As Severus gazed at the bouquet, drinking in Hermione's message to him, Ginny fetched a vase from the cupboard and filled it with water from her wand.

"Why have you never bought me flowers?" Draco asked Ginny.

"Because you would have said something like it's the wizard's job to woo the witch, not the other way around," she replied.

"Too true. Too true," he conceded. "But I don't think Severus minds something a little unconventional now and then. Am I right, Severus?"
Severus didn't hear Draco. Instead, his gaze was set upon the roll of parchment on the table, curious as to what Hermione had to say to him in the many, many, many words she had written him.

"Come Draco. I'm sure we can catch up with Severus later." Ginny rose, watching the way Severus was lost in thought. "Besides, my body clock is still on London time, and right after I just adjusted to the new time zone. I'm ready for bed."

Severus walked his guests down to the garden gate and thanked them for all that they had done for him, taking care of important matters. It was after the Malfoys had left he realized he forgot to tell Ginny to take the cat with her.

'Figures the wee beastie would make itself scarce at an inopportune time.'

Once back in his kitchen, he debated which to open first, Hermione's letter or her memory. Thinking how much easier it would be to imagine her voice as he read, he decided to view the memory first.

Entering his private Potions lab, he approached his new Pensieve. It had arrived a few days earlier than expected while the Malfoys were away.

The base was made of white marble, cut from the same Pentelic quarry that had supplied the marble for the Parthenon in Athens. On the base was a bas relief depiction of Mnemosyne, Titaness and Greek goddess of memory. It was a round base, instead of edged with flat faces, to evoke the fact that memories can be circular, coming back to a beginning with no end.

He'd chosen the model with the hand-hammered silver bowl that rested atop the base, with a locking lid for security, instead of the model where the bowl and base were one. His bowl was made to slip easily into the depression on the top of the base so it would never fall off or tip over. The lip of the bowl was decorated with a series of ancient Greek characters engraved into the metal.

Reading the ancient words, he translated them. "Memories can be air, stone, fire, and water. They can lift up, weigh down, deflagrate, or drown us."

Those words weighed heavily upon Severus. He had drowned in his own memories, as if unable to breathe at times. Or he let the weight of the memory of his wife weigh like an anchor around his neck, dragging it around for years as penance. But there were some memories that also lifted him up and made him soar like a bird on wing. Hermione had lifted his spirits with those memories that he recalled of their months together.

He gazed at the green-capped vial for a moment in anticipation of finally seeing Hermione, even if only in a memory. In Lavender's memory, Hermione was quite stern and forceful as she faced the Wizengamot, with little warmth. As much as he admired her in those memories, he longed for some of the tenderness that emanated from her, directed towards him.

As the memory swirled in the argentine water, Severus leaned forward, eager to see her once again.

Severus found himself once again back in his old flat. Hermione was there waiting for him, a vision in royal purple.

"Hello, Severus." She smiled sweetly, though he could tell that she was a little nervous by the way the corner of her mouth twitched and her eyes would dart away. He still knew her and her habits.

"I tried creating a memory as wonderful as the one you gave to me, but just as you had trouble putting your thoughts down on parchment, I had trouble speaking my heart to an empty room. Rather strange considering the circumstances under which we met?" She smiled at the irony.

Turning about, she asked, "Do you like it?" Hermione smoothed down the front of her dress when she stopped spinning. "I bought it for a wedding I attended in June, but you can read about the details of that in my letter to you."

Severus liked it very much. His hands wanted to slip over the silk to enfold this glorious creature in his arms once again. For now, the sight of her would have to satisfy his thirst for her. Not only had she donned a beautiful gown, but she’d had her hair done and was wearing make-up, just for him.

"Your home looks lovely, Severus, and I can't wait to see it in person one day." Hermione's gaze cast about the room. "And for now this is my home. Though even before I officially moved in, I think I already felt this was my home." Gesturing with her hand, she indicated Severus to come sit on the settee with her as they had done so many times before.

"Come, let us have some tea, and I will talk of pleasant things this time."
It did not escape Severus' attention her choice of words to indicate that the topic of her attack would not come up in this memory.

There was already a tea service with two cups on the low table in front of the settee. Hermione poured some tea into the cup that was set for Severus before pouring her own. Granted, Severus could not drink the tea, but it stirred more memories – of a time when they would sit and talk, watching the fire together. Not only had Hermione created this memory for him, but was evoking old ones of their time together.

"Albert has been a fine master and mentor to me. He's watched out for me when we go to those monthly gatherings at Niles Goggin's home. He warned me about how some of the Potions masters like to play pranks on each other, so he's made sure that none of the more inappropriate ones happen to me, though having my nose turned into the trunk of an elephant was pretty tame by comparison. Reginald Chuff, your old master, slipped Jack Braxton a potion that..." Hermione paused, before squinting her eyes shut momentarily as if pained by the memory. "As I said before, let us talk of pleasant things."

"I've mastered Latin and Greek, and I'm currently working on my Spanish." Smiling even more sweetly, she gazed across the settee where Severus had placed himself in this memory. "If you were here, or if I were in Hawaii with you, I'm sure you could tutor me and I'd learn it that much faster. I'm doing everything I can to finish my apprenticeship as fast as possible. When Lavender told me of her plan to set up operations in Hawaii and have me run the region, I was thrilled. I've thanked Draco for his idea, but tell him thanks once more for me. It is wonderful to have another purpose to strive for after my apprenticeship. Wanting to be with you is my greatest drive, but this opportunity is just the icing on the cake."

Hermione paused to fetch her tea from the table and sip, holding the saucer her hand.

"Lavender has been teaching me how to run the company, and there is so much I've learned. She intends on having me run the company while she's on maternity leave, so by the time I'm done with my apprenticeship, I'll know all the ins and outs of the operations and be fully up to speed. I just hope I can finish learning Spanish, Japanese, and Chinese in time for the opening of the facility in Hawaii, as Draco will be helping with preparations before I arrive."

Draco had told Severus of his plan to go back to work for Lavender, but now it really sunk in that Severus would be losing his co-worker and fellow tutor. If Draco was going to prepare the facility before her arrival, that meant that Draco would be supervising construction and would no longer have time to work at his shop. This would be something he would have to talk with Draco about regarding timelines, once he and Ginny had rested from their trip.
Hermione smiled to herself, as she put her tea down. "And while it may be at least a year or possibly two before I am fully accredited, and hopefully not longer, we have a chance to see each other before then." There was a small frown that pulled the corners of her lips down, and she furrowed her brow as she played with a callous on her thumb. "As much as I know you could never return back to England, I understand why. And as much as I would love to come to Malu Palekaiko, I know that having to leave you to come back to England at the end of a trip would be very, very difficult for me." The smile returned to Hermione's lips and her eyes grew hopeful. "But now that you're truly free to travel all over the world without any persecution, what is to stop us from seeing each other somewhere else?"

Severus smiled at that idea, realizing it wasn't going to be as long as he feared until he saw her once again.

"Lavender will be doing her launch for India the first weekend in October. She can't go because she'll be too close to her delivery date to Portkey. So, Lavender has asked Draco to come so he can be there for the launch as well, and I can introduce him as the new Vice President of Advertising and Marketing for the Asia Pacific region. And so, while I may be busy on the Saturday doing the whole boring press thing," Hermione said with a roll of her eyes, looking as thrilled as Severus would be if he was forced to do that kind of thing, "I'll have Sunday off, and Lavender agreed to extend my trip out to Monday or Tuesday so we can have time to catch up."

There was a twinkle in her eyes that Severus knew well, and all that it implied.

"So, I hope you can come to India." Dropping her chin down to look up though her lashes, her eyes almost focused to where Severus placed himself in the memory, she said with mock gravitas, "And as much as you may mock my Gryffindor sense of fairness, it would only be fair that you meet me half-way." Hermione became a bit more serious and genuinely sincere when she added, "Though in all honesty, I'd gladly go to the ends of the earth to be with you once again."

If Severus was a more physically demonstrative person, he would have placed his hand over his bosom and sighed dramatically, throwing his head back. Instead, he merely reveled in the heady sensation of emotions coursing through him at her words and sincerity.

"Before this memory ends, do you think we could have one dance?" Hermione rose from the settee and walked over to a space cleared away. "I know you cannot touch me in the memory, and you're not here with me, but we can still have one dance. I can imagine you here, and you can dance with the image of me."

Hermione drew her wand from the discreet pocket in her dress and turned the music box to play. Severus recognized it as Lavender's music box.
Standing straight, in heels, Hermione put her right hand out about where Severus' would have been, and held the other hand up as if placed upon his shoulder.

The familiar strains of a song began to play.

"I left my heart in San Francisco
High on a hill it calls to me..."

Severus remembered dancing with her to this song so many times and the way they moved about the room. As he danced with her in the Pensieve, he anticipated most of the time where she would move, dancing with near-perfect synchronicity to the memory of Hermione. His hand once in a while would pass through hers and there would be a slight shimmer of where their hands would have met.

As the song came near the end, Hermione held her hand up and twirled about once, as if Severus was guiding her.

The song ended, and there was silence once again.

"I've missed you, Severus," she sighed with plaintive longing, closing her eyes momentarily. "God, how I've missed you. I ache to the very center of my being for you."

He sensed a change in her tone, and guessed she was choosing to not dwell on how much they missed each other. Instead, Hermione began walking over towards the bed where she paused by one of the bed posts. "Lavender and Ginny thought I should leave you with something to occupy your thoughts for a while. And that doesn't seem too amiss."

Keeping her back turned towards the room where she had correctly guessed Severus would be standing, she began to slowly unzip the back of her dress. She let it slowly slip from her shoulders and past her waist.

Beneath her dress, Hermione was wearing a floor-length silk slip that hugged her form rather snugly. The slip was in the same royal purple as her dress, edged with black lace along the slit up the thigh and across the tops of her breasts. Severus felt his breath seize in his chest. God, he wanted her more than ever.
Slipping her feet out of her heels, Hermione crawled up onto the bed, still in her stockings and slip. Before she reclined back, she pulled the pins from her hair, and let the carefully-styled smooth curls that were piled atop her head spill down about her shoulders and back. As she laid back, she gazed at the empty space on the bed next to her, the place where Severus would normally lay.

"I lie here and remember you in this bed with me many nights. And as much as I wish I could join you, I will stay and finish my apprenticeship here." She sighed with longing, stroking the pillow next to her.

Severus had come to lay on the bed next to her. His vision was momentarily clouded when her hand passed through his head to touch the pillow.

Hermione smiled one last time as she said in nearly a whisper, "I love you too, Severus."

Severus found himself once again in his laboratory. The words inscribed in Greek never rang more true. He was at once soaring at the chance to see Hermione once more and hear her words of love for him; weighed down with the knowledge that they would have to remain apart for a while longer; and consumed with a burning desire for her. And as for the last element, he could understand how people could easily drown in memories, dragged down to depths that they no longer wanted to escape, but embrace like a watery grave, lost in a euphoric peacefulness. Severus could easily spend hours reliving this memory time and time again, to the exclusion of everyday life, much like those who had wasted away in front of the Mirror of Erised.

But Severus would not live in the past. He had a future ahead, one where Hermione would return to his side. As for the trip to India, it would mean having to push practice test schedules up by a few days for the Autumn SATs in late October, though it was still early enough to make such arrangements. He would have to make sure that he didn't have any potions simmering away while he was gone, which meant brewing extra Wolfsbane Potion and a few other long-term, regular commissions ahead of schedule, but it was nothing he couldn't work around.

Looking at his calendar, he noted that the India trip was just under six weeks away. Severus also noticed that Hermione's birthday was in exactly four weeks. He would have to ask Draco if the Weasley twins had taken his special commission to make a birthday present for Hermione. There was still much to catch up on with Draco and Ginny, but until that time, he would finish work in his garden, with breaks to read Hermione's lengthy letter in between chores.

Hermione had taken the anatomy portion of her apprenticeship exam with Albert earlier in the week and passed with flying colors. It was a nice little birthday present to herself, considering she was turning twenty-five and Severus would not be around for her birthday that year. Now she could focus on her code of ethics, Potions theory, and her remaining three languages.

It was Friday, two days before her birthday, and Fastrada Johnson had taken Hermione out to lunch to celebrate. The two witches had lunch about once a month to keep up on talk of the Potions trade, research, and idle chatter, including finding out that Trevor was not the father of Madam Dushka's baby. Once she learned of Hermione's attack, Fastrada had sent Hermione some flowers, which were waiting for her on her desk when returned to work back in July. Hermione wished she could have told Fastrada about her participation in the downfall of Calpurnia Fudge and Dolores Umbridge, but it was best to keep that on a need-to-know basis.

After returning to work from her birthday lunch, the house-elf at The Lovely Lavender Company's reception desk directed Hermione to go to Lavender's office.

Knocking on the door, Hermione entered and noticed that no tea or nibbles had been put out, which was a good sign. That, or Lavender didn't bother because Hermione was returning from lunch and figured it would have been refused.

Waiting with Lavender were Fred and George Weasley.

"There she is! The birthday witch!" George crowed and picked up Hermione in a grand hug, spinning her about shortly before putting her back down.

"And it's good to see you too!" Hermione said cheerily, a little surprised by their presence.

Fred also gave Hermione a warm hug, asking if she had time in her busy schedule of "Vice President of The Lovely Lavender Company, Potions apprentice, and righter of world wrongs," if they had time to squeeze in and have that brainstorming luncheon they talked about.

"Well, surely you didn't come over here just to ask me that. You could have owled, you know," she reminded them, though Hermione figured that Lavender and the twins had other business to discuss.

"Actually, we're here to deliver your birthday present to you. You see, we had this very strange request from Malfoy." Fred and George looked at her with a mix of suspicion and amusement, as the latter continued. "Malfoy came to us with the request of a secret commission of a birthday present from an unnamed party."
Hermione knew exactly who the unnamed party was and couldn't help but break into an elated smile.

"See!" Fred shouted with glee, "I told you she was seeing someone."

Shaking her hands, palms outwards, Hermione said innocently, "Wait, what makes you think I'm seeing anyone?"

"Because you're blushing worse than a virgin who wandered into The Sirens' Secrets by accident," George said smugly.

Hermione didn't want to have this conversation. It had been bad enough when Harry and Ron found out about her and Severus, she didn't need the twins to throw in their off-color remarks, making comparisons of him to vampires and Filch.

"So, you have my present? May I have it?" the still furiously-blushing witch asked, hoping to distract the pair of wizards from their line of questioning.

"Considering how much was shelled out for this little beauty, I am tempted to not hand it over without at least first getting a hint," Fred said, casually examining his fingernails.

"Yes, it is a new prototype," George elaborated. "But Malfoy, surprisingly inventive git in his own right, also had some new ideas to expand upon your present. We even promised him five percent royalties, since he gave us so many other ideas for variations on your present."

Hermione didn't exactly feel like dealing with any mocking of her lover from these two, and she crossed her arms over her chest. "And if I don't give you any hints? Not that I have either confirmed or denied seeing anyone, so there may be no hints to give," she asked with a bored look on her face to show her patience was starting to run a bit thin, despite her inward excitement.

"That sounds like something a Slytherin would say," George remarked, to which Hermione began to blush a little more despite her efforts not to.

"Well, the look on your face certainly takes a few contenders off the list," Fred noted, as if reading her mind. "Hmmm, who trusts Malfoy well enough to have him do this task for them, yet could not come to us himself? Does Malfoy know that Spanish twit, Delgado?"
"My present?" Hermione asked, with her hand outstretched, glaring with unamused impatience, endeavoring to not let the twins on to her relationship with Severus, not yet.

She knew Ginny and Draco had not told the twins or anyone else about his work for Lavender, her association with Severus, or how Hermione had helped them escape. Things were still rather hot concerning the topic of Death Eaters and the exoneration of Malfoy and Snape, especially since Draco and Ginny came back last month for a quick visit.

"Alrighty. Just make sure you open this in your flat once you have made as much space as possible. Something about folding away the bed and removing all furniture was included in the directions. And your office is far, far too small to open it in," Fred warned her. "As a matter of fact, whoever commissioned your present knew the exact dimensions of your flat. And that is my clue that you're seeing someone."

Hermione took the present, which was about the size of a large shoe box and weighed no more than if it was shoes in the package. Tied on top with the bow was a set of simple directions, Fred explained.

"This is not an entirely new idea, but let's say, one of our old products was supposedly the inspiration for this," George admitted. "But that's as much as we can say for now."

If Severus did commission the twins to make her a present, what old joke of theirs did he re-imagine into something for her? Severus was not one to give joke gifts. Now her curiosity was even more piqued.

The twins wished Hermione a happy birthday before parting. Once gone, Lavender reached into her desk.

"Now that they are gone, I can give you this. Severus handed it to me back in Hawaii and said to give it to you when the twins delivered your present."

A simple letter was handed to Hermione with her name written on the front. She recognized his handwriting.

Hermione stood in Lavender's office looking at both the box and the letter, lost in thought, when Lavender interrupted her silent contemplation. "Since it's your birthday this weekend, why don't you go home and open it up. If it's nothing too personal, you can tell me what it is Monday, as I'm dying of curiosity."

Harry and Zhubanysh were taking Hermione out for a birthday dinner that night, since her Saturday days were busy with her Herbology apprenticeship work and that Saturday night was the monthly Potions masters' booze-up, which would certainly involve copious amounts of drinking for her birthday. Even Sunday was another all-day workshop with Albert at his home. So Lavender's permission to leave would at least give her enough time to appreciate her gift before yet another busy weekend ahead.

Arriving home, Marf was surprised to see his mistress home before the end of the workday. The house-elf was more than happy to help Hermione clear the main room of her flat to accommodate the surprise inside the box.

Before opening the box, Hermione read Severus' letter to her.

-------

My beloved Hermione,

While this may not be as functional as the book I gave to you last year, even I can admit that something a bit frivolous now and again is not entirely a bad thing.

I do hope the Weasley twins have fulfilled my commission according to my specifications. Given their 'talents' even back at Hogwarts, I have faith that they have created something worthy of my level of expectation. I hope it will meet yours and will delight you as well.

Until we are reunited once again, I count the days until you are in my arms once more.

May your birthday be filled with good cheer and the good company of friends.

Eternally yours,

Severus
Hermione did have Severus' address, as Draco and Ginny had given it to her. Given she was going to see him in early October, she felt little need to write when they would see each other soon. Besides, she was leaving for India in thirteen days, while an albatross took between fifteen and twenty days to get from London to Hawaii. By the time it arrived, it would be after they had left to go to India, coming from opposite sides of the world.

Tucking the letter into a pocket, Hermione now stood in the middle of her empty flat and read the directions. All one had to do to activate the gift was open the box, and to put it back in the box required a simple incantation with directions on how to wave one's wand. She read over the direction twice to make sure she knew how to put it away, since Hermione had no idea what to expect.

Lifting the lid off the box, out leapt a flash of green and other bright vivid colors that filled every space of the parlor-cum-bedroom. When everything settled, Hermione looked around in amazement at what the twins had produced. They had taken their Portable Swamp idea and – she guessed it was upon Severus' suggestion – turned it into a tropical paradise instead. No doubt the charms were similar, but this was filled with perfumed flower-laden trees and shrubbery, and a waterfall, instead of stagnant water, muck, and dank smells. Birdsong filled the air along with the sounds of water splashing. Lush foliage, branches, and fronds obscured much of her flat's walls and ceiling, giving it an almost private, enclosed feeling.

Hermione laughed and spun about, enthralled with the splendor surrounding her. Beneath her feet was soft grass, and the waterfall that splashed over a rocky cliff edge – about where the crown molding was – cascaded over rocks into a small pool, just large enough for two to slip into. Walking over to it, after a detour past a clump of bamboo, bright flowering gingers and vivid shrimp plants, she placed her hand in the pool and noted how it was warm enough to soak in – a mini-hot spring.

She recognized several plants from her memory Severus gave her. Some of them he'd pointed out himself, some were from a book on tropical plants of Southeast Asia, South America and the Pacific Islands she'd purchased via Owl Order from Flourish and Blotts.

As she walked through, she named each plant she recognized aloud. "Cochlospermum vitifolium 'Florepleno'." She cupped one of the huge, richly yellow ruffled blossoms in her hand, amazed at the size and beauty of it. "Gardenia taitensis, Delonix regia, Schizostachyum glaucofoliolium," the last being a Polynesian bamboo Severus had pointed out in his memory for her, also giving her the Hawaiian name of "'Ohe Kahiko." There were even several bushes of Jasmine sambac, the flowers included in Draco and Ginny's lei to her, which gave off a rich and heady perfume that nearly made her head spin.

This was as romantic and glorious as any photo spread she had seen in many of her books of Hawaii.

After a tour around her own flat to look at all the different plants and flowers, Hermione was tempted to pick one of the flowers, but did not know if the flower could be kept out of the box, after packing away. If picked, would the flower be forever gone from that plant's stem with no new growth to replace it and never to re-bloom the next time she opened the box, or would it alter the spells used to create this lush and hedonistic scene. She would definitely have to owl the twins about the stellar work they had done and some follow up questions.

Hermione decided a dip in the warm pool was in order. After shedding her clothes, she toed into the small pool nude, feeling her muscles relax in the warm waters. It was certainly cooler than the hot springs at the spa, as she could see herself sitting for a long while in this temperature without getting overheated.

More than anything, she wished Severus was there to sit with her in this mini-tropical paradise he had given her for her birthday. It was small enough, she could easily pack it and take it with her to India in thirteen days and her wish still come true.

She wondered if the hot springs Severus talked of visiting once weekly was similar to this, as it was also similar to the photos she had in one of her books that she frequently fantasized her and Severus making love in. The boughs of flower-laden branches cascading near the edges of the pool certainly were close to her fantasy scenario.

After a long soak, Hermione got out of the water and wandered about some more, envisioning herself and Severus naked in the tropical forest. It almost brought back memories of the Dionysus Fever Potion she took and the game of chase that she and Satyr-Severus had before he captured her, taking her roughly within the hallucination, under the mind-altering influence of her final Greek project.

Hermione laid back on the soft grass and began to masturbate, remembering the image of Severus – with his beard and even longer hair with a white streak – taking her in the midst of their own private paradise. She came with a fierce cry, calling out his name.

As she laid there, feeling more satisfied from a round of masturbation than she had in a long, long while, Hermione stroked the grass, imagining Severus beside her. She whispered, "Soon we'll be together again, Severus. Soon."

Severus didn't normally attend children's birthday parties. Actually, he never did, but he was willing to make an exception for Kaimi. Draco and Ginny were invited well, but they were busy getting ready for the belly dancing recital later that afternoon.

The youngest of the Finau clan was turning nine, and her party was held at the Oktoberfest celebration, at a reserved table in the community center. Mounga's other children had reached an age beyond birthday parties, except for a few friends coming over for cake. Kaimi wanted one last big party as a child, which was normally held during the event since it was easier to get all her friends together there as the rest of the town tended to be there as well.

Rainbow was there in full German native dress, in a dirndl befitting a married woman, picked up during their family trip to Germany that summer. Rainbow felt a strong affinity towards her German roots, in addition to her Hawaiian roots, as she had a great-grandmother, Margaretha, with whom she was close. The German witch got pregnant around the turn of the century by a local Bavarian Muggle of some noble title now forgotten, whom she could not marry. She was perceived as a peasant, and had they known she was a witch, as her Muggle lover was unaware of her magical abilities as well, it would have been an even worse scandal. As it was, his family gave her some money and the promise to marry her off to some farmer in another village thirty miles away. She took the money and instead fled to Malu Palekaiko where she had the child, a witch and Rainbow's grandmother, and in time became a member of the local town council.

Rainbow was not the only local who had German blood, as there was also a small wave of Germans who had left their home country in the mid- to late-1800's. The immigrants made it to the Sandwich Islands as it was known at the time, so it seemed there was a smattering of Teutonic blood in many of the locals, in addition to Portuguese, Spanish, American, Mexican, Chinese, Japanese, Filipino, some various South American countries, and the other Polynesian Islands.

There were a lot of celebrations from other countries in Malu Palekaiko throughout the year. The Mexican community had their Cinco de Mayo celebration, plus El Dios de la Muerte for the sanctuary-seekers from Central America, the Japanese with the Bon Festival, the Irish with St. Patrick's Day, which was surprising since back in Ireland it was rather a non-event for the wizarding community in the country, and the Chinese and other eastern Asians with their Lunar New Year.

Shortly after opening his business, to harbor good will in the community, Severus had even paid for one of the local Chinese lion dance clubs to perform the "Cai Qing" or "Picking the Green" in front of his business. Since many of the local businesses were doing it, he figured for his first year in business it was good policy to follow local customs. There was a small parade featuring the small troops of lion dancing clubs and even a dragon dance, but the dragon dance only occurred when a dragon was not currently nesting on top of the volcano. No one wanted to tempt a dragon down from the volcano thinking there was a possible mate in the middle of town chasing an illuminated pearl.

And now it was time for Oktoberfest, which meant lots of German foods, music, dancing, lots of drinking and Kaimi’s birthday party in the midst of the celebrations. Severus did note the coincidence that Kaimi’s birthday was the day before Hermione’s, though he made no mention of it.

Severus was told that he didn't have to buy her anything, just that his mere presence for blowing out the candles and cake was all that was required of him, since Kaimi was rather fond of her "uncle." He did splurge and get her a small gold necklace with a pendant of a snake that had a tiny emerald for the eye. Kaimi had been quite thrilled upon learning that the Slytherin House mascot was a snake, and she was rather fascinated by them. She even asked him about Salazar Slytherin himself, not having been brought up with certain prejudices against Slytherins that some wizarding folk back in England had towards Slytherin House and Parselmouths.

Kaimi was dressed in her own dirndl of light blue with Tyrolean ribbon trim and a lace-edged white apron. Even her pigtails were braided and looped. Iakona was in lederhosen, and a red gingham shirt, with requisite knee-socks. Mounga refused to wear the traditional male German outfit, citing he had no German blood in him that he knew of, and that even though he was a good sport, even he had limits to what he would do.

Akela was wearing her own bright red dirndl, the skirt portion hemmed to just above the knees, which was quite flirtatious for a young witch who was coming into womanhood. She was dancing with a wizard who had been courting her recently. After the viewing of "Monty Python and the Holy Grail," the young wizard, named Tristan, had asked Severus for permission to escort Akela home after the movie – with Severus chaperoning, of course. Tristan was an adequate Potions student of his, of no remarkable talent, but he was quite good at Transfiguration, based on Draco's praise. He was an acceptable suitor for Akela in not only Mounga's eyes, but Severus' as well. Even Akela admitted to Severus, when he asked about their courtship, that she wanted to take things slowly with him and not rush things, unlike before. Rainbow and Ginny had the good graces to not mention that Tristan resembled a much younger version of Severus with a different nose.

Severus sat nearby as everyone, but him, joined in a chorus of "Happy Birthday" – sung wizarding-style, of course – before Kaimi made a wish and blew out the candles. He still was not comfortable with singing in public. The cake was a moist and delectable passion fruit flavored yellow cake with whipped cream frosting. After Kaimi polished off her piece of cake in no time flat, she ran over to Severus. She gave him a hug and brief kiss upon his cheek in thanks for her gift, which she was wearing proudly instead of the usual edelweiss flower necklace she would have worn to Oktoberfest with her outfit. He didn't even flinch when she kissed him, and Severus said he was glad she enjoyed her present so much. Even Severus was willing to accept that it was her second favorite gift, right after her new broom. It was hard for a bauble to compare to a new and proper riding broom.
As she trotted off to play with her friends and dance the polka with another witch of the same age, Mounga saddled up to Severus.

"Have you and Hermione ever talked about kids," Mounga said out of the blue, after watching the exchange between his daughter and his friend.

"Only that she was never going to have them with her ex-husband," he admitted freely, quiet enough so that no one else could hear their exchange, despite the fact it would have been hard with the oom-pah band playing up on the stage.

"What about kids with her second husband?" Mounga countered.

Severus swiveled and gave his large friend a look of mild shock, given the implications of his statement.

"Don't tell me, in all the time you spent together, even when you asked her to come with you here, you never talked about kids?" Mounga asked with a slight nudging of Severus' arm.

"No. It never came up. I never asked her to marry me either, though it may have been implied when I offered to be her master, but given how she had recently escaped an unpleasant first marriage, I didn't want to press the issue. When I did ask her to come, she promised to stay behind and clear my name. And when she did decide to come, it was but seconds before the vial of hair broke and she had to stay behind despite everything." Severus heaved a troubled sigh. "There was no point, since there was no plan of us being together again in the future. When I left, I gave her permission to move on with her life without me. But now that she will return..."

Severus shook his head weary. He had no idea how Hermione would feel about children with him. Even he wasn't sure if he was ready for children yet, if ever. He had killed his pregnant wife, and while Hermione had forgiven him, some part of him feared that if he became a father, he would be just like his own.

"I don't know. My own father was a monster in his own right, ruling through fear and alcohol-fueled fists, and I dread that I would be just like him," Severus admitted. "I don't want to raise children in a home of fear."

"Just because your father was like that does not mean you will be," Mounga assured him.
"But—"

Mounga shook his head and placed a large hand on Severus shoulder and leaned in. "If we all wound up just like our fathers, then I would be an unforgiving tyrannical bastard who plays favorites with his children, pitting them against each other, and this town would be a very different place. Trust me, as long as you make the effort, you can avoid becoming just like your father."

Severus had rarely heard Mounga speak of his father, though when Akela heard her mother mention earlier that day that her grandfather and Mounga's brother were coming for Thanksgiving, she looked rather grim and mildly shaken. The Potions master had never even known his friend had a brother until Rainbow's casual comment.

"Besides," the large wizard added, "I've seen you with Kaimi. You'd be a great father."

Severus didn't know whether to believe his friend or not, as Kaimi was not his own, and he was not the most forgiving or patient of wizards either.

Rainbow tried to ask Severus to get up and polka with her, but Severus was unaccustomed to the steps and preferred not to learn in front of others. The only reason why Severus stuck around the Oktoberfest festivities, besides Kaimi's personal invitation to attend for cake, was the good food and the fact that Ginny would have her first belly dancing school recital when the oom-pah bands were done playing. The recital was to be used as a transition before the evening bands began. He was there for moral support for Ginny.

The evening bands were part of the reason the community center was packed, as it was a music festival of sorts. Mounga encouraged him to stick around and listen to at least a few songs, since this music festival was a bit different than most.

As Severus sipped on good Bavarian pilsner, Portkeyed in directly from Munich for the event, he strolled around. It was the island's 148th annual Oktoberfest, though the sign hung above the stage said "Malu Palekaiko's 11th annual Sausage, Suds and Sounds Festival" with the addendum added on, "Now with more Shimmy!" It was rather trite and Severus felt that it cheapened the whole decorum of Ginny's efforts to incorporate a belly dance recital into the festival. However, Ginny wasn't picky, just thrilled to have a chance to show off her students that she was so proud of.

As the afternoon waned, witches of all ages took off backstage and began to get ready, switching from dirndls, sundresses and muumuus to fringed and beaded belts, swirling skirts, and fitted bra tops, or baladi dresses that usually covered the arms and midsections.

Around five o'clock, the last oom-pah band finished their last song and cleared the stage of all their instruments. Halulu introduced Ginny to those who had only come to the island for the festival, as everyone else on the island knew her or of her. Ginny, with aplomb, addressed the crowd, thanking everyone for coming before introducing the various sets of dancers. Since Ginny's Middle Eastern dance school was still a new venture, there weren't as many students as there were during the Christmas hula recital. Still, there were enough students to break down into three underage age groups and a couple adult groups.

Kaimi performed with her age five-to-ten group, and Severus promised her he would stick around to watch her dance even though he was there for Ginny as well. Having seen Ginny perform before, he could now tell the difference between a novice and experienced belly dancer. But just as Ginny was able to quickly pick up the hula, based on years of training as a dancer, the hula students made an easy transition to Middle Eastern-style dancing as well.

The highlight of Ginny's recital was her performing two dances, one with finger cymbals and one with a long silk scarf. Ginny was at the end of her first trimester, and she was just on the verge of beginning to show. Already, Severus could tell she'd had to alter the bust line of her dance outfit, since she wasn't quite so filled out on top before her pregnancy. Draco waited by the side of the stage to make sure that if Ginny collapsed yet again on stage, he would be there for her, though she promised not to perform a routine quite so taxing.

At the end of the recital, there was a great cheer and a few extra rounds of applause. The crowd roared when Ginny took her bow, thrilled and mesmerized by her dancing prowess and grace.

Afterwards, the first band of the evening began to set up.

Ginny joined Severus and Draco, once she had put her caftan on to cover her costume. While Severus was tucking into a plate of a Bockwurst sausage, mashed potatoes, and sautéed red cabbage with apples, Ginny came over with a heaping pile featuring two Hannover sausages, a pork chop, a mound of sauerkraut, two large potato dumplings with mushroom gravy, sautéed red cabbage with apples, boiled carrots, spaetzle, and a large tankard of non-alcoholic sparkling apple juice.

"I don't know about you, but I'm famished," Ginny exclaimed as she dove into her plate like someone who had been deprived of food for a week.

Severus was too distracted to eat, stunned that this witch who was half his size ate a meal that could choke a hippogriff, and in no time flat.

Draco nudged Severus, to distract him from the stunning fact that Ginny had eaten everything on her plate and was talking about getting some apple strudel with vanilla ice cream, evidently having found a way to open the sluice to her other hollow leg. "So Severus, do you think Hermione will wait until her birthday to open her present, or do you think when the twins dropped it off Friday she opened it?" he prompted him, trying to ignore the fact his wife's appetite at the end of her first trimester had returned with a vengeance.

Ginny wasn't the only witch with an appetite. Halulu, who was also pregnant, was herself diving into a large plate of food, but hers was still nowhere near in size as what Ginny had polished off. Mrs. Malfoy came back to the table with three servings of apple strudel a la mode. One of them was for Draco, the other two for herself, after Severus declined as he was plenty full from his dinner.

"I don't know," he said distractedly, as Ginny practically inhaled both portions of dessert. Severus remembered his own wife had a small spike in her appetite, but this was getting beyond belief even for him.

Ginny then excused herself from the table to suddenly run off to the loo once she was done.

"Where does she put it?" Severus asked.

"Don't ask. This morning I found her chugging sauerkraut juice straight from the jar. Followed by eating whole cloves of garlic, saying they tasted sweet, like almonds to her." Draco gave a brief shudder. "I'm not sure if I'm going to be father to a human child or a tapeworm. Is this normal, Severus?"

Severus was not the authority on pregnancy. He almost joked that Draco should ask his mother-in-law about such matters since Molly had been through it six times already and was practically an expert, but he knew how Draco was still quite vexed over her comments during their visit. He merely shook his head and suggested talking to Rainbow or one of the other Healers on the island about his concerns.

Noting the time, he figured it was around six in the morning London time and officially Hermione's birthday. Silently, he raised his tankard in a silent toast to her for her birthday, looking forward to seeing her in less than two weeks.
Severus was eager to not only having some intimate time with Hermione, but some nice long conversations, like the ones they used to have. He was hoping they’d finally have a chance to talk about their future together. There was also news of a new dragon species found in Antarctica that had just made the papers that day, as there hadn’t been a new breed of dragon discovered in nearly 400 years. He was anticipating discussing the particular ingredient properties of this new breed of dragon with Hermione. Perhaps as her final apprentice project she could even create a new potion using parts of this new breed of dragon. He was happy to help her come up with ideas if she needed to bounce ideas off of him, remembering fondly their collaboration and brainstorming sessions.

As the first band started playing, Severus decided that songs that change from one style of music to another were not his cup of tea. Hearing the melancholy pop love song, "Which Coast Witch," performed in a Dixieland jazz style, then changing to an angry punk style half-way through was just a bit too eccentric even for him. And from what Mounga had told him, every band would be changing from one style of music to another part way through their songs. It was the signature of the event that drew people to waltz for the first half of a song, then line dance to some country-western interpretation of a "classic" song.

As Severus reached his home, with a bit of leftover sausage wrapped up for the cat that refused to be adopted by Ginny and steadfastly stuck with him instead, he could hear off in the distance the faint strains of the band playing an Irish ballad that morphed into a Calypso beat.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Thank you to my betas for this chapter, Hope and JuneW.

Lani is Hawaiian for "heavenly", and mauna is Hawaiian for "mountain." Severus lives on Heavenly Mountain Trail, as it is the street that turns into a path up to the volcano and goes past the front of his house.

Cochlospermum vitifolium 'Florepleno' is the Double Buttercup tree. Quite lovely when in bloom.

Gardenia taitensis is also known as Tahitian Gardenia, a white, six- to eight-petaled fragrant flower on an evergreen shrub. There are Hawaiian songs that sing about this flower and how its loveliness is equated to the beauty of women.

Delonix regia is also known as Royal Poinciana, a tree with vibrant red (sometimes orange or yellow) flowers, seen frequently used as street landscaping trees in Hawaii. And yes, there is a Royal Poinciana tree in Draco and Ginny's Japanese garden back home, in case you recognize the tree name.

_Jasmine sambac_ are also known as pikake flowers. The single pikake form is most often used in leis.

You can read more about the lion dance and "Picking of the Green" here online: http://www.nationsonline.org/oneworld/Chinese_Customs/lion_dance.htm

Baladi dresses are long fitted folk-style belly dancing dresses that cover more skin than the more traditional midsection-baring outfit. You can read about them and see some nice examples here: http://www.shira.net/costuming/cg/baladi-dress.htm
"Draconem antarcticus glacihalus"

Chapter Summary

A newly discovered dragon species winds up being not such a boon to the wizarding world. Severus is “not so hot” about the discovery either.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Ninety-Five
"Draconem antarcticus glacihalus"

Disclaimer: One, two! One, two! And through and through The fanfic author went “Disclaim!”
She admitted with no growling that Potter's owned by Rowling
She went galumphing in vain.

A/N: This disclaimer is a parody of Lewis Carroll's poem, “Jabberwocky.”

==============

The news of the new dragon species in Antarctica was a momentous event globally in the wizarding world. An international team of witches and wizards, specializing in plants and magical creatures, had gone to explore the vast Antarctic deserts. There, they found the previously unrecorded breed of dragon they called the Antarctic Ice Dragon, or Draconem antarcticus glacihalus, for its ability to breathe ice instead of fire, as observed by the team. Some might have thought being caught in the breath of an Ice Dragon would be preferable than being burned to a crisp by most dragons. The Ice Dragon's breath was so cold, it was as if one had been burnt, similar to a Muggle handling dry ice without proper protection.

However, what the wizarding world did not count on, was a new strain of dragon pox which was unintentionally brought back by the international team and quickly spread throughout the wizarding world. Not every breed of dragon was a vector for dragon pox, so they did not think the Antarctic Ice Dragon would be a source of one either.

Charlie Weasley was one of the lucky few who went to Antarctica with the team of explorers, as they needed experts on magical beasts, should they encounter new species. Arriving back in London, after samples of the newly-discovered dragon's eggshells, molted scales and scat had been collected, Charlie went to the Ministry to deliver the artifacts to those within the Department for the Regulation and Control of Magical Creatures, who would study the items and compare its properties to that of other known dragons.

As Charlie was walking back to the lift, looking forward to seeing his wife, Angelina, and their three children after being gone for the past three weeks, he was suddenly overcome with a fit of sneezing. The sudden sprouting of frozen snot icicles out of his nose two feet in length did not bode well.

〜〜〜〜〜〜〜*

It was late and long past dinner. Severus had everything packed for his trip to India where he would finally see Hermione, but he was far too busy to think about her at the moment. Right now Severus, Ranjit, and Arnold were at the clinic combining their talents in search for a cure to this new Ice Dragon pox sweeping through their world like wildfire.

There were a few deaths from ice pox, as they called it, but those who died were the very old who, like the regular strain of dragon pox, were much more susceptible.

Most remedies for the standard case of dragon pox called for the cure that Gunhilda of Gorsemoor developed in the late 1500's. In addition to the potion to help treat regular dragon pox symptoms, lowering one's body temperature was recommended. This was because the disease usually had symptoms such as fever, burning throat – literally, sparks coming out of the nose when sneezing, profuse sweating, and, in rare cases, a craving for raw mutton. In more severe cases, one had permanent scars, not to mention permanently green-tinged skin if not cured. This new strain of dragon pox involved snot icicles hanging from the nose, sweat which turned into ice crystals on the skin, bone-shaking chills, fatigue, small bumps that felt frozen to the touch and itched, headaches, and – when the patient was not suffering from fever – a lower than normal body temperature that resulted in blue-tinged skin.

The Potions masters of Malu Palekaiko had been in contact with others from China, Japan, Australia, Canada, the United States, Mexico, Equador, Peru and Chile, which were the closest countries by albatross since the disease started spreading immediately following the arrival of various exploratory team members back from Antarctica. The exploratory team had members from Great Britain, Russia, Canada, South Africa, New Zealand, and Brazil. It was the perfect dispersion to spread an unknown vector throughout the wizarding world.

More isolated places like Malu Palekaiko were some of the last places to get the disease, but it arrived there nonetheless in less than a week from the first reported cases. It had been brought in via a witch who had Portkeyed in from Vancouver, Canada to talk to Severus and Blanche about an exclusive distribution deal for the Miniature Man-Eating Masdevallia pods throughout North America. She didn't have any symptoms until after she had arrived and infected everyone who worked in the Portkey office. Thankfully Halulu wasn't working there that day, since they had no idea how this disease would affect unborn children. Ginny had fortunately not caught the disease, and was being very cautious since the outbreak began, canceling all belly-dancing classes until further notice. Even Severus had canceled all tutoring and private consultations, corresponding through Owl Post only, for now. Besides, he was busy reading research other Potions masters around the world were doing and using their work – along with his own, Arnold's, and Ranjit's findings – to come up with a cure.

Gunhilda's cure involved using some blood of the Common Welsh Green, the breed which was the source of the dragon pox disease. Unfortunately, there was no blood of the Antarctic Ice Dragon, since none was collected and a new team was back in Antarctica trying to locate an Ice Dragon on the vast and desolate continent. The fact it had white scales made it blend in more, making it even harder to spot by broom or by Apparating to mountaintops to scan horizons from above.

There was talk of stopping Portkey travel until either the disease had run its course or a cure was found. Severus hoped if they did quarantine borders between countries, it would be after he had left for India. All these weeks of anticipation, and he was ready to see Hermione once again.

Severus was wondering if the outbreak was an emergency enough to call off his trip to India, as the Potions masters' code of ethics dictated he stay if such an emergency occurred. Rainbow assured him that Arnold and Ranjit were there, so he wasn't leaving their island without at least one Potions master to help deal with the problem. Besides, if Severus talked with other Potions masters in India, they might have some new ideas he hadn't come across in the correspondence with other Potions masters around the world, and bring those ideas back when he returned.

The clinic was full of witches and wizards of various ages, complaining of chills and other symptoms, despite the recent heat wave when it was 90 degrees F degrees outside. Most were diagnosed and sent back home with recommendations to keep as warm as possible to ease their suffering, as there was nothing else they could do for them at the clinic.

Draco had come to get Severus at the last minute before they left, indicating that Ginny was waiting for them at the Portkey office.

"Go, Severus," Rainbow said, seeing the conflict in Severus' face whether to stay and help or go. "No one has had much luck here, and maybe you'll learn something there that'll help."

Severus' bag was packed and by the door. As he headed to join Draco, who was waiting for him just on the other side of the door to the clinic, he felt a cool tingling in his sinuses. He stopped and paused in his tracks before sneezing violently.
Turning around, with two large icicles hanging from his nostrils, Severus looked at Rainbow with a look of dread plainly written on his face.

"No." He shook his head in disbelief that fate would be so cruel as to not only infect him, but prevent him from traveling and seeing Hermione at the last minute.

Draco, wondering when Severus was going to get his arse moving along, peered through the small glass window set high into the door to the clinic. There he spotted Severus looking back at him, icicles hanging from his face and his skin suddenly beginning to take on a pale blue cast. Draco's heart went out to his friend who would be denied being reunited with his love. Severus couldn't travel if he had the pox.

"Go," Severus said, loud enough so that Draco could hear through the windowpane. "Tell Hermione..." What could he tell her?

Standing on the other side of the glass and nodding, Draco said, "I know." His face was full of empathetic sorrow for his friend. He would tell Hermione about how Severus had been looking forward to seeing her so badly, but could not come now.

Rainbow ushered Severus over to the last empty bed in the clinic. As chills overtook him, he thought about the fact that Ranjit, Arnold, and he had been hesitant to try anything too experimental on the others' suffering. This was because the Potions masters code of ethics forbade them from dispensing experimental potions that they hadn't tried on oneself first, nor had any one of the three Healers on the island come down with it yet. Maybe they could now reach a breakthrough with Severus as the guinea pig.

One of the island's several Muggles, who were immune to all magical diseases, was in the clinic helping as best she could. Janine Watters, an African-American Muggle and former nurse when she lived in Minnesota, had retired to Malu Palekaiko with her wizard husband. She wrapped a blanket around Severus and offered him some piping hot coffee until Rainbow could look him over.

Hermione was waiting at the Varanasi Portkey office in India, eagerly awaiting the arrival of Severus, Draco, and Ginny in the mid-afternoon. Albert was there too, by her side, eager to speak with Severus about any research he had been doing in Hawaii regarding the outbreak of ice pox.

As the Malfoys alighted in the Portkey office, Hermione's heart sank. The look on Ginny and Draco's face was enough to tell her that Severus was not coming.
Hermione embraced her friend, as Ginny said with somber regret, "He was coming, but at the last minute, he came down with the pox." There was no need for Ginny to clarify which pox it was.

Hermione blinked back tears, knowing that not only was she not going to see Severus, but he was sick with the malady as well.

Albert and Hermione had been busy for the past week, prior to their departure, spending most of their time at St. Mungo's. All research and development at The Lovely Lavender Company was temporarily put on hold, though the house-elves in the warehouse were still manufacturing and shipping products. Lavender was avoiding going out into public, working from home instead in order to reduce possible exposure to the new contagion.

While at St. Mungo's, Hermione got to meet Reginald Chuff's current apprentice, Dvalinn Chrysalis. Chuff did not bring Dvalinn along to the monthly Potions masters' drinking parties, instead keeping the young wizard back home doing more cleaning, preparing of ingredients and low-level brewing for commissions that Reginald took as his main source of income.

Dvalinn was a lad of nineteen. He looked somewhat undernourished, and was skittish when his master, Chuff, was around. While Chuff did not physically beat Dvalinn, she could tell that Chuff was still just as much of a demanding and unrepentantly remorseless master as when Severus had studied under him. Hermione would have just plainly called him cruel. Watching the way Chuff ordered Dvalinn about and insulted him, Hermione could see where Severus learned his style of teaching from. Even with Severus' less than fond memories of Chuff, he had absorbed some of the harsher aspects of his mentor's personality when it came to teaching.

When Chuff wasn't around, Hermione gave Dvalinn tips and hints on how to chop and slice certain ingredients, given her years of work in her prior job, as Dvalinn was still uneven in his knife work.

But despite all the available Potions masters and mistresses in Great Britain, and their apprentices as well, in addition to nearly every country around the world working to create a cure for ice pox, none was discovered yet. Considering all the planning and great expense Lavender had gone through to plan this launch in India, Hermione and Albert still went despite the medical crisis. They hoped to consult with the Potions masters in India regarding any breakthroughs they might have discovered.

Hermione, Albert, and the Malfoys all headed to the hotel to check in.
Hermione's Aunt Christine, Lavender's Advertising and Marketing Vice President for Europe, Africa and Western Asia, had already arrived via plane the night before and was checked into the hotel, as the hotel also accepted Muggles, as long as they had some connection to the wizarding world. A liaison from the hotel brought Christine from the airport, via a magical rickshaw, similar to the Knight Bus, with orders to proceed carefully with its pregnant Muggle passenger. The entrance to the wizarding quarter of Varanasi was through one narrow, unremarkable alleyway that was otherwise unnoticed by the local Muggle population.

Lavender had already arranged for a team of stylists to meet Hermione and everyone else to take measurements for custom-made clothes for the big launch party and press event the next day.

The valet witch assigned to Hermione's room put away her belongings while a seamstress took measurements for her sari outfit. She would need a petticoat, choli top, sandals and jewelry to match for the complete outfit. Before Hermione arrived, Lavender had already ordered Hermione's sari to be in a bright fuchsia pink which was quite complementary to her coloring, but it was up to Hermione to pick which fuchsia sari, of the many the dressmaker brought to pick from for the event tomorrow. Lavish jewelry was already rented for the occasion for the women.

Looking through the row of folded saris laid out for her choosing, a portion of the decorative pallu end visible, Hermione had a hard time deciding, as they were all so beautiful. Some had intricate paisley patterns along the body with ornate gold patterns along the bottom edge, some featured a heavily beaded pallu of intricate craftsmanship. Finally, her eyes alighted upon one fuchsia sari with violet and orange secondary colors, with just a hint of emerald green accenting the bottom border and pallu.

Now that her sari had been selected, the seamstress began waving her wand about, much like Madam Mandel, listing off measurements in Sanskrit while the hovering charmed quill and parchment took dictation. Once done, the witch told Hermione her outfit would be ready tomorrow in time for the event and she would help her dress, including charms to keep her sari in place.

Ginny and Aunt Christine had their own seamstresses measuring them as well. Because Aunt Christine was nearly six months along in her pregnancy, Lavender had ordered a double-layered abaya-style churidar kameez in a turquoise georgette silk to help minimize her baby bump and flatter her blonde hair and pale complexion. Ginny was in her fourth month and had a two-piece lehenga in vibrant green to cover her now slightly swollen abdomen and complement her hair color.

Draco and Albert were also being measured and outfitted as well with dhoti sherwani suits of their own, befitting a formal affair of this caliber. Albert was told he would have a cut-away front, while Draco's long lean form was more flattered with the full-front sherwani jacket with right angles and no curved bottom jacket hem.
Now that everything had been put away by the valet assigned to the Malfoys' suite, Ginny laid down for the night, though it was only five in the afternoon local time. Draco headed up to the rooftop garden, bar, and restaurant. He found Hermione sitting at the bar, sipping a cup of hot tea.

Sliding up onto the bar stool next to her, Draco decided to stick with something non-alcoholic for once, as it was hotter than even the heat wave back in Hawaii. He was slightly perplexed Hermione wasn't drinking something with ice.

There was a silence that stretched between the two for a moment as they gazed out past the unobstructed view of the vibrantly-colored city. They could see the Ganges River stretching along the land like some great sleeping mythical snake, its waters undulating like the rippling of scales, swollen near the edge of its banks at the end of monsoon season. The sun, behind them in the west, began to color the buildings to the east in pale saffron tones.

"I can't tell you how much Severus was looking forward to coming," Draco said softly, his voice tinged with regret as he looked out cross at the far-off horizon. "It was just as we were about to leave for the Portkey office. He had his bag by the door of the clinic, Rainbow told him that they would be fine, as Arnold and Ranjit were there. And just as he was about to head out the door, that's when he came down with it."

Draco waited for some reaction from Hermione, but she kept staring blankly towards the fields located on the other side of the banks of the Ganges. There was a thin trail of smoke rising up from nearby where a cremation funeral was taking place along the shore, next to one of the many ghats, or staircases, leading down to the river, ruining the otherwise perfect view.

Just as the view was not perfect, marred by the knowledge that someone's corpse was currently being burned as part of the funereal purification ritual, so was Hermione's trip to India marred by Severus' absence and knowledge he had come down with ice dragon pox.

On another rooftop nearby, a woman – witch or Muggle, it was not known – was sitting while playing her sarangi. She sang a soft lament as she gently played her instrument. It was as if this woman had peered into Hermione's heart and seen the sorrow that subdued her, then translated it to song for all in that quarter to hear. Her voice rang clear, undulating as if in a prolonged sob.

"Ever since we came back with your letter, memory, and bouquet for him, he's..." Draco hadn't asked him directly, but knowing Severus as long as he had, he could tell his assessment of his friend was correct. "He's been happy. Happier than I've ever seen him before. Hopeful, even."

Draco turned to watch Hermione's reaction to that news. He saw her give a bittersweet smile, as serene as any smile gracing the lips of the many statues of Buddha they had seen throughout the city.

Hermione realized that Fate was toying with her, and she would not give it the satisfaction of seeing her suffer. Fate had given her the choice of staying behind or leaving with Severus, and when she chose to leave with him, Fate had caused that vial to slip from her shaking hand, removing her choice from her. Severus had made the choice of coming half-way around the world to see her, and his choice had been taken from him at the last minute as well.

"Keep calm and carry on. Isn't that how the phrase goes?" she asked before draining the last of her tea from her glass cup.

Damn that British pride to keep a stiff upper lip and all that rot. But what would a temper tantrum up on that rooftop in Varanasi do to cure Severus, or the rest of the wizarding world that was suffering from that damned plague? If anything, since Hermione would not be spending any time with Severus, every spare moment she had, when not fulfilling her job for Lavender with this launch, would go towards working with Albert for a cure. Albert had already made arrangements to visit some of the local Potions masters and brainstorm with them, compare notes, and continue to work towards some breakthrough. She would go as well, since she wasn't going to be holed up with Severus in a hotel room for a few days, living on nothing but each other's kisses and room service.

Draco stifled a yawn. "Sorry, not you, it's just that Portkey travel can be quite taxing at times. And now we have to get used to this time zone. It was close to eleven at night when we left, and now my body feels as if it's well past midnight. I wish there was a potion for Portkey travel across vast distances to reset my body to the right time zone. Are you aware of any?" he asked, regretting not querying Severus before he left Hawaii.

She shook her head. Hermione was not aware of any, and she herself was going to be wishing for a potion as Draco described. Her body felt like it was around noonish, as she herself was still on London time.

There were sleeping draughts, but it still did not do anything in regards to resetting one's internal body clock any faster, or with more ease. Perhaps no such potion existed, since Portkey travel across vast distances was still not common – just as in the Muggle world jet travel was not common and not exactly cheap either. Maybe Draco had inadvertently solved Hermione's problem of what to create for a new potion for her apprenticeship. Hermione did overhear her Aunt Christine complaining she couldn't take melatonin for this trip, due to her pregnancy. She would have to ask her aunt about how melatonin was used to help Muggles with jet lag.

There was nothing else Rainbow could do for him once she diagnosed Severus but for him to go home to rest. In his rapidly deteriorating condition, even he didn't trust himself to Apparate the ten blocks without making things worse, nor did he have the strength to walk those ten blocks that were all uphill. Even going by Floo was risky, since he was sure he might pass out during the short trip. Neither Arnold nor Ranjit wanted to touch Severus to Side-Apparate him home, as they didn't want to catch the ice pox either. Luckily, one of the Muggles on the island, Matt, had a two-seater surrey bicycle. Matt offered to take him as far as within one block of his house, where the road became too steep to peddle up all the way to his front garden gate.

Severus had seen the odd side-by-side two-seater bicycle about town once or twice. It was even used as a way for introducing young witches and wizards to the concept of a bicycle before graduating them to a regular two-wheeled model during summers. He had first informally met the owner, Matt, on Christmas Day when he went flying with the Finaus and they introduced Severus to the Muggle who surfed with Shark, the clothing store owner.

Matt, whose witch wife, Lorraine, was at home with the pox, helped Severus onto the surrey bike and ran around to the other side to hop on and begin the ride through town. The bike rocked and jostled a bit, as the roads on the island were not built for cars, even though they were wide enough to easily accommodate them.

Once the road became too steep for Matt to continue peddling the weight of two adults up the hill that became steeper, he put the brake on and helped Severus the last block up, as Severus had become quite weak.

Standing on the front porch in the flickering torchlight, Matt asked, "Do you need me to help you get to your bedroom?"

Severus shook his head, while his teeth chattered, and weakly thanked the kind man for helping as much as he could. He wasn't sure if he would have been able to walk that last block without leaning on Matt once or twice, dismayed this malady was sapping all his strength.

Once inside, Severus thought maybe he should have taken Matt up on his offer. It took the last of his will to nearly crawl upstairs into his bedroom and into bed, barely able to summon every blanket in the house to climb under.

He didn't even have the strength to take his clothes off, except for his shoes, before he passed out. He was worn from lengthy days working on a cure with no results, and the late hour.
Nearly all the Muggles in Malu Palekaiko were helping witches and wizards – running errands, shopping, cooking, and helping any way they could – since they weren't susceptible to the disease. Even some of Tina's Muggle relatives flew all the way from the East Coast to help Tina, who had come down with it as well, plus do "the good Christian thing" and help around with a few neighbors as well.

Elves and goblins were immune as well, so they were kept quite busy. The laundry service run by Mr. Loddy, a free elf, was running 24 hours a day with the increase in demand. The elf-for-hire service was also booked beyond capacity, with people willing to pay extra for services.

Goblins, seeing an opportunity to make an extra buck, also jumped on the bandwagon and ran errands for a fee if no Muggle or elf was available.

When Severus did finally stir from sleep, it was due to someone rapping on his bedroom door, sometime after mid-morning.

"Severus? Severus, its Janine. I'm here to check on you," she announced loud enough to warn him she was there.

Janine had experience having to come in and check other patients who were at home alone and sick. She knew to make her presence known to avoid getting hexed or walking into wards, especially since she was a Muggle.

Severus grumbled out some incoherent acknowledgment and waved his hand, poking out from under the covers, indicating it was all right for her to enter.

"Rainbow was worried, since you seemed to come down with it pretty quickly." The retired nurse approached his bed, unable to see him buried under the pile of blankets. "I'm going to pull the covers away so I can take a look at you."

Peeling the layers back, she finally found him under the bedclothes. There was a small gasp that she didn't quite stifle, as Severus had quite a bad case of ice pox. There wasn't one square inch on his face and arms that wasn't covered in icy lumps and bumps, and his skin had a cast so blue that he reminded Janine of a rare blood disorder she had read about during her studies as a nurse – something called methemoglobinemia. The Muggle condition was due to a higher than normal level of methemoglobin in the blood that caused the blue cast to the skin. Severus' blue skin was due to this disease and low body temperature.

"Can you cover me back up now?" Severus asked, his teeth chattering, lacking the fortitude to dispense a scathing remark.

Janine put the blankets back up to his chin, but left his head uncovered so she could talk with him. "I've been talking with Rainbow, Arnold, and Ranjit." She sat down on the edge of his bed as she talked with a look of hesitation about her face. "So far there still isn't a cure, but I have an idea that I'd like to run by you, if you're game. Would that be okay?"

Severus nodded as best he could, considering he was shivering violently enough that it might have been construed as a nod.

"Arnold and Ranjit say that regular dragon pox is treated with a potion that uses dragon's blood. Word came back that there was no luck adding powdered ice dragon dung either, nor scale, from the Ministries that got the original samples. So far, there is still no word on finding that damned dragon, so no blood. Now in the Muggle world, to bring a fever down is to prolong it, as the body needs to raise the temperature to fight the bacteria or virus and kill it off quicker. When I worked as a nurse in a hospital, we sometimes would not interfere with fevers unless the patient was uncomfortable, or the fever got too high and there was a risk of brain damage. My grandmother used to wrap us up as kids to hasten the fever to break; that worked for us and we were usually over it in a day."

Janine could tell Severus was getting impatient and wanted her to finish so he could go back to huddling under the covers once again and go back to sleep.

"Just hang on a second, Severus. My point is, despite the use of regular dragon pox potion having no effect, or raising body temperature to little effect, what if instead of raising the body temperature, we do the opposite and lower it? Maybe the fever will break if we drop your body temperature. I know you wizards can handle more extremes than us Muggles. Maybe if we lowered your body temperature, it might break it like a fever. Rainbow is hesitant to try it on anyone in the community, since it could make their condition worse, but it's the only treatment we haven't attempted yet, and there is no word on any potion either from abroad."

Severus was feeling colder than that time Potter and Black "played" dunk with him in the lake, holding him under water until a grindylow grabbed hold of his leg and dragged him down to the bottom until he could cast a stinging hex at the creature to break free. Madam Pomfrey had had to give him two doses of Pepperup Potion to finally take the chill from his bones. And even though he was now feeling like death warmed over, Severus could see where Janine's line of thinking was a "Sounds possible," he muttered through clenched teeth, afraid that if he didn't hold them together, he'd chip them from the chattering.

"You want to try it?" she asked for clarification.

"Yes," he barked impatiently. He wanted her to either cover him back up, or get a move on trying to get him over this fever faster so he would be less miserable sooner.

"Okay, let me run back down to the clinic and tell them you're up for trying this."

Janine ran out of his house. To Severus' dismay, she didn't cover his head up, which meant he had to put the considerable effort to pull the blankets the last few inches back over his head, which was quite exhausting in his state.

Just as he was falling back asleep, he heard the thunder of elephants, or maybe it was just the clomping of Rainbow's, Janine's, Arnold's, and Ranjit's feet trooping through his house and into his bedroom. It could have been elephants as he was starting to dream of India, but alas it was not.

Severus just wanted to hex Rainbow's mouth shut as she kept on asking if Severus was really up to this, and if he was of sound mind in his current condition to consent to such an experimental procedure.

"Yes, yes, yes!" he snapped at her, then clenched his jaw together. "You're going to make me into a blue ice lolly to see if we can do a reverse breaking of my fever. I understand, so let's get on with it."

Before they proceeded, Severus, Ranjit, and Arnold discussed which potions to use in concert with the ice bath they were going to give Severus.

Severus gave Ranjit permission to access his personal lab. He waited patiently under the covers while his fellow Potions master brewed up a Chilling Potion. Ranjit also made a skin-cooling ointment commonly used for bad sunburns, but upon Severus' suggestion, this batch would have more Arctic Mongoose blood added to it to make it even colder than normal upon application.
Once Ranjit returned, Rainbow and Janine stripped him down to just his underpants.

Severus didn't care that the ladies saw him in his skivvies, as they were medical professionals. There wasn't anything they hadn't seen before.

The ointment was applied to his skin. Then Ranjit helped pry open Severus' jaw, which seemed nearly frozen shut, and gave him the Chilling Potion.

Rainbow ran the bath as cold as possible, waving her wand to make it cold enough she had to break the layer of ice on the surface that formed before they could lower Severus into the bone-chilling waters of the bathtub. As Severus' skin made contact with the icy water, his body controlled by Rainbow's wand with a Mobilicorpus Spell, a keening howl let loose from his throat.

Hermione was crossing a vast desert. Despite having never been in this featureless expanse of scorching sand and air so hot that it felt like she was inhaling fire, there was something familiar about this place. It seemed she had been there before, but could not recall, as if it was some far-off dream. For some reason, she was without her wand and could not recall why she was without it. Or her wand was under the many layers of clothes and she couldn't find it, as if it was hidden in some unknown magical pocket she was unaware of.

Wrapped under layers and layers of clothes, like some nomadic Bedouin, she trudged on. Despite being under layers of cool, loose, flowing white clothing, she was sweltering under all that cloth in the mid-day sun.

With nothing to guide her, she knew what direction to head towards, her sight fixed upon the sand dune looming in the near distance, since it was the only distinguishing object in this indistinctive no-man's-land.

As Severus' body slid into the icy water, his body became even more rigid. The shock of the cold made his mind go blank, lost in the excruciating pain of a frigidness so consuming, it almost felt like his skin was on fire.

The fever worsened, but this was expected. The sweat poured forth and froze so thick, it was as if Severus had become encased in a shell of ice. Rainbow kept vigil of Severus' vitals, and Arnold and Ranjit now kept Severus' head afloat just above the waterline. Janine prayed her intuition was right as she knelt by the tub and watched Severus' face, noticing his eye movements beneath eyelids covered with a thin sheet of ice, and a small trail of blueish vapor cloud escaping from his nearly frozen-shut mouth to indicate he was still breathing.

Unable to hold onto consciousness any longer, overcome with the unbearable pain of the mind-numbing freezing of his body and extremities, Severus slipped into a hallucinatory state.

He was in hell; Severus was sure of it. Where else would he wind up in some place as desolate and blisteringly hot as this place. He had surely died of the pox and was now stuck in a searing wasteland, his last dying wish that he could be warm once more.

'Be careful what you wish for, you just might get it.'

Just like the time Chuff had dragged him out into the North African desert without any protection, Severus was stuck in the underpants he was wearing when he was placed in that infernal ice bath. He would sunburn, blister, and be even more miserable than he currently was, feeling the scorching sun burn him from above, the air baking his skin as if he was thrown into a oven in some Muggle horror tale about forest witches.

His only hope was that there was something more than sand waiting over the next sand dune in front of him. It was the only direction to go, because everything else was flat, barren sand with no shade to offer in the other direction. It would figure he had gone to hell without a wand to aid him, nor proper clothes. Maybe there was an oasis on the other side, if his luck would change for the better, for once.

This was worse than Hermione's dream of wandering aimlessly for hours or days on end that she could almost recall. At least the air was cool and reasonable amid the endless night that she wandered through, though when and where that was, she couldn't remember presently. Hermione was sweating profusely and was terribly thirsty, that much she was certain of now.

Hoping there might be something on the other side of the sand dune in front of her, she debated if it would take less energy to walk over it or around it when she saw a lone figure cresting over the Holding her hand up to her forehead to shelter her eyes from the glaring sun, she saw a familiar silhouette.

'But it couldn't be.' It made no sense. Severus was back in Hawaii with that damned pox. But she could not explain how she had arrived in this damned desert with no recollection of how she arrived there, nor by what means.

Severus was not cast alone into desolation. There was someone else there too in the distance, and by the look of it, the person was properly attired for it as well.

Seeing the figure gazing up, he waved his arms to show that he needed their help. He couldn't recall how long he had been in the sun. It could have been minutes or hours, but it seemed that the sun never moved from its zenith above his head.

As he began to half-walk, half-slide down the face of the sand dune, the lone figure clad in layers of native desert robes began unwrapping the cloth from around their face before finally removing all of their head covering in one swift movement.

He saw her hair shining in the sun and recognized her immediately.

"HERMIONE!"

Hermione heard his voice calling out and began running towards Severus, overjoyed. He was blue, as blue as the Indian deities she had seen depicted on the walls and in art back in Varanasi, but she didn't care. She had never been so happy to see him in her life. Why he was in this desert, she didn't know. She just couldn't wait to hold him again. Maybe they could find a way out of this endless desolation together, but at least they would be together.

He saw her run toward him in haste. Severus quickened the pace, trying not to fall down, as his muscles screamed and protested, feeling unyielding, stiff, and weak. Once on the flat ground once more, he ran towards her, ignoring the scorching heat of the hot sand on the bottoms of his bare feet.

Hermione could see him better now. He was still wearing his beard and his long hair flowed behind him, but he was clothed only in his underpants, obviously dropped in the desert without any protection from the elements.

Fifty feet from finally reaching Severus, the ground cracked upon and swallowed up Hermione whole. The hole expanded to show that Hermione had fallen into a sea of molten lava that had been simmering just underneath the thin crust of sand and earth above it. That would help to explain the unbearable heat.

Before the molten lava could burn though her protective clothing, Hermione, who suddenly had found her wand, cast a Flame-Freezing Charm, hoping it would last long enough until she could reach the edge and crawl out. Flailing, Hermione could not swim through the thick molten lava. If anything, it was like quicksand; the longer she struggled against it, the more she sank.

"Hermione!" Severus screamed, trying to stretch out his hand until he realized his own wand was somehow in his hand. It hadn't been there before, for he would have conjured some protection from the sun earlier.

He tried a Summoning Charm, but he could not free Hermione from the molten lava. Severus tried conjuring something long enough for Hermione to grasp, but for some reason, anything that came out of his wand was never quite long enough to reach her, despite his attempts to lengthen it. It was not enough.

Casting another Flame-Freezing Charm, Hermione began to panic as the lava crept up to her chin.

"Severus? Severus!" she cried out as she tilted her head back, having one last gulp of air before her head was submerged beneath the glowing pool of molten rock.

Without hesitation, Severus cast his own Flame-Freezing Charm and a large air bubble about his head and person, and dove into the molten lava.

Despite the charm, the lava seemed to scorch his skin. It was excruciating, but he didn't care. Severus would save Hermione. He hadn't been there to save her from Alan Parker, but he was now here and would save her from any further danger.
Unable to see, he could sense where she was and grasped her by the hand. Pulling her body close to his, he brought her into the air bubble he had created.

Hermione gasped, taking a huge lungful of air once inside the enlarged Bubble-Head Charm he'd modified to withstand the pressure of the molten lava pressing down around them.

Together now, they tried to kick and rise up through the molten lava, but Severus was losing strength. He was already weak when he arrived in this hell, but the blistering heat of the lava was making it so he could barely move his limbs anymore. Hermione was also losing the strength to struggle against the searing quagmire, her flowing robes floating upwards and around the clutched-together pair, enrobing them both.
Both looked at each other and realized that this might be where they met death together, their faces aglow from the super-heated rock surrounding them. Without words, they had one last kiss before meeting their inescapable doom, unable to free themselves.

Severus' lips touched Hermione's, and he felt a sweet warmth emanate from them and into his lungs. Despite the unbearable heat that began to burn him, Hermione's warm breath was welcoming upon his lips.

Hermione felt Severus' lips upon hers and found them chilled. She drew his breath into her lungs and felt it cool her from the inside out, starting as a tendril in her chest and tingling as it spread throughout her body.

They exchanged breaths, giving each respite from what the other suffered.

Lost within the comfort of being in each other's arms and their kisses that were the source of relief for the other, neither of them noticed that they began to float up through the lava.

As their heads broke through the surface of the lava, they gasped for breath.

~~~~~~~~~

"He's going to make it!" Janine shouted with relief when the fever broke. She could tell as Severus' lips went from blue to pink, and his breath began to warm.

With a sudden jolt, Severus woke and began flailing in the tub, shattering the shell of ice surrounding him in the process. "Hermione? Hermione!"

She was just in his arms. Where had she gone? Why was he in this freezing water?

Rainbow used her wand to lift Severus from the tub, which was pretty difficult as Severus was looking about in panicked confusion, trying to gain his bearings. Shivering violently, he was placed onto some bedding laid out on the floor that had been warmed with a charm, ready and waiting for him.

After wrapping him in toasty blankets that helped warm his skin, Rainbow moved him with her wand. Severus was swaddled like an overgrown babe, and was laid to rest in his bed where Ranjit had some Pepperup Potion ready for him to drink.

Already the blue cast about Severus' skin began to fade and change to white, a sign that the fever had broken and he was over the worst of it.
Severus, too weak to struggle, let himself be moved about, finally realizing it was all a dream. But it had felt so real, as real as that time he was dragged through the mud and Hermione saved him from the same fate as his wife, fighting to save him, until he fell in the forest.

"How long was I out?" Severus asked through teeth that still chattered, but not as bad as before.

"I would say it was about an hour at most." Rainbow settled him down into bed. She stroked a thumb along his cheek and saw the frozen crystals bumps under his skin simply melt away with her touch. "How do you feel?"

Severus had woke in a tub of frozen water, but the phantom feeling of the heat and molten lava scorching and singeing his skin still burned brightly in his memory.

"Better, I guess." He wasn't sure.

Ranjit helped him drink the Pepperup Potion. The sight of steam coming out of Severus' ears was a positive sign that he was recovering. All previous attempts to give Pepperup Potion to people suffering from ice dragon pox had been met with no steam.

Severus' mind was still elsewhere, having mentally faced a certain death in his hallucination with Hermione in his arms. He was rather discombobulated.

"Well, you certainly look better," Rainbow told him.

Severus could not focus on whatever Rainbow was rambling on about. It was something probably important, but he could not follow, having been wrenched so violently from his hallucination, or had it been some alternate reality?

He only thought of Hermione's lengthy letter she'd sent him and her description of her dream after recovering from that slicing hex. Draco had told Hermione about Severus' prolonged and unexplained sleeping spell. What details Severus shared with him, Draco relayed to Hermione. The timing was too coincidental for Draco not to mention something to her.

The similarities were too close to discount. His own unexplained falling into an unwakeable state months prior, the forest, the semicircle of wizards, Alan Parker there, his lying there in the mud and all that transpired. That dream and this recent hallucination were close enough to think he and Hermione had shared a dream. Now there was the possibility they had shared a dream twice now.

She had wondered in her letter if there was some unintended side effect of the Irresistible Potion, which included pomegranate juice, that they developed together, but even her own research at St. Mungo's into an increased correlation of spouses falling ill at the same time since the potion went on sale indicated that there was nothing to that theory regarding their possible shared dream. She wondered if the pomegranate was somehow an agent that strengthened not only bodies, but emotional connections as well, harkening back to Severus’ discussion of potions that amplified emotions that already existed.

He was willing to discount her theory until he finally remembered that one tome he'd read once. Short of going back to Hogwarts and plowing through the Restricted Section to find it, he would have to see if he could find another copy of that ancient Greek book.

His head was spinning and he was already exhausted. The Potions master would have to think on this when he was better and rested, not feeling weak and bereft of Hermione's presence once more.

~~~~~~~*~

Bolting awake, Hermione cried out for Severus. She found herself smothered under every blanket and towel in her room, plus the curtains.

Her nightgown was soaked with sweat. Pushing off all the heaps of linens atop her, Hermione freed herself from the weight of the fabric that was crushing her and making her sweat profusely.

Panting and shaken, Hermione wanted to cry. She'd had Severus in her arms and now he was gone. Though it was only a nightmare, it had felt so real.

Placing her hand up to her mouth, the pads of her fingers grazed her lips. They were still cool to the touch; cool from Severus' kisses. She exhaled, and a small puff of chilled air escaped her lungs.

This was confusing. Why was she under all those blankets when the night was so hot? Did she somehow Summon them in her sleep? But why? And if she was sweating and overheated, why were her lips cool if the kiss she shared with Severus was but a dream? It was as confusing as to why she was chilled earlier in the day despite the high temperatures that drove everyone else to drink iced beverages at the rooftop bar while she sipped her hot tea.

Hermione herself wondered if this was the possibility of yet another shared dream and shared suffering. Was Severus cold while suffering from ice dragon pox? Did she unconsciously Summon the blankets to help warm him in the dream they shared? Was it a shared dream or just wishful thinking that he was there with her and she could somehow take care of him and cure him?

After going to the bathroom to splash some cold water on her face and get a drink of water, Hermione called for the valet on duty in the middle of the night to change her bedsheets, since they were soaked, and she didn't feel like going back to sleep on sweaty sheets. Magic could only do so much with fabric; it was better to just get new clean sheets.

As the witch changed her bed linens and refreshed the room's expired Cooling Charms, Hermione contemplated going over to Albert's room and recounting her strange and vivid dream. Then she figured he had probably gone to bed late as well and needed the rest, given their big event was that day. It was only about three o'clock in the morning.

Instead, Hermione went to the desk in her well-appointed room and pulled out some parchment, ink, and a quill. She would write down her dream, and ask Severus if he'd had a similar dream as well. Hermione had hoped to talk to Severus after arriving in India about her theory of the Irresistible Potion, or some potion they imbibed together creating some dream-bond between them, but he was not there. So Draco would have to take her letter to him when he and Ginny returned to Hawaii after the weekend.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Thank you to my glorious betas, JuneW and Cygnuz, for their tireless work editing my away my fuck-ups and errors.

I have commissioned a piece of fanart by Bokuman to go with the dream sequence of Hermione and Severus floating in the air-bubble in the molten lava. To view it uncropped, visit here: http://atdlhea-betz.tumblr.com/image/150667266535

Bokuman's DeviantArt page: http://bokuman.deviantart.com/ Yes, I know, Severus is missing his beard, but I forgot to relay that bit when doing my commission and didn't notice until after it was completed. Oh well. Beardless Severus it is for the fan art.

"Glaci" is Latin for ice and "hal" or "hel" is Latin for breath. I added the "-us" to imitate how many subspecies names also end "-u", such as Thymus praecox articus for Elfin Thyme.

Dvalinn is an old Norse name meaning "slumbering." His last name, Chrysalis, implies that he will emerge changed, like a butterfly, once he is done with his apprenticeship under Chuff.
I picked Varanasi in India for the location as it's one of the oldest cities in India and the world, having been inhabited since about the 11th or 12th century B.C., so it must have a sizable wizarding population, having been around for so long.

Dhoti sherwanis are the long frock coat suit with the gathered loose pants, paired together as a suit.

Methemoglobinemia is a rare genetic blood disorder that can cause the person to have blue skin; otherwise, the people are perfectly healthy. To see photos of this condition, Google "Blue Skin Appalachia". There is a small genealogical pool of people in the Appalachian region who have this condition, and they have been featured in some news stories.
"Chaat, Chats and Cats"

Chapter Summary

Severus recovers from the ice pox. Hermione comes to realize certain aspects of her relationship with Severus.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Ninety-Six
"Chaat, Chats and Cats"

Disclaimer: We all know that Rowling invented and owns Harry Potter and the entire world she created. We all know I am merely a humble fanfic author borrowing her characters, concepts and world for the purpose of having a bit of fun, for entertainment purposes only, and receive no compensation other than the wonderful reviews you post.

==========

Rainbow ordered Janine to sit by Severus' bedside while he recuperated, in case he had a relapse. The Healer had given the retired Muggle nurse a playing card that - when torn in half - would Summon Rainbow if Severus took a turn for the worse.

To Severus' dismay, he was not allowed to go back to sleep. Rainbow wanted him awake so that if his symptoms returned, he could alert Janine and she could Summon Rainbow quickly. Mental confusion would be the first sign of a relapse, so Janine had to keep him talking.

Rainbow, Arnold, and Ranjit then left to see if their new method for breaking the fever could be replicated successfully with someone else suffering from ice pox.

Janine moved a chair from Severus' library to sit in while keeping him company. When she returned with the chair, the cat had taken up residence on Severus' bed, happy to curl up next to its master now that he wasn't as cold as an ice cube.

"How are you feeling now?" she asked as she settled into the chair by the bed to keep watch, observing Severus' familiar purr contentedly while snuggled on top of the covers.

"The same as when Rainbow asked me not five minutes ago," he replied tersely.

"Just checking," Janine said, not affected by Severus' attitude. She had been a nurse for many years and was used to the odd cantankerous patient who didn't like to be bothered. "What's your cat's name?"

"Cat."

Janine could tell Severus was not in a talking mood and she would have to find something to keep him awake and engaged for now. Looking about, she saw the photo by his bed. "Is that Hermione in the photo?"

Severus was about to ask her how she knew about Hermione, but then remembered he'd called her name out when he came to in the bath earlier. "Yes." His clipped tone tried to convey that he was not in the mood to talk about her, but that didn't seem to discourage Janine from asking more questions.

"She's lovely. If I may ask: Is she back in England right now?" If Janine had to keep Severus awake and not drift back to sleep, yapping at him was a sure fire way to keep him from dozing off.

"Normally yes, but I was supposed to meet her in India when I came down with the damnable infection," he growled testily. Severus understood she was obligated to keep him talking, for if she stopped talking, he surely would have corked right off. It still didn't tamp down the impatience he felt bubble up from her line of questioning.

"I'm sorry." There was no pity in Janine's reply. "You've been living here for nearly a year, so I'm sure you miss her. Is there a reason why she hasn't been able to come here? I remember that Lavender Weasley witch was here a few months back, and she is from England too. Am I remembering correctly?"

"Yes," Severus sighed. "Mrs. Weasley..." He still couldn't get used to calling her that. Severus had to refrain from calling her Miss Brown and had often resorted to using her first name during her visit, counter to his tendency to be more formal. 'Mrs. Weasley' was Hermione, and that name was linked to his memory of her. But Lavender was now married to Ron, and Hermione had merely never bothered to stop using her married name. "Mrs. Weasley is from England. In regards to Hermione, she is finishing her apprenticeship before coming here to join me."

Severus was expecting some sort of reaction of shock that he was involved with such a young witch who was still working on her apprenticeship, but Janine gave him no odd look or questions about her age. Perhaps the Muggle did not understand about some societal norms regarding apprenticeships reserved for those who only recently finished their main schooling.

"How did you two meet?" It was in an innocuous question, but if she was going to pry, he perhaps could give her answers to make her uncomfortable enough so that she would drop this line of questioning.

"I was originally her professor in school." He wasn't ashamed of that fact, but it did sound a bit... lecherous.

"Hot for teacher. Nothing wrong with that," Janine threw out casually, letting Severus know she wasn't fazed by any possibility of a large age difference between them, picking up on his brusque tone. "So did sparks fly while she was still at school?"

"Absolutely not!" he replied hotly, insulted by the fact that this Muggle would insinuate that he did anything untoward while working in an academic position of authority over students.

"I'm not accusing you of anything, just curious." Janine put her hands up defensively while trying to keep the tone light. "So sparks after she finished school. Was it right away, or did you two need some time apart before there was a mutual interest?"

"Definitely time apart."

Severus didn't know why he allowed her to continue on with her line of questioning. Maybe it was the fact he didn't have to think about how he had rehearsed for days how he would tell Hermione that he didn't care about the scar across her breast, the scar that Ginny had informed him about beforehand to prevent an embarrassing situation. Ginny had confessed her own shock upon seeing the scar and warned him so that he would not react the same way she did. Hermione was fragile enough regarding the incident and the scar, and didn't need an unprepared reaction from him. All that preparation was now for naught. Talking about something else kept his mind from that train of thought.

"So how did you two meet up later on then?" Again, it was an innocent enough question, but Severus was not going to share the details.

He could tell Janine some thread of the truth, while not revealing much. Reluctantly, but truthfully, he admitted, "She needed a friend with whom to talk."

Janine smiled. As if sensing that she was on the verge of delving too deep, she changed the subject. "So tell me how this whole Potions thing works. My husband Jimmy has tried to explain it, but he's an Astronomy person who barely passed Potions. What is it, like Chemistry? But with magic?"

Severus didn't know if Janine was truly ignorant about how Potions worked versus Muggle Chemistry, but it kept him engaged enough talking with her. As they were nearing the end of their discussion, Rainbow returned to check up on Severus. The Healer gave him and Janine the good news that they had done the ice bath and Potions treatment on two other patients and broke their fevers.

It was very good news, since some people had been suffering for a full week with the disease. Arnold and Ranjit were preparing a scroll to owl to Honolulu with their experiment and results.

Once Rainbow left, Janine tucked Severus in.

"Thank you," Severus said to his caretaker. He didn't have to thank her, but he did anyway. She had kept him awake and engaged in conversation lively enough so that it did not seem quite like the chore he'd feared it was going to be.

"You're welcome, Severus." She patted his hand and bid him goodnight before letting herself out.

Drifting off to sleep, Severus wondered how Hermione was doing in India. When Draco and Ginny returned, he would have to ask them for a few memories of Hermione to share with him.

---

The Lovely Lavender Company India launch was a great success. Hermione looked fabulous, and her sari hung perfectly with the pleats and creases laying just so.

The hired jewelry was almost too much, but it was part of the "uniform" she had to don for the event.
She wore a heavily jeweled necklace featuring faceted sapphires of pink, violet, golden orange, and green. Hermione knew the precious gem came in colors other than blue, but to see them was quite dazzling. The earrings were a bit heavy, so they were charmed to float just enough to hang properly, but not drag on the ear painfully. Ginny and Aunt Christine were also bedecked with jewels that highlighted their hair and eyes, and coordinated with their outfit colors. Draco and Albert looked quite dashing, though Draco refused to wear the turban.

Hermione overheard Ginny say quietly, "But you don't mind wearing the turban when I dance for you," but she was quickly silenced by Draco giving her a look that said not to reveal all their secrets in public.

The press was looking for something fun and frivolous to fixate upon other than the dark and depressing news of the ice dragon pox epidemic. The wizarding population in India had been hit just as badly as most other countries around the world, so this launch of The Lovely Lavender Company in India was something to keep people's minds from more somber news. Hermione spoke eloquently, having been coached by her aunt. She fielded questions expertly, directed the press to watch models hired to show the application of the new roll-on henna tattoo kit developed just for the Indian market, and discussed other aspects of the company.

There was food and drink of the alcoholic and non-alcoholic variety. Ginny liked the sparkling mango juice and Hermione stuck with non-alcoholic drinks as well, needing to stay on her toes for any challenging questions from the press. Draco was introduced as the new Vice President of Advertising and Marketing for the Asia Pacific region; photos of Draco and Christine together were taken, to show a bridging of both hemispheres. It was also quite the nouveau thing that a Muggle worked for a company owned by a witch, which also added to the buzz about the spectacle. There were questions as to who would head operations for the Asia Pacific operations, but Hermione diplomatically said that there were a small number of candidates in the final phase of interviews and that the announcement would be made later.

They had decided that it would not be prudent to announce Hermione as the new Potions mistress and head of Asia Pacific operations when she had yet to finish her apprenticeship. She was an extremely capable witch, but accreditation and rank still mattered in the grand scheme of things, especially in international business.

Instead of a formal sit-down dinner, hors d'oeuvres were passed around. They were actually chaat snacks served up like fancy appetizers: mini-samosas, various pakoras, bite-sized stuffed parathas, chana masala served up in tiny papadums fried into a bowl shape to hold the savory garbanzo bean mixture. Also, each chaat hors d'oeuvre was served with chutneys on the side of the serving trays. There were at least a dozen different chaat dishes to sample as they floated around on trays, with the press and business associates invited to the event sampling and enjoying the free food and drinks. Hermione made sure to sample at least one of everything, since it was all so delicious, though it was a bit spicier than the Indian food she was used to back in London.
There was talk of meetings in the coming months, calling cards exchanged, and promises of owls to discuss future business and distribution deals. Hermione was more than happy to have her Aunt Christine handle the press, which was not that different from the Muggle press in many respects. She didn't mind talking business, since she didn't have to force herself to smile so much as when photographers were snapping shots left and right. Instead of handshakes, Indian people greeted each other with the Namaste – placing the palms of their hands together near the heart, with fingers pointing up. Handshaking was mostly a Western custom, and keeping physical proximity to a minimum was the recently adopted norm since the ice dragon pox broke out in Varanasi.

After what seemed like hours, the event wrapped up. Gift bags featuring products from The Lovely Lavender Company were distributed to guests and press, and smiles and thanks you's were exchanged before the night finally ended.

Ginny and Christine were exhausted and ready to call it a night. Even Hermione was worn out, having been short on sleep the night before, and required to do a whole lot of smiling and conversing during the event. Albert invited her to come over to his room for a celebratory night cap, but she begged off. She could have told him about her dream the other night, but decided that would be a discussion for tomorrow. Right now she wanted to just sleep.

As all the women left, the staff at the hotel were cleaning up the last of the party decorations and empty glasses, folding chairs and tables away with their wands. Draco and Albert sat in a pair of empty chairs near an open window with a view of the star-filled sky above the fields, spread out like some dark green quilt on the other side of the Ganges River. They were leaning over toward each other as if talking in some conspiratorial tone.

Back in her room, the witch valet helped Hermione remove her sari and took her clothes off to be cleaned. In her nightgown, Hermione flopped onto her bed. During the night she had avoided thinking of Severus, knowing if she let her mind go down that rabbit hole, it would be much harder to pull off another convincing smile for the camera. Now alone in her bed at night, the valet gone from her room, she could let herself think of him.

Recalling the dream, she noted that the blue of Severus' skin was the same blue as some of the more severe cases of ice pox. She hoped Severus' case of ice pox was not that bad, but there was no way to know. And as much as Hermione swore to herself that she would not go to Hawaii until after she was done with her apprenticeship, fearing how difficult it would be to leave Severus yet again, she was reconsidering her vow. In the morning, she would ask Albert if she could change her plans and go to Hawaii, and see if she could work with Arnold and Ranjit on a cure. And maybe Albert could Portkey over if he learned anything in India. If anything, she could take care of Severus, even if that meant she might come down with it as well.

Happy with the thought that she still might see Severus, even if it was for only a few days, or longer if she caught ice pox and was stuck there until better, she drifted off to sleep.
The Wireless Wizard Network broadcast the emergency announcement for the third time in thirty minutes.

"Due to the plague of ice dragon pox, all international Portkey travel has been suspended until further notice. All countries worldwide have unanimously agreed to the ban until a cure or treatment has been discovered. We will continue to broadcast updates on this situation as they become available. Thank you."

Severus grumbled to himself. They had come up with a treatment, but evidently the idiots in Honolulu were waiting to verify the treatment method before forwarding the news of a treatment to authorities, since there was no coverage of it in the broadcast. Portkey travel to the U.S. mainland was also severely limited to emergencies only until further notice.

This meant that Draco and Ginny could not return home until the ban was lifted. He hoped it wouldn't be too long. It was now Sunday, and Draco was supposed to start interviewing Potential Charms and Transfiguration tutors on Wednesday. With the ban, none of the candidates that were coming in from abroad could travel either, so in the end it didn't matter if Draco was there or not.

As the kettle came to a boil he poured himself a hot cup of tea, eager to drink something warm. He was even dressed in his long linen trousers and one of his old long-sleeved shirts for breakfast, instead of wrapped in a light silk dressing down or shirtless in a pair shorts.

Grabbing the kettle, he hissed in pain. Normally, he could grab the handle of the tea kettle and pour it without burning his hands, as his tolerance to heat and his layer of calluses allowed him to not bother using a potholder or towel to protect his hand from the heat. Now it seemed his ability to handle hot things was severely diminished, as well as his tolerance to even the slightest chill, given how the slight morning breeze through the open sliding glass door made him shiver.

Fetching a potholder, he grabbed the kettle once more and poured himself a cup of tea. Even the mug was too hot for him to hold, and he had to grab it by the handle.

Severus hoped his intolerance for temperature variations was merely a short-term effect from the ice pox and not a lifelong hindrance he would have to adapt to.

During breakfast, he went over the Owl Post that had arrived overnight. All of them were from candidates who were sending regrets, unable to make the scheduled interview date for the tutor position to replace Draco. They all said they looked forward to a new interview appointment once the travel ban was lifted.

After breakfast, eating for the first time in a couple days, he went to the bathroom. Gazing in the mirror, he noted how his skin was dull, slightly lumpy, and still had an odd whitish pall to it. He hoped this wasn’t what his skin was going to look like for the rest of his life, as those recovering from regular dragon pox had green-tinged skin and lumps for the rest of their lives. If this was a long-term effect, he was a Potions master and he would endeavor to find some way to correct his newfound skin condition, should it be permanent.

Last night, he had allowed his cat this once to sleep in his bed to keep him company as he recovered. Now, the cat was rubbing along his ankles as it was finally ready to eat something, having to fend for itself while Severus was sick. Severus fortunately had some tinned meat he gave the cat, which sniffed at it haughtily.

"Be grateful I have anything at all in this house. I was planning on being gone and paid Akela to feed and water you." That plan had also been waylaid as Akela had come down with ice pox as well.

The cat eventually began eating what it was given, too hungry to complain that it wasn't fresh chicken livers or poached fish, like it was used to.

Dressed for the day, Severus headed off to the clinic to help Rainbow, Ranjit, and Arnold perform the newly-devised treatment for ice dragon pox on those they had not gotten around to curing yesterday, after himself.

He walked a bit slower than normal towards the clinic, still feeling quite weak, but unwilling to sit at home and recuperate for the next few days as he had been ordered by Rainbow. He wanted to be useful in order to keep his mind busy. If left alone at home to rest, he would most likely spend the entire day in his Pensieve, reliving memories with Hermione, having been denied his chance to reunite with her finally in India.

~~~~~~~~

The one upside to all the inconvenience of the Portkey travel ban was that Albert and the Malfoys could stay in their rooms until the ban was lifted, since the people who were going to occupy those rooms next could not travel into Varinasi now. Temporary Portkey travel restrictions were based on regional bans in India, besides international. Hermione had been planning on staying a few extra days anyway, but that was rather pointless now, except for needing a place to sleep at night.
Ginny and Draco decided to treat the extended stay like a second honeymoon, before the birth of their child, and spent most of their time up in their room alone and ordering room service, the same plan Hermione had had where she and Severus were concerned. But since Severus wasn't there, Hermione spent her time with Albert at the local wizarding hospital, working with the other local Potions masters and mistresses, and their apprentices, as they sought to brainstorm ideas.

Hermione and Albert updated everyone on all the efforts going on in Great Britain and Western Europe, and what had failed, while the Indian masters and mistresses shared their own list of failures.

Privately, Hermione already shared her dream of Severus with Albert and wondered if lava or some extreme heat might help with breaking the ice pox. Of course, the Indian Potion masters and mistresses had already tried variations of potions using dragon peppers and other sweat- and fever-inducing ingredients, but there was no breakthrough on that front.

All day Sunday and Monday was spent trying various potions – some old, some new and experimental.

It was Tuesday when news broke that in South Africa, Hawaii, and Finland, all three places had independently and simultaneously developed similar treatments for curing the disease over the weekend. It wasn't so much a cure as it was hastening the prolonged healing process along by breaking the ice fever. There was no real cure yet, but those who had been suffering from it for weeks could now, if they were strong enough, go through the process by dropping their body temperature to very low levels, thereby breaking the icy fever.

Hermione's heart soared at the news, and – upon hearing that Hawaii was one of the places listed – wondered if Severus was part of the team that came up with this method of curing, and if he was already cured. As more news trickled out, she did see his name listed among those who came up with the chilling potions and ice bath regimen.

As Albert and Hermione returned to the hotel, chatting about her plans to visit Severus for a few days, Aunt Christine was waiting for them in the lobby.

"I have good news and bad news," Christine announced as they entered the hotel, waddling over to greet them.

Hermione looked to Albert, wondering which one to pick first.
"Give us the good news first," Albert prompted her.

"The Portkey travel ban has been lifted," she said with a bittersweet smile.

"And the bad news?" Hermione asked, wondering what was so bad to make her aunt look that way.

Holding up her mobile phone, she said, "I got a call from Tim. Ron came over asking him to ring me immediately. You can't run off to Hawaii to join Severus. You have to go back to England immediately. Lavender has been put on mandatory bed rest, and the Healers at St. Mungo are threatening to hospitalize her if she doesn't stop working from home."

"Is the baby all right?" Hermione asked, beating Albert to the question.

"Lavender's fine, but she has been exhausting herself with this launch and doing everything since you and Albert had to take off to St. Mungo's last week. I've been trying to pace myself, which is why I wanted to rest a bit after the launch party before flying home tomorrow. My obstetrician thinks stress and working myself too hard last time is what might have contributed to my miscarriage."

"Hermione, why don't you go pack your bags and Portkey back to London immediately," Albert suggested. And as if reading the concerns on Hermione's mind, he added, "Christine, I hope you don't mind if I stick around until tomorrow to see you off. I don't want you to over-exert yourself, and it will be easier for you as a Muggle if you have a wizard around in this part of town."

Though Muggles were welcomed at the hotel, it was a bit inconvenient for Christine to take care of some things that normally a witch could do herself with a wand. Christine was heavily reliant upon the witch valet for her room for even the slightest task, and Christine was getting the feeling the staff was getting rather tired of doing everything for her, including the simple task of lighting candles and oil lamps.

"You are a dear, Albert," Christine said gratefully. "That would be lovely."

Albert promised Hermione to Portkey himself back to England once he was sure Christine was on her plane back home.

Christine had already sent a note to the Malfoys, who were still ensconced in their room, about the Portkey travel ban being lifted. They also were going to leave the next day, deciding to spend one more night there, given it was already the late afternoon by the time the news spread.

After Hermione said farewell to her aunt, Albert, and the Malfoys, who decided to leave their room to say goodbye to her, she hopped into one of the magical rickshaws offered by the hotel to transport her back to the Indian Ministry of Magic building on the other side of the city.

While the rickshaw was stopped while waiting for a wedding procession to cross in front of her, Hermione watched intently, as if hypnotized by the scene before her, like some richly colored romantic dream pulled from the recesses of her mind. The bridegroom was riding atop a white yali – a part-lion, part-elephant, and part-horse beast. He looked grand in his wedding dhoti sherwani suit, surrounded by his family, as a boisterous band of musicians proceeded him. He was a young wizard, long and lean with flowing, straight black hair and a neatly trimmed beard, with a striking profile and angular features. Hermione could almost imagine if Severus had some Indian heritage in his background, he may have looked similar to the groom.

Suddenly, Hermione imagined herself dressed in a red and gold sari, standing in front of an officiant with Severus by her side in a formal all-black version of a sherwani jacket, which wasn't that different from the black frock coats he used to wear.

Hermione was so lost in the daydream she barely noticed that she had arrived at the Portkey office.

Back in the reality of the moment, Hermione thanked the driver and tipped him well. Then she went inside to wait in the long line with others who had heard the good news that the travel ban was lifted, and were trying to get home as soon a possible, like her.

On Tuesday, Severus decided to close up shop by five o'clock. Draco and Ginny were still not back, and all tutoring was canceled until next Monday, even with the cure. This would give all his students a chance to recuperate and rest before resuming their studies. Even opening at noon, after helping Rainbow and Ranjit cure more people from ice pox that morning, business was extremely slow.

Depressed, Severus headed to Bongo’s after work for one, or possibly several, drinks. It was early October, but Bongo already had Halloween decorations up.

Supposedly in Malu Palekaiko, the children went trick-or-treating on Halloween, a custom Mounga started some years back. Instead of dressing up as vampires, witches, and other "monsters," the children on the island dressed up as Muggles in various occupations that were strange and a little frightening to them. It seemed dressing up as a dentist was a favorite, since the idea of drilling someone's teeth and sticking needles in their mouth was quite a terror-inducer to young imaginations. Iakona said one year he dressed up as a sewer worker, because he said the idea of having to walk around a small smelly tunnel underground knee-deep in "raw sewage" sounded pretty terrifying and disgusting to him. Akela went as an accountant one year as she said working at a job that boring for the rest of her life seemed scary in its own way. Kaimi had already told her Uncle Severus this year she was going to be a veterinarian, after hearing a few tales from her father when he spent a few years living amongst Muggles as a teenager.

Severus had asked Mounaga about those years, but his friend said he'd talk about them one day, just not yet. From Mounaga's tone in his answer, Severus knew there was something more behind that story then just some study of Muggle culture before he had pursued law.

As Bongo served up Severus his third Scotch, the place was empty except for Jerry banging away on the piano. His lover, Arnold, had finally come down with ice pox himself and was recuperating after having the ice bath and potion treatment done to him earlier that morning, with Severus in attendance. Jerry needed to unwind a bit, and playing Muggle tunes on the piano was his way of relaxing. He was tinkering around until he found a melancholy melody that he began to sing.

"They're writing songs of love but not for me
A lucky star's above but not for me
With love to lead the way I've found more clouds of gray
Than any Russian play could guarantee...

I was a fool to fall and get that way
Hi-ho, alas, and also lack-a-day
Although I can't dismiss the memory of her kiss
I guess she's not for me..."

Jerry continued to warble out his bittersweet tune until the song petered out, and he started playing something else equally maudlin in a different key.

Severus was even more depressed now, thanks to the alcohol and Jerry's choice of songs. On top of that, his skin was even more terrible looking and it was beginning to itch, even with the alcohol starting to numb him.

As he absentmindedly scratched near his collarbone, he looked down at his hand and noticed large clumps of grayish skin clinging to his nails.

Startled that his skin was falling off, Severus nearly fell off his bar stool. Stumbling off to the men's loo, he looked in the mirror and noticed patches of dead skin were peeling away near his neck. Grabbing the edge of the dead skin, he pulled – and a large sheet of dead skin began peeling away revealing fresh, smooth, pink skin underneath.

Severus was touching the newly-revealed skin, noting its smoothness and vibrancy. The lumpiness was gone, as if it was nothing more than a bad sunburn peeling away. Looking down at a spot on his arm that he'd scratched at unconscious in his sleep during his case of the ice pox, he noticed those small areas had scabbed over. It would take time to see if those would heal just as smoothly, or if there would be some scarring.

The fact he would not have gray lumpy skin for the rest of his life was one less worry for him now.

Relieved that this was actually a good sign, Severus saddled up to the bar for yet another drink. He might have left the bar to go eat something, but most of the town was still shut down and Bongo's was one of the few places currently open. At least the grocery store and general store were still open, and he was able to buy groceries on Sunday.

As Severus nursed his fourth drink while Jerry sang about being "in a New York state of mind," he heard a familiar voice from over his shoulder.

"Figures you'd be here drowning your troubles. If I was denied being reunited with the love of my life, I'd be getting pissed too."

Severus turned around to spy Draco and Ginny coming into the bar.

Severus was so thrilled to see his friends, he jumped off his bar stool and hugged Draco. Turning to Ginny, he would let her decide if she wanted to be touched by someone who was recently recovered from a contagious disease. Ginny knew Severus was most probably not contagious by this point, so she walked over and gave him a hug, adding an extra squeeze saying that one was from Hermione.

"When did you get back?" Severus asked, amazed at their return. The travel ban had been lifted a day, but no one was Portkeying on or off the island unless it was necessary.

"Just now," Draco said as he and Ginny each grabbed a stool to join Severus. "We got the news Tuesday, and left Wednesday, staying an extra day once the travel ban was lifted." In crossing so many time zones, they had gained a day upon their return.
Ginny looked a bit somber when she added, "Hermione was planning to come herself for a few days, but her Aunt Christine received a telephone call that Lavender is now on ordered bed rest. Hermione had to get back to London as soon as possible."

Severus frowned at his drink. Yet something else the Fates had thrown at them to keep them apart longer.

"But, she gave me another roll of parchment and a memory to give to you." Ginny placed the vial and scroll on the bar countertop. "Oh, and we picked up a souvenir for you from the trip."

Draco pulled out a small flat box and placed it in front of Severus. "Ginny will not rest until she sees you open this. She dragged me around half the wizarding quarter looking for just the right one."

Severus wondered what Ginny had gone through all the bother to get for him. Looking at her sideways, he said, "Thank you."

"You can thank me after you open it up." Ginny was squirming in her seat, excited to watch Severus' reaction.

Jerry had stopped pounding away on the keys to come over and welcome back the Malfoys. "How was India?" he asked.

"Hot," she replied, fanning herself just at the recent memory of it. Ginny ordered some ice-cold pineapple juice to help her cool down, as she was still overheated from her trip.

Severus unwrapped the box. The paper was printed with an intricate paisley design in blue, red, green, pink, orange, and gold. After lifting the box lid, he peeled away the carefully folded tissue paper. In the box was a gold-plated picture frame with an intricate filigree design for the border in an Indian motif. In the frame was a picture of Hermione from the India launch party of The Lovely Lavender Company, looking elegant in her fuchsia sari, coiffure, make-up, and ornate jewelry. She was smiling and waving, and he could see the hint of sadness behind her eyes that she masked. He knew her well enough that he could see through her mask, just as she had over time seen through his.

Severus said, "Thank you," once more, but this time his voice was a bit more choked with emotion.
God, what Severus wouldn’t have done to see her looking so splendid in person and have the chance to kiss her.

"You're welcome, Severus. I figured you needed a photo of her for your office, since you have one at home," Ginny elaborated.

Jerry peered over Severus’ shoulder to see the photo of Hermione smiling and waving back. Whistling long and low, he said, "Wow, she's a looker. She's your girl, Severus?"

He merely nodded.

"You are one lucky bastard." Jerry patted Severus on the back in a show of sympathy, since he'd heard the news of why Severus was unable to see her.

As much as Severus was wallowing in a pity funk, Jerry did lift his spirits a bit. He'd made him realize that indeed he was a lucky bastard that someone as brilliant, kind, and beautiful as Hermione loved him, and she was waiting for him.

Severus sighed. "Yes, I guess I am."

Jerry went back to tinkering on the piano, sensing that the old friends wanted to catch up in private.

"So, Severus. Hermione told us about how she read your name along with Rainbow, Arnold, Ranjit and Janine's for the Hawaiian team that came up with the cure," Draco said, changing the topic. He reached over and pulled away Severus' collar a bit, looking at the peeling area a little more closely, "Looks more like you were sunburned than frozen in an ice shell."

"In the hallucinatory state I fell into, I was so cold, it felt like I was burning up in a desert with lava," he said, recalling his vision. Noticing the odd glances from his friends, he said, "She was there, wasn't she?"

Draco nodded. "She told Albert more detail, as she thought somehow if might have been a clue to how to create a cure, but as for Ginny and me, she merely said she saw you in a desert and you both fell into lava. That's it."

Severus looked at the scroll of parchment on the bar top and knew Hermione would list every detail she remembered from her time on that ethereal plane together.

"How is it that on opposite sides of the world, you two have now shared two dreams together?" Ginny asked in wonder.

As strange and varied as the world of magic was, even this was quite fantastical to her, involving no incantation or charm to initiate.

"How is it that the power of a mother's love could save Harry Potter from the Dark Lord's Killing Curse?" he asked rhetorically.

Others had assumed Harry Potter defeated the Dark Lord the first time with the Killing Curse ricocheting back onto its caster; Harry's magic had not done that, but Lily's love. A force that was the most powerful magic in the universe, and yet few in the wizarding world understood it. There was even a door located in the Department of Mysteries that studied the concept of love. The locked door to that particular room could not be forced open, just as love cannot be forced.

The vision of Dumbledore back in his flat had tried to tell him about love and how powerful it truly was. It was only now that Severus was beginning to understand that love not only motivated people to act above and beyond what they thought themselves capable of, and selflessly, but moved the world and bent the universe to its whim when the love was strong enough.

~~~~~~~*~

Buried under a sea of parchments and scrolls, Hermione worked tirelessly until she was completely caught up on everything from her week away at St. Mungo's and her long weekend in India. It took her four days of working 18-hour days, but she was done in time for Albert to forcibly drag her off to the monthly Potions master booze-up at Niles's home. Even Albert knew if he didn't order Hermione to take a break, she'd push herself to the breaking point of exhaustion yet again.

Hermione didn't really want to go to another booze-up. Ever since her attack, she had been reluctant to drink such that she was not fully in control of herself. At the August gathering of Potions masters, she was able to get everyone so drunk on the "wipe-out" drink early enough in the evening that no one noticed she'd stayed mostly sober. At the September meeting, she brought vials of Sobering Solution to nip in the bathroom, while pretending to be drunk. It was because she was very muddled from exhaustion, too many potions, and drink at the July meeting that Alan was able to get the drop on her and disarm Hermione. The only reason she was able to drink as much as she did during her night out drinking and dancing, after dinner at Ron and Lavender's, was the fact that she was surrounded by several friends that she trusted with her life, who would be there to protect her. Between Harry, Ron, Ginny, Draco, Lavender, Albert, and Zhubanysh, she felt safe enough to let herself relax and drink.

During her weekly meetings with James Hoover, her Muggle therapist who was helping her with her post-trauma recovery, he had helped her address her fears against letting herself relax. James had been dealing with soldiers of both genders who had recently returned from tours of duty abroad and the transition back to civilian life, in addition to some clients who had dealt with sexual assault. Hermione was having similar problems: hunkering into a familiar mentality of war once more, seeing dangers in the most innocuous of everyday items and the people she passed by on the street. She had been seeing the therapist for about two months personally, ever since the corset incident, and lately they had been making some progress.

When the topic of the upcoming Potions masters' booze-up came up, Hermione admitted her reluctance to drink heavily, stating that not all those in attendance at these meetings were to be trusted. She recounted a few of the pranks, but also Albert's concerns not to accept any drink unless it was from him, or she poured it herself, and why. James agreed that women, whether Muggle or witch, should be careful of their surroundings when lots of alcohol was present in mixed company, and that her caution was prudent. They both agreed it was sad that it was not a world where women could get drunk and be safe from such dangers. James asked her why she had allowed herself to get wasted at prior meetings, but not since her attack – except for that one time with her friends.

Hermione had to admit to herself that her trust for the world at large had been damaged, and it would take time before she could rebuild that trust.

Apparating to Niles' house, Albert and Hermione noticed the party was in full swing already. Niles was belting out the Russian romance song, "Ochi Chyornye," the same song she heard him sing her first time at his house. Singing that particular song usually didn't happen until he had a minimum of four drinks in him. Hermione joined in, since singing in other languages was one way to learn pronunciation, and she planned on learning Russian some day. The lyrics were easy enough to pick up; while she didn't understand most of them, her understanding of Greek helped a little. She did have Albert translate them for her once, though he professed his Russian was shamefully rusty. From then on she thought of a certain wizard whose dark eyes "implored her into faraway lands, where love reigns" whenever she sang it along with Niles.
Since her first monthly booze-up in February, Hermione had also learned the lyrics to the French drinking song, "Chevaliers De La Table Ronde," the Chinese drinking song whose title roughly translated into "The Booze Song," and many more songs where Hermione had only half-learned the foreign lyrics.

In turn, Hermione taught everyone at the gatherings over the summer a new drinking song in Greek called "Ouzo Otan Pieis." She had learned it from her many trips to that Greek restaurant with Neville.

Before coming to these gatherings, Hermione was not much of a singer. But with the alcohol loosening her inhibitions and with some practice between the meetings, her voice improved so it no longer was quite off-key on some high notes, and she sang with a bit more confidence.

That night, everyone seemed to be drinking more than usual. It was most likely a way to let off steam after fretting about the ice dragon pox. Hermione merely nursed her drink, trying to limit herself to two that whole night, wanting to stay in control. There was still not a true cure, other than the chilling potion and the ice bath treatment, but it was still cause to celebrate. A few of the Potions masters there that night had come down with the ice pox and had gone through the procedure to report that they felt so cold it felt like their skin was burning. Hermione said nothing, knowing she had joined Severus in his dream of searing heat and lava.

She did notice how the skin was starting to peel from a Potions master named John Leyster, who she knew only in passing from the few meetings he came to before. Leyster was about sixty years old, and prior to the ice pox had some acne scarring. Now that his skin was peeling, John looked a bit younger; his wrinkles were far less noticeable, and the acne scarring was reduced so much you could barely notice it anymore. She wondered how far Severus was along in the peeling process, since that was a common side effect. As she was talking to Leyster about his experience with ice pox, she overheard Chuff in the other room and his booming voice, an indication he was already fairly drunk.

"And that bastard, Severus Snape, I knew he'd finally do something good with himself," Hermione overheard Chuff exclaim to the small audience of other Potions masters he was bragging to. "Helped figure out a cure, though why they allowed that Muggle cunt to be included in that list of those who found a cure, I'll never understand."

Irritated beyond all belief that Chuff had never mentioned Severus by name until he could brag about him once being his apprentice, and that he referred to the nurse, Janine Watters, in such a derogatory way, Hermione rose from her seat.

"If you will excuse me, John," she said before walking over to the archway into the next room where Chuff was still bloviating.
"Snape was a good student, quite bright, actually," Chuff rambled on. "He would have gone onto greater things sooner if he didn't waste all those years teaching a bunch of dunderheads at Hogwarts. At least all the knowledge I imparted to him has finally come to something."

Hermione wanted to rip Chuff a new arsehole. All these months he would refer to stories about Severus in an anonymous third-person way, and only when his name was attached to one of the three teams that had found a treatment for ice pox did Chuff bother to acknowledge he'd even had Severus apprentice under him.

Licking her lips, ready to jump in when Chuff stopped to take a drink, she hesitated when the moment came.

How had Hermione been any different from Chuff, when one really looked at it?

She had hidden her relationship to Severus under the guise of his nom de guerre, Delgado, and even when Neville asked her who she had been seeing other than Ron, she hid that fact from him by telling him it was complicated. It took until she called out Severus' name during her long sylvan dream, after she was rescued from her attack, for Ron to learn who her lover was. Even with the cajoling from the twins, wondering who her "boyfriend" was when they gave her her birthday present, she was still too ashamed to admit to the rest of the world that Severus was her lover and that she loved him.

Hermione had been ready to give up her life in England and join him abroad when he fled, and if he asked her to marry him, she would gladly take his name. All these months she had been pushing herself to join him once more, upon finishing her apprenticeship, and live with him in a house that he had built for the both of them, and yet she was still hiding her love for him like some great secret shame. Well, had Hermione not cleared his name, it would have been a great scandal as no one would have known that Severus was working for the Order all along – and an affair between a Death Eater and a Muggle-born would have caused an even greater shock to the wizarding world, more so than her divorce from Ron – but she had cleared his name. Everyone now knew he was fully exonerated and he'd had a part in helping Harry Potter win the war.

Draco and Ginny had told her that in Hawaii, everyone was very curious about her, wondering who the witch was who'd stolen the heart of the most eligible bachelor in Malu Palekaiko. While Severus was a private man who did not brag about Hermione, it had eventually come out that he belonged to her, the woman who just happened to also clear his name.

Severus was in no way ashamed of being in love with her, nor had he denied being in love with her when asked about her, as Ginny recounted it to Hermione in India. It was time for Hermione to do the same: to no longer be ashamed she was in love with Severus, and that he had been her lover.

As Chuff threw back another slug of Scotch, Hermione said with a hint of accusation, "I find it interesting that before Severus Snape helped discover this treatment, you could never dare to mention his name. Now you strut about like some peacock, fanning your tale about, boasting how he was once your apprentice and that somehow you should be credited for the cure merely by an association that ended years ago."

Hermione could not see Albert, but she could sense the restrained smile tug at the corner of his mouth as he sat in a chair behind her.

Chuff blinked back in shock that a witch, and one so young, had challenged him. "You impudent chit. Other than having to scrub cauldrons while under his tutelage at Hogwarts, what would you know of Severus Snape?"

"I know that when Severus Snape was your apprentice, you dragged him off to the North African desert, and you didn't warn him where you were taking him or to bring protection from the sun," Hermione began, citing chapter and verse, crossing her arms in front of her chest. "He wound up with a severe sunburn. You brought a hat for yourself and potions to protect from sunburn and windburn, but you did not give any to him, claiming it was his fault he didn't come prepared; nor did you allow him to conjure any protection. And how could he when you wouldn't tell him where you were going? He suffered for three days until you returned and he could finally brew something."

Heads swiveled and eyes looked to Chuff, watching for him to deny Hermione's claims. Many there sensed Hermione seemed to have a bit of a chip on her shoulder against Chuff from the very first meeting she came to, for some unknown reason. They were not willing to automatically believe her claim, though they knew she had no reason to come up with such a false story.

"Well, it was a lesson in learning to be prepared at all times," Chuff claimed in defense of himself.

There was a small collective gasp and murmur of groans that Chuff had admitted to doing such a thing to his former apprentice.

"Or what about that time you made him test the potency and length of a rash- and boil-inducing potion. Severus had to suffer for six hours until the potion waned while you leisurely recorded results, forbidding him from taking some pain-relieving potion of any sort. Not even willow bark tea." Hermione's eyes squinted in disgust at the Potions master.
"Any pain relief might have skewed the results," Chuff countered.

"That's a load of troll shit," Royston interjected into the argument. "You really are a bastard."

There as a gleam of triumph in Hermione's eyes when she saw the other Potions masters, and the few wives that came along that night, looked at Reginald Chuff with sudden distaste. Those stunts were pretty cruel, even for some of the more demanding and less sympathetic Potions masters.

Chuff knew Snape would never dare to share those private and humiliating stories with just any student of his. Going for the jugular, Chuff snorted, "And just how did you learn those little tales? Private tutoring on your back from the Head of Slytherin in his dungeon lair?"

There was a collective gasp, as many understood Chuff's improper insinuations.

The challenge was there, and Hermione was going to answer it. "Severus and I didn't become lovers until shortly before my divorce, years after I left Hogwarts, and years after the end of the war."

There was a crash of glass as Braxton dropped his glass of some unknown spirits, having lost his grip in shock of Hermione's confession. Shards and amber liquid were scattered across the wooden floor.

Chuff blinked in shock, hoping his cutting insults would cause her to blush or stammer. Instead, she stood there proudly, freely admitting to her adulterous relationship with Snape. He was out of ammunition momentarily.

"You admit to having an affair with him?" Chuff asked, hardly able to believe she would freely confess to such a thing. Wizards had affairs all the time, but with witches society dictated that they weren't supposed to admit to such things for the sake of propriety.

"Yes, but not nearly as long as Ron was having an affair with Lavender. He and I can't fault each other, as we're both guilty." It was a bold stroke to admit that, as it could open her up for more scorn, should Chuff phrase his next barb carefully.
"That explains why you took your case to the Wizengamot to exonerate him and his lackey, Malfoy. Couldn't bear to stand the thought of people knowing you were screwing a war criminal and a Death Eater?" he threw back haughtily.

"An ex-Death Eater who regretted that foolish mistake he made as a boy for the rest of his life and spent nearly two decades working for Albus Dumbledore, risking life and limb, to rectify his error and help Harry Potter defeat Voldemort. Or did you miss that part of the transcript of the trial where it was recorded from Pensieve transcripts how Severus stopped several curses from hitting Harry Potter so that he could finally kill Voldemort."

Hermione was reciting from rote some of her arguments for Severus' exoneration in front of the Wizengamot. It did not miss her observation that Chuff, and most of the others intently observing their fight, shuddered at the mention of You-Know-Whose name.

Chuff's eyes narrowed as a sudden realization dawn on him. "You helped him escape."

It had become common knowledge during the trial, without it being stated directly, that Snape and Malfoy had fled England some months prior. Since Severus was publicly listed as living in Hawaii, and since Draco's visit in August, everyone now knew where the ex-Death Eaters were residing.

Heads swiveled to look at Hermione, breaths held waiting for her to admit or deny Chuff's accusation.

"Yes, I did." Hermione jutted her chin up in defiance that there was anything wrong with that.

"When Minister Bones learns–"

Hermione cut him off by stating, "Minister Bones, along with Head Auror Kingsley Shacklebolt, and I already sat down and had a nice little talk about that." She smirked at him in a way to let him know he had nothing with which to blackmail her.

After the "Hot Mic" Spell was performed, and it came out publicly that Calpurnia Fudge and Dolores Umbridge had engaged in election-rigging, Hermione, Harry, Lavender, and Kingsley Shacklebolt sat down with the newly-elected Minister of Magic, Susan Bones. They told her about how they had used Polyjuice Potion in a non-sanctioned manner to uncover a greater crime and make those crimes public knowledge. While Minister Bones was not exactly pleased about the way Dolores Umbridge was initially interrogated – with Draco's false impersonation as Calpurnia, the liberal use of Veritaserum, and the use of an Obliviate – she was quick to overlook such measures when it resulted in the first non-rigged election in a while.

Minister Bones also took the opportunity to ask about how Draco Malfoy and Severus Snape had been able to escape England. Two ex-Death Eaters — while unjustly persecuted — had somehow evaded the system set up in place in order to prevent them from fleeing, so obviously the system had failed. Minister Bones gave Hermione a very pointed stare, since Hermione was in possession of two memories from Severus Snape during the trial, and therefore must have been in close contact with him in order to obtain them. The Minister prefaced her question with the disclaimer that anything said would be off the record, and possibly commended. Hermione confessed how she procured the ingredients for the Polyjuice though her position in the Department of S&F, and was met with a smile and an approving nod from the Minister at the end of her tale.

But of course, Hermione was not about to share the finer points of those details with Chuff or the crowd watching their argument.

With nothing left, Chuff merely sneered at her and said with disgust, "The Death Eater and the Mudblood fucking each other. Who would have thought? Wait until the Daily Prophet prints this little tale."

Hermione had crossed the room and had her wand pressed to Chuff's throat before the rest of the drunken guests finished blinking in shock of Chuff's slur against Hermione and his threat.

"Don't ever call me that again, you bigoted, arrogant, sadistic blowhard." The glint in Hermione's eyes made Chuff quail momentarily.

"An apprentice threatening a fully accredited master? This will not look good, should I report you to the accreditation board," he threatened as he tried to mask the fear on his face.

"Obliviate!"

Hermione staggered back in shock, turning her head to stare at the tip of Niles' wand. She saw the last wisping trails of the spell that came from it, erasing Reginald Chuff's memories of that night.

Sighing in exasperation, Niles merely said, "What an arse." Turning to Hermione, he said, "You restored the good name of a great Potions master who taught nearly a thousand students, including many who became our apprentices over the past two decades. In addition, you saved two people who were unjustly persecuted, and Chuff was threatening to go to the papers to out your love affair with Snape in a salacious manner to shame you? I don't think so."

Looking around the room, Nile announced loudly, with great authority, "Hermione, while not a fully accredited Potions mistress yet, embodies the code of ethics, integrity, and brilliance we seek to foster in our field. Everything that has been heard and seen here tonight will go no further than this room. We protect our own, especially when those of us have acted nobly."

Glancing about the room once more, Niles asked, "Do I have everyone's word?"

Every witch and wizard held up their wand and made the vow, their wandtips glowing brightly to show their sincerity.

Chuff, who was lying on the floor passed out, started to come around.

Glaring down at the prone disgraced Potions master, Niles said, "Get that bigoted piece of shit out of my house. And erase any memory of our monthly meetings. I don't want him turning back up at our parties like a bad Knut."

Niles was disgusted that Chuff had not only called Hermione that name, but that he'd referred to the Muggle nurse, Janine Watters, as a cunt. He had read the official account about how she helped come up with the cure as part of the Hawaiian team, and Chuff was no doubt bitter he didn't think of it before a Muggle.

Royston and Braxton eagerly came over and cast a Mobilicorpus spell to lift Chuff up off the floor, not being careful to not bump his head against doorjambs and walls on the way to the front door. They both Side-Along Apparated him away to his home, and finished with another Obliviate before returning to the party.

Standing in the kitchen trying to come down off an adrenaline rush, Hermione almost jumped out of her skin when Niles came up to her and placed a friendly hand on her shoulder.

"I never would have guessed about you and Severus. But I'm happy for the both of you – that is, if you're still together," Niles amended, not knowing the current status of their relationship.

"Yes, we're still together, though having a long-distance relationship is quite stressful at times."
Hermione heaved a sigh. "He was supposed to meet me in India last week, but he came down with ice pox just before he was supposed to Portkey."

Niles furrowed his brow as he poured himself another drink, his own adrenaline pumping quickly through his veins. "Why didn't you have Severus take you on as his apprentice? You'd be together now."

"Originally, I wasn't going to go with him, and he helped set me up with Albert. But by the time he asked me to go with him, I decided I had to stay behind and clear his name. He said he didn't care about being cleared of charges, but I insisted, telling him that even though he would be free of the Death Eater Decree, he still wouldn't be truly free." Hermione left out the part about trying to join Severus at the last minute and dropping the only source of Ron's hair for the Polyjuice Potion.

Niles stood there for a moment, studying his drink before asking, "I heard about Lavender's announcement of Draco Malfoy being the new Director of Advertising and Marketing for the Asia Pacific region. Is that a hint of your plans of what you will do and where you intend to go once you complete your apprenticeship?"

Albert cleared his throat, making his presence known. "That is still a matter of proprietary knowledge until such time that The Lovely Lavender Company makes its formal announcement on the new President of the Asia Pacific Region for its new offices in Malu Palekaiko," he said as he stood in the doorway to the kitchen. He looked at Hermione and gave her an exaggerated wink.

"Well," Niles said knowingly with a smug grin, "when that announcement is finally made, I shall have to congratulate her, whoever she may be."

Niles raised his glass, and Albert and Hermione clinked glasses with him.

After she drained her glass, Niles offered to refill it for her, to which she hesitated.

Albert nodded his head to Niles to fill her glass once more for another toast.

Looking to Albert, Hermione's eyebrows were raised in question. Leaning over discreetly, her master said quietly, "You no longer have to worry about who you accept drinks from any more at these parties."
Hermione stood back, leaning against the counter, and understood the grave implication of Albert's remark. Having had Niles, Braxton, and Royston support her against Chuff, and everyone else there take a wand oath to remain silent about that night's events, Hermione felt her trust in the world strengthen a little bit more.

She accepted the drink from Niles, who said, "A toast. To love. May your apprenticeship finish quickly, and may you soon be reunited with Severus once again."

Hermione raised her glass and said, "Cheers."

Albert raised his glass and clinked it against Hermione and Niles' glasses, adding, "Salut."

"Nostrovia," Niles said before they all drank.

His choice of toast triggered something in her mind.

"Niles," Hermione began in a manner that indicated she was going to ask something of him, "you know that song, Dark Eyes?"

"Ochi Chyornyye?"

"Yes. I read the original poem, and I noticed it was different from the lyrics Albert translated for me when you've sung it."

Albert shook his head and said, "I think I got it mostly right. It's one of those languages I haven't used in a long while."

"There are about three or four variations of the lyrics for that song." Niles took another sip as he tried to think if there were any other versions he was aware of.

"I was wondering, could you help me with changing the words about for a new variation of that song?" she asked sweetly.
"Absolutely. And we can work on your pronunciation, while we're at it," Niles said, happy to help her.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Than you to my betas, JuneW and thegrey ladies

Chaat is a type of Indian street food consisting of small dishes, available for purchase from street vendors. Usually a vendor will sell one type of chaat at his or her cart, so you have to go to different carts to try different foods.

"But Not For Me" composed by George Gershwin, lyrics by Ira Gershwin.

"New York State of Mind" written by Billy Joel.

"Ochi Chyornyje" is the romantic Russian song based on a Ukrainian poem. In English, it is called "Dark Eyes."

"Chevaliers De La Table Ronde" is a French drinking song (Knights of the Round Table) I used to know, having learned it in French class in junior high school. Given today's "zero tolerance" policies, I doubt they are teaching French drinking songs in public school anymore.

"The Booze Song" is a newer song by a Chinese folk-rock bank called Shan ren. You can listen to them perform it here: http://youtu.be/WCMgdRdyQHw

You can listen to a performance of "Ouzo Otan Pieis" here: http://youtu.be/h03P_j-iWc8
"Stop Dragon My Heart Around"

Chapter Summary

Hermione finally has that business luncheon with the twins, and she is inspired to new levels of crudeness. Severus finally finds replacements for Draco who won't make him want to poison or hex them. Italian opera and French can-can dancing included, "Snowball" cocktails are not, but the recipe is.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Ninety-Seven
"Stop Dragon My Heart Around"

Disclaimer: Yeah, alright, I know. Let's get this over with. The characters and concepts in this fanfic belong to J.K. Rowling, and various other franchises like Scholastic and Warner Bros. No financial gain is made from this, except if you count the wonderful reviews from my readers as legal tender.

==========

Since Severus was one of the first to recover from the ice pox, he was one of the first to discover the next stages of recovery, which Rainbow would help him document for the record over the next few weeks. The worst stage was when the skin under his beard and on his scalp was peeling around the hairs, as it itched like crazy. Severus was sorely tempted to shave his head and beard off in one go. At least when the palms of his hands peeled it was quick and mostly painless. All his calluses were gone, but he had built them over the past year. He could build them up again.

Draco noted it looked like Severus had lost at least a good five years off his face with the peeling. And with the peeling, Severus' skin had gone pale once more, which he countered with some potions to speed up the tanning process and avoid burning this time. Unfortunately, his Dark Mark remained, clear as ever. The white streak in Severus' hair remained as well, though it was still covered up with a spot dye job.

Now that the travel ban was over, interviews were rescheduled. Witches and wizards from all over came to Malu Palekaiko to interview for the position of Charms and Transfiguration tutor, with receptionist and office manager duties.
In between classes, tutoring, and private commissions, Severus and Draco fit half-hour appointments into their busy days to meet with the candidates, limiting themselves to three per day. Justina was happy she was getting a steady flow of guests at her hotel in the off-season, for some decided to stay overnight due to the time difference of where they Portkeyed in from, or to simply enjoy being in Hawaii.

The applicants all knew the job was dual-duty position and not very glamorous, but the beautiful weather and island scenery helped attract applicants. The smarter applicants had figured out that Snape was making money – not only from managing the export of rare Miniature Man-Eating Masdevallias, but from creating potions. They knew he had been on the Hawaii team that had helped find a treatment protocol for the ice pox. But being smart doesn't necessarily mean that one had social skills.

Over the months, Draco's list of students requiring tutoring had grown to the point where Severus had to take on some of the administrative duties Draco originally shouldered. The position was more than just a full time position between tutoring and administrative work, requiring someone who could easily switch hats between office manager and teacher, while working long hours. The job was far more demanding than many of the applicants assumed when they applied, which caused a slew of under-qualified and unprepared candidates to traipse through Severus' shop door.

As Severus and Draco sat there in the Potions master's office listening as another candidate, with an overly cheerful smile and sweaty palms, prattled on about their accomplishments and skills, both wizards wondered if finding someone competent was going to take as long as it had taken for Hermione to get all those Polyjuice Potion ingredients, once she agreed to help them.

"Transfigure this into something metallic," Draco said as he chucked a book suddenly at the wizard from California, growing restless and irritated with the slew of incompetent candidates who walked in.

The wizard was slow with his hands and his wand. The book wound up hitting the wizard on the side of the head, at which he apologized meekly for not catching it.

As the wizard bent down to fetch the book from the floor, Severus looked at Draco and shook his head. This wizard was spineless. Instead of getting angry with Draco for being so rude, the hunched-shouldered wizard merely conceded it was his fault. With someone like this, it would be no time flat before Severus would be snarling at him or walking all over him. While Severus didn't want someone overly aggressive either, having a co-worker who was a milquetoast was a recipe for disaster.

The candidate picked up the book and transfigured it into a frying pan.
"How imaginative," Draco drawled without concealing his boredom.

"Thank you for your time, Mr. Wells," Severus said perfunctorily. "We will owl you over the coming weeks with our decision. Good day."

Severus no longer acknowledged the wizard sitting across from him as he put his head down to make some more marks in his ledger.

Not everyone was an incompetent wet blanket or an overly cheerful twat. There were a few who were very talented. It just happened that they also had a demanding and bossy demeanor, not understanding this was Severus' business and that this person would be not only his co-worker, but his employee, handling bookings, appointments and some of the transactions on behalf of Severus. Severus and all those candidates so far instantly abraded each other's nerves, their personalities clashing from the start of the interview.

After two weeks of interviews, Severus and Draco conceded that he may have to hire for two positions – someone to act as receptionist and office manager, and someone separate to do just tutoring, since finding someone capable in both capacities and tolerable was an insurmountable feat.

Even with the creation of two new positions, none of the prior candidates they had interviewed would have fit the job of just a tutor for Transfiguration and Charms, or just office manager. If they had the talent, Severus could not tolerate the witch or wizard personally.

In the next issue of the local The Daily Times & Tides, and other prominent papers in major U.S. cities, Severus put in an ad for an office manager/receptionist, in addition for another call for candidates for the position of Charms and Transfiguration tutor.

The following Monday, Severus and Draco had several interviews lined up. Both were already quite exasperated and hoped this wasn't going to be another two weeks of annoying gits and belligerent arses bumbling into Severus' shop looking for a job they were obviously not qualified for. They also hoped for someone that Severus would not try to poison after the first month of working together.

