

"Yes, imagine my surprise when he said considering his aversion to dancing, especially in public, but his broom was listing worse than the German Quidditch team during Oktoberfest," Ginny added, still sounding surprised at the occurrence.
"I didn't do anything... foolish, did I?" Hermione had no recollection of the events. She hoped that this morning's Daily Prophet didn't have yet another topless photograph of her.

"All of us sober witches made sure no one misbehaved in any way," Ginny assured her with a wink. "You certainly cut loose last night and danced like some wild maenad."

This did not in any way comfort Hermione, who put her head back down on the table, not giving a fig about table manners at the moment.

"Come, drink your tea and put something into your stomach," Draco told her. "Potter will be coming over here soon, and we have things to do if we're going to carry out your plans in time before the election."

~~~~~~~*~

Walking home after the fireworks which signaled the end of the Bon festival, Severus pulled out his wand to unlock his front door. The faint mewling of a cat drew his eye towards a darkened corner not illuminated by his front porch light.

"Lumos."

His wandtip glowed blue and reflected off the wide chartreuse-colored eyes of a young juvenile cat. It was more than a kitten, its legs lanky and grace still somewhat ungainly with youth. It was also looking quite underfed.

The young cat did not fear Severus, but moved forward, sniffing at the tip of Severus' wand as if it was something to possibly eat or rub up against.

"Where's your home?" Severus asked, knowing the beast could not answer for itself. It merely looked up at him, mewling in a plaintive way.

Severus surmised it must have sought shelter from the explosion of fireworks at the end of the Bon festival. The pyrotechnics seemed to have put many of the pets on the island into a tizzy, like after the Fourth of July.

Lighting the candles in his home, the light spilled out onto the front porch. Now Severus could better see the apparently homeless creature. If it had a home, it wouldn't have looked so malnourished. Even by the light of the candles and lamps, Severus could see the ribs plainly visible through its black fur.

Severus felt pity for the poor beast, remembering what it was like to be young and hungry. Leaving the front door open, he said, "Well, come inside if you want to eat." He was sure there was something suitable in his pantry.

The lanky cat poked its head about the threshold for a moment. Severus was ready to give up and close the door in its face when the beast finally padded its way into the house. It looked up at Severus for him to lead the way, since he was the one who had invited it in.

There was a chicken Severus was going to have the hired house-elf who cooked for him prepare for tomorrow night's dinner. He already had all the offal put aside for stock and gravy.

Fetching the liver, he chopped it up and even warmed it up to the temperature of a fresh kill with a swirl of his wand, since the cat probably would be unsure what to make of cold meat.

After Severus set the liver down on a plate, the cat greedily wolfed it down, a sign the cat had not eaten for a while and was definitely homeless. Severus fetched a small saucer and filled it with milk. He let the cat lap away at it, contentedly purring that it finally had something in its stomach, thanks to this kind wizard.

The animal showed its gratitude by rubbing up against Severus' legs, swirling about in a figure-eight pattern between his legs, its head rubbing along his calf.

"Ginny has been talking about getting a cat. You should make an acceptable pet for her when she returns," Severus reasoned, explaining why he bothered to let the cat stay instead of evicting it, while spelling the cat hair off of himself.

Severus had never had a pet. He had an owl but that was not anything he was attached to, as he viewed it more like a service animal to deliver his mail than as a companion. Currently, Severus kept his owl at work most of the time, roosting at his house only on the weekends.

As Severus didn't want to wake up with cat by-products in his house which might come out of either end of the cat, or fleas, he grabbed some extra bedding and laid it out on the back porch, under the broad eaves to keep the cat and bedding dry should it rain overnight.
Still, Severus was not going to adopt this cat.

What Severus didn't realize was that just as the wand chooses the wizard, the cat decides who it wants to adopt. He didn't really have much say in the matter.

~~~~~~~*~

The fact-finding mission to Dolores Umbridge's residence earlier in the day yielded some interesting results. Draco had taken Polyjuice Potion and transformed into Calpurnia Fudge, in order to gain entrance into Umbridge's home before stunning her. Lavender did not reveal how she had gotten hold of some of Mrs. Fudge's hair. It was fortuitous that Umbridge was a spinster, so there was no husband or other family to deal with.

Harry, Hermione, and Lavender arrived once the officious cunt of a witch was secured with several binding spells and her wand was taken away. Veritaserum and some very specific questions revealed that while Umbridge and Calpurnia Fudge had no idea Alan Parker was behind the murder of several Death Eaters, nor did they direct him to attack Hermione, Umbridge was aware of Mrs. Fudge's machinations to stop Hermione from getting an apprenticeship for many years. It also came out that Umbridge and her friend not only wished Alan had finished dispatching Hermione Weasley, but a few other choice bits of information that went beyond the pale.

Lavender made use of her exceptional talents for memory charms, making sure Umbridge remembered nothing more than Calpurnia Fudge visiting, and both drinking a bit too much sherry for them both to remember the afternoon.

Back at Lavender and Ron's home, Draco changed back into his regular form. His talent for mimicking vocal and physical mannerisms had made him the first choice to take the Polyjuice Potion.

Now they knew what Umbridge knew, they could begin to plan for the second phase of Hermione's operation. Fortunately, the opportunity to implement it would be later this week, before Draco and Ginny planned to return to Hawaii.

Before Hermione headed home to eat a dinner she knew Marf would have waiting for her, ready and hot, Draco and Ginny took her aside.

"We brought back a few things for you from Hawaii, but here is one more thing from Severus. I promised to deliver this to you personally." Draco placed a vial into Hermione's hand.
Looking at the glass tube, this one with a green cap, she knew it was another memory for her.

Hermione thanked Draco for all his help and gave him a hug, filled with the same warmth she had for all her friends. Somehow, between when he left all those months ago and his return, Draco had changed dramatically. Gone was the animosity he once held for her, and in its place was not only sincerity and warmth, but a sense of serenity he had lacked before. Draco had found happiness and peace with all his wishes fulfilled, thanks to Severus and Hermione.

She wondered if Severus had found peace himself since reaching Malu Palekaiko, and if he had changed as well.

After dinner, Hermione went to work to use Lavender's Pensieve, which was still in her office among her Potions journals, books, and apprenticeship paperwork.

Standing by the desk, she tipped the vial into the bowl of shimmering liquid, watching the memory swirl in a quiet ballet of fluidity. Leaning over, she felt the cool liquid touch her nose and was pulled into a new memory from Severus.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Thank you to my tireless and talented betas, JuneW and Cygnuz.

Beta/NOTES:
Before Moody and the other officials arrived to interfere with Harry's interrogation of Alan Parker, Harry had Lavender come in and remove some key memories from Alan regarding Hermione and Ginny, and had Lavender leave before Moody and certain Ministry officials arrived. But Harry cannot tell that to the Malfoys or Hermione, since "it never happened."
Upon entering the Pensieve to view the new memory from Severus, Hermione gathered her bearings, finding herself in a strange place. The ground was damp – from recently fallen rain, by the look of it – and though she could not feel it on her skin, there was a breeze from the nearby ocean in the air, judging by the way the trees moved.

Severus was standing on a broad veranda at the front of a house that overlooked the tops of the
He still was sporting a beard; it looked even more grown in, but well-trimmed. There was a slender shock of solid white hair at his temple; it wasn't large, but it was still quite visible in stark contrast to Severus' raven locks. He hadn't had it in the photograph, and it went down to the very ends of his long hair. Severus wearing a Hawaiian shirt was a bit of a shock, but at least he was wearing trousers, and not shorts. She doubted Severus had broken down and bought a pair yet.