As the first candidate for office manager walked in at eight on the button, Severus looked up from his desk. There in the doorway to his office stood a middle-aged woman with snow in her salt-and-pepper hair, shucking off her cloak that was also lightly dusted with snow.
"Sorry I'm a bit late," the slightly overweight witch said.

Severus looked at his clock. She was punctual. "Actually, you're right on time."

Shaking her head, she admitted, "I wanted to be here a few minutes early, but Portkeys out of Chicago were delayed because of an early snowstorm for the season. Why snow would have an effect on the timely operation of Portkeys is beyond me, since it's all indoors, but I digress. I'm Pat Vallier, I'm here to interview for the position of receptionist and office manager."

Pat stood and offered her hand across Severus' desk to shake. Severus stood to shake her hand as he introduced himself, noticing Pat had discreetly spelled away all the snow and water she'd tracked in.

Just then, Draco came into Severus' office. "Sorry I'm late. Ginny kept me up half the night." Noticing the woman there, he stood back regarding her coolly. She had a bearing similar to Molly Weasley, which – given his relationship with his mother-in-law – made him a bit standoffish.

"Hi, I'm Pat Vallier," she said with a sincere smile, offering her hand to Draco, which he shook with some reluctance. "Ginny, is she your daughter?" she asked.

"My wife, second trimester," he corrected her, a little put-off for her forwardness.

"Ah, tossing and turning? Hips and back getting sore after lying on one side for too long?" she asked.

Draco furrowed his brow, but then smiled a bit. "Yes."

"If I may recommend, you might want to get your wife a body pillow that is about three-fourths her height, and about eighteen inches wide. I promise it will help with the hips and back, and help her and you sleep more soundly through the night – until her third trimester starts. But it's only a suggestion." Pat nodded with some authority indicating she knew what she was talking about.

"Thank you," Draco said, already warming up to this woman who had offered a very good piece of advice her first few moments there. She'd also left the final decision to Draco, unlike Molly who had ordered her children around like pawns on a chess board.

Pat was there to interview for the position, looking for an opportunity to leave Chicago, unwilling to live another winter there, tired of the frigid, snowy winters and muggy, stagnant summers. It was only a week before Halloween and Chicago had its first major snowstorm of the season already. It was a little early for so much snowfall, a sign of a potentially long and harsh winter ahead.

She had brought her resume and letters of references, all giving glowing reports of her organizational skills, and her personable and professional demeanor. Even her current employer, who said they were sad to lose such a valuable asset due to her intent to move to a warmer climate, gave her high praises and strong recommendations.

Draco asked Pat about her office skills, to which she listed off some skills that impressed even Draco. While Draco was fairly competent about his bookkeeping, Pat also was well versed in Muggle and wizarding federal and state business taxes, something Draco had yet to acquaint himself with. Severus had not bothered to look into hiring a Certified Wizard Accountant for taxes yet either. Having an office manager familiar with business taxes would certainly be helpful to Severus.

Severus asked her a few questions of his own during the interview. Her personality was pleasant, yet not overly cheerful. She was professional, but not overbearing. She seemed to have the right personality with which to not annoy Severus. In many ways, she reminded Severus of Minerva, if Minerva smiled a bit more and had a bit more padding.

At the end of the interview, Pat thanked them for their time.

"Are you staying in town?" Severus asked, thinking he might give her an offer before she Portkeyed back home.

"No, within the next few hours I have to Portkey to Phoenix for another interview I have later today," she said as she looked at the watch on her wrist that buzzed, whirred and hummed, telling her many things besides just the time. "Then it's back to the office tomorrow morning to finish training my replacement. I promised to stay on board to train my replacement so my employer is not left in the lurch with things hanging and unfinished. Even though I'm leaving them, I want to make sure the transition is smooth and they aren't inconvenienced."

Severus was sorely tempted to tell her to not bother Portkeying to Phoenix, as he sensed no deception, but just an honest work ethic in her demeanor. Instead he said, "After Mr. Malfoy and I talk, should we decide to make you an offer, what would be the best way to contact you?"
"You can send an owl or Floo-call me in the evenings."

Severus hated Floo calls, getting down on his knees while sticking his head in the fireplace, but that would be quicker than an albatross from Hawaii to Chicago. Also, should Draco agree she was the right candidate, he didn't want to miss an opportunity to offer her the position.

They shook hands once more before parting. As they watched Pat walk out the front door of Severus' shop, just as the door closed Draco said, "I think you just found your new office manager."

"Let's see how the rest of the candidates for office manager fare before the end of the day," he said, hedging his bet that they might find someone just as competent and compatible as Pat.

"Well, here's hoping that we can get someone to replace me within the next week or two for tutoring," Draco said with an exasperated sigh. "Lavender gave me the plans and monies to begin building the new facility. Once we have a new tutor, I can take the plans to the town council and building department for approval, and we can finally break ground. I'm just glad that I don't have to supervise the construction of the new school too."

When Lavender decided to build her new facility in Malu Palekaiko, one of the topics that came up was an available workforce. Many witches on the island only worked part-time since they stayed at home tutoring their children. To have workers available for hire, Lavender was willing to pay a substantial sum of money to help build Malu Palekaiko's first formal academic school. This deal helped her negotiate the price down on land that would house the Lovely Lavender manufacturing facility, and cut down on the usual permit and licensing fees associated with such a venture. The new school would free up many witches who could work full-time while their children were at school during the day. Of course, Draco and Ginny offered a large sum as well, seeing that their own children would probably be attending the school, if they chose to go there and should the academic standards prove to be as good as Hogwarts.

The plans for the new school were to be decided on by the local town council and the newly-formed school's Board of Governors. Severus had reluctantly agreed to be a board member, given his long academic career and experience as deputy headmaster. He understood the requirements of the facilities and curriculum needed for a proper classroom learning environment, especially the Potions classroom.

As Severus and Draco interviewed candidates for the tutor position, they did not share details of the new school since those plans were still fluid. However, the right tutor might be hired as a schoolteacher, something they kept in mind as they interviewed.
'Rise and shine,' the ghostly apparition of Remus crowed, hovering over Hermione's bed, his face nearly in hers.

Hermione groaned, rolling over and pulling the pillow back over her head. The sun wasn't due to rise for at least another hour and a half, yet the night before she'd asked visions of Remus and Hagrid to wake her up.

She still wasn't fully convinced that those two apparitions were ghosts, yet she wasn't entirely sure they were manifestations of her subconscious either. But she figured either way, ghosts or mental manifestations, she might as well make use of them, and waking her up was one way for them to be useful. Marf was usually too skittish to wake her up; on some mornings she was particularly grumpy, which is when Marf threatened to punish himself for waking her, though she had asked to be awakened by a certain time. At least with the visions of her old friends, no threat of self-inflicted corporal punishment would result.

The visions of Remus and Hagrid also had the good sense to know when to leave the room when she wanted to masturbate as well, nor did they make any comments about it afterwards. For "roommates," they were a fairly tolerable pair who kept her company and did ease some of the loneliness of being parted from Severus.

'You have a Floo meeting this morning with the owner of an apothecary chain in Iran in an hour,' Remus reminded her.

"Oh, fuck," she groaned to herself. She remembered it was on her calendar, but she was feeling a bit worn thin.

Hermione knew if she was only doing this job, she could handle it without a problem. The issue was that Hermione was also trying to be a full-time Potions apprentice and working on her Potions theory, learning her Code of Ethics book, revising for her Spanish exam she intended to take in early November, and working with Albert on the finalization of some of the new baby products they would be launching in the next month. Christine was going to handle all the press, advertising, marketing and sales of this new product line launch, but Hermione had to handle everything else all by herself.

There were visits to Ron and Lavender's to give her boss updates daily, but the blonde witch was under orders by St. Mungo's staff to keep it to a brief fifteen minutes, unless she wanted to risk a miscarriage.
Lavender was getting bigger every day. Hermione asked if she was carrying twins, and Lavender said she hadn't asked the staff at St. Mungo's whether she was or not. Since witches tended to have trouble-free pregnancies, except when they over-exhausted themselves with too much work like Lavender had, witches didn't need to go to St. Mungo's for prenatal check-ups like Muggle women did. Witches craved what the babies needed and they ate accordingly. Birth defects and complications during pregnancy were uncommon, and the only "birth defect" witches and wizards were ever really aware of was if a child was born a Squib.

After her morning Floo meeting with the Iranian wizard, Hermione had an inventory check to perform, and orders for supplies to fill out and owl. Then there was checking the progress of production, a check of the warehouse to make sure there were enough items in stock for all upcoming shipments, plus building up stock of various products in time for the upcoming Christmas shopping season.

It seemed there were enough wizards who gave their wives a jar of wart removal cream to warrant building up a supply for the Christmas crush. Hermione surmised there must be a few wizards who gave their wives such a present, and then must have made the trip to St. Mungo's Christmas morning to get a sizable lump of coal removed from their arses. The coal – or other sharp object – had been placed there by their wives, who had hoped for something under the tree that was a bit more romantic and less critical of their appearance.

Just thinking about the upcoming Christmas season reminded Hermione she had three more things to do in addition to running Lavender's company and working on her apprenticeship. She had to meet with the Weasley twins for a brainstorming lunch, have dinner with Viktor and Anne, and go shopping for a present for Severus in time to have it shipped via owl or Portkeyed to Hawaii.

Hermione had trouble thinking about what Severus would need, that she could buy him. He had enough money to buy anything he wanted now, including books. She remembered the Pensieve tour of his home – their home – and remembered that the Potions lab was stocked with every conceivable tool needed, and his kitchen was fully stocked as well, from what she could tell. She had no idea what books Severus had bought since giving that memory to her, so there was no way to tell if she would be giving him a duplicate book or not, if a book was what she was going to give him. Maybe a stroll along Diagon Alley or one of the smaller side streets would present a source of inspiration.

The twins were also looking towards the upcoming Christmas shopping season as well. They were quite eager to sit down and get a witch's perspective for items to sell, preferably from one as creative as Hermione.

In order to save time, as her schedule was rather full, Hermione asked the twins to come to her office where the company house-elves would serve lunch. Since the weather was getting cooler, she had the house-elves fix a slightly heartier fare for lunch.
As Fred and George sat down to the luncheon service set up in Lavender's office, shaking out their napkins before laying them across their laps, George cooed, "Quite the spread, Hermione. Are you sure you're not trying to butter us up for something you want from us instead of us pilfering you for ideas, with a cut of the royalties, of course?"

"No, nothing of the sort. Just trying to be a good host. And considering how long I've put off this luncheon, I figured I should make a good effort to make up for the delay," Hermione merely noted as she took a sip of sparkling pumpkin juice. She wished she could have a glass of wine instead, but knew if she did, she would probably want to nap on the couch that afternoon instead of talking with the goblin accountant about the increase in supply costs. There was still a lot work to be done after lunch.

The twins were drinking red wine, given that Hermione had ordered the house-elves to make shepherd's pie made with ground lamb, onions, carrots, peas, and a rich lamb stock gravy. She remembered shepherd's pie was a particular favorite dish of the twins, and she decided to use lamb, since Severus preferred lamb to beef in the dish.

"So, as we were saying, we're fine on the joke gifts and all, but we really need something new to add to The Sirens' Secret store for the holidays. We have those portable rendezvous that we're making like crazy," Fred said. "There's the Tropical Paradise – you got the prototype. There is the Arabian Nights Splendor – Draco was able to go into great detail about it."

"No doubt a byproduct of Ginny's belly dancing," George added.

Fred continued on, "The Japanese Serenity Tea Garden, though where Draco got that idea, I'll never know."

"They have an authentic Japanese garden at their house in Malu Palekaiko," Hermione offered, explaining the inspiration of that idea without going into further details. Hermione smiled to herself, recalling the way Ginny told her about how Draco had once transformed his flat into a Japanese garden for her.

"Gin never mentioned that." George said, picking up where his brother left off. "There is the Italian Loggia that includes a small orange orchard; the Snowy Swiss Chalet – skis not included; the Fern Grotto with a waterfall similar to yours; the Indian Raja Palace; and the Grecian Temple with a virgin sacrifice altar," he said with an exaggerated lascivious look, indicating the only blood to be spilt on that altar was someone's maidenhead – if it hadn't already been taken long before.
"It would be better if you had the temple dedicated to Aphrodite or Eros," she said absentmindedly, remembering her final Greek Potion exam. "Actually, the Aztec were much more into the virgin sacrifice than the Greeks. It was Romans who were into orgies."

"Oh, there's a thought for a newly renovated version," Fred said in earnest.

"I meant to ask, if I plucked a flower from the tropical version you made for me, would a new flower grow in its place?" Hermione asked, having forgotten to owl the twins about it earlier.

Around a mouthful of mash and gravy, George answered, "Yes, but the flower, once plucked and outside the confines of the enclosure, will disappear. So if you pluck a flower and put the environment away, the flower will merely dissolve into nothingness."

Hermione nodded, impressed. Then, seeing the question about to be asked in their eyes, she said, "Yes, it was absolutely brilliant. I am positively stunned. What a masterpiece! I felt like I had gone somewhere lush and tropical, all while still in the confines of my own flat."

"Yes, but was it romantic? That was one of the stipulations of the order Draco told us from that 'unknown' person," Fred said with a waggle of his brows.

Hermione smiled and sighed wistfully. Closing her eyes, she recalled, "It was wonderfully romantic. I could almost imagine Severus there with me."

It was a very sudden way of revealing to the twins that Severus was her "boyfriend," but given how they liked to surprise people with their jokes, she figured they could deal with a little surprise of their own.

Fred and George both started laughing, which earned a stern glare from Hermione. "Sucks that your boyfriend has the same first name as that greasy git who taught us Potions at Hogwarts," Fred said as he gave Hermione a pitiful stare in return.

Picking up her sparkling pumpkin juice elegantly in one hand while studying the bubbles that trailed up the sides of the flute, she casually replied, "I hope you won't be making any disparaging remarks about his last name, since it's the same last name of that former professor you are belittling."
Hermione hadn't meant to time that bit of news when the twins were both taking a sip of wine, but she was pleased nonetheless when they both simultaneously choked on it.

"You and Snape?" Fred asked, his eyes nearly bugging out of his head.

"Oh man, if Ron ever finds out—" George began, but was cut off by Hermione.

"Ron knows. As long as I'm happy, and Severus loves me back equally, Ron is happy for me." Hermione took a sip and gave them both a meaningful look, daring them to continue ridiculing Severus.

George leaned forward with a conspiratorial look on his face. "So, I know you're not the type to kiss and tell, but..."

Hermione sat back and raised her brows questioningly, purposefully pretending to be obtuse. "Yes?"

"Well?" Fred prodded her. He tilted his head jerkily sideways to imply what he wasn't going to say for fear of getting hexed by her.

George was right. Hermione was not the type to kiss and tell. She coolly looked at them, trying to keep her face impassive. She wished Severus was there, for he always had an elegant and cutting retort to such a personal question. Ginny had told her about those who had tried to get him to reveal who he was secretly attached to. Eventually, half of Malu Palekaiko found out about Hermione, though Severus had tried to be discreet about it.

Instead, she stuck with the pat answer. In clipped tones, she replied, "It's none of your business."

"Worse than Ron? Wow, completely not surprised," Fred goaded her into revealing otherwise.

Hermione narrowed her eyes, knowing what they were trying to do. She could have said something to the effect that two Slytherins had stolen the wives away from two Gryffindor wizards, thus attesting to the lack of sexual prowess of Gryffindor men. However, she didn't want to disparage Harry, nor publicly admit that she and Ron were not sexually compatible.
The best she could muster for a diplomatic and tasteful answer off the top of her head was, "You can think whatever you want." She waited a beat before adding, "No matter how completely wrong your assumption is."

Of course she wasn't going to let the twins cast aspersions against Severus' talent as something other than an über sex god, so she did it as delicately as possible.

Fred coughed and George laughed before asking Hermione for new product ideas she could suggest herself, wanting to move onto a new topic. The twins were unwilling to entertain thoughts of Professor Snape fucking Hermione until lost in wild throes of passion, though they were the ones who had asked.

She suggested floating kissing balls of mistletoe that could be charmed to various settings: follow a particular person, seek and hover over a specific or random couple, or randomly hover about a room. Upon asking about the other portable rendezvous the twins had developed, they said they also offered, for additional costs, costumes to go with each getaway-in-a-box. Hermione suggested picnic hampers as an option, thinking about how that time she ate Moroccan food with Severus while blindfolded would have been even more romantic in the Arabian Nights themed portable rendezvous. Hermione knew Draco was definitely inspired by his wife's belly dancing to come up with that one, confirmed by George's comment, and finally understood Ginny's comment in India about him not minding wearing the turban.

Hermione came up with an idea for a variation of the edible body paint. Paint it on a wizard's cock and it becomes striped like a candy cane, in peppermint flavor. "What better way to entice a witch to suck on his candy cane," Fred exclaimed, liking Hermione's idea, but still having trouble imagining her giving Snape a blow job.

Of course, that product would fall under Potions, which meant that Hermione and Albert would have to work on the Potion together in time for Christmas sales. They would have to paint their own fingers to see if it actually worked instead of its final intended use.

The twins had already informed Hermione that they had a set of Christmas-themed vibrators, dildos, anal plugs, and other toys they were working on.

"We have one plug that is shaped like a Christmas tree..." said Fred.

"But it folds like a brolly for insertion," added George.
"Once it is in place..."

"It will slowly pop open!" they chorused together.

It was Hermione's turn to choke on her drink.

In response to the twins' lack of bounds for taste, she asked scoffingly, "What next? A full-sized animated Santa doll that when you pull his drawers down pisses champagne, or that Christmas 'Snowball' drink? And then what? It literally tosses you Christmas cookies out of its mouth?" Hermione suddenly realized that she remembered seeing a small table-top version of the pissing Santa drink dispenser; she was a child in a novelty shop on Carnaby Street, and was just as horrified back then as she was now that she just suggested it.

The twins just looked at each other, their eyes gleaming. They exclaimed simultaneously, "That's fucking brilliant!"

"What a great way to combine sex and jokes!" George praised her.

"Sublime, yet over the top!" Fred added.

"And please tell us about this drink called 'Snowball'," George added.

Hermione shook her head and figured if she was in for a Knut, she was in for a Galleon at this point. At least there would be Galleons as part of her royalties to make up for the shame of knowing she came up with that horrendous idea.

There were ideas bantered about that would require contracting a baker who was willing to do the work for anatomically correct strip-teasing gingerbread men and women, pulling off icing-made clothing. No longer caring about the bounds of decency, Hermione even suggested they could have the gingerbread cookies fuck for a confectionery sex show. Holiday theme flavored lubes were also discussed, which meant more Potions work for development, and the obligatory Christmas themed kinky costumes.

That topic made Hermione pause for a moment and delve into her own little fantasy. She was thinking of how Severus' physique had improved since moving to Hawaii. His body was a bit leaner and simultaneously a bit more muscular, as seen in the Pensieve memory he'd sent her.
"Where were you just now?" George asked, noticing Hermione getting a faraway look in her eye.

"Nothing," she flustered and dodged.

"C'mon," Fred cajoled her.

"Red leather pants," she hummed. Remembering Severus would probably rather drink a Potion brewed by Neville than be caught wearing a Gryffindor color, she amended her fantasy by saying, "Or tight green leather pants."

Just suddenly thinking of Severus in tight green or black leather pants was going to be fueling a lot of Hermione's fantasies during the next week.

As they wrapped up their productive lunch, Fred asked, "Just how old is Snape?"

"Forty-four."

"Wow, given how he looked, I thought he was already in his sixties," George replied.

"You'd look old and worn out too if you had to teach Potions yearly to nearly 300 students and grade their homework by day, then play spy and kiss Voldemort's hems against your will by night," she said quite somberly. "Not to mention, be Head of House to Slytherin," she added for good measure.

Fred's eyes went wide in remembrance of the bunch of prats, plus the strain of the war. "Yeah, when you put it that way, it would prematurely age anyone."

Hermione remembered the vision of Severus in the Pensieve from the last days of the war and how drawn and haggard he looked. He did look old for his relatively young age at the time. In the last days of the war, he wasn't even forty, yet he looked like he could have been fifty at the time. She wondered how Severus' skin was doing, given that most everyone who had gone through the treatment for ice pox he helped develop was peeling. They were winding up with slightly improved skin, much like the Muggle technique of a facial peel.
"Besides, Hawaii agrees with Severus," she said, waving her wand to Summon the photo of her lover that Ginny and Draco had given her. It was taken from their wedding, before he became trimmer and tanner.

Handing it over, Fred said in disbelief, "That's Snape? But he's smiling. And not maliciously?"

"He's in a floral print short-sleeved shirt? And those trousers aren't black. Obviously an impostor," George said. He scarcely believed this was the same wizard in the billowing black robes who had ruled the dungeons and Potions classroom.

"Believe what you will," Hermione said simply, not caring any longer what the twins may have thought. "When I'm done with my apprenticeship here, I'm packing up and heading off to Hawaii to join him. Lavender is opening a new facility for the Asia Pacific region. I'm going to run it, and Severus already built a house for the two of us to live in."

"What do dungeons in Hawaii look like anyway? A rack made with bamboo and coconuts?" George piped up cheekily.

Hermione threw a glare his way, knowing he was jesting, but eventually willing to give him a small laugh, as that did seem rather ridiculous. Then, becoming quite serious, she said, "No, I'm sure he used a nice sturdy hardwood like koa, and industrial grade jute for the ropes." She winked at Fred and George when they momentarily looked at her in shock, wondering if she was serious or not.

"So who else knows about you two?" Fred asked.

Hermione gave them a brief rundown of who else knew about her and Severus.

"And just how did you two meet up?" George asked this time. "Or should I ask, how did a Slytherin who once loathed you and most Gryffindors, despite working for the Order, get romantically entangled with you?"

Hermione was not about to delve into the sullied nature of their initial meetings and Severus' official daytime job at the time. She deflected by saying, "It's a very long story, and I have a lot of work to do. Maybe another time."
"Did that Delgado introduce you to him?" George asked.

Hermione thought that if she needed to come up with some palatable lie, versus the seamy truth, that might be a not-so-white lie to spin. But now was not the time to improvise a new lie when she had much work to do.

After bidding her former brothers-in-law good-bye, Hermione set her mind to work on her many, many tasks she had to complete by the end of the day.

~~~~~~~*~

It was the Friday before Halloween. Severus had made the offer to Pat for the position the day after she was interviewed, and she accepted. Pat was going to move from Chicago over the weekend, staying at Justina's hotel until she could find an apartment. He'd been honest with her, explaining that there weren't that many apartments in Malu Palekaiko, or a house to rent or buy. She would be moving to Malu Palekaiko without her husband, as they had separated after their kids grew up, and he was currently living with mistress 3.0 in Boca Raton, Florida.

But even after a full week of interviewing over a dozen Charms and Transfiguration applicants, Severus and Draco were no closer to finding someone.

Business was busy for Severus once again. Commissions were up, tutoring was back in full swing, and Severus was experimenting with Miniature Man-Eating Masdevallia pods in a potion to erase the raised, scarred bumps from the ice pox, something that only happened if you scratched at the itchy lumps while suffering from the disease. Severus had a few spots on his arms and legs that he had scratched at while sick, and with his various experiments he tested to see if the new potion would erase the small, raised, scaly lumps that looked similar to a scabby wart.

Shipments of the Miniature Man-Eating Masdevallia pods were also up, as Severus wasn't the only Potions master out there who had the same idea. Blanche was able to raise the price, since demand was up. Severus was still helping her run her business and teaching Bailey how to harvest and manage the rare cluster of naturalized orchids. While Blanche and Bailey were both down with the ice pox, the orchids continued thriving, not caring that their caretakers were absent from tending to them for a whole week. Each member of the Condre family had their own small numbers of scars from the disease, and they let Severus have as many as he needed for his experiments. They were hoping he'd come up with a cure soon, since Blanche had a couple scars on her face she was quite self-conscious about, though she was not the only person who had some scarring in town.

As Friday drew to a close, some of his students who helped pay for lessons by doing menial work around his shop were finishing up.
"Did you scrub the toilets, clean the lavatories, and restock all the paper goods?" Severus asked Cyprien Jones, his new helper who had started that week. He was replacing one of Severus' original helpers, who had finally been accepted for Auror training in Seattle, thanks to Severus' instruction in Potions and a few practice duels.

"Yes, Mr. Snape," Cyprien replied, adding, "And the chandeliers have all been dusted, and had the wax scraped off and candles replaced. All floors are swept and main classroom mopped, trash bins emptied too."

"Cauldrons?" Severus prompted him.

"Thomas said he would do that while I took care of the other tasks."

Severus nodded. Thomas could be trusted to scrub a cauldron to Severus' level of satisfaction, stacking them in a way so they didn't tip over as well. Students had to clean their own cauldrons at the end of his brewing sessions, but often there were dregs that still clung to the cauldrons in the pores of the metal, or build-up that had to be thoroughly scrubbed away.

After checking over the young wizards' work, he dismissed Cyprien and Thomas, telling them to come in Monday afternoon since he had to change the schedule for an advanced brewing class they had signed up for due to the arrival of a highly perishable ingredient. Hoya seeds were viable for only a few days, and in some instances merely hours. The potion they were going to brew required the hoya seeds to be viable.

Knocking on the doorjamb to Draco's office, Severus asked, "Ready to lock up for the weekend?"

There were no appointments over the weekend. Severus would only come in to check on some long-term brewing potions, including a fresh batch of lacewing flies for his personal Polyjuice Potion stash, since he was getting low again. Pensieves and Polyjuice were a stop-gap measure to feed his need to see Hermione.

The rainstorm had just ended shortly before Severus locked up for the weekend. He and Draco walked two abreast on the damp sidewalk, discussing options for putting ads in foreign newspapers for the tutoring position, as they had only stuck with American newspapers so far. As they made their way to Bongo's, they heard yelling in the side alley right next to Flo & Eddie's Noodle Shop.
"Do you know the shit storm I'm in because of you?" a witch shrieked. Neither Draco nor Severus recognized the voice.

"Well, I don't know why you would be in trouble, considering I kept you out of it. You indicated you had no interest in helping me in the matter, so I did it all by myself!" a wizard yelled back. Severus and Draco recognized it as Jerry's voice, but never had they heard him raise his voice before. It was his strong, nasal New York accent when he was upset and excited that gave him away.

As the two wizards approached the mouth of the alley, Severus caught sight of the badge upon the short brunette witch's chest. It was a bright silver shield that said "Auror" that was pinned to the left lapel of her double-breasted Kelly-green tailored suit jacket with bright purple pinstripes.

"Well, because we were living together, up until the time you pulled that stunt then disappeared, they have cause to think I had something to do with it. Or did you not care at all? Not even a letter. What are you? A coward?" she grilled him, glaring daggers at him while she clutched her wand angrily, sparks starting to spit from the end of it.

Jerry casually slipped his hand into his pocket to palm his own wand. "Listen, babe. What was I supposed to do? Just sit there and let my father continue to get sent to the hospital time and time again? Not even my brother, Vince, could do anything. Last time he asked the precinct Captain for help, he got put on a shitty graveyard beat patrolling the Webster Projects." Jerry shook his head in defeat. "Captain was probably on the take. Blue wall of silence and all that shit. Pops told Vince not to risk his career with the NYPD, but I was willing to risk mine. And now I know my father is safe. Besides, weren't you the one who said you wanted us to take a break from each other for a while?"

"Yeah, but what about my career? I got stuck on administrative leave for two months." The Auror began to raise her wand.

"Is there a problem, Jerry?" Severus asked, having noticed Draco had run off to fetch Mounga from inside the bar. Severus already had his wand out and ready, given that this was an Auror he was dealing with.

The witch Auror looked Severus up and down. She could tell immediately he was a Potions master from the staining on the tips of his fingers and tops of his shoes. "I heard you shacked up with a guy. A Potions master. This him?" she asked caustically, raising her wand to point at Severus.

Severus cocked his head slowly to one side and carefully enunciated for emphasis, "Are you aware of the protective magic of this sanctuary, Miss?"

Ignoring Severus, she turned her attention back to Jerry and snarled, "I can't believe you're fucking some limey faggot. I thought you were straight. I think I'm gonna throw up." She shook her head in disbelief that Jerry's sexuality wasn't strictly hetero as she had assumed.

Mounga came running down the sidewalk to the mouth of the alley, parting some of the other spectators who had joined Severus; he got through with the 'gentle guidance' of his large hands. "You must be Ari Strano." Mounga held his hands up to show he was unarmed. "I'm Mounga Finau, the town judge and a council member for Malu Palekaiko. I processed Jerry's request for sanctuary. Perhaps we can go to my judge's chambers and discuss this in a more amenable setting."

As Ari lowered her wand, so did Severus, finally putting his away once she put hers back in her holster that hung by the side of her hip. Like many Aurors, she had a second strap for the tip of the holster secured around her thigh.

It was then that Severus noticed that Arnold was nowhere to be seen. Usually the former Auror and the Japanese Potions master went everywhere together, including Friday nights at Bongo's. But tonight, even with Mounga coming from the bar, there was still no sign of Arnold.

Mounga, Jerry, and Ari walked off to the town hall, as there was sure to be a lot more yelling and private things to be discussed. This was no conversation to be had in a lively bar with a band playing songs in the corner. There should be no grievances aired for others to observe.

Now that the excitement was over, Severus and Draco followed in behind the rest of the crowd that filed back into the restaurants and bars open along the main street.

There was so much commotion and buzzing about the bar only Ginny and Rainbow noticed when Severus and Draco walked into the bar.

Bongo was so caught up in the gossip, he didn't even notice his regulars enter the bar or call out his usual "Aloha" to them. Bongo did remember to serve up Severus' usual old fashioned and Draco's gin and tonic, using his wand to slide them down to the other side of the bar where their group sat.

Severus looked about and asked, "Where's Arnold?"
Rainbow had that look on her face when she had a particularly juicy piece of gossip she wanted to share, but given how Severus had publicly chastised her for blabbing on, she decided to use a bit of discretion for once. "Trouble in paradise," was all she said on the matter, while raising her brows to indicate a possible lovers' tiff between Jerry and Arnold.

Severus could tell there was more she could divulge. She looked near to bursting to let it all out, but she kept pressing her lips together in a thin line in some valiant attempt to not open her mouth except to take another sip of her drink.

The band in the corner went back to playing music, a ragtime rendition of a classical Baroque piece. It was an interpretation Jerry brought the house down with a few weeks prior when he played it with more passion and virtuosity than the witch currently playing it.

Looking at the clock on the wall, Rainbow said, "I hope Mouna isn't going to take long. We have tickets in Honolulu tonight to see A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum. Curtain is at eight."

"What was so hilarious that you had to buy tickets to observe a roadside incident?" Severus asked, wondering about her strange grammar usage.

Rainbow looked at Severus and blinked before she realized he didn't understand the meaning of her statement. Once her laughter died down, as she was the only one to find Severus' response humorous, she explained that that was the name of the Muggle musical theater production she and her husband were going to go see.

Turning to Draco, Ginny said, "Maybe we should go to the theater some time. We always wanted to go out to see some of the Muggle productions together in London, but couldn't."

Ginny and Rainbow, with Draco sitting there as a silent observer to their chatter, went on about the London theater district and productions. Severus didn't pay much attention to what they were discussing until he heard Hermione's name mentioned.

"My best friend back in England, Hermione, used to go with her parents when she was younger." Ginny stopped to take a sip of her grapefruit juice, which was the latest thing she was craving. "And for last Christmas, she got her parents tickets for a Muggle production called The Producers that opened in summer that she claimed they really loved."
Severus remembered how Hermione wished they could go to the theater during her birthday weekend, but they couldn't risk being spotted in public together. He could recall that black dress and how low it dipped on her back. Now that his name was cleared and she was divorced, he could take her out in public, and proudly walk with her arm tucked in his, promenading down the sidewalk together, no longer hiding. Severus wanted to take Hermione to the theater district in London, to have her dressed beautifully, to barely be able to concentrate on the production with her sitting next to him in that tempting black dress.

There was just one problem: Severus swore to himself never to go back to England ever again once he escaped. There was that promise to go back and end Potter's life, should he cause harm or trouble to befall Hermione regarding her helping him and Draco escape, and Potter did protect her as best as he could, though not quite adequately enough to Severus' liking. Besides, Severus had a business to run right now. He couldn't just up and go at the last moment.

Lost in fantasies of himself and Hermione dressed up stepping out on the town, Severus nearly jumped when Mounga placed a gentle hand on his friend's shoulder.

"You all right there, Severus?" the larger wizard asked.

"Yes, just contemplating a few things." It was the truth.

"Well, wish I could stick around and catch up with you, but I also made reservations for six o'clock at a Muggle restaurant near the theater." Looking up at the clock, he said as he put his hand on the small of his wife's back, "We'd better get going if we don't want to lose our reservation."

After they left, Severus made a point to remember to ask Mounga about how one went about making reservations at a Muggle restaurant. He wondered if it was something Naomi did, since she did a lot of work acting as a procurer and liaison in the Muggle world for witches and wizards. She even had a cell-you-lar telephone, though she said she had to Apparate to the Big Island to get any reception, something about a cell hall or tower and bars that were in the tower, or something of that sort.

Just as Severus finished draining his first old-fashioned of the night, Jerry dragged his sorry-looking ass into Bongo's.

"Aloha!" Bongo called out.
Jerry answered back weakly, looking like he had been put through the wringer. Bellying up to the bar, he called out, "Four fingers of bourbon topped with a shot of headache relief potion."

"That good?" Severus asked, glancing sideways at him.

"Worst fucking day in a long time." Jerry put his face in his hands and scrubbed it in exasperation.

Severus wasn't going to pry nor prompt Jerry to unburden himself any further. Clearly, Jerry didn't exactly feel like sharing his grief.

Once Bongo served Jerry his drink, the former Auror took a long swig and set it down before turning to Severus. "Please tell me you're still interviewing for that Transfiguration and Charms position. If you tell me no, then that would just be the perfect fucking hat-trick for today."

"Then you're in luck, for once." Severus caught Draco's attention and waved him to come over.

"What's up?" Draco asked, catching the look in Severus' eye.

"I want to interview as your replacement," Jerry replied.

"I thought you were helping Arnold with his Potions business?" Draco asked.

"You mean playing prep cook or plongeur to Arnold's executive chef?" Jerry shook his head. "I told Arnold I wanted to do something more than slice, chop, and pickle shit all day long. I told him about interviewing for your position today and he got all in a huff, going on about me owing him, and him expecting me to chip into the household. Which is silly because when I first moved in I offered, but he said no. So I offered to chip in and he still wasn't happy" He shook his head, trying to avoid going off on that unpleasant tangent and get back on track with his story, but not before taking another pull on his drink. "Arnold also views you as competition," Jerry admitted, looking at Severus.

"But you wouldn't be brewing Potions, you would be teaching Transfiguration and Charms," Draco pointed out.
"Exactly! But Arnold doesn't see it that way."

Severus wondered how wise it would be to hire a Charms and Transfiguration tutor who would be working in his own shop, yet living with his lover, Arnold, who was technically his competition, though there was very little competition for clientele. Jerry wouldn't be handling the office part, as Pat had been hired to do that, so Jerry would not be privy to what potions his clients ordered or how much he was charging. However, given the inherent secrecy of the craft, Severus was not so willing to consider interviewing Jerry.

Jerry surprised Severus by saying, "There were some things that came up during our argument – some relating to the position, some personal – but long story short, Arnold and I broke up today and I moved into Justina's hotel this afternoon. And I was going to head on over to your shop and see if that position was still open when I got yanked into the alley by my other ex."

Any reservations Severus had about interviewing Jerry had just evaporated with that revelation. There would be no risk of Jerry telling his lover about the confidential aspects of his business.

Draco stood up and behind Jerry's back gave Severus a meaningful look followed by the raising of one eyebrow. Severus gave a minute nod that it would be worth it to interview Jerry after all. One had to be fairly competent in both Charms and Transfiguration to become an Auror.

Lifting his hand up, Draco caught Bongo's attention. "Can you pass me a whole pineapple?"

Bongo used his wand to send one over to the other end of the bar.

Handing the pineapple over to Jerry, Draco said, "Transfigure this into something metallic."

Jerry held the pineapple in his hand, studying it for a moment, before lifting his head up and looking about the bar. "Hey Bongo, can I grab one more pineapple?" he asked.

With two pineapples placed on the bar, Jerry stepped back. Draco and Severus did the same, not knowing what Jerry had in mind.

With great flare, Jerry swung his wand about. The pineapples lifted up into the air and began to change, spiraling out into long threads or broad sheets of metal, affixing themselves to the walls around the bar. And on the other end of the bar top, a small anvil appeared.
The band in the corner had stopped playing and the bar patrons ceased their conversations to watch the ballet of movement above their heads.

When it was done, there as a small round of applause from the bar patrons. Severus said, "It looks interesting, but what is it?"

Jerry gave a sly smile and said, "I'm not quite done yet."

He then grabbed a handful of maraschino cherries from the bar top, He Transfigured them into metal balls before floating them up into the air into a slotted section that held the balls in place with a small swinging gate. At the other side of the bar near the anvil he'd Transfigured, he then positioned an empty bowl onto the counter, adjusting it minutely before being satisfied.

Turning to Ginny, who had come over to find out what was going on, he said, "Madam?" He extended his hand to invite her to set a row of metallic dominoes on the bar countertop into action.

Ginny pushed the first domino, which set off a chain reaction of movement. The dominoes fell, which then knocked the pendulum to swing back and forth. This action then set the gate to rise and fall, releasing the metallic balls in a set spaced pattern to glide along the metallic rails affixed to the walls. The balls moved down one side wall, then along the back wall and up the other wall towards the bar at the other end where the anvil and bowl sat. The entire rolling ball sculpture apparatus was configured in a U-shape around the perimeter of the bar, setting off whimsical vignettes.

Turning to the band in the corner, Jerry said, "Can I get a rousing rendition of the Anvil Chorus?"

Meanwhile, the balls were still running along the rails, in a series of vignettes prompting a metallic rooster that crowed, an alarm clock that trilled briefly, and a little row of colored flags that popped up.

Jerry held his arms aloft like a conductor, waiting for the right moment until he moved his arms, using his wand as a conductor's baton. The band struck up the main melody to Verdi's Anvil Chorus while Jerry sang.

As the balls reached their final destination, they fell off the end of the rails and onto a metallic anvil, bouncing off of it, before Transfiguring back into cherries in the bowl he set on the bar to
And with each strike of the metal ball on the anvil, Jerry sang in time.

"Chi del gitano i giorni abbella?
Chi del gitano i giorni abbella?"

All but two balls had made their way along the Rube Goldberg-esque contraptions Jerry had created. While waiting for them to come into position, he sang "Chi del gitano i giorni abbella?" one last time.

The last two balls fell as he sang, "La zingarella!" The last two balls struck in perfect time to the last two beats.

The walls of Bongo's nearly shook from the applause and cheers from the patrons. Even Severus was duly impressed and clapped, as Jerry had far exceeded his expectations. And what was most surprising is that despite Jerry's talent, he didn't brag about it, unlike some of the Gryffindors Severus had gone to school with who boasted and showed off their talent like a bunch of strutting roosters. Jerry merely nodded his head in thanks. This showed some sense of humility and reservedness, though Jerry liked to show off his musical talents at the piano as often as possible. The display was a bit of showing off, but Severus figured if Jerry wanted to make a good impression about his skills, he did just that.

Jerry finished transfiguring the pineapples back into their original state and thanked Bongo for the use of his fruit.

"Impressive," Severus conceded. "But how is your Charms work?"

Draco and Severus had been sorely disappointed with the efforts of some of their candidates to perform Charms in Severus' office. One of the spells the applicants were asked to cast was a Patronus Charm, and one candidate's raccoon Patronus had knocked over a jar of beetle wings. Severus called an end to that interview immediately. Some of the candidates couldn't even conjure a decent version of the spell, and it wound up sputtering out.

In order to finish the second request, Jerry walked over and asked the people sitting at the three tables along the back wall if he could borrow their tables and chairs for a moment. The people, wondering what Jerry would do next to thrill them, all got up eagerly and moved to the sides.
Lifting his wand, he said an incantation in French. The three tables and chairs rearranged themselves where the chairs moved on top of the tables. The cut-out scrollwork along the top rail of each chair morphed until it looked like a smile and twinkling cheerful eyes. The table-and-chair combo then stood up on two of the table legs, looking rather anthropomorphic. The table linens functioned as a skirt.

Turning to the band once more, he said, "Can I have you guys play Hell's Gallop?"

Once the band struck up the tune, often referred to as "The Can-Can Song," the table-chair figure began dancing a can-can on its own. The chair legs acted as arms, lifting the edge of the tablecloth as if lifting frilled skirts in a rapid display of high kicks in time to Jerry's wand movements. The bar clapped along to the dancing furniture until the end when the furniture turned around and bent over to flash its backside, flipping the tablecloths up.

Jerry ended the Charm and the patrons went back to their tables to finish their drinks, patting Jerry on the back, impressed by his skill. Walking back to the bar, Jerry looked to Draco and Severus, asking, "Well?"

Severus and Draco were fairly impressed, but had one last task. Draco said, "Can you cast a Patronus Charm?"

Jerry scoffed and said, "Yeah, of course. And?"

"May we see you cast it?" Severus said, wanting proof instead of taking him at his word; though by the skill Jerry had already displayed, it should be a simple feat for him.

Jerry looked down at the bar countertop and bit his lip.

"Is there a problem?" Severus asked a bit imperiously, sensing the former Auror's nervousness.

Jerry leaned over and whispered into Severus' ear, "I can do it, I just can't do it here or in town where anyone can see."

This piqued Severus' interest even more. Draco quirked a brow, wondering what Jerry had said to cause Severus to look that puzzled.

"I know a place where we can go," Severus suggested.

Jerry nodded. Draco knew where the place Severus was thinking of, as he had been there recently. Severus drew a quick map on the bar countertop with his wand, casting a charm to prevent others from spying over their shoulders.

All three wizards walked out of the bar and into the middle of the street before Apparating away to Severus' small farm on the west side of the island.

It really wasn't a farm, it was still just a patch of wild tropical jungle that Severus had not gotten around to clearing yet. There were spots north and south of Severus' two acres that were plains of black lava sparsely dotted with low scrubby plants. Even though the lava flows were from a volcano eruption a mere hundred years ago, the land was still recovering. Before purchasing this piece of land, Severus was warned that this was an active part of the island where lava flows often reached the sea, as the island continued to build itself. Severus' farm would have plants that would be easily replaced, as he kept his rarer plants in his own home garden. Should there be a lava flow through his property, it would be easy to replant.

In the dark, Severus heard Jerry call out, "You over there?"

Severus held his wand alight and said, "Lumos."

Jerry found his way over to the clearing where Severus and Draco were waiting.

The waning gibbous moon had just risen in the east and cast its pale light on the three gathered. The nearest neighbor was a hermit a couple of miles away. There was little chance of anyone seeing Jerry cast his Patronus, he hoped.

"I need you both to make a wand oath you won't tell anyone what my Patronus is." Even in the pale moonlight, Jerry was looking quite grave.

Severus and Draco held their wands aloft and swore to not reveal it, no matter what it might be.
Jerry held his wand up and said with conviction, "Expecto Patronum!"

Out of the tip of Jerry's wand a bright light issued forth that grew larger and larger until revealing its final form.

"A dragon?" Draco said in shock.

There stood a silvery Swedish Short-Snout dragon Patronus, all twenty feet of it.

Draco staggered back and smiled, laughing, "Why on earth are you afraid to let anyone know? I mean, the former Headmaster of Hogwarts had a phoenix for a Patronus, and a real phoenix as a familiar."

In the bright silvery light of the dragon Patronus, Severus watched Jerry's face and understood. "You're an Animagus." The elaborate dragon tattoo on Jerry's arm made much more sense to him now.

Jerry dropped his wand and his Patronus dissolved into a silvery fog that dissipated. Spinning around, he held his wand up in a threatening manner and growled, "You can't tell anyone!"

"Does Mouna know?" Severus asked. Of course Mouna knew. Mouna gave Jerry Veritaserum while processing his request for sanctuary, and Jerry had spilled all his secrets to him.

"Yes." Jerry hung his head down.

Draco still didn't understand the gravity of the situation, but he could tell Severus was grasping it. "How did you know, Severus?" Draco asked.

"Because Animagi are rare enough, but an Animagus of a magical creature? Very rare." Severus knew immediately, because Minerva was an Animagus who transformed into a cat, which was also her Patronus. "What did they do to you?" Severus knew that there was some reason why Jerry was secretive about his Patronus. If it ever got out that Jerry was an Animagus as well, people would obviously make the connection, since an Animagus form and Patronuses always matched.
"The U.S. Department of Magic ordered me to transform, then snipped a little bit of everything from me: claw, scale, horn. Turns out that none of what they took from me had any of the magical properties they were hoping for. Just plain old human wizard bits. And when they weren't happy with that, they cut me open with not quite enough painkillers to take samples, just to be sure they claimed. I refused, but they said if I didn't cooperate in the name of 'research', I might not have the grades in order to finish Auror training. And I wanted to be a cop, just like my big brother, Vince, more than anything."

Jerry looked up at the starry night sky, tears nearly brimming his eyes, anger seething just beneath the surface. His voice slightly quivered when he added, "I could have stayed in New York and taken my lumps gladly for pulling that stunt on live TV to oust those corrupt Justice Department fuckers. I could have let them strip me of my badge, but I could not have them make me disappear so they could cast an Imperius on me again, force me to transform, and carve me up like some Thanksgiving turkey. Because they were so pissed, I don't doubt they'd have done that to me. That's why I came here for sanctuary. That's why I lost my career."

Severus held up his wand and said solemnly, "I swear to never reveal that you are an Animagus or that your Patronus is a dragon." Draco held his wand aloft and repeated the same words with equal conviction. Both their wands glowed and then dimmed a second time.

"Thanks, guys," Jerry said with relief, putting his wand away. "You are handling this a lot better than Arnold. That's another reason why we broke up. I made him take a wand oath today to not tell, then I told him. He said if I loved him, I would transform and he would just take a little bit for experimentation, saying that the people at the Department of Magical Creatures in New York didn't know how to test it properly." Shaking his head, he said with disgust, "Fucking slime-ball, piece of shit, manipulative, cock-sucking asshat, twat waffle. I should have known."

Draco stepped up to Jerry and clapped him on the back. "Well, it isn't a completely cocked-up day. You got the job."

Chapter End Notes

Thank you to my betas, JuneW and Hope. You guys are awesome.

If you forget the photo that was taken from Draco and Ginny's wedding including Severus, here's the link to the "photo" from Chapter 75: http://atdlheabetz.tumblr.com/post/146318921950/anniversary-song-sung-by-david-cassel-the-ukulele
Art work by Deea: http://deevalov3.deviantart.com/art/Commission-estump-565122246
First snow for Chicago in 2004 was November 24th, but I wanted to drive the point that Pat wanted to get the fuck out of that town since it was before Halloween and snow had already fallen, October 30th being the average date for first snowfalls for Chicago. However, on September 25 in both 1928 and 1942, first seasonal snowfall has been recorded.

In England, a popular holiday cocktail from the 1970's was one called "Snowball." It supposedly has had a nostalgic resurgence in England. You can read about the recipe, which is lemonade mixed with Advocaat, and origins here: http://www.dailymail.co.uk/tvshowbiz/article-506196/Sales-advocaat-rise-40-cent-Nigella-declares-Snowballs-THE-drink-Christmas.html

In a plant catalog specializing in hoyas I had many years ago, the nursery owner wrote about the viability of hoya seeds being less than a week, and in some rare instances, less than a day. I'm sorry I don't have the catalog anymore, so I do not have the source of that information to share with you.

If you can't envision Baroque classical music played ragtime style, then I recommend you watch the YouTube video "Back Played in Lewd C Major" here: http://youtu.be/gPl_8tDkArM

In the 2004-2005 season A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum was playing at the Diamond Head Theater in Honolulu.

The Producers played at London's Drury Lane Theatre from 2004 to 2007.

A plongeur is a French kitchen term for a dishwasher/trash boy who might also help with some of the simple kitchen prep. But if you have seen the movie Ratatouille, you would know this.

If you want to see a performance of Verdi's Anvil Chorus, if you can't quite recall the tune, here is a Hungarian State Opera house production, complete with anvils on stage, set to start at the same point the band strikes up and Jerry sings, up until the 1:37 mark: http://youtu.be/yjMHCzoneuM?t=1m4s

"Chi del gitano i giorni abbella?
La zingarella!"
Translation:
"Who turns the Gypsy's day from gloom to brightest sunshine?
His lovely Gypsy maid!"

If you want to see the sort of Rube Goldberg-inspired contraption Jerry Transfigured, you can get a similar feel with the one that they have out in front of The Tech Museum of Innovation in San Jose. Here is a 1:30 minute video of it in action:
http://youtu.be/Jh3AG8Xlh_U
Chapter Ninety-Eight
"Facing Fears"

Disclaimer: Two stories diverged in written form,
And sorry I could not claim them both
And be one author, long I stood
And looked down one as far as I could
To where it bent in fandom AU;
Then read the other, as written by Rowling,
...
Two stories diverged in canon, and I –
I wrote the one less read by,
And that has made me no monies.

A/N: Disclaimer a parody of "The Road Not Taken" by Robert Frost.

Hermione got an urgent Floo call in the late morning on Halloween while over at Albert's doing her weekend apprentice work. Ron said he was taking Lavender to St. Mungo's since she was starting to get contractions. Having had several ex-sister-in-law's go through the same thing, Hermione figured she would have several hours before the baby arrived. It was quite a shock to both Hermione and Albert that Ron's head appeared in the fireplace while they broke for lunch, with the news Lavender had delivered a baby girl.

Albert promised to visit Lavender tomorrow. Hermione stated she would come over in a few hours as she had to finish helping Albert set the garden for a long winter's rest, trimming up the last of the brush and roses and raking up the last of the fallen leaves.
After swinging by her flat for a quick shower, as dragging garden dirt into St. Mungo's was just not good form, Hermione arrived and headed off to see the newest member of the Weasley clan. She brought some flowers which Marf had picked up while she was freshening up; Lavender was Marf's boss, too.

Hermione could hear them before she could see them. Rounding the corner, she saw many Weasley family members spilling out into the hallway, chatting excitedly. One of the staff was glaring daggers at them, shushing them as he passed by the sea of redheads.

When Hermione arrived, all the chatter in the hallway stopped. Charlie, who looked like he was fully recovered from the ice pox, was there with his wife, Angelina, and their children, along with Fred, his wife, Grace, and their three children. Percy and Penelope and their brood were there as well.

Fred came over and gave Hermione a hug, while Grace smiled and nodded, as she was rather busy wrangling their children. Charlie, Percy, and Penelope glared at Hermione, as if she was an unwanted interloper. Angelina held no grudge against Hermione and shrugged sheepishly, wanting to give her ex-sister-in-law a hug, but not wanting to get into yet another fight with her husband over the topic of Ron's divorce.

Fred put an arm around Hermione and guided her into Lavender's hospital room. Leaning over, he said quietly, "Your timing is perfect. You just missed Mum. Unfortunately, George had to leave, too."

"And was she all right today?" Hermione asking, her tone questioning her ex-mother-in-law's mental stability.

"Over the moon that Ron's 'real' wife has finally given him a child."

Hermione gave him an incredulous look. "Real? As if I was some imaginary or hallucination-induced wife she coerced her son to marry?"

"Right now we're all just a bit relieved she's finally come to accept Lavender is his wife, though she's still a bit twitchy at times," Fred confessed.

Hermione really didn't care what Molly thought any more, and she felt a bit of schadenfreude that Molly was still a bit unhinged.
Inside the room, she saw Bill, Fleur, and their gaggle of children surrounding Lavender's bed. She also saw George's wife, Florence, and their children who had stayed behind.

The new mother was sitting up in bed, her daughter in her arms. Ron, who was sitting in a chair, rose and gave Hermione a big hug.

"Congratulations, Ron. I'm so happy for you both," Hermione said with sincerity from the bottom of her heart. She handed Ron the bouquet of daisies, wood sorrel, and peach roses. The combination symbolized innocence, maternal tenderness, and joy; the roses' color was symbolic for 'congratulations.'

Ron was smiling down at Hermione, his eyes crinkling at the corners when he was just elated with joy. "Thank you. She's the most beautiful thing I've ever seen."

Bill gave Hermione a brief hug before making room for her to come sit by Lavender's bedside.

Lavender looked over at Hermione, a grin plastered to her face, looking quite exhausted, but thrilled. And still, despite just giving birth, she didn't have a single hair out of place, or her make-up smudged. Hermione wondered if she kept those beauty charms in place even while she slept.

Lavender reached out her one free hand that wasn't busy cradling Josephine in her arms and stretched it out towards Hermione. Hermione grabbed her friend's hand and squeezed. They both looked at each other and burst into tears.

"Would you like to hold her?" Lavender asked, once their tears died down and they laughed at the contagiousness of hormones permeating the room.

Even Ron wiped away a stray tear, moaning softly under his breath, "Bloody hell," before conjuring a vase for the flowers.

Hermione nodded and rose, taking Josephine into her arms with great care and settling her into her arms. "She's lovely, just like her mother."

That comment sent Lavender into a fresh wave of tears.
Compared to that time Hermione was at St. Mungo's when Fleur gave birth to her last child, Eric, the feeling was much different. It was not overbearing, nor did Hermione feel claustrophobic. Instead she felt at ease and without expectations. Without the pressure from Molly, she could relax and enjoy this moment instead of wanting to run away from it, dreading she might catch pregnancy as if it were an air-born communicable disease.

Hermione began to rock the babe in her arms. "Hello, Josephine. It's so very nice to finally meet you."

Josephine had the faintest hint of black hair on her head. Like many of the next generation of Weasley children, it would fall out and soon be replaced with red, blonde, or full dark locks.

The thought crossed her mind of herself maybe sitting in a hospital bed someday, cradling a small infant in her arms while Severus beamed with joy. Hermione suddenly didn't find the prospect of having children such a frightening and daunting prospect, if Severus was the father. Of course, they had never discussed children, much less marriage. She hoped maybe in time Severus would be open to the idea of children, if he currently wasn't. There was much they had to discuss regarding their future together, and talking about them in a one-sided Pensieve conversation or a lengthy letter was no way to broach such an important topic.

As much as Hermione said it would be very difficult to leave Severus, should she come to visit Malu Palekaiko before she was done with her apprenticeship, it was harder than not seeing him at all except in photos and Lavender's borrowed Pensieve. Perhaps in the spring, after Ginny had her baby, Hermione could visit. She would have to discuss it with Albert and Lavender at a much later time.

Hermione sat there rocking Josephine, who had fallen asleep in her arms, when Bill asked about her work and an update on her apprenticeship. Michael and Philippe were thrilled to see their auntie, and brought her up to speed on all the things they had learned and done since the last time she saw them, back on New Year's Eve. Michael was a natural garden de-gnomer, and five-year-old Philippe had displayed his first signs of magic.

Eventually, all the rest of the Weasley men and their families bid farewell to their littlest brother and his wife, congratulating them once again on the birth of Josephine. Once they were gone, it was just mother, father, daughter, and Hermione left in the room. Hermione heard one of the Healers walk by the room and sigh with exasperation, "Oh, thank God, they're finally gone."

There was a lengthy silence as Ron and Lavender watched Hermione cradle Josephine in her arms.
With great awkwardness, Ron began trying to put into words a question he never thought he'd ever ask. "So, you and Snape: Are you two planning on having kids one day?"

Ron's question was in no way delivered with the same pressure or harping his mother had done when they were married. It was just a question meant to satisfy his curiosity. There was nothing derogatory in the way he said it, as if Snape was just another common wizard. It was delivered with simple sincerity.

Suddenly, Hermione felt the tears brimming at her eyes. Hearing Ron ask the question changed it from some abstract thought she entertained into a burning need to know herself.

She had wanted to ask Severus that very same question for months now. There was still so much to say to each other. The gaping hole in her heart ripped open anew, feeling as fresh as the day Severus Portkeyed away out of her life.

Shaking her head, she held up Josephine for Ron to take from her, before she crumpled upon herself. Sobbing, she choked out, "I don't know. There were a lot of things we were supposed to talk about, but didn't." She didn't have to explain to them why things were left unsaid.

Lavender held out her hand once more, this time in support, tears falling in silent sympathy for her friend. Hermione took her hand gratefully, thankful there was someone who could understand her heartbreak.

"Maybe after I come back from maternity leave, we can arrange some time for you to go see him. It'll also give you a chance to check up on the construction and report back to me," Lavender offered.

Hermione lifted her head up. Through hopeful tear-streaked eyes, she said, "I was going to ask for the same thing, but I was going to wait until after you came back from maternity leave and things settled down. Maybe in the spring." Hermione laughed a bit over the fact they had both thought the same thing, and that now her heart didn't feel quite so heavy.

As long as the Fates didn't pull another cruel stunt, Hermione hoped to see Severus in April. If Hermione could survive a whole eleven months without Severus, though at times she thought she could not make it another night being parted from him, she could last five more months.

~~~~~~~*~
Severus finally had his old frock coat and trousers altered to fit him properly once again, given how he’d gained a little in the shoulder and chest with swimming, and lost a couple inches from his waist. It was a pity his first chance to wear them was for a funeral.

Matt, the surfing Muggle with the two-seater surrey bicycle – who had helped Severus go home after coming down with the ice pox – had passed away of a heart attack at the relatively young age of fifty-two.

Janine, who was once a nurse, was Side-Along Apparated over to the house by Lorraine, Matt’s wife. Janine had attempted CPR on him, but he did not respond. An emergency Portkey created by Halulu transported Matt over to a hospital in Honolulu. Unfortunately, the Muggle doctors could not revive him either.

Even in Sanctuary, some magical laws still applied. Using magic to heal Muggles was one law which could not be broken, even though there had been a few who came to Malu Palekaiko seeking sanctuary for breaking such a law.

Severus Apparated over to the cemetery on the west side of the island. It was located about four miles north of his farm. Ginny and Draco took a Portkey, since Ginny could not risk splinching herself in her condition.

A great number of Malu Palekaiko's residents had turned up for the funeral. Lorraine, Matt's widow, decided to hold the memorial service graveside.

While Matt was not a member of the town council, he was known by many, helpful, well-liked and one of the teachers at Muggle Camp. Many of his current and former students had shown up to his funeral to pay their respects to their beloved teacher. He was the only resident Muggle on the island who surfed, and was the very same surfer Severus saw surfing with Shark the first time he flew around the island Christmas Day.

Severus reflected on his own teaching career. He knew no former Hogwarts students, apart from Hermione, Draco, Ginny, and Lavender, would miss or mourn him if he had died.

As for the current students he tutored, he was treated and regarded much differently. His students here greeted him with a warm and respectful hello on the street, sometimes approaching him outside of his shop for a bit of advice to finish their homework on a part they were stuck on, then thanked him when he was done explaining. Even he noticed how much more patient he was with his students in Malu Palekaiko versus back at Hogwarts.
There was much to say about the environment affecting one's mood. Also, not being shackled to a position out of a debt to Dumbledore was a large factor. He tutored here out of choice, not obligation and guilt.

During one point in the service, some of Matt's students stood up and sang a Hawaiian song of farewell, sometimes performed at funerals. It brought a tear to Severus' eye, which he wiped away. The song was filled with the same sense of loss as that Scottish ballad that wizard in the ratty tartan and Tam o'shanter sang at the Hog's Head.

At the wake, there was a large selection of food, though people really didn't eat much. Grief is not conducive to a hearty appetite. Severus had brought a tray of Brie with assorted crackers.

There was a casserole Severus recognized as a donation from Tina and Manny. While Severus had been recovering from the ice pox, one of Tina's Muggle cousins – the same one he met at the wedding, with the chemical orange bouffant hairdo – delivered a casserole to his house, hoping to help provide him some food so he didn't have to cook that much while recuperating. It was the same chicken and green bean mishmash in some gloopy cream sauce he was given. No doubt, a family recipe. While he'd gratefully eaten the one given to him by Tina's cousin, too exhausted to cook while recovering from ice pox, he now avoided the beige and green melange at the wake.

Severus would have normally been happy to delve into the tray of lumpia or try some of the hummus with Afghan bread, but his appetite was lacking like the rest of the attendees.

The former spy had dealt with enough death during the war to fill too many lifetimes. Even after the war, so many of his former classmates and students, many of them Death Eaters, had wasted away in Azkaban, been given a Dementor's kiss, committed suicide, or starved to death; or were killed by Alan Parker's hand. Even those he knew who died and weren't Death Eaters, many of them died by the wand of a Death Eater, including his and Hermione's former co-worker, Marge Mallowton. All except Dumbledore, who passed away from old age, leaving this life to follow another grand adventure beyond the veil.

Sitting in the corner with a glass of cheap vinegary white wine in his hand, Severus was feeling quite pensive. There had been a great many things weighing on his mind as of late.

Since Jerry was hired, Draco had moved on and was now supervising the planning of the new Asia Pacific Headquarters of The Lovely Lavender Company. The blond wizard was exactly where he wanted to be in life. His name was cleared, he was living in a beautiful place, married to Ginny with a child on his way, and working at a job he was much happier at than tutoring. Everything was as it should be for him.
But Severus, though much happier and more fulfilled, was still not where he wanted to be. He was still torn between two places: his home in Malu Palekaiko and by Hermione's side, as she was still back in England.

The words of Jerry's former partner and girlfriend spoken in the alley still rung in his head.

'What are you? A coward?'

Severus was scared of going back to England. He had suffered and fought too long to escape. He thought he'd never have a reason to return, but when he made his vow, he didn't count on Hermione coming into his life and turning his head, heart, and life upside down, and for the better.

He was no coward. Not anymore.

With Hermione's near-death back in July, and with Matt's sudden death, Severus realized life was too short and precious to let some irrational fear keep him away from his love. Draco had gone back to England and had not been thrown into Azkaban. Draco had returned. Severus could go to England and no longer be in fear of his former prison.

He was not like Jerry, where the authorities would eviscerate him and chop him into little bits for vengeful experimentation if they got their hands on him. Jerry couldn't go back home to New York for fear of his life. Severus was in no such danger, especially since Alan Parker had been caught and convicted, thanks to Potter.

Hermione had said in her latest scroll she'd penned in India her therapist, James Hoover, was helping her confront her fears, to identify them, to overcome them. Severus decided it was time he did the same.

At Matt's wake, Severus made a vow to return to England to see Hermione before she finished her apprenticeship. Severus could not wait another year or more for Hermione to finish learning her last two languages, Japanese and Chinese, to see her in person.

Of course, mastering Latin first had made learning Spanish a whole lot easier. Hermione had aced all parts of her language test, written and spoken. The brewing portion and text interpretation with hidden hints went off without a hitch. Severus had told her, during their months together, about some aspects of the Spanish language in Potions, given it was a second language he grew up
She remembered these little slivers of information he would impart as they sat on the settee reading sections of books to each other, or while he sautéed and she chopped in the kitchen, or as they lay in bed after making love when the conversation moved from tender sweet nothings into something more academic. They were gems of information which applied not only to Spanish, but to other languages he knew, since many tips and tricks were shared across many languages.

Albert would have taken her out to dinner Sunday to celebrate, once she finished all her Spanish tests, but she had to take a raincheck. There was another meal with friends she promised that she had been putting off for a while. Since she had lunch with the twins, she figured it was time to make good on her other promise.

A quick trip home allowed Hermione to clean up and change into something more fashionable, but not too formal.

Apparating to the front garden gate, Hermione saw the formal ironwork matched the formal garden in the front yard. It was very classically English in the neatly clipped arrangement of boxwoods, yews, shrubs, and roses in geometric topiaries, borders, and hedges.

Knocking on the door, Hermione smiled when she saw her old friend. "Viktor, it is so good to see you."

"Come in, come in!" Viktor welcomed her, giving her a brief hug.

"Anne is in the kitchen, insisting she show off some of her cooking skills she has been trying to master," Viktor said in a way that was equal parts pride in his wife's efforts and part warning that Hermione should not expect anything to be very edible.

"No house-elves?" Hermione asked, half-jokingly.

"Ve pay them. Some of you did rub off on me after all." Viktor clearly remembered Hermione's work starting S.P.E.W. and his own reluctance to join. "But Anne gave them the night off so she would not be tempted to cheat and use them in a panic," Viktor confided in her.

"Well, I'm sure whatever she fixes will be wonderful," Hermione diplomatically replied, trying to be a good guest and assuage his fears they'd be eating over-salted burnt mystery meat.

"Hermione!" Anne trilled from across the parlor. She had just removed her apron and glided across the room to give her husband's dear friend a warm welcome. "I'm so glad you could make time in your busy schedule and finally have dinner with us."

There were a good many reasons why Hermione had taken so long to come over for dinner. Many of them good, and some not so good. They didn't bother to list any of those reasons, for it would have been too obvious.

"Thank you. I got your flowers after I got home from St. Mungo's," Hermione said, acknowledging one of the reasons she had not come to dinner before that night.

Viktor said quite somberly, "Vee are both glad you are okay now. But tell us, vhat have you been up to recently?"

Hermione accepted the aperitif Anne offered her and sat down on the plush overstuffed couch in the grand parlor where Anne led her. Viktor also accepted a drink from his wife before she poured one for herself.

"I just took my Spanish test today and now officially have completed three of the five languages required to be a Potions mistress," she announced with some pride in her accomplishment.

"A toast! May the last two be easier than the first three," Viktor said.

"Hear, hear! Cheers," Anne chimed in, raising her own aperitif before they all took a sip. "So what two languages do you have left?"

"Chinese and Japanese." Hermione gave a great sigh, knowing these were going to be the most difficult to master. Greek, Latin, and Spanish all had Indo-European roots. Chinese and Japanese were language systems she was completely unfamiliar with; they would involve new grammatical rules and characters, and learning to read up and down instead of left to right.

"If you master Chinese, then it will be far easier for you to master Hungarian, should you learn that language eventually," Viktor volunteered.
"That's right," Hermione said. "The Mongol hordes did get that far, to the gates of Europe if I remember correctly."

"Yes, they did." Viktor leaned back in his seat, and began to reminisce. "A few of my classmates at Durmstrang were from Hungary. They taught me a few spells in Hungarian and some of their country's history."

They talked a little bit more about languages until Hermione said, "Oh, I almost forgot. Lavender just had her baby two weeks ago."

Hermione noticed that Anne's eyes darted away nervously for a moment before she composed herself. Hermione figured that the topic of children was possibly a contentious subject in the Krum household at the moment, and she dropped the subject to avoid any further possibility of discord.

There was a small chime off in the kitchen, and Anne excused herself, stating that dinner would be served up shortly.

Once she was gone from the room, Viktor slowly shook his head. "It is still so strange to me, this arrangement you have with Lavender. Is this something that is common with Muggles? An ex-wife and the new wife such good friends? One working for the other?"

"No Viktor, it is very uncommon, wizarding or Muggle world. It's just one of those things that worked out this way. But I am happy for Ron and Lavender," Hermione insisted. "Ron and I just were not meant to be. Also, Ron and Lavender seem quite suited for one another in a way Ron and I never were."

Glancing over her shoulder to the door where Anne had just disappeared, she asked, "And how are you and Anne doing with married life? Well suited?"

Viktor smiled dreamily. "Very well."

Anne returned and announced that dinner was served.

Hermione would not say that Anne was a terrible cook, but she was no three-star Michelin chef either. Nothing was burnt or too salty, though the rabbit had far too much sage. Luckily the sauce helped cover that sin, but the sage still came through rather strong. The choice of wine did help wash down the flavor of sage which now permeated Hermione's sense of smell and taste. Having a trained nose made one especially sensitive to overused ingredients. But she was a gracious guest and smiled, complementing the cook on her efforts.

Conversation was pleasant, and Hermione wondered why she hadn't set aside a Sunday night earlier to have dinner with the Krums.

"So, Her-my-knee. Vhen you owled me back I vas surprised to learn you have moved," Viktor said.

"Yes, after my divorce with Ron, I moved into a fourth-floor flat in the Red Ginseng, on Le Soleil Levant Mews."

Hermione's and Viktor's heads snapped to look at Anne when she dropped her silverware. The silver clattered and clanged when it made contact with the fine china on which the Lapin a la moutarde was served.

After a faltering meek smile and an apology for her clumsiness, Anne picked up her silverware with as much aplomb as she could muster and asked, "Really. How is your new flat? Do you like it there?"

Hermione heard the slight quiver in Anne's voice. She guessed Anne was trying to mask the quiver by pretending to cough and clear her throat with a large swig of wine. Hermione not only recognized that habit of drinking wine to mask the truth, or to blunt it, but in her mind the rest of the pieces in the jigsaw puzzle now neatly fit together into a picture.

At the Krums' wedding Anne avoided the table where Lavender was seated. In fact, Lavender and Ron were seated in the corner as far away from the head table as possible. The way Anne looked away nervously when she mentioned Lavender having her baby. And just now when Hermione mentioned where her new apartment was.

It all made sense.

There was a flash of understanding that crossed Hermione's face for a fleeting moment. Anne's eyes went wide with panic, pleading with Hermione.
"If you'll excuse me for a moment," Hermione said as calmly as possible. "Where is the toilet?"

Viktor pointed the way, oblivious to the fact his wife had turned as pale as the ghost that haunted their garden shed behind the house.

Rising from her seat, Hermione forced her legs to move and not shake. Her knees felt weak and would buckle out from under her at any moment.

Once Hermione reached the door to the bathroom, she just leaned against the doorjamb, happy to find something to hold her up.

Anne smiled sweetly to her husband. "I think I'll make sure she can find it," she said to excuse herself from the table. Then she disappeared around the corner from sight and down the hall.

Hermione stood there, her mind a flurry of roiling emotions and jealousy. She felt sick to her stomach.

She nearly jumped out of her skin when Anne came up behind her and whispered, "Please don't tell Viktor."

Spinning around, Anne's face was fraught with worry her marriage to Viktor would be in jeopardy if he found out.

"When did you last see him?" Hermione asked, both knowing who she meant. Ginny had told Hermione that Draco had gotten rid of his shagging clients long ago, and Anne's reaction told her exactly who at the Red Ginseng she used to visit. It wasn't Blaise either.

"About a month before Viktor proposed, end of September. It was when I realized things were serious between Viktor and me that I stopped going."

Hermione wanted to run to the toilet and vomit back up the rabbit that –she now knew – was cooked by one of the witches Severus was fucking for money, at the same time he and Hermione were carrying on their affair.
Stumbling into the bathroom, Hermione sat down on the Louis XV chair upholstered to match the exquisite custom décor of the room. She tried to calm her stomach by will alone.

"You don't have to worry. I won't say a thing," Hermione assured her as she tried valiantly to make sure she didn't regurgitate her dinner all over Anne's designer shoes.

What could Hermione say without damning herself in the process. Anne already figured out they had some sort of shared experience through a mutual third party. The look on Hermione's face and her reaction told her as much.

"Thank you," Mrs. Krum breathed with relief as she came in and shut the door behind her. "Is that how you found him? Working for Lavender? When you arranged your apprenticeship with her and Albert? Are you and he living together?" Anne had selected his gigolo name of Bob and never knew Severus' real name.

Hermione shook her head. "He moved out before I moved in."

There was a taut thread of silence that stretched between them, neither sure what to say without giving away or assuming too much.

Anne confessed, "I went to him before I knew Viktor, because I was tired of dating guys who would then just go to the gossip rags and tell them everything, while getting paid to spill our most private bedroom secrets. I just wanted to have sex without worrying about some guy using me or blackmailing me again. This was why I saw him. I was the one in control and wouldn't have to worry about him saying anything to anyone. He couldn't hurt me."

Hearing why Anne went to Severus didn't make it any less painful. In fact, knowing Anne's sole purpose for seeing Severus was for sex made it hurt more. Severus had proclaimed with his most fervent sincerity that Hermione was the most beautiful person in the world to him, but how could she compare to Anne? Just visualizing Severus making love – no, fucking her perfect body – made the bile in her throat rise up.

"Towards the end, I think he was just getting bored with me, just like all the other guys who used me got bored with me before they hurt me. Maybe it was good I stopped seeing him before he could hurt me, though Lavender assured me discretion was guaranteed." Anne sighed and sat on the other chair that matched the one Hermione was sitting on across from her. "Something changed over that summer last year. He lost all interest. He pretended otherwise, but I could tell something changed."
Now Anne knew for certain that her Bob did not call her "my peony" that one time he shagged her rotten, but actually called out Hermione's name instead. She could have mentioned it, but correctly surmised hearing about the incident would not make her dinner guest feel any better.

Hermione's heart should have soared with the news Severus had lost interest in a witch like Lady Anne and her stunning beauty, preferring the company of a plain Gryffindor, but it was of little consolation knowing what Anne and Severus did now. Severus had tried to protect Hermione from the truth when she asked about the other witches he slept with, and now she fully understood why. The heartbreak and surge of jealousy was close to unbearable. Whatever jealousy Hermione felt towards Anne had ebbed somewhat with her confession Severus was growing bored with her before she stopped seeing him, but not entirely.

Something had changed over the summer for Severus, and that something was him falling in love with Hermione. She knew this.

"Did he hurt you?" Anne asked.

Hermione merely shook her head as she reached for a tissue that Anne offered her.

She wanted to tell Anne about how Severus was no longer a gigolo, that he was happy and free with his name cleared, that he owned a little Potions shop in Hawaii, and that they were madly in love with each other, but she couldn't share any of it with Anne.

Hermione could not let Anne know who her gigolo was. Severus always wore his mask for all his clients to hide his identity, but never for Hermione after that fateful night of her anniversary dinner with Ron. Hermione would keep his anonymity for him, even though it was likely Severus would never set foot in England again. She would not betray Severus and his secret.

"No, he was kind," Hermione said, wiping away her tears. "Uncommonly so, when I needed some kindness in my darkest hour." And that was all Hermione said on the matter.

Anne helped Hermione put herself back together, providing her with some Lovely Lavender's Puffy Poof Eye Creme to make the swelling and redness around her eyes go away.

Walking back, chatting cheerily between each other more for show, Anne said to her husband, "She got a bit lost along the way. Took a wrong turn," to explain their prolonged absence.
Viktor knew how witches were regarding bathrooms. He shook his head and figured they were engaging in talk that witches can only do when they go to the toilet together in packs.

At the end of the evening in the drawing room, as they sipped Rakia, the Bulgarian equivalent to America's Bourbon, Anne said, "It's been very lovely having you over for dinner, Hermione. I hope you can come over to dinner more often. I can see why Viktor has cherished you as a dear friend all these years now, given I've had a chance to get to know you more." Anne smiled sweetly at Hermione.

Viktor patted his wife's hand, pleased these two witches had gotten on so wonderfully, looking like they were going to become fast friends. Anne didn't have a lot of real friends in the wizarding world. Most of those who tried to ingratiate themselves into Lady Anne Battenberg's world and sought to gain her friendship were attracted to her only for her fame, money, and ties to the Muggle royal family or to her husband. Viktor knew Hermione didn't care about any of that, and knew if she offered her friendship, it would be an honest and earnest gift.

"Yes, that would be lovely," Hermione accepted, though given her schedule, it may be only once every few months she could come visit.

Who knew how many more dinners she would have before she would leave England, once she finished her apprenticeship. And in Hawaii, she would never invite the Krums to visit. She would not inflict that upon Severus or Anne.

Chapter End Notes

At the time of this posting, I've received word that my mom, who has been in and out of the ICU since mid-August, might only have hours left. So if I don't post the next chapter next week, be patient, shit/life is happening and I may be busy.
"Confessions: Free with a Slice of Pie"

Chapter Summary

It's Thanksgiving, so Severus gets to learn about turkey, stuffing, heaping spoonfuls of guilt and hefty portions of emotional manipulation, a traditional Finau family specialty. Plus, proof why Luna is so awesome.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter Ninety-Nine
"Confessions: Free with a Slice of Pie"

Disclaimer: Ninety-nine stupid disclaimers I'll post,
Ninety-nine lame disclaimers
Rowling own this
I've mangled some bits
One-Hundred stupid disclaimers I'll post...

============

Normally, Severus would have been invited over to the Finaus' home for Thanksgiving, but given that Mounga's father, brother, his brother's wife and their two kids were coming for the American holiday, he was on his own.

He wasn't going to spend it alone anyway. Draco and Ginny invited him over. As Jerry was living in a rented house for now and he didn't want to spend it alone either, the Malfoys invited him over for Thanksgiving as well.

Since Thanksgiving was a foreign concept to the British witch and wizards, Jerry promised to cook and prepare all the fixings and introduce his boss, Severus, and the Malfoys to a proper traditional Thanksgiving feast. The Malfoys offered their home for the celebration.

Severus was drinking something called a Brandy Alexander, made with vanilla ice cream. It was a rich drink for such a tropical climate, but Jerry insisted that they try all the traditional things he grew up with in New York. Given that Jerry was Muggle-born, they were going to get the full Muggle American experience. The former Auror still had some friends in the Auror division in Los Angeles. Through them, Jerry was able to get a broadcast of a Muggle American football game to pipe in over one of the Wizarding Wireless stations. Jerry insisted it really needed to be experienced on a television to fully appreciate it. Severus and Draco didn't understand most of the terminology and had little desire to learn about it.

Ginny tried to help with the cooking, but Jerry only let her stay in the kitchen to observe. He insisted on doing all the cooking, since they were gracious enough to invite him. Even Draco took notes, since he had been continuing to expand his cooking repertoire.

Jerry had brought over a centerpiece he'd bought at the florist, since the Malfoys bought all the food, with a list given to them by the cook. The centerpiece was a pumpkin-tom turkey. A neck and head and tail feather arrangement were attached to the orange squash. The center of the pumpkin was carved out, and a flower arrangement of asters, mums, and carnations in autumn colors filled the display. Jerry charmed the turkey neck and head part of the centerpiece not to move like they were charmed to by the florist, since it wouldn't normally move in a Muggle household.

Around five o'clock Jerry announced dinner was ready. The table was laden with a bountiful spread. There was a beautifully roasted turkey with a dark golden hue indicating a crispy skin over succulent meat. There were mashed potatoes with gravy, sweet potatoes with tiny marshmallows dotting the top, stuffing with chestnuts, roasted small potatoes, roasted squash, glazed carrots, green bean casserole with a homemade mushroom sauce and almonds, roasted Brussels sprouts, jellied cranberry sauce, rolls and butter.

"My word. You eat this much every year?" Severus asked in astonishment, now understanding Lucius' remarks about Americans being so fat.

"No," Jerry said, "usually it's one or two starchy sides and one or two vegetable dishes. But since this is your first year, I thought I'd give you the chance to try all the classics, since I wasn't sure what you guys would like. Besides, there will be so many leftovers, you won't have to cook for a week," he added, looking over towards Ginny.

"That will be nice, thank you" Ginny replied.

"Please, sit," Jerry said.

Once seated, Ginny, Draco, and Severus started dishing up food, but noticed Jerry was waiting for something.
"Normally at this point, my family would say grace." Jerry knew that religion wasn't a big part of the wizarding community, but he grew up as a Catholic, and it was still part of his upbringing.

The three others stopped and folded their hands in their lap, willing to observe a traditional Thanksgiving the way Jerry experienced it.

Jerry folded his hand, bowed his head and closed his eyes. Out of rote, he recalled the words his mother used to say at every Easter, Thanksgiving and Christmas dinner growing up. "Bless us, oh Lord, and these Thy gifts for which we are about to receive through Thy gracious bounty." He paused and added, "And thank you for my father's safety, and the new home I have found here with good friends in Malu Palekaiko. Amen."

Ginny, Draco, and Severus could certainly agree with the last addition to Jerry's version of grace, and joined in with an "Amen" out of politeness.

"Dig in," he prompted his hosts and friends.

Like the community potlucks Severus had been to before, he took a little bit of everything that interested him and he still wound up with a teetering plate full of food. He would definitely have to swim his full mile tomorrow morning to work off all that he had eaten. Severus nearly groaned when Jerry announced there was pie as well, but he promised them all they could let dinner settle for a long while before it was served.

As they all sat in the living room, silently enjoying the view of the beautiful tranquil Japanese garden, pleasantly full from a wonderful dinner, Severus broke the calm by announcing, "I've decided I'm going to England to visit Hermione."

Draco looked shocked, more so than Ginny. "What?" he asked, his voice rising at the end. "But I thought you swore you'd never set foot there again, once we were free."

"You don't want me to go?" Severus asked, feeling a bit aggrieved as he frowned at his friend.

"No, no!" Draco corrected Severus' misinterpretation to his remark. "I think it's wonderful, I'm just surprised, that's all."
"When were you thinking of going?" Jerry asked.

"Leaving Christmas Eve and coming back right after the New Year."

Ginny was the one who now protested. "But you promised the Finaus you were coming over for Christmas dinner. Rainbow said the kids wanted to have a proper English Christmas dinner, and you already promised to make the plum pudding. The children will be so disappointed, but if that's when you want to go, Hermione will be thrilled to find you under her tree this year."

"I've already made the plum pudding, so I can just drop it by the week before Christmas. Besides, Ginny, you know how to properly unseat one from its mold and make a hard sauce. I have faith it will be perfectly authentic," he assured her.

Draco put his hand on the shoulder of his mentor and friend. "Severus, I am happy that you're going, but you can't go until Ginny and I deliver you your Christmas present. We've gone through a lot of work to schedule this to come in, and we had to make arrangements for it to be brought in from abroad. And unfortunately, it can't arrive before Christmas Eve."

"Well, I intend on leaving Christmas Eve morning, since it will already be Christmas Eve night in London by the time I arrive by Portkey. Maybe it can wait until after I come back, if it's not here by morning," Severus said, not wanting to change his plans. He had mustered up the courage to finally go back, he didn't want to be delayed and have Fate possibly step in and keep them apart longer.

"Severus, we promise, you will get to see Hermione Christmas Eve, but our present to you is perishable and won't keep. It should come in in the morning, before nine. Just wait until you get it before you take off, promise?" Ginny gave Severus that same look she used when she wanted something from Draco. Of course it didn't work on him in the slightest, but he promised.

"Fine. And when you drop it off, I can give your wedding anniversary present. I would have liked to have given it to you for your wedding, but it took some time to find it and also I had to send abroad for it. You can give me my present, and I can give you yours before I go," Severus said, summarizing the itinerary.

It was all settled.

Just as Jerry started to suggest maybe it was time for coffee and pie, there was a knock on the door.
Draco got up to answer the door. All Severus could hope for was that it wasn't going to be another hostile visit like the one he'd endured when Lavender suddenly showed up on the Malfoys' doorstep and slapped him.

"Hi, Draco," Severus heard Akela say from the foyer. "Can we come in?"

Draco showed all three of the Finau children into the living room. All of them were looking quite somber, and Severus could tell that Kaimi had been crying.

"I was just saying it's time for dessert. You guys want to join us?" Jerry offered.

All three children nodded and shuffled off to the dining room.

"Do your parents know you're here?" Severus asked.

"I left a note for Papa telling him where we'd be. It'll be a while before he notices we're gone, since when we took off Papa, Grandpa, and my uncle were still yelling at each other," Akela informed him.

Severus had rarely heard Mounga raise his voice except to sing, but given his size, his booming voice and the sense of authority he gave off, Severus did not want to be on the end of that wizard's ire.

"Papa gets weird when he's around my uncle and grandpa," Iakona volunteered. "He is not himself."

"Well, no one can push buttons quite like family," Jerry said philosophically. Even Severus could agree with that, remembering how his parents would make him act in ways quite uncharacteristic to how others knew him.

"Well, what type of pie would you like?" Ginny offered. "Jerry made pumpkin, pecan, and apple."
The girls each asked for pumpkin while Iakona asked for pecan. All three of them took theirs a la mode.

As Severus bit into his own slice of pecan pie, having never tried it before, he nodded, liking the taste of it, noting the hint of maple flavor complementing the flavor of the nuts.

Out of the blue, Akela said, "I swear, I don't see how our father can be related to Uncle Papahi and Grandpa. They're both such assholes. And our cousins, what spoiled rotten little shits."

"Language, young lady," Severus warned her sternly, sounding very much like his professorial self from his days at Hogwarts.

"Why should I watch my language when few other words accurately describe them," Akela snipped.

"Ah, but you're young," Draco said jovially, a twinkle in his eye. "There is a whole vocabulary you have yet to be introduced to."

"Such as," Iakona prompted him.

"Such as, 'He has the effervescent charms of a troll with gastric distress and the warmth of a lamprey,'" Draco said with dramatic flair.

All three children bust up laughing at Draco's choice of words. The fact he said it with his British accent made it all the more funny to them.

"Or, 'With family like this, is it any wonder why someone invented the Obliviate spell. Being related to you, I would want to forget such a thing as well.'" Severus jumped in with a detached air of haughtiness. He'd decided this sort of word-play would cheer up the children and teach them alternative ways to voice this displeasure rather than resorting to vulgarities.

Akela and Iakona groaned with delight, knowing what a viscous, low blow Severus had dealt with his choice of words. They relished it, now contemplating if they could lay that insult on either their uncle or grandfather and not be grounded for over two weeks. For Akela and Iakona, even being grounded for just a week with extra chores would be worth it to see the look on either of their unwelcomed relatives' faces.
The two older children bantered about a few choice phrases of their own, until Kaimi said with great seriousness, "I wish Papa was an only child, and it was Grandpa that died, not Grandma." The Finau children never knew their grandmother, and only knew of her through stories from their father.

"I sometimes wish that too," Mounga said, suddenly appearing in the archway to the dining room.

There was a collective gasp as everyone suddenly noticed Mounga there, not knowing how long he had been observing their conversation.

"I hope you don't mind that I let myself in, Draco. Akela's letter said she took her siblings and herself over here," he explained for his barging in unannounced.

There was an awkward silence that was finally broken when Mounga walked into the dining room and sat down. "Your grandfather is taking a Portkey back home to North Dakota this instant, and Papahi and his family already went back to the hotel. They're leaving first thing in the morning."

There was a huge sigh of relief from all three of his children.

"Oh, thank God," Akela sighed dramatically with exasperation in a way only a teenager could.

Kaimi went over to her father and hugged him, and he hugged his youngest back. This only prompted Kaimi to start quietly crying with her head buried against her father's chest.

Severus was feeling quite uneasy being an observer at this private family moment.

"As a matter of fact," Mounga added, "I don't think we're ever going to spend another holiday with them ever again."

This was a source of great news to all three children. Akela and Iakona both rushed over to their father and hugged him fiercely, Kaimi now buried under one of her siblings in a group hug.
"If I may ask," Draco spoke, breaking the moment once he sensed the hugging part was done, "if your father and brother bring such discord to your family, why do you bother to invite them, or visit them?"

"It's a long story," Mounga said. His eyes discreetly glanced down towards Kaimi, indicating this was something she was still a bit too young to hear and understand.

Ginny stood and held her hand out. "Kaimi, how about I finish fitting you for your new belly dancing outfit. And then you can help me with ideas for decorating the baby's nursery."

Kaimi gave her father one last hug and went off with Ginny to another part of the house.

Mounga decided that Iakona was old enough to hear the tale. Akela had already heard part of it after she had her own outburst back in April, when her hormones were making her irrational and she called Severus an asshole.

Jerry offered Mounga a cup of coffee before he begun his tale.

Cradling the fresh cup of coffee in his hands, Mounga said, "I was not exactly the most well behaved teenager." He cast his eyes down and bit his lip nervously as he gave a chuckle at the irony of it, given he was the town judge. "After my mother died when I was twelve, things got more tense in the house growing up. Papahi was the perfect child who could do no wrong in my father's eyes, and at times my brother blamed me for things he did, though my father wouldn't believe me. My father was town judge at the time. And had you guys come to Malu Palekaiko when my father ran things around here, you would have found it a far different place."

Akela butted in with her own commentary. "Yeah, I've heard Grandpa was real strict, and tried to keep the Muggles segregated from being involved in the community."

"Yes," Mounga confirmed her assessment, "and he wouldn't even let them run for town council, unlike now."

"You changed that rule?" Severus asked, already knowing the answer.

"Yes. My father ran this island more like a penal colony. And if you two had come here back then," he said, looking at Draco and Severus, "he would have assigned you each to a one-acre lot on the far side of the island with a warning to not come into town unless you needed supplies. And you would have had to make your own shelter."

Ginny grabbed Draco's hand and squeezed it, suddenly realizing the island wasn't always the same warm and welcoming paradise that she and her husband had come to know.

Looking at Jerry, Mounga said, "And you, despite your noble and good intentions, would have been treated little better."

Mounga heaved a sigh. "Growing up here, there was little to do other than teenagers playing with potions to amuse themselves, lost in a fog of euphoria, or screw around. There used to be a lot of teenage pregnancies back then. And because there was no formal schooling, there was little chance to make something of one's self and get away. Just like some Muggle small towns, teenagers entertaining themselves with sex and drugs to fill the boredom of living in a town with little sense of community and nothing to do."

"Muggle camp, the festivals, summer Friday night movies – these were all your doing," Severus correctly surmised.

"Well, there has been an Oktoberfest and a Pele Festival around for decades, though both were much smaller and less inclusive, but yes. And admittance to all these community events for the underage population hinges now on if they behave, given that some kids need an incentive to keep on the straight and narrow."

"Something you, yourself, had trouble doing?" Draco asked succinctly.

Mounga rubbed his hand along the back of his meaty neck before taking a large sip of coffee. "Put it to you this way, if I'd had the opportunities to keep me busy and entertained, and incentives to keep my nose clean, I wouldn't have done half the shit I pulled as a teenager."

Now Severus was really interested in hearing the rest of the tale. Mounga was a pillar of the community who commanded a lot of respect, especially from the older inhabitants who had lived here a long time and most probably knew Mounga during his teenage years.

"Like," Jerry prodded, his own curiosity piqued.
Mounga looked at Iakona meaningfully before answering. "Like hopping on a broom at two in the morning and flying through the 24-hour drive through at Jack-in-the-Box fast-food restaurant in Honolulu, ordering a bunch of food over the intercom speaker and then watching the look on their faces when I pulled up to the drive-through window hovering on my broom."

Draco, Ginny, Iakona, and Akela burst into hysterics while Severus' eyes went wide with disbelief that Mounga was the sort of teenager to pull such a stunt.

Jerry's mouth fell open and his eyebrows furrowed, suddenly aggravated. "I hated doing clean-up when little shits pulled stunts like that back in New York. The violation of the International Statute of Wizarding Secrecy, the Memory Charms, the paperwork. Punks like you made my life hell!"

Mounga took another sip of coffee, looking repentant. "Yeah. I was bored and I wanted the attention from my father. I was also fascinated by Muggle culture, given that my father tried to keep it from 'tainting' our community. Needless to say, he tended to ignore how one of his own grandfathers was a Muggle-born."

"I didn't know Grandpa was biased against Muggle-borns," Akela said with sudden disdain.

"Not biased, but let's just say he viewed the Secrecy Statute as a means to exclude Muggle culture from wizarding society and island life, given how most Muggles are not privy to us." Mounga looked deep in thought as he added with a shake of his head, "He would not have let Matt be buried on the island. He would have forced Lorraine to go find a Muggle plot on another island."

A somberness stole over the room as they remembered the surfing Muggle's recent funeral.

"So what finally inspired you to fly the straight and narrow?" Severus asked, wondering what the impetus was to make Mounga change from who he was as a teenager into the wizard he was today.

"I ran away when I was fifteen," he admitted as he gave his eldest daughter a meaningful look.

Severus saw the look between them. He wondered if, back in April, Mounga had told her about this since she did not seem shocked at all, but Iakona, his son, was.

"Underage and on the run. Your father must have had a fit," Jerry said plainly with little sympathy.
"For starters," Mounga said, nodding his head as he became more reflective. "I made an illegal Portkey, went to Los Angeles, worked a bunch of different Muggle-type jobs, which I didn't seem to hold for more than a week, considering how unfamiliar I was with Muggle culture. Plus, I had to take off after I'd do something stupid, and then Aurors had to come in and clean up some mess I'd left behind when things would happen, even without the use of my wand."

Jerry shook his head with disgust. "We had a term for kids like you in the Auror Department in New York: Teen Trolls. Barge in, break everything, and leave a mess for everyone else to clean up."

"Oh, I am not denying I behaved terribly when I was younger, but at the time I thought it was a far more constructive way to keep myself busy. It was better than knocking up some teenage witch or losing myself in an endless haze of potions and elixirs. I Apparated into movie theaters and concerts, since I didn't have the money to pay, because I was in between jobs all the time. I even got to see the first Star Wars movie in 70-millimeter when it came out in 1977," he said with sudden great fondness.

Jerry, who was of the same generation as Mounga, gave an empathetic sigh, while the cultural significance and collective experience of the film on the rest of the company was lost.

"That's why I have movie nights in the summer, Muggle Camp, and the bands come in to play at Oktoberfest. I don't want kids pulling the same stunts I did out of sheer curiosity to go to Muggle events and cause trouble, then the thrill of getting away with it. And I've been trying for years to get the films for the first three Star Wars movies to screen them here, but no luck so far." Mounga heaved a troubled sigh of disappointment.

"Does the rest of the island know about your exploits?" Severus asked, wondering why Mounga was volunteering all this rather embarrassing information about his youthful follies.

"Oh, when I came back when I was seventeen, broke and without my wand, my father didn't literally pillory me, but he might as well have," Mounga said with a grave look on his face, remembering that time of his life. "Everyone on the island knew chapter and verse all of my misdeeds, since he put me up as an example of what happens when you let witches and wizards dabble with Muggle culture."

"Even Mom?" Akela asked.
"Your mother knows everything, and so does the rest of the island. My father made me stand up on the stage of the community center, drink a vial of Veritaserum, and confess my crimes, so he could show the whole town that not even his own screw-up of a son was beyond justice. He was going to make an example of me." There was a smile that curled at the corner of Mounga's lips, indicating that there was an interesting turn of events.

Severus and Draco both picked up on his sly smirk.

"I'm sensing that you weren't exactly locked away in the island's equivalent of Azkaban," Draco guessed.

"Yep. I knew my father would do something like that, so at the end of my confession in front of the whole town, I then said that I was willing to knuckle down with my studies for the next year, and take my SATs. If I didn't pass to go on to study law so that I could become a judge myself someday, then I would submit to any punishment he saw fit for my crimes."

Iakona sat back and whistled. "Whoa, Papa. You said that to Grandpa?"

Mounga gave a very self-satisfied smile. "Yes, and I got the distinct impression he didn't like the fact that not only did I pass, I passed with one of the top ten scores in the Western SAT Testing Division."

"What about compared to Mid-West and Eastern Divisions?" Akela asked.

"I was in the top-twenty when compared to Mid-West and Eastern Division scores."

Severus had become familiar with the testing and ranking scores of the U.S. National SAT ranking of scores, since he had become part of the Board of Governors for the new school they were building on the island. He was duly impressed by Mounga's admission, since over a thousand students took those tests each year nationwide.

"If you were so brilliant, why didn't you apply your great talents towards your studies from the beginning?" Severus arched his brow sardonically.

"Because my father had already said my brother was the brilliant one in the family and that I was the screw-up. At first, I merely lived up to his expectations and proved him right. But when I came back, I did everything I could to prove him wrong." Mounga pulled out his wand and Summoned the coffeepot so he could refill his cup before continuing.

Severus sat back and looked at Mounga in a slightly new light. Ever since his wife's death, Severus had tried to do everything to prove he was not the same stupid, foolish boy who had willingly taken the Dark Mark. "This is all very interesting. Very. But that still doesn't explain why you force your children to suffer the company of your father, brother and his family," Severus pointed out, trying to bring Mounga back to his original question.

"As I said, I did everything to prove my father wrong. And I did." Mounga smiled at his children, but it was bittersweet. "But despite me getting excellent test scores, going on to study law, do my time as a defense attorney and then a prosecutor, and finally coming back to Malu Palekaiko to become town judge, my father still wouldn't accept the fact I did turn my life around. He wouldn't admit that I could redeem myself, or that other people who came to this island after making mistakes in their life could redeem themselves and turn their lives around."

Iakona jumped in, understanding shining bright on his face, "Oh, so that explains why Grandpa said you turned this place into a freewheeling asylum run by the lunatics."

"Exactly. He thinks that once you have done wrong, you can't be redeemed."

Akela jumped in, "I still think you should have spiked Uncle Papahi's wine with Veritaserum, make him spill his guts about all the crap where he did things then blamed you."

"Yes, but at this point, what purpose would it serve, Akela?" Mounga reached across and put a large hand on his daughter's shoulder. "Sometimes we have to let go of the bitterness of the past. Besides, your grandfather would probably not acknowledge the misdeeds Papahi did. He would merely notice that I slipped my brother Veritaserum in order to embarrass him in front of his own family." Most everyone around the table snorted at the irony that Mounga was not spared that indignity with the berating he received from his own father in his own house, in front of his own family.

"To hold on to anger and resentment serves no one, not even those who have caused you your pain. They do not suffer, you do. That's part of my approach when people come here for sanctuary. Forgiveness, as long as they truly are sorry for whatever they have done to cause them to seek it here."

Sitting up and looking at Jerry, Mounga added, "Well, maybe not in your case Jerry. While you may have broken the law, I can fully back you up on your course of action since it was a rather last resort, and it did seem there was nothing else you could do to protect your father. And having him run away and close shop, it just means that others who would have taken over his shop would have continued to be hurt."

Jerry nodded very somberly in agreement, since he had searched every option and was left with only one moral course of action to take.

Turning back to Severus, Mounga said, "I have tried to prove to my father time and time again that I have become the upstanding citizen and model to the community he always admonished me to become, but he still sees the boy seeking love and attention from an emotionally distant father who played favorites between children. I now see, after the way he and my brother behaved tonight, and especially to Rainbow and my own children, nothing can ever change their minds. I forgive them, but I won't forget what they've done. So no more contact with them, no more holiday dinners filled with screaming and tears, no more visits to or from them. I love them; they are family, and I will always love them, but I do not like them."

Jerry raised his coffee mug and said, "Amen. You can pick your friends, but you can't pick your family."

Severus, Draco, and Ginny could all empathize with Jerry's assessment of family versus friends.

Iakona lifted his half-full glass of milk and said, "To the family we choose to have, not obligated to by blood."

Severus thought that was a very astute and wise thing for such a young wizard to say, and he lifted his own cup of coffee, having been chosen by Mounga's family to become a part of theirs. "To the family of our own choosing."

Everyone lifted their glasses and mugs and clinked them.

The mood had lightened considerably until Akela said, "Uncle Severus?"

Severus turned to acknowledge her with a raised brow as his mouth was busy sipping his coffee.

"I remember the morning after Papa had granted you sanctuary. I distinctly remember sitting at the table having breakfast when you walked in looking dog-tired," she recalled, turning to look at her father. "And you said, There, but before the grace of God, go I." Turning back to Severus she said, with great care to be respectful, "I know it's none of my business why you came and I'm not supposed to ask, but was my father's experience similar to yours?"

Severus' face became calmly impassive. His face was a blank canvas, and Akela slightly recoiled at the sight of all warmth draining from him with her question, as if he was a book that had closed.

Mounga, knowing Severus' whole history and seeing the discomfort his friend was feeling towards his daughter's question, decided to answer her question while honoring his oath to reveal nothing. "Akela, you know that it is up to Severus if he chooses to share any part of his past or why he came here. You know that you should not prompt him, as that is discourteous, but I can understand your wanting to understand what I said in context." Mounga's eyes flitted towards Severus' briefly before he looked back at his daughter's.

"Each person's journey is unique despite all of us coming to the same destination," Mounga continued. "Some of us reach the bounds of extremes before returning towards a safer path. My journey went in such a way that I practically eschewed all wizarding life and culture. But just as easily, had I some of the same experiences as Severus, I could have easily been drawn in other directions. His experiences are his own; they make him who he is, just as Draco's and Ginny's are their own, as well as Jerry's. One day they may share, or they may never. But if one day you grow up and stay here and become a town council member, and process those who seek sanctuary, then you will have to listen without judgment just as I have done, and as do Halulu and Gary."

Draco reached out and patted Akela's hand. "There are things I have done I am not proud of, but the fact is, I made my own mistakes when I was young, and then I grew up and moved past them. I realized they were the wrong choices – though in some ways I didn't have much of a choice," he added in a sotto voce voice. "You don't have to know our pasts to appreciate the people that we are now."

Akela turned to Severus and said, "I'm sorry for being nosy like that, Uncle Severus. It's just that phrase sort of stuck in my mind all this time and has been bugging me."

He could not begrudge the girl wanting to know more about his past in relation to that phrase, but would have preferred it if she had brought it up in private, especially without her brother or Jerry in the room.

"The matter is settled. Let's talk about something pleasant, like this New Year's Eve Ball Draco mentioned earlier," Severus said to change the topic, even though he wouldn't be around to attend it, instead looking forward to ringing in the New Year with Hermione, with champagne and lots of kissing.
Severus could have said something to Akela about curiosity killing the cat to stem her inquisitiveness, but decided the cold look he'd given her was warning enough not to broach the subject again.

Thinking of cats, he would have to make sure he asked Jerry to pack up the roasted turkey giblets that didn't get incorporated into the gravy, so he would have a treat for the cat back home.

Coming back into the greenhouse with the loppers slung over her shoulder after she'd finished trimming the fruit trees and maples for the winter, Hermione spotted the couple in a tender moment.

"Oh, I'm so sorry, I'll come back later," Hermione stammered. She tried to make a quick exit, embarrassed to have come across Neville and Luna snogging.

A few months after Hermione and Neville's regretful interlude, Neville and Luna had started dating again. There were a few times where the blatantly honest blonde witch had stopped by on Saturdays to bring her beau lunch and greeted Hermione, but Hermione still felt guilty over the moment of weakness in Neville's arms, and bed, and tried to remove herself from Luna's company as often as possible.

"Hermione, your timing is perfect. Neville and I were just about to go find you," Luna said with all the sincere sweetness that pervaded her personality.

"I was just going to drop off these loppers and then head home," she said, unable to look Luna in the eye.

"Hermione, there is nothing to be embarrassed about," Luna said plainly as she reached out to stop Hermione from practically throwing the loppers on the ground and bolting from their presence.

Hermione and Neville had been very professional with each other since that June evening, but the warmth and camaraderie that was once between them was lost, the void filled with a stilted awkwardness.

"I'm not embarrassed, though what I'm supposed to be embarrassed about, I'm not quite sure," she tried to say, but came out sounding more awkward.
Still holding onto Neville's hand, Luna grasped Hermione's with the other. "It's okay. Neville told me about you and him having sex last summer. And I'm fine with that. Neville and I were not together at the time, but Neville did tell me why he brought you into his bed."

Hermione had talked very openly about sex with Severus and even with Ginny somewhat, but Hermione was not exactly close to Luna, and here the blonde was discussing it with a frank manner as if it were a current event. In some ways, Luna's ability to talk about that which was difficult for others, including death and other somewhat taboo subjects with a clarity and unabashedness, is what made Hermione love Luna as a friend. She suddenly wished she spent more time to become better friends with Luna over the years, since she had an insight that was unparalleled and she was always honest.

Mustering the courage to get past his nervousness around Hermione, that had grown since that night together, Neville said, "Back in August I told Luna that I had tried to find something to fill the space in my heart left by her, and even though I tried to fill it with you, despite our friendship and what a lovely person you are, Hermione, you are still not her."

Luna squeezed Neville's hand and smiled up at him when she added, "So, in a way, if it wasn't for that time you were together, Neville would not have realized that he still loved me so deeply. Being a Gryffindor, he had the courage to come see me, and we had a long talk, even though I was the one to originally end our engagement."

Hermione didn't know what to say. Luna was saying that because Hermione and Neville fucked that they were now back together and that was supposed to be a good thing. Luna may have seen it as a good thing, but for Hermione, remembering sleeping with Neville only brought painful memories regarding herself and Severus, not to mention the tragedy of errors that came along afterwards tied to some assumptions and loose tongues.

"I don't know what to say," was all that Hermione could utter.

"Say you'll come to our wedding." Luna beamed brightly as she handed over an envelope with Hermione's name beautifully written on it.

Now Hermione felt truly awkward. Wasn't it bad form for past lovers to show up at a wedding? Though Hermione, Neville, and Luna had been friends for years, that one night had changed the dynamics of their friendship, at least in Hermione's eyes and Neville's.
"You want me there?" Hermione asked, still bewildered how Luna could be so cavalier about the fact that she had slept with her former and now again current fiancé.

"Even before, weren't we all good friends?" Luna asked as she stood between them, holding their hands once more, acting as a bridge between them, joining them all together. "All that we had been through together? School? The war? The rebuilding afterwards? You went to Ron's wedding after you divorced. Even Neville and I remained friends after I ended the engagement last time, but I've overcome some of my own fears and hesitations, realizing that they only stood in the way of my relationship with Neville. Don't let your own fears come between our friendship now, Hermione."

Hermione understood what Luna was saying and even wanted to embrace her philosophy, but still could not let go and put it entirely behind her. However, for Luna and Neville's happiness, she would try and put forth her best effort.

"Oh look, there's the Gumblesons," Luna said brightly as she pulled out another invitation from her patchwork satchel before trotting off and out of the greenhouse to deliver yet another wedding invitation by hand.

Left alone in the greenhouse together, the awkwardness between Hermione and Neville returned, but Neville's was far less than it was before, now that the air had been cleared.

Hermione decided that since this was a time for confessions, she should also clear the air a bit as well. "Ron knows about my own affair. He knows who it is."

Neville's face, which had been holding a nervous smile turned somber. "You said it was complicated. What were you waiting for before you could tell him?"

"I told him before I fixed that matter." Hermione kept her eyes fixed upon a small pile of overturned terracotta pots that had been stored away for the winter. It was better than looking at Neville who was studying her with great interest, as if she was some rare and exotic plant he was trying to understand.

"And what was the problem you needed to settle anyway, since it seemed to make little difference in the end in telling Ron?" Neville asked, his tone not quite so kind.

Hermione lifted her head and looked Neville in the eye squarely. "I had to clear his name in front of the Wizengamot."
Neville's face morphed from confusion to comprehension upon to whom she was referring to and then finally shock. "Him?" he whispered in a croak. He leaned against a potting bench for support, looking like he would have fallen over if he didn't have the greenhouse equipment to hold him up. "Why?"

Hermione should have been upset at the look of disgust that was beginning to make Neville's lip curl, but she could not blame him, given that he only knew Severus as a teacher who had made his life hell, and was the butt of Gryffindor boys' jokes.

"Because I love him," she said firmly, as if her tone could remove any doubt Neville had against her declarations, "and he loves me."

Just then, Luna came back into the greenhouse, humming softly to herself.

Neville lifted a finger and pointed it at Hermione, as if accusing her of a crime, and said with an edge of incredulous hysteria in his voice, "Did you know Hermione is in love with Snape?"

Luna merely blinked and looked at him, and without missing a beat said, "Well, I'm glad he's found someone to love him." Ignoring the stunned look on her fiancé's face, she turned to Hermione and asked very simply, "Does he feel the same way about you, Hermione?"

Chapter End Notes

A/N: And this is why we love Luna.

Thank you to my glorious betas for this chapter, JuneW and Hope.

Papahi is a Tongan boy's name meaning mischievous, smart.

In addition, shortly after I posted the last chapter my mother passed away. I want to thank everyone who posted words of kindness and support that were greatly needed and appreciated. My husband was far away for a very rare and extremely important client meeting for a product they had been working years on and was busy scrambling to fix things late into the night, and he was unable to be there for me until he flew home a few days later. Your words helped me greatly until my husband, my rock and best friend, returned and could be there for me. It is amazing the huge heart the fanfic community has, when I needed it most. Thank you for your warmth and love.
"Hell, High Water, or the End of the World"

Chapter Summary

Severus intends to go to England to visit Hermione for Christmas, meanwhile Albert drags Hermione off on a special surprise trip elsewhere.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter One-Hundred
"Hell, High Water, or the End of the World"

Disclaimer: There once was a fanfic author named Betz. She wrote a really fucking long fanfic and started running out of disclaimers, but valiantly she kept on disclaiming any ownership of the Harry Potter franchise, and that it was all entirely J.K. Rowling's baby. And Betz didn't get sued... yet. The End.

Severus awoke earlier than usual. He was too excited to sleep until his normal waking time. Rising, he stood at his sliding glass door and pushed its plantation shutters to the side along its track in the floor, and peered out at the now unobstructed view. Looking towards the east from the south-facing glass door, he could see the faintest hints of lightening sky on the horizon. The deep and endless blue of the Pacific was tinged with the deepest shades violet and streaked with pale orchid, signaling the coming of the sun.

Sunrise would be in an hour, shortly after seven, but there was still much he had to do.

Opening the back door, he was surprised to find that the cat was already up and waiting for him. The animal rubbed along Severus' ankles, purring contentedly, self-satisfied as it had killed another rat during the night. There was also a very threatening moth that was pollinating Severus' ginger in his garden. To the cat, that moth was attacking the flowers, and so it had to be dispatched thoroughly.

Severus served up some milk, but left enough for his own cup of tea, using up the last of it before his trip. After a strong cup, he went to the living room and surveyed everything he had laid out to pack the night before.
There was a rather large box that had arrived special delivery a week ago, with the delivery person coming all the way from England to drop it off. The delivery boy was quite skittish upon coming face-to-face with an ex-Death Eater, having heard tales of the dreaded former Hogwarts professor. The delivery was wrapped in Christmas-themed wrapping paper with a large gold bow and a tag saying it was from Hermione. Hermione's present to him was now sitting amongst his fine woolen cloaks, trousers, coats, vests, and shirts he'd had altered by the local tailor. He was bringing all his clothes he departed with a year ago back with him, so he would be properly dressed for winter in England. Laying next to Hermione's gift to him was a much smaller box: his present to her.

When Ginny and Draco learned of Severus' intention to go back to England to visit Hermione for Christmas, Ginny demanded to know what Severus was going to buy her as a present. Upon hearing what Severus had in mind, she shook her head and instructed Draco to take Severus out shopping for a proper present for Hermione. It was not as practical, but in the end, he trusted Ginny's judgment since the two witches knew each other so well. No doubt Ginny had gleaned more ideas over the years for preferred gifts than he had been able to ascertain during their short time together.

He looked at all he was taking with him – all his clothing, the two Christmas presents, toiletries, a rare tome he'd recently purchased still wrapped in brown paper, some other books he was planning on bringing along to share with Hermione that she could return to him at a later date in person, and other things he'd picked up for her. With a swish of his wand, all the items rose up into the air and neatly stacked themselves away into a trunk Severus had bought for himself recently. He was unwilling to use the handbag Hermione had given him to pack his belongings in a year ago.

With little to do but wait for his nine o'clock Portkey time, Severus donned his swim trunks, sandals, and a shirt, then threw a towel over his shoulder. He had a lot of nervous energy to work off.

The ocean was placid that morning, with partly cloudy skies that were colored in vivid oranges, scarlets, and golden hues as the sun raced toward the eastern horizon. Severus was so full of energy, he felt he could have swam all the way to England that morning, but he turned himself around at the half-mile marker to begin his swim back, sticking to swimming his usual morning mile.

As he came ashore, many of the fishermen had already come back with their morning catch. They were selling to restaurateurs who came in from the other Hawaiian islands, plus a few from the mainland, preferring to buy their fish from a fellow witch or wizard. Mario was there buying everything for his Christmas Eve menu that night at his restaurant.

Severus walked up the town's main street that was bedecked with garlands and wreaths of pine, cedar, eucalyptus, magnolia leaves, poinsettias, and other tropical or evergreen greenery. Some of the storefront windows were even temporarily painted with festive scenes of snowbound cabins, flying reindeer, Santa in an outrigger canoe or on a broom, and other holiday symbols. Severus smiled at the scene of the cheery and quaint town looking so festive.

This past month had encapsulated the warmth and welcome he felt in his adopted home. Nearly all of his students had given him some sort of token of their appreciation, presenting him with cellophane bags, decorated tins, and boxes filled with all home-baked treats. He had home-made macadamia nut brittle, cookies of all shapes, sizes and flavors, small loaves of sweet and sometimes savory quick breads, candied tropical fruits dipped in chocolate, a couple of coffeecakes, pecan pumpkin muffins, a cinnamon and walnut-swirled bundt cake, and even a pumpkin cheesecake. A few of his students’ parents had orchid farms, in which case, he was given spectacular specimens in full bloom to enjoy for the holiday season. Some of the blooms now decorated the reception room of his shop, and a few he placed in his outdoor shower at home to bask in the humid and bright diffused light location.

Severus had seen many of the baked goods given to him laid out at previous luaus or offered up for sale by locals who sold pre-ordered Christmas baked good packages to be Portkeyed later on in the year as a way of adding to their incomes. Nothing was bought from a store, and it meant more to him that his students gave him these, since some he could tell were made by young and inexperienced hands. Never in all his time at Hogwarts did any of his students give him any such gifts, especially homemade ones.

At the big hula school luau recital in early December, he brought paella. Mingling amongst the townsfolk during the large community event, he had felt like he had become one of them, ingrained into its daily fabric. Severus had even been invited to a few Christmas parties, at which he willingly mingled, conversing with those who only knew him as the respectable and well-liked Potions master who came from England.

He truly felt at home in Malu Palekaiko, being amongst those who accepted and appreciated him for who he was. Severus couldn’t wait for Hermione to finally come to Malu Palekaiko and experience the place for herself.

Stopping by the bakery, Severus picked up his usual croissant.

"So you are leaving for England this morning?" Kosal asked with a beaming smile. The Cambodian wizard baker remembered Severus made mention of it before.

"That's the plan. Hopefully, nothing will ruin this trip... this time," Severus said darkly.
He noted that the poi donuts with coconut glaze and chopped macadamia nuts, and the pineapple Danish, were already set out. He knew that Draco made a visit on Fridays out of habit to pick one of those for himself, plus whatever Ginny was craving that week. Friday-morning pastry habits were one of the few rituals that Draco had carried over from England to Hawaii, while Severus adopted it for every morning he went out for a swim.

"Ah!" Kosal groaned, itching at a spot on his arm.

"Did that cream I developed using the Miniature Man-Eating Masdevallias not take care of those pock marks on your arms where you just scratched?" Severus asked.

"No! No! It did. Just remembering ice pox makes it itch. Just a phantom feeling thinking about it," he assured the Potions master. "Hopefully nothing else like ice pox will stop you from going today."

"One can hope."

"Oh, here's some cheese Danish for your cat," Kosal said, as he gave Severus a little bag with half of one chopped up in cat-sized bites.

"Thank you," Severus said as he left the shop. The painted Santa and snowman on Kosal's shop window waved farewell to Severus.

Once he was back home, Severus took a long shower, giving himself a good wank. If anything, he would see Hermione within fifteen minutes of arriving in London, about eight-fifteen that evening, and both would be undressed by eight-thirty, Greenwich Mean Time. Severus even remembered to pack a few vials of lubrication potion and a few for his stamina as well. He wondered if she would be just as anxious and eager to join with him after their year apart, or would she need some gentle coaxing and wooing to disrobe before he ravished her once more.

Just knowing he would be making love to Hermione soon helped him come to a quick finish in the shower that morning.

Showered, dressed, and packed, Severus was ready to go with a whole hour until his Portkey time. He'd made arrangements for Ginny to feed the cat while he was gone. He could swing by the shop before he left, but Pat had everything under control, proving herself quite capable from her first day on the job. There were no potions to worry about while he was gone, and Jerry would continue with tutoring for some of his struggling students while he was away.

He just hoped Draco and Ginny would show up with his Christmas present before nine o'clock. They made him repeatedly promise he would wait around before Portkeying off to London. He had their anniversary present wrapped and waiting by the door. Considering how much money and time he'd spent to give this to the couple, he supposed he could wait for them to unwrap it. He wondered what Draco's reaction would be to have his mother's silverware given to him after finding out it had been sold to some "out-of-country buyer" before his name was exonerated, and before all his possessions that the Ministry had taken from him were returned, at least those that weren't sold off in the interim.

At eight-thirty, there was a knock at the door.

"Oh good, they're here finally," Severus sighed, knowing he would at least make his nine o'clock Portkey without a hitch. Nothing was going to stop Severus from going to London that day.

~~~~~~~*~

Her head bent over a stack of parchments, Hermione didn't hear the knock.

Lavender let herself into Hermione's office. "Hermione?" she called out softly, seeing her friend and vice president was deep in thought, and not wanting to startle her.

Hermione finally noticed and lifted her head. "Oh, Lavender," she noted, dragging her mind from her train of thought back to the moment. "I just wanted to finish up a few thoughts I had on new theories for some products I want to work on after I come back from my trip."

"Yes, speaking of which, if you don't hurry, you'll miss your seven-twenty evening Portkey. Besides, it's Christmas Eve. This can all wait until you come back from your field trip with Albert," Lavender assured her.

"Are you sure you want me to go?" Hermione asked. "You only just came back from maternity leave a week ago. And while I kept you up on everything while you were gone, I don't want you to exhaust yourself."

"Tut, tut," Lavender shushed her friend from fretting. "Ron is done with the Quidditch season, so he'll be helping take care of Josephine, and there are the house-elves and a cadre of in-laws to help us. Besides, everything drops off right after Christmas, and production and sales are always down for a bit until late January when people start thinking about Valentine's Day. I'll be fine. And Calleo will nest here and be taken care of while you're away." Lavender patted her on the arm to assuage her concerns.

Hermione shook her head. "I still don't know where Albert is taking me."

"He knows you've been so busy helping run the company he didn't want you to be distracted with the little details," Lavender said trying to calm her down, noting how she was becoming slightly agitated. "Besides, he said he gave Marf a thorough list of everything you'll need for your trip, plus I also bought you a few things. Consider it as a sort of Christmas present."

Hermione looked up at Lavender and her face fell. "Oh, but I didn't get anything for you-" she began, but was stopped by Lavender.

"Hermione, you have run my company beautifully so I could rest without worry while I recuperated during my maternity leave. Peace of mind is a gift that cannot be underestimated in value. And you have, despite all that has passed between us with Ron in the past year and a half, become a dear friend. You're the only female friend I trust. Letting Ron and me have our happiness, with your blessing, is worth a great deal to me. Don't worry that you didn't go out and spend a few Galleons on a trinket. I have something far more valuable – an ex-wife who isn't bent on hexing and cursing me and Josephine."

Hermione and Lavender had read a few stories in the Daily Prophet about – given the recent rise in divorce rates – some ex-spouses making life hell for the ex-husband and new wife, or for the ex-wife and new husband. For the fact Lavender and Hermione were on such good terms was a blessing for the second Mrs. Ron Weasley.

Rising from her desk, Hermione gave Lavender a brief hug, but gave one more troubled sigh. "I still don't know why Albert is insistent on leaving on Christmas Eve. I would have liked to have spent Christmas with my parents, but Albert says something about the timing of certain plants in bloom and the full moon on the 26th." She gave one more sigh, this one expressing more exhaustion than aggravation. "Oh well, the life of an apprentice, I suppose. At least I saw my parents last weekend, as Albert suggested."

"I think you'll have a grand time, even if you're away from family for Christmas."

"No hints?" Hermione asked one last time.
"What, and risk ruining the surprise?"

Hermione's brow furrowed. All she could think of was Severus' surprise apprenticeship trip to the North African desert and being unprepared, resulting in being sunburnt and miserable, but Albert was a good master and made sure she would have everything needed for her trip.

Looking at the clock on her office wall, Hermione said, "I suppose I'd better get going."

She walked with Lavender over to her office so Hermione could say goodbye to Josephine, who was awake. After pressing a kiss to her cheek and bidding her a soft farewell, inhaling the sweet smell, Hermione set her back down in her crib in the nursery set off of Lavender's office. She then gave her boss a hug goodbye with a promise to tell her everything about her trip when she returned.

Albert had already said goodbye to Josephine and Lavender, and was waiting for his apprentice downstairs in the lobby of The Lovely Lavender Company. They Floo'ed directly to the Ministry, since time was short and it was almost time for their Portkey to parts unknown.

Hermione didn't like the fact that Albert wanted to make the surprise all that more special by blindfolding Hermione during their Portkey. He held her arm to keep her steady and from falling over. The blindfold made her stomach even more uneasy than during the usual Portkey trips she took with Albert on short weekend excursions to collect flora and fauna.

As they landed, Albert insisted that she keep her blindfold in place just a bit longer, since they weren't at their final destination yet.

"This person is going to help Side-Along Apparate you to the final destination," Albert said as they landed. He assisted removing Hermione's cloak since it was warmer.

Hermione felt a large hand gently hold her by the upper arm and Side-Along Apparate with her.

Once at her hopefully final destination, she heard an additional popping noise, that was probably Albert arriving behind her.

She heard a knock on a door, which was so close it sounded like she was standing just in front of the door.
"May I finally take my blindfold off?" Hermione asked with a huff of impatience.

~~~~~~~*~

Severus walked over and thought he heard Ginny say something through the other side of the door, which he didn't catch.

Opening the door, he saw Draco and Ginny as he expected, but there was Hermione, blinking the sun from her eyes as Draco had just removed her blindfold before stuffing it in his pocket.

"Hermione?" He could hardly believe she was here on his front porch.

Hermione blinked a few more times, adjusting to the sudden bright light. "Severus?" she questioned with equal astonishment.
She flew into his arms as he reached out to scoop her up.

"How— " he blurted out as he held her tight, stunned by her sudden appearance.

"I had no idea— " she started to say, but stopped as she pulled her head away from his chest to look upon his face.

Each moved a hand to cup each other's cheek, their eyes roving over faces seen only in Pensieves and memories of late, memorizing the changes wrought since the last Pensieve memory they had of each other. Hermione smoothed a hand over his beard, finally feeling it with her own hands, noting that it felt softer than she anticipated.

All awareness that Draco, Ginny, and Albert were next to them had evaporated. The whole world at that moment only existed in each other's arms.
Hermione looked into his face; she had never before seen him so unmasked and emotionally open to her. There was nothing concealed in his features, just surprise at her arrival and love plainly written on his face. He'd never looked so handsome to her, even if the beard did take a little getting used to in person.

Severus, lost in the moment, pulled Hermione into a deep and passionate kiss unwilling to let another moment pass without his lips on hers. How he'd missed her kisses, her sweet and delirium-inducing kisses that could make his heart sing.

Hermione's heart felt like it would burst. Severus was kissing her with such passion and want, and she kissed him back with all the longing she had pent up for him this past very long and lonely year. Her head spun as her body and mind were overwhelmed.

Only when they finally pulled apart from their long impassioned kiss did they notice that they were being watched, but at this point, Severus and Hermione no longer cared.

Draco cleared his throat and rhetorically asked with joviality, "Now, what was that about nothing – not even hell, high water, or the end of the world – was going to stop you from going to England this morning?"

Hermione's face changed from elated love to quizzical surprise as she turned to regard Draco. "You planned this?" Turning to look at Albert, she added, "And you, too?"

Albert stepped forward and tilted his head to the side a bit in contemplation. "Well, after Severus didn't make it to India, Draco and I conspired together."

As much as Hermione and Severus never wanted to let go of each other ever again, they parted. Hermione went to embrace Albert, her master and mentor, while Severus gave Draco a hearty hug of thanks.

"I can't tell you how much this means to me," Hermione sighed as she gave Albert an embrace filled with gratitude.

Hermione and Severus swapped places, and Severus gave his old friend and fellow Potions master a firm handshake while Draco was given a near rib-cracking hug by Hermione. "Thank you," she said with her head pressed against Draco's chest, as the tears began to fall.
Severus pulled Hermione into his arms once more as she began to cry from sheer happiness.

Ginny, who had already started to cry, laughed through her tears. "I helped, too!" Hermione pulled Ginny into her embrace with Severus. Well, as much as they could hug Ginny considering her midsection had grown rather large since she had entered her sixth month of pregnancy.

Suddenly realizing they were all standing out on his front porch, Severus remembered his manners and said eagerly, "Come in, please, come in."

He rarely had guests, so it was quite a surprise. Fortunately, he had enough seating for everyone in his living room, where his packed trunk was waiting. Albert levitated Hermione's trunk in and set it down next to Severus'.

Her arm firmly latched into Severus', unwilling to let go of him, they walked into the living room. Hermione turned her head to look at her Master and asked Albert, "And you had this planned with Lavender the whole time too?"

Albert sat himself down at the same time as everyone else. Ginny took the most comfortable straight-backed chair that was kind to her back, and Hermione and Severus sat side-by-side on the couch — a couch that looked suspiciously similar to the one Hermione used to transfigure the settee into she noted silently. Draco stood behind his wife and softly rubbed her shoulders.

"Yes, which is why Lavender ended her maternity leave a week before today. That gave her time to get back into the swing of things so she would be back up to speed by the time I whisked you away to Severus'..." Albert stopped and looked around, suddenly admiring the architecture before finishing his thought. "...tropical hideaway."

Hermione blushed, suddenly realizing that Albert knew exactly what she and Severus would be getting up to for the next week. She turned and buried her face in Severus' shoulder. It was almost like talking about sex frankly with one's parents.

Draco and Ginny both had a small laugh of their own, remembering how they were rather inspired by the exotic setting and Justina's honeymoon suite at her hotel those first several weeks. Ginny squeezed Draco's hand and smiled up at him as she absentmindedly stroked her abdomen.

There was a small clatter in the kitchen, which made Severus let go of Hermione's hand and pull his wand out, nearly leaping off the couch.
"That would be the delivery elves," Draco said. Severus gave him a quizzical look, so Draco further explained, "Since you probably whittled your pantry and perishables down for your planned week away, Ginny and I arranged for the delivery of groceries to keep you stocked for the week since you'll be here instead. Unless you plan on still making that Portkey to London at nine o'clock."

Hermione looked at Severus, stunned by Draco's words. "Severus? Were you going to come to England to see me?" She had been so dazed by the surprise of suddenly finding herself in Malu Palekaiko, and in Severus' company, she had missed Draco's earlier joke about him leaving for England.

"That was the plan," he said rather dryly, now giving Draco a very pointed look. "And you couldn't have let me know sooner?"

"Well, it wouldn't have been much of a Christmas present had you known beforehand," Draco said, matching Severus' tone. "Besides, it takes a lot to surprise you. It was worth it to see the look on your face."

"I wish I had a photo of that moment. That was priceless," Ginny added.

"Speaking of presents," Severus said, pulling out his wand. He levitated the Malfoys' anniversary present by the front door over to float across the room and settle on the floor next to them. It was a bit too large and heavy to set in Ginny's ever-shrinking lap.

"Happy first wedding anniversary." Severus held his hand out toward the large box wrapped in silver and white. He had paid Naomi to wrap it beautifully for him.

Draco knelt down and began to unwrap it while Ginny sat in the chair observing.

Upon revealing the wood lid and silver plate engraved on the top, Draco gave a small gasp of surprise.

"You're not the only one capable of surprising people," Severus said lightly.
"My mother's silver," Draco choked out in a hoarse whisper as he reverently lifted up the lid. "But how? I thought it was gone."

Severus ran a thumb back and forth across the top of Hermione's hand as he said, "Naomi ran another errand for me when I sent her off to London to order Hermione's flowers last summer."

Upon the mention of that, Hermione grasped Severus' hand a bit tighter, willing all the bad memories of that mix-up to go away. She would only bring forth the memories of the vase of flowers that was presented to her when Draco and Ginny returned to England.

Draco's head hung down, and it did not escape anyone's notice that his hand went up to wipe away a tear. The young wizard rose and walked over to Severus.

Severus rose and let his friend clap him hard in a tight embrace.

"Thank you," Draco croaked, overcome with emotions.

He clapped Draco on the back. "It seems we have given each other something precious and irreplaceable this Christmas."

Ginny was wiping away tears herself, overcome by the emotion of the moment yet again. She knew how much Draco's mother's silverware meant to him from a purely sentimental worth. It was the best anniversary present Severus could have given them.

Sitting back down, Severus turned to Hermione. "How long are you here?"

"A week," Albert answered for her. "And she is under orders to do no work, but to relax today and Christmas," he said with a waggle of his finger. "But starting Boxing Day, she will have work to do the rest of her stay. Namely, checking up on the construction of the new facilities and the new school being built since Lavender is a large benefactor, plus writing scrolls on local plants and animals and their use. Perhaps with Blanche's permission, Hermione can get a tour of the Miniature Man-Eating Masdevallia reserve?"

"We'll see if Blanche will agree to that, but with no indicators in the final scrolls of where the reserve is located," Severus amended.
"But of course," Hermione said, knowing the location was held under a Fidelius Charm.

"And she is to work on her Japanese while she is here," Albert reminded her.

Since taking her Spanish test, Hermione had had little time to devote to learning her fourth language, given how busy she was running the company and doing her apprenticeship work.

"Excellent, I'm learning it myself so we can study together," Severus offered. Hermione squeezed his hand, thrilled at the prospect of learning something alongside Severus, both students for once.

"Anything else?" Hermione asked Albert.

"Attendance at the New Year's Eve Ball," Ginny said, as she pulled out an envelope holding two tickets from her pocket.

"Oh!" Hermione said, suddenly sitting upright. "I don't know if I have anything packed for a ball."

Albert sat back and chuckled. "I told you I would have Marf pack everything you would need for this trip, and I meant everything. You have all your formal dresses and various shoes and accessories," he said, flitting his fingers about to imply all the lingerie that went with each outfit as well without naming it specifically.

Hermione smiled and placed her hand over her heart, touched that Albert had thought of everything, as well as Draco and Ginny. And suddenly remembering Lavender's words, she knew Lavender had bought something for her for this trip.

"Now if you will pardon me for a moment, this house needs a bit of decorating," Ginny said. She opened a small pouch she pulled from the pocket of her cool and billowy tank maternity dress. Hauling herself up out of her seat, she opened the pouch and Summoned a large evergreen tree with her wand that expanded to its full size as it came forth.

While Ginny was busy decorating the Christmas tree, ensuring Severus and Hermione had a tree of their own to celebrate the holiday, Hermione asked Albert, "So are you staying in Malu Palekaiko for the week, as well?"
"No," Albert said, smoothing a hand over the front of his striped waistcoat. "One of my daughters and her family decided to go to New Zealand for Christmas, as I have a few distant relatives there I've been in contact with over the decades. So once I'm done handing you off into the hands of another very capable master for the week, I'll be Portkeying onward to Auckland." It didn't escape Albert's attention that the hand-holding between Hermione and Severus was getting more urgent and restive, as if they were making a conscious effort to not go at it in front of guests, while trying to play the good hosts who didn't kick their guests out too quickly.