He smiled into the distance as if trying to focus on some unseen ghost. She knew this wasn't a past memory – rather, he had made it specifically to send to her as a message to watch.

“Welcome and Aloha, Hermione.” Severus turned and walked inside, then glanced over his shoulder. “Come. I know you will be taking in your surroundings in this memory, but you can watch it again. I have much to show you.”

Hermione followed him inside, noting the dark woods and high, open beamed ceilings.

Looking about, turning around, Severus said, “I had this house built with the hope someday you could come and share it with me, and make it a home.”

It was beautiful and Hermione was awestruck. The design was spacious, simple, and elegant while the architecture still evoked a hint of something foreign and exotic. Severus walked on towards another room. “I had a library built with you in mind, anticipating there would be enough shelf space for all your books and mine.” He gave a short laugh, adding, “I do have about half of my other books at work. But I hope I planned enough space for you.”

Hermione spun about looking at the richly exotic woodwork and the tall bookcases lining the room. In the ceiling over the center of the room, there was a skylight that cast bright and even light about the room – plenty of reading light for the two chairs placed with a table between them. There was also a couple of hanging chandeliers which were currently filled with half-burnt unlit candles. Hermione glanced at the cover of the book Severus was reading and noticed it was written in Chinese. She wanted to say how the room was perfect, and she could imagine them spending many nights in there reading together in quiet companionable silence, but she knew this was merely a memory and he could not respond.

Severus then led Hermione to the kitchen where her bouquet of palm fronds and rudbeckia was placed in a vase in the center of the table. There was plenty of cupboard space. Hermione recognized some of the skillets hanging by the cooker on a rack with hooks, remembering the many meals they cooked together using those cast iron pans.
Severus sat down at the table, as if they were about to have a cup of tea together. Looking out across the room, he said, “I can't tell you how much I have missed you. It would take far too long to say how much, but know you've occupied my thoughts and are still entrenched in my heart. And while I had to let you free when I left, I also regret not contacting you sooner and telling you plainly how much I've needed you.”

A bittersweet smile grace his lips as he looked at his hands folded on the table. “I have everything I've ever wanted: my freedom and my name restored, all thanks to you. And through your act to help me reach sanctuary, I've also been able to build a thriving business, gain the respect of the community, build a house, have everything I've dreamt about for years while I suffered under the Death Eater Decree, and before that even. Yet you were right, I was never truly free until you exonerated my name and deeds. I'm finally free, and it's all because of you.”

Severus looked back up and across the room, exactly where Hermione was facing him in this memory. “But even with everything I have, it still lacks what I need the most, and that is you.”

Hermione felt the tears coming. She pulled out a handkerchief she had brought along with her into the memory, knowing she would probably cry at some point. Her heart sang and danced knowing he still loved her just as much, but still broke at the sight of Severus' face, telling of the pain he felt in missing her, a reflection of her own longing for him.

“And as much as I would like to ask you to pick up your life and come here to be by my side now, I know that would be selfish of me.” There was a sigh of resignation from both Severus and Hermione in unison. “Just as I've striven so long for the things I now have, thanks to you, I cannot deny what you've sought for so long as well. You must finish your apprenticeship with Albert Dobmeir. Unfortunately, the old traditions and prejudices of our profession frown upon any apprentice who changes masters unless there are certain conditions, such as death and incapacity. Finish your apprenticeship, become a fine mistress of the art of Potions, and then come join me.” When he said the last part, she heard his hint of warning that despite how much she might want to buck convention, she must stay the course.

Hermione watched as Severus swallowed hard, the same nervous swallow she had seen him do before talking about something difficult.

“To say that I was upset about hearing how you received the wrong flowers would be understating it by a bit.” Severus actually gave a short laugh, and Hermione could tell he'd made the choice of his words to trivialize his reaction. “I hope by this point you have received the correct flowers, though I can't wait to hear from Draco how that original mix-up occurred.” The somberness returned to Severus as his face became grim and he drew his lips into a thin tight line. “But to hear about what that monster did. I...”
Severus dropped his chin to his chest. She saw him take a moment to collect himself, as Hermione did as well, as her tears started up once again.

“I was overcome with grief. Looking back, I can objectively say I went temporarily mad. I had heard most of the story when I stormed off... and into a cyclone. Literally.” Severus lifted his head and pulled a hank of his white hair aside from his head, frowning a bit. “No doubt you've noticed the hair.” He sighed with resignation. “As Mounga said, 'Not everyone who has been kissed by Pele has lived to tell the tale.' And knowing you, you've probably already researched a bit about Hawaii and know that Pele is not only the goddess of fire and volcanoes, but wind and lightning as well.” There was a bit of humorous lilt to Severus’ voice, and she could see he had tried to make light of something very grave.

Hermione gasped in shock realizing that Severus had been struck by lightning.

“I am glad you have recovered. Please know I would have done anything to spare you from what happened, even risked coming back to face Azkaban,” Severus admitted freely with sincerity.

Rising from his seat, Severus held out his hand, his gesture inviting Hermione to come along with him. “Enough talk of that which has brought us much grief. This is supposed to be a happy memory, something for you to view when you miss me, and bring a smile to your lips and hope to your heart. Come with me, and I'll show you the rest of the house.” Hermione smiled and followed him as he took her on a tour of his house – their house.

The bathroom was better than she could have imagined. There was even an outdoor shower, where she could imagine her and Severus showering beneath the stars at night, and it even had a bench to sit. It did not miss Hermione’s notice that there was a photo of her on Severus' bedside table, and he gave a brief explanation it was a gift from Ginny. Next to it was the lemon she had given him as a promise to clear his name. Severus didn’t say anything about the card with a child's drawing of two people flying in a lightning storm; one of the flyers had obviously fallen off their broom. It was on the table beside her photo, and it must have meant a great deal to him to place it there.

The Potions lab was gorgeous, and she delighted in the spacious work space. Severus reminded her not only the house was built for her in mind, but this lab as well. Looking about, she did see that both of them could comfortably work in the same space and not get under each other's feet. The guest bedrooms were introduced as such, and Hermione noticed a slight shuffling of Severus’ foot. She wondered if he wanted to bring up the option of a bedroom for children in the future, but was afraid. Or maybe he didn't want children and this was a way for him to avoid talking about something they may not have in common. The rooms were empty and barren, being left as an afterthought to deal with later.

The house was minimally furnished, filled with only the absolute necessities for daily life. There were only a few decorative or extraneous pieces – a beautifully carved wooden bowl that rested on a simple console table made of some exotic striped tropical hardwood, both by the front door entrance. There was the same mahogany armoire in the bedroom she remembered from before, but everything else was new, though the bed looked amusingly very similar to the one they shared back in London.

Out in the garden, Severus talked of life in Malu Palekaiko, his usual daily life at his shop, Friday night drinks with the Malfoys and the Finaus, Sunday dinners with Draco and Ginny, and Wednesday night trips to the hot springs to soak away his aches and pains of working over cauldrons daily once again. He told the stories in between familiarizing Hermione with some of the plants in his Potions garden and some of the rarer tropical plants she may not have seen before.