Looking over at the clock on Severus' mantle, he said a bit more dramatically than necessary, "Well, I would love to stay and chat the day away, but I have a Portkey to take soon." Turning to Draco and Ginny, he said, "Could you please walk with me back to the Portkey Office? I would like a local's tour and get to see a few of the sights before I leave." It was a very polite way to prompt the Malfoys that it was time to leave. Even they understood the urgency simmering beneath the polite facade Severus and Hermione were trying to project.

Hand-in-hand, Severus and Hermione walked Albert and the Malfoys to the door. The delivery elves that restocked Severus' kitchen were long gone.

"I'll see you bright and early, January 3rd, back in the office," Albert said to Hermione with a twinkle in his eye as he stood on Severus' porch once more. Turning to Severus, he added, "And I expect you to take good care of my apprentice. Though, I don't think I have to worry about that at all. Make sure she doesn't push herself to yet another bout of nearly collapsing from sheer exhaustion. This trip is meant to recharge herself, besides check up on construction, since she's in the habit of pushing herself too hard at times."

"I push myself so I can finish my apprenticeship faster so I can be back by Severus' side faster," she reminded him of why she worked herself so hard.

Severus slipped his arm around her waist and chastely kissed the top of her head. "I'll make sure she gets the proper amount of rest."

Hermione was tempted to give him a wicked smile and say she didn't want to be too well rested. Instead, she refrained from making a comment filled with sexual innuendo since that was not her style in front of others, nor did she want to embarrass Severus.

Draco and Ginny exited the door, ready to walk Albert back down through the town since all of them, except Ginny, had Apparated directly there from the Portkey Office.
Ginny gave Hermione one last hug and kiss upon the cheek. "Since Severus is not going to be in England, we expect to see you both over at the Finaus' for Christmas dinner." She patted Severus on the arm, giving him a knowing look.

Severus had already dropped off the plum pudding the week before over at Mounga and Rainbow's house, but at the time he had no idea he would be there to enjoy it with them as well.

Looking at Hermione, Ginny said, suddenly remembering, "Oh, Marf was supposed to pack Christmas crackers, so be sure to remember those." She then turned to Albert. "You did get those, right?"

Albert assured Ginny that everything had been packed.

Draco gave Severus a pat on the shoulder. "And I will see you tomorrow as well. Mounga said to be there around two o'clock."

"Which means around three o'clock Hawaiian time," Severus amended, knowing that punctuality was not high on the priority of the locals, though they did learn to observe time in regards to appointments at Severus' shop for consultations and tutoring.

Draco was just about to leave when he stopped and reached into the pouch Ginny had earlier. "Oh, and one more thing from Ginny and me. You'll be needing this," he said with a knowing smirk upon his lips.

Severus looked at the wooden box Draco handed him and immediately recognized it. It was a special order Draco had paid to have Severus fulfill, saying it was going to be a Christmas present for a friend. Severus had filled every vial in that box, which consisted of an equal number of the natural lubrication potion and Sequoia, the male enhancement potion. Severus had brewed his own present from Draco, which Draco had paid for.

And stopping one last time, half-way down the stairs of Severus' front porch, Draco looked over his shoulder and added, "Oh, and Mounga said you could have use of the hot springs today, all day up until dawn. That's his and Rainbow's little gift to you and Hermione."

Draco, Ginny, and Albert really did plan for everything to make this the perfect week.
Hermione and Severus stood side-by-side, waving to their friends as they walked down the garden path towards the front gate.

Severus closed the door of his home. No sooner than he had closed it than he had Hermione pressed up against it, shoving his tongue down her throat, which she greedily devoured.

When they parted to finally catch their breath, she said through gasping pants, "I thought they'd never leave."

"Same here," Severus agreed, and went back to kissing Hermione with desperation, one arm cradling the box of potions they would make good use of for the next week.

"Bed, now," Hermione moaned, wishing Severus would put the box down, not knowing what was in it.

Severus would have picked her up and carried her off to his – their bed, but it was tricky business to carry someone in your arms and a wooden box at the same time.

They practically ran upstairs and into the bedroom, Hermione familiar with the layout from her many revisits to Severus' house in Lavender's Pensieve.

After placing their wands on the bedside table, Severus carefully placed the box next to them and opened the lid while Hermione surveyed her surroundings.

"Mosquito netting," she mused, "how romantic."

"More functional than romantic," he assured her as he plucked one vial from the set of thirty vials.

"What's in the box Draco gave you?" Hermione asked, curious as to why Severus was very careful while handling it.

"Something you're very familiar with," Severus said and held up the vial.
"You didn't brew this?" Hermione asked.

"Oh, I did, but Draco indicated it was for someone else when he ordered it, sneaky bastard."

Tipping the vial back, Hermione felt its effects, not realizing how much she missed that sensation, knowing what would come next. Her body reacted to the Lubrication Potion just as it had many times before.

Hermione carefully slipped the empty vial back in its slot. Then she took off the necklace Harry had given her for her safety. She would not need it here, as she knew that while she was with Severus she would be safe. The pendant was set on the bedside table, next to the dried lemon and photo of her younger self, before she turned her attention back to Severus.

"Are you still--" Severus began, but his question was finished by Hermione.

"Yes, I'm still on contraceptives."

There was a lot to talk about regarding that particular subject, but they could talk later. Right now they just needed to be with joined with one another as soon as possible.

There was a moment where they just held each other, one of Hermione's hands stroking the back of his neck, the other resting upon his shoulder. Severus held one arm around her waist, the other wrapped around her back. They were both scarcely able to believe they were finally together again, and this was no surreal meeting on some strange ethereal plane.

Severus and Hermione finally began to tear at each other's clothing, kissing each other with a raw hunger. Hermione's fingers worked furiously to unbutton the white long-sleeved shirt he was wearing, yanking the tails from his black light woolen trousers he had worn in anticipation of traveling to England.

Severus' hands were busy unbuttoning Hermione's blouse and trying to find the zipper to her skirt. He was unfamiliar with this particular garment, and blindly hunted for a zipper on the back. He finally found it on the side, unwilling to stop kissing Hermione to find it quicker.

Hermione nearly popped his last button off in her haste to divest Severus of his shirt, but found the last one in time. Her hands pushed the sleeves down, working against Severus' own attempts to use his hands to undress her simultaneously. He finally relented and stopped for a half-second to yank the sleeves off and left the shirt fall carelessly to the floor.

All the while they kissed, hardly able to keep their eyes open, yet longing to look forever upon the other, having been deprived of the sight of each other for so long. Severus felt his erection grind up against Hermione's hip and she ground back against it, wanting to feel its hardness and length against her body with equal want, desperate to have him fill her as soon as possible.

"God, I've missed you" Hermione said in a near sob, her voice thick with emotion.

Severus stopped kissing Hermione for a moment to look upon her face. Her eyes shone bright with unshed tears, smiling at him with pure happiness radiating from her face.

"I didn't think it was possible to miss you as much as I did," he confessed, still awestruck by the fact she was finally in his arms again. His hand cupped her cheek, and the pad of his thumb wiped away the tears that began to fall.

Hermione kissed him again, this time with near desperation. "I need you," she said against his mouth.

Severus kissed her back, his tongue battling with hers, as they both rapaciously consumed each other.

Hermione's skirt was finally unzipped, and Severus yanked it down past her hips. As she stepped out of her skirt, she also toed off her shoes. While Hermione pulled off her tights, Severus finished divesting himself of his trousers, boots, and socks.

Severus rarely remembered being so anxious and eager to make love. Even compared to their first time, he could not recall feeling this much anticipation.

Now dressed in only his underpants, he watched as Hermione, clad in her bra and knickers, crawled up onto the bed. She finally found her way underneath the mosquito netting and coyly beckoned him with a crook of her finger; a lustful come-hither look in her eye.

Hermione saw the way Severus approached her through the netting, the raw need burning bright in his eyes, as if his eyes could singe her flesh.
At the edge of the bed, he slowly lifted the netting, crawling underneath it.

This was their own little world, apart from the rest of reality. The outside world could be coming to an end, but they were not of it; they were in another dimension in that bed, finally together.

Severus roughly pulled Hermione into his arms, and they fell onto the bed. A tangle of arms and legs, both tussling about. Severus reached behind her and unclasped her bra, pulling the straps down from her shoulders.

Suddenly, he felt Hermione pull away from him and her arms cross in front of herself protectively. He anticipated this. This reminded him of their first time together and how she was so uncertain of her breasts back then.

Hermione began to cry, but not from joy this time. She didn't want Severus to see her scar, her hideous disfigurement inflicted by that monster Alan. Severus had once called her breasts perfect, but what would he think of them now with that grotesque souvenir of her attack marring them?

"Let me see," he asked, stroking her hair, trying to soothe her.

"It's so ugly," she wailed as she suddenly became overwhelmingly self-conscious, almost rolling away from Severus, wishing it was dark and he couldn't see the scar.

Severus pulled away from Hermione and knelt on the bed, holding his arms out for her inspection. "Look at me," he said.

Hermione rolled back over and looked at him. He looked so wonderful to her. His hair was longer, the beard made him look even more handsome, he looked like he was even trimmer with more muscle, and he had a nice tan. He looked perfect to her.

"Do you see my scars?" Severus asked.

It was then that Hermione did notice his scars. The one along his chest under his left nipple, and the other near his collarbone on the right. The one on his left was just as pronounced as the one Hermione now had. And then there was the significant scar on his leg that was longer than hers. "I don't see them. I only see you and how wonderful you look to me," Hermione said.

"Then how is your scar any different from the many of mine? You choose not to see them. And why would you think that a scar would make you any less beautiful to me?" Severus asked, trying to bring Hermione out of her shell once more.

Severus sat back down on his heels. "If we are fortunate enough to grow old together, should your hair become the color of dull steel, and you start to sag and become wrinkled, would you be less lovely to me?" he asked while shaking his head. "And I am no paragon of comeliness, yet you have professed how handsome I am to you. Do you think me so shallow that one scar could affect my whole opinion of you? That it is only your looks that matter to me?"

Hermione understood what he was saying, and she believed him, but it still didn't stop her fears of how he would react upon seeing it. She shook her head. She knew Severus was never a shallow man, but her psychological scars still ran deep.

Slowly, Hermione let her arms down and pulled the cups of her brassiere away from her breasts. She reluctantly let the bra fall upon the bed, her arms laying limp by her side.

It was a significant scar, but Severus did not care. To him, she was still a vision of perfection and loveliness.

Pulling her tenderly into his arms, he stroked her face. "You still look just as beautiful as before. More so, because I've missed you so much."

His hand gently cupped her scarred breast. She turned her head aside and almost flinched from his touch.

"Does that hurt?" he asked, seeing her reaction.

Hermione shook her head. There was no pain except in her mind.

"Then I see nothing," he whispered with urgent sincerity. "This does not define you." Severus placed his hand upon her heart above her scar and said, "This is what defines you," then he moved his hand up to place a finger upon her temple, "and this. It is your heart and mind I fell in love with."
Severus had a whole speech planned out since October to tell Hermione how he loved her regardless of her scar, but it came out completely different from what he intended. But in the end, he got his sentiments across so that she understood.

Being so open and free to express his emotions, was unlike what he had done in the past. Normally, he would be fighting with himself to express his feelings, but he had learned in his lengthy time apart from Hermione that holding back only hurt himself. He regretted that he had not more plainly and simply stated what was in his heart.

Even the vision of Albus back in his London flat once said to him, There is no regret in the experience of love, only when we deny ourselves the ability to love. He finally understood what the apparition of the old Headmaster meant. Severus wanted no more regrets.

Wiping away the tears from her face, he said tenderly, "I love you, Hermione, and I have missed you terribly."

Hermione felt like her heart could hold no more love for him, but somehow she could feel her chest glow warm as if it was expanding. A rush of the intense feelings of love for him burned inside her, making her head spin and feel as if she was floating. She felt like she was falling in love with Severus all over again. And while he was the same Severus she first fell in love with, there was something different about him – less guarded, yet more intense. His earnest declarations that her scar meant nothing to him eased her fears, but his confession of why he had fallen in love with her made her happy beyond what she thought she was capable of feeling. There was no greater high, not even under the most potent formulations of the Irresistible Potion, that could compare to what she was currently experiencing, and it was all because of this love she felt for Severus and his love for her.

Kissing Severus' hair, she felt his mouth trail down her neck. The sensation of his beard seemed to almost heighten the feeling of his mouth as it dragged along her skin, nipping and licking in his anthropometry devoted solely to her.

Severus tenderly kissed the top of her left breast, looking up to watch for a reaction from her that he should stop and calm her fears once more. Her head was thrown back, mouth hung open, eyes shut, looking lost in the rapture of his touch. Moving onward, his mouth grazed along the slope of her breast, over the scar and finally down to her nipple. Her whole areola and nipple were taut and waiting for his touch. As his mouth engulfed her peak, Hermione let out a harsh cry, fisting his hair with one hand while wrapping a leg around his torso to draw him between her legs.

He laved both of her nipples with his tongue, giving both equal attention, cupping her breasts with his hands and plucking at the nipple his mouth wasn't currently worrying and suckling. The gentle brushing of his silken hair along her sides was torture of the sweetest kind, making her shudder, arch, and sigh, which only caused him to suckle more earnestly. With one hand, he slipped Hermione's pale pink knickers off.

The ache between Hermione's legs was almost unbearable, feeling her core throb with each beat of her heart, feeling as if she would go mad from this primal need. When she felt his mouth leave her breasts and trail down her stomach, she could stand it no longer.

Lifting his head from her stomach with her hands, she begged, "I can't wait any longer. I need you now. Please," she added, her face pleading. She was unable to bear any more building anticipation as she yanked at Severus' underpants, using her feet to catch them and shove them down his legs quickly, wishing she had her wand to spell them away faster.

Severus stroked her thigh and slid up between her legs, encouraging her to raise and part them, which she did eagerly.

Holding himself above her with one arm, he held himself with his free hand and rubbed himself around her entrance, spreading some of her fluids around his head to ease penetration. It had been a very long time for either of them, and he didn't want to hurt her despite how badly she needed him.

Severus slid his head into her, and she gasped at the shock of the sensation, feeling she would nearly explode, but wanting more. He pulled out and slid a little deeper in the next stroke, which caused Hermione to arch her back and pull her knees up higher to spread herself wider for him. It took all of Severus' strength and willpower not to just sink himself into her in one swift stroke.

Her brow furrowed, arms thrown above her head. She clawed at the headboard for a place to hold on, as she screamed, "YES! More!"

Severus withdrew and slid back in all the way slowly.

Hermione screamed from the pleasure of it all, his length and width filling her, the friction of him entering her, his body atop hers, her flesh pressed against his, his hair sliding over his shoulder to caress her own. When Severus pulled back and filled her even deeper a third time, and she finally felt him settle as deep as possible in her, she shut her eyes tight and wailed.

Severus knew Hermione was at her limit. She was so tight. Even though he was buried in her to the hilt, he knew if he spread her legs even wider and began pounding her harder, her body would not take it. He had to ease her body back into the ability to easily accept him once more, like she once had before. Severus wanted to consume her whole, right there and then, but forced himself to be patient, wanting to savor their rejoining. This was the sweetest of pleasures and joys, and he wanted it to last forever. His heart pounded with need to take Hermione completely and with his love for her as well.

They could hardly keep their eyes open. They were so lost in the all-consuming experience of being joined together, after being apart for so long. Hermione rock her hips in time to meet each of Severus' thrusts, each stroke of his met with a cry of fulfillment from her. It took all of Severus' willpower to not come right them. She was so snug, it was a vise-like grip, her tightness making it all the more deliriously sweet to be buried in his love as he slid in and out of her.

This is what they missed. The feeling of their flesh pressed and rubbing against one another, the softness of each other's hair in their hands, the wash of hot breaths caressing each other with each exulted sigh, the sight of love and rapture written on each other's faces, the heady scent of skin as a light sheen of sweat bespangling their face, chest and backs. No Pensieve or fantasy could compare to the reality of being with each other.

Hermione opened her eyes finally to see Severus staring down at her with the same intensity as their first time together. He was her dark angel, taking her to paradise. Severus was looking at her as if she was the most beautiful woman on earth and for that brief moment, she felt she was. She felt dizzy, drowning in a deluge of sensations and emotions. Riding on that intoxicating tide of euphoria, she moaned, "God, I love you so much, Severus."

Severus could bear it no more. He came, already enamored by the sight of her beneath him as he made love to her, pushed to the edge by Hermione's declaration of her love for him. His eyes shut tight and he fell forward, burying his head against her neck, grunting and moaning as his hips stilled.

Hermione clasped onto him, wrapping her legs around him, welcoming him to rest upon her, tightening her muscles around him as she felt him empty himself into her. Severus then gasped in surprise, overcome by the sudden squeezing sensation.

This was Hermione's little trick to make his orgasm feel even more intense. Given the intensity of this particular orgasm, having finally made love to her after months apart, he felt like his head would explode. How he'd missed this as well.

Laying atop of her, gasping for breath, he felt Hermione's hands lovingly stroked his back, her legs still wrapped around his waist. He could feel her chest rise and fall in a stilted manner. Severus could tell she was crying. Lifting his head, he knew that these were the sort of tears he wanted to Hermione was so happy at that moment, she couldn't keep it in. She didn't want to cry, as she had cried too much over this past year with Severus gone, but she could not contain her joy.

"I couldn't wait. You are just so wonderful," Severus began, wishing he could have brought Hermione to her own completion before himself, but she only smiled more at him, the tears finally ebbing away.

"Shh. We have all week," she silenced him, placing a finger upon his lips before kissing his cheek and forehead.

Severus felt himself finally go soft enough that he slipped out of her, but he decided to seize the moment. Rolling off of her, he slid his hand down and slipped his fingers between her legs.

Hermione adjusted her legs and stroked Severus' hair, noting how much longer it was from when she last saw him. She closed her eyes and hummed as his fingers went to work on her.

Severus had spent enough time Polyjuiced as Hermione over the past year, he learned her body from a first-person perspective. As he started using new techniques he had developed, he heard Hermione gasp and her breath halt in her chest.

"Oh, God... Where... How..." All questions stopped, and she began a keening wail as Severus slipped two fingers into her while his thumb worried at her clit in just the right spot that sent her into fits. His other hand had also slipped between her legs, and one finger was slowly playing with the opening of her anus.

Severus looked to Hermione to gauge her expression. He saw that she was too lost in what he was doing to her body to notice him seeking quiet permission before he slipped a single slender finger in. Dipping his head while kneeling over her, he took the nipple closest to his mouth between his lips and started to suckle at it, working mostly on the nipple.

This was something a bit different and new for Hermione, and it was fantastic. The ache that was still left between her legs came back fiercely and began to grow in her abdomen. Throbbing and white hot, she could feel it build.
Severus timed his movements to her cries and how she moved her body in time to his hand, picking up the pace when he sensed she wanted more, quicker. He could feel himself harden once again, hearing and seeing Hermione undulating to his touch in his bed.

'This is so much better than masturbating in a Pensieve,' Hermione noted somewhere in the back of her mind. The two experiences could not even compare: Severus' very deft and increasingly talented fingers, versus her own. Hermione could feel her orgasm building. She thought she would literally set the mosquito netting and bed on fire, her body was so aflame. She threw her head back and opened her throat as she finally felt her orgasm take over her body, making her bellow and thrash about the bed like a mad woman in an attack of hysterical mania.

Severus felt her walls clamp down, quivering and pulsing around his fingers. He couldn't wait any longer. In the middle of her orgasm, he removed all his hands, and he slid back between Hermione's legs and back into her once more.

Hermione felt her orgasm stop momentarily, but it returned and with even greater intensity as Severus filled her once more. This time her body had become slightly accustomed to him, and she spread her legs wider. Feeling him sink into her, she felt her orgasm return and she clutched onto Severus, riding him from underneath as much as he was riding her.

Her orgasm finally waning, Hermione's screams morphed into soft whimpers of delight, feeling pleasantly exhausted. Severus' movements slowed and he finally rested between her legs, gently sliding back in and out of her until he finally stopped, his breath short and gasping, just like Hermione's.

Severus didn't orgasm a second time, yet, but he was glad to have helped Hermione finally have one of her own. He did not want to leave her unsatisfied at all, in any way.

Rolling off Hermione and onto his back, his face coated with more sweat, and thankful he swam to help keep up his physical stamina, he lay there on his back staring up at the ceiling through the netting. He could suddenly see the benefit of the ceiling fans Ginny and Draco installed in their home.

Hermione rolled over and curled up along Severus' side, playing with his chest hair and the tips of his longer raven locks.

Stroking her back lazily with one hand, Severus mused contently, "If I am dreaming, never let me wake. If I am awake, never let me sleep." Severus kissed the top of her head where it rested on his chest.
Hermione stifled a yawn. "I'm knackered. Oh, that reminds me."

Rising up, she started to reach across Severus for her wand, but suddenly stopped and ran off to the bathroom instead.

Severus chuckled to himself, feeling the familiarity of old habits from his former life appearing in his new life, like some ghost that had come back to life, becoming solid flesh and blood once more.

With her bodily needs taken care of, Hermione, completely nude to Severus' enjoyment, returned to the bed. She walked over to the bedside table to fetch her wand and Summon her trunk.

After setting it down by Severus' armoire, she opened it. She pulled open a few drawers before finally finding what she was looking for.

"Aha!" she said with some triumph. Then she came back to the bed while holding a small case.

"And what do you have here?" Severus asked, his own curiosity piqued since there was a glimmer of pride in her carriage as she walked back.

"Hopefully, a successful brewing of a Portkey lag potion I developed for my final apprenticeship potion." Hermione held the case out for Severus to inspect. It was a clear glass case featuring only two vials, each vial marked with hash marks and numbers along the side.

"And how does it work?" he asked, noting the numbers on each vial only went up to twelve. One vial was of a bright golden sunny hue, while the other had a dusky violet color to it, as if it was twilight captured in a glass.

"It helps reset the circadian rhythm to the new time zone," Hermione informed him.

"Yes, but that's what Invigoration Draughts and sleeping potions are for," he said not to be contrary, but to question how her potion might present a solution when other solutions were already available to the problem.
"Yes, but those potions don't reset the natural rhythm a body has when it says it's time to wake up, go to sleep, have a meal. While those other potions are a stop-gap measure, this helps avoid other problems when the body does eventually reset, such as sudden fatigue. I tried Invigoration Draughts and sleeping potions, when I came back from India, and I still found myself suddenly wanting to fall asleep face-first into my lunch of cottage pie up to a week later."

"Which vial would you take and how much?" he asked.

"That depends. If I want to stay awake for, say, eleven hours longer than my usual bedtime back in London, since there is an eleven-hour time difference, I drain this down to the eleven marked on the vial," she said pointing to the golden-hued elixir.

"And the other vial?"

"When I leave, it will be morning here, but night back in London. After arriving, I'll drain up to the eleventh mark on the vial, and it will set my body clock eleven hours faster towards sleep."

"And how much have you tested this before?" Severus asked, hoping Hermione wouldn't put herself accidentally into a Draught of Living Death-like coma, spending their week together with her passed out and him working on an antidote.

"I've done some small trips on the weekend with Albert when he's taken me on weekends a few hours across time zones, or when I need to get up pre-dawn for some ingredient-hunting task Albert has set for me, but nothing as much as eleven hours," she said as she opened the case, pulling out the sunny-colored potion.

Before Hermione imbibed, she told Severus about the ingredients and directions for brewing, plus where her notes could be found, should anything happen. Tilting the vial back, she felt the potion slide down her throat, invigorating her, erasing the feeling like she had already put in a full day's work, which she had.

Setting the nearly empty vial back in its case and on the bedside table, Hermione said with self-satisfaction of all her work, "I no longer feel sleepy."

Severus grabbed her and threw her back on the bed. "Good," he growled playfully as he palmed one breast, "because for each of those lubrication potions I brewed is a vial of Sequoia to match, and I have yet to take mine," he reminded her as she grinned eagerly at him.
A/N: Yeah, they're back together again and shagging like horny nifflers once more!

As always, thank you to my wonderful betas, JuneW and thegreyladies for your wonderful work.

Angel-soma has done a commission for me of Hermione and Severus seeing each other on his front porch, right after she takes off the blindfold and he opens the door. You can view it on my Tumblr page here: http://atdlheabetz.tumblr.com/image/152283855200
Or on Angel-soma's DeviantArt page here: http://angelsoma.deviantart.com/art/Commission-Estump-573883870
Chapter Summary

Summary: Severus and Hermione enjoy a tossed salad for lunch, a romantic Christmas Eve dinner at Mario's, followed by another tossed salad.

Chapter Notes

CAUTION: NSFW fan art embedded into chapter, most of the way down. Features frontal nudity. R-rated/Mature.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter One Hundred One
"Kiss Me Once and Kiss Me Twice, Then Kiss Me Once Again"

Disclaimer: Harry (lemons) Potter is the (lemons) property of J (lemons) K Rowling and (lemons) associates. No (lemons) copyright infringement (lemons) intended. (Lemons!)

A/N: Can you tell that now Hermione and Severus are back together that there will be a lot of sex?

============

The pleasantly exhausted lovers dragged themselves out to the kitchen to eat a very late lunch. Hermione was quite sore in the most delicious way, and Severus was feeling every bit of his forty-four years. Even with a nap, once they worked through the entire effects of the Sequoia Potion that was thoroughly used up to the very end, they were still worn out.

Hermione decided to don Severus' shirt she had divested him of that morning while Severus threw on his dressing gown, since he had conveniently forgotten to pack it. They had yet to unpack either of their trunks.

Checking his pantry and larder, Severus could tell that the Malfoys definitely stocked everything he and Hermione would need, and then some. The bottle of Fairy Brandy, and the pitcher of freshly-squeezed passion fruit placed front and center in his chilled ice box, did not escape his notice. No doubt this was a repayment in kind for what Severus did for them as a wedding present.
Severus offered to make lunch, though he was tempted to see if Mario’s was open that night since he wasn't sure he'd still be living come dinner time, much less have the energy to cook, unless Hermione was willing to. From the wiped-out and gratifyingly satisfied look on her face as she sat at the table, he wasn't sure she would be up to the task of cooking that night either.

"What's for lunch, my glorious sex god." Hermione sighed with a broad grin as she propped her cheek on her hand, her elbow on the table for support. She was quite thankful Severus’ lab was thoroughly stocked and he had something to soothe her with by making a salve. Otherwise, she wouldn't be sitting so comfortably at the moment, having been fucked until she was nearly raw.

It had been a long, long time since either of them had been sexually active, and not even toys did an adequate job of keeping Hermione "in shape."

Glancing over his shoulder, wearing a prideful smirk as he was busy chopping vegetables, he noted, "I am a sex god now? Absence has made the heart grow fonder."

"I always thought you were a sex god, Severus," she freely admitted, smiling even more dreamily. "I just didn't think you wanted to hear something so overly effusive without you deriding it as hormone-driven sentimental drivel. Though I could make the same claim when today you called me your beloved inamorata, your dulcinea, 'su tesorito,' your--"

"Silence, my saucy wench," he demanded playfully.

Even Severus could not deny he was caught up willingly in the magnificent throes of love and all the effusive things it would make him uncharacteristically say. Even if he meant every single declaration of his love, it was still a little awkward to hear back to his own ears. Though having Hermione confess her own romantic confessions was ever so fulfilling to his heart.

Hermione missed this, the playful banter between them. It was nice to know they could pick up where they'd left off despite their lengthy time apart.

"Yes, my darling cardimelech," she crooned sweetly at him.

Severus stopped his preparation of lunch and walked over to Hermione. He tipped her head up and leaned down to give her a gentle kiss. "You also are a vital force that makes my heart work," he said softly to her. "A sentiment that sweet and obscure deserves a kiss as a reward."
Diving into their hard-earned lunch, Hermione groaned with nearly the same lustful appreciation of the simple tossed salad Severus had made for them, as during their love-making earlier in the day.

Hermione loved the combination of chopped lettuces, tomatoes, cucumbers, radishes, avocado, papaya, and Asian pear, all tossed with a light citrus vinaigrette Severus whipped together.

Severus wished he hadn't given away all the ripe produce out of his garden, but at least Draco and Ginny had ordered plenty to replace what he gave to them and his neighbors in preparation for his trip that never came to be.

"After lunch, I'd like to get a tour of the rest of the house and unpack. That is, if you'll give me half a chance," she teased him.

"I was not the one who initiated another round of love-making when we were in the shower that took the last of our strength before our nap," he reminded her, giving her a leer in return.

"Oh, but that outdoor shower," she sighed effusively with a roll of her eyes. "Your body glistening in the sun, water sluicing off of your back and hair. That's one of those fantasy, hedonistic-type showers all women dream of, to have some fantastic sexual romp in with some chiseled stud." Her eyes raked over Severus possessively, definitely thinking Hawaii was not only good for his peace of mind, but his body as well.

"It's just some rock and wood with a shower head," he casually replied, pleased Hermione appreciated his body even more. Severus had had many a fantasy of having Hermione in that shower as he finally did that afternoon, but he wanted to draw out her opinion of it, since he did design the house with her in mind.

"But the aesthetic of it, Severus. It's simple, yet romantic. And those small ferns clinging to some of those rock ledges. The lovely potted orchids in bloom. And the placement of some of those rock and wooden ledges, if I didn't know better, you designed that shower for us to be able to easily make love in it." Some of those ledges were the perfect height for her to perch her arse on while Severus plowed into her, with a quick cushioning charm cast so as not to scrape her back against the lava rock.

Severus speared his salad and smiled to himself, pleased Hermione had noticed and liked the end result, even though the ferns grew there naturally without any help from him as the spores germinated and thrived in the well-shaded damp corners. "Well, remember," he reminded her, "this is our house. I built this for the both of us."

Hermione stopped eating her salad and placed her fork down to reach across the table and take hold of Severus' hand. Looking about the kitchen and dining room, she choked out, "I sometimes forget this is not just your home, but ours. Being stuck back in England, the reality of it seems so far away."

"But you will not be there forever," Severus reminded her and squeezed her hand back. "You will finish your apprenticeship. One day, hopefully soon, you'll move all your belongings here, and this will truly be our house. Our home."

"Then after lunch, can I get a tour of 'our' home and unpack?" she asked once more.

"Better unpack first. Should you be inspired to attack me in the other rooms, we've never get unpacked. And should we go out to dinner tonight, you'll need something to wear other than your warm English clothing or my fine linen shirt," he said. His eyes glanced down her front as his shirt gaped and bloused on her, revealing fleeting glances of her breasts to him.

Their trunks side-by-side, they twirled and waved their wands to unpack. Severus made room in his armoire for all of Hermione's clothes, pleased that Marf had packed all her formal dresses as well.

"Oh, it did come," Hermione exclaimed as Severus unpacked her Christmas present to him.

"I would have thought that the proprietors would have presented proof of receipt, given you probably paid handsomely for Portkey delivery all the way here," he surmised.

"They did, but I didn't notice it in the living room earlier."

"That's because I packed it in hopes of opening it with you Christmas morning back at your flat."

Hermione hugged Severus once again, still touched he had made the effort to come all the way to England to see her, especially as he did originally promise never to return. She did notice the smaller box he floated along her present to him as he moved them to the living room to place under the tree, and the tag indicating it was meant for her.
There was her own small pile of presents Hermione had to move from her trunk to under the tree, as it seemed Marf had packed some presents from Lavender and the twins. There were maybe half a dozen boxes from Lavender. They were all in the same very recognizable gold-foil-wrapped flat boxes she remembered from Madame Maurelle Mandel's House of Haute Couture. Probably some sexy lingerie for Hermione to put on only to be quickly taken off by Severus.

As for what the twins gave her, she could not guess. Hermione was thankful for the Undetectable Extension Charm that was included with the purchase of her new trunk, as one of the presents from the twins was larger than the trunk itself. The gift was about five-feet tall and two-and-a-half-feet wide and deep. There were a few other presents from the twins as well and she hoped none of them were too unseemly, for even they pushed the bounds of tastelessness to new levels. Still, Hermione certainly didn't mind making Galleons from products that they both profited from – products birthed from her most crude, crass, and lewd ideas voiced during her moments of resignation and desperation while enduring the twins' brainstorming sessions.

Hermione set Severus' birthday present to her by the side of the bed, eager to show him the portable paradise he'd given her. She had hoped to show it to him in India, but at least Marf had packed it for this trip.

Putting her dresses away, she noted Severus had a large number of short-sleeved shirts and few long-sleeved ones. Given Severus' reluctance to show his Dark Mark back in England, she surmised that the social taboos and the stigma attached to such a mark must not exist in Malu Palekaiko, for Severus to wear clothing that allowed his Mark to be seen openly.

Severus changed into clothing to run a quick errand, and Hermione was amazed Severus would wear a short-sleeved Hawaiian shirt, a pair of shorts, and sandals so casually and with ease. She mostly knew him buttoned up in his long frock coats. Sometimes during the summer he had dressed only in a long-sleeved shirt, devoid of a waistcoat or coat. And even then, he'd always worn trousers. This was some other tropical version of Severus she would have to get used to, just like the beard and less emotionally-reserved Severus she was now just acquainted with.

Changing from Severus' shirt into a cool cotton sun-dress from her summer wardrobe, Hermione felt much better, understanding how Severus could adapt to the native wardrobe. She still cast a cooling charm in the bedroom since she was finding the warmth of Hawaii a bit much, given the cold climate she just came from.

Hermione finished unpacking the last of her toiletries when Severus returned with news they had secured the last table at Mario's for Christmas Eve dinner.
Sidling up to him, she demurely played with the skin along his collarbone and neck. "I so longed to go out to dinner with you back in London. I'm glad I can finally walk out in public with you now, neither of us having to hide any longer."

Severus was not one to brag, and he had even been reluctant to tell others about Hermione, but now he could not wait to walk down the main street tonight with Hermione on his arm for anyone and everyone to see.

This would be their official debut as a couple together in public as themselves, not pretending to be an ordinary Muggle couple going by Hermione's maiden name, Granger.

No more hiding.

"Will you help me pick what dress to wear?" she asked. "You know the local fashion better than I."

Severus was no couture doyen. He could have told her that given the island's lax fashion standards she could have shown up in a simple pareo and rubber flip-flop sandals and fit right in with the clientèle at Mario's. Instead, he decided to ease her fears, remembering his own concerns about dressing appropriately during his first days of sanctuary.

Pulling the backless black number aside in the armoire, sliding it along the rod, he said, "If you wear this, we're never making it out the door." Pulling out the plum-colored two-piece dress robe outfit to glance at it, he said, "Too warm and more appropriate for business."

Looking at the red one and the matching cloak, he clearly recalled seeing Hermione in it the night she came to him after her anniversary dinner. A flood of conflicting memories came back to him as he studied it. It was the night she had said she wanted him, then ran away, leaving him misunderstanding her words. As wonderful as that color was on her, he could not bear to see her wear that dress again.

Hermione noticed how he was lost in thought while looking at it and stepped in. "I had no idea Marf packed that. I wouldn't have brought it. I have my own mixed feelings about this dress. I think I may just give it away since I'll never wear it again." That dress was her death shroud for her first marriage. It was a cursed garment for them both.

The only two dresses left were the purple one she'd worn to Viktor and Anne's wedding and the blue halter dress from the Ministry Halloween ball. "Leave the blue one for the New Year's Eve Ball, since I wanted to dance with you when last I saw you wear this," he said fondly.

Now that everything was packed away, Severus took her on yet another tour of the house, this one in person instead of a memory viewed through a Pensieve.

Severus showed off his new Pensieve, having bought it after his memory for her was made. She complimented him on his choice and oohed and ahhed over it, noting the depiction of Mnemosyne, the Greek goddess of memory in bas-relief around the base made of white marble.

He stood behind her and wrapped his arms about her waist as she admired it. "Lavender told me that you spend quite a bit of time using her Pensieve in your office Friday nights, based on reports from the house-elves," he murmured into her hair, which had become even wilder with the tropical humidity.

There was nothing she could keep secret from house-elves. She even noted that Marf cleaned her sex toys that kept her unsatisfactorily satisfied, much to her embarrassment and chagrin, before she had a chance to clean them herself sometimes. She wanted to tell the helpful creature he didn't have to do that, that she could wash her own sex toys, but was too mortified to broach the subject with him. And even when she cleaned her own, she noticed that they were more carefully arranged when she went back into the drawer she stored them in than when she originally put them away. Even when unpacking, Hermione found her stash of sex toys included in a discreet drawer and her emergency escape box. She was tired of toys and was ready for the real thing once more, but Hermione decided to leave them in the trunk for the time being, unless Severus wanted to incorporate them into their brief time together.

"Don't tell me that until you got this Pensieve of your own, your only fulfillment were fantasies and a calloused hand?" she asked, knowing Severus was far more inventive than he gave himself credit for in that regard.

"Well," he began, but felt slightly embarrassed, not sure how she would take to the news of his taking Polyjuice Potion and blending it with the hair she gave him a year ago. He gave a short sigh of exasperation and merely said, "I made do."

Hermione knew there was more. She decided this one time to prod him, hoping he could be as open and honest with her as he had been earlier in the day with his emotions.

Sliding out of his embrace and changing positions to stand behind, she wrapped her arms around him. Gliding one hand down his front to stroke his length through his cotton twill shorts, she purred against his back, "Severus, you know my little secret, though it seems it isn't much of a "Secret if Lavender and the house-elves know about it."

Severus shut his eyes, enjoying the friction of her hand along his slowly stiffening length.

"Tell me. Please," she asked sweetly.

"You did give me a fair amount of hair for the Polyjuice Potion last year," he reluctantly admitted, as he began to roll his hips in time to her hand movements.

Hermione's hand stopped. "You've Polyjuiced into me more than once?" she asked.

Severus' eyes opened, noticing the sudden cessation of Hermione's attention. 'I hope she's not upset.'

Hermione didn't know what to think. She knew he'd changed into her in order to flee the country, but to willingly change into her for sexual gratification? Maybe that was where he learned that new technique to stroke her clit and labia just so in that new way she'd enjoyed earlier, having spent time in her own body.

Her hand began to slowly stroke Severus through his shorts once again, this time more slowly. "What inspired you to do that?" She didn't sound upset nor disgusted, but merely curious.

"The first week we were here, I knocked up Draco and Ginny. Ginny opened the door of the honeymoon suite, or should I say, Draco Polyjuiced as Ginny answered the door and told me to come back several hours later. The smell on his breath was unmistakable."

Thoughts raced through Hermione's mind, and she didn't realize it, but her breath had become more labored and her grasp of Severus through his shorts firmer. Images of herself turned into Severus fucking herself filled her mind. She wondered what it would feel like as a man to have an orgasm, and for Severus to experience that sweet sensation of being filled as he entered her, and knowing what joys and pleasures she felt making love with him.

Severus said nothing, waiting for her response.
"Do you think that maybe..." Hermione began, but stopped, unable to say it since the concept was so new to her.

"You want to try Polyjuice Potion and trade places?" Severus asked, a slightly bemused lilt in his voice, sensing Hermione was quite turned on by the idea, but was too embarrassed to outright ask.

"Yes." She exhaled, her sigh full of lust, feeling herself get turned on by the idea alone. Her hand unzipped the front of his shorts and slipped into his underpants to grasp his cock. Inspired, she rocked her hips into Severus bottom, giving him a feeling of what it was like to have someone grinding against him from behind, despite her lack of equipment.

"You almost seem eager to try it right now," Severus said. He wondered himself how it would feel to be inserted by something other than his own fingers for once.

"If we didn't have those dinner reservations tonight, I would say why not."

Hermione steered Severus over toward a nearby bench with her hands guiding him, pushing his hips and waist where she wanted him to go. She spun him around and dropped to her knees as she finished yanking his shorts and underpants down far enough. Looking up at him, as her hand stroked his now rigid length, she said, "I can't wait to see what it feels like if you were to do this to me." She closed her eyes and engulfed him entirely in her mouth in one slow fluid motion.

Severus threw his head back and groaned loudly, his hands gripping the edges of the bench.

"See," Hermione said, stroking his cock with one hand, letting the tip of his cock rest against her lower lip as she talked, "I want to know how that feels for you." Her other hand began to cup his sac, gently playing with the hairs.

Severus felt a thrill shoot through him when Hermione began to caress him there and goosebumps raced along his thighs and flanks, coupled with her taking him back into her warm and willing mouth.

His hand moved from the bench to her hair. He played with her wild mane and slowly entrenched his fingers into her curls.

Hermione knew what he would do next, and she relaxed her throat as he began to fuck her mouth.
His plaintive sighs, the way his eyes would close and he would be lost in the sensation – she loved it all, as she looked up at him adoringly. She loved giving him pleasure, for he surely gave her plenty as well. And as vulgar as it may have been for her to say it aloud, she loved to suck Severus' cock.

Just as Severus began to pick up the pace, he stopped and hauled her up from the floor. He placed her in front of the bench and silently instructed to have Hermione brace her hands on the bench top.

He then settled in behind Hermione, yanking her knickers down until they only hung about one ankle so she could spread her legs, and hitching her dress up above her hips. Severus ground his cock up against her bottom, rubbing his head between the cleft of her cheeks. She arched her back in response.

"While you were turned into me," she panted, "did you ever feel your body naturally arch?"

Severus did notice while transformed into her, his body did respond differently. "Yes."

"Interesting," she sighed as she presented her backside to him.

Severus obliged and used his hand to guide himself into her, sinking deeply into her warmth. "How so," he groaned.

Leaning forward, relishing the sensation of the front of Severus' thighs slapping against the backs of her as he started to rhythmically slide in and out of her, she said through wistful sighs, "That means that while Polyjuiced as someone of the opposite sex, your body will instinctively respond." She grunted softly as Severus picked up the pace, slamming into her with more force. "To arch your back, to present yourself to be impaled, to feel that innate need to spread yourself wide to accept that magnificent cock of yours."

Severus grabbed a firmer hold of her hips and leaned forward, pinning her against the bench. He growled into her hair, "And you'll know how it instinctively feels to want to pound this delicious body, to ram myself deeply into you," he said through belabored grunts. "To revel in the maddening need to fill you until you come. To feel you milk my cock as you quiver and tremble around me, making love to you until I see you lost in the throes of an orgasm," he said, every other word coming out as a pant.

He reached around and began to stroke her clit.
She shrieked in response to the additional stimulus of his fingers. With one hand, she played with her nipple, tugging at it through her cotton dress and brassiere, wanting to increase the building epicenter of her orgasm she could sense was coming.

"Oh God, I can't wait to fuck you so you can know how good you feel." Seduced by her own statement, Hermione came, her cries choking in the back of her throat.

Severus shuddered and placed his head in the middle of her back as he came. Each time his balls seized and another spurt filled her, he grunted, his strokes becoming slower and more languid until he stopped entirely.

Hermione leaned forward, letting the cool metal bench top chill her nipples through her bunched up sun-dress-. The cool metal on the side of her face was quite refreshing, given how the tropical heat was finally starting to get to her. She could feel Severus breathe deeply against her back as he clung to her, hugging her from behind as if she were a piece of driftwood in the wide open seas.

When he withdrew from her, Hermione hissed. "Oh, I think I need some more of that salve. The lubrication potion wore off long ago," she noted with some resignation.

As she remained there bent over on the lab bench, she finally noticed with some detached observation – while ignoring the fact her arse was still fully on view – how Severus had half the benches topped with wood, and the other half with slabs of various stones or metals.

Severus pulled up his clothing before going to the other side of his lab and coming back with a small jar.

Tenderly, he applied the salve to her more abused parts. "I'm sorry. I guess we both got caught up in the moment. Though I could have used spit if you were that dry and desperate."

Hermione gave a hum of relief as the ointment soothed her. "I was too turned on to notice at the time. And spit? I'd rather you have opened that bottle of safflower oil on the shelf above our heads, since spit dries quickly." Once taken care of, she bent over, pulled her knickers up, and smoothed her dress down.

"You, me, a bottle of oil, and a hundred-square-foot sheet of six mil plastic sheeting. That sounds like a date," Severus said, finally thinking of a use for the roll of polyethylene sheeting he saw for Hermione stopped and looked at Severus, wondering where he picked up that particular Muggle terminology. "Six mil plastic sheeting?"

"There is a Muggle hardware section at the local general store, near the aisle where they sell paint," he explained upon seeing her regard him so curiously.

She shook her head, wondering just how much Muggle culture Severus had picked up in Malu Palekaiko. But first, they would finish the tour of their house together.

Showering once more without going at it yet again proved to be harder than they thought. Just as Hermione would soap Severus' back, her hand and the soap found other places to wash; this would distract Severus from the task of rinsing his hair, and resulted in a quick unfinished hand job. Hermione didn't protest either when Severus decided that he needed to spend at least five minutes to soap her breasts and lick the spray of water from her shoulder and neck. They decided that Severus would dress in the bedroom and Hermione would dress in the bathroom. Otherwise, they would definitely be late to dinner and never make it out the door, even with Hermione not wearing that little black backless dress Severus loved.

As he came into the bathroom to put on a small amount of cologne for her that night and brush his hair and beard one last time, he watched as Hermione finished pulling her hair up into an artfully arranged tangle of curls and tendrils.

"No, not quite right," he said absentmindedly to himself as he came over. With his finger, he pulled free one tendril and let it drape artfully down, halfway between the side and back on her neck so you could see it peeking out when viewed from the front. "There," he said with some satisfaction.

"I remember seeing you at Flourish and Blotts that sweltering night long ago. I noticed you observing me in the Potions aisle, and so I followed you to where I saw you reading up on family and marriage." Severus smiled to himself as he ran a finger along her neck, toying with the lock of her hair. "You had a tendril of hair on the back of your neck that refused to be tamed. And the more you played with it, the more I wanted to attach myself to your neck."

Hermione observed the look on Severus' face as he recounted that night, relishing in the light ministrations of his finger along her skin. She remembered that night too. "It was the scent of that cologne that made me stop to observe you. I caught the faintest hint of it and was going to ask whoever was wearing it what the name was. But then I saw you standing there in your black cloak and remembered how you said if we met in public, we would be but strangers to one another. I didn't want the enchantment to end."

Spinning around, she trailed her nose along the edge of Severus' collar, her hands placed palms down on his chest. "And I can smell that you used that same cologne to Haunt me with memories of you once more."

Severus smirked at her obvious pun. He also noticed Hermione was exuding a rather unique smell of her own now that she was in close proximity.

"I should ask you, what deliriously intoxicating scent are you wearing tonight," he purred and lifted her hand up to kiss her palm, inhaling the perfume more deeply, feeling his own senses reel.

"Something Albert and I have been working on. A match for Haunt. It smells different on each witch, amplifying her natural scents," she explained as his mouth began to trail kisses up the inside of her forearm, making it harder for Hermione to speak. "What do you smell?" she asked with a plaintive sigh.

"Gardenia, amber, bergamot," Severus recited. His eyes closed as he inhaled deeply, trailing his nose along the inside crook of her arm before sweeping her fully into his arms. He buried his nose at the base of her neck, smelling where she'd applied the tiniest amount to her pulse points. "Ylang-ylang, tuberose, tarragon, rose, oakmoss, and..." He inhaled once more deeply, enfolded her in his arms, and stopped. "Orange blossom."

Severus let go of Hermione and stepped back from her for a moment. Orange blossom was a scent he associated with Gabrielle. His first meeting with her was at the altar, and the scent of her bridal crown was his strongest memory of that particular fragrance.

It was an infinitesimal amount in the blend Hermione wore, he noted. Still, just naming it brought back a flood of memories, like a ghost from the past haunting him in his own way, just as his own scent haunted Hermione.

Noting the sudden change in his demeanor and how he had gone a little pale, Hermione placed a hand on his chest. "Severus, what's wrong?"

"I..." Severus had hardly thought about Gabrielle since coming to Malu Palekaiko, his thoughts mostly fixating on Hermione instead, and if or when they would be together again. His dead wife was like some apparition of the past reminding him of sins he had tried to absolve himself from for decades and put behind him with his new life. Severus had told Hermione about her. Surely, this was no time to be evasive with her. "Orange blossoms remind me of Gabrielle."

"I'm sorry if it brings back unpleasant memories. I'll just remove it," Hermione began, but was stopped when she reached for a tissue.

"No," Severus said as he gently grabbed her hand to stop her. "It's very minuscule and compliments the blending of other scents, plus the top note of lemon I also detect now. It smells divine on you. Leave it." He lifted her hand and tenderly kissed the inside of her wrist where she had placed a small drop earlier.

Orange blossoms were a part of Hermione and Gabrielle, just as they both had curious brown eyes, brown hair – Gabrielle's hair a light chestnut and Hermione's a dark chestnut, keen intelligence, and an insatiable quest for knowledge.

They also both had a certain air of righteous know-it-all common sense, the trait that caused Gabrielle to get herself killed. With Hermione, she'd used that particular trait to clear Severus' name and revoke the Death Eater Decree for him and Draco, in addition to ending a long string of election fraud. Severus could embrace that scent of orange blossoms on her, just as he embraced all those other traits that Hermione also happened to share with Gabrielle. It was a part of who she was that made him love her.

Severus was about to extend his arm to Hermione to begin escorting her to the restaurant, but was suddenly struck with another moment of inspiration.

"One moment," he said as he ducked off into the outdoor shower. Severus returned with a small spray of orchids.

Grabbing a spare hairpin Hermione had left on the counter, he began pinning it on the left side above her ear. "In Hawaii, a woman indicates if she is available or taken by the positioning of a flower behind her right or left ear," he explained.

Hermione was familiar with the custom, having read it in her tourist books, and understood the symbolism behind Severus placing it on her left side.

She admired the white orchids tipped with a vivid shade of purple that was a near match to her dress. "It's lovely," she said, gazing upon the vision of her and Severus in the bathroom mirror together.

"Our table awaits," Severus said as he stepped back and bowed courteously, kissing Hermione's hand, his eyes never leaving hers.

Hermione was strongly reminded of their early courtship days and how he would bow to her, kiss her hand, and help her with her cloak, slowly seducing his way into her heart. This was Hawaii and there was no cloak to help her with, since cloaks were very rarely if ever worn locally. But in England, there were no orchids to pin in her hair. She could adapt, with pleasure.

Tucking her arm in his, they set out into the deepening twilight of night towards town.

Leisurely strolling through town, Severus pointed out the various shops along the way to Mario's.

"That's the general store where I bought my Pensieve. They can Owl-Order or Portkey in anything from around the world, which is a great help to those who can't leave the safety of sanctuary."

He pointed to the shop across the road, their feet making a soft hollow thumping noise on the wide wooden boardwalk. "And that's the bookstore, Paige Spien's. Though not as extensive as Flourish and Blotts, there is a fair selection, plus she also has an exchange with a number of booksellers in San Francisco, Portland, Lima, Sydney, Tokyo, Beijing, Manila, Seoul, Seattle, Mexico City, and others. So if you want a particular book, she can get it, but finding something new through browsing you won't be as satisfied as at Flourish and Blotts."

They walked past the grocer who was just closing up, staying open extra late for those last-minute Christmas preparations and the forgotten extra pound of butter needed for baking.

"Severus! Who is your friend?" Lucinda asked.

Severus turned and presented his companion. "This is Hermione. She's here visiting for the week. And this is Lucinda, the town grocer."

Lucinda extended her hand to shake it, but not before wiping in on her apron. "Pleased to meet you. Well, I've got to finish closing up and go home to finish up some baking for tomorrow. Mele Kalikimaka, you two."
"Mele Kalikimaka, Lucinda," Severus said, not tripping over the saying like he did a year ago.

"She seems nice," Hermione said. She smiled at the witch as Lucinda used her wand to put away her produce display stands for the night and holiday, moving them from the sidewalk to inside the store.

"A lot of the people in this town are nice," Severus said with no sarcasm.

Hermione patted his arm, noting Severus seemed to be happy amongst these townsfolk.

As they continued their walk towards Mario's, a familiar place came into view. Bongo's had its doors wide open, as usual. Inside were revelers having a cup of Christmas cheer on Christmas Eve.

Severus could hear the band merrily playing away, a bluesy-folk rendition of a Christmas hymn that was normally sung with great solemnity reinterpreted to be a bit more cheerful with a faster tempo. From the flourishes on the piano, he could tell Jerry was tickling the ivories that night.

Looking up, she saw the shingle hanging outside the bustling bar. "Is this the infamous Bongo's?" Hermione asked with great interest, stopping at the open doors to observe the scene.

"The one and only." Severus spied Jerry just as he suspected, along with Agnes. The old witch was strumming away, playing a guitar solo while Maurice was squeezing and bellowing his accordion with the basic melody. There were a few people with brass horns, and someone had brought their cello to the bar to join in the nightly impromptu jam session.

Jerry looked up and spotted Severus and Hermione standing out on the sidewalk, the light of the bar bathing them in the warm yellow and red glow of the tavern lights. The Charms and Transfiguration tutor who worked with Severus was glad to see that everything worked out, and Hermione did indeed make it to Hawaii as Draco informed him. It was strange to see Severus dressed so formally, as he was wearing a neatly pressed long-sleeved white shirt buttoned up to his neck, long black trousers, a smartly fitted and tailored waistcoat, and a very beautiful witch on his arm. And that Hermione looked just as stunning as the photo of her on Severus' desk back at the shop.

Wrapping up the song in short order, Jerry mumbled something to the band as Hermione and Severus looked on, the witch fascinated by the local flavor.
Catching Severus' eye, Jerry gave an exaggerated wink at him before launching into a new song.

The band joined in, familiar with the old standard, and Jerry began to croon.

"Kiss me once and kiss me twice
Then kiss me once again
It's been a long, long time
Haven't felt like this, my dear
Since I can't remember when
It's been a long, long time..."

It was definitely sung for Severus' benefit and hers.

Hermione leaned against Severus, not missing the lyrics. She swayed back and forth a bit, suddenly remembering it had been over a year since they had danced together.

Severus encouraged Hermione continue on towards the restaurant, but once past the open doors of Bongo's where no one else could spy them, and noting the rest of the street was deserted, Severus pulled Hermione into his arms and began a slow foxtrot in time to the music.

Hermione threw her head back and laughed softly at the sudden spontaneity of Severus dancing with her out in public. They moved within the narrow confines of the sidewalk, keeping it simple. The song was shortly over, and Severus spun her once under his arm as the tune ended.

Tucking her arm back into his, she leaned slightly to the right, resting her head a little on Severus' shoulder as they finished walking the last few doors down to Mario's.

Severus opened the door to the restaurant and was greeted by Mario himself.

"Good evening, Severus. I can't tell you how pleased I was to learn you made reservations, and for two," the Italian wizard and chef said, drinking in the sight of Hermione on his arm.

Mario had come from Italy a couple decades prior, but still had a rather strong accent. He had sought sanctuary after his own dealings with the local mafia; he had enacted a bit of his own justice before coming to Malu Palekaiko, similar to Jerry's story. Before Mario's arrival, there were no fine dining establishments in Malu Palekaiko, nor any decent European cuisine of note, other than dining privately in the home of someone who was originally from Europe.

"Mario, may I present Hermione," Severus said with some pride, his chest puffing out the tiniest bit.

Mario bowed and grasped Hermione's hand to kiss the top of it. "Piacere! Ah. Hai rotto il fiato."

"He says it's a pleasure to meet you, and that you take his breath away," Severus faithfully translated for her.

"Grazie, Mario. I look forward to dining here, since I've heard such good things about it from Severus and other friends," Hermione said, remembering how Lavender was thrilled with the food and service. The founder of The Lovely Lavender Company was fairly hard to impress, considering all the fine dining establishments she frequented all over the world.

"Prego," Mario said humbly. "See? She speaks Italian already and as beautifully as she looks. She is a keeper, Severus, my friend."

Severus shook his head, knowing that Hermione wasn't the only beautiful witch to be charmed by Mario's suave manners and welcoming hospitality. He remembered when he, Draco, and Ginny first came to this restaurant.

"Come. I have a nice table for you in the back where you won't be disturbed." Mario beckoned them to follow him with a subtle gesture of his hand. He had two menus and a wine list tucked under his other arm.

As Severus and Hermione walked through the long and narrow restaurant, other diners stopped their conversations to notice that one of the town's few Potions masters, and one of the top eligible bachelors, was in the company of a beautiful and unknown witch. It did not escape the couple's attentions how the other diners' eyes raked over Hermione, surveying her and noticing how formal Severus was dressed compared to his more local casual look. They were by far the most formally dressed couple in the entire restaurant. Many of the men were wearing merely clean and not too wrinkled Hawaiian shirts or T-shirts and a clean pair of shorts. The women were also in very cool and casual dresses, or Hawaiian shirt and matching short outfits. It also escaped no one's attention there was a spray of orchids carefully placed behind Hermione's left ear.
After Mario helped Hermione into her seat, they accepted their menus and Severus was handed the wine list before Mario wished them "Buon Appetito."

Looking at the menu with her eyes never leaving it, Hermione said casually, "I think we're now officially the talk of the town."

Hermione was sitting with her back to the long wall. Out of the left corner of her eye, she saw the other diners' heads bent together while casting curious glances their way. Severus had the full view, sitting to Hermione's immediate right. He could see the eyes dart their way and even noticed how the conversation in the restaurant jumped by a few decibels once the newly-arrived couple walked through the length of the packed restaurant.

"This island is a hotbed haven for gossip and speculative rumors, since there is little else to take up their free time in this quiet town," Severus remarked dryly, with a hint of bitterness. He did not like to be talked about in such fashion, nor did he want Hermione to be the center of town gossip.

Hermione had been the center of gossip back home for nearly a year. She was no longer fazed by it. First she was the witch who was dumped by her rising-star Quidditch-player husband for a beauty queen. Then she was the witch who started that "awful Muggle fad of divorce and broken engagements." Next she was heralded in the tabloids and papers throughout Great Britain as that Muggle-born who exonerated two ex-Death Eaters, though her fame for finally discovering Dumbledore's will took a back seat to the more lurid news of her work to clear Severus and Draco's name and the irony of it, given her Muggle heritage. And the latest was that she was that pitiful, divorced witch who worked for her ex-husband's new wife who had just had a baby. There was even rampant speculation that Ron had left her for Lavender because Hermione was infertile. In each reincarnation of the gossip that surrounded her, there was always a footnote about how she was friends with Harry Potter.

If anything, Hermione knew that once people's curiosity was satisfied, they moved on to something else to occupy it.

"I know how to stop them staring at us," Hermione said.

"What, cast a Disillusionment Charm?" he asked with some sarcasm, stating the obvious.

"No, this," she said as she set her menu down and craned her neck to the side. With her right hand, she cupped Severus' cheek and guided him into a spontaneous kiss.
It was not a kiss filled with burning passion, but with slow sensuality. Hermione did not consume Severus with her kiss as she did earlier in the day. Instead, she slowly caressed his lips with hers as the tip of her tongue teased the tip of his.

Severus was surprised by the suddenness of Hermione kissing him in public, but did not fight it. His hand gently stroked her neck, sensing the mood set by her kiss.

Hermione pulled away and smiled at him. Without looking over her shoulder, she said softly, "They aren't looking at us anymore, are they?"

Severus was so enraptured by her sudden and swift seduction of that simple kiss that he had to tear his eyes away from hers to look. Sure enough, just as she predicted, everyone was back to minding their own business, and the level of conversation in the restaurant was back down to a more restful drone.

"How did you know?" Severus asked, wondering what inspired her to that bit of insight.

"Everyone was curious. You could see it in their faces and hear it in their hushed whispers. Satisfy their curiosity, and they move on to something else to occupy their free time in this quiet town," she hearkened back to his earlier statement.

"So you put on a show of public affection for their amusement?"

"I wanted to kiss you regardless. But if it also served the purpose of letting us enjoy our meal in peace, then I was willing to let them watch. Besides, we don't have to hide anymore," she reminded him.

"No, we don't," Severus agreed, and reached out to hold her hand on top of the table.

The waiter eventually came over. Severus ordered for the both of them and chose a nice Campania white wine, made from grapes grown somewhere along the Amalfi Coast. Severus selected the traditional Italian Seven Fishes Christmas Eve dinner. Mario was a master at preparing the local seafood, and he wanted Hermione to have the best of everything during her first visit to Malu Palekaiko.

But first there was the aperitivo. Severus had ordered a split of champagne to go with the first course of freshly shucked raw oysters, served with a shallot and champagne vinegar mignonette. Pouring the champagne, Severus tilted the glasses to keep the foam from bubbling over the edge.

"What shall we toast to?" Hermione asked, holding her glass up.

"To the best Christmas present ever given to me," he said, still amazed she was there with him, and Draco and Albert's scheming to bring her there to him.

"And best present to me as well," Hermione amended as they clinked.

The next course was salmon, marinated red pepper, and crème fraîche blended with artichoke, topped with a slice of Kalamata olive. It was Italian, but definitely had some French influence in the presentation.

The primo course was a traditional Linguine con le Vongole. Hermione marveled at how well the clams were done, not overcooked; and the broth was flavorful without being over-garlicky. Even during her previous trip to Italy – many of her trips lately were with Albert – the linguine with clams had a broth that was often too oily or too heavy-handed with the garlic. Mario's linguine course was sublime and light, and not too large, since there were still four more courses to go. Hermione appreciated the fact that the portions were small, since there were so many dishes she and Severus were going to be served.

For the secondo, or main entrée, Mario served up baked eel with lemon, olives, and capers, alongside braised squid with tomatoes, and sautéed scallops wrapped in basil leaves and topped with a light Alfredo sauce. There was a small and neatly arranged pile of freshly steamed spinach – drizzled lightly with olive oil, freshly cracked pepper, and nutmeg – served as the contorno, or side dish, alongside the trio of seafood.

In between each course, Hermione and Severus talked, able to have those languid conversations they once had as they sat by the fire, their lust sated and bellies full of good food and fine wine in Severus' flat. Hermione asked him more about his Potions shop and business, while he asked about her apprenticeship and her work with Lavender.

Just as one course was cleared away, there was a pause until the next course was served, timed to be a long and languid meal that makes one truly appreciate a fine dining experience. In those periods between courses, Hermione and Severus held hands, gazing deeply into each other's eyes highlighted by the ambient candlelight and the small votive on the table. Periodically, they were so lost in each other's eyes, they hardly noticed when the next course would suddenly appear on the table in front of them.
As much as Hermione loved the many wonderful and romantic dinners Severus had cooked for her, it was nice that they could forget about the kitchen and dishes, even though Marf helped a great deal. Both she and Severus were being catered to, pampered by the wonderful service, and served with superb seafood dishes.

Even Severus enjoyed the fact he didn't have to think about anything overcooking or busy steaming away in the kitchen, even if Marf could be there to attend to it. All of Severus' attention was on Hermione and Hermione alone.

The insalata came, which was a simple salad with small shrimp, lemon, olive oil, parsley, basil, oregano, pepper, and tender baby lettuces.

After the salad course, Hermione wasn't sure if she could eat any more. Granted, she and Severus only had a light salad for lunch, but there was much more protein she consumed during dinner. She wasn't sure she could eat anything else, and yet she still wanted dessert.

Even Severus was at his limit. And he was looking forward to Mario's cannoli, which he'd had on previous visits, but he wanted Hermione to try them herself.

When the plates disappeared back to the kitchen, Mario saw the diners didn't finish their salads. He came out of the kitchen.

"I sense that you've left no room for dessert," Mario correctly surmised.

"Once again, an excellent meal, good sir."

"Grazie," Mario bowed slightly toward Severus in recognition of his compliment.

"Yes, it was better than I could have hoped. Dinner was perfect, except that I can't face dessert," Hermione admitted. "Normally when we would dine together, we would have dessert at a much later time, after letting dinner settle for a while."

"Then let me pack it up to go for you, so that you may enjoy it later, after dinner has settled, as you say," Mario offered.
"Thank you, that would be appreciated." For once, Severus was able to pull out his money and pay, since the last time they dined in public, Hermione had to pay for everything with her credit card and Muggle money.

It really was nice to be free from the restrictions of the Death Eater Decree, able to treat Hermione like he had wanted to.

Severus left a generous tip for Mario for the wonderful meal, choice table location, and accommodating his request for a last-minute reservation on Christmas Eve.

As Hermione and Severus strolled arm-in-arm down the middle of the street, Hermione looked up and finally got a good look at the looming black silhouette of the volcano that rose up above the town. She could see the faintest red glow from the lip of the caldera, as the volcano had been active recently. The flow even reached the northwest side of the island, burning through some uninhabited forestland.

"I forget you live in the shadow of a volcano. Isn't there a risk of the town or people's houses being in the path of a lava flow?" she asked, having read about some homes on the Big Island being covered with lava periodically.

"As long as people are respectful of Pele and make their offerings, their homes and this town are safe," Severus said matter of factly.

Hermione stopped walking, which caused Severus to stop as well. Looking at him strangely and slightly shocked by Severus' statement, she said, "I didn't take you for a religious person, Severus."

"It's not religion based on faith when Pele exists," he said with a tone to indicate he was not joking, nor had he imbibed in the locals' own special brand of Kool-Aid. "It's her magic that gave me protection from being hauled back to England when Potter found me. Did Potter tell you what happened when he laid hands on Ginny our first day when he tracked us here?" Of course he did not want to mention his and Mounga's personal experience coming across Pele in real life, nor his spotting of her during the Pele Festival. It would sound too fantastical and delusional.

Hermione began walking once more alongside Severus, weighing his words and trying to remember. "No, Harry merely said that he found Ginny, that he'd known about you and me since the night of my anniversary dinner with Ron, since he saw me leaving your flat that night, and that he was willing to finally listen to my claims that you and Draco were always faithful to the Order.
That, and he was going away for a bit." She heaved a great sigh, remembering the day and all the sorrow and anxiety she went through.

"Well, Potter showed up in the late morning, while I was sleeping. He barged into Draco and Ginny's suite at Justina's hotel, just down the hall from my room. Halulu showed up and informed him that Ginny was under the protection of the island's magic, but Potter did not understand the finer implications of her statement. He grabbed Ginny in order to throw some clothes on her, or so he claimed, and he disappeared without her. They found him transported back in front of the Portkey office. He was lucky: some Aurors and bounty hunters have been transported to treetops, shark-infested lagoons, three miles out to sea, and on a rare occasion, the edge of the caldera if they attempt to take a person who has been granted sanctuary from this place."

Hermione laughed and shook her head. "No, Harry did not tell me about that. Neither did Draco or Ginny inform me of that, but I do remember from your memory of Dumbledore's own experience trying to bring back some of Grindel--"

"Shh!" Severus shushed her, not wanting to be overheard by anyone out late for a walk. "Since the Headmaster tried to bring some of his followers back, I'm not quite sure who still might have issues with the old Headmaster. Draco and I have avoided mentioning the Headmaster and his old war foe by name, to avoid those who might have issue with us being aligned with him."

Hermione could see the need to hide one's past. "Of your past, who knows about you and Draco here?"

"Mouna processed my request for sanctuary, Gary Fujitani processed Draco. Halulu processed Ginny and knows of us through our association with Ginny, but Mouna is the only one who knows all my secrets. Even ones I've never told you or Draco, and will never mention again," he said solemnly, his eyes cast down on the pavement in front of them as they wound their way back home.

Hermione had heard from Draco and Ginny about the use of Veritaserum in the granting-of-sanctuary interviews. She wondered, if she was forced to drink that much Veritaserum, would she remember things she had purposely put out of her mind and forgotten? She did not want to know first-hand.

Finally back at the house, Severus put the cannoli away.

"Stretching, Hermione asked as she headed towards the bedroom, "Care to make use of one more vial of Sequoia?"
"I was thinking we could make use of the Finaus' gift to us and visit the hot springs tonight. Otherwise we'll have to wait until my usual day, Wednesday," Severus countered.

"Can we do both?" she counter-offered. Hermione had had many fantasies of making love in one of those beautiful tropical pools she had seen in her tourism books. The fact that the twins' portable tropical paradise also had a mini-soaking pool with waterfall included only fueled her desire for an idealized romp in the water.

Considering all the wanking he had done in the hot springs thinking of Hermione, a visit there was only the natural next step considering she was finally there in the flesh. Severus guessed he wasn't going to let his muscles relax in the hot water after all, if he was going to put them to work some more that night.

Severus undressed quickly, changing into a pair of shorts, a plain black T-shirt Ginny once gave him as some joke, and some rubber flip-flop sandals. He then grabbed a couple towels.

"What are you doing?" Severus asked as he saw Hermione trying to shimmy into a one-piece bathing suit that Marf had packed for her.

"Getting changed for the hot springs, of course."

"You won't be needing that. Just something to throw over yourself for now, as we will undress there," he informed her, smiling with anticipation of more fantasies of his coming true shortly.

"What about other people?" she asked, not getting the finer points of Draco's comment that the Finaus' gave them use of the hot springs that night.

"We have it all to ourselves until sunrise. It's under a Fidelius Charm and no one else will show up, unless they want to risk losing their weekly privileges when it is clearly not their turn." Severus threw the towels over his shoulder while he waited for Hermione to get out of her swimsuit and find a pair of cotton knickers, a loose cotton dress, and sensible sandals, since she'd noted Severus' choice of footwear.

Side-Along Apparating there together, they waited for a moment while their eyes adjusted to the sudden darkness.
“Lumos.” Severus held his wand out in front of himself so he could see where he was walking and make his way from the Apparition platform up the stone stairs to the soaking pool. Hermione also cast the same charm and followed, watching where he was stepping.

As they reached the top of the short staircase, they ended the charm and let darkness surround them.

Hermione gasped in admiration as her eyes finally adjusted.

The waxing gibbous moon was near its zenith, bathing the entire hot spring in bright silvery light. The light of the moon was reflected off of the white flowers of the crepe ginger, white clock-vine, and the sprawling white and purple passiflora vine that scrambled along the edges of the pool.

A small waterfall cooled the magma-heated hot spring and created ripples in the water that caught the moonlight, giving it a banded texture of silvery white and blackest ebony across the surface of the water.

Hermione wanted to view this place in the daylight and see the vivid greens of the palm trees and bamboo that looked black when silhouetted against the starry moonlit sky.

Severus guided her over to a bench and a chopped-down, denuded tree that was merely a trunk with stumps where branches once grew. The stumps now served as places to hang clothing. There were holes drilled into the tree where you could store your wands.

They slipped out of their clothing and hung them on the old tree before Severus guided Hermione to an entrance point with steps, holding her hand so she did not slip.

"Oww," Hermione protested at the roughness of the porous lava stones beneath her feet.

"Your feet will toughen up a bit once you live here," he said as he restrained a small hiss of his own. Due to the ice pox, Severus' tolerance for extreme hot and cold temperatures was still not what it once was, but he was exposing himself gradually to more extreme temperatures to build it back up once more.
"Hah! Bit hot," Hermione complained.

"It's cooler over here," Severus said as he guided her closer to the waterfall, where a cool stream cascaded down the rock face.

They had already taken their doses of their respective potions back at the house. They were both feeling quite inspired by more than the elixirs they imbibed, feeling the effects of their surroundings more to enhance their mood.

Hermione dipped her head underwater and pulled her hair away from her face. She moved towards Severus in the moonlight.

Severus sat mid-chest deep in the water, having found one of the many custom seats that were built into the pool for people to sit on, and to better relax along the edge of the hot springs.

Hermione reached Severus and stood up, letting the water run in rivulets down her body, dripping off the tips of her breasts.
Watching her, he felt his heart beat faster. "You look like a water nymph in the moonlight," Severus said in awe of the sight of Hermione in the pale luminescence. Her body was bathed in the palest silvery blues, the water droplets clinging to her body sparkling like the twinkling of the stars. For a moment, she could have been the vision of an actual goddess to him.

She felt more confident and wanted to let Severus see her naked in the moonlight. "Were I Langia, that would make you Himeros, the Greek god of sexual desire," she lightly joked, recalling Severus' explanation for the magically arousing effects of Fairy Brandy. "I did mention earlier today you were a sex god."

Hermione went to straddle Severus, careful not to scrape her knees on the rough stone that lined the pool. With the Sequoia potion in effect, he was already hard when they Apparated to the hot springs. In the water, she felt him still erect in the hot water.
"I can't tell you how many nights I've fantasized about being with you in these hot springs, making love with you in the moonlight," she confessed. Hermione sighed as she guided Severus into her, feeling a bit more friction than usual as the water partially washed away the natural lubrication.

Severus, feeling Hermione nearly floating away from him and trying to impale herself further, helped by grabbing her hips and pulling her down onto him. This caused her to gasp as hot water was also pushed into her with the force of Severus’ cock, causing a momentary expansion of her vaginal walls.

Hermione remembered sex in the bath with Severus, but in the hot spring there was a lot more room to play around. She missed the sensation of friction and sex in the water, plus the way water would be pushed into her with each stroke, creating a fuller feeling.

"Oh, how I love you, Severus," she sighed as she let Severus guide the pace with the use of his hands.

The ripples on the surface of the water changed, becoming choppier with the addition of the ripples caused by Hermione riding Severus in one corner of the pool.

Hermione stifled her cries, not sure where the nearest neighbor was. Had she known it was at least a few miles away, she would have been more vocal.

Severus sighed and groaned with delight, hardly believing this was actually coming true. She was here and making love to him in the moonlight, confessing her love for him – and he was deliriously happy. He sat up straighter and grasped tightly onto her, wrapping his arms around her torso, pushing her down onto him as he thrust up from underneath. Her breasts were rubbing up against his upper chest and neck, so he took one nipple into his mouth and sucked as hard as he knew Hermione could tolerate.

She threw her head back and screamed, no longer caring if anyone heard them.

Unable to hold out any longer, Severus came, throwing his head back along the edge of the pool and shouting and swearing as he came.

Hermione slowed down as she sensed Severus soften momentarily, but she knew it would be a temporary situation since the Sequoia potion would make him hard quickly.
Climbing off him to sit next to him, she was about to sit down until Severus indicated he had other plans.

He reached up and patted the edge of the pool, indicating he wanted Hermione to instead sit along the edge of the pool and dangle her legs in the water. Initially she sat down, but then got up to fetch her wand to cast a cushioning charm along a large swath of the pool's edge. This would enable them to sit anywhere they pleased during their visit without the rocks scratching them.

Sitting back down once again, Hermione watched as Severus, looking like some mischievous satyr hoping to seduce her, moved towards her, parting her legs. Sometime during her visit, she would have to share the hallucination she had while taking her Greek exam, by watching the memory together with Severus in his Pensieve.

Hermione reclined back a bit, placing her hands on the ground behind her to brace herself as she observed Severus trail kisses up the inside of her thighs until his face was firmly planted at the apex of her thighs.

His tongue went to work licking, sucking, and nibbling, even using his nose to probe at her entrance. He chuckled when she spread her legs wider. Hermione was intrigued by the idea of Severus fucking her with that prominent nose of his. As he pressed his nose into her entrance, his tongue eventually darted out and licked at her anus.

During their time together, Severus had played with her arse periodically with his fingers, but he had never placed his tongue there before. Hermione was always a little bit uncomfortable and a whole lot of shy regarding Severus and the concept of rimming, but given the moment and the spontaneity of the moment, Hermione was not adverse to the idea for once.

"Yes," she sighed as she spread her thighs wider to allow him greater access.

Severus couldn't believe it. He had been wanting to give her pleasure in this way for a long time now, but he'd chosen to wait until she was more receptive. Now she was willing to let him try. To get better access, Severus asked her to flip over, laying her stomach and torso across the stones surrounding the pool, while her legs were in the pool, presenting her arse for his and her pleasure. He was thankful she'd thought to cast a cushioning charm.

Given her previous concerns regarding hygiene, Severus went for his own wand. He cast a specialized cleansing charm in Greek that he'd learned from an ancient Greek book on erotica, a rare tome he once browsed in the Malfoy library.

Hermione felt a sensation that was warm then cool, as she listened to the charm in Greek, translating the combined words in her mind. It was actually quite arousing, feeling a slight tingling sensation around and just inside her anus. Severus had told her that it was another erogenous zone, and his finger-play in that area did indeed prove that it was one for her, but until now she wasn't ready to entertain the idea of Severus sticking his tongue down there.

Severus set his wand down and caressed Hermione's arse. He could tell from the tension in her legs she was a little nervous. To soothe her, he decided to begin with familiar territory. As his fingers rubbed at her clit lazily, making her back arch even more, this allowed him the opportunity to delve in and lap at her labia and entrance to her vagina.

He rarely feasted on her from behind, but she really liked it, especially the sensation of his beard against her thighs and outer labia. She could even feel his beard tickling her clit, adding more sensation to the act.

Sensing she was relaxed and more receptive, Severus moved his fingers to probe her while his tongue begun to work on Hermione's other entrance. He delicately ran his tongue around her outside on a slow circular motion, which caused Hermione to gasp with delight in that way when she was experiencing something new to her.

Hermione reached her hands behind and spread herself a little wider for Severus, indicating she was willing.

Her head spun in the delirium of hedonistic experimentation she had always considered taboo, but her own research and exploration of erotica she had read over the past year had expanded her horizons and opened a willingness to finally try this with Severus. There were books similar to the erotic Arabian tome Hermione had found and bought. She read it at night with her fingers frantically working away, making herself orgasm to the thoughts of Severus trying those other avenues of pleasure on her.

As his tongue slipped into her anus, she let out a shuddering sigh, feeling the thrill of all those untouched nerves being stimulated for the first time that way. It also helped that Severus' fingers were deftly working on her clit and G-spot simultaneously, manifesting in a burning heat building in her abdomen.

The pitch of her cries intensified as she rocked her hips against Severus' hands and mouth until she could bear the tension no longer. It was a strange sensation to be invaded by Severus' soft and warm tongue, but it was also better than she'd anticipated.

Severus was tempted to replace his fingers with his cock, as Hermione often begged him to do in the past when he fingered her, but he resisted, even when he felt her flesh flutter and ripple around his digits. He let her crest through oral and manual manipulation, despite how his body demanded that he slip into her once more.

Panting heavily, Hermione slipped back down into the warm waters once more, blissfully relaxed from yet another orgasm. She had had so many that day that she had lost count.

Leaning her head back against the stones while gazing up at the stars above her head and the moon that was nearly blinding in its brightness, she sighed contentedly. "I think this tops my birthday and that weekend in Weybourne for most romantic day ever, Severus." She was blissfully tranquil.

Severus sat back down beside her and placed a hand on her thigh. "It could be one of many yet to come together." His stomach was tight with nervousness, but the romantic setting, the time, and Hermione's statement inspired him to seize the moment.

"When I'm done with my apprenticeship, I will return. And we can live together in our house."

Severus wanted more than just to share a house together, he wanted to share a life with Hermione that was a bit more than sharing a bed. He wanted much more, eventually, and he was willing to wait for her.

"When I left you, I gave you permission to move on with your life." He lifted his head up to gaze upon her face as she was still dreamily staring up at the stars and moon above. "I know I've mentioned this before, but I can't stress how much I regretted letting go of you. And when you go home, to your other home back in London, I don't want you to leave without there being a promise of sorts between us. That not only will you live with me, but that you'll be mine and mine alone, and I yours."

Hermione lifted her head to gaze at Severus, watching his brow, the high part of his cheek and nose highlighted by the moon while the rest of his face was cast into dark shadow. There was a very serious tone in his voice. She wanted to assure him that she was always his, but given their time apart, both knew the history of what had transpired, and both had regretted it.

"What are you saying specifically?" Hermione asked, knowing this was Severus' way of coming around to something important he wanted to tell or ask her. The tightening feeling in her stomach sensed what he was going to say next.

"Marry me, Hermione."

Chapter End Notes

Thank you to my lovely betas, JuneW and Hope. You make fanfic so much better, especially mine.

Title taken from the song "It's Been a Long Long Time." Written by Jule Styne and Sammy Cahn.

Su tesorito: "your little treasure" in Spanish.

Piacere: Pleasure OR It’s a pleasure to meet you!

Hai rotto il fiato: You took my breath away.
"A Promise"

Chapter Summary

It's Christmas morning, let's see what Hermione and Severus will unwrap besides each other.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter One Hundred Two
"A Promise"

Disclaimer:
Sung to "Jingle Bells"

Disclaimers, disclaimers,
Disclaiming all the way
Oh, what fun it is to say
Rowling owns Potter, okay?

Disclaiming through this bit
In a one-hack written fic
Copyright, we know
I'm not infringing it
Warner Bros. and Scholastic have some rights
To a billion-dollar franchise
The lawyers sleep tonight

A/N: Disclaimer a parody of "Jingle Bells."

"Marry me, Hermione," Severus said.

A laugh bubbled up from Hermione's throat. She didn't mean to laugh, but suddenly she felt quite overwhelmed.
Severus didn't know if she was laughing from relief that he'd finally asked her, laughing from joy that he'd asked her, or – the least likely of possibilities but still one – laughing at him.

"Oh, Severus! There is still so much we didn't talk about before you left. Things I wanted to talk with you about, but we didn't since you were going and I originally planned not to come with you," she said, her voice still punctuated with the occasional tension-filled titter.

Severus was relieved, but he sensed there was something else.

"One day, I would love to marry you, Severus, but right now I have an apprenticeship to finish up, and then I have to get the new operations here up and running. and get everything going here with work." The pitch in her voice was rising as if she was going to go into a full panic. "I don't know if I can deal with the pressure of an engagement on top of all that I have to do."

Now fully agitated, Hermione stood up out of the water and started pacing about the pool. All her feelings of euphoric relaxation were gone, now replaced with a building tension in her neck.

"I mean, I have just begun learning Japanese, and I hear that it can easily take six months to be barely proficient enough to pass just the written exam, not even passing the highly contextual Potions texts using subtle cultural clues as to the meaning of true ingredients hidden within the pseudonyms used for ingredients or directions," she railed on in a ceaseless patter, becoming more hysterical. "And then I have to move on to Chinese, and all this before Lavender hopes to start operations by summer? I'll never do it all in time." She was close to bursting into tears.

"Shh." Severus attempted to calm her, which only made her more vexed and aggravated.

"I don't know how I'm going to do it all," she wailed as she broke down into tears.

Severus understood the pressure she was under. He had heard from Ginny and Lavender about how Hermione had pushed herself nearly over the edge the summer before. Hermione was prone to over-exhausting herself by trying to do everything and then some.

"I'm sure we can work something out," he assured her, his voice becoming more business-like. With a firm tone to bring her back down from her near-hysterics, he asked, "How close are you to mastering your Code of Ethics?"
"I should be ready to have Albert test me on that by March."

"And you've taken you Anatomy and Potions Ingredients tests and passed those as well, correct?" he asked, to mentally check them off in his head.

"Yes," she replied, still feeling there was no solution in sight.

"And on this trip, you're testing your original potion that you developed yourself for your apprenticeship?"

"Yes, but that still doesn't include the Japanese and Chinese languages I have to master, which may mean another year or more!"

"True, true, but wait. You're almost done with your Herbology internship?" Severus asked.

Hermione turned her head away remembering that it was Neville with whom she had been serving her year-long Herbology internship, a flicker of shame flaring in her gut. "Yes, one more month and then I'm done." Her internship, which should have ended by New Year's Day, had been extended one month due to her taking a whole month in summer to recover from her attack and prepare for her trial in front of the Wizengamot to clear Severus and Draco's names.

"Then once you're done with taking your Code of Ethics test and Japanese test as well, you can study your Chinese language here. We have a lot of Chinese immigrants and bi-lingual descendants here on the island, and I'm already fluent in Chinese, so I can help you." Severus smiled, pleased with himself that he'd found a solution to help Hermione with her time conflict and bring her back to him faster.

"But what about my inability to change masters during my apprenticeship?" she asked, not wanting to ruin her standing in the community after putting in all that hard work.

"Some masters – not all, but some – will send their apprentices away for anywhere from two months to six months to the country in which they are to learn a language. During that time, they continue learning their Code of Ethics, broaden their exposure to Potions ingredients from other countries, get Herbology experience in a different climate, and continue studying anatomy. But considering you were already an ingredients expert before you even started your apprenticeship, and you had already been working on your anatomy studies for months as well, you are ahead of the game. Most apprenticeships take three years. Because of your previous experience, you are whittling it down to around two years," Severus explained, trying to calm Hermione down. He was feeling that he was succeeding since she was no longer pacing about, but sitting down back in the warm waters to consider his second proposal of the night.

He continued his explanation. "You'll be doing your language immersive studies at the end of your apprenticeship, which makes it no less valid. You have already done all the theory work and other academic studies that require direct tutelage from your master, except for your Code of Ethics, which is still mostly learning from a book rather than oral instructions." Severus moved behind Hermione and began massaging her shoulders, trying to make the tension in her neck that he knew was growing there dissipate. "And often, a master will pass the apprentice into the hands of another master for supervision during some of his or her language studies."

"Is that more common when a master is unfamiliar with a language an apprentice is learning?" Hermione asked.

"Yes, so technically, you are not switching masters, which is what our fellow masters and mistresses frown upon. You are merely seeking the resource of another master to help you complete your studies, in an area which your current master is unable to do. And if I remember correctly, Albert's grasp of Chinese is not as good as mine, so I'm doing you a service. Plus, given that you have a full-time job that will be making full use of your Potions skills, in addition to running a Potions-based business, that also qualifies as work experience during your apprenticeship in the eyes of the qualification board."

"Of course, I will have to clear this with Albert," Hermione said, knowing her master would have the final word on the matter, but she had a feeling he would be very open to the idea. "No doubt, Lavender will be thrilled she can get me here sooner." Hermione was feeling a bit more relaxed, both mentally and physically, now that Severus had given her a solution to her problem and was still rubbing her shoulders.

"I still don't want to deal with the pressure of an engagement right now. When things have settled down, but not know," she clarified.

"Fine, it is not an engagement," Severus conceded, knowing now that Hermione did want to marry him, but wanted one less thing on her schedule to face. "It is a promise that at some point in the future, when things have quieted down, we'll eventually get engaged and then married."

"Ugh. I hate engagements. All that planning. Mothers-in-law," she groaned in disgust.
"You'll have no in-laws from my side of the family. There are none," he said flatly.

"You're the last one?" she asked. She knew Severus had never talked about his parents. "No cousins even?"

Severus shook his head. He had one or two distant cousins, but they were not even family in his mind. He was alone.

Hermione stroked his leg, then held his hand. The thought then brought up another topic she had eventually wanted to discuss with him, besides the marriage question which was now settled.

"We never even talked about if you wanted children or not," Hermione said, saying it aloud more to herself than to prompt Severus into a discussion.

Severus supposed that was a topic that was going to eventually come up, if not now, then over the years. It was better to settle the matter and know where each stood. Hermione had said on many occasions that the idea of children with Ron frightened her, but now that Weasley would no longer be the father, how would she react to him – the wizard who'd killed his own wife who had been pregnant with their child – as the father of their children?

For once, Severus was without some intelligent or thoughtful response. He stammered briefly then shut his mouth in order to avoid further embarrassing himself.

She could tell he was uncomfortable with the subject, and assumed he was trying to find some way to let her know he wasn't interested in children. "One day, I suppose, it would be nice to have children with you. That is, if you want kids. But if you don't--"

Severus shut her mouth with a kiss, thrilled Hermione was willing to have children with him despite his past; it was a sign that she did want to spend the rest of her days with him. Children would bind them together forever, until death parted them.

"Yes, some day," he said, feeling his chest glow warmly at the thought of having a family together with her, creating the life he should have had, but didn't. A wife of his own choice, a life of his own free will, children brought into this world out of love and not familial obligation.

Severus' sudden kiss and breathy eager response to her set her heart aflutter. There was an odd and pleasant twisting sensation in her stomach from knowing that one day she would be going off of contraceptive potions and not dread getting pregnant, but some day would welcome the news. The stroking of Severus' hand along her abdomen made her realize this was something very real. One day she would be a mother and a wife, and Severus her husband and father to their children.

Something had changed between them. Just as something had changed when Severus finally removed his gigolo mask, when they first declared their love for one another, and when Severus asked her to come with him originally when he planned to flee England, their relationship had changed yet again. Their future was now certain, and all doubt about their feelings for one another was long gone, their uncertainty about their future was erased and replaced with a joy that one day they would have their own 'happily ever after' ending.

Feeling inspired by the moment, they made love once more, this time with slow and purposeful movements. There was no rush or fervent hunger to satiate. It was the sealing of a contract between their souls.

The old Gypsy woman's interpretation, based on face value of her statement, had come true finally. Even after Severus left her for Malu Palekaiko, Hermione did see him again. Maybe the old fortuneteller could not tell if Hermione's journey would eventually lead to marriage one day, but she was able to see this far enough into the future to this day. It was this day that sealed Hermione's and Severus' fate together.

Finally relaxed after soaking a bit longer after making love, they finally dragged their very limp and tired bodies out of the water, their strength sapped by the hot water and love-making. They helped each other dress, and Severus held Hermione's hand as they descended down to the Apparition platform.

Back at the house, Hermione beckoned Severus to snuggle with her on the couch. With a swish of her wand, she set the lights on the Christmas tree aglow.

They sat on the couch together staring at the festively colored lights on the tree, and the sparkling and glimmer of glass and glitter-covered ornaments; Ginny had decorated the tree well. Under the tree lay presents waiting to be unwrapped and treasured in the years to come.

"Our first Christmas tree together," Severus said, suddenly willing to let sentiment overtake him. It would be the first of many Christmases together to come, and that pleased him to know.
Hermione clasped his hand tighter and craned her neck up to kiss his jaw, feeling that his beard was still a bit damp. She was feeling quite sentimental as well, awash in the euphoria of love, and restful in the happy seasonal scene in their home together.

In the quiet that they enjoyed together, it wasn't long before it was disturbed by a familiar sound – well, familiar to Severus.

"Mrowr!"

"Damn, the cat."

"You have a cat?" Hermione asked.

"More like it has me." Severus patted Hermione's leg to indicate he wanted to stand up.

Together they walked into the kitchen. Hermione waved her wand to light some candles around the place while Severus went to open the back door.

"Well?" Severus said expectantly, as he opened the door and looked down at the animal that sauntered in.

"What's its name?" Hermione asked, as she squatted down and held out her hand in offer of some affection.

"Cat."

Hermione looked up at Severus with a look that he must be joking.

"It is a male or female?"

"You'll have to ask the cat. I don't pry into its business, and it doesn't pry into mine," Severus said, indicating his emotional detachment to the animal, though Hermione sensed he was more attached to the beast than he was willing to admit. She guessed the cat made a fine companion for Severus, as it was not needy and fairly independent, just like him.

Hermione gave him a slight look of impatience.

"No doubt it is looking forward to its evening meal," Severus informed her as he pulled out a shallow bowl for milk and a plate. Reaching into the icebox, he pulled out some raw fish and minced it finely before placing it on a plate.

The cat went from greedily lapping at the milk to wolfing down the raw fish in no time flat.

Hermione knelt down and pet the cat.

"I fear I am feeding it too much. The cat is getting fat," Severus remarked.

Hermione knew cats well enough. She pet the cat along its sides, noting the frame around its shoulders. She lifted the cat's tail to confirm her suspicion.

Rising up and walking over to Severus, she placed her arms around his waist and looked up at him sweetly. Smiling, she announced, "Well, I was hoping to wait at least a few years before saying this, but you're going to be a father, Severus. Your cat is a female, and she's pregnant."

"What?" Severus' face fell as if Hermione had just told him she herself was pregnant. It certainly was unexpected.

"Your cat isn't fat, it's hungry because it has kittens on the way. Make sure you give her plenty to eat. She's probably going to have them in about a month or less, since gestation is about nine weeks and I can feel the swelling."

Well, if this was a test to see if he was ready for parenthood eventually, taking care of a cat and its kittens was certainly a start, Severus thought. "It seems like pregnancy is a communicable disease on this island, as it appears half of the married witches around here are pregnant," Severus said, remembering that Ginny, Halulu, and Akela's former best friend, Kiki, were among the dozen or more witches waddling around town.
"Maybe it's good I'm leaving at the end of the week then. One year, but not now," Hermione said as they watched the cat finish the last of the milk and then come to rub against Hermione's legs. Hermione guessed the cat was sensing the witch was going to be an important ally for her.

"What shall we name her?" he asked.

"Can't name her Calleo, as that's my owl's name. I do hope they get along," Hermione realized, suddenly thinking of compatibility between the two beasts.

"You named your owl Calleo?" Severus asked.

"Yes, and she's a very nice owl."

"Calleo is a boy's name," Severus reminded her.

"She doesn't mind, so why should I? Besides, I wanted to name her after someone I was fond of and 'Severus' was already taken." Hermione reached up and gave him a peck on the cheek, but she was too slow and Severus caught her mouth in a quick playful kiss.

Suddenly, Hermione yawned.

"Nice to know my kisses excite you so." He amusedly arched one brow.

Glancing at the clock, she said, "Oh good, my potion kept me awake, and it's about this time I go to bed. So I'm feeling tired at about the right time. If the other half of the potion works as well as this half, then that's one more thing I've completed towards my... apprenticeship."

Severus let the cat out before escorting Hermione to bed, the cannoli forgotten for now.

As they undressed, they didn't even bother with anything to wear. When sleeping together back in London, they had become accustomed to sleeping nude. They now readily embraced their old habit.
Had they not exhausted themselves earlier in the day, they would have stayed up half the night talking some more, but as it was, both dropped off quickly, unable to stay awake any longer.

For the first time in a long while, Hermione did not feel overwhelmed by loneliness or the need to cry before going to sleep. Severus was there in bed with her, and she could now reach out and feel his comforting presence there once more. As she drifted off to sleep, she heard his deep and even breaths. There would be no nightmares in the dark, and even if they did come, Severus would be there for her.

Severus could not remember sleeping so well in his life. So it was distressing that some of the best slumbering in the enthralling arms of Morpheus was disrupted by the murderous grumblings of Hermione.

"Why the hell is that cat mewling before the sun is even up?"

Cracking an eye open, he looked at the lovely sight of Hermione and her tangle of mussed hair in the bed next to him as the predawn light colored her hair with highlights of coral and peach. Her own eyes were still shut and a small stain on her pillow showed she had drooled during the night. If Severus was to have his sleep interrupted, seeing this vision he’d longed for in his bed for over a year was worth it.

"This is when I usually get up for a morning swim and she gets fed before I head out." Severus groaned slightly, feeling his thigh, abdominal and back muscles a little sore from yesterday's strenuous activities. "I'll feed her and come back to bed," he announced, indicating that Hermione should not get up, yet.

Throwing on a pair of cotton twill shorts, without underpants, he padded out to the kitchen barefoot and shirtless. Seeing the bag of chicken giblets in the ice box, thanks to Ginny and Draco's planning, Severus gave his cat an extra large helping with an extra deep dish of milk. Normally, he would wait until the cat finished to clean up the dishes before the animal would follow him down to the beach and "guard" his belongings while he swam, but he chose instead to go back to bed as promised. There would be no need for a swim to work off excess tension and sexual frustration, at least during the week while Hermione was there.

Shucking off his shorts, he crawled back into bed and snuggled up behind Hermione who had rolled over during his absence.
"Happy Christmas," he murmured sweetly into her hair.

Hermione's eyes popped open, suddenly awake. She rolled over, now excited with the realization it was Christmas and they were finally together for the holiday. Giving him a quick buss on the lips, she then threw a leg over his hip. "Happy Christmas, Severus."

"We need not bother getting out of bed to unwrap presents. I already got what I wanted for Christmas," Severus said playfully and pulled her body closer.

His intentions were made clear by the fact that they both slept the night before without any clothes on. Hermione could feel him rub his stiffening length along her thigh, then along her stomach as he became harder.

It amused her to see Severus in such a lighthearted mood, as it was a rarity that he cast off his threadbare yet sturdy cloak of somber pragmatism. But even she noted that since moving to Hawaii Severus was by far more happy and at peace with himself then he was back in England, seeing it for herself in person.

Eventually, the soft kisses turned into a leisurely roll in the hay. Finding the laziest possible position that required the least amount of effort for maximum friction, they made love. Low groans of pleasure and soft sighs of satisfaction punctuated their gentle climax.

As they lay in bed, limbs still entwined where they were still joined, Severus asked, "How did you sleep last night? Did your potion work as you expected?"

Smiling up at the ceiling, Hermione said, "I slept like the dead, but given how busy we were yesterday, that's to be expected. But as for feeling time lag this morning? None at all. But we'll see how I fare the rest of the week as it can take a few days for the full effects of Portkey lag to kick in."

Reluctantly, Hermione rose from the bed and went to take care of her bodily needs. Severus decided he might as well get up and got dressed for the morning.

Walking into the kitchen together, Hermione asked as she reached for a skillet, "What do you want for breakfast? Sausage? Eggs? Traditional fry-up for Christmas morning?"
Severus reached for the coffee, since he was out of tea. "You'll find in this warmer climate, you'll adjust better if you keep the morning meals light. A hearty breakfast will weigh you down and make you sweat more heavily, especially if you're not accustomed to the heat," he said, recalling his first breakfast in Malu Palekaiko of eggs, sausage and toast. "A pastry, fruit and coffee will suit you much better."

Hermione cut up some fruit while Severus made coffee. Hermione decided to go with some Portuguese sweet bread to go with their shared plate of fresh papaya, starfruit and orange segments.

"Hmm," Hermione groaned as she sipped her cup of Kona coffee. "I wish Ginny and Draco brought some of this back to England in addition to all those pineapples." Hermione had read about Kona coffee in her guide books, but it was much smoother than she anticipated.

"Had I known you were coming, I would have asked Albert to pack me some tea in your trunk," Severus thought aloud.

"What, don't you have any tea here in Hawaii? Only coffee?"

"We do, procuring a fine Chinese black tea, Japanese green tea, or a delicate jasmine tea is easy, there is no lack of good Asian teas around here. But trying to find some good English tea is nigh on impossible, except at one of the imported European specialty food stores on one of the other islands. Our local buyer for custom goods, Naomi, said she'll be doing a run to Los Angeles soon, as there is supposedly a sizable British ex-pat population there, both Muggle and wizarding." Severus went to go pour himself a second cup of coffee and poured one for his lover as well.

"Now that you're no longer wanted by the British Ministry of Magic, you could go yourself," Hermione reminded him.

"True, but I have a business to run, a sizable garden to take care of. My time is limited. I pay for an elf-cleaning service to clean my house and do laundry for me, after trying to do it myself for a time. How you found time to keep house, shop, cook, do laundry, put in the hours you did at the Department of S&R, and attend those Quidditch games, I wonder how you made time to see me in your schedule and still get any sleep." He could certainly empathize with her exhaustion when she would turn up at his flat some times.

"I could say the same about you. Teaching Potions, running Slytherin House, supervising detentions, and then your work as a spy for Dumbledore? I remember those memories you loaned me." Hermione reached out and grasped his hand. "You looked so drawn and thin, and exhausted."
"You looked equally worn out in Lavender's memory of you in front of the Wizengamot. And she said you were looking better in that memory than a month before," he said with equal seriousness.

Hermione withdrew her hand from his and folded her arms across her chest protectively, her hand covering the part of her breast that sported her scar. It was a month prior to the trial she had been attacked, and near the point of over-exhaustion.

Severus reached across the space between them and pulled her hands down, then held them in his hands trying to get her to look in his eyes. "As much as I long to have you here as soon as possible, I do not want you to push yourself beyond your capabilities. It does not serve you well to overwork yourself."

"You did it and survived," she noted petulantly.

"I did it out of many reasons which we've already discussed once before that I do not wish to speak of again," he said quietly. The specter of his dead wife, Gabrielle, rose up between them once more.

"I'm sorry." Hermione wiped away a few tears. "I just miss you so much sometimes. The loneliness. I miss our conversations so much. Just to even hold your hand, sit next to you as we read in silence."

"I know. I've felt it too." He rubbed his thumb along the backs of her hands as he remembered the conversations he used to have with an imaginary Hermione to fill the void of her gone from his life when he first adjusted to his new life here.

She could sense he also had his own difficulty in being parted from her. "This is Christmas. This is not a time for us to be maudlin and remember sad times," she announced, wanting to brighten the mood for both of them. "Come. It's time to open presents,"

After letting the cat out, Severus let himself be willingly dragged to the couch for presents. Growing up he had learned to manage his expectation of what he would receive as presents from his parents and even more so as an adult. Dumbledore always gave him something to unwrap, and occasionally Flitwick and Minerva would give him something as well, usually some book they thought he might find of interest or a bottle of distilled spirits, but as for expecting anything to unwrap, it was a rare treat. His best present in many, many years was the photo of Hermione in a sterling silver frame. Ginny gave it to him; it was waiting for him back in his hotel room after their wedding and reception a year ago. It was the same one sitting on his bedside table, but this year's present of Hermione showing up on his doorstep unannounced was by far the best present ever. No photo could compare to the real thing.

Hermione was giddy, anxious to watch Severus' reaction to her present for him. She had put a lot of thought, and a lot of Galleons, into picking this present just for him. It was even better, as she was going to be there when he unwrapped it.

"Who shall go first?" she asked.

"Since it seems that all but one is for you—"

"Oh, no," she corrected him. "I saw a few packed in my trunk marked for you, but they didn't seem to say who they were from."

"All right. You pick then."

Hermione squirmed with excitement, cuddled up next to Severus, as she waved her wand to make the large beautifully-wrapped box float out from under the lit Christmas tree. She sat it on the floor in front of Severus. The tag listed clearly who it was from.

He began lifting his wand until Hermione said, "Ah, you have to unwrap it by hand."

"What's the point of being a wizard if you can't do it the easy way," he muttered under his breath as he began to pull at the bow and wrapping paper.

"Says the man who made his students scrub cauldrons and floors by hand, with no magic," she reminded him.

He turned his head to give her an evil grin, not refuting her claim at all.

Beneath the wrappings and trappings sat a new music box. He stared at it, suddenly realizing he had missed the sound of music in his home, but that music would have only reminded him of Hermione's absence.
"It can be used as a table-top music box or as a stand-alone piece," she said as she waved her wand and legs popped up underneath. The music box rose up, similar in movement to a horse getting up from the ground, as the legs unfolded and straightened.

The inlay on the top of the lid was exquisite with a small orchestra playing and a conductor waving his baton. The conductor and musicians were all made of several small pieces of inlaid wood stained various shades or gold, brown and black, and slivers of ivory for their powdered wigs. The little inlaid wooden conductor turned and bowed to Severus in recognition of its new owner. Severus could tell that Hermione paid very good money for a fine music box for their home, just for him.

"I noticed in your Pensieve tour of the house that you didn't have one," Hermione said a bit nervously. When she toured the house yesterday, she was relieved that Severus had not gone off and bought one of his own, but for the fact that Severus had said nothing in regards to his present was making her wonder if he liked it at all.

Severus sat there and looked at his new music box. Draco and Ginny's present of delivering Hermione to him was by far the best Christmas present ever, but as for something to unwrap from under the tree, this was by far the most thoughtful and exquisite present he could ever recall receiving. Turning his head, he could see her chewing on the corner of her mouth, and he knew she was wondering if he liked it.

"It's magnificent," he said and pulled her into his arms to kiss her.

Hermione was so relieved. When she was married to Ron, she always let him pick out the Quidditch gear he wanted. Having to come up with an idea, other than a book Severus might like, had been a rather daunting task for her. Upon her stroll down Diagon Alley for ideas, she'd spotted the music box in the window and felt certain it was the right gift. It was nice to know she'd picked just the right thing to make Severus smile.

"Shall we?" Severus asked with his hand outstretched towards the living room floor, wanting to try out his new present.

Hermione bolted up off the couch, practically bouncing on the balls of her bare feet.

Severus rose and placed his arm at her waist. Waving his wand at his music box, he said, "Foxtrot, slow."
As the soft strains of music rose into the air, Severus took Hermione's hand in his as they began dancing across the living room, next to the Christmas tree aglow with twinkling lights.

They were both in their bare feet, Hermione in her cool summery cotton nightgown and Severus in a plain short-sleeved button-front shirt and cotton shorts.

The chanteuse was warbling an older wizarding tune about waiting for her wizard lover and the anticipation of him Apparating to their secret rendezvous spot. They had danced to that song once or twice before back in London, but now that song seemed to hold a little more meaning for them. As the song ended, Severus dipped her. Hermione laughed gaily, feeling so happy in the moment.

Severus set the box to play some appropriate Christmas music quietly in the background as they continued to open presents.

Now it was Severus' turn to be nervous.

'I hope she doesn't think it's too ostentatious. I hope it fits. What if she doesn't like it?'

There were advantages over not having someone special in one's life, and that was that Severus didn't have to fret over picking out a present. But that was the only perk to being alone, that he could recall at the moment. The benefits of Hermione in his life were certainly worth putting up with a little nervousness Christmas morning. Besides, Draco had helped him select it, so if she didn't like it, Severus could always blame him.

Severus swished his wand to make his present to Hermione sail gracefully through the air until it alighted upon her lap.

She gave him a shy but eager look before she began to pull at the intricate bow, made of silvery netting and white silken ribbons. Tearing at the red foil paper, she paused when she saw the velvet covering the box. There was only one type of present she knew that came in velvet-covered boxes, and this box was far bigger than the very few velvet boxes she had opened before.

Latching her thumb along the lid, she slowly pried it open and felt her breath stop in her chest.
All those times Hermione had taken Harry shopping for jewelry for Ginny, she had always secretly envied Ginny. He had bought her lots of beautiful jewelry over the few years they were married, but never in all her shopping trips did she ever see anything quite as magnificent as the necklace that was in the box before her now.

It reminded her of the necklace that Lavender had rented for her in India, but this was more subdued and tasteful. The one she wore in India was a bit too large or flamboyant for her tastes, but this one was elegant, and literally breathtaking.

"It's..." Hermione choked up. "It's perfect."

Severus let out a silent breath of relief. Considering what he paid, he was thrilled she loved it, though the jeweler assured him if she didn't like it, he would gladly help her trade it in for something more to her style.

Hermione hastily wiped away her tears and set the jewelry box down before throwing herself at Severus. She cried a little, overwhelmed by Severus' gift to her. It was a very, very expensive gift. She had helped Harry shop for jewelry, and didn't even want to fathom what Severus had spent. It was also lovely and romantic.

"Let me see it on you," Severus said, once Hermione stopped peppering his face with kisses.

He lifted it from the box and undid the clasp. Hermione lifted her hair, grinning madly.

Once clasped around her neck, she turned so that Severus could admire it upon her. Yes, it was proportioned perfectly for her.

Hermione cast a quick reflection charm to see it on herself without having to leave Severus or the couch.

"This will go perfectly with your blue dress for the New Year's Eve party," he noted.

Turning her head from side to side, Hermione admired the white-gold necklace set with dozens of sapphires, offset with small diamonds as highlights. The sapphires ranged in color from small, pale-clear watery-blue stones close to the shoulder and collarbone down to larger, deeper and richer-blue stones, culminating with a large, deepest of blue sapphires resting just above her cleavage. The pattern of the setting gave a hint of a floral motif without it being obvious.

"I don't know what to say," Hermione stammered.

"Say you love it."

"I do! I do. I'm just... This is just so..."

Severus loved the fact he had rendered Hermione speechless. Given Hermione's reluctance to get engaged at the present time, he was glad he went with the necklace upon Draco's recommendation. Perhaps once they were eventually engaged, he could buy her a ring to match the necklace and the earrings she had just received from her parents.

Once Hermione found her voice again, she said, "I have no idea what's in that big box from the twins."

After unwrapping it, she peered into the top of the large box that was almost as tall as her.

"Oh, no. They didn't," she said with disbelief. She sat down and gave a great huff of exasperation mixed with disgust.

"What is it?" Severus asked.

"You don't want to know." She folded her arms and looked cross.

Severus noticed the small card that fell from the box that Hermione had missed. He snatched it up before she could do or say anything in protest.

----------

"Dear Hermione,

Since this was your idea, we'd thought we'd give you one of your very own. It's been a top seller, so the Galleons have been rolling in on both versions we offered: the stand-alone and table-top version.

We figured you'd appreciate a near-life-sized version of your own. This ought to spruce up Snape's dungeon love nest with something festive, while you're there for Christmas.

Of course, your royalties will be automatically deposited into your Gringotts vault.

Happy Christmas,

Fred & George"

Severus stood up and peered into the box. "It looks just like an ordinary Santa," he remarked with cool detachment, knowing the twins never did anything ordinary.

"It's not," she growled, embarrassed by her inspirational outburst during her brainstorming luncheon with the twins.

"Really? Then do tell."

She told him.

Severus could understand why Hermione would not want to be associated with a Santa that pulled down its pants and pissed drinks, then "tossed cookies" out of its mouth onto a tray, making use of the euphemism for vomiting.

"And you came up with this idea?" Severus asked, bemused and slightly horrified that something so crass was Hermione's idea.

"I said it more as a way of proposing something so outrageous, so tacky and vulgar, even they wouldn't dare to make it. I was proved wrong." The color of Hermione's cheeks was now nearly as red as the bits of wrapping paper scattered about the floor. She was tempted to say part of the inspiration was a Muggle novelty she once saw in a window of a Muggle joke and "magic" shop as a small child, but decided that the less said, the better.

Severus then had a thought. "Help me wrap this back up," he said, and they both began waving their wands about the box the Santa was still sitting in. They made sure to leave the bottles of alcohol mix and cookies that came with it in the box, along with the instructions that Severus briefly thumbed through.

"What do you have in mind?" she asked.

"I know just who would appreciate a gift such as this," Severus said as they moved it towards his fireplace. Severus scribbled hastily on a conjured gift tag.

"Who?"

Severus debated telling her, but merely said, "You'll be meeting him later."

With a shove and a bit of Floo powder, the present was delivered and gone from their sight, much to both of their relief.

Sitting back down on the couch, they both hoped nothing else would be quite as off-putting as that last present. There was also a box of 'special' Bertie Bott's Every Flavor Beans the twins had included from their joke shop. The joke was that every bean was an awful-tasting one, with not a decent-tasting one in the entire lot. It was meant to trick people into thinking they had the bad luck to only select the vile-tasting ones when in fact every bean tasted horrible.

"Let's open this one up. It's from Ginny, so it must be safe," Hermione said with a sigh.

Inside were some outfits consisting of mostly muumuus fitting close to her torso, but were cool and loose about the legs and hips, along with several pareos in cotton and silk, most of them with Hawaiian floral patterns. There were also a couple bikinis and rubber flip-flop sandals in there as well, so this gift had everything she would need to wear for a week in paradise.

"Put this on," Severus said, pulling out a silk pareo printed in a palate of blues, silently thanking Ginny for reading his mind.
Hermione pulled off her nightgown, leaving her underpants on. Looking at the moving diagram showing the dozen ways the pareo could be worn, she twisted and tied it off around her neck, wearing it as a halter-style dress.

Severus smiled. This is what he had wanted to see that first day in Malu Palekaiko back in Justina's hotel room: Hermione standing there in a pareo.

It was partially covering her necklace, but that was about to be remedied.

"Come here," he said, his voice thick with intention.

Hermione turned around, staying out of reach for a bit longer while she modeled it for Severus. "Do you like it?" she asked coyly. Of course she knew Severus liked it. She could see the way his eyes raked over her body and up her legs.

He nodded slowly, sitting on the edge of the couch. His hands reach out and snatched a corner of her pareo, drawing her closer to him as he pulled on her fabric to bring her close. Severus' hands snaked up her legs and under her dress. Latching his thumbs along her underpants, he casually mentioned, "We won't be needing these for now."

Now that she was wearing nothing but her jewelry and a pareo, Severus looked up at her as his hands roamed underneath the silken fabric. Hermione gazed down, suddenly feeling quite empowered, sensing Severus was lost in the moment.

She moved forward to straddle him on the couch, her dress bunching up. As Hermione seated herself upon Severus' lap, she could feel his erection straining up through his shorts. His hands moved along her thighs, gliding up them and around to caress her buttocks. She sighed and tilted her head back.

Hermione caressed his cheek with the back of her hand tenderly, and loved the way he closed his eyes and leaned into her touch. Her fingers began to slowly unbutton his shirt, which caused Severus to stop caressing her in order to shuck his other clothes.

Shorts and underpants hastily tossed aside, Severus felt her hands guide him into her entrance. As she impaled herself on him, he momentarily closed his eyes. Rocking himself in time with her movements, he finally looked up and watched as Hermione's eyes dreamily slipped shut. Her hands reached up and slowly undid the knot around her neck. So many times Severus had masturbated to a fantasy of Hermione dressed in a pareo, untying it for him so he could see her nude body, and here she was, riding him, doing this very same act.

As the knot came undone, he gazed at her form, noting how the silk slid against her body, caressing it with the same delicate touch as his own hands that now skated across her body. Her breasts swayed and jiggled with each movement as she rose and fell astride him.

Severus pushed up from underneath, wanting to drive himself into her deeper, enthralled with the vision of Hermione atop of him wearing nothing now but his necklace adorning her delicate neck. She was his.

Hermione reveled in this coupling with Severus. There was something quietly intense in the way he was gazing at her, and she felt truly treasured. Even the way he moved, as if he was possessed by the moment, lost in some lovely dream come true. Hermione could relate, since making love with Severus the night before in the hot springs had made her feel the same overwhelming lost sensation of being caught in a waking dream.

Leaning forward, she let her breasts graze against Severus' face as she rocked back and forth.

"I read somewhere once," Hermione said with a sigh, trying to sound conversational while making love, "that the courtesans of India would make love to kings and princes wearing nothing but ropes of pearls or gold necklaces, and lots of bangles and anklets."

"You are no courtesan. You are a queen, my queen," he groaned as his hands moved up from her hips to her breasts, then guiding one nipple into his mouth as he increased the pace. Just imagining Hermione with ropes of pearls about her neck, grazing her breasts and rolling across her skin as she moved, spurred him on. The idea and sight of Hermione wearing nothing but jewelry suddenly held an erotic appeal to him.

Feeling the slow building of heat in her abdomen, Hermione reached forward and grabbed the back of the couch for support, and she rode Severus harder.

"Oh God, how I love you, Severus," she sighed into his hair. This was yet the umpteenth time she had said that simple phrase since she arrived yesterday, and she would not stop herself from saying it when she felt inspired by the moment. Severus never tired of hearing it from her lips.
Her declaration inspired Severus to grab her quickly and spin her around, throwing her back down on the couch to drive deeper into her. Hermione hitched her legs as high and wide as possible, resting her ankles upon his shoulders while letting Severus enter her as deeply as he could.

Severus' hand reached down and stroked her clit, desperate to make her climax soon as he was trying to hold out long enough. He wanted to hear her cry his name once more. She had screamed it so many times the day before, but today was a new day and he needed to hear it again.

Hermione felt the bows and crinkled wrapping paper press into her back, but she didn't care. She was focused only on the sweet sensation of Severus slamming himself into her with abandon and his fingers hastening her building climax.

Severus listened for the way Hermione's breath would hitch and her spoken words would stop short, unfinished, an indication she was close to climax. Severus loved to make Hermione come; the way she would lose herself in the moment and scream his name, the way he would feel her flesh quiver around him, squeezing him. He would lose himself entirely in her, while he poured his heart into this seemingly violent act that brought them closer in the end.

A scream let loose from Hermione's throat, drowning out the low tinkling of Christmas tunes still playing in the background. Hermione's cue let Severus know he could also let himself fall over that edge and join her in that free fall of bliss.

Hermione could barely keep her eyes open, and mostly succeeded. She watched as Severus' face went from teeth gritted to surrender and relief. His grunts were prolonged and almost like some primitive language.

Letting a sigh of satisfaction punctuate the end of the moment, Severus withdrew to study the tableau of Hermione still laying on the couch. Legs parted with their mixed essence dribbling out from between her lips, her pareo undone and partially caught under her back, her necklace askew, hair looking wilder than ever, cheeks flush with color, eyes drowsy and looking at him with adoration and lingering lust – he wished he could have a photograph of this moment. Hermione looked like a woman thoroughly fucked, and he was the one who'd fucked her good and proper.

Hermione enjoyed her own vision of Severus sitting nude on the couch, an open and lazy smile about his lips as he gazed at her, his cock still glistening from the joining. Her eyes were drawn to the tan line between his torso and the paleness of his hips where he still was as pale as her. It was such a stark contrast. Tanned, the blackness of his hair on his head and body did not stand out against his skin anymore. She could now more easily see the Spanish side in him.
Eventually, they went back to unwrapping the rest of the presents under the tree, after Hermione tied the pareo back on. This time she tied the pareo cloth as a sarong, leaving her breasts uncovered, which proved to be a constant cause for Severus to glance at them, if not periodically touch them.

Albert gave Severus several tins of good tea. No doubt, it was a suggestion from Draco, since he and Albert did conspire together for Hermione's trip.

"Bless you, you beautiful bastard," Severus praised Albert under his breath. At least he would have tea available for tomorrow's breakfast.

There was another present from the twins addressed to Severus. Hermione recognized the size and shape of it, but said nothing. There was another note inside, which confirmed the twins must have been in on the secret that Hermione was going to Hawaii, as intoned in the other note.

"Snape,

Thanks for your suggestion for the tropical get-away. You've made us a dragon-dung-heap-high pile of Galleons from your suggestion. So when we heard from Lavender and Albert about Hermione's trip, we figured you deserved to have one of your very own, in case Hermione didn't pack hers.

Inside the 'get-away,' you'll find a box with the Galleons for your royalties at five percent. If you want auto-deposit, you'll have to set that up with your local Gringotts, if they have a Gringotts in that far flung place at the far corner of the globe.

Your former chaos-causing students and now business partners,

Fred & George Weasley

P.S. Don't shag Hermione too senseless and satisfactorily. She comes up with the best ideas when she's sexually frustrated and tense."

--------------
'Too late on that post-script,' Severus wryly thought with some self-satisfaction, a smirk tugging at the corner of his mouth.

"What does it say?" Hermione asked, since he knew better than to read whatever the twins might write aloud.

"Nothing of consequence, and something very inappropriate you'll wish you didn't read."

Hermione took Severus' advice over satisfying her curiosity this once.

Lastly, there were several gold boxes from Lavender. There were matching midnight-blue silk dressing gowns for them both, in addition to a silk floor-length nightgown in Slytherin green, edged with silver-gray lace, and a pair of silk boxers for Severus in Gryffindor colors.

"No doubt Lavender's 'subtle' commentary about two Houses now joined together. This Romeo-and-Juliet theme would have struck a better chord with Draco and Ginny," Severus noted dryly.

"Actually, Lavender was merely copying Ginny. When we all went out to lunch back in August, we went over to Madam Mandel's for a bit of shopping. Ginny got herself something in green silk and lace, and on a lark, got something in red and gold for Draco." Hermione didn't want to think too much on that day, as that was the day she'd had the panic attack in the fitting room.

There was one last box in the signature gold paper, addressed to Severus.

Lifting the lid, he noticed how Hermione gasped in fear, recoiling back with her eyes held wide in near terror. It held a purple silk corset with black lace. The same corset that had sent Hermione into a panic in the fitting room that day, that caused her to finally seek out help from that Muggle psychologist, James Hoover.

Hermione sat silently as Severus read the small note enclosed aloud.

-------------

"Dear Severus,
Upon consulting with James Hoover about my suggestion of the corset enclosed, he recommended as part of Hermione's therapy to face her fears and desensitize herself to certain triggers. You, the person she trusts most in the world, can help her with wearing this corset during her stay with you. While Mr. Hoover could not discuss many aspects of Hermione's treatments and conversations with him, upon asking, he did say that you might help her overcome some lingering long-term issues.

With kindest care,

Lavender"
Severus closed the box up and set it aside. "We can deal with this later, if and when you're ready."

Hermione curled up against Severus, seeking the shelter of his arms for warmth and protection. As he gave a gentle squeeze of comfort, she relaxed into his embrace, feeling her fears ebbing away, even with his arm snugly wrapped around her rib cage.

The living room was now strewn with scattered bits of wrapping paper, bows, tags, tissue paper, and boxes with unwrapped gifts lying about. It was a mess, but for once Severus welcomed it. It reminded him of the Finaus' living room Christmas morning a year ago; a happy household with remnants of the morning’s Christmas cheer cast about the floor. It made Severus realize he was capable of having his own happy home life as well, and this was just one of the first moments of one with Hermione.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: A round of applause to my tireless betas, JuneW and Hope, and all the hard work they do to clean up these chapters.

Los Angeles, most notably the city of Santa Monica that is located in the Greater Los Angeles Area, has one of the largest British ex-pat communities in the United States. Having grown up in L.A., it was easy for me to find many British pubs and British goods stores around L.A., especially around Santa Monica.

Yes, I have pulled the horrible Bertie Bott's Beans prank once. I yanked out every good-tasting one from the box and left only the vile-tasting ones. My friend, who was Executive Assistant to a very high-level executive, then thought, on a lark, to put them out on her desk as a joke for the rest of the office, for us regular schlubs, as a joke (inspired by my idea). One guy came along, a board-level mucky-muck of the company who was visiting that day, and he grabbed a handful and started popping them into his mouth. Before my friend could warn him, since this was a high-level guy, she kept her mouth shut instead since he'd already began eating them. The guy never made a face nor said anything. And yes, they were the nasty-tasting ones in the candy dish. We still shudder to this day to think about how he ate them without noticing how vile they tasted.
"Christmas Crackers and the Third Degree"

Chapter Summary

It's time for Christmas dinner over at the Finau family home, and the vegetables aren't the only thing getting grilled.

Chapter Notes

WARNING: NSFW, soft R for butt nudity fan art embedded at TOP OF THE CHAPTER

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter One Hundred Three
"Christmas Crackers and the Third Degree"

Disclaimer:
We wish you a legal disclaimer,
We wish you a legal disclaimer,
We wish you a legal disclaimer
Stating Rowling owns it all.

============

Hermione couldn't help herself. Just seeing Severus in the outdoor shower again, water sluicing off his muscular tanned shoulders and back, the hollows of his buttocks, hair wet and trailing down his back. She should have been focused on washing her hair and getting the sweat and dirt rinsed off before Christmas dinner at the Finaus', as they were already running a bit late, but the moment of inspiration struck. On her knees, she decided to see if there was one more ejaculation she could milk from Severus, as it was close to the end of the time limit of the Sequoia potion, and he had already orgasmed about four times already while under its influence, not including their earlier morning activities.
Before both of them had taken their matching sexual potions dosage, there was also that half-hour of work they’d both put in on the garden. And before that, some brewing of a quick tanning potion for Hermione, so that she could have a base tan and avoid burning so easily with her pale English skin. It was a full day of Christmas presents, brewing, gardening and then a few hours of love-making. But now that Hermione was having her needs met, she found that her appetite was not quite sated, but further aroused and ravenous.

Recalling Severus’ casual snipe at Hawaiian punctuality, she figured running a bit later than planned would be within the acceptable societal norms of Malu Palekaiko.

As one of her hands swept between Severus’ legs, her other hand kept time with her mouth, stroking him as she licked and sucked and swallowed him whole into her hungry mouth, the water running down their bodies as she knelt. She found the soap and began lathering it between his cheeks. Hermione had already helped Severus wash that part of his body, but there was something else that needed taking care of.
Now that there was a lot of lather between his cheeks to act as lubrication, she pressed a finger to his anus and looked up at him as the water continued to spray down his chest. His eyes glanced down at her, his eyes already begging for her to continue. As her finger slipped in, his hips jerked slightly forward, thrusting into her mouth. She removed her hand from his cock and guided his hand from caressing her hair to grabbing a firmer hold of her hair. This was her way of giving him permission to grab hold and fuck her mouth, allowing him more control. As his hips moved back, Hermione pressed her finger deeper into Severus.

A low groan issued forth from Severus. He wasn't reaching orgasm yet, but he was overwhelmed by the sensation of her finger prodding him, stroking his prostate as she sucked him off, giving him permission to set the pace.

He moaned, not quite begging for more, but clearly willing to accept whatever Hermione was going to do to him.

Hermione was happy to oblige. With more soap and a little more lather, she then added a second finger, which changed the pitch of Severus' moans to something a little higher. It was almost a whimper.

Hermione could feel his sphincter tighten around her fingers. She sucked greedily, wantonly licking the head faster. Severus gently placed his hand on the back of her head and slowly pushed in.

Hot semen gushed into the back of her mouth, though not as much as usual. She tried to swallow around him as he throbbed and twitched with each spurt, her muscles constricting around him and adding more to his pleasure.

With a sigh, Severus collapsed forward, leaning against the walls of the shower for support.

Hermione gently and slowly removed her fingers from his anus. She finished soaping and rinsing herself off while Severus was barely able to stand there, panting, trying to catch his breath.

"You're going to kill me. But what a way to go," Severus finally said as he pushed himself away from the wall to stand once more. He rinsed off the last of the soap Hermione had left on him.

"Yes, if you don't kill me first. I've never heard of anyone pulling an abdominal muscle while orgasming, so imagine my surprise when that happened to me."

Severus rubbed her abdomen. "Did that ointment soothe and heal it?"

"Yes, though I think I should recuperate for the rest of the night in that respect." Hermione rolled her eyes, recalling the intense orgasm she had and how magnificent it had been, only to have it interrupted by a stabbing pain of pulling an abdominal muscle during mid multiple-orgasm.

"We can play gently tonight, after we come back," he said as she slipped a hand between her legs and gently stroked her clitoris.

Hermione winced, "Oh, I'll need another dose of that lubrication potion if we do that. I'm nearly raw. That beard of yours can be a little abrasive after prolonged exposure."

"Do you need some salve to soothe you there too?" he asked with concern.

"I can wait until we get back. Besides, we're running late, if there is such a thing as late here," Hermione noted.

They finished rinsing off and hurried while they dressed, barely drying their hair enough so it didn't look like it was still dripping from the tips and tendrils of their locks. Something about their lateness and rushing to shower reminded Severus of the time Ginny and Draco were late for a duck dinner at his flat once.

Severus decided to wear long linen trousers and a subdued green Hawaiian shirt. Hermione chose one of the muumuus Ginny had picked out for her, something in red with short capped sleeves and no ruffles that hugged her torso. They both gave a smile to each other, finally realizing the unconscious choices in their color selections in regards to House affiliation, but to be fair they were Christmas colors.

In a pair of red flip-flops to match her dress, Hermione tried to keep up with Severus' long strides as they rushed to the Finau house for Christmas dinner, the box of Christmas crackers tucked under her arm. They were late, even by Hawaiian standards. Hermione barely had a chance to look about the town in daylight as she made sure not to trip or stub a toe on the odd uneven patch of sidewalk where a tree root had lifted it from underneath.
At three thirty-eight, Severus knocked on the door.

When the door opened, Akela screamed as she lunged at and hugged Hermione with boundless enthusiasm. It was a shrill screech filled with the uncontainable excitement that only teenage girls could muster. Severus remembered that sound, not too fondly, from his years at Hogwarts.

In a nearby cave on the outskirts of town, a colony of sleeping bats was temporarily awakened, thinking that one of their own was calling out in distress before the sound eventually subsided and they went back to sleep.

The teenager jumped up and down, still holding Hermione in a death grip, shouting, "Omigawd, omigawd, omigawd, you're finally here!"

Hermione, not wanting to appear too standoffish or too cold, merely hugged Akela back and looked at Severus with a mixture of, "Help," and, "Who is this person?"

Severus merely smirked, feeling vindicated that his perception – that island folk could be a bit too familiar with strangers upon first meeting – was spot-on.

Eventually, the ebullient teenage witch let go of Hermione and reached over to give her Uncle Severus a quick peck on the cheek. "It's about time you guys showed up. But that's okay, because dinner won't be for another hour."

Leaning in and whispering in confidence, Akela warned them, "I think my mom wanted you guys over here early enough so that she could grill you before she got too busy getting dinner on the table." The teenager than ran off without another word.

"And that was Akela. Welcome to island hospitality. One day you may get used to it. One day, so may I," Severus added dryly.

Hermione laughed at Severus' comment, knowing that Hawaii had not stripped him of his snarky personality entirely, just merely mellowed it a bit.

The general noise of people conversing mixed with the sound of children came from off in another part of the two-story plantation-style home. It was a noise Hermione was very familiar with after her many holidays at the Burrow with Ron.
There was yet another round of joyful noise and cheers as the two entered the kitchen.

"It's about time you two showed up," Draco said with a knowing smile. He stood behind Ginny who sat at the kitchen table, a chilled beverage in her hand. Ginny made an attempt to stand up, but then gave up and merely waved at them. She was a whole lot larger than the last time Hermione saw her in October, and she looked to be more like nine months along than just six, as Hermione finally got a good look at her.

Rainbow stopped stirring a pot on the stove and set it to stir itself with her wand while she came over and greeted the couple.

"Severus, Hermione, I'm so glad you could make it," Rainbow exclaimed as her eyes roved over Hermione, shaking her hand. "It's so nice to meet you finally, Severus has hardly said a thing about you. Like pulling Potions secrets from him." Her eyes moved over Hermione some more, making Hermione feel like she was getting the once-over from future in-laws to see if she was good enough for their son, since Severus did mention he had been informally adopted into the Finau family. "My, you're so... young."

Severus wanted to groan and put his face in his hand, which exactly matched the reaction of what Mounga was doing over in the corner of the kitchen. Rainbow knew that Hermione was once married to Ginny's older brother, and Ginny and Hermione had gone to Hogwarts together for many years, but the way it came out, it sounded like Rainbow was surprised by Hermione's youth.

"Hermione, this is Rainbow Finau," Severus introduced the two witches. "You already met her oldest daughter, Akela, at the door." Just then, there was a flash that streaked across the room as Kaimi ran in and nearly knocked the wind out of Severus and jostled Hermione too.

"Mele Kalikimaka, Uncle Severus! Why didn't you come flying with us today?" Kaimi said, pouting a little.

"And this is Kaimi, Mounga and Rainbow's youngest," Severus introduced his favorite "niece" to Hermione.

Before Hermione could greet her, Kaimi's eyes went wide and she shouted, "I forgot something! I'll be right back!" as she ran away as fast as a Firebolt.
Hermione looked about the kitchen and saw the huge mass of a wizard that was only slightly smaller than Hagrid was. "And you must be Mounga. Pleased to finally meet you," Hermione said as she extended her hand.

Mounga ignored the hand and pulled her into a hug, careful not to crush her too much. "It's good to finally meet you too, Hermione."