“Now that Lavender has been able to transfer to Draco and me all the gold we earned in her employ, I've been able to pay back Draco for all the money he lent me to help get my business up and running and to have my house built.” Severus kicked at a rock along the path between the beds. “Now that I have a small fortune, I was thinking of getting another parcel of land on the leeward side of the island where it's drier. Many of my Mediterranean plants find all this rain and humidity a bit much too properly thrive.”

Severus looked about and tilted his head back, his face full of the morning sun. “I found this place thinking about you.” He dropped his head and went back to scuffling his dark canvas shoe in the dark dirt, like some small boy somewhat embarrassed to admit something. “Draco said I should write to you. And I tried. Part of me was afraid that if Moody or other Aurors raided your flat, they'd find my letter to you and then you'd be under inquiry by the Ministry. But a large part of it was that I couldn't find the words, which is pretty ironic.”

Severus gave a crooked smile. “I would berate others for prattling on and here I am, going on to empty air in hopes that I haven't begun to bore you with details. As hard as I tried, I couldn't put to parchment everything I felt. I was worried about being too sentimental, and here I am pouring my heart out to you, talking to an imagined vision of you, listening to me with the same intent as when you would ask me to go on about the history behind a certain potion. And in my frustration to find the words back in February, I went stomping off into the jungle and came upon this abandoned property. All that was left was a barren slab when I found it.”

Sitting down on a simple functional bench carved from a fallen log, Severus continued on with his monologue. “I found distractions to keep me occupied with as I tried to ignore the desire I had to send word to you, any word. I also feared you had moved on as I suggested, but I'm glad you didn't. I've never stopped thinking about you, and from what Lavender has told me, neither have you.

“I've waited decades to have my freedom, something that I wanted most in the world. But now I need you, and I will not wait decades to tell you.” Hermione crouched close, seeing the same look in his eyes as the morning when he fled Polyjuiced in her form. “I love you, Hermione. And I always will. I'll wait for you, and hope that Draco and Ginny will return with news for me that you will wait for me as well, and that any misunderstandings, falterings, or doubts are put behind us.”

Severus drew in a deep breath before announcing, “I've ordered a Pensieve of my own from the town's general store. It should be arriving within the next week. Send me back a memory of you so that I can see your face and hear your voice once more. I've missed the sight and sound of you as much as I've missed you.”

Smiling one last time, he said, “Ku’u lei. Nau ko’u aloha. My beloved. My love is yours, Hermione.” Once he finished uttering those words, the memory ended.

Hermione had to sit down in her office and catch her breath. Her head was spinning in the same way that her body flew with the same euphoric elation as when she first realized she was in love with Severus. She had told Severus to find peace, and by his demeanor, she could tell that not only was he far more relaxed, but many of the demons which had periodically seemed to cloud his face had now vanished. Hermione had noticed the same relaxed and free-from-anxiety sensation from Draco as well, as if that which troubled his mind had been swept away with the same Hawaiian breezes that ruffled Severus' hair in the memory.

In the memory, Severus did not hesitate to tell her his heart plainly, whereas before, he struggled to state such matters. The barriers that would have kept them apart were gone now, except for her finishing her apprenticeship. While Severus seemed quite changed by his eight months in Malu Palekaiko, he was still the same man she had fallen in love with. There was still the dry humor and the wit, but there was also an acceptance and less armor around his heart. The anger that had colored Severus' face to the world seemed to have melted away. Not entirely, but he seemed rested, and had that same tranquility about him after they would have made love, or enjoyed a long, conversation-filled dinner together, happy in the moment. He seemed no longer restless.

Hermione had to think about what she wanted to say to Severus before she could create her own memory for Draco and Ginny to take back to him. Pulling out a sheaf of parchment, she began listing all the things she wanted to remember to tell Severus.

~~~~~~~*~

The mewling outside the sliding glass door to his bedroom woke Severus up. It was time to get up anyway.

He padded into his kitchen for a cup of Kona coffee, as he needed something a bit strong that morning before his morning swim. In the kitchen, his attention was drawn to the cat whom was carrying on on the other side of the back door, having run around to the other side of the property when it heard that the wizard was up.
Severus opened the back door and was greeted by the young cat proudly standing behind two rats that lay on his back porch. One was dead, the other was still twitching but definitely stunned. Severus dispatched both rats, as he had plenty of rat parts. His students brought him in properly processed rat parts that he paid them well for, but still below cost from the local apothecary.

The cat jumped as the magic left Severus' wand and made the rats disappear. The diminutive furry beast decided it had earned a reward. It promptly invited itself into Severus' kitchen and sat there, looking up at him expectantly for some food for a good night's work.

Crossing his arms across his chest, one eye squinting as he gave the cat a dismissive glare, he said, “All right. I suppose you've earned your keep for now. Now maybe I won't be losing so many tomatoes to those little thieves, so I'll have more tomatoes for gazpacho.” A plate of leftover locally-caught grilled fish that wasn't quite enough for a whole meal was given to the cat for a job well done, along with a saucer of milk. Severus set out a small bowl of water on the back porch, as the animal was going to keep his property free of vermin until Ginny and Draco could come back and take charge of the cat.

As Severus walked down to the beach for his morning swim, the cat followed him like a familiar, keeping him company. Before Severus went into the water, he pointed at his shirt and towel, and instructed the cat it was not to claw at, piss on, vomit hair balls on, or otherwise rub any cat hair on these items while he was out for his swim.

The cat merely made a trilling noise. Severus was unsure if this was a sound to indicate it understood or to say, “Fuck you, I'll do what I damn well please,” as he knew cats were wont to do at times.

Returning from his swim, he found that his items were untouched as instructed, but that the cat had left three partially mauled giant cockroaches in his sandals. He was glad to have caught it before slipping his feet in the sandals, and made a point to remember to mention the footwear next time as well.

In the bakery, Kosal remarked on what a sweet cat Severus had adopted. After Severus paid for his morning croissant, Kosal gave the cat a bit of cheese danish to nibble on. He petted the cat's head before it followed Severus out the door and back home.

Severus refused to let the cat into his bedroom while he was showering and changing into his work clothes for the day. He knew how Pettigrew hid for years in his Animagus form. The spell to turn an Animagus back into human form was cast and the beast remained in its current state, with a short hiss in response to the surge of magic that coursed through it. This meant that it really was a cat and not someone who was spying on him or seeking a free meal. Still, having the animal about watching as he paraded around in the altogether was just not going to happen.

The cat seemed to forgive Severus pretty quick about having a spell cast at it, and went back to rubbing up against his leg, willing to forgive him as he did give it the best meal of its short life. It's hard to lose a cat's loyalty after giving it fresh liver and grilled fish.

Severus evicted the cat from his home as he locked up for the day. He wondered what other “gifts” the cat would have waiting on his doorstep when he returned at the end of the day, or find the cat had moved onto a new home, one that would spoil it rotten with inside bedding, spells to amuse it, endless petting, and effusive cuddles.

~~~~~~~*~

There was a new vigor in Hermione's work. She had more energy and was more focused than she had been for the past few months. There was a bounce in her step that did not go unnoticed by Albert or Lavender, and her cheerfulness was almost downright annoying.

Ginny and Draco were busy themselves while Hermione was at work. Draco had to check his vault at the London Gringotts branch to see if all the money taken by the Ministry had been returned, along with what items were replaced and what the compensation was for unreturned confiscated items. Then there was the surveying of Malfoy Manor, and hiring of repair wizards and witches to fix what was damaged during the years of abandonment. At least there were no owners to kick out as Malfoy Manor had no one interested in buying the place.