The large wizard let go of Hermione and clapped Severus on the back, only bruising a couple ribs this time. "Glad you finally made it over here." Then – leaning in in confidence so he couldn't be heard by his wife, who had gone back to stirring the pot on the stove – he added, "Rainbow was about to send the kids over to fetch you at two-fifteen, but I told her to just wait." Mounga then gave Severus a subtle wink, knowing exactly why they were late.

Jerry, who had just come back from fetching a few oranges for Rainbow from the tree in the backyard, came into the room. "The prodigal son returns!" the former Auror exclaimed, which made Hermione blink in surprise.

Walking over to them, Jerry introduced himself. "You must be Hermione. You look just as lovely as that photo from India Severus keeps on his desk."

"Photo?" Hermione asked, turning to Severus.

Severus explained briefly how Ginny and Draco had presented him with the photo upon their return.

"Thanks for that great present you Floo'ed over to me this morning. Boy! Was I surprised! I didn't take you for a guy who got my sense of humor," Jerry said with frank surprise.

Severus knew exactly the type of humor Jerry appreciated. It was usually crude, vulgar, lewd, highly inappropriate for mixed company – especially children, and on a rare occasion scatological in nature. Pat, the office manager, has gently asked Severus if he had a policy in place regarding such humor and jokes told openly in the workplace and slightly offensive cartoons tacked up on his wall in his office, out of the earshot and view of children and their parents, of course. Severus did not, but gave Pat free license to write up a policy that he approved instantly.

He thought about telling Jerry that the alcohol-pissing and cookie-tossing Santa was Hermione's idea, but figured Hermione should not be subjected to Jerry taking such information as her implied appreciation of his sense of humor as well.

"Well, once I saw it, I figured you were the right person to appreciate such a novelty," Severus said. He spoke in a manner that Hermione, Draco, Ginny, and Mounga picked up on that was not outright a disparaging remark on the surface, but was one when you dug down to the root of its implied meaning.

Jerry was bright enough to catch the double meaning as well. "Touché!"

Kaimi came back into the kitchen, this time walking. "I made this for you, Hermione. Aloha and Mele Kalikimaka." She extended her arms, holding out a lei for Hermione.

"It's lovely," Hermione said in earnest, thrilled by the lei featuring red carnations, interspersed with white jasmine flowers and artfully folded green ti leaves. She took it from the child and placed it over her head. "Thank you, and Happy Christmas to you too," Hermione said, not attempting the Hawaiian Christmas greeting.

Severus looked about, and finally saw the last person to be introduced. Before he could say anything, Akela gave her brother an "accidental" shove, which dislodged him from his hiding spot from around the door frame where he had been discreetly and discreetly observing introductions.

"Hey!" he shouted at his sister, and gave her a none-too-gentle elbow to the ribs that she mostly darted away from in time.

"And this is Iakona, the middle of three," Severus said, nodding for him to come out and meet Hermione. When he saw the boy, he could tell he was in the middle of yet another growth spurt, for he seemed a couple inches taller from when he saw him just the week before during a brewing class. His hormones were active as well, for he had also broken out in a case of acne, which was unusual for him.

"Hel-lo," Iakona said, his voice cracking mid-word.

Severus almost winced, now understanding why the boy was hiding. He felt a great pang of empathy, remembering how awkward he'd felt when his own skin broke out and his voice cracked at that age.
Hermione, hoping to smooth over the boy's awkwardness and embarrassment, gently shook his hand. "Hello, Iakona. Severus has mentioned you're quite the apt Potions student, a compliment I never received myself while under his tutelage at Hogwarts. That's quite the feat. You must be very talented."

Iakona tried not to blush as he muttered out a meek thanks, his voice not cracking this time.

"Still not as good as me," Akela butted into the conversation. "I was so good, Uncle Severus said I didn't need any tutoring."

Kaimi, who had also been earlier picked on by her big sister, felt the need to stand up for her big brother and came to his defense readily with a jab she knew would be even more embarrassing. "But that didn't stop you from wanting to be tutored by Uncle Severus so you could be close to him when you were mooning over him," she said in a taunting sing-song manner, meant to enrage Akela, which it did.

"Why you little..." Akela gritted from between her teeth as she chased after Kaimi.

Kaimi screeched and took off, trying to stay out of her sister's grasp while shouting out loud enough for Hermione to hear, "And then there was the time that you were writing all over your parchment 'Mrs. Sn–'"

Akela had whipped out her wand and cast a Silencing Charm on her little sister.

"Hey, no fair," Iakona said, standing up for his little sister, and ended the spell. "Papa said no spells on her until she gets her own wand and can defend herself." Iakona's words were backed up by a hum of agreement from their father, who decided to let the children sort this out themselves.

Severus was rather appalled at the behavior of the children in front of a guest, but the scene just reminded Hermione of summers spent at the Burrow during her Hogwarts years when Percy, the twins, Ron, and Ginny would go at it like these siblings did. It was comforting in a way, confirming that siblings were just like this all over the world. She could tell that Severus was becoming a bit unsettled by the cacophony of youthful mayhem, and she decided to distract them.

"Kaimi, you're not eleven yet? But you're so tall!" Hermione noted with a little dramatic flair. She had noted just how tall the whole Finau household was and felt like a midget by comparison.
"I'm only nine," Kaimi said, before pointing out her siblings. "Akela is sixteen and Iakona is thirteen. And we get our wands at ten here in the States."

"Thirteen?" Hermione said as she appraised the young wizard once more, a bit astonished, as Iakona was almost as tall as Severus. Looking at Mounga, she could tell that Iakona was going to be as tall as his father and still had another ten or twelve inches to grow yet to match him. Even Akela was as tall as Severus and her mother now.

Finding the kitchen a bit cramped to continue cooking unimpeded, Rainbow said, "Dear, why don't you take our guests to the living room and offer them a drink." Turning to her children, she said in a very sternly disapproving tone, "Oh, no you don't. You keep your little fannies right here, I have tasks for you all."

Hermione almost choked on her own spit when Rainbow used that term, but then remembered that "fannies" was an American term used to mean bottoms, and was not being used with the British slang meaning.

As they ambled out to the living room, Draco said in commentary to his wife regarding the family bickering that just played out, "Are you sure you want three or four? Maybe two will be plenty."

Hermione laughed to herself and turned to see Severus give her a look that maybe that wasn't such a bad idea.

"Hermione," Mounga said, distracting Hermione, "what would you care for? We have Wizard POG, which is a blend of pumpkin, orange, and guava juices. We also have eggnog, an aperitif, beer, wine. I make an awesome 'polar bear.'"

"The 'beer' is served ice cold," Severus warned Hermione under his breath.

"What's a 'polar bear'?" Hermione looked at the array of alcohol bottles scattered on the serving console.

"Ground-up Ice Mice, mixed with crème de menthe and dark chocolate liqueur, and topped with a splash of brandy and half-and-half," Mounga said, shivering at the thought of drinking one. Draco gave a shudder as well.
"I think I'll go with an aperitif, though you will have to teach me how to make a Polar Bear so I can mix some up at the next monthly Potions masters meeting."

"Certainly," his host assured her. "Severus? For you?"

"The same."

"Wise choice," Draco added.

"Another polar bear for you, Draco?" Mouna asked.

"No, thank you. I just finished thawing out my toes and fingertips."

Ginny sat next down to Draco and guided his hands towards her neck, sighing with relief when his cool hands met her overheated skin. She was still nursing her glass of iced POG.

"Jerry?"

"I'll try some of that POG with a splash of something stronger from the bar."

Drinks in hand, they sat about and chatted. Mouna kept the questions light and social. Severus figured Rainbow had ordered him, under threat of keeping his manhood intact, to leave the grilling questions for Hermione to her.

The Finau children were as silent as the Grey Lady Ghost, as they moved about in the dining room, setting up the table with their wands, looking a bit contrite. Even Kaimi was subdued and helped where she could, setting the silverware.

Hermione and Severus sat next to each other on the couch as the conversation meandered. Periodically, her hand would quietly seek out his, to give just a quick and subtle squeeze. She still couldn’t believe they were together, having a conversation with others, with no one thinking their relationship off or disgusting as the initial reaction had been by some of those close to her back in England.
A few times, Severus' hand sought out hers as his thumb gently stroked the back of her knuckles, also seeking to return a small affectionate gesture. Severus was not one for public displays of affection, but these were subtle and quiet, noticed only by his intended.

In time, Akela came into the living room and, looking much more subdued, announced Christmas dinner was ready.

Everyone was ushered into the dining room, which was laid out with the family's finest linens and china. The floral decorations and centerpiece were not made of tropical flowers, but of box, pine and holly, looking starkly English in contrast to the tropical-themed paintings and decor. There were Christmas crackers on the table, which piqued the curiosity of the children immensely.

"Do we open the Christmas cookies now?" Kaimi asked with excitement.

"No, the Christmas crackers are for at the end of the meal, but before dessert," Ginny informed the children.

"Don't make me read the stupid joke aloud or wear the paper hat," Severus grumbled under his breath.

"In for a Knut, in for a Galleon," Hermione said just loud enough for him alone to hear.

After the Finaus said grace, food was served. There was a clanking and jumbling of bowls, platters, spoons, tongs, and other serving items about the table, punctuated with the obligatory, "Please, pass the...", "Thank you," or, "May I have the..."

It was right after Hermione put some bread sauce on her plate that Rainbow launched into the grand inquisition of her captive.

"So, Hermione. Draco has told me that you'll be running the new commercial facility that is being built here in Malu Palekaiko. That's quite a lot of responsibility for someone so young, who, as I've heard, is still working on her apprenticeship."

It did not escape Hermione's notice there was a slightly pained look on Mounga's face. Severus had warned Hermione that Rainbow liked to know a lot about other people's business, talked a great deal, and often stuck her nose where it didn't belong. However, he also acknowledged that despite her unwelcomed over-inquisitiveness, the Healer was a good person who meant no harm, but must be dealt with tactfully when telling her to mind her own business.

"No more responsibility than it is for Lavender, who is about the same age as I, and founded the company. And I ran her company while she was away on maternity leave, while I was still working on my apprenticeship, and took my Spanish exam for my third language, and continued working on my year-long Herbology portion of my apprenticeship which is nearly at an end," Hermione replied, sounding very business-like, as it was merely fulfilling her regular duties.

"Hermione is almost a whole year older than me and two years more than Ginny," Draco added to the conversation to give Rainbow a bit of perspective on age.

Severus felt like stepping up to defend Hermione against Rainbow's less than tactful approach to the topic of Hermione's youth, and by association their age difference. Then he decided that if Hermione could debate in front of the Wizengamot and win him and Draco their freedom, she could parry a few questions from a nosy parker. He supposed that Hermione could be described as "so young" if you didn't know her background, but she was obviously holding back from telling Rainbow about her experiences in the war against Voldemort; killing evil wizards and watching friends die would make anyone older and sadder.

"And why did you wait so long before pursuing an apprenticeship?" Rainbow asked.

Given the age of the children around the table, Hermione gave the pared-down version of events regarding Dolores Umbridge and how Hermione ended the witch's short reign as Hogwarts High Inquisitor, Calpurnia Fudge's interference with Hermione's apprenticeship application, and the eventual help Severus gave her in securing an apprenticeship under Albert Dobmeir. Severus sat quietly eating, wondering when Rainbow's line of questioning would make Hermione snap at her. He knew it was only a matter of time.

Mounga decided that Rainbow's method of interrogation was a bit too confrontational, so he decided to take over and make it a bit more convivial and less personal. "So, as a town council member, I'm sort of curious as to when operations will be starting up. Draco mentioned you need to finish your apprenticeship first?"

Hermione and Severus exchanged quick glances at each other before she spoke. "Well, it may take a full year or two before I am a fully accredited Potions mistress," she began. She was interrupted by Rainbow giving a gasp in shock at the long "year or two" delay, but Hermione kept talking. "Erm, Severus and I think we may have found a way to have me complete my last language abroad, here in Hawaii instead of back in England. Once I take my Code of Ethics exam around March and finish taking my Japanese language exam, the only thing left is for me to learn Chinese, which I might be able to learn here, while getting everything up and running with the factory."

Mounga let out a huge sigh of relief, along with Draco.

"But," Hermione added, "that is only if my master, Albert, agrees to such an arrangement. Which he probably will, given this will benefit his employer and mine."

"So how long until you finish learning Japanese?" Draco asked. He was also very curious, since may of the townsfolk had been asking him when they might be able to start applying for jobs at the factory.

"I don't know. I only just started studying Japanese. I heard having to learn a non-Indo-European language, along with a character-based written language, can take longer," Hermione truthfully confessed.

"It's not that hard," Akela interjected, before launching into a few Japanese phrases.

"Then perhaps could I trouble you for some tutoring while I'm here, for starting tomorrow, it's back to work for me with my studies, checking up on construction, and writing up several scrolls on the local flora and fauna of this island for my master." Hermione asked.

Severus cast a stern glance towards Mounga's oldest, answering for the witch, "Akela is not as fluent as she purports herself." He remembered reading her tutoring application scroll; he knew which languages she was fluent in, which was none, but she knew a smattering of a few.

"Gary Fujitani is a council member and a Nisei – that's a second-generation Japanese immigrant. He speaks, reads, and writes Japanese as fluently as a native since he grew up bi-lingual. I'm sure he can set aside some time this week to help get you started." Mounga smiled then frowned. "Pity you can't be here for more than a week. Gary could tutor you daily, instead of just for one week."

Hermione had thought it was a pity as well, for the only Potions master back in England she knew who was fluent in Japanese was Royston. She didn't want to spend more time in his company than necessary, given his previous interest in her as stated during a few drunken confessions about what he would like to do to her. A few of those times had resulted in Hermione dishing out a hex or a curse that kept his tongue in check until the next time Royston got so drunk he forgot about the last one.
Suddenly, inspiration struck. Hermione had been wishing that there was a way for her and Severus to communicate with each other more effectively than the current two- to three-week lag of correspondence via albatross, or the usual method of waiting for someone to make the Portkey trip half-way around the world, with Ginny and Draco playing courier. Later that night she would talk with Severus about her idea and then see if Jerry, with his talent in Charms, could assist them. But that was a discussion for another time.

"Gary's tutoring would be lovely. Any help is appreciated," Hermione replied.

Rainbow decided to take back charge of her interrogation. "So how long so you think it would take you to master Japanese in order for you to pass your language tests?"

"Perhaps six months? Maybe up to a year?" Turning to Severus, she asked, "How long did it take you to master Chinese?"

"About eight months, but Chuff was unwilling to tutor me so I had to learn entirely on my own."

"But your master will be able to tutor you, right" Rainbow asked.

"No. Unfortunately, Albert is not familiar with Japanese, but another Potions master I know is, and he might be willing to help."

"Who?" Severus asked.

"Royston," she ground out.

"I don't want you studying under Royston," Severus said, suddenly sounding very jealous, having heard Hermione's tales of Royston's behavior during the booze-ups.

"If I can handle him when we're both three sheets to the winds at the monthly meetings, I can handle him sober," Hermione countered. "I'd like to be able to move here in six months time, if I can get the tutoring."
Severus wanted Hermione to move in with him as soon as possible, but the idea of Hermione alone with Royston, who had said things in drunken moments like he wanted to, "Stir his potion in her cauldron," or, "See if she could make sparks fly out of his wand like New Year's Eve," made him debate against the idea of her prolonged absence from his arms.

Jumping upon that thread of conversation, Rainbow asked, "So, if you might be moving here in six months, will you be doing any house- or apartment-hunting while you're here this week? I'm sure Draco or Severus can recommend their real estate agents to help. Or will you just move into a hotel when you first move here and then hunt like Severus and Draco did?"

Hermione blinked at Rainbow and wondered what she was talking about, since she would be moving in with Severus, obviously. Then Hermione remembered that in the wizarding world cohabitation outside of marriage was looked down upon, unless you were already engaged or separated from your spouse and living as lovers. She had mistakenly assumed that with the laid-back island attitude such mores would have a bit more latitude here, especially since Severus told her about the stronger Muggle influence on the island.

"I have already made arrangements," Hermione said quietly, not wanting to put Severus on the spot.

Jerry, who had been watching the exchange with rapt attention, and glad to no longer be the victim of Rainbow's slew of personal questions for once, immediately picked up on the implications of her remark. "Ah, POSSLQs," he piped up knowingly, nodding his head with comprehension.

"What?" nearly everyone around the table asked in unison, except for Hermione and Severus. Hermione knew and she had even acquainted Severus with the POSSLQ phrase when they played house together during his last month in London.

Jerry then broke out into song, "Five foot two, eyes of blue. Would you be my POSSLQ? Has anybody seen my gal?" Nearly everyone around the table stared at him blankly. "POSSLQ: persons of opposite sex sharing living quarters."

"Oh," Rainbow said brightly, finally enlightened, "so you'll be moving in with Severus. That's wonderful. When's the wedding date?" The assumption was that unmarried witches and wizards only lived together if they were engaged and would be marrying in the very near future, the same as it was back in England.

The rest of the table erupted in joyous exclaimations of congratulations over the assumption of the couple getting married in the immediate future.
"Can I be a flower girl?" Kaimi asked.

"Severus, you old dog! Congratulations," Mouna exclaimed.

"Do you need help planning the wedding?" Akela asked, looking a bit dreamily lost in the romantic notion of planning one.

"I know just the place where you can get a wedding gown, the same place where Ginny got hers," Rainbow added to the cacophony.

Draco and Ginny said nothing, but noticed how subdued both their friends were despite the assumed good news.

Hermione, overwrought once more at the idea of an engagement and the slew of questions, blurted out, "Severus and I are not engaged!" It came out a bit more hotly then she intended, but it made the whole table immediately quiet, no longer pestering her with questions she had neither the time nor patience to deal with currently.

Rainbow looked a bit aghast, almost as if she was about to place her hands over Kaimi’s ears to prevent her from hearing about such notions as a witch and wizard living together with no intention of getting married.

Severus patted Hermione’s hand under the table in order to soothe her and spoke this time. "Hermione has the pressure of finishing her apprenticeship in a manner that is also time-critical. In addition to her current duties as vice president of The Lovely Lavender Company and then moving here, uprooting from her familiar life in England, to then immediately work on getting the new facility up and running, setting up operations, purchasing, shipping, and distribution channels, the last thing she needs is the added pressure of a wedding and engagement on top of all that."

To clarify, Hermione said in a very formal and businesslike manner, "The topic of marriage has been tabled until a later time."

Severus enjoyed how Hermione had taken a lot of the emotional aspect out of the topic and made it sound like a dry and joyless business venture. It was something he would have done. If anything, it certainly put an end to Rainbow’s curiosity on the matter for now.
To break the awkward silence that had now descended upon the table, Hermione turned to Jerry and said, "You seem to be quite musically talented. I heard you play the other night as we passed by. How long have you been playing piano?"

Jerry then took this opportunity to tell Hermione, and the rest of the guests, about his background growing up in New York, and being pegged as a child prodigy on the piano.

"I was on track to go to Juilliard, a very prestigious Muggle music academy, later on, but when I was ten I got my letter and wand, and then the rest is history." Jerry smiled, but it was tinged with a hint of sadness.

Severus could tell that there was more to Jerry's tale than that, as it was the same sad smile as when Jerry would mention his mother on a rare occasion. Severus knew that she had passed away during Jerry's first few years of his magical schooling; he never explained how she passed, only that her passing had inspired him to pursue a career as an Auror.

Ginny quietly asked, "Could you please pass the turkey?"

"Fourths?" Draco said a little louder than he intended, not wanting to bring attention to his wife's enormous appetite.

Ginny, feeling aggrieved at Draco's remark, said, "Well, I am eating for two!"

"Possibly three," Hermione added, noting how large Ginny had become and comparing her to when Lavender and her Aunt Christine were in their sixth month. "You know twins are genetic." When everyone around the table looked at her quizzically at her use of the Muggle term, she clarified by saying, "Hereditary. Tends to run in families."

"It is?" Draco asked, now looking a bit pale. "Having twins runs in families?"

"How far along are you, Ginny?" Rainbow asked.

"Six months, almost seven?"
Rainbow stood up and surveyed her patient. "Ginny, if I may?" she asked as she pulled out her wand and held it above Ginny's abdomen.

Ginny nodded, and Rainbow began casting a spell with a slow swirling motion. Her wand tip glowed until a shimmery thread of golden dust spilled out to hover in the air like dust motes. The dust began to congeal into a small cluster of three glowing and quickly pulsing orbs of light, orbiting around a larger and brighter golden orb of light that was beating in time, like a heartbeat.

Hermione watched, fascinated with the spell. She was transfixed by the bright glow of the light and the smaller pulsating orbs, like a miniature solar system made of golden dust.

"Not twins," Rainbow said, pausing for a moment, "triplets."

"What?" Draco and Ginny asked in unison, both equally shocked.

Hermione finally understood that each of the small orbs was the heartbeat of a child growing inside of Ginny, and the large central glowing and pulsing orb was Ginny's own heart.

Severus, though slightly surprised, was the first to congratulate the Malfoys. He knew that Draco would be the first Malfoy in nearly five generation to produce more than one child in the entirety of their marriage.

Hermione, noticing Ginny's look that bordered on dismay, asked, "Ginny? Are you all right?"

"I was hoping to finish pursuing my Healer apprenticeship after the baby was born, but how on earth can I do that with three?" The expecting mother began to cry, feeling quite overwhelmed with the news that she was not only to be a mother to one infant, a daunting task for a new mother, but three at once.

"I can help baby-sit," Akela offered, but Ginny seemed to barely acknowledge the offer.

"I'm going to be huger and fatter than ever before they're born!" Ginny wailed, her hormones now quite out of control.
Snapping out of his momentary lapse into shock, sensing his wife in distress, Draco gathered Ginny up in his arms as he got out of his chair and knelt next to her. Smoothing the hair out of her face and wiping away the tears, he tenderly assured her, "Ginny, you are even more beautiful to me now than ever. You're not fat, you're glorious!" It was a moment that should have been private, but given the situation and the place, Draco seemed not to care that Severus, Hermione, Jerry, and the entire Finau family were witness to this shared intimate moment. "I have faith that if anyone can handle triplets, it is you. I've seen you with your keiki class. If anyone can deal with a small rabble of urchins, it's you." Ginny gave a short laugh in response to the phrasing of Draco's praise. "I love you, and I will be there for you and our children to help any way I can."

This earnest declaration of Draco's promise to give his emotional and physical support seemed to have mollified Ginny. She smiled and gave Draco a quick peck on the lips, knowing the dinner table was not exactly the place to share a more passionate kiss in front of others.

Draco settled back into his chair and held her hand for reassurance they were together in this grand adventure called life.

Hermione sat there, absorbing the entire exchange, amazed at how Draco had turned from a petulant boy, quick to dish out a snarky remark, into a man stepping up to his responsibilities as a husband and expectant parent. He was giving Ginny his full love and support in a way that Ginny had always claimed he was capable of, but Hermione had only now finally witnessed first-hand. Even during the best moments of Harry and Ginny's marriage, Harry had not given Ginny the sort of emotional support and assurance that she had just witnessed. Any lingering doubts she may have had about helping Ginny leave Harry were finally erased.

Even back in London, Harry and his wife, Zhubanysh, were far closer emotionally and more well-suited to each other's temperaments than when Harry and Ginny were together. Harry had even admitted as such and reluctantly agreed that Ginny leaving him was the best thing that could have happened, in hind sight. Seeing how truly happy Ginny and Draco were together made Hermione's heart swell, bringing a tear to the corner of her eye.

She wiped it away hastily.

Severus noticed Hermione being affected by the moment, and gave her a squeeze of assurance.

Jerry, trying to lighten the mood, turned to Hermione and asked, "So, Hermione. Going into Potions. Is that something your mother or father did?"
"Oh, no. I'm Muggle-born. Both of my parents are dentists."

Hermione was somewhat stunned by the response of the Finau children, who responded with their own shouts of disbelief.

Severus noticed how Jerry merely choked on his wine while casting a quick glance to the Dark Mark on Severus' forearm. The former Auror gave Severus a quick look that conveyed a mixture of surprise and disbelief that an ex-Death Eater would be romantically involved with someone of no magical lineage.

"Really?" Iakona asked with great interest. "How gruesome!" He looked to be more delighted than horrified.

"Is it true they stick needles in your mouth?" Kaimi asked with morbid fascination.

"How do they drill holes in teeth?" Akela asked, drawn into the discussion.

Mounga laughed and interrupted his children's ongoing slew of questions. "Forgive my children. They're curious since dentists are a popular costume here for Halloween." The town judge went on to explain the custom in Malu Palekaiko of having children dress up as people in Muggle professions, then trick or treat around town.

"How did such a custom come into practice?" Hermione asked, intrigued as to the origins of that custom, a minor flip of the Muggle American one.

"Better to curb their curiosity than for them to engage in some of the stunts I did when I was a young teen," Mounga admitted. "Like the time I made Polyjuice Potion, then had Ragenstia, the hag who still lives on the north side of the island, give me some of her hair. I went trick or treating in Honolulu as her after making an illegal Portkey, and when I got back, I had all my candy taken away and my hide tanned by my father like no one's business." For effect, Mounga rubbed his hip in memory of that punishment.

"Wow, Papa," Kaimi said with amazement, "when you said you were sometimes a wicked boy, you meant it!"
Hermione was rather shocked herself that the town judge had such a disregard for the law in his youth. As for the rest of the table, they had already heard of many other misadventures of Mounga's youth that were far more transgressive.

Severus was tempted to offer up his own tale of Hermione using Polyjuice Potion and accidentally turning herself partially into a cat, but decided that was a tale for when Hermione was more well-acquainted with present company and was comfortable enough to share it herself. It had certainly taxed his own skills as a Potions Master to come up with a brew to counter the effects of using animal hair mixed with Polyjuice Potion. Maybe while Hermione was visiting, he could teach her the counter elixir, should she ever come across such an instance, rare as they were.

Hermione answered the children's questions about dentistry that seemed to take the terror-inducing mystique out of it, much to their disappointment. There were no gruesome tales they could share with their friends, now knowing some of the more mundane aspects about the dentistry field. As a healer, however, Rainbow was fascinated by the subject and asked if Hermione could tell her more about it at a later time.

"Hermione?" Akela prompted.

"Yes?"

"Would you say that you might be finishing your apprenticeship by say... summer, a year and a half from now?"

Hermione stopped and pondered the proposed timeline. Nodding in an unsure manner, she said, "Yes, that sound about right, should it take about nine months on average for me to learn my two remaining languages."

Akela suddenly blurted out with great eagerness, "Are you going to take an apprentice when you're done?"

Hermione was quite surprised by the question, now understanding the urgent tone in Akela's question. "You want to be a Potions mistress?"

"Oh, yes!"
"Akela," Rainbow began, "you shouldn't commit to an apprenticeship yet. You still have about a year and half in your studies left. You may find, as you continue maturing, your interests in a career are drawn elsewhere."

Severus remembered that Akela's keen interest in Potions had begun with her crush on him. She was still interested in Potions, since her heart had moved on, to be broken, healed and then won by the young Tristan. Akela said Tristan would come over that night after he was done with his own family Christmas dinner.

"Well, given Hermione's own difficulties and delays, isn't it wise that I, at least, begin researching my options, Mom?" Akela replied with a bit too much sass.

"As for taking on an apprentice so shortly after becoming a mistress, I'm not sure what the custom is." Turning to the resident expert on the subject, Hermione asked, "Severus? What is the usual time after one becomes a master or mistress that one takes an apprentice?"

"Having never had an apprentice, I can't say myself, but usually within the first five years of becoming one is standard. But given your previous experience, within the first year or so would not be amiss," he added, much to Akela's delight.

"Oh, that's great! My mom doesn't want me to study under any wizards, not unless they are like, you know, over a hundred years old already. And on the island, besides Uncle Severus, we only have Arnold and Ranjit, and neither of those two take apprentices. And on the other islands, we only have two other masters and no mistresses. Mom says that witches who study under masters, um..." Akela stopped and cast her eyes sideways at her little sister, who was too young to hear of such sexual matters. "Get too close, if you know what I mean."

Hermione knew all too well, having fallen into Severus' bed, even before they began working and experimenting on formulas together. Mixing learning and pleasure was a common occurrence in potions apprenticeships. Masters and female apprentices were a recipe for sexual dalliances that usually ended in marriage – or sticky affairs if the master was already married.

"I can certainly understand your mother's concern that you study under a Potions mistress instead of a master," Hermione admitted. "Were you my daughter, I would have the same concern. But in a year, if you are still interested, I will entertain the proposal. Perhaps for work experience you can take a part-time job at the equivalent of the Department of Standards & Regulations here in the States."

"They don't have a department like that," Severus informed her.
"What? How do they make sure ingredients are as they are advertised or sold? What about quality assurances?" Hermione asked, now wondering about the ingredients she would be buying in Hawaii and abroad.

"People tend to hire an in-house quality tester or go by reputation of the company selling the items," Severus said. He had to act as his own quality inspector, even when purchasing from the local apothecary.

Turning to Draco, Hermione said with a bit of exasperation, "Well, that's a position we'll have to hire for."

"I already have it written down on a scroll regarding employment positions to fill," Draco assured her. Leaning forward to speak to Akela down the table, he said, "I'll let you know when we start interviewing for the position."

The conversation continued during dinner, with more questions from Akela and Mounaga about the facility, and Draco and Hermione fielding them equally. Occasionally, Severus was consulted, since he had extensive work experience with the company.

Eventually, Christmas crackers were opened. Severus only agreed to wear the paper hat because Hermione whispered in his ear a promise that erased any hesitation he had. Nearly everyone groaned at the terrible jokes, and the children begged and swapped for the more desirable trinkets that were included. It did not escape anyone of the British contingent that the crackers were the Treble W brand ones. All of Fred and George's usual and popular joke items filled the various crackers. Severus gladly gave Kaimi his fake wand, and Hermione gave her the joke cauldron she received. Jerry traded Iakona his Headless Hat for the Extendable Ears. Mounaga was warned by Hermione about the punching telescope he received, based on her first-hand experience she relayed, and he narrowly avoided a black eye. Rainbow thought the quart jar of fake troll snot was a bit "tasteless," which was an ironic choice of words given that it was actually a tasty lime gelatin mixed with candies shaped like bugs and other disgusting things that might be found in troll snot.

Wishing to move along to more appropriate table conversation, Rainbow turned her focus on Jerry, asking if he had found a date for the New Year's Eve Ball.

Kaimi sat there quietly listening to the different conversations. She quickly grew bored and – with her belly full – eventually fell asleep, slumping sideways against Severus. Her paper hat slid over one eye.
Hermione watched silently as Severus let Kaimi, who was seated on his right, snuggle up and rest her head against his chest, as he wrapped his arm around her to cradle her and stop her from falling over. From the fact Severus reacted little to Kaimi readily clinging to his side as she drifted off, Hermione deduced this wasn't the first time the child had fallen asleep in the company of Severus. It warmed Hermione's heart, assuring her that Severus would indeed make a fine father some day, despite the nervousness he expressed about his own abilities to be an adequate one.

When Kaimi began drooling on Severus' shirt, Mounga came over and picked up his daughter and carried her off to bed. She was no doubt worn out by the excitement of the day and the couple nips of wine she was allowed to taste during dinner.

Akela and Iakona, still somewhat in the doghouse for the unseemly behavior in the kitchen in front of company, were ordered by their mother to clear the dishes and to wash them. Without magic. This amused Severus, since it was a new form of discipline Rainbow had adopted after hearing about how Severus disciplined his own unruly students during detentions.

The adults sat in the living room and conversed while dinner settled before dessert was to be served.

Just as Akela and Iakona finished washing dishes, there was a knock at the door. Akela ran to open the door.

Hermione could hear the young witch breathlessly greet the visitor. "Mele Kalikimaka, Tristan."

"Mele Kalikimaka, Akela," the young wizard replied, in a way that Hermione could tell that the two were quite smitten with one another. She remembered how Severus would greet her in a similarly warm and expectant manner during their courtship.

The visitor was ushered into the living room where he greeted each one in turn respectfully.

"Mr. Snape," Tristan said in greeting, waiting for him to introduce the witch Tristan recognized from the photo in his Potions tutor's office.

"This is Mrs. Weasley."

"Just call me Hermione, please," she amended Severus' introduction. She hated the use of her married last name in general, since it was often spoken with disdain back home.

Tristan bowed politely and shook her hand. "A pleasure to meet you."

After pleasantries, Akela and Tristan went off to exchange gifts in private.

Hermione sat back and squeezed Severus' hand yet again, reminded of the heady sensation of new love, or at least love during the early courtship phase of the relationship.

Eventually, it was time for dessert. Akela and Tristan came back out from her bedroom, the young wizard's hair looking a bit mussed after a proper snogging. The rum was warmed and poured on top of the pudding. Then the candles around the room were extinguished and the plum pudding was set ablaze by the tip of Rainbow's wand, as she said, "Incendio," setting the blue flames dancing gaily.

The cake was sliced and served with hard sauce, completing the authentic English Christmas dinner the Finau children wanted to experience. Everyone praised Severus on the plum pudding, with Jerry joking that if he didn't make it as a Potions master, he might make a fair living as a baker.

Hermione and Severus walked home Christmas night, a bag in Severus' hand holding plenty of leftovers Rainbow insisted on them taking home with them.

"Is Rainbow always asking questions and a bit too curious?" Hermione asked tactfully.

"You should have heard the questions she was trying to drag out of me about how our romance began."

Hermione laughed to herself. "Oh, dear."

"Of course, I spun a tale so outrageous that she couldn't believe me."

"Any truth to that tale," Hermione asked, wondering if he used the truth for the basis of a lie.
"Not unless there are any rings of any truth to my heroically diving into the Black Lake to save you from the reciprocated amorous advances of the giant squid after you had taken a love potion accidentally tainted with calamari ink," he admitted as if he was rather bored.

This further amused Hermione, wishing she could have seen the look on Rainbow's face when Severus laid that whopper of a tale on her.

"Janine asked me as well. She is the Muggle nurse who helped with the ice pox treatment, but she asked very nicely and tactfully. So I told Janine that you needed a friend to talk with, which is the truth."

Smiling, Hermione hummed in agreement. "Yes, that does seem to sum up nicely how it all began."

Once home, Hermione undressed, willing to fulfill her offer to Severus that convinced him to put the silly paper crown upon his head at the table for everyone to see.

As Severus walked in, holding the gold box he had set aside, he said, "You didn't have to promise to do this tonight."

Hermione placed her dirty clothes in the hamper with a flick of her wand, keeping her red knickers on. "Your fear is looking foolish. I thought if I could help you overcome that fear tonight, it would only be right for me to address my fear tonight as well."

Severus set the gold box on the bed and lifted the lid. Pulling out the purple and black corset, he heard Hermione breathe deeply, as she began her techniques to remain calm. He laid the corset upon her lap to look at, asking if there was anything else he could do to help her.

Hermione suggested brightening the lights, since it had been dark where Alan held her captive. She also asked him to set the music box to play something classical, soothing, a pleasant sound to focus
"I'm ready."

Severus loosened the laces as much as he could before wrapping the silk-and-lace undergarment about her. He let it hang open in the front, holding it loosely about her torso, to allow her to get used to the idea of it on her person.

Hermione knew she had nothing to fear from a piece of clothing, but it brought back the memories of feeling bound and trapped, the same as how it felt when Madam Mandel began to tighten and cinch it. All those recollections and images were close to rupturing through her mental focus of the moment.

With her hands slightly trembling, Hermione began to hook the front closed. She began breathing heavily while trying to control her emotions.

Severus wanted to say what a lovely color it was on her, but knew this was not the time.

They sat there on the bed as Hermione's breaths began to even out once more.

Hermione closed her eyes as she began to confess, "After the attack, I tried to visit the Pensieve memory of that one time you chained me up. I couldn't watch it. Just seeing myself unable to break free, it no longer aroused me, but only frightened me."

The corset was still very loose, and he would not tighten it until Hermione requested he do so.

Severus placed a gentle hand on her shoulder and began speaking in a low and comforting voice. "Do you remember that first time you bound me, when we were experimenting on the Irresistible Potion?"

Hermione licked her lips before breathing her reply. "Yes."

"I know the panic one can feel when one feels restrained," he admitted without further detail.
Hermione could only guess that he had been attacked while immobilized by some spell, hex, or jinx. "How did you get through it? How did you stop yourself from panicking?"

Severus' hand began slowly caressing her shoulder in a way that was meant to comfort, not seduce. "Because I was with someone I trusted completely. I knew you would not hurt me. I knew that while I was with you, unable to defend myself, you would keep me safe."

Hermione closed her eyes and let out a shuddering sigh as she leaned into his touch for support, taking relief in Severus' words and taking them to heart.

"One thing I think you failed to realize," he went on in the same gentle and assuring voice, "was that time I restrained you upon your request, it was not I who was in control, it was you. The slightest word by you and it all would have ended. You were the one in control, though I understand that you may have forgotten that." Severus leaned over and gave Hermione a chaste kiss upon her shoulder.

After a few moments, she sat up straight and glanced over her shoulder at the man she loved and trusted completely. "You can start slowly tightening the laces," Hermione said, her voice a little less shaky.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: And thank you to BleedingHeartWorks (http://bleedingheartworks.deviantart.com/) for the lovely commission of Severus in the shower, for the scene at the very top of the chapter. You can view it on my Tumblr page here. Rated soft R (mature) for naked butt, no bits showing, but still, NSFW. http://atdlhea-betz.tumblr.com/post/153292646125/sneak-peek-at-fan-art-for-and-they-didnt-live

Thank you to my ever talented, always glorious betas, JuneW and thegreyladies. Without my betas, this fic would be far less readable and coherent.

Regular Muggle POG is passion, orange, and guava juice, a favorite juice blend of kids that is available in stores in Hawaii. It is sold in cartons and cans.

Nisei is a person of Japanese descent (second generation), born and educated in the "Has Anybody Seen My Gal": Music by Ray Henderson, Lyrics by Sam M. Lewis & Joseph Widow Young.
"Pensieve Pleasures"

Chapter Summary

Hermione and Severus find a way to keep communicating while apart; later on, Severus continues to give Hermione more “therapy.”

Chapter Notes

Warning: Mild, consensual BDSM scene.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter One Hundred Four
"Pensieve Pleasures"

Disclaimer: So I got to keep on disclaimin'.
I got to write on, oh, ho, ho.
I, I, I, I'm so tired,
But I just can't lose my stride.
I got fifteen disclaimers to go now,
And I can hear the lawyers calling my name.
It's not as if, as though, I'm stealing Rowling's oeuvre.
I'm gonna tell you till my meaning is plain.
Now I'll be so glad to wrap this up,
And start my own original fic, that's the plan.
Now, when I post my fanfic,
I disclaim all over, rip, and remember who owns this franchise.
I got to keep on disclaimin'.
I got to write on, oh, ho, ho.
I, I, I, I, I'm so tired, but I just can't lose my stride.
Read on, let me tell you, ya'll, I, I, I, I, I, I, I, I'm so tired,
But I just can't lose my stride.
Come on fic, don't fail me now.
I got ten more chapters to go.
I got nine, eight, seven, six, six, six...

A/N: Disclaimer a parody of the song “25 Miles” by Edwin Starr. Songwriters: BRISTOL, JOHNNY WILLIAM/STARR, EDWIN/FUQUA, HARVEY. Published by Lyrics © Sony/ATV Music Publishing LLC
Severus woke up to something warm, furry, and rumbling attached to his face. Gently pushing the cat aside, he sat up to find his bed empty and the sun much higher in the morning sky than when he normally woke.

Glancing at the floor, he saw the corset still lying there as when it was tossed aside during their extended night of passion. Taking a second dose of the Sequoia potion within one day certainly explained why he had slept in.

"Katrina!" Hermione gently chastised the cat, who had finally been given a name by Severus. "I told you not to wake him. He had a long night."

Hermione came prancing in, practically bouncing on the balls of her feet, with a tray floating behind her. There was fresh fruit, a croissant, and a freshly made pot of tea, all for one.

"We both had a long night, yet you're up and about looking chipper." Severus couldn't help but suddenly smirk to himself in memory of the night before. Even he couldn't believe he'd let Hermione bind him to the bed as part of her "therapy" by reversing the roles. What's more, he couldn't believe he'd enjoyed it, but it was merely the illusion that he had given up control. Just the sudden visual recollection of Hermione in her corset, riding him wantonly as her hair tossed about while he was unable to hold her, but knowing he could have her free him at any moment, made his cock stir.

"Breakfast in bed is served," she announced, a lingering twinkle in her eye.

Severus sat up and braced his back against the headboard. He let Hermione set the tray down with the guidance of her wand. "This is something new." He was feeling quite pampered.

"You sleeping in this late is new," Hermione pointed out.

She leaned over and gave him a soft, yet lingering, kiss before going around to the other side of the bed to climb in and keep him company as he ate. She kept Katrina from sticking her nose in Severus' breakfast by keeping her busy with a thorough two-handed scratching behind the ears.

Severus had the tea and milk pouring themselves into a cup with the use of his wand, while he was busy looking at the Owl Post that had arrived that morning. Opening it, he hummed to himself.

"Anything interesting?"

"Gary Fujitani, your new temporary Japanese tutor, wants to come over today to begin lessons. He wants to know what time he should arrive." Severus knew that Gary would have probably come over instead and knocked on his door or met him down at his shop, but given that Severus had company, Gary probably didn't want to bother him.

"Where's your owl? I could send a reply that eleven o'clock would be fine." Hermione began to get up until Severus stopped her.

"Don't bother owling. I usually keep the owl at the shop. And the custom here is to go over in person."

"That's not very efficient," Hermione noted.

"No, but personal interaction is more highly valued; it's part of the sense of community here. While sometimes a bit impracticable, it does allow for more face-to-face time. It's a small community; most of the island's inhabitants live in town within walking distance, and not every home here has a fireplace. Besides, the menehune are frightened of owls, so people keep the use of owls to a minimum as well, more out of politeness, formality, or official business." Severus ate a forkful of pineapple before washing it down with a sip of tea.

Hermione had read in the Muggle guide book on Hawaii about local folklore of the menehune – ancient little forest people who build great construction projects overnight, fitting lava rocks and stones together seamlessly to build fish dams, aqueducts, irrigation channels, and temples. However, should the menehune be discovered, they abandon their project, forever leaving it unfinished.

There was a lot about life in Malu Palekaiko Hermione still had to learn about. She was still getting used to taking her shoes off when entering a house, a custom Severus had already picked up. It was strange to watch him pad about the house barefoot most of the time, so different from seeing him in black wool trousers, long-sleeved shirts, and boots. She did notice he had proper footwear when he was brewing, though; no open-toed sandals when he was in the Potions lab.

"Speaking of face-to-face, that reminds me of something I wanted to talk with you about," Hermione said, prompted by Severus' use of the phrase. She had wanted to speak to him last night about it, but they got carried away dealing with other matters. "Do you remember that mirror Harry once had that was a gift from Sirius? The mirror that had a twin in which you could see the other person's face and converse over distance?"

"You mean the two-way mirror that if Potter had bothered to use, Sirius Black might still be alive this day?" Severus bit out unkindly.

Hermione winced from Severus' acerbic tone, recalling the guilt Harry had gone through, thinking the exact same thing as Severus had clearly stated. She was not about to defend Harry, nor was she going to dwell on that part of their past either. Instead, she kept the conversation focused on the present. "Well, I was thinking, since Jerry is quite talented at Charms, as you say he is, perhaps he can help us create a set of two-way mirrors with which we could continue to see each other and talk a bit every day, instead of these long months apart. And though I might be here in as early as maybe nine or ten months, I really did miss talking with you terribly after you left. Once I do move here, it will be much more practical to stay in contact with Lavender back in London instead of albatross or Portkeys."

Severus mulled it over and wished he had thought of that himself. It was something that would certainly allow him to keep in contact with Hermione and see her, though not in person, every day. He had missed talking with her just as much, and having her around made him the happiest he had been in a long time.

"Perhaps we should visit Jerry before we visit Gary to see if he is capable of such a thing. As much as I am loathe to admit it, Black and Potter were quite talented wizards, and it is a rather ingenious device," Severus reluctantly confessed. "Then if you can continue your lessons with Gary via our mirrors, a long-term tutoring plan can be arranged."

Severus finished up his breakfast quickly and got ready for the day. Upon entering the kitchen, he saw what had kept Hermione busy while he slept in. She had her books on tropical flora out, and a few from his library. Also, she had been working on her scrolls for Albert, no doubt scribbling what information she had gleaned from working in the garden yesterday. Seeing that Severus was ready, she put her work away, and they headed out into the late morning together.

Now strolling, instead of rushing because they were late like the day before, Hermione could look about and admire the lushness of the island. Ferns, ti plants, orchids, and palm trees decorated people's front yards, which were accented with hedges of different gingers, sugar cane, various bamboos, and hibiscus in a rainbow of colors.

They walked together, with Hermione's arm tucked into Severus', towards the edge of town to an area where the jungle was less tamed. Turning off the main road they walked single-file along a path that was slightly overgrown, and where they had to duck their heads under the fronds of a tree fern, until they rounded a turn in the gravel path dotted with pink and red anthuriums growing wild. Then they came upon a multi-storied treehouse about fifteen to twenty feet up in the air, built atop some long pieces of lumber and around a few trees. Had Arthur and Molly built The Burrow as a tropical treehouse, it would have looked very similar to the house Hermione now stood nearly under, since it seemed there was not a right angle or plumb line in the entire structure.

They climbed a long flight of stairs that led up to the front door.

Severus knocked on the front door, and the two were greeted by a very bleary-eyed Jerry, who had a blue-and-white Japanese men's cotton kimono tied only half-closed. Hermione could see his black T-shirt and paisley boxers on underneath.

"Jeez, I thought you guys would still be busy playing 'hide the Beater's bat' this morning," Jerry drawled sleepily, his New York accent sounding rather pronounced that morning.

Severus was about to do something about the rudeness of Jerry's crude sexual innuendo as he began to go for his wand, but Hermione minutely shook her head, indicating to let it go. If she was offended enough by some remark Jerry made, she was fully capable of letting Jerry know of her displeasure. Besides, a wizard like Jerry who loved a pissing and vomiting Santa figurine was bound to make some uncouth comment about their sex life.

Scratching at his grizzled chin, Jerry stepped away from the doorjamb and waved them in. "Since you're here, might as well come in. Sorry about the mess; I had a party here after dinner last night."

Jerry ambled off towards the bathroom while Severus and Hermione walked carefully. They wanted to avoid the many bottles and drained cups, most of them empty of alcohol, strewn about the floor. When they found their way to the couch, Severus swept his wand across the couch to simultaneously dust and clear it of food crumbs before he and Hermione sat down.

Emerging from the bathroom, Jerry was now in a pair of shorts and a clean white T-shirt featuring a photo of four sullen-looking men with the word "Ramones" in a hastily scrawled font above it, Severus' co-worker staggered to his living room, tipping a vial of hangover relief potion down his gullet.

"Ah, better," he said as he chucked the empty vial over his shoulder, then cast his wand about, making the falling vial and all the empty and partially empty bottles and cups around the place disappear. The room was now clean and presentable, even with the Santa standing over in the corner. At least the over-sized novelty figurine's drawers were currently in the up position, though to Hermione's shock, two "nude" gingerbread cookies were still busy rutting away on the cookie tray, making the platter softly buzzle and rattle. She hoped Severus wouldn't notice, because she had not told him about her idea of a confectionery sex show featuring stripping gingerbread people – an idea that the twins seemed to have included in their present to her.

"What brings you over to Chez Jerry's at the ungodly hour of ten in the morning? Hey, aren't you supposed to be observing that British Boxing Day thing? Rest, sleep in, let the servants and house-elves have a day off? All that stuff?"

"We're here because Severus tells me you are quite talented at Charms. He told me about the dancing tables and chairs you charmed during your impromptu interview. And I was wondering if your talent in Charms was extensive enough to help us with a commission," Hermione began, sounding very business-like.

Jerry sat there yawning as Hermione started to explain her proposal, but he stopped her. "Sorry, I'm no damn good before my coffee." He flicked his wand, and a tray and hat rack walked out from the kitchen. A full coffee service for three was set upon the tray. "Coffee?" the host offered.

"Yes, thank you," Hermione accepted. Severus nodded as well.

The hat rack played butler and served coffee to all the guests and its master before walking off to stand in the corner.

"So what is it you think that I can do you for? Considering Severus is no slouch when it comes to Charms, I'm surprised you're here to see me." Jerry sipped his coffee and set his cup to hover in mid-air next to the armchair he was currently slouched in, as he didn't have an end table nearby.

Hermione explained the two-way mirror concept to Jerry, who kept nodding along as he periodically sipped his coffee.

"And this Black guy made a two-way mirror when he was what? Fourteen or fifteen? Man, I'd like to meet him someday," Jerry said with admiration.

"Unfortunately, he passed away," Hermione informed him.

"Not that unfortunate," Severus grumbled under his breath.
Jerry decided not to delve into whatever bug Severus had up his ass in regards to Sirius and merely replied, "Yeah, that's simple enough. Well, if you've had advanced training in Charms, it's simple enough." Jerry started to lean forward as if he was going to stand up then stopped. "But you could have gotten around this the Muggle way with a web camera on a computer with a bit of face chat time." He looked at the blank faces on them both. "You guys do know what a computer is, right?"

Hermione sat up a bit straighter and said, "I am Muggle-born. My parents do have a computer, and I do know what the Internet is. I've been on it a few times."

Jerry smirked. "Yeah, but do you have an email account, and could you get lover boy here on a computer too?"

Severus, not taking kindly to being referred to as "lover boy," knew about computers and even had a basic understanding about the Internet, as Hermione had explained it. He reminded Jerry why computers were not an alternative option. "You forget we have no electricity on Malu Palekaiko, and until some months ago, I could not go to the nearest available public-use computer over in Hilo, where they take the children to introduce them to computers during Muggle camp at the Hilo public library. Besides, there would also be a complete lack of privacy in a public library, which is why it is 'public.'"

Jerry looked a bit sheepish and said, "Yeah, there is that. I still have one foot in the Muggle world, and while I will be the first one to use magic when it is convenient, I also tend to think of Muggle solutions, too."

Hermione sighed, understanding his position. "Yes, my Aunt Christine, who is a Muggle, does marketing, advertising, and sales for Lavender, my boss. My aunt wishes we would find a magical equivalent of email instead of dealing with owls, since she and my Uncle Tim are not fond of cleaning up the owl pellets in the backyard."

"Yeah, computers work fine, until someone magical gets upset, then the circuits and motherboard get fried," Jerry remembered. "Had to pay fifteen hundred bucks out of my own pocket to replace my brother's computer I toasted, plus there were all those files he lost." Jerry laughed to himself, then stopped and frowned. "Yeah, maybe staying away from computers is the best."

Jerry agreed to make the two-way mirrors. When Severus and Hermione offered to pay him for his trouble, he refused payment. "Listen, if it wasn't for the opportunity to work at your shop as a tutor, Severus, I might have gone back to Arnold, and all that other stuff we won't go into. This job gave me a way out and a way to move out."
Hermione and Severus sat on the couch for the next ten minutes while Jerry rifled through dozens of books until he found the right one.

For testing, Jerry took a small hand-mirror and cut it in two. There were a few incantations and complicated wand movements. When he was done, he handed the two pieces of charmed glass to the pair for testing.

Severus went outside while Hermione went to the upper tier of Jerry's house, to prevent any accidental bleed-over of sound. The visuals and sound came through perfectly clear.

As they shook Jerry's hand, the Charms tutor said, "When you finally get the two mirrors you want me to charm, just let me know and I'll come over to your place. No point in schlepping them all the way here and back."

Hermione was smiling to herself as they walked on towards Gary and Iolana's house.

"You look very pleased with yourself," Severus noticed.

Shrugging, Hermione was indeed pleased with herself, but she was smiling thinking about how instead of masturbating and trying to imagine Severus was watching her, he actually could watch her now with the charmed mirrors. Masturbation, home alone back in London, was about to get a whole lot less boring and lonely.

Gary was thrilled to teach Hermione Japanese. He had taught his own children, but they had grown up and moved away years ago, and it was too far for him to Portkey all the way to Seattle, Washington, to teach his grandchildren on a weekly basis. He had tutored a few others around the island, but opportunities were few and far between for those who were serious enough to become proficient in the language.

Upon finding out about Hermione and Severus' two-way mirrors, Gary was even more excited to help teach Hermione long-term. Severus, who had been taking lessons from Arnold until Jerry started working for Severus, asked Gary to help him continue his learning of the language, since he and Arnold were currently not on good terms.

"How much would you charge for daily tutoring?" Hermione asked.
Gary waved his hand dismissively. "Don't worry about it."

"At least I should pay you then," Severus insisted.

Gary sat back in his chair and gave a light chuckle. "Listen, Severus, before you got here, we only had Arnold and Ranjit for Potions masters. I'd teach you just for thanks for being someone I can ask to brew commissions for me without giving me the stink-eye or opening his big fat trap."

Severus had brewed quite a lot of Sequoia potion for Gary, much to the delight and thanks of his wife, too.

Looking at Hermione, Gary added, "And the sooner you finish your Japanese language requirements, the sooner you get here. That means the sooner business will be up and running, and tax dollars will be coming in. We're hoping with the tax revenue Lovely Lavender will bring in, the town council members can give themselves a pay raise for the first time in nearly eight years. And with the additional taxes we are hoping to come in, we are planning on sprucing up the downtown with a few nice benches, better tiki-torch street lighting, maybe a wizard-Muggle chess corner in the park, but mostly money for the new school. So the sooner you're here, the sooner the money comes rolling in."

Severus had a vague idea how much town council members were paid, as Mounga had encouraged Severus to run for the town council. There was hardly any pay in it, and all the council members, except for Gary who was retired, had to have other jobs as their main source of income. Severus figured his time was better spent working on other endeavors. He was ambitious, but ambition didn't mean you had to work for a pittance; there was little pay for what little power he could attain through a seat on the town council.

Since Hermione and Severus would be long-term students of Gary's, it was decided that lessons would begin tomorrow morning at nine, at Severus' house. Gary gave them a list of primer books to pick up at the local bookstore.

At Paige Spien's Bookstore, the pair spent so much time browsing and shopping, they were almost late for supper over at the Malfoys'.

Arriving at their friends' home, with their bags of books in hand, Draco laughed at the pair standing on his front porch.
"It figures you two would go to the bookstore together first chance you had." Draco ushered them inside.

"Given we both have our first Japanese lessons with Gary tomorrow at nine o'clock, it was best to shop now while they were still open. I just wish Flourish and Blotts had after-Christmas sales like Paige Spien's," Hermione said with a huff as she set her bags of books by the door and slipped out of her shoes to go barefoot like her hosts and Severus.

Ginny waddled into the living room, greeting Hermione and Severus.

Hermione realized she was now living this other life she had thought so strange a year and a half ago, yet Ginny and she had both longed for it. Her and Severus having weekly Sunday suppers with Draco and Ginny. While it was surreal the first time they all dined together back in Severus' flat, it now seemed a comfortable and natural situation to find herself in. And while Harry and Ron used to run off and abandon Hermione and Ginny to talk Quidditch, Severus and Draco made no such move to segregate themselves from the company of their witches. This was the life that Hermione had dreamed of for months: A slice of normal domesticity in which she could see herself happy, instead of muddling through frustrated and disappointed, feeling like she had settled for less in life.

"Draco was quite busy this morning with the news that we have three babies on the way instead of one now," Ginny began the conversation.

"Why? What were you so busy doing?" Hermione asked out of curiosity.

"I finished the baby's quilt a month ago, but now that there will be three, I had to start working on two more if they are to be done in time," Draco replied.

"You're making the babies' quilts?" Hermione asked, not thinking Draco to be the witches sewing circle type.

"Oh yes, didn't Severus tell you? Draco won first place at the Pele Festival craft competition for novice division in Hawaiian quilting," Ginny beamed with pride.

Hermione couldn't help herself, she turned to Draco and dryly remarked, "Cooking and sewing? You'll make a wonderful housewitch for some wizard some day."
There was a moment of silence, and Hermione wondered if she had gone too far or if her joke had fallen flat, until Severus and Ginny simultaneously gave a sudden laugh each.

Draco gave a short laugh at himself before saying, "Well, they encourage everyone who moves here to pick up one of the Hawaiian cultural traditions. Severus is studying the language, and Ginny is learning hula. While I have an ear, I didn't feel like learning an instrument, and I'm not dancing bare-chested in a ti leaf skirt in front of thousands at the Pele festival. So I chose this instead, which I can do quietly in the evenings."

Hermione asked to see the blanket, and praised the fine workmanship and the quartered design of the flying Golden Snitches. "What charm did you use for the thread work?"

"No charms. Hawaiian quilting is done by hand, no magic."

"No magic? But why?" Hermione asked.

Draco took the blanket back from Hermione, folding it carefully. "Because it was a craft brought over by Muggle missionaries, and because the witches and wizards thought that to learn it without the use of magic was a way to teach patience and understanding so they could better understand those who were born without magic. But even though the Statute of Secrecy forced the split of the Muggle and magical Hawaiian communities apart, they still kept the tradition of sewing by hand."

"Well, it's simply lovely. You did a beautiful job."

Draco smiled and nodded his head, accepting her compliment.

For supper, Draco grilled a whole opakapaka (a local crimson snapper) on the grill in the backyard. Ginny made the salad and side dishes.

Sitting out on the back patio under the shade of an African Tulip Tree, a cool chilled drink in her hand and wonderful food shared among friends, the conversation flowed easily. Hermione couldn't believe that the sun was getting close to setting; time had flown as everyone enjoyed the long afternoon together.
As Hermione and Severus slipped on their shoes and picked up their bags of books to carry home, Hermione told Draco she would be over by ten-thirty, after her Japanese lesson, in order to go over construction plans and survey the site. Ginny and Hermione also made plans to have lunch together in Honolulu later that week, in addition to a bit of shopping.

The sun was low in the sky as Hermione and Severus finished putting their books away in the library.

"So how much space do you think you'll need with your current library?" Severus asked, wondering if he'd planned enough shelving for their combined collections.

"Oh, I'll take up less than half of available shelving once all my books are here." Hermione ran a finger lovingly along some of Severus' books, remembering reading certain ones by the fire in his flat while snuggled next to Severus as he read his own book. "I'm still full. How about we go read on the front porch and enjoy the sunset?"

Severus had been thinking the exact same thing, and he felt contented that they were so well suited with one another. He grabbed a book he was in the middle of that was marked with a silk ribbon, while Hermione grabbed one of her newly purchased books on native Hawaiian birds and their magical uses.

Rarely had Severus ever laid in the hammock on his front porch by himself. With the two of them on the hammock together, head to foot, reading by the late afternoon light, their skin caressed by the tropical breeze that came up from the ocean, Severus could barely keep his eyes on the page in front of him. There was Hermione, book in hand, an arm crooked behind her head to support it as she read, one leg hanging over the edge of the hammock, the descending sun making her hair shimmer with golden highlights.

This was the vision he'd had of her back in London, a sight that now made him feel at peace with himself. These past three days had been the happiest of his life. There was little more Severus could think of that could make his life more complete than what he had at that moment. He had a life and career of his own choosing, the respect and admiration of friends and the community, and a beautiful witch he knew would someday marry him and bear his children, binding them together.

He was so lost in his self-reflection, he didn't notice that Hermione had caught him staring at her in an odd way and had set her book down.

"Severus? Are you all right?"
Shaking himself from his reverie, he admitted freely, "Yes, everything is perfect."

Hermione turned around in the hammock to cuddle up next to Severus. She noticed that the sky was darkening and probably close to the horizon, the sun having finally disappeared behind the trees and mountainside.

"Are the sunsets always so vivid here?" Hermione asked.

They couldn't see the sun setting over the ocean, but trails of scarlet and vividly orange clouds that streaked the sky could still be seen from the front porch.

"Quite often." Severus suddenly had an idea. "The view of the sunsets is spectacular from my farm on the west side of the island. We should have a picnic and watch the sunset from there. I can also show you where I grow my Mediterranean plants in the rain shadow of the volcano. You can also see some of the lava fields from recent flows nearby and the ferns, ohelo shrubs, and the ohia lehua trees growing in the lava cracks, the beginning of reforestation."

Hermione intertwined her fingers with Severus. "In the Muggle tour books, they tell the tale of the ohia tree and lehua blossoms."

"How close do the Muggles get this story correct versus the way I was told by the natives here?" Severus prompted her.

"Let's see," Hermione began, her eyes glancing upwards as she began to recall the tale. "Pele fancied Ohia, a handsome young Hawaiian man, and she asked him to marry her. But Ohia was already in love and promised to Lehua."

Severus hummed in agreement, encouraging her to go on.

"Pele, furious she had been rejected and out of jealousy, turned Ohia into an ugly tree. The gods, unable to undo Pele's curse, took pity on Lehua and turned her into a blossom on the Ohia tree so that the lovers will never be parted. And local legend says if you pluck a Lehua flower, you are separating the lovers, and it will rain that day."
Severus put his arm around Hermione, and she snuggled closer. The context of the story was too close to the truth that at the end of the week, they too would be parted and there would be tears falling like rain.

As if sensing their sudden melancholy mood, a cluster of dark storm clouds appeared on the eastern horizon, a sign that it would surely rain tonight.

Stroking her jaw with the side of his finger, Severus felt his heart ache knowing that this happiness he had been reveling in for these past three days would come to an end. They would be parted. The last time they parted, even he had cried at the loss of his love.

Hermione tilted her face up to look at Severus. His eyes looked larger than normal, shining with what looked like unshed tears in the fading light. Her heart went out to him, knowing that he was thinking of how they were to be separated once more. Overwhelmed with her love for Severus, she craned her neck up and captured Severus' mouth in a kiss.

At first it started off soft, a soothing caress to assure him she felt the same way, but then it grew more urgent. Their kisses became more possessive, familiar with the same feeling they had in those last few weeks before Severus fled, knowing they would soon be apart from one another.

Severus' hand snaked up under Hermione's top, cupping her breast. She arched her back, pressing into his hungry touch. She tilted her head back, allowing Severus to trail a mixture of kisses and nips along her neck while her hand began undoing the button and zipper of his shorts.

Suddenly, they stopped when they heard two people talking along the road in front of the house. Severus had left enough dense vegetation along the front property line, but one might have been able to spy the amorous couple in the hammock when passing by the front gate.

Remembering that the front porch wasn't entirely private, they quickly moved their activities into the house, shedding clothing in a trail from the front door to the bedroom upstairs.

As Severus was spooned up behind her he slowly thrust into her, his arm clasped around her waist to hold her in place. His hand stroked her, as he moaned, "If I could change the stars and turn the world inside out to keep you here with me, I would."

"I know," Hermione sighed, arching her back to allow Severus to go deeper. "But it will be a shorter time apart, my love, I promise. And we'll have the mirrors," she reminded him.
He tilted his head forward and gently bit her shoulder, a subconscious sign of his desire to possess and mark her as his own. "You can't make love to a mirror."

Hermione pulled away from Severus momentarily as she changed position. Pushing him onto his back to mount him, she slowly rolled her hips back and forth as she sat up, letting Severus watch her above him, his hands stroking her thighs and caressing her hips as her breasts jiggled and swayed. "No, but you like to watch me touch myself. And while it won't be you, I do have those toys the twins gave me." She smirked openly at Severus before biting her lower lip to add a sense of false coyness to her suggestion.

Severus grabbed her hips and spread her a little wider as he drove himself up into Hermione, lifting his hips of off the bed with a few quick, pistoning thrusts. "Yes, I heard about you and your Pensieve trips. You like to watch as well."

"When I have something as beautiful as you to watch, how could I not?" Hermione leaned forward and kissed Severus as his hands reached up and grabbed her breasts firmly. He tweaked her nipples enough to make her gasp momentarily, knowing he had pushed her to the edge of pleasure and pain. She tore her mouth away from his to gasp harshly and concentrate on the sensation of what his hands were doing to her breasts.

"Do you want to finish your 'therapy' and watch something else?" Severus suggested.

The night before they had made great progress with Hermione and her corset. She even let Severus momentarily bind her to the bed, after he had let her bind him down first. It was a dual exercise in trust and conquering her fears. She had mentioned her inability to find arousal from the memory in which he had bound her back in his flat, but now that her fears had been mostly broken down – so it seemed – this was a way to address some of her lingering trauma in a non-threatening situation.

Hermione stopped riding Severus and stroked his hair lovingly away from his face. Severus had suggested something she found far more compelling than any remaining fear she had over watching herself in a memory bound and tied. She had longed to be with Severus in a Pensieve, watching each other in an intimate moment. While she had not openly told him of her secret desire, it was as if he had read her mind.

"Yes, I want to watch something else," she breathed heavily, even more turned on by the thought of it alone. "Oh, yes," she added once more heartily, letting Severus know just how much she was willing.
"Do you want to wear the corset?" Severus asked, wondering if the undergarment would help her with her "treatment."

"Why not. We can always remove it later on... as needed." Her implication of the last phrase was that it was hard to breathe when one was rigorously fucking and trying to get enough oxygen in the process.

Severus helped her with the garment, cooing the soothing words to her he said the night before that helped her deal with the sensation of the corset constricting around her rib cage. "These are my arms about you, keeping you safe. This silk is me, holding you close. The tighter I cinch, the tighter I am embracing you." He pulled the laces by hand, caressing her shoulders and kissing the nape of her neck with each round of tightening until it was snug yet still comfortable for Hermione.

"I'm ready," she sighed with anticipation.

They walked to the Potions lab, Severus completely nude, carrying only his wand, and Hermione in nothing but her corset, her wand tucked down the front of it. Severus lifted the silver dome over the Pensieve.

Hermione closed her eyes and recalled the memory that no longer seemed to frighten her as much. Slipping the silvery threads into the basin, they watched as the swirling waters carried the memory on an unseen current.

The lovers held hands as they both leaned forward, allowing themselves to be pulled into her memory together.

They found themselves back in the flat in London, when it was still Severus'. His armoire was there, along with the rest of the furniture he’d left that had come with the flat.

The scene began with the memory version of the lovers bursting through the kitchen door.

Severus was running after Hermione. He was supposed to be a threat to Hermione in this little game, but the periodic knowing smile that graced Hermione's lips as she escaped his clutches once more by ducking sideways belied the true nature of the chase. Her torn nightgown hung precariously from one shoulder, her breasts periodically visible through the large tear in the fabric as she swayed back and forth, attempting to fake out her pursuer.
The real version of Severus, who watched this memory unfold, slid up behind Hermione and wrapped an arm around her waist, while the other toyed with a tendril of hair, stroking her neck and shoulder in the process.

Hermione leaned against Severus, resting her head back against his shoulder as they watched together.

"You never told me what the inspiration behind this fantasy of yours was," Severus murmured in a low and seductive voice into her ear. His hand slipped from her waist, gliding along the silk and lace to rest between her legs, cupping her mons.

Feeling a bit heady in the intoxication of fulfilling a fantasy and Severus' languid touch between her legs, Hermione felt any hesitation or shyness melt away. "That time I caught sight of Ginny and Draco, I saw him restrain her. And... and..."

It was hard for Hermione to continue as Severus' finger was stroking her clit in such a way that it was making it hard not only to think, but to talk coherently while watching the scene before her.

_Hermione gasped harshly in mock fright as Severus finally caught her and roughly threw her on the bed, ripping at her nightgown, tearing it away completely. Her captor laughed menacingly in a way that sent a visible thrill through her._

The real Severus felt Hermione shudder in his grasp, thrilled at reliving the vision of the scene as when it originally happened. "Tell me what you were thinking at that moment. You're pretending to fight me off, but not that hard. Why?" he asked sweetly.

"That I wanted you so badly. I wanted you to take me roughly, like an animal," Hermione admitted with a plaintive sigh as she rolled her hips into Severus' touch, increasing the friction of his hand between her legs.

"But why fight me? Why not just sweetly beg? Why the pretense of a chase and refusal to submit to me?" Severus prodded with his line of questioning.

_Severus had flipped Hermione over onto her stomach as if she weighed nothing. Then he yanked her up roughly up onto her feet, but in a way so as not to hurt or pull her arms out of joint._
Still, the memory version of Hermione struggled against him, pleading in tones that were not very believable. "Please, let me go. Don't hurt me." They had already pre-arranged safe words to use.

"Hurting you is the last thing you'll think I'm doing to you when I'm done," Severus promised, a leer plainly written on his face as his eyes raked over the nude form of his prey. He quickly latched the metal chains around her wrists and ankles by hand; Hermione reduced her efforts to resist, in order to allow him to restrain her more easily.

This was how the lovers got around the restrictions of the Death Eater Decree that still allowed Severus to bind Hermione. She had placed the chains there beforehand with her own wand.

Hermione, watching herself chained up, felt her breath become more rapid, but it was not fear that caused her breath to become short. She was beginning to remember more aspects about this fantasy with Severus by her side she had pushed out of her mind.

She reached down and found Severus' length was hot and hard, and it twitched in her hand as she firmly grasped it, her hand slowly stroking him.

Severus felt his own breath hitch briefly as Hermione clamped her hand around his cock with a firm grip. "Why?" he breathed into her ear as his hand slipped further between her legs and his fingers began toying with her entrance. "Why pretend to not want me when clearly you do?"

Severus began toying with Hermione's body, gently stroking her skin in a way that made her body shake and shiver. The captive struggled against her chains, but it was more for show than any desire to escape, adding to the false narrative. Pleas for him to stop came feebly from her lips.

"Because I wanted to lose control completely," Hermione admitted.

"But you were always in control," Severus reminded her. "Look at me," he told her, directing her to continue watching their memory selves.

Severus was hastily pulling off his clothes. "I don't think your begging is very convincing. Beg harder for my mercy," he sneered, but the curl of his lip quickly faded and was replaced with a look of unadulterated lust. His mouth hung open, visibly panting as his hand stroked Hermione's body much more tenderly than from anyone who wanted to do her harm.
"Please," Hermione wailed more piteously, fighting against her chains more earnestly.

Severus grabbed her roughly from behind, embracing her. One arm wrapped tightly about her waist, the other grabbed at her breast greedily.

Hermione threw her head back. Her hips bucked backwards, grinding up against the erection Severus was pressing into her hip.

"Please," she begged once more, her voice becoming near hysterical. "Release me."

Severus moved behind Hermione and placed his cock between her thighs, grazing between her cheeks. "But you didn't want to be released."

"No," Hermione replied as she moved her hips to rub against Severus' cock, her hips making small movements to tease the head around her entrance. "Not that kind of release."

"See how I am fighting with myself from not taking you right there and then? I'm waiting for you to give me permission to proceed." Severus felt the tip of his cock catching on the edge, almost slipping into Hermione only to slide past and almost stroke her clitoris from behind. "You're in control. Why the illusion?"

"Please," Hermione wailed once more as Severus' hand slipped between her legs and began to stroke her clit.

"Please what?" Severus growled in response, his head bent forward resting on her shoulder as his other hand stroked her more tenderly, caressing her hip and softly cupping her breasts as his finger worked faster between her legs.

"The illusion of complete surrender," Hermione finally admitted, all of it coming out as if a dam were breaking. "To be seduced, to be so willing to be taken by you, to give complete control over to you that I would do anything you would ask. To be your slave if you asked, trusting you so fully I would do anything and everything you asked of me, wanting to please you in an act of submission I didn't think myself capable of."
"Please, take me. I beg you, have mercy and take me please!"

Simultaneously, the memory of Severus and the real Severus entered their respective Hermiones, who each cried out in their own ways.

_Hermione shrieked with release, fighting against her chains if only for the fact she wanted to clasp her arms about her welcomed attacker and hold him fast to her as his hips pumped furiously into her. His own screams and grunts were telling that he was also equally lost within the rapture of the game they played._

"Oh God, Severus. Take me any way you want. I'm completely yours!" Hermione wailed. Her eyes were shut tight, as she was unable to keep her eyes open any longer as she pushed back against each of Severus' thrusts. He came close to knocking her forward and nearly off balance, if it weren't for the fact he had a death grip on her hips as he slammed into her.

Severus was close to orgasming, but he valiantly held back. Roughly grabbing her about her torso to pin her back against her chest, he asked in a harsh whisper into her ear, "Any way?" To make his point, his finger slipped between her cheeks and pressed against her anus.

"Yes," she said, arching her back to let Severus slip a finger inside of her, knowing full well what he meant.

They didn't need to remain in the Pensieve until the end of the memory. With a swish of Hermione's wand, then found themselves back in the Potions laboratory.

Kissing each other, their hands grasping and clutching at each other, Severus moved Hermione backwards until her back pressed up against the edge of a workbench.

His arm shot out and grabbed the bottle of safflower oil she had pointed out the other day. Quickly flipping the cap off, not caring that it landed on the floor and rolled away to rest beneath another workbench, he sloppily poured a handful of the oil into his cupped palm. His body kept Hermione pinned in place against the work bench as she feverishly kissed at his shoulder, chest, upper arm, and neck.

She squealed momentarily as Severus began urgently rubbing the oil all over his cock that was currently pressed along Hermione's stomach. The oil dripped down both their bodies, running down their legs as Severus grabbed Hermione by the hip and encouraged her to turn around.
Hermione, now facing the bench, bent forward, enjoying the shock of the cool wood against her skin.

Severus, presented with her backside, slowly began rubbing oil all over her hips, making a circular pattern with his hand before pouring a small measure into his hand. Then he started tenderly applying the oil to her other entrance. Severus generously coated his finger in oil before inserting it, making sure there was plenty of lubrication in Hermione when he finally entered her.

"So you want me?" Severus asked, wanting Hermione to be sure she really wanted this, given her aversion to the act in the past.

"Yes, Severus. Take me. I want you to finally have all of me," Hermione sighed as she pressed her cheek against the bench top.

"Stroke yourself," Severus suggested as he pressed the head of his cock against her entrance, which was clinched tight and was unyielding. "Relax," he cooed.

"Then I should get rid of this," Hermione suggested as she stood back up and unhooked the front of her corset, now temporarily stained with oil.

Hermione's and Severus' wands, which had been stowed in her cleavage, stuck against her sweaty skin. Severus set his aside, but Hermione held out her wand and said, "Accio Junior Assistant."

A small dildo flew out of Hermione's trunk, sailed through the house, and landed in Hermione's outstretched hand. Smiling, she said, "This will help me relax."

Using a familiar charm, Hermione set the dildo to vibrate while simultaneously rubbing up against her clit in a familiar mode she often used when masturbating.

Bent over once more, her arse presented to Severus and the beginning of tingling threads in her abdomen beginning to bloom, Hermione announced, "I'm ready for you."

Severus could tell Hermione was much more relaxed as the magical dildo vibrated and stroked her clit. As he held himself with one hand, he concentrated on entering Hermione slowly. She had taken one or two of his fingers, but nothing of this girth before. As he pushed his head into her, he heard her breath momentarily hitch. He could tell from her grunts it was a little uncomfortable, but also she was feeling pleasure. Her vocalizations encouraged him to go a little more, a little more, a little more...

Finally, Severus’ head was inside of her, past the tight sphincter, and she gasped from the sensation of the intrusion of him in a place he had never been before.

Hermione could feel him inside of her. It was quite different. She breathed to get through the stretching of his head as he entered her, but now that he was inside of her, with her tight ring snug around his shaft, she wanted him to start moving in and out of her.

She pushed back against him, having his length go deeper into her, and sighed, "Yes, oh yes."

Severus started slowly, adding a little more oil to make sure she was properly lubricated.

It was all Severus could do not to come right there and then. Hermione was tight, unbelievable tight. In appreciation of the trust she gave to finally let him have her this way, he softly sighed, "I love you, Hermione."

Quite uncharacteristically, Hermione said as sweetly as the moment allowed, "Shut up and fuck me, Severus, before I get too sore to enjoy this much longer."

Severus began thrusting into Hermione with ever increasing speed, which was met with ever increasing screams of pleasure from Hermione.

The application of the magical dildo augmented the pleasure Hermione was feeling from this strange sensation of Severus in her arse. She was reluctant to believe Severus when he said it was yet another erogenous zone, but in the heat of the moment, she had to agree it was quite incredible. It was different, but in a good way, though she was quickly becoming a bit tender. Hearing Severus panting and groaning so sweetly, Hermione felt herself reach orgasm, helped by the stimulation of her clit.

Feeling Hermione clench and tighten around him as she came, Severus let himself go and pumped himself into her with abandon, unable to hold back any longer.
A strangled cry came from Severus, feeling as if he was cumming all the way up from his toes. He shuddered and nearly collapsed.

She felt Severus' cock pulse with each spurt as he emptied himself into her. She was quite tender now and felt every twitch and throb of his cock in her.

As Severus very slowly pulled himself from her, she made small mewing noises indicating she was quite sore. The jar of soothing salve was still on the bench top within arm's reach from the last time. He reached for it and very tenderly applied a little to her anus, kissing her oily back in gratitude.

"Thank you," he said. There was no need for him to say it, but he said it anyway. Hermione had told him about her fear of pain, given her one previous attempt at anal sex with Ron years ago, and for the fact she had trusted him enough to let him try, he was grateful.

"Thank you for making it pleasurable," Hermione said, though it was a bit uncomfortable towards the end. "I was afraid I wasn't going to enjoy it."

Both slick with oil along their stomachs, loins and legs, they padded on the balls of their feet through the house to the nearest bathroom, which was one of the other bathrooms downstairs next to a guest bedroom. Fortunately, Severus had it stocked with the basics, as Draco had stayed overnight as a guest once. While still a very nice bathroom, it wasn't quite as luxurious at the master bath.

They took a lengthy shower, as there were lots of places they had to soap to completely clean the oil off. And some of it got in Hermione's and Severus' hair, which required a washing as well. They canoodled about in the shower, kissing, and Hermione giving her honest feedback about anal sex.

"While I wouldn't want to do that all the time, once in a while would not be amiss," she admitted, knowing that with more frequent activity, Severus' size would not bother her as much.

As Severus was rinsing his hair, Hermione suddenly asked, "Severus?"

"Hmm?" Wiping the water from his eyes, he answered, "Yes?"

Hermione began soaping a spot on his thigh that still had some oil clinging to it. "Remember your suggestion about using Polyjuice Potion?"

"I hope you're not suggesting we do that tonight, because between the extra exertion and recovery from Polyjuice Potion, neither of us will be awake in time for Gary's Japanese lesson tomorrow morning," he reminded her.

"No, of course another night, but I was wondering about something. Now that I've had the pleasure of trying anal sex, when you are Polyjuiced as me, would you like to try that as well?" she asked as her soapy hand slid up the back of his thigh and caressed his buttocks.

Severus glanced at her over his shoulder, a smile curled at one corner, but not answering, since he had not contemplated it.

"Or," she breathed quite huskily, "I could transform into you first." Her soapy hand slipped between his cheeks and pressed against his anus this time. "And I could give you a proper prostate massage."

Given what it took for Hermione to be completely lost in lustful abandon for her to finally let him fuck her up the arse, it was a rather quick and sexually assertive leap to suggest she fuck him up the arse now as well with his own cock. Severus had now thoroughly stripped her of her sexual timidity for her to suggest such a thing as she began soaping his arse and pressing a finger against his own entrance.

"Why don't we take it slow the first time. We can see where the evening leads us, and we can see how comfortable we are in our new positions," Severus said, pleased at his own inadvertent pun before positioning himself for Hermione's attentions.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Thank you to my ever glorious betas, JuneW and Hope. I cannot thank them enough.

You can further read about the menehune (pronounced "meh-neh-HOO-nay") here: http://www.mythicalrealm.com/creatures/menehune.html

If you would like to see the inspiration behind Jerry's House, check out the video I made when I stayed at Skye Treehouse in Volcano, HI. It was so unique I had to incorporate into the story somehow, when I was still working on this story. You can view the video here: https://youtu.be/knXtL39NEVU

You can visit Skye Treehouse website's here: http://www.volcanotreehouse.net/
Chapter Summary

Hermione and Draco have a heart-to-heart about Severus. The Potion master and the apprentice discuss how they became bound to each other.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter One Hundred Five
"Catalysts and Indomitable Connections"

Disclaimer:
I'm going down to AO3; gonna read myself some fic. Friendly authors everywhere; hacking fanfics with no infringement. Going down to AO3; gonna write another disclaimer. Tons of lemons day or night; people spouting, "Harry Potter's Rowling's baby!" Heading on up to AO3; gonna smirch my virgin mind. I wish I could make lots of riches; I'm not making money, bitches. So come on down to AO3 and read some fanfics of mine.

A/N: Disclaimer a parody of the "South Park" opening theme song.

=========

Severus finished downing the last of the Wit-Sharpening Potion he'd brewed that morning. He was in sore need of it, after yet another lengthy night of making love with Hermione. He was exhausted, finding even a strong cup of coffee did little to awaken him, and just the nearby presence of Hermione sent his mind off into gauzy-viewed daydreams of how next to have her once more. Fortunately, the potion cleared his mind well enough so he could concentrate on his first Japanese language lesson.

Hermione seemed to suffer no such effects. If anything, her desires and needs fulfilled seemed to give her boundless energy and allow her to concentrate without distraction.

Jokingly, Severus was beginning to consider Hermione may have been part succubus, for it seemed the more sexually worn out he was, the more vim and vigor she seemed to display. He remembered seeing Draco and Ginny after their week-long secluded honeymoon and the way Ginny energetically frittered about while Draco looked like he was close to becoming an Inferi. Now, he surmised, it was merely an after-effect of lots of sex within a short period. Though, if he kept this up for the rest of the week, he would have to start brewing Invigoration Draughts as well.

Severus and Hermione bid farewell to their Sensei, addressing Gary with the formal Japanese title of teacher. Though Gary began their lessons at the very beginning level, both students felt that they had learned a great deal during their first lesson, even if some of it covered information they were already familiar with.

On the front porch, Hermione bid farewell to Severus before heading off to meet with Draco on business for The Lovely Lavender Company's new manufacturing plant.

"Draco mentioned he would take me out to lunch today as well, then off to the builder's office for an appointment. I'm not sure when I'll be back," Hermione said as she gave Severus a lingering hug.

"I'll probably be in my lab when you get back. I'll leave the front door unlocked." Severus had yet to get a spare key made for Hermione. He had a Floo, but he had it locked out of habit.

At the Malfoys', Draco gave a kiss on the lips to his wife – and three kisses on her ever-expanding abdomen – before heading off with Hermione.

Walking together in silence towards an empty parcel of land on the east side of town, out of the blue Hermione said, "I was quite surprised when Lavender told me that starting a facility here in Hawaii was your idea, and that my running it was your idea as well. I was under the impression you didn't care for me very much back then."

It was a bit late in the game for them to both have this conversation, but they had been so wrapped up in other things when the Malfoys returned to England last August, they hadn't had a chance to honestly talk with each other alone until now.

"I didn't used to care for you," Draco admitted. "We both held on to our comfortable and well-worn perceptions of the other, which continued to reinforce that animosity. I originally thought of you as a self-righteous know-it-all, and I perceived your initial interest in Severus was that he was some pet project to save or some infatuation to fill the vacuum of your own miserable marriage."

Hermione said nothing, her mouth set in a grim line at Draco's assessment of her and her relationship with Severus.

"But I knew you probably still viewed me as the arrogant, cruel, bigoted, daddy's-little-rich-boy who thought my name and money should grant me carte blanche to the world."

Hermione kept her eyes down on the occasional uneven pavement in front of her, despite wearing her good pair of hiking boots. She'd used these boots on previous weekend trips with Albert, to tromp about the wild landscape of the future site of the Hawaiian headquarters.

"Am I wrong in my assessment of your original opinion of me?" Draco prompted her, wondering if his statement was correct.

"No," Hermione sighed. She glanced up at him a bit guiltily, knowing she did think of him in those terms for quite some time.

"When Ginny and I were first given sanctuary here, we were so happy that first morning. And when Severus came out of his interview with Mounga, we all went out onto the beach and danced around in a circle out of sheer joy." Draco smiled to himself as he continued, his voice tinged with rosy nostalgia upon recalling the glory of precious moments. "Severus had not wanted anything so much as his freedom for the longest time. Even during the war, he wanted to be free. On that beach, as much as he'd finally attained what he wanted so much, I saw that he still was not truly happy. That was because you were left behind in England." He glanced sideways to gauge Hermione's reaction to that small detail.

Hermione remained silent, not sure what she was expected to say.

"Seeing Severus finally get on with his life here and yet still moping about and mourning for you, I had to do something. I owed it to Severus. If it wasn't for him, Ginny and I never would have fallen in love. I suppose I also felt indebted to you, for if it wasn't for your help, Ginny and I could not have been together in the end. And so, I hatched my plan to get you two back together. Besides, if you're Ginny's best friend and the love of Severus' life, you can't be all that intolerable," he finished with a light ribbing.

"When we showed up with you on Severus' doorstep as a Christmas surprise three days ago, I finally saw the expression of joy and pure happiness I had expected to see on Severus' face that first morning here after we were granted sanctuary." Draco glanced again to see Hermione lost on her own thoughts recalling that surprise that was just as joyous to her as to Severus.
Hermione almost tripped, suddenly coming to a halt upon realizing that Draco had stopped talking and walking simultaneously.

"We're here," Draco announced.

They stood at the edge of a large overgrown section of jungle. It looked like it would have the capacity of thousands of square feet for offices, brewing floor, storage warehouse, and everything else needed to run a fully operational beauty potions company.

Draco swiped his wand from side to side, clearing a path through the lush brush which grew taller and denser as they began walking to survey the property Lavender had bought last August.

Draco and Hermione had a rather warm and humid day of tromping about the brush and discussing the best layout for the facility, given the slope of the land and access to paved streets compared to present designs drawn up by Lavender's architects. They then looked over the grounds of the new school in another part of the town's outskirts; it was also still an untamed jungle, as ground had not been broken there either. Draco and Hermione then headed off to Ohana Family Diner.

"This is the first place we ate after we were granted sanctuary," Draco informed Hermione as she settled into her seat.

"This seems cozy," Hermione remarked, looking at the décor. There were shells, paintings of tropical flowers, photos of events on the island featuring parades and people dancing the hula on stage, and an old surfboard with a plaque underneath it mounted to the wall etched with "In Memory of Matt." Besides the plaque was a photo of a man posing with a two-seater surrey bike.

A waitress in a snug T-shirt and a pair of cream-colored shorts covered by a red apron appeared. "Hey Draco, who's your friend here?" she asked. She smiled quite broadly, her teeth looking very white and eyes exceptionally pale blue against her dark brown skin.

"This is Hermione, Severus' guest this week. She'll be running things once we get the plant built and producing." Draco took the two menus and handed one to Hermione.

"That's cool. Everyone is wondering when construction is going to start," the waitress remarked.
"Well, these things take time, but that's part of the reason Hermione is here this week. Hopefully we'll start construction soon enough," he assured her.

"Okay, well, take your time and let me know when you're ready to order. Oh, and do you want me to box up a slice of coconut-macadamia nut pie for Ginny for you to take home?" the waitress asked, familiar with Ginny's recent craving for the dessert.

"Yes, that would be wonderful. Mahalo."

"No problem, dude," the waitress assured Draco. Then she left to take care of some other customers at a table nearby, who cast the occasional glance over at Hermione, listening in on their conversation.

Looking over the menu, Hermione was a bit overwhelmed. Everything looked delicious, and yet she didn't have any clue as to what she was in the mood for.

"What's good here?" Hermione asked, trying to narrow down her choices.

"Most everything on the menu is decent. If you're famished, one of the loco meals will fill you up, especially since they give you two scoops of rice, in addition to a scoop of macaroni salad. Good if you're going to go flying all day long," Draco said as he continued to scan the menu. "The burgers are fairly good, but given I had never had one until coming here I can't really judge by comparison."

"I'm really in the mood for a tossed salad."

Draco started coughing, choking on his water. Hermione noticed the odd look on Draco's face as he regained composure of himself.

"For Merlin's sake, don't ever say that around Jerry or Mouna," Draco warned her.

"What?" Hermione asked innocently enough, unaware of what she said to make Draco react.

Draco discreetly waved his wand to put up a Silencing Charm to avoid being overheard by the next table, whose diners were still trying to discreetly listen in to their conversation.

Leaning forward, Draco said quietly, "Ginny has these cravings, you know." Hermione nodded for him to continue. "One day, when Jerry and Mounga were around, she said she was dying for a tossed salad, and those two completely lost it. Broke into hysterics. It took five minutes for them to control themselves without busting up into gales of laughter once more."

"I still don't get it," Hermione said, wondering what was the big deal is. She glanced over and noticed that the next table had given up trying to eavesdrop on their conversation with the charm in place.

"Well, it seems that with Jerry and Mounga's careers in law enforcement and their experience dealing with criminals, they picked up a few choice Muggle prison terms along the way. One of them is tossed salad."

Warily, Hermione asked, "And what does that mean, in prison slang?"

Draco tried to begin phrasing it in delicate terms since she was a witch, but then remembered that she was a Potions apprentice who had worked on a sex potion with Severus, so there was probably little left to shock her. By the look on Hermione's face, along with the fact she actually blushed, it seemed that perhaps there were a few things Severus had not yet exposed her to yet, Draco incorrectly assumed.

"Oh God," Hermione said, slightly mortified. Burying her face in her hands, unable to look at Draco, Hermione confessed, "At Christmas dinner, Rainbow asked about how I was liking food in Hawaii so far. I almost told her that Severus served me a delicious tossed salad the other day for lunch." Hermione blushed in memory of the fact that Severus had indeed served her a tossed salad at the hot springs that night for the very first time.

Draco shook his head. "Rainbow would have probably hexed those two if they lost it at the dinner table. I certainly did for embarrassing my wife like that, though Ginny did admit later if she was in Mounga or Jerry's position, she would have laughed as well."

"Was it my imagination or did Rainbow's eye change color during dinner?" Hermione asked, suddenly remembering how her eyes seemed green one moment and brown the next.

"No, her eyes change color according to her moods. If her eyes have gone black, stay out of her "path," he warned her. "Severus and Mounga seem to be the only people on this entire island not afraid of Rainbow when her eyes have turned black."

"She does seem to ask a lot of questions, as Severus warned."

"She's the town gossip, which is odd, considering how Mounga is more of the silent type and knows a lot of secrets from sanctuary-seekers." Draco set his menu down, having decided on his lunch choice.

"How is it that she hasn't blabbed everyone's secrets then, if those two are married?"

"Mounga can't say anything Severus said during his interview for sanctuary." Draco cast his eyes down. "Gary, your Japanese teacher, is the one who processed me, and he knows things that not even Ginny or Severus know about me. But the witch or wizard who interviews you is bound to say nothing. Only way anyone knows anything about your past is if you say something yourself, then it becomes public knowledge in a way."

Hermione had wondered how Severus and Mounga had become good friends, and she supposed telling a person every little secret about yourself might create a certain bond between two people. Hermione confessed many of her own secrets and fears to Severus at the beginning of their relationship, and she felt a certain connection with the sharing of herself with him.

As the waitress passed by their table, Hermione saw her attempt to make eye contact with them to see if they were ready to order. Picking up her menu, she figured she would order the first thing her eyes landed on and just eat that.

Draco ended the Silencing Charm, and the waitress came back to take their order.

Clearing his throat, Draco said, "I'll have the fish tacos, grilled, easy on the avocado sauce, and with the mango salsa on the side."

Hermione couldn't look the waitress or Draco in the eye when she said, "I'll have the Thai chicken mixed salad." She couldn't believe her luck her eyes would land on that section of the menu in light of the recent conversation.

The rest of the conversation during lunch was kept light and free of any proprietary information to
The Lovely Lavender Company, should anyone attempt to eavesdrop again. Since they came in at the end of the lunch rush, as they ate the little diner began to empty out.

When Amy – their waitress, who was a mix of Fijian Indian, South African, and Estonian descent – cleared their plates away and topped their drinks off one last time, they were the only ones left in the restaurant.

Now that they were basically alone, with Amy and the cook back in the kitchen, Draco’s face became quite somber to match the tone of his voice. "Did Severus discuss with you how he took the news of you being attacked last summer?"

Hermione had thought to talk with Severus about that, but they had been too busy – focusing on their happiness at being together – to dwell upon unpleasant things. "In his memory you brought me in August, he mentioned he went temporarily mad and flew off into a cyclone. He otherwise dropped the subject rather quickly, and I haven't wanted to press him on it. He only just helped me with some psychotherapy regarding me and being confined in a corset–," Hermione began, but stopped mid-sentence. "Did Ginny tell you what happened with the corset at Madam Malkins?"

Draco nodded and reached out to pat her hand as a gesture of comfort. Considering it was Draco, it seemed quite strange to Hermione, but she supposed that if they were going to work together and have their lives intertwined through Ginny and Severus, then it was only natural that they should eventually become friends.

"During my time as a Death Eater–" Draco stopped and had to take a sip of his drink, finding that just uttering those words made his throat close up. "It was not uncommon for Death Eaters to amuse each other and the Dark Lord by finding one with his guard down and binding or hexing him. It was a way of trying to display alpha dominance over another and rise in rank within the social order, besides seeking praise from that monster. I had a few instances where that happened to me. My father, in an attempt to make Severus look weak in front of the Dark Lord and others, bound and hexed him when his back was turned."

Hermione never asked Severus about his hex scars, but that certainly explained a lot. "Knowing how Severus doesn't want to talk about anything until he is ready, I haven't asked him about that, though he did tell me he got his white streak from being struck by lightning."

Draco looked like that first-year Slytherin she remembered as he frowned and looked to be fighting with his better judgment, until he seemed to come to some internal resolution. "Please just answer me plainly. Do you and Severus plan on one day getting married? I don't care about time lines: Will you two eventually marry?"
Hermione, who had been leaning forward, sat up abruptly, stunned by Draco's blunt question. She hesitated before answering, "Yes. Severus proposed, but I got hysterical, telling him I didn't have time for the nonsense and insanity of an engagement. I have an apprenticeship to finish and then getting the business going here, but I told him some day, yes."

Draco let go of a huge breath he had been holding before raking his fingers through his hair nervously. He leaned forward once more to speak, this time even more serious. "What I'm about to tell you, you can't let Severus know you know. Only Mounga and I know. But since you are so central, so integral, I think it would be remiss for you not to know." Draco once more cast a Silencing Charm to avoid any accidental eavesdropping.

"When Severus heard about how you'd received the wrong flowers, he was certain you hated him. I could see it crushed him, especially when Lavender said you thought he'd dumped you. And then the news of Parker attacking you and Severus presumably thinking how you had been targeted because of your association with him alone – before he heard the whole story – he just lost it." Draco licked his lips nervously, casting his eyes down. He was unable to look Hermione in the eye knowing the pain she would be feeling upon hearing the next bit of news. "In his madness and grief, he was convinced that he'd brought death to any witch who he was close to. His first crush, Lily Potter, his wife, Gabrielle, and then you nearly getting killed. He jumped on a broom and was going to offer himself up as a sacrifice to some unknown gods or the Fates – some entity – to save you, to keep you safe from future harm. He made a bargain in his skewed mind to give himself up to protect you."

"What?" Hermione asked, her voice cracking and tears brimming in her eyes. "What was he going to do? Throw himself into the volcano?"

"No, he flew out to sea in the cyclone and nearly drowned, but as he was about to be dragged down to the bottom of the sea, he came to his senses. He wanted to live. Some part of his mind that still held on to common sense said to him that you had not fought to clear his name only for him to just kill himself. And as he was flying back home, a lightning bolt struck and shattered his broom. If it wasn't for the fact that Mounga has a tracer spell on every sanctuary-seeker on this island, we wouldn't have found him in time, as he fell unconscious into Chum Reef."

Hermione sat there quietly crying, digesting everything that Draco had said to her. Kaimi's drawing on the card that sat on the bedside table suddenly made more sense to her now.

Amy popped out from the back of the diner, but when she saw Hermione and Draco talking and the tears on her face, the waitress disappeared back into the kitchen to leave them alone to talk once more.

Finally finding her voice, Hermione asked, "Why are you telling me this if Severus won't?"
"Because Severus is so madly and thoroughly in love with you, should you break his heart or should any harm come to you that he thinks was caused by him in any way, who knows what he might do. As abrasive and bristly as his exterior is, his heart is as fragile as glass. No Reparo Spell could fix it, should it shatter. You didn't see his flat the morning after your anniversary dinner, I did. His place was destroyed, empty bottles of liquor everywhere. I swear, he nearly poisoned himself from alcohol alone. Utterly despondent. I had never seen him so broken, except after he was fished from the sea and patched up by Rainbow quietly at their house. If anything, they wanted to protect Severus' reputation and prevent word of his lapse in judgment."

As much as Rainbow was annoying to Hermione at times, she suddenly felt a certain gratitude towards the Healer for helping Severus and keeping quiet about the incident. There were far too many tales of a Potions master who had gone mad on his own elixirs, and Severus flying off into a cyclone to kill himself would no doubt peg him as a Potions master who had lost his wits. A Potions master's reputation was everything to him.

Draco reached out his hand to grasp Hermione's and focus her attention on his next words. "As Severus' friend, please, know that he is far more fragile than he is willing to admit. You mean everything to him. Be gentle with his heart, and for Merlin's sake, do your best to stay safe and away from harm."

If would have been rude for Hermione to point out that of course she wanted to avoid injury to herself, but she knew Draco meant it as a warning that should any harm come to her, Severus would feel the injury in his own way as well.

She nodded, understanding the gravity with which she must deal with Severus. His heart was in her hands, and she would do her best to treat it gently.

"I must look a mess. I should go wash up before we go to the builder's office," Hermione said, trying to change the tone and put the topic of conversation behind them.

"Here," Draco said as he pulled out a familiar jar of Puffy Poof Eye Crème from his pocket. "Ginny's hormones have her crying at the slightest provocation, so I always have some on me just in case."

Hermione thanked him before cleaning herself up in the bathroom. As she came back out, she found Draco had Ginny's slice of pie boxed up, and he had paid the bill.
Standing by the door, he said, "Come on. Let's see how the local building codes have totally destroyed Lavender's carefully-designed plans the architect back in London drew up, and then let's see if we can salvage the plans, in addition to giving our own input to keep it functional."

~~~~~~~*~

Trudging up the hill, her arms full of scrolls showing the changes to the design to the construction plans she was to go over tonight, Hermione finally reached the front gate. As the gate creaked on its hinges, she spotted the light in the living room pop on shortly afterwards. No doubt Severus was aware of her return, as she was walking up the front path when the door opened and Severus stood there to greet her.

"You had a full day," he noted, smiling down at her as she ascended the front porch steps.

Three days rest made Hermione feel as if her energy to handle a full day of work had waned to nothing. "I don't know how your day had been, but I could use a drink," she said with some exasperation as she finished walking up the stairs.

Just seeing Severus standing there and now knowing what Draco had told her that day, she wanted to drop her scrolls, run into his arms, kiss him, and beg him to never do anything so foolish as what he did when he nearly killed himself. But Draco had made her promise to not let Severus become aware of her knowledge about those events.

"Then I guess you'll be thrilled that I cooked for us, and you won't have to do anything but the dishes tonight." Severus offered to take some of those scrolls from her arms as they walked into their home.

"What happened to the elf-owned cleaning service?" Hermione asked, not minding having to do the dishes as it would only be a few swishes and flicks of her wand.

"I gave them the week off when I originally planned to be in London instead," he reminded her, and they dumped the scrolls on the kitchen table.

Her arms now free, she went over and hugged Severus.

"What's wrong?" He knew her well enough to sense the change in her demeanor.

"Long day," she partially lied. She had missed him, even though they had spent nearly every minute together since she showed up.

"Was Draco's company that awful? You know, you two will be working together. He's not that bad, once you get used to his sense of humor," Severus assured her, then added in a deadpan voice, "At least it's not as vulgar as Jerry's, so be thankful."

She laughed lightly in response to his last comment, agreeing with him. She lifted her head that was pressed tightly against his chest. Stroking his cheek, she studied his face – the way his eyes looked a bit softer, his brow more relaxed – and she knew he was happy. And knowing deep down that she was the cause for his happiness now, she was humbled by it.

"Draco was fine." She heaved a sigh as she tried to think of some way to explain that knowing what she did now had changed her perception of Severus.

Hermione had thought that she was the one more emotionally invested in this relationship than Severus, given his reluctance to be more emotionally open with her back in England. And even with his confessions and assurances about how important she was to him in his Pensieve memory for her, and knowing he had built a house with the intent of sharing it with her, she did not realize the magnitude of how vital she was to his happiness. Now – after hearing the similar words from Draco and knowing how much Severus needed her – this new knowledge made her in awe of his love for her. Draco's talk with her made her understand that Severus did love her as deeply as she loved him.

To explain her slightly maudlin mood, she came up with a believable lie, based in truth. "I'm going to miss coming home to you after a long day at work when I'm back in London."

"But we'll have the mirrors," he reminded her. "And while you can't hug a mirror, you did say it was better than nothing, which I agree."

Severus opened a bottle of some California wine that he said wasn't a complete waste of his Galleons and was tolerable. Hermione wondered if the fact he didn't want to seem too easy to embrace American culture made him talk about the wine so dismissively, despite it being a lovely, light, and crisp Riesling that she could find no fault with. It was as good as any German or French Riesling she could recall.

This was the wizard who had yet to try a burger, having told Draco that if he was going to have perfectly good beef, it wasn't going to be ground up pointlessly to ruin the texture, drowned in condiments, topped with some plastic-like cheese, and served on a flavorless bun. Yet he would periodically eat chili con carne served with shredded cheese. It was most probably because of the slovenly Portkey officer in San Francisco that Severus had a lingering aversion to burgers, a story
Draco had told Hermione at lunch.

For dinner, Severus had stuffed and roasted a chicken. Since vegetables were not so dependent upon the seasons in Hawaii, he served it with some lightly sautéed greens and courgettes, mixed with freshly peeled and diced tomatoes, carrots, and fresh basil.

They talked about potions Severus worked on during the day, and Hermione told him about the progress she and Draco made with the builder. She even asked Severus to look over the changes to the plan with her for his feedback, given his lengthy work experience with Lavender and large-scale potions manufacturing. Fortunately, there were hardly any changes regarding the school’s blueprints.

The cat fed, leftovers put away, and dishes done, Hermione and Severus got to work looking over the plans. Severus made a few suggestions, including moving the storage warehouse for ingredients on the opposite side of the brewing floor from the finished-product storage warehouse.
While space in the London facility required the two storage places to be right next to one another, there was no such constriction of the layout space with the lot in Hawaii. It also ensured that finished products would not be accidentally placed in the same room with pre-brewed ingredients, some of which were volatile.

"When do you have to give your feedback to the builder on these plans?" Severus asked.

"Wednesday morning. Draco also has a set of plans and asked for a few days to look them over himself. The next phase is final plans by the builder given to me by Thursday afternoon to take back to Lavender for last and final approval. Then an albatross will be back with her approval, but I suppose we could cut that time down with the mirrors as well."

Hermione sat there, looking at the blueprints and realizing that not only would she be moving in with Severus, but that she would be running a fully functional manufacturing business as well. And she would be the boss of it all. Not only had Severus attained what he wanted most of all, coming to Hawaii, but she realized that she would be finding that fulfillment she was lacking all those years, stuck with Ron in a mediocre marriage in which they were both unhappy, and working at a dead-end job that afforded her no sense of accomplishment or mental stimulation.

"Then if the rest of your calendar is open, I thought tomorrow I could take you down to the shop, then afterwards, I could take you to a favorite spot for collecting urchins and anemones. I can teach you how to field-process those, if you haven’t had the chance to learn yet. Get a bit of beach time in, and a nice picnic lunch. Then later go to my farm on the west side of the island, do a little gardening, then have an unobstructed view of the sunset," Severus suggested. Well, since he had the whole day planned, it was more like an itinerary than a suggestion, but Hermione was thrilled he had planned the day.

"That sounds wonderful." Hermione craned her neck up and kissed the underside of Severus' neck, since he was still bent over, standing behind her while studying the blueprints.

Hermione's mind went back to what Draco had said earlier in the day, as she thought about how much Severus loved her. Was it their love for each other alone that tied them together, or was there something in that Irresistible potion that they took that somehow bounded them together?

"Severus?"

"Hmm." He was still looking over the plans, wondering if there was some way he could make the layout yet even more efficient.

"Do you still remember those two dreams we shared?"

Hermione felt the pressure of Severus pressing his lips against the top of her head in his initial response to her question.

"All too clearly," he said with some resignation. "More clearly than any dream, which makes me think they were not dreams." Severus sighed heavily before grabbing a chair to sit close next to Hermione.

"I was wondering about the Irresistible Potion we worked on. Was it something we did that created this... connection between us that calls the other when one is in some sort of danger or peril?" she asked, sounding a bit frightened that they had done something inadvertently with their experimentation. "I've been monitoring St. Mungo's for reports in which both spouses fall into a trance or coma when one is injured or gravely sick, and there have been no such cases. Fairy Brandy has been around for a long time, and no such recorded occurrences have come from that," Hermione said, as she ticked off mentally all the avenues of research into this strange phenomenon. "And the Caprese mother of pearl, that has had no such recorded effect either that would explain it." She heaved her own heavy sigh before asking, "Could the pomegranate juice have acted as some sort of catalyst, much in the same way those potions you read about that amplify emotions? Could pomegranate juice be used in an attraction potion – and did it strengthen our attraction to one another beyond the time limits of the primary potion's effects?"

With Hermione's conjecture, Severus finally spoke. He had thought of something in which to support Hermione's assertion. "It may have been the pomegranate juice."

"What? But how could a simple ingredient, which has been drunk and used in potions for thousands of years have caused us to share dreams? It is used in the Blood-Replenishing Potion and Strengthening Solution, but how is it that it was the cause of these shared experiences?"

Severus rose from his seat and walked over to the bookcase. On the shelf, still wrapped in the plain brown paper, was the ancient Greek tome he ordered through Paige Spien's. It had taken over two months for them to find another copy of that particularly rare book he once found in the Restricted Section. He paid several Galleons extra for the prolonged search due to the many owls and albatrosses that were sent to various booksellers worldwide, but it was eventually found. Severus still had it wrapped in the paper, since it only arrived a few days before he'd planned to leave for London and discuss this topic with her and Albert there, but since she was here, this was as good a time as any.

As he unwrapped the book, he said, "Once at Hogwarts, I had come across one strange variation of the Greek myth of Persephone, written in ancient Greek. I found it in the same rare Greek Potions tome in the Restricted Section I had read about Himeros – the Greek God of sexual desire and impetuous love – and the naiad, Langia. In this account of Persephone's trip to the underworld, she had not been kidnapped, but had willingly gone to join her secret lover, Hades." Severus stopped to let the implications of the story sink into Hermione's mind, as it was sometimes difficult to grasp a new perspective to a story that was so firmly ingrained into memory. His fingers finally found the passage and opened it to the spot for Hermione to read alongside him. "When pressured by Zeus to return Persephone, Hades and Persephone shared a pomegranate so she would be bound to return to him for part of the year, the fruit used as a means to strengthen a bond between two lovers reluctantly torn apart. The pomegranate gave Persephone strength to pass between the worlds of the living and dead each year."

Both Hermione and Severus were thinking the same thing: Could it be that they, being secret lovers torn apart to different ends of the world, had created their own magic, and were now bound to each other with the use of pomegranate in their research?

"Years ago, when I read this, I had discounted the veracity of the story for its worth, since it was the only telling of Persephone's kidnapping as a willing abductee I had ever come across. It was remiss of me to so easily discount such an account, just because it ran counter to all the other variations of the myth."

Severus felt guilty for dismissing the information and unknowingly binding Hermione and himself together with foolish experimentation, something he had prided himself to be far too skilled and knowledgeable to fall prey to.
To further explain his folly, he added, "In all my years of research, I had never read of any use of pomegranate to strengthen an emotional, mental, or physical bond between two people. And never had I ever read in all my years of research the use of pomegranate for anything other than a restorative in the healing arts. But what else could explain my sudden and unexplained time asleep that coincided with your attack and recovery? And my own hallucination during the ice pox?"

Hermione finished reading the story in ancient Greek before slowly pushing the book away.

"I am sorry for unknowingly binding you to me. As a Potions master, I should have been more careful, and I must apologize." Severus turned his face away, unable to look at Hermione, having admitting his failings that he was reluctant to confess.

They sat there in silence for a long while. Hermione dissected every part of the Irresistible Potion, analyzing the ingredients in her mind, their usage, and every other component. There was only one thing Hermione could find that somehow turned the pomegranate juice from a mundane ingredient into something more magical than either could originally conceive.

"I think you are forgetting something in this potion that has bound us together, Severus." She reached out her hand to grasp his hand. "You forget that love is what bound us together, knowing that someday we must part and do so with great reluctance."

Hermione's hand stretched up and turned his face towards hers. "This only worked because we loved each other before we began experimenting with the ingredients for the Irresistible Potion, knowing we would be parted and didn't want to be. It was love that was the catalyst, not the pomegranate juice. Without love, it would have had no other long-term effects on us. It tore my heart out to be parted from you. And I don't regret at all that I am bound to you, Severus Snape, for I love you as much as you love me."

Severus had wondered as well if the catalyst was love, for he knew that she loved him. Hermione's simple confession eased his guilt, for the fact she confessed she did not regret it. It was love that bound them together, and the pomegranate only helped strengthen their existing bond. Even without the pomegranate juice, they would still be bound.

Leaning forward, her hand still stroking his cheek and beard, he kissed her, tasting the salt of a few tears that had trailed down her cheeks to the corners of her mouth.

In the bedroom, as Hermione sat on the bed watching Severus remove his shirt, she reached for the box and pulled out a vial of lubrication potion for herself and a vial of Sequoia potion for Severus.
Smiling at her, he shook his head. "I don't want to use that tonight. I won't need it," he assured her.

Hermione was about to ask why, but didn't question. As Severus kissed her slowly, his hand teasing her clothes off her body in a deliberate fashion, Hermione began to understand why Severus decided to forego taking the stamina potion. Had he downed it, he surely would have ripped her clothes off by this point and be close to burying himself into her in haste. Severus' intentions tonight were different from their urgent need to join since her arrival. This was a seduction.

Hermione attempted to help him remove her clothing, but he stopped her hand and shushed her. "We're in no hurry."

Most of their love-making sessions had been frantic and hungry, making up for lost time or trying to cram as much passion as possible into their brief week together. It was with the analysis of how and why they were bound together on a plane beyond this current one that made Severus realize Hermione would always be his. They had the rest of their lives together to make love and be together. He wanted to savor these moments instead of rushing through them towards some moment of completion – a point he would still arrive at if he took his time.

They kissed, rolling about the bed. Severus' hand swept up Hermione's legs, teasing the skin along the edge of her shorts, her top already discarded, but her bra still on.

Delicately tonguing the pulse point on her neck, he murmured, "You're positively filthy. I can taste the sweat and jungle on your skin." He sighed and ground his erection, still hidden in his underpants and shorts, against her hip.

"What do you recommend, Mr. Snape?" Hermione asked in a none-too-innocent tone.

He raised a quizzical brow at the use of his formal name before letting a bemused smirk spread across his face. "I suppose a survey to see how filthy you really are before a course of action can be recommended to address the issue would be in order." His first survey was between her breasts to tongue the sweat from her cleavage.

As his fingers deftly unhooked her bra, Hermione sighed. Severus was certainly doing a very good job of arousing her. When he peeled away the fabric from her breasts, the change in air temperature made her nipples tighten and pucker. Of course, Severus had to survey her nipples as well.
Severus didn't know why, but he found the tang of salt and dried sweat on her alluring tonight. Perhaps it was the fact her own natural scent was stronger than usual, and he could smell her more than usual. She had made sure to her contraceptive potion earlier in the week and she couldn't be ovulating, but even without her being fertile, he wanted to drown himself in the intoxicating scent of her.

As Severus kissed his way down Hermione's stomach, she played with his hair. His long, silken strands slid through her fingers. She shuddered as his hair caressed and grazed her body, counterpoint to the hot trail of kisses he left with his lips as his mouth traveled lower.

"Your hair," Hermione sighed wistfully.

Severus lifted his face from her stomach. "Yes? What about my hair?"

"Caress me with it," she asked, as her hand played with a hank that had fallen over one of Severus' eyes.

Severus understood, for Hermione had used her long hair to tease and caress his face and chest. Now his hair was finally long enough to return the favor. Rising, he flung his head forward to allow his hair to cascade over the top of his crown and around his shoulders.

Hermione raised her arms up in surrender above her head as Severus, above her on his hands and knees, began dragging the tips of his hair across her face and down her neck. As the tips of his hair caressed her breasts and rib cage, she visibly shuddered, groaning from the teasing pleasure.

He could smell her musk now. His nose, drawn down to her stomach, grazed along her abdomen as he continued to drag his hair across her skin. The sound of the zipper on Hermione's shorts almost seemed to fill the room with its metallic notes, signaling what was to come.

She allowed him to peel her shorts off, but wondered why he left her knickers on. His cheek resting on her mons, he inhaled deeply, as if analyzing the ingredients in a custom pot of herbal tea.

Kissing her mons through her knickers, looking up at her, his eyes heavily lidded, he said, "You're not the only one who used a Pensieve to relive happier times."

Hermione smiled down at him, glad to hear Severus admit to her as much.
"And while the senses of sight and sound are sated, the Pensive memory lacks touch and taste. And unless it is very strong, it lacks scent as well." To drive his point home, he hooked her thighs over his shoulder, buried his face into the apex of her thighs, and inhaled deeply once more.

The tip of his tongue teased along the edge of her knickers, heightening the anticipation, making her more wet, the lubrication potion in full effect. She squirmed against his face, wanting him to do more, yet enjoying the anguishing slow pace Severus had set.

Finally, much to Hermione's mewling whimpers, Severus pulled her knickers off to begin teasingly toying with her clitoris. His tongue flicked and lapped, swirled and delved, relishing in her robust taste and scent. His lips tugged and played with her labia, exploring every fold and licking her thoroughly in the process.

As Hermione was close to orgasm from Severus' deft tongue work, she was about to protest when he suddenly stopped, but she wasn't surprised when Severus readjusted himself on the bed to lay next to her. One of his knees pushed to spread her thighs apart while his mouth came bearing down upon hers.

Severus thrust his tongue into Hermione's mouth, and she gladly accepted his invasion. She could taste herself on his lips, mixed with the heady taste of his own saliva. She welcomed his tongue and devoured it, as if sharing some ripe fruit or sip of wine, passed from one lover's mouth to another.

His one hand slid back down and replaced where his mouth was working only moments before. First one finger then another slipped into her. His thumb made long strokes up, down, and around her clitoris. He kept his touch light, gradually adding pressure as her groans rose in pitch.

She could feel him palpitate lightly against her G-spot with each stroke. She wouldn't last much longer; his fingers were well practiced.

When Severus felt her back begin to arch and the back of her throat close-up, he knew she was at the crest. Rising-up on one elbow, he wanted to watch, and he brought her to completion. This face of exquisite rapture, this twisted visage expressing unadulterated exultation – he drunk in the sight of it all knowing he was the one who had brought her to this point. He watched as her own hands reached for her breasts, pulling at her nipples to increase the pleasure as the walls of her vagina clamped down on his fingers.
The back of her throat opened and Hermione's own Song of Solomon issued forth. Her wails and guttural grunts and formless scream spoke of her love for him as if in some other language. Her eyes, fighting to stay open to watch Severus watch her, professed her heart and all that it contained. Severus had never used Legilimency on Hermione, but had she the ability to speak coherently, she would have invited him into her mind to experience all the love she had for him. She wanted to open herself to him completely.

As her body relaxed, her orgasm waning, Severus swept a stray tendril from her face, a tender moment between lovers, where everything was said, but not a word spoken.

Hermione's chest heaved as she tried to catch her breath, her eyes still watching Severus watch her.

Inspired by the moment, Hermione rolled over and on top of Severus, who was still in his shorts. Now her wild and wavy hair fell about and framed his face, intermingling with his straight black locks. With her hand placed between their bodies, she stroked his hard length through the cotton twill.

"Pensieves also only relive the moment," Hermione remarked breathily. "It is only when we are in the moment itself that we can feel it all: your heart beating so strongly in your chest against mine, the caress of your breath on my skin, the overwhelming feeling of love right here, right now."

She leaned down and kissed Severus, her hand never stopping its slow rhythmic stroking of Severus' length.

As her mouth trailed around his face to lay soft kisses upon his temple, cheek, and ear, she confessed, "I revisited that memory of that first time I nearly completely surrendered to you. Remember that time you had me blindfolded and pinned against the cupboard? You begged me so sweetly, I had never heard anything so beautiful as your voice, filled with desire for me. And on the couch, telling me how much you needed me. I almost let you take me completely that night, consequences be damned. You were my Siren that night, and I would have nearly dashed myself upon the rocks for you. I want to hear that beautiful music again."

Somehow during Hermione's erotic retelling of that night, she had made Severus' shorts and underpants disappear. He didn't know how, and he didn't care. All he could concentrate on was Hermione's own seduction of him.

"Beg," Hermione said as she straddled him. "Revisiting memories is nothing compared to the wonder of the moment itself. I need to hear you."
Severus' eyebrows twitched in confusion, his mind clouded by hormones and lust.

"Beg me, please."

Severus yet had to satisfy himself, so of course his own body was begging for its own release. He did not have to act for Hermione, it came naturally and without any hesitation. "Do you have any idea how much I want you? How much I need you?"

Hermione gave him a wicked grin, feeling more in control of the situation than Severus. "Oh, I can feel how much you need me right here." For added effect, her rolling her hips, grinding herself against Severus' length, rubbing her wetness along the underside of his cock. He closed his eyes and hissed lightly.

"Please, Hermione. I need to be with you right now, to have you, possess you, crush you in my arms. Let me fill you, make you scream my name, make my body feel what my heart already feels that you are mine." It was hard for him to continue, as his normally sharp mind was so fogged with sex and desire, it was difficult for him to be even this eloquent.

Thrilled by Severus' sweet words and the way his voice pleaded, Hermione grabbed his cock in her hand and guided him into her entrance, swirling it around and around, teasing not only her own body, but Severus' too.

She loved watching Severus' eyes slip shut, as he tilted his head back against the bed and the veins popped out of his neck as he attempted to control himself. Hermione knew it was all he could do not to flip her onto her back and slam himself into her, but she knew he wouldn't. He had refused taking the Sequoia potion and wanted to prolong this. She would torture him deliciously until he begged for his own release at just the right moment.

"So lovely," she cooed, as she watched Severus squirm beneath her. "My dark angel. My demon lover. So much passion, so much love, and to be consumed by you is the greatest pleasure of all." Hermione's own eyes shut, as she felt the tension in her abdomen throb from need, tightening with each teasing swipe of Severus' cock as it nearly slipped in with each pass.

Severus was deliriously drunk on the moment. Hermione turning the tables on him with her own heady seduction made him lose control.
Draco had told him once that it takes a strong wizard to completely surrender to love and to be truly exposed and naked with the one he loved. Severus finally understood.

"Please, take me, Hermione. Please. Please... please..."

She adjusted her grip and swiftly sheathed himself in her with a quick thrust of her hips.

Both cried out in release, Severus sitting up and pulling Hermione into his arms, his face buried in her breasts as she rode him.

"I need you more than you can know," he confessed, his words mumbled against her breasts and shoulder as he continued to meet the rolling of her hips with his thrusts from underneath. He was willing to let it all come out, realizing he was not being weak, over-emotional or too sentimental – just completely honest. "I felt my own heart ripped out the day I left you. But you stayed behind to make me free. I've only ever been truly happy since you've been here. I don't want to let you go, I want to keep you here with me, and it kills me to know this time I must stay and you must go. But if I don't let you go, you'll never have your own freedom. And it scares me that I'll feel this aching hole in my heart when you Portkey away. I love you, and I don't want you to go."

It almost broke Hermione's heart to hear him lay his heart out so plainly. It also made her love him even more so, if that was even possible. She didn't think so before, but she was proven wrong.

"I need you too, Severus. Just as much," she sobbed, starting to cry, overcome with bittersweet joy. She continued to ride him, her tears absorbed by Severus' hair, and she clutched his head to her chest. "I don't want to go either."

This is what Hermione feared and made her reluctant to come visit Severus all those months. That once she was there, it would be too hard for her to leave him again.

"I'm completely yours, Severus. I always have been."

Severus felt his balls tighten and squeeze. He clutched Hermione even tighter around her torso and pushed her down harder onto his shaft as he tried to bury himself as deeply as possible as he came in her.

Hermione, feeling his cock throb as he emptied his seed into her, tightened her muscles, grasping him tighter and making Severus gasp. She tightened her muscles in small pulses and then squeezed tight once more which made him groan once more and finally go slack. Severus dropped his death-grip on Hermione and fell back onto the bed, his whole body covered in a light sheen of sweat.

Still astride his hips, she played with the sweat on his body with the tips of her fingers, watching Severus' chest shake with each thunderous beat of his heart. She could nearly hear it. His chest was heaving as he tried to regain his breath. Puckering her lips, she blew lightly across his chest, the light and brief breeze making a smile light up Severus' face from the loving gesture. He placed his arms up in surrender to feel her cooling breath graze against the insides of his arms as well.

Severus watched her. He had poured his heart to her, exposing himself more than ever, yet he did not feel vulnerable for once. He noticed the way her lips puckered as she blew once more. She could have cast a breeze charm with her wand, but she didn't. She was tending to him in her little ways that made him feel loved. He watched the way the light from the candles flickered and cast shadows across her breasts and face. Her face glowed and smiled down upon him, as if she was one of the Graces or some blessed deity casting her love upon him. But this unearthly love was for him and him alone.

Hermione did not miss the way Severus was studying her. She could also tell that Severus was more at peace with the world than ever. In the flickering light of the candle, she could almost imagine the boy he once was. But she knew even as a boy, Severus was never that happy. He had confessed he had never been happier in his life than now, with her. His heart no longer hammering against his chest and the sweat on his body mostly dried, Hermione finally crawled off Severus to cuddle up alongside next to him.

She was still in awe that they loved each other so much that they had bonded with each other and pulled each other into a shared dream twice. One thing which bothered Hermione was that Severus had described his second turn into the dream world as more of a hallucination than a dream.

Her mind latched onto the conundrum of where they went; the thoughts had made her brow furrow.

"What's wrong?" he asked, pushing her hair away from her face, sensing her mind had changed gears.

"If we didn't share a dream, where did we share our consciousnesses then?" Suddenly the romantic mood had fled in the light of another mental puzzle yet to solve for her.

Still coming down off the heady highs of his orgasm, Severus was not about to become all business. It was quite emotional stuff sharing one's heart so completely. Kissing her shoulder, he began to postulate, "Well, we were both unconscious at the time."

"How seriously was your health threatened when you were during the ice bath treatment?" Hermione asked, having not heard all the details yet.

"Rainbow was quite concerned, since I was fairly sick with the ice pox, quite a bad case in comparison to others by Janine's and Rainbow's accounts. Though I wasn't at risk of dying, it was severe enough they were worried."

Hermione smoothed a hand over Severus' face, noting that he did seem to have a few less lines around his face than from before, a common side effect from those who recovered from the ice pox.

"What I'm confused about it that before your attack, and my passing out, I had felt sick since the day before. Quite nauseous, and no potions could ease my nausea and I felt unsettled," Severus noted, his own brow furrowing as he tried to deduce that particular anomaly.

Hermione had an idea, but she had to confirm it. "When did you start feeling nauseous?"

"I woke up Friday morning feeling unwell. Why?"

"I received your – or I should say, I received the wrong flowers Friday afternoon. And it tore me apart. I was nearly sick to my stomach and feeling physically terrible, in addition to emotionally broken. It may have been my own physical reaction to the flowers and what I thought it meant at the time, or it could have been the strength of our binding was being strained."

They both laid there silent, each lost in recalling those unpleasant days.

Severus added, "I passed out shortly after noon, on Saturday."

"Which would make it just past eleven at night back in London. That would be around the time I was stunned." Hermione started curling up into a fetal position, and Severus moved his arms to encircle her as if to protect her from the outside world. She continued describing, as best as she could remember, the time line of the events between waking and passing out after Harry rescued her.
Severus hummed to himself. "And the timing of your dream at night in India and my own experience with the ice bath indicate that they happen concurrently, despite where we are in the world or what time it is."

"But that still doesn't explain where we go. It wasn't Hades, for neither of us died," Hermione surmised.

"It was more like Purgatory. That first dream was a recreation of the night that—" Severus stopped, unable to say the words.

"I know," was all that Hermione said. She remembered his description about the night Gabrielle died. Even in her dream, she recognized that Severus – on the ground, covered in mud – had replaced his wife that he had been forced to kill those many years ago.

"The reliving of our worst sins," he said with quiet somberness.

"But what of the desert?" she asked.

"That was quite similar to my own three days in hell with Chuff in which I was dragged there unprepared." He growled to himself, still upset at his sadistic Potions master for that unpleasant jaunt.

"And the lava?"

Severus shook his head. "Maybe with you piled under all those sheets. And with the ice pox, I felt so cold that it was almost burning. Maybe that is why that place was conjured in your mind or mine."

"But where?" Hermione continued to ask. "Some place between life and death? Limbo? A plane of subconscious existence in the aether or nether sphere? Maybe some chamber in Morpheus' citadel?"

For the fact that not even Severus, who was more well read than herself, was clueless as to where they had gone during those journeys of their minds, was somewhat disquieting to her. She wished Dumbledore was alive, for surely in his vast knowledge and experience, he might know what had happened. Perhaps this was something only those who worked in the deepest bowels of the Department of Mysteries, studying behind the door that could never be forced open, knew and would not divulge to anyone. Maybe this was a mystery that was beyond any explanation one's mind could conceive.

Severus sighed with resignation that even this was beyond his capabilities of logic and observation to discern. "Whatever the place we both visited, it has only been when one of us has been in some form of great distress. Let us hope we never revisit such a place again."

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Thank you to my ever lovely and immensely talented betas, JuneW and Cygnuz.

Tossed Salad: Originally, in prison, to have someone eat your ass out, with or without salad dressing used as a means of disguising the taste of someone's ass. The salad dressing is also used as an impromptu lubrication.

Regarding the Persephone and Hades alternative myth, there was an SSHG Promptfest (after I had completed this story) in which one prompt was, "Retelling of any mythology story with Severus and Hermione as the main characters." I expanded upon my initial idea in this fic and retold the Hades and Persephone myth with her willingly going with Hades to the Underworld instead of being abducted against her will. It is a two-part story titled "Seeds" about 11,000 words long. You can read my reinterpretation of the myth on AO3 and Ashwinder here:

http://archiveofourown.org/works/7606516

"Dragontinis and Drunkards"

Chapter Summary

Hermione and Severus have an idyllic day out. Later, “the girls” have lunch out while “the boys” have a long-overdue booze-up.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter One Hundred Six
"Dragontinis and Drunkards"

Disclaimer:
This fanfic has been drinking, it still needs a disclaimer
And the writer lost her mind, the plot was getting lamer
And the characters all get drunk, and my spelling was just so weak
And the readers are getting restless, and my betas need a break
And this fanfic has been drinking, Rowling has created Potter, not me, not me...

A/N: Lyrics a parody of "The Piano Has Been Drinking (Not Me)” by Tom Waits.

============

Gary noticed that Hermione and Severus made a concerted effort to focus on the morning’s Japanese lesson, but he was gracious enough not to chastise them when he would catch them periodically casting longing glances at one another. They were as bad as any pair of lovesick teenagers he had seen, and though they tried to behave as rational adults in control of themselves, they failed. He knew that Severus had been pining for Hermione and that her stay would be brief, so he let it slide this week. He would tap his wand at the chalkboard to rouse them both out of their momentary distraction in order to have them recite what he had written on the board and correct their pronunciation as needed. Both were excellent students, but he also recognized when two people were madly in love with one another.

To end the lesson for the day, he instructed Severus and Hermione to ask if Draco would invite them to a tea ceremony before Hermione left to go back to London. "Many of the great Japanese Potion masters were also masters of the tea ceremony, which requires some common skills – the stillness of mind, paying attention to the number of times to whisk the tea, the precision of movement, the selection of only the best-quality ingredients.”
Gary began waving his wand about, folding up the chalkboard as he continued talking. "Draco, though not formally trained as a tea master, is quite good for a novice with no Master to study under, especially since he was self-taught from books translated into English. He was kind enough to invite me and Iolana for tea a few times. Observing a proper tea ceremony will help you understand some references in this highly contextual language, no doubt."

Severus thanked him for the suggestion and said he would contact Draco that day.

Once Gary was gone, Severus packed up the cabana he had finally gone out and bought the other day, since most other people on the island had a portable cabana for their family days at the beach.

Meanwhile, Hermione packed the picnic hamper, making sure to include the small hibachi grill from the back deck, but she left room for a few more items they would need to pick up. There was also the matter of towels, bathing suits, a small folding prep table, knives, net bags, and vials and containers to hold specimens until they could take them back to the lab upstairs, and other equipment and accoutrements required for a full day out. She wondered if using an Extension Charm on the picnic hamper would harm the specimens.

As they were heading down to Severus' shop, since he'd promised her the deluxe ten-Sickle tour of the place, Hermione stopped in the middle of the street.

She blinked in confusion. "Wait, wasn't that a Korean Bar-B-Que restaurant before?" she asked, pointing to the Thai restaurant.

"Yes. As diverse as the palates and different cultures that are here on the island may be, there isn't a population large enough to sustain a dozen different restaurants. So the restaurants rotate every two to four days. This building switches between Korean, Thai, and Indian, along with the décor and cooks." He then turned around and pointed to a Mexican restaurant one block down. "That place is a Mexican taqueria and El Salvadorian papuseria three days a week. It shares the space with a family that runs a Persian restaurant every other weekend, and an Ethiopian and a Brazilian restaurant."

"And what do the people do when they aren't running their restaurant?"

"Many people have farms they work on the rest of the time and use the restaurant to supplement their income, but there wouldn't be enough business on this island to have them run it full-time. However, the locals found if they rotated, there was enough of a revenue stream that they could share rents with others and keep enough patrons coming in to make a profit with the trickle that Portkeys or Apparates in from the other islands." Severus then spun about pointing out each spot with his finger, "Mario's, Ohana Family Diner, Flo & Eddie's Noodle House, Golden Dragon, and Yamamoto's are the only restaurants that are occupied by the same restaurant all the time."

They continued walking towards Severus' shop again until Hermione stopped and yanked on his arm. "Oh, wait! We still have to go mirror-shopping." Hermione remembered as they passed by the store that sold housewares and linens. "We should go in and shop now in case they have to order them."

Severus supposed this was as good a time as any to go shopping, though it was a rather tiresome chore.

Hearth, Hale & Ho'opika was where Draco had gone to outfit his home before he wed Ginny, and it was probably the only shop on the island that would probably sell mirrors.

The pair were greeted by Lorraine, Matt’s widow. Severus introduced Hermione to her, and Lorraine told them to look around, as she had several mirrors hanging about the store for display.

Some of the mirrors in the store were enchanted and started calling for Hermione and Severus to come look at them.

"Is there anything that doesn't have gold gilt bamboo or palm fronds for a frame and isn't already charmed?" Hermione asked quietly. She did not care for some of the more ostentatious styles of tropical-themed décor with charmed glass that was quick to flatter them. Some of the Asian-themed décor mirror frames did not tickle Hermione's fancy, especially the ones that were charmed to talk back, some not even in English. Given that the mirror Hermione picked would sit in her flat for months, and then be moved to Lavender's office to reside there, she had to pick something that not only she could tolerate, but that Lavender could as well.

Severus found a mirror he liked, a free-standing, floor-length uncharmed one that had a plain teak frame with little adornment. It was simple, but Severus' current decorating job at the house was also very simple, since the house still looked only half-furnished.

Finally, Hermione's eyes fell upon a mirror hidden towards the back. It had a frame with a European neoclassical style, featuring deep blue enamel and a small amount of gilded gold work that was understated. The glass wasn't even charmed. It was a large wall mirror, and it would also fit within the décor of Lavender's office. It was marked down and was otherwise perfect. Looking about the rest of the store, she could tell that European-style décor was not in hot demand in Malu Severus paid for the mirrors and instructed Lorraine to have them delivered the following morning between ten and eleven, after his lessons were over for the day.

As they turned down the small alley of Humuhumunukunukuapua`a Lane, Hermione let out a small squeal of delight. She saw the shingle hanging from under the awning and the wreath of silvery-green eucalyptus and red leucodendrons on the front door.

"It looks charming already," she exclaimed with anticipation.

Just as they reached the door, one of Jerry's students was exiting and held the door for them both.

"Severus!" Pat cried out in amazement from behind her reception desk. "Draco told me that he had a surprise that would keep you here, and here she is. You must be Hermione," the middle-aged witch said as she stood up to walk around her desk and shake Hermione's hand.

"Hermione, this is Pat Vallier, our office manager, receptionist, and most talented guardian against pointless appointments." Severus said with a lilt of dry humor in his voice.

"You must be very good to earn such high praise from Severus," Hermione remarked with her own wry observation.

"Given that I found ways to write off more expenses for the business, since I'm also versed in wizard tax code, I think I've saved him enough to earn my keep." Pat heard the hooting of an owl arrive. "If you'll excuse me, I have some things to attend to."

Just as Pat left, Jerry stuck his head out of his office. "They popped up for air!"

Severus gave Jerry a pointed look that said sexual innuendos in the office would not be tolerated, as his eyes then darted to Jerry's next student who had been watching the exchange quietly.

Taking the hint, Jerry said, "Well, I have my next student here, so I'll leave you two alone while you give your guest the grand tour." He then looked to the young wizard waiting patiently.
"Jimmy? Why don't you come in."

Hermione glanced at all the Christmas cards pinned to the wall, peeking at some of the inscriptions from grateful parents and students. Then Severus showed her his classroom setup and how it was meant for a much smaller class size. It was in a U-shaped table configuration so Severus could stand in the middle and observe all the students simultaneously, while not having to run around benches to reach a student before his or her cauldron exploded. Cauldrons of various sizes were stacked neatly in one corner, and there was a cabinet with various sizes of robes that students could wear; if they didn't bring their own robes, they could rent these for a fee.

In the next room back was the storage area, where Severus found Thomas stacking some deliveries that had come in. Thomas was one of his students who worked to help pay for his lessons.

"Oh, sorry, Mr. Snape," Thomas said with surprise as he stood up and dusted his hands off. "I thought you were going to be gone off to England this week. Pat told me to come in and put these deliveries away in case there was anything in them that would spoil, but I doubt you would order anything that needed special charms while you were away. But I came in when Pat asked anyway."

"That's all right, Thomas," Severus assured him. "This is Hermione Weasley."

Thomas recognized the witch from the photo on his boss' desk. He blushed a little when Hermione shook his hand and said it was a pleasure to meet him.

"Ma'am." He nodded his head, looking a bit shy as any young man did in the presence of a witch who caught his fancy and made him nervous. "Say, you wouldn't happen to be related to Ron Weasley, the Keeper of the English Chudley Cannons, would you?"

Hermione could distinctly hear the grinding of Severus' teeth, which she pretended not to notice. Trying to sound bright and unperturbed by the question, she said as nonchalantly as possible, "That would be my ex-husband."

Thomas' face fell. "Oh, I am so sorry, Mrs. Weasley," he stammered, ineloquent, but sincere in his embarrassment.

"Don't be sorry, I'm not."
"So then you aren't related to Lavender Weasley?" he asked innocently, too enthralled in the discussion to notice Severus glaring at him.

"That would be my ex-husband's current wife." Hermione paused and added for effect, "And my employer."

There was a moment of silence before Thomas commented, "That must be awkward."

Hermione found humor in the statement and laughed aloud, which surprised even Severus. "At first, yes, but it was for the best, and we're all much happier for it." She paused, then explained, "The three of us were classmates at school for seven years, and we still have friends in common."

Thomas nodded in understanding. "Oh, just like when kids here date and break up with each other, then date another friend."

Hermione smiled, glad to ease the young wizard's discomfort. He really was just a child, who might even end up working for The Lovely Lavender Company in a few years.

Severus was thankful for her skills with people. But mostly, he was surprised that the love-triangle relationship between Hermione, Lavender, and Ronald had not already spread to all the corners of Malu Palekaiko already. "Well, carry on with your tasks, Thomas," Severus said tersely, dismissing the young wizard.

Reaching into his pocket, Severus pulled out his keys and wand, using both to unlock his potions lab in the back where he brewed his commissions. As they entered, candles flickered to life; the place was deathly quiet. Severus had decided not to let anything simmer while he was away, should anything like a vengeful Mad-Eye Moody or some other unforeseen circumstance keep him from coming back in a timely manner.

As Severus shut the door so they could continue talking without being interrupted or overheard, Hermione noticed the layout and feel of the place.

"This reminds me of your old classroom," Hermione noted, a twinkle in her eye. "And if your students here require detention, do you make them come serve it here while you work away?"

"No," Severus said, having an inkling where Hermione's line of questions were going to lead. "If they misbehave, I either serve the parents with a nuisance fee or make them work it off by collecting potions ingredients for me for free. I no longer must supervise unruly students and waste my time disciplining them. Misbehaving students are prevented from signing up for future brewing classes with me, and I leave the parents to deal with the punishment."

Running a finger along one bench, looking a bit kittenish, Hermione said, "And if I was your apprentice and was a bit unruly, how would you discipline me?"

Severus folded his arms in front of himself and lifted his nose in the air, trying to look haughty and imperious. "Fraternization between master and apprentice is a solemn arrangement meant for serious study, not an excuse for dirty old wizards to exploit naïve, young, alluring and nubile witches for the purposes of satisfying their titillating peccadilloes."

"Yes," Hermione purred as she played with the button of Severus' black and green Hawaiian shirt, "but what if he's an attractive, virile wizard who is not so old, and what if the apprentice is not so young and naïve, and has her own dirty, lustful peccadilloes?"

Severus quirked a smug brow at her.

Hermione and Severus made sure every hair was in place, every button was buttoned correctly, and zippers were up before they left Severus' private lab forty minutes later. Pat and Jerry might have guessed they were busy talking about Potions, or they could have correctly guessed the couple was busy with other pursuits other than professional talk, but the lovers would not give them any cause to guess the latter.

Severus made use of an office owl and sent a missive off to Draco about the tea ceremony. They would have stopped to ask in person, but that would have delayed them. Severus wanted to be there to dive for urchins and anemones when the tides were optimal, and they still had to go shopping.

At the market, more people came up and talked with Severus, many – like Thomas – surprised that he was around that week. The social exchange turned into a chance for Severus to introduce Hermione to more of the townsfolk.

With enough food packed for lunch and dinner, they finally headed out to the edge of town to Apparate to a choice spot to go collecting. Severus set up the cabana along the beach, which allowed them a chance to change into their swimsuits in privacy. With their wands secured in their suits' loops, and their net collection bags in hand, they entered the water. They both cast Bubble-Head Charms before diving down.

Hermione was amazed at the variety of tropical fish that nibbled at the coral reef below. Yellow tangs as large as Severus' hand, Moorish idols, trigger fish, brightly-colored parrotfish, and several species of butterfly fish swam about. They all dazzled Hermione with their beauty, as she had only ever seen fish like this in aquariums, and much smaller at that.

Severus guided Hermione down to a spot that was rich in exotic corals, urchins, and anemones. Pulling out a knife, he showed Hermione how to pry and cut the various specimens free and gather them into the net bags carefully. Hermione had little problem with the pieces of coral and urchins she gathered, but with one anemone she did get stung.

Up on the beach, they deposited their collection into some tubs filled with sea water in order to hold them until they could begin processing some for parts. But before that, Severus fetched a bottle of vinegar and poured it over Hermione's hand, neutralizing the sting of the anemone. Severus also applied a salve to help speed healing, having had his own share of jellyfish and anemone stings over the past year.

In the shade of the cabana, Severus cracked open the first sea urchin, halving it neatly with a slicing spell in order to show Hermione the interior of the animal and the useful parts that usually were shipped dried to England. Once done with the anatomy lesson, he tipped the urchin over to empty the internal organs before reaching into the cavity.

"And now the delicious part," he said with relish. "The gonads."

Hermione watched as Severus plucked out the dark golden organ, rinsed it lightly in a small pan of sea water, and popped it into his mouth.

With his eyes closed, he chewed on it, savoring the sweet and briny soft flesh. He pulled the next one out and offered it to Hermione. She was almost reluctant to try it, having had urchin in a sushi bar once and was underwhelmed by the taste of it. But when Severus placed that fresh delicacy on her tongue, her eyes popped open with surprise, and she groaned with delight.

After swallowing, she said, "Oh my God, that is good. That is nothing like the urchin I've had before."

Severus smiled, as if he had personally shown her the secret cellar that stored the nectar of the gods, and let her sample some. He was almost like a giddy schoolboy sharing some great secret he'd stumbled across. "It's only good fresh like this. Once you pull the gonads out, the texture begins to change almost immediately and it won't keep, which is why this is the best way to enjoy it."
Hermione gave a try at cutting open a live urchin and cleaned out the various organs to throw them into the respective containers Severus had brought. Once done, Hermione pulled out a set of five more gonads, which they shared as a quick bite before they began cutting open the rest of the sea urchins to collect for various potions ingredients.

Once all the collected specimens were cut and set in various trays, salted, and left to dry in the sun, or thrown into jars and preserved with various fluids, it was time for lunch.

Hermione pulled out some fruit and began to slice them up as Severus lit the coals in the hibachi grill. Noting that Hermione was wielding a blade, he asked, "How are your knife skills lately?"

"Better," she replied noncommittally.

"Good enough for you to bet?" he goaded her.

"Depends. Are your massage skills just as good? Because after giving you a back rub last night, I need one of my own now." Hermione feigned that her shoulders ached, pouting and making over-exaggerated sad faces. "I don't remember your muscles being so tight back in England, and I had to put a lot of effort into it."

"I've had to put a lot of effort into you. You forget how much work it requires to satisfy you, though if you're still game to try Polyjuice Potion tomorrow, you'll finally figure that out first hand." He gave her a knowing leer.

"Well, if I win and I get a proper back-rub; what do you want should you win? And how shall we judge this competition?"

Severus had to think about it. She had already given him a very nice back-rub the night before, and without him even asking for one. There was little in the way of sexual desires that they hadn't already sated or planned to fulfill during the rest of the week.

He thought for a moment before deciding. "Hmm, fine. When we go to my farm, I get to sit back and supervise, and you can harvest and process the various things I need for my shop, in addition to gardening chores."
Aghast, Hermione huffed, only slightly amused. "What do you think I am? Free slave labor?"

"You are the apprentice. I am the master. Were you not aware that essentially you are indentured during your apprenticeship? Or has Albert been paying you when you work on his garden?"

Severus gave a very self-satisfied smile as he leaned back, clasping his hands behind his head, knowing he was right.

Eyes narrowing, she gave him a playful glare that she was ready to meet his challenge and felt she would surely be getting her back-rub later that day. "Fine, let's do it."

Hermione split the fish in half evenly with the same slicing spell Severus had used. After placing the fish halves on the scales Severus had also brought, it was confirmed that that the two halves weighed equally. The wizard who had the fillets that weighed the most would win.

What neither expected was a contingency should they come to a draw and both their fillets weighed the same. In the end, it was agreed that Severus would supervise while Hermione worked on Severus' farm later that afternoon, and Severus would give her a much needed back-rub afterwards.

After a lunch of grilled fish, everything was packed away. Severus had promised Hermione some beach time, and they Apparated to a spot where the sand was as soft as sugar beneath their feet. Severus normally didn't swim for fun, but only for exercise. However, with Hermione, he was enjoying himself as they swam about. Eventually, they both came out and rested in the shade of the cabana, each pulling out a book to read. Severus even dozed off for a bit, his book resting on his chest while Hermione continued to study her Japanese primer. When Severus awoke, Hermione had a refreshing chilled drink ready for him.

Arriving at the farm, they changed back into their clothes. Severus gave her yet another tour, pointing out the nearby farms and the various crops grown there. His farm still had areas he had yet to clear, but he also told Hermione what he planned to do. He had already planted some citrus trees, since they did better on the drier side of the island, with plans of a nice-sized orange grove soon. The rosemary and thyme were growing at an astounding rate; Severus instructed Hermione to take tips off of his rosemary bushes, and then set them up for drying.

He had built a small shed to house his tools, drying rack areas, a small desk, a sturdy sink to wash large batches of whatever was harvested, and a toilet. Reclining on a hammock on the front porch of the shed, he watched as Hermione moved about quickly, cutting bushes, dead-heading plants, picking fruit, and pulling weeds with great efficiency. Severus wished the students he supervised to work on his farm for pay worked as quickly and diligently as did Hermione, who admittedly did this to honor a bet, rather than for pay.
Sweat trickling down her face, she trudged up to the porch. "Well, I did all you asked so far. What next?" Hermione swiped her wrist across her brow to stop the sweat from trickling into her eyes.

"That's it. That's all that needed to be done today."

Relieved, Hermione came up to the porch and collapsed into the hammock, coming to lie next to Severus. Unfortunately, the sun was in the west and beating down on the front porch.

"You're filthy again," he noted.

"And you're still all salty from the ocean."

Severus set up the cabana for a third time that day, as the cabana came equipped with a shower for rinsing off after a day at the beach. Once showered, and with no one around to bother them, Severus honored his end of the bet and gave Hermione a thorough back-rub while mutually nude. This back-rub eventually turned into a tussle in the cabana as he straddled the backs of her thighs, sliding into her as he continued to dig his thumbs into key tight spots on her back and hips. They made use of lounge chairs they had reclined on earlier.

As sunset approached, they reclined in the hammock, side by side, enjoying the unobstructed view of the horizon. The sky changed quickly from golden to peach, then vivid orange and burnt orange as the sun set along the western edge of the Pacific.

Severus pulled out their food from the picnic hamper as twilight set in. He had some marinated pork set on bamboo skewers that he grilled on the hibachi. Hermione cooked the rice in a cauldron set at the edge of a small fire-pit she made with some lava rocks and some old dried pieces of wood. And there was a lightly pickled cucumber-and-carrot salad done Thai-style to round out the meal. Severus uncorked a Pinot Blanc to go with the meal.

The coals dimmed as they were finishing the last of their dinner, just as the stars came out.

As they relaxed once more in the hammock, they gazed up at the stars together. Hermione had not seen so many stars since she was a student at Hogwarts. There was no light pollution from any cities, and the sky was so filled with stars, she could even discern Severus' face by their light alone, the moon having not yet risen.
"As much as I wish it so, unfortunately no," he sighed with resignation. Severus was not about to let sentimentality overtake him this time, for he knew better. "As much as your visit has been like some fantastical dream of near perfection, I am not about to lie and wax rhapsodically that this gloriously heady time will be eternal. We'll both come home from long days at work and fall into our complacent habits. Hopefully, we will not fall into the common trap of taking each other for granted and thereby become resentful, but familiarity does breed contempt. I cannot promise that I will always be as agreeable as I have been this week with you, drunk on the euphoria of having you with me again, but as with love potions, passions that burn so bright burn out and cool in time."

For Hermione, it was quite sobering to hear Severus speak so frankly. She digested what he said before replying. "True, a blazing fire can burn out quickly, but if one tends to the fire to make sure it doesn't burn out, it can remain a constant source of warmth. As long as you don't neglect it, it can last a very long, long time, Severus." She snuggled her head against his chest. "And I will always tend to you, just as you've tended to me."

Severus hoped in the long term he would not fail Hermione. As much as he loved her, he had little experience when it came to long-term commitments, since his first marriage was so short. He had only known Gabrielle for about two years before becoming a widower at twenty years old. He barely had spent an entire six months with Hermione in the entirety of their relationship, including his time when she only knew him as Calleo. The only thing that quelled his own deep fear was that he knew that they loved each other deeply, enough to forge a bond that defied convention and was inexplicable. It was their love that gave him faith that perhaps he could have decades of happiness with Hermione.

It was a cloudburst of pelting rain that woke them up, after they'd drifted off to sleep in the hammock as they watched the stars above. Severus cast a Parapluie Charm to shield them as they ran under the cabana for shelter. It was late, and neither had any idea how long they had been asleep. They packed away everything from their day trip, with the canvas-covered cabana packed last before they Apparated home.

Severus set the various items they collected away in his lab. Meanwhile, Hermione lit a few candles and began working on her scrolls for Albert, while everything was still fresh in her mind, including drawing a diagram of a sea urchin.

Kissing the top of her head, Severus said, "Don't stay up too late. Come to bed soon."

Hermione pressed her cheek against the back of his hand that was resting on her shoulder. "As soon as I've finished," she assured him. She smiled, knowing that if Severus was still her professor and she just a young student at Hogwarts, he would have demanded she stay up as late as necessary to properly finish her work, giving no pity regarding the late hour.