Hermione learned that the overgrown mansion she saw in the distance the night she and Ron went to the Grand Royal Supper Club was Malfoy Manor. She knew there would be a lot of work to bring the property back up to habitable levels. It wouldn't be ready to inhabit until after the Malfoys had gone back Hawaii, but it would be ready, with a small staff of caretakers, for when they returned. There was talk of them coming back for a grand ball in the spring already, after the baby was born.

For the first few nights, Hermione tried to create a memory for Severus, but would become frustrated when she had forgotten something and wanted to go back to a subject she already discussed, or she had forgotten whole topics she wanted to include all together. Sometimes a subject came up causing her to burst into tears, when she needed to stop, collect herself, and start fresh from the beginning again. By Wednesday night, after the third try that night, Hermione realized this just wasn't going to work. She was better at putting her thoughts down onto a scroll versus speaking freely, the opposite of Severus' problem. It was in its own way also pretty ironic, considering how she originally came to Severus spilling her heart out so freely, talking on and on.

Sitting down with several sheaves, she began writing. Hermione would still create a memory for Severus as he requested, but it would be something a little different and special.
Scratching with quill and ink into his ledger, Severus heard the front door bell ring indicating another customer. Now that Draco was gone for the week, he had deal with all of his customers personally versus having someone field the nature of the call before being disturbed.

“Come in,” the Potions master called from his office, finishing up some notes on some recently-delivered commissions.

“Buenos días, Señor Snape,” Maria greeted him as she sat down in a chair opposite from him.

Severus put down his quill and sat upright in his chair, gazing at the witch with a cool eye. Speaking in Spanish, he asked, “And what brings you into my business today, Señora?”

Maria did not look at him with any of the same hostility she had for the past several weeks. Instead there was a contrite look about her. “I’ve come to tell you that I just received news that my husband has passed away. And with that, I am free to go back home, no longer fearing his wrath directed at me or our son.”

“Are you looking for sympathy or my congratulations?” he asked, his exterior as icy as a glacier.

“Neither. I am telling you that I will be leaving for Peru soon so that my son can grow up to be surrounded by my family. As much as Hawaii has become a home, I have family that I want to go back to. And Miguel would love to get to know all his cousins, his grandparents, aunts, and uncles.”

“And you are bothering to tell me now after refusing to speak to me, and spreading word about the island about what a lousy screw I was... because?” he asked, becoming agitated by her mere presence, feeling his resentment towards her simmering to the top once more.

“I’m here because before I leave I felt I should apologize,” she answered hotly, beginning to yell, agitated by Severus' blunt and abrasive confrontational style. “Rainbow evidently didn't know about you and this Hermione when she tried to set us up, telling me how I should get you to come around. She said a nudge was all at was needed to push you in the right direction. How was she to know?” Maria as being rather defensive, laying the blame upon Rainbow.

“It was none of her business to begin with. And let's not forget that you were the one to act upon such suggestions, so she's not entirely to blame,” he reminded her of her part in this as well.
Rainbow had already apologized to him personally and did it in a manner that was much more gracious and sincere than this witch before him.

“Nor did you have to shove me up against a wall and fuck me like some macho shithead,” Maria jogged his memory as well, getting quite aggravated at Severus evading his part in the whole debacle.

“You were quick to accept my impromptu advances, and seemed to have no qualms about fulfilling your needs right there and then, after you provoked me into such action by word and touch,” he growled at her, not willing to let her forget she was the instigator. “And as for the 'lousy' part, you seemed to enjoy yourself quite a bit during the act.” There was a smug grin of triumph as he sat back in his chair.

“You arrogant bastard!” she huffed with indignation.

“I've been called that and far worse by people higher in my esteem than you, but never by the many, many, witches I've had have I ever been called 'lousy.' So your opinion matters not, and with your departure, we'll never have to cross paths again. So there does seem to be a bright side to this conversation.” Severus went back to his ledger. “Adios, Señora.” He was ignoring her as he scribbled away once again.

Furious at being dismissed rudely, Maria stood up and grabbed a jar of pickled bat wings from the corner of his desk and threw it against the wall behind Severus.

“I’ll be sure to send you the bill,” Severus said nonchalantly to her retreating back as his wand casually swished to clean up the mess, echoing the same last words she had spoken to him during their previous encounter.

~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~_~

Lavender insisted on a long girls-only lunch, which consisted of eating at some wizarding restaurant with lovely outdoor seating amidst a garden and requisite bubbling fountain. The meal was followed by some shopping for clothes at Madame Maurelle Mandel's House of Haute Couture.

“So have you made a memory for Severus yet?” asked Ginny with a wicked grin. She was glancing over her shoulder as she was shuffling through some of the maternity lingerie Madam Mandel had brought out for her, upon learning the good news of her pregnancy.
“How did you...?” Hermione was about to ask, but Ginny answered her unfinished question.

“Because I remember Severus talking with Draco about which Pensieve to buy: the one made in China with ancient Chinese characters, the one made in Greece with ancient Greek symbols, or the Swedish model with runes like Dumbledore used to have.” Ginny held up the dark green silk and lace peignoir, sticking her hand underneath the fabric, imitating an enlarged baby bump to gauge how flattering it would be, and deciding if Draco would like it. “And I saw the way he handed off his own memory to Draco to give to you, like he was handing over a precious relic.”

“It was a very precious memory he gave to me. And no, I intend on making mine tomorrow night. I’ve tried, but I put most of my thoughts in a very long letter and intend to make a short but very sweet memory for Severus.”

“Please tell me you're going to dress up or him,” Lavender said, as she looked over stylish yet functional nursing bras, accented with lace.

“Well...” Hermione hadn't really thought about it.

“The wizard has been mooning after you like a love-sick boy, pouting and moping about. Give him something to keep him warm at night until you get back together,” Ginny suggested, hinting that the memory should stress the “fun” in the functional part of communicating with Severus across the vast distance between them.

“You don't have to go starkers,” Lavender said, sensing Hermione's hesitation, “but wear something stylish and then reveal yourself wearing some very enticing lingerie underneath? A bit of teasing of things yet to come would not be out of order.”

Hermione couldn't believe it, but she agreed to get herself a bit of racy lingerie. Hermione had thought to wear the purple dress she wore to Viktor and Anne's wedding, since Severus had not seen that one yet and it was rather flattering. Though she had a matching bra and knickers set to go with it, Lavender suggested a corset for something a bit different.

Madam Mandel brought Hermione a variety of corsets which would go along very well with the royal purple dress.

When Hermione disrobed, Ginny stifled a gasp at the sight of the scar across Hermione's left breast, where Parker's hex had sliced open her chest.
Noticing the look of shock on Ginny's face, Hermione said, “Maybe this was a bad idea. I mean, he wouldn't want to see my scar. It's so ugly.” She held back tears, as she thought she had dealt with how upset she was with the scar marring her body.

“No,” Lavender insisted. “To Severus it will not matter. I'm sure he has his own scars from the war and if his scars do matter to him, it's not like it made you appreciate him any less.”

Hermione nodded, knowing Lavender was quite correct, but it still didn't stop her from being self-conscious about her scar. At least the staff at St. Mungo's assured her if she ever had children, she could still breastfeed from both breasts without any problems, but there was nothing they could do about the surface scarring due to the hex.