~~~~~~~*~

"Yes, yes, Draco! This isn't the first time I have Portkeyed with a pregnant witch. I know what to do," Hermione said with great exasperation.

"But she's extra pregnant," Draco fretted.

"Versus a little bit pregnant?" Ginny ribbed her husband. "You are or you aren't. Besides, I'm not completely disabled, I can still walk."

Hermione placed a reassuring hand on Draco's arm that he could let go of his wife and let the two witches Portkey over to Honolulu for the day. "Don't worry, I will take very good care of her."

Halulu, who was one month further along than Ginny, chuckled to herself and rolled her eyes as she guided Hermione and Ginny over to the Portkey area. Shaking her head, she said, "Well, at least he cares enough to fret like a mother Kneazel."

Once the two witches Portkeyed away, Severus clapped a hand on Draco's shoulder. "How about a drink? I think you need it to calm your nerves."

Hermione and Ginny arrived in the Honolulu Portkey office, ready for a day of shopping and a long leisurely lunch between old friends.

Since it was almost lunch time, they decided to take a "Wiz-ped-cab." It looked just like the Muggle pedicabs that ferried people about the main drag of Kalakaua Avenue in the heart of Waikiki Beach, but it traveled much faster and took witches and wizards all over the island.

Stepping into the Wiz-ped-cab, Ginny asked, "Where do you recommend for lunch?"

The young wizard, who helped Ginny up, asked, "Muggle or wizard?" knowing that sometimes the tourists liked to be daring and mingle with the Muggles for a thrill.

"Oh, let's try wizard," Hermione suggested, knowing that once she moved to Hawaii, she and Ginny could try a Muggle one next time.
The wizard hopped on the bicycle attached to the front of the open-air cab and began peddling faster and faster, but the Wiz-ped-cab was going nowhere, despite the rapid speed in which his feet went around and around. Eventually, the wizard flipped a lever that looked like a bicycle gear control, and suddenly the Wiz-ped-cab lurched forward.

They were zipping through the streets of Honolulu so fast, they were observed by Muggles as nothing more than a gust of ocean breeze that ruffled the dresses of those it passed close by or dislodged the occasional Muggle's hat. As they approached their destination, the cab slowed down quickly to the point where it looked like any other pedicab delivering passengers to another restaurant. Though if the Muggles had noticed this particular pedicab, they would have asked how one made it high up onto the slopes of the mountains above Honolulu while towing passengers.

Hermione paid the driver, who gave him his card if they needed another ride when they were done with lunch.

Once seated for lunch at the Rikki Tikki Tavern, the two witches looked out at the expansive view from high up on the hillside of Honolulu and Waikiki Beach laid out before them, with Diamond Head in the far distance.

With a deep sigh, Hermione drank in the vista and said, "It's going to be hard to go back to London after a week in paradise."

"It's going to be hard on me. Just when I get my best friend back, you're gone again." Ginny gave a faltering smile as she rubbed her stomach absentmindedly.

"It's been almost surreal here. Like some wonderful dream I fear I'll wake up from, and I'll find myself back in my bed back in London, alone and hornier than ever," Hermione growled.

"Um, would you like to start off with some drinks?" the young wizard asked as he poured a couple glasses of water for the witches, his face a brilliant scarlet.

Hermione hid her face behind her hand, ducking her head down, embarrassed that that particular part of their conversation had been overheard.

"Yes, please," Ginny said brightly, trying not to laugh. "Can I get a half coconut water, half pineapple juice, with a splash of pumpkin juice for myself, and a Dragontini for my friend."
Once the young wizard was gone, Ginny laughed aloud. Hermione also eventually found humor in the incident and lightly chuckled at herself.

"So," Ginny began, her brows raised with amusement, "Severus had been looking progressively more happy and progressively more worn out as the week has gone on."

Hermione could not stop the broad grin from spreading across her face. "That makes two of us. If it wasn't for having to stop to do work for Lavender and Albert, I think I would have literally worn Severus down to a nub, and killed him with exhaustion after shagging him to death."

"Your drinks, Ma'am," the wizard squeaked, his voice cracking. His face was now even a more vivid shade of red, if that was possible.

Hermione didn't even look the flustered wizard in the eye, snatching the drink and taking a long sip to avoid looking at him. It was Ginny who thanked him, snorting as she tried not to burst into further whoops of laughter.

"I keep forgetting that I'm in public sometimes, and I can't speak so freely," Hermione said under her breath. "Ever since I won Severus and Draco their freedom, I can hardly walk down Diagon Alley without getting some sneer or disparaging comment cast my way."

"Yeah, when Draco and I were walking about shopping back in August, I did catch a few dirty glances thrown my way, but Draco would catch their eye and glare at them, and they'd shuffle off," Ginny volunteered. "We mostly stayed either at Malfoy Manor or Ron and Lavender's place, dealing mostly only with family and close friends. With my condition, Draco didn't want me out in public much to get hit with a revenge hex."

"I can certainly understand. After I divorced Ron, I had a mix of people either cursing at me or shaking my hand in thanks, but once winning their exoneration, I've had one or two close calls where people nearly pulled their wand on me. There were some Howlers too, two from Padma even. I swear, I only ever Floo between my flat, work, and Albert's place, and the monthly Potion masters' booze-up. At least the Potion masters and mistresses there have my back and support me."

Hermione drained the last of her drink as she tipped the glass up, thinking maybe she should order a second one since she could barely feel the effects of the alcohol. "Now I can certainly empathize with Severus and Draco, and why they always skulked in full cloaks early in the morning before anyone is hardly up. And that time I saw Severus at Flourish and Blotts late one night, his hood was pulled up when I thought he was still Calleo. It seems the only time I do go out in public is to Flourish and Blotts, and that's shortly before they close and with my hood up completely as well."
Hermione waved at their waiter to bring over another drink. A second drink in her mitts, they finally ordered lunch.

Relaxing on the back porch of Chez Malfoy, after a couple of bowls of Vietnamese pho from Flo & Eddie's, Draco leaned forward to refill Severus' glass.

"So have you shown her the hot springs yet? Or have you both been so preoccupied you've forgotten?" Draco asked as he drained the last of the Ogden's Finest Quadruple Distilled Single Malt into his own glass. He had been saving the bottle for a special occasion since he brought it back in August, and this was as good as any time to kill it. Besides, it had been over a year since they had a proper booze-up.

"We went this morning for a sunrise soak, since Katrina woke us up before dawn." Severus yawned. "Pardon."

Draco waved it off, having been in Severus' shoes before: blissfully worn out from lots of sex.

Severus lifted his glass and took a sip, his limbs feeling quite heavy. "She had wanted to see the place there in daylight, after I took her there Friday night after dinner at Mario's." There was a long pause as Severus tried to remember what his next train of thought was; he was feeling quite listless and devoid of tension since he was on his fifth glass. "I proposed to her there on Christmas Eve, and though she said yes in a round-about way, she was quite frantic in her explanation of why we couldn't sooner as opposed to later."

"After the way that Molly terrorized and harangued Ginny and Hermione with wedding preparations, can you blame them? Even you said yourself that the night before her wedding to Weasley, you remembered what a harried mess she was, breaking down into tears once you gave her your honest answer to what you thought about her marrying Ron," he reminded his mentor.

Severus merely nodded to himself.
"Besides," Draco went on, "you know what an overachieving perfectionist she is," then stopped himself and added, "and I mean that in the most complimentary manner in that she's a witch who seeks to excel in everything she undertakes, which is why she is perfect for you. Matched bookends, you two are." Tilting his head back to enjoy the beautiful canopy of the tree above their heads that was shielding them from the sun, he added, "If I might be so bold, why not – when she is done with her apprenticeship, and the business is up and going and I can run it for a few weeks – elope with her?"

Severus rubbed the side of his face, which was feeling a little numb from the very fine and potent spirits he had been drinking. "Elope?"

Hermione did rave on about all the plans that would be made to have a wedding and all the hassle that would entail. Perhaps eloping with her would save her from all the bother and stress. With the Malfoys' own wedding, Ginny only had to make arrangements for the rings, a dress, flowers, and a brief meeting with Mouna where she and Draco discussed the ceremony. Draco had arranged the reception at Mario's originally, which the town subverted with the secret wedding luau feast.

Both Hermione and Severus had gone through the full traditional English wizard wedding, both marriages ending in their own ways disastrously, and nobody happy with their spouses. Perhaps bucking convention by eloping would be the best thing for Hermione's sanity and thereby his as well. He loved Hermione, but he didn't think he could stand weeks of Hermione putting herself into a tizzy over a ceremony that lasted at most twenty minutes.

But even with eloping, that would mean he would have to schedule that any commissions he was working on were not burning while he was on his honeymoon. While it seemed grand to go off at the last minute spontaneously, he knew it would not be possible. Besides, Hermione would have to have Draco trained on running the business before they left, and that meant arranging things beforehand. But Severus could insist that they keep it as simple as possible, much in the same way the Malfoys had done.

Standing next to the curb, Hermione put her hand out and made the Shaka sign, a common hand gesture on the Hawaiian islands among Muggles and wizards alike. A few back on Malu Palekaiko had even waved at Severus using the odd gesture.

The Wiz-ped-cab – peddled by the same young wizard as before – came up curbside, Summoned by the hand gesture. "Ah, and how was lunch, ladies?"
"Excellent, thank you for the recommendation," Hermione said as she and the wizard helped Ginny up into the cab. Following Ginny, she hopped up herself, surprised she barely could feel the alcohol of the three drinks she'd sucked down during lunch.

"Where to now?" their driver and escort asked.

"I need to go shopping for some Muggle knives. Do you know any high-end cutlery stores?"

"Don't tell me you're going shopping for Potions equipment while on holiday," Ginny whined with exasperation as the Wiz-ped-cab zoomed off again.

"No, I'm going birthday shopping for Severus," Hermione retorted, leaning sideways and propping up Ginny with one hand as the Wiz-ped-cab made a sharp left turn.

"Only between two Potions boffins would the exchange of knives be considered an acceptable gift. I've heard the joke about the wizard who gave his wife knives and regretted it later," Ginny warned sarcastically. The Wiz-ped-cab driver was listening in on the conversation and started laughing, having heard that joke too.

"Well, I'm at a loss as to what else I can get him since his personal lab is outfitted with everything possible." Hermione harrumphed, wishing she could get something a bit more romantic than a fancy set of knives for Severus, but knowing he would still appreciate them.

As they pulled up to the large Muggle shopping center, the wizard directed them to a cookware store that would probably have what they were looking for. They found the store easily enough, especially since the name of the store was in large gold letters above the entrance.

Upon entering the store, Hermione was accosted by a floor salesperson wearing an apron, who offered to help her find anything.

"Yes, do you have ceramic knives?" Hermione asked politely.

"Oh, yes. Please follow me," the saleswoman indicated with a sweep of her arm.
"Ceramic? They make knives out of pottery now?" Ginny asked.

"No. It's these special knives from Japan. They bake a ceramic coating on the outside of the blade. They're harder than even the best steel, and supposedly require sharpening far less often, if at all. My parents just bought a set, and I tried them out while helping my mum make Christmas dinner the weekend before I came here. I was very impressed. Only thing better is Goblin steel, and they only make swords and daggers, not knives suitable for our type of work." Hermione knew better than to commission a Goblin to make knives for Potions work, knowing they would consider it beneath themselves for such a task, no matter how many Galleons you offered them.

The Muggle sales associate tamped down a giggle, listening to the one woman ramble on about Goblin steel. No doubt this was one of those Dungeon & Dragons live role-playing nerds she had seen in the parks on weekends, playing about with their foam shields and bamboo katanas.

Ginny nodded, duly impressed that Muggles could make anything as good as what was commonly available for the wizarding population.

The two witches listened to the saleswoman ramble on with her marketing jargon and speak about the excellence of each blade and so on. Hermione could spot advertising fodder from a mile away, especially since her Aunt Christine was the specialist in marketing bullshit.

"That's all well and good, but may I try them before deciding?" Hermione asked, trying to cut to the chase. She wanted her decision to be based upon performance, not fancy adjectives pulled from an advertising hack's favorite thesaurus.

"Um..." The salesperson looked a bit lost. She had never been asked if a customer could try knives personally, even though the knives were displayed next to a nice butcher block cutting counter area that seemingly invited Hermione to give her knife skills a whirl.

"Look. There is a perfectly good cantaloupe. Bring it over here." Hermione instructed the hesitant clerk, looking over at the decorative fresh fruit display meant to show off a tall glass footed centerpiece bowl that was for sale. "I intend to purchase one of these sets, but until I can test them I can't decide which would be the best set to suit my needs."

"Okay, but let me talk to my manager first," she hemmed and hawed.
As she shuffled off, Hermione turned back to Ginny. "So, Severus wants to try Polyjuice Potion tonight. He says he got the idea after you and Draco in the honeymoon suite declined to go flying that time. Got any advice you can impart?"

Turning a very vivid shade of red, Ginny said, "Well, I didn't think he picked up on that, but I guess he did."

Ginny's back was beginning to kill her with this standing around. She would have conjured a chair, but they were out amongst the Muggles and she could not indulge in such instant gratification of her needs. Looking at another sales associate who was wandering about, she asked, "Can I get a chair to sit on while we wait for the manager?" She leaned over the butcher block table, pressing one hand to her back to add extra emphasis.

Turning back to Hermione, she advised, "For the fact you're both working with equipment neither of you are familiar with operating, start off like a novice. No fancy positions, start with the basics. Oh, and take a breath mint before you start kissing. Kissing someone with Polyjuice breath is almost as disgusting as swilling it." She stopped talking and thanked the woman who brought her a chair before continuing on. "And make sure he takes the lubrication potion after turning into you. For some reason, when my hair sample was snipped while under the potions effects, it didn't transfer to Draco very well, and he had to take another dose of the lubrication for it to properly work."

"Did you try a dose of Sequoia after you transformed?" asked, now really curious from an academic standpoint of the effect of potion effectiveness to transfer between bodies using Polyjuice Potion.

"Oh, yes," Ginny sighed dreamily, recalling that afternoon fondly. Hermione didn't have to ask how well it worked, based on the look on Ginny's face.

"And Draco tried the Sequoia, then you tried the Polyjuice using fresh samples?"

"Yes, but once again, not as potent. Almost negligible." Ginny stopped her line of conversation after noticing the manager mincing over towards the pair, an overly bright smile on her face.
Polishing off the last of the rum, Draco said, "Wow. Can Ginny and I book an afternoon with your Pensieve? After the children are born, of course."

Severus waved his hand, indicating that he would be as accommodating as possible. "Just ask, and I'll make myself scarce for however long you need. It's the least I can do after you conspired to bring Hermione here." Severus stared into his glass while trying to recall if he was drinking rum or bourbon, and wondering what else Draco had in his liquor cabinet. "Best fucking Christmas present ever," he said with a lopsided smile, gazing off into the distance.

"You have been fucking your Christmas present," Draco noted with a snort.

Severus was in such a good mood, even he laughed at Draco's observation of his Freudian slip. Also, it helped he hadn't been this drunk in a long time. For once he wasn't drinking to forget his troubles, but rather celebrating how good life was, a first.

"How many times have you used the Pensieve so far?" Draco asked.

"Three times. Speaking of unique experiences, I've noticed that you stopped commissioning me for Polyjuice since Ginny has been pregnant," Severus finally remembered.

"Well, I didn't feel like being the third wizard in recorded history to go through a male-pregnancy. So we stuck to days before we predicted Ginny would be ovulating. A prudent way to avoid complications."

"Yes, quite," Severus agreed. Too drunk for either of them to get up, Severus used a Summoning Charm to retrieve the bottle of pear brandy.

"Ooh, brandy," Draco said longingly, forgetting he had bought some when he was in England. "Which reminds me, have you used the Fairy Brandy yet?"

"No. Though when we do, I may have to cast a reinforcement charm on the bed beforehand."

Draco nodded in agreement. “Definitely. With that bottle you gave us, along with the fresh passion fruit juice, I swear..." He gave a hearty groan implying he was quite put out by the end of the Fairy Brandy's influence.
Exiting the store with bags in hand, and everything gift-wrapped, Hermione shook her head. "You'd think they'd never seen anyone competent with a knife wield one before."

"'Are you a sushi master?' That was a good one," Ginny said with an amused snort. "But, you having an audience of fifteen Muggles oohing and ahhing as you sliced that cantaloupe into pieces so thin you could read a paper through it – while even I'm impressed, it's not like I didn't believe it was possible. Then all those Muggles clamoring to buy sets of their own after watching you use those knives. Sometimes it amazes me that Muggles can dream up such fantastical things like space travel and go all the way to the moon, yet couldn't believe you could do that with just a knife."

Hermione silently agreed with Ginny, nodding her head as they continued walking through the mall to window-shop a bit before taking the Wiz-ped-cab back to the Honolulu Portkey office.

Arriving back at the Malu Palekaiko Portkey office, they stopped to chat with Halulu a bit, recommending the restaurant they went to and giving Halulu a brief description of shopping at the Muggle shopping mall. No doubt the island's witches were in need of a fresh infusion of more gossip on the island; the tale of Hermione thrilling the Muggles with her knife skills would be passed around quickly.

With their bags dropped off in the living room, Hermione followed Ginny into the kitchen. It was as the two witches were grabbing something cold to drink when they heard something strange. Well, to Hermione is sounded strange since she had never heard it before.

Opening the back door, they spotted Draco and Severus, each slumped into their respective chairs, drunk off their arses and laughing uncontrollably. It was a rather foreign sound to Ginny as well.

Draco spotted his wife, but only after he put a hand over one eye so he only saw one of her. He waved. "Oh, hi, darling. You're home!"

For some reason, the two wizards both found the phrase amusing and both began laughing again.
Severus nearly fell out of his chair as he tried to turn around to spy Hermione, who was behind him. "Oh... Hey..." For a second, he almost forgot her name, then suddenly remembered. Severus was so far gone, he nearly had trouble remembering his own name. "Ermio-me, yeah, that's it."

Draco found this amusing as well and started laughing once more.

Hermione turned to look at Ginny, asking, "Is this a weekly occurrence?"

Ginny shook her head. "First time since we've been here they've done this. Not even after their yearly Victory Day sorrow drownings have I ever seen them this pissed. Nor this silly. What the hell did they drink?"

Severus and Draco both found this funny as well. They laughed so hard, both of them slid out of their chairs and laid sprawled out on the deck, on their backs, unable to move as the world spun about them.

Hermione looked at the number of bottles that were empty and divided that by the number of hours they were gone. She wondered if Rainbow had ever treated a wizard for alcohol poisoning or did a liver transplant before. Hermione was amazed at the amount of alcohol consumed, even when compared to what the other Potions masters drank at their monthly booze-ups.

Speaking out of the side of her mouth quietly enough so that only Ginny could hear, she advised from personal experience, "If you love him, give him the Hangover Relief Potion before you give him any Sobering Solution. That is, if you want to sober him up. Or you can just put him to bed with a bucket and let him enjoy it. And make sure the Hangover Relief is within arm's reach when he wakes."

Draco was oblivious to Ginny using a Mobilicorpus Spell to move him to the bedroom. Severus was not quite so oblivious, but he did think it was pretty darn amusing watching Draco float about, bobbing in mid-air. It was as Hermione lifted his body she noticed the half-finished bottle of Cheery's High Spirits Spirits. No doubt whoever Summoned that bottle didn't notice what they had. For the fact it wasn't the only bottle polished off explained that Severus and Draco were probably in the middle of drinking it when they came back home. No doubt they would have been even more far gone had they finished off the whole thing.

Ginny suggested Hermione use the Floo, but as Severus had locked the Floo back home and she couldn't get Severus to stop laughing when she asked him how to unlock it, she decided to Side-Along Apparate home with Severus instead.
As Hermione and Severus landed in the living room, that was the impetus for Severus to empty his stomach contents all over the floor. Hermione patiently held his hair back until he was done, conjuring a bucket for him in the middle of his ordeal. Once done, she went to his lab for the requisite potions to restore him back towards his sober and less giggly self.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Thank you to be talented, patient and hard working betas, JuneW and thegreyladies.

Hale is Hawaiian for home.
Ho'opika is Hawaiian for hospitality.

"A boffin is pretty much anyone who is into science in quite an intense way and carries this intensity as a defining characteristic of their personality. Professor Stephen Hawking is a boffin. David Attenborough is a boffin. Sheldon from The Big Bang Theory, when he’s not dressed in his Flash costume, is a boffin as much as he is a nerd. Mad professors are boffins. The Doctor is a boffin. He’s not a nerd though, and clearly, by Time Lord standards, he’s nowhere near being a swot. Far too wayward for that."
The Hangover Relief Potion and Sobering Solution had already taken effect, but that didn't stop Severus from holding his head in his hands as he sat at the kitchen table while Hermione made him a cup of weak tea.
Severus was mortified he had been unable to stomach Apparating home, and in front of Hermione. He groaned once more, his pride hurting more than his head.

"I told you not to worry, Severus. You said yourself that you haven't been drinking nearly as much as you used to, and your tolerance is now lower than what it was back in England." Hermione gave him a very gentle kiss upon the top of his head as she placed his tea in front of him.

"Yes, but as a Potions master, I am supposed to maintain my tolerance. I haven't done that since I was an apprentice," he grumbled, sounding a bit petulant.

Standing there beside him with her hands on her hips, Hermione stared down at him with empathy as he was reluctant to meet her eye. "Looking at the number of bottles that were empty, I don't think even Niles or Royston could have kept up with what you two put away this afternoon. And if you're going to go on a bender, at least be aware of what you're Summoning from the bar. You two downed over half a bottle of Cheery's High Spirits Spirits, giggling like a couple of fourth-year witches on Valentine's Day."

"Merlin, kill me now," he muttered under his breath. No doubt, Draco Summoned that bottle, and it was his own fault he'd accepted whatever Draco was pouring without reading the label.

"No. Killing you would put you out of your misery," she gently teased him as she rubbed his shoulder in an act of solidarity. "You'll survive." Hermione had survived enough humiliating binges of her own when her tolerance was lower, Severus would survive this as well.

"Why don't you finish your tea and go have a lie-down," she suggested in a kind, motherly tone. "I'll fix dinner tonight. Zhubanysh taught me how to make beshbarmack, which she assured me had helped her brothers and cousins after drinking far too much kumis."

Severus' stomach churned at the thought of that alcoholic drink made from unpasteurized fermented mare's milk. Fortunately for him, there was nothing left in his stomach.

Once Hermione tucked him into bed, she headed off to the store for a few ingredients that weren't already stocked in the kitchen.

Severus stirred from his nap due to the gentle stroking of Hermione's fingertip along his brow. She was singing to him in a language that sounded similar to Turkish, but he could not understand.
He laid there unmoving except to blink, watching her with rapt attention as she sang. He had realized he had never heard her sing before. Her voice, while not the most beautiful, was sweet, even when it wavered as she sang in a near-whisper. In the light of a single candle, she looked like an angel as she gazed down at him. He wondered if it was an after-affect of drinking so much, but there seemed to be a faint halo about her head.

Smiling, she continued to sing her lullaby while stroking his brow and cheek with the lightest of touches.

"Жаным эзунду абайла.
Учкан куштай too ашыйп,
Тынчсыз ойлор кайып болсун,
Алыс алыс жайларга.

Менин сүйүүм мөл булаг,
Тоо аралап ағылгапан,
Жан дуйнөндү сугарып,
Жүрөгүндү даарылап.

Көкурөктө соккон жсүрөк,
Кулақ салсан сага айтат,
Сени коргоит санаанан,
Сага арналган маҳабат."

Severus was speechless; he continued to stare up at her dumbfounded by this moment of extreme tenderness.

Hermione suddenly became self-conscious, now that Severus was finally awake and watching her intently. She stopped singing to turn her face away from his scrutiny as if she was blushing.

To fill the awkward silence, Hermione said, as she stared at the pattern in the wood floor, "When Harry came back to England from Hawaii, that day after you left, I had never seen him so angry at me. I had also never seen him so broken. I had helped Ginny leave him, and he felt betrayed by those closest to him." Hermione paused, wondering if Severus had heard the tale. Figuring how much he disliked Harry, Ginny and Draco probably never told Severus the tale of how Harry met Zhubanysh. "So he took off on a transcontinental broom race without telling anyone. Somewhere along the Pamir Pass in the middle of the night, Harry fell off his broom. They don't know if it was due to the freezing night temperatures, thin oxygen from the high altitude, the snowstorm, lack of sleep during the race, or all of those factors, but in the morning he was found by another racer.\" unconscious in the snow."

Hermione turned to look at Severus to gauge his reaction, but he continued to just stare at her. "He was taken to a nearby yurt where Zhubanyaksh was living with her family. I don't know if Ginny or Draco told you much about her, but she comes from a nomadic wizarding tribe from that area. Zhubanyaksh nursed Harry back to health. She claims it was the good horse broth she made that helped bring him back and restored his health, and Kingsley's healing knowledge. But I think it was the songs she sang to him as he lay there unconscious, by the way Harry tells it. Horse broth and basic healing spells can't mend a broken heart." She smiled to herself, her focus drifting to the candle that flickered on the bedside table as she continued her tale.

"When Harry finished his recovery and came back, he invited me over and introduced Zhubanyaksh as his wife. I was shocked. I wondered how Harry, who was so..." she paused momentarily, choking up upon recalling the memory, "... so broken after Ginny left, could so easily fall in love with a new wife and marry her so quickly, but after my own... After the attack, I could understand how Harry could fall in love with her so completely. I was waking up every night screaming, and I found the only way I could go to sleep and not wake up in tears and cold sweats was if Zhubanyaksh would come over at night and sing to me when I went to bed. She sang that song to me practically every night for almost two months before I could sleep without her nightly lullabies. That was one she sang to me every night."

Hermione didn't know what else to say, feeling Severus' eyes so singularly focused upon her and so still.

"It was lovely," he said in a soft whisper. "What language is it?"

"Kyrgyz. She even taught me the translation:

"Rest my sweet one
   Let your troubled thoughts fly away
   Like birds over the mountain pass
   Carried far, far away

My love is a mountain
   From it a spring cascades
   To feed the valley of your soul
   And water the pastures of your heart

Rest your head upon my chest
   Hear my heart beat
   It speaks of love to keep you safe
   Rest my sweet one."
Hermione stroked Severus' face once more and saw his eyes shutter close briefly, as he reveled in her gentle touch. "If you do ever come back to England, I hope you'll meet Zhubanysh. She calls me 'sister.' She is very sweet."

Severus finally stirred, moving his hand to stroke the back of Hermione's hand that was currently resting on his chest. "I'm glad she has been there to help soothe your mind when I could not be there for you," he said with some regret. It did not escape Severus' attention that Hermione had slept peacefully every night since arriving at their home Friday.

"It's okay. I understand," was all Hermione said, implying so much with that simple phrase. Changing the topic to avoid thinking about how Severus would not be in bed with her come next week, she asked, "How are you feeling now? Are you able to eat dinner? It's ready."

Severus sat up fearing he would feel like hell, despite the potions he took earlier that never countered all the after-effects of drinking so heavily. But when he sat up, he felt fine. In fact he felt quite wonderful. Maybe it was Zhubanysh's magical lullaby that Hermione sang to him that made him feel whole and rested, but he wasn't certain. Maybe purging all that alcohol out of his system did the trick, but he didn't want to repeat that experience again to confirm or refute that theory.

"Dinner sounds splendid."

Hermione conjured a rug for the middle of the floor, with the Chinese wok filled with the beef-and-noodle dish sitting in the center. On the rug around the wok, there were cushions on which to sit while they sat on the floor and ate the beshbarmack Hermione had prepared, following Zhubanysh's recipe. This is how Hermione always enjoyed it while eating it over at the Potters' house, so she continued the tradition over in Hawaii in her new home as well.

As Severus licked his fingers clean, since it was a dish eaten with one's hands, Hermione asked, "Are you still up for trying the Polyjuice Potion tonight or shall we wait until tomorrow night, if you're not rested enough?"

Severus gave her a mischievous smile. "Feeling nervous?"

"Aren't I the one who is supposed to ask you that? This will be your first time as a woman to experience intercourse," she reminded him.

"Yes, but I've practiced with fingers."
"Fingers are not the same, I promise you that. Were they the same, I would not have made good use of the samples the twins gave me since you left, and even then, it is a poor substitute for the real thing. Especially you." She reached across the rug and squeezed Severus' hand.

Both of them stood there nude in the bedroom, holding their cups of Polyjuice Potion. Hermione was a bit nervous, since her first experience drinking it had resulted in her spending a great deal of time in the infirmary while Severus brewed a counter-potion to her half-feline state. Even he had been gracious enough not to bring up that embarrassing schoolgirl episode during their adult relationship.

After placing a hair from each other's heads into their respective goblets, they drank. They watched each other with fascination as they changed, as if watching a vision of someone else morph into a mirror reflection.

For Hermione, being so much taller was quite strange, as it gave her a slightly new perspective of the world. And what's more, Severus, now transformed into her, looked positively tiny by comparison when she was used to a lover so much taller and bigger than herself.

Severus was having his own existential experience, seeing his own body from outside his own. When Hermione smiled broadly, it startled him to see his own visage grin – and so unreservedly – while she was sheathed in his image.

With a tentative hand, Hermione reached out and stroked his arm, noting how much larger her hands were now.

Looking up at her, Severus remarked, "My God, I didn't realize how much larger I am than you." In his current smaller form, he felt more vulnerable and was in awe of the reversal of size, being used to being always taller and larger between the two. Now the roles were reversed and he found it a bit overwhelming as if he was Alice in Wonderland and had drank something he shouldn't have.

Hermione walked up to Severus and gently put her arms around him, similar to when he would wrap his arms about her. "Yes, but I find that I like you larger than me. I feel protected in your arms when you hold me, and nothing in this world can harm me when I'm enfolded within them."

Severus leaned into Hermione's chest, feeling the hard planes of it beneath his cheek. Yes, he could see the appeal of it, feeling as if he was a small child wrapped up in a parent's arms, but different. Slowly, his arms wrapped about Hermione and stroked her back, feeling the muscles beneath his palms.

Gingerly, Hermione stroked Severus' hair, seeing the pattern of swirls and waves atop his now bushy brown crown. Comparing sensations, she noticed how much softer Severus' skin was now in contrast to the masculine skin she now sported. She could understand how Severus would murmur how he loved the softness of her skin, now that she could feel for herself, using Severus' senses in this other body.

As much as Severus was initially aroused by the idea of switching places, now he found himself unsure how to proceed. He was even a bit intimidated, having to get used to feeling so small, now that there was another body in which he was in close proximity to. Size did not matter in terms of a witch or wizard being able to defend themselves with a wand, but something in the primal part of his brain let him know he was more physically helpless. He may now inhabit the form of a woman, but his mind and psyche were still those of a man's mindset. Now being smaller and weaker was quite unsettling to him, even knowing Hermione would never hurt him. He was feeling uniquely vulnerable.

Hermione was having her own mental adjustments to deal with. She was afraid of breaking Severus, as if he were now made of delicate china. Of course, in their regular forms Severus had used a firm grip on her while making love to her or snogging her senselessly, but now she understood the instinctual need to tread more lighter than before.

Stroking his face, she tipped his chin up. "Are you all right?" she asked, noting how quiet Severus was and not initiating much beyond hugging her back.

Severus nodded. "Yes, just getting used to this rather new perspective." She'd never told him how his chest hair tickled her much smaller nose.

Hermione kissed his forehead tenderly, willing to go slowly. She now understood why Ginny said to take things at a novice pace. While Hermione was not sexually attracted to women, she had to remind herself that this was still Severus beneath this softer form in her own image. They had both wanted to experience what it was like to be together from the other's perspective and to know what it felt like to make love.
She initiated the seduction, since it was Severus who had slowly seduced her with his soft and arousing touches that slowly broke down her walls and wended his way into her heart.

Severus closed his eyes, feeling the scratching of his beard and mustache against his forehead, cheeks and eye lids, wondering how Hermione could stand the feeling of rough hair scraping against her tender skin so much. But despite the beard distracting him, he felt Hermione's warm breath caress his face as soft kisses were pressed against his skin. Her hand stroked his cheek lovingly. He felt his heart begin to beat faster and his breaths become more rapid and shallow. His head was feeling just a little bit dizzy when she finally stopped.

Hermione pulled her face away from his and asked softly in a low rumble, "Was that all right?"

He could now understand how Hermione talked about how he could seduce her with his voice alone. It was deep, and – with Hermione's own cadence and inflections – reassuring and warm. "Yes," he breathed.

Turning his face up, he returned her affections, kissing along her neck and cheek, twining his arms up around her neck as she had done many a time, and playing with her hair. He began raking his manicured nails along the base of her scalp. He was pleased for his efforts when she sighed and tipped her head back, humming almost as if she were a cat purring contently with a good scratch behind the ears.

Hermione enjoyed the reciprocation, wishing that back in her natural state her hair would not tangle so easily in Severus' fingers. Then he could play with her hair in the same manner as he currently was.

Smiling, she turned her face back to look at Severus and examined her own face from an outside perspective. She could see the small dark mole at the edge of her jaw that Severus now sported, the various shades of brown in her eyes ranging from amber to chocolate, the arch of her own brow (noting she should pluck her eyebrows yet once again), the slope her nose, and the shape of her lips as Severus smiled softly up at her.

Hermione didn't know why, but she had to kiss Severus suddenly, with a swift passion. If anything, she wanted him to feel how it was to be swept away and lose track of time with one of his kisses.

Tightening her one arm around Severus, her other hand cradled Severus' jaw and tipped his face up. She claimed his mouth with a firm kiss, seeking permission to enter his mouth with her tongue.

It wasn't that Hermione had never initiated intimacies before with such a possessive kiss, but now that she was in his larger and stronger form, he could understand how she would swoon in the moment and talk about surrendering to him so willingly. He parted his lips and gave her permission with a teasing swipe of his tongue against hers, before her tongue entered his mouth with the growing passion that was matching the erection that was now growing between her legs.

Severus let one hand slide down her hard, flat chest. His touch skimmed along her stomach, grazing the soft ebony down until his hand gently took her now semi-erect length in his hand.

Just the sensation of Severus' hand on her length made her very suddenly aware of the spare appendage she now had, and how very damn good it felt for Severus to be touching her. Just the fact of Severus touching her made it very hard, quite suddenly.

Tearing her mouth away from his suddenly, she gasped, "Oh, fuck."

Severus smiled smugly, now glad that Hermione finally understood how his own body would react to her touch so urgently. "Yes, we'll get around to that in a little bit. But as we agreed, let's take it slowly at first."

Hermione was about to say something, but then stopped and then went to the bedside table, fetching something in the process. "Here, a breath mint. For each of us."

Severus gladly took one and popped it into his mouth. "That's fortuitous of you to think of that."

"Actually," Hermione confessed, taking Severus back into her arms once more as she sucked on her mint, "Ginny recommended them."

"You mentioned what we were going to do to Ginny?" Severus asked, a bit irritated Hermione had said anything to her friend.

"Well, they know you know about their own use of Polyjuice, so I asked for a few tips, should they prove useful."

"Which were?" he prompted her.
"Use breath mints and go slowly as if we were beginners, since we'll be using equipment neither of us are used to. And that was it," she answered him, talking around the mint in her mouth.

"Wise words, I must admit," he conceded. He was now not as peeved, since the breath mints idea was a splendid idea as he could taste the Polyjuice Potions still on her lips and especially her tongue when they kissed.

Hermione pulled Severus into another passionate kiss, feeling a bit more sexually aggressive now that she could bend down to capture his mouth – instead of trying to stand up upon her toes and sexually overpower him in her normal, shorter, and weaker form, if they were standing up. It was much easier to attack Severus with kisses if they were laying down or on the couch, but now she could scoop him up in her arms, and plant a firm kiss, pinning him for once up against the bed post.

Severus knew what she was doing, but that didn't stop him from wanting to make a game out of this, teasing her in the process. As Hermione's mouth plundered his, his hand went back down to grasp her member that had become hard once more and was pressing urgently against his stomach. Knowing all of Hermione's tricks, he began stroking her rigid cock, hearing her whimper with delight each time his hand slid down the hot shaft.

Wrenching her mouth away from Severus' again, with a strained gasp, she groaned, "Keep doing that and I will cum before we've even begun."

"And now you know how I feel," Severus said with a wicked smile.

Grabbing Severus' hands and pinning them above his head against the bedpost, like he was wont to do when he wanted to take control and slow things down or tease her mercilessly, Hermione said with a smile of her own, "What's the old trick? Think of Quidditch scores and aged Ministry officials naked?"

If Severus wanted to play this game, Hermione could as well, since she knew all the tricks Severus would use to put her into a frenzy quickly.

Keeping both of Severus' hands held above his head, Hermione held them at the wrist with one of her large hands and slid a hand down, grazing the inside of his arm until she reached his breast. Ignoring the silvery scar tissue, Hermione lightly stroked Severus' breasts. She was rewarded when Severus closed his eyes and sighed plaintively.
Hermione had played with her own breasts enough over the years so that she knew exactly what would feel good, and so she used a combination of her own and Severus' tried and true techniques. She eventually let go of Severus' wrists and began guiding him back on the bed, since it was easier than bending over to begin the next phase.

Reclining on the bed, Severus felt more at ease with the idea of Hermione and himself switching bodies. And when Hermione's mouth finally latched onto one of Severus' nipples, he closed his eyes shut and gently cradled Hermione's head against his chest as her mouth and fingers went to work on him. As much as Severus normally appreciated Hermione's attention to his nipples in his male form, he could definitely feel the difference in sensation from a female's perspective. No wonder Hermione praised him so earnestly on his attention to her breasts. Even now, he could feel the pull of sensation that went straight from his nipples down to that core now inside of him, low in his abdomen, more so than as a man.

Hermione wanted to press her now raging erection up along Severus' thigh and rock against it for some sensation of friction. However, she did not, for fear she would orgasm all too quickly, and all over Severus' leg like some over-eager teenage boy in a broom closet back at Hogwarts. But for Hermione, this was all so new, and for all intents and purposes, she was like a teenager by experiencing these physical sensations and urges for the first time.

Knowing that as a woman, it took much longer to arouse her than a man, and she wanted Severus to enjoy this instead of feeling the deep disappointment of it all ending so quickly like she had for years with Ron. So she decided to take the next step. Granted, there was the Sequoia potion she could take to give her an erection that would last for two hours, but they had decided to delay using that and try it naturally the first time, though Severus would take the Lubrication Potion so he would not have to experience the discomfort of dryness during intercourse.

Hermione's mouth began languidly trailing down Severus' stomach, her hand stroking his thigh, listening to the little gasps of pleasure, some in half surprise. Just as she came close to touching Severus between his legs, her hand skated away to caress some other part of him. It was all she could do to not laugh when she heard the brief huff of frustration when her hand was so close to brushing against Severus' labia before she trailed her fingers away. No doubt the ache between Severus' legs would begin throbbing soon, knowing how the body she was seducing would react.

Suddenly sitting up, Hermione grabbed Severus' foot and began to lick at his toes, something that had sometimes made her giggle and other times merely increased her desire, depending on her current state of mind. Taking his little toe in her mouth, she began to suck on it sensuously, running her tongue around it while looking at Severus with the same burning desire in her black eyes as when he would normally gaze upon her.

Severus watched, feeling the heat in Hermione's gaze. He returned her stare with an equally smoldering one, his eyes heavy with lust.
Inspired, Hermione trailed her tongue down the arch of Severus' foot. She was rewarded with a sudden squeal, since when she had licked Severus' arch in the past, he never found that particularly ticklish in his male form.

Severus tried to squirm away, but she had a solid grasp on his leg and foot. Fortunately, the tickling was brief and she continued on, trailing her tongue up his calf. When her tongue met the back of his knee, he melted, noting it was just as exquisite to experience that in the female form as when Hermione did it to him before.

"Oh, that does feel just as good," Severus noted aloud for Hermione's knowledge.

"I would lick your legs more often, but leg hair in the back of the throat can be annoying," Hermione confessed as to why she didn't do something more often to him herself. At least she shaved her legs earlier that day, so they were smooth for this little Polyjuice experiment.

Lying back down besides Severus, they went back to kissing. Severus snaked a leg up and over Hermione's hip and she in turn stroked Severus back, hip, and thigh with one hand.

Gently, Hermione pushed Severus onto his back and trailed a hand down to his thigh. With her other hand, she stroked the wavy tendrils away from his face while murmuring sweetly, "I want your first time to be everything mine wasn't."

"In what ways was it lacking?" Severus asked, already knowing the answer.

Hermione trailed her mouth to Severus' ear, nipping the earlobe with her lips as warm breath grazed his ear. "I want you aroused, and not nervous. I want you turned on, aching so badly, you have no reservations and can't wait to feel yourself being filled so completely."

It was not that these were foreign concepts to Severus. Hermione had often purred these words sweetly in his ear, as she licked his earlobes before, explaining how he turned her on to the point where she yearned so badly to be impaled on his cock, before climbing astride him and guiding himself into her. But now she was the one who would have to wait until he was ready and willing to accept her invading his female body.

As he mulled her words over in his mind, he felt her fingers brush against his curls and gently caress his outer labia. His body bucked and he took a sharp intake of breath, not realizing that in this aroused state how much more sensitive that part of the body was now. With an elbow, Hermione encouraged Severus to part his legs a little wider as her fingers began to slowly finger him.

And when her fingers first stroked and glided along his clit, he grasped at her shoulder and arched his back, now knowing the difference between masturbation and someone else's hands, from Hermione's perspective. Yes, he'd understood the difference long before between masturbation and the feeling of someone else touching you for decades, but these sensations were wholly new to him despite having explored them himself while Polyjuiced as Hermione before.

Hermione knew she was proceeding at the right pace, for when her finger slipped between Severus' lips, she felt that slick wetness seeping from his entrance, even without the Lubrication Potion. Sliding her fingers along his lips, she coated her fingers before she began to stroke Severus between his lips and along his clit.

Severus closed his eyes and arched his neck as Hermione began the slow pace of rubbing him just so. He sighed and made quiet noises, indicating that she was doing it just right.

Stopping momentarily, Hermione lifted her hand up to her lips and licked Severus' essence from her fingers, noting that in Severus' body, she tasted much sweeter than when she had tasted herself before. The musk of her own taste that she was not particularly fond of tasted different, something pleasant, and she could better understand why Severus did not mind the taste of her, in the same way she did not mind the taste of Severus' cum.

With her fingers now thoroughly coated in saliva, Hermione placed them back down between Severus' legs and gently probed at his entrance, kindly seeking non-verbal permission to enter him with her fingers. Severus looked up at Hermione and nodded, parting his legs a bit wider for her.

Hermione watched as Severus' mouth went slack and his eyes shut tighter as she slipped one finger into him, slowly moving it in and out. Knowing that her body had already been stretched and accustomed to the intrusion from that week's sexual activities, she introduced a second finger. She was rewarded with an appreciative groan from Severus, who looked up at her in wonder.

When Hermione arched her fingers just so as she tried to find Severus' G-spot for the very first time, she knew she'd hit jackpot when he gasped and lurched, shouting a quick expletive at the sudden sensation of those nerves being stimulated for the very first time.

For Severus, it was like Hermione had just stroked his prostate, and he was not expecting it to feel that intense. Looking up at Hermione with a sense of intense longing, he pulled her face down towards his and kissed her with a fierce intensity, spurring her on to keep stroking his G-spot, while her thumb began massaging his clit.

With each stroke of Hermione's fingers along that sacred spot, Severus could not hold back the growing rise in pitch and volume of his cries against her mouth. While normally not this vocal, he finally could understand why Hermione was.

Hermione mimicked the movement of her tongue with her fingers, something Severus had done to her many, many times before, building the anticipation of when his cock would finally enter her. She hoped he would respond similarly and be eager to feel her sink herself into him soon.

Pulling his mouth away from Hermione, Severus felt the heat in his lower abdomen begin to tighten more and more until a thrilling, floating euphoria swept through his body and he cried out, his back arched against the mattress and eyes shut tight. He had felt this before, when he masturbated alone Polyjuiced as Hermione, but this was far more intense and rewarding.

Hermione felt him clamp down around her fingers and could fully feel the pulsing and quivering of muscles, rippling in a pattern as if milking her fingers.

It was a short orgasm. Severus finally slumped back down against the bed, eyes gazing lazily at Hermione. She smiled down at him, stroking the hair from his face.

"And how was that?" Hermione asked, knowing what Severus' answer would be.

"Wonderful," he said, feeling a surge of energy return to him as if his first orgasm had recharged his batteries, something completely opposite of orgasming as a man, unless under the influence of the Sequoia Potion. Now he understood how Hermione would orgasm once and be ready and raring to go, as if that was just a warm-up.

"Good," she purred as she began kissing her way down his stomach once more, not stopping until she had her face squarely between his thighs. She hoped her first time at cunnilingus was going to be as deft and successful as her fingering of Severus.

After the first five minutes, Severus asked Hermione to stop for a moment. While Severus was enjoying everything she was doing to him, especially when her mouth latched onto his clit, he had to ask for a pause in the activities.
"Don't you find the beard a bit abrasive down there? I'm finding it a bit rough myself," Severus admitted.

"I'm sorry, I suppose I should be a little gentler since this is all new to you, but not for me," Hermione apologized.

Sensing that they were going to be talking for a while, Hermione climbed back up alongside Severus to entwine herself with him as they began discussing the pros and cons of Severus' beard.

"While I initially found the beard to be a bit scratchy on the skin, it is far softer than your five o'clock shadow, which was like being snogged with sandpaper, even between my legs," Hermione expounded.

Severus did remember that the few times he did not have time to shave in the evenings, Hermione did wind up having her cheeks thoroughly reddened by his scruff scraping away at her delicate skin. There was a definite pattern on her face and body where his day's rough growth scraped and abraded her. He had resigned himself to either shaving in the late afternoons only or shaving twice in one day. Even feasting between her legs she had complained about his day's growth.

"Maybe if you didn't keep it trimmed so short and let it grow out a bit longer, like another half inch, it might actually increase your beard's softness," she suggested. While Severus did not keep his beard so short as to have it look like a well-trimmed scouring pad attached to his face, he did not grow it longer and thicker like others did. It was neat and a respectable length, but should they do this again, then perhaps he should let to grow out a bit more.

Sitting up, Hermione suggested, "I have an idea since, it will be temporary for me."

"Stop laughing and hold still," Severus chastised her as he used his straight edge razor to scrape off her beard, after he helped her trim it as short as possible before shaving commenced.

Now devoid of facial hair, Hermione and Severus both noticed the very visible line demarcating where Severus' face had tanned since growing his beard last summer.

"Ginny was right, the beard does make my face more balanced," he remarked as his hand stroked the now smooth cheek Hermione now had.
"It's certainly a bit cooler without the beard," Hermione observed herself, before scooping Severus up in her arms and carrying him off to the bed like a captured princess about to be properly ravished. He didn't squeal as Hermione has done in the past, but he certainly made a noise indicating surprise.

Laying Severus back down on the bed once more, close to the edge, Hermione knelt on the floor as she placed her hands on his knees.

"Now," Hermione announced, trying to imitate the same vocal mannerisms Severus used when he was trying to do something sexual with her, but trying to inflect the academic tone into the situation as he would pretend to be disinterested, "we will have the alternate version of the experiment begin and thereby have a comparison with which to base itself upon."

Severus, sounding less authoritative with Hermione's now higher and more feminine voice, added, "A true experiment would also include the comparison to include the day's growth into the examination of this experiment, but as—" His words were cut off as Hermione dove back down between Severus' legs and began feasting on him, licking, sucking and devouring him as he had done to her so many times before.

"Oh fuck," was all Severus muttered before flopping on his back. He was enjoying Hermione putting her best efforts into making him orgasm once more by the work of her mouth alone, which she almost succeeded in doing, but not quite. Still, Severus' body was taut and thrumming with desire after Hermione brought him close to orgasm a few times.

As Severus tasted his own essence on Hermione's lips as she kissed him hungrily, he breathed, "I'm ready. I want you." He could feel the ache between his legs, pulsing in time to his own heartbeat, and he now understood that base desire to be filled.

Hermione reached across the bed and gave Severus a vial of the Lubrication Potion, and waited patiently until Severus nodded he was ready. She tenderly kissed his neck as the potion worked its magic on his body.

"How about you be on top, so it will be easier for you to control," Hermione suggested. She was afraid if she was on top in a missionary position, she might accidentally be a bit over-eager and hurt him their first time, despite her best efforts to be gentle in his male body.

Straddling Hermione, he grasped her cock and rubbed it around his entrance, spreading his wetness around the tip to ease entry. Nervous, but still eager, Severus moved his hips and felt the head of her cock slowly pushing into him. He rose up a bit and slid back down a bit more, feeling the sensation of being spread open. Moving once more, he rose up and then further down a bit more, finally taking the head all the way in.

Severus closed his eyes and sighed, lost in the sudden glorious sensation that always sent Hermione into a frenzy whenever he first entered her.

What he didn't notice was Hermione panting frantically, though the death grip she had on his hips was becoming more apparent.

Finally, Severus rose up and impaled himself fully on Hermione and gave a strangled gasp.

Having a highly sensitive and currently engorged sexual organ suddenly being massaged by a warm, slick tunnel of flesh that seemed to clasp it too perfectly – it was just too much for Hermione.

Hermione began to unconsciously buck up from underneath, this other body knowing more than what Hermione knew what to do. By the fourth full stroke, Hermione let out a scream as she felt a match had been struck within her body that washed over her instantaneously. Her balls tightened and she sat up and held fast onto Severus, feeling the seed inside of her pumping though her and into Severus.

After she flopped back down on the bed, Severus continued to sit astride Hermione and looked down at her, a bemused smile tugging at his lips. "Well, you lasted one more stroke than I did my first time. An admirable attempt," he said wryly.

Her heart pounding as if it would leap out of her chest, Hermione was suddenly awash in sudden exhaustion. "I am so sorry for peaking too quickly, but damn. Does it always feel that fucking incredible?"

Severus leaned down and kissed her chin, as it was one of the few places on her body not suddenly coated all over with sweat. "Yes, but thinking of Quidditch scores and naked Ministry officials does help delay the sweet inevitable."

Hermione laughed heartily, and it was a rich laugh using his vocal cords. Once her laughter subsided, she suggested, "Do you want me to take the Sequoia potion and give you a proper shagging, making you orgasm with me inside of you, since we're not going to be turning back for some time?"

Smirking, Severus crawled off of her and reached over for the box to fetch a vial of the male performance potion that would be running out about the same time as the Polyjuice. Holding the vial up, he asked, "Are you sure you're ready for this?"

Leaping forward and pinning Severus' female body to the bed, rocking her groin against Severus with a slowly returning erection, she countered, "Aren't I the one to be asking you that question? I want to make you scream as much as you make me. And it's a good thing that soothing salve is on the bedside table, as I want to shag you until you walk funny like you have done so many times to me."

Letting Hermione pluck the vial from his hands, he said, "You already make me walk funny after a long bout of fucking, I don't need to be a woman to do that."

"No, that's the walk of a worn-out man, not a woman who had ridden a broom on the wrong end all night long," she corrected him before downing the potion and feeling the effects hit her instantly.

With a slight adjustment, Hermione easily settled between Severus' thighs and slid back into him. She was able to take it much more slowly and leisurely this time, but was still overwhelmed at the feeling of having a cock and fucking her own vagina with it. Severus was urging her on as he learned to lift his legs and wrap them around her waist to open himself wider so she could go deeper.

After a few more rounds, and both getting used to the mechanics of shagging while inhabiting the body of the opposite gender, they decided to take a quick rinse-off in the shower, since Hermione had yet to enjoy the mind-blowing sensation of a good old-fashioned blowjob. And since the outdoor shower was one of Hermione's favorite new places to give Severus such favors, he decided it was as good a place as any for Hermione to have her first.

Smiling proudly, Severus wiped the pearls of white from the corner of his mouth, still kneeling before Hermione as she lay sprawled against the rock and wood of the shower enclosure as if it was the only thing holding her up.

"Oh, I have got to give you more blowjobs if they feel that good," she sighed. She also agreed that licking Severus' balls more often would also be on the "must do more" list as well.
"And that was without the prostate massage, which is similar to when I stroke your G-spot," he added as he rose and began soaping Hermione's body.

"And what do you think you might be doing more to me," Hermione asked, wondering what he took away from the evening's activities so far, her head still spinning a bit.

"A lot of everything, but especially if it arouses you to the point of that unbearable throbbing between your legs making you want to ride me like a wild witch on the wrong end of a broom all night long," he said with a humorous lilt in his voice.

Hermione gave a throaty chuckle and grabbed the soap from Severus, massaging his breasts with the bar until there was a lot of lather in her hands. She set the soap down and began playing with Severus' breasts, letting him enjoy the feeling of having his breasts played with the way he played with hers so often. His own hand grabbed Hermione's length and began stroking her, knowing the potion was still working fully when she eventually turned him around and had him brace his hands on the shower wall so she could take him from behind.

They kept it to the basics and did nothing too adventurous in terms of positions or other more advanced techniques, but that didn't meant they didn't thoroughly shag themselves rotten.

"I think I'm dead," Hermione grumbled lazily. She was barely able to focus on the ceiling in the dim light of the candles still lit.

"Yes, I think I can heartily agree with your prior assessment that a witch hasn't been thoroughly fucked unless she wants to fall asleep at badly as the wizard after sex," Severus said, the last few words changing in pitch suddenly, becoming much deeper.

Noticing the changes in their own bodies, they lay there quite still, both exhausted, as they reverted back to their natural forms.

Hermione dragged herself out of bed and forced herself to urinate to avoid a bladder infection, just in case. Sitting on the toilet, she brushed her teeth, since she didn't think she had the strength to do it while standing. Done with her hygiene needs, she stumbled back through the bedroom and collapsed into bed.

Severus was already snoring softly, so exhausted he was not even able to crawl under the covers before dropping off.
With her wand, Hermione extinguished the candles and yanked the covers out from underneath Severus' arse before they both settled into sleep, sheltered under the mosquito netting.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: As always, a round of applause to my wonderful betas, JuneW and Hope.

I found a Kyrgyzstan lullaby on Vimeo that has a similar feeling to the lullaby Zhubanysh sang to Hermione, and Hermione to Severus. While Hermione may not sing with the same sustained undulating and wavering notes, you can get a feel for the melody and tempo. Unfortunately, I do not have the English translation for this song: https://vimeo.com/120100453

Translations services for the lullaby performed by Hero Translating.
Chapter Summary

Hermione and Severus go out for drinks, where revenge is best served cold, with a twist of lime. Later, it's fantasy playtime in the tropical romantic getaway - NSFW FAN ART EMBEDDED TOWARD BOTTOM OF CHAPTER (Rated R for artistic nudity)!

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter One Hundred Eight
"Dark Eyes: The Maenad and the Satyr Rejoined"

Disclaimer:
Haiku disclaimer
Rowling owns Harry Potter
I however don't

Gary tapped his wand to the blackboard and asked Severus to read the haiku poem in Japanese.

Severus read aloud:

"Onyx, this gem-black night.
Downcast, I await your return
like the morning sun, unrivaled in great likeness"

"The correct phrase is unrivaled in splendor. When you paused in the middle of the last word, you changed the meaning," Gary corrected Severus, knowing it was a common mistake to make for those learning the language.

"Splendor," Severus repeated, pronouncing it correctly a second time.
"Excellent." Turning to Hermione, he had her recite a poem from her primer. While she stumbled over the words, putting too much inflection into her accent, he corrected her as needed, pleased she was advancing through her first-level language book so quickly.

Wrapping up the morning's lesson, they decided since the next day was New Year's Eve, and they would all be going to the ball, they would forego tomorrow's lesson and pick up on the following Monday. Due to the difference in time zones, lessons would be held in the evening in Hawaii, which would be morning for Hermione, back in London.

Once Hermione and Severus saw their Sensei off, both went back to bed for a mid-morning nap, still in dire need of recuperating from the Polyjuice Potion the night before. Fortunately, Hermione and Draco didn't have to be at the builders to finalize the designs until two in the afternoon.

To fill the time, Severus took Hermione to visit Blanche Condre, and the operations he was helping her run with her Miniature Man-Eating Masdevallia farm in her backyard.

Finally meeting the witch Hermione was initially jealous over earlier in the year, Hermione suddenly felt a bit foolish in retrospect. In person, Blanche was merely a business partner who had no designs on Severus, and she even made a slight joke about Severus' stern demeanor. He parried it with a quick and witty retort of his own that she took in stride, acknowledging there was some truth to his remark. All in all, Blanche was a rather warm and gracious witch, if a bit flighty and easily distracted, but bright enough she was becoming better at running more and more of the business on her own, requiring less time from Severus to help run it, though he was still vital to the company.

After visiting Blanche, Severus took Hermione on a tour of a few orchid farms, since she had mentioned wanting to purchase and bring back a few specimens for Albert's own greenhouses, where he dabbled in cross-breeding.

Once done, they Apparated back to town and had a quick lunch at the local Chinese restaurant before Hermione met Draco at the builders' offices one last time.

It was nearly five o'clock when Hermione came back home with yet another armful of rolled-up blueprints. She would pack them up and take them back to London for Lavender and her architect to look over before construction would begin.

Knocking on the front door as she opened it, Hermione called out, "Severus? I'm home!" It was a simple phrase that made her quite happy to hear herself say. It was a pity that it would be a long time before she could use that phrase on a daily occurrence.
Severus emerged from the kitchen while wiping his hands on a towel. "I was wondering how long you were going to be stuck at the builders' office. And did you, the builders, and the local building codes officials reach some sort of compromise that is workable?"

Hermione sighed heavily and dumped the tubes of rolled-up parchment on the kitchen table. She threw herself into a chair, tilting her head back to stare at the ceiling, her mouth slack while her arms hung limply by her sides. "After this afternoon, I think I am quite ready for a proper booze-up at Bongo's."

Since Friday night, the usual day Severus and the others met up for drinks, was the same night as the New Year's Eve ball, it was agreed they would shift their social drinking night one day earlier in the week to Thursday.

"Well, eat up, as no doubt Rainbow will try and order you something to knock you for a loop like she did to me to have her own bit of fun," Severus said, his voice a bit tight as he remembered the incident with lingering bitterness.

"Oh, she can't surprise me with a Wipe-Out, since Albert had Draco surprise me with that concoction already back in August."

Hermione began diving into various dishes Severus served up, using up the last of the leftovers. They planned to go out shopping Saturday, when Severus showed her the local farmers' market that would be open on New Year's Day.

"She will try and get Bongo to mix up something to make a fool of yourself, especially since she knows you're a Potions apprentice," he warned her with a growl. "It seems I'm not the first person she's done that to. She has pulled that little stunt, hoping to get new arrivals for sanctuary to spill their secrets, since Mounga won't tell her anything."

"Oh, I think I can turn the tables on her and get Rainbow to get a taste of her own medicine." Hermione gave him a smug grin of confidence.

"Oh, you think so? The witch is a Healer and can certainly know when she has been poisoned," Severus countered, wondering if Hermione really could pull it off. He put a forkful of chicken salad in his mouth and began to chew as he regarded his lover carefully.
"Oh, I know so. Care to make a bet?" Hermione proposed, feeling inspired to make yet another bet which was a habit of theirs when food or alcohol was involved. Betting seemed to be something many Potions masters and mistresses seemed to engage in often to add a bit of fun, as many of the challenge tasks at the monthly meetings related to either drinking games, betting games involving Galleons, rare ingredients in their stores, or favors. The two lovers had graduated far beyond just simple tea blends.

This was certainly a bet Severus would be happy to lose, should Hermione succeed. He almost didn't want to win, but pride demanded he win for the honor of claiming he did.

As they ate, they settled on determining the condition of the bet and how it would be decided who won by what certain objectives had been met. Severus remembered Hermione was the same witch who caused Marietta Edgecombe to this day to have terrible acne scars across her face that spelled out the word "SNEAK." Hermione had agreed with Severus it was rather unfair for Rainbow to try and slip something into Severus in such a public forum, and he wondered what her inventive mind had planned for the evening.

Once they were done with dinner, they shook hands sealing the deal, fed the cat, and went off to get dressed for a night of drinking and socializing with friends.

As Hermione and Severus walked arm-in-arm down the broad sheltered wooden boardwalk towards Bongo's, they could hear that the place was already jumping. Out from the bar came the sounds of two dueling cellos playing something fast and loud.

Hermione could not name the song, but it sounded like something familiar. Severus was thankful they were coming in towards the end of it, hopeful they would play something a bit less raucous for the next song.

As the pair entered the bar, Bongo called out, "Aloha!" along with some of the other patrons. Severus returned the greeting, with Hermione joining in a beat later.

"Severus! Hermione!" Mounga called out, his arm waving above the crowd as he saved them a spot at the bar since the place was rather packed that night, especially for a Thursday night. Some people were taking the next day, New Year's Eve, off as well and were starting their end-of-the-year celebrating that night.

Jerry was playing on the piano, of course, now that the dueling cellists were back to playing a cover of the standard jazz tune, "Take Five," along with the usual suspects. There was Maurice on accordion, Agnes on guitar, an Indian witch on sitar – Severus had met her only once before, Buddy who was playing his pair of tabla drums instead of his drum kit, plus a few others playing horns and stringed instruments.

"Welcome to Bongo's!" Rainbow said. She was a bit overly cheerful, her eyes flashing alternatively between gold and lavender, a sign she was obviously in a very good mood already.

"Double old-fashioned," Severus called out to Bongo, asking for his usual drink.

It was then Severus and Hermione turned around to spy Draco looking a little peaky. The blond groaned upon hearing Severus' drink order.

Ginny was sitting next to her husband, perched upon a stool while rubbing his back.

"Oh, my," was all Hermione could say upon seeing Draco looking still a bit green around the gills. Looking at his drink, she asked, "Is that just plain water?"
Draco nodded, his eyes slipping shut as he tried to be social, but he found the lights and noise a bit much. It seemed even with a vial of Hangover Relief down his gullet that morning, he was still not quite up to par.

Bongo came over to Hermione and asked, "What will it be for you, Hermione?" He knew who she was, having heard all the town gossip about the beautiful brunette Potions apprentice visiting who was mostly attached to Severus' side.

Before Rainbow could jump in and suggest something for Severus' paramour, Hermione leaned forward across the bar and put in her request, but Bongo said in reply as an invitation with a jerk of his head, "Why don't you come around and mix it up yourself."

Severus looked quizzically at the exchange since Bongo had never invited him behind the bar, but then again, he was not interested in playing bartender either. He was happy to have Bongo mix him up something to imbibe, remembering when Chuff forced him to play bartender at Potions master booze-ups he was dragged to.

Hermione ducked under the bar at the far end and made herself at home. With great interest, since no one heard what she requested as the band was playing loudly, Severus, Mounga, Rainbow, and Ginny watched, along with a few other patrons. Patiently, they waited while Hermione began grating ginger, reaming some limes, muddling some peppermint, adding some seltzer water and honey, and placing a couple slices of banana along the rim.

"Here, drink this," she said as she slid it in front of Draco, who looked at her balefully. "This is what I drink the morning after a night of drinking far too much."

Draco took a tentative sip and then suddenly brightened, his stomach now feeling much more cooperative. In his hangover haze, neither he nor Ginny had thought to drink the same chilled ginger-lemon iced tea Ginny sucked down in great quantities during her morning sickness months.

"Is this what Hermione fixed you this morning, since you seemed to have recovered quite nicely after yesterday's binge?" Draco asked, noting how Severus was looking hale and healthy.

Severus looked away, replying, "Hermione had other remedies she employed." He refused to divulge anything else since he did not want to confess his bout of vomiting nor the intimate moment of Hermione singing to him.

"So what are you going to drink, Hermione?" Rainbow said, unable to suppress the mischievous quirk at the corner of her mouth. "There's a little specialty Bongo serves here that you've probably never heard of."

Turning to Rainbow in a bright and cheerful tone, Hermione said with all the sweet innocence she could muster, "How about we play a little game that's a favorite at the monthly Potions masters meetings back in England I go to with my master, Albert?"

Rainbow's smile faltered a bit, her initial plan obviously foiled, but thought she could salvage the situation. "Sure. What's that?"

"'Guess what's in this drink.' You're a trained Healer, so of course this should be easy for you," Hermione said in a very complimentary manner to boost Rainbow's ego and create a false air of camaraderie.

Sitting up a bit straighter, her pride obviously catered to, Rainbow said, "All righty then. Let's give this a whirl. This sounds fun."

Mounga was about to jump into the game as well, but Severus caught his eye and gave him the most imperceptible shake of his head that no one else caught. Catching on, Mouna suppressed a smile and decided to watch how this would play out, curious to what Hermione had devised.

Hermione conjured a screen, just as she had in England when she played the game and was mixing, to make sure no one, not even Severus, could tell what she was doing. There was a flourish of activity as Hermione ground and minced and chopped, and poured from various unknown bottles she grabbed from the shelves behind her.

Severus did recall that Hermione had come out of their laboratory at home, tucking something into her pockets just before they left for Bongo's. He wondered what she was going to slip to Rainbow, but he kept his face a mask of mild curiosity so as not to tip the victim off.

When the activity subsided, Hermione flicked her wand and the screen disappeared. On the bar top was a tall, opaque tumbler holding an enticing libation garnished with various slices of fruits and a tall straw poking out of the top.

With two of her fingers, Hermione pushed it forward so it sat right under Rainbow's nose. She had a triumphant grin threatening to break through her detached demeanor.

"Name every ingredient in this drink, and you win," Hermione challenged, throwing down the gauntlet.

"What do I win if I name everything in this drink?" Rainbow asked before the game began.

"You name them all, I'll drink whatever you deign to throw at me," Hermione threw back, fingering one of the bezoars in her pocket. She then added, "But if you lose, you have to down the whole rest of the drink."

Now finding a way to have Hermione drink a Wipe-Out, Rainbow took up the challenge. She was sure she could win, having drunk most everything in this bar at one point. Of course, Rainbow had no clue that Hermione had brought a few things with her which were not stocked at Bongo's bar.

Sticking her nose over her drink, she inhaled. "Dark rum?"

Hermione nodded that indeed that was one of the ingredients.
"And?" she prompted her.

Inhaling once more, Rainbow added, "Almonds?"

"Almond what?" Hermione was surprised Rainbow wasn't more specific, for even she could easily discern the scent of Amaretto.

"Almond liqueur?" Rainbow said with some uncertainty.

Hermione nodded, willing to let her have that, without naming the specific brand. "Yes. What else?"

Severus was enjoying this immensely, watching Rainbow squirm while Hermione applied the third degree to her with this little drinking game, as more people were beginning to watch the exchange in earnest. Even Draco and Ginny were keenly watching, since they sensed this was going to result in something memorable which would be talked about for days later.

Unable to discern anything else by smell alone, Rainbow, in a manner like a finicky cat poking its nose about food trying to decide if it was good enough to eat, eventually wrapped her lips around the straw and drew her first sip.

Rainbow began giggling like a silly schoolgirl. She then hiccupped, with feathers suddenly coming out her ears, followed shortly by farting loudly, making the sound of a duck. The sound of her own flatulence only made Rainbow want to laugh only harder, not realizing she was the source of the amusing noise. She drank more, taking a few deeper draws on her straw, which resulted in more giggling and the announcement she was going to dance for everyone, followed by farting even louder, which sent her into more fits of laughing. Hermione could have included ingredients that would have made her sprout feathers all over her body and turn her nose into a duck's bill too, but she had decided to go easy on the witch who had tried to slip one on her lover.

Everyone else was laughing as well, but at her, not with her.

Mounga leaned over the bar, a bemused, yet puzzled look on his face. "Just what did you give her?"
Hermione shook her head and smiled with a hint of Severus' evil grin thrown in she had slowly begun to pick up. "Now, what sort of game would this be if I told you when she hasn't finished naming all the ingredients yet," she said with mock sincerity, gesturing to Mounga's wife who has now crawled up on top of the bar and was dancing rather enthusiastically to the tune that the band was currently playing. Other patrons grabbed their drinks off the bar in fear of Rainbow accidentally kicking them over in her obliviousness of her actions. They were covering their drinks with their hands so the feathers sprouting out of her ears wouldn't drift into their libations.

Mounga let out a long, tense breath, wondering how he was going to get his wife down off the bar, as she kept farting like a duck as she danced. People were now starting to move away from her, offended by the noise and not sticking around to find out if there was a smell associated with the loud flatulence.

Hermione looked over at Severus. He seemed to be immensely pleased, laughing freely at the entire scene. His laughter was nearly drowned out by the band which was beginning to morph their song into one befitting a burlesque show, with Rainbow gyrating her hips and still quacking like a duck out of her arse.

Even Draco turned to look at Hermione. He gave her a hearty thumbs-up at her choice of revenge of Severus' honor, knowing the Potions master had been long stewing over how to get back at Rainbow over that incident he'd never forgiven her for.

Severus turned to look at Hermione, his eyes glittering with delight, and mouthed to her silently, "I love you." There was a look of pure gratitude on his face as if he could not have served up this dish of revenge any colder or with more relish.

When Mounga noticed Rainbow was taking her cue from the band. They'd started playing a rousing and bawdy rendition of "The Mooche," a jazz song hearkening back to the days of burlesque and bathtub gin, and Rainbow was starting to unbutton her top. Mounga looked at Hermione, his facial expression telling her that fun was fun, but it was to end there. Hermione conceded it was fine, and she handed Mounga a bezoar, nudging her head in the direction of his wife.

Mounga coaxed his wife down from the bar and stopped her before she finished unbuttoning her top and anyone got a peek of her underthings. A few bar patrons made their displeasure known that the floor show was ending before it got interesting.

The band wrapped up their song, knowing the fun and prank had come to an end, with the drummer ending the song with a rim shot.
Mounga popped the bezoar into his wife's mouth and encouraged her to swallow it, which resulted in her immediately coming to her senses, unaware of what had just transpired.

Staggering back to the bar, Rainbow asked, "What the hell happened?" She was finding bits of down stuck in her ears and hair.

Hermione set her elbow on the bar and plopped her cheek into her hand, unaware Rainbow did the same gesture when about to dish out a heaping pile of sarcasm. "What the hell happened?‘ Gee, that's just what Severus thought when you slipped him that Wipe-Out drink his first night here in Malu Palekaiko."

Rainbow’s eyes went wide in the grim realization that her little joke – that she thought she had gotten away with – had come back to bite her in the ass, with interest.

"Don't worry," Hermione added, "I won’t make you finish the rest of the drink even though you failed to name the rest of the ingredients." She wiped her hands with a clean bar rag, and went back to sitting on the other side bar next to the wizard she felt obligated to defend against pranks that assaulted his dignity.

Severus wrapped a possessive arm around her waist and kissed the top of her head when she sidled up next to him. He murmured into her hair, admitting, "You won. And for the first time, I'm actually thrilled to lose to have witnessed that. Thank you."

Of course, Severus would ask Hermione what she had put in Rainbow's drink, but he would do that later. Maybe they could even make another wager if he could guess all the rest of the ingredients she’d brought from the lab at home, based on the behaviors Rainbow exhibited and the trail of feathers that now dusted the floor.

Hermione gave Severus a quick peck on the cheek in return for his flattering comment before asking Bongo for a 'Tall Cool Blond,' a drink Royston had introduced to Hermione and the other guests at the monthly social. It was a drink Hermione had lost on a round of 'Guess what's in this drink,' as it smelled and tasted like nothing more than lemonade mixed with soda. Since Bongo was unfamiliar with that drink as well, Hermione scribbled the directions down on a spare bit of parchment.

Her drink in hand, Severus asked if he could try a sip and said, "Is there any alcohol in this?"
"Oh, you bet there is, two-and-a-half ounces," Hermione assured him.

Severus was impressed, as the drink tasted quite smooth.

With Rainbow's pride stinging a bit, she was not quite as chatty as usual. The conversation between friends was mostly directed by everyone else in the circle for once.

Draco made to excuse himself from their circle. Severus and Hermione thought he was going to the loo, but were surprised when they heard Draco's voice coming from next to the piano with a Sonorous Charm so he could be heard above the usual chatter of the bar patrons.

"I would like to dedicate this song to two dear friends of mine, who have finally been reunited after a long time apart."

Draco turned to Jerry to speak for a second before the two cello players began with long and sweet notes that carried throughout the bar. He opened his mouth and began to sing.

"At last...
My love has come along,
My lonely days are over,
And life is like a song..."

Hermione could not contain her smile at the sweetness of this song being sung in her and Severus' honor. Partly embarrassed at all the attention, she turned her head and buried it in Severus' shoulder, feeling the tears pricking behind her eyes.

The bar patrons, some familiar with the story about how Severus had been pining for his love, gave a whoop and cheer.

Hermione lifted her head from Severus' shoulder to gauge his reaction as she listened to the lyrics intently. She found him with a smile beaming down at her, also seemingly moved by the song. She rested her head-on Severus' shoulder as they continued to watch Draco belt out a very soulful rendition of the song, capturing the euphoric sentiment of love finally attained.

Severus was surprised by Draco's song dedicated to them, and would have initially asked that he not draw attention to himself and Hermione. But the look of adoration Hermione gave him and her eyes brimming with tears of joy were worth it to suffer a bit of attention for once, as he sensed how his lover was moved by the moment as Draco sang on.

Hermione squeezed Severus' hand. He squeezed hers back even more firmly, his other arm still holding her even tighter around her waist. If the bar wasn't so cramped, Hermione would have asked Severus to dance with her right there and then.

"... You smiled, you smiled,
Oh and then the spell was cast,
And here we are in Heaven,
For you are mine at last."

The strains of the cellos and the rest of the band wrapped up the song while the rest of the bar erupted in a cacophony of applause, whistles, and cheers.

Draco gave a humble bow and walked back toward his circle of friends.

Hermione dislodged herself from Severus. She went up to Draco as he rejoined them, standing up upon her toes and placing a peck on his cheek.

"Thank you, Draco. That was absolutely perfect and lovely," she said, wiping away more tears and sniffing, finally grabbing a bar napkin for her nose.

"You can thank, Jerry. It was his suggestion when I told him what Albert and I were planning," Draco admitted.

Rainbow, deciding she had sulked long enough in humility, decided to rejoin the conversation and praised Draco. "That was just too perfect." Turning to Hermione, she asked, "Do you think we can get one song out of you, since you won't be back for a while?"

Hermione shrugged, feeling a blush creep up her neck. "I don't know. I'm certainly not as good as Draco." It was one thing to sing in front of a small group of people she knew in a private home with a few drinks in her at those monthly meetings. It was another thing to sing for a bunch of strangers with a band that was as good as any professional band, with everyone staring at her, and in front of Severus; she'd only sang in front of him once, the night before.
"Come on," Rainbow tried to coax her. "We even got Severus to sing for us once."

Hermione, surprised, turned around with a slightly stunned look on her face and asked, "You sang once?"

Severus frowned, irritated Rainbow brought that moment up, but nodded reluctantly.

"Severus has a really lovely voice. It's a pity he doesn't sing more often for us, it's quite deep and rich," Rainbow added, hoping a bit of praise would get him in the mood to sing once more.

"I am not a trained monkey meant to sing for your amusement," Severus said in his old stern and acerbic tone that invoked memories of him in the Potions classroom for his former students who were watching the exchange between the two. "But if you want me to sing, I know one song—"

"Oh, no!" Rainbow protested. "Not that depressing Scottish ballad about the wizard who went off to war and his bride who killed herself!"

"Oh, I know that song," Hermione volunteered.

She began to half-sing, half-recite the lyrics,
"A wizard called Eòin Greumson
Of bonnie Blackbriar Dornoch..."

"No! You're not going to sing that. Please pick a different song. Anything but that," Rainbow implored.

"Hermione does not have to sing if she does not want to," Severus reminded Rainbow, with a steely arch of his brow.

"No, it's okay, Severus. I'll sing, I just need a few more drinks in me to have the gumption to get up and do it." Hermione put a calming hand on his upper arm conveying she didn't mind being requested to sing, having one song in mind. She was hoping at some point to sing it to him in private, but now was a good a time as any.
Turning around, while keeping Severus' arm still about her waist, she asked Bongo, "Can I have three shots of vodka?"

Hermione was not the only one who needed a bit of Aqueous Intrepidity to lubricate her courage to sing, much like Niles and Braxton back home during their gatherings. Much to Severus', and everyone else's surprise, Hermione slammed the three shots of vodka down like an old pro and said in about five minutes she'd be ready to sing.

As Jerry and the rest of the band were finishing up a Dixieland classic done with some honky-tonk flair, Hermione turned and gave Severus a quick buss on the lips. "Wish me luck," she said as she detached herself from Severus' side. She wended her way through the tables and chairs up towards the piano where Jerry sensed that someone else wanted to sing.

Hermione could feel the vodka work its own magic on her, easing her apprehension of singing in front of a crowd and loosening up her vocal cords as well, which would tighten up when she was nervous and sober.

"You gonna sing?" Jerry asked her, leaning sideways to hear her better over the thrum of the crowd.

"Yeah. Do you know Ochi Chyornye?"

Furrowing his brow momentarily, he replied, "Is that also called Dark Eyes?"

Hermione's face brightened. "Yes! That's it. Though I only know it in Russian."

"You speak Russian?" Jerry asked.

"No, just the lyrics for this song." Hermione shrugged, wishing she did know Russian as that would be one language closer to her and Severus being reunited permanently.

They talked for a few moments longer, with Jerry asking how many choruses she knew and instructing Hermione that they would be doing some solo bits after the second chorus, and to watch his hand signal for when she was to start the third and final chorus.
Severus was wondering what Hermione was planning on singing. He knew the types of songs they usually sang at the monthly Potions masters meeting, some of them quite bawdy. Even he still remembered one ditty in German about a particular barmaid which got more lewd with each chorus.

Finally, Agnes on guitar, a violin player, and the cello players began playing a slow and rich melody, something which would make one think of Gypsies and Eastern European folk songs. Severus finally recognized the melody as Hermione was about to sing. Sitting there, he felt a warm flush race through his chest in anticipation, smiling to himself.

Hermione closed her eyes momentarily to muster her courage and opened them up to stare at Severus and Severus alone through the crowd, for this song was for him, regardless of the others who would bear witness to her singing her heart to him.

"Ochi chyornaye..."

Hermione's voice, with the help of the alcohol, made it a bit huskier. She sang the words slowly at first, matching the pace of the band, as she tried to make her voice sound sultry and succeeded. Jerry joined in with flourishes on the piano appropriate for that style of folk song.

"Ochi zhguchie,"

Mounga leaned over and asked Severus, "Is that Russian?"

Severus merely nodded.

"Could you translate?"

"Dark eyes, burning eyes," he replied, never taking his eyes off Hermione as she gazed intently at him.

"Ochi strastnaye i prekrasnaye
Kak lyublyu ya vas, kak nuzhnay vay mne
Znaty, ya vstretila vas v chas otechaynaya..."
Severus was mildly surprised, knowing she had changed the words to suit her situation and their story.

Faithfully, he translated for Mouna, Rainbow, Draco, and Ginny who were listening to both Hermione sing and the words in English.

"Passionate and splendid eyes,
How I love you, How I need you,
Truly, I met you at my most desperate hour."

Hermione could see his lips move and discern that he was translating for the rest of their friends who did not understand Russian like Severus.

"Ochi chyornaye, zhguche plamennay
I manyat oni v stranay dalynie..."

Hermione held out her hand toward him, as if reaching for Severus for dramatic purpose to accentuate the intent of her feelings, as they truly mirrored her own.

"Gde tsarit lyubovy, gde tsarit pokoy Gde stradanyya net, gde voyna v storone."

She closed her eyes, pulling her outstretched hand back to clutch at her heart, tilting her head back, singing the last line of the second stanza with bittersweetness.

As the band launched into the bridge, adding jazzy flourishes during short solos, Hermione opened her eyes to stare at Severus once more across the crowded bar, the beat speeding up and becoming something more lighthearted and contemporary. Some of the various musicians added their own virtuoso flourishes to their brief solos.

Still watching Hermione, Severus faithfully recited the latest verse for their friends, "Dark eyes, flaming eyes,
They implore me into faraway lands,
Where love reigns, where peace reigns,
Where there is no suffering, where war is behind us."
The band was beginning to wrap up, Hermione caught Jerry's hand movements to indicate the band was going to slow back down, and he let her finish the third and final verse.

"Ne vstretila b vas, tak stradala bay
Prozhila bay zhizny bez ulaybki
Ocharovali vay menya, ochi chyornaye
Podarili mne schastye navsegda."

With the change of a few words, Hermione had turned a song that was originally about the tragedy of a man falling in love with the wrong woman who tempted him far away to lead a life of suffering into a song that spoke about Hermione's longing to be by Severus' side and how he had brought joy into her life.

"If I hadn't met you, I would be suffering so,
I would have lived my life without smiling,
You have enthralled me, dark eyes,
You have given me glorious happiness forever."

The band wrapped up the song quickly with a short crescendo.

The bar erupted once more into a clamorous thunder of applause, cheers, and whistles, entertained by Hermione's romantic ballad. And while she was not the best of singers, she did a very good job, and her enthusiasm and sincerity she put into the song made it quite captivating to watch and listen.

Though most of the other patrons in the bar did not speak Russian, they understood the feelings behind the foreign words she sung.

Hermione smiled shyly and bowed timidly, making haste to rejoin Severus and their group. As she passed by one table, an old wizard reached up and clasped her hand, patting it, and saying in Russian – his native language, "Spasibo, spasibo! It's been too long since I've heard my mother tongue sung, and so sweetly. Spasibo!" He finished by kissing the top of her hand.

Hermione had no idea what the old wizard said, but saw the tears brimming in his eyes and merely answered with a humble, "You're welcome."

Severus pulled Hermione into his arms. He was sorely tempted to throw decorum aside so he could give her a proper kiss in appreciation of a song that was rather poignant. Instead he just cupped her jaw with his hand, his thumb caressing her cheek as he gazed deeply into her eyes.

Hermione thought her heart would stop right there, with the way Severus was looking at her right now, his eyes ablaze and full of love.

Before Severus could find the right words to convey how he was moved by her song and her heartfelt rendering of it, Rainbow barged in, interrupting the moment between the two lovers.

"That was absolutely fantastic. Well, with a few vocal lessons it would be an absolute show-stopper at the Suds, Sausage, and Sounds Festival, but that was really good!" Rainbow praised Hermione, in her own special off-handed way.

Hermione nodded and mumbled, "Thanks," under her breath. Looking at Draco and Ginny, she saw Draco give a serious nod of approval and Ginny smiling at her brightly.

The rest of the night passed along with everyone chatting amicably, with even Hermione and Rainbow putting the night's earlier foolishness behind them. Rainbow was gracious enough to take the lumps she had coming to her and never made mention of the earlier scene.

Towards the end, Severus and Hermione were matching each other drink for drink, with them eventually stopping long before they reached their limit.

Draco, who stuck to strictly non-alcoholic drinks like his wife, decided to call it an early night as he was nearly as exhausted as Ginny.

The Malfoys left first, with a reminder from Ginny about the hair appointment she'd made for Hermione, since the pregnant witch wouldn't be able to do her friend's hair for the ball.

Soon afterwards, Severus and Hermione decided to bid the Finaus adieu, waving at Jerry as they left Bongo's.

Sauntering slowly, the alcohol still coursing through their systems, they finally reached home.

As Severus opened the door, both almost stumbling in, their footing a bit off from the alcohol, Hermione asked, "I know you didn't want to sing for Rainbow when she asked, but based on her description, I would love to hear you sing once before I go back home. Could you sing something for me sometime?" she asked politely and as sweetly as she could without whinging.

Standing there in the middle of the living room, having not kicked off their shoes yet and as the unlit Christmas tree loomed in the dark recesses, with only the light in the foyer dimly highlighting their silhouettes, Severus wrapped his arms around Hermione's waist. He held her close as he looked down at her and began to sing.

"A wizard called Eòin Greumson
Of bonnie Blackbriar Dornoch
Was bid to fight the goblin hoarde
Rebellion rose an' duty call'd..."

Hermione gazed up at him, the faint light from the foyer accenting his hair and parts of his cheek, jawline, and nose. She was enchanted by the rich and soothing sound of his voice, which rang clear and true in a baritone register.

She stood there, enfolded in his arms, her own arms entwined about his neck, feeling the deep vibrations of his voice through his chest to where their bodies touched.

As he sang the fifth verse, tears began to well in Hermione's eyes.

"As Eòin came home, he found his bride
Light fading from her eyes
She thought she had join'd him beyond the veil
And pass'd to the other side"

She could only think of Draco's recounting of how Severus had nearly killed himself in some mad idea that his death would somehow protect her from any and all harm. She promised Draco she would not let Severus know she was aware of his intent when he'd flown out to sea on that dark and stormy night.

When Severus finished the seventh and last verse, tears were freely streaming down Hermione's cheeks. It was a maudlin song that was meant to evoke such strong and visceral melancholy.

Now done, Hermione buried her face against her chest and let the sobs come freely. "That was beautiful," she choked out.

Severus conjured a handkerchief for her and pressed it into her hand, kissing the top of her head. He wiped away his own errant tear that came forth, remembering how close to death he had come less than six months before. He silently wondered if Hermione would go on with her own life, had he died, or would she attempt to join him beyond the veil as well. He did not want to contemplate such morose and frightening thoughts.

Pulling herself together, Hermione hugged Severus tightly once more before lifting her face away from his chest to look up at him, though a haze of teary eyes. "Promise me," she said, her voice thick with emotion, "that when we have children some year, you will sing lullabies to our children with your wonderful voice. Promise me." She reached up a hand and stroked Severus' cheek.

He tilted his head and leaned into her touch.

Severus' heart was feeling quite full and contented at that moment. He merely nodded that indeed he would sing for their children someday.

Shoes kicked off, Hermione began rummaging around the ice box for something sweet to eat. "Severus? We still haven't cracked open that Fairy Brandy Draco stocked for us, or touched that passion fruit juice," she announced with clear intent of what she was insinuating. "And there is a bottle of champagne that is already chilled we haven't opened yet either. How does Passion-Fairy-Champagne cocktails sound?"

Severus came up behind Hermione to wrap his arms around her as she began arranging everything on the kitchen counter. Speaking in a very low and deep voice, the same voice he'd used to seduce Hermione on a few occasions, he said, "You'd better take some lubrication potion before we begin drinking any of this," remembering what happened when they drank Fairy Brandy.

Kissing the side of her neck, as he momentarily distracted her, he complimented her, "Your Russian pronunciation was very good, considering you have yet to begin learning the language."

"Well, I found that knowing Greek helped a little," she admitted. "Plus Niles was very helpful in working with my pronunciation and changing the lyrics."

"You never did tell me all the details of your Dionysus' Fever potion. Did you wear the garment made of fawn?" Severus asked, his hand snaking around to begin stroking her breasts through her clothes.

"Yes," she purred in kind as she began rubbing her bottom against Severus' growing erection, "but he charmed it so it wouldn't come off during the potion so I could retain some modesty as he observed."

"And what did you experience?" he probed, his breath a warm caress along her ear.

"After dancing with the trees, suddenly you were there, Severus the Satyr, with a beard and a very large and impressive erection, who chased me about the woods, or I him, until he caught me and ravished me quite thoroughly." She sighed and leaned her head back as Severus began kissing up her neck, both hands cupping her breasts from behind and slowly grinding himself into her bottom as she braced her hands on the edge of the kitchen counter.

She continued on with her tale as Severus listened, rubbing himself against her as she ground back. "When the twins gave me the portable tropical getaway, I can't tell you how many times I fantasized of you, as that satyr, chasing me about the enclosure, capturing, taking. So many times, I masturbated, dreaming of you in that lush getaway," she sighed.

"We still have yet to try out the one the twins gave me for Christmas," he suggested. "Perhaps instead of deer skins, you can wrap yourself in a pareo, and I'll do my best to fulfill the role as satyr."

Furniture was moved out of the way to make room for the tropical getaway. Hermione dressed in only a simple cotton pareo that mimicked she fawn-skin shift she'd worn in the way she tied it. After she drained a vial of lubrication potion, Hermione was ready.

Severus followed the getaway's instructions and opened his gift from the twins. It was very romantic, and the waterfall and adjoining soaking pool looked quite enticing.

Both holding flutes of champagne, passion fruit juice, and a full one-ounce shot of Fairy Brandy, the lovers clinked glasses and drank it down quickly.

Their pupils dilated and the chase was on. Hermione, familiar with the layout, ran off and hid behind a clump of bamboo plants, crawling on hands and knees. Meanwhile Severus quickly divested himself of his clothing and chased after her, his erection bobbing like the satyr's in "Come out, my little water nymph," Severus called out.

Hermione, still drunk before she'd even drank the champagne, giggled – which gave away her location.

"There you are!" he said playfully and dove for Hermione.

Squealing with delight, Hermione got up and ran. Severus got up off the soft grassy floor and ran after her.

To her surprise, Severus was quite quick on his feet and was far faster than she'd anticipated, even slightly drunk. The enclosure was only so large and there were only so many routes she could evade Severus before he eventually cornered her.

Backed into a corner, Hermione grinned madly, eager to have Severus take her, yet still wanting the chase to continue, her eyes darting to an escape route.

As she lunged and tried to duck past Severus on his left, he caught her. In the process of her attempt to flee, she dragged him and herself down in the process. Severus, now partially sprawled on top of Hermione, slowly climbed atop of her, pinning her arms down. Their eyes locked.

He growled dangerously, "You are mine." Severus quickly leaned down and captured her mouth with a possessive kiss. His legs quickly pried her legs apart, and he thrusted into her without preamble, shoving himself deeply into her. Hermione's desire, in conjunction with the potion, made her so slick he slid with ease.

Yes, this was very close to the fantasy Hermione had many times, though the real Severus was a bit more patient, but no less erotic than the one she envisioned alone.

She cried out and clawed at his back.

He moved his face down and his teeth clamped down on her neck, biting her in the process as he continued to savagely thrust into her. He growled and howled and grunted like some beast, and Hermione met his vocalizations sound for sound, her own guttural scream ringing through the enclosure.

"I'm yours!" Hermione cried out.

The alcohol that Severus consumed earlier prolonged the eventual release to come, much to Hermione's pleasure and benefit.

As they lay there on the grass, panting heavily, Hermione reached out and plucked a fragrant cream-colored puakenikeni flower from a nearby shrub. Rolling over onto her stomach as she lay next to him, she tucked it into his hair, behind his left ear. "Greek gods should sometimes wear flowers in their hair, especially my darling Himeroes."
"I thought I was a satyr," he questioned her.

"You are definitely as gorgeous as any Greek god to me. You are my Himeros and I am your Langia." Casting her eyes over to the enticing pool, she asked, "Care to slip into my waters, my lover?"

The Fairy Brandy was still having a strong effect as they made love once more in the pool. The water from the waterfall splashed across Hermione's breasts as she rode Severus with abandon.

After a leisurely soak to recuperate, Hermione crawled out of the pool. Severus, still feeling the Fairy Brandy coursing through his veins coupled with the passion fruit juice, could not resist the sight of Hermione on her hands and knees. He took her once more roughly from behind, much to her delight and satisfaction.

As they enjoyed a post-coitus cuddle, with Hermione propped up against a convenient, vertical grassy knoll and Severus resting his head on her lap, she pulled off another piece of Ginny's banana chocolate chip bread and popped it into Severus' mouth before enjoying a piece for herself. She lovingly stroked his forehead, which lulled him into a restful state of mind as he reclined against her.
"I think based on those romantic post-Renaissance paintings, I'm supposed to be feeding you grapes." Hermione tore off another small morsel of the sweet bread and held it aloft above Severus' mouth before he opened it. She gently fed him, letting his lips brush her fingers.

Severus merely hummed in passive agreement, feeling too blissfully relaxed to argue or debate that if the Greek gods had Ginny's banana chocolate chip bread, the paintings might have been rendered differently. He was lulled into this sweet other state of completely happy lassitude, and the loving touch of Hermione's hand across his forehead was just too perfect.

The music box was charmed to play something soft and restful as they lay there, enjoying their mini-secret rendezvous.

They both lay there in comfortable silence, both wishing the night would go on forever. For each night that passed was yet another day closer to when Hermione would go home, and this wonderful respite from daily life and realities would end.

Severus woke with a start, realizing they had dropped off while still in the tropical getaway. Nudging Hermione awake, he helped her up and put the lovely present from the twins away, appreciative they'd built something so wonderful for him and Hermione to enjoy. It was just as he'd always imagined it.

As they both drifted off to sleep in a proper bed this time, they were both still drunk; drunk on bliss and the euphoria of love.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Thanks and praise to my glorious betas, JuneW and Cygnuz.

There is fanart for this chapter: Hermione feeding Severus banana chocolate chip bread, both nude I commissioned, by Ulafish (http://ulafish.deviantart.com/), R-rated due to nudity, NSFW. It is done in homage to Jean-Honoré Fragonard's painting, “The Happy Lovers”

You can view Ulafish's modern day version of “The Happy Lovers” here: http://68.media.tumblr.com/b9469daf707019db19ddf64d5940b2b3/tumblr_inline_okk4sf0gor1tcck

And now compare to Fragonard's “The Happy Lovers” here: https://www.wikiart.org/en/jean-honore-fragonard/the-happy-lovers-1765?

utm_source=returned&utm_medium=referral&utm_campaign=referral
The haiku at the top of this chapter is an actual one written over 1,000 years ago.
_Onyx, this gem-black night._
Downcast, I await your return like the morning sun, unrivaled in splendor.
— Ō no Yasumaro (circa 711), loose translation by Michael R. Burch http://www.thehypertexts.com/Best%20Haiku.htm

I played around with an online translator. "Splendor": 素晴らしさ, becomes "Great likeness" if you put a space between the second and third character.

And in the spirit of the Suds, Sausage, and Sounds Festival they have alongside Oktoberfest in Malu Palekaiko where they play various songs, but in different styles, of course they would play something like heavy metal music with classical instruments. If you caught the song I was referencing when Severus and Hermione first arrived at Bongo's, you might have correctly guessed it was "Thunderstruck" by 2Cellos. Here is the official video for the song: https://youtu.be/uT3SBzmDxGk

"The Mooche" was composed by Duke Ellington and Irving Mills.

If you want the recipe for the Tall Cool Blond, it's a drink I developed for the Harry Potter conference, Leviosa, that was held in July 2016. The drink is actually called "The Draco." Here is the recipe, and it is a very smooth drink.

Image with drink recipe:
https://scontent.fsnc1-2.fna.fbcdn.net/v/t1.0-9/11109446_765835530200319_8069223161365822792_n.jpg?
The Draco

Ingredients:

2 oz Lemon-Lime Soda
2 oz Lemonade
1 oz Bacardi Dragon Berry Rum
1 oz Skyy Dragon Fruit Vodka
1/2 oz Triple Sec
Maraschino Cherry

Directions:

1) Fill highball or pint glass with ice.
2) In a shaker, mix all ingredients and pour over ice.
3) Garnish with a cherry.
4

Yes, I am thinking of Draco doing a very good impression of Etta James, but in his natural lower tenor voice. "At Last" was written by Mack Gordon and Harry Warren. http://www.metrolyrics.com/at-last-lyrics-etta-james.html
Chapter Summary

Hermione and Severus ring in the New Year, and enjoy tea at the Malfoys'. Then it is time for bittersweet partings.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

Chapter One Hundred Nine
‘Dreams Can Come True’

Disclaimer: Rowling owns Harry Potter, the universe, and most of the concepts in this fic. She just lets me play with her things, and neither a brass Knut nor Muggle brass farthing are being made by me.

Hermione was applying her lipstick last. She was using one of the other bathrooms in their home, since she and Severus had agreed to separately dress and prepare for the ball. It was partly to surprise one another, and partly so they would be able to be ready on time by keeping their hands off each other.

She had heard Severus pacing about the foyer, no doubt waiting for her.

Turning her cheek to one side, she was glad that she was able to completely heal up that scratch from the bougainvillea she got when she decided to give it a thorough trim job. Severus' healing paste was an improvement of the one he'd helped Lavender develop to heal up fresh acne scars.

Hermione and Severus had spent the day engaged in domestic bliss of the mundane kind, doing laundry, cleaning, gardening and such, besides the odd roll or three in the hay. It was nice for Hermione to get a peek of how daily life would play out on the weekend when neither of them had to be at work and they could be together in a regular every-day kind of way.

And now they would be going out mingling with other couples in public at a social function.
Hermione's mind briefly flitted back to the Ministry Ball, and she wondered what would have been the reaction had she shown up at the Halloween masked ball on Severus' arm instead of Ron's. No doubt she would have had to divorce Ron by that point, and Severus' alternate Delgado persona was far older and obnoxious, but at least she could have danced with him in public instead of watching him from across a crowded room, feeling lonelier than ever.

Closing her tube of lipstick, she tucked it into the discreet charmed pocket on her snugly fitting blue halter dress. She checked one last time for her wand before going to meet Severus in the foyer for an evening of dinner, dancing, and frivolity.

Glancing at the clock on the mantle, he knew they were not running that late, but the clock had already struck seven and the ball had officially begun. Dinner was not going to be served until eight, but he hoped she would not dally much longer.

Hearing the thump of her heels on the wooden floor signaling her approach, he took his place in the foyer, ready to greet the love of his life and escort her to the ball.

As she emerged from the stairwell, Severus felt his breath catch in his throat. Each time he saw Hermione dressed up, he did not think he could imagine her any lovelier, yet she was. Her hair was done by a local beauty parlor, and these locals knew how to deal with wavy and curly hair that few back in England knew how to tame and style flatteringly, with the except of Ginny. It was piled up and off her neck with large soft curls, and a small cluster of white plumeria was set in her artfully arranged curls, on the left side. Her royal blue halter dress showed off her figure, and the accent of the sapphire necklace and earrings just completed the ensemble that made her a vision in blue.

She slowly walked toward Severus with a shy smile upon her lips, her hand nervously adjusting the jeweled necklace one last time before she stopped before him.

Finally finding his voice, he bowed deeply, purring in his deepest and most seductive voice, "Madam, never have I seen a more enchanting vision as you. I am your servant."

Hermione felt the blush suddenly flood her cheeks. She had seen the way Severus stared at her and knew he was not exaggerating in his praise. She briefly curtsied.

"Thank you, sir. And may I say you are looking quite dapper and elegant yourself," she complimented him.
Severus was dressed in his habitual formal long black frock coat with high-necked collar, and black trousers and boots, but given he'd recently had them tailored and altered, they fit his trimmer and slightly more muscular frame to a tee, showing off his form in a most flattering fashion.

Severus turned and extended his arm. "Shall we?"

They strolled into the community center that had been transformed for the event. Severus handed the two tickets over to the maître d', who bowed briefly before showing them to their table. Severus let go of Hermione's arm only when the tables prevented them from walking two abreast, and allowed her to go before him.

Hermione glanced about noting they had completely cleaned up and reset the community center. There was an earlier New Year's Eve Ball that day held for the teenaged set on Malu Palekaiko, with a balloon drop and a live Wireless Wizarding Network feed from Times Square in New York City. The event finished up at 6:15 pm., since it was a six-hour difference between Hawaii and New York. While Hermione was getting her hair done at the salon earlier, she could hear the loud thump of a whole lot of bass as wizard and Muggle rock and dance music blared.

Once at their table that sat eight, Severus pulled out Hermione's chair.

Draco and Ginny had made all the arrangements regarding seating. Severus and Hermione were both surprised to find Pat Vallier, Severus' office manager, already seated at the table, along with a young wizard.

"Severus, I'd like to introduce you to my son, Orin. He came out to spend a few days and visit from Dallas, Texas." Turning to her son, she said, "This is Severus Snape, my boss."

Orin rose and reached over, offering his hand, "A pleasure, Mr. Snape. My mother has said nothing but good things about you, a vast improvement from some of her previous employers. I'm glad she's happy working for you, and she's not quite as stressed anymore."

"Orin! Shh!" Pat gave her son a stern stare. "We're not here to disparage others who cannot speak in their defense, and those incidents are not to be repeated publicly. Besides, it's in the past, and that is drama I no longer have to deal with. Let's keep to pleasant conversation and avoid topics not fit for the occasion."
"Your mother is a wise woman, which is why I am glad to have her and her common sense in my employ," Severus said to the young wizard. Turning, he said, "And this is Hermione Weasley."

Hermione and Severus never did iron out how they would introduce each other in public, as the term companion had a coldness about it, lover seemed salacious, and girlfriend/boyfriend was certainly sophomoric. They weren't formally engaged, so the term fiancée/fiancé would send tongues wagging once more, and Hermione would be deluged by every witch at the ball wanting to harangue her for details about how Severus proposed to her, why didn't she have a ring yet, when the wedding date would be, and other such nettlesome nuisance neither wanted to deal with.

Hermione rose partially out of her seat and briefly shook Orin's hand. "It's a pleasure, Mr. Vallier."

"Weasley? I notice by your accent that you're from England," Orin noted.

'Well, that's a first. Someone guessed the country correctly,' Severus noted.

"Yes, I'm visiting for the week as well before I return to London on Sunday," she volunteered.

Leaning forward, Orin asked, "You wouldn't happen to be related to Ron Weasley, the Quidditch player?"

Hermione mused to herself that no one besides the most loyal and die-hard Chudley Cannon fans would have known the name Ron Weasley over a year ago. Now that he was first-string Keeper and had his face and body plastered all over that calendar, it seemed that nearly everyone had heard of him.

Placing a soothing hand on Severus' knee under the table, for she could almost hear the grinding of his teeth even with the band on the stage playing, she replied, "That would be my ex-husband."

Orin had the grace to look abashed. "I'm sorry if I caused any embarrassment by my question."

Hermione nodded her head in acceptance of his apology and added, "It was an amicable split and is long behind me."
Before an awkward silence could descend upon the table, Draco and Ginny showed up.

"Sorry for being late, but Ginny was attacked by a rather vicious nap and would not yield until she rested enough," Draco said in jest as a way to excuse their tardiness.

"Yes, quite sorry," Ginny added, stifling a yawn as Draco pulled her chair out and helped her into her seat. He gave her a strong arm to hold on to while she lowered herself carefully into her chair.

Pat introduced her son to the Malfoys, finishing up just when Jerry and his date showed up.

Jerry had brought Svetlana as his date to the ball. She was the same witch who, along with Justina, Antonia, Tina, and Miyuki, were in hot pursuit of Severus when he first arrived on the island until many of them had long given up or had heard the nasty rumors from Maria about his sexual performance.

It seemed Svetlana had glommed onto the current most eligible bachelor on the island, since Severus was definitely not on the market.

Hermione thought the blonde witch on Jerry's arm was quite pretty, but did not understand why she was glaring down her nose imperiously at Hermione and looking her over with great scrutiny. It then struck Hermione – remembering Ginny's tale that Severus had been the hottest thing on the island, and several of the witches were trying to snag Severus for themselves – and she correctly surmised Svetlana was probably one of those witches. Ginny had told her about how Severus has spurned their advances, much to their consternation, so Svetlana was probably trying to figure out what Hermione had that she didn't in order to land Severus herself.

With great grace, Hermione introduced herself to Svetlana, who seemed to melt her icy attitude towards Hermione a bit.

Now that everyone was at the table, Severus suggested that the gentlemen should fetch drinks for their female companions and themselves.

When they returned with refreshments, it seemed all the witches were chatting amicably. Sitting down, Hermione leaned sideways and asked very quietly, doing her best to remember and parroting what she heard in Russian, "Severus, what does 'Maria said he is small and soft like a little worm. Is that true?' mean?"
Fortunately, Severus had not sipped his drink, for surely he would have choked on it. Sitting up with his back ramrod straight, he glared at Svetlana with a look that could freeze even the hottest fires in hell.

Hermione didn't know what she repeated, but it must not have been good for Severus to give the blonde witch that look he only reserved for those that had truly raised his ire.

"Mr. Smokski," Severus said addressing Jerry, but his eyes still glaring at Svetlana, "please instruct your companion that such comments are not appropriate nor welcomed."

Jerry turned on his date and asked with a mixture of confusion and accusation, "What did you say?"

Svetlana shrugged, looking flustered as she feebly explained, "It was a little joke. I thought Hermione-nonny spoke Russian since I heard she can sing in Russian."

Ginny cleared her throat and said, "Well, Pat and I don't speak Russian, and neither does Hermione, so if it was a joke, we certainly missed the punchline."

Svetlana glared daggers at Ginny. "I don't have to take that talk from a fat korova like you."

Even Draco knew enough Russian to order from menus to know that she just called his wife a fat cow. Rising from his seat, his jaw clenched, his hand twitching to go to his wand and hex this offensive cunt across the Pacific and back, Draco hissed, "Jerry, I suggest you remove Miss Pushkin from our table and sight otherwise Rainbow will be spending the rest of the night reversing some rather unpleasant curses."

"That's okay," the Russian witch spat, "I wouldn't want to spend the rest of my night with a bunch of..." Before she could find the right word in English, she stormed off, muttering "Oslayob," under her breath.

Severus thought about saying to her retreating back in Russian that she would know better than him about such matters, but decided that probably would be a breach of the Potions master's code of ethics, since that might let others know about her possible proclivities. He had his suspicions. One thing was for certain, the next time Svetlana came to him for a commission to take care of a small and delicate matter regarding some peculiar tenderness she had obtained through unnamed means in one particular area of her body, he would refuse. Instead, he would send her off to Arnold, in which case she would balk and suffer, or pay him the commission and risk him telling the island just what she got up to in the privacy of her own bedroom, or maybe it was the barn.

"I am so sorry. She seemed like a nice person, but there is a bug up her ass evidently. My apologies." Jerry ran a hand through his hair, puffing out a breath of air, glad that at least it did not come to wands being drawn.

Draco sat back down, now assured Svetlana was not going to be a problem for at least a little while, as he watched her retreat back over to the maître d’, no doubt to ask for a different table to be assigned to.

When planning the ball with the town council members, Draco had prepared for such an instance. There were indeed a few spare tables off in the far corner, which she was escorted to. Hopefully, she would stay out from underfoot the rest of the night.

For part of the cocktail hour, Hermione and Severus circulated around the room, where he was able to formally introduce her to other members of the community she had not yet met.

"And this is Mr. Loddy," Severus said, introducing the free elf.

"Congratulations on your recent election to town council member, Mr. Loddy," Hermione greeted him, bending over a little to shake his hand.

"And you must be the indomitable Miss Granger, or is it Mrs. Weasley, forgive me. Some of the elves that live here now in Malu Palekaiko made it here after you freed so many of them from service during the war with You-Know-Who. They still refer to you so fondly by your maiden name," the elf explained.

"Call me Hermione, please," she insisted.

Severus, Hermione, and Mr. Loddy conversed for a bit before Mr. Loddy made to excuse himself to speak to a fellow town council member regarding something that was not quite fully resolved at the last meeting.

When a vampire and his half-human/half-goblin wife spotted the lovely witch on Severus’ arm, they walked up to the couple.
"Why, Severus, who is this enchanting vision that you are escorting?" Dariusz asked. He took Hermione's hand and bowed low before her, keeping his lips, and fangs, politely away from her instead of kissing her hand.

Hermione knew a vampire when she saw one, but was surprised there were any in Malu Palekaiko.

"May I introduce Hermione Weasley. And this is Pan Dariusz Król and his charming wife, Glomp," Severus said, using the Polish honorific for the vampire, indicating his place of origin.

"Very pleased to meet you both," Hermione said. She curtsied briefly to Dariusz and Glomp, noting that they were probably far older than her and from Europe, so formality should be employed.

"Quite charming," said Glomp in response upon observing Hermione's manners and grace.

"Dariusz and Glomp have a farm on the north side of the island, and raise some of the finest pork in the Hawaiian islands," Severus informed her.

This surprised Hermione even more than discovering a vampire in Malu Palekaiko – that a vampire and a half-goblin would be involved in raising livestock – but she figured that it was probably a venture that suited them both. They discussed some matters regarding the building of the new school, since Severus was on the Board of Governors, before Dariusz and his wife excused themselves.

As they were leaving, Dariusz paused and leaned over and said in parting, "Oh, Severus, that last batch? Just perfect. No need to make any more adjustments."

Severus nodded and the couples went their separate ways.

Hermione was curious as to what potion Severus could have supplied the vampire or his wife. However, she knew from her thorough study of her code of ethics tome that it was a private matter that was none of her business, and she did not question Severus about the parting comment.

On their way back to their table, Hermione finally had a chance to meet Ranjit.
Severus cleared his throat before introducing the pair. "Hermione, I would like to introduce you to Ranjit Singh, a fellow Potions master. Ranjit, I would like to introduce you to Hermione Weasley, Potions apprentice."

"Madam Weasley, it is a pleasure to finally meet you. I'm sorry I have not stopped by to introduce myself sooner, but I usually spend the week between Christmas and New Years in quiet meditation in order to clear my mind and spiritually recharge my battery, so to speak," Ranjit said with a formal bow to her.

"I'm here visiting Severus for a similar reason, to take a break from my apprenticeship – mostly – in order do the same, so I completely understand, Mr. Singh," she assured him.

"Have you had a chance to meet the other Potions master here in Malu Palekaiko, Arnold Ogawa?" the Indian Potions master asked.

"No," Severus answered on her behalf a bit curtly.

"Still not speaking to Arnold?" Ranjit asked, an amused lilt in his voice.

"His issue is with me, not I with him," Severus sneered, lifting his chin up a bit as when he would get that certain air about him when vexed. "He thinks I poached his assistant and companion. I refute his assertions. For the fact he refuses to speak to me and continues to sulk like a petulant, pouting, pubescent prat is his problem, not mine. I am open to resuming lines of communication between us when he realizes the folly of his accusations and ceases making such charges."

Ranjit rolled his eyes while sighing. "Well, knowing Arnold's pride and his temper it looks like that won't happen any time soon." Turning to Hermione, Ranjit apologized, "I'm sorry that it looks like you won't have a chance to meet Arnold during your trip, but when these two are no longer bickering perhaps you'll have a chance to meet him on your next trip."

Hermione said she looked forward to spending more time to chat on her next visit to the island, before she and Severus continued walking back to their table.

They returned to their seats just as dinner was being served.
It was a limited menu with a choice of two salads to choose from, two soups, and a choice of either the seafood, chicken, beef, pork, or vegetarian dish for the entrée.

Of course, with the price of admission to the event, all food and beverage was included.

When Severus said, "Pork presented three ways," the dish appeared right in front of him. It reminded Hermione of when she'd ordered food at the Grand Royal Supper Club and it suddenly appeared.

Severus could tell Mario was behind the creation of that night's menu, based on his particular flare, but noted that Mario was one of the guests enjoying the evening's festivities. They had spoken to Mario earlier that night; he'd informed them that he'd let his regular kitchen staff, along with some elves he hired, cook and serve so he could enjoy the night off.

On Severus' plate was slow-braised pork cheek served with a Mexican mole sauce, pork shoulder wrapped and steamed Hawaiian style with cabbage leaves, and pork belly prepared Chinese style.

Hermione ordered the Rock Cornish Game Hen stuffed with a wild rice pilaf.

During dinner, Orin told tales about adjusting to life in Dallas and how there were some things he missed about Chicago, and some things – like the miserable winters – he certainly did not miss. There was some talk regarding Hermione's apprenticeship, how Severus' business might be affected with the opening of the school with less tutoring and more commissions making up his business, and Ginny having one of her more advanced students take over belly dance classes while she recovered after the children were born, as well as a variety of other topics.

Once dinner finished, the plates disappeared off to the kitchen in the back of the community center.

Mounga was up on stage. He had been sitting at another table with his wife, Rainbow, his eldest daughter, Akela, and her beau, Tristan, who had given Akela tickets to the New Year's Eve Ball as her Christmas present. There were also other town council members and their spouses at their table. The town judge and town council member was now standing on stage with his wand to his throat performing the Sonorous Charm.

"Good evening everyone, aloha!"
The crowd responded in typical fashion, with Hermione picking up the cue that she was to say "aloha" back with the rest of the crowd.