Madam Mandel, who was still in the fitting room, said, “Do not worry, chéri. I shall make sure the corsets we try on you will cover you just so, if you wish. You will look magnifique for your beau.”

Hermione turned around to allow Madam Mandel to slip the purple silk and black lace corset around her. As Madam Mandel began to lace up the corset, cinching tighter and tighter to give her shape, Hermione suddenly began to panic.

She felt bound and restricted, as if she couldn't breathe. Closing her eyes, she tried to force herself to calm down. Hermione knew she was safe, she was with her friends, and nothing was going to happen to her. Still, no matter how much she tried to convince herself, the more Madam Mandel tightened the corset, the more it was like Hermione was back in that dungeon bound by Alan Parker as he talked on before hitting her with that slicing hex.

“Get me out of this,” Hermione demanded, her voice trembling and filled with fear. “Get me out of this now!” she shrieked, fighting against the hook closures in the front.

Before Madam Mandel could cast the spell to pull free the corset ties, Hermione whipped out her wand and cast a spell that split the garment in two down the front.

Collapsed on the floor, breaking into tears, she saw the beautiful piece of lingerie ruined. “I'm sorry. I couldn't... I couldn't...” Hermione shook her head trying to fight the memories which still haunted her nightmares. Even Zhubanysh's sweet songs and healing touch at night before going to bed could not erase all the pain and fear she still felt inside.
Ginny pulled Madam Mandel aside and quietly explained the scar was given while Hermione was recently restricted under a binding spell.

Hermione could hear Ginny, and felt ashamed she had reacted so violently when all it was was some scraps of lace and silk.

Pulling herself off the floor, Hermione straightened up and said, her voice still trembling despite her brave face, “Please allow me to pay for that. It was truly lovely, but I can't wear anything so... restrictive. I'm sure you understand.”

Madam Mandel came over and gave Hermione a brief hug and kiss upon the cheek. “I understand, and I am sorry for your pain. Let me come back with something a bit looser fitting, but just as alluring.”

Hermione nodded, trying to smile while wiping away the last of the tears.

Lavender insisted she should pay for the torn corset since it was her idea to begin with.

Once back at work, Hermione sat down and wrote a letter to James Hoover, asking to see her old Muggle marriage counselor for personal counseling at his nearest convenience. She had tried to move past the trauma of what happened to her, but what transpired that afternoon was surely a sign that she could no longer deal with it by herself any longer. Harry had said how much James had helped him with personal one-on-one counseling with all the things he had suffered over the years, Hermione figured he could help her deal with not only the trauma, but other things she still had trouble processing by herself. There were so many things she still needed to get off her chest, besides the recent attack.

Severus had seemed to have found peace, but she had yet to find her own.

~~~~~~~~

Calpurnia Fudge stood at the window of Dolores Umbridge’s Ministry office, peering down with contempt at the witches and wizards gathered below in the atrium to listen to the debate between her husband and Amelia Bones for the upcoming election. The Ministry had decided to hold the debate on Saturday when people could attend or listen in on the Wizarding Wireless Network at home.

“Tea, Calpurnia?” Dolores offered in syrupy sweet tones she used with only those in her closest “Yes, Dolores, I think I'll need a cup to brace my nerves, as I'll be expected to mingle amongst the vacuous masses after the debate.” Mrs. Fudge turned to accept the proffered cup and saucer with milk and just the right amount of sugar from her friend.

There was a slight clearing from Umbridge's throat before she took a sip from her own cup of tea. “Well, my dear, imagine how much more hostile those witches and wizards would be had they known that Alan Parker was your nephew. But as you and I have been able to keep news out of the Daily Prophet that it was he who murdered all those Death Eaters and nearly killed Hermione Granger...Weasley – whatever her last name is – last month, that won't be an issue.”

“It is a pity he didn't kill that divorcing Mudblood who has polluted the purity of wizarding with her filthy Muggle notions. But at least Alan's heart was in the right place. Kill the Death Eaters so we could make the hoi polloi forget that much faster about the war, so we could begin to rescind those pointless laws that punish discrimination against Muggle-borns. To think that Mudbloods would deign to think themselves as equal to one of us is ludicrous.” Calpurnia continued to gaze down her nose at the mass who appeared agitated. They were an unruly bunch, and she would only show up on the stage near her husband when it was time for the debate to begin.

Madam Fudge certainly sympathized with the Dark Lord and his views, but she knew to ally her husband with either side of the war, as it raged, would risk having him be kicked out of office and replaced with a candidate picked by the victors. Sitting on a fence was one way to say her husband was there and then claim he'd helped the side that won in the end, despite what his and Calpurnia's personal views were.

“Where is our dear Minister of Magic, your husband?” Dolores asked as she gazed about.

Calpurnia huffed. “Doing an interview with that silly little blood traitor, Luna Lovegood. It's about time she's come around to granting an interview to Cornelius.”

“Well, with you and me controlling what does and doesn't get printed in the Daily Prophet, it's not like that rag of hers, The Quibbler, matters much.” Umbridge said with a sneer, distaste curling her lip while uttering the name of that printed tripe.

“Don't discount those who might speak against us,” Calpurnia warned her friend as she turned away from the window, unable to stomach looking down upon the crowd whom had become even more boisterous and restive. “Remember The Quibbler ran an article which was flattering of Mergatroyd Morgan, the wizard Cornelius ran against in the last election. It was enough to tip the scales and I had to make some ballots disappear so that Cornelius won. But if you hadn't helped dispose of those ballots so cleverly, Dolores, I wouldn't be running the Ministry today thanks to you.”

Umbridge nodded in agreement. “Indeed. And does Cornelius enjoy deferring to you for your expertise? Or is he still sometimes difficult – insisting on running the Ministry himself?”

Calpurnia gave a short laugh. “As if he's bright enough to know when he's being told what to do. Unfortunately, I can't be the one who speaks out there, as I certainly would make more sense than his incessant ramblings.”

“And shall we employ the same methods of ballot disposal should the count be in favor of Amelia Bones?” Umbridge asked.

“Might as well, since it worked in the past. This isn't the first election I fixed, you know.”

Looking down, Umbridge spied Harry Potter among the crowd. “I see Harry Potter is down there now. What will you do should he ever decide to run against Cornelius? It would be harder to obscure the vote count if the margin of error is much higher in his favor.”

“Maybe arrange an 'accident' to happen to him on an Auror assignment abroad before he would even run. Too bad he didn't die during the broom race in Asia. Or better yet, pity You-Know-Who didn't kill him first instead of hitting that stupid Mudblood mother of his first. Would have saved both of us years of grief if he was the Idiot-Who-Died instead of the Annoying-Twat-Who-Lived. Now we have to smile sweetly to those blood traitors who won the war and pretend we were always on their side.”

Finishing her cup, Dolores Umbridge sighed. “Well, I guess the debate will be starting soon, so I'd better visit the Little Witch's room before it starts.” Opening her office door, she held it open as she added, “If you'll pardon me, I won't be but a moment.”

Calpurnia nodded her head in recognition of her friend's needing to excuse herself.

As the door to Dolores Umbridge's office shut, the toad of a witch ran as fast as her fat, pinched feet – shoehorned into heels too small for her – could carry her. Running into the loo four doors down from her office, she held the door open a little longer than necessary.
Shutting the door, she whispered aloud to the seemingly empty loo, “Did it work?”

Hermione pulled off Harry's Invisibility Cloak and turned to Lavender, who had emerged from a stall that held the real Dolores Umbridge, who was comatose.

“I could hear Calpurnia and you loud and clear, Draco,” Lavender replied to the wizard transformed into the officious Ministry bureaucrat. “I don't think there was a corner of the Ministry that didn't hear your 'Hot Mic' Spell, Hermione. Well, except for the office where Luna is interviewing Fudge right now.”

Hermione handed off the Invisibility Cloak to Draco, who had taken Polyjuice Potion to look like Dolores Umbridge. If Draco was going to make it back to Lavender's home without being torn apart by the masses of angry witches and wizards now teeming through the Ministry, he would need to be hidden while in Polyjuice form as Umbridge. Unfortunately, like Hogwarts, one could not Apparate directly from within the Ministry, except at the designated Apparition point at the far end of the atrium.

“We'd better hurry,” Hermione reminded them. “Kingsley can only misdirect everyone from Umbridge's office and this toilet for so long. Have you done the Memory Charm on her?” she asked indicating to Umbridge, who was still passed out while sitting on a toilet.

Lavender nodded before Draco, still looking like Umbridge, disappeared under the cloak. As the three of them left the toilet, Hermione and Lavender walked down the stairs with Draco trailing right behind them as they made their way towards the nearest Floo in the Ministry atrium. Harry soon joined behind them to make sure no one walked too closely and accidentally stepped on his Invisibility Cloak, and in the process, reveal Draco Polyjuiced as Umbridge. Harry walked far enough behind to give Draco space.

“It was a pity we couldn't stay longer in her office, as Calpurnia kept rambling on, providing more rope to hang herself with,” Hermione admitted under her breath.

“Yes, but it was prudent of Draco to end the conversation when he did,” Lavender added quietly to avoid being overheard. “Once she mentioned about her wishing Harry had died as a baby, there was a roar of outrage from the crowd which seemed to shake the walls. Good thing you thought to add the 'sound feedback' dampening part of the spell so you and she couldn't tell how outraged the crowd was, nor could they hear themselves broadcast through the whole place.”

No one would have likely overheard Lavender and Hermione, as people were shouting with rage having heard Calpurnia Fudge and “Dolores Umbridge's” candid confession. Draco had merely repeated close to word-for-word what Umbridge had admitted to under Veritaserum. Everyone was trying to hunt the two witches down. Kingsley had placed a spell to misdirect anyone trying to locate them until he saw Lavender and Hermione next to a fireplace – rather, he had spied a tip of a pink shoe poking out of the bottom of an Invisibility Cloak. Upon their exit, Kingsley ended his Mislocation Charm, and let the crowd find the instigators of their ire.