"I would like to welcome you all to the first formal New Year's Eve Ball for Malu Palekaiko," Mounga continued. "At this time I would like to thank Mr. Draco Malfoy for his wonderful suggestion to the town council for such an event, and his invaluable knowledge and help in organizing this affair," Mounga announced, gesturing with his hand toward the aforementioned wizard.

Draco stood and waved, bowing slightly before sitting back down once more as people applauded – some politely, some with more enthusiasm.

"You suggested the ball?" Hermione asked quietly, leaning closer towards Draco.

Speaking just low enough for her and Severus to hear, he replied, "Well, Severus was complaining how he did not have the chance to dance with you at the Ministry Halloween ball at all, and how it was wholly unfair Weasley did. So, when Albert and I planned to bring you here, I figured this was a chance to rectify what Severus called an injustice."

Severus knew of Draco's involvement with the planning of the ball and his plan for them to attend it together. It certainly explained why the younger wizard had asked Severus about the favorite songs he and Hermione had danced to since his return from India.

"Thank you," Hermione said gratefully. She patted his hand before going back to listening to Mounga, and rubbed Severus' upper arm briefly.

Others stood up and bowed, upon being recognized for their efforts to bring together all the planning needed to make the ball happen. There was the flash of a camera bulb here and there as the photographer from The Daily Times & Tides was there.

Mounga kept his remarks brief and wrapped it up shortly by introducing the main act, who would lead the band already on the stage. "And now I would like to present to you, straight from San Francisco, Tommy and his Two-Bit Strung-Out Pluckers!"

Hermione turned to see Severus' face fall. He nearly reared back like a skittish horse.
Draco tapped Jerry's arms rather firmly, nearly grabbing him by the arm and said loud enough for even Hermione to hear, "You said you were going to book an old friend from Juilliard – piano school – whatever, who got his wizarding school letter a year before you!"

"Yeah, Tommy and I are old friends. We go way back. Why, is there a problem?" Jerry asked. He was confused as to why Draco looked a bit stunned and Severus like he had been slapped across the face with a ten-pound mackerel.

Draco shook his head, indicating it was not a problem. Looking back over his shoulder at his mentor, he rolled his eyes and gave him a meek look of apology and a shrug that what was done was done.

"Severus? Is there a problem?" Hermione asked diplomatically.

Pinching the bridge of his nose, he leaned over and quietly whispered into Hermione's ear, "When I was fleeing Polyjuiced as you, we stopped in San Francisco. Tommy was rather blatant as he tried to come on to me and played various songs, no doubt in an attempt to woo what he thought was a female back to his bed that night."

Hermione pulled back from Severus to gauge if he was serious or not, but given his reaction, there was no doubt to the veracity of his story. Unable to help herself, she suddenly burst out laughing, imagining Severus there, in her image, scowling at Tommy who was trying to pick him up.

"I'm so sorry, Severus, but that is kind of funny," she said, then amended quickly when Severus didn't smile, "well, at least from my perspective."

They were going to start out the dancing part of the ball with a waltz, as the large card by the edge of the stage indicated what the next song would be.

Severus, figuring that Tommy would most probably not recognize Hermione, and there were plenty of other witches he could flirt with that night, deemed it safe to take her out on the dance floor. Standing, he held out his hand and said rather formally, "Madam, may I have the first dance of the night with you?"

Before Hermione could reply, Pat piped up with the comment, "See, Orin? That's how it's done. Maybe you'd have a nice girlfriend by now if you employed better manners like that."
Ignoring the familial bickering, Hermione placed her hand in Severus’ and said, as he helped her rise, "I would be delighted, Mr. Snape."

Draco turned to his wife. With a fleeting look between them, he gauged her willingness to dance in order to avoid embarrassing her, before he rose. "Mrs. Malfoy, would you do me the honor?" He extended his hand, and she placed her hand in his before she proceeded to leverage herself up out of her seat as gracefully as she could, with her husband helping. The Malfoys followed behind Severus and Hermione to the dance floor.

"Maybe I ought to have sent you off to England for those etiquette lessons instead of letting your Aunt Harriett teach you," Pat nagged her son gently before dropping the subject.

Severus bowed to Hermione, and she curtsied in kind. Hermione had not curtsied so much since the Yule Ball in her fourth year.

Tommy and the whole rest of the band began with a very brief intro before the sweep strains of a quick-paced waltz began. It was a wizarding Viennese waltz, which was only slightly different from a Muggle Viennese waltz in that there was a short extra beat added after four, eight, or sometimes sixteen counts of three. The extra beat signaled a change in direction of dancing and spinning from one direction into a reversed direction.

Spinning around in Severus' arms, Hermione felt on top of the world. Severus was looking quite dashing, his hair even pulled back into a queue, looking as if he could fit right into a formal Viennese wizards' ball or something straight out of the Regency era. She was deliriously happy, as she had longed to dance with Severus in public, and here they were in the midst of a crowd twirling about as if they were in some grand romance novel where he would sweep her off her feet. Hermione had already been swept off her feet by Severus and she was floating, dancing as if on a cloud.

Severus spun Hermione about, his posture perfect and straight, his chest puffed with pride as he danced with the most lovely witch at any ball that had ever been held. And while he knew it was romantic nonsense and sentimental drivel to think such a thing, it certainly felt like it was an absolute fact. For once he let himself be carried away with such a thought by this glorious night of Hermione on his arm, looking magnificent, a picture of poise and refinement, and gazing at him with pure adoration and radiating love directed solely toward him and him alone.

As the first song came to an end, Severus spun Hermione about under his arm before they ended with him bowing and her curtsying once more.
Draco and Ginny excused themselves from the dance floor, Mrs. Malfoy only having so much stamina and lung capacity with triplets battling for space in her abdomen. As they walked back, the one hand that wasn't holding on to Draco's arm was moving a silk fan back and forth furiously to cool the overheated witch.

The next song was a moderately-paced foxtrot. Hermione and Severus danced, moving about the floor, with him leading in order to avoid them bumping into other couples. Still, that did not stop some couples, where the man or wizard was not as well practiced in leading, from bumping into the pair and offering their apologies.

When the song finished, Severus indicated he wanted to go back to the table. Once there, he removed his long coat, since it was still a rather balmy night. Hermione decided some cool water would be good, since she was still adjusting to the temperature; she decided to rest until she didn't feel quite so flushed. Also, dinner had not quite completely settled, and she wanted to pace herself and avoid a stitch in her side.

As they rested, Ginny had a chance to finally admire Hermione's new necklace close up and praised Severus for his excellent taste. Draco and Severus exchanged glances briefly with their witches none the wiser to their silent banter. Hermione admired the large, beautiful diamond-encrusted brooch, a Malfoy family heirloom, that was pinned in the middle of Ginny's chest at the top of the bust line. It looked perfect with her forest green dress, which had an empire waistline to minimize her rather prominent baby bump.

Had Severus known he would be going to the ball with Hermione, he would have taken some of the free dance courses Draco, Halulu, and Jerry had organized for the community at large in the weeks leading up to the ball. He had yet to learn how to polka, rhumba, and mambo, and in addition, they were going to feature songs suited for the quickstep and Peabody dance. While Severus did know the quickstep and had taught Hermione the basics, it was a fast-moving dance, and neither of them had practiced it much. The Peabody was an American Muggle dance that was quite popular with the wizarding community in the states, but it had never caught on back in England. Draco and Ginny had taken lessons to learn the Peabody, as it was evidently invented by a rather "large" American Muggle who was too fat to dance with his partner in front of him. Given Ginny's current waistline, they decided to learn the new dance.

When the card by the side of the stage indicated the next dance would be a tango, Severus stood once more and invited Hermione to the dance floor.

As they moved about the floor smoothly as one, Hermione recognized the melody and smiled broadly.

"What an appropriate song," she mused aloud.
"How so?" Severus asked as he pulled her close to his chest.

"This song is called, 'I Could Have Danced All Night,' but this arrangement is set to a tango instead," she clarified.

Severus suddenly remembered the song from the movie he'd watched last summer and recalled Draco's remarks afterward. "Draco made sure this song was on the play list, to be sure. After our first night of dance lessons, oh so long ago, Draco watched you descend the stairs afterwards hearing you sing about how you 'could have danced all night and begged for more.' He did not volunteer that the next morning Draco accused him of seducing Hermione, surmising that only a thoroughly fucked witch would sing such a song so dreamily with a beaming smile upon her face.

Hermione got a faraway look on her face as she inwardly smiled to herself upon remembering that night. "Yes, I could have danced all night and almost did beg for more, had I not been married to Ron at the time," she said with some somber reflection.

"But you knew me only as Calleo at the time. Neither of us were ready to end the enchantment with my true identity quite yet," he reminded her.

"Too true, too true," she agreed with a sigh. "But here we are now. In a tropical paradise, dancing the night away, with the prospect of a long future together. Despite everything that has happened, it was worth it so that we could eventually be together."

Well, they weren't entirely together, as Hermione had to go back to England to finish her apprenticeship, and they could have done without the mishaps of last summer, but for the sake of argument, it was a done deal and they were solidly a couple. Those misfortunes were in the past and behind them.

The song card indicated that the next one would be a slow foxtrot, so they decided to stay on the floor for another dance.

At the familiar introduction to the song, Hermione and Severus smiled at each other. They were playing her favorite song.

Once the introduction had finished, Tommy began to croon sweetly, "I left my heart in San Francisco..."
They hardly noticed the other dancers on the floor moving about them as they gazed so intently into each other's eyes.

Severus stroked Hermione's cheek and confessed, "That day I fled for sanctuary, I requested they play this in that San Francisco lounge while we were waiting for our last Portkey. I really did feel like I was leaving my heart in San Francisco, as it rained buckets outside."

Figuring this was as good a time as any regarding something that had been bothering Hermione all week long, since the mood seemed right, she admitted, "I want to apologize."

Severus briefly furrowed his brow in confusion.

"When you proposed to me in the hot springs, I should have just said yes instead of screaming at you and getting hysterical."

Severus said nothing in response. He knew her well enough to realize that she was not done talking, and he would not interrupt her in the midst of her apology to him.

"I should have been more gracious, but all I could think of was all the hassle involved, instead of thinking about the good and wonderful aspects of it. Yes, Severus, I would love to marry you and be your wife. And I will endeavor, when that time comes and we can take that step and plan that day, to not put myself into a tizzy nor make you and myself miserable in the process."

She laid her head against Severus' chest as she said with a resigned sigh, "When we do marry, I want it to be a day I look forward to, not dread. I want us to think back and remember it as a joyous day, not one where I was too tired to enjoy it."

Pulling her head up from his chest, she looked him in the eye to gauge his reaction to her apology.

He only continued smiling, saying, "I know." Severus had understood her initial reaction, but was pleased Hermione had tried to make amends for her less than gracious acceptance of his proposal. "You know, Draco suggested that perhaps we should elope to avoid the fuss and bother."

"Yes, but I have to make sure Draco can run the business before we leave, and you have to make sure you don't have any commissions simmering away or tutoring appointments on your calendar, so there would be some planning required," she reminded him.

He laughed lightly, as that was exactly what he had pointed out to Draco. He kissed her temple, for having read his mind.

"You know," she said in that particular tone she used when she made some interesting observation, "if it wasn't for the fact we've had to interrupt our time together this week with language lessons and my work for Lavender and Albert, this week would have been a splendid honeymoon."

Severus gave her a bemused smile, countering, "And that time you abandoned me for your girls' lunch out with Ginny? Would you have done that were we truly on our honeymoon as well?"

Looking up at the ceiling innocently, she replied, "Well, how else was I supposed to get away from you to buy you your birthday present without you knowing what it is?"

Severus stopped dancing for a moment, just as the song finished and before the next one had started. "You bought me a birthday present?"

The next song began, and they started moving in a slow waltz.

"Of course I did. Since your birthday is coming up in less than two weeks, I figured now was as good a time as any. I was planning on leaving it for you to find after I've left, but that surprise is gone; however, you'll still have the surprise of unwrapping it."

"Christmas and birthday presents. I think I may actually start enjoying this time of year," Severus said a bit dryly.

They danced the rest of the waltz in silence with Hermione's head upon his chest.

As the song ended, she gazed up into his face lovingly as he reached up to brush his hand against her cheek, a slight smile tugging at his lips. They were both drunk on love, their foreheads almost touching.
Just then a camera flash went off near them.

The photographer for The Daily Times & Tides had been taking photos of people and couples around the ball that night and captured a tender moment between the two lovers.

"Oh, that was just beautiful. Put you in white dress robes and you two look like a bride and groom in love," the photographer quipped. "If you want copies for yourself, I'll have prints available for purchase towards the end of the night," he added in the last-minute sales pitch for a bit of extra money.

"I'd like a copy," Hermione said, realizing that there were no photos of her and Severus together.

"Make that two copies," Severus amended, wanting one for himself. Looking at Hermione, he said, "Until you can move here permanently, I'll need something to remind myself this isn't a dream."

Since the next dance was a polka, the pair left the floor and took in the cool night air.

A waning gibbous moon was just rising in the east as it started to cast its silvery glow. Its light set off the white plumeria in her hair, making it appear as if a sliver of the moon itself was adorning her crown.

Seeing the moonlight highlighting her cheeks and reflecting in her large brown eyes, Severus could not restrain himself any longer. He swept Hermione up into his arms, circling one arm behind her neck, and kissed her passionately.

Hermione no longer felt the earth beneath her feet, and she let herself be carried away by Severus' sudden and claiming kiss.

When he finally pulled his lips away from hers, she said in a whisper, her voice quaking with emotion, "Just when I think I cannot love you any more than it is possible, I am yet proven wrong once more. How I do love you, Severus. Beyond words or comprehension, I do love you so completely."

"As do I," was all he could say to let her know she had read his own heart as well, before kissing her once more.
Had there not been over a hundred people a mere twenty feet away, Severus would have taken Hermione to the nearest darkest corner and ravished her up against a wall, but he was able to restrain himself. With so many people milling about to seek a bit of fresh air, especially since the community center was an open-sided venue and everyone could spot them if they looked hard enough, it was not prudent to engage in such risky amorous pursuits.

If anything, the denial to satisfy their building ardor only fueled their passion for one another as they danced on the floor as the night progressed.

As they danced a foxtrot, Akela and Tristan came up alongside the couple.

"May I have the next dance with Madam Weasley?" Tristan asked, looking to Severus since it seemed the couple could hardly be pried apart that night.

Severus quickly glanced to Hermione, who nodded. He replied, "If I may be allowed the honor of dancing with Miss Finau in turn?"

The young couple nodded, and Akela almost blushed at Severus' formal manners.

When they swapped partners, as the next song, another foxtrot, began, Tristan and Hermione began dancing.

"I was wondering if I could ask you something, Madam Weasley?"

"Please, call me Hermione."

"Hermione." Tristan's eyes darted back toward where Akela and the Potions master were dancing, before he turned his nervous gaze back to his dance partner. "I may have an apprenticeship starting in the spring, but it's all the way in Salem, Massachusetts."

Hermione nodded, encouraging him to go on.
"Knowing that you and Mr. Snape have had a long-distance relationship, I was wondering if you could give me some advice or at least some pointers on what to expect. You know, with dating or at least staying together when you're so far apart for long periods of time." Tristan quirked a feeble smile.

Hermione's face became very somber. "I will be frank with you, Tristan. It is not easy. And when Severus first came here, we made no promises to each other. He asked me to come with him, but I had my reasons for staying. And while coming with him may have solved some problems regarding our relationship, it would not have solved some other issues, like eventually his exoneration. Also, I had already begun my apprenticeship when Severus asked me to come with him and I could not change masters. But he understood how important this apprenticeship was to me, just as I understood how important his freedom was to him."

Heaving a troubled sigh, she added, "Akela has already asked me for a possible apprenticeship under me once I have become a mistress and have moved here. That would mean two to three years apart until one of you finishes your apprenticeship, unless she can find a Potions mistress in Salem who would take her – and no, I recommend that she not study under a master unless he is very, very old. And unless your relationship is serious enough that you've already considered marriage, I will warn you that the distance may strain the bonds between you greatly and that it may not last. I have no easy answer for you, but I can tell you from personal experience, it can be quite lonely and difficult being apart from the one you love," she finished as she looked over Tristan's shoulder at Severus, who was engaged in conversation with Akela.

"So, Uncle Severus, Tristan is wondering if he should take the apprenticeship in Salem or look for something closer. What do you think?" Akela asked, seeking similar guidance from him.

"I will tell you that if he truly does love you and falls into the arms of another witch, it is not to hurt you, but that it is likely that he misses you so much he is willing to imagine the other witch is you in order to fill the emptiness of you gone," Severus admitted with a hint of ruefulness. It was a very round-about way of admitting his own faltering without outright confessing, as his own eyes glanced over at Hermione dancing with the young wizard.

"But let's say that we stay true to each other and we really do love each other very much. Do you think our relationship could stand us being apart for so long?" she asked, her eyes pleading for him to provide some answer to calm her troubled heart.

"Should you discourage him from seeking an apprenticeship as prestigious as the one he has been offered, in time he may grow to resent you keeping him away from such an opportunity and from reaching his potential," he warned her. "As for if your relationship is strong enough to deal with the strain of being parted, only you and Tristan know how deep your love has bound you together. I cannot judge on that matter, as only you two can."

Severus and Akela danced in silence for a bit longer when Severus added, "And do not rush to marry. Ginny married too young, as well as Hermione, and that led to much misery for them both. Each married for different reasons, but both married before they were ready."

"Yeah, I heard all about Ginny and Draco's courtship and Ginny's marriage to some Harry guy, but you never did say much about Hermione's marriage other than she married a big fat jerk that is married to her boss now." Akela suppressed a smirk, trying not to laugh. "My mom said something about you rescuing Hermione from some giant octopus and a love potion?"

"Giant squid, and that was to get your mother off my back with her incessant pestering about how the romantic aspect of our relationship began," Severus corrected her. "How our relationship in its present form began is not important. What matters is that Hermione and I have gone through our trials and have realized that we are willing to wait until she finishes her apprenticeship for us to be together. I understand how important this apprenticeship is to her and would do nothing to take it away from her, for that would be selfish of me, no matter how much I wish for her to be by my side and move here as soon as possible. And you should take into consideration Tristan's career and needs, just as I've taken Hermione's into consideration. I am willing to wait. Are you?"

"Tristan said he was willing to wait until my seventeenth birthday before taking things further – you know, like contraceptive potions – so he's patient. But I guess if I had an opportunity like what Tristan has, I wouldn't want him holding me back. So I guess we'll just have to see in time if is meant to last or not," Akela admitted with resignation, her brow slightly furrowed with worry.

"Love is patient. It will still be there waiting for you if it is meant to be," Severus said, just as the song ended. It was sentimental, but it was also quite realistic that if their love was not meant to be, then they would eventually part.

As Hermione and Severus sat, sipping on some champagne, the editor of The Daily Times & Tides, Rick Chen, came over and introduced himself to Hermione.

While they talked, Hermione deferring questions about the new Lovely Lavender facility to Draco Malfoy, much to the consternation of the editor, Severus noticed that one of the few centaurs on the island, Magnus, had shown up to the celebration. Since he was not going to eat, as he showed up long after dinner and dessert were served and it was highly unlikely he would dance, Severus mused he might have been let in without a ticket. It was then he spotted Svetlana talking with Magnus. It did not surprise him when Svetlana went up to Magnus and began conversing with him like they were old friends. Nor did it escape his attention when she very tenderly stroked his flank as they talked in a darker corner of the community center near the side. By the way that Magnus' tail twitched, Severus' suspicions were confirmed.
Draco and Ginny came over, having danced the Peabody, grateful there was at least one dance that worked to Ginny's advantage with her current body shape. She needed to get off her feet yet again and drink some more chilled beverage.

"Severus?" Draco said, noticing Severus looking quite distracted as he picked up his own flute of champagne to drink.

"Oh, nothing. Just noticing Catherine the Great leaving with her new date," the Potions master said offhandedly before turning his attention back to Hermione.

Draco turned around as he swigged a mouthful of champagne, and saw the figures of Svetlana and Magnus leaving the party together. Picking up on Severus' dig and the old nasty rumor started by the Polish about the Russian monarch and how she died when the horse fell, Draco began choking on his drink. His eyes were watering as a little champagne went up into his sinuses, as he began laughing, much to the confusion of his wife, Hermione, and Rick, the editor of The Daily Times & Tides.

"Are you okay, Draco?" his wife asked, seeing him still choking on the sparkling wine that went down the wrong way. She began patting him on the back.

"Yeah, (COUGH!) I just (HACK!), oh my..." He burst into fits of laughter once more, still amused by how casually Severus threw out that remark and all that it implied. Wiping away his tears, he said, "I'll be fine. Never mind me." It took him a few more moments to school his features.

Rick, seeing that Draco was in no condition to answer questions at the moment, turned to Severus regarding a business proposition. "So Severus, I was thinking I would like you to write a column for the paper. Maybe a weekly article in which you give tips on how to brew things at home. You know, common sort of questions a housewitch might have on brewing something. I was thinking you could call it 'Home Brew Tips,' so it sounds sort of homey. You could answer questions from readers about problems they are having or however. Maybe answer a letter or two, and give one tip that you didn't cover in the letter. Something like that? If it does well, I know a witch in New York who might like to syndicate your column, if you are interested in something like that."

Before Severus could think on the matter, Ginny insisted, "Oh Severus, that would be wonderful. My mum loved reading all those columns on how to do a spell or charm better and such, especially cooking spells. I think it would be a big hit, and given how vast your knowledge is. I think it would be great!"
Thinking about how his business might drop off in terms of tutoring with the opening of the new school, hopefully within the year, he viewed this as an opportunity to increase his sources of revenue, even though he still had a very healthy royalty income from Lavender that was filling his vault quite nicely. Still, it was good to diversify.

Looking as if he was still mulling over the offer, Severus said, "After the New Year, I will stop by your offices, and we can discuss the possibility of this column."

"Excellent, I look forward to it," Rick said. He shook Severus' hand before going off to get a quote by Mounga about the ball for the next day's edition.

"That's wonderful, Severus," Hermione said earnestly. She was glad that he was doing so well and was well respected. This was an opportunity that would have never been presented to him back in England, even with his exoneration.

Hermione and Severus danced some more, even dancing with a few other partners before taking a break, then going back out onto the floor to dance some more. When the song "At Last" began to play, they took to the floor again, dancing to a song that truly captured the feeling of them now being joined together again and deeply in love. That song was quickly becoming Hermione's new favorite song.

When it was almost midnight, Tommy launched into a new song, singing, "She got big red lips, she got big brown eyes..." Severus insisted they leave the dance floor to fetch fresh glasses of champagne for midnight.

That song still irked him to no end as he recalled Tommy crooning that song to him – while he was Polyjuiced as Hermione – in order to woo him.

With fresh glasses of champagne in hand, Severus, Hermione, Draco, and Ginny stood together on the dance floor and counted down aloud with all the party revelers.

At the stroke of midnight, Severus kissed Hermione, not caring if anyone saw them snogging away, since most everyone else was kissing as well, as balloons cascaded down from above.

Breathless from his kisses, Hermione beamed at Severus as the confetti drifted down like a multihued shower of snowflakes, alighting in his hair, peppering it with bright colors. One or two bits of confetti caught on his black eyelashes before he blinked them away as he smiled openly, his face alight with joy and happiness.

Some people held their wands aloft, sending shimmering sparks of every color to fill the air above their heads in the community center in celebration of the New Year.

Hermione stood up on her toes and kissed Severus this time, feeling overwhelmed with a warm glow in her.

Finally, they stopped kissing long enough to clink glasses with the Malfoys, and drank before spelling their empty glasses away. Then they joined with the crowd in singing "Auld Lang Syne."

Hermione and Severus toasted to a happy year ahead filled with so many plans they looked forward to.

Away in a dark corner, trying to be discreet, someone was busy scribbling away some quick notes on parchment. They had to take a Portkey home very soon if they were to make deadline.

~~~~~~~*~

Rolling over in bed, Hermione reached out and picked up the photograph of her and Severus at the ball to study it closer.

"You look so handsome," she sighed.

"Incomparable to your radiance, still," Severus said as he snuggled up behind her, looking at the photo she was holding while pressing himself into her bottom. They had just finished making love after waking that morning, and she wanted to look at the photograph yet again.

"That photo is perfect. We look so in love." she observed.

"We are so in love, so the photograph actually represents something accurately for once," he noted dryly, reminding Hermione about her own experience of photographs of her being taken out of context.

"Well, at least the photographer will give us that second copy free, since he couldn't find it, and he swore he made two prints," Hermione said.
"You should take this one home then. I can get the second copy next week when I swing by the paper to talk with Rick," Severus offered.

Setting the photo down, they finally got up out of bed to have a light breakfast, since it was already ten o'clock and they had to be over at the Malfoys' by noon for the formal Japanese tea ceremony.

After tea and fruit, Hermione set about writing up more scrolls for Albert while Severus read by himself until it was time to leave.

Arriving at the Malfoys' home, they were greeted at the door by Ginny. She was already wearing a kimono in a spring green color accented with plum blossoms for the New Year.

She bowed deeply, saying, "Youkoso."

Severus and Hermione bowed in kind.

"Thank you for inviting us to your home," Severus said. He could have said it in Japanese, but he knew Ginny only knew a few words.

"Come. I'll help you both with your kimonos," Ginny said, gesturing them to come inside. "Draco is almost ready for you. By the time you finish dressing he should be ready."

Ginny helped Hermione into a pink kimono and tied her contrasting obi for her, and gave her a new pair of tabi socks and zori sandals to wear. Once done, she went to Severus who was in the other spare bedroom and helped him with his black kimono and obi, and presented him with his own new tabi and zori set.

Once they were all dressed, Ginny guided them along a pathway around the outside of the house to a bench where they could sit and rest before the ceremony would begin.

Gary had walked Hermione and Severus though the tea ceremony as part of Thursday's lesson. He reviewed the parts of the ceremony, what they were expected to do as guests, the symbolism behind the various acts and movements, what they were to say and when, how to bow, and other proper etiquette.

Draco was going to perform Chaji, a full tea ceremony that involved a meal, with both thick tea and thin tea being served. Severus and Hermione had been warned by Gary that the full tea ceremony can take up to four hours, so they were prepared mentally for the ceremony.

As they sat on a bench that afforded them a view of the garden off of the living room area, they noticed one of the sliding glass doors had been Transfigured into a small door, that was now shunted aside. Draco emerged and approached his guests. After a silent bow in greeting they proceeded to the tsukubai in which to ritually rinse their hands and mouths with the water from the stone basin.

After removing their footwear, they crawled through the small opening and took their places in the middle of the living room. Draco had transformed it into a tea room for the occasion, having installed fresh tatami mats on the floor and a beautiful scroll hanging in the tokonoma alcove off to one side that had always been there.

Since Hermione was visiting, she was given the guest of honor spot, followed by Severus, then Ginny last. Draco finally entered the room and greeted each guest formally.

Hermione asked Draco about the scroll hanging, knowing this was expected of her.

Draco explained the scroll featured the first sunrise of the New Year, auspicious for that day.

Severus then asked Draco about a few of the tea items he had on display.

Once that part of the ceremony was complete, Draco began laying the charcoal fire. Their host then called for the elf to bring the food and sake. The elf was originally from Japan, and Draco had hired him to help with all the preparations.

The food was specifically chosen to reflect the season and time of day for the tea ceremony. It was all beautifully laid out as if presenting a highly choreographed scene to admire. Hermione noted that it was so beautiful it was almost a pity to eat the three-course lunch presented to her, including a small sweet at the end. They used their special kaishi paper to hold the dessert as they ate it; Ginny had given them the paper to keep tucked into their kimonos until it was time.
Draco poured sake to go with the meal in little cups featuring a muted green glaze. Each cup had some lightly contracting color brushed on in a manner that seemed spontaneous, yet purposeful in its pattern.

After the meal, the guests went outside to wait once more on the garden bench while Draco prepared the tea room once again. With the sound of the bell, Hermione, Severus, and Ginny ritually purified themselves once more by the tsukubai. They re-entered the tea room where the flower arrangement had now been placed in the tokonoma, replacing the scroll that hung there before.

Draco entered and performed the thick tea ceremony, ritually cleaning each utensil with very slow and careful movement. Hermione noted how Draco focused on each utensil as he handled it, the way he snapped the cloth before folding it a certain way, then wiping. By the position of his hands and body, she saw he was solely focused on each moment and the moment alone. She silently wondered if through studying the tea ceremony he had learned to be more patient and calm, as there seemed to be a serenity exuded while in the act of performing these simple movements.

Severus could admire the beauty of each careful movement of Draco's hands as they followed a specific order, noting the similarities between brewing and the ceremony.

Draco's hand moved with precision as he whisked the tea until it was ready. Turning, he and Hermione bowed to each other as he presented her the bowl of thick tea that everyone would share, exchanging polite phrases of gratitude in Japanese.

Being coached by Gary, Hermione knew to bow to Severus, the second guest, before drinking the tea. It was very strong and bitter, but she did not wince and made sure to turn the bowl as to not sip from the front of it.

Down the line, the etiquette of bowing to the next guest was observed as Severus drank from the bowl and passed it to Ginny.

Once the sharing of the thick tea was done, Draco cleaned his utensils, followed by more ritualized movements until the utensils were clean, and he laid them out for his guests to admire. Hermione asked for permission to view the bowl from which they drank, bowing to Draco as it was presented to her. Severus also took this opportunity to inspect the bowl, admiring the weathered and rustic state of the bowl, since Gary had discussed that week the aspect of imperfection, asymmetry, simplicity, and naturalness embodied in the concept of Wabi-sabi. Afterwards, Draco removed the utensils used for the thick tea ceremony and brought in a completely different set for the thin tea ceremony in which everyone would have their own bowl of tea to sip from.
It was during the thin tea ceremony that casual conversation could commence. As they drank tea, they talked. Ginny, who could not bear sitting on her knees for hours in her condition, was sitting on a low stool. Hermione and Severus wound up sitting sideways eventually, unaccustomed to kneeling for long periods as well.

Eventually, everyone had their fill of tea and Draco performed the same utensil cleaning ritual once again, allowing his guests to handle and view the tea-making objects closer until he packed them away. Before he left the room, Hermione thanked him in Japanese for his wonderful hospitality and how honored she was to have been his guest. Draco merely smiled and bowed before exiting the room, signaling the end of the tea ceremony.

The ceremony now complete, Ginny guided Hermione and Severus back out the small sliding door, through the garden, and to their respective rooms to change back into their clothes. She offered for them to keep their kimonos, obis, and footwear as a gift.

Standing on the front porch, Hermione said, not sure that Draco understood what she said earlier, "Draco, I am truly honored by all the effort you put into your tea ceremony. That was quite beautiful and your hospitality magnificent. Truly, thank you."

Draco bowed to Hermione, and she and Severus bowed back before they left to walk home.

~~~~~~~*~

Ginny and Hermione were both blubbering messes as they said goodbye at the Portkey office. The Malfoys had come to see Hermione off.

"I wish you could be here when the babies are born," Ginny sobbed. She gave a great sniff as she smiled weakly through her tears.

Draco and Severus both discreetly pressed handkerchiefs into their respective witches' hands.

"I know. But I might be coming out during the last week in March for a quick visit to check up on construction, if it has begun yet," she added with an exasperated growl, annoyed by the local building commission and their Byzantine building codes. She finished blotting her face.

"Luckily, you have a Slytherin on staff for such matters," Draco added, without saying too much more, since Halulu was standing nearby and she was on the town council. He did not want to damn the building project by disparaging various government officials in front of her.
Draco gave Hermione a hug before the Malfoys left so that Hermione and Severus could say their farewells in private. Halulu was hovering about the Portkey office trying to pretend she wasn't there, though she had seen many tearful goodbyes before.

As Hermione stood with her arms wrapped around Severus' neck, and her trunk by her side and waiting, she could hardly find the courage to look up at him. Swallowing thickly, she choked on her words. "It's been like some wonderful dream that has finally come true, being here with you."

Severus, who had his arms wrapped around her waist, reached up and pushed aside one tendril of hair that had fallen into her face, tucking it tenderly behind her ear. He then straightened the necklace Harry had given her for protection should she be in trouble again. Severus was thankful Potter was still looking out for her, and she remembered to finally put it back on that morning before she left.

"It has been a dream for me as well," Severus said. "I fear it is time for the dreamer to awaken. However, this has not been some dream, but a reality far sweeter than I could have imagined. I have never been happier," he said, his voice becoming a whisper, finding it hard himself to continue speaking.

The last, and only time, he had cried in Hermione's presence was when they parted, while he was Polyjuiced as Hermione.

"I don't want to go," she said. Her voice warbled as she tried to stop herself from outright crying it aloud, seeing Severus' eyes begin to look glassy as they were beginning to fill with tears.

Severus pulled her tighter to him, one arm wrapping around her shoulder as his hand cupped the back of her head and cradled it, clutching her to his chest. He squinted his eyes shut tight and damned himself as he felt tears quickly slide down his cheeks, his heart rent by the plaintive sound of her voice begging not to go.

Hermione held on with equal fervor, wrapping her arms around his chest and squeezing with all her might, in some vain hope that they could not be pried apart. She felt his chest heave and one of his tears land on her forehead. Just knowing Severus was crying too broke her, for she had hoped he would be her rock of stoic sensibility telling her that it was not forever and that they had the mirrors to converse with one another so they could talk daily. But it also moved her that Severus was equally undone by the fact they were to be divided once more from each other's presence.

"We'll have the mirrors," she said, as she tried to keep the sound of her voice light.
"Yes, we will." Severus kissed the top of her head. Tipping her chin to look up at him, he gazed down at her. "I will miss you."

Seeing the tears on his cheeks nearly sent Hermione into fits of wailing.

"Here," he said as he reached into his pocket. "You're not the only one who did a little shopping while away."

In his palm sat a very large misshapen pearl, that was about the size of his thumbnail, with a greenish iridescent hue, until Hermione looked at it closer and realized the pearl was in the shape of a frog resting. The tiny frog readjusted the positions of its legs, then continued resting once more.

Placing it carefully in her palm so that she could look at it, he said, "In Japanese, the word frog is kaeru, which sounds very close to the verb 'to return'. It is a custom in Japan to give a small frog to loved ones for safe travels and to return home soon, also for the return of wealth and fortune. You are everything to me, Hermione. Return home to me."

Severus captured Hermione in a kiss. She returned his kiss with all her heart, tasting the salt of their tears as they kissed, the small pearl frog clutched desperately in her hand.

Knowing that if she did not go, her resolve would falter and she'd never leave this island, Hermione let go of Severus and bent to pick up her trunk.

As she walked to the Portkey area on the other side of the desk where Halulu was waiting, she stopped to speak to Severus one last time and said somberly, "I will return, I promise."

Standing in the Portkey area that had a small protective railing demarcating the area for travel, she watched Severus as her hand blindly reached out and touched the Muggle telephone turned into a Portkey.

Severus would not let his eyes leave her until she was gone with a blue flash and the Portkey area was empty.
Halulu blew her nose very loudly into her own handkerchief. "You know, I've seen a lot of goodbyes, but few broke my heart like that."

Severus wanted to tell her to stuff it, but knew she was just being nice and her pregnancy hormones were making her especially sentimental.

Now he had to walk back home and sit in front of the mirror waiting for Hermione to arrive at the London Portkey office and Floo home. She would then unpack her own matching charmed mirror and they would see if the mirrors really did work over such vast distances. Then they could see and talk to each other every day until she came back to his arms once more.

As Hermione approached her destination in London, she prepared herself for landing, making sure she would not sprawl herself all over the floor like she had done once or twice when she was distracted or unprepared.

Upon landing, she was then suddenly blinded by a flash of camera bulbs all popping off at once. There was a clamor of people yelling and some screaming.

Hermione threw her hand up to shield herself from the flashes of light that made it hard to tell which Portkey arrival area she'd landed in, much less focus.

Before she could get her bearings, she heard Lavender say in haste, "Quick, get under here!"

Suddenly, Hermione was able to focus, and she realized she was under Harry's Invisibility Cloak.

Lavender had a firm grip of her arm through the cloak and was guiding her. Hermione dragged her trunk with her, pulling it under the cloak as she moved along.

Looking about, she saw the backs of familiar friends; Harry, the twins, Ron, Bill, Tonks, Kingsley, Fastrada, Trevor, Viktor and his wife, Anne, Niles, Braxton, Royston, John Leyster, Neville, Luna, even Arthur Weasley. All of them were creating a corridor and protective barrier in which Hermione was being guided through to prevent the throngs of people who had crowded the Portkey office from seeing Hermione and casting hexes at her.

"Harlot!" one witch with a purple velvet hat with a stuffed hedgehog attached to the brim screamed in the general direction of Hermione.
"Death Eater Fucker!" shouted a wizard about Hermione's age.

"How could you! And after everything that happened during the war!" bellowed another witch.

"What's going on?" asked Hermione, bewildered as to what had happened to cause this raucous melee.

"We'll talk once we get back to your flat," Lavender said under her breath as she guided Hermione to a Floo.

As they reached the Floo, Lavender called out for Hermione's flat and also said a spell to unlock it, something Hermione had not done when she had left.

Emerging from the fireplace back in her flat, Hermione set her trunk down and pulled off Harry's cloak.

"What in Merlin's name is going on!" Hermione asked, confused as to why the wizarding world in England had suddenly turned upside down and she was the sole target of its ire.

"This is what's happened," Lavender said as she produced the Sunday edition of the Daily Prophet.

There on the front cover was the photograph of Hermione and Severus looking into each others' eyes adoringly at the ball. Above it, the headline in large block letters screamed about their relationship in a manner that was not very complimentary.

Hermione felt her legs go out from underneath her. Fortunately, Marf had been appraised of the situation and was able to charm one of the wingback chairs to move quickly enough so that she fell into it instead of onto the floor.

She felt the bile in her throat rise, especially with the Daily Prophet's use of that very inappropriate term regarding her magical lineage, on the front page no less.
Looking at the by-lines, she noticed who wrote it. "Rita Skeeter, Marietta Edgecombe, and on special assignment in the middle of the Pacific, Colin Creevey." Hermione closed her eyes and pinched the bridge of her nose in a manner very similar to Severus and sighed, "Oh, fuck."

The three people who had a grudge against her had conspired together to create a story meant to shock and stir up the public's anger, directing said anger towards Hermione with language meant to incite hatred and disgust.

There was only one person she wanted to talk to now. She opened her trunk and began digging through it.

Severus sat in a kitchen chair with a cup of tea, waiting patiently by the free-standing mirror for Hermione. As he sat there, he saw the black drape of fabric on her side begin to move and flashes of candlelight luminescence as the protective cloth – charmed to prevent breakage – was moved aside.

A smile began to break across his face that the charm had indeed worked and the mirrors could allow them to see one another. But then his face fell as he saw the look of distress etched on her face, a fresh wave of tears now streaming down her face.

"Hermione? What's the matter?" Severus asked. He now stood in front of the mirror.

"This," was all she said, and she held up the front page of the Daily Prophet for him to clearly read: "SCANDALOUS AFFAIR: The Death Eater and the Mudblood!"

Chapter End Notes

A/N: ~o0o~ END of SEASON IV ~o0o~

Looks like lemon season is over. But how much longer will it be before our two lovers are reunited again? How will it take Hermione to finish her apprenticeship? And just how did those hacks at the Daily Prophet get tipped off about Hermione and Severus? Stay tuned and keep reading.
Thank you to my always helpful and talented betas, JuneW and Hope.

Smok is Polish for dragon, so I gave Jerry, who is of Polish background, a name, Smokski, that intones that somewhere there is something to do with dragons in his lineage, which explains why his Animagus form is a dragon.

Oslayob is a Russian swear word meaning "donkey fucker."

If you've seen the movie, "My Fair Lady," they do play an instrumental tango version of "I Could Have Danced All Night." It is played at the Embassy Ball scene where gossip is being spread by the character Zoltan Karpathy, Professor Higgin's former pupil.

Yes, I named the centaur Magnus, since the other centaur we're familiar with beside Firenze is Bane. Magnus Bane, yes, is the warlock from the Cassandra Clare Mortal Instrument series, but that's just how the name came to me.

Frogs are ascribed magical powers by the Japanese. They are popular lucky amulets, because the word for frog in Japanese – "kaeru" – sounds like the word for "return." Therefore, it implies many happy returns (of money and fortune), a safe return journey, etc. The website "Symbology" explains it thus:

"Twenty-seven species of frog are found in Japan. Due to an agricultural economy based on the flooded rice paddy, the presence of frogs is considered to bring good fortune. Additionally, the frog has become a creature much beloved in poetry and art. Ceramic frogs are often sold at shrines as the Japanese word for ‘frog’ is the same as ‘to return’.

https://japanesemythology.wordpress.com/frog-solar-symbolism-and-other-meanings/
Chapter Summary

Hermione and Severus work together to fight the Daily Prophet's twisted lies.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter One Hundred Ten "Welcome to My Nightmare"

Disclaimer:
Just a fanfic hack
Writing till the sky turns black
I took Rowling's work and played with it
Just an English girl
Born and raised in south Tutshill
She took the midday train to Edinburgh
A wizard in a pair of jeans
Butterbeer and Betrie Bott's Beans
I just borrow them for just the night
It goes on and on, and on, and on

Strangers reading
Up and down the Internet
Their keywords searching in the night
Disclaimers for people
Setting straight that I don't own this Rowling sleeps peacefully through the night

A/N: Disclaimer a parody of "Don't Stop Believing" Songwriters: CAIN, JONATHAN / PERRY, STEVE / SCHON, NEAL Published by Lyrics © Journey - Weedhigh Nightmare Music

"January 2, 2005 -- This past August, Hermione Weasley, the divorced ex-wife of famous Chudley Cannons Keeper and 2004 Mercury Broom calendar beefcake pinup Ron Weasley, took on the seemingly impossible and monumental task of clearing the names of renown Death Eaters, Severus Snape, disgraced former Potions master of Hogwarts School of Witchcraft and Wizardry, and Draco Malfoy, son of the infamous Death Eaters, Lucius and Narcissa Malfoy, for crimes they were accused of, but never convicted.

During the trial, the former Mrs. Weasley produced two memories procured from Mr. Snape for the purpose of presenting as evidence, proof that he and young Malfoy did not personally kill the doddering and senile Headmaster of Hogwarts, Albus Dumbledore, nor let the Death Eaters into Hogwarts. The discovery of Albus Dumbledore's rather rambling and poorly written will proved additional so-called proof.

The will's presence hidden as a common lemon at Dumbledore's graveside makes these reporters, who wrote this article in collaboration, wonder if the former Mrs. Weasley somehow tampered with the will to suit her purposes at the trial.

The valiant war hero and at the time of trial, Senior Head Auror, Alastor Moody rightfully questioned the source of these memories and insisted that they might have been tampered with by providing false memories.

And at no point, when questioned, did the former Mrs. Weasley admit to how she obtained those memories. Now in light of a long investigative process that has taken months to pull together, we will attempt to illuminate Hermione Weasley's dubious actions and alliances. In addition, we will provide eyewitness accounts from Colin Creevey who observed Hermione Weasley and Severus Snape engaged in some uncivilized ritual involving the consumption of strange food that may have even been cannibal in origin, lascivious dancing and who knows what other dark and forbidden eccentricities on the savage island populated by criminals and the dregs of society lorded over by a swarthy half-giant where Snape and Malfoy now reside.

It is quite evident now Snape willingly gave these memories to the former Mrs. Weasley, but what price of the flesh was she willing to yield to his demands to obtain those memories for her social justice endeavors? Quite a lot, by the look of it from the featured photo, to the point of probably becoming addicted to his probably perverse sexual desires, by the way they were found to be gazing at each other wantonly throughout the New Year’s Eve unseemly ritual. Everyone who has read or heard testimony about what went on at Dark Revels during post-war trials can probably safely assume that Snape has continued on with such disgusting habits in this backward island culture.

No doubt, Hermione Weasley sought to clear Snape and Malfoy’s names in yet another try to correct some perceived social injustice, similar to her rather laughable attempt to work for house-elves' rights at Hogwarts with the creation of her organization, S.P.E.W.: Society for the Promotion of Elfish Welfare.

Then as to how Snape and Malfoy escaped England, one wonders if in an effort to break the law once more, the former Mrs. Weasley, known within circles to flaunt the law and bend the rules to her whims, helped the Death Eaters escape while they were still being restricted under the Death Eater Decree. And if she did, that would explain her impassioned plea to exonerate them in order to avoid a lengthy stint in Azkaban herself had her possible crimes been exposed as they are about to be in this article.

Upon asking Minister Bones if any charges would be brought against the former Mrs. Weasley should the conjecture provided in this exposition prove true, the Minister said that if she did indeed help, there was no crime in anything she might have done regarding two wizards who have been since proven innocent.

As for how we discovered Hermione Weasley being seduced into such depravity, let us chronicle those who have helped us uncover her path from upstanding married witch with an honorable job in the Ministry to disgraced, divorced, sterile witch working for the mistress of her ex-husband willing to entertain the perversities of a known Death Eater in his bed..."

"I think I'm just going to vomit," Hermione stated with indignation, hating the fact she had to read the article to Severus aloud since he could not read it clearly through their two-way mirror.

What made this even more humiliating was the fact that her Aunt Christine was there in her flat, needing to hear first-hand every detail the paper got wrong in order to counter those claims and conjecture with counter statements, accusing the Daily Prophet of libel. Her Muggle aunt was responsible for marketing and advertising for The Lovely Lavender Company.

It was a less than ideal situation for Hermione to introduce the love of her life to her family. She was thankful her parents weren't there, but no doubt they had read the trash that was published about their daughter.

Hermione had to point out to her aunt that the Daily Prophet had a long history of publishing falsehoods when it suited their agenda, and no amount of protesting could force them to print corrections unless strong-armed by other influential members of the Ministry. Minister Bones was supportive of Hermione, knowing full well everything she had done, but there was doubt even she could force a full retraction of the story, even if there were small threads of truth plastered over with thick layers of innuendo and derogatory remarks so that none of the truth could be discerned amongst the false rhetoric.

On she read while Severus held his head in his hands, periodically groaning and grinding his teeth, as Aunt Christine scribbled furiously away on her Muggle yellow legal pad making copious notes. Lavender just sat in one of the wingback chairs feeling equally sick to her stomach.
There was the account from the floral delivery boy, Vradian Bumbershoot, about delivering the wrong flowers to Hermione with a note featuring the initials "S.S.," implicating Severus as the sender of that note, though the other florist customer Stephen Stronder had the same initials, and so did another dozen or so witches and wizards in England. Vradian gave a lengthy account of Draco Malfoy threatening him and making some very unkind remarks that he had to later look up in the dictionary to understand. The simple and "honest" floral order mix-up eventually resulted in him losing his job. It was all painted in a very sympathetic light for the poor boy wizard who had lost a job he needed since his parents were too poor to afford a proper broom for him, which was of course a big fat lie; they did not fact check with the parents, taking his word solely. Or if they did check with the parents, they omitted the truth that they indeed were not poor, and he was a spoilt child who ruined his broom in a temper tantrum in order to try and wheedle his parents into buying him a newer model that was a mere one year newer.

Then there was the interview with Alastair Moody regarding Severus Snape and Draco Malfoy. When asked about their means of employment while residing in England under the Death Eater Decree, the article noted that the former Auror seemed to be unable to disclose much of anything as if cast under a spell to prevent talking about the subject. He was able to name Lavender Weasley as their employer though what they did under her employ his mouth was unable to form the words. This was a huge relief to both Hermione, Severus, and Lavender, for none of them wanted the seedier side of Lavender's business made public. Hermione could not imagine explaining to her Aunt Christine about Severus and his former side career as a gigolo or the public fall-out if that became public knowledge.

When Moody was asked by one the of the reporters about the means the two Death Eaters might have used to escape England, he listed the usual routes of illegal Portkeys, which was easy enough for most people to create, Apparating across to France or Ireland even with a revoked license, the usual Muggle means, and of course Polyjuice Potion.

Since the three reporters had it in for Hermione, and given her previous job prior to working for Lavender Weasley, they automatically glommed into the idea that Hermione Weasley pilfered the restricted ingredients at her Ministry job needed to brew a batch of Polyjuice Potion.

Of course, of the many lines of conjecture they threw out there, that one was spot on, much to Aunt Christine's distress when Hermione admitted to it. But Minister Bones had already given the sly nod and wink that it was acceptable, especially since Severus and Draco were proven innocent. If anything, Hermione was guilty of some small petty theft the Minister deemed to be something she was willing to not press changes on given the greater good of two wizards proven innocent and no longer under false persecution. Hermione even suggested paying for the pilfered materials, plus interest in a gesture of good faith, which Aunt Christine deemed a good public relations act to add as a side note.
There were nasty comments by Madam Dushka about Hermione's performance on the job while at the Department of Standards & Regulations. When pressed for comments about the possible accusation of theft on the job, Madam Dushka was quick to add in more insults saying she did not put such reckless and irredeemable behavior beyond Hermione.

Reginald Chuff, Severus' old Potions master, was interviewed as well. While he had no recollection of meeting Hermione Weasley, and could not say if her Muggle heritage influenced her character to be an unfit Potions apprentice, he did have a few choice words about his own former apprentice Snape. It was during a lengthy diatribe when he brought up the fact that Snape was once married, but then his wife had died. When pressed for how his wife died, Chuff could not bother to recall except for the fact that she seemed to have had a proclivity in copulating with Muggles before her arranged marriage to Snape.

Severus was mortified, hoping that part of his past was long buried, but it seems now it was being dug up and aired for all to see.

When pressed by Christine about his first wife, Severus said it was not a matter for discussion, to which Hermione agreed and deemed the topic closed.

As for the tip as to how someone at the Daily Prophet had learned of Hermione's trip to Hawaii where she would "clandestinely rendezvous with the Death Eater in his jungle love lair," it turned out there was a disgruntled former employee at the Weasley Wizarding Wheezes. Of course, the article noted that accusations of pilfering the till and stealing stock were unsubstantiated regarding the cause for his recent dismissal. The former employee had gone to the paper with a tip after he had been sacked.

There was an account of the twins' former employee supposedly looking for some materials to restock when he had overheard – with the assistance of a pair of Extendable Ears that happened to be lying about – Messrs. Weasley discuss Mrs. Weasley and Mr. Snape in hushed tones in the back room. This former employee read a few drafts of a letter the twins had "casually" left laying about that they were going to enclose with some items they were going to have shipped. The former employee also heard the twins talk of Mrs. Weasley's upcoming visit to the location, although the newspaper still had trouble printing this without the words scrambling due to Dumbledore's enduring spell. It was from the "innocently overheard" conversation that suspicions of the three reporters working in the expose confirmed the illicit affair between the disgraced Muggle-born witch and Death Eater Potions master, who was once her professor, the article added a last jab regarding their former academic relationship in an insidious way. That passage further implied that perhaps detentions for some female students, especially Mrs. Weasley when she was still his student, was doing more than just scrubbing cauldrons.

Severus had never been so humiliated in his entire life. This was worse than the many embarrassing incidents during his teen years, now printed with a false light for thousands to read. and absorb as irrefutable truth.

There was an account from Colin Creevey and his observations of the New Year's Ball that Rita Skeeter decided needed a bit of spicing up, as Hermione recognized her trademark literary flair. The derogatory remarks about a place that would "... deem to elect a house-elf to the town council tells of just how far gone and uncivilized this far-flung refuge for the refuse of the wizarding world is," had all the hallmarks of that gossiping cunt's quill.

"Mr. Loddy is a free elf. Not that Rita Skeeter could even conceive of such a concept!" Hermione huffed, irritated and fuming at the tripe that had been published.

The article wrapped up by saying that Albert Dobmeir, the former Mrs. Weasley's Potions master, was unavailable for comment. However, it did note the time and date indicating when Hermione was due to arrive from her week away in the company of her Death Eater lover, which explained why there was an angry mob to greet her upon her return.

"But of course Lavender was available for comment, but they didn't seem to want to contact her to refute the piles of filthy lies they spewed!" Hermione thundered as she grew more incensed.

The dream had morphed into a nightmare for Hermione and Severus. Gone were all the warm fuzzy feelings they rode on, replaced with the stomach-twisting dread of the publication of that article.

"There is only one thing left to do," Lavender announced, finally saying something after sitting in the chair quietly all the while Hermione, Severus, and Christine growled, yelled, spat, and fumed with indignation. "Hermione and Severus, you must do an interview with Luna Lovegood. She'll print the truth in The Quibbler and we can certainly spin this to our advantage. Besides, we can out Rita, Marietta, and Colin as reporters with a grudge to settle with their muck-raking."

"No!" Severus refused firmly.

Hermione's shoulders slumped, knowing his tone indicated he could not be moved.

Christine had dealt with some very stubborn and obstinate CEOs and company presidents during her many years of tenure in Muggle advertising and marketing. She knew with the right words; she could get this wizard, who seemed to truly love Hermione, to come around to her point of view, as Christine was in complete agreement with Lavender.
"Listen, dearie," Christine began in a patient tone as she sat in front of the mirror to address Severus, who was close enough to her age that she felt she could talk to him as a reasonable peer. "This is my specialty, fixing public relations disasters that would make your head spin with bad press and the reporting of false accusations, and some not-so-false in print and TV that had been read and watched by over a billion people. That's billion with a 'B,' so this my forte, and this is what Lavender pays me for. She's right. Do the interview, or you can sit back in your little tropical shack on the other side of the world and watch as all those royalties she deposits into your Gringotts account dry up like a fleeting sprinkle of rain in the Atacama Desert. I've already fielded over a dozen Howlers since this morning with talk of boycotts of all Lovely Lavender products and all subsidiaries, which means Sirens' Secrets products as well."

Severus sat there listening to this woman who most probably would have been sorted into Slytherin, had she been born magical like her niece.

"So, let's say you and Hermione sit there and do nothing to address these lies and half-truths printed in this fish-wrap rag," Christine continued on with her persuasive argument. "That will only make people think that they are the truth, and the boycott of Lavender's company will move forward. It could easily spread internationally to other countries if their press reprint this tripe. Eventually, the business may close, in which case, no more royalties for you. No more job for Albert, and I'm aware of the circumstances in which you helped arrange for this job for him. And that would also mean no more money or job for Hermione. So you would have to support her financially, or she would have to live on whatever royalties she has currently accumulated until her apprenticeship ends.

"And with the shutting down of Lovely Lavender, that means no funds to finish the school there or the facility for which construction is about to start. Then there are the jobs in Malu Palekaiko that will not be filled because the company shut down. Then you'll have your own local community upset at you, thinking that you could have done something to redress the situation instead of sulking in silence. They may even grow to resent you for the belief that you have taken away the chance for better jobs besides working on farms, and taking away a chance for a better and formalized education for their children. You'd have your own public relations nightmare to deal with, Severus. Then they might start boycotting your little Potions shop as well."

Christine was laying out a very frightening and very realistic situation that might turn his little slice of happiness into yet a new nightmare, just when he had his life sorted out to his liking. Severus hated to admit it, but the Muggle was right.

"All right. I'll do it if Hermione is willing to do it," Severus grumbled.

He remembered Hermione telling him about how Luna's article in The Quibbler certainly provided a fresh and truthful perspective about Hermione and Ron's divorce that seemed to take the wind out of the gossip rage sales, diffusing the situation. Severus just hoped that Luna could write an article in which they could turn this around to their advantage without Severus having to lay bare too many embarrassing facts, especially regarding his dead wife.

"Yes, I'll do it. As much as I hate having my personal life splashed across the printed page yet again, I'll do it," Hermione said with resignation before excusing herself to fetch a vial of Headache Relief Potion. Lavender asked for her to bring two vials as she needed at least one as well.

"Okay. Then it's settled. Hermione will draft a letter, since she's friends with this Luna," Christine said to restate what was agreed upon. She checked a few things off on her yellow notepad. "It'll be better coming from Hermione – and we will arrange it for here at the flat so Luna can talk to you as well, Severus." With a great breath, Christine exhaled slowly. Looking at the clock and noting it was almost eleven o'clock and they had been going at this for nearly three hours, she asked, "Now, before we wrap this up, is there anything I need to know that hasn't been covered in this article. Not that we'll bring it up or tell this Luna about it, but any more potential public relations bombs that might be discovered? It's better to be prepared for a statement and not have to issue a press release than to be caught off-guard like I was with some of these things that Hermione and Lavender had failed to disclose to me before. I won't say piddly squat, but I need to know so that I'm prepared to be proactive, instead of reactive."

Lavender, Hermione, and Severus all exchanged glances at one another briefly before Lavender said, "No, nothing more."

"Cut the bullshit," Christine demanded, catching the brief nonverbal exchange. "Spill it. I know crap on executives that would get them sent away to prison on various charges for years. Fortunately I've never had to write a press release for many of those. Come on. This is some very unpleasant shit we've just sorted through tonight. What could be worse? Tell me and my lips are sealed, but I have to know so I can be prepared and spin whatever skeletons you have in your closets."

Lavender looked to Severus who shook his head. "Severus, she won't say anything, but if it comes out, we're all fed. She needs to know to be prepared just in case."

"This involves not only me, but Draco, Zabini and let's not forget your own business relationship with Macnair," he reminded her.

"And if Draco and Ginny come back and we're playing catch-up to the gossip rags instead of nipping it in the bud, should it come out, how would Ginny's reputation be affected as well, as well as the fact she was married to Harry at the time?" Lavender countered. "They could never show their face in England again, and I knew Draco and Ginny want to come back periodically and even let their own children attend Hogwarts some day, if they choose. Christine won't tell anyone, but she has to know to be prepared in case."

"Fine," Severus said reluctantly.

Hermione could do nothing but listen with her face red as a beet and buried in her hands. She peered through her fingers in dread of what was about to be disclosed to her aunt.

"Marf!" Lavender called out. The house-elf appeared before his employer with a bow. "Please bring us some strong tea, and maybe something strong from the liquor cabinet as well."

As the president of The Lovely Lavender Company sat in her chair with a cup of tea now firmly in her hand, she said, "Because of the Death Eater Decree, there were some certain ways I worked around the restriction of having Severus as my Potions master, even with the restriction against him brewing any potions. While he was secretly my Potions master, working under the false name of Sebastian Delgado, officially on the books with the Ministry he was employed as a gigolo, and I was his madam."

Christine listened, her mouth hanging open, periodically having to remember she was supposed to be taking notes while Lavender disclosed her role as madam and the fact that Hermione's block of flats was, until recently, a brothel. Lavender listed some of the notable clients she had on her books, which Christine said was good because she noted that powerful people would keep such a news item suppressed, as they did in the Muggle world. Lavender omitted Anne's name in Hermione's presence. She even disclosed the arrangement she had with Macnair, which horrified Christine, even with the back-story of why, which made the situation all the more tragic and twisted. Christine agreed that it was better for Macnair to avoid the Dementor's Kiss in exchange for letting Healers use his memories and his wand to try to fix some of the damage he'd done to Lavender's friend Parvati.

When it was all said and done, Christine turned to her niece and asked in an accusatory tone, "You were fucking a gigolo?"

"I didn't pay him to fuck me, if that's what you are implying. We had already fallen in love by the time anything happened between us!" Hermione retorted hotly.

This seemed to be a source of great relief to Christine. "Good. The fact is that if this ever comes out, this would just be a complete nightmare that would make the Profumo Affair look like a proper Edwardian tea dance by comparison." Christine took a swig of her tea before saying, "I feel like my head is going to split open from all this. My God." Looking over at the mantle clock, she said, "It's almost midnight and I've had a very, very long day. I need sleep in order to face the next day or I will be worth shit."

Rising from her seat with some difficulty since she was just one month from her due date, Christine went over to the mirror and said, "I'm very sorry you were forced into such circumstances, Severus; you seem like a nice bloke. I just wish we had initially met under better circumstances, and rest assured I won't breathe a word about what I heard in confidence."

Severus, already worn out as it was only one in the afternoon in Hawaii, said he wished he had met her under better circumstances as well.

Lavender, who had a young infant at home who was probably in need of a bit of nursing by now, had to make her farewells.

"Albert is supposed to arrive sometime tonight. No doubt we'll have to rehash this all over again in the morning with him," Lavender sighed. "Owl Luna tonight if you have the energy so she'll be able to read it first thing in the morning."

Hermione nodded. She did have the energy, since her body was telling her was time for lunch, not time for bed.

Lavender escorted Christine through Diagon Alley to her car before taking the Floo at the Leaky Cauldron home to Ron and Josephine.

Now it was just Hermione and Severus' reflection in the mirror.

"Oh, Severus," she whinged pitifully, "I wish I never came back."

"I know, but then that would have looked just as bad, if not worse. Then there is the matter regarding your apprenticeship," Severus reminded her.

"Niles, Braxton, Royston. and James were there to protect me, along with others, from the angry mob that greeted me for a welcome-home at the Portkey office," Hermione told him, trying to keep the tone light despite the gravity of the situation.
It pleased him that his fellow Potions masters were looking out for their own, especially Hermione. The fact they had not been quoted for comment, with a note in the article they had no comments to give, indicated they would help protect her.

Hermione drafted her letter to Luna, with Severus making some suggestions. Of his suggested edits, she took some – and of others, she said that the choice of words would appear to be a bit too ingratiating. She was trying to relay the idea that Luna was an extremely perceptive witch who could easily see through such rhetoric.

Severus took Hermione's lead, since she did know the Ravenclaw editor of The Quibbler far better than he did.

Once her owl Calleo, who had been nesting in the company's offices during Hermione's visit to Hawaii, took off with Hermione's letter, it was time for Hermione to go to bed. Pulling out the other half of her Potions apprenticeship experiment, she drank most of the dusky-hued liquid in the vial and suddenly felt quite sleepy, which reset her body clock to local time.

"I wish you were here to tuck me in, Severus." She yawned, stretching before scrubbing her face with her hands.

"I know. One day. Soon," he assured her.

"Should I cover the mirror, or can I leave it uncovered for a while so I can see you and the house as I drift off?" she asked.

"I'll sit here for a while longer if you want," he said, patting the book on the kitchen table that he'd been reading while waiting for Hermione to unpack her mirror. "After you fall asleep, I'll cover my side until about seven in the morning your time."

"Thank you," she mumbled sleepily as she undressed and slid under the covers.

Before he even finished reading the first page, he heard Hermione breathing deeply, indicating she had fallen to sleep. He did not cover the mirror just yet, as he wanted to watch her sleep. As he read, he would stop once in a while to gaze at her sleeping form.

Severus placed a marker in his book and set it down on the kitchen table. He was just about to cover his side of the mirror when he heard Hermione begin to turn over and thrash about in the bed, calling out in a panicked voice, her words indistinguishable.

Hermione's nightmares had returned, and with the day's events, it was no wonder.

"Hermione, wake up," Severus called out through the mirror.

His voice was enough to rouse her from her sleep. "Oh, Severus, you were being attacked by Alan, and Rita Skeeter was there taking detailed notes while I was getting hexed by a hedgehog that called me names," she said with some confusion.

"Shh, it's just a nightmare. Go to sleep. You need your rest."

Severus waited and watched until Hermione fell asleep before he pulled the black drape over his own mirror to give her privacy as she slept. He wasn't afraid she would have a second nightmare, as she'd told him before that usually, it was just one nightmare for the night.

It was time for lunch, but he had no appetite. Instead he put on his shoes and walked down the street.

Knocking on the door, he saw Draco greet him with a smile.

"Come to have a drink to drown your sorrows?" Draco ribbed lightly.

"No, but you may want to," Severus countered quite somberly. "Come, we need to talk. Something serious has happened back in England. Tell Ginny you're heading out for a bit. You'll probably want to avoid telling her about what I'm about to tell you until after the children are born. Given her hormonal state, she will not take this well at all."

Draco sensed it was something quite serious for Severus to suggest withholding information from Ginny, but he knew that if it was bad enough, he would wait. They went back to Severus' house as that was the only place that could ensure complete privacy, with Severus placing a silencing barrier charm on the mirror so Hermione did not have to hear Draco.
And it was a good thing Severus thought of that spell, since Draco did have quite the conniption fit, especially after Severus told him that Christine knew almost everything, just in case that part about him working as a gigolo came out as well.

Despite Draco's deep tan, he looked pale.

Severus was now in full warpath mode. He would talk to Mounga, who had been referred to as a "swarthy half-giant" in the article, about a counter public relations campaign showing Malu Palekaiko as a peaceful and civilized place filled with a warm sense of community and a diverse blend of cultures, including Muggles. This would be one way to counter such claims of the place being a third-world rat-hole populated by "criminals and the dregs of society." By proving some aspects of the article being false, it would further cause the rest of the expose's veracity to come into question and show it for the biased piece of tripe that it was. That was phase one. Of course, he would have to coordinate something with Christine, since she was the expert on press wrangling and campaigns.

"No, wear the dark wine-colored Hawaiian shirt The green one would be to reminiscent of your Slytherin House affiliation," Christine directed Severus through the mirror as they prepared for Luna's visit.

Severus rolled his eyes, but he knew she was the expert and even silently agreed with her, though he would not say it aloud.

Away from the mirror he changed, coming back to stand before it and ask, "Better?"

"Yes, but it's a pity I could not get a stylist I used to work with to trim your hair a whole lot shorter," she added.

"I'm not cutting my hair. Potions masters are not supposed to cut their hair short until after reaching the age of fifty. This is as a sign of competence – to show they had not burnt their own hair off in a Potions explosion," he informed her tersely.

"Oh, really?" she asked, unaware of that little cultural difference.

Hermione gave him a look to be patient with her Muggle aunt. Christine did not know all these little things, but in a short amount of time she had studied up on wizarding culture to be able to understand most of the cultural peculiarities.
Right on time, there was a knock at the door.

Opening it, Hermione found Luna standing there. She also suddenly noticed the large red letters spelling out "HARLOT TRAITOR" that now vandalized her front door, something that must have happened between when she brought her Aunt Christine to her apartment an hour ago and now.

Hermione looked to Luna with deep embarrassment.

Luna, with her usual casual aplomb, said calmly, "Here, I'll get rid of this for you." With a sweep of her wand, the letters were gone. "And I added an anti-graffiti spell so it shouldn't happen again."

Hermione hugged Luna and asked her to come in.

Luna was introduced to Christine Taylor, with the explanation that because of the Daily Prophet article, it had become a matter of concern for Lavender's business, which is why Christine would be present during the interview.

"It's nice to finally meet you, Christine," Luna said, extending her hand and shaking it.

"Hermione told me that you were once divorced. At some time in the future, would you mind if I interview you? Since divorce is rather rare in the wizarding world, I think it would be rather informative, considering how many in our world do not understand how it works for Muggles, beyond what Hermione briefly told me before."

Christine nodded, saying, "Yes, I would be happy to do an interview at a future time."

"Excellent." Luna turned on the spot and saw the large mirror propped up on an easel across from the settee. Walking over to it, she saw Severus' image in the mirror. "Hello, Professor Snape. Well, actually now it is Mr. Snape. Or would you prefer I call you Severus, since it would make the article more personal and perhaps more sympathetic toward you and Hermione if we do without addressing each other formally. This is why you invited me here, right? To tell your side of the story which seems to be painted in a very one-sided biased light and you want to repair the damage done to both your characters and prevent a backlash against Lavender's company. Am I right?"
Christine had to shut her mouth closed. Because of Luna's vocal mannerisms and slightly vacant stare, she had originally dismissed her as a ditsy airhead who was a touch flighty, but the blonde was just as perceptive and bluntly honest as Hermione had warned her.

"Yes," Hermione spoke for all of them, "this was not a matter we wanted to share with the press for all the world to read, but since the Daily Prophet reported on it and in such a slanted matter and false light, it appears that once again we must come to you to report the truth. Something that has been an on-going habit since the start of the second war, it seems."

Luna sighed to herself. "It does seem that happens quite a lot."

Hermione called for tea, which Marf put on the low table in front of the settee before the interview started.

Hermione began, "Let me preface the beginning of this interview that I believe part of the reason the Daily Prophet article was written in such an unflattering light was the fact that all three reporters who collaborated in that article have a long-standing grudge against me."

"Oh, I am fully aware of Marietta's acne scars and how she received them, and that photo of you posted at the end of your seventh year taken by Colin Creevey resulted in you hexing him," Luna recalled with perfect clarity. Her face then took on a look of befuddled curiosity when she added, "What puzzles me is that Rita would put her name on an article that is blatantly a character assassination piece when you have knowledge of her being an unregistered Animagus, but given that her name is one of three she can claim that she didn't write any of the more unflattering segments, and thus try and get away with it."

"Oh, she's probably still angry I kept her locked up in a jar while she was transformed into a beetle when I caught her trying to eavesdrop on me for another slanderous piece of yellow journalism at the end of the Triwizard Tournament. I forced her to write that article for The Quibbler when your father was still the editor," Hermione surmised. "Maybe it's time to out Rita Skeeter's unknown talent for getting those scoops – put it in a side-bar, then."

Hermione had kept Rita's secret for all those years since she did write the article for The Quibbler that informed the public of Voldemort's return, thus allowing Harry to finally tell his side of the story. However, her casual snipes over the years – at Hermione's job, her divorce, and trial coverage of her case to exonerate Severus and Draco – were bad enough. This latest piece just wiped away the last of Hermione's good will towards the bleached blonde hack.

Turning to the mirror, Luna asked, "Let's start with you, Severus. Since it is obvious the *Daily
Prophet's insinuations of you and Hermione having a relationship while you were still her professor are obviously untrue, as anyone who has ever attended Hogwarts and had you as a professor can attest, how did your romantic relationship with Hermione begin?

Severus and Hermione had briefly discussed how they would address this question. They were both thankful Luna directed the question to him first, since he was better at telling partial truths than Hermione.

"Hermione had stumbled across Draco Malfoy one day," he said, which was the truth, though the spying of Draco fucking Ginny Potter was entirely left out. "Hermione had previously thought that he had left the country after the end of the war, having neither seen nor heard about him over the years. It was upon further research she learned about the finer details of the Death Eater Decree and how it was applied to us in equal measure despite our work for the Order and as spies for Dumbledore. She had not known of the details as the Decree was passed while she was out of the country. It was then she began to search for me, and we eventually met." Though the original circumstances under which they met were left out of course, it was the truth, in a very round-about way, and Hermione was asking Ginny questions about Severus and how to find him before she had even met him as Calleo.

With the deftness that would make any lawyer from Slytherin House proud, Severus laid out the tale of how they met, and their subsequent meetings on how to free Draco and Severus from being persecuted under the Death Eater Decree. In actuality, those particular discussions they had were after she found out that Calleo was actually Severus and had already fallen in love with him, but Luna did not need to be privy to those specific details.

"Well, that cassoulet you made could easily win a witch's heart," Hermione added when she mentioned that he had invited her to dine with him during their many discussions in the evenings on how she could help Severus and Draco.

They admitted that their talks began varying to include talking about Arithmancy, Potions, Runes, and other academic topics and current events, in addition to their weekly dinners.

"And given our previous interview regarding your marriage to Ron, when did you realize that your marriage to Ron was ending? Was it before or after you fell in love with Severus?" Luna asked rather bluntly, but with no malice.

"I hated myself for falling in love with Severus while I was still married to Ron, but it was while falling in love with Severus, I realized what a hollow and futile thing it was to stay in my marriage," Hermione admitted. "I suppose you could say that I had never been in love until I fell for Severus."
Hermione turned to give him a smile, which he returned, until he noticed Luna observing him and he schooled his features once more.

During the interview, Hermione said that upon exhausting all other avenues through which to clear their names, since Severus and Draco's plea to confess their innocence under Veritaserum was denied, they realized they had no other choice but for Hermione to pilfer ingredients from her job at the Ministry.

It was also decided before Luna arrived that Severus would confess that he secretly worked as Lavender's Potions master, and Draco was the head of Marketing and Advertising before Christine Taylor took over the position. Since they were now exonerated, Lavender would be free from prosecution of employing them in a non-sanctioned manner. There was no mention of Blaise Zabini as interim director. As for the jobs they were officially on file doing with the Ministry, Severus said it was a low-level position he was still even too embarrassed to admit.

Luna did ask about his wife, to which Severus merely replied that it was an arranged marriage. Upon You-Know-Who becoming aware of his wife's affair with a Muggle from before they married, he ordered her killed. That was the end of the matter, and no other questions regarding Severus' wife were posed.

It was then that Mounga arrived at Severus' house, during the middle of the interview.

Luna learned that Mounga was not a half-giant, but that because he took after his father's side of the family, which was originally from Tonga, he was just naturally a large and tall person. He even cited several famous Muggle athletes of Tongan and Samoan descent who also were of large frame.

Regarding allegations in the Daily Prophet regarding lascivious dancing and dark rituals at the New Year's Eve ball, Mounga laughed, "Well, Severus is not too fond of Mambo or Rhumba dancing, and he thinks it undignified, but as for lascivious? Hardly."

Hermione piped up, "What I find interesting is that Colin Creevey, who is Muggle-born, gave this eye-witness account of 'lascivious dancing' – yet these are all dances that are common Muggle ballroom dancing steps. For a Muggle-born, it is quite surprising he would call Muggle dancing such derogatory names. I'm sure there are some Muggle-borns who have parents who engage in the hobby of ballroom dancing and would be quite upset that Colin called what their parents do in public 'lascivious.'"
Severus smiled, loving how she turned the tables on Colin, who would probably be fielding some Howlers from Muggle-borns and half-breeds about making such accusations about their parents' and grandparents' dancing activities.

The interview progressed with Mouna explaining how some of the residents were considered criminals in their home countries, but as in many cases, are eventually proven innocent, such as Severus and Draco, or were persecuted for political reasons. Then there were some escaping abuse by a spouse or family. With many of the mixed marriages on the island, in which one spouse is a Muggle, the couple had been shunned by the local populations, both wizarding and Muggle. It seemed that in some countries and even some areas, people were still not comfortable with what they called "inter-breeding."

Severus did tell of how the sanctuary's Muggle population was quite helpful during the recent ice pox break-out and that even one Muggle-born's Muggle family flew all the way out from the southern United States to come and help until the town was back on its feet again. He also told of the free elves on the island working tirelessly to help, which is how Mr. Loddy won a seat on the town council after helping coordinate help to those who needed it most during the outbreak.

It was a rather lengthy interview.

At the end, Luna said, "I could do a lengthy article on Malu Palekaiko alone, based on all the information I've learned today."

"We'd love to have you come out and do one. We'd even pay to put you up at the local hotel for a week, if you want," Mouna offered.

"Oh no," Luna refused. "That would appear that you paid me off to give the place a glowing review with free room and board." Turning to Hermione, she asked, "Is Malu Palekaiko a romantic place?"

Hermione could not stop the broad grin that graced her face, and she began to blush furiously. "Oh, my. It most certainly is," she said with a bit of a longing sigh, her eyes flitting to Severus, who also seemed to be unable to stop the smile from tugging at the corners of his lips.

"I wholeheartedly agree, it can be romantic with the right person," he said, a bit of wistfulness slipping into his reply.
"That's wonderful. Neville and I haven't made arrangements for our honeymoon yet, and the wedding is in less than a month. Maybe a week there would be just the place to go," Luna said brightly. "Is the island completely booked up?"

Mounga laughed, assuring her she would find accommodations easily, while Severus said he would get rates for the honeymoon suite at Justina's hotel for her.

"In closing, Severus, is there anything about England you miss that would make you come back here?" Luna asked, then amended with, "Besides Hermione being here?"

Severus' eyes glanced up towards the ceiling as he said with longing, "A good Stilton. And also access to a broad variety of European wines. It seems they stock mostly wines from the States' West Coast, South America, Australia, and New Zealand. European wines get a rather small shelf space at my local grocery store. But I can have Stilton and my choices for wines Portkeyed in from abroad. We have a shopper who brings back good English teas. I would not return except if Hermione needed me for some reason."

"Now Severus," interjected Hermione a bit shortly, but playfully, "that Riesling from California was as good as any from Germany or France you have served me. And that Malbec from Chile was I think better than the one from the South of France you served one time."

He sniffed haughtily. "That Riesling was passable at best, and the Malbec was a bit too bold--"

"I think you can't bear to admit that other regions can make wines just as good as the Europeans," Hermione threw back lightly as a challenge. "Next time I come back, we'll do a blind taste-test and prove you wrong."

"Care to make a wager for such a serious claim?"

"Gladly, especially if it means I'll win another back-rub or see you doing the dishes," she threw back with a playful smile.

Severus was about to make a retort when he caught Luna gazing at the pair of them with a rather sweet and dreamy look on her face.

"Is something amusing you, Luna?" he asked a bit defensively, still feeling awkward about using her first name in such a casual fashion with a former student he was not good friends with.

She sighed longingly. "You two already sound like an old married couple. It's quite sweet, really."

Christine had the audacity to laugh aloud. "Yes, they do seem like quite the smitten couple, don't they," she said, adding fuel to the fire.

Hermione and Severus both looked a bit abashed and toned down their playful banter since it would no doubt be include in the article one way or another. As much as they wanted to show the world that there was nothing wrong about their love for one another, they did not want to put too much of their affection and relationship on display for the amusement of others.

~~~~~*~

Severus had Hermione read over the paragraph one more time. Katrina was been mewling rather loudly, demanding more ear-scratching while sitting on his lap, so he'd missed that last part.

Hermione turned the page of the latest edition of The Quibbler rather pleased that it certainly seemed to paint their love affair in a rather sympathetic and non-scandalous light. There was even a quote by Ron saying that while he and Snape had always been at odds with one another due to House rivalry and his close association with Harry Potter, he had no qualms about them being in love and supported their relationship since it made Hermione happy, something neither of them were when they were married to each other.

She had no idea Luna had gone to her ex-husband for a quote, but was thrilled that Ron's quote seemed to remove some of the sting of them beginning their affair while Hermione was still married.

Once she was done reading the article, Severus asked if there was any other interesting news featured in The Quibbler that day.

"Nargle thefts are up, according to Ministry accounts," Hermione said blandly as she began rattling off the various headlines. "In Godric's Hollow, there was an apothecary shop that had a break-in. Ooh, there is talk about repaving the cobblestones down the high street in Hogsmeade and whether such a construction project might disturb any long sleeping and possibly forgotten magical creatures or entities that may have taken up residence under the stones that were first laid in the early 1200's."

Severus and Hermione discussed the pros and cons of such a construction project until Gary showed up and they began their Japanese language lesson.

Luna's article did cast Hermione and Severus' relationship in an entirely different light. The threatened boycott was fortunately averted, public opinion once swayed again with the truth presented with Luna's deft turn of a phrase and acute insight. The occasional Howler still came addressed to Hermione, wondering how she could betray her Muggle-born background and be involved with a Death Eater, despite all his work for the Order. Hermione went through the symbolic gesture of paying for ingredients she'd pilfered through her job at the Ministry, for a show of good faith that she was not a thief.

Near the end of January, Christine gave birth to a very healthy baby boy that she named Auberon, after Hermione's maternal grandfather that she never knew, since he died when Hermione was still a baby.

Severus was mildly interested in the baby photo of Hermione's new cousin, a cousin who was young enough to be her own son, as well as the latest photos of Josephine, Lavender and Ron's child. He supposed that one day he would have children, and he would no doubt be showing off photos of his own son or daughter with great pride. For the fact that Severus was not close to Lavender and was only briefly acquainted with Christine, he could not feign much interest. They were merely children of people with whom he was not particularly close to. And while Lavender was once his boss, theirs was a tenuous friendship, and Christine was a relation of Hermione that until recently she was rather distant to as well.

Of course, when Katrina birthed her kittens, Severus was happy to show Hermione each kitten in the mirror with parental-like pride. Hermione was taken with the kittens, asking Severus to not give away the one calico in the litter of five, since he had offers from many to adopt the kittens once they were born.

He supposed his own attitude towards human babies would change to something more positive upon the birth of Ginny and Draco's impending triplets.

It was during the Japanese tea ceremony that the Malfoys had asked Severus and Hermione to be the children's godparents. Hermione and Severus knew of many people, besides Harry, who had been or knew of children currently being raised by godparents, since both wars claimed many adults. They accepted the offer, humbled the Malfoys would entrust their children to them, should anything happen.

"All right, Hermione. Read to us the haiku poem you have composed," Gary requested, peering at her through the charmed mirror.
Finally finding the right piece of parchment on which she’d completed the assignment, she read,

"Steam rises curling
Fragrant tea perfumes the air
I wait patiently"

Severus smiled to himself, remembering the evenings together and their game of her guessing the ingredients in his latest brew.

"Excellent," her Sensei praised her, but then discussed her choice of the pronoun she’d used – Watashi, for "I" – and instructed her in the finer points of that particular pronoun. He gave her a suggestion that she might change it to Uchi given the reflective tone of the haiku while remaining gender-neutral so the poem could be read by either gender. Of course she would have to rewrite it as it no longer had five syllables at the end.

"Severus, care to share you haiku?" Gary prompted his other student.

The Potions master cleared his throat before reading aloud in Japanese,

"Petals in a stream
Slowly floating to the sea
Thoughts lost in the breeze"

He had been inspired to write that on a recent evening hike to clear his mind, and had seen the yellow blossoms of the buttercup tree floating down the stream.

Severus was praised for his haiku, but his mind was momentarily lost recalling at the time how he wished Hermione was there with him to enjoy the vision of flower petals gliding along the water.

"Hermione, I would like by week’s end a scroll on pronoun usage, and one on Japanese flora and fauna symbolism and how they differ from European symbolism. Severus, I want you to begin reading that book on Japanese ‘fairy’ tales and write an analysis on the symbolism in those stories,” Gary instructed them, both assignments very relevant to understand Japanese Potions texts.

Once Gary left, Hermione said a bit morosely, "Perhaps I should have read him the other haiku I wrote instead," feeling a bit let down that the haiku she’d worked so hard on was criticized for her particular pronoun choice.

"Why did you read this one instead?" asked Severus.

"I don't know," Hermione lied before finally admitting, "I guess it seemed a bit personal, and Gary would have read right through me if I'd read it aloud.

"Sun sets on the day
Waiting to knock on the door
Of sanctuary"

Severus smiled. "Yes, given your inability to keep a poker face, that was wise of you. I could have kept a straighter face, but given my second haiku, it would have been far more obvious," he admitted.

"Oh, really? Read on, Severus. Read on," she said with great interest.

"Her moonlit shadow
Cast upon my rumpled sheets
I dream when she's near"

"I think I would have outright blushed had you read that aloud," Hermione confessed.

"And that is why I read the other one." He smiled at her again until he noticed she'd put her hand momentarily to her head as if to steady herself. "Have you eaten breakfast yet?" His tone was not kind, but accusatory, knowing that with the stress of the past month and having to deal with the fallout of the Daily Prophet article, she was not eating. He did not like how she was getting too thin yet again.

"I'll eat when I have the stomach for it, Severus. You know how my stomach gets into knots and I can hardly have the appetite to choke something down when I'm this upset," she bit back more harshly than she intended. Public harassment of her had mellowed quite considerably after Luna's article, but it was still ever present with the looks people gave her if she ventured down Diagon Alley with her cloak hood down.

"You ate just fine when I'd fix you something when you came over, despite how stressed you were then," he countered a bit hotly referring to their summer together.

"Because I was happy when I was with you," Hermione yelled, suddenly breaking down into tears.

Even with the mirrors that allowed Hermione and Severus to see and talk to each other every day, and even engage in a little long distance "mirror sex," the stress of them being kept apart strained their relationship and it would flare up like an old wound, twanging when suddenly provoked for no reason. They did not bicker often or yell at each other much, but periodically the strain rose up like a sea monster, breaking the surface to be seen briefly before disappearing once more into the unfathomable depths of their subconscious.

While living apart from one another, Hermione would periodically wake with a start in the middle of the night, her brow soaked in a cold sweat. She could not roll over and reach out across the bed to find the comforting presence of Severus, and that is when nightmares returned like malevolent poltergeists in the dark of night.

Severus would not admit it, but when he and Hermione had been briefly reunited, he did not mind being woken up in the middle of the night. The pressure of a small, warm hand in the middle of his back, or placed upon the expanse of his chest suddenly in the quiet hours, would soon be followed by Hermione's fleeting unconscious sigh of relief that he was there to protect and love her. Then she would give a snuffling noise and turn to fall back to sleep, her even breaths telling him that she was slumbering once more. Without Severus in her bed, it was obviously harder for Hermione to fall back asleep.

It did not help that the Potions apprentice was beginning to push herself harder once more, making her more tired and taxed.

Bracing her elbows on her kitchen table, her head in her hands, she heaved a sob before she apologized. "I'm sorry, Severus. It's been a rather stressful month. So stressful, I skipped my period."

There was no chance of Hermione being pregnant since she already had her cycle once since returning from Malu Palekaiko, but some part of Severus deep down inside wanted her to be pregnant. At least then there would be a reason for him to petition the Potions certification board for Hermione to finish her apprenticeship with him and they could be together and possibly married, even if she wasn't finished with her apprenticeship. Of course he did not share this secret wish, but it was there in his heart, wanting any reason for her to be there back with him.

"I'm sorry for yelling at you. I know you're concerned. I'll eat something before I go into work, I promise," she said before rising from the kitchen table to set the kettle on for another cup of tea and to finally eat something.

"For your visit for Valentine's Day next week, as brief as it may be, I would prefer you fully nourished. It is preferable than having the visit spent brewing restorative potions because you're too tired," he said, insinuating she would need her strength for their brief rejoining.

"Sleep, eat, and making love, and not necessarily in that order," she said, a bit more softly, looking forward to her Portkey to Hawaii on Sunday night. She just wished she didn't have to leave Tuesday.

Severus had even arranged to be entirely out of the shop for Valentine's Day. He had scheduled appointments and commissions so that he could spend a solid forty-eight hours with Hermione without having to emerge from their home during her brief stay, similar to the Malfoys' honeymoon.

Hermione couldn't wait to see Severus again. She even bought him a Valentine's Day present that she knew he would appreciate. It was an antique wizarding book of erotic Japanese shunga prints where the figures moved, interspersed with sexually suggestive haiku. When buying it, she imagined that after Severus unwrapped it she would suggest they could practice their pronunciation while reading poems to one another in bed.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Thank you to my wonderfully talented betas, JuneW and Cygnuz. And sorry for the long delay uploading this chapter, I was hit with a very bad case of the flu with chest infection and laid out for a full week, though still recovering with massive lung hacking right now. I am getting better, but worst chest infection I've had in three decades.
Chapter Summary

Back in London, Draco and Ginny join Hermione for dinner, but dinner plans go awry with an unexpected guest.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

Chapter One Hundred Eleven
"Don't Worry, Baby"

Disclaimer:
Well, I've been disclaiming a whole lot
For oh I don't know how long
I don't know why
But I keep insisting
Rowling's owned Potter for so long
But she lets me go play
With her characters my own way
And she says "Don't worry, baby"
Don't worry, baby
Don't worry, baby
I won't sue you for infringement tonight
Don't worry, baby

A/N: Disclaimer a parody of "Don't Worry Baby" Songwriters: WILSON, BRIAN DOUGLAS / CHRISTIAN, ROGER VAL / MARGO, MITCHELL STUART / MARGO, PHILIP / MEDRESS, HENRY / SIEGEL, JAY
Don't Worry Baby lyrics © Universal Music Publishing Group

Severus practically flew out the front door of his shop when he heard the news Ginny and Draco's babies had arrived.

The medical clinic was decorated with obnoxious St. Patrick's Day paper décor that was more insidiously "cute" than the ones Bongo put up in his bar. Ignoring the tasteless decorating for the holiday, Severus walked back to the recovery room to find Ginny resting comfortably in bed, looking quite exhausted, but joyous. Draco was looking a bit haggard and unshaven, but he looked elated beyond even the day they had been granted sanctuary in Malu Palekaiko.

In his arms, Draco held one of his new triplet infants. "I have never seen anything so beautiful in my life. All three of them are perfect," he said in a reverent whisper.

Severus was thrilled for them. Now they were truly bound, and both of them could not be happier for it. And with the blessings of three healthy, beautiful babies, they were ecstatic.

"Congratulations," Severus said with deep sincerity as he entered the small room where Ginny was recuperating.

Rainbow had brought a specialist over from Sydney to help with the birth, since triplets were a rarity in the wizarding world. Everything went smoothly, thanks to the Healer's experience in birthing twins, which was his specialty.

"Ginny, how are you faring?" Severus asked with concern. He knew all the Potions required to help witches in postpartum, and he had already brewed many in advance of the slew of impending births on the island. Even Halulu had given birth to twin girls a few weeks prior.

"Wonderfully, all things considering, though a bit worn out."

Severus nodded, knowing all too well why she would be.

"So is it three boys, three girls, a mix?" Severus asked. When he received the news at work, he had not heard any more information than Ginny had finally finished giving birth. He was actually excited to know.

"Two girls and a boy," Draco informed him, looking up from gazing adoringly at one of his daughters that he was still gently rocking in his arms, but she began to fuss.

Ginny asked for her daughter, so Draco brought her over and Ginny began breastfeeding her.

As she nursed, Ginny said, "Draco and I have not entirely settled on all the names yet. And though we have debated, there is one name we would like to use, but only if you are all right with it," Ginny began.

"We would like to name our son Sebastian in honor of you," Draco announced. "We all know how life would have turned out differently had you not been there for me, Severus."

Severus felt his throat close up. "I would be honored," he choked out, suddenly feeling a bit overwhelmed. "Thank you."

Seeing Severus a bit overcome, Ginny asked, "Would you like to hold one of them?"

He nodded dumbly, sitting down. It had not escaped his memory that had his wife and child lived, he could have been a grandfather by now, as Ginny and his child would have been classmates from the same school year.

Draco got up and fetched one infant who was just waking up. As he cradled the babe in his arms, he cooed softly, "Come meet your godfather."

Severus had never held a child before, especially one so newly born, but he knew how to place his arms to rest the child comfortably in his arms, having seen it enough times.

"Severus, I'd like to introduce you to Libra, one of the twin girls," he said with great pride.

Severus stared down at the infant who gazed back up at him quietly with great intensity. "Hello, Libra. It is a pleasure to finally meet you." He wished more than anything that Hermione was here to share in this moment.

Libra began to squirm, which made Severus wonder what he did wrong to make her start to cry until it was explained she was probably hungry again. It was then he was introduced to his other goddaughter, Phoenix, and finally to Sebastian.

When Sebastian began to cry, Ginny suggested Severus try humming or singing to soothe him, since the baby was just fed and he wasn't in need of a nappy change. Severus began to rock his godson in his arms and hum softly, which caused Sebastian to calm down and begin to yawn. Eventually Sebastian drifted off to sleep. When Draco offered to take Sebastian and lay him down, Severus asked if he could hold him for a bit longer.
Severus missed the very meaningful glance exchanged between Draco and Ginny, since he could hardly pry his eyes away from this tiny being.

Now more than anything, Severus wished he could have seen Hermione hold her new cousin, Auberon, or Lavender's infant, Josephine, or even Potter and Zhubanysh's new child who was unfortunately named after Severus' old nemesis. Now he would be trying to imagine what Hermione would look like with their own child held in her arms some day.

Perhaps when the Malfoys went back to England next month, in April – for a spring party to introduce their children to Ginny's family and the rest of wizarding society, in addition to showing off the newly refurbished Malfoy manor – they might swing by Hermione's flat and she could finally hold one of their godchildren.

~~~~~~~*~

Hermione hated reading the gossip rags, but she was curious as to what the tone was regarding the Malfoys coming back to England. If anything, she was doing reconnaissance to see if there would be something close to a public lynching, which was damn near what she faced upon her return. To her surprise, the news of the Malfoy family return was met with fanfare and growing excitement of a positive nature, especially regarding the one-month old triplets. She complained about this to Severus through their mirrors.

"Why is it Draco – who is also an exonerated ex-Death Eater who worked for the Order, and even ran off with Harry's wife – is welcomed home like the prodigal son, yet you are treated with such disdain and my association with you is comparable to selling one's soul to the devil?" Hermione queried, pretending to be bored reading while her disgust was thinly veiled at best. She took a sip of her morning tea, trying not to slam down the china cup on its saucer when she put it down.

"I took my mark willingly, as foolish as I was as a lad, and was a willing Death Eater for a few years before I came to my senses. In contrast, Draco took his mark against his will and joined the Order immediately," Severus reminded her as he ate dinner. "And let's not forget the fact that I taught Potions to most of the witches and wizards in Great Britain who were born between 1970 and 1988, and their memories of me as their professor are not fond ones, nor are the memories from my former classmates."

Hermione made more grumbling remarks under her breath, but Severus did not prompt her to speak more clearly, allowing her to mutter to herself in peace.

"Besides, Malfoy is an old name with wealth and prestige attached to it, while the Snape name is nothing more than a soiled name that has no money associated with it nor any clout," Severus went on as if reciting dry historical facts from a dusty tome. "My last name has long been a house renown for alcoholic abusive husbands, feeble-minded, weak-willed wives and progeny of no social standing and bad tempers. Ginny's family, of course, is poor but well-known, with one son a Quidditch player and two sons successful businessmen.

"And let's not forget that Draco and Ginny will be feeding the masses who come in hopes of getting a photo in the society pages. Of the simpering masses, who doesn't love a night of free food and drink on someone else's Sickle in hopes of ingratiating themselves to be invited to another fete filled with more free food and drink?"

Hermione knew exactly that type of people. They were the people in the neighborhood who only socialized with her parents when they threw a party at which the Grangers provided food and refreshments for everyone. She remembered a few of those parties her parents had thrown when she was a child, until her parents realized they were not being invited to other neighborhood parties in reciprocation.

It was a slightly underhanded way of buying the public's good will, with a spring party at Malfoy Manor. However, if that was what was needed to help turn public sentiment such that he did not have to worry about his family being hexed, Draco was willing to do so.

"Then there is the fact that the Malfoy family helped build the Grand Royal Supper Club," Severus added.

"Well, that explains why they put bread crumbs in their cassoulet if the kitchen staff used to work at Malfoy Manor," Hermione said as an aside, which made Severus smirk. He had told her about his bet with Draco and the beard-growing competition between them. "I wish you were going to be here for the party, Severus. You could see me wear those pearls you gave me for Valentine's Day with that new green dress I told you about, in person. A known Gryffindor wearing green in public on the arm of the former Head of Slytherin House; I'm sure it will be quite the scandal, and you would love to watch everyone squirm with discomfort."

"I know, but with the upcoming SATs, this is the worst time of year. Extra tutoring sessions and brewing classes had been booked long before Draco and Ginny picked the date; I can't leave." Severus was still rather reluctant to go back to England despite his December attempt to return, and even without the upcoming tutoring schedule he would have preferred not to, as tempting as the scenario Hermione presented was.

Hermione would have complained that Draco and Ginny could have picked another week, but that also was something that could not have been worked around. Portkey travel for infants under a month was strongly discouraged, especially for international travel, so they had to wait a month after the triplets were born before they could travel back to England. And they couldn't arrange their trip at a later date since the Lovely Lavender Company's new plant was finally going to begin construction and Draco had to be present to supervise. The week of April 17th was the only option, unfortunately.

"Speaking of tests, how do you feel about your upcoming code of ethics test tomorrow?" he asked, hoping to change topics and brighten her mood.

Scrubbing her face with her hands, she said, "Honestly, at this point, I don't know. I mean, I read any random passage or rule or section and it all seems like I've committed them to heart, but when I try to recall specifically word for word, I find myself faltering."

"It's not so much a word-for-word recitation they want; it's whether you understand the concept stated in various codes," he reminded her. "The purpose of the test for code of ethics is not to train you to be a parrot and regurgitate on demand, but to understand the meaning and intent of each code in the book."

"I know, I know," she sighed. She looked a bit worn out despite having almost seven hours of sleep after staying up late studying. "It's just I fear I'll freeze, jumble the words, and I'll wind up sounding like a drunken troll."

"Maybe a Calming Draught would be in order before you take your test then?" Severus proposed. He knew that it was skirting the bounds and was an allowable potion to take before some Potions tests, but he also knew Hermione would pass on it based on principle.

Hermione shook her head, just as he thought she would. "No, I have to do this on the up-and-up all the way, or I won't respect myself."

Rising from the kitchen table, she blew a kiss to Severus before reaching out and pressing her hand to the glass of the mirror, as he went to the mirror to press his hand to hers. This was a ritual during their daily farewells.

Smiling, Severus mused, "You know what Jerry would say at this point?"

Hermione shook her head, wondering what other pearl of wisdom Jerry would have added.

Severus tried his best at a falsetto, singing, "Don't worry, baby. Everything will turn out all right."
Hermione laughed, having never heard Severus attempt singing in a high voice, much less a song by The Beach Boys, but glad to hear him sing more often. Since her return in January, she had been able to get Severus to sing to her at least once every few weeks. It was nice to see him be a bit lighthearted. His musical comment was even optimistic instead of his usual dose of pessimism, which was a sign that Severus was learning that the future was not always going to be bleak and disappointing.

In closing, Severus said, "I'll see Draco and Ginny off tomorrow morning. Let me know that Draco and Ginny make it there all right."

"I will. I can't wait to finally meet our godchildren," Hermione nearly squealed with excitement, finally finding a topic to be happy about, her mood lightened by Severus' singing.

She had seen the babies through the mirror when the Malfoys came over to their house. Seeing Severus hold little Phoenix in his arms like he was an old pro certainly made her heart glow and her stomach flutter pleasantly, actually looking forward to the day when she and Severus could start trying for children. They hadn't talked about it since her trip back in December, but the idea of having children was becoming a much less intimidating concept for her.

Before Hermione went to work, she decided to swing by the Ministry. After walking up the stairs where the Auror offices were, she rounded the corner next to Harry's office and was nearly bowled over by someone fully concealed in a cloak. By the size and frame of the person, it was most likely another witch.

"Pardon!" Hermione exclaimed, shocked at the sudden bodily contact. She grabbed at her shoulder that now felt heat bloom across the joint, knowing that it was going to develop into a lovely bruise.

The other person kept plowing on as if they didn't notice the collision, though Hermione distinctly heard the person growl, "Bitch," under their breath.

Hermione scowled at the rudeness of the other person, wishing people would get over the fact she was in a relationship with Severus and move on.

Walking up to the entrance to Harry's office, she knocked on the open door. She saw Harry bent over his desk, his hand fisted in his hair as he stared blankly at the pile of parchments scattered across his desktop. Hermione asked, "Is this a bad time?"
"No, no, come in," he invited her as he exhaled. Harry glanced up at the doorjamb where Hermione stood and waved his wand to shut the door with a bit more force than necessary. She also heard him put up a Silencing Spell to prevent anyone eavesdropping at the door.

Hermione didn't like the look of concern on Harry's face and asked, "Is everything all right?" Out of habit, when she began to fret herself, her hand reached for the pendant around her neck and began to worry at it with her thumb.

"Yeah. Just, had a short row with an old friend," he said dismissively.

Hermione glanced back and wondered if the person who had nearly knocked her over in the hall was the same person Harry just had words with.

She was about to ask who it was when Harry noticed her nervous tic. "I'm glad to see you are still wearing that necklace I gave you. More than ever now," he said a bit darkly, reaching down his shirt to pull out his pendant, showing her he still wore its match night and day.

"Yes, it seems that despite Severus working for the Order and having proven he was in no way involved with the attack on Hogwarts, and that Dumbledore knowingly sent him and Draco away when he knew the school might be attacked in order to protect their loyalty to him until the final battle, are not enough to convince others of their innocence." Hermione sighed. Then she finally remembered something she had been meaning to ask him for some time, prompted by his comment. "That night Alan Parker attacked me. My mind was so muddled. I can't recall if I ever called for you by grabbing onto the pendant before I was hit with that Stunning Spell."

"Actually, the one you are wearing has an enhanced call for distress spell imbued in it. You merely have to be wearing it and call for me in your mind. It seems I gave you one of the new prototypes by accident. It was developed after one incident where someone was hit with a curse before they could grab their pendant," he confessed. "Good thing, too. If you had been wearing one of the older Auror pendants that night, if you didn't grab hold of the necklace before you got hit, I would have never known to come find you."

"Yes, that is a good thing, for I think I didn't grab hold of it at all, or maybe I did. The whole night was a big blur." Hermione looked at Harry's desk as she tried to not let her mind go down the rabbit hole of remembering her night of terror. Instead, she focused on all the items on his desk, noticing the piles of clutter here and there, and how one could easily lose a multitude of items amongst the scrolls, parchments, new family photos featuring himself, Zhubanysh and little James, an empty Chocolate Frog box, a half-drunk cup of tea that was stone cold, the latest copy of Quidditch Weekly, and old make-up mirror compact already buried under a sheaf of parchment. Many items were most probably left behind by Zhubanysh when she brought James by the office recently.

"Well," she said, trying to get back to the reason why she came by Harry's office in the first place, "I've been reading the society pages and gossip rags, and it seems sentiment toward Draco and Ginny has thawed considerably. People are even looking forward to their returning, with the spring ball they're throwing. So I think for the most part, the general sentiment is that this is a good thing."

"Thanks for taking time to read those articles for me. I've had such a heavy work load, as I've been staying late a lot of nights, and Zhubanysh is fit to be tied with these late nights this week and me coming home late for dinner. I know how busy you are with work and your apprenticeship. I truly appreciate it," Harry said gratefully.

"Well, they are my godchildren," Hermione replied, sitting up straighter with a more serious look on her face. "Severus and I would do anything to protect them, and if it means reading some twaddle on people guessing what Ginny will wear to the party, and if she has reached her pre-pregnancy weight already, it's worth it.

"So, has the entire staff at the Portkey office been briefed that further leaks to the press when people return result in getting sacked?" Hermione asked pointedly, glad the person who leaked her return in January to Rita Skeeter was fired.

"Yes. When are they arriving?"

"They leave in the morning at nine, which means they arrive here at eight this evening. I thought I would welcome them, since Severus is concerned about them arriving safely." Hermione noticed the time after glancing at the clock. "Well, I better be heading off to work. Albert has me initiating research on a new project today, and I have to deal with some accounting matters with the company goblin later."

"Have a good day then, and let Lavender know we're free this weekend to bring James over for a play date with Josephine." Harry rose to give Hermione a hug good-bye.

"Harry, they're only a few months old," she pointed out.

"Yes, but Zhubanysh says it's nice to have some adult conversation and trade mothering tips with Lavender."
Hermione laughed, wondering if she'd ever find herself trading tips with another mother. She had already heard most of the tips when she was married to Ron, as all the other Weasley women swapped ideas and tips for everything from diaper rash to gas to the children's magic kicking in at the most inopportune times, such as their diapers suddenly disappearing off their bottoms.

In the atrium of the Ministry, Hermione Floo'ed directly to work. She emerged from the fireplace in the company's main reception area, since she didn't have a fireplace in her office. After taking the lift up, she opened the lift door and heard a shriek behind Lavender's door.

Hermione had been told by Severus that some of the times he had heard screaming from behind her office door, it had been Lavender having a snit of epic proportions, and in one instance it was that time he had discovered Lavender with Ron in flagrante delicto. Hermione was about to let Lavender have her temper tantrum in peace when she distinctly heard a second voice screaming and a loud thump.

Bursting through the door, Hermione found Lavender and Padma Patil rolling about the floor like a couple of first years engaging in good old-fashioned fisticuffs. It seems their wands had been discarded, as they lay on the floor haphazardly forgotten as the witches scratched at and pummeled each other.

"What is going on here!" bellowed Hermione, feeling like a mother who had come in on two children causing mischief – instead of two grown witches in the midst of a bare-knuckle brawl.

Padma gave one last good yank of Lavender's thoroughly skewed hairdo before separating herself from the other witch. With a face of utter loathing, Padma turned to Hermione as she sat partially upright and screeched, "Nothing of your concern, you Death Eater fucking whore!"

As Hermione whipped out her wand, should she need to defend herself, Padma Summoned her wand and Disapparated from the spot with a crack.

Lavender still lay inelegantly sprawled on the floor, rubbing her jaw that was beginning to bloom with a lovely swelling where Padma's right hook had made contact. Hermione rushed over and helped Lavender go to her bathroom to begin cleaning up.

The bruised witch removed all her make-up with her wand, since her face was too sore to use the make-up removing cloth she'd developed with Severus years ago. Brushing out her hair, she hissed, "Feels like that bitch took a hunk of my hair out. Damn."
Once Lavender's hair was brushed, Hermione began tending to her employer's injuries.

"Care to tell me what that was all about?" Hermione asked.

"Just another periodic visit from Padma who still blames me for Parvati's condition. Seems the visits happen more frequently since that Quibbler article came out, the one where Severus told the world he and Draco worked for me all along. Padma has been calling me a hypocritical traitor and worse. She continues to insist that I should have been the one raped and Crucio'ed until my mind was like scrambled eggs," Lavender said while trying to avoid talking out of one side of her mouth, where she had a split lip.

Hermione had always known the story about Lavender and Parvati being kidnapped and Parvati's long-term condition, but only years later learned that Lavender had been able to escape thanks to Blaise while Parvati was dumped off at the gates of Hogwarts after being abused so terribly for a few days.

"She's pressing forward with trying to get the Wizengamot to block my ability to visit Parvati at St. Mungo's, despite the fact that I'm the one who visits her every week ever since I finished my seventh year and who pays all her extra care bills," Lavender ground out, trying best not to move her lips too much. "Padma visits but a few times a year at best, yet the Wizengamot is willing to hear her case given that she is Parvati's only family, since her parents disowned her after she was attacked."

Hermione knew about Lavender's financial actions – taking care of Parvati's bills at St. Mungo's full-time, and funding additional research to try and find a cure for her friend's condition – but did not know about this latest legal development until just now.

"Today, Padma came over to serve me legal papers to cease and desist seeing Parvati, which I'll contest in court, of course." Lavender turned her face to the side and began applying a cream to make the swelling on her face go down. "And then it all devolved from there. You came in right after we disarmed each other, and she launched herself at me like a banshee possessed."

Looking over her shoulder to the office, Hermione suggested, "Maybe you should lock the Floo in your office for safe measure. After coming home from my Christmas trip, I keep my Floo locked all the time, even if the Howlers have mostly stopped."

"Well, after Luna wrote that article about her honeymoon in Malu Palekaiko, and how people come there for a fresh start and all that rigmarole, the Howlers directed to me personally and the Lovely Lavender Company seemed to drop off entirely."

"What I don't get is, it was briefly covered in the press about Draco becoming your Vice President for Advertising and Marketing for Asia Pacific back in October, yet no one thought it was the same person or didn't care until that Daily Prophet tripe came out at New Year's. That's what bothers me." Hermione sighed, not understanding the mercurial nature of public opinion when swayed by a few choice words placed in print.

As Lavender dabbed on more potions and gel-like substances, the damage done to her face began to fade. "I've got it from here. Why don't you go back to your office? Albert is anxious to talk with you about the cellulite cream project."

Hermione walked though Lavender's office and noticed some items had been knocked off her desk. Using her wand, she repaired a broken figurine with a quick spell and levitated it to sit once more on the edge of Lavender's desk. She also put back into place a few papers, a quill holder, several quills, a cloisonne box that seemed to have held a small mirror that had fallen out of the box, and a picture of Ron holding Josephine.

~~~~~~~*~

Severus was ready and waiting for her when she got home. Through the mirror though the other side was covered, he heard the Floo roar to life. It wasn't but for a few more seconds until the cloth was removed and Hermione greeted him with a radiant smile.

"How did it go?" he asked expectantly.

"I passed! With First Class level marks!" she crowed triumphantly.

With the good news, Severus popped the cork on the champagne and toasted to Hermione's success on passing her code of ethics exams. Marf had a chilled bottle ready for Hermione as well and served up a glass to his mistress.

"To Hermione, who will easily make Potions Mistress Extremely Talented, Third Class one day soon," Severus toasted, tipping his glass towards the mirror.

"Hear! Hear!"
They drank simultaneously.

"Pity I have to put in at least five years of work before I can graduate up to Second Class. Then I have yet five more years until I reach First Class, and that's with learning additional languages with each Class upgrade and more Potions developed, and publishing." Hermione noted.

Severus took another sip of champagne before putting it down and adding, "Yes, but given your academic and ambitious nature, that will be easy enough for you to accomplish."

"If it's just a matter of learning the languages, publishing, and developing Potions, I don't understand why there is a five-year wait to advance," she questioned.

"Because otherwise you'll have Potions masters and mistresses seeking to push themselves to reach the highest grade and burning themselves out in the process or not pacing themselves, and sometimes time itself can be an excellent teacher."

Hermione gave him a very sultry look as she leaned towards the mirror in her parlor-cum-boudoir. "Time has made you very, very knowledgeable, my dear Potions master." She tipped up the champagne flute and drained the last of it before setting it down on the settee. She had a look in her eye that said she wanted to celebrate with something a bit more intimate than a drink.

Just as she started unbuttoning her blouse, she heard a thunk in her fireplace, followed shortly by a rapping at her door.

Rolling her eyes, she held her finger up to indicate she would only be a moment.

Upon opening the door, she found Ginny on her front doorstep.

"So, did you pass?"

Hermione laughed and waved Ginny in. "Yes, Ginny, I passed, just as I was telling Severus I did."

"Hello, Severus," Ginny called through the glass. Turning back to Hermione, she said, "Well, I tried to Floo on over, but you locked your Floo."
"Yes, so I heard," Hermione said a bit dryly. "Maybe I should just unlock my Floo during the rest of your visit this week, but you should also owl ahead of time so I'm not in the middle of anything when you visit," she tried to hint delicately.

Ginny looked down at the champagne glass on the table in front of the settee. She then noticed the top button of Hermione's blouse wasn't properly buttoned, and Severus was buttoning up his half-unbuttoned shirt. Flushing, she stammered, "Oh, I am so sorry, I disturbed you. It's just that Draco and I were just eager to hear if you passed."

"It's okay," Hermione said, but heard Severus give a huff of protest. She then put forward, "How about you come over tomorrow night with Draco? We can have dinner here while Severus joins us while he has breakfast."

"Oh, that does sound lovely." Ginny turned to smile at Severus, but then noticed a slightly impatient look in his face. "Draco has a few questions for Severus, which he can ask then. So I'd better just toddle off now and leave you two at it, so to speak."

Severus gave her a look that her innuendo was not particularly subtle, but waved farewell to her regardless. "Until tomorrow."

Ginny didn't even bother leaving via the front door. Instead, she Apparated right from the spot back home, understanding that her friends no longer wished to be interrupted.

"Now, where were we," Severus purred as he began unbuttoning his shirt once again.

"I believe I was on the settee, but I suppose I can move on over to the bed for greater comfort and possibilities," Hermione said suggestively. She slowly sauntered over to the bed, using her wand to turn the mirror on the easel to face in the right direction.

Keeping her back to the mirror, Hermione slowly unbuttoned her blouse. She glanced over her shoulder with a smoky stare as she exposed one shoulder, then the other, as she let the fabric slide off her arms and expose her back for Severus' view.

Severus growled with appreciation, enjoying the slow building of anticipation. His own shirt was divested. He let his hands glide over the hard, flat planes of his stomach and chest; he knew Hermione liked watching him touch himself in the way she wished she could, imagining it was her own hands on his skin.

At an agonizingly slow pace, Hermione unzipped the back of her skirt, the zipper making a noise loud enough for Severus to hear through the mirror. She slowly pushed the waist of her skirt past her hips and let it fall to the floor.

"Ah, mercy me," Severus sighed. He was in awe of the sight of her wearing stockings with seams up the back of her legs; the stockings were held up by lacy black suspenders, and she had a matching lacy black bra and knickers. She had dressed in anticipation of the occasion, much to his delight.

Returning the favor, Severus undid the fly of his trousers and indelicately reached in to adjust himself.

Hermione licked her lips, remembering the feel and taste of Severus in her mouth, wishing it was already June when she would make her next trip out, since her March trip had been canceled due to construction not having begun yet. It had been a little over two months since they had been in each other's arms, during her Valentine's Day trip; they were both aching for each other, right down to their very core.

Turning around to face Severus, she reached up and pulled the pins from her hair before she shook out her mane. As it cascaded around her shoulders and caressed the tops of her breasts, Severus gave an audible sigh.

"The next time we meet, I want to tease you mercilessly," Hermione exhaled, her voice rich with yearning.

"You're teasing me quite well enough as it is." Severus began to slip his trousers down, leaving his underpants on to prolong the long-distance seduction. For added effect, he stroked his stiffening length through his underpants, making the shape of his member quite visible to discern.

"But I love to hear you beg, it makes me want to yield to your every desire," she cooed sweetly as she reached up and unclasped her brassiere. She slowly dropped the straps of one shoulder, followed by the next, before slowly pulling the lace and satin away from her breasts.

Severus ran his fingers through his hair, pulling it away from his face in order to keep his hands busy and stop himself from reaching directly for his own cock, wishing he was there with her. Had he been in the very room with her, he would have pushed her up against a bed post and begged to enter her right then and there.

To add to the torture, Hermione turned away from him to present him with a glorious view of her arse as she slowly bent over to slowly pull her knickers down. As they slid down, her could see her swollen lips dusted with her dark brown curls come into view from her position, as if taunting him that he could not sink himself into her snug warmth.

Still bent over, she peered behind her past her legs, her hair trailing down to her feet while she was still wearing her heels.

"Stay in that position and touch yourself," he asked in a husky voice.

Complying with his request, she reached around and began slowly caressing herself. As she toyed and teased herself, Severus finally shucked his underpants and began leisurely stroking himself in front of the mirror for Hermione's equal viewing pleasure.

Being bent over was fine and dandy for short periods of time, but not for long. She readjusted herself on the edge of the bed, spreading her legs wide for Severus to get a good look as she caressed her breasts with one hand and began fingering herself with another.

"Oh God, how I want you to fuck me," Hermione plaintively wished aloud.

"Then maybe something can be done about that," he proposed.

Reaching over to her bedside table, she pulled out one dildo, to which Severus shook his head.

"I don't think that will quite satiate your appetite tonight," he said, returning his eyes towards the side indicating she should try another.

When she pulled one out a little larger, he shook his head.

Pulling out the largest she was most comfortable with, he nodded his head that her choice was finally acceptable. It was just a bit larger than Severus, but he wanted to see her filled and view that exquisite look on her face when she felt something that large fill her.

Holding the dildo up, she ran her tongue along its length, giving Severus a view of what she would do to him if it were him and not some stand-in of the real thing. She engulfed the thing into her mouth, forming a wanton act of fellatio upon the inanimate object. She groaned with pleasure, as she ran her tongue around the head of it as her hand blindly reached for the bottle of lubrication.

Looking at Severus wantonly, she recited in Japanese one erotic haiku from the book she gave Severus for Valentine's Day – the book that also featured shunga prints.

"Majestic pine tree
Stout and towering it stands
Felled only in bliss"

With the lubrication bottle cap flipped off, she poured the clear viscous fluid along the dildo's length. She then rubbed her hand along the proxy cock, trying to warm it up and spread the fluid all around to ease penetration.

Spreading her legs as wide as possible, she slowly pushed the head into her as she sighed, "Yes, Severus. Take me. Fill me, I need you."

Severus' breaths were labored as he watched her remove the dildo and push it in a bit further, followed by pulling it out a little bit and pushing it in even father until she eventually inserted the entire length into herself.

Severus groaned aloud as Hermione shut her eyes and arched her back, using her wand to set the dildo to slide in and out of her at a languid pace. He caressed his sac with one hand while his other was still firmly sliding up and down his rigid shaft.

"Yes, Severus, oh how I've missed you," she groaned as she fistied handfuls of bedclothes, trying to remain upright in order to watch Severus stroke himself, imagine him between her legs. She could just discern the glistening of precum leaking from the tip and wished she could lick it off and taste his sweetness.

Severus watched the length of surrogate-lover slide in and out of her entrance. He glanced at her flushed face, hearing her voice calling to him.
He recited another haiku from the book.

"Beautifully painted
The fan is seen when opened
She unfolds for me"

With a twitch of her wand, the dildo began speeding up. Unable to continue sitting up on the edge of the bed, Hermione turned sideways on the bed, turning her head to continue watching Severus as he stroked himself faster.

Her hand slipped between her legs and began to rub her clit furiously.

Severus watched how her back arched up off the bed with each stroke of the dildo and how her nipples puckered even tighter, her sighs and cries increasing in intensity and pitch.

"You are my goddess," Severus exalted, "my gloriously divine Hermione. So beautiful."

Hermione's eyes slipped shut as she felt the heat in her abdomen throbbing with each penetrating thrust of the dildo. Severus' words of adoration in addition to her own finger work pushed her over the edge and she came, calling his name.

Seeing Hermione in the midst of an orgasm, Severus came himself, his semen spurting all over his hands and stomach, as he groaned with release.

It was a pale imitation of the real act, but it was better than masturbating alone, both agreed.

Hermione removed the dildo from herself and got up to use the loo while Severus sat there catching his breath. Once she came back, they said their farewells. Now it was time for Severus to shower and open up shop while Hermione cracked the books, now focusing solely on her Japanese language lessons. Each put the cloth over their own mirror until the next time when Severus would have returned home from a day at his shop and Hermione was waking, shortly before Gary came over for another Japanese language lesson.

With one of her new ceramic peeling knives she bought herself recently, Hermione began deveining the prawns. She thought fondly back on when Severus opened his birthday present and unwrapped the set of Japanese ceramic knives. Upon her telling him about the particular attributes of the knives, he of course ran to the ice box and started chopping and slicing various items on the kitchen table. He was quite thrilled by the knives' performance and even went out and bought a set for their kitchen too, since the set she bought him was for the laboratory.

When she finished the prawns, she heard the Floo roar.

"I'm in here!" she called out, as she grabbed a dish towel to wipe her hands before greeting her friends.

Just as she was about to exit the kitchen and greet them, Ginny and Draco entered instead.

"I brought a Spanish Rueda and an Italian Fiano, since you said the dish was going to be garlicky prawns," Draco said, holding up a bottle in each hand.

"Wonderful!" Hermione said enthusiastically as she took the wine from Draco. She greeted her friends before putting the wine in the icebox to stay chilled. "Severus just got back from his morning swim and should be out of the shower soon."

"We noticed the curtain was still up on his side when we arrived," Ginny remarked before adding, "You know, you didn't have to give up Marf so you'd be cooking all by yourself tonight without help. I know what long workdays you have."

"Nonsense," Hermione said dismissively with a flip of her hand. "Your party is Saturday, and you need all the help you can to get everything ready in time. I think I can live a few days without Marf, as useful and helpful as he is."

"Lavender did loan us her elves from her home for a few days too, except the one that cooks and the one that takes care of Josephine," Ginny informed her.

"Yes, Lavender did mention that this morning when we were talking. But please, have a seat while I start preparing the garlic." Hermione held her hand out to indicate for them to sit at the kitchen table while she continued her preparations.

"Oomph," Draco said with relief as he sat down in a kitchen chair, "I feel like I don't know what to do with myself. This is the first night Ginny and I have had away from the triplets since they were born, so this is like a date night for us. Granted, we have an elf at home we hired to help us, and we have the elves at Malfoy Manor right now looking after them, but we both feel strange being away from them for once."

"Well then, relax and enjoy yourself. They're in good hands. Tonight we can have adult conversation, wine, good food, and good company," Hermione practically trilled, feeling like she was getting another slice of domestic bliss. If it wasn't for the fact that Severus was half a world away, it seemed like she could expect him to walk into the kitchen at any moment and begin helping by chopping the cilantro.

"You know, because the triplets were born on St. Patrick's Day, Fred and George were very disappointed we didn't name Sebastian Patrick instead, or one of the girls Patricia," Ginny said, wrinkling her nose with dislike at the idea.

"Given that Phoenix looks like she'll have your red hair, that would just--" Hermione trailed off, as she heard the Floo roar to life once more. "Hang on a sec," she said curiously, knowing she wasn't expecting anyone else. She drew her wand and went to investigate as Draco rose to follow.

Entering her main room, Hermione saw Lavender standing by the fireplace, a large sack laying by her feet.

"Lavender? Is there something the matter?" Hermione asked curiously as she put her wand away, noticing that Lavender's hair was down and looking a bit unkempt, which was highly unusual, in addition to the darker clothing she had on.

Instead of replying, Lavender pulled out her wand and stunned Hermione without saying a word. As Draco cleared the door, he was caught off guard, momentarily perplexed by the sight of his employer brandishing her wand standing above Hermione's limp body. Draco was fast, but the witch already had her wand out and was ready for him.

"Is Lavender joining us for dinner?" Ginny called out from the kitchen, having heard Hermione say the witch's name.

She fell out of her chair and onto the kitchen floor with a thud, not even getting a chance to see who her attacker was.

Severus rushed along, knowing he was running a bit late, but that Hermione would wait to start cooking the prawns until he was dressed.
Walking briskly out to the kitchen, he used his wand to remove the cover over the mirror he had already set up in front of his kitchen table.

As he rounded the table expecting to see the warm faces of his lover and friends, he was shocked by the image in the mirror.

Hermione, Draco, Ginny, and Lavender were all unconscious, sitting upright in chairs and bound with a Binding Spell.

Grabbing the frame of the mirror in panic, he called out each of their names hoping to rouse them. His face was nearly pressed to the glass as he tried to look around and discern what was happening.

The only response was a hand reaching out from the side, tacking a piece of parchment on the glass facing towards him in order for him to read it.

Come back to England now.

Notify anyone, especially Aurors, and Hermione will be killed immediately. I have ways to know if you contact anyone.

Refuse to come and they all die.

You will pay for what you did.

You have one hour.

"HERMIONE!" Severus screamed, wanting to pound his fists on the mirror, but afraid if he did he would shatter the mirror.

To add insult to injury, the unknown assailant draped Hermione's pendant – the one that Potter had given her to call him, should she be in trouble – over the top of the mirror so that it dangled as if taunting him. Somehow, whoever had stunned her unconscious had known about the Auror's necklace and removed it from her, no doubt before she could call for help from Potter.

There was only one course of action.

Severus ran to his bedroom and used his wand to change his clothes into his black woolen trousers, black frock coat, and starched linen shirt, trying to shave off every minute he could so he could get back to England as soon as possible. He grabbed his cloak and checked to make sure he had his wand, then Summoned a few things from his lab just in case before Apparating directly to the Portkey office.

Bursting through the door, he saw Halulu there at her desk bent over, playing with her twin girls who were resting in a playpen by her desk.

"I need a Portkey to England!" he said urgently, trying not to yell, his eyes dark and stormy with trouble.

"Yes, what's wrong?" Halulu asked, getting up from her desk, sensing something was amiss.

"Dammit, woman," he snarled as he slammed his open palm down on the countertop, "I don't have time for twenty questions. Get me a Portkey to London NOW!"

Sensing the urgency of the matter, Halulu created a Portkey immediately and set it upon the table in the middle of the Portkey departure area.

Before Severus reached out and touched it, he felt around in his pockets and pulled out a ring filled with keys. He tossed them to Halulu. "Here."

"What are these for?" she asked, dumbly.
"Keys to my house and shop. Tell Mouna I couldn't escape fate. It's time to pay the piper," he said with defeated resignation just before he touched the shoe transformed into a Portkey and disappeared.

Knowing nothing good was meant by Severus' foreboding statement, Halulu ran over to the nearest fireplace and threw in a handful of Floo powder.

Poking her head out of the fireplace at the Finaus', Halulu called out, "Mouna? MOUNGA!"

"Hang on, hang on! Hold your hippogriffs," Rainbow said casually as she emerged from the kitchen with a cup of coffee in her hands.

"We got trouble. Where's Mouna?" Halulu nearly shrieked, bordering on hysterical.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Thank you to my ever lovely and talented betas, JuneW and Hope.

Good news, the last chapter is finally betaed, so I'll be posting remaining chapters as fast as I can get them through the Ashwinder mod queue.
Severus landed in London and immediately exited the Portkey office. He ignored the obvious stares and hushed whispers that rose like the susserations of an autumn wind in a wheat field upon their seeing the exonerated Death Eater, who had been pilloried by the Daily Prophet. He was a silhouette of billowing black robes as he crossed the atrium floor of the Ministry as if running for his life, which he essentially was, cursing he could not Apparate directly to Hermione's flat from within the Ministry. So instead, he headed towards the row of fireplaces and called out his destination before throwing down a handful of Floo Powder, his wand at the ready.

Emerging from the fireplace of his old flat, Severus stopped in his tracks.
There was Lavender, still unconscious and bound upright in a kitchen chair, yet another version of Lavender was standing over Hermione holding a small vial of something over her open mouth, while her wand kept a small mirrored compact aloft close to her head with a Levitating Charm. Hermione was still unconscious, her mouth hung open slack and wide. Severus also saw Draco and Ginny still bound upright in chairs as well.

"Recognize what I hold, Death Eater?" the conscious version of Lavender asked.

Severus immediately understood that it was the standing and talking version of Lavender who was the impostor, and the real Lavender was unconscious in the chair. The cadence and accent was wrong, and Lavender would never address him as such, nor look as unkempt as the one threatening those who were most dear to him.

Looking at the clear glass vial held in the impostor's hand and the way the early evening sun glinted off of it, he recognized it. The sparkling reds and oranges that danced within were unmistakable.

"Death of a Thousand Suns," he ground out in a murderous tone.

"Good, then you understand that if my hand just happens to slip, should you try to disarm me or worse, the vial slips into her mouth and she dies a painful death, that not even your bezoars, which you no doubt have shoved in your pocket, could cure. And without the right antidote administered within seconds, she will die an extremely painful death within minutes. Do I make myself clear?"

"As crystal," he growled, staring at the witch with deathly contempt.

"Good. Then I'll lock the Floo and ward the doors and windows shut so we'll be undisturbed," she demanded coolly.

"How do you know I have not informed anyone of your threat and that they'll be here at any moment?" he asked calmly, hoping to gain further information and stall for as long as possible.

"Your interview with The Quibbler gave me inspiration, thanks to your little mirror spell. Once I heard that this Death Eater and his whore wife were coming back, I placed mirrors within various offices and places of business of people who even remotely appeared slightly sympathetic to you that you might have alerted. I have several of these all charmed so I could listen in." She nodded her head slightly to the mirrored compact still floating by her head. "Even in Lavender's office, where I overheard how the elf here would be away and these two would be coming over to Hermione's flat tonight," she said, gesturing towards Draco and Ginny. "That's when I knew to strike." Flicking her wand, the imitation of Lavender had the small floating compact mirror fold close and slide down into a deep pocket. "You were good to make sure you didn't notify anyone, else I would have heard. There was no chatter except a few saying they spotted you heading straight from the Portkey Office to a Floo."

"Clever." Severus quirked his brow.

"Yes, now hand over your wand." She redirected her wand to point directly at Severus' chest, all the while keep the one hand holding the poison poised above Hermione.

Seeing as how the vial was tipped slightly towards Hermione's mouth and could easily be poured down her throat, Severus felt he had no option but to comply. Reluctantly, he tossed over his wand, which landed with a soft thump on the rug by the threatening witch's feet.

She retrieved his wand with her own wand, pocketing it so it could not be easily Summoned.

"Now, let's wake everyone and begin the evening." Aiming her wand at Draco, she cast a Stinging Hex which awakened him with a scream.

"Who are you?" Draco tried to ask, gritting through the pain of being woken with a painful hex.

"Haven't figured it out? Let's see if your traitorous cunt wife can guess."

The copy of Lavender turned her wand to Ginny, yelling, "Furnunculus!"

Ginny woke with a blood-curdling scream, having been burned by the spell hitting her shoulder and causing boils to appear.

"What do you want? STOP IT!" Draco demanded as he struggled against his bindings.

With a sneer, their captor said with impatience, "We can't begin until everyone is awake."
Lavender began to groan groggily, finally beginning to wake being stirred by Ginny’s screams, looking around wide-eyed at the current predicament. She didn’t say a word, but only looked to Severus with a plea in her eyes to help them.

Severus moved a step forward, but the witch holding them all prisoner, or at least it might have been a witch, looked at him and gave him a threatening glare. With a tilt of her hand, she reminded him that she would easily tip the poison into Hermione’s throat if provoked. Severus stepped back and held his hands up.

"Polyjuice Potion?" he asked, his lip curling into a sneer.

"If you could use it to escape, as the Daily Prophet correctly surmised in their expose, then I figured so could I."

"Padma," Lavender exclaimed with shock knowing exactly who would intend all of them mortal harm.

~~~~~~~*~

Mounga finally landed at the London Portkey office. Once he had his feet firmly on the ground, he ran over to the nearest Portkey agents and demanded, "Where are the Auror offices! This is an emergency!"

The poor wizard, somewhat stunned by this large wizard with an American accent looking serious and quite threatening, merely pointed a shaking finger towards the exit and squeaked out, "Second floor."

"Thanks, dude," he exhaled and took off running as fast as he could.

As he reached the second floor, Mounga stood there uncertain where to go. He did not want to barge into anyone’s office. Instead he inhaled a great breath and cupped his hands around his mouth. In his great booming voice he used when addressing thousands atop the volcano once a year, he called out, "HARRY POTTER! HARRY! I HAVE TO SPEAK TO YOU IMMEDIATELY!"

Every Auror who had stayed late that night immediately popped their head out of their office door to see who was bellowing loudly enough to rattle the interior windows of the Ministry department.
Mounga spotted a head of messy black hair, the scar and glasses on a slightly below average height wizard – just as Ginny once described – pop out of the door next to him. Grabbing him by the shirt collar, Mounga hauled him out of his office into the hallway.

Harry, thinking he was being attacked, drew his wand and pointed it at the large, strangely dressed wizard who was nearly as large as Hagrid once was.

"We can't talk here," Mounga whispered quietly as possible. "Your office is probably bugged, and Severus, Hermione, Draco, Ginny, and Lavender are all in danger."

Padma was too preoccupied with the vial of poison held above Hermione's lips to notice the mirror behind her was now shrouded black on the other side. The shock that Padma Patil, Parvati's sister, was the one threatening them distracted Severus from noticing such details as well.

"At last, we need to wake this Death Eater fucking whore who has denied me justice by allowing you to go free. It was probably you who told Macnair when and where he could abduct my sister," Padma fumed with seething rage.

"No, I would never tell them. I would have done anything to have prevented–" Severus began to plea his innocence, but was cut off.

"LIES! You're a fucking liar, just like when Goyle said he didn't kidnap my sister!" Padma removed the poison from near Hermione's lips and stood back, pointing her wand at the unconscious witch, screaming, "CRUCIO!"