~~~~~~~*~

The biggest frustration for Hermione was she and Albert could tell no one at their monthly Potions master meeting she was the one behind the “Hot Mic” Spell earlier in the day. Even if she had told them, none of them would even get the reference to the situation where a Muggle would ramble on at the mouth, without realizing that their candid words were being broadcast by a live microphone for everyone to hear, with them none the wiser that they were being overheard.

Calpurnia Fudge had “friends” and allies all throughout the wizarding world, and not even Albert was sure who at their meeting might have had an allegiance to the machinating witch. It was better to play innocent and keep their opinions to themselves anyway, as Potions masters were usually apolitical. Usually.

As Hermione and Albert showed up at the monthly meeting of fellow masters, Hermione was greeted with a mix of hearty claps on the back for her brilliant work discovering Albus Dumbledore's will and consoling handshakes for the attack she had suffered. One of her bouquets of flowers at St. Mungo's was from several Potions masters who had chipped in together, wishing her a speedy recovery.

Once everyone had their turn congratulating or consoling Hermione, the talk immediately turned to the news of the day regarding Calpurnia Fudge and Dolores Umbridge broadcasting the crime of election tampering, in addition to the various other bits of impolite talk. No one brought up the fact that Alan Parker, Calpurnia's nephew, was publicly named as Hermione's attacker by his own aunt.

Discussion went round as to how the conversation had been broadcast to the whole Ministry, and how the two machinating witches could not have heard themselves. Niles was convinced the confession was done under an Imperius Curse, a Sonorus Charm, and a dose of Veritaserum. Royston thought it was done with a set of some Weasley Wizarding Wheezes Extendable Ears and another sound magnification spell. Braxton came up with a scenario which was highly improbable and resulted in nearly everyone chucking something at him for being so daft as to suggest such a thing.

“I think it was two people Polyjuiced as Mrs. Fudge and Miss Umbridge,” Chuff volunteered.

“Yeah, but Polyjuice Potion ingredients are highly regulated, and no one short of a Potions master would have them on hand,” Royston countered.
“I admit it,” Albert put his hand up and waved dramatically, as if close to fainting. “I brewed a Doppelganger Potion and then had my copy and me take Polyjuice to pretend to be them, then I cast a Sonorus Charm.”

There was a pause before everyone, including Hermione, bust up laughing at Albert's “joke.”

“You lying sack of dragon shit. I was helping you in the garden this afternoon when it happened, as it came over the Wireless,” Niles pointed out. “If you're going to lie, make it half-way believable. Doesn't work to confess if you have an alibi. Though that doesn't explain where Hermione was,” he noted overdramatically in jest. “Anything to confess, young apprentice?”

“If you want to hear details about how I was doubled over with menstrual cramps today and would like to hear about my hands shaking with pain as I attempted to brew...” Hermione was cut off by the groans of wizards who did not care to hear about such matters.

She gave herself a small mental pat on the back for coming up with a way to deflect any accidental finger pointing at her, even as a joke, with a reply making any one of the men in her company wish to change the subject quickly.

Conversation rambled on for a while before the games part of the evening began. Hermione let the other Potions masters win the round of 'Name That Ingredient,' purposefully misidentifying the powdered toenail of troll in order to be able to select the next game.

“How about 'Guess what's in this drink?’” she offered, to the cheers of her fellow Potions masters who were always eager to drink something alcoholic while trying to identify what is in it.

“It's about time you concocted something for us. Hit us with your best shot, you young chit,” Reginald Chuff goaded her in good humor.

Hermione came prepared as Draco and Ginny had brought a case of distilled palm sap wine back to England, giving half the case to Hermione. They had also brought with them several crates of fresh pineapples to hand out to friends and family. Hermione had enough to serve everyone who was up for this round of the game. Niles already had rum and vodka stocked in his bar, but Hermione had to procure coconut liquor beforehand, and prepare her own fresh pineapple juice and guava juice before she came over with Albert that evening.
Erecting a screen with flick of her wand, Hermione began to use her knife with the speed of a fully-credited Potions master, preparing the drinks behind the screen so they could not tell what she was putting in each hollowed-out pineapple. Everyone, separated by the screen, was quite curious as she macerated the lavage in vodka and added essence of valerian, which effects were amplified tenfold when added fresh and combined with alcohol and an acidic base, versus added dried to hot water in tea. Hermione remained hidden from view, mixing with the distilled palm sap wine, rum, vodka, and topping off with fruit juices. She even did some fancy carving of the extra pineapple pieces, and sliced, twisted, and folded some pineapple leaves into decorative shapes.

“Voila!” she announced as she removed the screen to reveal a row of seven pineapples containing drinks, ready and waiting.