Hermione woke to a searing pain crushing her skull and screamed at the top of her lungs. Amid the pain, through the haze of the spell that shrouded her in a sickly yellow, she could see Severus and wasn't sure if it was the curse causing her to lose her mind so quickly or that he really was there. Padma did not relent, and Hermione eventually passed out from the pain.

Severus, could almost feel the pain of the Crucius Curse himself. His body lurched forward, and when Hermione passed out, he slumped forward on the floor and was pulled into unconsciousness once more.
Severus found Hermione on the ground twitching as lightning crackled across the ink black night. Not even stars were visible. He rushed over and pulled her into his arms while kneeling on the cold, dank ground. He saw her eyes flutter, looking about but unable to focus on him.

"Hermione," he said, trying to bring her around and assure her he was there for her, even if they were on some unknown plane of existence yet again.

"Severus?" she asked with uncertainty, not sure if she had seen him before she blacked out or not.
"Yes, I'm here. I'm in the flat with you trying to save you and the others," he said, trying to remain calm as he brushed her hair away from her face.

Hermione's eyes finally focused and they were filled with remorse. "I'm sorry."

They both knew what she was apologizing for. The evening after the tea ceremony at the Malfoys, Hermione wanted to renew their bonding. She had bought a pomegranate at the farmers' market that morning. That evening, after dinner, she had crushed the seeds and extracted the juice.

In silence, they had shared the cup of pomegranate juice, understanding their intent and the symbolism behind the gesture with Hermione being separated from Severus once again. It was their promise to remain connected together through their souls until Hermione could finally rejoin Severus permanently.

It was this binding that had dragged Severus into their other sphere when he was in the midst of trying to save their lives when Hermione was hit by the Crucius Curse.

Severus shook his head, for she had nothing to be sorry about. He had equally wanted to renew his bond to Hermione for their long parting. "Don't be sorry," he whispered. "I'm not."

As Severus went to wipe a tear from Hermione's cheek, he suddenly vanished, leaving Hermione alone in the dark as skeletal fingers of lightning still crackled across the endless night.

"Wake up!" Padma shouted as her boot made contact with Severus' jaw.

Severus' head snapped back. He opened his eyes as the throbbing pulse of pain spread along his jaw. When he tried to move, he discovered that he had been bound by a Binding Spell as well, but was now laying on his side. This was too similar to the time Lucius hexed him, which jogged his memory.

"There is no way I could have let the Death Eaters know where to find Lavender and Parvati. Before they were taken, I was already laid up in the Infirmary suffering from some nearly lethal hexes by Lucius Malfoy. Looking back, it was no doubt an attempt to stop me from warning the Headmaster, in case I may have overheard their conversation of what they planned to do," Severus said as fast as he could before Padma could scream for him to shut up or hex anyone else again. To his relief, Padma was no longer holding a vial of poison above Hermione's mouth, but his lover was still unconscious from the curse.

"That's what I've been trying to tell you," Lavender insisted. "When they brought me back to the infirmary, I found him laid up, just like I told you," Lavender's voice was cracking and wavering from the overwhelming fear building in her gut.

"Give me Veritaserum. I will tell you the truth," Severus offered, willing to profess his innocence.

"No! It's too late for that. You're going to pay. It's all your fault." Padma's hand was starting to shake, and the tip of her wand bobbed up and down slightly as she continued pointing it at Severus.

Severus could see now that no amount of reason could be had with this witch, as she was hell-bent on dishing out her revenge focused at him, even if it was misplaced.

"Fine, take your revenge out on me, but let the others go," Severus countered. "They had nothing to do with your sister's unfortunate assault."

"NO!" Hermione screamed, finally waking to hear Severus' offer. "No, Severus, don't!" She knew if Severus stayed, Padma would kill him.

"Unfortunate assault? You call being beaten, raped, Crucio'ed to the point of madness and impregnated by that Death Eater scum an 'unfortunate assault'?" Padma said, her voice rising to a shrill scream as her umbrage rose.

"What?!!?" yelled nearly everyone in union, unaware of Parvati's resulting pregnancy.

Swiveling to point her wand at Lavender, she snarled, "How would you know about it. You were too busy staying in school to finish your seventh year and take your NEWTs to care that she was pregnant."

Lavender did a quick calculation in her head. She remembered the attack took place in late September when the Headmaster was considering whether to allow weekends to Hogsmeade to continue or not, while allowing only seventh years who could Apparate to leave the confines of the castle. Given the time of her rape, Parvati could have given birth before Lavender finished school and saw Parvati for the first time at St. Mungo's in mid-June.
"Nobody told me!" Lavender screamed back. "Nobody told me anything!"

"Because my parents disowned her after they found out she was raped and impregnated!" Padma bellowed back. "I was the only one who could speak for her when no one else could! And then after giving birth, I was saddled with that hell-spawn brat when I got back from Hogwarts!"

"But the elixir Madam Pomfrey gave her to stop conception?" Severus spoke up, knowing the school policy procedure for such tragic occurrences.

"Seems they are only good if they are taken before fertilization occurs in some instances," Padma spat at him. "And St. Mungo's was too busy with the war to follow up to make sure she wasn't impregnated. They couldn't stop the pregnancy by the time they bothered to notice the vegetable in the permanent ward was not fat, but carrying that bastard!"

Parvati was gone a few days, long enough for fertilization to occur if she ovulated about the time of her kidnapping. After a certain point in the pregnancy, the magic of the child would prevent any attempt to end it. Thus, aborting was not an option without killing the witch in the process, as the magical link between mother and child was too strong to break.

Lavender, Ginny, and Hermione could not bear the thought of Parvati not only suffering what she did, but carrying a child to term in her mental condition as well. They all openly wept in sympathy for their old friend and classmate.

Draco hung his head in shame, unable to comprehend such a horror being foisted upon the poor witch.

Severus felt like he had been kicked in the gut with this new revelation. He knew that some Death Eaters engaged in such sick sport, but to impregnate their victims was just beyond the pale. It seemed almost contradictory considering how they went on about blood purity, but had taken no measure to prevent them from spreading their seed to those considered impure or blood-traitors.

"The others had nothing to do with this most heinous and tragic event. Let them go," Severus insisted once more.

"No? Draco is a fucking Death Eater, just like you! Probably helped them find her!" she screamed back at him.
"He was just a boy who took the Dark Mark against his will," Severus retorted, pleading Draco's case since he was still too dumbstruck to speak in his own defense. "His father held his wand against his temple and said he if refused or embarrassed him any further in front of the Dark Lord, Lucius would end the Malfoy line right there and then. Draco joined to save his own skin, and then joined the Order immediately to help Dumbledore and Potter win the war. There isn't a day that goes by he doesn't regret being forced to take that Mark!"

Padma did not want to accept any of their reasons. Storming over to Draco, she held her wand up and pressed it to his temple. As the point dug into his flesh, Draco flinched, his eyes shut tight. With a sudden glacial calm, Padma suggested, "Maybe I should just Imperio Draco to rape Lavender. And after that, Hermione too. And then I can Crucio them afterwards until they lose their minds as well. Maybe they'll get pregnant just like my sister and go through what she did."

"No, please, there is no reason for you to do this," Draco begged.

"I have plenty of reason," Padma snarled. "Every day I see that bastard my sister birthed and every day I see Macnair's eyes staring back at me, mocking me. This is the only way!"

"But why hurt Ginny? What did she do to you?" Hermione asked, hoping she could at least get her best friend freed through the use of logic, though it seemed Padma was impervious to it.

"Because she ran away with a Death Eater who should have stayed here and died, just like I poisoned Goyle!" Padma screeched.

"You?" Draco asked with disbelief, flummoxed yet once more. "You poisoned him?"

"Yes, and it was glorious to watch him die so painfully," she hissed with vitriolic delight. "The way he begged for mercy to kill him, and the way he thrashed and suffered."

"I thought Alan Parker..." Severus let slip aloud.

"I saw Alan Parker poisoning a Death Eater one night in a back alley some years ago. And it was beautiful," she confessed with relish. "So I figured, I'd copy him. And if he got caught, he would be blamed for all those deaths, though most of them were his work. But I helped with several over the years on my own."
"Parker is in Azkaban," Hermione volunteered foolishly.

Padma spun around on the spot. "How did you know?" she asked, her eyes dancing with a madness Hermione had seen only once before. Tilting her head to the side, Padma quietly said as her face began to contort with anger, "You sent him there, didn't you?"

Before Hermione could refute by saying that Harry had caught him and sent him away, in her fury, Padma cast yet another Cruciatus Curse at Hermione.

Hermione thrashed and bucked against her bindings as the pain raced through every nerve, until she slumped against her bindings.

Severus was unwillingly drawn into the ethereal abyss once more.

Clutching to Severus, Hermione ruefully whimpered, "I don't know how much more I can take."

The lightning raced across the sky, a mirror of the electric signals of pain racing through Hermione's nerves.

Severus held Hermione tightly to his chest. He knew if he did not do something, Hermione would not keep her mind intact much longer. It seemed Padma wanted revenge, and he would give her the satisfaction of it if it meant that the others could live.

There was no more escaping his past crimes that he had long lived in remorse over. Now was the time to clear his debts.

Severus knew if he died, because of his soul being bound to Hermione's, he might drag her along to the depths of hell with him. He was doing this so that she could live. As much as he regretted it, he knew it had to be done.

"You must live, Hermione. I cannot let you follow me where I must go. I release you from your binding to me," he murmured softly into her hair as he held back his tears.
Hermione began screaming for him not to go, crying hysterically as she called out his name over and over as he evaporated from her arms like mist.

Severus opened his eyes to find Padma staring at him curiously.

"I have a proposition," he began, his voice calm and businesslike. Severus figured this was Fate's way of saying he could not escape the sin of killing his wife and unborn child, and this was his only possible way to atone for it. "Kill me. Torture me as much as you want, but let all the others go without further injury or harm. I give myself to you freely if it means you'll let the others go."

"Is this some trick?" Padma asked. Her eyes were dancing with the prospect of the wizard she'd hated for so long giving himself over to her sadistic delights she had mentally entertained all those years, hoping if she ever had the chance.

"No, no trick. But you must let everyone else go," Severus stipulated. "Lavender, Ginny, Hermione, and yes, even Draco. Or do you want to be called a monster on par with a Death Eater for taking two mothers and a father away from their infant children. Kill them or drive them into perpetual madness, and you're no better than the Death Eater who tortured your sister. You'll only just breed more witches and wizards who want to exact even crueler revenge on you on behalf of their parents. The cycle of hate will never end, and on and on it will go. Kill me and end it now. I offer myself up to you to put an end to this madness that lingers after the war."

As much as Draco wanted to live for his children, he did not want to let Severus die either. Looking over at his mentor, he saw the resignation in his old friend's face. Severus was offering himself up so his godchildren would grow up knowing their mother and father. And Draco knew that to speak up might risk having Padma kill them all, which meant Libra, Phoenix, and Sebastian would have no parents or godparents to raise them, in addition to Josephine never knowing her mother. Draco began to weep wishing he could save his family and Severus, but knowing that Severus had made the decision for him.

"Fine," Padma agreed. "But I want them to watch as you die, so they can remember with horror every day of your death and be haunted with it every day, as I am haunted with the sight of that monster my sister birthed."
Padma didn't even bother to wake Hermione up, not noticing she was still unconscious.

Severus closed his eyes, tilting his head back, exposing his neck in submission to and acceptance of her wrath.

Behind his eyelids, he saw a bright flash of light.

With a loud crack and a blinding flash, the door to the flat splintered wide open, momentarily distracting Padma from finishing her spell. Before she could re-aim her wand from Severus to the intruder, she caught a Stunning Spell directly to the center of her chest.

Severus opened his eyes, to find Potter, Kingsley, and – to his even bigger surprise – Mounga rushing through the door while Padma, still Polyjuiced as Lavender, slumped to the floor.

There were a few more Aurors who rushed in afterwards, but Severus was too flooded with relief to notice who they were.

"That's Padma Patil Polyjuiced as me," the real Lavender Weasley spoke up as her bindings were removed with the ending of the spell.

"We know, Mounga here filled us in on what he overheard," Harry volunteered.

Mounga was bent over Severus, freeing him from his bindings and helping him to his feet.

The bewildered Potions master asked, "How did you know since..." His question was stopped short when Mounga removed a miniaturized mirror from his pocket and produced it for Severus' inspection. He recognized it as the charmed mirror from Severus' house. In the miniaturized mirror, he could see the flurry of activity about the room with the other Aurors freeing Lavender, Draco, Ginny, and Hermione from their bindings from the alternate perspective. The note was still tacked to Hermione's mirror.

"I blocked it so she could not hear or see us from this end and made it look like the mirror on your end was shrouded, so we could continue to watch and listen in," Mounga said with a smile of relief. "I got your keys from Halulu and your message, and figured out what was going on before taking a Portkey here. And because I knew the Auror offices were bugged, I yelled for Harry to come out of his office so I could fill him in. Sorry we took so long, but it took a while to get
When Severus found his legs and was finally standing, he momentarily hugged Mouniga in gratitude of this friend's quick thinking, but immediately stopped and went over to Hermione, who was still unconscious.

He scooped her up in his arms as Kingsley was tending to her, and the others were being freed and assessed for injuries. "Hermione, wake up. It's all right," Severus said earnestly as he stroked her face, trying to revive her. "We made it, I'm alive. Hermione?"

Fear began to grip him, and his hands began to shake as he caressed her cheek.

Kingsley took Hermione from Severus' arms and laid Hermione on the floor flat on her back. Harry and Kingsley both began to perform spells to revive Hermione and determine if she was injured beyond suffering from the Cruciatius Curse.

Draco held Ginny in his arms as both stood by, watching the Aurors try to awaken Hermione. Ginny and Lavender both began sobbing once more in fear for their friend's life.

"No," Severus breathed with disbelief at the conclusion that raced through his mind.

~~~~~~~~~~~

The room was deathly silent except for the odd noise made by the children. It seemed even the infants were keenly aware of the somberness that pervaded the hospital room.

Hermione was laying on her back, still and eyes shut as if she had drunk the Draught of Living Death. The white sheets were crisp and stark in contrast to her dark undulating waves and curls of hair that had been brushed out by the attending Healers.

Draco and Ginny sat in one corner with their three infants, unwilling to be parted from their children after recent events.

Lavender and Ron were also in attendance with Josephine in the portable bassinet being gently rocked by a charm. Lavender was looking unkempt and tired, too upset and scared for Hermione's well-being to bother with her appearance. Ron looked even more worried than his wife, dark circles and bags under his eyes. He had come home the night before to find his wife gone with no note as to why she wasn't there, knowing she should have been home by then.
Albert was there as well, looking drawn and quite old, concerned over the fate of his apprentice who had become like a daughter to him and a dear friend.

The Drs. Grangers sat on chairs along one side of the bed, holding Hermione's left hand, having been brought there by Lavender to be by the bedside of their daughter. Lavender had received quite the tongue-lashing from Christine that Hermione's parents were not immediately kept in the loop when their daughter was laid up in St. Mungo's the last time, and they were brought in right after Hermione was admitted this time. Hermione's Aunt Christine and Uncle Tim were also there, with Auberon being held in his father's arms.

The staff at St. Mungo's had demanded most of the people in the room standing vigil wait outside of Hermione's room or go home to await updates, but none who were there would budge nor be quelled into leaving.

Severus and Albert pooled their enormous talents together to try and think of some brew that would revive Hermione, but nothing they suggested to the staff of Healers worked any more than the Healers' standard procedures.

The Healers once again were at a loss as to why Hermione would not wake. They said it seemed very similar to the incident from last summer, stating that it seemed she had lost the will to live.

The last time Severus saw Hermione, he had let Hermione go, indicating he was willing to die to let her live. She had not awakened to discover that he did not die, and therefore must still be on that alternate sphere, thinking he was dead and gone.

Severus tried to rejoin her in that other plane they had shared before, but because he had willingly cut those ties that bound him to her to save her, he could not find the thread of deep consciousness with which to reconnect with her.

There was only one other option Severus could think of that might bring Hermione back to him.

All heads turned when the door to the hospital room creaked open.

Severus looked up from his spot by Hermione's bedside, unable to let go of her right hand those many hours to see his salvation walk in.
Harry was escorting Zhubanysh into the room. She was holding their son, James, in her arms.

For the first time, Severus willingly left Hermione's bedside and went over to greet Zhubanysh.

Before he could plead for her to help him, she said, "You must be Severus."

"Yes," he choked out, his voice hoarse from the fatigue of being awake all night, unable to sleep as he kept vigil by Hermionie’s bedside. "Please help. You're the only thing left I can think of. You healed your husband with your songs. You stopped Hermione's nightmares. Please save her, please sing to her."

Zhubanysh handed James over to Harry and took Severus' large and calloused hands in her small ones. "My songs will not heal her."

Severus sunk to his knees in front of her, still holding her hands, and piteously begged, "Please save her. Anything. You're the only one." He broke down in sobs, his shoulders slumped and heaving, no longer carrying about his dignity. His pride was shattered and he let himself be seen willingly crying by the others, unable to hold in his sorrow any longer.

Seeing Severus broken like this, Ginny began to cry silently once more and buried her face in Draco's shoulder. Draco could not hold back his silent tears either.

"My singing will not heal her, but your singing will," Zhubanysh said as she reached down and tilted his tear-streaked face up to her and smiled beatifically at him. Sorrow tinged her smile, for she was quite sad for what happened to her adopted sister, but she still had hope.

"But, I don't know your language, I don't know the melodies," Severus said, not wanting to do it wrong and fail to bring her back.

She pulled at Severus' hands indicating he should stand, which he did. She guided him back over to Hermione's bedside. "My songs do not possess magic that you do not already have within yourself," she informed him. "In our tribe, we learn to sing songs as a way of soothing and healing those dear to us. It is your love sung through song that will heal her, not the song itself."
Zhubanysh had Severus sit by Hermione's side once more. "Take both her hands," she gently instructed him.

Hermione's parents carefully handed Hermione's left hand to Severus' outstretched one, placing her care in his hands while hoping he could bring their daughter back.

Placing her hands on his heart, Zhubanysh said, "Close your eyes. Now all the love you have for Hermione, imagine that it is a mountain. And I can tell it is a very large mountain. So tall it touches the top of the sky and rises high above the clouds. Can you see it?"

Severus closed his eyes and tried to imagine all he felt for Hermione represented in a mountain. It was so tall he could barely imagine seeing it all in his own mind. He nodded.

"Good. Now from the top of this mountain flows a spring. That is the purest form of your love for her. The more you love her, the more it flows, like a great stream falling down the mountainside. Now as you imagine your love flowing down the mountain, it also flows from your heart down your arms," she guided him, moving her hands from Severus' chest, radiating sideways and began trailing them down his arms to his hands that still held Hermione's. "It flows to a valley, a valley where Hermione's soul resides."

Severus could feel a tingling warmth radiating from his chest and down his arms as Zhubanysh coached him.

"Now," she said softly so as not to break his concentration, "find a song that speaks of your love for Hermione and begin to sing it to her while you imagine your love flowing down your arms like a mountain spring and into her hands, feeding that valley where Hermione's soul is. Let those waters from your love and song make that valley lush and green."

Severus thought of one song that meant something to both of them. Taking a deep breath, he began to sing.

~~~~~~~~~*~

Hermione lay there crying in utter isolation, knowing that Severus had broken their bonds to free her and offer himself up in her stead yet again. She did not want to go on if she could not have Severus there to share it with her. In her grief, she decided to seek out Severus and join him. She and Severus had debated theories that the plane they had met on was one between life and death, a sort of limbo.
After the lightning ceased, Hermione found the strength to get up off the ground and begin the long chthonic journey. If she did not tarry, she might be able to find the bridge to the afterlife and meet up with Severus once more, and they could cross into the afterlife together hand in hand, no longer separated.

Onward Hermione trudged through the darkness for what seemed like hours, possibly days. As she continued walking, a faint light on the horizon to guide her, the path turned into one that followed up a ridge line. The ground on either side of her gradually subsided until she was walking along the spine of a hilly range.

Off to her left, she saw a valley shrouded in mist. It looked exactly as she had imagined Hades to look in her many readings of Greek mythology. There was a dark mauve-colored fog that thickly obscured everything from her view high atop of the ridge.

"Severus, I'm coming," she said to herself.

As she turned to walk down the hill, quickening her pace, she saw a figure emerge from the fog. At first she thought it was going to be Severus meeting her, but in the dim light she finally realized it was another woman.

Halfway down the hill, the woman with long light chestnut hair greeted her. "It's not time for you yet."

"But I'm here to join Severus," Hermione insisted, not letting this person get between her and Severus.

"I know, but you're headed in the wrong direction."

Before Hermione could refute, insisting that she was certain Severus would be coming along this way, she heard the wind pick up, and on the wind was the lingering of a familiar melody.

The woman with intelligent and curious brown eyes pointed a finger back up the hill from where Hermione came from. "That is where you will find him. Go, he's waiting for you."

As Hermione turned away, the stranger added, "Take care of him."
Hermione began running up the hill, making her legs go as fast as they could, wondering if there was yet another valley of Hades she had not seen – a valley that Severus was crossing into without her.

"My love waits there in San Francisco Above the blue and windy sea..."

Severus stopped singing, his eyes still shut tight as he imagined that mountain stream as a raging torrent. "It's not working," he whimpered with defeat.

Zhubanysh, who had stood by him with her hand on his shoulder, shook her head. "You're wrong. Look."

Hermione's chest was beginning to rise and fall more noticeably, compared to the dead stillness she exhibited earlier.

Zhubanysh moved closer to Hermione. Grabbing Severus' hand, she guided one of his hands to cup Hermione's cheek and the other to rest on her chest above her heart. "Keep singing," she urged him.

Severus tried to think of another song that had meant something between them until he finally remembered yet another. He began singing, "At last, my love has come along..."

When Hermione was near the top of the ridge where she once stood, the wind ceased and so did the ethereal music that lured her back up the hillside.

Stopping, in need of the whisper in the wind to guide her, she turned her head, trying to listen for any sound to give her a direction to follow. "No, no. Don't stop. Not now. Come on, where are you? Guide me, dammit!"

To her relief, the wind picked up once more, and she could even see a light on the other side of the ridge begin to glow. Not only did she hear the music once more, but a looming glow on the horizon that must have been the sun approaching in which to point her the right way.

Finally as she approached the top of the ridge, her breath stopped in her chest. Before her loomed a huge mountain that had not been there before. She had never in all her years seen anything as majestic or as beautiful as the tableau before her, looking like some idealized version of a mountain jutting up from the plain that spread out before her as it rose up sharply towards the brightening sky. At the base of the mountain was a valley that was slowly turning from brown to green as it was fed from a roaring torrent of water that cascaded down the side of the mountain, pooling at the bottom. The lake that was growing in size at the base of the mountain in the valley was still shrouded in darkness, as the sun was still behind the mountain and below the horizon. The lake looked refreshing and tranquil. Hermione wanted to bathe in those waters. She wished Severus was there with her to swim with her in that lake that was placid and inviting.

Bounding down the hillside, Hermione wondered if this was the paradise that was meant for her and Severus to spend the rest of their days together.

~~~~~~~*~

Halfway through the song, Severus could not remember the lyrics. He heaved a sob, as Hermione was still not coming around, just breathing, which is what she was doing before. Severus took a sign of Hermione's chest moving up and down as a sign she was barely able to hold on and would not much last much longer despite Zhubanysh's insistence he was doing fine.

Severus was losing hope.

Placing a hand on his cheek, Zhubanysh said, "Find a song, a song that speaks of your deep love for Hermione and how you feel about her right now. A song that speaks about how boundless your love is for her."

Severus could only think of one song, and he knew it by heart.

Closing his eyes, he poured his heart forth as he began to sing in a loud and clear voice,

"A wizard called Eòin Greumson
Of bonnie Blackbriar Dornoch
Was bid to fight the goblin horde
Rebellion rose an' duty call'd

He left his love, fair Maighread
His promise: a gowden ring
That they should wed 'pon his return
No later than the spring"
All around the hospital room, tears began to fall, most of the visitors all too familiar with the lyrics of the song. Hermione's parents, aunt, and uncle began to quietly sob, moved by the lamentable nature Scottish ballad being sung with profound sorrow.

As Hermione happily skipped towards the lake filled with sparkling clear water, she stopped, finally hearing the voice on the wind. This time she could not only discern the melody, but could hear Severus' voice on the wind. She knew this song, she had heard it before.

Looking up the mountain that loomed before her, she finally understood she was not supposed to swim in the lake, but to climb the mountain before her. There she would find Severus.

"I'm coming, Severus. I'm coming!" she said as she began running faster.

Severus sang on, putting every ounce of his emotions into the song as he continued to imagine his love flowing down the mountainside. His one hand caressed her forehead and cheek, the other was firmly placed over her heart, his arms feeling like they were almost glowing with warmth.

He was not distracted by the soft sounds of others in the room crying, moved by the song. He solely focused on Hermione and his feelings for her.

"A year had passed and not return'd
Poor Maighread was waefu'
Her lover fear'd lost for dead
Maighread's breast brokenheart'd

A poison quick upon her lips
The witch did drink 'ere deeply
To see her Eòin on the other side
Join'd e'er in eternity

As Eòin came home, he found his bride
Light fading from her eyes
She thought she had join'd him beyond the veil
And pass'd to the other side"

Hermione's mother sat there staring at the man she had never met who had captured her daughter's heart; she listened as he sang a song that seemed to mimic Hermione's own choice to give up living, most probably convinced her lover was dead. A snotty tissue was clutched in one hand while the other curled limply against her own chest as she leaned into her husband's arms for support, unwilling to believe her daughter might never come back.

~~~~~~~*~

Her lungs burning as she gasped for breath, Hermione raced up the mountain side. Hermione's legs were sore and felt like lead. Stopping by the water that splashed and tumbled down the mountain, she reached over and cupped a handful of water to refresh herself.

She suddenly stopped, wondering if this was like the story of Persephone and Hades. If she drank the water, would she be trapped there, unable to rejoin Severus? Seeing the water glint and radiate with a glowing light of its own, she could not resist. Sipping the water, she had never tasted anything so heady or ambrosial in her life. It was like her first kiss with Severus distilled into liquid form, it even tasted faintly like his kisses. It made her head spin and her body float.

Breathing heavily from the rush of sensation, she suddenly felt herself re-energized. Hermione leaned over to drink straight from the source, gulping it down by great mouthfuls, unable to quench this thirst that suddenly flared inside of her.

Finally lifting her head from the stream, the hair around her face now dripping with this dulcet mountain nectar, she felt herself renewed with boundless energy.

Like a sprinter, she ran up the hill as fast as her legs could move.

She could see the sun rising to meet her. She knew she had to reach the source of that spring at the summit.

"Wait for me, Severus," she breathed as her feet scrambled against the rocky path that would lead her towards the top, his voice leading her onward.

~~~~~~~*~

"No ghost remain'd, her soul pass'd on
Though Eòin was not to be found
She wandered lost without her love
Maighread found no relief in death's bound

Young Eòin gaed to join his bride
His heart could beat no more
In gravely beds, they lie aside
Join'd e'er beyond Grim's door."

Severus finished his song, and to his disappointment, Hermione did not awaken as he had hoped. He hung his head down and began to openly wail. He felt like his own heart could no longer beat.

He made a vow that if she died, he would join her and seek her beyond the veil of death. He found no purpose in living if Hermione was not there with him.

~~~~~~~*~

Just as Hermione reached the mountain top the wind and Severus' voice stopped.

"No, no, no!" Hermione had not run up what seemed like the tallest mountain in the world just to get there to discover Severus was not there and his voice had stopped. She was not going to lose Severus yet again.

"Severus?" Hermione called out, cupping her hands around her mouth, looking about frantically. "Severus! SEVERUS?"

~~~~~~~*~

Severus' head snapped up and all crying in the room ceased when Hermione spoke.

"Severus?" she croaked feebly in her sleep.

Hope renewed, Severus gathered Hermione in his arms, his face fraught with apprehension and growing excitement. "I'm here, Hermione. Wake up, please, I'm right here. You're in my arms."

He lovingly stroked the hair away from her face as he called her name again.

~~~~~~~*~

To her relief the wind picked up once again and she heard Severus speak her name, which filled her with joy. As she looked to the brightening sky, the sun finally broke above the horizon. It was blazingly brilliant in its luminosity. Its light made the waters pouring fourth from the spring source glimmer and shine as if the water was made of the sun itself.

Hermione looked directly at the sun, unable to turn her gaze away from its indescribable glory.
As her eyes fluttered open, the sun was replaced with the sight of Severus' face close to hers. And in her half-conscious dreamlike state, she could have sworn that there was a brilliant corona of light surrounding Severus' head like a halo of an angel.

He stared at her with wonderment, his face struck with awe as tears streamed down his ruddy cheeks.

"Severus?" she asked, wondering if this was real or if she was still on some alternate plane where she had finally found him.

"Hermione," he breathed and clutched him to her. He opened his eyes to see Zhubanysh smiling down at them, to which he breathed to her simply, "Thank you."

Zhubanysh merely nodded her head and went back to stand by her husband's side, taking James in her arms once more.

The room erupted in a wash of cheers, sobs, and expressions of relief that Hermione would be all right.

Severus rocked Hermione in his arms, unwilling to let her go, while Hermione, with as much strength as she could muster, hugged Severus back, her arms hanging limply over his shoulders.

Someone fetched a Healer, notifying them of Hermione's return to consciousness. It was only when Severus was threatened with being banned from St. Mungo's that he finally left go of Hermione, though he still sat by her bedside to hold her hand while the Healers went to work trying to figure what was the source of yet another prolonged and unexplained sleep.

"How long was I out?" Hermione asked.

"A whole day," Severus said, looking quite exhausted. He had been unable to sleep the entire time, and singing to her nearly took the last of the reserves he had left in him.
Once the Healers were done going over Hermione with every spell and asking her questions, they finally left. But first, they ordered everyone else to leave soon so Hermione could rest, having been close to what the Healers deemed the brink of death.

Hermione's parents promised to come visit the next day, if she had not been discharged yet. Aunt Christine and Uncle Tim also expressed their relief that Hermione would be all right before giving her a peck on the cheek and a pat on the hand as they said their farewells.

As Hermione said farewell to Lavender and Ron, Severus went over to speak to the Potters. "I cannot express my deep gratitude in you helping me bring Hermione back," Severus said with humble appreciation.

Zhubanysh handed their son over to Harry before reaching out to take Severus' hands in hers. "It is you who did all the hard work, I merely showed you the way. It was your love that brought her back. I should be thanking you for bringing my sister back." Without reservation or knowing the standoffish nature of Severus, she stepped forward and hugged Severus, wrapping her arms tightly about his ribs, and placed a chaste kiss upon his cheek.

Severus did not flinch, but welcomed the warm affection by this extraordinary witch.

"Thank you, Potter," Severus said without any grudge for once, looking over at Harry.

"Thank Mouna. He's the one who clued me in that something was wrong. I had no idea Padma dropped that mirror in my office to eavesdrop when she came to visit me Monday morning. I'm just glad I was still in the office late when he arrived to find me," Harry admitted.

There was too much of a history between them for either to embrace the other, so the two wizards merely parted with a handshake.

As Hermione and Lavender were speaking, Hermione began breaking down into hysterical sobs. Hearing her in distress, Severus rushed back to her beside.

"Severus, I can't bear it. I want to give up my apprenticeship. I can't stay here in England and finish if these attacks keep happening, and I don't want to be separated from you again," she began to wail, set off by Lavender's comment that she could take as long as necessary to recuperate before coming back to work.
"No, you've put in too much work and come too far to give up. I'm not going to let you walk away from your dream of becoming a Potions mistress," he insisted, trying to be sensible, but also equally unwilling to be parted from Hermione yet again.

"Severus? Lavender? If I may have a word with you both?" Albert said, as he stood holding the door open so they could talk in the hallway.

Severus reluctantly left Hermione's side, but only did so because Draco, Ginny, and even Ron were in there to protect her. His paranoia was at an all-time high that someone was out to get her.

Hermione watched from her bed as Severus gave her one last look and a reassuring nod of his head before he stepped out into the hallway to confer with Hermione's boss and her master.

She couldn't understand what was being said, but she saw the edge of Severus' head through the door's small rectangular window periodically shake in negation or nod in the affirmation.

When the three of them came back into the room, Hermione saw a smile tugging at the corner of Severus' lips, a sign there was hope.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Thanks to my fantastic and hard working betas, JuneW and Hope.

I commissioned Drkav (http://drkav.deviantart.com/) to do a piece of fanart to go with the scene in which Hermione and Severus are on an alternate plane. You can view it on my Tumblr page here:
http://68.media.tumblr.com/8ddb7a9e17c8f5664d3f0767f299a665/tumblr_okq27mburG1ugsuuho1

Did you cry? I did when writing this chapter, in full Joan Wilder "Romancing the Stone" fashion.

And if you want to read something I laid down in this story, back in chapter 42, before I took my multi-year hiatus, go read that chapter once more. Or for convenience, here is the section I am referring to when Severus was still in denial of his love for Hermione:
Once the lift started moving, Draco dropped his hood and confronted Severus. "All right. Nobody else can overhear us now. What do you mean she knows it's you, yet you have not revealed yourself? What sort of nonsense is this? More delays?" Draco asked tersely.

Severus kept his hood up, preferring to keep up his implacable facade of cool disdain. "Hermione needs time to adjust to the knowledge that it is me. She has already agreed to come to dinner as usual Thursday night. Once I feel confident that she will stay and help us, then I shall remove my mask. Until then, she would prefer to keep up the pretense of this little charade."

The lift lurched to a halt at their floor.

Just as Severus was going to reach out and push aside the gate, Draco placed his arm in front of Severus, his hand placed on the wall next to the older wizard, blocking him from exiting the lift. "You mean you'll keep your mask on until you are done with this little charade."

Severus did not bother to hide his harsh glare as he eyed the arm blocking him. He knew just how to break an arm in two with just the use of his hands and one knee. A clean snap, and Draco would not be able to wield his wand until he made the trip to St. Mungo's to have it healed.
"I would think that you, of all people, would understand the need for subtlety in this rather delicate situation," Severus hissed, not bothering to hide his growing anger at being questioned about his tactics.

"I understand, all right," Draco retorted with equal enmity. "Each day that we sit here in England is another day that one of us could be discovered. Then it's goodbye freedom and hello Azkaban. But I suppose if you want to wait until you can bed your annoying little Gryffindor, that's your call."

Severus grabbed Draco by the wrist and twisted him around quicker than the blond wizard could have anticipated. Draco was pinned up against the wall with his arm being painfully wrenched behind his back. Leaning close to Draco's ear so as to make his point clear, Severus snarled, "I would think that someone who is bedding an Auror's wife would be the last person to talk about taking risks and being sent off to Azkaban."

With his cheek pressed against the wall of the lift, Draco said with defiance, "I love Ginny. I'd die without her; I would die for her. What's your excuse?"

Severus was so taken aback by Draco's remark, he let go.

Draco twisted himself free as Severus' grip slackened. The younger wizard stepped out of the lift and faced Severus, who still stood in there. "If you love her, that would be one thing. But if you don't, end this game and get the damn ingredients."
Severus continued to stand in the lift. When the lift started to descend, he didn't bother to try and stop it, instead allowing the lift to descend and ascend once more before going to his office. He needed that time alone just to collect himself and put aside all thoughts of Hermione. If he bothered to analyze how much Draco's comment had unsettled him, he would have realized that he loved Hermione; then he would not have gotten any work done that day.
Chapter Summary

Hermione faces the Redoubtable Convocation of Potions Masters and Mistresses regarding the fate of her apprenticeship.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter One Hundred Thirteen
"The Redoubtable Convocation of Potions Masters and Mistresses"

Disclaimer: How many people write fanfic
How many make money from it – not I?
Where were you while Rowling published Potter?
Slowly posting on my wall
Disclaiming about owning it all
Where were you while Rowling created it?
Someday you will read me
Caught beneath the disclaimer
In an epic super-fanfic on the Internet
Someday you will read me
Caught beneath the disclaimer
In an epic super-fanfic on the Internet

A/N: Disclaimer a parody of "Champagne Supernova"; Songwriters: GALLAGHER, NOEL Champagne Supernova lyrics © Sony/ATV Music Publishing LLC

==============

Lavender sat down, finding a seat next to Ginny and Draco. "I'm sorry that took so long. Seems that because Ron was once divorced, that was cause for not granting automatic guardianship. We had to plead our case as to why we should become Devlin's adoptive parents," she apologized. She had just left the Wizengamot's main chambers since Padma would be going off to Azkaban and Parvati's child would otherwise be sent off to an orphanage.

There was the clearing of a throat off in the darkness and the rhetorical question from an unknown person asking, "Since all interested parties are now present, may we begin?"
Hermione and Albert rose from their seats and approached the two circles of light spotlighted on the floor. The circles were lit from above, giving this forum an air of great solemnity. Then a staff was thumped on the floor off to their left, signaling the start of the convocation.

From the darkness strode in five robed figures, their faces concealed in the shadow of the large cowls that covered their heads. With great ceremony, they walked in a processional toward a long table that was curved with a slight arc, concaving towards the person or persons who brought the petition forward.

Once the robed figures were all seated, there was another thump of the staff. The center figure who sat amongst the five said in a voice Hermione recognized, "Let the Redoubtable Convocation of Potions Masters and Mistresses commence."

Hermione was tempted to snort at the ostentatious name of what everyone else generally called the "certification board" for the Potions discipline, which was an assemblage of five randomly-selected Potions masters and mistresses among the field, but it was an old name. Given the request to be presented, formality and procedure must be endured.

"Potions Master Albert Dobmeir," the wizard in the center began. "You bring an unusual petition before us."

Albert, dressed in his best formal dress robes, nodded. "Yes, I do, but one worthy of the petition brought before the convocation. And I would like to start by thanking the committee for agreeing to this last-minute request, but as our case shall show, this requires immediate attention."

"And what is the petition you bring before us?" the central robed figure, who was acting as chair of the proceeding, asked.

"It is my request, and that of my Potions apprentice, Madam Hermione Weasley, that she be allowed to change Potions masters in order to finish her apprenticeship," Albert said with great seriousness.

There was a murmur amongst the five robed figures before the room was quiet once more.

"This is a highly unusual request, given that a change in masters occurs in cases such as the death of the master or incapacity with which to finish instructing their apprentice," the chair noted.
"True, but there are unique circumstances which surround our petition for Madam Hermione Weasley to switch masters and require the Redoubtable Convocation to consider and hopefully grant, without penalty to Madam Hermione Weasley's good standing in the Potions field once she has been fully accredited and certified eventually by this committee," Albert pleaded before the council.

Hermione would have normally been addressed as Madam Weasley, but given Lavender was there, their full names were needed to specify which Madam Weasley was being referred to.

"Let Madam Hermione Weasley speak her reasons as to why we should consider such a proposal, and then we shall see if your petition has merit."

Hermione stood proudly with her chin tilted up. She had only been discharged from St. Mungo's that morning, and not twenty-four hours prior had been near the brink of death, but she felt strong enough to face this council in order to hasten her departure from England.

"In the span of less than two years I have been attacked by those who had intent to kill me. The first was Alan Parker, nephew to Calpurnia Fudge, who sought to block any attempt by myself to gain an apprenticeship after the war, which many on the council here are no doubt aware," Hermione added with a bit of disdain. To her satisfaction, there was a bit of grumbling from a few of the council members who were aware of such interference from the former Minister's wife. "Mr. Parker is also the godson of Dolores Umbridge, the very same former Administrator at Hogwarts during my school years who was carried off by centaurs and who blamed me solely for the incident." Hermione could not stop a small smirk of satisfaction from tugging at the corner of her lip before schooling her face once more.

"During my attack by Mr. Parker, he expressed his bigoted views regarding my lineage as a taint upon wizarding society, his sympathy towards the societal goals of Voldemort—" she said, pausing while Severus and many on the council flinched upon the mentioning of that particular wizard's name, "—regarding those of non-pure-blood status, and disgust regarding my divorce from Ronald Weasley, in addition to seeking vengeance on behalf of his godmother, Umbridge."

The chair nodded when Hermione paused to let the effect of her statements sink in for dramatic effect. "Go on," he encouraged her.

"Then Wednesday night, Padma Patil, who was once a member of Dumbledore's Army and with whom I worked alongside during the war, attacked not only me, but Potions Master Severus Snape, my employer, Madam Lavender Weasley, Draco Malfoy, and his wife, Ginny Malfoy. She had the intent of harming all of us, but especially me since I had exonerated Master Snape's and Mr.
Malfoy's names in front of the Wizengamot. In my clearing their names, she felt I had denied her justice. In her mind, she blamed both Master Snape and Mr. Malfoy for the unfortunate abduction, rape, and torture of her sister, Parvati Patil back in 1997.” Hermione did not mention the subsequent resulting pregnancy that ensued, as it was still too painful for her to acknowledge without breaking into tears in front of the committee.

Everyone on the council was aware of Miss Patil's pregnancy; the news of their attack and many of the details had been covered in the Daily Prophet in Friday's edition. Fortunately, Luna reported a more truthful and less sordid version in The Quibbler, which called into question some of the literary license yet again taken by the writing staff at the Daily Prophet.

"So it seems that I have had two people, one sympathetic towards the death and havoc wrought by Voldemort and his Death Eaters seeking to expunge Muggle-borns, and one whose sister and who herself suffered at the hands of Death Eaters subsequently on the other side of the war, both seeking to harm me. It seems the scars of this war linger so deep that I cannot remain in England without living in constant fear of my life that the next witch or wizard coming around the corner might intend me mortal harm. This latest attack has caused me to wish to end my apprenticeship in my desire to leave this country and seek refuge elsewhere. However, if you will allow my petition to switch masters, I can continue on with my apprenticeship with peace of mind and body, without living in fear."

There was yet another round of murmurs between the robed council members before the chair spoke. "And where would you go? If you have been attacked here, what is to prevent someone from going abroad to seek you out and intend you harm in your new place of residence?"

There was a clearing of a throat before the spotlight suddenly shone down on Mounga, who strode up to stand next to Hermione. "I can help provide her sanctuary where she will be safe, in Malu Palekaiko," he said with gravity.

"And you are?" the chair asked, a slightly amused lilt in his voice.

"Judge Mounga Finau. I am Master of Law and Letters, town judge for Malu Palekaiko, an island of the Hawaiian chain, and president of the town council of Malu Palekaiko. Malu Palekaiko is an island sanctuary for all witches and wizards, and even some Muggles married to a witch or wizard, who have come seeking safe harbor from those who have sought to cause them harm." Mounga was wearing his finest judicial robes and leis he only wore for formal occasions, after taking a quick Portkey back home and coming back to help in Hermione's case.

"And just how can your sanctuary protect her?" the chair asked. "They could just Portkey in and attack Madam Weasley."
"Trust me when I say that the sanctuary of the island will protect her," Harry said, coming to stand up in front of the council. A light eventually shone over Harry's head. Understanding the formality of the proceedings, he introduced himself, "Harry Potter, Auror, First Class."

"We're quite aware of who you are, Mr. Potter, but we need you to further expound upon your assurances to us that Madam Weasley would be safe in Malu Palekaiko," the chair prompted him.

"When my ex-wife, Ginny, divorced me, I followed her to Malu Palekaiko." Harry paused while the council chattered excitedly amongst themselves momentarily. "And while I meant her no harm, I did intend to bring her back to England with me. Upon touching her arm, I was instantly transported back to the Portkey office on Malu Palekaiko." Harry heard Draco stifle a snicker upon recalling that day, but refrained from glancing over his shoulder and glaring at his former school rival. "I was also informed of other instances of persons coming to the island with more nefarious intent and trying to harm others given sanctuary; they were suddenly transported to various places, including dangerous cliff edges above razor-sharp reefs, lagoons full of sharks, and the edge of an active volcano caldera. The more pernicious the intent, the more dangerous the place the assailant was magically transported against their will. Trust me when I say she will be perfectly safe, should she move there."

There was a hum of low murmurs and heads nodding in unison before they quieted down. The chair then asked, "If this committee does consider the proposal that Madam Hermione Weasley transfers the remaining time of her apprenticeship to another Master or Mistress, who is the person she will finish her apprenticeship under?"

Severus took Mounga's spot in front of the council, speaking up, "That would be me. Severus Snape, Potions Master."

The snickers of some of the council members was unmistakable, which only made Severus stand up straighter and glare more imperiously at the robed figures who would decide Hermione's fate. Fortunately, he was able to have his clothes washed and pressed that morning since he only came to England with one set of clothes. He was also able to visit the barber to neaten his appearance, in addition to getting a trim of his beard in order to look respectable as he presented his case to supervise the rest of Hermione's apprenticeship.

"Yes, yes," the chair said with a innuendo-laced chortle. "Given the history of you two that has been made public in recent months, and a rather torrid history at that, what assurances do we have that you will make sure Madam Weasley will finish her apprenticeship?" There had been many instances where a master had married a female apprentice, and yet in time she had never become fully accredited, such as it was with Ganfrey and Fastrada Johnson.
"For the fact that as much as I desire her to remain in Malu Palekaiko to be by my side, during her two previous visits, I have been only able to let her return to England knowing how important this apprenticeship is to her," he said, projecting a very serious air about him, but his desire for Hermione was unmistakable. "It would be selfish of me to try prevent her from completing her own desire of becoming a Potions mistress, a goal she had long before our current relationship began, an apprenticeship delayed due to reasons previously stated before this council. Should her request to transfer masters be granted, I assure you, she will become a Potions mistress within a timely manner." There was an absolute finality in his last promise to the council, the presence of the former professor who once was Head of Slytherin House gleaming through in his voice and demeanor.

The droning sound that rippled between council members made it seem as if they were not entirely convinced of this petition.

Lavender cleared her throat as she approached the council, taking Harry's spot in the light. She presented herself, looking impeccable in her finest lavender dress robes, her hair beautifully coiffed, and her make-up understated but perfect. "If I may address the committee?" she requested.

"You may. And you are?"

"Madam Lavender Weasley, founder and president of The Lovely Lavender Company and employer to both Albert Dobmeir, my Potions master, and Madam Hermione Weasley, his apprentice and my Vice President of Operations."

"And what is your interest regarding Madame Hermione Weasley's request to not only change masters, but to move to the other side of the world with..." The chair paused and Hermione could almost hear him finish his sentence referring to Severus as "her lover" in a slightly derogatory manner, but was surprised when he finished by asking, "... the intent of finishing her apprenticeship there?"

"As some in this committee may have read, I have appointed Draco Malfoy, also a resident of Malu Palekaiko, as my Vice President of Advertising and Marketing for the Asia Pacific region," Lavender began, her manners and tone very formal at first. "It is my intent, once Madam Hermione Weasley is finished with her apprenticeship, that she should move to Malu Palekaiko and open an Asia Pacific manufacturing, distribution, and sales center for my company that is expanding into eastern Asia, Australia, and the Americas. Hermione has proven herself capable of running operations of such a size, having run my company while I was away on maternity leave last year, and becoming fully versed in every aspect of the company. She has, in a Potions-focused business, developed relationships with suppliers, negotiated deals with distributors, and overseen manufacturing and quality control, in addition to attending to company finances, earning her title of Vice President through skill, brilliance, determination, and a commendable work ethic. Not to mention using her experience in developing new products for me towards her apprenticeship, working alongside her master, Albert Dobmeir, in a Potions research and development capacity.

"In addition, I might add," Lavender said, her voice becoming more authoritative and a bit short that it seemed this committee was too dim to realize that Hermione was not a slouch and should instantly be granted her request without these endless pointless questions, "she has completed her year of Herbology experience in the field, tended to Albert's garden weekly in addition to working on her Potions theory, learned her code of ethics and passed the exam with flying colors, successfully developed a new Potion on her own to deal with Portkey Time Zone lag, mastered three languages, is working on her fourth, and yet we watch you sit there and drag these proceedings on as if changing masters so she can remain safe is some great scandal amongst you lot!" To finish her tirade, Lavender gave a great huff and then insolently sniffed at the chair leading the proceedings.

"Your commendation of Madam Hermione Weasley is admirable and noted for the record, Madam Lavender Weasley, but changing masters under such circumstances is something of great importance and rarely undertaken," the chair gently reproved her, his voice patient, but held a hint of warning. "While you feel this is a cut-and-dry matter, this is an issue that will affect her good standing in the Potions community and amongst her peers, and must be thoroughly explored before a judgment can be rendered."

Lavender turned to see Draco standing behind her and removed herself from the spotlight in order to let him take a crack at the committee and put forth his own rhetorical spin.

"And you are?" the chair asked, knowing who he was, but needed it stated for the record.

"Draco Malfoy, Vice President of Advertising and Marketing for The Lovely Lavender Company for the Asia Pacific region. If I may address the committee?" he asked with a detached air about him that reminded Severus of his father, Lucius.

"Yes, Mr. Malfoy?"

"In addition to the arguments regarding Madam Hermione's Weasley's personal safety, and her character which speaks of her determination to finish her apprenticeship, though under the tutelage of another master, there is another reason for her to transfer her apprenticeship to Potions Master Snape while on Malu Palekaiko sooner as opposed to later," Draco began.

"And that is?" the chair prompted him in hopes he would further elucidate the conclave on the matter.
"Economic and academic. Last year, Madam Lavender Weasley purchased two large plots of land in Malu Palekaiko in order to build her new Asia Pacific facilities, but also to help build a school, since there is no formal academic school of magic in the Hawaiian Islands. Potions Master Snape has been tutoring many of the children residing in Malu Palekaiko, and until recently, I was a tutor in Charms and Transfiguration. And Master Snape and I can both attest to the fact that the lack of a formal educational institution on the island is a detriment to the children's academic careers, given some of the abysmal gaps of knowledge by some," Draco added quite mutinously.

"That's all well and fine that you care for the academic standards of the local population, but how does this pertain to Madam Hermione Weasley," the chair urged him to get to his point.

"A formal academic institution for the benefit of the local island population has only come about with the promise of The Lovely Lavender Company opening several hundred jobs for the local population to fill. With better paying jobs than working rice and taro fields or orchid farms, they can afford to send their children to the new local school for which Madam Lavender Weasley had graciously donated the land for the benefit of the public, with additional monies provided by her, my wife and I, and Master Snape towards the building of facilities for education.

"Currently most children are home-schooled, with few traveling abroad or to the mainland of the United States to attend school. With jobs available for the local population, witches who currently spend half their day at home homeschooling children can now work full-time while their children are educated to a standard level that can provide opportunities beyond growing up to be farmers themselves with little economic opportunities to advance themselves if they do not score high enough on their standardized exams with which to earn an apprenticeship."

"Sounds very noble, Mr. Malfoy, that you have become quite the advocate of the working class to better themselves, something your father would have found distasteful, I'm sure. But please get to the point. As rambling as these proceedings may seem to you, they are not an invitation for you to ramble on without purpose," the chair reminded him.

"My point is, the sooner Madam Hermione Weasley takes up residence in Malu Palekaiko, the sooner operations can begin, the sooner parents can work and the sooner they can earn money with which to pay for a formal education for their children. Next week, after much delay by local building code regulators," Draco grumbled under through gritted teeth, "construction of the manufacturing facility begins. Should we have to wait until Madam Hermione Weasley finishes her entire apprenticeship here in England, the building will sit unused for months, possibly a year, and children will continue to be home-schooled in an uneven and sloppy fashion to their academic detriment. Considering she has finished most of her course work, except for Japanese, for which she gets language lessons long-distance through a mirror from a native-speaking Japanese tutor who resides in Malu Palekaiko, and Chinese, which Master Snape is more fluent in than Master Dobmeir, according to both of them, it would better serve Madam Hermione Weasley to finish out the rest of her apprenticeship abroad to the benefit of everyone, including her safety and health."
"A very persuasive argument indeed, Mr. Malfoy." The chair leaned over to confer with his fellow committee members before sitting upright once more. "Before we grant a decision, there are a few other questions we would like to have answered to our satisfaction."

'Oh, shut it, Niles, and just render a decision already. I know you made up your minds. What are you up to, you tosser?’ Hermione pondered, keeping her silent thoughts to herself.

Taking a different tangent, the chair casually mentioned in an airy tone as he addressed Severus, "It has come to the attention of many on the committee, that in addition to the name of Severus Snape, you worked under the alias of Sebastian Delgado, so that you could continue secretly working as a Potions master while unjustly incarcerated under the Death Eater’s Decree, which Madam Hermione Weasley had finally exonerated you of being prosecuted under after your... departure from England under less than auspicious circumstances, to eventually reside in Malu Palekaiko."

"That is correct," Severus replied, wondering where this little exercise was going to go.

"And based on recent articles that have been published since the New Year, your current association with Madam Hermione Weasley began the summer of 2003."

"That is also correct," Severus affirmed, dreading where this was going to go, sensing it was not going to be particularly pleasant for him or Hermione.

"Madam Hermione Weasley has previously stated, and even you, while under disguise as Delgado at the Ministry Halloween Masked Ball, that she came up with the idea of the brewers kettles for solving a problem of simmering ingredients in order to make the brewing of the male sexual enhancement potion, Sequoia, produced by The Lovely Lavender Company, cost-effective?" the chair queried.

Trying not to sneer, based on the growing insinuating tones in the voice of the chair, Severus answered, "That is also correct."

"And did she in fact help with the development of the other potion, the libido-enhancing potion also produced by The Lovely Lavender Company, under the name Irresistible?"

Severus nodded reluctantly.
"So what you are admitting to is that before Madam Hermione Weasley began her apprenticeship with Master Dobmeir, she was consulting with you regarding Potions work?"

"Yes," Severus admitted through gritted teeth. He could sense this was when they were going to lower the boom, and he was proven correct.

"Tell us in... great detail all the Potions experimentation work you and Madam Hermione Weasley conducted in private before her formal apprenticeship with Master Dobmeir began."

She could almost hear the leer in his request. Hermione felt her ears and cheeks burning hot with embarrassment that Niles would do something as vulgar as this for his and the committee’s amusement, humiliating Severus and her during formal proceedings.

"I assure you, sir, whatever lewd and inappropriate conduct you are insinuating that may or may not have happened between Madam Hermione Weasley and me, anything regarding those two potions you have listed, any help she may have participated in regarding the testing of said products occurred after we had realized our affections for one another. I, at no point, took advantage of the situation or my position as a Potions master. As for your request for details, I refuse to divulge them for your prurient amusement," he said with a snarl, his umbrage clearly apparent.

"Prove to this committee that this is not some lust-driven ruse in which to whisk this young witch away to your... jungle love lair," he said wittingly, hearkening back to the Daily Prophet article. "What assurance do we have that this relationship you have is not merely a love potion gone awry?"

"What proof can I provide, besides testimony at Padma Parvati’s trial this morning that I was willing to let myself be killed in order to save Madam Hermione Weasley?" Severus asked rhetorically.

"Kiss her," the chair stated simply.

"What?" Hermione challenged, a glint in her eye that she was tired of this nonsense and sensed Niles and the others on the committee were up to something for their own twisted sport.

To make her and Severus kiss in front of them, knowing how Severus felt regarding public displays of affections, and given his notorious history for breaking up more canoodling students at Hogwarts than Mrs. Norris, Filch, and Peeves combined, she felt this was merely their way of trying to embarrass him and her with this spectacle.

"No!" Hermione protested. "Given everything Severus and I have gone through, you want us to kiss in gratification of what? These proceedings have gone on long enough. If you're not convinced of everything presented to you by now, then nothing will." It was strange for Hermione to refuse, given she freely kissed Severus at Mario's on Christmas Eve with so many diners watching, but she sensed this was something to satisfy their prurient inquisitiveness, for their own titillation.

Hermione was stilled from her rant by Severus grasping her hand.

Turning her to face him, he cupped her face in his hands as he gazed down at her. With earnest sincerity, he said, "If I was asked to prove my love for you by being whipped naked down the middle of Diagon Alley while incarcerated in a Shrew's Fiddle, I would do so without hesitation if it would satisfy their puerile curiosity and in the end keep you safe from ever being hurt again."

Hermione could only look up at Severus in wonderment, her eyes filling with tears upon his declaration to the lengths he would go for her.

Severus leaned forward and kissed Hermione gently. She responded in kind by wending her arms around his neck and kissing him back.

Neither noticed nor cared about the room of spectators who watched them in this brief moment of sincere and intense moment of love shared between them.

After their lips parted, Hermione heard Niles laugh. Turning her face towards the chair, she glared at him.

"I told you I could get Severus to kiss her. Pay up, Braxton! Fifty Galleons," crowed Niles triumphantly as he threw back his hood, nudging the wizard to his right with an elbow.

"You bastards!" Hermione fulminated, aggrieved that this all was for show as she had correctly assumed. Incensed, her mind raced through the worst insults she could gather without dragging insults up from the gutter using language only Ron would use. "Both of you! You sophomoric, fiendishly callous malperts!"
"C'mon, of course we're going to let you run off with lover boy, here. We were ready to just give you an automatic ruling without even bothering to hold this meeting, but Royston here, it was his idea to put the screws to you both," Niles admitted, pointing to the last conclave member to the right who was waving cheerily.

Royston threw his own hood back and said, "That was precious. And worth the thirteen years in the making, considering the ration of shit Severus gave me when I was standing before the committee seeking to become fully certified and the hoops he made me jump through."

"Impudent little shit," Severus growled. To his displeasure, he heard Mounga laugh in the background.

"That's exactly what you called me when I sought to challenge some of the things you made me say and do in front of the conclave before you would relent to my certification as Master. Payback is a bitch, Severus, and I loved dishing this back to you in spades," Royston admitted with glee. "And I had to pay you back for the few hexes you laid on me, Hermione." Seeing how Royston was getting onerous glares from Hermione and Severus, he added, "You have to admit, it was kind of funny. I bet Niles I could get Severus to dish on some of the down and dirties we guessed you two got up to with those potions, but it seems Severus is just as noble as ever. Nice save from spilling details, Severus."

Albert gently grasped Hermione's wand hand, knowing she was going to hex Royston to hell and back if given half a chance. "Remember, revenge is a dish best served cold and often," her master muttered quietly under his breath so that only she and Severus heard.

The rest of the committee threw their hoods back, revealing the two others in this drawn-out farce to be John Leyster, and a master about Albert's age by the name of Garrick McAngus she had seen at a few of the booze-ups. He was an affable fellow with a penchant for dirty limericks when properly sauced.

John and Garrick both had the decency to look chagrined that proceedings got out of hand as they cast disappointed looks towards Niles, Braxton, and Royston. John cast Hermione a contrite look, while Garrick hung his head, embarrassed his fellow Potions masters used the solemn and serious event to pull a prank and fulfill a few bets.

To formally end proceedings, Niles pronounced in a rushed manner indicating his boredom, "Let the record stand that Madam Hermione Weasley, Potions apprentice, la-dee, la-doo, la-da, may formally transfer the rest of her apprenticeship under the tutelage of Severus Snape, Potions Master, until she finishes and returns to England to face the committee once more in order to become a fully accredited Potions mistress. And Bob's your uncle."
Despite all the formality through most of it, it was a rather indecorous end to the hearing.

Hermione threw herself into Severus' arms and they hugged each other fiercely, finally able to be together without impediment.

Albert congratulated the couple before the rest of the attendees to the hearing could rush up and congratulate them as well.

As things settled down, Niles announced to the whole group, "Well, since the Malfoy party is tomorrow night, how about a proper booze-up at my house tonight in celebration of the good news?"

Severus was about to refuse, but before he could give his scathing response to the wizard who led the painful proceedings, Hermione spoke up, "I guess we can put your prank aside and not let it ruin what should be a happy occasion. Severus and I would love to come over."

Normally Severus would have protested, but knowing Hermione, he was familiar with that particular lilt in her voice and knew to go along with her plans. Offering his hand out to Niles, he coolly said, "I guess there was no permanent harm done, as juvenile as your bets were."

"See?" Niles said, looking over his shoulder at his fellow Potions masters, "I told you Severus couldn't always keep that stick up his arse. Having a girlfriend and getting periodically laid seems to agree with him."

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Thank you to my wonderful betas, JuneW and thegreyladies.

A Shrew's Fiddle is like a portable pillory. Your head and wrists are locked up in a wooden device in which you can be marched through town. Sometimes it has been called a Shrew's Fife, if the wooden carving resembled a flute with locking the wrists around the outside of the wood shaft instead of locking in the middle, or neck violin. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Shrew%27s_fiddle
Shew's Fife examples can be seen here: http://www.medievalwarfare.info/torture.htm
"Some Enchanted Evening: Take Two"

Chapter Summary

Come join Hermione and Severus as they glide through the throngs of guests at the Malfoy Spring Party.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter One Hundred Fourteen
"Some Enchanted Evening: Take Two"

Disclaimer:
I disclaim this, I wrote for you once upon a fic
Rowling owns this, the copywrite proves it's her own original work
Yet I know it's true that characters are so much fun to write
But if I know you, I know what you'll do
You'll read Harry Potter, the way you did once upon a book

A/N: Disclaimer a parody of "Once Upon a Dream," Lyrics from "Sleeping Beauty."
Written by Sammy Fain and Jack Lawrence.
To help set the tone of this chapter, please read while listening to waltzes.

Severus yanked on the front of his new dress robes, courtesy of Lavender, who had called in a favor. Madam Mandel sent some house-elves over Saturday morning and made the robes in time for the Malfoys' party that evening. The robes were very nice, the wool-and-silk blend fabric a bit lighter in weight than his usual woolen clothing, and the cut was a smidgen more fashion-forward than he would have picked for himself, but they were very flattering.

"Severus? Could you help me with the necklace clasp?" Hermione asked as she finished putting on her lipstick.

"Certainly." Severus strode over to the bathroom where he found her smoothing a curl that had come askew from her carefully styled coiffure that showed off her natural curls to their most complimentary, courtesy of the hairdresser Lavender sent over to the flat to help Hermione.
Holding the multiple strands of pearls he gave her for Valentine's Day, Severus secured the clasp before letting his fingers delicately caress the top of her mostly-bare shoulders, which were only covered by a few thin strips of fabric.

Severus pulled one tendril loose and set it to rest along the side of her neck. Hermione smiled back at him in the mirror's reflection, remembering how his eye was always drawn to her neck if there was a wisp calling his attention.

Hermione and Severus had stayed in the flat all day, finally having a chance to talk and catch up, finding comfort in each other's presence. They had not made love yet. There had been little time, though they had been inseparable since Severus' return to England.

Severus never left Hermione's bedside while at St. Mungo's. After she finally awakened, Severus had still slept in the chair beside her bed all night, even with the Auror guarding her hospital room all night long. Friday, after she was discharged in the morning, was spent with various hearings and proceedings, including the trial and conviction of Padma Patil where she was sent to Azkaban permanently. This was immediately followed by the custody hearing for Parvati's son Devlin, which was awarded to Lavender and Ron; Severus and Hermione had briefly attended the hearing before Hermione's own hearing in front of the conclave.

Saturday they spent recovering from far too much drinking at Niles'. During the day, Hermione described to Severus her journey while unconscious. Upon hearing her description of the woman who met her and turned her around, Severus suspected his wife Gabrielle had saved Hermione from joining the land of the dead.

With rapt attention, he listened to Hermione's description of the mountain she climbed. She told him of the exquisite manna-like waters from which she drank, and how it seemed to revitalize her and fill her with joy. Her experiences made perfect sense when Severus told her of how Zhubanysh had helped him guide Hermione back from death.

As much as hearing each other's tales brought them yet closer, they did not consummate their rejoining. For both of them, it seemed that they needed this moment of quiet tenderness and restful spiritual healing.

It was Severus' gentle touch of Hermione's shoulders after securing the clasp of her pearl necklace that the flare of desire once again sparked between them.

Admiring her in that dress that was unmistakably Slytherin green, he suggested, "Are you sure you're up to this evening? It has been a rather harrowing few days, followed by much to do to prepare you coming back to Hawaii with me tomorrow. Nearly rambling into the valley of death is not what one could call a leisurely stroll. Perhaps it would be best if we stayed home and rested." His finger trailed up the side of her neck and caressed the shell of her ear.

Severus was rewarded with a sigh and the tilting of her neck in invitation. Obliging, he leant down and kissed the nape of her neck.

"Rest is hardly what we'd do if we stayed at home," she insinuated with a come-hither glance in the mirror.

Looking at each other in the reflection, both finally felt the call to join together.

Hermione's brow furrowed. It figured when they were both ready they had other obligations. Reading Severus' mind, she said, "Unfortunately, we're not in Hawaii; here, punctuality is a matter of courteousness, as well as required. I think if we show up nearly two hours late, it would be noticed and not a sign of proper etiquette."

"Damn propriety and etiquette, and the hell with punctuality," he said playfully as he wrapped his arms around her from behind, resting his chin upon her shoulder as they shared a smoldering gaze in the mirror.

"And miss the chance to be announced as a couple? Despite our names being linked in the papers for months, it will shock most of high society in attendance as well as many of my former in-laws who will be there. I wouldn't dream of missing it." Hermione smugly gloated. "Besides, I have to show off what a handsome wizard I landed myself."

Severus snorted, "Handsome? Hardly."

"A little sun, a bit of exercise, a well-trimmed beard, a vast reduction in the amount of stress in your life," she said, but the last item listed was met with a quirk of Severus' brow, given their rather stressful week, "and you clean up quite nicely. Doesn't matter; I think you are very attractive, and all those other witches in Malu Palekaiko seemed to think so, too."

Hermione spun around and adjusted Severus' red silken cravat; it matched the red ribbon holding his hair back into an elegant queue that reminded Hermione of some paintings from the 1700's. "Besides, everyone will be in shock because of you wearing Gryffindor red. It will be worth the wait to get me home tonight where you can ravish me properly without having to worry about my hair and make-up being mussed." It pleased her to no end that Severus had voluntarily requested his cravat be made with red silk as a symbolic gesture to match Hermione's own color choice.

"Heaven forbid decorum, should the band strike up a tango. Lascivious just might accurately describe our dancing for once," he joshed, recalling the phrase used in the Daily Prophet article that described how they danced on New Year's Eve.

Malfoy Manor was decorated in the grandest of splendor. While the Malfoy family home in Malu Palekaiko was modest and understated, adopting some of the Zen-like qualities of the Japanese style, Malfoy Manor was extravagant befitting an old family renowned for wealth and prestige. Hermione could definitely pick out where the Malfoy sense of style influenced the design and building of the Grand Royal Supper Club, with the gilded column capitals, use of mirrors to reflect light from the candle sconces, and semiprecious stone used to accent and decorate the walls.

Standing at the top of the stairs, Hermione and Severus stood side by side. Hermione's right arm rested gently upon Severus' in a manner befitting a time long ago.

"MADAME HERMIONE WEASLEY AND SEVERUS SNAPE, POTIONS MASTER!" the herald called out in a loud booming voice.

While the band on the dais at the far end of the ballroom played on, most of the guests at the ball stopped talking immediately, their heads swiveling in unison to view the infamous couple descend the stairs.
The lovers were a picture of elegance and refinement as they descended the grand staircase together.

Once they reached the base of the stairs, conversation among the party-goers resumed with a flurry. As the couple made their way across the floor to greet their hosts, they kept their heads held high as Hermione's lips were graced with a sublime smile, and Severus' mien exuded the air of a wizard not to be trifled with. Eyes darted towards them, as hushed whispers and sotto-voce comments rippled through the crowd as they passed. Hermione was keenly reminded of the film scene from "My Fair Lady" where rumor of Miss Doolittle's royal Hungarian lineage meandered through the crowd as she tangoed by.

"Named as godparents and not even married," one scandalized witch hissed under her breath.

As Hermione and Severus reached their hosts, the couples bowed and curtseyed to each other as custom dictated for such affairs. Once that was done, they greeted each other as old friends.

Draco was looking rather elegant in his own formal dress robes of a dark gray. Ginny wore a matte silk dress with silver beaded fringe along the bottom edge, a style that was reminiscent of the 1930's; the silk was a slightly lighter silvery-gray to match her husband's eyes. Of course Ginny was dripping in diamonds set in platinum, wearing a Malfoy family heirloom necklace designed during the Edwardian era.

Hermione bent over slightly and stroked the cheek of little Libra in the wide bassinet that held the Malfoy triplets. It was easy to tell the twin girls apart from one another as Libra had the faintest dusting of platinum blond hair while her otherwise identical twin, Phoenix, had a fine down of pale strawberry blonde hair coming in. Sebastian was blond like his father.

Ginny and Draco has been introducing their children to British wizarding society as the guests filed in during the evening; no one except for the closest of trusted friends and family they were still on good terms with were allowed to touch the Malfoy progeny. What with recent events, there were always at least two house-elves standing guard by the children at all times to help protect them. The elves were in addition to the swarm of Aurors that mingled undercover at the party, making sure no one else sought to bring old grudges to bear at such a grand event.

"May I?" asked Hermione, looking at little Libra who would not let go of her finger.

With a nod of their parents' heads, Hermione reached down and picked up Libra, along with a burp cloth she placed over her shoulder.

As Hermione looked adoringly at her goddaughter held in her arms, Severus felt his heart swell. It didn't take much for him to imagine their own children in her arms some day. His reverie was cut short when Phoenix began to fuss, not caring to be separated from her sister, especially when Libra was getting some additional affection when Phoenix was not. Severus reached down and picked up his goddaughter, expertly placing a cloth on his shoulder; he'd become quite familiar with the concept and viscosity of spit-up over the past month.

There was the briefest exchange of glances between Hermione and Severus before a shy smile crept upon Hermione's lips.

"One day," was all that Severus said as he patted Phoenix's back gently and ran a hand up and down her back to comfort her. Then they both put their goddaughters back into the bassinet next to their sleeping brother, who snoozed happily away amidst the bustle of the party.

"Hopefully not too long?" Draco added to their exchange.

"Let me finish my apprenticeship first. No sense putting the carriage before the thestral," Hermione said. She was not bothered by Draco's question about children since it was meant not to nag, but made in hope of their experiencing their own joy of children together some day.

"Yes, first things first," Severus said as he tucked Hermione's hand in his arm. There was also a wedding and much-deserved honeymoon to take care of before such things were considered.

They bid adieu to their friends before beginning to mingle amongst the crowd.

Over near the band they found Mounga. He had been invited last-minute to the party since he had made the trip all the way there and back once more, with his wife along the second time.

"I can now see where Draco and Ginny had all that money to donate for the school," Mounga mused aloud as his eyes drank in the grandeur of the newly-restored residence. Draco and Ginny had offered lodging at the manor to the Finau family and an additional guest during their brief stay.

"Yes, but if it wasn't for Hermione's tireless work to clear our names, it would still be a derelict dwelling with the vines slowly reclaiming it," Severus asserted with pride, glancing down at his love who looked up at him fondly. "Since rumors of what happened in Malfoy Manor still abounded after the war, few wanted to purchase it, so it sat unsold, an asset on the Ministry books until restored to its rightful owner."

"Who is taking care of Iakona and Kaimi?" Hermione asked. She'd noticed Akela and Tristan, who had also been invited, provided they could make the brief visit without endangering their study schedule for their upcoming exams.

"Halulu and Greg are employing Kaimi's babysitting skills while she and her brother stay over at their place until we get back. And cat-sitting skills," the large wizard added with a knowing look, since Severus had left without making any arrangements for Katrina and Veronica, the calico kitten Hermione insisted they keep from Katrina's litter. Following Severus' gaze, Mounga glanced over and beamed with pride as his eldest daughter moved about and socialized with British wizarding society; she looked like a Polynesian princess in her fanciest Hawaiian-style dress robes, escorted by her beau. He enjoyed seeing his daughter's radiant face as if she was drifting through a fairy tale.

"She seems to be quite adept at charming British society, for an American," Severus said, having told Mounga of British wizarding society's general contempt for Americans, some considering them to be uneducated, couthless slobs. It was not meant as a slight towards his adopted niece, but as praise that she was able to deftly overcome some ingrained preconceived prejudices with her grace and wit, given her young age.
"I can hear it now," Mounga grumbled, "'Can I summer at the Malfoys' and take a Potions apprenticeship in England, Papa?'"

"Too few mistresses here in England, and don't let her study under a master unless he's Dobmeir's age or older – if that," he drawled. Severus' warning was heavily laced with implied innuendo. "And unless you don't mind the idea of Royston Bentwick as a possible son-in-law, which I would heavily object to, then I suggest she stay the course and study under Hermione back home."

"If you'll excuse us, there are some people we need to speak with," Hermione said with a growing smile.

Following her line of vision to another area in the crowd, Severus spotted who'd caught her eye and escorted her over.

"Mum, Dad," Hermione greeted her parents. "I'm so glad you made it."

"Dr. and Dr. Granger," Severus greeted her parents with a genteel nod of his head.

"Severus, please. We're not in the office, and considering all things, please address us by our first names," Wendy insisted as she went over and greeted him with the briefest of kisses, but not directly on his cheek.

"I know we have had little chance to talk, though I must admit we've had more time to meet with you than we did with Ron before the wedding," Wallace said, somewhat uncomfortable of bringing up the topic of Hermione's first husband as he shook Severus' hand. "And while Hermione is a grown woman who can make her own choices, I must ask: are there any long-term plans?" he asked as delicately as possible without outright asking if Severus was going to "make an honest witch of her."

Hermione refrained from rolling her eyes, but given that in less than twenty-four hours she was leaving England for good, now was as good a time as any for her parents to grill Severus regarding their relationship, even with Hermione having filled them in on some aspects.

Sensing Hermione's discomfort and seeking to assure her parents, Severus volunteered, "Had Hermione finished her apprenticeship, I assure you that you would be addressing me as your son-in-law by now. But Hermione has indicated her apprenticeship comes first, something I understand "and am willing to wait for." He lifted Hermione's hand and kissed the top of it, which made Hermione duck her head and blush given Severus' charming romantic gesture in front of her parents.

"A wise decision," Wendy chimed in. "I had a few friends at university who dropped out once they married."

There was a nod of agreement between the four of them.

"You're wearing a lovely dress this evening, Wendy," Severus complimented her. "I can see where Hermione gets her good fashion sense, since she has not adopted the silly custom in the wizarding world of wearing a Quidditch hoop about her ankles, unlike others," he dryly remarked as their eyes cast about at the many witches wearing large flouncing hooped skirts.

"Oh, but it does make it seem like a costumed ball held by one of those period recreation groups I see listed in the Times or posted on the Internet," Wendy sighed a bit dreamily.

Hermione was about to tell her parents that they weren't costumes, but that fashion moved forward very, very slowly in the wizarding world. Even her own dress was reminiscent of something an elegant screen siren in the 1950's would wear to the Oscars, and still it was considered to be rather avant-garde by wizarding society.

"I wish you could both stay in England a bit longer so that we could have a chance to know each other better before you both leave, Severus," Wallace said with a bit of melancholy.

"As do I," Severus diplomatically lied, "but I already canceled four days of intensive tutoring for exams that will affect the potential careers of dozens of students on the island. Now I must now make up that time, but luckily I can do it with Hermione's help, as she has offered to tutor next week as well. And then there is the matter that I will not leave England without Hermione. The sooner she is in Malu Palekaiko and granted sanctuary, the sooner we can all be assured of her safety."

It felt strange to Hermione that her parents and Severus were speaking more about her future plans than herself, but she had rarely been comfortable about speaking to her parents about many aspects of the wizarding world, despite their open-mindedness.

"Then I hope we'll have a chance to spend some time visiting before the wedding," Wendy said, but quickly amended with, "that is, if there are accommodations close by in town."

"Nonsense," Hermione finally spoke up, "there is plenty of room at the house." That comment garnered a fleeting glance between her and Severus, which her parents caught.

"Well, we would not wish to intrude on a young couple in their house, so that is a detail we can sort out later," Wallace tactfully intervened, noting the potential conflict looming.

Before anything else could be said, Christine and Tim approached the small group.

"I'm so glad Draco and Ginny were kind enough to have a couple nurseries set up here at their manor, so we could check on Auberon during the evening instead of having to arrange a sitter," Christine said with a sigh, just coming back from nursing her son.

Tim reached over and plucked two glasses of champagne from a nearby floating tray and handed one to his wife. "Such a grand affair," he noted with admiration. "And the house-elves were very nice to us Muggles too, as they were charmed with the idea of watching a Muggle baby. I guess it's quite the novelty."

Yes, when the Drs. Grangers and the Taylors were introduced, the fact that Muggles were invited to a wizarding event – in Malfoy Manor, no less – it had caused as much as stir as when Hermione and Severus were announced.

"Given that Ginny invited all her family, and her six brothers have... nearly twenty children between them all, not including the triplets," Hermione guessed. She was unable to tally all their names quickly in her head at the moment. She knew that that number would be going up soon since Charlie and Angelina were expecting again; she'd seen the pregnant witch as they crossed the floor earlier. At the request of Arthur, Charlie seemed to put his particular grudges with his sister and her husband aside for the sake of family harmony, and had agreed to come along with Percy and his wife.

Everyone in the group rolled their eyes. They kept comments about the amazing breeding Weasley women to themselves, especially given the fact that Ginny had given birth to triplets. Also, there were a great number of Weasleys milling about who could overhear them at any moment.

When Hermione spotted Fred and George, she promised she would speak to her parents again before the end of the night, but she had an urgent matter to discuss with some old friends before she could leave tomorrow.

"Well, well, well. The terror of the dungeons and the bossy know-it-all came after all," George ribbed them lightly, which earned a sneer from their former professor. "No, really, we're glad you came to save the day there, Snape. Hermione comes up with some brilliant ideas. We would have hated to have lost someone as inventive as her. She's too bright a witch to lose," he praised her in earnest, which earned a nod of agreement from Severus.

"Speaking of brilliance, is that your handiwork we spotted earlier on Niles Goggins and Jack Braxton earlier this evening?" Fred asked with great curiosity.

"Me?" Hermione feigned with false innocence. "No, not entirely me. Severus helped, the brilliant darling he is in his own right," she chirped sweetly as she gave Severus a slightly mischievous smile.

"Care to tell us how you did it?" Fred asked, leaning forward.

"Only if you promise that no matter how many Galleons either one of them throw at you, you do not provide them with the antidote," Severus said with a smug grin.

"Done," the twins said simultaneously.

As Niles passed them, casting a penitent glance towards Hermione and Severus, George twITCHED his wand. This caused Nile's hat to fly off his head and expose the word "TWAT" on the back of his skull, where the hair had been removed in the shape of the four letters. No amount of hair growth potions or spells could make the hair grow back, much to Niles' distress. Braxton had also suffered the same fate that night, but with a worse four-letter word; it caused him to attend the party while wearing a turban that the twins had removed twice so far.

Niles used his wand to Summon his hat back. There were a few snickers from those nearby who had caught sight of Niles Goggins' new haircut. A mix of bemused and shocked glances were cast from some other nearby spectators before the wizard was able to cover his head up once more, using another sticking charm to keep his hat on.

"Is it permanent?" George asked.
"Hopefully within the year it will grow back, but given it is an experimental formula, we'll just have to see," Hermione remarked with a blasé attitude. "There is one item I would love to have your feedback on, regarding an idea I had," she proposed. Hermione spoke as she observed Royston Bentwick sauntering about with a drink in his hands, grabbing some of the hors d'oeuvres off of a floating tray before shoving them in his gob.

"What did you have in mind?" the twins asked, keenly curious as they followed her gaze.

"Let's just say when I come back in about a year's time to become certified as a Potions mistress, I want it to be something that will be remembered for a long, long time," Hermione said, imagining the tales that would be told for decades to come of the revenge of Hermione on Royston. The ill-humored potioneer deserved it for the humiliating grilling he'd put her and Severus through for his own petty grudge; so it should be something that would be remembered for more than just thirteen years.

"Ice-cold revenge, my favorite," George crooned with glee.

As Hermione and Fred talked, George turned to Severus. "Got any more of those lovely get-away ideas, like that tropical rendezvous? That has been quite the hit, and we're seeking new ideas to develop more of those."

Severus thoughtfully put his hand to his chin as if deeply pondering possibilities, before he replied, "Hmm, wasn't there something you mentioned about Hawaiian dungeons featuring racks made with bamboo and coconuts?"

George burst out laughing and slapped Severus on the back, exclaiming, "Hermione is right, you do have a sense of humor after all."

It was a good thing Severus did not have a drink in his hand, otherwise he would have spilled it all over Hermione. But then again, it would have been the perfect excuse to momentarily slip Hermione out of her dress while the house-elves cleaned it for her. Severus knew many secluded places in the manor they could have secreted themselves away in, but alas, it was proving far harder to slip away with his lover due to so many people she wanted to speak to before leaving tomorrow.

As Hermione and Severus strolled through the crowd that kept giving the couple curious stares, they spotted Harry and Zhubanysh, but Harry was busy pretending to blend in while working. He was in Auror mode. Hermione and Severus spoke with Mrs. Potter for a while as Harry's eyes kept scanning the crowd.
Mingling, they eventually came upon Lavender and Hermione's ex-husband. Hermione and Lavender began discussing the various things they needed to settle and resolve before her departure the next day.

"Weasley," Severus said with a particular drawl of dislike, deciding to make idle chatter to feign politeness while the two witches discussed business.

"Snape," Ron said in turn, no longer intimidated by his former professor. "Please let me, for the thousandth time, express my deepest gratitude for your saving my wife, my sister, and Hermione." Technically it was Mounga and Harry who had saved them all, but Severus' sacrifice, had the cavalry not arrived in time, would have ensured they still lived because of his bargain to offer himself for their safety.

Severus looked over the wizard he'd once loathed and still did not particularly care for, but he was gracious enough to accept his thanks. He extended his hands and they shook in a rather perfunctory fashion with no warmth between them.

"While I may not have been a good husband to Hermione," Ron began, and was met with a penetrating glare from Severus, at which Ron had the timidity to blush slightly with embarrassment, "I know that her next husband will take far greater care of her than I did."

Severus accepted Ron's half-apology with a nod of his head, indicating with a steely look at Hermione's ex that he would indeed take far better care of Hermione than Ron did, and more.

To fill the void of silence, Ron casually observed, "I don't see Viktor and Anne. I would have thought given their standing in society they would have been invited."

Ron was oblivious, but Severus and Hermione both caught the fleeting moment where Lavender collected herself. They improvised, "Well, Anne is probably home with morning sickness, just as Harry and Zhubanysh had to miss Anne and Viktor's wedding when she was pregnant." Rumors in the gossip rags had recently leaked her condition.

Of course Draco did not invite the Krums, especially given Anne and Severus' history. The potential for possible embarrassment was too great. Hermione had not informed Severus she was aware of their past business arrangement and saw no benefit in informing him of her knowledge, though she did mention the Krums had protected her from the mutinous mob when she returned in January.
As all the guests had arrived and ample time had been given for drinks, food, and conversation, the band struck up a musical introduction to indicate that the dancing portion of the evening was about to begin.

The dancing area in front of the band, laid with highly polished wooden parquet flooring, cleared of guests as Draco and Ginny stood in the middle of the floor, ready to begin the festivities with an opening waltz.

As Severus watched their hosts take to the floor, it amazed him how similar Draco looked to his father, with much the same build but none of the cold dispassion and arrogance. Instead this was a wizard who was radiating with warmth and hospitality, but with still the same grace and regal carriage. Severus felt quite proud of Draco, for whom he had acted as a mentor and eventually became friends with. Draco had turned from an arrogant, petulant, narrow-minded spoilt brat into a wizard who was admired by the Malu Palekaiko community. He was now what Muggles would call "a decent human being," or, as Jerry called him, "a mensch." And while Draco had credited his happiness in life to Severus saving him from a fate worse than death had he never fallen in love with Ginny, his wife and mother of their children, Severus had to admit that Draco was largely responsible for reuniting him and Hermione, and for that he was eternally grateful to his friend.

The band struck up a song and began to play "Donauwellen," the waltz that was played during the hosts' first dance as husband and wife during the impromptu wedding reception held by the town. The couple moved back and forth before beginning to turn.

Hermione, having seen the memories of Ginny and Draco's wedding in Severus' Pensieve, sighed aloud with great sentiment. She was moved by the symbolism of this song being chosen, and leaned her head against Severus' shoulder feeling rather nostalgic.

"Shall we join our hosts on the floor, Madam?" Severus asked simply, as the edge of the dance floor was too crowded with spectators for him to formally bow.

Hermione set her hand atop Severus' and let him lead her to the floor where he placed his hand gently at her waist and held her right hand as if it were a delicate china cup. They moved back and forth, to and fro for a few measures, before they began to spin about.

With their addition to the dance floor, others stepped out and began dancing in a swirling of colors from the multitude of brightly colored formal dress robes and gowns worn for the evening.
Three songs later, the band began playing a tango. Wearing large hoop skirts was not conducive to dancing the tango in, and even those who sported a bustle found the dance too demanding in the heavy and slightly constrictive dresses. This meant there were few couples who danced the tango on the floor, and Severus and Hermione certainly stood out among the few who danced to the music. The flash of Hermione's thigh and the top of her stockings as she wrapped a leg around Severus' certainly garnered more fuel for hearsay about their infamous affair. It seemed as they tangoed that they were almost taking perverse delight in stunning the crowd, shattering long-held perceptions of Severus as a gelid and asexual being. Their smoky stares and lingering glances as they danced with barely restrained passion were observed by all who stood agog as the couple's obvious desire for one another played out to the staccato beats and sweeping strains of the tango melody.

A few songs later a reel was called. Four long rows of dancers lined up. It was a song with a lot of Scottish flare and was a dance very similar to Strip the Willow, but instead of locking arms, people crossed wands above their heads. Hermione laughed gaily when it was her and Severus' turn to dance along the long line, briefly spinning with other partners down the row before returning to dance around each other with wands touching above their heads. Hermione's joy was so contagious even Severus could not refrain from the moment infecting him, and he smiled and laughed a bit.

They danced and danced until Hermione's feet were sore. Then they took a break and applied a potion to address her feet so they could dance some more. There were offers by those close to Hermione she trusted to dance with her, and even a few requests by witches to dance with Severus, but they both declined, with the exception of dancing a reel which required brief interaction with other partners. Severus was unwilling to let Hermione out of his sight or grasp until they were in Malu Palekaiko and she had been granted sanctuary. Even when she had to use the toilet, he stood guard by the door until she came out to join him by his side once more.

Taking a brief respite from dancing, they walked out onto the terrace to view the gardens in the moonlight à la belle étoile. It was much chillier in England than in Malu Palekaiko. When the breeze picked up, Hermione momentarily shivered. Severus immediately removed his long coat and draped it about her shoulders to keep her warm.

"Thank you," she breathed, reveling in the scent of Severus enveloping her, amplified by the faint hint of Haunt cologne he was wearing. She closed her eyes and inhaled deeply while leaning into him. "I have missed your scent," she murmured aloud to herself, but also for Severus' benefit.

There was so many things he'd missed about her, he could not even begin to list them, but her scent was one of them as well.

They stared out at the gardens lit by the gibbous moon that was so large, it was hard to tell if it was not already a full moon.

The rows of white roses, white tulips, and white peonies caught all the silvery light in their glory, making the gardens look otherworldly in their perfect splendor. The delicate scent of the peonies and roses gently perfumed the air.

As the strains of the music drifted out into the night, they stood in silence, feeling at peace in this perfect moment they shared.

Unable to stand it any longer, Severus swept Hermione up in his arms and kissed her soundly. He could no longer hold back the passion that had been slowly building inside of him all evening since he'd clasped the pearls about her neck, the necklace that now pressed against his chest as he held her tight.

Hermione felt as if she had drunk directly from the spring of Severus' love, her head dizzy and spinning. She could no longer feel her feet beneath her, feeling swept up in the spontaneous moment of their emblazoned kiss.

This was what love was. This was without a doubt what was meant to be. They both looked forward to the many years that lay ahead of them, facing life together side by side.

As their kiss finally drew to a close, Hermione sighed dreamily. Opening her eyes, she saw the moonlight glinting off of Severus' hair. The silvery light made his skin glow with a cool, pale blue light on one side of his face, while the warmth of candlelight from the party spilling out into the night cast the other side in warm colors. The lighting perfectly showed the two sides of Severus she knew so intimately and loved – the dry, cool intellectual who stimulated her mind, and the man with burning passion inside who consumed her whole with his touch. She reached up and kissed Severus, cupping his cheeks in his hands they way he had done to her many a time.

Severus reveled in the sensation of Hermione kissing him back with the same passion. His own sense of time and gravity momentarily faltered as his head spun. He was not drunk on champagne, but on the love he felt in Hermione's kiss, and that made him sigh deeply with satisfaction.

They smiled at each other, ready to finally call it a night and go back to her flat for one last night in London. Then they were going home, to their home that awaited them in a faraway land where, as she once sung to him in Russian, "love reigns, where peace reigns. Where there is no suffering, where war was behind them."
As Hermione offered Severus his coat back now that they were back inside, passing through the party, they nodded their heads toward Bill and Fleur, who nodded back. They had talked earlier in the evening, as Bill mentioned that he might swing by Malu Palekaiko since he had a business trip to the Gringotts branch in Tokyo he had to make soon.

Luna Longbottom came up to the couple and wished Hermione well on her trip abroad. While Severus knew Neville, who stood fidgeting next to his wife, was in no way a rival for Hermione's affections, especially with the Longbottoms being newlyweds, Severus could not bring himself to warm up to the younger wizard who'd shagged Hermione once while they were parted. There was a spark of jealous dislike in the Potions master's eye that made Neville quail slightly. Severus was very gracious to Luna, however, thanking her for reporting the truth after their interview, a rarity in journalism he noted. Luna and Hermione made promises to send the periodic albatross and to meet up when she came back to England the following year.

Walking toward where their hosts were chatting with guests, Severus and Hermione almost bumped directly into Arthur and Molly.

"Severus!" Arthur said jovially as he shook the fellow Order member's hand. "I'm so glad Hermione was able to clear your name."

"And thank you for being there to protect Hermione from the unruly mob when she returned after the New Year," Severus responded in kind.

"Yes, thank you, Arthur," Hermione added her thanks.

There was an awkward moment, as Molly sniffed disdainfully at Hermione, glancing at her sideways as if to not look directly at her. The matriarch's large hooped skirt rustled as she raised and lowered her shoulders in a non-verbal attempt to express the displeasure of being in the company of her ex-daughter-in-law. "Still not married and without children?" she asked stiffly.

"Molly," Arthur warned her.

Hermione was tempted to go into detail about how she and Severus would be living together out of wedlock and had not even bothered to get engaged – just to nettles and goad her – but instead was inspired to take a different course of action.

Turning to her lover, she smiled placidly as she began saying in fluid Spanish, "This woman has a new daughter-in-law happy to breed with my ex-husband, yet still acts as if I have personally attacked her and deprived her of yet more grandchildren. Thank God I am no longer married into this family and thank goodness for Ginny and Draco's sanity they don't live in England where she can harangue them into madness."

Glancing at Molly briefly at her reaction, he replied to Hermione in the same Castillian accent he used when pretending to be Eduardo, "My sweet darling, do not fuss. Take joy in the fact that you will probably never have to lay eyes on this harpy made manifest. Instead feel pity for her poor husband who has unwittingly bound himself to her. He has many more decades to go in which to endure her, while this evening is probably your last."

To both Hermione and Severus' satisfaction, Molly began to twitch.

"Molly?" Arthur asked with great concern, noticing his wife looking rather peaked and pale, her eyes glazing over.

"Perhaps she exhausted herself with all the excitement," Severus said with false sincerity that seemed quite believable, suppressing a malicious grin.

Arthur thanked him for his concern and began guiding his wife towards a nearby couch, thinking she was having another relapse.

"You have such a vengeful streak that I must make you an honorary Slytherin," Severus said quietly under his breath as they made their way through the party once more towards their hosts.

"Considering that you are often the epitome of what a Slytherin is thought to be, I consider that a great compliment," she accepted his remark with pride. "Resourceful, cunning, ambitious – all admirable traits."

Hermione had told him earlier in the day that he made a great Gryffindor with all his own brave, noble, and selfless acts over the years, especially in light of offering himself to save her, but he had taken her compliment with much less aplomb.

"It is time we made our farewells," Severus announced to their hosts.

"The night is still young," Draco said, sorry to see his friends leave.
"True, but we have a morning Portkey." Severus clasped Draco's hand as they said goodbye.

"We should be returning no later than Wednesday," Ginny replied, informing her friends of their own plans to return home soon. "Given recent events, Draco and I will be closing the house up for longer than we anticipated, and so there are some matters we must address."

They all quietly reflected in somberness that the lingering scars of the war had removed the possibility of them coming back to England even twice a year. Only time would tell when wizarding society in Britain would move on and it would be safe for the Malfoy family. Draco would allow his family to return only without the threat of harm looming over their heads.

"Then we look forward to you coming over to our home Sunday for dinner, at the usual time," Severus concluded, suggesting the pleasant idea of normal domesticity to look forward to before they parted.

Walking towards the cloak room, they found Albert sitting in a chair by the balcony surveying the scene below him. He had a glass of brandy in his hand, looking serenely happy and far drunker than earlier in the evening when they spoke.

Spying the exiting couple, he held out his hand to talk one last time that night before they parted. "Children, children, children," he called to them with the lazy flopping of his hand and a rosy glow about his cheeks and nose.

Severus did not care to be addressed in such a manner, but the wizard was old enough to be his grandfather, and he knew it was meant with endearment.

"I don't know if I will have the legs to see you off tomorrow," Albert said with a distinct slur, "but in case I don't, let me say a few things." Pointing a wavering finger at Severus as if trying to find the right wizard between the two in his field of vision, he said, "Next time you pick a nom de plume, alter your handwriting more so it's not so recognizable, and avoid using those particular phrases that only you would use." His fingers moved about freely as if he was playing some invisible musical instrument.

Weaving in his chair as he turned to look at Hermione, Albert addressed her in as stern a tone as he could muster, given how deep into his cups he was, "And you, young lady! Never had I had an apprentice as wonderful as you." He nearly sniffed and shed a tear at the great swelling of affection he felt toward his now former apprentice. "Merrrrrrrlin, am I so glad Severus could help me get out of that contract with Trevor Sprog." Hermione did not correct Albert's error regarding Trevor's last name. Upon mentioning of the topic, Albert swiveled his head and said, "And oh yes, thanks for that little favor, old boy." Returning to his wobbly train of thought that was in danger of derailment, he fuzzily focused on Hermione once more. "No working yourself to the point of collapsing anymore. Should you need to be hospitalized from over-exhaustion, I hope it's because you've been fucking each other's brains out to the point of blissful lassitude." He paused to hiccup momentarily before adding, "Again," referring to the way Hermione looked after coming back from her recent two-day Valentine's Day trip.

The addition of that last comment sent Hermione into a fit of blushing so severe it crept all the way down to her chest.

"We shall take your wise advice to heart, rest assured," said Severus with as much dignity as he could muster given the adjuration they both received. He was thankful the music from the band was too loud for others to have casually overheard the exchange.

"Yes, goodnight," Hermione muttered feebly. The lovers absquatulated with haste.

Upon arriving, Marf was there to greet them and take their cloaks. The poor house-elf had been wracked with guilt that he'd not been at the flat when Padma had attacked his mistress, employer, former master, and their friends. It took quite a lot of convincing from Hermione that none of it was Marf's fault and that she was the one who had suggested Marf go over to Malfoy Manor to help earlier that week. She reminded Marf that Padma timed her attack so that there would be no one around to help. Since then, Marf had been nearly underfoot the entire time, unwilling to let his mistress out of his sight, much like Severus had been.

"Thank you, Marf. You can retire for the night since I am here to make sure your mistress is safe until our departure tomorrow. If you could wake us around seven, that would be appreciated," Severus asked politely, being used now to addressing free elves in Malu Palekaiko with more courtesy.

Marf bowed deeply before disappearing with a shimmer.

Along one wall of the flat were many boxes of Hermione's books and housewares she was bringing with her. The rest was to be boxed in the morning, to be packed in her charmed trunk.

Marf had made sure there was a warm fire merrily burning, awaiting Hermione's return from the ball with Severus.

Now alone, Hermione turned to see Severus' silhouette back-lit by the dancing flames in the fireplace. Her heart and her loins sang with want for this wizard before her. Before Severus could suggest a snifter of brandy to relax, before he would slowly and gently seduce Hermione by the fire, she advanced on him and kissed him.

When Hermione awoke from her coma, she had been so happy to see Severus. With the halo of light around his head dazzling her, she had been too relieved to be upset with Severus. But once her strength began to return quickly, she was secretly angry with her lover. She had wanted to wail and pound on his chest with her fists that if he had a death wish, then he should not mercilessly tease her with the promise of a long life together. With the knowledge that Draco had imparted to her in confidence of Severus' brief dance with lunacy to kill himself in some mad plot to save her, and now this latest offering of himself to let Padma kill him to spare her and the others, Hermione was furious that he would welcome death so easily. After she had a chance over the next few days to silently mull over what had happened, she found she could not remain angry at Severus, for he did what he viewed as the only course of action to save them all from harm, and possibly death, with his sacrifice. And in his madness last summer, she could not fault him, for he wasn't in his right mind. Given her own willingness to traipse so readily to death's door without certainty of Severus' demise, she knew she could not fault Severus for all that he had done. She silently forgave him, though there was nothing to forgive.

It was when she finished her mental absolution of Severus that her carnal desires returned as they were getting ready for the ball.

The entirety of the evening seemed like one tortuously prolonged bout of foreplay between them. The trailing of his fingers as he clasped the pearls about her neck as the night began, the soft caress of his finger in a circular motion at the crook of her elbow when no one noticed, the possessive placement of his hands upon her as they tangoed, the subtle pressure of his hand upon her lower back as he guided her as they weaved through the crowds at the ball – all of these touches had slowly built the fire that now blazed hotly inside of her and now demanded to be quenched.

Her hands gripping his lapels tightly, she advanced on him until, her lips firmly on his, her tongue invaded his mouth as if she would sack and plunder him that night.

Severus shuffled backwards until the back of his calves hit the settee, and he plopped down rather inelegantly, bracing himself just in time.
Gazing up at her, he saw her need for him plainly written on her face. Pure love, searing lust, and unfettered desire were all discernible in the way she pinned him in place with her stare. Severus was unable to move.

Hermione stood above him, feeling the thrill of her seductive powers coursing through her as seen in the awestruck look Severus was giving her. She reached up and undid the zipper of her dress. With deliberate slowness, Hermione pushed the straps of her dress off her shoulders, one after the other.

Severus sat there feeling like a fool, unable to do nothing more than gaze at the vision before him, but this was the Hermione he'd hoped to bring forth with his training from the beginning of their affair: a confident temptress capable of paralyzing him with her sensuality. His mouth hung open and his breaths became shallow and quick. His erection was straining against his trousers, awakened by Hermione's sudden and commanding kiss. He wanted to reach up and caress her waist through the silk of her dress, but he could not find the ability to move. Dumbly he watched as she teasingly undid her zipper and sensuously pulled the straps aside to let the sheath of silk slip from her body, revealing her to be wearing only dark green lacy knickers, stockings, and her heels. Her wand was still secured in a loop on the side of her stockings until she suggestively removed it from its holster and casually tossed it on the settee next to Severus.

Hermione kept her pearls on, the multiple strands rolling across her skin with the longest strands swaying back and forth across her breasts. Severus watched each subtle movement. He was hypnotized as the ropes of pearls caressed her skin as if to tease her nipples, lightly brushing against them, as she began removing her knickers.

Thumbs hooked along the sides, she pushed the scraps of lace and silk past her hips until they fell and landed atop of her dress that was puddled on the floor.

With one fluid movement, she stepped away from her clothes and straddled Severus, who was still fully clothed.

The light of the fire flickered across her face, allowing Severus to see how large and dilated her pupils were, as if her own eyes had changed to match his own. He felt as if her eyes could swallow him whole, and he was transfixed by them. His hands tentatively reached up and stroked her ribs, skating along her skin until he gently cupped her breasts. The pearls clacked as Severus' hand moved, his thumb reaching to brush across her peaks that were already firm, casting shadows across her areolas.

Kneeling with her face above his, Hermione wended her fingers into his hair, her lips now parted as she breathed heavily, the anticipation becoming close to unbearable for her. Hermione could feel the throbbing between her legs grow ever more insistent like a steady bass drum that pounded away in time with her heart. With the removal of her knickers, she could tell she was already ready for him, as the cool air met her sodden curls. She could rarely recall the ache between her legs pulsing as badly as that moment. Severus' hands on her breasts were making her ability to draw out the moment excruciating, yet all the more delicious.

Removing one hand from his hair, Hermione placed it between her legs and dragged a single finger between her labia, coating it with her slickness. She then gently smeared her wetness on Severus' lower lip, her finger making a small circular motion while she recited in Japanese,

"The ripe peach is split
Juice dribbling down your chin
Devour with relish"

Severus knew every haiku in the erotic Japanese book she gave him. This was one of her own. Its symbolism so sexually charged, so lusciously suggestive and blatantly lustful, he could not help but be aroused she had written something like this for him, an amatory invitation for him to consume her whole. His licked her finger, drawing it slightly into his mouth, his tongue teasing the tip as he had various parts of her body before, giving a silent promise of things to come. He savored the sweet musky taste of her and felt his own heart thumping loudly against his chest in his own building anticipation.

As she lowered his mouth on his, the spark was lit.

Suddenly Severus' hands clutched at her possessively as one arm wound around her waist and the other to her hair, to pull her as close to him as possible.

Hermione's hands quickly snaked down his body and began blindly yanking and undoing knots and clasps, not caring if she popped buttons or ripped fabric.

Sensing the urgency of the moment, Severus hastily yanked at his trousers, shoving them down. He was reluctant to let go of Hermione, but also too eager to wait until he could enter her.

His coat and shirt undone, trousers and underpants only shoved halfway down his thighs, Hermione grabbed Severus' hot and rigid member. She felt it briefly twitch from her touch, before she positioned him and without any preparation impaled herself on him in one swift moment.

Both simultaneously threw their heads back at the overwhelming sensation. Hermione cried out, welcoming the feeling of him in her once more, as sudden as it was. Had her body not been so ready, it would have been painful, and his entrance into her nearly was, but only because she was aching so badly it was a release to finally have him inside of her once again.

Severus let out a loud moan of delight. While usually much quieter than Hermione when they made love, the quick thrust of Hermione's encasing him in her snug warmth was too much for even him. He shut his eyes tight and wrapped his arms around her tighter, locking his arms around her waist as he proceeded to help Hermione as she began to rise and fall, impaling herself on his length with a fury that demanded gratification.

One of Hermione's hands was braced on the back of the settee, clutching at the Chippendale wooden carving that ran along the top of the back, while her other arm crushed Severus' head to her bosom.

Severus grunted and groaned each time he was fully sunk into Hermione. He used his arms to push her down before helping to left her up in conjunction to her legwork.

His unreserved shouts of ecstasy were coupled with Hermione screaming in perfect time with him.
Each time she was fully seated upon Severus' cock, feeling it fill and stretch her so satisfactorily it made her want to cry, she exhaled with shouts of joy. And when she rose up, feeling Severus' member stroke her just so as he withdrew, she inhaled with a gasp.

The tension of their bodies pressed together, the pearls tugged and twisted around Hermione's neck.

Hermione was so highly aroused before they even began that it did not take much for her to feel the climax rapidly building inside of her. She did not even need stimulation of her clit, as she normally did, in order to reach orgasm. Between the long evening together, her already heightened desire, and their many months apart, Hermione quickly felt herself so close.

As her head began to loll back and the pitch of her screams hit as high a note as she could wail, her arm around Severus' head began to slacken.

Severus took this moment to hold on to her as tight as possible and push her down onto him as he thrust up from underneath, slamming into her deeper.

As one of the strands of pearls broke, Hermione shattered. She instantly felt whole with Severus once again.
Lurching forward, her eyes shut tight, Hermione's mouth hung open as she let a low and guttural bellow issue forth as Severus pushed himself into Hermione with desperation from underneath as he felt her body quake and shudder. Neither of them noticed the sounds of the pearls that had slipped off the silk cordage roll off the settee and fall like rain on the wooden floor with small plunking and plinking noises, bouncing and rolling away.

Seeing her so lost in rapture, he joined her and called her name out as he gave one last great thrust. He spilled himself into her. His hips gently continued rocking back and forth on the settee, milking the last of his orgasm as Hermione slumped bonelessly against him.

It was a short union, but it was perfect in its simplicity. So much intense emotion and consuming passion in such a fleeting moment as the hottest fire consumed most briefly, but brightly.

While holding her tenderly, he felt her chest rise and fall rapidly, and heard a great shuddering gasp. She was crying, but these were the tears he was happy to see come from her, the only tears he looked forward to. Hermione lifted her tear-streaked face from his shoulder and smiled at him with uncontainable elation.

No matter how many times she had cried from joy because of him, it humbled him. Wiping away a few tracks of tears from her cheek with a thumb, he said with great reverence, "You are my everything."

This only made Hermione cry more and laugh as she stroked the sweaty tendrils of hair away from his face before she lovingly kissed his brow.

"As are you, mi corazón," she sighed dreamily as her hands stroked his face before resting back against his chest.

Severus wrapped his arms around her once more protectively and stroked her back with a loving touch.

After removing themselves from the settee and fixing the broken strand of pearls with a swish of Severus' wand, Hermione spelled their clothes to hang in the closet to be packed away in the morning. Then they quickly settled into bed.

As they both drifted off with dreams of a future together, the two ghosts were off in the kitchen having a celebratory glass of champagne. Well, it was not real champagne, but merely a spectral manifestation in the shape of a champagne flute they each held in their hands.

'To Hermione and Severus! May they finally get on with their lives together in peace,' the vision of Albus said as he clinked glasses with Hagrid.

As Hagrid began to sip his own glass, he slowly morphed into a vision of Minerva. 'And about time, too!'

Albus' form began changing into Remus, faltering a bit before reasserting its form to resemble Albus once more, but with short hair as the werewolf once sported. His form was vacillating between the two since both Hermione and Severus were in the next room influencing his final shape as their minds began slipping towards dream states.

'It is a pity we could not have been of help during that whole incident,' Albus lamented with regret.

'Yes, but neither of us could latch on to any person in Padma's mind who could have swayed her from her course of action. Her mind was an absolute mess. What a jumble of madness, poor dear.'

Albus shook his head with regret. 'It would have been easier if the new tenants on the third floor were home at the time. We could have alerted them, and they might have been able to get help faster.'

'Ah, but Padma had planned for such an instance and had all those mirrors she planted all over the Ministry, so she might have mistaken it that Severus tipped them off and then Hermione might have been killed,' Minerva reminded him as she stroked the great black beard that spouted from her face as she morphed back into Hagrid.

'Well, it will be interesting to see if our next tenants will be as entertaining as these two have been.' Remus said with a twinkle in his eye, as he looked over his half-moon spectacles. 'The ones downstairs are as boring as plain porridge.' he complained sullenly.

'Hey, you forget that Draco and Ginny were quite an interesting pair as well. From what I can read of Severus' mind, Draco never told him about his own so-called mental manifestations of his dear Aunt Andromeda. Draco was so torn up when his Aunt Bellatrix killed her during the war. He felt guilty he could not publicly mourn Andromeda and had to pretend to revel in her death. Fortunately, that was an easy memory to pick from his brain. But you, you got to play Albus for both Severus and Draco.'

Albus/Remus nodded, noting it was easy to pretend to be one person for two people, both of them having very similar impressions of the Headmaster. 'Do you think they'll ever figure out that we're linked to those charmed bed curtains?'

'You'd think after they tried remodeling the third floor flat and the bed curtains kept popping back up they would have figured out something was amiss,' Minerva/Hagrid snorted.

'Well, Lavender did say she would wait to remodel this flat after Hermione left, so they might start getting a clue finally. That and that we're tied to each other and can't be separated, dear sister.'

Minerva/Hagrid rolled her beetle black eyes, noting with some gratitude, 'At least we didn't wind up in a Muggle's house where they would try to exorcise us, dear brother. That would be a bother to be stuck in limbo, that is if they even knew what they were doing in the first place.'

Jackson and Jillian, the ghosts of the once great Leto twins, seers and diviners extraordinaire, both raised their amorphous glasses and toasted once more.

Little did they realize when they created cloth to read auras and minds – when they imbued moonstone and their own blood into a richly woven silk and woolen tapestry – that it would bind their souls to the threads for eternity. But they figured that life in such an eternal state provided great amusement over the couple centuries, versus being stuck in an afterlife with other dead people. The living were far more entertaining with their daily triumphs and tribulations, with all the highs and lows. It seemed that Severus and Hermione were not the only ones who had inadvertently discovered some form of powerful and unknown magic resulting in unforeseen consequences.

The ghosts of the Leto twins just hoped the next flat occupants weren't going to be as hard to read as Hermione was. It had taken almost three months before being able to figure out who they should impersonate after filtering through the memories in her head as she slept.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: And now you know that they weren't manifestation of their minds, but indeed ghosts who could change shape and impersonate others. Still, the Leto twins are very special ghosts.
Thank you to my wonderful betas, JuneW and thegrey ladies. My betas really do a phenomenal job of improving the writing and flow of my story, so please do give much thanks to my betas too, when reviewing.

And you can view the fan art of Hermione and Severus descending the stairs, by dokinana (http://dokinana.deviantart.com/), commissioned by me, here: http://atdlheabetz.tumblr.com/post/157281150665/hermione-severus-at-the-malfoy-party-by
"It's a New Dawn, It's a New Day, It's a New Life"

Chapter Summary

Hermione finally leaves England and seeks sanctuary in Malu Palekaiko.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter One Hundred Fifteen
"It's a New Dawn, It's a New Day, It's a New Life"

Disclaimer: In Japanese haiku:
Rowling owns Potter
No copyright infringement
None of this is mine

Hermione could hardly eat her toast. She was equally nervous and excited she would be leaving with Severus that morning.

Severus read through the Sunday edition of the Daily Prophet periodically huffing with exasperation. The paper was filled with not only the usual whitewashed pablum about the Ministry goings-on, but was also chock full of coverage about the party at Malfoy Manor the night before.

The headline "MUGGLES MINGLE AT MALFOY MANOR MIXER" led right into a story that questioned whether the non-magical guests at the fête were aware of the notorious rumors of possible Muggle torture that may have occurred at the house during the first and second wizarding wars.

Once again, it was a piece of pulp meant to enrage the public and titillate their short attention spans until the next falsely-manufactured scandal came along, even if a few Muggles were actually tortured there during both wars.

The fashion pages featured, among many photos, a candid shot of Hermione and Severus. descending the staircase at the beginning of the evening, with compliments to Madam Mandel regarding Severus' dashing set of robes. There was also a photo exposé comparing Muggle and wizarding formal wear. Photos of Hermione's parents and aunt and uncle in their finest outfits, the men in black-tie tuxedos and the women in long formal Muggle evening gowns, were compared by fashion mavens to the more traditional evening wear that involved hoop-skirts and bustles. In the end, Ginny Malfoy's silver bias-cut dress was heralded the fashion winner of the evening, with a hint that maybe it was time for the wizarding world to begin moving away from Victorian underpinnings toward something more contemporary and chic, like hobble skirts and flapper dresses. Draco's double-breasted cashmere and silk robes in dark gray, with lapels set in a slightly lighter gray silk velvet, won him the designation of best-dressed wizard at the event.

Severus put the paper down when Hermione made a slightly distressed noise to herself. "Everything all right?"

"Yes, I received an owl from James Hoover, my therapist. He says that he is willing to continue seeing me long distance through the mirrors, especially in light of what recently happened, but that it may be a couple weeks before he can find an evening slot where he can make it to Lavender's offices." She sighed and put the last of her posts away before trying to finish the last of her toast, knowing if she didn't eat something Severus would be cross at her again for not eating.

Hermione hoped Lavender would take her advice and bring Devlin in for sessions with James, given the child had grown up in an unloving household where his aunt convinced him he was not worthy of love and that he was the son of a monster. Harry had also grown up in a very difficult house devoid of any love for him and was treated as a "freak"; she knew how that had caused him long-term mental and emotional scars. Hermione just hoped that Lavender and Ron could help reverse some of the damage done so Devlin could grow up to be a happy and well-adjusted wizard some day.

While they finished breakfast, Marf was busy packing up the bathroom and Hermione's clothes.

As they came out to inspect Marf's progress, Hermione found the top drawer of her dresser left opened. While all her lingerie had been packed, she could still see one item left behind that wasn't packed yet from that particular drawer.

Reaching in, she pulled out the box, waving her wand to end the spell that hid it from all except her and evidently Marf, since he'd packed it in her trunk during her December trip to Malu Palekaiko.

"What's that?" Severus asked, suddenly noticing the plain lidded box that suddenly appeared in her hands he didn't notice before.
Hermione bid him to come over to the settee to join her. With great interest he watched as she pulled off the box lid and peered inside.

"This is what I call my 'escape box,'" she informed him. "Before my parents left for the States to hide during the war, they wanted to make sure that in case the war didn't go as we hoped that I had a means to slip away and maybe rejoin them abroad if necessary."

Severus sat in silence, not missing the significance that Dumbledore had the same thought cross his mind during his last days alive, when he'd urged him to escape to Malu Palekaiko if the Dark Lord won.

"They made me promise not to tell Harry or even Ron. And to this day the boys have no idea about this. You're the first and only person I've told," she said in a voice barely above a whisper, noting the irony of it all. "Driver's license, credit card, passport, cash card, even some Muggle money should I have to suddenly leave and disappear. It was because of this, as well as Dumbledore's fear the Death Eaters might regroup abroad again, that I came up with a nearly foolproof way to prevent any Death Eaters from leaving after the war." Looking up at Severus, she added with a half smile, "Strange that though I came up with those measures I was the one who helped you and Draco escape, foiling my own carefully designed plan."

He felt deeply honored that she would share this great secret with him.

Hermione lifted out each piece to place in Severus' hand for his inspection. They both smiled when she removed the length of black silk from that night Hermione was blindfolded, while she only knew him as Calleo, and he'd begged her for more than she could give at the time.

"And now, despite having an escape box in case of the worst, I still need to leave England to stay safe even after we won the war," she noted with melancholy.

Severus looked at the photo of an eighteen-year-old Hermione on her passport and driver's license, noticing it was going to expire in a couple of years. All of the documents listed her last name as Granger.

As if reading his mind she remarked in an amused lilt, "Maybe before these expire I'll get them renewed, and maybe with a new last name."

Hermione's hint at marrying him one day and changing her last name on Muggle documents from Granger to Snape made him grin. She had not even changed her name on these items after marrying Weasley, but she was willing to do so for him.

Severus put the items back and put the lid back on. "Maybe you could even get a Hawaii state driver's license, and you could take me for another drive in a convertible. I hear the road to Hana on Maui is especially terrifying to most Muggles, because of its narrow twisting road."

Hermione laughed, thrilled that Severus seemed to be open to the idea of another drive. They might even go Muggle again and stay in Muggle accommodations in Maui for the night for the fun of it, making the bed springs creak as loudly as possible, and not even bother to charm them to be quiet next time.

It was almost time to go. Hermione put her escape box in with other sentimental items Marf packed, alongside the green frog-shaped pearl Severus gave her that she kept on her dresser top, and her San Francisco snow globe from her parents.

After one last check, everything had been packed and levitated into Hermione's trunk, including her dresser she'd had since before she married Ron. The only thing left behind was the furniture that was there when she moved in, including the settee, the low table that matched it, and four-poster canopied bed with the bed curtains that changed colors according to Hermione's moods – curtains that she rarely charmed black. Hermione also left the charmed two-way mirror behind, as Lavender would have one of the elves move it to her offices while its match was packed away after Mouna brought it from Hawaii. It was settled in her trunk with a protective cloth over it to prevent breakage during the trip, should the contents shift while Portkeying.

Marf sobbed bitterly that he was losing such a kind and wonderful mistress. When he asked if he could come with them and take care of them in Malu Palekaiko, Severus explained to the diminutive creature that in Malu Palekaiko there were only free elves, so Marf would have to be paid a comparable wage to that of a witch or wizard the house-elf suddenly decided that staying in England was a fine option and wished them the best instead. Hermione was sad that Marf and many other house-elves, though mostly free, still sought to bind themselves in some form of servitude to an employer. She was just glad Lavender was a fair and equitable employer who at least paid the elves in her employ something beyond a pittance and insisted on one day off a month mandatory.

As Hermione and Severus arrived at the Ministry via Floo, they were greeted by Harry. It seems after the night of partying, he was the only one awake and not hung-over enough to see them off, which was fine since Hermione had said most of her goodbyes last night.

Severus carried Hermione's trunk for her, levitating it with his wand behind them as they walked towards the Portkey office while Hermione carried Calleo in her cage. Mouna and his family had taken a slightly earlier Portkey and would greet them there in Hawaii when they arrived.

Just before approaching the desk for those with reservations, Hermione turned to Harry and gave him a hearty hug goodbye, which he returned with equal feeling.

"It's been a long, strange turn of events to reach this point," Hermione remarked.

Harry hummed in agreement, nodding his head. When he had asked Hermione to spy on Ginny to see if she was having an affair, neither of them could have guessed the way that events would have turned out with Harry married to someone else. Neither did they expect Harry to save Snape and Malfoy, two wizards he once loathed with a passion, from a former fellow Dumbledore’s Army member. They certainly did not expect all parties present to be happy that Hermione was going to go off and live with Snape.

"I suppose I should return this to you," Hermione said as she made to remove the Auror's pendant that still hung around her neck.

Harry shook his head. "No, keep it. When you come back to England for your certification as a Potions mistress, put it back on. Just let me know so I can wear its match before you come," he said as he lifted the other pendant briefly out from under his shirt to show he still wore his half. Looking to Snape, he added, "Two wizards looking after Hermione while she's here is better than one." It was an assurance that Harry did not doubt Snape's ability to protect Hermione when they would come back in about a year, but that a little extra help can sometimes be a good thing, just in case.

Severus agreed and shook Potter's hand. "Thank you."

Hermione waved farewell and even shed a few tears as they made their way to the desk to take a nine o'clock Portkey directly to Malu Palekaiko.

Severus held Hermione's arm to help her as they landed.

Exiting the Portkey landing area, Severus heard Halulu sigh with great relief, "Oh, thank Pele you both made it back safely!" Mounga had briefly brought Halulu up to speed on what transpired, but kept the details vague.
Mounga was waiting on the other side of the counter for the pair.

As Mounga placed a hand on Hermione's shoulder, she glanced over to Severus. "Must I do this now?" she asked, wanting nothing more than to go home and put the trauma of it all behind her.

Severus knew how she felt, but said with resignation, "Once your interview is over, you will be granted sanctuary and will be protected by the island's magic. Then we can both rest easy."

Glancing over at the clock that was just a few minutes past eight in the evening, Mounga said, "Hopefully, you'll be done by midnight, or maybe sooner, we hope."

"I'll wait for you here until you're done," Severus assured her.

Hermione gave him one last hug and fleeting kiss before removing her cloak and being willingly led off to a hallway featuring a row of doors. Severus could hardly believe that it was a mere sixteen months or so since he walked into one of those rooms. It wasn't that long ago, yet seemed like it was another lifetime.

Settling himself into a chair in which to wait alone with his thoughts, Severus wished he had at least pulled out a book to read from Hermione's library before they finished packing her trunk.

"I'm about to close up for the night. Mounga will lock up when you guys leave. Care for a cup of coffee before I turn off the pot?" Halulu asked as she cleaned up for the night.

Severus shook his head. He wasn't sleepy. He should have been, but staying up all night by Hermione's bedside that first night had reset his body clock to London time, without the help of Hermione's Portkey lag potion. He would make use of a vial tonight to set his body back to local time.

In the white room that gleamed with impersonal coldness, Hermione took the seat offered. She noticed the toilet in the corner concealed behind a low screen, no doubt to relieve herself should this take a while. She could only imagine the types of people who came seeking sanctuary – including some who might have once been dangerous indeed, that they would have to provide a toilet so the interrogator could still keep an eye on them until the interview was finished.
"Please place your wand and everything in your pockets on the table," Mounga asked politely.

Hermione did as she was asked.

Mounga removed a vial from his shirt pocket. "This is Veritaserum. Given you are a Potions apprentice, I shall assume you know what it is and does."

She nodded mutely.

Mounga continued explaining, "Now, by law, you asked for sanctuary, and I must give it to you. But part of the process of asking for sanctuary requires the administration of Veritaserum during the processing of your request for sanctuary."

"You don't have to give it to me," she freely offered. "I'll gladly tell you everything you want to know. You were there during the hearing in front of the committee."

Shaking his head, he admitted with regret, "It doesn't exactly work that way. See, we get all types. On one end of the spectrum, we see those who are truly being harassed, hunted, persecuted, oppressed, and tortured, who are the reason why a place such as this exists. All the way at the other end of the spectrum are mass murderers, sadistic psychopaths, and the worst scum who deserve to be wiped from the face of the earth, but they make it here by the skin of their teeth and luck, escaping what I would consider justice. However, because of the magic imbued into our sanctuary, all who come to seek it take Veritaserum, even if they profess innocence and even if we know they are innocent of any wrongdoing.

"If we make an exception for one from taking Veritaserum, even if we know they are worthy of the protection they are guaranteed here, then what would it take before others start demanding that it is not fair, others who might have a more questionable background. And while yes, technically, I can't force you to take it, this is the custom. But the custom is also perceived as the law though in actuality it is not law; the law should be blind, treating all equally without bias or preference. If it is any consolation, anything you say in here I am bound to never say. Should you choose to share certain aspects of your background, then it becomes public knowledge and then I may only speak of what you have revealed. I processed Severus, and though you may know him quite intimately, I cannot share things he said to me in confidence during his own interview. As such, anything you share here with me in this room I cannot tell even Severus, unless you were to break the law and things you divulged to me were relevant to said trial case, for instance: if you were a killer granted sanctuary and then attacked someone here."
Hermione had heard from Severus about his interview and Mouna's assured secrecy, but it did not ease her apprehension about taking Veritaserum.

"Does this Veritaserum make me tell you everything?" Hermione queried, knowing there were some variations to the formula and wondering if she would inadvertently tell Mouna about her and Severus' private and intimate moments.

"Only if you deem them relevant to the questions posed regarding your request for sanctuary," he assured her. "This is a slightly varied potion from the traditional Veritaserum you might be familiar with. It's a secret formula only known and brewed by those on the town council who interview those seeking sanctuary. Not even Severus knows this formula, unless he becomes a town council member some day and interviews those seeking sanctuary."

"The ones you said who come here, the more dangerous ones. Will I have to worry about someone like that here?" she asked, the threat of being attacked still looming large in her mind.

"No. Those types who come here know if they so much as set a toe out of line and harm another or blatantly break the law, they will lose sanctuary status and get kicked out. Those who we deem more potentially hostile we place in more secluded and remote parts of the island, and I visit regularly to check up on them and monitor for any possible issues. And while they are free to move about the island and mingle with the rest of the inhabitants, many usually keep to themselves, avoiding temptation. I can assure you that most seek to start over, and they have made earnest endeavors to leave their old lives and habits behind to live out the rest of their days in peace and quiet. For those, it may seem like a prison to you, but a prison of their own choosing versus what options were available had they remained to meet justice in their homeland."

Hermione drank in all that he said, remembering Severus had told her that Mouna's father treated all who came there as if they were the worst of the worst. She was glad that Mouna was running things around here now as Severus was never made to feel like a prisoner, despite his being unable to leave the protective sanctuary of the island while he was still being persecuted and hunted back in England.

"I'm ready," she said with a sense of finality, ready to take the step forward to be granted sanctuary.

With a flick of his wand, Mouna conjured a glass with water. He poured the famous elixir into the water for her to see.

Taking the glass in hand, she took a large gulp of it, feeling the tendrils of the magic loosen her tongue.
"Now, why don't you start at the beginning of everything that led up to the events that occurred that require you now to seek sanctuary," Mounga prompted her.

Of course Hermione had to start at the beginning. And to start at the beginning of it all meant she had to begin her tale with her first year at Hogwarts. With little surprise to Mounga, it began with Ronald Weasley insulting Hermione by calling her a "nightmare," which resulted in her fleeing to the girls' toilet the night Professor Quirrell had let a troll into the dungeons.

As Mounga remembered from Severus' confessions during his interview, he had told Mounga about Weasley's long-standing propensity to insult Hermione. 'Severus was right; Weasley is a big fat jerk,' Mounga mused to himself.

After the troll incident, Hermione said, she became friends with Harry and Ron, which resulted in her squarely in the category of students Severus disliked due to her association with the boy wizard who looked like a carbon copy of Severus' old nemesis. Of course, Mounga would never make mention of the fact that Hermione also reminded Severus of his dead wife, Gabrielle, as Mounga was not allowed to divulge such information. It was Severus' place to share that tidbit, if ever.

Her tale went on in which she and her friends thought Severus was after the Sorcerer's Stone and the various incidents that further put her into the doghouse with Severus, including the robe-burning incident during the Quidditch game. There was stealing from his stores to brew the Polyjuice Potion in her second year, the Shrieking Shack incident in her third year, and other happenstances, when she periodically had to stop talking to allow Mounga to guffaw with surprise or laugh heartily, having heard the tale from a different viewpoint before.

Never had Mounga had the privilege of processing two people so closely connected in their bid for sanctuary. He was acutely made aware that though both were speaking the truth during their interviews, the truth was somewhat subjective from their own points of view. And while their stories did not contradict one another, he did notice the differences, which made his appreciation for listening to two sides of a story in the courtroom more amusing with this elucidating experience.

It was as Hermione told about her fifth year at Hogwarts that more threads of the story began to unfurl, with the addition of Dolores Umbridge to Hermione's confession. From there Severus and Hermione's paths began to diverge during the war, except for where they briefly worked towards the same goal of defeating Voldemort. Progressing along her narrative, the war eventually ended. This resulted in Hermione telling Mounga about her marriage, including Severus yelling at her the night before her wedding, her low-level job at the Ministry, and her inability to secure an apprenticeship.
From here the story became more convoluted with the additional discovery of Ginny's infidelity with Draco, and Hermione's meetings with Severus, when she knew him only as Calleo and how she reluctantly fell in love with him. Hermione skipped over her time together with Severus, keeping only to the relevant details of stealing the Polyjuice ingredients and his invitation to join him to flee, including her meeting with the old fortuneteller.

She shamefully confessed her brief flirtation with Alan Parker at the Three Broomsticks, unaware he had set his sights on her in order to seek his revenge on behalf of his godmother, and their subsequent encounter the night of her anniversary. She even admitted, much later in the confession as it was chronologically relevant, as to why she'd slept with Neville, which then led to the disastrous floral mix-up being misconstrued for something other than what it was.

Upon reaching the part where Severus fled for sanctuary himself, it entered territory Mounga was not familiar with and he listened with rapt attention. When Hermione told Mounga about her and Severus' potions experimentation, which came to bear when she was attacked and Severus' bout with the ice pox; she explained how she and Severus met in an alternate plane. For some reason, this was a source of great relief to Mounga, since he had been perplexed as to the reason why Severus was passed out for those two days during the Pele Festival.

Mounga assured Hermione that he would not share that information about their inadvertent binding, not even with Rainbow, who was still confounded to that day as to the cause of her patient's prolonged and unexplained sleep.

On Hermione's tale went, periodically stopping to drink more Veritaserum as needed. As she told of her tale of nearly wandering into the Valley of Death, she could not help by cry, moved by the fact that Mounga was crying, having himself been involved with the surrounding events. Her interview ended when she gave a brief recap of her petition before the council to change Potions masters, since Mounga had been there himself to witness the hearing.

Sitting back in his chair, Mounga exhaled a huge breath. "Dude. I'm totally floored. What a tale. And I thought Draco and Ginny's story could hardly be topped, but man..." He shook his head, his mouth drawn down in deep contemplation of all that he had heard.

"What else do we have to do before I'm granted sanctuary?" Hermione asked, feeling emotionally spent.

Hermione frowned, as it seemed a bit anticlimactic. It wasn't that she expected a shower of silver and gold sparks to sudden baptize her or anything in some magical absolution and blessing, but it seemed that all she had to do was spill her guts and that was it.

"I was wondering, do we have to tell everyone on the island I was granted sanctuary?" Hermione asked, unsure what the answer would be.

"You want to keep it a secret?" Mounga asked, wondering why she looked a bit ashamed.

"Well, it's just that..." How could Hermione phrase this without making it come out wrong. "Must I carry around a welcome packet as a badge that I'm one of the good guys, like a seal of approval? I mean, people were already expecting me to move here anyway to open up operations. Can we just say that due to circumstances we moved up my move date and got a work-around with the council – which is the truth." Hermione hated to admit it, but she didn't want there to be a question as to her reasons for seeking sanctuary. For if people thought it was for criminal activity, she felt it might reduce everyone's esteem of her, and if it was for protection from persecution or harm, then there would be the curious questions and stares of who she was trying to run from. She just wanted to be accepted as someone who moved there of their own volition, not under duress.

"Yeah," Mounga said. "That is if Halulu and my wife haven't told half the town already," he said with a guilty chagrin, wishing he had said something earlier to the two witches to assure some confidentiality.

"Well, if the kneazle is out of the bag, I'll just deal with it then, but I would prefer to just go on without it being publicized so freely." Hermione sighed, hoping she would not have people approach her to drag up the past.

"Well, here, people tend to let others alone regarding their lives before coming here, unless the person wants to share. Just be aware my wife loves to pry, but I've seen you handle her, so no worries," he said with a half-laugh.

Severus kept himself busy by mentally going through all the students he could shuffle off to Hermione to make up the four days he had been gone during scheduled tutoring sessions. Then there were the commissions that he'd had to scrap. Fortunately for a few of the ones that required long-term brewing, he had spare batches already brewed and bottled just in case. Just as he was he was starting to go through his inventories at the shop, he heard the door down the hallway creak open.
Hermione practically ran and threw herself into Severus' arms just as he got to his feet. He spun her about and planted a kiss firmly upon her lips. But it was brief, suddenly remembering that Mounga was there and chuckling aloud to himself watching the two reunited.

"It's done," Mounga announced. "She's safe here now."

Severus could not keep an ecstatic smile from spreading across his face. Were he any other person, his eyes might have twinkled even.

Hermione reveled in seeing him so happy, on par with the day she suddenly showed up on his doorstep on Christmas Eve. However, this time it was no brief visit; she was going to stay there with him for the rest of their lives.