“If you don't cut it as a Potions mistress, you'd make a passable bartender,” Chuff said not too kindly.

“Drink and name the ingredients,” Hermione challenged him and the rest who were playing, her arms folded across her chest in triumph.

Everyone bellied up to the bar with their own pineapple. Nile turned around and asked Albert, “ Aren't you going to participate in this round?”

Albert waved his hand dismissively and shook his head. “It wouldn't be fair. I already know what's in this drink.”

“And what do you call this enticing little concoction of yours?” Braxton asked, licking his lips, drawn by the heady scent of fresh tropical fruit juices mixed with rum and other exotic scents.

“Wipe-out,” Hermione said with a smug grin.

Waiting in the atrium of the Ministry with a bouquet of flowers in her arms, Hermione looked about anxiously. It was late Sunday afternoon, and there were only a few people milling about. She arrived early, but still there was no sign of them. She hoped she didn't miss them.

Suddenly, the Floo across the atrium flared to life and out stepped Ginny, Draco, Lavender, and Ron from the fireplace. Ron was helping Lavender exit, holding her arm to help her keep balance.
“Sorry we're a bit late,” Ginny apologized, “but Bill wouldn't stop hugging me goodbye, and neither could the kids.”

“Yeah, he's been worried about you, so I'm glad you were able to put his mind at rest.” Hermione turned to Draco. “So, get a taste of what's to come?” Her eyes darted towards Ginny's still flat abdomen.

“A bit more boisterous than I anticipated, but nothing I don't think we can't handle.” Draco smirked as he put his arm around Ginny and kissed the top of her head.

Ron made an odd huffing noise.

“Something wrong, Weasley?” Draco asked, his eyes narrowing a bit, looking a tad defensive.

“Nope, just still getting used to the idea of you being my brother-in-law and spawning with my little sister. Not that I object any longer, it just takes a while.” Ron shrugged casually.

Draco held a large satchel in his free hand that wasn't wrapped around Ginny's waist.

Looking down at the bag, Hermione said, “I have something for Severus. I made the memory Friday night, but finished my letter this morning. And Severus will be wanting these two memories back. They're the ones I used at the Wizengamot. My memory is in the box with his.” She handed over a small wooden box with slightly tarnished brass hinges and a small swiveling hook closure. The other item was a thick roll made of many sheaves of parchment rolled together, and tied with a red ribbon and sealed with wax. Hermione also handed over a bouquet of flowers for Severus.

“I'll make sure he gets these,” Draco promised as he placed the parchments and wooden box in the satchel, while Ginny took the bouquet.

“We should get going if we don't want to miss our Portkey back home,” Ginny said reluctantly, not wanting to hasten their departure.

They walked across the atrium to the Portkey Office where the Malfoys went straight up to the front desk of the scheduled Portkey queue. Once they checked in, Lavender and Ron said their final goodbyes first, with Draco and Ron merely shaking hands, though with far less animosity then they once shared between them.
Hermione gave Ginny huge hug, making sure to not squeeze her too tightly, as much as she wanted to though. “I'm going to miss you both so much.”

“It's only a couple months until we'll see you again,” Ginny reminded her friend.

She smiled and wiped away a few tears before turning to Draco, who put down the satchel. Hermione gave him a warm hug. “Thank you so much.”

“I'm the one who should thank you,” he said with great sincerity.

Hermione laughed and gently hit Draco in the chest with her fist before giving him one last hug. “Take care of Severus for me.”

“That has been what Ginny and I have been doing since we left. Just don't take too long to finish up your apprenticeship, so you can take over that job full-time. Ginny and I will have someone else who will need our full attention soon.” Draco smiled and looked over at his wife, who was tearing up for the umpteenth time that day.

“I'm trying as fast as I can,” Hermione assured him before letting go and allowing the Malfoys leave to take a Portkey to San Francisco, and from there to home.

As the departing couple walked through the door, waving one last time, Lavender huffed with exasperation, “I have got to get someone in the Ministry to see about lifting Dumbledore's spell to block Hawaii, so we can start getting direct Portkeys, not to mention future advertising that doesn't have scrambled words.” Turning to her husband, she added, “Maybe I should contract your brother, Bill, to break that since it's almost like a curse, and he's good at curse-breaking.”

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Thank you to my lovely betas, JuneW and Cygnuz, for cleaning up my grammatical and punctuation messes.

And now the fast and furious chapter postings will ease back to a chapter a week, now that the story will slow down in pace again. Still need to keep of a buffer of betaed chapters in the works so I can keep posting a minimum of a chapter a week. Once my betas have finished with the epilogue, I'll then go back to posting them as fast as possible again, depending on how fast I can get them validated through the Ashwinder queue.
Severus slept uneasily. Halulu and Greg had come over and mentioned the fact that Draco and Ginny were overdue to return, a fact that had not escaped Severus' attentions when the Malfoys failed to come back home by Friday night as they originally arranged.

Rising with the dawn, he went to the back door to let the nameless black cat in before mincing some leftover roast chicken and placing it on a small plate along with a small bowl of milk for the useful beast. Severus was no longer finding half-gnawed produce in his kitchen garden. Unfortunately, rats were far more clever than some wizard's spell to deter them from a garden, but cats were even more clever. There was a moment where Severus thought he might even miss the furball, once Ginny came back.
'If she comes back,' he pondered.

Looking on the back porch, he noted that there was yet another rat dead, proof that there were far more raiding his garden than he had guessed.

"Keep it up, I might actually have something to can this year," Severus told the cat lapping away contently at the milk that filled its belly after a full night of hunting.

Deciding that a day tending his gardens would be plenty of exercise for the day, Severus forewent his morning swim and had breakfast. He knew something more substantive than tea, toast, and fruit would be prudent, given the amount of physical work ahead, but he could not eat anything more filling.

As he fought against the passion vine that cuddled quite amorously up his leg, he hacked away at the vine's tendrils and shoots before they could get any more fresh with him, and further invade his bed of rare Indian elephant flowers that trumpeted softly in the early morning sun. That was when he heard a familiar voice call out, "Aloha."

Severus pulled out his wand and cast a Blasting Curse before turning around and spying Draco and Ginny opening his front garden gate.

"Aloha. Halulu was about to send out a search party since you didn't come back Friday." Severus picked off the last of the passion vine still affectionately curling about his ankles.

"We unpacked our things and came right over. I think you'll find the reason why we delayed our return was for a worthy cause," Draco said with a satisfied grin as he pulled out a copy of the Sunday edition of the Daily Prophet.

Severus looked at the front page and grinned as he read the headline.

"Minister's Wife & Dolores Umbridge Confess To Election Rigging"

"My, you have been busy," Severus said nonchalantly. "Care to come in for a cup?"
Over a pot of tea, Draco and Ginny recounted Hermione's plan, and how now the Ministry was in an uproar, because Fudge had to resign as Minister, since he didn't lawfully win the last election. The wizard who should have won – Mergatroyd Morgan – had recently left the country to travel abroad, unwilling to stomach watching another electoral cycle. An owl was being sent to the remote tropical island where he went on holiday to inform him of recent developments. Deputy Minister McPeebles was running the Ministry until the election later that week, which was now between McPeebles and Bones. The election should have been between Morgan and Bones, but Morgan had been quoted a few times by the Daily Prophet saying that he had formally resigned from politics, and if he ever had to step foot in the Ministry ever again, it would be too soon.