Walking up the main street of town, arm in arm, Hermione holding Calleo's cage while Severus took care of her trunk, they heard the music spilling out of Bongo's.

It was almost midnight, and the place was packed.

Severus was glad he went to the bar on Friday nights as those nights tended to draw a slightly older and less rambunctious crowd than the one that populated that bar on Saturday nights – the ones who were presently imbibing unwisely beyond their limit. Many of the young unmarried witches and wizards in the bar were those close to Hermione's age or younger. Many of them were apprentices who sought to blow off steam from a long week working for their masters and mistresses while hoping to find someone attractive of the opposite sex equally interested enough to attempt a brief tryst that night.

Jerry's voice could be heard as he played on the piano, the volume up much louder than during Severus' Friday night visits, when he was surrounded by others who were a bit older seeking a drink after a long week at work before going home to family.

As they passed by the bar, they could clearly hear Jerry singing an older Muggle standard from the 60's that had been rerecorded and recently playing on the local Wizarding Wireless Network.

"... Oh freedom is mine
And I know how I feel
It's a new dawn
It's a new day"
It's a new life

It's a new dawn
It's a new day
It's a new life

It's a new dawn
It's a new day
It's a new life
It's a new life
For me

And I'm feeling good...

Hermione was sure this was yet another case of "radio syndrome," but with Jerry instead of a box belting out a tune that reflected the mood. It was a new day where Hermione and Severus were both free to begin their new life together. They were indeed both feeling good. She leaned her head sideways on Severus' shoulder as they continued their walk home.

"Do we really have to make the trek all the way to the top of the volcano tomorrow? Can it wait until next weekend when we've had a chance to rest?" she whined, seeing the tall mountain looming above the small town.

Recalling the urgency that was imparted to him when he first arrived, he recalled similar words. "You must make a trip to the edge of the caldera and make an offering to Pele in thanks for providing you with sanctuary within the first week, preferably the sooner the better. To not do so would be a great offense and bring bad luck."

"Bad luck?" Hermione scoffed questioningly.

Severus decided that when he, Hermione, and Mouna made the trip up tomorrow, he would share his experiences of seeing Pele in person himself. He would impress upon her the seriousness of the fact it was Pele's magic that was going to keep Hermione safe from future harm, and their need to respect that powerful magic with appropriate reverence.

Up on the porch, Severus set her trunk down with his wand as he fished in his pocket for his keys that Mouna gave back to him at St. Mungo's, while Hermione set Calleo's cage down. After unlocking the door, he pushed it open. Before Hermione could pick up the cage again and walk through, Severus scooped her up into his arms. She squeaked with surprise from the sudden act. Her heart raced at the symbolism of Severus' gesture to carry her across the threshold.

They may not have gone through the ceremony or had the piece of paper to make it official, but to Severus it made little difference. To him, he was finally bringing Hermione into their home at last, and they would no longer be parted.

Hermione suddenly felt a bit shy, like a new bride, and was overcome at this heartwarming gesture of great sentimental significance.

He was reluctant to put her down, and to his relief, Hermione pulled out her wand and cast a Summoning Charm to bring her trunk and Calleo's cage inside, followed by a flick of her wand to close the door.

Hermione stroked his cheek in awe at the sight of Severus unable to stop smiling.

"How about we get out of these warm woolen clothes into something a bit more appropriate for this climate," Severus suggested with an arch of his brow that implied so much more.

"And change into what?" Hermione played along with their banter.

"Cool cotton sheets and nothing else," he proposed with a lustful glance that made Hermione gasp with mock drama and throw her head back in surrender to Severus' libidinous intentions.

"Carry me off to your jungle love lair to ravish me, my dark angel lover," she sighed coquettishly, trying not to laugh, but failed as Severus began to chuckle himself.

Severus did not have to be told twice, but he was hoping to make her beg sweetly this time.

Calleo was glad, that after much vociferous squawking and unseemly baying that went on in the room upstairs that seemed to last for hours, her owner finally came back and let her out of her cage. The female human set her up with a few owl treats before going back and continuing on with the incessant whooping and caterwauling that went on far too long until nearly dawn.
Chapter End Notes

A/N: Stay tuned, two more chapters and then the epilogue.

And let’s give a round of applause to my lovely betas for this chapter, JuneW and Hope.

Yes, I have driven the road to Hana on Maui. It is rather narrow and twisting, but no less stressful and frightening if you grew up driving narrow twisting canyons like I did around Los Angeles: Tujunga, Mulholland, Coldwater, Topanga, Laurel, and some parts of the Pacific Coast Highway. However, if you live in a state that is mostly flat with lots of straight roads, I can see how it can be rather fearsome and daunting, based on some of the souvenir T-shirts they sell locally saying "I Survived the Road To Hana" or "Road to Hana Survivor" and showing a harried driver narrowly missing driving off a hairpin turn and driving off a cliff.

"Feeling Good": song written by Anthony Newley and Leslie Bricusse. This particular version lyric arrangement performed by Michael Buble. And yes, Buble's version was released in April 2005, same time as the end of this chapter.

And for a bonus, what sort of author would I be to keep talking about Severus' mango chutney and not provide you the recipe. So here it is:

Severus' Mango Chutney
Makes 6+* pints

Ingredients broken down into WET and DRY:

DRY:

5 cups White Sugar
1 3/4 cups Dark Brown Sugar
12 oz Candied Crystallized Ginger: snipped* into approx. 1/2” pieces
1 TBL Mustard Seeds: yellow or brown
1 1/2 tsp Salt
2 cups Raisins: white or golden
1 cup Black Seedless Raisins: e.g. Muscats
1 cup Dates: snipped* into 1/2” pieces

WET:

6 cups Apple Cider Vinegar
8 Large Mangoes: firm but barely ripe, not mushy
6 Large Garlic Cloves: finely minced
1 Small Onion: minced, red, white or yellow
1/4 cup Lemon Juice

Instructions:

1. Peel the mangoes and dice the fruit into 3/4” sized pieces.
2. Prepare 6-7 pint canning jars, lids and rings in a hot-water bath per manufacturer's instructions. Keep them simmering in hot water on a back burner ready for canning.
3. Put everything together in a large non-reactive (e.g. Stainless Steel) pot and bring to a simmer while stirring.
4. Cook, while stirring, until the mangoes are softened, about 8 to 10 minutes.
5. Remove all solids to a bowl and reserve. A Wok "spider" is an excellent tool for this. Don't worry about the small pieces that slip through the mesh of the "spider".
6. While stirring, boil the liquid down to slightly less than half of the original height. To measure the height, stick a clean kitchen knife straight down into the liquid until it touches the bottom of the pot. Carefully remove the knife straight up and measure the height of the liquid clinging to the knife. You must do this when the pot is NOT boiling and the surface is not bubbling. Clean the knife off and repeat as necessary to insure that slightly more than half the original liquid has been evaporated.
7. Return all the solids to the pot, bring back to a boil, while stirring, and can into pint-glass containers using good hygienic canning practices.

Notes:

A. Makes a little over 6 pints. Refrigerate after opening.
B. Make one-quarter of a recipe and you'll have a good size batch that you won't have to can.
C. Very long shelf life in the Fridge. I've kept some for 6 months and it was still good. High sugar and vinegar content probably makes the keeping ability at least as good as ketchup.
D. And in reference to the Ginger and Dates being "snipped," I am referring to the use of kitchen shears, but a good sharp knife will do as well.
Vivieron Felices Y Comieron Codero Y Salmón" (And They Lived Happily Ever After, and Ate Lamb and Salmon)

Chapter Summary

Come join Hermione and Severus at their wedding. Please specify if you will have the lamb or salmon at the reception.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter One Hundred Sixteen

"Vivieron Felices Y Comieron Codero Y Salmón" (And They Lived Happily Ever After, and Ate Lamb and Salmon)

Disclaimer:
We gather here today to read this fanfic of two characters who are finally going to be joined in the bonds of holy matrimony, which is an honorable plot. Into this, I must disclose that Harry Potter belongs to J.K. Rowling and no monetary compensation is received by me, nor is any copyright infringement intended. If anyone reading this fanfic can show just and legal cause why I shouldn't post this, let them review now or forever shut their gob.

============

September 3, 2006

As Severus stepped out of the shower, he noticed Hermione was standing in front of the bathroom sink while studying the vial in her hand, lost in contemplation. He went over to her, covered the vial and her hand with his own hand, and softly reminded her, "You don't have to make a decision today. We can discuss this after we come back."

Hermione looked at the edge of the vial that wasn't covered by their hands, studying the henna design refracted on her palm through the pale elixir and glass tube. She was about to reply, but was cut short when the doorbell chimed.

"That must be Mario. Can you let him in, dear?" Hermione asked, as she went back to brushing out her freshly washed hair, a towel wrapped around her torso.
"And after I let him in, maybe I could put up a Silencing Charm," he said in a sultry voice as he began to undo her towel and cast her a seductive glance in the mirror, but was met with a slight slap on his hand and a faux stern glare from her.

Turning around and brandishing her hairbrush in a threatening manner, she admonished him in her best imitation of a New York Brooklyn accent, "Y'know, you got them bad eyes, like a gypsy!" It was a favorite line of hers to quote from that romantic film they watched together last year during the summer Friday night movie festival.

"The better to seduce you with, my dear," he purred before briefly attacking her neck with his mouth. He was pleased when she squeaked with delight instead of thwacking him with her brush, but he stopped when the door chimed once more.

"All right, all right!" Severus barked as he rushed to throw on some shorts and a shirt.

Hermione could hear Mario talking away excitedly with his Italian accent and the tromping feet of several other people filing in to take over their kitchen that day.

Just as Hermione tied off her dark blue silk dressing gown there was a gentle rapping upon the bedroom door.

"Hermione? Are you ready?" a voice called out hesitantly.

"Yes, perfect timing," she invited the hairdresser in.

Fortunately for Hermione and Severus, they had taken Draco's original suggestion to keep things very simple.

While Hermione was getting her hair and make-up done, Severus let the florist in to drop off the flowers before going to get dressed himself in one of the guest bedrooms. He wanted the joyous surprise of seeing his bride all dressed up only when he would meet her at the bottom of the stairs and escort her.

Akela and Kaimi were so excited about the wedding, they were more than happy to fulfill the function of hostesses and part-time wedding coordinators before the day. They greet guests, the few who were coming; and they place presents in a pile. The guests had been told that since the couple was combining two households there was nothing they required, but that didn't stop people from bringing something for the bridal couple to unwrap. At the right time, the Finau girls would then direct guests to the backyard where the ceremony was to take place.

When Hermione was granted sanctuary over a year ago, Severus began the long process of getting the backyard ready for their eventual wedding. There was now a large multi-tiered deck on the back hill with an impressive pergola covered with vines of Jasminum tortuosum that he'd trained to climb over the structure. While the bush Jasminum sambac produced extremely fragrant flowers used in pikake leis, this particular vining jasmine produced a much lighter citrus-like scent that pleased Hermione. It was not cloying, like Jasmine polyanthum, the heavily perfumed variety grown in the Grand Royal Supper Club's garden.

In addition to the pergola, there was a large area he and Hermione had designed and built as a "toddler pen." They expected many toddlers to be coming – Draco and Ginny's triplets, for starters – so this area would keep them entertained and essentially penned off, since the children would no doubt find the solemnity of a wedding ceremony boring and tedious. The grassy area featured a slide, a rocking hippogriff and rocking owl, and other toddler-sized play equipment. They knew it would keep the children happy and busy, having the play area thoroughly tested over many weekends by their godchildren and children of friends who came over to visit periodically. There would also be a small contingent of elves to help wrangle the children and help with potty visits and diaper changes during the wedding and reception, so the parents could relax. The bridal couple had even set up one of the guest bedrooms to function as a nap area for when the little ones tuckered themselves out.

It didn't take Severus very long to get ready, so he mingled and greeted people as they arrived, keeping his jacket off until it was time.

The Finaus were the first to arrive, with Tristan who got a special furlough from his master in order to attend the wedding that weekend with his girlfriend, followed by Halulu and Greg with their twin toddler girls in tow. Hermione's parents, along with Aunt Christine, Uncle Tim and Auberon came over; the Grangers offered to help with anything, but there was little to do since it was all kept simple in order to save Hermione's sanity, and thereby Severus' as well. Bill Weasley, the twins and their entire families eventually arrived too; the Weasley wives were eternally grateful there was a play area they could let their brood run loose and work off that boundless energy that wore their parents down, and it was barely one o'clock. Albert arrived with gifts in hand – a gift for the bridal couple, and a couple bottles of very fine Spanish Madeira to share with the bridegroom, and any other guests who chose to have a bracer, before the ceremony.

While Severus was not nervous exactly, nor did he consider finally marrying Hermione unpleasant at all, he did have a glass to steady his steadily building nerves.
Gary and his wife Iolana finally made it, arriving at the same time as Fastrada Johnson, now a Potions mistress herself. Jerry and Pat, Severus' office manager, followed shortly after. Severus barely closed the front door before seeing more people down at the gate by the roadside approaching. As Severus directed Mario to where he could place the wedding cake to keep it safe from curious and grubby toddler fingers, Ranjit and Arnold showed up, the Japanese Potions master and Severus having long buried the hatchet thanks to some careful scheming by the Indian Potions master, Pat, and Hermione.

There were only three more families who needed to show up before the ceremony could begin. When Severus was tempted to have Akela go fetch the friends who were now officially late, Harry and his family arrived all looking a bit exhausted; they offered a quick apology for their tardiness due to a last-minute temper tantrum. No sooner had the phrase "temper tantrum" been uttered than Severus heard Josephine squeal in protest all the way down from the road where Ron Weasley and his family trudged up the hill.

"But Josephine, all your cousins will be there, and I know how much you like your cousins," Severus could hear Lavender trying to reason with her daughter who squirmed and fought in her father's arms, seeking to be let down and run in the opposite direction from the house.

"No, I wanna go swimming again!" she squalled.

"We can go swimming after the wedding. Besides, Auntie Hermione promised chocolate cake for all the good little girls and boys who behaved," Lavender added. Hermione didn't exactly promise such a thing, but the bride did insist on chocolate cake for their wedding, which Lavender used to bribe her daughter into behaving.

This seemed to quell the obstinate toddler's demand to do as she wanted into doing what she was told.

As they opened the garden gate, Severus saw Ron roll his eyes in exasperation, his fussing daughter in one arm and Devlin holding his adoptive father's hand quietly. Lavender brought up the rear, looking well put together as always, but slightly worn down by the toddler's recent outburst.

Severus could do nothing but give a smirk. He found some perverse justice that Ronald Weasley, who gave him trouble for seven years in his classroom, would have a solid ten years of dealing with his rather willful daughter, plus her summers home from Hogwarts.

As they reached the porch, Devlin struck out his hand with awkward politeness, "It's nice to finally meet you, Mr. Snape. Congratulations."
Severus shook the young wizard's hand, pleased his adoptive mother was imparting good manners in the boy, who seemed to be thriving in a house full of love. "Thank you, Mr. Patil. It is a pleasure to meet you as well." While he did recognize Macnair's eyes in the boy, Devlin did not seem to possess any of the cold cruelty of his biological father.

Devlin went into the house. He was followed quickly by Josephine who squirmed out of her father's grasp and bolted towards the backyard, where she heard her cousins and other children playing.

"Albert has Madeira," Severus announced quietly, knowing the offer would be much appreciated.

"Thanks, Snape, I definitely need some," Ron exhaled with relief that he would get a temporary break from the terrible twos.

"I'll need one as well," Lavender added as she closed her eyes and took a deep breath, bracing herself for the afternoon to come, praying Josephine would be cooperative for once.

"In the library," Severus directed them with a wave of his hand.

Draco and Ginny decided to Floo directly from home instead of making the walk up the hill, as they were already running late. There was a roll of the eyes indicating that temper tantrums were par for the course today to get children out of the house, but the triplets' moods brightened immediately now that they were over at Uncle Severus and Aunt Hermione's home and could play in the special garden they had built. They shrieked with ear-shattering delight when they saw all the other kids there playing already; they joined them immediately, running up the stairs and expertly opening the gate to get inside and join the fun.

Severus went into the library to enjoy a brief bit of peace and quiet; he had placed an age line and a Silencing Charm on the room so that parents could find a place of momentary refuge from the noise. Upon entering the library, he saw it was rather packed, all by parents seeking a moment free from the joyous screams and sounds of their toddler children. The exception was Albert, who was happily playing bartender, handing out glass after glass of cherished and nerve-soothing Madeira.

"Thank you for building that play area and having elves to help today," Draco said with deep gratitude.
There was a great murmur of agreement from the rest of the parents, all thankful that Hermione and Severus had the foresight to plan for things accordingly so their wedding guests could take a break.

"To the bride and groom! With much appreciation of your planning ahead of time from everyone here with children," Bill toasted.

"Hear! Hear!" the group chorused and drank in honor of the bridal couple. Aunt Christine and Zhubanysh raised their glasses of iced ginger and lemon tea while everyone else was imbibing with something stronger and alcoholic.

Now that everyone had arrived and caught their breath, Severus asked Akela and Kaimi to start directing everyone – well, the adults and older children – to their seats. The younger children were left to play in the special garden just for them.

Severus buttoned the bespoke cream and pale gold Sherwani jacket that had a subtle paisley pattern woven into the silk and linen fabric. He had cream-colored European-style tailored trousers to go with the jacket instead of the more traditional churdar trousers. All things considered, his outfit was very similar to his traditional long black frock coat he was renowned for by those who knew him during his Hogwarts years, except with a more distinct Indian flare. The outfit was Hermione's idea; she'd confessed her first daydream of marrying Severus was in India, upon seeing an Indian groom astride a yali while looking regal and handsome. She had easily envisioned Severus in a similar outfit.

Mounga laid a hand on his friend's shoulder. "You ready, dude?"

"For a while," Severus said a bit over dramatically, making light of the fact he had been very patient waiting for Hermione to finish her apprenticeship. Then he'd been patient waiting for all the guests to make arrangements for the trip all the way out from England, especially Hermione's side of the family who traveled via Muggle air travel.

Hermione had only just finished her apprenticeship three months prior, but they both had to make arrangements regarding their schedules to find a time where they could both take a few weeks off for a proper honeymoon. They timed the wedding to be during the week of Labor Day, since many students took that week off from school. This reduced Severus' need to be around for tutoring and would ensure they would be back in time for Oktoberfest, since Hermione had to perform with the beginner adult women's belly dancing group at the Sausage, Suds, Shimmy & Sounds Festival.

During Hermione's remaining apprenticeship time, she had trained Draco on all aspects of running the company. By the time she did finish and became a fully accredited Potions mistress, fourteen months after arriving in Malu Palekaiko as a permanent resident, he was fully up to speed on all aspects of the company, including supervision of manufacturing. Hermione added the joke that she swore she was going to marry Severus before her twenty-seventh birthday, by hook or by crook. Given that her birthday was only sixteen days away, they were just making it under the wire.

Draco and Mounga waited with Severus in the foyer near the bottom stairs. Severus felt his heart beat loudly in his chest when he heard the clatter of heels on the wooden staircases as the matron of honor and bride descended.

Hermione thanked her hairdresser for doing a fantastic job on her hair and make-up. Severus had always said he loved it when Hermione piled the hair up atop her head to let it cascade down the back of her head like a goddess on a Grecian urn. She tipped her stylist extra, having prepaid her, for taming her wild hair while not over-styling it. Her stylist added the spray of flowers – miniature red dendrobium orchids with yellow throats – to the left side of the bride's coiffure at the last moment, to match the larger ones in her bouquet.

Ginny helped Hermione fasten the necklace Severus insisted on buying Hermione when they went to Varanasi to go shopping for wedding clothes. It was twenty-two karat gold featuring red rubies and golden-colored sapphires, to match her red-and-gold wedding sari, chosen based on Indian wedding tradition, not her House colors. While it was a bit heavier in design than the sapphire necklace Severus had given her for Christmas, it perfectly fit the design and ornateness of her richly embroidered sari, though not as heavy or ostentatious as the one she wore during The Lovely Lavender Company's launch in India nearly two years ago.

She was glad she paid extra to have the sari charmed to wrap itself around her, ensuring perfect pleats and flawless placement of creases.

"Severus is going to be utterly stunned," Ginny sighed dreamily as she helped, looking over Hermione one last time to make sure there was not any lint that might have been caught in some of the beads that lightly fringed the edge of her pallu. "Nervous?"

"Absolutely not. Not a hint of cold feet," Hermione assured her friend that for this marriage she was certainly ready and looking forward to it. She slipped on her sandals and was now finally ready.

"Good, that's how I felt too when Draco and I were finally getting married," Ginny said with empathy, both witches silently remembering their nerves and reluctance regarding their first weddings.
Ginny handed Hermione her bouquet of red anthuriums and yellow-throated red dendrobiums before grabbing her own smaller bouquet of pale pink orchids and petite red anthuriums.

Walking down the stairs, Hermione could feel her heart racing. She was excited to be getting married, and the best part was that she had not put herself into a state of exhaustion. Now she and Severus could both enjoy this day.

As Hermione stepped into view, Severus felt his breath catch in his chest. He stared at her in awe as a euphoric smile spread across his face. And when Hermione momentarily cast her eyes down demurely to Severus' obvious reaction, she glanced up at him a bit coyly through her lashes, and he could have sworn she was blushing just the slightest bit. She was a vision in red and gold, and the complex henna design on her hands, wrists, and feet added a delicateness to her loveliness. A few days prior, she had spent several hours to have her henna tattoos done traditionally, incorporating each of their names subtly into the design in Sanskrit, even though she could have just used one of the easy roll-on kits she’d developed a few years ago.

Finding his voice, he bowed before her deeply. With adoration, he professed, "Madam, just when I think you can look no lovelier, I am gladly proven wrong once more. You are radiance personified."

Hermione could actually feel her cheeks bloom with heat; she hoped that in addition to the rouge she was wearing, it would not appear as if too much make-up was applied. And she certainly prayed Lavender's latest version of tear-proof mascara would hold true, for she could feel the tears swelling behind her eyes, but rapidly blinked them away.

She wanted to say how handsome and regal Severus looked in his outfit, and that he even looked better than in her daydream nearly two years ago of him, but figured that was something she could share with him later. Now it was time to get married. Besides, she was too choked up to say much of anything with any eloquence, as the moment demanded.

Leis were exchanged in the foyer, with Severus presenting a carnation and orchid lei to Mounga, their officiant. Severus presented Draco with a white ginger and green orchid lei to go with the cream and pale green Hawaiian shirt he wore and cream linen trousers. Hermione gifted Ginny with a pink orchid and white plumeria lei to go with her coral pink and white formal muumuu.

Hermione held her arms up above her heart, presenting Severus with a traditional lei of maile, symbolizing strength and growing together, accented with small red roses in full bloom. Her hands shook slightly as he took the lei presented to him, both recognizing the symbolism behind this gesture, since it was also a custom to exchange garlands in a Hindu wedding during the Jaimala portion of the ceremony as well. According to Hindu custom, her garland signified that she accepts the groom's proposal and accepts him as a husband. Severus gifted Hermione with lei made of five strands of pikake flowers, the number of strands symbolic as a testament of love according to Hawaiian lore. Ginny and Severus helped Hermione place the twisted multiple-strand lei over her head so as not to disturb her artfully-arranged cascade of curls.

Normally the exchange of leis would have happened before the guests who were seated out on the back deck, but Hermione and Severus wanted to do this very intimate and symbolically rich act in private.

Mounga led the way through the living room and kitchen, out the back door and up the steps to where the guests were waiting under the broad shade of the pergola. The strains of some light classical piece began to play as the couple began climbing the steps.

Jerry had offered to play "disc jockey" and cued Severus' music box to play something while they came up the pathway. Hermione didn't want anything formal or even slightly resembling a processional, so she asked that he keep it to something classical and light without an air of pomp and circumstance. She wanted to keep this informal, as did Severus.

Hermione did not want to do much of anything that reminded her of her first wedding, much the same way Ginny had felt, and so they merely walked to a spot cleared in front of the guests, who were seated theater-style – instead of marching up an aisle between guests seated on either side.

There were about thirty-two guests seated, including Devlin, plus Michael and Philippe, Bill and Fleur's two oldest, who wanted to watch the wedding. They preferred it to playing with the much smaller children who gaily squealed and frolicked about in their special garden.

Everyone stood as the bride approached. There was a murmur of appreciation of how lovely the bride looked and how she glowed. Her choice of a red sari would not have been acceptable back in England within the wizarding community unless she truly was of Indian descent and having an authentic Indian wedding, but given the rather international mix in Malu Palekaiko, this was met without a bat of the eye.

Hermione's father offered to give Hermione away again, but she politely declined. She didn't want to be given away, as she explained, but walk into this marriage already by the side of the man she had shared so much with and who already had claimed her heart. Severus kept glancing down at his beautiful bride who held on to his left arm. Hermione was more focused on trying to not step on the hem of her sari as they ascended the stairs towards the back deck, but she could feel his mesmerized eyes upon her.
Now that everyone had taken their places, the guests sat down while Jerry ended the music.

Lifting the conch shell to his lips, Mounga blew it three times, each long note resounding through the afternoon air. Even the children in the garden momentarily quieted to listen to the rich heralding sound.

Mounga did not have to cast a Sonorus Charm, as his voice projected quite easily with little effort for the small gathering. "When Severus first came to Malu Palekaiko, as I listened to his story as he sought sanctuary, I was moved by the words of love he spoke about Hermione and how he had – with great reluctance and heartbreak – left her behind, and how she willingly let him go and stayed behind to clear his name so he could be truly free, a very moving act of love itself. When Hermione came here herself seeking sanctuary, she told me her side of the story and of the things that happened between them. This showed me not only a deep and abiding love, but an extraordinary connection between two hearts that despite being separated by a great distance seemed to beat as one."

Hermione was initially reluctant about admitting she had sought sanctuary, but in time she saw there was no shame to it and people did not pry into her reasons for seeking it when she finally confessed having done so. However, Hermione and Severus had not shared the story about the inadvertent binding to each other through the use of pomegranate juice, though some knew of them meeting on an alternate plane. The only other person who knew was Mounga, and he was not going to share the particulars of that tale. So his words spoken meant something far more than the guests, or even Draco and Ginny, could assume.

"Marriage is a solemn contract, a joining of two to become as one, while remaining separate enough that each may thrive in the shelter and care of the other. Severus and Hermione, I have no doubt, will continue to thrive and grow together and stronger as the years pass within the shelter of each other's hearts and souls."
Turning to their witness, he prompted them. "The rings?"
The couple stuck with the traditional vows regarding the rings, as the symbolism of the words spoken and their meaning did hold true for them and their feelings.

Mounga then reached toward a small table next to him to pick up a glass that contained a dark red liquid. He held it up to show all the guests, who assumed it was wine.

"Drink, and with this act reaffirm the bindings of your hearts and souls to one another as you have stated your desire to do so," he announced to the couple, before offering the glass of pomegranate juice to the bride first.

Throughout the ceremony, Hermione had heard Mounga's words, but she was so awash in the heady sensation of elation, she could hardly remember what he said. Instead, she could do nothing but bask in the happiness that seemed to pulse from within Severus. But when Mounga lifted the glass of pomegranate juice, she became acutely aware of the words spoken and drank in their august intent knowing that to drink was to once more spiritually reconnect with Severus, their love as the catalyst.

Hermione took the glass in her hand and gazed up into Severus' eyes as she sipped from the glass, holding it with two hands like a ceremonial chalice of antiquity and she was invoking some great and ancient magic with this act.

She then offered it to her groom, the wizard she was willingly binding herself to once more. The marriage ceremony was merely to make official what was already cast in their hearts long ago.

Severus took the glass and drank the last few sips before handing it back to Mounga, his eyes never leaving Hermione's. When they had planned and discussed the ceremony, he was surprised that Hermione wanted to bind herself to him once more with pomegranate juice, but he welcomed the act as he had no regrets having done so before. This simple act of drinking meant more to him and her than any rings, exchange of leis, or spoken words. It was when he finished drinking the last swallows of the dark red nectar that in his mind that the ceremony was complete and he and Hermione were now truly joined in marriage, but there was one last thing to do for the benefit of the guests.

Upon watching the sharing of drink, Mounga recalled the words the ghostly memory of Albus once said to Severus. Mounga proclaimed with great reverence, "Love is the grandest of all the emotions man can experience. It brings us happiness, and makes our souls feel full of the matter that makes the universe spin and move. Love is the most powerful thing in the universe. There is no regret in the experience of love, only when we deny ourselves the ability to love." He paused to stress the importance of the words to be drunk in by all. "Let your hearts beat as one and your souls be joined forever more, bound by the love and affection you share with one another. Let it not wither, but flourish and flower as lush as a valley fed by the boundless springs of love."
Hermione finally broke eye contact with Severus so she could reach for her bouquet to fetch her handkerchief she had hidden under her bouquet, and dabbed at her eyes, feeling the tears swelling behind them. She was moved by the words that Mounga used to express their love; during her interview for sanctuary, she had described to him the springs she drank from cascading Severus' mountain of love.

Mounga's choice of words were not lost on Severus either. He would normally scoff at such sentimental drivel, but these words held great meaning to him and his bride.

There was only one part of the ceremony Hermione and Severus rehearsed beforehand. And since they did not feel the need to have the same words spoken twice since they shared the same sentiments, they decided to share, alternating in the speaking of their final vows.

Severus and Hermione stared with adoration at each other, both so fixed on each other, they hardly noticed anyone else around them. Severus noticed how the dark kohl around her eyes made the lighter flecks of amber more pronounced in her irises.

As they spoke their vows, Mounga translated for those who did not speak Hawaiian.

Severus began. "Na'u `oe."

"You're mine."

"O ku'u aloha no 'oe," Hermione said, finding her throat closing up with emotion as the ceremony was drawing to a close.

"You are indeed my love."

"Kaʻu Ia e lei aʻe nei la."

"I pledge my love to you alone."

"Mau loa, kuʻu lei."
"Forever, my beloved."

They smiled at each other, knowing it was finally done.

"You may now kiss each other," Mouna said, knowing how sexist Hermione thought the phrase "You may kiss the bride" was.

Without hesitation, Severus swept Hermione up in his arms and Hermione threw her arms around his neck, both eager to seal their vows with this simple act.

As their lips met, they could feel the magic of their renewed binding thrum through them, a visceral re-connection that told that their love had indeed bound themselves freely to each other, this time understanding and entering into this magical contract willfully.

Off in the forest just beyond the edge of the backyard, a beautiful young woman with a long fall of hair down to her knees stood there watching the ceremony from afar. She had heard the conch shell blown three times, calling for her divine presence yet again. As she watched Hermione and Severus kiss, she felt the thrum of their magic pulsing like a starburst, a shockwave radiating from them as their lips met. Magic conjured from love was the most powerful magic of all, more powerful than hers. Seeing that her presence was no longer required now that the ceremony was complete, and happy for the bridal couple, Pele turned and walked back into the forest.

Had there not been thirty-some people intently watching them, with some of the witches sniffing loudly and making syrupy sentimental noises – and the sudden sounds of disgust emanating from the peanut gallery romping in the garden, with one urchin yelling, "Eww, they're kissing!" – the couple would have continued kissing for far longer. Hermione and Severus both were of the same mind that a couple should not kiss so passionately that it was unseemly for a decorous ceremony; suddenly they were now themselves so swept up in their kiss, they had to hold back despite feeling the call of magic for them to continue on and without reservation.

As they reluctantly ended their kiss, Hermione felt equally overwhelmed and extremely exhilarated; she wasn't sure if she wanted to cry or burst out into peals of laughter from joy and relief, the ceremony was over and they were finally married. She could feel her head reel as if she were drunk. She held on to Severus' arm for fear she just might topple over, even though he'd forced her to have a late-morning snack to hold her over until food was served.
It was then she finally realized that Halulu's husband, Greg, had been taking photos during the ceremony. She saw him as he got up in front and took a few snaps of Severus and Hermione looking quite happy after their kiss.

"It is with great pleasure I now introduce Mr. and Mrs. Snape."

There was applause from all the guests, some more enthusiastic than others. Ron whistled and clapped loudly to Hermione and Severus' surprise, but then again, he did say he was happy Hermione found someone who made her happy, and Severus did that indeed.

Jerry cued to recessional music, which to Hermione's slight annoyance was Beethoven's "Ode to Joy" as it started to pick up around the seven and a half minute mark as the lead baritone singer launched into the recognizable melody. And while she thought it was a bit over the top, she conceded it was the perfect song as it was a joyous occasion for her and Severus.

The bridal couple led the way down from the pergola down to the back patio and lowest level deck where hors d'oeuvres and refreshments were being served, Meanwhile, Mario and his catering crew worked to reset the area under the pergola for the late bridal luncheon that would begin shortly.

To Hermione and Severus' relief, Jerry changed the music. Once the bridal couple and most of the guests were on the patio, he switched the music to something soothing, a compilation of jazz tunes both classic and contemporary that were unobtrusive to conversation as it played quietly in the background.

Lavender came up to the couple to wish them well, and began to talk with Hermione about her wedding sari. Albert and Tim asked Severus about the many colorful plants used to landscape the backyard and how did he get the gardenias to bloom so prolifically. Ron was busy shoving one of every kind of hors d'oeuvre into his mouth, not wanting to miss one.

"What is this?" Ron asked Hermione with a rapturous look about his face as he chewed with gusto.

"Duck lumpia with hoisin sauce, a little dish we came across in the Philippines while Severus joined me on a quick business trip there to meet with a distributor. She took us to this great restaurant in... where was it? Manila or Cebu City?" Hermione asked, turning to her husband.

"Lipa City," Severus jogged her memory as he handed her a glass of champagne. Then he discreetly slipped his arm around his bride's waist, his fingers lightly skating across her back where her skin was exposed just below her choli, before his hand finally rested upon her hip. He was rewarded with a restrained shiver Hermione tried to tamp down that was noticed only by him.

"Well, the food is fantastic," Ron professed earnestly around a mouthful of goat cheese wonton, a few drops of the cranberry-ginger dipping sauce clinging to the corner of his mouth and the edge of his mustache. He was oblivious to the way Hermione's eyes briefly fluttered shut.

Knowing if she did not escape from Severus' attention, he would continue to tease her mercilessly in hopes of having her aggressively pounce upon him later, she slid from his grasp. She cast a faux coquettish look over her shoulder at him that two could play at that game.

Hermione also figured it was probably a good opportunity to grab a bite finally, feeling relaxed enough to grab a mini-samosa from a tray that floated by. She popped it into her mouth and savored it, now that everything was in Mario's capable hands and the ceremony was over.

Zhubanysh came over at this time to pass on a message of congratulations from James Hoover, since Hermione had stopped seeing the Muggle therapist some months prior, feeling as though she had worked through her issues with him long-distance. Mrs. Potter worked with James part-time now, a few days a week, helping him with his wizarding clients where there was fear, trauma, or anxiety involved that hampered his ability to help them. She would teach the client's partner who had come along how to help soothe the witch or wizard's mind to calm them enough so that James could help them. If the client was alone, she sang to them instead, using her compassion to help soothe them. James found that love and compassion, as given through song and intent, was a far better alternative to a pharmacological solution for some of his magical clients who needed to calm down before addressing problems. Hermione was glad that Zhubanysh's special talent was being shared and taught to those who needed it most.

There was another round of excited screams from the children's garden as the elves and someone from Mario's catering staff brought sparkling pumpkin juice for the children, to keep them cool and hydrated in the warm Hawaiian sun, what with all the rigorous playing they were engaged in.

Hermione's parents greeted the bride and groom, welcoming Severus into the family formally, though they had already done that when they met up during part of Christmas break in Greece. Hermione and Severus had periodically met up with her parents, since she did promise to stay in better contact with them now that she no longer had Weasley family obligations to keep her away. Living on the other side of the world was less an impediment of her visiting with her parents than the endless Weasley family engagements she was formerly obliged to attend that was now Lavender's duty. And given Lavender's blackmail capabilities over Molly, Lavender kept her own attendance to a manageable schedule. Even Ron agreed, amazed at his wife's ability to talk them out of attending every Weasley function, that it was nice not to have so many family gatherings all the time.
For in-laws, Severus was quite pleased Hermione's parents were such agreeable and sensible people. So it did not bother him that a few times a year they met up with her parents abroad, such as Poland, Canada or the Caribbean. They might go see one or two sites together and enjoy dinner together one night, but otherwise left the young couple to their own devices. Much to Severus' relief, the Drs. Grangers did not want to spend the entire time together with their daughter, understanding the need for the young couple be left alone. Even for the week before the wedding, they stayed at Justina's hotel knowing that for the fact they did not have wands would mean they would require more help around the Snape house, where as Justina's hotel was adapted for Muggles already.

"I don't see Blanche here. I thought you said you invited her," Albert queried Severus on the whereabouts of the owner of the very lucrative Miniature Man-Eating Miniature Masdevallia orchid farm.

"She was, along with the children, but unfortunately there was a death in the family that required her to Portkey to Ohio a few days ago. I know you were going to discuss techniques on how to train them for pots so they thrive for distribution, since orchids are your specialty. I do not know how long she'll be gone, since she said there would most likely be family drama involving her brother who feels aggrieved that she isn't supporting him like she is her husband, who last she heard was living on a fishing boat in San Diego."

Albert shook his head thankful his children and various grandchildren all got along harmoniously.

Trevor Spawn was also invited, but could not make it either since his master, Royston Bentwick, refused to let him go that weekend to Hawaii. The Potions master was still rather miffed at Hermione and Severus over the doozy of a prank she laid upon him at the booze-up they had at Niles' house after she was certified by the committee three months prior. Given the effects of the prank, it was no wonder Royston was royally pissed at the Snapes and refused Trevor the chance to attend.

Severus' mind also was thinking about certain parties acting harmoniously with each other as well. He glanced over at the still slightly astounding sight of Draco and Potter talking with each other rather amicably, which still boggled him; he also saw their wives, Ginny and Zhubanysh, getting on like old friends without a smidgen of animosity between the two witches. Zhubanysh even thanked Ginny for leaving Harry when she did, for if events had played out otherwise, Zhubanysh and her husband would have never met. And if Zhubanysh was never in Potter's life, then Severus may not have been able to bring Hermione back, thanks to the witch's special magical healing technique she taught him.

To avoid awkwardness, there were a few people Hermione did not invite, most notably the Longbottoms and the Krums. Hermione understood Severus' rather unforgiving grudge and jealous streak where Neville was concerned. Though Luna and Neville had invited Hermione to their own wedding, even Hermione felt rather uncomfortable being there and was only at their reception briefly before making a hasty retreat. Regarding Viktor and Anne, Hermione eventually told Severus about her dinner with them and the accidental revelation. There was a somewhat awkward conversation that followed, given they had not discussed Severus' former profession for some time, but it was mutually agreed that though Hermione was friends with the Krums, they would not be invited for everyone's sake and sanity.

Mario announced that lunch was ready, much to the delight of the children who had only had a light snack before the wedding and who were now famished after playing so rigorously. Ron grabbed a last miniature cha siu bao and cucumber cup filled with ceviche before he followed the rest of the guests back up to the deck under the pergola, that had now been set up with a table arrangement in the shape of a large U.

The only arranged seating was a spot in the middle of the table configuration where the bride and groom could view all their guests, who sat on either side of the table. Having no seating arrangements was one less thing for Hermione to deal with, on top of running a business and training Akela, her Potions apprentice.

Lavender and Mouna wound up sitting next to each other as Lavender was also visiting Malu Palekaiko for business, seeking to finalize buying a large piece of property on the west side of the island, with plans to open a resort and spa there. The site had a hot springs on it, which cost a pretty Knut since the owner of that particular spring had Manny – Severus' old real estate agent – negotiate the deal on his behalf, and Manny was a very good negotiator. Lavender had been prompted to open a hot springs spa and resort after hearing Hermione and Severus bemoan that though the hot springs they had use of one day a week was very nice, they missed certain things from Madam Hope's Springs Eternal and Day Spa, like the natatorium, dry sauna, steam rooms, hot and cold plunges, and spa treatments.

And then there was the fact that since Malu Palekaiko was very Muggle-friendly, given the number of mixed couples on the island, there would be a need to make the proposed what the local building code regulators called "Muggle-compliant," which meant Lavender's architects back in London would have to personally come out and work with the government officials instead of the usual conference through mirror or albatross. Given how long it took to get final approval for her manufacturing facility a few years ago, she wanted to expedite the process.

Hermione watched nervously as Fred and George sat close to her parents and hoped the twins had the good sense to behave. With a stern glance, she gave them a warning with the flash of her eyes, darting to her parents indicating that what she did to Niles, Braxton, and Royston would pale in comparison if they pranked any of her Muggle relations. Fred gave her a reassuring smile that there would be no cause to worry, but he cast his eyes toward Ron with a mischievous smile towards her ex-husband. Hermione gave him a nod of approval that Ron was fair game.
Severus, who caught the nonverbal exchange between the two, asked, "Should we have antidotes ready?"

"Depends on how much pity you feel for Ron," she retorted, amused when Severus did not suppress a wicked grin.

"Yeah! Mac and cheese!" some of the children cheered, as bowls of the cheesy dish appeared in front of them. The children were finally seated next to and across from their parents as the salad course was served to the adults. And it was a fair number of children being served, the ratio of guests being three adults for every two children.

"It's pasta with a blended cheese sauce," Severus grumbled under his breath, loathing that particular American name for the dish. He speared his melon, prosciutto, and feta salad with some malice as Hermione patted his knee to soothe him. Few things nettled Severus unlike food being called by inappropriate names, which was going to make the soup course rather challenging, given Mario made gazpacho according to Severus' recipe. Severus still was rather aggrieved over the fact that his soup was once referred to as "salsa." And then there was the incident when Rainbow referred to his braised veal and pork pâté as "meatloaf." This wedding was the first time the Finaus had been back to dine at the Snapes' residence since that culinary misunderstanding.

Ginny and Draco seated themselves and their brood almost directly across from the bride and groom. Their children were sandwiched between them in order to better monitor them and prevent food from being flung, a recent bad habit the Malfoy children had discovered when one triplet's magic kicked in one day and a plate of grilled courgettes suddenly went sailing across the room. Phoenix was the one who hated courgettes, so it was most likely her magic that caused the plate to suddenly levitate and fly across the room with the plate shattering into large pieces, much to the triplets' delight and Ginny and Draco's distress. Now plates and bowls were spelled with sticking charms. Fortunately, Mario was an expert at catering events with children present; he made sure everyone's plate would stay firmly on the table with the appropriate spells to prevent such inadvertent disasters.

The wine flowed freely as Hermione and Severus had been stocking their cellar recently with trips to the West Coast of the mainland, as Lavender wanted feedback and reports on Muggle and wizarding spa resorts in order to design towards regional tastes. Many of those trips involved going to spa resorts on the other Hawaiian islands and Northern California's wine country where there were hotels and spas built around hot springs in the area. Severus had, upon a thorough tour of several Muggle and wizarding wineries of the area, finally conceded that the Americans could indeed make some wines on par with the Europeans. The lightly sweet Cabernet Sauvignon Blanc from the Sonoma Valley balanced out the acid and vinegar of the tomato-based Spanish soup. For the children, the sparkling pumpkin juice that flowed freely was worth it to put up with the fact their parents had put them into fancy clothes for the day.
Albert, who sat on Hermione's right, asked how Akela's apprenticeship was coming along as the soup course was finally cleared away.

"She's an apt student, but a bit overly sure of herself at times, an attitude that would have been brought more into line if Severus had the chance to tutor her and teach her a bit of humility," Hermione confessed, knowing that her husband was pretending not to listen in on their conversation.

Severus stopped the facade and confirmed he was eavesdropping when he mentioned casually, "If I recall, I did teach you, yet your own self-assured cockiness in the classroom did not seem to falter despite my best attempts to temper it."

"You used to confuse cockiness with rigorous studying, darling," she said with saccharine sweetness.

"And you used to confuse studying with wisdom and experience," he gently reminded her.

This comment made Hermione nod her head in agreement that while in school she was extremely naive about certain things. She now looked back on them with some embarrassment, but chalked it up to her own youthful guilelessness.

"Come, children, don't bicker; it's your wedding day," Albert gently chided them.

To the bridal couple's consternation, George piped up, "Bickering is probably their form of foreplay!"

George's comment earned a few glares from nearby parents, who were hoping the sexually-laced innuendo would fly over their children's heads.

"Four-play? Is that a game that requires four people to play?" Devlin asked his father innocently. This made Ron choke on his wine, and Lavender glared at her brother-in-law for his comment that prompted her son's remark.

Devlin's plain-spoken question sent Tim, Jerry, Mouna, and the twins into fits of laughter that earned them harsh glares from many of the women sitting next to them.

"Sometimes, if it's that type of marriage," Hermione heard Draco mutter under his breath in a slightly derogatory manner, too quietly for Devlin to have overheard. Draco's comment indicated that while others may have such an arrangement, he found the idea of sharing his wife with anyone distasteful.

Hermione noticed that Harry heard Draco's comment and blushed, a sign he was still somewhat uncomfortable with the topic of sex and the memory of both wizards sleeping with Ginny during the same time period.

Fortunately, lunch was served for the adults, which distracted everyone from the topic at hand. People had the choice of either chilled poached salmon with cucumber dill sauce, lightly dressed greens, and cold buckwheat soba noodles – or the leg of lamb with grilled eggplant, curried garbanzo beans, and couscous, with mango chutney, of course. Hermione felt that with so many people coming from England, having a cold option in the warm climate might help them combat the tropical climate that could become a bit overwhelming in the afternoons until one acclimated, even with the shade of the pergola overhead and a few Cooling Charms.

Since the children ate their meals during the adults' salad and soup course, most parents excused their children from the table to play for a bit more before it was time for a nap.

With the children mostly gone from the table, all the adults began to relax and enjoy their entrees, now that the sibling bickering had been banished to the children's area of the backyard. Josephine demanded to know when she was going to get her chocolate cake, but was told firmly by her mother it would be later after the adults were done with lunch and the meal settled a bit. The child knew from her mother's clipped tone that further questions as to when she would have cake would result in no cake at all, and she ran off to amuse herself with her cousins and other children playing.

Devlin and Michael decided that "mac and cheese" was below their palate standards and held out for the adult fare, enjoying the salad, but passing on the chilled vegetable soup. Conversation flowed more freely with the children away from the table, helped with an excellent Merlot that complimented the lamb and a fantastic Riesling that had Lavender asking about the vineyard and vintage, wanting to order a few cases for her own cellar at home.

As people were finishing their lunch, there was a tapping of a glass coming from the direction of where Mounga was sitting, and the growing chant of "kiss, kiss, kiss."

Hermione and Severus sighed, knowing they could not escape all wedding traditions, but agreed to amuse the crowd, not minding to kiss for everyone's amusement this once.

Ginny, who took her camera back from Greg after the ceremony, played photographer during the reception. She asked for the couple to wait a second while she whipped out her camera. Severus merely rolled his eyes, noting the spontaneity of the moment was somewhat hampered with a request to wait.

Now that she had given the signal that she was ready, Hermione shrugged noncommittally, feeling as if it was yet another performance for the benefit of others.

Severus leaned forward, but stopped short, his lips a mere inch from hers. Hermione was ready for him to perfunctorily plant one on her, but was perplexed when he withheld his lips from hers. As she began to crane her neck forward, Severus retreated while keeping his lips close to hers, but not touching. Hermione smiled, wondering what Severus’ game was, a game that would be more suited to the bedroom given his playful sultry smile he was giving her. She began sitting back, but then Severus' lips chased hers, still unwilling to let their mouths meet, but still keeping his face close to hers.

"Sev–" Hermione began to protest at his game, but was cut short when he leaned forward swiftly and captured her mouth with a kiss, surprising her.

Hermione melted against him as he wrapped an arm around her and trailed a finger along her jaw tenderly. They felt the pull to let their kiss deepen and become more impassioned unaware of Ginny taking their photograph, but withdrew when they heard the crude wolf whistles from Jerry and the twins.

"Didn't take you for a tease, Snape," Fred called out, which earned a quick glare from Severus.

Kaimi, who had been sitting at one end of the table with her family, suddenly felt very protective of her Uncle Severus and Aunt Hermione who were obviously uncomfortable with these sexual innuendos she had not missed and made her blush furiously. Knowing it would be bad form for the bride and groom to hex guests, Kaimi felt duty-bound to do something to protect their honor, since they were far above what Uncle Severus called crude humor. While Fred and George were busy laughing, Kaimi discreetly whipped out her wand and silently performed a Jelly Legs Jinx equivalent on the rear legs of their chairs, causing the wine they were holding in their hands to be spilled into their laps while they simultaneously fell flat on their backs. For a nearly eleven-year-old, Kaimi was very deft with a wand, having honed her skills against her older siblings now that she had a wand to defend herself since turning ten.
Everyone around the table began laughing, even earning a smirk from the groom and a smile hidden behind the hand of the bride.

Mounga noticed Kaimi wasn't laughing, but looking rather smug. When he arched a brow to her in question, she merely replied too innocently, "Yes, Papa?" He gave his daughter a warring look of pride and suspicion.

Severus looked about to see who'd cast the spells, figuring he knew who it was. Upon spying Kaimi, she merely gave the groom a gentle nod, indicating she had fulfilled her duties, as Severus had warned her ahead of time that the twins might need a discreet hex to pull them back into line if their wives did not. Severus gave her a nod back indicating that was enough, and he would handle any more bad behavior personally. Given her age, she was maturing in a way that was surprising for her youth. Going to the new wizarding school had exposed her to a greater social dynamic than she was exposed to when she was exclusively home-schooled, and she was now forced to socialize with kids she normally would not have dealt with before.

The year before a few boys at school called Kaimi some rather nasty names and put her into tears. Kaimi's parents spoke to the young wizards' parents, which only seemed to make matters worse. Severus seemed to be the only one who could truly sympathize with her plight, as she had gone to him for advice since the taunting had increased. He then taught her some rather inventive hexes and jinxes, and even instructed her how to stow her wand away quickly enough up a sleeve so that no one noticed that she was the one who cast it. It wasn't exactly proper for one of the Governors of the school board to be teaching a student how to cast spells that were against the school's code of conduct, but as he made exceptions for his Slytherins when he was Head of House, he was just as fiercely protective of Kaimi. He was sure that if she went to Hogwarts instead of the local academy, Kaimi surely would have been sorted into either Ravenclaw or Slytherin, as she was a rather clever and resourceful witch.

"All right, all right," Fred and George said, knowing they were getting a bit carried away. "Ten points to whoever cast that. We get the point," George admitted. They stood up and spelled away the wine stains and fixed their chairs, testing them before sitting back down in them once more.

Things settled down. Some of the guests started moving about to various chairs at other ends to talk with people they didn't have a chance to converse with before.

Hermione sat back and swirled her glass of Merlot with a practiced hand, looking quite serene. This was, in her mind, what a wedding should be like, a large dinner – or luncheon – party among friends without the restrictive formality. There was no fretting about perfect décor or rituals that made her feel like she was observing some custom that made her feel like a piece of property passed off. Her feeling was that some acts performed during a traditional wizard wedding were antiquated procedures that served no purpose other than to add irrelevant flamboyant rituals for show and little else. To reduce her stress, Hermione picked out her own bridal bouquet, but let Ginny picked her own flowers. She even let the florist have free license to design the floral display on the table with the one restriction that it wasn't to be so large that it would take up large amounts of table space, and that it would not prevent people from easily seeing their dining companions over them.

The biggest decision Hermione had to make in preparation of the wedding was which of the dozens of beautiful red and gold bridal saris to pick from, and which design for the ruby and golden sapphire earrings to pick to go with the necklace Severus had spotted in a jeweler's window in Varanasi and insisted he buy for her immediately. She even let Severus plan the menu with Mario, with a suggestion of a cool lunch option, which most of the visiting British contingent ate; she'd predicted they would be unable to face a hot lunch on a warm day, even with the gentle breeze coming up from the ocean.

"You look relaxed. So I'm guessing you're actually enjoying your own wedding for once," Severus asked his bride.

"Having Molly not present playing Attila the Wedding Coordinator helps greatly. And you taking over the catering was also a relief. Jerry arranging the music as DJ and keeping the music light and pleasant – despite his jibe he was going to add AC/DC's 'Highway to Hell' or 'Victim of Love' by the Eagles to your music box for the bridal processional – was one less thing to coordinate. And Rainbow, Akela, and Kaimi's offer to help with anything else I neither had the time nor inclination to deal with was also a joy." Hermione tipped her glass up and took a sip, savoring the balance of flavors and the tannins that washed over her tongue. She was glad Severus had the foresight to buy six cases, since they probably had gone through almost a case at the reception alone, and that was just the Merlot. A whole case of Riesling had probably been polished off by now.

Severus leaned over and placed a chaste kiss against her neck that sent a shiver up her spine. If anyone had spied the couple in this brief intimate moment, no one made comment, continuing on with their conversations.

Parents left the table to take children – who were starting to cry, get cranky from exhaustion, or had literally fallen asleep on the grass – off to the room set up for naps. Once they had returned from setting wee ones down, Jerry got up from his seat across from Fred and his wife, Grace, to approach the bridal couple. "Think we can talk you two into one dance for tradition?"

While Hermione and Severus did not plan to have dancing, they were amenable to the suggestion. They decided to stick with a simple foxtrot since Hermione was not used to dancing in a sari, even though it was charmed not to come undone.

Jerry set the music box to play "At Last," that particular rendition by Etta James, who Jerry coached Draco to imitate when he serenaded them during Hermione's Christmas visit at Bongo's.
It was a small area just large enough to dance within the U-shape of the tables.

"Are you ready to be dipped?" Severus asked, hearkening back to their first dance lesson when Hermione pitched over and pulled him down, after telling him years ago how Ron dropped her at their wedding.

"As long as it's you doing the dipping, and thank you for not stepping on my feet," she added, remembering how Ron tromped on her sandal-exposed toes.

They moved perfectly in time to the music, having danced to it many times before, the song supplanting the song about San Francisco as Hermione's favorite. At the end, Severus spun her under his arm and then dipped her with grace and ease. As he brought her up, he planted a kiss sweetly upon her lips, much to her delight; this earned some soft murmurs of appreciation from the guests for the tender gesture.

A few of the other guests decided to get up and dance a bit, now that the bride and groom sat down. The Potters, the Malfoys, and George and his wife, Florence, got up for a quick spin. Since there was little room within the confines of the U-shaped table arrangement, Akela and Tristan danced on the deck just below the one where the tables were, and were eventually joined by her parents.

Katrina and Veronica, the cats, decided that since the children were gone, they could grace everyone with their presence. They sauntered into the backyard and flopped on their sides, sunning themselves now that the motley muster of moppets was finally gone.

Not long after, children began to wake from naps, fully re-energized and ready for the promise of chocolate cake to be fulfilled. The emergence of the loud and grabby urchins caused Katrina and Veronica to seek shelter in the front yard where they could continue to sun and nap undisturbed.

Hermione and Severus cut the cake together, cajoled into yet another ceremonial gesture, as Ginny snapped away with her camera. Ginny had taken up the hobby of photography so she could take photos of her students during dance recitals, and she enjoyed taking snaps of her children. There was one framed photo of hers that Severus and Hermione had put on the mantle. It featured a sleeping Draco on the couch, looking quite exhausted, with scruff on his face, but happy, with all three of the children, when they were still small infants. Draco held one of the girls in each arm and had Sebastian sleeping on his tummy on his father's chest. In the photos you could see Draco's chest rise and fall slowly along with little chubby hands opening and closing as they slept and little mouths periodically making the sucking motions. It was the Snapes' favorite photo of their godchildren.
The bridal couple delicately fed each other a single bite without any of the childishness the Malfoys engaged in at their own wedding. Severus gave Draco a smirk of triumph that he had not succumbed to such antics.

Sitting down as Mario began cutting the cake and serving it to the guests, Hermione leaned close to Severus' ear, whispering intentionally so that her warm breath grazed his ear, "We'll have to make sure to take some cake along with us for the honeymoon. Who knows how long it will take for you to lick all that frosting off my breasts or me to nibble away the last of the crumbs from your stomach, and lower." Before withdrawing, Hermione gave Severus' ear a delicate swipe of her tongue, which made a very low-register sigh escape from his slightly parted lips.

"Didn't I warn you about teasing the animals before?" he softly warned her with a playful growl, his hand slipped around her back to caress her spine below her choli once more.

"It's not teasing if it's a promise," she reminded him innocently.

As everyone was eating cake, Draco stood with a glass of champagne that was served with dessert. "I'd like to propose a toast. To Hermione and Severus. May your love be ever growing, your blessings boundless, your tears be only joyful ones, and your sorrows few. To the bride and groom!" It was a toast of similar hope for the future that Severus had given at Draco's wedding.

Everyone said, "Cheers!"

Many of the guests remarked what a wonderful cake it was, as the use of cherries in the cake along with the fudgy chocolate base was decadent. Of course the second tier was plain chocolate cake since some of the children preferred their cake without the addition of fruit to the cake batter. Severus and Hermione smiled secretly, remembering how one of their first bets involved that very same cake recipe Severus served long ago.

Arnold decided that this was a perfect time to serenade the bridal couple, and he sang a beautiful a capella version of Elvis' song "Can't Help Falling In Love." The lyrics rang quite true for the couple for they could not help but fall in love with each other, despite how much they fought against it at first.

As Arnold finished with a bow, with a sincere round of applause from the guests, Uncle Tim went up to Arnold and praised him for his wonderful Elvis impression. He then committed the inadvertent social blunder of asking if Arnold had ever tried to enter an Elvis impersonator contest, for as Tim professed, he would surely be a winner.

Hermione sat there with her head in her hand groaning silently to herself, while Severus watched with amusement as Arnold turned five shades of red before quietly storming off. The bride wondered if she should have warned her Uncle Tim that the reason why Arnold had sought sanctuary years ago was that Arnold had bought a lock of Elvis' hair at a Muggle auction, then proceeded to brew Polyjuice Potion and enter Elvis impersonator competitions Polyjuiced into the "King of Rock 'n Roll." When the Japanese and American magical governments got wind of this, Arnold hightailed it to Malu Palekaiko and had been a resident there ever since. Since Arnold's granting of sanctuary, sighting of Elvis in the Muggle gossip rags dropped dramatically. However, since it was not Hermione's place to share Arnold's tale, she never made a point of warning her uncle not to say anything about it. Ranjit went off to assure Arnold that Hermione's Muggle relation meant no insult, and that he should take it as a compliment regarding his Elvis impersonating skills without the use of Polyjuice Potion.

Since most of the single witches at the wedding were aged six and under, with the exception of the Finau girls and Fastrada, who was a widow and not interested in any rituals for finding a new husband, the tossing of the bouquet was omitted from the itinerary that afternoon. Severus and Hermione both agreed without question the tossing of the garter was not going to happen. Period.

In addition, Akela had asked her mistress on advice about how to stop her mother from nagging her about when she and Tristan were going to get married; Akela recalled hearing similar stories about Hermione's ex-mother-in-law. A bouquet landing in Akela's lap would only add fuel to Rainbow's harping. Besides, Hermione thought it a shame that a bride always gave away such a beautiful and sentimentally meaningful bouquet of flowers. Hermione had heard from her Aunt Christine about how most Muggle brides kept their wedding bouquet and ordered a small tossing one instead to throw, which inspired Hermione to make sure to spell her flowers with a preserving charm, keeping them looking fresh and vibrant as their wedding day, before they left on their honeymoon.

Now that cake had been served and it was getting late in the afternoon, many people with children decided to call it a day.

Josephine had begun whinging about going to the beach to go swimming, taking her father's earlier suggestion as a promise instead. Ron looked to his oldest brother and asked pleadingly, "Bill? When do the terrible twos stop?"

"Around the time they take their N.E.W.T.s and start living on their own," Bill quipped, looking over at his eldest, Michael, playing with Devlin, looking like they were plotting something again. Though those two could be quite the devious pair at times, he was glad Michael had a cousin the same age and have someone he could pal around Hogwarts with when they both started in about three years. He was also glad that friendship between Houses was much more prevalent after the war instead of the constant rivalry that bordered on animosity, though Slytherin and Gryffindor were still a contentious pair, which he'd heard from Sprout. Michael was most likely going to be a Gryffindor, but who knew which House Devlin would be sorted into.

Before guests started departing, Ginny wrangled all the children together so that there would be a picture of the bride with all of them. Ginny had seen it in a Muggle book on photography she had bought and thought it a charming idea. The children did not, however. There was a special bribe of more treats from some of the parents of the more unruly children, which quelled them into smiling sweetly for the few seconds required to take the photo. Of course, after Ginny took the photo, everyone with spawn in the picture wanted a copy for themselves. Ginny promised she would send them off as soon as she could develop and make prints, having had a dark room built in a small office cottage they had added to their property in the back. The cottage also held a sewing room for Ginny to make costumes and Draco's quilting supplies, as well as a small belly-dancing practice studio.

Guests began departing, wishing the couple well. There were hugs and kisses, with Severus shaking hands only with any wizard who was a Weasley or a Potter. The Malfoys stuck around along with Hermione's parents, Albert, the Finau family, Tristan, and Jerry.

After draining the last of the champagne from her flute, Hermione asked her old Master, "Don't let me forget to give you Royston's antidote before you leave tonight. Three months of punishment is surely enough, though you can take your time giving it to him if you think he's still not sorry yet."

"Oh, trust me," Albert assured her with a hearty reply, "he's most utterly, deeply, regretfully sorry."

"Good," Severus said, almost crooning with glee, looking very satisfied.

"You never did say exactly what your revenge was," prompted Mouna, hoping to finally get the details.

Hermione looked about and noticed that Kaimi was off playing with the Malfoy triplets in the kinders' garten. Iakona was sixteen and probably old enough to hear it, but she was glad to notice that Iakona was in the kitchen getting more to eat, as Mario and his crew were wrapping things up and cleaning the kitchen before leaving. The Finau's son was going through yet another growth spurt.

Quietly, so only the adults present could hear, she said, "Well, the twins came up with the idea, but it required a great deal of research on our part..." Hermione stopped and turned to her husband, "... would you say it was reverse-engineering, or would you say it was something completely new?"
"Oh, something completely new, I'd say," Severus said darkly, crossing his legs while remembering the final end result, glad he and Hermione had an antidote ready that worked.

Albert laughed, understanding that Severus had put himself into the line of testing and felt some pity for him.

"And what exactly did you slip Royston at the party after you passed and became a Potions Mistress?" Mounga prompted her once more.

"Since Royston seemed to have some sort of perverse pleasure in trying to make Severus lay out intimate details and kiss in front of them, I slipped him a potion that every time he gets an erection, his manhood shrinks. The harder it gets, the smaller it is," she said with malicious pride. "And it doesn't wear off; it's permanent until one takes the antidote."

All the men sitting groaned and crossed their legs while the women cackled with amusement or gasped in shock, especially Hermione's mother who did not think her daughter could be so devious.

"And you let her test this on you, Severus?" Jerry asked incredulously.

"I wanted to get him back as badly as Hermione," Severus replied. "And considering I worked alongside of her, between the two of us, we could reverse anything so it was not permanent for me."

"Trust me, the antidote is effective to reverse it completely," Hermione assured them, then blushed considering she said it with a bit too much gusto.

"Damn, the things we do for love," Mounga groaned, making a silent pledge to never get on the Snapes' bad side, considering that Rainbow was still mortified regarding her behavior after sipping Hermione's revenge drink.

"The twins plan on selling it as a sort of jilted-lover revenge potion and promised us forty percent of the profits, since we did all the hard work, with the antidote selling for twice the cost of the original potion," Hermione further explained.
"Gouging Galleons out of those who need it most. One would think the twins should have been sorted into Slytherin instead of noble Gryffindor," Draco noted acerbically.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: I commissioned donkinana (http://dokinana.deviantart.com/) to do the wedding fan art for this chapter. You can view it on my Tumblr page here: http://atdlheabetz.tumblr.com/image/158121879960

Thank you to my fabulous betas, JuneW and Hope.

Title taken from the Spanish saying: Vivieron felices y comieron perdices (y a mí no me dieron).
Translation: They lived happily and ate partridge (and didn't give me any).
Meaning / English equivalent: And they lived happily ever after.

Quote: "Y'know, you got them bad eyes, like a gypsy." Moonstruck (1987)

A pallu is the decorative edge of a sari that is draped over the shoulder at the end of the fabric.

"Can't Help Falling In Love" written by Hugo Peretti, Luigi Creatore, and George David Weiss.

There is still the honeymoon and epilogue to come. Stay tuned.
"Mount Ruapehu"

Chapter Summary

It's the honeymoon! Lemon season has returned once more!

WARNING: NSFW fan art embedded in this chapter about three-quarters of the way down. NC-17/Mature for sexual situations. So don't get caught gawking at the hawt Hermione/Severus sexy times on your computer at work.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter One Hundred Seventeen
"Mount Ruapehu"

Disclaimer: Five score and seventeen chapters ago, this author brought forth on the Internet a new fanfic, conceived in fun and without profit, and dedicated to JK Rowling who is the creator and owner of Harry Potter and its universe.

A/N: Disclaimer a parody of the opening paragraph of Abraham Lincoln's Gettysburg Address.

=============

Since the Snapes had a six o'clock Portkey, they had to start getting ready. As much as Severus wanted to take his bride right there and then as he helped unwrap her from the yards and yards of vibrant silk that encased her, he held back. He wanted this night to be just a little extra special, despite Hermione's attempts to make their wedding nothing more complicated than a simple day when their life together was finally on paper.

While Severus was assured the Portkey would have them landing inside instead of outside in the snow, they wore clothes warm enough for where they were going, without sweltering in heavy clothes for the tropical climate they were still in. They had warm winter cloaks ready in a satchel.

They went through their checklist verbally as they did when they were about to travel, even for the short weekend jaunts abroad they made to Japan and China when Hermione was studying her languages, or to California for resort spa research.
"Toiletries?"

"Packed."

"Underclothes, socks, trousers, shirts, jackets, cloaks, your skirts and dresses?"

"Definitely packed," Hermione replied, remembering the one time she forgot to pack socks for both of them when they used to just list "clothes." That had resulted in item-listing all the items for future trips. Toiletries were easier to replace than clothing at the last minute.

"Your belly-dancing outfit too?" he asked with a sensuous hint in his voice. He enjoyed how she would let him watch her practice, especially since the recital was in less than three weeks and she needed to work on her routine for the group.

"Yes, and I even packed your turban if you want to play Sultan again," she answered with a knowing smile.

"Books?"

"Absolutely." Though as to how much time they'd have to read on their honeymoon was under discussion, but she did have a few travel books she included after finding out where they were going.

"Potions?"

"Yes: Standard kit plus Portkey Lag Potion, Sequoia, Lubrication, Polyjuice, Contraceptives."

Downstairs with their trunk ready and packed, and cloaks ready for travel, Hermione went over a few last details with her apprentice. Akela assured her mistress the cats would be fed and taken care of, the passion vines properly tamed, items harvested and prepared, and everything watered accordingly for all the gardens, including the farm on the west side of the island, while Akela continued working on her Spanish, anatomy and Code of Ethics. Final farewells to the last of the guests were given shortly before they locked up their house for the next two weeks.
Since time was running short, they took the Floo to the Portkey office, besides not wanting to walk through town in warm clothing that was making them sweat slightly, even with a Cooling Charm.

Much to their surprise, some of the townsfolk and people who worked at the manufacturing facility were there at the Portkey office to give the bride and groom a send-off. They tossed flower petals and rice, and held their wands aloft, sending sparks that raced along the ceiling of the Portkey office before trailing off into faint glowing embers. There were more handshakes and kisses wishing the couple the best on their trip. It wasn't a surprise luau reception, but it was a pleasant ambuscade.

As they landed at their destination, Hermione hugged Severus with delight as a roaring fire was burning in the fireplace. She had decided to let him plan the honeymoon, and so where they landed with their Portkey was a complete surprise to her since the only thing she knew was that they were going to New Zealand and nothing else.

In their blissful denouement cuddles when they wished they could lay there much longer, but had to get up and hurry off somewhere, she had talked about how she wished they could be off in some remote snowbound cabin. There they would be undisturbed and thereby left alone for them to fuck their brains out endlessly.

After untangling her arms from about his neck and giving him a slew of grateful kisses peppered about his cheeks and lips, she ran over to the window to peer out. Sure enough, all she saw was a field of snow lit with the golden glow of the low-slanting sun since it was just after four in the afternoon – the next day. The time zone difference was twenty-two hours ahead, but for their body clocks, it was just two hours behind, which meant the Portkey Lag Potion was optional if they wanted an additional two hours of energy that night.

"Ooh, there is even a hot tub!" She squirmed with gladness seeing that everything seemed to be just as she wished. Had she been a dog, her tail would have been excitedly wagging. Even without a tail, her bottom wiggled back and forth in an enticing manner such that Severus had to prevent himself from taking her right there and then. "Which mountain are we on? Mount Cook? Mount Hutt?"

"Mount Ruapehu," he informed her.

"Really? This much snow on the North Island?"
"Yes, I was assured there was a nice base and we might even get a flurry or two as we're still in the snowy season. Next week we'll go to the South Island." That was all he spilled on the details. He wanted to surprise his bride with the fact they would be spending a few days at a Muggle bed-and-breakfast in Christchurch close to the botanical garden, including a romantic picnic while punting on the River Avon, before spending the last days of their honeymoon in a wizarding village on Stewart Island.

Severus went over to the ice box in the kitchen area of the large one-room cabin – well, mostly one room as the toilet, shower, and sink were in a separate walled-off area, but the large tub for two was in the living room area for easy placement with a wand for soaking in right in front of the fire. Looking in the icebox, he was pleased it had everything he stipulated when he made the reservation through a wizarding travel agency over in Honolulu. There was even the right brand of champagne ready and chilled.

After putting the wedding cake in the ice box, he grabbed a couple glasses before popping the cork on the champagne. As he was busy doing that, Hermione did a quick unpack charm.

"Did you tell your parents about my wedding present to you?" Severus asked Hermione as she put away their toiletries in the small bathroom.

"No, I didn't get a chance," she answered, her voice carrying out easily to Severus in the next room. "And given we originally agreed that we wouldn't go through the bother of fretting over what to get each other, it would have felt a bit awkward to tell them you got me something while I got you nothing. And that doesn't include the ruby necklace and earrings you got me. How does one come up with a present comparable to two acres of prime land?" she asked rhetorically. Hermione was still rather overwhelmed. Severus had Side-Along Apparated them on the eve of their wedding to his farm on the west side of the island to announce to her that he’d bought the adjoining two acres for her to do with as she willed. Stunned and thrilled was putting her reaction mildly.

"Well, I did surprise you with it last night, so it wasn't like you had time the morning of our wedding day to pop on out and get something last-minute," he conceded.

In fact Hermione did come up with an idea that morning, but wanted to wait until now to surprise him with it.

Hermione emerged from the bathroom in her silk floor-length Slytherin green nightgown edged with silvery gray lace, her ropes of pearls, the henna tattoos that still adorned her hands, wrists, and feet, and nothing else.
Severus stopped in his tracks entranced by the vision of his bride giving him a come-hither look in her silk nightgown that he loved to slip her out of. The sight of her hair cascading around her shoulders just completed the alluring vision before him, in addition to clearly seeing the outline of her nipples standing out against the silk, casting slight shadows.

"There is one present I thought I could give you, but I'm not sure how it could compare," she said, a bit shyly.

She slunk over to her husband and plucked one of the flutes from his hand and replaced the flute with a vial containing a pale, clear liquid. Hermione looked up at him questioningly, trying to gauge his reaction to her present to him.

Severus swallowed hard, more nervous than when he asked her to marry him or the night she showed up on his doorstep after her anniversary dinner with Weasley in that red dress, but it was also the perfect present, if she was indeed suggesting what she did with this vial in his hand.

"I said you didn't have to decide now—" he began to question her decision, but was stopped short with a soft finger upon his lips.

"I have been thinking about it for a while. And if I'm so willing to drink pomegranate juice to bind myself to you in one way, then what is there to stop me from wanting to bind myself to you completely as your wife with children?" she asked him as she gazed up into his face that looked down at her in amazement and growing happiness. She tossed the flute of champagne down her throat and quickly set down her glass.

Severus matched her action and drank his in one quick go. Then he set the empty flute and the unopened vial of contraception potion Hermione never took that morning on the table before scooping her up in his arms.

It was a bruising kiss. Hermione felt she would nearly drown in it, the way his arms held her so tight and his mouth demanded so much that she surrendered to his every desire. She mewled with want from his ferocity.

The bed had been strewn with flower petals in anticipation of the bridal couple's arrival, but they didn't even make it the few extra feet and instead wound up on the couch in front of the roaring fire. Both sets of hands went to work on removing Severus' clothes completely before he took the extraordinary pleasure of peeling the green silk away from his bride's skin, leaving the pearls to caress her skin along with his fingertips.

The pair already perched on the couch, Hermione was ready for him as she threw a leg around his waist and drew him between her legs. She was willing to keep the foreplay brief since she was already aching for him, having taken the Lubrication Potion when she changed.

"Are you prepared with the idea of getting pregnant on our honeymoon? Ready to jump into parenthood right after marriage?" he asked. He spoke around a mouthful of nipple as he played with them and licked them teasingly, which made Hermione arch her back against the couch and grind her pelvis up against him harder as he knelt between her legs. He knew how Hermione liked to plan things and take her time with large decisions in her life. She stressed easily if things did not go according to her carefully laid-out schedule, which is why it seemed somewhat sudden, though she did indicate she had thought this over carefully.

"We've been playing house as if we were married in everything but the rings and license for the past year and a half," she assured him. "It's not as if we didn't have some time to settle into our lives together. Trust me, I'm ready," she growled playfully as she hooked an ankle around him and with her legs drew him forward, which caused him to canter forward.

If having a backyard full of screaming kids all day no longer fazed Severus, he knew he was certainly ready for children as well.

Alternating between kissing her neck and suckling at her breasts, he slipped a hand down between her legs and toyed with her a bit. With his teeth lightly capturing her nipple, he smiled up at her and she gazed back with begging need. This time, he wanted to make her beg. With a thumb slowly circling her clit, he slipped two finger inside of her and found the spot that made her sing her cries of exultation.

"Please, Severus, I need you! Fill me, take me..."

Severus was not willing to relent to her pleas, as delicious as they were to his ears.

Hermione could feel herself close, and she wanted Severus to be inside of her for her first orgasm on their wedding night. "Please, Severus, I want you inside of me." Realizing that he could quickly counter that he was technically inside of her with his fingers, she added, "I want to feel more of you. I want you inside of me now." The end of her plea morphed into a keeling wail.
Severus was happy to oblige. Keeping his two fingers inside of her, he pressed the head of his cock to slide just below his fingers and press at her entrance.

Hermione's eyes momentarily widened, realizing what he was about to do and nodded her head minutely giving him permission, as her body was willing and wanting.

Carefully, Severus slid himself into with slow and shallow strokes, going deeper each time while his two fingers remained inside of Hermione, palpitating her G-spot. They had done this a few times before, and he knew to proceed slowly so her body could accept the extra girth without discomfort.

Once seated into her, Severus began to slide in and out, his fingers continuing their work to add extra pleasure for Hermione.

Eye shut tight, Hermione reveled in the feeling of being stretched while fucked. It didn't take very long for her to crest and squeeze around him as she came, the experience heightened with the pressure on her G-spot. She froze momentarily as she bellowed, a sign that it was a particularly powerful orgasm that would paralyze her until she finally came down.

Now her appetite fully unleashed and hungrier for her husband than before, Hermione bucked against him, her back pressed against the cushions propped behind her back as Severus knelt on the floor in front of the couch. He removed his fingers before he began plowing into her with feral abandon. Her sweet cries of ecstasy and the sight of her breasts jiggling and bouncing with each forceful thrust of his nearly pushed him over the edge, but he would be damned if he would orgasm so quickly on their wedding night. In order to change positions and stop himself from peaking too soon, Severus pulled Hermione off the couch. He lay on his back, feeling the warm woolen rug against his skin heated by the fire that danced with bright yellow flames, matching their passion.

Hermione mounted him and rode him.

She could tell from the way Severus shut his eyes tight, he was close to orgasmming and that's why he changed positions. Hermione loved how he would try and prolong his first orgasm for as long as possible, trying to make her cum as often as possible before finally seeking his own release, even with the aid of the Sequoia potion to restore his vigor and continue on as before. As she sat astride him, she rolled her hips back and forth and loved the way his eyes would roll up into his head with she rotated her hips just right and would make him arch his own back against the rug. His eyes now opened, she cast him a glance that could set ice afire and she licked her lips and let one hand casually play with one of her nipples, knowing he loved to watch her play with herself. The sight of pearls swaying and caressing her skin as she rode him added to the eroticism of the moment.
Sitting up as she continued to rock against him, he reverently whispered, "My queen." With little imagination, he could envision Hermione bedecked with more jewels and a grand diamond tiara set upon her glorious mane.

She loved it when he called her that and began to ride him harder. As his eyes were ablaze with desire for her, his face half-lit by the glow of the fire, lost in the throes of passion is when she found him most starkly beautiful. "My dark angel lover," she called to him.

He loved her pet name for him in the midst of their carnal feasts. She had said when in the middle of making love there was another worldly beauty about him that was transfixing. And though he knew he was not the most handsome of men, to her in those moments, he was the most alluring and beautiful of all men to her.
Spurred on by her, he quickly lifted her off and turned her around to mount her from behind. He was her dark angel lover, who would protect her and cherish her for all eternity, in this realm and all other planes of existence. The front of his thighs slapped against the backs of hers, and he rammed himself into her deeply.

Hermione howled with pleasure, feeling as if Severus would shake her apart at the joints with each savage thrust as he fucked her with animal-like intensity. She was so close again. The sweat was dripping off of her brow, especially with the searing heat of the fire added to their rigorous act of consummating their marriage.

Severus could hear how close she was, and he wasn't going to hold out much longer. He leaned forward and braced one hand on the ground while his other hand sought out Hermione's clit to stroke and bring her to completion soon.

It didn't take but a few seconds of Severus' deft finger-work as she bucked against him before an orgasm ripped through her with a scream torn from her throat. She shuddered and could feel herself tighten around him as Severus let out a groan of release that he had finally let himself join her. He clutched onto her around the waist and held her still as he thrust his hips into her, pushing his seed deep into her. They could almost feel the completion of the pomegranate juice sow threads of magic between each other, ensuring their binding was once again complete with this final act.

Both gasping for air, they collapsed on the rug in front of the fire, both lightly coated with sweat. The rug was not as soft as they'd imagined and so they both hauled themselves, with great difficulty, back up onto the couch to catch their breaths. The air hit their knees, and they both discovered they had rug burns on them now. Fortunately they had a salve in their standard kit that could take care of that, but it would be later – once they stopped panting as if they had run a marathon since they were at an altitude of over eight-thousand feet and the air was much thinner than they were used to. Fortunately, Severus had packed an altitude adjustment potion for the trip, but he had not gotten around to fetching it before his wife inspired him to attack.

Hermione cuddled up next to her husband, brushing a sweat-drenched tendril away from his eyes, glad she was able to convince him to wear his hair a bit shorter. While she loved playing with his long hair, the slightly shorter layered haircut that came half-way between his ears and shoulder was much more flattering, especially with the beard he still kept to her delight, while still holding to societal convention that he keep his hair a little on the long side until he was at least fifty. The only reason she convinced him to cut his hair was during a recent round of Polyjuice play where she experimented on cutting her hair, while in Severus' form, at varying lengths until they found a length they both agreed was better than his longer hair that had grown all the way to the middle of his back.
For a brief moment Hermione thought about saying they should go for another round to make sure they that consummated their marriage, but they had been consummating for over a year before the ceremony, and it was a bit too corny, even for her. Instead, she just sighed and smiled sweetly at Severus.

"I love you... my husband," she sighed with great satisfaction.

Severus smiled openly back at her and tucked a stray curly tendril behind her ear that was getting rather frizzy due to low humidity from the cold and high altitude. "And I love you... my beautiful bride. My wonderful wife."

Hermione gave a slight purr of contentment and put her head back on his chest.

"Are you ready for a bit of cake?" Hermione asked a bit too eagerly, ready to fulfill her promise of eating every crumb off of him and making good use of her mouth wherever needed.

"Depends, are you ready for about two more hours of consummating our marriage?" Severus said, somehow having read Hermione's thoughts moments before as he summoned a vial of Sequoia and two vials of the altitude adjustment potion with his wand while Hermione got up to fetch the cake from the icebox. They would certainly need their stamina to breathe at such high altitude to survive the effects of the Sequoia potion so they could continue to express their joy at the prospect of being together for the rest of their lives.

For Hermione and Severus, it seemed that living happily ever after was not going to be an improbable thing to attain after all.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Yeah! They are married. How long will marital bliss last? And what happens when kids enter the picture. One more chapter left, the epilogue, and hopefully I can answer those questions.

Thank you to my ever fabulous betas: JuneW and Hope.

NSFW fan art of Severus and Hermione making love in front of the fire, by Hassly (http://hassly.deviantart.com/), commissioned by me, "His Queen and Her Demon Angel Lover: As They See Each Other." Yes, I realize I forgot to include the henna tattoos when I commissioned this. Oh well. You can also view it on my Tumblr page here: https://atdlhea-betz.tumblr.com/
Epilogue: "Darling, Something Has Come Between Us"

Chapter Summary

Ten years later, the Snape family travels back to England for a visit.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter 118: Epilogue
"Darling, Something Has Come Between Us"

Disclaimer: Yeah, last fucking disclaimer! Rowling and various corporate entities own Harry Potter, I don't, I'm just playing with them for your and my non-revenue-generating amusement. There, DONE!

============

As Hermione sat staring at her mug of tea, she heaved a troubled sigh. Glancing up, she looked at her husband, who sat far away at the other end of the table.

With her mouth pulled into a moue, she said with some great somberness, "Darling, something has come between us." There was a tired look in Hermione's eyes as she cast them down at the gulf between husband and wife.

Severus looked at his wife sitting at the other far end of the table, appearing a bit forlorn. He gladly would have slid right over across the long bench, and held her in his arms, but two of their three children on whom Hermione cast her gaze were sitting between them filling up that vast space, thus keeping them momentarily apart.

It was Hermione's subtle line indicating that though she loved their children, she needed a bit of T.L.C. from her husband all by herself, away from the kids. Last night they were hoping to have a night alone, but alas, their youngest, Albert – named after Hermione's Potions master and friend, who had passed away about a year before his namesake was born – decided that the rooms at the Leaky Cauldron smelled funny, the building creaked and the ghost in the room he was going to share with Kaimi was a bit too scary. So of course, that meant their four-year-old son demanded to sleep with his parents. No amount of assurances that the ghost was friendly or that all old buildings made noises could convince Albert to sleep in the room he was going to share with Kaimi. The youngest Finau child had agreed to come along for the trip to England for a free Portkey ticket, meals, lodging, and all expenses paid while coming out for a job interview at Hogwarts; all she had to do was play nanny to the kids while along for the trip.

It was strange for Albert to be afraid of ghosts, as he had befriended some during the many trips abroad that his parents brought him along, as well as sleeping in many a dusty, drafty and creaky old temples, palaces, and manors. He was a sensitive child who was highly attuned to the emotions of family members, especially his parents. It was probably their apprehension of coming back to England for the first time since Albert Dobmeir's funeral that spurred him to cling so tightly to their sides, sensing his parents' own fears of returning.

Kaimi, who was twenty now, picked up on the subtle exchange between Mr. and Mrs. Snape. "I can always take the kids out sightseeing for the day if need be so you have a chance to rest," she said delicately.

"We may take you up on that." Severus scrubbed his face with his hands, thinking if he and Hermione did have a few hours, instead of making love, they might just drop off to sleep instead. Hermione had to sing Zhubanysh's old lullaby to Albert for nearly half an hour before he dropped off the night before, long after his father had already been lulled to sleep by his wife's sweet voice.

They did take their Portkey Lag Potions when they arrived the night before, but it had been a trying few months for both the Snapes. Hermione was finishing training the new Operations Manager at the Malu Palekaiko facility before her week-long trip away, given that Draco was back in England with his family that week too and would not be there to supervise in her stead. Not to mention, one of their children had had a case of Troll Flu about six weeks prior; it threw everyone's schedule off for a while with her constant need for care until she was over the worst of it.

Severus also had quite the harrowing week. Jerry, who still tutored part-time at his shop when he wasn't teaching at the local academy, was laid up in the clinic. When a Peruvian Vipertooth dragon came to nest in the caldera the previous week, the beast decided to investigate the activity in the town and started climbing down the volcano mountainside towards the town. Jerry, as he had done in the past when a dragon got too curious, has transfigured into a dragon in order to lure the beast away from the town, and – if need be – out to sea to encourage it with its migration towards southern Chile. What he didn't count on was the dragon was male and that a female was approaching the island, intent with mating with the dragon roosting there. The pair were out of their usual mating area, which was normally Easter Island, since breeding pairs met halfway between Chile and Malu Palekaiko on their migration to and from Japan.

The male dragon suddenly decided it wanted to battle for the genetic supremacy of mating with the female, even though Jerry's transfigured form was of a different dragon breed entirely. Jerry, who was not familiar with mating habits of all three dragon breeds that visited the island during migrations, ducked down his head and the leading edge of his wings, exposing the tops of hi wings; he was thinking this was an act of submission, and that the other male had won the right to breed with the female. That might have worked with a Japanese Imperial Dragon or a Chinese Fireball, but with a Peruvian Vipertooth, it was a challenge to battle, a posture a Peruvian Vipertooth male would take before launching himself at the challenging male.

It resulted in Jerry taking to wing and flying as fast as his could out on a southwest vector, closer to the normal breeding grounds. And to Jerry's detriment, he learned that though he might transfigure into a dragon, he was not entirely fireproof from other dragons. Mounga had followed on a broom with a Portkey to bring him to the clinic. Mounga was able to catch Jerry before he fell into the ocean, too tired to remain in his transfigured form any longer after flying till his wings ached and his heart nearly burst from exhaustion while suffering from some moderate burns.

Those in the clinic, especially Rainbow, who treated him for burns, were sworn to secrecy of Jerry's particular Animagus form, since they were able to piece together how that third dragon mysteriously appeared on the island to draw the two dragons away.

Severus was drawn away from his own thoughts of his co-worker and friend when Hermione asked Kaimi, "Since Albert didn't sleep with you, you must have had a chance to prepare for your interview for the Herbology opening?"

"Actually, I was too excited to review my notes and latest journals, and so I went downstairs for a couple pints last night." Kaimi poked at her breakfast distractedly. "In fact, some Irish dude was seriously picking up on me. Shawn... no Seamus. Seamus Flaherty... Finnoley--"

"Seamus Finnigan," Hermione corrected her tartly.

"Yeah, that's it. You know him?" Kaimi asked, her smile brightening as she plopped her chin in her hand with her elbow on the table, just like her mother did. She was suddenly energized despite the lack of caffeine after earlier complaining about the quality of the coffee in England, calling it "lamprey quality, because it sucked so badly."

"Yes. Stay away from him," Hermione warned sternly, recalling his rude comments after her divorce from Ron.

"Whoa. You must have gone to school with him for you to dislike him that badly," she replied with an amused chuckle to see her Aunt Hermione take on such a sour disposition so quickly by the mention of a name alone. "Well, don't worry. He had desperation coming off of him in waves, like some sleazy lounge lizard on the prowl."
Severus nodded, pleased his favorite niece still had more horse sense than her older sister when it came to some wizards. At least Akela had the good sense to hold on to Tristan when he came along in her life, instead of pining her days away for that no-good Ulrich boy who had fathered a few bastards on the island out of wedlock, much to the distress of his wife, Kiki. The Snapes and Kaimi were planning on swinging through Salem on the way back home towards the end of their trip to visit Akela, Tristan, and the new baby.

"So when do you think Draco and Ginny will show up? Today?" Kaimi asked, as they had spent the night at the Leaky Cauldron since the Malfoys were delayed coming back to England for a few days. There was a last-minute rescheduling to meet with the psychologists, counselors, and school officials regarding Libra back in Hawaii. It seems transitioning to a Muggle school for a Squib could be just as difficult as a Muggle-born to a wizarding school during their first year.

"Tomorrow. They assured me they will be back in time to meet Phoenix and Sebastian when they get off the Hogwarts Express when it arrives tomorrow evening, but we'll have to spend one more night here, since Malfoy Manor is closed until the Master and Mistress return," Severus explained.

This news was met with cheers from their daughters Gabrielle and Viola, but only made Albert snuggle against his mother's side in search of comfort, not enjoying the "charming and old-world rustic attributes" of the pub that was over five-hundred years old.

Gabrielle, who had her mother's curious brown eyes and brown hair that was tamed a bit by her father's genes, asked, "So the party at Malfoy Manor will still happen, and I'll be able to ask Phoenix and Sebastian about their first year at Hogwarts then?"

"Yes," Hermione assured their eldest daughter. "The party will happen, and you'll have a chance to ask them. And you can ask Devlin and Michael about taking their N.E.W.T.s as well."

Some months after Hermione was granted sanctuary, Severus began asking her very specific details about the woman who met her on the path towards what they referred to as the Valley of Death. It was with a viewing in a Pensieve that Severus' thoughts were confirmed, identifying the woman as his dead first wife. Three months after their wedding when Hermione discovered she was pregnant, she asked him if it was a girl whether they could name her after Severus' first wife, for it was Gabrielle who pointed her in the right direction so that they could be rejoined.

The whole reason why Hermione and Severus finally decided to return to England was for the fact that Gabrielle was nine, and would soon have the choice of starting wizarding school at the local academy when she turned ten, or attending Hogwarts like her parents did when she turned eleven. This trip was for Gabrielle to weigh the options of going to a school far, far away on the other side of the world with the reputation as being one of the world's best schools, or to stay in Hawaii and go to the local academy where all her friends would be but the education and prestige were not as august. And while she would not be without friends, as Phoenix and Sebastian were three years older, and there was a whole brood of Weasleys infecting the school who would stick up for their "cousin," there was the aspect of being far away from immediate family to think of. Regarding the quality of her education, should she stay in Hawaii, with Severus and Hermione's endless work on the Board of Governors to improve the quality of teaching and the curriculum, she would be well-educated to be sure. The school was rising up through the ranks of notable academic institutions. And then there was the fact she was a Snape, so she would be tutored to excel above and beyond the standard requirements needed to pass her classes, if she was anything like her parents, which she was in that regard.

This trip was not just for Gabrielle to weigh her options, but for Hermione and Severus to see if they could deal with the thought of their daughter being away in England, a country they both fled due to prejudices, injustice, violence, and the deep lingering after-effects of the war. Draco and Ginny had been back to England many times; they themselves were somewhat hesitant to let their children attend Hogwarts, but noticed that as time passed, life did somewhat resume a sense of normalcy. For example, Victory Day was now being celebrated more with sales signs in window shops along Diagon Alley than as a day of somber remembrance of those who perished and those who fought against bigotry and tyranny. Even the numbers who attended Victory Day speeches by the fountain in the Ministry atrium had dwindled over the years to the point that those who regularly attended were those who had fought the hardest and lost the most. It seems Alan Parker was right in the respect that people had moved on to forget dark days of the past, to only wanting to remember better times.

Viola, who had her father's dark locks but blessed with some waves and body from her mother's side, asked, "Kaimi? Why didn't you go to Hogwarts?" The child's ice-blue eyes blinked up at her favorite babysitter curiously; she had the same striking blue eyes Severus' great-grandmother, Septima Snape, once had. Between her wavy raven locks, striking eyes, and delicate features, Severus knew he would be chasing the boys off with a Beater's bat and setting some very stringent wards on his daughter's window when she was older.

"That's because I'm not a British citizen. You, Gabrielle, and Albert are. Your parents never gave up their citizenship, even though they live in Hawaii. So of course since you are British citizens, you'll get a letter with an offer to attend Hogwarts, just like Phoenix and Sebastian did," she informed her charges with great authority, knowing how these things worked.

It was when Libra's letter to Hogwarts never arrived, Draco and Ginny's fears their daughter was a squib were confirmed. They even Portkeyed to Scotland and talked directly to Headmistress Sprout to make sure that the letter was in no way lost, as it would have gone half-way around the world via albatross.
Albert poked at his porridge sullenly. "Mummy, isn't there any fresh fruit or rice for breakfast?"

Severus looked over at his son's breakfast and looked down at his, noticing he'd barely touched his own. "Would you care for my eggs and sausage instead?" he offered Albert.

His son eagerly nodded his head and gladly swapped breakfasts. Severus was in the mood for something lighter than what he'd ordered, not realizing his own stomach would be in knots from the trip and the constant sense of tension. His hand was always at the ready to grab his wand and defend his wife and family at a moment's notice, given Hermione's reason for seeking sanctuary years earlier.

Last night as they checked into the Leaky Cauldron, Severus had been approached by a witch with a frantic look in her eye. It was when she shoved a copy of Severus Snape's Home Brew Tips: Volume Four that he realized she was not a threat bent on eradicating the ex-Death Eater due to some longstanding grudge, but a fan of his newspaper Potions brewing column seeking an autograph on her copy. Severus' column had quickly turned from a weekly column to a daily one with publication in many of the English-language wizarding newspapers around the world within five years. It pleased him that in the latest poll in the United States and Europe he was far more famous than Gilderoy Lockhart, who was still a permanent resident at St. Mungo's.

Knowing of his own fame – of the good kind – still did not ease the fear that there were those who remembered him under less respectable circumstances. There were many still roaming about Great Britain who were sympathetic to the Dark Lord, and who might view him as the traitor who turned the tide against the greater good of wizardkind, much like Alan Parker.

Kaimi looked at the breakfast fare on the table, and her own kippers that did not live up to her expectations, and muttered to herself, "I would Crucio or A.K. for a bagel, cream cheese, and lox." It was a popular breakfast item at the Ohana Family Diner upon Jerry's insistence they include the New York breakfast staple on the menu, and it was one of Kaimi's favorites.

Severus glared at Miss Finau, not particularly caring for that particular slang phrase that was popular among the young set of witches and wizards on the island, making light of two of the three Unforgivables. Upon seeing Severus' pointed look, she quickly apologized.

To change the mood that had suddenly grown a bit gloomy, Kaimi brightly asked, "Why don't we let your mom and dad have a chance to take care of boring things today while the four of us go have some fun. What would you guys like to do today?"
"Florean Fortescue's Sybaritic Mountainous Matterhorn Sundae!" Gabrielle shouted, as she was as much if not more of a chocolate fan than her mother.

Hermione's stomach turned at the thought of a rich chocolate dessert so early in the morning. She had ordered toast for breakfast and had barely nibbled at it and sipped at her tea. Her own nerves were somewhat frazzled at the fact she was back in England after leaving the country in haste eleven years ago.

"That's not something to do, but we can put it on the itinerary – after lunch." Kaimi took a swig of her coffee and winced, put off by the bitter and acid taste compared to the Kona coffee she was spoiled on growing up.

"Flourish and Blotts?" Viola suggested.

"That big fat Ferris wheel?" Albert said, now less attached to his mother's side, being swept up in the excitement of sightseeing. "And the Knight Bus?"

Severus gave a short laugh at his son's suggestion that a purple triple-decker bus would be something in which to visit on purpose. The rest of wizarding Britain viewed it as a mode of transportation to be avoided at all costs unless absolutely necessary as a last resort.

Kaimi conjured parchment, quill, and ink with her wand, and began scribbling down suggestions for the day.

"Hogsmeade!" Gabrielle added.

"We'll go to Hogsmeade together as a family later this week. Today I would prefer if you all stick around London," Severus recommended firmly.

Kaimi understood his concerns, replying, "Not a problem." Turning back to the children, she excitedly added, "There is so much to see and do around here, we won't even have to Floo anywhere."

"Ooh! What about London Bridge?" Viola suggested
"The one that fell down?" Albert queried, wondering if it was the same one from the nursery rhyme.

"No, no, the tall one," Viola clarified, not knowing the exact name.

"Oh, you mean Tower Bridge," Hermione corrected her.

"Yeah, that one! I hear you can even walk along the top between the two towers."

Kaimi wrote that one down as well for ideas. "Sure. And the Tower of London is right next to it. Do you want to see that too?"

"No," Gabrielle declined, making a face she was not impressed or inclined to visit that place. "Naomi said the Crown Jewels were pretty tiny actually, and the ghosts are sort of surly."

The mention of more ghosts who were less than friendly sent Albert burrowing into his mother's side once more for security and comfort. He was only four and still very much a little boy who would only be starting at the new kindergarten and elementary school next year.

It had taken a while for the town to accept the idea of letting a formal institution teach children basic reading, writing, and math during formative years before starting wizarding school. However, given how many witches worked at either the busy resort on the west side of the island or at the Lovely Lavender facility and didn't have the time to teach their children themselves, it was welcomed.

"That sounds like a full day." Hermione patted Albert's hip and gave him a buss on the top of his head.

Gabrielle turned her attention to the growing list next to her parents across the table. "Mum, Dad, will you show us where you lived in Diagon Alley before you moved to Hawaii?"

"Sure, it's not that far from H.Q.," Hermione assured her, referring to The Lovely Lavender Company world headquarters, "but not today."
Albert, sensing his mother's fatigue, asked, "Are you both okay, Mummy?"

"Yes, your father and I are fine." She patted her son on his hip again, slightly puzzled by the slightly frustrated look on Albert's face. "We've just had a long week and would like to take a breather before the party commences at Malfoy Manor, celebrating the first of the next generation of Weasleys graduating Hogwarts," Hermione said with a bit of wariness hoping she could avoid speaking or running into her ex-mother-in-law all night long.

Noticing that no more breakfast would be eaten, Kaimi announced in a slightly theatrical tone, "Well, if everyone has their brollies and jackets, in case of rain, let's get going and see if we can beat the crowds at the London Eye. And we need to be back here by four, as your mother has an appointment to take you girls with her to Madam Mandel's."

Since there was going to be a party at Malfoy Manor, Hermione figured it was a good excuse as any to get a few good dresses for the girls for the party and several good new dresses for herself. She no longer fit the dresses she bought years ago; her body changed due to age, a little extra padding Severus was glad she was finally sporting that added to her curves, and three pregnancies.

After making sure that Kaimi had enough Muggle money for fees, lunches, Tube fare and such for everyone, plus souvenirs, Hermione told them to stop before they headed out the door.

Reaching into her blouse, she pulled out her Auror's necklace she promised Harry she would wear any time she came back to England. She had worn it for when she came back for Albert's funeral and alerted Harry she'd wear it for her return this trip.

"Here. Put this on. I will feel better if you have this with you just in case. Just call out in your mind for Harry and he'll come if you need anything, like if Albert wanders off again," Hermione recalled that rather fretful time he toddled off when she took the kids to the mall in Honolulu to go Christmas shopping last December. Albert didn't want to be found since he was busy enjoying himself at the mall toy store, which made locating him much harder.

Kaimi already knew how it worked and didn't exhibit any impatience when having it explained to her again, understanding a mother's concern. "Are you sure, because--"

"I'll have Severus with me. I'll be safe." Hermione squeezed Severus' hand as they stood side-by-side, the parents already having given strict orders to their children to obey Kaimi while they were out and about, and warnings that any mischief would certainly be reported back to them.
Viola and Albert demanded hugs and kisses before leaving. Gabrielle was too excited to finally be in England to think of giving her parents a farewell before tromping off into the big city on some grand adventure.

Before they left, Albert decided his mother needed one extra kiss goodbye before he readily clasped his hand in Kaimi's and they were off.

As Hermione dragged herself upstairs back to their rooms, Severus informed Tom the barman they'd need the rooms for one more night. They would have stayed at Lavender and Ron's place, but the house was currently under renovation. Besides, Severus felt odd at the idea boarding at the home of Hermione's ex-husband and his former employer.

Hermione had almost dozed off by the time her husband followed her into the room shortly behind her.

"Albert seemed quite concerned for you. Are you feeling all right?" Severus asked as he toed off his boots, pulled off his long frock coat, and crawled onto the bed to curl up behind his wife, rubbing her back with the flat of his palm along her spine. He had learned to pay attention to his son since he seemed to have a certain sixth sense about things that later proved to bear out.

"Yes, I suppose," she sighed, giving a soft moan of appreciation of his hands caressing her back in a mix of reassurance and therapeutic need. "Weeks of worrying that we'd arrive and find an angry mob to greet us came to nothing, thank goodness."

Severus remembered her nightmares that manifested and woke him with her shouts in the middle of the night once they’d agreed to come back to England. There were a few times he had to sing a song of his love to calm her down and keep the nightmares away, her apprehension about returning growing as the departure date arose.

"I'm just feeling pretty tired as of late. Long nights, training Yvonne, the new Operations Manager. I mean, she proved herself by working her way up through the various divisions, but I'm still a bit nervous. But there is the mirror in Lavender's office if anything arises, so I shouldn't worry. And thank God for hired elves, or we would have been eating Floo take-away every night this week." And then there was the fact they didn't even have the time or energy to go to the hot springs the Wednesday before to soak their aches away.

Severus gave his own sigh of exhaustion and threw an arm over Hermione's ribs to snuggle up closer to her. "It didn't help that Jerry's accident occurred right when Pat took off for two week to go take care of Orin's family as the baby came a few weeks early. But I was able to wrap up and reschedule everything so I could shut the shop down entirely, since Jerry won't be there to tutor."

Smiling to herself, Hermione bumped back against Severus groin playfully. "Think there's enough fire under that cauldron to get in one lazy tussle?"

"Did you pack any Sequoia, because after the long couple weeks we've both had and Albert rabbit-kicking me in the kidneys and ribs for half the night, I don't have the energy unless I get a boost," he ruefully admitted.

Hermione made an exaggerated grunt as if her wand was made of lead as she halfheartedly made an attempt to Summon a vial, but she let her hand and wand flop back down on the bed with a groan of defeat. "How about a nap and then a shag?" she mumbled with her face half smothered in a pillow.

Severus did have just enough energy to cast a spell to undress them both and tuck them under the bedclothes to sleep in the nude. They figured the children would not be back for at least six hours, so hopefully that would give enough time for a rejuvenating nap and a full round of much overdue intimacies, since it had been almost two weeks.

~~~~~~~*~

Since it was just a family gathering and a few friends of the various Weasley and the Malfoy children from school, it was a much more informal affair for the evening party. That still meant that wearing semi-formal attire or at least a nice set of dress robes was required at Malfoy Manor for the affair, instead of formal wear.

Severus and Hermione mingled as the children ran about, playing with their "cousins." While Hermione was no longer officially a Weasley after divorcing Ron, many in the Weasley family did still consider her part of the clan in a similarly adopted fashion as Severus was with the Finau family. Molly's, Percy's and Charlie's votes on the matter were informally overruled; however, they still ignored the ex-wife of Ron. Hermione and Severus kept their civil distance from the more contentious and unforgiving members of the Weasley family as they milled about.

Devlin and Michael, who were still thick as thieves, were both trying to put the moves on the lovely Miss Kaimi Finau.

The youngest of the Finau daughters had grown into a lovely witch in her own right. She was a mix of Polynesian goddess and Tongan-Amazonian warrior, with a very fit and femininely muscular frame she had built up with her aggressive Quidditch skills as a Seeker on the local amateur adult team back in Malu Palekaiko. She had been approached to play professionally, but after growing up with tales about the life of a Quidditch player from her Aunty Hermione, she decided to pursue Herbology as a career and keep the Quidditch playing as a hobby. For the fact she had been approached to play professionally only intrigued Michael and Devlin; the boys were thinking a witch who played Quidditch that well must be a Chinese Fireball in the sack, having learned the Weasley way of equating Quidditch skills into the bedroom.

Devlin, who stood up on the balls of his feet in order to appear taller while standing next to the six-foot-tall Miss Finau who towered over him, offered her a glass of champagne as Michael scrambled to get one into her hand before his rival.

Kaimi, who was amused to have two wizards vie for her affections, cast an amused glance over at Hermione, who merely shrugged at the droll situation. As Kaimi began dating a few years prior, Aunty Hermione and Aunty Gig-Gin both gave her some rather sage advice regarding young wizards, expectations, experience, and dating. Looking at these two young wizards who were a few years younger than her, she figured if anything, she could teach either of them a few things, though her own experience was rather limited. It was hard to find wizards in the Hawaiian Islands who dared to date the town judge's youngest daughter and the favorite niece of the formidable Potions master, Severus Snape, six-time Pele Festival Dueling Champion. Heaven help the wizard when Severus' god-daughters and own daughters came of age.

After accepting a glass of champagne from Michael, who at least was nearly as tall as her, she thanked him, patting him on the cheek, saying, "Owl me when you've learned to shave, iki kane." Then she glided off to talk with Draco, since he wanted to discuss with her about where he should build the orangery in the gardens.

Ginny, who stood next to Hermione and watched the exchange, laughed. "Maybe we taught her too well. What a man-eater," Mrs. Malfoy noted, watching how Michael and Devlin watched Kaimi with ephebic adoration as she glided away from them without a glance backwards.

"She has the good sense to avoid immature wizards," Severus praised his niece, announcing his presence to the pair of witches as he brought his wife a glass of champagne. He had his own good sense to not make any comment about the fact that both witches had not learned such lessons until they were much older, to their sorrow.

As the Snapes strolled around, they caught sight of Gabrielle in a corner with the Malfoy triplets and Josephine, no doubt exchanging the pros and cons of attending Hogwarts. One of those cons would be the reputation that preceded their names.

During the early part of the school year, Draco and Ginny had to personally Portkey all the way from Hawaii to Hogwarts to speak with Headmistress Sprout after Phoenix had sent Finch-Fletchley Jr. to the Infirmary to have his tongue reattached. Neither Ginny nor Draco saw any reason for their daughter to be censured or given detentions, given the fact the little Hufflepuff upstart said, "It served the Malfoy family right that a Death Eater would give birth to a Squib."

Of course Phoenix had a month's worth of detention that was school policy for such attacks on another student, and Finch-Fletchley Jr. had six weeks of detention for such a cruel and insensitive statement, inciting the incident to begin with. The rest of the Weasley clan backed their little Malfoy cousins, also feeling rather protective of Libra, who could not be there to defend her own name. Needless to say, the few Weasleys who were also sorted into Hufflepuff continued to make life Hell for Finch-Fletchley Jr. the rest of the year with various Treble-W "experiments" going off in the little shit's bed at all hours of the night, without getting caught as any Weasley worth their salt would. Given that there were twenty Weasleys attending Hogwarts at once, the school quickly learned the any attacks on their ickle firstie Malfoy cousins, verbally or by wand, would be dealt with swiftly and with prejudice.

Hermione took a sip of champagne and grimaced, setting it down finding the taste slightly off, before guiding her husband over to the buffet. Her appetite had returned now that it seemed that her presence back in England was a non-event, and no one would be out to get her, Severus, or their children. That still didn't mean she wanted to move back, given the fact she and Severus had fit into the community in Malu Palekaiko quite nicely and loved living there.

As Hermione wolfed down another canape, the twins ambushed the pair. "Got any more interesting books that you've 'translated' into English you'd like to publish?" George asked, as he came around Hermione's right side while Fred came up from behind Severus' left.

"There is no lack of... inspiration of source material; however, time and energy are limited with three young children in the house, something you're familiar with," Severus reminded the brothers.

"Your book..." Fred coughed to correct himself with deliberateness. "Sorry, Taichi Daikon's book of Japanese haiku, Dark Passions, is selling so fast we can barely keep up with demand." The Galleons flowing into the Snapes' vault in Hawaii told them as much.

Of course Fred and George knew that Hermione and Severus wrote that book of erotic haiku, sold under the alluring narrative that it was discovered in a long-forgotten cavern temple built where two lovers secretly met to consummate their forbidden passions, given the war between their clans. The collection of haiku was "supposedly" penned by the lovelorn wizard and his secret witch lover. This collection was eventually “accidentally” discovered centuries later by the Snapes as they searched for rare Potions ingredients while abroad and stumbled into the hidden sanctuary. Then the collection was faithfully translated by the couple.

Smiling up at her husband, she demurely said in Japanese,
"Falling petals twirl
A dance between two lovers
Drifting on a breeze"

Fred and George exchanged glances. "Is that one that can be translated with underage children around?" Fred asked warily.

Severus translated faithfully as he gave a smirk of triumph, knowing he could still inspire his wife since that was a new one he had not heard from her before. Severus and Hermione were not ones to spout poetry to each other, but they did enjoy the economy of contextually rich words of the Japanese language, imparting so much meaning, overt and subtle with a few syllables. It had become a game to them, which is how they eventually compiled their first attempt at publishing poetry under the nom de plume that roughly translated to "big/thick radish."

"Whew," George said prematurely before Severus launched into one he came up with suddenly upon recalling their long tryst in their room at the Leaky Cauldron the other day.

"Glistening nectar
Beckons bees to the flower
Sipping from her bloom"

From the knowing smile Hermione suddenly gave her husband, the twins knew better than to ask for a translation right there and then.

Just then, Lily Potter and Jessica Taylor barreled straight into Fred and George, asking their "uncles" for some trick or joke to give them to get back at their older brothers, James and Auberon.

"It's not fair Auberon has a wand and can give me little shocks, but I have to wait until I'm eleven until I can get a wand to get him back," Jessica whinged loudly as only a nine-year-old girl could. She had already started displaying signs of magic, and knew she'd attend Hogwarts one day.

Upon hearing Jessica's complaint echo across the room, Christine stormed across the ballroom, growling her son's name murderously under her breath, as he'd broken a cardinal rule of their house.

Fred pulled something out of his pocket, insisting, "Don't tell your mum where you got it. Say it fell out of Uncle Ron's pocket if you get caught."
"As her cousin, I did not hear that," Hermione feigned, while trying to stifle a giggle, somewhat pleased that the twins might put her ex in the doghouse with her Aunt.

Hermione had her own urchin suddenly clinging to her side. Albert, who had been circulating among the many blood and adopted cousins at the party, clutched onto her arm possessively, asking, "Are you both okay, Mummy?" Like all the Snape and Malfoy children growing up in Hawaii, they may address their parents with a British accent regarding their names, but the rest of what they said was pure American accent. This had also caused some teasing of Phoenix and Sebastian at Hogwarts from the other children for a while.

"Yes, Albert, I'm fine." She was wondering if she had fretted too much about this trip and caused her son to be overly concerned with his highly attuned senses. "And so is your father," she assured him, but then suddenly felt a bit faint. She asked Fred to take Albert for some dessert to distract him temporarily.

Severus noticed his wife clutching on to his arm a bit harder than usual and the way her eyes momentarily unfocused, a sign she hadn't been eating usually. He guided her to sit over on a richly upholstered antique Rococo récamier set into an alcove. It was unusual, since he had seen her eating well enough so that she did not have low blood sugar.

Ginny, the Healer in the family, spotted Hermione looking a bit unwell and went to investigate. She guided them to a nearby guest room where Hermione could properly lie down on a bed.

"Overdoing it again?" Ginny chastised her friend.

"You know me," Hermione drawled sarcastically. This earned a warning glare from her husband, all too familiar when his wife over committed herself.

Ginny waved her wand over Hermione, since some of the children at the party were getting over a dose of the Troll Flu and still might have been contagious. And with stress, one was naturally less immune, even if Hermione did not catch Viola's sickness that had struck about six weeks prior and caused the child to be bedridden for a whole week.

Hermione did not like the brief frown that tugged at the corner of her friend's lips. Perplexed, Ginny did a few more spells, resulting in her eyebrows rising up in surprise.
"When were you due?" Ginny plainly asked.

"Due what?" Hermione asked and then froze, suddenly understanding the question.

Hermione's mind raced back to when Viola had the Troll Flu and suddenly vomited violently all over her bedroom. That stopped Hermione just as she was about to take her contraceptive potion that week. Instead, she had to race to take care of her daughter, cleaning up the mess, bathing her daughter, and getting Severus to brew something while she sat by her daughter's bedside ready with a bucket. And it wasn't until Wednesday she remembered to finally take the contraceptive potion after she and Severus began alternating with the job of constantly tending to their daughter, but she did not think that taking it three days late would result in...

"I'm pregnant," Hermione realized aloud. Well, she had thought she skipped last week because of stress again, but hadn't bothered to check otherwise, given her propensity to skip when stressed. That answered the question of why she was late this month.

"What?" Severus asked. "How?"

Hermione found his question rather amusing, even considering how weak she was currently feeling, suddenly out of breath. "Well dear, you ought to know. You were there. And this isn't your first time at the rodeo," she ribbed him, using a favorite quote of Jerry's.

Severus didn't want to laugh, but allowed a smile to creep through. "What I meant was, despite all our careful planning--" He suddenly remembered Hermione telling him about delaying taking that one vial a few days late, but considering it had always taken three to six months for Hermione to get pregnant after going off contraceptives, neither thought that three days delay of one vial would make much difference, especially as Hermione was thirty-seven.

"So this isn't planned," Ginny realized, seeing the mixed look of surprise and shock on their faces. "I'll leave you two to talk alone."

It was early enough in the pregnancy where Hermione or Severus could brew something and end it. They had originally agreed to try for one of each, stopping at three if they had all boys or girls. Albert had been a bit of a relief, since Hermione did want to give Severus a son.

"What do you want to do," Severus asked, both knowing what the questioned implied.
"I don't know," Hermione admitted, a bit overwrought. "I mean, my Aunt Christine had Jessica when she was forty, Halulu was about my age when she had the twins." The tears suddenly swelled in her eyes, unsure if she could face either decision.

Severus pulled her into his arms and rocked her, unsure himself how he felt, though a bit secretly thrilled. One would never guess it, but Severus loved babies, especially his own. He loved singing to them, teaching them, reading to them, cuddling with them, watching them nurse at their mother's breast, seeing their faces light up with joy upon seeing their father and knowing he was loved so unconditionally, especially when those little arms trembled as they tried to hug him with all their might.

Looking up to gauge her husband's face, she asked seriously, "Can you handle another pregnancy?"

Due to the very deep bond Hermione and Severus shared through the pomegranate juice, Severus experienced a sympathetic pregnancy alongside his wife with each child. There were the mood swings, fatigue – which now explained why he himself was so knackered as of late if Hermione was indeed pregnant, the cravings, the backaches and such. The labor – oh, the labor. And while Hermione may have occasionally vomited from morning sickness, Severus did not, though he did find his stomach frequently unsettled during the first trimesters. Then there was the weight gain. During Hermione's pregnancy with Albert, the connection was so strong between them that Severus grew quite the pot-belly. The joke around the island questioned which between the two were actually pregnant. It had taken to swimming six days a week and some gentle weight-loss potions for Severus to fit back into his clothes after his son was born. As for Hermione's figure, she was still fairly fit, but he liked her with this slightly softer, curvier, lusher, and less hip-bone-clashing figure she sported after children.

Caressing her cheek with his hand, as he said the day they were married, "You don't have to decide today." She wanted his feedback, but ultimately he knew this was her choice. "But whatever you do, I still love you, and more so every day."

Their tender moment was interrupted when Albert burst through the doors, disturbing them from almost kissing.

"Albert," Ginny called out, as she had tried to stop their son from interrupting them, but the child could not be swayed and bolted right past his auntie.

"It's okay, Ginny," she assured her friend, who closed the door behind the child.

"I asked you if you were both okay, Mummy," Albert asked, looking a bit cross as he ran over to his parents.

"Your mother and I are fine," Severus said, trying to soothe his son.

"No, Daddy! Not you. Mummy and my baby brother," Albert corrected his father with a bit too much cheek for a four-year-old to possess.

"What?" his parents asked in unison.

Albert rolled his eyes and sighed with deep exasperation. "I said... are Mummy and the baby fine." He huffed and put his little fists on his hips, tired of being so easily dismissed when he asked a question he wanted answered.

Severus and Hermione looked at each other, stunned. Albert asked yesterday if they were "both" fine before Hermione went upstairs to collapse for a much-needed nap. She now understood his look of frustration when she'd assumed he meant his father as well. This evening he asked just before she felt faint and out of breath. Somehow their son knew of the impending child before even Ginny or themselves.

"How do you know there is a baby? And that it's a boy?" Hermione asked.

"Because I can hear him," Albert said, as if it was the most obvious thing in the world.

Hermione and Severus could only stare at each other, confounded how their son heard his baby brother who was probably no more than five or six weeks along, but given Albert's unusual talents, they did not question.

"Yes, the baby and I are fine. I'm just a bit tired, which is normal. I was tired and sometimes had to sit down or take a nap when I was pregnant with you, and the same with your sisters. We'll be okay." She soothed her son with a swipe of his dark hair out of his eyes and a kiss on the forehead. Albert returned the gesture with two kisses: one for his mum and one for the baby. It was something he did prior as well, giving his mother one extra kiss before going out sightseeing for the day.

Severus picked up his son in his arms, suggesting, "How about we let your mum rest for a bit. You and I can go look for some sparkling pumpkin juice," remembering how poorly his own body withstood alcohol during Hermione's previous pregnancies. He gave Albert a peck on the cheek, causing his son to throw his arms about and hug him tightly as they left the room and rejoined the party.

~~~~~~~~~

Hermione and Severus strolled arm in arm up the High Street in Hogsmeade, amused at their children's reaction to seeing Zonko's Joke Shop and Honeydukes Shop for the first time. Mrs. Snape shook her head, still trying to grasp what Ginny and Draco told them about Libra's test results at the party, after she had rested for a bit.

"I mean, I knew Libra was bright, but I never would have imagined," Hermione remarked with amazement. "An I.Q. of 172? I mean, Einstein was only recorded at what? 160? 165? And he was considered one of the greatest minds of the early Twentieth Century."

They ambled along a little further before Severus added his own conjecture. "I had a feeling that the problems she was having at school were not that she could not keep up, but that she was bored to tears and considered the work before her beneath her bothering to finish." Severus had felt similarly when he had some assignments in school regarding basic Potions scrolls his first few years, but Libra was years ahead of her peers in every discipline, even reading and writing.

"Now Ginny and Draco will be spending the summer looking for a Muggle school for gifted children, preferably along the West Coast, so that Libra can start in the autumn and be with others with whom she can hopefully relate to better. I didn't think she would have such trouble making friends her first year given how well she gets along with her siblings, our kids, and her friends on the island, but I can certainly empathize," Hermione recalled, her own first year making her stand out and remain friendless for the first few months due to her academic excellence.

Libra trouncing Severus at chess at the tender age of seven was one sign she was an exceptionally bright young girl. They played using the new chess set Hermione had bought for him, featuring a pair of younger Severuses that glared at the original human Severus in disgust that someone so young had beat him and almost refused to play a second game.

Since Severus' exoneration and knowledge of his work as a spy for the Order became common knowledge, new chess sets of the 20th century finally featured Severus as Albus Dumbledore's rooks, a symbolic gesture of Severus' spy work, since kings and rooks can both move in the same turn in a move called castling.

"I suppose when she started checking out college-level texts on astronomy from the public library in Hilo, that should have tipped us all off," Severus admitted with a sigh, acknowledging another sign of her keen intelligence.
After their wedding, Severus had built a telescope observation deck above the pergola. Hermione bought him a very nice refracting telescope their first Christmas after they were married. Often after an evening barbecue on the back deck, the Malfoy family would climb up the steps while Severus set up his telescope. He’d align it to view the planets and stars. Draco, Severus, and Hermione took turns telling stories to the children about the constellations, and why they moved across the sky, before letting each of the children look at the celestial bodies through the eyepiece.

Libra began asking questions which none of the adults could answer, and she had to start researching in Muggle books. When Libra asked about what the stars were made of, how did they know what they were made of, how far away they were, how did they measure that distance and why the stars were different colors, even they were slightly out of their depth. And when there was math in some of the higher-level books she read, she started asking for books from which to learn algebra, trigonometry, and the beginnings of calculus. Severus and Hermione were very good at Arithmancy, but some of the calculations she was starting to attempt were quite complex even for them. When Libra came across one old chemistry book in German when she was eventually introduced to the concept of spectronomy, she then asked to learn the language, which she picked up at a speed that even boggled Hermione who had only just learned it herself from Severus.

Ginny and Draco were thankful that Hermione, a Muggle-born who had two parents who were dentists, could give them some guidance on how to better instruct Libra, since she was so taken with the Muggle sciences.

As they approached the Three Broomsticks, they corralled their children inside with a promise to go shopping at Honeydukes before they went up to the castle to meet with Headmistress Sprout. It was kind of the Headmistress to let Gabrielle have a tour of the castle before deciding if she chose to attend Hogwarts or attend the academy close to home. Severus also wanted to talk with the Headmistress since he was on the Board of Governors back home and there was a proposal for the Malu Palekaiko Academy students to study a year abroad, and Hogwarts was a possible school to incorporate into the program.

Severus’ eyes scanned the crowded tables for someone, while his wife found a table for the six of them. He did not spot Kaimi among the patrons. Waiting for the last in their party to arrive, Severus turned to his eldest and asked, "So after speaking to your cousins last night, have you come closer to a decision of wanting to attend your mother's and my alma mater?"

Severus and Hermione offered to fill their children in on life at Hogwarts, but it seemed that Gabrielle was more interested in the opinion of her contemporaries rather than the nostalgic ramblings of her parents.
Gabrielle blew air out from between pursed lips and gazed up at the cobweb-strewn ceiling in thought. "Well, Phoenix said some of the kids were pretty snobby towards them, calling them 'Yanks,' and not in a good way. Then there was that whole thing with the tongue she hexed off. And you're not allowed to leave the castles on weekends until your third year? I mean, that's harsh. And then when you can go, it's only one weekend a month, and that's if you don't have detention," she added dramatically with a roll of her eyes. Viola and Albert sat there transfixed, hanging on every word their big sister said, forming opinions in their minds if they wanted to attend Hogwarts some day. "And if you don't mind the lack of fresh fruit selection, I mean seriously, no mangoes, no papaya? No fresh pineapple?"

Viola gasped with disbelief, "No."

"Yeah, I mean they had apples, pears, and oranges, and the pumpkin pasties and cakes. The turkey is pretty awesome, and the sausage and bacon amazing, but they said the coffee was gross," Gabrielle added with some disappointment. "Oh," she added with great dramatic preamble, "and no sushi!"

Viola made a face that said she didn't want to go to a school where she couldn't have sushi and fresh tropical fruits.

Then Gabrielle's eyes alighted, "But the ghosts are awesome and know all sorts of really cool stuff; the library puts Mum and Dad's library to shame. And the castle is, like, over a thousand years old, and huge! Phoenix sleeps in Gryffindor tower, and Sebastian said his room is in a dungeon under the Black Lake!"

"Cool!" Albert piped up.

Even Viola was having her opinion turned from dislike to keen interest.

"Remember, your father was Head of Slytherin House for many years," their mother reminded them of Severus' stories about Hogwarts.

"Oh, that's another thing. Depending on which House you get Sorted into, mentioning Dad can either be a good thing or a bad thing. Seems Phoenix got lip when she mentioned you to her House-mates, Dad, and she said how nice you were. They even gave her a hard time that her brother was sorted into Slytherin. It seems the Gryffindors still hate you, Dad."
Severus gave his wife a cool look. "Gee, Gryffindors, so brave of them to continue embracing their prejudices against other Houses."

"Oh, don't even go there," Hermione warned her husband with her tone and a look.

"It seems Dad deducted more points from Gryffindor House than any other teacher in the history of Hogwarts," Gabrielle clarified.

"Color me surprised," Hermione said with dry sarcasm staring blandly at Severus, which he returned with a triumphant smirk.

Before Hermione and Severus could begin a round of civilized fripping in front of their children, Madam Rosmerta swept by the table, looking just as lovely as ever, if not older from her graying hair. "Bless my soul! Hermione Weasley and Severus Snape."

"Mrs. Hermione Snape," Hermione said, holding up her left hand for inspection.

Madam Rosmerta's eyes scanned and registered the resemblance of the children sitting at the table to their parents in conjunction with the ring on Hermione's finger. "Well, considering the tripe that fish wrap called the Daily Prophet publishes, I wasn't sure if the rumors of you two getting hitched were true or not."

"Oh! Finally made it!" Kaimi huffed as she slipped into the sixth seat. "Man, what a haul from the castle all the way down here! Sorry, the interview went longer than anticipated."

"Madam Rosmerta," Hermione said with an indication of her hand, "this is Kaimi Finau, family friend, here with us to help watch the children while we visit England, and interviewing at Hogwarts for the open Herbology professor position."

"Muggle Studies," Kaimi said under her breath as she picked up a menu and glanced over the choices, looking for something not so grease- or butter-laden. "I'll have the chicken salad and a cold beer," Kaimi announced, ignoring the surprised looks from the Snapes.

Madam Rosmerta took orders for the rest of the table, getting introduced to each of the Snape children in the process.
As the pub owner walked away in a swish of her many skirts, Severus turned to their traveling companion and asked in a slightly confused tone, "And what is this about Muggle Studies?"

Kaimi drew a deep breath before exhaling and sitting up as straight as possible. "It seems," she began, indicating it was going to be a long story, "that Headmistress Sprout is reluctant to relinquish her precious greenhouses to someone who only just finished their apprenticeship, despite my years of experience before even starting my apprenticeship. And while my work breeding orchids impressed her, she wanted me to have more years experience before letting someone of my youth take over the very important position of teaching Herbology and maintaining her plants in the greenhouses." She let her breath finally out and took one more steadying breath before launching into the second part of her tale.

"However, it seems the Muggle Studies professor tendered his resignation yesterday in order to take a Ministry grant to study Muggle radio." Kaimi rolled her eyes, thinking that was a pretty Mickey Mouse subject to study given the plethora of other Muggle modes of communication available. "So when the Headmistress asked what I knew of Muggle studies, of course I launched into my experience. It seems not even the previous Muggle studies professor knew what a cellular phone – sorry, mobile – was," she said, accentuating the British word equivalent, "or had a driver's license, much less drove, and for the fact I have both, have driven before, have used computers, knew what the Internet was and have my own email account sealed the deal. So you are looking at the new Muggle Studies professor starting in the fall – sorry, autumn. And while I'm at Hogwarts, Sprout will let me continue on with my Herbology experience, and if the professor she has decided to pick chooses to leave after a few years, she will put me at the top of her list for his replacement."

"Who did she hire, as it seems she picked him or her instead of you, before you arrived," Hermione asked, somewhat aggrieved.

"Oh, I was a contender, but upon talking with me and gauging my experience, she decided by the end to go with the other guy, Longbottom, I think his name was," Kaimi said offhandedly.

Had Severus been sipping his drink, he surely would have choked on it.

Hermione suddenly went a little pale.

Kaimi, noting their reactions, asked, "You know this wizard?"

Hermione exchanged a brief look with her husband, who crossed his arms over his chest and sat... back, allowing his wife to explain.

"Neville Longbottom was a classmate of mine, same year and House, and often my partner in Potions, when Severus taught. Neville was terrified off him, and let's say he melted more cauldrons than a dragon in a lead foundry." There was the issue of Hermione sleeping with Neville once, which was the source of the hostility coming from Severus regarding the subject of his former pupil and bane of his teaching career, but that would be discussed when the children weren't around to prepare Kaimi so that she understood the delicate history between them. "Severus is not too fond of him, and Neville and I parted on awkward terms."

Kaimi's brows shot up, picking up on the slight inference, but let it drop.

To the relief of all the adults, food and drink arrived so they could change the topic to something more pleasant and less contentious, like the twenty-year reunion tour of the Weird Sisters who were playing in the amphitheater under the Three Broomsticks later that night. This was to be their first concert after breaking up during the war in 1996.

Kaimi was dismayed to learn right then that the English version of chicken salad on the menu meant chicken mixed up with an ungodly amount of mayonnaise, onion, and celery served on a single leaf of iceberg lettuce, not the copious amount of mixed greens with fresh fruit, chopped vegetables, grilled chicken, and light vinaigrette she was used to. It seems Kaimi and the Malfoy children were not the only ones spoiled on Hawaii's bountiful produce; Albert poked his fork at his tinned peach half sitting on his plate in a puddle of syrup, giving it a sneer that made him look like a miniature version of his father.

Hermione and Severus walked arm-in-arm up towards castle as the children ran ahead, dragging Kaimi with them. Since she had accepted the position, she figured she'd get the ten-Sickle tour with the Snape children, as she was going to be moving to Hogwarts at the end of August anyway. During lunch, Gabrielle had stated that if Kaimi was going to be on the staff at Hogwarts, then she wanted to go to Hogwarts too.

"I wonder if all four of our children will want to go to Hogwarts," Hermione asked, wondering aloud.

Severus stopped and looked at his wife. "You've decided? You're sure?"

Hermione smiled up at him and patted his arm as she began walking up towards the front doors.
"Albert seems to have already established a connection with his brother. As much as I would not have chosen to get pregnant, it seems we've been given this opportunity. Since the saying goes that Aller guten Dinge sind drei, we'll have to see if it holds true for four as well."

Severus stopped once more and cupped his wife's face in his hands, smiling down at her. "Have I told you how happy you make me and how much I love you?"

"Not since this morning," she reminded him.

Severus kissed his wife sweetly. He could have swept her up into one of those dizzying kisses that made time stop, but it had been a while since he gave her one of those kisses, and the children were hounding them to catch up. There would be time tonight for Hermione and Severus to show how much they loved each other, if they weren't too tired at the end of the day.

"You know, it's a good thing you forgot to pack the Polyjuice Potion, I would not want to be the fourth wizard in recorded history to go through a male-pregnancy," Severus mused, eliciting a chuckle from his wife. The third one had recently been recorded just a year prior in Argentina.

"Just be prepared for the jokes that you are the fourth one from Mouna and Jerry if your sympathetic pregnancy is as bad as the last time," Hermione warned him, patting his mostly flat stomach lightly.

Arm-in-arm they strolled, walking up to the front doors of Hogwarts castle. And they did live happily ever after.

The End

Chapter End Notes

A/N: Thank you to my betas for this chapter, JuneW and Hope.

"Iki kane" means "little boy" or "little man."

Fripping: 1910's slang for domestic bickering between husband and wife.
Aller guten Dinge sind drei: All good things come in threes.

Well, it's been a long, fun ride, and I hope you enjoyed it. It went a bit longer and got more complex than I anticipated, but I got it all out and committed to keyboard and screen in the end.

Please drop by the archive and comment to let the author know if you enjoyed their work!