Severus laughed and periodically shook his head, silently amazed by Hermione's inventiveness and her ability to right yet another injustice. He was not surprised by Morgan's refusal to remain in politics and feeling a bit empathetic with rightfully elected Minister where the Ministry was concerned. Most of all, he was glad Hermione was able to finally exact revenge against Calpurnia for interfering with her life, and was thankful Draco was there to help, as having a Slytherin available was useful whenever one was hatching cunning plans.

As Draco began to unpack the satchel that contained items they had brought back for Severus, he announced, "I have all the things you requested. Monies from the Ministry in compensation for your seized house – good thing you thought to have Mounga draw up that 'power of attorney' document, granting me the right to bring back the money on your behalf." There was a thump and jingle as a small pouch of Galleons was placed on the counter, given that Severus' former home was rather modest and wasn't worth much to begin with.

"Bangers from Abattoir and Haunches, plus enough so that our local butcher can finally find out what a real banger should taste like. Oh, and proper British back bacon." The blond wizard pulled out more packages of wrapped meat from the satchel, which had an Extension Charm. "Teas, from the apothecary you sent me to. Jammy thumb biscuits. Clotted cream, since our local cows don't have the right butterfat content. And some good French and Spanish cheeses, plus Stilton."

Severus was thankful that his friends brought back most of the things he requested, but what he was looking forward to most was not among the items Draco placed on his kitchen counter.

"And lastly, I have this." Draco pulled out a large tube of parchment consisting of several sheets rolled together and tied with a ribbon. "And this," he added, pulling out the same wooden box Severus had left Hermione as a Christmas present. "Hermione said two of these in the box belong to you, and the third is from her."

Severus wanted to appear cool and collected enough to appear almost disinterested, but he rose quickly and nearly snatched the box out of Draco's hand hastily.
"She still loves you, Severus," Ginny said, answering the question he had yet to ask aloud.

"So how did she get the wrong bouquet?" he asked, offering his guests some more tea and nibbles.

Draco decided he was better at spinning the tale with more flare than his wife, as he knew how to use words that pandered to Severus' temperament and conveyed the right sentiments that only another Slytherin could truly appreciate. Ginny was the one who told Severus about Hermione receiving her leis, and the toast that Draco proposed and all who joined in.

Throughout the morning, they continued to recount the party to Severus. He even heard about the dirty limerick contest, which Ginny tried to convince her husband to not retell. The redhead apologized for Hermione's crudeness in her absence, since she was quite drunk from that "Wipe-Out" drink that Draco fixed the former Golden Trio. Then there was the story of Hermione challenging Draco, Harry, and her ex-husband, Ron, to a beer-drinking contest at the Korean barbecue joint, followed by dancing at a club afterwards.

Severus had gotten Hermione tipsy before, but never quite that drunk. By Draco and Ginny's descriptions, Albert was doing a fine job of bringing her tolerance for alcohol up to an acceptable level, as that was part of the apprenticeship training.

For centuries, unscrupulous witches and wizards have attempted to get Potions masters and mistresses drunk enough to spill their most guarded secrets, only to have the intellectual property thieves drunk under the table and secret potions formulas remaining secret in the end. It was yet another way to protect their knowledge from those who would try to steal it. Pity Ranjit didn't drink alcohol, and Arnold had the alcohol tolerance of a first year. Severus hadn't been to a proper booze-up in years, though he and Draco had one every year on Victory Day during their oppression under the Death Eater Decree, but it wasn't quite the same when you were drinking to mope, instead of socialize.

The Malfoys also told Severus about their visit to Molly and Arthur's and what a strained affair that was. While Ginny was thrilled to see her father, things were still rather tense between mother and daughter.

"And when Ginny was feeling a little nauseous, I offered to make some ginger tea for her," Draco recalled. "Molly nearly had a heart attack on the spot, hardly believing I was willing to venture into a kitchen and not demand she or a house-elf do it."
"Would it have been so terrible if she did have a heart attack?" Ginny bit out.

"Not at all. As for her comment that maybe you weren't pregnant and it wasn't too late to have a divorce, it did not endear her to my bosom any further," Draco said rather icily, still frosted about his mother-in-law's words.

"But at least my father apologized. He was thrilled to see how happy I am with you and how attentive you are to me," Ginny reminded him.

"Yes, Arthur was civil and gracious. Your mother is another matter." Draco ground his teeth at the memory of the visit.

The topic was quickly dropped. They moved on to other more pleasant subjects, including the restoration of Malfoy Manor and the refilling of the Malfoy vault at the Gringotts London branch.

"Unfortunately, my mother's silverware was missing." Draco sighed heavily. "I was hoping to find that returned, but they said it had been sold in the meantime to some buyer from abroad."

"Well, you never know. With time, it might turn up again," Severus noted as casually as possible. "Did you find out what you were compensated for the set?"

"About six-thousand Galleons."

"What?" Ginny reacted with shock.

"The set is a full service for twenty-four, with both a lighter luncheon setting and a heavier dinner setting, so it's actually forty-eight settings in total. All Goblin-made, of course." Draco seemed rather nonplussed by the value of the set, and more concerned over its sentimental value. "Each setting includes, besides the basic salad and entree forks, a teaspoon, place spoon, and knife, a bouillon soup spoon, cream soup spoon, iced beverage spoon, demitasse spoons, butter knife, fish knife, fish fork, ramekin fork, fruit fork, lobster pick, and other pieces. Then there are the various serving pieces, such as meat fork, ladles, serving spoons, and so on."

Severus nodded, quietly thrilled Naomi had been able to purchase the set for under three-thousand. It had taken a bit of effort for him to scrimp together that much, but he had wanted to find the set before anyone else purchased it. Though, had he known Hermione would win their property back for them, he would have held off and let the Ministry buy it back from the dealer in Knockturn Alley. But six-thousand Galleons was double what he'd paid, so the discrepancy in price made Severus wonder if the set's spell to avoid being split and sold off had been broken. He would have to retrieve the set from Naomi and do a count, as there were a few pieces to the set he was unaware of until Draco listed them. Still, it would make a fine first wedding anniversary and Christmas surprise later that year.

"Oh!" Ginny said suddenly. "I just remembered one more thing from Hermione." Getting up from her seat, she reached far down into the satchel, practically having to stick her head into the bag to find the last item.

"This bouquet is from Hermione," Ginny said.

In the center were two red roses for love. Surrounding the two roses were ox-eye daisies mixed equally with corchorus. Severus laughed to himself at the heartfelt yet contrary nature of the mixing of those two, as the ox-eye daisies symbolized patience, and the corchorus impatience of absence. It was her way of telling Severus she would wait, but that she couldn't wait to see him.
Surrounding the daisies and corchorus were a mix of alstroemeria, heliotrope, and white periwinkle, symbolizing devotion, faithfulness, and pleasures of memory. It was quite a change from her previous bouquet that he had recently discarded, as the rudbeckias (for justice) had withered and the palm fronds (symbolizing victory) were beginning to turn brown, a few weeks after he and Draco had been exonerated by the Wizengamot. Today, this new bouquet's message was love.

Running a finger along the petals of the white periwinkle, Severus did recall Lavender mentioning, in a round-about way, that Hermione would spend many a late Friday night – based on what the house-elves told her – locked in her office with Lavender's Pensieve. Lavender made some innuendo-laced remark about not needing so much time to review just two memories.

